The CHAIRMAN.—I really am utterly at a loss for words to express the sentiments which overpower me upon the present occasion. To have had my health proposed in the terms of praise in which it has been presented to you by so distinguished an individual and so valued a friend as Mr. Montagu Smith, and to have had it responded to as it has been by such an assembly as this, is really an honour which I cannot sufficiently appreciate, and which I altogether want words and utterance to express. I must; and I cannot but suppose that a great part of that praise which my hon. and learned friend has been good enough to bestow upon me is due to that sense of friendship which I know he feels towards me, and which, I assure him from the bottom of my soul, I do appreciate and respond to. For more years than I should like to name, or to think of, have we travelled our common circuit together; and this I will say, that, valuing our common profession as I do, and appreciating the merits of so many of its distinguished members, there is not, from one end of it to the other, one individual whose praise I would sooner have, or more cordially value. From my long experience, I may say that in all that can distinguish the advocate—ability, honour, fairness, justice, candour—and, in all that can distinguish the man and the gentleman, there is no one who in my estimation stands higher than he does, and no one whom I would more willingly have met in the presence of this Society. In equal truth I may say, that, in looking round to those whom I have now the honour to address, I know of no assembly of men whose tribute of regard I would more willingly accept or deeply value. I can only say, that, in the position in which I am now placed—although, indeed, I am painfully conscious that I cannot ask for credit for one tithe part of those merits which it has pleased my kind friend to ascribe to me—this I do know, that I desire honestly, conscientiously, and impartially to discharge the high duties which are imposed upon me; and if, in what remains to me of the judicial life upon which I have just entered, I can secure the good wishes and the kind feelings of the profession of the law in all its branches, the fondest object of my ambition, or my desire, will be abundantly gratified. I beg to thank you for the honour you have conferred upon me, and to express the great and heartfelt satisfaction, as well as the pride it has been to me, to have presided over you on this occasion.

Mr. SOUTHGATE.—The toast which I have to propose will excuse the inefficiency of the proposer. It is "The Bench, the Bar, and the Profession." Of the members of the Bench I shall only repeat what has been said by my learned friend Mr. Roundell Palmer, that, among the patrons of this Society, there is, I believe, a very large number of the members of the Bench, and also of the members of the Bar, and the other members of the profession. Amongst those who support the Society, I observe a very important feature is, that, to a certain extent, the Society is self-supporting, from the very large support given to it by the members themselves, and that the largest portion of its funds comes from that source. Under such circumstances, I feel confidence in the permanent success of the institution; and I am quite sure I may say, on the part of the Society, that they feel every possible gratitude to the other part of the profession, who, not being members of the Society, contribute to its funds and its success. Distinct from all pecuniary motives, this is the only society I know of in England—and, I suppose, if the only society in England, it is the only society in the world—where all the members of the different grades of the profession of the law meet together at least once in the year upon terms of equality. I do not know that any other society exists where all its members, from the Lord Chief Justice upon the Bench down to the copying clerk in the solicitor's office, meet once in the year for the good of their common profession. Gentlemen, a society like this is a society of the highest importance; and I am quite sure every person in the room will join with me in drinking the health of those who have been so instrumental in promoting its success. I, therefore, propose "The Bench, the Bar, and the Profession, coupled with the name of Mr. John Locke, M.P. for Southwark."

Mr. JOHN LOCKE, M.P.—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I may say that I rise upon the present occasion in the position of a gentleman under difficulties; for if Mr. Roundell Palmer felt difficulty in returning thanks, being one of the patrons of this Society, for the patrons, how much more difficult must my task be when you see in my person (not a very small one, I am sorry to say) the embodiment of the whole profession of the law. I rise on the present occasion to return thanks for every branch of that great profession to which we all have the honour to belong. With regard to the Bench, I am satisfied of this, that the expressions which have fallen from the Chairman to-night—his expression of thanks for the honour that has been done to him by this assembly in drinking his health; those expressions coming from one of the first judges in the land, and one of the most eloquent men that ever adorned our profession—renders it unnecessary for me to address you in terms of thanks for the Bench; but I may be called upon, perhaps, more especially, to return thanks for that branch of the profession to which I have the honour to belong—namely, the bar. Although an humble member of that profession, I do not forget that I have now been connected with this Society for a great number of years. I regret that I have not more frequently been amongst you, though my presence would not have aided you much in the pursuits which you have in view. But when, from fortuitous circumstances, honours have been cast upon me, I thought that by coming here this day I could do some little good to this Society. I can assure you that has been the object which has actuated me in coming here to-day. I am happy to find that this Society goes on from year to year more flourishingly. I think I see more persons assembled upon this occasion than I had the pleasure of meeting when I was amongst you before; and from that most inestimable document which has been read to us, I find that the funds of this Society are in so flourishing a condition, that they may bid defiance to the work of time and all other fortuitous circumstances that may arise, because I see that this Society is based upon a rock. It has the support of an incalculable number of members of the profession; it likewise has the appreciation of the profession at large; and it must not only go on further flourishing, but I will say esto perpetua. I would say that the bar much appreciate the honour which is done to them by being asked to attend at your annual festival, and I believe that many of those members of it who do attend are much better able to express than I can the feelings which they entertain for the prosperity of this Society. My health was announced as a Member of Parliament—and I would say one word upon that, not at all in vanity to myself, but with reference to the profession. I was one of those who went to a constituency, and had to contend with that vulgar prejudice which was raised for vulgar and improper purposes—namely, that they did not like a lawyer. Now that objection I believe—not by eloquence, because I do not possess any, but by honesty of purpose and by a clear and forcible statement—I entirely removed; and it was an agreeable thing to me to know that I had to represent a constituency who highly appreciate lawyers. If, in this country, there be a constituency which has a better opinion of us than another it is the borough of Southwark; and I will tell you why that is the fact. Within a very few years comparatively there have been three members of that borough who were lawyers, and I am the fourth. Now, I say, if there ever was a distinguished constituency upon the face of the earth—a constituency endowed with a nice sense of discrimination—it is the borough of Southwark. To them I owe the high position in which I am placed, and I trust I shall never be wanting in gratitude for the honour they have conferred upon me. Now, gentlemen, I have done with the bar; but I must, as the great duty has been imposed upon me of returning thanks in a triangular sort of way for the three different branches of the profession, return thanks for the other branch to whom we all owe so much—the profession at large—that great body who, in a great measure, rule this country, whether for good or for evil; sometimes I am afraid for evil; for, as the representative of a large constituency, I am bound to tell the truth. But we must not lose sight of this great fact, that there is no good in the world without some spice of evil in it; and when I see that great profession so good and so excellent as they are, and when I see there is so little evil among them, I am sure I do not do them any injustice when I say that the bar is deeply indebted to them, and I do not for one moment say that we are any better than they are. This I will say, that, in every branch of the profession, we all endeavour earnestly and fearlessly to do our duty; and when I have to return thanks for those branches of the profession to a Society like this, I can only say that it is a great satisfaction to them to find that those endeavours which they make, and which I may say are almost universally crowned with success, are appreciated by a body who are so able to understand and to distinguish the merits of every branch of the profession.

Mr. STEERE proposed the health of the three eminent gentlemen whose names would be found on the face of the programme as trustees of the Society. For twenty-five years there had never been any reason for the members of that Society to cry out for a Trustee Bill, because the gentlemen who had filled that important office had made integrity their foundation, and what cared any trustee for "misdemeanors," or "pains," or "penalties" of any sort, who rest upon such a foundation as that. They had a duty to perform that day which must be a most pleasing one—namely, to drink the health of "the Trustees." Might they long continue to perform the trust they had undertaken, and, when their days were ended, might the Society be so fortunate as to find like honourable persons to act as their successors in the important office intrusted to their charge.

The subscriptions announced during the evening amounted to nearly £400.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, July 13.

LARCENY, &c., BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this Bill, which he stated was one of a series, which constituted a consolidation of the various statutes on different points of criminal law.

Lord CAMPBELL said, when these Bills were read a first time, he understood that they would be laid on the table this session and considered, but that they would not be proceeded with till next session. That seemed to him the most expedient course, for there might not only be consolidation but alteration of the Acts; and though no doubt they had been most skilfully prepared, still if there had been any alterations, they ought to be well considered. He thought the consolidation ought to be done as a whole, and not piecemeal, and that these measures had better be postponed till next session.

Lord WENSLEYDALE said he thought these Bills ought to be proceeded with this session. He, in conjunction with the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and Mr. Greaves, had taken great pains to make these Bills as correct as possible; and if they were not passed after such pains had been taken, he despaired of any Act of Parliament of this kind ever being passed.

The Marquis of WESTMEATH called attention to the 57th clause of the Bill relating to offences against the person, as to the punishment for rape. He thought a distinction in the punishment for this offence ought to be made when it was committed by one person and by several.

Earl GRANVILLE remarked that alterations in that law should not be suggessed on a mere consolidation Bill.

Lord CAMPBELL said that if the Bills were to pass, he should advise their Lordships and the House of Commons to place entire confidence in those who had drawn them.

The Earl of DERBY said that he thought in a case where the House had before them mere consolidation Bills, the less discussion they had on details the better, and they should accept them as consolidation Bills, on the assurance of the Government that they made no alteration in the law.

The Bill was then read a second time, as were the following:—Offences against the Persons Bill, Malicious Injuries to Property Bill, Forgery Bill, Libel Bill, Coinage Offences Bill; Deer, Game, and Rabbits Bill; Accessories and Abettors Bill.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Lord CAMPBELL said, as chairman of the select committee appointed to consider how far the privilege of reporting the proceedings of law courts, without being subject to the law of libel, should be extended to the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament and to public meetings, he had now to lay their report on the table. The petitioners prayed that there should be an entire immunity for all newspapers for printing and publishing what was spoken at any public meeting. They heard the witnesses who were examined, and they came to the unanimous resolution that the prayer could not be safely granted in the plenitude in which it was sought, because a mob might be called a public meeting, and a member of a mob might utter the most calumnious attacks on private character. What was proposed was, that the party should proceed against the speaker, and not against the journal; but that would often leave the party without remedy. It had been proposed to make a speaker liable for a printed report of his speech; but that would be a great and important change in the law of England, and, he believed, was inexpedient. Therefore, they all came to the opinion, as the select committee in 1843 did, that such a concession was unnecessary, and could not be safely granted. At the same time, they thought they might, with perfect safety to the public, grant a protection against vexatious actions. They thought that a report of the proceedings in either House of Parliament, when strangers were admitted, should have the same privilege as was now extended to the reports of the proceedings in courts of public justice; because, in the opinion of the majority, all the reasons that existed for the privilege in the one case extended to the other. It was equally important to the public that the proceedings in Parliament should be faithfully published as those of the courts of law, and that those who published them should not run the peril of an action or an indictment. An objection had been raised respecting the standing orders of the two Houses of Parliament, prohibiting the publication of any of their proceedings, but one might hope that these standing orders would speedily be repealed. The most important alteration recommended for the protection of the public press was this: A journal contained an account of a public meeting in which observations were made, which, in point of law, were libellous. The individual might bring his action, and though he had suffered no damage, the judge was bound to tell the jury that they must give him a verdict. For the purpose of remedying that state of things as far as they could, the jury found a verdict, with a farthing damages. By a late Act of Parliament the plaintiff recovered no more costs than damages, and therefore in such a case as that the defendant was not bound to pay the plaintiff his costs, but then he was burdened with his own. In a recent case (Davidson v. Duncan), which had caused so much apprehension in all parts of the country, the jury found the report was a faithful report, and that there was no malice whatever, and they thought the plaintiff had suffered no damage; but the judge told them they must find some damages, and they found a farthing, and the defendant was obliged to pay the cost of defending himself, which was said to amount to £400. To prevent this, it was proposed that if there was an action brought against a public journal for that which professed to be a report of a public meeting, the defendant might plead that it was a faithful report of the proceedings, and that the plaintiff had sustained no actual damage; and if the jury were of that opinion, then they were to find a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff thus, instead of receiving damages or costs, would be obliged to pay the costs of a vexatious action. A difficulty arose as to what should be considered a public meeting, and they recommended that all meetings called by a sheriff of a county or the mayor of a borough, or the meeting of a town council or a board of health, or any other body meeting under an Act of Parliament, to impose a rate, or to consider the local affairs of any district, should be public meetings. This was a summary of the recommendations of the committee. He was afraid it was vain to think of legislating on such a subject during the present session of Parliament; but he gave notice, that, at the beginning of another session, he should frame a Bill in accordance with these resolutions, which he trusted might meet the approbation of Parliament.

Tuesday, July 14.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition from 2,000 creditors of the British Bank in favour of this Bill. In moving the second reading his Lordship said, the law at present was in an anomalous condition with regard to these banks. If a joint-stock bank became insolvent, a shareholder might obtain a winding-up order, and the Master in Chancery, or the Chief Clerk of the Vice-Chancellor, whose duty it was to wind-up these affairs, had the power of making calls on all the shareholders in order to raise a fund to pay the creditors; but that was a proceeding to which the creditors were not parties, it was a mere proceeding of the shareholders inter se. The object of the present Bill was, as far as possible, to remedy this defect, to give to the creditors the power of taking care that in making the calls proper steps might be taken to seize the whole of the property of the shareholders if need be, in order to raise a sufficient sum out of which the creditors might be paid in full. For this purpose it provided, in the first section, that the creditors might summon a meeting, and, if two-thirds in value thought fit, they might appoint a person to represent them in the matter of winding up the concern. If the company had become bankrupt, then there was no necessity for the choice of a representative, because the assignee in bankruptcy would perform those functions. The second section provided that where a company had become bankrupt, and there had been a winding-up order, the assignee might proceed with it; then there was a provision that the representative should have power to make any compromise whether for the discharge of the liability of all the shareholders or of any one of them, and if the compromise were approved by a judge, it should be valid and binding. Then there was a further provision of great importance. By the law as it at present stood, any creditor of a joint-stock bank, when he recovered judgment against the public officer of a bank, had a right to take out execution against any of the existing members of the corporation, and against any of those who were formerly members, limiting it to three years. Practically this last remedy had been found to be delusive, because it could only come into operation if the creditor were able to satisfy the court that he had exhausted all reasonable means to obtain payment from all the existing members; and in a large joint-stock banking company that was almost an impossibility. This Bill provided, that where there had been one of these compromises entered into, that was to be deemed proof that all reasonable steps had been taken to obtain payment from the existing shareholders, and the creditor would then be in a position to enforce his rights against the former members. There was another provision to prevent the shareholder of an insolvent joint-stock bank from going out of the country without giving security for the payment of the debt or of his share of the fund to be contributed. An objection had been made to the measure that it was not just to those who had got judgments and thereby obtained a priority; but he thought that it was but just to put them on a footing with the other creditors. It was not deemed unjust when a man became bankrupt that all the creditors should be placed on the same footing, though some of them might have obtained judgments; and there was a provision in the last bankrupt Act that when a man could not pay his debts a certain proportion of the creditors might agree that instead of insisting on their full rights there should be a rateable distribution of the debtor's property, and that compromise was binding on all the creditors.

Lord MONTEAGLE complained that the effect of the Bill would be to take away the priority of judgment creditors, a judgment in Ireland being equivalent to a mortgage.

Lord ST. LEONARDS thought the Legislature ought to remove the doubt, as to whether the law of joint-stock banks in Ireland was the same as in England, and give to the creditors of those banks in Ireland the same rights as in England. It would be a great injustice to take away a priority which actually amounted to a mortgage.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Thursday, July 16.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

Lord WENSLEYDALE, on behalf of the Newcastle Banking Company, moved the insertion of a clause which would retain for them the priority of judgments obtained by them against the Tipperary Bank; which was opposed by the LORD CHANCELLOR. The amendment not being pressed, the Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, July 9.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

On clause 9, prescribing the punishment for a misdemeanor under this Act,

Mr. HADFIELD thought that the penalties imposed by this Act upon delinquent trustees were too severe. Even now, prudent men hesitated to become trustees, but with these penalties staring them in the face no one would undertake the office. He thought the Government ought to take some steps for the relief of trustees, especially as a Bill which had been introduced by Lord St. Leonards elsewhere had not been proceeded with since its introduction.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL admitted that the alteration in the law pressed heavily upon trustees. A Bill for their relief, to which reference had been made, would probably come down to that House in time to receive due consideration. With regard to the clause immediately under discussion, he was desirous of making two or three amendments in it. Since the clause was framed, Parliament had made a material alteration in the terms of penal servitude. The shortest of those terms, at the time when the Bill was originally drawn, was seven years. It had now been reduced to three years. The committee would agree with him that it was desirable to retain the punishment of penal servitude, and he proposed to alter the clause as follows:—"To be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to suffer such other punishment by fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labour, as the Court shall award." The maximum term of penal servitude would thus be three years; but there would be some minor offences which would be punishable by fine, some other offences which would be punishable by simple imprisonment not exceeding two years, and in the worst cases there might be the addition of hard labour.

Mr. G. HADFIELD thought the clause still too severe, and hoped the case of the trustees would have the consideration of the Government.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

On clause 10, enacting that nothing in the Bill should exempt any person from answering any questions in any court, but that no evidence given by such person should be admissible against him in any prosecution under the Act,

Mr. BUTT objected to the clause as an infringement of the principle of law that no man was bound to criminate himself. An innocent trustee might be subject to an accusation under this Act; and the proviso did not altogether remove his objection; because, although a person's answer was not to be admissible in evidence against him, it might supply the links of evidence that might convict him in a court of law.

Mr. AYRTON believed that this was the first Act which was at variance with the acknowledged principle of English law—that a man was not bound to criminate himself.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that, if this clause were omitted, the statute would be useless, because the moment a bill was filed in equity against a trustee for any breach of trust, although not fraudulent, he might say, "I shall be brought within the provisions of the Fraudulent Trustees Act, and I will close my mouth, and will not say one word."

Mr. BUTT thought that the explanation did not meet the objections he had advanced. He should at a future period take the opinion of the House upon it.

Mr. MALINS maintained, that, in order to facilitate the ends of justice, it was highly expedient to retain the clause. He stated that he had been the day before engaged in a case in which a surviving trustee had appropriated £1,500 of trust money to his own use. In his answer he admitted the appropriation, thus saving the court all further trouble in proving the offence. If, then, the clause under discussion were omitted from the Bill, the administration of justice, instead of being facilitated, would be impeded under its operation.—The clause was then agreed to.

To clause 11, Mr. CAIRNS moved to add the following words:—"And nothing in this Act contained shall affect or prejudice any agreement entered into, or security given, by any trustee, having for its object the restoration or repayment of any trust property misappropriated." He said that now, for the first time, the misappropriation of trust money was to be made a criminal offence, but there were cases in which an advantageous compromise might be made, which the clause, as it stood, would prevent. To meet such a case he proposed the above addition.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not see that the words were necessary; but, in order to remove Mr. Cairn's apprehension, he had no objection to their insertion. The clause, as amended, was then agreed to.

On clause 12, Mr. CAIRNS said, that, as the Bill at present stood, a trustee, without any danger of suffering a conviction, might, from personal or other motives, be compelled to undergo the odium of being indicted for a criminal offence. A man might become a trustee on a marriage; children might result from that marriage and grow up, and family quarrels might arise, in which it might be the interest of some one of the parties to annoy the trustee. Under the present Bill nothing would be easier than to get up a case against the trustee, and, upon an ex parte statement, to procure his indictment at the Old Bailey. To check such a contingency the Attorney-General proposed, that, before any indictment could be preferred against a trustee, the person who wished to press the indictment should obtain the consent of the Attorney-General, or of one of the judges in equity. Now, with regard to the first check, the duties of the Attorney-General were already so onerous that he would not have time to investigate the cases which might be brought before him, and which would rest upon an ex parte statement alone. Again, an equity judge, if asked to determine upon an ex parte statement, would consider it a most noxious duty, and would refuse in any case to grant his consent. The expedient which he proposed was a simple one. It was to give the judge the power of hearing both sides in the most simple, inexpensive, and summary manner, and of then determining where civil responsibility ended and criminal liability began. In order, also, to avoid the chance of a person absconding, he would give the judge the power upon affidavit, which stated a reasonable ground of suspicion of intent to do so, of granting a writ of ne exeat regno. To effect this, he proposed the amendment of which he had given notice.

Mr. BOWYER thought this amendment an improvement on the Bill, because it saved the trustee from some unnecessary disgrace. The Bill, as it at present stood, made practically a very great change in the law of England, and would render it very difficult to procure men willing to become trustees. The amendment would modify this change, and therefore it should have his support.

Mr. COLLIER observed that the effect of the amendment would be that no criminal suit could be instituted without a previous suit in Chancery. At present a trustee who fraudulently appropriated trust moneys for his own use was as guilty of a crime as the man who stole money by picking pockets; but the anomalous state of the law regarding trustees to a certain extent protected him. The object of the Bill was to take away that protection, and to afford facilities for making the party who was guilty of the crime criminally liable. It appeared to him that the amendment would do away with the efficacy of the Bill.

Mr. CAIRNS contended that his amendment would, where the suit was already in existence, enable the judge to order the prosecution at once; and where there was no suit, by merely placing a claim upon the file, and stating that it was a case in which criminal proceedings ought to issue, the judge would, if he thought right, call the other side before him to answer the complaint, and, if a sufficient answer were not given, order the prosecution to be instituted. The only difference between his proposition and that of the Attorney-General was, that the one proposed that the judge should act upon an ex parte statement, while the other provided that both sides should be heard.

Sir F. KELLY thought that there should also be a power in the judge of any civil court—the courts of equity, common law, or bankruptcy—to order a prosecution, not merely in the case of suits instituted against trustees, but where, in the course of any proceedings in Chancery, bankruptcy, or otherwise, it should appear that a trustee had been guilty of some fraud that brought him within the operation of the Act of Parliament.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought that the ordering of a prosecution might be left to the discretion of a judge or the law officers of the Crown, for it was not to be supposed that they would do so without good grounds. If it were made imperative that a fraudulent trustee should, previous to prosecution being ordered, be summoned before a judge to be heard, the effect of such a proceeding would, in many cases, be to warn the delinquent to quit the kingdom as quickly as possible. With regard to the clause in the Bill, he was far from saying it was not open to objection; but he had proposed it in deference to the prejudices or apprehensions of some who felt a difficulty about assenting to the measure without the insertion of such a provision. He, however, did not himself see that an enactment to punish men guilty of fraud would operate to deter honest people from becoming trustees. The Bill proposed that the duty of investigating complaints and sanctioning prosecutions should be committed to judicial or official functionaries; and he believed that an efficient safeguard would thus be provided against the abuse of the law, while it could so speedily be brought into operation that not more than a few hours would interpose between an application and the issue of the necessary warrant. The first two clauses proposed by Mr. Cairns provided, that, if in any civil proceeding against a trustee it appeared to the court or judge that there was reasonable and probable cause for a criminal prosecution, the court might make an order sanctioning such prosecution. Now, such cause could only appear to the judge after the evidence had been taken, the defendant heard, and when it became the duty of the Court to pronounce judgment. Judges would put a strict construction upon these clauses; they would act with extreme caution, and he might even say reluctance. The result would be, that no criminal prosecution could be instituted until the delinquents had had an opportunity of leaving the country, and the judicial proceedings would become a mere farce. With regard to the third clause, the full extent of the frauds committed by a trustee might not be at once discovered. It might be ascertained that he had fraudulently appropriated to his own use £50, or £1,000, or £1,500; while, in fact, he might have misappropriated as many thousands. The effect of the writ of ne exeat regno would simply be, that the defaulting trustee would be required to give bail for the small amount of his discovered frauds mentioned in the writ, and would then be enabled to fly from the country and avoid the consequences of his crime. He maintained that the mode of proceeding proposed by the Bill was infinitely more efficacious than that which his hon. and learned friend wished to substitute, and he hoped it would be sanctioned by the committee.

Sir F. KELLY thought the difficulty might be met by providing, that, if there was reasonable cause to suppose that a trustee had absconded, or was about to abscond, a warrant might be issued for his apprehension, in order that he might be called upon to show cause why a prosecution should not be instituted against him.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would give the subject his consideration in the interval before bringing up the report.

Mr. ROLT thought that it would be obvious, that, in a law directed against guilty trustees, there ought to be provisions to protect innocent trustees against malicious prosecutions. As to the two clauses before the House, he would submit that the amendments of Mr. Cairns could be adopted as they stood. It was assumed that the innocent trustee ought to be protected. By that clause you submitted the accused to an ex parte inquiry before any steps were taken towards a prosecution. He was sure that a judge or the Attorney-General could not act unless they could do so safely, in order that the object of prosecuting a guilty trustee should be attained. The amendment caught the happy medium. The necessary steps for a prosecution could be taken at any stage of the proceedings as well as after the hearing, so that there was every precaution against a criminal trustee escaping, although there would be a fair preliminary inquiry whether there was a fit case for a prosecution. The only difference between the two clauses was, that in the one case a cestui que trust could prosecute a trustee ex parte without any discussion of the case, while in the other there would be a hearing, and at the same time he would be held to bail, and could not escape.

Mr. HENLEY said the object of this clause was to give some protection to parties against malicious prosecutions. Looking at the clause as it stood, he thought it would be prejudicial to the party accused, because he would go to his trial with the opinion of the judge or the Attorney-General hung round his neck that he was guilty. If they had some assurance that Government would introduce some words that the party should be first heard, he, for one, should prefer the clause in the Bill to the amendment.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he would give an assurance that words should be added to the clause giving the judge or Attorney-General—more particularly the judge—power to summon the party accused. He would not carry it to the extent of making the summons compulsory. He would have gladly done so if the judge had had the power to convict. That was his original intention, and he so framed the clause; but on consulting the judges they expressed such great repugnance to exercising the power, that he was obliged to draw the clause in its present form.

Mr. CAIRNS said, he was quite satisfied with the assurance of the Attorney-General. He would suggest whether it would not make the machinery more complete to add a power of issuing, in those cases in which something must be done immediately, a warrant or a writ of ne exeat regno.

The amendment was then withdrawn, and this and the remaining clauses were agreed to.

Friday, July 10.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

On the question that clause 40 should stand part of the Bill,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he could not but think that there was some misunderstanding in the decision come to on the amendment on Monday night. It was represented that it would be a great boon to farmers and others, having large stocks, if probate were allowed to be made in the district courts. Supposing the Committee to have acted on this view, he had endeavoured to alter the terms of the clause so as to include the class of property referred to; but he thought the Committee would readily acquiesce in another view, which was more prominent in his mind at the time—namely, the facility which would be given for fraud in dealing with funded property, if the amendment of Monday night were adhered to. The duty in the district offices would generally be discharged by clerks receiving 25*s.* or 30*s.* a week, and who could not be expected to be proof against pecuniary solicitation. Thus, probates might be improperly obtained to informal or fraudulent wills, which would give the parties taking them out full command over funded property in the course of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. The same course might be pursued with forged wills. When a person went to the Bank of England to transfer stock, the broker who accompanied him was understood to vouch that he was the party really having the right to the stock. Thus every facility was given for the transfer. On the last occasion, he had stopped at this point in order that he might ask the Committee to retract the injurious decision at which they had arrived. The course he proposed was this—to draw up a clause which should give the district courts power to grant probate in cases where the property situate within the district did not exceed £3,000—funded property and stock and shares not to be included. In the case of shares, a person who had improperly obtained probate, might at once transfer the shares to an agent who was implicated in his fraudulent proceedings, and thus the property would be lost to the estate. He threw out this suggestion with a view to further consideration, and he hoped that the Committee would adopt it. He proposed that the question "That the clause do stand part of the Bill" should be negatived, with a view to the introduction of such a clause as he had described on the bringing up of the report. For a variety of considerations, the Government thought it would not be wise or possible to give the district courts a power of granting probate beyond £3,000; but the matter would be open for the consideration of the Committee. It was only on terms of mutual concession and compromise that they could ever expect the Bill to pass into law.

Mr. HENLEY thought the more desirable course would be to have the proposed new clause brought up again in committee, and not on the report on the Bill. When the Attorney-General spoke of £3,000 of property within the district, he must have meant in any part of England.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he meant in any district, and would bring up the new clause in committee.

Mr. WESTHEAD said that he acted for persons who were well acquainted with this subject—solicitors and merchants in the country—and he could hold out no expectation that they would be satisfied with the proposed limit of £3,000. He was content that stock and railway shares should be dealt with as at present by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. To show the large amount of property which was the object of testamentary bequest in the North of England, he would call the attention of the committee to the following statement of the number of wills proved in the Diocesan Court of Chester and the Prerogative Court of York. In the five years from 1851 to 1855 there were two wills proved where the personalty was upwards of £300,000, four upwards of £200,000, six upwards of £160,000, four upwards of £140,000, ten upwards of £120,000, six upwards of £100,000, nineteen upwards of £80,000, twenty-eight upwards of £60,000, fifteen upwards of £50,000, thirty upwards of £45,000, 200 upwards of £25,000, 458 upwards of £12,000, and 2,066 upwards of £10,000. The total number proved where the property was above £10,000 was 4,055, not taking into account the Lancaster Court, nor the courts of Nottingham and Durham. He certainly thought that when there were to be but forty-two district courts in lieu of 400, they could afford to pay sufficient remuneration to those who conducted business of so much importance. Where was there any evidence of fraud in the present system? The registrar of the archdeaconry of Nottingham stated in his evidence that 4,800 wills passed through his hands in the course of twenty-eight years, and that not one of them had been repudiated or revoked, while only two contentious cases arose out of the whole. There was no reason, therefore, to suppose that there would be more frauds now than formerly if the courts were properly officered. With regard to the indexing of wills, no doubt that was of great importance; but Mr. Trevor, the officer of the Prerogative Court, stated that he could find the will of any one in the county in five minutes, and the name of any residuary legatee in ten minutes. There need be no trouble, therefore, in having a correct index of wills. He did not think it safe that wills probably drawn up by schoolmasters should be left in the care of persons in receipt of 25*s.* a week, when there was a probate tax of £900,000 out of which they could be sufficiently remunerated, which would induce them to transact the business in a manner agreeable to themselves, and with safety to the parties with whose interests they were intrusted.

Sir J. TROLLOPE hoped the House would not revoke the deliberate vote which it had already come to on two separate occasions.

Mr. AYRTON said it would be impossible to go on with the Bill unless the clause suggested by the Attorney-General was before the House.

In reply to Mr. WIGRAM, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he thought it essential to the security of the Bank of England and other large concerns, that their stock should not be transferred without the additional security of a metropolitan probate.

Sir F. KELLY said he had given notice of a clause, the effect of which would be, that, upon probate or administration being granted by the registrar, no stock in the Bank of England (and he had no objection to add East India stock and railway shares) should be transferred under a country probate unless it was countersigned by the central officer in London.

Mr. WALPOLE said there were two questions before the House. One was, whether any limit should be put on the probate granted by the district registrars; and the other whether, with regard to funded property, a prerogative probate should not, in all cases, be required. He could not understand on what ground the Attorney-General would be able to maintain the Bill at all if he limited the amount of the district probate, because all the arguments which applied against granting probates of wills exceeding £3,000 equally applied to probates where the property was under that amount. The statement of Mr. Westhead —that with regard to property amounting to £10,000 there were no less than 2,000 wills proved in Chester and Yorkshire alone—struck him very forcibly, and showed clearly that the limit of £3,000 could not be justified on any principle. What he should suggest was, to maintain the clause as the House settled it the other evening, the more especially as the Attorney-General said the Government did not stand pledged to the limit of £3,000. As to the introduction of clauses into the Bill, so as to insure prerogative probate in all cases relating to funded property, he should give it his full support.

Mr. ELLICE (Coventry) regarded the measure as one of the most important proposed to Parliament for many years, and the country would view its failure with regret. But having some experience in the probate courts, he doubted whether, if anything like a limit of £3,000 was put on the district probates, it would not be better for the country to submit to the inconvenience of the present system. The business of the probate courts was better conducted than that of any courts in the country, and he never heard any complaint made against them, except that they were too many. It would be better to give the present practitioners the exclusive privilege of practising in these courts for some time longer, before admitting general practitioners, than to give them an indemnity where none was necessary.

Mr. MALINS said, that the principle of the Bill was, that there should be a limit to provincial probate, but that it should extend to every kind of property, therefore, he was surprised to hear the Attorney-General say that the limit should not be £1,500 as proposed, but £3,000, and that probate was not to cover £100 Consols, or a single share in a railway or in a joint-stock bank. If the district courts were fit to administer property of one description to the amount of £3,000, what was there to prevent them from administering property of another description amounting to only £100? He believed it was the law that if a man obtained probate of a forged will, and the Bank of England paid him money under the probate, that was a good and valid payment. He could not, therefore, concur in the principle that the Bank of England required protection.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—The course taken by the Government was this. In order to accomplish what was represented to be a great good, and to give an opportunity to persons in humble circumstances to prove wills in their own districts, they departed from the true principle, which was, that all wills should be subject to that perfect registration which could be given by a general central registry in London. The general current of opinion in the report of the Commissioners was in favour of some concession being made, and accordingly a departure was made from that principle. The Government thought that £1,500 would be a proper and convenient limit for country probates. But the House had now come to a different understanding, and decided that there should be no limitation at all. Mr. Henley suggested an enlargement of the compromise, to which the Government acceded; and in order to meet that concession on one side, a concession was made on the other side that the country probate should not include funded property; and that understanding having been made, Mr. Malins now said that he could not see, what he thought must be plain to every one, why a distinction should be made between Consols and any other kind of property. The simple difference was, that a man might easily run away with a large amount in Consols, while he could not easily run away with more material descriptions of property. For his own part, if he were to express his individual opinion—which he gave up, however, in deference to that of others — he should frankly say that with regard to property locally situated in the country —he meant such property as agricultural stock, actual stock in trade, and so forth—there should be no limitation at all. With that expression of what he himself felt, he would only add that he should most unquestionably persevere in the course he had intimated, of opposing the motion that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill. But he did so on the understanding that he would bring up a new clause which would be considered, and he would not be obstinate with regard to the amount at which the limitation as to property should be fixed.

Lord PALMERSTON agreed with the Attorney-General as to the first question so distinctly put by Mr. Walpole; and it did at first appear to him that some limit ought to be fixed as to the amount of property locally situated; the general sense of the committee had, however, pronounced against it; and as the limit was not essential to the principle of the Bill, which was one of very great importance, and as it would be a very great evil if any difference of opinion as to what he would call the subordinate details should cause its postponement to another session; and as it appeared that they were ready to make mutual concessions—on the one hand, to agree that there should be no limit as to local property properly so called, exclusive of funded property; and, on the other hand, reserve the question of railway and other shares for future consideration—he did not think it would be worth while to put the committee to the trouble of dividing on the clause; he would, therefore, waive the motion for disagreeing to the clause. The new clause would be brought up in committee, and not on the report.

The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 51, as to the appeal from the County Court, Mr. MALINS said, this clause gave the appeal from the County Courts to any court of common law. He thought it would be better to give the appeal to the Court of Probate; it would be more consonant to the principle. He moved to insert the words, "Court of Probate, whose decision shall be final." In properties of small amount one appeal would be sufficient.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was quite prepared to agree to the amendment, but he wished to consider how it had best be carried into effect. In the Act referred to in the clause, the mode of appeal from the County Courts was extremely simple, and he would wish to preserve the same mode.

The amendment was then withdrawn, on the understanding that the Attorney-General would bring up a clause to carry it into effect.

The clause was then agreed to, and clause 53 was struck out.

On clause 85, Mr. W. H. ADAMS hoped that the Attorney-General would consider the propriety of increasing the salaries of the clerks of the county courts, now called registrars, in consequence of the additional work that might be thrown upon them by this Bill.

Sir W. HEATHCOTE said that last year, when the salaries of those officers was augmented, there was a general feeling that they were too high.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL received the impression from the debate last year that the condition of the servants was better than that of the masters; he looked on the decision then arrived at as a proof of the influence exercised over certain members by the country attorneys—an influence which had been further exemplified that evening.

Mr. SPOONER believed that the influence of country attorneys was not so excessive with those on his side of the House as the Attorney-General supposed.

Mr. CAYLEY thought the remark of the Attorney-General, with regard to the influence of country attorneys upon hon. members, was scarcely justifiable. What was it but the influence of the London attorneys and the proctors that had prevented such a Bill as that now under consideration from being carried many years ago?

In reply to a question from Mr. SPOONER, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL observed that the fees of the judges and registrars of the county courts would be regulated by the Lord Chancellor; and when there had been sufficient experience of the working of the system, the question would, no doubt, undergo further consideration.—The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 86, relating to the taxation of costs,

Mr. HADFIELD wished to know what was included in the term "costs," whether there was to be a table of fees for the business actually done, or whether, in addition to paying the probate, legacy, and succession duties, parties were to be taxed for the benefit of the proctors, the registrars, and the Rev. Robt. Moore. The principle of an ad valorem duty was most unjust, and tempted persons to evade the proving of wills. The proctors were the only class of persons who had sought for compensation as a profession.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the question before the committee was whether the rule which had hitherto been beneficially observed as between attorney and client should be extended to the case of proctors and those who resorted to them—he meant the rule that costs should be subject to taxation. What the scale of costs should be was a very important question to be determined hereafter. Whatever compensation the House gave must come out of a fee fund to be created by the costs which would be imposed.

Mr. W. W. HODGSON asked what the scale of fees would be, and whether the Attorney-General would lay it on the table?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the scale of fees would require a great deal of attention on the part of the Lord Chancellor; and he could not undertake to lay it on the table. As he had before stated, the fees to be charged must depend on the amount of compensation to be given.—The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 87, Sir H. WILLOUGHBY inquired whether any of the compensation was to come out of the Consolidation Fund?

Mr. MALINS said, in his proposals he certainly did not contemplate taking a single farthing out of the Consolidated Fund; neither should he propose any addition to the existing charges. What he desired was the continuance of the existing charges for a certain period.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the fees would be so regulated as to provide, if possible, an adequate compensation fund; but as to the other charges, although they would primarily come out of the fee fund, yet, the payments being of a permanent character, if there were any accidental deficiency in the fee fund, it would be charged on the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. ROLT observed that the business of the Court of Probate was carried on at present in buildings belonging to the College of Advocates. He thought that clauses should be inserted in the Bill, enabling the college to dispose of their property.

Sir J. TROLLOPE suggested that wills should continue to be deposited in Doctors' Commons.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that opportunities were presented for the deposit of wills in unoccupied fire-proof chambers at Somerset-house. The Registrar-General had furnished him with plans, which showed at how little expense all the wills in London and the country might be stored and arranged there, where they would be in immediate connexion with that great store-office of statistical information, and the office for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages. He hoped to see all the wills in the country so arranged at Somerset-house that they might be at all times referred to and inspected. With regard to the court itself, it was no doubt very desirable, if not absolutely essential, that it should have its local habitation in Westminster-hall, and one result would be that the advocates would follow the court. A great part of Doctors' Commons belonged to the Faculty of Advocates, which they had a right to dispose of; and if Mr. Rolt would propose clauses with a view to the attainment of that object, they should have his best consideration.

Sir F. KELLY said, he presumed the Attorney-General meant only copies, so far as country wills were concerned, to be deposited in Somerset House.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he regretted very much that country wills must remain in the country, because he thought the retention of them there prevented the collection of a great body of valuable information. The building of suitable depositaries in the country was contemplated in the Bill.

Mr. WESTHEAD observed, that he had given notice of an amendment which he intended to move on the bringing up of the report, that wills proved in any district court should be deposited in that court.—This and the last clause (88) of the Bill were then agreed to.

The committee then proceeded to consider the additional clauses.

On the clause fixing £4,000 a year as the salary of the judge,

Sir F. KELLY said that this judge would be precisely in the same position as the vice-chancellors and the common law puisne judges. He proposed, therefore, to limit the salary at £5,000.

Mr AYRTON thought the amendment ought not to be pressed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, there was a provision in the Bill increasing the salary of the judge in the event of certain other duties being undertaken by him, when he would receive the same salary as the other judges. The Government had gravely considered the subject, and he trusted, therefore, that the committee would pass the clause as it stood.—The amendment was negatived.

A clause providing an additional salary in case of the judge of the Court of Probate filling the office of judge of the Admiralty Court was agreed to.

The next clause, enabling the Crown to grant a retiring pension of £2,000 in case the salary of the judge stood at £4,000, and a pension of £3,500 in case it stood at £5,000, was, after some discussion, also agreed to.

On a new clause being proposed to regulate the amount of stamp payable on admission to practise in the Probate Court,

Sir F. KELLY renewed his question as to the retiring pension of the present judge of the Prerogative Court.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that it was impossible to give an answer to the question. If the judge of the Prerogative Court should decline to accept office under this Bill, most probably the House would deal with him as liberally as they dealt with the Masters in Chancery a few years ago.

Sir F. KELLY thought that some provision should be inserted in the Bill against the contingency of Sir J. Dodson deciding against accepting office under it.

Mr. MALINS said that if Sir J. Dodson should decide on not accepting the new judgeship to be created under this Bill, as his office was abolished for public convenience, it would be contrary to all principle if the same Act which abolished the office did not secure him proper compensation. The point was one which ought to be left in no doubt.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would press the matter upon the attention of the Government; and if they took the view which had been just expressed, he would bring up a clause in accordance with that view.—The clause was then added to the Bill.

Upon a new clause being brought up, providing that the judge should fix a table of fees to be taken by officers of the court and by officers of county courts,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (in answer to Sir F. Kelly) said he proposed to postpone for the present the question of compensation until they knew the amount of business likely to be transacted in the new court; so that the clauses proposed to be inserted by Mr. Malins respecting the case of the London proctors, and the clause proposed by Lord Goderich as to the proctors of York and Chester, would be considered at the same time. The whole amount of compensation provided for under the Bill could not, as he supposed, exceed £30,000 or £40,000 a-year—an insignificant sum compared with the advantage to be gained from the reduction of the fees.—The clause was then added to the Bill.

Additional clauses, enacting that fees should be paid by stamps, and not by money, that they should be paid to the testamentary fee fund account, and giving power to provide for incidental expenses, were also adopted.

A new clause, providing that persons receiving compensation should continue to discharge the remaining duties of their offices, was adopted.

A clause protecting the interests of Viscount Canterbury was likewise added to the Bill.

On the proposition to add a new clause, providing that the registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury should vest in the registrars of the court,

Mr. HADFIELD took occasion to remark that Mr. Moore, the present possessor of the office, had received £8,000 a-year for fifty or sixty years. His successor in reversion was Lord Canterbury, and the present Archbishop of Canterbury had done what Archbishop Howley had refused to do, and had appointed his own son, a young gentleman of twenty-five years of age, to succeed Lord Canterbury. So that there was a registrar in possession while there were two in reversion. Were all these gentlemen to be compensated out of the fees raised from widows and orphans? Had the archbishop's son any interest in this office, and had he a claim to compensation?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the appointment of one of the relatives of the present Archbishop of Canterbury as a reversioner in expectancy in succession to Lord Canterbury, was not recognised by the present Bill as entitling him to compensation.

Mr. COLLIER recommended the clause to be postponed, and to come up with the other compensation clauses; which was agreed to.

Upon schedule A, Sir J. JOHNSTONE proposed that York should be the place for the district registry of the whole of Yorkshire, instead of York for the West Riding (excepting the Leeds district), Richmond for the North Riding, and Hull for the East Riding. He supported his amendment upon the ground of economy, because a registry existed at York; and upon the ground of convenience, because York was the nucleus of a number of railways.

Viscount GODERICH said the population of the North and East Ridings was 400,000, while the population of the West Riding was 1,300,000. The average population of these districts was between 300,000 and 400,000; and he, therefore, hoped the committee would allow the West Riding to be a district of itself. The city of York was not within the West Riding at all; and it would be an act of injustice, which he was certain the Government would not commit, to inflict so great a hardship upon the large population of the West Riding as to compel them to go to a place at the very extremity of their frontier, and which was by no means easy of access.

Mr. B. DENISON said, if you were separating the county into three divisions for the purpose of selecting three places of registry, undoubtedly Wakefield, Beverley, and Northallerton ought to be selected; but for public convenience and safe deposit of wills, no place could be so well adapted as the city of York.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it not very reasonable to say that the inhabitants of all the populous districts throughout the county should be compelled to go to York, and, therefore, could not concur in the proposition that the sole registry should be in that place.

Upon a division the numbers were:—For the amendment, 67; against it, 177: majority, 110.

Mr. CHARLESWORTH proposed to leave out from schedule A the words "excepting the Leeds district;" which was assented to.

Mr. CHARLESWORTH also proposed to substitute Wakefield for York as the place of district registry for the West Riding.

"Wakefield" was inserted in the place of "York" in the schedule, and "York" was inserted in lieu of "Richmond and Hull."

On the motion of Mr. ROEBUCK, the words "parish or county court district of Leeds" were struck out.

Ipswich stood in the schedule as the place of registry for the county of Suffolk and north division of the county of Essex; but Earl JERMYN moved that Bury St. Edmund's, which had been a place of registry for centuries, might continue so under the Bill, and be the place of registry for the western division of the county of Suffolk, and Ipswich that for the eastern division of the county of Suffolk and north division of the county of Essex.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL consented to the amendment.

Sir F. KELLY opposed the amendment, on the ground that it went to multiply district registries and officers unnecessarily, and consequently compensation.

On a division the numbers were—For the amendment, 151; against it, 53: majority, 98.

Amendments were then moved, that new district registries should be inserted in the schedule—viz. Colchester, for the northern district of Essex; a separate registry for the counties of Monmouth and Glamorgan; and Plymouth, for the southern district of Devon: which were negatived, and the schedule was agreed to.

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the House having resumed, the Chairman reported progress.

Monday, July 13.

FRADULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

On the further consideration of this Bill, as amended,

Mr. BUTT moved the omission of the 10th clause, which he submitted would not only be mischievous in its immediate effects, but would establish a principle of most dangerous application. Hitherto no person had been compelled to answer a question that might tend to criminate himself. It was true the clause provided that the answers given on interrogatories should not be used against a party in a criminal proceeding, but interrogatories might be framed for the purpose of finding evidence against him.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said Mr. Butt had mistaken the object of the clause. What he proposed was, that a trustee, being already bound by civil contract to answer faithfully and fully every question which might be put to him concerning the use which he had made of the property intrusted to him, when he had committed a crime by stealing some of that property, should not afterwards be allowed to set up his theft as a defence to a civil suit in which he was required to make a full discovery. The clause was intended to apply to proceedings in a court of equity.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the 20th section had been postponed. The preceding clause declared that no prosecution should be proceeded with until the matter had been brought before a judge of one of the superior courts, or the Attorney-General, or the Solicitor-General, &c. The committee thought it might be desirable that the accused party should have a hearing, and, in order to meet its view, he proposed the following words:—"But he"—that is, the judge, or the Attorney-General, or the Solicitor-General—"shall in every case give the party accused an opportunity of answering the charge, where the same can in his opinion be done with a due regard to the interests of justice."

The amendment having been agreed to, the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

THE DIVORCE BILL.

In reply to Mr. HENLEY, Lord PALMERSTON said it was the present intention of the Government to bring on the Divorce Bill next Monday.

Tuesday, July 14.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT) BILL.

On clause 1, Mr. BOWYER moved that the chairman should leave the chair. He objected to the Bill, that it abrogated a part of the British constitution. The only argument in favour of the Bill was that the present system produced inconvenience to the City of London; but a Bill of this kind went not to remedy, but to destroy. Blackstone, in vol. 4 of his Commentaries, spoke of the grand jury as a barrier between the subject and the accusations against him, and he deprecated any attack on the institution of grand juries. Though casual inconveniences might arise, we ought not to shut our eyes to the advantages which we derive from the system of grand juries. It was said that indictments were found against parties behind their backs, but this might be obviated by providing that no indictment should be found without notice given to the party accused. Again, it was said that witnesses who appeared before the grand jury were sometimes bought off; this might be remedied by binding them over to appear. One part of this inconvenience was owing to our having no public prosecutor; but, seeing the example of Ireland, we ought not to abolish grand juries until we had tried the system of public prosecutors. If grand juries were abolished in London, it would follow as a necessary consequence that they would be abolished in every county in England.

Sir F. THESIGER said it had been sought by Mr. Bowyer to raise a prejudice against the Bill by referring to ancient names; but what would Blackstone have thought of the institution of County Courts? Committees on this question had repeatedly stated that the inquiry of grand juries was unnecessary where a previous examination had taken place before a magistrate. Grand juries themselves in the metropolitan district had given in presentments to the like effect. The publicity of the existing police-courts was such as to protect any one against a false charge, for every one might be as well informed of what took place there as though he himself had been present. The accused was confronted with his accuser; and a magistrate, carefully selected from the legal profession, was empowered to determine whether there were grounds for putting him on his trial. At present a new tribunal was interposed, who had heard nothing of the case before, and whose inquiry was a secret one, to decide whether the magistrate had done right in committing the accused party for trial. If they found a true bill, and sent the party for trial, they merely indorsed the judgment of the magistrate; but if, from the imperfect nature of the inquiry, or their mistake as to their duty, they threw out the bill, the greatest possible mischief resulted, not only to the public, but to the party accused.

Mr. AYRTON supported the objection to the Bill taken by Mr. Bowyer. In a question of public liberty, what confidence could be placed in a stipendiary magistrate—a mere creature of the Home-office? The strongest argument in favour of this Bill was, that it would prevent parties from preferring bills of indictment against others without notice; but so long as the Court of Queen's Bench retained the power of finding such indictments, where was the remedy? What was more, the Bill provided that the Attorney-General might indict parties without information, oath, or affidavit. With the abolition of grand juries, the nation would lose the right of impeaching a Minister of the Crown, and then what would become of the national liberties?

Mr. M'MAHON said the Bill ought not to be made to extend to the whole of the metropolitan district, because there were not stipendiary magistrates in the whole of the district, as in the City of London, where the aldermen administered justice in their way, and in Essex. The stipendiary magistrates were doubtless honourable and upright men, and did their duties admirably; but they were all dependent on the Crown, and the people of this country had always held that their liberties should be independent of the servants of the Crown. In the City of London, the only safeguard of the subject was the grand jury; for parties committed by the aldermen sitting as magistrates, were tried by a judge appointed by those very aldermen. It might be well enough to exempt ordinary charges of larceny and burglary from the inquiry of a grand jury, but any higher charge ought to be differently dealt with. The power given by this Bill to the Attorney-General was perfectly frightful; he might put any person on his trial for treason or any other crime, without any previous notice or proceeding.

Mr. COBBETT thought the change proposed by the Bill would be disadvantageous to the country in many respects. All the reasons alleged against grand juries in London were equally applicable to grand juries generally; therefore what became of the distinction? It should be borne in mind that grand juries at sessions and assizes received instruction from the judges as to any changes that had been recently made in the law, and thus went back better informed men than they came. For years great efforts had been made to soften the criminal code of this country, but the Legislature remained unmoved until a representation was made by a grand jury of London (which this Bill would abolish) against the barbarism of our criminal code, which hanged men for stealing a one-pound note.

Mr. BAINES did not think that this Bill went to subvert the grand jury system generally, or he would vote against it. Even Mr. M'Mahon was willing to do away with the inquiry of grand juries in cases of common larceny; and he had no doubt that in the metropolitan district generally it would improve the administration of justice. It was said that Mr. Justice Willes had expressed an opinion unfavourable to this Bill; but that learned judge had had little experience in the administration of criminal justice in the metropolitan district. Judges who had sat from time to time on the Bench of the Central Criminal Court, and especially the late Recorder, Mr. Wortley, strongly recommended the provisions of this Bill. On the part of the Government, he hoped that the House would agree to go into committee.

Mr. BRISCOE said that the argument of Sir F. Thesiger, if good for anything, was equally applicable to the abolition of grand juries generally throughout the country, and to that he could not consent.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that if he supposed this Bill went to abolish grand juries throughout the country as well as at the Central Criminal Court, it should not on any consideration have his support.

Mr. HENLEY could not understand the extraordinary distinction which was attempted to be drawn between the metropolis and the country. If they abolished the grand jury, the petty jury would be next attacked; and there might be strong reasons adduced why the decision of a judge would be preferable; but he did not imagine that the House would ever consent to the removal of that bulwark of the constitution which our system of trial by jury supplied.

The committee then divided.—For the motion, 80; against it, 187: majority, 107.

On the question that clause 1 do stand part of the Bill, Mr. M'MAHON moved that the clause should be postponed, in order that it might be altered to the effect that grand juries should only be summoned twice a year in London.

Sir F. THESIGER said that those who objected to the power which the Bill gave to the Attorney-General seemed to be ignorant of the power of that officer. It was in his power, in the case of any indictment, to enter a nolle prosequi; and where there was an evident desire on the part of the prosecutor to keep the matter hanging over the party accused, the Attorney-General would do, as he (Sir F. Thesiger) had done during his short official existence, direct a nolle prosequi to be entered. He had no apprehension of the police magistrates not doing their duty; he did not imagine that any of them would be bold enough to refuse to direct a prosecution because it might be obnoxious to Government.

Mr. AYRTON said, he should oppose the Bill on every clause and every word. The leading argument in favour of the Bill was that the stipendiary magistrates of the metropolis carefully sifted every case before them; but to pass such a Bill would be an indirect censure on the justices of the country. The hon. gentleman continued speaking until a quarter to four, when the debate was adjourned by the standing orders.

Wednesday, July 15.

JUDGMENTS' EXECUTION, &c., BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

Mr. MAGUIRE threatened to resist the Bill pertinaciously if it were pressed further. He and those who acted with him were quite resolved that the Bill should not pass this year.

The LORD ADVOCATE recommended that the Bill should be withdrawn, while he regretted the fact of an opposition based on no intelligible principle.

Mr. SPOONER said the opposition did not come from Irish members only, but from English also. He was convinced that it would open a wide door to collusive judgments.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, the Bill had been approved of by the law officers of the Crown and by the House, and it was only not the law in consequence of the opposition which the forms of the House enabled the Irish members to give to it. However, considering the period of the session, and the opposition that was still given to the Bill, he would now withdraw it; but he would introduce it in the next session.

MARRIED WOMEN BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of this Bill,

Sir. J. Y. BULLER (in the absence of Mr. Malins) moved that it be read a second time this day three months.

Sir E. PERRY said, he did not hope to pass the Bill this session, but if the Divorce Bill was rejected, he would seek to have another day's discussion on it.

The House then divided:—for the second reading, 120, against it, 65; majority, 55.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Thursday, July 16.

THE COMMON LAW COURTS COMMISSION.

Mr. WARREN said, he wished to receive some authentic information as to the conclusions at which the Commissioners had arrived. It was reported that York and Liverpool were to be taken from the northern circuit, that an assize was to be established at Manchester, and that there were to be three assizes for civil business wherever there were now three for criminal. He wished to know whether the Government proposed to carry out the intended changes of their own authority as representing the executive, or whether they would ask for the sanction of Parliament?

Sir G. GREY said he had that day seen a member of the commission, who informed him they were engaged in considering their report, and hoped to be able very soon to present it to her Majesty. When that was done he had no doubt he should receive instructions to lay it on the table of the House.

Sir J. PAKINGTON said, Mr. Warren had received very erroneous information as to the conclusion of the commission. They had agreed to the heads of a report, which was now being drawn up.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES &c., BILL.

This Bill was read a third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent).

FRIDAY EVENING.

During the present week there has been almost a dead calm in private business, and, with the exception of the Committee on the Shropshire Union Railway and Canal Bill, the Peers have been making holiday. This Bill was passed on the 14th, leaving the remainder of the week a blank. All the bills which had not passed Standing Orders in the Lords were disposed of, and will be read a second time before the 22nd of July, which will be the last day for second readings. On the whole, the decisions of the Commons Committees seem to have given pretty general satisfaction, if we may judge from the absence of grumbling, which is a good test.

There appears to have been a desire to discourage poaching on the fair rights of existing companies; and, considering that there has been no less a sum than £300,000,000 sunk in railways, it is almost time that the course taken by the present committees should be universally acted upon.

It is hardly necessary to mention the fact, that the Rogue's Bill (Great Northern Capital) was passed triumphantly by Mr. Beckett Denison's party. But no one who takes up the Times can help observing that the fight is raging in the columns of that paper, if anything, more fiercely than in Parliament. Two Committees on Opposed Bills will sit on Monday next in the Lords; but we shall reserve our notice of them until we see whether any new features are brought out in the Lords which did not come to light in the Commons.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

FRIDAY EVENING.

The decisions of the Committees up to this point have, we presume, influenced nervous petitioners, for a great many petitions have been withdrawn within the last few days. The Irish cases teach us best what we may not do at elections. We find, on reviewing the evidence given before the Galway Committee, that it was not lawful for Dr. James Valentine Brown to seal the voters' cards after giving their votes, and send the voters on to one Oliver, a baker; nor was it lawful for the said Oliver to let his outhouse to an invisible man, who (as was stated last week) telegraphed with two fingers through a hole in the wall; nor was it lawful for the free and independent voter to put his sealed card within those telegraphic fingers, and receive back bank notes. The Committee very properly came to the decision that this process could not have gone on for so long a time unless Dr. Valentine Brown and Oliver, the baker, had acted in concert with the telegraphic fingers, and consequently they reported thirteen cases of bribery; but, as usual, the sitting member slips from the grasp of justice. The House of Commons, however, appear disinclined to let the matter drop, as a motion was carried on Thursday night for laying all the papers in the Galway election before the House.

MAYO.—From the proceedings herein we learn a little more election law. It is spiritual intimidation for a party of bishops to sign a pastoral letter to the priests, and for those priests to make use of awful blasphemies for political purposes, and call down the vengeance of heaven on those who vote contrary to their wishes. The most extraordinary theory possibly ever broached in an election committee was insisted on by John of Tuam as legitimate, which was, "that he the titular archbishop considered it quite right and proper that a man should not vote except with his priest's consent." As regards the pastoral letter, and M'Hale's evidence in denial of his having authorised, or being cognisant of its publication, the committee clearly did not believe his testimony. The committee not only unseated Mr. Moore, who, like many of his fellow victims, pleaded ignorance, and was acquitted on his plea, but have in their report advised that the House shall take steps against the Rev. Peter Conway and the Rev. Luke Ryan, who have been the main movers in the iniquitous and disgraceful proceedings at Mayo. It is rather strange that the House of Commons, with its known jealousy in all matters affecting breach of privilege, should not take some steps of their own against those who ill treated the witnesses on their return. The result must be, that no man who has not iron nerves will ever dare to speak the truth in an Irish election committee, and the little truth which does come out in those tribunals will be extinguished.

BATH.—After a most tedious scrutiny and opposition on the usual points of bribery and corruption, Mr. Tite, the sitting member, has been declared elected by one vote. One peculiarity attended the investigation, which was that in trying a case of bribery, it came out that the petitioner's (Mr. Way's) proposer, was the bribing party, and, consequently, two votes were struck off at once—those of the briber and bribee.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.— The committee have reported in favour of the sitting member retaining his seat. They have, however, reported several cases of bribery and treating, and express their opinion that the evidence generally was most unsatisfactory, and disclosed venality amongst many of the electors. The sitting member escapes with a qualified acquittal, inasmuch as the report states that the man against whom bribery was proved, was not called before them to rebut the evidence of bribery and treating; and the committee were not entirely satisfied that he had such authority as to call upon them to make the sitting member responsible for his acts.

LAMBETH.—This case was made very short work of. The sitting member, Mr. Roupell, gave evidence which left apparently no doubt in the minds of the committee, that the petition was presented for the sole purpose of extorting money; and accordingly they have reported that the petition was frivolous and vexatious, and the parties will have the pleasure of paying all costs.

The committees on the Maldon, the Falkirk, and the Weymouth election petitions respectively, have commenced their sittings, but there is nothing of special importance to communicate. It is the old story of beer, beef, money, or influence.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The disastrous intelligence from the East Indies has caused great dulness and a gradual depression in the English Funds throughout the week, resulting in a fall in Consols of about one per cent. The directors of the Bank of England at their meeting held yesterday, resolved to lower the rate of discount from 6 to 5½ per cent. Foreign Securities have been in active demand, but without any material variation in price. The resolution of the Bank Directors has led to corresponding changes in Lombard Street in regard to the rate of discount and interest on deposits. Money is in sufficient supply, but the expectation that the contest in the East Indies will occasion a large defalcation in local revenue, together with a very heavy outlay, prevents almost entirely any material improvement in the money market.

According to a statement recently issued by Mr. James Lowe, the shipment of specie from England to India, China, Egypt, and Malta, for the half year just ended, reached £8,760,641, while from the Mediterranean ports an additional sum was sent of £1,845,399, making an aggregate of £10,606,040, of which the whole was silver, excepting £116,700. The arrivals of specie during the week have amounted to about half-a-million, a large proportion of which is reported to have gone to the Bank of England. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 11th July, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,962,215, being an increase of £493,680; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,592,160, shewing an increase of £75,304 when compared with the previous return.

Several meetings of joint-stock banks have been held this week, at which the communications reported to the shareholders are of a nature to re-assure confidence in the business of banking as a profitable employment of capital. These favourable reports are more satisfactory as coming soon after the unfortunate and disgaceful disclosures relative to the management and results of joint-stock banks, which, during twelve months, have attracted so large a share of public attention.

At the half-yearly meeting of the London and Westminster Bank, on Wednesday, a dividend and bonus was declared at the rate together of 18 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax. It is proposed and agreed to let the rest, or surplus, accumulate by the addition of 5 per cent. yearly upon its capital, and also to add any unappropriated profits at the close of each year until it shall reach £250,000. Also that £10,271 balance of profit and loss, after payment of the present dividend, shall be carried forward to meet liabilities extending over the succeeding six months, and to provide for the contingency of reduced profits during that period. It was stated that there is an increase in the deposits amounting to nearly £2,500,000, proving the confidence reposed in the Bank by the public..

At a meeting of the Union Bank of London, held on Wednesday, the dividend declared was 5 per cent., with a bonus of 7½ per cent., making, with the 7½ per cent. distribution in January, a total of 20 per cent., free from Income-tax, for the year. The Chairman stated that it was not intended to declare a dividend at that rate unless the profits should be sufficient to make, in addition, the usual provision for the reserved fund. The present addition to the reserved fund is 2½ per cent. on the paid-up capital, making it amount to £150,000. The directors indicate an intention to limit in future the dividend and bonus to 20 per cent. per annum as a maximum, after making due provision for the reserved fund, and to carry all surplus above the dividend declared to the credit of the reserved fund until it shall amount to £250,000, when the directors will submit a proposal for capitalising a portion of it by making an addition to each share.

At the meeting of the City Bank a dividend was declared at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, with a bonus of 10*s.* per share, both free of Income-tax, making, with the dividend paid for the preceding six months, a total distribution of 6 per cent. and the reserved fund is raised from £10,000 to £28,000. It was also resolved to carry forward the sum of £2,174 to the profit and loss account of the current half-year.

One of the main points of the business of a banker is supposed to be, in the first place, to transact a large portion of his business without any profit; and in the second place, to find opportunity for making large profits without the necessity of employing any capital of his own, in other words, by employing the deposits of his customers. And herein may be understood the mode in which we have seen, on the one hand, the paid-up capital of several banks all dissipated; and, on the other hand, the steadily-growing wealth of bankers doing only very moderate business, and the large dividends of profit which some remarkable examples have just now made apparent.

In this view, the test of success or failure seems to lie in correctly adjusting the amount of business to be done without profit, and the proportion of deposits which may be safely engaged in the money market, together with the degree of risk that may be incurred.

Montgomery.—Valuable Freehold Estates.

TO BE SOLD by AUCTION, by Mr. WHITEHALL, on Saturday, the 1st of August, 1857, at the Royal Oak Inn, Welshpool, in the county of Montgomery, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, either together or in the following or such other lots as shall be determined upon at the time of sale, and subject to conditions to be then produced:—

Lot 1.—A capital MESSUAGE FARM and LANDS, called Belan-ddu, otherwise Hendu, situate in the parishes of Llanllugan and Manafen, in the county of Montgomery, containing 197a. 0r. 27p., or thereabouts, of arable, meadow, pasture, and wood land, together with an extensive right of sheep-walk belonging thereto, now in the occupation of Messrs. Powell.

Lot 2.—An ALLOTMENT or ENCLOSURE of LAND, situate in the parish of Manafen, in the said county, containing 13a. 1r. 32p., or thereabouts, also in the occupation of Messrs. Powell.

Lot 3.—A MESSUAGE FARM and LANDS, called Dolmarch, situate in the parishes of Llanllugan and Llanyddylan, in the county of Montgomery, containing 39a. 3r. 18p., or thereabouts, of arable, meadow, pasture, and wood land, in the occupation of Lewis Evans.

Lot 4.—A MESSUAGE FARM and LANDS, called Penybryn, situate at New Mills, in the parish of Manafen, in the county of Montgomery, containing 50a. 1r. 1p., or thereabouts, of arable, meadow, pasture, and wood land, in the occupation of the Rev. Thomas Lewis.

Lot 5.—A MESSUAGE, called Dolrhieu, with the garden, orchard, and several closes of arable, meadow, and pasture land thereto adjoining, containing 11a. 2r. 8p., or thereabouts, situate at New Mills, in the respective occupations of Mr. Jones, Mr. James Cowdal, and Mr. John Clayton.

Lot 6.—A newly-erected DWELLING-HOUSE and SHOP, adjoining Lot 5, with the garden and appurtenances thereto belonging, containing 16p., or thereabouts, in the occupation of Mr. Francis Ambrose.

Lot 7.—The MESSUAGE or PUBLIC-HOUSE called the Woodcock Inn, with the stables and appurtenances thereto belonging, and the meadow therewith occupied, containing 2a. 12p., or thereabouts, in the occupation of Mr. Richard Jones.

Lots 1 and 2 are situate midway between New Mills and Llanfair, and the remaining lots are at New Mills, and adjoin the turnpike road leading from Welshpool to Tregynon. The whole of the property is within an easy distance of the Montgomeryshire Canal and the proposed line of railway from Oswestry to Newtown, where lime and coal may be had, and to which there are excellent roads.

The whole property is freehold of inheritance, and the greater portion of it is tithe free.

The estate being surrounded by properties strictly preserved, is well stocked with game, and there is good trout fishing in the river and streams in the neighbourhood.

For lithographed plans and further particulars, apply to Messrs. Tennant and Darley, solicitors, 3, Raymond-buildings, Gray's-inn, London; Messrs. Shaw and Tennant, solicitors, 14, Albion-street, Leeds, Yorkshire; E. B. J. SCHEMES OF LAND TRANSFER.

If nothing is done in the matter of registration, it will not be the fault of the legal members of either House. Besides the large suggestions contained in the Report of the Commission, there are already three Bills before Parliament on the subject, and the Attorney-General is expected shortly to produce another. It is needless to say that these projects are not intended to be pressed to any conclusion during the present session, and are merely designed to supply materials by means of which the scheme ultimately to be adopted may be put into a working shape. No great legal reform was ever satisfactorily carried out until the subject had been well ventilated in the profession, by the circulation of what may be called experimental Bills. Registration is the very last thing that should be settled in a hurry; and we believe that the many vexed questions connected with it will have a better chance of being solved in such a manner as to meet the views of the profession, and provide for the interests of the public, by the course which has been taken, than if an immature measure had been hastily forced upon the attention of Parliament. At a future time we hope to consider, in some detail, the plans brought forward by Lord St. Leonards, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Brougham. For the present, it will be sufficient to indicate the broad principles on which they proceed, and to call attention to the points which most need the consideration of the profession.

Of all living men, Lord St. Leonards has the strongest right to speak with authority on the laws relating to the transfer and tenure of land. But the person who knows best all the intricacies of existing law is not of necessity the safest guide in pointing out the course which legislation ought to take. The steady conservatism of Lord St. Leonards might have led any one to expect that his Bill for facilitating the transfer of real property would not be a very sweeping measure; but we were not quite prepared to hear a Bill for such a purpose introduced by a speech the whole pith and substance of which was an argument to show that facility of transfer was either unattainable or undesirable.

Lord St. Leonards urged against the scheme of the Commissioners an objection which is, no doubt, deserving of the most careful consideration, and is, indeed, one of the great difficulties in the way of the project. All frank advocates of a title registry readily admit that it would expose land to some of those dangers arising from the misfeasance of trustees, which are now confined to settlements of stock; and the question they have suggested is, whether the increased security against latent defects of title would not more than compensate for the new risk. But Lord St. Leonards scouted the idea of making the limitations of a settlement of land matters of personal trust, and rather curiously suggested another mode of saving the trouble of investigating titles, which involves a still larger dependence on personal care and integrity. Let a purchaser be content, without further inquiry, with the title on which his vendor bought, and we agree with Lord St. Leonards that conveyancing would be wonderfully simplified; but certainly the risk run by such a course would be, at least, as formidable as any that the scheme of the Commission would introduce. Lord St. Leonards said, indeed, that he had lately sold land on the understanding that the purchaser was to be content with the old abstracts, but we should have felt more confidence in his recommendation of this course, if the learned Lord had been the purchaser, instead of the vendor. It is one thing to sell without a title, and a very different thing to buy.

The Chancellor's Bill, though not a very extensive measure, attempts, for a limited purpose, to grapple with one of the chief practical difficulties that have stood in the way of all registration schemes. People have no great objection to settlements and purchases, and dealings of that character, being made, to a certain extent, public; but there is a good deal of sensitiveness not unnaturally felt about disclosing mortgage transactions. Lord Cranworth's proposal would draw away the veil from all private dealings of this kind. As a test of the extent to which the objection to the public registration of charges prevails with landowners, the Bill may be useful; but our own impression is, that the objects contemplated by it are not of sufficient importance to outweigh the reasons or the prejudices against such publicity.

It might, perhaps, be worth while, as part of a really comprehensive scheme, to give up some of the facilities of effecting private loans which are now enjoyed, though it would not be absolutely necessary, and possibly not desirable, to make this an essential condition of any registration Bill. But, we confess, we do not see in Lord Cranworth's project anything like an equivalent for the inconvenience which such publicity would cause.

Lord Brougham's Bill will probably have the effect which it was designed to produce—namely, to stimulate the movements of the Attorney-General by the appearance of a rival in the field. It is not, however, of much consequence whether the Government Bill be printed a few days sooner or later, provided it is put into circulation before Parliament is prorogued. Certainly it would be much to be regretted if by any lack of care or thought, it should not adequately embody the ideas of the Commission.

The Bill which was printed in connection with the Report has rather tended, by its crudeness in some particulars, to throw doubts on the practicability of the Commissioners' recommendations; and it is to be hoped that the measure to be turned out by the Attorney-General will be drawn with the deliberation that the importance of the subject deserves, and will set at rest the question whether it is or is not possible to put the views of the Commissioners into a working form.

BILLS NOT ACTS.

The statutory provision aimed against the procurement of a desired object by fraudulent pretences, has been recently proved in our courts of law to be susceptible of so many ambiguities, and to present such a fertile text for the ingenuity of lawyers, that we are encouraged to frame under it an indictment against the Lord High Chancellor himself. We certainly never came across a more patent fraud than that under cover of which he has succeeded in passing through the House of Lords a detached portion of the work of the Statute Law Commission, which was pompously announced as completed by the Report of that body, to which we drew the attention of our readers a few weeks ago, but which we certainly did not then anticipate would be pressed on in its present isolated and imperfect state. These Bills—there are eight in all—regulate, among other important branches of the criminal law, those which have reference to offences against the person and against property by larceny or malicious injury. And, on their being laid upon the table of the House two or three weeks ago, they were received with that absolute indifference which there attends, not inappropriately, on measures for which present consideration is not claimed. It was understood, universally we think, certainly by those whose opinion as to the details of the Bills is most worth having (such men, for example, as Lord Campbell), that these measures were then introduced in order to supply to their Lordships no uninteresting food for study and meditation during the recess. Great, therefore, was the consternation of the Lord Chief Justice to hear them last week proposed for a second reading. But little availed his remonstrances. Lord Wensleydale considered it "expedient that the Bills do pass." If they were rejected—nay, if they were even discussed—his Lordship rather naively intimated, he should despair of any efforts of the Statute Law Commission proving successful. And here occurred, on the part of the Lord Chancellor, abetted, we grieve to say, by Lord Granville, that misrepresentation against which we wish to record our protest. They actually had the hardihood to assert that the Bills merely consolidated existing Acts or parts of Acts, into so many single statutes, without materially interfering with the present law. This sop soothed even Lord Derby. Not ill-pleased, we may presume, to be spared the discussion of the details of arson, &c., in the dog-days, he reposed, and his brother peers reposed with him, in absolute reliance upon ministerial veracity. "If that be the case," yawned he, "no more need be said; we accept these Bills as Consolidation Bills, and in that character only."

Now, our readers shall judge for themselves if these Bills are of the alleged description; and to enable them to do so, we will take one or two of the group, and give such an account of their contents as shall be sufficient to make good our charge. We will begin with that as to "Offences against the person;" and it appears that in consolidating the existing statutory provisions on this subject (contained in sixteen Acts of Parliament), this Bill, among other alterations of the law, either creates altogether or newly regulates the following offences:—1. The delivery of poison to B., with directions to administer it to C. 2. The unsuccessful attempt to discharge a loaded gun. 3. The neglect of children (followed by injury to the health) by those liable to their support. 4. Garrotte robbery. 5. The ill-treatment of women and children. 6. The abduction of females who have no property. 7. The attempt by a pregnant woman to obtain her own abortion. 8. The concealment of birth by others besides the mother. Next, as to the "Malicious injuries to property Bill." Here we observe alterations of the existing law as to firing buildings; as to injuries committed by part owners of the property injured; as to injuring reservoirs, and we know not what besides. Then we have the "Larceny Bill." Is it a consolidation merely, to make it, for the first time, a felony simply to enter a dwelling-house in the night with intent to commit any felony—the existing law being, that there must also be a burglarious breaking. Nay, is it even an amendment, to insert in a larceny bill a clause which includes an entry with intent to ravish or to commit arson? Again, the Bill contains a provision against embezzlement by clerks and servants similar to the 47th section of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29; but with this material difference, that, whereas by that Act the property embezzled must have been received in virtue of the clerk's or servant's employment, it is now proposed to make that circumstance immaterial.

We think, then, without going into the subject more in detail, it will be conceded, that to call this batch of Bills "Consolidation Acts" merely, is a flagrant misnomer. The alterations in the law therein proposed, are very probably judicious ones; but they are such as peculiarly require the opinions of many practical men. On almost all of them every magistrate ought to have his say; and, we doubt not, many a member of the Upper House, conscientiously desirous of performing his duty as a justice of the peace, and well qualified by experience, would have taken an active and useful part in the debate, had his vigilance not been hoodwinked, as above described. And, had this course been taken, we do most entirely believe that these Bills—which, it appears by the last Report of the Statute Law Commission, were originally drafted by five nameless gentlemen, and afterwards dealt with by Lord Wensleydale, as the only representative of the Peers—would have come down to the Lower House in a condition more likely to pass with success the fiery ordeal to which, under ordinary circumstances, they would be there subjected. We say "under ordinary circumstances," and we use the expression advisedly; for it is just possible that a coup d'état is intended with regard to these measures, for which it shall not be our fault if the public are unprepared. It is a very great object with the Statute Law Commissioners, and those who look upon their proceedings with a favourable eye, to have something done. Unmistakeable murmurs have reached their ears. Indelicate allusions have been freely made to Mr. Ker's salary. Malapert reformers speak of the labours of the Commission with a prolonged whistle. It would, therefore, be most gratifying to more than one person in high station, if by any tactics it could be accomplished, that the parliamentary lawyers now scattered through the country should, in October, on examining their copy of the statutes of the year, find these Acts amongst them. How many a statute is discovered in this annual volume of which during its progress to vitality few in the House, and no one out of it, ever heard—how many inconsistent, foolish, hasty Acts are shoved through the necessary stages by their respective promoters during the last few weeks of a session, when members, the press, and the public are alike sick of the whole affair—those only can tell whose duty it is to piece together disjointed provisions, and attempt to explain inexplicable legislation. Was this the true reason why Bills which, by the Report already mentioned, seem to have been substantially prepared two years ago, were only initiated at this period of the session? Had they been introduced at its commencement, their framers, we are disposed to imagine, feared their fate in a select committee. Did some Machiavel suggest, that if they were, under the guise of Consolidation Acts, passed through the Lords so late in the session that the lawyers in the Commons were all dispersed on circuit, there was a reasonable hope of their being accepted without discussion there also? We trust not; and we believe the real grievance is, that the sanction of the Peers has been craftily obtained for future use without their understanding what they were doing. If, however, it should be otherwise, the publicity produced by discussion will tend to frustrate the scheme. And in order to promote this as far as we are able, we brave the risk of the stereotyped sneer of all detected conspirators—"Did you think we were in earnest?"

Legal News.

The Probates Bill was further discussed in committee on Monday night, and it was decided that the district courts should have power to grant probate and administration without limit of amount or reference to the nature of the property of the deceased. The Attorney-General proposed his clause, requiring metropolitan probate for funded property, stock of the Bank of England or of the East India Company, or shares in any railway or other company having its principal office within the metropolitan district. But so strong an opposition was manifested to this proposal, that its author withdrew it without going to a division; and Sir F. Kelly's clause, which was to the same effect so far as regarded stock transferable at the Bank of England or the East India House, was also negatived. Thus only one difficulty remains in the House of Commons—the adjustment of the claims of the proctors and officers to compensation. Upon this point Sir James Graham offered valuable advice. He recommended the House to pass the Bill in the form which it believed to be most conducive to the public interest; and if the change operated detrimentally to the proctors, let their claims be dealt with in a just and liberal spirit. Lord John Russell gave counsel nearly to the same effect; and it is to be hoped that these two great authorities will have weight with that side of the House on which they sit, and where the most formidable opponents to compensation are likely to be found. The measure is to be further proceeded with on Thursday next; but in the opinion of the Attorney-General it has now undergone changes which place it in imminent peril in the House of Commons, and probably will destroy it in the House of Lords. Without adopting this despairing tone, which appears, in spite of the speaker's disavowal, to have been intended to influence the committee in favour of the rejected clause, we cannot but feel that the prospect of passing a Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill in the present session is by no means so promising as we could desire. Just at this time, too, the Government has begun to move with the Divorce Bill, and it certainly does seem, that, although there may be time to pass one of these measures, yet that simultaneous activity in both is likely to produce a negative result. Much will depend upon the character of the next Indian news, which may possibly be such as effectually to divert Parliament from the subjects which concern this Journal.

Sir James Graham avowed, on Monday night, that he was, and still is, of opinion that the same tribunal which grants probate ought also to construe the instrument, and that that tribunal ought to be the Court of Chancery. In the Commission he voted with the Attorney-General and the Master of the Rolls in support of this view, which was overruled by the majority of the Commissioners. Sir James added, that the very name of the Court of Chancery so appalled the public and the House, that it would have been impossible to give effect to his proposition. It is vain for Chancery practitioners to disguise from themselves the existence of this undefined and unreasonable apprehension of the Court. We have very recently pointed out abuses and delays in practice, which can be, and ought to be, promptly remedied; and it is to be hoped that the evident unpopularity of the Court may quicken its authorities in introducing the improvements so much desired by practitioners.

The Attorney-General declared, in the same debate, that his own opinion was in favour of a completely central system of probate, which certainly he could never have entertained the smallest reasonable hope of carrying. He would have made the district offices simply receiving houses, which should forward all testamentary papers to the metropolitan registrar for examination. We may judge, from what has happened to the pending measure, how a Bill for turning the Courts of York and Chester into mere letter-boxes is likely to have been treated by the House of Commons.

Lord Campbell has called attention to the case of of Miller v. Salomons, still pending in the House of Lords, on appeal from a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber delivered in 1853. The oblivion into which this once-celebrated cause had fallen, can only be accounted for on the supposition of an understanding between the parties to it, much better than usually subsists between plaintiff and defendant. Lord Campbell reminds us that this was an action brought for penalties for sitting and voting in the House of Commons, and was intended to try the question whether the words "on the true faith of a Christian" could be legally omitted from the oath so as to allow Jews to take it. This question was decided in the negative, in the Exchequer, by a majority of three judges to one, and the judgment was unanimously affirmed on appeal in the Exchequer Chamber. Lord Campbell himself presided on that occasion, and he now states distinctly that his view of the law remains unchanged, and that he is prepared to act upon it judicially, if called upon, even at the risk of placing himself in conflict with the House of Commons. Lord Campbell also took pains to explain the exact bearing of the case of Mr. Pease, which has been so often referred to as affording a precedent for the attempt to seat Baron Rothschild by resolution. Quakers, he says, are absolved by statute from the necessity of swearing, and are allowed to affirm; and, therefore, the proceedings in Mr. Pease's case were according to law. There was no attempt to alter the law by a resolution of the House of Commons; but in the present instance, the course proposed has been adjudged to be contrary to law.

Lord Brougham made a speech on Thursday evening on the bankruptcy law, and concluded it by bringing in a Bill to which, it is needless to say, the Lord Chancellor promised his best attention, adding the satisfactory assurance that the whole subject is under the consideration of the Government. It will be remembered that in the month of January a Mercantile Law Conference was held, under the auspices of the Law Amendment Society, at which the evils of the existing system of bankruptcy were very fully stated and discussed, and resolutions were adopted calling for such amendments as were deemed expedient. A deputation from the Conference waited on Lord Palmerston, and at its head was Lord Brougham, who delivered a speech almost identical in purport with that which he has just addressed to the House of Lords. The Premier's answer, too, was exactly to the same effect as that now given by Lord Cranworth. He was very complimentary to Lord Brougham, and, indeed, to the Conference in general; and he promised to their representations "the greatest possible attention" on the part of Government. Now, we are far from saying that it was to be expected that the recommendations of the Conference would be carried into practical effect during the six months following its meeting. We could, indeed, have predicted with tolerable accuracy what has occurred. Whatever hopes may have been raised by the proceedings at Willis's Rooms, they could scarcely have survived, except in very sanguine minds, the courteous reception and official blandishments administered by Lord Palmerston.

SIMPLIFICATION OF TITLE.

(From the Times).

There are at present several Bills before Parliament for the improvement of the law of real property, and yet the prospect of any simplification in the system of titles appears as remote as ever. "Who shall decide," says the proverb, "when doctors disagree?" Who, that is to say, is to arrive at a practical decision, and to carry it into effect? The patient himself has little difficulty in deciding that his disease is curable, and that some definite treatment ought to be adopted; but during the conflict of medical authorities he finds himself absolutely helpless. Yet it is said that every man in middle life must be either a fool or a physician, and there are certain well-known remedies within the reach of the most ignorant invalid. But landed property is a more delicate subject for experiment than the human body. The theory of conveyancing is a mystery known only to lawyers; and until they are willing to apply their knowledge to the improvement of the system, the unlearned many will look in vain for any prospect of relief.

The law lords constitute the most astute, the most busy, and the most vivacious section of the whole community; and, unluckily, they are also the most pugnacious of mankind.

> "Age cannot wither them, nor custom stale
> Their infinite variety."

But their energies are perpetually wasted in warfare with each other. As often as two of them rise in succession to speak on any question, the House of Lords instinctively prepares itself for an animated controversy. The victory in all such cases necessarily remains with the opponent of any proposed course of action. Lord St. Leonards can defeat any Bill of Lord Brougham's, while his own measures are at the mercy of the Lord Chancellor and of the Lord Chief Justice. It seldom happens that the great legal authorities agree on the object which is to be desired, and they never concur in the methods suggested for attaining it. The Attorney-General is in the meantime generally pursuing in the House of Commons some course especially his own.

Those who possess, and those who desire to possess, landed property complain that they can neither sell nor buy with economy, and that they cannot even hold their estates with certainty. Now the ad valorem stamp duty for transfers of land and of personalty is precisely the same. The documents which are necessary to convey real property are neither complicated nor expensive, for the freehold of half a county may be conveyed away on a page of letter paper. The doubtfulness of titles, and the consequent difficulty of investigating them, are the sole causes of the enormous cost of transfers, as well as of the anxiety which oppresses many apparent owners of prosperous estates. Lord Brougham wasted his time some years since in an abortive and useless attempt to shorten conveyances. The records of title must be adapted to the circumstances which they recite. The complicated relations of a settled and incumbered estate cannot be expressed in a sentence; and the length of deeds, even when it is excessive, is but a secondary evil. It may be true that the rights of purchaser and of lender are seldom defeated by concealed mortgages, of which there has been implied notice; but the possibility of the risk is in itself a substantial evil, inasmuch as it is necessary to guard against it by elaborate inquiries and precautions. The danger of an insufficient title is far more common and alarming. A claim arising on the expiration of a life estate is sometimes prosecuted with effect, notwithstanding half a century of undisputed possession. It is also notorious that a safe holding title by no means necessarily involves a practical power of sale. Judicious proprietors shrink from all unnecessary exhibition of even the most faultless title-deeds.

A part of the inconvenience is, as Lord St. Leonards suggests, inseparable from the existing law of landed property in England. It is impossible to pass from hand to hand the title to a specific plot of ground, and at the same time to enable the owner to tie it up for twenty-one years after the expiration of any number of estates granted for lives in being at the time of the settlement. It is true that stocks or shares may be subjected to precisely the same limitations, and that the full powers of entail allowed by law are often exercised in the case of personalty; but it is only in the ownership of land that identity of subject-matter is esteemed of primary importance. If a hundred pounds' worth of Consols is missing, the trustee can make the default good by paying the value of the stock; but Whiteacre and Blackacre have an individuality of their own, which is thought to admit of no compensating equivalent. A farm may be settled on half-a-dozen existing reversioners in succession, with remainder to as many unborn grandchildren of the original owner; and it is necessary that at the expiration of all the contingencies provided for by the settlor the same farm shall be forthcoming for the benefit of the person ultimately entitled. A purchaser who inadvertently accepts a conveyance from any one of the intermediate holders will find himself helplessly defrauded. Every limitation which is permitted by the law involves a possibility of a flaw in the title, and skilful practitioners must necessarily be employed to stop up every possible gap.

Much may be said in favour of a more modest claim of interference with future generations. The right of disposal allowed to settlors and testators is not indispensable either to their own consciousness of ownership or to the reasonable security of families, but landed proprietors are scarcely prepared for a restriction of their present powers. It is important to distinguish between the unavoidable inconveniences of the actual law and the additional uncertainties which are created by a defective legal machinery. Lord St. Leonards is justified in asserting that titles to land must necessarily be complicated; but it is not to be inferred that the difficulty should be aggravated by secresy. Registration in foreign countries may be simpler and easier, but it is nowhere so necessary as in England. The longer and more confused the history, the more necessary it becomes to record it with accuracy. When the land of a proprietor is compulsorily distributed among his children, it would be comparatively safe to dispense with the registration of a notorious and inevitable transaction; but no memory can retain, and no sagacity can divine, the adventures of a property deliberately cut up into half-a-dozen particular estates before it arrives at an owner in fee. Under the most perfect system of registration it will be necessary for conveyancers to examine the effect of all previous dealings with the property; but the materials for the investigation ought to be collected and arranged in a public office, and not scattered at random in attorneys' offices, in muniment-rooms, and in miscellaneous repositories.

Lord St. Leonards holds that registration is impossible and undesirable. Lord Campbell declares that it is practicable and necessary. Common sense will adopt the more sanguine view, although professional skill is required in contriving an effective system. No other proposed reform in the law suffers so much from procrastination; for the main difficulty consists in beginning, and the process will become easier with every successive year. Landowners are in many cases unwilling to produce their existing titles; but they may fairly be compelled to place on record all future dealings with their property. The history of an estate for five years will convey some information to a purchaser; and when the registration has been in force for twenty years, nine-tenths of all the doubts affecting title will be at an end. A much shorter time will eradicate all the prejudices which proprietors may at present entertain against the system. The value of their possessions will be enhanced by a large calculable percentage, and their peace of mind increased to an extent which admits of no calculation. If the law lords and the law officers could be induced to work together for a single session, the numerous difficulties of detail which beset an evidently practicable enterprise might assuredly be overcome. The good sense which would be displayed by concert and mutual toleration would, perhaps, constitute as effectual a claim to public esteem as the ingenuity which is exercised in perpetual squabbles and in reciprocal criticism. The great dignitaries of the law have long since satisfied the world of their cleverness. Their ambition might now be more effectually gratified by establishing a reputation for wisdom.

HOME CIRCUIT.—LEWES, July 22.

(Before Mr. Justice WILLES and a Special Jury.)

Woods v. May.

This was an action of slander, the allegation in the declaration being that the defendant had maliciously and falsely charged the plaintiff with having committed wilful and corrupt perjury.

The defendant pleaded a justification.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. Hawkins, were counsel for the plaintiff; Serjeant Shee and Mr. Prentice were for the defendant.

The plaintiff and the defendant are both attorneys, the former practising in partnership at Brighton, and the latter at Brighton and in London. In the year 1855, Roberts, who carried on the business of a horsedealer and riding-master at Brighton, and had two establishments in the town, was desirous to dispose of one of them; and Charles Pool, at that time a cattle-dealer at Ringmer, near Lewes, agreed to purchase one of Roberts's establishments, at the price of £1,000 for stock and goodwill, but upon the understanding that only £100 was to pass in money, and that the remaining £900 was to be secured by a bill of sale of the stock, furniture, &c. The present plaintiff, Mr. Woods, acted as the attorney for both parties, and he prepared a deed in conformity with the arrangment between Pool and Roberts, and this deed was executed by the former in the month of June, 1855. Through some neglect in the office of the plaintiff, the deed was not registered in due course, and this led to the whole of the subsequent litigation, and was also the cause of the present action. In order to cure the defect in not registering the deed in time, it became necessary that it should be re-executed, and on the 3rd of October, 1855, the plaintiff, Mr. Woods, made an affidavit that on the previous evening Pool had re-executed the deed, and upon this affidavit the deed was registered. In October in the following year, Roberts seized the whole property under this deed, and next day Pool proceeded to London and made a declaration of insolvency, evidently with the object of preventing Roberts from taking the whole of the property to the exclusion of the other creditors; and Mr. May, the defendant, was appointed the solicitor to the assignees. Mr. Woods, the plaintiff, in the course of the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, was called as a witness; and he swore that between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening of the 2nd of October, he went to the private residence of Mr. Pool, in Norfolk-square, Brighton, and that he was asked into the parlour, and there saw Mr. Pool, and that he at that time re-executed the deed in question by writing with a dry pen over the former signature, and that he himself did the same to his own signature, as the attesting witness. Pool himself subsequently underwent an examination in the Court of Bankruptcy, when he positively contradicted the statement made by Mr. Woods, and, as the result, Pool obtained a first-class certificate, and the Commissioner made an order that Mr. May should bring an action against Roberts on behalf of the assignees of Pool, to recover back the money he had obtained under the deed by the sale of Pool's property. An action was subsequently commenced against Roberts, but he declined to contest the validity of the deed, and handed over the proceeds of the property to be divided among the general creditors. The defendant had sent a report of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and in which there was an allegation that Mr. Woods had made a false statement with reference to the alleged re-execution of the deed on the 2nd of October, to the Brighton Herald newspaper, which reports was inserted; and the defendant had distinctly stated to Mr. Faithful, a solicitor at Brighton, and other persons, that Mr. Woods, in the evidence he gave before the Commissioner in Bankruptcy, had been guilty of wilful perjury, and was liable to be transported.

Mr. A. W. Woods, the plaintiff, said that upon finding the registration had not been performed in conformity with the statute, he repeatedly applied to Pool to come to his office to re-execute the deed; and upon finding that he did not do so, he went between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening of the 2nd of October, 1855, to his house in Norfolk-square, accompanied by his clerk, Mr. Dempster. He was told that Pool was at home, and he went into the parlour, leaving Mr. Dempster outside, and he produced the deed, and Pool wrote with a dry pen over his old signature, and delivered the instrument as his act and deed in the usual formal manner. He said that he at once proceeded to his office and drew up an affidavit stating the circumstances under which the deed had been re-executed, and this was engrossed by his clerk, and sworn by him next day, and the deed was finally registered on the 9th of October.

On cross-examination, Mr. Woods said that Roberts had threatened to bring an action against him to recover the balance of his debt on account of his negligence in not originally registering the deed in proper time. It was his own opinion that the deed was perfectly valid; and Mr. Roberts acted again his advice in not defending the action brought against him by the assignees to set it aside. The plaintiff likewise said that on the evening to which he referred the door was opened by a female servant; and he had made inquiries in all directions to discover her and bring her forward as a witness, but he had been unable to do so.

Mr. Dempster, the gentleman referred to by the plaintiff as having accompanied him to Pool's house on the evening of the 2nd of October, was then examined; and he stated that he remained outside while Mr. Woods went in, and that when he came out he distinctly saw Pool accompany him to the door and remain talking to him a short time; and that Mr. Woods, when he returned, told him that Pool had re-executed the deed, and on the same evening he engrossed the affidavit that had been drawn up by Mr. Woods.

Mr. G. Faithful, solicitor, of Brighton, proved the conversation he had with the defendant, and that he said in reference to the proceedings that had taken place in the Court of Bankruptcy—"The fact is, Woods prejured himself."

For the defendant, Mr. C. Pool was called; and he stated that he had never executed any other deed than the one that was placed before him for that purpose in the month of June, 1855; and with regard to what was represented to have occurred on the evening of the 2nd of October, he swore positively that nothing of the sort took place. He said, that what was called the small sheep fair at Lewes was held on that day, which he had not missed attending for twenty years, and he left his house at Brighton about 1 o'clock, and rode on horseback to Lewes, and remained there till the evening, when he met a relative named Payne, who invited him to Ringmer, and they went there in a fly and passed the evening with Payne and other persons at the Anchor public-house, and he slept at Payne's, and did not return to Brighton until 8 o'clock on the following morning. He also stated, that, on the 2nd of October, his house in Norfolk-square was occupied by lodgers, and he was himself living at Roberts's, and it was, therefore, impossible that he could have executed the deed in his parlour under the circumstances stated by the plaintiff.

This witness said there was another sheep fair at Lewes, on the 21st of September, but he was sure the occurrences he had spoken to took place on the 2nd of October. He had no business to transact at the fair, and he did not make a bargain of any kind; and he was unable to give the name of any person who saw him in the fair on the 2nd of October. He sent for a fly to convey him to Ringmer, but he did not know where it came from or who was the driver.

Miss Ellen Pool, the sister of the last witness, stated that on the 2nd of October, 1855, the lower part of the house in Norfolk-square was occupied by lodgers, and that she remembered her brother going to the sheep fair at Lewes, and did not recollect seeing him any part of the day; and she also said that no one could have come to the house between 7 and 8 in the evening of the 2nd of October without her knowing it, and she was sure no one did come.

Several other witnesses were called, who spoke to seeing Pool at Ringmer on a certain evening about the month of October, but, on cross-examination, they were unable to speak with any certainty as to the particular day.

The jury, after a very short deliberation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £750.

LIMITED LIABILITY IN BANKING.

(From the Times.)

Great alarm is expressed by many persons at that clause of the new Banking Bill which proposes to allow any number of persons beyond six to associate as a company for banking purposes. No importance seems to be attached to the fact that it is not proposed that the law shall compel any one to trust them. It is said "they will enjoy all the status in society and all the advantages which a joint-stock bank enjoys." But a joint-stock bank enjoys no particular status, except such as it derives from its capital and proprietary. If seven unknown men, with £350 paid up, choose to invite the deposits of the public, are we to believe the public so incapable of resisting the invitation that we must make a special law to restrain them? If so, why not make laws to prohibit them from every other imprudence to which, in the exercise of their free will, they may be liable? The belief is that the public, on the whole, ought, with the assistance of the Criminal Courts, to be able to take care of themselves; and that, at all events, if they are defective in this power, they are not likely to acquire it by never being allowed to try. It would be at least but fair that the experiment should be made. A year's trial can scarcely yield us a combination of cases worse than those of the Tipperary, the London and Eastern, and the Royal British Banks; and if the Government still find that we are unfit to be out of leading-strings, they can then return to the protective method, which in the space of little more than twelve months presented us with these specimens of its utility.

A CASE FOR THE NEW DIVORCE COURT.—Matthias Wood, a respectable-looking man, was charged with bigamy, in marrying Susan Allen, on Sept. 30, 1841, his former wife, Phœbe Wood, being still alive. So far back as 1838 the prisoner was married to Phœbe Drinkwater, at Grinstead, Northamptonshire. Soon after the marriage the prisoner left his wife and came to reside at Upton-upon-Severn, and in Sept. 1841, he was married at Tewkesbury to Susan Allen, with whom he had lived up to the present time, and by whom he had had seven children. He had maintained a character at Upton as a good husband, a good father, and a good neighbour, for the last sixteen years. The first wife was living at Bedford, and the prosecution was instituted by her. The jury convicted the prisoner. When taken into custody the prisoner stated that he had left his first wife because she was in the habit of going with other men, and that he believed she was now living with a policeman. Mr. Baron Martin said, that, in these cases, he always wished to get at the real facts, and to know who the real prosecutor was; and, having taken time to make inquiries, he ultimately sentenced the prisoner to two months' imprisonment.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—Dr. Fletcher, minister of Finsbury Chapel, London, narrates the following in regard to the case of Eliza Fenning, referred to by the Dean of Faculty, in his defence of Miss Madeleine Smith:—"A considerable number of years ago I was sent to visit, on a Sabbath-day, Eliza Fenning, in prison, who was sentenced to be executed on the following Monday, in the front of Newgate, and who was found afterwards—alas! though too late—innocent of the crime. She was executed for a deed she never committed. In company with the Ordinary of Newgate, I conversed and prayed with her. She was dressed in white—an emblem of her innocence. In the same garments she suffered death as a criminal on the following day. I had no opportunity of judging as to her innocence. The expression of her countenance will never be erased from my remembrance. It is literally stereotyped upon my heart. From what was communicated to me some years after the fatal and melancholy event, I can now explain the expression of her countenance. It was the demonstration of injured innocence! When the event of her execution was almost forgotten, a baker, dying in a workhouse in the vicinity of London, said to the matron of the ward, or some other individual, to the following effect:—'My mind is heavily burdened. I cannot die until I make the following communication:—Eliza Fenning died innocent of the crime for which she suffered. I am the murderer of her mistress. I put the poison into the morsel which effected her death.' On the trial, the jury concluded it must have been the cook who had administered the poison, as they had not the slightest clue to suspect the baker. Yesterday, in the vestry of my own chapel, one of my elders stated to me that the baker was a relative of the deceased. There is no doubt that he accomplished his murderous purpose to gratify some long-cherished passion of revenge for an offence given him, real or imaginary, by the fated victim of his malevolence. Better that a hundred murderers should escape, than that one innocent person should perish by 'circumstantial evidence.'"—Times.

CANVASSING.—The best defence of canvassing—and, indeed, the only kind of defence that can be made for much of the old wild electioneering—is, that canvassing has, and the wild practices had, a tendency to keep up friendly, pleasant, and personal relations between classes. Reduce everything to a matter of business and calculation, and half the old English element in life is swept away. It was "our old good humour," as Clarendon calls it, which made our elections so many Saturnalia in former days, which made the old gentry popular where your modern millionaire is only feared, and which, if once it die out, can never be supplied. A man cannot scour his county on a hunter to canvass without seeing more of the people, and being brought into closer relations with them, than he well could be in other ways. The excesses of the old elections are to be avoided; but why should everything be swept away? Abolish personal canvassing altogether, and the solemn prig stands as good a chance as the hearty and frank man, not to mention that the gentlemen of the kingdom lose the advantage which a personal intercourse with the people will always give them over rivals.—Quarterly Review.

AN ELECTIONEERING INCIDENT OF 1751.—It appears from the journals of the 10th of May, says the Parliamentary History, that one Thomas Long, gentleman, was returned for the borough of Westbury, in the county of Wilts, who, being found to be a very simple man, and not fit to serve in that place, was questioned how he came to be elected. The poor man immediately confessed to the House that he gave to Anthony Garland, mayor of the said town of Westbury, and one Watts, of the same, £4 for his place in Parliament. Upon which, an order was made that the said Garland and Watts should repay unto the said Thomas Long the £4 they had of him. Also, that a fine of £20 be assessed for the Queen's use on the said corporation and inhabitants of Westbury for their scandalous attempt.—Quarterly Review.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—PRIORITY—NOTICE.

Jones v. Williams, 5 W. R. 775; Roberts v. Croft, 5 W. R. 773.

These two cases involve two rather novel points in connection with the general doctrine of notice—Jones v. Williams being a case where deeds relating to part of an estate were deposited as the title-deeds of the whole; and Roberts v. Croft one where part of the title-deeds, not including those by which the property was conveyed to the depositor, were deposited. In the former case the deposit was held not to have created a good equitable mortgage over the property which was not included within the parcels of the deeds. In the latter, the deposit of a portion only of the deeds was decided to have constituted a valid equitable mortgage. The facts in Jones v. Williams were rather intricate, but all that is material may be shortly stated:—The mortgagors held two adjoining pieces of land under two deeds, one dated in Dec. 1840, the other in Aug. 1843. The first was deposited in 1845 with the mortgagors' bankers, the plaintiffs, to secure an advance. The deed of 1843 was afterwards deposited, in Jan. 1855, with the defendants (Messrs. Williams), who were also bankers, as security for an advance obtained from them. The two pieces of land were used as one manufactory by the mortgagors, and Messrs. Williams were, on this occasion, led to believe that the deed of 1843 related to the whole. Subsequently to this transaction, Messrs. Williams, in Feb. 1855, got a conveyance from the mortgagors, the general words of which were large enough to include the whole premises; but in the course of that transaction circumstances occurred which were held sufficient to fix them with constructive notice of Jones's deposit. In order, therefore, to establish their defence of purchasers for value without notice, it was necessary to show that the deposit in Jan. 1855 was in effect a mortgage of the property comprised in the deed of 1840. If that point could have been made out, Messrs. Williams, who had got in the legal estate, and who, as was admitted, had no notice except what the deposited documents supplied, would have been in a position to rely on the defence of purchasers without notice. The argument was, that, as the deed of 1843 did relate to the premises occupied by the mortgagors, and was represented by them as including the whole, the previous deposit with Messrs. Jones being at the same time suppressed, Messrs. Williams thereby acquired the rights of equitable mortgagees over the whole property which was described as comprised in their security. The Master of the Rolls, however, held, that, although there would be a right to compel the mortgagors in such a case to make good their representations, it would be going farther than had ever been done to hold that such a right actually created an equitable charge on the land. His Honour accordingly held, that, so far as this transaction was concerned, it did not make the defendants mortgagees over that portion of the property which was affected by the plaintiffs' charge, and that the subsequent acquisition of the legal estate did not give the defendants priority. The other part of the case was simply a decision on the evidence that the additional security afterwards obtained was obtained with constructive notice of the plaintiffs' claim, and, therefore, did not better the defendants' position.

In the other case (Roberts v. Croft), the depositor was the owner in fee of certain property, the title to which depended on a long series of deeds, commencing with 1768. Some of the earlier deeds were in duplicate; and one copy of these, and the whole of the other deeds, down to 1826, were deposited, as the title-deeds of the estate, with a Miss Willes, by way of equitable mortgage. The deposited deeds, however, showed no title in the depositor, but merely brought it down to the persons from whom he had purchased. No inquiry was made on this point, and the mortgagor afterwards deposited two deeds, of 1833 and 1838, together with the duplicates of some of the earlier deeds, with other parties, to secure an advance from them. It appeared that one of the duplicates (that of the deed of 1826) recited all the previous deeds; but no inquiry had been made as to the whereabouts of these documents. Under these circumstances, the second mortgagees claimed priority, on the ground of Miss Willes' negligence in taking, without inquiry, deeds which failed to trace the title down to the depositor. The Master of the Rolls held, that there was no ground for postponing her, and considered that, if he attached any importance to the fact that no title appeared in the mortgagor, it would be necessary, in every case of equitable mortgage, for the Court to go into a regular investigation of title. With respect to the alleged negligence, his Honour said, that there was the same ground for charging negligence on the other parties who had omitted to inquire for the old recited deeds. This decision is calculated to save the Court from much embarrassment; but it is possible that the distinction between deeds showing no apparent title, and deeds showing an imperfect title, may not yet be altogether disposed of.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—CO-DEFENDANTS.

Betts v. Menzies, 5 W. R. 767.

There was an attempt in this case to bring correspondence in relation to the suit between co-defendants within the rule which protects communications between parties and their legal advisers. Until the decision of Lord Cottenham, then Master of the Rolls, in Curling v. Perring (2 Myl. & K. 380), there appears to have been no instance in which the protection was ever extended beyond the case of solicitor and client. In Curling v. Perring, however, a motion for the production of correspondence (which was referred to in the defendants' answer, and admitted to be in their possession) between the solicitor of the defendants and a person not a party to the suit, was refused, on the ground that the correspondence had taken place after the dispute which was the subject of litigation had arisen, and that it formed no part of the plaintiff's title. "If the right of inspecting documents," said his Lordship, "were carried to the length contended for by the plaintiff, it would be impossible for a defendant to write a letter for the purpose of obtaining information on the subject of the suit, without the liability of having the materials of his defence disclosed to the other party." In Holmes v. Baddeley (1 Phill. 476), Lord Lynahurst, and in Combe v. The Corporation of London (1 Y. & C. C. C. 648), Knight Bruce, then Vice-Chancellor, refused to order the production of cases and opinions which had been prepared and taken in contemplation of litigation, not only in the suit in reference to which the opinions were taken, but in a subsequent suit respecting the same subject-matter, and involving the question to which the cases and opinions related. But these decisions appear to be extreme illustrations of the rule, and are hardly consistent with other reported cases. Professional privilege is the foundation of the rule, though, as we have seen, it has been applied in other instances; but professional privilege, as Lord Truro observed in Glyn v. Caulfield (3 Mac. & Gor. 474), is a ground of exemption from production adopted simply from necessity, and ought to extend no further than is absolutely necessary to enable the client to obtain professional advice with safety. Beyond what was absolutely necessary for this purpose, his Lordship considered that it ought not to be allowed to curtail the power of a court of equity to compel discovery. Lord Brougham used similar language in Greenough v. Gaskill (1 Myl.& Ke. 98); and in Goodall v. Little (1 Sim. N. S. 155), Lord Cranworth, then Vice-Chancellor, held that there was no protection as to letters between the parties themselves, or from a stranger to a party, merely because such letters might have been written in order to enable the person to whom they were sent to communicate them, in professional confidence, to his solicitor. During the argument of the last-mentioned case, an opposite decision, by Lord Cottenham (Reid v. Langlois, 1 Mac. & Gor. 627), does not appear to have been cited. In Reid v. Langlois, Lord Cottenham expressly held, that correspondence between a defendant and his agent, for the purpose of being communicated by his agent to his legal adviser, was privileged from production. This conflict of decisions arises evidently from a difference of opinion among judges as to the general policy of the rule as to privileged communications; some judges leaning to the opinion that there ought to be no such rule, and others being of a contrary opinion, and believing that even truth may be purchased too dearly, when it is only discoverable at the expense of general convenience (see per Lord Cranworth, when Vice-Chancellor, in Baiguy v. Broadhurst, 1 Sim. N. S. 112). In Betts v. Menzies, Wood, V. C., appears to be indisposed to extend protection from discovery further than the reported decisions expressly warrant, or to apply it in any other cases than those of solicitor and client and witnesses. "No case," said his Honour, "had gone to the length that where two co-defendants corresponded, each being able to communicate with his solicitor, such correspondence was entitled to protection. It was not necessary that one defendant should communicate to another those things which he must disclose to his solicitor; and if he took upon himself to make any such communications, the plaintiff was entitled to extract from the co-defendant everything within his knowledge." In this case, as in Curling v. Perring, the production was resisted, upon the grounds that the letters were written after the institution of the suit, or in anticipation thereof, and that they related exclusively to the defence, which appears to bring the documents within the exception pointed out by Lord Cottenham's observations in Curling v. Perring, though that case is, no doubt, distinguishable, on account of the fact that there the correspondence was between the solicitor of the party and a witness.

WINDING-UP—LIST OF CONTRIBUTORIES.

Re The Kilbricken Mines Company (Libri's Case); Re The Court Grange Mining Company (Sedgwick's Case)*, 5 W. R. 773.

The question which was discussed before, but not decided by, the full Court of Appeal two months ago, in Ex parte Harding Re Morland Greig, has again come before the Court in Re The Kilbricken Mines Company—viz. whether or not the chief clerk has jurisdiction to settle the list of contributories under the Winding-up Act? On the one hand, it was argued, that, as (under s. 10 of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80) matters arising out of the Winding-up Acts were excepted from the provisions transferring to the chief clerk the business theretofore transacted by the Master, it was obligatory upon the judge himself to settle the list, and that, until he did settle it, there was no compliance with s. 79 of the Winding-up Act, 1848. On the other hand, it was contended, that, the chief clerk having certified, and there having been no appeal made within fourteen days, he must be considered as being invested with the same authority as the Master. The V. C. Wood appeared to have no doubt, that, until the list was signed by the judge himself, it could not be considered as being properly settled, but seemed to be at a loss as to the course to be pursued under such circumstances. In Ex parte Harding, the certificate of the chief clerk was not signed by the judge himself, but by the chief clerk only; and Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, therefore refused to admit a claim by the official manager of the British Bank against a person named in the order for a call so signed. But the Court held, that, as the order had the seal of the Court of Chancery affixed, the Commissioner was not at liberty to question it. In that case the Court of Appeal declined to go into any question as to whether or not the chief clerk had any such judicial power as had been exercised by the Master, as their Lordships considered that such a question was not then properly raised upon the proceedings on appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Bankruptcy. The time has come, however, when the decision of the question cannot be conveniently postponed any longer; as there is, and will continue to be, considerable embarrassment in dealing with winding-up cases in chambers, so long as it is uncertain whether the duty of actually settling the list of contributories, and of making calls, is to be discharged by the judge himself, or by his chief clerk. In Re The Court Grange Mining Company, Wood, V. C., decided, that, before any proceedings were taken by the chief clerk to settle the liabilities of individual shareholders in respect of a company being wound up in chambers, the list of contributories must first be settled.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

OBTAINING PROPERTY BY FALSE PRETENCES—7 & 8 GEO. 4, c. 29, s. 53.

Reg. v. Danger, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 738.

The law as to obtaining property by "false pretences" continues to give rise to questions of intricacy. A few weeks ago[a] we had occasion, in another part of this Journal, to make some remarks on the case of Reg. v. Bryan, in which a conviction under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 53, was quashed. There, it will be remembered, the prisoner had obtained money by pretending that certain spoons he offered in pledge were equal in quality of plating to those made by Elkington & Co., whereas he knew they were of inferior quality; and the majority of the judges held, that a mere misrepresentation of the quality of an article on which money was obtained was not within the statute. In the present case the prisoner, Danger, was indicted under the same section for obtaining a "valuable security" by false pretences; and it appeared that the prisoner had pretended falsely to the prosecutor that he, the prisoner, had at his disposal, for sale, some leather; and that the prosecutor, relying on such assurance, agreed to buy such leather from him, and to accept a bill of exchange drawn by the prisoner, and payable to his order, for the amount of the purchase money. It was objected for the prisoner that no "valuable security" within the meaning of the Act had been obtained by the prisoner from the prosecutor; for that, until the acceptance by the prosecutor, the property in the bill of exchange was in the prisoner, and that the prosecutor acquired no property therein by writing his name as acceptor—the chattel obtained was the chattel of the prisoner himself; all that was obtained was evidence of a promise on the part of the prosecutor to pay. On the other side, it was urged for the Crown, that a person stealing his own goods may be indicted for larceny; and that there was, moreover, nothing in the Act to show that the security must belong to some person other than him by whom it was obtained. The opinion of the Court, however, was again in favour of the prisoner. They held, that, to support an indictment under this provision, it is essential to show that the document was a valuable security while in the hands of the prosecutor; but while it was in the hands of the prosecutor it was—not having been indorsed by the prisoner—of no value to the prosecutor, nor to any one else, unless to the prisoner himself. "In obtaining it," said the Court, "the prisoner was guilty of a gross fraud, but, we think, not of a fraud contemplated by this Act of Parliament." The conviction was quashed.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—LIABILITY FOR EXPENSES OF WITNESSES.

Lee v. Everest, 5 W. R., Exch., 759.

This is a very satisfactory decision. The only thing of which we have to complain is, that such a sensible limitation of the liability of attorneys should ever have required to be judicially determined. The case arose thus:—The defendant was attorney to the parish officers at Epsom, and certain poor-rates assessed on property within that parish were appealed against. The assessments in question had been made by one P., a surveyor; and the defendant, as the attorney for the parish, and in order to provide evidence in support of the rate at the ensuing sessions, wrote to P., requesting him to secure the services of an experienced valuer, to justify the assessment. The valuer selected by P. was the plaintiff in the present action, and he proceeded to make a survey and report of the premises in question, and incurred considerable expense in order to qualify himself to give the evidence he afterwards tendered at the hearing of the appeals. At the trial, a verdict for the plaintiff was entered for the amount claimed; but leave was reserved to move to enter a nonsuit if the Court should be of opinion, on the above facts, that the defendant was not responsible. It was now urged, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the attorney was liable personally, the charges and expenses having been incurred by the plaintiff at his request. And those decisions were relied upon, which determined that the attorney and not the client is liable to any bailiff employed by the former to execute a writ issued on behalf of the latter—viz. Maile v. Mann (2 Exch. 603), and, more recently, Brewer v. Jones (10 Exch. 655). On the other hand, it was urged for the defendant, that it had been decided by Robins v. Bridge (3 M. & W. 114) that an attorney is not personally liable to a witness whom he subpœnaes, for the expenses of his attendance to give evidence; and that there was no sound distinction between the case of a witness who was already qualified, and one who had first to qualify himself. To this reasoning the Court assented. "It is a clear rule," said the Chief Baron, "that where a person is presumably acting as agent for another, the principal is bound, and not the agent." In this case the defendant had had no communication with the plaintiff except in the character of attorney to the parish officers; against whom, indeed, the plaintiff had, in the first instance, made his claim. The engagement of a witness to give evidence is not with the attorney but with the client, by whom alone an action can be brought for any breach of duty committed by the witness.

We may add to the observations of the Court, that, in the case of the bailiff, the only privity of contract which exists is between him and the attorney, which distinguishes it completely from the present action. We may also refer to the case of Mayberry v. Mansfield (9 Q. B. 754), by which it was determined that an attorney is not liable to be sued by the sheriff for his fees in executing a writ, in the absence of any special circumstances showing that he intended to make himself personally liable; though the sheriff has, by statute, a right to recover such fees from the client.

MAGISTRATE, ACTION AGAINST—WHEN IT LIES.

Gelen v. Hall, 5 W. R., Exch., 757.

This was an action brought against a magistrate for having assaulted and falsely imprisoned the plaintiff, and for having convicted him "wrongfully, wilfully, and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause," of a breach of a bye-law of a railway company, whereby he was compelled to pay a sum of money; but which conviction was afterwards quashed on appeal to the Quarter Sessions. It appeared that the plaintiff had been, in the first instance, charged with travelling on the railway with an expired ticket, and pending the hearing of the charge had been committed by the defendant for safe custody to the House of Correction. Before, however, the case came on, it was found out that the ticket in question had been accidentally misdated by the company, whereupon he was discharged from custody, but was served with a summons to appear to answer the charge of having refused to give up his ticket on demand, there having been some delay in his doing so when asked on his journey to produce it. At the trial, the jury, under the direction of Lord Campbell, found for the defendant on the count for false imprisonment, with leave to the plaintiff to enter a verdict of £20 damages. As to the count for the improper conviction, the plaintiff had a verdict with considerable damages. A rule was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff to enter the verdict for him on the first count; and another, on behalf of the defendant, to set aside the verdict on the second count, and to arrest the judgment. These rules came on to be argued together; and the Court held, in the first place, that the defendant was entitled to retain his verdict on the first count, because he was justified in point of law, by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 16, in committing the defendant to the House of Correction for the time that should elapse before the hearing of the charge. The Court also held that the rule for setting aside the verdict obtained by the plaintiff must be made absolute; not with reference to the question as to whether any action lay against the magistrate (with regard to which they declined for the present to pronounce any opinion), but because, after perusing the evidence which had been offered at the trial, they thought it was proper that the case should be submitted to a second jury.

As to the question whether any action at all lay against the magistrate, it is to be remembered, that, at common law, a justice, whose conviction was quashed from any defect, was liable for anything done under it, just as any other person by whose authority a writ is issued which is afterwards set aside. It was in order to protect magistrates in the execution of their duties that it was provided by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, that, in the declaration of every action brought against a justice for any act done by him in the execution of his duty as such justice, and with respect to a matter within his jurisdiction as such, it must be expressly alleged that the act was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause; and that, if such allegation be not proved at the trial, the defendant shall have a verdict. On the other hand, with regard to judges of the superior and other courts of record, the rule seems to be, that no action will in general lie for acts done in the execution of their office. In case of corruption, the remedy is not by action at the suit of the party injured, but by way of criminal information. Yet it has been held, that even a judge of record may be sued for an act done by his command, where he has no jurisdiction, and is not misinformed as to the facts on which his jurisdiction depends. (See Houlden v. Smith, 14 Q. B. 841).

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS ON PROMISSORY NOTES.

Lindus v. Melrose, 5 W. R., Exch., 758.

This was an action against three of the directors and the secretary of a joint-stock company "limited," registered under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 157, on a promissory note signed by them. It appeared from the note that it was for a sum of money "for value received in stock" on account of the company. It was held by the Court, that the note ought to be construed as if the words between inverted commas had been in a parenthesis, and then it would appear that the parties against whom the action had been brought had signed the note on account or on behalf of the company only, and not intending to bind themselves personally; for otherwise the same instrument would show on its face that the consideration for it was received by one party, and the promise made by another.

It is somewhat singular that neither in the argument nor the judgment of this case was any allusion made to that of Aggs v. Nicholson (1 H. & N. 165), and yet it is much in point. There a promissory note was signed by two directors of a joint-stock company, and it appeared by the note itself that the promise was made by the directors so signing "by and on behalf of the society; value received." Here, also, it was held that the note was binding on the company, and not on the directors who signed it personally.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A Special Meeting of the Managing Committee was held on the 17th instant.

A deputation from the Manchester Law Society attended to make arrangements with the Committee with reference to the Annual Provincial Meeting of the Association, and it was resolved that the meeting should be held at Manchester on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of October next, the opinion generally expressed at the meeting at Liverpool last year being, that the most convenient time for assembling would be during the first whole week in October.

The Secretary and Assistant-Secretary were instructed to co-operate with Mr. Marriott, the Honorary Secretary to the Manchester Law Society, in securing the attendance of members and the reading of papers, and generally in carrying out such measures as the Manchester Law Society might deem expedient to promote the success of the meeting.

The Secretary reported that in accordance with the resolution passed at the previous meeting, a third letter had been sent to the editor of the Law Times on the 15th instant, asking for the names of the two members of the Society whom he wished to place upon the Committee of Investigation proposed by himself, and that no reply had been received.

The Assistant-Secretary reported that the petition of the Association for the amendment of the "Married Women's Reversionary Interest Bill" had been presented, through Lord St. Leonards, to the House of Lords.

The Assistant-Secretary also reported an interview with the Solicitor-General on amendments in the Attorneys and Solicitors' Colonial Courts Bill," and the "Summary Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace Bill," to which the Committee had called attention; and that the Solicitor-General informed him they had been considered with a desire to meet the wishes of the Committee.

The Committee discussed the proposed new clauses in the Probates and Letters of Administration Bill, excepting from the jurisdiction of district offices cases in which property may have consisted wholly or in part of money in the public funds, or of shares in public companies, and the reasons assigned for the necessity of such clauses.

The consideration of the other business on the Agenda List was postponed.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

END OF THE COLCLOUGH WILL CASE.

The final ending of the long-litigated case of Boyse v. Rossborough may, under all the circumstances, be considered a fair compromise for both of the hostile parties. The terms, as agreed on last week, down at the Wexford assizes, are as follows:—Rossborough and wife, the defendants, are to remain in the undisturbed possession of the Tintern Abbey estates—which are valued at between eight and nine thousand a year—subject only to Mrs. Boyse's jointure of five hundred per annum; while Mrs. Boyse is to retain all the rents and profits received by her while in possession of the estates, and part of which, about £22,000, is lodged in the Court of Chancery. Thus suddenly terminates this great trial, in which six leading counsel were engaged on special retainers. The merits of the case have so frequently been discussed in courts of justice and by the public press during several years back, that it is needless to recur to the subject, especially as all litigation is now at an end. Some idea may be formed of the strong feeling which prevailed in the county of Wexford against the plaintiff, when it is recollected that in the House of Lords a very decided opinion was expressed in her favour, and that, notwithstanding this, the jury were found to be so manifestly leaning against her, that she was advised to compromise. In fact, when the application to change the venue to another county was refused by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, those who were best acquainted with the subject looked upon the case as virtually decided against Mrs. Boyse, being aware of her unpopularity in Wexford, and of the prevalent feeling throughout that county in favour of the Rossboroughs. On one account, the compromise is most unsatisfactory. It leaves the vexed question of "undue influence" just where it was. The plaintiff is in this false position—that, after Lord Cranworth, in delivering the judgment of the House of Lords, has decided that the facts did not disclose undue influence exercised over the testator, Colclough, still the plaintiff, by submitting to a verdict, in effect admits that the will was not duly executed by the testator. But this is another instance to be adduced to show that personal considerations have more weight with a jury than the abstract justice of the matter.

DECREASE OF CRIME IN IRELAND.*

Never was it so plain that crime goes hand in hand with poverty. From 1847 to 1849, Ireland was at its lowest ebb. The effects of the famine were yet severely felt by all classes of the community; wages were very low, and employment was very scarce. At that period, it will be remembered, that disaffection prevailed to a great extent among the poorer classes, and to no trifling extent among the middle classes. These causes acted and reacted on one another; and between starvation and sedition, the island and its inhabitants were in a state which excited the utmost alarm at the head-quarters of Government. Treason, Felony Acts, Arms Acts, and other ingenious approximations to military law, were resorted to largely: so little was the source and origin of the disease understood in England.

Since that time, however, the aspect of affairs is wholly changed. From a state of general bankruptcy and wretchedness, Ireland has emerged into prosperity and incipient wealth. The land has been transferred from the hands of Chancery receivers into those of solvent and improving proprietors. Political agitation is absolutely unheard of in any part of the country. Now that peace and prosperity prevail everywhere, it will be worth while to turn to the criminal records, and mark the corresponding diminution in the number of the inhabitants of our gaols and penitentiaries.

In 1849, the number of persons committed for trial at the various assizes and quarter sessions amounted to nearly 42,000. In 1856, the number of committals had diminished 5-6ths; only 7,100 persons being committed in the latter year. This improvement in the national morality was not sudden; it was, like the general prosperity, progressive. On the 1st of January, 1850, 11,000 prisoners were confined in the different gaols; the year after, the number fell to 10,000; and it steadily diminished in 1852 and 1853. In 1854, the number of prisoners was only 5,755; in 1855, it had further diminished to 5,080; in 1856, 3,561 prisoners were found; and on the first day of the present year no more than 3,419 persons were, throughout Ireland, in the custody of the law.

Under these circumstances, the judges have had an easy time of it this summer circuit. The lists of prisoners were so scanty as to call for general congratulations between Bench and jury-box. So many gifts of white gloves by high sheriffs were never before recorded. The truth is, that the Irish peasant is not naturally an ill-disposed or a vicious specimen of humanity. He violates the law when poverty harasses him; he attends a seditious meeting when no more useful employment presents itself; but when work and wages are to be had, he constantly manifests a preference for honest labour. This is happily the case now; and, with the exception of some little excitement in the West, arising out of contested elections, and in the North, caused by foolish reminiscences of the Boyne, the guardians of the Queen's peace have, throughout the country, all but a sinecure. Long may the presentation of kid gloves continue to be a prominent duty of the shrievalty.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Craufurd's announcement of his intention to withdraw his Judgments Execution Bill has not been received with much surprise in Scotland, and perhaps with little regret. The Bill, when first introduced, was received here with much distrust, for several reasons. Mr. Craufurd himself was not personally popular; although a Scotch member, he was an English lawyer, and Scotch lawyers are naturally jealous of any interference with their law from such a quarter; and lastly, the Bill proposed to overturn legal principles which had been received as axioms from time immemorial. It was not, therefore, surprising that old men shook their heads. But these feelings were gradually dying away, and the Bill, if not welcomed, would, at all events, have been calmly submitted to, but for the mutilations which it suffered in consequence of the unfair and unreasonable attacks made through it upon the law of Scotland. That Mr. Craufurd did his best to maintain his Bill is universally admitted; and the perseverance with which he fought it forward against the formidable and factious opposition arrayed against it, has gained him much sympathy and many admirers, who might, in other circumstances, have proved unfriendly. But it was plain, in the course of the debate, that his knowledge of Scotch law did not enable him to meet the objections to his Bill, which were founded on the law of Scotland; and he was, therefore, obliged to submit to amendments which put Scotch decrees in a worse position than either

* "Report of Inspectors Generals of Irish Prisons;" Freeman's Journal, of 20th instant.

English or Irish decrees—amendments, too, which went far beyond what was necessary to meet anything that was reasonable in the objections on which they were founded. If Mr. Craufurd had had sufficient knowledge of Scotch law, he might have so modified his Bill as to make it a complete answer to such cavillers, and increased very greatly the number of his supporters in Scotland. Of course, it was the business of the Lord Advocate, if Mr. Craufurd had the support of Government, as he was understood to have, to answer the objections referred to, and to propose a remedy to the extent to which these objections might be supported on reasonable principles; but as his Lordship satisfied himself with panegyrising Scotch law generally, and recommending English and Irish lawyers to study it, it must be supposed that he was afraid to go very deep into legal principles, or too much occupied with his own crude schemes, to help Mr. Craufurd to elaborate his one, or, which is the common belief, that the support of the Government was more nominal than real. Mr. Craufurd has intimated his intention of bringing forward his Bill again next session; and as he must be well aware that nothing that is wished to be done is so certainly done as when we do it ourselves, we would recommend him to study for himself the extent of jurisdiction claimed by the Scotch courts, and the mode in which it is exercised, and he will then be able to meet the absurdities so solemnly enunciated by some of his opponents. It is not too much to expect that a Scotch member and a lawyer should take this trouble.

The Court of Session rose on Saturday for the long vacation, which lasts till November. During this long period, there is little or no civil business done; and the consequence is, that the junior bar (their opinions not being very valuable, or, at least, not greatly sought after) are almost completely idle, for very few go circuit, and those who do look upon the whole affair more as a piece of pleasure than real work, and give it up altogether after making a few rounds. The seniors, like the other branches of the profession, must, of course remain longer at home, for whenever solicitors are at work there must be work preparing for them. Besides this, many of these seniors are engaged in the Jury Court, which is now sitting, and which continues to do so till the trials are all disposed of—a work which generally occupies ten days or a fortnight. But, after all, they have little to complain of, because, by almost universal consent, August and September are devoted to pleasure by the Edinburgh lawyers, and the busiest may be absent for weeks without calling forth any remark, perhaps without being asked for.

Englishmen have little idea of the change which vacation makes in Scotland; at least, those will have little idea who are not aware that it is the custom in Edinburgh for the whole bar, seniors and juniors, who practise, or desire to practise, their profession, whether they have work to do or not, to meet every morning during session, at nine o'clock, in their robes, under the roof which covered the old Parliament of Scotland, where they remain for two or three hours, the busy ones discussing their cases with the solicitors who employ them, and moving off to the different courts, when they recognise their names—as only a practised ear could do—in the dreadful jargon which every minute rolls along the hall, the briefless ones retailing the gossip of the town to each other, with all the emendations and additions which imagination may have suggested, and gradually dropping off to their pleasure or their studies, about twelve o'clock, after which the courts are left in the possession of those who have real work to do. Vacation rudely breaks in upon those pleasant morning meetings. There is no other place where one can be sure of meeting such an agreeable variety of friends; no place where the conversation is so sure to jump pleasantly with your own humour; no place where you pick up so much news and gossip with so little trouble; and no place where you improvise so many pleasant little parties. What wonder is it, then, that in this welcome given to the vacation, a sigh of regret should mingle.

One of your correspondents, we are happy to see, has begun a criticism on the Glasgow Poisoning Case, and he has already started two or three questions of general interest—among others, the admission of hearsay evidence, the extent of cross-examination, and the propriety of a unanimous verdict. The two first questions require a reference to the proceedings in the case; and as the authentic report by the Faculty Reporter, which is sure to be well done, and is expected to be a verbatim one, is promised in a day or two, we prefer to wait till it appears, rather than use mere newspaper reports, which can seldom be depended upon. The third question, however, is one which may be discussed altogether apart from the present case; and in regard to it we must say that we were certainly surprised to hear it argued that unanimity obtained by imprisoning and starving the jury till it is arrived at can give any moral weight to a verdict, unless we start with this assumption—that no man ought to be found guilty unless the evidence is so clear that every juryman must be satisfied of his guilt. We do not imagine that Englishmen wish to maintain any such proposition: they say one man on a jury has doubts—if he is left to the rest, they will convince him. But is this practically true? We think, in criminal cases, to which these observations are exclusively limited, certainly not. On the contrary, we, in Scotland, think that, in England, justice is very often defeated by demanding such unanimity. One man holds out obstinately against a conviction, all the rest think the prisoner guilty; but one man sees reason to doubt, though they see none; therefore there may be doubt, they are not to make martyrs of themselves for a mere opinion, and they accordingly bring in a unanimous verdict of not guilty. What moral weight can such a verdict have; and yet we believe such verdicts are not uncommon. We should be astonished if they were. We think that the arrangement is quite calculated to produce the result. In Scotland we believe that the natural tendency of the heart is to be merciful to a criminal, even at the expense of truth and justice, and that, therefore, no juryman will find a prisoner guilty unless he is compelled to draw that conclusion. If eight men on a jury (the criminal jury in Scotland consists of fifteen) pronounce a panel guilty, he is sure to be so in the judgment of all reasonable and unimpassioned men, and the remaining seven are in all probability very willing to find a flaw to hang their opinions upon. We feel quite persuaded, that, in all cases involving loss of life or any serious punishment, this principle of human nature may be relied upon with the most perfect confidence.

COUNTY COURTS.—(From a Correspondent).

The superior courts possess a great advantage over the county courts with regard to the issuing of execution against the body. In the former, you get your writ at once; but in the latter, you are obliged to take out a summons on the judgment—a proceeding nearly the same as the commencement of a new suit, and attended with the payment of fresh fees for the summons and the hearing. Sect. 101 of 9 & 10 Vict. confers on the judge the power of committal on the hearing of the cause, but the judge of this district is unwilling to exercise it, and has, on several occasions, refused to do so; leaving the plaintiff the remedy by judgment summons; and, I believe, most of the judges follow this course. Now, the great evil of the system to say nothing of the fees, is the delay in arresting a defendant, and which gives such fine opportunities to wandering scoundrels, having no fixed residence or effects, to plunder their creditors ad libitum; for, before the day of hearing, the defendant, of course, decamps, leaving the plaintiff the empty satisfaction of an order, and the payment of court fees.

I will now mention something worse. Having obtained a judgment against a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction, I cannot even issue the judgment summons as a matter of course, but must actually wait till the next court, and then make an application for leave. Now, as, under the new Act, the registrar has the power to grant leave to issue the original summons in such a case, why should he not have the same power with regard to the judgment summons?

Orders in Chancery.

July 18th, 1857.

The Right Honourable Robert Monsey, Lord Cranworth, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable Sir James Lewis Knight Bruce, and the Right Honourable Sir George James Turner, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Torin Kindersley, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, and the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, doth order and direct as follows:—

1. The Orders of the 11th day of April, 1842, shall be amended as to Numbers XI. and XII. in manner following (that is to say):—

XI. If any party or person who is by an order or decree made in any suit or matter ordered to pay money, or to do any other act in a limited time, shall, after due service of such order or decree, refuse or neglect to obey the same according to the exigency thereof, the party or person prosecuting such order or decree shall, at the expiration of the time limited for the performance thereof, be entitled to a writ or writs of attachment against the disobedient party or person; and in case such party or person shall be taken or detained in custody under any such writ of attachment without obeying the same order or decree, then the party or person prosecuting the same order or decree shall, upon the sheriff's return that the party or person has been so taken or detained, be entitled to a commission of sequestration against the estate and effects of the disobedient party or person; and in case the sheriff shall make the return non est inventus to such writ or writs of attachment, the party or person prosecuting such order or decree shall be entitled at his option either to a commission of sequestration in the first instance, or otherwise to an order for the Serjeant-at-Arms, and to such other process as he hath hitherto been entitled to upon a return non est inventus made by the Commissioners named in a commission of rebellion issued for the non-performance of an order or decree.

XII. Every order or decree made in any suit or matter requiring any party or person to do an act thereby ordered, shall state the time, or the time after service, of the order or decree within which the act is to be done; and upon the copy of the order or decree which shall be served upon the party or person required to obey the same, there shall be indorsed a memorandum in the words or to the effect following—viz.:

"If you, the within-named A. B., neglect to obey this order [or decree] by the time therein limited, you will be liable to be arrested under a writ of attachment issued out of the High Court of Chancery, or by the Serjeant-at-Arms attending the same Court, and also be liable to have your estate sequestered for the purpose of compelling you to obey the same order [or decree]."

2. If it shall appear upon the return of any writ of fieri facias, or any writ of elegit, issued in pursuance of the General Orders of the 10th May, 1839, that the person against whom such writ shall have been so issued, is a beneficed clerk, and has no goods or chattels, nor any lay fee in the bailiwick of the sheriff to whom such writ shall have been directed, the person to whom the sum of money or costs mentioned in such writ is or are payable, shall, immediately after such writ, with such return, shall be filed as of record, be at liberty to sue out one or more writ or writs of fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis, or one or more writ or writs of sequestrari facias, in the form stated in the schedule hereto, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case may allow.

3. On every such writ of fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis, or writ of sequestrari facias, so to be issued as aforesaid, there shall be indorsed the words "By the Court," and also thereunder the calling, if any, and place of residence, if any, of the party or person against whom such writ shall be issued, and also the name and residence or place of business of the party or solicitor at whose instance the same shall be issued; and every such writ shall be also indorsed for the sum to be taken or levied, according to the form used upon like writs issuing out of the superior courts of common law.

4. Such writs, when sealed, shall be delivered to the bishop, and shall be executed by him as nearly as may be in the same manner in which he doth or ought to execute such like writs issuing out of the superior courts of common law, and such writs, when returned by the bishop, shall be delivered to the parties or solicitors by whom respectively they were sued out, and shall thereupon be filed as of record in the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs of this Court; and for the execution of such writs the bishop or his officers shall not take, or be allowed any fees other than such as are, or shall be, from time to time allowed by lawful authority for the execution of the like writs issuing out of the superior courts of common law.

5. For every such writ so to be issued in pursuance of these orders, there shall be allowed to the solicitor at whose instance any such writ shall be issued, the sum of 6*s.* 8*d.* for instructions for the said writ, and the sum of 13*s.* 4*d.* for preparing the same, and a fee of £1 shall be paid by means of a stamp for examining and stamping every such writ at the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs, and there shall be also allowed to such solicitor the further sum of 6*s.* 8*d.* for attending to lodge the same at the bishop's registry, and for attending to instruct the officer charged with the execution of such writ.

SCHEDULE.

Forms of Writs.

No. I.—Fieri Facias de Bonis Ecclesiasticis.

Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, To the Right Reverend Father in God (John), by divine permission Lord Bishop of ——, greeting. We command you that of the ecclesiastical goods of C. D., Clerk in your diocese, you cause to be made £——, which the said C. D. lately before us in our Court of Chancery, in a certain cause or certain causes [as the case may be] wherein A. B. is plaintiff and C. D. is defendant, or in a certain matter there depending, intituled, "In the matter of E. F." [as the case may be], by a Decree or Order [as the case may be] of our said Court, bearing date the —— day of ——, was decreed or ordered [as the case may be] to be paid by the said C. D. to the said A. B., together with interest on the said sum of £ ——, at the rate of £4 per centum per annum from the —— day of ——, and have that money, together with such interest as aforesaid, before us in our said Court, immediately after the execution hereof, to be rendered to the said A. B., for that our Sheriff of —— returned to us in our said Court on —— [or "at a day now past"] that the said C. D. had not any goods or chattels or any lay fee in his bailiwick whereof he could cause to be made the said £ —— and interest aforesaid, or any part thereof, and that the said C. D. was a beneficed clerk (to wit) rector of the rectory [or "vicar of the vicarage"] and parish church of —— in the said sheriff's county and within your diocese [as in the return]; and in what manner you shall have executed this our writ make appear to us in our said Court, immediately after the execution hereof, and have you there then this writ. Witness Ourself at Westminster, the —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord ——.

No. II.—Fieri Facias to the Archbishop, de Bonis Ecclesiasticis, during the vacancy of a Bishop's See.

Victoria [&c., as in No. I.], To the Right Reverend Father in God ——, by Divine Providence Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of All England and Metropolitan, greeting. We command you, that of the ecclesiastical goods of C. D., Clerk, in the Diocese of ——, which is within the province of Canterbury, as Ordinary of that Church, the Episcopal See of —— now being vacant, you cause to be made [&c. Conclude as in the preceding form].

No. III.—Writ of Sequestrari Facias.

Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom o Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, To the Right Reverend Father in God (John), by Divine permission Lord Bishop of ——, greeting. Whereas we lately commanded our Sheriff of ——, that he should omit not by reason of any liberty of his county, but that he should enter the same, and cause to be made [if after the return to a fieri facias] or delivered [if after the return to an elegit, &c., recite the former writ]. And whereupon our said Sheriff of ——, on —— [or "at a day past"], returned to us in our said Court of Chancery that the said C. D. was a beneficed Clerk, that is to say Rector of the Rectory [or "Vicar of the Vicarage"] and Parish Church of ——, in the county of ——, and which said Rectory and Parish Church were within your Diocese, and that he had not any goods or chattels, or any lay fee in his bailiwick [here follow the words of the Sheriff's return]. Therefore, we command you that you enter into the said Rectory [or "Vicarage"] and Parish Church of ——, and take and sequester the same into your possession, and that you hold the same in your possession until you shall have levied the said £ —— and interest aforesaid of the rents, tithes, rentcharges, in lieu of tithes, oblations, obventions, fruits, issues, and profits thereof, and other ecclesiastical goods in your Diocese of and belonging to the said Rectory and Parish Church of ——, and to the said C. D. as Rector thereof, to be rendered to the said A. B., and what you shall do therein make appear to us in our said Court immediately after the execution hereof; and have you there then this writ. Witness Ourself at Westminster, the —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord ——.

Indorse it as a Fi. Fa.: After the words "expenses of the execution," add, "and sequestration."

Signed by the Lord Chancellor and the other Equity Judges.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

This Bill was read a third time.—On the question that it do pass,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that while he was opposed to giving priority to any judgment creditor against joint-stock banks, which it was the object of this Bill to prevent, yet his attention had been called to the question of registered judgments in Ireland, which operated as mortgages on the estate, and he therefore proposed that the rights of such creditors should be preserved, unless they chose to give up their judgments, or that the mortgage should be taken in full satisfaction of their debt, so as not to enable them to compete with other creditors. He proposed, therefore, that there should be a clause inserted after the 10th clause to the effect, "that nothing in the Act should apply to or affect the rights of creditors, unless with their consent, who had obtained judgments in Ireland which had been duly registered."

The Earl of DONOUGHMORE was understood to object to the proposed clause as unsatisfactory, and also to the ex post facto legislation of this Bill, which naturally affected the rights of those creditors who had sought a remedy at law against the Tipperary Bank before that bank had been subjected to the operation of the Winding-up Act.

Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, that no doubt this was ex post facto legislation, and deprived some parties of rights which they might have acquired; but it was intended to put an end to an interminable system of litigation, and the only question now was, whether these registered judgments should have priority over others. On the face of it that was somewhat doubtful; but in consequence of the peculiar state of the law in Ireland, which made these judgments act as mortgages on an estate, it would be unjust to prevent those who had obtained these judgments from taking advantage of them; but it was also equitable and just, that, if they had this benefit, those registered judgment creditors ought not to have the advantage of the dividend which had been paid.

After a few words from the LORD CHANCELLOR and the Earl of DONOUGHMORE, the clause was agreed to and the Bill passed.

LARCENY, &c., BILL.

This Bill, and the seven others for the consolidation of the law on Offences against the Person—Malicious Injuries to Property—Forgery—Libel—Coinage Offences—Deer, Game, and Rabbits—Accessories and Abettors, were severally read a third time and passed.

TRANSFER OF LAND.

Lord ST. LEONARDS called attention to the measures proposed for facilitating the transfer of land. He believed that it would be impossible to give a common law facility to the transfer of landed property, and at the same time retain the power of creating settlements and jointures without interfering with the title to the fee simple. No other country but England possessed this facility. It had been said, that a certificate of title ought to be as negotiable as a bill of exchange. He hoped he should never see such facility for the transfer of property. If a man could carry his title-deeds in his cigar-case, no one would answer for the consequences. There was no necessity to render property so easily transferable; for if a man wanted to raise money on his property, he could do it by mortgage. After noticing the ancient modes of transfer by delivery of seisin, and otherwise, and the abuses which had thence arisen, he said that the Legislature and the judges had always shown great anxiety to protect purchasers. Formerly there used to exist several great protections against fraud; as, for instance, the power to bar a right for nonclaim, and the creation of terms attendant upon the inheritance; but those safeguards had, he regretted to say, long been all swept away. The Court of Chancery had laid down a rule which was very conducive to honest dealing, but which had led to much inconvenience—he meant what was called the doctrine of notice. Where the notice was express, and to the party himself, nothing could be more proper than that doctrine; but unfortunately the courts of equity had gone much further, for they had set up a constructive or implied notice. If, for instance, he employed an attorney, believing him to be an honest man, to purchase an estate for him, and if it could be shown that that attorney had any knowledge of any incumbrance upon it, it would be inferred that the purchaser himself was also aware of it, and he might lose the estate he had just bought, and lose it without any fault of his own; indeed, it might have been utterly impossible for him to have known of the incumbrance. He thought the time had arrived when an alteration might be made in respect to that doctrine. In another respect the present practice required amendment. It was held that a lis pendens was notice to all the world; in other words, every purchaser was presumed to know every fact in relation to the property he was buying that might have been disclosed in any suit then pending. That rule was based upon the assumption that every Englishman was bound to make himself acquainted with whatever took place in the courts of justice—a manifest impossibility. It would be a great improvement, and save an enormous expense, if matters affecting property which were disclosed in the course of suits could all be brought into one office, so that search might at once be made for them. The great expense of the transfer of land arose from the circumstance that men did not choose to depend upon anybody but their own advisers. If a man wanted to buy an estate, he insisted on having a laborious and costly investigation into the title gone through by his own solicitor, and the result advised upon by his own counsel; although the estate might have been purchased only three months before, and exactly the same process had already been gone through. One of the chief dangers to be guarded against in the purchase of real property was, lest there should be a concealed incumbrance. To avoid that, various plans had been proposed. Amongst others was a scheme for the registration of deeds. A Bill with that view had been brought in by the Lord Chancellor; but he (Lord St. Leonards), thinking that it would be mischievous, and would lead to much expense, had felt it his duty to oppose it. He had arrayed against him all the noble and learned Lords in that House, and the Bill was passed; but in the other House it was summarily rejected. The result was, the appointment of a Royal Commission, who had lately made a report, and whose labours it was intended to embody in the shape of a Bill. Nobody could read that report without being deeply impressed with the great learning, knowledge, and ability which it displayed; but he was sorry to be obliged to add that he could not in the least agree with the conclusions at which the Commissioners had arrived. Their plan was not to have a general registration—that was to say a registration of every deed and of every assurance; but they recommended what was called a registration of titles. What they proposed was, that some one should be registered who was the owner of the estate, with power to sell or mortgage it; but it would not be possible to register any estate in which a settlement had been given. The Commissioners began by making this registration voluntary; but after an estate had once got upon the register, it could never disappear from it. What was proposed was in truth that the Government should open a shop for the sale of good titles. But that could never be endured; and, therefore, notwithstanding the great authority of the Commissioners, he must give the proposal his most decided opposition. It must be obvious that a person who went to the office and asked to have his property registered would have nobody to oppose him; his application could be no more than an ex parte one; and yet if it was granted, the real owner of the estate might find his claim barred. By the law of England any man who had a right to any property might recover it; but, according to the Commissioners' Report, if he recovered it, he would not have it; he would only receive a money compensation. Nor was that all. The scheme contemplated in many cases that a sham owner should be registered; but this sham owner would nevertheless have an undoubted right to mortgage or sell the estate. To guard against that, it was proposed to establish a machinery of caveats or injunctions, the result of which would be to invoke the Court of Chancery on every possible occasion. In a word, while attempting to make the transfer of land as simple as that of a railway share or £50 stock, the Commissioners had run the risk of incurring the gravest possible inconveniences, and they had sacrificed altogether their Lordships' power of making settlements upon their own estates; for it was impossible to preserve the rights of property if they conveyed to any person other than the real owner the legal fee simple. There were some things involved in the Report at which it was hardly possible to repress a smile. For instance, under the new system, it would be impossible for two men to purchase an estate together. At present that was often done; and the property was conveyed to them as tenants in common; but under the proposed plan that would be impossible, unless they agreed to give the survivorship to one of them. The Lord Chancellor informed them the other evening that he was about to lay on the table a very different measure in reference to registration; and Lord Brougham had laid on the table another Bill respecting the registration of deeds. That Bill, he apprehended, would entail the necessity of maps, and it should be remembered that the maps of the Tithe Commission had already cost £2,500,000. He would now state the objects of the Bill that he intended himself to introduce, which was not a Bill for the registration of titles, but for simplifying titles. He proposed to remove obstacles to the transfer of land; to restrict the present power of limitation; and that a purchaser's title should be indefeasible if he had been in undisturbed possession for twenty-five years; but he would not take from any man the right to recover charges on property.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said there was no one who was more entitled to call their Lordships' attention to this subject than Lord St. Leonards, who was pre-eminently conversant with all its branches. With regard to the Report of the Royal Commission, he thought there was some misunderstanding on the part of Lord St. Leonards. Their Lordships would recollect that in the year 1853, very soon after he had the honour of receiving the great seal, he laid on the table a Bill for the registration of assurances. It passed that House, and in the House of Commons was referred to a select committee, who reported, recommending that a Royal Commission should issue in reference to what they called a registration of titles, instead of title-deeds; which was issued at the end of 1853, and this year they made their Report. Before this Report was made, he had himself framed a measure which related to one of the objects of the report. At present, one of the great impediments to the transfer of land was, that no man could tell what charges there were upon it. He prepared a Bill, the provisions of which he stated, (which are given ante, p. 625). That was a simple measure, certainly far short of what the Commissioners had contemplated, but which he should have been prepared at the commencement of the session to lay on the table of the House, but that he did not like to do so pending the consideration as to what was to be done with that Report.

Lord CAMPBELL entered his protest against Lord St. Leonards' objection to a general registration. Instead of being a burden on land, it would be a great boon and relief, and would simplify the transfer of property almost beyond belief. Registration had proved beneficial in Scotland, in the colonies, and in every country where it had been tried; and in no one country where it had been established had it ever been abandoned.

THE OATH OF ABJURATION.

Lord CAMPBELL, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose to put a question to the Lord Chancellor respecting the state of an appeal of Salomons v. Miller; and took occasion to observe, that, to his great surprise, on looking at the votes of the other House, he found a notice of motion, that, as Baron Rothschild declares that the words "on the true faith of a Christian" are not binding upon him, the House of Commons should resolve that the clerk be instructed to omit those words in administering the oath to Baron Rothschild, and that he should be permitted to take his seat in the House of Commons by a resolution of that House, in defiance of what had been done by their Lordships, and without the consent of the Crown. If such a motion should be carried, it would never come before their Lordships for discussion, but would instantly be treated by the other House as law. Instead of considering it the law, he should consider it a flagrant violation—he would use the gentlest term he could, and say it would be a coup d'état, such as that which had been resorted to in a neighbouring country to bring about a revolution; instead of being the law, it would be contrary to law, because it would be an attempt, by a resolution of one House, to repeal an Act of Parliament, and make laws without the consent of the other, and without the consent of the Crown. This course of proceeding was justified by the precedent in the case of Mr. Pease, who, in the year 1833, was elected for the county of Durham. He (Lord Campbell) was then a member of the House of Commons, and one of the law officers of the Crown, and took an active part in that investigation, and he could say that what was then done had not the smallest application to the case now under consideration. Mr. Pease was a Quaker. There was no question as to the manner in which the oath should be taken. He had to take no oath. The question was, whether Acts of Parliament had not passed by which Quakers were absolved from taking the oath. It was his sincere and firm conviction, that, under two Acts of Parliament passed in favour of the Quakers, they were allowed to affirm, with regard to the oath of abjuration, without swearing at all. The language of the Acts was so strong as to admit of no other construction; and because the Quakers were absolved from taking any oath, they were allowed to affirm. They were not called upon to swear at all; and on that ground alone, Mr. Pease was allowed to affirm, and he took his seat with the unanimous approbation of the House of Commons. That was not an alteration of the law by resolution of the House of Commons, it was simply a declaration of the intention of the legislature. Another precedent had been referred to in a recent case in their Lordships' House. Now whether their Lordships were right or wrong in their decision, it had not the slightest application to the present case, because their Lordships were exercising a jurisdiction analogous to that exercised by the House of Commons when it decided whether a person taking his seat had been lawfully returned or not. Their Lordships did not alter the law on that occasion. They were the only tribunal by which the question could be decided. Well, then, what was to be the consequence of the course of proceeding now suggested? The judges could not stop a resolution of the House of Commons; but, if such an action were brought, I or any other judge would be bound to lay down the law as it has been declared by the Court of Exchequer, to say that the penalties had been incurred, and to direct the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff. I see it has been proposed to vote it a breach of privilege for any one to bring an action against a member of the House of Commons who had been allowed to take his seat without swearing in the manner required by the law. In the course of his parliamentary career he had been a strong supporter of privilege, and did not in the slightest degree regret the lengths to which he went in the controversy between the House of Commons and the Court of Queen's Bench when he was a member of the House of Commons. But that was in a clear case of privilege. But to declare it to be a breach of privilege to bring an action against a member of the House of Commons who had violated the law would be absurd. The House of Commons might just as well resolve that it should be a breach of privilege to bring an action on a bill of exchange against the acceptor. If the course now proposed should be persisted in, it seemed to him that it would be something like the commencement of a revolution in this country. In any strife which might be stirred up between the courts of law and the House of Commons he should not be afraid of consequences personal to himself. He hoped, if an order should be made for sending him to Newgate or to the Tower of London, the people would rise in his defence. The House of Commons must not suppose that the people would see the judges of the land treated in such an arbitrary manner, and with so much indignity. But he was perfectly prepared for his fate if any such attempt should be made. He, however, had so much confidence in the leaders of the House of Commons that he should be very much mistaken if they took any such step. He had read in the newspapers accounts pointing out the way in which the Prime Minister was to be urged, and compelled to agree to such a resolution, but he had great confidence in the firmness of the noble lord, and believed that he would give them a very courteous but very decisive refusal, telling them that such a proceeding is contrary to the law and the constitution of this country. He had thought it his duty to inquire into the state of the appeal to which he had referred. If the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber could be reversed he should greatly rejoice, for he should be glad to see the Jews constitutionally and lawfully introduced into Parliament. He believed that no danger would arise from their admission, and hoped the time was not far distant when the reproach of their exclusion would be removed, but till then they ought to submit to the privation under which they were labouring.

The LORD-CHANCELLOR said, that Salomons and Miller was set down, in 1854, for hearing in May, 1855. Nothing was done in that session. In the last session an application was made by both plaintiff and defendant that the case might stand over till this session, and it was directed to stand over accordingly, as a matter of course. In June this year another application was made to adjourn the case for two months, which would postpone it till the 15th of August, and thus throw it over the session.

Lord BROUGHAM hoped and trusted the House of Commons would not attempt to carry their privilege to the extent now contemplated, from which they could not escape without such violent conflicts as disgraced our ancestors 150 years ago.

Lord CAMPBELL said, that, with reference to the explanation of the Lord Chancellor, the plaintiff and defendant appeared to have a close understanding on the matter, and whatever one suggested the other agreed to. With all respect for his friend Mr. Alderman Salomons, he must say he thought it desirable that the case should be brought to a conclusion, and a final opinion given on the judgment of the Court of Exchequer.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

Lord BROUGHAM said, the Bill which he proposed to introduce would deal only with one point of that law. At the beginning of the present year a great conference was held on this subject, comprising legal and commercial representatives from all the large towns in the kingdom. This conference was held under the auspices of the Law Amendment Society. The conference discussed all the branches of commercial law, and many most valuable opinions were given. The result was a report, which had been presented to the Government, and which pointed out the relief they sought. Their first complaint was the great expense attending the administration of the bankrupt laws; and this every one would admit was well founded. Under 121 bankruptcies which occurred in one year, about £90,000 was collected; but the sum divided among the creditors was only £44,000 being not quite 50 per cent. of the whole. It was suggested that a portion of those expenses ought to be borne by the consolidated fund; for he objected to throwing upon suitors the whole expense of a court, and considered that the cost of an administrative establishment like the Court of Bankruptcy ought to be borne by the country at large. No less than £25,000 a year was still paid as compensation to the commissioners displaced in 1831; and all this came out of the pockets of creditors. By the Bill which he sought to introduce he would transfer this charge to the consolidated fund. The next ground for complaint was that there were unnecessary officers in the courts of bankruptcy—the messenger, the accountant, and the broker. He would retain the messengers, rendering them subject to the direction of the commissioners. Complaint was also made of the way in which official assignees were paid, by a percentage on the assets of each estate. The result was the greatest diversity in the receipts of these useful officers; in some cases they were barely sufficient to pay office expenses. One assignee had received in one year as much as £3,000 or £4,000, while the income of another had been as low as £200. He proposed that they should be paid by salaries, not to exceed a certain amount, and partly by fees. A further complaint was the irregular attendance of the commissioners; he proposed to move for a return of those attendances, and he hoped that the Lord Chancellor would by that means be enabled to enforce a more regular attendance. He found that one commissioner had held 130 sittings in the year, another 151, another 185, and a fourth 705. These last figures had given him an insight into the nature of these sittings; they only meant the number of different matters brought before the commissioners, and in point of fact this gentleman only sat on 54 days, and he had disposed of an average of thirteen cases at a time. Well might the courts present the scene which had been described to him as a scramble. Another suggestion was, to permit the estate of a deceased person, who, if he had been alive, would come under the operation of the bankrupt law, to be administered under that law. In the matter of appeal, the conference complained that it at present went from the commissioner who had heard the case—who had seen the bankrupt, who had witnessed his demeanour, before whom the evidence had been given—to the Lords Commissioners, who knew nothing about the case. Now in respect to questions of dry law there could be no doubt as to the propriety of giving an appeal; but with regard to the power of granting a certificate he thought the objection of the conference was well founded.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was one question which it would undoubtedly be desirable to sift to the bottom—the cost of administering the estates of insolvent persons. Unfortunately, that expense had always been so large in comparison to the assets, that a disposition had always been shown to withdraw cases from the court and to arrange them privately. He had moved for a return (which, though on the table of the House, had not yet been printed) from which he saw his way to some diminution of the expenses incurred under the present system. Messengers in bankruptcy, as they were called, were no doubt persons in whom considerable trust was reposed; but still he did not think it fitting that they should be allowed to receive half as much again as the county court judges. There were cases in which these messengers actually received as much as £1,600 or £1,700 a-year. That was an abuse with which it was in his power to deal as soon as he had had some communication with the Lords Justices, and it must, and should, be remedied; as to the mode of remunerating the official assignees, he was afraid that to adopt any other method than a payment by a per-centage would only tend to diminish the amount of the assets realised. He certainly hoped that some plan might be devised to lessen the terrible disparity between the sum realised and that distributed; and the subject should have his best attention. With regard to the Commissioners, he had only to say, that in the single instance in which a complaint had been made to him, he had taken immediate steps to prevent a recurrence of the conduct complained of. No doubt the Commissioners had very little work to do, but that was owing solely to the fact that the staff was too large, which would be reduced to four on the next vacancy. He certainly could not concur in the suggestion of his noble friend, with regard to appeals. When he considered the important results of refusing a certificate, he thought it ought not to be entrusted to any single judge, unless his decision was liable to be reviewed by a superior court. Lord Brougham was moreover quite in error, when he supposed that the Lords' Justices were obliged to adjudicate in cases without seeing the bankrupt or the witnesses. When he was a Lord Justice, the attendance of both had been more than once required.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that nothing so bad as our old bankruptcy system had ever before existed in a civilised nation. Upwards of £2,000,000 were in the hands of the Seventy Commissioners—the Septuagint as they were called—which ought to have been distributed ten, fifteen, or even twenty years before; and certain banks had made a profit of £5,000 or £6,000 a year by the sums deposited with them on the account of those Commissioners. He was very far from feeling discouragement—certainly he felt no shame that after twenty-five years' experience there were still things that required amendment.

The Bill was then read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, July 20.

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The committee on this Bill was resumed for the purpose of inserting new clauses.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed four new clauses, the first providing that the Court of Probate may cause questions of fact to be tried by a jury before itself, or direct an issue to a court of law; the second defining the powers of the court for the trial of questions by a jury; the third providing that the question shall be reduced into writing, and that the judge shall have the same authority as a judge at Nisi Prius; and the fourth enabling the court to direct issues to try any fact.

The clauses were agreed to, and added to the Bill.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he had two clauses to propose which would come in after clause 41. With regard to property locally situated in any district or districts, no matter what the amount, the probate granted by the district registrar will be sufficient for all purposes of administration; but when it becomes necessary to produce the probate in London, for the transfer of funded property, Bank or East India Stock, or share property in any railway or other joint-stock company having its head office in London, it will be requisite under this new clause that the probate granted by the district registrar shall be countersealed by the metropolitan Court of Probate. In the event of the joint-stock company not having its head office in London, it will not be necessary that this second form should be gone through.

On the motion that the first of these clauses be read a second time—Sir J. TROLLOPE said he was willing that the metropolitan seal should be affixed to all probates relating to Bank of England securities; but it should be done through the means of a simple certificate, to be issued to the district registrar. He was not aware of any instance where fraud had been practised upon the Bank of England under a will proved in the provinces. The only will forgeries of that nature, that he was aware of, were those of the Fletchers; but they were concocted in London, not in the provinces. He could not, however, conceive the necessity for applying the same precaution to every species of share property to be transferred in London. There was scarcely a small tradesman or farmer in the country who did not hold a share in some joint-stock company or other; why should his will be proved in London when it could be done just as well near the home of the testator? He should, for these reasons, move the rejection of this first clause, believing that the one which Sir Fitzroy Kelly had placed on the paper would best embody the views which the House had expressed on a former occasion.

Mr. HENLEY had always protested against shares being placed in the same category as the funds. The Bank of England might desire that all their business should be done in London, but joint-stock companies did not, and that was a sufficient reason why shares should be struck out of this clause.

Mr. MALINS contended that the clause was founded neither on reason nor principle. Would anybody pretend to say that the London and North-Western required more protection than the Midland, whose transfer office was at Derby, or the North Midland, whose transfer office was at York? If a man possessed any amount of stock in either of these railways the country probate would be good enough; but in the case of another man who was a trifling holder of London and North-Western stock the country probate would be good for nothing. The real question was this—were the country probate courts worthy of credit; if they were, why limit the amount of property as to which they shall issue probate?

Mr. GLYN said, he could not see why the Bank of England and the East India Company should be specially protected. The joint-stock banks and private banks required protection as much as the Bank of England, if protection was to be given at all.

Mr. WIGRAM said, that the number of transfers in the Bank of England was so great that it was essential the transfer should take place under one seal. It was not as protection that he asked for the exception, but in order that the public might have full confidence in the transfers in the Bank, which was the holder of Government stock.

Mr. GLYN said that the liability fell on the Bank of England, and not on the Government, in the case of fraud, and, therefore, they were not differently situated from other banks.

Sir J. GRAHAM said he had hitherto remained silent in respect to this Bill, and he should frankly tell the reason of it. He had ventured to speak last session on this subject, but he was so sharply reprehended by the Attorney-General on that occasion, and he retained such a lively recollection of it ever since, that he thought it better to remain silent. He was of opinion that the court with whom the instrument rested should have the construction of it, and he also thought that that court should be a branch of the Court of Chancery; but the very name of the Court of Chancery seemed so objectionable, that he was in a small minority on that point in the commission. He did not agree with Mr. Malins, that the limitation of country probate to £1,500 was a question of principle. If he were allowed to open the secrets of the prison-house, he might inform the committee that the limitation of £1,500 was like nine-tenths of the things of this world—a compromise. It was not at all a question of principle. With regard to the present clause, as he understood it, it was this, that if a man had £1,000 in a country bank, and £200 Consols, he could get probate in the country for the £1,000, but not for the smaller sum, without coming to the court in London. Why was this distinction made? He believed that probate in the common form was a very simple thing, and it was evident, from the statement read the other evening by Mr. Westhead, that country probate might be safely allowed to an unlimited amount. This clause and the question of compensation to the London proctors were, he believed, the only difficulties in the way of this Bill passing. Therefore, he would say, pass the Bill in that form which upon the whole you think most conducive to the interests of the public, and do not hesitate to act not only fairly, but even liberally, on the question of compensation.

Sir F. KELLY said the question they were called on to consider was not whether the Bank of England stood upon special grounds of its own, but whether the power which was conferred on the country registrars should cease in respect to any property a portion of which was proved at any time to consist of Government stock. It should always be borne in mind, that what they had mainly to consider was the case of ordinary probate, and not the case of contentious probates. The statement read the other evening by Mr. Westhead showed that the country registrars dealt with property amounting to thousands without a single charge of fraud being brought against any one of them. He suggested to the Attorney-General that he should withdraw the clause, and give effect to the clauses which were agreed to by a committee of the House in respect to the country registrars. With regard to the Bank of England, it was well known that they were bound to act under certain Acts of Parliament, and that this created a distinction between it and any other depositary.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would be in the recollection of many members of the committee, that, in the Bill which he himself introduced last session, he did not impose any limitation on the district registration, though at the same time he sought to combine that principle with the principle of unity, by requiring that the papers in the country should be transmitted to a metropolitan office, which it would only require a few hours to do, even from the remotest parts of the country. In the Bill of last session, and of the preceding session, he proceeded on that principle. He proposed to abolish the distinction in favour of the London proctors, and to enlarge the court, so that all solicitors should practise in it. He then, also, proposed to give the London proctors that compensation which they then rejected, but which, it appeared, they were now, through Mr. Malins, most desirous to have. What did Sir J. Trollope and Mr. Malins then say? They said, "Don't give us a Bill framed on your own principle, but a Bill framed on the Report of the Commissioners, and we will support it. Unfortunately he trusted to that assurance, and brought in a Bill framed on the Report of the Commissioners. But, to his surprise, Sir J. Trollope now turned round and said, "There is no principle in your limitation of £1,500;" whilst Mr. Malins said, that, in giving up the limitation of £1,500, they abandoned the whole principle of the measure. Now his argument showed that the limitation was undoubtedly not a principle, but was rather a sacrifice of principle, in order to obtain what was imagined would be a greater public benefit, and therefore it was that the compromise was made. The Bill was drawn to carry out that compromise; and when he was pressed to justify the limitation, he had frankly stated that his opinion was then, as it was now, in favour of a different rule. Lord Palmerston, seeing this, yielded to what seemed to be the general feeling of the committee. Mr. Westhead had given them instances in which property to a very large amount had been proved in the Metropolitan Court of York, and in the Diocesan Court of Chester. But those were not fair examples to quote. The Metropolitan Court of York had always had most experienced officers; it had an array of proctors and advocates, and there had likewise always been men of great experience at Chester. He did not wonder, then, that wills to a great amount had been proved in that court. But what were they now about to do? They were about to set up forty offices throughout the country in which wills passing any amount of property might be conclusively proved. Now, we had an extremely technical law—a law which laid down an iron rule as to what should be the essential characteristics of a valid testament; and to determine whether that rule had been accurately followed would obviously require an examination conducted with considerable legal skill, great accuracy, and considerable experience. The proposition which the committee had then to determine was this—were the wills of the people of England to be submitted to a competent tribunal or an incompetent one? They must remember, that, the moment probate was granted, no inaccuracy or insufficiency of the document could be considered. Nor would the clause proposed to be brought up by Mr. Glyn meet the difficulty; for it would be no good to leave probates for examination. Sir J. Graham seemed to think that that would be a sufficient security to the Bank. But the copy of the will contained in the probate would not prevent any of the difficulties which might appear on the face of the document itself. There would appear on it no erasures, no obliterations, no interlineations, and the signature and the attestation clause would appear to authenticate every part of it. Nothing would appear on the probate inconsistent with the supposition that the original document was in conformity with all the provisions of the law. Now he had no confidence, nor would any lawyer who had examined into this subject have any confidence, that the problem would always be solved by the persons to whom it would be intrusted in these district courts; and the House might hereafter be startled by the discovery that they had removed from the people of England the protection which their property had hitherto enjoyed, and repent of what they had done. He had therefore considered that the probate of all wills ought to be in London; and in consenting to a departure from that principle he had confined it only to cases where the property was of small amount. But if the House adhered to its decision, he was undoubtedly driven to this admission—namely, that he could not point out any distinction between a will which would affect £5,000 worth of stock transferable in the country and £5,000 transferable in the metropolis. He had the other day endeavoured to draw a distinction between funded stock or share property and agricultural stock or produce. The committee did not seem disposed to adopt that distinction, and accordingly it had now been proposed that the line should be drawn between property which required an act to be done in London, and property the transfer of which might be completed in the country. That distinction could not be justified on any principle, so that when you came to a compromise a line must be drawn somewhere; and where the party must necessarily come to London no additional difficulty would be created by ordering that the original will should also be brought to the metropolis. The distinction would undoubtedly be of service, and might prove a sufficient protection; but he would leave it entirely in the hands of the committee.

Sir J. GRAHAM said, that, if he understood the Attorney-

General aright, it would be his duty to resist the further progress of a Bill the effect of which, he seemed to consider, would be to transfer important legal business from competent to incompetent tribunals. Lord Palmerston, too, who had, of course, very naturally consulted the Attorney-General, ought not to have given way, in reference to this matter, when the Bill was before the House upon a former occasion. The arguments of the Attorney-General were, in fact, conclusive against the decision arrived at on a former occasion; and he was quite at a loss to understand whether the Government intended now to press this clause, or, if they did, what course he ought to adopt. He hoped, therefore, that the Attorney-General would state distinctly whether he thought that upon the whole there would be no danger in the proposal before them, or whether he thought there would; in which latter case he thought the Attorney-General ought not to press the further progress of this Bill.

Mr. HENLEY quite agreed with Sir J. Graham, and he felt very great surprise at the language which had been held by the Attorney-General. For his own part, he thought there was no danger of the kind hinted at. There had been seventeen witnesses examined before the Commissioners, but it should be recollected that sixteen of them were proctors, and parties interested in the proving of wills in London. They might, therefore, have been certain that every one of them would be against a country probate.

Lord J. RUSSELL said he also had been somewhat embarrassed by the speech of the Attorney-General. He quite agreed that they ought, not for the sake of any London proctors, or of anybody else, to make this Bill different from what the public interests required. If the district courts were competent at all, he could not understand why they should not be able to deal with railway property registered in London, as with railway property registered at York, or any other place. The principle stated by the Attorney-General would equally apply to money in the hands of bankers; but to that he did not, it would appear, intend to apply it. He certainly thought that, as the matter stood, the Attorney-General's speech was an answer to his clause.

Lord PALMERSTON said, hon. members had asked what were the opinions of the Government with regard to the clause under discussion. As he understood the question, it lay between the clause of the Government and that of Sir F. Kelly. But upon such a question, where there were as many opinions as men, it was difficult to speak with actual exactness. In short, then, he should be willing that the country probate should extend to everything but stock in the Bank or East India Stock, which alone should require a metropolitan probate.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he should withdraw the clause, which the committee had declined, in fact, to adopt.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then moved the addition of a clause giving a right of appeal from the county courts to the Court of Probate; and of another, providing for Sir J. Dodson a compensation of £2,000 per annum, in case he should not hold the office of Judge of the Court of Probate.—Both clauses were agreed to.

Sir F. KELLY then moved to insert before clause 42, "that no probate or letters of administration granted by any district registrar shall be of any force or effect so far as relates to any stock transferable at the Bank of England or the East India House, unless and until the same shall have been sealed with the seal of the principal registrar of the Court of Probate in London, and such probate or letters of administration, when so sealed, shall be of the same force and effect as if originally granted by said Court of Probate; and it shall be lawful for the principal registrar of the Court of Probate, and he is hereby required, unless cause be shown to the contrary, to seal all such probates and letters of administration upon application made to him for that purpose, by or on behalf of the executor or administrator therein named." He said, unless this clause passed, the Bank might be compelled, under a genuine probate of a forged will, to transfer stock; and the object of the clause was to prevent this being done until the parties objecting to the will had time to make good their objection.

The question was put to insert the words down to "Court of Probate in London."

Mr. MALINS objected to the clause. The principle of the clause was that the country probate was not to be good for two descriptions of stock—Government stock and East India stock. Was the seal to be a mere form or a real thing? If it were form, why have it at all? If it was a matter of substance, then it was in effect requiring two probates; and was the committee prepared to require two probates?

Mr. WIGRAM said, under the new system, it would be possible that there would be two probates. A person might leave two testamentary documents—one, say, leaving the property to the widow, and the other to the son. The parties, instead of contesting which was the last will, might run a race to get probate, and they might each get probate, one in York and another in London; and thus the Bank of England would run a risk. This clause would guard the Bank against any risk of that kind, because in the metropolitan court they would not put their seal to a probate of a will proved in a country district if there had been another probate granted in the metropolitan court.

Mr. WEGUELIN thought that a distinction might be drawn in favour of the Bank of England, in consequence of the immense amount of its business. The management of the public debt involved the keeping of 250,000 accounts with people in every part of the world.

Mr. CAIRNS was not satisfied with Mr. WEGUELIN's reasons. The Bank of England wanted protection from only one danger, that of the party supposed to be dead turning up on a future day; and this clause did not give it. He did not see why the Bank of England should be protected any more than other banking establishments.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL opposed the clause, which was negatived without a division.

Mr. MALINS rose to propose his compensation clauses, but, in answer to a general call, moved that the committee should report progress, which was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent.)

FRIDAY EVENING.

The private business, when it actually gets into the Lords, appears to shrink. In spite of threats of opposition to the last stage, promoters and opponents are mostly drawn together into an amicable settlement; the fact being, that the Lords seldom do much to disturb the legislation of the Commons, and an opposition is only waste of time and money, as a general rule. Taking all the Lords' opposed cases together, they will not, from first to last, exceed thirty, and many of these will end in nothing.

The decision of the Commons on the Mersey Conservancy Bill has attracted great attention; whispers are afloat that certain of the judges have no hesitation in saying that the measure is unconstitutional; and a division was taken on the second reading in the House of Lords, after a long debate, on the motion of Lord Derby. The great question is this—viz. If Parliament think the measure advisable, will they give in? In the case of the London and South-Western Bill, in 1855, the House of Commons inserted the penal clauses in their Bill, the effect of which was, that the dividends of the Company were to be confiscated unless that Company fulfilled a forfeited pledge. The judges did not hesitate to say that the measure was illegal; but Parliament passed it, and, in order to do so, the Lords suspended the standing orders upon which the shareholders relied for throwing out the measure. We now specially invite the attention of our readers to this Liverpool question as a measure of the power of Parliament. The effect of passing the Bill will be (as we before stated) to confiscate the revenues of one of the oldest corporations in England, amounting to £100,000 per annum. This is proposed to be done by a Private Bill. We must sit by and await the result.

In the Mid-Sussex Bill, on the petitions of a landowner and the Arun Navigation, an attempt was made to upset the Bill, without success, on the question of the bona fides of the subscription contract. There were three contracts. The first was signed by two contractors and a third party for £114,500, the remarkable feature being, that one contractor signed first for £50,000, and repeated his subscription three times on the last day for depositing contracts, by power of attorney and the aid of the electric telegraph, for sums, inclusive of the first £50,000, amounting in all to £70,000. In the case of the second contract, in substitution of the first, the same contractor signed at once for the £114,000, and a second party for £500. The House of Lords, however, let the matter pass, as the contract was bolstered up by names of subscribers which were subsequently obtained in June; and the Bill passed.

A matter of greater interest, and one which demands the earnest attention of the profession, is a new practice which has crept in of introducing quasi Public Bills as Private Bills—Bills which are prombted by Government Commissioners and other bodies. One case, which shall be nameless, was brought to light a few days since, in which a Bill for taking property compulsorily was discovered just in time to take the sting out of it. In this Bill provisions were proposed to be inserted by which the promoters would have deprived the landowners of the most important power which the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act gives of going to a jury for compensation, and by the same Bill the power of going to arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act was proposed to be wholly repealed. The matter has been fully laid bare, and it is believed that the Chairman of the House of Lords has prepared a scheme by which these practices—the common honesty of which is questionable—will be prevented for the future. The dishonesty of the practice consists in giving the landowner an ordinary notice, and taking extraordinary powers.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

FRIDAY EVENING.

MALDON.—The Committee in this case decided, on the petition against Mr. Western, that the sitting member was duly elected. The bribery reported was somewhat novel, being, in one instance, a promise of contract work at a church; and, in another instance, a promise to supply flour under the market price to an elector. The Committee further reported that the petition against the return of Mr. Bramley Moore, the other member, was frivolous and vexatious, and in their opinion was presented for the purpose of procuring the withdrawal of the petition against Mr. Western. Treating, on the part of Mr. Western's agents, was also reported, but that gentleman was not proved to be connected with it.

FALKIRK BURGHS.—North of the Tweed the peculiarity in election proceedings seems to be, that, instead of gin and beer, whiskey is the popular drink with the free and independent electors; and, on the evidence of a waiter at one of the taverns, it was stated there was no drunkenness at Mr. Merry's inn. On cross-examination, however, it turned out that the gentlemen who partook of Mr. Merry's hospitality were so "hard headed" that they were not affected by the toddy which appears to have been liberally supplied. In spite, therefore, of the "constitutional" sobriety of the electors, the Committee were of opinion that they should not have eaten or drank at all at the expense of Mr. Merry's agents, and Mr. Merry lost his seat; but bribery was not proved against him. The Committee further reported that Mr. Merry had not complied with the provisions of the Bribery and Treating Act, inasmuch as he had not appointed an agent or auditor under the 31st section of the Act.

WEYMOUTH.—The main allegation in this case charged the sitting member, Mr. Campbell, with direct bribery in harbouring a witness named "Vile," a shoemaker, who received a cheque for £10, which he made some mistake about getting changed, and which eventually he handed back to Mr. Campbell's butler, who paid him £8 for a pair of slippers, which cost him, witness, 1*l.* 1*s.* Witness, however, declared that "Mr. Campbell had a foot as big as a giant's." The Committee informed the counsel for the sitting member that they required special attention to be drawn to the above case, and also to a charge of bribery in paying £6 to an elector for arrears of a previous election account. The Committee reported bribery in the latter cases, but not in the "slipper" case, which was denied by Mr. Campbell, who was declared duly elected.

IPSWICH.—There are three petitions against Mr. Adair and Mr. Cobbold respectively, the former gentleman having the pleasure of receiving the lion's share—two having been presented against Mr. Adair. The allegations are bribery and corruption—as usual.

The Commitees on the Great Yarmouth and Gloucester petition commenced their sitting to-day. The particulars shall be given next week.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Anxious expectation of additional news from the East Indies has been the prevailing feeling in the City all the week. It is combined with an impression that the crisis is greater, and the contest forced upon us more serious than has been generally supposed. The English Funds have receded from the advanced prices of Monday and Tuesday. The favourable impulse which certainly would have been communicated by the present prospect of harvest is nullified on the Stock Exchange, prices at the end of the week being nearly on the same level as at the beginning. Foreign Securities are flat. Money is in plentiful supply. The Chancellor of the Exchequer announces a surplus of £2,860,000, and confidence in the expectation of material improvement would be strong if anxiety as to the Eastern contest did not intervene.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 18th July, 1857, which we give below it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,978,000, being an increase of £15,785, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,840,652, showing an increase of £248,492 when compared with the previous return.

Accounts from the wine growing countries are various. In France there appears to be sanguine expectation that the vintage will be abundant, and the quality good. Much is said of the benefit derived from the application of sulphur to the vines as protection from the prevailing disease. On the other hand accounts from Portugal state that, after favourable appearances for some time, suddenly and notwithstanding the application of sulphur, stems leaves and grapes became covered with the oidium, emitting a pestilential smell. Accounts from Spain are equally unfavourable. The disease is believed to be as extensively injurious as last year.

The late splendid weather has greatly influenced the balance of opinion in the corn market on the question of a fall in prices. It has been the cause of bringing forward larger supplies of grain, and has produced a powerful downward movement in each of the last two weeks in Mark Lane, and generally at the provincial markets. Intelligence now reaches us so quickly, that reports of the effect of the weather or other causes acting on the remotest markets of Europe become available here in a very short time. These reports, up to the present day, are highly favourable. In this country uncertainty will prevail during six weeks yet to come, but in many of the corn growing countries a good and abundant harvest is in great part secured.

During the course of six weeks ending the 11th July, we have experienced a steady and regular advance in the average price of many sorts of grain. The imperial average price of wheat is returned under date the 11th July, as 63s. 10d. per quarter. As this high price did not have the effect of bringing to market more than barely a hand to mouth supply, this fact affords very strong evidence that the stocks remaining in the hands of our growers are limited. Reports from abroad concur in stating that stocks are not any where large. Under these circumstances, those persons who wish to see the price of bread lower than at the present time, may reasonably come to the conclusion that, as the present high price appears to have been caused by short stores, lower prices will follow the abundance expected as the result of the present harvest. The fall in the price of wheat has amounted to about 6s. per per quarter. It has not proved sufficient to induce buyers to supply themselves freely. Very little business has been transacted.

Public attention being aroused to a lively interest in Indian matters, the pecuniary support of Government is demanded—first, for a line of telegraph, and ultimately for a railway which shall connect the shores of the Mediterranean with the head of the Persian gulf; or a submarine telegraph from Suez, down the Red Sea to Aden. It has been repeatedly mentioned that a line of telegraph wires in the Valley of the Euphrates will be exposed to the uncertain action of wild tribes, who feel only in a small degree the control of their nominal sovereign at Constantinople. The line now proposed would derive a great degree of security from being under the sea, and as quick intelligence is a matter of the utmost moment, a strong reason exists for the aid of Government.

THE SESSION.

It was no wonder that the prominence given to the subject of law amendment, in the speech of the Lords Commissioners at the commencement of the present session of Parliament, coupled with the previous memorable speech of Sir Richard Bethell at Aylesbury, should have excited considerable expectations in the public mind. There being no absorbing question of political interest to occupy the time of the House during the session, it was generally believed that a number of useful measures, to which the legal members of the Government professed to have devoted their particular attention, would have been passed without unnecessary delay. The difficulty was to imagine any obstacle. The Bills, we were told, had been prepared with the utmost care, on the best information, by the most competent persons. No Minister ever had to deal with a more manageable Opposition. In fact, on the subject of law reform, there could not be said to be any opposition; for here, at all events, the great majority, both of Lords and Commons, reflected the opinions and desires of the country. The ability of the Attorney-General was admitted by every one; and his anxiety to achieve legal reforms was so frequently and earnestly proclaimed by himself, that people had begun at length to believe in its existence. It was not unreasonable, therefore, that the friends of law reform should have indulged in high hopes of what would be accomplished, under such auspicious circumstances. It is because so little has been, or we fear will be, accomplished before the session closes, that we somewhat anticipate that event; and we do so in the hope that something may yet be done, if the professed friends of law reform who have seats in Parliament are true to their cause.

The measures for which Ministers expected especial credit are those relating to Testamentary and Matrimonial jurisdiction, and to Fraudulent Breaches of Trust. Indeed, they have not proposed any others of much importance, except the Insolvent Joint Stock Companies Bill. Notwithstanding the very elaborate report of the Registration Commissioners, and the other abundant materials for legislation, on the law affecting the transfer of real estate, they have not even pretended to deal with it; and if we may judge from a recent observation of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, it appears very problematical whether they mean ever to do so. The institution of a department of justice is another matter of hardly less moment, the consideration of which has been also indefinitely postponed, nor has anything been attempted towards carrying out the improvements in the language and manner of legislation, which were suggested some time ago in the report and evidence of the select committee on the Statute Law Commission. We have no desire, however, to make out a catalogue of all the measures which the Government ought to have undertaken, but which they have left untouched. A more useful inquiry is, how they have done what they have attempted? And here lies the secret of the want of success which has hitherto characterised most of their attempts at law amendment.

Of all the Government legal measures of the session, unquestionably the most important is the Probates aad Administration Bill. Now, our complaint is, that, both as to last session and the present, either an ill-considered Bill was laid before Parliament, or else one purposely much less useful than it might have been. Since the Lord Chancellor laid his first Bill upon the table of the House of Lords to the present time, the utmost uncertainty and vacillation have been exhibited in dealing with it by the law advisers of the Government. First of all, there was to have been a transfer of the contentious business to the Court of Chancery; then, in deference to popular clamour, there was some mystification about engrafting upon that tribunal a common law procedure in all testamentary business; for a while it was uncertain whether Mr. Collier's proposal for a transfer to the common law courts might not be adopted; and lastly, by way of escape from the rivalry of the two sides of Westminster Hall, there is to be a new court, and a new judge, who may be either an advocate or a member of the equity or the common law bar. Still more remarkable was the treatment of a question which affected the very principle of the Bill. It is impossible to deny that the only serious opposition which it has hitherto encountered came from the warmest supporters of the principle which it proposed to embody, and to the success of that opposition we now owe the abolition of the limit proposed for district probates, in respect of the amount and the kind of property of which testators resident in the district might die possessed. The strangest feature of this part of the case is the declaration of the Attorney-General, when he discovered the House of Commons to be almost unanimously opposed to restricting country probates as to the amount of property, that his own opinion fully coincided with that of the majority. At the same time, it would be unjust to deny the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General the praise of having perseveringly endeavoured to pass this measure; and we earnestly hope that their efforts will not be defeated by the opposition with which it is menaced by the proctors, when the question of their compensation comes to be discussed.

The fate of the Fraudulent Breaches of Trust Bill cannot yet be regarded as certain. That part of it which applies to the case of ordinary trustees has elicited considerable disapprobation. The remainder of the Bill, which relates to directors and officers of Joint-Stock Companies, on the contrary, has met with nothing but approval. The policy of including the former class of persons in an Act intended principally for the latter is questionable. Without some such provisions as those contained in Lord St. Leonards' Bill for the Relief of Trustees, the effect of Sir Richard Bethell's Bill would probably be to deter the great majority of persons from accepting the onerous and unprofitable office of trustee. With so great a risk of innocently suffering heavy pecuniary loss, as exists in the present state of the law, it only wants the additional terror of criminal proceedings to frighten men of ordinary nerve from undertaking the office. The same objections have manifestly no application to the paid officials of public companies; and there is no reason why they should all be placed together in the same category. But, however the House of Lords may deal with the clauses relating to trustees, there appears to be little room for doubt that those applying to other classes of persons will be enacted; and so far Sir Richard Bethell will have rendered English jurisprudence a substantial service, by removing doubts as to criminal liability, where none ought to exist.

Apart from the Divorce Bill, of which the prospect is not hopeful, the Insolvent Joint Stock Companies Bill is the only remaining Government measure of importance. It has now received its third reading in the House of Lords, and therefore its success is certain. Its effect must be very beneficial both to the shareholders and the creditors of insolvent companies. Under its operation, the interminable and ruinously expensive proceedings, the disgraceful conflict of jurisdictions, and the cruel persecution of shareholders, which were consequent upon the failure of the British Bank, need never be witnessed again; and we have no doubt that when it becomes law it will be hailed as a boon by tottering companies, many of whose members, under the existing law, would be ruined in the event of winding up.

We have now exhausted the list of the legal achievements of the session, unless, indeed, the group of eight Bills purporting to be a consolidation of certain branches of the criminal law are to be included in the number, which we are most unwilling to allow. In themselves they do not possess any strong claim upon our admiration. And considering that they are not merely attempts at consolidation, but also at alteration in a very important department of the law, we cannot but wish for their rejection by the House of Commons, if for no other reason, because of the late period when they were introduced, and of the vicious principle involved in delegating the proper functions of the Legislature to the employés of the Statute Law Commission. That learned body has been now for some years at work. It has had the help of a paid member and a numerous staff of assistants; and if it can do nothing more than contribute at the last moment such a batch of Bills as those presented lately to the House of Lords, it is high time that its functions should cease, and that the work of consolidation should be placed in other hands. We regard these eight Bills as nothing more than an attempt to prolong the existence of the Statute Law Commission, by an exhibition of vitality which may save it from the reproach of utter worthlessness.

On the whole, the public will be disappointed at the slight results which have followed from the great promises of law amendment, which ushered in the present session. We anxiously hope that the Probate Bill, at all events, will be the law of the land when Parliament is prorogued. If nothing further is achieved, that of itself will not be a contemptible instalment, and we shall be happy to find others of equal value in the programme of Ministers next February. Amongst these, above all, should be a well-considered Bill to facilitate the transfer of land. If the Lord Chancellor, or the Attorney-General, be not then prepared with such a measure, they may be assured that that most necessary task will be undertaken by some independent member of the Legislature.

LORD BROUGHAM'S REGISTRATION BILL.

If Lord Brougham's Transfer of Real Estate Bill had been introduced with a view to actual legislation, we should be obliged to enter our most decided protest against the scheme. We presume, however, that the only object of the learned and energetic Lord was to stimulate the activity of the Attorney-General in the preparation of the measure which he has promised to frame upon the basis of the Report of the Commission. The defects which are apparent on the face of Lord Brougham's scheme may, however, serve to direct attention to the difficulties which will have to be surmounted in preparing a comprehensive Bill, such as to do justice at once to the public and the profession. In this view, therefore, it will not be altogether lost time to examine the general outline of the machinery by which Lord Brougham proposes to simplify the present practice of conveyancing. After a series of clauses providing for the appointment of a hierarchy of Registrar-General, Recorders, and Registrars, and for the parcelling out of the country into divisions and districts, the powers and duties of the officers are prescribed. Their first business is to be the formation of a map for every district, a matter on which it will be remembered the Commission pronounced no very definite opinion, but which, we believe, will, on any system, prove to be an indispensable preliminary. The proceedings by which the accuracy of the official map is intended to be secured may furnish some useful suggestions. In the first place, a discretion is given to the Registrars to avail themselves of the Ordnance and Tithe Commutation maps where these are found to be sufficient in scale and accuracy, or, if necessary, to institute new surveys to perfect the plans. After the map has been laid down, due publicity is to be given by means of notices, and the Recorder of the division is to hold a sitting for the examination of all objections on the part of landowners who may consider their boundaries not to be defined with sufficient clearness and accuracy. When all necessary corrections have thus been introduced, the map is to be authenticated by the official seal; and machinery is also provided for the correction from time to time of any errors which may arise by the alteration of boundaries, the progress of building, or any other causes. This is so far well, but, having got his map, Lord Brougham is determined to make it the only basis of registration. Parcels are to be described by reference to letters in the map; and if any stickling purchaser is anxious to have the identity of his land made more secure by the addition of verbal descriptions, he is not to be permitted to insert them in his conveyance, but is to be forced to adopt the clumsy contrivance of a supplementary instrument to specify the parcels. It is a strange way of simplifying conveyances to cut a deed into two, and describe the property on one piece of parchment, and convey it by another. This, however, is only introductory to a much more objectionable proposal — namely, that the deed of conveyance or mortgage shall be in all cases prepared, not by the purchaser or mortgagee, but by the registration officers, a plan which needs only to be stated to be condemned. What is wanted is to simplify the transfer of land with the least possible infusion of officialism, and not to take the conveyancing business of the whole country, and hand it over bodily to an army of registrars and recorders. Registrars will have quite enough to do with their own business of registration without making them universal draftsmen, to the hazard of all who deal in land, and to the obvious detriment of the profession, who know how to do the work at least as well as any local officers who would be likely to be appointed under the provisions of the Bill if it were ever to become law.

These are objections to the machinery rather than to the principle of the Bill, though they are of too sweeping a character to be regarded as otherwise than fatal to the whole scheme. But the principle of the project, if it have any, is at least equally open to comment. Whatever else may be the result of the Report of the late Commission, we take it to have finally established the much disputed, but really obvious, conclusion, that any system of registration of assurances can lead to nothing but increased complication and additional expense. The question now on trial is, whether registration of title, as distinguished from registration of documents, can or cannot be worked out with efficiency and safety. In terms Lord Brougham seems to admit that this is the actual position of the inquiry, for he is careful to adopt the phraseology which is appropriate only to some such method as the Commissioners have suggested. Thus his Bill provides for the formation of what is termed an "Index of Titles;" but upon examination of the enacting and explanatory clauses, it turns out that the index is intended to be nothing whatever but an index of deeds and documents. The very first thing to be borne in mind in devising any scheme of registration is, that there are two distinct principles, on one or other of which you must of necessity proceed. Either you may make the registration conclusive, subject to the title of the first registered owner being good, or you may warrant the title, of course after a due investigation with sufficient notice to all interested parties. The Commissioners entered very fully into the consideration, whether it was advisable to give a parliamentary title in every case. They decided, for what seemed to us unanswerable reasons, against such a plan, and explained, in some detail, the procedure by which those who desired to procure an official warranty might be enabled to do so. It was a matter of course that such a machinery should not be allowed to work injury to an absent party, whose interest might not be discovered before the conclusion of the proceedings and the grant of an indefeasible title. The greatest precautions were intended to be used to prevent any steps being taken without due notice to all who could have any possible claim; and in the rare instances in which wrong might inadvertently be done notwithstanding such safeguards, compensation was to be made at the public expense. It is clear that it is only by the force of some such provisions as these that it can be possible in any case for a purchaser to dispense with an investigation of the title prior to the first registration; but Lord Brougham appears to contemplate a much shorter cut to this end. The Bill contains no provision in the case of a register of a purchase for any judicial investigation of title, nor is compensation offered in the event of an estate being registered in the name of a usurper. If a true owner afterwards turns up, there is nothing that we can find in the Bill to prevent his displacing those whose names appear on the series of transactions which may be entered in the official index. It follows, that a purchaser from any of these latter persons can only be safe after investigating the title as fully as if no registration had taken place; and yet the Bill proceeds to enact that no person whose name shall have been placed on the register shall be required to deduce a title beyond the fact of registration, of which the certificate of the registrar is to be sufficient evidence. In other words, the Bill proposes to simplify conveyancing, by enacting that, in future, purchasers shall not be entitled to insist on any title being made. It would be in effect precisely the same thing to enact that henceforth there shall be no more purchases or other dealings in land. This certainly is an original method of facilitating the transfer of real property.

THE CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

(From the Daily News).

This is surely rather sharp practice. Here are no less than seven Consolidation Bills, on some of the most important branches of the criminal law. Larceny and all other descriptions of criminal misappropriation; forgery; coinage offences; malicious injuries to property; offences against the person; the law relating to accessories and abettors; and the law, both criminal and civil, relating to Libel—a collective mass of legislation occupying 120 pages of parliamentary foolscap—thrown before the House of Commons on the 31st of July, within a few weeks of the close of the session, and at a period of the year when a great proportion of the legal members of the House are notoriously absent on circuit. On the 29th of July these Bills were first placed in the hands of members; on the 31st the House is to be asked to assent to their being read a second time. We are well aware of the apology which will be made in extenuation of this paroxysm of legislative haste. It will be urged that these Bills are to a great extent simply a consolidation of the existing law. As far as this plea is urged with truth, we are not disposed to question its validity. In all exertions of legislative power there are two main points to be attended to—the matter and the manner of legislation. Is the proposed law expedient in its objects? is one question; is it so expressed as to carry out those objects? is another question. The two questions fall within the province of different orders of men. The first question is a question for legislators, the second for lawyers. Parliament is the only tribunal for the one; a committee of legal members of the House of Lords is no doubt admirably fitted to decide on the other.

If these seven Bills merely consolidated the existing enactments on the subjects with which they deal—if they did nothing more than re-enact with judicious improvements in legislative language the criminal statutes which have accumulated since the consolidation Acts of Sir Robert Peel, and fuse the whole incongruous body of law into one homogeneous mass—we at once admit that there would be great force in the argument, that the House of Commons would be well advised not to interfere in the matter, but to take it for granted that they could hardly improve, in point of form, what the utmost science of the greatest lawyers of the day had been sedulously employed in bringing as near as possible to perfection. But the case is not so. In the first place, even in point of form, it may well be doubted whether this consolidation of the criminal law makes any very near approach to that ideal standard of lucid accuracy and comprehensive terseness of expression which the public have a right to expect in model legislation. It ought to be generally understood that these Criminal Law Consolidation Bills are a totally different thing from the long-promised criminal code. The latter is still in embryo. Many hundreds of thousands have been lavished, many commissions have sate, upon it. The public have nothing to show for this waste of money and time but a few fragments of codification, buried in a mass of learned annotations, and still more deeply sepulchred within the dusty covers of forgotten Blue Books. The seven Consolidation Bills which the House is to be asked to read a second time to-night are a far humbler effort of legislation. There is nothing scientific about them; they aim at nothing higher than the collection, into seven Bills, of provisions now scattered through more than seventy times seven Statutes. Their authors are the working members of the existing Statute Law Commission, and, without any desire to be hypercritical, we must be allowed to doubt whether some of the Bills, especially that relating to offences against the person, do not present omissions and inaccuracies which, even in point of form, would render it somewhat inexpedient to impress on them, without due deliberation, the final sanction of the Legislature.

But the danger of hasty legislation in respect to these seven Bills does not arise only from defects of form or from errors of omission: it depends on the fact that several of these Bills, more especially those relating to coinage offences and offences against the person, contain new provisions, the expediency of introducing which is a grave matter for the consideration, not of legal draftsmen, weighing words and phrases, but of statesmen, weighing thoughts and things. We will take only a single instance from the "Offences against the Person Bill." The Report prefixed to this Bill states, that "Section 36 underwent much discussion in the Lords' Committee, and was framed expressly to prevent the too-prevalent ill-treatment of women and children, by giving a much more severe punishment than can now be awarded in such cases." Turning to the Bill, in order to see the mode by which this laudable object is proposed to be carried out, we read as follows:—"S. 36. Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously cause any bodily harm or do any violence to the person of any child under the age of ten years, or of any woman, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years, with hard labour." Now we have no wish to animadvert on this clause in the narrow spirit of legal criticism. We have no desire to point out, what is on the face of the clause itself sufficiently obvious, that it vests in the tribunals an excessively wide discretion—a discretion under which any assault, however trifling—"any bodily harm or any violence"—an abrasion, a bruise, or a blow—may be punishable with not less than three years hard labour. We would simply submit, that the expediency of thus far extending the power of imprisonment now possessed in such cases, is a question not for lawyers but for statesmen—not for a committee of the law lords up-stairs, but for free and public discussion by both Houses in their capacity as legislators. If this be so—and that it is so really admits of no reasonable doubt—it follows, as a necessary consequence, that it is really idle to ask the House of Commons on the 31st of July to pass judgment on seven Bills, none of which were delivered to the House before the 29th of July, and several of which — we would instance especially the Coinage Offences Bill—involve not only a consolidation of the existing law, but the introduction of much which is absolutely new law.

If, indeed, these seven Bills were so perfect in form as to realise in that respect the ideal of criminal legislation, we might be disposed to urge on the House of Commons a suspension of its proper functions, as a means of securing with all possible speed so inestimable a benefit to the country. But this is simply not so. The Bills are, with some noticeable exceptions, respectable specimens of the improved style of parliamentary drafting; nothing more. In as far as they bring together the disjecta membra of the criminal statutes, they would no doubt save the practitioner some trouble of reference; but even in this respect we fail to see that they would possess any marked advantage over the current edition of "Jervis's Archbold." On the other hand, the amendments they propose to introduce in the law, however admirable and useful in themselves (as to which we pronounce no opinion), ought certainly not to be pressed through Parliament without abundant opportunity of discussion and deliberation. The country will not suffer for having to wait a year longer for this result of the labours of Mr. Bellenden Ker's Commission; but it would be eminently discreditable to all concerned, if impracticable or unstatesmanlike provisions were allowed to become law, merely because the House of Commons was asked to ratify without examination what a committee of law lords had seen fit to approve.

COMMITTEE FOR PRIVILEGES.

THE GREAT SHREWSBURY CASE.—HOUSE OF LORDS, July 16.

The Registries of Albrighton, Salwarpe, and other places were produced by various witnesses, for the purpose of proving the burial of several of the persons mentioned in the pedigree.

The Rev. Dr. Winter, a Roman Catholic priest, said he had formerly been private chaplain to the late Earl. He saw him buried.

Cross-examined.—In a conversation he had with the sixteenth Earl, the predecessor of the late Earl, he was told that "Lord Talbot of Ingestre had no more claim to the title and estates than this writing pen." The Earl at the same time held up a pen in his hand.

Re-examined.—The Earl made that remark in consequence of witness having told him he had heard a rumour, that, in the event of Bertram Arthur's death, Lord Talbot would succeed to the title and estates.

By Lord ST. LEONARDS.—No more conversation took place on the subject. He asked the Earl the question abruptly. Bertram Arthur, afterwards the seventeenth Earl, was the nephew of the sixteenth Earl, and was living in the same house with his uncle when the conversation occurred.

Proof was then given of the death of the remaining members of the second branch without leaving issue, and thus the second line of the pedigree was completed.

With respect to the third line a curious book, called the "Benefactors' Book," was tendered, containing a pedigree alleged to be signed by Sir Gilbert, the son of Sir John of Albrighton, and the brother of John of Salwarpe. The origin of this book was as follows:—At the time of the great fire of London, the Heralds' College was burnt down, and in order to raise the then large sum of £5,000 for the purpose of purchasing land and rebuilding the College, a Royal Commission issued, directed to the nobility and gentry, urging them to raise the necessary funds, and directing the heralds to make a book, to be called the "Benefactors'," in which the pedigrees of all persons so subscribing were to be entered, "together with their marriages, issue, and liberality, for the remembrance of future ages." In the first place, proof was tendered of the authenticity of Sir Gilbert's signature by means of an acknowledged authentic will being placed before experts in the art of comparing handwritings, and then the signature in the "Benefactors'" was shown them.

Mr. Serjeant Byles objected to this method of proceeding.

Sir F. Thesiger contended that their Lordships would hear this evidence, because, in the first place, if they were bound by the rules of civil judicature, they must receive the evidence in accordance with the Act of Parliament; and, secondly, if they were not bound by the Act, they would not reject themselves what they had considered a just and convenient course to be adopted by other tribunals.

After some further discussion the proof of the handwriting was admitted, and several persons skilled in the art gave it as their opinion that the handwriting in the will and that of the signature in the "Benefactors'" was the same.'"

The pedigree entered in the "Benefactors'" was then tendered as evidence upon two grounds,—first, as an official document, and secondly as a pedigree signed by a member of the family, and containing statements respecting that family.

Mr. Serjeant Byles objected to the entry being given in evidence —first, upon the ground that it was not an official document, inasmuch as, unlike the Heralds' "Visitations," no search was required to be made by the Heralds before the entry was made, for the purpose of establishing its truth; and secondly, because the entry, having been made with the intention of its being made an official document, it could not be called a private pedigree signed by a member of the family.

The Attorney-General said, that he considered the entry was not an official document, and, inasmuch as there were several blanks in the pedigree, he did not think it could be admitted as evidence.

Sir F. Kelly submitted that the pedigree did not pretend to be complete, but merely to be true as far as it went. He contended that it ought to be received in evidence.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said that the "Benefactors'" had been admitted in evidence in 1804 by their Lordships in the De Ros peerage.

Sir F. Kelly said, that, if there had been any ground of objection, the Attorney-General of the day would not have allowed it to be received in evidence.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that this was a very important point, and his strong conviction was, that, leaving open all question as to the weight that ought to be given to it, it ought to be received in evidence, upon the ground that the "Benefactors'" was legitimate evidence to satisfy their Lordships that this was a pedigree made by a member of the family, whether signed by him or not; the signature being merely for the purpose of showing who the person was who drew up the pedigree. In his opinion the book had been in proper custody. At all events, they might take it safely as a statement made by a member of the family as to the state of the family at the time. It was not now necessary to say whether, if there had been no proof of the handwriting, that it would have been admissible in evidence, but at the same time he did not think that the "Benefactors'" stood upon the same footing with the Heralds' "Visitations," which were quasi judicial proceedings. In the present case there was no evidence to show that the Heralds made any search before they entered the pedigree, to ascertain its correctness.

The other Lords having concurred,

The "Benefactors'" was put in evidence, and the entry read.

July 17.

Further documentary evidence was given in proof of the third line of pedigree. An objection, which was overruled, was made by the counsel opposing the claim to a copy of an inscription upon a monument erected by William Talbot, Bishop of Durham, to the memory of his father. An objection was also made to the evidence, as insufficient, of the marriage of William, Bishop of Durham, with Catherine, his supposed wife.

Lord Belhaven was examined with respect to certain conversations he had had with the sixteenth Earl and Lady Shrewsbury as to the state of the family. He was told by them that Bertram Arthur, the late Earl, would keep the Protestant branch out of the title.

July 27.

Sir F. Kelly tendered some slight further documentary evidence on behalf of the claimant, and he was then proceeding to sum up the claimant's evidence, when

Lord ST. LEONARDS said, the House could not hear him until after the cases of the parties who appeared in opposition to the claim had been concluded. Major Talbot had sent in a document by which he declined offering any active opposition to the claim, but he prayed to be allowed to watch the case. The House would, therefore, only hear Mr. Serjeant Byles and the Attorney-General against the claim.

Mr. R. Palmer, on behalf of Major Talbot, said he had received new evidence, which he was prepared to lay before their Lordships.

Lord St. Leonards.—Are you prepared to produce the evidence at once?

Mr. R. Palmer said, certainly he was.

The Lord Chancellor asked if there was an affidavit to that effect?

Mr. R. Palmer said that one could be prepared at once.

Sir F. Thesiger said, that Major Talbot had adopted a singular course. He had first been permitted by the indulgence of their Lordships to lodge a case, and then, having declined to offer any active opposition, he now sought to give evidence without having lodged any case at all.

Mr. R. Palmer said he must have made himself misunderstood, for he merely wished to inform their Lordships that he had obtained fresh evidence. He did not propose to produce it before the House. He merely wished to watch the case.

Sir F. Thesiger said he had no objection to his learned friend watching the case, provided he remained silent.

At the suggestion of the House,

Mr. Serjeant Byles proceeded to open the case of the Duke of Norfolk's second son, in opposition to the claim, by saying that there was no wish on the part of the Duke of Norfolk to controvert any honours or emoluments to which Lord Talbot might lay claim. He had not the slightest idea of this devise to his younger son until the death of the late Earl. He, however, was the natural guardian of his child, who was an infant not merely in the legal sense of the word, but a child of a few months old, and, therefore, he was bound in duty to that child to defend its possessions. He should show at least thirteen persons as to whom no reasonable evidence had been given that they had died without issue. He could not entertain any reasonable doubt that this was not the last claim to the earldom of Shrewsbury which their Lordships would have to decide upon. Their Lordships would recollect the case of Lord Willoughby, in which the title had been in the possession of a younger branch of the family for a period of 150 years, at the expiration of which time an obscure person, living on Tower-hill, came to their Lordships' House and proved to demonstration that he was the true heir to the title through the elder branch, and he took his seat in this House as a Peer. It was only within the last eleven months that the issue of the first Earl of Shrewsbury, whoever they might be, had received notice that they might be entitled to this splendid inheritance. It was most likely, from information they had received, that several persons would put in their claims to the title. It was true that there had been notices in the public newspapers, but it was not until this case had been published, and the evidence laid before the world, that the parties would know of their rights. He submitted that the case required the most extraordinary vigilance on the part of their Lordships, for they had to go back for 300 years through the pedigree of a most prolific family, in which there had been many second marriages, and which was now submitted for the first time to anything like a judicial investigation. There was already one person at their Lordships' bar who claimed to have sprung from an issue not mentioned in the case of the claimant; and if time were allowed, there was no doubt but that more persons would have appeared before their Lordships. According to the Act of Parliament, a person had nothing to do but to show that he was the real Earl of Shrewsbury, and he would enter at once into the possession of £45,000 per annum. Whoever was to hold the estates, were it Lord Talbot or were it the Duke of Norfolk's second son, they would always hold it with the sword of doubt suspended over their heads, as the moment a new person proved his right to the title, the estates under the Act of Parliament would pass to him without regard to the Statute of Limitations. He (Mr. Serjeant Byles) did not wish to express any disrespect to the judges who were to decide this claim; but he must observe the fact, that, at the fag end of the first session after the late Earl's death, Lord Howard was threatened with the loss of these estates without his having been enabled to prepare his case, or obtain sufficient evidence. He should, however, make such observations upon the claimant's case as he considered necessary, and he should also lay before their Lordships such evidence as he had in his power. He would not trouble their Lordships by going into the claimant's pedigree at large, but he would content himself by simply laying before their Lordships the weaknesses which presented themselves to his mind in looking at the claimant's case. Before he proceeded to open the case on behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, he begged to remind their Lordships that Sir F. Thesiger said that he should mainly rest his case upon two documents—the recital in the private Act of Parliament of 1718, and the Benefactor's Pedigree. He could not do justice to the case which he should have the honour to present to their Lordships unless he were indulged with an opportunity of making some observations upon these two pieces of evidence; for if they were to be received by the House without any such observations at all, the difficulties with which he should have to contend would be much increased. He would call their Lordships' attention, in the first place, to the recital in the deed of 1718, executed a year after the death of the Duke of Shrewsbury, and the circumstances under which that recital was introduced in the deed. The father of the Duke was Francis, the eleventh Earl, who was killed in a duel, and his eldest son Charles was left a minor; and the executor of this Francis was William of Wittington, who, it was said by the claimant, was the father of the Bishop of Salisbury, and who, at all events, must have been perfectly well known to the Duke of Shrewsbury. Most of the members of this illustrious family were Catholics. The Duke of Shrewsbury made the settlement of 1700 when he was in the country, and after he had retired from public business. He would beg their Lordships' attention to the condition of the Catholics at this time, because it would have a most important bearing upon the case. In the early part of the year 1700, an Act of Parliament, the 11 & 12 Will. 3, c. 4, was passed, entitled "An Act for further Preventing the Growth of Popery." The provisions of that Act seemed almost incredible to us of the present time. It gave a reward of £100 to any informer who should convict a Roman Catholic bishop, priest, or gentleman, of celebrating mass, and the 2nd section inflicted imprisonment for life upon the parties so offending. The 3rd section was the most important; it rendered Catholic landowners incapable of taking or holding lands, and enacted, that if within six months after coming to the age of 18, Catholics did not abjure their faith by making a declaration against transubstantiation, their estates should go at once to the next of kin being a Protestant. The title and the lands were thus at the mercy of their nearest relations, and any informer might inflict upon them these severe penalties, without incurring the risk of which they could not practise the sacred rites of their most august religion.

Lord Brougham.—What did you say, Mr. Serjeant Byles—of what religion? We did not hear you distinctly.

Mr. Serjeant Byles.—Of their religion; he would use that term if their Lordships preferred it. Under these circumstances he would point their Lordships' attention to the state of the family at this period. Gilbert was a Catholic priest, and George was also a Catholic. Sir John, of Longford, was a Catholic next in succession, and Sir John, of Lacock, was the only Protestant. John of Longford had no children. The Bishop of Salisbury was perfectly well known to the Duke, who had been his benefactor, and who it might be presumed wished to benefit him further. It was under these circumstances that the Duke had to settle very large estates in his name and blood. The Duke, who appeared to have been a person of very great wealth indeed, in settling his estates only made the bishop a trustee, and did not leave them to the bishop as a possible heir to the title, but rather excluded him from the possession of them, which would not have been done supposing it was known he had a chance of becoming the Earl. He submitted that the bishop was not in the position that the claimant endeavoured to place him in, or that the Duke knew that between himself and the bishop there were a great number of persons who would have a prior claim to the title and the estates. The recital in the deed, he should contend, was made at the instance of the bishop, and was, therefore, not a proper document to be received in evidence by their Lordships. With respect to the pedigree contained in the Benefactors', he contended that the proof of the signature of Gilbert Talbot to it was not sufficiently proved by the comparison of the initial letters "G. T." on Gilbert Talbot's will, with the signature purporting to be his in the Benefactors'. Besides this want of authenticity, he should show that there were a great many erasures, and upwards of thirteen persons who would be proved to have existed, of whom the Benefactors' made no mention, and who were not proved by the claimant to have died without issue. Under these circumstances he trusted that their Lordships would not allow the claim of Lord Talbot to the title of Earl of Shrewsbury.

July 28.

Mr. Serjeant Byles proceeded to produce evidence for the purpose of showing the incorrectness of the Benefactors' Pedigree. In order to show this, several ancient wills, deeds, and inquisitions were tendered, in which a great many persons bearing the name of Talbot were referred to, who were not mentioned in the Benefactors' Pedigree. Among these were a Sir Humphrey

Talbot and a John Talbot, said to be the issue of the first Earl of Talbot by a second marriage. In the first line a Thomas was mentioned, said to be a brother of the fourth Earl, of whom all subsequent trace was lost. William, a son of the fourth Earl, said to have died without issue, was stated in certain documents to have had a son, Walter, of whom no subsequent trace could be found. As to the second line, Sir Gilbert of Grafton was said by the claimant to have had by his first marriage only one son, Gilbert; but in the will of the above-mentioned Sir Humphrey, Sir Gilbert of Grafton was said to have had a second son, Humphrey. A will of Gilbert, the eldest son, stated that he had two sons, Humphrey and Walter. Walter was said to have had issue who could be traced for several centuries. Sir John of Abbington was stated to have had two sons and five daughters by his first marriage, which were not mentioned in the Benefactors', and John, the tenth Earl, was said to have had a third brother, Gilbert, living in 1609. With respect to the third line, the claimant's pedigree was admitted to be correct down to Sherrington of Rudge, who was stated by the Benefactors' to have had six sons, all but one of whom died without issue. By the deeds put in evidence it was now attempted to be proved, that, besides the six sons, he had four daughters, and that the sixth son, Gilbert, said to have died without issue, had one son and two daughters. Charles, a grandson of Sherrington, was also said to have had issue, mentioned in certain deeds. Another grandson of Sherrington, not mentioned by the Benefactors', was stated to have had issue. By his second marriage, according to the claimant's pedigree, Sherrington had three sons, of whom George and Edward were said to have died without issue, whereas it was now attempted to be proved that George had a son William.

If the case thus endeavoured to be made out by the parties in opposition be correct, the title and estates have been in the hands of wrongful possessors for upwards of two centuries, and not one of the present claimants would be entitled to them. Thus the second son of the Duke of Norfolk would be able to keep possession of the estates until some person came forward who could make out his claim to the title to their Lordships' satisfaction.

At the conclusion of the documentary evidence,

The Rev. Dr. Logan and the Rev. Dr. Rock, both Catholic clergymen, were called for the purpose of speaking to conversations they had had with John, the last Earl but one of Shrewsbury, in which he had said that Lord Talbot had no claim to the earldom in case of Bertram's death, and that he did not belong to the same family.

The Rev. Dr. Rock said he had had his attention drawn to the evidence of Mrs. Hibbard, which appeared in the Times, and knowing that he could give evidence in contradiction to hers, he had felt it his duty to tender it.

July 30.

Several witnesses were called this morning on behalf of the parties opposing the claim to speak to conversations which they had had with John, the sixth Earl, in which he said Lord Talbot had no claim to the title.

At the conclusion of the evidence offered in opposition,

Sir F. Thesiger proceeded to produce evidence in contradiction to the suggestions of the parties opposing. Some of the persons mentioned by the deeds produced on Tuesday were shown to have been illegitimate, others were shown to have belonged to branches of the family younger than that through which Lord Talbot claimed.

At the conclusion of the evidence in reply,

On the application of Mr. Serjeant Byles, the further hearing was adjourned until this day week, and the evidence was ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY REFORM.

(From the Times).

The statement just made by Lord Brougham on the existing defects of the bankruptcy courts will, perhaps, stimulate the Government during the approaching recess to prepare a scheme of amendment. But, although the improvements urged were far from extensive, the tone of the Lord Chancellor afforded little hope that they are likely to be vigorously taken up. The great evil of the present condition of the question is the damage it inflicts upon public morality. Everything that deters creditors from bringing the conduct of failed firms before an impartial tribunal operates as an encouragement to the fraudulent trader. Where affairs are wound up under private inspection the representations of the debtor are always more or less taken for granted, and while the honest man abstains from turning this fact to his own advantage, it proves to the unscrupulous an irresistible temptation. Both, however, occupy afterwards the same position in society. Indeed, if there is any difference, it is against the honest man, since he frankly admits all his mistakes, while the more practised operator resorts to every kind of concealment and sophistry, and usually ends by extracting a general expression of "sympathy" from his deluded supporters. The records of the past few years indicate the field that is open to every bold adventurer. He may go on with a lavish personal expenditure, and wind up with liabilities for £100,000—they must never be less than £50,000 if he desires to be respected—and at the end, although he may be unable to show assets for more than a quarter of that amount, or to give a single satisfactory reason in the shape of unforeseen calamity to account for the disappearance of the remainder, he can rely that few questions will be asked, and that the whole matter will be smoothly adjusted. Should any dissatisfied sufferer manifest a disposition to severity, it is only necessary that some friend of the insolvent, after enlarging upon the readiness shown by that gentleman to facilitate the liquidation—he having actually offered to continue his best services in the cause for three months, or even longer, on a proper allowance being made to him—should threaten every obstructive with the fact that if any want of unanimity is shown, the case must be carried into bankruptcy, where, instead of 4*s.* or 5*s.* in the pound, which might now be realised, there will, at the best, be a prospect of half-a-crown. From that moment all opposition is over. The creditors sign a deed of arrangement, write off their losses, wait patiently for the small pittance promised, and never make another inquiry. That such results should be witnessed, when, as Lord Brougham observed, speaking from the experience of the past three years, out of 120 bankruptcies, with assets amounting in the aggregate to £90,000, the creditors got only £44,000, the whole of the balance having been swallowed up by expenses, can hardly create surprise. Even under the best system, the inducements on the part of creditors to shun a public court are very strong, since those who have made large losses are never anxious to parade them, but with the certainty that the pecuniary results would be worse, even although some reserved assets might often be extracted, which, under a private liquidation, would never be heard of, there can be no doubt as to which will be preferred. Thus all the most questionable cases wholly escape. Pecuniary loss and inconvenient publicity both stand before the creditor to deter him from his strict duty, and the reckless defaulter gets through without even a rebuke, since it is not the business of any individual to assume the functions of a judge. A system more calculated to strike at the root of all straightforward and unpretending modes of business could scarcely be conceived. The story of the prosperous American financier, who upon his sixth failure was told that his assets did not show more than 3*s.* 9*d.* in the pound, and who replied that, as he had never paid less than 5*s.*, he would make up the difference from his own pocket, finds something very like its parallel every month in London. The continuance of the evil depends now upon the Legislature. The expense of a legal liquidation certainly need not exceed that incurred by a leading professional accountant. In fact, it should be considerably less. With a reform in this respect, and with some arrangement for the non-publication of the amount of the claim of each individual creditor, the Court of Bankruptcy might become what such a tribunal should be in the first commercial country in the world—a terror to the dishonest, and a refuge and justification for the unfortunate trader. In the absence of the latter provision, whatever reforms may be made in other respects, it will perhaps never be uniformly resorted to. Some of the recent and most important investigations connected with the Royal British Bank were nearly being stopped through difficulties in that respect. They were got over, however, by an understanding that names or special figures should be suppressed wherever their publication might be injurious or inexpedient, and, subject to the discretion of the court, there seems no reason why the example thus furnished should not be generally acted upon.

BANKRUPTCY STATISTICS.

The following is an Abstract of a Return to the House of Lords from the Official Assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy in London, and of the District Courts of Bankruptcy, from Oct. 11, 1855, to Oct. 11, 1856, of the total amount of remuneration received by them during that period, and of the sums paid thereout for expenses for the same period:—

The damages, &c., are in consequence of Official Assignees being necessary parties to all actions by and against the creditors' assignees, and equally liable with them to all consequences of these actions, although the Official Assignee can have no interest in the subject-matter of the action but as a mere receiver.

In the case of Griffiths & Co., the assignees found, on their appointment, a ship in the bankrupts' actual possession. They were advised by an eminent counsel that it was theirs. They, therefore, defended an action brought against them to try the right. The verdict was against them, and the damages were found at £3,220. The creditors' assignees are incapable of paying. The estate has no funds, and no prospect of any. The whole loss falls on the Official Assignee. The costs are estimated at about £800 more.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—DURHAM, JULY 23.

(Before Mr. Baron CHANNELL.)

THE QUEEN v. BALLENY (A MAGISTRATE).

In this cause a special jury was sworn to try a criminal information, whereby her Majesty's Attorney-General charges Robert Balleny, Esq., a justice of the peace, residing at Little Greencroft, near Lanchester, in the county of of Durham, with having, under colour of his office as a magistrate, compounded an offence and extorted money under threats of fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Atherton, Q.C,, and the Hon. A. Liddell, were for the prosecution; Serjeant Atkinson for the defence.

Mr. Atherton said this case was one of great importance as concerning the administration of justice—one very unfrequent in our courts, and, he might almost say, without a parallel. The defendant was a gentleman by position, and had been for many years a county magistrate. On the 2nd of July last year two police constables, in the course of their duty, observed two men, named Spoons and Story, in pursuit of game. They apprehended them, and took them before the nearest magistrate, who happened to be Mr. Balleny. He, instead of proceeding in the ordinary way to hear the evidence, addressed the prisoners thus: "If you will pay £1 each you may go; if not, you will be taken to Lanchester and locked up, and brought before the magistrate next day and fined 40s. and costs." Then, without waiting for an answer from the accused parties, he ordered one of the constables to handcuff the men and take them to Lanchester. The men asked to be allowed to go to Berry Edge, their object being to raise the money for their liberation. Mr. Balleny gave them permission, and the men went to Berry Edge, raised the money, and paid it over to one of coustables. They were then allowed to go home. The constable went the next day to Mr. Balleny, and asked him to enter the cause. The defendant thereupon said the men were not fined, and that nothing was due to the county or the superannuation fund. He then handed 10s. to Robson, the constable, telling him there was 5s. for himself and 5s. for the other officer. Robson declined to receive it, and Mr. Bellany said if it were objected to by the chief constable, they must return the money to him.

The field in which the poachers were found belonged to Mr. Balleny himself.

Mr. Serjeant Atkinson, for the defence, complained that this was an information ex officio, and said, that, on the facts, as proved by the prosecution, never had the office of Attorney-General been so abused as in this case. He contended that Mr. Balleny had a perfect right to do as he did. An offence had been committed against him, and, not having merged his civil rights in his public duties, and being influenced by the appeal to settle the matter at once, he consented to take £2 as compensation for the damage he had sustained. The men had, therefore, never been fined at all. The learned counsel concluded by reminding the jury of the serious consequences a verdict of guilty would entail.

Mr. Atherton replied; and

The jury, after a short deliberation, found the defendant Guilty of extorting the money, and that he did it under colour of his office as magistrate.

The defendant will be brought up for judgment next term in the Queen's Bench.

In re Humphrey Brown.—Court of Bankruptcy, July 30.—(Before Mr. Commissioner Fane.)—A petition for adjudication in bankruptcy has been presented to this court by Mr. Brown, through his solicitors, Messrs. Greville and Tucker. The object of the petitioner is to obtain his release from custody, where he now is under an attachment issued at the suit of the official manager of the Royal British Bank. The adjudication was made, and the bankrupt's surrender was taken, he having been brought up for the purpose in custody on the Commissioner's warrant. It is said that an application to the Vice-Chancellor will be founded on these proceedings for his release from custody.

Re Suitors in Chancery.—Court of Chancery, July 25. — Mr. Renshaw appeared in support of a petition to have a fresh receiver appointed of the compensation fund awarded to the Earl of Devon on the abolition of a patent office formerly held by him in the Court of Chancery. The application was made on behalf of the Globe Insurance Company, who are first incumbrancers on the fund. The Lord Chancellor made the order as asked, without prejudice to the rights of any of the parties.

A Black Calendar of Crime.—The calendar of prisoners for trial at the Liverpool assizes, as made up to the 27th inst., is one of the blackest catalogues of crime that has been issued for some time. There are ten cases of murder in it (to which will have to be added another from Manchester, in which three prisoners are for trial), fourteen of stabbing, wounding, &c., one of shooting, one of attempt to blow up a house, five of rape, and five of perjury, besides a long list of burglaries and other offences—Times.

The Election Petitions Bill.—The following rather important clause has been added in committee on the Bill of Mr. Adderley and Mr. S. Child for regulating the presentation and withdrawal of election petitions. The clause enacts that any petitioner who shall not complete his recognisances to proceed, or who shall afterwards withdraw his petition without leave of the House, shall be liable to pay double the amount of all costs, damages, and expenses incurred by the sitting member or other party complained of in the petition. The agent presenting the petition will also be personally liable to pay all costs to which the petitioner is liable under this Act.—Times.

Chancery Vacation Notice.—During the vacation, until further notice, all applications which are necessary to be made at the judges' chambers are to be made at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood. Parties desiring to make any urgent special application to the Court during the vacation, are to apply at the said chambers for an appointment. The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Wood will be open on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in each week, from 11 to 1.

The Privilege of Reports.—The Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Privilege of Reports, have agreed to the following resolutions, viz.:—1, That the prayer of certain petitioners that there shall be entire immunity for the publication in newspapers of all that is spoken at all public meetings, if the report be faithful, thus depriving persons calumniated of all remedy, save against the speaker, cannot safely be granted; 2, That faithful reports of the proceedings of either House of Parliament, at which strangers have been permitted to be present, shall have the same privilege as is now granted to faithful reports of the proceedings of courts of justice; 3, That if an action shall be brought for an alleged libel, it shall be competent for the defendant, in addition to any other plea, to plead, "that the alleged libel was par of the report of the proceedings of a public meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose, and that the said report is a faithful report of the said proceedings of the said public meeting, and that the plaintiff has sustained no actual damage by the publication of the alleged libel," and that on proof of this plea, the jury should be directed to find a verdict for the defendant; and 4, that a public meeting for this purpose shall be a meeting lawfully called by the sheriff of a county or other public functionary to petition the Queen or either House of Parliament, or a meeting for the election of members of Parliament, or a meeting of the town counsel of any city or borough, or a meeting held under the authority of an Act of Parliament for imposing rates on, or regulating the local affairs of, any district. The second resolution was only carried by 5 to 3, and the rest of the resolutions nem. dis. The witnesses examined before the Committee were Mr. E. Baines, Mr. Alexander Dobie, Mr. T. Curson Hansard, and Mr. A. Ely Hargrove.

Election Expenses.—Perhaps few candidates at the late general election were returned at less expense than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the Radnorshire boroughs. The auditor's account of these expenses has just been published, from which we learn that the return cost just 30*l.* 2*s.*, of which sum 10*l.* 8*s.* (more than one-third) was the auditor's fee, the actual election, therefore, costing under £20. The agent had ten guineas, the printers 5*l.* 15*s.*, and the cost of proclaiming the notices in the contributory boroughs (3*l.* 9*s.*) made up the total.—Times.

Questioning Prisoners.—Mr. Baron Martin, on the Oxford circuit, at the close of the prosecution of a prisoner for stealing the property of his master, called up the chief constable, and told him he had no right to put questions to prisoners to get evidence of their guilt. If questions were put bonâ fide, to ascertain whether a prisoner was guilty or innocent, the case might be different; but the course pursued was directly contrary to the Act of Parliament, which required the committing magistrates to caution prisoners before hearing their statements. His Lordship wished to put the police on their guard, for the Act of Parliament would become nugatory if prisoners were to be examined and cross-examined by the police. The practice must be abandoned, or steps would be taken to put a stop to it. —Times.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

Winding-up Acts—Building Society.

In re The St. George's Building Society, 5 W. R. 771.

Whatever difficulties may have arisen in construing or applying the provisions of the Winding-up Acts, there has not been much controversy as to the character of the companies, associations, or partnerships which come within their operation. The 1st section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45 (Winding-up Act, 1848), includes all "companies, associations, and partnerships," whereof the capital or profits is or are divided into shares, which are transferable without the consent of all the co-partners. The 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108 (Winding-up Act, 1849), extended the operation of the former Act to all "partnerships, associations, and companies" consisting of not less than seven members. There have been, however, a few cases in which the question has been raised, whether an association of persons who joined together not for trading purposes, and who are not liable individually to creditors, is necessarily included in the words of the Act of 1849. In the Sherwood Loan Company (1 Sim. N. S. 165), it was argued that that loan company was not an association, company, or partnership within the meaning of these statutes, the company not being (as was contended) a trading or commercial company carrying on business for the sake of profit. Lord Cranworth, then Vice-Chancellor, doubted whether the company would have been within the meaning of the Act of 1848, but had no doubt that the language of the Act of 1849 was quite large enough to include it. His Lordship, however, gave no opinion as to whether it was necessary, in order to bring an association, &c., within the meaning of the Act, that it should be formed for purposes of profit, as he considered that profit was one of the objects of the company in question. In Bright v. Hutton (3 House of Lds. Cas. 351), it was held that a projected railway company, provisionally registered, is an association within the meaning of the Acts; but in Re The St. James's Club (2 De G. Mac. & Gor. 383), Lord St. Leonards reversed a decree of Knight Bruce, then Vice-Chancellor, ordering the winding up of the St. James's Club, the constitution of which was similar to that of most West-end clubs. The grounds mainly relied upon for the appellant were, that the Winding-up Act, 1848, only extended to companies, &c., trading or instituted for profit; and that the 8th section of the Act of 1849, which referred to "carrying on the business" of the associations, &c., showed that that Act also was meant to apply only to trading associations, &c. Lord St. Leonards adopted this view in construing the Acts, but appears to have been influenced in his decision mainly by a feeling of the inconvenience that might arise from the affirmance of the principle involved in the Vice-Chancellor's decree. "I cannot," said his Lordship, "hold the Act to apply to every association or company. If I were to do so, I might be called upon to carry the application much lower than to such a club as that now in question. A cricket club, an archery society, or a charitable society would come under the operation of the Act." A still more important reason, however, for excluding such an association from the operation of the Winding-up Acts, is the fact, also noticed by Lord St. Leonards in his judgment, that no member of such a club is liable to a creditor, except so far as he has assented to the contract in respect of which such liability has arisen, which is of itself a sufficient reason for excluding all such cases from the operation of the Winding-up Acts, unless, indeed, the words of the Acts are so explicit as to give judges no discretion. Building societies are placed in somewhat an anomalous position, in reference to the Acts. By the 2nd section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, all benefit building societies other than such as are certified and inrolled under the statutes in force respecting such societies, are liable to the operation of the Act. The difficulty at once arises under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, whether building societies, excepted from the former Act—viz. certified building societies—are included in the latter, which extends the provisions of the former to all partnerships, associations, and companies of not less than seven persons. Kindersley, V. C., doubted that they were so included, but considered himself bound by the authority of the Sherwood Loan Company's case, between which and the case of certified building societies his Honour saw no distinction to warrant him from arriving at a different decision. As far as we know, In re The St. George's Benefit Building Society is the first case in which it has been held, after argument, that a certified building society may be wound up under the Acts; but there does not appear to be much room for doubt that such societies are brought within the provisions of the Act of 1848 by the terms of the Act of 1849, which we have already mentioned.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—AGREEMENT FOR SALE OF HOUSE AND GOODWILL.

Darbey v. Whitaker, 5 W. R. 772.

There is no branch of the jurisdiction of courts of equity which rests upon more definite and intelligible principles than that which relates to the specific performance of agreements. Recent decisions, however, including the most recent—viz. the decision of the House of Lords in Ridgway v. Wharton—do not tend much to elucidate the doctrine of the Court in cases of specific performance, where the exercise of its jurisdiction may be said to be discretionary. An agreement may be such, as to its subject-matter or its form, as to prevent the Court from decreeing that it should be specifically performed. Or the party seeking such a decree may by his conduct at the date of the alleged agreement, or subsequently, have disentitled himself to the relief sought. But as questions of conduct or laches on the part of plaintiffs enter into nearly every suit instituted in equity, it is unnecessary here to touch upon that subject. Darbey v. Whitaker is an illustration of what difficulties may arise as to the subject-matter of an agreement of which specific performance is asked. In this case, the plaintiff agreed to assign the lease and goodwill of a beershop, and to sell the tenant's fixtures, &c., at such sum as the same should be valued at by two persons named, or their umpire; and all the stock of porter and ales, not exceeding a certain quantity, at the valuation of two licensed gaugers, or their umpire. There was the usual clause by which the plaintiff agreed not to carry on the trade within a specified distance under a penalty. And in case either party failed to perform the agreement, the party so failing should pay to the other, if he was willing to complete, a specified sum in the nature of liquidated damages. As to the principal subject-matter of this agreement—viz. the goodwill of the business—Lord Eldon decided, in Baxter v. Conolly (1 Jac. & Walk. 576), that the Court will not execute a contract for the sale of a goodwill of a business, but will leave the parties to their remedy at law, upon the ground that there could be no conveyance, and that it would be impossible to carry out the contract. In a subsequent case (Bryson v. Whitebread, 1 S. & Stu. 74), in which Baxter v. Conolly does not appear to have been cited, Sir John Leech granted specific performance of an agreement to sell the goodwill of a trade, and the exclusive use of a secret in dyeing, ordering at the same time that the Master, in settling the deed which was to give effect to the arrangement, should introduce a general covenant to restrain the use of the secret for twenty years, and a covenant limited, in point of locality, as to carrying on the ordinary business of a dyer, both parties being willing that the agreement should be so modified. This authority is not mentioned among the cases cited before V. C. Kindersley, in Darbey v. Whitaker. His Honour, however, while feeling himself bound by the decision of Lord Eldon, in Baxter v. Conolly, considered that an agreement for the purchase of a goodwill, mainly, if not entirely, annexed to the premises, was clearly distinguishable from an agreement to purchase a mere goodwill. "There was not the smallest doubt," said the Vice-Chancellor, "that a contract relating to such a goodwill was subject to a decree for specific performance." Dakin v. Cope (2 Russ. 171) is an express authority to the same effect. In that case, no doubt appears to have been raised as to the power of the Court to execute an agreement for the purchase of a leasehold public-house, and the goodwill and licenses connected with it. Granting the rule, as laid down by Lord Eldon, the distinction taken by V. C. Kindersley is perfectly consistent therewith, and throws no difficulty in the way of understanding the general doctrine of the Court in relation to specific performance. It is not so certain that the same may be said of the other two points involved in his Honour's judgment. It has long been an admitted principle, that, where the plaintiff can have adequate compensation at law, by way of damages, for breach of the agreement, a court of equity will not decree specific performance; and if the parties themselves proceed upon that understanding, and stipulate the exact amount which is to be paid on breach, it can hardly be contended that the nature and the amount of compensation are not adequate, where the sum agreed upon is evidently intended as compensation, and not merely by way of penalty. The Vice-Chancellor observed, that, "as to the remedy being legal upon the clause as to liquidated damages, it was true that the vendor might sue, if he pleased, but it was quite optional." The same remark would apply to several reported cases where specific performance has been refused, upon the ground that the plaintiff could have had an adequate remedy at law. There is, however, to be taken into account the strong leaning of the Court to execute specifically all contracts relating to land; but, at the same time, it should not be forgotten, that, in this case, the principal item in the contract was the goodwill of a business. So far his Honour was in favour of the plaintiff; but he refused the decree asked, on the ground that the fixtures, &c., were to be taken at a valuation, for which no time was named. There is no doubt that the Court always refuses to execute a contract containing stipulations which cannot be carried out; but it is difficult to understand how the agreement to take the fixtures, &c., at a valuation—even though no time for making the valuation was named—could bring the case within this rule. Parker v. Whitby (Tur. & Russ. 366), Dakin v. Cope, supra (and see observations of the Lord Chancellor in Meynell v. Surtees, 3 W. R. 540), and other cases, are authorities to show that the Court does not always require the valuation to be completed before a decree can be made for specific performance; and that being so, there does not appear to have been any peculiar difficulty as to the valuation in this case which could distinguish it upon that ground. There is no doubt, however, that Milnes v. Gery (14 Ves. 400), and other decisions of Lord Eldon, are to the effect that the Court will not execute an agreement for sale according to a valuation which has not been made. Upon the whole, it must be confessed, that the present state of the authorities on this subject is anything but satisfactory.

PRACTICE—INFANT HEIR-AT-LAW.

Lamb v. Lamb, 5 W. R. 772.

In this case an order was made for an infant heir-at-law to elect to take under a will—the election having the sanction of the Court—without referring the matter to chambers.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—RESPONSIBILITY OF LATTER FOR ACTS OF FORMER.

Collett v. Foster, 5 W. R., Exch., 790.

This was an action brought for an arrest and false imprisonment, under the following circumstances:—The defendant had instructed her attorney to take proceedings to enforce a warrant of attorney which had been given to her by the plaintiff. The warrant was to confess a judgment for £60; but at a time when the sum due under it had been reduced by various payments below £20, a writ of ca. sa. indorsed for a debt of £21 was issued, and under that writ the plaintiff was arrested. After a few days' imprisonment, he was discharged by a judge's order, under the 57th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which enacts that no person shall be taken or charged in execution upon any judgment in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein "the sum recovered" shall not exceed £20 exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment. It was argued at the trial for the defendant, that, as the writ was one which, under the circumstances, could not lawfully be issued, the defendant could not be held to have authorised her attorney to issue it; but Martin, B. (who tried the cause), held, that, as the warrant had been handed over by the defendant to the attorney, with general instructions to enforce it, the client was responsible for what was done in the course of that employment, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with £50 damages. A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the damages were excessive. As to the damages, they were reduced by consent to £30, but as to the other ground, the rule for a new trial was discharged. It was said by the Chief Baron, that the liability of a client for the acts of his attorney, retained by him to conduct a suit, differed, to some extent, from the ordinary liability of a principal for the acts of his agent, it having been "long an established rule" that the client is responsible for what the attorney does in the conduct of the suit. Watson, B., agreed, and added, that, if the attorney went beyond his duty, the client had his remedy against him; but Bramwell, B., concurred, "with some misgivings." He found a difficulty in seeing how the defendant could be made responsible for an act she probably did not authorise to be done in any way, inasmuch as she could not herself have issued the writ.

The decision on which the defendant chiefly relied in the above case was that of Freeman v. Rosher (13 Q. B. 780), in which the Queen's Bench certainly laid it down, that a principal is not responsible for a trespass by an agent unless he gave a prior authority or subsequent assent. The Court added, however, that, where the principal is responsible for damages arising from the want of skill or mistake of the agent in the course of the performance of his employment, the principal is not responsible in trespass, but in case; "and the form of action involves an interest of some importance, as the measure of damages in an action on the case would be confined to an indemnity." In the present case, the damages having been reduced, this decision may perhaps be more satisfactorily disposed of in this manner than as suggested by the Chief Baron; for, though it arose out of a case in which the act complained of had been committed by a broker in conducting a distress, and therefore, according to him, would not govern the liability of a client for the acts of his attorney, it may be doubted whether there is, in fact, any well-defined rule qualifying, with reference to the relationship of attorney and client, the ordinary rules of law as to principal and agent.

It deserves remark, that, in a recent instance, some of the judges of the Common Pleas entertained doubt whether the above provision of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, was applicable, so as to render an arrest irregular where a defendant was taken on a warrant to confess a judgment above £20, though the debt actually due had been reduced below that sum by instalments of payment. They seemed to hold that the "sum recovered" by the judgment was the whole sum for which confession of judgment was allowed—such sum standing as security for all instalments yet unpaid. This was the case of Johnson v. Harris (15 C. B. 357). It may also be observed that the ca. sa. issued by the defendant, inasmuch as it pursued the judgment, was not (as appears from Blew v. Steinau, 11 Exch. 440) a nullity, but irregular only.

Discovery of Defendant's Title in Ejectment.

Horton v. Bott, 5 W. R., Exch., 792.

By this case it has been conclusively determined that a plaintiff in ejectment is not entitled to a discovery of the defendant's title; a doctrine on which the case of Flitcroft v. Fletcher * (11 Exch. 543)—in which the Exchequer had decided differently—had thrown some doubts. In arriving at this amended decision, the Court of Exchequer intimated that they adhered to the opinion that the discovery allowed by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, must be such a discovery as would be allowed according to the rules existing in courts of equity. But on a fresh examination of the passage in "Wigram on Discovery," and the cases in equity bearing on that subject, on which they had allowed interrogatories with a view to discover the title in Flitcroft v. Fletcher, they arrived at a contrary conclusion from what they did before. In explanation of this, Mr. Baron Bramwell, in delivering the judgment of the Court, says, "We may be permitted to say, that owing, perhaps, to our want of familiarity with the subject of equitable discovery, the remark of Lord Abinger, in Bellwood v. Wetherell (1 Y. & C. 211), seems well founded: 'Upon looking at the cases, some of them appear extremely embarrassed and contradictory, and no steady principle is adopted in them.'"

The case of Flitcroft v. Fletcher stood in collision with that of Moor v. Roberts * (5 W. R. 693), in the Common Pleas, and with Edwards v. Wakefield † (6 Ell. & Bl. 462), in the Queen's Bench. Now, however, that it has been virtually overruled, the three Courts may be considered as in harmony on the point.

Life Insurance—Effect of Fraud.

Wheelton v Hardisty, 5 W. R., Q. B., 784.

This was one of the actions arising out of the policies effected on the life of the late Mr. Jodrell. It was brought on behalf of a reversionary interest company, who had effected an insurance with a life assurance association on this life; and by the pleadings (which imputed fraud to the plaintiffs) the question arose as to how far a person effecting a bonâ fide insurance on a life in which he has the requisite interest is responsible for the fraud (unknown to him) of the party whose life is to be insured, or that of his referees. And it was, among other things, established, that, where the insurer is, in negotiating the insurance, required only to state his belief in the information furnished, and where the truth of that information is not made the basis of the contract, no fraud on the part of the insurer attaches to the policy; for that the parties furnishing the fraudulent information are not, under such circumstances, the agents of the insurer. The defendants in this action succeeded, however, substantially; because they were held to be bound by a prospectus circulated by the company among its customers, stating that every insurance should be held unquestionable unless fraud were practised in obtaining it; and it was held by the majority of the Court, that this exception included fraud on the part of the life and his referees, as well as of the party effecting the insurance himself.

Attorney and Client—Discharge of Agent by payment over.

Symonds v. Atkinson, 1 H. & N. 146.

In this case it appeared that a bill of exchange, drawn by B. & Co., and accepted by A. & Co., had been indorsed to the plaintiffs, and discounted by them for B. & Co. Before the bill became due, A. & Co. stopped payment, and ultimately agreed with their creditors to pay a composition by promissory notes, at various dates, payable to B.'s order, and indorsed by him in all cases in which his name was on the original bills. B. & Co. were unable to take up the bill when it became due. On the day appointed for the payment of a dividend on their composition by A. & Co., B. was intrusted by the plaintiffs with the bill of exchange above mentioned, in order to enable him to fetch the dividend due in respect thereof, and for no other purpose. With this bill in his possession, B. went to his attorney (the defendant in the present action) and obtained from him, on security of the bill, and in anticipation of the dividend about to be paid by A. & Co., the sum of £200, asserting that he had satisfied the plaintiffs their interest on the bill; and the defendant accordingly received the dividend. An action was now brought against him by the plaintiffs to recover either the bill or the money he had received.

It was argued, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the bill had been intrusted to B. for a particular purpose; and that, in violation of his trust, he pledged it to his attorney; but that he could give him no title to receive the dividend, for the property in the bill was never out of the plaintiffs. The defendant had assumed to treat the bill as his own property; had received through it payment of the dividend; and, though he had credited B. with the proceeds as against the £200 he had advanced, this made no difference as to his liability. The Court, however, without hearing the other side, held, that all the defendant did was done by him in a ministerial capacity, as B.'s attorney and agent. He had no means of knowing that B. was not the real owner of the bill. He advanced money upon it; and he was justified in doing so, because the bill (overdue) was in the hands of the drawer, who had an apparent right to it. The defendant had a right to stop a portion of the money he received on the bill to repay the advance which had been made by him.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Summary of Proceedings of the Council.

May and June, 1857.

The subjects which have been under the consideration of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society since our last report (p. 460) have embraced, among others, the following matters:—

The Council received a communication from the Attorney-General relating to the proposed concentration of new courts and offices in the neighbourhood of the Inns of Court, and requesting plans and statements to be sent for the information of the Government. Plans, estimates, and statements were accordingly transmitted.

Letters were received from several provincial law societies, with suggestions relating to the proposed alterations in the circuits of the judges, and the terms and sittings; and these suggestions were submitted by the Council to the Common Law Judicial Business Commissioners. The Council also took into consideration the question of the number of judges requisite for the despatch of business in Term and the Nisi Prius Sittings, and on the several circuits, and communicated their opinion to the Commissioners. The Council also suggested several improvements in practice at the Judges' Chambers.

Communications were received from the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies relating to the Bill for the admission of colonial solicitors in the superior courts of England, upon which the Council repeated their suggestion—that such solicitors should be required to pay the same stamp duty as English solicitors, and to undergo a similar examination. The Secretary of the Society was instructed to attend the Under-Secretary of the Colonies and the Chairman and Solicitor of Inland Revenue with the proposed amendment; and he reported that he had done so, and had also attended an appointment at the Treasury, when the amendment was adopted.

The Judgments Execution Bill was considered, and the Council having resolved to support it, subject to further amendments, the President was requested to communicate with Sir F. Thesiger thereon.

The Probate and Administration Bill was referred to the Parliamentary Committee, who suggested material amendments, which were approved by the Council, and submitted to the Attorney-General and several other members of Parliament.

The following Bills were also considered:—Joint-Stock Companies, Fraudulent Trustees, Married Women's Reversionary Interests, Leases and Sales of Settled Estates.

The Council having received complaints of delays in the transaction of business at several of the Chancery offices, the subject was referred to the Equity Committee of the Council, with power to call in the aid of other members of the Society, of which the Committee largely availed themselves, and were favoured by the attendance of several experienced and able members of the Society; and, after numerous meetings, they prepared a Report, which was carefully considered by the Council, approved, and transmitted to the Lord Chancellor.

A communication was received from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association on a proposed new scale of costs on criminal prosecutions; and the Secretary having obtained copies of the several scales proposed by the Treasury as applicable to proceedings both at the assizes and quarter sessions, a letter was written to the Lords of the Treasury upon the subject; and in answer the council were referred to the gentlemen who had been commissioned by the Treasury to consider and report upon the matter.

Several questions of professional usage on conveyancing matters were taken into consideration; amongst others, as to the costs of a release and indemnity where the original deed had been lost; the costs of a contract of sale, and its preparation by the vendor's solicitor; the settlement of an action between the parties and the plaintiff's attorney, in the absence of the defendant's attorney; retaining fees on elections for members of Parliament.

The attention of the Council was called to a decision on the trial of an action against one of the members of the Society, which appeared to increase the liability of attorneys to a serious extent; and the Secretary was directed to obtain the shorthand writer's notes of the case, and to make inquiries on the subject of an intended application for a new trial. It was afterwards reported that a rule for a new trial had been granted.

The Secretary reported that the rules for striking two attorneys off the Roll had been made absolute by the Court of Queen's Bench; and directions were given to apply for the removal of the names from the rolls of the other courts of law and equity.

Several applications for the renewal of the annual certificate of attorneys, with the affidavits and testimonials in support, were considered. In one of these cases the Council successfully opposed the renewal, at the instance of the Newcastle Law Society.

In another case which had been referred to one of the Masters, the Court, on a special application, enlarged the terms of the rule, authorised the examination of witnesses viva voce, and directed the applicant to produce his account books, papers, and writings before the Master.

An application having been made to renew the certificate of an attorney who had been remanded by the Insolvent Debtors' Court for several breaches of trust, counsel was instructed to oppose the renewal. Cause was shown in the first instance, and the rule was refused.

The Examiners' Report of Trinity Term was received, recommending two candidates to the Council as deserving of prizes—namely, Mr. Edward Balden, of Birmingham; and Mr. Walter Browne, of Lenton; and three as deserving of certificates of merit. The books proposed by the several candidates having been approved, were presented by the Council, and certificates of merit granted to the others—namely, Mr. Joshua Fallows, jun., of Piccadilly; Mr. Wm. Stewart Forster, of Lewisham; and Mr. Wm. Henry Randles, of Ellesmere.

A letter was received from Mr. Arden, the principal, of Clifford's-inn, communicating the resolution of that Society to grant a prize of 20 guineas annually, to be appropriated by the Council in prizes for the candidates who should pass a superior examination.

Several questions were considered relating to the due service of articles of clerkship under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 12.

Measures for the improvement of legal education and a proposed college of attorneys, having been noticed at the Annual General Meeting of the Society, on the 23rd June, letters were written to all the Inns of Chancery, with copies of a former communication, and inviting their consideration of the subject.

It having been ascertained that the publications and indices printed under the directions of the Patent Law Commissioners, were given to some of the public libraries, application was made to obtain the same for this Society; the indices have accordingly been received, and the future publications will, from time to time, be given to the library.

Donations of numerous old law works, appeal cases, gazettes, &c., were received from Messrs. Few & Co.

Additional names of proposed Lecturers on common law and equity were received, and the day of election was appointed.

The requisitions made on the investigation of the title to the land in Chancery-lane, agreed to be sold to the Law Life Insurance Society, having been satisfactorily answered, the conveyance was received and approved, and the sale was completed on the 4th June.

In reference to the election of future members of the Council, it was resolved, that "it will be advantageous to the Society that a limited number of members resident and practising in the country be elected as members of the Council."

The following gentlemen have been recently proposed and approved as members of the Society:—

Gabriel Samuel Brandon, of 15, Essex-street, Strand.
Francis Norton, of 12, President-street West, Goswell-road.
Henry Webb, of 11, Argyll-street, Oxford-street.
Edward Hodges, of 4, Royal Exchange-buildings.
Henry William Willoughby, of 13, Clifford's-inn.
David Howell, of Machynlleth.

Twenty articled clerks were admitted as subscribers to the Library.

The following vote of thanks to the late President was unanimously passed by the Council, at their meeting, on the 25th June:—

"Resolved,—That the best thanks of the Council be presented to Edward White, Esq., for the able, zealous, and most efficient manner in which he has discharged the important duties of President of the Incorporated Law Society during his year of office.

"The Council especially recognise the benefit derived by the Society from his ability and discretion in the management of a difficult and important negotiation for the sale of the surplus land.

"They desire also to record their sense of his uniformly courteous, urbane, and considerate conduct on all occasions, both in and out of the chair, not only towards the members of the Council, but towards the profession generally, and all others with whom the duties of his office have brought him into communication."

Correspondence.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

The long vacation is now commencing in earnest, and judges and practitioners are, with few exceptions, betaking themselves to country retreats, or otherwise seeking relaxation after the labours of the legal year. The Lord Chancellor arrived at the end of his cause-list a fortnight since; and the Master of the Rolls, after finishing his own list, as also an additional list of hearings transferred to his court from that of the Chancellor, has been for a still longer period enjoying vacation. The Masters in Chancery are still sitting; but another reason, and a more potent one than that furnished by the state of their business, is found for this circumstance—by the Chancery Regulation Act, these functionaries are obliged to sit until the 10th of August, whether they have anything to do or not. The Incumbered Estates Commissioners have not yet risen, as their business has been unusually heavy; and the number of deeds of conveyance to purchasers, and the amounts paid out to claimants and incumbrancers, during the present month, have been, we believe, respectively greater than in any corresponding period in former years. The circuits are now nearly over, and many complaints are heard of the scanty lists of records that were to be tried, while the criminal business all over the country has been considerably less than ever.

Under these circumstances, as may be supposed, the topics of interest in legal circles are very few. The only one worth mentioning arose out of a judgment delivered by Master Litton, In re The Irish Consols Mining Company, and the Winding-up Acts, in which the proceedings of Mr. O'Dwyer, the first taxing-master in Chancery, had been such as to raise a question of jurisdiction, as well as to involve some personal matters. On taxing the costs of the official manager, incident to the winding up of this company, numerous items had been disallowed; and on the case again coming before the Master in Chancery to whom it had been referred, he had requested the taxing-master to certify the grounds on which such items had been disallowed. The reply was furnished in the shape of a voluminous certificate, in which (inter alia) the taxing-master contended that the Master in Chancery had no jurisdiction to review the taxation, inasmuch as the latter was a co-ordinate, and not a superior tribunal. The Master in Chancery, in now giving his judgment, said that the powers conferred on him by the Winding-up Acts, in respect to costs, were of the most extensive description, and he claimed, in this respect, a jurisdiction superior to that of the taxing officer; and after going through the items in question, and allowing some and disallowing others, he declared his intention of making an order for the payment of the further items so allowed (in addition to the amount certified by the taxing-master) in one month, unless in the meantime some person interested should give notice of appeal. In reference to some imputations of a personal character that had been made against the official manager and his counsel, the Master in Chancery said that above £10,000 had been brought in; and it was a singular fact, that, in no other case that he had been able to discover, either in England or in Ireland, had the creditors been paid in full; and that in this case all the creditors had received twenty shillings in the pound, while a considerable dividend was also paid to the contribntories—a result owing partly to the intelligence and skill of the official manager, but still more to the ability of the manager's counsel, whose fees formed a considerable part of the items which had been disallowed on taxation; and these circumstances had their weight in inducing him to reinstate those items, which he accordingly did, with an expression of regret, that, in a purely legal document like the taxing-master's certificate, any reflections upon the manager and his counsel had been inserted.

Mayo Assizes—The Election Riots.

One of the incidents connected with the Mayo election petition, and one that created some sensation at Westminster, was the ill-treatment received by John Gannon, one of the witnesses, on his return to Mayo, after having given evidence before the committee. Some of the persons concerned in this outrage were immediately tried on a charge of riot and assault, and were found guilty. In delivering sentence, the presiding judge (Richards, B.) read a severe lecture on the barbarity that had been exhibited towards a person who had merely discharged a public duty by giving evidence, and sentenced one of the prisoners to one year's imprisonment, with hard labour, and another (who was the ringleader on the occasion) to two years, with hard labour.

Immediately afterwards, his Lordship sentenced four other prisoners to three months' imprisonment for having carried away against their will two persons who were voters of the county of Mayo, and having detained them until the election was over. An Act of Parliament (he said) recently passed, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 10, s. 5, met this case, and declared such conduct to be unlawful, and a misdemeanor; and the excuse urged on behalf of the prisoners, that this was done in the heat and excitement of a contested election, was no excuse; for, if this were done, an election would not be the free choice of the electors, but would represent merely the physical force of the dominant party.

It must be admitted, that, at and after the recent Mayo election, very irregular modes of influencing the conduct of voters were resorted to by the "popular party;" the evidence given before the Committee fully establishes this, could any doubt exist as to it. On the other hand, we must, in fairness to unruly Connaught, admit, that, in the speedy conviction of the offenders, justice has been satisfied; and we must give due credit to the impartiality of the Castlebar juries, who have thus done their duty without fear or favour. Doubtless the determination of the Election Committee, combined with the judicial sentences on the rioters, will have a salutary effect on the public mind in Mayo; and we may expect to see future elections for that county uninfluenced by clerical intimidation, and unsullied by mob-violence.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

The last of the first division jury trials, which was to have been taken to-day, was compromised just in time to save the judge, though not the jury, the trouble of appearing in court. Such cases are of constant occurrence in Scotland; and it is not surprising that jurymen, brought often from a distance of fifteen or twenty miles, at considerable expense to themselves, should grumble when they are told that they are not required, and should be disposed to look upon trial by jury as a device for oppression, rather than as a bulwark of liberty.

It is difficult to explain all the reasons why jury cases should be so often compromised in Scotland, when they are ripe and set down for trial. Some of them are to be found, no doubt, in the dislike with which many in Scotland still regard this form of process, and in the desire which agents often show to avoid the anxiety and responsibility of proceedings which are very much out of the usual routine; but the chief cause arises from a very absurd rule of court, which prevents a party who may be successful from recovering the expense of any precognition of witnesses that may have been taken previously to the adjustment of the issues in the cause, the theory being, that the party ought to know all about his own case, and should not require to make any investigation; that the precognition is only required after the issues are adjusted, to enable counsel to select and examine the witnesses. The consequence is, that, when the pursuer's agent makes his precognition, with a view to trial, he often finds that the facts have been stated on the record in such a way as to give a wrong complexion to a case which may be substantially just and honest, and he is naturally unwilling to risk a trial, if he can make any reasonable terms.

The jury trials being now over, the judges have nothing to disturb their repose till September, when the circuits commence. There are three circuits—the north, south, and west; two judges go on each, and may be occupied for a fortnight or three weeks. The judges sit together generally; but when there is a press of business, which sometimes happens at Glasgow, they hold separate courts. There is very little civil business transacted on circuit.

Some little excitement was caused lately among the members of the College of Justice by the appearance of the Lord Advocate's Annuity Bill, which has for its object the provision of some substitute for the annuity tax, which is levied in Edinburgh for the support of the city clergy from the whole community, except the members of the College of Justice, who have been exempted for 200 or 300 years. The abolition of their privileges would greatly increase the value of property held by other parties in Edinburgh, and is, therefore, very much desired. The Bill is considered by many as the most shameless of all the Bills proposed for the abolition of this tax. It is matter of general regret that the Lord Advocate should have been found capable of aiding and abetting the Town Council in their dishonest desire of appropriating to other purposes than the restoration, in the proper sense of the word, of Trinity College Church the money extracted from the North British Railway, under the authority of Parliament, for that sole use. Still more is it a matter of regret that his Lordship should have been found willing to destroy—when so many other means might have been first resorted to—the only fund which exists in Scotland out of which the Crown can offer rewards to distinguished clergymen of the Church of Scotland—viz. the revenues belonging to the Deans of the Chapel Royal, who are four in number, and who each receive about £400 a year out of these revenues. The members of the various legal bodies in Edinburgh would have witnessed with less sorrow a much greater infringement upon their special rights and privileges than his Lordship has ventured upon in the present Bill. Perhaps it was thought that the confiscation of the railway money, and of the revenues of the Chapel Royal, might be a sop which would induce the legal bodies to pay the tax for a few years as proposed, but there never was a greater mistake committed, and the suddenness with which the Bill has been withdrawn has proved that the error was soon discovered. The Lord Advocate has damaged his reputation more by this one measure than by all the other mistakes of his political life.

There is no legal news which can be of any interest. The whole of the ordinary inhabitants of the city seem to be abandoning it to the crowds of foreigners and strangers who are daily flocking into it, but who are not likely to furnish any news that can be interesting to the legal public.

Lord St. Leonards' Land Transfer Bill.

The following is the Bill brought forward by Lord St Leonards on the 21st ult. We reported in our last number the speech in which he introduced the measure. Although there is no probability of the Bill being passed, or even discussed this session, the reputation of its author induces us to place it before our readers. It recites, that it is expedient to simplify the title to real estate, in order to facilitate the transfer thereof upon sales, and proposes to enact:—

1. The time or event upon which executory devises may be well limited shall no longer be lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards as a term in gross; but, after lives in being, the term of twenty-one years, and the time for gestation, shall only be allowed as valid where they have relation to the birth and infancy of any issue to or in favour of whom the land shall be limited or given by the instrument creating such executory devises.

2. No entry, distress, or action shall be made or brought against any bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, to recover any land or rent but within twenty-five years next after the actual conveyance of the land or rent to the purchaser, and the payment by him of the purchase-money; but this Act shall not, in any case, enlarge the time allowed for making or bringing an entry, distress, or action by an Act of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, intituled "An Act for the Limitation of Actions and Suits relating to Real Property, and for simplifying the Remedies for trying the Rights thereto:" provided that where any such purchaser at or before the execution of the conveyance to him, and the payment of the purchase-money, had express notice, or had reason to know that the estate or interest of the claimant existed or might become available, this Act shall not afford such a purchaser any bar to the claim, but his defence shall remain as it would have stood if this provision had not been inserted in this Act.

3. No judgment, statute, or recognisance, whether in favour of any person, or of her Majesty, her heirs or successors, nor any liability, charge, or lien of or upon any lands, in respect of any debt which shall be found due to her Majesty, her heirs or successors, by any inquisition, or in respect of any obligation or specialty to her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or in respect of any acceptance of office, whereof there is no execution or extent served and executed upon the land before such time as the same shall have been conveyed to a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, shall bind such lands, or be executed against such purchaser, his heirs or assigns, notwithstanding any notice to any such purchaser of any such judgment, statute, or recognisance, charge or lien, obligation or specialty, or acceptance of office.

4. No lis pendens shall bind a purchaser for valuable consideration unless he shall have express notice of it before the execution of the conveyance to him, and the payment of the purchase-money by him.

5. No bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration shall be bound in any case by any other than express notice of any charge, or any other act, matter, or thing, affecting the title to the property purchased.

6. So much of the Act of the 16 & 17 Vict., intituled "The Succession Duty Act, 1853," as charges an estate in the hands of a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration with the duty imposed by the Act, or that renders him liable to pay the same, or to see to the payment thereof, is hereby repealed; and no such purchaser, or the property purchased by him, shall be liable to such duty, nor shall he be bound to see that the same is paid.

7. The bonâ fide payment to and the receipt of any person to whom any money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust, or for any limited purpose, or of the survivor or survivors of two or more mortgagees or holders, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, shall effectually discharge the person paying the same from seeing to the application or being answerable for the misapplication thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security.

8. No seller of land shall be bound to produce a title with a root extending beyond forty years, unless required to do so by the contract for sale, or unless the court shall be of opinion that there is reason to suppose that some settlement or will prior to that period may have been executed which might prejudicially affect the purchaser's title.

9. Any seller, or his solicitor, or agent, wilfully concealing any incumbrance from a purchaser, or falsifying any pedigree upon which the title does or may depend, in order to induce him to accept the title offered or produced to him, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being found guilty shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to suffer such punishment, by fine or imprisonment, or by both, as the court shall award, and shall also be liable to an action for damages at the suit of the purchaser, or those claiming under him, for any loss sustained by him or them in consequence of the incumbrance so concealed, or of any claim made by any person under such pedigree, but whose right was concealed by the falsification of such pedigree; and in estimating such damages, where the estate shall be recovered from such purchaser or from those claiming under him, regard shall be had to any expenditure by him or them in improvements on the land.

The Succession Duty.

Lord Redesdale, in presenting a petition from Mr. Damer, complaining of the interpretation put upon the Succession Duty Act by the controller of legacy duties in regard to settlements made before the passing of that Act, said that the working of the present Act was, in many cases, productive of great hardship. By the Act imposing succession duties, those duties were fixed at 1 per cent. in the case of a son, 5 per cent. in the case of a collateral relation, and 10 per cent. in the case of a stranger. It happened, however, in practice, that the authorities at Somerset House ruled, that when a son took property after his father, in accordance with a previous settlement, the duty which he had to pay was not 1 per cent., but the per-centage which would be due had he taken the property at once without the intervention of the father. Lady Caroline Damer had devised an estate to Col. Damer for life, with remainder to the first and other sons in tail. Col. Damer had, by a disentailing deed executed before the Succession Duties Bill came into operation, barred the entail. It had been held that the son of Col. Damer was liable to pay a higher duty than 1 per cent. This decision appeared to him to be unjust, because it seemed clear that where a new title had been created, it was upon that that the duty ought to be levied. It appeared to him that the whole question was one which required revision, or at least that the Act itself should be made clear and intelligible, instead of being left, as it was, intricate and confused.

Earl Granville said, that most of the points which had been taken by Lord Redesdale were raised during the discussion of the Bill. As for the measure being too harsh, he might remind their Lordships, that, although Mr. Gladstone had calculated the income that would be derived from it at £2,000,000 a year, and although some of their Lordships had expressed their apprehension that it would prove a burden upon property, in some cases amounting almost to confiscation, the sum really obtained from it had not yet exceeded a fourth of the expected amount. If he was not mistaken, there was in the Act a clause which exactly met Mr. Damer's case, and provided that a disentail should not avoid the payment of the duty. As to the amount of litigation to which this Act had led, he had found that only three cases had been tried under it; that in all these the decisions had been in favour of the Government, and that no attempt had been made to reverse those judgments.

After a few observations from the Earl of Derby and from the Lord Chancellor, the petition was ordered to lie upon the table.

Fraudulent Trustees Bill.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was intended to remedy a very serious defect in the existing system of law. That system having been handed down, not as a written code, but by tradition, contained many incidents appropriate to a rude state of society when personal property was confined to chattels; but totally inapplicable to the present day, when the condition of property was so different, and involved such complicated relations, especially in regard to trust property. In the case of trust property, the trustee was the legal owner, and, therefore, if he misappropriated it, he could not be punished, as the law recognised it as his property, not the property of the beneficial owner. Every one admitted that this was a technical rule which required to be remedied, and that was done by the 1st clause of the Bill. He believed there was no objection to the principle of the measure, but there were some objections of a technical nature to the details. The first was as to the difficulty of defining what shall constitute a person a trustee. That, however, was met by the interpretation clause, which provided that a trustee shall include an executor, administrator, or assignee in bankruptcy or insolvency. The next clause to which objection was taken was one which had been introduced while the Bill was passing through the other House, and which, in his opinion, would require great consideration and amendment; and some of their Lordships were desirous to strike it out altogether. The clause in question was the 12th, which enacted that no prosecution under the Act should be instituted without the sanction of a judge of one of the superior courts of common law or of the Court of Chancery, or the Attorney-General. He objected to the provision requiring the assent of a judge; and when the Bill was in committee, he would propose to strike out that part of the clause. He would still make it necessary to obtain the sanction of the Attorney-General, as was now done in revenue and some other prosecutions. By that means they would secure trustees who had acted honestly from being annoyed by disappointed cestui que trusts. The 2nd clause of the Bill rendered merchants, bankers, and brokers criminally liable for the misappropriation of property intrusted to them. They were so at present, if there was a written direction as to its disposal; but there was no reason for such restriction of the liability, and the Bill extended it to all property intrusted to them. Another clause removed an anomaly which few but lawyers would believe to exist in the law. If a parcel was given to a carrier to be carried to a distance, and he stole it, he was not guilty of any misdemeanor, as the law considered him a bailee, and there was no "asportavit;" but if he broke it open, and took a portion of the contents, he was guilty of larceny. The Bill did away with the absurd distinction. The next clause related to directors and officers of public companies. They had seen of late several instances of disastrous evils produced by the misconduct of these officials, and it was now proposed to render them criminally liable for the misappropriation of the property intrusted to them, or for the publication of false accounts, a practice sometimes adopted in order to lull the shareholders into security. These were the principal clauses of the Bill, and he did not anticipate there would be any objection to the second reading.

Lord St. Leonards did not oppose the Bill. He approved of a great portion of it, although he lamented the necessity for the introduction of such a measure. He feared that if it passed it would greatly increase the difficulty of obtaining trustees, for no man would like to undertake the office with the chance of six years' penal servitude hanging over his head; and he was very much inclined to think that trustees who had meant to act honestly had suffered as much from the misconduct of the cestui que trusts, as parties beneficially entitled had from the wrongful acts of their trustees. It would be necessary to take great care in defining what persons should come within the Act. The interpretation clause to which the Lord Chancellor had referred did not meet the difficulty; it merely declared that the heirs and personal representatives of trustees, executors, administrators, and assignees should be held to be trustees. He himself had a Bill on the table to relieve trustees who acted honestly from the results of the breaches of trust of which they might be guilty, and he considered they required relief quite as much as the cestui que trusts. In consequence of the difficulty of obtaining private trustees, the South Sea Company had proposed to establish themselves as a corporation for that purpose; but their Bill had, he was glad to say, with his assistance, been defeated. He now understood, however, that some parties had availed themselves of the Limited Liability Act to establish such a company. He entirely objected to the principle of such a company; it would greatly increase the expense to parties. At present a trustee was not and ought not to be paid; it would be impossible properly to estimate the remuneration to which he would be entitled. He strongly objected to the clause which required the sanction of a judge previous to commencing a prosecution: such a case would always go to a jury with a strong prejudice in favour of the judge's fiat.

Lord Brougham said, that, on his suggestion, the Law Amendment Society had appointed a committee to inquire into this subject, and they came to the conclusion that frauds by trustees, quasi-trustees, and executors were much more numerous than could have been supposed. It was also found that these frauds were chiefly committed by persons in moderate circumstances—for this obvious reason, that persons in affluent circumstances could always have the advice of an attorney to direct them. It was also found that there were numerous cases where poor men were compelled to sue trustees or executors for small sums of £400 or £500, which they had appropriated. He had heard of an instance of a gentleman of eminence in the legal profession who had spent the whole of the trust property confided to his charge, died insolvent, and left his wards on the parish. Still worse, he had heard of a judge who had done the same thing. It was desirable that the Courts of Chancery should have the power, where it was proved that a trustee had speculated with trust funds and gained a profit, of compelling him to restore those profits.

Lord Wensleydale did not rise to oppose the second reading, considering the measure well entitled to their Lordships' attention. It had been much improved since it was first introduced in the Commons; and he hoped that further amendments would be introduced by their Lordships. He did not think it desirable to require the sanction of a judge or of the Attorney-General before a prosecution was instituted. In revenue or political prosecutions the sanction of the Attorney-General was required, also in prosecutions for violations of the laws relating to the press; but no such sanction was required in any other Act of this nature.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Trustees' Relief Bill.

On the motion of Lord St. Leonards, this Bill was read a second time.

The Lord Chancellor gave it a general approval, but said that he should propose amendments in committee.

The Business of the House.

On the motion of Lord Redesdale, the following resolutions were agreed to:—

"That this House will not read any Bill a second time after Friday, the 7th day of August, except Bills of Aid or Supply, or any Bill in relation to which the House shall have resolved, before the second reading is moved, that the circumstances which render legislation on the subject of the same expedient are either of such recent occurrence or real urgency as to render the immediate consideration of the same necessary.

"That on Friday, the 7th day of August next, the Bills which are entered for consideration on the minutes of the day shall have the same precedence which Bills have on Tuesdays and Thursdays."

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

Upon the order for the second reading of this Bill being read, Mr. Henley moved that it be read that day month. The House would recollect, that, as the law at present stood, persons who required a dissolution of marriage were obliged to go through three distinct operations—one in the eccle siastical court, a second in a court of common law, and the third in the House of Lords, by way of privilege. Such being the state of the law, the Government, in 1853, issued a commission to inquire into the present state of the law of divorce à vinculo matrimonii. The Commissioners met, and agreed to resolutions. In the following year a Bill was brought into the House of Lords, and passed. Nothing, however, came of it, and so the matter rested until this year, when the present Bill was introduced, and passed through the House of Lords. With the view of showing how impressions had varied on the subject, he would proceed to contrast the recommendations of the Commissioners and the two Bills which had been agreed to by the other House with each other. In the first place, the report of the Commissioners recommended as a tribunal for the consideration of matrimonial causes a court consisting of three permanent judges. In 1854 it was proposed to throw this matter upon the Court of Chancery. The present Bill proposed the creation of a new court, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the two Lord Chief Justices, and the Lord Chief Baron, and the judge of the Court of Probate, of whom three were to be a quorum. With regard to the subject of appeal, the Commissioners recommended a general appeal to the House of Lords. In the measure of 1854, the appeal was to be similar to the appeals from the Court of Chancery, and therefore with an ultimate appeal to the Lords. At present it was proposed that there should be no appeal on questions of fact, but upon questions of law an appeal was given to the House of Lords. Again, the Commissioners, after considerable deliberation, came to the conclusion that questions of fact should be left to the judges, and that a jury should not be summoned. In 1854, the House of Lords was still of opinion that there should be no jury. When the present Bill was first brought forward, there was to be a jury—not of right in every case, but only where, in the discretion of the judge, it was thought fit to summon one. During the discussion of the subject the mind of the House underwent a change; and as the Bill came down, it gave a jury as a matter of right. The Bill dealt not only with divorce à vinculo matrimonii, but also with what it called judicial separation—a state of things better described as divorce à mensâ et thoro. The Commissioners thought that divorce à mensâ et thoro should follow gross cruelty, conjugal infidelity, and wilful desertion, the latter also being provided for in the alternative by a decree for alimony. In 1854, desertion for three years was made one of the grounds of this divorce. Then came the Bill of this year, which fixed the period of desertion at two years. The Bill of 1857 also contained a very curious provision, giving the wife, upon desertion by the husband for twelve months, the right to her earnings as against him and his creditors. This right was to be secured by the decision of one magistrate, from whom an appeal would lie to two. Both the Bills—that of 1857 as well as that of 1854—fixed the ground of divorce à vinculo, if applied for by the husband, upon adultery only. With regard to the wife, the Commissioners recommended that this species of divorce should be granted to the wife in cases of "aggravated enormity"—a phrase which they explained as including incest and bigamy. The measure of 1854, increased the grounds of divorce, so it included incestuous adultery and unnatural offences, or attempts to commit them, while it omitted bigamy. The measure of 1857 gave the right of divorce to the woman in the following cases:—1st. Incestuous adultery; 2. Bigamy; 3. Adultery, with gross cruelty; and 4. Adultery, with desertion for two years. Here were most important variations. He must also refer to the subject of remarriage. Conscious of the difficulty by which this point was surrounded, the Commissioners gave no opinion whatever upon it. The Bill, however, as it finally came down, proposed that the parties should be allowed to marry again. With respect to the action of crim. con. as the present Bill came down, the action was abolished, but in getting at this result great uncertainty of purpose had been exhibited. At first the action was to be retained, but it was to be brought after instead of before the divorce; then it was proposed to make criminal conversation a misdemeanor; ultimately a fine was proposed and the action abolished. Now there were but few cases coming within the scope of this Bill. Taking the average of the years from 1834 to the present time, he found that the number of cases of divorce à vinculo averaged only about three per annum. He could get no information as to the present average of suits for divorce à mensâ et thoro; but by the Report published in 1832 he found that the whole number of causes in all the courts of England for 1827, '28, '29, was 101, and of that number there were sixteen in the Arches Court of London, and forty-two in the Consistory Court; that was to say fifty-eight altogether in London, and forty-three in the country; so that by the Bill two-fifths of the jurisdiction would be swept away, and no remedy provided for the people.

The House divided, and the numbers were—For the postponement, 130; against it, 217: majority, 87.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Lord PALMERSTON, in reply to a question put by Mr. HADFIELD as to the intention of the Government with respect to certain Bills before the House, said, with respect to the Probate and Divorce Bills, her Majesty's Government considered those measures of great importance, and inasmuch as they had been before Parliament now for some time, he trusted that the House would give time and attention to those measures, so that they might be disposed of during the present session. There were eight Bills which had come down from the House of Lords limited to the consolidation of existing laws. If this House would follow the example of the House of Lords, and adopt those Bills on the faith of the integrity of the Commission having made a mere consolidation of existing law, then they would have made a great step towards the object of that Commission, and the Bills would form the basis for future steps in that direction. But if the House proceeded to discuss the measures clause by clause in committee, it would be seen at once that the task would be endless, and all attempts at consolidation would be useless.

Mr. HARDY did not know whether the statement which the noble Lord made with respect to the so-called consolidation Bills being purely consolidatory in their character, was made from his own knowledge. He reminded the House that the Bills which were said to be mere consolidations, which were laid upon the table of the Lords last year, really went further, and altered the law in some particulars. On the other hand, if they were amending as well as consolidating Bills, he did not see how the House could abdicate its proper function of duly considering their provisions.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in rising to move the second reading of the Bill, said that the Bill, in fact, only embodied long established rules. It was intended to give to these rules a distinct place in the law, to remove the inconveniences attending the present practice—but the law would remain what it was now, what it had for the last two centuries been understood to be. He would attempt to show this by sketching briefly the history of the existing law. Anterior to the Reformation, the doctrine of the indissolubility of marriage prevailed. The whole subject of marriage and divorce was under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts. When the Reformation came, new views were taken of the question; the doctrine that marriage was a sacrament was no longer the teaching of the Church. In the time of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. statutes were passed delegating to well-chosen Commissions the task of reforming the law in this particular. The result of the inquiry was a report, that marriage should be dissolved for two or three causes, amongst which the chief was adultery. But if the Reformation was faulty at all, it was in reference to the ecclesiastical tribunals. Those ecclesiastical tribunals, instead of being regarded as royal courts, deriving their authority from the Crown, and administering the common law of the land, were permitted to retain their ecclesiastical character. The result was, that for a considerable period—probably for a century after the Reformation—marriage was dissoluble by the sentence of the ecclesiastical courts on the ground of adultery. But about the commencement of the seventeenth century, the old law was restored by a decision of the Court of Star Chamber, denying the right of the ecclesiastical courts to grant divorce à vinculo. The result was, that the ancient imperfect jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts alone remained; and no other tribunal was provided with power to sever the tie of marriage. The matter continued in this state—some slight interruption at the time of the Commonwealth excepted—until Parliament came to the relief of the law, and of the necessities of the country, by establishing that system of divorce which has since been administered through the medium of a legislative assembly, upon grounds, however, purely judicial. It was an undoubted fact, therefore, that, from the time of the Reformation until now, the necessity of having a change in the purely ecclesiastical law, and the necessity of introducing the principle that marriage should be dissoluble for adultery, had been recognised by the Legislature, and, for a considerable period, by the ecclesiastical tribunals. It was impossible to continue, after the Reformation, a system which was directly at variance with the exigencies of human nature. Previously to the Reformation, the strictness of the law had led to that which all unduly strict laws did lead to, the invention of various fictions by which its letter could be got over. But, after the Reformation, these were unavailing, and the fact was that after the decision of the Star Chamber, there was greater difficulty than ever in obtaining a divorce à vinculo matrimonii. This state of things was ended in the manner he had already stated, and, in course of time, the interference of Parliament became a matter of course; its practice became settled, its rules known, the ground of its decisions collected and arranged; and thus, though in name legislative, the remedy was as purely judicial in reality as any remedy afforded by an ordinary court of justice. In the course of the jurisdiction exercised by the House of Lords, and after them by the House of Commons, certain exceptions had been established to the general principle that marriage was dissoluble for adultery, and the rule of law might be thus simply stated:—An injured husband who established a case against his wife was entitled to a divorce, unless it could be proved that he had been guilty of collusion or of connivance, unless he was open to recrimination, and had been guilty of acts which would entitle the wife to be separated from him by a decree of the ecclesiastical court. That rule had been established as to the right of the husband to obtain a divorce, but the House of Lords had imposed certain conditions upon applicants. A husband must first prove adultery in the ecclesiastical court, and obtain therefrom a sentence of divorce à mensâ et thoro; and he must, in the second place, bring and recover damages in an action of crim. con., and he had then to prove the adultery a third time before the House of Lords. These requisites complied with, the husband in the case of his wife's adultery was entitled to a divorce à vinculo. With regard to the wife, the rule was fixed that the simple ground of adultery of the husband did not entitle her to a divorce; but by four distinct precedents it was well established that divorce should be granted upon the wife's application where the adultery on the part of the husband was incestuous, where he had committed bigamy, or where such aggravated circumstances had occurred as rendered it impossible for the parties again to come together. Beyond this—with one exception, viz. the case of adultery attended with malicious desertion by the husband—the Bill before the House did not propose to go. Thus, so far as the Bill was concerned, no material change in the law would be made—the mode of procedure alone would be altered. In lieu of trying the question of adultery in three different courts, and once in the absence of the wife, by the abominable action of crim. con., the whole matter would at once be disposed of before a court competent to decide in a suit in which the injured person would be plaintiff, and the wife and the adulterer defendants. He came next to a topic which was a fruitful source of difficulty and vexation. He meant the intermarriage of the guilty parties, and also whether clergymen of the Church of England should be compelled to celebrate such marriage. The Church of England was bound to obey the law; and he could not conceive a more dangerous doctrine than that the individual scruples of clergymen should be set up in opposition to the law. He would now call attention to one point connected with the procedure. He had stated that the action for crim. con. was to be entirely abolished. In one section of the Bill it was provided that the new court, in pronouncing for a divorce, should have the power to impose a fine on the adulterer, but no power was given as to its application. If that section were preserved, it might be worthy of consideration whether the fine might not be made the means of imposing a penalty, and giving a compensation to the husband. In the new tribunal, the primary business would be conducted by the ordinary judge, but the more vital points would be brought before the full court, consisting of the Lord Chancellor and two of the chiefs of the common law courts. Passing to the other matters embodied in the Bill, he thought that a great improvement in the law would be effected by enacting that the proceeding hitherto confined to the Ecclesiastical Courts, viz. the sentence of divorce á mensâ et thoro, improperly called divorce (but which was really no more than a sentence regulating the terms of separation in cases where for some cause or other it was not proper for the husband and wife to continue to live together), that this sentence of so-called divorce should be converted into a sentence of judicial separation. Divorce á mensâ et thoro was imperfect and insufficient for its own purposes. The wife was still entitled to dower and the husband to the property of the wife, and many cases of great barbarity had occurred, consequent upon the husband exercising his power, and seizing upon the hard-earned gains of the wife's industry to dissipate them in extravagance and immorality. Such were the material features of the Bill, to which, in moving the second reading, he thought it necessary to direct attention.

Sis W. Heathcote moved as an amendment that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

The debate was adjourned till Friday.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent.)

Friday Evening.

The House of Lords have, as usual, waited till all the opposed Bills were before them, and set themselves vigorously to work to clear the list. In one Committee, of which the Marquis of Clanricarde is Chairman, the North Level Bill was disposed of in as many hours as it was days before the Commons; and two Kent Railways, the Herne Bay and Faversham Railway, and South Eastern (Greenwich Junction to Dartford) Railway Bills, which are respectively promoted by the deadliest rivals, the East Kent and South Eastern Companies, were next brought before them. The South Eastern Bill, after three days' contest, was rejected, so that the country from Rochester to London is open to both companies for another year.

On Monday last, to the surprise of promoters and opponents, two Committees on opposed Bills were appointed to sit on the following morning.

The Marquis of Westminster's Committee had a miscellaneous bill of fare before them in the shape of the Taff Vale Railway, Swansea Docks, and Tweed Fisheries Bills. The Swansea Bill was quickly disposed of, and the Tweed Fisheries was finished on Thursday—both of the last-named Bills being passed by the Committee. The Taff Vale was taken on Friday morning, and most of the oppositions being settled, the Bill was passed after two hours' discussion.

The Committee, on which the Duke of Norfolk was Chairman, passed the South Staffordshire Water Bill, and the Metropolitan Railway Bill, on the first day of their session. There was a sharp opposition to the Caledonian Railway (Line to Granton) Bill, which continued for two days, and the last Bill before them The Richmond and Kew Railway Bill, was strongly opposed, by, amongst others, the Duke of Cambridge, and was ultimately rejected.

The Committee on the memorable Mersey Conservancy Bill met on Wednesday, Lord Chichester in the chair, and are proceeding with the promoters' case. From the present appearance of matters, it looks as if the opponents have not much faith in their case, as, instead of the room being crowded like the pit of a theatre, as was the case in the Commons, a very small deputation of Liverpool faces represent the town. The Town Clerk of Manchester, Mr. Heron, has been under a lengthened examination both yesterday and to-day.

Three Bills—viz. the Thames Conservancy, North Western Railway, and Finsbury Park Bills, were committed on Monday night for Tuesday morning, and were all passed on Wednesday.

There are no opposed Bills now waiting for Committee; and with the exception of the Committee on the Mersey Conservancy Bill, the business may be said to be over. In spite of the opposition of the South Eastern Railway Company, the Committee have passed the Herne Bay and Faversham Bill.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

Friday Evening.

Gloucester.—The Committee had to consider petitions against both members, Sir R. Carden and Mr. Price, and commenced with Mr. Price. From the statement of the sitting member, Sir Robert Carden, it appears that the petition against his co-member, Mr. Price, was a set-off against the attempt of Mr. Price's party to turn him out. The Committee reported that both members were duly elected, but that the evidence given against Sir Robert Carden was most unsatisfactory. One case of bribery was reported against Mr. Price, but the Committee decided that it was not proved to have been done with his consent.

Huntingdon.—There is a peculiarity in this case which is as follows:—Three members started for the borough; and two of them, Mr. Fellowes and Mr. Heathcote, polled the same number of votes, 1,106. The charges of bribery were withdrawn on both sides, and the proceedings of the meetings were confined to a scrutiny, which terminated in the middle of the day on Friday, by Mr. Heathcote retiring, and leaving Mr. Fellowes in possession of the seat.

Ipswich.—The Committee first proceeded with the petition against Mr. Adair, from whose evidence it appeared that he had no committee-rooms nor any authorised committee. The Committee decided that Mr. Adair was duly elected. They reported five cases of bribery as having been proved, but without the knowledge of Mr. Adair. The Committee after a very lengthened deliberation have decided that Mr. Cobbold is duly elected.

Great Yarmouth.—From all accounts Great Yarmouth is a pleasanter place at an election than most boroughs. One of the charges against the sitting member was, that forty-eight electors sat down together to dinner, and drank their bottle of wine a-head sociably. There was no taking men into obscure public houses and giving them brandy-and-water on the sly, but the company sat down at an hotel situate on the beach. The two sitting members were Mr. M'Cullagh and Mr. William Watkin. The Committee decided that neither of the hon. members should retain his seat. Six cases of bribery were reported, but without the knowledge of the sitting members.

The Committees on the Beverley, Sligo, Dublin (city), and Drogheda cases commenced their sittings on Friday. The first case involves a question of qualification. The particulars shall be given in next week's paper.

Some excitement is felt about the Drogheda case, as a petition has been presented complaining that threats and intimidation have been used towards the witnesses.

The Sligo case came to a quick determination on Friday afternoon by the Committee deciding that several votes were wrongly rejected, and Mr. Wynn was declared elected by the Committee, and Mr. Patrick Somers was unseated.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

The Indian news of Wednesday was announced as rather favourable, notwithstanding it informed us that it had been found necessary to disarm the native troops at Calcutta—that there was a general spread of revolt in the Bengal army—that it had been deemed proper to arrest the ex-King of Oude and place him in confinement in Fort William—that General Barnard was waiting for reinforcements to attack the insurgents—and that the mail from Bombay did not bring intelligence of the capture of Delhi.

Although it suited that part of the daily press which supports Government to give a pleasant colour to this gloomy intelligence, the Stock Exchange has not manifested in its operations any appearance of active sympathy. The English Funds have gradually receeded ⅛ per Cent. since this news was received, and are now one per Cent. below the price of this day week. Full rates are being paid on loans, the demand for money is become more active, and a large requirement of silver for exportation to the East is again in extensive operation.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 25th July, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,577,895, being a decrease of £400,605; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,672,978, showing a decrease of £167,674 when compared with the previous return.

The returns of the Board of Trade show a small decrease in exports for the month of June last, compared with June, 1856. This is the first time this year that an increase in exportation has not been shown. The decrease is but £30,247 in the aggregate.

Reports from the manufacturing districts represent that trade continues in a healthy state, and the demand steady, except for goods suitable for India, in which no transactions are taking place. All parties anxiously wait for more decided intelligence.

Letters from France state that the harvest there surpasses all expectation. The accounts of the harvest in England are also very favourable; but the downward tendency in the price of grain does not appear to have received any fresh impulse during the present week.

The circumstances connected with the failure of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation will not make so deep an impression on the public mind as some other failures, because, fortunately for the share-holders, the winding up and the liquidation of claims remain in the hands of the Corporation, and are likely to be accomplished without any great degree of public exposure, and it may be hoped without any ruinous amount of costs. Some of these circumstances are perhaps more remarkable than those which have attended on any other bank, and form a very curious chapter in the history of Joint Stock Banks. It does not appear in this case that there is any pretence for saying that shareholders have been induced to take shares in consequence of fraudulent misrepresentations. They and their property are fairly liable for the debts of the bank, and there is no alternative for them but to pay the amount. The statement of accounts laid before the meeting held on the 20th July embraces the result of liquidation from the 11th April to the 11th July. It is stated that the branches in India, at Bombay and Calcutta, have been prudently conducted, and that the only operations resulting in loss have originated at the head office.

It appeared at the previous meeting that more than the entire paid-up capital of £250,000 had been advanced in loans to Colonel Waugh, and other directors, including Mr. Stephens, the managing director. The advance to Colonel Waugh amounts to about £200,000. It is also stated that not one of the open accounts of the directors has yet been adjusted. The estimate of loss sustained by the shareholders, in addition to their entire capital, has been raised from £6,320, to £12,710, owing to the disastrous results of the exchange operations carried on by the directors in London to supply themselves with funds, apparently to be dissipated in the same way as the paid up capital. Those shareholders who have not acceded to the arrangement by which their promissory notes were to be given for unpaid capital have been subjected to two calls, each of £15 per share, the first payable on the 24th April last, the second on the 1st August, and steps were to be taken to enforce these calls.

The enormous advance to Colonel Waugh is the most remarkable circumstance connected with the management of this bank, and the final result of the liquidation depends almost entirely on the realisation of the securities held for his debt. The managers of the Bank in India have made over the charge of the branches at Bombay and Calcutta to the agents of the Oriental Bank, by whom the Indian affairs are being wound-up as expeditiously as possible.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, AUGUST 8, 1857.

THE PROBATES BILL.

The Bill to amend the law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration, as amended in committee, has now assumed the shape in which it will in all probability be enacted. It will be, therefore, not without use to glance at its provisions, and to see what alterations it proposes in the existing law. Its preamble discloses its main feature—viz. that all jurisdiction in relation to the grant and revocation of probates of wills and letters of administration in England is, for the future, to be exercised in the name of her Majesty by one court. Its first effect, then, will be to put an end to the present system of prerogative, diocesan, peculiar, manorial, and other courts; and, in their stead, to substitute one Court of Probate in London, which is to be presided over by one judge, who is to be also the judge of the Court of Admiralty, when that office next becomes vacant. District Registries are to be established throughout England and Wales, in convenient localities, where probate and administration may be granted in common form, in cases where it appears by affidavit of the person applying for the same, that the testator or intestate had a fixed place of abode within the district; and such probate or administration is to have effect over the personal estate of the deceased in all parts of England; but the district registrars are not to make a grant in any case where there is contention, or where it appears that it ought not to be made in common form. In all cases of doubt, a statement is to be laid before the judge of the Court of Probate, who is to direct the registrar how to proceed; or, if he think fit, to forbid further proceeding in the matter before the district registrar, leaving the party applying to resort to the Court of Probate; or, if the case be within its jurisdiction, to a county court. In consequence of the greatly increased operation given to local grants, a precautionary clause has been added in committee, requiring the district registrar to give immediate notice to the metropolitan registry of every application to him; and no grant is to be made until a certificate shall have been received that no other application has been made in respect of the goods of the same deceased person.

Another safeguard against fraud will be a registry of caveats in London and throughout the country. Every caveat lodged at the metropolitan registry will be notified to the registrar of the district in which the deceased resided, while the caveats lodged in all the country registries will be communicated to London. The original wills are to be filed in the district registries, but lists of the grants are to be furnished at least every month to the principal registry in London. County courts will have jurisdiction to decree the grant or revocation of probate or administration in all cases where the personalty is under £200 (without deducting anything on account of debts due by the deceased), and the real property is under £300, whereupon the grant or revocation is to issue from the district registry—a right of appeal to the Court of Probate being reserved for the benefit of dissatisfied parties.

The Court of Probate will be invested with all the powers, in relation to the personal estate of deceased persons, which the Prerogative Court has now, but will have no jurisdiction in suits for legacies, or for the distribution of residues. In contentious matters, witnesses are to be examined, where their attendance can be had, in open court; and where parties verify their cases by affidavit, they will be subject to oral cross-examination. Following the very useful precedent introduced into courts of equity by the Chancery Amendment Act, power is given to the judge of the Court of Probate to obtain the assistance of common law judges; and the court is, moreover, to have a power which a future Chancery Amendment Act may advantageously confer upon courts of equity—viz. it may cause questions of fact to be tried by a jury before itself. It will also be able to direct issues to courts of law, in the same manner as an issue may now be directed by the Court of Chancery. It appears to be settled that the House of Lords is to be the Court of Appeal. When the Bill originally came before Parliament, it was proposed that the appeal should be to the Privy Council, which we should have considered, upon the whole, a more satisfactory tribunal; but inasmuch as the number of cases that will be brought before the final Court of Appeal will probably bear an extremely small proportion to the mass of business, the constitution of that court is not a matter of very great moment. And after the ample discussion which has been bestowed upon that subject, in reference to the appeals not only from our own courts of common law and equity, but also from the Irish and Scotch tribunals, it is to be hoped that another session will not pass before the highest Court of Appeal in all these cases, and also in cases arising under the new jurisdictions to be created by the Probate and Matrimonial Causes Acts, will be satisfactorily constituted.

The Probates Bill, as it now stands, gives to the proctors the monopoly of the common form business, and only permits solicitors to share in litigated cases; but after the announcement of Mr. Malins on Monday evening, that the proctors were prepared, on being adequately compensated, to give up all their exclusive rights of practice, and the explicit understanding to that effect on the part of the Government, it appears now to be finally arranged that all the business of the Court of Probate will be thrown open to the profession generally. As Sir R. Bethell quaintly expressed it, proctors will henceforth be reduced to the level of solicitors, though, in all probability, the effect of their long experience in the business of the new court will be to retain the new business, to a great extent, for some time in their hands. The ultimate result to the public will be highly beneficial. There will no longer be any necessity for employing two professional men to do work which may as well be accomplished by one. The expense and inconvenience arising from the rule as to bona notabilia will be abolished. Where no contention exists, a probate or administration in common form may be obtained at a comparatively trifling cost, in the locality where the testator or intestate resided at the time of his death, and they will have effect all over England, without any further grant from the metropolitan court. Original wills may be inspected on the spot by persons desirous of investigating their contents; and such persons will always have convenient and inexpensive means of resisting grants, when they are interested in doing so. Litigants will have the satisfaction of appearing before a tribunal which accords with the feelings and usages of the age, and where there will be no cloak of secrecy offering an invitation to fraud. The procurement of probate and administration will no longer be a bugbear to the representatives of those whose fortunes would now be hardly sufficient to meet the necessary expenses of such a step. The County Courts will supply facilities for the comparatively poor; and not the least of all the benefits which will accrue to the nation by the passing of this most useful measure, will be the substitution of one intelligible and well organised jurisdiction, with a practice suggested by common sense, and the experience of other tribunals, for the jurisdiction and authority of all the "Ecclesiastical, Royal Peculiar, Peculiar, Manorial, and other Courts and Persons," that now grant and revoke probate and letters of administration of the preperty of deceased persons in this country.

ASSIGNING COUNSEL TO PRISONERS.

From causes sufficiently familiar to all professional men, criminal law is at a discount in England. Little money is to be got out of prisoners, and less glory. When a pickpocket gets, as he calls it, "into trouble," his friends, including more especially the landlord of the public-house which he principally uses, get up a raffle or a subscription, and raise a couple of pounds for his defence. Of this peculium two of the lowest representatives of the two branches of the legal profession receive respectively 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* and 16*s.* 6*d.*—the one gentleman for handing to the other a copy of the depositions, and the other for trying to persuade twelve good men and true that the gentleman who felt "my unfortunate client" too near his pocket, the policeman who saw him break away with the prosecutor's watch in his hand, and the pawnbroker to whom he wished to sell it, are all the victims of an unexampled and unaccountable delusion. This, as our readers well know, is too often the prosaic version of that high function of protecting innocence which is sometimes ascribed to the profession of advocacy. That able and high-minded men should shrink from the coarseness, the lying, the contact with all sorts of petty, stupid, and repulsive vice which is involved in criminal practice, needs no explanation. Perhaps nine-tenths of the prisoners who enter the dock at sessions or assizes are guilty—certainly five-sixths are convicted; and in a large proportion of cases there is really no substantial question at all to leave to the jury. To be much concerned in defending prisoners is not a very enviable reputation either for an attorney or for a barrister of any considerable ability or experience. It is, for the most part, the resource of an inferior class of attorneys and of barristers, who are either just entering upon practice, or are not qualified for its higher branches. We must, however, admit that the subject has its important as well as its vulgar side. Criminal law, though in bad professional odour, is after all a very important thing; and it must be admitted that few more dreadful calamities can happen to any one than the unjust loss of liberty, or sometimes of life. It is so grave a matter to deprive a man of either, that it should only be done with the very greatest circumspection. It is now more than twenty years since the law in this country recognised the theory, adopted by every other civilised nation, that prisoners ought to be allowed to defend themselves by counsel in cases of felony; but we are still far from having raised the practice to the level of the theory. Our whole conception of criminal law is based upon the doctrine that a trial is only a sort of action; and that, so long as the prisoner has fair play allowed him, he has no one but himself to thank if his defence is not properly conducted. The fact that it is a misfortune to the State to convict an innocent man is one to which our criminal procedure gives little prominence. The utmost that it will do for such a person is to allow him full liberty to avoid conviction.

We have been led into these remarks by observing, that, in no less than three recent cases of murder, the depositions were handed down by the presiding judge to counsel who happened to be present in court, with a request that they would defend the prisoners. One of these was the case of a man who shot his sweetheart at Chatham; another, that of a prisoner accused of poisoning his grandchild with phosphorus in Cornwall; and the third was the case of the wretched Bacon, convicted at Lincoln of an attempt to kill his mother. In the first case, the facts were so clear and simple, that, in all probability, no human skill could have produced the slightest effect upon the result. Of the other two, one terminated in an acquittal, and the other in a conviction. Let us consider whether the course taken—and it must be remembered that no other was open to the presiding judges—was just either to the prisoners or to society. The Cornwall case involved one of the most delicate scientific questions that could well occur in a court of justice. Poisoning with phosphorus is an incident of the rarest occurrence; and it was stated in evidence that only ten cases of the kind were on record. When we remember the conflict of scientific evidence which took place upon Palmer's trial about poisoning with strychnine, is it possible not to feel some scepticism about the value of the testimony of a single scientific witness, cross-examined by a gentleman who cannot be presumed to have paid special attention to such subjects, and who was only instructed by a set of depositions handed to him, perhaps, a few minutes before the trial began? Bacon's case, though simpler in a scientific point of view, was one which required the most cautious consideration in other respects. The ablest and most experienced advocate would have wished for time for mature reflection before he decided upon the line of defence to be adopted; and legal difficulties of some complexity were involved in the question whether the madness of the prisoner's wife and her reported confessions of guilt could be made available for his defence. All these questions the gentleman who was called upon to defend had to solve as well as he could on a few minutes' warning. The possibility of such occurrences betrays a considerable defect in the administration of the law.

We are well aware of the practical difficulties of remedying completely such a state of things; but we cannot help thinking that with care and contrivance considerable use might be made of a principle which is acted upon in France to a very great extent. Mr. Jones's "History of the French Bar," which we reviewed some time since, informs us that in France the governing body of the Faculty of Advocates possesses the right of calling upon any member of the profession to defend any prisoner gratuitously; and that it would be considered in the last degree discreditable in any one so called upon to refuse his services. We do not see why arrangements might not be made by which the power of proceeding in formâ pauperis might be extended to criminal as well as to civil causes. It seems something more than absurd, that, whilst a man may have professional assistance as a matter of charity in enforcing a claim to property, he cannot have it in a matter involving life or liberty. The practice of assigning counsel in capital cases shows clearly, that, on such occasions at least, prisoners are not considered competent to defend themselves; and it would surely be better to do systematically and thoroughly what is at present done most imperfectly.

A great collateral advantage of such an arrangement would be, that it would give young barristers an opportunity of enabling attorneys to judge of their powers. The absence of any such opportunity is a serious evil to both branches of the profession. The existing system unavoidably throws criminal business into the hands of a low class of practitioners, whose arts, whichever branch of the calling they may belong to, have a strong tendency to bring the calling itself into disrepute. If counsel and (in cases requiring the preparation of evidence) attorneys were assigned to prisoners by the court, many discreditable scenes would cease, and the whole tone of the administration of criminal justice would be raised. A discretionary power of allowing expenses, vested in the court, would hardly be liable to much abuse. A county ought not to grumble at having to pay a few pounds to those who saved them from the calamity of hanging an innocent man.

Legal News.

The eight Bills purporting to consolidate certain branches of the criminal law, which were introduced to the House of Lords only a few days ago, and were passed through that House with somewhat singular haste, were last night, or rather this morning at half past one o'clock, withdrawn in the House of Commons by the Government. They will no doubt be again brought forward next session, and we hope early enough to allow full discussion of their merits or demerits. Meanwhile it will be desirable for the law officers of the Crown to consider how far the Statute Law Commissioners are to undertake the work of amending and altering the laws which they attempt to consolidate. If the Bills which have been thus withdrawn were merely a consolidation of those branches of the law to which they relate, there would have been no difficulty, even at the last moment, in enacting them.

It is now more than a month since the Equity Committee of the Incorporated Law Society presented to the Council a Report on complaints of delays and defects in several of the offices of the Court of Chancery. This Report was adopted by the Council; and it was resolved to transmit a copy to the Lord Chancellor, and to solicit his consideration of it; and we believe that his Lordship has promised his attention to the Report. We are this week enabled to place before our readers the substance of this most important representation; and it is well that we have the opportunity of doing so while Parliament is still sitting, so that it may be known what is the opinion of solicitors as to the efficiency, actual and possible, of the Court, and what has been done and is now doing by them to bring about most salutary reforms. The Committee refer to a Report made by them on Dec. 2, 1851, which was submitted to the Chancery Commissioners, and has been laid before Parliament. Many of the recommendations of that Report were subsequently adopted by the Legislature; but the most essential feature of it was the appointment of four additional judges to work out the scheme proposed, and this part of the plan of the Committee was disregarded. It is believed that experience has abundantly proved the wisdom of the advice thus offered by the solicitors in 1851, and that the obvious remedy for many serious existing evils is to be found in an immediate increase of the staff of judges.

In the words of the Report, "the success of one of the greatest improvements ever made in the practice of the Court is imperilled by the present state of business in the Judges' Chambers, and an immediate remedy is required." This, be it observed, is the deliberate opinion of a committee of solicitors extensively engaged in business, who must surely be the best possible authority both as to the existence of the defect and as to the means of curing it. The business of the Court has increased largely since 1852, and it must continue to increase from year to year. Indeed, if the improvements now suggested, and others which will readily occur to the experienced practitioner, were adopted, the growth of business would be accelerated to an extent hardly calculable. The fact is, that the Court enlarges its functions every year in spite of the unpopularity it has inherited, and of the clogs which were unfortunately placed upon the working of the reforms of 1852. But these augmented duties have been hitherto discharged by a smaller judicial and official staff than existed under the old system, which was so justly reprobated. Before 1852 there were four judges to make decrees, and ten masters to work them out. Now, there are no masters. The judges both make and work out decrees. But while the business of the Court has increased, the number of judges remains the same. And further, in place of ten chief clerks of masters, there are now only eight chief clerks of judges. It is, of course, quite vain to expect that the judges can do the work imposed upon them; and the delegation of judicial functions to the clerks can scarcely have been contemplated by the Legislature, and certainly will not satisfy the suitors. We commend to the public attention the remarks of the Equity Committee on this subject, believing that the conclusion from them is inevitable in favour of the appointment of four new judges, and probably also of additional chief or other clerks. When Parliament re-assembles the Government ought to be prepared to ask for the necessary authority to make these improvements, so that the Court of Chancery may at length emerge from the cloud of prejudice under which it has been so long regarded, and may attain the full measure of utility of which its system is capable when not weakened by unwise arrangements.

It will be seen that the Report deals also with the Taxing-Masters' and the Accountant-General's offices; and just at this moment the complaints embodied in it will be echoed by many a practitioner who is feeling the full force of the grievances animadverted upon by the Committee. There can be no doubt whatever of the crying necessity which exists for the appointment of additional taxing-masters. The possibility of assimilating the proceedings of the Accountant-General's office, to a very great extent, to those of the Bank of England, may not, perhaps, be evident to a judge who has never entered the office, or to a clerk who has never left it; but no man of plain sense and business habits who looked into the question would hesitate one moment in his conclusion on it.

The following is the substance of the Report:—

The Committee, having considered a statement relating to the present mode of transacting business in several offices of the Court of Chancery, submit to the Council of the society the result of their deliberations, founded as well on their own experience, as on the information they have received from other solicitors, of whose assistance the Committee have availed themselves.

The Committee beg leave to refer to the Report made by this Committee to the Society, dated the 2nd day of December, 1851, in which the defects then existing in the practice and proceedings of the court were fully pointed out, and accompanied by detailed suggestions for removing those defects. (Parliamentary Paper, No. 216, March 30th, 1852.)

That Report was submitted to her Majesty's Commissioners "for Inquiring into the Process, Practice, and System of Pleading in the Court of Chancery," and many recommendations contained in it were adopted by the Commissioners, and carried into effect by Acts of the Legislature and Orders of Court; but, notwithstanding the improvements thus effected, very serious complaints have for some time past been made by the suitors in Chancery and the solicitors, in consequence of the impediments to the transaction of business at several of the offices.

The Committee limit their present Report to those three offices which appear to them to require more immediate attention, viz.—

1. The Judges' Chambers.
2. The Taxing Masters' Offices.
3. The Accountant-General's Office.

1. The Judges' Chambers.

In their Report, already referred to, this Committee expressed their opinion, that, in order to the satisfactory transaction of the business then proposed to be performed by the judges in chambers, it was desirable "That four new judges should be appointed, one of whom should be attached to each of the present courts of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors, so that each court shall have two judges, and that each judge should sit three days in court and three days in chambers; so that the Bar would be kept employed by four judges sitting constantly in court; and four judges would be always sitting in chambers, working out (with their officers) the details of their cases."

It was with great regret that this Committee found, that, although the Commissioners and the Legislature adopted a plan by which business was intended to be transacted by the judges in chambers, they did not think it necessary to appoint more judges to do the extra work thus thrown upon them; while, at the same time, they gave to the existing judges a staff, which, though composed of most competent persons, is quite inadequate in strength to the performance of the duties devolving upon them.

The Committee recommend that a respectful but earnest communication should be at once made to the Lord Chancellor, pointing out to him that the success of one of the greatest improvements ever made in the practice of the court is imperilled by the present state of business in the judges' chambers, and that an immediate remedy is required, which this committee unanimously consider will not be effectually attained, except by adopting their former recommendation of 1851, and appointing additional judges.

A comparison of the present and former staff of the court, and of the present and former quantity of actual work done (or to be done), will show how inadequate is the strength of the present staff for the duties to be performed by the judges and chief clerks in chambers.

Previously to the alterations in 1852 there were, in addition to the four judges, ten masters and ten chief clerks, whose whole time was devoted to the business of their office; at present the four judges, already overworked, attend in chambers for an hour or two only twice or three times a week, while the rest of the business in chambers has to be performed by the eight chief clerks, part of whose time is necessarily occupied before the judge when he attends in chambers.

The jurisdiction now exercised in chambers comprises a great variety of matters over which the masters had no power, so that from this cause, and the great increase of the business of the court, owing to the improvements in its general practice and proceedings, and the continued accumulation of property, the judges in chambers and their chief clerks have to transact, with a diminished staff, a far larger quantity of business than devolved on the masters.

The chief clerks are most efficient officers of the court, and their acquaintance with details which their previous practice as solicitors has given them, enables them, under the direction of the judge, to dispose satisfactorily of a very large amount of business; but there are many matters now determined by the chief clerks, involving important questions in dispute between parties, and the exercise of considerable responsibility, which it would be much more satisfactory to the suitors and their solicitors to have decided by the judges themselves.

It should also be noticed, in considering the practice of the court, that although so large a portion of its business is administrative, and not contentious, an amount of decision is constantly required to be exercised in chambers with respect to the suitors and their solicitors, in order to the dispatch of business, for which the personal authority of the judge, and means of frequent and ready access to him, are absolutely essential; and that it is highly important to the regularity of the proceedings in chambers, that the solicitors should attend as much as possible in person, which they would do to a much greater extent than at present if the judges themselves could attend at suitable times.

While, however, the judges are limited to the present number, it is impossible to expect them to do more work at chambers than they do now; they have the same amount of court business as they had before the alterations; the chamber business is so much extra labour imposed on them, and the only time they can devote to it, is after the court has risen (about half-past three or four o'clock). The mind of a judge has then been occupied for five or six hours in hearing and deciding upon the arguments of counsel, and he is bodily and mentally fatigued; and after all, he cannot give up more than six or eight hours a week, which are quite insufficient for the purpose. The hours, too, at which the judges attend chambers (just before post time) are most inconvenient to solicitors, who have themselves been engaged all the morning, and have to write their letters on the business of the day. Under these circumstances, it is too much to expect that the judge can devote to the business at chambers the energy and time that are necessary, or that the solicitors (who, as well out of respect to the judges as for the interests of their clients, would, if practicable, attend in person) should, except on some urgent occasions, neglect their daily correspondence in order to wait at chambers, as they are sometimes obliged to do, until six or seven o'clock, before the judge can be seen.

This Committee, therefore, beg to repeat the recommendation contained in their Report of the 2nd of December, 1851—viz. "That four new judges should be appointed, one of whom should be attached to each of the present courts of the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellors, so that each court should have two judges, and that each judge should sit three days in court and three days in chambers."

To this recommendation they would add a suggestion, that the judges attached to each court should be enabled, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, to appoint additional chief or other clerks in their chambers, whenever the state of the business before them rendered such appointment necessary.

The appointment of these additional judges would have the further advantage of rendering it practicable, in those cases in which viva voce examinations of witnesses take place, to conduct the examination before the judge who hears the cause, and thus remove the very serious objection, still continuing, to the mode in which evidence is taken viva voce by the court.

Another great advantage, too, would be the attendance of counsel in the judges' chambers in cases of sufficient importance to require it. The members of the bar do not attend the chief clerks of the judges, but they would attend the judges themselves in chambers.

2. The Taxing-Masters' Offices.

The accumulation of business in the offices of the taxing-masters is such, that, at present, appointments to tax bills of any considerable length or importance cannot be obtained except at a distance of several weeks. In the numerous class of cases in which creditors and legatees are interested, it almost invariably happens that the costs of the suit must be taxed, before the debts or legacies can be paid, and the delay in payment caused by the time lost before the taxation can be completed, is of the most serious consequence to the parties interested and those dependent upon them. Towards the close of the offices for the vacations, it frequently happens that the taxations are not completed in time to obtain the money from the Accountant-General, and the parties and their solicitors are kept out of their rights till the re-opening of the office. It is submitted that additional taxing-masters should be at once appointed.

3. The Accountant-General's Office.

In the office of the Accountant-General an improved system is urgently required. There seems no reason why the suitors should not have their business transacted with punctuality and despatch equal to that with which the business of the public is transacted by the Bank of England.

The contrast between the Bank of England and the Accountant-General's Office is most remarkable. Except for four days in the year, and during the time when the transfer books are shut for the dividends, the Bank is open for the transfer of stock at three hours' notice every day in the week; on four days without fee; on the other two days on payment of a very trifling fee. The Accountant-General's Office is close shut for vacations, averaging 102 days in the year, of which 36 days are not part of the long vacation; and these 36 days occur at the very busiest periods of the whole year. When the office is open, the Accountant-General transfers stock on two days only in each week: he requires at least three days' notice before he acts upon the order for transfer or sale of stock; and his clerks take two days more after the stock is sold to prepare the draft for the money. The result is, that the suitors have to wait at least five days to get business done through the Accountant-General, which the public, through the Bank, gets done within a few hours, or, at the most, in one day. The suitors are also subjected to an additional day's delay and additional expense, in consequence of the registrar's directions being required, besides the order of the court, in all cases of transfer or sale of stock, which, it is submitted, is a useless form, and ought to be abolished. A power of attorney also, which, if bespoken at the Bank before twelve o'clock, can be obtained the same day, cannot be procured from the Accountant-General's Office in less than two or three days; and at the busiest period of the year, when despatch is of the utmost moment to the suitor, a longer time is required. In addition to this, the execution of the power of attorney has to be verified by an affidavit, while no such verification is requisite for a Bank power.

The extent and magnitude of the business transacted by this office of the court is apparent from the fact that the gross amount of funds under its control is upwards of £60,000,000, that the average annual receipts amount to about £7,000,000, and the annual average payments to about the same sum.

The loss and inconvenience now sustained by the suitors, under the present system of management, render it highly desirable that a new system should be introduced; and this object would be attained in the easiest and most effectual way, by converting the office at once into a branch of the Bank of England, and placing in it some competent persons acquainted with the routine of common banking, so that the business of the suitors may be transacted in the time ordinarily occupied by similar business, and (except during the long vacation, which it is not proposed to abolish) the days and hours of attendance may be assimilated to those of the Bank of England, a fair increase of the clerks' salaries being allowed.

It is at the same time submitted that the office should continue open for at least ten days longer than at present, after the court rises for the long vacation—the time now allowed for carrying out the orders of the court for the sale or transfer of stock, and payment of money, after the court has risen, being quite insufficient for the purpose.

The committee have had under their consideration several communications which have been made to them relating to other offices of the court; but at present they recommend to the council, that the suggestions to the Lord Chancellor should be confined to the more urgent and important matters to which they have referred.

CASE OF MISTAKE AS TO IDENTITY.

Thomas Warr Simeon was tried at the Exeter Assizes, on Saturday last, for forging a bill of exchange for the payment of 80*l.* 10*s.*, with intent to defraud.

Mr. Serjeant Kinglake and Mr. Poulden were counsel for the prosecution; and Mr. Collier and Mr. Coleridge defended the prisoner.

This was an indictment preferred at the instance of the Admiralty, and created the greatest excitement in consequence of the high respectability of the accused.

It appeared, that, on the 13th of May last, shortly before 4 in the afternoon, a person in the dress of a mate in the navy went into the Devonport Bank and tendered a bill of exchange, apparently drawn by a paymaster of the ship Vixen upon the Admiralty for 80*l.* 10*s.*, and asked for cash. The clerk gave him change for it, partly in Bank of England notes and partly in gold. The bill purported to be certified and approved by the proper officers of the ship in the usual manner. The party received the money, and without counting it put it in his pocket and walked away. The whole transaction did not occupy more than three minutes. The bill was sent to London in the regular manner, and it was discovered that all the names were forged. There were such persons filling the different offices in the ship, but they were all incorrectly spelt. Information was sent into the country. One of the three clerks in the bank on the 19th of May saw a person he believed to be the one who had obtained the money going past the Bank. He endeavoured to get out in time to stop this person, but the door being locked, he was prevented getting out for some time, and the person escaped. On the following day, however, one of the clerks and a messenger of the bank, accompanied by Mr. Eastlake, the solicitor to the Admiralty at Plymouth, and the superintendent of police, went on bard the Cordelia ship, lying in Plymouth Harbour, and the clerk and the messenger picked out the prisoner as the person who had brought the bill of exchange. The prisoner was called into the captain's cabin, and told what the charge against him was; he instantly denied all knowledge of the matter, and declared that he did not even know where the bank was, and had never been in it. The prisoner was searched, but nothing of consequence was found upon him. He was at once taken into custody, and was then taken to the bank, and the other clerk immediately declared that the prisoner was the person who had been at the bank. None of the witnesses had ever seen the prisoner at any other time. The two bank clerks and the messenger now stated it to be their belief that the prisoner was the man; they had little doubt about it. It turned out that by some means a great many of these bills of exchange, the greater portion of which are printed, had been obtained from the waste-paper office of the Government, and several of them had been presented in London and other parts with all the names forged. The present bill was said to be a very clumsy forgery. A curious circumstance was stated during the trial. A master in the navy, who was called to prove that one of the names was a forgery, stated that last Wednesday evening he was introduced to the prisoner at Exeter, and on the following morning he stopped the prisoner, and asked him if he had not breakfasted that morning at the New London Inn. The prisoner declared he had not done so; but the witness said, he was positive he had, and so positive was he, that he would have sworn that he was the person until the actual gentleman was pointed out to him, and he then saw the mistake; that person he now pointed out in the court, and he certainly very much resembled the prisoner.

Mr. Collier, in his address to the jury, pointed out the danger of relying too much upon evidence of identity when the party had only been seen for three minutes, and where there was nothing to attract the attention of the witnesses at the time. The learned counsel also related a circumstance that had occurred to himself only last week, when a gentleman had met him in London, and referred to a conversation which he said he had had with him that afternoon. Mr. Collier told him he had not seen him before that day. The gentleman still persisted that the conversation with him had taken place, but he assured him that at the time he referred to he was dining in the House of Commons with four members of Parliament. The learned counsel then said that on the present occasion, most fortunately for the prisoner, he should be able to show most clearly that he could not have been in the bank at the time, and that he was perfectly innocent of the crime imputed to him.

The son of Sir Francis Collier, Mr. Cardale, and Mr. Wogan, all midshipmen in the navy, were called, and they accounted for the time at which this offence was committed, and clearly showed that Mr. Simeon was with one or other of them from 3 o'clock till past 4 in the afternoon of that day, making it clear that he could not have been at the bank. Other witnesses were also called, who corroborated these gentlemen, and clearly proved the innocence of Mr. Simeon.

Verdict, "Not Guilty."

Every one appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the result, and of the innocence of this young gentleman.

Messrs. Eastlake, of Plymouth, conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Elsworthy the defence.

We understand that James Coppock, Esq., has been appointed to the treasurership of the Kent County Courts, vacant by the death of the late W. F. A. Delane, Esq.—Globe.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas has appointed Mr. Daniel Dunnett, solicitor, Uttoxeter, to be a perpetual commissioner for the county of Stafford for taking the acknowledgment of deeds by married women.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

Creditors' Suit—Future Debt—Calls.

Wentworth v. Chevell, 5 W. R. 743.

This suit was instituted by creditors for the administration of the estate of a person who was the holder of shares in the Norfolk Estuary Company. After the usual decree, calls were made by the company. In the Master's report, no provision was made for the payment of future calls. The only question of importance in the cause was, as to these future calls, whether provision ought to be made for their payment before the distribution of the testator's estate among the simple contract creditors. It was scarcely disputed that the calls which had been made were specialty debts. "With respect to the claim for future calls," said V. C. Kindersley, "it was remarkable that no reported case could be found in which the Court had made provision for future calls. The principle was this:—If there was a debt due, but not payable immediately (as against creditors), the Court would make a provision for it as a debitum in præsenti solvendum in futuro; but if there was a liability to pay under a certain contingency, the Court made no provision for such a debt, but distributed the fund amongst the simple contract creditors, without waiting to ascertain whether the liability would ever accrue. The true rule was laid down in Read v. Blunt (5 Sim. 567)." In Read v. Blunt the testator had entered into a covenant with the plaintiff, for securing to him an annuity for his life, and had executed a warrant of attorney as a further security, but judgment had not been entered up. The plaintiff asked that the executors might be ordered to set apart a sufficient portion of the assets to answer the future payments, the annuity not being in arrear. The Vice-Chancellor of England refused the relief asked, upon the ground stated above. "The executors," said his Honour, "may, by law, the day before an instalment of the annuity becomes due, apply the whole of the assets to pay the simple contract debts. The case of a bond is different; for, when the condition is broken, the whole penalty is due."

Hawkins v. Day (2 Ambl. 803) is a well-known authority to the effect that payment by an executor of simple contract debts before breach of condition is good; and Lord Hardwicke there observed that the rule had then been established for above a hundred years. "If a conusor or obligor die," said his Lordship, "leaving simple contract debts, and the covenants are not broken, and consequently no debt accrued upon a breach, it is a good administration to pay simple contract debts." If the company in which the testator held shares were being wound up by the Court under the Winding-up Acts, and the executors were placed on the list of contributories, it has been held (Robinson's Executors' Case, 5 W. R. 126), that the calls made by the Master or the Chief Clerk would not constitute a specialty debt, even though the calls which might have been made under the deed executed by the testator would have been so. This case, however, though decided by the Court of Appeal, assisted by common law judges, was acquiesced in by both the Lords Justices, with great doubt and hesitation.

STAT. 6 ANNE, C. 18—CESTUI QUE VIE.

Meyrick v. Lawes, 5 W. R. 746.

The Master of the Rolls was moved, in this case, to make an order, under the above statute, for the production of a cestui que vie; but his Honour declined to make the order, on the ground that the statute gave him no jurisdiction. The statute, in terms, authorises only the Lord Chancellor, Keeper, or Commissioners for the custody of the Great Seal of Great Britain for the time being, to order the production of a cestui que vie. There are two reported cases, however, in which a Vice-Chancellor has made such an order—viz. In re Lingen (12 Sim. 104), and In re Clossey (2 W. R. 183). In the former case, the Vice-Chancellor of England, and in the latter, V. C. Stuart, entertained no doubt that they had power, under the statute, to make the order. It does not appear that the attention of the Master of the Rolls was called to these authorities, or that any doubt was suggested to either of the Vice-Chancellors as to their jurisdiction. There is no question that the statute itself does not enable any judge besides the Chancellor, Keeper, or Commissioners of the Great Seal to make the order; the jurisdiction of the other equity judges, therefore, depends on the subsequent statutes, creating new judges in equity, and otherwise modifying the exclusive jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor.

POWER, EXECUTION OF, BY PREVIOUS WILL.

Cofield v. Pollard, 5 W. R. 774.

This case follows the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England, in Stillman v. Weedon (16 Sim. 26), and both are authorities, that, by the combined operation of the 24th and 27th sections of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), a will, though made before the creation of a power, may be a good execution of it. Upon the words of those two sections, the contrary of this proposition is hardly arguable; but, taking into account the state of the law before the Act was passed, there is little doubt that it was not the intention of the Legislature that those sections should have such an effect. According to the authorities before the Act came into operation, a general bequest was not an execution of a general power, unless the intention of the testator to execute was shown by some reference either to the power itself, or to the property which formed its subject-matter. It would, therefore, have then been impossible, in any case, to have executed a power by a previous will. The most probable intention of the Legislature was merely to do away with the effect of these decisions, so far as they required such specific reference to the power or its subject-matter, but not to enact that general words of gift contained in a will were to operate constructively as an execution of a subsequent general power, it being impossible that such an instrument could be an actual and express execution of the power, it having been made before the power itself came into existence.

BANKRUPTCY—ORDER AND DISPOSITION—REVERSIONARY INTEREST.

Re Rawbone's Will, 5 W. R. 796.

In this case, Wood, V. C., previous to the decision of the Lords Justices in Bartlett v. Bartlett (5 W. R. 541), had held that a reversionary interest was not within the order and disposition clause (s. 125) of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849; but after their Lordship's decision, his Honour desired the present case to be re-argued before him. The facts were shortly these:—Mr. Rawbone, being entitled to a reversionary interest under his father's will, became insolvent in 1841, and made no mention of this interest in his schedule. In 1854 he became bankrupt, and in 1856 the reversion fell into possession, when the assignees in insolvency and in bankruptcy both for the first time heard of its existence. It being clear, since the decision in Bartlett v. Bartlett, that the reversion was within the order and disposition clause, the only remaining question was, whether it was within the order and disposition of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, "with the consent of the true owner"—in this case, the assignee in insolvency. The Vice-Chancellor held that it was not, on the ground that the assignee in insolvency had no means of arriving at the knowledge that the insolvent was possessed of the property, and, therefore, that he could not have given his consent to its being within the insolvent's order and disposition.

EXONERATION—LIEN FOR UNPAID PURCHASE-MONEY.

Hood v. Hood, 5 W. R. 747.

The question in this case turned upon the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, the 1st section of which enacts, that when any person dies seised of or entitled to any estate or interest in land, which at the time of his death is charged with the payment of any money by way of mortgage, and such person has not by his will, or other document, signified a contrary intention, the heir or devisee is not to be entitled to have the mortgage debt discharged out of the personal or other real estate of such person, but the land so charged shall be primarily liable to pay the mortgage debt. In Hood v. Hood, there was a contract to purchase freehold land, a deposit having been paid. Before the completion of the purchase, the intended purchaser died intestate; and the heir at law claimed to have the unpaid portion of the purchase-money made good out of the personal estate of the intestate. The personal representative contended that the unpaid portion of the purchase-money ought to be treated as a mortgage under this Act. The only authority referred to was Sproule v. Prior (8 Sim. 189), which was the case of an uncompleted purchase, and part payment of the purchase-money, at the death of a testator; and the Vice-Chancellor of England there held, after a careful review of the principal cases, that the assets ought to be marshalled, on account of the vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase-money. "The weight of authority," said the Vice-Chancellor, "is abundantly in favour of holding that the lien of the vendor must be subjected to the ordinary rule of marshalling assets." Stuart, V. C., considered that the Act did not, in such a case as the present, prevent the payment of the purchase-money out of the personal estate, because it could not be considered that the lien of a vendor was in the same position as that of a mortgagee. "The Act," said his Honour, "took away a right of exoneration which otherwise existed; but in the case of a contract for sale, all that was intended was, that the purchaser should get the real estate, and the vendor his money." We believe that Hood v. Hood is the first decision on this point, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113. Swainson v. Swainson (5 W. R. 187), following the old rule as laid down in Scott v. Beecher (5 Madd. 95), decided, that where a mortgaged estate descended from one who was not himself liable to pay the mortgage debt, the heir was not entitled to exoneration out of his ancestor's personal estate.

PRACTICE IN CHAMBERS—CHIEF CLERK.

In re The London and County Assurance Company, 5 W. R. 794.

An observation of V. C. Kindersley in this case, relating to the practice in Chambers before the chief clerk, is worthy of being noted:—"It could not be repeated too often," said his Honour, "that, if a question arose for determination before the chief clerk, either party had a right to the opinion of the judge, even on the minutest item of account, although parties very wisely usually left those questions to the chief clerks, who were perfectly competent to deal with them. No doubt it was the discretion of the solicitor not to be unnecessarily dissatisfied with the chief clerk's decision, unless there were matters which deserved the attention of the judge himself." Though there can be no question upon the construction of the Act abolishing the office of master and appointing chief clerks, and of the general orders consequent thereon, as to the right of the suitor to have the decision of the judge himself upon every litigated question that arises in any stage of the suit, a different notion has been growing up, and the practice of moving before the judge in Court was beginning to be considered the regular course, not merely to vary the chief clerk's certificate, but on interlocutory matters. In the present case, Kindersley, V. C., refused, with costs, a motion that a director of the company now being wound up, either should answer a certain question which had been put to him in chambers, or stand committed for contempt. The solicitor of the director requested that the examination might be adjourned before the Vice-Chancellor in chambers, but the chief clerk concurred in the suggestion of the other side, that the matter should be decided in court.

Taxation of Costs—Distributive Issues.

Treherne v. Gardner, 5 W. R., Q. B., 817.

In this case, an important question arose as to the principle on which costs (as between party and party) are to be taxed by the Master, where, there being a distributive issue, the verdict in respect of each item sued for is in favour of one side; but where, nevertheless, the opposite party has, to a certain extent, succeeded in opposing the claim or defence. It was an action brought to recover from the defendants (the lord and steward of a manor) certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by the plaintiff on his admission as tenant of the manor. The declaration was on the money counts, and to the whole of them was pleaded the single plea of "never indebted;" on which issue was joined. At the trial a general verdict was taken for the plaintiff by consent, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special case; and ultimately it was referred to a Master to say how much the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In the result the plaintiff recovered something in respect of each item he had claimed in his particulars of demand. The Master, however, allowed costs to the defendants where certain of those items in respect of which the plaintiff did not recover the whole of what he had claimed: and it was to review the taxation made on this principle that the present application was made to the Court.

It was urged, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendants, not having had a verdict in respect of any portion of the demand, were not entitled to any costs, inasmuch as the taxing-master had no authority to split the verdict. It was the same thing as if, on an action brought for £50 as the price of a horse, the defendant should be allowed a proportion of the costs of the issue if a verdict for £30 only should be recovered. On the other side, s. 75 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was mainly relied upon, enacting that all pleas and "other pleadings" capable of being construed distributively shall be taken distributively, it being insisted that the word "pleadings" included counts in a declaration. It was also urged, that, independently of that section, several issues were, in fact, raised on a general plea of "never indebted" to a declaration of money counts by which a variety of distinct items were claimed.

As to the 75th section of the Act, however, the Court said it was inapplicable to the case before them. They held it to be confined to pleas and the subsequent proceedings, and not to include the declaration; and they referred to and adopted the observations on this point made by Jervis, C. J., in Gabriel v. Dresser (24 L. J., C. P., 81), where he said "the 75th section of the Act was intended to meet the difficulty which previously existed of dealing with such pleas as payment and set off." Independently, however, of the Common Law Procedure Act, the Court proceeded to give judgment in accordance with the principle adopted by the Master in taxation, on the authority of the well-known case of Cousins v. Paddon (2 C. M. & R. 547), in which, for the first time, an issue on the plea of "never indebted" was deemed to be distributive, and a verdict for part of the amount claimed entered for the plaintiff, and a verdict in respect of the residue for the defendant—supported by the more recent case of Welby v. Brown (1 Exch. 770). The general principle laid down by the Court was, that it must, in each case similar to that now before them, be ascertained by the Master whether any and what distinct costs have been incurred as to the part of the issue found for the defendant; and when they can be ascertained to have been incurred relative to the whole issue, to tax them to the defendant, though the plaintiff is entitled to the general costs of the cause. The Court also intimated, in reference to the objection that no judgment had been given or verdict entered for the defendants for any part, so as to entitle them to costs, that this might be remedied (if necessary for subsequent proceedings) by amending the postea. The rule was accordingly discharged, but without costs.

It may be observed, that the question whether an issue is divisible or not, depends upon its structure. Should a declaration, for example, allege a breaking and entering of Blackacre and of Whiteacre—closes of the plaintiff—and the defendant pleads that he is not guilty, then, on proof of a trespass committed on Blackacre only, the jury may find the defendant guilty as to so much of the declaration as related to Blackacre, and not guilty as to so much as related to Whiteacre. (See Sharling v. Loaring, 1 Exch. 375.) In such a case the issue is divisible; and the necessary consequence is, that the defendant is entitled to any costs he may have incurred with regard to Whiteacre. But if the plaintiff declares upon a special contract, and the contract be put in issue, he must prove it as laid. Here the issue is not divisible, and both parties cannot have a verdict.

Compulsory Reference—Practice as to.

Master v. Hamilton, 3 Jur., N. S., 722.

In this case the action had been brought by an administrator against the manager of the deceased's estate, under the direction of the Court of Chancery; and on the ground that the question involved therein was one of a disputed account only, application was made to a common law judge to refer it to a Master under the compulsory arbitration clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. The Judge refused to make the order, thinking he had no power in a cause sent by the Court of Chancery to be tried at law, in the ordinary way, before a jury. And on the application for a reference being renewed to the Court, it was further alleged, in opposition, that the question involved was in reality one of law, not of account. Ultimately the cause was referred by consent, with a direction to the Master, that, if a question of law should arise, he should make an interlocutory report thereon to the Court, who would then dispose of that question; and, if necessary, send the matter again to the Master, that he might go into the rest of the account.

Practice—Several Prisoners—Order of Defence.

Reg. v. Holman and Poplett, 3 Jur., N. S., 722.

Some time ago we noticed the case of Reg. v. Thomas & Harris,* in which Mr. Baron Channell gave in his adherence to the alleged rule of practice in criminal trials, that the prisoner who happens to be first named in the indictment should be first called on to make his defence. It appears, however, by the above case, that the judges are not at harmony on this point; for, at the close of the case for the prosecution, the Chief Baron called on Poplett (who happened to be defended by counsel) to make his defence; and, on remonstrance, said, "I do not subscribe to that imaginary rule. Is the order of defence to be determined by the caprice of the person who draws the indictment?"

Breach of Agreement to refer—Application for stay of Proceedings.

Lury v. Pearson, 1 C. B., N. S., 639.

A charterparty (between the plaintiff as owner, and defendant as charterer) contained the following stipulation—viz. that any question or difficulty which might thereafter arise out of that charterparty should be decided by arbitration. And it was, by the same charterparty, agreed that the defendant should effect certain insurances on the vessel chartered to be the property of, and to be delivered to, the owners. In accordance with this clause, certain policies on the vessel were effected in the names of the defendants' brokers. On the voyage, the vessel was lost, and the plaintiffs claimed delivery to them of the policies; but the defendants refused, in consequence of their brokers claiming a lien on them. On this an action had been commenced to recover damages for such non-delivery; and an application was now made to the Court for a stay of proceedings, under the 11th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which allows that course to be taken, where, in any instrument in writing, the parties thereto having agreed that any existing or future differences between them shall be referred to arbitration, any of them shall nevertheless commence an action against any of the rest in respect of the matters so agreed to be referred, but only allows such stay where the court or judge is satisfied that "no sufficient reason exists why such matters cannot or ought not to be referred."

It was now urged, on behalf of the plaintiff, that no question or difficulty had arisen between the parties out of the charter-party; and that, if it were, it was not a case in which the Court would compel the plaintiff to refer. There was no suggestion on the other side that there was any defence to the action; whereas, in Russell v. Pellegrini (22 L. T. 121)—a case in which the Queen's Bench had stayed proceedings on a similar application, and which was relied on by the defendant—the action had been brought on a charterparty by the shipowner for the freight, and a cross action had been brought by the charterer for damage alleged to have been occasioned by the vessel being unseaworthy.

The Court ultimately declined to interfere, and refused the rule which had been moved for.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

Assistant Barristers and County Court Judges.

By the wise policy of the early sovereigns of England, during whose reigns Ireland was annexed to the British empire, the legal system of the annexed country was in all respects assimilated to that which had so long prevailed across the Channel.

It was then an acknowledged truth that to promote uniformity in the administration of justice, was one of the surest methods of uniting and consolidating the empire. Accordingly, we find that the Courts at Westminster had, very soon after the invasion of Strongbow, their exact counterparts established on the banks of the Liffey. In later years, when equity had grown up into a perfect system, we find the Courts of the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls existing at Dublin, in exact imitation of their English prototypes. Now, the question arises, why was this salutary practice abandoned? Why is one rule adopted for England, and another rule for Ireland?

That uniformity in the administration of justice should cease to be practically regarded, now that one and the same Legislature presides over both kingdoms, is not the least remarkable view of the question. It is, however, the fact, that the "Union," instead of promoting this uniformity, as might naturally have been expected, seems to have had the contrary effect. Year by year the constitution and practice of the various courts of justice seem to vary more from the original English models.

On the present occasion, we intend to advert to one only of the many illustrations that might be adduced in support of our statement as to the increasing dissimilarity of English and Irish tribunals; and that is, the state of the county local courts. The English county court system, under which a judge, whose time is altogether devoted to his judicial duties, performs a monthly circuit of all the chief towns in his district, has apparently worked well; and, with some trivial amendments, it might become perfectly satisfactory. This system has now been in full operation for more than ten years, and can no longer be called an experiment. Supposing, then, that, because of its experimental character, it was at first applied to England only, is there, we ask, any good reason why, after its success has been established for so long, it should not now be extended to Ireland? It will be necessary to state here what is the existing system of local courts in Ireland. There is for each county (and for each moiety of the two largest counties—Cork and Tipperary) a functionary chosen from among barristers of seven years' standing, appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, and denominated the "assistant barrister," who presides at the quarter sessions, and has civil, as well as criminal, jurisdiction, within the limits specified by the various statutes regulating the office. To this system it is not difficult to discover three grave objections:—In the first place, the public have a right to demand that such a court should sit more frequently than once in three months; once a month would not be too often for the purpose. Secondly, the appointment resting with the Lord Lieutenant, the office becomes more of a political than a legal office, and is, in most instances, filled up by hangers-on of the Government for the time being, rather than from the ranks of the working lawyers. Thirdly, there being in Ireland no well-defined distinction between the common law and equity practitioners, it becomes highly objectionable in principle that the judge of a county court should continue to practise, and should be able to receive to-day as a client the individual who will to-morrow appear before him in court in the character of a practitioner. The "assistant barristers" do not, it is true, practise at the assize towns on their own circuits; but this is a very partial and ineffectual remedy to the evil suggested, and it does not prevent what we have known to occur—briefs in Chancery cases being sent by attorneys practising at sessions to the assistant barrister who presides at those sessions.

We are far from asserting that the "assistant barristers" are as a body unqualified for judicial office, or that among their number there are no highly accomplished and eminent lawyers; for on the list are found the names of O'Hagan, Henn, Major, and Lynch—all ornaments of their profession—together with the names of several other less distinguished, but still highly-qualified, men. At the same time, we are bound to state, that many of the number are wholly unknown to the profession, and have never practised at all in the four courts, however familiar their faces may be to saunterers in the "Park," or to frequenters of the drawing-rooms at the "Castle." Would it be tolerated in England that any "man about town," through political or aristocratic connection, should be appointed to a well-paid judicial office, the whole business of which required a sitting but four times a year?

The remedy which should be applied will at once occur to the minds of your readers. The judge of the county court should sit here, as in England, every month; and his salary should (if necessary) be increased, so as to enable him to give up all other business. Above all, the appointment should no longer rest with those who are necessarily unable to form a judgment as to the capabilities of the various applicants for a vacant judgeship; and who, as a matter of course, will often degrade the office by filling it up from political considerations. The power of nomination should be given to the Chancellor, or, perhaps, in preference, to the three chiefs of the common law courts; and we might then confidently look for good appointments. One other alteration should be recommended. We are utterly unable to discover why seven years of nominal practice at the bar should be essential to qualify for an office requiring a knowledge of law, and requiring, still more, habits of business and common sense. It is an insult to the whole body of solicitors that they are excluded from the local judgeships; and we strongly recommend the Incorporated Law Society of Dublin to take up this question in earnest, and never to let it rest until they have procured a repeal of the invidious clause which disqualifies many of the ablest men in Ireland from holding offices for which they are peculiarly fitted.

It is truly mortifying to a Scotchman to read the reports of the proceedings of the Incorporated Law Society, as given in your journal, and to observe the business-like manner in which it watches over the various important interests involved in the gradually increasing changes upon the existing system of law, which is the peculiar feature of the present times.

If Scotchmen were only aware of the constitution of that society, of the important position which it has acquired, and of the influence which it really exercises, there might be some hope of the various legal bodies in Scotland associating themselves in a similar manner, instead of merely talking about doing so.

From the report of the society's proceedings in your last paper, it appears that Mr. Craufurd's Judgments Execution Bill has been considered, and that the Council have resolved to support it. For many reasons, this resolution will be received with satisfaction here, because it is a guarantee that the whole subject with which the Bill deals will be fairly and dispassionately considered; and it will encourage those who take an interest in the Bill here, and who feel, that, in the various discussions which have taken place upon it, the law of Scotland has not been fairly represented, to express their views upon the subject. For the feeling is very prevalent, that a great deal of prejudice against Scotch law, arising from misrepresentation, might have been cleared away, if a little trouble, combined with accurate legal knowledge, had been applied to the subject. Of course, the Lord Advocate was, to a certain extent, responsible for allowing much that was absurdly advanced to remain unanswered; but as he did really strongly protest against much that was maintained, it is perhaps only fair to believe that the accumulation of Scotch work which has pressed upon him during the present session, has prevented him from devoting the time to Mr. Craufurd's Bill, which, in other circumstances, he might probably have been willing to spare. We shall take an early opportunity of explaining the nature and extent of the jurisdiction claimed by the Supreme Courts of Scotland, and the mode in which parties are convened to the courts, as the chief objections taken to Scotch decrees dealt with by Mr. Craufurd's Bill have reference to these two points.

There is one point in Lord St. Leonards' Land Transfer Bill which is well worthy of notice—viz. that no lis pendens shall bind a purchaser for valuable consideration unless he shall have express notice of it before the execution of the conveyance to him and the payment of the purchase-money by him. This provision seems to be founded on a just and equitable principle, and it deserves consideration whether it should not be adopted in Scotland. With regard to Lord Brougham's Bill we can only say that it would be impossible to work its machinery in Scotland. There may be three or four different titles to the same piece of land, all describing the subject in precisely the same way, so that the map plan would fail altogether; but there is probably less difficulty in England, from the circumstance that a proprietor in England cannot dispose of land to be held of himself as over-lord, while in Scotland the process may be resorted to without limit. It does not appear either to be contemplated in England to register anything more than the legal title to land, leaving the various limited rights in it to rest upon the existing law. If this be so, it seems certainly to be a defect; but it is difficult for a foreigner to understand exactly the nature of the various proposals. We consider it very fortunate that the whole system of registration in Scotland is under consideration at the very time that the subject is being dealt with in England: both countries will derive benefit from the circumstance.

The claim which the Crown makes in England to reply in criminal cases seems to be most unfair; and the fact that it is considered harsh seems to mark the general opinion on the subject. In this respect the law in Scotland contrasts most favourably with that in England; for here the prisoner always has the last word. The English rule was imported into Scotland, along with jury trial in civil causes; but it was found to work unfairly, and has been changed, the defender in all cases having the reply.

REGISTRATION OF TITLE.—(From a Correspondent.)

One of the great newspaper cries now is for a system of registration of title. I say "newspaper," for I do not believe the landowners care much about the matter—certainly not half so much as is represented. Depend upon it, if they did, they would themselves enter into the contest, and not complacently leave it in the hands of the literary gentlemen. We should hear of public meetings, and of the other usual modes of proceeding by which great grievances are brought to light. The apathy of the landowners, then, I conceive to be a strong argument against the adoption of a new and untried system of conveyance.

That great man, Lord St. Leonards—undoubtedly the highest living authority on real property law, and, as such, the more capable of forming an opinion on the proposed change—has declared against it; and Lord Brougham himself, in his "Essay on Gradual Legislation," says: "The having once adopted a plan is a reason for not changing it, unless the improvement recommended appears plainly to deserve the name."

I also imagine that a system of registration would add to the present expense of a conveyance; for is it possible, that, with a multiplicity and complexity of interests, deeds to explain the true position and rights of the parties could be dispensed with? Deeds being then absolutely necessary in many cases, it would be difficult, except in the simplest matters, to say when they would not be required; and unless there was a legislative prohibition of this nature, the solicitor would, in every case, of course look to his own pocket, prepare the deed, and make the client pay for it.

Great exaggeration is made as to the charges in conveyancing transactions. I believe, that, if a return of the number of conveyances for the last twelve months, and the charges in each, were to be made out, it would be found that the average costs were only a fair remuneration to the solicitor for his trouble and great responsibility. The day for exorbitant and unfair charges is gone by, and the solicitor making them will not long keep his client.

If you think these humble remarks worth a place in your paper, you will oblige by inserting them.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, July 31.

TRANSFER OF REAL ESTATE BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the second reading of this Bill. He mentioned a case where on a certain manor, during thirty years, out of 500 conveyances the average length of each was not more than 170 words, and the average expense 7*s.* each. This Bill was founded on the same principle, and would confer a real benefit on landed property by introducing a system of registration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR feared the Bill would not have much chance of becoming law this session, but thought there was much in it that would be valuable in the way of suggestion.

He agreed with the noble and learned Lord that a system of registration must be the foundation of any simplification of transfer and title. A commission had already sat on this subject, and had presented a very valuable report.

The Bill was read a second time.

Tuesday, Aug. 4.

JUDGMENT ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT.

Lord BROUGHAM moved for certain returns to show the comparative working of two measures, one of which had passed the House of Lords without a dissentient voice; the other was a measure substituted for it in the other House, after an inquiry before a committee, to which his (Lord Brougham's) Bill, and another Bill on the same subject by the Attorney-General, had both been referred. The fees under the existing Act on 23,163 judgments on bills of exchange had averaged 3*l.* 15*s.* each, and the total amount was £86,776; whereas, if his (Lord Brougham's) Bill had become law, the average cost would have been only 17*s.* 8*d.*, and the total amount £22,000. There would thus have been a saving of three-fourths.

Thursday, Aug. 6.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

The House went into Committee on this Bill.

Clauses from 1 to 11 inclusive were agreed to.

On clause 12, which provided that a prosecution under this Bill should be sanctioned by one of the judges or by the Attorney-General,

The LORD CHANCELLOR proposed to amend the clause by striking out that part of it referring to the judges, because it might happen that a trustee charged with fraud might be tried before the very judge who had sanctioned the institution of criminal proceedings against him.

Lord CAMPBELL approved the amendment, and expressed an earnest wish, that, in other branches of the law, the sanction of some public officer might be necessary before criminal prosecutions were instituted. He had frequently observed that the most frightful abuses arose from the facilities which were given to private prosecutors, without any notice whatever to the parties accused, to prefer bills of indictment and immediately obtain warrants thereon, particularly with regard to charges of perjury and conspiracy, which were frequently preferred for the sake of extortion. He had had a good deal of conversation on the subject with the late Attorney-General, Sir A. Cockburn, who had made up his mind to propose a Bill to remedy the evil. He hoped that a Bill of that nature would ere long receive the sanction of the Legislature.

Lord ST. LEONARDS briefly expressed his concurrence in the omission proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

On the question that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill,

Lord WENSLEYDALE moved the omission of the entire clause on the ground that it was objectionable to give any individual the power of stopping prosecutions instituted by private persons for breaches of trust. That was entirely opposed to the principle of the law of this country. It was true that in foreign countries no criminal prosecution could be commenced without the interference of the Executive; consequently, for the accomplishment of party purposes, or for the gratification of individual animosity, the Government and the officers of the Government had ample opportunities. There were, no doubt, cases in which it was desirable and necessary that the institution of criminal proceedings should be vested in an officer of the Crown; but this Bill did not directly concern the public, it had merely reference to wrongs committed on private individuals. The law relating to trustees was now clearly defined, and no such provision as this was necessary.

The LORD-CHANCELLOR said, the great evil which was apprehended from this Bill by the other House was, that while it would punish those who had been guilty of fraud, it would also deter honest men from undertaking the duties of trustees. This objection was obviated by the introduction of the safeguard afforded by this clause.

Lord ST. LEONARDS and Lord CAMPBELL supported the clause.

The motion of Lord Wensleydale was negatived without a division, and the clause was then agreed to.

The remaining clauses were agreed to, and the Bill passed through committee.

TRUSTEES RELIEF BILL.

This Bill passed through committee.

Clauses 2 and 6 were negatived by consent, and several amendments were introduced into the other clauses, on the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor.

TRANSFER OF REAL ESTATE SIMPLIFICATION BILL.

On the order of the day for the second reading of this Bill,

Lord St. LEONARDS said, that he could not expect at so late a period of the session to be able to pass the Bill into law; but, as he had been somewhat misunderstood on a former occasion, he wished to state what were the provisions of the measure. The object of the present Bill was to render a system of registration wholly unnecessary. The Bill dealt with the present system as regarded perpetuity, and amended and explained the present law. It proposed also to reduce the period of forty years of uninterrupted possession, which the law at present recognised as giving a valid title, to twenty-five years; and it rendered it unnecessary to include in a conveyance abstracts of title for more than forty years back. At present a registered judgment might be executed against a purchaser any time after the purchase had been completed; but he proposed that when there was a boná fide purchase no purchase should be attached upon a judgment or Crown debt unless execution issued before the purchase was completed. The Bill also provided for the exemption of purchasers from the succession duties, and it enabled trustees to give a perfect discharge to purchasers from any claims upon the property. The last proposition was to make any seller, agent, or solicitor concealing an incumbrance with a fraudulent intent liable to punishment, as being guilty of a misdemeanor; and he believed such a provision would be found to operate beneficially.

Lord CAMPBELL expressed his general approval of the measure.

The order for the second reading was then discharged.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, July 31.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The debate on the second reading of this Bill was resumed by Mr. GLADSTONE, in support of the amendment.

Mr. WALPOLE spoke in favour of the Bill.

On a division the numbers were—For the second reading, 208; against it, 97: majority, 111.

Monday, August 3.

TRUSTEES' RELIEF BILL.

Mr. HADFIELD asked the Attorney-General whether he intended to bring in a Bill this session or the next to relieve trustees from certain liabilities at law in respect of trust property, consequent on acts done by them in the reasonable exercise of their judgment, and without fraud; and from the acts of co-trustees, deposits with bankers, and other dealings, such as would be reasonable and proper in the conduct of private business.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, as Lord St. Leonards had taken the matter up, he thought it best to leave it in his hands. Considering the present state of the session, he was afraid there was no chance of Lord St. Leonards' Bill being passed; but he hoped that in the next session he should be able to introduce a Bill having the same object.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS.

In the debate on the resolution as to nomination of the committee—That the committee do consist of twenty-five members to be nominated by the House, and of all the gentlemen of the long robe, members of this House.

Mr. COX reminded the House that there were other members of the legal profession in the House besides the "gentlemen of the long robe," and proposed the addition of Mr. Hadfield and himself. He suggested that the words "legal profession" be substituted for "long robe."

Mr. WARREN said, one advantage might result from the suggestion of Mr. Cox—The "gentlemen of the long robe" were generally feed, and, in that view of the matter, perhaps nothing could be more objectionable than to have a great number of members of the long robe upon the committee.

Mr. FITZROY suggested that the course to be taken with respect to Mr. Cox and Mr. Hadfield would be for some one to propose the addition of their names to the committee. But the resolution in its original form was carried.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

Mr. MALINS rose to move clauses, the object of which, he said, was to secure compensation to the proctors for the abolition of their offices, and for the other losses they would sustain under this Bill. When the Bill was originally introduced, the proposition of the Government was, that district probate should be allowed to an amount not exceeding £1,500; but that limitation was rejected by the committee; and the result would be most injurious to the interests of the proctors. The Government did not propose to provide compensation to the proctors; and the question he wished to put to the committee was, whether a Bill which destroyed the occupations of so many men should be permitted to pass without an act of justice to those who would be so materially affected by it? Although his observations would refer principally to the proctors of London, they would not be confined to them, but would extend to the proctors of Chester, York, Durham, Exeter, and various other places throughout the country. About 120 proctors were to be found in Doctors' Commons, where the profession had existed with exclusive privileges for a period of not less than six centuries, and the business had been handed down from father to son. That business had been extensive and valuable, although perhaps not sufficiently lucrative to enable the proctors to realise large fortunes. The Chancery Commissioners had reported most favourably upon the manner in which the business had been conducted; and in 1854 he (Mr. Malins) presented two petitions, one signed by 258 leading bankers and merchants of London, and the other from 112 of the principal solicitors and conveyancers, both bearing testimony to the satisfactory manner in which the business of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury had been conducted. As the Bill now stood that business would be totally annihilated. The Attorney-General had resisted all appeals for compensation when the Bill was originally introduced, upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the district courts was limited, and, therefore, the most valuable business would still remain with the London proctors. Even under the original form of the Bill the London proctors would have lost 79 per cent. of their business, but as it now stood they would lose it altogether, as there were forty-one new districts created, in which wills could be proved with the same force as in London. Then, again, all the proctors of all the diocesan courts were eligible to practise at Doctors' Commons, and the judge of the court was to have power to grant the same privilege to as many persons as he might think fit. The Attorney-General had admitted, that, in the cases of the proctors of York and Chester, there was a ground for compensation; but, in admitting that, he also admitted the principle of giving compensation for loss of business. If they were ready to give compensation to the professional men of York and Chester, they must give it to those of London also. Not fewer than sixty of the 120 London proctors had passed middle life. By this Bill their business was annihilated, and they and their families left destitute. The expense of getting into the business of a proctor was very great—the premium was usually from 800 to 1,000 guineas, and other items brought the sum on an average to £1,200. One of these gentleman stated that he had been forty-five years a proctor; that he had a family of fifteen, all of whom were now of adult age; that he had been unable to make any other provision for his family than that of an insurance upon his life; and that the effect of the Bill would be to curtail him of three-fourths of his professional income, and expose his family to extreme privation. He had other statements of a similar kind, all of them representing the great expense which they had incurred on entering the profession, and the loss and ruin to which they would be exposed by the passing of the Bill before the House. He mentioned these cases, to show, that, having entered the profession on the faith of its permanency, they were now entitled to compensation for the losses they must sustain. The Commissioners had expressed an opinion that if the profession of the proctors was not preserved as an exclusive profession, justice demanded that some compensation should be made to them for the loss which they would suffer. But they had what might be called a parliamentary title to compensation. In the Bill of 1854 there was a provision by which the exclusive privileges of the proctors were continued to them for ten years, but it was soon seen that this provision fell far short of the justice of the case, and the Bills of 1855 and 1856 contained clauses identical with those to which he was now asking the committee to give its assent. The Attorney-General, in moving the second reading of the Bill of 1855, said, that though he did not think that the loss to the proctors would be so great as they anticipated, yet they were entitled to some compensation, and he proposed that they should be compensated by an annuity equal to one-half of the clear income then received by them from testamentary business. This was the proposition which he himself now made. In 1856 the Attorney-General spoke much to the same effect. He could not, therefore, understand what was his reason for departing this year from the course which he had taken in the two previous years. He had shown the justice of this case, and would support it by reference to what had been done by Parliament in similar instances. In all cases in which existing institutions and existing bodies had been abolished for the public good, it had been thought better to err on the side of liberality than on the reverse. The Masters and the Six Clerks in Chancery received compensation. In 1854, 1855, and 1856, the Chancellor of the Exchequer assented to the principle of compensating the proctors, and therefore he was estopped from now objecting that they held no offices, and were therefore not entitled to compensation. The fact was, that the proctors held their offices under an Act of Parliament which secured to them exclusive privileges, not merely for their own benefit, but also for the good of the public. It would no doubt be urged that the public burdens were very great, and the House might be reminded of the increase which would result from the passing of the Civil Service Superannuation Bill. It would indeed be a question for the House to consider whether this Bill was worth what was to be paid for it; but the clauses which he now proposed to introduce would add nothing to the public burdens. There were certain fees paid now; and these it was proposed to continue, so as to pay to each proctor, for the remainder of his life, a pension equal to one-half of his emoluments. Most of these men were advanced in years, and probably but few of these pensions would continue payable after a period of twenty-five or thirty years. The country would have no great reason to complain, if, when the Government propounded a measure conferring a great public advantage, the price at which that advantage was purchased was the continuance for a limited time of the same payments which were now made, and which must undergo a gradual diminution. He now moved the clauses of which he had given notice. The effect of the first was, "that the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, by examination on oath or otherwise, may inquire into and ascertain the net annual amount of the profits arising from the transaction of proctorial business by such proctors, on an average of five years immediately preceding the commencement of this Act, or of such proportion of five years as shall have elapsed since he was admitted to practise in such courts, and shall award to such proctor an annual payment during his life of such amount as shall be equal in value to one-half of the net profits derived by him in respect of proctorial business upon the said average of five years immediately preceding the commencement of this Act, or of such proportion of the said five years as shall have elapsed since his admission to practise in such courts."

The Attorney-General said it would be necessary in point of form to defer the discussion on Mr. Malins' clause until several clauses to be proposed by the Government had been disposed of.

A clause was then proposed for granting compensation to registrars, &c., of existing courts.

The Attorney-General said, that, by the abolition of the local courts, a number of officers would be entirely thrown out of employment. Some of them had been appointed anterior, and some of them subsequent to the passing of certain Acts which took away the right of compensation. The first class of officers had a legal claim to compensation, which this clause was intended to satisfy. The second class would also receive compensation, but its amount would be regulated on a different scale.

Sir H. Willoughby wished to know the probable amount of compensation required to be given.

Mr. Malins said, the Attorney-General had on a former occasion stated that there were 149 proctors, whose average incomes amounted to £700 a year, and that, supposing them to receive one-half, the amount would be £52,152.

The Attorney-General.—By a return in 1832 the whole amount of the emoluments of the judges, registrars, and deputy-registrars was given. The salaries of the judges amounted to £13,271, of the registrars to £28,076, and of the deputy-registrars to £15,851. But these sums included the salaries of a number of persons who would be appointed to offices under the new Bill, which would make a considerable deduction from the amount. The registrars would be divided into two classes—those appointed before the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, and those appointed since that time. The number now in existence who were appointed before the passing of the statute was extremely small. The aggregate amount of the salaries of those who would remain after the appointment to the new offices, and have to be compensated, amounted to about £29,000. He did not know the relative number of officers appointed before and since the passing of the statute; but supposing half the number to have been appointed before the passing of the statute, the sum to be provided for them would be about £15,000. The payment might very well be raised by fees paid into the testamentary fee fund, and from that into the consolidated fund, which would have to bear the compensation. The practical result would be, that the compensation would be levied in the shape of a tax upon the suitors resorting to the court.

Sir F. Kelly understood that the registrars who were to do the business would be paid by fees. Now, if the fees were to be paid to these parties, he wished to know how the compensation was to be paid out of fees?

Sir H. Willoughby said, if he was right in his view, the compensation would be much greater than that which was stated. He had met with a document from which it appeared, that, if they took into account the local courts, the amount would be £63,000.

Mr. Hadfield thought the compensation would be at least double that which was stated. They had no data to go upon. Upon what fund were these compensations to be charged? If he read the 6th clause aright, they would come out of the consolidated fund. He thought they ought not to come out of the fees. The compensation proposed would be making the fortunes of many of these gentlemen. There were few men who would not abandon their profession if they were to have one-half of their average profits secured to them for life. Mr. Malins cited the case of the Six Clerks, and argued that because £30,000 a year was granted to them, they ought to grant a large amount to the proctors. Why, a more flagrant job was never perpetrated than that of the Six Clerks. The claims for compensation under this Bill amounted to 386 already; and he was of opinion that the amount of compensation which those various officers would be entitled to receive would be found to be not less than £200,000 a year during their lives; and to any such proposal as that he should offer his most strenuous opposition.

The Attorney-General said the sum he mentioned was arrived at after deducting from the aggregate amount of existing salaries the salaries to be given to the parties to be appointed under this Bill. They would thus find the amount of compensation would be less than £29,000, the amount at which he stated it. With regard to the question of Sir F. Kelly, he would find that the registrars were to be paid by salaries. No doubt it was intended that fees should be paid to district registrars at first; but as soon as they could form an adequate notion of the amount of business that would be done in a district, they should fix a salary, and the whole of the fees would go into a general fund, and be applicable to compensation. The object of clause 6 was to insure a proper return of the fees. Instead of fees being paid to the registrar, stamps would be issued; and as the Treasury would thus become the recipient of the fee fund, the charges for compensation would be on the consolidated fund.

Mr. W. Williams maintained that they ought to know the amount of compensation to be awarded to each person, and it ought to appear in a schedule. When the question of compensating the Six Clerks was before the House, he objected to the amount being fixed by the Lord Chancellor, and he received from the Government an assurance that the amount awarded would not be more than from £500 to £700 a year. The Lord Chancellor gave each of them from £5,000 to £7,000 a year, and also £2,500 a year during a period of seven years after their decease, to be left by will to whom they pleased.

Mr. Hadfield moved the omission of the proviso giving compensation to Mr. Henry Raikes, registrar of the diocese of Chester. The proviso was, he contended, in contravention of the Act of 1836, Mr. Raikes having received his appointment in 1837.

Mr. Roebuck appealed to the Attorney-General to say whether or not the clause in the Act of 1836 applied to the case of Mr. Raikes. For his own part, he protested against such an application of public money.

The Attorney-General said there could be no doubt that if Mr. Raikes was appointed since 1836, he could not claim compensation under the Act. But he was of opinion, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed with him, that it would not be right to produce an Act passed twenty years ago, and use it to debar all who had been subsequently appointed from obtaining compensation. Two scales had been devised, one giving full compensation to those who were not barred by the statute, another applying to the case of those who were removable at pleasure. He could not imagine a stricter measure of justice; and as regarded the case under consideration, he did not admit that the Government had at all erred on the side of liberality.

Mr. Roebuck was surprised at what had fallen from the Attorney-General. Twenty years ago a gentleman was appointed under an Act of Parliament, upon the express provision that if any alteration took place he should have no compensation. For twenty years this gentleman had received £5,000 a year. It was indecent in him to petition Parliament for compensation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Treasury had entire discretion under the Bill with regard to compensation. They would take into consideration the legal and equitable claims of every case, and thereupon decide upon the amount of compensation to be paid. A statement of the amount of compensation could not, therefore, be made without prejudging these cases.

In answer to a question from Sir H. Willoughby,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that there were many instances of compensation being granted for the abolition of offices held at the pleasure of the Crown. The Treasury had great experience in the matter of compensation, and, although there might be some cases of excess, yet, from the many complaints he had received of inadequacy, he did not think they were open to the charge of profusion.

Mr. Wigram asked whether the Treasury would bonâ fide exercise a discretion in each case?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that the Treasury endeavoured to act justly to every individual, and considered each case on its own merits.

The committee then divided — For the amendment, 81; against it, 149: majority, 68.

Mr. Malins proceeded to move his compensation clauses.

Mr. Wigram suggested that the exclusive privilege of proving wills should not be preserved to the proctors.

Mr. Malins said that the proctors looked upon this privilege as worthless, and were quite willing that the profession should be thrown open. In short, they felt that the profession was gone.

Mr. Roebuck did not think that a sufficient case had been made out for compensation. Alterations in the law had ruined the special pleaders, the county courts had absorbed all the civil business of the circuits, the power-loom had beggared the hand-loom weavers, and railroads had made bankrupt the turnpike trusts; and yet in none of these cases had compensation been given. The proctors had enjoyed a monopoly for 600 years, handed down from father to son; they had done no service to the public for which they had not been amply remunerated; and, therefore, he did not see the justice of the claim for compensation.

Mr. Whiteside denied that the county courts formed a case in point. The county courts provided many good places for lawyers, and extended the profession of the law; but here a profession was destroyed, and no appointments were reserved for the proctors.

Mr. Kirk said that the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland had taken away the business of the Irish bar, and no claim for compensation had been made or acknowledged.

The Attorney-General said he wished to call the attention of the committee to the proposition before the House. As he understood the proposition of Mr. Malins, it was this—that the proctors who were to receive compensation for the loss of business in causes testamentary, should not have any monopoly in that respect in future. What he (the Attorney-General) proposed, then, was this—that an average should be taken of the gains of the proctors for three years before and three years after the passing of the Bill, and if it turned out that their professional emoluments during the three years subsequent to the passing of the Bill were diminished below the average of the three years previous to the passing of the Act, that in that case compensation should be given to the extent of the loss. He thought between the two propositions the committee should judge. By the proposition which he himself made in the Bill of last year, and to which the Government were pledged, the proctors were to receive, in the shape of an annuity, half of the clear yearly gains which they could show they had derived during the period of three years before the passing of the Bill from that particular source of business. He was not going to recede from that proposition; but the proposition he now made was, in his opinion, a more advantageous one, in some respects, for the proctors; for he believed the proctors, in many instances, would, instead of suffering any diminution of business under the new arrangement, have an increased amount of business. He, however, was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the committee.

Mr. Westhead said there was this objection to the proposal of the Attorney-General, that if a proctor died during the three years, he would not get any compensation.

Mr. Rolt said, it was of importance that all the probate courts should be put on a common footing. One rule should apply to all. The judge of the London Court of Probate should have the power of saying who should practise in the London and district courts.

Lord Hotham drew attention to the hardship the Bill would inflict on the clerical surrogates in the North of England. These surrogates, in many cases, were clergymen who had small incomes, and if their offices were abolished without compensation, it would be a great hardship on them. He had received several communications from surrogates on this subject. In one case a surrogate had held his surrogacy fifty-eight years. He was vicar of Hull, and had to provide three curates at £100 a year each, leaving him only £390 a year, more than half of which came from the surrogate fees. He appealed to the Attorney-General whether persons in the position of clerical surrogates were not as much entitled to compensation as the proctors.

Mr. Wigram trusted that anything which might be done in favour of surrogates in the province of York would be extended to all other clerical surrogates.

The Attorney-General admitted that the claims of the clerical surrogates were deserving of consideration, and should not, therefore, oppose Lord Hotham's proposition, as embodied in the clause of which he had given notice. He had been asked by Mr. Henley whether an archdeacon performing the duties in person of the archdeacon's court would be entitled to compensation in the same way as any other person performing those duties. The question was whether the archdeacon would be included in the term judge. He (the Attorney-General) did not think he could as the Bill stood; but if Mr. Henley thought the archdeacon in such cases entitled to compensation, it might be provided for by moving, in the interpretation clause, that the word judge should include the archdeacon. All he would ask the committee was, to determine the principle of compensation generally, after which the Bill would in this respect require to be remodelled, and the clauses embracing the subject would be brought up at a later stage.

Mr. Malins was grateful to the Government for the way in which they had recognised the principle he had put forward. Having the option offered him by the Government, he preferred to take the clauses as he had proposed them, knowing that they would satisfy the proctors.

Mr. Atherton said he should prefer the inflexible proposition of Mr. Malins to the flexible one of the Attorney-General. As the testamentary monopoly of the proctors was entirely gone, the Attorney-General could not do less than propose a compensation to them, as he had done last year.

The Attorney-General was willing that the clauses of last year's Bill should form part of the present Bill, it being understood that the whole of the proctors' monopoly should be done away with. If Mr. Malins would withdraw his clauses, he would undertake that they should be introduced on the Report being brought up.

This suggestion was agreed to, and the clauses were withdrawn.

Mr. Walpole moved a clause, giving compensation to the chief or managing clerks of proctors.

The Attorney-General suggested that this ought only to apply to articled clerks.

The clause was negatived.

Sir H. Willoughby proposed a clause providing for the publication of accounts, which was agreed to.

Sir F. Kelly moved to insert before clause 10, the following:—"The judge of the Court shall be a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council."—Agreed to.

Mr. Malins moved a clause giving a claim to compensation on a certain scale to articled clerks of proctors, which was opposed by the Attorney-General.

Mr. Ayrton suggested that the articled clerks might have relief given to them by altering the 38th clause, which restrained them from practising otherwise than as proctors; so as to enable them to practise as solicitors in the same manner as their masters were allowed to do.

On a division, the numbers were—For the clause, 57; against it, 113: majority, 56.

These being all the new clauses,

The Attorney-General said he should move to recommit the bill pro formâ in order to introduce amendments. He proposed to take the report on the amendments on Thursday, and the third reading on Friday.

Tuesday, August 4.

Probate and Letters of Administration Bill.

Mr. Hadfield objected to the arrangement of the districts.

The Attorney-General defended the proposed arrangement of districts as being, on the whole, the most convenient one for the public. The schedule was left open for the consideration of the House, and he himself took no part in the matter. Since the arrangement of the schedule, he had received innumerable applications from persons whose interests would be affected, asking for alterations in the schedule. These representations he had carefully considered. There were a number of specific proposals on the paper upon which the House would decide.

Mr. Spooner said, that Mr. Malins, who had originated the amendments on the paper, was absent under the impression that there would be no discussion.

After some discussion, the House went into committee, and the amendments were agreed to pro formâ.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The House went into committee on this Bill, after an amendment by Mr. Warren to defer it for three months had been negatived without a division.

On clause 6, the Attorney-General proposed that the court should be called the "Court for Divorce and Causes Matrimonial."

In answer to Mr. Lygon,

The Attorney-General said that any marriage solemnised between British subjects under British law, whether in this country or India, would be dissoluble by this court.

Mr. Ayrton considered that the jurisdiction of the court was founded on residence, and that it would have no jurisdiction over parties not domiciled in this country.

Sir F. Kelly said, the clause merely transferred to the new court the jurisdiction now exercised by the various ecclesiastical courts. It did not at all alter the law with regard to marriages in India.

Mr. Gladstone said, he did not see what provision was made for meeting cases where adultery was committed in India, and which were provided for by the existing law.

The Attorney-General would suppose the case of two parties resident in India, one of whom instituted a suit for cruelty or adultery in the ecclesiastical courts. At present the proceedings were initiated before the tribunals in India, and when they obtained a divorce à mensâ et thoro they applied in the ordinary way for a divorce bill. Whatever they could now do in the ecclesiastical courts, they could do in the new court.

Mr. Gladstone hoped that after this Bill was passed we were not still to have all the difficulties and anomalies of the parliamentary system. He understood that the Bill was to apply to all the dependencies of this country. He hoped the Attorney-General would make this matter clear.

The Attorney-General said they were at present dealing with the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, which was bodily transferred to the new court. A suit for divorce between parties resident in India must still be conducted before the courts there. If they subsequently came to this country, they might proceed under this Bill.

Mr. Cox wished it to be clearly understood how parties in India having obtained a divorce à mensâ et thoro, were to proceed. Would they have to proceed by Bill in Parliament as now?

The Attorney-General said, that if the parties remained in India they could not resort to the jurisdiction given by this Bill, which did not apply to the colonies, the Isle of Man, Scotland, or Ireland. No doubt it would be followed by a similar statute for Ireland, and probably for India.

Mr. Gladstone.—Then it appears that not only a further provision but a further Act will be required.

Sir E. Perry suggested that a new clause should be introduced, to meet the case of parties in India, and the decision of the committee taken as to whether the power of dissolving marriage should be vested in a single judge in India or in the new court.

The Attorney-General said, that, if the parties remained in India, they would not, of course, apply to the new court; but if they came to this country they would at once be subject to it. Even now an Act of Parliament could not be obtained unless the party was present in England.

Mr. Gladstone said, the discussion had led to the discovery of a most important defect in the operation of the Bill. It had been introduced as a Bill entirely to do away with private divorce Bills; but it now appeared it would not have that effect. The question was, whether the arm of the new court would reach as far as that of the House of Lords now did; if not, it would still be necessary to have private Acts.

Mr. Walpole admitted that if this Bill did not put an end to divorces by Acts of the Legislature, it would fail in its main object. With regard to India, the difficulty always found under the old system was, that the witnesses could not leave that country. To meet this, the Act of Geo. 4 was passed, to enable the evidence to be taken under a commission. If a similar power were introduced into this Bill it would meet all the difficulty.

Lord J. Manners wished to know what would be the effect of the Bill with regard to persons remaining in the colonies.

The Attorney-General said, a person resident abroad could now sue, under certain restrictions, in any court in England, and parties in the colonies would have the same right in the new court, subject to any regulations which might be made. It would be competent for the different colonial Legislatures to establish courts of divorce; if not, the parties resident there could come to this court.

Mr. Gladstone said, that, it appeared, in fact, that they would not put an end to legislative divorces by this Bill; for it would not extend to those cases where the wife went abroad after committing adultery.

The Attorney-General said, that he would, at a future time, bring up a clause to give power to serve process out of the jurisdiction of the court.

This clause, together with clause 7, was agreed to.

On clause 8, Mr. Malins doubted whether the great law officers proposed to act as judges of this court would have time to attend to the duties cast upon them as such judges.

The Attorney-General confessed that he did not think that the number of judges selected to sit with the ordinary judge was so large as convenience required. If the committee would now pass the clause, he would bring it up again at a future time, with a view to enlarge the class of judges to sit with the judge in ordinary in divorce cases, so as to take in all the judges of the superior courts.

Mr. Malins doubted the advisability of this plan, inasmuch as it now took a month before a common law judge could be obtained to sit with the judges in equity.

After some further discussion, the chairman was ordered to report progress.

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill.

Mr. Whiteside moved the second reading of this Bill, which he said was to repeal a clause in a previous Act, which deprived Sir T. Wilson of the power of applying to the Court of Chancery for power to build. It was supposed that the object of this gentleman was to build on Hampstead-heath, but that he could not do without a special Act of Parliament. There was neither the legal power nor the intention to build on the Heath. The road along which Sir T. Wilson desired to build had no more to do with Hampstead-heath than the top of St. Paul's, yet the House had passed a clause prohibiting this gentleman from submitting his case to the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Malins seconded the motion.

Mr. Cox moved that the debate be adjourned.

Sir H. Willoughby said, that however attempts might be made to prevent Sir T. Wilson building on Hampstead-heath, at his death his successors would be at liberty to do so.

The debate was adjourned to Wednesday.

Criminal Law Consolidation Bills.

These Bills, which stood for second reading, were, at the suggestion of Mr. Henley, postponed till Friday; when, Lord Palmerston said, the Government will state what course they intend to adopt with regard to them.

Wednesday, August 5.

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill.

On the motion for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading of this Bill,

Lord R. Grosvenor said, that this Bill had been brought in for the purpose of repealing certain clauses in an Act of Parliament passed so recently as last year. That was an Act which, as originally introduced, instead of compelling persons who wished to procure an alteration in the settlement of entailed property to have a special Act of Parliament for that purpose, enabled the Court of Chancery to deal with such settlements. That was a great novelty in legislation, and the Bill was referred to a select committee, who, after duly considering its provisions, thought it was dangerous to transfer such a power to the Court of Chancery without accompanying it with certain safeguards in the interest of the public; and the Bill was withdrawn in 1855. In 1856 it was again brought forward. The House agreed to the Bill in the shape in which it was eventually passed into a law. But the House of Lords, by a small majority, rejected the particular clause which prevented the Court of Chancery reviewing the decisions of Parliament. The House of Commons, for reasons urged by the Attorney-General, insisted on the re-insertion of the clause. The Lords accordingly assented to the restoration of the clause in question, and the Bill was passed at the end of last session. Now, however, almost before that Act had come into operation, Mr. Whiteside and Mr. Malins actually proposed to the House to give up the safeguards in question. He hoped the House would not be guilty of so stultifying its proceedings; and he should therefore move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Mr. Butt, as the member of the select committee at whose instance the clause in question was inserted in the original Bill, briefly traced the history of the Act of last year as it passed through Parliament, and opposed the Bill before the House on the ground that it was a public measure for the private relief of Sir Thomas Wilson.

Mr. Scholefield said every one knew that if it had not been a question of Hampstead-heath, no such clause would have been inserted in the Act of last year. The whole power of Parliament was brought to bear upon one individual, to deprive him of rights which every other individual in the State enjoyed, because he had the misfortune to be the owner of property which the London public coveted and wished to obtain on their own terms.

Mr. Malins said that up to the time of passing the Act last year, whenever a will was drawn defectively, so that the tenant for life had no power of granting leases, it became necessary to apply to Parliament for an Estate Bill, which cost from £300 to £500, and sometimes a larger amount. The Bill which passed last year was the second introduced by the Government with the same object—viz. to transfer the power thus exercised by Parliament to the Court of Chancery. He gave his cordial support to that Bill, but he warned the Attorney-General against the clause which it was now sought to repeal. But a short time ago the Attorney-General told him that his object in supporting the clause last year was to give the Metropolitan Board of Works an opportunity of making an arrangement with Sir T. Wilson for the purchase of Hampstead-heath; but that, as the Board did not seem inclined to make any arrangement, he would support the present Bill, which would repeal that clause. The Act of last year enabled the Court of Chancery to confer powers of leasing for agricultural, mining, and building purposes upon tenants for life, and enabled trustees to sell and exchange property, and so forth. But a clause provided that the Act should not apply to persons who had before made application to Parliament unsuccessfully for these powers. He believed there was no other instance of the rejection of an Estate Bill, except that of Sir T. Wilson, who, fifteen years ago, unsuccessfully made application to Parliament for these powers; but lapse of time altered circumstances, and what was inexpedient in 1842 might be expedient in 1857. It did not, however, rest on that argument. The application of Sir T. Wilson was rejected, because it was supposed that he was going to build on Hampstead-heath. It would have been prejudicial to Sir T. Wilson's interest to do so, and the law as it stood prevented his doing it. The whole value of the clause in the Act last year was that it applied to Sir T. Wilson, and the whole value of this Bill was that it would relieve Sir T. Wilson from restrictions which could not be justified. An unprecedented and unwarrantable exception had been introduced into a general law, which would last only during the life of a man more than sixty years of age. He therefore hoped the House would support this Bill, and redeem Parliament from the stigma of such an act of injustice.

Mr. Barrow said he had supported the introduction of the clause in the Bill last year upon general principles. If Parliament had decided against any person, and that person wished to appeal against the decision, he might appeal to Parliament, but he ought not to be allowed to obtain the reversal of a decision of Parliament by appealing to an inferior tribunal.

Mr. Whiteside.—The Bill was intended to repeal a clause in a general law passed last year. When that clause was originally introduced, the Bill was thrown out because it had the clause in it; and the Attorney-General, who had been induced to consent to its being put in on the second occasion (upon the representation of the metropolitan members that it was intended to buy the property), was now ready to support the Bill for its repeal. If the public wanted the property they ought to buy it, but not attempt to compel the owner to receive less than its value. The Metropolitan Board of Works, after entering into the consideration of the purchase of Hampstead-heath, passed a resolution that it was not their intention at present to deal for it. Sir T. Wilson wished neither to build upon nor enclose Hampstead-heath. The law prevented his meddling with it; and all the alteration of the law which he wanted was, to be allowed to lay his case before the Lord Chancellor, which every one else might do except himself.

Mr. HADFIELD opposed the Bill. Notwithstanding the prestige and power of the two learned members who had introduced it, he trusted that the House would not stultify itself by rescinding various former decisions.

Sir J. GRAHAM thought great injustice had been done in the various decisions to which the House had come on this question. Sir T. Wilson wished to make certain arrangements for his property, but was stopped by the confused manner in which the covenants under which he held it had been prepared. Whether he sought for justice through the means of a private Act, or by a general one, Sir T. Wilson was still denied what was only common justice. Every one, of course, would say, by all means keep Hampstead-heath open; but no one would say, keep it open at the expense of injustice towards a private individual. Besides, it was not now sought to obstruct the public access to the heath, but to build on the Finchley-road, which was at some distance.

The House divided—For the second reading, 77; against it, 59; majority, 18. The Bill was then read a second time.

Thursday, Aug. 6.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The debate on clause 8 was resumed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that Mr. Malins having suggested the other evening that delay might arise from difficulty in obtaining the attendance of the chief common law judges to sit in this court, he had since considered the matter, and submitted it to those who had had the charge of this Bill in the other House. The result was that he thought that it would be better to leave the constitution of the court as it stood. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice had arrived at the conclusion, that, if the court was left as it stood, there would be no difficulty in its meeting a sufficient number of times in the year for the despatch of the business committed to it. The Lord Chancellor justly observed that no inconvenience had resulted from having one of the chief judges to sit with him in the hearing of divorce and matrimonial causes; for under an existing Act either of them might appoint a judge to sit for him at Nisi Prius in the sittings after term; and this power might, of course, be exercised so as to secure the requisite number of days for this court to sit. In all probability the range of business would be very small, and would not demand more than two or three days at the end of every term.

Lord J. MANNERS suggested that if, as Mr. Napier had pointed out, the Bill were applied to Ireland, a difficulty might arise from the fact that the chiefs of the Common Pleas and Exchequer were Roman Catholics, and that their religious tenets would prevent them from administering the law. There was nothing, moreover, in the law of England to prevent some of the judges nominated under this clause from being Roman Catholics. He perceived that by clause 12, power was given to the Sovereign to make the new court a court of circuit. Well, undoubtedly, if the law was to be administered cheaply, and brought home even to the middle classes, the court must be a court of circuit; but he wished to know whether it was really the intention of the Attorney-General and of Government to send the Lord Chancellor and the other judges of the court through the country to administer the law. If that were the case, all he could say was, that it would, he believed, be the first time that the Lord Chancellor had been sent tramping through the country for such a purpose. He should like to know at what period of the year the court of circuit was to administer this inestimable boon of divorce. If, as was now represented, only three or four cases a-year were likely to arise, he could not understand why Parliament should be kept sitting till September in order to pass this Bill.

Mr. MALINS coincided in the opinion, that, if there should be a great increase in the number of cases, neither the Lord Chancellor nor any one of the chiefs would be able to attend the new court with sufficient frequency for the despatch of business.

Lord J. RUSSELL was surprised that the Attorney-General should have been so easily satisfied with the statement of the Lord Chancellor, who it appears, finding that there have been few cases in the House of Lords, thinks that if at the end of term he can get one of the Chief Justices and the Chief Baron, to sit with him, the court will be able to dispose of the three or four cases, which he supposes will be the limit, in a few days. But if this is to be a general remedy, we may expect an increase. Bnt he could understand that it would not increase, because this was not the way in which a poor man would seek a remedy, who, having probably some experience of an attorney's charges, would be so alarmed at the thought of the expense of employing an attorney in the country to set in motion an attorney in London (however much he might wish for a remedy), that he would forego the remedy which Parliament had provided. But it would be possible to enable persons desiring to obtain this remedy, to present their petitions to a court in the country—to a judge at assize. The facts might be ascertained by witnesses competent to give evidence in that court, and, the facts having been found, a judge of assize would be perfectly competent to make his report to the court in London, and the ultimate decision might be made by that court. It would be preferable to have various and different courts, even at the risk of there being some uncertainty and variety in the decisions, than what is now proposed. It would be better if the superior courts in London, and the judges of assize were enabled to afford a remedy.

Mr. HENLEY did not believe that all the business of the new court would be got over in two or three days at the end of term. With regard to the promise of bringing the remedy within the reach of the poor man, it was an utter delusion.

Mr. WARREN contended that the court would be altogether inefficient, and pointed out that the weight of business now pressing upon the Chief Justices would render it impossible for them to assist at a court for trying divorce cases. It had not been explained whether the court was to be stationary or itinerary—it was to sit when her Majesty in Council might appoint; but it appeared to him that for the Lord Chancellor to go down to Cornwall would not be exactly in accordance with the usage or the seemliness of that high office.

Mr. COLLINS, with the view of bringing the remedy home to the door of the poor man, proposed that the county-court judgss should have jurisdiction in divorce cases; for the county courts were the only civil tribunals to which the poor had access, the higher courts being too expensive for them.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the House of Lords heard these cases in a very different manner from that which the proposed court would adopt. The evidence of the witnesses would be taken at the trial, and upon that evidence the court would pronounce its judgment. When there was an application for a new trial the question would be heard and decided at once, and in as short a space of time as similar applications were decided now by the common law courts at Westminster, where five or six applications for new trials were frequently heard and decided in a single morning. He did uot anticipate that there would be any such great addition to the number of divorce cases under the new law as some seemed to anticipate, nor did he believe that the expense of the proceedings would be so alarming as had been suggested. In Scotland, where divorce was easily obtained, there had been but ninety-five cases in five years, and the average cost of rescinding a marriage in that country was about £30, and if no opposition was offered, about £20.

Mr. AYRTON thought that the question which had been raised by Lord J. Russell ought to be seriously considered. It was impossible to decide what the court was to be till it was known what sort of justice it was to administer; or until it was determined whether there were to be local courts, or some machinery by which every man could for £10 or £20 bring his case before some tribunal for trial. He believed that under this Bill a cost of £100 or £200 would be incurred before a man could get redress.

Mr. POWELL said that he thought it would be less difficult to get together three puisne judges than three chief justices; and as by a recent enactment the Lord Chancellor could call in the assistance of the common law puisne judges in Chancery, he did not see why they could not be members of this court. With regard to the suggestion of giving the power of divorce to the county courts, he thought it was intended to throw ridicule on the Bill, and he deprecated any notion of giving a jurisdiction in divorce to such courts.

Mr. BUTT said, the proposition to give jurisdiction to the county courts, so far from being calculated to throw ridicule on this measure, would carry out the principle of the Bill by bringing the same justice to the cottage of the poor man as to the door of the rich, which the court now to be constituted would not do.

Lord Stanley said that before he supported the proposition of extending the jurisdiction in divorce to the county courts, he should be desirous of ascertaining, not merely whether the judges of the county courts were competent to deal with these questions, but whether they had leisnre to undertake such an addition to the business of those courts.

Mr. Bowyer said if this was a poor man's Bill it would be impossible to stop short of giving county courts the power of dissolving marriages. And if that course should be adopted, an extraordinary facility would be given for divorce and for collusion. Should a man and woman quarrel, what would be easier than for them to qualify themselves to obtain a divorce. Parties would think no more of going to the county court to get a divorce than to sue for a debt of £5.

Mr. Macaulay said, at present, a poor man could not contest an acre of land, or bring an action for libel or defamation, without coming into the superior courts; and he did not see why an ambulatory court should be constituted to settle disputes between men and their wives.

The committee divided. The numbers were: — For the clause, 105; against it, 71: majority, 34.

The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 9, the Attorney-General said, the Bill required a petition in the first instance, which would be of the most informal and in expensive character. If the respondents appeared and opposed the petition, it would lead to a trial being directed. The judge ordinary would direct the trial, but the ultimate decision must be before the full court. If the question of fact was to be tried before a jury upon an issue directed for that purpose, the order directing the issue might be made by the judge ordinary alone. That would be, of course, in a contested case. If it were an uncontested case, it would still be the duty of the court to take evidence before itself to ascertain the fact that adultery had taken place, and then the court would proceed at once to pronounce sentence. That must be before the full court.

Mr. Drummond said there was no means of giving relief to the poor except by extending to the county courts the power of making decrees of judicial separation in cases of ill-treatment, and proposed an amendment with this view, but which he consented to withdraw for the present.

On clause 12, relating to the sittings of the court,

The Attorney-General said, that it was not intended that the court should be itinerant.—The clause was agreed to.

On clause 15, the Attorney-General stated that he should be prepared to introduce a clause giving compensation to proctors for matrimonial business, in the same way as was done in the Probates Bill.

The motion for reporting progress was then agreed to.

Probates and Letters of Administration Bill.

In answer to Lord Goderich,

The Attorney-General said, he saw no prospect of going on with this Bill before Tuesday, but he would put it in the paper for Friday, and if not proceeded with then, he would fix it positively for 12 o'clock on Tuesday.

Wills, &c, of British Subjects Abroad Bill.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill.

The House resolved itself into committee on this Bill, after an ineffectual opposition by Mr. Cox; but on the motion of Mr. Ayrton, carried by a majority of 1, the chairman was ordered to report progress.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent.)

Friday Evening.

The Mersey Conservancy Bill is still pending; and the Liverpool interest has assumed an appearance of vitality quite equal to that displayed at any period of the proceedings. To a great extent the Committee in the Lords have negatived the decision of the Commons, inasmuch as they have come to a resolution that they will not interfere with the Liverpool Town Dues; and that they will not pass the Bill unless compensation is paid to the Corporation of Liverpool. This resolution is, in fact, an adoption of the views expressed by Lord Derby in the discussion on second reading; and although his Lordship's motion was rejected by a majority of the House, still the benefit intended to be conferred by it has been granted to the Corporation by this Committee. The three parties interested—viz. the promoters of the Mersey Conservancy Bill, the Liverpool Corporation, and the Liverpool Dock Company respectively, have made propositions, founded on the resolution of the Committee;* so that, whatever may be the result, an issue is made upon which the Committee can try the real merits of the case between all parties. Anything is better than an adjournment of the question, which was anticipated a few weeks ago, as it seemed impossible to lay the whole case before the Committee in the Lords in the time limited for that purpose. The decision of the Committee quite bears out the generally admitted theory, that the Lords regard vested rights and interests with a much more jealous eye than the Commons.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

Friday Evening.

Ipswich.—The decision on this petition was only made just in time for press last week. In Mr. Cobbold's case four cases of bribery were proved, and the guilty knowledge came very nearly home to the sitting member, as one case of bribery was reported to have been committed by Arthur Thomas Cobbold. The Committee reported generally on both petitions that the payments made for travelling expenses had been systematically in excess of the actual disbursement of voters, although the fact of corrupt intention had not been proved against either member.

Beverley.—Edward Auchmuty Glover, Esq., a member of the bar, has not only been unseated, but stands a fair chance of being prosecuted by the House of Commons. Mr. Glover was unseated on the ground of want of qualification. He made the declaration in the form prescribed by the Act of Parliament in respect of property which, as he alleged, he was entitled to under a recent marriage. There is a strangely romantic, or rather melo-dramatic, story connected with this said marriage, which would be out of place in these columns, but suffice it to say that the committee unanimously decided that the evidence should be laid before the Attorney-General, with a view to further proceedings being taken in the case.

Drogheda.—There is an old saying, "that one man may steal a horse, whereas another may not look into a stable window;" and certainly the decision of the Committee on the Drogheda Election Petition, as compared with that of the Committee on the Mayo case, seems to confirm this. The stories of Mayo and Drogheda Elections seem to agree precisely. The voters were cursed, and pelted, and bullied, priests howled, and stones flew about like hail. The grand feature of agitation seemed to be to keep up a perpetual memory in the minds of the voters of the Battle of the Boyne; the only difference between the priests who carried the Mayo Election, and those who figured at Drogheda, being in name. The Committee came to the conclusion that Mr. M'Cann was duly elected. They also reported that there was rioting on the day of nomination, and on the preceding day; and that it did not appear to the Committee that proper precaution was taken by the authorities to insure good order.

Dublin Election.—The Committee decided this afternoon in favour of the sitting members, to the great disappointment of the Roman Catholic party, who looked on the anticipated result as a certain set-off to the priestly interference proved in the Mayo case. The case of the petitioners was, that the Protestant Association had used undue influence and bribery; and certainly their suspicions were not groundless, inasmuch as it was proved that one Protestant Society applied to the sitting members to be repaid a sum of £16 in respect of payments made on their behalf.

The Committee agreed to report to the following effect, though not totidem verbis:—that it was proved that several freemen had voted under the expectation and promise of pecuniary reward after the expiration of the time for petitioning against the sitting members; that it was not proved that any such pro-

* The following is the resolution of the Committee on the Mersey Conservancy:—

Resolved,—That the Committee will not take upon themselves to adjudicate upon the claims of the Corporation of Liverpool in respect of the town dues, and the alleged right to apply the income therefrom, either in whole or in part, to purposes other than the maintenance and improvement of the port. The Committee, therefore, will not sanction the transfer of such town dues to the trust proposed to be created by this Bill, without some provision that shall secure to the Corporation such fair and equitable compensation as may now be agreed upon by the parties, or that shall leave the question of compensation to be determined by the decision of a court of law, upon the primary question of such rights and liabilities attaching thereto.

mises were made with the consent of Mr. Grogan or Mr. Vance. To give some idea of the free and independent electors of Dublin city, it may be stated that one of them was in bed on the day of election, and literally had not a rag to his back, and that clothes had to be provided for him to go to the poll in.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Our former contests in India and China, although extensive and important, did not create in the public mind the same degree of keen anxiety as European contests always produce; nor has the additional expenditure attendant upon those eastern conflicts been so great as to occasion material derangement to the national finances. But it now becomes more obvious every day that we are engaged in wars, and in an expenditure of such magnitude, that measures of economy, and hopes of retrenchment suitable to times of peace, must be deferred for an indefinite period. In the early part of this week contradictory inferences, drawn from the late Indian news, caused much fluctuation in the English Funds. During the last three days the market has been rather firmer, and has improved about $\frac{5}{8}$ per Cent. The closing price of Consols for money is 90$\frac{1}{2}$. Tuesday being the 4th of the month, the demand for money, both in the discount market and at the Bank of England, was exceedingly great. Later in the week there has been less demand, but rates have not declined. The East India Company having given notice of a further rise of 2 per Cent. in their rate for bills on India, the purchase of bills has received a powerful check, and the demand for silver for exportation will be proportionably augmented. The amount of specie shipped for the east by the Peninsular and Oriental Steamer, Ripon, is £1,012,963; nearly the whole of it is silver, the gold being only £5,380.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 1st of August, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,905,980, being an increase of £328,585, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,302,152, shewing a decrease of £370,826 when compared with the previous return.

Advices from a part of the wine districts of France report the re-appearance of the vine disease in those vineyards where the use of sulphur was neglected. Nevertheless, a good vintage is expected, with quality equal to the wines of 1811. In the mean time prices decline in almost every market. The accounts from Burgundy are excellent, there are no complaints of disease. In the neighbourhood of Paris the grapes are magnificent, and abundant beyond example.

The conclusions arrived at by Captain Douglas Galton, and his colleagues, relative to the main drainage of London, extend wonderfully the view of that subject both in regard to the time it will occupy and the cost it will involve. It is not only London, in its largest extent, which the conclusions of these gentlemen embrace; but also the districts adjacent to the metropolis, and the population of a large portion of the main valley of the Thames for which drainage is proposed to be provided, it being a fact that those districts have become saturated with sewage, and the streams throughout the country polluted by means of increasing and improving house-drainage, and now require, almost equally with London, to be purified. The prospective population of the metropolitan district, for which provision should be made, is 3,578,089, and of the subsidiary districts, 401,000, being a total prospective population of 3,979,089. The period of time to be allowed, considering the magnitude of the works, the peculiar difficulties of construction, and having a due regard to economy, should not be less than five years. It is concluded that the best outfall on the north side of the Thames is at a place between Mucking Lighthouse and Thames Haven, in Sea Reach, considerably below Gravesend, and the best outfall on the south side is Higham Creek, in the Lower Hope. The cost of these main outfall sewers will be £3,144,300; the cost of the internal system of intercepting sewers in the metropolitan district will be £2,292,965, and the total cost £5,437,265. The final conclusions are, that all towns and villages in the line of the main outfall sewers should discharge their sewage into these channels, instead of allowing it to pass through the marsh drains into the river, that these districts should contribute towards the cost, and that the Thames cannot be purified by any less comprehensive plan than the one now suggested.

LOCAL DIVORCE COURTS.

The repeated divisions in the Committee on the Divorce Bill on questions involving the principles of the measure, and the energetic conflict between the keenest debaters on both sides of the House, have rather thrown into the shade a discussion which will, perhaps, exercise more practical influence on the working of the new machinery than even the modifications which have been proposed in the interest of the equality of the sexes, and resisted, partly out of deference to the habitual practice of the House of Lords, and partly on the ground of that prescriptive right to the pleasures of polygamy, which Mr. Buxton asserted, and the Premier himself implied, to be one of the inalienable privileges of male human nature. We refer to the debate on the amendments by which Mr. Butt and Lord John Manners successively attempted to engraft a local jurisdiction upon the highly centralised machinery of the Government Bill. We do not under-rate the importance of the distinctions so much discussed between adultery with cruelty and desertion, or bigamy, and the occasional offence of a casually unfaithful husband. Nor do we deny that something may depend on the greater or less degree of strictness with which the power of decreeing a judicial separation may be limited. But we are convinced that the question, whether the Court is to be local or merely central, far outweighs in importance all the other points to which we have referred.

Whatever degree of laxity may be introduced into the law of separation and divorce, the probability is that the remedy will seldom be sought, except in the most aggravated cases; and we should not be at all surprised to find that the enlarged grounds of jurisdiction which have been introduced from time to time during the progress of the Committee will not add a case a year to the number which would have occurred had the restricted powers of the original Bill been preserved without any extension.

The effect of giving a cheap and accessible local remedy will be very different. At present about two-fifths of the divorces à mensâ et thoro are granted in local courts which the Bill will annihilate, and a very small proportion of these would find their way to London under the new regulations. At any rate, if they did, it would be at the cost of much additional trouble and money. Thus the result of a Bill professing to increase the facility of obtaining divorces in all cases in which it is proper that they should be granted would perhaps be, on the whole, to make the difficulty of procuring a decree for separation greater even than it is under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. So strongly was this felt, that the Attorney-General and Mr. Gladstone, who were agreed on nothing else, concurred in admitting the claim, and we may almost say the right, of residents in the country to have some local tribunals substituted for those to which they are now able to resort.

The only question was, whether it was possible to find or to create a suitable court, and what that court should be. It cannot be denied that there is much practical difficulty in carrying out the principle of local jurisdiction. To establish new tribunals, scattered about the country, for the sole purpose of granting judicial separations, would be objectionable on many grounds. They could only be made competent at very considerable expense, of which the judge's salary would form but one of many items. Then they would not be occupied in most districts for more than a small portion of their time, and it is bad economy to establish a multitude of new and highly-paid officers to do work which altogether may not be enough to occupy more than one or two of their number. Another device suggested was, that the London Court of Divorce should be made itinerant; but the unwieldly character of the court, and the proposed association of the Admiralty and Testamentary Courts with the Divorce Court under the same working-day judge, would interfere grievously with any system of circuits for the settlement of matrimonial difficulties. The proposal to confer the jurisdiction on the judges of assize is even less admissible. The hurrying from town to town, and the press of civil and criminal trials on the very same populous circuits where divorce cases would be most numerous, are fatal objections; and another serious difficulty would arise from the want of regular archives, and the absence of registrars and clerks, without whose assistance there would be no means of preserving a record of the relations judicially established between a ci-devant man and wife, and of the rights to alimony or otherwise, dependent on them. The only other tribunals which have been suggested are the county courts and the quarter sessions. The objection to the county courts is simply that the judges are already loaded with such a variety of incongruous duties, and are of necessity habituated to so rapid and off-hand a mode of procedure, that they would be scarcely able to give to the delicate questions which would arise in matrimonial causes the deliberate investigation which they above all others require. The court of quarter sessions is not a tribunal for which we have any very strong sympathy; and where strict questions of law arise, it is apt to fall into grievous blunders. But we do not think that a question of technical law will turn up in one separation case out of a hundred; and for the mere adjudication upon the class of facts on which judgments of divorce à mensâ et thoro commonly depend, there might be less suitable judges than even the justices of the peace in quarter sessions assembled. The subject indeed presents only a choice of difficulties, and these have been somewhat aggravated by the course of the proceedings in the House of Commons.

The present position of the question is that the committee has unanimously negatived Mr. Butt's proposal in favour of the county courts, and has passed Lord John Manners' singular amendment defining the duties and the powers of "any court hereinafter authorised." Probably the technical rejection of the county court jurisdiction will not be allowed to stand in the way of any settlement which may be thought desirable. The House, however, has committed itself to find a court, without apparently any very clear notion where it is to be sought; but, as we think that even an indifferent court is better than a denial of justice, we cannot help rejoicing that in some shape or other the House is bound to provide the local tribunals, without which the poor man's divorce bill, as it has been called, would increase the average cost of all proceedings except those for divorce à vinculo.

GENTLEMEN OF THE LONG ROBE.

We have been long familiar with this phrase as a portion of that elegant and euphonious language which is popularly supposed to be supplied to the columns of the newspapers at the price of one penny per line. An account of an assault, an elopement, or a disputed heirship, is commonly concluded by the remark that "work for the gentlemen of the long robe" is likely to be the result of the acts and circumstances detailed. If our memory does not deceive us, the important investigation now pending in the House of Lords was anticipated in these very terms by some of the many pens which strove to announce with adequate grandeur the decease of the late Earl of Shrewsbury. We certainly had hitherto conceived that barristers were designated as "gentlemen of the long robe" only in that mysterious world, as unknown to this Journal as the Journal itself to the inhabitants of it, where "lovely and accomplished brides" are conducted to "hymenal altars," and where the most obscure prophetic imagery is employed to convey the simple fact that an addition to the royal family is probable at no distant day.

We were, therefore, a good deal surprised to observe that Lord John Russell, in the House of Commons, adopted the phrase in question to designate accurately a class of members who were to enjoy a peculiar privilege. In addition to the twenty-five members nominated to serve on the Oaths Committee, it was ordered that "all gentlemen of the long robe members of the House" should have the right to share in its deliberations. But it appears that Lord John Russell was quite right. There was no deficiency on this occasion in that constitutional knowledge for which he is so eminent. We understand that precedents can be produced to justify the phrase, and perhaps it is not unsuitable for an assembly which delights to employ at the least five words whenever reference is made to an individual member. We may add that the expression is not inaptly chosen, as a collective epithet for barristers, because it supposes merely the possession of a gown, and raises no sort of question of intellectual qualification which can possibly be inconvenient to anybody. Indeed, it is probable that the term is justified by an antiquity as venerable as that on which rests the existing system of admission to the bar; and, at any rate, we think that this ridiculous piece of verbiage harmonises most exactly with the solemn absurdities that precede and attend a call. A gentleman who has eaten dinners, and who has been present at the delivery of lectures, becomes, in due time, a gentleman who wears, or may wear, a gown. Really we think that the penny-a-liners have fallen into a vein of satire, and that this phrase is used by them not merely for its own intrinsic beauty but in order to remind the British public in a light and transient way of the necessity of reforming the inns of court.

We have noticed this subject, however, for another purpose. Upon the discussion of Lord John Russell's motion a question was raised by Mr. Cox, the member for Finsbury, as to his right as a solicitor to attend the deliberations of the committee. Now clearly Mr. Cox is not a "gentleman of the long robe," nor is Mr. Hadfield; and there are two or three other members of the House who belong to the legal profession, but possess neither the flowing garment nor the right to array themselves therein. It turned out, therefore, that the formula which we had thought empty and bombastic possessed a real efficacy, inasmuch as it disposed for the time of a question which, however, may not improbably be revived, and which is well worthy to be considered by our readers. The number of solicitors holding seats in Parliament will very probably increase, and we do not hesitate to say that their presence there is likely to be beneficial to the public, as well as to their professional brethren. We should expect that the solicitors returned to the House of Commons would usually be men of considerable abilities, and possessing knowledge and habits of mind likely to be useful in debate, and still more in the business of committees. If, however, a delicate point of legal construction were about to be referred by the House to a select body of its members, we certainly should not contend that solicitors were peculiarly qualified to advise upon it; but the question raised by Lord John Russell was not very abstruse; and, for our own part, we should have supposed, until we read the proceedings of the committee, that very little doubt could have been felt upon it. Besides, if the point in dispute were really one demanding the exercise of the most practised judicial minds for its solution, there can scarcely be conceived a greater absurdity than committing it to the consideration of a body comprising all members of the House, who might happen at any time to have been called to the English or Irish bar. Whatever may be the learning of Mr. Cox or Mr. Hadfield, they have, at any rate, gone through a real legal training, and have not been allowed to acquire a fustian title by merely complying with various empty forms.

We endeavoured when the elections were complete to present our readers with a list of all members of the legal profession who had been returned to Parliament, and in so doing we encountered the exact difficulty which the form of words placed at the head of this article would have enabled us, if we had adopted them, to escape. It is evidently unjustifiable to class a country gentleman who kept terms thirty years ago at one of the inns of court with a man of the same standing who has spent his life in the study and practice of the law. Yet the squire could if he pleased have voted in the Oaths Committee in the character of a "gentleman of the long robe," and when it came to a close division his presence would have been as influential there as that of his learned friend. We certainly observe one or two names on the committee which we believe are not well known in the legal world, either of London or of Dublin, and which it did not occur to us to include in our list of professional members of the House. It is not going too far to say that the bearers of these names can posses no special qualification for adjudicating upon legal subtleties. We think that the case against the present system of admission to the privileges of the bar was tolerably complete before; but, if anything were wanting to its full force, this committee on members' oaths supplies it. It has been sometimes complained that barristers of seven years' standing were rather hastily assumed by the legislature to be qualified for important functions. In the present instance, however, the House of Commons has gone a great deal further, and has allowed the mere right to wear a gown to place the youngest and least learned barrister upon a level with the Attorney-General. We trust that before next session is far advanced the additional argument thus supplied will be turned upon the inns of court; and we shall also be glad to see the position of solicitors in the House of Commons more satisfactorily ascertained than it is at present. We repeat that it is not our intention to insist upon solicitors being consulted by the House where they are not peculiarly qualified to advise, but we think it should be borne in mind that solicitors, equally with barristers, are members of the profession of the law, and it is not right to include all the latter and exclude all the former class in the indiscriminate manner that was adopted on a late occasion; and this, we believe, would be the feeling of the House if an opportunity should arise for pressing the question upon its notice.

Legal News.

The Probates Bill passed the House of Commons on Wednesday, and this great legal reform may now be confidently reckoned as among the acts of the present session. The compensation clauses have been liberally adjusted, and the practice of every kind and in every court has been thrown open to the profession generally.

The Divorce Bill has occupied a vast deal of time and labour in committee, and the Opposition have certainly succeeded in proving that neither the Government nor the House of Lords had brought this measure into anything like a perfect shape. The discussion on a single clause occupied the greater part of three long sittings, and is full of interest for the lawyer, but abridgment is impossible, and our limits forbid us to publish it at length. It now appears probable that this Bill will pass, and if it does, another branch of practice will be thrown open to soliciters.

The Report of the Common Law Courts Commission has been presented to both Houses, but we understand, that, up to yesterday afternoon, no authority to print and distribute it had been given by the Government. We are, therefore, unable to lay the Report before our readers, and can only present them with the following summary of its contents which we have abridged from our contemporary, the Jurist, of last Saturday:—

The first matter entered upon is the possibility of reducing the present number of the judges in the common law courts at Westminster Hall. An inquiry has been instituted as to the amount of judicial business transacted prior to 1830, when the judges were but twelve in number—no doubt with a view to correct an erroneous impression common to many, that the additional judges appointed in 1830 were made in consequence only of the increase in the number of the circuits by the addition of Wales.

This inquiry is, however, productive of no very satisfactory results, owing to the vast change in the nature of the business transacted since that time, occasioned partly by the abolition of many formal and trifling matters which used to occupy the time of the court, and partly by the introduction in modern Acts of Parliament of entirely new business, considerably more intricate and important than any of that which has ceased to exist. The consequence of all this is, that although numerically the cause lists and court papers of the present day do not equal any of those of the five years prior to 1830, in matters of weight and difficulty they no doubt far exceed them.

For greater satisfaction, however, on this point, another comparison has been made between the amount of business transacted in 1856 and the average yearly amount of a period embracing the twelve years ending and including 1856. The result of this, taking into account the increased length of trials at Nisi Prius since the recent admission of parties as witnesses, and the permission afforded to counsel of making additional addresses to the jury, is, in the opinion of the Commissioners, evidence of the existence of an increased rather than of a diminished amount of judicial labour; and the examination of Mr. Justice Coleridge and Mr. Baron Bramwell, whose opinions on this point are published in the Appendix, fully confirms their view of the case.

A very important item, in considering the desirability of having twelve instead of fifteen judges, relates to the necessary attendance in such case of three instead of four members of each court upon the Banc sittings. The present attendance of four judges is, perhaps, open to the objection, that in cases where a difference of opinion arises, there may, by possibility, be an equal division. Such an event is, however, declared by one or two witnesses examined to be of extremely rare occurrence, and the evil, if it exists, is far outweighed by the advantage of having at all other times either the unanimous opinion of four judges, or else the opinion of three against one — more satisfactory a great deal to the suitor than the opinions of a bare majority.

A still more important argument against the reduction of the existing judicial staff, and one which seems to us to have weighed much with the Commissioners, is, that, as at the present time, owing to unavoidable causes, very frequently three judges only are able to sit together in Banc, so if the normal number were reduced to three, the like causes would as frequently reduce the attendance to two, and very much inconvenience would be occasioned.

The unanimous opinion of the Commissioners is, that the present number of fifteen judges ought to be retained; and we feel sure that both the profession and the public generally will concur in their recommendation.

No less than nine towns, of greater or less importance, sent in memorials, praying either for separate assizes or for an extension of their present assize jurisdiction.

The first of these claims taken into consideration in the Report is that of the city of Manchester and hundred of Salford, the enormous increase in the commerce of which, during the past few years, has rendered it a matter of the greatest inconvenience that all the causes and criminal business arising in these two places should be sent for trial to Liverpool, distant nearly thirty miles.

Nineteen memorials were presented to the Commissioners from various parts of the county palatine, praying for a separate assize at Manchester, and such prayer was advocated by a deputation which attended the Commission in February last, and who stated, amongst other things, that the corporation of Manchester was prepared to expend, if necessary, £50,000 in the erection of the necessary courts, judges' lodgings, and other accommodation. This statement, being supported by an elaborate calculation of the immense additional cost of civil actions arising in Manchester and tried thirty miles off, has called forth a unanimous recommendation that a separate criminal and civil assize shall be holden at Manchester for that city and the hundred of Salford.

The corporation of Lancaster also made an application for a large extension of their present assize jurisdiction; but the arguments by which it was supported were so slender as to be declared wholly insufficient to warrant the adoption of any such important measure, and the prayer of the memorialists is, therefore, unanimously rejected.

The representatives of the West Riding of the county of York desired the removal of their assizes from York; but there are unfortunately two rival towns, Leeds and Wakefield, both equally desirous of obtaining the West Riding assizes, and they, both in their memorials and by their deputations, put forth arguments against one another's claim, and furnished the deputation from York with several very good suggestions for retaining the assizes for the whole county at the place where they are now holden. The Commissioners are unanimous against the claim of Leeds, but as to Wakefield they differ, Sir John Pakington and Mr. Wilson Patten thinking assizes ought to be holden there, and the rest of the Commissioners believing them to be unnecessary.

Birmingham has made a claim for a separate assize, grounding the application upon a statement, that not only is Birmingham the centre of a vast mining and manufacturing district situate on the borders of Warwick and Staffordshire, and connected by railroads with all parts of those two counties, but also that the inhabitants of that densely-populated town equal in number half the population of the entire county, while nearly one-third of the civil and criminal business tried at Warwick arises in Birmingham.

Upon this statement two claims are put forth—one, that Birmingham may be made the centre of an assize district, to be hereafter defined by law, and to include the whole of the county of Warwick and the mining and manufacturing districts of South Staffordshire; the other (if the first is rejected), that, without abolishing the present Warwick assizes, additional ones may be held at Birmingham for the borough alone.

The former of these propositions is unanimously rejected by the Commissioners; but as to the propriety of the latter, so much difference of opinion exists that the numbers are equally divided, four voting in favour of and four against any change at all in the county assizes. The Birmingham memorial, therefore, goes before the Queen in by no means an unfavourable manner, and we shall not be greatly surprised if the more moderate of the two prayers is eventually granted.

Memorials and a deputation from Bristol complain of the inconvenience arising from all the criminal business of the city being tried, forty miles away, at Gloucester, and of the injustice done to prisoners, who are seldom able to raise funds sufficient to bring any witnesses that distance. It is, in addition, alleged as a grievance, that, owing to there being only one civil assize in the year holden at Bristol, in local actions, such as ejectment, the party entitled is delayed nearly a year before he can get a judgment.

Although this latter statement is undoubtedly erroneous, with the existing provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act for changing the venue, all the Commissioners, except Mr. Justice Cresswell, think that a second civil assize ought to be holden at Bristol; but as to making any arrangements for transacting criminal business there, they are again equally divided in opinion.

The remaining memorials for additional assizes, presented by the corporations of Kendall, Hull, and Wisbech respectively, being unsupported by any documentary or other evidence, have been unanimously rejected.

After referring to the Report of the Circuit Regulation Commission of 1845, and expressing their entire concurrence in the opinion therein contained touching the undue length of the Northern Circuit, and which will shortly be still further increased if the recommendation as to Manchester be adopted, the Commissioners suggest that York shall be taken from the Northern Circuit and added to the Midland; that Warwick shall be added to the Oxford, and Northampton to the Norfolk Circuit; and that Salop and Hereford, now forming part of the Oxford, shall for the future be included in the Welsh Circuits.

By this arrangement it is estimated that the respective length of the circuits affected will be as follows:—

North and South Wales	36	days.
Northern (without York)	36	,,
Oxford (without Salop and Hereford, and with Warwick)	31	,,
Midland (without Warwick and Northampton, with York)	35	,,
Norfolk (with Northampton)	28	,,

The amalgamation of the Welsh counties appears to have engaged a large amount of attention, and the suggestion made by the majority is, that upon the North Wales Circuit, Ruthin and Mold shall be the alternate assize towns for the counties of Denbigh and Flint, and Bangor or Carnarvon for Carnarvon and Anglesey. Respecting Montgomery and Merioneth they offer no advice, owing to the incomplete state of several proposed railways through those counties.

Upon the South Wales Circuit it is suggested that two judges shall for the future go to Cardiff and Swansea, and together transact the large and increasing business of Glamorganshire; that Cardigan and Carmarthen shall be alternately the assize towns for the counties in which they are situate; that Haverfordwest shall remain the assize town for Pembroke; and that at Brecon shall be tried the business arising in Brecknock and Radnor.

No alteration whatever is proposed in the present arrangement of the Terms, or of the times of holding the circuits. Winter commissions are recommended to be issued as at present to those towns in which the number of criminals awaiting trial renders such increased accommodation necessary, accompanied by commissions of assize and Nisi Prius, for the disposal of civil business, in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and such other places as may from time to time clearly require such assistance. Several suggestions were submitted to the Commissioners, and are mentioned in the Report, for a more equal division of the year by two general circuits; but the only feasible way of effecting this was by having one circuit in January and another in July, which would place the general assizes of the kingdom in the depth of winter, and render the number of prisoners for trial in July nearly double of that now appearing in the calendars of the Summer Circuit. The periods of the circuits, therefore, remaining unaltered, no useful change in the Terms can, in the opinion of the Comissioners, be effected.

The prohibition of pleading between the 10th August and the 24th October, by the stat. 2 Will. 4, c. 39, is considered so undesirable, that there is a recommendation for a new Act of Parliament, in which the 1st October shall be substituted for the 24th; and it is suggested that the vacation judge may be empowered to try actions of lesser importance in all the courts during the month of October, and so not only afford to parties an earlier opportunity of having their causes tried, but relieve the courts of much of the pressure of Michaelmas Term.

An alteration has been recommended with reference to the sittings at Nisi Prius, and the attendance of the judges at chambers during term.

Great annoyance is continually caused in the common law courts by the presiding judge being obliged, at two or half-past two o'clock in the afternoon, to adjourn the Court in order to attend chambers. To avoid this inconvenience, two equally objectionable methods have hitherto been resorted to—one, to request a brother judge sitting in Banc (and who is usually taken away from still more important business), to attend chambers; the other, to keep some 100 or 150 attorneys and clerks waiting elsewhere until the conclusion of the cause then trying.

The Commissioners suggest that this evil may for the future be remedied by one judge only attending chambers at a much earlier hour in the day, and transacting the business of all the courts; the other two "outsitting" judges to sit at Nisi Prius, and try indiscriminately all causes entered during the sittings. The Report concludes thus:—

"We have all felt strongly, that, before recommending changes of importance in the mode of administering justice, it became us to satisfy ourselves clearly, by arguments leaving no doubt or hesitation in our minds, that such changes were called for by the wants of the public, and were for the general advantage and welfare of the nation. By some of the alterations which we have proposed, more labour will undoubtedly be imposed upon the judges; by others, the interests of some members of the bar may possibly be for a time affected. With regard to the first of these considerations, we are confident that the additional exertions required from the Bench will be willingly and cheerfully made; and with regard to the second, however much we should regret such a consequence of a partial re-arrangement of the circuits, we cannot allow it to deter us from laying before your Majesty, in obedience to your Majesty's commands, our unanimous resolution upon that subject. We have only to add, that upon this as upon all other branches of our inquiry, our great study has been to ascertain to the best of our ability in what mode the object required for the public benefit could be attained with the smallest sacrifice of private interest and convenience."

COMMITTEE FOR PRIVILEGES.

The Great Shrewsbury Case.—House of Lords, Aug. 6.

Mr. Roundell Palmer put in some slight further documentary evidence.

August 7.

Mr. Roundell Palmer concluded his summing up of the case made for Lord Edmund Howard, by contending that there were strong grounds for disbelieving that there had been any solemnisation of a marriage between the Bishop of Salisbury and his alleged wife, Catherine King. No record of such marriage could be found, although the other side acknowledged they had pursued the most extensive search; and, if there was no marriage, it followed that the Lord Chancellor Talbot, through whom the Earl Talbot claimed, could not be the legitimate son of the bishop.

August 10.

Sir F. Kelly, in replying upon the whole case on behalf of Lord Talbot, proceeded to divide the pedigree into four periods. The first period extended from the creation of the title in 1442 down to the extinction of the first line in the person of the eighth Earl in 1618, which was a period of nearly 200 years. The second period commenced with George the ninth Earl, and passed through a succession of nine Earls, including the last Earl, Bertram, who died in 1856. The third period began with Sir Gilbert of Grafton in 1517, and ended with Sir William of Whittington, the father of the bishop, in 1686. The fourth and most important period was that extending from the year 1700, the date of the Duke's great family settlement, down to 1719, when the Act of Parliament passed. The first material objection made to Lord Talbot's pedigree was the alleged existence of John Thomas, who was said to have been a son of John, the third Earl, and to have had issue.

Their Lordships intimated that there was no necessity for having the two earlier divisions of the pedigree.

Sir F. Kelly said, he would then proceed with the third branch of the pedigree, beginning with Sir Gilbert of Grafton. Substantially speaking, there were but two points made in this part of the pedigree. The first point was the allegation that there were other sons of Sir John of Albrighton besides Sir John, by his first marriage. There was no evidence before their Lordships with respect to those two sons except an obliterated inscription upon a tombstone, which could not be made out. Sir John in his will merely mentioned his son John by his first wife, and his two sons, Gilbert and John, by his second marriage. It had been suggested that John, the grandson of Sir John of Albrighton, had a third son, Gilbert; but George, the ninth Earl, had made no mention of any such person, although he had left legacies to his two other nephews, John, the tenth Earl, and George. The great family settlement of the Duke of Shrewsbury in 1700 was entirely wrong if there were any living descendants of Sir John of Albrighton by his first marriage, except John of Longford, and Gilbert of Batchcoate, whose issue became extinct in Bertram, the last Earl. He now came to the second line from Sir John of Albrighton by his second marriage. This he must divide into two parts. In the first place he must trace the descendants of Sir John of Albrighton to Charles, the Lord Chancellor. Three points had been made by his learned friends on the other side. In the first place doubts had been thrown upon the legitimacy of John of Salwarp; then the descent of William the bishop from William of Whittington was contested; and, thirdly, the descent of Charles from the bishop. The only evidence to lead their Lordships to suppose that John of Salwarp was illegitimate was an erased "?" placed at the end of his name in the pedigree produced by the other side. On the part of Lord Talbot several inquisitions and wills had been produced, in which John was mentioned as the youngest son of Sir John of Albrighton by his second marriage, and he had inherited estates left to him under that description. If he made out the case he had stated to their Lordships' satisfaction, he had established an Earl of Shrewsbury; and it would be for the other side to produce another claimant with a better claim. He had listened with surprise to the suggestion of the other side that the bishop was not the son of William of Whittington. The first piece of evidence with respect to the bishop's descent from William of Whittington was contained in the much-abused book of the Benefactors. The pedigree was made by the hand of the brother of William of Whittington, who was stated to have married Mary, by whom he had a son William. In the will of a sister of William of Whittington certain legacies were left to her brother William and to his son William, and to his daughter, Mrs. Catherine Lyttleton. That Mrs. Lyttleton subsequently married the Bishop of Exeter, who became by that marriage, and who was called, the brother-in-law of William the bishop. Would the two bishops have been guilty of the public lie of so calling themselves if they had not been thus related? He trusted that their Lordships would not credit such a suggestion, and would not believe that a person who had been raised to his high position would have been guilty of such an act. If he had done so, his aider and abettor was his son Charles, the Lord Chancellor, of whom a noble Lord (Lord Campbell) then present had said, he found this Chancellor the only one without an enemy, without a detractor, without any one to cavil at any part of his character, conduct, or ability; and this was the person their Lordships were asked to consider a conspirator and a forger, in the expectation of aggrandising a remote descendant. He now came to the third and last point made by his learned friends upon the other side, which related to the question of the legitimacy of Charles Talbot, afterwards Lord Chancellor. In the first place he admitted that he was utterly unable to find any register of the marriage of the bishop, but the register at Chipping Norton of the baptism of Charles had been laid before their Lordships, in which he was described as the son of Mr. William Talbot. The other side had suggested that if Charles had been legitimate he would have been described as the son of the Rev. William Talbot, or of William Talbot, clerk. Against the suggestion of the other side were to be set the entry of Charles's admission in the books of the Inner Temple, which was to the effect that he was the eldest son of the Rev. William Talbot; and also the writ by which Charles Talbot was created baron, in which it was recited that he was son and heir of William, Bishop of Salisbury; and further, the fact that he was a party to the deed of settlement of 1718, to which all the members of the great Talbot family were parties. If their Lordships were satisfied that there were no reasonable doubts as to the legitimacy of John of Salwarp, the relationship of paternity between William of Whittington and the Bishop of Salisbury, and the legitimacy of Charles, this one great fact was established, that Earl Talbot, the claimant, was lineally descended from the first Earl of Shrewsbury, and was entitled to their Lordships' judgment in his favour, unless some nearer heir could be proved to exist.

Lord Campbell said, that it was the claimant's duty to give reasonable evidence that no nearer heir existed. It was not essentially necessary that direct evidence as to the deaths of those persons should be given; but there must be reasonable evidence to conclude that no nearer heir existed.

The Lord Chancellor.—If those points are decided in your favour, you have established that there is an Earl of Shrewsbury.

Sir F. Kelly then said, that, with regard to the five sons of Sherrington of Rudge, who were suggested to have had issue, no mention of such issue had been made by the Duke of Shrewsbury in his settlement of 1700, although such issue would have been entitled to the title in the event of the death of Sir John of Lacock without issue, which really happened, and of the death of George of Batchcoate, who was then a boy, without issue. The Duke of Shrewsbury and the Earl of Sussex, who had married a female relative of the family, stated upon oath that the persons named in the deed of settlement were the nearest in the line of succession, and yet they had not mentioned any descendants of Sherrington except Sir John of Lacock, and Sir William of Whittington. Even supposing that his learned friend was right in his statement that these persons had issue, yet he did not attempt to trace them later than the date of the settlement in 1718. Let his learned friend name any person in existence, and he should know how to deal with the matter, but their Lordships could not call Lord Talbot to prove a negative. The only one out of the sixteen persons added by the other side to Lord Talbot's pedigree, who had been proved to have existed, was a Sherrington, the son of Thomas, a son of Sherrington of Rudge, and that person had not been heard of since 1684.

Mr. Serjeant Byles said, he believed he should be able to produce the marriage register of the marriage of that Sherrington.

Sir F. Kelly said, it was very hard upon Lord Talbot, that, every time any ancient record of a Talbot was discovered, his case should be delayed until it was proved to have nothing to do with the family. He submitted, that, upon the whole of the evidence as laid before them, their Lordships would pronounce in favour of Lord Talbot's claim.

August 13.

The registry of the parish of Marylebone for January 1, 1687, was produced, and by this it appeared that Sherrington Talbot was married by license on that day to Sarah Squires. On February 24, 1688, a daughter was born to them, and on the 26th October, 1702, a son called Sherrington, who died in August, 1703. The marriage license was also produced, by which it appeared that Sherrington Talbot was about twenty-four years old when he married. The object of this was to show that there was somebody between the Duke of Shrewsbury and the Bishop of Durham at the time of the settlement of the estates by the Duke.

A witness from the State Paper Office was called, and produced a document which showed that Earl Gilbert was denounced as a Jesuit priest in 1719; a fact which the counsel for the claimant said had been all along admitted.

This being all the evidence in opposition to the claim at present produceable,

Mr. Serjeant Byles renewed his request for time. They did not want days, they wanted months, to complete the pedigree of the family. He did not promise that they would be able to produce the true Earl of Shrewsbury, but—

Lord St. Leonards.—Mr. Serjeant Byles, that is the last thing you wish to do. It would be a bad accident for you if you found him.

The Lord Chancellor.—This matter did not stand over to be re-argued. Is there any further evidence? If there is not, the case must stand for to-morrow morning.

Ordered accordingly.

An interesting point was raised in the Bankruptcy Court on Monday last, whether the proceedings before the Court in the cases of trader debtors summonses should be public or not.

Mr. Lucas, on the part of a client not named, raised the objection, and stated that one trader had been wholly ruined by publicity.

The Commissioner observed that he believed it to be the intention of the Legislature that the proceedings in this court should be public, and it would be a mischievous rule to lay down that they should be conducted in private. The object of a trader debtor's summons was to ascertain whether a man was solvent or not, and if he was solvent why need he fear publicity?

Mr. Lucas.—It would ruin him.

His Honour.—I admit there is some inconvenience to the debtor, but the injustice to the creditor would be far beyond it. There could be no injury to a solvent man, but there might be to a man who could not pay his way; and it was important that publicity should be given in times like the present, when debtors struggled on to the last, and made away with their property at the last moment. Under these circumstances, he thought the law acted wisely in giving publicity; but he would confer with his brother Commissioners with the view of establishing a general rule; his own voice would still be raised in favour of publicity. There were parties in this court who reported the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; whereas, in private arrangements, one-sided statements too often found their way into the newspapers.

In the case of Singfield v. Stannard a rather important question, and one that is continually recurring, has been raised in the City Sheriff's Court—viz. whether the court has power to commit after a certificate in bankruptcy?

Mr. W. R. Buchanan, Basinghall-street, appeared for the defendant, to show cause why he should not be committed on a judgment summons, for non-payment of a debt which had been contracted in 1854; but the defendant had subsequently become bankrupt, and obtained his certificate in October, 1855, and he (Mr. Buchanan) put it in, not as being a prohibition against the court taking further proceedings in the matter, but to submit to his Honour whether, in the face of the certificate, he would make an order, when he had a discretionary power.

Mr. Davies, for the plaintiff, said that the late judge, Mr. Gurney (now Recorder), had committed the defendant for twenty-one days.

Mr. Buchanan said that was for the mode in which the debt was contracted; since then the amended Act had been passed in relation to the County Court Act, by which final orders in insolvency and certificates in bankruptcy were protection against subsequent proceedings in the county courts. Unfortunately, the City had not applied for an amendment of their Act in that respect, and that serious flaw existed. Still, the Court had a discretion, and would, no doubt, act upon the principle laid down in the amended County Court Act, and refuse to make any order.

The judge, Mr. Prendergast, Q.C., ultimately held, that, under the City Act, 9 & 10 Vict., which contained similar clauses to the County Courts Act, and from the cases of Abbey v. Dale, and a case reported in 17 Jurist, p. 758, he ought not to make any order. The cases in insolvency and bankruptcy differed thus, that a protection under insolvency did not satisfy the debt under the original Act; but as it had been subsequently declared that an order in insolvency or a certificate in bankruptcy should be received as a defence, he should refuse to make any order.

An illustration of the manner in which the French courts are inclined to deal with the decisions of our English tribunals with regard to foreigners residing in France, is afforded by the case of Hope v. Hope. It will be in the recollection of our readers that Mr. and Mrs. Hope, after numerous legal proceedings relative to their divorce and to the possession of their children before the courts both of England and France, came, in March, 1855, to an arrangement that their youngest child, John Henry, should remain with Mrs. Hope, and that the others, four in number, should go to their father, Mrs. Hope reserving to herself the privilege of seeing and corresponding with her children; Mrs. Hope, besides, consented to abandon an application for divorce which she had made in England, and undertook not only not to oppose but to promote the demand for divorce made by him against her in that country. Yesterday, Mr. Hope applied to the civil tribunal to order that the child in question should be given up to him; and he based his demand on the ground that the Court of Chancery in England had decided that all the children should be placed under his care; and that, as the arrangement of March, 1855, was not legal, he was not bound by it. Mrs. Hope, in reply, insisted that the interests of the child, who is only ten years of age, required that he should be left under her care; and she represented, that, as her husband was an Englishman, and as she by her marriage to him must be considered English also, a French tribunal had no jurisdiction over them in such a matter. She also represented that if the arrangement of March, 1855, was not binding in law, there was nothing to prevent the tribunal from declaring that it was equitable, and that it should be acted on. Lastly, she urged that as Mr. Hope thought fit to live apart from her, and refused to fulfil the duties of a husband towards her, though no separation between them had been pronounced in France, he was not warranted in insisting on exercising alone paternal power over all their children. The tribunal decided, that, as the parties are English, as Mr. Hope refused to receive his wife into his house though not legally separated from her, and as, besides, the interests of the child required that he should remain with his mother, it (the tribunal) had no jurisdiction in the matter, and that Mr. Hope's application must be dismissed with costs.

The interpretation to be put upon the 22nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was discussed in the case of Millar and Others v. Draper, tried before Baron Martin, at the Gloucester assizes, on Monday last. Mr. Gray, who appeared for the defendant, having, on re-examination of one of his witnesses, whether he had not made a statement to the plaintiff's attorney, and being about to cross-examine him upon that statement Mr. Baron Martin interfered, and said, that the 22nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, only allowed that course to be taken in case the witness shall, in the "opinion of the judge, prove adverse." But it did not allow it in every case where a witness varied in his statement. His Lordship, after conferring with Mr. Baron Bramwell, repeated his opinion that the witness must be adverse before he could be contradicted.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—Bristol, August 8.

Mr. Justice Coleridge opened the Western Circuit on Saturday, at Bristol. Great interest is attached to an action, to be tried there, by an attorney against Mr. Simpson, of the London firm of A'Beckett and Simpson, for opposing him—as he alleges maliciously—before Mr. Commissioner Law, and getting him a long term of imprisonment.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—Gloucester, August 8.

(Before Mr. Baron Martin and Common Juries).

D'Elwart v. Marshall.

Mr. Serjeant Pigott and Mr. W. H. Cooke appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Skinner, Q. C., and Mr. Powell for the defendant.

The plaintiff in this action, Mr. D'Elwart, was a Frenchman, and teacher of the French language, residing at Cheltenham; and he sued the defendant, Frederick Marshall, an attorney in the same town, to recover damages for slander, imputing to him that he was "a rogue, and had swindled a lady named Johnson of the sum of £240." It appeared that a Cheltenham lady named Johnson had become interested in the plaintiff, and had made him divers offers of assistance. To the several plans proposed by the lady for his advancement the plaintiff objected, but having intimated that he had a strong desire for agricultural pursuits, Mrs. Johnson promised that she would purchase a farm for him. It was rather suggested that the plaintiff himself understood he was to become the proprietor, as he had given instructions to the defendant to procure his naturalization; but this point was not cleared up, for though the plaintiff and Mrs. Johnson were both in court, neither of them was called. The defendant, it appeared, had been employed by Mrs. Johnson to get back a contract and abstract from the plaintiff, and, strongly disapproving the plaintiff's conduct in the matter, he expressed his opinion of him in a very unreserved manner to a Mr. Roberts, on which occasion, according to the evidence, he made use of the slanderous words now complained of. He also repeated the same expressions on another occasion.

The defendant was called as a witness, and denied having made use of the slanderous words imputed to him; but he admitted having called the plaintiff a "scoundrel," and that he believed he was a "rogue," though he said he had never called him by that name.

Considerable amusement was produced in court by the vivacity of the little Frenchman and the pugnacious disposition of the defendant, who, it appeared, had been bound over to keep the peace, in consequence of a threat to chastise the plaintiff's attorney, a man, named Boodle, who also practises at Cheltenham.

Mr. Serjeant Pigott offered to consent to the withdrawal of a juror, provided the defendant would express his regret at having made use of the expressions complained of.

Mr. Skinner, as his client refused to accede to this proposal, contended that the words had never been spoken, and, if they had, the communication was privileged.

Mr. Baron Martin having summed up the evidence, the jury found for the plaintiff—Damages, £40.

Mr. Whateley, Q.C., and Mr. Dowdeswell, appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Skinner, Q.C., and Mr. Phipson, for the defendant.

The plaintiff in this action, Evan Thomas, was an elderly man who lived at Lampeter, in Cardiganshire, and he sued the defendant, Thomas Lewis, an attorney in the same place, to recover damages for negligence as an attorney. The chief ground of complaint was, that the defendant had advised the plaintiff that he could legally enter into certain agreements with an attorney named Lloyd, which agreements were afterwards held by the Vice Chancellor to be bad by reason of "champerty." The defendant denied that he had given the plaintiff any such advice.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 40*s.* damages, the plaintiff having leave to move to increase the damages if the court should be of opinion that he was entitled to more.

August 13.

(Before Mr. Baron Martin and a Special Jury.)

Haddock and Another v. Lewis and Another.

This was an action of ejectment brought to try the validity of a will made on the 14th April, 1855, by Mrs. Anne Higgins, an old lady, who died at a place called "Shepherds," about four miles from Newnham, on the 13th of May, 1855, at the advanced age of eighty. Considerable interest attached to the inquiry, arising from the circumstance that the will in question was made by Mr. James Knight Smith, a solicitor, of Newnham, and that one moiety of the property, after paying certain legacies, was left to a Mrs. Elliott, an old lady of sixty-six, who was Mr. Smith's mother-in-law. The other moiety was left to Sarah Lewis, who was the testator's first cousin. The plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law, and the defendants as devisees.

The questions involved were the competency of the testator to make the will, and the professional propriety of the conduct of Mr. Smith.

The suggestions on the part of the plaintiffs were, first, whether the deceased had signed the will on the 14th of April; secondly, whether she had ever signed any will at all.

Mr. Baron MARTIN summed up the evidence. He said, that if the account Mr. Smith and his clerk gave of the transaction was true the will was valid; for however improper it might be that a will should be so executed in favour of an attorney's family, there was no objection to it in point of law.

The verdict of the jury has not yet reached us.

The personalty involved amounts to £6,000, and the realty to £350 a year.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LIVERPOOL, AUGUST 10.

Mr. Baron Watson opened the Liverpool assizes on Monday, at twelve o'clock. The calendar is unusually heavy: There are 15 persons charged with murder; 20 with stabbing, wounding, and shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm; there are 18 cases of manslaughter; of rape, and attempts to commit rape, there are 11; of forgery, 8; of highway robbery, 30; of burglary, 33; of perjury, 8; of bigamy, 6; and various other offences of a serious character.

The cause list contains an entry of 104 causes, 36 of which are in the Manchester and Salford list, the residue in the West Derby and Liverpool list. About 50 of the latter are foreign causes, chiefly from London, owing to Liverpool being the last assize town.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. — AUGUST 11.

QUESTION AS TO COMPROMISING A DEBT.

Ex parte Executors of Hodge, In re Lane.

In this case the assignees had agreed to accept a composition of 10*s.* in the pound on a debt of 3,000*l.*, due from the representatives of Richard Hurst, deceased. An order had been made by the court, under the 153rd section of the Act, authorising the assignees to accept the proposal.

Mr. Heather, on behalf of certain creditors, now moved the court to rescind its former order, on the ground that it had been made without the consent of several large creditors, and under a misapprehension as to the rights of the assignees against the debtor. It appeared that the bankrupt (Lane) held two judgments against Hurst, on whose estate they ranked as third incumbrancers; and the question was, whether those judgments had been sufficiently registered, so as to take precedence of subsequent incumbrancers. The assignees had acted on the supposition that they had not, and hence the compromise.

Mr. Stevens (of the Chancery bar) who had advised the assignees in the matter, supported the order of the court, and cited the Acts of 5 Anne, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and subsequent statutes, relating to the registration of judgments. On the authority of Westbrook v. Blyth (23 Law Journ. N. S. 386) and Hughes v. Lumley (1 Jur. N. S. 422), he contended that a judgment was inoperative where the property was situate in a register county (Yorkshire or Middlesex) unless it was registered both in the Court of Common Pleas and in the register office of the county.

Mr. Commissioner Goulburn said, he had at first doubted whether individual creditors could interfere, in a case of this kind, with the discretion of the assignees and the court as to sanctioning a composition; but a fuller consideration of the 12th clause, that which gave the court primary jurisdiction, had led him to the conclusion that creditors had the right to exercise surveillance over the assignees in respect to compositions, and were entitled to have the matter openly inquired into, and discussed. In this case it appeared that the composition had been sanctioned by creditors to the amount of £18,000 out of £23,000; and no one could doubt that it was one highly beneficial to the estate, for there were serious doubts as to the validity of the judgments. In administering a bankrupt estate, it was not the duty of the assignees to contest every moot point to the last, a course which could only result in transferring the assets to the pockets of the lawyers; they would exercise a sound discretion in agreeing to such a compromise as put an end to a litigation which threatened to be most protracted and costly. The motion must be dismissed, but as it was a very proper one to be made, the costs would be allowed out of the estate.

THE RIGHT OF A BANKRUPT TO PASS HIS LAST EXAMINATION ON UNVOUCHED ACCOUNTS.

In re J. Ellison.

This was a last examination sitting, in which Mr. Bagley (instructed by Messrs. Reid, Marsden, & Co.) was counsel for the assignees, and Mr. Hubbard was for the bankrupt.

Mr. Bagley prayed an adjournment without day, on the ground that the accounts were unsatisfactory, being unvouched by books, and a large sum of money (867*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*) wholly unaccounted for, otherwise than by estimating it as expended under trade and personal expenditure.

It appeared that the trade and personal expenditure of the bankrupt, during a period of a year and seven months, amounted to—personal, 149*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*, and trade, 872*l.* 18*s.*—total, 2372*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*; whilst his profits during that period were stated by himself to be only 160*l.* 6*s.* He commenced his account on October 22, 1855, with a deficiency of 1593*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, which was now increased to about £5351 on his own showing. There was no cash-book, and the other books were quite insufficiently kept to make other than what is called a "raised account" since the bankruptcy.

Mr. Bagley prayed an adjournment without day; and Mr. Hubbard was heard for the bankrupt contrà. In the course of the argument the case of a bankrupt named Sellers was adverted to, in which the Lords Justices had passed the accounts of a bankrupt wholly unvouched, and disclosing no assets, nor any account of how he had disposed of them, other than by a statement and figures made by an accountant, and wholly unvouched and unsupported by proof of any kind.

His Honour said that before he finally disposed of this or other similar cases, he must be informed, with some degree of accuracy, as to what the Lords Justices had said touching a bankrupt's last examination—what it was and ought to be. He (Mr. Commissioner Goulburn) had always considered, and he had had now nearly 40 years' experience in bankruptcy matters, that at a bankrupt's last examination he was bound to render to his creditors "a full and true account of his estate and effects, vouched by reasonable evidence." Such he had heard to be the rule—he believed from the lips of Lord Eldon himself. It would appear from accounts, which had been, no doubt, inaccurately put forth, that the appellate jurisdiction had ruled (in the case referred to and others from Mr. Commissioner Evans's court) that the last examination of a bankrupt was simply to receive such account as he might think fit to give, and without vouching any of the items therein, either by his books or otherwise; and that, upon such an account, the court were bound to "pass" the account, not as a "full, or true, or satisfactory one," but as the only one the bankrupt could, or thought fit to, give to his creditors of his estate and effects. Such a principle (his Honour remarked) seemed to his mind to be one fraught with infinite mischief, and if acted upon would make a bankrupt's last examination a mere ceremony—costly to the creditors, and worse than useless to them. He should adjourn this case without day, and take means to be informed as to what really had been ruled by the Lords Justices in the case referred to.

Examination adjourned sine die.

Aug. 13.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FANE).

In re Hugh Innes Cameron.

This was the day appointed for the last examination of this bankrupt, so well known from his connexion with the Royal British Bank. No accounts had been filed; but a statement has already appeared, which makes his liabilities, independent of those to the bank, about £8,000. He is made bankrupt as a sheep salesman, of Kensington.

Mr. Linklater appeared for the assignees, and Mr. Cotterill for the bankrupt.

Mr. Cotterill.—I appear for Mr. Cameron, and I have to make application to your Honour that a quantity of papers which were taken from him by the French authorities when he was arrested, and subsequently, by arrangement, came into the hands of Mr. Linklater, may be restored to Mr. Cameron, inasmuch as they in no way relate to his dealings as a trader, and it is essential that he should have them, in order to prepare his defence for the prosecution which has been instituted against him.

The Commissioner.—But I cannot make a general order that all these papers should be delivered up. There must be some distinction. What course do you propose to pursue?

Mr. Cotterill.—That some third party should examine the papers, and hand over to us such as do not relate to his dealings as a trader.

Mr. Linklater.—I cannot consent to that. I should not be satisfied with the inspection of the papers by any other eyes than my own. I am quite content to undergo that ordeal, along with my friend, in order to see which of the papers relate to Mr. Cameron's estate, and which of them to his dealings with the Royal British Bank; because if there be anything relating to his dealings, either as a trader on his own account, or in connexion with the bank, I should ask to retain possession of those documents. On the other hand, such of them as relate to family matters, or things of that kind, I have no wish to retain.

The Commissioner.—Then I cannot interfere. How can I, sitting here in bankruptcy, order Mr Linklater to deliver up documents in his possession belonging to the assignees, which may be useful to them in carrying on a prosecution?

The matter then dropped.

It is understood that the bankrupt declines to file any balance-sheet, of which advantage might be taken for the prosecution, until after November; and the assignees have consented in the meantime to accept a statement of the debts and assets particularising the assets now to be collected.

At the last meeting the bankrupt was ordered to be discharged from custody, and an allowance of £3 per week was made to him.

The examination was then adjourned till the 30th of October.

OATHS TAKEN BY MEMBERS.

The report from the select committee on oaths taken by members, together with the proceedings of the committee, has just been published.

At the first sitting Lord J. Russell, at the instance of Mr. Disraeli, was moved into the chair. The committee then deliberated and considered the provisions of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62. On the following day a motion was made and question proposed by the Attorney-General:—"That in the opinion of this committee, the House of Commons is included within the following words of the 8th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62; that is to say, 'all bodies now by law, or by statute, or by any valid usage, authorised to administer or receive any oath.'" Mr. Disraeli moved an amendment, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "It is expedient, before it comes to any decision on the matter referred to its investigation by the House, that this committee should obtain permission from the House to hear counsel on the application of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62, to the Houses of Parliament,"—but this amendment was, by leave, withdrawn. On the motion of the right hon. gentleman it was agreed, by 14 votes to 9, to postpone the consideration of the question. On the third day of meeting (Monday last) the committee took into consideration an amendment, moved by Mr. Warren at the previous sitting—viz., to leave out from the word "committee" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "it would be expedient, regard being had to the late period of the session, and the public and private engagements of its members, that they should report to the House that the committee deem it advisable that it should be re-appointed at the commencement of the ensuing session." It was agreed, however, "that the words 'that in the opinion of this committee the' stand part of the question." The main question was then put—"That in the opinion of this committee the House of Commons is included within the following words of the 8th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62; that is to say, 'All bodies now by law or statute, or by any valid usage, authorised to administer or receive any oath.'"—The committee divided: Ayes, 13—Mr. Dilwyn, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Attorney-General, Mr. Roebuck, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Pakington, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Greer, Mr. Bowyer. Noes, 16—Mr. Cobbett, Mr. Gladstone, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Henley, Mr. Malins, Mr. Napier, Mr. Rolt, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Whiteside, Lord J. Manners, Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Wigram, Mr. Adams, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Maguire. The committee agreed to report to the House as follows: The following resolution was proposed by a member of the committee:—"That in the opinion of this committee, the House of Commons is included within the following words of the 8th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62; that is to say, 'All bodies now by law or statute, or by any valid usage, authorised to apminister or receive any oath.' Upon deliberation, the resolution passed in the negative." Ordered to report.

The Statute Law Commission.—A return has been published showing how the balance of £3,029 on the 30th of April, 1856, and the sum of £1,911 voted in 1856, for the purposes of the above Commission, had been expended. The total payments to draftsmen from April, 1856, to June, 1857, amounted to £2,285. The total amount voted since 1854 has been £9,490, and of this £8,685 has been expended.—Times.

The Right Hon. James Stuart Wortley, M.P., is, we are happy to learn, recovered from his severe attack of illness, the only effects remaining being a slight weakness. The hon. and learned gentleman has just returned to town from Eserick Park, Yorkshire, Lord Wenlock's seat, where he had remained in seclusion to renovate his health. We understand, that, at the solicitation of his more intimate friends, he purposes, after the ensuing vacation, to resume his professional duties at the bar, and hopes in the next session to be able to take a useful part in the House of Commons.—Daily News.

Prorogation of Parliament.—The public business has so far advanced—in spite of needless obstructions—that the termination of the session may now be confidently looked for. Every effort will be made to bring the session to a close on Saturday, the 22nd instant, so as to enable her Majesty to prorogue Parliament in person, previous to the departure of the Court for the north, which will take place on Monday, the 24th instant, in the event of the session being over at the expected time.—Observer.

It is stated in political circles, that Mr. Phinn, the late Secretary of the Admiralty, is about to proceed to the colonies, having accepted an appointment.—Liverpool Albion.

Town Clerk of Cardiff.—Mr. E. P. Richards having resigned the office of Town Clerk, the Council unanimously elected Mr. B. Matthews as his successor.

The Ministerial whitebait dinner is fixed for Wednesday, the 19th instant, at the Trafalgar, Greenwich.—Globe.

In the House of Lords, the decision in the case of the South Eastern Railway Company v. Joctin has been postponed sine die.

In the Bankruptcy Court Mr. Commissioner Fane has ordered proceedings to be instituted agsinst a Mr. Solomon, an alleged debtor to the Hastings Bank of over £8,000. The case came before the Court In re Smith, Scrivens, & Co.

ELECTION EXPENSES.

Greenwich.—It appears, from the official statement of Mr. James (the election auditor), that at the last election the expenses of Sir W. Codrington were 1,096*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and of Mr. Montagu Chambers (who was unseated), 1,039*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*

Oxford City.—The total expenses of the four candidates for the representation of the city of Oxford at the general election in March last were 2,545*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*, of which sum Mr. Langston's return cost 660*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, including £200 and 13*l.* 13*s.* to agents. Mr. Neate's election cost 550*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, including 50 guineas to the agent. The expenses of the unsuccessful candidates were much larger in proportion, the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell's alone amounting to 928*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, including £205 each to his two agents; while Mr. Serjeant Gaselee, who only polled 225 votes, disbursed a sum of 405*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, including £84 and 32*l.* 5*s.* to agents.

Oxford County.—Expenses of the county election were—G. G. Harcourt, Esq., 207*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*; the Right Hon. J. W. Henley, 52*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*; Colonel North, 57*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; H. H. Pelly Hinde, Esq., 87*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* The latter gentleman only issued an address, and met the electors at the town-hall, after which he retired from the contest.

Banbury.—Mr. Tancred, the successful candidate, expended 208*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.*, while his opponent's (Mr. Yates) expenses were £81.

Woodstock.—The Marquis of Blandford's (now Duke of Marlborough) expenses were 51*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DISCHARGE.

Pearl v. Deacon, 5 W. R. 702; S. C. 793.

The reported cases touching the relations of principal and surety abound in subtle distinctions, and there is no class of decisions in which it is more important for the lawyer to understand the foundation on which the law has based the relations between parties. In the present case, a publican borrowed £250 from his landlord, for which he gave an assignment of his pension, a bill of sale of his furniture, and also two notes of £125 each, in one of which the plaintiff joined as surety, there being another surety for the other moiety. The plaintiff was aware at the time when he became surety that the bill of sale had been given. The landlord, who was the defendant in the suit, seized the furniture for rent which accrued subsequently to the loan transaction; and the plaintiff in this suit claimed to be relieved pro tanto from his obligation as surety by the act of the creditor in taking for another claim the property which formed part of the security for the debt which the plaintiff had guaranteed. The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the plaintiff's claim, and his Honour's decree was affirmed on appeal by the Lords Justices. It was argued, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the distress which had been put in by the creditor was not within the scope of the contract between him and the surety. The Master of the Rolls, however, did not decide upon this ground, but on the ground of the equity arising out of the relation between the parties; and in this distinction he followed the doctrine laid down or recognised in numerous decisions. In the common case of contribution among co-sureties, where there is no express contract for contribution, the right of one surety who has paid the principal debt or any part of it, to enforce contribution from a co-surety, depends, as Lord Eldon observed in Craythorne v. Swinburne (14 Ves. 164), "rather upon a principle of equity than upon contract; unless in this sense, that the principle of equity being in its operation established, a contract may be inferred upon the implied knowledge of that principle by all persons; and it must be upon such a ground of implied assumpsit, that, in modern times, courts of law have assumed a jurisdiction upon this subject." But though a surety is liable to contribute, rather by force of a principle of equity than by contract, it is clear that a surety may, by contract, place himself out of the reach of the principle, which, however, had not been done in this case. The relation between the creditor and surety has been sometimes stated so high as to make the creditor a trustee for the surety, in respect of the securities which the creditor holds for his debt; and it cannot now be questioned that sureties are entitled to the benefit of every security which the creditor holds against the principal. If the relations of the parties were based upon contract, a question might frequently arise as to knowledge of the contracting parties at the time when the contract was entered into; and it might be doubtful whether a surety would be entitled to have the benefit of other securities than those which were known to him to exist when he guaranteed the debt. In Pearl v. Deacon this question could not arise, because there the surety knew that the creditor had taken the bill of sale as a security; but even if it were otherwise, there is little room for doubt, that, upon the authority of several cases which have never been impugned, the plaintiff would have been entitled to be relieved, pro tanto, from his obligation. The analogous case of Deering v. Lord Winchelsea (2 Bos. & Pull. 268) (approved of by Lord Eldon, 14 Ves. 165), is a distinct authority, that, where a person becomes surety, not knowing that there is another surety for the same debt, the right of contribution in his favour exists just as fully as if he were aware of the existence of the other suretyship. In the present case, if the bill of sale had been given at a different time, and as a security for the other moiety of the debt, it would be similar to the case of Wade v. Coope (2 Sim. 155), where it was held, that, under such circumstances, the surety was not entitled to the benefit of the security.

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—TAXATION UNDER 6 & 7 VICT. C. 73.

Re Strother, 5 W. R. 797.

The decisions under the 37th and 41st sections of this Act have been very numerous and conflicting. One of the commonest grounds upon which petitions are presented for taxation after payment, or after the expiration of twelve months from the delivery of the bill of costs, is alleged overcharge; and though many cases involving this question have been decided, it is still difficult to say whether or not even gross overcharge, in the absence of fraud, is sufficient to obtain an order for taxation under the Act. There are decisions to the effect that mere overcharges, even though considerable, are not a sufficient ground, unless, indeed, the overcharges are of such a nature as to raise the presumption of fraud. In Re Strother, Wood, V. C., appears to have considered that mere overcharge of itself would justify taxation after the lapse of the time from the delivery of the bill fixed by the statute; though it was not necessary for his Honour then to have decided the case upon that ground, inasmuch as there were other "special circumstances" to support the decision. There had been a dispute about some of the principal items, from the time when the bill was delivered, in reference to parliamentary proceedings, of which the solicitor admitted his client's ignorance; and, moreover, the solicitor had made no demand for payment until the twelve months had passed. Therefore, though the Vice-Chancellor appears to have said that "overcharge and pressure need not be combined, either would justify taxation," the case cannot be considered as an authority that mere overcharge, without other circumstances, will induce the court to order taxation under the statute. The most recent decision of the Court of Appeal, on the point of taxation after payment, is Re Boyle, Ex parte Turner (4 W. R. 617), and there both the Lords Justices considered that the overcharge must be so gross as to amount to fraud to induce the court to tax a bill after payment; and there is no difference in principle between the case of taxation after payment and after the lapse of twelve months from the delivery of the bill. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, at all events, does not proceed upon the assumption of any such distinction. As well as we can extract a principle from the long catalogue of cases on the subject which are to be found in the books—especially in the fourteen last volumes of Mr. Beavan's "Reports"—the rule appears to be, that overcharge simply is not such a special circumstance as the Court considers to justify taxation under the 37th and 41st sections; but that, where the overcharge is obviously gross in its amount, or where it is accompanied by other circumstances suggestive of fraud, the Court will presume fraud; and the overcharge will not be allowed to stand in equity, any more than any other fraudulent transaction.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

STRIKING OFF THE ROLL—APPLICATION TO BE RESTORED—PRACTICE.

Re Thomas Simpson, 1 C. B., N. S., 554.

Mr. Simpson, an attorney, obtained, at his own request, from the Court of Common Pleas, a rule to strike him off the roll of that court—his object being, to be called to the bar. The rule was acted on, and his name struck off accordingly. Application in his behalf was afterwards made to restore him to the roll, on an affidavit stating he had abandoned the intention of going to the bar, and was desirous of resuming his practice as an attorney. But, inasmuch as this affidavit described him to be "one of the attorneys of the Court of Common Pleas," notwithstanding the erasure of his name from the roll in consequence of the above-mentioned rule, the Court, previously to granting his request, required the affidavit to be resworn and amended.

ENLARGING RULE FOR THE PURPOSES OF SERVICE—PRACTICE.

Grissold v. Harding, Official Manager of the British Bank, 1 C. B., N. S., 556.

In this case judgment against the defendant, as official manager of the bank, having been obtained by the plaintiff, a rule had issued calling upon one of the shareholders to show cause why there should not be execution on such judgment against him; but the plaintiff's attorneys had been unable to serve the party to whom the notice of the application had been addressed, in consequence of his having left his former place of abode. Leave was accordingly applied for, on the last day of term, to amend the rule, and to enlarge it until the first day of the next term; but the Court demurred, asking how they could so deal with a rule after it had run out. Master Park, however, stated that what was asked was commonly done, for the purpose of service, in the Queen's Bench; the amended rule being, in effect, treated as a new one. And on this the Court of Common Pleas acceded to the application.

PAPER BOOKS—DELIVERY BY ONE PARTY IN DEFAULT OF DELIVERY BY THE OTHER—EFFECT OF.

Simmons v. Siggers, 1 C. B., N. S., 588.

By r. 16 of the General Practice Rules of Hilary Term,

1853, it is provided, that, four clear days before the day appointed for the argument of a demurrer, the plaintiff must deliver copies of the demurrer both to the chief and senior puisne judge; and the defendant, to the next two senior judges; and that, in default of either party, the opposite party may, on the day following, deliver the required copies; and that the party making default shall not be heard till he have paid for the copies so delivered in default, or have deposited with the master a sum sufficient for the purpose.

In the above case the paper books had been delivered by the defendant's attorney in default of the plaintiff; and on the demurrer being called on, it was objected, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff could not be heard. The attorney for the plaintiff not being present to pay for the books, application was made that the case might stand over; but the Court said that it was not usual in such a case to grant time, and gave judgment for the defendant.

It would appear from Dorsett v. Asplin (11 C. B. 651), that, in the above case, the plaintiff might be let in, if he came the next day with an affidavit of merits; and it would also seem, that, in the Queen's Bench, it would be necessary to give notice of the default to the opposite party, by filing an affidavit or otherwise. At least, that was so before the present rules under a rule of Hil. Term, 4 Will. 4, to the same effect. (See Sandall v. Bennett, 2 Ad. & E. 204). In the Common Pleas, on the other hand, no notice of the objection has been ever required; though, in the case of Dorsett v. Asplin, above referred to, Jervis, C. J., remarked, "It is only fair and proper that notice should be given."

BANKRUPTCY—"KEEPING THE HOUSE," MEANING OF.

Clements v. M'Kibben, 2 H. & N. 62.

Among the acts the committal of any of which is specified by the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849 (having been incorporated into that statute from the general law of bankruptcy), to be an act of bankruptcy, is that of the trader's "beginning to keep his house." What this imports is not, perhaps, so clear as it might be; but the above case throws some light on the subject. The alleged bankrupt (one Phillips) had bought from the defendant a large quantity of beef, and immediately after its delivery circumstances occurred to convince the defendant that it had been fraudulently purchased from him at a time when Phillips knew himself to be insolvent. He accordingly went to the house of Phillips and asked to see him, claiming, at the same time, the re-delivery of the beef, as having been obtained from him by fraud. He was refused admittance; but, through the intervention of the solicitor of Phillips, the beef was ultimately given up, and Phillips, on a subsequent day, was adjudged a bankrupt. His assignees (the plaintiffs in the present action) now sued the defendant for the value of the beef, alleging that their title related back to the day on which Phillips committed an act of bankruptcy by "keeping his house," by refusing to see the defendant, as above mentioned. The Court, however, said there was nothing to show the refusal to see the defendant had been made with intent to defeat or delay a creditor. In the first place, the defendant was not a creditor, but an applicant for the return of the goods; and in the next place, for aught that appeared, if the defendant had come to demand money, Phillips would have seen him, and requested him to take a bill. Judgment was given for the defendant.

DISCHARGE OF JUDGMENT DEBTOR BY ORDER OF THE ATTORNEY—ACTION AGAINST SHERIFF.

Hodges v. Paterson, 26 L. J., Exch., 223.

This was an action against the sheriff for a wrongful discharge of a judgment debtor; and it appeared that the defence was, that the judgment debtor, after his arrest, had been discharged under a written order of the attorney for the plaintiff. The judgment debtor had been taken on a ca. sa.; and the attorney, while in ignorance of that fact, wrote thus to the officer:—"I hereby countermand the writ of ca. sa. until further notice;" and, on the same day that the officer received this letter, the prisoner was discharged. The judge who tried the action thought that this letter was no authority to discharge the debtor within the meaning of the 126th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which provides that a written order under the hand of the attorney in the cause by whom any ca. sa. shall have been issued, shall justify the sheriff, &c., in whose custody the party may be under such writ, in discharging his prisoner, unless such sheriff, &c., has received written notice to the contrary from the party for whom the attorney professes to act. However, at the solicitation of the defendant's counsel, the judge left that question to the jury, who found for the defendant. The Court now set aside the trial, on the ground that it was a misdirection to leave the construction of the letter at all to the jury—the question being for the judge.

It is to be remarked, that, though an attorney has always had the power of directing the sheriff to discharge his prisoner, who has been taken on a capias ad respondendum (see Taylor v. Brander, 1 Esp. 45; Martin v. Francis, 2 B. & Ad. 402), he had no such authority if the prisoner was arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum, until the provision of the Common Law Procedure Act, above noticed, extended the rule, with certain qualifications, to the execution writ. Even now, it is in the power of the client, if he pleases, by a written notice, to retain the prisoner in custody. As to how far notice to the sheriff's officer is notice to the sheriff himself, the case of Howard v. Canty (2 D. & L. 115) may be consulted with advantage.

VENUE—DEFECTIVE NOTICE OF TRIAL—IRREGULARITY, PRACTICE AS TO.

Selwyn v. Smith, 26 L. J., Exch., 226.

In this action, the venue was laid in Middlesex; and before plea, a summons for time to plead was taken out, indorsed by the plaintiff's attorney, in the usual way. "Take an order for five days on the usual terms; the venue to be changed to Gloucester." The order was drawn up by the defendant's attorney in the usual form—"Taking short notice of trial;" adding "for the assizes," but not mentioning Gloucester. Notice of trial, however, was given for Gloucester. On the day before the commission day, the attorneys met, and the plaintiff's attorney said he feared he had made a mistake in giving notice for Gloucester, and that it would be of no use to deliver briefs. Afterwards, however, being advised otherwise, he delivered briefs, and obtained a verdict in the absence of the defendant, who did not appear. An application was—on the day before execution after the above verdict could issue—made to the Court to set aside the trial and all proceedings, upon an affidavit stating the above facts, and also that the indorsement as to change of venue to Gloucester was made by mistake, and that all the defendant meant by drawing up the order with the words as to taking notice of trial "for the assizes" was to meet the case of there not being time to give notice for the town sittings. And it was submitted, that, there having been, in point of fact, no order to change the venue, the trial was a nullity, as it had taken place in a county different from that in which the venue was laid. The Court, however, said that there was an order to change, and that the only mistake which had been committed was the neglect to mention therein the name of the new county, and to alter the declaration accordingly. These, however, were matters of irregularity only; and as the motion to set aside the trial was not made until the very day before that on which execution could issue, and as there was neither an affidavit of merits nor any statement as to the amount of the verdict, they refused to entertain the application.

It would seem to have been the defendant's proper course in this case, as soon as he received the notice of trial for Gloucester, to have moved to set it aside. For it is a rule that he who moves to set aside proceedings on the ground of irregularity must ask to set aside the first proceeding in which the irregularity occurs. (See Hardwick v. Wardle, 4 D. & L. 739).

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF LAWYERS IN PARLIAMENT.

It is quite in accordance with the known habits of mankind that every now and then an example should be made of some delinquent who merely acts, as many others act, in violating some law or regulation of questionable wisdom. The majority of mankind will not submit to rules of which the expediency is (to say the least) not obvious, and which are based on no recognised maxim of morality. Hence, the constant evasions of such laws; and, amongst others, of the law prescribing a real property qualification for members of Parliament. We have no intention of entering upon the question—How far any property qualification whatever is desirable? Such an inquiry would be necessarily foreign to the objects of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, as trenching on the forbidden ground of politics; all that we propose to consider is, the working of a law which requires of all members of Parliament, including professional men, a property qualification of a particular kind—i. e. land, or a charge on land, of a certain annual value.

Now, it will scarcely be denied, that a small portion only of the barristers and solicitors who are actually practising as such, possess the particular kind and quantity of property required by law; and it follows that but few would be bonâ fide qualified, if elected, to take their seats in the Legislature. Speaking from observation, we are disposed to think that solicitors usually invest their accumulations partly in their business, and partly on mortgage, or in the public funds. Railway shares, of the better kind, are also in demand with both branches of the profession. It is generally late in life that the practising lawyer, with a view to establishing his name and family in some provincial locality, begins investing in land, and continues by degrees adding to his possessions, until, with that innate love of territorial distinction, which is as strong in those who are not as in those who are inscribed on the roll of the landed gentry, he foresees, in imagination, the names and armorial bearings of his descendants figuring in that revered volume. But whatever successful ambition may lead to, it will not be denied, that, while in the prime of life and the zenith of actual practice, the lawyer is not, in general, a landed proprietor; so that when he is best fitted for public life, he is actually in terms excluded from it by the law which requires this one particular kind of qualification. In point of fact, however, the law does little harm in the way of excluding from Parliament men who would otherwise obtain seats, for a sense of its unreasonableness has reconciled even honourable and otherwise scrupulous men to attempt constant evasions of it. When men of this stamp will consent to evade a law, we hold that it ought at once to be abolished, or, at least, altered so far as to admit of one's doing straightforwardly what one can do by indirect means.

The facts which were in evidence last week before the Beverley Election Committee were quite sufficient to induce thoughtful men to consider well the existing law, and the constant attempts made to evade it. That may, indeed, be called an extreme case; but we cannot, after all, see that Mr. E. A. Glover, who now finds himself ignominiously unseated, and even brought under the notice of the Attorney-General, is, in reality, more deserving of reprobation than many other sitting members, whose qualifications, without being one whit more substantial, are yet so artistically fabricated, that, if called in question, they would doubtless stand the test. It will be remembered that Mr. Glover, on becoming M.P. for Beverley, qualified on the strength of a heavily encumbered property in the county of Cork, which is moreover legally vested in his assignee in insolvency, and therefore cannot be considered as his own for any purpose whatever. There can be little doubt, that, had unfortunate Mr. Glover been in the hands of more astute advisers, he might have retained his seat in spite of the fact of his wanting a genuine qualification. Representing himself as the zealous recruit of a great party in Parliament, ten minutes' negotiation at one of the political clubs in Pall-mall would have ended in his obtaining a grant of a rent-charge of the requisite amount, issuing out of the lands of Blackacre, to hold to him and his heirs for and during the life of A. B. (aged 97 last birthday, and in a most infirm condition). The deed securing the rent-charge would then have been safely locked up in the strong box of the grantor's solicitor; or, if it became positively necessary to produce it, safe precautions would have been taken to prevent its being applied to any other purpose, or, perchance, a bond to a large amount, with a proper defeazance, conditioned for a re-conveyance, might have been executed by the aspiring candidate for parliamentary honours; and so the fears of the said grantor would be quieted—every one's object would have been attained—and the letter of the law would have been obeyed.

That transactions like this are of daily occurrence during a general election, we confidently assert; and the question is, whether a system should be retained which compels professional men entering Parliament to have recourse to such shifts and expedients, or, to take the other alternative, excludes those who have tender consciences from Parliament until such time as they shall rejoice in their territorial possessions. We submit (assuming, of course, as we, discussing the subject in these columns, are bound to assume, that a property qualification is to remain a sine quâ non) that any candidate ought to be allowed to qualify on proving that he possesses property in the funds, in shares, or elsewhere, to a certain amount; or, better still, on showing that he enjoys an annual income of a certain magnitude; and, for these purposes, it would be well to collate the declaration or affidavit of the new member with his income-tax returns, as the latter document is one in which the amount is hardly likely to be over-stated.

In England no provision seems to be made for the defence of prisoners, and it must often happen that innocent people are convicted, especially in petty cases; for there can be no doubt that there is often a strong desire on the part of the police to convict; and where the desire exists, and there is little fear of contradiction, unscrupulous officers will often state as facts what originally were mere suspicions. It is not meant that the police as a body are unscrupulous—far from it—but in so large a number it must happen that there are untruthful as well as over-zealous men, who are nearly as dangerous; and it is not possible for any judge to protect a prisoner against either class. In Scotland, they manage matters rather better in this respect, although, after all, when the practical working of the system is examined and understood, there is little to boast of, although it is still better than no system at all. The various bodies of solicitors nominate each year certain members, generally two from each body, whose duty it is to attend to the interest of the various prisoners, in concert with certain members of the bar, who are selected by that body to act as counsel for criminals. As, in Scotland, the Crown is bound to furnish a criminal with a list of the witnesses meant to be examined for the prosecution, the criminal agents generally consider themselves bound to see the principal witnesses for the Crown if resident in Edinburgh or the neighbourhood, and they are therefore able to inform the prisoner's counsel of any defects that may exist in the evidence for the prosecution; but they seldom go further than this—and it very rarely happens in Scotland that a criminal makes a defence or a counter-case, although doubtless this might be often possible. Still it is something to know what the Crown witnesses will say, and in Scotland prisoners generally have this advantage. It will be difficult to improve upon this system so long as there is no fund provided to meet necessary outlay, for it is of course out of the question that agents should advance any money for the defence of a criminal with whose interests they may be theoretically charged; and every one knows that it is impossible to make any active defence without some resources. The plan of providing a public fund for the defence of criminals has been proposed, however; and it is believed, that, if only necessary outlay was allowed to be charged against it, justice would be done to prisoners too poor to purchase it for themselves, and jobbery would be excluded. Perhaps this suggestion may contain the germ of a just system—but it will be difficult to persuade the country that it is proper to provide for the defence as well as for the prosecution of criminals.

The French system, which seems to consist in this, that the bar has the privilege of calling on any of its members to defend a criminal, has been greatly lauded; but unless there is some provision for the preparation of a case preparatory to trial, which can hardly be done without money, the French have not practically made any great step in advance of us.

The public of Edinburgh seems to be at last awakening from a dream; for the Town Council, which fairly enough represents the mercantile community in that city, has discovered that Scotch Bills are hurried through Parliament in an unseemly manner; at least, they have made this discovery in regard to two Bills against which they have petitioned—the Lunatics Bill and the Police Bill. With regard to both these Bills, they will meet with much sympathy on the part of the legal bodies; and the circumstances may, perhaps, induce a spirit of combination, which is the only thing that can relieve Scotland from the tyranny of that anomalous official, the Lord Advocate, if the constituencies will not have lawyers, who alone are capable of coping with him, to represent them.

The last vote in the estimates is one which will be regarded with much satisfaction here; for it proves that Government is alive to the necessity of extending the accommodation in the General Register House; and, from the amount, it would also seem to indicate that the plan of concentrating all the public registers of Scotland in one general office in Edinburgh is about to be adopted. The solicitors in Glasgow have advocated the adoption of this plan with a zeal and consistency which shows that they are above all petty professional jealousy, and capable of a large and general view of the subject.

LEGACY DUTY, RESIDUARY ACCOUNTS, AND THE RETURN OF PROBATE DUTY.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—At a time when so many subjects of all kinds are undergoing scrutiny (and, where required, reform), it may not be out of place to direct your attention, and that of your readers, to the following case and facts, which have recently come under my own personal observation, owing to my having to complain from time to time of the delay of my clerks in transacting business at Somerset House, and my going there personally to ascertain for myself. The following direction occurs in the will of the person whose residuary account I wished to pass, and which I here transcribe verbatim:—

"I direct my executors for the time being to pay unto my said son, Thomas Soundy, the sum of thirty pounds per annum (which I have agreed to pay him) for the board and maintenance he shall have provided for me from the 5th day of December, 1843, up to the time of my decease, and also a proportional part of such sum for the fractional period of a year (if any) which shall elapse between the 5th day of December, in any year, and the day of my decease. And I do hereby declare and acknowledge that the aggregate amount which shall be found payable to my said son Thomas at the time of my decease for my board and maintenance, as aforesaid, shall be deemed, and will actually be, a debt then existing, and being due from me to him, but for which no interest-money whatever is to be paid to or claimed by him."

The testatrix died in July, 1856, and the executor paid the son £380 for the maintenance of the testatrix from 5th Dec., 1843, to the date of her death, as directed by the will, and took his receipt for the amount. In passing the account, this sum of £380 was objected to by Mr. "S. to Z.," who referred me to Mr. Walpole, and he to Mr. Trevor, the solicitor, upon the ground that the son of the testatrix could only recover at law six years' maintenance; and that, if such "gifts" were allowed, the revenue would be seriously defrauded, as (as Mr. Trevor argued) a rich testator might direct his executors to pay to a son or other relative, or friend, an annuity of £500 or £1,000 a year for maintenance, which might extend to twenty or even thirty years.

This objection I endeavoured to meet by referring Mr. Trevor to the case of Williamson v. Naylor (3 You. & Coll. 208), which, I submitted, was a case exactly in point (in which opinion, however, he differed from me); and I urged that £30 per annum was a reasonable sum for maintenance, and £500 or £1,000 per annum was not. I would refer you to the above case, in which it was decided (inter alia) that an acknowledgment of a debt in a will by the testator prevented the devisee's or creditor's claim from being barred by the Statute of Limitations, and therefore entitled him to recover the amount directed by the will to be paid. I then, as the question only involved a sum of £2 (barring the question of principle), asked if £380 would be allowed in the probate duty return, supposing that £180 only were allowed as a debt paid by the executor, and Mr. Trevor said that one payment would regulate the allowance of the same sum in the other case.

My arguments and interviews with Mr. Trevor being apparently in vain, and he stating, that, in the event of my "trying" the question, no part of the £380 would be allowed as a debt, and he threatening unless I consented to go what he termed "a step further," and inquire what had become of the testatrix's income for the last few years from some stock she had, I eventually gave way; and, after the usual "circumlocutionary" performances of passing the account, filling up a warrant, registering, paying, comptrolling, stamping, and waiting my turn to do each of these separate acts, I succeeded in paying the 2*l.* 2*s.* due to the Revenue for duty, and thus this part of the business was ended as I thought.

I must, however, here state that I respectfully denied (and do now deny) Mr. Trevor's right to go "the step further," and inquire about the testatrix's prior income from the stock, and, therefore, his right even to make such a statement at all. Supposing, however, that he had a right to do so, it is certainly very monstrous and unjust, to say the least of it; but I could have shown that the testatrix, having been in very ill health, and for the last eight years of her life confined to her bed, could not be, and, in fact, was not, nearly supported and kept for the moderate allowance of £30 per annum to her son; but that she applied her little income from the stock towards paying her doctor and purchasing other little delicacies and comforts, which £30 per annum certainly would not. Having thus passed the residuary account upon Mr. Trevor's own terms, I next sought to recover the amount, which had, as is usual, to be returned on account of probate duty, by reason of certain debts having been paid since the granting of the probate; but here, again, although the amount was small, the difficulties were not, and I will endeavour to give you in detail, for such of your fortunate readers as may never happen to have been in such sort, a short history of the necessary performance, in order to obtain a return of that which I conceive is wrongfully enforced in the first instance, as the testator's debts are invariably known at the time of granting probate or administration.

Having then drawn, engrossed, and had sworn by the executor in the country the long formal affidavit in the form and with the reference required and prescribed by the authorities at Somerset House, stating the death of the testator, the date of the grant, the amount the property was sworn under, the amount paid for probate duty, "the facts and circumstances of the case, to show how it happened that too much duty was paid," with "a true and perfect inventory, account, and valuation of the estate and effects whereof the said deceased was possessed, thereto subscribed and subjoined by the executor," the first thing was to take it to the Probate Duty Office at the top of the new buildings adjoining Somerset House (No. 25 I believe), where several people are generally waiting their turn, and (when it comes to yours) where the probate is first entered and marked by a young gentleman whose duty appears to be to do nothing else. With his hieroglyphics upon it, it is next taken to an agreeable old gentleman who sits in the same room behind the door on the right as you enter, who, in my case, required some proof that the debts which the executor had paid, and for which I produced receipts, actually were debts which he (the executor) was liable to pay. This, however, after a little mild conversation, he eventually waived, finding (as I suppose) that Mr. Trevor had only allowed the £180, instead of the £380 as before mentioned. He then took the probate and the affidavit, and said, that, on my producing the receipt in the form prescribed, signed by the solicitor to the executor, in about ten days' time, I should have the warrant for the amount of the returned probate duty (£7). This little interview lasted about one and a half hours. I then filled up the receipt in the prescribed form, and sent it into the country for signature. In due course it came back signed, and I applied for my warrant, when, lo and behold! on application to the aforesaid young gentleman, he handed me a small piece of paper, containing a kind of message, which had been circulated from one red-tape department to another, asking whether all duty had been paid on the estate, and the reply being, "not on this amount" (meaning the £7), I was again referred to Mr. "S. to Z.," who (having unavoidably kept me waiting some time) said it would be too late to pay the duty that day. I, therefore, "turned and left the spot," resolving to come some other day early in the morning, and, if necessary, spend the day there.

Accordingly, I again made my appearance there, and Mr. "S. to Z." having again looked into the residuary account, and made out a warrant or authority for me to pay the duty, which amounted to "one shilling and fourpence," and I having filled up another legacy duty receipt by the executor who was entitled to retain the money for the next of kin (in my turn), paid the said sum of 1*s.* 4*d.* to the receiver. I then (as before) had this one-and-fourpenny account duly registered, comptrolled, and stamped; and on my producing it to the aforesaid young gentleman in No. 25, he handed me the warrant for the £7, and the probate. This warrant I was directed to take to the Receiver-General (across the square of Somerset House), one of whose clerks, in an inner office, wrote me a cheque upon one in an outer office, and I eventually had the pleasure of receiving the said sum of £7 in cash. This attendance lasted upwards of two hours; and I assure you I would willingly have paid the duty six times over to have dispensed with such a nuisance; but, as I could neither obtain the £7 nor the probate without it, of course I had no alternative. I do not think the above facts require any comment. If they did, I could make plenty; and could also suggest a plan or plans for the abolition of such a circumlocutionary, red-tape, round-about, unnecessary performance, which should save the Government a large sum in collecting the Inland Revenue, and the public time too, and dispense with the services of many of the employés at Somerset House.

In conclusion, I think I ought to say that I experienced (and always have) great courtesy from all the gentlemen at Somerset House with whom I had to do in this matter in the discharge of their painfully tedious duty, and especially from Mr. Trevor, whom I was compelled to trouble with four interviews, and who must have much annoyance (and a good salary) for his endeavours to do the best he can for the Revenue. I have to apologise for the length of this communication; and, having no desire to appear in print by name, I enclose you my card, and remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

A Solicitor and (would-be)
Somerset House Reformer.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Fraudulent Trustees Bill.

The reports of amendments on the Fraudulent Trustees Bill and the Trustees' Relief Bill were considered and amended.

Married Women's Reversionary Interest Bill.

Lord Monteagle moved the second reading of this Bill. The object of the Bill was to enable married women to dispose of personal property in the same manner as under the Fines and Recoveries Act they were enabled to dispose of real property. It had been said that the Bill would lead to abuses; but unless it could be proved that the change of the law with regard to fines and recoveries led to abuses, he could not see how it was possible to reject the Bill on that ground. Lord St. Leonards opposed and defeated a Bill founded on the same principle in 1838; but he (Lord Monteagle) was willing to introduce certain amendments in committee.

Lord St. Leonards opposed the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to do away with the distinction between real and personal estate which had been left in reversion to married women. The noble Lord was very much mistaken in supposing that the Fines and Recoveries Act made any change in the law. That Act only made a change in the mode of applying it. A man who left a certain sum of money to his daughter's husband for life, with remainder to her and her children, thought that he had made provision for his child, and as the law now stood he did so; but if this Bill passed, the creditors of the husband would come down upon him. The law now protected the wife's interest as against the creditors of the husband; but if this Bill passed, the wife would divest herself of her own and her children's interest, in order to protect the credit and position of her husband. The effect of the Bill would be to force a sale of reversionary interests, which were always sold at a depreciated price. There were companies established in this metropolis for the express purpose of buying these reversionary interests. In conclusion, he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

The Lord Chancellor said that the Bill was a balance of advantages against disadvantages. On the ground of giving the greatest freedom to the disposition of property he should support the Bill, but he would stipulate that it should not come into operation before 1858.

Lord Campbell supported the Bill.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace Bill.

The Earl of Harrowby moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to give increased facility to suitors who might be dissatisfied with the decision at which justices of the peace, in cases in which they exercised a summary jurisdiction, might arrive, to submit the question at issue to the consideration of a superior court.

Lord Campbell approved of the principle of the Bill.

The Bill was read a second time.

Tuesday, Aug. 11.

Law Courts Commission.

Lord Campbell said, with reference to this Commission, that, as the report had not yet been laid on the table, and legislation, therefore, during the present session was impossible, it was desirable that the public mind should be disabused of some unfounded notions which prevailed. It had been stated that the puisne judges were almost sinecurists, having scarcely anything to do, and that the number should be materially diminished; but the Commission, including two lay members, Sir J. Pakington and Mr. W. Patten, and of which he was himself a member, after a most patient and laborious investigation, came unanimously to a resolution that there could be no diminution of their number without danger to the interests of justice.

The Lord Chancellor said that he had had the honour for eleven years of filling the office of a puisne judge, and though the labours of those judges were not quite equal to those of the chief justices, from the 1st of November till the long vacation their time was fully occupied. It had been said that he was wrong in recommending her Majesty to fill up vacancies pending the inquiry. But he found that if he had not done so he must have done what would have been most unsatisfactory to the provinces—namely, appoint deputies to perform the duties of judges pro hâc vice. Government would endeavour to frame a measure for carrying into effect the recommendations of the report, or any portions of them which they might think fit to adopt, and to introduce it early in the next session of Parliament.

The Attorneys and Solicitors (Colonial Courts) Bill, and the Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The Municipal Corporations Bill passed through committee.

Thursday, Aug. 13.

Municipal Corporations Bill.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

Married Women's Reversionary Interest Bill.

This Bill went through committee.

Wills of British Residents Abroad Bill.

Lord Wensleydale said there was a Bill standing for the second reading, which had reference to the wills of British subjects, in regard to personal property, who were domiciled in France, and other countries abroad, and the object of it was to enable persons who were domiciled abroad to make their wills in the English form. He did not think the Bill would serve the purpose for which it was framed; the true remedy for the present state of things being, in his opinion, for all wills to be made in duplicate, one will being in accordance with the law of the country where the testator was domiciled, and the other in accordance with the law of this country. Nothing could be easier, for example, than for a person to make one will in the French and another in the English form; and he begged to ask Lord Clarendon whether facilities might not be afforded for making this suggestion to English subjects domiciled in France and in other foreign States through the medium of our ambassadors and consular agents?

The Earl of Clarendon was favourably disposed towards the Bill alluded to. He did not think Lord Wensleydale could have adopted a better means of making known his suggestion than by stating it in the House. He would give his best attention to the matter in conjunction with the Lord Chancellor: and if they could devise any means by which her Majesty's diplomatic and consular agents abroad could communicate the suggestion to British residents, they would be very happy to do so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Aug 7.

Criminal Law Consolidation Bills.

Sir G. Grey said that the Government did not intend to proceed with these measures during this session. The orders for second reading would, therefore, be discharged, and early next session the Bills would be introduced and referred to a select committee.

Common Law Courts Commission.

Sir J. Pakington, in answer to a question by Mr. Warren, said that he believed that the Report of the Commission had been signed by all the members, and that it would very shortly be presented to the House; and therefore it would be inexpedient to enter into the recommendations at length; but he might say that certain modifications of the existing assizes were recommended.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

Upon clause 17, providing for protection of a wife's earnings when deserted by her husband,

The Attorney-General stated that this clause had been introduced at the instance of Lord St. Leonards from motives of humanity and benevolence, but the machinery devised for working out the principle laid down was, he believed, impracticable. The only alternative, therefore, as it appeared to him, was to adopt the view of Mr. Henley, and strike out the clause.

Mr. Henley suggested, for the consideration of the Attorney-General, whether much good would not be done, and the object of the clause effected, by giving the woman, in case of the desertion of her husband, a remedy, as regarded the protection of her earnings and property, by application to the county court.

Mr. Blackmore proposed, that, if it was thought that the responsibility was too great for an ordinary magistrate, the jurisdiction should be vested in the chairman or vice-chairman of Quarter Sessions, or the whole body of magistrates sitting at petty sessions or general sessions, but he objected to intrusting it to the county courts.

Mr. Napier said, that all the magistrate had to do was to make an order to protect for a time the earnings of the woman; and, if it were thought desirable, a provision might be inserted giving the creditors power to apply to the judge of a county court to set aside this order.

Sir J. Graham agreed that the principle of the 17th clause was valuable, if they could make it effective. He did not consider it would be right to give such a power to a single magistrate, or even to two justices sitting in petty sessions. But he would suggest to the committee that a very small extension of clause 18 would be an immense improvement to that clause, and at the same time give effect to that which it was desired by this 17th clause to accomplish. He would insert the word "earnings" in the 18th clause, making it extend to earnings as well as property, and he would extend the power which was given by that clause to the court in London to the county courts. Thus the county courts would have jurisdiction to protect the woman both in regard to property and earnings.

Mr. Henley observed that there was no class of cases with which the country magistrates had to deal so difficult as those of desertion. If a man left his wife and family, and they became chargeable to the parish, the parish authorities were sure to press upon the magistrates to send the man to gaol for the desertion, though he might have gone away with the view of seeking employment.

The Attorney-General said, he had no intention of abandoning the remedy which was embodied in the clause; but he was anxious that the other clauses should be affirmed before he suggested the means by which the principle of the clause should be carried into effect. If the committee would accept the pledge which he now gave, that another and a full opportunity should be given for the consideration and discussion of the subject, he would withdraw the clause, and endeavour to frame it in such a manner as he hoped would be better adapted for its purpose of protecting the interests of the humbler classes.

Sir E. Perry accepted the pledge, but expressed an opinion that a justice of the peace would be able to afford instantaneous relief. The county court judge sat only once a month, which would occasion a delay that might be attended with great hardship and injustice. In the case of a wife who had been deserted a year, if she were allowed to petition the county court judge, or apply to the court in London, the remedy would probably be sufficient.

The Attorney-General, in reply to Mr. Collins, said he thought the remedy should be given by the inferior tribunals for earnings, and by the superior tribunal for property. He would consolidate the 17th and 18th clauses, and leave the committee to deal with them.

The clause was put and negatived. Clause 18 was also negatived.

On clause 19, which provides for a separation on the part of the wife on account of desertion,

Mr. Butt proposed an amendment, the effect of which would be, in the particular case for which this clause provided redress, to enable the injured party to apply, not only to the central court established in London, but to the cheap and expeditious tribunal (the county court) which would be able to give local redress. Beyond an appeal to the ecclesiastical courts for restitution of conjugal rights, there were only two remedies by which a deserted wife could obtain redress from her husband, but they were indirect remedies. In the first place, if a wife was left by her husband without support she might throw herself as a pauper on the parish, and so compel him to contribute to her support; and this had been done, and even by ladies of rank, for the purpose of punishing their husbands. Another course was, that, if a wife could get any one to support her, the person so maintaining her had a right of action against the husband, and might receive adequate compensation. The one remedy was decided by the local magistrates, and the other was decided by a court of law, and it might be by the county court, the very court to which he wished to give the power of affording a remedy for the wife. This, certainly, touched on the wider question, whether the redress provided by the Bill should be administered by one central court or by local tribunals; and on the ultimate decision of that question would depend whether this Bill was to be one of reform or of centralisation. The Bill included two distinct measures. The first was the constitution of one great supreme tribunal, possessing the power and jurisdiction which were now exercised by a number of scattered local tribunals; and the other was the giving to this supreme tribunal the power of dissolving marriages to the extent and in the manner in which they were now dissolved by the Legislature. His amendment referred to the first proposition; and, as it stood, it did not propose to meddle with divorce. He then proceeded to argue against the system of centralisation which was involved in the provisions of the Bill, and urged, that, if the administration of the local courts were defective, it would be better to reform them than to take away their jurisdiction. There were at present about fifty local courts administering a cheap and easy remedy to any wife injured by the cruelty of her husband, by affording her a judicial separation and alimony; but for those courts the Bill substituted a central court sitting tn London.

The Attorney-General said this clause involved questions of the highest importance. In such cases the question was, whether there was reasonable excuse for the desertion. Now, one of the excuses might be adultery, and every ground of separation or divorce might become matter of controversy. Suppose an application made in the first instance for a judicial separation, and on grounds which afterwards involved an application for divorce, how difficult it would be to say that the decision of the inferior tribunal was to be slighted and disregarded by the superior tribunal; and, therefore, it seemed to him unadvisable to give power to an inferior tribunal to try, for a subordinate purpose, the very questions which might have to be tried by a superior one. He would accept the amendment to the extent of giving the county courts power to adjudicate in cases of judicial separation, whenever such a separation was sought on grounds which did not involve a final divorce.

Lord J. Russell understood that the only reason for enacting the 19th clause was, that hitherto desertion had not been a cause of divorce à mensâ et thoro. But another cause for judicial separation was not stated in the Bill, as the law was not altered in that respect—namely, cruelty by the husband to the wife. If power be given to the county court to deal with judicial separation, that court would have power to decide questions of cruelty, which under the present law was a cause of judicial separation. The principle on which Mr. Butt proceeded was a just one—namely, that, having destroyed the local courts, there should not be a transfer of the whole jurisdiction in matters of this kind to a central court, but that some equivalent should be given, and that a wife should have a local remedy against a husband. If that was so, the amendment had a wider scope than appeared on the face of the clause, for the county courts might, under it, deal with all cases of judicial separation. He wished the Attorney-General to state if it was only adultery which was to be excluded from the purview of the county courts?

Sir E. Perry felt great reluctance to give the power to the county courts to dissolve marriages; but for all other grievances, the poor classes ought to have access to the county courts.

Mr. Gladstone assumed that it was the desire of the committee to maintain the existing facilities for obtaining judicial separation; and he thanked Mr. Butt for having devised a method of raising a question which they had hitherto found it as impossible for them to get at as it would be hereafter for poor people to get at the central court of divorce. He would now take the liberty to point out a difficulty and an anomaly that would follow the adoption of the proposal of the Attorney-General. The proposed amendment must carry with it as a certain consequence that the clause would not be confined to cases of judicial separation for desertion only, but to all other cases for which judicial separation was obtainable. The Attorney-General allowed and gave jurisdiction to local tribunals only with the limitations which he had stated. But, then, supposing the county courts had power to deal with all cases except those matters which were connected with divorce à vinculo matrimonii, what would be the consequence? Under the Bill, the adultery of the wife enabled the husband to present a petition for a divorce à vinculo matrimonii; but the wife could not present a petition for a divorce à vinculo on account of the adultery of the husband. Now, as the adultery of the husband was not a ground of divorce à vinculo by the wife, she had a right to go to the county court for a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery; but the husband could not go to the county court for a judicial separation on the ground of adultery by his wife, because that was a subject which might come before the central court on a petition for a divorce à vinculo matrimonii.

Mr. Malins considered it desirable to have another tribunal beyond the central court, but did not think the county court a proper one. Assuming the judges of the county courts to be perfectly competent, they would not have sufficient time at their disposal. Cases of the description contemplated by this Bill frequently occupied days, and yet it was proposed to send them before courts which were already overburdened with business. He trusted the Attorney-General would not consent to have anything to do with the county courts.

The Attorney-General said the question for the consideration of the committee was this—ought the county court to be armed with authority not only to the extent now possessed by the Consistory Court of London, of decreeing divorce à mensâ et thoro, but in case of desertion. Divorce à mensâ et thoro was granted on the ground of cruelty and adultery. The Bill proposed to introduce a new principle—namely, desertion. Now whilst he entirely agreed in the expediency of investing local tribunals with all the authority that was required for the administration of justice in matters of necessity, he did not think they ought to be intrusted with matters which did not require to be dealt with in that expeditious and summary manner which was requisite in cases of debt. The county court jurisdiction was limited to civil matters, but it was now proposed to authorise them to determine matters of the most delicate nature, not only requiring a considerable knowledge of law, but great judicial ability. He did not think them a fitting tribunal for the decision of such cases. If the question was simply desertion continued for two years, which was so notorious as to require no judicial investigation, there would be no difficulty; but when the question arose whether desertion was without reasonable excuse, it involved the whole range of judicial inquiry, and introduced an issue which could not be properly decided by such a tribunal. If the committee determined that these matters should be within the cognisance of these local tribunals, the whole subject of judicial separation must be brought within the scope of their jurisdiction.

Lord J. Manners trusted the amendment would be put to the committee in such a form that all who were favourable to local jurisdiction would be able to vote for it, because many members were favourable to local jurisdiction who did not think county courts a fitting tribunal. He would, therefore, suggest the insertion of the words, "any court that may hereafter be authorised by this Act."

Mr. Butt said he would accept the proposition, and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Malins objected to the withdrawal of the amendment, and insisted on having the decision of the committee as to county courts.

Mr. Butt said, as Mr. Malins objected to the withdrawal of the amendment, he would ask the committee to negative it. His object was to raise the question of local jurisdiction.

The amendment was put and negatived.

Lord J. Manners then proposed to insert the words "or any court authorised by this Act."

Sir G. Grey asked what court it was that was meant. The committee had just unanimously rejected the proposition that it should be the county court, and had thereby rejected the only courts available.

Lord J. Manners said the amendment of Mr. Butt was to give jurisdiction to the county courts, and, to his surprise, the Attorney-General partially accepted the principle of local jurisdiction, but said he wished to put certain restrictions upon it. Many gentlemen said they were in favour of local jurisdiction, but were not in favour of county courts. That being so, he proposed this amendment which would leave it open to the Government, if they were sincere in their desire to carry out the proposal of Mr. Butt, to frame clauses in the Bill to meet the general desire for courts of local jurisdiction. It was very important that the people in the country should not be deprived of the courts with local jurisdiction that they had now.

Sir G. Grey said the effect of carrying out this amendment would be to cast upon the Government a responsibility which they entirely disclaimed.

Mr. Butt said the committee, by affirming the amendment now before them, would only declare that they would not give exclusive jurisdiction to the central court, and that they reserved the question of the local courts for future consideration. He was perfectly ready, if the Attorney-General would not, to draw up clauses which would carry out the amendment. He could conceive clauses giving part of the jurisdiction to the courts of assize, part to the quarter sessions, and part, with great advantage, to the county courts.

Mr. Disraeli said the question was whether they should have local jurisdiction or not. They had an opportunity now of asserting a principle which he believed to be sound, just, and politic, and one to which the people of this country was devoted.

Lord J. Russell said, whatever difficulty he might have in voting for the amendment, he felt much greater difficulty in voting for the clause as it stood. When Mr. Butt moved to give jurisdiction to the county courts, the Attorney-General partially assented to the proposal, and it was not till some time after that he made the objections that he did. This clause proposed that judicial separation should take place only on petition to the central court, and thereby they would for ever destroy and part with the local tribunals. He thought they ought to make some attempt not to destroy all these courts, because, whatever benefit might be derived from the other parts of the Bill, this would be a great injury. He should be sorry to assent to this clause, enacting that these local courts should be destroyed, and that no substitution should be made for them. The committee then divided—For the amendment, 98; against it, 87: majority, 11.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clauses 22 and 23—"A wife divorced à mensâ et thoro to be considered as to property a feme sole," and "also for the purpose of making contracts or suing," were agreed to.

On clause 24, Mr. Gladstone said the clause only provided that parties who had been judicially separated, but who had come together again, might cause a declaration to that effect to be filed. Would it not be better to make it imperative upon them to record in some formal manner the fact of their re-entering into the full married state? He could conceive it possible that if the matter were left optional, the parties, though reconciled, might find it convenient to preserve the state of judicial separation as a bar to the rights of creditors.

Mr. Adams said, the language of the clause must be altered to suit the decision the committee had just come to. Did the Attorney-General intend to accept that decision, and frame the necessary clauses himself?

Sir E. Perry said the amendment had been supported by both sides of the House, and he trusted the Attorney-General would give way and frame clauses to carry it out. There was no chance of new courts being established, and the county courts were the only ones the poor could go to.

Mr. Henley wished to know what would be the position of parties who signed the declaration. Were they to remain with all the conveniences of man and wife in one sense, and without the inconvenience in another? Was their property to be separated whilst their persons were united?

The Attorney-General said the clause was not in the Bill as originally introduced, but had been added by Lord St. Leonards. The effect, as he understood it, was, that, when a judicial separation took place, the after-acquired property of the wife became her separate property; and if the parties came together again, it would be affected by any debts of hers, and her creditors would have a remedy against it. There was some difficulty, however, in construing the clause, when taken in connection with the 22nd.

Sir F. Kelly said these clauses introduced entirely new principles. By the 22nd clause, when a sentence of separation was pronounced, the property of the wife was to be considered as that of a feme sole; but if the parties came together again, the 24th clause would produce the greatest complication.

Mr. Malins asked what would be the effect of the 22nd and 24th clauses, in the case where declaration was not made until after the parties had cohabited for some time?

The Attorney-General said that his opinion was, that the 24th was at variance with the 22nd clause, and he should therefore propose to negative it.

Mr. Ayrton apprehended that the omission of the 24th clause would not free this question from difficulty. In fact, he believed that the Bill would lead to endless perplexity unless the 22nd clause as well as the 24th were got rid of.

Mr. Gladstone thought that some assurance should be given that the Government would give effect to the decision of the committee. He should like to know whether Mr. Butt intended to prepare clauses.

Mr. Butt said that if the Attorney-General desired it, he would undertake to frame clauses and submit them to him.

The clause was negatived.

On clause 25, Mr. Drummond moved the omission of the word "incestuous;" which was negatived on a division by 126 to 65.

Joint-Stock Companies.

Mr. Wilson obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856.

Mr. W. S. Fitzgerald obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law with respect to judgments.

Tuesday, August 11.

Probates and Letters of Administration Bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of this Bill, as amended.

Mr. Westhead, in lieu of clause 91, moved a clause, making it obligatory on the acting judge and registrar of every ecclesiastical or other court now having jurisdiction to grant probate or administration, except the registrars of certain courts mentioned in schedule A, upon receiving a requisition under the seal of the Court of Probate, to transmit to the District Court of Probate in which such ecclesiastical or other court was locally situate, all records of wills, probates, &c., to be deposited in such district registry so as to be easy of reference.

The clause was withdrawn on the Attorney-General giving an assurance that the clause in the Bill should be modified so as to carry out the object of Mr. Westhead in another form.

The proposed clause was then withdrawn.

Mr. Westhead then proposed to add a clause, providing for the compensation of advocates practising in the province of York and the diocese of Ripon, to the value of one-half their net profits under the present system.

The Attorney-General opposed the clause as introducing a principle hitherto unheard of into the Bill.

The clause was negatived without a division.

Mr. Ayrton then moved the following clause:—"That every person to whom any compensation shall be granted under this Act, shall, at all times when called upon, be liable to fill any public office or situation in England under the Crown for which his previous services in any office abolished by this Act may render him eligible; and that if he shall decline to take upon himself such office or situation, and execute the duties thereof satisfactorily, being in a competent state of health, he shall forfeit his right to any compensation or allowances which may have been granted to him in respect of such previous services, under s. 19 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 24."

The Attorney-General did not think that the statute of Will. 4 applied in the manner supposed in the clause.

Sir J. Graham thought the operation of the clause would be salutary, as it seemed to be the application of the principle of half-pay in the army, and he should therefore support it.

The clause was added to the Bill.

The Attorney-General, in reply to a question from Sir F. Kelly, said it was his intention to bring up a clause to the effect that if the judge of the Court of Probate should also become the judge of the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes he should be placed, with regard to salary, in the same position as the judges of the superior courts of common law.

Mr. Hadfield moved an amendment on clause 45, with the object of allowing all solicitors and attorneys to practise in the Court of Admiralty, and also in divorce and matrimonial cases, as well as in courts of probate.

The Attorney-General said the Divorce Bill, which he hoped would pass during the present session, threw open the divorce courts, so that it was unnecessary to introduce such a provision in the present Bill; but with regard to the Court of Admiralty, he had no objection to include it.

The amendment was modified and agreed to.

On clauses 48 and 49, Mr. Hadfield moved to leave out "affidavits," and insert "statutory declaration or solemn affirmation," with the view of doing away with unnecessary oaths in the Court of Probate. But he withdrew his amendment on the Attorney-General undertaking to effect his object in preparing the rules of procedure for the Court of Probate.

On clause 56, Sir F. Kelly proposed the following amendment—"And every judge of a county court having jurisdiction under this Act, whose salary shall be less than £1,500 a-year, shall be paid out of the Testamentary Fee Fund, in lieu of any fees for the business done by him under this Act, so much money annually as, together with his salary as a county court judge, shall amount to £1,500."

The amendment was opposed on a point of form, and withdrawn. But Sir F. Kelly intimated that he should revive the question on another opportunity.

On clause 99, Mr. Spooner moved an amendment to entitle county courts' registrars to certain fees under the Act.

This amendment was also withdrawn on a point of form.

On clause 108, Mr. Rolt moved an amendment to give compensation to the managing clerks of proctors; which was also opposed by Mr. Wilson as informal, and negatived without a division.

In the Schedule,—Mr. Collins moved that the West Riding, for the purpose of probate duties, should be divided into two districts; and that Leeds should be the place of district registry for the wapentakes of Ewecross, Staincliffe, Claro (including the liberty of Ripon), Skyrack, Barkston, Ash, and for the borough of Leeds.

Mr. Baines seconded the amendment.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Wednesday, August 12.

Probates and Letters of Administration Bill.

Mr. Malins expressed his regret that compensation had not been given to the proctors' clerks and to the four advocates at York, and urged upon the Government the necessity of bearing in mind the cases of those gentlemen, and giving them the preference in any appointments that might be made under the Bill.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

Joint-Stock Companies Act (1856) Amendment Bill.

Mr. Wilson moved amendments in its single clause, to limit its operation to a revival of the Act the 8th Vict. c. 110, passed in the year 1844, with regard to insurance companies now established, or hereafter to be established. This Act was by an error repealed by the Act of last year, and hence the necessity for the present Bill.

The amendments were agreed to, and the Bill passed through committee.

Thursday, Aug. 13.

Verdicts of Non-Proven.

Mr. W. Ewart gave notice that next session he should move for leave to introduce a Bill to enable juries in England and Ireland to return verdicts of "Not proven."

The Law of Elections.

Sir F. Kelly gave notice of his intention next session to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the election of members to serve in Parliament; also to extend to certain classes of her Majesty's subjects the right of voting in the election of members to serve in Parliament.

Registration of Titles.

Sir F. Kelly also gave notice of his intention next session to bring in a Bill for the registration and security of titles, and for the facilitating the conveyance of land.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The morning and evening sittings were occupied with Clause 25; which was not passed when the chairman was ordered to report progress.

Judgments Bill.

This Bill was read a second time.

Fraudulent Trustees Bill.

The Lords' amendments to this Bill were considered and agreed to.

Charitable Trusts Act Continuance Bill.

This Bill, the object of which is to amend the law respecting Roman Catholic charities, and to place them on the same footing as other charities, was read a second time.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

Friday Evening.

The Election Committees concluded their labours on Friday last, after a session of five weeks. Between fifty and sixty petitions were presented against returns, but only thirty-two members went through the ordeal of an investigation by a select committee; of these thirty-two members, nine only were unseated—rather more than one fourth of the number. The names of the unseated members are:—G. H. Moore, Mayo; C. Neate, Oxford; A. O. Flaherty, Galway; James Merry, Falkirk; Messrs. M'Cullagh and Watkins, Great Yarmouth; J. M. Heathcote, Huntingdon; E. A. Glover, Beverley; J. P. Somers, Sligo. Analysing these "unfortunate" candidates, we find that five only were unseated for bribery, one for undue influence, one for want of a qualification, and two on a scrutiny. A very singular feature is found on looking into the reports of all the committees who sat to consider the petitions—viz., that not only is there a great tendency to extreme leniency on the part of the Parliamentary tribunals, but an earnest desire to try and persuade themselves that the sitting member has been kept in ignorance of the bribery, when it is proved. Circumstantial evidence appears to have no weight with these committees. They seem to establish, by mutual consent a rule, that, unless it is proved to them that the sitting member is actually the instrument of paying the money, or administering the bribe, he is guiltless of all bribery. Another strange feature is that members, whose seats are disputed, are frequently sitting in judgment on some other petition.

If any one wants to get at the bottom of the evils attending the whole system of elections and election petitions, let him on a future occasion only walk down the committee lobbies, and first watch the crowd who are waiting to be examined, and, having gratified his curiosity outside, spend an hour or two in a room where a bribery and treating case is going on. Unless a new state of things springs up, a visitor to the House of Commons will perceive that the influence of gin and beer is kept up to the last; and, however early it may be in the morning, he will find that many of the witnesses have had a pretty fair allowance. He will have an opportunity also of hearing the nearest approach to perjury which some of the free and independent electors think safe—some of the witnesses attempting to browbeat the committee and counsel, and boldly stating that "they never vote without being paid, and never will, and upon the present occasion they were paid," and swearing hard that they don't know who paid them. Other of the witnesses, being timid men, try the prevaricating and quibbling plan, with a hope to slip through the meshes of the net, and perhaps should be classed by themselves as "cautious liars," in contradistinction to "bold perjurers." What have become of the petitions in respect of which no proceedings were taken? Some of them were literally appointed for committee, and in consequence of the pressure from without, which must have induced their abandonment, a Parliamentary measure has been introduced fixing the agent to the petition with double costs in all cases where petitions do not proceed. Mr. Oliveira, in the celebrated Pontefract case, made a clean breast of his peccadilloes, and told how much he had paid for bribery in 1852, and how much for the withdrawal of his petition. Mr. Roupell, the member for Lambeth, stated that an intimation was made to him that the Lambeth election petition might be withdrawu on his becoming a Director of the South London Railway, and there is little doubt but that many members whose moral courage was not of the strongest, have paid for the withdrawal of the petitions. Only let Mr. Shark, the Borough agent, get half-a-dozen cases of bribery against a timid member for whom he procures his seat, and it is as good as a thousand pounds in his pocket. Is it good or is it bad that a member of Parliament, who has been guilty of bribery, should feel himself in the hands of rogues with whom he has had dealings, or should he be able virtually to take his leave of them as soon as he has taken his seat?

Various interpretations have been placed by committees on the question of expenses paid to voters, and to committee-men. Mr. Neate fell a victim to over-liberality at Oxford, whereas Mr. Roupell rode over the course for Lambeth, and the petitioners were saddled with costs. There seems no rule established by which the number of clerks and committee-men can be safely reckoned on as legal or illegal; or by which they can be apportioned to the size of the electoral district or number of voters.

Another very conflicting state of things is found in the decisions of committees on questions of undue influence. In the Mayo case, the flagrant proceedings of the Roman Catholic body very properly lost Mr. Moore his seat. In the Drogheda case, which was "on all fours" with Mayo, the committee decided that the authorities did not use proper means to save confusion and riot, and allowed the member to retain his seat. In the Dublin case, the Protestant party were attacked, and the committee seated both members, but found that the Protestant Society demanded re-payment of £16 from Mr. Grogan; but there was no evidence to show whether the demand was paid.

Looking at the whole case, and taking a glance at the proceedings of the twenty-five committees, it seems, that, so long as there are needy voters and active canvassers, there will be bribery and corruption, and members must pay directly or indirectly for their seats; but it does seem a most extraordinary state of things that members whose return to Parliament is questioned should be allowed to sit on election committees themselves.

The Sligo case stands quite per se. It was a scrutiny case, and was disposed of in an hour or two by the rejection of Mr. Patrick Somers. The poll-clerk acted as Mr. Somers' most active agent. A voter, who is a well-known man in Sligo, tenders his vote to the poll-clerk, who is intimately acquainted with his person, name, and identity—Poll-clerk: What's your name? Voter: John Brown.—Poll-clerk: No such name here. Voter: My other name is Thomas.—Poll-clerk: Too late; you should have said so at first. Can't take your vote.

Of course such a state of things as this could not stand the ordeal of a committee for a longer time than was necessary to test a sufficient number of votes, but it does seem hard that a member should incur the expense of putting himself in a right position in the teeth of such a palpable fraud.

There is one case—the Beverley—in which the House intend to prosecute the member. It was a case of want of qualification.

The House had a fine lot of delinquents in the shape of offenders against the Bribery Act, and if they content themselves with only selecting the two Roman Catholic Priests at Mayo, for prosecution, it is almost a fair inference for the public to draw, that after all, bribery and corruption, are very venial sins in the eyes of the majority of the House of Commons.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The closing price of Consols for money is 90⅞, being a rise from the lowest point, 89¾, of yesterday, of 1⅛ per cent. During the last three days the fluctuations have been great, but a better feeling now prevails, and an advance has been established of ⅜ per cent. upon the latest price as announced by us last week. The particulars of Indian intelligence received this afternoon are considered to be quite as favourable as the telegraphic despatches indicated; and, although Delhi was not taken when the mail left, anxiety is relieved on several important points. Such, at least, appears to be the view prevailing in the city, and operating to give buoyancy to the English funds. The vague rumours existing a few days since of the capture of Delhi are proved to be destitute of foundation; and it is strange and almost incredible that such utterly baseless fictions should be allowed to influence speculation. If it were the fact that any rise in the funds was caused by this report, it is satisfactory to observe that the funds have not fallen on proof that the report was false. The just opinion would seem to be, that the taking of Delhi is merely a question of no very long time, and that the event may be awaited without the excessive anxiety which has been expressed in various quarters.

From the Bank of England Return for the week ending the 8th of August, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,547,440, being a decrease of £358,540; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,283,754, showing a decrease of £18,398 when compared with the previous return. Nothing was done by the Bank Directors yesterday as to raising the rate of discount.

Money on Wednesday, and particularly yesterday, was plentiful both in Lombard-street and on the Stock-exchange. In the former, yesterday, transactions took place at 5¼ per cent., and on the Exchange the price was 4 to 5 per cent. To-day there has been more demand, but the supply is fully equal to it at 5 per cent. on the Stock-exchange and Bank rates in Lombard-street.

An impression prevails to some extent that the Government may take a loan of heavy amount for the service of the East India Company. There is no doubt that of late years the wealth of the community in general in our East India possessions, especially in Bengal, has marvellously increased. The disasters attendant upon the present military revolt are peculiarly distressing, and the loss of treasure is something considerable. It is possible the insurrection may assume such proportions as to render the immediate raising of money impracticable. But the wealth of the community has not yet suffered materially, and after the lapse of some little time, means will probably be found to collect taxes, and the country will be neither unable nor unwilling to pay them. The debt due from the East India Company to the wealthy people and territorial proprietors of India, is valid security, that those persons will continue their support to the present order of things; and it cannot be doubted that if England makes herself answerable for the liabilities of India, the bond which secures to the present ruling power the support of native property and influence will become more weak.

It appears to be at length decided that the new Westminster Bridge is to occupy the same site as the old bridge. It is admitted that considerable advantage in regard to the view of the new palace from the bridge, and in regard to the appearance of the bridge itself, would be obtained by changing the site. But the first Commissioner of Works, taking into account the great expense to be incurred if the site of the bridge be changed, refrains from making any recommendation to the Government for that purpose. Nevertheless, it will rest with the House of Commons to consider and decide this important point. It is understood that the additional expense would chiefly arise by the cost of houses and ground on the north side of Bridge-street. This expense is expected to be large, without any change of site. It would be very much larger if the new bridge was to be placed, as proposed, some considerable space northward of the site of the old bridge.

LEGAL FRUITS OF THE SESSION.

The determination of Lord Palmerston, and the skill and energy of the Attorney-General, have secured a larger crop of measures for the amendment of the law than we had ventured to hope for only a few weeks ago. The difficulties which were anticipated in dealing with the proctors' compensation have not been allowed to defeat the long-desired reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and, although some exception may be taken to the price paid for the improvement of the Probate jurisdiction, it is impossible to doubt, that, even in a pecuniary sense, there will be some immediate and a large prospective gain to the public; while the monopoly which ousted the profession from testamentary business is, at the same time, abolished, and the conflicts of a multitude of limited jurisdictions are swept away for ever. Assuming that due care is exercised in the appointments to local offices under the new Act, we see no reason to doubt the wisdom of the amendments by which the proposed pecuniary limit on their powers has been removed; and we cannot help observing that the argument derived from the assumed inefficiency of local courts seems to have lost all its influence on the minds of Ministers from the moment when they found that the consent of the proctors was not to be bought by the partial monopoly which, in defiance of all principle and common sense, it was originally proposed to continue in their favour. Of the two courses, it is undoubtedly better policy to pay them off in hard cash, than to cripple the machinery of the new courts by retaining any trace of the old exclusive system. We are, therefore, not only rejoiced that the Ecclesiastical Courts have been abolished on any terms, but we are disposed to prefer the bargain which has now been concluded to that which the Attorney-General originally offered.

The other branch of ecclesiastical jurisdiction with which Parliament has dealt has also been committed to a satisfactory and open court. It would carry us beyond our special class of subjects to discuss the principles by which Parliament has been guided in determining the conditions under which divorce or judicial separation may henceforth be obtained; but, so far as the constitution and procedure of the proposed court is concerned, we have every reason to be content. The settlement of disputed questions of fact by the aid of a jury trial, either before the court itself or on circuit, as the nature of each case may render most convenient, is the only sound basis which could be adopted; and the boon of local jurisdiction in separation cases, involving of course the grant of alimony, will add greatly to the efficiency of the procedure. The final compromise between the different tribunals suggested for the purpose is perhaps the best of which the case admitted; and, by giving a concurrent jurisdiction to the justices and others named in the Commission of Assize, with the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, an opportunity will be afforded for testing by actual experience the comparative advantages of the two courts. After a short time, there can be little doubt, that whichever may be found the most convenient and satisfactory tribunal will absorb the whole local business, and the doubts which it was difficult to decide à priori will thus eventually solve themselves. Nor ought we to omit, in our enumeration of the benefits which the measure will confer, that the business both of the central and the local divorce courts will be open to the whole body of legal practitioners, instead of being confined, as heretofore, to a privileged class.

The Act for the prevention of fraudulent breaches of trust has finally passed, with some improvement in its phraseology, and in certain minor provisions, but without any change to affect the large and comprehensive principle on which it was originally framed. The panic at first excited by the proposition to add the chance of a criminal prosecution to the other unenviable liabilities of private trustees has already shown symptoms of subsidence, and we believe that a very little reflection will convince all honest trustees that they cannot possibly be annoyed by proceedings which can only be instituted when the Attorney-General has first been satisfied that there has been, not an ordinary irregularity, but a breach of trust "with intent to defraud."

That the Insolvent Joint-Stock Companies Bill will prevent in future oppressive proceedings such as those by which the shareholders in the Royal British Bank were victimised, there can be no question; though we should have been better satisfied with the measure, if it had removed entirely the conflict of jurisdiction between Lincoln's-inn and Basinghall-street, instead of giving the prize to the court which establishes its title by superior diligence. The Act, in fact, bears marks of having been framed in haste to patch up the affairs of the two insolvent banks, instead of providing adequately against the recurrence of similar evils in future; and we shall not be surprised to find, that, in some future session, it will be found necessary to introduce a Bill to amend the Act of 1857, by assimilating the mode of winding up banks and other companies, founded on the basis of unlimited liability, to that which was adopted in the recent statute, by which the privilege of trading with limited liability was conferred. Except in the amount of the calls which may have to be made, there is no distinction, so far as winding up is concerned, between the position of limited and unlimited companies, and we see no reason why precisely the same machinery should not be applied to both.

While we notice with satisfaction the majority of the Acts which have been passed, we cannot help regretting the postponement or withdrawal of bills on other legal subjects of not less importance. We do not, however, extend our regret to the so-called Consolidation Bills which were introduced on the authority of the Statute Law Commissioners. Until the Commission contrives to gain a much larger share of public confidence than, as at present constituted, it either enjoys or is likely to enjoy, it will never pass a single Bill. Consolidation Bills, if they are to be enacted on a large scale, must be taken in great part on trust; and, in order that this trust may be reposed, the framers must be men on whom Parliament can rely, not only for skill in the performance of their duty, but for a conscientious determination not to transgress the limits assigned to them. It is enough to say that this is not the feeling with which the public is inclined to regard the Commission as a whole, whatever may be the respect felt for the majority of the members of which it is composed.

The most serious omission of the Government is the neglect to prepare a Bill to test the practicability of the suggestions made by the Registration Commissioners. It was intimated that this would be done by the Attorney-General before the prorogation; and, although hasty legislation was neither desirable nor possible, it would have greatly conduced to the ultimate settlement of the question if the views of the Government had been thus early embodied in a Bill, for the consideration of the profession during the recess.

Upon the whole, the Session of 1857, short as it is, deserves to be ranked among the most fruitful in the matter of law reform. We hope that the ability of the Attorney-General will be devoted to the same subject in another year, with no abatement of zeal; and that, among the measures to be introduced, a Bill for the completion of the Chancery Reform commenced in 1852 will not be the last to be thought of.

THE REPORT ON JUDICIAL BUSINESS.

We republished last week, from a contemporary, a summary of the recommendations of the Common Law Commissioners upon the maintenance of the existing number of judges, and the redistribution of the circuits. The Report itself is now before us. It contains, of course, a considerable number of details of which the interest is chiefly local; but it incidentally touches upon many matters which no member of the profession can regard with indifference.

The first point to which the Commissioners direct their attention is the question, whether the number of common law judges can be safely diminished? and they are unanimous in maintaining the negative. Indeed, we cannot imagine how any one practically acquainted with the administration of justice can think otherwise. There has been much ignorant and foolish talk about the degree in which the establishment of county courts and the progress of law reform has diminished the business of the higher tribunals; but the evidence given in the Blue Book before us conclusively proves that the natural consequences which might have been expected to follow from the increased wealth and commerce of the country have, in fact, taken place. Little pottering actions about petty trespasses and so forth have, no doubt, greatly diminished in number; and a vast quantity of matters of form and of course which used to be transacted in open court, have given place to a more rational procedure. The Superior Courts have also been freed, to a great extent, from the drudgery of hearing undefended causes. Questions incident to a more primitive state of society—such as disputes about territorial rights, boundaries, rights of way, the enjoyment of watercourses, and so forth—have been to a very great extent exhausted; and the political prosecutions, which formerly found so much employment for the Crown side of the Queen's Bench, have disappeared. This is one side of the question; but, on the other hand, the really substantial and important business has greatly increased. Causes are heard far more fully, and yet business is despatched much more quickly than was formerly the case. "Lord Campbell," says Baron Martin, "must recollect when there were hundreds of remanets in the Queen's Bench." There are very few now. The late Mr. Lavie says, that, in old times, "there was a complete monopoly in the Court of Queen's Bench. There was very little done comparatively in the Court of Common Pleas, and nothing at all in the Court of Exchequer. The whole of the business was then in the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was two years before causes were tried." When Mr. Lavie first practised there was no Nisi Prius business in the Court of Exchequer, and, except when the Chief Baron or other judges sat in equity, they had very little to do. "I recollect the first civil cause which was ever tried in the Court of Exchequer." Notwithstanding the cessation of political prosecutions, the business on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench has largely increased. Rating cases, and similar matters which are really civil, though the Crown is nominally a party, more than supply the gap left by the absence of ex officio informations.

If any doubt could remain as to the impolicy of diminishing the number of judges, Baron Bramwell's evidence would put an end to it. His opinion is given in a most amusing and characteristic manner. He shows, by a careful calculation, that, independently of the long vacation, which to a judge may be, on an average, two months, he has forty-four days in which he does not discharge any duties in public; and he argues, with irresistible humour, that this is not too much for a man who has to read all the reports, to write judgments, to get up his special papers and paper books in cases of error, and so forth. His Lordship enters into an elaborate argument to prove that it is desirable that a judge should decide right, combating, apparently, a vulgar notion that it does not much matter how he decides. "I think it really is of the greatest importance that one should not be hurried in that particular matter" (writing judgments), "because, in the first place, you have to decide between the particular parties; and the result of a wrong decision is, that you give to one man what belongs to another." Secondly, "the losing party is never satisfied; but if he thought that he not only had had injustice done him, but that that injustice was attributable to the haste or indifference of the judge, just consider how much greater his dissatisfaction would be." Thirdly, you lay down a bad precedent by a wrong decision; and though the common impression is, apparently, that it does not much matter how you decide so long as something is decided, Baron Bramwell holds the singular theory that right decisions are better than wrong ones. His reason for this peculiar view is, that a bad decision causes so much litigation:—"Attempts are made to distinguish other cases; so that at length the case gets nibbled and carped at, and shaken, till, somehow, it is gone." Then a judge ought to read the Reports. "As I said before, I cannot read them without consuming time in reading them. I am almost reluctant to call it a labour, because, as I have said, it is more often to me an amusement than anything else; but if it were not an amusement, I should still have it to do. No doubt, if it were not there to be done, one could not do it. So that, in that sense, it may be said that a multiplicity of reports causes an additional amount of occupation." In short, the Baron works from morning to night, and we are much afraid seven days in the week. "I do not want to trouble the Commission with personal details, but I can undertake to tell them that I very often work, certainly as often as not, and am obliged to work, after I have come out of court, and after I have had my dinner. I work in the evening, in short; and at other times which one need not more particularly name, but which are not included in any of the days which are here mentioned." A deputation from Exeter Hall should wait on his Lordship without further delay.

The alterations suggested in the distribution of the circuits are not very extensive, nor, with some exceptions, are they of great importance. It is proposed to add York to the Midland, and Warwick to the Oxford Circuit. Hereford and Shrewsbury are to be given to the North and South Wales Circuits; two judges going to Cardiff and Swansea, where they are, we suppose, to separate, and complete the Welsh Circuits as at present, meeting at Chester. Manchester is to have a separate assize; and there is a division of opinion upon the question whether or not Birmingham should also have an assize of its own. These suggestions seem to us reasonable enough, and we feel that the claim of Manchester to a separate assize is stated with irresistible force by the Commissioners, whose recommendation will, we trust, be acted upon without delay. It is singular that no evidence was given upon the subject of the remodelling of the circuits as distinguished from the question of the claims of particular towns. The Northern, Midland, and Oxford Circuits have all been more or less altered without the examination of a single witness about the wishes or convenience of any branch of the legal profession. We do not say that such considerations are by any means the most important, but they might have been stated.

COMMITTEE FOR PRIVILEGES.

The Attorney-General observed, that, without reference to the deeds of 1700 and 1718, he was of opinion that there was proof that Sir John of Grafton was the eldest son of Sir John of Albrighton. The will of that person stated that he had three sons, and other documents had been put in in which other children were mentioned, and the inscription on the tombstone at Bromsgrove had not been satisfactorily deciphered. This was a material point, as the authenticity of the tomb was not denied, and it might happen that other male issue of that marriage might be discovered. The deeds of 1700 and 1718 did not clear up this point, and he thought there ought to be delay in order to ascertain more satisfactorily the inscription on the tombstone. It was then suggested that John of Grafton had a son, named Gilbert, besides those which had been found in the pedigree before the House, and although that person was mentioned in a deed of settlement executed in the lifetime of Gilbert, yet he was not mentioned in a patent of precedence granted to the youngest son of the Earl; and the inference, therefore, was that he was dead when it was granted, and most probably unmarried. With regard to the legitimacy of John of Salwarp, every attempt to prove him illegitimate had failed. Sherrington of Rudge had three sons who were stated to have died without issue, and the youngest of them, Thomas, was not mentioned in the Benefactors' Book; but it was shown only yesterday that he had a son called Sherrington, who married Sarah Squire, and had issue a son and a daughter, and this circumstance showed the necessity of delay for further inquiry; especially as it appeared that Thomas was in indigent circumstances, and an outcast from the family, and so might have been probably left out of the pedigree. The next person of importance was Charles, the brother of Sir John of Lacock, who was stated to have died without issue; but it appeared that he left a will, in which he left certain property to his son Gilbert. This Charles was most probably the one named in the Talbot pedigree. He next came to another brother, as he was called, of Sir John of Lacock, whose name was Gilbert; and with reference to this point there was so much difficulty, that, on the part of the Crown, he must urge delay for the purpose of inquiry. The birth of this Gilbert had been proved, as well as his marriage with Ann Hythe, in 1686, and it was urged that he was a descendant of a junior branch of the Talbot family. Thus two Gilberts were shown to have existed at the same time; but both sides claimed the Gilbert who married Ann Hythe. With regard to the settlement of 1718, that might either confirm or throw doubt on the pedigree. There were two points on which he had no doubt; and that was, that William of Whittington was the father of the Bishop of Durham, and that the bishop was married, and that his son Charles, afterwards Lord Chancellor, who was the ancestor of the claimant, was legitimate. As regarded the settlement of 1718, he was of opinion that the Duke of Shrewsbury recognised the bishop as a kinsman; yet it did not appear in what relation he stood to the Duke, and especially with reference to the title. The committee of that House in 1718 were evidently not satisfied with the statement of the bishop with regard to the state of the family, and they left the pedigree open. As the bishop had not satisfactorily proved his pedigree to the Duke of Shrewsbury or to the committee, he was of opinion that every possible opportunity ought to be given for acquiring further information before their Lordships decided this case.

Lord CAMPBELL.—Do you, on the part of the Crown, propose to institute further inquiries, and ask for time to do so?

The Attorney-General.—I ask for time for that purpose, and I shall make a report to that effect in the proper quarter.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that what the House had to consider was, whether Lord Talbot had made out his claim, and not whether there were any other persons who might be discovered, and who might be claimants.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said, he thought the course adopted by the Attorney-General was unusual.

Lord REDESDALE said, he did not remember any other instance of the kind.

Lord WENSLEYDALE said, there was no precedent for the Crown taking an active part in such an inquiry as the present.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he never heard of the Crown's investigating any case of a claim to a peerage.

The Attorney-General said, he must leave the matter in the discretion of the House.

After some consultation among their Lordships,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that this important case had been most elaborately argued; but all the House had to decide was, whether the claim of Earl Talbot to the title of Earl of Shrewsbury had been made out; for with the question of the large estates attached to the earldom they had nothing to do. However anxious he might be to decide the question before the House as quickly as possible, he did not think that it would be doing justice to the parties concerned if they did not take time to consider their decision; and he should, therefore, move to adjourn the case sine die—that was until the next session of Parliament.

The further consideration of the case was therefore adjourned sine die.

THE HEADLEY PEERAGE—HOUSE OF LORDS, Aug. 20.

Mr. Fleming, as counsel for Lord Headley, supported the claim of Lord Headley to vote at the election of representative peers for Ireland. He stated that the first creation of a Baron Headley was in November, 1797, when Sir George Alison Wynn, a Baronet and a Baron of the Exchequer in Scotland, was, by letters patent, created Baron Headley of Aghadoe, in the kingdom of Ireland. That noble lord had two sons by his second wife—one the second Lord Headley, who succeeded to the title in 1798, and a second son, Mark, whose third son, Charles, was now Lord Headley.

The LORD CHANCELLOR thought the evidence sufficient, and moved the committee that Lord Headley had made out his claim.

The claim was accordingly allowed.

It is understood that this is the last peerage case or appeal to be heard during the present session. Two appeals, Burrowes v. Gore and Hooper v. Lane, remain undecided. In the first, the Law Lords who heard it differ on some minor details; and, in the second, there is a difficulty in consequence of the ten judges who attended to advise their Lordships being equally divided in their opinions. Their Lordships have, however, heard and decided thirteen English and Scotch appeals during this short session, notwithstanding the interposition of the protracted Shrewsbury case and many divorce bills.

A very interesting point as to the responsibility of a wife in cases of manslaughter, where she has acted in co-operation with her husband, was raised at the Liverpool assizes before Mr. Baron Watson.

James Turner and Elizabeth his wife were indicted for having, at Manchester, on the 29th of June last, killed Jane Schofield. Mr. C. H. Hopwood conducted the prosecution; Mr. Wheeler defended the prisoners. It appeared from the evidence that the female prisoner, in company with her husband, seized the deceased, with whom they had been quarrelling, by the hair with one hand, and struck her about the face and head with the other. The male prisoner also struck the deceased a blow on the eye, which knocked her to the ground. He also held the door, while he at the same time encouraged his wife to pommel her. From the injuries received on this occasion deceased died on the following Saturday. His Lordship wished to know from the prosecuting counsel why the female prisoner was included in the charge? Both at common law and even from the evidence he thought the wife was not responsible, inasmuch as she would be presumed to have acted under the coercion of her husband. Mr. Hopwood contended that manslaughter was in the same category as murder, where the privilege was not allowed. He cited as express authority 1 Hale, 435, and referred to "Reg. v. Cruse" (8 Carr. & Payne), 1 Russ. 18-25 It became unnecessary to decide the point, as witnesses for the defence werecalled to contradict the evidence for the prosecution; and the jury gave a verdict of Acquittal as to both prisoners.

An instance of the great encouragement given to embezzlement by the carelessness of the heads of large establishments, in not properly checking their pass-books, is furnished in the case of Thomas Lings, tried at the Liverpool assizes. The prisoner was a cashier in the service of Messrs. Kershaw, Leese, & Sidebottom, merchants, of Manchester, and he contrived in a short time to embezzle no less a sum than £8,000. He was tried, however, on a charge of embezzlement of £2,000. The time for taking stock at Messrs. Kershaw & Co.'s (Dec. 28) did not correspond with the time at which the bankers balanced up the pass-book and returned it, the pass-book not being returned until the 31st of December. Thus there was a period of three days, during which any person who chose, and had access to the books, could make an entry which might conceal any deficiency existing in the bankers' pass-book. When business is conducted so loosely, it would only be by comparing the cash payment book, and the date of payment into the bank with the bankers' pass-book, and the date of receipt by the bank, that the fraud could have been detected. The jury found the prisoner guilty. Sentence deferred.

The popular notion which long prevailed, that if a clerk debited himself with the sums of money he abstracted from his master, he was not criminally liable, is gradually being corrected. A case in point occurred in the course of the week at the Central Criminal Court. Frederick Gardner was indicted for embezzlement. The prisoner was in the service of a gentleman named Spencer, who carries on the business of a waterproofer in the City of London, and his salary was £3 per week. He left his employer's service, and at this time it would appear that no suspicion was entertained of his honesty; but very shortly afterwards the prisoner sent a solicitor to the prosecutor, and informed him that he had for a considerable time been in the habit of embezzling money, and a number of I O U's in the prisoner's handwriting were found in the cash-box, and it turned out that every time the prisoner had taken his master's money he placed an I O U in the cash-box for the sum he had taken. It also appeared that the prisoner had effected an insurance upon his life for the total amount he had abstracted.

The Prosecutor recommended the prisoner to the merciful consideration of the Court; and he was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for six calendar months.

A question as to the limitation of time in judgment debts was raised on Tuesday in the Lambeth County Court, in a judgment summons case, Baylis v. Broadbridge. An order for payment of a debt had been obtained more than six years ago, and the plaintiff now appeared on a judgment summons which he had obtained against the defendant. His Honour said, that, unless there had been a payment within twelve months on a judgment obtained more than six years ago, there could be no further order unless by leave of the judge. The leaving of the discretion with the judge, he considered, meant where there were some special grounds stated, and as there were none in this case he should make no further order. Plaintiffs in all cases should pursue the original orders, and not allow cases to stand for such periods as six years.

HOME CIRCUIT.—Croydon, Aug. 14.

Lambert v. Sidebottom.

This was an interpleader action, the question in dispute being whether a bill of sale, executed by one James Adkins to the plaintiff, was a valid instrument, or whether it was executed fraudulently, in order to defeat a judgment that had been obtained by the defendant against Adkins.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. Needham were counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. E. James, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, and Mr. Hawkins were for the defendant.

The present action arose out of the following circumstances: In June last the defendant, who is a gentleman of fortune, brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench against Adkins, who was the keeper of a gambling-house at the west end of the town, called the Berkeley Club House, to recover a sum of £6,500, which he alleged to have been won from him at hazard by means of false dice. Upon that occasion he clearly established that he had been plundered at the house, and Sir F. Kelly, who appeared for the defendant Adkins, consented to a verdict for the sum sought to be recovered. Judgment was subsequently entered up, and execution was granted; but upon the sheriff going to seize the property of Adkins, who occupied a house at Brompton, called Wintersoll House, and the furniture contained in it, the present plaintiff claimed a right to the whole of the property under a bill of sale; and the question now to be decided was, whether this was a valid instrument or not. The lease and furniture of the house were valued at £1,300.

Mr. James, on behalf of the defendant, said he would not attempt to deny that a regular bill of sale had been executed, and that all the accompanying formalities had been gone through; but the whole proceedings were a sham and a trick to cheat Mr. Sidebottom, and prevent him from receiving any benefit from the verdict he had obtained against Adkins.

The Chief Baron summed up, and the jury, after a very short deliberation, returned a verdict for the defendant.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—Gloucester, Aug. 14.

(Before Mr. Baron Martin and a Special Jury.)

Haddock and Another v. Lewis and Another.

This case, which it will be in the recollection of our readers we reported last week, was an action brought to try the validity of a will. Mr. James Knight Smith, solicitor, at Newnham, drew up the will. One moiety of the property was left to a Mrs. Elliott, an old lady of 66, who was Mr. Smith's mother-in-law. The other moiety was left to Sarah Lewis, the testator's first cousin. The property at stake was very considerable.

Mr. Baron Martin left it to the jury to say, whether, at the time the deceased signed the paper of the 14th of April, 1855, she was in a sound and disposing state of mind, and whether the paper in question contained her will.

The jury retired to consider their verdict, and were absent several hours. At length they sent a note to the learned judge, putting to him this question, whether the following constituted a sound and disposing mind—viz. "If the testatrix knew that she was signing the will, and giving away her property."

His Lordship thereupon sent for the jury into court, and, after reading over the question submitted to him, said that abstractedly that would be a sound and disposing state of mind; but, looking at the entirety of the evidence in this case, his Lordship said, the jury must be satisfied that the disposition of the property was according to the will and intention of Mrs. Higgins. The jury ought to find their verdict for the defendants if they thought Mrs. Higgins had signed the will in a sound and disposing state of mind, and they were satisfied upon the evidence that it was her will and the intention of mind to dispose of her property as was expressed in the will. But, his Lordship added, he was not aware that such a case as the present had ever occurred before; and he then directed the jury, that, if Mrs. Higgins was of a sound and disposing mind, and meant Mrs. Lewis to have one moiety of her property, but had no intention that the other moiety should go to Mrs. Elliott, they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff as to one moiety.

The jury, without hesitation, acted on this suggestion, and found their verdict for the plaintiff (the heir-at-law) as to one moiety of the property.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Aug. 14.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Fane.)

In re Humphrey Brown.

This was a meeting for the proof of debts and choice of assignees. The bankrupt was brought up in custody.

The preliminary statement furnished to the official assignee discloses the following particulars:—

Total amount of creditors unsecured, 3,410*l.* 5*s.*; liabilities, £4,900; creditors holding security:—Mr. R. J. Cabbell, £554; the Gloucestershire Banking Company, £10,277; Mr. Lindsay, Stroud, £700; Mr. Long, Cheltenham, £2,600; Mr. Minet, Overbury, £8,100; Mr. Payne, Strood, £2,500; Ridlaw's executors, Cheltenham, £940; Mr. Job Smith, Overbury, £120; Miss Smith, ditto, £1,600—total creditors holding security upon meadow lands, cottages, and other property, £22,341; the Royal British Bank is returned as creditor for 63,673*l.* 5*s.*, with this note appended—"This claim as to amount is disputed and has been referred to arbitration, under an agreement dated 2nd of February, 1857: the said arbitration is still unsettled." The Bank is represented as holding the following property of the value of 64,129*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*:—mortgage on household property at Tewkesbury, 628*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*; the Helen Lindsay cost £9,078; the Magdalena, £11,107; the Hero, £1,648; the Ocean Wave, £7,452; the Hornet, £24,796; and the Ambrosina, £7,450. Only a portion of these securities have hitherto been realised.

Mr. Tucker, of the firm of Tucker, Greville, & Tucker, of St. Swithin's-lane, appeared as solicitors under the bankruptcy; and Mr. Linklater for creditors.

Mr. Linklater tendered a proof for 1,154*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* on behalf of Mr. John Roberts, as a creditor of the Royal British Bank, of which the bankrupt was a shareholder. The proof was tendered as one of joint demand, which would not come in competition with the separate creditors of the bankrupt.

Mr. Bell, who appeared as counsel for the bankrupt, said he was not prepared for the proof, and said he wished to call the attention of the Court to the fact that an agreement had been entered into between the assignees of the bank and the bankrupt appointing an arbitrator, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due from the bankrupt.

Mr. Linklater said that the amount of that debt, whether £60,000 or £70,000, was immaterial, and had no reference to the claim now tendered. The bankrupt had deposited a sum of about £600 with the arbitrator, who had power to direct its application on account of the claims of the bank.

Mr. Bell contended that the proof could not be admitted, and he had found no case on the subject.

Mr. Linklater.—To set the point at rest I will read the case of Ex parte Marston (4 Dea. 191), where a creditor of the Imperial Bank of England was permitted to prove under similar circumstances. In that case Sir George Rose said:—

"It cannot be denied that the question submitted to us in this petition is one of great importance, and that this, among many other cases, affords a melancholy proof of the danger of men engaged in commerce becoming partners in these joint-stock banking companies."

The COMMISSIONER.—Is the proof tendered solely for the purpose of voting in the choice of assignees?

Mr. Linklater.—Yes; and of entitling the creditor to the right of dissenting from the bankrupt's certificate, and to the benefit—not, however, likely to arise in this case—of a dividend out of the surplus after payment of the separate creditors.

Mr. Bell submitted that the official manager represented the body of creditors. He must contend that the interests of the body of creditors of the bankrupt being antagonistic to the interests of the assignees of the bank, it was not proper that the assignees should be appointed assignees under Mr. Brown's estate.

The COMMISSIONER asked Mr. Bell for some authority in support of his views.

Mr. Linklater.—As it is not convenient for the learned counsel to quote the authority of the Winding-up Act, I will do so for him. (Mr. Linklater then read the 58th section of the Winding-up Act, distinctly stating that the rights of creditors were not to be affected by the winding-up proceeding.)

Mr. COMMISSIONER said it was clear that the Winding-up Act never intended to diminish the rights of creditors. He would, therefore, admit the claim.

Mr. Hampton, solicitor, as one of the separate creditors of the bankrupt, said he was strongly advised that the case was one that was governed by the statute, and not by the common law. Mr. Roberts not having obtained a judgment against the official manager, the proof could not be admitted.

The COMMISSIONER.—Have you the opinion to which you have referred?

Mr. Hampton.—No; it has not been reduced to writing. I am told the Court of Queen's Bench has so decided. I am not prepared at present to say more than that there will be an appeal from its decision.

Mr. Roberts's proof was thereupon admitted.

Mr. Lewis then tendered a proof on behalf of the official manager for £1,500, for calls under the Winding-up Act.

Mr. Tucker, the bankrupt's solicitor, objected, unless the official manager first gave the bankrupt a release from an attachment.

A discussion arose whether the official manager had authority to give this release without the sanction of the Vice-Chancellor. Ultimately the official manager stated that he had the authority of the Vice-Chancellor to prove the debt, and that would have the effect of entitling Mr. Brown to his discharge.

The COMMISSIONER asked Mr. Linklater, as representing the assignees, whether he had any objection to the bankrupt's release?

Mr. Linklater.—No; because, in consequence of the official manager having proved his debt, Mr. Brown is entitled by law to his discharge. The bankrupt has given bail for his appearance by two sureties for £2,000 each to answer the informations preferred against him by the Attorney-General, and he will therefore be forthcoming for the trial.

The bankrupt's release was then ordered.

Mr. J. Roberts, of Uxbridge, was appointed trade assignee, and Messrs. Linklaters & Hackwood are the solicitors.

The reporter was informed that the appointment of Mr. Roberts would be appealed against, the choice resting solely upon parties who had been connected with the bank, not a single trade or private creditor of the bankrupt having proved against his estate. The bankrupt, who was present, and appeared to be in excellent health, was liberated in the course of the afternoon. The examination meeting is fixed for the 19th September, at twelve o'clock.

PRACTICE OF THE COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FANE.)

The Welsh Potosi Mining Company (Limited).

This was the meeting to settle the list of shareholders or contributories. It appears that the Court has power to make a call beyond the amount of the shares, the company not having been registered under the Limited Liability Act until a few months ago, when the bulk of the debts had been contracted. A list of some sixty shareholders had been prepared by the official liquidator and the solicitor conducting the proceedings; and notice had been sent to each of these gentlemen, that, unless cause was shown to the contrary, they would be definitively placed on the list. Meantime this conditional list was published in one of the penny papers, the result being to inflict serious injury on several of the parties concerned. The matter was now brought before the attention of the Court.

Mr. Harrison, the solicitor under the proceedings, asked that the list might be settled in private, as great evils would result from a public proceeding. He understood that some party attending the Court had obtained the list and published it in the papers.

The COMMISSIONER.—I don't know how it can have been done. I have no recollection of any such document being tendered to me at all.

Mr. Harrison.—It was not tendered to you, but was merely brought here and filed with the proceedings.

The COMMISSIONER.—It seems to have been a little irregular to file it with the proceedings at all before some communication had been made to the parties. Would the Master in Chancery have allowed such a proceeding? I should like to see this document (it was handed up).

Mr. Harrison.—I followed the practice which has been hitherto adopted in Chancery.

The COMMISSIONER.—I see the form is for the gentleman who acts as solicitor to the official liquidator to make oath and say "that the schedule hereunto annexed contains a list of persons whom he thinks are contributories." Unless complete secrecy is enforced, both by the Court and by those having the conduct of the proceedings, there is nothing to prevent such a publication.

Mr. Harrison.—I always understood the rule of the Court to be that no person should see those proceedings.

The COMMISSIONER.—So it is.

Mr. Plews.—On the part of the shareholder whom I represent, as soon as the list has been gone through and settled, it will be my duty to ask for an investigation into the circumstances under which, out of 20,000 shares advertised as being issued, only 13,000 appear on the list. We wish to know what has become of the other 7,000 shares, also why the parties ventured to commence business and to spend £20,000 or £30,000, without having the proper amount of capital paid up. This is a company established on what is called the cost-book system; and I shall show that great mischief has been caused by their not following out that principle. Upon that system the purser of the company is required to lay before the shareholders, at the commencement of each month, an estimate of the cost of working the company for the ensuing month, and that amount is then to be provided. I shall ask your Honour (for you have the power to do it) to throw the consequences of this mismanagement on those who have been the authors of it.

The parties then retired, and the composition of the list was discussed in private.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—Aug. 18.

(Before the COMMON-SERJEANT.)

CHARGE OF ABDUCTION.

George Richard Clarke, 33, was indicted under the statute known as the Bishop of Oxford's Act, for misdemeanor, in having by false pretences procured a girl named Elizabeth Harris, under 21 years of age, to have illicit connection with him. Another count in the indictment charged the defendant with the abduction of a girl under 16 years of age without the consent of her parents. There was also a count in the indictment which charged the defendant with having conspired with another person, named Rosa Bush, to procure the same act to be committed.

Mr. Sleigh conducted the prosecution. Mr. Lawrence was counsel for the defendant.

Elizabeth Harris, the prosecutrix, who was the principal witness, and who, although represented to be only 14 years old, presented the appearance of a girl considerably older, deposed to the facts of the illicit connection, and also declared that she was induced to consent to the prisoner's wishes by his representations that he would marry her on the following Monday. She admitted, however, that she had, in the first instance, stated that all that took place was done against her will, and that she resisted all she could.

In answer to questions put by Mr. Lawrence, she said that she had written several love-letters to the prisoner, and that they were indited for her by Rosa Bush. She also admitted that when her friends came to fetch her away from Nottinghill, she said that she was 17 years old, and that she could do what she pleased.

In order to support the count in the indictment which charged the offence of the abduction of a girl under 16 years of age without the consent of her parents, the mother of the prosecutrix was examined, and she said she believed her daughter was 14 years old this August, but she could not state in what year she was born, as she was very ill at the time.

An elder sister of the prosecutrix was also examined, and she said that she believed that her sister was only 14, but she was also unable to say what year she was born in; and on being cross-examined, she did not appear to be able to speak with any certainty as to the ages, or even the names of some of her brothers and sisters, and she differed materially from her mother with regard to the number of children that were born before and after her sister Elizabeth.

Mr. Lawrence contended that there was no evidence to support the first count of the indictment as to the false pretences; and, with regard to the count charging the abduction of a girl under 16 years of age, urged that there was no evidence upon which they could rely to show that the prosecutrix was under that age.

The jury, after a short deliberation, convicted the prisoner upon the count charging the false pretences, and acquitted him upon the one which charged him with the abduction of a girl under 16 years of age.

The prisoner was at once called up for judgment, and the Common-Serjeant having observed upon the gross immorality and misconduct of which he had been guilty, sentenced him to 12 months imprisonment, with hard labour.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS COURT.

This Court will sit again for bail cases on Friday week, the 28th instant. On the last occasion fourteen were liberated on sureties till their hearing, and considering the number of persons in prison for debt, and about to petition, a larger number is expected on the next occasion. A person has lately petitioned the court whose examination some time ago created quite a sensation before the Lord Mayor, for alleged forgery at the Cape of Good Hope. He has petitioned as "Woolf Levy," otherwise "Montefiore." He has also been known as Langfield.

Mr. Edwin James, Q. C., as counsel for the plaintiff in an action for criminal conversation at the late Surrey assizes, referred to the conduct of Mr. Gladstone in the case of the Newcastle divorce. Mr. Gladstone, in his place in the House of Commons, adverted to the statements of Mr. James, and indignantly denied them. Mr. James replies in a letter in the public paper, in which he says, that he was wrongly reported, adding,

"The sentiment which I intended to convey to the jury was, that a man of the highest position, and the most unsullied honour, might, from feelings of friendship and from the most sincere motives, lend his assistance to another in procuring the evidence essential to obtain a separation from a wife who had dishonoured him, and who, he believed, was no longer worthy to bear his name. Since my return to town, I have read the testimony given by you in support of the Bill in the House of Lords, and which, I think, justifies the statement which I made in the course of my address to the jury."

Mr. James concludes by requesting that his letter should be read to the House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone refuses to read a "document, the most material part of which I could read only to question and contradict."

The Globe of Thursday night says: "Although by no means a matter of certainty, we believe it is most probable that the session of Parliament will be brought to a close on Tuesday next. Her Majesty will not, as has been erroneously stated, prorogue Parliament in person. The royal speech will be delivered by commission, and a privy council will be held on Monday next for the purpose of settling its contents."

Mr. Finchett-Maddock, town clerk of Chester, has resigned his office, in consequence of extreme deafness, and Mr. John Walker has been temporarily appointed in his place.—Liverpool Albion.

The Chief Justiceship of New Zealand has been conferred (according to the Hampshire Chronicle) upon Mr. Arney, Barrister-at-Law, Recorder of Winchester.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P., whose health has suffered from the severe pressure of his parliamentary and professional duties, has left England for Germany.

Judge Tyrrell, of the Exeter County Court, has given himself a month's congé, having married his fourth wife, to the great admiration of the legal profession. Mr. Jerwood, the barrister, judges for his Honour in his absence; and, from his experience and acceptability on many former occasions, will, no doubt, give as much satisfaction as his Honour himself.—Western Times.

Michael Henry Gallwey, Esq., is appointed Attorney-General for the colony of Natal; and Charles Watters, Esq., Solicitor-General for the province of New Brunswick.

In the Bankruptcy Court, owing to the severe indisposition of Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, the registrar, Mr. Hazlitt, presided at the last two sittings of the Court. Mr. Hazlitt was assisted by Mr. Winslow. The learned gentleman confined his attention to the transaction of pro formâ business.

THE BANKRUPT AND INSOLVENT LAWS.

We heartily concur with the leading members of the commercial and trading communities, with the higher grades of the legal profession, and with, we may add, every disinterested person of intelligence who has examined the subject, that the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency require much revision.

There is one part of the necessary reformation which ought to be at once proceeded with. Its accomplishment is not beset by any very formidable difficulties, and is urgently demanded by justice and humanity. We, therefore, hail with satisfaction the intimation made by Sir George Grey to the House of Commons, on Wednesday, in reply to a question of Mr. Hadfield, to the effect that "Government had under their consideration a measure to abolish imprisonment for debts contracted without fraud." We only regret that with that intimation Sir George Grey coupled the statement that he "would not give any positive promise that such a Bill would be brought forward next session."

An "Imprisonment for Debt" measure was introduced in February, into the last Parliament, intituled a "Bill to amend the law of imprisonment for debt, to extend the remedies of creditors, and to punish fraudulent debtors." The spirit of the Bill was to prevent the committal to, and detention in, prison of non-criminal debtors, and to save to the nation the immense annual expense entailed upon it for the maintenance of the apparatus by which is accomplished this systematic violation of the first principles of natural justice and of the British Constitution. Without entering critically into its merits and demerits, we say, that the Bill, as it now exists, is a sound stock upon which a good law may be formed.

There is another point in the Bill of pressing urgency. At present there is no limit to the number of times of imprisonment for the same debt under the County Courts Acts. For small debts to provision-shops it is no uncommon occurrence for respectable artisans and others, though bravely struggling to maintain their families, to be sent again and again to the demoralising atmosphere of Whitecross-street and Horsemonger-lane Gaols. The creditor gains nothing but revenge. In existing circumstances something to the following effect ought to be law:—

"After the commencement of this Act, no judge of a county court shall possess power to commit a defendant to prison, under the provisions of the County Courts Act oftener than twice upon any judgment obtained by one and the same creditor, or for one and the same debt, where such debt shall not exceed £20," &c. &c.

Recent inquiries have established the fact, that a large proportion of debtors are now detained virtually, not by the creditors upon whose suits execution was nominally issued, and by whom they are nominally kept in prison, but by the solicitors of the detaining creditors for the sake of their own costs. In fact, crowds of debtors are hurried to prison by attorneys for the sake of costs. Such debtors can generally emerge by paying costs, and without paying any part of the original debt. The law was never intended as a means of providing "costs" for disreputable practitioners.—Abridged from the Morning Post.

THE DIVORCE BILL.

In spite of the persevering hostility of many opponents, the Divorce Bill, the success of which for some days past has trembled in the balance, is now fortunately become certain and assured. Backed by large majorities, the Government might, at its pleasure, have defeated all opposition, and passed the Bill precisely in the shape in which it had been sent down by the Lords. Instead of adopting this course, objection has been met by conciliation, and, in many important particulars, judicious concessions have been made, which materially improve the general complexion of the measure. It is well known that nine thousand clergymen of the Church of England, influenced no doubt by the highest and most conscientious motives, have signed a protest, declaring that they will not solemnise such marriages. In this state of circumstances two courses were open to the Government—either to coerce the consciences of those reverend gentlemen, by subjecting them to penalties for disobedience to the law, or to exempt them from an obligation the performance of which they considered to be opposed to the Divine command. The Government, after mature deliberation, determined to adopt the latter alternative; and, as the Bill now stands, no clergyman of the Church of England will be liable to "any suit, penalty, or censure for refusing to solemnise the marriage of any person whose adultery has been the ground of the dissolution of his or her marriage." It was further stated, that at a future stage a proviso would be introduced to enable some clergymen to perform the ceremony in those cases in which the rector or vicar of the parish, from conscientious scruples, objected to solemnise the marriage. It has been contended that persons guilty of the crime of adultery should, as a portion of their penalty, be compelled to be married before the superintending registrar. The Attorney-General, however, proposes that in cases of adultery the petitioner shall be enabled to obtain damages to be assessed by a jury, and that those damages shall be applied at the discretion of the judges of the new Court of Divorce. The wife will be a necessary party to all proceedings taken under the Bill, and therefore she will not for the future be in the truly unfortunate and unprotected position to which the law now condemns her.—Abridged from the Morning Post.

20 VICTORIA,* 1857.

CAP. L.—An Act to amend the Act for limiting the Time of Service in the Royal Marine Forces.

In the year 1847 it was thought expedient to amend the system of marine enlistment then in use; and, by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 63, it was accordingly enacted that no person should be enlisted in that force for a longer term than twelve years. The same statute also contained a provision enabling the recruit to re-engage himself for a further term of the same length during the last six months of the first engagement, or after its termination; and also enabling him, if during the last three years of his first engagement he should be ordered on foreign service, to re-engage himself, before embarkation, for such period as should complete a total service of twenty-four years.

These provisions were so construed as to prevent any person from being enlisted as a marine for a less period than twelve years. And the present Act so far alters them as to allow enlistments for any term not exceeding twelve years, and re-engagements for any term authorised by the Admiralty, and subject to the approbation of the commanding officer—provided the term for which the recruit is re-engaged, with the term of his service under his first enlistment, do not exceed twenty-one years.

CAP. II.—An Act to facilitate the Appointment of Chief Constables for adjoining Counties, and to confirm the Appointment of Chief Constables in certain cases.

By 41 Geo. 3, c. 78, magistrates are empowered to appoint special constables to execute warrants on particular occasions; and by 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 41, and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 43, such special constables may also be appointed in default of the requisite number of ordinary officers, when tumults, riot, or felony has taken place, or may reasonably be apprehended.

Out of this class of constables a system of county police was engrafted in the year 1839, by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93; by which Act the justices of any county were permitted to make a report to the Secretary of State that the ordinary officers of the county were not sufficient for the preservation of the peace therein, and the protection of the inhabitants; and, on this report being approved, the expenses of the county constables to be thereupon appointed under that Act were to be defrayed out of the county rate. And by that Act, and a subsequent one passed for its amendment (3 & 4 Vict. c. 88), a chief constable was allowed for each county with a constabulary under their provisions. The system first established by these statutes was made compulsory upon the justices of every county by the Act of last year (19 & 20 Vict. c. 69); which enacted, that, in every county where, under the two previous Acts, a constabulary for the whole county had not been established, the justices at quarter sessions should proceed to establish the same; and, that, in every county where it had been already established in part, they should establish it for the residue of such county.

The present Act is to meet the case of two or more adjoining counties. Under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93, the same person might be appointed chief constable for such counties if the justices thereof, in general or quarter sessions assembled, mutually agreed to join in the appointment. By the present Act (s. 2) the justices of any single county, in general or quarter sessions, may appoint a person to be chief constable of their own or of any part of their own county, although he may also be chief constable of any adjoining county or counties, or of any part thereof. But there is a proviso that the justices of each county, in such sessions, shall declare their consent that the office in their appointment may be held by such person together with such other office or offices.

The Act also confirms some appointments already made, as to the validity of which doubts had been entertained.

CAP. III.—An Act to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the General Board of Health applying the Public Health Act, 1848, to certain Districts; and for altering the Constitution of certain Local Boards.

This is one of the Acts rendered necessary by that provision in the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, which requires that an order of the General Board of Health for that statute to be made applicable to a place from which there is no petition for that purpose, or in which any local Act for paving, cleansing, &c., is in force,—should be confirmed by Act of Parliament. It differs in no material respect from other Acts which have been passed for this purpose, such as the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 42, and c. 69.

CAP. VI.—An Act to reduce the Rates of Duty on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices.

It is provided by this Act, that, for the year commencing April 5, 1857, there shall be charged (in lieu of the rates of duty now in force) the reduced rate of sevenpence in the pound, subject to a further reduction of the present rates, in the proportion that the rate of sevenpence bears to the rate of one shilling and fourpence, in the several cases mentioned or referred to in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 20, s. 2—viz. where any less rate or duty than one shilling and twopence in the pound of the annual value or amount of any property, profits, or gains, is chargeable under the Acts relating to the income tax; or where, under those Acts, any relief, or abatement, or deduction is directed to be given, made, or allowed, after any rate therein specified.

CAP. X.—An Act to continue certain Temporary Provisions concerning Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in England.

In the year 1836, an Act was passed (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77) to carry into effect the reports of the Commissioners appointed in 1835 to consider the state of the Established Church in England and Wales, with reference to ecclesiastical duties and revenues, so far as they relate to episcopal dioceses, revenues, and patronage. This statute (which established the "Ecclesiastical Commissioners," and authorised many alterations in the arrangement of dioceses and the ecclesiastical system in general) contains a provision (s. 20), that, as it might be expedient to consider the state and jurisdiction of all the ecclesiastical courts in England and Wales, no order in council made according to the machinery authorised by that Act for carrying out the schemes of the Commissioners, should, for one year after the passing of the Act, affect the jurisdiction, power, or authority of any of the ecclesiastical courts then existing, or the extent or limits thereof. And (s. 22), that, during the same period, no order in council should be construed to alter in any respect the law of bona notabilia, or (s. 23) the grant of marriage licenses. Moreover, by s. 24, power was given, during the same period, to every ecclesiastical court in which any proceedings shall be had, to send for and enforce the production of all original instruments and documents relating to such proceedings, by whatever ecclesiastical authority the same may have been issued. These temporary provisions have been continued from time to time by different Acts; and by this Act are now further continued till the end of next session.

* This session commenced February 3, 1857.

Cap. XIII.—An Act for Punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better Payment of the Army and their Quarters.

This is the annual Mutiny Act; and the only particular respecting it requiring notice is, that, by the 21st and 22nd sections, the offender, in certain cases, may be adjudged to be transported for life, or for a term of years. These provisions, however, must be read in connection with the general Act of the present session, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, by which it is enacted, that, after the passing thereof, no sentence of transportation shall be pronounced—that of penal servitude being in all cases substituted. The same remark applies to ss. 23, 24, and 25 of the following Act (20 Vict. c. 14) for the regulation of the marine forces while on shore.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

Legitimacy—Conflict of Laws—Inheritance Act.

In re Don's Estate, 5 W. R. 836.

This petition raised in a new shape the question decided by the House of Lords, after two elaborate arguments, in Birtwhistle v. Vardell (9 Bligh, N. S. 32; 7 Cl. & Fin. 895). That decision was based on the old law of inheritance; and on the present occasion it was unsuccessfully contended that the Inheritance Act had indirectly operated so as to render the principle affirmed by the House of Lords no longer applicable. The question in Birtwhistle v. Vardell was, whether a son born of Scottish parents before marriage was legitimated by their subsequent marriage in Scotland in such a sense as to be capable of inheriting lands in England. The opinion delivered by the judges was in substance to the effect that the son being legitimate by the law of Scotland, his legitimacy, as a matter of personal status, ought by the comity of nations to be governed in all countries, and would by the law of England be governed by the Scotch law, and that consequently the son must be regarded as legitimate in England. But the rule of inheritance in England, as settled by the Statute of Merton and many authorities, was, not that the eldest lawful son should inherit, but the eldest son born in lawful wedlock. Consequently, by our law, two conditions must be satisfied to entitle a son to inherit—first, he must be the eldest legitimate son; secondly, he must be born in lawful wedlock. The succession to English land was a matter to be decided exclusively by the English law, although it would import foreign law so far as to determine whether the son were legitimate or not; and as the son in the actual case satisfied the first condition of English inheritance, but not the second, which required that he should have been born in lawful wedlock, it followed that he was not entitled as heir to English land. This distinction is perfectly intelligible, whether it be or be not consistent with general principles of international law. It was adopted by the House of Lords, notwithstanding the able and, we think, unanswerable arguments of Lord Brougham. He urged that there were the same reasons for appealing to the foreign law to decide what was "lawful wedlock," as for applying it to test the question of bastardy or legitimacy as a matter of status; and that the English courts must, to be consistent, decide by the foreign law the question whether a person was born in lawful wedlock where the doubt arose, not from the birth being ante-nuptial, but from some question as to the capacity of the parents to contract a marriage. By the law of Scotland, the claimant was born in lawful wedlock, and, consistently with the rules of international law, must be held to have been so born by our courts, and therefore to have fulfilled both conditions of inheritance, even supposing that the two alleged conditions were anything more than two ways of stating the single maxim that the eldest legitimate son should inherit. These arguments, however, did not prevail, and the son was held not to be entitled to the English estate. The rule established by this judgment is confined to land; and, as Lord Brougham observed, it is staggering to be told that the same person is a bastard when he comes into one court to claim land, and legitimate when he resorts to another to claim a personal succession; and that even the same court of equity must view him as both bastard and legitimate in respect of a succession to the same intestate.

In the case of Mr. Don, before V. C. Kindersley, the principles laid down by the House of Lords were of course not impugned, but the argument raised was, that the Inheritance Act had cut away the ground for such a decision in all cases where the succession took place after the passing of the statute. In this case it was the father claiming as heir to a son who had been born under circumstances precisely similar to those in Birtwhistle v. Vardell. The 6th section of the Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106) makes a lineal ancestor capable of being heir "to any of his issue." It was not denied that issue must be limited to legitimate issue, but the son was, consistently with the decision of the House of Lords, to be regarded as the legitimate issue of his father; therefore, by the express words of the statute, his father could inherit from him. The only way of escaping this conclusion was to hold that the word issue must be construed, not merely as confined to "legitimate issue," but as still further narrowed to "inheritable issue," who by the rule of the House of Lords are not co-extensive with the former. The Vice-Chancellor adopted this view, and held that the father could not inherit, although it necessitated his overruling a decision pronounced by himself when a Master of the Court. This, at least, is clear, that it was not the intention or object of the statute to alter the principles laid down in Birtwhistle v. Vardell, or to enable a father to inherit from a son who could not have inherited from his father. The words of the statute, however, required some straining to extract this decision from them, and the case may perhaps be regarded as one illustration more of the difficulties which have been occasioned by a departure from the simple rule of deciding legitimacy for all purposes by the criterion of the same law.

Married Woman's Separate Estate—Notice.

Dawson v. Prince, 5 W. R. 813.

This is a case which, at first sight, appears to introduce an anomaly into the law of courts of equity with respect to notice; for a defendant was compelled to bear the loss of a fraudulent transaction on the ground that he had notice, although, at the same time, the Court expressly declared that he had no knowledge, and had acted with perfect bona fides, and without negligence. The facts were, that a bill made payable to a married woman was indorsed by her husband in her name as well as his own, and discounted with the defendant. The bill had been remitted as part of the married woman's separate estate, and, the husband having absconded with the money received from the defendant for the bill, the indorsee was restrained from suing the acceptors, who were ordered to pay the amount of the bill to the wife. The principle of the decision seems to have been this:—In the first place, the married woman being payee, and the fact of her marriage being known to the indorsee, he was held to have notice that the bill was for her separate estate. If, therefore, he had taken the husband's indorsement alone, which would have been sufficient to enable him to sue in a court of law, he would have been restrained on the ground of his constructive notice of the wife's interest. In fact, he took an indorsement in the name of the wife also; but, as that ultimately turned out to be a forgery, it passed no title whatever, and left the indorsee in the same position as if he had only had the husband's signature, in which case, being affected with notice, he would, as a matter of course, be restrained from enforcing his legal rights adversely to the wife. In this view the case will be seen to be consistent with the established rules in respect to constructive notice.

Solicitor's Lien on the Proceeds of a Suit—Common Law Procedure Act—Attachment.

Sympson v. Prothero, 5 W. R. 814.

No rule is better established than the right of a solicitor to a lien for costs on funds recovered by his exertions in an action or suit. In Sympson v. Prothero an attempt was made to deprive a solicitor of this right, on the ground that the money coming to his client had been attached under the garnishee clauses in the Common Law Procedure Act. The suit was therefore brought to establish the lien. Messrs. Sympson had acted as the attorneys for the defendant Phelps, who was plaintiff in an action against the executors of a Mr. Prothero, and had also acted for him in an injunction suit arising out of the same matter. By an order in the suit, Prothero's executors were ordered to pay a sum of £500 to Phelps, and a further sum of £100 for Phelps' costs at law. On Jan. 20, 1857, the plaintiffs served Prothero's executors with notice of their lien on the sums ordered to be paid. Subsequently, a judgment creditor of Phelps obtained an order against Prothero's executors as garnishees under the Common Law Procedure Act, to pay the £600 to him; and the defendants in this suit contended that the order was absolute, and that it ousted the lien of Messrs. Sympson. V. C. Wood, however, said that this money, having been ordered to be paid to Phelps, who was indebted to the plaintiffs, his attorneys and solicitors, the subsequent charging order could not affect their lien, inasmuch as they had previously given notice to the parties by whom the money was to be paid. His Honour added, that he should greatly miscarry if he did not look at how the fund had been recovered, and allow the plaintiffs to have their reward out of the fruits of the proceeding. The injunction suit must be regarded as part of the defence to the action, and the plaintiffs were entitled to their lien for their costs both in the action and the suit.

TRUSTEE RELIEF ACT—COSTS ASKED AGAINST TRUSTEE, AND REFUSED.

In re Bendyshe, 5 W. R. 816.

This case adds one more to the number of those where trustees have been charged with a wanton and vexatious payment of trust-money into court, and where costs have been applied for against them in consequence. The ground on which the money was paid in was, that it belonged to a married woman, and that some agreement for a settlement had been come to, which was abandoned, and the husband and wife afterwards applied to the trustee for payment of the money to them. The trustee under these circumstances declined to pay the money, and the Court, though holding that there was no binding agreement for a settlement, nevertheless considered the trustee justified, and gave him his costs out of the fund. His Honour, at the same time, stated, that, beyond all doubt, if a trustee from caprice or obstinacy, and not acting honestly and truly as a trustee should do, put the cestuis que trust to expense by refusing to act unless compelled by the Court, the Court would make him pay the costs; and that the doubt as to the jurisdiction to order payment of costs against a trustee under this Act had been removed by a recent decision. See Re Woodburn's Will (noticed ante, p. 536), which was a case of oppression of a very different character from the present.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.—June 23, 1857.

I. Alterations in the Law and Practice in the last Session of Parliament.

It may be convenient, according to the usual course at the Annual Meetings, to notice briefly the principal measures which were passed during the last session of Parliament, and which were taken into consideration during their progress by the Council, so far as the proposed enactments related to the practice of the courts, or the duties to be performed by solicitors on behalf of their clients.

1. The Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, by which the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery has been enlarged, for the purpose of affording relief in a large class of cases relating to settled estates. The parties interested in such property are thus enabled to make arrangements for their mutual benefit, in cases which, from the moderate amount of the property, did not justify an application to Parliament.

2. The Intestates Personal Estates Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94, is also a beneficial measure by which the special customs in the cities of London and York, and other places, have been abolished, and this branch of the law has been rendered uniform.

3. In this department may also be classed the Drafts on Bankers Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25, enabling the drawers to limit the payment of crossed cheques, thereby rendering more secure the payment of money to the right parties.

In the advantages resulting to the public from these measures, the members of the profession in some degree participate, either by the increase of business, or by the removal of difficulties or responsibilities in transacting it.

4. A further extention of the jurisdiction of the county courts was effected by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 109. Actions may now be tried in these courts, even on questions of title, to any amount by consent, and without consent when reduced by set-off under £50. Summonses may be issued against persons out of the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose within it. If the sum in question be above £20, the defendant must give notice of his defence; and where the judgment exceeds £20 the plaintiff's consent is requisite to an order for payment by instalments. No costs on a judgment by default under £20 in the superior courts are allowed unless by order of the judge*.

The metropolitan county courts are now deemed one district, and summonses may be issued either in the plaintiff's or the defendant's district. On issuing a certiorari to a superior court, security must be given for the amount claimed and costs. Amendments have also been made in proceedings by mandamus and prohibition. The provisions of the Bills of Exchange Summary Procedure Act are made applicable to the county courts. The scale of costs in these courts is now authorised to be settled, with the Lord Chancellor's approval, by five of the county court judges, instead of, as previously, by the judges of the superior courts; and where the taxation is between attorney and client, and costs are claimed beyond the scale, the consent of the client must be proved in writing. Such is an outline of the further steps in advance made by these courts, which, bearing the name of county courts, were by the first Act of 1846 expressly described as "small debt courts."

It may not be immaterial here to remind the profession, that, in the City of London Small Debts Act, 15 Vict. c. 77, there are two sections—119 and 120—which are inconsistent; the one compelling a plaintiff to bring all actions up to £50 in the City Court, the other limiting it to £20; and notwithstanding this inconsistency, the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Castrique v. Page, 13 Common Bench Reports, p. 458, decided that the 119th section was not repealed by the 120th, and the plaintiff loses his costs absolutely unless the judge certifies under the 121st section that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior court. It is therefore proposed that the 119th section of the City Act should be repealed, and the powers of that Act assimilated to the jurisdiction of the other courts for the recovery of small debts.

5. The Joint Stock Companies Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, comprises the important enactments relating to the limited liability of the partners or shareholders in a large class of such companies, and provides special regulations for their management, with safeguards in their practical operation and the security of their creditors. This alteration in the law was mentioned in the speech from the Throne as one which would afford additional facilities for the advantageous employment of capital, and thus tend to promote the developement of the rescources of the country.

6. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, effected several alterations; amongst which were the protection of the title to goods before they have been actually seized or attached under a writ against the vendor, and as to the specific delivery of goods sold. It abolishes the necessity of stating in writing the consideration for a guarantee; and gives to a surety, who discharges the liability, a right to an assignment of all securities held by the creditor. It also contains several provisions relating to the limitation of actions, especially where there are joint debtors, some of whom are abroad, and as to part payment by one of several contractors. Provisions are also made regarding the acceptance of inland and foreign bills, and the claims for the repair of ships.

7. The Foreign Evidence Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 113, provides for taking evidence in relation to civil and commercial matters pending before foreign tribunals.

8. The Stamp Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, relates to the articled clerks of attorneys, enabling the £80 stamp duty on articles to be paid at any period during the clerkship, subject to a penalty proportioned to the time when the tax may be paid.

9. The Counties and Boroughs Police Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, which was long under the consideration of Parliament, is also noticed in the Queen's Speech as adding to the security of persons and property, and affording increased encouragement to the exertions of honest industry.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

The last meeting of the Managing Committee before the vacation was held on the 12th inst.

* By a rule of all the common law courts, if judgment be signed by default, the plaintiff having given notice on the writ, may apply to a judge for his costs; and if, before judgment, the defendant does not give notice that he intends to oppose, the judge will sign his name on the writ, which operates as an order for costs, and thus the expense of summonses and judge's orders is saved.

The Secretary read the following note from E. W. Cox, Esq., dated the 20th July:—"Mr. E W. Cox presents his compliments to Mr. Shaen, and begs to say, that, in accordance with the recognised practice, any communications for the Editor of the Law Times must be addressed to that personage, and not to Mr. Cox;" and reported, that, on the 23rd July, in acknowledging the note, he expressed his regret that the intimation had not been given to him in reply to his letter of the 21st May last, then nine weeks ago, adding, that the committee could not suppose that they were guilty of any irregularity in addressing the Editor of the Law Times personally, seeing that in more than one subsequent number of the Law Times their previous letters, which were addressed "E. W. Cox, Esq.," were mentioned as if duly received by the Editor.

The Secretary also reported that no other communication had been received from the Editor of the Law Times, and that the names of the two members of the Association whom he desired to place upon the Committee of Investigation proposed by himself, and agreed to by the Managing Committee last May, had not been furnished.

The Secretary read the draft of a proposed circular to the profession at large with reference to the charges made by the Editor of the Law Times, and the course pursued by him, and it was resolved that the circular be referred to a sub-committee to be settled.

The Assistant-Secretary read a prospectus of the "National Association for the Promotion of Social Science," received from the Secretary of the Law Amendment Society, who stated that he would feel obliged for any assistance the Managing Committee could afford in carrying out the objects of that Association.

The prospectus stated that the first annual meeting of the National Association would be held at Birmingham, on the 12th of October and four following days, under the presidency of Lord Brougham; and it enumerated the topics on which papers would be received—Jurisprudence and the Amendment of the Law forming the first department of the Association.

The committee resolved to bring the subject before the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association at their annual provincial meeting at Manchester.

The Assistant-Secretary submitted a proof circular announcing the provincial meeting of the Association at Manchester, on the 7th and 8th of October, and the following list of subjects to be suggested to the members for discussion at the meeting, and on which it was desirable to obtain papers:—

1. Whether the expenses of the Civil Judicial establishments should be borne by the country or by the suitors. 2. Professional Remuneration—Law of Costs. 3. Whether the County Courts should be retained as Small Debts Courts, or whether they should be made Courts of First Instance with unlimited jurisdiction; and the superior courts retained solely as Courts of Appeal. 4. The appointment of a Minister of Justice. 5. Whether a union of the two branches of the legal profession would be desirable and advantageous. 6. Suggestions for improving Legal Education. 7. Schemes of Land Transfer. 8. Business in the Chancery Offices. 9. The Statute Law Commission. 10. The Office of Trustee. 11. Bankruptcy Administration. 12. The Property of Married Women. 13. Courts of Marriage and Divorce. 14. Courts of Probate. 15. Grand Juries. 16. Corrupt Practices at Elections. 17. Law of Libel —The expediency of extending the privilege now enjoyed by reports of Courts of Justice to reports of proceedings in the Houses of Parliament and other assemblies. 18. The Duties of Coroners with regard to holding Inquests, considered with reference to their adaptation for the promotion of the ends of public justice.

The circular and list of subjects were approved.

The Assistant-Secretary reported that he had seen Mr. Malins, M.P., and also Lord Monteagle, with reference to an amendment suggested by the committee in the Bill to enable married women to dispose of their reversionary interests in personal estate.

The Bill, as passed by the House of Commons, and sent up to the House of Lords, gave a married woman the power of disposing of any reversionary interest in personalty devolving on her otherwise than by marriage-settlement; and it appeared to be comprehensive enough to include reversionary interests, where subject to a restraint on alienation. The committee had, therefore, proposed an amendment to exclude from the operation of the Act any reversionary interest to which a married woman might be entitled by deed or will under which she should be restrained from alienating.

The Assistant-Secretary reported that Mr. Malins and Lord Monteagle had received the suggestion of the committee with great courtesy, and that his Lordship had promised that the amendment would be embodied in the Bill when in committee.

The committee having received numerous complaints of the delays in transacting business in the offices of the taxing-masters and chief clerks of the Court of Chancery, Mr. Malins, at their request, moved for and obtained an order of the House of Commons for a return of all appointments made before the Masters and Chief Clerks with respect to proceedings between the 1st June and 1st July, 1857. This return, it is hoped, will enable the committee to offer some suggestions for facilitating the dispatch of business.

The Trustees' Relief Bill, as amended, was considered, and the Bill was reported as having passed the Lords, and been sent to the Commons.

The consideration of Lord Brougham's Bankruptcy Bill, based to some extent upon the resolutions of the Mercantile Law Conference held by the Law Amendment Society in January last, was postponed.

Some remaining business, referring to the vacation operations of the Association, was then disposed of, and the committee adjourned till the 11th of November next.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION.—Michaelmas Term, 1857.

Rules for the Public Examination of Candidates for Honours or Certificates, entitling Students to be called to the Bar.

An examination will be held in next Michaelmas Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court who is desirous of becoming a candidate for studentship or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the Treasurer's Office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs, on or before Thursday, the 22nd day of October next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction; or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the bar.

The examination will commence on Thursday the 29th day of October next, and will be continued on the Friday and Saturday following.

It will take place in the Benchers' Reading Room of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed fer the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Thursday morning, the 29th October, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Friday morning, the 30th October, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Saturday morning, the 31st October, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Saturday afternoon there will be no oral examination. The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of the examination will vary according as the student is a candidate for honours or a studentship, or desires simply to obtain a certificate. The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned; regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination. In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations, until he shall have obtained a certificate. Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship, but only at one of the three examinations immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship, his name shall not appear in the list. Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship.

The Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to examine on the following subjects:—

He will expect the candidates for honours in the ensuing examination to possess a general knowledge of the leading events of English history. He will expect them to be thoroughly acquainted with the chapters in Hallam's Constitutional History which treat of the reigns of Elizabeth, of the Stuarts, of King William, and Queen Anne; with the first volume of Lord Clarendon; with May's History; with so much of Rapin and Tindal, or Belsham, or Macaulay, and Somerville, as relates to those reigns; and with Bishop Burnet's Memoirs of his Own Times. He will expect them to be acquainted with the history of the law of real property, as given in Lord St. Leonards preface to Gilbert on Uses; and the law of treason and the law relating to the press; and with the most important State Trials during the time that has been mentioned. The candidates for a pass will be required to answer general questions in English history, and to be well acquainted with the history of the reigns of Elizabeth, Charles I., and Charles II.; with the events of the Revolution, and with the reign of Anne. They will be expected also to show a competent knowledge of the State Trials during the reigns of the Stuarts and Queen Anne.

The Reader on Equity proposes to examine in the following books:—

1. Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence; Mitford on the Pleadings in the Court of Chancery. Introduction; chapter 1, sec. 1 and 2; chapter 2, sec. 1; chapter 2, sec. 2, part 1 (the first three pages); chapter 2, sec. 2, part 2 (the first two pages); chapter 2, sec. 2, part 3, chapter 3. The Act for the Improvement of the Jurisdiction of Equity, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.
2. The Cases and Notes contained in the first volume of White and Tudor's Leading Cases; and the Cases of Wilcocks v. Wilcocks, Blandy v. Widmore, Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth. Aldrich v. Cooper, Silk v. Prime, Row v. Dawson, and Rees v. Berrington, in the second volume, with the Notes on those Cases.

Candidates for certificates of fitness to be called to the bar will be expected to be well acquainted with the books mentioned in the first of the above classes.

Candidates for a studentship or honours will be examined in the books mentioned in the two classes.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Joshua Williams on the Law of Real Property; the same author on Personal Property.
2. The Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.
3. The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), Divisions 2, 3, and 6; and the Notes to those Divisions in Shelford's Work on Bankruptcy.
4. The Lien of a Vendor for Unpaid Purchase Money; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Vesey, 329, and the Notes to that Case: White and Tudor's Leading Equity Cases, 194—222.
5. The Law of Escheat and Forfeiture; The Attorney-General v. Sir George Sands, Hardre's Reports, 488, and the Notes to that Case in Tudor's Leading Cases in Conveyancing, 617—741.

Candidates for honours will be examined in all the foregoing books and subjects, and candidates for a certificate, in those under heads 1, 2, and 3.

The Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law proposes to examine candidates for honours in the following subjects:—

1. The Elements of the Roman Law of Conventional Obligations; Mackeldey's Systema Juris Romani hodie Usitati, lib. ii. sec. 2, cap. 1 (edition of 1847, pp. 362—428).
2. Principles of General Jurisprudence with reference to Rights and Duties, their relation to each other, and their modifications. Lindley's Introduction to the Study of Jurisprudence. Part ii. chapter 1, pp. 52—98.
3. Absolute International Rights of States. Wheaton's Elements of International Law. Part ii.

Candidates for a certificate will be examined in—

1. The Institutes of Justinian, Book iii. (beginning with Title xiii.), and Book iv., together with the Notes in Sandars's edition.
2. Absolute International Rights of States. Wheaton's Elements of International Law, Part II.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

Candidates for a pass certificate will be expected to be familiar with—

1. The Elements of Mercantile Law, so far as exhibited in Smith's Mercantile Law (5th edit. book i.—omitting chap. 3—and book iii. chap. 1).
2. The Jurisdiction of, and, generally, the Mode of Procedure in the County Court (which may be read in any Treatise on County Courts published since the passing of the stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108).
3. Criminal Law—in connection with offences ordinarily tried at Quarter Sessions; and Part i. chaps. 1 and 2 of Paley on Convictions (4th edit.) concerning the Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, and Proceedings before them preliminary to Conviction.

Candidates for the studentship and honours will be examined in the above-mentioned books and subjects, and also in—

4. The Principles of the Law of Evidence—so far as explained by Mr. Best in his Treatise on that subject (2nd edition, Part i. chaps. 1 and 2; Part iii. book i. chap. 2).
5. The following cases from the first vol. of Smith's Leading Cases (4th edit.), with the Notes thereto: Armory v. Delamirié, Ashby v. White, Coggs v. Bernard, Collins v. Blantern, and Lampleigh v. Brathwait.
6. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 1—38).

LAW LECTURES.—MICHAELMAS TERM, 1857.

Prospectus of the Lectures to be delivered during the ensuing Educational Term, by the several Readers appointed by the Inns of Court:—

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Public Lectures to be delivered by the Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History will comprise the following subjects:—

The Reigns of George I. and George II.; the Progress of our Jurisprudence, the State Trials, and the Proceedings of Parliament. The Reader will then trace the Origin and Progress of our Constitution before the Reign of Henry VII.

In his Private Classes the Reader will follow the same course.

BOOKS.—Tindal or Belsham's History of George I. and George II.; Kerr's Edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, vols. 1 and 4; Annual Register during the Period; Hallam's Constitutional History; Statute Book; Bracton's Treatise; Matthew Paris' Reign of John; Reeves's History of the English Law, vol. 1; Sullivan's Lectures; Fortescue de Laudibus Legum Angliæ, (Edition by Amos.)

EQUITY.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, a course of six Lectures.

1. On the Sources of English Law, the Origin of the Superior Courts, and the causes which influenced their System of Procedure.
2. The History of the Court of Chancery.
3. The Principles of Equity Pleading.
4. The Jurisdiction of the Court over Infants.

The Reader on Equity proposes to form two Private Classes—a Senior and Junior—according to the amount of preliminary knowledge possessed by the Students; using, in the Junior, "Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence" as a text-book; and, in the Senior, examining the principal branches of Equitable Jurisdiction, with a frequent reference to cases; and also commencing the perusal of Lord Redesdale's Treatise on Equity Pleadings.

LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, &C.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of six Public Lectures on the following subjects:—

1. The Devolution and Transmission of Powers and Trusts for Sale.
2. The Effect of Disclaimer by Trustees for Sale, and Donees of Powers of Sale.
3. Conveyances and Assignments by Debtors to Trustees for the Benefit of Creditors.
4. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Acts, so far as they affect the Law of Real Property.

In his Private Classes the Reader on Real Property Law will refer more particularly to the cases cited in the Public Lectures. He will also discuss the nature and quality of the different estates in land, and the common forms of assurance.

JURISPRUDENCE AND THE CIVIL LAW.

The Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of six Public Lectures on

The Roman Law of Testaments and Legacies. He will treat incidentally of the Early History of Wills and Testamentary Succession, as disclosed in the Ancient Roman and other Primitive Systems of Law; the successive steps by which a Will obtained its present form and characteristics; the relation of Testamentary to Intestate Succession; the nature of Universal Successions, and their connection with other forms of Succession; and the principles which Modern Jurisprudence has derived from the Roman conceptions of a Will, an Inheritance, and a Legacy.

The Reader will form a Junior Class, with which he will read the Commentaries of Gaius. The course will be strictly elementary, and the whole ground covered by the Roman Institutional Treatises will be traversed in the educational year. The Reader will also, if possible, form a Senior Class, with which he will read the Systema Juris Romani hodie Usitati of Mackeldey, beginning with the section on Obligations.

COMMON LAW.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the Educational Term, six Public Lectures, as under:—

Lectures 1 and 2 will indicate the method to be pursued in studying law as a science—will trace out its leading departments and subdivisions—and especially inquire respecting the importance of a knowledge of cases, and how they should be read and fixed in the memory.

Lectures 3 and 4 will be devoted to an examination of various elementary principles of our Common Law, and of the mode of applying them in practice.

Lectures 5 and 6 will specify the tribunals by which our Common Law is administered, and the limits of their respective jurisdictions.

With his Private Class the Reader will principally be engaged with the subjects included in Lectures 4—6 of the above programme—referring as well to decided cases as to the following books:—Smith's Leading Cases, 4th edition; Warren's Introduction to Law Studies; and Broom's Commentaries on the Common Law.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

SPOLLEN'S TRIAL.

The acquittal of Spollen, the suspected murderer of the unfortunate Mr. G. S. Little, did not surprise those who are acquainted with the difficulties which must beset any case founded on purely circumstantial evidence. It was quite clear, from the extraordinary circumstances attending the discovery of the stolen property, that the prisoner's wife, who first furnished the clue to the police, had accurate knowledge of the identity of the criminal, whoever he might be; and it was equally clear that either her husband, or some person well known to her, was that criminal. Her declarations, although not receivable as evidence, naturally had their weight in attaching more than suspicion on the prisoner; and, with so strong a primâ facie case against him, his defence was a difficult task, but, as the event proved, a successful one. Some persons still believe that the prisoner's wife had matured a frightful conspiracy against him; nor can the verdict of the jury be justified on any other ground than that this was also their belief.

We think that this remarkable trial furnishes another proof of the increasing unwillingness of juries to convict in capital cases, and may well excuse the inquiry whether the extreme punishment should continue applicable where the evidence is merely circumstantial. It may fairly be asked whether it would not be an improvement in our criminal jurisprudence to reserve the punishment of death (as the Legislature is resolved to retain that mode of punishment) for criminals convicted on direct and unmistakeable testimony. It may, indeed, appear unjust to deal differently with criminals convicted of similar offences, but this might be the lesser evil after all. It is probably a greater evil that we see now in constant operation—viz. the acquittal of prisoners against whom the evidence is merely circumstantial, and whom juries are unwilling to condemn to the gallows, for fear lest it may afterwards turn out that some other person was the real criminal.

In the present instance, the subsequent proceedings of the acquitted man have done more to prejudice the public mind against him than all the facts adduced in evidence at his trial. A morbid love of notoriety, combined with a desire for gain, have induced him to make a public exhibition of himself; but we are happy to add that very few of his fellow-citizens have the bad taste to patronise this unique entertainment. Those who have done so have put such unpalatable questions to their entertainer, that he found replies impossible, and will, it is to be hoped, be induced, for his own sake, to close his doors very speedily. Is it possible that the Executive Government have no power to put a stop to this revolting exhibition? Dublin can boast of more police-magistrates and more policemen than any city of its size in the empire, and its police code is more stringent than that of any other place; it is therefore surprising, that, while publicans, car-drivers, and other classes are under hourly supervision, and are strictly proceeded against for every shadow of a violation of law, nothing can be done to preserve decorum at places of public entertainment. Even the Lord Chamberlain, whose jurisdiction is elsewhere so largely exercised, appears unable, or unwilling, to interfere with the programme of a suspected murderer.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.

Before leaving for the Long Vacation, the Commissioners of the Incumbered Estates Court have appointed several sales of very large estates to take place in the ensuing months of November and December; and from the state of their lists there is no symptom whatever of falling off in the quantity of business transacted by them. The estates (in the south-west) of the Marquis of Thomond, comprising several thousand statute acres, are to be sold in December. A large property in Louth, belonging to the Marquis of Anglesey, is also to be disposed of about the same time. Several large and valuable estates in Tipperary and adjacent counties, bought by the notorious speculator J. Sadleir, M.P., and afterwards mortgaged by him to the London and County Bank and other London companies, will also be sold, and will doubtless realise large prices. November and December are the favourite months for sales of large estates, on account of the intermediate Long Vacation, which affords to purchasers and others an opportunity of inspecting the estates so announced for sale.

 In remarking on the property qualification required by law for a seat in the House of Commons, ante, p. 731, we inadvertently lost sight of the statute which now regulates the qualification—stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 48. Sect. 2. provides that no person shall be capable of being elected a member for any city or borough in England or Ireland unless he shall be entitled, &c., to an estate in lands, &c., or unless he shall be possessed, &c., for his own life, or the life of another, or for a term of not less than thirteen years unexpired, of or to personal estate or effects, or the interest or dividends thereof, such personal estate, or interest, &c., producing the clear yearly sum of £300 over and above all incumbrances.

PRACTICE OF PUBLIC BOARDS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I presume it is not proposed to give legal opinions in your valuable journal; the inquiry which I am about to make, however, I think will not come within the description of a legal opinion, and if you, or any of your readers who are familiar with the practice of public bodies, will furnish a reply, I for one shall be obliged.

In the proceedings of a corporation formed under the provisions of a recent Act of Parliament, a resolution was passed to this effect—No "resolution of any meeting of this board shall be rescinded at any subsequent meeting without notice given at the meeting immediately preceding that at which the proposition to rescind shall be made, and that such intimation shall be given in the notices calling the meeting." At a recent meeting of the board the following proceedings took place—"Moved by Mr. ——, seconded by Mr. ——, that the sum of £—— be allowed for &c." Show of hands taken—"For the motion, 6; against, 8: motion lost."

The question I am desirous of having solved is this—Is it competent for the mover or seconder, or any other party, to put the same motion again without giving notice; or is the loss of a motion similar in effect to a resolution, and does it come within the terms of the resolution which I have transcribed in full?—Yours obediently,

A SUBSCRIBER.

TESTAMENTARY AND DIVORCE BUSINESS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The attention of the profession should be immediately directed to the resolution moved last night by Mr. Bouverie in the House of Commons. If the effect of the resolution, or of the Bill to be founded upon it, be (as I understand it to be) that no attorney can practise in the Courts of Probate and Divorce without paying the same stamp duty, on being admitted, as is now payable by a person on being admitted a proctor, nor without taking out an annual certificate in addition to the certificate he has now to pay for, I take it that the alleged throwing open of the testamentary and divorce business is no better than "a delusion and a snare."—Yours obediently, Manchester, August 19th, 1857. AN ATTORNEY.

[The question raised in the above letter will be set at rest by the following communication, which we have received from an excellent authority.—ED. S. J. & R.]

By a new clause in the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill

(s. 61, as amended in committee) the stamp duty on the admission of persons "as proctors" in the new courts is required to be paid, as well as the annual certificate duty.

A question has been raised whether this will apply to attorneys and solicitors, who, by this Bill and the Probate Bill, are expressly entitled to practise in both the new courts. We are informed, on authority on which we can rely, that this provision is intended to meet the case of "registrars and deputy registrars" who are entitled to be admitted as proctors and as attorneys and solicitors, and who may not have paid the admission duty. The clause will also apply to attorneys and solicitors or proctors who, if they confined their practice to the new courts, might evade the payment of the annual certificate duty under the existing Acts.

The clause in question, however, only imposes the stamp duty on persons admitted as proctors. The attorneys and solicitors of the courts of law and equity will practise as attorneys and solicitors in the new courts, and not as proctors, and will require no admission as proctors. Under the regulations of the Court they may probably be required to sign the roll, but no stamp duty can be required. So long as the taxes on the larger branch of the profession are continued, it is but fair that all who practise in any of the courts should pay the like stamp duties.

"ASSIGNING COUNSEL TO PRISONERS."

To the Editor of The Solicitors' Journal & Reporter.

Sir,—I have read your leader under this heading in your thirty-second number, and must beg of you, before you say anything more on this head, to endeavour to prevail on the Crown to allow better costs to attorneys conducting prosecutions, as, to use your own words, "the existing system throws criminal business into the hands of a low class of practitioners." What will the profession say to this?—

Some little time since I was retained to prosecute a man for cutting another with a hook, with intent, &c. (a very serious case), at the assizes at Exeter. My trouble amounted to this—The preparing of a brief (four sheets); travelling to Exeter, thirty miles from my residence, and staying there four days, preparing for and awaiting the trial; for which I was allowed by Mr. Gurney the magnificent sum of one guinea!

I have never conducted a prosecution since, although many have been offered me.—Very truly yours,

South Molton, Aug. 17, 1857. J. J. Shapland.

ATTORNEYS AS SURROGATES.

To the Editor of The Solicitors' Journal & Reporter.

Sir,—Before the Probate Bill becomes law, I do not imagine that it will be out of place through your columns to suggest a clause for the appointment of attorneys as surrogates throughout England. I do not apprehend it will be for me to show or discuss the question as to the competency of attorneys in comparison with clergymen, for it is too palpable; but I have personally, with some of my clients, experienced considerable inconvenience from the absence or illness of the clerical surrogates in my neighbourhood; and I think it a question well worthy of the consideration of the promoters of this measure, and, before the Bill becomes law, a clause might very well be introduced empowering attorneys to act as surrogates for the purpose of administering oaths, on probate being made, in the same manner as attorneys are, in all superior courts, enabled to take affidavits; but the power might be restricted to attorneys who are strangers, or are not in any way concerned in the probate or administration. I am sure the inconvenience would be materially lessened, if not avoided entirely, by the affidavits being taken before an attorney other than the gentleman engaged in the business professionally, so that there might be no fear of collusion.—I am, Sir, yours respectfully, John Nurse Chadwick.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Aug. 14.

Delays in Chancery Suits.

Lord St. Leonards presented a petition from a party to a suit in Chancery, complaining that, although the proceedings had been instituted in 1833, no judgment had as yet been given in the case.

The Lord Chancellor said, with respect to the particular case, this was the first time he had heard of it; but the statements in the petition should be inquired into. In reference to the general state of the business of the Court of Chancery, he did not believe it ever was in so satisfactory a state before. Where there were now one or two arrears, there used to be hundreds. He believed, that, although there was no deficiency in the number of judges, there was a deficiency in the necessary official staff of clerks in the judges' offices. He did not mean to say that he intended to increase that staff, but he should probably institute some inquiry with respect to it.

The Law of Domicile.

Lord St. Leonards drew attention to the present unsatisfactory state of the law of domicile, and particularly to its operation upon wills.

Lord Campbell said, that, although he had been studying the law of domicile for upwards of forty years, he positively did not know where his own domicile was, whether in Scotland, Ireland, or in England, as he had property in all three countries, and resided about two-fifths of the year in Scotland. He thought reform with respect to this subject was absolutely necessary.

The Lord Chancellor thought that at present, at all events, any alterations in the law would be productive of more evil than good.

Monday, August 17.

The Royal assent was given to the Attorneys and Solicitors (Colonial Courts) Bill, Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace Bill, Municipal Corporations Bill, and the Fraudulent Trustees Bill.

Joint-Stock Companies Bill.

The Commons' amendments to this Bill were considered.

The Lord Chancellor said that this Bill had been amended in the other House in the first place by providing that the dividend of 2*s.* in the pound should not be given up. To this amendment he offered no opposition, for he was informed that the judgments were taken for the amount of the debts less the 2*s.* But the amendment went on to enact, "that no proceedings should be taken upon the judgments without the leave of the Court of Chancery." To this proviso he must certainly object. He therefore moved to disagree with this portion of the Commons' amendment, and to reinsert the words which had been passed by that House.

Lord St. Leonards disagreed with the course proposed by the Lord Chancellor, believing that the Commons' amendments could work no possible injustice, for the judgment creditor would have to go to a court of equity before he could enforce his judgment.

The Lord Chancellor said that the effect of a judgment in Ireland being equivalent to a mortgage of the land of the judgment debtor, it was thought only just that the judgment creditor having thus taken that land, should be restrained from going against other property of the shareholders. The House divided—For the motion, 11; against it, 9: majority, 2.

Probates and Letters of Administration Bill.

On the order of the day for considering the Commons' amendments to this Bill,

The Lord Chancellor said, the main features of the Bill had not been changed in the House of Commons, but the provision confining the jurisdiction of the district courts to non-contentious cases in which property below the value of £1,500 was involved had been altered in such a manner as to give these courts jurisdiction in all cases, whatever might be the amount of property, provided there was no contest as to the validity of the will, and the testator died within the district. That House also had determined that the exclusive privileges of proctors should be abolished, and that all solicitors and attorneys should be admitted to a share of the business, and had decided that the proctors should receive a large compensation. It would be idle now to discuss that question, but he had at several stages of the Bill expressed his opinion that the diminution of practice was not a legitimate ground for compensation. These were the main changes made by the House of Commons, but a number of minor alterations had also been effected:—It had been decided by the Commons that the appeal from the decisions of the county court judges should be to the Court of Probate itself, and he should ask their Lordships to add to that change, in mercy to the parties themselves, that such appeal should be final. With respect to the procedure of the court, it was thought in the other House that the framing of the rules should be concurrent with the coming into existence of the new court. A change had also been made in the procedure, by allowing the judge of the Court of Probate, when questions of fact were to be tried by a jury, a discretion to try them before himself, or to send them to be tried by another court. It was quite obvious that the adoption of these amendments was essential to the passing of the Bill, and he therefore moved to agree, with some verbal alterations, to the amendments of the Commons.

Lord Wynford expressed his opposition to the amendment extending the jurisdiction of the district courts, and hoped their Lordships would refuse their assent to it.

Lord St. Leonards was greatly surprised that the House of Commons should have consented to give to the proctors compensation to the amount of £100,000 a year. The principle of this Bill with regard to compensation would be hereafter referred to in favour of improper, wanton, and unnecessary compensation.

Lord Campbell said, that although he did not approve the whole of the Bill, yet, taking it all in all, he thought that it would be a great boon to the country. With regard to the question of compensation, he had always held the opinion, that, wherever by an improvement in the law an office was abolished, there ought to be compensation.

The Lord Chancellor said, that, with regard to compensation, he believed that its probable amount was considerably over-stated at £100,000. The proctors now received what was called the "proctor's fee" on every probate. That fee would eventually be abolished; but he was afraid a portion of it would have to be retained for a time to meet this claim for compensation.—The Commons' amendments, with certain verbal alterations, were agreed to.

Thursday, August 20.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

Lord Redesdale gave notice that he should move, when the Bill came before them, that the Commons' amendments be considered that day three months.

Lord Campbell said, that it would be a great national calamity if the Bill were not passed this session.

Lord Wynford said it was very objectionable that the Bill should be passed in the absence of all the bishops.

Joint Stock Companies Act Amendment Bill.

This Bill passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, August 14.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The debate on the 25th clause was resumed. This clause, with clauses 26 and 27, were agreed to.

Probate in the Three Kingdoms.

The Attorney-General, in reply to a question put by Mr. Hadfield, said that a clause extending English probate to Ireland, and Irish probate to England, would be introduced into the Irish Probate Bill. With respect to Scotland the difference in the law was very great, and it was therefore not his intention at present to propose that the Scotch confirmation should be operative in England or Ireland. That must be a matter for future consideration.

Joint-Stock Companies (Act 1856) Amendment Bill.

This Bill was read a third time.

Mr. Malins objected to the Bill's passing, unless certain words were inserted to exclude insurance companies from its operation which were established before the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

Mr. Wilson said that it was intended that words to the effect required should be inserted in the Lords.

The Bill then passed.

Trustees Relief Act.

This Bill was read a second time.

Charitable Trusts Acts Continuance Bill.

This Bill passed through committee.

Salaries of County Court Judges.

Sir F. Kelly gave notice that he should next session move an address to her Majesty praying that the salaries of county court judges may thenceforth be fixed at £1,500 per annum.

Monday, August 17.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The committee on this Bill was resumed with clause 28; which, with clauses to 52 inclusive, were, during the morning and evening sittings, agreed to.

Trustees Relief Bill.

Mr. Walpole moved that the House resolve itself into committee on this Bill.

The Attorney-General objected, on the ground that the House had not sufficient time to consider it, and stated that it was his intention to introduce a comprehensive measure on the subject next session.

Mr. Walpole consented to withdraw the Bill.

Judgments Bill.

This Bill was committed pro formâ.

Tuesday, Aug. 18.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes (Stamp Duties).

The following resolutions proposed by Mr. Wilson were agreed to:—

"That the same amount of stamp duty as is now payable on the admission of a proctor to any ecclesiastical court shall be payable by every person to be admitted as a proctor in the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, or in the Court of Probate, who shall not have been previously admitted as a proctor in the other of such courts, or in an Ecclesiastical or Admiralty Court, and have paid the stamp duty in respect thereof."

"That every person who shall practise as a proctor or as a solicitor or attorney in the said Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, or the said Court of Probate, shall obtain an annual certificate to authorise him so to do under the Stamp Duty Acts, in the same manner as proctors practising in the Ecclesiastical or Admiralty Courts, and solicitors and attorneys practising in her Majesty's Courts at Westminster, are now required to do by the said Acts, or any of them."

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The following proviso of the Attorney-General was added to clause 53, after a lengthened discussion, and several amendments, which were negatived or withdrawn:—"Provided always, that no clergyman in holy orders, of the United Church of England and Ireland, shall be compelled to solemnise the marriage of any person whose former marriage may have been dissolved on the ground of his or her adultery, or shall be liable to any suit, penalty, or censure for solemnising, or refusing to solemnise, the marriage of any such person."

Mr. Wigram moved a proviso prohibiting the marriage of the adulterous parties; which was negatived.

On clause 24, which abolishes the action for crim. con., Mr. I. Butt moved to omit the clause. He said that it was admitted that at the close of the last century, the speeches of Erskine and Lord Kenyon, and the verdicts of juries in suits of this kind, had powerfully contributed to check the crime of adultery, which was then more common than it has been since. When they had made adultery a criminal offence it would be time to abolish this action, but till then he hoped it would be retained.

On a division the clause was allowed to stand. The remaining clauses of the Bill were agreed to.

On the motion of the Attorney-General the following clauses were added to the Bill:—

"All persons admitted to practise as advocates or proctors respectively in any ecclesiastical court in England, and all barristers, attornies, and solicitors entitled to practise in the Superior Courts at Westminster, shall be entitled to practise in the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes; and such advocates and barristers shall have the same relative rank and precedence which they now have in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, unless and until her Majesty shall otherwise order."

"A sentence of judicial separation (which shall have the effect of a divorce à mensâ et thoro under the existing law, and such other legal effect as herein mentioned) may be obtained, either by the husband or the wife, on the ground of adultery, or cruelty, or desertion without cause for two years and upwards."

The Attorney-General, in moving clause 18, said he felt that he was precluded by a former decision of the committee from adopting the county court, and had therefore to resort to such tribunals as remained—viz. the itinerant judges of assize, the court of quarter sessions, and the courts of the recorders of cities and boroughs. But it had since been intimated to him that the courts of quarter sessions were not properly constituted for conducting this nice and delicate jurisdiction, and therefore, although he proposed in the clause to leave jurisdiction in this matter to the courts of quarter sessions, he now proposed to amend that part of the clause by substituting for those courts the courts of the recorders in cities and boroughs.

Mr. Malins said it would be impossible for the assize judges to form an opinion as to how long such cases would last, and it was doubtful whether they could dispose of the business. Even as to the recorders a delay of three months would take place between each sitting; and as many of them were young unmarried men, he doubted, taking the average of them, whether they had sufficient experience to be entrusted with a jurisdiction such as that proposed. The commissioners of lunacy tried cases with juries; would it not be best to send down special commissioners to try the cases under this Act, and report to the court?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL reminded the committee that besides the judges at Nisi Prius there were commissioners, consisting of seven counsel and serjeants-at-law; and what he proposed was that any of these commissioners might act. A special person might be selected from amongst the commissioners, and appointed to hear any number of these divorce cases that might arise. With regard to the service of the petition, that difficulty might be obviated by directing that it should be sent up to the judges of assize a certain number of days before the sitting of the court, and sealed with the seal of the court; and in that way the respondent might be brought up to answer. In regard to the suggestion of the quarter sessions having the jurisdiction, he had no objection to adopt it, and to allow the chairman of quarter sessions to take these petitions, sitting pro hâc vice as the judge. He proposed to move an amendment, to enable the judge to refer the hearing of petitions of this nature to any barrister named in the commission, and to empower the judge to make such appointment, and also to introduce words giving jurisdiction to the chairman of quarter sessions, as being the best local tribunal available.

Mr. S. FITZGERALD suggested that the assistant chairman, as well as the chairman of quarter sessions, should have power to deal with these cases.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL assented.

The clause as amended was read a second time.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then moved a clause declaring that every person who at the time of the passing of the Act had been duly admitted and was practising as a proctor in any ecclesiastical court in England, should, at the expiration of two years from and after the commencement of the Act, be entitled to claim compensation from the Treasury; such compensation to be calculated on the average clear gains of the last three years, to be awarded by way of annuity, and in no case to exceed one-half of the annual loss.

Mr. HENLEY wished to know why the parties most interested —namely, the officers—were not dealt with in the same manner as the proctors.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it had been uniformly represented to him that if the chancellors and officers of the inferior diocesan courts were compensated in respect of the testamentary business, they would be perfectly satisfied. As regarded the proctors, it never was intended that compensation should be granted to them on the same principle under this Bill, as under the Testamentary Bill. The latter Bill took away from them business which they had; while this Bill gave them a new description of business, and took nothing from them.

A clause to precede clause 55, containing the resolutions of the committee as to Stamp Duties (given above) was agreed to.

Wednesday, Aug. 19.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. HADFIELD asked whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce in the ensuing session any measure for the abolition of imprisonment for debt which had been contracted without fraud.

Sir G. GREY said that the subject was under consideration, but he could make no promise.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL brought up a clause which he proposed to substitute for clause 8, relating to the constitution of the court. It was to the effect that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, the senior puisne judge for the time being of each of the above-mentioned courts, and the judge of the Court of Probate, should be the judges of the new court. The hon. and learned gentleman remarked that the only alteration was the addition of the senior puisne judge of each of the three courts in common law.—The clause was agreed to.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL submitted another clause, empowering the judge of assize or any other person named in the commission of assize or Nisi Prius, the chairman or assistant-chairman of quarter sessions, and the recorder, who were the judges nominated to exercise the local jurisdiction created by the Bill, to impanel juries and hear and determine petitions precisely as the court itself would be able to do, and also providing that the orders of such local tribunals should be entered and treated in every respect as if they had been originally made by the court.

Mr. HENLEY did not see what machinery was provided for the local tribunals.

Mr. AYRTON remarked that the court of assize was a court pro hâc vice only, and until the commission was opened no steps could be taken.

Mr. S. FITZGERALD thought it would be objectionable to give the decision in matters of fact to quarter sessions, when any number of magistrates might attend.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would withdraw this clause, and upon the report would re-introduce the original clause, taking care to insert such words as would make the whole machinery of the courts of assize and quarter sessions applicable for business to be done in consequence of this Bill.—The clause was then withdrawn.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL next proposed a clause providing that a husband might petition for damages to be paid by the person who had committed adultery with the petitioner's wife. The claim so made should be tried in the same manner and upon the same principles as the existing action for crim. con.; and if damages were recovered upon the verdict of a jury, the Court should have power to direct in what manner they should be applied, whether settled upon children, or for the maintenance of the wife, or in any other manner.

Mr. MALINS observed that the clause was a complete substitute for the old action of crim. con.

Sir J. TRELAWNEY inquired whether the same publicity which had hitherto been allowed in actions of crim. con., and had been much complained of, would be permitted under this Bill?

Mr. MALINS hoped that there would be no attempt at secret tribunals in cases of this kind, however objectionable the publication of the details might be.

The clause was agreed to, and added to the Bill.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed a clause to the effect that, when any clergyman of the Church of England should refuse to perform the marriage ceremony between persons who but for such refusal would be entitled to the performance of that ceremony, then it should be lawful for any other minister of the Church of England licensed within the diocese in which the parties resided, to perform such ceremony.

Mr. MALINS said, it would be highly repugnant to the feelings of the clergy to open their churches for the performance of the marriage ceremony in cases where they could not perform it themselves. He objected, therefore, to the compromise now proposed. If any difficulty should arise as to the celebration of these marriages, that difficulty might be met by a short Act at some future time.

After much discussion, the committee divided, and the numbers were—for the clause, 73; against it, 33: majority, 40.

The clause was then read a second time, and added to the Bill.

The Lords' amendments to the following Bills were considered, and agreed to:—MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL, and the JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

Thursday, Aug. 20.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

On the order for considering this Bill as amended, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved to leave out clause 18 (added in Committee), and to substitute the following:—

"Application for restitution of conjugal rights or for judicial separation on any one of the grounds aforesaid may be made either by husband or wife, by petition to the court, or to any judge of assize at the assizes held for the county in which the husband and wife reside or last resided together, or to the court of quarter sessions of the peace held for the county or borough in which the husband and wife are or were last resident, and which judge of assize and courts of quarter sessions respectively are hereby authorised and required to hear and determine such petition according to the rules and regulations which shall be made under the authority of this Act, and the court or judge to which such petition is addressed, on being satisfied of the truth of the allegations therein contained, and that there is no legal ground why the same should not be granted, may decree such judicial separation accordingly, and where the application is by the wife, may make any order for alimony which shall be deemed just; provided, always, that any judge of assize to whom such petition shall be presented may refer the same to any of her Majesty's counsel or serjeant-at-law named in the commission of assize or Nisi Prius, and such counsel or serjeant shall, for the purpose of deciding upon the matters of such petition, have all the powers that any such judge would have had by virtue of this Act or otherwise."

The motion was agreed to.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved to insert after clause 18, the following:—

"For the purpose of hearing and deciding all applications under the authority of this Act, the judge of assize, or person nominated by him as aforesaid, and also the courts of quarter sessions for any county, district, or borough, shall respectively be entitled to avail themselves of the services of all officers, and use and exercise all powers and authorities which the court of assize and courts of quarter sessions respectively may employ, use, and exercise, for the determination of causes and other matters now usually heard and decided by them respectively; and the said judge of assize or other person, and courts of quarter sessions respectively, shall also, for the purpose, have and be entitled to exercise all the powers and authorities hereby given to the Court for the hearing and deciding applications made to it; and also the powers hereby given to the Court to make provision touching the custody, maintenance, and education of children, and every order made by any judge of assize, or other person, or any court of quarter sessions, under the authority of this Act, may, on the application of the person obtaining the same, be entered as an order of the Court, and, when so entered, shall have the same force and effect, and be enforced in the same manner, as if such order had been originally made by the Court. The Court shall, from time to time, fix and regulate the fees which shall be payable upon all proceedings under any application to a judge of assize or court of quarter sessions or magistrates under this Act; and such fees shall be received in money, for their own benefit, by the persons to whom, or for whose use, the same shall be directed to be paid."

The motion was agreed to.

The Attorney-General brought up a clause in lieu of clause 19, protecting the separate property and earnings of a married woman whose husband had been guilty of adultery.

Mr. Henley asked whether the clause gave sufficient protection to the earnings of a wife, as against the husband or his creditors?

The Attorney-General said, in case of seizure by the husband himself, the magistrate's order, as provided by this clause, making the wife a feme sole, coupled with a resort to the Court of Chancery, would be a sufficient protection. There was a technical difficulty in the way of giving the wife the right of proceeding, by action, against her husband. In case of attack by a creditor or assignee of the husband, the wife could have an action for the recovery of her property, if under £50, in the county court, and above that sum in the superior courts.

The clause was agreed to, after much discussion.

On clause 30, words were introduced giving the court power to make interim orders for alimony pending the investigation of a petition.

The report was then agreed to.

Friday, Aug. 21.

The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill was read a third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent.)

Mersey Conservancy.

This Bill has at last passed the committee in the House of Lords; though, as was before stated in a previous number of this paper, their Lordships have materially altered the principle of the original Bill, by awarding compensation to the Corporation of Liverpool in respect of their confiscated rights. That amount of compensation is fixed by the Bill at no less a sum than £1,500,000. The main grievance which was put forward, from time to time, by the large importers of goods at Liverpool (who principally consisted of the Manchester cotton-spinners) was, that Town Dues were levied on all goods not belonging to the freemen of the port, or to resident freemen of London, Bristol, Waterford, or Wexford, which Town Dues amounted to an enormous revenue, and were applied to the improvement of the city of Liverpool, and did not, in any way, benefit the port.

There was a peculiar circumstance connected with this Bill—viz. no solicitor's name appeared on the back of it. The Town Clerk of Manchester ostensibly appeared as the solicitor in charge of it. And although no concealment was made of the fact that the Great Western Railway Company, whose terminus is at Birkenhead, were much interested in the success of the measure, still the secret was preserved until the Bill was in committee in the Lords, when it transpired that the Great Western Company were at the sole expense of promoting the Bill. That Company had a great stake in the Bill as it passed the Commons, inasmuch as they obtained powers to hold land at Birkenhead, contiguous to the docks there. The Bill, as it will pass into a law, is settled as follows:—A board, to be called the "Mersey Dock and Harbour Board," is to be formed. The Birkenhead Docks, Liverpool Docks, the powers of levying tolls enjoyed at present by the Corporation of Liverpool, the Liverpool Dock Committee, and Liverpool Dock Trustees respectively, are to be transferred to the Board. The powers of the Pilotage Commissioners, and the Town and Anchorage Dues, heretofore enjoyed by the Corporation of Liverpool, are also to be transferred, as well as the Conservancy of the Mersey; so that, instead of half-a-dozen tribunals, there will be one public body who will be responsible for the management of the Mersey Navigation and Docks at Liverpool and Birkenhead.

The Great Western Company failed in obtaining land at Birkenhead.

Sir James Graham, as chairman of the committee in the Commons, has taken charge of the new Bill, and will, no doubt, insure its receiving the Royal assent. The Bill sanctioned by the Lords was so materially altered that it has become necessary to re-introduce a Bill pro formâ, and pass it through both Houses. This concludes the private business of the session.

The Parliamentary Session.

The late session has, as regards the amount of work, been beyond the usual average; and, looking at the measures introduced and passed, the general style of business has assumed the appearance of "solid legislation," and has been divested of the wild speculative taint which has since the railway mania year by year gradually disappeared

At the commencement of the first session 249 Bills were introduced, 130 of which related to railways, and 97 authorised new works. Of these ninty-seven Bills, forty-six related to works projected by new companies, and fifty-one to works by existing companies. The remaining Railway Bills related to amalgamations, leases, running powers, and capital.

On the commencement of the second session, after the new Parliament met, twenty-four of these Railway Bills had either met an adverse fate in standing committee, or were withdrawn. About ninety of these Bills will have received the Royal assent as soon as Parliament rises, and (inclusive of Estate Bills) the number of Bills altogether which will have received the Royal assent will be about 160. Several of the great English railway companies have been involved in parliamentary litigation. The South-Western Company was involved in a protracted struggle with a new Broad Gauge Company, which endeavoured to extend their system to Southampton, in which the promoters of the new scheme failed. The South-Eastern Railway Company, with the East Kent Company, successfully contested in the Commons the right of making a new line between Dartford and London, and lost the ground they had obtained in the Commons by an adverse decision in the House of Lords; so the country is still open for another year. The Great Western Company had a monster quarrel with the Corporation of Liverpool over the Mersey Conservancy case, and also with the North-Western in the Shropshire Union Railway and Canal Bill, in both of which they failed.

The Great Northern and North-Western came in collision over the Lancaster, Carlisle, and Ingledon Railway Bill, and, after several days in Committee, a decision was arrived at favourable to the last-named company.

No particular measure for making a railway in the suburbs of London was carried. The Richmond and Kew Railway Bill was thrown out in the Lords, and the South London was withdrawn in the Commons. Power was obtained to abandon the Clapham and Norwood Railway; so that, by the legislation for metropolitan railways, a branch has been cut off the tree by the abandonment of one railway.

The Brighton Company have succeeded in supporting the Mid-Sussex Company through both Houses of Parliament, and thereby extended their own line from Horsham to Petworth, and have been unsuccessful in preventing the Wimbledon and Dorking Company from bringing Epsom in immediate connection with Waterloo Terminus viâ Wimbledon and the South-Western Railway.

The Eastern Counties was threatened by a dangerous adversary in the shape of the Tilbury, Maldon, and Colchester Railway Company, who projected a scheme for getting to Colchester independent of the Eastern Counties Railway. A compromise, however, was effected without an opposition, and the new company withdrew their Bill.

In the large mineral traffic district the Ely Tidal Harbour and Railway Bill occasioned a session of many days, during which the Clive and Bute families respectively disputed the dock rights at Cardiff. This matter was ultimately arranged, and clauses agreed on by both parties. The Taff Vale Railway Company, and the freighters by that line, also occupied the Committee several days in settling their quarrel, which also terminated in a mutual settlement.

The Caledonian, Deeside, and Monkland Railway Companies respectively obtained powers to make branches and extensions on the other side of the Tweed; and from the other side of the Channel the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, and the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland Company, sustained the longest Irish contest.

It is impossible to give more than the outline of the main features of some of the important cases. We must, however, not overlook two or three cases which do not relate to railways. Amongst these the Liverpool contest over the Mersey Conservancy Bill stands pre-eminent. The Drainage Bills also, peculiar to the Norfolk, Suffolk, and Bedford districts—viz. the North Level Drainage and Nene Valley Drainage Bills—shared opposite fates. The former was passed after a long contest; the latter was rejected by the Committee, to the amazement of promoters and opponents, some of whom prophesied dolefully of winter floods, owing to powers not being obtained for executing works forthwith.

The Tweed Fisheries Bill, also, although looked on as a great boon by the upper proprietors of the Tweed as the salvation of the breed of salmon, is regarded by the lower proprietors as an infringement of their rights. It is a very important measure; the effect of it being, that the time and mode of netting salmon is limited by the Act, so as to prevent the little fish being poached on their way to the sea. It was proved by the evidence that salmon grow five or six pounds, when young, in three months, and that the greediness of the lower proprietors in stopping the fish in transitu to the sea was an incalculable loss to the fisheries.

Several Roads Bills were passed, and Bills of minor local interest, but we have noticed such of the most prominent schemes as our space would allow.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The closing price of Consols for money is 90⅞, so that the result of the fluctuations of the week has been that the price remains exactly at the final quotation of last Friday. From Saturday to Wednesday the favourable tendency noticed in our last number continued, and an advance of ⅛ per Cent. was realised. But yesterday and to-day depressing influences have again operated. The state of the principal foreign money markets is not encouraging, and uncertainty on this point, and as to the course of events in India, goes far to neutralise the effect of the abundant harvest. For the last few days money has been very easy on the Stock Exchange, at 3 to 4 per Cent. To-day there has been somewhat more demand at 4 per Cent., but the supply is adequate. In Lombard-street the price is 5⅛ to ¾ per Cent., and the demand is light. No alteration was made by the Bank Directors yesterday in their rate of discount.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 15th August, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,393,025, being a decrease of £154,415; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,259,906, showing a decrease of £23,848 when compared with the previous return.

The amount of specie shipped to India and China by the Columbo is £1,095,014. The total of remittances during the present year is thus raised to about £12,500,000 against £7,500,000 in the corresponding period of 1856. To this extent specie instead of goods is already demanded of us in the East India trade. Without supposing more than a partial interruption in the demand for our exports in consequence of present disturbances, it is reasonable to expect an increasing drain of bullion.

The reports of the half-yearly meetings of a large number of railway companies are now before the public. The aspect of affairs is, in many cases, very unfavourable. Interest and curiosity are chiefly attached to the great trunk lines. The magnitude of these undertakings, the immense expenditure, and the superlative engineering skill devoted to them, all tend to excite admiration. The public enjoy the vast advantage and convenience afforded by railways, and naturally rejoice at the easy means of gratifying the ruling passion for frequent and rapid change. All persons employed in working railways, feel pride and satisfaction in the vast development of the system. Persons who have sold part of their land for railways, and find the remaining part increased in value, and those who have secured preferential shares also rejoice. But there remains the general body of shareholders, those who, having invested their capital without any extrinsic advantage, reckon upon the periodical dividends as their means of support. These numerous persons find no cause for satisfaction.

The dividend declared on the London and North-western Consolidation Stock is at the sale of 5 per cent. per annum. The Eastern Counties dividend is 5s. per £20 share. The Great Western, which holds the first place in splendour and magnificence, is reduced to a dividend of 1 per cent. per annum. The question arising out of Redpath's frauds, which has so much agitated the Great Northern Company, assumed a very strange aspect. There was a report of a dictum of Lord St. Leonards to the effect that the company might refuse liability for those frauds, but it has not appeared in what manner such refusal could be made to operate. An arrangement more immediately practical rested on the question whether the preferential shareholders were in any degree to suffer loss. It seems to have been settled that, although they suffer in a less degree than ordinary shareholders, they have not wholly escaped.

These great trunk lines and their branches are far advanced towards completion. It is obvious that during the progress of such undertakings there is great difficulty in ascertaining profit. Competition without being every where extinguished will probably become moderate, and it may be hoped that railway property, in general, will be made to pay a dividend somewhat higher than stock in the Government funds.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, AUGUST 29, 1857.

NISI PRIUS ELOQUENCE.

It is not often that the London journals report at length the effusions of provincial advocacy. Some general expressions, such as, "Mr. So-and-so made an eloquent and forcible appeal," or "Mr. Such-an-one, in a powerful and feeling speech," are all that is usually bestowed on a whole garden of rhetorical flowers, which, however, bloom in full luxuriance in the pages of the local newspapers. We have been favoured, by a correspondent, with a copy of the Wrexham Telegraph, containing a very choice specimen of the oratory which is in the highest esteem in the Assize Courts of Chester; and, as our readers are much concerned to know the various talents and qualifications of advocates, we cannot do better than invite them to examine the sample here presented.

The action of Lewis v. Bayley, tried at Chester, on the 4th inst., before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury, was brought by a solicitor and clerk to the magistrates at Wrexham, against the proprietor of a newspaper, published in the same town, to recover damages for an alleged libel. Mr. Neale, of the Oxford Circuit, was specially retained for the defendant; and we presume that this step was taken under an opinion of his skill and power, which he would naturally do his best to justify. Indeed, when he begins by declaring that he cannot introduce "one particle of eloquence," and that he shall put to the jury merely "a common-sense view of the case," we see at once that some extraordinary display of forensic art is in store for us—

> "I am no orator, as Brutus is;
> But, as you know me all, a plain, blunt man."

These words occur in the course of a skilful and highly-wrought appeal to the passions of a popular assembly, and it is one among innumerable proofs of the poet's knowledge of the human mind, that Mr. Neale, at the Chester Assizes, should decorate his "common-sense view" of his client's case with quotations from Johnson, Pope, Goldsmith, and Shakespeare himself. Nor does the learned gentleman neglect another of the usual topics of an opening. After renouncing even the smallest claim to that character for eloquence which he intends to do his utmost to establish, he proceeds to attribute to the jury a soundness of judgment, which, if they possessed it, would render his oratorical flights in the last degree perilous to his client's case. We will ourselves endeavour to bring to the consideration of Mr. Neale's speech a little of that same common sense which he says is his own strong point, and let us see how it will bear the test. It is stated, but neither proved nor positively denied, that Mr. Lewis, the plaintiff, is not only an attorney, but editor of a newspaper competing with that of the defendant. Of course Mr. Neale, although not an orator, improves this topic of the enmity between the two local journals as skilfully as if he had been Antony himself. "Do you think," he asks, "if the plaintiff had not been the editor of a rival paper, that you would have heard anything about this matter?" This is a good point well made. The alleged libel itself compares the plaintiff to the notorious firm of Quirk, Gammon, and Snap; and the defendant's counsel here suggests a parallel with the equally celebrated Mr. Potts of the Eatanswill Gazette. Presently, however, Mr. Neale gets upon another tack. He assails the plaintiff on the old familiar ground that he is an attorney. "If Mr. Lewis had been simply an editor, and not editor and attorney, would you have ever heard of the affair?" To our minds, this argument is inconsistent with that before employed. But, perhaps, if we had listened to a recitation of Pope, Goldsmith, and Shakespeare, by a gentleman specially selected to give all the points effectively, our memory and discernment would have been so far enfeebled as to render Mr. Neale's experiment on them by no means dangerous.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff had been injured by the libel in his reputation as an attorney; and it is to meet this complaint that the defendant's counsel has recourse to copious extracts from the English classics. His reasoning is, that the reputation of an attorney is necessarily, and independently of his conduct, such, that it cannot possibly matter how much abuse and falsehood may be lavished on him in the progress of his career. The devil is black already, and the most unsparing application of the paint-brush cannot darken his complexion by a shade. An attorney sensitive about his character! "I cannot conceive," says Mr. Neale, "how the plaintiff could believe you capable of swallowing such a story." A special jury of Cheshire is much too intelligent to be deluded by such a transparent artifice. The plaintiff, gentlemen, may think you fools, but we know you better. Three of our standard authors have undertaken to ridicule attorneys, and have done their work so well, that there is really nothing left to be said by the Wrexham Weekly Advertiser. Indeed, the editor of that newspaper can only regret that Johnson, Pope, and Goldsmith should have lived and thought before him, and that his own lot has been cast in the middle of the nineteenth century, when there are very few poetic crowns remaining to be won. The pretensions of attorneys to respectability were effectually disposed of more than one hundred years ago, and the plaintiff in this action must certainly be a very sanguine man if he hopes to persuade an enlightened jury to award to him one single farthing for damage to his professional reputation.

So far Mr. Neale is not illogical, and we can believe that he spouted his poetic extracts with an emphasis that produced a very considerable effect. But it would never have done to have stopped there. He makes haste to add, that "the profession of a lawyer is not necessarily what these authors have described—nay, it is an honourable profession." But if this be so, Mr. Lewis has, or may possibly have, a character to lose; and an attorney complaining of a libel is not necessarily, after all, an impudent impostor, experimenting upon the credulity of special juries, and the absence of any advocate as clear-sighted and outspoken as Mr. Neale. The poets are not to be believed. They had, in fact, a tendency, occasionally shared by barristers, to exaggerate and use high colouring for the sake of producing a strong effect. The profession is respectable enough; and it is only the litigiousness of persons like Mr. Lewis, "who are constantly poking their writs at their neighbours," that brings the profession into ridicule. But it happens that the question, whether Mr. Lewis had or had not good reason for "poking his writ" at Mr. Bayley, is the very question which the learned counsel was specially retained to argue. There can be no ground for this action, because the poets have said that all attorneys are rogues. The poets, however, only said so because attorneys brought groundless actions, like the present, which is without foundation, for the reason before stated. This, in a few words, and omitting the quotations, was the argument of the defendant's counsel. The plain statement of it is a sufficient refutation, and we think that the speech in which it is embodied is anything but a creditable specimen of Nisi Prius eloquence.

There was a verdict for the plaintiff, with £10 damages, and the judge certified for the special jury. The costs cannot but be considerable; and Mr. Neale anticipated in his speech that the effect would be to "sell the defendant up, types, house, presses, and dismiss him to the winds; and the lion of Wrexham will roam over the desert without even a Gordon Cumming to oppose him." This we take to be a metaphorical way of stating that the Wrexham Weekly Advertiser will shortly be numbered among the defunct cheap newspapers; and that the Wrexham Telegraph, or whatever be the title of Mr. Lewis's paper, if he have a paper, will enjoy sole dominion over the public mind of the district which has given birth to these disputes. To compare the editor of a country journal, whose rivals have become extinct, to a lion roaming unopposed over the desert, is certainly a piece of bold imagery; and we think, that, although Johnson, Pope, and Goldsmith may have anticipated Mr. Neale's client, Mr. Neale himself is still capable of originality even in the nineteenth century.

Why such extravagant violations of propriety should be introduced into Nisi Prius speeches we cannot tell, any more than we can conceive a reason why stupid, ungrammatical libels should be published in provincial newspapers, and obstinately persisted in when a retractation could so easily have been made. To trace the history of one of these miserable local squabbles is disgusting and disheartening in the last degree; and we certainly should not have entered into the details of this Wrexham case but for the unwarrantable and sweeping license assumed by the defendant's counsel. We must say that the pleading was worthy of the client. The advocate and the editor showed themselves on a level of taste and feeling; and the conduct of both was most justly reprobated by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, who, on other occasions besides this, has very effectively interfered where attorneys have been assailed with unmerited obloquy by counsel. His Lordship commenced his charge to the jury with the following remarks, which well deserve all the publicity that can be given to them:—

"I shall always consider it part of my duty, so long as I have the honour of presiding in a court of justice on trials of this kind, where an action is brought by a man who complains that his character has been libelled, to advise a jury, if they see reason to think that the libel relates to the individual who comes forward to complain, and that the matter is libellous and one for which reparation ought to be given, to consider it the most serious and grievous aggravation of the wrong that has been done to the complainant, that the defendant has taken advantage of the opportunity of the defence, to endeavour to heap ridicule and obloquy upon the man who has had the misfortune to have had his character assailed, and who comes into a court of justice to seek for redress for the injury he has sustained. Because a gentleman, who is an attorney, has reason to think his character has been attacked, and thinks himself entitled to submit to a jury of his countrymen the question of whether he is not entitled to have that character vindicated, he is therefore to be assailed by an eloquent counsel in every mode which eloquence and ingenuity and research can suggest to heap upon him ridicule and contempt, is what I think no jury ought to permit without marking their sense of such a defence. That he is to be classed among 'vile atttorneys,' described as a 'useless race;' and to have pieces of poetry brought forward for the purpose of showing that all the merits in the world cannot prevent a man from being the subject of ridicule because he happens to be an attorney—I say a defence of that description is tenfold, if not an hundredfold, an aggravation of any libel which can be brought against a man for any departure from the propriety of his profession. Therefore I feel it to be my bounden duty to tell you, if you think it is a libel and directed against the plaintiff, that the line of defence resorted to here, in seeking to heap obloquy upon the profession and personal character of this gentleman, is a most grievous aggravation, and one which it is your bounden duty to take into your serious consideration."

FRENCH TRIALS.

Considerable attention has been directed by several of our contemporaries to the proceedings in the recent State trial at Paris. Political writers will, of course, draw their own conclusions from these occurrences, and will tax their ingenuity to prove what, to any lawyer, was clear at first sight—that there was "no evidence," in the English sense of the word, against the accused persons. Such subjects do not fall within the scope of this journal, but it may interest our readers to see a short comparison between the more important features of French and English criminal procedure.

One great distinction will be found to run through the whole of the two systems, modifying even their most minute details. In England there is no connection whatever between the judge who tries the case and the prosecutor who brings the prisoner before him. The Court simply hears the evidence laid before it by two parties, to both of which it is a stranger, and acts according to the result to which that evidence points. In France a very different state of things takes place. The trial before the Cour d'Assises is but the last act in an inquiry which from first to last is under the control of the Government. A different set of officers are, no doubt, concerned in it from those who directed the preliminary investigations; but it is still substantially and really an inquiry on the part of the State, and not, in our sense of the word, a trial. When a man is arrested in France, he is subjected to an elaborate system of interrogations, which are prolonged and repeated, apparently, quite at the discretion of the police. Witnesses are, in the meantime, searched for in every quarter; and when, at last, the "ministère publique" considers the case sufficiently strong, it is sent before a jury. It is on its arrival at this stage that French procedure displays its most curious characteristics. The trial opens by the reading of the acte d'accusation; and any one who wishes for a striking example of the nature of these documents would do well to read that which the Procureur-General, M. Vaisse, composed on the subject of Tibaldi, Grilli, and Bartolotti. He need not be afraid of finding it dull. M. Dumas, in one of his most popular novels, introduces a Procureur-General, who solaces himself under the affliction of seeing his wife poison the rest of the family, by composing, with infinite care and pains, an acte d'accusation against a criminal who turns out to be his own son; and the novelist declares that the lawyer's efforts were never more happy. We can well believe that the pursuit must be an absorbing one, for it is hardly possible even for a mind trained in the inveterate scepticism as to facts, which the practice of English law is apt to produce, not to believe any person guilty of anything of which an acte d'accusation accuses him. The style is so good, the story is so neatly arranged, the difficulties or deficiencies in the evidence are so skilfully glossed over, that it seems almost an impiety, or, at the very least, a personal affront to the author of the document, to decline to adopt his conclusions. The acte is throughout a sort of triumphant account of the steps which led the Government to a great discovery, prefaced with a variety of moral sentiments about the guilt of assassination, and the objections to revolutions. Here and there, in a conversational way, a little evidence is thrown in; but it is done with the air with which a man performs an act of supererogation. The substantial part of the business is, not a dry collection of technical proofs which will warrant the jury in convicting the prisoner, but a very picturesque and interesting story, interspersed with many observations upon crime, human nature, and the honourable sentiments which remain at the bottom of the most perverted hearts, with which M. Vaisse is fortunate enough to have an opportunity of regaling his audience.

After the acte has been read the Procureur-General makes his speech, and then the President questions, first the prisoners, and then the witnesses. The interrogation of the prisoners at the late trial was infinitely more important than the examination of the witnesses; and, indeed, as two of the three admitted their guilt, this could hardly be otherwise. We must, however, observe, that nothing could be less satisfactory than their statements; indeed, by their own accounts, they had lied so freely and so often, that we should hardly have believed their evidence in the most utterly unimportant circumstance. The unfortunate man who denied his guilt was examined with all the rigour of the law; and the sort of bias which the Court felt against him is obvious from the fact, that, notwithstanding his reiterated assertions that a coat found in a box, which was said to belong to him, did not fit him, and his vehement requests that it might be tried on, the judge refused to make the experiment.

The most singular parts of the system to English lawyers are the latitude of drawing inferences which French juries enjoy, and the total absence of what we are accustomed to consider the best of all engines for ascertaining truth — cross-examination. The letters produced before the Court, and said to have been written by M. Mazzini, were not traced to him in any way whatever. The President, indeed, observed that they had been compared with his handwriting, and were very like it; and M. Vaisse, in his elegant literary way, remarked that, according to the saying, "le style c'est l'homme," there could be no doubt at all as to their authorship. According to English views, the President's assertion, which was supported by no proof whatever, was a complete transgression of the bounds of his duty; and there is something extremely ludicrous in the notion that a set of jurymen may be presumed to be so fully acquainted with M. Mazzini's writings as to be able to recognise his style in familiar letters. The absence of cross-examination is the feature of the performance which disappoints us most. Oh, for one hour of Mr. Edwin James! was the principal observation suggested by many parts of the evidence. It would have been a real pleasure in the present hot weather to have seen M. Bartolotti attempting to explain how he knew that the man he saw was M. Mazzini, and what reason that gentleman had to pay him in advance for undertaking to kill the Emperor. It would have been amusing to hear him detail his impressions as to the frequency or otherwise of meeting fat Frenchmen with whiskers and mustaches in the streets of London; and to have listened to his explanations as to what he did with the fifty Napoleons which found their way into his rascally pocket. There may be a certain classical stateliness in a French court of law. Our Parisian contemporaries report some beautiful sentences about "the chosen of six millions," "the hand of assassination," and the cowardice of those who can suborn, but dare not commit, murder. It is all very fine, and very clever, but there is nothing like leather. Years ago, a famous speaker at a flourishing debating club had a stock sentiment beginning, "Will ye part with your birthright for this miserable mess of pottage?" His friends called it the mess of pottage peroration, and laughed at it, but, somehow, liked it. We experience, in reading French law reports, a somewhat similar feeling. We long for the "Dismiss from your minds, gentlemen, I entreat you, whatever you may have heard elsewhere;" and we sigh for the "Be careful, Sir;" the "You are on your oath, Sir;" the "Have you never said, &c., &c., Sir." A little more use of these condiments, coarse as they are, would make the French dish far more palatable to our English stomachs.

VICE-CHANCELLORS' CHAMBERS.—Aug. 24.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood.)

Henry and Others v. The Great Northern Railway Company.

The hearing of this cause, which commenced on the previous Friday, was concluded to-day.

Mr. Daniel, Q.C., and Mr. Turner, were counsel for the plaintiffs; the Attorney-General, Mr. Denison, Q.C., and Mr. Rochfort Clarke were for the defendants.

The plaintiffs hold various amounts (being in the aggregate £135,695) of the four descriptions of preference stock issued by the Great Northern Railway Company, and the object of the suit was to obtain a declaration that the plaintiffs and other preference shareholders are entitled to be paid full dividends from the 30th of June, 1856, before any dividends shall be paid to the ordinary shareholders, and to restrain the company by injunction from declaring or paying dividends to the ordinary shareholders without regard to such right of the plaintiffs and the other holders of preference stock.

From the statement of Mr. Daniel it appeared that the net revenue applicable to dividend for the half-year ending the 31st of December, 1856, was 243,923*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*; but shortly before the end of that half-year it was discovered, that, during the preceding eight years, large quantities of each sort of stock, particularly of the original, had been forged by Leopold Redpath, which, with the dividends that had been paid thereon, amounted to nearly that sum. The valid stock not being easily distinguishable from the forged, no dividends could safely be paid; and as the holders of the forged stock appeared to have purchased it bonâ fide, and for value, the company were advised to apply to Parliament for an Act to make valid the spurious stock, and to authorise the payment of dividends thereon. At the general meeting of the company held subsequently, on the 12th of March, after considerable discussion, it was resolved—

"That no dividend be declared, but that this meeting considers it desirable that the balance of 243,923*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* mentioned in the directors' report should be applied to meet the losses caused by Leopold Redpath, referred to in the directors' report, and that the directors be, and are, hereby requested and authorised so to apply the said balance when and in such manner as they may consider most beneficial to the company."

A Bill was thereupon introduced into Parliament, which, after making valid the spurious stock, required the directors to apply the above-mentioned net balance of revenue and any moneys to be received by the company from Redpath's estate in paying the expenses occasioned by his frauds. By the 139th Standing Order of the House of Commons—

"No railway company shall be authorised to alter the terms of any preference or priority of interest or dividend which shall have been granted by such company in pursuance of, or which may have been confirmed by, any previous Act of Parliament, or which may otherwise be lawfully subsisting, unless the Committee on the Bill report that such alteration ought to be allowed, with the reasons on which their opinion is founded, together with the number of preference shareholders who have assented to or dissented from such alteration."

The Bill was introduced into Parliament, without reference to this Standing Order, as a Bill which did not by its provisions affect to deal with any right of preference shareholders. Upon the Bill going to the House of Lords, where no such Standing Order exists, the directors, apparently thinking that something to authorise the confiscation of the rights of the preference shareholders ought to appear on the face of the Bill, proposed, after the latter had again failed to procure the insertion of an express clause in their favour, to add to clause 3, which directs, as already mentioned, the application of any possible surplus, the words "and thereupon the said sum of £243,923*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* shall be considered to have been duly divided among all classes of shareholders in the company." This addition was opposed on the third reading, but carried on a division by the majority of 53 to 7. On the Bill, with this amendment, coming down to the House of Commons, the commercial spirit of the House rose up in arms against such an introduction, and Mr. Denison, seeing the feeling of the House so strongly against him, withdrew it, without going to a division. The House returned the Bill to the Lords with the following reason for disagreeing to the amendment:—"Because the said amendment, if adopted, would decide a question of law in dispute between the preference and ordinary shareholders of the Great Northern Railway Company, which ought to be left to the decision of a court of law." The Lords thereupon did not insist upon their amendment, and the Bill passed as it now stands. The learned counsel then cited the cases of Stevens v. South Devon Railway Company (9 Hare), Sturge v. Eastern Union Railway Company (Law Times for December 30, 1854, and July 14, 1855), and Crawfurd v. North-Eastern Railway Company (not yet reported).

The Vice-Chancellor proceeded to deliver judgment.—The only difficulty in the case arose out of the recent Act of 1857. But for the 3rd section of that Act, no doubt would have existed in his mind as to the right of these shareholders to arrears. The object of the Act was to legalise the spurious stock, to make provision for buying up and extinguishing an equal amount, and to authorise the payment of dividends. He agreed with the counsel who first advised the companies that this loss was like the falling in of a tunnel. Still there was no equity that the preference shareholders should bear part of such a loss. The principle would be the same if a clerk had stolen a box containing £40,000. But for the 3rd section the loss would come out of the general profits of the company. By the 120th section of the Companies Clauses Act, the directors must prepare a scheme showing the profits since the last dividend. No dividend was declared at the meeting in March. Neither the preamble nor the first two sections of the Act of 1857 were inconsistent with this construction. As to the Attorney-General's observation that the company had full power to dispose of this question, they had no power to vary or deal with the rights of the preference shareholders. That being so, had Parliament varied those rights? Here the general question as to arrears was important, because there seemed no indication of any intention of the Legislature to take away any such right. The surplus referred to in s. 3 might possibly arise before any dividend should be declared, and hence a direction was given concerning such balance. If there were no right in general to arrears, the subject became much more difficult; because, if Parliament thought that the preference shareholders had a right to so much per cent. at such time only as a dividend might happen to be made, then it would not be so absurd a construction that Parliament meant to take away from them a fund primarily liable to them, and give them instead this possible surplus. As to the first two preference stocks, I have no difficulty. The proceedings at the meetings of the company show that no clear notions prevailed as to the distinction between guaranteed and preference dividends. I cannot find any understanding that preference dividends gave no rights to arrears. [His Honour here read the resolution of the meeting of 7th June, 1849.] At the subsequent meeting of the 11th of August, 1849, a report was read stating that the shares had been issued bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum in perpetuity, and that they were ratified by Act of Parliament. It is too late for any company, after taking subscribers' money and issuing certificates referring to an Act of Parliament, to object that three-fifths of the votes at the meeting did not assent, and that the stock was not issued under all the provisions of the Act. To issue shares under such circumstances would be deceiving the public. The last two Acts expressly say, that so much dividend shall be paid—one of the Acts calls the dividend "fixed," but this word does not make much difference. I can give no meaning to these shares except that the holders shall take out of the profits of the company so much before any profits are divided among the ordinary shareholders. Preference shareholders are sometimes strangers to the Company, and unless they were entitled to arrears the ordinary shareholders might, instead of declaring dividends, resolve to spend their revenues in rolling stock, while the preference shares existed, and would thus, in effect, be receiving profits before the preference shareholders received dividends. This loss is like any other calamity, and does not interfere with the rights of the shareholders inter se. By giving any possible surplus to the preference shareholders, the Act does not intend to give the ordinary shareholders profits before the preference shareholders are paid. No difficulty need arise in this respect. If the preference shareholders are now satisfied, they can hereafter maintain no action for such surplus. I should not have arrived at the opposite conclusion, even if I had made the opposite assumption, that the preference dividend was only from half-year to half-year; because the Act takes away the fund to which the preference shareholders are primarily entitled to look, and only inferentially could be held to give a substitute. It would not even then be clear that the Legislature intended to take away positively the rights of the preference shareholders, because there might, in the case of an impoverished company, be no dividend for several years; and the Legislature might intend by the 3rd section, that, at all events, you shall have the balance which may possibly remain of this fund. The Court, therefore, declares that the plaintiffs, and other holders of preference stock, are entitled to be paid dividends out of the profits realised by the company from the 30th of June, 1856, before any payment of dividends to the holders of the ordinary original stock, the A stock or the B stock, out of such profits; and that a perpetual injunction issue to restrain the defendants from declaring or paying any dividend upon the ordinary original stocks the A stock and the B stock, without regard to the rights of the preference stockholders to be paid in priority their dividend from the 30th of June, 1856. The Court also declares that the 3rd section of the Act of 1857 is cumulative by way of security for, and not in substitution of, such preference dividends. The Company must also pay the plaintiffs' costs.

HOME CIRCUIT.—Croydon, Aug. 15.

Barnett and Another v. Reade.

The plaintiffs in this action, Messrs. Barnett & Johnstone, are well known—the former as a dramatic author, and the latter as an actor and dramatic composer, at the Strand Theatre; and the defendant is also a dramatic author. The action was brought to recover damages for having inserted a notice in the Era newspaper, in which the defendant alleged that a piece about to be produced at the Strand Theatre was a practical imitation of a work he had himself written; and the plaintiffs represented, that, in consequence of this notice, they were prevented from taking advantage of the new Copyright Act, by selling the privilege of representing their drama to the managers of country theatres.

Mr. M. Chambers, Q.C., and Mr. Wordsworth, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. E. James, Q.C., Mr. Lush, Q.C., and Mr. Prentice were counsel for the defendant.

After a good deal of evidence whether the piece in question was original, or merely a translation,

Mr. James submitted that the plaintiffs had made out no case at all; and that, as they had not complied with the provisions of the Copyright Act, they had no property whatever in the piece in question, and had no ground of action. The question was one of considerable importance, undoubtedly both to English and to foreign authors; and the defendant, as the authorised agent of the latter, and who in that capacity had duly registered his work, was very anxious that the point should be settled.

The Lord Chief Baron said he was certainly of opinion, that, if the plaintiffs had not registered their work, they had no legal property in it, and had no ground for sustaining the present action.

Mr. Chambers said that this was a question of law which he should wish to have settled.

The learned counsel on both sides then conferred together, and the result was, that an arrangement was come to that the plaintiff should be nonsuited, but with the understanding that all the facts and the question of law should undergo further consideration; and, if the result should be in favour of the plaintiff, the nonsuit is to be set aside, and the Court will be empowered to assess the damage sustained by him.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT. — Liverpool, Aug. 25.

Civil Court.—(Before Mr. Baron Channell.)

Eastham v. Whalley, Clerk.

Mr. Manisty, Q.C., and Mr. E. M. Fenwick appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Hugh Hill, Q.C., and Mr. Unthank for the defendant.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a solicitor, against the defendant, for various advances made to him while at Cambridge during the years 1850 to 1852. It appeared that the father of the defendant had spoken to the plaintiff originally respecting his desire that his son should go to the University, where his abilities might lead to success; and it was ultimately agreed between the plaintiff and defendant, that plaintiff should supply him with any necessary assistance. The defendant denied his liability, and insisted that at the time of his going up to Cambridge his father had left in the hands of the plaintiff a sum of money to be appropriated to the wants of the defendant. The plaintiff denied that any such arrangement had ever been made with the father; and he proved that at the time the defendant went to Cambridge the whole of the money had been drawn out by the father, who was still in debt to the plaintiff, and a letter was put in from the defendant himself to the plaintiff, in June, 1852, in which he acknowledged the advances which had been made, and agreed to a charge of interest.

Verdict for the plaintiff, £308.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Aug. 22.

In re The Royal Surrey Gardens Company.

A sitting was appointed for this day, before Mr. Commissioner Fane, for making the order absolute, under the 5 & 6 Vict., for winding up this company.

Mr. George appeared for Mrs. Seacole, Mr. Jones as solicitor to the petition, and a number of legal gentlemen for other parties.

It appears that the property was originally purchased of Mr. Tyler for £14,000, and was held at a rental of £750 a year. Mr. Tyler, it was stated, brought that money in, but was now a debtor to the company for a considerable amount. Mr. Coppock is also understood to be a creditor for £10,000. The company entered into a contract with the builders for building the hall, &c., for £10,000, upon which a mortgage was given, and it is stated that they also claim upon several acceptances given to them. The statements made were, that the account at the banker's is overdrawn to the amount of nearly £400; that there are no assets, beyond the Gardens, held by the builders; that the Crown is creditor for assessed taxes; and that M. Jullien, the well-known composer, who invested in shares £6,000, has also a claim upon the company for £3,000. Mr. Jones, the surveyor, has received nothing in satisfaction of his claim of £1,160. Mrs. Seacole, at her benefit, it was arranged, should have a clear third of the proceeds of the entertainment, but no account has been rendered to her by the company. This company, in the course of the year, had received and spent above £20,000.

Mr. Roxburgh appeared in support of the petition.—The petitioner was a shareholder in the company. The company was formed in March, 1851, with a capital of £40,000, in 4,000 shares of £10 each, and 3,743 were subscribed for; and, most of these having paid up the deposit of £2 each, the capital at the commencement was £33,546. The usual declaration followed: that the petitioner was the holder of twenty shares, that the capital was exhausted, and praying for the usual order, &c.

Mr. Chappell appeared on behalf of M. Jullien and other shareholders, and did not oppose the winding-up; but he would draw attention to this fact—whether any order could be made on this petition? The petitioner stated he was a contributor, the holder of twenty shares at £10 each, upon which he had paid up in full, and the question was—whether a party who had paid up in full could be called a contributor? He called attention to the 65th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act. A contributor was one who would contribute, and this gentleman having paid up on his shares could not be called on to contribute to the company's debts. Parliament had also given a clear meaning to the words. It would be seen by the 86th and 88th sections of the Act, that, if an order was made upon this petition, the matter would be in the hands of those parties who ought not to have the conduct of the proceedings—viz. those who had not paid up upon their shares. It also appears on the face of the petition that the whole of the capital was lost or unavailable, and debts to £26,000 had been contracted. The contributories had little interest in these proceedings.

The Commissioner said, he could not agree to that. The contributory who had paid a deposit had a right to try to get some of it back under the administration of this court, for whatever had been paid—if something had been paid—the contributory had an interest in the company. He did not see why any shareholder could not present a petition for winding up.

Mr. Chappell.—There is no authority under the Act of Parliament.

Mr. Roxburgh said, that it was arguing against the Act of Parliament itself. Besides, under the 86th section, the Commissioner had jurisdiction.

The Commissioner said, he thought the intention of the Legislature must be, that a man who acted fairly and honestly, and paid up upon his shares, had a right to present a petition. How much did the company owe?

Mr. Jones said £26,000, and they had no available assets. Judgments to the amount of £2,000 had been obtained against the company, and executions to the amount of £2,000 would be put in next week on dishonoured bills. He was the architect, a contributory for £200, and a creditor for £1,100.

Mr. Fleming objected to his being heard. He relied on the 72nd section of the Act.

His Honour, after referring to the 80th section, said he thought there should be an adjournment.

Mr. Roxburgh observed, that, if the order was made, they would preserve the property, as all executions would be stayed. The day the petition was presented the company was served with several writs, and the Court, by making the order, could stop the mischief occasioned by the writs. The Gardens were advertised to be open for twelve days; and if the order was made they could be let, and the money received would benefit the estate.

His Honour thought he was not warranted to rush at a conclusion at the suit of one person, when a body asked for an adjournment.

Mr. Roxburgh said, there was a case in which the Master of the Rolls had his attention called to an opposition of this kind, and he would show how it was dealt with. It was the case of the Electric Telegraph Company of Ireland. The Master of the Rolls made an order for winding up.

His Honour said, that decision was given in a case with quite different circumstances to the present. That was a case decided before clause 80 of the present statute was in existence. He was not satisfied that the Master of the Rolls would have decided in this manner if clause 80 had been in existence.

Mr. Roxburgh said, the impediments to the individual creditor under the Winding-up Act were much greater. The Master of the Rolls said: "Had this Court the power of letting a case stand over until it could be seen if the undertaking could be carried on with an advance of fresh capital?" He decided it could not. This was not a case in which the discretion of the Court could be questioned. There would be no harm in making the order, and appointing an official liquidator, and give the benefits asked for. And, if the Court afterwards saw the company could be wound up without its intervention, it could stay its hand.

Mr. Chappell, who appeared for the contributories, would concur in the winding-up order being made.

Mr. Coombs, a shareholder, said that there was a meeting of shareholders appointed for Tuesday next, and they wanted an adjournment until after Tuesday, to take the sense of the shareholders upon it. They connected certain parties with great frauds, and this gentleman had gone on building large premises when the company was insolvent to the extent of £4,000, and they connected him with the directors.

Mr. Jones.—That is not true.

After some further discussion,

His Honour adjourned the matter to Thursday, that the sense of the shareholders might be taken on the matter on Tuesday.

Mr. Roxburgh asked for an order to restrain the proceedings until Thursday, which the Commissioner granted.

On Thursday the case came on again for hearing, and after a long and somewhat angry discussion it was further adjourned to the 17th of October. Mr. Coppock was in attendance. He repudiated indignantly the charges which had been made against him, and challenged the fullest inquiry into his conduct.

OLD BAILEY.—NEW COURT.

Conduct of a Solicitor.

At one of the last sittings of this Court some person, whose name did not transpire, drew the attention of the Court to the case of a young man out upon bail to answer a charge at these sessions, alleging that a solicitor, named Frederick Hockly Wood, had received a sum of £11 to defend him at this court, but that he now refused unless he received £5 more. All that had been done for that money by Mr. Wood was to attend three times at Worship-street Police-court, and twice at the House of Detention. He further complained of Mr. Wood having made a false representation to a person present, who, being bail for the young men in question, was, by such false representations, induced to become bail for another person included in the charge. That man, who was the most guilty party of the two, had since absconded, and left the young man for whom applicant addressed the Court to bear the entire weight of the charge—one of forgery.

Mr. Wood said, he had received about the sum named from some person connected with the synagogue, but not upon the understanding that he was to carry him through this Court. He had attended four or five times at Worship-street, and attended upon his friends, and had great difficulty in obtaining bail for him, which he ultimately did; and he was told that he should not be able to defend him at this Court without more money. With regard to the other part about the bail, that was entirely false. Mr. Wood then gave to the Common Serjeant a memorandum.

The Common Serjeant, after perusing it, told the applicant that if he had any complaint against Mr. Wood he must take it into the county court, for he could not say that Mr. Wood had not done all that the agreement contracted for to be done by him.

Applicant.—Mr. Wood promised to do all for the £11 mentioned in that; this young man knows nothing of its contents—he cannot speak English or read. Mr. Wood promised him he would get him off.

The Common Serjeant.—A solicitor cannot promise that.

Applicant.—It is not the first time Mr. Wood has been charged with these things.

Mr. Wood.—Say that again outside the court, and I will give you in charge. My Lord, will you detain him until he gives his name and address?

The Common Serjeant.—I cannot do that; but not one word has transpired to establish before the Court what he charges.

BLOOMSBURY COUNTY COURT.—August 12.

Corsbie v. Organ Builders' Benevolent Institution.

This was a proceeding in the nature of a suit in equity under the last Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), by the 41st sect. of which exclusive jurisdiction is given in disputes between a friendly society and one of its members in certain cases, of which one is the failure to appoint arbitrators for determining disputes. The plaintiff by his plaint prayed that the defendants might be ordered to pay him the sum of 6*l.* 5*s.*, being the amount of five monthly instalments of 1*l.* 5*s.*, and a further sum of 10*s.* and odd pence increase of annuity in respect of the subscription of 5*s.* each actually paid by himself to the society; and further, that he might be declared an annuitant on the funds of the society for £15 per annum, and entitled to be paid the said sum, with the two other annuitants, out of the funds, without any priority.

Mr. Keane (instructed by Messrs. Cook & Stevens, of Gray's-inn-square) appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Williams for the defendants.

The institution was founded in 1842, and the rules were certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt, and inrolled in January, 1847. The 41st rule requires the appointment of five arbitrators, pursuant to the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, at the first meeting of the society or the general committee next after the inrolment. This was not done; but some time in 1847 five arbitrators were appointed. The succession, however, was not kept up; and in 1856 the society proceeded to fill up vacancies which had occurred, and they did so, not by completing the number of five, but by electing seven. In October, 1856, the committee declared the funds to be open for a third annuitant in addition to the annuitants of £15 who were then in the enjoyment of their annuities. In December, notice was given that the election would take place on the 30th day of January, 1857, and that notice was renewed on the 5th of January, 1857. On the 16th of January an extraordinary special meeting was convened for the 23rd of that month, the object of which was to prevent the election on the 30th. The meeting was held, and it passed resolutions, which, if valid, rendered null the subsequent proceedings on the 30th. Some members of the society, however, held that the meeting of the 23rd was a nullity, and they proceeded with the election fixed for the 30th, and the plaintiff was elected. The parties to the meeting of the 23rd were the stronger, and they refused to pay the plaintiff; hence this action.

For the plaintiff, it was contended that there were no arbitrators to whom the dispute could be referred, because there had not been a regular succession of arbitrators even if the first had been duly elected; and because an election of seven arbitrators, when there was only power to elect five, was bad. It was also argued that the meeting of the 23rd was a meeting without authority, because the rules required that it should have been convened by five members of the committee, whereas it had been convened by five persons, of whom three only were actual members and two members displaced by the rotation for retiring; and also because the rules required that notice of holding such meeting should be given "at least" seven days before holding it, whereas the notice had, in fact, been given on the 16th for the 23rd. Under these circumstances, it was argued that the plaintiff was well elected, and that the judge had jurisdiction.

For the defendant, it was argued, that the case ought to have been referred to arbitration, and that, at all events, the election of the plaintiff was void—the meeting of the 23rd of January being good. It was also suggested, that the funds would not support a third annuitant.

The judge was of opinion that he had jurisdiction, because there were no well-appointed arbitrators; that the notice of the meeting of the 23rd of January was not in time under the rules; and that the plaintiff was well elected an annuitant. He made an order for the immediate payment of 6*l.* 5*s.* and 10*s.* 5*d.*; but he postponed the declaration of the plaintiff's future rights for two months, to enable the defendants to consult an actuary as to the sufficiency of their funds to bear any and what third annuity, the plaintiff to be at liberty to attend the actuary. Judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, accordingly.

CHARGE OF FALSE PRETENCES.

Mr. John Doherty was summoned before the Liverpool magistrates on Wednesday, charged with obtaining from Messrs. Bingham & Co., corn merchants of Liverpool, two acceptances, one for £1,250, the other for £750, under false pretences. The false pretence consisted in the alleged representation by Mr. Doherty of a duplicate bill of lading as an original; the original having been previously deposited by him with Messrs. J. Hubback & Co., of Liverpool.

Mr. Aspinall, instructed by Mr. Martin, appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Brett, instructed by Messrs. Gregory, for the defendant.

The defence was, that the sending the duplicate bill to Mr. Hubback was a mistake; and there was also the technical objection, that this was not a fraud within the meaning of the Act, the defendant having only obtained an acceptance, which was not a valuable security. Mr. Aspinall observed that the case of Regina v. Danger did not apply; the cases were not identical, as in the case now before the court the acceptance had been indorsed, and was a valuable security to the Borough Bank.

Mr. Brett, counsel for the defendant, apprehended that the technical objection must be fatal to the case, the defendant was charged with obtaining what? An acceptance, a mere promise to pay certain moneys on certain conditions, which could not be called a valuable security.

Mr. Mansfield.—Was the money paid to the bank?

Mr. Aspinall.—Yes, by Messrs. Bingham & Co.

Mr. Mansfield.—It is evident, then, that the acceptance was a valuable security to somebody.

A mass of evidence was adduced in support of the charge, after which the magistrates committed Mr. Doherty to the assizes; bail, however, being accepted, himself in £2,000, and two sureties in £1,000 each.

A Rochdale workman named Taylor has recovered, in the Rochdale County Court, the sum of £5 from his late master, Mr. Stott, an ironmonger. Taylor had given notice of his intention to leave, when Stott publicly taxed him with dishonesty, following up the accusation by instructions to an officer to search his premises, himself accompanying the officer. No warrant had been applied for. The Judge observed, that, were such conduct permitted to pass with impunity, an Englishman's house would cease to be the "castle" it had been declared to be.

In the case of Evans v. Robinson, which was an action for crim. con. tried in the superior courts, a verdict was returned for the defendant. Some time after a new trial was ordered, and a verdict was obtained for the plaintiff, with £500 damages. Having obtained his verdict, the plaintiff next applied to the ecclesiastical courts; and there Sir John Dodson, detecting some discrepancies in the evidence which Mr. Field and his assistants had collected, refused to entertain the application; and this time law once more favoured the defendant, and the plaintiff was dismissed to seek his remedy elsewhere. Again the case is brought forward; and at the Old Bailey an indictment is preferred for perjury against the parties on whose evidence the ecclesiastical judge had decided, and the grand jury once more inclined the scales in favour of the defendant, and found a true bill for perjury against the parties on the other side. The trial may probably give the plaintiff a victory in his turn, leaving it to law to continue the game of fast and loose with the unfortunate litigants. Already several thousands of pounds have been expended in the case.

The case of Mrs. Haigh, late Miss Dyer, who has petitioned the Insolvent Debtors' Court, presents the rather novel feature of a married woman during the lifetime of her husband applying to be released from her debts. It will be recollected that Mr. Kingsbury, professor of music, brought an action against her to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract, by which she was to become his pupil for three years. Before the trial Miss Dyer was married to Mr. Haigh, the vocalist. A verdict was given for £20 damages, and the costs were £72. In order to prevent the possibility of an arrest, a petition was filed under the Protection Act. The insolvency is attributed to the action of Mr. Kingsbury. The hearing of the case has been appointed for the 11th of November.

C. Harcourt, Esq., the judge of the Canterbury County Court, has given an important decision as to what constitutes a candidate at an election. An action was brought by Mr. Cooper, the auditor appointed to examine the bills of the candidates at the late election for that city, against Mr. C. M. Lushington, for the recovery of £10, under the following circumstances:—From the statement of Mr. Wightwick, who was for the plaintiff, it appeared that the amount named was sought to be recovered as a first payment to the plaintiff in his capacity of election auditor (under the 34th section of the Bribery Prevention Act) by the defendant, who, it was contended, was a candidate for the representation of the city within the meaning of the Act, he having issued an address to the electors on March 14, but resigned his pretensions to the seat three days before the day of nomination, the 27th of March, the writ being issued either on the 23rd or 24th of March. Mr. Lushington, in defending the action, said, he should not have done so but by the advice of friends in London. The interpretation clause of the Act, which had, he said, been very loosely drawn as to who was a candidate, had reference solely to the 4th and 36th sections—the 4th, in which the question of treating was defined; and the 36th, where candidates were found guilty of bribery. The word "candidate" was not defined in the Act. It simply spoke of "candidate at an election;" the word "election" meaning the day of nomination where a poll did not take place, the auditor, by the 34th section, being "entitled to £10 as a first payment for each candidate at the election." His Honour said, his impression was very strong that the defendant was not a candidate within the meaning of the Act. The issuing of an address, merely meant that the party issuing it gave notice of his intention of becoming a candidate at the election, and unless he was nominated, or made himself responsible for other expenses, his opinion was, that defendant could not be considered a candidate. The plaintiff must, therefore, be nonsuited.

No feeling, no humour, no sarcasm ever comes from the hon. member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), but he is a mere "logic mill," and, we may add, working without oil. Surely the most unpleasant speaker that ever gained position and money by his talk—and then his copia verborum! We will back Mr. Malins to use more words in saying what he intends to say than any other man living could do if he were to give a week's study to every sentence. No mere description, however, can give a right notion of Mr. Malins's verbal talk. We will therefore take the liberty to present a specimen, assuring our readers that the sack is like the sample:—"Will the right hon. and hon. member on the Treasury Bench, led by the noble Lord at the head of her Majesty's Government, and supported by right hon. and hon. members on their side of the House, venture to say—will they venture to affirm—that the proposition made by the noble lord below me, and supported by right hon. and hon. members on this side of the House, is not the right and true proposition which ought to be made? I ask my hon. and learned friend her Majesty's Attorney-General—I ask the noble lord at the head of her Majesty's Government—I ask the right hon. and hon. members who support my hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General, and I ask it with the strongest confidence, whether the proposition moved by the noble lord below me, and supported by right hon. and hon. members on this side of the House, is not more constitutional, moral, sound, and more consistent with the objects which my hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General proposes to attain, than that which has been sent down from the Lords, has received the sanction of my hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General, and is supported by the noble lord at the head of her Majesty's Government, and by the right hon. and hon. members who surround him?" Let the reader imagine an hour's talk of this character, delivered with great fluency, considerable action, and in a somewhat nasal tone, and he may possibly form some conception of the oratory of Mr. Malins. On the clauses in question of the Divorce Bill Mr. Malins almost rivalled Mr. Gladstone in the number of speeches which he made.—"Inner Life of the House."—Illustrated Times.

A curious episode took place in the House of Lords on Monday night. In one of the divisions on the Divorce Bill, which eventually gave the Government a majority of ten, a curious scene occurred. Seeking, perhaps, only a cool seat, the Earl of Suffolk had betaken himself to one of the back rows of the episcopal bench, now rendered almost vacant by reason of the bishops being required elsewhere on diocesan duty. On his declaring himself the holder of the proxy of a lay peer, his exercise of it was pronounced by the opposition to be informal, inasmuch as a standing order of the House declared that no lay peer should speak or vote from the episcopal bench. The Government maintained the validity of the proxy so tendered; whereupon a bristling discussion sprang up, and the committee actually divided as to whether the proxy should be admitted or not. It happened that just as many voted for the admission of the proxy as for its rejection; and, in accordance with another standing order provided in such a case, the proxy was recorded, and the Government and their supporters gained their point.

Mr. J. G. Shorter, the town clerk of Hastings, terminated a life of suffering by suicide. Great excitement was occasioned by the melancholy news, for the deceased gentleman was much and deservedly respected. In addition to the office of town clerk, Mr. Shorter has, for many years, been clerk to the borough magistrates, clerk to the local board, coroner for the borough, clerk to the commissioners of taxes, and, in connection with his partner, Mr Phillips, clerk to the county magistrates. For six years Mr. Shorter has been afflicted with paralysis of his lower members, and has been unable to move about the town only as wheeled in a chair. But, during the greater part of that time, his mental faculties appeared unimpaired, and his attention to business was remarkable.

Mr. John James Heath Saint, B.A., barrister, of the Inner Temple, has joined the Church of Rome. Mr. Saint, who was educated at Eton and Oxford, is a son of the rector of Speldhurst, Tunbridge Wells, and is a member of the Midland Circuit.

The magnificent estates of the late John Sadlier, including Kilcommon Demesne and Cahir Castle, are to be sold in the Encumbered Estates Court on the 17th of November next. Messrs. Morrogh and Kennedy are the solicitors having carriage of the sales.

Barristers on Circuit.—One large class of rules of etiquette is conceived in the narrowest spirit of exclusion, and has for its direct object to increase the expense of the Profession to practitioners. For instance, a barrister on circuit must travel by postchaise and not by coach. A barrister must take lodgings in a circuit town, and not live at an hotel. The reasons sometimes put forward in defence of these and similar rules will not stand the test of a moment's investigation. It has been said, they are requisite to keep up the social position of the bar; but men of far higher station habitually travel by stage coaches, and put up at hotels. They are sometimes defended on the ground that it is requisite to prevent the bar from coming in contact with attorneys and other subordinate actors in the performances of an assize. This plea is either in substance the same as the former one, and rests upon some mistaken notion of artificial "respectability;" or it assumes that barristers would unfairly turn such casual encounters into opportunities for securing business. We have heard the rule explained on that ground by men of some authority, or we should have hesitated to mention an explanation so childish and so insulting. But, in fact, there are lame attempts to account for the class of rules in question in some other way than the true one. The truth is, they are designed to make the Profession as expensive as possible, and thereby to exclude competition. Every one who has gone a circuit knows that the leaders, following immemorial tradition, aggravate the effect of the rules by setting the example of unnecessarily lavish remuneration of every service that an itinerant barrister can require. To be a "counsellor" on circuit is a sufficient reason in the provincial mind for being fleeced and overcharged.—Law Magazine for August.

Election Expenses—The late Double Return for Huntingdonshire.—The auditor's detailed report of the expenses of the three candidates is as follows:—Messrs. Fellowes and Rust, the sitting members, are reported to have expended in printing and advertising 293*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; travelling expenses and conveyance for voters, 329*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*; horse and fly hire, 132*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*; hire of committee rooms, 99*l.* 18*s.*; committee clerks, 43*l.* 1*s.*; inspectors and "personation agents," 28*l.* 8*s.*; check clerks, 12*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*; messengers, 6*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*;

BARON WATSON'S MANSLAUGHTER OF THE LOWEST DEGREE.

The administration of justice is becoming utterly past our comprehension. Sometimes we are amazed at its hesitations; sometimes, as in Bacon's case, at its rashness; sometimes at its incapacity, as in Spollen's; and sometimes, again, at its wondrous leniency. Of the last description is a sentence on the Northern Circuit, and it will be observed that the charge of the judge upon the circumstances of the case is in a sort of keeping quite inexplicable with the nominal punishment awarded.

John Davies was indicted for the murder of Robert Reusses at Liverpool. The prisoner, in a state of intoxication, had entered a public-house, and asked a man, R. Hodson, to go to his (Davies's) house, where there was a man in improper intimacy with his wife, and he (Hodson) would see "some fun." They went together to the house, where Davies's wife was found alone in the lower room. Davies struck and abused her, and asked Hodson to go upstairs with him. Davies went to his wife's bed-room, where no one was found. He then proceeded to a garret, where a man was found with his clothes on, lying on a bed on the floor. Davies instantly jumped on the man's face, then stabbed him mortally with a pair of scissors. Hodson having interposed, Davies, who had promised him some fun, threatened "to serve him the same."

Upon the proof of these facts Baron Watson, the presiding judge, charged the jury—

"That a man killing another caught in the act of adultery with his wife was not murder, but manslaughter in the lowest degree; and it was for them to say whether the circumstances of this case warranted such a finding."

The charge is beside the facts proved. Reusses was not caught in the act of adultery. He was found in circumstances which could only warrant suspicion. It was not upon the sudden provocation of discovering the parties in their guilt that Davies struck the man to the heart; he had deliberately asked Hodson to come and see the fun, which turned out to be killing the man whom he suspected of improper intimacy with his wife. He had no proof of it. He found the woman in one room, the man asleep in another. He killed the man barbarously upon suspicion only, and yet the judge instructed the jury of the law bearing on the detected act of adultery, of which there was not a particle of evidence. If the proceeding had been the action for crim. con., would any jury have been persuaded that a woman's having been found at the bottom of a house while a man was asleep at the top, argued an illicit intercourse? The law does not intend to give the privilege of homicide to every husband who has reasonable suspicions that another has wronged him, but only excuses the vengeance he may take when he is under the provocation of witnessing the actual and present evidences of guilt. This was not the case of Davies, nor anything like his case; and yet Mr. Baron Watson instructed the jury respecting the law bearing upon the detection of the adulterer caught in the act, which could have no application to the case of the man found asleep, not in the same room with the woman, nor in the same part of the house. And, so misdirected, the jury having delivered a verdict of manslaughter of the lowest degree, Mr. Baron Watson, to perfect the matter, sentenced the prisoner to four days' imprisonment!—Examiner.

THE DIVORCE BILL.

The Divorce Bill as it now stands, having received the sanction of the Legislature, contains sixty-six clauses. It puts an end to the jurisdiction of all the existing ecclesiastical courts, as regards questions of marriage (except so far as relates to the granting of marriage licenses), and enacts that all pending suits in causes and matters matrimonial shall be transferred to, dealt with, and decided by the new Court of Marriage and Divorce, as if the same had been therein originally instituted. The new "Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes" will be a court of record; and the Lord Chancellor, the two Chief Justices, and the Chief Baron, and the three senior puisne judges, and the Judge of the Court of Probate will be the judges of the Court. Decrees of divorce à mensâ et thoro will henceforward cease, and, instead thereof, the new court will pronounce a sentence of "judicial separation," which will have the same force and effect. The Judge of the Court of Probate will be styled the "Judge Ordinary" of the New Court of Divorce, and have full authority to hear all matters arising therein, by himself, or with one or more of the other judges, his colleagues, except petitions for the dissolution or annulling of marriages, and applications for new trials of questions or issues before a jury, bills of exception, special verdicts and special cases. Petitions for the dissolution of marriages, and the other excepted cases, must be heard by three judges at the least, of which the Judge Ordinary is to be one. The Court will sit in such place in London, or in the county of Middlesex, as the Queen in Council may from time to time appoint. Advocates or proctors now practising in the ecclesiastical courts, and all barristers, attorneys, and solicitors entitled to practise in the superior courts at Westminster, will be entitled to practise in the New Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. A sentence of "judicial separation" (having the effect of the old divorce from bed and board) may be obtained under the Bill, either by the husband or the wife, on the ground of adultery, cruelty, or causeless desertion for two years and upwards. Applications for such separations are to be made by either party by petition to the court, or to any judge of assize held in the locality where the parties reside or last resided. The authorities thus pointed out will have full power to receive such applications, and to decree a "judicial separation;" they may also order alimony for the wife. An appeal, however, will lie to the Judge Ordinary of the regular central court from the decrees of these local authorities, but no such appeal will stay the interim execution of the order for separation. Wives deserted by their husbands may at any time apply to a police-magistrate, or to the petty sessions, for an order to protect property earned by themselves, or of which they may have become possessed, since the secession of their husbands, against their husbands or their husbands' creditors. Decrees of separation obtained during the absence of the husband or wife may be reversed on application and proof. Wives "judicially separated" will be considered femes soles as regards questions of property, and for purposes of contract and suing. So much for the temporary and conditional separation of married couples. But it is further enacted by the Bill that petitions for an entire and absolute dissolution of the marriage may be presented to the Court of Divorce, on the ground that the wife has forfeited her conjugal rights by the crime of adultery, or that the husband has been guilty (we quote from the text of the Bill) of "incestuous adultery, or of bigamy with adultery, or of rape, or of sodomy, or of bestiality, or of adultery coupled with such cruelty as, without adultery, would have entitled the wife to a divorce à mensa et thoro, or of adultery, coupled with desertion without reasonable excuse, for two years or upwards." "Incestuous adultery" will be taken to mean adultery by a man with a woman with whom, if his wife were dead, he could not lawfully contract marriage by reason of her being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity. Adulterers may be made co-respondents to petitions for divorce, and contested matters of fact may be tried, if the parties insist, by a jury. If the court of divorce be satisfied that there has been no collusion, condonation, or connivance, and that the charge of the petitioner is proved, the marriage will be absolutely and finally "dissolved," with the proviso that the decree to that effect shall not be pronounced if the petitioner has been guilty of adultery or unreasonable delay in presenting the petition, or of having deserted the other party "without reasonable excuse," before the act of adultery complained of, or of wilful neglect or misconduct conducing to the adultery. Alimony might be awarded to wives, even in the event of the marriage being thus dissolved. Husbands may claim damages from adulterers if they please, and such claims will be heard and tried on the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules and regulations as actions for crim. con., the damages being determinable by the verdict of a jury. Adulterers, made co-respondents, may be mulcted in the whole of the costs. The custody of children will be provided for by interim orders of the Court of Divorce. Questions of fact may be tried before the court by the verdict of a jury, special or common; and the court may direct issues to try matters of fact in any court of common law. A number of clauses refer to the mode and forms of procedure before the court. All witnesses will be sworn and examined orally in open court, where their attendance can be secured. An appeal will lie from the decisions of the Judge Ordinary (in cases where he is authorised to decide alone) to the full court; and an appeal from decrees dissolving marriages will lie from the Court of Divorce to the House of Lords (within three months). Clause 55 enacts, that, after the lapse of this period allowed for appeal, and supposing the decree of dissolution to stand fast, "it shall be lawful for the respective parties to the marriage to marry again, as if the prior marriage had been dissolved by death," provided that "no clergyman in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland shall be compelled to solemnise the marriage of any person whose former marriage may have been dissolved on the ground of his or her adultery, or be liable to any suit, penalty, or censure for solemnising or refusing to solemnise the marriage of any such person." The following clause, however (56), provides, that, although a minister may refuse to solemnise such marriages himself, he must, nevertheless, permit any other minister of the establishment, officiating in the diocess, to perform the marriage service in the parochial church or chapel. Clause 57 terminates the scandal of actions for crim. con. The fees under this Bill will be collected by stamps, to be "stamp duties" under the management of the Inland Revenue Department. Clause 62 secures compensation to proctors in the Ecclesiastical Court two years hence, at the hands of the Treasury; the compensation to be calculated on a comparison, in each case, of the average clear gains of the three years before the passing of the Act, and the two years succeeding. The compensation will, if granted, be a life annuity, such annuity in no case to exceed one moiety of the annual loss ascertained, as aforesaid. The salary of the judge of the Court of Probate, if he be appointed judge-ordinary of the new Court of Divorce (as is professed), will be £5,000 a year; but such judge, if afterwards appointed judge of the Court of Admiralty, will be entitled to no increase of salary.

CAP. XIX.—An Act to provide for the Relief of the Poor in Extra-Parochial places.

This title does not accurately express the effect of this Act, which is not merely to provide for the relief of the poor in extra-parochial places, but also to form such places into self-contained and distinct parishes for a variety of other purposes. Its origin may be discovered in one of the observations of the Registrar-General, in the Report prefixed to the Population Tables of 1852. In discussing the territorial subdivisions of Great Britain, he remarks that the ancient parish boundaries in England first assumed their legitimate importance in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, "when they were made the area of the district which by rates maintained its own poor." And that extra-parochial places, being such places as "are included in no parish," ought no longer to be allowed to exist as such. In order to judge of the machinery by which this object is sought to be accomplished, some notice shall here be taken of each of the eleven sections of which this Act consists. The 1st section is as follows:—

"After Dec. 31, 1857, every place entered separately in the Report of the Registrar-General on the last Census, which now is, or is reputed to be, extra-parochial, and wherein no rate is levied for the relief of the poor, shall, for all the purposes of the assessment to the poor-rate, the relief of the poor, the county, police, or borough rate, the burial of the dead, the removal of nuisances, the registration of parliamentary and municipal voters, and the registration of births and deaths, be deemed a parish for such purposes, and shall be designated by the name which is assigned to it in such Report; and the justices of the peace having jurisdiction over such place, or over the greater part thereof, shall appoint overseers of the poor therein; and with respect to any other place being, or reputed to be, extra-parochial, and wherein no rate is levied for the relief of the poor, such justices may appoint overseers of the poor therein, notwithstanding anything contained in 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101."

It would have added much to the clearness of this provision, if the unusual course had not been taken of referring for explanation to a document dehors the Act itself. The reference itself, also, is not accurate in its form. The Report of the Registrar-General contains only general results and observations; but in the Population Tables, forming part of the Appendix to that Report, there is stated, among other particulars, in reference to every place throughout England and Wales, whether it is a parish, township, or chapelry, or whether it is extra-parochial. In order, then, to ascertain to what places this Act applies, it is necessary to extract from these voluminous Tables the places entered as extra-parochial. Why was not a schedule of such places added to the Act? The blot in the law it was intended to hit was scarcely so serious that the delay of a few weeks might not have been endured, until the remedy could be properly drafted. But to return to the section itself. The 1st clause, it will be observed, declares that all the extra-parochial places above referred to, which have no poor-rate levied therein, shall be deemed parishes for these several purposes:—1. Assessment to the poor-rate and the relief of the poor. 2. The county, police, or borough rate. 3. The burial of the dead. 4. The removal of nuisances. 5. The registration of voters (both parliamentary and municipal); and 6. The registration of births and deaths. But with regard to all other purposes for which the secular division of parishes in this country has been immemorially made subservient, these places are apparently to remain, as before, extra-parochial. With regard to the first of the above purposes—viz. the relief of the poor, and the appointment of overseers—it deserves remark, that, as long ago as the reign of Anne, it was solemnly determined by the Queen's Bench (in the case of Dolting v. Brewcomblodge) that overseers of the poor might be appointed in extra-parochial places; and afterwards, in the reign of George I., the same Court compelled, by mandamus, the justices of the peace of the county of Nottingham to appoint overseers for a place of this description—it being the opinion of the Court, that the powers given in the 43 Eliz., to be executed in parishes, had been extended by 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, to all townships and villages, whether parochial or extra-parochial. (See Reg. v. Rufford, 1 Str. 512). So matters remained till the year 1844, when, by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 (referred to in the above section), it was provided, that, for the future, it should not be lawful to appoint separate overseers for any township or village, or other place, for which, before the passing of that Act, separate overseers had not been appointed. It was apparently to obviate the difficulty occasioned by this provision, that the concluding words of the section under consideration were inserted; but it is observable that they apply only to extra-parochial places, other than those entered as such in the Registrar-General's Report. The meaning perhaps is, that, with regard to the extra-parochial places so entered, they are to be, for the future, parishes for all the six purposes above-mentioned; but that extra-parochial places not so entered, are to be parishes only for such purposes as fall within the jurisdiction of overseers of the poor.

It is apprehended that extra-parochial places (whether so entered or not) will still be deprived of many of the incidents, and privileged from a variety of the functions, which appertain to an ordinary parish. Thus, for example, the inhabitants will not be entitled to meet in vestry to make bye-laws—they will have no parochial constabulary—they will not come under the Lighting and Watching Act—and they will still be exempt from the parochial liability of keeping roads in repair. The extent of the effect of this Act on the law of settlement and removal—chiefly turning, as it does, upon the relief of the poor—is one of the numerous questions to which its provisions may give rise. Under the present law, no one born in such a place acquires a settlement by birth (see Reg. v. St. Nicholas, Leicester, 2 B. & C. 889), nor can a pauper be removed thither (Eridewell v. Clerkenwell, 2 Salk. 468).

Sect. 2, provides for the case of such extra-parochial places (and they are very numerous) as are too small to supply the two overseers required to be appointed for parishes under the 43 Eliz. c. 2. In these cases the present Act allows one only to be appointed from among the inhabitant householders of the place, or some such householder of an adjoining parish who shall be willing to undertake the office; and such last-mentioned person may be paid a salary, if approved by the Poor-law Board. In ordinary parishes, it will be recollected, the office of overseer is by law compulsory on those appointed, except in the case of certain exempted classes. Apparently, in an extra-parochial place sufficiently large to supply one inhabitant householder as overseer, the general rule of law would now be applicable as to this point.

Sect. 3, provides that in the Temple (Inner and Middle), in Gray's-inn, and in the Charterhouse, the under-treasurers and registrar respectively (or, in default, an inhabitant householder in such place), shall be the overseer. There is no similar provision, however, as to Lincoln's-inn (the remaining inn of court), or as to any of the inns of Chancery, or as to either of the Serjeants' inns—though they are all of them extra-parochial places, and, it is apprehended, all possess either a treasurer, a registrar, or some equivalent officer. These places, being all entered separately as extra-parochial in the Report above referred to, will now be parishes for the whole of the six purposes above enumerated. The present section (in anticipation of that which immediately follows) adds, however, a proviso that the Temples, Gray's-inn, and Charterhouse "shall not be liable to be added for such purposes to any union or district."

Sect. 4, contains a provision that any extra-parochial place (at the desire, expressed in writing, signed by two-thirds in value of the owners and occupiers of the land comprised therein) may be annexed to, and become part of, any parish for all the six purposes above enumerated. But the consent of such parish must be obtained, expressed by a vestry resolution, after due notice. The order for the annexation may be made by the justices in quarter session; or, if the place be within a borough with a recorder, by the recorder.

Sects. 5 and 6, regulate the position, at the board of guardians, of the overseers for extra-parochial places, in the possible event of any such place being added to any union. It is remarkable, however, that by the terms used in the 3rd and 4th sections a distinction seems to be contemplated between an annexation to a union and to a single parish; and the mode of annexation pointed out in the latter section refers to a parish simply, whereas the provisions as to the overseers acting as guardians refer to a union. Yet there are guardians for single parishes (see Toulmin Smith's "The Parish," p. 166); and, therefore, an extra-parochial place, which, under the provisions of this Act, shall be annexed to a single parish, would seem to be unrepresented among the guardians thereof.

"Provided, that nothing above contained shall apply to any extra-parochial place in respect whereof there shall be any agreement with any parish as to the liability of such place to contribute to the poor-rate of such parish contained in any Act of Parliament."

According to grammatical construction, this section should refer to the whole of the preceding provisions of the statute; and would prevent any extra-parochial place, party to such agreement, becoming a parish for any of the purposes mentioned in the 1st section; and yet this can scarcely be the meaning, because there is no reason why such agreement, for the purposes of the poor-rate merely, should defeat the objects of the Act (so far as such place is concerned) in reference to the other five purposes. It is apprehended, that, instead of "nothing above contained," the words should have been "nothing above contained in reference to annexation to a parish or other district;" that is, that no extra-parochial place, party to such an agreement with some parish as to the poor-rate, shall be liable to be annexed to such, or to any other, parish.

By sect. 8, analogous provisions to those contained in the 4th sect. are made for adding an extra-parochial place to any district in or adjoining to which it lies, wherein the relief of the poor is administered under a local Act. The consent of two-thirds of the occupiers and owners of the land comprised in such place, and of the guardians of the district, must be obtained; and the order is to be made by the Poor-law Board, instead of the justices or recorder. The annexation in this case, however, is to be for the purposes of poor relief only.

The two succeeding sections (9 & 10) of the Act refer to quite a different subject—viz. as to the publication of banns, and as to marriage registers. As to the first, authority is given to the bishop of the diocese within which there may be locally situate any church or chapel of the Church of England, within or belonging to some extra-parochial place—to authorise, by writing, under his hand and seal, the publication therein of banns; and the solemnisation therein of marriages, by banns or, license of persons residing within such extra-parochial place. This state of things was dealt with in the Marriage Act of 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, by a provision (s. 12), that, for the purposes of that Act, extra-parochial places should be deemed to belong to the parish or chapelry next adjoining. It may be observed, that the "license" referred to intends, of course, that immemorially given by the ordinary, and has no connection with the secular license of the superintendent-registrar, under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119.

As to marriage registers, the 10th section of the Act extends the provisions as to providing and keeping them, contained in 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, to such extra-parochial churches and chapels as shall be authorised by the bishop as above explained.

The last section of the Act contains a general provision that its words shall be construed as those in the Poor-law Amendment Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, and that the provisions in that Act, and in the subsequent Acts explaining and extending the same, and not repealed, shall be extended to the present statute, so far as they are consistent with it.

A similar declaration should have been added in reference to the Acts dealing with the purposes unconnected with the relief of the poor, for which extra-parochial places are now to be parishes. But to specify these would, apparently, have given the framers of the present Act too much trouble. On the whole, the Act under consideration appears a clumsy specimen of legislation, and would have been much improved by the exertion of a little more trouble and thought on the part of its promoters. It ought not to have been possible to raise any of the points above suggested as to its construction.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

GIFTS TO CHARITIES—DESTINATION OF SURPLUS.

The Mayor of Beverley v. The Attorney-General, 5 W. R. 840.

The class of cases of which this is one stretches from the time of Lord Coke to the present time; and although the decision just arrived at by the House of Lords will govern many analogous cases, it will probably not suffice to terminate questions which have arisen out of events that the testators, whose wills have to be applied to them, never for an instant contemplated. The normal case, which has occurred over and over again, is this:—A testator, some two or three centuries ago, gave an estate to a corporation or other persons, specifying its value, and directing a multitude of small payments to be made for charitable objects, and generally so arranged his bounty as to leave a few pounds to the administrators for their trouble. It never seems to have entered into the minds of any of these ancient benefactors that the rental of their estates might, at some future period, increase to ten times their then value. They jotted down carefully the actual rental, and portioned it out so as just to exhaust the whole, either with or without a donation to the trustees for their own use. Now that the money value of land has so enormously increased, the question presents itself, what is to be done with the improved rental? It is quite settled that this is a question of construction, but various rules have been devised to stamp particular phraseology with a special interpretation. The real answer to the inquiry what the testator intended to have done with the surplus, which he did not dream of, would be that he had no intentions at all; and the Courts have, therefore, under the guise of discovering an intention in the words, very often invented one which never had any actual existence. One rule was settled at a very early period, in the famous Thetford case (8 Co. 259). There the testator gave an estate, which he seems to have described as being of the annual value of £35, to certain trustees, with a direction to apply so much for the maintenance of a preacher, and so much for a schoolmaster, and so on for other objects, the separate sums exactly exhausting the £35. It was held, that the whole estate was given to charity, and that the increased rents afterwards obtained were to go in augmentation of the several charities, the following rule from an old Act of Parliament being cited as the principle:—"Ita semper quod pia et celeberrima voluntas donatorum in omnibus teneatur et expleatur et perpetuo sanctissime perseveret."

This was soon followed by stronger decisions. Thus, in Arnold v. The Attorney-General, a House of Lords case (reported Show. P. C. 22), a testator prefaced his will by a statement that he meant to settle his estates for charitable uses, and devised a manor to trustees, upon trust to pay a number of sums for various charities, amounting in the whole to £120. The will made no mention of the actual or estimated value of the manor, but it was ascertained to have been worth, at the date of the will, £240, and the whole surplus was held to belong to the charities. And in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Coventry (2 Vern. 398), where a corporation, which had paid part of the purchase money, took a grant of land upon trust to apply in charity certain sums, amounting in the whole to £70 a year, which was the then rental of the land, it was held by the House of Lords that the subsequently increased rental should go entirely to the objects of the charity. The result of these and other cases is, that, where it can be made out that the charitable gifts exhaust the whole of the rental at the date of the will, or where there are other indications of an intention to give the whole to charity, all the increased rents will be applied to the same purpose. This is quite independent of the particular language used, and may apply, as we have seen, to a case where a large present surplus is left without any specific appropriation.

The other cases which present themselves are those where one or more of the objects of the testator's bounty is not a charity; and these have given rise to some conflict of decision. Thus, the whole value of the land may be fully apportioned among a number of charities and one non-charitable object. This frequently happens; the last gift being to the corporation or other body which is to administer the trust. When the rent increases, is the whole increase to be devoted to the charity, or to be taken by the corporation, or to be apportioned rateably between them? The answer depends, to some extent, on the precise terms of the will; and it is considered very material to inquire whether the testator has himself specified the value of the land; whether he has called the first private gift "a surplus," or described it like the rest—by merely stating its amount; or, as in the present case, used some such phrase as "the overplus rent—viz. £7;" or, finally, whether he has simply devised the estate, and appropriated the greater part of the rent, but omitting to give any directions as to the residue. The Mercers' Company v. Attorney-General (2 Bl. N. S. 165) was an example of the last kind, 9*s.* out of £150 being left unappropriated; and the Lords held that the Company was not entitled to the whole increased rental, but intimated that their 9*s.* might perhaps increase rateably with the other gifts. This point, however, was not thought worth fighting. The instances in which the private gift is unaccompanied with the term surplus, or some equivalent language, are not common; but, probably, the rateable principle would still be held applicable to them, though it is pretty strongly intimated by the Lord Chancellor, in this case, following Lord Lyndhurst's view, that the decision in the Mercers' case ought properly to be attributed to certain general words showing an intention to give the whole to charity, and that where there is an undisposed-of surplus it all goes to the devisees of the land. The rateable principle was applied by Lord Langdale, even though the word surplus was used, in the cases of the Coopers' Company (3 Beav. 29), and the Drapers' Company (4 Beav. 69); but the Lord Chancellor has strongly intimated his disapproval of those decisions. The present Master of the Rolls followed Lord Langdale's decisions in two cases—viz. The South Molton case (14 Beav. 357), and the one which has just been before the House of Lords. Both of these decisions have now been reversed; and though the judgment was aided by other considerations, it may be considered as settled by the Beverley case, that, where, after a number of charitable gifts, the surplus rent is given to the administrators of the charity, the whole increase of the rental will go to them notwithstanding that their share has been described not merely by the general term "the surplus," but also by the more specific description "the surplus, amounting to £—."

CONSTRUCTION—SURVIVORSHIP.

Page v. May, 5 W. R. 540.

This case is chiefly important as having finally disposed of a decision (Macdonald v. Bryce, 16 Beav. 581) which it was very difficult to reconcile with the general current of authority. The bequest in this case was to a "tenant for life, with remainder to certain legatees, to be equally divided, share and share alike, or, in case of the demise of each or either of them, to be divided between the survivors or survivor, or their representatives." The words in Macdonald v. Bryce were substantially the same; and the question was, what was to be done in the event (which happened) of the death of all the legatees in remainder, during the life of the tenant for life? Was the fund undisposed of, or did it belong to the legatees' estates in equal shares, or to the last survivor of them? The argument for the intestacy was, that the survivorship on which the gift over took place was referable to the date of the death of the tenant for life, and that there was nothing to vest the gift before that event; and this view prevailed in Macdonald v. Bryce. In the present case, however, the Master of the Rolls overruled his former decision, and held that there was no intestacy. As the same person represented the estates of all the legatees, the doubt between the rights of the last survivor and the others remains unsettled so far as this decision is concerned, but there can be little question as to the title of all upon the many other reported decisions on analogous cases. (See 1 Jarm. on Wills, 705).

PRACTICE—LIBERTY TO BRING AN ACTION—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Farina v. Silverlock, 5 W. R. 827.

This suit was for an injunction to restrain the defendant from printing and selling certain labels for Eau-de-Cologne bottles. At the hearing, on appeal, before the Lord Chancellor, the plaintiff's bill was ordered to be retained for a twelvemonth, with liberty to bring any action which he might be advised. The twelvemonth would expire on the day after the present motion was made, and the plaintiff had not brought his action to a hearing. It did not appear that he had been guilty of undue delay in bringing the action, or that the defendant had placed any impediments in the way of its being conducted to adjudication; but the cause did not come on for trial until the last week of the twelvemonth, and then the plaintiff withdrew the record on account of the absence of counsel. He now moved for an extension of time; and the Court made the order, on the ground that there had been no laches on his part, and that there was manifestly a bond fide intention to proceed to trial within the time prescribed by the original order of the Court. The order for extending the time, however, was made upon the terms of the plaintiff paying to the defendant all the costs occasioned by the delay, and doubling the security already given for costs—the plaintiff residing out of the jurisdiction—in case he should prove unsuccessful.

Correspondence.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

Scotch cases generally are not likely to be read with much attention. But there are two classes of them which may be studied with both interest and instruction: those in which English principles of law (or at least what are understood here to be such) are repudiated, and those which relate to the rights and responsibilities of agents of every class belonging to the legal profession. These cases are not numerous; and it is proposed in the course of the vacation to give short reports of such as have occurred since the beginning of the year. In pursuance of this purpose we proceed to notice the case of Mrs. Jane Bowman or M'Naughten and children against the Caledonian Railway Company, 15th January, 1857. In this case the pursuers, who were the wife and children of a man named Daniel M'Naughten, a joiner, in the service of the Caledonian Railway Company, claimed damages (which were laid at £800) from the company as reparation for the death of the husband and father who was killed while working at a carriage on a siding, at Greenock, by a collision caused by an engineer and stoker, also in the service of the company, driving an engine violently into the siding without warning. In defence, the company stated, among others, the following preliminary plea:—"The allegation that injury was occasioned through the culpability of fellow-servants in the defenders' employment, is irrelevant, the defenders not being legally responsible in a question with the deceased or his representatives for such culpability."

The Lord Ordinary (before whom, as already explained, all actions in the Court of Session come to depend in the first instance) disposed of the plea by interlocutor—"Repels the said plea in law." To the interlocutor containing this finding, he appended a long note, explaining the reasons of his judgment, and entering into the arguments on each side so fully, that it is not necessary to do more for the understanding of the case than quote some parts of it:—

"The defenders' objection to the relevancy of this action raises a question of great general importance, entering deeply into the constitution of one of our most common and familiar contracts. The facts alleged by the pursuers and to be assumed at present are briefly these:—M'Naughten, while employed as a joiner or carpenter in repairing a railway carriage, on a siding, was killed by a collision caused by an engine driving violently into the siding. No warning was given, and no precautions were taken to secure the safety of those who might be engaged on the siding. The collision, and consequent injury and death of M'Naughten, are alleged to have been caused by the fault of the defenders' servants—viz. the persons in charge of the engine and the person in charge of the switches."

The Lord Ordinary then narrates the defenders' plea; and, after explaining the primary principle of responsibility in such cases, and showing that the same principle affects auctores as well as actores, he goes on to say:—"There can be no doubt of the relevancy of the averments in this case if the person injured had been a stranger. On this point it is understood that the master's responsibility is also recognised by the law of England."

"But it is said that here the person injured was himself in the employment of the defenders, and that a master is not liable for injury done by one servant to another," &c.; and his Lordship then mentions the English cases referred to in support of this doctrine (Priestley, 1837, 3 Mees. & W. 1; Hutchinson, May 22, 1850, 19 Law Journ. Exch. Rep. 296; Wigmore, May 22, 1850, 19 Law Journ. Exch. Rep. 300). With regard to these English cases, the Lord Ordinary states, that, "so far as he can venture to form any opinion on the English decisions, he is disposed to think that no rule quite so absolute and inflexible as that for which the defenders contend has been settled by express decision; though, certainly, the authority of the cases, and the dicta of the learned judges, are favourable to the defenders' plea. In the law of Scotland, the decisions directly adverse to the absolute rule contended for are express and numerous. Masters have repeatedly been found liable for injury done by one servant to another. There is no trace of such a rule in Scottish law as exempts the master from responsibility, merely because the injured party as well as the doer is in his employment."

The Scotch cases particularly referred to were—Linwood, May 14, 1817; Sword, Feb. 13, 1839; Sneddon, June 16 1849; Rankin, Jan. 31, 1852; Gray, Dec. 1, 1852; and Reid, July 3, 1855.

The Lord Ordinary then goes on to say, that he thinks the principles upon which the law on this subject should be regulated ought to be universal over the whole kingdom, and suggests that some principle might be found intermediate between what is stated to be the English rule, and the inflexible rule enforcing the liability in Scotland—as, for example, "while both (servants) are employed in a common operation."

But he observes further, that cases may occur of a different character, as where one servant is subordinate to another, or where they are engaged in different operations. In the first class of cases the master's liability for the fault of a servant having a superintendence was recognised by the House of Lords, in Paterson, 1 Macqueen's Rep. 748; and that if the absolute rule maintained by the defenders were well founded, a master would be exempt from responsibility in such a case as that of a dairymaid, while bringing home milk, being carelessly driven over by the coachman, which, he thinks, would be "a very startling result to a Scotch lawyer; for whatever support to such a rule may be found in some of the decisions of the Courts, and more particularly in some of the dicta of the learned judges in England, there is neither precedent nor authority in the law of Scotland in favour of it."

His Lordship then goes on to show, that "the doctrine of an implied undertaking in the contract of service to incur all risks from the fault of servants in all different departments is not one recognised in Scotch law;" as might have been expected from the way in which the law upon the subject has been applied in Scotland.

The defenders reclaimed, but the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor without hearing the pursuers; and some of the Lord Ordinary's speculations met with little favour from the inner house judges.

The Lord Justice Clerk said that he went upon the "broad principle, that, since the employer is liable to third parties for the injuries sustained by them, he is, a fortiori, liable for those sustained by his own servants." And again, "the notion that each workman undertakes all the risks of accidents caused by say 1,000 other fellow-workmen employed in a railway, and that the master is not to be liable, is, to my mind, quite opposite to reason and justice."

That the duty of the master is to take care not to allow his servants to injure any, and that this duty is not limited to the public: "The first thing, I think, is to take care of all his own servants; they are brought into constant contact with each other, and the risk of injury is very great. The order and duty, therefore, of being careful and attentive to the life and person of others applies first and primarily to fellow-servants."

He then observes, that he could have understood the English rule if it had declared a master not liable when his instructions were violated. "It seems most extraordinary to say that he is free from all risks for accidents caused by fellow-workmen."

Lord Murray expressed similar views, and said:—"I cannot see my way to any principle here which would free the master from his liability. I do not know the English law on this point; but we have a principle here which appears to me very wise and just, by which, at any rate, I, as a Scotch judge, am bound."

Lord Cowan followed on the same side, and concludes his judgment thus:—"There are two, if not three, decisions standing, in which this defence has been repelled by well-considered judgments of this court. It would be wrong in this state of matters, as it appears to me, to entertain serious argument on a principle so thoroughly recognised, until the House of Lords has instructed us to act differently. It may be very expedient that the same rule should prevail in both countries; but so long as the decisions in our own courts remain unreversed, I do not see how we can do otherwise than affirm the interlocutor of Lord Ardmillan."

A Complete Manual of Short Conveyancing. Containing, I. Common Forms; II. 250 Precedents of Assurances. With Explanatory Notes and a copious Index. By Herman L. Prior, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Wildy & Sons.

Mr. Herman Prior's Manual of Concise Conveyancing may at least claim the merit of being one of the most startling law books which have appeared for many a year. It has nothing, or almost nothing, in common with the concise forms which have been published by more than one of the leading conveyancers of the day. Their drafts have been for the most part framed on the principles which have been recognised in conveyancing for centuries, and their brevity has been almost exclusively attained by the omission of redundant and tautological expressions. This mode of dealing with the subject does not at all satisfy the ardent reforming spirit by which our author is animated, and he complains that "the retrenchments of modern times appear to have gone on the principle of lopping off an obvious excrescence here and there, instead of the reconstruction, on sound principles, of the entire mode of thought and language." This, though a distorted, is not altogether a false account of what has been done by those who have preceded Mr. Prior in the attempt to improve the style of legal instruments. The task he sets himself is nothing less than "the reconstruction of the existing forms on sounder principles of language and arrangement;" and though we shall have to question the soundness and the safety of Mr. Prior's suggested principles, we are bound to admit in the outset that he has discharged himself of his rather Quixotic undertaking with great ingenuity, and yet greater courage.

Like a true knight errant, Mr. Prior will not be content without a social monster to quell. To say that conveyancing is often cumbrous and prolix, and that it is capable of further improvement, even after all that has been done of late years, is, in our author's estimate, an utterly inadequate view of the actual facts. It is not reform, but revolution, which he deems necessary. The conveyancing of the last century is pleasantly described as "one of the scourges of the country;" and "the vitality of this gigantic imposture" is investigated in much the same spirit in which a missionary might be expected to inquire into the nature and origin of Buddhism or Fetish worship.

If Mr. Prior had been more temperate in his denunciation of the present system, we should have been disposed to agree with him that the neatness and elegance of modern drafts might be increased, and their costliness diminished, by a judicious regard for conciseness of expression. But it is an utter misconception to represent the prolix language still employed by some, though not by the best conveyancers, as the cause of the expensiveness of modern conveyancing. The real obstacle to the ready transfer of land consists in the necessity of investigating, at the expense of much skilled labour, the title to the property dealt with, for a period of more than half a century, and of making good real or apparent defects by a still more expensive and laborious accumulation of evidence. While this process has to be gone through, it must be paid for; and it is idle to suppose that the mere contraction of the length of legal instruments will be suffered to deprive the professional agents employed on a purchase of a fair remuneration for their bonâ fide services. It is true that at present they are most absurdly compelled to regulate their charges for the skill and intellectual labour bestowed, by the standard supplied by the number of words in the documents prepared. But if these documents were cut down to a quarter of their present length, the only consequence would be that some new scale, or, what would be much better, some entirely new principle of remuneration, must be adopted, or else no solicitor would undertake conveyancing work at all. Mr. Prior, indeed, fully admits this necessity, and concurs in the very sensible suggestion of the Registration Commissioners, that the remuneration of solicitors should be based upon some other principle than the length of the instruments prepared.

But this being conceded, all Mr. Prior's rhetorical flourishes about "scourges" and "impostures" shrink into very small compass. The only real saving which can be effected by conciseness is just the prime cost of the mechanical labour of certain copying clerks: for it is acknowledged that the reduction in professional remuneration, which, under the present system, would be the immediate effect, must be, and very soon would be, compensated by paying in a direct and rational form for the labour, thought, and care which now receive scarcely any acknowledgment except in the profit made on copies and engrossments.

In estimating the importance of conciseness, therefore, the question of expense becomes comparatively trivial, and it would assuredly be the height of folly to curtail conveyances so far as in any degree to impair the security of titles.

The two points in the present system of conveyancing which Mr. Prior pronounces the most objectionable, are the habit of using a multitude of nearly synonymous terms in the place of one sufficient general phrase, and the practice of introducing recitals into deeds. On the first point, it is only necessary to say that the habit is greatly falling into disuse, and that no material reduction in the length of well-drawn instruments, such as are now commonly turned out, could be effected by the most rigid enforcement of Mr. Prior's dogma against tautology. So far, however, as he confines himself to the elaboration of more concise and comprehensive modes of expressing the ideas comprised in common forms, he is only treading in the steps of the eminent conveyancers who have already weeded out almost all the redundant verbiage which was formerly in vogue. But the essential characteristic of Mr. Prior's system is the entire omission of recitals; and any one who has the least familiarity with conveyances will easily understand, that, by this bold device, he is able to reduce an average draft to a much smaller compass than is possible for the tersest draftsman, who adheres to the old practice of reciting so much of antecedent transactions as may be necessary to make the instrument intelligible as well as operative.

The substantial question which Mr. Prior raises by his elaborate work is, whether the advantage of conciseness is sufficient to compensate for the inconvenience and obscurity which the absence of recitals would certainly produce. We think that the answer must be in the negative. Mr. Prior's ingenious argument against the employment of recitals sums up all that can be said on that side of the question.

"It really seems wonderful," he says, "how such a practice could ever have been considered necessary, or even tolerable. To a lay mind it would certainly appear enough that a conveyance from A. to B. should be a conveyance from A. to B. without being a history of A.'s antecedents, and perhaps those of one or two of his ancestors as well. No doubt, as a literary production, a conveyance is much more complete and satisfactory for exhibiting the preliminary state of the title at length; but as in practice this has always been well sifted beforehand, and every party to the instrument is assumed to be cognisant of it, it does seem monstrous that the entire process should be gone through again, and the draft swelled to thrice its length, for the benefit of some exoteric reader in after times, who, even if he exist, will not accept these statements on the faith of the document itself, but require their strict proof, viewing the document not as an isolated fact, but as merely one link in the chain of title. But it may be fairly urged, should a conveyance then be in every case a mere general transfer of the parties' interest, without identifying in any manner the capacity in which they execute? Certainly not; and if it should hereafter happily form the subject of a general order that recitals in deeds should not be allowed for on taxation, except under special circumstances, the character and grounds of execution by the different parties (framed so as to include the benefits of estoppel, and others of a similar nature) would be the principal test of the conveyancer's skill. It is quite easy to frame such a statement in language clumsy, involved, and even lengthy; but it is also possible, although perhaps not easy, to include it in terms which shall neither incumber the draft, nor perplex the reader."

There are two or three considerations which seem sufficient to dispose of this theory. In the first place, it does not seem to us worth while to destroy the value of a conveyance, even as a literary production, for the sake of the very small advantage of saving a skin of parchment. Besides this, there is another most material use in recitals of which Mr. Prior takes no account at all. On the present system, the entire series of deeds on which a title depends get so interwoven by means of the recitals which they contain, that a fraudulent suppression of an instrument which may cut at the root of an apparent title becomes an extremely difficult matter. In point of fact, frauds of this kind are more rare than any one could à priori have expected; but if every conveyance were as little suggestive of what had gone before as those which Mr. Prior furnishes as models, there is reason to fear that a notable increase would take place in the dangers to which titles would be exposed from the schemes of dishonest vendors. But the omission of all recitals would not only be hazardous, but in many cases absolutely impossible. Our author concedes the necessity of describing "the character and grounds of execution in such a manner as to include the benefits of estoppel, and others of a similar nature;" and whether this is done by first stating the facts, and then proceeding to the operative part of the deed, or, after Mr. Prior's fashion, by inserting the facts in a parenthetical clause, it is equally a recital; the only difference being, that, in the one case, it is in its natural place, and free from ambiguity; while, in the other, it is inserted as a subsequent explanation of the earlier phrases of the deed, and in many cases must be wanting in perspicacity, and dependent for its meaning on the unsatisfactory resources of punctuation. For example, a deed of dissolution of partnership is thrown by Mr. Prior into the following shape:—

"For effectuating an agreement for determining the partnership business of ——, heretofore carried on by the said A. B. and C. D. under articles dated &c., and in consideration of one moiety of the profits of such business, up to the —— day of —— last, having been received by the said A. B (and of £—— secured to him by the bond bearing even date herewith of the said C. D., being the value of the share of the said A. B., as ascertained by a stock taking and account stated between the parties of the partnership property), and also in consideration of an indemnity against the partnership liabilities by bond, bearing even date herewith (in the penal sum of £——), executed to the said A. B. by the said C. D., the said A. B. releases, &c."

An old-fashioned conveyancer would have got rid of all the relative and parenthetical clauses, and told the story simply by reciting that the business had been carried on by A. B. and C. D. under articles, &c.; that one moiety of the profits, up to the —— day of —— last, had been received by A. B.; that the value of A. B.'s share had been ascertained at £——; that bonds for securing the amount, and for indemnity, had been given; and that, in consideration of the premises, the said A. B. releases, &c.

No one but a man on a hobby could prefer the form which Mr. Prior has been at so much pains to frame. The other mode would be quite as short; it is certainly more natural and elegant to recite substantively what you wish to record, than to introduce the facts by an oblique statement in connection with the consideration. If, as is commonly the case with arrangements for dissolution, the terms were of a more complicated nature, the indirect mode of reciting the necessary circumstances would be quite unmanageable, and the draftsman would be driven to the artifice adopted by Mr. Prior in some of his precedents, of throwing the difficulties and complications as they arise into a series of schedules. Not content with abolishing recitals, Mr. Prior condemns the time-honoured habendum as a superfluity, though even he can scarcely complain much of its length. But he is resolute to have nothing that cannot be proved to be indispensable, and would willingly derange the habits of centuries for the sake of eliminating half-a-dozen words. But while we can only regard these wild notions as instances of the fanaticism with which a man will often follow a pet theory to any lengths, however extravagant, we are bound to concede to Mr. Prior the praise of having worked out his idea with remarkable skill. The large collection of precedents which he has elaborated will not be lost, even to those who, like us, are not quite advanced enough to give up recitals, or to appreciate our author's purposeless omission of the two or three words which constitute the habendum of an ordinary deed. Apart from the general scheme, there are many happily condensed forms in the collection which may advantageously be used by any draftsman; and, notwithstanding our objections to his theory, we think Mr. Prior's work a valuable contribution to the conveyancer's library.

Inspectors of Prisons' Report.

The Twentieth Report of the Inspectors of Prisons has been published. It is confined to the Northern and Eastern District. In the prefaratory letter to the Home Secretary, dated in September, 1856, from Mr. Voules, the inspector, he states that the report is on the prisons which have been inspected by him during the year. We were, therefore, somewhat surprised to find that many of the separate reports bear date as of visits made early in 1854, and none of them later than December in that year. Why such delay should have taken place before the reports were communicated to the Government, or why the first paragraph of the inspector's short communication to Sir George Grey should contain so obvious a mistake, is more than we can undertake to explain. But if there be any value in the information given in such reports—a matter on which there may be some doubt as long as they retain their present character—it would, at all events, be desirable that they should be communicated to the public as soon as official convenience may permit. An inspector's duty, when he visits a prison, seems to be to inquire generally as to whether there has been an increase or a decrease in the number of prisoners; also as to their spiritual and sanitary condition; the cost of their maintenance; the internal economy of the prison; the manner in which the books and accounts are kept; and whether there is any special ground for dissatisfaction in the minds of the visiting justices, the officers, or the prisoners. The result of such inquiries he notes down cursorily at the time, and a collection of these notes (in this case two years after they were written) is called his report. There is, therefore, not very much that would interest general readers to be found in this blue-book; and yet it is impossible to read even the meagre statements which it contains without being convinced how large is the field which the judicious philanthropist may find in our prisons, without entering upon the more debateable ground of reformatories. It certainly appears strange that there should be so little uniformity in the management of our prisons. Justice would seem to require that the character and nature of the punishment should be as nearly equal as possible in all our prisons in this country, so that a given number of months confinement in one jail would be equal, as a punitive sentence, to the same in another. We find, however, crank labour largely used in some jails, while it is unknown in others. There is also a great difference as to the quality or quantity of food supplied to the prisoners. Thus, at Derby, the daily cost for each was 6*d.*, and we are informed that the surgeon "orders extra food for any prisoner who loses in weight;" while at Hull the daily cost of food was only 4½*d.* per head, and we are told "the rules of this prison do not require the surgeon to see prisoners who are not on the sick list more than once a month." At Beverley, the average cost in 1854 was 6½*d.*; Ipswich Borough, 5¼*d.*, and County, 4¾*d.*; Bury St. Edmunds, 3½*d.*; Oakham (Rutland), 8¾*d.*; Southwell, 5⅝*d.* There is also a great difference as to the total annual cost of each prisoner. Upon the whole, it seems evident enough that the "general prison regulations" are not sufficiently stringent, or else that the control of the inspector and his power of interference with the management of the visiting justices are too limited in their range. In order to make Government inspection of prisons what was originally intended, and what it ought to be, more power must be intrusted to the inspectors, and then something more worthy of them may be expected than those comparatively trifling memoranda and would-be statistics, which now go by the name of reports, and have the sanction of appearing in the blue-books.

Since the above remarks were in print, we have received another of these reports. It is the production of Mr. Perry, and relates to the prisons of the Southern and Western District. This report is evidently the result of inspections during 1855-6, though, singularly enough, that fact nowhere appears throughout the entire report, except inferentially. Neither does it appear in the inspector's letter to the Home Secretary; and, with a rare consistency in his contempt for dates, Mr. Perry satisfies himself by giving the month, but not the day, when that document was written. These trifles—if such obviously important things may be so designated—show that there is very little system or methodical plan in the proceedings of the inspectors. Each seems to pursue such a method as strikes his fancy, and to report accordingly. We were, therefore, prepared to find that we should be unable to pursue our inquiry as to the average daily cost of the dietary of prisons in the Southern and Western District. In the report now before us, we have no direct information as to the average daily cost of the prisoner's food, nor as to their total annual cost; but, by way of compensation, we have a statement of the total expenditure and receipts during the year ending Michaelmas, 1855, in the greater number of the prisons which have been inspected. The other tabular returns are also more carefully given, and present more useful results than those which we have generally seen. But it is clear that if there is to be any comprehensive system of judicial statistics, there ought to be some uniformity in the returns and tabular statements furnished by our jail authorities. The value of our inquiries on the subject of criminal statistics has been very much diminished by the diversity and unnecessary incongruity which have characterised our attempts hitherto. We cannot help thinking, moreover, that such statistics as we require might be much more conveniently obtained by means of printed forms to be filled up by the local authorities, and returned periodically to a central office, than through the agencies at present employed. There would still remain sufficient employment for the prison inspectors, whose time could easily be better employed than in picking up odds and ends of figures, and little bits of unconnected statistical information, according as they squared with their own private theories or particular fancies.

Mr. Perry seems to be strongly in favour of the separate system, and tells us that there are only two prisons in the district in which it has not been adopted, wholly or in part.

"It would be gratifying (he says) to be enabled to add, that the discipline pursued in these improved prisons is always consistent with the principle of the system for which they were designed. But although in the greater number much attention is devoted to the teaching of what may be called abstract morality, and the advantages of an honest course of life are theoretically inculcated, sufficient care is not always taken to institute such a course of productive industry as shall practically demonstrate the truth of those principles, and thus tend to induce a taste for labour. It is true that the views I am advocating are, year by year, becoming more extensively received; but there remain, nevertheless, more than one instance in which it is studiously endeavoured to divest prison labour of all but its punitive element, and in which the remote advantages which might be reaped from it in its results both to the prisoner and to society are blindly disregarded. It is right to add, however, that even in many of those prisons in which 'hard-labour cranks,' and other such ineffectual inventions, founded on the notion of repressing crime by mere severity of punishment, have been erected at great cost, and persisted in for a time, they are now altogether abandoned; while in others the authorities are meditating their abandonment, and the adoption of productive labour in their stead."

These observations open up a very large field of inquiry, but one which it is time to enter upon resolutely. There are few social questions more important, and at the same time more difficult, than those relating to the employment of convict labour. At present, all our theories on the subject are, for the most part, purely empirical; and all our plans bear the impress of our uncertainty and want of logic. It is strange, that it should not yet be decided by our political philosophers whether or not the labour of our convicts may be made productive to the State without injury to other labour. The absence of any well-considered scheme for accomplishing so desirable an end must be owing, if not to the impossibility, at least, to a want of conviction of the possibility of such a result. The great difficulty, no doubt, is to discover any sufficient field for labour, that would be at all remunerative, in which there should not be the competition of the labour of persons who are not criminals. But those who insist upon this view of the subject are very much given to overrate its importance, and to forget the awkward fact that at present the innocent support the criminal without receiving anything in return—without the latter making any contribution by their labour to the common fund; whereas, if labour were made the condition of support, the common stock of commodities would, at all events, be increased in the same proportion as if no criminals existed, or as if all our convicts were industrious members of society. It is beyond our comprehension to understand how the State could possibly be a loser by the necessary addition to its capital or consumable stock, the actual consumption remaining the same. Such, in effect, would be the result of employing our prisoners on reproductive work. It is for our statesmen to discover a scheme by which the general advantage may be gained at the smallest possible loss or inconvenience to individuals.

Judicial Business Report.

BARON BRAMWELL'S EVIDENCE ABRIDGED.

Mr. Justice Cresswell in the Chair.

Can you give the commission any information on the extent of the labours of a Baron of the Exchequer, as to what they are at the present time?—I can tell you what I have had to do since the beginning of the business time, and, as well as I can judge, what I shall have to do till the end of the usual business at the beginning of the long vacation. The term began on the 3rd of November, and continued till the 25th, during which time of course I sat in Court.

For what average number of hours?—The average number of hours is six—from 10 till 4.

Are the labours of the day closed when you quit the Court at 4 o'clock?—Most certainly not.

Will you mention the number of hours you attend at Chambers?—I should say four hours, from 11 till 3.

On the average?—On the average I should certainly say from 11 till 3 in the Exchequer. On the 1st of December, which was on a Monday, I went on the winter circuit, and I returned from the winter circuit on the 24th of December; but out of those days there were two during which I was in town.

Which circuit did you go?—I went a circuit composed of portions of three different circuits. I went to Cardiff, to Gloucester, to Chelmsford, to Maidstone, and to Lewes; and I saved two days out of that time, during which I was in town entirely. Of course those days were saved by sitting late. I should say that at Cardiff and at Gloucester I went into Court at 9, and left between 7 and 8. Of course, it is a great convenience to jurymen, witnesses, and parties, if you can let them go the same night, instead of making them attend another day. On the 26th, 27th, 29th, 30th, and 31st of December, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, 6th, and 7th of January, making eleven days, I was not engaged in the discharge of that part of my duty which is done in public.

Those were holidays?—Yes. I will show you how I disposed of those holidays presently. On the 8th, 9th, and 10th I was at chambers.

But you are bound to be at the service of the public during the day?—I am. From the 12th to the 31st was Term time. I was what is called "out judge;" that is to say, if there was no Nisi Prius business I sat in Banc; if there was Nisi Prius business I took it, and as soon as I got away from that work I had to go to Chambers. I am quite certain that I speak within compass when I say that my work then commenced punctually at 10. I certainly did not leave on the average till 3, and I then went to Chambers, where I must have had from two and a half hours to three hours of work, besides affidavits to read afterwards.

From 10 till 6, then, were the hours you were engaged?—Yes, certainly. From the 31st of January to the 7th of Feb. I ought to have been the first four days sitting in the Court of Error, and was so for three days; but upon the other day I went to the Old Bailey, where I ought also to have been on another of those four days. On the fifth day of that week I went to the Old Bailey, and so could not sit, where I otherwise ought to have done, in my own Court in Banc at the "After Term sittings." On the sixth day I did sit in my own Court in Banc at the "After Term sittings;" so that, in truth, in those six days I had work for nine; that is to say, on the whole six days I ought to have been at Westminster, either in the Court of Error or in the Court in Banc, and I ought also to have been three days at the Old Bailey. In the last week in February, that is to say, until the 28th of February, I shall have to go to chambers, when I shall certainly have work, according to my past experience, from 11 to 5, owing to the approach of the circuits, and the necessity for doing business which cannot be postponed till the Court sits in Banc; and my experience undoubtedly is, that I get six hours' work at chambers during that time. In the week after that, which ends on March the 7th, I shall have to go to the Old Bailey again, because I am the North Wales judge; but out of that week I shall have certainly two days unoccupied. I shall have another day on March the 9th. From March the 10th to April the 4th, I shall be on circuit.

When is your last commission day?—The 28th. Between the 4th of April and the first day of Term I shall have eight days with no public duty. From April the 15th to May the 8th is Easter Term.

Then the whole of every day is occupied?—Every day is then occupied. From May the 8th to May the 22nd I shall have to be at the Old Bailey and to take my fourth of chamber duty, which I calculate will amount to six days, giving me five in that interval to myself.

Have you made any allowance for the Court sitting in Banc after Easter Term?—I have not. I have supposed that there would be no Banco sittings and no Error sittings, and on that supposition I have given myself five days. From May the 22nd to June the 12th is Trinity Term; from June the 12th to the 19th I suppose we may say we shall be sitting in Error; from June the 19th to the 26th I have no hope but what we shall have such an amount of arrears as to sit in Banc; the following week, from June the 26th, I suppose we shall be in the House of Lords. No doubt I ought to calculate upon more; but inasmuch as I cannot be in two places at once, and the only remaining week I shall have to be at chambers, I have supposed that from June the 26th to July the 3rd I shall be in the House of Lords, and from July the 3rd to July the 10th I shall be at chambers.

Assuming that I get the six days which I have mentioned in the month before I go on circuit, I shall have had 44 days not engaged in business in public. But I desire to mention what else I have to do besides this regular ordinary public business, and I will mention everything, though some matters may be of very little importance, and others of more importance. The judges have to hear tax cases. They are liable to be called on also to sit in equity, to assist the judges in equity. They have Bills referred to them by the House of Lords. It occasionally happens, that a judge is asked by the parties to undertake the decision of a case for them which may come before him in a variety of ways;—for instance, upon an interpleader summons at chambers; or I may mention another case, which certainly is germane to the matter in hand. There was a case which came before us in Banc, I think in last Trinity Term. It was a case of considerable complication, and the Court and the parties asked me to hear it and decide it, which at their request I agreed to do. From that time down to the present I have never been able to give them a day, and I am going to hear it on next Monday. Then a judge has to prepare his notes for the court in cases where there are motions for new trials, or to enter verdicts, where he has tried them; and, although his clerk copies out the notes, of course he has to revise them. He has to prepare any cases which may come before the Court of Criminal Appeal. He has not to any very great extent, but to some extent, to correspond with the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if any reference is made to him. He has to read his special paper, and his paper books in cases in error; and he has his judgments to prepare in cases which are reserved for consideration. And as to that, I cannot help saying, that to my mind, that last matter alone is very nearly a full occupation for the number of leisure days which I have supposed myself to have in the course of the year.

Except the Long Vacation?—Except the Long Vacation. It is very easy to write a judgment, but not very easy, in my mind, to write a good one. I think it is all important that one should have ample time for the preparation of judgments in those cases which do not admit of decision at the time when they come immediately before the court. Now I have mentioned that I had eleven days between Christmas-day and the first day afterwards that I went to chambers. I can assure the commission that of those eleven days there were not three in which I was not engaged in writing, I will not say judgments, because they were not afterwards adopted and read by the court as their judgments, but in writing what, if they had been approved of, might have been delivered as the judgments of the court. In particular, there is one case which will be in the knowledge of some of the members of the commission, a case not in my own court, but a case argued in the House of Lords—namely, Lane v. Hooper, in which I will undertake to say that if I opened one book, I certainly opened, including those that I opened twice, a hundred, so that that was the way in which I was occupied. I was writing a judgment then. When I say a judgment, the object of writing down your opinion in the form of a judgment is, that you may circulate it amongst either the members of your own court or those who have to consider the matter with you, in order that they may see how far they agree with you or how far they differ from you; because it is obvious that one can write down one's opinions on paper more methodically and clearly than one can state them in conversation with a brother judge who has to decide the case. Now I say, that I think it really is of the greatest importance that one should not be hurried in that particular matter; because, in the first place, you have to decide between the particular parties; and the result of a wrong decision is, that you give to one man that which belongs to another. But there is another consideration, which to my mind is almost equally important, and it is this,—the losing party is never satisfied; but if he thought that he not only had had injustice done him, but that that injustice was attributable to the haste or negligence of the judge, just consider how much greater his dissatisfaction would be. At all events, you had better let him go away with the feeling that he has not suffered from the incompetence or indifference of the person who has decided against him. I think the public satisfactory administration of justice requires that. Then there is another thing; you must bear in mind that our decisions do not merely settle the particular case, and are then forgotten, but that they are cited as precedents; and I am sure anybody who knows the mischief that an unfortunate decision occasions, will say that it would be very desirable that it should never take place, not only for the sake of the particular parties concerned in it, but for the sake of the public generally, because what is the consequence? It is in vain to say that you settle the law by it. You do not settle the law; for as long as a case is decided upon a wrong principle, although the Courts may abide by it, because they consider it their duty not to overrule the judgment of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, yet you are continually having attempts made to distinguish other cases from it by circumstances, which indeed make a difference in point of circumstance, but none in point of principle, so that at length the case gets nibbled and carped at, and shaken, till somehow or other it is gone. I would not require a better example of that than a well-known case which was decided by the House of Lords. No court, of course, could overrule it; but it has given rise to as much litigation as could possibly take place, and the result is, that that case has not been overruled, but distinguished from to such an extent, that if any party now cited it he would be laughed at. I need not say that I make these remarks under the correction of those members of the commission who know about these matters better than I do, from their greater experience, but I make them, subject to that correction, very confidently; and I really would press upon the commission very strongly the great importance of not driving the judges to hasty judgments upon those cases which are of such a character that they cannot decide them in court. There is another matter which I must mention to the commission. Lord Wensleydale, one of the commission, told me, and my own judgment goes with it, that no judge can do his duty who does not read the Reports. Ever since I have been upon the bench I have faithfully read all the Reports.

What Reports are those?—Reports of cases and decisions in the different courts. When I was at the bar I did not read them, and I did not pretend to read them, and my clients knew that I did not read them, and they took me for better or for worse with notice. But I cannot serve the public in that way, and I read them now diligently and faithfully, and they require time; I do not mean to say that the reading of them is laborious, because from long habit and inclination, I do not say but that the reading of the Reports occasionally is rather an amusing thing.

Do you read all the multifarious reports—namely, the Jurist, the Law Journal, the Justice of the Peace, and the Law Times?—No; I read what I suppose you may call the orthodox Reports of the three Common Law Courts—namely, Ellis & Blackburn, the Common Bench Reports, and Hurlstone & Norman. I read the Law Journal Reports (Equity and Common Law), and I read the Jurist Reports. I read over the same case very often three times; but if I do not do so, I am not sure that I shall not miss it, so I read it to make sure. If I find upon reading it that I remember it, I do not always trouble myself to read any further. What I have now stated is my work besides the long vacation. I do not want to trouble the commission with what one may call personal details, but I can undertake to tell them that I very often work, certainly as often as not, and am obliged to work, after I have come out of court, and after I have had my dinner. I work in the evening, in short, and at other times which one need not more particularly name, but which are not included in any of the days which I have here mentioned. There is no remedy for it that I know of; I do not mean to say that one is always obliged to do it, but continually one is so obliged.

The labours of the judges, according to your account, are increased by the multiplicity of Reports, are they not?—As I said before, I cannot read them without consuming time in reading them. I am almost reluctant to call it a labour, because, as I have said, it is more often to me an amusement than anything else; but if it were not an amusement I should still have it to do. No doubt if it were not there to be done, one could not do it; so that in that sense it may be said that the multiplicity of Reports causes an additional amount of occupation. It may be asked, why does one read the same thing in duplicate? My answer to that is, that if I distinctly comprehend the case when I read it I do not trouble myself to read it again; but it very frequently happens that you find varieties of expression in the judgments, where they have not been considered and written, of such a character that it is quite desirable that you should read both Reports. You may find that one reporter is struck by one remark, which he puts down, and while writing it, not being an accomplished shorthand writer, something escapes his attention which the other puts down.

Do you consider that the statement which you have just made conveys a fair idea of the work done by the whole fifteen judges?—I do not like to answer for any one but myself. I do not know what my brethren of my own court would say. I cannot suppose that I work harder in my own court than they do, except in so far as I may be more laborious and slow in the discharge of what I have to do out of court than they are. My brother judges may be more rapid in their own proceedings out of court than I am. I cannot undertake to answer for that, but no doubt they have quite as much to do before the public as I have.

When I was called to the bar, the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench used to break up the sitting in banco at twelve o'clock in term time on certain days to hold a Nisi Prius sitting; that was about twice in the term: but on those occasions nothing but undefended causes were tried in term time. The sittings in term time lasted for a few hours each day. All that has been totally altered, causes are now tried of as grave a character, and lasting as long, in term time as in the sittings after term, and by that means, and by that only, you get through the business, which has been enormously prolonged both from the modern manner of trying causes, and from the habit of hearing them out instead of disposing of them as they used to do in a very summary way. A cause is now enormously prolonged by an accumulation of speeches, which are allowed, very properly I dare say, under the last Common Law Procedure Act, and also by allowing parties to be examined as witnesses, which imposes on every defendant the necessity of getting into the witness box, and when he has once taken the plunge of appearing as a witness himself, of course he brings others to support him if he can.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

Lord Redesdale, after a warm debate, withdrew his motion that the Commons amendments to this Bill be taken into consideration that day six months, in deference to the opinion of the House.

The Joint-Stock Companies Act (1856) Amendment Bill was read a third time.

Monday, Aug. 24.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The Lord Chancellor moved that the Commons' amendments be considered.

Lord Redesdale moved that the Commons' amendments be taken into consideration that day six months. He was induced to take this course upon three grounds:—First, by reason of the character and importance of the Commons' alterations, which were of such magnitude that they ought not to be hurriedly discussed or hastily decided upon. In the next place, he considered that what had occurred during the present session showed the advantage which would accrue from a further consideration of the subject; and, in the third place, he thought that the Bill passed by many matters which were within the scope of its object; that, therefore, it was imperfect, and, as an imperfect measure, it ought not to be further proceeded with.

Lord St. Leonards, in discussing the merits of the amendments, said, that, as regarded the constitution of the original court, he entirely approved of the alterations made. With regard to the proposed local courts, the House of Commons had declared, by an abstract resolution, that they would have local courts, which would bring relief to every man's door. He deprecated the spread of courts of divorce over the whole land; and though he desired to see the remedy extended to the poor as well as the rich, he did not wish to see every possible facility given for obtaining divorces. It was first proposed to resort to the county courts, but that proposition was immediately scouted. It was afterwards determined to leave the matter to a judge of assize, or to the quarter sessions, or to a Queen's counsel, or a serjeant-at-law, to be named by a judge. As to the quarter sessions, divorce was a thing which magistrates at that court could not cope with—the attempt to do so must inevitably break down. Then, again, with regard to judges at assize, he would appeal to Lord Campbell whether the moment a question of detail—for example, a question of account—arose at assizes, it were not customary for the judges to say, "We have not time to hear it; the case must go to arbitration?" Supposing there were all the necessary appliances, it would be nothing extraordinary if a divorce case occupied a week. But where were the appliances to be found? Where were the judges or the counsel at Nisi Prius who were familiar with the procedure of the ecclesiastical courts? Again, if the judge deputed a Queen's counsel or a serjeant-at-law to discharge his functions, how was this to be done when there was no court? How was a jury to be summoned? The Bill could not possibly work. The result would be, that divorce cases would have to be carried to the court of appeal, where they ought to be taken in the first instance. As to the fees to be paid to the persons intrusted with the performance of these duties, he should like to know whence they were to come. It could hardly be intended to throw the burden on the country; while, on the other hand, if the suitor had to pay them, he would be placed in a worse position than other suitors who had courts provided for them at the public expense. He would suggest that the clause should be struck out, on the understanding that a Bill should be brought in next session to settle the form of jurisdiction. The next point was as to the action of crim. con. He had, in committee, proposed clauses to abolish that action, but to give the jury power in certain cases to award the husband damages from the adulterer. Considerable discussion arose, and it was at last agreed to abolish the action. The question then arose, what was to be substituted, and in the Bill, as it went down, the Court was empowered to impose a fine on the adulterer, and order him to pay the whole or any part of the costs. The House of Commons struck out the power to impose a fine, but inserted a clause that in certain cases the petitioner might claim damages, his claim to be tried in an action. He could not perceive how that would differ from the old action of crim. con. There was, indeed, a proviso that the Court should have power to direct how the fine was to be disposed of, and might order a portion to be settled on the wife or children. They had abolished the action of crim. con. because they believed it to be a disgrace to their jurisprudence, when it had been compulsory on the part of the husband to bring that action; but it would now be voluntary, and there would be every inducement to collusion between him and the wife, to obtain a provision for her at the expense of the adulterer; and he could do so without asking even for a judicial separation. He would support the motion of Lord Redesdale, because he objected to having the amendments of the House of Commons forced in wholesale upon them.

After a few words from Earl Granville, their Lordships divided—For the amendment, 44; against, 46: majority, 2.

The Lord Chancellor then proceeded to state the nature of the amendments which had been made in the clause which gives jurisdiction in cases of judicial separation to the judges of assize and courts of quarter sessions, and said, that, admitting the principle of local jurisdiction, he could not conceive any better local tribunal for this purpose than the judges of assize. Any difficulty that might arise from the pressure of business would be provided for by the new rules and regulations which it would be in the power of the Court to make; one of which rules would no doubt provide that petitions should be presented in sufficient time, so that the judges might know what causes of the sort were coming on. With regard to the court of quarter sessions, the feeling of the House of Commons was, no doubt, this: that the poor should have a court of easy access, as well as the rich, for the decision of these cases. No doubt these courts were open to objection, as any local tribunal they could constitute would be; but as the principle of the Bill was left untouched, and as something must be left experimental, he trusted their Lordships would not object to the giving of jurisdiction in these cases to the courts of quarter sessions. They proposed the best machinery at their hands, and if that was found inefficient they must try some other.

Lord Monteagle did not object to the giving of jurisdiction to the recorders, who were learned men selected by the Crown; but he had a strong objection to giving it to the courts of quarter sessions, which, he believed, would not give satisfaction. He, therefore, moved to omit the words "or to the courts of quarter sessions."

Earl Powys said, that chairmen of quarter sessions had a right to protest against an important class of duties being thrust upon them, as was proposed by this Bill, involving points of law of which they had no special knowledge. The business would be chiefly in the hands of attorneys, not perhaps of a very reputable class, who would be constantly striving to set husband against wife in village communities, for the sake of making business. Great injury, too, would result from the public discussion at every quarter sessions of cases of this kind.

Earl Granville said, that, as the feeling of the House appeared to be almost universal against this portion of the clause, he would not insist on the retention of the words "court of quarter sessions for the county or borough."

The clause was altered accordingly.

Lord St. Leonards objected to the fees that would be chargeable in the assize courts, and urged that they would be a hardship on poor men. He also objected to that part of the clause which authorised the judges to refer questions of divorce to members of the bar.

The Lord Chancellor said, that, in every commission of assize, there were associated with the judges all the Queen's counsel and serjeants who went the circuit; and the clause only provided that the same course should be pursued with regard to these causes. It was extremely unlikely that an important divorce cause would be left to be tried by a Queen's counsel; the proviso was only introduced to meet an emergency, and to preserve the form of the commission the same as at present.

The amendment of the Commons in the clause constituting the court was then agreed to.

On clause 25, Lord St. Leonards moved the omission of the words "adultery committed in the conjugal dwelling."

Lord Monteagle supported the motion, and said, that the proposer of the words under consideration had entirely misunderstood the enactment of the French law which he had attempted to copy. The French law gave a woman a right of divorce in case her husband obtruded his mistress into the house; but as the clause stood, a man might bring his concubine home, and the wife would have no remedy, unless she could prove an act of adultery actually committed under her roof.

Lord Redesdale pointed out the further objection that a divorce might be granted on the ground of rape, and afterwards a jury might decide that no such offence had been committed.

The House divided—Contents, 27; non-contents, 44: majority, 17.

The Commons' amendment was thus rejected.

Lord St. Leonards moved to disagree with the Commons' amendment to clause 30, the effect of the amendment being practically to maintain the action of crim. con.

The Lord Chancellor said, clause 7, which the Commons had inserted, practically maintained the action of crim. con. When the Bill was before their Lordships he gave way on that point to the opinion generally expressed by their Lordships; but he was much struck with the argument of Lord Wensleydale, that there were cases in which the husband suffered great pecuniary loss by the separation from his wife.

Lord Redesdale said, the amendment was an encouragement to husbands to commence actions for damages on account of the wife's guilt.

Their Lordships then divided on the question whether the Commons' amendment be agreed to, and the numbers were—

Content.....Present, 32; Proxies, 45—77

Non-content...Present, 40; Proxies, 27—67—Majority, 10

The other amendments of the Commons were then agreed to.

Tuesday, Aug. 25.

Royal Commission.

The royal assent was given by commission to the following Bills:—Charitable Trusts Act Continuance, Married Women's Reversionary Interest, Joint-Stock Companies, Probates and Letters of Administration, Joint-Stock Companies Act (1856) Amendment.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The Lord Chancellor announced that the Commons had agreed to the Lords' amendments to this Bill.

Friday, Aug. 28.

The Royal Assent was given to the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The Lord Chancellor then read the Queen's Speech, of which the following are the only paragraphs interesting to the profession:—

"The Acts for establishing a more efficient jurisdiction for the Proving of Wills in England and Ireland, correct defects which have for many years been complained of.

"The Act for amending the Law relating to Divorce and to Matrimonial Causes will remedy evils which have long been felt.

"The several Acts for the Punishment of Fraudulent Breaches of Trust; for amending the Law relating to Secondary Punishments; for amending the Law concerning Joint-Stock Banks; together with other Acts of less importance, but likewise tending to the progressive improvement of the law, have met with her Majesty's ready assent."

Parliament was then prorogued to the 6th of November.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, August 24.

Joint-Stock Companies Act Amendment Bill.

The Lords' amendments to this Bill were agreed to.

Tuesday, Aug. 25.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill.

The Speaker announced that this Bill had been returned from the Lords, with many of the Commons' amendments agreed to, and others not agreed to.

The amendment of the Lords, to strike out the words "Quarter Sessions," was read and agreed to.

The amendment of the Lords, striking out the clause giving a right of divorce to the wife on the ground of adultery by the husband in the conjugal residence, was read, together with their reasons for doing so—namely, that the words were indefinite, and would give rise to questions of fact and law, and that the enactment was calculated to lead to collusion.

Sir G. Grey moved that the Lords' amendment be agreed to; which was opposed by Mr. Henley.

The House divided—For agreeing to the Lords' amendment, 48; against, 11: majority, 32.

The other amendments were agreed to.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

The aspect of East India affairs has had a depressing influence in the City throughout the week. On Saturday the English Funds experienced a decline of ½ per Cent. On Monday and Tuesday there was a small advance in price. On Wednesday, Thursday, and to-day, there has been a gradual small decline, but the total fall in Consols since this day week does not exceed ½ per Cent. It may be reasonably concluded that the effect upon the money market would be greater, but for the beneficial influence of the weather. Notwithstanding the violent storms, the conclusion in Mark-lane is, that the late rains have been in the whole more beneficial than otherwise. In the corn market there is a decline from the prices of Monday of from 3*s.* to 4*s.* per quarter on wheat, making the whole decline in price in the course of this week exceed 8*s.* per quarter.

The arrivals of specie from Australia since last Friday have exceeded £600,000, of which the Bank of England is reported to have taken a large part. The demand for money has been active in the discount market generally. The supply has been equal to the demand at about 4½ per Cent. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 22nd August, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,208,605, being a decrease of £184,420, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,230,131, showing a decrease of £29,775 when compared with the previous return.

The Board of Trade issued on Wednesday returns for the present month, and exhibit therein a large increase of exports. The declared value of our exports, as compared with the corresponding month of last year, is £2,233,306 in excess. Cottons stand highest in the scale, but allowance must be made for the increased value of the staple. Woollens stand next. There is also a large increase in metals, machinery, and hardware. It also appears that shipments to India of Manchester goods, and most other articles, do not show any falling off.

The opposition in the House of Commons to several proposals for obtaining, by legal obligation, statistical returns of the results of agriculture in England, has been successful in preventing any practical test of the value of a comprehensive measure on this subject. The inconvenience sustained in consequence of the want of such returns in England, may be estimated by observing their operation in regard to Scotland. The Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland has made a report on the cultivation of a large portion of that kingdom. It explains the remarkable fact, that while grain of all kind has, in some degree, and wheat in a very large degree, gone down in price since the termination of war with Russia, all descriptions of live stock have advanced in price, with strong indications of short supplies. The want of reliable information relative to the cultivation of England would leave us more in ignorance of the causes which have produced this contrariety in the respective range of prices if we did not possess some degree of light as afforded by the returns of agriculture in Scotland.

Mr. Caird has brought into the House of Commons a Bill for the collection of agricultural statistics in England and Wales, intending it for consideration during the recess. It appears this Bill will escape strong opposition, only because it is not compulsory. It will have the effect of enabling agriculturists, who make the desired returns under the authority of the Act of Parliament, to influence their neighbours by their example, and perhaps gradually induce them to fulfil the intention of the law.

The Government are not inclined to advance money or incur responsibility in the projected railway undertakings in India. Much has been said in favour of the Euphrates Valley Line, and of the great fertility of the country through which it would pass. It is probable, however, that railway communication with Constantinople from the West will exist at no distant period, and if a line should be carried from the west to Constantinople, and continued from the eastern side of the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf, a much shorter and better means of communication would be secured with India, than by the line of the Euphrates Valley, which would involve a sea passage either from Marseilles, Toulon, or Trieste, to the further end of the Mediterranean. It is admitted that telegraphic communication stands in a different light from the railway. Although the Government are not disposed to undertake the establishment of a line of telegraphic wires, they would engage to pay for using it. A company is making a telegraphic line through the Valley of the Euphrates, and it is probable we may look forward to the completion of that line. The proposal to connect by telegraph Suez with Aden, and Aden with Kurrachee, being a submarine line, has other advantages and other difficulties. It is said the Atlantic Telegraph Cable may be appropriated to this undertaking. If a suitable bottom be found in the Red Sea much time will be saved by having the cable ready.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 5, 1857.

THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

The Annual Provincial Meeting of this Association will be held at Manchester on the 7th and 8th of next month, and it may be hoped that the importance of the meeting itself, combined with the attractions of the Manchester Exhibition, will draw thither a full attendance of the profession both from town and country. We published in our number of the 22nd ult. a list of subjects suggested for discussion at the meeting, and this list deserves, we think, to be recalled to our readers' notice.

It is to be observed that this list is intended to be merely suggestive, and by no means to restrict members in their choice of subjects. The reading of well-considered papers, and the discussion thus originated, would give interest and vitality to the proceedings, and would, in many respects, be fruitful of good afterwards. This is, indeed, a subject in which we are peculiarly concerned. It is most desirable that the columns of this Journal should, to a considerable extent, be filled by the contributions of practising solicitors. Unfortunately, however, those members of the profession who are most able to instruct and interest their brethren are absorbed in engagements which occupy all their time and energy. Many men, too, who could command both valuable ideas and time to put them before our readers are withheld from doing so by the notion that the task proposed to them is heavier, and the necessary effort greater and more elaborate than it really is. The maxim, that if a thing is worth doing it is worth doing well, is indisputably sound, and it has been held and practised by men whose example will always be held in the highest honour. But, nevertheless, it is quite possible to push this optimism too far. It should be remembered by every man, that, if a thing is worth doing, and he can do it, society may suffer by his delay. The claim upon him to use his talent for the public good is at least as strong as upon anybody else. The example, once set, would have many followers; but, if every man hangs back, waiting for some one else to take the lead, there is considerable danger that the advance will not be made at all.

We apprehend that, in writing for many readers, as in speaking to a numerous audience, it is the first experiment that is felt to be the grand difficulty. A man who has been induced, in anticipation of such an ordeal, to make himself thoroughly master of his subject, will not improbably discover that he knows a good deal more about it than those whom he has prepared himself to address, and that it is in his power, on more than a single occasion, to command the attention of persons to whom the subject of his special study is not familiar. It will often happen, too, that the experience gained in the course of business by one solicitor will enable him to supply very valuable and interesting information to many of his brethren whose practice lies in different localities, and who are conversant with quite another class of subjects. If people could only be induced to think that writing for a newspaper is, after all, no such very formidable affair, we are convinced that the columns of this Journal would receive many welcome contributions. Any man who really has something to say, and will say it plainly and compendiously, is pretty sure to find a good many persons who will be glad to listen to him. We believe that it is not the least of the many advantages of the Association that it induces members, in anticipation of the annual meetings, to investigate and prepare for the discussion of matters of the highest professional importance, and thus gives a direction to their thoughts which is likely to survive the occasion on which it was first received.

It must, however, be admitted, that rare experience and discernment often remain an unimproved treasure in the mind for want of the early intellectual training which would have fitted the possessor of them to bring his convictions forcibly and clearly before his fellow-men. And this consideration suggests to us the importance to the solicitor, as to every other highly-trusted servant of society, of the best and most complete preliminary education that can be combined with the exigencies of his purely professional course of study. We believe that no one at all acquainted with English life will dispute that the influence of solicitors who combine legal skill and knowledge with liberal attainments is very great both among their brethren and in the world at large. The late Mr. Lavie may be referred to as an eminent example of what is gained by the union of the best academic and the best professional education. It should be the study of all who have at heart the social elevation of the solicitor, to provide that, in the next generation, the number of such examples may be largely multiplied. The importance of this subject has naturally given it a prominent place at former meetings of the Association. Last year, at Liverpool, the topic was introduced immediately after the chairman's opening address; and the year before, at Birmingham, a paper was devoted to it. We have no doubt that it will again receive a large share of attention at the meeting to be held next month. Whoever feels that he has any complaint to urge against the Legislature, or against society—whoever thinks that the fair claims of solicitors to public employment are disregarded, or that they do not enjoy all the influence and estimation which is their due—let every such person feel assured that the true and certain remedy for all these grievances is in the hands of the solicitors themselves. Give to the young who are now preparing to enter upon the profession the best preliminary education that can be procured, and they will surely make their own way upward in the social scale.

In the week after the gathering at Manchester, the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science is to hold its first annual meeting at Birmingham, under the presidency of Lord Brougham. One department of the meeting will be devoted to Jurisprudence and the Amendment of the Law, and we believe that the reform of the existing bankruptcy procedure will form a prominent subject of discussion. It may be expected that the various schemes of registration, and of improved transfer of land, will also engage attention. The importance of these subjects will not fail to be appreciated at Manchester; and the discussions held and the conclusions arrived at there may be profitably communicated to the meeting which is to follow at Birmingham. There is much, too, in the legislation of the session now just terminated to give unusual interest to the first extensive gathering of the profession after it. The business of the Probate and Divorce Courts is thrown open to all solicitors, and thus an object long contended for by the Association has been at last attained. Herein is matter for congratulation, and for encouragement to further efforts in time to come.

And, besides all the strictly professional claims of the Association upon its members—claims which would be equally strong, and, we hope, quite as readily admitted in any year, and whatever place were selected for the meeting—it must not be forgotten that the Association meets this year at Manchester, and that the Art Treasures Exhibition in that city will still be open, and will, in itself, amply repay the visit. Every truly liberal mind is open to the influences of art; and the same man who desires to raise the character of his profession will be anxious to elevate and purify his own intellect by studying the works of genius. We trust that these considerations will not be lost upon our readers—that the gathering at Manchester will be numerous and cordial—and that much will be done there to promote that thorough union of the profession, both in town and country, which the Association was intended to secure.

LORD BROUGHAM'S BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The Bill to amend the laws relating to Bankruptcy, which Lord Brougham presented to Parliament at the close of the session, was probably intended by his Lordship—as was his Bill relating to the Transfer of Real Property—to be merely experimental. It embodies, no doubt, many of the suggestions which were received with something like unanimity at the recent Mercantile Law Conference; but it cannot be considered anything else than an attempt to deal with some of the most obvious defects in the administration of our present Bankruptcy Law, while it hardly touches the more important and embarrassing questions relating to the conflicting, concurrent, and anomalous jurisdictions which exist for the purpose of administering the estates of bankrupts and insolvent debtors. The main object of the new Bill—viz. to diminish the enormous expenses now incidental to proceedings in bankruptcy—is, however, of so great moment to the mercantile community, that probably his Lordship is wise in confining his efforts for the present to its achievement.

As the law now stands, persons who resort to the Court of Bankruptcy to enforce the payment of their debts, are themselves first compelled to pay, not only the salaries of all the existing judicial and other officers of the Court, but also a heavy annual sum for compensations and pensions to a crowd of former officials, whose functions have been abolished by the Legislature. It is peculiarly hard that this should be so, considering that all these expenses fall exclusively upon those who are of necessity already sufferers, and that the same rule as to the payment of judicial salaries does not apply in other branches of our jurisprudence. It is notorious to all men in trade that scarcely a tithe of the mercantile failures, which should properly form the subject of judicial investigation, come before the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, mainly because of the great risk of loss, where the estate is small, to the creditors who move in the matter, and of the overwhelming costs that must be incurred in any case. From the statistical table furnished to the Mercantile Law Conference by Mr. Commissioner Ayrton, we learn that the average number of bankruptcies during three years in the Leeds Court was only 40¼, and that, out of an average gross sum collected of 748*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, the average amount divided was only 366*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*; so that the ordinary cost of administering a bankrupt estate in the Leeds district, under the existing system, is, in round numbers, fifty per cent. Indeed, it appears that in other districts the results obtained from parliamentary returns are still more monstrous. Out of 2,234 bankruptcies in England, between the years 1849 and 1851, there were 1,270 in which no dividend was paid; and, according to the statement of Mr. Sampson Lloyd, of Birmingham—an authority on the subject—the average expenses amounted to sixty-seven and a fraction per cent., of which the official assignees' charges were nearly nine per cent. We have the authority of Mr. Ayrton for stating, that, in working a bankruptcy with the smallest possible amount of assets—that is, with only £150—at least £100 is swallowed up in expenses.

In order to put an end to this disastrous state of things, Lord Brougham proposes to charge all compensations and annuities now payable under the provisions of former Acts relating to bankrupts upon the Consolidated Fund; to abolish the offices of accountant and broker; to fix the salary of official assignees at a maximum of £1,500 per annum; and to save estates the fees now payable to the court messengers where the judge considers their employment unnecessary. We fear that, however reasonable the first-mentioned proposition may be, or however it may be supported by precedent, in the present temper of the country as to financial matters, there is not much probability of its being carried, especially as the opposite principle has been adopted in the recent Probate and Divorce Acts, under which the suitors will have to bear the burden of compensating for abolished offices. The clause relating to the accountants of the court will probably not meet with much opposition when the Bill comes before Parliament. There is no reason why the creditors, who are the persons mainly interested, should not be allowed to appoint their own accountant. At present, when an estate gets into the Bankrupt Court, almost the only persons who have no control over it are the creditors. One would suppose, that, of all others, they would be at liberty to interfere in the administration of the assets; but the fact notoriously is otherwise. No doubt they are nominally represented by the trade assignee, but it is well known, that, to all intents and purposes of good, he is powerless. Perhaps it was the intention of the Legislature that he should be so, seeing that he is the only functionary connected with the administration of the estate who gets nothing out of it. The appointment of an official accountant is certainly an arbitrary and useless encroachment on the rights of creditors; and, in some cases, it has been found very inconvenient. But the present position of the official assignee, and of the messenger, is a much more serious grievance. Official assignees are paid a per-centage on the amount of assets realised, and also on the dividends paid. In adopting this plan of remuneration the intention of the Legislature was to induce official assignees to exert themselves in the administration of bankrupt estates, and generally to proportion the pay to the work done. Everybody knows that neither of these desirable objects has been attained. Where the bulk of a bankrupt's assets consists of small debts, there is no inducement to the official assignee to trouble himself much about their collection; while, in other cases, his emoluments are extravagantly high. Mr. Ayrton mentions a case in which the official assignee of a banker's estate, with a minimum of trouble, received within the first twelve months £5,000 for his remuneration. Where a bankrupt's property consists mainly of stock-in-trade, the trade assignee, without any compensation for his trouble and loss of time, has the task of converting the stock into money; and, for the mere labour of putting the cash into his pocket, when realised, the official assignee is entitled to charge 2½ per cent., with a further sum of 2 per cent. upon so much of it as finds its way into the pockets of the creditors. Nobody can approve of the system in which such absurdities are of every-day occurrence. It is high time to adopt some other, and Lord Brougham's proposal is to remunerate the official assignee partly by fees and partly by a fixed salary, but so that the entire amount of income should not exceed £1,500 a year. Such a plan does not appear to be open to any serious objection, and it would put an end to a heavy tax which the creditors of large estates now pay without receiving any adequate return.

The case of the messenger is still more unreasonable. Though the bankrupt's estate is vested in the official assignee, another officer, called the messenger, is appointed for the purpose of entering into possession, which is generally an expensive piece of business. According to the good old system, before railways revolutionised our notions of locomotion and its expense, Mr. Messenger is allowed 7*d.* a mile and 30*s.* a day for himself, and 5*d.* a mile and 17*s.* 6*d.* a day for a gentleman to accompany him, when he travels on the business of his office. In some instances, the income of this officer, for the discharge of whose duties no very great amount of intelligence or education is necessary, has nearly equalled that of the judge to whose court he was attached. The Manchester Association for the Protection of Trade has published an account of one case in which the sum divided amongst the creditors was 471*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, while the messenger's fees amounted to no less than 41*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* We need not, then, be surprised, that, as we are informed by a recent parliamentary paper, one of the London bankruptcy messengers returned his his income at £1636 for the year ending 1st June, 1857. Whatever might have been the use of this official under the old bankruptcy laws, when the Commissioners sat only at long intervals, and, therefore, had but little control over the creditors' assignees, he is worse than useless now that the judges sit frequently, and have under them experienced official assignees, who are responsible for their acts. Lord Brougham, however, with a due regard for vested interests, and, no doubt, desiring to avoid opposition as much as possible, does not propose the abolition of the office; but only that "no messenger shall be employed in any bankruptcy proceedings without a written order from the Commissioner by whom the adjudication was made." Assuming that it would be impossible at present to procure the entire abolition of the office of messenger, we entirely concur in this proposal..

Another useful clause in the Bill before us is one to give more general effect to the "arrangement clauses" contained in the Consolidation Act of 1849. For the purpose of meeting difficulties which have arisen from certain judicial decisions upon the construction of those clauses, it is proposed, that, in cases of arrangement by deed, which, under the former Act, would be valid but for an omission in the deed to provide for the distribution of the whole of the trader's estate among the creditors, such omission shall not make the arrangement invalid. A much more debateable clause is that which relates to the distribution of the estates of deceased debtors. Lord Brougham desires that the creditors of a deceased debtor might be enabled to obtain against his estate an adjudication of bankruptcy, and that, for such purpose, the Court should have power to summon before it the "debtor's successor," and, in certain cases, to issue a warrant to secure the property of the deceased debtor. We doubt whether any useful purpose could now be served by such an enactment. Its first and main effect would be to introduce a new concurrent, if not conflicting, jurisdiction—and for what object? What better machinery for winding up a deceased debtor's estate does the Court of Bankruptcy possess than now exists in the Court of Chancery? The truth is, it possesses none half so good or so cheap; nor would it, even if Lord Brougham succeeded in carrying his Bill through Parliament intact. The average length of time employed in bringing a bankruptcy to a close is said to be about 8½ years. We have seen what the cost is. Whoever is conversant with the recent practice of the Equity Courts knows very well, that, with all the odium attached to Chancery proceedings, a creditors' suit in Lincoln's-inn would be infinitely preferable, on the score not only of delay, but also of expense. We are, therefore, disposed to regard this feature of the Bill as a move in the wrong direction.

Other considerations of a practical character have been entirely overlooked. There is at present no effectual audit of the official assignee's accounts. It has been suggested that a proper check might be found in the audit of the trade assignee, instead of the nominal responsibility for the discharge of that duty which now attaches to the registrar of the court; but no provision of the kind is proposed. Neither is any attempt made to put an end to the unseemly contest which has been going on for some time between the Commissioners and the Lords Justices on the subject of bankrupts' certificates. It was proposed by Mr. Wells, of Hull, at the Mercantile Law Conference, that a certain majority of the creditors should have a voice in a matter which deeply interests them, and on which they are likely to be well informed; and this hint well deserves attention.

There are other and deeper questions, relating to the whole subject, which it is to be hoped will receive attention during the recess. There is a general opinion amongst mercantile people in favour of abolishing the legal distinction between persons who are traders and those who are not. Is the distinction founded upon any sound principle; and, assuming that it is, why should not both classes of cases be dealt with by one tribunal? Why should bankruptcy be possible without imprisonment, and insolvency not? Why are Courts of Bankruptcy unable to inflict any other punishment upon a fraudulent bankrupt than what indirectly results from a refusal or suspension of his certificate? And why, in case of refusal, is the bankrupt sent to the Insolvent Debtors' Court for protection to his person, while his estate remains in the hands of the Court of Bankruptcy? And, lastly, why should not the Court of Bankruptcy have jurisdiction in every assignment for the benefit of creditors, without its being necessary to resort to the Court of Chancery to coerce neglectful or unfaithful trustees to discharge their duty to the creditors? The Lord Chancellor has promised to be prepared with a measure next session. We trust that he will not be afraid of grappling with the subject in all its bearings—a task, we admit, of no trifling difficulty.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Aug. 28.

Hooper v. Lane.

The last judicial act of the House of Lords in the late session was to deliver judgment in this dubious and much litigated case. The following report of it is given in the Daily News:—

This was a writ of error from the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The matter arose in an action on the case against the plaintiffs in error, who were sheriffs of Middlesex, for breach of duty in not arresting one Anthony Bacon, against whom the defendants in error (the plaintiffs below) had lodged a capias ad satisfaciendum. The declaration alleged that the writ of the plaintiffs below—for debt, damages, and costs—was delivered to the defendants below as sheriffs, and that Bacon, for a certain time afterwards, was within their bailiwick, and that they might have arrested him, but failed to do so; and that the sheriffs afterwards wrongfully, unjustly, and illegally took and imprisoned Bacon under the false and illegal pretence of another writ, from which custody he was discharged by order of a judge, whereby he escaped from their bailiwick, and the plaintiffs below lost their debt and costs. The action was first tried before Lord Denman, May 12, 1845, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs below on all the issues of fact. The facts which appeared in evidence were, that the plaintiffs below delivered their writ of ca. sa. for 323*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* debt, and 3*l.* 10*s.* damages and costs, against Anthony Bacon, to the then sheriff of Middlesex, on May 20, 1842, and this was delivered over by their predecessors to the defendants below on their coming into office at the end of that year. That a warrant was issued by their predecessors on this writ, but not by the defendants until after Bacon was in custody, as hereinafter mentioned. That on August 1, 1843, a piece of parchment, purporting to be a capias ad respondendum against Bacon, at the suit of one Juan Aramburn, out of the Court of Exchequer of Pleas, which had never been signed by the proper officer of that court, and was therefore void as a writ, and a perfect nullity, and for which there was neither any writ of summons or judge's order, nor was there any præcipe in the office was delivered to the defendants, and information was given to them as to where he was to be found. They thereupon issued their warrant on that piece of parchment to their officer, Swayne, who immediately went and arrested him. A summons was then taken out by Bacon for his discharge from this arrest, which the defendants below did not attend, and he was directed by Mr. Justice Coltman to be discharged; and a warrant having in the interval been issued by the defendants below, under the plaintiffs' writ, under which the sheriff alone detained him, another summons was then taken out by Bacon for his discharge at the suit of the plaintiffs, of which no notice was ever given to them, nor were they called on to attend; and on an objection being raised by the defendants below, who attended that summons, that the plaintiffs ought to have been summoned, Mr. Justice Coltman said there was no necessity for this, as it was the wrongful act of the sheriff which was complained of, and ordered his discharge. Evidence was given, that, had he been properly arrested under the writ of the plaintiffs, Bacon could and would have paid the debt, damages, and costs; and that, immediately after his discharge, he left this country, and they had lost their debt and costs.

Lord Denman directed the jury that there had been no valid arrest of Bacon, that the order of the judge was no justification to the sheriff, and that he was liable for negligence. To this direction a bill of exceptions was tendered by the defendants, on the ground that the jury ought to have been directed that there had been no arrest, or that the order of the judge was no justification, and that it should not have been ruled that in point of law the sheriff had been guilty of negligence. The matter came by writ of error before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in December, 1847, which Court ordered that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that the question of negligence ought to have been left to the jury. The second trial came on before Lord Denman, in May, 1850, and he directed the jury in accordance with the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The verdict was again found for the plaintiffs. Another bill of exceptions was tendered, which was heard before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which Court gave judgment for the defendants in error (the plaintiffs below), thus deciding the illegality of the conduct of the sheriff. The matter was then brought by writ of error to this House. The case was argued last session before their Lordships, assisted by the common law judges, who took time to consider their opinions, which were delivered some weeks since in the present session, when, although there was a difference of opinion among them, the majority agreed with the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber.

The LORD CHANCELLOR now delivered judgment, and went at length into the facts and law of the case; stating that the question was, whether a sheriff, arresting a person on a bad and invalid writ, from which arrest the person wrongfully arrested could claim his discharge, was entitled to detain him, so as to put into operation another good or valid writ, which was also in existence. His Lordship, in an elaborate argument, pointed out the grounds on which a sheriff could not in such a case be considered as a mere agent of all the persons for whom he held writs, but was a public functionary bound by the strict law applicable to each case. The question, whether a sheriff could detain a person arrested on an invalid writ for the purpose of availing himself of other good writs, had been decided in several cases in the courts in Westminster Hall, and especially in a case in the Common Pleas, where it was held that a sheriff in such a case could not be permitted to profit by his own wrong. As that had been laid down by all the Courts, it was not the duty of that House to disturb those decisions, unless their Lordships were clearly of opinion that the Courts had laid down bad law. In this instance he was not of that opinion, the law so laid down having been acquiesced in and acted upon for many years. He was of opinion with the Courts below, that, if a sheriff did an illegal act by taking a person into custody on an invalid writ, and by which he would render himself liable to an action for false imprisonment, that he could not avail himself of that wrongful act for the purpose of enabling him to execute other good and valid writs. He should, therefore, move their Lordships to agree with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and that judgment should be given for the defendants in error.

[Referring to the above case, Baron Bramwell, in his evidence before the Judicial Business Commission, says: "In particular, there is one case which will be in the knowledge of some of the members of the Commission—a case not in my own court, but a case argued in the House of Lords—namely, Lane v. Hooper, in which I will undertake to say, that, if I opened one book, I certainly opened, including those that I opened twice, a hundred."]

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LIVERPOOL, Aug. 27.

(Before Mr. Baron WATSON).

Hatton and Another v. Royle and Another.

Mr. Atherton, Q.C., and Mr. Brett were for the plaintiff; Mr. Edward James, Q.C., and Mr. Rew for the defendant.

This was an action on an award made against the defendant and his late partner, Robertson. The defence was, that the defendant had never assented to the reference.

The partnership was dissolved in 1850, the partnership affairs being left in the hands of Robertson, who was empowered to receive all debts and pay all liabilities. In exercise of this power Robertson had brought an action against the present plaintiffs for a partnership claim, in the name of the late firm; and this action and all matters in difference between the parties were referred to arbitration by a judge's order, made by consent of the respective attorneys. The arbitrator had awarded in favour of the present plaintiffs, finding the claim to be unfounded, and that the late firm of Robertson & Royle was in the plaintiffs' debt to the amount of about £80. Royle, the defendant in this action, had taken no part in the action or reference, not having interfered with the partnership affairs. The plaintiffs being unable to obtain payment from Robertson, brought the present action against Royle. As the liability of Royle under these circumstances resolved itself into a point of law, the learned Judge suggested that a special case should be stated for the opinion of the Court above; and a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to this arrangement.

(Before Mr. Baron CHANNELL and a Special Jury.)

The Local Board of Health of Hull v. The Trinity House of Hull.

Mr. Warren, Q.C., and Mr. T. P. Thompson were for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Hugh Hill, Q.C., Mr. Mellish, and Mr. Milward for the defendants.

This was an action brought for the recovery of 467*l.* 5*s.*, contended to be due from the defendants for their share of a private improvement rate made by the local Board of Health in October, 1855. The property in respect of which the defendants were rated consisted of a plot of ground, with a frontage of 222 yards, which, it was contended, "fronted, adjoined, or abutted on a street not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large."

After the case had proceeded for several hours the learned Judge directed the jury, in conformity with the ruling of the Court of Exchequer in the analogous case of The Local Board of Health of Hull v. Jones, which had been tried at the last Liverpool Assizes, and was in respect of the same rate—viz. that the plaintiffs could not call on the defendants to contribute towards paving, flagging, and channelling of a street which the plaintiffs had themselves made under the Public Health Act and the local Act. The main object of bringing this action was to enable the local Board of Health to contest the propriety of the rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer; and Mr. Warren, with that object, tendered a bill of exceptions, the jury returning a verdict, as in the former case, for the defendant.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)

In re Kemp & Clay.

The bankrupts were bill-brokers of Nicholas-lane. This was their certificate meeting.

The balance-sheet commences in May, 1852, and ends in May, 1857. The bankrupts appear to have commenced with a capital of £1,676, and they owe to creditors £6,494, the liabilities being £28,192, some of which have run off since the bankruptcy. The net profits during the five years are set down at £14,479, while the expenses were £1,959. The doubtful debtors amount to £5,948. The only assets in hand are £220 in cash and the same amount in bills.—Mr. Lawrance, who represented the assignees, did not offer any opposition, and stated that the principal creditors were satisfied with the conduct of the bankrupts both before and after their bankruptcy.

Mr. Hermann, a creditor for £65, opposed, and stated that the bankrupts had been guilty of irregularities in the course of their business, they being in the habit of receiving bills for discount under "approval," passing them over to their bankers immediately, and then offering part cash and part promissory notes at long dates for the respective amounts. He considered that the bankrupts had been expensive in their habits; and, in fact, about the time they were in difficulties, Mr. Kemp had actually given a bal masqué, which had cost upwards of £200.

Mr. Sleigh opposed for Mr. Maude, a creditor for £300 and costs of an action for false imprisonment, and asked for a total refusal of certificates. The bankrupts were not novices in this court, for they had both failed. Mr. Kemp was bankrupt in 1849 for £15,000. The estate paid a most miserable dividend, and a third-class certificate was granted after three months' suspension. He (Mr. Sleigh) then called the attention of the Court to the position of Mr. Maude, whom the bankrupts had prosecuted upon an indictment for obtaining money from them by means of false pretences. Mr. Maude had been acquitted of the charge, and had subsequently obtained a verdict against the bankrupts for £300 in respect of their malicious prosecution. Mr. Maude had been ruined by the bankrupts, who had resorted to this court immediately upon finding themselves defeated upon the trial of the action. In order to obtain funds to defend the cause, Mr. Kemp had assigned his furniture to Messrs. Miller & Horn, his solicitors, and they had made advances. It now turned out that the furniture was still being used by Mr. Kemp's family at Maidahill, where the bal masqué was given. He submitted that the losses (£6,000) and the bad debts must be deducted from the profits before any credit were given to the bankrupts on that ground. That being done, it would be seen that they had not been living upon their profits, but upon their creditors.

The COMMISSIONER inquired whether it would be expedient to try the validity of the bill of sale at common law.

Mr. Lawrance said that his clients were quite satisfied that it was executed bonâ fide; but that, if the Court thought proper, the assignees' names could be used in an action, provided the undertaking were given to pay costs. He could not allow the joint estate to be burdened with the expenses of proceedings arising out of the separate estate of Kemp.

Mr. Sleigh could not consent to anything of the sort.

The COMMISSIONER ordered the question as to the bill of sale to stand over until Tuesday next, in order that Messrs. Miller & Horn might be communicated with.

August 28.

FAILURE OF A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

In re John Townsend.

Mr. George presented a petition against John Townsend, of Greenwich and Charlton, county of Kent, auctioneer and house agent, and one of the members for the borough of Greenwich. The petitioning creditor is Mr. Shepherd, one of the lessees of the Surrey Theatre, for £200 money lent, and the petition was supported by a declaration of insolvency signed by Mr. Townsend, and under those circumstances an adjudication was granted. The liabilities are said to be very heavy.

MR. JUSTICE DAVISON'S DECISION IN THE CUNNINGHAM CASE.

The following is Mr. Justice Davison's decision in the case of Mrs. Cunningham, which has attracted so much attention on this, as well as on the other side of the water:—

"The defendant in this case is charged with a violation of the statute against the fraudulent producing of a pretended heir (2d R. S. 861, s. 51). That the facts proven before me show probable cause of a fraudulent exhibition and possession of a child there is no doubt. The accused puts on the appearance of gestation, announces herself with child by Dr. Burdell, claims to be his wife, speaks of its being born to take his property, simulates pregnancy and labour, provides all the paraphernalia of childbirth, and is found in possession of an infant proved conclusively to belong to another, which she exhibits to the very officers of the law as her lawful legitimate child, and as the child of Dr. Burdell, her husband. I do not attach importance to the question whether she was actually with child or not as being in any way connected with the corpus delicti; a woman might actually be pregnant and delivered of a still-born child, and simultaneously produce a fictitious one, as the child of parents under the statute, and yet be amenable to its punishment. The sham pregnancy and sham delivery are only valuable as strong evidences of felonious intent, and are not of the essence of the crime. Do these facts come within the statute? I think they make out the crime under the revised statutes contended for by the district attorney, and for these reasons: The crime consists of three parts:—

"I. Fraudulently producing a child.

"II. Falsely pretending it to be born of parents whose child would be entitled to any share of personal estate, or to inherit real estate.

"III. The intent of thereby intercepting the proper distribution or descent of such property.

"1. To 'produce' is defined by Webster, second Subdivision, 'To exhibit to the public;' and he quotes Swift:—'Your parents did not produce you much into the world.' It appears to me, the facts in evidence show a fraudulent exhibiting to the public of a child.

"2. Falsely pretending it to be born of parents whose child would be entitled to share in property. The latter part of the sentence is a mere inuendo or explanation of the legal status of the child about which the false pretence is made: whether there was actual marriage or not is not material, as the essence of this part of the crime is 'falsely pretending.' This may be by acts, as well as words, as is the familiar doctrine in the law of false pretences, and, in my opinion, the false pretence is clearly proven by the evidence in this case.

"3 With intent to intercept the proper distribution or descent of such property. This is a pure legal deduction from facts, and, I think, may fairly be inferred from the facts in evidence. In the state of New York, as to the question of bail, all felonies, including murder, are affected by the same considerations. The officer before whom the proceeding is pending—proceeding on the same legal grounds in all cases—the legal question is, the probability of appearance for trial as affected by the nature of the punishment, and the probability of guilt, and of conviction of the crime, if an appearance for trial is made. In this case, the crime is infamous, and punishable to the extent of ten years' imprisonment at hard labour in the state prison; and I find the probabilities of guilt overwhelming from the testimony contained in the depositions before me. Having found that the offence prohibited by the statute has been committed, I can have no legal doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, and, therefore, believe it to be my duty to commit her without bail. In support of this determination, I refer to the recent decision in the case of The People v. Louis Baker and others, on a motion to admit to bail—Cowle, J.—as reported in 10 Howard's Practice Reports, 567, where the power and duty of the court to admit to bail is set forth as follows:—'It seems to be settled by authority that the Court will in all cases, capital or otherwise, exercise its discretionary powers, and admit to bail when, from the testimony under which the accused is held, it is indifferent whether he is innocent or guilty; in other words, when upon an examination of the testimony the presumption of guilt is not strong; and it is particularly called upon to bail in all cases when the presumptions are decidedly in favour of the innocence of the accused;' and again, in p. 571, Justice Cowle says, in delivering the opinion of the Court:—'These principles were approved by the Court in the case of Taylor (5 Cow. 39), which was a case of homicide before indictment;' and in that case, after approving of the rule laid down by Chief Justice Spencer in the case above cited, Mr. Chief Justice Savage says:—'If the facts in the case now before the court afford the same presumptions of innocence, and it appears to the court, from the depositions, that it is quite indifferent whether he is guilty, then, in my opinion, he ought to be bailed; otherwise not.' If I have erred in my construction of the law as applicable to this case, or in my judgment as to the guilt and conviction of the defendant, a speedy remedy by review on a writ of certiorari may be had."

The magistrate then made out a full commitment for Mrs. Cunningham.

PROSECUTION UNDER THE JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT.

The National Savings Bank Association of King William-street, City, was summoned before Alderman Hale, to answer the complaint of Mr. Shuttleworth Bryant—"For that the said National Savings Bank Association having held an ordinary general meeting on the 16th day of July last, did unlawfully neglect to forward the list of names and summary of the capital and shares of the said association to the registrar within the time limited by the Joint-Stock Companies Act, by which the said company had incurred a penalty of £5 for every day such default continued. Mr. Warrand stated that his client had obtained a verdict against the Company for £200 in an action recently tried in one of the superior courts. The Company had given notice that they should move for a new trial, and an application was pending in the mean time that the Company should give security for the payment of the amount. His client thought it would be prudent to ascertain what prospect there was of its being ultimately paid by inspecting any document which might have been filed at the office of the registrar of joint-stock companies, and finding that up to August 7, the last day for filing the balance-sheet produced and laid before the shareholders at a recent annual meeting, that document had not been so filed, he took out the present summons, under the 16th and 17th clauses of the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856, to recover the penalties for such omission.

Mr. Lawrence, in reply, said the notice was quite informal. It spoke of an annual meeting, but the Act only referred to ordinary general meetings, and it would be found that the meeting which had been called in July was not the ordinary general meeting.

This objection having been overruled, Alderman Hale asked Mr. Warrand how he intended to prove that the ordinary general meeting had been held?

Mr. Warrand said he would call the company's solicitor, and examine him.

Mr. George William Brady was accordingly sworn, and said: I was present at a meeting of some shareholders of the National Savings Bank Association, in July last, as their solicitor. Several of the directors were also present. There was no official meeting. No report was laid before that meeting, but I believe a report was issued individually to shareholders. The meeting took place on the 16th July, and was adjourned to the 17th, when there were not enough present to form a quorum. I did not count how many there were, but there were nearer fifty than five. The number present was not sufficient to transact the ordinary business of the association.

Mr. Warrand—Do you know if the directors prepared a balance-sheet to lay before the shareholders at that meeting?

Witness—I must claim exemption from answering that question, as it would only be known to me in the way of professional confidence. The meeting dispersed on the 17th, and no other day was named for any further meeting.

Alderman Hale asked how long the company had been established?

Mr. Brady said about twelve months, and this was the company's first meeting.

Alderman Hale said the evidence went to show that the ordinary general meeting of this association had not yet been held, and the offence charged of neglecting to register within fourteen days after such meeting could not be sustained. The summons was therefore dismissed.

LEGAL STATUS OF AN ENGLISHMAN IN FRANCE.

With reference to a case—that of Parkinson v. Bedenc—which has lately come before the civil tribunal at Paris, the plaintiff's solicitor, Mr. Margary, addresses to Galignani's Messenger the following general statement of the existing law:—"Great facilities are given by the law of France for the arrest of a foreigner when the creditor is a Frenchman, and many an unfortunate Englishman has been incarcerated upon overdue bills of exchange (often obtained from him fraudulently) indorsed to a Frenchman. As, however, in the majority of cases the party is not a bonâ fide holder for valuable consideration, but merely a man of straw, who lends his name for the occasion (technically called a prête-nom), the debtor generally succeeds in obtaining his liberation on showing to the Court the real nature of the transaction, and getting the arrest declared illegal. This, however, requires some time to effect, as, if he succeeds in the Tribunal de Commerce, the nominal creditor appeals to the Cour Impériale, and months elapse before a final judgment can be obtained. In the meantime, the unfortunate debtor must remain in prison, unless he can deposit the amount claimed in the Caisse des Consignations, or give bail; and, as the surety is not only answerable, as in England, for the appearance of the debtor, but also for the payment of the debt and costs in case judgment is given against him and he is unable to meet the demand, it is almost impossible for a foreigner to find a substantial person willing to undertake that responsibility. In England no distinction is made as to liability to arrest between a British subject and a foreigner, as neither can be arrested on mesne process (that is, before judgment), unless the creditor can prove to the satisfaction of a judge that the debtor intends to leave the country. Art. 11, tit. 1, liv. 1, of the Code Napoleon, says:—'L'étranger jouira en France des mêmes droits civils que ceux qui sont ou seront accordés aux Français par les traités de la nation à laquelle cet étranger appartiendra.' It is not, however, sufficient that certain rights are accorded to Frenchmen by the laws of a foreign country for the subjects of that country to enjoy the same privileges in France—the reciprocity must be expressly stipulated for by treaty (see Rogron's note on this article in his Code Civil Expliqué). Now, no treaty exists which puts Frenchmen in England, and Englishmen in France, upon an equality as to arrest for debt, the former enjoying in England the same privilege in that respect as a British subject purely and simply by the law of the land. It strikes me, however, that, if the case were brought officially to the notice of the French Government, they would admit the equity of the claim of British subjects to enjoy in France the same privileges as the law of England accords to Frenchmen in that country, and the cordial alliance which now exists between the two nations, the high sense of justice of the Emperor of the French, and the well-known zeal of our ambassador at Paris, seem to render the present moment peculiarly favourable for obtaining the desired object."

LAW CONFERENCE AT BIRMINGHAM.

A Law Conference will take place at Birmingham, on the 12th of October next, and the four following days. The Conference is to be held under the auspices of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, which is to hold its first annual meeting at Birmingham on that day, under the presidency of Lord Brougham. The leading subject of the Law Conference will be Bankruptcy—embracing practical suggestions from the assembled mercantile delegates, with the view of preparing one general bankrupt statute, to be made applicable, if possible, to the whole of the United Kingdom.

The Right Hon. Lord John Russell, M.P., presides over the first department, assisted by the following gentlemen as secretaries:—J. Stuart Glennie, Esq.; J. Napier Higgins, Esq.; and Arthur Ryland, Esq.

The committee are as follows:—

Abdy, Professor
Barlow, W., Esq.
Bristowe, H. F., Esq.

The directors of the Great Northern Railway Company intend appealing against the decision of V. C. Sir. W. P. Wood. They state that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor would throw the whole loss on the ordinary, including the A and B stockholders, annihilating their dividend for the half-year ended the 30th June, 1857, and depriving the A stockholders of all prospect of dividend till March, 1859; contrary to the intention of the meeting of this company, held 8th July last, when the Bill then before Parliament was approved by a great majority, in the full belief that, if it passed, all classes of stockholders would become contributors to the loss; and it is also contrary to the intentions of the committees of both Houses of Parliament. The Attorney-General has subsequently stated, that he is clear in his conviction, and is so fully assured of the erroneous view of the Vice-Chancellor, that he has advised the directors not to declare a dividend, as they cannot obey the injunction of the Vice-Chancellor without violating the Act of Parliament; and he further advises that the meeting ought to be adjourned, so as to allow of the Vice-Chancellor's opinion being submitted to the decision of the full Court of Appeal.

At the monthly meeting of the Liverpool Town Council, on Wednesday, the Mayor, Mr. F. Shand, presiding, it was moved that the recommendation of the Finance Committee to vote to the town clerk £1,000 for his services during the struggles in Parliament for maintaining the alleged rights of the corporation should be confirmed. Mr. Hugh Hornby, chairman of the Finance Committee, who made this proposition, referred to the Act of Parliament passed last session, by which, he said, the council would, on the 1st of January, be deprived of its trusteeship of the docks, and at the same time would cease to have any control over the management of the duties connected with the port of Liverpool. Mr. Hornby characterised this measure as unjust and arbitrary. The provisions of the Bill, however, were, he said, better than could have been anticipated, and as Mr. W. Shuttleworth, the town-clerk, had been instrumental in obtaining these improved terms, he thought that the council ought to evince its gratitude. Mr. S. Holme seconded the proposal. Mr. Woodruff (senior churchwarden) opposed the grant, on the ground that the town clerk had but done his duty, and that for all he had done he had been paid by an ample salary (£2,500 a year). He moved as an amendment, that the recommendation be not confirmed. The amendment not meeting with a seconder, the original motion was carried. The town-clerk returned thanks.

The election expenses for the East Riding and for the boroughs of York and Scarborough have recently been published, and present some interesting items. In the East Riding there was no contest, Lord Hotham and Admiral Duncombe being re-elected without opposition. The total expenses were 396*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* At the York election there was a contest—the candidates being Mr. Westhead, Mr. Smyth, and Mr. Lewin, and the total expenses were 1,562*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*—viz. Mr. Westhead, 569*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*; Mr. Smyth, 615*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*; and Mr. Lewin, 376*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* The Scarborough election was contested—the candidates being Sir John Johnstone, Earl Mulgrave, and Dr. Bayford. Mr. Thomas Moore was also a candidate before the election, and his expenses are put down at 21*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* Exclusive of Mr. Moore's expenses, the total expenses of the election were 788*l.* 18*s.* 5½*d.*

Mr. R. Pritchard, the election auditor for the borough of Southwark, has just furnished a detailed account of the expenses of the various candidates, in accordance with the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854. The total expense to each candidate is as follows: Sir Charles Napier, 1,219*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*; J. Locke, Esq., 3,880*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.*; A. Pellatt, Esq., 684*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.*

The trial of the Hon. Mr. Stapleton, M.P. for Berwick, Mr. Humphry Brown, late M.P. for Tewkesbury, Mr. Hugh Innes Cameron, and the other persons who were arrested for the alleged frauds in connection with the Royal British Bank, will take place in the Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster Hall, on or about Monday the 30th of November, Lord Campbell is to try the cases.

The benchers of the Inner Temple have, in consequence of the dilapidated state of the premises, given directions to have pulled down, for the purpose of being rebuilt, the whole of the houses on the west side of Inner Temple-lane, extending from the house adjoining the gateway opposite Chancery-lane to the archway at the entrance of the church; and the well-known Dr. Johnson's staircase, and the chambers occupied by the learned lexicographer, are included in the premises which will be pulled down in the course of a few weeks.

At the Sheriffs' Court on Thursday, Mr. Hemp, the principal bailiff, made proclamation of outlawry, and the following were called upon to surrender:—T. Ingram, Richard Chapman King, the Hon. Geo. T. Finch Hatton (commonly called Viscount Maidstone), the Hon. Horace Pitt, Wm. Sowden, Josiah Bartlett, Sir Robert Jukes Clifton, Bart., John Frederick Hill, J. H. W. Harris, Frederick Jones, Wm. Digby Seymour, J. E. Beales, Demetri Prince de Schinas, and Wm. MacOubrey, and Catherine Mary Jane (late Evans), his wife.

Mr. Archibald John Stephens is appointed Recorder of Winchester, in the room of Mr. G. A. Arney, appointed Chief Justice of New Zealand. Mr. Henry George Allen is appointed Recorder of Andover, in the room of Mr. Stephens.

Legislation of the Year.

20 & 21 VICTORIE,* 1857.

CAP. I.—An Act for the Amendment of the Cinque Ports Act.

The chief object of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48 ("An Act for the better administration of justice in the Cinque Ports"), was, to abolish, as courts with special jurisdiction for the redress of civil injuries, the "Cinque Port Courts," held in Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich, under the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports and Constable of Dover Castle; and to assimilate the direction and execution of all writs and process from the superior courts within the Cinque Ports, and the towns of Winchelsea and Rye, to that which is used for other places in England. But, besides the provisions for this purpose, that Act contains others for severing certain members or liberties of Dover, or other of the Cinque Ports (including, among such members or liberties, St. John the Baptist, usually called "Margate"), and for annexing them to the county of Kent, on the petition of the rated inhabitants of such places, and the resolution of the justices of Kent, admitting them to the county on their contributing to the gaols and other buildings. This annexation is to take place by an Order in Council; and, after any such order shall have been made, the justices of Kent are to have jurisdiction in such members or liberties; and are also to raise therefrom their quota to the county expenditure as aforesaid. By the 5th section of this Act, it was further provided, that, from the date of such order, or from "the granting of a charter of incorporation to the said parishes or places, or any one of them, or any part or parts thereof," the provisions contained in 51 Geo. 3, c. 36; 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 135; and 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 105, ss. 10, 11, which enact that the non-corporate members and liberties of Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Hythe, and Rye shall (as distinct from such towns and ports themselves) contribute their due proportion to the payment of rates in the nature of county rates; and to the jurors summoned to serve at the general or quarter sessions of the peace for such towns and ports—shall be repealed, so far as the parishes or places comprised in such order or charter of incorporation are concerned; and it is also provided, that, from the date fixed in such order or charter of incorporation, no court of sessions for Dover, or any justices thereof, shall have jurisdiction in such parish, place, or enchartered district; and that after such date no such parish, place, or district shall be liable to any rate, cess, or impost, to which, as such member or liberty, it would otherwise have been liable.

It has been recently determined by the Privy Council to grant to Margate a charter of incorporation—such town having petitioned to that effect under 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78; but no commission of the peace or quarter sessions has hitherto been granted for the district. The present Act has been passed to obviate the inconvenience which would be occasioned by this, or any other of the above-mentioned members or liberties, obtaining a charter of incorporation, and thereby becoming immediately released from the provisions mentioned in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48, s. 5. It is, therefore, enacted by the present Act, that the 5th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48, shall not, in such case, apply till a commission and quarter sessions shall be granted to the enchartered district.

It is to be remarked that the present suspension of the repeal of the above-mentioned provisions, will not apply to any of the members or liberties of Dover or other Cinque Ports specified in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48, which shall apply for and obtain an Order in Council for their becoming part of the county of Kent.

CAP. III. — An Act to amend the Act of the 16th & 17th Years of her Majesty, "To substitute in certain Cases other Punishment in lieu of Transportation."

This Act (which came into operation on the 1st of July last) is a great improvement on the law as it existed up to that period, inasmuch as it substitutes a simple and intelligible rule for a very complicated one.

The punishment of "transportation beyond the seas," unknown to the common law, was first inflicted by 39 Eliz. c. 4 (see Barrington on Statutes, p. 352); but the statute mainly regulating it up to the year 1824 was 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, many of the provisions of which are still in force mutatis mutandis, though the sentence of transportation itself is now abolished. Most of these provisions, indeed, are expressly extended so as to apply to the new sentence of "penal servitude," by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and the present Act; and these two last (which by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 7, are "to be read and construed together as one Act"), together with that of Geo. 4, may be considered as containing the chief law now in force as to this subject.

The 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, contained provisions by which an offender sentenced to transportation beyond seas, might be confined for a part at least of the term for which he was sentenced in this country, though the time during which the prisoner could legally be so detained does not clearly appear; and it is apprehended that the whole of the provisions of the Act on this subject are declaratory merely of the royal prerogative. (See Brenan's case, 10 Q. B. 492). And, by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 67, the Crown was enabled to change the place of confinement from one prison in Great Britain to another. In consequence, however, of the difficulty in finding places beyond seas proper and willing to receive transports, it was determined, in 1853, to diminish as far as possible the need for such receptacles by diminishing the number of those sentenced to be transported.

With this object was passed the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99; and in it was adopted the singular expedient, of framing a species of sliding scale to be applied to any enactment then in force punishing a specified offence with transportation. Thus penal servitude for four years was substituted in the place of transportation for seven or under; penal servitude from four years to six, in the place of transportation for terms between seven years and ten; and so on. At the same time, the punishment of transportation was retained, when it was awarded by any such enactment for life or for terms of fourteen years and upwards—though a general discretion was vested, by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, in the court, even in such cases, to use the punishment of penal servitude instead—according to the scale above mentioned. The effect of these provisions (which were contained in the first four sections of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99) was found, however, in practice, to be embarrassing, and to involve unnecessary complexity. It was also afterwards considered expedient to do away altogether with the specific sentence of transportation. Most of the other provisions made by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, were found to work well, or at least not to be ripe for any change during the present session.

The Act under notice (20 & 21 Vict. c. 3) deals with this state of things, thus—

First, in order to do away with the necessity for the scale above referred to, it repeals altogether (by s. 1) the first four sections of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99; and, in place thereof, it enacts (s. 2), that, "after the commencement of this Act, no person shall be sentenced to transportation;" and that any person who, but for 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and that Act, might have been sentenced to any term of transportation, may now be sentenced to penal servitude for the same term—the only exception to this being, that, where the transportation might have been for seven years, the penal servitude is to be for not less than three years; and (s. 12) that, where the offender is liable to be transported by reason only of a previous conviction for felony, the penal servitude is to be not less than four years, or more than ten. There is also a general provision (s. 6), that, in any enactment now in force, the expression "any crime punishable with transportation," or "any crime punishable by law with transportation," or any expression of the like import, is now to be construed as applicable, also, to any crime punishable with penal servitude.

Secondly, in reference to the entire abolition of the specific sentence of transportation, partially retained in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, that Act contained a provision (s. 6) for keeping persons sentenced to penal servitude, where it was considered expedient, "in any part of her Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, or in any port or harbour thereof; and this, as far as it went, was sufficient for practical purposes. But inasmuch as the terms of this provision extended only to cases where such persons are confined in parts beyond the seas, in places of confinement appointed under 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, or 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, the present Act (ss. 3, 4) enacts that such persons may be conveyed to any place to which transports might have been conveyed by law; or to any place beyond the seas which may be hereafter appointed under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, as extended by this Act to meet the case of offenders under sentence or order of penal servitude. These provisions of 5 Geo. 4 authorise the appointment of places of confinement beyond the seas by Order in Council; and provide for the effectual removal of the convicts thither by Government contract.

Thirdly, as to the remaining provisions of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, the present Act amends one or two, and preserves the remainder entire. These provisions of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, are chiefly as follows:—

1. To apply to the case of one convicted of a capital offence to whom mercy shall be extended by the Crown on the condition of penal servitude, all the existing enactments and regulations where, in a similar case, the condition was transportation beyond seas (sect. 5).

2. To apply (where consistent with the Act) all previous enactments with respect to transports, to persons sentenced to penal servitude; and, in particular, those of 5 Geo. 4, c. 84 (viz. ss. 10—16) as to the appointment of places of confinement within England and Wales, for the confinement of male offenders (which the present Act extends to females also), and as to keeping such offenders to hard labour in parts of her Majesty's dominions out of England; and also (ss. 17—23, and 26) as to the removal to or from, and confinement in, the places of confinement referred to in that Act, and as to the custody, treatment, management, and control of offenders confined in such places (sect. 7). This last provision of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, is re-enacted in more general terms by part of the 3rd section of the present Act, thus—"All Acts and provisions now applicable to and for the removal and transportation of offenders under sentence or order of transportation to and from any places beyond the seas, and concerning their custody, management, and control, and the property in their services, and the punishment of such offenders if at large without lawful cause before the expiration of their sentence, and all other provisions now applicable to and in the case of persons under sentence or order of transportation, shall apply to, and in the case of, persons under sentence or order of penal servitude, as if they were persons under sentence or order of transportation."

3. To authorise the Crown, by a written order from the Home Secretary, to grant to convicts sentenced to penal servitude "a licence to be at large in the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, or in such part thereof respectively as in such licence shall be expressed," during such portion of the term of sentence, and on such conditions in all respects, as the Crown shall see fit; and also to revoke and alter such licence at pleasure—the convict, while such licence is in force and unrevoked, not to be liable to imprisonment under his sentence; but on its revocation, being liable to be apprehended on a warrant to that effect, and recommitted to the place from which he was originally released, there to undergo the residue of his original sentence (sects. 9—11).

No alteration has been made by the present Act as to these regulations with respect to "tickets of leave," except that by s. 5 the convict, on the revocation of his licence, may be recommitted either to his original place of confinement, or to any other in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude may be lawfully confined.

4. To apply to the sentence of penal servitude the authority or discretion theretofore existing of any Court in respect of awarding other punishment instead of or in addition to the sentence of transportation, so as to preserve the same unchanged (sect. 14).

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—PURCHASE BY SOLICITOR OF CLIENT'S PROPERTY.

Nelson v. Booth, 5 W. R. 722.

Several questions arose in this case, of which the following are the most important:—

1st. Whether a man marrying a lady entitled to an equity of redemption to her separate use, and subsequently paying off the mortgage debt, stands in the place of the original mortgagee? Stuart, V. C., had no doubt that he does. "It is clearly settled," said his Honour, "upon the equities between husband and wife, that, if a married woman be entitled to the equity of redemption of an estate settled to her separate use at the time of her marriage, and the mortgage debt, which leaves to such woman only the equity of redemption, be paid by her husband, he can so deal with such mortgage debt as to acquire for himself and for his own benefit a right to stand in the place of the original mortgagee." And his Honour, therefore, was of opinion, that the husband so paying off the mortgage, and obtaining possession of the title deeds, could, as against his wife and her assigns, retain the deeds till his estate was indemnified. In Bagot v. Oughton (1 P. Wms. 347) L. C. Cowper held, that, where a feme sole made a mortgage and received the money, and married, after which the mortgage was transferred, the husband joining in the assignment and covenanting to pay the mortgage money, the wife or her heirs, upon the husband's death, could not compel an application of his personal estate for payment of the mortgage debt. It would be otherwise, no doubt, if the husband had received the mortgage money; as to which see Tate v. Austin (1 P. Wms. 264), Clinton v. Hooper (3 Bro. C. C. 201), Lewis v. Nangle (Ambl. 150).

2ndly. The question was raised in this case, whether an assignment of the mortgage to the solicitor of the husband and wife, by the husband, without the privity of the wife, as security for a debt due to the solicitor for costs principally incurred in a suit in which he acted for the wife before her marriage, was a valid security against the husband's estate? The Vice-Chancellor held that it was—there being no question as to the existence of the debt, and the husband having a clear right to deal with the mortgage for his own benefit, and to apply it if he liked in discharging the debt due to his solicitor.

3rdly. The solicitor having subsequently purchased from the original mortgagee for £40 a claim of £175, which he would have been entitled to have added to the £400 mortgage, was the purchase to be treated as one for the benefit of the solicitor or of the wife? The argument in favour of the wife turned mainly upon the fact that the solicitor had discovered the existence of the incumbrance while acting for his client (the mortgagor) in his professional capacity. On this point the Vice-Chancellor observed, that a solicitor who, in the course of confidential employment, happened to acquire a knowledge which enabled him to deal with property in which his clients were interested, would never be permitted in a court of equity to avail himself of the benefit of any such dealings. "But," said his Honour, "it is another thing to say, that, if a debt be fairly due to a trustee or a solicitor from his cestui que trust or client, his rights to that debt are so far annihilated that no security which he may obtain in respect of such debt can stand." It was then contended for the solicitor that he was entitled to the full benefit of his purchase of the £175, and not merely to stand as a creditor for the amount which he had actually paid; but it was held that he was only entitled to the sum paid, and to all costs properly incurred. The case is an express authority, if any such were wanting, that a solicitor is not debarred from obtaining from a client security for a bonâ fide debt; while it cannot be considered to encroach upon the doctrine enunciated in Lees v. Nuttall (1 Russ. & Myl. 53), and in Ex parte James (8 Ves. 337)—viz. that a solicitor, acting professionally for a vendor, cannot himself purchase for his own benefit. In Austin v. Chambers (6 Cl. & Fin.)—a case in which a purchase by a solicitor was impeached—Lord Cottenham held, that, if an attorney was not acting as an attorney for his client on a particular occasion—ex. gr. at an auction of the client's property—he might throw off his professional character, and exercise his independent rights. "If," said his Lordship, "he was not acting with a view to the interests of his client, who had been his client before, and was his client afterwards, he had a right undoubtedly to throw off his character of solicitor at that particular time (at the auction), and to exercise the right which belonged to him in another character." At first sight this decision appears to be at variance with a subsequent decision of the House of Lords—viz. Carter v. Palmer (8 Cl. & Fin. 657)—where it was held that the employment of counsel as confidential legal adviser disabled him from purchasing for his own benefit charges on his client's estate, without his permission; and that, although the confidential employment ceased, the disability continued. But there it was assumed that the disability continued only so long as the reasons on which it was founded continued to operate. The principle governing all such cases is, that counsel, solicitors, or other persons in a confidential situation, are not to be at liberty to use for their own benefit, and to the prejudice of their former clients, information acquired while acting for them. But such persons may divest themselves of their confidential relation, and, to use Lord Eldon's expression in Coles v. Trecothick (9 Ves. 247), "contract for liberty to buy." Austin v. Chambers and Nelson v. Booth are authorities to show, that, even without any special "bargain for the right to purchase," dealings by a solicitor with the property of persons who had been his clients are not necessarily voidable; that the disability continues only so long as the reasons on which it is founded operate; and that, where a debt is fairly due by the client, a security obtained from him by the solicitor in respect of such debt is not ipso facto invalid.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATION DEED—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PART PERFORMANCE.

Webster v. Webster, 5 W. R. 725.

Among the many curious reported cases involving the construction of the Statute of Frauds, there is not one, perhaps, in which a more curious question has arisen than in this case. The suit was instituted by a widow against the representatives of her husband and the trustee of a deed of separation, for an account of what might be due to her in respect of an annuity given to her by the deed, under which she claimed to be a creditor. It appeared, that, after the execution of the deed, a reconciliation was effected at the request of the husband, who promised, that, if the wife would return and live with him, the annuity should be continued, and that he would better secure the same by charging it on his real estate. Upon the faith of this promise, the trustee of the deed of separation consented to the wife's return; and she accordingly returned, and lived with her husband until his death, which occurred in the latter end of the same month. Nothing having been done by the husband to charge his real estate, in pursuance of his verbal undertaking, the question for the Court was, whether such an undertaking could be enforced against the husband's estate? In a former stage of the suit, it had been held that the reconciliation and re-cohabitation of the parties avoided the deed of separation; and, therefore, the widow's right now depended solely upon the parol contract to secure the payment of the annuity by a charge upon the husband's land. Stuart, V. C., held that there had been a sufficient part performance of the contract to take it out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds, and therefore decreed that the real estate was charged with the annuity. We do not know of any other case in the Reports in which a return to cohabitation by the wife has been held to be part performance of an agreement within the statute; but whether we consider the case upon the words of the statute, or upon abstract principle, no reason appears why it should not be so held.

JUDGMENT CREDITOR—LIEN—CONTRACT FOR SALE.

The Governors of the Grey Coat Hospital v. The Westminster Improvement Commissioners, 5 W. R. 855.

This is an important decision, bearing on the rights of judgment creditors under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13. The plaintiffs in the suit contracted to sell land to the defendants. Part of the purchase-money was paid, and the defendants let into possession, but no conveyance was executed. The defendants at the time were indebted on judgments, and afterwards became insolvent. A decree was made establishing the plaintiffs' lien, and directing a sale, which took place. The purchaser under the decree required that all the creditors of the defendants, whose judgments were prior to the decree, should join in the conveyance. Stuart, V. C., considered that it was not necessary for them to join; but both the Lords Justices were of a different opinion. Knight Bruce, L. J., said, that "he could see no difference between the case of a mortgagee of the original purchasers' interest, if they had mortgaged it, and that of a judgment creditor of the same purchasers;" and Turner, L. J., had no doubt as to the rights of the judgment creditors against the lien of the original vendor. Their Lordships' decision in effect was, that the judgments were direct charges on the equitable interest of the defendants, under the original contract to purchase.

PRACTICE—INROLMENT OF DECREE OR INTERLOCUTORY ORDER.

Williams v. Page, 5 W. R. 854.

This is the third case in which the present Lord Chancellor has held, that, where a decree of the Court has been properly inrolled, the Court will not be disposed to vacate the inrolment upon any other ground than mala fides, of which speed on the part of the person inrolling will not be considered to raise a presumption. An attempt was made in the argument by counsel to draw a distinction between final decrees or orders (ex. gr. at the hearing of the cause), and interlocutory orders upon matters of practice; but it does not appear that such a distinction has ever been recognised by the Court, and the Lord Chancellor had no doubt that it was untenable. Interlocutory decrees are frequently inrolled, and appeals from them are sometimes heard by the House of Lords. A comparatively recent instance was, an appeal from an order of one of the Vice-Chancellors appointing a receiver, and, the order having been inrolled, the appeal was brought directly to the House of Lords. Lord Cranworth evidently differs from Lord Hardwicke as to the rights and privileges of a person holding a decree. In Anon. (1 Ves. senr. 325), Lord Hardwicke vacated an inrolment, though strictly regular, simply on the ground of its being done too quickly. In Wickenden v. Rayson (3 W. R. 463), Lord Cranworth said, he could not "find fault with any person taking the earliest step to inrol a decree without informing his opponent; nor could it be designated sharp practice; it was in accordance with the principles of the Court, and worked no hardship, considering that the other party had the opportunity of preventing the step by entering a caveat against it." In Backhouse v. Wylde (5 W. R. 245), the Lord Chancellor repeated the proposition, that the Court would vacate an inrolment only where the person obtaining it had been guilty of mala fides; and in Williams v. Page he used similar language, and said, that, whatever might have been done in the time of Lord Hardwicke, there was nothing now to prevent a plaintiff or defendant holding an order of the Court from having it inrolled at once. In the converse case—viz. when the time fixed by the general order is allowed to pass without inrolling the decree—the Lord Chancellor has held that the burden of showing cause does not fall upon the party asking inrolment, but upon the party opposing it. (See Kay v. Smith, 5 W. R. 194.)

II. New Bills in Parliament.

The Bills by which it was proposed to effect further alterations in the law during the short session which commenced in February, and preceded the dissolution of the last Parliament, were few in number, and most of them, with several others, have been again introduced in the new Parliament, and have received, and in their progress will continue to receive, the attention of the Council, so far as the interests of the members of the society and the profession generally may appear to require.

They are as follows:—Probates and Letters of Administration, Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Property and Reversionary Interests of Married Women, Fraudulent Trustees, Joint Stock Companies, Judgment Execution, and the Lord Mayor's Court.

Of these measures, the Council have more particularly given their attention to the Probates and Administration Bill, by which it is now proposed to substitute for the Ecclesiastical Courts a new Court of Probate, unconnected with the Court of Chancery, and assimilating the mode of taking evidence and the trial of causes to the Common Law Courts; establishing the principal court in London, but providing registries of wills in various districts of the country, and giving jurisdiction to the county courts where the property does not exceed £200 personalty or £300 realty. The common form business is to be reserved exclusively to the proctors, and they are enabled to act as agents for attorneys and solicitors, whilst the latter are to be entitled to practise in the new courts in all contentious cases.

The Council have made suggestions for the amendment of several clauses of the Bill, particularly in defining the class of business in which solicitors are to be entitled to practise, the qualifications of registrars and other officers, the admission of practitioners in the District Registries, the tribunal to which appeals may be made from the Court of Probate, and the limitation of district grants of Probate and Letters of Administration, having effect over all parts of England.

By the Divorce Bill a new court will be established, over which the Lord Chancellor and the chiefs of the common law courts will preside with the judge of the Probate Court; and in this tribunal will be vested the power of absolutely dissolving marriages, now possessed only by the Legislature. It is not proposed to give any jurisdiction in these cases to the County Courts; and though the costs of obtaining a divorce will be very largely diminished, and the whole matter decided in one instead of three suits, still the expense will be considerable; but it may be expected that frequent resort will be had to the new courts by parties in the middle classes of society, who were formerly precluded from relief by the enormous charges connected with an action-at-law, a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, and Bills in both Houses of Parliament.

The Fraudulent Trustees Bill will require attention in settling the language of the clauses, lest the difficulty should be increased of procuring proper persons to undertake the duties and responsibilities of trustees and executors. Though an honest trustee, however mistaken in the strict exercise of his duties, need not fear the result of a prosecution, many cautious persons will be inclined to excuse themselves from undertaking an office which may possibly expose them to a malicious, though unsuccessful, proceeding.

The Joint-Stock Companies Amendment Bill also requires to be well considered with reference to the restraints which are proposed to be placed on the proceedings of creditors against the shareholders of the company.

The Judgment Execution Bill, giving facilities for enforcing judgments in all parts of the United Kingdom, received the attention of the Council on several previous occasions, and, subject to some practical amendments which they have suggested, they consider the proposed measure a beneficial one.

The Lord Mayor's Court Bill requires consideration in reference to its jurisdiction by what is called "foreign attachment." The Common Law Procedure Act enables a judgment creditor to attach property of the debtor wherever it may be found, whether within the walls of the city or not; and it seems expedient that the law should be made uniform in this respect over the whole kingdom.

The Council were favoured with a communication from the Colonial Office, with the draft of a Bill to regulate the admission of attorneys and solicitors of colonial courts into her Majesty's superior courts of law and equity in England in certain cases; and they submitted that the authority and control of the judges of the superior courts, to which admission was proposed to be facilitated, should in no way be lessened or altered, either as regards the examination or admission of colonial attorneys or solicitors, who, when admitted, would be in the same position, and be subject to the same regulations, as all other attorneys.

They also considered that residence within the jurisdiction of the courts of this country, and a discontinuance of practice in the Colonial Courts, should be required; and that the admission should bear not only the usual stamp, but also a stamp of the same amount as that payable on articles of clerkship in England.

It appears that, although attorneys and solicitors who have been articled, examined, and admitted in the superior courts of this country are admitted to the courts of many of her Majesty's colonies without further service of articles, there are colonies (as, for instance, Canada) to the courts of which they are not entitled to be admitted without a renewed service there; and the Council suggested the expediency of a recommendation to the authorities in those colonies, that an Act similar to the proposed measure should be passed by the Colonial Legislature. The Council also noticed that the principle involved in the proposed measure might have a wider application than at present was contemplated, and that hereafter it might be contended that the proposed facilities furnish a precedent for a similar measure as between England and Ireland.

A letter was received from the President of the Law Amendment Society, inviting a deputation from the Incorporated Law Society to attend a conference on the proposed amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, the Law of Partnership, the Law of Merchant Shipping, the Law of Principal and Agent, the 17th sec. of the Statute of Frauds, the Law of Banking, the Assimilation of the Commercial Law of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the establishment of Tribunals of Commerce. The Council instructed their secretary to return an answer, stating, that while the Council were not insensible to the importance of well-considered amendments in the law, and were prepared to give their best attention to any specific amendments which might be suggested therein, they did not feel it to be within their province to take part in the proposed general discussion of the extensive range of subjects embraced in the papers transmitted.

At the commencement of the last Session of Parliament, and at the instance of one of the law societies in Scotland, the subject of a renewed application to Parliament to repeal the remainder of the Annual Certificate Duty was considered; but it was deemed inexpedient to take any proceedings for that purpose. The subject was again considered with reference to the new Parliament, but it was deemed that the pressure of taxation at the conclusion of the war rendered it still unadvisable to apply to Parliament.

Correspondence.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

One great blot upon the legal system of Scotland is the law of deathbed, of which it is proposed to give a short account, in the hope that some legal reformer may be found willing to bring the subject before Parliament, and because it is curious and historically interesting.

The Scotch law of deathbed had its origin in early feudal times, and rests entirely upon ancient custom. It is mentioned, though not fully explained, in the Regiam Majestatem, B. II. c. 18, s. 7, in which the following words occur:—"Albeit it is lesome to ilk man to give ane reasonabill portion of his lands to quhom he pleases induring his lifetime, in his leige poustie; nevertheles vpon his deadbed, in the time of seiknes in the quhilk he deceisses, it is not permitted to him to do the samine;" and, lastly, it is said to have been continued to protect the people in Scotland against the designs and influence of the Popish clergy.

By the old law of deathbed, if a man executed a free deed

(that is to say, a deed not granted in implement of any obligation) disposing of any of his heritage while he was ill of the disease of which he afterwards died, the deed so executed was reducible quoad such heritage at the instance of the heir, unless it could be shown that the granter of the deed went publicly to kirk or market unsupported after executing it. This defence, like the right of challenge, rests also upon ancient custom. If sickness was proved at the time of executing the deed, and death followed under circumstances which could infer any probable connection with that sickness, it was presumed to be the sickness of death. No mere interval of time destroyed this presumption; but it might be elided, by proof, that death arose from a different illness not consequent upon that under which the granter of the deed laboured when executing it. Being ill, however, of the disease of which he died, it did not matter that the granter of such a deed was in a perfectly disposing state of mind when he executed it, and transacted all his ordinary business as well as other men; his free deed was reducible, unless after its execution he went unsupported either to kirk or market; and no equivalents for such an act were admitted.

In illustration of this statement of the old law on this subject, the following cases may be examined:—Richardson, July 30, 1635, D. 3210, where a sale of lands, though for a reasonable price, was reduced, because the seller died of the effects of palsy a year after he had, in sound and perfect judgment, sold the lands. Dun, Feb. 25, 1668, where a deed granted by a man who had broken his leg was reduced, because he afterwards fevered, in consequence of the fracture, and died. Lowrie, Feb. 7, 1671, D. 3319, where a number of acts specified were held not to be equivalent to going to kirk or market. Mountainhall's Daughters, Feb. 1683, D. 3320, where it was held not sufficient that a man with gout and palsy had, on one day, ridden from Mountainhall to Edinburgh, calling at Caldecoats, and transacting business; that he had, on another day, ridden by Pepper Mill to Edinburgh, and then to Fisherrow, also transacting business; and that, for long after signing the deed in question, he had transacted all his own business well. And Keirie, Nov. 25, 1687, D. 3321, where similar proofs of vigour were rejected. Although there is a curious case (Livingstone, Feb. 1683, D. 3321) where a party was held not obliged to go to church to ratify his deed, seeing that he was a quaker, and was held to have done enough to validate it by sitting in his shop for several weeks after executing it, selling his goods.

Putting aside this case, the law at this time seems to have been so completely fixed, that it became the custom to go privately, and even at night, into an empty kirk or market for the purpose of validating deeds; which, on Feb. 29, 1692, called forth an Act of Sederunt, which, after narrating the practice, sets forth, that, "for remeid whereof, the Lords declare they will not sustain any such parties going to church and mercate where it is proven that he was sick before his subscriving of the disposition quarrelled, as done in leets, unless it be performed in the daytime, and when people are gathered together in the church or churchyard for any public meeting, civil or ecclesiastic, or when people are gathered together in the mercate for public mercate."

Shortly after this, a desire to moderate the rigour of the old law appears to have arisen; for, in the case of Lady Scotstoun, February 20, 1694, D. 3297, while it was found that a disease, a running sore from a fall, which had been upon a man for three years, was mortal, it was at the same time found, that, going from Edinburgh to Inverkeithing to an election, spending a whole day at sea fishing, and as a magistrate visiting prisoners in the Tolbooth, were equipollents for going to kirk or market. But this case was never followed as a precedent. Two years after this, an Act was passed (1696, c. 4), statuting and ordaining "that it shall be a sufficient exception to exclude the reason of deathbed as to all bonds, dispositions, contracts, or other rights that shall be hereafter made and granted by any person after the contracting of sickness, that the person live for the space of threescore days after the making and granting of the said deeds, albeit during that time they did not go to kirk and mercat. But prejudice always, as of before, to quarrel and reduce the said rights and deeds, if it shall be alleged and proven that the person was so affected by the sickness the time of the doing of the said deeds, that he was not of sound judgment and understanding."

This Act was, of course, a great improvement, and if the decision in Lady Scotstoun's case had been followed as a precedent, the sting would have been taken out of this absurd rule of law. But, either because it was thought that the statute above-mentioned by inference required, that, within the sixty days, the challenge should be elided only by going to public church or market, or because restrictions upon the disposition of heritage were in those days thought desirable and proper, the rule of requiring appearance at public kirk or market unsupported was enforced, and continues to be enforced, with all the strictness of the old law, and tells with more severity now, seeing that public markets have, to a great extent, disappeared. Accordingly, in Black, Dec. 11, 1787, D. 3302, although it was alleged that the granter of a deed had been ill for years with a cough—that he had never been confined to his bed, or even to his house—that he had not been prevented by his illness from going about his ordinary business, and that his faculties to the last remained in full vigour, it was presumed that his illness was mortal, and a deed executed by him within sixty days was set aside. In Maitland, May 16, 1815, F. C., it was held that it was not sufficient to elide the plea of deathbed to show that Maitland, whose deed was challenged, and who was admitted to have been complaining before he left home, went alone from Ballygreggan to Monteith, on the 29th April, to visit his wife's father, and from thence, on the 30th, to the general county meeting at Wigton, and on the following day to a meeting of road trustees. And in Black, Nov. 21, 1816, Hume, 154, it was held not relevant to allege that the disponer had, in various respects, indicated bodily strength, and passed through streets where the market was held, but was not at the time held.

On the other hand, while the defence founded on going to kirk or market has been strictly, it has been fairly, construed. In Laird, July 9, 1763, D. 3315, it was held sufficient that the granter of the deed had gone to a horse-race at which a market was held. In Rait, Nov. 27, 1818, F. C., it was held sufficient that the granter of the deed had gone to the market-place of Aberdeen on a Wednesday, although no market was in use to be held on Wednesday, because the Dean of Guild officer certified that Wednesdays and Fridays of each week are considered the legal market-days. In M'Crachen, Sept. 14, 1821, 2 Mur. 551, it was proved that there was a fish market held in Dumfries every day, and it was found sufficient to prove that the granter of the deed passed through this market on a Monday. In Onniston, May 17, 1821, F. C., the granter of the deed died within two days after executing it, but he had gone to market. It was averred, that he was manifestly ill while in the market. The Court found "that it is a relevant exception to elide a challenge on the head of deathbed, that the testator, after executing his settlement, appeared at kirk or market unsupported; and find that it is not a relevant reply to said exception that the testator, upon appearing at kirk or market, exhibited symptoms of bad health, and of the disease of which he afterwards died."

These cases, read in connection with the short historical statement given of the law upon this subject in Scotland, will show with sufficient accuracy how it at present stands. They will show, also, the narrowness of the points upon which important deeds have hung. But it is only by going to the Reports, and examining the multitude of cases scattered through them for the last three hundred years, with reference to the practical application of the law, that one can form any conception of its absurdity. Hardly a year passes which does not furnish an example of the harshness of the rules which regulate its application; and no modification will ever be satisfactory which applies more than the simple test of whether or not any deed attempted to be set up was executed by the granter while in a sound disposing state of mind.

CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT.—WHO ARE CANDIDATES?

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Much attention will, necessarily, be given to the case of Cooper v. Lushington, noticed in your last number, and to the question of construction involved in it. There are four hundred constituencies, to all of which the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, applies; and I know personally that the question "Who is a candidate at an election?" within the meaning of the 34th section, has, at the recent general election, been repeatedly raised—having myself received several letters of inquiry on the subject. As I have, in print, advocated a different and more extended meaning than that put upon the words by the judge of the Canterbury County Court, I should, in candour, admit thus much at once, as I contend that his decision, under the circumstances of the case, was incorrect. Though I can suppose many cases where it would be difficult to draw the line satisfactorily, I must contend that Mr. C. M. Lushington was clearly within the 34th section and the subsequent interpretation clause. The facts are shortly these:—Mr. Lushington, who at the time of the dissolution was member for Canterbury, issued an address to the electors on the 14th of March. It is notorious that the new writs were issued on the 21st of March. The nomination day at Canterbury was on the 27th. On the 23rd or 24th, Mr. Lushington withdrew. I assume that between the 14th and the 23rd (for, though not reported, I believe it was proved in the case), he canvassed the electors, and otherwise openly and avowedly acted as a candidate within the ordinary and conventional meaning of the term. The question is, was he—what the 34th section terms—a "candidate at the election?" It is somewhat remarkable, that, while the simple word "candidate" occurs nearly forty times in the Act of Parliament, the words "candidate at { the / an / any / or / such } election" occur but five times—viz. in the 4th, 24th, 33rd, 34th, and 36th sections, exclusive of the form in the 31st, and the interpretation clause (the 38th).

The latter enacts, "the words 'candidate at an election' shall include all persons elected as members to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates, or who shall have declared themselves candidates AT or BEFORE such election."

It is plain that this interpretation clause is applicable to the 34th sect., which enacts that "every such election auditor shall be paid, &c., the sum of £10 from each candidate at the election, as and by way of first fee;" and so on. Reading this, and the interpretation clause together, it would seem pretty clear that every person, whether returned or nominated, or one who had simply declared himself a candidate before the election, is liable to pay the fee. The Judge, however, is reported to have decided (and the report is borne out by the facts) that "the issuing of an address merely meant that the party gave notice of his intention to become a candidate at the election; and unless he was nominated, or made himself responsible for other expenses, (! !) his opinion was, that defendant could not be considered a candidate." I conceive that this decision completely ignores the words in the interpretation clause, "or who shall have declared themselves candidates at or before such election." The persons returned and nominated are specifically mentioned; and the latter class of candidates, "at or before such election," is noticed as separate and distinct. Testing it by the questions, what was the object of the Act? and what the evils it desired to obviate? we find, that, consistently with the present decision, this might occur:—A. and B. might start as candidates, in open or secret alliance, but having separate agents. B. intends to go to the poll, and A. bribes for the two. Before the nomination, A. retires, but leaves B. in full possession (if things are well managed) of the fruits of illegal practices. B., however, escapes, and A., according to the Judge of the Canterbury Court, is not obliged to send in to the auditor an account of his expenses. It will not be denied, I presume, that, if the auditor be not entitled to the fee prescribed by the Act, he is not bound to do the duties imposed on him by the Act, as to the non-fee-paying candidates. The interpretation clause, it is true, does not interpret the simple word "candidate," which is the word used in the 17th and subsequent sections, treating of the mode of payment of candidates' bills; but I incline to the opinion, that the interpretation clause applies to the word "candidate" throughout the whole Act having regard to the context, in which it is invariably found—just as if the words "candidate at an election" were repeated each time. This view is strengthened by the circumstance, that the first time the word "candidate" is mentioned is in the 4th section, and then in company with the words "at an election." Thus, "every candidate at an election who shall corruptly," &c. I conceive, that, wherever the word "candidate" is subsequently inserted, it relates to the description of candidate first mentioned; and the clause interpreting the words "candidate at an election," and not the word "candidate," is an additional argument, as it appears to me, in favour of this view.

In practice, this view has been generally adopted, for, in very numerous cases, much weaker than Mr. Lushington's, the accounts have been sent to the auditor, and his fee paid. The published parliamentary returns show this.

But whether I am correct or not in this respect, what is the ground upon which it can be said that Mr. Lushington was not within the 34th section, precisely interpreted by the 38th clause to apply to just his case? Is the word "before" in the latter clause meaningless, or mere surplusage? To what case could it apply, if not to such a case as this? I can well understand that much difficulty would occur in attempting to draw the line, and say when "before the election" ceased, and fixing the furthest period back to which it could apply. But where a man is a candidate, and acts as such on or after the writ being issued, I should think the Act is clear from ambiguity. If a man, some long time previous to any vacancy or any writ being issued, expressed his intention, by address or otherwise, of becoming a candidate, he is not de facto a candidate. He intends to become one. But in the presence of an actual or imminent vacancy, much less on and after the issuing of a writ, I should have thought that a person issuing an address, and asking for votes or support, explaining his principles, &c., was as much within the letter as the clear spirit and scope of the Act. Shades of difference there would and must be in such cases; but that Mr. Lushington should have been held, under the reported facts, not to have been a "candidate at or before the election" of 27th March, when he resigned so late as the 23rd or 24th March, the writ being issued on the 21st, passes my comprehension.

This is a point on which the able criticism of yourself and your learned correspondents may be usefully exercised. For my part, I regret that it has not been decided by special case, by consent, in a superior court. One thing is perfectly clear: the Act, as usual, could be more explicit.—Your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. LEWIS.

PRACTICE IN CHANCERY.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Allow me to call the attention of your readers to the following anomalies in the practice of the Court of Chancery:—

1. A defendant has fourteen days to answer, but if, having put in an insufficient answer, he submits to exceptions, he has actually a longer time to answer than he had originally—viz. three weeks from the submission.

2. That, although a defendant is bound to answer within fourteen days, a plaintiff has six weeks within which to except to the answer.

3. That, from the fact of a voluntary answer being obliged to be put in within twelve days from appearance, and interrogatories not being required to be filed till sixteen days after service of the bill, it may, and, indeed, has happened, that the time for the voluntary answer expires before the plaintiff is bound to file interrogatories.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Sept. 2, 1857. A SUBSCRIBER.

Review.

The New Practice of the County Courts, &c. By JAMES EDWARD DAVIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Butterworths. 1857.

The Practice of the County Courts. Second edition. By HERBERT BROOM, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. With the Practice in Insolvency, and under the Protection, &c., Acts. By LEONARD SHELFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Maxwell. 1857.

We confess to having nursed a gentle hope that we had performed our duty in the matter of county court practices, so far as the year 1857 was concerned. The courts themselves, though in a general point of view highly interesting, are scarcely so in the details of their practice. And except within the narrow limits of the County Court Acts themselves, the principles on which their procedure is or should be based, are those which obtain in all other courts of justice. We, therefore, prayed that our notices of Messrs. Archbold, Lloyd, Morgan, Pollock, and Nicol might suffice.

> "Now our weary lips we close—> Leave us, leave us to repose."

It was not, however, so to be. The two works of which we have prefixed the titles have for some time challenged our inspection; and we address ourselves to the task the more willingly, that we have ourselves somewhat to say about the county courts, which is not to be found in these or in any other treatise; for we defy the most industrious workman to keep pace with the national manufactory, which coins law with the rapidity of the Mint, and spoils your page before the printer's ink has fairly dried on it. But let us first tell our readers what we think of these two fresh candidates for the favour of the profession.

Mr. Davis has written under considerable difficulties. Not long ago he published a "Manual on County Court Practice," with which he combined an essay upon the law of evidence.

At the time of the passing of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, the stock, it would seem, had not sufficiently diminished to render it prudent, commercially, to withdraw the Manual previously written from circulation. And yet we doubt whether that plan would not, in the end, have proved the wisest one; for we learn from the preface to the work before us, that it is both intended as a supplement to the "Manual of Practice and Evidence," and as a self-contained and sufficient manual for such purchasers as may prefer to look at it in that light. Now, to supplements of all kinds we have an especial aversion; and, of all the race, we consider that which is appended to a book of practice the most noxious. What! shall we toil and labour in the "Manual" to learn that a notice is to be signed by A.; and then, a week after it has been delivered, be told by the "Supplement" it is to be signed by B.? And yet, such is the nature of the disappointments which must wait on those who buy both of Mr. Davis's works. And there is not only much danger of committing mistakes, but it is intolerable to the reader that the labour and responsibility of comparing enactments, and drawing therefrom the proper conclusion, should be shifted to his own shoulders from those of the author—their proper bearer. On the other hand, to buy the Supplement without the Manual requires more faith than is usually given to man. An uneasy feeling constantly pervades the mind, that the author, in his care for the recent enactments, has omitted something of moment which is to be found in the larger treatise. And this state of mind is further irritated by seeing (as in the Supplement before us) "See Manual of Practice and Evidence, 2nd edit., pp. —," perpetually repeated. This being our opinion, we do not care further to speak of Mr. Davis. We neither approve nor condemn the way in which he has executed his task, because we think the objections above stated are fatal to the usefulness of the whole design.

Mr. Broom was either more fortunately situated with regard to unsold copies of his former edition, or he agrees with us, and the old adage, as to the difficulty of sitting upon two stools. Here, indeed, we have, instead of only half a work, two separate works by a pair of authors in a single cover. It is something quite of modern invention (except so far as Reports of Cases are concerned) this method of auctorial partnership—at all events, where the names of the members who compose the firm are honestly disclosed. Sometimes the division line of labour is carefully veiled; but, occasionally, all is above board; and, in the present instance, the reputation of either author is so high that neither need blush at his companionship. If the Reader at the Inner Temple is well known as a scientific and thoughtful jurist, Mr. Shelford is also recognised as the best editor of an Act of Parliament now amongst us. And we doubt whether any work could appear with greater promise, than one published under their joint auspices.

The expectations which we justly formed have been, in a great measure, realised. We think, that, on the whole, and for general purposes, the present County Court Practice is the best that has hitherto appeared. It is a great comfort not to be obliged to carry about a library; and here it all is in a single volume; not merely a very fairly complete treatise on the matters for which these courts were primarily established—viz. the recovery of small debts and demands—but the different jurisdictions which subsequent Acts have heaped upon them in profusion are here sufficiently detailed. We own that we should ourselves have preferred these latter to have been chronologically arranged, rather than that any attempt should be made to classify what has been the result of the merest chance. There is no reason, for example, that we can see, why the Chapter on the proceedings under the Merchant Shipping Consolidation Act, 1854, should precede that which describes those under the Mercantile Marine Amendment Act, 1851; or why the Succession Duty Act of 1853, should divorce two statutes of the respective years of 1856 and 1855.

How strangely characteristic are these tribunals of the manner in which most of our municipal triumphs—nay, our constitution itself—have been painfully elaborated by successive changes and the additions suggested by experience. When Lord Brougham was manfully struggling to establish his favourite scheme for providing local, and consequently cheap, justice for the defrauded tradesman or helpless workman, did it ever enter his head that the same machinery would be made applicable to such a various jurisdiction as these courts now possess. We doubt whether any but those who have studied it with some pains, are at all aware of the extent of this variety; and an enumeration of the subjects now intrusted to the county court judges will form, perhaps, the most interesting result that we can produce from materials in part afforded by the books under consideration.

In addition, then, to the jurisdiction originally bestowed upon them in 1846, in reference to the recovery of small debts and demands, the judges of these tribunals have now, under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, to hear the petitions of insolvent prisoners confined in country districts, and the petitions of those who apply for relief under the Protection from Process Acts; and also cases arising against judgment debtors, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. By the Absconding Debtors Arrest Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 52), they are enabled to arrest such debtors till a capias ad respondendum can be obtained, in due course, from a judge of the superior courts. The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 31), conferred upon them power to adjust disputes between such societies and their members; and by the Succession Duties Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), a similar authority was given them in disputed assessments under that statute. The same year laid on them duties under the Customs Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), and as to Charitable Trusts (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137). In the year following they were visited with the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), and the second Common Law Procedure Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125). In 1855 the execution of judgments of the Stannary Courts below £50 was intrusted to them by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 32; and also the settlement of disputes occasioned by the Nuisances Removal Act for England (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), and by the Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) of the same year. Last year they got off cheaply, being only saddled with the winding up in certain cases of joint-stock companies (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47); being authorised to use the machinery of the summary procedure on bills of exchange and promissory notes in cases where the amount due falls within the limit of their £50 jurisdiction (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 4; Order in Council, 30th of January, 1856); and being enabled to receive acknowledgments from married women (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 73). In the session which has just concluded, as we have above intimated, their services will now be also required to carry out the new scheme for proving wills and administering the estates of intestates; it being enacted by the 54th section of the Act "To amend the Law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration in England" (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), that, where a testator or intestate had, at the time of death, his fixed abode in one of the districts specified in the schedule to the Act, and his personal estate, in respect of which probate or letters of administration are to be granted (exclusive of what he had as trustee, and not beneficially, but without his debts), is under £200, or his real estate (if any) is under £300, the judge of the county court for the place where such abode shall be, shall have the contentious jurisdiction and authority of the "Court of Probate," established by the Act in respect of questions as to the grant and revocation of probate or letters, in case there be any contention in relation thereto.

In regarding this vast field of jurisdiction, it is not easy to avoid the reflection, that, when county courts were first established, the arrangement of districts, of judges, and of officers was on far too large and expensive a scale; or else that the primary object of their invention must now be very inefficiently performed; or else that the array of statutes above cited have been passed in order to meet cases so rarely occurring in actual practice, as not to require the interference of the Legislature. We are inclined to fear that the second is the true solution of the question; and that, though much justice is done in these courts, it is, (chiefly from the judges being overworked), of that rough sort which scarcely befits the polished age in which we live. The remedy for this is, a re-distribution of districts; an increase in the number of the courts, and the frequency with which they are held; and, above all, the discovery of some means to draw the decisions of the judges more prominently and more cheaply, under the superintendence of Westminster Hall.

Judicial Business Report.

JUDGE COLERIDGE'S EVIDENCE ABRIDGED.

(LORD CAMPBELL in the chair).

What would be your opinion with respect to the Welsh counties; would you be for grouping the counties, and holding assizes at one place for several counties?—I should think it the best thing to be done if the thing is possible.

Are you aware that that was thought of by the Commission of 1828, and that the circuits were arranged by the then Mr.

Justice Bosanquet, and that there was such an outcry on the part of the Welsh gentry that they were forced to abandon it?—I am aware of that fact, and that was in my mind when I said, if it were possible.

Are you of opinion that twelve judges would be competent to transact all the town business, supposing the circuits could be altered so as to embrace six; or any other scheme might be adopted by which fourteen judges or fifteen judges would not be wanted for the circuit? Are you of opinion that the town business could not be transacted in a satisfactory way?—I think before one answers that question, you must determine what you mean to be the ordinary number of judges sitting in Banco.

That would of course necessitate the ordinary number of judges sitting in Banco to be three?—Then, I must say, I think that that would be a very objectionable change. No doubt three, or even two judges may dispose of a great deal of the business of the court as well as four, and perhaps more rapidly; but I think that in all difficult cases it is better to have the mind of four than the mind of three, and, according to my observation and experience, it is found that three judges hardly decide with so much consideration, and they differ with greater readiness than four judges do. This is not unnatural. The doubts or difference of one are adhered to with less misgiving as against the opposite judgment of two than of three minds; and there is, on the other hand, less chance of there existing a scruple in the minds of two than of three. Every judgment which is pronounced with a difference of opinion has not only less authority in itself, and gives less satisfaction, but is almost certain to lead to an appeal or a writ of error in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which is a great evil; where you gain time in one step, you lose it in another.

Then, if the number of four judges were continued as the normal number to sit in Banco, you think that the business in London could not be accomplished by twelve judges?—I do not think it could, satisfactorily. Besides, I quite agree with the letter which I have been reading of the late Mr. Baron Alderson, that people out of the profession have not ordinarily the least idea of what the chamber work is; how very important it is, how much of it there is, and what it has grown to.

The fact is, that a great deal of business is now transacted at chambers which formerly used to occupy the full court?—An immense deal; and there is this to be remembered, that if your ordinary number of judges in Banco is three, you will be constantly sitting with only two; as we often now sit with three, the ordinary number being four.

You make no provision for the accidental absence or illness of one judge?—No; but it happens not merely from these causes: it occurs many days in the course of every term, from one judge being at Nisi Prius, and one going to chambers, or attending the Court of Criminal Appeal, which usually sits for two days in the term. With respect to the alteration of the times for holding the ordinary circuits, it will be important not to make the second circuit later in the year than it is at present. I have always remarked that the common jurymen, who, by a strange and unjust practice, are almost exclusively drawn from the small farmers and small tradesmen, and yet get no payment at all for their attendance in a criminal court, find it extremely inconvenient to have the assizes during the harvest; they complain very much now of being drawn away from the hay harvest, and to draw them away from the corn harvest also would be a very great additional evil in the agricultural counties.

Will you state your opinion upon the expediency of a third assize for civil business?—My opinion is certainly that it is not at all necessary. I think that the greater number of causes are tried now quite as soon as they ought to be from the time of their commencement. I have been very lately sitting much at chambers, and I do not think that gentlemen not in the profession are aware how very soon the smaller causes come to trial—within a month, or six weeks at the outside, from the time of the commencement the cause is very often over, and there is execution for the debt. And in the heavier causes, I am sure that there is extreme difficulty for the parties to get their pleadings at all into shape within the time allowed by the rules. I suppose that not one cause in a hundred occurs without repeated applications to a judge for more time. The number of special pleaders and pleading barristers who are in much of that kind of business is not very large, and, having lately sat at chambers a good deal, I should say that the attorneys really have great difficulty in getting their papers in time, either into or out of the hands of their counsel or their pleaders; and that very often amendments are necessitated and considerable expense incurred because the thing is done more rapidly, and therefore inconsiderately, than it ought to be done. Very often you cannot at once get the precise information you want; indeed, you hardly know at first what you will want; the first answer suggests a second question, especially when the cause turns on rights of way, rights of water, customs, or prescriptions, and matters of that kind; and thus in country causes two or three posts are lost out of eight or ten days, when nothing can be done. No careful pleader, I suppose, likes in such matters to let his pleading finally pass from him to the other side until it has been submitted in a finished state to his client. As to mere money causes, it should be remembered also that a great number of them come to London without waiting for the country assizes. Causes for debts come to London or Middlesex, where they are now tried at the sittings in and after term, at a smaller expense than they would be in the county town.

I venture to make this remark with respect to the number of judges and circuits, and, having perhaps less personal interest in it than any other judge, I may make it with the less scruple. I think it is not at all desirable that more work should be put upon the judges than they now have to do; this work being not merely that which the public see, but including a great deal of reading and writing of which the public know nothing but in its results. If you make it impossible for a judge to go into society, or to cultivate liberal pursuits, you not only do him harm, but eventually you do very considerable harm to the profession; and whatever is in this sense injurious to the profession is equally so to the public. What I say about judges, I say also with regard to barristers. I think that they should have their times of relaxation. It would be a great pity to keep the one or the other in town when all other society is out of town, and it would be a great pity to oblige them to go out of town when all other society is in town. If you deprive them of the means of improvement which social intercourse out of their profession and literature afford, you do them great injury, the consequences of which must be felt by the public; for you cannot prevent theirs being a powerful agency on society.

Have you seen the letter of the late Mr. Baron Alderson to Mr. Gladstone?—I have been reading it since I came into the room.

Do you think that his scheme is a practicable measure—viz. to have three associated judges with a vested right to be appointed?—I must say I think it is utterly impracticable. I do not think it would work well.

Coadjutor judges?—Coadjutor judges. Of course I do not mean to say that a Queen's counsel or a serjeant who is upon the circuit does not try his prisoners as well as a judge; but he is not often thought to do so by the parties most concerned and the uneducated standers-by; much, too, of that external circumstance which impresses them is lost, and it is not at all satisfactory, I think; and for a person to have acquired a vested interest in a judicial situation by an appointment of that kind, while he is still practising as a barrister, would be full of evil.

Has the business to which the judges have to attend in London much increased of late years?—No. Speaking for myself, I should say that my work is lighter now than it was for the first seven or eight years after I was appointed judge. My case may be peculiar, for we had in our court an immense arrear of business when I first came there.

Does the time occupied in court and in chambers combined amount to a larger extent of time than it did twelve or fourteen years ago?—I do not think it does; it is rather that the quality of the business has altered than the quantity. At that time we had a great deal of work at chambers, which consumed time, and was wearying, but was almost ministerial, if I may say so, which other persons might have done quite as well as the judges. Now we have, I think, a good deal of work at chambers, some of which had much better be done in court than at chambers, where we have not the help of the bar. It is something, too, that we have no public with us at the time.

Are you of opinion that your business as a puisne judge has diminished of late years?—Yes; I think it has in this respect. We are very much relieved in the Court of Queen's Bench from what we had for a great number of years—viz. long post-terminal sittings.

We understand you to think, that, without considering the circuits at all, there ought for the London business of all kinds to be fifteen judges?—I think so.

That turns upon your opinion, that there ought always to be four in Banco?—To a great extent it does, and I think that should be the ordinary number. There is no evil in an occasional departure of one judge; three go on for a time probably quite as well as the four, but if you have three as the ordinary number, beside the objection to the reduction in itself, it will be equally likely to be reduced very often to two. I attach some importance to bringing all the banc business, if possible, into term. I think it would be done much more regularly, and with more despatch, if it was all done as part of the term business, instead of there being sittings after term in error. I would lengthen each term for the purpose of bringing into it the whole business. This business would be transacted as a part of the regular business, and would be done more satisfactorily; besides which, we should always secure the attendance of the Chief Justices and Chief Baron, to which, I confess, I attach very great importance. Whatever tends to increase the authority of decisions by the Court of Exchequer Chamber tends to diminish writs of error to the House of Lords, and so diminishes delay and expense in litigation. All the error business should be in term, and the business of the Court of Criminal Appeal should be in term—every thing should be done in term on which the judges sit in banco. In addition to the reasons for this already suggested, I should wish to add one of considerable importance—the convenience of the bar, whereby you advance the interests of their clients. Important business in banco and at Nisi Prius ought not to be going on at the same time, especially in places so remote as Westminster and Guildhall, if you wish clients to be at all secure of the attendance of the counsel whom they have selected, and in whom they trust, and without whose help they do not believe that their cases have been satisfactorily heard. This rule would be much more nearly observed according to my suggestion, and counsel would have little excuse either for being absent or unprepared when their case came on.

Registration of Titles Report.

SUGGESTIONS BY MR. COOKSON.

An accurate and perfectly secure system of land transfer, which shall at the same time be simple, expeditious, and cheap, will be a valuable acquisition to the owners of land in this country, and a boon to the public at large.

If simplicity, expedition, and accuracy can be carried to the extent of giving to a purchaser of land, immediately, a simple and absolutely safe title, at a comparatively trifling expense, great additional value will be conferred on land.

It is believed that such a system of land transfer may be contrived, and an attempt will be made to show how by means of a register.

It will probably be admitted to be impossible, having regard to the enormous expense and delay of such a proceeding, and of the danger of acting on ex parte evidence, to ascertain finally and conclusively, so as to bind all the world, by means of Commissioners or otherwise, the present state of title to and ownership of every piece of land and every incorporeal hereditament in the kingdom, as a preliminary to a simple system of land transfer.

If it were possible to do this, and if every owner in fee could be registered as owner, and if, in all other cases, trustees, to be named by the parties interested or by the Commissioners, could be registered as owners, a simple system of registration might be commenced, embracing at once all the land in the kingdom; but such a proceeding is assumed to be practically impossible.

It is also assumed that no plan will be acceptable which shall interfere with, or directly or indirectly enlarge or abridge, existing estates, rights, or interests in land, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy. Whatever quantity or quality of estate, right, or interest any man may have in land when a new system of land transfer comes into operation, he must have afterwards, until, by some act or default of his own, he alien or lose it.

In the investigation of titles to land three important questions arise:

First,—Do the title deeds disclose a clear title to the lands described in them?

Second,—Does that description of the lands comprise all the lands intended to be dealt with?

Third,—Is the actual possession or occupation of the lands consistent with the title as disclosed by the deeds?

For it must be obvious that though the deeds may show a clear title in A. to the lands described in them, these may not be the lands intended to be dealt with; and when the first and second questions are answered in the affirmative, yet, unless the person in possession is holding as the tenant of A., or such possession is shown to be consistent with the title of A., the title cannot be safely accepted.

In the absence of any special restriction in the contract for sale the purchaser is entitled to expect that a clear title, showing all the dealings for sixty years past, with all legal and equitable interests in the land, will be deduced. Experience has shown that ordinarily the deduction of a title for sixty years is necessary to give a purchaser a reasonable assurance that he may peaceably enjoy and safely sell what he has bought and paid for.

A title for the requisite period being deduced to land which may be that which the purchaser has bought, it must be shown that it is the same; the identity must be established. He must also ascertain that the possession of the occupier is the possession of the vendor.

The bulk of the expense incurred by both vendor and purchaser is generally occasioned by the deduction and investigation of the title for sixty years, as that title appears on the title deeds; and it is to the simplifying of the evidence of this sixty years title that attention must be directed.

Under the present system, if A. purchase an estate, and investigate, at great expense, the title to it in the most careful and searching manner, with the assistance of an experienced solicitor, aided by the advice of eminent counsel; and if A. afterwards sell or mortgage the estate to B., all the expense of investigation of title which was incurred for A. has to be incurred for B.; and there is no way of preserving or continuing, for the benefit of B., the labour of A.'s solicitor and counsel. For there is no evidence on which B. can rely, that A.'s solicitor has seen all the deeds, or that an accurate abstract of them has been laid before counsel, or that serious objections to the title may not have existed, which have been overlooked or waived for a pecuniary equivalent, and so on.

And thus it frequently happens that eminent contemporaneous counsel have before them successively the same title to advise upon, at longer or shorter intervals, in the course of their professional career.

Again, a large estate held under one title may be divided for sale into a great many lots, the purchaser of each lot has his own solicitor by whom the title is to be investigated on his behalf. An abstract of the title is delivered to each purchaser, and there may thus be fifty different solicitors, assisted by fifty different counsel, engaged at the same time in the investigation of the same title to the several lots into which one estate has been divided; and sometimes the same counsel is consulted again and again on the same title. In this case there is an advantage to the counsel, but the expense to the purchasers is not diminished.

In the present state of the law, land is capable of being limited to successive persons for life and to unborn persons in remainder, and in various other ways; and charges may be created upon it, for jointuring widows and portioning children, and for numerous other purposes; and no desire is felt to restrain or limit the power which an owner now possesses over his land. Indeed, the desire would rather be to increase his powers and facilitate their exercise.

Stock also is capable of being settled on successive persons for life, and on unborn persons in remainder, and in various other ways; and charges may be created on it, for jointuring widows and portioning children, and for various other purposes. In such cases the stock is transferred into the names of trustees, who hold it on the trusts declared by a separate instrument; but the instrument is not noticed in the transfer books; and the trustees, if not restrained by distringas, may at any time sell the stock, and the purchaser will have a good title to it against all the world.

It has been frequently objected that any system of transfer of land, in any degree resembling the transfer of stock, would open a door for fraud; and that, under such a system, estates, when in settlement, may be lost altogether by the misconduct of the trustees.

An objection of this kind must not be disposed of by à priori reasoning, and if it be weighed in the balance of actual experience, it will probably be found very unsubstantial.

Under the present system, nearly all well-drawn settlements of landed estates in this country contain clauses empowering the trustees to sell the estates, and to invest the purchase money in other estates to be settled to the same uses. The power is usually to be exercised with the concurrence of the tenant for life, if living, but if dead, at the sole discretion of the trustees; and in either case the purchase money remains under the control of the trustees until reinvested in the purchase of land.

And it must not be forgotten that a very large portion of the land in this country is in mortgage; and that, inasmuch as, under the present system, a mortgagee usually has a power of sale, which he may exercise without the concurrence or knowledge of the mortgagor, nearly all the land in mortgage is, and has long been, in the position in which it is alleged that land cannot be safely placed! Experience has shown that the power of sale vested in the mortgagee is very rarely abused, and it is uniformly given without hesitation.

It is further to be observed, that a very large proportion, probably two-thirds, at the least, of mortgages on land are held by persons who are merely trustees of the money, and have no beneficial interest in it. There can be no doubt that many millions of money are at this moment invested on mortgage where the mortgagees are trustees under settlements or wills, and have no beneficial interest in the money. Such mortgagees are, in fact, trustees of the land subject to the mortgage for one party, and trustees of the fund secured by the mortgage for another; and the land and the money are both unhesitatingly placed in the position in which it is alleged that land cannot be safely put.

Neither must it be forgotten that there are nearly £800,000,000 of money in the funds, of which a full proportion (probably one-half) is already in the position in which it is alleged that land cannot be safely placed; and that millions on millions represented by shares in railways, and canals, and docks, and other public companies are similarly circumstanced. What has been found practically safe for them, cannot, it is presumed, be otherwise than safe for land.

But, in addition to all these considerations, the system of distringas, subsequently recommended to be applied to land transfers, will completely protect the landowner from injury. It will be his own fault if he ever suffer under the proposed system from abuse of power by a trustee or mortgagee.

It is proposed that an office shall be opened for receiving, classifying, indexing, and filing all transfers of land. That there shall be an index for each county, and an alphabetical index for all the parishes in each county; with an alphabetical index for each parish, to contain the names of all persons who shall register transfers of land in that parish. That, on and after the day named, where any dealing with land takes place by a person entitled to or having power over the whole fee-simple, a transfer shall be executed, conveying the whole fee-simple to one or more persons absolutely. That such transfer shall be on parchment in original and duplicate, in a simple printed form, and shall express the true consideration, and shall transfer the property described in the schedule to the purchaser, or mortgagee, or trustees, who shall thereupon become the registered owner. That both parties shall sign the instruments, in order that the signature of the purchaser may be on the register as a check on any future transfer by him. That both parts shall be lodged at the Transfer Office, and compared with each other there, and that the duplicate shall be filed and entered in the index, and the original returned, stamped as registered to the registered owner; or the original may be filed and the duplicate returned. That it shall be competent for, if not obligatory on, parties to add a map to the schedule, for better describing the lands. That the validity of the title of the first registered owner shall depend, as it does now, on the validity of the title of the party making the transfer; so that the first registered owner must investigate the title—the legal and equitable title—as he does now. That when the first registered owner shall afterwards sell to another, say at the end of ten or twenty years, the purchaser will see on the register the evidence of the title for the ten or twenty years, and for that time he will require no other evidence of ownership than the register; but as a title for ten or twenty years only will not satisfy him, he must carry back his investigation beyond the commencement of the register, to see that the first transfer was made by a party duly authorised—legally and equitably authorised—to make it.

When, under this system, land shall have been transferred for fifty or sixty years, there will be a sufficient title on the register, and thenceforward the registered ownership alone will be referred to; and in the meantime, every year will bring a purchaser nearer and nearer to this result, and year by year the expense attending the transfer of land will be diminished.

The system of restraining transfers of stock by distringas should be adapted to restraining the transfers of land; and it will be desirable that the registrar himself, or the assistant registrar, should be the officer by whom the restraint shall be authorised, and not as at present an officer of the Court of Chancery; and that the registrar or assistant should himself enter the restraint in the index.

It may be objected, that, under the proposed system, a mortgagee would have power to sell the mortgaged estate. The answer to this is, first, that under the present system the mortgagee usually has the legal fee vested in him with an absolute power of sale; and, secondly, that the mortgagor may lodge a distringas, which will prevent a sale without due notice.

Under this system equitable mortgages may be created with facility and dispatch. An equitable mortgagee may obtain a distringas if he hold a simple undertaking of the owner to grant a mortgage when required.

Provision must be made for devises, where the whole ownership is not devised to one or more persons, either beneficially or as trustees. The executors may, in such cases, be registered as owners, and a distringas may be lodged for the protection of the parties beneficially interested.

In cases of intestacy, it is not proposed that the registrar should decide on claims of heirship; such claims must be referred to the courts of law or equity, where conflicting claims are preferred, and a purchaser from an heir would require satisfactory evidence of heirship; judicial advertisements for heirs might be inserted in the Gazette, and the claim might be referred to the registrar, and, after judicial publication of his report, the claimant's title might be held good, unless questioned within a limited period.

A separate register would be kept of leases, except occupation leases for terms not exceeding twenty-one years, and a note should be made in the entry of the absolute ownership, referring to the lease register to give notice of its existence. A building lease for ninety-nine years is subject to as many dealings during its continuance as the fee-simple during the same period, and should therefore be registered under a distinct head.

Separate entries would be made on the register of absolute ownership of all fee-farm rent-charges, and other incorporeal hereditaments, and reference would be made to them on the register of the ownership of the land.

It has not been thought necessary, for carrying out this plan, to suggest any alteration in the existing system with reference to crown debts and judgments, though that system is susceptible of great improvement. The present plan of registry of crown debts and judgments may be continued; or the register may be transferred to the land registry. It would, however, tend to greater simplicity, if a distringas were required in order to render a crown debt or judgment debt a charge on land.

The system will have the effect of keeping all family arrangements from the public eye, as all family arrangements with respect to stock are kept from the public eye. But, as a further protection against impertinent curiosity, it may be prudent that no search should be permitted, or information given, except on a request in writing from a solicitor, stating why and for whom he applies, similar to the request to the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery for information as to the state of accounts.

The advantages expected to result from the proposed system are, that without any additional expense to the landowners the whole land of the country will gradually, but certainly, come upon the register; and that eventually the only title to land which a purchaser can require will be a succession of simple transfers, such as have been described, to be found on the register.

It may be objected that the effect of this scheme would be to make all interests liable to be litigated equitable interests, and to compel all litigants respecting land to resort to the Court of Chancery. To this objection an answer is suggested by the Report of the Commissioners appointed by her Majesty to inquire into the process, practice, and system of pleading in the Court of Chancery. In that document the following remarkable passages occur:—

"The mischiefs which arise from the system of several distinct courts proceeding on distinct and in some cases on antagonistic principles are extensive and deep rooted."—"It happens that, in many cases, parties in the course of the same litigation are driven backwards and forwards from courts of law to courts of equity, and from courts of equity to courts of law."—"It is obviously most desirable that in every case the court which has the cognizance of the matter in dispute should be able to give complete relief."—"We have arrived at the conclusion, that, without abolishing the distinction between law and equity, or blending the courts into one court of universal jurisdiction, a practical and effectual remedy for many of the evils in question may be found in such a transfer or blending of jurisdiction, coupled with such other practical amendments as will render each court competent to administer complete justice in the cases which fall under its cognizance. We think that the jurisdiction now exercised by courts of equity may be conferred upon courts of law, and that the jurisdiction now exercised by courts of law may be competent to administer entire justice without parties in the one court being obliged to resort to the aid of the other."

The plan, so far as it has yet been explained, is one of slow operation, and it will be a long time before titles can attain the simplicity which is aimed at by its operation. But if for any reason a landowner desire to be entered on the register with a warranted title, as when contemplating the sale of land subdivided into numerous lots for building purposes, he may apply to the registrar to have his title investigated by counsel and solicitor, to be named by the registrar, and if the title be found perfectly marketable, the owner may be entered on the register as owner, with a warranted title. The owners in such cases will of course pay all the expenses incurred in the investigation of the title, and a fee on registration, as a premium for the warranty.

An apprehension has been expressed that the index would become wholly unmanageable in a very few years, but this apprehension is not well founded. The indexes of the public funds are so far from being unmanageable, that there is absolutely no difficulty in finding, in a few minutes, any account which may be asked for; and the indexes to the public funds are simply alphabetical lists of all persons in whose names any stock is standing. And there is no subdivision; whereas in the proposed indexes for land-transfer there will be a separate index for each county, and that index again will be subdivided into parishes; so that if a person wishes to ascertain whether A. is possessed of any land in any parish, he will merely have to search the index of that parish under the letter A.; and if the landowners of the most populous parish in England were to be arranged alphabetically, there would be very little difficulty in finding the individual name.

It would, moreover, be very easy to subdivide the index of each letter, by classifying not only by the first letter of the name, but by the first vowel in the name, as, for instance, "Throgmorton" would be found under the letter "T.," and the subdivision "T. o." This system is observed with advantage by the Bank of England.

An objection has also been started, that the discussion and inquiry which would frequently arise on the rights and interests of parties having stop-orders would occasion the same expense as now.

This objection is not well founded. Under the present system not only have all parties legally and equitably interested in land to adjust their respective claims, but all the successive purchasers and mortgagees of that land for fifty or sixty years to come have, in their turn, to see that those claims were properly adjusted. Under the proposed system the purchaser or mortgagee would have nothing whatever to do with these questions. Whilst a "stop" exists, the land will be tied up, and when the "stop" is gone, the land may be transferred. The equities under stop-orders or distringases are adjusted once and for ever, and leave no stain or incumbrance on the title; but equities under the existing system live for half a century, and obtrude themselves upon every one who, during that period, may have to do with the land.

A question remains to be mentioned which has not yet been here alluded to, but which has been much discussed with reference to the registration of assurances. Shall the registry be central or local, or both central and local? Or, to put the question more accurately, shall there be

One central registry for the whole kingdom; or,

Several central county registries for the several subdivisions of the whole kingdom; or

One central registry for the whole kingdom, with branch offices in the principal towns throughout the kingdom?

A central registry for the whole kingdom would, of course, be established in the metropolis; central county registries would probably be in the largest, or most central, or most generally accessible town in the county.

The advantages of a metropolitan registry over county registries appear to be many and manifest.

1st. Under a metropolitan registry a uniformity of system throughout the whole kingdom would be established, which would hardly be attainable, or, at any rate, maintained, in several county registries.

2nd. One metropolitan registry would be much less expensive than from fifty to sixty county registries. For in each county registry there would, necessarily, be an efficient registrar, and a deputy competent to discharge the duties of the registrar during his absence, from illness or other inevitable cause.

3rd. It is believed that one metropolitan registry, under the superintendence of a registrar of high professional attainments and experience, and efficient deputies and subordinate officers, would inspire more confidence into the land owners of the country than several county registrars would do.

4th. The registers of judgments, bankruptcies, and insolvencies must, necessarily, be metropolitan.

5th. The suggested system of distringas will be more efficiently worked, and uniformity of practice will be more securely preserved, in one metropolitan registry than in numerous county registries, and on the efficiency of the distringas will in a great measure depend the efficiency of the whole system.

6th. A metropolitan registry would be less expensive to parties employing solicitors resident in the country. Every solicitor in the country, without exception, has an agent in London with whom he is in daily confidential unreserved communication, and no additional expense, or the smallest additional expense possible, is incurred by the client by reason of the employment of a London agent. The remuneration of a solicitor is on a fixed scale, and, as to the business transacted by the agent, the remuneration is divided between the agent and country solicitor. They are, as regards the particular transaction, very much in the position of partners residing in different towns. Through his London agent, therefore, the country solicitor might obtain from the metropolitan registry all the required information, at the same cost to the client as if the registry were in the town where the country solicitor practised. But the country solicitor rarely has a confidential agent in any other place than London, and if he did not reside in the register town he would be obliged to employ a local solicitor, or to make a journey to the registry for the purpose of search or registry, and it would often happen, where secresy was desired, that he would find it his duty to incur the expense of a journey.

7th. With country registries it would constantly occur, that solicitors in distant parts of the country, as well as solicitors in the metropolis, would have no knowledge of the solicitors in the particular town where the county registry might be. Many of the solicitors in large practice in London have clients who are landowners in many of the counties in England, and they would be much inconvenienced and embarrassed by a system of county registries.

8th. The ordinary communication between London and country towns, to say nothing of the telegraph, is often much more rapid and regular than between one country town and another, and of course the postage of letters is the same whatever the distance may be.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

Fluctuations in the English Funds have been of daily occurrence during the week. They have been confined to very moderate limits, and result in an improvement of about ¼ per Cent. In the month of August, operations in consols terminated in a fall of 1¼ per Cent. in addition to that which occurred in July. Money has been in active demand for the payments of this day, and the supply has been, and continues, sufficient. The amount of specie shipped by the Indus, for China and India, is £696,025. The bullion in the Bank has experienced a reduction of about half a million in the course of the month.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 29th August, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,324,175, being an increase of £115,570, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,500,587, shewing an increase of £270,456 when compared with the previous return.

Letters from Paris mention that M. Auguste Thurneyssen the well-known banker, and one of the directors of the Crédit Mobilier has been declared by the Tribunal of Commerce liable for the debts of his nephew M. Charles Thurneyssen who failed for more than £600,000, and absconded in May last. This judgment is on the ground that a partnership was regularly formed between these persons in 1837, that it has been continued without interruption, and never regularly terminated. The Council General of the department of Herault have passed resolutions in favour of a revision of the French Customs tariff, and suggest that the present excessive duties should be reduced to rates which would permit foreign competition to stimulate French industry. They compare the rate of duty levied on certain articles by Napoleon I. with the present rate, and point out the enormous augmentation fixed by the decree of 1853.

From all parts of Europe the harvest is reported excellent. The countries around Danzic and Stettin have finished their gathering most satisfactorily, and it was proceeding very favourably in the neighbourhood of Rostock. Advices from Odessa say that the progress of the harvest had brought business to a perfect calm. At Galatz, Ibrail, and Taganrog similar effects were in operation. In Mark-lane the price of wheat has not materially varied during the present week.

The half-yearly meeting of the Great Northern Railway Company, held last week, was of unusual importance. V. C. Sir W. Page Wood has lately decided that dividends cannot be declared by this company except on the footing of paying the preference shareholders a full dividend for a whole year. The directors, being advised by the Attorney-General that they cannot obey the injunction of the Vice-Chancellor without violating the Act of Parliament, and, further, that the present meeting ought to be adjourned, so as to allow the Vice-Chancellor's opinion to be submitted to the Court of Appeal, proposed to adjourn accordingly, without declaring any dividend. A discussion, attended with great confusion and uproar, and without any regard to order, succeeded; but at last a statement by the chairman, Mr. E. Denison, M.P., preparatory to moving the adjournment of the meeting, was allowed to be heard. He spoke with great confidence of the progressive prosperity of the railway; alluded to the increase of traffic as being well known; and stated, that, but for the unfortunate dispute between the preference shareholders and the general shareholders, arising out of Redpath's frauds, a better dividend would have been paid than had ever been received at this time of the year. And with respect to the value of the property, he said, it is as good as ever, and very nearly, if not quite, the best railway property in the kingdom. In reference to the violent manner in which the directors and himself had been attacked, he said he would take any amount of abuse; but when any considerable portion of the shareholders endorsed an unfavourable view of his conduct, he would retire at once. An explanation of proceedings in Parliament, in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, and relative to the intended appeal, followed; and the chairman concluded by moving an adjournment "to such time, not being more than ten days after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, as shall be fixed by the directors."

The chairman was reproached with having lost the confidence of the shareholders; and a portion of the daily press has magnified the numbers and importance of those who are opposed to the measures of the directors. The result of the voting was as follows:—Of those present, the number in favour of the chairman's motion was—Voters, 87; votes, 2,975. Against the motion—Voters, 101; votes, 2,542. Proxies, in favour of the motion—Voters, 1,031; votes, 17,179. Against—Voters, 226; votes, 4,194. It therefore appears, that, of the persons present, there was a majority of 14 voters against the chairman's proposal. But the votes of the 87 voters who were in favour of the motion gave a majority of 433. The proxies showed a majority in favour of the chairman of more than four to one of both voters and votes. The meeting stands adjourned till after the decision of the Court of Appeal.

A prospectus has been issued of the Red Sea Telegraph Company, with a capital of £300,000, for constructing the first part of a line of telegraph to India—namely, from Suez to Aden. The East India Company have guaranteed a minimum annual revenue of £20,000 on this portion, subject to the approval, yet to be obtained, of the Board of Control. Ultimately it is contemplated to extend the cable to Kurrachee; but meantime the proposed section would, it is stated, reduce the distance from India to one week. A purchase of the Atlantic cable is proposed. On the other hand, it is stated that the cable cannot be maintained for any length of time, on account of the irregular formation of the bottom of the Red Sea. No explanation has yet been published of the obstacles which prevent a firman being obtained from the Turkish Government for the Euphrates Valley line of telegraph. When this difficulty has been surmounted, the chief impediment to this line will be its liability to damage from the Arabs; yet persons well acquainted with these people believe that they may be induced to become its protectors.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 12, 1857.

NEW LAW COURTS.

We apprehend that the question, where is the Judge of the new Courts of Probate and Divorce to hold his sittings, is one of very immediate and pressing interest. We cannot be charged with impertinent intrusion upon the dearly-bought repose of the present month, if we venture to urge upon the Government that there really is an inevitable necessity for making up their minds on this subject without delay. In December last a deputation of the Incorporated Law Society waited upon the Chief Commissioner of Public Works to represent to him the importance of concentrating all the law courts and offices in some one convenient locality. Considering that the question had then been agitated for some fifteen years by all the usual machinery of pamphlets, petitions, and committees of the House of Commons, it may be supposed that the deputation were well up in their case, and stated their argument with a good deal of force and clearness. The only result, however, appears to have been that Sir Benjamin Hall proved to them that the wrong men had come to the wrong place. Any representation on behalf of the lawyers generally should be urged, he thought, by the judges, and should be laid before the Government, whose order it would be his own duty to carry out. It was then suggested by the deputation that a fund existed in the Court of Chancery which might be made available under certain conditions to defray the expense of building, and the Chief Commissioner was requested to move for a Select Committee of the House of Commons to consider this portion of the subject. But here, again, a most reasonable proposition was set aside for an alleged technical informality. The Attorney-General, it was objected, was the proper organ of the Government to make such a motion in the House; and so Sir Benjamin Hall politely advised his visitors to put themselves in communication with that already over-worked functionary; and having thus neatly shelved a troublesome business for some time, he dismissed the deputation with as large an allowance of courtesy and common-place phrases as is usually bestowed by a Minister who understands his duty.

But really this subject is growing every year so important to all lawyers, that neither bows nor smiles, nor sounding talk about "judges of the land" and "principal law officers of the Crown," will suffice much longer to pacify the demand for change. What, we ask again, is to be done for the Judge of the Courts of Probate and Divorce? Shall Parliament, which called him into existence, omit to provide for its offspring a roof to shelter him? We have not observed any ugly edifice of brick rising rapidly in either of the inns of court to astonish the occupants of chambers, on their return to the labours of next term. It will be remembered that the two unsightly courts in Old-square, Lincoln's-inn, now occupied by Vice-Chancellors, were built in the recess following the appointment of additional judges. But we cannot discover that any corresponding activity exists now. And yet, as a commercial speculation, it would probably be well worth while for either of the inns of court to provide, at its own expense, accommodation for the new tribunals within its precincts. But wherever else it may be expedient or practicable to locate the Judge of Probate and Divorce, one point, we think, is clear, that he should not be allowed to sit for a single day at Doctors' Commons. It was said that the Court of Chancery would never be effectually reformed until the procedure of the Masters' Offices was not only remodelled, but transferred from Southampton-buildings to some other atmosphere less charged with sleepy influences. We believe that the reforms of the late session demand the same precaution to insure success; and if a new court cannot be immediately provided in the metropolis, we would advise that the Judge be sent on a provincial tour, so as to test the appreciation of the country for a local remedy, until arrangements can be made to start him in business in London, in a good situation, and under conditions favourable to success.

But there is another aspect of this question in which its increasing urgency is undeniable. The common-law business has now become so large, that two, or even three, judges of one or more courts have been trying causes simultaneously during the past year. Now it was stated some time ago that the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was under the necessity of ascending eighty-five steps to reach the room then appropriated for his sittings in term at Nisi Prius, and that aged and feeble witnesses had declared themselves incapable of obeying the exigency of the subpœna served upon them. The Common Pleas, in fact, has no second court at all, and has been obliged, until lately, to content itself with what is called in the memorials of the Law Society a "temporary room somewhere about Westminster Hall," and at a considerable distance, either perpendicular or horizontal, or both, from the chief scene of business. The Exchequer had always the enjoyment of a second court—a recondite cell, with a single narrow access, intended, we believe, for the sittings of the Court of Error. Perhaps if this were the original plan, the architect was not much to blame. It is true that the conclave of eight or more judges on appeals did not gain in solemnity by being poked into an obscure hole like this; but it might be justly calculated that no impression made by this tribunal could ever extend far. The dry legal discussions of the Exchequer Chamber would seldom obtain a single listener free to go elsewhere, and the public would never be seen in the Court of Error unless they got there by mistake. But whatever idea may have possessed the designer's mind, this he certainly did not contemplate, that Mr. Edwin James, on a sultry summer afternoon, should address a common jury on a question interesting to grooms and cabmen. The Queen's Bench have also a second court, originally appropriated, as its name implies, to taking bail—a process which could have but slender interest either for the town idler or the country sight-seer, and which, therefore, might well go on in an apartment utterly inadequate for the trial of Nisi Prius causes.

We are aware that the evils above described have been lately, to a great extent, mitigated by holding the sittings of the equity courts almost entirely at Lincoln's-inn. The exhilirating sport of hunting a Vice-Chancellor up turrets and along galleries is now enjoyed by counsel and solicitors only upon the first day of term; and the only two tolerably good courts belonging to the Chancery judges at Westminster are generally available for the use of their brethren at common law. But the concession thus made of one part of the original demand places beyond all dispute the expediency of a total change. The inconvenience of sitting at a distance from the chambers of counsel and solicitors, and from the offices of the court, coupled with the existence close to Chancery-lane of accommodation which, though by no means adequate, is at least as good as any that is to be found at Westminster, has determined the judges upon the virtual abandonment of their ancient seats. At common law, the delay and difficulty of transacting judicial business at Westminster is quite as keenly felt; but there are no old halls or new brick sheds within the precincts of the Temple to render the protest of its inhabitants against the waste of their time unanswerable. That daily walk along the Strand and Parliament-street, which Lord St. Leonards declared to be a positive advantage on the score of health, is still obligatory upon the Templars, or may be exchanged at pleasure for a river voyage, which it is very likely that some other sage, equally superior to modern prejudices, has in some other blue book proclaimed to be the true specific for securing length of days. But we venture to hope that the physical wellbeing of barristers practising in the Temple may not be found irreconcilable with the economy of their own and of official and judicial time. A system which fifteen years ago was defended almost solely by Lord St. Leonards must surely be now verging upon its decline. It is pleasant to hear how much a man of eminent ability can find to say, where one might have thought there was nothing to be said at all. The argument is curious, but it does not satisfy our minds. When manufacturers and even tradesmen employ the telegraph to communicate over the width of a single street, it cannot be good policy to separate one portion of the lawyers from the rest by an interval of upwards of a mile, which must be traversed backwards and forwards throughout the day in cabs. The wisdom of concentration is indisputable. There are but two places which can claim to be selected for the site, and either of them would be available if desired. Even the money is ready for the whole work; and nothing is wanting but the necessary effort to set the official machinery in motion. We purpose, on another occasion, to explain the details of the plan, and the many advantages to the public and to all branches of the profession which may be expected to result from its being carried out.

THE DIVORCE ACT.

There are three ways in which any one who studies an Act of Parliament may examine its contents, and present them to himself and others. He may turn the whole substance of the Act into a narrative form; it is thus that writers of text books, like Blackstone or Serjeant Stephen, have to deal with Acts important enough to be transplanted into a summary of law. Or he may consider how the general public are affected by the Act, and in what way its contents bear upon social life, or the fortunes of bodies corporate, families, and individuals. Lastly, he may view it as a professional reader would view it, who wished to have a general notion of the scope and import of its enactments. A legal practitioner cannot remember the details of Acts of Parliament; but when an important Act is passed, he wishes to know generally what are the points which he must bear in mind, so as to approach the circumstances of any case submitted to him, with some degree of certainty and confidence. It is in this last way that we now propose to look at the Divorce Bill. Many of its clauses may be dismissed from the consideration of a professional man. Some of them are general, and affect him no more than any other member of the community. A solicitor, for instance, is not, as a solicitor, concerned with the clauses giving compensation to proctors, or exempting the clergy from the obligation of re-marrying adulterers. Others again are so purely technical, that no one would think of trusting his memory on the subject—such, for instance, as those clauses which regulate the stamps or fees of the new court. A practitioner must turn to the Act itself for information on such points; but the main provisions of the Act form a body of matter, of which any one in practice may be expected to have such a knowledge as will enable him to speak of divorce and matrimonial causes in a professional way.

Divorce à vinculo is a subject easier than any other dealt with by the Act to speak of with precision. The provisions regarding it are simple, and easily understood. If it is a husband who wishes to dissolve the marriage tie, he must present a petition, supported by an affidavit, charging his wife with adultery, and making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent. If he pleases, he may also ask for damages from the adulterer, and these damages will be assessed by a jury. The demand for damages is entirely in the option of the husband; but if they are asked for and obtained, it is in the power of the Court to direct how they shall be applied, and to make a provision out of them for the wife and children. The husband will also be liable to provide alimony for the wife, if it is reasonable he should do so; but in case his wife has any property of her own, he may apply for a settlement in his favour out of it. His claim may, in the discretion of the Court, be denied if he can be shown to have been guilty of adultery, cruelty, or desertion of his wife; and he may be ordered to attend and be examined, but no question can be put to him, the object of which is to show that he has been guilty of adultery. It is probable that petitions for divorce à vinculo, presented by the wife, will be very rare; but there are three grounds on which the dissolution of the marriage tie may be asked for by the wife, which, among the lower orders, very frequently exist; and, since suing in formâ pauperis is to be allowed, it is possible that wives may occasionally claim the assistance of the law. These three grounds are—adultery coupled with bigamy, adultery coupled with desertion for two years, and adultery coupled with excessive cruelty. In case a divorce à vinculo is granted, the Court has power to make such order as it may think proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children of the marriage.

A sentence of judicial separation, which is to have the effect of the old divorce à mensâ et thoro, may be obtained by either husband or wife on the ground of adultery, cruelty, or desertion for two years; and the husband may, if he pleases, ask for damages from the alleged adulterer, as he also may without applying for any remedy against the wife. In every case of judicial separation the wife, of course, will be entitled to alimony, if circumstances render it reasonable that she should have it; and, further, she is to be considered as a feme sole with respect to all property which she may subsequently acquire, or which may come to, or devolve upon, her. She will sue and be sued as if she were unmarried; and if she again cohabits with her husband, all the property which she may be entitled to at the time of the re-union will be held to her separate use, subject, however, to any agreement in writing made between herself and her husband whilst separate.

A wife deserted by her husband has also a more summary remedy. She may apply in London to a police-magistrate, or in the country to justices in petty sessions, for protection; and after she has proved the fact of desertion without reasonable cause, and also that she is maintaining herself by her own industry or property, she may obtain an order by which her earnings and property acquired since the desertion began will be protected from her husband, and all creditors and other persons claiming under him. If the husband, or any person claiming under him, in defiance of such an order, seizes on any portion of the property secured by it, the wrongdoer will be liable, not only to restore the specific property, but also to pay double the value by way of damages. The husband, or any person claiming under him, may, however, apply to the court, or to the magistrate or justices by whom the order was made, to discharge it; but whilst it is in force the wife is to be exactly in the same position with regard to property as if she had obtained a judicial separation.

The Judge of the Court of Probate will be the Judge Ordinary of the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. From him an appeal will lie to the full court, composed of the Lord Chancellor, the three chiefs and the three senior puisne judges of the courts of common law; and then an appeal may be carried to the House of Lords. When petitions for divorce à vinculo are to be heard, two of the other judges must always sit with the judge ordinary. The Court will act, as far as possible, on the principles and rules hitherto adopted and observed in the Ecclesiastical Courts. When questions of fact are tried, the rules of evidence will be the same as those obtaining in the courts of common law, and the decrees and orders of the Court will be enforced like the decrees and orders of the Court of Chancery. Questions of fact are to be tried by the Court itself, if the intervention of a jury seems not to be necessary, or is not demanded. But any of the parties may demand a jury, or the Court may direct that a jury shall be summoned to try the question at issue; and this trial may, at the discretion of the Court, take place before itself, or any one of its judges, or before any of the judges of assize. The judges of assize have also a local power quite independent of the Court. Petitions for restitution of conjugal rights, or for a judicial separation, may be presented direct to them, and they will have the same authority and powers as the Court itself for hearing and deciding applications made to them; but their orders will be subject to be reviewed by the judge ordinary. The Act is to come into operation on any day not sooner than the first day of January next, which the Queen shall by Order in Council appoint.

Legal News.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—July 15 and 16.

(Before the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.)

Perry Herrick v. Attwood.

The plaintiffs in this suit were mortgagees upon an estate near Chelmsford, known as the "Hylands Estate," belonging to the defendant, John Attwood, for sums amounting together to £25,000 and interest, claiming as transferees under mortgage securities dated Sept. 7, 1850, Jan. 24, 1851, May 17, 1851, and Aug. 27, 1851. The defendants, other than John Attwood, also claimed to have charges upon the same estate, either as mortgagees or judgment creditors; the defendants, Frances Attwood, Maria Attwood, Thomas Troward, and Catherine his wife, claiming, as mortgagees for £30,000, under an indenture of Jan. 30, 1848, to have the first charge upon the estate.

The Hylands estate was purchased from the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, and conveyed to the plaintiff, John Attwood, in 1839. It consists of the mansion-house, pleasure grounds, and park surrounding, with three small farms, comprising altogether about 750 acres of land, of which about 700 acres are freehold, and the remainder copyhold of inheritance; the copyhold lands being excepted from the alleged mortgage of Jan. 30, 1848. The value of the freehold portion of the estate (including the mansion) may be about £40,000.

The question at issue in this suit was, whether the plaintiffs, under their said securities, were not entitled to priority of charge for their mortgage debt, amounting to £25,000, over the defendants, Frances Attwood and her sisters, for their mortgage debt of £30,000, notwithstanding the security for the latter sum bore date prior to the date of any of the plaintiffs' securities; for the reason, that, the defendants claiming under the deed of Jan. 30, 1848, although at the time when their mortgage deed was executed the title deeds were in the actual possession and power of their solicitor, Roger Williams Gem, and there was no reason why he should not retain them on their behalf, they allowed him to hand the deeds over immediately afterwards to the defendant, John Attwood, and did not take any steps to have any notice of their said alleged mortgage inscribed on any of them: whilst, on the other hand, those through whom the plaintiffs claimed advanced their money, and took their securities, without notice of any prior incumbrance, and on the faith of having the first charge—the title deeds to the estate, including the conveyance deed to John Attwood, having been produced by his solicitor, and handed over to them in the usual and ordinary way upon the advance of their moneys.

It appeared, that, in the month of January, 1848, and for some time previously, the defendant, John Attwood, who was then a man of considerable wealth, and owned large landed estates in Essex and elsewhere, resided with his sisters, the defendants, Frances Attwood and Maria Attwood, in Park-lane, Hyde-park. He had in his hands at this time £30,000, which formed the fortunes of his sisters, the defendants, Frances Attwood, Maria Attwood, and Catherine Troward, for which sum they held no security. In the early part of the month of Jan. 1848, Mr. Roger Williams Gem, a solicitor, of Birmingham, who had for many years been the confidential solicitor and adviser of Mr. Attwood and his family, at Mr. Attwood's request, came to London to make his will and otherwise arrange his affairs. He stayed in town about a month, and, during his stay, he spoke to the defendants, Frances Attwood and Maria Attwood, on the subject of the money owing by their brother to themselves and their sister, Mrs. Troward, and told them he intended to prepare a security for it, and get the defendant, John Attwood, to sign it, and they left him to do what was necessary for them. Shortly after this conversation, a deed (of Jan. 30, 1848) was prepared; and, soon after its date, it was executed by John Attwood and the other parties to it. It was a mortgage by demise for 200 years of the Hylands estate (except the copyhold parts thereof) for securing £30,000 and interest. It did not contain any power of sale. After the deed had been so executed, it was tied up in paper by Mr. Gem, and handed to Miss Maria Attwood; and the title deeds to the Hylands estate, including the conveyance deed to Mr. Attwood, were tied up and returned by Mr. Gem to Mr. Attwood, by whom they were retained.

During the months of January, February, and March, 1848, two actions at law were pending against John Attwood. These were brought to recover certain moneys owing by him, and were prosecuted and defended up to the 3rd March, 1848, when a preliminary agreement was entered into for the settlement of the actions; and the title deeds of the Hylands estate were, on the 6th March, 1848, delivered by the defendant, John Attwood, himself, in pursuance of that agreement, to Messrs. Pooly, Beisly, & Read.

In the early part of the year 1850, the defendant, John Attwood, applied, through Mr. Beisly, his then solicitor, to Mr. Whitaker for a loan of £15,000 upon mortgage of the Hylands estate. This loan was agreed to and carried out by the above-mentioned mortgage of Sept. 7, 1850. Subsequently the mortgages of Jan. 24, 1851, May 17, 1851, and Aug. 27, 1851, were executed. On the occasion of the advance of £15,000, the title having been duly examined and approved, the title deeds to the Hylands estate were handed over by Mr. Beisly, as Mr. Attwood's solicitor, to Mr. Whitaker, as the solicitor to the mortgagees; and those gentlemen advanced their money and took their securities (as they alleged) on the faith of having the first charge, and without notice of the mortgage of Jan. 30, 1848, or of the deposit of the title deeds with Mr. Beisly, or of any prior incumbrance.

In the month of November, 1851, the defendant, John Attwood, applied, through his solicitors, Messrs. Beisly & Read, to Messrs. Barker, Bowker, & Peake for a loan upon mortgage of the Hylands estate, and other of his estates in Essex and Dorsetshire; and, after much negotiation, a loan of £6,000 was arranged, and this loan was carried out by a mortgage deed of Dec. 16, 1851. Statutory declarations were required and taken from the defendant, John Attwood, and his solicitors, Messrs. Beisly & Read, as to the incumbrances then existing upon the Hylands estate; and the £6,000 (it was alleged) was advanced on the faith of those declarations, and of the deeds being in the custody of the person represented to have the first mortgage.

In the month of September, 1853, the mortgages for the £25,000, secured by the several deeds of Sept. 7, 1850, Jan. 24, 1851, May 17, 1851, and Aug. 24, 1851, were transferred to the plaintiffs. The practice of solicitors as regards the custody of title deeds and mortgage transactions appeared from the affidavits of several solicitors of large practice.

The points which arose on the case were—1st. Whether the defendants, Frances Attwood, Maria Attwood, and Catherine Troward, ought not to have retained possession of the title deeds to the estate, as well as of their own mortgage; and whether, by allowing their solicitor, Mr. R. W. Gem, to return them to the defendant, John Attwood (there being no reason, according to the plaintiffs' contention, for such a proceeding), they did not do such an act as to disentitle them to any priority over the subsequent lenders which otherwise they would have had. 2ndly. Whether, if they were justified in giving up possession of the deeds, they ought not to have inscribed notice on them of their mortgage; and 3rdly, Whether the said defendants, by their subsequent acts, had not lost any priority which otherwise they would have had.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—There is nothing like fraud on the part of these ladies. It is impossible to use any expression more inappropriate to them. The state of this case is this:—They were creditors of their brother to the extent of £10,000 each; they did not make any pressure upon him, nor ask for any security; but he voluntarily gave a security for the purpose of securing to them money to which they were entitled. And I may take the case in two points of view, supposing this to be a mere voluntary charge. One question is, whether that charge could be supported, it being created by him merely for the express purpose of affecting the validity of a mortgage which he was about to make with other persons? I think it unnecessary to go into that, because I think, upon the evidence, I may treat this as if it was an arrangement made between Mr. Attwood and his sisters at the suggestion of the family solicitor. He was the solicitor both of Mr. Attwood and of the ladies themselves. Now I do not think it necessary to go through the class of cases which have been cited with reference to what amounts to fraud, or to culpable negligence, because I find an express purpose in this particular case; and, before I go into that, I may state how I dissent on the facts of this case from the conclusion to which Mr. Bagshawe wishes me to come, fully concurring with him, however, in the principle of law, that, if a person is entitled to priority as a mortgagee, and has got the deeds, he is not to be deprived of that priority by reason of the misconduct of the solicitor, who might take away those deeds, or give them to other persons, no more than he would be deprived of his priority if the deeds were stolen. He would be in the same situation. But, in my opinion, these deeds were never in the possession of Mr. Roger Gem in the character of these ladies' solicitor; or that, if they were in his possession, they were only in his possession for a moment for the purpose of creating the security. He was the solicitor of Mr. Attwood, who made this charge in January, 1848, in order to secure the claims of his three sisters, and they are informed of it. At the same time they are informed, that, in fact, Mr. Attwood is making an arrangement with respect to his affairs, and that he proposes to make a mortgage for the purpose of securing a particular charge to other persons, and that therefore these deeds are to be in Mr. Roger Gem's possession, as the solicitor of Mr. Attwood, for the purpose of enabling him to make that charge. Then, in that case, it amounts to nothing more than this—that there are certain persons who are creditors of an owner of an estate, who, taking a charge from him, allow him to retain the deeds for the express and admitted purpose of raising money on that property, and of making a charge on it to other persons. I think it impossible for them to say, after that, that that charge is not to have priority over theirs; for they have allowed him (I do not say fraudulently or improperly) to raise money on the property. It is true that they say, that he was to be allowed to raise money on this property for a specific and particular purpose, and only for one particular purpose: but that was clearly a matter which would rest entirely upon his honour whether he did so or not. They allowed all the title deeds to remain in the possession of the person who had given them the charge for the express and admitted purpose of raising money on the property in priority to their charge. He does not raise the particular sum in question; that is to say, he does not give a mortgage to the persons mentioned by him. But, supposing this money had to be applied in payment of such persons, would not the question have been exactly the same? I take it, however, on still broader grounds, for I think that the deeds, being allowed to remain in his hands for the purpose of raising money in priority to their charge, they cannot afterwards complain of the extent to which that money had been raised, but it must have priority over them. They had abundant means of preventing it besides retaining the title deeds. They might have caused an indorsement to be made upon the deed of purchase by their solicitors. When I say they might have done so, of course these ladies knew nothing about the matter; but I am bound to treat them as if they did, because all the acts which their solicitor did, or which he ought to have done, are, in law, what they did, or ought to have done, themselves. He might have made an indorsement on the deed that there was a charge of £30,000 in favour of these three ladies, which was only to be subject to a sum of money to be raised for certain persons by name. If that had been done, nobody would have advanced money on this estate without having had notice of it; and I am of opinion that it was their duty, if they had intended to confine the particular charge which they were to allow to be made to a particular sum, to make such an indorsement. They left it with their brother to raise money, and took his word that he would not raise above a certain amount—viz. £15,000. When I say they took his word, it is not that there was an express statement between them, but it was retained by him for that admitted purpose; and therefore they assumed that he did not intend to raise any more, and did not expect he would raise any more. In other words, they trusted to his honour not to raise a greater amount; but he has thought proper to do so, and to that larger amount I am of opinion they must be postponed. That is my view of the rights of the plaintiffs. I will make a declaration that the Misses Attwood must be postponed to the claim of the plaintiffs; then I shall direct a sale, also giving a direction to ascertain priorities, without prejudice to any question which may exist between co-defendants, or which may exist between any other defendants and the plaintiffs. Mr. and Mrs. Troward stand exactly in the same situation as the Misses Attwood. With respect to Mr. and Mrs. Troward, I think it proper to observe, in reference to an argument put forward for them, which, in my opinion, does not apply to this case—viz. that Mr. Attwood was the sole surviving trustee of the settlement, and that, therefore, he was the proper person to have the custody of these deeds. But, in point of fact, he had not the legal estate in him under the deeds of 1848. The persons who had the legal estate were the two Misses Attwood; and if the legal estate had been conveyed to Mr. Attwood, and he had been made the termor of the purpose of raising this money, the same question might have arisen; but, in fact, Mr. Attwood was only a cestui que trust under that deed. It is true, he was a trustee under the marriage settlement, and when he received that money he was bound to hold that money he so received in trust for the persons entitled under the marriage settlement. In any view of the case, I am of opinion that Mr. and Mrs. Troward cannot stand in a better situation than the two Misses Attwood in whom the term was vested for the purpose of raising this money, and that they must be postponed to the plaintiffs. I shall make an observation with respect to the statutory declaration which had been made, and I think it proper to observe, that, in this case, the solicitors for the mortgagee appear to have taken every reasonable precaution which they could take. They had all the title deeds; they had a clear deduction of title, and had nothing to show any mortgage; they obtained the solemn assurance from the mortgagor that he had made no other incumbrances than those stated in the schedule, except certain equitable mortgages created by deposit of the mortgage deeds, which are all answered, not merely by his statement, but by the production of the deeds themselves; and it is obvious, that, in a case of this description, if the plaintiffs had not a good title to this mortgage, it is impossible that anybody could be sure he had got a title, dealing with the most respectable persons, and the most respectable solicitors; and it would necessarily follow, that, except by a registration of deeds, you could not be certain that you could have the deeds which made out a good title to the property. No doubt the difficulties of the case make it a matter of great importance and a point of honour with the solicitors. I must say, according to my experience, that solicitors invariably do mention the slightest suspicion of a charge when they have got a property which they are allowing another firm to advise their clients either to purchase or to advance money upon; and in that view of the case it is with the deepest regret that I see such a declaration as that made by Mr. Beisly, which obviously was a concealment of a notice which he had distinctly of this charge, and which it was his bounden duty to have given notice of, even without making any declaration at all to solicitors who were advising clients to advance money. It may be consistent with the exact words of the statutory declaration, but it cannot be consistent with the spirit of it, and that which it is obvious was intended to be conveyed to the minds of persons who require it to be made to them. The plaintiffs, therefore, will be entitled to priority over the Misses Attwood's security of January, 1848.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.—(Before Mr. Baron CHANNELL.)

Sept. 8.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Montague v. Harrison.

This was a renewed application on the part of General Harrison to be discharged from Whitecross-street Prison, on the ground that he was privileged from arrest in attending the Marylebone Police-court to prosecute certain parties on a charge of felony. The application was before the learned judge on a former occasion, and stood over for an affidavit as to a former summons before Mr. Justice Wightman. An affidavit was put in, but it was denied that the question had been fully heard before Mr. Justice Wightman.

Mr. Dixon, on the part of General Harrison, urged that it was very hard on him to be arrested under the circumstances he had been while attending a police-court.

Mr. Baron CHANNELL asked for an authority for the privilege demanded.

Mr. Dixon said, there was, unfortunately, no authority save the general principle of protection. This was the first case of the kind as far as could be ascertained.

A clerk from the office of Mr. Huson, attorney for the plaintiff, asked for the summons to be dismissed.

Mr. Dixon urged his Lordship to hear the matter, as he could bring it before him on a writ of habeas corpus. The case concerned the liberty of the subject.

His Lordship said he was of the same opinion as Mr. Justice Wightman, that there was no privilege, and, therefore, refused to make an order.

The summons was dismissed, without costs.

BANKRUPTCY COURT.—Sept. 4.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FANE).

In re Henry Bunney.

The bankrupt, Henry Bunney, formerly a solicitor, was described as a brickmaker, money scrivener, and cattle dealer, at Newbury. He disappeared under very mysterious circumstances from Newbury in November, 1853, rumours of all kinds being rife respecting the position of his affairs, he was not again heard of until 1855, when it was ascertained that he had comfortably "settled down," with his wife and family, as a farmer at Wellington, New Zealand. The assignees under the adjudication of bankruptcy which had been granted against him took the necessary steps to recover possession of the bankrupt's estate, and sent over a warrant empowering Mr. Hart, as their agent, to seize the bankrupt's property, which was done; and the bankrupt instituted proceedings in the Judicial Court at New Zealand for an illegal seizure, in which he was defeated. In no way discouraged, he re-embarked for this country, and carried the matter on appeal before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who, without expressing any opinion on the matter, advised the bankrupt to bring an action at common law, which would decide the issue. The matter was ultimately compromised by the bankrupt foregoing his right of action, on the assignees paying him all costs and expenses incurred in the prosecution of the suit; and he further consented to surrender to his bankruptcy and file a balance-sheet.

The balance-sheet, prepared by Messrs. Paul & Turner, extends from November, 1853, to October, 1855, showing this summary:—Creditors unsecured, £6,124; creditors at New Zealand holding security, £1,373; profit on trading in New Zealand, £1,177; interest due on purchase money of property sold in New Zealand, £536; debtors, good, £1,120; doubtful, £150; property at New Zealand realised, £1,541; and interest due on property sold there, £536; property held by creditors, £2,633; losses on sale of farming implements, &c., at New Zealand, £150; interest, £120; wages, £60; house and personal, £335; deficiency at commencement, £2,744. The sales in New Zealand had been £1,000, and the property consists of 1,200 head of sheep, land, farm implements, &c.

Mr. Lawrance, who appeared for the assignees, said the balance-sheet was very unsatisfactory; but as it was impossible to get better accounts, his clients would consent to the bankrupt passing.

The bankrupt then passed his final examination, and obtained enlarged protection to the certificate meeting, which was fixed for the 17th of October next.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)— Sept. 8.

In re Kemp & Clay.

This case was adjourned for the purpose of inquiring whether Messrs. Miller & Horn, the bankrupt's solicitors, had received an unfair preference. The case having again come on for rehearing,

Mr. Lawrance (for the assignees) stated, that, since the last meeting, he had communicated with Messrs. Miller & Horn, with reference to the bill of sale given to them by Mr. Kemp, and they had replied that the transaction would bear any investigation, and offered to refer the matter to his Honour for his decision.

The COMMISSIONER.—I would rather suspend my judgment until after the question has been disposed of. It is quite clear there will be a suspension. I have been reading the examinations, and they are not at all satisfactory.

Mr. Lawrance said, it would be a satisfaction to creditors if immediate certificates were granted.

The COMMISSIONER.—A satisfaction to creditors! I do not understand that feeling where the expenditure is so great. Mr. Kemp appears to have been at this Court before. He was running his estate a good deal too hard by his expenditure. I shall order an adjournment until November. That delay will certainly be within the period of suspension that I shall award.

Adjourned accordingly.

LEEDS BOROUGH MAGISTRATES.

IS A PHOTOGRAPHER AN ARTIST?

At the Leeds Court House, on Tuesday, before J. H. Shaw and E. Irwin, Esqrs., a young man, named Amos Lambert, appeared to answer a summons charging him with having, on Sunday last, followed his ordinary calling by taking and selling photographic likenesses.—Mr. Ferns, who appeared for the defendant, said he was not instructed to deny the facts. The difficulty experienced by the Bench was, whether a photographic artist came within the meaning of the word "artificer" in the Act of Parliament. The words were: "No tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever can exercise their ordinary calling on the Lord's-day." The words "or other person whatsoever" must mean of the same description as those mentioned before; they could not extend to other classes, that was quite clear. That being so, the question was, simply, what was the meaning of the word artificer, and if it included artists? In the Imperial Dictionary, the word "artificer" meant "artist;" and, turning to the word "art," he found that it included "mechanical skill." If the case could be heard at the sessions, the best course would be to raise the question there, by the Bench inflicting a small penalty, so that an appeal might be made. But there was no appeal from the decision of the magistrates, and as they were anxious not to go short of the law, or to go beyond it, they should allow the question to stand over till they had an opportunity of consulting the Recorder, or some other person of eminence, on the point whether the practice of photography came within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

A petition has been presented to the Vacation Judge in chambers (Sir. W. Page Wood) for winding-up the affairs of the London and Eastern Banking Company, and the appointment of Messrs. Tucker, Greville, & Tucker as solicitors has been sanctioned. If, as is supposed, preliminary proceedings have been taken for bringing the liquidation of the bank under the Court of Bankruptcy, there may be another contest, like that in the case of the Royal British Bank, for supremacy of jurisdiction; but after what then occurred, it is not probable that any protracted litigation would be suffered. The petitioners who have appealed to the Court of Chancery are Mr. A. Stuart and Mr. G. Duplex, shareholders; and there is consequently every prospect of the transactions which distinguished the management being fully exposed. An investigation either through Chancery or Bankruptcy is the only proper medium for eliciting the actual facts identified with the loans and operations of Colonel Waugh, the manager, and the secretary — the three principal debtors to the bank.

On Saturday, at the Judges' Chambers, a man, named Henry Moore, stated to be a member of the swell mob, was brought up by habeas corpus from Reading Gaol. The prisoner was committed as a rogue and vagabond by the Windsor magistrates for "sounding" the pockets of several ladies at the Windsor Revel. The objection to the committal was, that the warrant did not state that the "Revel" was a place of public resort, as required by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 29. Mr. Baron Bramwell considered that this question had been decided by the Court of Exchequer, and he felt himself reluctantly obliged to discharge the prisoner. Upon being released, the prisoner was immediately taken into custody on a charge of being concerned in a garotte robbery of a Jew, in the Waterloo-road, on the 29th of April last. He was subsequently examined at the Southwark police-court and remanded for a week, bail being refused.

Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Cyprien Hermodan Dupuy, Esq., to be district magistrate for the island of Mauritius.

Sir John Dean Paul, Strachan, Bates, Robson, Agar, Tester, Saward (alias Jim the Penman), together with the notorious swindler Redpath, are on board the Nile, convict ship, which vessel got under weigh from the Little Nore, made sail, and proceeded towards the Downs with a strong south-west wind on Tuesday last.

The University of Durham has conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws upon Sir Samuel Martin, one of the Barons of the Exchequer.

The New York Post published a complete list of all who have been sentenced to the extreme penalty of the law in New York county since the year 1784, which were, for a period of 73 years, but 89, an average of a little over one a year. And as this is a much larger number than were executed, the number convicted of capital crimes and pardoned or not hung being 18, it leaves but 20 capital punishments in 41 years.

The Surrogate had given a decision in the Burdell case. Mrs. Cunningham, in his opinion, is not the widow of the murdered dentist, and he had directed the issue of letters of administration to the next of kin. Mrs. Cunningham, according to the statement of an inquisitive reporter who visited her in her cell, maintained great coolness. She was of opinion that the Surrogate, though an upright man, had been influenced by her enemies.

A murder had taken place in a dining saloon at New York. Nymus, an actor, met an attorney named Wagstaff, and, some altercation ensuing, the latter struck the former a severe blow. Nymus immediately drew a revolver, and fired two shots into Wagstaff, who immediately fell to the floor a corpse.

In the West Riding the candidates who were unopposed were Mr. Edmund Denison and Lord Goderich, and, perhaps, never were members elected for so large a constituency at a general election at so small a cost in money. The total of the expenses connected with the election of Mr. Denison was only 150*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* Among the items were—sheriff's expenses, including printing and posting bills, share of hustings, under-sheriff, and bailiff, 61*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and advertising Mr. Denison's address and thanks, 75*l.* 9*s.* The total of Lord Goderich's expenses was 430*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* Among the items were—sheriff's expenses (same as for Mr. Denison), 61*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*; printing, advertising, posting bills, carriage of parcels, &c., 170*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*; "marked copies of the register of voters for canvassers," £125; and election agents for professional service, 46*l.* 3*s.* At Knaresborough there were three candidates—Mr. B. T. Woodd, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Robert Campbell. The first two were elected. Mr. Woodd's expenses were 102*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; Mr. Collins's, 38*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*; and Mr. Campbell's, 49*l.* 18*s.* The two largest items in Mr. Woodd's expenses were £42 for professional services, and £13 for the use of a long room and cab-hire. Mr. Collins has no charge for professional services, and the largest item in his bill is 11*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* for election auditor's fee, per-centage, advertising, and stationery. The largest item in Mr. Campbell's bill is 11*l.* 16*s.* for refreshment, expenses of candidates, committee, agents, clerks, &c.

During the interval that has elapsed since the former inquiry into the affairs of the Royal British Bank, it is understood that a close investigation has been instituted into all the accounts, with a view to ascertain whether there is any case of securities having been made away with that were deposited with the bank with written instructions, the disposal being contrary to such instructions. This is made a felony by a special Act of Parliament, and Sir John Paul and his partners were convicted under that statute, and sentenced to transportation. At present, it appears that no such case has been discovered. It is said that whenever the trial shall be appointed to take place, the defendants will make an application to be tried separately, the object of this proceeding being to confine the evidence to the particular person under charge, and thus exclude a good deal of evidence as to the fraudulent intentions of the parties and the general combination among them. The application will doubtless be strongly opposed on behalf of the Crown.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

The First Part of the judicial statistics for the year 1856, lately issued by the Home Office, comprises Police, Criminal Proceedings, and Prisons. The Second and concluding Part will embrace the statistics of Civil and Commercial Justice. The report only occupies thirty-three pages, and Mr. Redgrave has shown both judgment and ability in the manner in which he has compiled it. But the returns appended occupy 103 pages, and we have serious doubts whether much advantage can be derived from the elaborate details which they contain.

The committals for trial during 1856 exhibit a decrease of no less than 6,535, or 25·1 per cent., following the large decrease of 3,387 persons, or 11·5 per cent. in 1855; so that the decrease in two years amounted to 9,922. This decrease extends over the whole country; and is rendered striking by the fact that it has extended over several years. In 1837 the committals were 23,612, in 1856 they were 19,437. Possibly the decrease during 1856 is to be accounted for in part by the extended power of justices to deal summarily with certain offences. It might have been expected that the almost total abandonment of transportation, and the return of large numbers of idle men from the Crimea, would lead to the increase of offences coupled with violence in a greater ratio than seems to have been the case. This state of things presents a gratifying contrast to what occurred at the close of the war in 1815, when the total of the commitments was immediately doubled, and offences of the gravest description bore their full proportion in that sudden increase. At the same time, it ought to be observed, that the only offences which appear to have increased during the year 1856 are burglary, housebreaking, and shopbreaking—offences with violence—which amount to 23·7 per cent., showing that the same causes which operated in 1815 were not altogether inert in 1856. It is, however, only fair to remark, that, in highway robbery—under which garotte offences are classed—there has been no increase. It seems clear, therefore, that the measures taken to repress crime have not been ineffectual.

The decrease in crime during 1856 seems due chiefly to the diminution in the crimes of theft by servants. In 1855 the committals were 20,000, and in 1856 only 13,000. It is among the females that this decrease is most remarkable, and, no doubt, this fact is to be accounted for by the operation of the Criminal Justice Act. In the more serious offences the female committals have not at all diminished. For some years the female criminals have borne an increasing proportion to the males. Twenty years ago the proportion was under 20 in the 100, but in 1855 it reached its maximum of 30·6 in the 100. In 1856 it was reduced to 26.

It is remarkable how the character of the crime is decided by the character of the agent who commits it. In crimes of the darkest complexion, where the worst passions are roused, the proportion of female to male criminals is much more close than in the other. In 1856, of 82 persons charged with murder, no less than 42 were females; of 41 charged with attempts to murder, 11 were females; of 282 charged with stabbing, wounding, administering poison, and such offences, 45 were females. The same conclusion is apparent from the sentences recorded. In the last ten years, of 96 persons executed, 13 have been females; whereas, on comparing the proportion which females sentenced to transportation or to penal servitude bear to the males, it is much smaller.

Our criminals are mainly the young, the unemployed, and the uneducated. It is certainly an appalling fact that no less than 11,808 males and 2,173 females were committed to prison, and subjected to prison discipline, who were under sixteen years of age; 1,990 of whom were, indeed, children under twelve years of age. When we regard our criminals with reference to their occupations, it would seem that manual skill, like intellectual and moral culture, is, as a general rule, a preventive of crime. Above one-half of those committed for trial, of whom a large proportion are females, have no occupation, or are classed as labourers, charwomen, and needlewomen. Of mechanics and skilled workers, including factory-workers, the proportion is 21·7 per cent.; and of foremen, overlookers of labour, shopmen, and all above the artisan class, the proportion is only 3·8 per cent.

The French Tribunals.

The decision of the Tribunal of Commerce, by which Auguste Thurneyssen is made liable for his nephew's debts, has excited so much attention in England that we think it may not be uninteresting to our readers to state the grounds of that decision. The action was brought by the Syndic of the bankruptcy of M. Charles Thurneyssen (who in May last fled to America, leaving liabilities to the amount of about 10,000,000f., and assets of only 1,500,000f.), to have that person's uncle, M. Auguste Thurneyssen, one of the directors of the Crédit Mobilier, and that gentleman's son, George Thurneyssen, declared partners of the bankrupt, and as such responsible for his liabilities. The action was based on the allegation, supported by the production of accounts, deeds, and papers, that they, and especially M. Auguste Thurneyssen, had participated for a long time in the operations of Charles Thurneyssen; had brought capital into his bank; and had taken a large share of the profits realised. M. Auguste Thurneyssen opposed the action, on the ground, that, though he had once been a partner of Charles, who is his nephew, he had ceased to be so before the operations which resulted in his bankruptcy, and that of late years he had only been his commanditaire. The answer of M. Georges Thurneyssen was, that he was not a partner, but simply an employé of Charles, with an interest in his business. The judgment of the tribunal was to the effect, that, on the 20th December, 1837, a partnership for carrying on a bank was regularly formed between Auguste Thurneyssen and Charles Thurneyssen, was continued without interruption from time to time, and that it was never regularly put an end to; that a deed, dated 25th February, 1852, which M. Auguste Thurneyssen relied on to prove that he had ceased to be a partner, and had become a simple commanditaire, was null and void, inasmuch as it had not been published according to law; that it appeared that, by correspondence, he had approved of the acts of Charles Thurneyssen, and had even personally given explanations destined to calm the disquietude which had been expressed by one of the most important customers of the bank; and lastly, that as it was proved that a notable part of the liabilities at present known go back to the partnership, and that, on the 31st of December, 1851, that partnership "was in deficit several millions, independently of extensive dissimulations of liabilities, of which the books already allow the trace to be seen," that, consequently, as Auguste Thurneyssen had never ceased to be the partner of Charles Thurneyssen, and responsible for his acts, the declaration of the bankruptcy of Charles Thurneyssen must be declared common to Auguste Thurneyssen, and that the operations of the bankruptcy must for the future be followed in the common names of Auguste Thurneyssen and Charles Thurneyssen, his nephew. With respect to Georges Thurneyssen, the tribunal came to the conclusion that he had never held any other position in connection with the affairs of Charles Thurneyssen than that of a clerk with an interest, and it therefore declared that the demand for including him in the bankruptcy must be dismissed with costs; the costs, however, to be paid out of the bankrupts' estate.

A singular trial has just terminated before the French tribunals in Algeria, which, while it illustrates their peculiar manner of distributing justice, is equally interesting for the picture it affords of Arab manners and character. On the 12th of last September the diligence between Tlemcen and Oran was stopped by Arab marauders. Amongst the passengers was the Aga Ben Abdallah. The other passengers, after a short contest, fled, and when they returned with help, they found in the coupé the dead body of Ben Abdallah, and his secretary mortally wounded lying by his side. The crime, of course, caused great sensation in Oran; and Montauban, the general of the district, urged Captain Doineau, the commander of the district, to discover the murderers. Doineau said, he suspected the tribe of the Beni Nar, and indicated Tlemcen as the home of the criminals. But the widow of Ben Abdallah, breaking through the reserve of the harem, rushed into the street and accused Aga Bel Hadj. She had previously lost three other husbands, and all by deaths equally violent. Bel Hadj, to his Arab cunning, adds the politeness and philosophy of a Parisian. He is an officer of the Legion of Honour, and has been nine years in the service of France. He had been grossly insulted by the murdered man. Shortly after he was arrested, Bel Hadj, and seventeen other Arabs, confessed that they had murdered Ben Abdallah, but that Captain Doineau directed them, partly using his official power, but relying mainly, it is clear, on the force of his personal character. If the eighteen Arabs who made this singular confession were of one story, their evidence would be satisfactory; but it is far from being so. However, they are all placed in the dark, from whence they are alternately called to give evidence against themselves and their comrades. Each day of the trial betrays new contradictions. Bel Hadj is, however, the prince of prevaricators. He tells, on the first day, a circumstantial story, accusing Doineau. On the next day, during the examination of another accusing witness, Doineau exclaims: "Let Bel Hadj be again examined. It is impossible that that man, whom I have never injured, and whose good services to France have won him the rank of Aga, and the decoration of officer of the Legion of Honour, should not return to the truth." This curious way of taking evidence is, it seems, allowed in French courts, and Bel Hadj is called again to confront the Kodja Si Mohamed, who has sworn against Doineau. Bel Hadj is asked again to tell the truth: "Did Doineau command them to kill the Aga?" Bel Hadj hesitates, then turns to the Kodja, and pressing his hands on his breast, and in a voice of remarkable sweetness, says to him, "Now that we are in the face of death, should we accuse the Captain?" This, of course, produces "lively sensation." But the next day the Aga again accuses Doineau; and so he goes on from prevarication to prevarication. The result, however, is, that Captain Doineau has been condemned to death, and his accomplices to twenty years' deportation. Captain Doineau, who is a nephew of M. Billault, has appealed against the decision of the Court.

A curious point has just been decided by the Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine. There is a café at the corner of the Rue Lepelletier, known by the name of the Café Riche, of which M. Garin is proprietor. One of the heirs of M. Riche, the founder of the café, being tired of seeing his name serve for a sign to the café, brought M. Garin before the tribunal to make him resign the name. After a very elaborate argument, the tribunal has decided that a family name is an imprescriptible property, which cannot be alienated but by the will of those who have the right to bear it; and though during many years the heirs of M. Riche have tolerated their name serving for a sign to the establishment in question, they have a perfect right to withdraw that tolerance. M. Garin, therefore, is within a fortnight entirely to remove the name of Riche, and meanwhile is condemned in the costs.

The Court of Assize has condemned (par contumace) Ledru Rollin, Mazzini, Massarenti, and Campanella to deportation. When a judgment par contumace is pronounced, the intervention of a jury is not required, and it is customary to condemn the absent to the highest punishment which has been inflicted on the accused who were present. As, therefore, Tibaldi was condemned to deportation, Ledru Rollin, Mazzini, Massarenti, and Campanella have had the same sentence pronounced upon them. The proceedings occupied but a short time. There was no address from the public prosecutor, and no defence. The act of accusation was merely read, and, after a few observations from the president, judgment was pronounced.

A very interesting case is shortly to come before the Civil Tribunal in Paris. A Monsieur de M—— died on the 27th of February last, leaving a will, entirely in his own handwriting, which he concludes thus:—"And to testify my affection for my nephews, Charles and Henri de M——, I bequeath to each d'eux (i. e. of them) (or deux, i. e. two) hundred thousand francs." The paper was folded before the ink was dry, and the writing is blotted in many places. The legatees assert that the apostrophe is one of those blots; but the heir-at-law, a legitimate son of the defunct, maintains, on the contrary, that the apostrophe is intentional. It will be curious to watch the result of the contest.

CAP. XIII.—An Act to facilitate the procuring of Sites for Workhouses in certain cases.

The intention of this Act is to provide for a casus omissus in 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69. That statute was passed in 1835, in order to remove some difficulties as to the sale and purchase of workhouses and other parish property, under the then existing law; and (among other things) it enabled any lay or ecclesiastical corporation, aggregate or sole, to dispose of, by way of absolute sale or exchange, any lands or buildings for the purpose of a workhouse, or for any other purpose relating to the relief of the poor approved by the Poor-law Board: and it contained provisions for effecting such a transaction, when the owner of the land or building required was "a person idiot, lunatic, or under any other disability," through such person's guardian, trustee, husband, or committee; but it failed to provide for the case of the land or building desired belonging to an ecclesiastical corporation sole (a bishop, for example, or a benefice), and the person for the time being entitled to such land or building in virtue of his office happening to be insane.

The Act under discussion provides for such a contingency, by enacting (s. 1), that, in the event of the guardians of any union or parish—or the managers of any of the school districts established under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 10, s. 40 (as amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 82, and 13 & 14 Vict. cc. 11, 101), for the management of infant poor of sixteen years of age and under, chargeable, deserted, or placed in the school of the district by their parents or guardians—being desirous, for any of the above purposes, to purchase or exchange land or building belonging to any ecclesiastical corporation sole, the person entitled thereto for the time being having been found to be insane upon a commission issued under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70 ("The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853"), such guardians or managers may petition the Lord Chancellor for leave to purchase or exchange the same accordingly; and, on such petition, the Lord Chancellor may make such order as he shall think proper. But his order, authorising the sale or exchange, will not be sufficient for the purpose, unless there be also obtained, in all cases, the consent of the ordinary having jurisdiction over such corporation (i.e. in the case of a parson, the consent of the bishop; and of a bishop, of the archbishop of the province); and, in certain cases, other consents also. Thus—1. In the case of an incumbent of a benefice, the consent also of the patron. 2. In the case of the land or building desired having been purchased, or become appropriated, or annexed to a benefice, by or with the consent, concurrence, or direction of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (as to which see 2 & 3 Ann. c. 11), the consent also of such governors. In either of these two cases, the proceeds from the transaction are, by s. 2 of the Act under discussion, to be paid to such governors, and the receipt of their treasurer is a sufficient discharge; and the proceeds are, as the general rule, and subject to any stipulation or agreement as to the expenses of the sale or exchange, to be appropriated by the governors to the particular benefice to which the land or building belonged. On the other hand, in all other cases, the proceeds (by s. 1) are to be paid into the Bank of England, to be placed to the Accountant-General's account to the credit of the corporation sole from which the land or building is bought or exchanged; and thenceforth (by a provision of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69, which is incorporated into the Act under discussion with respect to these cases), the Court of Chancery may, on petition or motion of any claimant, order summarily the investment of such proceeds in the purchase of real estates or of public funds; and the rents and dividends to be distributed according to the respective interests of the claimants; and may make such other order in the premises as shall seem reasonable.

The 3rd section of the Act under discussion has reference to the above proceedings authorised by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69, s. 2; and it provides, that, until such reinvestment of the proceeds of the transaction for the benefit of the corporation, the interest, dividends, and annual income thereof shall be applied in like manner as the rents and profits of the land or buildings would have been had the transaction not taken place.

The 4th and 5th sections of the Act under discussion regulate the manner in which the consents required by the Act are to be given—viz. in general, by executing the deed or assurance by which the land or building is conveyed or assured. But there is a proviso, that, in the case of lands or buildings of copyhold or customary tenure, the consent may be under the corporate seal, or hand and seal (as the case may be) of each of the consenting parties; such writing to be entered, with the surrender, on the court rolls of the manor. And it is also provided, that, where the benefice from which the land or building is purchased belongs to the Duchy of Cornwall, or has for its patron the Crown, or one under disability, the consent of the patron shall be testified by the persons mentioned by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 23, as to houses for the beneficed clergy—viz. (in the case of the Crown) by the Treasury, if the benefice exceed in yearly value £20, otherwise by the Lord Chancellor; and (in the case of a patron under disability), by the guardian, committee, or husband; but a feme covert must add her written consent as well.

It is noticeable that the provisions contained in the 5th section of the Act under discussion, as to Crown benefices and persons under disability, refer, by its terms, only to the case of the sale of lands and buildings under the Act. They are, however, probably intended to extend also to cases of exchange.

By s. 6 of the Act under discussion, the meaning of the word "benefice," as laid down in the 12th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 (the Pluralities and Residence Act), is adopted—viz. a benefice with cure of souls as distinct from a cathedral preferment, to which the term in a larger sense extends (3 Inst. 174).

The 7th and remaining section of the Act under discussion incorporates with it the provisions of 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 50, as to lands and hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure, and of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 69, as to the conveyance of workhouses, &c., to unions, under the superintendence of the Poor-law Board.

CAPS. XIV., LXXX.—Two Acts "to amend the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856."

It is necessary to examine these two statutes together—the latter by way of anticipation of its order in the session—as their common object is to remedy the defects of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, or "the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856," hereafter called "The Principal Act." By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14 (hereafter called "the Act under discussion") certain alterations and additions are made in the first, third, and fifth Parts of the Principal Act. These are—1. As to the registration of the company; 2. As to the register of the shareholders; 3. As to the mode of winding up by court; 4. As to the official liquidators; 5. As to the forms authorised by the Principal Act; 6. As to the repeal of statutes in force prior to the Principal Act; 7. As to the temporary provisions of the Principal Act. Besides these, the Act under discussion provides for a subject not dealt with in the Principal Act—viz. 8. Security for costs in certain cases.

1. As to the registration of the company.—By the 4th section of the Principal Act, it was, in effect, provided, that not more than twenty persons (other than miners in the Stannaries) should, without being registered or authorised by private Act or charter, carry on in partnership "any trade or business having gain for its object;" and that every of such persons carrying on business contrary to that provision should be liable for the payment of the whole of the partnership debts (as though a member of a trading partnership at common law), and might also be sued for the same without the joinder of the other members. It was made an objection to this provision that it was doubtful whether, by reason of its terms, more than twenty persons, unregistered, and not falling among any of the classes above mentioned, could carry on such business in partnership even at the risks above specified; and, therefore, the Act under discussion repeals the provision, and substantially re-enacts it, leaving out the substantive prohibition. It also substitutes for the words "trade or business having gain for its object," the words "trade or business having for its object the procurement of gain to the partnership."

Again, by s. 13 of the Principal Act, the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies is directed to certify to any company its incorporation, on registration of the memorandum of association mentioned in the 5th section of that Act. By the 4th section of the Act under discussion, a copy of this certificate can now be procured by any person on payment of five shillings.

2. As to the register of the shareholders.—By the Principal Act, the capital of registered companies is treated as divided into numbered shares of fixed amount; and, by its 16th and 17th sections, companies are directed to keep a general register of their shareholders, and to forward annually to the Registrar a list of the shareholders for the current year. The 5th section of the Act under discussion allows shares fully paid up to be converted into stock, and, as to such part of the capital, dispenses with the register and annual list of shareholders. But (by s. 6) notice must be given to the Registrar of an intended conversion of capital into stock, and (by s. 7) a register of the names and addresses of the stockholders is to be kept for inspection at the company's office. Also (by ss. 8 and 9), the provisions in the Principal Act as to remedying improper entries or omissions in the register of *share*holders, and as to the rectification in general of the register, are extended to the case of *stock*holders. Moreover (by s. 10) a penalty of £1 for every offence is laid on a company making default in forwarding to each of its shareholders, who shall apply for the same, a copy of the memorandum and articles of association.

3. As to the mode of Winding-up by the Court.—The 11th section of the Act under discussion gives authority to the Court winding up a company, on the application of the official liquidator, to issue a warrant for the arrest and seizure of the property of any contributory about to quit the United Kingdom, or otherwise abscond, or to remove or conceal any of his goods and chattels, for the purpose of evading payment of calls, or avoiding examination in respect of the affairs of the company. Any contributory, however, so dealt with may (by s. 12) apply to the Court for his discharge or for the re-delivery to him of his property; and such order shall be made as seems just. By s. 13 of the same Act, all calls made on contributories under s. 82 or s. 104 of the Principal Act are to be deemed, in England and Ireland, specialty debts from the contributory to the company. It may be presumed that the object of this provision is to make the personal estate of a contributory on whom such call has been made, chargeable thereto in the hands of his executor or administrator, in preference to his simple contract debts; and to make his real estate chargeable therewith, in certain cases, in the same priority, through the medium of the Court of Chancery.

4. As to the Official Liquidators.—Several changes as to these are introduced by the Act under discussion. By ss. 14 and 15 they are for the future to be appointed with reference to, and as the representatives of, both the creditors and the contributories. By ss. 16, 17, and 18 they are intrusted with additional powers to those given them by the Principal Act, with regard to compromising debts, calls, and claims, selling the property of the company in the course of liquidation, and calling together general meetings of such company. After these provisions as to official liquidators, there is (somewhat out of place) an enactment in the Act under discussion (s. 19) to enable the Court winding up a company to adopt, partly or wholly, proceedings previously taken under a voluntary winding up. The Act under discussion then reverts to the position of official liquidators; and makes them (by s. 20) liable to a penalty for failing to report to the registrar the decree or the resolution declaring the dissolution or the fair winding up of any company they have been engaged in liquidating, either under the court, or voluntarily; and (by s. 21) constituting them trustees, under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96—the Act of 1847 for securing trust funds, and for the relief of trustees—with regard to any property of the company they shall find themselves unable to distribute at the expiration of twelve months from the dissolution of such company, owing to the death or absence of the parties entitled thereto.

5. As to the Forms authorised by the Principal Act.—The schedule to that Act contains (Table B) certain regulations for the management of registered companies; which by s. 9 of that Act, if there be no regulations prescribed in the articles of association, or, so far as such table is consistent with the regulations annexed to or indorsed on such articles—are to be deemed the "regulations" of the company. But, by the 58th section of that Act, authority was given to the Board of Trade, to make alterations from time to time in the forms and tables of the schedule. By s. 22 of the Act under discussion, however, no such alteration is to affect any company registered prior to such alteration, unless adopted by special resolution of the company.

6. As to the Repeal of Statutes in force prior to the Principal Act.—The 107th section of that Act repealed 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 (the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1844), the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78 (for the amendment of the Act last mentioned), and the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 133 (the Limited Liability Act, 1855)—but, so far as regarded any company completely registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, not till such company registered under the Principal Act. Under this section a difficulty arose as to insurance companies, they (together with banking associations*), being expressly excepted from the operation of the Principal Act. Hence the 23rd section of the Act under discussion repeals the 107th section of the Principal Act, and proceeds itself to enact, with reference to the three Acts above mentioned, that they "shall be deemed to have been, and still to remain, unrepealed as to any company completely registered" (i. e. under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110) "which has not obtained registration under the Principal Act, until such time as such company obtains registration under" the Principal Act, or the Act under discussion, "but from and after such time, and not before, shall be repealed as to such last-mentioned company; and, subject as aforesaid," all the said three Acts "shall be repealed." It was, however, later in the session discovered that that section did not meet the case of insurance companies, and therefore was passed 20 & 21 Vict. c. 80, called (as well as the Act under discussion) "An Act to amend the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856." By this Act it is enacted, that neither the Principal Act nor the Act under discussion shall be deemed to have been repealed as respects insurance companies already or to be hereafter formed under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, or any Act amending the same, or relating to such companies. There is, however, the following provision as to certain particular insurance companies:—Provided, that, if any insurance company formed under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, or the directors of, or shareholders in, any such company, have, during the interval between the passing of the Principal Act and the Act under discussion, acted as if the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, had, as to such company, been repealed by such Principal Act, then, "so far as affects the mutual rights and relations of the said company, its directors and officers, and late or present shareholders, and so far as affects any penalties which the said company, or its directors, officers, or shareholders may have incurred by non-observance of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, the said 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, shall, as regards the actions of such company, its directors and shareholders, during such interval as aforesaid, be deemed to have been repealed." The result of all this seems to be, that (whatever may have been intended by the Principal Act) the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78, are still the statutes under which all existing insurance companies are regulated, and under which future ones are to be formed. It is to be remembered that companies for assurance are expressly excluded from the Limited Liability Act, 1855.

7. As to the temporary provisions of the Principal Act.—After a provision (s. 25) as to companies registered under the Principal Act between 3rd Nov. 1856, and the date of the Act under discussion, and after the repeal of the 110th section of the Principal Act, the Act under discussion (by s. 27) fixes 2nd Nov. 1857, as the date before which companies completely registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 (except insurance companies), or under the Limited Liability Act, 1855, must register under the Principal Act, or the Act under discussion; and, in default, visits them with certain penalties and incapacities. By s. 29, certain existing companies not required by law to be registered may, nevertheless, register on certain conditions; and by s. 33, the 113th section of the Principal Act is repealed, and, in its place, is inserted a provision, that, on compliance with the requisitions as to registration, the Registrar shall certify to any existing company that it is incorporated as "limited," or otherwise; and it is provided, that the provisions by which such company was formerly regulated or constituted, shall be deemed thenceforth the "regulations" of the company, as if they had been in a registered memorandum and articles of association; and that the provisions of the Principal Act and of the Act under discussion shall apply to such company, with certain reservations and provisoes.

8. Finally, as to security for costs in certain cases.—It is provided by s. 84 of the Act under discussion, that, where a limited company is plaintiff or pursuer in any legal proceeding, any judge with jurisdiction, if he has reason to be satisfied that the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay the costs of the defendant, if successful—may require security to be given for such costs, and, in the meantime, may stay all the proceedings.

* Banking companies are now regulated under another Act of the present session—viz. c. 49.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

GAMING—ILLEGAL CONTRACT.

Byers v. Adams, In re Law, 5 W. R. 795.

The 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, renders void all contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering, and enacts that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering money alleged to be won upon wager, or deposited in the hands of a person to abide the event. There have been numerous decisions at law, some of which have tended to throw doubt upon the construction of the very clear and intelligible provisions contained in this section of the statute. We are not aware that the subject has come under the consideration of a court of equity, until the case of Byers v. Adams. In Johnson v. Lansley (12 Com. B.

Rep. 468), two persons jointly made bets with third persons on a horse-race. One of the two persons received the money, and gave the other, for his share, a bill for the amount, accepted by a stranger. In that case, the Court of Common Pleas held that the indorsee was not precluded by the 18th section from suing the acceptor upon the bill. "Before the statute," said Maule, J., "he would have been bound to pay over the money, and I find nothing in that statute to excuse him from doing so;" and all the judges appeared to be of opinion that there was nothing in the Act to render betting on a horse-race illegal—Maule, J., observing that the 18th section treated "the money which is in a man's pocket at the time as the reasonable limit to which he may gamble." In a subsequent case (Knight v. Cambers, 15 Com. B. Rep. 562) the same Court held, that it was no answer to an action for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant's use, at his request, that the money was paid in respect of losses on wagering contracts made void by the 18th section. The contracts in that case were for the sale of shares in a company, and, under the circumstances, the defendant contended that the contracts in question were by way of gaming and wagering, and, therefore, void; and that the plaintiff, who was the sharebroker, and had paid the amount of the loss resulting from the transactions, had no right to recover the amount so paid; but Maule, J., considered, that, assuming the original contract to have been void, there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from recovering money afterwards paid by him at the defendant's request; and the case appeared so plain to the other members of the court, that judgment was pronounced for the plaintiff without going into any discussion on the merits of the question. Fitch v. Jones (5 Ell. & Blackb. 238) is a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench during the same year as the last-mentioned case—viz. in 1855. In Fitch v. Jones, which was an action on a promissory note, the plea was, that the defendant made the note, and delivered it to the indorser in payment of a bet on the amount of hop duty, and that the plaintiff took it when overdue, and without value; and it was there held, that, although proof that a negotiable instrument was affected with fraud or illegality in the hands of a previous holder raised a presumption that he would indorse it away to an agent without value, the presumption did not arise when the previous holder merely held without consideration; and that a bet, though void, and, therefore, no consideration, was not illegal so as to raise a presumption that the indorsement was without value. In Byers v. Adams, A. instructed B. to back a horse in £100 for a race, which B. did with C. The horse won, and B., having received the amount of the bet from C., died without paying it over to A.; and the question was, whether A. was a creditor upon B.'s estate for that amount. Stuart, V. C., notwithstanding the cases to which we have referred, and other decisions at common law to a similar effect, held that A. was not a creditor. His Honour considered that the transaction was struck at by the express provisions of the statute; and as to the cases at common law, in which there were acceptances or promissory notes, he observed that they "could only be accounted for upon the principle that the money was recoverable upon a bill of exchange or promissory note as on a legal consideration." It was, however, properly argued for the person claiming to be creditor that the money had been received from a third person for the use of the claimant, and that it was, therefore, to be considered as held to his use, irrespective of the circumstances under which it was obtained, and that the holder was as much bound as if he had accepted a bill of exchange; but his Honour was of opinion that the language of the section was too explicit to admit of a doubt. That his opinion as to the construction of the statute is somewhat at variance with the views expressed by the common law judges is obvious, we think, from his Honour's statement of its general effect—viz. that the "statute had enacted, in the plainest terms, that courts of law and equity should not countenance suits instituted for the recovery of sums of money or other valuable things alleged to have been won on a wager." In this case, however, there could hardly be a doubt, upon the construction of the statute, that A., the claimant, who was the winner of the bet, could not maintain a suit for the recovery of the money won, B. the holder of the money having been the person who, at A.'s request, negotiated the making of the bet.

EXECUTOR—CREDITOR—PUBLIC COMPANY.

Labouchere v. Tupper, 5 W. R. 797.

This case, which was a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, decided that the assets of a deceased shareholder in a joint-stock company were not liable to creditors for debts contracted subsequently to the testator's death, although the executor continued to hold the shares and receive the dividends during the time which intervened between the death of the testator and the failure of the company—a period of more than three years. The principle of the decision is thus expressed by Knight Bruce, L. J., who delivered the judgment of their Lordships:—"The executor of a trader carrying on the trade after his death, though doing so avowedly in the character of executor, is nevertheless personally liable for all the debts contracted in the trade after his death, whether he is entitled or not entitled to be wholly or to any extent indemnified by the testator's personal estate, and whether it is sufficient or insufficient for the purpose; nor does the propriety of his conduct, as between himself and those beneficially interested in the testator's personal estate, give the creditors of the trade, becoming so after the death, the rights of creditors of the testator—it being immaterial, also, as far as they are concerned, whether the testator, if he had a partner, was bound by a covenant with him, that the testator's executors should continue the trade in partnership with the surviving partner. The latest authorities on the point are, we conceive, thus, and appear to their Lordships preponderant and correct."

The case was on appeal from a decree of the Court of Chancery in the Isle of Man; but it was assumed in argument, and acquiesced in by the Bench, that there was no difference between the law of England and that of the Isle of Man as to the principles and rules affecting the question at issue. The decision, therefore, is an important authority in our law, and is an illustration of the manner in which our Courts apply the general doctrines affecting executors in cases now of very common occurrence—viz. where their testators were members of joint-stock companies at the time of their death. The legal year which has just drawn to a close has been prolific in decisions affecting the rights and duties of executors placed in such a position.*

WILL — CONSTRUCTION — "UNMARRIED."

In re Gratton's Trusts, 5 W. R. 795.

There are several reported cases in which Courts of equity have been called upon to construe the meaning of the term "unmarried." In Hall v. Robertson (4 De G. Mac. & Gor. 781), a gift by will to "unmarried daughters" equally, was held by Stuart, V. C., to mean daughters who never married; but, on appeal, the Lords Justices varied the order of the Court below by declaring that the testator intended by the term "unmarried" to point to persons unmarried at the time of making the will, and therefore included a daughter who had married and become a widow between the date of the will and the death of the testator. Their Lordships appear to have been a good deal influenced by the consideration, that, if they did not so construe the will, there might be circumstances in which there could be no division of the property, for all the daughters might become married after the testator's death. Subsequently, however, in Re Thistlethwaite's Trust (3 W. R. 466), which was an appeal from the decision of the same learned judge, their Lordships construed the word "unmarried" as meaning never having been married; at the same time being very careful to insist that they arrived at that conclusion from the whole context of the will; and that their decision was not to be considered as settling the interpretation which was in general to be given to the word in wills. In Re Norman (3 De G. Mac. & Gor. 967), their Lordships reversed a decision of Kindersley, V. C., who held that the expression in a will, "dying without being married," meant without having ever been married. The Lords Justices were of opinion that the true grammatical construction was—dying without the person (a lady) having a husband at the time of her death. In Re Gratton's Trusts (5 W. R. 795), a sum of money was given by will to such person as A. C., a married woman, should appoint; and in default, after her death, the same was to go to her next of kin as if she had died "intestate and unmarried." She died without having executed the power, leaving her husband and three children surviving, under which circumstances, Stuart, V. C., was of opinion that the intention was to exclude the husband in the event which had happened, and that, in effect, the words used by the testator—viz. "intestate and unmarried"—were equivalent to "intestate and a widow." In all these cases, as in every case where the intention of a testator is to be gathered, not merely from some particular word which he may have used, but from the whole scope of the will, and from the context generally, decisions of the highest courts are not of very great value in construing other wills; but they are very useful to the practitioner who is in the habit of framing such instruments, inasmuch as they call his attention to states of circumstances and contingencies which may arise, for which it may be proper for him sometimes to make particular provision, or, at all events, to bear them in mind, while he is engaged in giving shape and effect to the intentions of testators.

III. Practical Improvements.

Proposed Alteration of Terms, Circuits, and Sittings.—The Council having been favoured with a communication from the Commissioners for inquiring into the arrangements for transacting the judicial business of the superior courts of common law, and the times and places of holding assizes; and the Commissioners having invited the suggestions of the Council on the subject-matters of the inquiry, the Council, with the valuable aid of their Common Law Committee, considered it advisable, in the first instance, to transmit suggestions proposing that there should be three instead of four terms, three circuits for civil business, and three Nisi Prius sittings in London and Middlesex.

They subsequently proceeded to consider some of the details for carrying into effect the proposed alterations, and suggested as follows:—

The first circuit to commence about 6th January, and continue till the middle of February. Hilary Term to commence the 14th or 15th of February, and to continue till 13th or 14th March. The sittings in London and Middlesex then to take place, and continue till the 13th or 14th April.

The second circuit from 14th April to 24th or 25th May. Easter term to be abolished, and Trinity to commence the 25th or 26th May, and continue to 22nd or 24th June. The sittings in London and Middlesex to be held from 24th June to about 22nd July.

The third or summer circuit from 24th July to the end of August. Michaelmas term to begin on the 1st November and end on the 27th. The sittings in London and Westminster to commence immediately after Michaelmas term, and continue till the day before Christmas.

It was considered essential in this inquiry to ascertain the opinions of the several committees of the provincial law societies on the proposed changes, and letters were accordingly sent to those societies requesting their opinions on the following points of inquiry:—

1. The advantages to be gained by having three circuits in the year, instead of two.
2. The periods of the year at which the circuits should take place.
3 The discontinuing assizes at small towns, and transferring the business to adjoining places.
4. Re-arranging the assizes, and appointing some to be held at large towns which are now without assizes.
5. The best means of arranging such changes with reference to the time of holding Quarter Sessions.
6. The redistribution of the circuits, either by increasing the number of the circuits, or by re-arranging the length of each circuit, and equalising the duration of the whole.

The Council have been favoured with answers on these points from several of the provincial law societies, and with one exception on the Western Circuit, they have intimated their concurrence in most of the suggestions of the Council, but have added several important recommendations, which have been submitted to the Commissioners.

Several members of the Council, with some of the members of the Society, have attended the Commissioners, and given their views in detail, which will, of course, appear in the Commissioners' Report.

Delays in the Chancery Offices.—Notwithstanding the large diminution which has been effected in the expense and delay of Chancery proceedings by the recent Statutes and Orders of Court, there are still several complaints of delay in conducting the business at some of the offices of the Court.

Although causes are heard, motions made, and decrees and orders pronounced with as much expedition as can be desired on the part of the suitors, consistently with a due and proper attention to their interests, it is the subject of very general complaint that such decrees and orders are not promptly issued and carried into effect. The truth is, that there are numerous delays at the four principal offices where the details of the business of the Court have to be investigated and completed—namely, at the chief clerks' offices, the registrars' office, the taxing-masters' offices, and the Accountant-General's office; and without imputing blame to any of the present officers, the Council are of opinion that the evils complained of require to be redressed, and they have now under their consideration suggestions for expediting the despatch of business in the several offices above mentioned.

Administration of Oaths by London Commissioners.—According to the present practice, commissions for taking affidavits in the several superior courts of common law are issued to every attorney residing at the distance of ten miles or upwards from London; but such commissions do not authorise the administration of an oath within ten miles of London. The consequence of this restriction is, that any deponent residing ten miles or more from London can make an affidavit in any action or other proceeding before the nearest attorney who has obtained a commission, at any hour most convenient to all parties; but if the deponent reside in London, or within ten miles, he must either travel beyond ten miles from London to a commissioner, or must attend the Court, or at the judge's chambers, within certain limited hours. It has therefore been submitted to the Chief Justices and the Chief Baron that the public convenience and the saving of expense to the suitor in common law proceedings would be consulted by granting commissions to a sufficient number of attorneys carrying on business in different parts of London to the distance of ten miles therefrom. The Council have not yet received a reply to their application.

Sheriffs' Fees.—A memorial from several under-sheriffs, setting forth the alterations which had taken place since their fees were regulated in the year 1837, having been presented to the judges, the subject has been taken into consideration by the Council; and the masters of the common law courts have been attended; and, considering the circumstances urged by the under-sheriffs, the Council are of opinion that there should be a complete revision of the whole of the sheriffs' fees; and the scale, when satisfactorily arranged between the practitioners on the part of the suitors, and the under-sheriffs and their officers, might be submitted to the masters for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the judges.

New Rules and Orders.—The rules and orders of court which have been printed for the Society during the past year, for the use of the members, are as follows:—

In the *Court of Chancery.

1st February, 1856.—Erasures in Answers, Affidavits, &c.
1st August, 1856.—Obliterating Stamps.
12th November, 1856.—Business of the Judges' Chambers.
15th November, 1856.—Leases and Sales of Settled Estates.

LAW STUDENTS' MUTUAL CORRESPONDING SOCIETY.

Fourth Annual Report of the Committee, presented to the Members 9th April, 1857.

It is with pleasure your Committee are enabled to announce in this, their Fourth Annual Report, the continued success which has attended the operations of the Law Students' Mutual Corresponding Society during the past year; and placed upon a still firmer basis such a systematic means of intercommunication between the junior members of the profession as cannot fail to prove most beneficial to those who may avail themselves of the advantages it offers.

The Society now consists of nearly 100 honorary and ordinary members; a considerable increase since last year, notwithstanding the secession of many of the older members from the ranks of the Society, their terms of articles having expired, and the active duties of the professional life into which they have entered rendering it impossible for them to devote the requisite time and attention to the papers of the Society. It is, however, most gratifying to your Committee to state, that, in nearly every instance of withdrawal, they have received letters speaking in the highest terms of the great advantages derived by the writers whilst members of the Society, one of the most convincing proofs that it is really a most material assistance to the articled clerks in their studies, and most deserving of their support.

* The Chancery Orders of 18th July, 1857, as to enforcing Decrees, &c., are included in the Collection.

The growing importance of the Society has been manifested during the past year by the establishment of a quarterly journal, circulated amongst the members, containing, in a digested form, the most important discussions of the Society, besides other articles of utility and instruction to the law student; and your Committee cannot here omit to express on behalf of the Society their warmest thanks to those gentlemen who have undertaken the labour of preparing and editing the contents of the journal, which, your Committee feel, will be productive of immense advantages to the members of the Society.

Your Committee regret that the steps taken to organise a London section of the Society for viva voce discussions did not meet with that encouragement which had been anticipated, and that the meetings were in consequence discontinued; they hope, however, at some future time, to see the section revived, and would earnestly recommend the consideration of such a course to the members of the Society now residing in the metropolis.

Your Committee deem it advisable to draw the attention of those articled clerks who are not at present aware of the existence of the Society, to its principal features and objects. It is designed—first, as a means of friendly intercourse, and for the purpose of engendering feelings of unanimity and friendship amongst articled clerks generally throughout the kingdom; secondly, to supply the wants of a debating society in small towns by affording a medium for the written discussion of moot points on legal subjects, and the composition of essays; and thirdly, by the same means, to furnish opportunities to the student to apply principles to practice, and thus assist him in obtaining a practical knowledge of his profession; and your Committee feel justified in asserting that every member who, actuated with an earnest desire for self-improvement, will give his full attention to the papers of the Society, cannot fail to acquire an extensive and varied knowledge of the law.

With regard to the financial position of the Society, your Committee feel pleasure in stating, that, after defraying all the expenses of the past year, an ample balance remains to the credit of the Society. For the Committee,

CHARLES R. GILMAN,

Norwich, August, 1857. Hon. Secretary.

Correspondence.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

The next case which has been considered of sufficient interest to merit special notice in this Journal is Clarke & Others, Wellwood's Trustees, against Mrs. Ann Rattray & Others, 17th Dec., 1856. This case came into court, at the instance of the trustees, in the shape of a multiple-poinding, a form of process resembling interpleader in England, and in which almost every kind of question may be raised and disposed of. The case has come before the court at various times, and upon various points; but we only intend to notice it in reference to the questions brought before the court on the date above mentioned, which included one in regard to the right of the agent for the trustees, who was himself a trustee, to make certain professional and other charges against the estate.

The truster, Mr. Wellwood, died in February, 1847, having conveyed his whole estate to his widow and certain other persons as trustees. The primary trust purposes were to pay his debts and certain annuities, legacies, and provisions, which need not be particularly specified. By the 8th purpose of the trust, the trustees were directed to entail the lands of Foleyhills and Colinton Mains upon his granddaughter, Maria Ann Boswell (or Rattray), and the heirs whomsoever of her body, upon her attaining majority. The trustees were further directed to accumulate the rents and produce of the trust lands so to be entailed, "so long as vested in them," and to pay over the same, along with the residue of his means and estate remaining after satisfying the other purposes of the trust, to his four grandchildren, "equally between them and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the entail of the said lands has been executed."

The trust deed further declared, that, if Maria Ann Boswell married without the consent of the trustees, she should forfeit the estate. She married without asking this consent; but in 1851 the trustees stated, judicially, that they consented to the marriage, and they were directed to entail the estate upon their ward in terms of the trust deed, which was accordingly done. Maria Ann Boswell (or Rattray), the heiress of entail, had attained majority in 1849; she was married in 1848.

The accounts of the trustees were then remitted to Mr. Donald Lindsay, accountant, and Mr. Thomas Ranken, S.S.C., for the purpose of being audited and adjusted, with the view of ascertaining the amount of accumulated rents and residue divisible among the four granddaughters, that the trustees might be exonered.

The trustees in their accounts debited themselves, for behoof of the general and residuary legatees, with the rents of the entailed lands for crop 1849, and the first half of crop 1850; and credited themselves with all payments on account of these lands applicable to the same period. They further credited themselves, as against those parties, with certain other items, including professional and other charges made against the estate by Mr. Sands, W.S., one of their number, whom they had appointed to be their agent, factor, and cashier. The rents above mentioned were credited against the residuary legatees in consequence of an arrangement which had been entered into with the view of avoiding a question which arose as to when Maria Ann Boswell (or Rattray) became entitled to these rents, in consequence of not having obtained the consent of the trustees previous to her marriage.

Mrs. Hill, one of the residuary legatees, and her husband, besides objecting to the board allowed to Mrs. Rattray, objected to the following items of charge in the trustees' accounts:—1st. The expense of a new cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains, part of the estate entailed on Mrs. Rattray (Maria Ann Boswell)—on the ground that it was beyond the power of the trustees to make such an application of the trust-funds, and so favouring the heiress of entail to the injury and damage of the residuary legatees, seeing that there was no legal obligation on them to make any such expenditure. 2nd. The charges for making up the title to the entailed estate—on the ground that it was chargeable against Mrs. Rattray. 3rd. The charges made by Mr. Sands for commission and professional trouble—on the ground that he was not entitled, being a trustee, to make such charges: and 4th. The amount of interest allowed by Mr. Sands on the trust funds retained in his hands—on the ground that he was not entitled to mix up the trust funds with his own, but was bound to have placed them in bank, upon separate account, in name of the trustees.

In regard to the first objection, it was answered that the expenditure objected to was proper in itself, and was truly a charge against the rents, which Mrs. Rattray had given up: to the second, that the expenses referred to were incurred in carrying out the directions of the truster, and were part of the expenses of executing the trust; to the third, that the business charged for was all necessary business, and was for work done over and above Mr. Sands' fair share of duty as a trustee, and must have been incurred to another agent, if he had not been employed; to the fourth, that Mr. Sands had not retained funds longer than was necessary to collect them, for the purpose of meeting the obligations of the trustees.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th February, 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—Finds that both parties have "expressed their adherence to the arrangement made on 26th February, 1852, by which the additional claim of Mrs. Rattray was disposed of; and, having considered the objections taken to the accounts of the trustees, repels the objection taken to the charge in the trustees' accounts for £145, expended in December, 1850, in building a cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains." Then follow some findings relative to the rate of board, which are not important; after which the interlocutor proceeds as follows:—"Finds that Mr. Warren H. Sands, himself a trustee, acted as factor, cashier, and law agent for the trust, and that his accounts, after due examination, have been found to be sufficiently vouched, and to be reasonable in amount. Finds that Mr. Sands is not entitled to charge any commission or factor's fee against the trust estate for his management as factor and cashier. Finds, that, in so far as Mr. Sands' accounts as law agent have been incurred in the conduct of suits in which the trustees were parties, and he acted as agent for the trust in the suits, he is entitled to make a charge against the trust estate for his professional remuneration; but that, in so far as his said accounts have been incurred in the administration of the affairs of the trust, apart from judicial proceedings, Mr. Sands is not entitled to claim against the trust estate any professional remuneration, but only to be reimbursed his outlay. Repels the objection by the claimants to the charge for £25, paid to Mr. Gardner, the agent of the heiress of entail, for his business account in the execution of the entail, which, by the terms of the trust deed, the trustees were bound to execute, and to that extent sustains the charge against the trust estate." Then follows a finding of consent; and lastly, "Finds, that, under all the circumstances, the interest chargeable against Mr. Sands during his management has been fairly stated in the accounts, and that no higher interest is exigible." With these findings, appoints the case to be put to the roll, &c.

To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary (Ardmillan) added the following note:—"The point of difficulty in this case relates to the business accounts of Mr. Sands, W.S., who, being himself a trustee, was factor, cashier, and law agent to the trust. He had been previously agent for the family, and was well acquainted with the affairs. He was one of several trustees; and when he was appointed factor, a quorum was left to control him, and his management has been satisfactory to all the trustees, and favourably reported upon by Mr. Donald Lindsay and Mr. Thomas Ranken. It is, accordingly, a hard case for the application of the rule, that a trustee shall make no profit by his office; and it is not without some hesitation that his professional remuneration as law agent has been limited to charges for agency in judicial proceedings. But the general rule of law is now settled, and it has been declared by the highest authority to be important and salutary. The case of Horne against Pringle was decided in the House of Lords, on June 22, 1841 (2 Rob. App. p. 384); the case of Seaton against Dawson, in this court, on Dec. 18, 1841 (4 Dun. 319); and the case of Cullen against Baillie, on Feb. 20, 1846 (8 Dun. 517). And the promulgation of the rule, at least within the legal profession, must be viewed as complete before the date of Mr. Wellwood's death, on Feb. 25, 1847. So that the administration of this trust commenced after the rule had been judicially announced and enforced—in this respect differing from the case of Miller's Trustees against Miller, Feb. 23, 1848 (10 Dun. 765): A sum of £50 was bequeathed to each of the trustees; the beneficiaries are many of them in minority, and there are no grounds for inferring adoption or homologation of the agency of Mr. Sands as professional, and to be remunerated, so as to bring the case within the operation of the principle recognised, under special circumstances, in Ommaney v. Smith, March 3, 1854 (16 Dun. 721). It was contended by the trustees, that, Mr. Sands being one of several trustees, and there being a quorum without him, he is not within the general rule; and the case of Cradock against Pyper, Jan. 18, 1850, was strongly founded upon in support of this argument. But after careful consideration of the decision, in Cradock v. Pyper, by Lord Cottenham (1 Hall and Twells' Chan. Rep. p. 617), as well as the previous case of New v. Jones, Aug. 8, 1833 (reported in a note to the report of Cradock v. Pyper, as above, p. 63), decided by Lord Lyndhurst, when Chief Baron, and the more recent case of Lincoln v. Windsor, July 9, 1851 (20 Law Journ. Chan. Rep. p. 531), decided by V. C. Turner, the Lord Ordinary has felt himself unable to recognise any ground of exception from the general rule, in the mere fact that the trustee acting as agent is not a sole trustee, but one of several. In the case last mentioned, the point is expressly referred to by the Vice-Chancellor, and no ground for this distinction is recognised; and in the case of the Bon Accord Assurance Company v. Souter's Trustees, June 13, 1850 (12 Dun. 1010), the claim for professional remuneration was rejected, though there were several trustees. A distinction in regard to agency in a suit, where the trustees were parties, where a law agent must have been employed, and where the costs of the estate have not been augmented, seems to have been recognised in England, and also in the case of Tindlay's Trustees v. M'Onie, March 6, 1852 (14 Dun. p. 621); and to this exception effect has been given in the present case." Then follow some general remarks which are not important.

Both parties reclaimed, and were heard on their pleas—nothing was said as to the rate of board. The other objections above-mentioned were fully discussed.

The Lord President, with whom Lords Ivory and Curriehill concurred, in delivering judgment, said, the points which the Lord Ordinary had decided are various, and may be taken in the same order as he has taken them. The first objection disposed of relates to the sum expended in building the cattle-shed on Colinton Mains, in Dec. 1850, viz. £145, for which the Lord Ordinary has allowed the trustees to take credit. His Lordship then stated fully the circumstances under which the expenditure was made, and those under which the arrangement took place, whereby the rents for the first half of crop 1850 and previous years were surrendered to the general residue and continued:—"It appears to us, upon the whole, that his Lordship is right. The arrangement between the landlord and tenant was a most proper one. The rents out of which the expenditure was allowed to be retained were those of 1849. These rents would have belonged to the heiress of entail if the question as to the date of her succession had not arisen, and would have borne the charge. As a matter of compromise, she surrendered these rents; and it must be held that she surrendered them as they stood at the time—that is, subject to the charge upon them arising out of the arrangements between the trustees and the tenant which had been previously concluded."

The next question is as to Mr. Sands' accounts. This must be settled by the recent judgments of the whole Court in the cases of Douglas and Dundas. The broad principle sanctioned by these cases is, that a trustee is not entitled to place himself in a position which may give him an interest possibly adverse to the estate, and so prevent him from discharging his duties faithfully, by giving free and unbiassed advice. With the exception, therefore, of outlay, Mr. Sands' charges must be disallowed, and that part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor will be altered.

Then, as to Gardner's account: There does not appear to be any ground for charging it against the general estate. The trustees were ordered to make an entail of certain lands, and were bound to execute that entail; and they were entitled to employ Mr. Gardner, if they thought fit, but always at the expense of the estate to be so entailed.

Lastly, there is the question of interest, which is important as a question of principle. Mr. Sands was acting as agent for the trust, and he was one of the trustees. I assume that it was necessary, for the purpose of the trust, to have a command of funds, and so balances arose. Mr. Sands has given the trustees credit for the same rate of interest on these balances which they would have got if they had been deposited in bank; but he does not appear to have accumulated the interest. It is contended, that, being a trustee, he was not entitled to keep trust funds in his hands; that, having done so, he must pay the highest rate of interest; and that the interest must be periodically accumulated. In some cases it may be very important to enforce this rule, for the funds may be put in peril. It may not be easy to ascertain what are the trust funds if mixed up with the private funds belonging to a trustee. The perils are considerable even in regard to persons whose affairs appear to be flourishing. This applies not merely to an agent who may happen to be a trustee, but to merchants and all others who may be factors on an estate. The party who may be acting as factor or agent for a trust may be undoubtedly solvent, but the Court cannot draw distinctions. The only safe course is for a trustee to separate the trust funds from his own, and to keep them on separate accounts. If he does not take that course, he must submit to have a high rate of interest charged against him. On the other hand, if he advances money on account of the trust, he will be allowed to charge bank interest.

The Court pronounced an interlocutor, which, besides disposing of the question in regard to the rate of board, and some other matters of no interest, contained the following findings:—"Recall the findings in the said interlocutor in reference to the accounts of Mr. Warren H. Sands, or Messrs. Sands, as law agent or law agents, for the trustees and trust estate in the conduct of suits in which the trustees were parties. Find, that Mr. Warren H. Sands, himself being a trustee, the business charges in the accounts of himself, as law agent, and those of Messrs. Sands, as law agents, of which firm Mr. W. H. Sands is a partner, cannot be sustained except to the extent of costs out of pocket, and except to that extent that Mr. Wellwood's trustees are not entitled to credit for the business accounts of Mr. W. H. Sands or Messrs. Sands, and sustain to that extent the objection of Mr. and Mrs. Hill. Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it repels the objection by Mr. and Mrs. Hill to the charge of £25 paid to Mr. Gardner, the agent of the heiress of entail, and sustain their objection to that charge. Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it has reference to the interest chargeable against Mr. W. H. Sands during his management. Find, that, in the circumstances of the case, Mr. Sands falls to be charged with interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum on all trust moneys in his hands from time to time, and that his trust accounts fall to be balanced annually, so that the yearly balance, on whichever side of the account it may be, may bear interest. Quoad ultra, refuse the prayers of both of the notes, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against and decern," &c.

It ought to be observed, that four per cent. is the current rate of interest obtained for money standing upon such securities as the Court will allow trust funds to be invested upon.

STAMPS ON ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

By the 7 Geo. 4, c. 44, the Commissioners of Stamps are prohibited from stamping articles of clerkship after six months from the date thereof. Within the six months, the Commissioners invariably allowed the articles to be stamped on payment of £5.

I am informed, that, under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, the Commissioners now refuse to exercise their former powers of stamping such articles, upon a £5 penalty, within the six months, and require the payment of £10 at any time within a year, with interest on the duty from the date of the instrument.

Now, I submit that the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, does not repeal the 7 Geo. 4, c. 44, where the articles are brought to be stamped within the six months. The 3rd section of the new Act authorises the Commissioners, notwithstanding the former Act, in any case where they shall be directed so to do by the Treasury, to stamp such instruments on payment of the penalties specified—viz.

As to Instruments executed before Aug. 5, 1853	£20
Any other such instruments brought to be stamped within a year	£10
After one year, and within two years	£20
After two, and within three years	£30
After three, and within four years	£40
After four years	£50

But, in all these instances, the stamp can only be affixed where the Commissioners shall be directed so to do by the Treasury. Under the former Act, no such previous authority was required from the Treasury; and I submit, that, the former power of the Commissioners not being expressly repealed, they may exercise it without giving the applicant the trouble of memorialising the Treasury. JUDICIAL SEPARATION—RIGHTS OF WIFE.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—By s. 25 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act it is enacted, that, after a "judicial separation" of husband and wife, the wife shall, whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire, or which may come to or devolve upon her, and that she may dispose of the same as a feme sole. This clause has reference only to future acquired property; therefore, I conceive that no conveyance of the real property belonging to the wife prior to, or acquired after, marriage, but before the judicial separation, can be made without the husband's concurrence, which would be necessary to get rid of his life interest, and also of his claim as tenant by the curtesy. The Act does not provide any machinery to meet such a case, nor does it appear to me how it well could, when the parties may, if they like, again cohabit. As to such property, it would seem that, unless settled on the wife, she will be unable to dispose of it during her husband's life, or that she can only do so by effecting an arrangement with him, which, under the circumstances, might be a very difficult matter.—Your obedient servant, ROBERT WHEELER.

"ABUSE THE PLAINTIFF."

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I am happy to see how heartily you and the press, and the profession generally, concur in the sentiments of C. J. Cockburn, in his summing-up to the Chester jury, upon the disgraceful practice in low barristers of abusing attorneys. But I am anxious that the peculiar instance of Nisi Prius eloquence the Chief Justice so eloquently reprobated should not be taken as a specimen of the eloquence of the Chester bar. The counsel in this case was "special." Some time since he distinguished himself in an arbitration case in this neighbourhood by the fluency of his declamation and his vituperation of the opposing party—a magistrate of the county, and a large landed proprietor. During his conduct of that case, upon the non-appearance of the clergyman, he extemporised a sermon in a national school-room. His clients, I believe, having strong faith in the omnipotence of mob-oratory, retained him solely for his speech; how widely they miscalculated when they supposed that the Chief Justice and a Cheshire special jury were to be wrought upon by the frothy declamation which sways the unwashed mob, the result has shown. Let the loud-mouthed denunciators take warning by it, and, when they have a bad case, learn, that, though they are fortified by wig and gown, they are not to indulge with impunity in such language towards a gentleman as would disgrace the walks of private life.—Yours obediently,

AN ATTORNEY OF THE CHESTER CIRCUIT.

The Parish: its Powers and Obligations at Law, as regards the Welfare of every Neighbourhood, and its Relation to the State; its Officers and Committees, and the Responsibility of every Parishioner. By TOULMIN SMITH, of Lincoln's Inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Sweet.

A new edition has recently appeared of Mr. Toulmin Smith's work on "The Parish." It is an able and original work; and its learning makes it valuable, not only to the professional lawyer, but to all whose occupation it is to inquire into the history of the local institutions of England, or to assist in their management. As it is strongly coloured by a particular theory, care must be taken not to be led away by the author's vehement language when we have to refer to it for particular details, and apply practically its contents. This theory amounts to the proposition that the local institutions of England, at a period of time unascertained, but, probably, not long after the Conquest, were absolutely perfect, and that we ought to return to them, and reject every modern alteration which the folly of the last six or seven centuries has introduced. We could not examine this theory in its general aspect without being led into a long political discussion, and we, therefore, prefer stating some of the principal facts to which Mr. Smith is most anxious to call attention, and some of the principal subjects with reference to which his work will be found serviceable.

"An examination," says Mr. Smith, "of the most authentic records shows that the parish is the original secular division of the land, made for the administration of justice, keeping the peace, collection of taxes, and the other purposes incidental to civil government and local wellbeing." Town, parish, and vill all mean the same thing; they are the integral divisions of hundreds. It was through the parish that the taxes were collected by the Crown. The parish was governed and represented by a head known under different names, such as headborough or provost, and four domesmen. These five persons assessed on oath the amount of tax to be levied on the parish, and were responsible for its being raised. Domesday Book is the return made by the domesmen of each parish. They were also responsible for crimes committed, or nuisances permitted, in the parish; and had to attend before the local courts of the shire to answer for their conduct. Nothing, as Mr. Smith repeatedly insists, can be plainer than that the parish is a purely secular institution; and it was only by degrees that priests became attached to the existing divisions of the land. Each parish had power to make its own bye-laws; and the vote of the majority of the parishioners was sufficient to give these local laws validity. A church-rate, for instance, is only enforceable because it is ordered by a bye-law of the parish. All persons occupying land or other premises were parishioners, the villeins as well as the lord: all had a right, and were considered morally bound, to attend the vestry or general meeting of the parishioners, and there the chairman was, and is, in every case, elective; and the minister has no better claim than any other parishioner to fill the office. A division of those present is the proper way of ascertaining the wishes of the majority of the parishioners, and a poll is a modern innovation. It is one which Mr. Smith views with the greatest regret, as he does also the change introduced by Sturges Bourne's Act, which gave a plurality of votes to the rich.

The portion of the book which treats of Churchwardens may be taken as a fair sample of the rest, and its contents suffice to show what is the kind and what the extent of information to be looked for in this volume. Churchwardens have succeeded the provost or head of the town as chief officers of the parish. They were never ecclesiastical officers; and Mr. Smith very properly thinks it of the highest importance to establish this point beyond a doubt. Churchwardens are temporal officers chosen by the laymen of the parish to "take charge of things of temporal estate." Thence they were originally called "Wardens of the goods," and under this description appear in the Rolls of Parliament as early as the 15th of Edward III., and in the Year Books as early as 1410. There can be no doubt that the churchwardens were, as a rule, with very few exceptions, chosen by the parishioners, and the theory of their office would certainly exclude their being chosen by any one else.

But in 1608 a canon was published, by which it was declared that the appointment of one churchwarden should rest with the parson. This canon did not bind the laity in any way, but the parsons claimed to exercise the right it purported to confer, and in many parishes the claim was not resisted, as it might have been most successfully, by an appeal to the courts of common law; and the custom has thus sprung up in many parishes of the parson appointing one churchwarden. Mr. Smith raises the question whether this custom can now be upset. Of course, he admits that it can only be upset where parish minutes and records exist, which will show conclusively, that, up to the beginning of the 17th century, the parishioners elected both churchwardens; for, otherwise, the custom would not be on the face of it illegal, for it is certain, that, before the date of the canon, the custom had already established itself in a few parishes. But we cannot feel so sure as Mr. Smith seems to be, that the Court of Queen's Bench would upset the custom, even if it were proved to be of later origin than the canon; for the custom is not bad in itself, and is now two centuries and a half old. Mr. Smith says, that it cannot be upheld, where a probability exists that it was first established owing to the parishioners being deceived as to the legal force of the canon. But it seems to us unlikely that the Court of Queen's Bench would remedy such a mistake after so great an interval of time. Certainly, it is to be regretted that the churchwardens should, in any case, be nominated by the parson. For they have now succeeded to the office originally held by the sidesmen—that is, the representatives of the laity in the synods—whose duty it was to present an information against the parson if any cause of complaint existed against him; and it is absurd that the parson should himself appoint one of the officers who is to watch over his conduct.

On a cognate point, Mr. Smith brings forward a great amount of learning, and uses language of considerable vehemence. This point is the assumed right of the parson to preside at vestry meetings. Mr. Smith shows, and, as we think, conclusively, that no such right exists. The leading case on the subject is the well-known one of Houghton v. Reynolds, decided in 1736, where a vicar assumed to occupy the chair, and, in virtue of his assumed right there, further assumed the power of adjourning the vestry. The Court of King's Bench decided that he had no right to adjourn or to preside. But in 1819, in the case of Wilson v. Macmath, the King's Bench refused to grant a prohibition against the Ecclesiastical Court entertaining the question of the right of a vicar to preside, because, in that case, the meeting had been held in the church, and the Ecclesiastical Court decided that the parson had a right to preside. However, the question has finally been settled by the highest court. The Braintree case, decided by the House of Lords, determined that a prohibition will issue although the meeting is held in a church. We are thus brought back to Houghton v. Reynolds, which was only departed from in Wilson v. Macmath, because it was supposed that the place of meeting made a difference. We think it very satisfactory that Mr. Smith has cleared up this point. When the law is once clearly understood, there is no difficulty or ill-feeling created in parishes by such questions as that of the parson's right to preside in the vestry. Let it be clearly understood that the parson has no more right to preside in any vestry meeting, held in any place, or for any purpose, than any other parishioner has, and he will fall, without the slightest bad feeling on any part, into his proper place as one of the principal inhabitants.

The Chapter on Constables shows more conspicuously, perhaps, than any other, what is Mr. Smith's theory of the position of a parish in modern England. The constable was originally the same as the provost, and, thus, the principal parish officer. It was the duty of the parish to keep watch and ward over all its members; and the parish was considered responsible if any violence was committed within its bounds, and the offender was not brought to punishment. The constable was charged with the task of maintaining watch and ward within the bounds of the parish. If an offender escaped beyond the bounds of the parish, the constable was to raise the "Hue-and-Cry;" which he did, practically, by informing the constables of the adjoining parishes that the offence had been committed, and the offender had got away. The parish and the constables were kept up to the performance of their duties by periodical courts of inquiry, and the place or the officers were liable to be amerced if the ends of justice had been defeated through their negligence. "The constable was thus," says Mr. Smith, "the constitutional public prosecutor." The system was, he conceives, complete. Offences could not be passed over, because it was the interest as well as the duty of every one in the neighbourhood to lend assistance in the discovery, and there was always an official ready to commence and conduct the inquiry. In no particular has the old parochial system been more invaded in recent years than in the arrangement of the constabulary force; and under no head, therefore, is Mr. Smith so warm in his denunciations of modern changes as when treating of the substitution of county police for parish constables. Whether, now that locomotion has become so easy, and thieves are so expert, the system of one parish constable telling another that the thief is gone, is likely to prove practically sufficient, is a question into which Mr. Smith does not enter.

No one can read Mr. Smith's book without being persuaded of its great value; and a sound knowledge of parochial institutions was never more needed than at the present moment. The fault of the book is, that it never really discusses the effects which the altered state of modern society must have on ancient institutions. Mr. Smith does, indeed, say that adaptation, as he terms it, is the great principle of parochial life; and that the parish, while retaining all its essential characteristics, should adapt and alter its method of operation and sphere of duties according as new exigencies arise, and new means are supplied for meeting the demands of a growing civilisation. That this is altogether practicable we do not feel convinced by the reasoning which he brings forward. But we may say safely, that centralisation has gone too far in England already, and that its further progress should be most jealously watched. These, however, are political rather than legal considerations. But the great majority of parochial difficulties are not disputes between the parish and the State, but between different parts or members of the same parish. These difficulties can only be surmounted if persons who take an active part in the guidance of the parish, or in discussing its affairs, inform themselves what the law on the subject is. Mr. Smith's book has the great and rare merit, that, in it, the portion of law with which it deals is treated historically and, therefore, soundly. It is only by historical knowledge that English law can be illustrated and explained. When once we have thoroughly impressed on our minds the legal theory of the parish, and traced its historical formation and composition, the details on which particular circumstances compel us to enter are easily comprehended. We can only hope that Mr. Smith's book will be widely and carefully read. It is one of the few law books that belong as much to the lay as to the professional reader.

Roman Catholic Charities Report.

The Select Committee of the House of Lords, appointed to consider the Roman Catholic Charities Bill, have reported to the House. They state that the committee have met, and proceeded with the consideration of the Roman Catholic Charities Bill (H. L.), and also of the petition referred to them, and that they have examined witnesses, with a view to satisfy themselves how far the complaint contained in the said petition, praying for more extensive relief as to Roman Catholic charities than was proposed by the Bill, rested on any solid foundation.

The committee accordingly examined Mr. Bagshawe, who is an eminent Queen's Counsel, and also Mr. Harting, a very respectable solicitor. Both these gentlemen are Roman Catholics; and the result of their evidence is, that all or very nearly all the Roman Catholic charities in this country are mixed up with what has been decided in the Court of Chancery to be a superstitious use; and that therefore they are, in all probability, absolutely void and illegal. A bequest of money to be paid to a priest for saying prayers and celebrating masses for the soul of the testator was decided by Lord Cottenham, in West v. Shuttleworth, to be bad, as a superstitious use.

The evidence taken before the committee shows that a condition to pray for the soul of the founder of a Roman Catholic charity is sometimes expressly, always impliedly, annexed to every charitable foundation. The petitioners point out that it is part of the devotional practice of the Roman Catholic Church to offer up prayers for the dead, and that such prayers are offered up daily in all prayers, and at all masses, forming always a part, as well of private as of public devotion. The petitioners therefore urge, that, as the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion is now freely tolerated, the doctrine of superstitious uses, so far at least as relates to the praying for the souls of the dead, ought not to be held to attach to their charities, so as to affect their validity, and therefore that the Bill ought to go the length for which they contend—namely, to make all their charities valid where their invalidity consists solely in their having infringed the law relative to superstitious uses.

The committee, without expressing any opinion on this claim, yet feel that it is one entitled to a grave and deliberate consideration, and they recommend that in the next session of Parliament the subject should be inquired into, when there will be full leisure to investigate it.

The following is an abridgment of Mr. James Vincent Harting's evidence:—

I am a solicitor, and a Roman Catholic. I have been very familiar with the Roman Catholic charitable endowments for the last ten years. I have heard the evidence which has been given by Mr. Bagshawe. He states, that, in his opinion, from his acquaintance with the Roman Catholic charities, they all, or almost all, contain, expressly or impliedly, an obligation on the parts of the recipients of the charities, or the priests connected with them, to pray for the souls of the founders. That is so; it is not only the fact, but it is the law of the Church; so that, if prayers were not made for the founder, the next of kin or the heir of the founder would have a right to go to the bishop and require his interference, in order to enforce the saying of those prayers, not merely by reason of the condition annexed, but as a condition imposed by the very nature of the gift. Some of these charities date back as early as the beginning of the seventeenth century. As regards endowments, I am almost disposed to say that more than one-half would date back before the commencement of the last century; and that brings me to notice an Act which has not been referred to—namely, the 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 50, by which all Catholic property given to superstitious uses was vested in the Crown absolutely by force of that Act, without office found, so that some remedy must be provided for that, or we cannot think of registering the deeds. I would take leave to add to what Mr. Bagshawe said, this observation: The 2nd clause of the Bill, as now drawn, proposes to validate all our charities upon the inrolment of the deeds constituting those charities. Now, besides the indorsements which those deeds bear with reference to the subject-matter of the next section—namely, the superstitious use—there are other indorsements; those deeds relate, in some instances, to a variety of property, some of which has been lost by the apostacy (I do not use the word offensively, but in a Roman Catholic sense) of those to whom it was confided; and memoranda may be made of that apostacy. Your Lordships know, that, until a very recent period, premiums were offered to children, by conforming to the established religion, to dispossess their parents. Records of those facts remain; and the bishops would be very sorry, by inrolling these deeds, to bring up a number of matters, which, of course, would cause great pain to families, and families of much account now in the kingdom. Therefore, I would suggest, that, instead of inrolling the original deed, a copy might be inrolled, unless the precedent of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 85, was followed, which validated all deeds for charities (we were not then within the law, and, therefore, could not take advantage of it), although no inrolment had taken place under the Act of George the Second. If that were done in our case, it would relieve us from a great deal of trouble. If that were not thought convenient, then there might be the option, instead of being required to inrol the original deed, of inrolling either the original deed or the deed declaring the trust.

Lord WENSLEYDALE.—You agree that the principal thing which you want is to legalise the saying of masses for the dead? To take away the legal objection arising from what are called superstitious uses. I should mention that there are two classes of superstitious uses, one arising out of the supposed policy of the law as expressed in the Act of Edward the Sixth, and the other arising under the 23rd of Henry the Eighth, c. 10, which prohibits the endowment of any church or chapel, or any similar object, for any purpose, for more than twenty years. So recently as 1818 or 1819, a case occurred before Lord Chief Justice Abbott, the case of Doe on the demise of Wellard v. Hawthorne, in which a deed was avoided under that statute: it was a lease for a congregation of Dissenters of Lady Huntingdon's connection. It should be observed, also, that the relief granted to Protestant Dissenters by the Toleration and subsequent Acts is conditional on their taking certain oaths and subscribing declarations, which no Catholic can take or subscribe. The Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, s. 2, substitutes for these, in the case of "schoolmasters and other masters professing themselves Roman Catholics," the oath prescribed by the Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 2; but this substitution does not extend to any other classes, and consequently all others are excluded from the benefit intended by the Act of 1832; for by necessary construction they are forced back upon tests and penalties for recusancy, from which they had been relieved by the Acts 18 Geo. 3, c. 60, and 31 Geo. 3, c. 32. This should, of course, be remedied. Again, in all or nearly all Roman Catholic charities, the bishops for the time being, by virtue of their office, are constituted and declared to be the trustees or administrators of the charities, or the same are to be executed at their discretion, or under their immediate supervision and control. As the law now stands, Roman Catholic bishops in England and Scotland have not only no legal status, but their very existence is declared to be "unlawful and void" (14 & 15 Vict. c. 60). I would also observe, that any Bill now to be passed for amending the law relating to Catholic charities must be expressly retroactive in its operation, in order to avoid all questions under the Succession Duty Act.

Judicial Business Report.

MR. GERMAIN LAVIE'S AND MR. WILLIAM MURRAY'S EVIDENCE ABRIDGED.

Will you favour the Commissioners with any information which you think may be of service to them in their inquiries?

Mr. Lavie.—The sentiments of the Council of the Law Society are, that the number of the judges ought not to be reduced; and the sentiments of all the members of the profession, the attorneys, that I have spoken to, without exception, are quite to the same effect. Every one expresses rather his wonder that there should be any thought of reduction. Some say that they should have thought that the number might be increased instead of being reduced. I think there is but one feeling on the subject among the body of attorneys in London. That opinion is founded mainly upon the London business to be transacted by the judges. One element of that opinion is, that I find that there is a universal opinion against three judges sitting in Banco. And I think that if you reduced the number to two judges, or even one, it would be less objectionable. But you must recollect that the judges of the courts of common law are always more or less sitting in appeal upon matters of fact tried at Nisi Prius; and, therefore, I think there ought to be four, and that two judges would not do. We fancy, with great respect to the judges, that if two judges are very predominant in a court, and they take the lead against the one judge, the one judge may as well not be there. With three judges to one, it is more difficult not to preserve something like an equipoise; and though it occasionally happens that two judges may be ranked against two judges, that is not common; and when it does happen, it is upon a very grave and difficult subject. We fancy that by its being always necessary to have a majority of three judges, there is a better chance of things being well considered; and we think that the public would be better satisfied than with a majority of two to one. We are very much accustomed to judges sitting in equity alone. There the judge has the whole responsibility himself; he has to argue the case with himself; it is all in his own mind, in his own breast and conscience, and he must come to a proper conclusion; and I think we are tolerably well satisfied with that. I think that a plurality is indispensable in the common law courts, though not in equity. The business is really substantially now very great in London. I am not in the habit of going much now to chambers; but I have two common law clerks, who are constantly in attendance at chambers; and they come to me repeatedly with complaints of the impossibility of getting through the business. We all agree that there should be still the four judges in the common law courts.

Mr. Murray.—Yes, and the number not less than fifteen. I think, I will say positively, that, in my opinion, one judge is better than three in any court under any circumstances. I believe that at the Law Society we all thought that there might be some improvement with regard to the circuits. I do not think we all of us see our way upon that subject, though we have sent in a report from the Law Society.

To Mr. Lavie.—Are you of the same opinion with one or two other gentlemen who have been here, that the business transacted now by the judges in London, confining your attention to the London business, is individually, amongst the fifteen judges, greater than it was when there were only twelve judges, or as great?—I should say, that, individually, it is greater in some respects. My first recollection of the individual judges of the Court of Exchequer was, that, except when the Chief Baron or other judges sat in equity, they had very little to do. The Court of Exchequer was a closed court for all Nisi Prius business. I recollect, in my day, the first civil cause which was ever tried in the Court of Exchequer. The Court of Exchequer never used to sit for general business. I recollect the time when there was nothing but what they called the general issue. There were no pleadings, no questions arising; there were no interrogations in our common law courts, and the state of business altogether was very different, and, at the very time when the fifteen judges were chosen, I should say the business was less than it is now in the aggregate.

Can you point out the chief features of the change which has taken place?—A great deal arises from the chamber business being so very much increased—a great deal from the interlocutory business, which there is now, but which did not exist before. A great improvement has been made of late years, no doubt, and causes have come to a more satisfactory result. I recollect when a cause was two years in Lord Tenterden's paper; when I first went into the City, in 1824, an action was brought, and there was no pleading required, merely the general issue, and the parties came to issue, and the cause was set down. In my office we never used to look at those papers for a year; we never thought it necessary at all to look at them till we knew when the cause was likely to be tried. There was a complete monopoly in the Court of Queen's Bench. There was very little done, comparatively, in the Court of Common Pleas, and nothing at all in the Court of Exchequer. The whole of the business was then in the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was two years before causes were tried. I should almost have said that it was not the Welch Circuits alone that led to the appointment of fifteen judges; but it was rather the notion, perhaps, of strengthening the Court of Queen's Bench, because, immediately after that alteration was made, a second judge was always sitting in the Court of Queen's Bench, which, in my early days, was never thought of. The Bail Court, when I first began, was never thought of. I should say that the aggregate of business actually done by the judges is now very much greater—that is to say, the substantial good business which they do; the time occupied may not be greater. The labours at chambers are very great, and there is a great deal to do, involving a great many important questions, and very often there is not time enough to do it. Without having gone through the matter statistically at all, my impression is, that the business has not diminished, although the county courts have been established. It would be much more satisfactory to the attorneys as a body, if, during certain periods of time—namely, when the assizes are sitting—there were two judges attending to chamber business instead of one; I have no doubt there is business enough for two judges. There is a great deal of interlocutory pleading and discussion before the judge on very important matters pending at the assizes. Letters come up from the assizes, and it has to be got through before post time, and it is very difficult to do it. My opinion is, that the present fifteen judges are worked as hard as eminent public officers ought to be, and that their time is fairly full. That I understand is the opinion of all the attorneys. It is very rare now that a case is not tried upon the merits. The misfortune in former days was, that cases were prolonged by all sorts of things which are done away with now. We were then upon the system of tripping up more than we are now; we tripped up upon the question of stamps and things which were quite unexpected.

We have a plan before us recommended by the Incorporated Law Society with regard to terms and circuits; that plan recommends three circuits in the year. Is it your intention, in recommending three circuits in the year, that they should each of them transact civil business?—Certainly.

To Mr. Murray.—Will you be good enough to explain what the views of the Incorporated Law Society are with regard to the arrangement of criminal business by these three circuits. It was contemplated that there were to be three circuits for criminal business, and that criminal business should be transacted as at present. We also thought that civil business might be transacted on almost all the circuits. But at some particular places it did not seem to me and to the other gentlemen that there were causes sufficient to incur the expense of it. Barristers would not attend.

To Mr. Lavie.—Taking your own opinion, is it at all desirable for the ends of justice, either civil or criminal, that there should be a court of assize in the country districts of England every two months?—I hear from people in the country, I hear from Liverpool people, that business which would be conducted at the assizes by the superior courts is either sent up to London to be tried, or to some other place where it can be tried. London and Westminster are the places where it can be alone tried during the intervals of time when they have not sufficient opportunity of trying causes at the assizes; or the alternative is, if the case admits of it, to go to the county court. I believe myself that the effect of there being three assizes at those large places would be that there would be a greater employment of the superior courts, because they are preferred by such places as Liverpool and Manchester. The county courts there are not preferred in the abstract to the superior courts. The majority of the Law Society are for three circuits.

To Mr. Murray.—Did you vote on that side?—Yes.

Perhaps you will state the view which is taken?—I take my views a good deal from the country law societies, the reports which they sent us, and their recommendations; and, judging from my own experience, I should say, that, if carried out, it would be very desirable. The country law societies are unanimous that there should be three circuits for civil business. I take the Devon and Exeter, the Plymouth, Manchester, Lancaster, Preston, Hull, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Societies. We communicated with them, in order to get their views. Most of those societies are for the three circuits—all except the Manchester Society, who think that the assizes for the Hundred of Salford should be held at Manchester. The Plymouth Society recommend that the assize should be held at Plymouth, three circuits, and so on.

To Mr. Lavie.—Do you see a benefit in having three terms rather than four?—One's first impression is that there is no benefit in it, but when one looks at it, I do not think it is very material. If there had been three terms originally, I do not think I would have altered them to four.

But in the event of having three circuits, does not it become very material to re-arrange the terms accordingly?—It must be done.

Mr. Murray.—It seemed to us that Easter and Trinity Terms coming together was undesirable.

With reference to the proposal for a third assize for civil business, do you find in your experience that in cases of magnitude and importance you can conveniently prepare a cause for trial in less than five or six months?—If you are for the defendant you cannot, but if you are for the plaintiff you can do so. The plaintiff gets up his case, and takes his own time and opportunity for issuing his process, and the defendant is then, in reference to time for pleading, &c., too much at the mercy of the plaintiff.

Mr. Lavie. — All these questions about trying important causes are very much compounded of a good many considerations. Sometimes it is very desirable for the litigants themselves that the cause should not be tried too hastily. It is a great mistake, in my belief, to suppose that too great a facility of litigation is a good thing. I venture to think that the county courts have caused more litigation almost than they have cured.

You think that the increased facility will not be an unmixed good?—No; I think it never can be; law is like medicine. I think it is not to be brought home to every man's door to be injuriously used. I never could understand the Courts of Conciliation. Compulsory arbitrations, I think, with submission to the judges, have been a great misfortune, and I hope that that point will be considered. I may observe, that the county courts do not affect the business of Mr. Murray or myself in the least degree.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have shown very little fluctuation during the past week, and transactions have not been numerous. Consols closed to-day at 90¼—⅜, which is nearly the same as this day week. The demand for money continues active both on the Stock Exchange and in the open market. The Bank rate of 5½ per Cent. interest is generally obtained, and the expectation which was entertained some time back that the rate would be lowered by the Bank has passed off. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 5th September, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,246,840, being a decrease of £77,335, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,491,313, showing a decrease of £9,274 when compared with the previous return.

The corn market is firm both in London and the country without any appearance of further decline, on the concontrary rather higher rates are quoted. The arrival of cattle and sheep into the port of London from the continent has been unusually large. The customs return for one week gives a total of 16,174 head.

It appears that the directors of the Great Western Railway Company are taking measures to reduce the working expenses of their various lines. Several of their daily trains have been discontinued this month. The locomotive establishment at Swindon will participate in the general curtailment, 300 of the artisans having received notice to leave the company's service.

Accounts of the Bank of France, subsequent to the last monthly statement, are put forward as shewing a more favourable state of its affairs in consequence of a considerable increase in its stock of bullion, and greater ease in regard to discount.

M. Auguste Thurneyssen has been declared bankrupt in consequence of his connection with his nephew. The Credit Mobilier is felt to be greatly compromised by this judgment against one of its most influential directors.

The resolutions mentioned in our last number, passed by the Council General of the department of Herault, open the question of free trade in France with an appearance of much weight and importance. If this movement prove to be the leader of a large amount of general feeling on the part of the agriculturists and traders of France, changes may be expected of great interest to this country. If the French Government enter upon the consideration of reducing their import duties, they will probably negotiate for a further reduction of our import duties. But, in fact, our arrangements have already gone very far in the way of reduction—so far, indeed, that we have the authority of Sir Cornewall Lewis for saying, that, if a customs' revenue is to be maintained of such amount as is essential to the stability of our finances, no further considerable reductions can be made under present circumstances.

The tariff of France is based upon the principle of protection to French industry by absolute prohibition of foreign competition. A resolution has recently been voted by the Council General of the Nord that protection is, and will be for a long time, the most imperious want of French agriculture and manufactures. In the tariff of England the principle of protection is renounced, and foreign produce is taxed to raise the necessary customs' revenue. By reason of the requirements of the revenue, we cannot afford to reduce the duty on wine. We tax British spirits to the utmost point consistent with the principle of not giving encouragement to illicit distillation. We apply the same principle to foreign spirits, and we cannot afford further to reduce these duties. In silks and paperhangings, clocks and cabinetwork, and some other articles, something may perhaps be done to meet the wishes of our neighbours. Our tariff of import duties has been greatly lowered without waiting for reciprocal reductions on the part of other nations. The best interests of the manufactures and trade of France will be advanced by adopting a similar line of policy, of which it is to be hoped the present movement is an indication.

In attempting to settle the affairs of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation a picture is presented to the public very similar to that of the Royal British Bank. About six months ago it became known that this bank was in difficulties. It was then stated that the paid-up capital, namely, £250,000, and a small additional contribution by the shareholders, would be sufficient to meet all liabilities. Since that date notice of its affairs has several times come before the public, and every notice has been more unfavourable than that which preceded it. But not till recently has it appeared that the expectation confidently put forward, of settling all matters by the corporation themselves, would not be realised. The petition lately presented to the Court of Chancery for an order to dissolve the corporation, and that its affairs may be wound up under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, makes disclosures which seem to preclude all probability of any arrangement without judicial interference. The petition alleges that very shortly after the company had begun business, the directors commenced making advances out of the paid-up capital of the said company to each other on insufficient or without any security other than personal, and at a rate of interest lower than would and ought to have been obtained for such advances, and among others to John Carnac Morris, John Edward Stephens, and Colonel Waugh, directors of the said company. The directors advanced and lent to Colonel Waugh the sum of £237,000 upon security of a nature and value wholly insufficient to warrant such an advance, and upon the realization of such security a loss to the amount of £100,000, or upwards, will, in all probability, arise, Colonel Waugh having since become bankrupt. V. C. Wood has fixed the 21st instant for the appointment of an official liquidator.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 19, 1857.

RECENT WINDING-UP CASES.

Two cases, which have recently come before the Courts of Chancery and Bankruptcy, will serve to test the respective value of the winding-up machinery provided by the Limited Liability Act and by the old Winding-up Statutes, as modified by the Act of the last session. The Surrey Gardens Company is handed over to the administration of the Court of Bankruptcy, and the London and Eastern Banking Corporation has fallen into the hands of V. C. Wood. We shall watch with some interest the proceedings of the two Courts, as we are disposed to think that neither of the remedies provided by the Legislature is exactly what it should be, and that experience will probably suggest some uniform mode of procedure, which shall combine the advantages, and avoid the defects, of both.

One of the main distinctions between the machinery devised for limited companies and that which applies to banking and other corporations is, that, in the former, the jurisdiction in ordinary cases is confined to the Court of Bankruptcy, while, in the latter, the Chancellor may take the initiative, subject to the intervention of the assignee in bankruptcy, as representative of the creditors, in case proceedings should also be taken in Basinghall-street. Another most important difference is, that the official manager, under the Winding-up Acts, must be appointed on the application of a contributory, while one of the official liquidators, on a creditor's petition under the Limited Liability Act, may be selected by the majority of creditors, at a meeting to be held for the purpose. In one of these respects, we believe, the advantage will be found to be decidedly in favour of the old procedure, and, in the other, not less clearly on the side of the new machinery. The right of creditors to have a voice in the appointment of the officer on whose vigilance and activity the result of the winding up must mainly depend, is so obvious, that we cannot think that the Chancery method of winding up defaulting companies will be left much longer without the introduction of an amendment, for the purpose of securing the rights of the public as against the shareholders of a fraudulent concern. The Act of the last session, it is true, has enabled the creditors to appoint a representative; but, instead of clothing him with authority to support their just claims, it has merely empowered him to abandon them on such terms of compromise as the shareholders may choose to offer. What is required is, some security that the most will be made of the company's assets, and that a reasonable contribution will be enforced against the parties who are liable as contributories. So far as concerns the choice of the officers to whom the duty of making calls and getting in assets is committed under the direction of the Court, the Limited Liability Act is fair enough in those cases where the petition has emanated from a creditor; but the case of the Surrey Gardens shows that this provision may easily be evaded, as it is always in the power of the directors to anticipate a hostile petition by procuring some shareholder to make the first application to the Court. By whomsoever the petition may be presented, the object of the winding up is the same; and we see no reason why creditors should not be allowed to nominate one of the official liquidators, as well in the case of a petition promoted by the company itself, as of one where a creditor may, by extraordinary activity, have managed to get the start. With such an extension of the rights allowed to creditors, we think that the Limited Liability Act would be free from objection so far as it regulates the choice of officers for conducting the proceedings; and we shall not be surprised if the issue of the pending litigation in the case of the companies to which we have referred, should afford another illustration of the necessity of giving more authority to the creditors as a body than is allowed by the present state of the law. The old device, of leaving to each creditor the power of protecting himself by individual proceedings against any or all of the unlucky shareholders, has been justly condemned, and is now, practically, abolished by the recent statute; but this renders it the more necessary that the claims of the whole body should be aided by the same privilege of appointing a creditors' liquidator, which is accorded to the victims under a private bankruptcy.

As yet the proceedings against the London and Eastern Banking Company and the Surrey Gardens Company have not advanced far enough to afford a conclusive test of the relative efficiency of the two courts on which the task of winding-up has devolved in the two cases; but even the preliminary discussions which have taken place in Basinghall-street are enough to suggest grave doubts whether the constitution of the Court of Bankruptcy is well adapted to the performance of the novel duties which have been cast upon it. The real hitch, however, will be when the settlement of the list of contributories, and the adjustment of their liabilities inter se, come under consideration; and we shall be agreeably disappointed to find that the Court of Bankruptcy can manage without the aid of the chamber machinery—by which so much is done in winding-up cases in Chancery—to dispose satisfactorily and expeditiously of the very complicated and delicate questions which seldom fail to arise. Perhaps the difficulty may be less in the case of the Surrey Gardens than in other companies that may hereafter come under the bankruptcy jurisdiction, because it appears that the shares are for the most part fully paid up, and the list of contributories will, therefore, be extremely small. But whenever the Court of Bankruptcy shall find itself under the necessity of acting extensively on the clauses by which it is empowered to raise calls from contributories, we have a very strong suspicion that the unsuitableness of the jurisdiction will be painfully obvious.

Leaving legal points, and looking to the moral aspect of these last exposures of the way in which public companies are administered, it is enough to say that the broad features are just the same as those which disgusted the world in the British Bank affair. If Mr. Cameron and Mr. Brown were allowed to enrich themselves out of the funds committed to their care, the manager and directors of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation have been even more remarkable for the energy with which they have played the same game. The advance of £235,000 out of a paid-up capital of £250,000, which was made, on insufficient security, to Colonel Waugh, quite throws into the shade the less magnificent appropriations of the directors of the South Sea House; and the ingenious way in which the loan was entered in the published accounts of the company is fully equal to the concealment of hopeless debts practised by the managers of the Royal British Bank. Who could suspect that the following business-like summary included a quarter of a million advanced to a single insolvent director:—"East India and Government securities, bills of exchange, Treasury and agency drafts, credits, discounts, and cash in hand, 989,925*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*" We really scarcely know whether to give the palm to the Royal British or the Eastern Bank; but the one case, no less than the other, demonstrates the utter inutility of any system of published accounts and audits to check the irregularities of boards which are practically irresponsible. The Surrey Gardens Company, too, deserves some notice for the quiet way in which it suppressed the existence of a mortgage debt of £14,000, and by a fictitious dividend induced new shareholders to commit their money to a bankrupt association. Unfortunately, the Fraudulent Trustees Act is too late to reach any of the offenders on either board; but it is some consolation to think that their practices cannot be imitated by future directors without the risk of something more than the exposures of the Bankruptcy Court and the pleasant torture of one of Mr. Linklater's examinations.

THE PROBATE ACT.

Last week, we gave a summary of the Divorce Act, and we now propose to give one of its companion measure, the Probate Act, or, to give it a more correct, though longer, title, the Act regulating Probates and Letters of Administration. It is not only because the same judge will preside in the courts respectively created by these Acts, that the two measures are connected together. They contain, when looked at as a whole, the sum of the change which has ended the nominal—for it was only nominal—intervention of ecclesiastical authorities in civil matters. They both throw open to the ordinary practitioner a wide field of occupation, and they both require him to make himself acquainted with the principles and practice of the old ecclesiastical courts, or, in other words, with the English adaptation of the civil law. The Probate Act is chiefly to be looked at as constituting a new machinery of justice; but, in two points, it also introduces a considerable alteration in English law. In this one respect, there is a difference between the two Acts. The main feature of the Divorce Act was the regulation, if not the constitution, of an important section of the law; the main feature of the Probate Act is, that it provides a machinery.

The principle on which this machinery is arranged is, that there is to be one central authority, to which recourse may be had in every case whatever, and local authorities, to which recourse may be had only in certain simple and formal cases, or where the property at stake is small. The Judge of the Court of Probate will sit in London, furnished with a proper staff of registrars and record keepers, and enjoying throughout England the same authority as the Prerogative Court exercised within the province of Canterbury. The local machinery consists of two branches—the machinery for proving wills or taking out letters of administration in common form, and the machinery for proving wills or taking out letters of administration when a contention is raised as to the validity of the will or the right to administer, and the property at stake is small. District registrars will supply the machinery in the former case, and the county court judges in the latter. There are to be forty district registrars in England and Wales, and if there is no opposition, any will, whatever may be the amount or nature of the property passed by it, and wherever that property may be situated, will be admitted to probate, or, in case of an intestacy, letters of administration will be granted, by the district registrar, upon an affidavit being made that the deceased had, at the time of his death, a fixed place of abode within the district where the application is made. It will be the duty of the district registrar, upon receipt of the application, to forward a summary of its contents by the next post to the central registry, and he will not be able to act himself until he has in reply received a certificate from one of the registrars in London that no application has been previously made in respect of the goods of the same deceased person. When he has received this certificate, the object of which is, of course, to prevent two probates being granted of the same will, he may exercise his own jurisdiction. When he has granted probate, he will keep the original will in his own registry, but he will be obliged to forward a copy to London.

Supposing there is a contention as to the grant, then an inquiry must be instituted as to the value of the goods of the deceased. If it can be stated on affidavit that the personal estate, without any deduction being made for debts, is under £200, and that the deceased has left no real estate, or only real estate of a less value than £300, then the judge of the county court having jurisdiction in the place where the deceased had at the time of his death his fixed place of abode, will have full power to decide the contested matters; and the district registrar will obey his decision, and grant or refuse probate or letters of administration accordingly. If, at the hearing before the county court judge, it is shown that the facts stated in the affidavit are not true, that the property is really of greater value, or that the deceased resided elsewhere, the judge will stay the proceedings; but, if he once pronounces his decision, the affidavit will be conclusive, and its statements cannot be thenceforward impugned. An appeal will lie from the county court judge to the court in London, and there will be no further appeal allowed. But when the matter comes in the first instance before the Judge of the Court of Probate, there will be an appeal from his decision to the House of Lords. In every case, without the place of abode of the deceased or the amount of his property making any difference, application for probate or administration may be made directly to the central court. It is entirely at the option of the persons applying whether they will, or will not, make use of the local machinery; but, in case any contentious matter arises, and the judge sees that, from the circumstances of the case, it could originally have come within the jurisdiction of a county court judge, he may, if he pleases, send it to that judge to examine into and decide.

Of the changes in law introduced by this Act the first is the provision, that, if the Court thinks fit, all matters of fact shall be tried either before the Court or before a judge of common law. The question, reduced into writing in such form as the Court shall direct, is to be submitted to a jury, and the rules of evidence observed are to be those which are observed in the courts of common law. In two cases only is a trial by jury a matter of right: when the person claiming a trial is the heir at law, and when all the parties concur in the application. If some, or one only of the parties make the application, the Court may refuse it, but its refusal will be subject to an appeal.

The other change gives probates of wills, under certain circumstances, a new validity as regards real property. Neither the probate nor any decree or order of the Court will, in any way, affect the heir or any other person in respect of his interest in real estate, unless he, or the person under whom he claims, has been cited, or made a party to the proceedings. But, if a will is proved in solemn form, or the probate of a will is revoked on the ground that the will is invalid, or the validity of a will is disputed, the heir-at-law, the devisees, and all other persons claiming an interest in the real estate are to be cited, and may become parties to the proceedings. If the will is subsequently found valid, the decree of the Court will be binding on the persons who, but for the will, would have claimed the real estate; and so, on the other hand, when the probate is revoked, the decree of the Court will enure for the benefit of the heir and the other persons against whose interest in the real estate the will would, if valid, have operated. If it appears that only personalty is affected by the will, the heir need not be cited before probate is granted; but if, in any action at law or suit in equity, a party desires to rely on a will proved in common form as against the heir, he may give ten days' notice to the heir of his intention to use the will as evidence, and then, unless the heir, within four days, gives notice that he disputes the will, the probate, although only obtained in common form, will be admissible to establish any devise or testamentary disposition which the will may contain. This Act, like the Divorce Act, is to come into operation at as early a period of next year as the Queen shall, by order in Council, direct.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. — Sept. 10.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE).

PRACTICE OF THE COURT.

In re Gotch & Gotch.

The bankrupts, John David Gotch and Thomas Henry Gotch, carried on business at Kettering and elsewhere as bankers, tanners, curriers, shoe-manufacturers, and brewers. This was the meeting for choice of assignees. Mr. Lawrance appeared for creditors to the amount of £60,000; Mr. Page for creditors for £8,000. From the statement of affairs of the 9th of June last it would appear that the creditors are £132,026; assets about £82,000. From the latter sum, however, must now be deducted a sum of about £13,000, which has been appropriated towards payment of a composition of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound to some of the creditors.

Mr. Lawrance proposed Mr. Linnell, of Burton Latimer, farmer; Mr. Sharp, of Finedon, woolstapler; and Mr. Turner, of Rowell, farmer, as assignees.

Mr. Page objected to the appointment of the persons named, and said that his clients were desirous that Mr. Ivens should be chosen. Complaints were made by many creditors, that, upon attending to prove their debts, they were called upon to execute powers of attorney of the nature and effect of which they were ignorant. His clients had all along wished the appointment of Mr. Ivens. Under those circumstances he would ask for an adjournment.

Mr. Lawrance opposed any adjournment. The country solicitors were gentlemen of the highest respectability, and utterly incapable of the conduct alleged.

The COMMISSIONER held that the creditors who were ready, and had a majority upon the day appointed, were entitled to choose their assignee, except under very special circumstances. That was the opinion of Lord Eldon, and it had been a rule of the Court for years.

The nominees of the larger body of creditors were then appointed assignees, and the Commissioner confirmed the choice.

Messrs. Lawrance, Plews, & Boyer continue to represent the estate, and Messrs. Harding & Pullen are the accountants.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FANE.)—Sept. 11.

QUESTION AS TO COSTS.

In re ——.

This was a trader debtor summons. The case involved an important point in respect to practice and costs. The debtor was served with a writ for £44 on August 28. No further proceedings could be taken under that writ before October 24. To meet this, the debtor was also served with a trader debtor summons. Payment of the debt and costs was tendered, minus the costs of the trader debtor summons. It was urged, that, the debt being under £50, no adjudication of bankruptcy could be made, and that the Court would not allow the costs consequent on the summons.

His HONOUR held that the debtor must pay the costs under both the forms of proceeding, and that, although the amount of the debt was under £50, an act of bankruptcy would be committed if the claim were not forthwith settled.

It follows that the long vacation allows no protection or respite to debtors where creditors take proceedings in this court by summons.

In re Hall & Hall.

The bankrupts were solicitors in Boswell-court, and farmers at Neasdon. Their accounts were now filed by Messrs. Turquand & Young, and an adjournment of the bankrupts' examination asked. The accounts contain the following items:—Unsecured creditors, £102,641; creditors partly secured by debts, £23,593; creditors secured by property, £20,082; creditors secured by furniture, £1,183; professional earnings, £26,287; capital on January 1, 1851, £2,734; cash, £200; debtors considered good, £10,841; doubtful ditto, taken at 5*s.* in the pound, £1,150; other debtors, £1,695; property realised, £15,519; leases, £1,483; debtor upon security assigned to creditor, £15,033; property held by creditors, £21,779; losses, £95,162; interest and discount, £9,829; salaries and petty cash, £6,204; trade charges, £3,715; law charges, £648; domestic and personal expenses, £17,855; liabilities, £4,853; property realised, after deducting salaries, &c., £14,336. This item is thus divided:—Furniture, £2,387; wine, £993; live stock, £2,805; blood stock, consisting of 121 geldings, &c., £5,660. Stock sold by Tattersall, £432; dogs, £93; lambs £181. The purchases of wine during the period over which the balance-sheet extends (from January, 1851, to June, 1856) are put down at £3,101, and the quantity consumed at £2,000, the remainder being in stock.

An adjournment was ordered. Mr. Lawrance appeared for the assignees.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.—Sept. 12.

(Before Mr. Commissioner MURPHY.)

In re Thompson.

The case of this insolvent, which will be found more fully stated in our report of Bossy v. Thompson, in the City Sheriffs' Court, again came before the Court. He had obtained his final order, and was subsequently committed by the Sheriffs' Court.

Mr. Commissioner MURPHY said, that he saw by the newspapers, that Mr. Prendergast, the judge of the City Sheriffs' Court, had stated, that, if this Court discharged, he would recommit. The commitment was after the final order, and he (Mr. Commissioner MURPHY) should certainly order the discharge.

Sept. 15.

FRIENDLY ARREST.—(In re Thomas Brown.)

This insolvent, who had lately kept the Masons' Arms, at Swindon, in Wiltshire, was opposed by Mr. Sargood for nearly a dozen creditors, and supported by Mr. Reed.

The complaint was, that the insolvent had come away from his creditors, 57 in number, in the country, and had got a friend to arrest him in London, to enable him to take the benefit of the Act. In answer to a question, the insolvent said he had been served with about "40 writs," of which number he had filed about 20; and a bundle was produced in addition.

Mr. Commissioner MURPHY observed, that he set his face against dismissing petitions on friendly arrest. In this case no good would be done; and, as the law was altered, he was not inclined to dismiss the petition.

The insolvent was discharged.

In re James William Clifford.

This insolvent, a young man, who was in custody for the damages and costs in an action for a serious injury to a little girl, by which she had entirely lost her sight, applied to be discharged.

The insolvent was a glass-blower, and, being annoyed by children whilst at his work, he thrust a piece of hot glass through an aperture of the door, which inflicted the injury on the child Rosina Reeves, and, being blind with one eye, she lost the sight of the other. An action was brought for damages; and, in the Sheriffs' Court, Red Lion-square, they were assessed at £100. Some terms of compromise were offered, but nothing was done; and the insolvent, who was just out of his time as an apprentice, was taken to prison for the damages and costs.

Mr. Sargood thought there could be no case proved against the insolvent, who was a young man, and not out of his apprenticeship when the accident occurred. By the 78th section of the Act, the injury, to come within the statute, must have been maliciously inflicted.

Mr. Commissioner MURPHY said, he held that a person who thrust a hot piece of glass through a door, and it inflicted an injury, did it maliciously, and therefore the case came within the Act. The case must stand over; and he recommended the insolvent to make some compensation to the poor child, who was totally blind. His opinion was, that it was a malicious injury; and, unless some arrangement was made, he should stretch his power to give a judgment to the utmost. With that intimation, perhaps, something would be done for the poor child.

The case stood adjourned to Friday.

CITY SHERIFFS' COURT.—Sept. 10.

(Before Mr. PRENDERGAST, Q.C.)

Bossy v. Thompson.

This was a judgment summons adjourned from June last.

Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall-street, appeared for the defendant, who had obtained a final order from the Insolvent Court before the judgment of this Court issued, and the name of the creditor, the present plaintiff, appeared in the schedule filed in the Insolvent Court, and due notice had been given to him as required by the Act. The case was adjourned until to-day, to see whether the defendant would be in a condition to pay the whole or any part of the debt.

The defendant now said he was not in a position to pay any part of the debt, as he had a wife and eight children to support.

Mr. PRENDERGAST said the case had been adjourned to give him time to recover himself, and unless he now made some satisfactory offer he must be committed.

Mr. Buchanan submitted, that, although his Honour had power to commit under the City Act, yet that could only be on being satisfied that the defendant had means and refused to pay, and that it was a matter entirely in the discretion of the judge. He then went through the several Acts relating to insolvency, and finally referred to the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which repealed the 102nd section of the General County Court Act, as to the commitment of bankrupts who had obtained their certificate of conformity under the bankrupt laws, or an insolvent who had obtained his final order under the insolvency. The City had not been diligent enough to get their Act amended, and he had no doubt that his Honour, in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, would not enforce a power under the City Act, which could not be exercised under the County Courts Act, if his Honour were presiding at Whitechapel.

Mr. PRENDERGAST ordered the defendant to be committed for fourteen days.

Mr. Buchanan said he must respectfully express his intention to immediately apply to his Honour the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court, who, acting on precedent, would order the defendant's discharge. It appeared to be unjust that a man who had undergone the ordeal of passing one court, and had been absolved from his debts, should be made to pay by another.

Mr. PRENDERGAST intimated, that, if the defendant were discharged, and again brought before him on another summons, he should commit him again.

BLOOMSBURY COUNTY COURT.—Sept. 10.

Rule v. White.

This was an action to recover the value of a check for £10 drawn by the defendant.

Mr. De La Mare appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Williams for the defendant.

Mr. Waites, a licensed victualler in the Hampstead-road, was in the habit of leaving change with one of his barmen; and on the 7th or 8th July, during his absence, his barman cashed a cheque for £10, drawn by the defendant, Mr. Walter White, a solicitor, upon the Commercial Bank of London, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, and dated the 6th day of July last, in favour of a Mr. Lawrence Levy. The barman did not take the name of the person to whom he gave the cash, nor was he in attendance to prove the payment of the money. Mr. Waites, on the 9th July, paid the cheque to a Mr. Pritchard, in part payment of an account for upholstery.

Mr. Pritchard proved the receipt of the cheque, and that it was cashed for him by the plaintiff. After the cheque had been presented, the plaintiff told him there were "no effects." Subsequent to the dishonour, he went to the defendant's offices, but he was absent on the Continent, and his clerk said there was no doubt the cheque would be paid when he came home.

The defence was, that the cheque had been lost on the day it was drawn, and that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

The Secretary to the Albert Loan-office, Catherine-street, Strand, said, he received the cheque in question from Mr. Lawrence Levy on the 6th of July, with instructions to pay it in to his private account with the Unity Bank. During his walk from Catherine-street to Leicester-square, he lost the cheque out of his waistcoat pocket. He immediately went back and informed Mr. Levy. They both went and informed Mr. White, and payment of the cheque was stopped. Four or five parties afterwards came down to the office about the cheque, but they did not produce it. At the time he had the cheque the words "and Co." were written upon it. The defendant gave Mr. Levy a second cheque for £10, and he obtained the money direct from the bank. He had no other money at the time he lost the cheque. The second cheque was given seven or eight days after the first.

The defendant's clerk proved that seven or eight parties had called about this cheque who could not give a satisfactory account of the mode in which the cheque got into their possession.

Mr. HEATH (the judge) said there was no evidence at the commencement of the plaintiff's case that there was any consideration paid for the cheque. There was no proof that the barman gave any money for it. The cheque was then kept in Waites's hands for two or three days, and there was a still further delay before the cheque was presented. That delay was unexplained, and was fatal to the plaintiff's case. Unless, therefore, the plaintiff's attorney could disturb his view of the law, his judgment was for the defendant. Mr. De La Mare was quite aware, if laches could be proved, it would be an answer to the case.

Judgment for the defendant accordingly, with costs.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT

The Court resumed its sittings on Monday. It appears by the first edition of the calendar that there are at present seventy-two prisoners for trial, which number will probably be increased to one hundred before the grand jury are discharged.

The RECORDER, when the grand jury had been sworn, said he had hardly expected that he should have been called upon to address them again, as upon the last occasion when he had done so a Bill was before Parliament, the object of which was to abolish the institution of the grand juries within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and which appeared to have such a general concurrence of opinion in its favour, that he considered there would be no doubt that it would have passed into law. The number of prisoners for trial in the present session was not large, but he regretted to say that there were several serious cases, and that no less than three involved the destruction of human life, and would come before them in the form of charges of wilful murder. One of these cases—that of a person named De Salvi—had this peculiarity, that the prisoner had already been tried and convicted for wounding the person, who was at that time alive, but who had since died, and was under sentence upon that conviction. In consequence of the wounded man having since died from the effects of the injuries he had received, and the death having taken place within a year and a day of the time of their being inflicted, the prisoner would now have to take his trial upon the charge of wilful murder, and the grand jury would have nothing to do with the fact that the prisoner had been already convicted of another offence arising out of the same transaction. His Lordship then referred to the cases of Denny, for the murder of the Italian lad at Hampstead, and the murder by a prisoner in Horsemonger-lane Gaol, and said it appeared to him that it would be their duty to find true bills for murder in both these cases; and he observed, that although in the latter case there might be a question whether the accused, at the time of the commission of the act, was in such a state of mind as to render him criminally responsible, they were not empowered to entertain that question, which could only properly be disposed of by the petty jury. There was only one other case to which he considered it necessary to direct their attention, which was a charge of uttering a forged baptismal certificate, and he mentioned it with a view that it should be known that this was an offence of a very serious description. It appeared, that, by the regulations of some of the departments of the public service, no person could receive an appointment unless he was of a certain age; and it seemed that the person accused, having obtained a certificate from the clergyman of his parish of the date of his birth, by which his age would appear to be fifteen, had altered the date, so that his age would seem to have been seventeen instead of fifteen. If this fact was made out, it would be their duty to find the bill, and it was right it should be known that an act of deception of this description was a very serious matter, and subjected the party who was guilty to severe punishment.

William Edwin James Hillyer, the young lad charged with forgery of his baptismal certificate, with intent to defraud the Civil Service Commissioners, has been acquitted—the jury giving him the benefit of the doubt that some older person might have altered the figures in the certificate without the prisoner's knowledge.

The expenses of the last election at Knaresborough have been published by Mr. Samuel Powell, jun., the auditor. It appears the bill of Mr. Basil Woodd amounted to 102*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, and that of Mr. Thomas Collins to 38*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* The expenses of Mr. Robert Campbell, the unsuccessful candidate, were 49*l.* 18*s.*

The auctioneer's hammer is waving over the tenements on the west side of Inner Temple-lane. On the first of October the house-breakers will be masters of the situation, the bricks will go for what they will fetch, and, the site being cleared, the honourable benchers of the Inner Temple will proceed to improve their property by building better houses in the place of the rubbish removed. Ah! but is it all rubbish? Not quite. On the transom of the doorway at No. 1 (there is a lamp projecting, and a large carved hood above), is written "Dr. Johnson's Staircase," and up this, truly enough, he often went with Goldsmith, Reynolds, Boswell, and others, of whom this present generation are never tired of hearing. We spoke not long ago to a hale and clear-headed gentleman, who recollected seeing the pursy doctor with his arm round a post in Fleet-street, resting for breath after some exertion; and who, moreover, had been taken up into the arms of the kind-hearted Goldsmith. Dr. Johnson lived in this house between 1760 and 1765, and it was during this time that the association, which afterwards became so renowned as the Literary Club, took a regular form. Joshua Reynolds, Johnson, Goldsmith, Burke, Dr. Nugent, Langton, Topham Beauclerc, Chamier, and Hawkins were the original members. It was while Johnson occupied these rooms that the adventure occurred, as described by Boswell, when the dissipated but accomplished Beauclerc, returning once with Langton from supper, roused up the grave Doctor at three in the morning, and dared him to a ramble.—The Builder.

At a meeting of the Town Council of Manchester, on Monday, a letter was read from Secretary Sir George Grey, inquiring whether, in the event of the recommendation of the Common Law Commission, for the transfer of assize business for the hundred of Salford from Liverpool to Manchester being carried into effect, they were prepared to adopt the necessary measures for such criminal and civil business by providing separate courts and lodgings for the judges. A resolution was proposed on the reading of the letter to the effect that Sir George Grey be assured that the council, in conjunction with the hundred of Salford, was prepared to make such provision. It is believed that no powers exist at present enabling the magistrates to apply county rates to such purposes; but it is hoped the Government will feel it to be their province to introduce a general public Act next session of Parliament to give magistrates the power in all such cases to use the county funds for making such provision. The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Charlotte Knox Knox, surrendered to take her trial, before the Recorder, for obtaining money from the East India Company by means of false pretences. The defendant was the widow of Captain Robert Walter Knox, formerly of the East India Company's service, and in 1842 became a pensioner upon Lord Clive's fund for widows, which would cease upon her re-marriage. This she had done in 1855, but had gone on receiving the pension down to the present year. The second marriage was not denied; but it was pleaded that the second husband being then a married man, it was no marriage at all. Evidence was then given to show that down to January, 1857, she received her pension as Mrs. Knox; but that in October, 1845, she was married at Antwerp to one Richard Osborn Cross, and had lived with him at Berkhampstead as his wife. In his examination, Mr. Cross said he did not know that his first wife was alive. He had not seen her from 1843 until lately. He saw her last Sunday fortnight in Brighton. The defendant was then discharged.

At the Third Court, before Mr. Prendergast, Q.C., Thos. Holland, a respectable looking young man, said to be a teacher in a Catholic school, was indicted for feloniously assaulting Hannah Peake. After the case was closed, and whilst the jury were deliberating, the Commissioner interposed several times, and pointed out different points in the case, commenting further upon them.—Mr. Ribton, with much warmth, protested against such a course being pursued when a case was closed. The case during the early part had been nearly taken out of his hands by the Bench.—The Commissioner denied that he had taken the case out of the counsel's hands, or that he had interfered in the matter in any way to call for the remarks which had been made upon his conduct.—Mr. Ribton repeated his objections to the course which had been pursued by the Commissioner throughout the whole trial. After some further remarks from the Bench, which provoked immediate replies from the counsel, the scene, happily for the dignity of justice, was brought to a close, the jury finding the prisoner guilty; and he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment.

At the Aylesbury Petty Sessions on Saturday last (before Captain Hamilton and a full bench of magistrates), Mr. James T. Senior, one of the magistrates of the county, residing at Broughton Hall, near Aylesbury, was charged with shooting without a game certificate, whereby he had rendered himself liable to a penalty of £5. The defendant's solicitor admitted the fact that Mr. Senior had no game certificate, but said it was entirely an accidental omission on his part. The fact was, that he had made application for the certificate to the old assessor instead of the new one, and that was the reason he was not in possession of one. He submitted, that, as there had been no intention to defraud, a very moderate fine would be sufficient. Captain Hamilton ordered the defendant to pay a fine of £5, including costs.

The statement to the effect that Sir John Dean Paul, Strahan, Bates, Robson, Redpath, Saward, and Agar had all left England in the same convict ship, is incorrect. Sir John Dean Paul and Mr. Strahan are still at Millbank, and Mr. Bates is at Pentonville.

The Wrexham Telegraph says, a rumour is in circulation that there will soon be a vacancy in the representation of the county of Denbigh, by the elevation of Colonel Biddulph to the peerage.

The office of Queen's Advocate at Sierra Leone has become vacant by the death of Mr. Collett.

COUNTY COURT STATISTICS.

From a parliamentary return just issued, we extract from a mass of figures the following interesting particulars:—The total amount of plaints entered since the establishment of the county courts in England and Wales, from March, 1847, to September 30, 1856, was 4,509,756. During the same period, the total number of causes tried was 2,476,851. The number of causes tried under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, for sums above £20 and not exceeding £50, was 35,752. The entire number of days the courts sat was 80,176. The total of the sums sought to be recovered was £13,861,944, and of this sum judgment had been obtained for £7,103,549. No less than £962,851 had been paid in satisfaction of debts without proceeding to judgment. The aggregate of the moneys received to the credit of the suitors was £4,024,495, of which £3,473,534 was paid out to suitors. The number of cases tried by a jury was 7,639, and the number of those in which the party requiring a jury obtained a verdict was 3,733. During the same period the total of the judges' fund and officers' fees amounted to £2,135,874.

The total number of appeals under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, from August 14, 1850, to September 30, 1856, was 152; of these, the number of the decisions of the county courts which were confirmed was 45, those reversed were 46, and those dropped were 59.

The aggregate of the plaints entered from January 1 to September 30, 1856, was 395,381; of these, 5,304 were for sums above £20, and not exceeding £50. The total number of causes tried was 204,797, and the total in which judgment was entered for sums above £20, and not exceeding £50, was 2,768. The entire number of days on which the courts sat was 6,487. During the same period, the total of the moneys for which plaints were entered amounted to £1,054,041, and the total of the moneys, exclusive of costs, for which judgment had been obtained, was £498,318. The amount of such costs, including the expenses of witnesses, counsel, and attorneys, was £126,028. The sum paid into court, in satisfaction of debts sued for, without proceeding to judgment, was £80,566. The gross total of the money received to the credit of suitors, and the amount paid out to suitors, stands thus—paid in, £432,473; paid out, £431,970. The judges' fund and officers' fees amounted to £164,056; adding to this £29,285 for the general fund, the total of the fees received by the courts amounts to £193,341. Out of the 395,351 plaints, only 500 were tried by a jury; and of these latter, the number of causes in which the party requiring a jury obtained a verdict, was only 268. During the same period, from January 1 to September 30, 1856, the number of executions issued by the clerk of the court against the goods of the defendants amounted to 57,284. The number of judgment summonses issued was 47,867. The number of warrants of commitment issued was 11,648, and the number of persons actually taken to prison was 4,872.

A comparison between the business transacted in the county courts in 1855 and that in 1856, gives the following results:—Number of plaints entered in 1855, 538,148; in 1856, 581,053—increase, 42,885. Number of causes tried in 1855, 285,178; in 1856, 297,679—increase, 12,501. Number of causes tried above £20, and not exceeding £50, in 1855, 4,686; in 1856, 4,053, showing a decrease of 633. There has also been an increase of 172 days in the sittings of the court. The total amount of moneys for which plaints were entered in 1855 was £1,495,605; in 1856, it amounted to £1,533,666, being an increase of £38,061. There has been a decrease, however, in the amount of moneys for which judgment was obtained. In 1855, judgment was entered for £736,077; in 1856, for £725,413, showing a decrease of £10,664. In 1855, the money paid in satisfaction of debts sued for, without proceeding to judgment, was £111,127; in 1856, it was £113,863, being an increase of £2,736. The total number of executions issued by the Registrar against the goods of the defendants amounted, in 1855, to 74,081; in 1856, there is an increase on this number of 2,577. The number of summonses issued in 1855 was 59,990; in 1856, there has been an increase on this number of 12,497. There has also been an increase in the warrants of commitment of 2,285, and the number of actual commitments stands thus—in 1855, the number of persons actually sent to prison was 6,480; in 1856, it was 7,011, showing an increase of 531.

The returns from January 1 to December 31 stand as follows:—The total number of plaints entered during that time was 581,053, of which 7,877 were plaints between £20 and £50. The total number of cases tried, or in which judgment was entered, was 297,679; of which 4,053 were between £20 and £50. The aggregate sum for which the plaints were entered was £1,533,666; the amount for which judgment was obtained, exclusive of costs, was £725,413. The amount of costs was £163,307; and the sum paid into court for debts sued for, without proceeding to judgment, was £113,863. The total amount of the judges' fund and officers' fees was £164,056.

FRAUDS BY A SOLICITOR.

Another addition has within the last few days been made to the list of cases of gross fraud. The defaulter in this case is Mr. Dean, a solicitor, of King's Bench-walk.

The facts of the case connected with Mr. Dean appear to be, that, for years passed, he has been in the habit of obtaining large sums of money from his bankers, and from capitalists, on the deposit of forged deeds, purporting to be mortgages of freehold property. To such an extent has this system been carried on, that, for several years, it is stated he has been in the habit of paying as much as £3,000 a year in the shape of interest on the advances which he had obtained. Already forged deeds to the amount of £60,000 have been discovered, and there is reason to believe that the whole extent of the frauds has not yet been fully ascertained. The most intimate friends and relatives of the absconding defaulters are, we regret, among those who are the greatest sufferers by his frauds. Title deeds of property which had been left by several of his clients in the hands of Dean have been made away with in several instances; and it is needless to say that great distress has been caused by his fraudulent conduct. The defaulting solicitor lived near Barnes Common, and the whole of his goods and effects have been seized under a bill of sale, and will be sold in a few days. The proceeds will not, however, it is expected, cover the amount for which the seizure has been made. Since his disappearance, he has been adjudged and declared a bankrupt as a "money scrivener," and it is not improbable that the validity of the bill of sale may be disputed by the assignees under the bankruptcy. Warrants for the apprehension of Dean have been placed in the hands of Inspector Field.—Observer.

THE CLERGY AND THE NEW DIVORCE BILL.

The Rev. Bryan King, rector of St. George's-in-the-East, one of the leaders of the High Church party in London, informs the clergy that they have in their hands the remedy for many of the evil consequences which he contends the Divorce Bill will produce, and "that it may be overruled, to the promotion of church discipline, in a manner of which its episcopal and other promoters never dreamt." He reminds the clergy that the 109th canon requires that adulterers should be presented into the ecclesiastical courts, "to be punished by the severity of the laws, according to their deserts;" and that the 113th canon empowers ministers to make such presentments. He adds—"Let then a society be immediately formed in London, with a branch in each diocese, for the defence of the church in this instance; and then, whenever a divorce shall have been obtained in the new court, on the ground of adultery, let the minister of the parish be enabled to present and prosecute such adulterer. The sentence of any ecclesiastical court upon such offender (if it be but formal excommunication) must surely be such a one as to require him or her to give satisfaction to the church, by the avowal of penitence, before he or she would be entitled to any of her ministrations. I firmly believe, that, were such a society established for the purpose of taking such proceedings in the ecclesiastical court, another session would not pass without the passing of an Act exempting the church from all complicity with such infamous unions as those upon which it is now attempted to prostitute her marriage service."

MR. TOWNSEND AND HIS CONSTITUENTS.

A public meeting was held at Woolwich for the purpose of hearing from Mr. Townsend, M.P. for Greenwich, an account of his parliamentary conduct during the late session. Mr. Eugene Murray took the chair. Mr. Townsend, after recapitulating the questions on which he had voted during the session, and after referring to his labours to obtain additional pay for the dockyard labourers, promised, in the next session of Parliament—and he should be there in spite of his enemies—to submit a motion to increase the wages of Government labourers to 16*s.* a week. He had been in business at Greenwich fourteen years, and until recently no man ever had to call upon him twice for a debt. Mr. Townsend then entered into detail with a view to prove, that, at the period of his election, he possessed the requisite legal qualification, and that his subsequent difficulties were caused by the persevering efforts of a solicitor whom he named, and who had boasted that he would drive him from his seat. If they wished him to resign his seat, he would not be a stubborn man; but, if otherwise, his enemies should not wrest the seat from him. His enemies did not object to him as John Townsend, the auctioneer, but as John Townsend, the member of Parliament. Mr. Townsend resumed his seat amidst the most uproarious applause. A resolution of confidence in Mr. Townsend was unanimously passed.—

On Tuesday, Mr. Townsend held a meeting at Greenwich, for the same purpose. The chair was occupied by Mr. W. Jones, a solicitor. Mr. Townsend referred to his private difficulties, and asserted that these had arisen from the persecution of a lawyer at Greenwich, who acted as agent to the defeated candidate.

The French Tribunals.

A decision of interest to the merchants and shipowners of England, lately given by the civil tribunal at Havre, has been confirmed by the superior court. The facts of the case are these:—Messrs. Clauss & Co., of Liverpool, were in 1853 owners of a ship called the Ann Martin; but a Mr. Harrison held a bill of exchange for £4,000 sterling accepted by them, and they gave him a mortgage on the vessel as security. He transferred the bill and mortgage to Mr. Emley, who, in his turn, transferred both to MM. Castrique & Co., of Havre. The ship was sent on a voyage to Calcutta, and the captain drew bills on Clauss & Co., but they became bankrupts in May, 1855, and the holders of the captain's bills in consequence transmitted them to France, in order that the vessel, which was bound to Havre, might on arrival be seized as security for the payment. This was done; but Castrique & Co. some time ago brought an action before the civil tribunal of Havre to have the seizure in virtue of the mortgage set aside. The tribunal, however, finding that no mention of the alleged mortgage was made in the ship's papers, decided that it was invalid in French law, and dismissed the action, at the same time condemning Castrique & Co. to pay 500fr. as damages to the holders of the bills for the inconvenience to which they had subjected them by the seizure. MM. Castrique & Co. appealed to the Imperial Court of Rouen against this judgment, but the Court confirmed it.

The following singular case was tried on Tuesday last before the Tribunal of Commerce:—The Countess d'Héricourt was in 1850 robbed of 35 Neapolitan bonds of 25 ducats each, and the thieves, a married couple named Godefroy who were in her service, were condemned by the Court of Assize. Attached to the bonds were coupons of interest to be paid at intervals up to 1855. It having been impossible to ascertain what had become of the shares, the Countess brought an action before the Tribunal of Commerce against the Messrs. de Rothschild, agents of the Neapolitan Government, to obtain from them new bonds to replace those stolen, and payment of the five years interest from 1850 to 1855. Messrs. de Rothschild offered to give new bonds, provided they bore an inscription setting forth that they were destined to replace the stolen ones; but they said that, as the Neapolitan Government had agencies in other capitals of Europe, it was possible that the five years' interest on the stolen bonds had been paid by one of them, a point they had no means of ascertaining, and that therefore they ought not to be ordered to pay it. The tribunal gave a judgment in accordance with the representation of Messrs. de Rothschild; and as to the interest falling due after 1855, it ordered that it should be deposited every half-year in the Caisse des Dépots et Consignations, and, after the expiration of five years, should be paid half-yearly to the Countess. It further ordered, that after the expiration of thirty years 35 bonds "to bearer" should be delivered to the Countess, in the room of those bearing the inscription aforesaid.

The Tribunal of Correctional Police on Thursday tried a married couple, named Rideau, photographers, Rue St. Honoré, 247, for having produced and exhibited obscene photographs. The case against them was rather singular:—As a respectable couple named Brault, carrying on business in the same house, were one day passing along the Passage Valentino, they saw photographs exposed for sale, representing young girls lying on sofas without any clothing, and they perceived to their astonishment and disgust that the features of the girls were those of their own daughters, Virginie, aged 17, and Josephine, aged 15. On inquiry, they learned that Rideau had solicited the girls to sit to him; and they at once laid a complaint against him and his wife. The tribunal condemned Rideau to three months' imprisonment and 300fr. fine, and his wife to a month's imprisonment and 16fr. fine. It also condemned three other photographers to from four months to a year's imprisonment, and to from 300fr. to 1,000fr. fine, for publishing obscene photographs; and it fined three other persons severally 100fr., 500fr., and 1,000fr. for selling photographs without authorisation.

CAP. XXV.—An Act to continue the Powers of the Commissioners under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, and further to amend the said Act.

The statutes here referred to are, 1st, that passed in 1854, to "make further provision for the good government and extension of the University of Oxford, of the colleges therein, and of the College of St. Mary, Winchester;" and, 2ndly, that of the following year (19 & 20 Vict. c. 31), to amend the Act first mentioned.

The objects of the Act under discussion, are as follows:—

1. To continue the duration of the Commission appointed by the first of the above Acts, which would otherwise have expired Jan. 1, 1858; and it is accordingly continued till July 1, 1858.

2. By the 28th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, it was made lawful for every college to make, and submit to the Commissioners, regulations and ordinances for the purpose (inter alia) of altering their statutes with respect to eligibility to headships, fellowships, and other college emoluments, and the tenure thereof; and (in order to insure such emoluments being conferred according to personal merits and fitness) for modifying or abolishing any preference; and for promoting the main designs of the founders and donors; and for the consolidation, division, or conversion of emoluments.

It has been held that so much of the above provisions, as relates to income and property and to the consolidation of emoluments, was intended to apply only to the case of a college of one foundation; and, therefore, s. 2 of the Act under discussion, extends them to the case of Queen's College, which had two founders—viz. Robert de Eglesfield and John Michel.

3. In the original Act, no provision was made as to advowsons already belonging to the colleges, or as to acquiring fresh advowsons. The omission was rectified as to college or hall livings (already acquired), by the 4th section of the amending Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 31), which authorises the sale of advowsons annexed to the headship of the college or hall, or held in trust for such head; and the addition of the same to the livings in the patronage of the college or hall, making due compensation to the parties personally interested. The 3rd section of the Act under discussion extends this provision materially, and makes it lawful for any college (with consent of the visitor) to appropriate and apply any property or income, held by or in trust for the college for the purpose of purchasing advowsons for the benefit of the college, for any of the following objects:—1. The augmentation of the endowment of the college livings. 2. The erection of parsonage houses on the college livings. 3. The foundation or augmentation of scholarships or exhibitions. 4. Any other purpose for the advancement of religion, or learning and education within the college. And it is provided, that, in the exercise of this power, the college may annex to the endowment of a college living any tithe rent-charge vested in the college—compensating the general property of the college, by the appropriation thereto of part of the property or income held for the above-mentioned purpose of purchasing advowsons.

4. It was found expedient to incorporate with the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, certain of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18)—those, viz. in particular which have reference to the purchase of lands by agreement. This was accordingly done, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 31, s. 7; and s. 4 of the Act under discussion contains a similar clause to meet transactions under that Act.

CAP. XXXI.—An Act to amend and explain the Inclosure Acts.

Until the commencement of the present century, the inclosure of common fields and waste lands, and the consequent extinction of common rights therein, used to be undertaken under the Statute of Merton (20 Hen. 3, c. 4), or under the provisions of some local Act obtained for the purpose of a particular inclosure. In the year 1801 was passed the first of the General Inclosure Acts—viz. 41 Geo. 3, c. 109—which was a collection and consolidation of the enactments usually contained in such local Acts; so that they might be made applicable, by reference, to any future Inclosure Act. It was the principle of this statute, and of others passed to amend it—viz. 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 23, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 87—that, in order to effectuate an inclosure, a special Act of Parliament must be obtained; but, in the year 1836, it was thought proper, in order to facilitate inclosure, to dispense, under certain circumstances, with the necessity for any Act of Parliament for the purpose. It was accordingly enacted, by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 115, that open and common lands (whether arable, meadow, or pasture) might be inclosed without the sanction of an Act of Parliament, provided the consent of two-thirds in number or value of the commoners be obtained. In such cases, the inclosure is to take place under the superintendence of Commissioners appointed by the parties interested in the lands proposed to be inclosed. And in case the consent of seven-eighths in number or value of the commoners be obtained, such inclosure may take place by an agreement among the parties interested, without the intervention of any Commissioners. Subsequently, in 1845, another Act was passed (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), which still further facilitates inclosures; and also deals with the cognate subjects of exchanges of land, and the division of intermixed lands. And by this Act (which has since been amended by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 70; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 111; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 83; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 79; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97; and, finally, by the Act under discussion), were established the "Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales:" a board which one of the above Acts—viz. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53—consolidates with the Copyhold Commissioners and the Tithe Commissioners. The general scheme for inclosure, under these last-mentioned Acts, is, that the Commissioners—on the application of one-third in value of the persons interested in lands subject to be inclosed, and provided the consent of two-thirds in value of such persons, with that of the lord of the manor (in case of a proposed inclosure of a waste of a manor), be ultimately obtained—institute an official inquiry into the case, and specially report, for the information of Parliament, the expediency of making such inclosure. Upon this report, an Act of Parliament is passed authorising the inclosure to be proceeded with; and an example of such an Act is to be found in cap. 20 of last session—a statute, however, which does not call for any special discussion. In such an Act, the thing enacted is, that the inclosures mentioned in the schedule thereof "be proceeded with;" and this is accordingly done by the aid of a "valuer" appointed by the Inclosure Commissioners under the provisions of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, and the other Acts above mentioned—all of which statutes, together with the Acts passed in pursuance of the annual or special reports of the Commissioners, are, it may be noticed, (by the effect of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 79, s. 34; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97, s. 21), considered and cited as "The Acts for the Inclosure, Exchange, and Improvement of Land," and to this batch, the Act under discussion is now to be added (see s. 14).

The object of the Act under discussion is, to remedy certain defects and omissions in the above Inclosure Acts, and more particularly in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118.

1. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 83, it was provided, that the allotments made by the valuer should, as the general rule, be fenced by the allottees, and the fences kept in repair and maintained by such persons as the valuer should direct. The 1st section of the Act under discussion is aimed at this provision, and gives power to the Inclosure Commissioners to dispense, where they see fit, with such fences, by an order under their hand and seal; and to direct that the allotments in question be distinguished by metes and bounds instead; and it is further provided (by s. 2), that, while such allotments remain unfenced, they shall be considered as "regulated pastures" under the said Acts (as to these see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, ss. 113—122); and that "the owners thereof shall enjoy all such rights of common by reason of vicinage, as they were entitled to prior to the setting out of such allotments."

2. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 47, the claims of parties interested must be delivered in writing to the valuer, at a meeting appointed by him for that purpose. It is provided by the 3rd section of the Act under discussion, that such claims (or any notice required by the above Acts to be given to any designated person) may be delivered, either by sending it in a registered post letter, or by leaving it at the office or usual place of abode of the person to whom it is to be delivered or given.

3. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 16, a definition is given of the persons deemed to be "interested," for a variety of purposes, within the scope of the Inclosure Acts. The 4th section of the Act under discussion expressly includes within those "interested"—for the purpose of exchanging land—railway, canal, and similar companies incorporated by special Acts; and this, though the purposes to which the land of such company proposed to be exchanged shall be applicable, is limited by the provisions of such special Act. And s. 4 of the Act under discussion provides for the case of "persons interested" within the definition of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 16, seeking to take, by way of exchange, land to which the Crown is entitled, in reversion or remainder on a life or larger particular estate.

4. The previous Inclosure Acts had contained no sufficient provisions to meet the contingencies of there being a difference of value in favour of the land required, in the case of a proposed exchange; or (in the case of a proposed partition), of there being a difficulty in allotting in severalty, in parts or shares of the like proportional values as the undivided parts or shares, in respect whereof the partition is proposed to be made. By ss. 6 to 11 of the Act under discussion, the deficiency in value in the lands offered in exchange, or the difference in the proportional values of the allotments in severalty—may be compensated by a perpetual rent-charge on the land given in exchange or allotted in severalty, as the case may be. But the deficiency in value requiring to be compensated, must not exceed one-eighth part of the actual value of the land taken in exchange or allotted in severalty. And the amount of the rent-charge must be fixed and determined by the inclosure award or order of exchange or partition; and when made, shall be a charge on the land, yielding in precedence only to tithe rent-charge, the land-tax, local rates and taxes, quit or chief rents incidental to tenure, and charges created under drainage or improvement Acts.

5. The 12th section of the Act under discussion provides a summary means of preventing nuisances in town and village greens, or land allotted under the Inclosure Acts as places for exercise and recreation. It authorises any churchwarden or overseer of the parish in which such green or place is situate, or any person in whom the soil is vested, to give information thereof; and it renders the offender liable, on conviction before two justices, to a penalty for every offence not exceeding 40*s.* over and above the damages occasioned.

6. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 34, it was provided that the majority of the "persons interested" might resolve upon instructions to the valuer for the appropriation of parts of the lands to be inclosed for a variety of purposes therein specified; and, amongst these, for the site of any school. It having been found that the instructions given in accordance with this provision have often failed to set forth with sufficient clearness for what class of children the school is to be provided, or to whom the site shall be conveyed, or in what manner and by whom the school shall be managed, visited, and inspected—power is given, by the 13th section of the Act under discussion, to the Inclosure Commissioners (on the requisition of a due proportion of the persons interested), to call a further meeting to resolve on other or further instructions; and to substitute or add them, when agreed on and sanctioned by the Commissioners, to those previously given.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

DEVISE TO TRUSTEES—POWER OF SALE.

Hall v. May, 5 W. R. 869.

A question of great importance in practice was decided in this case; and, considering the great number of times that it must have presented itself in cases where trustees have exercised a power of sale, it is strange that it has not yet been set at rest by authoritative decision. The question was upon a devise to trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust that they and the survivors and survivor of them, his heirs and assigns, should sell. The will also contained the usual power to appoint new trustees. Upon a sale by the devisees of the surviving trustee, a purchaser objected that the vendors were not duly appointed trustees under the will, and had not power to sell. The purchaser mainly relied upon the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England in Cooke v. Crawford (13 Sim. 91), in which the devise being to trustees, or the survivors or survivor, or the heirs of the survivor, upon trust for sale, the sale was made by devisees of the sole trustee, the others having disclaimed; and Sir L. Shadwell there held, that the devisees were not entitled to execute the trust for sale, the heirs of the sole trustee under the will alone being so entitled. In that case his Honour followed his own decision in Bradford v. Belfield (2 Sim. 264), where he held, that a trust for sale vested in A. and his heirs could not be exercised by an assign of A., though assigns were mentioned in the receipt clause; and in both he would have felt himself bound, if he entertained any doubt—which he did not—by the decision of the Court of King's Bench in Townsend v. Wilson (1 B. & A. 608). In the last-mentioned case, the power of sale was given to three trustees and their heirs, and the money to arise from the sale was to be paid to the trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them. One of the trustees having died, the power was exercised by the two survivors; and the Court of King's Bench held, that that was not a good execution of the power. There are several other decisions in the same direction. Thus, in Ockleston v. Heap (1 De G. & Sma. 640), where a testator devised estates to trustees, their heirs and assigns, and the surviving trustee devised them upon the same trusts, Knight Bruce, V. C., made a decree for the appointment of new trustees, his Honour entertaining doubt whether the devisees were duly appointed trustees. And so in Mortimer v. Ireland (6 Hare, 196), the legatee in trust of the survivor of two executors and trustees was held, by Sir J. Wigram, V. C., not to be a trustee properly constituted, though he was legally in possession of the trust property. This decision was affirmed, on appeal, by Lord Cottenham (11 Jur. 721). The leading authority generally relied upon, as running counter to the above-mentioned cases, is Titley v. Wolstenholme (7 Beav. 425), a decision of Lord Langdale. A testator there devised real and personal estate on trusts, which the Court considered, on the construction of his will, were intended to be performed by his trustees named, and the survivors and survivor, and by the heirs and assigns, or by the executors or administrators of the survivor; and there was no power given for the appointment of new trustees. Lord Langdale there held, that a devise and bequest of the trust estates by the survivor was valid. It was admitted on all sides, in the argument, that the trustees, or the survivors or survivor of the trustees, could not, by any act inter vivos, relieve themselves or himself of the trust; and, on one side, it was contended that the same disability attended any assignment by way of devise or bequest, and that, although the estate and property might be vested in the devisees or legatees of the surviving trustee, the duties and responsibilities attending the execution of the trust remained in the legal representative of the survivor. His Honour, however, in his judgment—the reasoning of which is much more satisfactory than that of any of the decisions to which Titley v. Wolstenholme is generally opposed—clearly pointed out the fallacy of this argument. Where a testator names several trustees, and gives no power of appointing new ones, it may be considered that he has done so from motives of personal confidence; but it is absurd to suppose, that he could have any personal confidence in the heir, and not in the devisee, of whoever happened to be the survivor. "It cannot be known beforehand," said his Lordship, "which one of the several trustees may be the survivor; and as to the contingent survivor, it cannot be known, beforehand, whether he may have an heir or not, or whether the heir may be one, or may consist of many persons, trustworthy or not, married women, infants, or bankrupts, within or without the jurisdiction." It is obvious, that the same reasons do not apply to the case of an alienation inter vivos by a surviving trustee, as to a devise by him, which could only take effect at a time to which the personal confidence of his testator could not have extended; and when, also, there must necessarily be a transmission of the estate to some person not trusted by the original testator. Wood, V. C., both in Hall v. May and in Saloway v. Strawbridge (3 W. R. 335), was disposed to lean strongly towards Lord Langdale's decision in Titley v. Wolstenholme, and against Sir L. Shadwell's in Cooke v. Crawford. The two recent cases, however, are distinguishable from both the others by the testator using the word "assigns" in the recent cases, and not in the two older ones—and, in Hall v. May, there was, moreover, a power to appoint new trustees. Under these circumstances, Wood, V. C., had no hesitation whatever in holding that the devisees of the surviving trustee could make a good title to a purchaser under the power of sale. "The safety of many titles," said his Honour, "would be imperilled by holding otherwise; nor was he inclined to extend the decision in Cooke v. Crawford, while Titley v. Wolstenholme had been recognised by several judges."

OBLIGATION BY SPECIALTY.

Eyre v. Monro, 5 W. R. 870.

"Debts by specialty, or special contract," says Blackstone, "are such whereby a sum of money becomes, or is acknowledged to be, due by deed or instrument under seal: such as by deed of covenant, by deed of sale, by lease reserving rent, or by bond or obligation." Thus, under a covenant to a retiring partner as soon as conveniently could be to pay the debts and indemnify him against them, which covenant was broken by the death of the covenantor leaving debts undischarged; those debts, being paid by the covenantee, were held to be a debt by specialty, against which the administrator of the covenantor could not retain his own simple contract debt, as he might have done in the case of debts of equal degree. Nor does it make any difference, as to the character of the debt, whether its amount is ascertained or not; for "it is settled," said Lord Eldon, "that, if a covenant is broken, though the damages are unliquidated, the covenantee is a specialty creditor" (Meeson v. May, 3 V. & B. 197; and Ellis v. Ellis, before the Lord Chancellor, 1856, unreported).

So, where A. and B. agreed, by deed, that a sum of money in the hands of A., but belonging to B., should be laid out in the funds, in A.'s name, in trust for B., and A. died without having invested the money; B. was held to be a specialty creditor for that amount; in which case, if B. were the executor of A., he would be entitled to retain the amount so agreed to be invested, out of his testator's assets, in preference to A.'s simple contract creditors (Mavor v. Davenport, 2 Sim. 227.)

Freemoult v. Dedire (1 P. Wms. 429), Deacon v. Smith (3 Atk. 323), and Cheveley v. Stone (2 Dick. 782), are types of another class of cases, from which the general doctrine may be deduced, that a covenant generally to settle land, or to lay out a sum of money in land to be settled, creates a specialty debt; while a covenant to settle particular land, of which the covenantor is seised, creates a specific lien on it. In Wellesley v. Wellesley (4 Myl. & Cr. 561), Lord Cottenham was of opinion that a covenant, on or before a certain day, to secure an annuity by a charge upon freehold estates of inheritance to be situate in England or Wales, or by investment in the funds, created a lien on any property to which the covenantor became entitled between the date of the covenant and the day limited for its performance. Following the principle of all these decisions, Wood, V. C., in Eyre v. Monro, held, that a covenant by a father, in his son's marriage settlement, that, upon certain events, he would, by will or otherwise, in his lifetime, settle out of all his real and personal estate £3,000, or property to that amount, upon certain trusts after his death, created a specialty debt for the amount named. Upon the construction of the covenant, his Honour held that it was not merely a covenant to execute an instrument so as to give the money in his lifetime, or by will, so far as his testamentary estate should extend; but that it created an immediate obligation to be proved against his estate in the event of his dying without having discharged it in his lifetime. "There was no ground," he said, "for holding that the covenant would be satisfied by the covenantor merely purporting to perform it (or by anything short of an effectual performance)—for example, by a disposition of property liable to be diminished or altogether absorbed by debts subsequently contracted." The cestuis que trust were, therefore, declared to be entitled in priority to the simple contract creditors of the covenantor.

PRACTICE—EVIDENCE—DRAWING UP DECREE.

Manby v. Bewicke, 5 W. R. 867.

A proceedings in a cause, or decrees or orders in another cause between the same parties, may be read at the hearing without an order of the Court specifically authorising the party to read them, upon the principle that the Court takes judicial notice of its own acts. But, according to the old practice, where a party desired to read, at the hearing of a cause, the answers or depositions taken in another cause, even though the parties were the same, he was obliged to obtain an order entitling him to do so. In this suit the plaintiff's bill was dismissed without entering upon the defence. When the decree came to be drawn up, the defendant wished to have entered upon the decree as evidence read office copies of proceedings at law and in equity relating to the subject-matter of the suit, at various periods previous to 1782; and also the whole of the answer in this suit, parts of which only had been read by the plaintiff. Wood, V. C., held, that the defendant was entitled, not having had an opportunity of stating what his evidence was, to rely upon everything which he might have used at the hearing; and that he might have referred to office copies of the old proceedings without an order for the purpose. Having consulted the Registrar as to the practice, his Honour also held, that the answer might be entered in general terms as read, and not merely the passages referred to by the plaintiff. It is not stated whether the defendant desired to have entered merely the judgments and decrees in the former actions and suits, or the evidence—the depositions, answers, &c., on which the judgments and decrees were founded; nor whether the Vice-Chancellor's order included the latter. The old practice of the Court appears to have altered as to the rule to which we have referred, which requires an order to entitle a party to read answers or depositions taken in another cause. In Williams v. Broadhead (1 Sim. 151), Sir A. Hart held that an order was not necessary to entitle the plaintiff to read office copies of depositions by living persons in a tithe suit in the Exchequer, in a suit in equity against another person who made the same defence, the only condition imposed on the plaintiff being the production of the bill and answer in the former suit. His Honour there drew a distinction between the case of a cause and cross-cause, and a case where the parties were different in the two causes. In the former case he considered that an order would be necessary, because it saved the necessity of examining the witnesses in both causes; but that, in the latter, it was unnecessary, the object being merely to show that the same points were in issue in both. It has been said that the depositions in another cause may be read without an order, if the whole proceedings in the cause are put in evidence; and that the object of the order is to save the useless expense of proving all the proceedings (see argument of counsel in Goodenough v. Alway, 2 Sim. & Stu. 482). The practice, however, can hardly be taken as yet settled; for, in the last-mentioned case, Sir J. Leach refused to make an order that depositions in a tithe cause in the Exchequer might be read in a suit in equity against other occupiers of land in the same parish, though the object of both suits and the interest of the parties were the same; and he required that the depositions should be proved in due form.

Professional Intelligence.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

We are informed that the Committee of the Manchester Law Association are making considerable preparations in connection with the forthcoming meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, which is to be held at Manchester, in the Town-hall, on Wednesday the 7th, and Thursday the 8th of October next.

We understand that the Local Association has invited to the dinner, which will be held on the evening of Wednesday the 7th, representatives from all the Law Societies in England, all members of Parliament who are or have been solicitors, all mayors who are solicitors, the local members, and many others.

The Local Association, we believe, purpose giving a déjeûner on the morning of Thursday the 8th. There will, no doubt, be, as is expected, a large and influential gathering.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

IV. Usages of the Profession in Conveyancing Matters.

The Council have taken into consideration several questions of professional usage submitted to them by members of the society and other solicitors, the decisions on which are entered in the usage book kept in the secretary's office. These questions relate to:—

1. The preparation of mortgages of trust property where there are different solicitors.
2. Procuration fee on mortgages.
3. Searching for and production of title deeds.
4. Charges on the execution of numerous deeds by the same parties.
5. The preparation of disentailing deeds.
6. The execution of counterparts of leases.
7. Bonds of indemnity against the covenants in a lease.
8. Preparing and perusing deeds of covenant.
9. Commission on premiums of insurance.

V. Remuneration of Solicitors.

The members are aware, from previous annual reports for several years, that the remuneration of solicitors, especially in proceedings in equity, since the claim orders were issued seven years ago, has been in an unsatisfactory state, alike injurious to the suitor and the solicitor; operating as an impediment to the attainment of justice by the one, and of due remuneration to the other. The Council and their committees have felt it to be their duty to bestow much time and attention on this subject, and to endeavour, by all the means in their power, to remove the grievance complained of. They have addressed various memorials to the equity judges, and many deputations on the part of the solicitors have attended them in furtherance of the objects in view.

These exertions at length produced the Chancery Orders of 30th January last, and the Council regret that the Court has deemed it proper to grant only a comparatively small part of the claim of the practitioners. It is understood that the Commissioners, to whom the matter was referred by the Lord Chancellor, were convinced, by the evidence laid before them, that a loss had been sustained of not less than one-third of the solicitor's emoluments; and that, though the length of Chancery pleadings and other proceedings (upon which a considerable portion of his emoluments depended) had been largely diminished, the personal labour and responsibility of the solicitor had been increased; and it was expected, that, whilst the suitor justly derived considerable relief—not only in the amount of the charges to which he was liable, but in the despatch of the business in which he was interested—the emoluments of the solicitor would be so far provided for that it would not become his interest to decline undertaking suits in Chancery except in behalf of valuable clients whose general business, on the whole, afforded a sufficient recompense for professional services.

Such, however, is the present state of this important matter; and the Council apprehend they must wait the operation of the new scale for some time to come, before they make a further appeal to the judges. It may, however, become necessary, as the Commissioners intimated that part of the claims of the solicitors could only be sanctioned by the authority of Parliament, to submit that part of the case, if not the whole, to the consideration of the Legislature.

Under this head it may be mentioned, that the Council considered a communication relating to the right of solicitors practising in England to participate in the profits of professional business introduced by them and transacted in Ireland, and of solicitors in Ireland participating in business transacted here, when introduced by Irish solicitors; but they agreed in opinion with the Incorporated Society of Attorneys in Ireland that such participation was neither legal nor expedient.

A communication has been received from several solicitors of Hong Kong, with a recent ordinance relating to solicitors' costs, providing (inter alia) that in the rules of taxation no distinction should be made as to costs between party and party, and attorney and client; and that special contracts might be entered into to allow any reasonable sum for business done, although higher in amount than the ordinary scale, such agreement to be signed by the client, subject, however, to the control of the taxing officer. It thus appears that a rule which has been long contended for in this country, has been adopted in one of the colonies.

VI. Concentration of the Courts and Offices of Law and Equity.

The members are aware that at every convenient opportunity from the year 1840, when the first committee of the House of Commons was appointed at the instance of this society, to the present time, the Council have urged the concentration of all the courts and offices, both of law and equity, in this neighbourhood; and since the last annual meeting they have several times renewed their application to the Government.

It cannot be questioned that the existing courts and offices are quite insufficient for the proper administration of justice, and that the convenience of the public absolutely requires great additional accommodation. Recently the courts of equity have sat in Lincoln's-inn all the year: the courts of the Lord Chancellor and of the three Vice-Chancellors adjoin each other; but they are inconvenient, small, and inadequate. The court of the Master of the Rolls is at some distance from the other equity courts, and on the opposite side of Chancery-lane. The chambers of the equity judges (where a large proportion of the business is now transacted) are hired for the purpose, and are all in different places, more or less distant from each other, and have been temporarily fitted up; and the Masters' offices are in a building distinct from the others, as are also the offices of the taxing-masters.

The Common Law Courts still hold their sittings in term in Westminter Hall, away from the chambers of counsel and attorneys, and distant from three-fourths of the metropolis; and the numerous offices of the three courts are scattered in various parts of the law district.

It is obvious that it would be much more convenient to the suitors, the barristers, the solicitors, and the public, that all these courts and offices should be placed together, with proper and suitable accommodation in accordance with the dignity of the law, and the wealth and position of the country.

A site has been suggested in the immediate vicinity of the inns of court, between Lincoln's-inn and the Temple, and which is at present occupied by ill-drained and badly-ventilated houses of the lowest class.

It appears to the Council that the object might be attained without imposing any charge on the consolidated fund, and without injustice to any one. The returns lately made to Parliament by the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery show that there is upwards of four millions of stock to the credit of the Suitors' Fund, of which a million and a quarter has arisen solely from profit made by the investments of cash balances in hand, to which no suitors of the court can make any claim. The past accounts show that the Unclaimed Suitors' Fund has been constantly accumulating for upwards of a century, and there is no probability that it will decrease. Supposing it possible that each individual suitor should claim his share and make out his title to the principal of the money paid into court, the sum of 1,291,629*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.* will still remain as surplus interest; and under proper provisions this fund may be applied in purchasing the required site, and in erecting the necessary buildings.

The increase of this fund considerably exceeds the claims on it at the present time; and these claims diminish as the pensions and compensations charged on it, amounting annually to £60,000, fall in to the extent of about £2,000 a-year.

There are several precedents for applying the unclaimed funds to the erection of new buildings for the transaction of legal business. The Act of 14 Geo. 3, c. 43, recites that it would be no injury to the suitors, if the unappropriated accumulations of cash should be employed in rebuilding and erecting the Six Clerks' office, and authorises their application in rebuilding that office, and in erecting proper offices for the Registrar and Accountant-General. In 1791 a sum not exceeding £30,000 was directed by Act of Parliament to be applied out of the interest of the suitors' unemployed cash in building the Masters' offices in Southampton-buildings. In 1800 a further sum of £12,000 was applied in the erection of the Examiners' and other Chancery offices in Rolls-yard.

It may also be mentioned that the Government are now paying several thousands per annum for rents of detached buildings, in which portions of the legal business of the country are carried on.

It is expected that this important subject will soon be brought before Parliament, and that the small and inconvenient courts at Westminster will be removed, in order to complete the buildings and offices of the Houses of Parliament.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

Dundas Hamilton v. The Western Bank of Scotland.—Dec. 13, 1856.

The facts of this case are very simple, although they raised several points of importance.

R. T. Miller & Co., Merchants, in Glasgow, drew a bill upon A. S. Sichel, of Manchester, for 630*l.* 10*s.*, dated 28th Dec. 1853, and payable four months after date, which was accepted. This bill was discounted by the defender to Miller & Co., upon an arrangement under which Miller & Co. agreed to transfer to the defender 300 cases of brandy, belonging to them, and lying in bond, to be held "as collateral security" until retirement of the bill above mentioned; and in implement of this agreement, they, on March 16, 1854, handed to the defender a delivery order addressed to the warehouse-keeper, in virtue of which the brandy was transferred in his books to the defender.

The bill above mentioned became due on the 1st of May, 1854; but on the 28th of April it was renewed to the extent of £500 for four months; and in consideration of the defender discounting it, Miller & Co. authorised him, by letter dated May 9, 1854, "still to hold 300 cases brandy transferred to your order March 16th last, as collateral security, until Mr. Sichel's next acceptance to us matures and is retired."

On the 21st of July, the defender gave Miller & Co. a further accommodation of £400.

On August 31st the renewed bill was retired by the acceptor. On Sept. 9, the £400 being still due to the defender, and the brandy still standing in his name, Miller & Co. became bankrupts.

The pursuer was appointed trustee on Miller & Co.'s estate, and raised the present action (which contained alternative conclusions for damages) to enforce delivery of the brandy for behoof of the creditors; the main plea in support of the action being that the brandy was transferred for a special and limited purpose—namely, to secure the debts of 630*l.* 10*s.* and £500 which had been already paid. The defender resisted the demand to deliver the brandy, on the ground inter alia that when the £400 had been given it had been agreed that the brandy should be retained in security of that advance also. The pursuer denied this agreement, and a proof on commission was allowed. The proof failed, and a finding to that effect was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary. The defender reclaimed, and having asked leave to add the following pleas to the record—viz. "(4) The brandy in question having been transferred and delivered by the bankrupts to the defender under a real contract of pledge, he is entitled to retain the possession so acquired until all advances made by him to the bankrupts subsequent to his attaining such possession—at least, all such advances made on the faith of such possession—and especially the £400 mentioned in Statement 7 of his defences, are repaid. (5) The said brandy having been transferred to the defender by conveyance ex facie absolute, and possession attained and held under such conveyance, he is entitled to retain possession thereof until all advances made by him subsequent to said conveyance and possession are repaid"—the case was remitted to enable the Lord Ordinary to open up the record for the purpose of receiving these pleas.

The case was then argued before the Lord Ordinary on the proof and on the fourth plea, both parties assuming that the transaction was a contract of real pledge. The pursuer, on this footing, maintaining that it was a specific and limited pledge; the defender maintaining that it was a general pledge. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the agreement averred had not been proved; repelling the whole pleas of the defender, and finding that he "was bound to transfer or deliver over to the pursuer the cases of brandy specified in the summons, and that the detention of them was wrongful and illegal." The Lord Ordinary added a long and elaborate note to his judgment, discussing the contract of real pledge in its general and specific character; and referring to numerous authorities in the Scotch, French, and civil law in regard to the principles upon which the question, whether the pledge was given in security of a specific debt or was general, ought to be determined; the ground of his judgment being, that, in the present case, there was a special appropriation to secure such a debt.

The defender reclaimed, maintaining that he was entitled to retain the brandy whether the agreement were proved or not; that if the transaction were viewed as one of pledge, it must be viewed as a general pledge to cover all advances made subsequent to the contract; that, to limit it to a security for a special debt, a special document so limiting it was necessary; and in support of these views various authorities from the English-French civil and Scotch law were referred to. But the point most strongly urged was, that the transfer, having been ex facie absolute, and constructive delivery having taken place, the property in the brandy passed absolutely, subject only to a latent right to recover so much of it as might be found to be redeemable in the circumstances in which it was given. The pursuer maintained his previous plea, that the case was really one of pledge for a specific debt; that it was like an absolute disposition with a back bond to reconvey on payment of the debt in consideration of which the disposition was granted, and that the fifth plea of the defender involved the absurdity of attributing a higher character of transference to a transaction, the facts of which must, if such effect be given to them, be held insufficient to constitute the minor contract of pledge.

The Lord President, in delivering judgment, said, that the case had been several times before the court, and had changed its aspect each time; that he had no doubt the defender had failed on the proof; and that the case must be considered apart from the alleged agreement. That it was difficult to gather from the record what really were the averments of parties; that he thought that the case of each party was to be found in the averments of the other; that the pleas were ambiguous; that the case was first treated as one of pledge, but now as one of absolute transfer; but that he thought the pleas wide enough to cover all the views taken at the debate, though it was difficult to decide the case upon them as they stood. That, in the first place, the brandy, being in a bonded warehouse, was transferred from the name of the bankrupt to that of the defender. That this was not admitted, but that it was sufficiently made out by the documents; that the brandy remains so transferred; that there never was actual custody of the brandy, nor was it intended that actual delivery should be given, which was necessary for real pledge. That there was constructive delivery, but that there was no authority for holding that such delivery was equivalent to actual delivery; that it was not even equal to delivery by giving up the key of a warehouse. That he did not, therefore, consider the transaction one of pledge—the essence of which is, the actual delivery of the subject pledged. But that, although the brandy was not pledged to the defender, if there was enough to constitute a transference of property, that might give him a right to retain the goods for subsequent advances, which must be presumed to have been made on the faith of such transference. That it might not have been the intention that the property should ultimately remain with the defender, but that circumstances might arise which would convert the qualified into an absolute right, as a conveyance qualified by a back bond might become an effectual right of property, though only intended to create a security. That the question was not whether there could be any right in the defender higher than that which actual custody would have given him, but whether the facts resulted in a different right; and that he thought they did, and that there had been such a transference of the property as entitled the defender to retain it till all his claims were settled.

Lord Ivory concurred in thinking that the agreement was not proved; that the debate brought out a different question from that discussed before the Lord Ordinary; and that it was upon the plea that the transaction was neither one of pledge nor security, but of absolute transfer of right from the bankrupt to the defender, that he rested his judgment. That he thought confusion had been introduced into Scotch law from a loose use of English terms; that, in reference to the transference of movable property, no two systems started from more conflicting principles; that, in this way, lien and set-off had crept into use in Scotland instead of the proper terms compensation and retention, and that the confusion had become greater on account of the analogies; that the difference was well pointed out in Mr. More's remarks on Stair, with which he agreed, except in regard to what was said about the case of Faulds. That set-off, in England, was altogether the creature of statute; that the system of mutual debits and credits introduced by the Bankrupt Statute had still further approximated the law of England to the broad principle of retention recognised in Scotland. That, in dealing with statute law on one hand, and common law on the other, there was obvious danger in trusting to analogy; that difficulties had arisen in our law itself out of the distinction between custody and possession; that goods sent to be worked upon were in the custody of the workmen, but still in the possession of the owner; that a carrier had a limited custody, but not possession; that a manufacturer has a higher right, but still not possession; that in all these cases a question of retention might arise; that the second shape which custody took was pledge, which conferred more than mere custody, what in England is called special property in the article itself; that the possession, no doubt, was of a limited kind, but quite distinguishable from mere custody; that, lastly, there was possession arising from absolute title, under which the present case fell; that a qualification existed, but extrinsic of the absolute right; that the party in possession was absolute proprietor under a personal obligation to divest himself, which the original proprietor had a personal right to enforce. That the statutes in regard to bonded warehouses dealt with transfer alone, and left no termini habiles for security or pledge; that it could not be otherwise, as the goods must remain in the warehouse till the duties were paid—so that, while these were unpaid, no question of custody could arise. That, in this case, it was not meant that the duties should be paid by the defender; that what he was to get was the right to the goods, subject to these duties, and such possession as his debtor had; that he could not get active possession except by increasing his loan, and paying the duties; that the real possession was meant to remain with the warehouse-keeper as before; that if the sale had been unqualified, the delivery order could not have been in stronger terms. His Lordship then referred to several cases where security only had been intended to be given, but where the title had been held to be absolute, because the qualification upon it was extrinsic of the title itself, and concluded by observing that the state of the question arose from the shape of the title, which was an absolute assignation of the goods duly intimated; that the ultimate rights of parties arose by force of law; that the right of retention arose to the defender under the common law, when compensation was shut out; and that the original proprietor could only be reinstated in the possession by the act of the defender, which he could not call into existence except by performing the legal obligations under which he lay to him.

Lords Curriehill and Deas expressed similar views, and the Court accordingly found the defender entitled to retain the brandy until the advances made subsequently to the transfer were repaid.

Review.

A Historical Sketch of Civil Procedure among the Romans. By J. T. ABDY, LL.D., Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Cambridge. Cambridge: Macmillan & Co. 1857.

It is no longer necessary to apologise to English lawyers for bringing under their notice a work on the Civil Law. An acquaintance with some portions of the Corpus Juris has become a recognised part of the education of all practitioners who wish to qualify themselves for undertaking the higher branches of their profession, and contributing to guide the course of current legislation. The very subjects, to which attention is at present most prominently turned, suffice to point out the necessity of knowing something of that great system of law which governs so large a portion of the civilised world, and which is itself the expression of the most consecutive and scientific thought which has ever been brought to bear upon jurisprudence. The framers of the Act for the Punishment of Fraudulent Trustees began the difficult task of shaping the intended Bill by inquiring what was the Roman conception and definition of fraud; and the Probate and Divorce Bills abound in points which at once carry us to the Roman law, and to the systems of law which have sprung from it throughout continental Europe. It is expressly provided that the practice and doctrines of the Ecclesiastical Courts—or, in other words, the adaptation of a considerable portion of Roman law to the wants and notions of English society—shall be observed in the new Courts, as far as possible. And it is not one of the least advantages of the constitution of this new tribunal, that no one can henceforward say that a knowledge of the Civil Law belongs to the thinking, not the acting, lawyer—to the jurist, not to the barrister or solicitor. The civil law will in future stand to the practitioner in a place intermediate between a general and a special education. Whatever advantages he may be said to derive from a classical and mathematical education before he commences law at all, he will reap the same when he begins law by entering on that which is the general education of the lawyer.

Dr. Abdy, the Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Cambridge, has recently published a "Historical Sketch of Civil Procedure among the Romans." We do not quite understand for what class of persons it was intended, as it is below the level of those who make the civil law a special study, and for ordinary students appears to go over ground which is mostly occupied by other writers. But, whatever may have been Dr. Abdy's object in publishing it, he has compressed into a moderate space the elementary learning connected with his subject, and tells what he has to say in a plain straightforward way. It forms no part of his plan to speculate on the theory of civil procedure generally, or to trace the causes of its changes at Rome, or to connect its history with the history of civil procedure in this country. No book could be more unaffected or unambitious. Dr. Abdy hardly ever ventures upon a general remark. He has collected some facts, and he does not pretend to do more than submit them to the reader. We do not in the least quarrel with his judgment. If Roman law is to be studied, we cannot expect or desire that it should always be handled by men who occupy themselves with the most difficult problems which its contents suggest. There must be humbler workers in the same field. It is necessary that students of Roman law should know the outlines of the civil procedure of Rome; and if Dr. Abdy thinks he can give those outlines in a clear, short, accessible form, he is doing a useful work by carrying out his design. Probably his main purpose is to meet a want felt among his own students, and his Summary may be intended to form the basis of lectures in which he will theorise, when he has once assured himself that the facts of which he is speaking are known to his hearers. We suggest this, because very possibly there may be readers who may regret that a Regius Professor should at this moment, when attention is just beginning to be turned to the Civil Law, have presented us with such a simple, technical, matter-of-fact little volume. We might have been very glad if the subject had been handled in a broader spirit, with a more comprehensive grasp, and with a higher aim. But it is not for the reader to complain if the author does all he offers to do. Dr. Abdy offered to give us a "Historical Sketch of Civil Procedure among the Romans," and he has given it.

If we had to fix on the one primary benefit which English lawyers derive from studying the Civil Law, we should say that it was to be found in the material for comparison which the Civil Law affords. It is not until we know a foreign language, that we can understand grammar; it is not until we have studied the history of another nation, that we can realise to ourselves the history of England. So in studying Law, we should find it very difficult to comprehend the growth of our own system; the causes which have promoted or retarded its advancement; the stage at which we now find ourselves; the direction in which, consciously or unconsciously, we are tending; unless we had a system to compare with our own, which also had an indigenous and gradual growth—was worked out under historical circumstances in some degree similar, and was formed by men whom we must recognise as intellectually our equals or superiors. When we attempt to pursue the comparison between the English and Roman systems, we find no field more instructive than the history of civil procedure in the two countries. Let a person, for instance, ask himself such a question as, what is the origin and meaning of legal fictions—a question which cannot fail to suggest itself to every reflective student of law. An inquirer who only looked to the Roman Law might derive his answer from such considerations as the relations of Rome to the other Italian States; or, if he only looked to English law, he might find a solution in the relations of the ecclesiastical to the civil power. But the combined experience of the two countries teaches him that legal fictions are a stage of the expansion and formation of legal notions, through which nations whose growth in legal civilisation is indigenous are sure to pass. They are the expression of the first efforts of individuals to infuse new thoughts into the fixed framework of law, which, at a certain point of the history of a semi-barbarous people, is almost identical with the framework of society. So, too, when we reach a later epoch, we find in the subtleties of the formulæ and of special pleading, a gauge of the national advancement, and a key to the general position attained in legal history.

There is nothing arbitrary in law. Sooner or later, the same questions and the same difficulties must present themselves to those who build up a legal system; and, if no disturbing circumstances intervene, it is probable that these questions will be answered, and these difficulties surmounted, in the same, or nearly the same, manner. The best and the newest chapter in Dr. Abdy's volume treats of the Roman law of evidence. In its general outline, this law is exactly the same as ours. It could not be otherwise. When we hear that "the burden of proof lay on him who affirmed, not on him who denied," what we really learn is, that the Roman lawyers put the dictates of common sense into the shape of a terse and neatly turned sentence. The thing itself was a necessity. There was no choice about it. If the negative had to be proved, actions would be impossible. So, too, when we read of the distinction of presumptions into those juris et de jure, juris tantum, and facti, we know that, whether this distinction had been made or not, presumptions with different degrees of force must have existed. But the Roman lawyers analysed the difference, and invented appropriate technical terms for the component parts of the result of the analysis. This is one of the greatest services which they rendered to future generations of lawyers. They gave accurate names to accurate thoughts. In English law, we have to deplore the want of an accurate legal nomenclature, and there is no better way of estimating our own deficiency, and of finding hints for its correction, than by turning to the pages of the "Corpus Juris."

Dr. Abdy makes one, and only one, general reflection in his volume, and we therefore are inclined to dwell more on it than we otherwise should do. "It is," he says, "a problem somewhat difficult of solution to account for the reasons of the constant improvement of legal institutions visible in most civilised countries in the midst of revolution and war;" and he proceeds to remark, that, in Rome, in England, and in France, "that period of history which is most disfigured with war and discord is remarkable for the steady settlement of the law, and for the decided influence of its teachers." We cannot agree with Dr. Abdy that this problem is a difficult one, and find it a little hard to see that it exists. It is not every period of war and discord that is synchronous with the settlement of the law. The Code Civil of France was certainly framed while France was a young Republic fighting against Europe; but the law of France did not advance a step during the wars of the Fronde. In England the law received its new settlement after, not during, the parliamentary struggle. At Rome, the law grew steadily alike through the struggles of the Republic, and under the settled quiet of the Empire. We do not see any resemblance in the facts to warrant us in supposing that a common principle underlies them. The point is not of much consequence, but in a technical book we are naturally caught by any remark which for a moment tempts us to quit the region of technicalities.

Judicial Business Report.

EVIDENCE OF MR. EDWARD LEE ROWCLIFFE ABRIDGED.

I am a member of the firm of Gregory & Co., solicitors. I have heard the evidence of Mr. Sharpe. I certainly think that a third assize would be very useful in many places, especially in the great manufacturing and commercial towns in the north. In giving that opinion, I am speaking both of civil and criminal business. What I have said as to three assizes is founded upon this belief, that a great many claims are abandoned solely because parties have not a reasonable opportunity of trying them. That belief is founded on the fact, that, in the Borough Court of Liverpool, which sits four times a year, from 50 to 100 causes are entered for trial at each sittings. Some of them, I know, are very important actions, for infringements of patents and so forth, which, I believe, would be tried in the superior courts if facilities were given for them. I allude to the Passage Court, the court over which Mr. Edward James presides. I do not think that any arrangement for an equal division of the year would be a compensation for the want of three circuits. My strong belief is, that merchants frequently give up disputed accounts, which they would have a fair chance of recovering, simply to close their books. They say, we cannot try in a reasonable time, and, therefore, we will give the demand up and close the account. And again, that they would rather give up a disputed account than have the personal trouble and inconvenience of going a long distance, and being detained a considerable time in trying it. Whether a debt is recoverable or not, frequently depends on whether a speedy trial can be had. I agree with Mr. Sharpe, that the business of the common law courts has not fallen off, but that within the last five or six years it has increased, and is still increasing. Then, I say, that the character of the business has very much changed; that it has become less local, and more commercial; that boundary questions and watercourse questions, and so forth, very seldom arise now; and that the questions to be provided for are chiefly those arising out of mercantile transactions. That, in commercial questions, there are two things, in my opinion, necessary. The first is, that the plaintiff should be able to try at a time certain, somewhere or another, as speedily as the process of the law will allow. The other is, that in other cases, he should have a convenient place provided for him, near to him and easy of access, where he could try matters in which time is not so great an object. Then, I say, that, to provide for the first, I think that the plaintiff should have a right, if he chooses to avail himself of it, to lay his venue in London, and to keep it there, subject, of course, to a power on the part of the judge to change it if there were any special circumstances, the judge also having a discretionary power over the costs. Then, I say, that I think the sittings in London during term should be discontinued. I think they are inconvenient to judges, and certainly they are to counsel and to solicitors who are largely engaged. I do not recommend that there should be a third circuit throughout the whole of England; but only in the more populous towns. In my opinion, it is a hardship for parties in Manchester to be obliged to try their cases in Liverpool; and one reason which I give for it is this, that although I believe the Salford division of Lancaster is as populous as the Liverpool division, the Salford division only produces, I think, about one-fourth or one-fifth of the causes. I started with the statement that I think a great number of questions, far more than are tried, are abandoned or compromised, simply because merchants in large business will not leave their places of business to go from Manchester to Liverpool to try them. My house is chiefly an agency house: clients come to me, especially from the north, and they say to me, people really will not try questions if they have the trouble of leaving their places of business for some days to try them; they would rather give them up. I next suggest that I think some arrangement should be made for trying special jury causes in London between the present Easter Term and the present Trinity Term. There is now a long interval when special jury causes cannot be tried in London; practically, from the end of February until the middle of June. Then, I say, to attain the second result, a trial at the most convenient place, I think a new arrangement of the circuits imperatively called for. Lancashire, with some portion perhaps of Yorkshire, would form one circuit. I look upon the present Northern Circuit as most cumbersome and inconvenient; it is quite impracticable, it seems to me, to deal with the amount of business which there is there already. I think that Liverpool and Manchester at once require three circuits; experience would show how far the principle, once conceded, might be extended to other great towns. I do not go beyond Liverpool and Manchester, because I know more about them than I do about other towns. As regards the cause lists in London at present, they are very well arranged; but I think it should be a great object never to put more causes into the paper for each day than can be got through. In London we have daily cause lists, and the expense of a day's attendance in court, either in London or in the country, is very great—seldom less than £10; and I have known it amount to even £100 and more. Scientific witnesses require their ten guineas a day, and even more. To carry out that object, I suggest that cause lists might possibly be prepared in the country. Then I think, also, that causes in the country might perhaps be entered, as in town, some few days before the commission day. I do not know how far that would work practically; but it has just occurred to me, and I have mentioned it for what it is worth. Causes might be entered with the under-sheriff, or with some other person, so that an opinion might be formed of the business which there was to be done. Then I think it is most important that a sufficient time should be given for the assizes throughout the country. At present the judges are frequently obliged to sit from nine o'clock in the morning till seven at night, or even later; and that is certainly a greater amount of labour than I could undergo. I cannot understand how it can be done. We were engaged in a cause some years ago (Doe dem. Bainbrigge v. Bainbrigge) in which the judge sat till very late; I believe, eleven o'clock at night. The judges frequently sit until seven or eight o'clock at night. It is not possible that justice can be administered at a very late hour of the day, with an exhausted Court, so well as it ought to be. I think that not less than four judges should sit in banco. I think it is the most satisfactory tribunal that can be constituted, and I say, as a proof of it, that I do not think that in nine cases out of ten in which an appeal is allowed from a decision in banco there is an appeal; and where there is an appeal, I should say it is frequently invited by the Court, either to determine some new point of law, or to overrule some obsolete decision. I look upon protracted litigation as most unfortunate to all parties engaged in it, and that it is most desirable to obtain a decision of so much weight as to be final as speedily as may be. I think the business at chambers is about the most important business that a judge has to get through. I have brought together here a few of the applications which he has to dispose of: interpleader cases, garnishee orders, applications for writs of injunction and mandamus (they are now applied for at chambers), applications for writs of certiorari and prohibition, applications for orders to hold to bail and to set them aside, all of them important, besides a great number of interlocutory applications in pending actions, such as for inspection, orders for examination and cross-examination of parties, for commissions, to reform pleadings, &c., involving sometimes questions of great magnitude and nice points of law, practice, and discretion. I may say, that upon the point whether the judge thinks that a commission should issue may depend the recovery of the debt in an action, a debt of not unfrequently £10,000, and even much more. I think that provision should be made for the regular and early daily attendance of judges at chambers. I suggest that there should be a judge at chambers every day at eleven o'clock, to sit there during the whole of the day. At present the business is very satisfactorily done, but I think more time might be devoted to it with great satisfaction to counsel and to parties. For instance, questions of pleading, to discuss them thoroughly, would require an hour, an hour and a half, or two hours, and I have suggested that they might be taken by the judge who sits in daily attendance at chambers, or, possibly, which I think would be a great advantage, they might be taken in the Bail Court in public. When the judge does not come to chambers till three, and it is necessary to obtain his fiat before a writ can be on summons issued, a writ of capias for instance, the offices closing at three in vacation, the writ cannot be issued until the next day, so the defendant may escape. I would suggest that references are now becoming very favourite modes of determining disputes, but practically they are most expensive, and it occurs to me whether certain references might not be taken by judges instead of by counsel. The references before the master answer very well, but I should say that the masters are already rather overburdened. With respect to the long vacation, I would observe, that writs are issued and judgments by default are signed in the long vacation now, only pleadings are stopped.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The grave character of the intelligence received this week from India has had less effect on our public funds than would naturally be expected. During Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday there was great dullness, and the price of securities receded in a small degree. Yesterday and to day have been productive of greater fluctuation. Speculators for a fall find their views assisted by the stringency of the continental money markets. The closing price of consols is 90 to 90⅛ for money being ¼ per Cent. below this day week.

The half-yearly meeting of the Bank of England was held yesterday. A dividend was declared of 5½ per Cent. for the half-year. The rate for discount and advances remains unchanged—namely, 5½ per Cent.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 12th September, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,872,825, being a decrease of £374,015; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,218,461, showing a decrease of £272,852, when compared with the previous return. The supply of money continues sufficient for the demand, there being very small requirements for speculation.

The directors of the Red Sea Telegraph announce that, under existing circumstances, their line cannot be carried out on the terms previously proposed, and suggest a guarantee from the East India Company, and the Government.

An important change in regard to the management of Exchequer Bills, and the payment of interest thereon is recommended by the committee of the House of Commons to whom it was referred to consider the best mode of arranging such payment and management. The present practice is to call in Exchequer Bills annually, and to pay off or renew the same. The committee propose that the annual renewal of these bills be discontinued; the bills to run on from year to year with the consent of the holders until called in for renewal; that the rate of interest be advertised annually, and that the bills be issued with coupons for the annual interest.

Great satisfaction is felt by the manufacturers of Lancashir and the adjoining counties, and by others interested in the navigation of the Mersey and in exporting and importing produce through the port of Liverpool, at the act of the last session for the settlement of the town dues of Liverpool levied on that navigation. These dues amounted in 1836 to rather less than £60,000. In 1846 they amounted to more than £85,000, and in 1856 to about £150,000. It is settled by the act referred to, that payment of town dues to the credit of the borough fund of Liverpool, and their application in defraying the local expenses of the borough of Liverpool, shall cease.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 26, 1857.

THE WIDENING OF PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION.

When any discussion is held as to the relative positions of the two branches of the legal profession, it is usual to look to the lowest ground on which they meet. The provincial barrister is very much like the provincial solicitor. Their work is substantially the same. The education they need is not very different. The solicitor feels quite equal to addressing magistrates at the quarter sessions; the barrister feels that he would be very glad to confer directly with his clients if he could but fill his purse in the process. There is nothing, or scarcely anything, to prevent an immediate amalgamation of the two branches if we look at the point where they meet most closely. But it is different when we turn to the higher walks of the profession. The Bar not only enjoys a traditional prestige, and is supported in its claims to superiority by all those who have the practical guidance of legislation and the bestowal of offices of emolument and dignity, but it can fall back on a plea which common sense tells every indifferent person is well worth considering. For the interests of the community at large, there should be, it may be urged, a body of lawyers who receive a high legal education, who are conversant with the theory of legal science, who are saved from the routine of mechanical drudgery in order to have leisure to entertain the higher and larger points of law, and to keep up the level of English jurisprudence. English society has but recognised a distinction which can only be disregarded at the peril of degrading the whole system of our law. There is much truth in this, but obviously the distinction rests upon the assumption that it is possible to discriminate, roughly perhaps, but sufficiently, between the provinces of the practical and the scientific lawyer. Hitherto it may have been possible, but we think that there is a cause at work which is rapidly undermining this distinction. It is a cause operating silently, almost imperceptibly, but incessantly, and certain, sooner or later, to produce a great change. We do not venture to predict the shape which this change will assume, but that a change is inevitable we consider obvious to any one who will look at the matter calmly and dispassionately.

The cause to which we allude is the widening of professional education. This one session of Parliament has introduced two great branches of the law into the necessary scope of the education of a solicitor. A solicitor will not like to be ignorant of the law of domicil when his clients may call on him to aid them in proving a will made abroad; and if there is one subject more than another in which the advice of a confidential solicitor will be sought, it will be in the delicate and difficult emergencies of matrimonial disputes. But a moment's reflection will show us how far a knowledge of the law of domicil and of marriage will lead a lawyer. He is taken at once into the region of higher jurisprudence; he has to make himself acquainted with the maxims of the civil law, and with the niceties of the conflict of legal systems. Nor will education necessarily be widened merely because specific fields of study are added. The whole treatment of legal subjects will, in time, be influenced by the study of theoretical jurisprudence, which is every year becoming more common. Text-books will be written in a different way, with more of independent analysis, and a more constant reference to the principles which ought to be common to every code. At every turn, a person who is striving to obtain a good education as a solicitor will find himself impelled to go beyond technical law. He will desire to go to the same fountains from which those who wrote for him derived their inspiration. While English law was an isolated system, a mass of technicalities, justified only by tradition, and appealing more to the memory than the reason, it was, perhaps, desirable that the few superior men who, in each generation, with more or less of conscious effort, were aiming at the improvement and readjustment of the body of the law, should have been left to occupy a peculiar position of importance and dignity, and that the avenues to the higher dignities of the profession should have been jealously guarded. But in proportion as law is improved, made more simple, more coherent, and more scientific, those who receive any education at all above the very lowest must approach law from its scientific side in order to comprehend the general direction in which the legislation of their day is tending, and to master the questions that may practically be submitted to them.

If, then, the higher education of both branches of the profession must inevitably be, in process of time, almost the same, and no solicitor who aims at eminence in his own calling will venture, during the period of his early studies, to neglect the wider field of jurisprudence which lies in the background of positive law, the question will arise, how this education can best be obtained? Every point of this kind must in the long run be referred to the one test of what promises the greatest benefit to the community at large. Now, if we remove ourselves from the arena of professional jealousy, we must pronounce at once that it is for the obvious advantage of the public that every body of men who are to receive a scientific education should receive it in the best possible way, and from the best possible teachers. It is a great source of danger that a superficial smattering of any science like that of law should be encouraged. The legal education of the solicitor in civil law, in the conflict of laws, and in theoretical jurisprudence, to be valuable at all, must be as good as that received by a barrister. In high education everything must be first-rate, or it is valueless. It is possible only to go a short way in the particular subjects, but so far as the subjects are studied at all, they must be studied in the best manner, and with the greatest advantages and aids. Whatever difference may afterwards divide them, the two branches of the profession ought, therefore, to start with exactly the same groundwork of their legal education. And expediency and good sense point out that, so far at least, they ought to receive their education in common. The body that should watch over this education should be the best and highest possible—the teachers the ablest that can be found. Division would be useless, and worse than useless. The Legal University—the institution of which cannot long be delayed—must comprise solicitors as well as barristers among its students.

So far is plain. Professional education must be widened, and it must, up to a certain point, be bestowed on the two branches of the profession in common.

What the ulterior consequences of this educational union may be we do not pretend to anticipate. It may lead to some kind of general amalgamation; but we know that, in England, changes of this sort—altering the habits and modifying the traditions of the upper classes of society—are made very slowly. There need be no apprehension lest any of the advantages of the existing system should be rashly sacrificed. There will be plenty of discussions, and arguments, and delays, and compromises, before the relations of solicitors and barristers are finally settled. But the widening of professional education is not a thing to be argued about and arranged—it belongs, not to the future only, but to the present: it is a necessity and a fact.

NEW LAW COURTS.

Assuming that the dispersion of the various law courts and offices is a great evil, and that the existing accommodation is inadequate, we shall now proceed to state the details of the plan proposed for concentration, and to show how the money may be obtained for carrying it into effect.

We believe that there are not now many persons who contend for Westminster in opposition to a site which would be far more convenient for the great majority of the bar, for nearly all solicitors, and for the larger portion of litigants, jurymen, and witnesses. With some minds, no doubt, the venerable associations connected with the Royal Palace of Westminster are held to be of paramount importance. It has been urged that not only is the body of the barrister strengthened by his daily walk to the ancient Hall, but his soul also is filled with lofty aspirations, and his mental energies are braced for forensic conflicts by the memories which that hoary pile suggests. We have, however, the authority of Mr. Justice Erle for the opinion that these considerations do not operate on more than a very few of the aspirants for business at the outer bar; and further, that if there be any youthful advocate who cherishes historical associations, the best advice his friends can give him is to dismiss them altogether from his thoughts. "Professional exertion," says that learned judge, "is wholly unconnected with antiquarian interest;" and the claim of our ancestors to guide us in the decision of this question was even more effectually disposed of by the late Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, who observed that, if we have felt an inconvenience for any considerable length of time, that is in itself a reason for getting rid of it with the smallest possible delay. To these reflections it is to be added that Sir Charles Barry has declared himself unable to allot a single square foot of additional space to the law courts at Westminster, and he strongly desires to dispossess them of that which they now occupy. And further, we understand that, in order to bring these buildings into some sort of harmony with the new Houses of Parliament, it is proposed to increase their external elevation by a sham façade, the effect of which would be that the lantern lights of the courts would be placed in a sort of well, formed on three sides by the heightened walls, and on the fourth by the Abbey roof—an aggravation of existing inconveniences which we think the most enthusiastic votary of tradition would pronounce intolerable.

Quitting, then, with or without regret, their ancient home, the lawyers must turn their faces eastward, and seek a more eligible abode. If they were guided entirely by architects, we believe there would be little hesitation in fixing upon Lincoln's-inn-fields as the site of the proposed courts. Now we do not doubt that, allowing an unlimited command of time and money to the designer, a very imposing edifice might be erected in the centre of the largest square in London. It may, however, be as well to bear in mind that the construction of a convenient court is a problem of considerable difficulty, and that its solution is not likely to be advanced by attempting it under a supposed necessity of contributing to the architectural embellishment of the metropolis. We may add that the fund which we consider fairly applicable to the erection of convenient courts and offices could not, with the same propriety, be expended in a competition, more or less successful, with the magnificence of continental capitals. It is far from our intention to assert that the proposed new courts are not to be made as handsome as a due regard to economy will permit. All we contend for is, that the convenience of lawyers and suitors should be first considered, and not treated as a mere subordinate portion of the design, which is by no means to be permitted to fetter the artist's genius.

But there are sanitary arguments against encroaching upon Lincoln's-inn-fields. It is urged that, if space be wanted for an extensive building, it should be obtained by clearing for the purpose, and not by the appropriation of the few unoccupied acres which yet remain in the heart of a vast and crowded city. It has, however, been answered by Sir Charles Barry that the courts would only occupy about one-fourth of the whole area, and that the healthful influence of the Fields would be much increased by opening into them several wide streets, which must necessarily be made in order to give access to the Courts. It may be added, that the comparative retirement of this locality would be very suitable for the quiet transaction of judicial business; and if the air of the place be peculiarly healthy, the lawyers would have the benefit of it. Supposing, however, that the open area of the Fields is to be religiously preserved to its full extent, there is another situation of which the advantages are, in some respects, equal, and in others superior, to that above discussed. It is proposed by the Incorporated Law Society, that nearly eight acres of land, bounded by Carey-street on the north, by the Strand on the south, by Chancery-lane on the east, and by Clement's-inn and New-inn on the west, should be purchased and cleared of existing buildings at an estimated cost of £675,000. The Strand would be widened to the extent of 100 feet, and the position of the courts, by the side of that great thoroughfare, would render them generally accessible. At the same time, they would be about equally distant from Lincoln's-inn and from the Temple, and thus the advantages of the proposed change would be more fairly apportioned between the equity and the common law practitioners. It is calculated that the total cost of building and fitting up the courts and offices would be £522,000, and this sum, added to the estimated cost of site, amounts to £1,197,000. It is believed that it would be found profitable to erect chambers on portions of the proposed site, not immediately required for the new courts and offices, and the value of ground-rents thus obtained would go in reduction of the proposed outlay. And, besides, there is the value of the present sites of the courts at Westminster, and of the various Chancery and Common Law offices, which might be sold by Government on the completion of the proposed scheme; and there are also other offices for which rent is now paid to some of the inns of court, and the value of this rent ought obviously to be contributed by Government towards the expense of the new offices. These deductions altogether are estimated at £523,500, and the ultimate cost of site and building is thus brought down to £673,500.

We feel the strongest possible conviction that the country would obtain a very good bargain indeed if a million of money were to be advanced out of the national exchequer to complete, as speedily as possible, a suitable edifice for the transaction of all that portion of judicial business which necessarily centres in the capital. It is probable that every lawyer who reads this paper could confirm, from his own experience, our statement that the proposed change would considerably facilitate the performance of his own duties. Some authorities have gone so far as to assert that the business done by solicitors and their clerks at the various law offices might, under the proposed system, be transacted in one-half of the time now occupied; and if this be so, it necessarily follows that the charges to clients would be reduced in nearly the same proportion. Perhaps we cannot put our argument in more forcible terms than this. The expenditure of the lawyer's time is equivalent to that of the client's money; and here is a certain means of economising the first, and therefore the second also. Really we are disposed to think that a prudent and frugal House of Commons, if once satisfied of this truth, might, with great propriety, vote a million sterling, for the purpose of carrying out the plan. But it is not necessary to apply to Parliament for any portion of the required sum. There exists in the Court of Chancery a fund of upwards of one and a quarter million stock to which nobody possesses any legal right, and which may therefore, with great propriety, be employed in providing for the required outlay. This large sum has arisen in the following manner:—Money has been paid into Court, but no order has been obtained for its investment. The Bank of England, however, doing as other bankers do, has invested a certain proportion of the cash thus placed in its hands; and the interest of such investments, with the accumulations, after allowing a fair profit to the Bank, has been employed from time to time in the purchase of stock, which now amounts to the sum above mentioned. To the produce of these investments it is held that the suitors have no legal claim; and, even if they had, such claim would, in the great majority of cases, be very difficult or impossible to prove. Still it would be prudent to guard against the contingency of demands upon the fund, and, therefore, it would be provided that Government should pay interest upon the sum advanced, and give security for the repayment of the principal.

We shall perhaps endeavour, on another occasion, to explain more fully the vast advantages, immediate and remote, of the scheme of concentration here proposed. For the present we will add but one remark. It is probable that many persons, when they hear for the first time of Chancery holding in its hands a million and a quarter of money, to which nobody living has any claim, may become loud in their denunciation of the delays and abuses of that Court. To this we answer, that, for accelerating and improving the procedure of that and the other chief tribunals, concentration of all the branches of all the Courts under one roof will do far more than all the agitation and declamation of speakers, writers, and societies, and all the machinery that Parliament or Government can contrive. If only the House of Commons can be induced to authorise the carrying out of this, which, be it observed, is a lawyers' plan, they will have effectually provided against the recurrence of an evil for which it cannot be denied that the lawyers of a former generation must be held responsible.

Legal News.

Mr. George James Johnson, a partner in the firm of Tyndall, Son, and Johnson, solicitors, of Birmingham, has been appointed to the Professorship of Law in Queen's College, in that town, vacant by the resignation of Mr. C. R. Kennedy, barrister-at-law. We understand that Mr. Kennedy's class of students was very small; but it is expected that Mr. Johnson's acquaintance with the kind of aid which articled clerks require in their studies, and his ability to render it, united with his popularity amongst them, will tend to increase the number of students in this department of the College Mr. Johnson is a young man just commencing practice. We believe that he served his articles in the office in which he is now a partner. During his clerkship he was an active member of the Law Students' Society in Birmingham, and the ability and legal knowledge he displayed there have gained him a high reputation among the articled clerks and junior members of the profession.

We shall observe Mr. Johnson's conduct in his Professorship with a very friendly interest. It is most important that, in every one of our great towns, there should be, if possible, a Professor of Law to guide the studies of the numerous clerks articled there. The creation of such Professorships would go a long way towards insuring that improved professional education which it is most desirable that the rising generation of solicitors should possess. Many of the difficulties which have been felt by the Incorporated Law Society in devising means to effect this object would be removed by the existence in our chief provincial towns of Professors who should command with a numerous class the influence and popularity which are likely to be enjoyed by Mr. Johnson. The experiment of appointing a solicitor to their Professorship appears to have been made by the Council of Queen's College under good auspices, and we heartily desire that Mr. Johnson may not disappoint the hopes that have been formed respecting him. Perhaps a time may come when the selection of a solicitor for such an office will not be regarded as a new or strange thing. We certainly hope to see such a time, believing that the profession, and society generally, would benefit by the changes which must come along with it.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Sept. 23.

In re The Royal British Bank.

This was an adjourned sitting for the examination of the Directors of the Royal British Bank.

Mr. Mason (Mason & Sturt), with Messrs. Cooper & Stevens, attended for Messrs. Gillott, Butt, and Hurst. There were also present Mr. Sleigh, Mr. Venning, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Coleman, &c., representing Directors and other parties. Mr. Linklater appeared for the assignees.

Mr. Linklater said that the assignees had originally proposed that a dividend sitting should be held that day; and it was hoped on 24th of June that the realisation of the estate would be so far advanced as would enable them to make a final dividend. That had been interrupted by the proceedings of a gentleman of whom the assignees wished to recover £16,000; but he declined to have the matter settled by a court of common law, and had appealed to the Court of Chancery, who had directed him to pay in the money as security. In consequence of the vacation, that money would be locked up until November, when, no doubt, the matter would be settled, as the facts were within a very narrow compass. There had also been litigation at Hamburgh respecting charges which Mr. Humphrey Brown should have paid, and the assignees had just received a telegraphic message that they had been successful, and there would be about £1,200 coming from that source. The assignees had been unsuccessful in their endeavours to dispose of the Welsh mines, which had been so often referred to, and on which £120,000 had been expended. Great efforts had been made to carry out the general compromise with the shareholders, but there had been great difficulties to contend with consequent on the dissolution of Parliament on the 8th of March. On the 4th there was a numerous meeting at Freemasons' Hall, when it was agreed to take 16*s.* 6*d.* in the pound; 10*s.*, he firmly believed, would be the dividend paid under the bankruptcy, and 6*s.* 6*d.* was to come from the shareholders. Before the assignees proceeded with the Bill in Parliament, a guarantee fund of £10,000, in case the compromise was not carried out, was subscribed, to which Mr. Stapleton and Mr. Alderman Kennedy very liberally contributed; and if, at the end of another month, that compromise was not carried out, that fund would be forfeited, and the assignees would give no further time, and the creditors could again proceed against the shareholders individually. Observations had been made by some with reference to the prosecution; and it was imagined that the ex officio information filed by the Attorney-General embraced all the points in his Honour's judgment. But there had been no information as to the manner in which the original charter was obtained from the Board of Trade, or as to the representation made to the Board of Trade at the time the supplemental charter was obtained. The information embraced the point on which all were interested—viz. Whether the Directors conspired together with intent to defraud the shareholders and the public.

A gentleman in court said the parties upon whom most opprobrium should be heaped would escape. He considered that the original parties, who represented they had a capital of £100,000, when only £80,000 was subscribed, should be prosecuted. If that representation had not been made, he should not have lost all his money, but only a few hundreds on the shares he had taken up. £20,000 had been employed, he believed, to rig the market.

Mr. Linklater said, a communication had taken place with the Attorney-General as to whether another information should not be added. He had numerous clients who were anxious to contribute or present their cases to the Court separately. Men of property must expect to part with a considerable part of their estate, and the best thing that could be done would be to follow out the spirit of the Act of Parliament. There would be £170,000 required to pay the creditors 6*s.* 6*d.* in the pound; and if the shareholders understood the vast importance of the compromise, no doubt the money would be forthcoming. The right of individual creditors to proceed for the recovery of their debts must be somewhat controlled by the statute, and each application against a shareholder must depend on its own peculiar circumstances. No such Bill could have been passed but for the aid of the assignees, and great benefit is likely to result from it, while at the same time a great scandal will have been removed from the profession to which my friend and I belong. Proceedings have been taken which have resulted in ruin to many shareholders, and the solvent shareholders have been compelled to leave the country. A general compromise, to be sanctioned by the assignees and by the Court, would be most advantageous, as well for the shareholders as the creditors, and, if carried out, the 16*s.* 6*d.* in the pound would be paid; but there can be no question that the proceedings by individual creditors have very seriously prejudiced that compromise. No time should be lost on the part of the shareholders in determining at once whether that compromise should be carried out. In justice to the assignees, in justice to the creditors and those shareholders who are willing to contribute to the extent of their means, I am bound to state, that, whatever may be the result either of compromise or the application for individual discharge of the shareholder, that our best thanks are due to the assignees for the pains they have taken. It was obvious, in the very first instance, that in a remedial measure of this kind no effort on the part of the shareholders could be successful unless supported by the assignees. The Bill was framed and carried with the joint assistance of my friends, Mr. Linklater and Mr. Field, who undertook the management of the details elsewhere, and the result is to place the shareholders in a position of temporary and comparative safety; but it would be a most ungrateful return if the shareholders do not take advantage of the opportunity afforded them, and contribute for the general compromise. Many I represent, who have returned in consequence of this Act having passed, will use their best exertions to carry it out. The amount is very large (£170,000), but I do believe that if shareholders knew the vital importance to themselves in carrying out this compromise, the amount might be subscribed. My friend has alluded to the conduct of the assignees. I can only say that they have well and zealously discharged their duties. The proceedings which have been referred to have been taken independently of this Court. Whatever the result of the indictments against the directors might be, the world would be satisfied that justice had been done.

After some further discussion, the proceedings were adjourned to the 26th November.

Sept. 24.

In re Thomas Dean, Solicitor.

This was the first meeting for the proof of debts and appointment of trade assignees under the bankruptcy of Thomas Dean, an attorney, who was made bankrupt as a scrivener, formerly of Staple-inn, and since of Barnes, and King's Bench-walk.

Messrs. Roy and Cartwright appeared for the petitioning creditor, G. Tatham, Esq., of Margate. The exact amount of liabilities, in the inextricable confusion of the bankrupt's affairs, cannot at present be ascertained, but they are said to range between £20,000 and £30,000. Mr. Stubbs, the messenger, has taken possession at both Barnes and King's Bench-walk. The furniture at the latter place is valued at £80; and at the former, the private residence of the bankrupt, the furniture is stated to be of the most costly character, and to have been taken possession of by a mortgagee. There appear to be no assets. The bankrupt's letters are, in accordance with an order issued by the Court, redirected to Mr. Graham, the official assignee, and warrants will, it is stated, be granted for the bankrupt's apprehension, and placed in the hands of experienced officers; in addition to which Webb, the active deteetive, has been employed by the Bank of England, who have been forged upon to the extent of £1,100, to trace the fugitive.

Proofs to the amount of £10,000 were tendered, and admitted without opposition. One was on behalf of Colonel Wright, retired on full pay from the Royal Artillery, and a relative of the bankrupt. It was for £5,050, which was deposited with the bankrupt ten years ago for investment. Bankrupt paid interest for ten years on the amount; but on his flight it was discovered that there was no security.

A proof on behalf of Mr. Jones, of Gibson-square, Islington, was admitted under precisely similar circumstances.

There was also a proof for £1,654 on behalf of Carter, a builder. The original bill was £3,916 for improvements and alterations in the bankrupt's premises, of which £2,200 odd had been paid off. Admitted.

The next was on behalf of Alexander Jones, a bill discounter, of the Paragon, Old Kent-road, for £200. Admitted.

The following gentlemen were appointed trade assignees:—Mr. Charles Ward, 217, Strand, manager of the London and Westminster Bank; and Mr. John Jones, of 68, Gibson-square, gentleman. The appointment with the approval of the Court.

The examination meeting is fixed for the 3rd of November at one o'clock, when, if the bankrupt fails to surrender, the usual proclamation of outlawry will be made.

It is our painful duty to record the death of Mr. Simpson, who has long held a prominent position in this town and county. He was one of the oldest members of the legal profession in Derbyshire, having been in practice more than forty-five years, during which long period his career had been marked by untiring business habits, and by an amount of probity which secured for him general and uninterrupted confidence. His advice was on all occasions eagerly sought by the Conservatives of Derbyshire, among whom his known undeviating principles, and his professional connection with many of the first families of the county, gave him a large amount of influence.—Derby Mercury.

BRISTOL DISTRICT COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—

September 22.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Hill.)

Re William Henry Smith.

The bankrupt, who was a barrister, and member of the South Wales Circuit, failed in June, 1846, as a newspaper proprietor and printer. No dividend was paid on this occasion. In May of the present year he was again gazetted as a brickmaker, carrying on business at Swansea. The allowance of a certificate was opposed by Mr. Edlin, of the Western Circuit (instructed by Mr. Charles Taddy, solicitor, of Bristol), on behalf of Mr. Frederick Lambe, Merchant, of Lombard-street, London, who was formerly in partnership with the bankrupt. Mr. Clifton (from the office of Messrs. W. Bevan & Girling, solicitors, Bristol) supported the bankrupt.

The Commissioner delivered judgment:—This was an application for a certificate by William Henry Smith, who is described as of Swansea, in the county of Glamorgan, brickmaker, in a petition whereon he was adjudged a bankrupt on the 16th of May last. In the year 1846 the applicant himself sued out a fiat in bankruptcy in this Court, and in the same year received his certificate. On that occasion, although the balance-sheet held forth large expectations of dividend, yet the assets were insufficient to defray the cost of the proceedings, so that no dividend was received by the creditors. On the former occasion the applicant failed as a newspaper proprietor and a printer. He now ascribes his failure to his embarking in trades of which he had but a slight knowledge. As the applicant is a barrister, the fact of his not being conversant with either of the trades in which he has been engaged is highly probable; although, as he recommenced business after his first bankruptcy without capital, the present position of his affairs might not have been very different, however great his capacity for conducting the concerns of a brickmaker. The present application for the allowance of the certificate was not resisted by the assignees, or by more than one of his creditors. Mr. Lambe, however, the opposing creditor, who has proved a debt for 2,235*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, has made out a very serious case of misconduct against the bankrupt. It appears that in the month of March of last year Mr. Lambe, being desirous of employing his capital in manufactures, advertised his readiness to become a partner in some established concern. The bankrupt answered the advertisement. Mr. Lambe, who then resided in London, repaired to Swansea, and entered into negotiations with the bankrupt for a share in the brick-making trade, and at length agreed to pay £1,500 as the premium for admission to a third share in the concern, and also as the purchase-money of a third share in the plant and stock. It was further agreed that Mr. Lambe should have assigned to him one-third share of the bankrupt's interest in the lands and premises wherein the business was then carried on; and also that a lease from the Duke of Beaufort to the bankrupt, granting a right to get the clay used in the manufacture of the bricks, should be assigned to the firm. This agreement was formally incorporated with a deed of co-partnership, and the whole transaction appears to have been conducted with deliberation; yet at this very time all the plant and stock had been transferred to the bankrupt's solicitor, Mr. Strick, by a bill of sale duly registered, given to secure the repayment of a debt of £1,048, bearing interest at 10 per cent. per annum, Mr. Strick to enter at any time into possession on one day's notice, unless principal and interest were then immediately paid. And with regard to the assignments to be made to Mr. Lambe and to the firm, the whole property so to be dealt with was under mortgage, for amounts which, as it now turns out, leave no surplus. Passing by various parol statements of the bankrupt unfounded in fact, and having for their object to inspire confidence in the security of Mr. Lambe's investment (which comprised other advances than those specified), the Court is driven by the evidence to the conclusion that the new partner was inveigled by fraud into a concern which Mr. Strick, the holder of the bill of sale, might have stopped at any moment, and that such fraud was not the offspring of sudden temptation, but was carefully concocted and matured. Soon after the dissolution of the partnership Mr. Strick enforced his claims, swelled by a new loan and arrears of interest, which extended not only to the stock and plant, but to the household furniture of the bankrupt, thus reducing the assets to a trifling amount, quite insufficient to defray the costs of the bankruptcy, unless the proceeds of the bill of sale can be recovered by the assignees from Mr. Strick. The bankrupt held forth, and it is just possible he may have sincerely entertained, great expectations of the value to be realised from some building land, of which he became the owner at a low price by the generosity of a friend. This land, however, which was heavily and repeatedly encumbered, has been sold by the first mortgagee, and the produce of the sale is insufficient to satisfy the other incumbrancers. The unhappy result for the creditors is a deficit of upwards of £13,000, subject to a reduction of some £1,400 if the assignees are successful in their action against Mr. Strick. Under all these circumstances I cannot bring myself to believe that I should not betray my duty to the opposing creditor and to the public if I allowed any certificate or afforded any protection to the bankrupt. The application must, therefore, be wholly refused.

THE LONDON, MANCHESTER, AND FOREIGN WAREHOUSE COMPANY (LIMITED).

A special meeting of this company was held on Monday at the company's warehouses, 91, Watling-street, to take into consideration the propriety of dissolving the company. The chair was taken by Mr. Costeker, one of the directors.

The company, it should be stated, was formed in January, 1856, with an assumed capital of £50,000, in 5,000 shares of £10 each, and upon which £8 per share has been paid. The directors were Mr. Costeker, Mr. Lowry, Mr. Holyland, Mr. Cramping, Mr. Sharland, and Mr. Laishley. Of these Messrs. Cramping and Lowry resigned before the completion of the registration; and the company has practically been carried on by Messrs. Costeker, Holyland, Sharland, and Laishley.

At a recent meeting, at which the half-yearly report of the directors was not adopted, the report set forth that a loss of £29,000 had been incurred during the 18 months trading, and that the liabilities of the company at that time amounted to £20,000, while the assets, consisting principally of stock, fixtures, leases, and book debts, were represented at £35,000, subject to realisation. The principal dissentient shareholder at the time was Mr. G. Harding, the holder of 125 shares. Since that time Mr. Harding has published a pamphlet, which, among other things, contains the following charges:—1. That the directors had expended the whole of the capital, as by prior arrangement, in the purchase of a bankrupt's stock, being compelled to raise money on loan from Messrs. Quilter and others in order to commence the trading; 2. That having purchased leases and fixtures at the cost of £10,400, those leases and fixtures represented assets in the balance-sheet of Christmas last of £12,600, being an increase on cost of £2,200; that the market for these securities, which appeared to have risen so conveniently at Christmas, had subsequently experienced a more than equivalent depression, for it appeared that the loss on leases and fixtures between December, 1856, and June, 1857, was £6,062, they having in that intermediate time sold for £1,186 what they estimated in December, 1856, at £7,248; 3. That after having in February last confirmed the resolution that 5 per cent. should be divided among the shareholders out of profits, the directors sacrificed, without notice, £80,000 worth of stock, and the business for which the company was incorporated; 4. That losses to an enormous amount had been thereby occasioned; and that the present position of the company was really this—the total loss of its paid-up capital, and a prospect of a further call of £2 per share.

Mr. Proud proposed a resolution that the company be wound up voluntarily, and read a statement of the position of the company, which he believed warranted an opinion that a sum of £11,000 might be returned to the shareholders.

Mr. Sharland also made a statement respecting the position of the company. The company had still stock to the amount of £11,000. They had also good book debts to the amount of £7,000 or £8,000. The company's trade debts did not now exceed £400. There were certain loans by directors and their friends, which it was proposed to pay last. There was no chance of any one succeeding in obtaining a winding-up order in the Court of Bankruptcy. If the company were wound up voluntarily, there would probably be a small surplus; if not, the shareholders would probably be called upon for a further payment of £2 per share.

In reply to further questions, the chairman said, the company was liable upon £1,500 of its bills, as well as upon the claims referred to.

Mr. Philps preferred a voluntary winding-up; he had a great dread of the Court of Bankruptcy.

A Shareholder observed, that of late the directors of public companies seemed to close all discussion just as they pleased, by holding before the eyes of the shareholders the fearful effects of the Bankruptcy Court.

It was ultimately carried unanimously that the company should be wound up voluntarily, reserving to the shareholders the right of obtaining a satisfactory reply to Mr. Harding's charges against the directors.

The French Tribunals.

The Court of Assizes of the Seine commenced on Tuesday with the trial of Carpentier, Grellet, Guerin, and Parod, for the extensive robberies of the Northern Railway, amounting to about 6,000,000f.

It appears from the evidence that Carpentier and Grellet entered the service of the Northern Railway Company when it was first formed. They were then very young, but by attention and intelligence they attracted the notice of their chiefs, and the former was after a while appointed sub-cashier, and in 1856, cashier. The latter after being chief clerk of the office of the deposit of shares, was made sub-cashier, still remaining at the head of that office. On August 26, only some months after his promotion to the cashiership, Carpentier obtained from one of the directors leave of absence for a few days, on the pretext that he was about to marry, and the next day Grellet absented himself begging an employé to say, in the event of any of the directors asking after him, that he had gone to the Bank of France on business. No attention was excited by the absence of the two men till the 1st September, when Carpentier's father waited on one of the directors to say that both his son and Grellet had disappeared. On this the director, who was the Marquis Dalon, made a hasty examination of their accounts, and found them apparently perfectly regular; but upon a more searching investigation robberies and frauds to an enormous amount were discovered. It was then ascertained that the two men had been very intimate with Parod, who was an old schoolfellow and townsman of Grellet; and that in conjunction with him they had speculated largely on the Bourse ever since 1852, their operations at first being successful, and afterwards the reverse. It was subsequently discovered that on the 27th Carpentier had sailed from Havre to New York, and had written to Grellet to tell him so; that Grellet had gone to Liverpool, and had proceeded thence for the same destination; and that Parod, with a female named Felice Duhut, with whom he had lived for some time, and by whom he had had two children, had also fled from Paris to Liverpool, and had sailed in the same vessel with Grellet to New York. Lastly, it appeared that about the same time Guerin—who had been in the service of the railway company, first as watchman of the baggage, and next as watchman of the cash office, at a salary of only 1,200 francs, but who had left the company in October, giving out that he had inherited a fortune, and who had purchased land, built houses, and made loans of money—it appeared this man had gone to Brussels, and from thence to London, where he was staying under a false name. As the frauds and robberies had been committed in the office which he had to watch, it was supposed that he must have been concerned in them, and in September he was arrested at London. The other three were not captured in America until some time afterwards. Though the 30,000 shares of Baron de Rothschild had appeared to be untouched, on a close examination it turned out that 5,065 of them had been taken away, and had been replaced by 5,065 others removed from the deposits of other shareholders. The safe in which they had been deposited had been forced open, and as Grellet and Carpentier could open it with keys, it was almost certain that the extraction must have been made by Guerin, unknown to them. In the cellars of the company were other safes, in which were deposited shares belonging to different holders, and these safes were fastened with three locks—two of the keys of which were held by Carpentier and Grellet, the third by a director. Yet these safes had been opened, and 240 shares belonging to the Marquis de Lentilhac had been taken from the envelopes in which they had been placed; thirty-four other envelopes, containing shares belonging to twelve different persons, had also been opened, and 5,512 shares had been abstracted from them. Of these 5,512, 5,065 had been placed in the collection of Baron Rothschild. There consequently remained 447, which, added to the 240 of the Marquis de Lentilhac, made 687; and, consequently, this total, added to the Baron's 5,065, made 5,752. This vast robbery was not the only one committed; 1,000 bonds of 500f., numbered from 384,001 to 385,000, had been abstracted from the counterfoil registers which contained them. Some time after it was ascertained that the accounts, though apparently perfectly regular, presented a deficit of 1,166,543f. 52c., consisting first of a sum of 900,000f., which had been falsely inscribed as having been paid into the Bank of France, and next one of 266,543f., falsely inscribed as having been paid to the accountants of the company. The indictment then proceeded to relate the circumstances of the arrest of the four prisoners, and said that Carpentier was found in possession of a sum of 108,720f.; Grellet of 22,901f.; and Parod of 55,890f.—in all 187,511f.; in addition to which there is reason to believe they have, jointly or separately, secreted part of their booty. As to Guerin, when arrested, he possessed various houses at Paris or in the environs, estimated at 310,000f., securities for loans made by him to the amount of 142,000f., 1,415 coupons of shares of the Northern Railway, an acknowledgment of 160,000f. for goods sent to Valparaiso, and, lastly, when he fled from Paris to Belgium he carried with him 60,000f. in notes of the Bank of France. The indictment next went on to say that Carpentier and Grellet had confessed to the robberies and frauds, and had stated that they had made them in order to raise funds to meet losses incurred at the Bourse with Parod, with, however, the intention of making restitution in the event of the speculation being successful. As to Guerin, it appeared that he had speculated on his own account, and that in 1854, 1855, and 1856 his operations amounted to the enormous sum of 43,000,000f.

The trial has not yet concluded.

The Court of Assizes of Aveyron has been occupied for the last two days in the trial of a man named Joseph for murder. The singularity of the case consisted in the prisoner being able to overcome his two victims. It appears that in the month of May two workmen returning from Nimes to their homes were met near Ganges by the prisoner, who begged permission to travel with them. The three men stopped at various public-houses on the road, and Joseph speedily became acquainted with the history of his two companions. They were returning to their families after some months' absence, and had with them a certain amount of money, which they had earned by hard work. On arriving at a village, the two men proposed stopping there for the night, but Joseph proposed to them to go on a little further to a field, where they might sleep without expense. On the following morning a boy discovered the two men, bathed in blood, extended on the ground. One of the men was dead, but the other recovered. On his evidence Joseph was arrested. The prisoner sought to prove an alibi, but failed; the testimony of the man who had recovered, and of persons who had seen the three men together, was conclusive, and the accused was sentenced to death.

On Wednesday, the Court of Assizes of the Vaucluse tried a man, named Mabille, for robbery and forgery. A Scotchman of the name of Herbertson, being on a tour, took up his residence at the beginning of June in an hotel at Avignon, and there he formed an acquaintance with a Frenchman residing in the house, named Clinchamp. Although he could scarcely speak French, and the other knew nothing of English, considerable intimacy sprang up between them; but on the 14th June the Scotchman missed from his room a portmanteau containing clothing, a ring, some seals, and five letters of credit of the Union Bank of London, and on the same day his pretended friend Clinchamp disappeared without paying his bill. He was naturally suspected of being the thief, and it turned out on inquiry that he had sold the stolen seals to a jeweller in the town. He was traced to Lyons, and it was there ascertained that he had made several purchases of wine, pictures, &c., and had in payment offered letters of credit of the Union Bank in the name of Herbertson, but that they had not been accepted. The police proceeded to the hotel at which he had taken up his quarters, but found that he had left for Paris, abandoning some of the effects stolen from Herbertson, and amongst them the letters of credit. To these last he had forged Herbertson's name. The police of Paris immediately made a search, and before long arrested him. It then turned out that he was a liberated convict, who had been condemned to hard labour for forgery, and that he had shortly before committed forgery at Saumur. He was declared guilty by the jury, and was sentenced to fifteen years' hard labour.

CAP. XXXIII.—An Act to regulate certain Proceedings in relation to the Election of Representative Peers for Ireland.

Immediately before the Union, and in anticipation of that event, the Irish Parliament passed an Act (40 Geo. 3, I.) "To regulate the Mode by which the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons to serve in the Parliament of the United Kingdom on the part of Ireland, shall be summoned and returned to the said Parliament." By this Act, which was recited in, and incorporated with, the Act of Union (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 67), it was provided, among other things, that, whenever the seat of any of the twenty-eight elected Lords Temporal of Ireland should be vacated, the Chancellor or other Keeper of the Great Seal of the United Kingdom for the time being, upon receiving a certificate under the hand and seal of two Lords Temporal of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, certifying the decease of such peer, or on view of the record of attainder of such peer—should direct a writ to be issued, under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, to the Chancellor or other Keeper of the Great Seal of Ireland for the time being, directing the issue of a writ by the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to every temporal peer of Ireland "who shall have sat and voted in the House of Lords of Ireland before the Union," or whose "right to sit and vote therein, or to vote at such elections, shall, on claim made on his behalf, have been admitted by the House of Lords of Ireland before the Union, or after the Union by the House of Lords of the United Kingdom." Notices of such writs, and of the peers to whom they were addressed, were directed to be forthwith published by the Clerk of the Crown, on any such vacancy occurring, in the London and Dublin Gazettes; and to each writ was to be annexed a form of return, with a blank for the name of the peer to be elected, to be filled up within fifty-two days from its date by the voter, and subscribed with his seal of arms. It was also provided, that (with the exception only of the representative peers of Ireland, who had taken the proper oaths, and signed the declaration, on taking their seats in the House of Lords of the United Kingdom), no peer of Ireland should make a return to such writ unless, between the date of its issue and that of its return, he shall have taken the oaths and signed the declaration required from the Lords of the United Kingdom before they can sit and vote in the Parliament thereof—such oaths and declaration to be taken and subscribed either in the Court of Chancery of Ireland, or before a justice of the peace there; and a certificate thereof, signed by the Registrar of the Court or the justice, to be transmitted by the voter with the return, and to be annexed to the record of the writ and return deposited in the Crown Office of Ireland.

Some of the above arrangements having become out of date, or insufficient for existing exigencies, the Act under discussion is intended to amend them; and, with that object, it enacts by (s. 1) that the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, on a vacancy arising, shall be directed, under the Great Seal of Ireland, to issue voting writs, not only to the peers entitled to receive them, according to the provisions of 40 Geo. 3 (I.), but "also to every peer in respect to whose right to vote at the election of representative peers, the House of Lords shall have directed a certificate to be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal of the United Kingdom had reported to the House that the right of such peer to vote had been established to his satisfaction, and that the House had ordered such report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland." This alteration of the previous enactment on this subject may possibly be required to meet cases in which, in accordance with the 4th article of the Union, the House of Lords have taken upon them to decide a "question touching the election of a Lord Temporal of Ireland to sit in the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

As for the "oaths" above mentioned, they are those of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration; which must be taken by each member of either House before he sits or votes, as required by 30 Car. 2, st. 2, and 1 Geo. 1, sess. 2, c. 13—the penalties for not doing so being preserved by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 48, though the disabilities formerly attaching to such neglect were taken away by the statute last named, as being "unnecessarily severe." Roman Catholics, however, are now enabled to take the oath prescribed in 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, in the place of these oaths. And as to the "declaration" above mentioned: this—which was against transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass—was taken away by the same statute of Geo. 4; and as regarded Protestants, as well as Roman Catholics. As to these oaths, the Act under discussion, dispenses with any limitation of time during which they must be taken, in order to qualify the voting peer to make his return—if they are taken in the House of Lords. By the provision recited in the Act of Union, they must be taken "between the issuing of the writ and before the day on which it is returnable;" but by the Act under discussion (s. 2) "any peer of Ireland who has taken and subscribed in the House of Lords" the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, or, in the case of Roman Catholics, the oath prescribed by 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, "may make return to the writ." The Act under discussion, further facilitates the taking of the necessary oaths, by declaring that they may be taken and subscribed before any of the following authorities:—1, The House of Lords; 2, any of the superior courts of law or equity in England, as well as in Ireland; 3, any division, or before any Lord Ordinary, registrar, or other proper officer, of the Court of Session, or any sheriff, in Scotland; 4, any lord lieutenant of any county in Great Britain or Ireland; 5, any member of the Privy Council; 6, the judge, registrar, or proper officer of any district county court; 7, any British ambassador or accredited minister, or the secretary of any British embassy or mission; or 8, the governor, lieutenant-governor, or governing officer of any of the colonies or possessions abroad, or any of her Majesty's judges residing therein.

It is noticeable that the Act under discussion commences with the recital of the Irish Act of 40 Geo. 3 (I.), and states, that, by it, certain provisions were made, &c., and that it is expedient to amend the same. It is obvious, that, to make the preamble correct, it should have been further recited that the Irish Act was adopted by and incorporated in the Act of Union; respecting which last statute the Act under discussion is altogether silent. It is also somewhat singular, that, among the authorities specified as those before whom the oaths may be taken, are not to be found consuls, or consular agents; although these officials are enabled, by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 42, to take affidavits abroad, in most instances.

CAP. XXXV.—An Act to amend an Act passed in the 15th & 16th Victoriæ, intituled "An Act to amend the Laws concerning the Burial of the Dead in the Metropolis," so far as relates to the City of London and the Liberties thereof.

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 (the Act above referred to), provisions were made for the appointment of "Burial Boards" in the several parishes of the metropolis (with the exception of parishes within the limits of the city and liberties of London, i.e. the London parishes), with various powers and authorities; some of these to be only exercised with the approval of the vestry of the particular parish. As to the London parishes, power by the same Act was given to the Common Council to direct the London Commissioners of Sewers to exercise, in reference to such parishes, the powers and authorities given to the respective "burial boards" of the different metropolitan parishes. But the London parishes numbering more than one hundred, it was found impracticable to obtain the consent of all of them to the uniform exercise of those powers and authorities which, by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, were made dependent on vestry consent. One object of the Act under discussion is to remove this difficulty; and it does so by making (s. 2) the consent or approval of the major part in number of the vestries of the several London parishes sufficient to enable the Commissioners of Sewers (who are, in effect, the London Burial Board) to exercise all the powers and authorities intrusted by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, to the respective Metropolitan Burial Boards—in those cases in which, by that Act, any vestry consent at all is required.

Again, by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, s. 37, power was given to the vestry of each parish, with consent of the bishop of the diocese, to fix, revise, and vary the fees of the incumbent, clerk, and sexton thereof, in respect of interments. But the Common Council having authorised the purchase of a cemetery at Little Ilford for the joint use of all the London parishes, the Act under discussion proceeds (s. 1 and schedule) to fix the fees to be taken by the incumbents generally of the London parishes, for interments in the consecrated portion of such cemetery—such fees "to be in satisfaction of all claims on the part of such incumbents to fees of every description, whether in respect of burial in vaults, of graves, or of the erection of monuments, gravestones, or tablets, or of monumental inscriptions in the said cemetery"—the Act reciting that the consent of the bishop, and of the major part of the vestries of the London parishes, had been obtained to such scale of fees.

It will be observed, that the scheduled fees are those only payable to the incumbent. In the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 (ss. 32, 33, 35, 36, 37, and 50), arrangements are made as to the fees payable also to churchwardens and clerks, sextons and others, for parochial or other purposes. By the 3rd section of the Act under discussion, these, however, are not to apply to the London parishes; but fees are (by s. 4) to be settled and determined by the Commissioners, as the London Burial Board, with the approval of the major part in number of the vestries of the several London parishes.

By s. 5 of the Act under discussion, the Commissioners, as the London Burial Board, are directed to pay such fees to incumbents, in quarterly payments "to such person or persons as shall by such incumbents, or the major part of them, be appointed from time to time to receive them"—such fees to be applied according to a scheme agreed upon by the major part of such incumbents, with the consent of the bishop.

The Commissioners (acting as such Burial Board) are empowered, by s. 6 of the Act under discussion, also to fix, "without prejudice to the fees payable to incumbents under this Act," and with the approval of the Home Secretary (see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 7), a scale of fees for the burial in the cemetery of persons not residing within the city or liberties of London. And, by s. 7 of the Act under discussion, the chaplain or chaplains appointed, under "the 89th section of the said recited Act," by the incumbents of the London parishes to perform the burials in the said cemetery, are directed to conform to all such regulations of the Commissioners as are not inconsistent with the Rubric. It is noticeable, that the last "recited Act" is the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128. The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, however, is the one intended.

The 9th and last section of the Act under discussion contains a provision for the expense of obtaining and passing that Act. The costs are directed to be paid out of the consolidated rate authorised by the City of London Sewers Act, 1848." The provision here meant is that contained in the 168th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 163; by which a rate (not exceeding 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in any one year,) may be made on the owners and holders or occupiers of property within the City, for the several purposes therein specified.

MORTMAIN—VALIDITY OF BEQUESTS TENDING TO BRING LAND INTO MORTMAIN, THOUGH NOT IN TERMS WITHIN THE PROHIBITION OF THE STATUTE 9 GEO. 2, C. 36.

Philpott v. St. George's Hospital, 5 W. R. 845.

This is a case of very great importance, in which the House of Lords has overthrown the doctrines by which the Courts of Equity had in several cases endeavoured to defeat bequests in favour of charity, as being within the spirit, though not within the letter, of the Mortmain Act. The terms of the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, are extremely clear. The thing prohibited is the giving of land, or money to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of land, for any charitable purpose, except by deed executed and inrolled in the manner prescribed by the statute. The cases on the subject turn for the most part on two questions—the one, what constitutes an interest in land within the meaning of the statute; the other, what is the application of money in bringing land into mortmain which was forbidden to be made except by inrolled deeds. The first question involves much difficulty, and has given rise to many not perfectly harmonious decisions as to whether mortgages, tolls, shares in companies possessing land, and other like matters were to be considered land within the meaning of the statute. The present case, however, involved only the second question, which, but for the decisions which had aimed at extending the law, would seem to be sufficiently simple.

It was very soon settled that a bequest of money for the purpose of building was, in effect, a bequest for the purchase of land, and consequently void under the statute. Lord Hardwicke, indeed, in Attorney-General v. Bowles (2 Ves. sen. 547), intimated, that, if land already in mortmain could be secured, the bequest would be good to enable the trustees to build upon it, notwithstanding that the testator expressly contemplated the purchase of land, as well as the erection of buildings upon it. But this decision was questioned at an early period, and has long since ceased to have any authority; the law being well settled, that a bequest simpliciter to build, is by implication a bequest to purchase land, and therefore void by the letter of the statute. It is not enough, to make the bequest good, that the trustees should in fact procure land which had been previously in mortmain; but it must be shown that the will does not purport to authorise the purchase of land—for if it does, no ex post facto arrangement can prevent the statute from avoiding the gift altogether. It is not necessary to refer at length to the numerous cases by which this point was ultimately settled; but we may mention Lord Eldon's decision in Attorney-General v. Parsons (8 Ves. 186), which is fully supported by the recent judgment of the House of Lords.

Even where the testator suggests an alternative, and directs his trustees, in general terms, to build, adding a request that they would beg some other person to give the requisite site, the gift is void. This was Mather v. Scott (2 Keen, 172), in which Lord Langdale held that the terms of the bequest did not preclude the trustees from purchasing land if they thought proper, and that it was therefore bad. This doctrine also is upheld by the decision of the House of Lords; and it may be considered as perfectly settled law, that any bequest of money for building, which leaves it open to the trustees to buy a site if they cannot succeed in begging one, is bad.

The Attorney-General v. Davies (9 Ves. 535) carries the operation of the statute a step further. There the testator gave personal estate to a society upon condition that they would convey certain lands for a charity, and that was held to fall within the express prohibition of the statute, because it differed in name only from a purchase, the money being given as a consideration to induce the legatees to convey lands for a charitable purpose. This decision likewise is sanctioned by the House of Lords; and the Lord Chancellor observed, with reference to it, that, if a testator promised to devise land to A., with the understanding that A. should give that land to a charity, for the endowment of which the testator intended to provide out of his personal estate, and if the will were made accordingly, the gift would, in fact, be void by reason of the secret trust, because it would be, in substance, a gift of land to trustees for a particular charity.

The actual case which we are now considering was exactly that which the Lord Chancellor suggested, except that the secret trust, if it existed, was not proved. The testator, Lord Beauchamp, devised a piece of land, in the hamlet of Newland, absolutely. He also directed his trustees to pay £60,000 out of his pure personalty to the trustees of certain contemplated almshouses in case any person should, within twelve months after his (testator's) decease, at his own expense, purchase or give a suitable piece of land in Newland for a site, and such land should be legally dedicated to charitable purposes. The devisee of the land did give it to the charity, following the formalities required by the Statute of Mortmain, but there was no case made of any secret trust or understanding for the purpose; and the question was, whether, under those circumstances, the gift of £60,000 was within the statutory prohibition. It is obvious that such a transaction is not a gift of money to be laid out in the purchase of lands, and is, therefore, not within the letter of the statute. The idea that the word "purchase" in the statute could be read in any other than its ordinary sense was emphatically repudiated by the House of Lords, and, though pressed in argument, does not appear to have been at all the foundation of the judgment which has been overruled. But the Master of the Rolls, following his own previous decision in Trye v. Corporation of Gloucester (14 Beav. 173), and relying upon certain dicta in Attorney-General v. Whitchurch (3 Ves. 411), Pritchard v. Arbouin (3 Russ. 456), Giblett v. Hobson (3 My. & K. 517), Mather v. Scott, and other cases, deduced the proposition that a bequest is void which tends directly to bring fresh lands into mortmain; and held accordingly, that the gift of the £60,000 was bad as offering such an inducement, and violating the spirit of the statute.

The House of Lords reversed this decision, the principle on which their judgment proceeded being thus summed up by the Lord Chancellor:—"In one sense it is perfectly true that this bequest has a direct tendency to bring lands into mortmain—it is a solicitation, it is something which may operate as an improper pressure upon some one else to bring lands into mortmain. But I must own, I think this is not the way in which any court of justice has a right to deal with prohibitory statutes. Prohibitory statutes prevent you from doing something which formerly was lawful; and whenever you find that anything that is done is substantially that which was prohibited, I think it is perfectly open to the Court to say that that is void—not because it comes within the spirit of the statute, or tends to effect the object which the statute meant to prohibit, but because, by reason of the true construction of the statute, it is the thing, or one of the things, actually prohibited. What is prohibited is the giving money to be laid out in the purchase of lands. . . . I assume, in the observations which I am about to make, that this transaction is, as it purports on the face of it to be, an independent gift of £60,000 for the maintenance of certain almshouses, if, within a year after the death of the testator, somebody else should give lands and build such almshouses. Now, that is not struck at by the words of the statute." His Lordship then, after going through the authorities, considered that they did not support the enlarged doctrine of the Master of the Rolls; and, with the concurrence of Lord Brougham and Lord Wensleydale, the decision below was reversed.

WINDING-UP ACTS—PERSONS TAKING SHARES ON THE FAITH OF FALSE REPORTS BY THE DIRECTORS NOT LIABLE AS CONTRIBUTORIES.

In Re Royal British Bank; Ex parte Brockwell, 5 W. R. 858.

The decision in this case, though possibly a strictly logical deduction from the theory of the old Winding-up Acts, puts in a very strong light the inadequacy of those statutes to secure the effectual winding-up of the affairs of an insolvent company, and the due protection of the creditors of the concern. The facts were these:—A Mr. Brockwell, in common with many other persons, had taken shares in the Royal British Bank in the early part of 1855, on the faith of the fraudulent reports issued by the directors, in which the bank, though really insolvent, was represented as a flourishing institution. Mr. Brockwell was duly returned and registered, and persons dealing with the bank had the same reason to rely on their security against his assets as against any other member of the concern. If, therefore, a question had arisen directly between a creditor and Mr. Brockwell, it is not easy to see how the latter could have escaped the liability which apparently attached to him in his character of a registered partner in the defaulting bank. Indeed it was expressly decided, in Henderson v. Royal British Bank, In re Goddard (5 W. R. 286), by the Court of Queen's Bench, after a general conference of the common law judges, that it was no answer to a creditor's application for leave to issue execution against a particular shareholder, that he (the shareholder) had been induced to take shares by the misrepresentation or fraud of other shareholders. As Lord Campbell observed, "It would be too much to say, that, having become a partner in the bank, holding himself out as a shareholder, and so remaining until the concern stops payment, he should be at liberty to say, 'I am no longer a shareholder; I have been defrauded, and I will get rid of my liability to the creditors of the bank.' That (said the Lord Chief Justice) would be monstrous injustice. Supposing this to be the case of a common partnership, where credit has been given to the firm, and judgment obtained in an action against it, would it be any answer to a creditor to say that one of the partners sued was induced to become a member of the firm by the fraud of the other partners? That circumstance might perhaps be admissible as between one partner and another; but, so far as a creditor is concerned, it is wholly immaterial."

The suggestion contained in the last sentence from Lord Campbell's judgment, which we have italicised, is the foundation of the judgment of V. C. Kindersley in the case now under consideration. We do not understand the Vice-Chancellor to have questioned the liability of Mr. Brockwell to proceedings at law at a creditor's suit, but he held that Mr. Brockwell could not be a contributory, on the ground that the sole object of the Winding-up Acts was the adjustment of the liabilities of shareholders inter se, and not the provision of redress for the creditors of the concern wound up. The reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor was shortly this:—Mr. Brockwell was induced to take shares by the fraud of the directors. The acts of the directors in issuing false reports must be taken to be the acts of the company. Therefore, the company, and all the shareholders therein, are precluded from asserting any claim to contribution against Mr. Brockwell, and he cannot be placed on the list of contributories. There is no doubt, that, if the winding-up proceedings are to be treated as matters pending solely between shareholder and shareholder, this decision was inevitable, and it is pretty clear that that was the idea of the Winding-up Acts. When they were passed, it was thought that the creditors were sufficiently armed with their common-law powers of issuing execution; and the Acts were accordingly framed simply to insure a correct apportionment of liability among the shareholders themselves. On the literal interpretation of the statutes, the decision can, perhaps, scarcely be questioned; but it is not less the fact, that, in its practical working, the winding-up machinery has been regarded quite as much as an engine to give creditors their due as a mere apparatus for adjusting the rights of shareholders. Now that the Act of last session has substantially annihilated the legal powers of creditors, they have very little else to rely on than the effect of winding-up proceedings; and it is a curious result, that a shareholder, who is pronounced in a court of law to be unquestionably liable to every creditor, cannot be made to contribute to the only fund out of which it is possible to get payment of a debt. If the powers of creditors were, as the Winding-up Acts impliedly assume, sufficient to secure payment in full from one source or another, it would be quite immaterial to them whether the list of contributories contained a name more or less, and there would be justice as well as law in the doctrine that creditors have nothing whatever to do with the settlement of the list; but, although in theory the question is merely between shareholders inter se, it becomes, in every case where there are not funds to pay 20*s.* in the pound, practically a question between the creditors as a body and each particular contributory. Had it been legally so, the judgment in Brockwell's case must have been the other way; but the Vice-Chancellor has decided, that winding-up proceedings are to be treated as litigation between shareholder and shareholder; and, though it is difficult to escape his reasoning, it is equally difficult to avoid the conclusion, that the law now provides no remedy for creditors, even against those whose liability to the debts of an insolvent company is expressly established by judicial precedents. Mr. Brockwell, according to Henderson's case, is answerable for all the debts of the Royal British Bank, but there are no means whereby he can be made to contribute a farthing for the purpose.

Correspondence.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

William and Edward Elias and Richard Williams, Pursuers, v. Black, Defender: July 14, 1854; Dec. 1, 1855; July 9, 1856; and Jan. 24, 1857.

This was an action of reduction and declarator. The facts, as stated by the pursuers, were, that, prior to Feb. 27, 1849, Williams, one of the pursuers, was sole owner of the schooner Joseph Howe, of Liverpool. That, on Feb. 27, 1849, he mortgaged the vessel to the other pursuers for £200 advanced, and for money to be advanced not exceeding £300. That, on a voyage, in Dec. 1848, from Limerick to Bristol, with grain belonging to a Mr. Germain, the vessel was driven by a storm to Tobermory, in the Island of Mull, where she found shelter after suffering some injuries. That, on learning what had happened, Williams went to Tobermory, and put himself in communication with the defender, who was "agent for Lloyds' there," in consequence of which the defender "assisted him in getting workmen to repair" the vessel, and also to procure "sails and cordage for refitting her to prosecute the voyage." That the cargo was landed and stored. That the defender did all he could to accumulate expenses, "for the purpose and with the design of acquiring the vessel for himself," and with that view paid off the master and crew without authority, and so prevented the prosecution of the voyage and the earning of freight. That, on March 14, 1849, the defender raised an action before the sheriff against Williams and the master of the vessel for 189*l.* 2*s.* 7½*d*, as advances made by him on account of the vessel and cargo, and to the master and seamen. That nothing in relation to the cargo was done for behoof of Williams, but solely for behoof of and on the employment of the owner of the cargo. That the whole was charged against the vessel in the hope that Williams might be unable to meet the accumulated sum, and that so decree in absence might be obtained. That, at the time the action was raised, Williams and the master were domiciled Englishmen, not subject to the jurisdiction of the sheriff, and against whom no jurisdiction had been constituted That, notwithstanding this, the defender, having restricted the conclusions of his summons, obtained decree on April, 4, 1849, in absence against Williams and the master for 133*l.* 11*s.* 4½*d.*, besides expenses. That the defender further arrested and dismantled the vessel on the dependence of this action. That one of the Eliases, the other pursuers, having heard of the arrestment, went to Tobermory, and, founding on the mortgage before mentioned, made application on behalf of himself and his brother to have the arrestment recalled. That the defender opposed the application. That, after considering the record which had been made up, and hearing parties thereon, the sheriff refused the application, and found the pursuers, the Eliases, liable in expenses. That, after obtaining the decrees above mentioned, the defender, on April 17, 1849, raised an action against Williams and the master in the same court, concluding that the vessel should be publicly sold by warrant of the sheriff, and the proceeds applied in liquidating the sums decerned for on April 4, as above mentioned, and also the expenses of the arrestment and of the process of sale. That, at the date of this action, Williams and the master were domiciled Englishmen, not subject to the jurisdiction of the sheriff, and against whom jurisdiction had not been in any way constituted. That the Messrs. Elias were not called as parties. That, notwithstanding, decree was pronounced as craved; that, thereafter, the defender prayed the sheriff to appoint two parties to inventory the vessel, and fix the upset price, and suggested two of his own friends for that purpose. That the sheriff granted this prayer; that the vessel was inventoried, and the upset price fixed at £160, which was less by £300 than her real worth; that these proceedings were not intimated to the master or any of the pursuers. That, on the application of the defender, the sheriff ordered the vessel to be sold after certain insufficient advertisements. That she was purchased by the defender, who was preferred to the purchase, the only other offerer being one Duncan, "who was in his (the defender's) confidence, and was a person of no credit or responsibility, being at that time, or shortly before, a notour bankrupt." That Duncan made one offer; that "this offer was authorised and connived at by the defender for the fraudulent purpose of getting up an apparent competition, when there was none in reality." That Williams protested against the sale. That the defender was at once the exposer and purchaser of the vessel. "That he betrayed and sacrificed the interests of the pursuers, and of all others interested in the said vessel, with the 'fraudulent and collusive' design of acquiring the vessel at a low and inadequate price." That the defender, having been put in possession of the vessel by the sheriff, traded with her on his own account, against the remonstrances of the pursuers, and obtained a new certificate of registry in his own name. That the vendition in security remained uncancelled on the old certificate. That the pursuers did not dispute the defender's account so far as it consisted "of advances and disbursements on account of repairs and furnishings to the vessel bonâ fide made." That the Messrs. Elias were willing that the defender should be preferred to them for such advances and disbursements.

The defender averred that the vessel had received much greater injuries than the pursuers set forth. That, on the 19th Dec. 1848, the master put her into his hands for repair. That, about the beginning of January, Williams came to Tobermory, approved of the master's acts, watched the progress of the repairs made on the vessel, and directed the cargo to be removed and stored. That, on 13th March, 1849, after the repairs were completed, the master and Williams docqueted the defender's account as correct. That this account included the charges for the cargo. That the action raised on 14th March was served personally on the master and on Williams; and that both were then subject to the jurisdiction of the sheriff. That the demand contained in that action was restricted because the owner of the cargo paid the charges applicable thereto, amounting to 55*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* That, not being able to pay for the repairs, Williams, with the knowledge of the other pursuers, offered them as security for the defender's account; and, when they were declined, concocted the mortgage with the view of getting the arrestment recalled, and obtaining possession of the vessel. That the mortgage was got up for the purpose of defrauding the defender, being executed on the 27th Feb. 1849, subsequent to the execution of the repairs. That, in point of fact, no advances were made by the Messrs. Elias; that the mortgage was not a formal and legal deed. That the action raised on 17th April, 1849, was served on Williams personally; that both he and the master were then subject to the jurisdiction of the sheriff. That the persons appointed to inventory the vessel were not friends of the defender's, but neutral persons; that all the proceedings in that process were in regular form, and that the price paid for the vessel was ample. The charges of fraud and collusion on the part of the defender were peremptorily denied, as well as all design to acquire the vessel at an under value; and it was averred that the whole proceedings connected with the sale were fairly and honestly conducted. In other respects, the statements made by the pursuers were admitted as qualified by the defender's averments above mentioned.

The pursuers asked reduction of the whole decrees in the actions before referred to, in respect that the sheriff had no jurisdiction; that the defenders were not duly cited; that the proceedings were in absence; that the Messrs. Elias were not called; and that sufficient intimation of the application to have the vessel inventoried and the upset price fixed, was not given. The pursuers further pleaded that the purchase of the vessel was "void and inept in respect—(1) that it was incompetent and illegal for him (the defender) to purchase the said vessel at a sale conducted at his own instance, and mixed up, as he was, with the whole arrangements in reference thereto; (2) in respect that his conduct at and in reference to the sale was fraudulent and collusive, and calculated to secure the vessel to himself at an inadequate price, to the pursuers' prejudice." The pursuers further pleaded that the defender's title was bad in respect of various objections to the registry of the vessel and the certificate of registry; but, as these pleas were never discussed, they need not be further referred to.

The defender pleaded the regularity of the proceedings sought to be reduced. That no claims could be maintained in respect of the mortgage, because it was fraudulent. That, in any view, the mortgage could not compete with the defender's prior claims. That the defender's title to the vessel being legal and valid, he was entitled to use her as his own.

The case was debated before the Lord Ordinary on the question of jurisdiction and various other points; and on 17th July, 1852, his Lordship repelled "the reasons of reduction founded on alleged want of jurisdiction in the sheriff, and the whole other reasons of reduction in so far as they relate to the decree and proceedings in the action of constitution against Davis, the master, and Williams, the owner of the vessel, and in so far as they relate to the decree and proceedings in the application at the instance of William and Edward Elias, for loosing the arrestment of the vessel which had been laid on pending the said action of constitution," and appointed "parties to be heard on the other parts of the cause." To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary added an elaborate note explaining the reasons of his judgment. The pursuers allowed this interlocutor to become final.

The pursuers then asked that the case should be sent to a jury to determine the facts relative to the sale. The issues proposed by them did not put the question of fraud and collusion. The defender insisted that this should be done; in consequence of which the pursuers, on 23rd June, 1854, asked leave, which was granted, to delete from the record the words which will be found in the previous narrative printed in italics. The parties were still unable to agree upon the form of the issues, in consequence of which the case was reported to the first division of the court on 27th June, and on 14th July thereafter the following issues were settled:—

"It being admitted, that, at and prior to the 25th day of July, 1849, the pursuer, Richard Williams, was sole owner of the schooner 'Joseph Howe,' of Liverpool; and it being further admitted that the said vessel was sold on the said 25th day of July, at Tobermory, under a warrant of the sheriff substitute of Argyleshire, obtained in absence of the pursuers at the instance of the defender, and that the defender purchased the said vessel at the price of £170; and it being further admitted, that, at and prior to the said 25th day of July, 1849, the said William Elias and Edward Elias were registered mortgagees of the said vessel under and in terms of the indenture and deed of mortgage numbers four and eighteen of process.

"Whether the said vessel was brought to sale and purchased by the defender wrongously and illegally, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, Richard Williams.

"Whether the said vessel was brought to sale, purchased, and possessed by the defender wrongously and illegally, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said William Elias and Edward Elias."

On the same day the pursuers lodged a minute, stating "that they abandoned all objections in reference to the sale and purchase of the vessel, on the ground of informality of the legal proceedings; and further, that, in deleting from the record certain statements and pleas of fraud and collusion under the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on 23rd June, 1854, they meant to depart, and accordingly do hereby depart, from fraud and collusion as a separate ground of reduction, and agree that, under the issues, they shall not be allowed to lead evidence of fraud and collusion.

The case was tried on 31st July, thereafter. The pursuer, Williams, was examined, and proved the original price of the vessel. A man, Fraser, proved that the defender had insured her for £400. M'Callum, a writer in Tobermory, proved the regularity of the proceedings at the sale, and that the defender's agent, Mr. Pirie, was present. It was admitted that Mr. Pirie acted for the defender in the process of constitution, and also in the process of sale, and that the accounts put in were incurred on such employment. Mr. Hunter, a ship-broker in Greenock, proved the amount of advertisements generally made on the sale of a ship, and spoke as to the value of such a vessel as that in dispute. Some other loose evidence as to value was led, and various documents were put in, among others the advertisement of the vessel for sale, in which parties were directed to apply to Mr. Pirie for further particulars. The defender was also examined, and stated, inter alia, that when the action of sale was raised he had no intention of purchasing the vessel; that he never intended to do so; that his agent, Mr. Pirie, advised him at the sale to bid; and that, after he bought the vessel, he had expended £170 on her. Duncan proved that he offered what he thought was the full value of the vessel; but it came out on cross that the two valuators settled the upset price to be put upon the vessel in Mr. Pirie's office. It was also proved that the vessel was lost while in the defender's possession. The following special verdict was returned:—"On the first issue, the jury find that the vessel was brought to sale and purchased by the defender to the loss and damage of the pursuer, Williams; but whether this was wrongous and illegal, the jury—this being a question of law—cannot say, and leave to the Court, on considering the notes of the evidence and the documents, to determine the said question, and, according as the same may be determined, to enter up the verdict for the pursuer or defender.

"On the second issue the jury find that the vessel was brought to sale, purchased, and possessed by the defender; and find that no actual loss has been proved to be sustained by the mortgagees in consequence of the said sale and possession; but whether the said proceedings of the defender were wrongous and illegal, and whether the mortgagees have, in law, any title or interest to challenge these proceedings, the jury—these being questions of law—cannot say, and leave to the Court, on considering the notes of the evidence and the documents, to determine these questions, and, according as the same may be determined, to enter up the verdict for the pursuers or defender.

After the trial, the case first came before the Court on the 1st December, 1855, on a purely incidental question. The defender's country agent had been cited by the pursuers as a witness, and, when the trial came on, was, according to rule, directed to leave the court with the other witnesses. He refused on the ground that his client required his services in court, which was admitted to be a good ground. He claimed 21*l.* 18*s.*, being payment for his whole time after receiving citation. The pursuers offered 8*l.* 8*s.*, or to leave the auditor of court to settle the amount. The Court thought the proposal reasonable, and counsel agreed at the bar that 10*l.* 10*s.* should be paid.

On July 11, 1856, the case came before the Court to discuss the question in whose favour the verdict should be entered up. The pursuers, upon the first issue, argued that the purchase by the defender was illegal in respect of the fiduciary character held by him—that he was bound to sell the vessel at the highest price that could be got; but that, if he became a purchaser, it was his interest that the price should be low—that he had certain duties to perform, and could not be allowed to place himself in a position that could conflict with the performance of these duties—that, from his position with regard to this vessel, he had a control over the proceedings, besides having means of knowledge which other people had not, which he might use to his own advantage; that he might mislead intending purchasers, to the prejudice of those with whose property he was dealing, and who were entitled to demand that any surplus should be accounted for to them—that this conflicting interest put him in the same position as a common agent selling under a ranking and sale, or a creditor selling under a bond—that, with regard to the loss, all that was required to be proved was legal or constructive loss, such as that the pursuers had been put to risk—that here it was clearly proved that the vessel had been sold at an under-value.

Upon the second issue it was attempted to be shown, that the mortgagees had suffered loss by the illegal possession of the vessel, and, in particular, that they suffered by the vessel being sent on more perilous voyages; but the case of the mortgagees was argued without confidence.

The authorities quoted were, 3 Sugden on Vendor and Purchaser, 225 and 228; York Buildings Co., 8 Brown's Reports, by Tomlins, 42; 2 Bell's Com. 266; M'Kellar, 8 March, 1817, F. C.; Bell on the Personal Diligence Act, p. 99; Taylor, 20 January, 1846, 8 Court of Sess. Rep. 400; Blaikie, 1 M'Queen, 461; Smith's Leading Cases, p. 131.

The defender pleaded, under the first issue, that when he brought the action of sale he had no fiduciary character for the pursuers, and had not acquired that character since—that he had no such character, in respect that the vessel was handed over to him for repair—that he had the mere custody of it—that, even if it had been pledged to him, he could not sell it without judicial authority; but that she was not pledged, because a master had no power in a home port to pledge a vessel—that, applying for judicial authority to sell did not make a man a trustee—that, when he so applied, the defender had no duty to perform to Williams at all—that he was acting adversely to him, and exercising a right of his own in the only way in which he could exercise it, for there was no other way in which the machinery of the law could be put in motion to work out his rights—that the Court, and not he, was the seller—that he had nothing to do but look after his own interest—that he had no authority from his debtor to sell, differing from a creditor in a bond who sells under the mandate of the debtor, and not by the authority of the Court, and is, therefore, under an obligation to account to the debtor for his acts, as in the case of Taylor. That, in a ranking and sale, the common agent is charged with the interest of every one concerned—of the creditors, and of the party having the reversionary interest—and that he must produce a reversion if possible; that, in a sale demanded by an individual creditor, the Court takes charge of the interest of all other parties concerned. That Pirie was only authorised to operate payment of the defender's account in a legal manner, and, if he did anything more, he exceeded his mandate, and Black was not responsible.

The defender pleaded, under the second issue, that the mortgagees could not suffer any loss in that character; that the mortgage was not affected by a sale, and that no doctrine was better settled than that a mortgagee not in possession could secure his interest only by insurance.

The authorities relied on by the defender, besides those referred to by the pursuers, were Maxwell, 21 Jan. 1823; Jeffrey, 16 June, 1826; Hodson, 1 Glyn. & Jam. 12; Bell's Com. 161.

The Lord President, who delivered the judgment of the Court, said:—The question is, whether the double position the defender occupied was inconsistent with what the law recognises as necessary to protect the owner from risk. The action of sale was at the instance of Black, who followed it out by the usual procedure. Whether, in all the details, the best course was taken, is not the question; there is no reason to doubt the honesty of Black. Pirie was the agent of Black, and was his representative in every stage of the proceedings.

The summons of sale describes the vessel as in the custody of Black from the first, whether legally pledged is not the question. The summons is pursued by Black; the valuation is ordered by the sheriff at his suggestion; the advertisements refer to his agent; and the whole proceedings show that they were for the behoof of Black, Pirie acting as his agent. I perfectly believe, that, while these proceedings were in progress, there was no intention on the part of Black to purchase this vessel. He says that his agent suggested to him at the sale that he should purchase it, and he did so. But all this brings the present case within the principle of those where purchases by parties interested have been set aside. It is impossible to say that a party who takes so complete a management of a sale, as Black did in this case through Pirie, is not a trustee for all interested. He had the custody of the vessel. He had the control of the process of sale. He could bring on the sale at a time suitable to himself. He suggested the valuators, who, although acting with perfect honesty, might yet be known to him to hold views which would suit his purpose. His agent might give information that might mislead, or he might withhold information that ought to have been communicated, and so might deter or discourage parties from buying. I do not say that any such things were done; but it was in the defender's power to take such advantages. If he had only set agoing the sale by raising the summons, and then leaving the Court to carry out the sale upon the necessary applications, it is difficult to say that it might not have been perfectly legal for him to become the purchaser. But when he buys the vessel, having had all these opportunities and advantages, whether used to the disadvantage of the owner or not, the law will not maintain him in his position; for it cannot discover whether they have been used injuriously or not, and therefore regards, with peculiar jealousy, any such transaction. We can, therefore, have little doubt in holding, however severe it may be, that the law cannot recognise this purchase, and that therefore the verdict on the first issue must be entered up for the pursuer, Williams.

With regard to the second issue, the verdict is differently expressed; it finds that no actual loss or damage was sustained by the mortgagees, and so raises the question as to their interest to challenge the proceedings in the process of sale. Looking to the evidence in connection with the verdict, it is plain that it must be entered up for the defender.

On 24th January, 1857, the verdict was applied as entered up, and the Court, quoad Williams, reduced, decerned, and declared in terms of the conclusions of the summons, in so far as regarded the decree in the action of sale and the certificate of registry, in the defender's favour, and declared that the defender had and has no right to the vessel; quoad ultra, the Court assoilzied the defender, except as to expenses, with regard to which a remit was made to the auditor of court to tax the accounts of Williams and the defender, distinguishing (1) the expenses applicable to the part of the case disposed of by the interlocutor of 17th July, 1852; (2) those occasioned by that part of the record which was withdrawn averring fraud and collusion on the part of the defender; (3) those occasioned by the presence of the Messrs. Elias as pursuers; (4) those incurred in the discussion upon the verdict, separating those applicable to the first from those applicable to the second issue. And in this position the case appears to stand at present.

EXCESSIVE CLAIM FOR FEES BY ARBITRATORS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I have lately been concerned in a reference to arbitration, the circumstances attending which, both as regards a point of practice, and in relation to the charges of the arbitrators, may be useful as well as interesting to your readers.

The question referred arose between my clients and a railway company, as to the loss of water to a brewery, for which loss compensation was by the special Act directed to be made by the company, such compensation, in case of difference, to be settled by arbitration in the manner directed by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

My clients, being unable to agree with the company, appointed Mr. Thomas Webster, of Pump-court, in the Temple, as their arbitrator; the company appointed Mr. Hoggins, Q.C.; and those two gentlemen appointed Mr. Bliss, Q.C., as their umpire.

The reference was first proceeded on at Maidstone; and the three gentlemen named came down to Maidstone in the evening previously to the day appointed, and on the following morning viewed the premises, and then proceeded with the reference; and, after a fair day's work, adjourned until the following day when the matter was further proceeded in until between two and three o'clock, when, an arrangement being suggested, an adjournment was decided on.

The further proceedings took place at Westminster during four days at the end of the last long vacation.

On the two first of those four days, the proceedings were carried on from about half-past ten to between three and four o'clock. On the third day there was again a discussion about an arrangement, which led to an adjournment about two o'clock; and on the fourth day (the 27th Oct.) nothing was done, except to discuss and agree on the terms of arrangement, the heads of which were ultimately reduced into writing by the arbitrators, and signed on behalf of the parties; and it was understood that such heads were to be the basis of the arbitrators' award. The only point not agreed on was by whom the costs of the arbitrators and umpire were to be paid; and this point was left to their determination, and the meeting broke up between one and two o'clock.

It will have been thus seen, that the time those gentlemen were occupied on the reference was two days at Maidstone and four days at Westminster, during the long vacation, two of those four days being short days; and that all that remained for them then to do was to put the agreement made between the parties into the shape of an award, and to meet and decide by whom their own charges were to be paid.

I was astonished by receiving, in a few days afterwards, a letter from Mr. Hoggins' clerk, stating that the award would be signed, and be ready for delivery on a certain day, upon payment of 908*l.* 5*s.*, the amount of the arbitrators' charges.

As I could not, by any calculation that I could make, arrive at more than about half of this sum—putting, as I thought, very liberal sums for all the arbitrators' services—I advised my clients not to pay, or take any part in the payment of, such a sum, unless they were compelled to do so.

I believe that the company's solicitor was as much astonished as myself at this demand; and it is assumed that it came to the knowledge of one or more of the arbitrators that the charge was thought excessive, as it was made known that the award would be delivered on payment of 847*l.* 7*s.* This reduction did not, of course, satisfy me, and I made the company's solicitor acquainted with my dissatisfaction, and endeavoured to come to some arrangement with him for resisting the payment. He, however, paid the money, and took up the award without my knowledge, stating afterwards that he was not aware of any possible mode of having the charges reduced.

It turned out that my clients were directed to pay one-third of the arbitrators' costs, and the company the other two-thirds; and, upon their third being demanded of my clients, they, under my advice, refused to pay.

Upon consideration, it appeared to be doubtful, first, whether the Courts had any power, under the Railways Clauses Act, to interfere at all; and secondly, whether, the arbitrators being barristers, their charges were amenable to taxation, there having been, as it was understood, no case referring such charges to taxation. I was, however, determined to try what could be done; and, upon application to Mr. Justice Erle, in the Bail Court, he granted a rule nisi to refer the charges to taxation, expressing doubts whether he had any power to make an order, but stating that justice required that something should be done. This rule was made returnable at Chambers, and Mr. Justice Coleridge, before whom the case was heard, after taking time for consideration, made the rule absolute.

The Master required the solicitor to the Railway Company to obtain accounts, showing the details of the arbitrators' charges; and, accordingly, accounts were delivered, amounting in the whole to 840*l.* 6*s.*

It will be observed that the first demand made was 908*l.* 5*s.*; that there was then a reduction to 847*l.* 7*s.*; and at last, when particulars were required, the detailed accounts were made to show a less sum than the arbitrators had already actually received.

Mr. Hoggins' and Mr. Webster's accounts each amounted to 287*l.* 16*s.*, and were made up as follow:—

June 28	Attending at Guildhall	10	10	0
July 3	do. do.	10	10	0
,, 25	do. at Maidstone	105	0	0
,, 25	Attending meeting	15	15	0
,, 26	Same	15	15	0
Oct. 23	Same, at Westminster	15	15	0
,, 24	Same	15	15	0
,, 25	Same	15	15	0
,, 27	Same	15	15	0
,, 28	Same	15	15	0
,, 30	Same	15	15	0
Nov. 3	Attending meeting	10	10	0
	Expenses	8	10	0
		271	0	0

Mr. Bliss's account amounted to 264*l.* 14*s.*, and was similar to those of Messrs. Hoggins and Webster, except that the two first items of 10*l.* 10*s.* were omitted, and that his clerk's fees were charged at 14*l.* 14*s.* instead of 16*l.* 16*s.*

I have already stated the time occupied in the proceedings on the reference.

The two charges of 10*l.* 10*s.* made by both Messrs. Hoggins and Webster were for preliminary meetings of about half an hour each at Guildhall, the first of such meetings being an abortive one, as Mr. Hoggins knew was likely to be the case before it was held, and when he refused to allow it to be postponed, as he was requested to do. Three meetings are charged for at a gross cost for such three meetings of £126, or £42 for each arbitrator, after all the evidence had been taken and the terms of the award agreed on, except as to the cost of the arbitrators and umpire. The Master taxed the costs as follows:—To Mr. Hoggins and Mr. Webster, each (including clerks' fees and expenses), £151*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*; to Mr. Bliss, 145*l.* 18*s.*; and, for the expenses of award, 7*l.* 1*s.*: total, 456*l.* 6*s.*—thus taxing off £384 from the sum charged in the detailed accounts, and making a deduction of 451*l.* 19*s.* from the original demand of 908*l.* 5*s.*

I do not think it necessary to comment upon what is shown by these figures, but, in justice to the bar generally, I ought perhaps to state, that, as far as I have been able to learn, such charges as those I have set out are very different from those usually made, and that, in the recent case of Barnes v. Hayward, in which, engineers having been employed as arbitrators, their charges were objected to as excessive, Lord Campbell took occasion to recommend parties to refer to barristers, whose charges, as he said, were known and moderate.

However, if any of my professional brethren should happen to have an outrageous demand made upon his clients by any barrister arbitrators, he will now know that the law affords him a remedy, and that it is his own fault if he submits to it; and I hope that, in addition to taxing the excessive charges, he will consider it his duty, as I consider it mine, both to the profession and the public, to make the facts known.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN CASE.

Review.

On the Domicil of Englishmen in France. By HENRY WARWICK COLE, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Wildy. 1857.

Mr. Cole has published a very compact and instructive treatise on a subject which more or less directly affects a great number of Englishmen, and which has lately attracted attention from the decision of the Judicial Committee in the important case of Bremer v. Freeman. This subject is the domicil of Englishmen in France. The old rule of international law was perfectly clear, which pronounced that moveable property always followed the person, and that the domicil at the time of death invariably determined the place, the manner, and the formalities of succession to the personal property of a deceased person. It is much to be regretted that this rule, so simple and so widely received, should ever have been infringed by the enactments of municipal law. But it has been the policy of France to discourage the acquirement of foreign domicils. Nothing can be harsher or more stringent than the provisions of the Code Civil, which punish French citizens for making their place of permanent residence out of the dominions of France. They are visited with the total loss of the quality of a French person, and this deprivation extends to political as well as civil rights. In order to return again to France, and recover the rights to which by birth they are entitled, they must obtain a special authorisation from the French Government. Naturally, therefore, French lawyers have exhibited a strong desire to strain the law, so as to prevent, in particular cases, it being held that French citizens have acquired a domicil abroad, and they will hardly allow that the domicil can, in any case, be perfected unless the authorities of the country where the French citizen resides have received formal notice that he wishes to establish himself there. This feeling has, in turn, coloured their opinion on the questions that have arisen as to Englishmen having acquired a domicil in France, and made them less disposed than they otherwise might have been to admit that it is mere intention, coupled with long residence, which establishes the domicil of foreigners within the French territories.

Those of our readers who may remember the judgment in Bremer v. Freeman are aware, that, by an article of the Code Civil, it is declared that "the foreigner, who shall have been admitted by the authorisation of the Government to establish his domicil in France, shall enjoy there all civil rights, so long as he shall continue to reside there." But, supposing an Englishman resides in France long enough to acquire a domicil in that country by the law of nations, but does not procure an authorisation from the Government, has he, or has he not, a French domicil? It is easy to see that the question which arises from the wording of the article is not the only one that suggests itself. We have not only to ask, whether a foreigner is excluded from obtaining a domicil in France by the terms of this article, but, also, even if he were excluded, how far the enactment of a particular system of municipal law is to control the decisions of the tribunals of other countries, which have only to look to the general rule of international law? The English courts would, in the case supposed, naturally say that the domicil was a French one. They would, therefore, regulate the succession by the rules of French law. It is probable, though even that is not certain, that the French courts, which would deny the existence of a French domicil, would in the case supposed regulate the succession of moveable property situate in France by the English law. Ought the English courts, for the sake of a uniform treatment of the different parts of the same succession, to follow the rules of the French law—for the concession cannot possibly be made on the other side, as, under the hypothesis, the French courts are expressly excluded from being guided by the rules of general law? Mr. Cole raises this point, and discusses it without arriving at any definite conclusion; and the Judicial Committee, although it raised the question in Bremer v. Freeman, did not decide it, because it considered that the true interpretation of the article above referred to did not make an authorisation imperative, and that, accordingly, a French domicil was acquired even by the municipal law of France by such residence as would create a domicil under the general law of nations.

Mr. Cole wrote before the Judicial Committee had delivered its judgment; and the object of his treatise is to show what, for English lawyers, the judgment has now settled, that authorisation is not necessary for the acquisition of a French domicil. He states, at length, the circumstances of the leading cases on the subject, and places before us, in French and English, the decisions of the highest courts in which those cases were heard. The most striking and important of these cases is, perhaps, that of Thomas Gil de Olivarez. He was a person whose domicil of origin was at the Danish Island of St. Thomas. He was brought to France at an early age, and thenceforward resided in France, both before and after he attained his majority; but he did not obtain the authorisation of the Government, and he died in France intestate. The Court of First Instance, and afterwards the Court of Appeal of Bourdeaux, the most eminent of the provincial tribunals of France, decided, that, notwithstanding the absence of authorisation, the domicil of Thomas Gil de Olivarez was at Bourdeaux, and that his succession was to be regulated by the French law. In its judgment, the Court stated, with reference to the article, that it was "evident from the text, and from the discussion to which it gave rise in the Council of State, that the article only relates to the foreigner who wishes to enjoy foreign rights in their plenitude; but the enjoyment of civil rights is one thing, and domicil is another."

This was, however, followed by a case where the French tribunals have unquestionably and expressly claimed the right to set aside the general law of domicil as against a foreigner, by virtue of a portion of their municipal law. By a law of 1819 it was enacted, that, in case of a distribution of the same succession between foreign and French co-heirs, the latter shall have a right to deduct from the property situate in France a portion equal to the value of the property situate abroad, from which they would be excluded by virtue of local laws and customs. It so happened that M. de Olivarez left a sister who survived him, and became entitled to a share of her succession. She married a Spaniard, and acquired a Spanish domicil. While still a minor, she made a will in favour of her mother; and, by the law of Spain, this will was valid. Her heirs applied to the French courts for such a share of the property situate in France as a minor in France would have been incompetent to pass by will. The Court of Cassation, by a decision pronounced at the end of last year, has sanctioned this claim, and overruled the decision of the Court of Appeal of Bourdeaux, which held that the general rule of domicil permitted the deceased to dispose of the entirety of her moveable property, and that it could not be said that this general rule was a "local law or custom." Mr. Cole strongly contends that the inferior court was right, and the Court of Cassation wrong. It is always a doubtful and delicate task to criticise the judgments of foreign courts; but we must say that we are inclined to agree with Mr. Cole, and to think that the Court of Cassation confused the general law of domicil with the local consequences to which that law, in its application to a particular country, may give rise. The general rule is, that the domicil, at the time of death, shall determine the status of the deceased and therefore attract with it all the incidents of that status according to the municipal law of the country of the domicil. The will being thus valid, and passing the entirety of the property of the testatrix, it seems scarcely possible to say that there was, in the case of the sister of de Olivarez, a "distribution of the same succession between foreign and French co-heirs."

So much is said in disparagement of English law that it is only right to point out any instances where the English law can boast a superiority over continental systems. We may, therefore, observe, that all these difficulties arise because the French code is less liberal, less observant of general principles, less wide in the scope of the succour it affords, than the English. Not only do many difficulties occur in determining the existence of domicil in France from the narrow provisions of the French law, but it must be remembered that the French tribunals will give no assistance whatever to the opening of a succession, and will not entertain the question of domicil at all, unless it appears that the deceased was a Frenchman, or that a French citizen is interested in the result. We believe that the French courts do not themselves assert their own incompetence to deal with the succession of foreigners, and it rests with some one of the parties to point out to the Court that it cannot act. But when this is pointed out, the Court is powerless. When we quit the domain of international law, and come to questions confessedly within the range of municipal law only, the illiberality of the French code is displayed in a still more striking manner. Unless he obtains an authorisation, the foreigner cannot enjoy, to use the words of the article, "the plenitude of his civil rights." For instance, the undisturbed enjoyment of a trade-mark is a civil right. A foreigner cannot, therefore, without the grant of civil rights, institute proceedings in France to prevent his trade-mark being used by a Frenchman. Messrs. Rowland & Son, the dealers in Macassar Oil, and Messrs. Kirby, Beard, & Co., the needlemakers, have experienced this to their cost, and have given their names to the leading cases in which this point has been established by the Court of Bourdeaux and the Court of Cassation. England is much in advance of France in its legal conception of the relation it occupies to foreigners, and this is seen, no less in the small details of technical law, than in the broad questions of free-trade and protection.

Questions of domicil are a sort of legal luxury, very interesting to those who happen to have a fancy for them, but scarcely claiming a peremptory attention from those who only study what is absolutely necessary. But there is a considerable number of professional readers who wish not wholly to neglect the sphere of general jurisprudence, and who yet have neither time nor inclination to read theoretical works. Their want is exactly supplied by works which treat, plainly and agreeably, the more prominent questions of private international law. As it is the fortunes of private individuals that are at stake in the cases treated of, the illustrations of which the author makes use are presented to the reader in exactly the same shape as those which he is accustomed to see in the volumes of English reports. But he finds the facts treated on a new method, and determined on new principles. He has laid before him, in a definite and appreciable form, a specimen of that conflict between the general and the particular, the comprehension and management of which is the substantial reward of the study of theoretical jurisprudence. To all who wish to read a work that will guide them on this path, without ever being dull, or prolix, or too abstruse, we cannot recommend any better book than the treatise which Mr. Cole has published on a subject with which he is perfectly conversant.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Great dulness has prevailed on the stock exchange during all the week. There has not been any noticeable variation in price. Consols close this afternoon at 90⅛ per Cent. Foreign stocks have been well supported, and demands for investment rather numerous. Money has been in sufficient supply both on the stock exchange and generally in the discount market at the full rates of previous weeks.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 19th September, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,901,215, being an increase of £28,390, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,188,560, showing a decrease of £29,901 when compared with the previous return.

The finest and most suitable weather has prevailed for the late gatherings, and made the final part of harvest equally favorable with the beginning. In the north of England and in Scotland the change produced has been very great. Accounts from Scotland state that fine dry winds have prevailed, and that cutting and gathering have been going forward night and day, lamps being used in the fields for that purpose. Under the influence of these circumstances the corn market has received a downward impulse, both in London and in the provinces, of from three to four shillings per quarter. It probably would be greatef but for the circumstance that importation from abroad is much less than last year, and also by reason of the extent of disease in the potato which is stated to be worse in some places than has been noticed since its first appearance.

The commercial panic in the United States, which assumed a very formidable aspect at the commencement of the present month, according to the last accounts, gradually subsiding Many failures are reported of houses of fair standing and respectability, but the greatest pressure appears to have rested upon the banks. Several were, and probably are, in difficulties from advances they have made to railways, all forms of railway security being extraordinarily depreciated. There were many banks and other establishments connected in business with the Ohio Life and Trust Company, and this body had come under very large advances to various undertakings, and stopped payment on the 24th ult., causing extensive inconvenience in many quarters. Investigation into the affairs of this company presents a better prospect than had been anticipated; and, if no further bank difficulties appear, the manner in which the principal establishments have passed through the crisis, in the face of the attacks made upon them, will be creditable to both bankers and merchants. The crisis is believed to have been occasioned by a phenomenon which has recently presented itself in New York, and, more or less, in many of the American cities. This is the systematic intervention of the press in mercantile affairs.

It appears from the report of Captain Douglas Galton relating to railways, that the total amount of money actually raised by railway companies, by shares and loans, to the end of the year 1856, was £308,775,894. Of the 8,718 miles open for traffic on the 31st December, 1856, 6,737 miles were narrow gauge, 679 broad gauge, 254 miles mixed, and 1,048 miles Irish gauge. From figures given in the appendix, it appears, that, from 1852 to 1856, the first-class passenger fares in England have been diminished, while the receipts per mile have increased. As regards the second-class traffic in England, the fares have been slightly increased, and the receipts per mile have not varied much. In the third-class traffic, which includes a large amount of excursion traffic, the average fares were diminished, and the receipts per mile largely increased. Also it appears, that, while in 1849 the proportion of receipts of the passenger traffic to the goods traffic was as 53 to 47, in 1856 the proportion of the passenger traffic to the goods traffic is as 44 to 56. The aggregate receipts from all sources of traffic for the whole kingdom have been £23,165,493, or £2,724 per mile in 1856, against £21,507,599, or £2,629 per mile in 1855. Of the total amount of money raised, £77,359,419 has been raised by loans, £57,057,171 by preference shares, and the remainder—viz. £174,359,304. by ordinary share capital. The large amount of preferential capital has prevented an increase in the dividends on the ordinary share capital proportionate to the improved receipts; but the steady increase in the net revenue in a greater ratio than the increase of the capital invested, is evidence of sound progress. The stability of railway property depends chiefly upon careful management.

ARBITRATION FEES.

The letter which we published in our last number, from Mr. Case, of Maidstone, will probably have directed the attention of many of our readers to the unsatisfactory principle on which the fees of arbitrators are commonly settled. We do not wish to enter into the particulars of the case referred to, as we have scarcely sufficient means of judging of the amount of trouble which the reference may have entailed. So far, however, as we can form an opinion, we certainly see no reason for supposing that the sum allowed to the arbitrators on taxation was not a fair recompense for their services. We are not of those who think that arbitrators, or any other persons selected for a difficult and responsible task, ought to be remunerated with a grudging hand; and whether engineers, or barristers, or solicitors be employed, they have a right to look for at least a good average day's earnings as the pay for a day's work. Nor do we doubt that our correspondent would have been, in his own case, quite willing to submit to charges fairly regulated by this principle. It would be very bad economy to refer a dispute to a cheap and incompetent tribunal; and when eminent engineers or Queen's counsel are thought necessary to decide a matter of difficulty, we are quite sure that no one in the profession will be reluctant to allow them such reasonable fees as shall be a fair, and even a liberal, remuneration for their time and labour. But what we do protest against is, the system under which arbitrators have been hitherto allowed to fix their own fees, with scarcely any guide from custom, and without any restraint from the law. The Maidstone Case is now a precedent for the taxation of arbitrators' fees, whatever may be the dignity of the gentlemen engaged, or their supposed professional immunity from the interference of the taxing-master. Probably the principle on which the judges acted was, that an arbitrator, who is entitled to withhold his award until his fees are paid, cannot claim the same honorary privileges as are allowed to counsel in their ordinary business, in which they have no legal power of recovering their fees at all. But, whatever may have been the reasoning which induced the Court to make an order for taxation, we hope that the case will lead to some action on the part of the profession by which a proper scale of fees may be settled. It is not desirable to have every arbitration case brought to the tribunal of the taxing-master; and there seems really to be no great difficulty in arranging a sort of model scale of fees, which would prove a sufficient guide in the majority of cases. Whether the judges would take upon themselves the task of suggesting a rule for general guidance may be doubtful; but there is no reason why something of the kind should not be done by a common understanding in the profession. It would be easy to frame a general scheme which would supply the absence of any definite or recognised custom in the matter. It is quite well settled what is the proper fee to counsel for a multitude of strictly professional pieces of business. Why should there not be an equally well understood rule to determine the fees which are to be given when they or other persons act as arbitrators? It is true that, in the last case, the fee, instead of being marked by the solicitor, is fixed by the arbitrator himself; but a similar observation may be made of a great deal of conveyancing and other business, and we do not hear of much difficulty arising in consequence. All that is necessary is, that the scale should be regulated by acknowledged usage rather than by arbitrary discretion in each case; and as there does not seem to be any approach to universal agreement as to what the usage is, the sooner the profession can agree to promulgate their views of what it ought to be the better. Any attempt to lay down rigid rules to provide for every possible circumstance would be absurd; but some general principle, sufficient to serve as a guide in the majority of instances, might, we think, without much trouble, be determined on.

One thing, however, is certain, that even when the fees are kept within reasonable bounds, arbitration is a far more costly mode of settling most disputes than a regular trial. There is about the same expense in getting up the case on either side; and, besides all that, there is a tribunal to pay in place of one provided at the cost of the country.

The extreme uncertainty of the sittings of arbitrators, if they chance to be men of any considerable business, and the perpetual interruptions after meetings long enough to introduce the subject, and altogether useless so far as actual progress is concerned, are still more serious objections to references in general. It is impossible, no doubt, to dispense altogether with this private forum; but the fact that it is to any considerable extent resorted to is always a reproach to the regular courts of the country, and sometimes an argument of the lack of prudence on the part of suitors. If the machinery of the courts were enlarged, and adapted for conveniently entertaining and disposing of all kinds of questions, the incidental costs of litigation would, in most cases, be less than those of a reference; and although there may be some questions which cannot very well be gone into satisfactorily before a jury, we believe that the frequency of arbitrations might be greatly lessened by attaching to the courts of law some more suitable machinery for the investigation of complex and tedious matters, which are now almost invariably referred. That any improvement in this direction will add to the credit as well as to the efficiency of the regular courts would be too much to expect. It is precisely because it investigates so many details, and does so much work of the same heavy kind that commonly occurs in arbitration cases, that the Court of Chancery is still the object of opprobrium for its supposed delays. The New York lawyers appreciated the character of complicated business so well, that they maintained the reputation of their courts for rapidity by sending everything that required any expenditure of time to be decided by a reference. To some extent, the same thing is done here; and modern legislation has tended still more to extend the practice of arbitration. For ourselves, we regard it as a very questionable expedient, which ought to be discouraged as much as possible; and though it must be resorted to in exceptional cases, there is no reason why the evils incidental to it should be aggravated by the absence of any recognised rule as to arbitrators' fees.

THE INNS OF CHANCERY.

When the Royal Commissioners were appointed, in 1854, to report on the existing arrangements for promoting the study of law and jurisprudence, they were instructed to direct their inquiries not only to the Inns of Court, but to the Inns of Chancery. They accordingly sent a circular to the officials of those institutions, and collected information sufficient to enable them to understand the position which the Inns of Chancery now occupy. It appears from the evidence published in the Report of the Commission, that originally the Inns of Chancery were auxiliary to the Inns of Court, and that barristers, attorneys, and solicitors were, without distinction, comprised among their members, and subsequently admitted to practise by their sanction. In the time of Philip and Mary, the privilege of the Inns of Chancery to call their members to the bar was abated, and it was further curtailed in the time of Elizabeth. In the time of Charles I., the Inns of Court assumed the sole privilege of calling to the bar, and refused to admit any attorney or solicitor among their members. Until the time of Queen Anne, the Courts of Common Law required that attorneys and solicitors, in order to be admitted on the Rolls, should belong to an Inn of Chancery; but after that reign this has not been exacted, and the Inns of Chancery are now nothing more than private societies composed of members of the legal profession, and enjoying the benefit of a certain amount of property held in trust for them. As these Inns are therefore, at the present day, entirely unconnected with legal studies, there exist in them no arrangements for instruction or assistance in learning the law. There are no libraries and no lectures. But in some of these Inns there was for a very long time a provision made for instruction, and Readers were sent from the Inns of Court to teach the students. At New Inn, more especially, it is only within a very few years that the Middle Temple has discontinued to hold readings in the Hall. As, therefore, there exist for solicitors a set of Inns which at one time closely resembled the Inns of Court, which have a local propinquity to the sites of the Inns of Court, and which long received from the Inns of Court some kind of legal instruction, it has repeatedly been proposed to make them answer the same purpose for solicitors that the Inns of Court fulfil for the bar. In 1846, the Commissioners appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the state of legal education reported that, if possible, it would be desirable that the Inns of Chancery should be aggregated into a Solicitors' Law College, under the direction of members of their own body, and having, like the Inns of Court, the judges as their visitors. The Commissioners of 1854 received suggestions to the same effect. The notion is, indeed, a very obvious one, and its very obviousness may perhaps make it reasonable to suppose that some good ground exists why it has not been acted on.

There are certainly very strong reasons why the Inns of Chancery have not been, and are not likely to be, made into a Solicitors' College. In the first place, they are to a great extent in the hands of private individuals, who buy and sell the property in very nearly the same way as if it were not connected with any institution. They are not corporate bodies, nor are they subject to any trusts for public instruction. It would, therefore, require a purchase of existing interests to get the Inns into the hands of a College; and the purchase would be a very doubtful investment of the sum requisite for the purpose. It is difficult, also, to see on what ground a compulsory sale of these interests could be justified. In the next place, the Incorporated Law Society answers the objects to be attained by the establishment of a Solicitors' College too nearly to give any probability of success if it were attempted to set a new institution on foot. The Commissioners of 1854, therefore, reported that they did not see anything in the position and constitution of the Inns of Chancery which would connect them with the study of law and jurisprudence. These Inns have, in short, so far as legal education is concerned, an antiquarian, not a practical interest.

But it very often happens that, in the changes and revolutions of society, institutions which have long lost their original shape, and almost passed away, and which it would be pedantic and foolish to think of reviving, have yet a value from the light which they throw on the best method of meeting the novel exigencies of a very different era. The County Courts have really nothing to do with the leets and tourns of the Saxon constitution, and yet these local courts served as a historical starting point and as useful guides in the erection of the district tribunals of the nineteenth century. So, too, without any wish to see the existing Inns of Chancery made into a Solicitors' College, we may look to these institutions for hints when we desire to devise some means of responding to the necessity for a widened professional education, and of making this education common to the two branches of the profession. In our number of last week we stated our reasons for believing that it would be very advantageous if this participation in a certain portion of professional education could be effected. We now refer to the history of the Inns of Chancery, as suggesting a mode of accomplishing this object.

So far as these Inns were ever connected with education, or ever brought the two branches of the profession into communication, they were stamped with two distinguishing features. They were affiliated to some one of the Inns of Court, and they received instruction from the Inn of Court to which they were affiliated. These, then, are the two essential notions—surveillance on the one hand, and instruction on the other. The students were to show that they were fit persons to be members of a particular body, and were then to be helped in their studies. Practically, these notions were very faintly and imperfectly realised, but still they lay at the bottom of the relations between the two species of Inns. It seems to us that here is exactly what is wanted. Solicitors may reasonably ask that they shall be permitted to attend the instruction given by the Inns of Court in the higher branches of the law. The Benchers of the Inns may reasonably ask that the applicants shall show their fitness to be admitted. It can scarcely be said that the mere fact that a young man is an articled clerk establishes this fitness. Why should he not be called on to prove it? Why should not applicants be made to pass a preliminary examination showing that they had received a liberal education? Without such an education it is absurd to attempt to gain an acquaintance with the principles of civil law, of general jurisprudence, and of the history of law. If a solicitor has received such an education, there is no ground for excluding him from attendance at the lectures of the best teachers on those subjects that can be found. No plan could be more easily carried into immediate execution. It would involve no expense, and no creation of anything that does not already exist, except the arrangement of a system of examination. As the examination would be perfectly voluntary, there could be no objection on the part of solicitors that they were compelled to learn what they might think practically useless to them. And as the students thus admitted would have proved their fitness, there could be no objection made by the bar that their lecture-rooms were thrown open to persons not qualified to be found there. The experiment seems to us safe and simple, and yet its ulterior consequences might be great and highly beneficial. For the present we will leave this proposal, which we have been obliged to make rather shortly and nakedly, to the consideration of our readers. In an early number we propose to revert to it, and to discuss more fully the advantages which it seems to us to promise, and the obstacles it might possibly encounter.

Legal News.

LONDON AND EASTERN BANKING COMPANY.

V. C. Sir W. PAGE WOOD held a Court at Ipswich on Monday, at the Great White Horse Hotel, to dispose of a petition praying for a winding-up order in the matter of the London and Eastern Banking Company.

Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the petitioners, Dr. Abel Stuart, of West-cottage, South-bank, Regent's-park, and Mr. George Duplex, surgeon, of Torrington-square; Mr. Glass and Mr. Hetherington appeared to oppose on behalf of a committee of shareholders and other parties; Mr. Druce appeared for the Oriental Bank; Mr. Bovill for the trustee of an independent shareholder and for the bulk of the Indian shareholders; Mr. Rodwell for the Agra and United Service Bank; and Mr. Bromehead for Col. Yates.

After considerable discussion as to whether the petition should be heard during the vacation,

The VICE-CHANCELLOR decided—although he remarked that it was a bad precedent—to go on with the case.

Mr. Roxburgh was accordingly heard at great length on behalf of the petitioners, whose petition, dated September 3, recited the circumstances under which the company was established, and the nature of the business which it proposed to carry on. This was the ordinary trade of bankers; and it was provided, that the company should in no case purchase any of its own shares, or make any advance to any person on the security of them. The following persons were appointed directors by the deed of settlement:—The Hon. J. C. Erskine, Mr. J. C. Morris, Colonel T. Chadwick, Mr. Robert Griffith, Mr. R. J. Lattey, and Mr. J. E. Stephens; Mr. J. E. Coleman and Mr. G. J. Lyons were appointed auditors; Mr. J. E. Stephens, manager; Mr. J. Black, secretary; and Mr. Curtis and Col. Chadwick, trustees. The capital was £500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of £100 each; and the directors were to publish a correct balance-sheet of the assets and liabilities of the company once at least in every month in the London Gazette. Whenever a loss of at least twenty-five per cent. on the capital for the time being paid up had been sustained, it was to be incumbent on the directors to summon an extraordinary general meeting, to consider the propriety of dissolving the company; and whenever a loss of at least seventy-five per cent. on the subscribed capital for the time being had been sustained, any shareholder was empowered to summon a meeting to dissolve the company. The company, having obtained a paid-up capital to the amount of £250,000, commenced business in 1854, the directors being the Hon. C. Erskine, chairman; Mr. J. C. Morris, deputy chairman; Colonel Chadwick, Mr. H. Tendall, Mr. J. E. Stephens, and Colonel Petrie Waugh. Mr. J. E. Stephens was also manager. The petitioners proceeded to allege, that, very shortly after business was commenced, the directors began to make advances to each other out of the capital on insufficient or without any security other than personal, and at a rate of interest considerably lower than would have been paid by other persons. It was also alleged, that the directors advanced to Col. Petrie Waugh £237,000, upon security wholly insufficient to warrant such an advance, even if made bonâ fide to a stranger; and upon the realisation of such security the petitioners expressed their belief there would be a loss of £100,000 and upward. The directors, in the last monthly statement which they published of the assets and liabilities of the company, gave the following item:—"East India and Government securities, bills of exchange, treasury and agency drafts, credits, discounts, and cash in hand, 989,925*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*;" and it was contended that this statement was delusive and untrue, as it did not include the advance of £237,000 made to Col. Waugh. In less than a month after the publication of this statement the bank failed, and the shareholders were, it was alleged, for the first time made acquainted with the alarming state of their affairs, and informed that the liabilities of the company exceeded its assets by £240,000; that not only was the £50 paid up on each share lost, but that, at least, the remaining portion of £50 per share would be required to be paid up. A proposition was made, and assented to by some of the shareholders, that promissory notes should be given for the remaining £50 per share, payable at twelve months' date, and that arrangements should be made with the Oriental Bank for a transfer of the Indian assets and liabilities, guaranteed by the personal security of shareholders. The petitioners, and some other shareholders, refused to adopt the proposition; but the majority of the proprietors assented to it. The petitioners were served with notices, intimating that two calls had been made; and, as they declined to make any payment, Messrs. Oliverson, Lavie, and Peachey, solicitors to the company, informed them that they were instructed to take the necessary proceedings to compel them to do so. The petitioners, believing that the directors had committed great irregularities, and that, if the accounts of the company were taken by the Court, great benefit would result to the shareholders, prayed that an order absolute might be made for the dissolution of the corporation, and that its affairs might be wound up under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849.

Responsive affidavits by Mr. C. J. F. Stuart, Mr. H. E. Beville, Mr. F. Thynne, Mr. A. F. Arbuthnot, and Mr. S. Smith—gentlemen who have been endeavouring to arrange and settle in the best practicable way the affairs of the company since it ceased its operations—were also read, as were affidavits from the Hon. J. C. Erskine and Col. T. Chadwick, two of the directors. The first affidavits, which were extremely lengthy, recited the proceedings adopted for the settlement of the affairs of the bank, and the part taken by the Oriental Bank in making advances, &c. They stated, inter alia, that the debts and liabilities now remaining due to certain Indian banks amounted collectively to about £103,000; that the said Indian banks would forbear to press their claims, provided the present mode of liquidation was continued; that the amount expected to be received from shareholders, in pursuance of the calls made upon them, will, it is believed, be sufficient to discharge in full all the debts and liabilities due to the general public, with the exception of the Indian banks, who would be willing to give time; that the committee of shareholders have caused an action to be brought against the late manager of the bank, to recover £6,000 due; that the committee are prepared to take all such proceedings against the late and present directors or other persons as may in their judgment be calculated to benefit the shareholders at large; that the effect of a winding-up order would be to materially impede the effectual prosecution of these proceedings; that the committee are using all due diligence to realise the assets, and that the appointment of an official manager or any person not having the same opportunities of communicating with India would be seriously detrimental to the interests of the shareholders; that the great body of the shareholders are not desirous that the affairs of the company should be wound up under the Winding-up Act.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without calling for replies from the other learned counsel concerned in the case) proceeded to give judgment. His Honour observed, that it was just possible some advantage might result from placing the concern under the control of the Court; but such a course appeared to be opposed to the wishes of the great body of the shareholders. No less than 4,170 shareholders had given their promissory notes for the calls made, and it did not appear that a single creditor had commenced proceedings in order to recover payment of his claims. The only creditors would be the Oriental Bank, and a few other small banks. The matter was, therefore, reduced into the hands of a very few persons, and they would be able to consider the best course for all parties. There were no equities between one set of shareholders as against another, or against any other persons than the directors. The matter would probably be reduced to a quarrel between the directors and the shareholders; and he did not consider it necessary that the expensive machinery of the law should be set in motion by the granting of a winding-up order and the appointment of an official manager, especially as there was no charge of malversation in regard to what was now being done.

Petition dismissed, with costs as regards parties served.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. — Sept. 16.

(Before Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD).

In re Thomas Hart.

The bankrupt carried on business in Charlotte-street, Blackfriars, and elsewhere, as the London Hat and Cap Company, of which "company" he styled himself "the general manager."

This was a meeting for proof of debts and choice of assignees.

Mr. Crafter (Doughty-street) appeared for the petitioning creditor, and Mr. Elam (Norton, Son, & Elam) for certain creditors.

Mr. Elam proposed Mr. James Morris, of King-street, Cheapside, Draper, and Mr. Benjamin Wilson, of Walbrook-house, London, Plush Importer, as assignees.

Mr. Crafter objected to the appointment of Mr. Morris, on the ground that he had had complicated transactions with the bankrupt which required investigation, and that he had compounded with his creditors (Ex parte Surtees, 12 Ves. 10).

On being examined, Mr. Morris stated that he had compounded with his creditors for 16*s.* in the pound, and that the composition, though not yet paid, was secured, and the creditors had executed an absolute and unconditional release of their debts.

His Honour refused an application to adjourn the meeting for the production of the release, and confirmed the appointment.

Sept. 25.

In re The London and West of Ireland Fishing and Fishing Manure Company (Limited).

This was a sitting to adjudicate on a petition presented on behalf of Col. Daniel, under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, that an order for winding-up the company in this Court may be made absolute.

On reference to the prospectus of the company, it appears that it was proposed to establish it on the principle of "limited liability," with a capital of £50,000, in 5,000 shares of £10 each. The provisional directors were the Hon. W. Napier, managing director of the Lands Improvement Company, Old Palace-yard, Westminster; Mr. Charles Balfour, 39, St. James's-street, Edinburgh; Mr. Edward Chapman (Messrs. Chapman & Hall), 193, Piccadilly; Lieut.-Colonel French, 8, Duke-street, St. James's, and Galway; Mr. Henry S. Pitcher, Northfleet Dockyard; Mr. W. Pulteney, 55, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Mr. John Shorter, 1, Lawrence Pountney-place, Cannon-street; Mr. Thos. Osborne Stock, Lloyd's, and 18, Austin-friars; Commander Thomas Edward Symonds, R.N. (managing director, resident at Galway); Mr. Thomas Robert Tuffnell, 18, Tokenhouse-yard; Mr. Charles Whiting, Beaufort-house, Strand. Solicitors: Messrs. Vallance & Vallance, 20, Essex-street, Strand. Auditors: Mr. J. E. Coleman, 36, Coleman-street, and Mr. George Cumming, manager of the Kent Mutual Life and Fire Insurance Societies. Brokers: Messrs. Field, Son, & Wood, Warnford-court. Secretary (ad int.): Mr. E. Matthews. Offices: 32, Regent-circus, London, and 24, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin. Principal fishing station: Galway.

The petition before the Court set forth, among other things, that the company was provisionally registered about January, 1856; that, on or about the 22nd of September, 1856, the company was duly registered; that the company commenced business with only a portion of the capital paid up; that the directors have made calls of £8 per share; that the company has entirely failed; and that the petitioner verily believes that three-fourths or more of the paid-up capital has been lost or become unavailable, and debts and liabilities to a large amount have been incurred, which the said company is unable to pay and discharge. That no general meeting of the company was held until on or about the 1st of August last (1857), and on the 14th of August last an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held, at which it was proposed that the said company should be wound up voluntarily, and that an official liquidator, with a remuneration of £500 at the least, should be appointed for that purpose. The ground of such proposal was, that the said company was insolvent.

This petition was met by one from Captain Thomas Edward Symonds, the managing director of the company; Mr. William Charles Wryghte, accountant; and Sir John Fox Burgoyne, of the War-office, Pall-mall, Inspector-General of her Majesty's Fortifications, and chairman of the Board of Directors of the above-mentioned company, praying that the company may be allowed to continue to wind up voluntarily.

Mr. Roxburgh raised a preliminary objection to the petition—viz. that the company, having resolved to wind up voluntarily, in pursuance of a power given by the Act of Parliament, it was not competent for a contributory to petition to have the company wound up by this Court.

Mr. Linklater also objected, and referred to the 105th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, which enacts "that the voluntary winding up of a company shall not prejudice the right of any creditor of the said company to institute proceedings for the purpose of having the same wound up by the Court." He contended, that it was clearly the intention of the Legislature to give such right to a creditor only; and that contributories must be bound by the resolution to wind up voluntarily.

Mr. Chidley took the same ground. He further referred to the passing of the special resolution of the company to wind up. The 34th and 64th sections referred to the manner in which such a resolution should be passed; and he contended that their provisions had been sufficiently complied with. It was true that the original resolution was not confirmed until the day after the presentation of the petition to this Court on the part of a contributory; but, by the 64th section, the winding up must be held to commence from the time of the original resolution. The confirmation was only required to bind absent and dissentient shareholders. The 64th section was silent as to confirmation.

The Commissioner.—By the 34th section, it would not be a special resolution unless confirmed.

Mr. Chidley urged, that, if all the shareholders were present at the first meeting, confirmation might be unnecessary.

The Commissioner overruled the objections, and said there was still the question whether the Court would exercise its discretion.

Mr. Lawrance proceeded to urge that the case before the Court was one of that character. The business had been conducted by the directors in so reckless and improvident a manner as to call for the interference of this Court and due investigation. The company was constituted in October, 1856, and began operations in January, 1857. Although a special resolution was passed that an audit should take place every three months, no audit ever took place. The first general meeting of the company was held on the 14th of August. Only fifteen persons were present, mostly directors. The resolution referred to was passed on that occasion. The next meeting was on the 18th of September. There were then only seventeen shareholders present. The total number of shareholders was 131. At the second meeting fifteen only of the shareholders agreed to the resolution of the 14th of August, and these had not seen any accounts. The nominal capital of the company was £50,000, divided into 5,000 shares of £10 each. Only 2,941 shares were, however, he alleged, subscribed for. The directors had been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty in thus beginning business with little more than half the required capital. From the report of Mr. Wryghte, the liquidator, it would appear that 3,532 shares were subscribed for, upon which a call of £8 per share was made. 1,400 shares were thus missing. One of the earliest acts of the company was to award £1,000 to Mr. Henry Vallance, solicitor of the company, and one of its promoters, £400 being applied for calls upon shares; and £1,000 was also voted to Captain Symons, also a promoter. That was before the company had earned a shilling by their operations, or a single step had been taken. The question arose whether this payment ought to have been made out of the capital of the company. The first three acts of the company, in fact, were payments of £50 to Captain Symons, £1,000 to Mr. Vallance, and £1,000 to Capt. Symons.

The Commissioner said that all Mr. Lawrance now stated should have been in the petition if he intended to rely upon it. General allegations of fraud or mismanagement could not be urged in this form.

Mr. Lawrance contended, that he had surely a right to refer to statements that appeared in the books of the company, and that such statements might hereafter be introduced into the petition. It was not until yesterday that he had access to the company's books. It had not, therefore, been possible to introduce that which they showed into the petition. He contended, that the fact of the company having lost three-fourths of its capital was sufficient for his purpose. The Legislature said, that he was entitled to his petition when three-fourths of the capital had become lost or unavailable.

Mr. Roxburgh.—That is not the case.

Mr. Lawrance continued to urge that he was not bound to allege gross misconduct on the part of the directors. Suppose that three-fourths of the paid-up capital had not been lost, then he could not be heard at all. This was, in fact, all that he was required to establish. If the Court, however, desired that the petition should contain other matter, it would grant an adjournment to allow him to amend.

The Commissioner thought this was the proper course. Admitting that it had been established that three-fourths of the capital had been lost, he thought, after what had taken place in respect to the voluntary order for winding up, that he ought not to adjudicate at present. It was the first case of the kind that had come before the Court, and therefore some latitude should be given to amend the petition.

Mr. Roxburgh.—The petitioner is the holder of only twenty-five shares. I represent the holders of 1,012 shares. The petitioner is the only dissentient to the voluntary winding up, and the petition is unreasonable.

The Commissioner.—That I cannot say until I know the allegations.

Mr. Roxburgh observed, that the Court of Chancery had invariably refused a winding-up order on the ground of misconduct on the part of directors; he referred, of course, to other than criminal misconduct. Why should the shareholders have greater benefit here? One shareholder might draw the whole company into litigation if such a course were allowed. Unless some special equitable ground could be shown, he submitted that the petition must be dismissed. The proper remedy of the shareholder was to file a bill in Chancery. If he then failed, he would pay the penalty.

Mr. Linklater urged that it would be conceding an indulgence to Col. Daniel to allow him to amend. He knew what would be required in any petition, and he ought to have been prepared. The liquidator under the voluntary order had paid claims to the amount of £3,500. The debts remaining unpaid were only £2,700, and they would be discharged to-morrow if this petition were now refused. There was no reasonable ground for the interference of this Court. In any case the Court would allow the right to amend without prejudice to the rights of the liquidator.

The Commissioner.—The 19th section provides for any difficulty of that kind.

Mr. Chidley also urged the dismissal of the petition.

The Commissioner said, there would be an adjournment to amend. The adjournment must not, however, be understood as a precedent. The question of costs must abide the result. There was no imputation upon the liquidator appointed under the voluntary winding up. He could continue, therefore, to perform all necessary duties.

An adjournment was then ordered.

Wednesday morning was appointed for settling the terms of the order; but Mr. Lawrance said that Colonel Daniel, having ascertained that the great bulk of the shareholders were in favour of a voluntary winding up, had, in deference to their wishes, requested him to withdraw from the petition. Having regard to the strong opinion expressed by V. C. Wood in the matter of the London and Eastern Bank as to the advisability of giving weight to the opinion of the majority of shareholders, he thought the petition should be dismissed; and if that was done now, it would immediately give vitality to the resolutions passed on the 14th of August and the 15th of September appointing a liquidator.

Mr. Vallance said, although, as stated by Mr. Lawrance, it appeared by the minute-book only fourteen or fifteen shareholders attended each meeting, it was because the directors held a large number of proxies. Circulars were sent round explaining the object of each meeting, and they always passed off unanimously, without one dissentient shareholder. The directors even now would be glad of the co-operation of Colonel Daniel, or any other dissentient shareholder in the winding-up of the company. When the resolution for voluntary winding up was made, the liabilities were £6,000, and the liquidator advanced half of that amount out of his own funds to pay off the debts, and nearly all the remaining creditors approved of the acts of the directors, and expressed their opposition to the bankruptcy proceedings. The directors would court inquiries into their conduct and accounts when the proper time arrived.

The Commissioner, in dismissing the petition, said if proper means were taken to get the contributories together, and they stopped away, that could not be urged against the resolutions passed by those who chose to attend. Such resolutions must be considered as those of the contributories.

The petition was dismissed.

Mr. R. H. Harrison, a bencher of the Inner Temple, and who was called to the bar in 1815, died on Monday last.

We regret to have to announce the death of Wm. Mackworth Praed, Esq., judge of the county court of the district in which Plymouth and Devonport are included, who expired at the New London Inn, Exeter, on the 25th ult.

The Right Hon. James Stuart Wortley, M.P., has left Carlton-gardens for Italy, for the winter.

The auditor's account of the election expenses incurred by Mr C. A. Moody and Mr. W. H. P. Gore Langton, the sitting members for the western division of the county of Somerset, shows that 79*l.* 10*s.* was expended by the former and 881*l.* 2*s.* 5*d* by Mr. Langton. In the eastern division the total expenses of Mr. Miles are set down at 157*l.* 2*s.* and those of Mr. Knatchbull at 145*l.* 7*s.*

In the Lambeth County Court on Monday week, an action was brought by a lodging-house keeper at Brixton, named Hughes, to recover the amount of a fortnight's rent and a dinner provided for the defendant, an officer in the East India Company's service, named Lawrance. It appeared that the defendant had taken apartments at the plaintiff's house, and ordered a dinner to be provided, but afterwards wrote a letter declining the apartments. It was pleaded by the solicitor for the defendant (Mr. Ody) that the plaintiff was precluded by the Statute of Frauds from recovering the rent under the circumstances. His Honour said the Statute of Frauds was the cause of more frauds being perpetrated than it had ever prevented, and gave a verdict for the amount of the dinner only.

On Thursday a sale of considerable interest took place, by direction of the benchers of the Inner Temple, when the building materials of chambers formerly occupied by Dr. Johnson, on the first floor of No. 1, Inner Temple-lane, were offered to public competition by Messrs. Hammond and Eiloart. The auctioneer announced at the commencement of the proceedings that the celebrated "Dr. Johnson Staircase" was withdrawn from the sale, the benchers having determined to retain possession of the staircase from the entrance to the first floor, the wainscotting, banisters, &c., and the carved hood over the door, with pilasters, &c., forming the external doorway, and would keep them as long as the Temple existed, although they were obliged to be removed from their present position. The boarded and timber floor on which the learned Doctor and his literary friends had so often walked, with the windows, doors, moulded panel partition, &c., sold for 10*l.* 5*s.*

PROSECUTION OF THE BRITISH BANK DIRECTORS.

Until the conclusion of the examinations in bankruptcy, the law officers of the Crown were not in the slightest degree bound to notice any irregular or criminal act which might have been committed by the officers of the bank. Without waiting for the processes of report and formal reference provided by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, the Attorney-General, upon reading the depositions—copies of which had been forwarded to him by Mr. Linklater—elected to proceed by way of criminal information, and not by way of indictment. It is very well known that the most competent lawyers entertain very serious doubts whether the statute or common law can reach the offences with which the officers of the bank have been charged. Many nice and difficult points will have to be argued; such, for instance, as these—whether the compulsory disclosure made in bankruptcy does not exempt the persons who made it from criminal responsibility, or whether the false statements held out to the public of the affairs of the bank amount legally to the offence of conspiracy to defraud. It is probable that the accused, if found guilty at all, will be convicted of the common law misdemeanor of having disobeyed the provisions of an Act of Parliament—for having made false returns of the amount of paid-up capital, and other fraudulent returns to the Board of Trade.—Abridged from the Morning Post.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE.

This Association meets at Birmingham on the 12th inst. and four following days. In the department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law, the subject of Bankruptcy Reform will have a prominent place. The following circular has been addressed by the Secretary of the Law Amendment Society to the Chambers of Commerce and Law Societies which sent delegates to the Mercantile Law Conference, held in January last:—

3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, S. W., Sept. 15, 1857.

Dear Sir,—I forwarded to you a short time since a Bill to amend the law of bankruptcy, recently introduced by Lord Brougham into the House of Lords, and then read a first time. I am anxious to offer to you a few observations on this Bill, and I hope that you will be good enough to communicate them to your Chamber.

I may observe, that, in remedying the defects complained of in our bankruptcy law and administration, as in nearly all measures of reform, there are two distinct courses, either of which may be pursued. We may determine, on the one hand, to frame at once a comprehensive Bill, which shall settle for many years the whole question; or, on the other hand, we may resolve to bring forward at convenient seasons a succession of smaller measures adapted to hit certain blots in the existing system, without attempting its immediate and entire abolition. Each of these two distinct courses has its advantages according to circumstances, but any third mode of proceeding would seem to be unadvisable; any Bill which would greatly disturb the existing system, without at the same time producing a final settlement, would appear to be an absolute evil.

The Bill introduced by Lord Brougham, it is hardly necessary to say, belongs to the second of the two classes of measures I have alluded to, and aims at the immediate remedy of a few obvious defects in the existing bankruptcy system. It purports to transfer to the consolidated fund the compensative payments made to former officers of the courts, now defrayed out of the fees; to abolish the offices of broker and accountant; to restrict the employment of the messenger to those cases in which his interference is sanctioned by the Commissioner; to provide for the payment of the official assignee in part by a fixed salary; and to enable the creditors of a deceased trader to bring his estate into the Bankruptcy Court. It will probably be considered by your Chamber that all the above-mentioned provisions would be salutary, but it may be thought that one of them should be carried further—that the office of messenger should be abolished. I find, however, that many practical men are of opinion that the duties of messenger ought to be kept distinct from those of any other officer of the Court, and that the valid objection is not to the office, but to the two evils connected with it: first, that in some cases the messenger acts when there is no necessity for his doing so; and secondly, that his fees are of an exorbitant nature. The first evil is provided for by the Bill; the second is now being dealt with by the Lord Chancellor, who has orflered returns from the various messengers, with the object of revising their scale of fees, and reducing them to a proper amount. I am therefore inclined to think that the total abolition of the office of messenger is neither necessary nor desirable.

It is probable that several clauses might be advantageously added to Lord Brougham's Bill without changing its present character, and any suggestions which may be made by your Chamber to that effect will receive his Lordship's best consideration before the next session of Parliament.

The question whether the time has yet arrived for attempting a sweeping measure of bankruptcy law amendment remains distinct, and it is one too important to be considered on any but its own merits. I am glad to be able to announce that an opportunity for deliberating upon it, under the most influential auspices, will shortly be presented. The lately formed National Association for the Promotion of Social Science will hold, on the 12th of October next and the four following days, a meeting at Birmingham; its first department being devoted to jurisprudence and the amendment of the law, and having the signal advantage of Lord John Russell's presidency. It has been determined that the question of the amendments required in bankruptcy law and administration shall form the prominent topic in the discussions; and the occasion is so favourable for the purpose, that I venture to express a hope that your Chamber will send some authorised representatives to the meeting. I am the more sanguine of a useful result, because I am aware that the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce has prepared a Bill on the subject, and we shall thus have the advantage of seeing the views entertained by mercantile men placed in a tangible shape before us.

In the hope that your Chamber may think fit to fall in with the suggestion I have made, I inclose a prospectus and circular relative to the meeting alluded to; and I beg you in conclusion to believe me,—Yours very faithfully, G. W. Hastings.

THE STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

From a parliamentary return lately issued, showing the expenditure of the Statute Law Commission, we extract the following facts:—The balance remaining in the Treasury on April 30, 1856, was 3,029*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and the sum voted in 1856 for the purposes of the Commission was £1,911, which, with the sum received by the secretary from the sale of parliamentary papers, made a total of 4,946*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.* The following are the material items of the expenditure of this sum:—To Mr. H. B. Ker, for one year's salary as commissioner, £1,000; to Mr. J. Brickdale, secretary, for ditto, £600; the Fees to Draftsmen amounted to 2,285*l.* 15*s.*; the total expended was 4,141*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, and the balance in hand on June 30, 1857, was 805*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*

The following is a return of the names of the Draftsmen employed to prepare consolidation bills, and the fees paid to each since the date of the last return, April 30, 1856:—Criminal Law, J. F. Archbold, £450; Law of Aliens, W. C. Beasley, £25; Landlord and Tenant, A. Bisset, £100; Law of Property, A. Bisset, £10; Criminal Law, R. Bourke, £75; Criminal Law, T. Chandlers, £50; Law of Property, G. W. Cooke, £150; Criminal Law, A. Edgar, £125; Bills of Exchange, A. Edgar, £5; Criminal Law, H. T. Holland, £125; Stamp Acts, H. Jessel, £250; Law of Property, H. Jessel, £75; Law of Pawnbrokers, A. J. Johnstone, £50; Law of Property, G. B. Lennard, £20; Law of Property, R. Lindley, £15; Law of Carriers, H. Lloyd, 87*l.* 10*s.*; Statutes of Limitation, J. M. Ludlow, 165*l.* 15*s.*; Law of Property, F. C. J. Millar, £25; Law of Property, A. E. Miller, £50; Law of Aliens, J. Pouncefote, £25; Law of Property, F. S. Reilly, £75; Law of Carriers, G. Somerset, 87*l.* 10*s.*; Law of Property, E. P. Wolstenholme, £95; Classification of the Statutes, A. Wood, £250.

The total amount voted for the Statute Law Commission since its appointment on August 23, 1854, was 13,180*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, but from this sum there is to be deducted £3,690, repaid to civil contingencies for sums advanced to a former Commission. This leaves the whole available sum at 9,490*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*

The total sum paid as salary to Mr. H. B. Ker, down to March 31, 1857, amounts to 2,605*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* Mr. Brickdale has received, in the same period, 1,552*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* The total received by draftsmen since the institution of the Commission, amounts to the sum of £3,887.

RIGHT OF A SUBJECT TO CHANGE HIS ALLEGIANCE.

The United States papers publish the following opinion of their highest legal functionary, on the very delicate point of a man's right to change his allegiance:—

Attorney-General's Office, Aug. 17.

The note of Count Montgelas, transmitted to your department through Mr. Vroom, our Minister at Berlin, asks for an explanation of the opinion given by Mr. Cushing in October last, on the right of an American citizen to expatriate himself.

The specified case put by Count Montgelas is that of Julius Amthor, a native of Irmelhausen, in Bavaria, who came to this country, and after being naturalised returned again to Bavaria. His effort to recover his status as a native of Bavaria seems to be impeded by a doubt which the authorities there entertain on the question whether he can throw off his allegiance to the United States, and if so, in what manner it is to be done?

There is no statute or other law of the United States which prevents either a native or naturalised citizen from severing his political connection with this Government, if he sees proper to do so, in time of peace, and for a purpose not directly injurious to the interests of the country.

There is no mode of renunciation prescribed, in my opinion. If he emigrates, carries his family and effects with him, manifests a plain intention not to return, takes up his permanent residence abroad, and assumes the obligation of a subject to a foreign Government, this would imply a dissolution of his previous relations with the United States; and I do not think we could or would afterwards claim from him any of the duties of a citizen. At all events, the fact of renunciation is to be established, like other facts for which there is no prescribed form of proof, by any evidence which will convince the judgment. It is for the authorities of Bavaria to determine, first, whether they will admit Mr. Amthor to the privileges enjoyed by a native subject of their King without an express renunciation of his American citizenship. If this be decided in the negative—that is to say, if they demand from him an express renunciation — they may take it and cause it to be authenticated in what form they please. They may demand an oath of abjuration as a test of his sincerity, or as a necessary part of his title to the future protection of the Bavarian Government. Whatever satisfies them ought to be satisfactory to us, since, in all similar cases, we prescribe our own rules for the admission of Bavarian subjects as citizens of the United States.

I have spoken of the laws of the United States. Virginia and Kentucky, two of the States, have statutes which require a certain formula or renunciation of citizenship. But these statutes have no application to this case. I do not understand Mr. Amthor to have resided in either of those States. If the Federal Government gives him up, his obligations to the particular State in which he lived could hardly come into any practical conflict with those which he is about to assume toward his native country. I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. S. Black.

Hon. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State.

The French Tribunals.

The Paris Court of Assizes was again occupied the whole of Wednesday, with the trial of the four men accused of the robberies and frauds connected with the Northern Railway securities.

The principal points of interest in the evidence were these:—A locksmith deposed, that, notwithstanding the precaution which was adopted of having safes with triple locks, one of the keys of which was kept by a director, the late cashier, M. Roberts, had double keys to all the three locks of each safe, and kept them in a drawer to which his employés could have access. The President expressed doubts that such a want of care could possibly have been manifested, but Grellet said that the statement was perfectly true. He, however, declared, as he had done before, that it was not with any of the keys so left that he had opened the safes to take away the shares.

Guerin defended himself with some plausibility, and amongst other things said that he had had no need to break open the safe, as he knew enough of cabinet-making to be able to remove and replace the top of the safe.

The young woman who had lived under the protection of Carpentier, named Georgette Rollet, was called to give evidence, and she appeared in a magnificent toilette. She declared that Carpentier had only given her 300f. or 400f. a month; but she admitted that she had been possessed, at the time the robberies were discovered, of 37 bonds of the Lyons Railway; of several coupons of Three and Four-and-a-Half per cent. Rente; of a number of bank notes and bills of exchange; and of about 1,800f. in gold. She did not state how she obtained all that property, but denied that it was from Carpentier.

On Thursday the public prosecutor addressed the jury in support of the indictment. M. Lachaud afterwards pleaded for Carpentier, representing him as a victim of the passion for gold, and for Stock-Exchange gambling, which characterises the epoch. He deplored that at the early age of twenty-five the "fearful responsibility" of the post of cashier of a great enterprise, like the Northern Railway, had been imposed on him. He had at first only taken shares, in the belief that by the use of them he might realise a large fortune, and his firm intention had been to restore them.

The trial terminated on Friday. The President having summed up the evidence, the jury withdrew to deliberate, and in an hour and a half returned into Court with their verdict—Parod was acquitted, but Carpentier, Guerin, and Grellet were found guilty of theft and embezzlement, with extenuating circumstances in favour of the first two. In consequence, Grellet was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment, and Guerin and Carpentier to five. Furthermore, on the demand of the railway company as partie civile, Carpentier, Grellet, and Parod, although acquitted of the robbery, were ordered to restore conjointly 4,352 Northern shares, and Guerin 1,400.

The Correctional Tribunal of Paris has delivered a most extraordinary judgment, decreeing the seizure and entire suppression of the "Mystères du Peuple," by Eugène Sue, a serial commenced so long ago as 1849, and which has been circulating throughout Europe ever since by hundreds of thousands of copies. Baron de la Chastre, the assignee of the copyright, is sentenced by this decree to a year's imprisonment and a fine of 6,000 francs. The publisher is sentenced to two months' imprisonment and a fine of 2,000 francs; and the printer to one month's imprisonment and a fine of 1,000 francs. The following is a translation of the judgment, which has excited the deepest interest in the legal as well as literary circles of France:—

"Considering that the work in sixteen volumes, entitled 'Les Mystères du Peuple, ou Histoire d'une Famille de proletaires à travers les âges,' by Eugène Sue, is the property of the defendant, Baron La Chastre, by virtue of a deed of January 1, 1854; and he has published it jointly with the publisher, Chabot-Fontenay; and the defendant, Widow Dondney Dupré, printed it. Considering that, although this work was begun in 1849, it has been continued up to 1857, and consequently the publisher and printer cannot plead prescription, the work having been printed and published within the last three years, and there have been new editions of the first eight volumes, as appears by the report of the Commissary of Police, M. Nusse, dated May 7, 1857. Considering that the author of the 'Mystères du Peuple,' Eugene Sue, who died since the commencement of this prosecution, undertook the work in 1849, and continued it up to 1857, solely out of hatred to the institutions and government of his country, and with an evident immoral purpose; in fact, we find in every volume, in every page, the negation of all the principles upon which religion, morality, and society depend. Considering that in this work the morality of religion is insulted and travestied, good manners outraged by immoral, indecent, and obscene descriptions, and public morality condemned and lowered by a systematic rehabilitation of actions as odious as criminal—which have been uniformly stigmatised as criminal in all ages and by all nations; that Eugène Sue represents France as having always been divided into two races—the one, the Franks, conquering and oppressive—and the other, the Gauls, conquered and oppressed; that he describes this division of races as having prevailed for ages, as existing in the present day, and as being the origin of the oppression of that class of society which he denominates proletaires—the successors of the Gauls, by another class which he calls the class of crowned, coronetted, and mitred tyrants, the successors of the Franks; that he excites the former to count themselves and to make a war of extermination upon the latter; that at the head of every chapter of the 'Mystères du Peuple' he has placed a motto which is an appeal to insurrection; that he openly apologises for and justifies the massacre of September, pillage, incendiarism, violation, and regicide, representing these criminal acts as just and legitimate reprisals, which it is the right of the poor to exercise against sovereigns, nobles, the clergy, and all who are rich and powerful—not only on account of their own sufferings, but also by way of revenge for the oppressions endured by their ancestors, and which their descendants may expect to endure likewise; that he advocates the red flag, and represents property as an usurpation; that he excites to hatred and contempt of the government established by the constitution, and even in the two volumes printed in 1857 proclaims the universal republic founded upon the overthrow of the French Government, in the first place, and of all other governments subsequently; that he extols secret societies, saying that the members of these societies are animated by the most noble sentiments, that they seek only to destroy the oppressors of the people, and that insurgents are honest men who fight to save themselves from starvation, and their daughters from prostitution; that the monarchy oppresses the country by violence, robbery, and murder; that the proletaires possess all the virtues, and that vice and corruption are universal among other classes. Considering that it would be dangerous to society to allow "Les Mystères du People" to circulate any longer; that no doubt can be entertained of the danger, since the work has been found to be in the possession of most of the members of those secret societies which have been prosecuted of late years, the Court decrees, &c., &c."

CAP. XXXVI.—An Act to supply an Omission in a Schedule to the Act to amend the Acts relating to County Courts.

No better example than the Act under discussion could be given of the necessity which exists, if not for a "Minister of Justice," at all events for some official person, whose duty it shall be to guard the public against such mistakes in Acts of Parliament as result from their being so often hurried on at the close of a session, or from amendments being made at the last moment, with which the previous provisions even of the same Act are inconsistent. Every Act, without exception, should be finally revised by a competent person; and if this had been done in the case of the last County Court Amendment Act, the gross mistake corrected by the Act under discussion would not have occurred. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 (among other provisions) declared that for the future the salary of each county court judge should be £1,200 a year, and no more; but inasmuch as the salaries of certain of the then existing judges had, under the provision of a former statute, been raised by the Treasury above that amount—in some instances to £1,500—that Act contained a proviso saving the rights of those judges who at the time of the passing of the Act had received this addition. These persons were, during the time they respectively remained judges, to receive the salaries appended to their names, as scheduled to the Act. But at the very last moment, on the motion of Mr. Roebuck, the name of his brother-in-law, Mr. Falconer, and that of Mr. Yates, were added to the list of the scheduled names, but the amount of their respective salaries was left in blank. The Act under discussion sets this right, both with regard to the amount of salary already owing to these two gentlemen, and to that which will accrue to them in future, by enacting that the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, is to be read and to take effect as from the time it came into operation, in the same manner as if in the said schedule the sum of £1,500 had been mentioned to be payable to them respectively; and that the Treasury may pay to each of them the sums requisite to make up their salaries at that rate from the time at which the 19 & 20 Vict. came into operation.

CAP. XXXVII.—An Act to repeal the 27th Section of the Superannuation Act, 1834.

The Act thus referred to—though without sufficient authority, the custom of inserting in statutes a short title by which they may be cited not having been in use prior to the last few years—is the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 24; an Act passed chiefly to regulate the pensions which should for the future be granted, on retirement, to persons in the civil service of her Majesty. This statute—after laying down a scale of periods of service which must be gone through before any pension can be claimed, in reference to the different classes of office; and another scale of the amount of the allowance, in reference to the different periods of service (so that in no case it shall exceed two-thirds of the salary and emoluments resigned)—proceeded (by s. 27) to enact, that, with regard to those civil servants in the different offices, or departments, specified in the schedule thereto annexed, who had entered the public service since the 4th of August, 1829, there should be made an annual abatement of their salaries in quarterly proportions, after the rate of £2½ per cent., on salaries and emoluments not exceeding the annual sum of £100, and of £5 per cent. on all exceeding that sum; and, further, that with regard to all persons whomsoever then holding office, and entitled to superannuation allowances under that Act, who had been appointed subsequently to the said 4th of August, 1829, and who should thereafter, on promotion, obtain any increase of salary or allowances in respect of their offices, such annual abatement as above mentioned should be made from the amount of such increase, from time to time, commencing from the period when the same should take place. The Act under discussion simply repeals these provisions as to the abatement of salaries; and does not substitute any others in their place. The repeal is to a certain extent retrospective—being to take place from and after the 30th of June, 1857, while the Act under discussion received the Royal Assent on the 17th of August, 1857.

Cap. XXXVIII.—An Act to continue the General Board of Health.

Although this Act is intituled a "continuing" Act merely, it is in truth, also, an amending one, and makes an important change in the constitution of the Board. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 95, s. 3, it was provided that there should be paid to the President of the Board such salary, not exceeding £2,000 a year, as should be from time to time appointed by the Treasury, but that the other members should be unpaid; and that the President should be capable of being elected and of sitting and voting as a member of the House of Commons. The Act under discussion, without noticing this provision, enacts, that, if the person appointed President shall, at the time of his appointment, hold any office of profit under the Crown, he shall not receive any salary in respect of the office of President; and if, at the time of his appointment, he shall be a member of the House of Commons, he shall not, by reason of such appointment, vacate his seat. The last clause of this section of the Act under discussion has been, it is apprehended, introduced with reference to the 6 Ann. c. 7, s. 26, by which any member accepting an office of profit from the Crown (new commissions in the army or navy alone excepted,) vacates his seat. But, as the clause is framed, it would seem to apply, not to any person who may happen to be appointed President, but to any person holding an office of profit under the Crown at the time of his appointment; and, with respect to such a person, the first part of the section makes the office accepted (viz. that of. President) no longer one of profit. With respect to such a person, therefore, the section would seem to be surplusage merely; but how would it be with regard to a person who, at the time of his appointment as President, was a member of the House of Commons who did not hold any office of profit under the Crown? He would apparently have to vacate his seat; but we suspect such was not the intention of the framer of the Act.

Cap. XXXIX.—An Act to regulate the Admission of Attorneys and Solicitors of Colonial Courts in her Majesty's Superior Courts of Law and Equity in England, in certain cases.

In certain of the colonies, and notably in parts of India, the system of jurisprudence pursued is founded on or assimilated to the common law and principles of equity as administered in England; and English attorneys and solicitors are admitted as attorneys and solicitors there, on production of their certificates of admission in the English courts, without any colonial service or examination. The object of the Act under discussion is, to a certain extent, to give reciprocal facilities to colonial attorneys and solicitors desirous of being admitted to practise in this country. With this object, the Act provides—

1. That all British subjects, duly admitted and inrolled as attorneys and solicitors in the superior courts of law and equity in such colonies or dependencies as above mentioned, and where full service under articles to an attorney-at-law for five years at the least, and an examination as to fitness are required (except in the case of duly admitted and inrolled English practitioners seeking to practise in the colonial courts) previous to admission—may be, under certain conditions to be presently specified, admitted and inrolled in all or any of the English courts.

2. The first of these conditions is, that the applicant must pass an examination in this country to test his fitness and capacity; and produce thereat a certificate from the presiding judge of the superior court of common law in the colony in question, to the effect that such applicant is duly inrolled as an attorney-at-law and solicitor therein, and entitled to practise as such; and, further, that no charge or accusation has been established or is pending against him in his professional character, or otherwise affecting his fair fame and repute; and also finding the amount of the stamps (if any) paid by such applicant on his articles of clerkship and on his certificate of admission in the colony.

3. The applicant must also make affidavit that he is resident within the jurisdiction of the superior courts of law and equity in England; and has ceased, for a twelvemonth at the least, in practise as attorney or solicitor in any colonial court of law.

The Act under discussion also contains provisions analogous, in general, to those which are contained in the Attorneys Act for England (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), for the appointment by the Judges or the Master of the Rolls, as the case may require, or by the Judges and the Master of the Rolls jointly, of Examiners; and for making orders and regulations for conducting the required examination into the applicant's qualification, fitness, and capacity to be admitted; and as to the administration to the applicant, after a successful examination, of the same oaths that are taken by attorneys and solicitors in England, and for his subsequent admission and inrolment.

The stamp payable on the first admission of every such applicant is to be of the value of an ordinary admission stamp, together with such further sum as, with the amount certified to have been paid on the articles and admission in the colony, shall be equal to the stamp payable on articles of clerkship in England.

The Act under discussion is not, however, to take effect in any colony or dependency until an Order in Council has issued, directing it to come into operation there; and no such Order is to issue except on the application of the Governor of the colony in question, nor till it be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the conditions above mentioned, as to the system of jurisprudence administered in the colony, and as to the qualifications of and regulations for the admission of attorneys and solicitors there, are fulfilled.

The Act under discussion (which may be cited as "The Colonial Attorneys Relief Act"), although unobjectionable, in our judgment, in point of principle, and though the abuses to which it might give rise are carefully guarded against, cannot, we think, be regarded as a specimen of neat drafting. The 2nd section, for example, is wholly unnecessary, being, in effect, re-enacted in the 7th. Again, by s. 4, the applicant is to make affidavit in such manner as shall be provided by order or regulation to be made by the Judges, &c., "as hereinafter provided." The only provision of the kind is that in the next section, referring to orders and regulations made "for conducting the examination." As the affidavit, apparently, is to be made (for what reason we are at a loss to conceive) at the time of examination, it is probable this will be held sufficient; but it is a clumsy method of expression.

Statute of Frauds.

Ridgway v. Wharton, 5 W. R. 804.

This case, although chiefly remarkable as an illustration of the uncertainties of the law, is not without interest as a legal decision on a rather difficult point arising out of the Statute of Frauds. Ridgway, the plaintiff, was under-tenant of a public-house at Sydenham, which belonged to the defendant, Wharton; and, in the year 1849, he negotiated with the defendant for a new lease, to commence on the expiration of the existing term in 1852. With the exception of one meeting between the principals, the treaty was conducted between Ridgway and one Crawter, the agent of Wharton. After matters had proceeded so far that the defendant had actually given instructions to his solicitor to prepare a lease, the matter was allowed to drop until the existing term was on the point of expiring. In the meantime, the value of the property had been, or was supposed to have been, materially increased by the erection of the Crystal Palace,
