THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 3, 1857.

THE day has come for us to present ourselves before the world, and we shall be judged henceforward by our deeds and not, as we have been, by our professions. The reality of the alleged want of a journal which shall distinctively represent the solicitors will best be proved by the success of our exertions to supply it. We declare emphatically that this our Journal owes its origin to no personal animosity, nor selfish pursuit of peculiar interests, but to the conviction long entertained by solicitors in town and country, that their branch of the legal profession ought to be represented by a newspaper established and conducted by themselves, reflecting their opinions, watching over their interests and reputation, and urging upon the legislature and the nation their just and reasonable demands. The promoters of this enterprise challenge no comparison and seek no rivalry with any other journal. They will thankfully acknowledge and candidly applaud whatever may be done by the press to improve the character, to assert the rights, and to enhance the respectability of the solicitors. All they ask for themselves is, that they may be allowed as freely as other labourers to enter upon a field of duty which they believe to be peculiarly their own. A fair and full trial is all they seek; and if, after the lapse of no long time, it be not felt that they are doing what has not been done so well before, they will be content to own that their intention has been rash, their measures ill-advised, and their labour bestowed in vain.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, which is born this day in London, owes the seeds of its existence to two great provincial towns. At the meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, held at Birmingham in October, 1855, the project of such a newspaper was much discussed and favourably received, and at the meeting of the same body, held at Liverpool in October last, it was felt that under the new law of limited liability the chief difficulties of the undertaking had disappeared. It was determined, therefore, that there should be no more delay; and wishes long felt and frequently expressed by leading members of the profession in town and country, were thereupon put into practical effect. A memorandum of association was signed at Liverpool by five provincial and two metropolitan solicitors. This paper afterwards, for a purely technical reason, was set aside, and another was substituted, which had been prepared in London, and signed by the London solicitors whose names could be most readily obtained. The majority of the declared originators of this journal were therefore, in fact, country solicitors, and the majority of the shareholders in the Company are also country solicitors, as may be seen by the prospectus which we this day publish. The same prospectus will show to all who understand the subject, that the London provisional directors and shareholders belong to every class of business. All interests, both of town and country, are fairly represented in the Company, and will, we hope, be equally regarded and maintained in the columns of our Journal. The general good of the profession is the object for which we now see the light, and when we forget, or prove unfaithful, to our duty, we shall deserve to forfeit the life we have abused.

It will be the duty of this Journal to secure for the solicitor, so far as its power shall extend, the recognition of his fair rights, and proper social character and position. But there is nothing of an aggressive nature in the functions which we thus assume. The claims of the profession which we undertake to advocate, will, as we believe, be conceded by all impartial minds as soon as they are correctly understood. Legal reforms have already brought about great changes in legal practice, and changes far more sweeping are possible at no distant day. The solicitor asks that his remuneration should be equitably adapted to the labour and responsibility that falls on him under the altered system. He is as ready to admit, as his most ignorant assailants are to assert, that, at present, he is sometimes paid for work which he does not perform. Such payment he is willing and anxious to relinquish, and he only asks in return that he may be fairly paid for the work which he actually does. Again, the solicitor complains that, however fit he may be for certain offices, he is excluded from them, while, at the same time, a merely nominal qualification may obtain those offices for the barrister. Now, if a certain duty would be best discharged by a skilful and experienced solicitor, we say that such a person should be sought to fill it. If, again, the learning and practice of a barrister be thought to qualify him best for particular functions, we say that that barrister should be selected to undertake them. All we contend for is, that one man is not to be excluded simply because he is a solicitor, nor is another man to be chosen simply because he is member of the bar. Let the highest qualifications always decide between rival claimants and classes of claimants. In this way the public advantage will be best secured, and professional jealousies will be assuaged by reference to a rule, that will solve every controversy and promote alike the interests of every class.

The social estimation of solicitors must depend upon their own efforts after self-improvement, and upon the growth in the public mind of a conviction that the body of the profession is as upright and public spirited as the individual members of it are generally known to be by those who have the means of judging of them. In advancement of this object, it will be our duty to point out, from time to time, what has been done and is now doing by solicitors to amend our laws and the procedure of our courts. We shall show that while solicitors have opposed crude projects of law reform, their resistance has been grounded on true principles and not upon a short-sighted estimate of their own interests, as has been sometimes imputed to them. And we shall also show, that where judicious changes in the law have been at length effected, the movement has either been originated or materially assisted by that practical knowledge of the working of legal machinery which is the peculiar province of the solicitor. We shall urge upon parents who destine their children for solicitors, to take care that they prepare them for learning aright their professional duties by a good and complete preliminary education before clerkship. The solicitor often becomes in the course of business the confidential friend of men of the highest mental culture and refinement, and therefore he should be fitted by education to be a worthy depository of their confidence. And if the solicitor hopes to claim successfully a share of the higher honours and rewards that await the lawyer, he must ground his claim upon his professional attainments, and these upon a previous training of longer duration and wider scope than he has hitherto, in general, received.

That which is for the general good is best for individuals and classes, and the interest of the client is the same thing as the interest of the lawyer of every grade. By this principle we propose to try all questions, and, we believe that, if fairly applied, it will suffice for their solution. And if, in time, we can convince the public that this is the rule which guides our efforts, we shall be sure of obtaining for the body we undertake to represent, a fair and impartial investigation of whatever claims it may have to urge. It must always be remembered that the duty of this Journal is not only to convince solicitors that their demands are just, but to convince the world at large, and this we can only hope to do by establishing a reputation for full and free inquiry, for fair and unbiassed judgment, and frank uncompromising declaration of the conclusions at which we have arrived. And, lastly, let us repeat as distinctly as we can, that this Journal will study to represent solicitors generally, whether in town or country, and it will look to the profession everywhere for aid as extensive as the objects it proposes to attain. We confidently appeal to all provincial law societies, and to all solicitors individually, for that sympathy and co-operation with our Journal which will be the surest guarantee for its success.

AMONG the projects of law reform which the new Attorney-General has pledged himself to introduce in the next session, is a comprehensive scheme of registration. If we were to expect only a repetition of the attempts which have been made and defeated over and over again during the last quarter of a century, we should not think the probabilities of success, or the value of the proposed change, sufficient to deserve any very lengthened consideration. The truth is, that the history of the various schemes which have been devised for the purpose of establishing a general registry of all assurances affecting land, proves only the extreme difficulty—we might almost say the utter impracticability—of framing a working system, and the insignificance of the benefits to be derived from it when compared with the certain addition to the trouble and expense of investigating titles, which it would inevitably involve. But the movement has now entered upon an entirely new phase, and one which invites the special attention of all who are concerned in the intricate business of conducting the transfer of real estate. From the elaborate scheme propounded twenty-five years ago by that eminent conveyancer Mr. Duval, down to the last registration bill which was introduced by the present Lord Chancellor, every project which has been brought forward has been founded on the notion of having a complete registry, either central or local, of every deed by which property in land may be affected. If the mere mechanical and practical difficulties could be got over, the result of such legislation as has been proposed would be to load every abstract with a multitude of instruments which, when they have done their office, are on the present system kept off the face of the title. Once on the register a deed would be there for ever, and a purchaser would be compelled to investigate a long series of transactions for no other purpose than to see that they have ultimately produced no effect on the title to the land which he intends to purchase. It is not only in this way that the cost of conveyancing business would be increased, for on every purchase, however small in amount, there would be incurred the extra expense attending the act of registration, including, probably, the cost of a journey by a professional man either to London or, at least, to the central county register office, if a local system shonld be adopted. A further inconvenience of a serious kind would be felt in the publicity given to equitable mortgages, and in the necessity of a formal assurance in the place of the mere deposit of deeds with or without an accompanying memorandum by which loans to an enormous amount are now cheaply and expeditiously effected, without any revelation of the transactions to the curiosity of the world at large. The solitary advantages to be set against these serious evils is the additional security which would be afforded against one species of fraud—the suppression of deeds—which, as Lord St. LEONARDS, Mr. JARMAN, and other men of the largest experience have testified, is of the rarest possible occurrence. These considerations are sufficient to show that the registration of assurances, if superadded to our present system of conveyancing, would have the effect of largely increasing the expense which even now seriously impedes the free transfer of real property, without affording any adequate advantage in return.

But this is by no means the only objection to such bills as that of Lord Cranworth in 1853. They are not only of very questionable utility, but they would be found impossible to work. It is true that we have partial registries at present, but these are acknowledged to be insufficient for the purposes contemplated by the advocates of a general registration of deeds, and no detailed scheme has ever been devised by which those purposes could be effectually attained. Indexing may be thought to be simple though laborious work, but a moment's consideration of the requisites of an index of assurances will show how vast are the difficulties which it presents. Let it be supposed, by way of example, that an estate was originally vested in A, that by his will he left it among his sons, B, C, and D for life, with remainders over to their children, and that he charged it with portions for his daughters E, F, and G. Each of the sons may make a new disposition of his interest on marriage, or may raise money upon it by a series of mortgages, or suffer judgments, or become bankrupt, and by every such step will introduce a new set of legal or equitable claimants on the estate. In this way we may soon run through a whole alphabet of names, all of which must be referred to before it can be ascertained how the various rights may appear on the face of the registry. Besides this a number of incidental privileges or estates may affect the general title. There may be a right of way in favour of an adjoining tenement, and portions of the property may be let on building leases, or occupied by farming tenants. Then there may be complicated shifting clauses, or it may happen that the estate gets cut up, and that different portions of it flow in different directions. New land may be purchased on one side, old fields may be parted with on another. Boundaries may become doubtful, and the right to portions of the property may remain in abeyance pending the settlement of a disputed contract. Imagine a registrar, or what would be the actual case, a poorly-paid registrar's clerk, having to frame an index relating to such an estate which should be comprehensive enough to include everything relating to the title, and so perfect and manageable as to preclude the possibility of error on any occasion when a search may be required. It is tolerably clear that, without a map system as the basis, many of the entries on the registry would never be ascertained to refer to the particular estate in question, while, if the index were framed with reference to a general map, the mixture of interests affecting different estates, and the frequent changes in the physical condition of property would lay a foundation for abundance of ruinous mistakes.

The select committee to which Lord CRANWORTH'S bill was referred fortunately extended their inquiry beyond the narrow question of a registry of deeds. A large and simple scheme for the registry, not of deeds, but of title, or legal ownership, was brought before them, and in the confidence that, if fully developed and made capable of easy operation, it would solve the great problem of combining facility of transfer with simplicity and security of title, the committee recommended the appointment of a commission for the purpose of considering the subject of registration of title as distinguished from registration of deeds. It is understood that the bill to be introduced by the Attorney-General will be founded upon the report of the commission, which is shortly expected to appear. Until we have their views before us, it would be premature to discuss the merits of the scheme. This much may be said of the general principle, that it is exactly the reverse of that to which the objections we have mentioned are applicable, and that, instead of endeavouring to form a record of every interest that may affect an estate, the leading idea is to admit to registration the title of one owner only of the legal estate, and to leave all subordinate interests very much in the same position as if the subject matter were stock instead of land. By adopting this principle, all the practical difficulties we have referred to would be got rid of, and the extreme simplicity of the register would ensure the entire accuracy without which any registration would do far more harm than good.

It is proposed that the registered owner should (subject to the right of all interested persons to put a distringas on the land) have the same power of effectually transferring the estate to a purchaser, as is now possessed by the legal proprietor of stock. Such a system would, in fact, convert all interests, short of a fee, into equitable estates, and would, when it came into full operation, sweep away all the complications with which the title to land is now encumbered. The old practice must of course continue so far as the title anterior to the first registration is concerned; but in the course of a generation or two the last fragment of feudalism would have disappeared. The only question which can be raised will be, whether the immense advantages of such a change can be obtained without risking the security of estates in land. The promoters of the scheme contend, with much reason, that settlements of stock are nearly if not quite as safe as those of land, and that the position of registered owners would give them no more power than is now enjoyed by mortgagees or trustees with a power of sale. A regular system of caveats is also relied on as a further protection; but we must await the appearance of the report before entering more fully into the question of the sufficiency of the proposed safeguards.

Summary of Legal News.

AT the Birmingham Quarter Sessions, which commenced on Monday, the Recorder, Mr. M. D. HILL, made some valuable remarks on transportation and the system of tickets-of-leave, a subject upon which there is just now some danger that unreasoning terror may prevail over common-sense and humanity in the public mind. Mr. HILL reproves us for giving too much care to what he calls "the luxuries of society," unmindful of its necessaries. We are intent, in general, upon debates in Parliament, on mechanical inventions, and the glories of art and science, and if an obscure paragraph in the newspaper records an outrageous burglary we care but little for it. But just now the public has been seized with a spasmodic fit of energy in repressing crime, and clamours for a severity from which it may be expected speedily to repent. "The tide," says Mr. HILL, "has not really turned." A careless observer, watching the waters for a brief period, might think so, but soon he would be convinced of his mistake. Crime, Mr. HILL predicts, and we hope rightly, will slacken; newer topics will arrest attention; and then the former distaste for severe punishments will regain its hold. He reminds us that our prisons, formerly abodes of pestilence, had become far more comfortable than the dwellings of many honest labourers, and that transportation was well known to lead often to high prosperity, and still our yearning after clemency was unappeased. So it has been, and so it is likely to be again. We ought to aim at depriving our criminals of the power of again offending, until we have some proof that their habits and dispositions have been really and effectively changed. And if the discipline of the gaol fails to produce this effect, then Mr. HILL declares it to be unquestionably right that seclusion should continue even for life. It is to be feared, however, that upon this most difficult of all questions our new adviser helps us as little as those we have heard before. Who is to judge when that real change of heart has taken place which will fit the convict to return to the society he has wronged? Chaplains undertook the task, and humanitarians applauded the attempt; but now the cry is that hypocrisy has been too much for zeal and charity. Shall we shut up all our criminals for life, or, if not, whom shall we trust to decide when they shall be set at large?

Mr. HILL, of course, does not join those who clamour for a return to transportation without considering what transportation means. The hope of reformation can only be entertained where the criminals are sent to thriving colonies. But such colonies naturally object to receive our criminals, and if transportation only means penal labour under restraint, we may manage that more cheaply and efficiently at home. Undoubtedly, if we establish a penal settlement in the antipodes, it is likely that what are called "expirees," will trouble our colonies or other states rather than our remote selves. But, if those who now cry out for transportation really mean this, it would only be honest in them to say so, and then we should have an opportunity of hearing what the world in general has to say upon this plan of outfall for our moral sewage. On the whole, Mr. HILL advises us to take a lesson from our neighbours, who, not having had dependencies which they might infest with transported criminals, have been compelled to manage as best they might at home.

The scale of fees to be allowed on business in Chancery is still unsettled, and it may be feared that, unless some conclusion be arrived at before term begins, another long postponement may take place. There are certain indications that the same question may arise in another way, and that at no distant period the whole subject of the remuneration of solicitors will have to be considered and re-adjusted. At present, the fees for conveyancing business depend in a great degree upon the length of deeds. But if ever the time should come when long deeds are likely to be dispensed with, it will behove the profession to deliberate maturely how their services should thenceforth be recompensed, and to act unanimously upon their conclusions.

We understand that Tuesday, the 20th instant, has been appointed for the examination of candidates for admission as solicitors. When we publish the questions we shall endeavour to indicate, for the guidance of students, what are the defects most commonly disclosed by examination, and by what course of reading and mental discipline proficiency is most likely to be attained.

Yesterday the Lord CHANCELLOR and Lord Justice TURNER sat specially to hear an application on behalf of shareholders in the Royal British Bank for the appointment of a receiver, and agreed in refusing the application. The result of this decision is, that every creditor is left to bring his action against every shareholder, and there will be a mere scramble for priority of execution. Ruin and bankruptcy therefore impend over these unlucky shareholders, many of whom, perhaps, have no other serious liabilities than those brought upon them by their connection with this Bank. And yet it is probable that if time were given, and if the assignees had power to represent all the creditors, and to bind them all, the debts of the bank might ultimately have been paid in full.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

THERE have already been several applications to the court under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43—the act which enables infants, with the approbation of the Court of Chancery, to make binding settlements of their real and personal estate. It has not yet, however, been definitely settled what is the effect of an application under the act by a female infant; whether, by such application, she becomes a ward of the court to all intents and purposes; and whether, therefore, it is the duty of the court to look, not only to the propriety of any proposed settlement in contemplation of marriage, but also to the propriety of the proposed marriage itself. Vice Chancellor Stuart strongly inclines to the latter opinion; and the Master of the Rolls also, it was said, in a recent application on the subject to the Court of Appeal. There appears to be some difference of opinion between the members of the appellate court as to the construction and effect of the act in this respect, the Lord Chancellor apparently leaning to the opinion that the court is to look only at the settlement, and has no jurisdiction to inquire into the circumstances of the marriage. The difficulty has been overcome hitherto by the petition in each case being supported by evidence to satisfy the court that the marriage was a proper one.—In Re Strong, 5 W. R. 107.

Several important decisions affecting solicitors have been given in the courts of equity since the long vacation. Barnard v. Hunter, 5 W. R. 92, is useful as an illustration of the onus probandi in transactions between a solicitor and his client, in a case where the names of other solicitors were introduced in the transactions; but it did not appear that they had given their nominal client the benefit of their advice. The onus probandi, in all cases, is on a solicitor dealing with his client that the client had due professional assistance. In Blagrave v. Routh, 5 W. R. 95. a solicitor obtained from his client a mortgage to secure costs, the amount of which had been estimated, but the bill had not been then delivered, though it was shortly afterwards. After a lapse of more than five years, the client filed his bill to open the accounts and set aside the security, simply on the ground that the plaintiff had discovered errors in the bill, and of a general allegation of improper charges, neither fraud nor pressure being alleged. The Lords Justices affirmed Vice-Chancellor Wood's decree which dismissed the bill.

There have been two judgments recently delivered by the Master of the Rolls upon cases so well calculated to illustrate the law upon the execution of powers, by general testamentary bequests, that they might almost be supposed to have been manufactured for that express purpose. These were Evans v. Evans, and Shelford v. Acland. In each case a married woman was the donee of a power over a money fund of which she enjoyed the income for her separate use. Both ladies were also entitled to reversionary interests in other funds which did not, in either case, fall into possession. Neither of them had any other property except such proportion of the separate income as had accrued since the last half yearly payment. The only difference in the position of the two was that in Evans v. Evans the wife had a special power, subject to her husband's life interest, to appoint among children, of whom she had three, while in Shelford v. Acland the power was a general one in default of children, of whom there were none. Mrs. Evans died in her husband's life time, leaving a will which she declared to be a disposition of all the property and income she then was or thereafter might become possessed of, and by which she gave all her property to her husband for life with remainder to the children equally and other gifts over. The will contained no reference to the power—and as the power was a special one the Wills Act did not assist the gift. Moreover there was a trifling amount of separate income due, and also the contingent reversionary interest which ultimately failed. These were, however, considered as sufficient to satisfy the words of the will, and to shut out the construction that must otherwise have established it as an execution of the power for want of any other operation to give it. The result was, that a sum of less than £100 was held to be settled on the husband and children, and the fund of several thousands went over in default of appointment.

In the other case, the lady, instead of disposing of her property by a general gift, made a will, simply giving £2600, being about the value of the settled fund, to her husband. There was no way in which this will could operate except as an execution of the power, and the rather curious consequence was, that under circumstances almost identical, a pecuniary bequest did operate as an execution of a power, while a general bequest failed of effect.

Both cases were decided independently of the statute on the general doctrine, that a bequest not referring to a power will execute it where no other operation can be given to the will, but not otherwise. In the case of Shelford v. Acland, however, the Master of the Rolls intimated his opinion that the 27th section of the statute, which makes a bequest of personal property described in general terms a good execution of a general power, might properly be referred to in aid of the construction of a will where the bequest took the form of a mere pecuniary legacy. Whether such a legacy is strictly within the language of the Wills Act "a bequest of personal property described in general terms," is a point scarcely yet settled, upon which the Master of the Rolls declined to express an opinion. It has been so held in the course of the present year by Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and if that decision should become the law of the court, many cases of disappointment of the intentions of testators will be avoided. Meanwhile the practitioner should be careful not to rely too much on this liberal reading of the statute, and to remove all doubts by carefully referring in such cases to the power under which the bequest may be intended to operate. In our next number we purpose to notice Hesse v. Briant, and some other recent decisions bearing on the practical business of a solicitor's office.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ATTORNEY, PRIVILEGES OF.

Grace v. Wilmer, 5 W. R. Q. B. 47; 26 L. J. (N. S.) Q. B. 1.

According to the decision in this case, an attorney has still an absolute privilege to lay, and retain, the venue in Middlesex, provided he sues in person. This privilege, it was held, has not been taken away, either by the Uniformity of Process Act or by the Rules of Hilary Term, 1853, as to change of venue. It was intimated, however, by the court that they considered the privilege as an unfair one under existing circumstances, and that it would probably be taken away by a rule made for that purpose.

ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP DEFECTIVELY STAMPED.

Exparte Norton, 5 W. R. Q. B. 6; 26 L. J. (N. S.) Q. B, 24.

On this application it appeared that F. N. had been articled to his father, an attorney, in 1844, but, after serving for three years, found out for the first time that the articles had been neither stamped, filed, nor enrolled. Subsequently, in May, 1854, F. N. entered into fresh articles with another attorney; paid the present duty on them; served under them; and the Lords of the Treasury stamped the old articles under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 83, on his paying the difference between the present and the former duty on articles. Under these circumstances, Crompton, J., granted a rule, absolute in the first instance, that the service of F. N. should be computed from the day on which the first articles had been executed, notwithstanding the affidavit of execution was not filed within six months, as required by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 8.

In addition to the above case, two other applications recently disposed of by the same judge, may be noticed as showing the anxiety with which the practice enjoined by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, will be watched, so as to avoid injustice in particular cases o irregularity where no blame attaches to the applicant. In th first of these, Exparte Barnard, see 5 W. R. 20, the service of the clerk was allowed to date from the execution of the articles, although the master, in his affidavit of such execution, stated himself to be "an attorney," without going on to state that he was "duly admitted." And, in the second, Exparte Jones, 5 W. R. 68, the same permission was accorded to a clerk whose articles had been enrolled in a palatinate court only, on his payment of the additional duty of £20. In this case, indeed, Mr. Justice Crampton doubted whether the application was necessary.

PAYMENT FOR CLIENT.

Lucas v. Wilkinson, 26 L. J. (N. S.) Exch. 13.

M., a solicitor, acted as such both for A. and B. In the year 1853, A. having occasion for a sum of £200, M. procured it from B., the money being secured by A.'s bond. In April, 1855, M. received, in his capacity of general agent for A. in his pecuniary affairs, the sum of £2,000 on A.'s account. Shortly afterwards, in June the same year, B. informed M. that repayment of the £200 was required. On this M. (without the knowledge of A.) paid off B. by money he borrowed from C. for that purpose, and deposited with C. the bond given by A. to B. as security. Soon after M. died, in embarrassed circumstances. On this C sued A. on the bond, in the name of B., and A. pleaded payment. The Court of Exchequer, however, held unanimously that M having had no direction from A. to apply part of his money in M's possession to the payment of B., the bond was not satisfied; and a rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiff was made absolute.

MAGISTRATES'-CLERK, FEES OF.

Bowman v. Blythe, 5 W. R. Q. B. 86.

This was an action for penalties under 26 Geo. 2, c. 14 s. 2, against a magistrate's-clerk, for taking fees not authorised by the "Table of Fees," made under the above statute. The plaintiff had been charged with an offence before the magistrates of the county of N., and (in the absence of the defendant) had been bound, himself and one surety (instead of two as was usual) to appear again. At the day appointed he was committed for trial; was bound himself with two sureties to surrender; and was, in due course, tried and acquitted. He was charged by the defendant (who supposed that both on the occasion of the remand and of the committal there had been three recognisors) for six recognisances, though, as was usual, two parchments only were used; one for the remand and the other for the committal. According to the "Table of Fees," by which the defendant went, he had a right so to charge, except in his demand for three recognisances on the first occasion, which he made from mistaking the facts. But this table had been made at the Midsummer Sessions in 1837; was submitted for approval to the succeeding Michaelmas Sessions; was adjourned to, and finally approved at, the ensuing Epiphany Sessions in 1838, and was afterwards confirmed at the Spring Assizes in the same year: whereas, by 26 Geo. 2, c. 14 (the act in force for settling fees to be taken by justices'-clerks prior to 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), it was provided that a table of such fees made at one sessions, and approved at the next, should be laid before the judges at the then following assizes, and that act imposed penalties on any person demanding other or greater fees than were contained in a table so made, "under pretence" of anything done as clerk, &c. Under these circumstances, the Court of Queen's Bench held, first, (on the authority of Regina v. Dobson, 7 East. 222) that the defendant had committed no offence under the statute, in charging for three recognizances instead of two on the occasion of the remand, as he had not acted malo animo, but under a mistake of the facts; and, in the next place, they held, that the table of fees in question was not a valid one, as it had not been approved at the "next" sessions according to the provisions of the act; that, therefore, the action brought could not be sustained, and that, consequently, the verdict must be entered for the defendant.

LONG VACATION; TIME TO PLEAD.

Sharp v. Fox, 5 W. R. Encl. 136.

In this case the declaration, with a notice to plead in eight days otherwise judgment, was delivered on Friday, 1st August; and, consequently, the eight days expired on Saturday, 9th August. The defendant delivered pleas on the Saturday, after two o'clock in the afternoon, and the plaintiff signed judgment for want of a plea, on the following Tuesday. It was now moved to set the judgment aside; but Mr. Baron Bramwell refused to disturb it, on the ground that (by Reg. Gen. E. T., 1856) the service on the Saturday must be taken as having been made on the Monday, 11th August, and that such service being in the time of the Long Vacation, was, by the Uniformity of Process Act, a nullity.

Rules of Court.

RULES AND ORDERS FOR REGULATING THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS; AND FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS THEREIN.

INDEX TO RULES AND ORDERS.

WHEREAS by an act passed in the twentieth year of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the Acts relating to the County Courts," it is enacted, that "the Lord Chancellor may appoint five county court judges, and from time to time fill up any vacancies in their number, to frame rules and orders for regulating the practice of the courts, and forms of proceedings therein, and from time to time to amend such rules, orders, and forms; and such rules, orders, and forms, or amended rules, orders, and forms, certified under the hands of such judges, or any three or more of them, shall be submitted to the Lord Chancellor, who may allow or disallow or alter the same; and the rules, orders, and forms, or amended rules, orders, and forms, so allowed or altered, shall, from a day to be named by the Lord Chancellor, be in force in every county court:"

And whereas, by virtue and in exercise of the power for that purpose given to the Lord Chancellor by the said recited Act, the undersigned James Manning, the Queen's Ancient Serjeant-at-Law, John Herbert Koe, one of her Majesty's Counsel, Edward Cooke, John Worlledge, and William Furner, Esquires, were, on the second day of August, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six, appointed by the Lord Chancellor to frame such rules and orders, as to them should seem expedient, for regulating the practice of the courts, and forms of proceedings therein.

In pursuance of the powers thereby vested in us, we, the said James Manning, John Herbert Koe, Edward Cooke, John Worlledge, and William Furner, have framed the following rules, orders, and forms, and we do hereby certify the same to the Lord Chancellor accordingly:—

J. MANNING,
J. H. KOE,
E. COOKE.
J. WORLLEDGE,
W. FURNER.

1. The rules of practice and the forms now in use in the county courts, except in proceedings under the Charitable Trusts Acts, shall, on and from the first day of January, 1857, cease to be used, and in lieu thereof the following shall on and from such day be the rules, orders, and forms adopted and used in the said courts.

Sittings of the Courts.

2. Every judge shall appoint the days and hours for holding his courts; and a notice of the day and hour on which each court will be holden, shall, three calendar months before the holding thereof, be affixed in some conspicuous place in the court-house, and in the registrar's office; and whenever any day or hour so appointed for holding the court shall be altered, notice of such alteration shall immediately be posted in like manner; but any judge may from time to time hold additional and adjourned courts.

3. Two courts shall not be holden before the same judge on one day, unless with the consent of the Lord Chancellor; but this rule shall not apply to the holding of an adjourned court.

Interpretation.

4. In these rules the words "home court" shall mean the court from which process is originally issued; and the words "foreign court" shall mean the court of the district into which process is issued from another court; and the words "home district" shall mean the district of the home court; and the words "foreign district" shall mean the district of the foreign court; and the words "on oath" shall mean "on oath viva voce or by affidavit;" and unless there be something in the context inconsistent therewith, the provisions of sec. 142 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 shall apply to the interpretation of these rules.

Infant.

5. Where an infant applies to enter a plaint for any cause of action (other than for wages or piece-work, or for work as a servant) he shall procure the attendance of a next friend, at the office of the registrar at the time of entering the plaint; and no plaint shall be entered until the next friend has undertaken, in the form set forth in the schedule, to be responsible for costs, who, on entering into such undertaking, shall be liable in the same manner, and to the same extent as if he were a plaintiff in an ordinary suit; and the cause shall proceed in the name of the infant by such next friend, and the undertaking shall be filed by the registrar; but no order of the court shall be necessary for the appointment of such next friend. If the plaintiff fail in, or discontinue his suit, and do not pay the amount of costs awarded by the court to be paid by him to the defendant, proceedings may be taken for the recovery of such amount from the next friend as for the recovery of any debt ordered to be paid by the court.

Registrar's Duties.

6. The registrar shall keep an office at each place where the court of which he is registrar is holden, and such office shall be kept open every day from ten o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon, except on Christmas-day, Good Friday, or any day appointed by royal proclamation for a public fast, humiliation, or thanksgiving, and except also on Saturdays, on which day the office may be closed at one o'clock in the afternoon; provided always, that where Saturday is the market day of the town in which the court is holden, the office may be closed at one o'clock on some other day of the week instead of Saturday, and when any day is fixed upon for such purpose, it shall not afterwards be changed except by leave of the judge.

7. The registrar shall keep the books in the forms set forth in the schedule; and every entry in such books shall have a number prefixed, corresponding with the number of the plaint to which the entry relates.

8. Whenever the registrar, or his lawful deputy, is absent from the court, the judge shall appoint a deputy to act on behalf of the registrar; and an entry of such appointment, and the cause of such absence (if known), shall be made on the minutes of the court.

9. Whenever a registrar appoints a deputy, the reason of such appointment shall be entered on the minutes of each court for which such deputy acts.

10. The duties of acting in court as registrar, signing the minute book, taking affidavits, granting permission to sue under sect. 15 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, and acting under "The Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855," shall be performed by the registrar, or by his lawful deputy.

11. The registrar of the court shall issue all summonses and warrants to the bailiff forthwith after the plaints are entered or warrants applied for.

12. Where a summons is required to be served in a foreign district, the registrar shall transmit the same, and a copy thereof, to the bailiff of the foreign court, with a letter, according to the form in the schedule, unless the judge of the home court shall order the summons in that particular case to be served by the bailiff of the home court; and if the summons be returned to the registrar by the high bailiff of the foreign court not served, the registrar shall forthwith give notice to the plaintiff of such non-service.

13. The registrar shall, in all cases where a summons is to be served in a foreign district, require the plaintiff to pay the fee of one shilling for the oath under sect. 62 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and shall pay over the same to the treasurer of his court at such times and in such manner as may be directed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

14. The registrar shall, in all cases where by these rules particulars are required, annex to the summons a copy of the plaintiff's particulars, sealed with the seal of the court; and shall also make and deliver to the bailiff a true copy of the summons for indorsement, as required by rule 25.

15. The registrar shall enter in the "Notice Book" all notices and letters sent by him, and all particulars required by the form of such book.

16. Searches may be made and the money to which suitors are entitled shall be paid out upon demand (in cash if required), on three days, at the least, in each week, such days to be fixed by the registrar from time to time with the approbation of the judge, and to be printed or written on the plaint note; provided that, for the purpose of enabling the registrar to furnish the list of balances in the ledgers according to the requirements of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, no searches shall be made or money paid out of court during one week in each year, of which week due notice shall be affixed in some conspicuous place in the office of the registrar.

17. Whenever money is paid into or deposited in court, whether before or after judgment, an acknowledgment in writing of such payment or deposit shall be given on the summons or on the order, but such acknowledgment need not bear a receipt stamp.

18. All the books of the court, including the bankers' book and cash book, shall at all times be open to the inspection of the treasurer.

19. No registrar, deputy registrar, registrar's clerk, bailiff, broker, or other officer of the court, and no partner or clerk of any such officer, shall, on account of suitors, sign the ledger, or any other book, or receive money, or otherwise act as an agent for that purpose.

21. Whenever the high bailiff does not attend any sitting of the court, the cause of his absence shall be entered by the registrar on the minutes of the next succeeding court.

22. The high bailiff shall keep books and make returns in the forms set forth in the schedule.

23. The high bailiff or an under bailiff of the court shall attend, for the purpose of receiving summonses, or for the performance of other duties, at the office of the registrar, once at least every day; and shall compare and examine the copy of each summons delivered to him by the registrar, so as to enable him to prove its correctness.

24. The high bailiff shall serve or cause to be served process sent to him for service from other Courts, and where he shall be unable to swear the affidavit of service or non-service before the judge or registrar, he shall be re-paid by the treasurer of his court, the one shilling paid by him to the commissioner for taking the affidavit.

25. If the service of the summons has been personal, the bailiff who served the same shall indorse on the copy of the summons delivered to him by the registrar, the fact and mode of such service; and if the service has not been personal, he shall indorse on the copy of the summons the statement which has been made by the person to whom the summons was delivered, or other circumstances from which it may be inferred that the service of the summons has come to the knowledge of the defendant, and if the summons has not been served, the bailiff shall indorse on such copy the fact, and the reason of of such non-service, and shall deliver it to the registrar with the list of summonses mentioned in the next rule but one, unless the judge shall otherwise order, and such copy shall be produced at the time of the trial by the registrar or high bailiff, as the judge may require.

26. Where the summons is required to be served in a foreign district by the bailiff of that district, he shall, nine days at least before the return-day of the summons, transmit the copy thereof to the registrar of the home court, with an affidavit of the service, if the summons has been served; and if it has not been served, he shall return the summons with an affidavit stating why it has not been served, and the affidavit shall state the same particulars as to service or non-service as are required by the last rule to be indorsed on a summons; and if such affidavit be defective the bailiff shall amend the same at his own expense in conformity with the direction of the judge of the home court.

27. Eight days before the day of holding any court the high bailiff shall deliver to the registrar a list of all summonses on plaints before judgment, issued to him, returnable at such court, and such return shall state the mode of service or the cause of non-service of each summons, and the high bailiff shall, at the same time, unless the judge shall otherwise order, deliver to the registrar the copy of every such summons which has been served, and the summons itself when not served.

28. Where a summons has not been served, and the summons remains in the hands of the Bailiff, he shall, at the time of making out the list aforesaid, give notice to the plaintiff of the fact of such non-service in the form set forth in the schedule.

29. The high bailiff shall enter in "The Order Book" all orders for the payment of money or costs, or both, which he shall have received, and the date on which he shall have caused the same to be posted.

30. The high bailiff shall enter in "The High Bailiff's Warrant Book" every warrant which he has been required to execute, and shall state from time to time therein what he shall have done under each warrant, and if the same be not executed within one calendar month from the day of its delivery to him, why it was not executed; and the high bailiff shall, at all reasonable times, give to a suitor every information that he may reasonably require as to the execution or non-execution of any warrant, which has been issued at his instance.

31. Every bailiff levying or receiving any money by virtue of any process issuing out of the court of which he is bailiff, shall, within twenty-four hours from the receipt thereof, pay over the same to the registrar of such court, and shall file such process and retain the same in his custody.

32. Whenever a warrant required to be executed in a foreign district has not been executed within one calendar month from the day of its delivery, the bailiff of the foreign court shall, on the day after the termination of such month, make a return to the registrar of the home court of what he shall have done under such warrant, and why it has not been executed; and when the same warrant has not been executed during the time that it is in force, such bailiff shall return the same to the registrar of the home court within twenty-four hours from the expiration of such time, and shall indorse on such warrant the reason why the same could not be executed, and he shall sign such endorsement, but the bailiff shall return such warrant to the home court at any time, although unexecuted, if he shall be directed to do so by the registrar of the home court, or shall give such information as such registrar may require in the matter of the warrant.

Plaint.

33. Every plaint shall be entered in the "Plaint Book" before issuing the summons.

34. Where the plaintiff is unacquainted with the defendant's Christian name, the defendant may be described by his surname, or by his surname and the initial of his Christian name, or by such name as he is generally known by, and the defendant may be so described in the summons; and in the event of the plaintiff or defendant not appearing, the proceedings under sects. 79 & 80 of 9 & 10 Vic. c. 95 may be taken as if the true Christian name and surname had been stated in the summons, and all subsequent proceedings thereon may be taken in conformity with such description, but without prejudice to any amendment made at any future time by direction of the judge.

Particulars.

35. On entering the plaint, the plaintiff shall in all cases, where the sum sought to be recovered shall exceed forty shillings, deliver at the office of the registrar as many copies of a statement of the particulars of his demand or cause of action as there are defendants, and an additional copy to be filed, and where the demand exceeds fifty pounds, but the plaintiff desires to abandon the excess or to admit a set-off, and sues in a county court for the residue, the abandonment, or the admission of the set-off shall be entered on the particulars before service; and in all cases the particulars shall be deemed part of the summons.

36. In actions for penalties to secure the performance of covenants, within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, the plaintiff shall deliver particulars of the breaches on which he relies, in the same manner as required by the last rule, which, when delivered, shall be deemed part of the summons; and if the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, judgment shall be entered for the penalty, where the penalty does not exceed the amount over which the court has jurisdiction; and where the penalty does exceed such amount, then for the amount over which the court has jurisdiction, and an entry shall be made on the minutes, of the damages awarded to the plaintiff, and execution may issue for the amount of such damages; and in case of subsequent breaches, the plaintiff may enter a plaint and sue out a summons in the nature of a scire facias on such judgment, and shall deliver particulars of such subsequent breaches in the manner before mentioned, and which shall be deemed part of such summons.

37. If the amount claimed in any case include a fraction of a penny, such fraction shall not be entered in the books of the court, and judgment shall not be given for such fraction.

Plaint Note.

38. At the time of entering the plaint, the registrar shall give to the plaintiff, or his attorney, or agent a note under the seal of the court, according to the form in the schedule; and no money shall be paid out of court to the plaintiff or his attorney or agent, unless on production of such note, provided, that in the event of such note being lost or destroyed no money shall be paid to any person unless it be proved on oath to the satisfaction of the registrar that the person applying is the plaintiff or his agent authorised in that behalf.

Summons to appear to a Plaint.

39. The summons to appear to a plaint shall be in the form set forth in the schedule, and shall be dated of the day on which the plaint was entered, and the date thereof shall be the commencement of the suit.

40. Such summons may be returnable either at the next court after the entry of the plaint, or by leave of the court or registrar at any subsequent court to be held within three calendar months.

41. The registrar shall not issue a summons under section 15 of 19 & 20 Vic. c. 108, unless he is satisfied by statement on oath that the party applying has a cause of action, and that the whole of such cause arose within the home district.

42. Where a summons is issued by leave of the judge or registrar, the words "by leave of the court" or "by leave of the registrar," as the case may be, shall be written on the face of the summons.

43. Where a summons has not been served, successive summonses may be issued without entering a new plaint, unless the non-service has been caused by the fact of the defendant's having removed from the address given before the entry of the plaint, or unless the plaintiff shall have given a wrong or insufficient address, but if the bailiff shall ascertain that the defendant has removed to some other place within the district of the court, he shall serve the summons at such other place, indorsing on the copy thereof the new address; and the successive summons or summonses shall bear the same date and number as the summons first issued, which date and number shall be written in red ink in the "Plaint Book," and such summonses shall be a continuance of the first summons; provided that no successive summons shall be issued on a plaint which has been entered more than three months.

Service of Summons to appear to a Plaint.

44. A summons to appear to a plaint, where it is to be served in the home district, should, in order to ensure its service, be delivered to the bailiff at least twelve clear days, and where it is to be served in a foreign district, fifteen clear days, but it shall, in either case, be served at least ten clear days, before the return-day thereof; provided that a summons may be issued at any time before the return-day, on production by the plaintiff to the registrar of an affidavit showing that the defendant is about to remove out of the ordinary jurisdiction of the court; and service of such summons at any time before the return day may be deemed good service, if, at the hearing, the judge is satisfied on the evidence on oath before him, that such party was about to remove out of the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, but in every such case, whether such proof be given or not, the judge may, in his discretion, and on such terms as he shall think fit, adjourn the hearing.

45. The service of the summons, except in the cases hereinafter specially provided for, shall be either personal, or by delivering the same to some person, apparently sixteen years old, at the house or place of dwelling or place of business of the defendant; but no place of business shall be deemed the place of business of the defendant unless he shall be the master or one of the masters thereof.

46. Where a defendant is living or serving on board of any ship or vessel, it shall be sufficient service to deliver the summons to the person on board who is, at the time of such service, apparently in charge of such ship or vessel.

47. Where a defendant is residing or quartered in any barracks, and serving her Majesty as a soldier or marine, it shall be sufficient service to deliver the summons at the barracks to the adjutant of the corps, or to any officer or serjeant of the company or troop to which such soldier or marine belongs.

48. Where a defendant is a prisoner in a gaol, it shall be sufficient service to deliver the summons at the gaol to the governor or any person appearing to be the head officer in charge thereof.

49. Where a defendant is working in any mine or other works underground, it shall be sufficient service to deliver the summons, at the mine or works, to the engine-man, banks-man, or other person apparently in charge of the mine or works.

50. Where the defendant is employed and dwells in any lunatic or other public asylum, or in any common gaol or house of correction, it shall be sufficient service to deliver the summons to the gate-keeper or lodge-keeper of the asylum, gaol, or house of correction.

51. Service of the summons may be effected on a railway company or other corporation by delivering the summons to a secretary, station master, or clerk of the defendant, at any station or office of the defendant within the district of the court in which the summons is to be served.

52. Where a defendant keeps his house or place of dwelling or place of business closed, in order to prevent a bailiff from serving the summons, it shall be sufficient service to affix such summons on the door of such house or place of dwelling or place of business.

53. Where a bailiff is prevented by the violence or threats of the defendant, or of any other person or persons in concert with him, from personally serving such summons, it shall be sufficient service to leave such summons as near to the defendant as practicable.

54. Where the summons has not been served personally, or under the provisions of the last four rules, and the defendant does not appear, in person or by his attorney or agent, at the return-day, the cause may proceed if the judge is satisfied on the evidence on oath before him, that the service of such summons has come to the knowledge of the defendant before the return-day, but no such evidence shall be necessary in the cases specially mentioned in the last four rules.

55. Whenever a summons has been served in one of the modes herein-before mentioned, but it appears that it has come to the knowledge of the defendant less than ten clear days before the return-day, the cause may, at the discretion of the judge, proceed or be adjourned, whether the defendant appears or not at the hearing.

56. The twelve rules preceding this rule shall not apply to summonses issued under section 28 of 19 & 20 Vic. c. 108, or under "The Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855."

57. Where a summons shall issue under section 18 of 19 & 20 Vic. c. 108, the same shall be served by the bailiff of the district within which the defendant shall dwell or carry on business, unless the judge shall in each case otherwise specially order; provided that this rule shall not interfere with the general power, now vested in the bailiff of the court from which the summons has issued, to serve the same within 500 yards of the boundary of his district.

58. The above rules as to the mode, but not those as to the time, of service of summonses to appear to a plaint, shall apply to the mode of service of all summonses whatsoever, except where otherwise directed by statute or by these rules.

59. No summons, order, or other process or notice, shall be served on Sunday, Christmas-day, or Good-Friday, or on any day appointed by royal proclamation for a public fast, humiliation, or thanksgiving; but such days shall be counted in the computation of the time required by these rules in respect of such service.

Objection to Jurisdiction.

60. A defendant, intending to avail himself of the power given by section 39 of 19 & 20 Vic. c. 108, to object to an action's being tried in the county court, shall give notice personally or by post of such intention to the registrar and to the plaintiff, five clear days before the return-day of the summons, according to the form set forth in the schedule; and shall therein name the parties whom he proposes to be his sureties, or state therein his willingness to deposit money in lieu of giving security, and if he shall fail to give such security or make such deposit before the return-day, or shall fail to give such notice of his intention to object as aforesaid, he shall not be entitled to object to the action's being tried in the county court.

Payment into court before judgment.

61. Where the defendant is desirous of paying money into court, it shall, except where otherwise expressly provided, be paid five clear days before the return-day of the summons, with court fees proportionate to the amount paid in, and the attorney's costs where the amount paid in exceeds twenty pounds; and the registrar shall within twenty-four hours from the time of such payment send to the plaintiff notice thereof by post: provided, that at any time before the return-day the defendant may pay money into court, with such costs as aforesaid, and the registrar shall give notice thereof to the plaintiff as aforesaid: but where money is so paid in less than five clear days before the return-day, it shall be lawful for the court to order the defendant to pay such costs as the plaintiff shall have incurred in preparing for trial, before the notice of such payment was received by him, or in attending the court.

62. If the plaintiff elect to accept, in full satisfaction of his claim, including costs, such money as shall have been paid into court by the defendant, and shall send to the registrar and to the defendant by post, or leave at the registrar's office and at the defendant's place of dwelling or place of business, a written notice, stating such acceptance, within such reasonable time before the return-day as the time of payment by the defendant has permitted, the action shall abate, and the plaintiff shall not be liable to any further costs. But in default of such notices from the plaintiff, the cause may proceed.

Inspection of Documents.

63. 157. In actions by executors or administrators if the plaintiff fail, the costs shall, unless the court shall otherwise order, be awarded in favour of the defendant, and shall be levied de bonis propriis.

158. Where an executor or administrator, plaintiff or defendant, shall not appear on the day of hearing, the provisions of sects 79, and 80, of 9 & 10 Vic. c. 95, and of sec. 10, of 13 & 14 Vic. c. 61, shall apply respectively, subject to the rules applicable to executors or administrators suing or sued.

159. A party suing an executor or administrator may charge in the summons, that the defendant has had assets, and has wasted them.

160. In all cases where the defendant is so charged in the summons, if the court shall be of opinion that the defendant has wasted the assets, the judgment shall be, that the debt or damage and costs shall be levied de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, de bonis propriis; and the non-payment of the amount of the demand immediately on the court finding such demand to be correct, and that the defendant is chargeable in respect of assets; shall be conclusive evidence of wasting to the amount with which he is so chargeable.

161. Where a defendant sued as an executor or administrator does not appear, or where the defendant appearing denies his representative character, or alleges a release to himself of the demand, whether he insists on any other ground of defence or not, if the judgment of the court be in favour of the plaintiff, the judgment shall be that the amount found to be due and costs shall be levied de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, de bonis propriis.

162. Where a defendant sued as an executor or administrator admits his representive character, and only denies the demand, if the plaintiff prove it, the judgment shall be that the demand and costs shall be levied de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, as to the costs, de bonis propriis.

163. Where such defendant admits his representative character, but denies the demand, and alleges a total or partial administration of assets, and the plaintiff proves his demand, and the defendant proves the administration alleged, the judgment shall be to levy the costs of proving the demand de bonis testotoris si, &c., et si non, de bonis propriis; and as to the whole or residue of the demand, judgment of assets, quando acciderint: and the plaintiff shall pay the defendant's costs of proving the administration of assets.

164. Where such defendant admits his representative character, but denies the demand, and alleges a total or partial administration of assets, and the plaintiff proves his demand, but the defendant does not prove the administration alleged, the judgment shall be to levy the amount of the demand, if such amount of assets is shown to have come to the hands of the defendant, or such amount as is shown to have come to them, and costs, de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, as to the costs, de bonis propriis, and as to the residue of the demand, if any, judgment of assets, quando acciderint.

165. Where such defendant admits his representative character and the plaintiff's demand, but alleges a total or partial administration of the assets, and proves the administration alleged, the judgment shall be for assets quando acciderint, and the plaintiff shall pay the defendant's costs of proving the administration of assets.

166. Where such defendant admits his representative character and the plaintiff's demand, but alleges a total or partial administration of the assets, but does not prove the administration alleged, and has not established any other ground of defence, the judgment shall be to levy the amount of the demand, if so much assets is shown to have come to the hands of the defendant, or such amount as is shown to have come to them, and costs, de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, as to the costs, de bonis propriis, and as to the residue of the demand, if any, judgment of assets, quando acciderint.

167. Where judgment has been given against an executor or administrator, that the amount be levied upon assets of the deceased quando acciderint, the plaintiff or his personal representative may issue a summons in the form set forth in the schedule, and if it shall appear that assets have come to the hands of the executor or administrator since the judgment, the court may order that the debt, damages, and costs be levied de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, as to the costs, de bonis propriis. Provided, that it shall be competent for the party applying to charge in the summons that the executor or administator has wasted the assets of the testator or intestate, in the same manner as in rule 159, and the provision of rule 160 shall apply to such inquiry; and the court may, if it appear that the party charged has wasted the assets, direct a levy to be made as to the debt and costs, de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, de bonis propriis.

168. Where a defendant admits his representative character, and the plaintiff's demand, and that he is chargeable with any sum in respect of assets, he shall pay such sum into court, subject to the rules relating to payment into court in other cases.

169. In actions against executors or administrators for which provision is not herein-before specially made, if the defendant fail as to any of his defences, the judgment shall be for the plaintiff as to his costs of disproving such defence, and such costs shall be levied de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et si non, de bonis propriis.

Notices.

170. Where by these rules any party is required to give notice according to a form mentioned in the schedule, it shall be sufficient if the notice given complies substantially with such form.

171. In all cases where any notice or thing is required by these rules to be given or done within a period of twenty-four hours, or within a period of forty-eight hours, no part of Sunday, Chrismas-day, or Good Friday, or of any day appointed by royal proclamation for a public fast, humiliation, or thanksgiving, shall be included in the computation of such period.

174. Where a summons has been served in due time to prevent the operation of any statute of limitations, and either party dies after such service and after the lapse of the period within which it is provided that an action may be brought, proceedings may be taken by or against the surviving party, or by or against the personal representative of the deceased party, within one year from the day of holding the court at which the summons required the defendant to appear.

Arbitration.

175. Where a plaint is entered, the judge may, with the consent of the parties, as well in cases within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court as in cases of agreement under sec. 23 of 19 & 20 Vic. c. 108, make an order for a reference, under the provisions of sec. 77 of 9 & 10 Vic. c. 95, before, upon, or after the return-day of the summons; and all the provisions in the last-mentioned act contained as to references shall apply to a reference proceeding under such an order; provided that the same fees shall be paid as would have been payable on the hearing of the cause.

176. Where a claim for rent or mesne profits, or both, is added to a plaint for the recovery of possession of a tenement, and the additional poundage to be taken on the amount or amounts so claimed would, with the poundage to be taken on the rent of the tenement, exceed the poundage which is to be taken on a claim for twenty pounds, the total poundage to be taken shall be estimated on twenty pounds only.

181. Where the distress is for damage feasance, and the defendant is entitled to judgment for a return, if the plaintiff require, the judge shall, if the cause be tried without a jury, and the jury shall, if the cause be tried with a jury, find the amount of the damage sustained by the defendant, and judgment shall then be given in favour of the defendant, in the alternative, for a return, or for the amount of the damage so found.

Detinue.

182. The judgment in detinue, if for the plaintiff, shall be for the value of the goods detained, together with a sum to be stated in the judgment by way of damages for the detention and costs; but it may be made part of the order that on payment of damages for the detention, and costs, and return of the goods, on or before a day to be named, satisfaction shall be entered.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 10, 1857.

THE costly litigation in the matter of the Royal British Bank has as yet done no service to any of the parties concerned. The shareholders have got no relief, and the depositors are in much the same position as at first, with the exception that some months have been lost and some thousands of pounds have been expended, which would otherwise have gone to swell their dividend. But the ruin and the waste that we have already seen are nothing to that which may be shortly expected. It is competent for every one of the six thousand creditors to take proceedings against each of the two hundred and eighty unhappy shareholders. Who can estimate the devastation which may ensue, or the frightful addition which the costs of innumerable actions may make to liabilities already sufficiently heavy? If creditors would but abstain from pressing their claims against individual shareholders, there can be little doubt that the call to be immediately made by the official manager would, together with the remaining assets of the Bank, suffice for the payment of twenty shillings in the pound. It is not impossible, on the other hand, that the threatened rush of executions may have the effect of putting every shareholder to flight, and defeating the measures of the official manager, by which their demands might otherwise be met in full. Every depositor, however, is at perfect liberty to attack any shareholder he pleases, with the full assurance that neither law nor equity will interpose to stay his hand. "The law allows it and the court awards it," and no Portia has found out a plea to baffle those who stand for law and insist upon their bond. The application for the appointment of a Receiver under the Companies Bankruptcy Act was the last remaining chance for the shareholders, and that has failed. No one can question the justice of throwing the loss occasioned by the frauds of directors upon the members of the company, who, with their eyes open, undertook the risk, rather than upon depositors who paid in their money on the faith of the unlimited liability of every shareholder. But it is a scandal to the administration of justice, that no better means have been provided for securing payment of the debts of an insolvent company than the ruinous scramble, which is likely enough, if it continues, to exhaust or scatter every farthing of available assets, without satisfying half of the claims which the bank has to meet.

It had been hoped that whatever might be the results of the litigation to the parties concerned, we should at least have obtained a satisfactory interpretation of the statutes as a guide in future proceedings. But the elaborate judgments that have been delivered have done little to clear up the law, and nothing whatever to correct the evils which have resulted from the mode of its administration. The solitary point decided is that the Winding-up Act has not totally repealed the earlier statute, though it still remains doubtful whether the clauses which relate to the appointment of a Receiver are to be considered as supplanted by the larger provisions of the subsequent act. The difficulty which the legislature has created by neither prohibiting nor regulating concurrent proceedings in Chancery and Bankruptcy still remains, and throughout the contest the Courts have made no effort to unite in the same hands the powers derived from rival jurisdictions, which cannot be effectually exercised by different and hostile officials.

Judicial interpretation having failed to harmonise the conflicting statutes which Parliament has enacted, as if on purpose to perplex lawyers and confound the public, there is but one remedy by which a recurrence of the same mischiefs can be avoided. Legislative power alone can correct the evil which it has produced, and not a day should be lost in providing a carefully revised act, for the winding-up of bankrupt companies, to take the place of the mass of contradictions which now deforms the Statute-book. The law officers of the Crown cannot shut their eyes to this duty, after the intimations of its necessity which have fallen from the bench. The language of L. J. KNIGHT BRUCE is but the authoritative expression of what every man of common sense feels upon the subject. "It is to be hoped," said that learned judge, "that the legislature will take steps to prevent the recurrence of conflicts and complications such as the proceedings before us exhibit and portend—miserable conflicts, distressing complications, which it has itself created—conflicts and complications which must embitter the anxiety and add weight to the oppression of sufferers under nefariously conducted schemes, such as the thing ironically called the 'Royal British Bank;' conflicts and complications which, to a civilized people, are nationally discreditable, and, in a governed country, ought not to be possible."

It cannot be supposed that such suggestions from such a quarter will fall on deaf ears, even if the share which the Lord CHANCELLOR has taken in the matter were not enough to ensure the introduction of a bill so urgently required. It will need vastly more care and knowledge than went to the concoction of the existing law, to settle the details of a measure which shall do justice alike to creditors and members of a defaulting company. But we do not think that there will be much difficulty in laying down the general principle on which it should proceed. The object to be kept in view is simply to preserve, and if possible, to increase the security which creditors at present enjoy, and to save the shareholders from the needless aggravation of their loss to which they are now exposed. The creditor's security is the aggregate property of the whole body of shareholders, and if that can be made available without the clumsy device of a general scramble, creditors will suffer nothing by being deprived of their right of indiscriminate execution. We believe that not only may this be done, but that a regular administration of the assets of the company and the contributions of its members might be made more productive than the harsher proceedings which the law now allows. To do this, all that is necessary is to combine the principle of the Bankruptcy Act (7 & 8 Vic. cap. 111), with an improved form of the machinery of the Winding-up Act.

There are only two substantial differences, in principle, between the two systems. The Bankruptcy Act gave the conduct of the winding-up to the representative of the creditors, and, at the same time, was intended to stay their individual actions, on the appointment of a receiver, who was a sort of embryo official manager, except in cases where the leave of the court had been first obtained. The Winding-up Acts, on the contrary, can only be set in motion by shareholders, and worked by their nominee. Nor are they allowed to interfere with the right of creditors to proceed to execution against individual members. In both respects the former act is preferable to the latter, whether regarded in the interests of the debtors or of the creditors. It is clear that the property of the debtors will not go as far in satisfaction of the liabilities, under the present wasteful system, as it would do if it were rateably and systematically distributed; and if powers were given to the court to seize the property or person of any member who was about to abscond, and to avoid all fraudulent assignments, the position of the creditors, as a body, would be far better than it is at present. The act of the 7th and 8th Victoria failed in practice because it required the joint action of two independent courts, and provided no adequate means for working out its own principles. All that portion of it which was intended to effect what is now done under the Winding-up Acts, has remained, for this reason, a dead letter. The principle on which it proceeded has never, in fact, been tried, and we believe that the easiest way of remedying the confusion which now disgraces the law will be by recurring to the original idea of the 7th and 8th Victoria, and carrying it out by means of the single jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, armed with adequate powers for the enforcement of calls, and for the prevention of any attempt on the part of a shareholder to escape contribution, or to withdraw his property from the reach of the court.

THE case of KINGSFORD versus MERRY—now agitating the commercial world—is somewhat complicated in its facts; but the important question which arises under them is intelligible enough, and we will endeavour to state shortly so much of the circumstances as appears material to explain that question. Messrs. KINGSFORD & SWINFORD, the plaintiffs, are manufacturing chemists, and they usually sell their manufactures through a broker, retaining possession till payment, but delivering invoices to the purchaser on receiving advice of any transaction. It appears that in the year 1853 certain casks of acid made by them were sold in this way; and were sold over by the purchaser to one ELLIS, who received in due course a "delivery order" on the plaintiffs. ELLIS, in his turn, sold over to LEASK, a broker who was induced to buy through the knavery of one ANDERSON, who falsely and fraudulently represented to LEASK that he had authority to procure such purchase to be made on behalf of another party. ELLIS handed the "delivery order," which had been given to him, to LEASK; and LEASK, after indorsing it specially deliverable to himself, handed it to ANDERSON that he might inspect the acid at the plaintiffs' warehouse. Armed with this "delivery order," however, ANDERSON induced the plaintiffs to send the casks of acid to a wharfinger, to his (ANDERSON'S) order; and he persuaded them so to act by falsely and fraudulently representing that the acid had in reality been bought by LEASK from ELLIS for him (ANDERSON). While the casks remained at the wharf, ANDERSON transferred the delivery warrant given by the plaintiffs to the defendant, Mr. MERRY, as part security for a bonâ fide loan; the acid was subsequently sold over by the defendant; and ANDERSON, who of course had never paid for it, became a bankrupt, and was finally transported for forgery. Upon discovering that the acid had been disposed of by the defendant, the plaintiffs commenced the present action in trover against him; on the ground that, under the circumstances, ANDERSON could give no title. The judge who tried the cause at the Guildhall sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1855, directed a verdict for the defendant, but gave the plaintiffs leave to move the Court of Exchequer to enter the verdict for themselves instead. This application was refused; but the decision of the Court being appealed against under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was reversed by the Exchequer Chamber; by which Court the verdict was directed to be entered for the plaintiffs on the leave reserved, to the great indignation of Mr. MERRY and a host of sympathisers.

It was urged for the plaintiffs, in the Exchequer Chamber, that, under the circumstances of the case, the relation of vendor and vendee had never existed between the plaintiffs and ANDERSON; and it was insisted that where a party, not a vendee, obtains possession of property by fraud, and sells or pledges it to a bonâ fide purchaser or pledgee, he cannot thereby convey a title. It was urged, on the other hand, for the defendant, that the plaintiffs had been guilty of "laches" in arming ANDERSON with the indicia of property—that is to say, with the delivery warrant; and that they were therefore estopped from disputing the title of his innocent vendee; for that where one of two innocent persons must suffer, it should be he by whom the mischief was occasioned. The judgment of the Court, in favour of the plaintiffs, delivered by Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN, dwelt much on the circumstances of the case, as showing, in their opinion, that no privity of contract existed between the plaintiffs and ANDERSON. "It is stated," said the Court, "in the evidence set out in the case, that the plaintiffs gave the delivery order to ANDERSON, and dealt with him as the assignee, not as purchasing goods from them, but as having purchased them from (query 'through') LEASK, as falsely represented by him. There was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and ANDERSON; and it was only as representing himself as claiming under LEASK that they gave him, by the delivery order, the means of possessing the goods. Such a delivery, under the circumstances of this case, would no more pass the property in the goods than a delivery to an agent or servant of LEASK would pass the property to such agent or servant."

The decision in this case—supposing it to remain unreversed in the House of Lords—appears, in the first place, to confirm the general proposition, that, where a party, not a vendee, obtains possession of any property by fraud, and sells or pledges it to a bonâ fide purchaser or pledgee, he cannot thereby convey a title to such property; and, in the next place, to establish that such geueral rule is not subject to exception in a case where such fraudulent possession being obtained through the medium of a "delivery order," the possessor attempts to convey such title by an indorsement and delivery of such order to an innocent buyer or pledgee of the property.

It is to be observed that the first of the above propositions is in harmony with the general rule of law, that (unless in the case of goods sold in market overt) it is only from the owner of goods that any property in them can be derived—a rule, the application of which, in many cases, is common learning. It is, moreover, by no means inconsistent with a doctrine which has been recently discussed and established in the Court of Common Pleas (and on which, indeed, the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the present case proceeded), that if MERCATOR sells goods to DOLOSUS, and afterwards discovers the contract to have been obtained by fraud, he may disaffirm the transaction—provided, in the meantime, the property in the goods has not been transferred by DOLOSUS to INNOCENS, for valuable consideration; but that if such transfer has taken place, then the title of such transferree prevails. For, according to the view taken in the Exchequer Chamber, this state of things did not arise for consideration, inasmuch as that Court held that the plaintiffs had never sold to ANDERSON.

The whole, or at least the chief point, of the matter in the eyes of mercantile men, lies in the second of the above propositions; for without, perhaps, much caring to understand the general law, their ideas of the rights and liabilities attaching to "dock warrants,"

"wharfingers' receipts," "delivery orders," and similar documents, have been, it would seem, long settled, and to these ideas the decision of the Court of Error has given a rude shock. The truth appears to be that these documents being—unlike bills of exchange and bills of lading—of modern invention only, are at present to be legally dealt with, not by any custom of merchants, but by the ordinary rules of the common law, unless where (as in the case of such documents being "entrusted" to agents, &c.) they are governed by special Acts of Parliament. And, according to these rules, a "delivery order" appears to be only a species of title-deed to the goods to which it has reference; and not of itself to be able to change either the possession in, or the property of, such goods. If, then, the propositions we have above deduced from this case, or either of them, are inconsistent with mercantile security, or with the facility which ought to be afforded to commercial transactions, an Act of Parliament would seem to be the proper remedy.

For ourselves we cannot feel any surprise at the consternation which the mercantile world has exhibited; for though, as we have shown, it is a difference as to the facts not the law of the case which appears to have led the Court of Error to reverse the decision of the Court of Exchequer, yet this reversal, or rather the reason given for it, is sufficient to upset the ordinary course of dealing in these matters. Among merchants the grievance is felt to be intolerable, that one who would lend his money upon, or buy goods through, the medium of one of these documents, should be obliged—and that only in the exercise of an ordinary prudence—first, to trace the different steps through which it may have travelled before coming to his hands. Such an obligation, it is believed, would cripple his resources; would produce, in many cases, fatal delay; and would, in all cases, leave behind the sting of insecurity. Hitherto the merchant has treated these documents simply as bank notes, or as securities freely convertible into money (and that with complete security), by endorsement and delivery; and if he has done so without the authority of the law, why?—so much the worse that law is than he thought it, and the sooner it is set right the better. Such, it is alleged, is the feeling of a large majority of the most influential trading houses; and, if it should prove to be so, such feeling ought to be respected. In the meantime, we shall watch with interest the proceedings of the meeting of merchants, to be held on the 19th current, for the full discussion of the question.

Summary of Legal News.

AT the Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday, a meeting was held for the proof of debts in the case of the Royal British Bank, and the case of the new shareholders, who claim to prove for the amount paid upon their shares, was brought forward, and after a partial hearing adjourned to Thursday next. These shareholders allege that they were induced to take shares through fraud, that money got by fraud can be recovered as money had and received, and in case of bankruptcy proof should be admitted for the amount. Further, if the fraud should be established, the new shareholders will claim to repudiate their shares, and dispute their liability to pay calls. It was also pointed out that, by 7 & 8 Vict., c. 113, additional capital could not be raised unless the previous capital had been paid up, and when the new charter was obtained in February, 1855, this requisition had not been complied with, and therefore the question arose whether the new shareholders had ever been legally shareholders at all.

It was proposed to prove that the directors had published false statements of the affairs and position of the bank with the intent to induce people to take shares, and that shares had been taken in consequence of these false statements. The bank had divided 6 per cent., but that dividend had been paid out of capital. A reserve fund had been mentioned, which fund, it would be proved, did not exist. The debts of the chairman, manager, and some of the directors were represented as available assets, as also were the mines in Wales. But really they were not so. If it could be shown that the new shareholders had received any dividend, the amount would have to be deducted from their claims. It might be urged, on the other side, that the directors had given up the management of the bank to two or three of their body, but it was contended that that would make no difference. Reference was made to the case of Burns v. Pennell, in the House of Lords, where Lord BROUGHAM says, "You must show that there has been some specific fraudulent conduct on the part of the directors—some grossly fraudulent conduct which gave rise to the particular contract in question. It is not a general averment of dolus; it must be dolus dans locum contractui." Counsel for the claimants said he should show the kind of fraud referred to by Lord BROUGHAM. After some evidence had been given, the proceedings were adjourned for a week, to give time for the examination of the bank accounts.

On the 3rd instant, Mr. HUMPHERY BROWN, M.P., was adjudged bankrupt on the petition of the Royal British Bank, claiming as creditor for £40,000.

The gang of forgers now under examination at the Mansion House have gained an infamous pre-eminence for patient assiduity, fertile invention, and, for a long time, unbroken success in crime. In various ways, and with more or less dishonesty, they possessed themselves of blank forms of cheques upon different bankers, and then of specimens of the signatures of customers of the banks, which they might imitate in filling up the cheques. One of the confederates had in his possession blank cheques upon Messrs. GOSLING & Co., which, in fact, he had "accidentally found" in the pocket of Mr. TURNER, solicitor, of Red Lion-square, and the question was how to obtain Mr. TURNER'S signature to serve as a model for the skilful forger, who was to turn the "accident" to profitable account. A plan was continued by SAWARD, a member of this worthy company, who, we believe, brought to its deliberations the aid of a legal education, and his suggestion was industriously carried into effect by ATWELL, now a convicted felon and witness against his former friends. ATWELL was to call on Mr. TURNER and instruct him to take proceedings in his name against one HESP on an I. O. U. for about £30. HESP was a fictitious personage, and his address was at a place hired by ATWELL for the occasion. Mr. TURNER wrote to this address the usual application before proceeding, and the money was promptly paid. ATWELL advanced the needful sum, and his brother went, either in the name or on the behalf of the imaginary HESP, and handed it to Mr. TURNER. Soon after, ATWELL goes to Mr. TURNER'S office to learn the result of the application made to HESP. Unlike many clients who visit their solicitors on similar errands, he finds that the debt has been promptly paid; and, with equal promptitude, Mr. TURNER'S clerk pays him the amount, but, "most unfortunately," in cash and not by cheque, as the confederates had hoped. The learned and patient SAWARD was not far off. The disappointment is announced to him, and he bears it with the equanimity of a great mind. "We must wait a little, and then try it again," and meanwhile there is "business"—that is, forgery—to be done elsewhere.

The professional assistance of Mr. TURNER of Red Lion-square, was soon required again by ATWELL. On this occasion, the debt to be recovered was upwards of £100. The name of the debtor was to be HART, and a lodging was taken in his name. The exertions of Mr. TURNER, in the case of HART, were as rapidly successful as with HESP. The money was paid, and on this occasion Mr. TURNER gave ATTWELL a cheque for the amount; and thus, at length, his long desired signature was in the possession of the industrious forgers. The subsequent steps appear to have been nearly the same in all the forgeries. A room was hired, and some young man, advertising for a clerk's situation, was engaged by one of the gang. After going on one or two immaterial errands, the new clerk is desired to step to some bank and get cash for a cheque which bears a skilful imitation of the name of TURNER, or some other customer of the establishment. The young man is watched to and from the bank. If he receives the money, and should happen to forget the way back to his new master's residence, there is some one near at hand to remind him that over London Bridge is not the nearest cut to the Eastern Counties Railway. If payment is refused, the unhappy candidate for employment falls under a charge of forgery; and the confederates, warned in time, disappear from the head-quarters they had selected for that particular experiment. The convict ATWELL, who tells this tale, is evidently proud of the skill, assiduity, and repeated triumphs of his gang, and he exults in the distinguished appearance he has made upon the stage he is now compelled to leave.

An inquest has been lately held in a case where death appeared clearly attributable to strychnine, but the symptoms so fully described in PALMER'S trial did not present themselves. The deceased, a female servant, aged 37, was found by her mistress lying on the floor, as if she were in a fit. On the arrival of a neighbouring medical man she was quite dead. There was nothing in the appearance of the body to account for death—no rigor mortis, such as is believed to follow death by strychnine—but there was some muscular action of the fingers. A bottle belonging to the deceased contained a compound of strychnine and French chalk, and the medical witness who examined the stomach stated that the deceased had taken 12 or 15 grains "of the poison," meaning, probably, the compound. According to the Coroner, Mr. WAKLEY, it results, from this inquiry, that a person may die from the effects of strychnine, and yet no external trace be left, nor even the slightest injury to the coats of the stomach be discernible.

The system of "responsible Government" has now been inaugurated in the Australian Colonies, and in New South Wales one consequence of the change has been that the office of Attorney-General, one of the four which form the ministry of that colony, has been bestowed on an attorney, who is said to be a clever man and a good debater. Mr. MARTIN, the new Attorney-General, had passed an examination for the bar, and he was admitted a barrister a few days after he had been appointed to an office which in Englaдn his elevation, His tenure of office, however, was very short, as the ministry, of which he was a member, resigned almost immediately.

From New York, we have the news that the standard of examination, previous to admission to legal practice, had been raised rather suddenly by the authorities, and that many candidates had been consequently rejected, and great alarm spread among youthful aspirants to the functions of barrister and attorney.

The city meeting, to consider the state of the law as to warrants for goods, has been postponed to the 19th instant. It is curious to notice the frequent discrepancies between commercial practice and authoritative expositions of the law. Not long ago the question of crossed cheques was so handled judicially as to cause some disturbance in the minds of men of business. Now we have the judgment in Kingsford v. Merry, spreading wide dissatisfaction; and it appears also that, in case of variation between the words and figures of a cheque, the practice of bankers has been opposed to what recognised treatises declare to be the law. These are matters well worthy of the attention of the conference on commercial law, to be shortly held under the auspices of the Law Amendment Society, and of which we give the particulars elsewhere.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

A very important question has been decided in Robinson's executors' case, In re Royal Bank of Australia; whether the rule of law involved in the decision can be considered as satisfactorily or conclusively settled is another thing. The case was originally heard before V. C. Stuart, assisted by Mr. Justice Erle; and an appeal from his Honour's order, which was in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Justice Erle—was heard by the full court of appeal. After it had been well argued, their lordships intimated their desire to have it re-argued before them, assisted by two common law judges. Accordingly, the case was again argued before the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, assisted by Mr. Justice Cresswell and Mr. Baron Martin. The result of all was, that after several months of consideration, and several months more of re-consideration, on the 4th of December last, judgment was delivered by the court; the Lord Chancellor supporting the decision of the court below, and therein agreeing with all the common law judges, and both the Lords Justices strongly dissenting in opinion from his lordship and all the other judges, but in consideration of the weight of authority against them, declining to act upon their own view. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor, was, therefore, affirmed. The facts may be stated very shortly. R. took shares in and executed the deed of settlement of the Royal Bank of Australia, which is now being wound up. The shareholders covenanted to pay calls and to bear the losses of the company. Upon the death of R. his executors were made contributories, and they paid or compromised for payment of a call by the master. A further call was made, but not before they had distributed R.'s assets in the payment of simple contract debts. For the official manager it was contended that they were nevertheless liable to pay the call, inasmuch as it was a specialty debt, being an obligation under seal of their testator to pay calls, and that the further call was a certain, although a future debt, and it was their duty to retain assets to meet it. The executors, on the other hand, argued that the call was not a specialty. The power of the master was not limited by the provisions of the company's deed of settlement; nor must the call necessarily be in respect of losses contemplated by the deed. Mr. Justice Creswell, delivering the opinion of Mr. Baron Martin and himself, considered that the question was untouched by authority, and depended altogether upon the construction of the Winding-up Acts. On this point, he said that, "assuming, for the sake of argument, "a final winding-up of the concern and settling the rights of the partners, and that the official manager will be acting upon and working out the covenant entered into by the shareholders to pay certain claims and bear losses in proportion to their shares, and that the money called for would be a specialty debt, it appears to me that the whole scope and object of the Winding-up Acts are much more extensive; that the calls made under them are primarily to pay creditors and cannot be referred to any power contained in the deed of covenant, but to the statutory powers given by the Legislature. On the whole, therefore, we are of opinion that this debt cannot be treated as a debt by specialty." The Lord Chancellor was of opinion that what the shareholders had to pay in consequence of a call was independent of any such stipulation as that contained in the deed of settlement relied upon by the official manager; every shareholder being liable to every creditor to the full amount of his demand; and the sum raised by the master representing "not any demand of the shareholders inter se, but the aggregate amount of all the creditors on the whole of them," which the solvent shareholders were bound to make up, not by virtue of any engagement contained in the deed, but by virtue of the general rule of law which makes every partner liable to the whole of the demands on the partnership. Lord Justice Knight Bruce thought that the call in this case was "to some extent, if not wholly, a just demand directly founded on a covenant," and therefore constituted a specialty. L. J. Turner took the same view. Regarding the Winding-up Acts, as intended mainly to enable shareholders to settle their rights between themselves, and not to secure the interests of creditors; and assuming that the legal and equitable rights to be adjudicated upon must depend upon the contracts into which the parties have entered, which contracts were not in any respect altered by the acts; his lordship came to the conclusion that the testator's contract being under seal, the call was a specialty debt, as it was merely the mode of working out the contract that had been provided by the legislature.

The order of the court, however, as we have already mentioned, was in affirmance of the judgment of the court below, notwithstanding the strongly-expressed opinions of the majority of the judges of the Appellate Court, in favour of a dismissal. The case is equally important as a decision upon the construction of the Winding-up Acts, and as an instance of the common law judges, brought in to assist the Appellate Court of Chancery, virtually over-ruling the majority of that court. In this respect, however, we suppose it is not meant for a precedent.—In re The Royal Bank of Australia, Robinson's Executors' Case, 5 W. R., 126.

The rule which applies to purchases by or through a solicitor or other agent for the vendor has been frequently the subject of discussion in courts of equity. The principle of the rule is the same as that affecting purchases by trustees of the trust property—viz., that such dealings are opposed to public policy, and should not be sanctioned by the court; because, though in any particular case there may be evidence that the transaction is fair, yet it is clear that from the relations of the parties, the interest of the solicitor, agent, or trustee, must in many cases conflict with his duty; and also, as Lord Eldon said in Exparte Bennett, 10 Ves. 385, "from the impossibility of knowing the truth in every case." The rule itself is now sufficiently definite, not going so far on one side as Lord Rosslyn's view, which was, that to invalidate such a purchase, it must be shown that the party in a fiduciary position had an advantage in the dealing; nor on the other, according to Lord Eldon, that in no case can the vendor's solicitor or trustee be permitted to buy either for himself or for another. The course of more recent authorities seems to lie between the two; and, in the case of a purchase by a solicitor, may be stated in the words of the marginal note to the case of re Bloye's Trust, 1 Mac. & Gor. 488. They are as follows:—"The solicitor who conducts the sale of property cannot become the purchaser without giving full explanations to the vendor, and informing him that he (the solicitor) is to become the purchaser." In Hesse v. Briant, 5 W.R. 108, Mr. Mellersh, a solicitor, acted for the vendor, from whom he had an ample written authority to sell, and also was the solicitor of the purchaser, to whom he sold the property for a higher price than was named in the written authority. There was no evidence of fraud, or of inadequacy of price. The only question for the court was as to the conduct of Mr. Mellersh towards the vendor. The facts are stated in the report, and upon them Vice-Chancellor Stuart supported the contract, and decreed specific performance. The Lord Chancellor, however, took a different view. Such a transaction, he considered, must be characterised by "the utmost good faith, and the utmost openness of dealing." The main circumstance relied upon by the vendor (the defendant) was, that though he was informed by his solicitor without delay of the fact of the sale, and the stipulated amount of the purchase-money, he had been purposely kept in ignorance of the name of the purchaser. The solicitor signed the contract on behalf of the vendor, and the purchaser on his own behalf; and the purchaser's case was that no solicitor had acted for him, but that he relied wholly upon his own judgment in the negotiation, which he insisted was carried on between him and Mr. Mellersh at arm's length. It appeared, however, that in a bill of costs delivered by Mr. Mellersh to him, there were several items relating to the contract for purchase.

The effect of this decision is to make it necessary for solicitors, who can in any way be said to act for both vendor and purchaser, to do nothing in the matter, however trifling it may appear to be, without the fullest sanction of the principal concerned, such sanction being obtained from the principal with a knowledge of all the facts. In such a case, the solicitor is to be regarded more as an instrument than as an agent for conducting the treaty, and carrying out the contract. The Lord Chancellor, indeed, expressly laid it down, that the proper course for a solicitor, under circumstances which admitted of a personal treaty between the principals, would have been to bring them together—a course which cannot be too strongly impressed on solicitors, who fill the difficult position of agents to both parties to a treaty.

In a late case before the Lords Justices (Re Dickson, 5 W. R. 108), the principle on which taxation of a solicitor's bill will be ordered under the third party clauses (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 38, 39) is laid down in a form somewhat different from what had previously been understood to be the rule of the court. It had long been settled that the only cases where taxation would be allowed after payment in the common case between a solicitor and his client, being himself liable to pay, were those where there had been pressure or overcharge, amounting to fraud. But an impression prevailed that, under the third party clause, these conditions would not apply with the same strictness. Where a man chooses, without pressure, to pay a bill out of his own pocket, there is much stronger reason for refusing taxation than where the bill has been paid by a trustee, without the concurrence of the party liable; and it has been urged, in such cases, that payment by the trustee ought not to conclude the person liable, any more than payment under pressure by himself; because, in neither case, is the payment a strictly voluntary act of the party who is ultimately liable. This view received some countenance from a decision of the Master of the Rolls (Re Turner, 4 W. R. 805), in which he said that, under the third party clause, any question as to pressure was irrelevant. In Re Dickson, a different idea seems to have prevailed. There the application was made by a residuary legatee for taxation of a bill of costs, which had been paid without pressure by the executors of the will. There were no special circumstances applicable to the legatee, which were not applicable to the executors also, and it was held that, in order to obtain taxation, the same special circumstances must be shown as if the executors had made the application—that is to say, that either pressure or fraudulent overcharge must be proved. The order would have been refused on the ground of the absence of pressure, but L. J. Turner was of opinion that the overcharges were sufficient to support it, although he expressed his conviction that the solicitors had charged no more than they considered themselves honestly entitled to, but said that solicitors dealing with executors ought not to charge more than would be allowed on taking the accounts in an administration suit. L. J. Knight Bruce considered that the order for taxation was wrong, but as the opinion of L. J. Turner coincided with the decision of the court below, the result was, that the order was affirmed.

The effect of this decision appears to be to allow the absence of pressure to be as effectual a defence to taxation after payment under the third party clause as in other cases, but at the same time the definition of "a fraudulent overcharge" seems to be extended in dealings with executors to almost any overcharge whatever.

The law of principal and surety has been the subject of two interesting cases—one before the Master of the Rolls, and the other before Vice-Chancellor Stuart. It has always been held in equity that a surety who pays the debt of his principal is entitled to the benefit of the mortgages and other securities in the hands of the creditor. If, however, the debt is secured by a bond, the payment by the surety extinguishes the security, and as the bond has no longer any existence in the eye of the law there is nothing to transfer to the surety, who cannot therefore claim to be a specialty creditor of his principal in respect of it. This was long ago settled in Copis v. Middleton, Tur. & R. 224, by Lord Eldon, who laid it down that the general rule must be qualified by considering it to apply to such securities as continue to exist and do not get back, upon payment, to the person of the principal debtor. This decision, though perhaps unavoidable on technical principles, was certainly hard on the surety, but it has worked no serious injnry, because a prudent surety for a bond debt will always insist on a collateral bond of indemnity to himself. In the recent case of Allen v. De Lisle, 5 W. R. 158, an attempt was made to extend the qualification introduced by Copis v. Middleton to a security of a different kind. The debt in this case was secured by a mortgage of a fund in court, under which the proviso for redemption, instead of stipulating for a re-assignment, declared that on payment by the debtor, or any one on his behalf, the indenture should be void and of no effect. The debt was paid by the surety; and the principal thereupon contended that the mortgage had ceased to exist, and was, on the principle of Copis v Middleton, not available for the security of the surety. The Court, however, notwithstanding the technicality, held the surety entitled to a security on the fund. Farebrother v Wodehouse, 5 W. R. 12, before the Master of the Rolls, is a decision on a point of great importance. There two sums had been advanced at the same time on distinct securities. A surety, with knowledge of the whole transaction, gave his bond to secure one only of the debts. The debtor became insolvent, and the creditors claimed to tack their debts together, and to apply both sets of securities in satisfaction of them before surrendering to the surety those which related to the debt he had guaranteed. The surety, on the other hand, though he admitted that the right to tack would have existed as against the debtor, contended that on payment of the debt for which he was liable he was entitled to all the securities given for it, and that the privilege of tacking must be postponed to his rights as surety.

A precisely similar question had been decided by Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, in Williams v. Owen, 13 Sim. 597, in favour of the creditor; but a late case before Lord Cranworth, when Vice-Chancellor (Bowker v. Bull, 1 Sim. N. S. 29), had been supposed to be inconsistent with the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of England. The Master of the Rolls, however, followed Williams v Owen, and gave judgment in favour of the creditor's right to tack against the surety.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

TAXATION, COSTS OF.

The Queen v. Eastwood, 6 Ell. & Bl. 285.

A. having been tried at the assizes and acquitted, taxed the bill which was delivered to him by B., the attorney concerned in the defence; and which amounted to £36 14s. 6d. The Master struck off from the bill delivered £7 0s. 3d., but added £1 4s. 8d. for items not included therein by B.; and treating this latter sum as diminishing pro tanto the amount of his deductions (which, on this calculation, were less than one-sixth of the bill delivered) threw upon A. the costs of the taxation, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. Against this decision A. appealed, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the proper course was to estimate the deductions by themselves, as constituting the sum taxed off; and that such deductions ought not to be considered as having been, for the purpose of settling on whom the costs of taxation were to fall, reduced by the additional items added by the Master. The rule to review the taxation and allow to A. the costs thereof, was therefore made absolute.

It may be remarked in this case, that even had the £1 4s. 8d. been added to the bill after it had been reduced by the deduction of the £7 0s. 3d., such last-mentioned sum would still have been more than one-sixth of the bill actually due. Had it been otherwise, it may admit of some question whether the court would have gone beyond the actual legal result, and have entered on an inquiry as to how that result had been obtained. If they had, it might have become necessary to re-examine the case of White v. Milner, 2 Hen. Bl. 357, which was recognised in the Queen's Bench in the later case of Mills v. Revett, 1 A. & E. 856, but has been questioned by the Exchequer in Morris v. Parkinson, 2 Cr. M. & R. 178.

INTERPLEADER ISSUE, COSTS OF.

Clifton v. Davis, 6 Ell. & Bl. 392.

In this case the principle was established, that, in an interpleader issue ordered by a judge at the instance of the sheriff, the costs incident to such issue will be taxed without reference to which of the claimants was ordered by the judge to be plaintiff, and which defendant. For the purposes of such a trial there are no "general costs": each party is considered as victorious pro tanto; and hence if the claimant succeed in establishing his claim against the execution creditor to a certain amount, and if the execution creditor partly succeeds in his opposition to the claim advanced, costs in respect of such success are to be allowed by the Master to each.

INSPECTION.

Temperley v. Willett, 6 Ell. & Bl. 380; Smith v. The Great Western Railway Company, id. 405; Bray v. Finch, 8 W. R. (Ex.) p. 148.

In the first of these cases a rule had been obtained by the plaintiff calling on the defendant to show cause why a certain deed in the possession of the defendant should not be inspected by the plaintiff. It appeared that the action in reference to which the inspection was applied for was brought for a false representation alleged to have been made by the defendant to the plaintiff on selling to him a renter's free admission to Covent Garden Theatre: and it was deposed that this false representation would be made evident by the deed in question, which would itself be material evidence at the trial of the cause. On the other side it was sworn that at the time of the application another action was pending, brought by the same plaintiff against the lessee of the theatre, for an assault alleged to have been committed by the latter, and to have arisen out of the same transaction; and as there seemed, from the affidavits, great reason to believe that the action in reference to which the application was made had been commenced, not with the bonâ fide intention of recovering damages for the false representation, but to use the inspection of the deed in question as a means of obtaining evidence to support the other action, the Court of Queen's Bench unanimously discharged the rule; and observed that it was most important to check any abuse of the powers of ordering inspection recently conferred on the courts of law. And an intimation to the same effect has been given by the Court of Exchequer in the still more recent case of Bray v. Finch, where a rule requiring the defendant to discover what books or documents were in his possession relating to the subject matter of the suit, and to show cause why the plaintiff (who sued as an administrator) should not be at liberty to inspect the same, was discharged with costs, as it appeared that the plaintiff's attorney had been furnished with a copy of the material part of the only such book or document in the defendant's custody, and had been informed at the time he was at liberty to inspect the original.

It is to be remarked that the above decisions are perfectly consistent with the principle of the rule which the Court of Exchequer laid down in Hunt v. Hewitt, 7 Exch., 236, viz., that in order to obtain an order for inspection under the sixth section of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1851, it must appear—1st, that there is some legal proceeding pending; 2nd, that the document to be inspected relates to such proceeding, and is in the custody or control of the opposite party; and 3rd, that the case is one in which, before the act, a discovery might have been obtained in a court of equity.

In the second case above noticed (Smith v. The Great Western Railway Company), a regulation was laid down as to the costs incident to inspection, which it may be useful to remember in practice. An action had been brought for the infringement of a patent; and the substantial controversy was whether certain wheels used by the defendant were infringements or not. Erle, J. made an order, at the instance of the plaintiff, that an officer of the defendant should answer interrogatories; and these having been answered in a certain manner, Crompton, J. made a second order, that the plaintiff, in company with two engineers, might inspect the wheels in question. There then appeared to have been an infringement, and the defendants consented to judgment for £200 and costs. Neither of the above orders contained any provision as to costs; but, on taxation, the Master allowed the plaintiff the costs of obtaining both, and also the expenses which had been incurred in inspecting the wheels. On an application to review this taxation, the court held, that under the 57th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the costs allowed by the Master were in the discretion of the judge making the orders; and that as no directions were given in such orders respecting costs, such costs and expenses formed no part of the "costs of the cause." The rule to review was therefore made absolute.

This decision should be considered in connection with a case decided in 1852 by the Court of Exchequer. This was Hill v. Philp (7 Exch. 231), in which a question arose on whom should fall the costs of inspecting certain documents under the Evidence Amendment Act, 1851, and the court intimated that the costs of inspection under that act should always be paid by the party seeking the inspection. In the present case, it will be noticed that by the master's decision the costs of the inspection itself, as well as of the necessary preliminary proceedings, were thrown on the party by whom inspection had not been sought. But, on the other hand, the reason given by the Exchequer for their decision in Hill v. Philp, viz., that the costs of inspection "are very trifling indeed,"—would not always apply to an inspection of a chattel, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. It seems, however, clear that the costs of all preliminary proceedings whether before a judge or the court, necessary to obtain a order for inspection, fall on the party by whom such proceedings are taken, unless it be otherwise provided for in the order or rule itself.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

THE first meeting of this Society, after the Christmas Vacation, will take place on Monday next, the 12th of January, at eight o'clock.

A short Report from the Criminal Law Committee will be read, and the following resolutions will be submitted for the consideration of the Society:—

1. That the existence of the present frequent highway robberies and burglaries, coupled with the fact that the great body of the people of this country are honest and peaceable, argues great imperfections in our criminal law, or in its administration, or in both.

2. That even in cases where there is no moral doubt of a man's guilt, and of his being an habitual criminal, it is now often the case, that, for want of the technical evidence required by the law, the culprit remains at large, to the great danger of the lives and property of her Majesty's subjects.

3. That it is highly desirable that every legal obstacle which, while it is likely to afford a screen for the guilty, is not necessary for the protection of the innocent, should be removed.

4. That it is highly desirable also that every habitual offender, especially when convicted of a serious crime, should be imprisoned for such a period as will, in all likelihood, suffice to effect his complete reformation; and that when there is no reasonable prospect of reformation, he should be confined for life.

5. That as an important step towards the attainment of this object, it is the opinion of this Society that the 4th section of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, laying down a scale for substituting penal servitude for transportation, should forthwith be repealed, and terms of imprisonment adopted instead, fully equal to those of transportation; subject always, as in the case of transportation, to the mitigating power of the Crown.

THE MERCANTILE LAW CONFERENCE.

Will be Composed:—

First.—Of such members of the Law Amendment Society as shall desire to attend.

Secondly.—Of Representatives of Town Councils, Chambers of Commerce, Trade Associations, Law Societies, and other Public Bodies of a similar nature.

Thirdly.—Of such Peers, Members of Parliament, merchants, and other persons, as the Committee of the Conference may invite.

The Objects of the Conference are:—

1. To discuss and bring under the notice of Government, Parliament, and the public, those imperfections in the mercantile laws of the United Kingdom which most require amendment.

2. To collect information from the various bodies represented at the Conference as to the best legislative remedies for these imperfections.

3. To consider the practical steps which ought to be adopted for obtaining such legislative measures.

The subjects for discussion will be chosen and classified by the committee before the opening of the conference, and their selection will be guided by the communications to be received from Chambers of Commerce, and other bodies by whom delegates may be sent.

Among the subjects already determined on are—

1. The Law of Bankruptcy
2. The Law of Partnership
3. The Law of Merchant Shipping
4. The Law of Principal and Agent
5. The 17th Section of the Statute of Frauds
6. The Law of Banking
7. Assimilation of the Commercial Law of England, Scotland, and Ireland
8. Tribunals of Commerce.

It is not meant that the whole subject in any case is necessarily to be discussed; for instance, the point in the Law of Partnership which has been suggested is the expediency of establishing a registration of partnership.

The order of proceeding will be as follows:—

On Tuesday evening, January 27, a preliminary meeting will be held at the rooms of the Law Amendment Society, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall.

The meeting will commence at seven o'clock.

The final arrangements for the business of the conference will be made.

On Wednesday morning, January 28, at twelve o'clock, the conference will be opened.

The subjects for discussion will be brought on in succession, according to the scheme previously fixed on by the Committee.

On Thursday morning, January 29, at twelve o'clock, the conference will be resumed, and the remaining business be disposed of.

BUSINESS OF THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Since the commencement of last Michaelmas Term eight cases of error from the Court of Exchequer have been heard and disposed of in the Exchequer Chamber, viz.:—Collins v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 5 W. R. 89; Stokes v. Cox, ibid.; Kingsford v. Merry, ibid., 151; Phillips v. French, ibid., 114: Booth v. Kennard, ibid., 85; Graham v. the Van Diemen's Land Company, ibid., 149; Weld v. Baxter, ibid., 113; and The Belford Union v. Pattison, ibid., 121. The case of Boyd v. Hind, reported in the Court below, 25 L. J. Ex. 246, was also argued, and is now under the consideration of the Court. In the first five cases the decisions of the Court were in favour of either the plaintiff in error or the appellant, as the case might be; and in three cases only was the judgment of the Court below affirmed. Of the five successful appeals three were against judgments of the Court in banc, one was for error on the record, and one on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron.

In the course of the argument of Boyd v. Hind, Norman v. Thompson, 4 Ex. 755, was cited; and Mr. Justice Willes, who was counsel in the case, said the profession ought to be informed that both the pleadings and the judgment in Norman v Thompson, as they stand in the report, are mis-stated; that an application had been made at the trial to insert in the plea the words "and divers of the said other creditors" printed in italics in the marginal note; that the application was refused; and that seemingly the reporter, upon the supposition that the words in the margin of the brief formed part of the plea, had moulded the terms of the actual judgment to make it correspond to the supposed existence of the words in the plea.

HILARY TERM EXAMINATION.

THERE appears to be no diminution of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors. For the ensuing Hilary Term no less than 153 have given the usual notices.

Correspondence.

DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent).

THE approaching first day of Hilary Term will, as usual, be marked by a general assembling of the legal tribes at the four courts; little, however, has occurred during the recess to stimulate the curiosity of the numerous class who habitually visit all the courts on the first day of term, to survey both new and old occupants of the Judicial Bench. The changes that have taken place have merely reinstated well known dignitaries in their old haunts. The new Lord Justice of Appeal in Chancery, the Right Hon. F. Blackburne, will take his place in the court in which he formerly presided, as head of the law. In the Exchequer, Baron Richards will resume his full duty, his connection with the Incumbered Estates Court having now terminated.

The appointment of a Judge of Appeal in Chancery, was one of many reforms loudly called for, but the only one of importance which was carried into effect during the last Parliamentary session. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the state of the appellate jurisdiction. A decision of a Master in Chancery, has heretofore been affirmed, or reversed, as the case might be, in the Rolls; and the case has afterwards been taken before the Lord Chancellor. Under this system, therefore, three judges have successively determined the same question; and it might happen that on the last hearing, the decision of both the inferior judges would be reversed by the Chancellor. Appeals will now lie from the inferior courts of equity to a Court of Appeal, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Justice, and any third judge who may be called in by the Lord Chancellor, under the powers conferred on him by the recent act. Few men have displayed greater fitness for judicial office than L. J. Blackburne, or have been more practised in it. Successively Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice of the Queen's Bench, and Chancellor, he has proved himself one of the greatest living masters of both common law and equity. We cannot but rejoice that talents like these are now to be employed for the public benefit. The appointment of a judge whose political views differ from those of her Majesty's advisers, must also be regarded as a good omen. Let us hope that the appointment proceeded from a desire to put "the right man in the right place," and from that alone.

Criminal justice is still at fault in its endeavours to trace the murderer of the unfortunate railway cashier. The Times has made a singular blunder in censuring the constabulary force for their want of professional acuteness; the fact is that they have no more to do with the affair than have the London police. The rumours that have been flying about for a month past, as to persons suspected, and important witnesses under the charge of the authorities, all amount to nothing. The mystery is as deep as when the crime first became known. Crown solicitors, and English detectives have all failed to throw any light upon it. In England, the populace aid public justice; in Ireland the criminal is rarely betrayed by persons of his own rank in society. This is the real solution of the difficulty.

Law reporting appears to be a very unremunerative business. A quarrel has lately taken place between the reporters of the Irish common law and Chancery reports and their publisher. The former complained of under payment, and of too great intervals in the publication. The latter retorted that his accounts showed a considerable annual deficit. Circulars were forwarded by the contending parties to the lawyers generally, and an opposition set of reports was threatened. The matter is now arranged; it will furnish an instructive episode to some future history of legal literature.

It is by no means improbable that before long a pamphlet may be issued from the press, bearing on its title-page the name of an eminent Q.C. and successful Parliamentary orator, the subject of which will be the simplification of the titles of real property. There is reason to believe that the difficulties of the subject will be met by the writer with a degree of innovating energy that will startle the disciples of Coke and Littleton. It would not be right to forestall the publication of this remarkable brochure, but at the earliest opportunity an outline of the reasoning contained in it will be furnished to the readers of this Journal.

WARRANTS FOR GOODS.—KINGSFORD v. MERRY.

To the Editor of the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

SIR,—The recent decision in the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of Kingsford v. Merry, and the comments upon it in the London Times, and the more recent note of an experienced merchant in the city article of the Times of last Saturday (which I inclose as you may wish to reprint it in order to make the question intelligible), have created a great sensation in the City, and in the commercial world generally. And yet it is no new doctrine that is thus broached. In Phillips v. Huth, 6 M. and W. 572; Taylor v. Trueman, 1 M. and M. 457; Taylor v. Kymer, 3 B. and Ad. 337; Evans v. Trueman, 2 B. and Ad. 886; Bryans v. Nix., 4 M. and W. 775; Bonzi v. Stewart, 4 M. and Gr. p. 295; and Jenkins v. Osborne, 7 M. and Gr. p. 678, the holders of delivery warrants or other documents were held in each case not to be entitled to make a valid pledge, and when properly examined it will be found to be rightly so decided in each case. The simplicity with which bills of exchange are used to give currency to thousands of pounds, has a great tendency to create in the minds of merchants a wish that all symbols of property should be available in the same manner without any consideration of the difference between the money represented by a bill of exchange, and goods represented by the symbol of property.

Now it may be convenient to know what is the warrant which is thus the subject of discussion; it is thus described by Mr. Baron Parke (now Lord Wensleydale) in the case of Farina v. Home, 16 Mee. and Wels. p. 123, where a question arose whether the delivery of a warrant was the same thing as the delivery of the goods themselves to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. "A delivery warrant (says his lordship) is no more than an engagement by the wharfinger to deliver to the consignee or any one he may appoint; and the wharfinger holds the goods as the agent of the consignee, and his possession is that of the consignee until an assignment has taken place, and the wharfinger has attorned, so to speak, to the assignee, and agreed with him to hold for him. Then, and not till then, the wharfinger is the agent or bailee of the assignee, and his possession is that of the assignee, and then only is there a constructive delivery to him. In the meantime the warrant and the indorsement of the warrant is nothing more than an offer to hold the goods as the warehouseman of the assignee."

The question is whether the act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, passed since and in consequence of those cases, by which every agent for sale is enabled to give a valid pledge by deposit of the goods or the symbol of goods, is not sufficient for the exigencies of commerce, and whether it is desirable for merchants themselves that any, and if any, what greater latitude should be afforded.

It is apprehended that there must be a limit somewhere, that is, that it is not expedient that "every bill of lading, India warrant, dock warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate warrant or order for the delivery of goods, or other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods" (the words used in the Merchants and Factor's Acts), should pass by mere delivery like a bank note, for it would surely be unsafe to put such a temptation to abuse in the way of any class of agents, clerks, or servants. It is quite another question whether it would not be right to make all the before-enumerated symbols of property transferable by indorsement in the same manner as a bill of lading, and to make the original depositor's contract with the dock company, wharfinger, or warehouse-keeper to pass by the indorsement as in the bill of Lading Act 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. This it is conceived would give all the requisite facility to commerce without the introduction of fresh opportunities of fraud by persons who must be necessarily entrusted with the possession of the document.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

CHREMES.

[As he case was fully reported in our last number, it is unnecessary to print the article of the Times of Dec. 27, referred to by our correspondent].

Review.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. Circular No. X. Proceedings at the Annual Provincial Meeting, held at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, Oct. 14 & 15, 1856. London: Wildy & Sons.

THE proceedings of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association lie before us in the shape of a thick and somewhat closely-printed pamphlet, containing reports of addresses and debates, papers by several eminent members of the profession, and a pleasant acknowledgment of the courtesy and hospitality displayed to their guests by the town of Liverpool. Everyone who cares for the interests of the profession must be gratified at proceedings which have so strong and obvious a tendency to promote good feeling among its members, and to elicit their opinions on matters connected with their condition and prospects. The proceedings of the Association comprise such a variety of subjects that it would be impossible to do justice to the whole of them on this occasion. Mr. Ryland's paper on "The Registration of the Names of the Partners of Trading Firms," and Mr. Morgan's on "The Reformatory Act," contain sensible practical suggestions, amongst which we would particularly refer to Mr. Morgan's recommendation, that the managers of Reformatories should be enabled to admit, under certain restrictions, young persons voluntarily presenting themselves for that purpose, which we can well imagine might have the effect of greatly checking vagrancy. Mr. Smith's paper on "Public Prosecutors," contains a fair statement of the case derived from the blue-book lately published upon the subject; but, though the recommendations of the Committee appear to us objectionable on account of the vast expense which they would involve, we cannot agree with Mr. Smith in thinking lightly of the evil which they are intended to remedy. Mr. Leverson's paper on "Procedure," is little more than a resumé of Bentham's "Tract," and we cannot but regret that he should have thought it expedient to retain that author's style as well as his thoughts. The greater part of Bentham's works were never completed, but were left in the shape of rough notes, which have given abundance of trouble both to his editors and to his readers. With a slight inversion of the old quotation, we would say to Mr. Leverson, as to other disciples of Bentham,—Si vis legi debes intelligi.

The most important questions which engaged the attention of the Association were those of the education of articled clerks, and of the relative position of barristers and attorneys, the first of which formed the subject of a debate, whilst the second was discussed in a paper by Mr. Field. The first question submitted to the Association in relation to the former subject was—Whether it would be advisable to substitute for the examination now held before admission, several examinations in one or more of the subjects in which proficiency is required, to be held at different times during the period of clerkship, so as to spread the influence of the system over several years, instead of concentrating it at a single point, and so promoting the pernicious habit of cramming? It was also debated—Whether a certificate of having passed an examination in the more common branches of education should be made a necessary condition to admission to articles? There can hardly be two opinions as to the expediency of securing for articled clerks a liberal education and a sound acquaintance with the principles of their profession, and we are not prepared to suggest any more efficient means of obtaining this end than that of examinations. We also fully agree with the opinion, that where proficiency in a number of different subjects is required, separate examinations in each are better than a collective one in all, both because the mind is less distracted between a variety of objects, and because there is less temptation to procrastination; and we think that with the addition of honorary distinctions for merit, such as have been recently introduced in the existing examination before admission, the system would be as efficient as it could become. We must, on the other hand, point out that nothing is more easy than to be misled by false analogies on the subject, and that nothing is more difficult than to exercise any effective influence over the education of articled clerks as a class. Examinations derive their principal credit from their use at the great public schools and the universities; but their influence in those establishments depends almost entirely upon the fact that they form a subject of common interest to a large body of students collected together in one place, who understand the character of such contests, and attach a special definite value to success and distinction in them. Before a man finally takes his degree at Cambridge he has probably been examined twenty times, and has conducted the whole of his reading—which occupies the whole of his working day—with reference to those examinations. An articled clerk is isolated, he knows nothing about examinations till he comes up to be examined in the company of people whom he never saw before, and will never see again. During the years which precede his admission, the greater part of his time is occupied in pursuits which have no direct relation to examinations. He is a clerk, and not a student; and any scheme for his education which neglects this essential distinction will be necessarily superficial, and will be sure to disappoint the expectations which leave it out of account. We are speaking, of course, of the education of articled clerks as it now exists. Of late years, courses of lectures have been given at the Law Institution, and, as many clerks spend some portion of their time before admission in London, they have the opportunity of attending these lectures, if so disposed. Whether anything further should be done to exact from the clerk a more systematic study, whether his class should be comprehended in a properly constituted legal university, is a very wide question, and one to be hereafter considered in all its bearings.

The most interesting subject discussed by the Association, was that to which Mr. Field's paper on "the Autocracy of the Bar, and on the system of prescribed tariffs for legal wages, and on the connection of these two subjects," was devoted. Mr. Field directed his attention to a great variety of subjects, at some of which we cannot even glance, but his principal recommendations were the abolition of the distinction between barristers and attorneys, and the adoption of an entirely new system of payment for the new profession so constituted. Mr. Field would wish to see every attorney or solicitor entitled to act as an advocate, and the result of this measure would no doubt be that every advocate would begin his professional life as a solicitor, and gradually withdraw to the other branch of the profession, as he found that his talents suited him for it. He founds this proposal partly on the hardship to which attornies and solicitors are now exposed by the necessity of leaving their own business before they can keep terms at the bar, partly on the ground that actual intercourse with the clients would be an excellent education for advocates, as contrasted with the present inefficient system in use in the Inns of Court, partly on the example of America, and partly on the ground that free trade demands the suppression of all exclusive guilds, of which the Inns of Court form one. Such in a condensed shape is Mr. Field's argument. He expands it with much vigour of language and illustration, and, although we cannot adopt his conclusions in their full extent, we do think that they would be almost inevitable if the choice lay between the system which he advocates and that which now exists. There can be no doubt that the profession is at present constituted in such a manner that many men eminently qualified for advocacy are solicitors, whilst many others, eminently unqualified for almost any employment, are barristers, and the remedy proposed by Mr. Field would undoubtedly destroy this, as well as many other anomalies. There is, however, another side to the question, which it is very desirable to notice. Everyone who has any acquaintance with the existing conditions of English law must be aware that its great defect is its unsystematic and unscientific character; and the only hope of remedying this evil lies in training up a body of men who will study the subject, not merely or principally with a view to the immediate practice of the profession, but in the spirit in which men study other sciences. A certain maturity of mind, and the undisturbed devotion of several years to the subject, are indispensable conditions of such study. It would, of course, be out of the question to demand such qualifications of articled clerks, who, for the most part, pass their final examination at twenty-one or twenty-two; and though no doubt an active and ambitious man might contrive to combine it with the practice of a solicitor, he would probably find it very difficult, and, as his business increased, almost impossible to do so. It appears to us, therefore, that such a body of men can only be obtained by making an examination of considerable depth and difficulty compulsory upon all persons intending to become advocates, and by furnishing the best machinery that can be devised, in the shape of lectures, public and private, as a preparation for them. We are not prepared to lay down a detailed scheme on the subject, but the general principle which appears to us fairest is, that any one, solicitor or not, who could comply with these tests should be entitled to be called to the bar if he chose. There would thus be a substantial, and not merely an arbitrary and conventional distinction between the two branches of the profession. This is the principle adopted in France, and although in that country the qualifications of an avocat are placed, as it seems to us, far too high, the result has undoubtedly been to raise very greatly the tone and credit of the profession. And this fact seems to us a conclusive answer to Sir C. Lyell's remark, that the division between the two branches of the profession could only be maintained in a highly aristocratic community, for whatever else France may be, no country is more passionately opposed to merely conventional distinctions of rank. The arrangement which we propose would, we think, realise the advantages of Mr. Field's plan, and avoid some inconveniences which he leaves out of sight, but which in practice would be seriously felt. It must be remembered that there are ten thousand attornies and solicitors of our various courts Now, if the mere fact of belonging to this numerous body entitled a man to practice in court, much of the confidence which now prevails between the bench and the bar must necessarily cease, and the failure of that mutual understanding would not only retard the transaction of business, but would in many cases make it almost impossible. It is very desirable that the business of advocacy should be vested in a body which is select enough to admit of a certain degree of personal acquaintance between the court and those who address it, and so constituted as to afford the best possible guarantee for their character as men of honour and education. If our proposal were carried out, it would go a long way to secure this desirable result. We could mention various courts, both in town and country, which are grievously afflicted by the presence of members of the bar who would certainly have never been able to attain their present dignity if they had had to pass the test of a compulsory examination. If, on the other hand, Mr. Field's suggestion were adopted, we fear that the evil would be considerably aggravated, and that the restraints which professional esprit de corps, and the personal influence of the judges, do certainly exercise over the bar, even under the present unsatisfactory system, would be greatly weakened. If the whole of the arrangements of the profession were regulated exclusively by the law of supply and demand, if every advocate and every solicitor made his own bargain on his own terms, and accustomed himself to look upon the other members of the profession simply in the light of rivals and competitors, the worst results would follow both to the public and to the profession. How far such cases are fair specimens of the behaviour of American lawyers we cannot tell, but we have certainly seen reports of several causes célèbres in the United States in which the advocate behaved in a manner which would make the hardiest Old Bailey practitioner stand aghast. In the monstrous cases of Colt and Ward the counsel were guilty of conduct for which, in England, they would in all probability have been disbarred; and, in estimating the effects of the American system, facts like these cannot be left entirely out of sight, however much and however justly we may be disposed to praise American jurisprudence. No doubt much cant is talked about the distinction between trades and professions, but, like most cants, it has a substratum of truth, which we take to be this—that the members of a profession ought to consider their occupation, not simply as a means of getting money, or as a stepping-stone to rank, but as a public service. We should rejoice to see every member of the legal profession—barrister or solicitor—look upon himself as being really and effectively what he is legally—an officer of the court, a minister of justice—and not a mere tradesman, selling his skill or his talents just as he might sell cotton or sugar. This conception of a lawyer's position involves, of course, the principle that the profession ought to be regularly governed and arranged according to the different functions which its members have to discharge, and we do not see our way to any arrangement which would fulfil the objects for which the profession exists without recognising the distinction between those who study law as a science and those who are principally concerned in the practical application of its broad rules to the common affairs of life. What the profession ought to do, and what at present it entirely fails to do, is, to take care that no distinctions shall be permitted except those which are founded upon just and substantial considerations. We should wish to see this defect remedied, not by destroying the whole legal corporation, but by making it do its duty in an efficient manner. We are convinced that, in some form or other, such a corporation must exist. We do not understand even Mr. Field to go so far as to propose that it shall be as much open to a man to set up as a lawyer as to open a grocer's shop; if he does not go to this length, the only question between us is, whether the legal guild shall or shall not recognise in any way the difference in kind between different branches of legal labour.

With the other part of Mr. Field's paper, that which refers to the mode of payment to both branches of the profession, we have a more entire sympathy. The subject is no doubt a difficult one; payment by a commission on the transaction, and of costs out of pocket, is, we believe, the usual course in France, and would, we think, be infinitely preferable to the plan existing in England, of doing gratuitously what should be paid for, and of charging for what should be done gratuitously. We also agree to a great extent with Mr. Field's remarks on the bar etiquette of taking fees and not earning them; but we think he rather overstates, and thereby seriously weakens his case, by saying that it is conduct for which an attorney would be struck off the rolls. Every solicitor is aware of the practice, and if he chooses to employ a man so much over-loaded with business that he cannot get through his work, he runs the risk with his eyes open. There are, moreover, practical difficulties in the question, which Mr. Field overlooks. A man with a very moderate share of business has carefully written an opinion, advised on evidence, and read his brief in two cases. One is in the Queen's Bench and one in the Exchequer; and, owing to one of the innumerable accidents which happen every day, both, contrary to expectation, come on at the same moment. Is he to return his fees for one after doing the work for both? On circuit the difficulty would be still greater. It is easy to put hard cases on both sides, but the practice is no doubt one which constantly gives rise to most dishonest conduct, and which most peremptorily requires reform. In the meantime we would suggest to solicitors that the remedy is to some extent in their own hands. They are under no obligation to give briefs to those who will not or cannot read them.

At a meeting of the committee of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, held on the 10th ult., the following resolution was passed unanimously:—

"That this committee cordially recommend The Solicitors' Journal and Reporter to the support of the members of this association, feeling convinced that it is calculated 'to promote the interests of suitors, by the better and more economical administration of the law, and to maintain the rights and increase the usefulness of the profession,' which are the declared objects of this association."

Manchester Law Association.

The committee of the Manchester Law Association passed the following resolution on the 3rd ult.:—

"The subject of the establishment of a proposed legal newspaper, to be called The Solicitors' Journal and Reporter, having been brought before the committee of the society, it was resolved that the secretary be authorised to forward to the Manchester solicitors the prospectus issued by the provisional directors, together with the printed form of application for shares and for subscribers to the paper, accompanied by a letter from him requesting a reply to be made to him within an early day to be named."

Leeds Law Society.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Leeds Law Society, on the 17th ult.:—

"That this society entertains a very decided opinion that the establishment of a weekly journal, devoted to the promotion of the interests of the attorneys and solicitors, in conjunction with the advocacy of well-digested legal forms, is of great importance to the legal profession, both in London and the provinces, and also to the public; and, therefore, regards with much satisfaction the project of The Solicitors' Journal and Reporter, and strongly recommends it to the support of its individual members, and of the profession generally."

Liverpool Law Society.

An intimation has also been received from the Secretary of the Liverpool Law Society, that the subject of the establishment of a proposed legal newspaper, to be called The Solicitors' Journal and Weekly Reporter, with a statement of the principles upon which, and the objects for which, it is intended to be founded, having been brought before the committee, it was resolved that that committee earnestly recommend it to the members of the Law Society for their support, and urge upon each individual member the desirableness of his name being as early as possible added to the subscription list.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

THE English Funds have manifested little variation during the week, and at the close of this day are about ⅛ below the price of this day week. The most important Foreign Securities, namely, French 3 per Cents,, Russian 4½ per Cents., Sardinian 5 per Cents., Turkish 6 per Cents., and Turkish 4 per Cents., guaranteed, have continued steady, being now generally a shade lower than last week.

The Bank Directors have this day notified their willingness to make advances on Consols now open, at 6½ per Cent., the Bank rate of discount being 6 per Cent.

At Constantinople the Government has conceeded to English capitalists the establishment of the Imperial National Bank of Turkey, and arrangements have been definitively made.

The movement in favour of immediate repeal or large reduction of the Property Tax, which has been strongly supported in the provinces is more feebly advocated in the City of London. City men are mindful of the outstanding charges of the late war, and that, without this tax in its full amount for another year, the expected addition to our permanent debt must be increased largely.

Since the payments incidental to the 4th January, money has become rather more easy in the discount market. There is an increasing feeling that the investigation by Parliament into the operation of the Bank Restriction Act will not produce any change iu principle, nor any material change in details. The weekly accounnt of the Bank of England will be found below.

The Stock of Grain at some of the outports has largely accumulated. There has been very little variation since last week in the price of Corn, either in London or the country. The prices of other prime necessaries are well maintained. Reports from the manufacturing districts are favourable, with steady demand and extensive orders.

The payment to the public of the January dividends at the Bank, and of the life annuities at the National Debt Office, commenced on Thursday.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 17, 1857.

THE solicitor and his client have, we believe, an equal interest in advancing legal reform; and whatever changes of law and practice are beneficial to the one will, in the long run, prove salutary to the other. We firmly maintain, and shall steadfastly act upon, this principle; and so long as it is kept in mind, there will be no room for extravagant alarm as to the effect upon the interests of solicitors of possible alterations in the course of business. We hold it to be absolutely certain that public and professional advantage are identical, and that any measure which promotes the one must also advance the other. To proclaim that the interest of the solicitor is antagonistic to that of all the world besides, appears to us, in the first place, to be manifestly untrue; and, secondly, to be singularly rash. If ever a question could possibly arise on which the general good demanded one course of legislation, and the good of the legal profession demanded another, we are bound to say, in all sincerity, that we believe the national resolve would overpower the opposition of a class. We should only deceive our readers if we pretended to expect that the closest union, and the most energetic action of the body of solicitors, could resist the combination of all other classes of the community. The power of the profession is very great; and, wisely directed, may effect vast results, while blind and rash resistance to the course of social progress may destroy it. The unlearned laity is prone to jealousy and distrust of lawyers; and although much has been done to diffuse a juster estimate of the legal body, it is by no means too late for ill-advised and intemperate agitation to damage or destroy the credit that has been slowly gained.

These remarks appear to us by no means inappropriate, as the time draws near for the opening of a session which promises to be fertile in the discussion, and perhaps in the enactment, of very sweeping changes in legal practice. Whatever may be the feelings and wishes, and the true view of the interests of the solicitors, it is pretty plain that the existing system of conveyancing will undergo extensive modifications at no distant day. We do not believe that it would be sound policy to resist this change, and we are fully convinced that the opposition, if attempted, would prove useless. But the judicious statesman will contrive to lead and guide a movement which he feels himself inadequate to withstand; and this is the line of conduct which the lawyers, if prudent, will adopt when the public, no longer intent on war but on domestic grievances, demands the abolition of a system of which it feels the burden, but cannot understand the merits. If the lawyers were so perverse and blind as to refuse their aid in framing a plan of registration for real property, the ill-digested schemes of former years would be reproduced and inconsiderately adopted by a people who know the evil from which they fly, but not that upon which they rush. It will be in the memory of many readers that the LORD CHANCELLOR'S bill for registering estates very nearly became law in 1851, and again in 1853; and that the successful opposition to that bill was mainly the work of the various Law Societies, bodies which comprised among their members the most extensive experience of the working of the existing system, and the most reliable opinions upon the various schemes that had been framed as substitutes.

Now, it was felt by the authors of this successful opposition that the attempt they had once defeated would be speedily renewed, and that, if they would continue to hold the advantage they had gained, they must appear not only as objectors but as proposers, and must be prepared to explain to Parliament not only what could not but what could be done. The registration of deeds was believed to be either impossible or mischievous; but the registration of legal titles appeared simple and practically useful. This was the plan which was investigated by the Committee of the House of Commons in 1853, and which we may presume has been under the consideration of the Royal Commission which has sat during the three last years. It would appear that the ATTORNEY-GENERAL has determined to propose such a system of registration to Parliament in the forthcoming session; and we believe it will be generally felt, by all who understand the scheme, that it offers the best, and perhaps the only solution of a most difficult problem in legislation. Whether such a bill will be carried this year or next year is, of course, quite uncertain, and depends upon a variety of accidents and conflicting influences. But it is our duty to impress upon our readers, that the adoption of such a measure is possible at the present moment, and very probable at no distant day. We repeat that conveyancing practice cannot, and will not, continue what it now is. We do not ourselves believe that the true interest of the profession requires that it should so continue; and, whether that be so or not, we are convinced that the day for resisting alteration is gone by, and that we should injure instead of benefitting the solicitors by attempting to maintain the system as it now exists. A change which many people call, whether rightly or wrongly, a reform is necessary and inevitable; and if the profession will not lead this movement, the only alternative will be to follow it. The intimate familiarity of solicitors with all the details of conveyancing ought to secure to them a large share of influence in framing any scheme of registration that is intended to work successfully. But the authority that might be thus acquired will, of course, be forfeited at the outset, if the earliest rumour of the contemplated measure is encountered by a thoughtless clamour, the offspring of ignorance, and of a very narrow and mistaken view of sectional and individual interests. We firmly believe that the reform which popular instinct declares possible professional sagacity might effect, and that the solicitors who contributed to procure this great advantage for the community would not find themselves losers by it in point of income, and, at the same time, they would gain immensely in social influence and consideration, as the authors of a wise, and bold, and thoroughly disinterested reform.

We shall not, however, pretend for a single instant to disguise those features of the scheme for registering titles which have a tendency to alarm solicitors. The popular conception of a lawyer is that he is a man who lives by verbiage, and even lawyers must admit that this idea is, to some extent, a just one; inasmuch as they cannot but feel that, if verbiage is likely to be done away with, the question of how lawyers are thenceforth to live assumes an immediate and very urgent interest. But we do not apprehend that it will be found impossible to combine with the altered practice a change in the method of remuneration, which shall secure to the solicitor an adequate recompense for the trouble and responsibility he undertakes, and shall at the same time get rid of many features of the existing system of conveyancing charges which every one admits to be indefensible. The practice in various other countries of charging a per centage upon the value of property, bought or sold, would furnish one method of remunerating the solicitor without regard to the number of folios in the conveyance. The plan of registering legal titles to land is commonly explained by comparing it to the bank accounts of stock, and the parallel might be extended by supposing the solicitor to be paid, like the stockbroker, by a per centage, and the business of buying and selling land to be strictly confined, like that of dealing in stock, to a special and well-known class of men. If it be really the wish of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL to produce and carry a measure which shall satisfactorily dispose of the long-vexed subject of registration, he will take care that the question of conveyancing costs is maturely considered and equitably adjusted by the Legislature. The share which solicitors may take in preparing and elaborating the scheme of registration will command for them a respectful hearing when they urge what they conceive to be their own fair claims. This advantage they may derive from an enlightened perception of their own as involved in the general good, and it can only be endangered by proclaiming to the profession and to the public that their interests are irreconcilably opposed.

THE case of SWINFEN v. SWINFEN, in which the Court of Common Pleas gave judgment on Monday last, relates to a subject of great interest, and is a very curious illustration of the spirit in which that very important branch of the Legislature—the fifteen judges—perform their duties.

As all our readers are aware, a practice has long existed, founded, like many other practices in English law, upon no definite principle, by which counsel exercise the functions of judges, more or less directly compelling their clients to submit cases to arbitration, or to compromise them on such terms as appear to the counsel to be fair. There are, no doubt, many circumstances in which this practice is highly beneficial to the client's interests; but, like every other practice resting on no intelligible ground, it produces, in a large minority of cases, the most cruel injustice. Few objects would be of more importance to the legal profession than a clear exposition of the principles which ought to regulate the right of legal advisers in general, and of counsel in particular, to act for their clients; and the case of SWINFEN v. SWINFEN would almost seem to have been made on purpose to give the court by which it was decided an opportunity of laying down such rules.

The facts, stated very shortly indeed, were as follows:—On a trial affecting the right to a large property, the counsel (Sir F. THESIGER), the attorney (Mr. SIMPSON), and the client (Mrs. SWINFEN), met after the adjournment of the court on a Saturday night, and Mrs. SWINFEN took time to consider a proposal for a compromise, suggested to her by Sir F. THESIGER. On the Sunday, she sent a telegraphic message, distinctly refusing to accept it. On the Monday, Mr. SIMPSON learnt a fact which led him to think that the cause ought to be compromised, and in this opinion Sir FREDERICK concurred with him. Mrs. SWINFEN being absent, and not being aware of the fact which led her legal advisers to their opinion, her counsel agreed to certain terms with the counsel on the other side. Mr. SIMPSON was present during the negotiation, and did nothing to prevent it, though he told his counsel that he could not take the responsibility of instructing them to compromise. Sir F. THESIGER, thereupon took the responsibility on himself, and closed the negotiation, which was made in the usual course an order at nisi prius, and afterwards a rule of court. The client refused to carry out the terms, and the question whether she was at liberty to do so, arose upon a motion to make absolute a rule for an attachment against her for such refusal.

This state of facts raised, as broadly as possible, two questions vitally important to all legal practitioners. First. If an attorney is present in court during a negotiation between counsel, and offers to such negotiation no opposition of which the other side can take notice, does he consent to the terms on which the negotiation issues; and if so, does such consent bind the client? Secondly. Have counsel in a cause general authority to compromise it, independently of the instructions of the attorney, express or implied? Each of these questions is of the highest practical importance, and it is not a little singular that they should have remained so long unsettled. It is no less singular that, when these points are raised, the effect of the first decision upon them should have been to involve each of them in even greater obscurity than formerly prevailed. A better illustration could hardly have been given of the extreme inconvenience of committing one of the most important parts of our legislation to the hands of legislators who can only act under a double set of fetters. One set is imposed upon them by the fiction that they only declare, but do not make the law; and the other, by the fact that they can only enunciate such principles as are required by the circumstances which come before them, or are permitted by the forms of procedure by which they are presented to their notice.

As our readers are doubtless aware, a rule for an attachment can only be made absolute by the unanimous judgment of the court. In SWINFEN v. SWINFEN Mr. Justice CROWDER took one view, and Mr. Justice CRESSWELL and Mr. Justice WILLIAMS took another. There was, therefore, no rule; and as Mr. Justice CROWDER's opinion prevailed in opposition to those of his brethren, it fell to his lot to deliver judgment. The effect of this is, that in so far as SWINFEN v. SWINFEN is an authority at all, it is an authority against the view adopted by a majority of the judges who heard it; and as if this were not confusing enough, the judgment of Mr. Justice CROWDER, on one of the two points in question, is of the very narrowest and most negative kind. He does not decide whether, under the circumstances which we have stated, the tacit consent of the attorney would bind his client, but confines himself to saying, "I am strongly disposed to think that after counsel has had a personal interview with his client for the express purpose of obtaining authority to compromise on the given basis, which the client has declined to give, the counsel ought not to act even upon the direct instructions of the attorney, if at variance with the client's expressed determination." Probably Mr. Justice CROWDER is of opinion that, if such instructions were given, and were acted on, the compromise would not be binding on the client; but, if this be his opinion, his language very inadequately expresses it. Still less satisfactory is his opinion on the question whether the conduct of the attorney in this case amounted to a tacit consent. All that he says is that he does not think that an attachment ought to be granted on the strength of it; but he leaves it quite uncertain whether an action might not be brought on the compromise itself. On this part of the case, therefore, SWINFEN v. SWINFEN is only an authority for the proposition that it has been held by one Judge against two that, if a client has expressly dissented from a proposed compromise, and the same is afterwards entered into by counsel in the presence of the attorney, who makes no opposition, the client, refusing to adopt it, will not be liable to an attachment for contempt, though he may or may not be liable to an action.

On the other question—namely, whether counsel has a right, as general agent for his client, to enter into a compromise opposed to the client's express wishes, facts having come out in the client's absence which in his judgment render such compromise advisable—Mr. Justice CROWDER takes a ground which is certainly broad and clear, though we do not think it meets all the emergencies which might arise. His view is that a barrister is a special and not a general agent; that his authority only extends to the management of the cause, and not to effecting compromises; and no doubt the contrary proposition is one which cannot, upon any grounds of common sense, be maintained for a moment; and, to us at least, it seems that it would be equally opposed to all rules of law. It would be a monstrous thing to make the authority of the agent entirely independent of the will of the principal. But though we feel no doubt upon this point, we feel quite as strongly that Mr. Justice CROWDER'S view cannot be accepted as an ultimate solution of the difficulty. Indeed it would be a bold thing to do so in opposition to two such judges as those who differed from him. It is surely hard to say, that if in the absence of the client the whole state of circumstances is changed by the discovery of new facts, his legal advisers are not to be allowed to do for him what in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he would, if present, wish to do himself. The offer of a compromise once rejected may not be renewed; and thus a client may be utterly ruined by what may, perhaps, be an involuntary absence. It is, moreover, no easy matter to draw the line between the right of compromising a case, and the right of conducting a case. The latter may often practically involve the former. The difficulties on the other side are obvious enough, and are efficiently dealt with in Mr. Justice CROWDER'S judgment, but we do not think he pays sufficient attention to those which we have here suggested. The case will in all probability go before a higher tribunal, which we hope will lay down some broad and intelligible rules. So far as the public are concerned, SWINFEN v. SWINFEN decides nothing at all.

Legal News.

THE conviction of the prisoners charged with the bullion robbery on the South Eastern Railway last May twelvemonth, was generally anticipated; and no difference of opinion can reasonably exist as to their guilt. The confirmation of AGAR'S story "in some fact which goes to fix the guilt on the particular persons charged," was abundantly supplied by a variety of minute circumstances. Counsel for the defence quoted the well known dictum of Lord ABINGER, that "a man who has been guilty of a crime himself will always be able to relate the facts of the case, and if the confirmation be only of the truth of that history, without identifying the person, that is really no corroboration at all." The public who now hear or read this rule of evidence for the first time, must be struck by the remarkable agreement which it shows between the reason of the law and the reason of mankind at large; and we hope that the publicity now given to such an excellent example of judicial wisdom will go a long way towards rescuing the law and its professors from the discredit into which they seem lately to have fallen in city circles. It will probably be felt that the words of Lord ABINGER describe not only what ought to have been proved, but what actually was proved on the late trial against all three prisoners. The confidence of the public in the decisions of our criminal tribunals has just been somewhat shaken by the unfortunate case of MARKHAM; but still we do not apprehend that the ingenious speeches delivered this week at the Old Bailey will produce in any sane mind a belief that injustice can have been done to BURGESS, PIERCE, and TESTER.

Every one will sympathize with the regret expressed by Mr. Baron MARTIN at the escape of PIERCE with a conviction merely for simple larceny, and a sentence of two years' imprisonment, with hard labour. BURGESS and TESTER, being servants of the Company when the robbery was committed, receive sentence of "transportation beyond the seas" for the term of fourteen years. What that sentence actually means, or what, in the mutations of parliamentary sentiment, it may come to mean, would, perhaps, be difficult to tell. On one point, however, we have the advantage of a judicial declaration. The learned Baron noticed that "it was perfectly clear AGAR was fond of associating with persons of the other sex," and henceforth he will be "entirely cut off from all such associations;" and we may probably venture to infer that the same will be the case with TESTER and BURGESS. The character of AGAR is extraordinary, and may well attract the study of the psychologist; but the trait which Baron MARTIN appears to have thought remarkable, belongs not only to thieves, vulgar and refined, but also to many honest men. Indeed, we might infer from the zeal of the learned Baron on behalf of AGAR'S injured mistress, that "persons of the other sex" are viewed by him with the same partiality which he seems to have thought exceptional in the case of AGAR. "It is perfectly clear," to use Baron MARTIN'S phrase, that his indignation at "the robbery of that wretched woman" by PIERCE, was as genuine as the applause bestowed by the audience upon his denunciation of PIERCE'S villany. Lord CAMPBELL himself might have envied the success of his learned brother in this "point;" and it may be suspected that Baron MARTIN shares, not only the human infirmity of the convict AGAR, but also that of the Lord Chief Justice.

In the case of the Royal British Bank, a variety of proceedings have taken place. The adjudication of bankruptcy against Mr. HUMPHREY BROWN, M.P., obtained on the petition of the assignees of the bank, has been annulled. Great difficulty and expense were apprehended by the assignees in supporting the adjudication, and it was therefore thought advisable to abandon the petition before the court, and endeavour to obtain a fresh adjudication on the debt of another creditor. A petition has also been presented on behalf of Mr. HUMPHREY BROWN to annul the adjudication against the bank. On Monday, various shareholders were summoned before the Commissioner to show cause why they refused to pay the call of £50 per share made by the directors a few days after the bank stopped payment. The first person summoned was a clerk to a railway company. He was the holder of six shares, and therefore called upon to pay £300. He claimed to be a creditor of the bank for £490, and a call upon him of £75 per share had been made by the official manager. He said, "he was so confounded that he did not know what course he ought to take, which call ought to be paid, or to whom he ought to pay it. He had earned the amount paid for the shares by his own industry, and his case was a very hard one." The next person who appeared held ten shares, which he alleged he had been induced to take by fraud. He had made the assignees an offer to pay £100 in full, and had hinted that, if that sum were not accepted, "it would do to take him through the court." Another person summoned, was, by his own account, "only a poor jobbing master carpenter," and, as the holder of fifty shares, was called upon to pay £2,500. He might perhaps be able to pay £500 in a month or so, if his friends would assist him. Then came one, formerly a cheesemonger, but now out of business, who held five shares. He was not prepared to pay the call, but had friends who would endeavour to make up a small sum. Another shareholder had paid £400 on supplemental shares as lately as April last. He was now called upon to pay £500, but stated himself to be quite insolvent. Then came a fishmonger, holder of ten shares, who had not paid the call of £500, and was not able to do so, or to make any offer. Lastly, there appeared a linendraper's clerk, holding three shares, who was not in a position to pay the call.

While this herd of humble victims is pursued in Bankruptcy, the courts at Westminster are daily beset with applications against the more wealthy shareholders individually. Several motions have been made for leave to issue execution against shareholders on judgments obtained against the official manager, and the usual defence has been that the holders were induced to take their shares by fraud. This question has now been raised in all the courts, and it stands over to ascertain whether the judges are unanimous upon the point.

The chronicle of a week's litigation in the matter of the Royal British Bank is not yet complete. On Wednesday Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD gave a judgment, which, it is stated, will be final; and which will govern questions of the pecuniary value of £30,000. Mr. BANES kept a drawing account at the Bank, and also a discount account. At the stoppage of the Bank there was a cash balance in Mr. BANES's favour of £503, the Bank being the holder of certain bills. The assignees claimed a right to sue Mr. BANES and other parties whose names were on the bills, and contended that Mr. BANES must prove for the balance due to him like any other creditor. Mr. BANES prayed that, the Bank having applied from the cash balance a sum of £166, as required for the full liquidation of its claims upon the bills, the said bills might be given up to him, and that the court would make an order that no action be brought on their account. The petitioner would then prove for the smaller, instead of the larger, balance. Mr. BANES was the drawer of the bills, which had been accepted for value. The Commissioner decided that the bank had a right to require payment of the bills from the acceptors, and that Mr. BANES must be left to take such course as he might be advised with regard to the drawing account.

The further proceedings in bankruptcy against shareholders have been private, it having been found inexpedient to reveal the particulars of such cases as those of which we have given some specimens above. An attempt is said to be now making to collect a fund among the shareholders, with a view to the settlement of all claims upon the bank.

The "Common Law Judicial Business" Commissioners have commenced their labours, and have invited suggestions on the subject-matter of their inquiry into the business of the superior courts of common law, the times and places of holding the assizes, and the division of the country into circuits.

It is understood that Mr. CAIRNS, Q.C., and Mr. SELWYN, Q.C., have elected to practice—the former in the court of the Vice-Chancellor WOOD, and the latter at the Rolls.

BARRISTER SAWARD.

The last two years have been crowded with occurrences which seem to have been expressly intended to throw discredit upon the most favoured classes of the community. We were always bragging of the high character of English commerce, and of the honesty, intelligence, and enterprise of English merchants. Hardly a quarter has passed for two years back, in which some member of the commercial aristocracy has not walked out of the felon's dock at the Old Bailey, to the appropriate but uncongenial society of the colonists of Portland Island or Dartmoor; and few of these intervals have elapsed in which some great mercantile concern has not been ruined, either by fraud or folly. Last week, a similar lesson was read to another class, which certainly did not require it less than the mercantile world, and which is, no doubt, in a position to profit by it more easily. No body in the country enjoys a higher social standing than the bar; indeed, the advantages and dignities of the profession are the sole reasons which induce many persons to become members of it. The character of those who are real barristers, and who live, or intend to live, by their profession, unquestionably stands high; but the mere fact of having a right to be registered in the law list as a barrister, can hardly, we should think, be considered an honour by the weakest of mankind, after the exposure, last week, of the career of "Barrister Saward," whom the exemplary Edward Agar "saw pleading in Westminster Hall." We alluded last week to this learned gentleman's connection with the Mansion House frauds; and here we find him again resorted to, apparently quite in the ordinary course of business, by the most accomplished thieves in London, as a receiver of stolen goods. This man must have been recommended to the benchers of the Inner Temple, by two barristers, as "a gentleman of respectability," and must have carefully purged himself from the suspicion of being an attorney—an accusation of which we hope and believe he was entirely innocent. Can anything put in a clearer light the total inefficiency of the present arrangement for testing the fitness of candidates for the bar? Surely, if a man who has been for years an associate of thieves could find his way into the profession, the qualifications required must be a mere farce. Saward's case has proved conclusively, that a cheat and a thief may be a barrister, as Sir John Dean Paul's proved that a banker may be a robber and a hypocrite. Of course, no profession can invent tests which will exclude from its ranks all but unspotted characters; but the bar can certainly find means to prevent common thieves from qualifying themselves for police magistracies and commissionerships by becoming "barristers of seven years' standing." For the credit of the other branch of the profession, we hope that, notwithstanding he has been sixteen years a barrister, Mr. Saward, "of the Home Circuit" (but now of the Old Bailey), was the original of Mr. Briefless.

JUDICIAL OATHS.

In a case heard at the Newcastle County Court last week, the following colloquy took place:—On the plaintiff making his appearance and taking his book to be sworn, Mr. Story, the defendant's solicitor, said he wished the judge to ask him what form of oath was binding on his conscience. The Plaintiff.—The regular form of oath, so far as I know. Mr. Story.—Then, do you believe in the existence of a God? The Plaintiff.—I believe in the existence of a God. Mr. Story.—Whom we know as the Supreme Being? The Plaintiff.—I cannot exactly tell what you know, but I believe in a Supreme Being. Mr. Story.—Then, I shall ask you the last question. Do you believe in the existence of a future state of rewards and punishments? The plaintiff.—I can't say I disbelieve in them. Mr. Story.—I must have your absolute answer. The question is, do you or do you not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, not disbelieve; do you or do you not absolutely believe in it? The Plaintiff.—I can hardly say whether I do or whether I don't. Mr. Story.—Do you or do you not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments? The Plaintiff.—I can't tell exactly what you mean. If you will explain what you mean by rewards and punishments, I shall perhaps be able to answer you. Mr. Story.—Then, do you believe in the existence of heaven and hell? The Plaintiff.—I believe there is such a thing talked about; whether there is such a thing I can't tell. Mr. Story.—Then, your Honour, I must submit that this man by his answers brings himself within what the law terms incompetency to give evidence from infamy. The man who would give such answers as this is infamous in the eyes of the law. The Judge.—It is not because he is infamous, but because he can't be believed. Mr. Story.—I say the form used is "infamous." He cannot be heard in any court of justice. The Judge (addressing the plaintiff).—Suppose you are sworn in any particular way, do you consider that you would be in any way bound by what will take place hereafter in the way of punishments or rewards for it? No, I don't, Sir. The Judge.—Then, I can't take your evidence. Mr. Story.—Then, your Honour ought to direct that he should be removed from the court. A man who would give utterance to opinions of this sort—— The Judge.—He has a right to his opinion. The plaintiff was nonsuited.

STATISTICS OF CRIME.

The Epiphany Quarter Sessions for the four western counties have just been held, and it appears from the charges delivered by the chairmen to the grand juries that the state of crime is on the whole satisfactory. In Dorset, the commitments in 1855 for felony were 246; misdemeanours, 467; under the Juvenile Offenders' Act, 26; summarily convicted, 31; making a total of 770. In the year just passed, however, there were only 627, showing a decrease of 143. Some of the offences were of a rather serious nature, and the chairman stated that within the last two years no less than nine ticket-of-leave men had been re-convicted. In Devonshire, the number for trial were 29, which, considering the number tried under the Criminal Justice Act, was about the same as at the corresponding period of last year. In Cornwall, the chairman, Mr. J. K. Lethbridge, expressed his regret at the large number of prisoners for trial, there being no less than 35, and observed that that "seemed to to show that they were returning to those days which he had hoped had gone by." In Somerset, the number for present trial was 25; for the adjourned sessions, 31; under the Criminal Justice Act, 46; total 102, against 109 in the corresponding period of last year.

TICKETS OF LEAVE.

At the Central Criminal Court, on the 7th inst., Mr. Justice Willes said that he wished to correct certain observations made by him lately at Warwick, in consequence of finding, while on circuit, that a considerable number of persons upon whom a sentence of penal servitude had been passed were at liberty, and, as he was informed, under tickets of leave. Since then the matter had been explained, and he found that the cases to which he had referred were exceptional, and that, in practice, persons who were sentenced to penal servitude must undergo their full sentence. These cases at first sight appeared to show that penal servitude was subject to ticket of leave; but having been fully informed of the circumstances, he found that, in point of fact, no tickets of leave were granted in those instances, but that those persons were let out in the ordinary way by an unconditional discharge, under circumstances of a very peculiar character.

Mr. Baron Martin sentenced a prisoner to six years' penal servitude, and said that, in practice, a ticket of leave was never granted when a prisoner was sentenced to this punishment.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

THERE are some reported cases in which the court has granted an injunction to restrain the disclosure of secrets acquired in the course of a confidential employment. The principle of the rule which governs such cases, is the same as that which prevents a solicitor from being compelled to disclose, to the detriment of his client, secrets which he has learned in his professional capacity. Thus, in Evitt v. Price, 1 Sim. 483, an accountant, who had been employed by a firm, and allowed by them free access to their books and papers, from which he had made extracts, was ordered to deliver up these extracts to his employers, and was restrained from taking or retaining any copies of the same, and from communicating the contents thereof, or any of the information therein contained, to any person whatever. The general rule, however, must be understood, with some restrictions. Thus, in the recent case of Gartside v. Outram, 5 W.R. 36, the bill, which was filed by woolbrokers at Liverpool against one who had been their clerk, stated that some of the plaintiffs' customers, after the defendant had left their employment, had applied to them for explanations as to various items in their accounts, admitting that they had received private information, and had been furnished with extracts from the books and accounts of the firm, which they ascertained had been supplied by the defendant. V. C. Wood took the same view as Lord Cranworth, when Vice-Chancellor, did of a similar case (Follett v. Jefferyes, 1 Sim., N.S. 3), and decided that the defendant, having raised specific charges of fraud against the plaintiffs, and having interrogated them thereupon, they were not protected from answering the interrogatories; and that, if the charges were established against the plaintiffs, the defendant would have a complete defence; "because," said his Honour, "if the doctrine were to prevail that the moment a man was retained as clerk he was bound to keep secret all irregular transactions in which his master was engaged, the court would be lending itself to the commission of fraud." The court will therefore refuse to extend protection to cases where the transactions which have come to the knowledge of the defendant were fraudulent.

The question of an insolvent's right to sue has been a good deal discussed in two recent cases (Wearing v. Ellis, 5 W.R. 40, and Brabderry v. Brooke, 5 W.R. 98). The former case, when before the Lord Chancellor, turned very much upon the construction and effect of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, by which any person not being a trader, or being a trader owing less than £300, may, upon presenting his petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, receive a protection. In Wearing v. Ellis a devisee of the insolvent filed his bill claiming to be entitled to the benefit of an assignment, by the official assignee, of a reversionary interest under circumstances which it was contended created a trust for the insolvent devisor. The bill alleged that all the creditors had accepted a composition, and executed a release to the insolvent; but no order had been obtained revesting surplus property in him. The only question for the court was simply, whether the plaintiff, under the circumstances, could maintain his suit. Vice-Chancellor Stuart, before whom the cause came on to be heard originally, held that he could, upon the ground that a surplus admittedly existed, and that in such a case, there was to all intents and purposes an end of the insolvency. It appears, however, that when the case was before his Honour, his attention was not called to the fact that the insolvency, or quasi bankruptcy, had taken place under the 5 & 6 Vic., c. 116, which contains no provision for revesting the surplus property of an insolvent. The Lord Chancellor considered that the case was to be dealt with as if it were a bankruptcy, and had happened under the Bankruptcy Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 16), under which the assignees, after the debts had been paid in full, became trustees for the quasi bankrupt, and that his devisee was, therefore, entitled to sue. The decree was on these grounds affirmed. In Bradberry v. Brooke, the question of the insolvent's right to sue arose in this way: In 1841, the plaintiff was declared insolvent, and a vesting order was made, founded on a judgment in outlawry which was afterwards reversed. The debt, in support of which the action was brought, was paid, but there was no revesting order. In 1855, the plaintiff filed his bill to redeem a mortgage, and subsequently again became insolvent, when another order was made vesting his estate in the same provisional assignee as before. It was objected that the plaintiff had no right to sue, all his interest being in the provisional assignee. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley allowed the objection. Lord Justice Turner said that a plaintiff who was insolvent before the commencement of a suit was clearly unable to file a bill; and if he became insolvent after the filing of the bill, he could not go on. Lord Justice Knight Bruce gave no opinion on this point, but the decision of the court was that the case should stand over for a month, with liberty to the provisional assignee to carry on the suit; and, in default, the bill to be dismissed.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

INSOLVENT CLERGYMAN—WRIT OF SEQUESTRARI FACIAS.

Parry v. Jones (Clerk), 5 W.R. (C.P.) 121.

THIS case turned on the respective rights of the general body of creditors (as represented by the assignees) of a clergyman who had obtained an "interim order" under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and those of an individual creditor who, after the date of such order, had sued out a sequestrari facias on a return of nulla bona having been made to a fi. fa. on a judgment. The question was raised by an application to the court, in which the action wherein such judgment had been obtained was pending, to set aside the sequestrari facias; but the court discharged the rule with costs, on the ground that as property consecrated to Divine uses (for example, the glebe or churchyard) cannot be taken in execution by temporal hands; and as, on the same principle, the profits of an ecclesiastical benefice do not, in the absence of express statutable provision, pass to the assignees of an insolvent clerk, so such profits, where they do not so pass, cannot be protected from process by the "interim order."

In explanation of this decision, it is to be observed that neither the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, nor the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, contain any provision similar to that which occurs in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 (s. 55), and according to which last-mentioned act the assignees of an insolvent prisoner, being a beneficed clergyman or curate, may apply for and obtain a sequestration of the profits of such benefice for the payment of his debts. It results, then, from the above decision, that in case of the petition being from a beneficed clerk in prison, under the Insolvent Debtors' Act, the race is between the assignees and that creditor who can first obtain a sequestration (see, in support of this, Bishop v. Hatch, 1 A. & E. 171); but in a case where the petition is under the Protection from Process Acts, the struggle lies between two or more individual creditors, and the assignees are altogether excluded.

ALLEGED WILL—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS ON ACCOUNT OF.

Prosser v. Wagner, 5 W.R. (C.P.) 146.

This was an action on a cause which had accrued to the deceased, brought by one who had taken out administration; and application was made to the court, by the defendant, for a stay of proceedings on the ground that a will was in existence abroad, and that it would shortly be proved in this country. The rule was, however, discharged on the authority of Allen v. Dundas, 3 T.R. 125, from which case it appeared that if the defendants paid the plaintiffs, they would not have to pay again, though a will should eventually be produced, and the same cause of action be put in suit by the executor therein named.

PRACTICE ON APPEAL FROM THE DECISION OF THE COURT AS TO A RULE.

Kingsford v. Merry, 5 W.R. (Exch.) 151.

In the hearing of this case, two points of practice were incidentally determined. The Court of Exchequer had refused to grant a rule to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiffs on a point reserved at the trial, and an appeal against this refusal now came on for argument, under the Common-Law Procedure Act, 1854. It was intimated by the Exchequer Chamber sitting as the Court of Appeal—1. That any preliminary objection to the appeal might be heard at the time of showing cause against the rule so to enter the verdict, if it were granted by the Court of Appeal after argument; and 2. That in the Court of Appeal, cause is to be shown against such a rule, if granted, in the first instance.

CA. SA.—EFFECT OF CHANGE IN THE PLACE OF CUSTODY.

Haines v. East India Company, 5 W.R. (Pr. C.) 159.

The circumstances of this case (which was an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from a decision of the Supreme Court at Bombay) were peculiar, and the facts occurred in India. The case is, nevertheless, interesting to the English practitioner, as being elucidatory of the true character of a capias ad satisfaciendum, and of the common-law doctrines of this country in reference to imprisonment under that writ.

The appellant (Haines) had been sued at Bombay in an action on promises by the local government there in behalf of the East India Company, and judgment, after a verdict, having been signed against him, a ca. sa. was issued out, endorsed for the amount of the judgment debt, under which he was arrested by the sheriff, and detained in custody in the gaol of Bombay. During his imprisonment, Haines fell seriously ill, and on a medical report to the effect that his temporary release from his place of confinement was absolutely requisite for his recovery, the respondents—that is to say, the Bombay government—caused him to be informed that if he chose to avail himself of the offer, he might take up his residence, during his illness, outside the prison walls, on the terms of the sheriffs' officers being continually in and about the house. To this proposal Haines gratefully consented, and was accordingly conducted by the under sheriff to a house outside the prison walls, and there suffered to remain during his illness, but always under the surveillance, as agreed, of the officers of the sheriff. Upon his recovery he was remitted to the gaol, and there applied for his discharge to the Supreme Court at Bombay, on the ground that the judgment debt, on which the ca. sa. under which he was detained had been taken out, had become satisfied by his temporary enlargement under the circumstances above explained. This application was rejected by the Supreme Court, whereupon the present appeal was brought.

The Judicial Committee dismissed the appeal with costs; and the judgment, which was delivered by Sir J. Patteson, went upon the ground that, under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, the judgment creditor had never, in point of legal effect, discharged the defendant; for that he had, at the most, consented to an irregularity in the manner of the judgment debtor's being held in custody under the ca. sa., and that the appellant, having availed himself of this irregularity, was estopped from saying that it amounted to a discharge. The court intimated, however, that it might admit of a good deed of doubt as to what the consequences of such irregularities in the custody of his prisoners might be to the sheriff, in reference more particularly to his liability for an escape. But they appeared, on the whole, to think that due consent by the sheriff, by the creditor, and by the debtor himself, would be equivalent (so far as regarded such liability) to a rule of the court for a change in the place of imprisonment, which may be had on proper cause shown, and acted upon without rendering the sheriff so liable.

It is to be remembered that it is the discharge by the plaintiff, not the mere termination of the custody, which exhausts a ca. sa., and makes the execution of another writ on the same judgment illegal. And a discharge obtained by the fraud of the defendant has been decided to be ineffectual for this purpose (see Baker v. Ridgway, 9 Moore, 114). In the above case the conduct of the appellant seems to have been such as to have invalidated his discharge on this ground, even though, except for the fraud, his release from prison had been held to be, in its legal effect, so far a satisfaction of the judgment debt as to prevent a re-capture.

TAXATION OF BILL—6 & 7 VICT. C. 73, S. 37.

Cowdell v. Neale, 2 Jur. (N.S.) C.P. 1248.

This was a rule for setting aside an order of Mr. Justice Willes (dated 14th Nov., 1856) for the taxation of the plaintiff's bill of costs. The bill had been delivered to defendant on the 9th May, 1853; and two objections were now raised to the order. The first of these was, that the judge had no jurisdiction to make such order, inasmuch as no part of the business charged for in the bill had been transacted in any court of law or equity, as required by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. And, in support of this objection, it was urged that the only items in the bill which could come under that class of business, were certain charges made in conducting for the defendant certain proceedings before, or rendered necessary by, the decision of a country magistrate sitting alone, in reference to the defendant being bound over to keep the peace; and that such a magistrate so sitting, and not made by any act of Parliament equal to justices sitting in petty sessions, does not constitute a court within the meaning of the above section in the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. As to this objection, the court gave no opinion. The second objection, however, was, that more than twelve months after the delivery of the bill had expired before the application for taxation was made, and that no "special circumstances," within the meaning of the proviso in the same 37th section, were before the judge at the time when he made the order. And this objection the court held to be fatal, and made the rule to set aside the order absolute.

EXAMINERS OF ARTICLED CLERKS FOR 1857.

By a rule of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, of this term, the several masters for the time being of those courts respectively, together with the following attornies-at-law (selected from the Council of the Incorporated Law Society), are appointed examiners for the present year, to examine all such persons as shall desire to be admitted attornies of all or either of the said courts:—Edward Savage Bailey, Keith Barnes, John Henry Bolton, William Loxham Farrer, Bartle John Laurie Frere, John Swarbreck Gregory, Germain Lavie, Joseph Maynard, William Murray, William Henry Palmer, Edward Rowland Pickering, Charles Ranken, John James Joseph Sudlow, Edward Archer Wilde, William Williams, and John Young. Any five of the examiners (one of them being one of the masters) are competent to conduct the examination in pursuance of and subject to the provisions of the rule of all the courts made in Hilary Term, 1853.

By an order of the Master of the Rolls, dated 12th January, 1857, his Honour has appointed the following solicitors (also selected from the Council of the Incorporated Law Society) to be examiners of persons, not having been prevously admitted attornies, who apply to be admitted solicitors of the Court of Chancery, touching their fitness and capacity to act as solicitors:—Edward Savage Bailey, Keith Barnes, John Henry Bolton, William Loxham Farrer, John Swarbreck Gregory, Germain Lavie, Joseph Maynard, Edward Rowland Pickering, Charles Ranken, Edward Archer Wilde, William Williams, and John Young. And the Master of the Rolls directs the examiners to conduct the examination in the manner and to the extent pointed out by the rule of 13th January, 1844, and the regulations in reference thereto.

Prior to the abolition of the office of sworn clerks in the Court of Chancery, the senior clerks in court were associated with the twelve solicitors; but, subsequently, the duty has been entrusted to the solicitors without any other officers of the court. Under the directions of the Master of the Rolls, questions in equity and the practice of the courts are propounded at the same time as the common-law examination. This arrangement saves the candidates the expense and trouble of separate examinations. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 18, expressly authorises the Master of the Rolls, jointly with the judges, to appoint examiners; the appointments are made separately; but by the convenient arrangement referred to, the examination is jointly conducted.

DEATH OF MR. PELHAM, SOLICITOR.

On Saturday morning last, at 6 o'clock, Mr. Jabez Pelham, solicitor, died at his residence in Arbour-square, Stepney. The deceased gentleman was in his 56th year, and practised at the various police-courts for a period of 27 years. In the early period of his professional career he attended to the common law practice in the courts at Westminster only. His extensive knowledge of maritime law, and his superior talent as an advocate, caused him to be retained in almost every shipping and mercantile case of importance at the Whitechapel and Bow County Courts, the Thames police-court, and the Mansion-house. He was consulted by the Lords of the Admiralty and their solicitor in 1850, when the Mercantile Marine Act was introduced, and he framed the principal discipline clauses, which were subsequently embodied in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. The late Mr. Pelham was also engaged for a period of 25 years in criminal prosecutions, and the defence of prisoners at the Central Criminal Court, the Clerkenwell Sessions, and the assizes. Mr. Pelham conducted the defence of the notorious Noah Pease Foulger, master mariner, who shot Mr. Mellish, the eminent contractor, on the Royal Exchange; and the defence of Oxford, who shot at the Queen. It will be recollected that in both cases a plea of insanity was established. Mr. Pelham was much respected by the profession, and by the judges and magistrates before whom he so frequently appeared.—Express.

SUICIDE OF A CORONER.

On Saturday evening last, Mr. Thomas Higgs, coroner for the duchy of Lancaster, and formerly for many years deputy-coroner for Westminster, was found dead in his bed, at No. 7, Crosier-street, Lambeth, having apparently died from taking poison. An indented inquisition paper, such as the jurors sign at inquests, was found hanging to the top of the bedstead on which he died, and it contained the following in the deceased's handwriting:—"20th of August, 1856. I seem dying from cholic, with stoppage in the bowels of long standing. In the event of my being unable to transact business at inquest, please refer the constables to my deputy, W. John Payne, Esq., 2, Tanfield-chambers, Temple. The inquest account is in small boxes in the back room. Taplett's Charity papers in boxes—one in front room, the other in the back room. My friend, I know, would kindly see to my papers. The general and some principal papers are in drawers on the sideboard. Mr. and Mrs. Roberts will attend to my wants in emergency. (Signed), Thos. Higgs, born 7th of February, 1787; appointed deputy-coroner for Westminster in 1818; appointed to the duchy of Lancaster by patent dated 17th March, 1828; second patent, October, 1830."

Correspondence.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—COUNTY COURTS.—As these courts are now become of great importance, and as many points of practice must arise and be determined in them under the recent Act and New Rules made in pursuance thereof, you would do a great service to the profession by devoting a corner of your Journal to the report of "Important County Court Cases," which I have no doubt the attorneys who practise in those courts will gladly supply you with for the benefit of their brother practitioners.

I am, Sir,
Yours truly,
South Molton, Jan. 13, 1856. J. T. SHAPLAND.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—If we are really to have a public registry of the transfer of real property, to render it of the utmost utility to the owners of such property and their creditors, there ought to be a branch office in every town and considerable village in the kingdom; and, to render it of any essential service, there ought at least to be a branch office in every county court district. For, in the name of common sense, what else but confusion, increased fraud, and litigation, may be expected by the establishment of a sole registry in London, except, indeed, to carry out that system of centralisation too often the parent of tyranny, and the bane of healthy free action, which seems now being set on foot in this country, and is so lamentably deprecated in the sister empire of France.

A registry of real estates is no modern expedient in our island. Dion Cassius tells us "that, whilst the Emperor Nero was engaged in his follies (nearly 1,800 years ago), there fell out an unexpected misfortune in Great Britain. Two cities were taken there, 8,000 men, Romans and confederates, were cut in pieces, and the whole island revolted from the empire. The registering of estates (says he) of the most considerable inhabitants, from which the Emperor Claudius had formerly exempted them, and which Decian, who had been sent into the island in the quality of Imperial Advocate, was for reviving, was that which served as a pretence and occasion to take up arms," &c.

In travelling through France, if you ask a French gentleman in what principally consist the advantages of this country over his own, he will answer, or would have done so a few years ago, that England was really a country the benefit of whose institutions were alike incident to or attainable by all its inhabitants, but that Paris alone was France, and that the rest of the country was little better than in a species of slavery to it.

Englishmen like to be the absolute guardians of their private property, whether personal or real, and to keep the actual possession of the one, and their title deeds, as evidence of the legal possession of the other, at their own homes. If, therefore, they continue wise, they will not let the title to their real estates depend upon whether it be on a registry or not, but mainly upon the custody of such deeds.

Who ever hears of frauds being perpetrated out of the registry counties of Middlesex or York in regard to real estates, unless in cases of great negligence? Ordinary care is a sufficient protection; and it is commonly understood that more frauds occur in the registry counties in proportion than in any others.

A general registry may do well enough in a small or (if spacious) thinly populated country, where the transfer and subdivision of real property is not frequent; but even there the possession of a person's title-deeds, exempt from the uncertainty of searches, is preferable; and in a large commercial country, such as England, the adoption of a general registry, I conceive, is far from prudent, if intended merely, or chiefly, for the security of the owners of real property.

I saw an article in the London Times newspaper a few days ago, pointing to the Irish Encumbered Estates Court as somewhat of a precedent in the present mania for a general registry, as if we had already forgotten the Sadlier frauds. Quos vult Deus perdere prius dementat.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,
A PROVINCIAL.

[Our correspondent quotes from Dion Cassius "done from the Greek by Mr. Manning" in 1704. We apprehend that this translator has entirely mistaken his author's meaning—δήμευσις τῶν χρημάτων does not mean "registering of estates," but "confiscation of property." The following is, we believe, a correct version:—"Now, the cause of the war was the confiscation of the properties which Claudius had granted to the chief men, and which properties Decianus Catus, the procurator of the island, alleged ought to be resumed." The quotation, therefore, has no bearing upon the subject of the letter.—ED. S. J. & R.]

Lectures at the Incorporated Law Society.

ON THE STATUTES OF LIMITATION.

On Monday, the 12th instant, Mr. Malcolm Kerr resumed his course of lectures on common law. After referring to his previous lectures, which treated of the changes introduced into the law by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, sections 3, 4, & 5, relating to guarantees and indemnities, the lecturer proceeded to notice the 6th and 7th sections, which require every acceptance of any inland or foreign bill, &c., to be in writing, and provide that all bills drawn or made in any part of the United Kingdom or the adjacent islands should be deemed inland bills, except as to stamps. The lecturer cited and commented on the cases of Mahoney v. Aslin, 2 B. & Ad. 478, and Mendizabal v. Machado, 6 C. & P. 218.

The lecturer then proposed to direct attention to the statutes of limitation in every-day use, and to explain the alterations effected by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (ss. 9—14). The measures passed in the Parliament of 3 & 4 W. 4, caused a revolution in the whole law of real property. The previous session, the 2 & 3 W. 4, had produced the Prescription Acts.

The acts of 3 & 4 W. 4 were—the statute of limitations, as to actions for the recovery of real property, c. 27, and as to actions for the recovery of debts secured by specialties, c. 42; the Fines and Recoveries Act, c. 74; the act making freeholds liable to the debts of the owner, c. 104; the new law of dower, c. 105; and the new law of descents and inheritance, c. 106.

The statutes of the 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 71, and the 3 & 4 W. 4, cc. 27, 42, were those prescribing a limitation—the two former as to proceedings for the recovery of real property, the last as to actions for monies secured by specialties, and to which the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act applied. These, in short, were—the twenty years' limitation, within which actions might be brought on specialties; the six years' limitation of simple contract debts; the four years' limitation of actions for trespasses to the person; and the two years' limitation of actions for verbal slander.

Besides these limitations, and to which the new statute bore no reference, there were—the sixty years' long limitation barring the right of the Crown, and all the short limitations of twelve, six, and three months, within which actions must be brought against justices of the peace and parish constables, judges and officers of the county courts, surveyors of highways, inspectors of nuisances, and other persons having to perform public duties.

The lecturer proposed to consider—

1st. The statutes of limitations as to proceedings for the recovery of real property;

2nd. As to actions on specialities;

3rd. As to actions on simple contract; and,

4th. As to actions for trespasses and words.

Mr. Kerr, before enumerating the statutes relating to the recovery of real property, referred to the two chapters in the third volume of Sir Wm. Blackstone's Commentaries describing the various remedies which the law gave for the recovery of corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. He observed, that the right to real property the former law held to consist of—1. Possession, or absolute seisin of the land; 2. The right to possession; and 3. The right of property to which possession could afterwards be joined. There were various modes of proceedings to obtain possession:—1st. Entry to recover possession; 2nd. Writ of entry to prove the right of possession, or writ of assize; and, 3rd. The writ of right.

The lecturer then alluded to the action of ejectment, and to the fiction of a lease for a year being granted by the freeholder to John Doe, and said that in only two cases was the action impossible—namely, that of an advowson, where no entry could be made thereon as an incorporeal hereditament, and that of a widow claiming her dower, she being unable to grant a lease until a third part of her husband's lands had been set out by metes and bounds.

When the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 36, abolished all the real and mixed actions with the exception of three, the action of ejectment had long been the only mode of trying title, and title came practically to depend on possession merely. If the defendant in ejectment could show that John Doe's lessor had been dispossessed for twenty years, John Doe could not recover. This was now the statutory period of limitation enacted by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 2, and overrided, of course, the old law as to writs of right, for which sixty years was the limitation by the 32 Hen. 8, c. 2. And the writ of dower, as well as the writ of right of dower (both of which are writs of right), must now be brought within twenty years; while in respect of the other real action, which was preserved, of quare impedit, a special period of limitation had been prescribed.

The proceedings for the recovery of real property were at the present time:—1. Quare Impedit; 2. Dower and right of dower; 3. Entry; and 4. Ejectment.

1. As to quare impedit, the period of limitation was prescribed by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, ss. 30-33, and the action must be brought within sixty years or three incumbencies; but no action could be brought after the lapse of a century. The provisions of this act were extended to bishops by the 6 & 7 Vic., c. 54 (see Blackst. Com. vol. iv., c. 15).

2. As to the writ of dower and right of dower, the second section of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27 applied, and no such action could be brought unless within twenty years. Section 41 prescribed six years in actions for arrears of dower.

3. As to the remedy by entry, this was in order to the preservation of the seisin of the rightful owner making such entry, and formerly such seisin was required to enable the owner to convey or devise the land. Where the owner could not effect an entry, the law enabled him annually to make claim near the lands to preserve his seisin. This was the doctrine of continual claim. Entry, since the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, had become a good legal remedy only, if the legal right was admitted by the person in possession, or, in other words, if followed by attornment.

4. As to the writ of ejectment, the statute of limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27) applied equally to the remedies by entry and by ejectment.

Real property or "hereditaments," in contradistinction to "chattels real," were corporeal or incorporeal. On corporeal hereditaments an entry could be made; and, to recover them, an ejectment could be brought. The right to incorporeal hereditaments might be asserted in different ways, according to the nature of the right, and for one species (advowsons) the remedy was by quare impedit.

Incorporeal hereditaments might be divided into two species—1. Rents, or rent services or charges, in contradistinction to rents reserved on a lease, which were part of, and attached to, the reversionary estate; and 2. Easements, which comprised all rights affecting real property which were created by, and existed only in contemplation of, law, and were truly "incorporeal"—such as rights of way, and of common and pasturage, or profits à prendre, the right attached to the possession of ancient windows and the like.

For an incorporeal rent, the proper remedy was by distress—for easements, by an action against those whose proceedings were injurious to the right of the plaintiff. For the latter there was a special statute of limitations, generally called the Prescription Act; while the former class of incorporeal hereditaments was included in the statute as to land.

1st. As to the statute respecting incorporeal hereditaments, not including rents, and the various periods of limitations of which were fixed by the Prescription Act, 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 71. Before this statute, any person asserting a prescriptive right to a profit à prendre, such as a right of fishery—or an easement, such as a right of way—must have asserted its enjoyment for six centuries and a-half; that was, for the time of legal memory. The courts first held, that evidence of enjoyment, as far back as the witnesses knew and could speak to, was enough; and, ultimately, that twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment might be deemed conclusive evidence of the right. But the plaintiff might still be defeated by the defendant's showing that the enjoyment of the right commenced in fact, or must have commenced, within legal memory, although that commencement was much more than twenty years before, or that it took place by virtue of a grant or license from the person interested in opposing it, or without his knowledge (Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 211; 4 Tyrw. 508). The Prescription Act was passed to remedy this mischief. By the first section it was provided that no claim to right of common, or other profit or benefit, should now be defeated after thirty years' uninterrupted enjoyment, by merely showing that it was first enjoyed at some time anterior to the commencement of that period. After sixty years' enjoyment, the right was absolute and indefeasible, unless it appeared that the same was by consent or agreement expressly made for the purpose by deed or writing.

The 2nd section of the Prescription Act provided for right of way or other easements, and rights to watercourses, or the use of water. Twenty years' possession constituted a primâ facie title in this case, which the statute declared should not be defeasible, by merely showing its commencement before that time; but the right was still defeasible in any other way. Forty years gave an absolute right, only defeasible, by showing an express agreement by deed or writing as in the former case. A right of way must not be enjoyed by stealth, and must be pleaded to be, and be, as of right (Holford v. Hankinson, 5 Q. B. 473; Winship v. Hudspath, 10 Exch. 5). If the owner had been asked for his permission to use it, there was no enjoyment as of right (Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 211). The enjoyment must be continuous (Onley v. Gardiner, 4 M. & W. 496); but it might still be defeated at any time within forty years, by the proof of a grant or license, written or parol, for a limited period; or that it was exercised in the absence or ignorance of the parties interested in opposing it (Beasly v. Clark, 2 Bing. N. C. 705). After forty years' uninterrupted enjoyment, however, the right was defeasible only by showing an agreement in writing. This was required to be in writing where the agreement was prior to the forty years; for, as in Beasly v. Clark, any facts showing that the enjoyment of the easement was not of right within the twenty or forty years, might be proved by parol (Tickle v. Brown, 4 Ad. & E. 369).

The 3rd section of the Prescription Act related to the use of light, the enjoyment of which for twenty years without interruption, conferred an absolute and indefeasible title, unless it appeared that the enjoyment was by some consent or agreement for the purpose.

Rights of way, and profits à prendre, were positive easements —the right to light was a negative one; the former were rights to do something affecting the property of others; the latter was a right to prevent some other from doing something on their own property, which, primâ facie, he would be entitled to do. But the latter right was now, by the statute, in precisely the same legal position as the former, and, therefore, was liable to be defeated in the same way—as, for instance, by unity of possession (Harbridge v. Warwick, 3 Exch. 332). The enjoyment in this case must also be continuous, and mere payment of rent for the use of the light was held no interruption (Plasterers' Company v. Pewterers' Company, 6 Exch. 630).

The 3rd section enacted that twenty years' uninterrupted possession of the light should constitute an absolute right, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. Before the statute, the prescriptive right to the enjoyment of ancient windows, when enjoyed for twenty years, did not extend to the City of London, which had a custom to the contrary. Any person might build up an old foundation, and darken his neighbour's windows, if he liked. This was now no longer the case, the words of the section being express (Salters' Company v. Jay, 3 Q.B. 109, 2 G. & Dav. 414; Truscott v. Merchant Tailors' Company, 4 W. R. 295). The same rule would, of course, apply to any local custom in any other part of the kingdom. In all these cases the enjoyment of the right must have been uninterrupted. The intermission of the exercise of the right in the middle or other part of the period of prescription, was not necessarily an interruption of its exercise. It was for the jury to decide upon the evidence whether there were an "interruption" or not; for the interruption must have been adverse, and not a mere neglect to exercise the right (Carr v. Foster, 3 Q. B. 581); and ceasing to exercise the right under an agreement for a limited time was no interruption (Payne v. Shedden, 1 Mood. & Rob., 383). Mr. Baron Parke, however, seemed to think that acts of user within a year of action brought, and in all cases a yearly user, ought to be shown (Lawe v. Carpenter, 6 Exch., 828). The Prescription Act would therefore seem to apply the maxim on which the annual perambulation of parish boundaries was founded, as the 4th section enacted that no act or other matter should be deemed an interruption of the period of prescription, unless acquiesced in for a year. Consequently, no interruption had any effect in defeating the right, or rather of necessitating the commencement of a fresh period of prescription, unless acquiesced in for that period (Flight v. Thomas, 11 Ad. & E., 688; 3 Per. & D., 442—affirmed on appeal in Dom. Proc. 8 Cl. & Fin., 231).

The learned lecturer then briefly noticed the difficulties of pleading these acts of interruption, and added, that the periods of prescription did not run during the time the person interested in resisting the claim was an infant, an idiot, or non compos mentis, a feme coverte, or a tenant for life, or during which any action was pending—referring to the 7th section of the statute, and the case of Clayton v. Corby, 2 Q.B., 813; 2 G. & Dav., 174.

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION—FIFTH GENERAL MEETING.

JANUARY 12th, 1857.

Lord STANLEY, M.P., took the chair at eight o'clock.

The following new members were balloted for and elected:—W. Howard, Esq.; J. D. Allcroft, Esq.; G. S. Glennie, Esq.; C. G. Wade, Esq.; R. R. R. Moore, Esq.; W. H. Willis, Esq.; W. H. Trinder, Esq.; S. Teulon, Esq.; Adolphe Back, Esq.

Mr. HASTINGS read the following letter from Lord Brougham:

"Brougham, January 8, 1857.

"My dear Hastings,—It appears to me very important that the attention of the society should be directed specially to the complaints, not by any means groundless, which have lately been made of some things connected with the administration of the criminal law. Of the change required in the law itself, I have more than once made mention; but I now refer to certain matters in the administration of it. I shall at present only mention one of them, but it is really of great importance generally and permanently, although at this time, from accidental circumstances, it possesses peculiar claims to our attention. Surely some arrangement ought to be made for giving the Home Department more regular and effectual assistance in the exercise of that most important and difficult and most delicate office of remitting or commuting punishments ordered by the sentences of courts. It is not interfering with the high prerogative of mercy to regulate the manner in which it shall be exercised. The prerogative would remain, whatever checks we might impose upon the advice to be tendered. Nay, the very department to which assessors might be appointed would be at full liberty to disregard their recommendation, as the sheriff is in the writs of inquiry executed by him with his assessor. But there is a case more closely resembling the one in question, where the royal prerogative in criminal, as well as in civil causes, is in substance touched though not in form. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council hears and determines those causes; and though its recommendations do not bind the Crown, and may be wholly disregarded, yet I question if any instance can be found, even before that tribunal was established (certainly there has been none since), of any other judgment being given by the Crown than according to the report of the committee. But I am sure I never dreamt that when we were forming the court, with powers far more extensive than the former possessed, there was any encroachment made upon the prerogative. It well deserves to be considered by one of our committees in what way this help should be provided for the department. Several plans have suggested themselves; but it is manifest that here, as in so many other branches of our inquiries touching the amendment of the law, the want of a minister of justice will be sure to meet us at each step, and that the creation of such an office would probably supply the defect complained of. There have been some cases lately in our criminal courts deserving of serious attention, on account of the erroneous views taken by juries, and not perhaps sufficiently checked by the bench. But without more full and accurate information than I have been able to obtain as to the facts, I do not even wish to state my doubts and difficulties.—Believe me, sincerely yours, "H. BROUGHAM."

Mr. HASTINGS then read a report from the Criminal Law Committee, on Mr. F. Hill's paper "On the Means of Freeing the Country from Dangerous Criminals." The report stated, that, in the opinion of the committee, the number of habitual criminals was small, and capable of being kept in check by proper arrangements, so as to make crimes of violence matters of rare occurrence. The Committee thought, that a temporary cause of the late increase of crime was to be found in the late disbandment of the militia, but that a more permanent cause was the worse than useless system of short imprisonments, by which the class of habitual criminals are constantly passing through our gaols. They recommended, as remedies for this defect, that for the present terms of penal servitude should be substituted periods of confinement equal to those of transportation formerly; and that courts of justice should be empowered to inflict, if they thought fit, one of such terms for the offence of simple larceny, although no previous conviction might have been proved. They disapproved of Mr. Hill's plan for calling upon any persons to prove that they were obtaining an honest livelihood. They also dissented from Mr. Hill's opinion, that the procedure and rules of evidence in criminal cases were productive of frequent failures in justice. On the subject of transportation, the committee were decidedly opposed to a new penal settlement, considering that there were no advantages to be secured by such an establishment which might not be better attained at home. The committee recommended that every encouragement should be given to reclaimed criminals to emigrate to such colonies as would be willing to receive them; in finding which, under proper regulations, they believed no great difficulty would be experienced. The ticket-of-leave system, they thought, had not had a fair trial. The committee concluded by submitting the following resolutions, in place of those proposed by Mr. F. Hill:—

"1. That the 4th section of the 16th & 17th Vict. c. 99, ought to be repealed, and that terms of imprisonment equal to the former terms of transportation should be adopted in place of the periods of penal servitude laid down by that section.

"2. That courts of justice ought to be empowered to inflict, at their discretion, one of such terms of imprisonment on any offender convicted of simple larceny, without any proof of previous conviction of felony.

"3. That it is not expedient to establish a new penal colony, or to renew the former system of transportation; but that it is highly desirable to encourage the emigration of reformed criminals, after they have passed through a proper period of punishment and probation in this country, to such colonies as may be willing to receive them."

Mr. HASTINGS then moved that the report now read and the resolutions be adopted.

Lord STANLEY said the debate had, practically, turned on the subject of transportation. That subject divided itself into two distinct questions: first, What they were to do with criminals while they were under punishment? secondly, What they were to do with them after their term of punishment had expired? As regarded the first of those questions, he believed there was a very general agreement amongst all who had well considered the matter, that, while a criminal was actually undergoing his sentence, it was in all respects more advantageous to detain him here than to send him abroad. Under the former arrangement there was no possibility of the criminal mixing with the home population, because he was kept secluded; there were plenty of public works upon which he might be employed; they saved the expense of his passage; they had a more effective superintendence than could be obtained on the other side of the world; and, which was a consideration that ought not to be entirely neglected, there was a better climate here than in most places abroad where public works could be usefully executed. The real difficulty was met with when they came to consider the other question—What they were to do with those whose strictly penal term had expired? It seemed to him that there were only three courses which could possibly be adopted. The first was, to send the criminals to colonies which were already occupied; the second, to found new colonies expressly for the purpose of receiving them; the third, to keep them in this country, with tickets of leave, or without them. As to the proposition to send them to colonies which were already peopled, that was an expedient of which he altogether despaired. The colonists would not consent to receive criminals, and no sane man would entertain the idea of forcing them to do so. It was often said, that there were particular settlements which would receive a few convicts. The reception of a few would not meet the case; it would, at the utmost, only postpone for two or three years the adoption of the remedy which must be resorted to at last. The alternative lay between founding a new colony for criminals and providing for them at home. As to the former, it was surrounded with difficulties. In the first place, it would be absolutely necessary to exclude free settlers from any new penal colony. A new penal colony must be exclusively penal, otherwise the free settlers would gradually strengthen in influence till they became the majority, and prevented any further importation of criminals. Even, however, if free settlers were excluded, a similar result would ultimately arise. The convicts who were sent out would have children—for, of course, women would be sent; and in thirty years there would be a new generation, consisting of persons who, being themselves innocent, would object to the importation of criminals as strongly as settlers who had gone out from England. Besides, there was the practical question, where were they to find such a place of transportation as would be required? As to selecting a small South Sea island, that was out of the question. A large area would be required, for a very considerable number would have to be sent; and one, if not the principal object of sending out criminals would be to put them in a place where there would be almost unlimited space for all. Three situations had been named—one, the northern part of Australia; another, Vancouver's Island; the third, Hudson's Bay. Now, to every one of these locations there was some grave objection: as to North Australia, there was, in the first place, the certainty, that, whatever the distance might be, the criminals who were confined there would, when allowed a certain degree of liberty, find their way sooner or later to the other Australian settlements. In the next place, it must be recollected that the whole of Northern Australia was between the tropics, and that the settlement of Port Essington, which was founded there, was given up because the climate was found to be unhealthy. In fact, all experience showed that in low-lying lands thus situated the European race degenerated, and its labour was unprofitable. With regard to Vancouver's Island, he thought the neighbourhood of the Californian diggings, and the feelings of the inhabitants of the United States, were conclusive objections to its being selected. The same objections did not, indeed, apply to Hudson's Bay; but then he believed it would be found that a subsistence was only to be obtained there by hunting, the climate offering insuperable objections to the keeping of stock and the cultivation of land. These considerations, as it seemed to him, disposed of all the localities which had been mentioned as available. In this state of things, the only alternative left to them was to try and make the best of detention at home. On this subject he would remark, in the first place, that he did not think the ticket-of-leave system had yet had a fair trial, much less was responsible for the whole of the outrageous crimes which had been recently perpetrated. A large number of men had been discharged from the militia; regiments of the line which had returned home, on being reduced, had naturally got rid of some of their worst characters; and, owing to these two causes, there was no doubt a larger criminal population than there would have been under other circumstances. But, in the next place, he did not think the principle on which the ticket-of-leave system was framed had been fairly carried out. As he understood that system, it was implied that the residence and occupation of every man having a ticket of leave should be known, so that if there were merely a strong suspicion that any such person was getting his living dishonestly, he should on that ground alone be called to account. The principle of the ticket-of-leave system should be applied with much greater strictness than it had been. Now, he would just point out one or two means by which he thought the existing evil might be alleviated. It struck him, as a great misfortune, that in their prison discipline there was no provision for an intermediate state between actual seclusion in prison and absolute freedom of life out of doors. The man who left prison was bewildered by the new state of things in which he found himself. Moreover, the men who were the best behaved in prison were often the worst behaved out of prison—and for this reason, that they were the men who were most susceptible to any influences, whether good or bad, which were brought to bear upon them. The man who was docile when subject to good influences was equally docile perhaps when placed in contact with his old companions. He thought, therefore, that one evil which required to be corrected was the sudden transition from a state of absolute prison seclusion to a state of absolute freedom. He was also of opinion, that more consideration ought to be given to the recommendation of Captain Maconochie, that the length of a man's imprisonment should be made to depend to a certain extent on his own labours. Another question arose—namely, whether, taking into consideration the state of employment in this country, and the extreme difficulty of sending criminals abroad, it would not be practicable to provide continued employment for those who were willing to accept it on public works, or otherwise, after their discharge from gaol. It was, he thought, a reproach to the state of the law that a ticket-of-leave man should be compelled to come before a police-magistrate, as had been the case recently, and say—"What am I to do? No one will give me employment." He would conclude by saying that, though they did not pretend to see their way out of all these difficulties, they should at least warn the public against trying vain and fancied remedies. It was better to know that the problem remained unsolved, than to put trust in some imaginary solution, which was sure to break down at last.

It was moved, as an amendment, that the report be received and printed, and this motion was ultimately carried by a small majority.

THE MERCANTILE LAW CONFERENCE.

The arrangements for the Mercantile Law Conference, on the 27th of this month and two following days, are proceeding in the most satisfactory way. The following towns have intimated their intention to send delegates, either from their Chamber of Commerce or from some similar body:—

Bath	Leeds
Belfast	Liverpool
Birmingham	Manchester Chamber of
Bradford	Commerce

Bristol	Manchester Commercial Association
Dublin	Newcastle
Glasgow	Plymouth
Huddersfield	Worcester.
Hull

These fifteen towns will fairly represent the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the United Kingdom. A considerable number of members of both Houses of Parliament are also expected to be present.

The Lord Mayor's name has been added to the list of Vice-Presidents.

The committee are anxious that each subject should, when possible, be opened by a short paper, stating the evils to be met, and the remedies suggested. They have already received notice of six papers:—

One on Tribunals of Commerce, by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce.
Two on Bankruptcy Law, by the Leeds Chamber of Commerce and Mr. Commissioner Ayrton.
One on Registration of Partnerships, by the Manchester Commercial Association.
One on the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, by Mr. Robert Slater, a member of the Royal Commission for the Assimilation of the Commercial Laws of the United Kingdom.
One on a Commercial Code, by Professor Levi, of King's College.

Juridical Society.

AT a meeting of this society, on Monday evening last—the Hon. Baron Bramwell in the chair—Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, Q.C., read a paper on "Advocacy, as connected with the Administration of Justice."

The learned reader having touched upon the great importance of the subject in all civilised societies, glanced at the recorded opinions of Dean Swift, Mr. Macaulay, Paley, Dr. Johnson, Montagu, and others, both as to the system of advocacy in the abstract, and as to the manner in which its profession was pursued in this country. These opinions, as might be expected, were very various. There were, however, two erroneous dogmas, of an entirely different character, in reference to the relation of advocacy to the administration of justice, which had prevailed very much among ethical philosophers and writers on casuistry. The first of these dogmas insists upon a standard of morality which would so identify the advocate with the client as to make the advocate morally responsible for the justness of his client's case. This opinion is founded upon the views of those who regard the principles of morality as binding the advocate's conscience, without reference to the limits or provisions of positive law, and as extending to duties of imperfect obligation not provided for by positive enactment. Those who maintain this theory are very much given to insist upon the propositions that no man can claim a right to do, or be a party to doing, what is wrong; that it is equally unjustifiable to withhold a right as to inflict an injury—to make a false charge, as to deny guilt; that, as in every case of a right demanded and resisted, there must b guilt charged and denied—either the charge or the denial must be indefensible; and that, therefore, to have an advocate in every case is only to insure the multiplication of wrong-doers. Upon examination of the arguments of those, however, who maintain this view—among whom might be mentioned Hooker, Baxter, Bishop Sanderson, Thos. Aquinas, and Sir Matthew Hale—they will be generally found to apply rather to the manner in which the duty of advocacy ought to be discharged, than to prescribe what its functions truly are. Many of these writers, moreover, have indulged in the common fallacy, that there is a complete identity between the advocate and his client. Thus Molena, in his treatise De Justitiâ, lays it down expressly that an advocate, when asked to plead for an heir-at-law against devisees under a will not formally executed, is bound in conscience to ask his client whether he believes it was the intention of the testator that the will should take effect; and that, if the heir should say that he thought the testator so intended, or if, from circumstances, the advocate were morally convinced that the testator had such an intention, his duty was not to undertake the case, as being against conscience. Jonathan Dymond and Mr. Hoffman, both American writers of note, insist upon this view. In short, according to them, even in matters not conflicting with Divine law, there is a morality binding on the advocate's conscience, paramount to the provisions of positive law. Suppose this proposition be tested by Molena's case of the heir-at-law. The power of the ancestor to devise is a creature of positive law, and not a natural right. The law which confers this power imposes no obligation upon the testator's conscience; and if he dies without exercising the power, the law provides for the descent of his estate. If the dispositions which the law would make in any given case of intestacy left moral claims unsatisfied, that may impose upon the ancestor the duty of avoiding such consequences by making other dispositions. But if he omit to do so, does his sin of omission fix itself in descent upon the conscience of the heir? and is the advocate first to satisfy himself as to the justice or injustice in each case of testacy or intestacy? How is he to decide whether he was, in any particular case, bound to assist only those who were active in asserting rights, resting upon an imperfect compliance with positive law, or those who had passively relied upon their substantive rights? Pleas of infancy, of the statutes of limitation, and similar defences, were frequently referred to as instances in which the advocate sacrificed his conscience; as, perhaps, they might sometimes fairly be, if he were a judge in a case of morals, instead of an advocate of a party sued by a person claiming a legal right.

The other dogma was of a totally different character. It proceeds on this notion, that it is not only the right but the duty of the advocate to maintain his client's case at all hazards, and without any reference to its merits—in a word, to personate his client. This was the ground of Bishop Warburton's great admiration of Cicero as an advocate. By Mr. Montagu the functions of an advocate are compared to those of an actor upon the stage. The strongest statement of this theory of absolute identification was that of Lord Brougham in his speech on Queen Caroline's trial. Mr. Daniel then combated these views and proceeded to say, that, whatever opinions might be entertained as to the practice of advocacy, or its effects upon its professors, no one could deny that the system was essential to the administration of justice—1, because of the suitor's inability, in general, to manage his own case, either in the statement of the facts or the application of the law; 2, because of his possible inability to cope with his opponent; 3, the power and influence of the judge, and his unintentional errors, demand protection for the suitor. The advocate meets these wants. But he is not the mere agent or instrument of the client. Though his main duty is to protect his client's interest against his opponent, and, if necessary, against the judge, it is also his duty to protect the judge from the vexation and burden of adjudicating upon unfounded claims and improper contention, which the suitor, acting without advice, and prompted by his own selfishness or ignorance, might raise. The proper aim of advocacy is to assist in the administration of the laws, and not to concern itself with obligations or duties, the enforcement of which is beyond the cognisance of those laws. As a judge is not permitted to set up his own judgment in opposition to positive law, or to affect, on the score of conscience or otherwise, to be better or wiser than the law, however harsh he may feel it to be in any particular case, so the advocate has no right to set up his own conscience as the standard of his client's legal rights. In no sense can he be regarded as the arbiter of his client's interests. He has not the right, and therefore it is not incumbent upon him, in conscience, to abandon rights conferred upon his client by positive law. What the client is entitled by law to assert, the advocate is authorised to assist him in asserting. The moral responsibility of the result is not with him. An unfounded demand may succeed; a just demand may fail; but he has only to regard the proper discharge of his duty to his client and the judge. Nor is he at liberty to reject a case because it is regarded with odium by the public, nor to exercise any choice in the selection of suitors. If the contrary were permitted, the course of justice would be interrupted by prejudice against rejected suitors, in proportion to the respectability of the advocate who had rejected them; and, as had been well observed, the character of the counsel would be evidence in the case. This was strongly put by Lord Erskine, in his defence of Thomas Paine; and the great injustice which would result was there forcibly exhibited. It is no part of the advocate's duty to inquire into the bona fides of a case which he is required to undertake. The division of professional labour which at present obtains in this country interposes another person between him and the client; so that, in fact, the advocate has rarely any communication with the latter; but if it were otherwise, and he were bound to inquire into his client's case before undertaking it, it would follow that, the result of his inquiry being unfavourable, he must decline it; and thus he would assume the functions of a judge, without having the judge's opportunity of arriving at a proper decision. Sir Matthew Hale was once in the habit of thus examining cases to satisfy his own conscience before he undertook them, but he saw the propriety and the justice of relinquishing, or at all events very much relaxing, the rule. How far the advocate's obligation in this respect would be varied, if the duties of advocate and attorney were blended, might be a question. Both in France and America, it seemed to be recognised as the duty of the advocate to sift the client's conscience and his case before undertaking to act for him—a practice which might be owing, perhaps, to the want of that division of labour which prevailed here. Mr. Daniel referred to the work of M. Camus, Lettres sur la profession d'Avocat, and to Hoffman's Elements, to show what the practice was in France and America, and concluded by insisting upon the importance of a special education to fit advocates for the proper discharge of their duties.

It was announced that, since the last meeting of the society, Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Justice Crompton, Mr. Baron Watson, Mr. Thomas Phinn, Mr. R. P. Collier, Q.C., M.P., and Mr. Honyman, had been elected members of the society.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

THE English Funds have failed in maintaining any advance on the prices of the previous week, the result of the week's operations being a depression of rather more than ⅛ per Cent. Accounts from the Paris Bourse have arrived irregularly. The French 3 per Cents. are quoted at 67f. 75c., and with other important Foreign Securities are very quiet with no particular variation. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 10th January, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of Notes in circulation is £19,427,990, being an increase of £202,690, and the stock of Bullion in both departments is £10,180,984, shewing a decrease of £1,422 when compared with the previous return.

In the discount market large applications and high rates have been the ruling features. A report has prevailed that the Bank of France intends to attempt making a considerable addition to its capital. The truth of this report is not fully admitted. Such a measure would enlarge the direct resources of the Bank of France; and, therefore, in the opinion of some persons, would tend to check the drain of gold from this country; but, being also likely to provide means in France for more extensive speculations, it may be expected, after some time, to lead to a renewed drain of gold, probably in greater force.

The names of the successful applicants for the concession of the Imperial National Bank of Turkey, mentioned in our article of last week are: Sir Joseph Paxton, M.P., Messrs. Cayley, M.P., Ewart, M.P., Laing, M.P., Scholefield, M.P., Brassey, and some others. A continental combination will also most probably be effected.

The present average price of wheat is from 7s. to 7s. 6d. per bushel. The decline of price in wheat has been slow and variable, but in the course of the last three months of the past year the reduction has been considerable. For many weeks past, the variations noticeable in several markets have counterbalanced each other, and made the average variations very small. As the present mild winter has not caused depression, there is little reason to expect that prices during the spring, either for grain or meat, will go much below their present rate. These prices are certainly high. If producers remember the scale of prices which ruled two years previous to the late war, and also keep in mind the vast amount of importation during last summer and autumn, and the probability of large future increase in importation, they will be prepared to meet the consequences which would attend a decline in present prices.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 24, 1857.

NEW COURTS OF PROBATE.

THE Law Amendment Society has joined in the crusade against the Ecclesiastical Courts, which have now defied all the efforts of reformers for something like twenty years. The obstinacy with which they have sustained this protracted siege is certainly not due to the number of their friends. No one has a word to say in favour of the existing system, and, indeed, its supporters show considerable tact by preserving a judicious silence. Duties which any solicitor could efficiently perform are entrusted only to a privileged class of proctors. The monopoly is supported by enormous court fees, which are employed in maintaining sinecure registrars with princely incomes, while all the work is done by their subordinates. To the costliness, which is the natural result of monopoly, the Ecclesiastical Courts have added all the inconveniences both of centralisation and local division. There is but one solitary thing to be said in their favour, and that is, that the proctors and acting registrars are, for the most part, up to their work. Their functions, indeed, are simple enough, and solicitors would probably not be much alarmed at having to undertake the formal duties of this privileged class, in addition to their own more complicated business. Still, faulty as the courts are, and in spite of attacks from every side—from laymen and lawyers, from novelists and men of business, from the ministry and the opposition, from chancery and common law—the testamentary jurisdiction remains just what it always was, and the will of a man who dies at the Land's End must still be proved at no small cost in London, if he chance to possess £5 worth of goods out of the diocese where he ended his life. It is easy to see why a reform which almost every one desires has been so long delayed. The attack has hitherto been conducted by a coalition, whose members are united in nothing but the conviction that the present courts ought to be superseded, without being able to agree as to the nature of the tribunal which is to take their place. During the last session three discordant schemes were warmly debated; and every attempt at a compromise having failed, the ecclesiastical tribunals remained for another year in possession of the disputed ground. A committee of the Law Amendment Society, which was recently appointed to concoct a practical scheme out of the three bills of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Sir FITZROY KELLY, and Mr. COLLIER, has produced an elaborate report, which was read on Monday by Mr. PITT TAYLOR. On several of the points discussed there is no room for difference of opinion. No one can question the propriety of giving to every probate validity throughout the country for all purposes. It is equally clear that an exclusive central system would be most inconvenient. Local courts, without any local limits on their jurisdiction, are, therefore, indispensable. All the common form business, as well as the contentious business relating to small estates, would be most advantageously administered there, and the functions of the Metropolitan Court should be limited to the general supervision of the affiliated tribunals, and the decision of the more weighty matters which may occasionally arise. We are disposed to concur in the recommendation of the committee that the county court system should be made available for this purpose. Sir FITZROY KELLY'S plan would perpetuate the inconveniences of the present arrangements, by preserving almost unchanged the local distribution of the courts. Any such scheme is altogether out of the question. The committee may well ask why Plymouth practitioners should be sent to Exeter for a probate—why Southampton and the Isle of Wight should still be subject to a Winchester jurisdiction—or why a Liverpool will should not be authenticated without a journey to Chester. The county court districts certainly offer the most appropriate sub-division of the country; and, as MR. PITT TAYLOR seems to think that the additional labour would not be too much for the judges and registrars, we shall not venture to suggest any difficulty on that score, though we must confess that we regard, with some alarm, the tendency to heap new functions upon a class of officers, who, in many localities, are already rather heavily burdened with business.

The extension of the jurisdiction of the court of probate, to real as well as personal estate, would be of immense advantage by enabling parties interested under a will to have its validity determined once for all by a single proceeding; and in recommending this alteration the committee do but follow the course which has been taken by all three of the rival reformers. Two points of some difficulty remain to be considered—viz., the constitution and procedure of the proposed court, and the extent of its jurisdiction. Mr. COLLIER'S proposal was to commit all testamentary jurisdiction to the courts of common law. In every case where there was a contest at all he would have his writ of summons, declaration, plea, replication, and so on, with all the machinery of demurrers and issues for the severance of points of law from disputes of fact. All this complication, however, is not only inapplicable to common form business, which constitutes 99 per cent. of the whole practice of the testamentary courts, but unnecessary in the majority of disputed cases. Sir FITZROY KELLY propounds a very similar plan, the only difference being that he would replace the Courts of Queen's Bench, Exchequer, and Common Pleas by a new court of probate, framed exactly on the same model. He also proposes to give to the court so constituted jurisdiction over the construction of wills and the administration of estates, for which it would certainly be ill adapted. For these latter purposes no pleadings at all are wanted, and none but affidavit evidence is ordinarily required. When you have a judge with the will before him you have all that is necessary to obtain a declaration as to the meaning of the testator, or a direction as to the way in which his intentions are to be carried out. This is just what a court of equity supplies, and in an ordinary administration suit the only pleadings consist of a statement of the will, and the evidence is for the most part confined to affidavits, verifying payments of money, and describing the nature of an estate, and similar matters, together with the usual documentary proof of the births, deaths, and marriages, which show the actual state of the testator's family. Any court which had the same jurisdiction given to it must adopt the same simple procedure, and become, in fact, a second Court of Chancery.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL agrees with Sir F. KELLY in proposing to make the new court of probate a court of construction and administration; but he avoids the absurdity of clogging it with any system of pleading, and would have it merely another vice-chancellor's court. There is something rather plausible in the idea of enabling the same court to grant probate, to determine points of construction, and to administer estates; but, after all, it would not be in one case in a hundred that the several powers would be exercised together; and it seems to be a matter of very secondary importance whether the present equity jurisdiction over wills be or be not added to the functions of the court of probate. We cannot, however, indorse Mr. PITT TAYLOR'S notion, that such an arrangement would afford a dangerous facility for needless litigation. The dread of making law too accessible is a worn out folly, which one would hardly have expected from a county court judge. On the question of the constitution of the new tribunal the report of the committee is even less satisfactory than any of the schemes which it reviews. They strongly object to Mr. COLLIER'S plan because they think that the fifteen judges would not willingly begin to learn a new lesson so as to fit themselves for the administration of probate business. For this reason they recommend a separate court, but, with ingenious inconsistency, they propose that three puisne judges, selected from Westminster Hall, shall undertake the additional duty, and that the fifteen judges whom they had before pronounced unfit for testamentary business should form the court of appeal. We must leave Mr. TAYLOR and his colleagues to reconcile a contradiction which fairly baffles our ingenuity. There is one other passage in the report which we are unable to comprehend, except on the supposition that the committee have not escaped a popular prejudice, to which they ought to have been superior. They object to giving the proposed court the machinery of a court of equity, on account of the defective nature of its rules of practice, pleading, and evidence. Surely they ought to have known that in an administration suit there need be no pleading at all, and that in no case can there be more than one simple statement on each side. The mode of taking oral evidence in Chancery is as bad as it can be, and must some day be changed; but this has no real bearing upon will cases, because the routine proofs are invariably by affidavit, the cheapest of all evidence, and any really contested questions as to sanity and the like are always decided by an issue, directed to the same judges on circuit, and tried in the same manner as if it had proceeded from a court with common law procedure. The conditions essential to the efficiency and economy of a court of probate seem to be the absence of all pleadings beyond a statement of the will, the use of affidavit evidence in ordinary cases, and the assistance of a jury to decide a certain class of contested facts.

Sir R. BETHELL and Sir F. KELLY may be left to settle the knotty question, whether such a tribunal would be more properly called a court of law or equity. For ourselves, we should be quite content with it under any name.

THE CASE OF THE QUEEN v. CLARKE.

IT is a curious thing that the law of England should have existed for so many centuries without deciding the age at which, and the circumstances under which, children become entitled to the right of personal liberty. That such was the fact can be doubted by no one who has read the arguments and the judgment in the case of REG. v. CLARKE, decided last Wednesday by the Court of Queen's Bench. The question at last looks as if it were finally settled; and though the process by which this result has been reached was curiously slow and long, the result seems, on the whole, to be satisfactory. The rules respecting guardianship form one of the most intricate parts of our legal system. There are as many as eight different kinds of guardians, and it would fill many pages to state the various rules and distinctions by which their powers are regulated. Of these, however, no less than six apply only to cases in which the infant has property, although the custody of the property generally involves that of the person, and of these six several are almost entirely obsolete. The two forms of guardianship which apply primarily to the person and not to the property of the infant, are guardianship by nature and guardianship for nurture. There is, however, no real distinction between them, for the first is included in the second—guardianship by nature being "that which belongs to the ancestor in respect of his heir apparent," and guardianship for nurture that which belongs to the father, or, on his death, to the mother over all the children. The result of the old authorities as to the rights of a guardian for nurture is stated by Lord CAMPBELL to be, that it is the guardian's duty to "nurture—i. e., to educate, to train, to bring up," the child, and that for that purpose he "has a right to the custody of the child, and shall maintain an action for trespass against a stranger who takes the child." The expressions of the various authorities as to the age at which the rights of the guardian for nurture terminated, and as to the method by which they were to be enforced, were more or less vague, and the decisions on the subject settled it in a curiously piecemeal manner. They apply to three distinct classes of cases. Those in which the age of the infant is under seven, those in which it is over fourteen, and those in which it is between the two.

The fact that the law upon each of these three subjects was laid down by itself, whilst the other two remained undecided, and that the whole range of judicial legislation on the question extended over more than half a century, is one of the most characteristic illustrations that we have ever met with of the manner in which English law is made. The question first settled was that which related to the condition of infants under the age of seven. It was held, so far back as the case of REG. v. MANDEVILLE (5 East), that the liberty of a child of that age consisted in its delivery to its guardian for nurture, and that the proper instrument for effecting this purpose was the writ of habeas corpus. It was next decided, that with respect to minors of upwards of fourteen years of age liberty consisted in following their own discretion, and that the court would make no order as to their custody, but would confine itself to freeing them from any illegal restraint, leaving them to use such freedom according to their own inclination. This was the case of REG. v. GREENHILL (4 B. & E. 624), decided in 1836. The case of children between seven and fourteen was not decided till Wednesday last, and the question then brought before the court was extremely short, and so simple that it is matter of very great surprise that it should never have been raised before. It was whether a child of the age in question should be allowed to make its choice as to the custody in which it would remain, if it should appear to the court to be endowed with sufficient intelligence to enable it to give reasonable grounds for the choice at which it arrived. It was decided, we think with unquestionable justice, that the court had no discretionary power, but that the powers, rights, and remedies of a guardian for nurture were in every respect the same over children between the ages of seven and fourteen as over those who are below the age of seven. The law upon this subject would therefore seem to be now completely settled—by a somewhat tardy process, no doubt, but still in a reasonable and satisfactory manner, and to be shortly this: that if a man dies, leaving a widow and children under the age of fourteen, without having appointed a testamentary guardian, the mother has an unqualified right to the custody of the children, which she can enforce by habeas corpus, notwithstanding the disinclination of the children to accede to her wishes, unless evidence can be given to show that her character, or the purposes for which she wants the children, are so immoral that they would run the risk of contamination if they were delivered over to her. The principle appears to us so obviously just that we cannot understand how any serious person can represent it as in any way interfering with the rights and liberties of children. Indeed, nothing is more curious than the extreme liberality of the English law in this matter. The provisions of the French Code Civil, upon the subject of paternal authority, shows how lenient our conceptions are. A father, in France, or a guardian (with certain restrictions), not only has the complete custody of his child's person till he is twenty-one, but can, if he thinks fit, imprison him without any legal process whatever (Code Civil, art. 371—380). The existence of such a power goes far to prove that the English rule as to parental authority cannot rationally be considered severe.

Nor can we by any means sympathise in the indignation which has been expressed in some quarters as to the hardship inflicted on the girl ALICIA RACE herself. We should be inclined to think that her mother showed some want of judgment, and possibly of respect for her husband's memory, by the course she has taken; but it would surely be monstrous to say that a person is to be deprived of the management of her own affairs because she takes a view of her own or of her child's interests in which the majority of her countrymen would not agree. Sergeant RACE left his children to the care of their mother, or, rather, did not deprive her of the care of them, and she has used the discretion which he chose to allow to her. Who can have a right to complain? It is surely a pity to introduce heated popular matter into an argument before so grave a tribunal as the Queen's Bench. Even before a jury, it is not very expedient or dignified to appeal to religious animosities; and we must say that, in our opinion, Mr. O'MALLEY would have exercised a sound discretion in abstaining from quasi theological comments on the possible spiritual experiences of children under fourteen years of age. To allow a child of ten or eleven to fly in the face of its mother, because it had imbibed theological opinions of a different character from her's, would, in effect, be to strike at the root of parental authority, and no parent would be safe in trusting his child's education to any person whose teaching was not conducted under his own eye.

We must also express our opinion that it is matter of regret, that whilst the judgment of the court was still undelivered, the Times should have published an article on the hardships which its decision in a particular manner would inflict. It is very well to say that there is a distinction between cases which are submitted to a jury and those which are submitted to judges; but it was hard, in reading the article to which we are alluding, not to feel that there was something very like irony in the praise bestowed on the bench for their superiority to considerations of popularity. It is not only at the Old Bailey that judges have been discredited by popular applause. In the present case it is true there was a safety valve for feelings of this kind in the eulogy which was so largely bestowed on that "model of a Christian soldier," Sergeant RACE; but we still feel it most undesirable that any other than legal considerations should be admitted in the discussion, either at the bar or in the press, of rules of law.

Legal News.

THE meeting of merchants, bankers, brokers, and other traders, called to consider the decision in the case of KINGSFORD v. MERRY, was held on Monday; and Baron ROTHSCHILD acted as chairman, and introduced the subject of the meeting. The speeches delivered are of importance, rather as proving the existence of an evil, than as suggesting any sufficient remedy. The chairman asked why the original owner of goods should be protected against the whole trading community; and he said that the case before them was a very hard one for the defendant, who had advanced his money, and who had taken every precaution that a prudent man could take. If the law continued as it now was, and its condition became generally known, extraordinary litigation would be engendered; because a great many persons had been hitherto ignorant of the law, and had believed that dock warrants passed legally from hand to hand by being endorsed. But if it were declared that the case was different, the necessary result must be, either that much vexatious litigation would be produced, or that so much precaution would have to be taken in the business of bankers and merchants that the community must suffer serious inconvenience. There could be no doubt that, for the sake of checking litigation, preventing fraud, and facilitating commerce generally, these documents ought to pass legally from hand to hand, if properly endorsed and properly obtained, and if it could be proved that value had been given for them. The first resolution was—

"That the decision of the Court of Error, in the case of 'Kingsford and Swinford v. Merry,' appears to involve a principle which is calculated to render the recognised and well-understood course and practice of trade insecure and uncertain, and to destroy confidence in delivery-orders, warrants, bills of lading, and other mercantile documents essential to the safe transaction of business and development of trade."

The mover of this resolution, Mr. GREGSON, M.P., did not appear to have made up his mind so thoroughly as Baron ROTHSCHILD as to the expediency of the proposed enactment. He called it a "delicate question" how far dock-warrants should be allowed to circulate, even though the person presenting them to the party making an advance was fraudulent. This speaker thought it would be going too far to say, that, under any circumstances whatever, a person making an advance should be justified in holding the documents. At the present time, when such a lamentable amount of fraud was perpetrated, it seemed to be requisite to take some precaution that the person making the advance should have a knowledge of the person requiring it, and some knowledge also that he has given a bonâ fide value for the goods. If they let loose to the fullest extent the circulation of documents which might have been obtained by fraud, perhaps the evil thereby produced would be greater than the one they now sought to remedy. It would evidently be impossible, if a warrant passed through a variety of hands, say from A. to Z., that Z. should trace it through all its stages from A. Still, if it came to him with a reasonable ground for believing that the party was respectable, and that value had been given for it, that would be sufficient to entitle a person to retain the document, and make an advance upon it.

It would appear that Mr. GREGSON's apprehension of opening a wider door to fraud was shared by a portion of his hearers. But it would not be easy to lay down any practicable rule exacting from the holder of the warrant more than proof of his own good faith, and of the reality of the consideration given by him. To impose upon Z. the obligation of proving that he knew, or had good reason to believe, that Y. had become possessed of the warrant in the fair course of trade, by giving value for it to X., would destroy the facility of transfer demanded for the convenience of commerce, and would sow a plentiful harvest of litigation. It was urged by the next speaker, that documents of title connected with the transfer of goods, ought to stand on the same footing as bank-notes or bills of exchange; and this principle is simple and intelligible, although, certainly, it is not embodied in the single clause of a proposed bill which was read to the meeting by Mr. WEGUELIN.

The City meeting certainly does not help us much to determine what the law ought to be; and the Court of Exchequer has added to the obscurity which prevails as to what the law actually is. On Tuesday, the CHIEF BARON took occasion to remark that the Court of Error did not overrule either his direction, or the ruling of the full court, but that the case was presented to the Court of Error on a totally incorrect statement of the facts. Mr. Baron MARTIN testified to the same effect, and added that the case stated to the Court of Error was in itself utterly unintelligible. The CHIEF BARON observed, that, if the facts had been presented to the Court of Error correctly, that court would undoubtedly have given the same decision as the court below. The result is, that the judgment which has caused so much uneasiness was based on an imaginary state of facts, and that the Court of Exchequer Chamber has been drawn into pronouncing an opinion upon a case that did not actually occur. Of course, judges ought to argue as correctly upon feigned as upon real premises; but it is not the habit of English judges, with the brilliant exception of Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE, to do so; nor is it usual to attach any great weight to declarations of the legal effect of merely hypothetical states of circumstances. But supposing that there is a defect in our commercial law which legislation ought to remedy, how curious it is that this fault might never have been discovered but for the felicitous blundering of the learned gentlemen who settled the case upon which the appeal was heard. Anti-reformers may say that, if there had been no Common Law Procedure Act, there would have been no possibility of such an accident. The ingenuity of counsel would have had no opportunity of framing an imaginary case, and thus the law would never have been declared by the Exchequer Chamber, and merchants and bankers might have remained another twenty years in ignorance. If the proposed change in the law be salutary, and if it be actually made, we may congratulate the public on the carelessness of Mr. MERRY'S legal advisers, but we certainly cannot congratulate Mr. MERRY. He must endeavour to look upon himself as a victim to the general good, and he may remember that the law has lately borne much more hardly upon other unfortunates—as, for instance, the innocent convict, MARKHAM.

The proceedings of the Law Amendment Society on Monday night demand the particular attention of our provincial readers. Now is the time to consider the various proposals for remodelling the courts of probate, and to take care that the interests of all classes of the profession are fairly adjusted under the new arrangement, which cannot be delayed much longer. Country solicitors must not leave this task entirely to their London brethren, and only intimate their dissatisfaction when too late. It will be observed that the Society, besides receiving the report on the ecclesiastical courts, appointed, on Monday night, a committee to consider that most important subject of fixed rates of professional remuneration. In order to aid the consideration of this subject by our readers, we publish elsewhere the table of fees for conveyancing business now in use in Scotland, as one example of a method of remuneration only partially dependent on the length of the instruments prepared.

The legal profession has lately been made the object of some very unnecessary and unjustifiable abuse. The Illustrated London News of Saturday last ekes out its scanty stock of facts by two paragraphs, one about "hideous tortures" applied to the man who tried to kill the King of Naples, and the other describing a "falling out" among the lawyers. The former story, probably, and the latter certainly, is pure fiction, as much an effort of the imagination as if the pencil, and not the pen, of our contemporary had produced it. "The old feud between the country and the metropolitan attorney has burst out afresh," and the cause of quarrel is that "the tendency of the proposed reforms in the conveyancing system will be much to the detriment of the country solicitor." It is implied that the same reforms which are to destroy the provincial will benefit the Londoner, will enable him to keep a carriage instead of a brougham (as we know he ordinarily does), and to buy a country villa, instead of hiring a house at Ramsgate; and that this is the cause of quarrel. The ruin of the country solicitor, says our contemporary, may not appear a matter for many tears on the part of the nation, but it is to be remarked that "the respectable country solicitor is that which we can hardly affirm the majority of the legal profession to be, namely, a valuable and useful member of society." And then follows a sketch of the "respectable solicitor" aforesaid, with which we have no fault to find. As, however, the country solicitors form the large majority of the profession, it follows that the country solicitors are not "valuable and useful members of society," and, therefore, are not "respectable," and so the portrait we have just commended turns out to be imaginary. We pity that portion of the public which, when it wants "to comprehend a little about" any matter, goes to our contemporary and gets the question made "plain enough." The sketch of the "respectable solicitor," who does not exist, may form a companion picture to that of the extinct dodo, which lately ornamented the pages of the Illustrated News.

It is no novelty to see a journalist in difficulties turning a smart sentence or two at the expense of the solicitors, but we were surprised to find the profession almost as hardly used by Mr. PITT TAYLOR in the Law Amendment Society's report on the Ecclesiastical Courts. The tendency to submit frivolous questions to judicial decision, "for the mere sake of costs," is certainly not general among solicitors, and ought not to be imputed to them in such a document. We believe, too, that the county courts are not by any means the only existing tribunals where "the fees to professional men are not sufficiently large to tempt them to advise unnecessary proceedings for the sake of costs," even supposing that solicitors habitually yielded to this temptation. But Mr. TAYLOR, we must own, is quite impartial; or, perhaps, the common-law bar, to which he himself belonged, is most hardly used by him; for he says that it produces with difficulty a crop of fifteen judges of adequate or nearly adequate capacity, and the demand for a sixteenth would be beyond the productive energies of the soil. These judges, too, are "past the meridian of life," and hardly competent to master a new branch of law, or, at least, too lazy to undertake the task—an observation which, we hope, would not be found to hold good of county court judges, who might, under Mr. TAYLOR'S scheme, be called upon to acquaint themselves rather suddenly with the law, not only of probate, but also of the construction of wills and the administration of estates.

DANGEROUS ILLNESS OF BARON ALDERSON.

We learn with sincere regret that this distinguished judge is lying in an almost hopeless state at his residence in Park-crescent, Regent's Park. He was in the first instance attacked with determination of blood to the head, and since that time he has had an attack of paralysis, which has effected his lower extremities. Baron Alderson was appointed vacation judge, but it has now been arranged that Mr. Justice Coleridge shall take that duty, and Mr. Serjeant Channell will be placed on the commission for the Home Circuit at the forthcoming assizes, in the place of Mr. Justice Coleridge.

AMENDMENT OF CHANCERY BILLS.

According to the present practice, where any amendment in a bill in Chancery causes an addition of more than two folios in one place, it cannot be made in writing; and the consequence is, that though it may be necessary only to make a single amendment, the whole bill requires to be reprinted, which involves considerable expense where the bill is lengthy. An application was made to the Lord Chancellor this week for leave to reprint only the page or two affected by the alteration, and to make some consequential alterations in writing. His lordship refused the application, being of opinion that any alteration in the present rule, which does not allow amendments partially by printed, and partially by written, alterations, would be inconvenient.

SWEARING IN OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

On Tuesday last, there was some little sensation produced in the Lord Chancellor's Court, by his lordship retiring rather hurriedly from the bench, and re-appearing in a few minutes followed by a tall robust looking gentleman, wearing a moustache, and dressed in a rough pilot coat and driving gloves. No one appeared to know who the gentleman was. The Chancellor remained standing, having handed him a small piece of parchment, and the Bar rose from their seats. It turned out to be the swearing in of the Duke of Cambridge, our Commander-in-Chief. His Royal Highness read the oath or declaration, in a stentorian voice that might have been heard outside the walls; and shaking hands with Lord Cranworth, made his bow, and retired.

BROADBENT v. IMPERIAL GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. Justice Crompton and Mr. Justice Willes sat with the Lord Chancellor on Thursday, to hear a question argued, on which the Lord Chancellor desired the assistance of two Common Law judges. It arose in the case of Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas-light Company, and is of great importance to that and all similar companies. Upon its solution will probably depend the fate of the present suit for an injunction to restrain the company from using, in the manufacture of gas, all that portion of their works which adjoins the grounds of the plaintiff, a market gardener.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

A QUESTION was raised in Webb v. Kirby (5 W. R. 189), as to the power of an administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo durante absentiâ, in Canada, of one who was the testator's next of kin, and also next of kin to the surviving executor and trustee of testator's will. The bill was filed by the administrator durante absentiâ, for the specific performance of an agreement to purchase certain leaseholds, part of the testator's estate, which were put up to auction by the plaintiff's direction. In the particulars of sale, it was stated that the sale was "by order of the executors of the deceased testator;" and one of the conditions described the vendor as selling under his will. The purchaser objected to complete the contract, on the ground that the plaintiff was not what he described himself to be, and that he had no power, as administrator durante absentiâ of another, to sell the premises. The V. C. Stuart held the plaintiff to be entitled to specific performance, as he considered that for every purpose of the suit, and for the carrying out of the sale, the grant of letters of administration with the will annexed to the plaintiff, as the attorney of one of the residuary legatees named in the will, was quite as effectual as if the latter had himself taken out administration, and personally carried into effect the trusts of the will. The Lord Chancellor, however, was of a different opinion. He fully agreed with his Honour as to the effect of the grant during the life of the principal, but in this case the principal was said to be in Canada at the time when the agreement was entered into; and for anything that was known, he might have been then alive. If he were dead, the letters of administration to the plaintiff as his attorney, of course, de facto, would expire, and it would be impossible for him then to make a title. The Lord Chancellor considered that there was also another ground for dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The principal was not properly the administrator of the last surviving executor of the testator's will, but of the last surviving trustee; and his lordship was therefore of opinion that the cestuis que trust ought to have been parties to the contract for sale. The main use of the decision is to show the importance of looking not merely to the validity and effect of such letters of attorney, but also to the proof that, at the time when it is proposed that they should be exercised, the principal is still living.

It is a well-established principle of courts of equity, that one cannot set up, against his own incumbrance, a beneficial interest in a prior incumbrance; in other words, that a man cannot claim to be a prior incumbrancer on his own estate. A very curious case within this rule (Otter v. Lord Vaux, 5 W. R. 188) has been recently decided by the Lord Chancellor, who affirmed the decree of the V. C. Wood. The plaintiff was second mortgagee of an estate in Wales. The first mortgage deed contained a power of sale in default of payment; and the deed was generally recited in the plaintiff's deed, but the power of the sale was not mentioned in the recital. The first mortgagee contracted with one Davies to sell to him the estate for a less amount than was due to him in respect of his security. Before the conveyance was executed, Davies sold his interest in the contract to the mortgagor, and the conveyance thereupon was made to him. The second mortgagee filed his bill to foreclose the mortgagor. The mortgagor contended that the plaintiff's right, which was only in respect of the equity of redemption, was destroyed by the exercise of the power of sale, of which he had constructive notice, as he had actual notice of the deed in which it was contained. The plaintiff relied upon the well established principle of the court which we have mentioned, upon the fact that the mortgagor had notice of the second mortgage, and, also, upon the covenant for further assurance. It appears uncertain what the decision would have been, if the sale to Davies, and the conveyance to him, had been completed; the Lord Chancellor's decision, in favour of the plaintiff, having gone expressly upon the ground that the contract for sale was, to all intents and purposes, with the mortgagor. There is no reported case in which the mortgaged estate came back to the mortgagor after it had been sold and conveyed away to a third party by a first mortgagee under a power of sale; but there appears to be good ground for the agrument of the mortgagor in this case, that, under such circumstances, he would not be bound by a subsequent mortgage under his covenant for further assurance, nor is it at all clear that the rule which prevents a mortgagor from setting up a beneficial interest in his own prior incumbrance, would apply. The practical effect of the decision in Otter v. Lord Vaux, however, will be to make conveyancers inquire, in a title under a power of sale in a mortgage, whether the estate has subsequently come into the hands of the mortgagor, as there would certainly be considerable risk in accepting such a title.

The question of the exoneration from mortgage debts of real estate out of the personal estate of a testator is now of comparative unimportance, as it can only arise in cases where the testator died prior to the 31st December, 1854, it being enacted by the 17 & 18 Vic. c. 113, that when any person dies after that date seised of or entitled to any estate or interest in any land or other hereditaments, which shall at the time of his death be charged with the payment of any money by way of mortgage, and such person shall not by his will or deed or other document, have signified any contrary or other intention, the heir or devisee to whom such lands or hereditaments shall descend or be devised, shall not be entitled to have the mortgage debt discharged out of the personal estate or any other real estate of such person, but the land so charged shall be primarily liable to pay the mortgage debt.

In Swainson v. Swainson, 5 W.R. 187, the testator died before the act came into operation, and the case is worthy of notice only because in it there was an unsuccessful attempt to question the doctrine of Scott v. Beecher, 5 Madd. 95, which has been uniformly acted upon for the last thirty-five years. The recent decision merely confirms the rule that where a person inherits a mortgaged estate from one who was not himself liable to pay the mortgage debt, the heir is not entitled to exoneration out of his ancestor's personal estate.

Kay v. Smith, 5 W. R. 194, has set at rest a question of practice upon which there has been some doubt as to the construction of Lord St. Leonard's orders (7th Aug., 1852). According to the old practice, any party to a suit in which a decree had been made, after the regular time for enrolment had passed, could obtain an order as of course at the Rolls, to enrol nunc pro tunc. The Lord-Chancellor considered in Kay v. Smith, that the only alteration made by the 3rd Order of 7th Aug., 1852 (1st set), is to give an opportunity to any other party desiring to oppose the enrolment, to show cause why the decree should not be enrolled. The Master of the Rolls was of a different opinion, considering that the onus was upon the party making the application, and that it required a strong case to induce the court to grant it, especially where the applicant was a solicitor, and must be taken to have been acquainted with the General Orders.

It has been decided by the Lords Justices, in ex parte Harrison, 5 W.R. 193, that where an adjudicated bankrupt had, previously to the adjudication, filed a petition under the arrangement clauses, the bankruptcy did not relate back to the filing of the petition, and did not take effect earlier than the adjudication, though it was not questioned that the filing of the petition was an act of bankruptcy. The ground of the distinction was stated by Lord Justice Turner. His lordship said that it was not an act of bankruptcy in all cases. If it were, it would be in the power of a creditor to make a petitioner a bankrupt at any time within twelve months after its presentation; whereas the 76th sect. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act provided that the petition for adjudication must be filed within two months after the dismissal of the petition for arrangement. Ex parte Syers, 3 Jurist, N. S. 6, is another recent decision of the same court, relating to the construction of the arrangement clauses. In that case there was a contention between a considerable majority of the creditors who desired to support a proposed arrangement under these clauses: on the one hand, and on the other, a small minority who insisted upon a bankruptcy. The court decided in favour of the minority. Where it was proposed to carry into effect an arrangement under these clauses, "it lay on the debtor to prove the affirmative," observed L. J. Knight Bruce," and the court ought to be satisfied on strong and clear evidence that the fact was so." Another ground of their refusal to sanction the arrangement was, that the statute left it in the discretion of the commissioner to decide whether the arrangement was a proper one, and he having decided that it was not, it required a strong case to shew that he had not made a prudent or reasonable use of that discretion.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT—USE AND OCCUPATION.

Smith v. O'Brien, Julland v. Riches, 5 W.R. Exch. 197.

In both these cases a rule nisi had been obtained on behalf of the defendant to change the venue from London to a county. In the first of them, the affidavit stated: 1. That the action was to recover rent due on a lease. 2. That there was a defence on the merits. 3. That the defendant was entitled to a set-off exceeding the sum claimed; and 4. That all the defendant's witnesses (five in number) lived in the county in question. In the second case the affidavit stated: 1. That the cause of action arose in the county in question, and not in London. 2. That the defendant's witnesses resided in such county. 3. That the cause could be there tried most conveniently; and 4. That the application was not made for delay. In both instances the court made the rule absolute (an order to change had been previously refused in both by Mr. Baron Martin), and observed that the ancient practice of changing the venue in cases of this description (i.e., for use and occupation, see Herring v. Watts, 2 D. & L. 609) on the common affidavit was still to be adhered to, unless in cases where the opposite side showed sufficient grounds for not changing it, according to the rule laid down in De Rothchild v. Shilston, 9 Exch. 503.

From the observations which fell from the court in the course of the argument of the above case, it would seem, that had the plaintiffs sued as for rent due on a demise, under seal, and not (as they did) on a common count for use and occupation, a more special affidavit would have been required; for in such case, under the old practice, the common affidavit would have been insufficient. See Taylor v. Becket, 1 Lev. 307, Duplessis v. Chalk, 2 Str. 878.

ATTORNEY'S BILL.—DEFENCE OF NEGLIGENCE.

Cox v. Leach, 5 W.R. C.P. 199.

In this case the plaintiff had been instructed by the defendant to proceed at law against certain underwriters, in performance of which he brought an action against them in the Lord Mayor's Court of London, although he was aware that in order to maintain the action, evidence would be required from Calcutta, and was only to be obtained by a commission, or mandamus, under 13 Geo. 3 c. 63; and though he ascertained (apparently before commencing the action) that on the common law side of the court, no such commission could issue; while if it were applied for from the equity side of the court, the expense of it would fall on the applicant. The proccedings in the Lord Mayor's Court were consequently abandoned, and an action having been brought against the client, by the attorney who had been instructed to sue, the verdict was entered for such client, with leave to the attorney to move the court.

It was held by the Court of Common Pleas, that the charges in the bill delivered, which had reference to the proceedings taken in the Lord Mayor's Court, could not be recovered; for that to sue in such local court without express directions, and without acquainting himself, and seeing that there was adequate machinery to carry out the objects of the action, was negligence sufficient to support a defence on that ground pro tanto. There were, however, in the bill delivered certain items for letters written to the underwriters requiring payment of the client's demand, before the abortive action had been commenced. And these charges the court held to be recoverable, on the principle that such letters might have produced payment of the demand.

This judgment—in both of its parts—appears to be consistent with the cases in the books upon this somewhat difficult subject. As to the first branch (which decided that quoad the proceedings in the Mayor's Court, no costs could be recovered) it is borne out by the observations of Tindal, C.J., in Godefroy v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 460, where he says, "an attorney is liable for the consequences of ignorance or non-observance of the rules of practice; for the want of care in the preparation of the cause for trial, or of attendance thereon with his witnesses; and for the mismanagement of so much of the conduct of a cause as is usually and ordinarily allotted to his department of the profession."

And in accordance with this doctrine, an attorney has been held liable for suing for a breach of a simple contract, where the contract in truth was under seal (Cliffe v. Prosser, 2 D.P.C. 21); for suing in an inferior court for a cause of action arising out of its local jurisdiction (Williams v. Gibbs, 5 Ad. & El. 208); for applying at chambers where he was expressly confined by statute to the court itself (Shilcock v. Passman, 7 C. & P. 289); for neglecting to keep alive a writ of summons sued out to save the statute of limitations (Hunter v. Caldwell, 10 Q.B. 69); for preparing an agreement to pay an annuity on the consideration of past co-habitation, without taking care that such agreement should be under seal (Parker v. Rolls, 14 C. B. 691); for taking proceedings on foreign bills of exchange without previously ascertaining that they were according to the lex loci, so indorsed as to enable his clients to sue thereon (Long v. Orsi, 18 C.B. 610), and the like, while on the other hand he has been held not liable for an erroneous construction of a doubtful statute or rule of court (Laidler v. Elliott, 3 B. & C. 738 & Bulmer v. Gilman, 4 Man. & Gr. 108).

So also the second branch (which decided that the charges made for letters were recoverable) is in strict harmony with the observations of Lord Ellenborough in the case of Pasmore v. Birnie, 2 Starh. 59, with those of Lord Mansfield in Templer v. M'Lachlan, 2 N.R. 136; and with the case of Shaw v. Arden, 9 Bing. 287, which shows that where the business charged for could possibly have been beneficial to the client, or was reasonably expected by the attorney to prove so, the defence of negligence is no answer to the attorney's bill, though the circumstances may possibly be such as to render the attorney liable to a cross action for negligence.

BANKRUPTCY—LOSS BY NON-DELIVERY OF GOODS—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Exparte Harrison; re Lawford, 5 W. R., L. J. 193.

In this case the bankrupt had contracted in May, 1856, to sell to one A. B. a certain quantity of oil to be delivered by instalments in June, July, and August; and on the 19th June he further contracted to deliver in July an additional quantity. On the 14th June, the delivery of the first instalment, under the first contract, took place, but no other delivery of oil, under either contract, was ever made. On the 2nd July, the bankrupt filed a petition for private arrangement under 12 & 13 Vic. c. 106. ss. 211, et seq., and in his account of debts inserted £88 as a debt to A. B. arising from the non-delivery of the oil. On the 9th August this petition was dismissed, and the petitioner adjudged a bankrupt under sec. 223 of the same act. A. B. claimed in the proceedings on such bankrupcty to prove for the loss he had sustained, in respect of the two contracts previous to the adjudication of bankruptcy under sec. 223, but subsequent to the filing of the petition under the arrangement clauses. This proof the commissioner allowed, and on its being appealed against by the assignees, the Lords Justices confirmed the decision, but in dismissing the appeal, directed the costs of both parties to come out of the estate.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeded on these grounds:—1st. It held, that the bankruptcy adjudicated on the 9th August did not relate back to the filing of the petition on the 2nd July. They decided this in accordance with the case of Nicholson v. Gooch, 5 Ell. and Bl. 999, where one L., who had petitioned under sec. 211 of the Bankrupt Consolidation Act, on the 23rd November, 1853, was (the proceedings having been adjourned into open court) on the 31st December, 1853, adjudged a bankrupt under sec. 223; and in which case the Court of Queen's Bench assented to the doctrine that an adjudication under the last-mentioned section is the act of the court itself, and is not founded on any act of bankruptcy; and that the title of the assignees thereunder does not relate backwards to any prior act of bankruptcy (see also as to this Stevenson v. Newnham, 13 C. B. 285). 2nd. The Lords Justices held, chiefly on the authority of Exparte Bateman, 4 W. R. 329, that the debt to A. B., scheduled by the bankrupt in his petition for private arrangement, was a sufficient ascertainment of the amount of loss incurred by A. B., owing to the failure in delivery of the oil, to take the case out of the general rule established by Green v. Bicknell, 8 A. and E. 701; Utterson v. Vernon, 3 T. R. 539; 4 T. R. 570, and other cases which establish the doctrine that a claim for damages requiring the verdict of a jury before it can be ascertained, is not, in general, provable in bankruptcy.

Council Chamber, Lincoln's-inn,

RESULT OF HILARY TERM EXAMINATION.

This examination took place on the 20th instant Master Cancellor presided, and the other examiners were Mr. Keith Barnes, Mr. Frere, Mr. Gregory, and Mr. John Young. Of the 153 who had given notice only 107 were examined. A considerable number did not leave their testimonials of due service of clerkship, and some left them in an imperfect state. It appears, that there is much carelessness in producing the documents required by the rules of court. Attention should be given to this part of the preliminary inquiry, and we understand the examiners will not in future take the examination conditionally, and permit the defects to be afterwards supplied.

We regret to learn that the examination has not, on the whole, been satisfactory; no less than twenty-eight candidates have been postponed for want of sufficient answers to the questions—so that only seventy-nine were passed.

On the other hand, we are informed that honorary distinctions have been awarded to the three following candidates:—

The first prize of books to the value of ten guineas, to Charles Wright, of Sunderland, who served his clerkship to Mr. J. J. Wright, of Sunderland: and Messrs. Maples and Pearse, of Frederick's Place.

The second prize of books to the value of five guineas to Alfred Beaven, of Highway, Wilts, who served his clerkship to Mr. Arthur Gore, of Mellisham, and Messrs Smith and Sheppard, of Golden Square; and the like prize to Henry C. Potter, of Inverness-terrace, Hyde-park, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Leman, of Lincoln's-inn-fields.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of the managing committee was held on Wednesday the 14th inst. The committee having considered the request contained in a circular sent by the directors of the Law Newspaper Company to all the law societies, inviting communications to the "SOLICITORS' JOURNAL AND REPORTER" of the operations of the societies, and statements of occurrences which may from time to time take place, of a nature calculated to interest the profession. It was resolved that a report of matters, considered by the committee at their meetings, be prepared by the secretary, and after being settled by the chairman, be forwarded to the editor of the journal for insertion.

The SECRETARY reported an active correspondence going on with reference to an official connection between the association and the law society of an important seaport town, a connection likely to prove mutually advantageous.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY reported that arrangements had been made for co-operation and correspondence with the Justices' Clerks Society, in measures connected with bills for consolidating the statute law relating to indictable offences.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY read the draft of an address which had been prepared, comprising some account of measures in contemplation for the amendment of the law, which may probably occupy the attention of parliament in the approaching session, and recommending local committees to call meetings for the purpose of considering the subjects referred to, and reporting thereon to the central committee. The address was considered, and referred to a committee for revision, with a view to its being printed for the information of the provincial members of the committee, and the Local Law Societies.

The following gentlemen have been recently added to the Committee of Management:—Mr. E. E. P. Kelsey, of Salisbury; Mr. T. Waters, of Winchester; Mr. C. E. Deacon, of Southampton; Mr. Thos. Coombs, of Dorchester; and Mr. H. S. Stokes, of Truro.

WORCESTER LAW SOCIETY.

At the annual meeting of the Worcester and Worcestershire Law Society, held at the Law Library, on Tuesday, the 20th instant, Mr. Charles Pidcock, President in the chair, the following appointment of officers for the ensuing year took place:—Mr. John Hill, Town Clerk, President; Mr. W. N. Marcy, of Bewdley, Clerk of the Peace for Worcestershire, Vice-President; Mr. William Allen, Treasurer; and Mr. John Stallard, Secretary.

BEFORE THE LORDS JUSTICES.

Thompson v. Finch.—In re Hayward. Jan. 27.

Lord Justice Turner said that at the hearing of the cause their lordships had felt it their duty to call upon Mr. John Hayward, a solicitor of the court, to show cause why, upon the materials before it in this suit, and in other suits, he should not be struck off the roll. His lordship entered into a full statement of the facts, and observed that if those facts had stood unexplained the court would have felt it a duty and an act of justice to the public to whom the integrity and character of solicitors are most important, and no less a duty to the great body of solicitors themselves, to whose character for integrity it was impossible to bear too high testimony, to have ordered this gentlenman to be at once removed from the roll of its officers. That there had been a gross and unqualified breach of trust in regard to the £1,000 and £500 was plain, and great irregularity and serious misconduct as to the £3,500 could not be doubted. When solicitors become trustees they become not only responsible like other trustees, but as officers of the court they are amenable to the court for their conduct in that character. Upon looking at the affidavits which Mr. Hayward had filed a doubt had been created in his lordship's mind, though they undoubtedly did not remove altogether the impression made on it by the former proceedings, and more especially as to the point of the title-deeds, of which Mr. Hayward swore that he did not recollect the matter, and left it all to his clerk; nor did he remember the borrowing the deeds from Mr. Finch, which Mr. Finch had positively sworn that he did; and, moreover, Mr. Finch has said that he did not think Mr. Hayward had a fraudulent intention. It altogether appeared that forgetfulness or inadvertence, rather than dishonesty, were attributable to Mr. Hayward. Beyond this the affidavits bore strong testimony to the character of Mr. Hayward, and also to his honesty, integrity, and kindness of disposition; they showed that he was respected by clients who had again resorted to his advice and professional assistance even after he had been compelled to pass through the Insolvent Court. Those affidavits proved that county magistrates and other influential persons had restored him to the many important offices he had held, and that he had been re-elected a member of the Law Society to which he before belonged, and considering that Mr. Hayward's entanglement with the affairs and property of Sir J. K. Shaw appeared to have led to the difficulties in which he had been involved, it appeared to him (Lord Justice Turner) that justice would be satisfied by directing that no further proceedings be taken in the matter and that Mr. Hayward should pay the costs of the proceedings.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said he was of the same opinion.

CHANCERY.—Marriage with consent.

IN the case of Dobbyn v. Adams, in which judgment was delivered by the Lord Chancellor on Wednesday, a point arose of a novel character. Mr. Adams was, under the will of his father, empowered to charge the family estate with a jointure, on his marriage, provided that it took place with the consent of the executor and guardian appointed by the will. After the testators death, but considerably before the son attained his majority, the latter eloped with a young lady of still more juvenile years, and they were married without obtaining the consent of any person. The ceremony was performed in an irregular way, but by an ordained clergyman. A few days after the marriage, the consent of the executor and guardian was obtained, and a regular wedding took place between the parties in the parish church.

The case came on appeal from the Master of the Rolls, who had decided that the second marriage being regularly performed, and preceded by the consent, enabled Mr. Adams to charge a jointure on the estate (within the terms of the will). The L. C. held otherwise. The status of the parties was to be considered as determined by the first marriage. The marriage act did not render the irregular marriage void ab initio, but merely voidable within a given time, on the application of particular persons. No suit having been instituted by Mrs. Adams to annul the first marriage, it had become perfectly valid; and having taken place without consent, Mrs. Adams could not sustain her claim to the jointure. The order of the court below was, therefore, reversed.

QUEEN'S BENCH.—Another marriage case.

IN a case of Beamish v. Beamish, a still more curious question has arisen. It is shortly this: whether a clergyman can officiate at his own marriage? This question arose at the assizes last summer, in a case of title affecting estates near Cork. It seems that some years since, the Rev. Mr. Beamish himself performed the marriage service between himself and the lady who claims to be his lawful widow. No other clergyman was present on the occasion, nor was there any witness of the ceremony, except one person who casually witnessed it through the window of the church.

As may be supposed, this question has given rise to a vast amount of research and learned argument. The Fathers, and a host of more modern authorities have been ransacked for dicta bearing on the point. The arguments before the Exchequer Chamber (in error) having lasted for four days, concluded on Saturday; and the judges are now considering the authorities, prior to delivering judgment.

QUEEN'S BENCH.—Reg. v. Massy.—Fracas between Solicitors.

On Wednesday, Mr. Martley, Q.C., on behalf of the prosecutor, applied for a criminal information against Mr. Massy, another solicitor. It appeared from the statements made in the affidavits, that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Massy (who are both solicitors of standing, and well known in the profession), had been acquainted with each other for several years. They lately had some slight differences in relation to a case in the Incumbered Estates Court; but no angry collision had ever occurred between them. On the 29th November, the case in the Incumbered Estates Court stood in the list of that court, but counsel not attending, it was struck out. The prosecutor afterwards prevailed on the court to re-instate the case, but it was not eventually heard, and the court soon after adjourned. Mr. Massy is stated to have resented some supposed affront arising out of these circumstances in an extraordinary way, to have addressed Mr. O'Brien in the hall with language in which the words "blackguard" and "ruffian" prominently appear, and to have brandished his umbrella in a menacing way. The prosecutor checked his first impulse to inflict chastisement with a walking cane; and conscious of having done nothing to merit such insult, applied to this court for redress.

The court granted a conditional order for a criminal information.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.

It will be remembered that a promise was given by Lord Palmerston (in reply to some questions put to the Government in the House of Commons, towards the close of last session), that Mr. Baron Richards should resume his full duty as a common law judge, and be enabled to go circuit with his judicial brethren. After a long delay this promise has been redeemed, and the learned Baron has now quitted the court of which he has been the presiding chief since its institution in the autumn of 1849.

The time for making this change has, however, been singularly ill chosen. The cases in the Incumbered Estates Court were divided among the three commissioners; and according to the mode of procedure there adopted, each commissioner has his own list of appointments, schedules fixed for hearing, &c., for two or three months in advance. The consequence is, that while the two remaining commissioners have their hands fully occupied, the entire proceedings in about six hundred cases are brought to a complete standstill, and nothing whatever can be done.

Speculation is rife as to the course which the Government intend to pursue; whether a third commissioner is to be appointed, or whether arrangements will be made so as to enable the existing commissioners to transact the whole of the business. Meanwhile, the inconvenience caused by this abrupt suspension of so much important business is daily increasing; and the dissatisfaction of solicitors and suitors is rapidly approaching a point at which some general expression of it must be expected to take place. Surprise is expressed that the Incorporated Law Society does not take up the matter, and represent the general state of feeling to the proper authorities.

KINGSFORD v. MERRY.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I perceive by the Times newspaper that the great City meeting has been held, and what is very extraordinary, that whilst every speaker mentioned the necessity of remedying existing deficiencies in connexion with the dock warrant or other symbol of merchandise, the clause of the proposed bill to remedy the grievance is silent, altogether silent, as to documents of title.

The clause in question, read to the meeting by Mr. Weguelin, is as follows:—

"That any purchases, or any contract or agreement for the purchase and sale of merchandise, which shall be bonâ fide made by a purchaser in the ordinary course of trade, shall be as binding on the true owner of such merchandise, and the purchaser shall have the same right and title to the merchandise, as if the sale thereof, or the contract for the sale, were made by the true owner: provided the person who shall make such sale or contract, shall have the possession of the merchandise at the time of the sale or contract, and shall deliver over the merchandise to the buyer."

Now, let us see whether this, if made the law of the land, would advance the object of the City gentlemen. In the first place, does it authorise anything but an actual sale? does it give relief to any banker or merchant coming under advance merely? I trow not, for although the word "contract" is used in addition to the word "sale," yet, by the rule of construction in such case of "noscitur à sociis," the contract must be ejusdem generis: must be in the nature of a contract for sale. But in what way would that serve Baron Rothschild or other capitalists wishing to advance money on merchandize safely, and not to speculate on the merchandize as a purchaser? But suppose this difficulty overcome by a special provision as to security for advances, is the clause in question free from further objection?

To bring oneself within the words of the clause, before a safe contract for purchase or sale can be entered into, the buyer or seller, as the case may be, would have to go and see that the merchandise proposed to be bought or sold was in the actual possession of the party with whom he contracts. Would that give an additional facility to commerce? Again, if the party contracting has been shown the identical merchandise he is bargaining for, he will have to carry his circumspection still further; he must see that the goods delivered are the identical goods shown to him and included in the contract, for if the transaction were of fifty hhds. of Jamaica sugar per Sesostris, and fifty hhds. of the same quality by the same vessel but held under a different title were delivered to him by the fraud of the seller, this projected bill would not afford him protection. Besides, it cannot be too strongly inculcated upon commercial men that mere bodily possession ought not to give a title to merchandise, otherwise how could the capitalist be ever safe as to his advances—he must place confidence in the wharfinger, the warehousekeeper, or the carrier, and their bodily possession ought not to enable them to pass the property of their employers.

On this head, as it seems to me, the 4th section of the Merchant and Factors' Act, 6 Geo. 4, c. 94, is quite sufficient protection for fair dealing between merchants, the clause in question being to the effect, that persons may contract with known agents in the ordinary course of business, or out of that course within the agent's authority, notwithstanding notice.

On a review of the question, and having the benefit of the discussion at the city meeting, I am more convinced than ever that such a measure as I suggested in the letter you inserted in your second paper is that which the merchants and capitalists require, and ought to seek.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

Jan. 21, 1857. CHREMES.

BRENTFORD COUNTY COURT.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The cause list at the last court contained upwards of 100 cases!—got through, as usual, during the day! It invariably contains from 100 to 200 cases, all of which are decided on that day.

Some of the suitors and loungers being tired of waiting about, towards the end of the day became in various stages of inebriety, and talked, laughed, and swore, with no other interruption than an occasional—"Pray silence;" "Be quiet, ladies;" "You must sit down, or go out," from the meek-spirited usher; or an angry dialogue between the aforesaid usher and some "unprotected female" struggling at the door to gain admission.

It is admitted, I believe, that the principle of the Small Debts Acts is cheap and speedy law; and for that purpose courts are directed to be held at least once in every month. But I ask you, Sir, why, in a populous district like this, the court does not sit once a week, or once every alternate week at least, having a cause-list of moderate dimensions, containing one-quarter or one-half of the present average number? By this means much of the noise, confusion, and ill-humour so ordinary at this court might be prevented.

It may truly be said that it is utterly impossible for the learned judge (Mr. Adolphus) to give the same degree of attention to those causes which may happen to be at the end of this long list, as to those at or near the beginning. The latter causes are more hurried; the witnesses are not allowed time to give their answers; the judge becomes fatigued, and says smart things to the suitor and their witnesses—which he would not have occasion to say, were the court not to crowd so much work into one day's list.

I trouble you with these remarks, in the hope that, with your aid, they may possibly tend to the better regulation of the court, and thereby to the public advantage.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Jan. 22, 1857. A SUITOR.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES TO LAND

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I ask permission to lay before your readers some remarks in opposition to the projected revolution in the transfer of real property, and, before adverting to the measure itself, some observations on the incessant persecution carried on by the Legislature against the legal profession, and especially against that more numerous portion of it by which the practical details of legal business are almost entirely managed. If the Legislature had the power of creating some new professions, it might, most beneficially to society, exercise such power; but here is a most ancient and honourable profession, amongst secular professions the most important and the first in rank, which has furnished to the peerage one-third of its members, and whose actual head is always himself a peer, and presides in the most august assembly in the land, and the Legislature seeks its destruction. The members of the lower branch of that profession have paid to the Government the prodigious sum of at least seventeen or eighteen hundred thousand pounds for simple admission to it, and pay a very large sum annually for liberty to practise it; as a body they are men very highly qualified, and of highly honourable character; their intervention in the transfer of property, and the responsibility under which they act, practically afford a security in the acquisition and enjoyment of property which is of the highest possible value; and they are treated by the Government and Legislature precisely as if they were a body of ticket-of-leave men, or worse—as a body of men whose means of obtaining an honest livelihood it is perfectly just, and of the highest importance to destroy. A profession which is the direct result and offspring of law, in a sense which no other profession or occupation is, law is employed to ruin. In other cases compensation is given for the destruction of vested interests. If the crier or some other mechanical officer of a court has his occupation superseded, he receives full compensation for it; and if the occupation of attorneys and solicitors is taken from them, they, as officers of the courts, which they legally are, are just as much entitled to it, though no one thinks of giving it to them. If anything in the existing state of the laws is found not exactly to suit the views of certain persons who have influence in the Legislature, they have only to raise an interested or ignorant cry against the profession; and measures involving the grossest injustice towards it, to an extent which threatens the actual extermination of the larger portion of its members, are eagerly carried, and both Houses of Parliament unite in them with as much satisfaction as if they were engaged in a just, and wise, and charitable work. In the present instance, Punch is, not quite inappropriately, set to work to introduce the revolutionary change, and the Times follows. The Times declares that such a measure cannot be otherwise than highly beneficial to the public, though it admits, either with affected naïveté or gross ignorance, that "a great part" of the employment of professional men depends upon the transfer of property: in the latter case—of ignorance—"plusquàm ne creditis actum est." Possibly it is not aware of the full extent of the injury which it labours to inflict, seeing that not only a very great part, but the whole, in many cases, of professional practice, consists of business thus arising, and that, too, in offices of the very highest respectability. But any one acquainted with the Times, knows what value to attach to a judgment thus expressed; it does not imply that there is any good ground for thinking the public really interested in the matter; it may be for the public advantage, or otherwise; it does not even imply that the Times knows or thinks anything about the matter: this it implies, and only this, that it suits, or is supposed to suit, the immediate purposes of the Times to say so. But unfortunately, as much injustice and oppression may be perpetrated in the name of "The Public," as in the name of "Liberty," by taking advantage—as has been done in other cases, demonstrably to the public injury—of the disgraceful fallacy of first subtracting from the real public the classes most deeply interested in particular measures, and then calling the residue the public, and making that appear an advantage to the public as a whole, which is really an advantage only to one part of it (if even that), at the expense of much more serious disadvantage to another. Legislators do not seem to be aware how easily and directly, and how forcibly, such a principle may be brought to bear upon a general confiscation of funded or landed property, or the sanction which they are consequently giving to the Communist principle in acting upon it. The outcry against the emoluments of the profession is altogether unreasonable; those of other parties connected with the transfer of property are much higher. The estate-agent or the stock-broker can as easily gain a given number of thousands in a year as the solicitor can hundreds, and with a smaller number of persons in their employ, and dependent upon them. Even in small transactions, if there be no special occasion of increased expense, the cost is small, exclusive of stamps, in proportion to the value of the property, and in larger ones trivial in comparison. If a broker buys shares to the amount of £5,000, ½ per cent. is charged to both parties, making £50; and he has merely to step into Capel-court, make a memorandum in his book, fill up a printed form, send it for registration, and settle at stated intervals the balance of an account; perhaps even buying and selling the same stock several times over before it is actually transferred, if transferred at all, and charging the same commission upon each transaction. With a straightforward title, the expenses of vendor and purchaser on a conveyance of land of the same value will seldom amount to near so much, exclusively of stamps; but the purchaser or mortgagor is apt to look at the total amount only of his solicitor's bill, and set down to his emolument the stamps, which, as an unpaid collector of taxes, and at his own risk, he advances to the Government. In large transactions even the banker's charge for a remittance of the purchase-money, or for paying it over the counter to the party entitled to it, will exceed the charges of the solicitor. Architects, surveyors, auctioneers, almost every profession, makes higher charges than the solicitor, and without a corresponding measure of responsibility. If the cost of a transfer of interests in real property is thought too high, the simplest and most equitable way of reducing it is to reduce the stamps; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might as well do this as exterminate three-fifths of the members of a profession who pay annually, for permission to exercise it, a sum very considerable in the aggregate, and which too often—such is the rate of professional emolument—amounts to a duplication of the income-tax, and at the same time throw away almost entirely the large amount which is now derived from articles of clerkship. To destroy the legalised emoluments of the solicitor, instead of reducing the stamps, is precisely equivalent to charging the stamps on conveyances and securities to the solicitor, instead of charging them to the party.

But supposing that the contemplated change, instead of operating to the extermination of the greater part of the profession, should have the effect of raising it, in point of emolument, to the far higher position of professions of inferior dignity and importance. Still it must be considered liable to inseparable objections, and those of the very gravest character on public grounds. I am here obliged to controvert the views expressed in the leading article on the subject in your first number—expressed, that is to say, provisionally until the scheme is more developed—but the interests of the public, not less than those of the profession, imperatively require that the objections to it should be fairly stated—in general terms at least. A much larger space and very extensive consideration would be required to give full effect to them. There is a fundamental error in the very idea of assimilating the conveyance of land to the transfer of stock. The latter is merely the transfer of an abstract right—a right to have a certain sum of money inscribed against your name in a certain book, and to receive the dividends accruing upon that sum. But a line in a book is a very different thing from an acre of land; in the former case no specific thing is conveyed, nothing which the transferree can take into his possession, nothing that can be individualized or distinguished from other stock, otherwise than as forming a certain proportion of the whole amount. In the latter case the thing conveyed is a specific, individual, local, property, which must be distinguished from all other property by situation, by metes and bounds, and other continually varying means of identification, and which the owner may enter upon and use, or permit others to enter upon and use, for an indefinite variety of purposes; in which, moreover, a great variety of partial interests are continually carved out, not only with much greater frequency than in the case of stock, but of a kind of which neither stock nor any similar species of property is susceptible. Look at the possible varieties of interest in the same property exemplified in the second paragraph of the article referred to. How are these to be dealt with in the same manner as a transfer of stock from A. to B.? This difference is inherent and essential; and circumstantially there is a difference also, in the much greater frequency with which stock and similar kinds of property are bought merely for speculative purposes, when a simple transfer of the absolute right to a single owner may be sufficient. When partial interests are created in property of this kind a separate deed (or will) is necessary for the purpose; and where is the advantage to the parties interested in having their title regulated by instruments distinct from the transfer itself instead of a single deed? The truth is, that the recognition of none but absolute and legal interests in stock and shares is intended, not for the advantage of the parties interested, but for the convenience of the bank, or of the joint-stock company whose shares are transferred, and in order to relieve them from the infinite complications that would arise if they were compelled to recognise all the partial interests to which their stock, in indefinite subdivision, would be subjected. It is for this purpose that corresponding provisions are expressly introduced in the settlement deeds of joint-stock companies; and the truth of the statement I have just made is thus exemplified. I am connected with two or three of these, and know that the system is extremely inconvenient to the shareholders, especially on a devolution of the shares; though essential to the proper management of the concern. But the necessity which in these cases exists for recognising only absolute ownership does not exist in the slightest degree in the transfer of a specific local property from one individual to another, where there are no corporate interests, and where no other parties have either right or occasion to interfere; and to ignore, without occasion for it, partial or equitable interests, is only to open the door to innumerable illegitimate dealings with interests in land, corresponding with those which the other system is experimentally and unavoidably found to admit with regard to the kinds of property regulated by it. Surely it is a plan far more straightforward, natural, efficient, and secure, to allow the interests of tenant for life, reversioner, lessee, mortgagor, or mortgagee, or cestui que trust, to appear upon the face of the instruments by which these interests are governed, than to attempt to regulate them by instruments collateral to an actual transfer which makes a single person falsely appear as the absolute owner, and leaves it in his power at any moment either to defeat those interests, or defraud a purchaser of his purchase-money; especially when the plan is thoroughly well settled and understood, and works with admirable efficiency; and when great inconvenience must attend a change, and innumerable questions be set afloat by it which cannot now arise.

It is suggested that such absolute apparent owner would only be placed in the same position as a mortgagee or trustee, with power of sale, now is. The case is very widely different, in point of fact; but, before showing this, I ask why other parties are to be placed in this position, who now stand in quite different relations to each other? Are all the leasehold interests existing in London on the estates of the Duke of Bedford, or the Marquis of Westminster, to be ignored, or is their reversionary interest to be so? Is the tenant for life, as absolute owner, to be enabled to convey the interest of the reversioners, when the transaction may never be discovered till the death of the former?—or is the reversioner to be enabled to defeat the interest of the tenant for life? On the present system, no such possibility exists; on the system proposed, no precaution could prevent the continual occurrence of such transactions. Caveats may be useful in certain cases; as where a will is likely to be offered for probate, which is not entitled to it; but what would be the use of them where a party interested has no possible means of knowing the steps about to be taken to his prejudice? And what would be the value of a distringas, when the value of his interest has been expended or realised, and carried off to America? Were there no other objection to the change of system than that of compelling the owners of partial or equitable interests to become active asserters of their rights, instead of resting upon them in a position which no one now ever thinks of assailing, because those rights are apparent on the face of documents under which the title must be derived, it would be a change immeasurably for the worse. And, supposing such interests to have been wrongfully conveyed, is the owner of them or the purchaser to bear the loss?—and, if the latter, will it not be incumbent upon him to institute a strict examination of the vendor's title, even as now, except that it would be under circumstances which would make the investigation much more difficult, and less satisfactory, than at present? But, returning to the position of mortgagor and mortgagee, and supposing it as reasonable as it is unreasonable, that other parties should be placed in the same relative position, so far as regards the power of the one over the property of the other, the comparison fails in the most essential points. The equity of redemption of the mortgagor is disclosed in the document which contains the power of the mortgagee. The purchaser can judge for himself of the validity of the power, without ignoring the interest of the mortgagor. It is always provided that express notice, at least three months before a sale, shall be given to the mortgagor, or that interest shall be for a certain period in arrear, so that he is aware of his liability to have the property sold; and in practice, notwithstanding that provision, express notice is always given when the mortgagor is accessible, and the property, if sold without his consent, is almost invariably advertised for sale. The mortgagor thus always knows when and from whom to claim any balance of the purchase-money. This bears no practical resemblance to a system which would enable a mortgagee of an estate worth £10,000 and mortgaged for £1,000, to effect, as absolute owner, either a real or colourable sale of the property, without the mortgagor knowing anything about it, perhaps, till long afterwards, when the purchase-money is removed out of his reach. So, with regard to trustees, I doubt whether an instance ever occurs of a trustee selling real estate in order to avail himself of the proceeds of it, though it occurs very frequently with regard to stock on the system which it is proposed to substitute for the present. At all events, the interest of the parties equitably entitled is disclosed; they may be referred to, if necessary; and, in fact, their concurrence in the conveyance is generally asked for and given, unless infancy, absence, or some other reasonable cause affords a reason for this not being done. Besides, it must be remembered that trustees are always selected persons, and generally there are two or more of them; whilst the absolute apparent owner, when not a trustee, may be anybody; and even when a trustee, is to be placed, it seems, singly upon the register, thus making invariable that very condition which now very frequently makes equitable interests unsaleable, and unavailable for the purposes of a security, when it accidentally occurs.

I can only notice one other objection to the change. It is suggested that all partial interests must become merely equitable interests. If it were so, it would indirectly involve a violent and almost total change of the judicature to which legal interests in real estate are now subjected; a change that would be attended with the most serious inconveniences, and with this amongst them, that it would probably be a quarter of a century before the law of real property became again settled, if that should ever be the case, when it seems to be an axiom of legislation that the law shall never be allowed to remain on any point the same, except for the shortest period possible; and when a vice-chancellor may, any day during the session of Parliament, appeal to the bar for information, whether all the laws of England have been altered since the preceding day.

Of course, I am well aware that a vulgar clamour exists against the present system of conveyancing, as against the law of real property itself—especially by a class of persons whose knowledge of both informs them that entails are created not by the act of parties, but by law; and gives them equal understanding of the law on other points—but any sound objection to them I have never seen stated, whilst the admirable efficiency, and especially (the most important one) the security of the system, it would be futile to deny. I believe it to be nothing but a senseless rage, a mania for innovation, or a cupidity which will allow nothing to remain to another which it can appropriate to itself, that demands the change; unless perchance it should be a discreditable desire to raise a little political capital—in which attempt more may be lost than gained—by acting upon a vulgar prejudice. As a system of jurisprudence, I believe that nothing in the civil law has equalled, or, in any other law, approached our code of laws relating to property. It was also a thoroughly coherent system, until tampered with by hands not qualified to deal with it, and for the most part is so still. The form of conveyance also has been a thoroughly scientific one, and none likely to be substituted for it will bear comparison with it in this respect. A little antique gravity of language is no objection to it; a change in this respect would be no more advantageous than to the bible or the prayer-book; and the grammatical and logical strictness and fulness of expression which are ignorantly called tautology, would be very ill replaced by popular language that would leave things much more open to evasion or dispute. Who attempts to drive a coach-and-six through a well drawn conveyance? Are our acts of parliament equally well drawn? I can discern no "feudalism" in the forms of conveyance, though I studied law when well educated lawyers were accustomed to go more deeply to its foundations than it is usual to do now. If there be feudalism, it is in the law of real property, not in the conveyance; and this, I have no doubt, is one object of indirect attack. But are monarchy, aristocracy, the ownership as distinct from the occupation of land, and all other things that can be traced up to feudal times, to be rejected on that account? Is everything necessarily evil that has existed previously to the nineteenth century? Is the very existence of a thing a reason for abolishing it? Have all the changes already made been productive of unmixed good, or even of good upon the whole? Is it a fitting thing that there should be no stability in law, and that every fanciful member of Parliament, and every aggressive class, should be permitted to deal with existing systems of jurisprudence as if they were mere rubbish, which, for the indulgence of their own whims, they may order to be removed and cast away?

It has been suggested that the contemplated change is promoted by some London solicitors with the view of advancing their own interests at the expense of their brethren in the country. I am unwilling to contemplate the invidious distinction, and think it incredible that such a suicidal measure should be promoted with that view. A central registration I believe utterly impracticable; and if a Legislature which has established local courts could cover itself with ridicule by attempting to establish a central transfer of local property, it cannot be doubted that the country at large would oppose a resistance to a measure involving such monstrous injustice and such intolerable inconvenience, which it would be impossible to withstand. But supposing that instead of being directed to the extermination, as far as possible, of the profession at large, the measure were so arranged as only to destroy the country practitioners for the benefit of the comparatively small body of practitioners in London, the result to the latter would be the worst that could be conceived. A large proportion of the country practitioners, either from expedience or necessity, would migrate to London, or open offices there, and travel backwards and forwards, as architects, engineers, and other professional men now do; thus not only neutralising the expected benefit, but competing with the London practitioners for the London practice, and taking into their own hands their own agency business and that of their connections in the country. It is the whole profession that is threatened with the destruction of its legitimate interests, though not in equal measure; and the interests of the whole profession require that a change so injurious and so impolitic should be most resolutely withstood. In doing so it would be sustained by the sense of the more intelligent and upright portion of the public itself. "Live and let live," is the just and generous maxim which yet prevails with a large portion of the public, though Governments and Legislatures, and certain other aggressive classes, may be disposed to reject it as feudal, or obsolete, or otherwise unworthy of the middle of the nineteenth century. My name, of course, I communicate to you; but as the force of my reason does not depend upon it, I think it unnecessary to obtrude it upon your readers.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

Z.

The Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 & 1854, &c., &c. By THOMAS HUGH MARKHAM, Esq., M.A., Barrister-at-law. Wildy & Sons.

THE course of legal literature in reference to the recent changes in common law practice, has been rather amusing to a bystander. No sooner had the first clouds, ominous to chicane and the pleader's art, which rolled over the horizon of the common law in the early part of 1852, burst in the form of the Procedure Act of that year, than many a Coke took heart of grace and commenced his commentary on a new Littleton. His practice—each aspirant felt—could not be injured; and if his chance of future fees were in some measure diminished, why, at all events, behold a golden opportunity to establish his claims as a jurist, if not yet as an advocate! At all events it was incumbent on him forthwith to study the act and the report of the commissioners on which it was founded. He could not afford to wait, as many of his be-briefed brethren did, to study each point as it arose and enlivened his well-laden table. He must try to understand the statute for his own edification; and what better or more recognised way of so doing than by writing an edition thereof with notes for the use of the public? It really was a tempting field for speculation—that act with its 236 sections, and its brace of schedules:—so many ingenious speculations to be raised on each of them by the ambitious!—so many useful remarks to be left (and safely left) unsaid by the cautious or the dull!—such stores of blue-book and text-book learning to be filched by the unscrupulous! Accordingly, Messrs. Holland, Lawrence, Kerr, Francis, Pearson, and many more, mended their pens and set to work. Mr. Holland annotated because he had been secretary to the commission; Mr. Lawrence, we suppose, because he had not; Mr. Kerr wrote that he might become known; and Mr. Pearson (he has since died, and the profession has lost a worthy man and a sound lawyer) bestowed upon us the fruit of his large experience. These various editions were born and died, after success proportionate to their respective merits. Time rolled on, and lo! another cloud arose, almost as lowering as its predecessor—viz., the Common Law Procedure Act 1854; and by this time—to say nothing of several judicial decisions on different points—there were the General Rules (practice and pleading) of Hilary Term, 1853—the giant offspring of their Titanic parent of the preceding year. These all required to be dealt with, and then followed the Rules of 1854, founded on the Procedure Act of that year. All these successive inroads on the existing practices fairly routed the general forces of the annotating army. A few, we believe, still stood to their colours. Mr. Kerr expounded the later Statutes and Rules, though with less success, in our humble judgment, than in his earlier efforts. Mr. Pearson, too, married the two Procedure Acts, and produced a handy volume enough, which is still in request; but the larger number had had enough of it. Besides, by this time, heavier guns had been brought to bear, and the whole fortress of "Common Law Practice" was about to be attacked; whereas the assailants to whom we have alluded had been content to let fly at some salient points thereof which had been brought into prominence by the Acts themselves. In a word, Captain Archbold-by-Chitty-by-Prentice, and Captain Lush-by-Stephen, took the field, and two ponderous works saw the light, of which it is our intention and our wish to speak with the most sincere respect. Both of them (as was necessary to the plan of their conception) set forth and attempted to explain, not the Procedure Acts and Rules by the practice theretofore existing, but the existing practice itself;—the acts and rules affecting a small part only, in comparison, of their contents. And to the full and proper elaboration of this design it is evident that the productions of Messrs. Holland & Co. were preliminary; and, we doubt not, of considerable use. Since the publication, however, of the two important treatises just referred to, we believe that, with the exception of the work placed at the head of this notice, none of the annotating character, in reference to this branch of the law, have been published; and, we apprehend, for the simple reason that none were required. In this opinion, however, Hugh Markham, Esq., M.A., did not, for one, coincide, and he has accordingly given to the profession a book which (we quote from his title-page) contains "an abstract of every case decided on the construction of the Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852 and 1854," up to October, 1856; "copious information on the New Practice of the Courts of Common Law at Westminster, and new precedents and forms adapted to the various enactments of the Acts; together with the 'Regulæ Generales' of 1853 and 1854; the new Pleading Rules"—[we would suggest that these last form part of the 'Regulæ Generales' first mentioned]—"the Directions to the Masters of the Courts; the Scales of Costs on Taxation; the List of Fees under the Statute of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 73; Table of Cases and full Index; forming a complete and concise book of practice." Well! we felt a little out of breath when we came to the end of this bill of fare, and a little surprised at the moderate dimensions of the book itself—96 pages to wit, with an additional 137 pages, or thereabouts, made up with the schedules and forms which have been already appended, more or less fully, to most of the works we have alluded to (as well as to many others); and which, indeed, are to be had from any law stationer. Moreover, of these 96 pages, we imagine about 50 or 60 (for we do not profess to have entered into any abstruse calculation on the point) consist of the text of the two Procedure Acts themselves. Now, we do not state it as a grievance that Mr. Markham has favoured us with so little original matter from his pen—far from it—but we confess the title-page and the dedication to Mr. Justice Willes (which last is really amusing in its way, but too long to reprint here) had prepared us for something quite of a different nature.

We have not left ourselves any great space to examine the quality of the small residuary meal extractible by the hungry student or practitioner: and, indeed, the object of this notice has been to enter a good-humoured protest against a far too common class of books to which this belongs—of great promise but small performance; and wherein there is great expenditure of type, but little of patient thought, or from the resources of profound knowledge—rather than to expose individual deficiencies. And yet the original matter, such as it is, will scarcely satisfy the assisa panis established for those who would cater to the legal appetite; and it would be ill-timed leniency not to justify this judgment by a few examples. We take, therefore, a section or two at random. First, then, in a note to s. 51 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, we find, that "the Editor heard the Lord Chief Justice (Jervis) of the Common Pleas a few weeks since, while the case of Chester v. Wortley was being argued before him, say, the proper way to answer interrogatories is to give a separate and distinct answer to each question; that is to say, a specific answer to a specific question, as for example—Interrogatory the first.—Answer. Interrogatory the second.—I decline to answer." And to help out this judicial example (which, as so reported, is, in truth, not over lucid) the editor employs one of his 96 pages in printing certain interrogatories in an interesting case called Boldero v. Race, which, so far as we know, has not yet emerged from our Editor's chambers; but in the future proceedings whereof he anticipates an order from Mr. Justice Crowder, bearing date "20th Dec., 1858." Now, it strikes us as a pity that a note of the case Crooms v. Morrison, 5 Ell. & Bl. 984 (reported nomine Crews v. Morrison, 4 W. R. Q. B. 282), was not here substituted, for it gives information as to the affidavit which is required in an application for interrogatories before declaration; as well as that of James v. Barns, 17 C. B. 596, which determines a similar point in reference to interrogatories applied for after plea. And we are concerned to find no note of Tetley v. Easton, 16 C. B. 643 and 25 L. J. 293. So also at sect. 173 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, we were somewhat scandalised—notwithstanding the deprecatory assertion there made by the Editor that "it was not the province of the work to explain what defence a landlord might and may set up"—to find no allusion to Clarke v. Arden, 16 C. B. 227. Again at sect. 210 of the same act our best spectacles have failed to discover Romily v. Fycroft, 4 W. R. Exch. 26. And, not to pursue the task, at 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 15, Tyerman v. Smith, 25 L. J. Q. B. 359, must be returned non est inventus; while, on the other hand, we are informed, on the authority of Lock v. Vulliamy (a case more than 20 years old), that "no precise form of words is requisite to constitute an award:" which is all Mr. Markham has to say to the section in question; though as our readers are probably aware, it regulates the important subject of the time during which awards are to be made. By the way, this reminds us of another complaint we have to make, on parting with our annotator; and this is, that every now and then—in default of points judicially decided on the Procedure Acts—he has inserted (apparently pretty much, at hazard, from the text books) notices of cases long ago decided, in reference to the part of practice to which the section he is dealing with has more or less affinity. Such surplusage is worse than useless in a book such as that before us is intended to be, the plan of which is not devoid of merit; and Mr. Markham, if he would efficiently carry it out, might add, from time to time, a convenient manual to our libraries.

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION.—SIXTH GENERAL MEETING.

JANUARY 19TH, 1857.

The following gentlemen were ballotted for and elected:—Frederick Clark, Esq., W. F. W. Bird, Esq.

Mr. HASTINGS stated that the council had, on the application of Mr. Edwin Field, determined to appoint a special committee to consider whether any and what fixed rate of professional remuneration ought to be laid down. The committee to consist of Mr. G. B. Allen, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Cookson, Mr. Edgar, Mr. Field, Mr. W. Hawes, Mr. A. Pellatt, M.P., Mr. Phillips, M.P., Mr. Pitt Taylor, with power to add to their number.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR then read a report from the special committee appointed to consider the three Ecclesiastical Courts' Bills of the last session of Parliament.

It stated that Sir R. Bethell, as representing the Government; Sir F. Kelly, as representing the Opposition; and Mr. Collier, as representing the Independent members of Parliament, had all arrived at the conclusion, that no effectual scheme of law reform, as applicable to wills and intestacies, could be carried out except by depriving the Ecclesiastical Courts of all jurisdiction in matters testamentary, by ignoring the doctrine of bona notabilia, and by breaking down the monopoly of the doctors and proctors. The committee approved of these cardinal amendments of the law. They advanced no arguments in support of them, because no attempt had been made to question their policy, and they considered it idle to parade proofs where judgment had virtually been allowed to go by default.

But the first point on which the promoters of the several bills of last session differed was as to the nature and functions of the tribunal or tribunals to be henceforth intrusted with testamentary jurisdiction. They all agreed that any court on which testamentary jurisdiction was to be conferred should deal with wills of real as well as of personal estate. They all, too, recommended, though they differed in the details, that in certain cases probates and letters of administration should be granted by local tribunals. Moreover, the Attorney-General and Sir Fitzroy Kelly thought that the court of probate should construe the terms of all wills, adjudicate upon the rights of legatees, and administer the estates of deceased persons. On other matters, far less unanimity prevailed. Th Attorney-General seemed anxious that a new Queen's court should be established, which should virtually be an additional department of the Court of Chancery, and that a single judge should preside in this court, who would differ in little but the name from a vice-chancellor, who would deal with facts as well as law without the intervention of a jury, and who would rely either on affidavits or on testimony reduced to writing behind his back by the examiner. Sir F. Kelly, while recommending the establishment of a new court, and the appointment of a single judge, proposed that this court should be a court of common law, examining witnesses viva voce, calling in the aid of juries when necessary, and adopting pleadings and procedure which should vie in simplicity with the forms used in the county courts. Mr. Collier contended that no new court should be established, but that the testamentary jurisdiction should be transferred, according to the amount of the property to be dealt with, either to the courts of common law or to the county courts.

The committee were not satisfied with any of these schemes. They thought Sir Richard Bethell, in introducing into his court the system of procedure which prevails in courts of equity, had committed a fatal error. No doubt, that system had been improved by recent legislation; but still many of the rules of practice in Chancery, and especially those which related to pleadings and evidence, were highly defective, and the mode of examining witnesses was nearly as faulty as any that could be devised. These objections were sufficiently weighty to foster and to justify the continuing unpopularity of the Court of Chancery, and they furnished an unanswerable argument against any scheme for extending its jurisdiction. They had, too, peculiar force when applied to testamentary causes, which generally turn on questions of sanity, undue influence, or fraud, and require, beyond all other suits, to be dealt with by judges and jurors who have ample opportunity of watching the demeanour of witnesses. The committee objected to so much of Mr. Collier's plan as related to the courts of common law. They thought it very undesirable to impose on the fifteen judges the duty of mastering a branch of the law with some portions of which they were almost necessarily unfamiliar. They referred to that large and troublesome class of suits which turn on the doctrines applicable to the different grants of limited administration and the like. These doctrines are not very abstruse, and able lawyers might, if necessary, soon make themselves acquainted with their details; but the judges, who have passed the meridian of life, would probably not regard with much favour any scheme which would necessitate a departure from the beaten track of their ordinary duties, and convert them from administrators of the law into hearers of the law. Mr. Collier's plan was exposed to two other objections. First, the Chancery Commissioners of 1854 had pointed out that "uniformity of practice is of essential importance in regard to the probate of wills;" and this uniformity would not be promoted by the transfer of the business to three independent courts of concurrent jurisdiction. Next, the committee foresaw great difficulty in framing any machinery for duly controlling the registrars employed in conducting the common form business, when once they were subjected to the interference of three separate tribunals. "No man can serve two masters," and the committee would not recommend that the registrars of wills should be called upon to serve three.

Sir F. KELLY, in proposing the establishment of a separate court, had an obvious advantage over Mr. Collier, and, by insisting that his court should be a court of common law, he placed in strong relief the principal defect of the Attorney-General's measure. Thus far, then, his scheme was excellent; but it was open to certain objections. First, his court was to consist of a single judge, who should enjoy the rank and receive the salary of a puisne judge. This arrangement was faulty. It was objectionable to increase the number of our common law judges. It was not always an easy matter to find fifteen men of sufficient professional eminence to discharge the functions of a judge in a really creditable manner, and it would be inexpedient to aggravate this difficulty unless a case of necessity were made out. But Sir Fitzroy had not established any such case. A strong impression, too, prevailed in the country that the common law judges had not sufficient employment to occupy their time, and a commission had been appointed to report on the expediency of diminishing their numbers. In the face of these facts the House of Commons would not be very willing to sanction the appointment of a sixteenth judge. Such a course was quite unnecessary. Instead of appointing a new judge for the court of probate, three of the existing puisne judges should constitute that court—one to be selected from the Court of Queen's Bench, another from the Court of Common Pleas, and the third from the Court of Exchequer. These judges would still continue to be members of their original courts, and when not sitting as a court of probate would transact business as ordinary common law judges. They would be appointed without additional salary, and when engaged in the court of probate the remaining judges would make arrangements for dispensing with their attendance in their respective courts. This plan presented several advantages. 1. It would save the salaries of a judge, secretary, usher, and trainbearer, which could not be less than £5,600 a-year; and this matter deserved attention, as the measure must cost the country dear in the shape of compensations. 2. The substitution of three judges for one would add to the authority of the court, and would assimilate its proceedings to those of the other courts of common law. It would also remove an anomaly; for, as all issues of fact in country causes arising out of disputed will were to be sent for trial to the assizes, if the court of probate were to consist of one judge alone, he would, on every application for a new trial, be required to review the conduct of other judges of co-ordinate or superior authority. 3. The plan would impose on the common law judges some additional labour, and thus tend to remove all cause for public dissatisfaction, on the ground of the judicial staff being disproportionately large. No alarm need be felt, lest by this arrangement the energies of the judges should be overtaxed; for, as a large portion of judicial business is, during term, transacted in banco, the principal effect of employing one judge of each court in the disposal of testamentary causes, would be to introduce the practice of three judges sitting together, instead of four—a practice which, although it would increase the responsibility, could add little to the labours of each judge, and would not impair the efficiency of the court. 4. The plan proposed would neutralise an objection that has been urged in high quarters to the establishment of a new court of probate. The Lord Chancellor, in 1854, stated, on the authority of the Chancery Commissioners, that the Ecclesiastical Courts were not occupied more than sixty days annually in contentious business relating to wills; and he then asked with much force, "how it could possibly be advisable to create a new tribunal which would have no employment whatever during ten months in the year." Now, by "creating a new tribunal," Lord Cranworth evidently meant "appointing a new judge," and in this light his reasoning was unanswerable; but if the court were to consist, not of a new judge exclusively occupied in testamentary matters, but of three judges draughted from other courts, who, when the court of probate had no business to transact, would be employed in their ordinary avocations, the whole argument crumbles to pieces. A fifth cogent reason for preferring the plan advocated by the committee to that of Sir Fitzroy Kelly was to be found in the same debate to which allusion had just been made. "In my opinion," said Lord Cranworth, "a minute division of labour in the higher departments of jurisprudence is highly inexpedient. I do not believe that a man who never considers any other subject will be as competent to determine a question of insanity, or of undue influence, as one who is in the habit of dealing with such subjects in common with other questions to which his judicial capacity is applied; and so far from considering it to be an advantage that only a single class of cases should be submitted to each judge, I regard it in the light of a serious disadvantage."

The plan of appointing some of the existing judges to sit as a separate tribunal, and to deal with a particular class of cases, was not a new idea. It had long formed a fundamental part of the Scottish system of judicature, and it had been successfully adopted in England under the provisions of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, cap. 41, in selecting the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Nay, the same principle was recognised to some extent in our three superior courts of common law; for, although in most legal matters the fifteen judges exercise concurrent powers, and perform similar functions, yet certain exclusive jurisdiction is vested in the Court of Queen's Bench with respect to crimes and parochial law, in the Court of Common Pleas with respect to the law of Parliamentary elections, and in the Court of Exchequer with respect to revenue causes.

The plan proposed would probably not be opposed by the judges, as it would affect only three of them; and if some slight honorary distinction, in the shape of precedence or the like, were conferred on the members of the court of probate, the ablest of the puisne judges would gladly consent to qualify themselves for the office.

The second objection urged by the committee to Sir Fitzroy Kelly's scheme has reference to the proposal, which he made in common with Sir Richard Bethell, that the new court of probate should also be a court of construction and a court of administration. Nearly one-half of the business transacted by the equity judges has relation to testamentary causes. Either the terms of a will have to be construed, or the rights of a legatee have to be defined, or the estate of a testator has to be administered. All these suits are, of course, conducted in accordance with the forms of equity procedure. Sir Fitzroy does not intend to deprive the Court of Chancery of any portion of this jurisdiction, but he wishes to confer on his court—which is to be a common law court, employing common law procedure—a similar jurisdiction. Thus, there would be two independent tribunals of co-ordinate power, so far as the construction of wills and the administration of the effects of deceased persons were concerned, and each would deal with the matters before it in a mode essentially different from that which was adopted by the other. No arrangement could be more unsatisfactory. The new court would do its work either better or worse than the Court of Chancery, or there would be no perceptible difference between the two. If the work were done worse, the public would sustain a positive loss by the change; if the work were done equally well, the only effect would be that five highly salaried functionaries would despatch business which four can now despatch with ease; and if the work were done better, the court of probate would be thronged, and the Court of Chancery deserted, and the whole of our judicial machinery, so far as the courts of equity are concerned, would be thrown out of gear.

This objection did not extend to Sir R. Bethell's scheme, for, as in his court suits would be carried on through the medium of the usual forms of proceedings in equity, there would be no inconsistency in imposing on the judge of that court several of the duties which now devolve on the ordinary vice-chancellors. The scheme, however, had other weak points, in common with that which Sir F. Kelly advocated. Thus, both were open to the objection that, as the present staff of equity judges was amply sufficient to keep down all arrears in their courts, and as they now disposed of all questions of construction and suits for administration, it would be impossible to clothe another court with jurisdiction over these matters without diminishing the business, and thus impairing the efficiency of the existing tribunals. Moreover, the committee doubted the expediency of conferring on any one superior court the separate powers of granting probates, construing wills, and administering estates, on the ground that the union of these separate functions in one court would afford a dangerous facility for needless litigation. The advice given by lawyers to their clients is not always disinterested, and it is notorious that much less persuasion is required to induce a man who is already involved in law to take ulterior steps in the cause than to commence legal proceedings de novo. If the court of probate were made a court of construction, so that an attorney might suggest to an executor that it would be prudent, on obtaining probate, to take the opinion of the court on some doubtful expression in the will, many frivolous questions respecting alleged obscurities would, for the mere sake of costs, be submitted to judicial decision, which, under other circumstances, would never have been seriously raised.

Sir F. Kelly's scheme was radically defective in another point. In common with the Attorney-General and Mr. Collier, he recognises the necessity of conferring on certain district offices or courts a limited testamentary jurisdiction. But in selecting the districts he had committed a twofold error. First, he had proposed the establishment of only thirty-two offices—a number absurdly insufficient, as the country contained fifty-two counties, and was divided into sixty county court districts; and, next, he had been induced, apparently through the influence of the local proctors and registrars, to adopt substantially the present diocesan districts, and thus to fix his offices in most inconvenient localities. For instance, no office was vouchsafed to Liverpool, the second city in the kingdom; but every probate required by any one of her 255,000 inhabitants must be obtained either at Chester or in London. Again, the West Riding of Yorkshire, containing a population not far short of a million and a-half, had no court of probate nearer than York; and the whole of the county of Derby was left dependent on the town of Nottingham. The people of Plymouth must travel more than sixty miles to Exeter; the men of Birmingham and Wolverhampton must go to Lichfield; and the inland town of Winchester must furnish probates and letters of administration for the 150,000 persons who resided in Southampton, Portsmouth, and the Isle of Wight. Mr. Collier had originated a far wiser plan, which was, that the only tribunals to be intrusted with local testamentary jurisdiction should be the county courts. New local courts should not be created to administer so small a subdivision of the law as that which relates to wills and intestacies. The more courts are multiplied the less chance there is of securing anything like uniformity in decisions or procedure. The creation, too, of a court is always an expensive affair, as it entails, not only the appointment of a judge and a competent staff of officers, but the purchase or renting of a court-house, with an appropriate registry. Moreover, when two functionaries in separate offices are partially engaged in transacting business which might be disposed of by one of them in a single office, each is unlikely to attain that efficiency which is the result of experience and practice. The work, in short, will be less well done, and the cost of doing it will be far heavier.

On every ground it was desirable to intrust the county courts with whatever testamentary business it might be thought desirable to have transacted in the country. The courts themselves were most conveniently situated for the despatch of local business. All the larger ones had good offices; and, what was of great importance when wills had to be registered, they possessed fire-proof rooms for the protection of their records. The registrars had been selected in consequence of their known intelligence and integrity; and where the business of the courts was at all extensive, they must be competent to perform the additional duties which would devolve upon them by the plan proposed. No doubt, a little study and attention would be necessary at first, and some slight awkwardness might be felt at starting; but a very few weeks would render the officers familiar with the routine, and, practically speaking, the system would work without any difficulty.

The committee next proposed that the registrars of the county courts should act as district officers of the metropolitan court, with respect to all "common form" or non-contentious business, where the estate of the deceased amounted to £300. They should entertain applications for probates or administrations, give directions respecting the production of documents and proofs, and the preparation of affidavits, see that these directions were complied with, and transmit the papers to the court in London, in order that they might be finally examined by one of the principal registrars. The actual probate or administration should be granted by the metropolitan court, and the documents, when duly completed, should be returned to the local registrar, to be by him delivered to the proper parties. This arrangement would be productive of much benefit to the public, for it would enable executors and administrators to transact their business without the aid of an attorney, and would obviate the necessity of employing a London agent.

The duties of the county court registrars ought to be restricted in the manner stated above—partly because this course would best insure uniformity of practice; partly because errors would be more likely to be discovered when documents were subject to a twofold examination; and partly because the seal of the metropolitan court would be far better known than that of any county court, and consequently any attempt to utter a forged probate would be more easily detected.

Next, when the property of a deceased person is sworn under £300, the county court of the district in which he dwelt at the time of his death should be authorised to grant probate or administration, whether in a contentious or a non-contentious suit, and in all these cases the registrar should transact the common form business, subject to the control of the judge in cases of difficulty.

From a return published by the Chancery Commissioners in 1854 it appears that, exclusive of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and the courts of the Archbishop of York, the annual grants of probates and administrations, where the property was sworn under £300, amounted on an average of the three years—1850, 1851, and 1852—to 8,947: a number sufficiently large to illustrate the value of any measure which would facilitate, simplify, and cheapen the proceedings required for obtaining these grants; yet a number sufficiently small, when read in connection with the annual returns of deaths, to prove how extensively the annoyance, trouble, and expense consequent on the present testamentary system operate in deterring the personal representatives of deceased persons from perfecting their titles according to law.

The committee further recommended that in cases under £300 the county courts should exercise all powers now vested in the Court of Chancery with reference to the interpretation of wills and the determination of the rights of parties under them, and also with reference to the administration of the estates of deceased persons. The metropolitan court of probate should not be either a court of construction or a court of administration, because, under the existing law, the Court of Chancery interpreted wills and administered estates in a tolerably satisfactory manner; but the county courts should be clothed with these powers with respect to properties sworn under £300, because, under the existing law, there was practically no court which could deal with such matters. The Court of Chancery was only open to those who "put money in their purse," and no man of ordinary prudence would seek for the decision of a vice-chancellor, with a possible appeal to the Lords Justices and the House of Lords, on a question involving less than £300. Moreover, such a course would afford no dangerous facility for promoting litigation; for the fees to which professional men are entitled in the county courts were not sufficiently large to tempt them to advise unnecessary proceedings for the sake of costs.

The committee did not recommend that all the 500 courts established in 1840 should exercise the powers of a court of probate. In many of these courts the business transacted was extremely small, and the registrars had scarcely sufficient official experience to justify their employment in matters relating to wills and intestacies. Moreover, the court-houses and offices were inconvenient, and no proper fire-proof registries had been provided for them. It was, therefore, proposed that the experiment should be tried with about one-third of the courts, the Treasury being authorised to add to their numbers, or to vary their localities, in accordance with public convenience. Every court disposing of more than 1,000 plaints annually ought to be intrusted with testamentary jurisdiction, and the last county court returns showed that in 1855, 107 courts were included in this category. Sixty or seventy more courts might be judiciously selected for the experiment, regard being had to their accessibility with respect to neighbouring towns; and the districts of the remaining courts should, for testamentary purposes, be attached to the selected courts in such manner as might be thought most desirable. The county courts judges could on this subject furnish the best information, if the attention of each was directed to the requirements of his own immediate circuit.

The committee declined to express their views on the subject of compensation, which would, no doubt, be dealt with by the House of Commons in a liberal, but not a lavish, spirit. They, however, drew attention to two enactments, with which the public are probably not very familiar, viz.:—The act of 6 & 7 Wm. 4. c. 77, s. 25, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 98, s. 9; and they pointed out that under these provisions no officer of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury can claim compensation if his appointment dates subsequently to the 22nd of July, 1847; and the claim to compensation is barred with respect to the officers of all other ecclesiastical courts unless they have been appointed prior to the 13th of August, 1836. In these cases, compensation might be granted as a matter of favour, but it could not be demanded as a matter of right.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved that it would be expedient,—

1. That no ecclesiastical, peculiar, or manorial court should exercise any jurisdiction in matters testamentary.
2. That a new metropolitan court of probate and administration should be established.
3. That such court should rank as one of her Majesty's superior courts of record.
4. That in such court barristers as well as advocates, and attorneys as well as proctors, should practice.
5. That the staff of such court should consist of three judges, three registrars, and other interior officers.
6. That her Majesty should appoint by sign-manual, and without additional salary, one puisne judge of each of the three courts of common law to constitute such court.
7. That whenever such court should be sitting, the remaining judges of the common law courts should make arrangements for dispensing with the attendance of its members in their respective courts.
8. That such court should adopt, as far as possible, common law procedure, but without formal pleadings.
9. That issues of fact raised in such a court should be tried by a jury, unless the decision of the judge were preferred.
10. That in every such issue the evidence of the witnesses should be taken viva voce in the presence of the jury or judge, except in cases where commissions would be now granted in an ordinary action at law.
11. That all country causes brought in such court should, in the event of any fact being disputed, be transmitted for trial at the assizes.
12. That all town causes brought in such court should, in the event of any fact being disputed, be transmitted for trial at the Nisi Prius sittings in London or Middlesex.
13. That where issues of fact shall have been decided under either of the last two resolutions, all applications for new trials should be made to such court.
14. That the registrars of such court should deal with all simple matters relating to common form business, but their acts should be subject to the supervision of the court.
15. That all such matters as now form the subject of motions in the courts of probate should be capable of being heard by a single judge of the new court sitting in open court, but such judge should be empowered to refer any subject brought before him to the full court.
16. That an appeal should lie on all questions of law to the Exchequer Chamber, and to the House of Lords.
17. That such court should, besides exercising the ordinary jurisdiction of a court of probate, be empowered to grant probates of wills relating to real estate.
18. That such court should appoint real representatives.
19. That such court should grant certificates of intestacy with respect to real property.
20. That such court should not be a court of construction or a court of administration, and should not interfere with the existing jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.
21. That when the property of a deceased person shall be of the value of £300 or upwards, application for probate or administration in common form should be capable of being made to the registrar of a county court.
22. That when any such application shall be made, the county court registrar should furnish the proper information to the applicant, and should examine and take charge of the documents, and should transmit them to the metropolitan court to be finally examined and completed by one of the registrars of that court.
23. That when the property of a deceased person can be sworn under £300, the county court should be empowered to grant probate and administration, whether in common form or in contentious suits.
24. That in all such cases the registrar of the county court should despatch the common form business, subject to the control of the judge in cases of difficulty.
25. That an appeal in matters of law should lie from the county court to the metropolitan court, but the decision of that court should be final.
26. That all parties desirous of obtaining probate or administration should have the option of applying to the metropolitan court, whatever be the amount of the property.
27. That all applications under Res. 21 or 23 should be made at the county court of the district in which the deceased shall have dwelt at the time of his death.
28. That when the deceased shall have had no place of residence within any county court district, the application should be made to the metropolitan court.
29. That about 170 county courts should be intrusted, in the first instance, with testamentary jurisdiction, including about 110 courts in which more than 1,000 plaints were entered during last year, and about sixty additional courts to be selected on account of their convenient locality.
30. That the districts of the remaining 330 courts should, for testamentary purposes, be attached to the above 170 courts in such manner as the Treasury should direct.
31. That the Treasury should be empowered to vary from time to time the number and locality of the county courts intrusted with testamentary jurisdiction.
32. That the Treasury should be empowered to appoint, if necessary, an additional testamentary registrar in each of the ten or twelve county courts where the annual number of plaints exceeds 10,000.
33. That such additional registrar should be selected, if possible, from the present ecclesiastical registrars.
34. That probates and administrations granted by the county courts should extend to all the personal property of the deceased, wherever situate, and should be recognised as of binding authority in all parts of England and Wales.
35. That wills relating to property sworn under £300 should be deposited in the registry of the county court by which probate shall have been granted.
36. That certified copies of all such wills should be deposited in the registry of the metropolitan court.
37. That all other wills should be deposited in the registry of the metropolitan court, and that certified copies thereof should be deposited in the registry of the county court of the district in which the testator shall have dwelt at the time of his death.
38. That all county courts authorised to grant probates should also be courts of construction and administration, and should, when the property is less than £300, exercise all powers now vested in the Court of Chancery with reference to wills, or the rights of parties under them, or the administration of the estates of deceased persons.
39. That in all such cases an appeal on any question of law or equity shall lie from the county court to the Master of the Rolls, or one of the vice-chancellors, but the decision of such superior judge should be final.

It was moved by Mr. COLLIER, M.P., that the report be received and printed, and be taken into consideration on Monday, the 9th of February.

After some discussion the motion was carried, and the meeting adjourned.

NOTES.—1. In all the cases specified in the preceding table, where charges ad valorem are allowed for the drawing of deeds, it is understood to be optional to the agent to charge either the fees ad valorem, or the regulation fees of drawing according to the length, as fixed No. 1.

2. The object of the preceding table, as respects both the rates of charge, and the relative professional rules, is merely to regulate the cases therein enumerated where there is no particular stipulation on the subject. Of course, therefore, it is competent to the parties to make any arrangement between themselves, relative to all such matters, which they may consider more equitable or convenient in the circumstances of each case. On the subject of commissions for selling and purchasing estates and other money transactions, it has been found impracticable to afford even an approximation to a fixed rule, as the subjects of such charges are too much diversified to allow the application of general rules. A commission is a remuneration for trouble and responsibility, and the only rule, therefore, for regulating it, is the extent of such trouble and responsibility. In the case, e. g., of the sale or purchase of an estate, it may happen that the man of business has no trouble whatever, the bargains being wholly settled by the parties themselves, the agent having only to prepare the necessary deeds. In such a case, there can, of course, be no room for commission.

By former tables, a fee was chargeable for expeding services and confirmations, but these articles are now subject to the ordinary charges for agency. Where no specific charge is made for any professional duty, the same general rules are understood as applicable.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

THE English Funds continue in the same quiet state as has been manifested during several weeks. The variation at any time has not exceeded $\frac{1}{8}$ per Cent., and the variation in the whole of the last week has not been more considerable. This morning, Consols were quoted at 93$\frac{3}{4}$ to $\frac{7}{8}$; but this advance was not maintained, and the closing price was 93$\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{5}{8}$. Prices from the Paris Bourse arrive irregularly. The last quotation of French 3 per Cents. is 67f. 95c. Other important foreign securities remain quiet, with very little variation.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 17th January, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of Notes in circulation is £19,463,035, being an increase of £35,045; and the stock of Bullion, in both departments, is £10,110,409, showing a decrease of £70,575, when compared with the previous return. The rates of the Bank of England for discount on Bills of Exchange, and for advances on Stock, are without alteration. Reports of trade afford evidence of unabated activity, with the appearance of being sound and healthful. This evidence leads to the conclusion that sound Trade is not embarrassed by the present high rate of discount, and also to the conclusion that any alteration in the present rate by the Directors of the Bank, is not desirable, except on motives both strong and likely to continue.

The Corn Markets, during the last week, have manifested a decline in prices, both in London and the provinces.

Since the resolutions come to at the meeting of merchants, bankers, and traders, on Monday last, a report has been published of a statement made in the Court of Exchequer on Tuesday by the Chief Baron, confirmed by Mr. Baron Martin, to the effect that the decision of the Court of Error in the case of Kingsford & Swinford v. Merry, was grounded on an erroneous report of the facts, totally different from the facts presented to the Chief Baron on the trial, and to the Court of Exchequer on the argument of the rule, and which erroneous report the Court said was in itself utterly unintelligible. This statement will probably have the effect of moderating the alarm which was in a great measure the cause of the meeting on Monday, and of the resolutions adopted on that occasion.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 31, 1857.

A FALSE ALARM.

We published in our last impression a long and able letter, in opposition to what our correspondent calls the projected revolution in the transfer of real property. Should the plan of registering titles ever become law, the extent of the change which will, not indeed immediately, but in the course of some fifty or sixty years, be introduced into conveyancing practice, cannot be exaggerated, and but for its gradual character it would well deserve to be called a revolution. Such a change ought not to be ventured on without full deliberation and discussion, and though we think the prospect less alarming than our friend Z. considers it, we are by no means blind to the difficulties which will present themselves to the framers of the contemplated measure. Many of these are clearly and forcibly presented in our correspondent's letter; but they are not sufficient to induce us to condemn, by anticipation, a scheme of which the details are not yet announced, and which some of the ablest lawyers of the day are engaged in maturing. There is some truth in the old proverb, that where there is a will there is a way, and we cannot help thinking that if our correspondent had set to work to surmount the difficulties of the project with the same zeal and energy which he has employed in portraying them, he would have been able to give a good account of more than one of the obstacles which he regards as insuperable.

The staunchest supporters of the registration scheme must admit, and indeed have admitted, that the transfer of stock is an easier matter to deal with than the transfer of land. There is first of all the obvious distinction that land is individual and specific, while one £100 of stock is precisely equivalent to another. If a field is bought, it must be identified either by description, or by a plan, or what is perhaps the best course of all, by a combination of both methods. When stock is transferred, there is nothing to be done but to specify the quantity. This essential difference in the nature of the subject-matter will always prevent the registry of title to land from being so simple and compact a matter as a corresponding record of ownership of stock. But it does not follow that there is a fundamental error, as our correspondent maintains, in the very idea of assimilating the conveyance of land to the transfer of stock. It is possible to assimilate two operations, even though you cannot make them absolutely identical, and there is no necessity for giving up an enterprise in despair merely because it is less easy than another which never presented any difficulties at all. The practical arrangements requisite to insure accuracy may, we believe, be easily perfected, and at any rate we shall not jump at the opposite conclusion until we have seen the detailed scheme which may shortly be expected. A more considerable difficulty is, that of guarding effectually against possible frauds. Although of rare occurrence in the case of settlements of stock, we think the experience of most practitioners will bear us out in saying that they do happen in such cases more frequently than under settlements of real estate. Still it is a great mistake to suppose that land would be in equal danger if the new plan of registration were adopted. No one buys land without looking to the possession as well as to the documentary title; and it is the latter only which the register is intended to replace. Then, again, it would be impossible for a fraudulent trustee or legal owner to bring an estate into the market and turn it into money in half an hour, as he may do with consols; and on any system of registration we are satisfied that stock will always be exposed to much greater risk of misappropriation than land. In both cases, the safeguards, as well as the deterring influences, may be, and probably will be, increased; and even if there were no other side to the picture, we should not despair of seeing the new dangers which are feared from the registration of title reduced to such proportions as not to form a very serious obstacle to the scheme. Nor should it be forgotten that although the suggested innovation would tend to increase one class of risks, it would, at the same time, diminish and ultimately annihilate another. Take the common case of a man purchasing an estate and then mortgaging it, with a power of sale. He would be exposed to two dangers—one from some possible defect in the title on which he purchased, and the other from the abuse of the power of sale by his mortgagee. Will our correspondent venture to say that in an average case the latter danger is the more formidable of the two? And yet the possibility of an improper sale by a mortgagee is a far greater risk than would be run under the projected plan, because the mortgagee always has the power, when he sells, to relieve the purchaser from any inquiry into the propriety of the sale or the fact of notice to the mortgagor, while on the register system every interested person, whether mortgagor or otherwise, would be able to secure due notice by a simple caveat which would, no doubt, be lodged in every case as a matter of course. On a well-arranged system it does seem that the new risks introduced by it may be made smaller than the present dangers arising from infirmity of title, all of which would, by the proposed scheme, be utterly swept away.

But our correspondent not only dwells on the danger and difficulty supposed to be inherent in the plan, but maintains stoutly that, if ever so successful, it would be a doubtful benefit to the public, and a damaging blow to the profession. We differ from him entirely on both points, and believe that, like most other changes which facilitate transactions between man and man, it would benefit not only vendors and purchasers but the professional agents who may be employed.

The practice forced upon the profession, of charging in proportion to the length of a draft without reference to the skill employed or the responsibility incurred, is essentially bad, and nothing would so much assist the efforts of those who are aiming at an improvement in the mode and scale of professional remuneration as the legislative simplification of conveyancing practice. Where large responsibility is incurred, a proportional fee should be paid; and certainly no revolution in conveyancing will satisfy us unless it adopts to a considerable extent the principle of per centage fees. Our correspondent remarks, that brokers, agents, bankers, auctioneers, and surveyors, concerned in a sale, are often better paid than the solicitor, who has all the labour and responsibility of investigating the title, and drawing the conveyance. But this seems to us the strongest possible argument in favour of the projected change. How can a complicated system of conveyancing be necessary to secure a fair payment to solicitors, when other agents, who have no such foundation for their charges, are able to secure a more ample profit? Were the old false measure of legal remuneration once destroyed, as it would be by registration, a new one must be adopted; and we believe that the profession is quite strong enough, if it will only hold together, not only to secure the selection of the right principle, but to take care, at the same time, that real services shall be more adequately paid than they are in a large proportion of the cases which now occur. There is a remark on the subject of centralisation in our correspondent's letter which makes us suspect that some one has been hoaxing poor "Z.," or that he has been amusing his leisure with some legal studies which have clouded his good sense. Does he really believe that anybody in these days would seriously propose a purely central system of registration in connection with a method, the simplicity of which removes the only objection to multiplying local offices? In this, as in some other branches of the law, the only sensible plan is, to establish, not indeed a number of distinct and independent centres, but a group of branch offices in connection with a central body.

One word as to the concluding paragraph of "Z.'s" letter. He tells us that it has been suggested that the contemplated change is promoted by some London solicitors with the view of advancing their own interests at the expense of their brethren in the country. We know that such suggestions have been made, and "Z." might, without much effort, have guessed the reason why. We know, too, that we have been pointed at as the especial organ of the plotting metropolitans; but our correspondent may assure himself that all such insinuations will die a natural death, and he will probably before long learn to laugh at the credulity which led him even to refer to their existence.

LEGAL MISTAKES.

No one can have had much experience of the administration of the criminal law without an occasional misgiving as to the extent to which we ought to modify the common statement, that in our crown courts substantial justice is done, in spite of some defects, both in the principles and in the practice of the proceedings which take place there. It has long been a sort of mock-modest boast that even a guilty man frequently escapes punishment in this country, the innuendo being that à fortiori all innocent men must succeed in doing so; but it is a fact not less certain than unwelcome, that from time to time cases are made public which show that if guilt is not always detected, innocence is not always safe. The deplorable story of the groundless conviction of Mr. TEMPLE, four years ago, at Coventry, and the case of JOHN MARKHAM—who added another instance to the list of persons who have suffered for their resemblance to others, with whom they had no connection—are painful enough in themselves; they are doubly painful when we reflect that it is almost impossible to deny that they are typical cases, affecting a class of persons small indeed, but large enough to represent a miserable aggregate of causeless and unmerited suffering. We believe that the vast majority of innocent convicts are the victims of a—we might perhaps say the—characteristic defect which runs through the whole of our criminal procedure. How that defect is to be remedied is, perhaps, one of the deepest and most complicated questions in the whole range of the immense subject of law reform. We may hereafter attempt to offer some suggestions upon the subject, but for the present we will content ourselves with calling attention to the fact of the existence of the flaw. Almost every proceeding known to the common law of England assumes the form of an action. We have no notion of an inquiry into facts prompted only by a wish to arrive at the truth, and not set in motion by some private interest. Even inquests of office are virtually suits between the crown and the parties concerned in traversing its rights. Criminal proceedings form no exception to this rule. They are in fact, as they are in form, actions in which the Queen is plaintiff and the prisoner defendant, and this circumstance weighs heavily against the person accused. No one who has watched criminal trials will refuse his assent to the proposition, that the principle by which they are unconsciously and unavowedly regulated is, that it is the prosecutor's business to get a conviction if he can, the prisoner's to escape if he can, and the judge's to see fair play between the two; but a man might pass a lifetime in criminal practice without discovering an instance in which it occurred to any one of these three parties, that the discovery of the truth for the benefit of the public was a matter of any particular moment.

Illustrations of this might be indefinitely multiplied, but we will only mention a few. A man was tried at the Old Bailey for murder. The defence was madness. Two surgeons had seen him; one at the desire of the prisoner's friends, whose evidence formed part of the proofs on the brief of the counsel for the defence; the other was the surgeon of the gaol, who had had the man under his care for weeks or months. The surgeon, who had only seen him once, was called for the prisoner, and did not make out a very strong case. The other surgeon, who had probably seen him a hundred times, was not called at all. The counsel for the Crown, probably, thought the case, as it stood, strong enough, and did not wish to give his learned brother a reply on the question of the prisoner's sanity. The counsel for the prisoner had no means of knowing what evidence the surgeon would give. Here was a case in which most material testimony was suppressed, because one party thought that a conviction could be obtained without it, whilst the other was not sure that it would tend to produce an acquittal. A stronger proof can hardly be given of the degree in which our system looks upon the verdict as the triumph either of vengeance or of self-defence, and not as a matter with which the public interest is in any way concerned.

The unfortunate case of Mr. TEMPLE, which has created so much remark, is an additional and a most remarkable illustration of the same thing. It is impossible to say that upon the established principles any one of the parties concerned in Mr. TEMPLE'S actual trial were to blame. No doubt an abler and a more patient judge than the present Lord WENSLEYDALE never sat on the bench, nor does there seem any sort of ground for imputing improper conduct either to the counsel for the Crown, or to those who instructed him. A clearer case of guilt than that which he opened, so long as it was unexplained and uncontradicted, can hardly be conceived. A man who has booked his place for Manchester stops at Rugby, and has in his possession another person's portmanteau. He afterwards tries to escape from custody. Can stronger primâ facie evidence of guilt be given? — could any prosecutor have discharged his task more efficiently than the man who produced such damning proofs as these? The prisoner, or those who advised him, were the only persons to blame. Why did not they find and produce Mr. TEMPLE'S own portmanteau? Why not explain the circumstances which induced him to stop at Rugby, instead of going on to Manchester? Why did they not have their witnesses to character in the way from the very beginning of the assizes, instead of relying on the proverbially uncertain arrangements made by judges as to the time at which cases shall be taken? If they suffered by the verdict, they have no one to thank but themselves for their want of coolness, presence of mind, and knowledge of business.

Such is the comment which a thoroughgoing partisan of our present procedure would make upon such a case as Mr. TEMPLE'S. We need not say that it would be cruelly harsh and unjust, but it is most desirable to point out why it is so unjust. It all proceeds upon the fallacy that to establish the prisoner's innocence—if he is innocent—is the business of no one but himself. Whereas, in fact, the only reason why society wishes to punish the guilty is that it may protect the innocent, and there is no class of innocent persons whom it is more desirable to protect than those who, from ignorance of law, or from want of coolness or presence of mind, are least able to protect themselves. If the most ordinary pains had been taken to test the truth of the story told by Mr. TEMPLE, or if he had understood how to prove it, he would have been acquitted. He would seem, however, to have been a man of feeble and excitable character; and upon such a man a system of procedure which throws upon the accused person the whole task of defending himself, acts with extraordinary hardship. Mr. TEMPLE'S was probably, in some degree, an extreme case, but cases analogous to his must be of almost daily occurrence, though we hear little of them. No one can see the stolid, sullen faces, and listen to the half-articulate and almost utterly unintelligible speeches and remarks of the great majority of prisoners without a most painful misgiving that many of them are innocent if they only knew how to show it; and that they could really explain many suspicious circumstances if they only knew how suspicious they were. There is a stereotyped conversation between the judge and the prisoner which we can never hear—though it is as familiar as the alphabet—without a sort of pang. Judge: Do you wish to ask this witness any questions?—Prisoner: Yes, Sir—that is, my lord, —Sir, I asks him this—which you see I was walking along the road, my lord, being that I'd been staying——. Judge: No, no, ask him questions; you shall make any statement you like to the jury afterwards. The prisoner is confounded and baffled by the interruption, forgets both the questions that he meant to ask and the statement that he intended to found upon it, and half from nervousness, half from the wish to be respectful to the Court, offers no further remark. Such scenes as these occur twenty times a day at assizes or quarter sessions, and there must surely be a minority of cases, not altogether inconsiderable, in which, if the maundering confused talk could be patiently heard and fairly sifted, it would turn out to be important. It is hardly an exaggeration to say, that the criminal law, as at present regulated, actually punishes a man for not possessing that skill in cross-examination, in statement, and in explanation, which is one of the last results of an elaborate education and long professional experience. It throws upon the prisoner the whole burden of his own defence, and not only abstains from giving him any assistance in preparing it, but does not even take the trouble to suggest to him the points which bear upon him most hardly.

Legal News.

THE Mercantile Law Conference met on Wednesday, and Lord BROUGHAM occupied the chair. Mr. Commissioner AYRTON, of the Leeds Court of Bankruptcy, read an elaborate paper on the improvement of the bankrupt law. He said that the two great complaints against the existing system were, first, that the expenses were too heavy; and, second, that the punishments inflicted were uncertain and inadequate. The sum of £28,000 a-year is now raised by a tax on bankrupt estates, to pay compensations and pensions for abolished offices. This charge, Mr. AYRTON thought, should be transferred to the consolidated fund. The mercantile community, he urged, ought not to pay for two sets of officers—the old ones who were abolished, and the new ones who were created. He then proceeded to suggest some very extensive changes in the staff of the Court of Bankruptcy, and in the remuneration of the officers. He thought that the London registrars might be dispensed with. If they were continued, the taxing master in London was unnecessary; and if the taxing master remained, he could see no occasion for the registrars. He thought that the messengers were too highly paid, and that, if the offices were retained, the scale of allowance ought to be reduced. But he could perceive no sufficient reason why the office of messenger should not be abolished, and his duties transferred to the official assignee. The office of broker might also be done away with. He objected to the present mode of paying the official assignee. The remuneration was not proportionate to the work done. The small bankruptcies, which required much labour to collect numerous trifling debts, remunerated the official assignee badly, or not at all; while a large bankruptcy, as a banker's, which gave the least possible amount of trouble, might pay the official assignee a very large sum indeed. It appeared to him that the official assignee should be paid a fixed salary of £800 a-year, and also from £250 to £300 a-year for office expenses. In addition to this, he would enable the commissioners to allow a sum varying from £1 to £20 in each bankruptcy, "for examining accounts and general diligence."

Mr. AYRTON then proceeded to deal with the solicitor, who, he thought, received too much out of the bankrupt estate, not because he was overpaid for what he did, but because he did too much; that is, he did business which other people ought to do, and which was not properly within the province of the solicitor. He proposed to appoint a solicitor to each court, whose duty it would be to act as official solicitor under every bankruptcy, and who should be paid a fixed salary of £400 or £500 a-year. It should not be imperative on the creditors to employ the official solicitor. They might be allowed to select any other solicitor if they thought fit; only, in that case, the dividend would be reduced by the amount of the bill of costs.

Mr. AYRTON then proceeded to suggest the abolition, except in disputed cases, of the proof of debt by the creditor's oath, and a great simplification of the form of the balance-sheet; and he further proposed that the penal clauses should be made more severe, and that the right of appeal in certificate cases should be taken away. The commissioner should be assisted by two commercial men of the same trade as the bankrupt, who should have votes in the decision of the case, and the judgment of this tribunal should be conclusive.

These proposals, it must be owned, are broad enough to satisfy the most ardent innovators. We have thought proper to give them a conspicuous place, inasmuch as some of them peculiarly concern solicitors; but it must be remembered that the only resolution adopted by the Conference on this subject was to appoint a deputation to wait upon Lord PALMERSTON; and the committee of the Conference was to consider what points should be especially pressed on his attention. The deputation so appointed was received by the Premier yesterday with his usual courtesy and safe enunciation of generalities.

In the evening of Wednesday the subject of Tribunals of Commerce was discussed at considerable length; and next day a paper on "The Registration of Partnerships," emanating from the Manchester Commercial Association, was read and fully considered; and it was resolved that a bill to secure that object should be introduced into Parliament, and that the operation of such bill ought not to be confined to traders under the bankrupt law, but should extend to all kinds of partnerships, whether for trade or professional. An elaborate paper on the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds was also read, and a resolution was adopted to the effect that the clause in question ought to be repealed, and an act passed which, without mentioning any amount, should provide that in certain specified cases the agreement should be reduced to writing. The second day's proceedings thus appear to have produced a very important and definite conclusion; and, on the whole, it cannot denied that the Conference has proceeded most satisfactorily, and that the labours of the promoters of it have been expended for the public good.

The following letter appeared in the City article of the Times of the 23rd instant:—

"To the Editor of the Times.

"KINGSFORD v. MERRY.

"SIR—With reference to the statements of the Lord Chief Baron and Baron Martin, reported in your paper of yesterday, on the subject of the manner in which this case was stated to the Court of Error, we have permission of all the three eminent counsel for the defendant, by whom, along with those of the plaintiffs, it was most anxiously prepared and carefully settled, to state that that case fully and correctly set forth the whole of the facts proved on the trial, and fully and clearly raises all the points relied on by the defendant. We have further to state that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer detailed the facts on which it proceeded, and that that judgment, embodying these facts, was fully before the Court of Error when its decision was given.

"Jan. 22, 1857. "DEFENDANT'S ATTORNEY."

We believe that the case referred to will shortly be published by the defendant's attorney, and an opportunity will then be afforded of forming a satisfactory opinion upon the merits of this controversy.

An order of the Court of Chancery, fixing the lower and higher scales of solicitors' fees for business under the new practice, will this day be issued, and is to take effect immediately.

DEATH OF BARON ALDERSON.

The death of this distinguished judge took place at his residence in Park-crescent on Tuesday afternoon, in his 70th year. The Hon. Sir Edward Hall Alderson, Baron of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, was the eldest son of the late Mr. Robert Alderson, barrister-at-law and Recorder of Norwich, and was born at Great Yarmouth in the year 1787. Having received his early education at the Charterhouse, he proceeded to Caius College, Cambridge, where he closed a brilliant career as an undergraduate by taking his degree in January, 1809, as Senior Wrangler and Smith's prizeman and Senior Chancellor's Medallist: thus obtaining the all but singular reward of the very highest honours which that University has to bestow for classical and mathematical attainments.

In the following year Mr. Alderson was elected a Fellow of his college, and in 1812 he took his degree as Master of Arts. He had been already called to the bar of the Inner Temple in the preceding year, and for several years went the Northern Circuit. He edited, in conjunction with Mr. Barnewall, five volumes of reports of cases heard in the Court of King's Bench between 1815 and 1820, which form part of the standard series of law reports of that court, and which were afterwards continued by Mr. Justice Cresswell. He never held a seat in parliament, but perhaps on that very account had leisure to earn even a higher reputation as a legal junior, and to secure a very extensive practice as a chamber counsel. While still wearing a stuff gown, he was promoted, in 1830, to the Court of Common Pleas as an additional puisne judge (Mr. Justice Patteson and the late Baron Taunton being his companions in the elevation); and on that occasion he received the honour of knighthood. He was transferred from that court, however, in 1834 to the Court of Exchequer, where he acquired a great reputation as a judge, while his intercourse with the bar was uniformly courteous and friendly, and his good humour, and perhaps over frequent jocoseness made him generally popular. In 1823 he married the youngest daughter of the Rev. Edward Drewe, of Broadhembury, in the county of Devon, by whom he had a large family.

PROJECTS OF LAW REFORM.

The forthcoming session promises to be prolific in measures of law reform. Amongst others which are understood to be in a state of forwardness are the Bills for the Registration of Title to Land, Divorce, Testamentary Jurisdiction, Fraudulent Appropriation of Trust Property, and Public Prosecutors. There appears to be some uncertainty as to the intentions of the government with respect to the last mentioned bill; but should they fail to deal with the subject, Mr. J. G. Phillimore has pledged himself to bring forward a measure of his own. It is also probable that the legal advisers of the Crown will take an early opportunity of proposing some measure to prevent the recurrence of such scandals as the history of the British Bank swindle has lately disclosed. We are informed that Mr. Malins intends to renew his attempts to improve the law relating to the reversionary interests of married women, and to abolish the distinction between debts by specialty and simple contract. It is probable that a measure for the better enforcement of clergy discipline will be submitted to Parliament by the Archbishop of Canterbury. There are various rumours as to the nature of the provisions and extent of the changes proposed by the testamentary bill which the Lord Chancellor, it is said, has taken into his own hands. One report is that according to the present frame of the bill, the monopoly of Doctor's Commons will, to a great degree, be perpetuated, though the proposed court is to have common law procedure, and to be presided over by a Vice-Chancellor. If such prove to be the fact, the general body of solicitors will no doubt protest against the continuance of their exclusion from testamentary business. In reference to this subject, we may add that both Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Mr. Collier have incorrectly attributed to the present Attorney-General the intention of transferring testamentary business to the Court of Chancery, his proposition being that it should be administered in the Court of Chancery, in an analogous way to that in which bankruptcy cases are now dealt with by the judges of that tribunal.

PRINTING OF BILLS AND CLAIMS.

The Lord Chancellor has more than once intimated his wish that bills and claims should be figured down the sides, as in the printed cases before the House of Lords, so as to enable a more easy reference to them; and also that dates and numbers should be expressed in figures and not in words at length; but upon this latter point, his lordship was not certain whether the practice might not require a general order.

BUSINESS OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

In the course of Tuesday several cases were struck out of the paper in consequence of the absence of counsel in other courts.

Lord CAMPBELL said, it had never been considered an excuse for absence on paper days that counsel were arguing in other courts. They ought to make arrangements to be here. The court was unanimous that the cases should be struck out of the paper.

Application was afterwards made that they should be restored to their place, but the application was refused.

Lord CAMPBELL said they might be re-entered.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

A case of considerable importance on the effect of foreign judgments has recently been decided by the Master of the Rolls (Reimers v. Druce, 5 W.R. 211). Certain Hanoverian merchants, trading at Emden, in Hanover, had consigned a cargo of wheat, shipped from a Prussian port, to a London merchant for sale on commission. This was in 1818, but for some reason which did not very clearly appear, the wheat was not sold until 1825, by which time the consignee had run up a bill for warehousing and similar charges, considerably exceeding the price obtained for the wheat. The shippers took proceedings in the Hanoverian Courts against the consignee, who appeared and instituted a cross suit for the balance, which he claimed to be due to himself. In the first instance, the judgment was in favour of the consignee, but two successive appeals, the second of which was to the court of highest jurisdiction in Hanover, were decided in favour of the foreign merchants, and a peremptory judgment was obtained, whereby the consignee was ordered to pay a certain sum with interest from the year 1818, to the shippers of the wheat. These proceedings did not terminate until 1842, and from that time, until the filing of the bill, no steps were taken to enforce the judgment against the consignee in England where he resided. In the meantime, the consignee died, in the year 1846, and the bill was filed against his executors for an account and payment of what was due under the Hanoverian judgment. According to the English rules of international law, the contract being to be performed in England was to be governed by the English law; but the Hanoverian Courts took a different view of the matter, and held that Emden was the locus contractus, and that the foreign law was to govern the question. According to the usual practice in most continental countries the reasons of the judgment were annexed to, and formed part of, the document itself; and foremost among them was stated the conclusion that the matter was governed by the foreign law. Had the judgment been given like those of English Courts, without incorporating the reasons on which it was founded, there could have been no doubt that, apart from the question of laches, our courts must have enforced it; but it was contended on the part of the defendants that the reasons alleged constituted error on the face of the judgment itself, and afforded sufficient ground to justify an English court in examining and impeaching it. On the part of the plaintiffs, it was argued on the authority of Ricardo v. Garcias, 12 Cl. & F. 369; The Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q.B. 717, and other modern cases, that the only grounds on which a foreign judgment can be impeached are the want of jurisdiction in the court which pronounced it, the neglect to summon the defendant to make his defence, and fraud in obtaining the judgment. The Master of the Rolls, however, founding himself mainly on the earlier cases, held, that when a plaintiff seeks to enforce a foreign judgment here, his suit may be answered, not only on the three grounds before mentioned, but also by showing either that the foreign court decided contrary to the law which it professed to administer, or that there was error on the face of the judgment sufficient to show, without extraneous evidence, that the foreign court had miscarried either in fact or law. This doctrine seems to diminish the force usually attributed to a foreign judgment, and, if there had been nothing more in the case, would probably have led to an appeal. The decision of the Master of the Rolls, however, mainly rested on the long delay which had occurred. The plaintiffs had been continuously resident abroad, so that the statute of limitation was not an absolute bar, but the length of time during which the plaintiffs had rested on their rights was considered in itself a sufficient reason for dismissing the bill, on the well-known principle of courts of equity to discountenance stale demands.

Whitmore v. Empson, 5 W. R. 217, was another case of great commercial interest. A manufacturer had mortgaged certain fixed machinery by a bill of sale, framed on the footing of treating the machinery as chattels, and assigning it accordingly separately from the freehold to which it was affixed. The manufacturer having become bankrupt, it became a question whether the effect of the bill of sale was to constitute the machinery goods and chattels within the meaning of the order and disposition clause of the Bankrupt Act. The assignees contended that the mode of dealing with the machinery severed it in law from the freehold, and made it subject to the clause in question, in the same way as timber might be brought within its operation by being felled. The creditor who claimed under the bill of sale maintained that the fixtures remained fixtures, and as such did not fall within the operation of the clause in question. The latter view was supported by very strong authorities, such as Trappes v. Harter, 2 Cr. & M. 153, and Ex parte Sykes, 18 L. J. Bkcy. 16, being almost expressly in point; and the Master of the Rolls decided in accordance with the defendant's view, that the machinery remained of the nature of fixtures, and did not pass to the assignees.

Pennell v. Millar, 5 W.R. 215, is a good illustration of the practice of Courts of Equity in varying decrees upon a rehearing before the same judge. A fraudulent mortgage had been set aside on the terms of the assignees of the mortgagor, Lord Huntingtower, repaying the actual advance, with interest; and it was also directed that an account should be taken of the payments and receipts of the mortgagee in respect of certain policies effected by Lord Huntingtower on his life, as a further security, and on which the mortgagee had paid the premiums, and some of which he had afterwards sold. The balance of the account was to be paid to or retained against the mortgagee, according as the premiums paid exceeded or fell short of the proceeds of the sales of the policies. The curious part of the case was, that the plaintiffs, the assignees of Lord Huntingtower, had themselves requested the insertion in the decree of the clause relating to the policies, and afterwards finding that the balance would be against them, petitioned for a rehearing, and to have the decree altered by striking out the clause. The Master of the Rolls decided in the plaintiffs' favour, holding that the policy transaction was to be considered as a private speculation of the mortgagee with which the plaintiffs had nothing to do, and that the original decree was wrong in directing any accounts or payments in respect of them.

The Mayor of Berwick v. Murray, 5 W. R. 208, is one of those cases depending so much upon special circumstances, which are never likely to be found again similarly grouped together, that it can hardly be regarded as a precedent, or as anything more than an illustration of certain principles of law. The main use of such cases, perhaps, is to afford one a notion of the manner in which the Court regards any given course of conduct or of dealing. Accordingly, we find in them some of the best exemplifications of the branch of the doctrine of constructive notice, relating to the circumstances which are sufficient to put parties on inquiry as to the rights of others, when they are seeking to gain or to enforce rights or benefits for themselves.

In The Mayor of Berwick v. Murray, one of three sureties for due accounting by the treasurer of the corporation of Berwick-on-Tweed, having received a notice of the defalcation of his principal, immediately applied to, and obtained from him, by way of indemnity, a banker's deposit note for more than the amount for which he was surety. The note was in the name, not of the principal, but of his daughter, and was endorsed by her. It being held that the money was in fact the money of the corporation, which was taken from the ordinary account of the treasurer in one bank, and invested in another in the name of his daughter, the Lord Chancellor was of opinion that the circumstances were such as must have forced any honest man to make inquiry; that the surety was bound to have asked why such a deposit was made in the name of the daughter; and that, therefore, he could not be allowed to plead that he was ignorant of the fact that the money belonged to the corporation.

There are few doctrines of the court more difficult in their application than the doctrine of satisfaction. The dealings between parents and children seldom contemplate the possibility of appealing to a court of law for their interpretation; and, therefore, they are generally little characterised by precision or regard to legal technicalities. In the case of Kay v. Crook, 5 W. R. 220, a father, upon a treaty for the marriage of his son, promised to give him a certain sum of money, "and finally to recognise him, in common with the rest of his (the father's) family, in the future provisions of his will." Upon this understanding, the marriage took place; and, on the father's death, the son filed a bill to have it declared that he was entitled to a share in his deceased father's estate, at least equal in amount to those of the other children. The plaintiff took a substantial interest under the father's will, although it was of less amount than what he would have received had the testator's property been equally divided among all his children. The V. C. Stuart held that the provision by the will in favour of the plaintiff was a sufficient compliance with the promise of the testator. To have had such a representation made good out of the testator's estate, there should have been reasonable certainty as to the amount or proportion to be bequeathed to the son. His Honour considered that, consistently with his promise, the testator might have left all his property to a stranger. The doctrine of satisfaction was a good deal discussed in Davis v. Chambers, a case decided by the Lord Chancellor a few days ago.

It has been held by V. C. Wood, in Dendy v. Dendy, 5 W. R. 221, that the devisee of a deceased plaintiff cannot, under the 52 sec. of the 15 & 16 Vic. c. 86, obtain an order to revive, because the devise itself might be the subject of dispute in the suit, which was against trustees for an account.

In our remarks upon Swainson v. Swainson last week, we overlooked the proviso in the 17 & 18 Vic. c. 113, by which it is provided that nothing therein contained should affect the rights of any person claiming under any will, deed, or document, made before the 1st January, 1855.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ATTORNEY—RULE TO PAY MONEY—SUMMARY JURISDICTION OF THE COURT.

In re William Marshall, 5 W. R. (Q. B.) 200.

A rule had been obtained on behalf of one Cooper, calling on W. M., an attorney of the court, to show cause why he should not pay over to Cooper a certain sum alleged to have been received by W. M. as attorney for and on the account of Cooper. It appeared that Cooper had employed one H. to collect the sum in question, which was due on a bill; and that H. had instructed W. M. to take proceedings on such bill; and that Cooper had refused to supply W. M. with the requisite funds for the action, on the ground that H. was responsible for the expenses. The affidavit of Cooper alleged an express promise by W. M. to pay over the money. On the other hand, W. M. swore he was employed by H. alone, who was still indebted to him for the costs of the action; and that he had made no such promise. The court held that, under the above circumstances, no case had been made out for their interference. There was no privity between Cooper and W. M.; the relationship of attorney and client had never existed between them; and the allegation of a promise to pay had been denied. The rule was therefore discharged with costs.

This was an attempt to extend the summary jurisdiction, which the courts have always assumed over attorneys in their position as officers of the court, to enforce, where necessary, the performance of the general duty of an attorney to his client; and the purposes for which this jurisdiction has been usually exercised are to compel such attorney to deliver up papers, &c., which have come into his hands, or to account for money he has received, in that capacity. It has, however, always been considered essential, that the relationship of attorney and client should exist between the applicant and the attorney against whom the rule is sought. Thus in Exparte Nicholls, 2 Dowl. (N. S.) 423, the court refused to interfere where papers had come into the possession of an attorney as the executor of the owner's attorney, inasmuch as it appeared that the applicant (to whom such papers now belonged) had refused the attorney, into whose hands they had fallen, permission to act as his attorney, Wightman, J., observing, "This gentleman is a stranger to you; you repudiate his being your attorney, and I do not see how you can call upon him to account to you as such."

Moreover, in the present case, had the relationship been established, it is apprehended the rule could only have been made absolute on the terms of payment to W. M. of the costs owing to him by H.; for the courts will not in general interfere with an attorney's lien (see Re Millard, 1 D. P. C. 140).

CERTIORARI—COSTS—CONSPIRACY.

Regina v. Jewell & Percival, 5 W. R. (Q.B.) 202.

From this case it appears, that if one of two or more defendants, jointly indicted—as for a conspiracy—seek to remove the indictment into the Queen's Bench by certiorari, it is (notwithstanding the recent provision, 16 & 17 Vict., c. 30, s. 5, by which the present practice of removal of indictments into the Queen's Bench is chiefly regulated) incumbent on the removing party to become bound for the subsequent costs, in case either himself or any of his co-defendants shall be convicted. From a recent case to which reference was made arguendo, Regina v. Wilks (5 E. & B. 690), it may also be collected that it is in the discretion of the judge allowing the certiorari, to decide whether all the defendants must be bound, or he only by whom the removal is sought.

MARRIED WOMAN—CA. SA.—DISCHARGE BY REASON OF HAVING NO SEPARATE PROPERTY.

Ivens v. Butler & Wife, 5 W. R. (Q.B.) 202.

This was an application to discharge Anne Butler (the female defendant), who had been taken in execution on a judgment, signed against her and her husband, in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover a debt contracted by Anne Butler dum sola. The husband had obtained a final order for protection under the Insolvent Act. It appeared that if the wife survived the husband, she might possibly receive from certain trustees an allowance of a precarious nature.

Lord Campbell, C.J., laid down the general law to be, that if a husband and wife are taken in execution for the debts of the wife, the wife is entitled to be—or at least, according to the long-established practice of Westminster Hall, will be—discharged, if she has no separate property. And that it makes no difference as to this (notwithstanding the observations of the Barons in the case of Larkin v. Marshall, 4 Ex. 804), whether the husband be taken or not taken with her, or whether he be exempt from imprisonment on the judgment. The court also held, unanimously, that a possible allowance, contingent on the death of her husband during her lifetime, was not "separate property" sufficient to authorise her detention in custody.

JURISDICTION OF JUDGE—EXECUTION AGAINST SHAREHOLDER, LEAVE TO ISSUE.

Palmer v. The Justice Insurance Society, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 44 (Q.B.)

A rule had been obtained, calling on two shareholders in the above company to show cause why execution should not issue against them on a judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the company. And in the argument it became necessary to determine the question, whether an order for execution under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 68, against individual shareholders could be made at chambers by a judge of either of the three courts, without regard to his being or not being a judge of that court out of which the record issued. All the judges held (on being consulted by the Court of Queen's Bench), that each of the judges had such authority under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, s. 1.

RESPONSIBILITY OF ATTORNEY AS GENERAL AGENT FOR HIS CLIENT.

Swinfen v. Swinfen, 5 W. R. (C. P.) 203.

In this case, a rule which had been obtained by the defendant for an attachment against the plaintiff for refusing to carry out the terms of a reference agreed to by counsel on either side in court, embodied in an order of nisi prius, and subsequently made a rule of court, was discharged, on the ground that one member of the court (Mr. Justice Crowder) did not think the plaintiff in contempt, because he thought her not bound by such agreement. The important proposition affirmed, arguendo, that counsel, without any special authority previously given, or any subsequent ratification, and by the mere relationship of counsel to his client, is invested with a general agency and authority to bind the client by any agreement he may, in his discretion, enter into on his behalf while conducting the cause in court, remains, consequently, neither overturned nor supported by any judicial decision further than those relied on by the defendant in his argument. But a case in the Court of Common Pleas (Filmer v. Delber, 3 Taunt. 484), was referred to by Mr. Justice Crowder, in his judgment, which is of great moment to the attorney; because it would seem from that case that an attorney, at all events, has such authority and such responsibility thrown on him by the law, on the ground that if he grossly errs in his judgment or manner of proceeding the client has a remedy against him by action, though not against counsel. It is remarkable, however, that in a subsequent case (Biddle v. Douse, 6 B. & C. 225), Lord Tenterden carefully avoids expressing any acquiescence in the doctrine established by Filmer v. Delber, that an attorney has power to bind his client by an order of reference of nisi prius, without his consent and even against his instructions.

BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this society was held in the theatre of the Institute, Cannon-street, on Wednesday evening last. William Wills, Esq., occupied the chair, and amongst the gentlemen present were Messrs. W. R. Wills, G. J. Johnson, C. T. Saunders, M. A. Fitter, J. Brown, J. Walford, S. Balden, W. H. Harris, and L. Chirm, solicitors, and honorary members; and Messrs. Hodgson, Harrison, Payne, Potts, Warden, Slater, Browning, Fox, Marigold, Fereday, Horton, Brown, and others, ordinary members.—The Chairman commenced the proceedings by an address. After remarking on the important objects contemplated by the society, he proceeded to enforce the necessity of studying constitutional and legal history, especially in the source most instinct with life and reality—the state trials. In these the student could trace step by step the contests of faction, the operation of cruel laws, the growing sense of needed amendments in the criminal code. Extending over a period of five hundred years, the state trials formed the clue and explanation of almost every statute and every event of our national legal history during that long period. Not only did these trials exhibit the operation of cruel laws, especially the terrible law of treason as it was formerly interpreted, but they were full of romance beyond the inventions of novelists; they laid bare the workings of the human heart, they were crowded with touching events, pathetic situations, and dread catastrophes. After quoting from the state trials some of the most remarkable cases recorded in them, Mr. Wills earnestly recommended his hearers to make themselves acquainted with the great moral abstract principles which formed the bases of rules of law, and concluded his address by expressing his deep interest in the Law Students' Society, and his hope that it might long continue to be the means of diffusing the advantages of sound legal knowledge.—Mr. Wills has consented to allow his address to be printed for distribution amongst the members of the society.—Mr. Horton, the secretary of the society, read the report for the past year, which congratulated the members that, at this the ninth anniversary, the association was in a greatly improved position. There were 118 honorary and 43 ordinary members, and since the last annual meeting ten members had been placed on the rolls as attorneys. The library had been increased by 27 volumes, and now numbered 150 volumes, exclusive of various papers. There had been many readings and discussional meetings, and these had been generally well attended. The cash accounts showed the receipts for the year to be £52 9s. 3d., and the expenditure £49 3s. 3d., leaving a balance to be carried to the next account of £3 6s. A balance of £2 16s. 5d. was also in hand on the library account.—The following gentlemen were elected as the committee for the ensuing year:—Messrs. Johnson, Fitter, Balden, Fox, Fereday, Horton, Warden, Marigold, and Jelf.—The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Payne, Fereday, Horton, Johnson, Marigold, and Saunders, and the proceedings were brought to a close by a vote of thanks to Mr. Wills for his kindness in presiding.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—In confirmation of that part of Z.'s letter in your paper of Saturday last, relating to the charges of solicitors for conveyancing business, I would ask you to publish the following facts which have lately happened in my own practice.

The estate of a nobleman in the North Riding was last autumn sold in lots by public auction. A client of mine purchased at the sale two lots for £13,423 15s. The abstract of title consisted of ninety-five brief sheets. A conveyance to my client of these two lots, about 100 folios in length, was prepared and executed, together with a separate deed of covenant from the vendor for the production of the title-deeds which were retained by him. My client afterwards purchased another portion of the same estate for £11,000. The abstract of title to this portion was a copy of that relating to the lots previously purchased. Another conveyance of about 100 folios in length, and another deed of covenant for the production of the title-deeds, was prepared and executed by the vendor. The deeds were in the hands of the vendor's solicitors in town, and were examined with the abstract by my agents, through whom the purchase-money was paid, and both purchases completed.

My bill for the whole (exclusive of stamps, and money out of pocket) amounted to £55, but the stamps and money out of pocket amounted to £138. My agent's charges for examining deeds with abstract and completing the purchase, and making searches, &c., were (exclusive of money paid) about £15, thus making the professional charges of my agents and myself £70. Now, if my client had purchased stock or shares to the amount of £24,423, he would have been charged by his broker rather more than £122 for commission. His attorney has charged him a little more than one-half of this sum on a purchase of land. It is, therefore, clear that the charges of solicitors, in conveyancing, are less than those of stock-brokers in transfers of stock and shares.

I may add, that if my client had made the second purchase before the conveyance of the first had been executed, the whole would have been included in one conveyance, and, in that case, my charges would only have amounted to about £35, whilst the stamps and money out of pocket would not have been less than they were. The broker's charge would have been £122, irrespective of the fact that the purchases were made at the same or at different times.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

27th January, 1857. T.

Lectures at the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. MALCOLM KERR ON THE STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. Kerr delivered his seventh lecture on the Common Law and Practice of the Courts, on the 23rd inst. He observed that he had in his previous lecture divided the consideration of the statutes of limitations into:—

1. Those applicable to suits and proceedings for the recovery of real property.
2. Those applicable to actions on specialties.
3. Those applicable to actions for simple contract debts, and trespasses to property. And
4. Those applicable to certain actions of trespass to the person, and for verbal slander.

The enactments of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act did not affect in any way the limitations comprised under the first head. They applied solely to the other periods of limitations.

The lecturer said that he had already disposed of the Prescription Act, which defined the various periods of limitations applicable to incorporeal hereditaments, other than rents. The next sub-division was, as to the limitations prescribed with reference to proceedings for the recovery of corporeal hereditaments, or land, and rent services. The period of limitations applicable to the remedies to recover these, was fixed by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 2, which enacted that no person should make an entry, or distress, or bring an action, to recover any land or rent, but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to do so should have accrued to that person, or some one through whom he claimed. Previously to this statute an entry might have been made, unless it were tolled or taken away by a descent, cast, or a discontinuance at any time. If entry failed as a remedy, a possessory action must have been brought, for which the period of limitation was, at one time, King John's return from Ireland; at another, Henry the Third's coronation; but ultimately, by Henry the Eighth's Statute of Limitations, fifty years. Finally, the writ of right might be resorted to within sixty years of the title accruing. But none of these periods of limitation applied to rent services, or services due by custom, the right to which could not, until the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, be barred by any period of dispossession however long. These periods of dispossession must also have been adverse to the title of the claimant; the possession of a tenant was regarded as the possession of the landlord, and consequently not adverse to him. The possession of a younger brother of the real heir was that of the heir himself and non-adverse; the possession of one joint tenant, tenant in common, or coparcener, was that of the co-tenants or co-parceners. The statute, however, contained express enactments altering these rules of law, and put an end to all questions as to whether the possession required thereby were adverse or not (Culley v. Taylerson, 11 Ad. & E. 1015; Nepean v. Doe, 2 M. & W. 911). Actual possession for twenty years was all that was now required, since, under the statute, possession not only gave the right, but transferred the estate. The previous statutes of limitation barred the remedy, but not the estate. They did not create an estate, although they enabled a party to hold that which he had against all the world. The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, in point of fact, gave the estate, for it barred the remedy and declared the title indefeasible. (See the observations of Lord St. Leonards in Incorporated Society v. Richards, 1 Connor & L. 84-5; 1 Dru. & Warren, 289; Landsell v. Gower, 17 Q. B. 589; Doe d. Baddeley v. Massey, 17 Q. B. 373; Doe d. Thompson v. Thompson, 6 Ad. & E. 721.)

As to what hereditaments the statute applied to, the enactment was, any "land" or "rent;" and land, by the first section, was declared to include manors, messuages, and all corporeal hereditaments, and also all tithes, which expression, according to the case of the Dean and Chapter of Ely v. Cash, 15 M. & W. 617, had been interpreted to be the right to, or estate in, the tithes. The word "rent," by the interpretation clause (s. 1) included heriots, and all services and suits for which a distress might be made, and all annuities and periodical sums payable out of land.

The word itself, independent of the interpretation clause, might, however, still include the rent itself, such as rent under a lease, or an estate in a rent, such as a freehold quit-rent, or such like payment. It had been decided that it was the estate in, or the title to, the rent, to which the statute applied, and that the expression did not include rents reserved on a lease (Grant v. Ellis, 9 M. & W. 122; Owen v. De Beauvoir, 16 M. & W. 566; 5 Exch. 166).

The 2nd section of the Limitation Act provided that no action should be brought, or distress made, but within twenty years after the right to do so should have accrued, either to the claimant, or some one through whom he claimed. The 3rd section pointed out the several periods at which this right should be deemed to have accrued. The first case given was when the claimant, or the person through whom he claimed, should have been in possession or receipt of the profits of the "land," or in receipt of the "rent," and, while so entitled, should have been dispossessed of the land, or have discontinued such possession, or the receipt of the profits thereof, or of the rent, or at the last time when any such profit or rent were so received. Dispossession of land by being turned out was, at the present time, a very rare occurrence, although it was often infinitely better for the claimant to resort to this summary remedy, and run the risk of an action of trespass, than to proceed at law in the first instance. The most ordinary kind of dispossession was, the discontinuance of the receipt of the rents or profits; and the effect of the section was, to make the last payment or receipt of such profits the date from which the twenty years was to run. This was decided by the case of Owen v. De Beauvoir, 16 M. & W. 566.

The second case given was that where the claimant of the land or rent claimed the estate or interest of some deceased person who continued in possession until his death, in which case the claimant's right was to be deemed to have accrued at the time of the death.

The third case was when the land or rent was claimed as an estate, or interest, in possession, granted or assured to the claimant, or some one through whom he claimed (otherwise than by will), by a person who, in respect of the same estate or interest, was in possession or receipt of the profits of the land; or of the rent, in which case the twenty years ran from the time when the claimant, or the person through whom he claimed, became entitled.

It was held that this section comprehended the case of a mortgagee who obtained by grant the estate of the mortgagor, and that a mortagee was obliged to bring his action to recover the land within twenty years of the date of the mortgage (Doe d. Royland v. Lightfoot, 8 M. & W. 553). It was now provided, however, by 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 28, that a mortgagee might bring ejectment at any time within twenty years of the last payment of any principal or interest. It was not necessary to prove an actual payment of interest or principal, if the defendant were estopped from denying it (Forsyth v. Bristowe, 8 Ex. 716). The fourth case defined by the 3rd section fixed the time when the right accrued to an estate originally granted in reversion or remainder. It provided that when the estate claimed should have been an estate in reversion or remainder, and no person should have obtained the possession or receipt of the profits of the land or of the rent, then the right should be deemed to have accrued when the estate first became an estate or interest in possession. The condition that no person should have obtained possession was essential, because if once there was a possession in fact, or by receipt of profits, the case was within the first class, and the time began to run from dispossession or non-receipt of the profits. If, therefore, there were an outstanding term, it was clear that the reversioner's right of entry did not accrue until the term had expired, because only then did his estate become an estate in possession (Doe d. Davy, 7 M. & W. 131). This section had created a curious anomaly. Suppose the case put by Mr. Baron Alderson of an insolvent tenant under an existing lease, containing a proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent, that the insolvent had paid no rent at all, and continued to sit free and insolvent, for twenty years, the lease still subsisting, and the reversion, of course, not having fallen in: here the landlord lost both the land and the rent. This was decided in Doe d. Mannon v. Bingham, 3 Ir. L. Rep. 456. So that a landlord was entitled to recover possession at the end of the term, though he never received a farthing rent, but he could avail himself of the clause of re-entry, and enter on the land, after the lapse of twenty years; for the last case specified in the 3rd section was when the person claiming the land or rent, or the person through whom he claimed, should have become entitled by a forfeiture or breach of condition, the right should be deemed to have accrued when such forfeiture was incurred, or such condition broken. The anomaly just mentioned resulting from the combined operations of the 2nd and 3rd sections of the statute, would seem almost to have been anticipated by the framers of the act. It was clear that if a reversioner or remainder-man did not take advantage of a forfeiture or breach of condition within the twenty years allowed him, he lost his right to do so. It seemed to have been feared that under the 2nd section he would then lose his reversion, for the 4th section made an express provision for such a case, enacting that if advantage was not taken of a forfeiture or breach of condition the reversioner should have a new right to enter when his estate fell into possession, which "falling into possession" was defined by the 5th section of the statute. The doctrine of non-adverse possesion was entirely done away with.

The 7th and 8th sections assisted to carry out this object. If there were a tenancy at will, the right of the landlord was deemed to have accrued at the end of the first year, or at the expiration of the tenancy. Consequently where the tenant was let into possession in 1817, and the action was brought in 1839, it was considered to be too late, for the right accrued in 1818, at the end of the first year of the tenancy, although the landlord had entered, and cut and carried away stone from the lands; this only converted the tenancy at will into one by sufferance, and the tenant had continued in possession as tenant at sufferance, unless a new tenancy at will had been created (Doe d. Bennett, 7 M. & W. 226). In this case a new trial was granted, and it was found that there was evidence of a new tenancy at will having been created, so that a fresh period of twenty years had begun to run, and had not expired before the action was brought. (See the same case, 9 M. & W. 643.) Twenty years' possession under this statute gave an estate. Its operation, as to a tenancy at will, in barring the right of the real owner to recover after twenty years had expired, would be seen in the case of Doe d. Dayman & Moore, 9 Q.B. 555. The object of the provision at the end of section 7, that no mortgagee or cestui que trust should be deemed a tenant at will, was too obvious to call for comment.

The 8th section of the statute laid down a similar rule as to tenancies from year to year, where there was no lease in writing. Under the previous sections the right accrued at the determination of the tenant's term, either by breach of condition, forfeiture, or effluxion of time. The same principle applied to yearly tenancies—the right accrued either at the end of the first year of the tenancy, or at the last time when any rent was received, whichever should last happen. The operation of the act in giving an indefeasible estate by twenty years' possession, without payment of rent, after a yearly tenancy, was illustrated by the case of Jukes v. Sumner, 14 M. & W. 39. The effect of the payment of rent within the twenty years was illustrated by the case of Doe d. Earl Spencer v. Beckett, 4 Q.B. 601.

The non-receipt of rents or profits was the period from which commenced that dispossession of the rightful owner, which, after twenty years, was to oust him altogether. The payment of rents or profits it was which, on the other hand, preserved to the landlord his property. But in a tenancy at will, or at sufferance, there was no rent or annual acknowledgment of the owner's right; and hence twenty years' possession might give such tenant an indefeasible estate. In the cases mentioned, the rightful owner would have preserved his property had he taken an acknowledgment of his right from the tenant, for this, by the 14th section of the statute, was equivalent to possession or receipt of rent by him. What was a sufficient acknowledgment, what writing amounted to an acknowledgment, was generally a question of law, and of course was, on general principle, to be determined by the court (Morrell v. Frith, 3 M. & W. 402). That was a case on the statute of limitations of James I., but the same rule was applied to a case under this very section, (Doe d. Curzon v. Edmonds, 6 M. & W. 295.) That case would also serve to show that an acknowledgment must be unconditional and absolute; it must not be of the nature of a proposal, for instance. A good illustration of such an acknowledgment was to be found in the case of Fursdon v. Clogg, 10 M. & W. 572, and in the recent case of Jayne v. Hughes, 10 Ex. 430.

The 16th section of the statute provided for the case of disabilities at the time the right accrued to the person, by or through whom the claim was made. It gave a claimant ten years beyond the time when the disability should have ceased. These disabilities were—one, infancy; two, coverture; three, unsoundness of mind, including idiocy or lunacy; and four, absence beyond seas. It should be observed that "imprisonment" was not a disability under the statute, as it had hitherto been under the 21st of James I. The commissioners on the law of real property had this disability omitted, both in their statute and in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, s. 42, which prescribed the limitation as to actions on specialties, on the ground that imprisonment, whether under civil or criminal process, was now of comparatively short duration. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act had swept it away in other cases, so that it no longer existed as a disability in any case whatever. With reference to "absence beyond seas," it might be remarked that it remained a disability under this statute so far as regarded suits for land or rents, but had ceased to be so as to suits for money charged upon land, and also under the other statutes of limitation—the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 & in 21 Jac. I. c. 16. Suits for recovery of money charged upon land would, therefore, be classed with specialty debts. With reference to the other disabilities—infancy, coverture, lunacy, and absence beyond seas—the disability must exist at the time the right accrued, from which it might sometimes happen that the protection intended to be afforded by the statute was no protection at all (see Owen v. de Beauvoir, 16 M. & W. 567).

Even in the case of disability, the lapse of forty years was, by section 17, an absolute bar to the right to recover, as was held in the case of Doe v. Branston, 3 Ad. & E. 63. But it must be kept in view that the forty years was not a bar against all the world. The twenty years constituted the regular and ordinary bar; the savings of different disabilities constituted the exceptions thereto; the forty years period ran only in the case of disabilities, and in that case not more than forty years were allowed. The twenty years began to run when the right accrued; for instance, when an estate in remainder or reversion fell into possession—an event which might not happen for a much longer period than forty years, as, for example, in the case of an estate for life with remainder over, or a lease for ninety years. With these cases the forty years' limitation had nothing to do.

The lecturer said that the 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 23rd sections of the statute were passed merely to carry out the general object of the statute, and that their examination would involve a disquisition on the law of real property which it was not within his province to give; but that the operation of the 21st section was illustrated in the case of Austin v. Llewellyn, 9

Ex. 276. The 24th section merely made part of the statute law, the rule on which the Court of Chancery had all along acted in adopting legal periods of limitation.

Mr. Kerr said, that the limitations applicable to corporeal hereditaments and rents might be summed up in three propositions.

1. An entry could only be made on, or an ejectment be brought for, land (including tithes), or a distress be made for a rent charge within twenty years of the right accruing to the claimant, or some one through whom he claimed.

2. The right to enter, bring ejectment or distrain, accrued (and the period of twenty years of course began to run), when the claimant was first dispossessed.

3. If the claimant, or the person through whom he claimed, happened to have been an infant, lunatic, a feme covert, or absent beyond seas, at the time the right accrued, the claimant had, ten years after the death of the person under disability, or after the disability ceased, to proceed, but in no such case had he more than forty years.

Mercantile Law Conference.

In accordance with previous announcement, this conference met, on Jan. 28, at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, Lord BROUGHAM presiding. Among those present were:—Lord Stanley, M.P., Sir Erskine Perry, M.P.; Mr. Apsley Pellatt, M.P.; Mr. George Ridley, M.P.; Mr. Wickham, M.P.; Mr. Craufurd, M.P.; Mr. Christopher Russell, Liverpool; Mr. Edward Banner, Liverpool Law Society; Mr. John Wilson, Vice-President of the Liverpool Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade; Messrs. Hassell, Phillips, and Wells, Hull Chamber of Commerce; Mr. L. Briton, secretary to the Bristol Chamber of Commerce; Messrs. Crosthwaite, Francis Codd, John Jameson, and Thomas Pim, Dublin Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Henry Brown, mayor of Bradford; Mr. John Darlington, secretary to the Bradford Chamber of Commerce; Messrs. Kitchley and Saunders, Kidderminister; Mr. Scrope Ayrton, Leeds; Messrs. Turner, Entwisle, Taylor, and Fleming, Commercial Association, Manchester; Mr. Lea, Warrington Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Richard Graves, mayor of Warwick; Mr. S. S. Lloyd, Birmingham Chamber of Commerce; Mr. J. Mitchell, Leith: Mr. T. T. Paget, President of the Leicester Trade Protection Society; and Mr. Thos. M'Clure, Belfast Chamber of Commerce. There was also a large attendance of members of the legal profession.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said it gave him very great satisfaction to have the honour of meeting that conference, assembled as it was from all parts of the country, as well as from the City of London, and that, too, on a subject of the greatest possible importance. He would not detain them by dwelling on the importance of the occasion. It was enough to say that those whom he addressed were met to give the result of their practical experience of the working of the mercantile laws of this country. If anything could add to the necessity of attention, on the part of the Government and the Legislature, to the experience of mercantile men on the subjects which most nearly affected them, it was the fact that of late years very material changes had been introduced in the mercantile laws of this country, and that of the effects of those changes, for good or for evil, they had not yet had an adequate opportunity of informing themselves. At the head of the subject-matter set down for consideration stood the law of bankruptcy and insolvency, and the other branches of the law of debtor and creditor forming part of the new system which had been introduced within little more than a quarter of a century. A great change was made in the law by the act of 1831. Important changes were made by the act passed in 1840 or 1841; and a further change, and, as he trusted, a further improvement, was introduced in 1849, by the act commonly called "The Bankruptcy Consolidation Act." They had now to consider how far benefit had arisen from these several changes; how far errors had been committed, and, therefore, mischief had been inflicted; and how far improvements might now be introduced in the law. As regarded measures of amendment generally, objections had been urged against the course pursued by the Law Amendment Society which appeared to be wholly groundless. It was said that they had not proceeded upon any system, that they ought to introduce a new code of mercantile laws instead of going to work piecemeal and making a variety of proposals. Now, in the first place, he denied the truth of what was alleged; he asserted that they had proceeded almost constantly upon a uniform system. One great principle would be found to pervade and govern all the changes which he himself proposed before the existence of the Law Amendment Society, and many of which he happily succeeded in bringing about, and all the changes which that society had since been the means of carrying into effect. That principle was the substitution of natural for technical procedure—natural procedure with its incalculable benefits, for technical procedure with its incalculable evils. If he were asked why they did not propose a new system of law, his answer would be that that would be all very well if the existing system of jurisprudence were a mass of absurdity and contradiction. If, indeed, there were nothing valuable in the existing system, the sooner it was swept away and another substituted for it the better; but the contrary was the truth. Even the stoutest law amenders admitted that such was not the case. Mr. Bentham himself was one of the first to admit that there was in the English system of jurisprudence far more of what is valuable than of what is reprehensible; and it followed from this that, instead of the whole being swept away, nine-tenths of the system, being good, should be retained, and the remaining tenth should, as far as possible, be improved. Again, it was said that the improvements which were proposed, not merely by the Law Amendment Society, but by those who desired changes in the political, civil, or religious system of the country, did not go far enough. His answer was, that they went as far in most cases as they ought to go—as far as was practicable and safe. It was best to take one step, and make sure of their footing, and then to wait until that step had proved safe and beneficial. No harm could arise from postponement, while it was at least attended with the advantage derived from experience. He had alluded to the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act. Many objections had been made both in and out of courts of justice, to the working of that statute. These objections were, he believed, very much exaggerated; but one thing must be admitted—namely, that late events in the mercantile world had unfortunately shown that there was a species of conflict between the different branches of the law affecting bankruptcy and insolvency, and the Winding-up Acts. His impression was that these things were beneficial on the whole, and that the great difficulty arose from the conflict of jurisdiction; and if the winding-up and the bankruptcy were administered by the same tribunal, he ventured to say 99 out of 100 parts of the grievance would cease to exist. He was informed that Mr. Commissioner Holroyd concurred in this opinion. Now he thought the moment at which they were met was in some respects a happy one. There was now a great disposition on the part of all persons in both Houses of Parliament to devote their attention to the important subject of the amendment of the law; and various measures were not merely in contemplation, but in actual preparation, for the accomplishment of that desirable object. Not only the Government, but parties wholly unconnected with, and indeed opposed to it, concurred in the necessity of making some changes, and in hoping that the changes contemplated would prove beneficial. Professions and promises, indeed, cost little, and wise and prudent men would be disposed to take them at cost price. He certainly participated in that feeling, and would look more to a little performance than to very ample promise; but, beyond the general principle which he had stated, he had no reason whatever to doubt the perfect sincerity, both of those in office, and those out of office, from whom the promises and professions in question had proceeded; still, he was disposed to watch carefully, to be active and diligent, and to do all he could to secure that those to whom he referred should fulfil their promises; and nothing certainly could be more likely to conduce to the desired result than the proceedings of that conference.

Mr. HASTINGS, one of the secretaries of the conference, then read the following report of the committee:—

"The great success of the Mercantile Law Conference held in November, 1852, and the legislative results which followed its deliberations, induced the council of the Law Amendment Society to take into consideration, at the commencement of their present session, the expediency of convening another meeting of a similar nature. The council felt that the same reasons which had operated so powerfully to produce and carry through successfully the first conference were still in existence, to exercise the same influence over another. It is true that considerable amendments have been made during the last four years in the mercantile law of the United Kingdom; but it is equally true that those amendments bear but a small proportion to the defects which still require a remedy. The council have constantly received communications from various quarters, which showed that considerable dissatisfaction is felt by the commercial community as to the law or its administration, or both; and were there no other evidence of the need existing for further improvements in our laws, this dissatisfaction, arising in a body of men so little prone to agitation and so desirous of stability as the mercantile classes, seems in itself a tolerably conclusive demonstration. Law, if cheap, simple, and well-adapted to its purposes, would work smoothly and silently as the recognised arbiter in case of dispute, and as the natural medium for the assertion of right and the redress of wrong. It is only when it departs from its true nature and fails properly to execute its appointed ends—when it becomes slow, cumbrous, expensive, uncertain, and oppressive—in other words, when it imperatively requires reform, that there is any likelihood of the public mind being agitated in respect to it. A general complaint against the working of a law is a proof that the law is defective; we may not at once see the evil, but we may be confident that it exists somewhere. Pure law is no more likely to be complained of than pure air or pure water. Impressed, therefore, with the dissatisfaction which appeared prevalent on the subject of our commercial laws, the council in November last addressed a letter to the Chambers of Commerce throughout the United Kingdom, asking their opinion as to the expediency of holding a Mercantile Law Conference for 1857. The answers received were so favourable that the council resolved to appoint the committee who are now addressing you, and to charge them with the preparation for a conference; and the committee accordingly proceeded to fix the days for the meeting, to issue invitations to chambers of commerce, town councils, trade associations, law societies, and other bodies interested in commercial law, and also to solicit suggestions as to the topics which the conference would do well to discuss. This appeal has been most fully answered, both with regard to the number of towns which are represented to-day, and the number and nature of the communications forwarded to the committee. Twenty-one towns, comprising upwards of five millions of inhabitants, and concentrating the wealth, energy, and enterprise of our shipping, manufacturing, and trading interests, have sent delegates to this conference. The names of these towns, several of which have supplied representatives from more than one public body, are as follow:—Bath, Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Bristol, Dublin, Glasgow, Huddersfield, Hull, Kidderminster, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle, Norwich, Plymouth, Southampton, Wolverhampton, and Worcester. The number of communications received is so considerable that the committee are unable to fulfil their intention of enumerating and describing them to the conference. Several will be read as papers during the proceedings, and it is hoped that all will be printed with the authorised report which the committee intend to publish very shortly. The task of arranging and classifying the various subjects forwarded to the committee has been a more difficult one. The circulars originally forwarded to the different bodies invited, contained eight heads of subjects which were selected as indicia of the kind of topics desirable; and the committee have been happy to find that while suggestions have been sent up on some point or other under each of these heads, scarcely any point has been urged which cannot be classified under one of them. Numerous and various, no doubt, the suggestions are; but on the main points there seems to be a singular agreement, and the committee believe that the course of discussion they are about to recommend is likely to bring prominently forward those topics in which the great majority of the delegates present are most interested. The principal subjects, they would observe, will be opened by papers, a mode of proceeding which tends to bring the discussion to a definite issue, and to present that issue in a clear and intelligible way. The first subject in the list is the law of bankruptcy, one on which the committee have received communications from every single public body represented here to-day, as well as from a number of private individuals. There cannot be a question that the present administration of this branch of our law, greatly as it was improved by the Bankruptcy Act of 1831, and afterwards by the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act of 1849, requires immediate and searching revision. The committee will not enter into the details of this question, being relieved from the necessity of doing so by the fact that a paper will be read on the subject which has been prepared by the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, and which will no doubt treat of it in the fullest and most satisfactory way. Mr. Commissioner Ayrton has favoured the committee with a paper under the same head, which will also be read to the conference. The committee have thought it advisable, that on the same morning during which bankruptcy is considered, other topics which can be classed under the same general head of the law of debtor and creditor should be taken. Mr. Craufurd, M.P., will accordingly read a brief paper on his Judgments' Execution Bill, a salutary measure which has been too long delayed. A discussion will also be taken on the United Kingdom Writs Bill, which is advocated by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and by other public bodies. Under this class of subjects, the committee may allude to that of imprisonment for debt, concerning which they have received several suggestions, among others a bill from Mr. Apsley Pellatt, M.P. In the evening of to-day a paper will be read by the Liverpool Chamber, on that most important and popular subject, the establishment of tribunals of commerce. Considerable difference of opinion prevails as to the expediency of these tribunals, at least if established after the continental fashion; but there can be little doubt as to the justice of the demand by the mercantile classes, for a cheaper, more frequent, and more satisfactory mode of disposing of commercial litigation. On the morning of Thursday, after a short paper by Professor Levi on a commercial code, the Manchester Commercial Association have undertaken to bring forward the subject of a general registration of partnerships. There is no topic more occupying the minds of mercantile men at the present moment: a strong impression prevails that such a measure, if it can be practically worked out, is most desirable, if not essential to the security of traders; and it is the highest satisfaction to the committee that this important subject is in hands so well calculated to do it justice, it being well known that the Association, in conjunction with the Manchester Law Society, have prepared a bill to carry out such a registration. The next paper read will be on the 17th. section of the Statute of Frauds, by Mr. Robert Slater, a well known merchant in the City, and one of the late commissioners of inquiry into the expediency of assimilating the commercial laws of England, Scotland, and Ireland. This subject has now been long discussed, and seems to divide the mercantile world. The committee hope that the consideration of it at this conference may tend to its ultimate settlement. There are various other topics of a less general nature which the committee think may be more advantageously debated by a small number than by a numerous and mixed meeting. They therefore recommend that several small committees be appointed, composed of one member from each deputation interested in the particular subject, and that these committees should, after due deliberation, report to the conference before it terminates. The committee, in conclusion, cannot but express their deep obligation to the various bodies who have supported them on this occasion, and to the gentlemen who have sacrificed their time and occupations to be present here. They are well aware of the influential nature of this conference, and of the important results which are likely to flow from it; but at the same time they are impressed with the conviction that these results will not be of a day's accomplishment, and that much care, caution, labour, and oversight will be requisite if the full fruits of this meeting are in their maturity to be gathered in. They would recommend therefore, that the committee who have superintended the arrangements of the conference be authorised to continue their functions as the accredited representatives of the powerful gathering present here, and that to their number should be added the president and chairman of every Chamber of Commerce and other public body represented at the conference. Such a committee as this will speak the voice not of a town or a county but of the kingdom at large; it will afford a rallying point for all mercantile law reformers, and may lay the foundation for an organisation which will at last move the government and the legislature to efforts worthy of the national greatness, and calculated to bring the laws of the United Kingdom into permanent harmony with the requirements of justice and sense, and with the customs and exigencies of trade."

Mr. Commissioner AYRTON, of the Leeds Court of Bankruptcy, read a paper on the improvement of the bankrupt laws. The two great complaints against the present system were:—first, that it was too expensive; and second, that the punishments inflicted were uncertain and inadequate. But expense was the great complaint. Now the Court of Bankruptcy, being a mercantile court, its expenses were taken out of bankrupt estates, and fell exclusively upon those who suffered by bankruptcies. In working a bankruptcy with the smallest possible amount of assets — that is, with only £150—at least £100 would be swallowed up in expenses. As the assets increased, so did the expenses swell up, though not in the same ratio, to £200, £300, and £400, till in such cases as the Royal British Bank the ordinary working expenses would be as many thousands of pounds. The expense of the Court of Bankruptcy was then greater than it would be a few years hence—first, because the large sum (about £28,000 annually) then paid for pensions and compensations would, of course, cease as the annuitants died; and, second, because the permanent expenses of the court were to be diminished by reducing the commissioners to four in London, and to seven in the country, thus saving the expense of seven commissioners and seven registrars, or £18,000 annually. The following table would give a tolerably correct idea of the annual expenses:

Compensations and pensions (about)	£28,000
Accountant in bankruptcy and clerks	6,380
Five London commissioners (2,000*l.* each)	10,000
Eleven country ditto (1,800*l.*)	19,800
Taxing master and clerks	1,650
Seven London registrars (1,000*l.*)	7,000
Twelve country ditto (800*l.*)	9,600
Five London ushers (100*l.*)	500
Eleven country ditto (80*l.*)	880
Chief registrar's clerks (four)	905
Travelling expenses of country commissioners and registrars (about)	1,000
	£85,715

"In addition to which sums, the solicitors, official assignees, and messengers, had to be paid. The following estimate was believed to be below the mark:—

Solicitors' bills, London and country	£100,000
Thirty official assignees (1,200*l.* each)	36,000
Seventeen messengers (800*l.* each)	13,600
	£149,600

"The first item was £28,000 a-year for compensations and pensions for abolished offices. Was it not unjust to saddle these compensations upon bankrupt estates in the present day? Surely it would be proper that this sum of £28,000 for compensations, from which bankrupt estates derived no advantage whatever, should be charged upon the Consolidated Fund."

The learned commissioner then proceeded to remark on the following, among other, matters:—

"THE REGISTRARS.

"It had been asked whether the registrars were necessary? In the country districts there was, eventually, to be but one commissioner in each district, who must sit daily; in case of his illness, and to enable him to take vacation, the registrar could act for him, and the country registrar had to tax the bills of costs of the solicitors; it therefore appeared that the country registrars could not well be dispensed with. In London it was different: the commissioners there sat for each other, and there was a taxing master in London. It therefore appeared that the London registrars might be dispensed with.

"SOLICITORS.

"The costs of the solicitor constituted the most serious item in the expense of every bankruptcy. In the court at Leeds, in the five years from January, 1843, the aggregate amount of costs was £26,471, or above £5,000 a-year. It appeared to him that the solicitor received too much out of each bankrupt estate; not because he was overpaid for what he did, but because he did too much; that is, he did business which other people ought to do, and which was not properly within the province of a solicitor to meddle with. The result was, that far too large a proportion of the expenses of bankruptcy was caused by the solicitor's ordinary bill of costs. He proposed to appoint a solicitor to every court, whose duty would be to act as official solicitor under every bankruptcy, and to be paid a fixed salary of £400 or £500 a-year, such salary to be paid out of the same fund as the other officers of the court. The experiment of the official assignee in place of the creditors' assignee has been found highly successful. He believed that an official solicitor would be no less successful. He did not propose that it should be imperative on the creditors to have recourse to the official solicitor. They should be allowed to select any other solicitor if they thought fit, only, in that case, the dividend would be reduced by the amount of the bill of costs. He did not perceive that this measure would be unfairly injurious to the profession. Other great public bodies had their official solicitors, who were remunerated by fixed salaries, and why not that commercial chamber, the Court of Bankruptcy? It was to be remembered that all the costs of a bankruptcy were paid in reduction of a dividend to be made out of an estate already insolvent. He had suggested various reductions in different branches of the Court of Bankruptcy, and the solicitors would have no just reason to complain if they were included in the reduction.

"APPEALS ON CERTIFICATES.

"The question of the amount of punishment to be inflicted by the Court of Bankruptcy generally arose on questions of granting, suspending, or refusing the certificate. It had been stated in a very public manner that an unfortunate difference of opinion existed between the Lords Justices and the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, regarding the proper quantum of punishment to be affixed to different degrees of culpability in bankrupts applying for their certificates. No doubt it was the fact that on appeals the Lords Justices generally alter and modify the sentence of the commissioners, almost invariably reducing the quantum of punishment. In many of the appeals the Lords Justices had differed from the commissioners on questions—sometimes of principle, sometimes of detail—of such a nature that the judgment of the one or the other must be fundamentally wrong on questions of common mercantile life and morals. The result appeared to be, that, in order to maintain that feeling of respect which ought to accompany every tribunal for the administration of justice, one of two things ought to take place—either the whole question of the certificate must be taken from the commissioner, and transferred to the Lords Justices, or the appeal on questions of certificate must be abolished, and the decision left with the commissioner. As regards the first plan, it was tolerably certain that the Lords Justices would never tolerate the wearying labour of deciding, in the first instance, concerning bankrupts' certificates; even if their lordships felt inclined to undertake the task, it was very doubtful whether they could possibly find the time; and if they could, there still arose the question whether the public would endure the expense of taking all the country cases to London; and, finally, would their lordship's decisions be satisfactory, seeing that the whole case, up to that time, had been before another tribunal? The result appeared to be that the appeal on questions of certificate only ought to be abolished. But, in leaving the decision in the hands of the commissioners alone, it must be remembered that lawyers were not born with any peculiar aptitude to judge of commercial matters; and their legal education and professional pursuits went very little way towards supplying what, like all other men, they had to learn upon the subject. Skill and knowledge on such matters was the slow growth of time and experience. The commissioner sitting daily, attending daily to commercial matters, surrounded by men in trade, and by solicitors connected with merchants, might be supposed in time to gain some portion of experience in commercial matters. But in order to guard the public against any erroneous views which the commissioner might take, the remedy would be to require that on questions of the last examination, or of certificates, if any of the parties (that is, the bankrupt, the assignees, or any opposing creditor) should require it, two commercial men of the district—members of the chamber of commerce, if possible—not connected with the bankruptcy, but of the same trade as the bankrupt, should sit with the commissioner, having a voice and vote in the determination of the case. With this guard, the appeal to the Lords Justices on such questions might be abolished with safety and advantage to all parties.

The CHAIRMAN thought it desirable for the conference to see how far it was likely to agree with regard to the proposed alterations in the bankruptcy law. There were four principal recommendations embraced in Mr. Ayrton's paper. The first was the throwing of the £28,000, a year, paid for compensation, on the consolidated fund, with regard to the propriety of which he (the chairman) entertained no doubt whatever. The second was the abolition of the offices of messenger and broker, and of the office of registrar, so far as London was concerned. Thirdly, there was the payment of the official assignee altogether by salary. He could not entirely concur in that suggestion, because he thought the result of such a state of things would be that the official assignee would in many cases go to sleep. He thought the payment should be partly by salary and partly by fees. The fourth and last point was the abolition of the appeal. He was of opinion that the appeal should not be totally abolished, because without it, amidst the multiplicity of commissioners, it might be impossible to keep the administration of the bankruptcy law sufficiently uniform.

The proceedings of the conference continued on Wednesday evening and on Thursday. We must reserve our further report until next week.

Juridical Society.

At a meeting of this Society, held on Monday evening last, a paper, by the Hon. I. N. Dickinson, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, was read. The subject was "English Case-Law, with an inquiry into its essential characteristics, and some suggestions for forming a complete digest and institutes out of existing decisions." After referring to the recent attempts at consolidation of the statute law, the learned writer cited the authority of Lord Coke, Mr. J. W. Smith, and others, to show the great importance of a mastery of the reported decisions to the legal practitioner. The difficulty, however, was unquestionable. The volumes contained reports of cases arranged in the chronological order of their decision. The first case in a volume might be on a bill of exchange, the second on the power of a coroner to turn a man out of a room, the next respecting the validity of a marriage, and so on. If the student had recourse to the treatises, no doubt a general, but a superficial view of the whole of the separate titles of law might be obtained. The knowledge thus acquired could with difficulty be retained in the memory, as the mind could not clearly perceive the reasons for the decisions enunciated; nor could the learning derived from treatises be safely applied in practice till it was ascertained what similarity there might be in the facts, whereon advice was sought, with those which induced the decision cited in the treatise which appeared applicable to the circumstances under consideration. The law, like all other sciences, was a collection of particulars, from which, on close examination, certain formulæ or rules might be induced. These rules were useful only so far as, from their brevity, they might easily be recorded in the memory, for the purpose of suggesting the individual cases from whence they were derived. Though clear ideas of legal propositions were only to be obtained by the study of the facts on which the decisions were pronounced, distinct notions could not be stored in the understanding, unless the several parts of the subject were arranged in their natural order. If all the cases cited in Bayley on Bills were collected into one volume, and therein arranged in the same order as they are cited in the treatise, the law relating to such instruments would be much more accurately apprehended and remembered, than it could be from the study of the treatise, or by the perusal of the cases, along with others, as they occurred in the volumes of the reports. If all the cases on every other title were collected into distinct books, and similarly arranged, a vast deal would be accomplished for the student of case-law; but from the multitude of reported cases the mastery of twenty titles would require the expenditure of half the number of years. In many instances it would be ascertained that the law on a particular point had been proved by repeated decisions, and as a proposition of law was sufficiently proved by one decision, therefore all but one might be struck out of the collection. If of several decisions on the same point one should be found which accounted for as well as proved the legal proposition, that should be the one retained; for it would show not the law only, but the reason of the law. The case so retained might be denuded of the counsel's arguments, and so much only of the opinions expressed by the judges should be set down as disclosed the reasons of their determination. There would then remain of a volume of collected cases on a head of law, the report of one case alone on a given point, setting out the facts on which the decision arose, and why they received the determination that was recorded. If the reports on every title of case-law were thus collected and reduced, and all the reduced collections arranged in a scientific order, the labour of reading the books at large would be wonderfully reduced. The common law would thus be reduced into a digest, which would combine the certainty of the report-books with the method of the abridgement. As most of the cases thus admitted into the digest would be explained by the reasons assigned for them, from those reasons there might, in an elementary work, be deduced, by à priori reasoning, the same rules which were arrived at by induction from the cases in the digest. As the statute law, in many places, necessarily intersects the case-law, the code or consolidated statute law and the digest should be arranged uniformly, as far as practicable; and each chapter in the elementary work or institute should be similarly arranged, and should denote on each head the relations of the statute and the case-law on the matter of that division. Such a digest would be preferable to the incorporation of the case-law with the statutes into a code; for as the details of circumstances could never be set forth in statutes, the code would provide only for general and not particular instances, and would be a mere collection of abstracts without concretes. The only plan of reducing the cases into the form of positive law would be by inducing general rules from the instances in the books, and giving them the efficacy of statutes. The learned writer proceeded to discuss a plan of this kind which had been proposed by Mr. Crofton Uniacke, in 1825, and alluded to a work by Mr. S. B. Harrison, on the Law of Evidence, which was undertaken by the latter gentleman for the purpose of illustrating Mr. Uniacke's scheme. But although the methodical arrangement advocated and illustrated by these gentlemen would form an admirable portion of an elementary institute, it was unsuitable for a digest of the case-law, which should consist, not of generalisations, but of individuals, as in law the only safe process of reasoning is from particulars to particulars, or by ascertaining the similarity of the circumstances on which a decision was propounded with those under consideration, or the analogy existing between their relations. In a digest of case-law, the greatest care should be given to set out the circumstances and details of facts, so that the propositions of law should not have too general an application. Domat's work would be a good form for an institute, if to each rule was added (as in Euclid's Elements) an explanation of the reasons of the rules formally enunciated, together with references to the cases in the digest which proved the propositions to be law. Should the case-law ever be incorporated with the statutes into a code, new circumstances would continually arise, to which that code could have no application. The code itself would continually be subjected to construction, and its application to facts in litigation would form new materials for books of case-law. The very construction of a statute is a common law operation, as also the decision of all cases entirely novel in their circumstances. All lawyers studied with more pleasure, remembered with more certainty, and applied with more accuracy, the case-law than the statute. Hence, in digesting the former, the circumstances and details of facts should be retained. "The reporting of particular cases and examples," said Lord Coke, "is the most perspicuous course of teaching the right rule and reason of the law; and the glossographers, to illustrate the rule of the civil law, often reduce the rule into a case, for the more lively expression and application of the same." It is assumed that most propositions of the law which the cases propound, have been established on some reason disclosed in one at least of the decisions; and there are also many propositions—the only evidence of whose existence is to be found in the books of reports—which are grounded not upon abstract reasoning, but sometimes upon custom, sometimes on positive law of greater antiquity than the ordinary statutes, and others which have been decided contrary to principle and reason.

As such propositions had not (unless accidentally the attribute of universality), and were not necessarily, in the absence of positive enactments, law in other countries, like those which were founded on abstract reasoning, they could not with propriety be included as a portion of the common law. The ordinary notion of the common law was that conception by which it differed from Acts of Parliament, and the whole of the case-law satisfied that notion. In discussing the case-law, it might be important to distinguish between those cases which were grounded on abstract reasoning, and which were, therefore, more properly called common law; so that, in the digest, the origin of each proposition should be disclosed, in order that the other class of cases should be dealt with as the statute law—treated as cases within the express decision, while the former might be extended by analogy. The following sketch was offered as to the method of ascertaining the law on litigated subjects. If a statute was applicable, the dispute was governed by the enactment. If there were none applicable to the case, but a case in the books was found identical in its circumstances with the facts, it would decide the question, unless the decision was demonstrably repugnant to reason. If neither a statute nor a case could be found, the court was obliged to decide by natural reason. The case thus decided was called "a case of the first impression," and the law propounded was considered to be then discovered and declared. The decision stood thenceforth as evidence of the pre-existing law on the disputed facts, and as a precedent for future decisions. If every proposition of law were founded upon natural reason, a digest should contain only "cases of the first impression." But there are propositions of law which might be shown to be repugnant to reason, but were, nevertheless, held to be law, because cases have often been decided by them, and public acquiescence has conferred on them a validity as potent as if they had been enacted by Parliament. But in these instances, it was held that they are only to be directly applied, and were not to be extended by equity or analogy, according to the maxim of the civil law—Quod contra rationem juris receptum est, non est producendum ad consequentia. Each of such legal propositions, together with those which had arisen by custom, or other positive law, should be evidenced in the digest by some one decision exhibiting its irrational or positive original, in order that the digest should distinguish between the cases which might be extended and those which should be restricted in their application; and possibly these latter legal propositions might be better dealt with by being incorporated with the statute law. Mr. Bentham had proposed this mode of dealing with the whole of the case-law—that the whole law of England, as far as it has arisen by enactments, or been developed in the course of litigation, should be matter of positive enactment. If the reason on which a case was decided was to be made the proposition of law in such a code, no resolution would be disclosed of the peculiar facts which elicited the provision; and when similar facts should afterwards come into controversy, the question would be, whether they had been provided for beforehand by the code. If, on the other hand, the point decided by the case was to be made an article of the code, it would afford no rule for cases which would be within the same reason. The provision of the code could not be extended by analogical reasoning, and a large amount of law would have to be developed anew. The law which is evidenced by judicial decisions was far more elastic than statutory enactments. For, as no enactments could provide for all things that might afterwards happen, cases of the first impression must always arise to be decided, not by the conjecture of the judge, but by some proposition of natural justice more general than the point decided, so that the conclusion might be shown to be based on a prior rule, and not on considerations beginning and ending with the circumstances before the court. The learned writer then discussed a number of rules, which he proposed for the formation of such a digest and institute; and laid before the society a specimen of each, by way of illustrating his method.

A discussion ensued, in which the Hon. Baron Bramwell, who occupied the chair, expressed considerable doubt as to the possibility of satisfactorily accomplishing the proposed work, and of its utility, even though it could be achieved. It was generally admitted by the speakers, however, that the plan of the institute would be most valuable for the student, and even for the practitioner of law.

NOTE.—The English public were lately somewhat surprised at the information contained in M. Ubicini's work on Turkey, in which he gives us a very elaborate account of the efforts of law reformers and codifiers in the land of the Cadis. We are told that the Turks have eight distinct codes—viz., the religious, the political, the military, the criminal, the penal, the commercial, and the civil codes, and, lastly, the code of game laws—but what will our lawyers say when they are told that even the reported decisions (fetvahs), of which there appears to be a greater number in Turkish than in English law, have long ago been consolidated and arranged very much in the same manner as has been suggested by Mr. Justice Dickinson, in the paper noticed above. M. Ubicini tells us that the solution of almost every conceivable case may be found in the ancient collection of fetvahs (decisions or opinions), which have been carefully preserved since the time of the first disciples of the Prophet; and their number is so great, that Toderini reckoned fifty-five large volumes of them in the library of St. Sophia alone. There are five of these collections, extending from the year 1041 to the year 1143 of the Hegira (1631-1740): the last of these, compiled by the learned Behdjet-Abdoullah Effendi, contains the substance of all the others. In 1226 (1808) Hafiz-Mehemmed-Kedoussi published a new collection, in Turkish and Arabic, printed at Constantinople in 1822, which is both an abridgment and a commentary of the preceding ones. Its contents are arranged in forty-five books, in the order of the six codes of which the Ottoman jurisprudence was then composed.* This collection is still used in the tribunals as a commentary or explanation of the general code of laws.

Private Bills before Parliament.

Mr. Smith and Mr. Frere, the examiners appointed by the Houses of Parliament for private bills, began their sittings on Monday last. Mr. Frere took his seat for the first time, having been appointed examiner in the place of Mr. May, who has succeeded to Mr. Ley, as clerk-assistant of the House of Commons. Mr. Frere was one of the committee clerks, and has for many years assisted the examiners in their important duties.

* See M. Bianchi's account of this work in the Journal Asiatique for March, 1824. There is a printed copy of the collection of Kedoussi in the archives of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs at Paris. Another collection of the fetvahs of the Mufti Ali was printed in 1830 at Constantinople. Ali was Mufti (Sheikh-ul-Islam) under Mohammed IV.

The following list will show the result of the labours of the examiners during the week;—

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The news from China has not produced any material decline in the English Funds, but combined with the continued drain of gold, with additional tightness of money, with renewed activity in the demand for accommodation in the discount market, and with the absence of any signs of improvement on the Paris Bourse, has kept down the price of Funds rather below the drooping rates of the previous three weeks.

Foreign Securities remain quiet, with a downward tendency.

The rates of the Bank of England for discount and advances are without alteration.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 24th January, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,089,965, being a decrease of £373,070; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,116,282, shewing an increase of £5,873, when compared with the previous return. The decline of prices in the Metropolitan and Provincial Corn Markets, during the last two weeks, has been very considerable. Producers appear to have come to the conclusion that late rates will not be maintained. This decline is expected to lead to some degree of easement in the Money Market, by checking the importation of Foreign Corn. In the Meat Market, prices continue without abatement. Foreign and Colonial produce fully maintain previous rates, and hostilities in China have caused a considerable advance in the price of Tea.

At the recent interview between gentlemen representing the Property and Income Tax Association and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street, several important facts were mentioned, well known, indeed, but ignored, or forgotten, or kept out of view, by persons who pretend to lead and direct an expression of popular will on the subject of the Income Tax. Persons desirous to court popularity fix instinctively upon the theme of reducing or abolishing a tax as a sure means of attaining their object, and leave out of view facts which the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not omit to put prominently before the gentlemen who were present at this interview, and also before the public. He stated that the law is perfectly clear to maintain the tax till April, 1858, but that the Government wholly renounced all intention of taking any kind of improper advantage from the law, which it would be the duty of Parliament to maintain or alter. He stated that sound policy forbids the Government to reckon the conclusion of the war to have been at any earlier period than the ratification of the treaty of peace. He also pointed out that the effect of the movement to reduce the income tax would be, if successful, to remit £8,000,000 of revenue, and that the abolition of the whole of the tax would produce a remission of more than double that amount.

It may be remarked that with these facts the question between direct and indirect taxation is closely united. It is clear that the advantages of free trade could not have been secured without that large reduction in custom and excise duties which the imposition of an income tax alone made practicable. Those parties who demand the immediate reduction or the total removal of the Income Tax should shew, if it can be shewn, how the consequent deficiency in the public income can be made good without such an increase of custom and excise duties as would greatly hinder free-trade, and become more painfully burdensome to tradesmen and manufacturers than even the Income Tax, notwithstanding the inquisitorial means by which it is assessed, and notwithstanding it has not been found practicable to establish a differential duty between permanent and precarious Income.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 7, 1857.

DICKENS OUTDONE.

The Westminster Review has declared, in its number of last month, that comprehensive law reform can only be expected as a consequence of reform in Parliament. Public feeling, says the reviewer, is but languid on the subject of legal abuses; and we might add that, in the opinion of many persons, it would be difficult now to raise any very vehement agitation for the remodelling of the House of Commons. But if the nation neither feels the burden pressing on it, nor cares to take measures to obtain relief, we cannot but apprehend that the hopes of our law reformers are doomed to grievous disappointment. It will not, however, be the fault of the Westminster Review if this pernicious apathy be not disturbed. The Court of Chancery, and certain officers of the court, who are called by those who understand its practice "solicitors," and by those who merely talk about it "attorneys," are selected by the reviewer as the most signal disgrace of our legal system. The writer, desiring, of course, to inspire confidence in his conclusions, begins with a little pictorial embellishment. The Court of Chancery is personified as holding in its hands, instead of just weights and measures, "unequal balances and false keys." What the Court of Chancery is to do with the latter implements we are not informed, and probably the words were only introduced to round a period.

We ought scarcely, perhaps, to urge any serious complaint against an attack upon the profession which is introduced by a quotation from "Bleak House." The writer evidently intends to warn us, that, although we may find him dull, he has not the least intention to be serious; and that, if he has not naturally as much imagination as CHARLES DICKENS, he intends to make the most of what he does possess. "How comes it," he asks, "if the Court of Chancery be so horrible a place as has been described, that so many hapless victims are induced to enter it?" It is owing to the solicitors, whom it pleases him to call "attorneys," that suits in Chancery are commenced. "To the attorney employed such a suit is a fortune:"—a statement which contrasts rather strangely with the experience of attorneys themselves, who have of late years been rather hardly put to it to contrive to do Chancery business without actually losing money. So far from being "a rich field for legal spoilers," the Court of Chancery has of late become a place where the alleged spoilers have themselves been spoiled by the operation of changes which superseded to a great extent the old scale of remuneration, but omitted, until this very week, to provide a new one. The notion of a solicitor "taking advantage of individual weakness," to originate proceedings out of which "he knows with certainty he will have a fortune," is a ludicrous exaggeration which would be of questionable propriety in a novel, and is quite unworthy of a grave review. The fact is, that even under the new scale of costs, which was published on Saturday last, it is very doubtful whether a solicitor will find it worth his while to undertake Chancery business where the subject-matter of the suit is under the value of £1,000. Perhaps he may not be willing to refuse such business when it comes to him without his seeking it, and the parties interested are in other respects valuable clients. But to talk of solicitors "worming their way into houses," and seeking for "discrepancy of temper and principle" in the members of a family, in order to embroil them in a Chancery suit, is to propagate fables too monstrous even for the cheapest and coarsest of romances. The truth we take to be, that London suits pay the solicitor badly, and country suits hardly pay him at all; and there is, consequently, a general reluctance on the part of provincial solicitors to engage in Chancery business. In fact, the small proportion of country as compared with London causes can only be accounted for on the supposition, that the provincial solicitor does "serve his own ends" by tempting his client not to litigate but to compromise or sleep upon his fancied claims.

The Westminster Reviewer evidently knows nothing at all of the actual state of that "terrible court" into which ravenous "attorneys" are supposed by him to lure or force their clients; and it cannot, therefore, be expected that the remedies he presently suggests will possess the smallest practical utility. And yet the article before us has evidently been written to serve as a word in season to our legislators on entering upon a session which promises to afford opportunity for law reform. The review, too, in which it appears is a publication of such high authority that a ready and confident writer may safely venture to handle in its pages a subject of which he knows next to nothing. The reputation of the whole work will cover the deficiencies of individual contributors; and, besides, as this reviewer has himself told us, people in general know little, and care less, about law reform, and they are ready enough to fall into the views of any one who will tell them as with authority that Chancery abuses may be simply and shortly cured, and that they only subsist thus long because the cunning and cupidity of the practitioners has been unwisely tolerated by an idle and indulgent legislature.

We do not ourselves presume to speak with the weight of the Westminster Review, but this is a subject upon which we do know something, and it is our duty to point out that as the evils complained of are to a great extent imaginary, so the remedy proposed for them would disappoint its patrons and produce very serious inconveniences. We shall not follow the reviewer into the details of the comparison he has drawn between the solicitor and the barrister. It is enough to say that he knows very little indeed of solicitors, and of the way in which they do their business; and that when he has acquainted himself more thoroughly with the subject upon which he undertakes to write, he will find reason to modify his conclusions. We believe, too, that when he has seen more of the actual working of legal business, he will recognise the soundness of the general conclusion, that the functions of the barrister and solicitor are different, and that the interests of the client will be best promoted by employing each branch of the profession in its own peculiar sphere. Undoubtedly we can imagine a case where the client might receive more cheaply and speedily from counsel direct the advice which he obtains through the intervention of a solicitor. But it must be borne in mind that it is the usual business of counsel to resolve difficult questions arising in some one department of the law which he makes his peculiar study. The solicitor is required to know the leading principles of every branch of law; and he must also possess an acquaintance with the world and its ways, which is more likely to be lost than gained by profound legal study. The Westminster Review most unfairly contrasts a barrister who does his work well with a solicitor who does his work badly; and thence infers that the barrister should, in general, undertake both duties. But is there no incompetence and no carelessness to be found among the members of the bar? Do instances never occur where serious miscarriage in the conduct of a cause has been avoided by the experience and caution of the solicitor? It is possible, we admit, that even a carefully drawn case may appear to a practised counsel to contain much matter that might have been omitted. But is it not equally true that counsel often present to judges statements and arguments that to long exercised discernment appear irrelavent? And if the story, as it comes from the solicitor, is unnecessarily prolix, how much more cumbrous and obscure is it likely to have been when narrated originally by the client? We do not deny that cases are sometimes drawn by careless or ignorant solicitors; nor will it, we suppose, be denied that opinions are sometimes given by barristers who deserve the same uncourtly epithets. It is not at all unlikely that barristers might be found to discharge most efficiently the duties of solicitors; and it is also very probable that we could name solicitors who would acquit themselves most creditably at the bar. But it is our opinion, nevertheless, that legal, like most other labour, will be best done by being divided. This opinion is generally held, even in countries where the two branches of the profession are not so distinctly separate as in England: and, we believe, that when the Westminster reviewer rests from writing and begins to think, he will see that the opinion is a sound one, and that the legal reforms for which he is so anxious are not likely to be facilitated by subverting it.

THE CIRCUITS.

In Pauli's History of England we read the following passage:—"In the winter of 1164, important measures of Government were taken, and comprised in what was called an assize. Their object was the keeping of the peace, and the execution of justice. This attribute of the royal office was, according to old customs shown by precise precedents, committed by Henry II. (who was often abroad) to his itinerant justices. All England was for this purpose divided into six districts, for each of which three judges were appointed." Hence it appears that our existing circuit arrangements can plead an antiquity of no less than 693 years—a longevity which, for so mere a question of detail and convenience, is almost supernatural. It would seem doubtful, however, whether this venerable institution is destined to arrive at an age just ten times as great as that which marks the limit at which human life becomes labour and sorrow; for we understand that a commission, appointed for the purpose of revising and improving it, is about to hold its first sitting. We shall look with some anxiety for their report, for the subject is one of very considerable interest to every member of the legal profession, as well as to the public at large. Pending their deliberations, we would submit a few remarks on the subject to the attention of those whom it may concern.

We are not of the number of those who think that the circuits and their appendages either can or ought to be abolished. County courts and stipendiary magistrates are excellent institutions; but we are firmly convinced that we cannot take too much pains to secure the very highest minds that are to be had for the decision of questions affecting life or permanent liberty, and the most important controversies as to property. Nor is it a slight advantage of the English as compared with the French administration of justice, that the same judges preside in all parts of the country, and that the same law prevails at York, Lewes, Norwich, and Carnarvon; whereas Bordeaux, Marseilles, Strasburg, Rouen, and many other cities are each the centre of a little district, governed by its own interpretations of the general law. For these, and for some other reasons, we cannot agree with those who look upon the assizes as an antiquated anomaly destined to give way to local jurisdictions. Whilst, however, we should wish to see the principle of the present arrangement retained, the details appear to us to be very ill contrived, and to require a great deal of modification. Of the eight circuits, into which England and Wales are divided, two—the Northern and the Home—are so much larger than the others, that they probably yield more business than all the rest put together. In these circuits, Liverpool and York in the one case, and Kingston or Guildford in the other, stand in much the same relation to the rest of the circuits, as the circuit itself occupies with respect to other circuits. The result of this is, that whilst the business is often over on the smaller circuits by the beginning of April, or the early part of August, it often lasts several weeks longer on the two larger ones. There can be little doubt that this concentration of business at a few points operates most injuriously on the bar, and through them on their clients. The immense quantity of business in the large circuits attracts to them almost all the abler members of the profession, and the consequence is, that the inhabitants of extensive districts of the country are deprived of the advantage of having advocates of any considerable ability, unless they are able to go to the enormous expense of a special retainer, or to adopt the almost equally unpleasant course of trying their causes in London, or at a distant assize town. It sometimes happens that one or two barristers of more than the average ability are found in a small circuit. Such men become Tritons amongst the minnows, and seriously disturb the administration of justice by overmatching those to whom they are habitually opposed. For these reasons we regard the inequality of the extent of the different circuits as a serious inconvenience.

There are, however, other defects in the existing state of things. Various circumstances have contributed of late years to diminish very considerably the amount of business done in many of the less important counties. We could mention towns where, in former times, twenty, thirty, or forty causes were tried at the assizes, at which a cause list of eight or ten is now considered heavy. It is impossible to see the apparatus which is brought to bear upon so small a matter without a smile. Two judges, twenty or thirty barristers, the high-sheriff and his chaplain, a small regiment of javelin men, and a curious troop of farmers and country squires come together twice a year in dingy old country towns, which are hardly ever enlivened by any other incident, to try, perhaps, two or three insignificant actions, and ten or twelve prisoners. We doubt whether, on any circuit except the Home and the Northern, so many as a hundred causes are tried on an average. On the Western Circuit last summer there were not more than thirty-five, and on the Midland about the same number. On the former there are six, and on the latter seven, assize towns, which would give to each place an average of less than six causes; and even this number is greatly too high, for a very large proportion of the civil business of the Western Circuit is transacted at Bristol, and of the Midland Circuit at Warwick. We learn from the report on Public Prosecutors, that in the year 1853 there were as many as eleven English counties in which not more than thirty-five prisoners were tried at the assizes, whilst the average number in ten Welsh counties was only thirteen and a half, or about seven prisoners at each assize. Between each of these small bits of employment come the intervals necessary for travelling, and for a commission day on which nothing is done. Surely this is a very clumsy and very wasteful arrangement. We are not prepared to state any detailed plan for its remedy; but some of the elements of such a plan seem obvious enough. Means might readily be found for diminishing the enormous amount of business with which the Home and Northern Circuits are encumbered. If the Oxford and Norfolk Circuits respectively terminated at Reading and Hertford, a considerable number of the London causes which are too late for the sittings after term, and are, consequently, entered for the Surrey Assizes, might be tried at those places; and the propriety of adding York to the Midland circuit has been repeatedly mooted. Something, also, might be done by extending the application of the principle recognised when Liverpool was created into an assize town. It is impossible to give any reason why there should be only one assize a year at Bristol; and it is perfectly absurd to continue to punish the town for the riots of 1831 by confining the assize to civil business. And it is very hard to say why Birmingham, with a quarter of a million of inhabitants, should not supersede Warwick, which can barely count 20,000. It is rather a pedantic adherence to old notions about the division of England into counties to include in the list of assize towns Oakham, Huntingdon, and Flint, and exclude from it Leeds, Manchester, and Merthyr. The following list, extracted from the report which we have already quoted, of the number of prisoners tried at the borough sessions of five towns at which the assizes are not held, and of five towns at which they are, is a singular legal curiosity. In five towns in which no assizes were held there were tried, at the borough sessions, in 1853, 1,501 prisoners; viz., at

Bristol	206
Leeds	305
Manchester	551
Portsmouth	113
Total ...	1,501

At five assize towns there were tried at the borough sessions for the same year, 94; viz., at

Devizes	3
Shrewsbury	25
Warwick	19
Winchester	24
Total ...	94

And the number of prisoners tried at the borough sessions at many of the other assize towns was so small as to be excluded from the return. The truth is, that the principle of having one assize town for each county is quite worn out. The number might be most advantageously diminished very considerably; or, if it were considered desirable to retain the principle of the local administration of justice, it would save much time and cost little money to try the prisoners and the causes of three or four counties at their respective county towns alternately, instead of presenting each of them every year with a lively illustration of the nursery rhyme about the four-and-twenty tailors who went to kill a snail, at the expense of the Bench, the Sheriff, and the Bar.

Legal News.

In the case of Kingsford v. Merry, a full report of the trial. with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, the case on appeal, and the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, has been published as a shilling pamphlet, and we have examined it with considerable curiosity to see how far the observations of the Chief Baron and Mr. Baron MARTIN, made in the Court of Exchequer on the 20th ult., would appear to be well founded. Those remarks were so very strong and positive as to induce us to found upon them some reflections which we certainly should not have made if we had been aware at the time of writing them that the defendant's legal advisers had published a contradiction as positive as the statement of the judges. We have, on the one hand, a declaration from the bench that "the case was presented to the Court of Error on a totally erroneous statement of the facts," and "was in itself utterly unintelligible;" and, on the other hand, the assertion of the defendant's attorney, on the authority of his three counsel, that "the case fully and correctly set forth the whole of the facts proved on the trial, and fully and clearly raises all the points relied on by the defendant." Now it certainly appears to us, on a careful comparison of the case with the evidence in the pamphlet, that the former does correctly state the substance of the latter, and that any difficulty which may occur to a reader of the case arises from the deficiency or obscurity of the evidence itself, rather than from any carelessness or want of skill in the counsel who epitomised it for the Court of Error.

The present position of this case furnishes a striking example of the extent to which legal ingenuity may complicate a tolerably plain question when the amount in dispute is large enough, or the passions of the litigants and the sympathy of their friends are warmly enough excited, to call forth the utmost resources of forensic skill and subtlety. The leading counsel for the plaintiffs at the trial was Mr., now Baron, BRAMWELL, and we may presume that the action was brought under his advice. He says, in his opening address to the jury, "by the law of the land, a person who obtains goods under false pretences, not under a contract of sale, but by false pretences, acquires no property in them, and cannot give to any one else a better title than he has himself." This, we apprehend, is no very abstruse or dubious proposition of law, and it is exactly the same as enunciated by Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN in the Exchequer Chamber. The plaintiffs' counsel stated, and proved by his witnesses, the facts from which he drew the inference that ANDERSON did obtain the goods "under false pretences, and not under a contract of sale;" and these facts are by no means complicated, nor does there appear much doubt as to the soundness of the conclusion drawn from them by Mr. BRAMWELL at the trial, and by the Court of Exchequer Chamber on the appeal. We are even disposed to wonder how a different view of these facts could possibly have been adopted by the Chief Baron at the trial, and by the Court of Exchequer on the discussion of the rule. If, however, we had heard the argument of the defendant's counsel, we might possibly have to confess that there was more to be said for their view of the question than we had thought. But, however the complications of the case may have been brought about, it is certain that Mr. BRAMWELL at the beginning of the pamphlet before us, and Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN at the end of it, agree entirely both in the aspect which they put upon the facts, and in the law which they apply to them. It would, therefore, appear that this litigation has arisen rather out of opposition to the policy or justice of the law than from the inherent difficulties of the loyal question. "Hard cases," it has been said recently, "make bad law;" and the ruling of the Chief Baron in Kingsford v. Merry seems to prove that they also some times lead to inconsiderate conclusions on points of fact.

The feeling in the city of the injustice of the decision against Mr. MERRY will, probably, be heightened by a perusal of the evidence before us. It was difficult to understand on reading the report of the case in Banco and in the Court of Error how merchants of ordinary prudence could have been imposed upon, as the plaintiffs were, by ANDERSON. But the negligence with which we had supposed Messrs. KINGSFORD and SWINFORD to be chargeable falls very far short of that which was actually proved against them. It will be remembered that ANDERSON obtained from LEASK, a broker, two delivery orders, on the pretext that he wanted them to enable him to inspect the goods. He then took these orders to the plaintiffs, told them that he had purchased the goods from LEASK, and requested them to deliver the goods to his order at Custom-house Quay. There was a conflict of testimony between LEASK and the plaintiff KINGSFORD as to the indorsement upon one of the two warrants. LEASK swore that he had indorsed both warrants "to be delivered at Custom-house Quay to my order;" but one only of the warrants produced by KINGSFORD, as received by him from ANDERSON, had this indorsement, and the only name upon the back of the other was "THOMAS BROOMHALL." But taking the condition of these documents as described by either witness, it did appear to us remarkable that KINGSFORD should have accepted ANDERSON'S statement without inquiry. This, however, he did, and ordered the goods to be deposited at the wharf in the name of ANDERSON. This was on Nov. 21, 1853. By a piece of good fortune which might be wanting to more careful men, the plaintiffs' clerk ordered the goods to be deposited in their own names, and not in that of ANDERSON; and on Nov. 26, the plaintiffs received a letter from LEASK, complaining that the goods had not been delivered to his order, and thus shewing that the story told by ANDERSON five days before was false. By the happy mistake of the plaintiffs' clerk, the goods were still within their control, and, if they had read and attended to LEASK'S letter, ANDERSON'S fraud would have been discovered in time, and the loss and litigation would have been avoided. But on Nov. 29 ANDERSON called on KINGSFORD and represented to him that the goods had not been transferred into his name, and thereupon the transfer was made and the opportunity afforded to obtain a bonâ fide advance upon the goods from MERRY. KINGSFORD stated on his cross-examination that "he never knew of LEASK'S notice" till sometime afterwards. He thought it could not have been delivered at his office, but, if it were, "his partner might have opened it." The plaintiffs, it must be admitted, shewed gross negligence, while the defendant's conduct appears to have been perfectly regular and business-like; and we cannot, therefore, wonder that indignation has been expressed at the judgment which condemns the latter to bear the loss.

The long delayed Order of Court, fixing the new scales of Chancery costs, appeared last Saturday, and it will be found with the schedules in another part of this day's impression. We cannot congratulate the profession on the result of this long suspense. The scales of fees do not, we believe, differ in any material respect from those which had been drawn up as far back as last July, and as they only apply to business done subsequent to the date of the order, it follows that serious loss has been sustained, while the question has remained unsettled, without any adequate compensation in the extent of the improvement now introduced. Whether it is possible to do business at a profit under the lower scale will best be proved by actual experience of its working, and it appears desirable that the trial should be fairly made, and that the solicitors should reserve their complaints until they are perfectly convinced that the evidence in support of them is overwhelming. The impression, we believe, is still afloat in the public mind that a Chancery suit is a mine of wealth to the fortunate solicitor engaged in it. The professional view of this question is certainly different from that popularly entertained, for we believe that some solicitors do seriously doubt whether it will be worth their while to undertake Chancery business when the amount litigated shall be under £1,000.

We trust it will appear, from the forthcoming report of the Committee on the Registration of Titles to Land, that the subject of conveyancing costs has been looked at from the point of view which the profession has so long contended for. The leading principle to be adopted in all cases we take to be, that regard should be had to the actual skill and labour employed, and responsibility incurred, and not merely to the length or multiplicity of the written forms. It was certainly expected, when the taxing masters in Chancery were appointed, that this principle would be applied to Chancery costs much more extensively than has ever yet been done, or appears to be now contemplated. The salaries of the taxing masters were fixed, as we apprehend, upon the supposition that they would find a wide scope for the exercise of discretion, and were not to be confined to the merely mechanical office of applying one or more schedules without discrimination in all cases.

COST OF A PROSECUTION.

A bankrupt named Lillicrap, on coming before the Court of Bankruptcy, was ordered to be indicted criminally in respect to the concealment of property of the value of about £60.

Mr. BAGLEY, on behalf of the solicitor who conducted the prosecution, now applied for an order for the payment of the costs,—viz., £317.

Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN inquired how a prosecution at the Old Bailey for a simple offence could have cost so large a sum? What number of witnesses had been called, and had the bill been taxed?

Mr. BAGLEY.—There were twenty-three witnesses, and a great deal (£42) was struck off the bill on taxation at the Crown-Office. Some of the witnesses came from Brighton. The trial of Palmer was fixed for the same time. The witnesses had to be sent back to Brighton in consequence of the long time that trial occupied.

The COMMISSIONER could not imagine on what principle of taxation the Crown-Office proceeded that so large an amount as £311 could have been allowed in such a case. He should not make any order for payment without requiring certain affidavits. There were twenty-three witnesses, but he was informed that one witness who could have furnished material evidence—evidence that might have occasioned the bankrupt's conviction—was not called.

Mr. BAGLEY urged that not less than £170 were actual costs out of pocket; and that, the prosecution having been directed by this court, it would be hard to mulct the attorney of his costs.

His HONOUR thought it did not follow that costs must be paid in such a case as a matter of course. Suppose an attorney were to conduct a case carelessly, or in some other manner so that the conviction might fail, could it be said that the attorney ought to be paid his costs? He should require affidavits. Those affidavits must explicitly state the cause of the witness referred to not having been called.

Mr. BAGLEY urged that the assignees had not desired to indict the bankrupt, but to leave his case to the jurisdiction of this court, and that it was by his Honour's especial desire and direction that the indictment was preferred.

His HONOUR said he would consider the case when the affidavits had been laid before him.

TREATMENT OF A JURY.

The jury who were locked up on Monday night on account of their not being able to agree upon their verdict in the case of Abraham Missenden, were next morning again brought into court.

A jury in a criminal case are not allowed to have any refreshment or fire, with the exception of candle-light, but with a view to remedy as far as was practicable the inconvenience to which they must necessarily be subjected by being confined in such inclement weather without any necessary comforts, the Under-Sheriff directed that the jury should be placed in the dining-room, in which there had been two large fires the whole of the evening, and a great number of lamps were also placed in it, and this to some extent increased the temperature. The jurymen earnestly entreated to be allowed to have some refreshment, but they were informed that the court could not legally grant their request.

In answer to the Recorder, the Foreman, in an emphatic manner, said there was not the slightest chance of their agreeing.

A surgeon was then sworn, and he stated that he had visited the jury that morning, and he was of opinion that it would endanger the life of one of them if he was kept any longer without nourishment.

The RECORDER said that upon this statement he felt himself justified in discharging the jury without giving a verdict.

THE CASE OF FANNY KAY.

Late on Monday evening Mr. Clark, the clerk of the Central Criminal Court, received a communication from Mr. Baron Martin, directing him to make out an order upon Sir Richard Mayne for the Turkish bonds that were found in the possession of Pearce, one of the bullion robbers, to be delivered up to Mr. Rees, the solicitor to the South Eastern Railway, in trust for the benefit of Fanny Kay and her child.

STATISTICS OF CRIME.

A blue-book, issued on Tuesday, gives tables showing the number of criminal offenders in the year 1855. A considerable decrease in the number committed for trial is noticeable, which must be attributed as much to the changes in the law as to the actual decrease of offences. The Criminal Justice Act of 1855, and the Juvenile Offenders' Act extend the powers of summary conviction, and so cut off the supply of candidates for trial by jury. There were 25,972 commitments for trial in 1855, against 29,359 in 1854, and 27,057 in 1853. There was a decrease of 22·3 per cent. in Middlesex, of 20·3 and 11·6 per cent. in Surrey and Kent, 20·2 in Monmouth, 19·2 in Cheshire, 9·4 in Stafford, 8.7 in Lancashire, 7.6 in Warwick, and 4·0 in Yorkshire. The decrease was not less remarkable in the agricultural counties, as in Suffolk, Dorset, Somerset, Berks, Lincoln, and Norfolk. An increase occurred in Bedford, Bucks, Derby, Durham (21·9 per cent.), Northumberland, Notts, Northampton, Southampton, and Worcester. Offences against the person show a slight increase for murder, but the frightful increase of 88 per cent. in malicious stabbing and wounding. The newly defined offence of "assaulting and inflicting bodily harm" has risen 10 per cent. Violent offences against property have slightly, and ordinary offences against property very materially, decreased. In coining and offences against currency there is a decrease, but the forgery of notes has increased. Of the 25,972 culprits committed for trial in 1855, 5,967 were acquitted and discharged, 34 found to be insane, and 19,971 convicted. Of these 19,971 convicts 50 were sentenced to death, 323 transported, 2,041 condemned to penal servitude, 17,397 imprisoned, and 160 fined or whipped. 11 persons were condemned to the scaffold for murder, 10 for attempts to murder, 20 for the crime of sodomy, 2 for burglary with violence, 5 for robbery and wounding, and 2 for arson of dwelling-houses. Only 7 out of the 50 were actually executed, and all of these were murderers. The maximum number of executions of late years has not exceeded 15 (in 1849), and the minimum has been 5 (in 1854).

ATTENDANCE OF SOLICITORS IN COURT.

On Friday, the 30th ult., an application was made that a cause in which a decree had been taken the day before in the absence of either counsel or solicitor for the defendant, might be re-heard, the brief of counsel, which had been sent on Wednesday night, having remained in his letter-box until Friday morning, while the solicitor had been summoned to attend a funeral in the country.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WOOD took occasion to observe that solicitors seemed to think it no part of their business to attend this court. It was a circumstance which had struck him very painfully, and he had not intended to let it pass unnoticed, that he had recently heard no less than seven causes in this court without the attendance of a single solicitor. This was extremely to be reprehended, and it was at least to be expected that when a cause came on to be heard, either the counsel or the solicitor should be in attendance. As to the particular application, the defendant was at the mercy of the plaintiff, who was entitled, if he wished it, to hold the decree.

THE PROVINCE OF COUNSEL.

The following is an extract of a letter dated Jan. 26, which appeared in the Daily News:—According to the recently published report of the trial of a breach of promise of marriage case, before Mr. Baron Bramwell, reflections were cast by Mr. Edwin James, counsel for the defendant, upon the plaintiff's attorney, as having brought into court a case which ought not to have been brought there. Upon which, Mr. Serjeant Thomas, counsel for plaintiff, says: "As an imputation has been cast on the attorney in this case, may I observe that this action was brought by the advice of my learned friend Mr. Charnock and myself?" And then this follows: Mr. Baron Bramwell—"You are not justified in making any such statement; it is not as counsel your province to do so." Mr. Serjeant Thomas excused himself by saying that the attorney for the plaintiff had been attacked. Mr. Baron Bramwell—"Let the attorney submit to it then."

COMMON SERJEANT.

On Saturday Jan. 31, Mr. T. Chambers, the newly elected Common Serjeant, was sworn into office.

CHANCERY FEES.

Record and Writ Clerks' Office,—Feb. 4, 1857.

All certificates for the lower scale of fees must be signed by the solicitors in the causes, themselves, and not by their clerks.

It is requested that, for the convenience of filing, the certificate may be written on half a sheet of foolscap paper, with sufficient space at the top for the distinctive mark and date of filing.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

Decisions upon the construction of wills, inartificially drawn, where it is impossible to arrive at the precise intention of the testator, are mainly useful as exhibiting the leaning of courts of equity. Thus, the court, when it can by a reasonable construction prevent intestacy, is always disposed to do so; again, it has been said always to lean towards vesting. Glyn v. Glyn, 5 W. R. 241 is an illustration in point. In that case, the testator by his will bequeathed property, to belong to and "be given up" to his child or children on attaining the age of twenty-five years; and he provided that if his eldest son should "hereafter" come to the inheritance of his (the testator's) father's or eldest brother's landed property, in such case his (the eldest son's) share was to be "made over" to his brothers and sisters. There were several children of the testator, and the eldest son had attained the age of twenty-five years, and had not inherited the said landed property, the testator's eldest brother being still alive, and in possession of part as tenant for life, of other part as tenant in tail, and of other part as tenant in fee simple. Vice-Chancellor Stuart, before whom the case was heard, decided that the eldest son, notwithstanding the provision, was entitled to the share absolutely, his Honour holding it to be inconsistent with the language of the will, that if the money was ever paid to him, it should be paid back by him. By holding that the words of the provision applied only to the event of his succeeding to the property before the time when the share provided for him by the will actually got into his hands, the Vice-Chancellor considered he made the best attempt at giving consistency to the will.

Burton v. Powers, 5 W. R. 242, and Lewis v. Hopkins, Id. 243, also turned upon the construction of wills. In the former case, the law respecting indefinite devises was very clearly stated by Vice-Chancellor Wood. The testator there, by his will dated in 1822, devised a farm to his wife for her life, and after her decease he gave the same to his "son, J. W., subject to the payment out of the aforesaid premises of the sum of £50 to be paid to" M. N. In a subsequent part of the will, he ordered the rents and interest that "is behind due and unpaid, shall go and be paid to that person I have left the estates and property respectively to." The question was, did J. W. the son take the farm absolutely, or only for an estate for life? "Nothing is better settled," says Mr. Jarman in his work on Wills, p. 219, "than that a devise of messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments (not estate), without words of limitation, occurring in a will which is not subject to the newly enacted rules of testamentary construction, confers on the devisee an estate for life only, notwithstanding the testator may have commenced his will with a declaration of his intention to dispose of his whole estate, or may have given a nominal legacy to his heir, or may have declared an intention wholly to disinherit him, or the will may contain an antecedent devise to the heir for life of the testator's property which is the subject of dispute;" and in many other cases equally strong. But though there have been many such decisions, and the rule of the court is therefore thoroughly established, there has been always an inclination on the part of judges to change, by implication, indefinite devises to fee simple estates, where such implication could fairly be resorted to; thus, where the devisee was directed to pay his testator's debts, or a gross sum, even a future or contingent debt, though the possibility of loss were out of the question if the devisee only took a life estate, the devisee has been held to take an estate in fee. In wills made since the 1st January, 1838 (7 Will. 4, & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 28), a devise unaccompanied by words of limitation is "construed to pass the fee simple or other the whole estate or interest which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." In the present case, the will having been made in 1822, the old rule applied. The Vice-Chancellor considered that the words of the will shewed no intention to give more than a life estate, and that this case was distinguishable from the ordinary class of cases in which implication of an intention to pass the fee is raised, because as in Denn v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 356, the devisee took nothing until the payment was made, the charge being independent of his interest. His Honour therefore held that J. W. the son took but a life estate.

In Lewis v. Hopkins, a testator by his will gave leaseholds to trustees for a term of thirty years, to commence from his decease, upon trust to receive the rents during the term, and thereout to pay his debts, and to accumulate the surplus until the legacies therein given should be satisfied; and subject thereto, he gave the said leaseholds to the said trustees upon trust to permit his son B. to receive the rents for his own use until the son of B. (if he should have a son) should attain twenty-one, remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, but nevertheless to permit such son to receive the rents during his life, and after his decease, to the heirs male of such son; and for want of such issue, to the second and every other son of B., and their respective heirs male; and for default of such issue, then upon trust for his son L., and with similar limitations to those of B.; and in default of issue of L., to the son of the body of A., a daughter, until he should attain twenty-one years of age, and then with subsequent limitations similar to those of B. B. and L. having both died without issue, the questions were whether the limitation to the son of A. was not void for remoteness; and if not, then whether he took an estate for life or absolutely. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley said, that, if the subject of this gift was real estate, and there had been a son of B., he would have taken an estate tail, and therefore where the subject was personalty, as in this case, he took absolutely. If there were no son of B., and there were a son of L., the son of L. would take in the same way; and in default of issue of both B. and L., the son of A. the daughter took absolutely. The Lord Chancellor agreed with his Honour's view, having no doubt that the limitation to the son of A. took effect upon the deaths of B. and L. without issue, and that their deaths took place within the time when the limitation would be good. The principal point insisted upon by the appellant, was that the life estate to the son of A. was an equitable estate (the words of gift being to "permit and suffer him to receive," &c.) and that the remainder was a legal estate, so that if the property were freehold the rule in Shelley's case would not apply, and in the present case, by analogy to that rule, the life estate and remainder could not coalesce, and therefore that the son of A. could only take a life estate. The Lord Chancellor was of opinion that if the analogy of freehold estate were to be considered, the son of A., under the gift, would take a legal estate for life, with a legal inheritance.

Baker v. Pugh, 5 W. R. 239, was another case involving the construction of a will. £5,000 stock was vested in trustees upon trust as to the residue of the dividends after paying an annuity, and after the decease of the annuitant, then as to the whole of such dividends, during the minority of C.M.B., to apply so much thereof as they should deem sufficient for the maintenance and education of C.M.B., and after she should attain twenty-one, to pay her the dividends for her life, with further trusts as to the corpus of the fund; and from and after the decease of C.M.B., in case she should have been married, then as to the said £5,000 stock, and the dividends thenceforth to arise therefrom, in trust for her children; and in default of children, if C.M.B. attained twenty-one years, as she should appoint; and in default of appointment, or in case she should die under twenty-one years, then in trust for the settlor's next of kin. During the minority and discoverture of C.M.B., the trustees were authorised to invest surplus dividends of the fund to "which the said C.M.B. shall be entitled," and to pay the same to C.M.B. on her attaining the age of twenty-one years. C.M.B. died under that age, and unmarried, and there was a large surplus, consisting of accumulations of unapplied income. The question was as to this surplus,—whether it should go to the next of kin of the settlor, or to the legal personal representative of C.M.B., or whether it was altogether undisposed of, and, therefore resulted, in which case the executors of the settlor claimed to be entitled. The V. C. Kindersley held that it was undisposed of, and that there was, therefore, a resulting trust in favour of the legal personal representatives of the settlor. The grounds of his Honour's decision are fully stated in the report of his judgment, p. 240.

A new point has been raised by the case of Crowther v. Crowther, 5 W. R. 237, before the Master of the Rolls. It is a well-settled doctrine, that a plaintiff, who is in a position to enforce his rights by ejectment, cannot come into a court of equity for relief until he has established his title at law, the Court of Chancery always refusing to try a mere question of ejectment. There is, however, an exception to this rule when the plaintiff is an infant who has been in possession by himself or his guardian, and has been ousted by an intruder upon the estate. In such cases, the court holds that the intruder constitutes himself a sort of bailiff for the infant, and will decree an account of rents and profits in the same way as between an infant and his regularly-constituted guardian or bailiff. In the present case, the infant was not alleged to have been in possession, but he claimed an estate in which an adverse interest was claimed by the defendant under an alleged agreement between him and the father and predecessor in title of the infant. The defendant had taken possession under his alleged title. For the plaintiff it was contended, that infancy alone was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to maintain the bill; but the Master of the Rolls held that the exceptional cases referred to applied only where there had been an actual invasion of the infant's possession, and that where the plaintiff had never been in possession the general rule applied alike to infants and adults. Upon this ground a demurrer was allowed.

There have been some useful points of practice recently decided. In Duffort v. Arrowsmith, 5 W. R., p. 241, the L. C. ordered an administration suit, in which there was no decree, to be transferred from the V. C. Kindersley's Court to V. C. Stuart's, there having been a decree for the administration of the same estate in the latter court. It appeared to be clearly right that proceedings should be stayed in the suit in which no decree had been made, and the only question was which judge should make the order—whether V. C. Stuart, who had made a decree for administration in the other suit, or V. C. Kindersley, in whose court the suit was, in which it was required to stay proceedings. The L. C. thought the proper course was to transfer the last-mentioned suit to that branch of the court where a decree had been made.

Reed v. Barton, 5 W.R. 240, is a case which, fortunately, will not be much required as a precedent. It but rarely happens that an application is made to the court to take off the file a document purporting to be an answer. Reed v. Barton however, informs us of the circumstances under which the court will make such an order.

It is an inflexible rule in interpleader bills that the plaintiff always must annex to his bill an affidavit that he is not in collusion with any other party. If the affidavit should be wanting, the bill is demurrable: and in Wood v. Lyme, 4 De G. & Sma. 16, the demurrer was allowed, though an affidavit to that effect was made by the plaintiff's solicitor. Gibbs v. Gibbs, 5 W. R. 243, perhaps renders the rule still more strict. It was there decided by V. C. Wood that where a bill had been exhibited by a firm consisting of four partners, it was not sufficient that the affidavit of no collusion had been made by one of the partners on behalf of himself and the other members of the firm. The affidavit should have been made by all of them, unless some satisfactory reason could be given why they could not all join.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ATTORNEY—LOAN BY, ON DAMAGES RECOVERED—CHAMPERTY AND MAINTENANCE.

Simpson and Another v. Lamb, 5 W. R. Q.B. 227.

This was a rule obtained by the defendant, calling on the plaintiff to show cause why satisfaction in the above action should not be entered, on payment of the difference between the amount of the judgment in that cause in the Queen's Bench, and the amount of a judgment obtained by the defendant against the plaintiff in another action, in the Common Pleas. The action in the Queen's Bench was commenced on behalf of the plaintiffs by a Mr. Scott, on the 1st December, 1854, and on the 26th February, 1855, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs (damages £50), and judgment accordingly was signed on the 28th March in the same year, for £85 4s. A day or two before the trial of the cause a private arrangement had been entered into between Scott and a Mr. Shaen, another attorney, to the effect that the latter should have the future conduct of the proceedings, but that in order to avoid the expense of a change of attorney, Scott's name should remain on the record; and it was in his name that final judgment was ultimately signed. On the day after the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs requested Shaen, as a personal favour to themselves, to advance to them the amount of the verdict they had gained; and he accordingly advanced the £50, and gave notice on the same day to the defendant that he had a claim on the judgment to that amount.

The action in the Court of Common Pleas was one in which the same plaintiffs were nonsuited, and in which the same defendant signed judgment accordingly against them, with £71 1s. 6d. costs. In this last action Mr. Shaen was not concerned at all.

The court made the rule absolute; and they did so on the ground that at the time of the advance of the £50 made by Shaen to the plaintiffs, he was—though not nominally on the record, yet really and substantially—their attorney in the cause, and that therefore the transaction was, in truth, a purchase by the attorney in the cause of the subject matter of it, pendente lite, because the plaintiffs therein were in need of the money; and that such a purchase was against the policy of the law, and consequently void. It followed from this view that Mr. Shaen had no claim as purchaser, which would prevent the set-off of the amount recovered in the other action as sought by the rule. The court held, however, that such set-off could only be made subject to the lien of the plaintiffs' attorney for the costs of both causes.

In the argument of this case it was attempted to bring the advance made to his client by Mr. Shaen within the provisions of the act of Parliament respecting maintenance and champerty, although the transaction was confessedly bonâ fide in its character. Lord Campbell very properly disposed of this ground, urged in support of the rule, as soon as it was advanced; and also of another point made by the defendant—viz., that the right of setting off one judgment against another is necessarily incident to the parties to a suit;—for, as was observed by the court, this setting off of cross judgments is, in truth, allowed only when such a course may be equitably taken; and the right yields, for example, in all cases to the lien of the plaintiff's attorney (See Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853 (Pr.), r. 63, re-enacting R. H. 2. W. 4. s. 93; Domatt v. Helyer, 2 D. P. C. 540; Caldell v. Smart, 4 D. P. C. 76; Cowell v. Betteley, 10 Bing. 432; Brearey v. Kemp. 3 W. R. (Bail-court) 575 and other cases).

So much for the case itself; but it may not be uninteresting to examine a little into the real nature of champerty. "Champertors," says a gloss to the statute 33 Edward 1, s. 2, as printed in Ruffhead's edition of the statutes, "be they that move pleas and suits, or cause to be moved, either by their own procurement or by others, and sue them at their proper costs for to have part of the lands in value, or part of the gains." And champerty is called by Blackstone, "the purchasing of a suit or right of suing;" and he remarks, that this practice is so much abhorred by the law of England as to be one main reason why a chose in action is not assignable at common law. There are several instances in the books—even in modern times—in which the true nature of this, and of the cognate offence of maintenance have been discussed. Thus, in Williams v. Protheroe, 5 Bing. 309, it was held that an agreement between a vendor and vendee of an estate to the effect that the vendee should be entitled to any sum he could recover in the vendor's name against an occupier for dilapidations, on the terms of bearing himself the expenses of the suits, was not void as being tainted with champerty. On the other hand, in Stanley v. Jones, 7 Bing. 369, an agreement by A. B. to communicate to C. D., who had a dispute with E. F., certain information material to the decision thereof, on the condition of receiving from C. D. a certain portion of the sum of money to be recovered by means of such evidence, was held to be illegal, as savouring clearly of the offence under consideration. So also in Bell v. Smith, 5 B. & C. 188, where an action was brought at the instance of A. B. and three others, and on its being discovered that they had not sufficient evidence to support it, A. B. and the other parties really interested joined in a release of their respective interests to the nominal plaintiffs in the suit, in order that the objection of interest, under the former rule of evidence, might not prevent them from being called as witnesses, it was said by Mr. Justice Bailey that it was difficult to put a stronger instance of maintenance or champerty.

Finally, In re Masters, 1 Har. & Woll., p. 348, an attorney entered into an agreement with his client to secure him from all costs of proceedings to be instituted in his behalf, on the condition of such attorney's retaining half of whatever should be recovered. This Mr. Justice Coleridge held to be substantially an agreement for maintenance.

EVIDENCE—STEALING—RECENT POSSESSION.

Regina v. Wilson, 5 W. R. (C. C. R.) 251.

J. W. was tried on an indictment for stealing and receiving certain articles of dress. T. W. (the prosecutor) proved that his house was broken into on Sunday, Nov. 2nd, and that the articles in question were then taken out of the same. S. proved that he bought those articles at a fair price, from J. W., in a public-house two days afterwards, when about thirty persons were in the room, and with no attempt at concealment on the part of J. W. On being apprehended, J. W. said the articles in question were brought to him by C. and D., and were sold by him "on the spree," and that his landlady would say so if asked. C. was subsequently tried and convicted of taking other articles at the same time from J. W.'s house. D. was discharged by the magistrates for want of evidence. The prosecutor did not call either C. or D., or the landlady. Counsel for J. W. submitted there was no case to go to the jury, but this was overruled, and J. W. was convicted—the question, however, being reserved for the Court of Criminal Appeal, whether, under the above circumstances—resting solely on the recent possession—it lay on the prosecution to call as witnesses C. or D., or the landlady, to whom the prisoner referred to account for such his possession.

The court held there was evidence for the jury, and affirmed the conviction, but intimated that the trial was a very unsatisfactory one.

EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION.

Regina v. Reany & Reddish, 5 W. R. (C. C. R.) 252.

This case turned upon a question which has often been the subject of debate, viz., what is the nature of that apprehension of death which renders the declaration of one who has since died admissible as evidence: for (as it has been sometimes expressed) an unoriginal relation may be admitted when the hearsay was made by the declarant on the point of death. Respecting these dying declarations, the rule has generally been understood to be, that, before they can be received, it must be shown to the satisfaction of the judge that at the time they were made the declarant was in actual danger of impending death; that he thoroughly understood the danger he was in; and that death, accordingly, ensued shortly after. But it has also been understood that the admissibility or non-admissibility depends rather upon the impression of the declarant as to his immediately impending dissolution, than on the space of time which actually elapsed before the event took place; and that consequently the length of that space was only secondarily important as one test of the nature of the impression which existed in the mind of the deceased. It has also been understood that a belief in the mind of the declarant that, though no final recovery would take place, yet that death might perhaps not be immediate, rendered the declaration inadmissible.

It is apprehended that the present case is not inconsistent with the above view of the law on this subject. It appears that the deceased appended to his statement put in, after his death, as evidence, these words: "I have made this statement believing I shall not recover," and he died ten days afterwards. It was impossible he should have recovered, owing to the nature of the injuries he had received; but, on the same day that he made the declaration, he said, in answer to a question, "I have seen the surgeon to-day, and he has given me some little hope that I am better, but I do not myself think I shall ultimately recover." All the judges sitting in the Court of Criminal appeal held that the declaration so made was admissible, as being, within the proper meaning of the rule, made under the apprehension of impending death.

RE KING, AN ATTORNEY.

This was a rule to re-admit an attorney who had been struck off the roll of this court in the year 1845, in consequence of a conviction of a conspiracy to defraud.

While the argument was proceeding, Lord CAMPBELL said the most satisfactory course would be that the affidavits on both sides should be referred to the Master, who should examine into the facts, and report theron to the Court; and this suggestion was adopted.

RE JOSEPH BERRY FULLER, AN ATTORNEY.

Mr. HUDDLESTON moved for a rule to re-admit an attorney named Joseph Berry Fuller, who had been struck off the roll of this court in the year 1853, for misconduct, in coming to an agreement with a man who kept a barber's shop to carry on business together for the recovery of small debts. When the matter was before the court in 1853, their lordships were about to sentence Mr. Fuller to imprisonment for three months, but at the request of the attorney himself, who was suffering from a disease of the heart, and was apprehensive that imprisonment might cause his death, the court commuted the sentence of three months' imprisonment, and ordered him to be struck off the roll. The applicant in his affidavit now stated that, from his confusion and excitement at the time, he omitted to ask the court to commute the imprisonment for suspension; and, after expressing great contrition for his offence, and promising good conduct for the future, he implored the court to allow him to be re-admitted.

Mr. ATHERTON, Q.C., said he was instructed, on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, to show cause against the rule in the first instance. The learned counsel contended that, according to the 32nd section of the statute (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), an attorney who allowed an unqualified person to practise in his name was liable to be struck off the roll, and was for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor.

Lord CAMPBELL said the agreement which the attorney had entered into was a most culpable one; and if such an offence were brought before the court, the court would suspend the party for a long period. The party had agreed to give the other a share of his profits; but though that was a great offence, it was not the specific offence mentioned in the enactment. On the whole, considering his repentance and the promises the attorney had made of unsullied conduct for the future, the court thought he might be restored.

The other judges concurred.—Rule absolute to re-admit.

RE LAWRENCE LEVI, AN ATTORNEY.

This was a rule to strike an attorney, named Lawrence Levi, off the roll of this court for perjury committed in an affidavit of increase.

Mr. SERJEANT SHEE and Mr. PETERSDORFF showed cause against the rule, on the ground that the charges were false, and were made from vindictive motives on the part of a foreigner who had attempted to extort money from the attorney.

Lord CAMPBELL appealed to Mr. Hodgson, who appeared to support the rule on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, whether he could call on the court to decide this question on affidavits.

Mr. HODGSON said the charges were supported by several witnesses, whereas the denial came from the defendant alone; and he submitted, the case might be referred to the Master, who could examine into the facts.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that if the attorney had been guilty of perjury, or subornation of perjury, he might be indicted, and, on a conviction, the court would take notice of it.

Mr. HODGSON said the parties had already gone before a magistrate on that charge; but as there was only one witness to each assignment of perjury, the magistrate would not proceed.

Lord CAMPBELL thought the rule ought to be discharged.

Mr. Serjeant SHEE then applied for the costs.

Lord CAMPBELL said there was sufficient ground for the application for the rule, and he would abstain from saying more. His lordship refused the application.

Rule discharged, without costs.

EXPARTE WILLIAMS.

Mr. PULLING applied on behalf of a Mr. Williams for an order directing the master of the court to receive and inroll his articles of clerkship; the articles had been executed in August, but when they were tendered to the master for inrolment he refused to receive them, as they had not been stamped. The applicant contended that the master had no discretion, but was bound to receive them when tendered; the law allowed him six months to have them stamped, and the duty was a matter between him and the Treasury.

Mr. Justice ERLE was afraid that if he granted this application it would become a practice not to have the articles stamped until the conclusion of the clerkship; a party would get his articles inrolled, and refrain from paying the duty on the chance of changing his intention, so that if he did not eventually apply for admission, he need never pay the duty.

Mr. PULLING said that evil could not arise, for it was discretionary with the Treasury to allow the articles to be stamped, and a party would not expose himself to the risk of a refusal.

Mr. Justice ERLE would look into the acts of Parliament, as the question was an important one.

IN THE MATTER OF HOLT, AN ARTICLED CLERK.

Mr. HODGSON appeared to show cause against a rule calling on the examiners of the court to proceed with the examination of Mr. James John Holt; the examiners had no wish to oppose Mr. Holt; but, under the circumstances of the case, they did not think it right to act without having the facts brought before the court. There was no question that Mr. Holt had duly served under his articles, and he had given the requisite notices for the last examination; but on the 17th of January he received an intimation that he would not be permitted to present himself, as it had been discovered that in 1842 he had been found guilty on an indictment for conspiracy. In support of this rule he had made an affidavit, in which he detailed the whole transaction. He stated that in 1842 he was under articles to Mr. Spiller, who was instructed by a person named Gordon to issue a writ against a Mr. Hevers. After the writ was issued, Gordon said he wished to have it served by a man of his own, and obtained possession of it for that purpose. The defendant did not appear; and on Gordon's statement that the writ had been served, an appearance was entered for him under the statute. Gordon also undertook to serve the notice of declaration. The defendant did not plead, so judgment was marked and damages assessed on a writ of inquiry. Hevers was then arrested on a ca. sa., but at once applied to be discharged, and to set aside the whole proceedings, on the ground that he had never been served with the writ or notice. He soon after, without any preliminary investigation by a magistrate, preferred an indictment before the grand jury against Spiller, Holt, Gordon, and another man, for a conspiracy. Mr. Holt stated in his affidavit that after the bills were found he received an intimation from the prosecutor that no evidence would be offered against him or his master, and therefore made no preparations for his defence. On the day of trial he went into court, and was most surprised to find that the case against himself was being proceeded with. Mr. Spiller was acquitted, but he and the other were found guilty. He at once determined to apply for a new trial (the indictment had been removed to this court by certiorari), but being assured by the prosecutor that no further proceedings would be taken against him, he abandoned the idea, not thinking that the verdict would ever affect his future prospects. Judgment had never been entered against him, and he swore most positively that he was entirely innocent of the offence with which he had been charged. A number of other affidavits had been filed, giving him the highest character.

Mr. E. JAMES, in support of the rule, was not called on.

Mr. Justice ERLE said that a person who had been guilty of the offence charged against Mr. Holt was certainly not fit to be admitted an attorney; but the fact that no judgment had been entered against him was a point in that gentleman's favour, and corroborated his statement. He thought the best course would be to refer the whole matter to the master to ascertain whether Mr. Holt's version of the affair was the correct one; if the master certified in his favour, he could apply at once to a judge in chambers for an order to the examiner to proceed with his examination.

Referred to the Master.

THE MANCHESTER LAW ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this association was held at the Law Association Rooms, Norfolk-street, on the 23rd. ult.; William Beamont, Esq., the president, occupying the chair. After the accounts for the past year had been passed, the report of the committee, which we subjoin, was read by the honorary secretary and adopted.—Mr. Beever proposed, and Mr. Thorley seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Beamont, the president of the past year, for his unremitting attention to the duties of his office.—Mr. Beever remarked that Mr. Beamont, although residing at Warrington, had attended almost every committee meeting, which he must have done at considerable personal sacrifice, and that he had with great courtesy and alacrity joined in the various deputations of the association and had otherwise fulfilled the many duties he had been called upon to undertake in such a manner as to add credit and importance to the association, and to entitle himself to its best thanks. The vote was passed most cordially.—After a unanimous vote of thanks had been passed to Mr. Marriott, the honorary secretary, the officers for the ensuing year were elected, James Crossley, Esq. being the president; James Barrett, Esq., and Richard Scott, Esq. vice-presidents; James Street, Esq., treasurer; and Francis Marriott, Esq., honorary secretary; and thirty other members were appointed the general committee.—It was decided that the annual dinner should not be held until the aggregate meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, which is to take place in Manchester in the autumn of the present year.

In presenting the eighteenth annual report, the committee have the gratification of stating that during the past year there has been an increase in the number of members, and a further accumulation of funds; the number of members being 180, and the balances in the bank amounting to £566 12s. 3d. The committee advert with much regret to the decease of Mr. John Owen and Mr. Thomas Taylor. The last-named gentleman, as the honorary secretary of the association for the first nine years of its existence, rendered to it most important services; and, after his retirement from that onerous office, he continued to serve with zeal as a member of the general committee. Several cases on points of practice which have been submitted to the committee, and the opinions given thereon, are copied in the appendix. The past year is not memorable for changes in the law, though several important bills were introduced into Parliament, and had the attention of the committee. By a clause of a bill introduced by Mr. Colville, to amend the laws relating to justices of the peace, it was proposed to exclude practising attorneys and solicitors from being justices of the peace for any county, riding, or division. The committee petitioned against this clause, and they have the pleasure of recording that the bill was withdrawn. The Ecclesiastical Courts and Testamentary Jurisdiction Bills had due consideration. With regard to that brought in by the then Solicitor-General, your committee, thinking it calculated to effect a long and urgently required change in the law, sent a deputation to the Solicitor-General, which, in conjunction with deputations from other law societies, expressed strong opinions in its favour, and subsequently, the committee transmitted to the Solicitor-General a petition in its support, and to each member of the House a series of objections to the exclusive jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and peculiar courts in matters relating to wills and administrations. It is hoped that schemes similar to, if not indentical with, those supported by the committee will be pressed on the Legislature in the ensuing session of Parliament, and the committee urgently press upon their successors in office the necessity of making every endeavour to aid in the good work. In adverting to the County Courts Amendment Act, passed during the last year, the committee remark with satisfaction on the working of the section by which it is enacted that where an action is brought in the superior courts for a sum not exceeding £20, and judgment goes by default, costs shall not be recovered unless by order of a judge. The judges have, in all cases where a plaintiff and defendant lived twenty miles apart, allowed the costs of the action, thus preventing the necessity of plaintiffs being obliged to travel with witnesses to distant county courts to prove their cases; for the same act prevents judgment going by default in all cases under £20 in a county court. The general remuneration of solicitors in Chancery proceedings again occupied the attention of the committee, and they forwarded a memorial to the Lord Chancellor, praying for a revision of the present inadequate scale of charges, and they had the satisfaction of hearing that his attention would be given to the subject. As regards costs in small suits in the Chancery Court of the county palatine of Lancaster, the committee having received a communication from the Liverpool Law Association on the subject of a letter from the Vice-Chancellor, on a proposed reduction of costs, appointed a deputation, which attended the Vice-Chancellor in Liverpool, to express the ready acquiescence of the committee in the proposed reduction; and the Vice-Chancellor afterwards submitted to your committee the drafts of certain rules and orders, by which, in every case where the subject of the suit does not exceed the value of £300, the court fees and solicitors' charges will be reduced one half. The committee assume that a corresponding reduction will be made in counsels' fees. At the request of the Manchester Commercial Association, your committee devoted considerable attention to the subject of registration of the members of partnership firms, and they prepared a report thereon, as suggestions for a bill in Parliament, and forwarded the same to the Commercial Association, to be incorporated with the suggestions of that body, and to be printed and submitted to Government. The subject of holding assizes at Manchester has been recently mooted, and the committee, having reason to suppose that the requisite accomodation for the courts might be afforded, trust that an object so materially affecting the administration of justice, will not be overlooked by their successors. It was mentioned in the last report that the annual aggregate meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association for the year 1856, had been appointed to be held in this city, but a suggestion having been made that it was more desirable for Manchester to be the place of meeting in the year of the Art Treasures Exhibition, in which the committees of that association and of the Liverpool Law Society acquiesced, the meeting was held at Liverpool in October last. It is not within the province of the committee to remark on the important and interesting proceedings at that meeting, but they may be allowed to express a hope that when the aggregate meeting of the association is held in Manchester, it may receive a hearty welcome. In conclusion, the committee venture to express their belief that, amongst the measures which, in the ensuing session, will demand the attention of the Legislature, none will be found more important than the bill for the registration of titles, which is expected to be proposed by the Government. As long ago as 1850, the committee expressed their conviction that "the adoption of a well-considered system of compulsory registration of titles to real property throughout the Kingdom would be of great public benefit" (See 12th Annual Report, p. 8). They are still of the same opinion; and should the bill prove to be what it is expected to be, namely a measure conducive to the public good, the committee doubt not that it will receive attention from their successors, not according to illiberal and short-sighted views of what is termed the interest of the profession, but in the spirit of that juster and broader policy which dictates that the interests of the profession and the interests of the public are one and the same.

THE TRANSFER OF LAND.

The only event of any importance in the legal world, has been the appearance of the long promised pamphlet* from the practised pen of Mr. Butt, Q.C., M.P., on the Transfer of Land. It is manifestly the result of much labour and research on the part of its accomplished author; and may be described as containing a well-written statement of the evils connected with the present system of conveyancing, and an equally readable outline of a plan for simplifying the titles to real property. The subject is one on which an able writer, tolerably conversant with the present state of things, could scarcely fail to present something worth reading. Those, however, who are familiar with the various suggestions that have been from time to time made during the last dozen years, will not fail to observe that Mr. Butt offers in this publication few suggestions which have not been discussed over and over again. He takes up the subject in the spirit of a clear-headed and sensible lawyer, whose vocation has never been the practice of conveyancing, and whose knowledge of real property law has never been profound. He proposes what has been a hundred times proposed, but what has been as often treated as impracticable even by law reformers. He does not seem to be aware of this fact—that the real difficulties to be grappled with are difficulties of detail. Many writers have urged that as stock is transferable with ease, land should be made similarly transferable; but those who are willing to concur in this sentiment, generally feel that the obstacles in the way are such as cannot easily be removed. It is, therefore, disappointing to read through 129 pages of elaborate writing, by one who is really well qualified to throw light on most subjects, and after all find that the practical difficulties to which allusion has been made, are not fairly grappled with. These rounded periods, illustrated by well selected bits of antiquarian lore, show that the writer has taken pains with his theme; but we conclude the perusal of the work assured that, in so far as it seeks to advance the great object of simplifying titles to real property, this publication is all but a failure.

The brochure in question is in the form of a letter to Sir R. Bethell; whose addresses at Aylesbury, more than his proceedings in Parliament, stamp him as a professed reformer of real property law. He is at the outset reminded that the transfer of land is a subject that must be dealt with (in Parliament, we presume, and not merely on the hustings) in a manner worthy of statesmen. He is still more forcibly reminded that the old policy of English law was to facilitate the transfer of land.

Thus we arrive at the text, on which this lengthy discourse is founded. Lord Coke in his unbounded admiration of our legal system, and in language rather more imaginative than exact, happened to describe the Court of Common Pleas as a "MARKET OVERT for assurance of land;" although with all deference to so eminent an authority, it is hard to discover in what respect the phrase was applicable to a court in which nothing was ever sold. Between the sale of goods in market overt, and the transfer by fine with proclamations, there was little real similarity; otherwise, an enquiry into the title previous to the levying of a fine would, of course, have been unnecessary.

* The Transfer of Land, by means of a Judicial Assurance: its practicability and advantages considered, in a letter to Sir Richard Bethell, M.P., &c. By ISAAC BUTT, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel, formerly Professor of Political Economy in the University of Dublin. Dublin: Hodges and Smith; London: Ridgway. (p.p. 129.)

However, Lord Coke has styled the Court of Common Pleas, a "market overt," and Mr. Butt thinks that that court (or some other court) might really be made what Lord Coke somewhat fancifully styled it. This would be a compromise, safe and agreable to all parties between conservatism and revolution! Land is to be transferred from one owner to another in a manner to some extent resembling the transfer by fine and proclamations; and the Court of Common Pleas would, in the opinion of the writer, be the best tribunal, for the sake of old associations, if for no better reason. So much for the conservative aspect of the scheme. The other aspect is as different a one as could well be imagined; what connexion it has with the assurance by fine known to the old law of England, it is not easy to discover. The system known as the REGISTRATION OF TITLE system, is proposed. It is described as involving "the establishment of an office or registry—call it what you will—in which any man who can establish his title to a piece of land, may register his title to that land, and have in that registry conclusive evidence of his ownership."

Mr. Butt is then an advocate for the registration of titles, and objects to a registration of deeds, which (at least, as it exists in Ireland) he very justly brands as a "cumbrous contrivance for complicating titles." He proceeds next at some length to show that in Ireland transfers of land have, for the last six years, taken place through the medium of the Incumbered Estates Court. He does not, however, consider that a tribunal created for a special exigency should be continued after the exigency has ceased; nor does he propose to limit the application of his system to incumbered estates, passing under a judicial sale. Every owner of land should be entitled to make out his claim to be registered as an owner, and his claim to be so registered would undergo investigation by a tribunal to be created for the purpose, composed of a number of competent persons, "who, call them by what name you will, would, in fact, be conveyancing counsel. Their sole, or almost their sole duty should be the investigation of the abstracts of title that would be submitted to the court."

Mr. Butt is strongly of opinion that the duties of investigating titles should not be committed to any persons who have judicial duties to perform. The functionaries who are to have the control of the Registry must "give their whole and undivided powers to this particular duty." Were Lord Coke himself on the bench of the Common Pleas, and were that court to rise daily at one o'clock, p.m., after concluding its day's work, Mr. Butt would not have any investigation of title undertaken by the venerable occupants of the bench during their vacant hours. He considers that the functions of a judge and of an examiner of title are essentially different. The judge, he says, "is not bound to investigate for himself the abstract right of the case he decides. . . . . He sits to decide between two adverse parties, each of whom presents his case as he thinks proper. Upon the case so presented, and upon that only, he decides." It appears strange that so eminent an advocate should have this limited apprehension of the functions and responsibilities of a judge. Is he aware that the best equity judges are in the habit of relying more on their own private examination of the papers than on the case "as presented by the opposing counsel?" Does he remember Lord Eldon's avowal, that his mind was more frequently influenced by the arguments not pressed, and the cases not cited, by counsel? Is it not a matter of notoriety that a judge, some of whose words form a motto for this very publication—the Irish M. R.—bestows even more attention at home than he does in court upon every case brought before him? One more question on this point:—Have not three judges of whom he speaks in such eulogistic terms—those of the Incumbered Estates Court—personally perused the title to every acre of the three millions of acres already sold by them?

It appears then, that partly in consequence of a supposed incongruity between judicial duties and the duties to be performed by the members of the Court of Transfer, Mr. Butt would not confer this new jurisdiction on the Court of Chancery. Another reason he gives for concluding that the equity judges cannot be employed in this manner: He says:—"We spoil the Court of Chancery for its proper purpose of deciding equities between man and man, when we graft upon its rightful and wholesome jurisdiction the incidents of determining title to estates; of setting up lands to auction; of managing estates until they are sold. If we add to this the duties inseparable from the power of giving indefeasible titles, I believe we shall irretrievably damage that court for the purpose of its higher administration."

Now, without asserting that the registration of title ought to be under the control of the Court of Chancery—for many grounds may be urged for the creation of a new and distinct tribunal—I cannot but think that Mr. Butt is unfortunate in his reasons for preferring the Common Pleas to the Court of Chancery. Why do we damage a court by conferring on it increased powers? Was the court (for example) damaged by being enabled to make a vesting order, instead of the circuitous process formerly resorted to in cases of infant trustees? If not, may not the court innoxiously to itself, be enabled to make an order vesting any estate, on the occasion of any sale, in the purchaser? Why should one branch of equity jurisdiction be "higher" than another? Is the granting of an injunction to prevent a counterfeit of Holloway's pills, a "higher" function, than would be an order vesting the estate of A. B. in C. D., who has paid fifty thousand pounds for it? Mr. Butt, moreover, overlooks the important fact that the Court of Transfer would be more constantly engaged in determining on equitable than on legal interests; surely this is a reason for confiding these powers to a court of equity rather than to the Common Pleas, or to any tribunal under the control of the Common Pleas.

So far as Mr. Butt has touched upon matters of detail, it seems to me that he has impaired the value of his suggestions. Taken by themselves, they substantially include the propositions which the advocates of a system of registration of title have for several years supported. His main suggestions are appended in his own words:—

"1. I propose the establishment of a great public record of the ownership of landed estates, the appearance upon which of the name of any person as the owner of an estate should be conclusive evidence, for all purposes, that he is so.

"2. The institution of a system of judicial assurance, under which any person desirous of selling his estate might confer an indefeasible title upon the purchaser. If he was himself entered on the public record as owner—by a short transfer, and the substitution of the purchaser's name for his own. If he was not so entered—by adopting the means necessary to establish his title.

"The record should be under the control of a tribunal armed with the powers, and provided with the machinery, necessary for the investigation of the title of every claimant, and all transfers by record should take place under the control of the same tribunal.

"The recourse to such a record should be perfectly optional with each individual owner.

"It might be adopted either for the purpose of quieting his own title, or of an assurance to a purchaser from him.

"In the case of compulsory sales of property at the instance of creditors, any person interested in the sale might compel a resort to this mode of assurance.

"It should, however, be equally applicable to all transfers of property, whether judicial sales or private ones.

"In the instance of all devolutions of property, whether by descent or devise, the tribunal controlling the record should have power to enter the name of the successor. The owner of a limited or a partial estate to be entered on record for such limited or partial estate.

"The record of the ownership of any estate should be accompanied by a map defining it, upon a scale large enough to admit of easy and distinct reference to each parcel.

"Unless a new Court of Wills be instituted, all wills affecting any estate on the record should be entered in a separate book, and referred to by figures of reference from the record of ownership.

"Assurances settling any of these estates might be made by a public act to be entered of record, and preserved to guide and direct the future entries of the names of owners.

"With respect to incumbrances, if deemed desirable, a book might be kept by an entry in which any estate already entered on record might be charged with a sum of money by a process as simple as that by which the ownership could be transferred. If it were deemed undesirable so to facilitate incumbrances, provision ought to be made, that to each person recording himself as owner, an exemplification of the entry, under the seal of the court, should be given,—that no future transfer could be effected without the production of this, or accounting for its loss; and that the deposit of this should have the same effect in equity as the deposit of title deeds."

Such are the outlines of Mr. Butt's scheme for facilitating the transfer of land, and for simplifying titles: objections may be urged against several of them, but I apprehend, nevertheless, that if any extensive reform takes place in our conveyancing system, it must, to be efficacious, proceed upon the principles which Mr. Butt has adopted. The difficulties of detail he does not fairly meet; but his leading ideas, if not perfectly new, are deserving of the close and earnest attention of all who take an interest in this important question.

TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION AND SUPERINTENDENT REGISTRARS OF BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS JOURNAL & REPORTER.

It is understoodthat Government, in the present sessionn of Parliament, intends to introduce a bill for the abolition of the ecclesiastical courts, so far as relates to matters testamentary, and for the substitution, in lieu of the existing courts, of other modes of procedure, more especially with reference to the registry of wills and the obtaining of probates and administrations.

It is not the object of these remarks to discuss the question of the abolition of the existing courts. The expediency of the abolition is assumed.

With reference to matters testamentary there exists both a contentious and a non-contentious jurisdiction—the duties required in the one jurisdiction being judicial, and in the other merely ministerial; and the leading principle which it is respectfully submitted ought to be strictly observed in legislating on this subject is the keeping entirely distinct the contentious jurisdiction from the non-contentious, and the judicial duties from the ministerial.

The ministerial duties in relation to matters testamentary may be said to comprise chiefly the registration of original wills or copies, the preparation and custody of indexes, the administration of oaths, and the performance of all formal business relating to applications for and the obtaining of probates and administrations.

Assuming that the Legislature will establish one general court of probate and one general registry of original wills for the whole kingdom, or that, acting on the second report of the Chancery Commission, dated the 11th day of January, 1854, the Legislature will establish district courts of probate and registry for districts, about thirty in number, "each of such districts to comprise some county or counties, or some known division of a county or counties." It is proposed by the following remarks to show that superintendent registrars of births, deaths, and marriages are public officers most eligible to perform efficiently, in their various districts, the ministerial duties above specified.

In order to show their eligibility it is desirable to state in detail what are the present duties of superintendent registrars, and what are their districts.

Under the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, England and Wales have been divided into separate districts or unions for poor law purposes.

In the year 1836 an act was passed for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, and by that act each poor law union was formed into a separate district for registration purposes, and provision was made for the appointment to each district of an officer, called the "superintendent registrar of births, deaths, and marriages" in the district or union, and the clerks to the guardians of the poor were made superintendent registrars in their respective districts. Each of those districts or unions was divided into sub-districts, and subordinate officers, called "registrars," appointed for the registering of births and deaths in these sub-districts.

By another act of 1836, for marriages in England, the superintendent registrars of births and deaths became also the superintendent registrars of marriages in their respective districts or unions. The registrars of births and deaths in the sub-districts comprised in each union, are placed under the management of the superintendent registrar of the district or union, and are required to register births and deaths in their sub-districts, and to deliver quarterly the original and copies of the registers to their superintendent registrars, but they have no jurisdiction or duties with respect to marriages.

Having, therefore, stated the nature of the office of superintendent registrars, and the relation of their office to that of registrars of births and deaths, it is proposed to give a short summary of the duties of superintendent registrars, for the performance of which they are paid by fees out of the Consolidated Fund.

1st. The quarterly examination of the copies of the original entries made by registrars of births and deaths, and the transmission of the copies to the Registrar-General in London.

2ndly. The sole custody and care of the registers of all births and deaths, and of marriages of all denominations, both Churchmen and Dissenters.

And 3rdly. The preparation and custody of indexes of those registers.

The superintendent registrars are paid by fees for their other duties, shortly enumerated under the following heads:—

1st. The issuing, when required, of certified extracts from the registers.

2ndly. The receiving notices of, and issuing certificates for, marriages, or receiving and registering caveats against marriages.

3rdly. The granting of marriage licenses.

And 4thly. The registration of chapels for the solemnisation of marriages, and the certifying of chapels as places of religious worship. There is another fact in relation to the office of superintendent registrar which has an important bearing on this subject. By the act of 1836, for registering births, deaths, and marriages, the guardians of the several poor law unions are required to provide and uphold register offices for the due preservation of the registers.

Whatever may be the ultimate decision of the Legislature as regards the establishment of a general court of probate, with a general registry, or of district courts of probate and registry, it is respectfully submitted—for the following reasons, that either the originals or copies of all wills and administrations of persons dying in a superintendent registrar's district should be deposited and registered at the office of the superintendent registrar, and that superintendent registrars should be entrusted with the discharge of all ministerial duties relating to wills and administrations of persons dying in their respective districts.

1st. The districts of superintendent registrars have been well arranged with a view to area and population.

In proof of this it may be mentioned that these districts are not only for the most part co-extensive with the originally formed poor law unions, but have since been recognised and adopted in most cases for county court districts. They are also well known and generally recognised divisions of the country.

As these districts are not too extensive in area or population, the offices of superintendent registrars are conveniently accessible from all parts thereof for the purpose of registration, and search and applications for probates and administrations. It would appear, therefore, that the adoption of these districts for deposit and registration, of either originals or copies of wills, is calculated to confer on the public all the advantages resulting from a well-advised scheme of local registration.

2ndly. Superintendent regisrtars are already invested with the duties of surrogates in relation to marriages, being empowered to grant marriage licences.

3rdly. Superintendent registrars are entrusted, as before observed, with the custody of the original registers of births, deaths, and marriages, and are provided at the public expense with fire-proof depositories for the proper keeping of the same.

4thly. Similar means for access to, and inspection of, wills and copies, at the office of superintendent registrars, can be provided as now exist in relation to registers of births, deaths, and marriages.

5thly. Superintendent registrars have proof of the deaths of all persons dying within their districts (which no other local public officer possesses), and are, therefore, in a position to afford early information to the Inland Revenue Office.

And 6thly. Superintendent registrars, being appointed by the guardians of the poor, who are elected by the ratepayers, may be considered, as a body of public officers, to possess the confidence of the country.

It is submitted that the contentious and non-contentious jurisdictions, in relation to matters testamentary, should be kept separate; and that this be effected by keeping the registry of wills and all ministerial duties, similar to those now performed by surrogates, entirely distinct from the courts or offices empowered to grant probates and administrations; and, inasmuch as superintendent registrars are public officers entrusted with the custody of public documents, and have duties, in many respects, analogous to duties ministerial, in relation to matters testamentary, that, as regards the registry and deposit of wills and administrations, either the originals or copies of wills, and administrations of all persons dying in the district of a superintendent registrar, should be forwarded to his office, for deposit and registry, and for convenience of search and inspection; and that, as regards the applications for probates and administrations, and the administration of oaths, and the performance of all duties in relation to matters testamentary, now performed by surrogates, the superintendent registrars should be entrusted with the discharge of those duties in respect of all persons dying in their several districts, and should be appointed public officers for those several purposes, acting under the immediate control and superintendence of the principal officer of a general registry office, or, as the case may be, of the principal officer of the local registry office for the district, of which the superintendent registrar's district forms part.

It may be observed, in conclusion, that in a measure proposed by the Manchester Commercial Association, in relation to the registration of partnerships, superintendent registrars are suggested as the most eligible public officers for the registration of partnerships within their respective districts, and that, should a measure be passed providing for a local registration of titles, the reasons given in this paper equally apply in favour of the adoption for such a registration of superintendent registrars districts, and the eligibility of superintendent registrars to perform the duties of local registrars of titles.

Review.

The Practice of the New County Courts, &c. By JOHN FREDERICK ARCHBOLD, Esq., Barrister-at-law. Seventh Edition. Shaw & Sons.

The Law and Practice of the County Courts, &c. Seventh Edition. By MORGAN LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law. John Crockford, Essex-street.

We scarcely know the copyright of which, were we speculators in books, it would give us more satisfaction to become the assignees, than that of a really good County Court Practice—for there are few works for which the demand can be more general or more frequent. It is not every one who can attain the joys of Westminster Hall—non cuivis adire Corintho—but where is the man who, at some time or other, may not hope to figure in a county court? Indeed, if they add to those much enduring tribunals a testamentary jurisdiction, it will be as difficult to avoid such fate as it is to escape altogether that corner of the Times which is sacred to the births, deaths, and marriages of her Majesty's lieges.

To meet this universal want a full supply has been, from time to time, created by the economists who regulate our legal Exchange; and from the year 1846, when the new system of local courts was first established, fast and furious has been the storm of instruction showered down upon us from all quarters. Neither Lord Chancellors nor the Legislature have been wanting to the prayers of authors. Lord Brougham, indeed, could not with propriety write a treatise on the practice to be followed in his favourite tribunals, but he had already done excellent service in their cause; and Lord Cranworth has just contributed "rules" of great length, in substitution of those formerly in force; and the Lords of the Treasury have issued their "instructions," and Parliament has imparted its views in at least four statutes, all of them more or less contradictory of the others, all in full force, and each and all productive of much satisfaction to the explainers of county-court mysteries and their respective publishers. For some of these, however, we apprehend the harvest of materials has come in a little too fast. An edition, be it ever so good, does require a little space before it can be digested by the buying public, and we fear that the seventh edition of the "Practice of the New County Courts," which Mr. Archbold has just produced, must have pushed its elder brother out of the way a little prematurely, inasmuch as he was born as lately as the long vacation in 1856. However, that is no concern of ours; for we are bound, in all charity, to believe that the sixth edition has been fairly sold off, and that the seventh is not an impostor in a new title-page, and with a few leaves added or cancelled to suit. If it were not so, indeed, we should feel it incumbent on us to protest here indignantly against a trick of the trade, which is not an uncommon one; and which could not be defended even by a somewhat loose moralist—resembling, as it does, too closely, the plan of putting new wine into old bottles;—a foolish expedient (as we know), and often a very knavish one besides.

It appears to us that there are two plans on which a treatise on the practice of the county courts may be written, and that each of them is good in its way. One of these is to aim at furnishing the practitioner with a volume containing all he can possibly or reasonably require, in order to conduct to a creditable issue the cause or proceeding he may have in hand, without having occasion to resort to any further aid—to give him, in short, a book which he can pack up in his carpet-bag, and feel happy in the remembrance on his way to the court of the district, without caring for the treatises on different subjects which adorn his shelves at home. To succeed in this endeavour, however, a large and (consequently) an extensive work is necessary. It must be remembered that the law of Westminster Hall is, or should be, the law of each of the 500 county courts which the country enjoys; and that the practice of that Hall is also to a great extent followed in each; or, as a model for imitation, is useful to the attorney arguendo, and to the judge himself. Moreover points of law and practice, particularly in reference to contracts and to the rules of evidence, arise as frequently and are as hotly contested in causes put in suit in the local tribunals, as in those which are tried before Lord Campbell and his colleagues. Hence such a work as we have hinted at should not merely comprise a correct exposition of the acts themselves, of the miscellaneous statutes under which in certain cases proceedings may be taken in the county court, and of the rules of court, but should treat in detail many heads of general law and practice, and especially the two subjects of contract and evidence to which we just now referred. Such a work we believe would be peculiarly acceptable to the country practitioner; and none of those we have hitherto seen, thoroughly supply the want.

The other plan is far less ambitious, and is simply to give the acts themselves, rejointed, and put into as readable a form as possible, with the omission of all "whereas's" and "it is enacted's," &c., and to notice briefly the comparatively few points of construction, or of law, appertaining to county courts in common with other inferior courts, which have been drawn from the judges on rules for prohibition, or on county court appeals. And this plan is consistent with a moderate size and a reasonable price,—though there be added a full appendix of rules and tables, and an index as complete as Tidd ever compiled.

Mr. Archbold's book belongs to the last-mentioned rather than to the former division. It contains, indeed, a chapter on evidence chiefly extracted from his own valuable work on Nisi Prius; and there are chapters on the proceedings which may, in some cases, be had in the county court for the district under the protection acts; or, against debtors, under the 8th & 9th Vict. c. 127. But, in other respects, it adheres pretty closely to the less pretending of the two methods. That it is accurate and clear as far as it goes, no one who is at all acquainted with Mr. Archbold's earlier works will doubt. And as it would give us sincere pain to stumble upon an error in one whom we have always considered as a master in the art of compilation, we have not even attempted the ungracious task.

As compared with Mr. Archbold's work, that by Mr. Lloyd has a greater affinity to the more elaborate of the two classes of treatises we have mentioned, in that its pages are in the proportion of 725 to 295. Moreover the chapter on evidence is much more complete in its design. But its more ambitious tendencies are exhausted in these efforts; nor do we think there has been attained, in any considerable degree, that clearness of expression, combined with accuracy of detail, which appears to us at least to be absolutely essential to the full success of either plan of construction. Yet Mr. Lloyd appears to be almost nervously anxious to lose no aid which the insertion of numerals, of divisions and sub-divisions, and the intermingling of bourgeois and pica can bring to the task. We will take as an example of our meaning the commencement of the second Book—The Officers—which Mr. Lloyd begins as follows:—

"CAP. I.—THE JUDGE.

"I. His Appointment and Qualification.

"It will be seen, on reference to the provisions of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, that the appointment of the judges, with certain exceptions presently to be noticed, is vested in the Lord Chancellor.

"The exceptions are, 1st, of certain districts specially named in the act; and, 2ndly, of certain cases which may hereafter arise.

"The exceptions specified are—

"1. The then existing judges of the local courts of Bath, Bristol, Liverpool, and Manchester.

"2. The district of Sheffield, of which John Parker, Esq., the then steward, was to be the first judge.

"3. The district of Eccleshall, of which Daniel Maude, Esq., the then steward, was to be the first judge.

"4. In the county of Middlesex, of any district of which, at his option, the then county clerk was to be the first judge.

"5. In the towns specified in schedule C, when any order shall be made for holding a county court there, the lords of the manors and liberties mentioned in the schedule were entitled to appoint to the next vacancy after the passing of the act persons properly qualified according to its provisions, subject to the approval of one of the Secretaries of State.

"The power of appointment thus vested in the Lord Chancellor is also limited to the selection of persons having certain qualifications defined by the statute. He appoints, therefore, subject to these conditions, and any appointment of an unqualified person would be void.

"No person is eligible for the appointment of judge, unless he be either—

"1. A barrister-at-law of seven years' standing.

"2. A barrister-at-law who shall have practised as a barrister and special pleader for at least seven years.

"3. A barrister (even of less than seven years' standing) who had been appointed to preside in any of the local courts named in schedules A. and B., by whatever title.

"4. An attorney holding the like office.

"5. Any person filling the office of the county court, or county clerk, in the same county, at the passing of the act."

Now, the above passage, in more than one part, is ungrammatical, and its statements are not easy to be understood, even if an equitable construction be alone attempted. In the second paragraph, for example, the two "ofs" we have printed in italics are redundant, and that in a way to create confusion; but it is a still graver fault to leave the reader permanently in doubt as to what the author may intend by the second branch of the exceptions, those cases—namely, "which may hereafter arise," but of which we hear no more; while it is worst of all to create an unnecessary puzzle, as to whether "John Parker, Esquire," some time steward of the manor of Stafford, has or has not any connection with the present Sheffield County Court, or whether "Daniel Maude, Esquire," still reigns in the manor of Eccleshall. Then again, when Mr. Lloyd, in describing those persons who are now eligible for the appointment of judge, prints the two paragraphs in the above quotation, numbered 3 and 4,—the expressions used by the Legislature in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 9, are travestied in such guise as to render them hopelessly unintelligible. "An attorney holding the like office." Which office? we ask, in sad perplexity.

The truth is, the exceptional cases placed by Mr. Lloyd at the commencement of the subject are, so placed, extremely puzzling; and, moreover, to the general mass of readers they are utterly unimportant. It would have been better to have laid down shortly and broadly the present rule of qualification for judges,—adding that at the first establishment of the system, there were certain persons, already judges of local courts then or thereafter to be adopted into the general system, who were preserved by the act in their offices without regard to that qualification; and if this course had been adopted, Mr. Lloyd would have been under no temptation to proceed as he does in the next page with the following sentence, which we confess conveys to ourselves not even a scintilla of meaning:—

"APPOINTMENTS TO VACANCIES.

"The latitude of appointment allowed in certain cases of judgeships, to supersede pre-existing judgeships of local courts, is limited to the appointment of the first judge."

It may perhaps be urged, that in a book such as that under our notice, it savours of purism to object to style, or indeed to anything short of bad law; and in deference to this opinion (in which, however, we cannot bring ourselves entirely to concur), we notice, in conclusion, a part of Mr. Lloyd's work we are able to praise, as containing the law correctly and fully given; and we doubt not there are many other portions which would equally stand the test of close examination. We allude to his chapter on appeals, and more particularly to that part of it which treats of the costs of appeal. The statement Mr. Lloyd makes upon this subject is moreover much fuller and more satisfactory than that given by Mr. Archbold, who most unaccountably makes no mention whatever of Gibbon app. Gibbon resp.; Leidmann app. Schultz resp.; Foster app. Smith resp. 18 C. B. 156 (by the way, this last case has escaped Mr. Lloyd also); or Mountney v. Collier. It appears to us, however, that both authors have failed to observe a distinction which the courts appear inclined to draw between those cases in which the judgment of the court below is affirmed—and in which the costs follow as a matter of course unless the contrary be expressed by the court at the time of delivering their judgment (see Cannon app. Johnson resp., 21 L. J., Q.B. (N.S.) 164),—and those cases in which the judgment of the court below is reversed. For it seems to us that it is in reference to this latter class of cases only, that any difference of opinion has been manifested between the Queen's Bench on the one hand, and the Common Pleas and Exchequer on the other.

Mercantile Law Conference.

On Thursday, January 29, at 11 a.m., the Conference re-assembled at Willis's Rooms; Lord Brougham in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said, as codification was one of the subjects set down for consideration that day, he wished to observe that he had but little hope of any digest, whether of the whole law or of any portion of it, being successfully carried out. This, he said, in order to prevent future disappointment. The history of the attempts which had been made to codify the criminal law showed that his apprehension was well grounded, and he now almost despaired of any digest. There was but one way in which such an object could be secured, and that was by Parliament reposing entire confidence in those who were employed to prepare a digest, and not interfering with regard to details. Although he despaired of codification, he did not despair of improvement by means of such practical suggestions as would emanate from that conference. (Hear.)

Mr. LEONE LEVI then read a paper on the practicability of securing a commercial code. In this paper it was remarked that the first step towards the accomplishment of the object in view was the removal of the differences which existed between the commercial laws of the separate branches of the United Kingdom. With a view to the effecting of this object, it was desirable that those statutes which related to mercantile matters should be separated from the other enactments, and simplified, and that a similar course should be adopted in reference to the various decisions at common law.

Mr. ENTWISTLE, formerly M.P. for Lancashire, then read a paper "On the Registration of Partnerships," which emanated from the Manchester Commercial Association, and was to the following effect:—

"The experience of every man who has conducted any extensive commercial operations will probably have afforded many instances in which great advantage would have been derived from a ready access to the best and fullest information as to the number and names of the partners in any firm with whom his business may have brought him into contact, the nature of their occupation, and the term for which it was originally constituted, inasmuch as there are many cases in which partners have retired or died out where the character of the business has been totally changed without any public intimation of the altered circumstances of the firm. The principle (which has been recognised in the case of joint-stock companies, not only for the execution of great public works, where parliamentary powers or a charter from the crown are required, but also for the conduct of ordinary trading operations) must soon be extended to every other case where any partner is desirous of limiting his obligations for the debts of the firm to a definite sum fixed by legal deed, and capable of being accurately known by any one whom it may concern. Such a measure would involve the constitution of a department for the registration of all such partnerships as should be contracted with any specific reservation or limitation of liability; and if these should, as may well be expected, become numerous, the deficiency of similar means of information regarding other partnerships would immediately become the more striking, and could hardly fail to result in a general measure for the registration of the names, extent of obligation, and term of partnership of every partner engaged in any business in which two or more persons should have a common interest and responsibility. In granting privileges such as those contained in the Joint Stock Companies Act, or in the Partnership Amendment Bill, for exempting certain partners who may desire and place such an intention on record from the ordinary obligations of unlimited liability imposed by our law, the Legislature was entitled to make a full disclosure of the terms of the original contract a condition preceding the grant of such exemption. But with ordinary partnerships, where no such exemption is sought or intended, the case is different. Here no special inducement can be held out to any firm to place themselves upon the register so long as they keep clear of any legal proceedings; and the attempt to compel registration solely by the infliction of penalties is open to grave objections. It is proposed to disable any firm from recovering a debt until it shall have been registered. Considering the vast facilities for information which such firm, in common with the whole commercial world, would derive from the proposed constraint upon all other firms to comply with the law, it will hardly be deemed to be a very severe one; and to provide that either upon the written application of any person desirous of information, or without such application, the registrar may require full information, and upon failure to comply with his demand for a specified time, may inflict certain penalties."

Mr. ARTHUR RYLAND said that the suggestion that partnerships might be sued in the name of the firm was the law of Scotland, and would be a great improvement, but would not render registration unnecessary, as a plaintiff, when he had signed judgment, would not know against what parties he could issue execution. Mr. Ryland then pointed out some objections to the scheme of the Manchester Association, and laid before the Conference a plan which he had prepared, and which he thought would be more simple, more acceptable to the mercantile community, and, consequently, more efficient. He proposed the registrar of joint-stock companies, instead of the registrar of births and death, as suggested by the Manchester scheme; and he omitted matters not necessarily connected with registration, proposing to leave all other points for consideration in connection with a consolidation of the partnership laws.

After considerable discussion, it was resolved that the registration of partnerships was desirable, and that a bill to secure that object should be introduced into Parliament; also, that the operation of the bill should not be confined to persons who were traders under the provisions of the bankruptcy laws, but should extend to all kinds of partnerships, whether trade or professional.

Mr. HASTINGS then read a paper, prepared by Mr. Robert Slater, on the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, which stated, that there is no comparison to be drawn between the position of England as a commercial country in 1678, when the Statute of Frauds was enacted, and its trading importance at the present day. Woollens and cutlery were then the only branches of manufacture of any importance. The silk manufacture can scarcely be said to have been established until after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, which led to the Protestant refugees locating themselves as silk-weavers in Spitalfields. The cotton trade—the leading branch of our manufacture at the present day—was not introduced for upwards of 100 years afterwards, and until the successful application of machinery continued comparatively small. Banks had not been established. There was no public debt until after the revolution in 1688; and for many years afterwards the "funded system" was not of such importance as to call for the intervention of a single stockbroker. With the exception of Virginia and New England, in America, and a few insignificant settlements then recently established in the West Indies, England possessed no colony of any importance. There could, therefore, have been no colonial brokers as intermediate agents between the importer and wholesale dealer. There were no joint-stock companies in those days, with the exception of the East India Company; but that body of adventurers, who had managed even at that early period to secure a monopoly of trade in their own favour, was composed of only a few leading merchants who managed their affairs themselves. There were therefore no share-brokers required for the sale or transfer of stock. The great bulk of the people was in a state of deplorable ignorance compared with the trading classes of the present day. The statute was a virtual prohibition against all persons entering into trade who could neither read nor write, at a period, too, when these attainments must have been extremely rare.

In its operation the 17th section is not only vexatious in its provisions, but unnatural in its character, from being antagonistic to the confiding habits of individuals. It has consequently been a most fertile source of litigation. The difficulty of defining what is, and what is not, within the statute, particularly as to delivery and acceptance, invests the law with a degree of mystery and doubt beyond the comprehension of ordinary men engaged in trade, and exposes them to the risk of being constantly plundered by designing persons. The very principle of giving something "to bind the bargain" is barbarous in the extreme, and unworthy of a civilised age. This section of the Statute of Frauds is used as a weapon in the hands of a dishonest buyer, whose object is to repudiate a bargain which intentionally he may not have ratified, while it is powerless in the hands of a man who has an honest claim to have the bargain fulfilled. It is neither a protection to a buyer in a rising market, nor to a seller in a falling one.

Where parties dealing are strangers to, or suspicious of, each other, it may be safely left to their own judgment to annex such conditions as they may deem necessary to ensure the fulfilment of a contract. This is the practice in general, notwithstanding the existence of this obnoxious section; and such would certainly continue were that section repealed to-morrow, confidence between man and man being felt, as a rule in all ordinary contracts, to be a sufficient guarantee for their fulfilment. There are houses of business in England where verbal contracts exceed one hundred thousand in number every year. In a commercial population, therefore, of twenty-seven millions of people spread over the United Kingdom, whose existence is almost entirely dependent on buying and selling, the enormous number of verbal contracts arising amongst them baffles all human conception. It is futile to say that traders are governed by the Statute of Frauds in their business transactions with each other. They are governed by the common impulses of human nature, and by the confidence which every man is willing to place in the good faith of his customer. It is altogether a work of supererogation to attempt to regulate by law the operations between man and man on principles inconsistent with the confiding habits of the people. It is not that the existence of such a law has prevented dispute and consequent litigation between parties, but that people have never troubled themselves as to its provisions, and, as a rule, are upright and honest in their dealings with each other, on the common principles of expediency, as well as morality, without even knowing, far less caring, about the boundary lines laid down for their government by this section of the statute. It is apprehended by some persons that by a repeal of the section the present practice of delivering bought and sold contracts for colonial produce, shares, stocks, &c., may by possibility be compromised, and a system of fraud be introduced, under the authority of law, by which verbal contracts in respect to such transactions might have equal force as the system of written contracts at present in use. But no such result need be dreaded, as the natural consequence of a repeal of the 17th section. In Scotland and our colonies, as well as in every country on the face of Europe where the principle comprehended in that section has never been adopted, all dealings of that class are effected through the intermediate agency of brokers, or by the exchange of written contracts between merchants, as in this country. It is the mercantile usage, which is not a custom merely, but a law of itself, against which there is no higher law in opposition. Mercantile usage commands the same supremacy in this country, and there is nothing in the proposed repeal which could in the least degree affect it, as it is founded on the most unexceptional principles of morality and expediency. But were there likely to be any foundation for such fears, nothing is easier than to obviate it by an enactment specifying the exceptions where written contracts alone shall be held to be binding.

It was moved that the clause in question ought to be repealed, and an act passed dispensing with the mention of any amount, and providing that in specified contracts the agreement should be reduced to writing.

The resolution was ultimately adopted.

DEPUTATION TO LORD PALMERSTON.

On the afternoon of Friday, the 30th ult., a deputation from the Conference had an interview with Lord Palmerston.

Lord BROUGHAM, in introducing the deputation, said that the Conference had been of a most satisfactory nature in many respects, particularly in the general disposition of the members to confine themselves to practical and attainable objects. The importance of the Conference was only equalled by that which was held four years ago for the assimilation of the mercantile law of the three kingdoms. The unanimity which prevailed on the present occasion was the more remarkable because the scope of the Conference was more widely extended, and the subjects incomparably more numerous and important. The amount of compensation, £28,900 a year, pressed greatly upon the suitors, because the whole was paid out of fees. There was also the burden of officers' salaries, and the conference expressed a hope that it would be found practicable to throw these burdens off the shoulders of the creditors on to the consolidated fund. As to the offices of manager, broker, and accountant, the conference was of opinion that those offices might be abolished, and the duties discharged by the official assignee (Hear). There was also great dissatisfaction with the system of appeals, the present system being extremely burdensome to the parties; and one great evil was, that the appeal was made from the judge who knew all the circumstances, and had the power of knowing the conduct of a bankrupt, to a judge who had not had such opportunity, and who, to a great extent, must be ignorant of the real state of the case. It had been very much complained of that there was a very irregular attendance of the Bankruptcy Commissioners, and a strong feeling prevailed that their more regular attendance should be rendered compulsory. There was also a general feeling that the bankruptcy and the insolvency should be placed under one tribunal, and that traders and non-traders should be placed in the same category. They were also of opinion that the winding-up jurisdiction should be transferred to the Bankruptcy Court, so that such proceedings as had been recently witnessed, of cases being bandied about from one court to another, might be done away with. The conference had expressed an opinion that Mr. Crauford's Judgment and Execution Bill should, without delay, be passed into law (Hear, hear). Upon the subject of the general registration of partnerships there was a very general concurrence. The noble and learned lord then spoke of the decisions of the conference on the Statute of Frauds, tribunals of commerce, and the other matters which had been under discussion.

Lord PAMERSTON assured the deputation that the Government would give the greatest possible attention to the matters which Lord Brougham had explained. Any representation coming from such a meeting as that representing the great commercial interests of almost all the great commercial towns of the country, must necessarily command the attention of the Government; and the high authority of the noble lord who had been chosen as the organ of the meeting—were he alone in the room—would be sufficient to command the greatest deference and respect on the part of the Government.

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION—SEVENTH GENERAL MEETING.

FEBRUARY 2nd, 1857,

LORD BROUGHAM took the Chair at eight o'clock.

Amongst those present were — Mr. Pitt Taylor, Mr. F. Hill, Mr. Edgar, Mr. Tudor, Mr. W. Hawes, Mr. E. Field, Mr. E. Laurence, Mr. Reed, Mr. Howell, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. John P. Foster, Mr. Teulon, Mr. W. White, Mr. Neil Baillie, Mr. Roche, Mr. C. Webster, Mr. A. Hill, Mr. Back, Mr. Stuart Glennie, Mr. Wingrove Cooke, Mr. Crewe, Mr. Salomons, &c.

The following gentlemen were balloted for and elected—Robert Miller, Esq.; John Benjamin Smith, Esq, M.P.; Thomas Dunn, Esq.; Arnold White, Esq.; John Jamieson, Esq.; Francis Codd, Esq.; William Loxham Farrer, Esq.; G. R. Longden, Esq.; Thomas Lott, Esq.

LORD BROUGHAM mentioned that the London Trade Protection Society had become a corporate member of the Society.

Mr. HOWELL then read a paper on the Law of Partnership, and in the course of the discussion on it, Mr. Lawrance mentioned that there was a female who had lodged in the Royal British Bank the sum of £46, which, by the payment of the dividend, had been reduced to £35. She had obtained judgment and execution against the official manager, and she had, by her attorney, been induced to take out nine summonses against nine separate shareholders, the costs of which must largely exceed the entire amount of her original claim. He regretted that this attorney was not present, that he might mention his name in order that he might expose the acts of those legal cormorants who had brought disgrace upon that profession of which he had the honour to be a member. He had been now thirty years practising as a solicitor, during which time he had seen a great deal of misery arising out of the defective state of the law, but the misery he had seen arising from the Royal British Bank was in itself greater than the aggregate of all that he had witnessed during his professional career.

The society then adjourned till Monday next, the 9th of February, at eight o'clock, to consider the report on the Testamentary Jurisdiction.

Orders in Chancery.

GENERAL ORDERS AND RULES OF THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY, ISSUED BY THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR, JAN. 30, 1857.

WHEREAS of late years various alterations have taken place in the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery, whereby certain of the fees heretofore allowed to the solicitors of the court have ceased, and others of such fees have become inapplicable to the duties which the solicitors have to perform; and it is desirable that a new and revised list of fees should be made.

Now, upon consideration thereof,

The Right Honourable Robert Monsey, Lord Cranworth, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir James Lewis Knight Bruce and the Right Honourable Sir George James Turner) the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery), the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Torin Kindersley, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, and the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, doth order and direct as follows:—

1. The several orders and parts of orders following are discharged, so far as regards all costs incurred subsequent to the time when this order comes into operation;

4. The fees of court, now collected by means of stamps, are to be reduced and varied as set forth in the third schedule hereto.

The fees set forth in the column headed lower scale in the third schedule hereto are to be paid in all cases in which the lower scale of fees is to be charged by and allowed to solicitors, under the provisions of the second section of this order; and the fees of court set forth in the column headed higher scale in the third schedule hereto are to be paid in all other cases.

The solicitor or party instituting any proceeding in respect of which he claims to pay the fees of court according to the lower scale, is to file with the Clerk of Records and Writs a certificate in the form hereunder set forth, of which certificate the Clerk of Records and Writs is, at the request of any solicitor, or any party acting in person, in the suit or matter, to mark a copy.

On production of such copy of the certificate, the officers of the court are to receive and file all proceedings in the suit or matter bearing stamps according to the lower scale.

In any case certified for the lower scale of court fees, in which it shall happen that the solicitor shall become entitled to charge and be allowed according to the higher scale of solicitors' fees, the deficiency in the fees of court is to be made good.

In any case in which the fees of court have been paid upon the higher scale, and in which it shall happen that the solicitor shall become entitled to charge and be allowed only according to the lower scale of solicitors' fees, the excess of fees of court so paid may be allowed upon the taxation of costs, if the circumstances of the case shall, in the judgment of the taxing master, justify such allowance.

Parliamentary Proceedings.

HOUSE OF LORDS FEB. 3.

Lord BROUGHAM expressed his satisfaction at the promises of the Government with respect to measures for the improvement of the law, and he had every confidence that these promises would be performed. Never was there a time when such reforms were more needed in all branches of the law. Without entering now into a discussion on the ticket-of-leave question, he would say that some change or other must take place in the mode of dealing with prisoners. It was not easy to say what that change should be, but a considerable increase in the number of our police-officers, he believed, would be absolutely necessary. He had lately had the honour of presiding over a conference of delegates from all the great mercantile towns, at which certain changes in the mercantile law were discussed. These mercantile men had had more opportunities than any other for estimating the disadvantages of the present law, and he hoped their lordships would give a favourable ear to their representations.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that, as the paragraph in the Royal Speech with regard to law reform was rather vague, it would probably be acceptable to their lordships if he intimated to them more in detail what measures it was the intention of the Government to introduce. The first subject to which the Government had directed their attention was the reform of the ecclesiastical courts — a subject of the greatest importance, and one which, singularly enough, had been undertaken without success by every Government during the last twenty-five years. On that day week he should ask their lordships' leave to introduce three bills—one for the reform of testamentary jurisdiction, another to amend the laws of marriage and divorce, and a third on the subject of church discipline. The Attorney-General would also, as soon as possible, ask for leave to introduce into the other House, a bill to render criminal, breaches of trust, of which there had unfortunately been so many instances of late. Some time ago, it would be in the recollection of their lordships, a commission was issued to inquire into the subject of the registration of lands; that commisson had not yet reported, though he had reason to know that it had prepared the drafts of two bills to be laid before Parliament on the subject. In the meantime it was his intenton to ask the Legislature to effect a minor reform in the same direction, to render extremely simple mortgages of land by means of registration. Their lordships were aware that there was at work at the present moment a commission for the consolidation of the statute law; nobody unacquainted with the subject could comprehend half the difficulties which beset it; but the commission had succeeded in consolidating the whole criminal law, and bills similar to those which he had laid on the table on the last day of the previous session would be introduced for the purpose of effecting that consolidation. He should also ask their lordships to refer the second report of that commission to a select committee, in order to consider the proposition in that report for the adoption of means to improve the manner and language of current legislation. The member who introduced a bill was generally so glad to have it passed that he consented without difficulty to any alteration that was proposed in it: and the result was, that, when the measure became law, its various provisions were found not to dovetail together. Moreover, the language of the statutes was frequently discrepant, leading to uncertainty as to its meaning. What the Government, therefore, proposed was, that there should be an officer appointed, who should be a very able lawyer, and whose duties would be to report, when called upon, on every bill introduced for the alteration of the law; to explain exactly what its effect was, what was its bearing on the existing law, and generally to put the whole statute in order. And further, after a bill had gone through committee, the House should refer it, if it thought fit, to this officer to examine and state the alterations it had undergone in passing that ordeal, and also to point out how far those alterations affected its general tenor. Of course, this officer would have it in his power to offer suggestions for improving the language of an act; and it was to be hoped that the result would be to render our statutes more clear, less verbose, and more in harmony with the common feelings and understandings of mankind. Another part of the same officer's duties would be to classify the various acts passed within the year. His functions would, of course, be at first extremely tentative; but, no doubt, as they became gradually more defined, they would prove highly useful. Before concluding, it was right also to mention that his right hon. friend the Home Secretary intended to introduce a measure into the other House on the subject to which a noble lord had alluded—namely, that of secondary punishments. Having made this announcement, he trusted their lordships would not think that the Government had been idle during the recess in the important matter of the amendment of the law.

HOUSE OF COMMONS FEB. 4.

Mr. CRAUFURD moved for leave to bring in a bill to render judgments or decrees obtained in certain courts in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively effectual in any other part of the united kingdom.

Colonel FRENCH asked whether this was the same bill which had been successfully resisted for the last four or five sessions?

Mr. CRAUFURD said, it was the same bill, but it had been approved by the Conference on Commercial Law.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was ordered for a second reading on Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, FEB. 5.

SECONDARY PUNISHMENTS.

Mr. MILNES gave notice of his intention, upon the motion for the appointment of a select committee to consider the system of secondary punishments, to move as an amendment that the select committee which sat last year upon the subject of transportation be re-appointed, and instructions given to it to inquire into and report upon the best means of procuring temporary employment for discharged prisoners.

THE VACANT JUDGESHIP.

Mr. GLADSTONE wished to know whether it was intended to fill up the vacancy in the Court of Exchequer caused by the lamented death of Baron Alderson, or whether it was intended to keep open that vacancy until the commission recently appointed to inquire into the state of the judicial establishments in Westminster-hall had made their report?

Sir G. GREY believed it was not intended to keep open the vacancy on the bench of the Court of Exchequer during the prosecution of the inquiries of the commission. The instructions of that commission were to inquire whether any changes could be made consistently with economy and the public convenience, whereby a reduction in the number of judges could be made. At the present time he (Sir G. Grey) was informed that to keep open the vacancy caused by the death of Baron Alderson would cause great public inconvenience.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT, &c.

Mr. HADFIELD, in the absence of Mr. A. Pellatt, obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law of imprisonment for debt, to extend the remedies of creditors, and to punish fraudulent debtors.

The bill was afterwards brought up and read a first time.

CRIMINALS.

Mr. LLOYD DAVIES, in the absence of Mr. Packe, moved an address for copies of all memorials or addresses to the Secretary of State for the Home Department from any public bodies in reference to the criminal state of the country during the year 1856, and up to the present time.

The motion was agreed to.

Transfer of Chancery Causes.

ORDER OF COURT.

Monday, the 2nd day of February, 1857.

Whereas, from the present state of the business before the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls respectively, it is expedient that a portion of the causes set down to be heard before the Master of the Rolls should be transferred to the book of causes to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart. Now, we the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls do hereby order that the several causes set forth in the schedule hereunto subjoined be accordingly transferred from the book of causes of the Master of the Rolls to that of the said Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart. And do also further order that the causes so to be transferred (although the bills in such causes may have been marked for the Master of the Rolls, under the orders of court of the 5th day of May, 1837, and notwithstanding any orders therein made by the Master of the Rolls), shall hereafter be considered and taken as causes originally marked for the Lord Chancellor, and be subject to the same regulations as all causes marked for the Lord Chancellor are subject to the same orders: Provided, nevertheless, that no order made by the Master of the Rolls in any such causes shall be varied or reversed otherwise than by the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices. And this order is to be drawn up by the registrar, and set up in the several offices of this court.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Payments on Wednesday, the 4th of the month, were very heavy, but well and regularly met, money being in fair supply and the demand not excessive.

In the English Funds there was an advance, on that day, of ⅛ per cent., which has not been maintained.

The rates at the Bank of England again continue unaltered.

The fluctuations in the Stock and Share Markets during the month of January have not been large. The operations have resulted in a decline of prices, and there has been generally great flatness. In the English Funds the total decline in the month has amounted to about 1 per cent. In the French 3 per Cents. an advance of full 1 per cent. has been established in the course of the month. In other important Foreign Funds there has been a decline in price commensurate with that in the English Funds. In the English Share Markets the decline has been nearly in an equal ratio with the English Funds. The demand for money in the Discount Market continues active, but there is greater easiness than during the last month. The rates for discount and continuation are high. The state of Trade and Manufactures is believed to be sound and favourable, notwithstanding the high rates of interest. The chief cause of these high rates is still believed to be derived from operations in France.

In the Corn Markets the considerable decline in prices which progressed during the last two weeks of the month of January has been arrested during the present week, but without any general recovery.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 31st January, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,173,235, being an increase of £83,270; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,139,976, showing an increase of £23,694, when compared with the previous return.

The French Government has published an article in favour of the union of Wallachia and Moldavia under one administration. It is sound policy to prefer one powerful state. It has not been shown that there is any such principle of opposition between these states as made the union of Holland and Belgium in 1815 result in early separation. It is alleged that these provinces united would be subservient to Russia, and that the governments of Austria and Turkey are opposed to the union. Possibly the suzerainty of Turkey will be more surely maintained by disunion.

Public attention has been again drawn to the subject of an increase in the capital of the Bank of France, by re-publication last week in the Moniteur of a remarkable note by Napoleon I., sent to the bank in 1810 by his order. It combats in his usual strong and clear terms the principle of augmenting the capital of the bank for the purpose of discounting bills of exchange and making similar advances. When the French Government, during the late war with Russia, negotiated a loan, the whole was readily taken by private persons, shewing that large reserves had accumulated in such hands and were brought forward on that occasion. If it is now intended to adopt the plan of augmenting the capital of the Bank, this appeal to a document bearing the name of the great Napoleon may be made for the purpose of opening again such accumulations. It may be expected that the shares intended to represent the proposed increase in the capital of the Bank will be taken by private persons, without any great diversion of capital now engaged in public investments. It appears that the capital of the Bank of France was augmented from time to time, but no augmentation has taken place during many years past. It now amounts to 90,000,000 fr. (£3,600,000), and there is a reserve fund of nearly £500,000. During the subsequent interval the wealth and population of France has increased so as to make an increase in the capital of the Bank suitable to present circumstances. If such increase be derived from sources of home growth and domestic prosperity, and be managed with even a moderate degree of caution, it is reasonable to expect amendment in the position of the Bank, and consequently a cessation of that drain upon the money markets of other countries, which is believed to have been very costly to the Bank of France, and also to have been the cause of inconvenient disarrangement in the Bullion and Discount Markets on this side the water.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 14, 1857.

THE TIMES ON LAW AND LAWYERS..

From time immemorial lawyers have been the best abused class in the country. Playwrights and novelists, journalists and demagogues, have at all times been accustomed to make much capital out of the profession. All this railing proves little, except that lawyers have a larger influence, whether for good or evil, than most other classes in the community. The mischief which can be effected by an unscrupulous solicitor is as great as the benefits which an upright one bestows upon society; but, unfortunately, the good which results from the daily labour of the profession is known only to their clients, while the evil machinations of an occasional black sheep are paraded before the world with all the embellishments which the masters of fiction know how to add. For the most part, the imputations of the press are harmless enough; and no solicitor, we suppose, has ever felt particularly annoyed by such fanciful portraits as Mr. OILY GAMMON, or the highly influential firm of DODSON and FOGG. We may laugh at the ignorance which could take Bardell v. Pickwick as a model of a trial at law, and Jarndyce v. Jarndyce as a fair specimen of the Court of Chancery. But there is a limit to the license to be allowed to the press; and however much we may be disposed to smile at the amusing caricatures of a romance, we have a right to protest against the systematic defamation which the Times, above all other publications, delights to indulge in, whenever law and lawyers are under discussion. Of course we do not pretend that a dishonest lawyer is an impossibility, any more than a dishonest journalist or a corrupt member of Parliament. But we do confidently assert that there is no class in the kingdom possessing an influence like that enjoyed by our profession which furnishes so small a proportion of instances where the power is abused. The Times, however, never lets slip an opportunity for a sneer at the law, and has for some time bestowed its insinuations with especial liberality on that portion of the profession whose practice lies in the Court of Chancery. Whatever the immediate subject may be, if it have any connection with law, it is sure to be made the occasion for the stereotyped sneer. A leader which appeared on Thursday is the last example. The object was to write down the proposed transfer of testamentary jurisdiction from Doctors' Commons to a court over which one of the Vice-Chancellors was intended to preside; and the argument is summed up in the following choice sentence:—"The nation feels that any change which should throw all the wills of the country into Chancery, at the mercy of a profession, some of whom are notoriously unscrupulous, must be regarded as a change from better to worse—as a fall from a more bearable to an intolerable place of torment." The question, whether Sir J. DODSON or a Vice-Chancellor should sit in the Court of Probate, is not a very important one after all; but, even if it were, it might surely be discussed without casting a most undeserved imputation upon the solicitors of the Court of Chancery. The ignorance of the Times as to the nature of proceedings in equity is as conspicuous as its injustice to Chancery practitioners. It steadily ignores the revolution which was effected by the statutes of 1852, and goes on denouncing the remodelled court for evils which have long since ceased to exist. But the historical character acquired by the High Court of Chancery, when arrears accumulated and judgments were deferred for years, in the old Tory days of Lord ELDON, had worked its way thoroughly into the popular mind; and, thanks to the pertinacious misrepresentations of the Times, one-half of the world still believes that it takes years to obtain the judgment of a court of equity, and that the simplest case is buried in a useless mass of multitudinous pleadings. It is easier to pander to a vulgar prejudice than to represent things as they actually are; and a court which disposes of all its business term after term with scarcely a cause in arrear, is still pictured as a monstrous engine of vexatious delay. "If," says the Times, "there be one branch of our legal system which stinks in the nostrils of the public more than another, it is just this Court of Chancery, with its interminable delays, vexatious rules, and halting jurisdiction." Accusations more exactly the reverse of the truth could scarcely have been made. Everyone who knows anything of the procedure of courts of common law and equity must be perfectly well aware that the decision of a contested question can be obtained with even greater rapidity in a court of equity under the new practice than by the more elaborate process of a common law action. It is matter equally familiar to every practitioner, that, so far from the practice being incumbered with vexatious rules, the mode in which the real questions in dispute are brought before the court is so simple, that a decision turning on a merely technical point of pleading is almost unheard of. Some inconveniences undoubtedly arise from the method of stating a case at large, in the place of the more scientific pleadings of the courts of common law; but the great merit of the system is precisely that which the Times denies it—viz., the absence of strict and vexatious rules, and the certainty that the judgment must depend, not on the skill of the pleader, but on the merits of the cause. The charge of halting jurisdiction is even more ingeniously absurd. The encroachments of equity have been often regarded with jealousy; but the notion that the most comprehensive jurisdiction in the country is a halting one, is certainly the most amusing charge that ever was brought against the Chancellor's Court. We do not know when we shall hear the last of the story of interminable delay. So long as the Court of Chancery continues to be an office for the administration of trusts, and the management of estates, there will always be suits extending over many years. An infant cannot attain his majority until he has lived twenty-one years, even though he be a ward of court; nor can any judicial activity bring a remainder into possession during the existence of a tenant for life. By whatever tribunal the administration of trusts, dependent on the deaths of some persons or the majority of others, may be directed, the business cannot be brought to a close until the period of distribution has arrived. But these proceedings are not, in any proper sense, suits at all; and though the Times and a portion of the public may choose to confound things which are essentially distinct, it is not the less true that Chancery litigation, as distinguished from Chancery administration, is conducted with simpler forms and dispatched with greater speed than that of any other court of superior jurisdiction. Skilfully as the Acts of 1852 were framed, experience has shown that there is still room for further improvements; but it will be in vain to look for assistance in future reforms from those who, after the lapse of several years, have been unable to open their eyes to the extensive improvements which have been already effected. We have no expectation that the Times will be induced to do justice to the equity practitioners or to any other branch of our profession. It must have some unpopular institution to cudgel; and as the Court of Chancery, in years gone by, won for itself a not undeserved character for delay and complexity, the Times finds it easier to perpetuate an old prejudice than to cast about for new subjects for its slashing writer. Gradually the truth will become known in spite of calumny; but so long as popular ignorance makes the Court of Chancery a convenient subject for abuse and ridicule, it is not likely that the Times will deny itself the pleasure of attacking it. There are too many members of Parliament who take their ideas of law from the representations of the daily press, and we shall watch with some jealousy the tone which our representatives may think fit to adopt in speaking of the legal profession.

THE DEBATE ON TRANSPORTATION.

The debate on Sir George Grey's motion for leave to bring in a bill on the subject of transportation and penal servitude, which took place on Monday last, opened the discussion of one of the most important of the subjects which are to be handled during the session. It seems to us to have elicited a statement rather than a solution of the numerous difficulties by which the question is beset. The substance of Sir George Grey's very long speech may be very shortly expressed. Omitting that part of it which explains once more the difference between the popular and the technical meaning of the phrase "ticket of leave," we pass at once to the part which specified the contents of the projected act. It is proposed that the punishment of transportation eo nomine should be abolished, and that that of penal servitude should in all cases be substituted for it; but that instead of four, six, and eight years, the sentences of penal servitude should be for seven, ten, and fourteen years respectively, and that sentences of transportation for twenty years, or for life, should be replaced by sentences of penal servitude for the same time; but, as we understand the proposal, these periods are to be subject to reduction on good behaviour, and the Government are to have the power of sending the prisoners abroad if they can find places to send them to. The result of the whole is, that whereas under the old system transportation generally meant penal servitude, penal servitude is, under the new system, sometimes to mean transportation. Under the old system, Government could either send the prisoners abroad or keep them at home; under the new, they have the option of keeping them at home or sending them abroad; under the old, seven, ten, and fourteen, meant four, five, and six; under the new, they are to mean five, seven, and ten years respectively. The change seems little more important than the transition from six to half-a-dozen. As regards the working of the scheme, Sir George Grey hopes to be able for a few years to send 250 convicts per annum to Western Australia; and he throws out a hint that incorrigible criminals are to be imprisoned, or rather restrained for life, in some part of Great Britain. If the plan is intended only to gain time for the purpose of maturing a larger scheme, based upon intelligible principles, we have no objections to offer to this proposal. But it is merely idle to suppose that it has thrown any sort of light upon the question. It leaves it just where it found it; and Sir George Grey admits this distinctly, for he tells us that there is no difficulty at all in finding employment for any number of convicts on public works, but that the real question is, what we are to do with them after their sentences are expired. This is what is meant by the cry—ill-informed, no doubt, but, as Sir J. Pakington said, rather misdirected than exaggerated—about tickets of leave. The technical details about transportation and penal servitude are quite unimportant; the state of the case, stripped of all such accessories, is as plain as anything can be. So long as we had the power of really transporting out of the country as many persons as we pleased, transportation was a very great convenience, for it amounted in almost every case, whether the term was a long or a short one, to banishment for life. We sent our criminal away, and no more was heard of him. This state of things has been brought to a close by the progress in the population and wealth of the Australian colonies; and the simple question is, what we are to substitute for it? About nine-tenths of our criminals must henceforth stay at home, and what are we to do with them? This is the question which is really proposed by the clamour about tickets of leave, and we again declare our conviction that the debate of Monday last has not advanced one step towards its solution.

The sensible speeches of Mr. Collier and Mr. Adderley afforded some hints upon the subject, which contain the germ of important measures. Mr. Collier seemed to recognise the necessity of a classification of crimes, and Mr. Adderley the corresponding necessity of a classification of puuishments. We are convinced that if these desiderata were once supplied, we should find that almost all the questions relating to convicts would solve themselves. We do not pretend to have a complete classification to offer, but some species of crime are sufficiently well marked to be distinguished at once. It is quite clear, for example, that incorrigible criminals form a class by themselves. In Captain Chesterton's Revelations of Prison Life there is an account of several of these villains. One of them brutally outraged his own daughter, was suspected of several murders, and was finally hanged for killing a warder of the prison; another was also suspected of murder, and was by profession a highway robber; a third "considered revenge a sacred duty," and made a desperate attempt to take the life of Captain Chesterton himself. One man of this kind does more harm to his fellow convicts than twenty ordinary thieves or swindlers, for his force of character gives him a sort of moral superiority over them, which may be perverted to the very worst purposes. If the unwise compassion of the age saves such fiends from hanging, the least that can be done is to imprison them for life, like any other furious wild beasts. Another class might consist of those who commit strange occasional crimes. Cases of manslaughter, which border on murder, savage cutting and wounding, outrages on women, and the like, are generally committed by men who have little in common with ordinary criminals, and who are often in a position in life which proves that no amount of education will reform them. How would an opportunity of earning an honest livelihood as a shepherd in Australia tend to reform a man who had kicked his wife to death? Crimes of this kind are to be kept down by the universal sentiment of hatred and horror which they inspire, and that sentiment is nourished by visiting those who commit them with terrible and exemplary punishment. Hard labour in chains, or bodily pain, might be very beneficial in cases of this sort. Another class is that of the common professional thief. This is no doubt the class for which it is most difficult to provide, and it appears to us to be that which would be most likely to reward the exertions of philanthropists. To this class, imprisonment and hard labour, ending sooner or later, if possible, in some form of transportation, would be appropriate. Another class is that of occasional thieves—boys and young men who commit a first offence, servants who pilfer from their masters, and the like. For this class of offenders it is, we believe, almost universally acknowledged that short terms of imprisonment are worse than useless. We should prefer to see them visited by short and sharp penalties, soon inflicted, and very uncomfortable. Two days of a dark cell would be a severer punishment, and one likely to make far more impression on the imagination of a young offender than a month's hard labour. For boys not confirmed in habits of thieving we have always thought that a sound whipping would be the fittest punishment. We would also suggest, that as names have a great influence over the imagination, the phrase "felon," which is at present quite unmeaning, should be confined to criminals belonging to the first two classes, "misdemeanant" to those comprised in the third, and that the fourth class should merely be described as "offenders." We only make these suggestions to illustrate our meaning. But we are firmly convinced that no ingenuity will give efficiency to the existing system of punishment, or to that now proposed, so long as no attempt is made to classify the persons who are to be submitted to it. We also feel that there never was a subject that more demanded the resources of a statesman's intellect. It may be true enough that for the present an adjournment of the question for three or four years is all that can be expected, but we hope that the interval so gained may be fruitful in some measure which will be more than a mere stop-gap.

Legal News.

An incident occurred at the last session of the Central Criminal Court, which appears to us so horrible that we feel it a most imperative, though a very unpleasant duty, to call attention to it. But for the sagacity of Mr. Baron Bramwell, an innocent man would have been condemned to transportation for life upon the most atrocious of all accusations. It appears that a man was accused by a boy of an unnatural crime; he was convicted by the jury, sentence of death was recorded, and he would have been consigned to lifelong punishment and infamy if the judge had not suspected the veracity of the testimony against him. He sent the boy in a cab with a police-officer to the scene of the alleged crime, and on his way the boy confessed that his story was utterly false. The judge ordered the jury to reconsider their verdict, and the man was then acquitted. The utmost punishment which can be inflicted upon the boy for this offence is four years penal servitude; and, as two witnesses are required to sustain a charge of perjury, he may possibly be acquitted, as he certainly would have been but for his own admission. Surely this is a fact more frightful in its nature than any of the legal mistakes to which our attention has so often been called. It is awful to think how often the same thing may have occurred without detection, nor can one easily exaggerate the degree of caution which juries ought to exercise in cases which almost always rest on the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness, and which must often have had their origin in an obscene fancy working upon a malignant disposition.

The anxiety expressed by certain of our legislators in the last session of Parliament, lest the country should be burdened with the unnecessary payment of judges' salaries, appears to have been ill-founded. The vacancy occasioned by the lamented death of Baron Alderson has only just been filled; and the indisposition of Chief Justice Cockburn, during Hilary Term, has, on some days, reduced the available strength of the Court of Common Pleas to four judges. If any suppose that the number of twelve judges of the superior courts would now be sufficient for the satisfactory discharge of all the various functions of these tribunals, we think that the experience of the last few weeks is sufficient to refute them. All the three courts have found occasion to sit in Banco during the present vacation; at the same time the Nisi Prius business demands the attention of one judge of each court, and there is business every afternoon at chambers, which cannot be postponed without serious injury to the suitors. Thus, the full court will, under ordinary circumstances, consist of four judges in the morning and only three in the afternoon; but if as has happened lately, a judgeship should be vacant or a judge be temporarily disabled, the court can only begin its work with three members, and will presently be reduced to two. The notion that the presence of four judges is necessary to the full efficiency of a common law court, however it may have originated, is certainly well fortified by antiquity. Lately we observed that a committee of the Law Amendment Society ventured to broach the idea that three judges constituted a more efficient tribunal than four. This suggestion may or may not deserve serious notice; but this is certain, that it has not yet been adopted by our Legislature, and great consideration ought to be exercised before arrangements are made, which would necessarily, though perhaps not intentionally, involve its adoption. Several cases have recently occurred in which the decision of three judges has certainly not been regarded by the profession as satisfactory. We do not mean to say that the presence of another judge would either have produced a different decision, or imparted greater authority to that which was actually given; still it is proper to point out that the law contemplates a court of four judges, and as the result of that arrangement, that no decision shall be given in case of difference, except by a majority of three to one. It may be added that although the Court of Exchequer Chamber consists in theory of eight judges, it is by no means uncommon to see this tribunal getting through its work with six or even five members only present. In this way, it may happen that the decision of three or four judges is reviewed, and perhaps reversed, by five or six judges of no greater experience or learning, and of merely co-ordinate authority, and besides these every-day functions of the fifteen judges, the Court of Chancery is empowered and required to call upon them to give their aid in deciding legal questions which formerly used to be sent to courts of law. And now that the session has commenced, the assistance of twelve judges may not unfrequently be required in the House of Lords, besides which there is the usual routine of duty to be provided for at the Old Bailey. It therefore appears to us, that, whatever may be the force of the other arguments in favour of making the new Court of Probate a common law court, that proposal certainly cannot be rested on the ground that the fifteen judges have not enough to do already, and are in a position to undertake a new and by no means an easy task. These considerations are sufficient, without the aid of a commission of inquiry, to conduct us to the conclusion that the number of judges is not too large, and we are glad to observe that the Government has not delayed the appointment of a successor to Baron Alderson until the commission shall have made its report. We believe there can be no worse economy than that of underpaying or overworking judges; and it is a little surprising that this truth should not be more fully evident to some of our most distinguished politicians. There can be no doubt whatever that delay in hearing and deciding causes drives litigants to compromise. Whether this be or be not for the interest of the suitor, we shall not at this moment offer a positive opinion; of this, however, we are quite sure, that it is not for the interest of the lawyer. The judicial force in all courts both of law and equity, ought to be sufficient to do the business well and without delay. After a considerable interval, in which the word "arrears" had become almost obsolete, the courts of common law again begin to find that they have more work before them than can be got through during the term. Such a moment, therefore, seems peculiarly inappropriate for diminishing the number of the judges. It may be added that the practice of nominating a serjeant, or Queen's counsel to do the work of a judge of assize, is one which certainly ought not to be more largely resorted to than it is at present. It is easy to say that the learned gentlemen thus employed are equal in experience and ability to many judges, and that a man becomes no better lawyer by being authorised to wear a wig and gown of another pattern. Still suitors are not satisfied, nor are criminals and their friends impressed in the same degree by these substitutes for judges, as they are by the unimpaired majesty of the law. If it be desirable, as we think it is, to maintain the system of circuits, it ought to be maintained in its integrity; and the substitution of counsel, however well qualified, in the place of real judges, will certainly not give satisfaction in the provinces.

The observations of Lord LYNDHURST, in Tuesday night's debate, as to the necessity for abolishing the action of crim. con., are strongly illustrated by the case of Ling v. Croker, tried in the Court of Common Pleas on Saturday last. The letters produced in the course of this trial were offensive in the highest degree to public decency. The case presented, however, some features more unusual than the production of licentious correspondence, or the statement of disgusting details, an attempt was made to prove that the plaintiff consented to his wife's dishonour, and troubled himself only about exacting from the adulterer a sufficient consideration for the indulgence. The defendant's case was rested on three letters, which, if genuine, must have put the plaintiff out of court. The verdict of the jury, giving £1,000 damages, implies that, in their opinion, these letters were a forgery. This conclusion, however, was not arrived at without considerable hesitation, and the evidence of the plaintiff, as to whether the letters were or were not in his handwriting, was of course excluded by the nature of the case. In the opinion of Lord LYNDHURST, however, the principal objection to these actions is not exactly what we have above stated. He says that it is inconsistent with the manly character of the English nation to attempt to satisfy the laws of honour in this way. Upon this it may be remarked that the law of honour, as ordinarily understood, would scarcely be better satisfied by a more speedy and cheaper process of divorce, or by the legal punishment of the adulterer in person, instead of pocket. The noble ex-Chancellor seems rather to point to another method of satisfaction, formerly much in use in England, and still very prevalent abroad. It may be noticed that another lawyer, Mr. SLADE in a recent case at Nisi Prius, uttered a somewhat similar expression of regret at the disuse of duelling, which he seemed to think a much better remedy than a lawsuit in cases like that in which he was engaged. This indiscreet praise by a lawyer, of a practice which was always a violation of the law was not received with favour by the presiding judge.

The Judgments' Execution Bill has passed its first stage by a majority of ten, but it is to be feared that the private interests of members may combine with various other causes to render its further progress difficult. One objection urged against the measure is founded on the extreme facility with which judgments are stated to be obtainable in the Scotch courts. Personal service of process, it appears, is not necessary; it is sufficient to leave notice at the usual, or last known, place of residence of the defendant. Now, if that residence be merely a shooting-box, which an Englishman has occupied during a few weeks of autumn, it would seem scarcely reasonable that a visit to the moors should involve the ardent sportsman in liability to judgments, against which he might have no opportunity of protesting. However the Scotch law may stand, it is certain that in some countries the facilities afforded to legal process are so great, as to work an injustice equal to what is elsewhere sustained through the law's delay. We believe that in some States of the American Union a very enlarged liberality prevails—first, in conferring the right to sue, and second, in removing difficulties out of the plaintiff's way. It may happen that a resident in an adjoining State desires to obtain a divorce, but is unwilling to encounter the wrath with which his better-half would receive such a proposal. To attain his object quietly it is only necessary to announce to his wife an intended absence of a few hours, and to make a journey into the neighbouring territory of free and expeditious law. He can at once become plaintiff in a suit for divorce, his wife, the defendant, is required by the court to put in her answer within a fixed time, and in default, judgment will be given for the divorce. The only notice of this proceeding is by advertisement in a newspaper of the state whose tribunal is resorted to; and this newspaper it is nearly certain the wife will never see. At the expiration of the time allowed to plead, the husband again makes a day's journey to look after his suit; the wife, of course, has not put in any plea to a process of which she has never heard; judgment is given by default; on his return home the decree of divorce is served by the husband on the wife; its validity is recognised in the state in which they have been residing, and thus the husband has obtained his object without the necessity of disagreeable discussions, in which, perhaps, he might have fared indifferently. This is certainly an example of improving and expediting legal procedure to a point that would be more intolerable than the most tedious delays of the unreformed Court of Chancery. It cannot be desirable to assimilate our law and practice to the very advanced pitch of civilisation which is stated to have been attained in some parts of the United States. At the same time we are far from asserting that the Judgments' Execution Bill would have any such effect.

BUSINESS OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.—Although the court has sat during four whole days since term, there still remain many cases in the several papers. In the new Trial Paper, twenty-two cases have been disposed of, and seventeen remain, in the majority of which the rules were granted during the last term. In the Special Paper, twenty-two cases have been argued, and there remain eight. In the Crown Paper, nine have been disposed of, and three remain. Twelve cases stand over for judgment,—the day appointed for giving which is Tuesday, the 24th instant. All the causes entered for trial at the sittings in term have been disposed of. The entry for the sittings in London after term is unusually large,—the list shewing seventeen remanets, and eighty-eight new causes, of which thirty-eight are marked for special juries.

BUSINESS OF THE EXCHEQUER.—Much inconvenience has been felt and freely expressed, on more than one occasion, by the Lord Chief Baron, from the want of a judge in the room of the late Baron Alderson. On Wednesday last, the court, in consequence of one of its members being obliged to go to chambers, was under the necessity of adjourning at 2 o'clock; whereupon the Chief Baron said that he regretted to be obliged to take that step at so early an hour, but it was impossible for the court in its present incomplete condition to proceed any further to-day with the Banco business. The want of the full complement of judges had already compelled him to leave two or three special jury causes untried in Middlesex, and he feared that similar results must follow in the city, if the appointment of a judge in the place of the late Mr. Baron Alderson should be still longer delayed.

CRIME IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Rev. John Davis, the Ordinary of Newgate, has just presented to the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, his report for the year 1856, upon the state of crime in the metropolis.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE SYSTEM.—"In the present year many ticket-of-leave men have appeared among us. Those proved in open court to have been at liberty on tickets-of-leave from their exemplary conduct in prison, have had their names transmitted to government. The calculations made public are based on these returns, and it is attempted to be shown by such means what the proportion is between the liberated convicts who reform, and those who fall again into crime. I greatly doubt the accuracy of such returns as underrating what the facts of the case are. On one occasion during the past year, when we had forty-eight men in Newgate under sentence of transportation or penal servitude, the governor took the trouble to inquire, from rumours among the police, from conversations among the prisoners themselves, from the officers who were constantly with them, and various other sources of information, how many out of the forty-eight might be ticket-of-leave men, and he had reasonable proof that somewhere about twenty were so. Not more than one-third of that number could be reported to the government under the present regulations. As a general rule, the ticket-of-leave system fails with men of habitual crime, and should never be applied to them, except in rare instances of exemplary demeanour. There is nothing so much dreaded by habitual thieves as perpetual imprisonment, and to lessen such a sentence there is nothing they would not have recourse to."

GAROTTE ROBBERIES.—"I have often thought, and still think, that the origin of garotte robberies took place from the exhibition of the way the Thugs in India strangle and plunder passengers, as exhibited in the British Museum. However valuable as illustrations of Indian manners such representations may be, I could heartily wish that these models were placed in some more obscure position, and cease to be that which I fear they have been, the means of giving to men addicted to crime and violence an idea how their evil purposes may be accomplished."

RECORDERSHIP OF FALMOUTH.—Edward W. Cox Esq., of the Western Circuit, has been appointed to the recorderships of the borough of Falmouth and Helstone, vice Mr. C. Bevan, appointed judge of the Cornwall County Court.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed (Jan. 29) Francis James Coleridge, of Ottery St. Mary, Devon, gentleman, a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

THE PROVINCE OF COUNSEL.—In a case of Hincks v. Luis, in the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. Serjeant Thomas, who appeared for the defendant, severely, and at great length cross-examined every witness called for the plaintiff; and, in the course of his cross-examination of a German named Luis, he was interrupted by Cockburn, C. J., who said, that, when at the bar, he had always felt the great disadvantages under which a witness laboured, and that, as long as he sat on the bench, he would never allow evidence to be misconstrued, or a witness to be led into a snare, and he concluded with saying, "I do not care a rush, Brother Thomas, what your instructions are; I won't have misconstruction here."

THE NEW BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER.—The seat upon the bench of the Court of Exchequer vacated by the death of the late Baron Alderson, has, we understand, been filled by Mr. Serjeant Channell, who received the appointment on Thursday evening, and was sworn in yesterday.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

By the 51st of the General Orders of the 16th October, 1852, the time within which an application may be made to discharge or vary any certificate or report which has been signed and adopted by the judge sitting in chambers, is eight clear days after the filing of such certificate or report. Following the analogy, however, of the old rule as to reviewing the Master's report, after it had been confirmed, the court has sometimes given leave, in similar cases, to move to vary the certificate of the chief clerk after it has been signed and adopted by the Judge. Thus in Ware v. Watson, 4 W. R. 36; Stuart, V. C., opened the biddings for land sold under the order of the court, though the result of the sale had been certified by the chief clerk and adopted by the V. C., and eight days had elapsed since the date of the certificate. The only ground of the application was that a purchaser could be found at a higher price than had been reserved—in fact, at a "fancy" price; and it was contended for the certified purchaser that under the practice relating to the Master's report, the biddings could not be opened upon such grounds, which appears plain enough from the reported cases. The V. C's. decision went mainly upon the increased discretion given to the Judge as to time, in such cases, by the 58th and 59th of the General Orders of the 16th October, 1852. The Lords Justices, however, on appeal reversed this decision, being of opinion that it required a much stronger case than this to open the biddings after the certificate became absolute. Their lordships also ruled that in calculating the eight days within which there must be a summons or motion to discharge or vary, the vacations were not excluded, there being nothing in the statute to prevent the statutes then running.

In Howell v. Kightley, 4 W. R. 477, the Lords Justices still more distinctly enunciated the rule that, after eight days, the certificate is on the same footing as a report confirmed absolute; and therefore it follows that the decisions relating to reviewing or varying the master's report are, mutatis mutandis, entirely applicable to cases in which it is sought to vary or discharge the chief clerk's certificate. In Ashton v. Wood, 5 W. R. 271, leave to move to vary the certificate after eight days was granted by the Lords Justices, affirming the order of Stuart, V. C., the suit being for specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of land, and it appearing that the reason why the motion to vary was not made in time—within the eight days—was a mistake or misapprehension of the clerk of the solicitor of the plaintiff, who now moved for leave to move, as to the practice of the court in such a case. The chief clerk's certificate was to the effect that the plaintiff had not made a good title to the land, and the evidence was that the solicitor's clerk was under the impression that the question arising upon the title could be brought before the court, notwithstanding the certificate, when the cause came on for further consideration—a mistake, no doubt, arising from the practice now general of setting down the motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate to be heard when the cause comes on for further consideration, and forgetting that the notice of motion must be served within eight days after the certificate has been signed by the judge.

Apart from any question of irregularity, the only ground for vacating the inrolment of a decree, appears to be the mala fides of the party who has obtained inrolment; or perhaps, as the head note of Backhouse v. Wylde, 5 W. R. 245, puts it, a party seeking to vacate the inrolment of a decree must show that he has been misled by the party who has obtained inrolment. It has been decided that the speed, or even the extraordinary haste, of the party inrolling, or, where he has done nothing to mislead the other party, the surprise of the latter, is not a sufficient ground for vacating the inrolment of a decree. Unless in the case of such irregularity as was complained of in Robinson v. Newdick, 3 Mer. 13, the only safe ground for a motion to vacate an inrolment is, that the party applying has actually been misled by the party who has inrolled, as was stated by the Lord Chancellor to be the rule in Backhouse v. Wylde.

Another useful point of practice was decided in Lady Londonderry v. Bramwell, 5 W. R. 247. The plaintiff after the time for replication had expired, had served the defendant with notice of motion for decree, together with a list of the affidavits which he intended to read. The time within which the defendant might file his affidavits expired on the 23rd January, having been enlarged on the 15th of January, and the defendant's solicitor applied at the Examiner's office for the appointment of a day to cross-examine some of the plaintiff's witnesses, and could not get a day named earlier than the 3rd of February. He then applied to have further time to put in his affidavits, in order that he might first cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses, upon the ground that it was material for his defence that cross-examination should take place before filing the affidavits of his own witnesses. Wood, V. C., refused the application. His Honour considered that neither the Legislature nor the general Orders of the court had conceived it to be proper that the witnesses on the other side should be cross-examined by a party before putting in his own affidavits; and, moreover, there was nothing to prevent both sides putting in affidavits on the last day allowed.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

AWARD—SIGNING JUDGMENT ON, TIME FOR.

O'Toole v. Potts, 5 W. R., Q. B., 256.

This was an application to set aside a judgment which had been signed in August, 1856, by the plaintiff, for whom (by an order of Nisi Prius) a verdict had been taken at the sittings after Trinity Term in the same year, subject to a reference of the cause, and of all matters in difference. The award had been taken up by the plaintiff in July. It was now contended that he should have waited till the end of the ensuing Michaelmas Term, before signing judgment, and taxing his costs; but the court refused to interfere.

This case marks an important distinction between the time at which proceedings can be taken to enforce an award made upon a reference where no cause is in existence, and one which is made upon reference of a cause, whether "all matters in difference" be or be not at the same time referred. In the case first mentioned, such proceedings cannot, as it would seem, be taken till the end of the term next after making the award; for, during that period, the party against whom the award is made may move to set it aside; but, in the latter case, the successful party may sign judgment, and tax his costs, on the expiration of fourteen days "after the award." A question might possibly arise, however, as to the time when, for the purpose of the above calculation, the time begins to run—whether from the time that the verdict was formally entered—i.e., at the time of the trial of the action—or from the date of the award itself, or from the time it was taken up. All that can with certainty be deduced from the above case, as reported, is, that after such an award has been taken up, the successful party may, on the expiration of fourteen days (the period prescribed by the 120th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and by R. G. H. T., 1853 (Pr.), r. 57, for issuing execution on a verdict), proceed to enforce it. And this seems the proper meaning and application of the R. G. H. T., 1853 (Pr.), r. 170, that "costs may be taxed on an award, notwithstanding the time for setting aside the award has not elapsed."

It is suggested by Mr. Russell, in his work on Arbitration (p. 623, 2nd edit.), that the object of the above rule was to assimilate the practice of the Common Pleas and the Exchequer, which, before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was different in this respect—the Common Pleas holding that costs could not be taxed on such an award till the time of moving to set aside had expired (Holdell v. Miller, 2 Scott (N. S.), 163), and the Exchequer considering that the successful party might sign judgment, and tax his costs, as soon as he was at liberty to issue execution—i.e. (under the former practice), within the first four days of the next term.

COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OF OFFICE.

Regina v. Mayor of Brighton, 5 W. R., Q. B., 257.

This was a decision as to the principle on which compensation for office, is claimable under the Municipal Corporation Act. It was claimed under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 66, which awards compensation to any officer whose office "shall be abolished" under the provisions of the act. But, in the case under consideration, it could only be established that the emoluments of the office (which was that of clerk of the peace for the county of Sussex) had been diminished in consequence of the establishment of a separate court of quarter sessions for the borough of Brighton; and it was admitted that the applicant had still some duties to perform in the capacity of clerk of the peace for the county, within that borough. The court held, that though the statute should be liberally construed with regard to the matter of compensation, yet that it was necessary to bring the case in which such compensation was claimed within the words of the act; and that a mere diminution of profits was apparently a casus omissus in the statute.

ATTACHMENT—RULE NISI—SHOWING CAUSE—PERSONAL SERVICE.

In re ——, 5 W. R., B. C., 260; Russell v. Dodd, Ib., 267.

The first of these cases was an attempt to break through the well-known rule of practice, which prevents a rule nisi for an attachment obtained on the last (or last but one) day of term being made returnable at chambers unless by consent (See Fall v. Fall, 2 D. P. C. 88; Tetley v. Suran, 3 W. R., Ex., 551; Casse v. Wright, 14 C. B. 562). The endeavour was unsuccessful.

In the second case (Russell v. Dodd) another point, as to the practice on attachments, was affirmed—viz., that in all cases the rule or writ in respect of which the contempt has been committed must be personally served on the party against whom the attachment is prayed. In this case a judge's order for interrogatories under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, had been obtained by the defendant, and served, with the interrogatories, on the plaintiff's attorney. And there being no answer to the interrogatories within the proper time, the defendant obtained a rule nisi for the contempt of not answering, which was also served on the plaintiff's attorney—personal service on the plaintiff himself being found, in both cases, to be impossible. But Mr. Justice Erle (though he consented to enlarge the rule nisi) refused a rule for an attachment without personal service of such rule.

It may, however, be remarked that the "affidavit of service" need not, in positive terms, allege personal service; it is sufficient if it aver facts from which the court can satisfy itself that the rule or writ reached the hands of the party to whom it was addressed, and that he understood its import. See Re Morris, 22, L. J. (N. S.) Q. B., 417; Re Pyne, 1 D. & L. 703; Re Whalley, 14 Mee. & W., 731.

POLICE MAGISTRATE—COMPELLING ADJUDICATION.

Regina v. Paynter, 5 W. R., Q. B., 267.

This was a rule (applied for under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5, which substitutes in certain cases such an application for the process of mandamus), calling upon Mr. Paynter, the police magistrate, to show cause why he should not proceed to adjudicate, and to convict, on a summons granted by him against the Gas-light and Coke Company for unlawfully breaking up certain pavements without the necessary consent of the Board of Works for the district. Mr. Paynter, after hearing the case, wished to dismiss the summons; but on being pressed by the solicitor of the complainant either to refuse to adjudicate or to inflict a penalty, in order that the matter might be referred to the Queen's Bench, refused to adjudicate accordingly. The court, however, in some alarm, declined to interfere, intimating that were they to take a contrary course, any petty sessions might shift from themselves the burthen of adjudication in any case brought before them. It was not, they observed, a voluntary refusal on the part of the magistrate to adjudicate; for if he had followed the dictates of his own judgment, he would have decided the case by dismissing the summons. Crompton, J., added, that the Court of Queen's Bench in such cases was a court of appeal, not a court of advice.

ATTORNEY—AUTHORITY TO RECEIVE INTEREST OR PRINCIPAL ON MORTGAGE.

Kent v. Thomas, 1 H. & N. 473.

The defendant in this case had borrowed a sum of money from the plaintiff, through the agency of one P., who prepared the mortgage deed, and was the only attorney employed. Interest was paid regularly by the defendant to P., from whom for some time the plaintiff received it, in due course, at P.'s office; but after some time he ceased to receive it, and was told by P. that it had remained unpaid by the defendant, who was abroad. P. never received from the plaintiff power to receive any part of the principal of the debt owing from the defendant; but the defendant from time to time, on the application of P., paid to him sums of money on account of such principal debt. After some time the plaintiff requested from the defendant payment of the arrears of interest, and gave notice that he also required repayment of the principal. He was then informed by the defendant that the arrears of interest had been regularly paid; and that he had, moreover, paid off to P. a considerable portion of the principal debt. After some correspondence between the plaintiff and defendant, it appeared that P. had deceived both, and had appropriated both the interest paid and also the sums paid on account of the principal. Under these circumstances, a special case was framed, by consent, for the opinion of the court, whether the payments made by the defendant to P. were a good answer, pro tanto, to an action brought by the plaintiff on the covenant in the mortgage deed for payment of the principal and interest.

It was held by the court that the plaintiff had treated P. as his agent to receive the interest, and, therefore, that quoad the interest the defendant was discharged; but that the plaintiff had never given P. any power to receive any part of the principal, and therefore that the defendant quoad the sums paid on account thereof, must be the one to suffer.

This case is very similar, in some of its circumstances, to another which occurred in the year 1850 (Wilkinson v. Candlish, 5 Exch. 91). There one D., who acted as the attorney both for the borrower and the lender, retained possession of the mortgage deed, and received and paid over the interest as it fell due to the lender; but, on the principal being paid to him by the borrower, appropriated it to his own use, and afterwards died insolvent. Lord Wensleydale, in delivering the judgment of the court, directing the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, who (as in the case above noticed) sued on the covenant for repayment in the mortgage deed, pointed out that an authority to receive the interest of a mortgage by no means imports an authority to receive the principal; and the Court of Exchequer held that of such authority as last mentioned, neither the possession of the mortgage deed by D., nor his receipt of interest under it, was any evidence.

Professional Intelligence.

WOULFE AND ANOTHER v. PROPERT.

The plaintiffs are tailors in Conduit-street, and this was an action to recover their bill for clothes supplied to the defendant to the amount of £107 while a student at Haileybury College.

The defendant having pleaded infancy, the plaintiffs replied that the clothes in question were "necessaries."

In support of the plaintiffs' case the following evidence was given:—

John Philip Woulfe stated that he furnished all the articles charged in this bill, except those which were put down as clothes, but really were money lent and silk furnished. Those items amount to £13 13s.

The CHIEF BARON: A grosser and more abominable fraud I don't know of. If a tailor lends a youth money and charges it to his parent as goods sold, that is, in my opinion, worse than picking a pocket.

Examination resumed: I lent the defendant various sums at different periods. I charged the loans as goods at the defendant's request when I asked him to repay them. I objected to do so, but he said, "Well, if you don't you won't get your money."

The CHIEF BARON: If you had obtained this money from the father you would have been liable to be transported for fourteen years; even now you may be proceeded against for a misdemeanour in attempting to obtain the money.

Cross-examination resumed: I threatened to arrest the defendant on the day he was to go in for his examination, because he broke faith with me.

The affidavit of the witness, on which the defendant was about to be arrested at the suit of the plaintiffs, was then put into the witness's hand. From that document it appeared that the witness swore that the defendant was indebted to his firm in the sum of £107 "for goods sold in the way of their business as tailors and clothiers."

The CHIEF BARON: I have never yet taken such a step, but I now order you not to leave the court till the close of the case. You have acknowledged that you have committed perjury in that affidavit when you swore that the defendant was indebted to you £107 for goods sold and delivered as tailors and clothiers.

The Witness: No, my lord. I signed it at the request of my attorneys, to whom I left the matter.

The CHIEF BARON, in summing up the case, observed that there were certain actions against which judges and jurors should make a firm stand—actions against husbands for goods supplied to extravagant wives; and for goods supplied to an excessive extent to infants, which were virtually actions against their parents. This action was of the latter class, and the question was whether the goods for which it was brought were necessaries, the defendant being clearly an infant at the time of their sale. As to the mode in which the plaintiff had sworn the affidavit, it was, to say the least, very careless, and it was no excuse for him to put it on his attorney, and to say he swore it as a mere matter of form.—Verdict for the defendant.

CRISP v. SIR ROBERT GYLL.

In the course of summing up the plaintiff's evidence in this cause,

Mr. Slade said, if his client had been in the same position with the defendant there would have been one of three courses adopted. Either there would have been an apology made by the defendant, or else there would have been a hostile meeting—

The CHIEF BARON: That is all over now.

Mr. Slade: No, my Lord, I hope that it is not all over.

The CHIEF BARON: For the honour of the country of which we are both members I trust that it is all over. Sitting here in my public position, I cannot hear you publicly state that duelling is one of the courses to be adopted when a man considers himself injured, without saying that in this Christian country such methods of redress are no longer pursued.

Mr. Slade: Well, my Lord, I hope it is all over; but I must say that it was a very good check upon impertinence. In former times, however, if a man had refused to make an apology, or to fight, he would have been soundly horsewhipped.

DENNE v. LIGHT.

This was an appeal from a decree of Vice-Chancellor Stuart.

The affidavits being contradictory, the court determined that Mr. Nightingale, the agent for the plaintiff, and Mr. Hatch, the son-in-law of Mr. Light, should be examined viva voce; but, as the counsel on each side refused to initiate the examination, the same was conducted by the Lords Justices.

Lectures at the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. MALCOLM KERR ON THE STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. Kerr, in his lecture of the 2nd instant, resumed the consideration of the Statutes of Limitations, and proceeded to notice the statutes applicable to actions on specialties. He observed that the same period of twenty years, within which an entry must be made or an ejectment brought to recover the possession of land, had been fixed by the 40th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, as that within which rights that affected the realty must be enforced. Any action, suit, or other proceeding to recover money secured by a mortgage or lien, or otherwise charged upon land, or a legacy, must be brought within twenty years after a present right to receive the same had accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge or release. Actions for rent, or on a lease by deed, or on a bond or other specialty, and all actions or other proceedings on recognisances must, by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, be brought within twenty years after the cause of action had accrued.

Although the period of limitations in these cases was the same, it was created by different statutes, but it was more convenient to class mortgages and matters of record with bonds and recognisances as specialties, and particularly as Blackstone had so done in vol. 2, c. 20, where he described "obligations on bonds and recognisances," as deeds not used to convey, but to charge or incumber lands.

The limitation prescribed by the 40th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was not restricted to actions against real estate, but it affected charges on real estate whether sought to be enforced against the real or personal representatives (Shepherd v. Duke, 9 Sim. 567). The words of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, were "money secured by any mortgage, judgment, lien, or otherwise charged on land, or any legacy," and the section related to actions brought to recover the money either on the covenant usually inserted in the mortgage-deed, or on the bond which not unfrequently accompanied it (Doe d. Williams v. Jones, 5 A. & E. 290). Such action, therefore, more usually fell within the limitation prescribed by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, which applied to "actions of covenant on any bond or other specialty." In equity a mortgage was a charge upon land, and a foreclosure suit was to recover a sum so charged, and was within the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40 (Du Vigier v. Lee, 2 Hare, 326). This case also decided that the mortgagee was entitled, in a foreclosure suit to carry back the interest account for the period of twenty years; and, on the other hand, that the court would not compel the mortgagor, when he sought to redeem the land, to pay all the arrears of interest, without reference to the statute. For the reason that actions on covenants in bonds and mortgage deeds fell within the statute of limitations as to specialties, there were almost no common law cases on this section—the questions principally arising in foreclosure suits.

No suit or other proceeding could be taken on a judgment, but within twenty years after a present right to receive the money had accrued. This applied to a case in which a judgment was sought to be enforced against the personal as well as against the real estate (Watson v. Birch, 15 Sim. 532). It applied of course in administration suits as well as at law. Therefore, where a judgment creditor allowed twenty years to elapse, and then, finding that in an administration suit which had been instituted in the meantime there was a decree for payment of the specialty creditors, attempted to prove his debt, it was held that he was barred by this section (Berrington v. Evans, 1 Y. & C. Ch. 434). Before the statute, a bill filed by any creditor on behalf of himself and the others would have prevented the statute running against any one of the creditors who came in under the decree (Sterndale v. Hankinson, 1 Sim. 393). The law in this respect had therefore been completely altered. The application of this section at common law was well illustrated in the recent case of Loveless v. Richardson, 4 W. R. 617. There, an application was made for leave to issue a scire facias on a judgment more than twenty years old. It did not appear that there had been any payment or acknowledgment within the twenty years, and the court, in the absence of such facts, refused to put the defendant to the trouble of pleading the statute of limitations. It should be recollected that a scire facias, or, as it was now termed, a writ of revivor, was the proper mode of reviving a judgment, and that the Common Law Procedure Act prescribed the different periods within which such a writ might be issued. It issued as of course within ten years of the judgment, after ten and within fifteen years only on a rule to show cause. This was important, for the scire facias created a new right altogether (Farrell v. Gleeson, 11 C. & F. 702). The period of limitation ran from the date of the last judgment of revival, and not from the date of the original judgment.

A lien charged on land could only be enforced within twenty years. The only species of liens with which the common law dealt were those allowed in certain instances, as in the case of bailments and of goods entrusted to factors and other agents by the Lex mercatoria, to which this section had no application. It was in the courts of equity alone that the liens here provided for were enforced, the most ordinary case being that which occurred in a contract for the sale of real property, on which the price or part of it was made a lien. In such a case, the lien must be enforced within the twenty years, otherwise it was entirely gone. Accordingly, where a property was sold in March, 1811, and the purchaser let into possession, the price being payable in May following, but which price was never paid at all, a bill filed after the twenty years claiming a lien for the purchase-money and interest was held to be barred (Toft v. Stephenson, 7 Hare, 1). On the same principle, a bill filed to sell land on a registered judgment at law, which was now an equitable lien on all real estate, must be filed within the twenty years, otherwise the right was gone.

The 40th section applied to mortgages, judgments, liens, or other charges upon land, and legacies. It was doubted whether this word extended to legacies not charged upon land, but this doubt was set at rest, and the statute held to apply to legacies charged on personalty only (Piggott v. Jefferson, 12 Sim. 26). The Court of Chancery had practically an exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings for the recovery of legacies. The legatee might no doubt sue in the ecclesiastical courts, or in some cases in the common law courts. In the former case he ran the risk of finding himself the defendant in an administration suit, to which the executor was sure to resort, if proceedings were adopted in Doctors' Commons; and the legatee could only sue at law for a specific legacy to which the executor or administrator had assented. Such actions, even in the county courts, were however very rare. "Residue," it should be mentioned, was a legacy within the meaning of this section, the residuary legatee having that as his legacy (Prior v. Hornblow, 2 Y. & C. 201).

The 40th section specified as the period from which the twenty years began to run, the time when a present right to receive should have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same. The two decisions on this subject were Ravenscroft v. Frisby, 1 Coll. C. C. 22, and Bennett v. Cooper, 9 Beav. 252. It was clear that legatees, whose legacies were charged on real estate subject to prior charges, had no present right to receive their legacies so long as the prior charges subsisted (Faulkner v. Daniel, 3 Hare, 212).

This section concluded by enacting, that a part payment of principal or interest, or an acknowledgment in writing, should keep the claim alive. There was an enactment to the same effect in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 5.

The limitation as to specialties by s. 3, was to the effect that all actions for rent upon a lease by deed, or covenant, or upon a bond or other specialty, or scire facias upon a recognisance, must be brought within twenty years after the cause of action accrued. Therefore, in an action on a post obit bond, the time of limitation ran, not from the date of the deed, but from the death of the grantor (Tuckey v. Hawkins, 4 Com. B. 655). Although the words of the section were precise—"action of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise"—it was doubted whether, the provision of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, which enacted that arrears of rent or interest should only be recovered for six years, did not override this enactment. It was soon, however, held that it did not. See the cases of Paget v. Foley, 2 Bing. N. C. 679; Strachan v. Thomas, 12 A. & E. 558.

Actions for the recovery of real property must be brought within twenty years after the cause of action accrued, and the cause of action accrued on the first dispossession of the claimant. All the provisions of the Real Property Limitation Act, as to the period at which, in particular cases, this right of action should accrue—as, for instance, on the last non-payment of rent at the end of the first year's tenancy, either in a tenancy from year to year, or in a tenancy at will, all amounted to the same thing, that was, to specify what was to be dispossession. The period of limitation once begun ran on, and if the twenty years elapsed, the estate of the claimant was barred altogether. The claimant could not say that there was a fresh dispossession every year for instance, and that it was for that he sued: once dispossessed, he remained so, until again put in possession by receipt of rent or acknowledgment of his title. But it was very different in the case of a covenant or a bond conditioned for certain payments. In these cases each non-performance of the condition, each breach of the covenant, was a separate and distinct cause of action; and for all those causes of action which were not more than twenty years old, the plaintiff could recover. There had been several decisions illustrative of this interpretation (Sanders v. Coward, 15 M. & W. 56, and Amott v. Holden, 18 Q.B. 593).

From the operation of the different sections of the real property limitation and specialty limitation statutes, a curious state of affairs might arise—viz., that a man might lose his present estate in a reversionary rent, and yet recover the same sum on a collateral covenant. Thus, if the owner of the reversion did not receive rent for twenty years, his right was gone—at least, until the reversion fell in—for he thereby acquired a new right to possession. If, however, the owner of the reversion had a collateral covenant for the rent, he might sue on the covenant, and recover the money, although his estate in the rent itself were gone (Manning v Phelps, 10 Ex. 59).

The 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, contained an enactment to the effect, that the period of limitation should run from the last payment of principal or interest, or from the date of an acknowledgment in writing, signed by the party liable, or his agent. This was by the fifth section of that act, which should be taken together with the similar provision of the Real Property Limitation Act. The several statutes of limitation were in pari materiâ, and should receive a uniform construction, notwithstanding any slight variation of phrase, their object and intention being the same. This dictum was laid down in Murray v. East India Co. 4 Barn. & Ald. 215.

There were then two modes of preventing the operation of the statute; one by a payment of principal or interest, the other by an acknowledgment in writing.

The first mode of keeping a claim alive by partial payment would be considered under the third head in reference to acknowledgments which prevented the operation of the statute of limitations as to simple contract debts. The second mode was the one on which most questions arose; for the acknowledgment,

1. Must be in writing.
2. Must be signed by the person liable, or his agent.
3. Must be given to the person entitled, or his agent.

Thus, if a man were to write a letter to a third person (not the agent, of course), acknowledging the debt, it would not take it out of the statute. In order to do so, the acknowledgment must appear to have been made with a view of rendering the party making it liable to the demand, and it must have been made to the party entitled to make the demand (Greenfell v. Girdlestone, 2 Y. & Coll. 676). Therefore, where a bill was filed against two executors, and the plaintiff, with a view of taking his demand out of the statute, relied on certain letters written by one of the executors to his (the plaintiff's) attorney, it was held that the letters had not the effect ascribed to them, because they were written by the executor, not for the purpose of charging himself, but of throwing the burden of payment on his co-executor. (Holland v. Clark, 1 Young & Coll. (N. S.) 151).

As to acknowledgments in writing, the acknowledgment must not be a mere proposal for a settlement, but must be a distinct admission of liability. Where a person wrote, in answer to an application for a meeting to discuss the subject of the claim by another, "I do not see the use of a meeting unless some party is ready to pay me off," this was held to be a sufficient acknowledgment of title in the other; and the same unqualified admission would do in any case (Stansfield v. Hobson, 16 Beav. 86). A recital in the assignment of a mortgage that all interest had been paid up to the date of that deed, was evidence of payment of interest, so as to enable the jury to find that payment had been made within twenty years, and thus find the issue for the plaintiff on a plea of the statute; but it was doubted whether such a recital could be considered an acknowledgment in writing (Forsythe v. Bristowe, 8 Ex. 716). In this case, the deed was signed by the party liable, and the party entitled was a party to it. It was held that where the party entitled was not a party to such a subsequent deed, any such deed would not be sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Thus, in an action by an executor on a mortgage-deed, dated in 1824, made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff's testator, the plaintiff, in order to take the case out of the statute, gave in evidence a deed executed by the defendant within twenty years before action brought, but to which the plaintiff's testator was no party, it was held that this was not an acknowledgment so as to take the case out of the statute (Howcutt v. Bonser, 3 Ex. 491).

An action for calls, under the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, was an action on a specialty, and to which the twenty years' limitation would apply (Cork & Bandon Railway Company v. Goode, 13 C. B. 826). But an action of debt on a bye-law made by a corporation chartered under the great seal, was not an action on a specialty, but, on the contrary, on simple contract, and one, therefore, to which the six years' limitation applied. (Tobacco-Pipe Makers' Company v. Loder, 16 Q. B. 765).

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION.—EIGHTH GENERAL MEETING.

FEBRUARY 9th, 1857.

Lord BROUGHAM took the Chair at Eight o'clock.

Among those present were — Mr. Hadfield, M.P.; Mr. Serjeant Woolrych, Dr. Waddilove, Dr. Spinks, Mr. Pitt Taylor, Mr. D. Power, Mr. W. S. Cookson, Mr. Macqueen, Mr. Edgar, Mr. Tudor, Mr. F. Hill, Mr. H. F. Bristowe, Mr. Aspland, Mr. T. H. Bastard, Mr. Pritchard, Mr. A. Hill, Mr. G. Harris, Mr. Coote, Mr. Longden, Mr. Manning, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Back, Mr. Teulon, Mr. Trower, Mr. C. Dod, Mr. C. Webster, Mr. Tait, Mr. F. S. Williams, Mr. Salomons, Mr. Platt, Mr. F. G. A. Williams, Mr. Wingfield, Mr. Fisher, &c.

The following gentlemen were balloted for, and elected:— J. W. Church, Esq.; Thomas Chambers, Esq., M.P., Common Serjeant; Thomas Webster, Esq.; E. W. A. Tuson, Esq.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR moved the adoption of the Report on the Testamentary Jurisdiction.

Dr. WADDILOVE objected to the Report, since it recommended that the Court of Probate should be strictly a Court of Common Law, with a limited power of construction and no equitable jurisdiction. A Court of Common Law might well try the mere issue of will or no will; but a Court of Probate must go further, and appoint some one to receive the grant. That often involved intricate questions as to whether there was an executor according to the tenor or a residuary legatee in trust, and so forth. Again, questions of domicile, or implied revocation, often arose on the face of a will, which required more than the machinery or experience of a Court of Common Law satisfactorily to decide. With reference to the proposed jurisdiction of the County Courts, a distinction was made in their favour which seemed an inconsistency, and showed the importance of clothing the Court of Probate with equitable functions, for the report recommended that County Courts should exercise those functions to the utmost where the estate of the deceased was under £300. Another objection which struck him was, empowering registrars of County Courts to grant probate in common form. Questions of much difficulty, requiring a practical knowledge, were often satisfactorily disposed of by the registrars of the Prerogative Court, whereby a reference to the judge was obviated, and delay and expense saved; he feared that registrars of the County Courts had not the necessary experience of the subject to enable them to do so. Instead of making the Court of Probate either a Court of Law or a Court of Equity, he would urge the importance of combining the elements peculiar to each, and of thus forming a tribunal which would do complete justice in all testamentary matters, by first declaring the will to be valid or not; then, if valid, declaring the trusts, devises, and legacies under it, and finally distributing the assets.

Mr. PRITCHARD thought that in some respects Chancery would be better for the administration of Testamentary business than Common Law.

Mr. DAVID POWER said that he supported a Common Law Court of Probate, because wills of realty were already under the jurisdiction of the fifteen judges, and because the mode of taking evidence in the Court of Chancery was of an unsatisfactory character.

Mr. HASTINGS had thought there might be some reason in postponing the discussion, in order to see the Lord Chancellor's Bill, but the character of the measure was already known, and no one could believe that the Society would assent to it.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR pointed out that the Lord Chancellor had, on a former occasion, given the strongest reasons against continuing the monopoly he now sought to retain.

Mr. H. F. BRISTOWE gave his support to the leading features of the Report. At the same time he objected to the expressions used concerning the pleadings in the Court of Chancery, which were now as simple as possible. He also should prefer an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in place of the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords.

The first three resolutions were adopted. On the fourth, which is in favour of abolishing the monopoly of the advocates and proctors, Mr. Pritchard urged the services of his body, the difficult nature of much of the common form business, and the personal hardship of depriving a number of professional men of their means of subsistence. He intimated his intention of moving a series of amendments to the remaining resolutions; whereupon further discussion was adjourned till that day three weeks.

The Society then adjourned till Monday next, the 16th of February, at eight o'clock, when the National Reformatory Union and the Birmingham Educational Association will join with the Society in discussing Sir Stafford Northcote's Bill for the Suppression of Juvenile Vagrancy.

MERCANTILE LAW COMMITTEE.

The Committee who were appointed by the Mercantile Law Conference to carry out the opinions of that meeting, have formed themselves into a permanent body, under the title of the Mercantile Law Committee of the United Kingdom, and have resolved to raise a fund for the purpose of carrying out their object. They number representatives from nearly all the principal towns in the United Kingdom, and are in a position to make a powerful demonstration in favour of Mercantile Law Reform, should they receive an adequate support.

A meeting will be held under their direction at the rooms of the Law Amendment Society, this day, at half-past one, to consider the law relating to Consuls and Consular Duties.

Juridical Society.

This society met on Monday evening last, Mr. Baron Bramwell in the chair, when the Rev. F. D. Maurice, M.A., read a paper on the "Moral Grounds of the Distinction between Common Law and Equity." He commenced by referring to the 27th chapter of Blackstone's 3rd Book, which he took to be a warning written for the express purpose of deterring unlearned persons from meddling with the subject of the paper. Blackstone ridiculed the notion that a court of equity ever really acted on the principles which ingenious theorists attributed to it: he gave no hope of obtaining light upon its meaning or method, even from writers who had some notions of jurisprudence, such as Grotius and Puffendorff; and he said that even our own legal antiquaries, Spelman, Selden, Coke, and Bacon himself, were all likely to mislead us; that the systems of jurisprudence in our courts of law and equity were equally artificial—founded on the same principles of justice and positive law, though varied by different usages in the forms and modes of their proceedings; the one being derived originally from the feudal customs as they prevailed in different ages in the Saxon and the Norman judicatures; the other from the imperial and pontifical formularies introduced by clerical chancellors. But if the practice of both courts were founded on the same principles of justice and positive law, it could not be without interest to ask what these expressions signify. If they can be referred to a feudal or to an imperial source, the nature and difference of those sources are subjects for the ordinary historical inquirer; and if the respective systems have been both much improved and reformed, it must have been by their having been brought into close connection with the principles of morality and reason. These inferences were borne out by authorities to which reference was made by the reader. The passage quoted from Blackstone showed that moralists might receive benefit from communion with lawyers. Moralists are, no doubt, prone to make systems ever more artificial, ever less real, than any which are constructed by practitioners in courts of justice. In the 5th Book of the "Nicomachean Ethics," Aristotle considered the question — How does the equitable man differ from the just man? How does equity differ from justice? The solution, in an ethical treatise, has reference first to an individual character; but Aristotle, though he starts from the man, always looks to the state. Morals with him were the vestibule to politics. He could not contemplate the just man apart from justice itself, or apart from the doing of justice and its method. Aristotle considered law to be in its nature universal—that if it did not speak universally, it would speak uselessly and falsely. But there are some things about which it is impossible to speak universally and rightly—nay, in these somethings is included the whole practice of life. Whatever is in action cannot be brought within the compass of a general rule; the defect of law, therefore, is not in itself—in the law—or the lawgiver, but in the nature of the matter with which it is conversant. Injustice must follow from it if there is nothing to correct it. Equity does what the lawgiver would have done if he could—it expresses what he would say if he were present. Passing from the region of pure philosophy to that of law—from Greece to Rome—what did Cicero think upon this subject? There is a passage in c. 37 of the "Dialogus de Partitione Oratoria," which at first promises an answer to the question; and is referred to in Forcellini's Lexicon as settling the meaning of the word equity. But in that passage Equitas is opposed to Religio, not to Lex; it stands in the same relation to Jus Humanum as Religio stands to the Jus Divinum. The subject is raised unintentionally. Marcus Cicero asks his father how he is to deal with those causes which admit the fact, and defend the lawfulness of it. Thence it became necessary to show what was lawful, or rather how an advocate might make the lawfulness of an act evident to the minds of those who were to pronounce judgment. The treatise belongs to rhetoric much more than to morals. In the very words in which he defines equity, he assumes a ratio æqui et boni, to which the orator may appeal, and from which his arguments may be deduced. Then, turning to Cicero's "Work on Laws," lib. 1, cap. 5, we find a passage on the subject of more use than a mere formal definition—"Natura juris explicanda est nobis, eaque ab hominis repetenda natura: considerandæ leges quibus civitates regi debeant: tum hæc tractanda, quæ composita sunt et descripta, jura et jussa populorum, in quibus ne nostri quidem populi latebunt quæ vocantur jura civilia." The reader read the passage at length, and continued in these words:—Cicero appeared to set aside the principle of Aristotle altogether, evidently inclining to the opinion that Lex indicated something more fundamental than Jus. At first this might appear to be an assertion of the Hobbes doctrine that right was deduced from power, but Lex itself was the highest reason. To Cicero's mind it meant something more than Νόμος, which only denotes that which gives to every man his own. Lex was the underground of all civil rules and enactments, and not merely an equity or principle of compensation. The nature of man recognised it as reasonable, bowed to it, implied it. Cicero had, no doubt, a much deeper feeling of a will, of which this highest law is the expression, than Aristotle had. In this book he referred the origin of law to the gods, and its existence amongst men to their relation to the gods. Because law had this original, it could not be merely imposed: it must have the force and virtue which is independent of all mere decrees. The Roman admitted an equity distinct from mere positive law—even more fully than the Greek. The distinction goes through the whole of Cicero's treatise. Whether he is acting the philosopher and reaching to the foundations of things, or extolling the twelve tables as superior to all the theories and dogmas of philosophers, he is equally asserting the existence of a common sense and equity upon which laws rest, and to which they must appeal. His Greek learning and his Roman patriotism no doubt sometimes interfered with each other; but then we may discover the reconciliation of this. The sage, he supposed, brought to light that sense of right and justice which was latent in all men, and which found its expression sometimes in a written document, oftener still in the maxims and customs which had gained the force of law—one knew not how—without being committed to letters. It was the business of the wise man to know these witnesses in the heart of the ordinary man. Therein lay the explanation of much of the life of that remarkable man. His mind, if you look at it on its best side, was one of the most equitable that ever existed. Equity was its characteristic. Sometimes, through respect to common opinion, he sacrificed his higher existence, and became a rhetorician or trimmer. Sometimes, through the ambition to be equitable, he became a mere eclectic; but that which made the Roman the civiliser and legislator of the world was exhibited by Cicero in perfection. What he spoke, therefore, explained remarkably the thoughts of later Romans under the empire, and after their influences became blended with influences proceeding from other quarters. Cicero was certainly not less acquainted than Aristotle with the necessity that might arise, from time to time, for modifying general laws to suit particular emergencies. The edicts of the prætors—the jus honorarium—accomplished this purpose. But though these edicts might be grounded upon equitable considerations, equity in its own nature lay beneath all edicts, and beneath the law itself. That belief descended from the jurists of the empire. The celebrated definition which Ulpian adopts with admiration from Celsus, "Jus est ars boni et æqui," shows that they regarded equity as inseparable from goodness. Æquitas with them was the synonym for Æqualitas. It pointed to the condition of which all transgression was the disturbance, and it attempted to restore that condition by affixing punishment to the misdoer, and compensation to the sufferer. On this ground rests the eloquent statement of Ulpian respecting the dignity of his own profession. Perhaps the ambition of these jurisconsults to make men good, however honest and noble, was dangerous, as being liable to draw them out of their province. There was in the idea of an art of jurisprudence, something which interfered with the true conception of it as a science. In their definition of the Jus Naturale, as belonging to all animals equally, and in their reference of marriage to this head, there was a true desire to affirm a law which is not at the mercy of human caprice, but also a perilous confusion of mere instincts with the privileges and obligations of a voluntary creature. Yet these confusions might rather have affected the value of their definitions than interfered with their idea of equity, but for another difficulty, in the minds of all Roman thinkers. This grand art of the good and the great, or the equitable, proceeded ultimately from the Emperor, and he himself was not bound by the terms and principles of it. Leges interpretari solo dignum imperatore esse oportet. Such was the maxim of Justinian. Mr. Maurice proceeded to show that the same notion was as strongly insisted upon by the Christian emperors, and continued:—The idea of a law, which is deeper than a law written upon tables of stone, and yet which does not in any way displace or contradict that law, but fulfils the purpose of it, is so worked into the heart of Christian Ethics, that it was impossible it should not affect the order of society into which Christianity had deeply penetrated. But it could not penetrate deeply or make this distinction felt until the Gothic reverence for domestic relationships had been combined with the Roman reverence for order and government. These two great elements of modern civilisation present themselves as the foundation of the distinction which our law and equity courts have respectively adopted. Between them lie the Pontifical maxims, more nearly akin to the imperial than the feudal.

Next week we hope to give the conclusion of this interesting and valuable paper.

The Right Hon. Robert Lowe, M.P.; Professor Abdy, of Cambridge; Mr. P. A. Gates; Mr. W. C. Beasley; and Mr. F. Meadows White were elected members of the society; and the society, on the proposal of Dr. Colquhoun, one of the honorary secretaries, elected four distinguished German Jurists honorary members.

THE LAW OF DIVORCE.

Lord CAMPBELL moved for the production of a paper by Mr. Macqueen, the Secretary of the Commission, appointed four years ago to consider the law of divorce, who had lately been in France; and from oral communications, as well as from written books to which he had referred there, he had prepared a most valuable communication. This paper gave a sketch of the laws relating to divorce, and to husband and wife, which prevailed in France under the ancient régime, under the Code Napoleon, during the restoration of the Bourbons, and under Louis Philippe, as well as under the present law. He had also given an abstract of the codes of other continental nations, particularly of the Austrian and Prussian codes, which last was especially interesting to them as Protestants who did not look upon marriage as indissoluble. He thought it of great importance that their lordships should all have an opportunity of reading this valuable paper before the bill of his noble and learned friend came before them, and he therefore moved that it be printed and circulated for the use of the members.

Lord BROUGHAM concurred with Lord Campbell as to the value of the document alluded to.—The motion was agreed to.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to a question by Lord BROUGHAM, said that the bill which he should introduce into the House would contain a provision that some of the episcopal bench should attend the Judicial Committee as assessors, when their presence would be likely to throw light upon any case brought before that body.

VEXATIOUS LAW PROCEEDINGS.

Lord BROUGHAM moved the first reading of a bill to put an end to frivolous suits. His object was to effect the establishment of courts of reconciliation similar to those existing on the continent. As the law stood a person might bring an action upon the most unfounded claims, without the slightest chance of being able to defray the costs. In such a case the plaintiff, on being nonsuited, and judgment for costs going against him, immediately took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act. He was informed by the learned commissioners of that court they were debarred from considering whether a man had vexatiously brought actions, though they had jurisdiction to go into the question of vexatious defences. With a view of remedying this defect he had added clauses to this bill, in addition to so much of it as consisted of the bill which he introduced in 1851, having for their object to enable parties to apply to a judge of the court in which the suits and actions were instituted, in order that he might, upon cause shown, order the complaining party to give security for costs. He had taken the unusual course of saying thus much upon the first reading, as he thought it advisable that attention should be called to measures of this kind in limine, in order that the opinions of professional and other competent persons might be had upon the subject.

The bill was read a first time.

JURISDICTION OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after describing how the Ecclesiastical Courts came to have jurisdiction over matters which cannot, except technically, be described as of an ecclesiastical character, stated that he proposed to introduce two bills for the remedy of abuses connected with the jurisdiction thus acquired in matters testamentary and matrimonial, and a third for the correction of clerks for misconduct and matters of that kind. First, with regard to the testamentary jurisdiction, it appears from a return laid before the other House during last session, that the number of courts actually granting probate was ninety-eight, although fifteen others were provided with machinery for exercising that jurisdiction. Now, when a person dies within the jurisdiction of one of these courts, primâ facie, that court has jurisdiction to grant probate, but many persons have personal property not all within the same district, and the consequence is that most persons have recourse to the Prerogative Court, while, in point of fact, the probate of the Prerogative Court is liable to be set aside if the testator had no property out of the district or diocess in which he died. Many attempts have been made to remedy this evil, but, whether from the conflict of interests or from other causes, they have proved abortive. It has been said that the subject is one of second-rate importance and of first-rate difficulty, but I trust that we shall be able during the present session to give the lie to that view of the case. It is a point also of great importance that wills should be properly preserved and registered, and nothing can be more unsatisfactory than the arrangement of many of these small courts in that respect, although in the larger districts the registers are perfectly efficient. There is also another great evil connected with these courts. The contentious business conducted in them mainly consists in ascertaining whether a testator was competent to make a will at the time of its execution, and then whether it has been executed with all the necessary legal solemnities. As to the competence of a testator to make a will, there is a vast amount of conflicting evidence, and the mode of procedure of the ecclesiastical courts is ill adapted to deal with cases of that description, the evidence being reduced to writing, and tendered in that form, whereby the advantages which would result from oral examination are lost. Another evil connected with this subject is, that, under the present system, the ecclesiastical courts decide only upon the validity of wills so far as the personal estate is concerned, while the real estate is decided by other tribunals. If a question, therefore, arises whether the testator were of sound or unsound mind, there may be a different decision with respect to the personal estate from that which may be given as to the real estate. There is a suit of this description pending before your lordships' bar at the present moment. In the year 1842, a gentleman named Colclough died seised of a large real estate in the county of Wexford, and of personal property to the value of £120,000 or £130,000. The will gave all the property to the widow, and she obtained probate in the Prerogative Court of Ireland, and took possession of everything. In 1849, however, the heir-at-law brought an action of ejectment to recover the real estate in Wexford, and the court decided that the testator was a man of unsound mind, and that the will had been unduly obtained. The consequence is, that, although the same piece of paper conveyed both properties to the widow, she has validly obtained possession of a large amount of personal property, while the question of the real estate, of some £7,000 or £8,000 a-year, yet remains in dispute. Now, that is an anomaly which ought to be dealt with. I propose, therefore, not that it should be necessary in every case of real estate to obtain probate, but that if there be a contest as to the sanity of the testator, and a caveat be entered against granting probate as to the personal estate, then that the heir-at-law as well as the next of kin shall be cited, and that that adverse proceeding shall litigate and determine the question both as to the personal and the real estate. I think that we should adopt the suggestion of the last commission, that the court of probate ought to be a Queen's court, and not an ecclesiastical court. I therefore propose to constitute one Queen's court of probate; but it should be observed that the duties of that court are practically almost entirely of a ministerial character. The real matter in which the public are interested is, that there should exist the means of ascertaining cheaply and without delay who is the representative of the deceased person. All that is necessary for that purpose is to have a good, clear, cheap, and expeditious system of registration of wills; because that is what it really amounts to, the practical duty of the court being the duty of registration. I propose that the proctors shall be continued, subject to the power of the Lord Chancellor and the judge of the court to add to their number, or to make new regulations with regard to them. This monopoly, however, only applies to non-contentious business—to the proving of wills according to the ordinary form, or to what I call the common registration of wills. So much with regard to wills proved in London. But I propose that there shall be, as at present, a number of district courts where wills may be proved as they now are. For that purpose I propose to retain all the present diocesan registries, and to add a few others, so as to make the number thirty in all throughout the kingdom, because some of the dioceses are so large and straggling that it is inconvenient for persons to have to go so far. Their operation will be confined to cases where the personal estate is sworn under £1,500. When the property is of greater value, it will be more convenient that the will should be proved in London. I propose, also, whenever a will shall be proved in a district court, to take away the power of questioning its validity. I intend to introduce a similar measure with respect to Ireland and Scotland. Of the 30,000 administrations granted in the year, about 29,950 are included in the non-contentious jurisdiction of the courts, and I propose that all non-contested wills may be proved in London, if the parties please. With regard to the contentious jurisdiction the law at present is that, wherever a will is proved, there the question must be contested, whether it is a valid will or not. That arrangement is often very inconvenient, from the want of competent legal assistance. I propose, therefore, that there shall be no contentious jurisdiction in the country, but that it shall be carried on in the court of probate in London, as other questions are dealt with in the superior courts at Westminster. Strong objections have been taken to the expense and delay of the proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts. Under my bill, the registrars will be the officers to superintend the granting of probates, and the judge will be referred to in cases in which his assistance may be required, and I propose that questions as to the sanity of the testator, and the due execution of his will, shall be dealt with exactly as trials of issues of will or no will are now conducted in the Court of Chancery, and that the same course of procedure should be followed as in the case of a trial for ejectment. With regard to the appointment of a judge, I propose, as the present judge of the Prerogative Court (Sir J. Dodson) will have almost nothing to do when all disputed questions of fact are sent to be tried by a jury, that one of the vice-chancellors shall discharge the duties of the new court, and in this way a saving will be effected to the country. With regard to the practitioners in the court, my decided opinion is, that the advocates in Doctors' Commons, the proctors, and all the practitioners of the common law courts, should be at liberty to practise in the new court of probate. Thus far I have spoken of cases amounting to £1,500; but where the probate is sworn under £200, it shall be within the competency of the county court to decide the matter. I shall now proceed to the question of matrimonial jurisdiction. For a century and a half it has been the practice for this House, if an act of adultery on the part of a wife has been established, and a divorce a mensâ et thoro obtained in the ecclesiastical court, to grant an act of Parliament to enable the husband to marry another woman. In the case of the wife she can only obtain a divorce from her husband if adultery has been committed by him under circumstances which render it impossible for her ever to cohabit with him again; as, for example, when the adultery amounts to incest—of which I believe there are only four instances on record. This is a state of things extremely discreditable to the country, and calls for a remedy. The law with regard to property acquired by married women divorced a mensâ et thoro is exceedingly anomalous; and in the divorce bill of last session some proposals were made by my noble and learned friend (Lord Lyndhurst) with the object of mitigating, if not of removing, the existing evils. These proposals I propose to introduce in the bill I am about to lay on the table. In the first place, if a married woman has been deserted by her husband without lawful excuse for a certain time—say three years—it is extremely reasonable that she should be entitled to a decree of divorce or separation from the court to be constituted, which will enable her thenceforth to be mistress of her own property, and her husband be precluded, if he should return, from claiming as his property any money she may have accumulated. If, however, the husband and wife should desire to live together again, every facility should be afforded them for doing so. I therefore propose that a wife who has earned money shall, under such circumstances, have the power of making a settlement just as she could before marriage. It is now legally competent to married persons to separate by deed, but these separations are effected in a most cumbrous manner. I propose to remove these cumbrous anomalies, and to enable persons to do directly what they can only do indirectly, and that the wife shall in such cases have the same power over any property she may acquire as if she were separated by a decree of the ecclesiastical court. There is still another subject relating to ecclesiastical jurisdiction with which I propose to deal; viz., offences of the clergy, which may be classed under two heads—moral offences and doctrinal offences. At present the course of proceeding in such cases is artificial and cumbrous, and expensive to a degree hardly credible. If a clergyman is charged with any offence, moral or doctrinal, he is summoned to answer the accusation; and if he admits his guilt, the bishop inflicts punishment. If the accused does not admit his guilt, the bishop has to issue a commission to five persons, who are empowered to summon before them witnesses in support of the charge, and the accused clergyman, and to inquire into the facts. The inquiry is attended with enormous expense and with great delay, and the result is reported to the bishop. If further proceedings are taken, the same dilatory and expensive course is pursued. The remedy I propose is, that a bishop may at any time file articles in his own court, in the simplest form, against an offending clergyman, or the same course may be taken by any voluntary promoter. If the accused admits the charge, the bishop, assisted by his chancellor or vicar-general, will pronounce sentence. If the charge is not admitted, I propose that a jury, consisting of five persons, clergymen and laymen, shall be summoned, and shall decide upon the questions of fact. If, however, the facts are established, the defendant may appeal, first, to the Court of Arches, and then to the Privy Council. I propose that the same course should be pursued in the case of doctrinal offences; but I think that before such proceedings are taken, a certificate ought to be given by a certain number of persons of station in the Church, declaring that there are reasonable grounds for instituting proceedings. I am sorry to say that, although this bill is in preparation, I am not yet enabled to lay it upon your lordships' table. The noble and learned lord then laid the bills on the table, with the exception of the Clergy Offences Bill.

Lord Lyndhurst observed that with respect to the testamentary jurisdiction, he was apprehensive the bill proposed would not generally be considered satisfactory. In the last session the Attorney-General introduced a bill upon this subject into the other House, and the great objection urged against it was that it was a transfer of the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate to the Court of Chancery. That transfer was objected to by almost every member of the other House whose attention was directed to the subject. It was said that it would be contrary to policy to add to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery; and I heard expressions used as strong as this—No sane man would add to the jurisdiction of that court. In the present bill it is true the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate is not in terms transferred to the Court of Chancery, but it is so in substance. In the first place the judge of the new court is to be one of the vice-chancellors. Further, the orders and regulations with respect to the course of proceeding are to be framed by that equity judge, assisted by another equity judge, the Lord Chancellor. Again, in the mode of enforcing the decrees of the court, the practice of the Court of Chancery is to be followed. So far, then, this tribunal is to be an adjunct to the Court of Chancery. Now, with respect to the mode of taking evidence in the Court of Chancery, I have communicated with many of the practitioners and some of the judges of that court, and they concur in the opinion that it is most unsatisfactory. But to proceed further, the appeal from the present Court of Probate is to a most popular tribunal, the Judicial Committee; but it is proposed to take the appeal from that tribunal and to transfer it to the Court of Chancery, and from the appellate jurisdiction of that court to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords! One objection which has always been made to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is, that when questions of fact have to be decided, the court does not decide them, but calls in the assistance of other courts. When a case occurs in the city of London or in the county of Middlesex upon which a question of fact arises, an issue is sent to be tried before my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Campbell). A question arises in the court of equity on my noble and learned friend's decision, and a new trial is moved for, calling in question the decision of my noble and learned friend, before a judge who has never been in a court of common law in his life. It is an appeal from an enlightened judge who has practised every day in a court of common law to a judge who is comparatively ignorant of the subject. Again, as the law at present stands, an heir-at-law cannot be divested of his property without the verdict of a jury; he has a right to insist upon it. But by this bill a verdict will be by no means necessary. The question may be decided by a court without a jury, and not by a court of common law, but by a court of equity. Again, about forty new district courts are to be established, or old courts already in existence are to be continued. But the registrars of those courts will have no more than a ministerial jurisdiction; they will only have to see that the wills are properly framed—a jurisdiction which might well be exercised by the registrars of the county courts under the superintendence of the judges, and the expense of these new courts saved to the country. Another very difficult part of the subject is that of compensation. You are transferring the jurisdiction from the Court of Probate, presided over by a learned judge, experienced in the discharge of his duties and ably performing them, to a new tribunal, and I should be glad to know what compensation is to be offered to the members of that court? Dismissing that subject, I now come to the bill which relates to Church discipline—a subject of great importance. Our attention has been very much drawn lately to the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth, under which a prosecution has recently been carried on. By that statute the slightest deviation in doctrine from any of the articles of the Church of England may be made the subject of a prosecution, although that deviation may be sanctioned by the highest authorities—by rev. and right rev. writers. And what is more, every offence within the jurisdiction of the act to which I have referred is an offence to be dealt with under the general ecclesiastical law; and if dealt with there, the punishment is not defined, but the sentence may adapt itself to the nature of the offence. I think this is a subject of great importance, and one eminently deserving your serious consideration. With reference to the third subject—namely, the divorce bill—I shall say but a very few words, because this bill was before your lordships last session. But there are two alterations in it, one an omission and the other an addition, to which I must briefly allude. The bill of last year contained a clause by which, in the case of a conviction and separation for adultery, the party guilty of the adultery should not be allowed to marry the accomplice. That clause had not been introduced in the present bill. I regret, too, that the bill contains no provision for putting an end to a practice of which I cannot speak too strongly in terms of condemnation—I mean the action for criminal conversation. I say it is scandalous and wholly inconsistent with the manly character of this country for a man to attempt to satisfy the laws of honour by having recourse to a proceeding of that nature. The only remaining point is the addition made to this bill on the point of separation. By that addition a husband and wife, without the intervention of any tribunal, and simply by a deed recorded in some office, would be allowed to separate themselves, and afterwards live apart. I believe this is the first time that an attempt has been made to deal with the question of separation in this way; and I hope my noble and learned friend will well consider this clause before it passes into law.

The Bishop of Exeter thought that it would be better to make the subject of Church discipline a substantive bill than to let it form part of any general measure.

Lord CAMPBELL. I hear with astonishment and dismay that it is proposed that any married couple, if they have a temporary disagreement, or have had some improper purpose long entertained, may obtain a divorce for all practical purposes, except marrying again. In France they have what is called a separation de corps, the effect of which is that the marriage between the parties affected by it is dissolved for all purposes, except marrying again; but in that case the matter must be decided by a judicial tribunal, there must be adequate reasons assigned for the separation, and an attempt at reconciliation on the part of the judge. Common law courts at present viewed deeds of separation with great suspicion, but such deeds were nothing compared with the judicial proceedings proposed under this bill, which would amount to a virtual divorce, except that parties would not be allowed to marry again. He, however, had his misgivings whether the reforms which had been desired for twenty-five long years would be accomplished by this bill, and he began to think that the ecclesiastical courts were immortal, and bore a charmed life. With regard to the Court of Chancery, he had a sincere respect for that court; but he did not think it was well imagined to make a Court of Probate an adjunct of that tribunal. Now, suppose an issue was directed to be tried as to whether a will had been properly executed, and whether the testator was of sound mind. That question would come before one of the judges of the land, either in the county of Middlesex or upon circuit; it might come before him. Now, he should feel it no degradation to have one of his decisions reviewed by an equity judge; but at the same time, without arrogating any superiority to himself, he doubted very much whether it would not be more satisfactory to the parties if the appeal went before his brethren in the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, rather than before a single vice-chancellor. But he trusted that his noble and learned friend, if it was not too late, would avoid the Court of Chancery, and make his new tribunal a common law court Notwithstanding the difficulties pointed out, he hoped they would be surmounted; and his friends and himself would all do their best to assist in this work.

Lord BROUGHAM also hoped that the difficulties in the way of this important bill would be overcome by his noble and learned friend on the woolsack, but he confessed that his first difficulty arose upon this point—that it was proposed to establish a new court under an equity judge to exercise a common law jurisdiction. If he understood the plan aright, the new court was to be regulated by the procedure of the common law. Now, if a Vice-Chancellor was to sit as a judge in such a court, what occasion was there to deprive the present judges in Doctors' Commons of their jurisdiction? Why might not Sir J. Dodson discharge precisely the same functions which his noble and learned friend's measure proposed to vest in the Vice-Chancellor? As to common forms, could there be any doubt that such causes would be quite as well—if not better—disposed of by the present ecclesiastical judges than by a Vice-Chancellor; and, as to contentious cases, could not those also be heard and decided upon quite as well by the Prerogative Court? The Vice-Chancellor, it seemed, was to direct an issue to be tried; but could not the judge of the Prerogative Court do the same thing? He was quite of opinion that the ecclesiastical courts ought to be abolished; but then, he contended, they should constitute a Court of Probate, not under an equity judge, not connected with the Court of Chancery, but a Court of Probate consisting of common law judges. He agreed with the right reverend prelate as regarded the question of Church Discipline, that it would be better to treat that as a separate question. There was another point to which he wished to call attention. A case had lately occurred which confirmed him in the belief that it was not right that any individual should be dragged before that tribunal in order that doctrinal points might be tested. He hoped, also, that for his own part he might meet with some encouragement to renew a bill which he had proposed some years back in order to remedy a great grievance. Under the present system, if a clergyman had from conscientious motives separated himself from the Church and become a Dissenter, and performed service as a Dissenting minister, he was by the present law liable at any moment to be brought before the diocesan, and to be dealt with as if he were still a member of the Church of England. If it could be enacted as part of the proposed bill that all Church censure should cease as applied to parsons who had separated from the Church, he thought that it would be a wise and certainly a most tolerant addition. With respect to Church discipline, also, he hoped that some measure would be taken to relieve right rev. prelates from the position in which they were at present placed as regarded the enforcing of discipline. One right rev. friend of his, the Bishop of Winchester, had been in one case put to an expense of certainly over £4,000, and he believed over £5,000, not one farthing of which could he possibly recover. He was sorry that the bill did not go further in granting divorces a vinculo at the suit of the wife. As far as it did go it was in the right direction; but it did not provide the complete remedy that was required. He concurred in the remarks upon the suit of crim. con., where the woman whose character was at stake was not permitted to be a party to the suit, and when she might be the victim of a conspiracy between the husband and the alleged adulterer. He suggested that in actions of this description notice should be given to the wife; and he trusted that all these actions would finally be got rid of. In conclusion, he was understood to say that he would treat seduction as a criminal offence, instead of making it the subject of a civil action.

Lord WENSLEYDALE said that the general provisions of the measure should undoubtedly receive his cordial assent, because he believed that the bill was calculated to effect a great improvement in the law. It met some of the great difficulties which existed in the Court of Probate; it did away with a multitude of small jurisdictions; it established one court where the originals of all wills might be seen; and it put an end to the old annoyance of bona notabilia. Perhaps the chief merit of the scheme was that no new offices were to be created, and that no large compensations were to be granted under it.

The Bishop of OXFORD after making some suggestions opposed to the bill sketched out by Lord Brougham, at the conclusion of his speech, said he wished to say a few words on another point. The Lord Chancellor had stated his readiness to adopt the suggestion which had been made to him of providing assessors to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in cases of doctrine. But that suggestion had been misapprehended. The suggestion was that the Judicial Committee should decide the purely legal question involved in a case of doctrine without any admixture of the spirituality; but that in order to enable them to do so there should be some machinery instituted by which they might learn from the spirituality what was the decision of the spirituality upon the point of doctrine. What the Lord Chancellor proposed would only make matters worse.

Lord CAMPBELL remarked that the proposal of the right rev. prelate to establish a spiritual court to try causes coming before the Judicial Committee, would only make the decisions of the Privy Council more odious and more likely to create disgust, and bring about the disruption of the Church.

The LORD CHANCELLOR maintained that one or more assessors, selected from the spirituality, would be amply sufficient to enable the Judicial Committee to decide any question of doctrine which might come before them. His noble and learned friend asked, why should not Sir J. Dodson be the new judge? His answer was that he wished to get rid of the Prerogative Court altogether. And if he was asked why he selected one of the Vice-Chancellors rather than a judge of one of the common law courts, his reply was that the Vice-Chancellor would be always at hand and ready to do the business of the court. But for that reason, no doubt, the duties would be as well discharged by a judge at common law as by a Vice-Chancellor.

The bills were then read a first time.

IMPROVEMENT OF LANGUAGE OF LEGISLATION.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the second report of the statute law commission be referred to a select committee, in order to consider the propositions in that report for the adoption of means to improve the manner and language of current legislation. It was proposed that an officer should be appointed with a sufficient staff, whose duty it would be to attend to all bills that were referred to him, to report exactly what was the existing state of the law on the subject to which it related, and what alteration it would effect in the existing law; to examine all bills after they had passed through committee, and report to the House the effect of the alterations which might have been made, so that Parliament might be guided in its decisions as to whether those bills should pass or not. After pointing out many mistakes in recent acts, he continued that the report of the commissioners recommended that bills should be classed so that those which laid down permanent rules of law should be separated from those of a local or private character; that they, again, should be subdivided into statutes applying to England, Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies, and thus our legislation kept from becoming a confused mass which it was almost impossible to comprehend. He therefore proposed that the recommendation of the commission should be referred to a select committee. He presumed the wish would be to have the same officers attached to both Houses—an arrangement which would save expense, and at the same time promote unity of action.

Lord CAMPBELL gave the proposal his unqualified approbation. Their bungling mode of legislation had brought discredit on legislative assemblies. Questions relating to the common law, which were brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, were very soon settled; but those which turned upon the statute law occasioned the court great trouble and inconvenience.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, Feb. 10.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

Mr. KEATING asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government in the present session to introduce any measure founded upon the recommendation of the commissioners appointed to consider the subject of legal education?

Sir G. GREY said, he had had some communication with the Lord Chancellor, but nothing was decided at present.

"KINGSFORD v. MERRY."

Mr. GREGSON asked the Vice-President of the Board of Trade whether, in consequence of the doubts thrown by the courts of law upon the validity of advances on the hypothecation of goods or warrants, it was his intention to introduce any bill upon the subject during the present session?

Mr. LOWE said it was undoubtedly one of great importance. He did not the least doubt that the case of Kingsford v. Merry was decided according to law, but he did not think any one would say it was decided according to substantial justice. But it was not enough that the Government should know a hard case had been decided. They must also be satisfied that their interference would be satisfactory to the mercantile classes, and on that point they were not satisfied. However, the Government would be quite ready to bring in a bill as soon as they were satisfied it would meet the wishes of the mercantile classes, whose interests the bill would materially affect.

IMPROVEMENT OF LANGUAGE OF LEGISLATION.

Lord PALMERSTON made a similar motion to that of the Lord Chancellor upon this subject, and proposed the appointment of a proper officer who should be the servant of the two Houses of Parliament in regard to these matters, to whom all bills should be referred, and who should report upon their phraseology and entire effect.

Mr. NAPIER said that the course proposed would only deal with a small fragment of a very large question, to which he (Mr. Napier) intended to call the attention of the House on Thursday evening, but he did not offer any opposition.

Mr. J. EWART was of opinion that we should never have a comprehensive and practical scheme until we adopted the plan of Mr. Napier, for the appointment of a Minister of Justice, to which he should give his hearty support.

Mr. J. G. PHILLIMORE thought that it would have been better to postpone the appointment of this committee until the whole subject had been discussed upon Mr. Napier's notice.

Mr. BAINES said, that the commissioners thought that a board, or a single officer with a competent staff of assistants, should be appointed, their preference being in favour of the latter alternative of the two; this suggestion the proposed committee would have to examine, and whether the same officer should act for both Houses of Parliament, and should be nominated by each House separately on its own behalf.—Motion agreed to.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

Mr. CRAWFURD moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. F. FRENCH opposed it, on behalf of Ireland, as being injurious to the interests of the mercantile and professional classes of that country. He stated that many of the small traders in Ireland were in the habit of making their purchases in this country; and, if the bill passed, they would, in the event of actions being brought against them here, be compelled, at a ruinous expense, to bring over their witnesses to defend them; and he concluded by moving that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

The amendment was supported by Mr. M'MAHON, Mr. BLAND, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. NAPIER; and, after some observations in favour of the measure from Mr. HADFIELD, Mr. J. FITZGERALD, and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the House divided, when there were—

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that, on Friday, the 20th of February, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to render frauds by trustees criminally punishable.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

Mr. E. EWART gave notice that, on the 26th inst., he would move for leave to introduce a bill to assimilate the law affecting capital punishments in Scotland with the law in England.

LEGAL REFORM.

Mr. NAPIER moved an address to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to take into consideration, as an urgent measure of administrative reform, the formation of a separate and responsible department for the affairs of public justice. He deplored the confusion, the inconvenience, and the inefficient administration of justice, arising from the want of an efficient central supervision of all matters relating to judicial procedure, by some person armed with authority who should be in constant communication with the judges and those who administered the law, to ascertain what difficulties they experienced, and to suggest remedies, and to devise and superintend the framing of acts of Parliament, and the expurgation, classification, and consolidation of statutes. The law of this country was now in a transition state; and he believed that the law had declined in public opinion, and that the profession of the law was not rising in public opinion. He therefore urged the necessity of legal education; the reform of existing law; and a better mode of law making for the future; all carried out on the most enlightened principles. This he believed could best be done by Parliament giving to the country a separate department for the affairs of justice. With regard to the objections which had been made to the principle of his motion: one was to the name; he cared not for the name—he wanted the thing. Another was on the score of expense. He did not think, however, that the country would grudge any expense for the establishment of a really efficient department of justice. Again, it was said, that it would interfere with the rights of the Chancellor; but it was admitted that the Chancellor was without such an organisation of a body of assistants as to enable him to perform the functions of a minister of justice. He answered other objections as to interfering with the Home Secretary, and with the Irish executive. It was also said that this department would interfere with the freedom of Parliament. He denied that the having a minister of justice in Parliament to take charge of and explain all matters relating to the law could in any way interfere with the freedom of Parliament. He knew that there were difficulties to be met in arranging the details of such an establishment; but he did not think that they were insuperable.

Mr. COLLIER seconded the motion and described what would be the functions of the department for the administration of justice. To that office ought to be returned all the judicial statistics relating to the working of every tribunal throughout the country. It would receive and record suggestions of improvements from the judges and any other persons by whom suggestions might be offered. It would conduct scientifically and methodically all those inquiries which had hitherto been delegated to a variety of commmissioners. The next great and important function which such a department ought to undertake should be the progressive amendment of the law Under that head he included the consolidation of the statute law. Then, again, this department of public justice ought to have the care of preparing and passing through parliament such measures of law reform as the government might determine upon, and for which the government ought to be responsible. He then sketched other functions of the department. It would be perfectly consistent with the resolution before the house, that the Lord Chancellor should be appointed minister of justice, but if the duties of the office should be too onerous for the Lord Chancellor, then it would be most desirable that the head of the department should be a member of the House of Commons, and he thought, in many respects, that would be the most advantageous course.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that he did not think that there was any necessity for the appointment of such an officer as a minister of justice at the present time. In his opinion, all the objects of the resolution might be more effectually carried out by means of the existing machinery than by introducing a change in the constitution which would require something more than was embodied in the present proposition. Everything that was required could be done without the admission into the cabinet of any such minister. It was clear to those who had given anything beyond a mere superficial consideration of the subject, that it would be impossible to introduce into the Cabinet a Minister of justice, so long as the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary remained there, without introducing discordant functions. He believed that it would be in the power of the Lord Chancellor, if furnished with a sufficient staff, to accomplish all that might be necessary to carry into effect the three great objects in view; first, an effectual superintendence over the administration of justice in all its departments; secondly, the superintendence and effectual carrying out of the amendment of the law; and thirdly, the giving prompt, effectual, and complete assistance to the conduct of the business of current legislation.

Lord J. RUSSELL said, that the Lord Chancellor having so many various duties imposed on him, could not be competent to conduct a separate department, which was not only to have the superintendence of the administration of the law, but the superintendence of all bills for the amendment of the law. He did not believe the Lord-Chancellor would have sufficient time at his disposal. It was in consequence of being unable to devote his whole mind to the subject of law reform that the Lord Chancellor had introduced such bills as those relating to ecclesiastical courts and divorce, which appeared so eminently inefficient and unsatisfactory. On the contrary, an officer devoting the greater part of his attention to the subject, consulting, of course, with the Lord Chancellor, would be able to introduce into that house many measures of law reform far more harmoniously, and in a manner far more satisfactorily, than they had seen of late years.

Mr. KEATING said that until such a department was established, the attempt to consolidate the statute law would never be attended with success. It was beginning at the wrong end. They must first get the current legislation into proper condition, have a control over it, so as to keep it in that condition, and then the consolidation must be gradual.

Mr. L. WIGRAM thought there should be, at the head of this department some great officer who should be able to give his undivided attention to the subject; and said that such officer should be a member of that House.

Mr. W. EWART said that unless there was a minister of justice in that House, the scheme would be abortive.

Sir E. PERRY was of the same opinion.

Mr. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said that the effort to consolidate the written and the unwritten law was one of the greatest efforts that had been made in modern times. It had been objected that the proposed measure would interfere with the private action of hon. members, but in reality it would have an exactly opposite effect. Instead of bringing in crude and unfinished bills, the government would be able to put forward their measures in such a state as would obviate the necessity for much discussion.

Mr. MALINS said the house had been discussing what was most beautiful in theory; but when they attempted to put it in practice, he was afraid they would find it a miserable failure.

Mr. L. KING was delighted to see the measure brought forward, because it would at all events break up the Statute Law Commission. That commission had cost the country more than £50,000, and it had done positively nothing.

Viscount PALMERSTON said: We have had a discussion whether a new minister should be appointed, to be called a minister of justice, or whether, on the contrary, we ought to build on existing foundations, and make the most of what we have by attaching the new department either to that of the Lord Chancellor, or of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I think it would be right to endeavour to see whether you cannot accomplish your purpose by attaching that department to some of the existing ones. I can assure the right hon. gentleman that it will be the duty of her Majesty's Government to give their earnest attention to this subject. It is one which he himself admits is surrounded by great difficulties, one that will require a very mature consideration. That consideration shall be given;

d I am not without hopes that those difficulties may be over-

e. I agree to this resolution as the pledge that the efforts of the Government shall be directed to meet the wishes of the House and the country on this subject.

Mr. NAPIER expressed his gratification at the way in which his motion had been met by the Government.

The motion was then agreed to.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The arrival of gold from Australia in the early part of this week was very large, two vessels bringing £820,000. The estimates for the Army and Navy have been published, and shew a reduction of £17,000,000, reducing this charge to something near the level of years preceding the late war.

It is announced that our differences with Persia are likely to be arranged.

These favourable occurrences have caused during the last three days an advance in the English Funds of 1⅛ per cent.; On the Stock Exchange there has been a full supply of money, and in the discount market, and at the Bank of England greater ease.

From the Bank of England return, for the week ending the 7th instant, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,873,205, being a decrease of £300,030, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,979,246, shewing a decrease of £160,730, as compared with the previous return. The rate at the Bank for discount and advances continues without alteration.

In the Corn Markets there is again a tendency to lower prices. Arrivals from abroad have not been large in wheat, but more bountiful in flour, the price of which has declined In the Meat Markets there is no appearance of any abatement in price, but rather the contrary. Other prime necessaries of home produce, and several articles in general demand imported from the colonies, and foreign countries, continue to realise advanced prices, in consequence of the present favourable weather, and the approach of Spring. Many articles of less general demand have materially advanced in price. Successive unproductive seasons have enhanced the price of foreign wines and spirits beyond what could have been supposed possible a few years ago. The failure of the crop of silk in France, Italy, and China, has greatly advanced the price of silken manufactures, and a short supply of leather, and the lighter sorts of skin, has made several important articles in general use, much higher in price.

Two important financial measures engage the attention of the House of Commons, and the public; namely, the reduction of the Income Tax, and the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England. With the favourable view of expenditure now before Parliament, an immediate reduction of a large proportion of the present rate of Income Tax appears to be practicable, without, on the one hand, increasing the permanent debt; and, on the other hand, without interfering with that relief in regard to Custom and Excise Duties which the Free-trade policy, and financial measures of former years, have established on a foundation to which the experience of every year adds additional security. The consideration of the Bank Charter Act is referred to a committee. The Debate shewed little strength on the side of those who have previously, on many occasions, impugned the policy of the Act of 1844. Government has not suggested any change. Those who deem it to be essential to the safe circulation of bank notes that there should be good security for their convertability, and that that convertibility must be into gold and silver on demand, are likely to find their views again established, notwithstanding the strong demands for other measures which have been frequently forced on public attention.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 21, 1857.

A MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

The reception which Mr. NAPIER's motion, in favour of the appointment of a Minister of Justice, has met with in the House of Commons, renders it pretty evident that the house and the government are at their wit's end on the subject of Law Amendment. After all that has been said and written on the reform of our laws, the revision of the statute book, and the improvement of our methods of legislation, it is still clear enough that our legislators are not very definite in their notions about any of these questions; and that they are still open to accept euphonious nostrums and universal specifics. In such a class we cannot help placing Mr. NAPIER's panacea for all the ills of modern legislation. What the particular functions, or the position of this great new officer of state are to be, no one seems to be able to guess; not even the honourable and learned mover of the question. Some say that he ought to be a lawyer—others that a layman would be more likely to suggest and carry out sweeping reforms. There is also a controversy as to whether he ought to be a peer or a member of the lower house; and, in either case, there is this further question as to his relation to the Lord Chancellor—whether he should be of superior, inferior, or equal dignity.

But suppose all these knotty points to be satisfactorily settled, a still more important consideration remains. What is to be the special province of the department over which it is proposed to place this new minister? Is it intended, as Mr. NAPIER has more than once suggested, that it should be the repository of all the projects of legal reform, which now find their resting place among the archives of Waterloo Place? Or is he merely to content himself with the clerical supervision of such bills as the Lord Chancellor and the law officers of the Crown shall initiate or recommend? Mr. NAPIER vaguely intimates that the department should supply the want which has long been felt of "some central supervision over the administration of public justice," which he says on account of the numerous and pressing engagements of the Lord Chancellor, it is impossible for him to attempt. The main argument, however, adduced in support of the motion, was that some person of rank and authority was required to "mature the measures brought before Parliament," a task which everybody admits is now very imperfectly discharged. Sir RICHARD BETHELL aims at the accomplishment of a grander scheme, by means of existing machinery, without any constitutional change. His programme comprises effectual superintendence over the administration of justice in all its departments; supervision of projects of law amendment; and assistance to the business of current legislation; but characteristically enough, the ATTORNEY GENERAL's programme contains no reference to the mode in which he proposes to effect these most desirable objects. Lord JOHN RUSSELL's suggestion that the SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR should take upon himself some of the duties now belonging to the Home Department, so as to allow the HOME SECRETARY to assume the functions of a minister of justice, has at all events something tangible and practicable about it, which is more than we can say of the very elaborate dissertation of Sir RICHARD BETHELL.

But let us ask why should the choice lie between the appointment of a new Secretary of State and the constitution of a new department on the one hand; and on the other, the transfer of a considerable portion of the business of the Home Office to other departments, for the purpose of enabling the HOME SECRETARY to do that for which, after all, he would probably be wholly incompetent? If in order to carry out this latter plan, it would be necessary not only to charge the War Department with the duty of preserving the public peace, but also to appoint a number of new officials to undertake other duties now discharged by the HOME SECRETARY, why should not the LORD CHANCELLOR, the Constitutional Minister of Justice, and who under any circumstances must control or interfere with any department constituted for the proposed objects, be relieved of his too numerous duties, and thereby be enabled to devote his mind to subjects that are emphatically within his province? By a trifling alteration in the business of the Lords Justices' Court, it would be quite possible for one appellate tribunal to hear and decide all appeals in the Court of Chancery, and the LORD CHANCELLOR would then be enabled to spend the most valuable part of his time—that which intervenes between two sessions of Parliament—in the preparation and revision of new bills. At present, he is just as hard worked as any of the Equity judges, from the end of the long vacation until the opening of Parliament; and it would be, therefore, absurd to expect that he could apply his mind to the close consideration of any comprehensive measures of law amendment which always require the most careful handling and abundant examination. With a suitable departmental staff there is no reason why the Lord Chancellor could not undertake and effect all that the Attorney-General has sketched out; and at the same time discharge his judicial functions, not only in the House of Lords, and at the Privy Council, but also in the Court of Chancery, whenever as sometimes now happens, the importance of a case makes it desirable that it should be heard before his lordship sitting with the Lords Justices.

We think, therefore, that the appointment of a Minister of Justice would not only be an unnecessarily expensive proceeding, but a very inexpedient and inconvenient one; and we suspect that the favour with which some persons have entertained the proposition is not the result of superior information on their part, or of anything else than the notion that as it has been called a measure of administrative reform, it really is so. At the same time, it is to be hoped that, though we need not have a new minister, a new department under the control of the Lord Chancellor may be instituted, and that his lordship, as minister of justice, may be enabled to obtain all the assistance in the preparation of measures intended to be submitted to Parliament, and generally in the administration of public justice, which the public service requires, and which it is impossible for him to receive from the present legal functionaries, however willing they might be to afford it. If such a department should be constituted there might be some official holding a seat in the House of Commons, similar to the under-secretaries of the other departments, which would have the advantage of being at once convenient and constitutional.

Such a plan would certainly be preferable to the appointment of a new Secretary of State, and would unquestionably be a vast improvement on the present lumbering system of law commissions; which, notwithstanding all the recent eulogies of Lords BROUGHAM and CAMPBELL, no man in our day has done more to bring into disrepute than Mr. BELLENDEN KER, and especially in the late miserable attempt at the consolidation of our Statute Law, in which that learned commissioner has been the presiding genius.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

The course taken by the Times in relation to the case of Davison v. Duncan is remarkable in more ways than one. That a newspaper should impugn a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench as bad law; that the Lord Chief Justice should make a speech in the House of Lords which looked very like an apology to the newspaper for the conclusion at which the Court arrived; that the newspaper should then, after repeating its charge of timidity, if not of ignorance, repay the judge's complaisance in a strain of patronising compliment not unlike insult, — are facts which deserve to be remembered as an illustration of the character of several of our institutions.

We fully agree with the Times in thinking that Lord CAMPBELL is not only a great judge, but a very remarkable man; but the value of its evidence upon the subject is somewhat diminished by the naïve insolence which prompted the writer of the article in question to say of a class which contains such men as the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Mr. Justice CRESSWELL, and Mr. Justice ERLE—"Some of them may be good pleaders, and all are honest, painstaking judges." The courage of the learned person who looks down upon the bench with such ineffable condescension is materially enhanced by the circumstance that his view of the law is entirely wrong. The proposition which he maintains is, that it would have been competent to the Court of Queen's Bench to hold in the case of Davison v. Duncan, that if A. speaks words of B. which do not expose him to an action for defamation, C. may assert in print that he used them, without exposing himself to an action for libel. He supports this proposition by an argument which misquotes or misunderstands every case to which it refers.

"In the twelfth part of Lord COKE's reports," we are told, "we find the celebrated case of the Earl of Northampton." We also find the following note prefixed to the part in question. "The twelfth reports are said by Mr. HARGRAVE to be of small authority, being not only posthumous, but apparently nothing more than a collection from papers neither digested nor intended for the press by the author. Serjeant HILL refers to fo. 18, 19, as showing that the twelfth report is not fit to be allowed." "It (Lord NORTHAMPTON's case) was decided," says the Times, "so long ago as 1612, and the resolution was made after solemn argument by eleven out of the twelve judges of England. The resolution was in these words—'In a private action for slander of a common person, if J. S. publish that he hath heard J. N. say that J. G. was a traitor or thief, in an action on the case, he may justify, &c.'" The resolution was not made after solemn argument. The defendants pleaded guilty, and the resolutions of the judges were entirely extra-judicial; the particular resolution quoted by the Times was quite foreign to the matter in hand, for the proceeding in question was on a criminal information for a scandalum magnatum. "This," says the Times, "was the old common law, and the judges who announced it quoted abundant decisions of their and of Lord CAMPBELL's predecessors." It was a judgment of the Court of Star Chamber—the most unconstitutional and tyrannical court that ever existed in England—a court of which the specific peculiarity was its enmity to the common law, and so far from having quoted "abundant decisions," the judges in Lord NORTHAMPTON's case quoted but two decisions from the year-books, one of which seems to us curiously irrelevant to the subject-matter. "A smatterer in law," continues Lord CAMPBELL's patron, "will object that this resolution was of words spoken and not of words written. Lord CAMPBELL is too good a lawyer to make such a reply. He knows that it is most indubitable that when this judgment was given, the courts recognised no distinction between oral and written slander. It was so recently as the year 1812 that the distinction between written and spoken defamation was first formally drawn." It is quite true that in Lord NORTHAMPTON's case no distinction was drawn between libel and defamation, and, indeed, such a distinction would have been even more foreign to the case before the court than the resolutions which were actually made; but when the case of Thorley v. Lord Kerry, which formally established the distinction, was decided in 1812, the judgment was expressly based upon the fact, that for more than a century past the courts had acted upon the rule that words might be libellous for which an action of defamation would not lie. No doubt Sir JAMES MANSFIELD said upon that occasion, "I cannot upon principle make any difference between words written and words spoken as to the right which arises on them of bringing an action:" and this the Times quotes; but he also went on to say that the practice was so well settled that he could not disturb it, and this the Times does not quote.

After a reference to M'Gregor v. Thwaites, which is only slightly unfair, the writer in the Times goes on to the case of De Crespigny v. Wellesley; but, before noticing it, he uses an expression which is not a little remarkable:—"We admit that from time to time the judges cast an evil eye upon the old law." Was the writer haunted by the recollection of a case of Lewis v. Walter (4 B. & Ald. 614), which formed an authority almost expressly in point in De Crespigny v. Wellesley, and in which the proprietor of the Times was the defendant, and a Hampshire attorney the plaintiff? "No court," says the Times, "thought itself strong enough to repeal so solemn a decision" (as Lord NORTHAMPTON's case) "till"—the case of De Crespigny v. Wellesley. We answer that Lewis v. Walter went quite as far as De Crespigny v. Wellesley. Mr. Justice HOLROYD said on that occasion, "The book in which Lord NORTHAMPTON's case is found, is not so accurate as the rest of the reports of Lord COKE. The point there is stated in very general terms, and, as it seems to me, may be questionable." — "In the case of De Crespigny v. Wellesley," the Times says, "Chief Justice BEST stepped out of his way, and confessedly without any necessity for the purpose of the case before the court," overruled the rule for which the Times contends. Chief Justice BEST did no such thing. He decided the case on a broad principle which directly applied to it, instead of disposing of it as he might have done by a side-wind.

We have shown how the writer in the Times misunderstands and misrepresents his authorities; but his logic is even more at fault than his learning. He argues thus:—There are some things which it is actionable to say, and there may be a doubt whether, before the year 1812, it was actionable to write any other things, though, since that time, the distinction between libel and verbal slander has been established beyond all doubt whatever. Lord NORTHAMPTON's case decided that it was not actionable to repeat what it was actionable to say, if the repeater vouched the original author; therefore, since 1812, it cannot be actionable to state in writing that a person used words which, when spoken, were not actionable. Surely, this is a wonderful consequence. The true inference would be, that as before 1812 it was not actionable to repeat in words what it was actionable to originate in words; so after 1812 it would not be actionable to repeat in writing what it was actionable to originate in writing. The reason of the rule in both cases being that the person slandered is enabled by the person repeating the slander to bring an action against the original slanderer; but this reason does not apply in cases where the printing is the gist of the offence, because by printing what is libellous, though not (technically) defamatory, the printer injures the person attacked, and gives him no remedy against the person attacking him. Very shortly, the argument of the Times is this:—"The law of defamation is too lax, therefore relax the law of libel. You may call a man an adulterer, a liar, and a rogue with impunity, therefore you ought not to punish us for giving additional currency to his slanders." In our humble opinion it is wiser to increase the risk of defamation than to diminish the risk of libel, and we cannot express our reasons for that opinion in better words than those which were used by the "Old Tory judge, whose politics no one respects, and whose learning no lawyer venerates," as the Times calls one of the ablest men that ever sat on the bench. In his judgment on the case of De Crespigny v. Wellesley, Lord WYNFORD said:—

"If the person receiving a libel may publish it at all, he may publish it in whatever manner he pleases—he may insert it in all the journals, and thus circulate his calumny through every region of the globe. The effect of this is very different from that of the repetition of oral slander. In the latter case, what has been said is known only to a few persons; and if the statement is untrue, the imputation cast upon any one may be got rid of; the report is not heard of beyond the circle in which all the parties move, and the veracity of the accuser, and the previous character of the accused, will be properly estimated. But if the report is to be spread over the world by means of the press, the malignant falsehood of the vilest of mankind, which would not receive the least credit when the author is known, would make an impression which it would require much time and trouble to erase, and which it might be difficult, if not impossible, ever completely to remove."

Legal News.

In the Daily News of the 24th ult., in the report of the trial of an action (Disborough v. Midgley) in the Exchequer, the following passage occurs:—

"Mr. Serjeant Thomas—As an imputation has been cast on the attorney in this case, may I observe that this action was brought by the advice of my learned friend, Mr. Charnock, and myself.

"Mr. Baron Bramwell—You are not justified in making any such statement; it is not, as counsel, your province to do so.

"Mr. Serjeant Thomas excused himself, by saying that the attorney for the plaintiff had been attacked.

"Mr. Baron Bramwell—Let the attorney submit to it then."

We believe, from inquiries we have made, that this is a correct report of the words used by Mr. Baron BRAMWELL, and we think it our duty to point out that the plaintiff's attorney in the case was harshly and unfairly treated, and that he ought not to have been expected, by the learned Baron, to "submit" to the attack made upon him by the defendant's counsel. We have been informed that the case was really one of actual wrong to the plaintiff, that the defendant had treated her very shamefully, and well deserved the penalty inflicted on him by the verdict. There was substantially no defence, and a very skilful advocate and great master of vituperative rhetoric was reduced, by the dearth of other topics, to heap abuse on the attorney who had brought the action. Now, we apprehend that Baron BRAMWELL was quite correct in laying down that the plaintiff's counsel over-stepped his province when he stated that the action was brought under his advice. It is the duty of the attorney to decide whether a particular action can fairly and properly be brought, and if he takes proceedings for the sake of vexation or unjust extortion, he cannot be allowed to shelter himself under the authority of counsel when charged with prostituting to unworthy purposes the process of the Court. It is not, however, very surprising that the plaintiff's counsel should have been anxious to defend the attorney from an imputation which appears to have been undeserved. These attacks are hardly ever made in cases where counsel on the other side have a legitimate opportunity of answering them in the course of the reply. When the defendant's counsel offers no evidence, his speech immediately precedes the judge's summing up, and thus no opportunity is afforded either for the plaintiff's attorney, or for counsel on his behalf, to vindicate his injured character. But to us it appears that this vicious practice ought not to be suffered to continue. If counsel be willing to defend the attorney's reputation, he might surely be allowed to do so, even though he should thereby step beyond the strict line of his peculiar duty. And if the attorney desires personally to vindicate himself, it does seem most unfair to deny him a few moments' hearing for that purpose. It may be quite true that this is after all a matter of no great consequence, for the device of abusing the attorney who has presented an unanswerable case is so familiar, that even a common jury are not likely to be influenced by such means. At the same time, it deserves attention that such attacks are frequently made, and usually left unanswered. Nobody thinks it worth while to waste one word or one moment's time in removing imputations which we nevertheless fear must, by their frequent repitition, exercise a certain influence upon the estimate popularly formed of the attorneys. An upright man, with his hands full of business, will, probably, not bestow a thought upon an attack which he knows cannot do him the least injury with any one whose opinion he regards. But we think that an attorney thus unfairly and unnecessarily assailed owes to the profession generally the duty of at least offering to vindicate his own character; and we think, also, that the presiding judge would do well to allow a brief hearing to such a vindication, even although the proceeding were not strictly regular. Such an interruption would be quite as seasonable as the jokes of some judges, and the platitudes of others. We would, further, venture to suggest that some check might properly be placed on the exuberance of injurious epithets with which the conduct of the plaintiff's attorney is sometimes assailed by counsel. We observe that lately the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas interfered to protect a witness against the violence which is too commonly resorted to by accomplished brow-beaters. This admonition, if repeated a few times, would put down a very unseemly practice, and we think that the attorney, as well as the witness, deserves rather more protection from the court than hitherto he has usually enjoyed.

In a letter in the Daily News of the 18th inst., on the subject of "County Courts," we find the following sensible remarks on the identity of professional interests, rightly understood, with those of the community:

"For myself, I confess, that if, by the plan I propose, the interests of the legal profession were likely to be sacrificed, I should pause long before I adopted it.

"The moral and intellectual standard of either the legal adviser or the advocate, can never, in such a state of society as ours, be lowered without inflicting serious injury upon the community at large.

"But will the legal profession be prejudiced by the plan proposed? I think the contrary may be shown.

* * * * * *

"Have the devotees of Westminster-hall ever reflected upon the vast amount of business now lost to the legal profession, simply because the would-be litigants are deterred from the contest by the delay and the expense which necessarily attend on it? In how many cases is a compromise effected, not because either party is satisfied with it, but because the evils avoided by it are still more intolerable?

"How many just claims are abandoned, because their abandonment is preferable to their prosecution?

"One tenth part of the inconvenience, expense, and delay attendant upon the instance I have given will deter, and ought to deter, a prudent man from seeking to enforce his rights, or complain of his wrongs; and the members of the legal profession may feel well assured that as long as you compel the would-be plaintiff to have recourse to a distant and necessarily expensive tribunal, you largely diminish the general legal business of the country, and prejudice professional interests, while you are unjust to the suitor.

"I utterly deny it. The county courts will become, if you permit them, tribunals for the determination of disputed facts—and, where the law is not doubtful, for the decision of points of law. They will be resorted to only when more convenient than the superior courts. When legal difficulties are involved, they will be argued by appeal in Westminster-hall, before the superior judges, and by the ablest advocates. I apply myself with confidence to any lawyer, and ask, whether the cases (of comparatively small importance in mere amount) which have hitherto been sent up from the county courts have not been among the most interesting of purely legal inquiries, and the most suitable for argument and decision in Westminster?

"Enlarge, then, the amount of legal business throughout the country, and (reserving the right of appeal on points of law) I doubt not you will increase, instead of diminishing, the practice of Westminster. It is true, that general business will be somewhat differently distributed. It cannot, in any case, be otherwise. New seats of manufactures and commerce have arisen to compete with the capital, even in political importance. In more than one district of Lancashire alone there is a population far exceeding that of London proper. If, by such a state of things, local advocates are created, they cannot be denied admittance to the arena. But, in truth, they must fight at a disadvantage. The metropolis will always command the ablest speakers and the most trained lawyers, for it will reward them most liberally. Do away with the prejudices attending practice in the county court—enlarge its jurisdiction—let the stakes be large, if the litigants desire it, and the contests will be ably conducted.

"Nor in this age of railways is it difficult to obtain in any part of England the services of some of the most able London advocates. Above all, secure by a well-digested system of appeal a final recourse to Westminster, and the legal profession will have no cause in any branch of it to fear a diminution of business.

"I have been writing above of class interests; but those interests are too powerful to be prudently neglected.

"Firmly believing that they can never, in the long run, be different from those of the community, I am yet anxious to conciliate support where I should dread hostility. On the meanest pecuniary calculation, I believe the scheme proposed by me will benefit Westminster-hall. Sure I am that those who love (as I do) even its traditions, and desire to uphold its dignity, should support an effort to secure its popularity by extending its usefulness."

JUSTICE TO THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Times used to be as remarkable for the correctness of its information as for the ability with which such information was turned to account in its leading articles. But however it may retain its character for cleverness, it certainly is in a fair way of losing its reputation for accuracy. The two recent attacks upon the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Chancery are full of blunders and misrepresentations, which our duty to the profession and to society compels us to expose. "Six years ago," says the Times in its leader of Saturday last, "we appointed two additional judges to do what our Lord Chancellor had heretofore (sic) done single-handed. The aids have been so vigorous that Lord Cranworth opens a seven weeks' sitting with a list of three appeals. In Chancery he has comparatively nothing to do." Now every one of these allegations is the reverse of the truth. It is not true that the Lords Justices were appointed to do, together with the Lord Chancellor, what had previously been done by Lord Chancellors single-handed. On the contrary, the number of appeals now bears a greater proportion to the number of appellate judges than in the days of Lord Eldon; and so far from its being the fact, that Lord Cranworth had only three appeals in a seven weeks' sitting, and that "so far as his judicial duties are concerned, he is almost as otiose a gentleman as his brother of Lancaster"; the truth is, that from the first day of Michaelmas term last until the opening of Parliament, the Lord Chancellor sat every day that the other equity judges sat, with scarcely any, if one single exception. He frequently sat until after dusk, and on several occasions by candle-light. On the 2nd January, in the short Christmas vacation, he sat with Lord Justice Turner until past seven o'clock in the evening to hear the appeal from the decision of Commissioner Holroyd in Re The Royal British Bank Ex parte Shore. Instead of only hearing three appeals during the period to which we allude, he heard thirty-three, and pronounced judgment in thirty-one, many of them causes of great complexity and importance. In this number we do not include patent cases, or other applications which came before the Lord Chancellor directly, nor yet any of those interlocutory applications which are constantly referred to his lordship by the judges of the courts below, when there is any doubt as to the practice or procedure of the Court. It is, moreover, the well-known practice of Lord Cranworth to take home with him all the papers in every heavy case where the evidence is voluminous, and therefore requires pctient investigation; and in such cases as the Mayor of Berwick v. Murray, and Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas Light Company, the only wonder has been how he managed in so short a space of time to master the quantity of evidence with which each case was overladen. During the sitting of Parliament, the Lord Chancellor, as a rule—almost without an exception—sits in the Court of Chancery every day that he is not engaged judicially in hearing appeals in the House of Lords, or, as he has been recently been, in the Privy Council. The statement of the Times, therefore, that after the long vacation he had but three appeals to hear, and, in point of fact, that he has had nothing to do, and does nothing, is as untrue as any statement can possibly be; we venture to affirm, on the contrary, that, since last November, Lord Cranworth has had more to do, and has gone through more intellectual labour than many professional men in England, including barristers of large practice.

Another instance of the gross ignorance of the Times as to the facts of the case, on which it so flippantly pronounces judgment, is its description of the process of appeal in the Court of Chancery. It speaks of "the frequent appeals from a Vice-Chancellor to the Lords Justices, from the Lords Justices to the Lord Chancellor, and from the Lord Chancellor to the House of Lords." Now, every tyro of a month's standing in a solicitor's office knows that there is no such thing known, or possible, as an appeal from the Lords Justices to the Lord Chancellor, but that the two courts have generally co-ordinate jurisdiction, and that it is a mere matter of arrangement as to whether the Lords Justices or Lord Chancellor shall, during any particular sitting, take the appeals from the Master of the Rolls or any given Vice-Chancellor. For example, sometimes the Lord Chancellor in Trinity Term, will perhaps take all appeals from Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and the Lords Justices all from Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, and vice versâ in Michaelmas Term. But it has been reserved for the Times to discover a step in Chancery procedure, which has altogether escaped the observation of the Legislature, the judges, and the legal profession. We certainly now learn, for the first time, that it is possible to appeal to the Chancellor from a decision of the Lords Justices. Another specimen of the ignorance, or intentional unfairness, with which these attacks are conducted, is to be found in the contrast which is made between the judicial labours of Lord Cranworth and such judges as Lord Eldon, &c. "A superstition still survives in England," says the writer, "that a Chancellor is an unhappy State drudge, who vainly toils to keep down a hopelessly accumulating amount of work; that he is like a prisoner condemned to the Spanish pump, when the volume of water running into his cell is rather greater than the highest pitch of muscular exertion can pump out. This is a history of other days—of the days of Eldon, Brougham, and Lyndhurst." The argument is, that Lord Eldon and other chancellors in former days were able to manage without the assistance of Lords Justices, and so ought Lord Cranworth; or, at all events, that one court of appeal should be quite sufficient now as it formerly was, and that, the Lords Justices being appellate judges, the Lord Chancellor has abundance of time on his hands for law reform. But the writer of the paragraph, which we have quoted, must be ignorant of what nine out of every ten ordinary persons of education are acquainted with, viz:—that in Lord Eldon's time there was only one inferior judge in the Court of Chancery—the Master of the Rolls; and that, therefore, the Lord Chancellor had to hear appeals from only one court, while there are now, in addition to the Master of the Rolls, three Vice-Chancellors; so that cæteris paribus, the number of appeals is four-fold what it was in those days. We have no reliable statistics before us, but we have little hesitation in saying that there are now actually ten times as many causes, or matters which formerly would have been causes, heard and decided in the Court of Chancery, as there were in Lord Eldon's time. But even admitting that there has been no greater increase in the business than bears a proportion to the increased number of judges, and assuming the ratio of appeals to remain stationary, yet the increase would be as four to one; and, therefore, the argument of the Times proceeds upon an assumption that is wholly and obviously false.

It is also worthy of notice that another marked difference between the state of appeal business at present and in days of yore, is that formerly the list of appeals to be heard was always of great extent, simply because the Lord Chancellor was generally two or three years in arrear, while now the judgment of a court of appeal is commonly pronounced within as many months—and in the case of motions, within as many weeks—after the decision of the court below. Any person who is acquainted with the actual practice of the courts must admit this to be the fact; and a very little consideration will show that where the appellate courts properly discharge the functions and anwer the ends of such tribunals, they will usually be able to hear appeals within a reasonable time after they have been brought—while the facts and the arguments are still fresh in the minds of counsel and solicitors, and before new complications arise in the relations of parties to the suit, or by reason of a change in the parties themselves. A very long list of unheard appeals, therefore, is merely a proof of the inadequacy of the appellate tribunals, or the incompetency of their judges. It is certainly a novel charge against the Lord Chancellor that there are now no arrears of judicial business, the actual amount of business being notoriously much larger than it ever yet has been; but thus it is that accusations which spring from ignorance or malevolence sometimes turn out to be the highest tribute of praise.

So long as the leading articles of the Times on legal questions continue to be characterised by an almost incredible amount of ignorance and recklessness of assertion, so long will its random-shot thunderbolts fail to injure anything but the Times itself. If it really desires to aid in the work of law amendment, it would be certainly well worth its while to gain some little information on the subjects necessary to be discussed.

NEW MASTER OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.—Lord Campbell stated in court on Feb. 14th, that ten days since a certificate had been laid on the table of the House of Commons, in which the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench certified that it was essentially necessary for the administration of justice that a fifth Master for the court should be appointed. His lordship then said that he had appointed Mr. Henry John Hodgson, of Lincoln's-inn, barrister-at-law, to be the new Master, in the room of the late Master, Mr. Richard Goodrich.

LAW COURTS COMMISSION. — Baron Martin has been added to the Royal Commission for inquiry into the statute and common law courts and the courts of assize, in the room of Baron Alderson, deceased.

VACANCIES AND APPOINTMENTS.—The office of chief clerk of Marylebone Police Court has become vacant by the death of Mr. James Fell.—Mr. C. S. Whitmore, of the Oxford Circuit, has been appointed Judge of the Southwark County Court, in the room of Mr. George Clive, now M.P. for Hereford, who resigned his judgeship before addressing the electors of that city.—Mr. Martley, an eminent barrister, is appointed Chief Commissioner of the Incumbered Estates Court, Ireland, at a salary of £3,000 a-year.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK. — On the 18th inst., counsel applied, by permission, on behalf of Mr. Marcus, for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the decision of the Lords Justices pronounced on the 19th of December last, whereby they had refused to annul the adjudication in bankruptcy which had been pronounced against the bank. The ground of the application was, that the questions of construction involved in the case as presented to their lordships, were of sufficient difficulty, and considering the magnitude of the interests affected by them, of sufficient importance to warrant the court in giving such leave, according to the power in that behalf given to them in the 18th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act. It was objected, that after so long a delay, and the important steps which had been taken under the order already pronounced, that order of the court ought not to be appealed from. Their lordships refused the application, being of opinion, that, though if applied for at once or very shortly after the order was pronounced, the leave required would unquestionably have been granted, it ought not, under all the circumstances of the case, to be given after so long a delay; it appearing that Mr. Marcus had given no intimation to any of his opponents of his intention to apply to the court before the 14th instant.

On the 19th instant., there was a meeting for the last examination of the directors of the bank. Mr. Linklater, for the assignees, recommended an adjournment for two months; and added—We are in hopes that before then matters will have so far progressed that we may be able to announce the fact that shareholders are no longer in peril from proceedings of individual creditors. The assignees are desirous of impressing upon creditors the great importance of withholding proceedings against individual shareholders, in order that the general arrangement for compromise may not be frustrated, by depriving us of the funds that would otherwise be subscribed by those shareholders who are willing to do their duty to the general body, but who, in the event of individual proceedings against them, may be driven out of the country or forced to seek protection from this court. The shareholders have now come to the unanimous resolution to raise a sufficient fund for the payment of a composition which is admitted on all hands to be reasonable and fair. We hope that in a very few days the creditors will be called together in order that they may come to such unanimous resolution as will enable the shareholders to carry out this arrangement. It is only upon occasions of this kind that the assignees have the opportunity of expressing to the public how exceedingly important it is that there should be an end of individual process, which can but have the effect of exhausting means that ought to be applicable to the payment of the debts.—Mr. Lawrence: Shareholders should now use their best exertions to carry out the compromise to which the assignees and committee of depositors, as far as they can in their corporate character, and almost without exception in their individual capacity as creditors, have given their consent and are willing to give their co-operation. The proceedings taken by individual creditors against shareholders have had the effect of sending from the country many of those from whom the largest amount of contribution was expected. The creditors as a body have been most considerate and forbearing, and the aggravated and vexatious nature of such actions as have been commenced, arises from the multiplicity of the notices to recover the same debt. In one case, where the debt was originally £46, the creditor, a woman, proved that debt under the bankruptcy and received the dividend of 5s. 6d. in the pound, thereby reducing the balance to about £30. An action was brought against the official manager, and judgment was obtained against him. Executions were levied in three different counties for the purpose of obtaining a return of nulla bona, and no less than nine notices were served on nine different shareholders in respect of that wretched fragment of a debt. The costs thereby incurred amounted to at least thrice the sum sought to be recovered, or rather the sum due, for it would be erroneous to say that the attorney was seeking to recover payment of the debt. I wish to impress upon the shareholders for their own sakes the absolute necessity of discarding all personal considerations, and at once assisting the assignees in carrying out a compromise to which they have already given their cordial and ready assent. Creditors, even the most forbearing and most considerate, cannot be expected to abstain from proceeding for an indefinite period, and unless the shareholders will exert themselves to raise a sufficient fund, it is clear that such cases as that I have already mentioned will not be exceptions.

CROSSED CHEQUES.—In the case of Simmonds v. Taylor, in the Common Pleas this week, the question raised by the action (involving the construction to be put on the recent act relating to drafts on bankers, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25) was one of great importance to bankers and the public, and was, whether where a customer of a bank crosses a cheque, but before presentment the crossing has been fraudulently obliterated by some person, through whom it is presented at the bank, and it is paid over the counter in the ordinary course of business, the loss falls upon the bank or upon the customer.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said the question was, whether the words of the act which made it obligatory upon a banker to pay a crossed cheque only through a banker had reference to the time of the drawing of the cheque, or the time of the presentment at the bank. That question he would reserve for the opinion of the Court. On the question of negligence he said that it was a daily occurrence to send cheques and drafts through the post, and the business of the country could not go on unless that was done. Then the jury must say whether every cheque presented at a banker's was to be scrutinised by holding it up to the light to see if it was crossed, as had been suggested. They were to say whether the bank had exercised due and reasonable care in paying this cheque, there being nothing at once visible to the eye on the face of it at the time when it was presented, to show that it had been crossed. The jury found that there was no negligence on either the part of the plaintiff or of the defendant, and a verdict was then entered for the defendant, subject to leave to the plaintiff to move on the point reserved.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

There are several cases in the books of gifts by will for the benefit of the testator's creditors, where they had previously compromised their legal claims, or where the debts were barred by the statute of limitations. In Coppin v. Coppin, 2 P. Wms. 291, the testator, who had compounded with his creditors for 10s. in the pound, by his will gave the residue of his estate to a trustee upon trust to pay to the testator's creditors, who had so compounded, the balance without interest. Upon the construction of this bequest, it was held that the compounding creditors, having released their debts, could only claim as voluntary legatees, and had no other title than to legacies in such manner as given by the will. In Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Y. & C. Exch. 208, the testator had been a member of a partnership which had compounded with its creditors, and he by his will declared that one-fifth of the residue of his personal estate should be divided among such of the creditors of the partnership "as were contained in a schedule (annexed to the will) according to the amount of such creditors' debts, the other creditors of the said concern having been already satisfied" by the testator. The schedule contained the names of the individuals and the firms to which the partnership was indebted, the amount of each debt being set opposite the respective names. The case was further distinguishable from Coppin v. Coppin by the fact, that there the creditors had released their debts, while here they had not done so. Lord Lyndhurst, sitting in the Exchequer, at the hearing of the cause, was of opinion that this gift was not to be taken as mere voluntary bounty on the part of the testator, but that he meant the money to be applied in satisfaction, or part satisfaction, of those debts, which, though they could not be enforced against him, were still subsisting debts. The creditors, therefore, his lordship held to be entitled strictly as creditors, and not as legatees; and, consequently, there was no lapse of the interest of those who died in the testator's lifetime. When the cause subsequently came on upon further directions, it was argued for the next of kin, that the whole of the creditors' claims depended upon the particular clause in the will, and not on a general revival by the testator of his debts, which were, therefore, not payable out of his general assets. It was not necessary to decide this point; but Baron Alderson, who heard the cause in the Exchequer, coincided with Lord Lyndhurst's view, that it was a devise to pay such persons as should reasonably appear to be the creditors of the partnership at the testator's death. "There are," said his lordship (3 Y. & C. Exch. 215), "a variety of debts mentioned in the schedule as being due to firms, and to the executors of different persons. Obviously, therefore, the schedule refers not to individuals, but debts; it points to the debts, rather than to the persons of the creditors." Both these cases have been discussed very fully in Philips v. Philips, 3 Hare, 281, which was almost identical with Williamson v. Naylor, except that the gift included the respective executors and administrators of the creditors. Payment was to be made unto and amongst the several persons who were the testator's creditors at the time he executed a conveyance of his estate and effects for their general benefit, their respective executors and administrators, such payment to be made amongst such persons respectively, their respective executors or administrators, rateably and in proportion to the quantum or amount of the original debt or debts due at the date of the conveyance. Vice-Chancellor Wigram held that the representatives of creditors who died in the lifetime of the testators were entitled to claim, the testator's object being to discharge pro tanto his obligations to his creditors, notwithstanding the bar of the statute. The same question substantially was raised in Turner v. Martin, 5 W. R. 277, where a person had been a member of a partnership which was bankrupt in 1822, and by his will he directed his just debts to be paid, including the unpaid-in-full debts proved on the estate of the bankrupt firm. The executors admitted assets sufficient to pay the amount found due. The Lord Chancellor held that the shares of those creditors who died before the testator did not lapse, but that they were payable to their representatives. It was further held, upon the principle of Foster v. Ley, 2 Bli. N. C. 259, that, the debts having been barred by the statute of limitations, legacy duty was payable. In such cases as those to which we have been referring, it is generally very difficult to say either that the testator meant simple bounty, or that he intended merely to discharge an obligation. Perhaps the fund should be regarded—as it has been no doubt in some of the cases—as characterised by the mixed motives of the testator, in fixing it with the payment of debts which have been barred or released. In one sense, such a gift must be regarded as bounty, in another as being only the due of its objects.

In Wolley v. Jenkins, 5 W. R. 281, a very difficult question, and one highly interesting to conveyancers, was discussed at length. Upon a marriage settlement an estate was settled to the use of Mr. J. A. Gordon for life; remainder to the use of Mrs. Gordon, if she survived her husband, to secure a jointure; remainder to the use of other trustees for £500 to raise the arrears of the jointure. There was then a limitation to the original trustees for 2,000 years upon trusts to raise portions for younger children, and subject to the said estates for life and to the said terms, the estate was limited in favour of the issue of the marriage, with an ultimate remainder to Mr. Gordon, the husband, in fee. The settlement also contained a power to the widow at any time after the marriage, by deed or will, to charge £2,000 upon the settled property to be raised after her decease, for the benefit of her own estate, and for that purpose to create a term; and there was also a power to the original trustees during the life of Mr. Gordon, with his consent, and within twenty-one years after his decease with the consent of the persons for the time being entitled to the receipts of the annual rents and profits, to sell or exchange the hereditaments. There was no issue, and Mr. Gordon died, having devised the estate, subject to the subsisting interests of his widow, to trustees upon trust for sale. The question for the court was, whether the trustees of the settlement, or the trustees of the will, were the proper parties to sell. After the very elaborate arguments of counsel, which are epitomised in the report, the Lord Chancellor affirmed the decision of the Master of the Rolls, by which his Honour held that the power to the trustees of the settlement had gone. "On the whole," said the Master of the Rolls, "my opinion is, that the power in the settlement cannot be exercised after the union of the estate for life with the reversion or remainder in fee; that this union, in the present case, took place upon the death of the husband; and that the trustees of the settlement, therefore, ceased to have any right to exercise the power originally vested in them."

In Borradaile v. Smart, 5 W. R. 271, Vice-Chancellor Wood held that a lessor is not entitled, in the absence of any stipulation to that effect, to insist upon witnessing, by himself or his agent, the execution, by the lessee, of the counterpart of the lease. His Honour, however, appeared to be of opinion that where a practice of that kind existed, as (it was stated) in the case of the Duke of Bedford's estate in London, it might be an implied stipulation.

The first of a flight of cases shortly to be expected upon the complicated provisions of the Succession Duty Act, was decided lately by the Master of the Rolls. Like most modern statutes, the act contains elaborate definitions of the terms employed, and attempts to define, with extreme precision, the persons who shall be considered as predecessors and successors respectively, for the purpose of fixing the rate of duty to be paid. Either intentionally, or otherwise, the language used is such as to admit of the same person being his own predecessor, and, consequently, also successor to himself. For such a case no scale of duty is provided, and one of the points argued in the case of Re Jenkinson 5 W. R. 301, was that Sir Charles Jenkinson filled this double character, and that the duty was, therefore, not payable. The facts of the case were shortly these:—Sir Charles Jenkinson, a tenant for life, agreed to pay an annuity to Sir George Jenkinson, who had the remainder in tail, in return for which Sir George charged the remainder with £5,000, to be at the disposal of Sir Charles, and £20,000 to be held on trust for the daughters of Sir Charles. The first question was, whether any duty was payable on the £5,000, which was decided in the negative, on the ground that it was a purchase for money or money's worth, and, therefore, within the exemption of the 17th section. The other and more knotty point was, who was to be treated as the predecessor of the daughters—their father who had paid the annuity to secure the provision for them, or the relative who had charged it on the family estate. The Master of the Rolls regarded the transaction as a purchase by the tenant for life, and held him to be the grantor, and, as a necessary consequence, the minimum duty of £1 per cent. only was payable.

A case of considerable interest to all who live within the metropolitan district has also been decided by the Master of the Rolls, with respect to the powers of the Board of Works. The plaintiffs in Stainton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 5 W. R. 305, were the executors of a gentleman who had spent a vast amount of money in turning a small brook into fish ponds and ornamental waters about his grounds. The Metropolitan Board built a sewer, and tapped the source of the stream which had supplied the pond. The plaintiffs contended, and perhaps proved, that if the sewer had been made water-tight, the ornamental water would not have suffered. The Board of Works maintained that the sewer was a good sewer for drainage purposes, well constructed, and that it fulfilled its purpose all the better for admitting the percolation of the surface and other water. It did not appear that any further inconvenience could arise from caulking the crevices of the sewer where it passed near the plaintiffs' pond than some additional expense; but it was shown that it would be absolutely impossible to adopt the watertight system generally, as the water that leaked through was essential to maintain the flow of the sewer. The question, therefore, resolved itself into this—whether the board could be compelled in a particular case to adopt an exceptional mode of construction for the convenience of the plaintiffs, or whether they were not left to the compensation which was provided for injury under the act in much the same terms as in the Land Clauses Act. A very near approach to a precedent in favour of the plaintiffs was supplied by the case of Coats v. The Clarence Railway Company, before Lord Lyndhurst, which is reported in 1 Russ. & My. 181. The only difference in principle was, that the bridge in that case was not, like the sewer in this, shown to be properly constructed so far as the purposes of the act were concerned. Upon this distinction the Master of the Rolls founded his judgment, and refused to grant a mandatory injunction to compel the board to adopt an extraordinary mode of construction, solely for the benefit of the plaintiffs.

Holloway v. Radcliffe, 5 W. R. 271, deserves a passing notice for the dictum which it contains, to the effect that one of a number of joint legatees of the proceeds of the sale of land cannot, without the concurrence of the rest, elect to take his undivided share as realty. The inconvenience of conflicting elections would be very great if they were to prevent a sale, though no such consideration would arise on the question whether the proceeds should go to the heir or personal representative of the electing legatee. The judgment in the present case, partly founded on the disability of the legatee to elect, and partly on the question of fact as to the election, was in favour of the personal representative.

Stanley v. Jackman, 5 W. R. 302, supplies the judicial interpretation of a direction to trustees to settle certain shares of an estate, which was couched in terms not unlikely to recur. The most noteworthy point is, that while the direction to settle contained merely a restriction on the husband's control during the wife's life, the court added the usual clause against anticipation, and (considering the object of the will to be to give as large a dominion to the wife as was consistent with her protection and the rights of her issue), introduced a general power of appointment by will in default of children before the ultimate limitation to the personal representatives of the wife.

One other case (Re Bodmin Mines, 5 W. R. 300) we may mention, as illustrating what has more than once been declared, that the court takes no judicial notice of the peculiar mining regulations known as the cost-book system. The Master of the Rolls said that it was competent for the parties to such a mining concern to vary the system as they pleased, and that in the absence of written rules the only way of determining the power of the shareholders and officers was by looking at the ordinary course of their business. In this way the court arrived at the conclusion, that in this particular mine a committee appointed by a general meeting could accept a resignation of shares without insisting on the payment of arrears of calls.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES—LIABILITY OF SHAREHOLDERS.

Peddell v. Gwynn; Gordon v. Official Manager of the Sea Assurance Company, 5 W. R., Exch., 283; Henderson v. The Royal British Bank, ib., Q.B., 286.

By the two first of the above cases, the opinion of the Court of Exchequer has been elicited upon an important point in reference to the constitution of joint-stock companies, completely registered under 7 & 8 Vict., c. 110—viz., that if such company should accept, by the directors, a bill of exchange, it is no defence to an action thereon brought against the official manager —nor to a scire facias against an individual shareholder upon the judgment in such action—that by the deed of settlement, bills of exchange accepted by the directors are to be binding on the company and shareholders, and each of them, to the extent only of the respective shares held by them in the capital stock of the company, and no further, or otherwise.

As to the action, it is clear that if such a defence were admissible, the shareholders of a company registered under 7 & 8 Vict., c. 110, would be in a different position, in point of liability to third parties, from shareholders of a co-partnership not so registered, but whose affairs are managed by directors. But according to the considered decision of the full court of appeal in Chancery, in the case of Greenwood, 23 L. J., N. S., Ch., 966, the position of the two classes of shareholders is the same in this respect; and in neither case can they absolve themselves from the ordinary liabilities of partnership quoad third parties (see also the case of Smith v. Hull Glass Company, 11 C. B. 897, 927.

As to the scire facias, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer went upon the well-known principle of law, that, as an answer to proceedings in scire facias on a judgment, there can not be set up any matter which might have been pleaded to the action on which that judgment was obtained—a doctrine clearly established in the case of Bradley v. Eyre, 11 Mee & W. 432, and Philips v. Lord Egremont, 6, Q. B., 587.

In the last case (Henderson v. The Royal British Bank), the Court of Queen's Bench (in consultation and concurrence with the judges of the other courts) gave judgment upon another point of much interest, in connection with joint-stock companies. Judgment had been recovered against the bank (established under 7 & 8 Vict., c. 113), and the present application to the court was for leave to issue execution against one of the shareholders for the amount of such judgment; and his answer was, that he had been induced to become a shareholder by the fraud of the manager and directors; that he did not discover the fraud till after the bank had stopped payment; and that, on such discovery, he had disclaimed being a shareholder, and claimed to prove in the Bankruptcy Court, as a creditor in respect of the money he had paid for his shares. It was, however, unanimously determined that this was no answer to the present application; and that to allow the shareholder, after having become a partner, and received dividends till the bank stopped payment, to say he had been defrauded and would no longer be a shareholder, and so get rid of his liability to third parties, would be "monstrous injustice." The rule as prayed for was therefore made absolute.

ATTORNEY—TOWN CLERK—PARLIAMENTARY BUSINESS—REMUNERATION.

Morgan v. Corporation of Birmingham, 5 W. R., Ex., 291.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, an attorney, to recover certain costs incurred while town clerk of the borough of B. The action (together with all other claims of the plaintiff) had been referred to a barrister, who, before making his award, requested the advice of the court as to the following question:—It appeared that in 1846, one Mr. Bray was town clerk of the borough; and while holding such office, a committee of the council, which had been appointed for that purpose, reported that the professional (as distinct from the routine) business "appurtenant to the office of town clerk," consisted of "parliamentary proceedings," perusing the daily votes of the House of Commons, and watching the bills likely to affect the interests of the borough, and also of business directed by the council and various committees, of conveyancing, prosecuting, and defending suits at law and in equity, and of other general business. And it was resolved, in consequence of this and other parts of their report, that the town clerk should for the future be paid by a salary of £800 for all business, "routine and appurtenant to the office," including all professional business ordered by the mayor, council, or committee—but exclusive of money out of pocket. In August, 1852, Mr. Bray resigned; and previously to the appointment of his successor, it was determined by a resolution of the council, referring to, and grounded on, the above report, and on a subsequent report on the same subject, that a salary of £500 should be given for "all business, routine and appurtenant to the office, exclusive of money out of pocket," but that there should be also given a distinct allowance of £300 to cover the salaries of clerks, who (in consequence of business arising from the Improvement Act of 1851), would have to be engaged by any future town clerk. The plaintiff was subsequently appointed town clerk, and received the above salary and allowance, and continued in his office till October, 1854, when he resigned; and in February, 1855, delivered (with other claims) certain bills of costs for "parliamentary business performed by order of the council" in 1854 and 1855, to the amount of £800 and upwards. The items of these bills consisted of attendances in council and on committees, journeys to London, and correspondence in respect of certain local bills affecting the town. The plaintiff was paid his expenses out of pocket. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to make such charges.

The court said that the plaintiff had accepted office under an appointment referring to a document in which the duties were specified; that part of those duties were "parliamentary proceedings;" that the matters now charged for were covered by that expression; and that he had failed to show any contract, express or implied, to be paid any sum in addition to the salary of the office.

Some of the observations of the Chief Baron, in delivering judgment, are worthy of remark. They are as follows:—"Some stress has been laid upon the fact of the plaintiff being an attorney, and that he may have had other business than that connected with the duties of his office. I am not aware that a town-clerk may not have business of his own. The case does not find whether that was so in this instance. But if it were, that an attorney undertook to perform the business appurtenant to the office of town-clerk, in the same way that he would undertake any other business that he might be retained or employed to transact for an ordinary client, I think that fact would have a material bearing upon the question of whether the salary excluded remuneration for any particular service."

Attorney—Advocate—Privileged Communication.

Brown v. Foster 5 W. R., Ex., 292.

The real question in this case, which is of the utmost importance, not only to the barrister, but also to the attorney, in reference to his duty in those tribunals in which he can practice as an advocate, is how far he may or ought to disclose to the court any circumstance, the knowledge of which he has acquired in consequence of his being engaged as advocate for the party against whom it is to be used.

The action was for malicious prosecution, and the defence was a justification by reason of the embezzlement of the plaintiff when in the employ of the defendant as clerk. There had been two examinations before the magistrate in reference to the alleged embezzlement, at both of which the clerk was represented by E., a barrister. On the first of these, the day and cash-books were put in by the prosecutor, to show that a certain sum of money, which had been paid to the clerk, had not been entered by him in due course. The clerk was liberated on bail; and at the second examination before the magistrate, E. pointed out an entry which exonerated the clerk, and he was then discharged, and commenced the above action for malicious prosecution. At the trial of this action, it was suggested by the counsel for the defendant, that the entry in question had been made by the plaintiff between the first and second examinations before the magistrate. On this the judge (the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas), after consulting Mr. Justice Cresswell, examined E. as to the condition of the book when in his hands as the plaintiff's counsel at the first examination before the magistrate. E. swore there was then no entry of the sum in question. Hereupon, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, which it was now sought to set aside, on the ground that the evidence by E. should not have been received.

The judges (Pollock, C. B., and Barons Martin and Watson) refused to disturb the verdict, and seemed to entertain no doubt that if E. knew as a matter of fact, that the entry was made subsequent to the remand, he was bound, on being questioned, to disclose the truth, without reference to what effect his so doing might have upon his former client's interest; for that (in the case before the court) the inquiry in which such information was given related to a different matter, and was between different parties; the case in which E. had been retained had been determined; the fact to which E. was asked to depose he could not, in any sense, be said to have acquired the knowledge of through any privileged communication, for the book in question was put in evidence by the prosecutor, and was before the magistrate.

The Court also intimated that no words of reprobation would be too strong as regarded the conduct of E., if it was necessary to believe that, when he pointed out the entry to the magistrate on the second occasion, he was aware that it was not in the book when he first examined it. But "it was just possible," said Mr. Baron Watson, "that E. did not, at the time he used the book, recollect that on the former occasion the entry was wanting, and may only have discovered afterwards that he had been deceived."

Correspondence.

DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The columns of the Dublin daily papers have been for nearly a week past, to a great extent, occupied by reports of two extraordinary trials that have been proceeding in the Queen's Bench and the Common Pleas respectively. These trials have arisen out of a somewhat complicated series of occurrences and letters; and the parties to them are the same in both actions, although in different characters. Mr. Arthur Smith, a solicitor in extensive practice in the city of Waterford, figured as plaintiff in the first action, and as defendant in the second; his adversary in both being Sir Benjamin Morris, Knt., also a resident in Waterford. These actions excited an amount of interest, both in legal circles and among the public, which is rarely equalled; and, as may be supposed, all the first men at the Common Law Bar, including Messrs. Brewster, Fitzgibbon, Whiteside, McDonough, and other Queen's Counsel, were arrayed on one side or the other. The action first tried was that of

in which Mr. Smith sought to recover damages for a libel penned by Sir Benjamin Morris upon the back of a cheque drawn by the latter upon the National Bank for a sum of money, being the amount of debt and costs in an action brought against him by certain clients of Mr. Smith. While paying the amount, Sir Benjamin gave vent to his feelings by endorsing on the cheque a statement to the effect that such payment was rendered necessary through fraud and perjury. As the only affidavit made in connection with the proceeding had been made by Mr. Smith, that gentleman very naturally came to the conclusion that those words conveyed an imputation on his character, and he accordingly brought this action. A vast amount of evidence was given on various collateral issues, to which it is not necessary to refer. The only point deserving of mention is one that, more than anything else, seemed to influence the minds of the jurors against Mr. Smith. On his own admission he had opened an envelope, enclosing a bill, which was lying at the bank, sealed up, and addressed to Lady Morris; his attempted justification for that act being, that, as solicitor for the Waterford branch of the bank, he was interested in discovering some alleged forgeries that had been committed, and that he was thus justified in opening any document in the custody of the bank. It will be seen that, in the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, the excuse was not a valid one, as the motive was really a wish, by comparison of handwriting, to obtain evidence that could be made available in the cross action. In summing up, his lordship observed, that no one could doubt that by "perjury" in the words of the libel, was meant wilful and corrupt false swearing; and it was admitted that the endorsement on the cheque was aimed at Mr. Smith. It was his (the Lord Chief Justice's) duty to tell them that that was a libel, and being so that they must find a verdict for the plaintiff. His lordship then proceeded to detail the circumstances at length, and afterwards referred to the letter-opening. He could not agree that Mr. Smith was justified in doing that. He was not there to make strong observations, and he would only say that this was a question for Mr. Smith's own conscience; but to justify it on the ground of a desire to detect a forgery was all nonsense, for it was never acted upon. It was clearly, to his mind, a mode of obtaining proof of Lady Morris's handwriting, to further the other case then ripening; and he thought it was a means which ought not to have been resorted to. He then left it to the jury to say what amount of damages should be given for this charge of perjury made against an attorney, and which was not attempted to be justified. After an absence of three minutes from the box, the jury returned with a verdict for the plaintiff—Sixpence damages.

SIR B. MORRIS & WIFE v. SMITH (Q. B.)

This was the other action for libel before referred to; and, involving a greater array of facts and correspondence, it occupied a longer time, and excited even more interest than the last. For five entire days was the court occupied in the investigation of a number of facts, most of them of little public importance, although more or less material to the question at issue. Briefly, the action arose out of the proceedings undertaken by Mr. Smith as attorney for some other persons who were aggrieved by certain anonymous letters said to have been written by Lady Morris. Mr. Smith's letter to a local journal—the libel on which this action was founded—contained certainly some very strong expressions impeaching the character of both Sir Benjamin and Lady Morris, and directly conveying a charge of forgery, and an insinuation that other and worse practices could be proved against Lady Morris. The pleas of justification put in by Mr. Smith opened, of course, a wide field of inquiry, and, among other questions, whether Lady Morris had really been guilty of the malpractices laid to her charge. A vast number of witnesses were examined on both sides, and Lady Morris emphatically negatived all the charges made against her. After a protracted inquiry, enlivened by some brilliant speeches of counsel, the Lord Chief Justice charged the jury, and they retired for half-an-hour; and, on their return, handed in their verdict, finding that the justification was not proved, and assessing for the plaintiffs £1,000 damages.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.

It will be remembered that on the summary dismissal of Mr. Baron Richards from the senior commissionership, two courses were open to the Government—the appointment of a commissioner to transact the vast arrear of business in the vacant chamber, or else such new arrangements as might enable the two remaining commissioners to take up that business in addition to their own. The latter course would, however, have involved changes amounting to an entire reconstruction of the court, and would necessarily have occasioned very great delay, and consequent injury to a multitude of suitors. From the recent statement made by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, it appears that the appointment of a successor to Mr. Baron Richards has been at length resolved on. The legal profession and the general public regard the question of the choice of this judicial officer with very great interest. On the selection of a competent man very much depends; and the nomination of one who does not possess the extensive legal knowledge and the practical ability required for the post would be regarded as a permanent injury to a system which has, on the whole, worked most beneficially for Ireland. Rumour has for the last two days given the commissionership to a learned gentleman whose practice at the bar is exceedingly limited, but who has been a reliable supporter of the Government in the Commons House, and has, therefore, undoubted claims to promotion. Let it not be supposed that legal offices are bestowed in Ireland as they have lately been bestowed in England. In deference to public opinion, the central Government places on the bench at Westminster Hall men of high reputation, large practice, and acknowledged ability. In Ireland, on the contrary, promotion in the majority of instances goes by religious tenets and parliamentary services.

The extensive influence which the Incumbered Estates Court possesses over the entire landed system of Ireland, becomes daily more apparent. It is a difficult matter to find a purchaser for any property, large or small, unless the advantage, so highly appreciated by buyers, of a "parliamentary title," can be guaranteed. Advertisements daily appear in the public journals of sums of money to lend on mortgage; and it is a rare occurrence to find the "incumbered estates title" not required by the proposed lender. It is not surprising, therefore, that Lord Cranworth states, as his opinion, that the Incumbered Estates Court should be made a permanent institution of this country. Under the present act the court will come to a close somewhere about the end of July, 1858.

It appears from a return (dated 13th February) that the total number of petitions presented in the Incumbered Estates Court is 4,048; the total amount realised by the sales up to the present time is £19,626,177 : 17 : 8.

THE ATTORNEYS AND THE BAR.

A correspondence appears in the Dublin journals on a subject which may be denominated a standing difficulty—the non-attendance of counsel in courts in which they have accepted briefs. It might have been hoped that the admirable example set by the leading equity counsel in London would have been followed elsewhere, and that Queen's Counsel would, ere this, have ceased to accept briefs without a reasonable expectation of appearing when the cases are called on. It seems, however, that for some reason or other the unsatisfactory practice not only prevails, but promises to endure, of each leader going into all the courts, and, consequently, attending properly to his business in none of them.

The correspondence alluded to is between the Incorporated Law Society, represented by its secretary, and Sir Thos. Staples, Bart., the senior member of the Irish Bar, and, for such purposes, its representative. The first letter states that the council, impelled by a sense of public duty, on former occasions complained, and now with more reason complains, of the evils arising from the absence of counsel, and that strong observations have been made by the Lord Chief Justice, showing the necessity for some regulation securing the more regular attendance of counsel. The answer of Sir T. Staples on behalf of the Bar is a most unsatisfactory document. It states that the remedy for the inconvenience complained of rests with the solicitors themselves, and that the bar as a body cannot interfere. It also states that no regulation of the kind proposed has been adopted by the English Common Law Bar, and that no further step can be taken with reference to the subject. A more fallacious comparison could not have been instituted than that attempted by the representative of the Irish Bar. It is well known that not more than half-a-dozen leading counsel in Dublin confine themselves to the courts of equity—the others accept briefs in all the courts. As some ten or twelve courts are sitting daily, it may well be imagined that the greatest public inconvenience results from this indiscriminate acceptance of briefs: the exception is to find counsel ready when a case is called on. Ubiquity is by no means a characteristic of even the most eminent Nisi Prius advocates. The only remedy will be for the common law leaders to follow the example of the leaders at Lincoln's Inn, and choose one court. Why an expedient so simple and efficacious, and which has already proved so satisfactory to counsel and to suitors, should be regarded with abhorrence by the English Common Law Bar, and by the entire Bar of Ireland, it is difficult to comprehend.

LAW AND LAWYERS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Permit me, as a country practitioner, to express through you my gratification at the bold career of law reform upon which the Attorney-General has entered, and my concurrence in the views which you have taken of our true policy and duty at this crisis.

It has been the fault of legal publications in general that they address the members of the profession as having rights and interests distinct from and conflicting with those of the community at large. We have been exhorted to agitate against the certificate duty—against the abolition of copyholds and of ecclesiastical courts—to claim compensation for the loss of every petty office and department of business—in short, to do battle for every abuse by which we are supposed to profit. We have been represented as rightfully endowed with the emoluments of an existing system, however vicious, and to some, in virtue of special offices, are ascribed privileges which can be compared to nothing but letters of marque. A disguise is, of course, thrown over the argument to make it decent, but this is its real import. Nothing can be more unjust—nothing more degrading to the profession which it is meant to serve.

In opposition to all this you rightly contend that it is the highest interest of the profession to be in harmony with the wants and feelings of the community; and that to this end every member of it should be mindful that lawyers were made for mankind, and not mankind for the lawyers. There is an analogy in principle between the solicitor and the surgeon in their relations to the public, and it would be well if there were a closer analogy in practice. As a man ought not to have more physic, so he ought not to have more law, than his case requires. Does the surgeon assert a vested interest in disease? Does he claim compensation for the loss of small pox by the enforcement of vaccination? No; he knows that his art will be resorted to in proportion to the evils it can remedy or relieve. So the only basis on which the rights of the solicitor should stand is his usefulness—in his trusty counsels and welcome help in the exigencies of civil life. It is only thus that he can occupy that honourable place in the estimation of his neighbours for which he is generally qualified by talents and education. And how is it that he too frequently does not?—that an amiable character and intellectual attainments do not exempt him from ignoble suspicion, from many a shrug of distrust? It is because the law itself has not commanded the respect of the people—so whimsical and mysterious have been its rules and processes, and so burdensome its expenses; and because too many lawyers have been so miserably short-sighted as to resist the improvements which the times require. Selfishness is almost always short-sighted, and it is so in this case. For I feel convinced that not only our higher interest—namely, our honour and influence—but also that lower interest to which our advocates too often appeal—namely, our pecuniary advantage—will ever be advanced exactly in proportion as it is brought into accord with the general interests of society.

Experience abundantly shows that the more legal processes are simplified, and the delay and expense of them diminished, the better reason has the lawyer to rejoice with his client. Every country practitioner—conversant as he is with the lesser and most numerous transactions—can tell the prodigious impulse afforded to Chancery business by the improvement of the procedure and to conveyancing by the abolition of the lease for a year, the reduction of the stamp duty, and the encouragement given to short deeds. He can now effect three conveyancing transactions at less cost to his client, and more profit to himself, than two before; and he has now three comparatively contented, instead of two murmuring clients. He can now permit his clients to resort to Chancery for the construction of a will or the remedy of a defect, instead of depending, as heretofore, on clumsy compromises and indemnities.

The country practitioners, who are beginning to be alarmed at the prospect of a registration of titles, are startled at a shadow. No matter what form the amendment of conveyancing practice may assume—if it do but facilitate and cheapen transfers—it must be a benefit to them. I do not expect that conveyancing will be deprived of its scientific character, and that we shall be reduced to be the drudges of a mechanical routine; and so long as science shall be requisite, there need be no fear that proficiency will ever be without employment. In the numerous minor transactions with which we are conversant, the circuitous and expensive processes of conveyancing are never observed. They are guarded against by special contracts or general understanding. We are generally content with a primâ facie legal estate and a moral assurance of title. Not one title in a thousand is disputed; not one contract in 500 is required to be enforced ad invitum; time quickly supplies a presumption as strong as proof; and therefore the array of attested copies, registers, inspections, covenants, and affidavits which technical routine prescribes are boldly dispensed with. We are compelled to adopt this course by stress of economy. The transaction must be accomplished for a trifle, or not at all. The responsibility we thus incur is often onerous, and always unfair—because, so far from receiving a premium for the risk, it is incurred for the very purpose of diminishing our emolument. Under an improved system we may hope to avoid this risk, and to provide our clients with unexceptionable titles at an expense which shall not discourage the smallest transaction. From this will result an increase of business which must redound both to our credit and advantage.

I would, however, suggest to our law societies in London and the provinces that they should urge upon the framers of the new measures the expediency of consulting, upon their details, country solicitors, who are familiar with the operation of the law upon the numerous class of yeomen and shopkeepers. The project for a general registration of deeds elaborated four years ago was framed in total ignorance of country practice, and of the large proportion (not less than four-fifths) which sales and mortgages under £500 bear to the whole; and no sooner was it confronted with this fact than it collapsed, and was most properly abandoned.

REGISTRATION OF PARTNERSHIP.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Lord Brougham said, at the interview with Lord Palmerston on the 30th ultimo, in speaking of the registration of partnerships, that it might be said to be in some degree connected with the question of limited liability. Although this is not noticed in your report of his lordship's address, yet, as the opinion was expressed in the hearing of a large number of delegates, I am anxious to correct the prejudicial effect upon an important question, which this, as it appears to me, erroneous view of his lordship is calculated to produce. That the registration of private partnerships is quite distinct from, and independent of, the limited liability question, will, I think, be clear when the objects of registration are understood. They are twofold—first, to enable persons about to deal with a firm to judge of its trustworthiness; and, second, to enable those who desire to enforce by legal proceedings claims against a firm, to know how to frame the legal process, as a firm cannot be sued in the superior courts in England, unless in the process be stated the Christian and surnames of every partner, and hence the chief necessity for registration; so that, if limited liability had never been mooted, the reasons for the registration would be precisely the same, and of as much strength as now they are. Moreover, the law already admits of partnerships of limited liability, under certain conditions—one of which is, that the partners' names, and certain other particulars, shall be registered; and whether this principle be extended, or be kept within its present bounds, the reasons for a registration of private partnerships will remain the same, and the registration of such partnerships would not affect the argument for or against the principle of limited liability. Let no one, therefore, hesitate to sanction the principle of a registration of the names of partners constituting trading firms, from a fear that it is a sanction of this principle.

I observe, in your last number, a long letter in recommendation of the superintendent registrars of births, marriages, and deaths being made the local officers of the new testamentary courts, and that reference is made to the Manchester scheme for making these officers the registrars for partnerships. The writer of that letter is evidently intimately acquainted with the duties of superintendent registrars, but he does not make out to my mind any case for their selection. I will mention one objection: they are parochial officers, and in each city or borough there may be, and generally are, several parishes. In Birmingham there are three parishes, and three superintendent registrars; and if these gentlemen were to be the registrars for partnerships, or for wills, three searches might have to be made instead of one in every case. This consideration, I think, must, to every impartial person, be a sufficient condemnation of such a selection. The fitness of the registrar of joint-stock companies for a similar office for private partnerships does not depend alone on his superiority to the superintendent registrars of births, &c. Many good reasons exist independently of this comparison, but which it is not necessary here to state.

I am, &c., your obedient servant,

Birmingham, Feb. 10. ARTHUR RYLAND.

To the EDITOR of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—A point of considerable importance to the profession has arisen in practice, upon which I am anxious to elicit the opinion of your readers. Recently, on sale of a reversionary interest, I obtained and furnished certain statutory declarations, as evidence of the vendor's identity, &c.; but the purchaser's legal advisers objected to accept them, because they had been made before commissioners to administer oaths in Chancery, as they had not power, it was contended, to take declarations; on the other hand, I submitted that, inasmuch as, from time out of mind, masters extra in Chancery, before the passing of the act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 62, had taken voluntary oaths, such masters had power to take voluntary declarations, and that the act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, only changed the name of such officers to "commissioners;" besides which it is specially provided by that act, that the commissioners should discharge such duties, and have such powers, &c., as by "usage in that behalf or otherwise" they had previously.

I am, your obedient servant,

Review.

An Introduction to the Principles and Practice of Pleading in Civil Actions, &c. By WATKIN WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-law. Butterworths.

The "science of special pleading" is as extinct as are any of the grim Saurians at Sydenham. Its existence, indeed, was but a brief one, for he who called it into action still lives to mourn its decay. Some forty years ago a young pleader had occasion, in the pursuit of a somewhat extensive practice of his art, to ponder over the law of pleading as it then lay scattered through "the books;" and his habit of mind led him to endeavour to deduce from the decisions he found, general rules for future use. Our investigator discovered that these points, apparently unconnected, and emanating, through the course of centuries, from very different men, were yet connected in this—that they resulted from the application of certain fixed principles to different combinations of circumstances. By slow degrees, these principles emerged under his research, and they appeared well defined, consistent with each other, and fit, in short, to become the foundation of a scientific study. The inquirer, we need hardly tell our youngest reader, was Mr. Serjeant Stephen; and the system he laid down was that which is to be found in his "Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions."

Had we more space at our command, it would not be difficult to point out how rudely these rules have been disturbed by the framers of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852; but a few instances are all that can be here attempted. Thus, the very first of them—viz., that "after the declaration, the parties must at each stage demur or plead"—is no longer fully in force; for, says 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 80, "either party may, by leave of the court or of a judge, plead and demur to the same pleading at the same time," &c. Then fell with a stroke of the Commissioners' pen the whole fabric of "special," as distinguished from "general" demurrers—a distinction in which the Serjeant naturally revelled. The "special" traverse, indeed, had even in his time fallen in great measure into disuse, and might, he hints, be dispensed with, without much loss to the general system. But the most important inroads on the pleading of his day, are those which infringe upon the rules he lays down as tending "to produce certainty or particularity in the issue." It cannot now be said with any of that universality of application which is essential to a fundamental proposition, that "pleadings must have certainty of place or time;" that they must "specify quality, quantity, or value," or "names;" or that they must show "title," or "authority." The wide rule that "whatever is alleged in pleading must be alleged with certainty," is now liable to qualifications and exceptions which did not exist when it was first propounded—and the same may be said of most of the other canons which the Serjeant so industriously collected, and so lucidly explained. And we do not hesitate to say that the change—while it has tended to diminish the length and, therefore, the expense of pleadings, and, above all, the risk of ultimate failure in the action commenced, and must, consequently, be hailed as a blessing by that portion of the public whose vocation it is to sue and be sued—has entirely destroyed the symmetry of special pleading; and its professors have become empirics, more or less successful, instead of being graduates in an art governed by fixed laws and scientific principles. It may be true that to draw a plea or a declaration as much care as ever is required—nay, perhaps, as much skill—but the care is with a different object, and the skill is of a different kind. It is no longer sought to adapt fixed principles to ever-varying complications of facts, but the sole endeavour is to satisfy the mind of Mr. Justice A. or Mr. Baron B. that the pleading expresses in intelligible language, and without violating the recognised meaning of any term of art, the cause of action or of defence relied upon; and so that the true controversy between the parties may be determined in the existing suit.

We have been led to these reflections by the "Introduction to the Principles and Practice of Pleading in Civil Actions," which has recently been published by Mr. Watkin Williams; and we examined the work with much curiosity to see what the author would make of his emasculated subject. Our curiosity, however, was doomed to remain unsatisfied, for it appears that the present volume is an instalment only of the entire work. It treats of the proceedings generally in and incidental to an action, and not of the principles on which the mutual allegations between the parties to the suit should be framed with regard to the law as it now stands. It is, in short, an extended edition only of the first chapter of its celebrated predecessor, which, as our readers may remember, is entitled "Of the Proceedings in an Action from its Commencement to its Termination," and forms a model which all the recent writers on the subject of an action at law have freely imitated.

Upon the whole, nevertheless, we have been much pleased with Mr. Williams. We honour greatly patient industry and original thinking whenever we discover their traces. And the volume before us bears ample evidence that its author spared neither research nor meditation before he appeared in print. His plan is an extensive one, if viewed merely as an introduction to the principal task he has undertaken. He sketches the rise and progress of the three superior courts of law and their several jurisdictions; explains how the ancient methods of procedure gradually took the form of those now in use; and then he takes the reader rapidly through the different steps of an action, from the issuing of the writ of summons down to its termination. All this, indeed, has been done before; but it is here neatly re-cast, and our only objection to the execution of this part of the volume is, that it has been worked up too much in detail for the purposes of the student, while it is far too slender to be available in practice: in fact, it displays too openly the process of its construction. We have the result of a young man's reading for his profession, a species of commonplace book under the head of "Action at Law," which is most satisfactory as a voucher of the industrious student, but is scarcely fit to be given to the world at large. The nature of Mr. Williams's present volume, therefore, will sufficiently account for our abstaining from any detailed commentary upon its contents. We find no fault (as the general rule) either with the matter or the style of the author. He appears to us to have read up his subject well, to have thoroughly made up his mind what he wanted to say, and to have been able to express his meaning with precision. The occasional want of keeping (in artistic phrase) which is perceptible, arises chiefly from his anxiety to tell us all he knows; for, of course, all the points he has studied do not possess an equal degree of interest to his readers.

As a specimen of the manner in which Mr. Williams handles his theme we will instance the divisions he gives of actions. Scorning to abandon to its fate the ancient learning upon this subject, which (so far as regarded the distinction between real and mixed actions) had become somewhat hazy even so long ago as 1825, when Roscoe wrote his Treatise upon actions relating to real property, he entangles himself in a needless refinement in reference to the present action of ejectment. At page 42, he says:—"This action is now in general a real action only; but in actions by landlord against tenant it is a mixed action, and in this case the jury may award damages for the profits during the time that the tenant wrongfully held possession."

Of this distinction, however, we cannot approve. We apprehend, that to consider the present action as connected in any way with the ancient lore above alluded to, would only breed confusion in the mind of the student. When Mr. Williams chooses to call it a "real" action, merely because by the judgment the court adjudges the plaintiff to be entitled to the premises he claims, we think a mischievous attempt is made to adapt the creation of modern convenience to a classification which was the result of technicalities long since exploded. The present action cannot claim the slightest relationship with the remedies given under the name of real actions in the books, lacking, as it does, their various incidents of "original writs," "essoigns," "grand and petit capes," and the like. And this truth the student ought to know in limine, and not to be left to find it out for himself after much unnecessary trouble. Indeed, we are disposed to cavil at Mr. Williams's own law here; for the form of ejectment, superseded by the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, though denominated a "mixed" action by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and stated by Mr. Williams to be so considered immediately before the passage we have quoted, was, in its form, a species of the personal action of trespass, as explained in works of authority. And another of our author's positions in the same part of his work is, we think, open to question. He classes detinue and assumpsit both as actions of contract, whereas both of them seem technically founded on tort. As to the first, indeed, we apprehend there can be little doubt, although it is enumerated by Chitty as an action ex contractu. The injury on which it is founded is the detention of the chattel, not necessarily the breach of any contract between the owner and the person to whom the possession has passed; and accordingly it is so classed by Mr. Serjeant Stephen in the third volume of his Commentaries, p. 452. And as to assumpsit, it is properly a form only of trespass on the case (see Steph. Pl., p. 42, 4th edit.), although no doubt often treated as a separate class.

We believe that Mr. Williams will feel obliged to us for these observations, for they will show him that his work has been examined in no careless spirit, but with a thorough appreciation of its aim and pretensions. Neither will he take amiss from us an exhortation to use still greater diligence, and to bestow still closer consideration on the remainder of his work, and before he lays down principles for the new system of pleading. It is on the execution of this part of his undertaking that his reputation must ultimately depend. For what he has already performed he can, at best, only hope to receive the praise of a successful compiler from works already before the profession. If he would emulate the fame of Stephen, he must produce the same results as he did. To any discoverer, in whatever art or science, the world cheerfully pays homage; and Wöhler could not more truly claim that name, when he drew his aluminium from the clayey compound in his crucible, than the Serjeant, when he deduced out of his mental alembic the hidden principles of pleading, which the "year-books," and the "digests," and the "abridgments" of his library held, in combination with an infinite amount of dross. Let Mr. Williams perform a similar feat, and he will receive the same reward.

CONSULS AND CONSULAR DUTIES.

A meeting was held on Saturday at the rooms of this Society, under the direction of the Mercantile Law Committee of the United Kingdom, to hear a paper read by E. U. A. Tuson, Esq., Chancellor of the Austrian consulate in London.

Lord BROUGHAM took the chair; the audience included Mr. W. Ewart, M.P., Mr. Headlam, M.P., Mr. Hadfield, M.P., Mr. W. Hawes, and Mr. Pitt Taylor.

The paper opened with an explanation of the word "consul"—traced the history of the consular office from the days of Lucius Junius, when it was first established, to the present time—recited all the acts of the British Parliament relating to and regulating the duties of consuls, explaining their several provisions by an elaborate detail of their marginal notes, and described the intention and effect of all orders in council upon the subject. Passing from this historical review, the writer proceeded to notice certain defects in our own consular system, the most prominent of which were an inequality of power and authority in different consulates; the appointment of persons to the office, especially in the Levant, who were engaged in commerce, and who frequently used their official character as a means of extending their private trade, occasionally in a very unfair and oppressive manner; and the appointment of persons ignorant of consular duties, and of the circumstances and peculiarities of the countries to which they are accredited. He suggested that the powers of the British consul should in all cases be defined by treaty, similar to the treaties by which the powers and authority of the United States consuls in France, Belgium, and other nations, were defined; that a proper code of instructions and regulations should be laid down to which British consuls in every part of the world should be required to conform; that no person engaged in mercantile or other trading pursuits, or any naval or military officer, should be eligible to the office; that a system of élèves should be introduced, and that from these élèves, a certain number of whom should be attached to each consulate for instruction, the consular agents and consuls should in future be selected according to the ability displayed; and he recommended that in no case should the salary attaching to the office of consular agent be lower than £200 a year.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the obligation of the members to Mr. Tuson for his instructive paper, but observed that he had been under the impression that consuls were not now permitted to engage in trading transactions on their own account. The education of consuls, as suggested by Mr. Tuson, was a matter of high importance.

Mr. TUSON said that in many foreign ports, particularly in the Levant, the consular representatives of Great Britain were still traders, and the dignity and influence of the office suffered in consequence. In reply to a question, he subsequently added, that the salaries of these persons did not in many instances exceed £70 a year.

Mr. W. EWART moved the thanks of the meeting to the lecturer, and that the subject be referred to the Mercantile Law Committee. In doing so he gave it as his opinion that the consular representatives of Great Britain should in all cases be Englishmen. He believed that it was the practice both with France and America to appoint none but their own subjects as consuls. He perfectly concurred in the recommendation as to the appointment of élèves.

The motion was seconded by Mr. HEADLAM, who, as chairman of the Mercantile Law Committee, remarked that the changes suggested, in the propriety of which he fully concurred, were such as might be carried into effect by the executive government without any alteration of the law.

The resolution was carried unanimously, and after some further remarks the meeting broke up.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE.

A meeting of the Managing Committee was held on Wednesday, the 18th instant, when the Secretary reported a letter received from Ireland, stating that the profession there experienced considerable difficulty in protecting their interests, owing to their distance from the seat of legislation; and that, with the concurrence of the Chairman, he had opened a communication with an influential body of solicitors in that country, with a view to establish arrangements for friendly co-operation and assistance in matters of mutual interest.

A report of the Assistant-Secretary on the Bankruptcy Laws and their Administration, was read. It referred to some of the chief evils in the working of the present system, and after noticing suggestions as to the direction in which reform might be sought, concluded by recommending the appointment of a sub-committee to confer with a committee of the Law Amendment Society, who are now considering the subject. A sub-committee was accordingly appointed, to consider the report, and to represent the committee in relation to the subject of bankruptcy, in conference with the Law Amendment Society.

Letters complaining of the arbitrary interference of the Treasury in the taxation of costs on criminal prosecutions were read, the consideration of which had been postponed by the committee, while the new scale of equity costs was unsettled; and it was resolved that further inquiries be made, with a view to action, on the part of the committee, for the protection of the profession.

The following law bills, recently introduced into Parliament, were brought up and referred for consideration:—Judgments Execution, &c., Imprisonment for Debt, Vexatious Litigation Prevention, Probates and Letters of Administration, Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Property of Married Women, and Judicial Statistics.

The following address has been issued to the provincial members of the committee and the local law societies:—

ADDRESS OF COMMITTEE.

The committee desire to bring under the notice of the association some of the subjects which appear likely to engage the attention of Parliament during the next few months; and they hope that this programme, suggestive of future proceedings, may secure from the members such assistance as will enable them, by means of the association, to give an effective expression of opinion upon the following matters:—

TRANSFER OF LAND.—The Royal Commission appointed, on the recommendation of a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1853, to consider the subject of registration of title, with reference to facilitating the sale and transfer of land, have not yet made a report; but from the speech at Aylesbury of the Attorney-General, a distinguished member of the commission, it may be inferred that they have determined on a scheme which is to be shaped into a legislative measure, and brought forward in the ensuing session.

When the details of the scheme are made public, they must receive the earnest attention of the association; and the committee would forewarn their fellow members, that if the plan shadowed forth in the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons (printed Aug. 5, 1853), and in the Attorney-General's speech before referred to, should be adopted, it will involve a total subversion of existing conveyancing practice; and it will be essential that the profession should be unanimous in demanding that such a change should be accompanied by an alteration in the present system of professional remuneration—at any rate, so far as it is applicable to conveyancing practice.

The members of the association are aware how objectionable to the whole profession is the present system of remuneration as applied to Chancery business. The efforts of the association have long been directed to its improvement, and the committee would refer particularly to their sixth circular issued 19th July, 1855, in which the whole subject is fully dealt with.

The committee are of opinion, however, that this matter of remuneration for Chancery business is really insignificant in comparison with the importance of the great change now proposed. By the new scheme, the legal ownership of land is to be evidenced, and its transfer to purchasers and mortgagees effected, much in the same way as is now done with reference to stock or shares, leaving beneficial interests to be dealt with as such interests in stock or shares are now dealt with; some register, also, of legal ownership is to be established, and probably some plan of granting parliamentary titles superadded, after the manner of the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland. Now, if this plan is adopted, and the present mode of remuneration is allowed to remain, the measure will prove most destructive to all those who depend mainly upon their conveyancing practice. The rules of law as they prevail at present, declare, in substance, that the profession shall be remunerated, not on the basis of the skill displayed, and the responsibility incurred in the transaction of any business, but on the length of the documents prepared. The effect of the proposed scheme will be to shorten conveyances so materially as to destroy the present mode of remuneration; and it will be necessary, therefore, for the profession to take care that another system is introduced, by which the practitioner shall be paid, not according to the length or multiplicity of written forms, but according to the measure of skill and labour required, and the responsibility incurred.

ECCLESIASTICAL.—The committee, in their annual report for the year 1853, refer to the striking unanimity of opinion which has so long prevailed, with respect to the expediency of introducing certain changes in that branch of jurisprudence at present administered in the Ecclesiastical Courts. All have arrived at the conclusion that the needed reform in matters testamentary, to be efficient, must provide for the total abolition of the Ecclesiastical, Peculiar, and Manorial Courts, the extinction of the doctrine of bona notabilia, and the destruction of the monopoly at present enjoyed by the advocates and proctors in Doctors' Commons. At this point, however, unanimity of opinion ceases. When the nature and functions of the new tribunal or tribunals to be henceforward intrusted with testamentary jurisdiction are considered, the most irreconcilable opinions are expressed. A very general opinion, indeed, appears to prevail, that any court on which testamentary jurisdiction is to be conferred, should be one of universal jurisdiction, and should be empowered to grant probate of wills of real as well as of personal estate; and that, in certain cases, probates and letters of administration should be granted by local tribunals. On other points, however, great difference of opinion exists. Many contend that no new court should be established at all, but that all testamentary jurisdiction should be transferred to the superior courts of common law and the county courts. Some seem anxious to attach the whole of this jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery; others again recommend the establishment of a new court of common law, with a single judge and with common law procedure; while the Lord Chancellor, in his new bill for amending the law relating to probates and letters of administration, proposes a new court common law, to be presided over by a Chancery judge. The Lord Chancellor's measure must not, however, be thus summarily disposed of; and the following outline of its provisions may, perhaps, enable the profession to judge whether it is likely to prove satisfactory. It provides for the establishment of a new court, to be called the Court of Probate, which is to have all jurisdiction in relation to the granting of probates and letters of administration, now exercised by any Ecclesiastical, Peculiar, or Manorial Courts in England, and over which one of the Vice-Chancellors is to preside, assisted by the clerks and officers now employed in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. The new court is to have, throughout England, the same powers, and to observe the same procedure, as the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; but power is given to direct issues on any question of fact, to be tried in the courts of common law in the same manner as an issue may now be directed by the Court of Chancery. The proctors are to retain the monopoly of the common form business, while the contentious business is to be thrown open to solicitors and attorneys, who, together with proctors and advocates, are to have the right of practising in the new court. With regard to wills bequeathing property up to £1,500, it is proposed that, if uncontested, they should be proved in district courts, but if contested, they should be proved in London. Wills which dispose of personal property under £200, and of real property under £300, are to be decided on by the county courts.

The committee refrain from expressing any positive opinion upon the measure at present. They are apprehensive, however, that it will not be found generally satisfactory; and they will state the reasons upon which they found that opinion when the bill has reached a subsequent stage.

COMMERCIAL LAW.—The committee, in alluding to commercial law, would express an earnest hope that the Legislature will, without delay, take into consideration the subject of our bankruptcy laws and their administration, the chief evils of which are, their want of uniformity, and the multiplicity of courts which take cognisance of the same matters; the expenses of administration; the irregularity of attendance at court on the part of the commissioners and registrars; the formalism with which many operations of the court are encumbered; the inadequate nature of the punishments awarded to fraudulent bankrupts; and the unsatisfactory nature of the present system of appeal.

The present state of the law for winding-up insolvent companies is creating wide-spread dissatisfaction among the profession and the public; and the committee would urge upon the members the necessity of devising some plan with a view to prevent that discreditable conflict of jurisdictions recently exhibited in the case of the Royal British Bank. With the observations of Lord Justice Knight Bruce the committee cordially agree:—

"It is to be hoped that the Legislature will take steps to prevent the recurrence of conflicts and complications such as the proceedings before us exhibit and portend; miserable conflicts, distressing complications, characterised by the grave frivolity, the costly uselessness, the sickening delay in which chicanery rejoices; conflicts and complications which must embitter the anxiety, and add weight to the oppression of sufferers under nefariously conducted schemes, such as the thing ironically called the Royal British Bank; conflicts and complications which to a civilised people are nationally discreditable, and in a governed country ought not to be possible."

PARTNERSHIP.—The registration of partners in private partnerships is also a question of great moment. At present there is no mode of ascertaining who are partners in a firm. Some firms comprise many partners, but are represented by one name. There are others with the words "and Co.," containing several partners; and there are others with that addition, yet having no partners at all. Mr. Ryland, in his paper read at Liverpool, suggests that every private partnership should be required to send to the registrar of joint-stock companies the name and residence of every member of the partnership, and the particulars of every change in the members, and that the non-registry may be pleaded, and shall be a good plea in bar, to any action at the suit of the partnership. The committee might usefully lay the views of the association on this matter before Parliament, in case the law of partnership should be discussed, as it probably will be, in the approaching session. Members are, therefore, invited to communicate their opinion touching this subject.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTE LAW.—The important subject of the consolidation of the statute law should receive attention on the part of the association. Something has undoubtedly been done, and bills for consolidating the statute law relating to indictable offences have been printed, and will be presented during the session. This is, however, but a very small portion of the work to be accomplished. No plan can be accepted as efficient or satisfactory which does not provide for the annually increasing acts of Parliament, as well as for existing statutes; and it would be greatly conducive to the public convenience if the Statute Law Commissioners should select those subjects for consolidation which are most urgently requiring the interference of Parliament. The committee cannot but express their regret and disappointment that so little progress has been made; and they think that more effectual means for attaining the desired object—the consolidation of the present and a periodical consolidation of future statutes—should be forthwith adopted.

CRIMINAL LAW—PUBLIC PROSECUTORS.—Among those questions affecting the interests of the country practitioner, that of the appointment of public prosecutors, which arose at the aggregate meeting at Liverpool, on the reading of a paper by Mr. C. A. Smith, Secretary to the Justices' Clerks Society, is most important. The scheme recommended in the report of the committee of the House of Commons is the appointment of district prosecutors, with a staff of agents—a scheme which presents objections most formidable.

The intervention of a public officer, irresponsible to the suitor, to perform functions which are now entrusted by the client to his own legal adviser, who would have no motive for exertion beyond a sense of duty; the dislike with which juries regard prosecutions conducted by the Government; the unfavorable feelings and opinions generally entertained towards Government functionaries—feelings and opinions which might be excited so as to prevent the services of a prosecutor being beneficial to the public; the enormous patronage that would be at the disposal of the Government, and the further consideration as to how that patronage would be likely to be exercised; the fact that cases sometimes arise where prosecutions have to be instituted against the servants of the Executive (police-officers, for instance, for excess of duty)—cases which it would not be desirable to intrust to a regularly appointed Government official; the heavy annual expenditure; the important fact that where respectable attorneys are employed, prosecutions are, as a rule, well and satisfactorily conducted under the existing system;—all these considerations constitute so many serious objections against the proposal put forth in the report of the House of Commons, that the committee are decidedly of opinion, that the appointment of public prosecutors upon the plan suggested, would be productive of injury, instead of benefit, to the administration of justice.

The committee are aware that some prosecutions do undoubtedly fail, either on account of the absence of proper preliminary proceedings, or through the non-existence of sufficient evidence to support the case; they think, however, that this evil is to be traced to the fact, that respectable and competent attorneys avoid undertaking prosecutions because they frequently impose a loss or inadequate remuneration; and they are of opinion that the simplest and most effective remedy would be to pay the attorney fairly, in order that he may be induced to do the work properly.

The committee regret to find that the opposite course is now being systematically adopted by the Government.

Government taxing officers—men who are unrecognised by the law or by custom—are now going round to every assize town throughout the kingdom, to tax counsel's and attorneys' fees, and to reduce allowances to constables and witnesses to the lowest possible figure, upon the plea, that, the costs being paid out of the consolidated fund, Government has a right to superintend the taxation of those costs. The functions of the established officers, the clerks of arraigns at assizes, and the clerks of the peace at sessions, are superseded, and their scale of allowances set aside. The result of this proceeding is, that respectable attorneys, as a rule, avoid criminal business, which, therefore, frequently falls into incompetent hands.

The committee entertain a strong and decided opinion, that free competition, and adequate remuneration, will secure the due and proper administration of the criminal law, by making it worth the while of able attorneys to undertake criminal business, and that the present evils are owing to a parsimony, unfair to the practitioner, and injurious to the public.

The committee, in concluding this address, would urge upon the profession the necessity of forming and expressing an opinion upon the subjects here referred to; and they also hope that the interest excited by the meeting at Liverpool may not be permitted to pass away without leading to a considerable accession of members. They would, therefore, suggest that local meetings be summoned during the present assizes, first of all, to consider, and report to the committee upon this address, and then to take immediate steps for increasing the number of subscribers, and consequently the resources of the association, without which it is obvious that the exertions of the committee, however great, must fall short of the objects to which they are directed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 13.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Lord BROUGHAM called the attention of the House to the question of the right of property of married women. He reminded the House that he had some time since presented a petition to their lordships from upwards of 2,000 married women, complaining of the state of the law upon this subject. Amongst the names of those signing the petition were many women who earned their bread by daily labour, many who adorned the literature of this country. By the law of England every penny which these women earned was the property of their husbands. His lordship cited several instances of the present working of the law. The evil being then apparent, the question arose as to the remedy. The general opinion was in favour of one course—viz, to do that for those who were without a settlement which was done for those who died without a will. If a man died without a will, the law made a will for him, directing how the property should go amongst the next of kin; so where people married without a settlement, it was proposed that the law should make a settlement for them. This was the law in the greater part of the United States of America; it had answered most perfectly. The French law made a provision for meeting the case of an evil-doing husband, and upon this another remedy was suggested by some. By the French law the wife could obtain an autorisation, which operated as a stop-order, restraining the husband and his creditors from interfering with the property of the wife. There was nothing that he could add to these facts. He should, therefore, move three resolutions. First, that the law ought to be amended; secondly, that the wife ought to have the entirety of her property; and, thirdly, that until the second resolution could be carried out, or if it could not be carried out, the French system of the autorisation should be imported into our law.

Lord GRANVILLE said that he assumed that the noble lord did not intend to press his resolutions, for the time was not yet ripe for committing the House to any opinion. He was quite ready to admit that the existing state of the law was the cause of many difficulties in the position of married women; but great difference of opinion existed as to the means of meeting the difficulty. At the same time, he trusted that something practical might be done in the present session.

Lord CAMPBELL was ready at that moment to affirm that the law relating to married women ought to be reformed. In truth, its present state was barbarous. But from the proposition in favour of settlement by operation of law he entirely dissented, as he thought it would lead to constant domestic quarrels. He moved the adjournment of the debate to this day six weeks.

After a few words in reply from Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell's motion was agreed to.

Monday, Feb. 16.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

Lord BROUGHAM laid on the table a bill, the object of which was to facilitate the collection of judicial statistics. His lordship observed that the want of such statutes was greatly felt in this country, while all over the continent, and even in Naples, some provision was made for their collection. The bill he now presented was exceedingly short, and he hoped before the second reading the schedules which had undergone revision, correction, and improvement by the Law Amendment Society, would be perfected.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that some account of the business done in the various courts would be very desirable. He thought the subject deserving of consideration.

LAW OF LIBEL.

Lord CAMPBELL presented a petition praying for an alteration of the law respecting the right of publishing bonâ fide reports of meetings in which speakers had stated matters which were slanderous. Their lordships were no doubt aware that a recent case (Davison v. Duncan) had been heard and decided by him and his brethren, in which the publisher of a paper had been found liable in respect of a report in a newspaper of a meeting, at which meeting a speaker had used language amounting to a libel on a third party. But while as a judge he had given his judgment on the law, as a legislator it was his right to express his opinion as to what the law ought to be. He reminded their lordships that many years since he had introduced a measure for the protection of the press in respect to bonâ fide reports of debates in that or the other House. It certainly seemed to him a monstrous thing that the publisher of a paper should be mulcted for merely giving, with no malicious intention, a report of a statement made in that House. So far as the proceedings of the two Houses were concerned, he should at that moment consider most favourably any proposition similar to the measure which had formerly been introduced into Parliament. And with regard to public meetings, he was not prepared to say that the right of publication might not be advantageously extended under certain limitations and restrictions; but it was most preposterous to suppose that the judges sitting on the bench should seek to change the law of England. That he hoped they would never attempt to do. [See infra, Feb. 19.]

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

In reply to a question from Lord Brougham,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said it was his intention at an early day in this or the following week to lay upon the table seven bills, forming a complete consolidation of criminal offences, which the Statute Law Commission had been engaged during the recess in preparing. Those bills had been prepared before the end of last session, and in their then state they were laid upon the table of the House, but they applied in part to England, and in part to England and Ireland; but it was found that, after they had been corrected by Irish lawyers, they would, thus altered, be but incongruous measures, and that it would be better to have two sets of bills. He proposed to lay those bills on the table, and then he would state in some detail exactly what had been done, and what was being done, by the commission.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

LAW OF LIBEL.

Lord CAMPBELL gave notice that on Thursday, 26th February, he would move for a select committee to inquire whether the privileges at present accorded to reports of proceedings in courts of justice might not be extended to reports of the proceedings in the two houses of Parliament; and whether, also, they might not be extended to reports of public meetings and assemblages; and, if so, under what restrictions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, Feb. 13.

STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

On a motion of Lord PALMERSTON, Mr. Baines, Sir J. Graham, Mr. Walpole, the Attorney-General, Sir F. Thesiger, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Henley, Mr. Hughes, Sir W. Heathcote, Sir F. Kelly, Lord Stanley, Mr. Locke King, Mr. Napier, Mr. Evelyn Denison, and Mr. W. Ewart were appointed a committee on the Statute Law Commission.

Monday, Feb. 16.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC JUSTICE.

Lord CASTLEROSSE appeared at the bar with the following message from her Majesty:—"I have received your address on the subject of the establishment of a department of public justice, and shall give directions that the subject shall receive the attentive consideration which its importance demands."

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

Sir G. GREY, in reply to a question of Lord R. CECIL, whether it was his intention to bring in any bill for the purpose of giving effect to recommendations of the committee which sat last session on the Ecclesiastical Commission, said that a bill upon the subject had been prepared, and on Monday next he would give notice of the day of its introduction.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Mr. M'MAHON asked whether the commission for inquiring into the Administration of Justice would make a report in time to found a measure thereon this session?

Sir G. GREY answered that the commission was now sitting, but he could not say when it would make its report.

EXPULSION OF JAMES SADLEIR.

Mr. FITZGERALD moved a resolution to the effect that Mr. James Sadleir having been charged with frauds, and not having obeyed an order of the House commanding him to attend in his place on the 24th of July last, and being a fugitive from justice, should be expelled from the House.

Sir F. THESIGER approved of the resolution, but contended that the facts brought forward by Mr. Roebuck towards the close of last session were sufficient to have warranted his expulsion at that time.

Mr. ROEBUCK, Mr. WHITESIDE, Sir G. GREY, and other members having briefly spoken, the motion was agreed to.

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

PUBLIC PROSECUTOR.

Mr. J. G. PHILLIMORE rose to ask whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Ministers to bring forward any measure founded on the report of the committee of last session on the appointment of a public prosecutor.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that the subject had been for some time under the consideration of Government. The question was one of the greatest difficulty, and the Government were not at present prepared to bring in a bill.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

Petitions in favour of the bill were presented from the Society of Mutual Communication for the Protection of Trade; The Bristol Chamber of Commerce; The Guardian Society of Liverpool; and on the 19th from the Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade, Glasgow.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

On the motion of Mr. CRAUFORD, that the House go into committee on this bill,

Mr. HUGHES moved to defer the committee for six months, on the ground, that the effect of this measure would be that a creditor having obtained an English judgment might, just before the expiration of the six years, send a memorandum to Ireland and have a right of execution during another six years in that country, although he could have no such remedy in the county where he had recovered.

Colonel FRENCH seconded the amendment.

Mr. HADFIELD supported the bill.

Mr. WHITESIDE said, that the law of judgments had been investigated by a committee a few months ago, and they stated in their report that the law of judgment in Ireland required to be reconsidered, but that recommendation had never been complied with. He would recommend the hon. and learned gentleman either to postpone his bill until the new department of justice was established, or to refer it to the Attorney-General for Ireland, who was bound to bring in a bill to remedy the law of judgments in Ireland in conformity with the recommendation of the select committee.

Mr. WARREN regarded the measure as one to secure the uniform administration of the law throughout the United Kingdom. A judgment was simply the deliberate declaration of the court that the plaintiff ought to recover a certain sum of money due to him by the defendant. That declaration could not be made behind the back of the defendant. The object of the bill was with industrious care to put a judgment of the courts of the three kingdoms on the same footing.

Mr. NAPIER said that his objection was, that the remedy was worse than the disease. By the first clause a judgment fifteen or twenty years old, which could not be enforced in the kingdom in which it was obtained, might be transferred by memorial to another kingdom, and execution issued upon it without any notice to the person affected by it. Again, if a person issued execution for more than the amount due to him, if he "overmarked" it, he was now liable to an action; but by this bill if a man "overmarked" an execution in Ireland, obtained by means of an English or Scotch judgment, the person against whom it was issued would have no remedy unless he took proceedings in England or Scotland. That difficulty had been felt by the select committee which sat on a bill upon this subject in 1854, and they had, therefore, confined the operation of that bill to judgments obtained in adverse suits. He suggested that wherever there had been an adjudication upon a demand, and the debtor was not resident in the kingdom were such adjudication had been obtained, a specified copy of the adjudication should be sent to the country in which the debtor resided, and an affidavit made of the amount due, upon which a judge should, if he thought proper, make an order, and that order by a recent law would become a rule of court.

Mr. ROEBUCK said there was no doubt that all laws in a civilised country similar to each other ought to have the same effect in every part of that country, but the bill was not founded upon that principle; on the contrary, it gave the same effect to different laws. The law of Scotland was that the court of session was the commune forum of all persons residing abroad, and they were summoned to it by citation at the Market-cross of Edinburgh, and at the pier and shore of Leith. When a man who resided abroad possessed only movable property in Scotland the process of "arrestment" was resorted to; a letter was directed to the supposed debtor and put into a box; he heard nothing of it: and if this bill became law, the first notice he would have of the proceedings would be, that some one would issue execution against him in London. To that execution he would have no answer.

The LORD-ADVOCATE said that the present bill merely carried into effect the principle unanimously recognised by the committee of 1854. Effect was given to a foreign judgment in every civilised country, and he thought the time had now come to make a judgment obtained in one of these three kingdoms available in the other two. The only question was whether they ought to continue to treat the three kingdoms as foreign kingdoms? He thought they ought not. The fact that actions were not very often brought upon English judgments in Irish courts proved that a measure of this kind was necessary, as creditors preferred losing their debts to bringing two or three separate actions for them.

Mr. SPOONER objected to the bill on the ground that it would open the door to fraud, by enabling dormant judgments to be put in force without notice.

The House divided, when the numbers were—for going into into committee 127, against it 80, majority 47; the House accordingly resolved into committee.

Mr. H. HUGHES suggested that the present committee should be adjourned for a week, in order that hon. members having amendments should place them on the printed paper, and thus make the House acquainted with them before their consideration. Several amendments of the measure had been suggested to him by one of the Irish judges.

Mr. CRAUFURD acceded to the proposition.

After a brief discussion the House resumed, the committee having been postponed till another day.

Private Bills before Parliament.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

At the close of last week, and also on Monday, the English Funds were depressed and inactive. There has, subsequently, been more animation, and a recovery of ⅛ per cent; but the advance of last week has not been fully maintained. The withdrawal of gold from the Bank of England has not been large. There is no alteration in the rate of discount, but the Bank authorities have decided to make advances in anticipation of the April dividends at 6 per cent., being ½ per cent. lower than previously, and money is in better supply in the discount market and on the Stock Exchange.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 14th instant, which we give below, it appears that the amount of Notes in circulation is £18,796,415, shewing a decrease of £76,790, and the stock of Bullion in both departments is £10,259,660, shewing an increase of £280,414, when compared with the previous return.

Quotations of the French 3 per Cents. on the Paris Bourse shew an advance of 1 per Cent. during the week, and discount is freely obtained in Paris below the rate of the Bank of France, the Emperor's speech at the opening of the French Legislature having imparted a feeling of confidence. Other important foreign securities are steady at a small advance on the prices of last week. It is announced that the concession by the Russian Government of the great net-work of railways is settled. The lines are to be constructed within ten years, at an outlay of about £45,000,000. Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and Co, are concerned for England. The Russian Government guarantees 5 per Cent. on the outlay.

It is imputed to the Government by many persons, particularly by Mr. Clay, in his speech at Hull, that having fixed their estimates for the Army and Navy, on a scale requiring a considerable amount of Income-tax, above 7d. in the pound, the pressure of public opinion, adverse to the War Income-tax, has induced them to make a reduction of three or four millions or more below the first estimates proposed. If it be true that Lord Palmerston's Government is very ready to yield to the influence mentioned by Mr. Clay, and to run before the gale of popular impulse, the probability of such line of policy is likely to have led to the conclusion that it has been adopted. Such an impression on the public mind must tend to destroy confidence in the Government; but those who examine the scale of taxation as by law now established for the three ensuing years, and compare it with the scale proposed for adoption by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the House of Commons, will find no such large amount of difference as to make any considerable alteration in the estimates necessary. The Income-tax, under the existing law, would amount to 26d. in the pound in the three years. The modification proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer being 7d. in the pound yearly, for three years, will amount to 21d. in the pound. The estimated difference of amount in the three years is £5,000,000, which the proposed alteration in the duty on Tea and Sugar is expected to reduce to £4,000,000. It is clear that this last amount of deficiency, spread over three years, cannot have made necessary any such humiliating and dangerous change of policy as is imputed to the Government in regard to the estimates for the Army and Navy. Parties interested in the sale of Tea view the proposed alteration in the duty with regret, as effecting existing contracts, and a Stock of 97,000,000 lbs. It appears this view will have the advantage of Mr. Gladstone's support, according to the resolution of which he has given notice for to-night.

The returns of the Board of Trade, for the last year, were issued on Thursday, shewing in the declared value of the Exports of the United Kingdom an excess over 1855 of £20,202,772. The largest increase is in metals, the second in cotton, and the third in woollen manufactures. Under the head of imports, the increase in wheat and flour is remarkably large—being in wheat two-thirds more, and in flour and meal double the quantity imported in 1855. The wheat and flour taken for home consumption in the last year amount to 4,107,941 quarters of wheat, and 4,038,242 cwts. of flour and meal. In wine and spirits the quantities taken for home consumption are larger than in the year 1855.

The remarkable fertility of the Danubian Principalities, and the abundant supply of grain, which may thence be drawn through the Ports of Galatz and Ibrail, make the question of their future administration interesting to commercial men. The French Government appears to desire that the provinces should be united, and placed under the government of a foreign prince with the title of King. As this resembles very much the policy which placed King Otho on the throne of Greece, it naturally suggests the view of a fresh field for Russian influence. It is said that the majority of the people in Moldavia and Wallachia desire to be united. If this be so, some other bond of union than the shadow of a king may after a time be found, and under the influence of a prosperous course of development, we may see the united provinces in the east rival in industry and wealth the historical fame of the united provinces of the Netherlands. Moreover, the suzerainty of Turkey which is guaranteed by the Treaty of Paris, may press less heavily than the crushing influence of Russia, and allow the great fertility of those provinces more free development. And thus the manufactures of England will find profitable returns to a vastly increasing extent in the ports of the estuary of the Danube. The policy of Russia to monopolize at Odessa, the trade of all the provinces which lie on the northern side of the Euxine, will sustain an important check. On these grounds England, Austria, and Turkey are opposed to the union so prematurely advocated by France.

EQUITY AND LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

Of this Society was held at the OFFICE, NO. 26, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS,

On THURSDAY, the 19th inst.,

GEORGE LAKE RUSSELL, Esq., in the Chair.

THE FOLLOWING

REPORT AND STATEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

WERE PRESENTED.

Report of the Directors of the "Equity and Law Life Assurance Society," to the Annual General Meeting, held on Thursday, the 19th February, 1857.

The Directors have much pleasure in submitting to the Proprietors a report of the progress of the Society during the last year, and of the position of its affairs at the present time.

During the year 1856, 161 Policies were issued for assurances, amounting to £162,745, and producing in new premiums the sum of £5,004 2s. 7d. These amounts are greater than in any previous year during the existence of the Society, and exhibit an increase of upwards of 17 per cent. upon the new premiums of the year 1855.

From the establishment of the Society to the 31st December, 1856, there have been issued 1,703 Policies for Assurances, amounting to £1,602,538; of these, 539 for £453,858 have lapsed from various causes, leaving in force at the close of the last year 1,164 Policies for Assurances, amounting (exclusive of bonus additions) to £1,148,680, showing an increase upon the amount in force at the end of 1855, of £108,695.

By the accounts, which have been certified by the Auditors, and of which every Shareholder has been furnished with a printed copy it will be observed that the total income of the Society for the year, amounted to £43,653 6s. 3d.; and the total charge for payments of all descriptions to £25,262 11s. 10d., leaving a surplus of £18,390 14s. 5d. to be carried to the credit of the Assurance Fund; so that the realised assets of the Society, after making provision for every ascertained liability outstanding, are now increased to the sum of £187,229 11s. 7d.

Claims have arisen during the year in respect of 15 Policies for £11,250; of which those of the participating class, amounting to £5,350, have had appropriated to them in addition, bonuses amounting to £611 15s. 2d. These claims are considerably less than might have been anticipated.

The Directors who, pursuant to the provisions of the Deed of Settlement, retire by rotation upon the present occasion, are—Mr. Wilbraham, Mr. Kensit, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Lucas; and Dr. Phillimore and Mr. Rudd are the retiring Auditors, the former for the Proprietors, the latter for the Assured. These gentlemen are eligible for re-election.

The Directors regret to announce that two of their most esteemed colleagues, Mr. Raymond Barker and Mr. Bonsor, have resigned their seats at the Board, finding that a continued attention to the affairs of the Society would be incompatible with their other occupations. The vacancies thus created will also have to be filled up at the present meeting.

In conclusion, the Directors may observe, that they are satisfied that the statements they are enabled to make in this report, will bear a most favourable comparison with those put forth by any office of similar, and by many of much longer standing. They believe that this Society affords all the real advantages which have been introduced into the practice of Life Assurance; and they refer to the position it has attained, and to the steady increase of its business and resources, as just grounds for the confidence and support of the shareholders, the profession, and the public.

GEORGE LAKE RUSSELL, Chairman.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Report, stated that the amount of new business transacted by the Society had greatly increased,—that although the claims had necessarily increased, the amount was much below the sum which might have been expected. The Securities were annually investigated by a Special Committee, and it appeared from their report that all the moneys of the Society were well and securely invested.

The Report was unanimously adopted.

The retiring Directors and Auditors were re-elected. Mr. George Abraham Crawley and Mr. John William Hawkins were elected Directors, to supply the vacancies mentioned in the Report.

After the usual votes of thanks the meeting separated.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 28, 1857.

THE NEW MASTER OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

In making legal appointments, the plan of putting a round man into a square hole is not by any means likely to become obsolete; and it would almost seem as if certain high authorities thought that it was a good plan, and one which should be adopted even more frequently in choosing a Judge or Master than in making up a Cabinet. We can readily conceive reasons why, a few years back, the present PREMIER should not have been offered the post of Foreign Secretary, and why the late Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH should only have attained with difficulty and delay to the position of Colonial Minister. It is also easy to understand that places in the Cabinet, then about to be constructed, must at all events have been found for two such influential politicians; and it was therefore necessary to devolve upon them duties which they did not understand, and did not feel disposed or obliged to learn. The consequence was, that very little was done in the departments of those Ministers, and still less was well done. But of the obstruction of public business there were few or no complaints; and when the evil was pointed out, it was generally regarded as a natural and inevitable defect of a system of Government which has many countervailing excellences.

But if a Secretary of State does not understand his duties, he is usually able to delay acting until he has obtained competent advice, and the office over which he is called upon to preside generally contains men who are able to guide him in his difficulties; and their assistance may be given privately, and without appearing to the outer world to have been given at all. Sometimes, however, it has happened that the political necessities of the hour have forced into the office of Lord Chancellor of England or Ireland a lawyer as little familiar with courts of equity as Lord PALMERSTON may have been with the Home Office, or Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH with Public Works. Now, it would scarcely occur to the most devoted worshipper of our Constitution to pretend that Lord TRURO or Lord CAMPBELL would have been likely to make better judges in Chancery, because they had spent their lives and energies in the Courts of Common Law. To say that a round man ought, for his own and the public benefit, to be taken out of a round and put into a square hole, would be rather too extravagant; and yet this is exactly what was done in the case of Lord TRURO, and in many cases before his time. Lord CAMPBELL also was put for a time into a square hole; but he, wiser or more fortunate than others, found an opportunity of dropping into a round one, where he has been remarkably comfortable ever since.

So great an officer as the Lord Chancellor is fenced about with a dignity and splendour which dazzle the majority of mankind, and hinder them from criticising too minutely the manner in which he does his work. Besides, the Chancellor usually sits as a Judge of Appeal; and a novice at the work would probably not do very wrong if he contented himself at first with affirming, or, perhaps, where appeals come from certain judges, with reversing, in all cases, the judgment of the court below. It may be added that, whenever doubt was felt, it would be easy to reserve judgment, and even a Lord Chancellor might procure efficient help, until diligent study should have rendered him more competent to discharge his duties.

But whatever illusion may exist in the colonies as to the knowledge of a Minister, or among the laity as to the learning of a judge, it is impossible to deceive attorneys as to the competency of a newly-appointed master for the duty of taxing their bills of costs. An official of this rank has neither voluminous robes and wig, nor obsequious attendants, nor exalted dignity, to confuse our perception of his inexperience; and, besides, his conduct is observed, not by distant or ignorant spectators, but by those who understand and feel in their own pockets the measure and the consequences of every error he commits. Nor can a taxing master, like a Lord Chancellor, relieve himself of a painful responsibility, by affirming a previous decision, or by reserving judgment, and privately obtaining the assistance of more experienced men. He decides in the first instance, and he has, in a single morning, to consider and dispose of not one only, but a score or more of questions, upon each of which probably he never expended one moment's thought before. It is, of course, impossible for any unpractised intellect, however able, either to do such work as this when first appointed, or even to impose upon those around him by a decent pretence of doing it. If a newly-created taxing-master had the faculties of HARDWICKE, MANSFIELD, and ELDON combined in his own mighty mind, he could not decide a single disputed item of a bill of costs unless he was familiar with the scales of fees, and with the rules and practice. Nor can it be conceived as possible that any barrister, however diligent, should make himself familiar with this branch of legal learning until he actually felt a direct personal interest in doing so. There are doubtless men at the bar who know a good deal of the law of courts in which they do not practise; and we have heard that skilful connoisseurs in art, eminent chemists, and erudite theologians may be counted among the veterans of Westminster Hall. But we certainly do not believe in the existence of an amateur in costs. We think that the most active and vigorous intellect would shrink from the effort necessary to make out or to tax an imaginary bill.

We understand that Mr. HODGSON, who has lately become Master of the Queen's Bench, feeling the difficulty of his new duties, obtained the assistance of a brother master, who sat by his side during the taxation, heard the arguments, and suggested, in an under-tone, what the decision on every question ought to be. Now, we suppose that if the SOLICITOR-GENERAL were to be appointed a Vice-Chancellor, and were to take his seat on Monday, with Sir W. P. WOOD by his side to prompt him, considerable surprise would be expressed, both by the profession and by the public, and it would be thought that judicial dignity had been sadly compromised. But yet, supposing it to be necessary or conformable to our time-honoured Constitution to devolve duties upon a man who cannot possibly be qualified to perform them, and supposing, also, that these duties must be discharged forthwith, and publicly, we do not see what better course could be adopted than that which we have ventured to suggest. We are very far indeed from intending to say anything disrespectful or injurious to Mr. HODGSON. He is, we believe, an able and accomplished man, well versed both in the theory and practice of his profession—teres atque rotundus—but he has been put by Lord CAMPBELL into a square hole; and strangely enough the daily newspapers, in announcing that he had been so placed, rather anxiously assured us that he was round. We dare say that with time and friction the new Master will come to fit his place more easily; and if we cannot obtain the appointment of taxing officers properly qualified at the outset, the next best thing is to see men chosen who have ability, industry, and, above all, a conscience to urge them to qualify themselves for their task as speedily and thoroughly as they can. It is due to Mr. HODGSON as well as to Lord CAMPBELL to assume that he is such a man; and we believe that, for making the best of a bad system, a more judicious choice could not easily have been made. A very little time well used will enable Mr. HODGSON to dispense with the promptings of Sir A. D. CROFT; and we think that, in the meantime, if he felt that he must have that aid, he did well to receive it openly.

We do not, of course, forget that the taxation of costs is only one of the duties of a Master of the Queen's Bench, although attorneys may well be pardoned for thinking it the most important of them. For his other functions it is probable that Mr. HODGSON, having been a reporter in the court of which he is now an officer, is remarkably well qualified. But surely this circumstance cannot be expected to reconcile attorneys to the sight of the new master trying his "'prentice hand" upon their bills. And it is scarcely necessary to point out that every one of the questions that come before the taxing officer concerns not only the attorney who is to receive, but the party who is to pay the costs. We have urged on various occasions that a wider discretion ought to be exercised by taxing masters in all courts, and that as they should have the liberty, so they should have the capacity and the will, to consider what may be a fair remuneration for the work actually done in the particular case. To discharge this duty satisfactorily it would be almost inevitable to appoint solicitors, and this has been done in the Court of Chancery; but we cannot say that the taxing officers of that Court have fulfilled the expectations formed of them.

THE CASE OF THE ARROW.

It would be foreign to the purposes of this journal to discuss the political bearings of the quarrel with China, which led to the brilliant debate in the Lords on Tuesday night. There is a side to the question, apart from these, which must have a deep interest for every lawyer. Lord LYNDHURST and the LORD CHANCELLOR laid down broad principles of international law diametrically opposed to each other, and, in a legal point of view, far more important and curious than the particular set of facts which elicited their statement. As our readers have probably heard quite enough about the Arrow and Sir JOHN BOWRING, we shall confine ourselves to a consideration of the rival principles, each of which can claim such high authority.

Lord LYNDHURST lays it down as a self-evident truth, which "no man can by possibility with any show of reason dispute," that "you may give any rights, or any privileges, to a foreigner or to a foreign vessel, as against yourselves, but not as against foreigners." Lord CRANWORTH, on the contrary, holds—though he rather implies than states—the doctrine "that any sovereign state can give any rights to any person as against all the world." There can be no doubt that Lord LYNDHURST'S view of the case appears at first sight to be not only true, but, as he himself considered it, self-evident; whereas the principle which we have attributed to Lord CRANWORTH looks paradoxical. With the most unaffected diffidence as to the soundness of a view opposed to so great an authority as that of Lord LYNDHURST, we must express our opinion in favour of the latter principle, and we feel that the practical consequences of the adoption of either are so important that, at the risk of engaging in a somewhat abstract discussion, we will state the reasons which have led us to this conclusion. Understanding by the words "a law" a command prescribing a course of conduct, and by the words "a right" a power which can be enforced by law, it follows that, as between sovereign states, there are, strictly speaking, neither laws nor rights. The expressions "laws of nations" and "rights of nations" are therefore metaphors. The nearest approach to a law between two nations is an understanding between them that in certain events the one will make war on the other; and the nearest approach to a right on the part of a nation or of an individual, against a foreign nation, is an understanding that if the nation or individual is prevented from acting in a particular manner, war will follow against the nation so preventing him. The proposition which we have attributed to Lord CRANWORTH forms the logical conclusion from these premises. Any sovereign state can give to any person whatever "a right" (as we have defined it). to pursue towards any other state any course of conduct, however monstrous or wicked. If we passed a law here that any Frenchman who committed murder should by that act acquire the privileges of an English subject, and should be claimed by, and given up to, any English consul, Frenchmen would thereby acquire a right to commit murder. That is, they would acquire a power of commiting murder plus the protection afforded by our agents (whatever that would be worth); and if the French Government chose to refuse such a demand their refusal would be a violation of that right, and would be a cause of war. If for France we were to substitute Tahiti in this illustration, it is obvious that such a right would be as solid as any right whatever.

Such language as this sounds, of course, to the last degree absurd and paradoxical; but this only arises from a want of attention to its meaning. We, of course, know that it would be extremely wicked and foolish in us to confer or to protect such rights; but there are many legal rights which it is foolish and wicked to exercise. If I see a man drowning I have a right to let him drown; if my father is starving, and I am rich, I have a perfect right to let him die of hunger, till an order for his maintenance is made upon me in due form of law. If I choose to be desperately heartless, cruel, and false in all my dealings I have a perfect right to be so, and the law will protect me in my right against any one who interferes with it. There is therefore nothing absurd in the proposition that a sovereign state can confer upon any person any rights it pleases as against all the world, though it may be extremely wicked of all the parties concerned to do so. We have illustrated our position by the most extreme cases, but the fact is, that in ordinary cases every nation acts upon it. The English maxim is, "Nemo potest exuere patriam." The American maxim is, that residence makes a citizen. Here, therefore, is a case in which Lord LYNDHURST'S proposition completely fails: the Americans do daily "give rights and privileges to foreigners as against foreigners." If we were at war with America, and found in their ships American citizens born in England, and wished to hang them as traitors, does any man doubt that they would denounce such an act as a murder to be punished by reprisals on English prisoners?

The great advantage of the principle which we are maintaining is, that it is the only one which can be applied to dealings with nations in all stages of civilisation. Apply Lord LYNDHURST'S principle to a barbarous country and it breaks down at once. Would it not be competent to the government of India to give a Frenchman who has resided in Calcutta for ten years rights as against the King of Oude or the Shah of Persia? Apply the principle, on the other hand, to America or France, and it can do no harm. We may, no doubt, confer any sort of absurd right on any one, just as we may make piracy or robbery lawful; but we are very sure not to do it, because there are well understood, and in many cases, well defined limits to the degree in which it is expedient for nations to interfere with each other's affairs. Lord LYNDHURST asks whether we should have treated the American or French shipping interest as we have treated that of the Chinese. Certainly we should not. We might do so; but it would be as unquestionably wrong to exercise that right against the French, as it may possibly have been right and wise to exercise it against the Chinese. Lord LYNDHURST's principle amounts to this:—You have no right to refuse charity to a beggar, because it would not be right in you to refuse it to a friend.

Applying these principles to the facts of the particular case of the Arrow, we think that the question whether the colonial ordinance was valid depends entirely upon its relations to the Imperial laws upon the subject. That it was valid as against the Chinese, i. e., that their remedy upon it was wholly and solely by war against us, we have no manner of doubt. That it was right to pass it seems to us very probable, though we can express no decided opinion upon the point. Whether Consul PARKES was right in claiming to decide whether, as a register relating to the vessel in question was in existence, the ship was under the protection of the ordinance, is a curious and delicate question. Two courses were open to the Chinese. They could either repudiate the ordinance altogether, which, according to our view, would have been a declaration of war; or they could take the objection that the register was run out—but by taking that objection they would consent to the consul's jurisdiction. If they took the second course, the consul would be morally bound to decide according to the justice of the case. A decision on the ordinance ought, we think, to have been in favour of the Chinese. The case, therefore, appears to us to stand thus:—The Chinese had a good and a bad ground to go upon. They chose the bad ground in ignorance of the good one, which our consul did not disclose to them. They said in effect, "we repudiate your ordinance." The fact that they said so was not the less a hostile act, because they might have got possession of the Arrow upon other grounds. Suppose that, instead of making this particular case the ground of their complaint, they had made a complaint against the ordinance itself when it was enacted; suppose it then to have been enacted, and that they had seized vessels with our register on board, should we have submitted to that? If we had we should have stultified ourselves, and yet this is the ground which must be taken by those who would contend that our actual conduct has been illegal and oppressive.

Legal News.

Lord CAMPBELL has moved for a select committee of the House of Lords to consider whether the privilege now enjoyed by reports of law proceedings might not be properly extended to the proceedings of other bodies. In his short exposition of the existing law, Lord CAMPBELL did not fail to attribute its true value to the Earl of NORTHAMPTON'S case, so much insisted upon lately by the Times; and he reminded the House of a recent celebrated question—that of life peerages—in which the authority of Lord COKE had been disregarded. Lord CAMPBELL recommends that protection should be afforded to journalists who give fair and faithful reports of proceedings of the two Houses. He is disposed to think that the same privilege should be extended to Convocation, remarking, by the way, that prelates are rather apt to use strong language, and therefore the protection may be needed; and he would also include the proceedings of county meetings and of town-councils. Beyond this point, he does not clearly see his way, but he suggests that the same privilege might be given to all reports which were for the public good, leaving the question of what falls within that limit to be decided by a jury. Some such provision as this would seem to be sufficient for the honest and careful journalist. We cannot adopt the view put forward by the Times, that the conductors of a newspaper are too busy, or too hurried, or too little informed, to exercise a discretion as to the nature of the reports they publish, and it appears to us that the legitimate and wholesome influence of the press is likely to be damaged by urging these extravagant demands. One rule we may safely venture to lay down. Whenever a journalist feels doubtful whether it is right to publish a certain speech, he may feel sure that he will do right in letting it alone, at least, until he has had time for inquiry and consideration. In all public proceedings of great and immediate interest, it may be expected that the character of the assembly will sufficiently control any excessive violence of language. But the world is not so taken up with the debates of every petty local meeting as to demand a full, unhesitating publication of them on the very next day. People may get through the morning pretty well even without reading what passed the night before in the Parliament of Little Pedlington. We think, moreover, that it is not correct to assume, as does the Times, that newspapers always report "mechanically, and without feeling," and that they are nothing more than "the rock from which the voice reverberates." Besides, Echo is a capricious nymph, and the tones to which we wish her to respond must be modulated with exact nicety. The fact is, that most newspapers have favourite topics and speakers, and they do already exercise for their own advantage a degree of judgment and discretion which would be quite sufficient for the protection of individuals and of the public. In the case of seditious meetings, it cannot reasonably be contended that the speakers alone ought to be punished, and the printers and publishers to escape; and yet this is the legitimate consequence of the principle contended for by the Times. We are of opinion, upon the whole, that the law ought to be altered as regards Parliament, and in some other cases as suggested by Lord CAMPBELL, and that juries might be safely trusted to decide in other instances whether a report was really for the public good. The English juryman would generally remember that a newspaper was essential to his daily comfort, and that he must not destroy his constant friend and counsellor by a verdict for unreasonable damages.

It appears useless to discuss the details of the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill until we know more certainly what shape the measure will assume. It is true that we have before us the bill brought in by the LORD CHANCELLOR, with its ninety-three sections and its schedule; but it would not be easy to predict the degree of resemblance which that bill may bear to the same measure when it has passed through the committee to which it was consigned on Monday night. The LORD CHANCELLOR himself appears to have no fixed opinion upon any of the leading questions that arise in dealing with this subject. He tells us that formerly he thought the proctors ought to lose their monopoly and to be compensated; but he found, or feared, difficulties in the way of compensation; and so he now inclines to maintain the monopoly, so far as the non-contentious business is concerned; but if a sufficiently strong pressure be put upon him in the committee, he will be ready, it would seem, to revert to his original opinion. We cannot but feel the gravest doubts as to the success of any attempt at law reform under the auspices of one so vacillating. It is not so much the want of time as of a clear perception and firm purpose that threatens to mar the efforts of the LORD CHANCELLOR.

A letter has been communicated to us containing the following passage:—

"There was a paragraph in the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL a week or two ago which I am sure is not consistent with the high tone in which a Solicitors' Journal ought to be conducted. Speaking of compromise of suits, the writer says, page 155, 'Whether this be or be not for the interest of the suitor, we shall not at this moment offer a positive opinion; of this, however, we are quite sure, that it is not for the interest of the lawyer.' I have long thought that there are very few cases (where litigation must otherwise take place or is going on) in which a suitor should reject reasonable terms of compromise; and as to the lawyer, I am certain that it can never be his true interest that a case should be carried on merely to swell his bill of costs, and it is not honest."

We entirely concur in the principle enunciated by the writer of this letter; and if we have appeared to contravene it in the passage quoted by him from the journal, it can only be because we have failed clearly to express our meaning. We think that in general a client does well to accept reasonable terms of compromise; and we have no hesitation in declaring it to be the duty of his legal advisers to assist in making an end of strife. Nevertheless, it is the business of the Legislature to provide, so far as possible, a remedy for every wrong. It is the province of the moralist and the preacher to lead men to peace and good-will by direct arguments, and not by contriving to make litigation impossible or difficult. There ought to be a ready means of enforcing every just demand; and if it appears to be the interest of the suitor to abandon or abate his claim, that can only be because the risk or delay incident to legal proceedings is so great as to render it advisable to accept part of a demand now instead of the possible future chance of realising the whole. We apprehend, therefore, that, strictly speaking, it ought not to be the interest of the suitor to compromise his suit, although, under any human system of law, it frequently must be so.

Again, as regards the lawyer, we think it is accurate to say that it is not his interest that his client's suit should be prematurely ended by a compromise, instead of proceeding to its final issue, and we say this on the simple ground that the lawyer would thereby lose a large part of his fees. We were speaking, at the moment, of the direct pecuniary interest of the profession, and of that alone; but we never said, or meant to say, that the pursuit of that interest ought to be the lawyer's ruling motive, or that he would gain in the long run by exclusive devotion to it. It is the lawyer's duty always to do the best he can for his client without looking narrowly to his own interest. This principle it has been our constant aim to inculcate, and to avoid all risk of mis-construction, we now declare, distinctly, our adherence to it.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. William Shaen, M.A., of 8, Bedford-row, solicitor, has been appointed by Sir William A'Beckett, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria, a Commissioner to take and receive, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the verification of memorials, and also the acknowledgment of deeds relating to property, in the colony of Victoria.

On Monday, the 16th inst., at a special meeting of the Town Council of the borough of Wolverhampton, Mr. Edwin John Hayes was unanimously elected town clerk in the room of Thomas Walker, Esq., resigned.

Mr. H. Phillips, senior clerk at Worship-street Police Court, has been appointed chief clerk at the Marylebone Police court, in the place of Mr. Fell, deceased; and Mr. Hurlstone, second clerk at the Worship-street Police Court, has been promoted to be chief clerk.

CHANCERY NOTICE AS TO ORDERS ON SUMMONS.—In all cases in which the registrar shall find it necessary to issue a draft of any order made on summons in chambers, upon the attendance of any other party or parties besides the applicant, notice of settling such draft is to be given by the party having the carriage of the order to such other party or parties; but no notice of passing such order will be required to be given, unless specially directed by the registrar. Where the registrar does not deem it necessary to prepare a draft of any such order, but issues the order in the first instance, notice of passing the order will be required to be given in the usual manner.

Chancery Registrar's Office, 18th February, 1857.

IN BANKRUPTCY—EX PARTE TYSON.—This was an appeal by the bankrupt, Mr. William Tyson, a flour dealer at Liverpool, against a judgment of Mr. Commissioner Perry, granting the bankrupt a certificate of the second class, but suspending it for two years from the 23rd of January last, "without protection for the present." One ground of the judgment appeared to be that the bankrupt had borrowed money of, among others, his solicitor Mr. Pemberton for short periods and at a high rate of interest. The judgment upon this point contained the following passage:—

"He has paid to Mr. Pemberton in interest on loans £4,072, a sum exceeding the whole of his profits, which are stated at £3,635. The interest so paid was at various rates—generally at £6 per cent. per month; but there are instances of charges made of £5 for the loan of £100 for twelve days, which is after the rate of about £150 per cent. per annum; and a charge in one case of £2 for the loan of £100 for four days, which is after the rate of £180 per cent. per annum."

The other ground was for bad book-keeping. Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said, it was quite impossible to sanction a tradesman raising money at such a rate of interest; but as the case did not seem to present any feature of dishonesty, other than so far as borrowing money upon such terms might be deemed dishonest, he should think that justice would be satisfied by leaving the judgment as it is, save only giving the bankrupt protection, without which he could not maintain himself or family. He added that the court must not allow itself to be reasonably suspected of favouring such conduct; how far unreasonably suspected it need not and did not care. No case of fraud had been treated by the court with anything but severity —none.

THE LATE ARCHER RYLAND, ESQ.—Our obituary records the death of Archer Ryland, Esq., the barrister, a well-known member of the home circuit. Mr. Ryland had a very extensive knowledge of settlement law, and formerly had a very large practice in this department at the Essex Quarter Sessions, of which bar he has been for some years the senior.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

The Royal British Bank still contributes its quota to the decisions of the day. One of the last cases was an application on the part of Mr. Marcus, a shareholder of the bank, for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the decision of the Lords Justices, on his previous petition to annul the bankruptcy (see 5 W. R. 335). The court showed a strong primâ facie disinclination to exercise the invidious function of forbidding an appeal from its own decision. The question turned on the 18th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, which authorises an appeal when the court considers the matter of law or equity to be "of sufficient difficulty or importance to receive the decision of the House of Lords." It was clearly the opinion of the court that the question on Mr. Marcus's application was of sufficient difficulty or importance to be a proper subject for the wisdom of the House of Lords; but both of the Lords Justices concurred in the view that it was not enough for a party desiring to appeal to show that the question was difficult or important, as required by the letter of the statute, but that he was also bound to make the application for leave to appeal, if not at the time when the petition was heard or immediately after, at least within a reasonable time. The obvious inconvenience of allowing an appeal after the applicant had lain by while more than £100,000 had been distributed, and many proceedings had been taken, was the main ground on which the limitation of time was imported by implication into the 18th section.

Another case, of some practical interest, arising out of the same unfortunate company, was Walton v. Butler (5 W. R. 331). The suit was for administration of the estate of a deceased shareholder in the bank. One of the judgment creditors had commenced proceedings at law to obtain leave to issue execution against the executors, who thereupon applied to the Master of the Rolls for an injunction. On the part of the creditor, it was contended that he ought to be allowed to obtain leave to issue execution, not for the purpose of levying it, but to enable him to prove as a judgment creditor against the estate of the individual shareholder. The Master of the Rolls, however, after ascertaining the course of practice in chambers, held that the previous leave of the Common Law Court to issue execution was not necessary; and that, without taking that preliminary step, the judgment obtained against the official manager might be proved in the administration suit as a judgment debt against the estate of the shareholder. On this ground the proceedings at law were restrained as unnecessary. The principle out of which the practice in chambers has grown is difficult to explain, except on the ground of convenience; and it is not unlikely that a more serious contention may hereafter arise upon the point.

In Graham v. Lee (5 W. R. 828), the Master of the Rolls, acting on the principle that clauses of forfeiture must be strictly construed, held that a legacy which was to be void in case of an attempt or agreement to assign it was not forfeited either by an offer to mortgage it if possible, or by a declaration of insolvency followed by an adjudication of bankruptcy. His Honour laid it down, that, to effect a forfeiture, the attempt to assign must be, not a mere offer, but such an attempt as would have operated as an effectual assignment but for the clause in question.

In Clarke v. The Royal Panopticon, 5 W. R. 332, a question, on which there is no direct authority, was decided. The Royal Panopticon was incorporated by charter, under which and its deed of settlement, a council to be constituted as provided in the latter, were empowered to enter into and make and execute all necessary contracts, purchases, sales, assurances and other acts. The corporation was empowered to borrow any sum not exceeding £25,000, and they borrowed on mortgage of their building and chattels the sum of £12,000. The company became unsuccessful, and the mortgagee, under a power of sale in his mortgage deed, was proceeding to sell, until restrained by injunction. Upon motion to dissolve the injunction, a question arose whether the council could to give a power of sale to the mortgagee, there being no provision expressly to that effect in the charter or the deed of settlement. Kindersley, V. C., before whom the motion came on, treating the council as trustees for the general body of shareholders, held, that a power to sell is not incident to a power to mortgage real estate, though it may be in the case of chattels, of which an effective mortgage could only be made by a bill of sale. In the absence of any decision on the point, his Honour's judgment proceeded mainly on this principle, that where a special power was given to a trustee, involving confidence and personal discretion, it was not competent to him to delegate the exercise of such power to another. Admitting that the council had power to sell, when they mortgaged, they could not delegate that power to another to sell at some future time, because they were to exercise a discretion as to whether there should be a sale at all or not, and also as to the time when, and the circumstances under which the sale should take place. The Vice-Chancellor further considered that, though it was clear that a special power given to a trustee to sell might authorise a mortgage by him, yet a special power given to him to mortgage did not include a power to sell. He further remarked, that the practice of giving powers of sale to mortgagees had become far less desirable since the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, the 48th section of which gives to a mortgagee, or any subsequent incumbrancer, or a mortgagor, the option of a sale instead of foreclosure, should the court, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, think such a course proper, and then upon such terms as the court thinks fit to direct. Upon the operation of this section, see Laslett v. Cliffe, 2 W. R. 536; Campbell v. Moxhay, Id. 610; and Wickendon v. Rayson, 4 W. R. 89; S. C., 25, L. J., Ch., 162.

The law relating to voluntary trusts has been very much discussed in the profession of late, in consequence of the Lord Chancellor's decision in Scales v. Maude, 6 De G. Mac. & Gor. 43; S. C., 4 W. R. 109, which some lawyers have considered to disturb the course of authorities on the subject. But the difficulty, if any such there be, which has arisen from that decision, relates only to cases in which there is but a mere declaration of trust, without any change of legal ownership. It was decided in Collinson v. Patrick, 2 Keen, 134, that if what has been done amounts to a transfer of the legal interest, the parties in whose favour the trust is created are entitled to have the benefit of it in a court of equity; but a voluntary transfer of an equitable interest by a person beneficially entitled, requires at least that notice should be given to the trustee, or that the intended transfer should in some way be acted upon (Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare, 471). A marked distinction, however, has been established in numerous decisions between cases in which there has been a declaration of trust, and cases where there has been an imperfect gift, the legal ownership in both remaining unchanged. In Ex-parte Pye, 18 Ves. 14, Lord Eldon thus stated the distinction:—"It has been decided, that, upon a (voluntary) agreement to transfer stock, this court will not interpose; but if the party had declared himself to be the trustee of that stock, it becomes the property of the cestui que trust, without more." The rule, therefore, appears to be, that where a person by an imperfect gift, and without a declaration of trust, attempts to make a gift to volunteers, it is inoperative. In Kiddill v. Farnell, 5 W. R. 324, a lady who was entitled to a sum of £3½ per cent. Stock, then standing in her name in the Bank books, being seriously ill, executed and delivered to her sister a power of attorney in the usual form for the transfer of the same into the name of the sister, and died intestate two days before the sister procured the actual transfer of the stock into her own name. There was satisfactory evidence that the gift was intended to be complete and absolute; and the only question was, whether it failed owing to the death of the lady before the power of attorney had been acted on. On the one hand, it was contended that, the donor having done all that circumstances permitted towards effectuating the gift, it was perfectly valid. On the other, it was argued, that the present case was covered by authorities, according to which, in order to have the gift complete within the rule of the court, the power of attorney should have been acted upon in the lifetime of the intended donor. The cases mainly relied upon in support of this side, were Coningham v. Plunkett, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 245, where a person beneficially entitled to stock gave instructions to his solicitor to prepare a settlement of it for the benefit of certain persons whom he named, and to procure from the trustees a transfer for that purpose. The settlement was accordingly prepared, and a power of attorney executed by the trustees, which was subsequently placed in the hands of bankers, who transferred the sums of stock into the names of the intended donees, as mentioned in the solicitor's instructions. The intended settlor, however, died, without having seen the settlement, and before the actual transfer; and it appeared, that in consequence of a caution given to the solicitor who attended him for the purpose of receiving the instructions, not to do anything which might lead him to think he was in immediate danger, the solicitor did not ask him to sign the instructions, which were taken down in writing by the solicitor from his mouth. Knight Bruce, L. J., then Vice-Chancellor, was of opinion that everything that was necessary to be done to complete the transfer had not taken place. The ground of this decision appears to have been that, inasmuch as the intending settlor meant that the stock should not be transferred without a settlement, and the settlement never was made, if he had lived he might have revoked his instructions, and countermanded the transfer; and that having died before the settlement was made, his death was a revocation. In the present case, Watson v. King, 4 Campb. 272; Wallace v. Cooke, 5 Esp. 117, were also relied upon. Those cases are merely to the effect that the death of the grantor is a revocation of a power of attorney, which hardly admits of any discussion. The question then is shortly this:—The intended donor having done what was necessary on her part to make a perfect transfer, and her intention being manifest to confer an absolute interest on the intended donee, whether the death of the intended donor, before the transfer by virtue of the power of attorney which she had executed, brought the case within the rule applying to imperfect voluntary gifts? Stuart, V. C., held that it did not,—that, under the circumstances, the death did not operate as a revocation of the gift. His Honour considered that, as far as the Bank of England was concerned, the power, which was in the usual form, precluded all persons claiming under the donor from alleging that it was revoked by her death; and that, consequently, the transfer, which took place after her death, was perfectly valid.

ATTORNEY—ATTACHMENT—EFFECT OF CERTIFICATE OF PROTECTION.

Re Slater, 5 W. R., Q. B., 293.

From this case it appears that a "certificate of protection," under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70, s. 6, which provides, that after a resolution or agreement of such proportion of the creditors of the petitioner, as is required by the act, shall be filed and entered of record in the Court of Bankruptcy, and a protection from arrest shall have been indorsed by the commissioner on the certificate of such filing, the petitioning debtor shall be free from arrest at the suit of any person being a creditor at the date of the petition, with such notice as in the act mentioned, is a sufficient excuse for the non-payment of a sum of money which the petitioner had undertaken to pay, and which undertaking he had been called on by rule to perform, in the exercise of the summary jurisdiction of the superior court of law of which he is an attorney.

The same point, in relation to a certificate of bankruptcy (under the former statute, 6 Geo. 4, c. 16), was decided by Lord Tenterden, C. J., in the King v. Edwards (9 B. & C. 652), on the ground that an attachment for non-payment of money is in the nature of a civil process, merely to enforce the payment of a debt; and that a person attached thereunder is entitled (if otherwise entitled) to the advantage of the bankrupt laws. In both this and the case above noticed, the party ruled was an attorney; but in both it was held that this made no difference, for if, on the one hand, the conduct of the party ruled was more immediately within the jurisdiction of the court, so, on the other, had it not been for his being such attorney, the creditor would not have had the advantage of the process by attachment at all.

County Court—Costs—Expense of Professional Advocacy.

Lawford v. Partridge, 5 W. R., Ex., 295.

This was a motion for a prohibition to the county court of Bedford. The plaint was for a trespass committed on the plaintiff's land, in respect of which 4*l.* 15*s.* were claimed as damages, and an additional sum for costs (including, apparently, the costs of employing professional advocacy), making together the sum of 6*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* The defendant at the hearing set up title to the land in question, and objected to the jurisdiction of the court; whereupon the judge nonsuited the plaintiff and awarded costs to the defendant (including, apparently, the costs of professional advocacy). The grounds for the prohibition now prayed for were—1st, that the judge, under the circumstances, had no power to award any costs at all; 2ndly, that if he had, the costs he awarded were not such as he had power to give on a claim of a demand of £5.

No opinion was given by the Court (Pollock, C. B., and Watson, B.) on the second point, and, therefore, it remains undetermined whether the expense of employing a barrister or attorney is allowed on taxing the costs payable by a plaintiff to a defendant after a nonsuit, where the demand for damages was under £5, but together with the costs claimed exceeded that amount. But the rule for the prohibition was made absolute on the first ground; and it was held, that, as by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 58, the county court has no cognisance of any suit wherein title to land comes in question, and as in the case before them such title did come into question, there was no power in the judge either to nonsuit or to give costs, for such power did not exist in him, unless by virtue of the 79th section of the same act; and that section (which enables the court to nonsuit, and give costs to the defendant "if the plaintiff shall not make proof of his demand" to the satisfaction of the Court) applies to cases only within the jurisdiction, and not to the excepted cases mentioned in the 58th section.

Holding over after Lease—Terms of Tenancy.

Thomas v. Parker, 5 W. R., Ex., 316.

This case is in confirmation of a doctrine which was already well established—viz., that where a tenant by lease holds over after the determination of the term, and pays rent, he becomes a tenant from year to year, under all the conditions of the expired lease consistent with such a tenancy. In the present case, the lease contained a clause for re-entry on non-payment of rent, and the tenancy from year to year created by his holding over was held to be subject to the same condition. Baron Watson remarked—"It is important that no doubt should be thrown upon a question of such very general importance, as a great many of the houses in London and throughout the country are occupied by tenants holding over."

Writ of Execution—When a Fi. Fa. must be returned before issuing a Ca. Sa.

Andrews v. Sanderson & Nicholls, 5 W. R., Ex., 317.

It was laid down, in the case of Miller v. Parnell (6 Taunt. 370), that a plaintiff who has issued and executed a fi. fa. cannot abandon it, and sue out a ca. sa. before the fi. fa. has been returned; and this rule was afterwards acted upon in Chapman v. Boulby (8 Mee. & W. 249).

On these two decisions the above case was determined, and a return of the fi. fa. was held to be necessary before issuing a ca. sa. on the same judgment, on its appearing that the sheriff, after the seizure, but before sale, had withdrawn the execution at the request of the plaintiff's attorney. It appears that the only exception to the general rule, therefore, is where (as in the case of Dicas v. Warne, 2 D. P. C. 762; see Lush Pr., p. 437, 2nd edit.) nothing could, by law, have been realised under the first writ—as, for example, where the officer found the landlord already in possession for an amount greater than the value of the goods of the judgment debtor on the premises.

Gilbert v. Crozier, 5 W. R., C. P., 309; Brockelhurst & Another v. Law, Id., Q. B., 311.

Two points on the construction of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, have lately come before the superior Courts of law. In the first of the above cases, the plaintiff had sued the bankrupt at law to recover a demand in respect of which he had filed, in the Bankruptcy Court, an affidavit of debt, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 78, in consequence of which the defendant had been summoned before the Court of Bankruptcy; and a verdict in such action having passed in favour of the plaintiff, but for a less amount than that sworn to as above mentioned in the Court of Bankruptcy, the defendant now applied for his costs under the subsequent part of the same 78th section,—which gives the defendant in such action his costs, provided it shall be made to appear, to the satisfaction of the Court in which the action is brought, upon motion made in court for that purpose, and on hearing the parties by affidavit, that the plaintiff had not any reasonable or probable cause for making affidavit of debt to the amount he filed. The Court of Common Pleas, however, held that the verdict found in such cases—though a material element in the question, whether such reasonable or probable cause existed—was not conclusive; and that in the present instance (in which the plaintiff sued for work done, on the quantum meruit), there was room for thinking the plaintiff had fair grounds for believing he should recover the full amount claimed. They, therefore, refused the application.

The other case (Brockelhurst v. Law) turned upon the question how far a landlord's common law right to distrain for rent any goods on the premises demised, when rent is in arrear, is affected by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 129, which provides that no such distress made after an act of bankruptcy shall be available for more than one year's rent.

The plaintiffs were owners of a mill whereof one W. was in possession as yearly tenant. W. had assigned, by way of mortgage, to the defendant, all the machinery on the mill, but remained himself in occupation, until, on non-payment of the sum lent, he was turned out of possession by the defendant, who disposed of part of the machinery by sale according to the power to that effect in the deed of assignment. Afterwards,—viz., on the 17th July, 1856—the machinery unsold being still on the premises, W. committed an act of bankruptcy. At the time of the act, one year's rent was in arrear from W. to the plaintiffs, and they gave notice to the defendant, who was then in occupation of the mill, that they intended to distrain the machinery remaining. This year's rent the defendant paid; but on a claim being made by the plaintiffs to distrain for another quarter's rent subsequently accruing, a case was stated for the Court of Queen's Bench to ascertain whether the plaintiffs, under the circumstances, were entitled to do so, and to what amount. It was argued for the plaintiffs that the effect of the deed of assignment and of the sale which the defendant made in pursuance of the power of sale, was to vest the property in the machinery in such defendant at the time of W.'s committing the act of bankruptcy, and hence that the goods sought to be distrained by the landlord did not belong to the bankrupt, and might therefore be the subject of distress as at common law, notwithstanding the above-mentioned section in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act. It was urged for the defendants on the other hand, that the deed of assignment was nothing more than a security, and did not affect the property in the machinery, notwithstanding the power of sale. The court decided in favour of the view taken by the plaintiff—holding that the goods had ceased to be W.'s at the time of his bankruptcy, and were therefore liable to be distrained by the plaintiffs, for that the object of the statute was to prevent the landlord from sweeping away everything from the general body of the creditors, and not to protect any person whose goods might happen to be on the premises (although such person might also happen to be a creditor of the bankrupt), against the legal rights of the landlord.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.—BEAMISH v. BEAMISH.

The Court of Error delivered judgment in this singular case on Friday and Saturday last. The main question to be decided can be stated in few words; it is simply whether a clergyman can officiate at his own marriage. The Court of Queen's Bench held that such a marriage, although irregular, was nevertheless valid. The case was thence carried up to the Exchequer Chamber, where it was argued elaborately last term, Mr. Napier Q.C., addressing the court at great length on behalf of the defendant in error, who disputes the validity of the marriage. As the Court of Error was divided in opinion, the judges delivered their judgments seriatim. The decision of the House of Lords will, in all probability, be obtained; still, as the point is a novel one, never having been decided in any court, it may be as well to append a brief outline of the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh, in which the material facts are stated, and the law, as I venture to think, correctly laid down.

KEOGH, J., as the junior judge, first delivered his judgment. He stated that the case came before the court on special verdict. The plaintiff claimed, as grandson and heir-at-law of Mr. Beamish, whose eldest son was the Rev. B. S. Beamish, the plaintiff's father; the defendant was a younger brother of the Rev. B. S. Beamish. The special verdict found, that, in 1831, the Rev. B. S. Beamish went to the house of a Mrs. Lewis, and there performed the marriage ceremony between himself and Isabella Frazer, by reading out and going through the forms prescribed for the solemnisation of matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer. No one was present but the contracting parties; the proceeding was, however, observed through a window by a casual spectator, who could not hear what was said. The plaintiff was the eldest child of that marriage; and, if legitimate, had an undoubted right to recover the estate. Although the zeal of counsel had led them to take a wide range, and examine the marriage laws of the whole Christian world, that learning was not altogether relevant, as the question must be dealt with as one of British law. The case of Reg. v. Millis (10 Cl. & F. 544), in the House of Lords, decided that no celebration was sufficient unless performed by an ordained clergyman; consequently no valid marriage could now take place between members of the English Church except by the intervention of a priest in holy orders. His Lordship then proceeded to show that, according to the ecclesiastical laws of these countries, the presence of such a priest has been at all times essential to the due solemnisation of matrimony. This appears by a constitution of King Edmund in 940—by the canon of Winchester in 1076—and by a later canon in 1175. The authority of the Common Prayer Book could not be disputed; and the marriage service could not, without grave and serious alterations, be performed by a clergyman at his own marriage. Although the faults or errors of the ministering priest might not vitiate the marriage, it could hardly be upheld where one of the contracting parties was a transgressor against his own sacred calling. Priests had been permitted to marry down to the eleventh century; but never had a priest been allowed to marry himself. The English Church did not revoke or alter ceremonies without reason; and it might safely be assumed that what was previously the law, and what that Church had not altered, still remained the law; and that as before the Reformation no priest could marry himself, he could not do so now. He conceived that justice and the good order of society were opposed to the validity of the marriage. The judgments of Greene, B., Jackson, J., Ball, J., and Monahan, C. J., were to the same effect: on the other hand, six judges were in favour of affirming the decision of the Court below. By a majority of one, therefore, the validity of the marriage is established; but as before intimated, an appeal to the House of Lords is confidently looked for.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.

The appointment of Henry Martley, Q.C. to the First Commissionership in the place of Mr. Baron Richards, affords an assurance that the intention of the Government is to carry on this court efficiently. The new commissioner was called in 1828, appointed Queen's Counsel in 1841, and has for many years enjoyed very extensive practice at the bar. In politics a moderate Conservative, he has not gained promotion as the reward of political subserviency, as has been the case with too many occupants of the judicial bench. The only objection that can possibly be urged against this appointment arises from the fact that the two other commissioners, to whose incessant exertions and distinguished ability the success of the commission is to be attributed, have been passed over in a manner that is far from creditable to the discrimination of her Majesty's advisers. It might reasonably have been expected that promotion would have been given to those eminent lawyers, in acknowledgment of services which have elevated Ireland from her state of territorial bankruptcy to a state of prosperity unequalled in her history. The friends of the Government, in attempting to reply to this charge of ingratitude (not to say injustice), point to the Common Law Bench, to the chief seats of which any very prominent member of the bar is at all times liable to be raised, without regard to any claim on the part of a puisne judge. The analogy, however, fails, as the Chief Justiceship is in law a distinct office, recognised as such in many acts of Parliament. The Incumbered Estates Act, on the contrary, recognises no distinction between the commissioners, except that of salary. In the Incumbered Estates Court there is no Chief Commissioner. When, therefore, the First Commissionership became vacant, it was generally expected that the distinguished occupants of the second and third seats would have obtained promotion, and that the new appointment would have been to the vacancy so created.

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS.

Considerable dissatisfaction has been occasioned by some recent appointments to Crown prosecutorships by the Attorney-General (with all his ability, perhaps the most unpopular man who has ever occupied that office). For example, a probationer—that is, a young gentleman just called to the bar, and not yet fully received as a member of the circuit, has received such an appointment on the Home Circuit. A system so administered, of course, fails to secure the best professional advice in Crown prosecutions. It is to be hoped that the nomination of Crown counsel will, in any measure introduced for England, be vested in such hands as will insure the selection of prosecutors with regard to their experience and ability, and not as in Ireland, from political and sectarian considerations.

The office of Clerk of the Crown for Kildare, vacated by the death of Mr. Barry, has been conferred on Mr. William Lewis, of the firm of Lewis and Howe, Nassau-street. The office of sub-sheriff, vacant by Mr. Lewis's promotion, will be filled by Mr. E. Howe.

ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP—STAMPING AND ENROLMENT OF.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—May I request the favour of your calling the attention of the profession to the last stamp act in reference to the stamping of articles of clerkship, viz. 19 & 20 Vict. cap. 81, s. 3, in which the 7th Geo. 4, cap. 44 (prohibiting the Commissioners of Stamps from stamping any articles of clerkship after the expiration of six months from date), is repealed. By the recent act, the commissioners are empowered (if directed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury so to do), to stamp any such instruments upon payment of the duty chargeable at the date thereof, and such further sum, by way of penalty, as is therein set forth, such penalty varying in amount from £10 to £50, according to the length of time intervening between the date of the instrument and the time when the same shall be brought to be stamped.

Under the existing rule of court as to the enrolment of articles of clerkship, the recent act is rendered inoperative, as no articles can be accepted for enrolment after six months from the date and unless previously stamped. Whether any new rule upon the subject is in contemplation, with the view of carrying into effect the intention of the Legislature, is uncertain, as would appear from the fact of the point having been raised in the case of Ex parte Williams, which stands over for consideration and judgment. Under these circumstances, it would be highly indecorous to do more than call the attention of the profession to an apparent anomaly between an act of Parliament and the existing rule of court.

7th February, 1857. N. B.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Among the many anomalies of the law which tend to bring it into disrepute, none is, perhaps, more absurd than the rule that a license given by a lessor to a lessee to do any particular act for the benefit generally of such lessee, operates as a destruction of the condition for re-entry upon any breach of covenant of the lease. It is true that some doubt exists as to the extent of the operation of this rule, and as to how far it may be restricted by a qualified license; still, with the exception of the City of London, I believe all corporate bodies—and certainly most private persons—refuse to grant such licenses to lessees without taking defeasance to revive the condition. This is at all times a severe tax upon the lessee; and in cases where the property has been the subject of several sub-devises, and, therefore, not only licenses are required from the original lessor and each intermediate one, but defeasances also, it becomes a most oppressive one.

The rule, if indeed it is law, as, with the exception mentioned, it is generally believed to be, ought no longer to exist; and if one of our numerous legal representatives in Parliament were to bring in a bill to do away with it, and to enable lessors to grant qualified licenses without danger to their right of re-entry upon any future breach of covenant, he would do good service to the public, and also to the profession, whose interest it is to render the law reasonable and popular.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

A SOLICITOR.

Lectures at the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. MALCOLM KERR ON THE STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. Kerr, in his lecture of the 13th inst., resumed the consideration of the statutes of limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, cc. 27, 42. He said that in each of these statutes provision was made for disabilities, which were now the same in both. The disability of imprisonment under the statute of James 1 was not made a disability in either of the acts of Will. 4. The disability of absence beyond seas had also in certain cases ceased under section 10 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which provided that no person should be entitled to "any time within which to commence his suit or action" beyond the period fixed for the same by any of the enactments mentioned in the section, by reason only of such person or some one or more of such persons being, at the time the cause of action accrued, "beyond the seas." The section expressly specified the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, as affected by its provisions, and it would also apply to the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 4. It might, therefore, be stated generally that in actions and suits on mortgages, judgments, liens, and for money charged on land, and for legacies, absence beyond seas was no disability; that in actions on covenants and bonds, and proceedings on recognisances, it had now ceased to be a disability; and, generally, that as to all the twenty years' limitations of actions on specialties (including the above proceedings) there were now but three disabilities—infancy, coverture, and unsoundness of mind.

These three disabilities constituted incapacities within the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, and were the remaining disabilities expressly mentioned in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 4.

Two propositions only were, therefore, required to sum up the law under the second head; and these were:—

1. All actions at law, and suits in equity on specialties—i. e. to recover the money secured by a mortgage, judgment, or lien, or to recover money bequeathed as a legacy, or damages for the breach of a covenant, or money payable under a bond, or under an award under seal (which was a specialty), or upon scire facias on a recognisance—must be brought within twenty years of the right accruing.

2. The right accrued at the time the money was receivable; and if the person entitled thereto was an infant, under coverture, or of unsound mind, the money became receivable when the minor arrived at full age, when the woman was discovert, or when the person entitled became of sound mind.

The lecturer then came to the third head of his subject—the period of limitation applicable to debts and other claims arising on simple contract. It had been considerably simplified by the abolition of the disabilities of imprisonment and absence beyond seas, but had been extended by section 18 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which made an acknowledgment by an authorised agent equally effectual to bar the operation of the statute as an acknowledgment by the party himself.

The statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, enacted that all actions of trespass qu. cl. freg., of trespass, detinue, in trover, and replevin for taking away goods and cattle, all actions of account and upon the case (other than such accounts as concerned the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors, or servants), and all actions of debt grounded upon any trading or contract "without specialty," and all actions of debt for arrearages of rent, should be commenced and sued within six years next after the cause of such action or suit, and not after. There was one general observation applicable to this enactment—viz. that it did not extinguish the debt, but only barred the remedy. Therefore a lien in respect of a debt was not gone, although the person having that lien could not sue the defendant in an action (Higgins v. Scott, 2 B. & Ad. 413). Another consequence of more importance followed from this doctrine of the remedy only being barred—viz. the claim was capable of being revived by the debtor's subsequent acknowledgment or promise without any new consideration. Following out this doctrine, it would be found that in equity the statute did not run against the creditor of a bankrupt after the fiat (now the petition for adjudication), although the six years elapsed after it issued, and before the creditor applied to prove (Ex parte Ross, 2 Glyn & J. 46).

As to the prominent exception in the section—the exception of accounts between merchant and merchant—its operation would be sufficiently illustrated by the case of Farrington v. Lee, 2 Mod. 311.

The law on this exception had undergone some changes. It was formerly held that the exception was not confined to the accounts of merchants, in the strict application of the term; but that wherever there were mutual dealings or cross accounts, for any one item of which credit had been given within the six years, both accounts were kept open (Catling v. Skoulding, 6 T. R. 189).

The fact of there being one item of credit was considered evidence of an acknowledgment that there was an open account between the parties, which let in an inquiry into the whole of the accounts together. Then came Lord Tenterden's Act, making an acknowledgment in writing necessary to bar the statute; after which it was held that the mere fact of there being an open account was not enough to take the case out of the statute. Thus an open account between two tradesmen, in which each charged the other with goods, although it contained items within the six years, was not within the exception of the statute (Cottam v. Partridge, 4 M. & S. 271).

Formerly, before Lord Tenterden's Act, the exception of merchants' accounts was not confined to the accounts of merchants in the strict acceptation of the term; it applied to tradesmen's accounts, and might be pleaded in actions of assumpsit. That kind of equitable construction of the statute found no favour in the Court of Exchequer when the question came to be raised as to what was the strict law of the case. The operation of Lord Tenterden's Act was to destroy the effect of all verbal statements, and nothing was to go to the jury as evidence but a written acknowledgment. The Court of Exchequer had now confined the exception of merchants' accounts to those cases in which an action of account, or an action on the case for not accounting, would lie (Inglis v. Haigh, 8 M. & W. 769). These three cases it would be useful to recollect for the next five years and a half; for the 9th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, destroying the legal effect of the exception in the statute of James the First, allowed actions on merchants' accounts to be brought for six years after its passing. Henceforth, by that section, the same limitation of six years would be applicable to these claims as to all other claims on simple contract—i.e., a plaintiff could not recover for items more than six years old without a written acknowledgment under Lord Tenterden's Act, or a partial payment, which was an implied acknowledgment.

The next question was, what actions came within the 3rd section. It began with trespass quare clausum fregit, which included actions for mesne profits after ejectment; next were actions of trespass, detinue, trover, and replevin for taking goods or cattle; and next, actions of account, and on the case, from which the exception of merchants' accounts was made. Actions of account on the writ to compute were quite unknown in practice,—the remedy by bill in Chancery being infinitely preferable.

The 3rd section of the statute of James next mentioned actions upon the case, which term included actions of assumpsit. It will be seen from "Blackstone" that, in its origin, assumpsit was an action on the case on promises; had this not been so, this action would not have been within the statute of James. On this point the case of Battley v. Faulkner, 3 B. & Ald. 294, might be consulted. The section afterwards mentioned all actions of debt upon any contract without specialty, and actions for rent. The word "contract" applied the six years' limitation to claims arising out of almost all the transactions of every-day life. It would be sufficient to instance its application in three cases. The statute applied to an action for a penalty under a bye-law made by a chartered company, the defendant, by becoming a member of the company, consenting to its imposing bye-laws, and contracting to pay penalties incurred by him for any infraction thereof (Tobacco-Pipe Makers' Co. v. Loder, 16 Q. B. 765). It also applied to the right of the owner to money deposited with a banker; for if that money was allowed to remain six years in the banker's hands, without any payment or acknowledgment by him, the statute barred its recovery, the contract between a depositor and his banker being the same as a lending of money which was repayable on demand (Pott v. Clegg, 16 M & W. 321). Again, if an action was brought for a debt which was incurred and accrued due in a foreign country—in Scotland, for instance—which was generally considered a foreign country by the law of England—the statute might be pleaded in bar of such action, although the period of limitation, if any, prescribed by the law of the country in which the debt was contracted, might not have expired (The British Linen Co. v. Drummond, 10 B. & C. 903). The 3rd section of the statute of James enacted that all the actions mentioned in it should be commenced and sued within six years of the cause of such action, and not after. There was now but one way of commencing an action (there were formerly several), by suing out a writ of summons. This must be done within the six years; and to prevent the operation of the statute it must be kept renewed from time to time in the mode prescribed by the C. L. P. Act, so that the main question connected with the commencement of the action was, when did the cause of such action arise? In those actions specified in the section there could never be any difficulty; a trespass was a trespass, and the cause of action arose when it occurred. The cause of action in trover and replevin was the taking of goods; in detenue—the detention after demand made of them. With reference to actions on contract, again, there was one simple rule by which the commencement of the period of limitation might always be ascertained; and this was, that the statute ran, not from the making of the contract, but from the time when the plaintiff might have brought his action, which could only be upon a breach thereof.

Thus, if the contract were to pay money at a future period, the six years began to run when that period had elapsed. Therefore, where a bill was drawn, payable at a future day, as was usual in such cases, for a sum of money lent by the payee to the drawer at the time of drawing the bill, the payee was allowed to recover the money in an action for money lent, although six years had elapsed since the advance of the money, the Court holding that the statute began to run only from the time at which the money was to be repaid—that was, from the time the bill became due, and when the promise of repayment was broken (Wiltertheim v. Lady Carlisle, 1 Hen. Bl. 631). In this case the contract was special; the money was lent to be repaid at a future day, and the breach of contract took place, when, that future day arriving, the money was not paid. In the ordinary case of money lent, there was no special contract, and the law, therefore, implied one—viz. a contract to repay on demand; but as no demand was necessary in such a case, the period of limitation began to run, as in the case of Pott v. Clegg, from the very day of the money being lent. And so, if a promissory note were payable on demand, this was a special contract to pay, in the same way as the law implied in the case of money lent, and the statute began to run from the date of the note (Norton v. Ellam, 2 M. & W. 461). The same principle applied to the case of bills or notes payable at a certain time after demand, or after sight; for where a bill or note was payable one month or six months after demand, a demand was necessary, that the drawer or maker might know when to pay—his contract was broken if he did not pay on the expiration of the time, and the statute then began to run (Thorpe v. Coombe, Ry. & Moo. 388). So, if a bill was drawn payable one month or any other time after sight, the statute ran from the expiration of that period after the bill had been presented to the drawee for acceptance (Holmes v. Kerrison, 2 Taunt. 323). There was, however, a peculiarity attending foreign bills. It was this—that the holder of a foreign bill had an immediate right of action thereon on the non-acceptance, protest, and notice, and did not acquire a fresh right of action on non-payment thereof when due; the statute accordingly ran from the former, and not from the latter period (Whitehead v. Walker, 9 M. & W. 506).

There was the same general rule running through all classes of contracts—viz. that the limitation began to run from the breach of the contract; so that, in order to ascertain when the period of six years commenced, the inquiry should be, What was the contract? This could be best illustrated by a few ordinary cases. If a merchant consigned goods to a factor, or to an auctioneer, to sell, the promise of the agent was, on his being employed, to account for the proceeds of the sale on request. Therefore, until a demand or request for an account was made, the agent had not refused to account, he had not broken his promise or contract to do so. Consequently, an action for not accounting would not lie till after demand; and as the plaintiff's right of action accrued on his demand not being complied with, the statute ran from the time of the demand (Topham v. Braddick, 1 Taunt. 572).

So in the case of a guarantee or an indemnity. When a surety became bound to answer for the debt or default of another—i.e. became guarantee for another—the law implied a promise by the principal debtor or defaulter that he would indemnify the surety. This obligation to indemnify arose the instant the surety was compelled to pay in ease of the principal; at that very instant, the principal acquired a right of action against the surety for not indemnifying him; consequently, the statute ran against the principal from that very instant. Suppose, again, there were two or three sureties: the law in this case implied a promise or contract by each of them to pay his share of liability, and, as a necessary ingredient of that contract, to indemnify each other, if either or any of them paid more than his proportion. The right to enforce this implied contract of indemnity arose whenever one of the co-sureties had paid more than his share; consequently, then, and then only, did his cause of action accrue, and from the time of that payment of more than his share did the statute run (Davies v. Humphrey, 6 M. & W. 153). The actual damnification, in these cases, called into activity the implied contract; and there being nothing to suspend the right arising under the contract, the contract was at once broken by the non-indemnifying of the surety. Thus, if one man lent another his acceptance, there was an implied promise by the borrower that he would indemnify the lender against the consequences. In this case, the statute ran, not from the time the bill or note became due, but from the time the lender of it had to pay it, irrespective of its becoming due; for at that time only was he damnified, and then only was the promise to indemnify broken (Reynolds v. Doyle, 1 M. & G. 753).

In all actions of contract, the gist of the action was the breach of the contract, not any resulting or collateral damage, which might be thereby occasioned. In the last instances, arising on contracts of guarantee and indemnity, there was, no doubt, damage sustained by the sureties, and by the person indemnified in the latter instance. But the damage sustained was not the result of the contract. If the surety was not called on to pay for his principal—if the co-surety was not required to contribute more than his share—if the person who lent his acceptance was never called on to take up his bill—there was no breach of contract at all. It was the very fact of their being damnified which entitled them to be indemnified, and gave them a right of action.

Since, then, in actions of contract, the gist of the action was the breach of the contract, and not the consequential damage, the statute ran from the breach. It followed that, although the consequential damages were sustained by the plaintiff within six years, his action was barred if the contract was broken at a period beyond the six years. As illustrative of this principle, two cases might be referred to:—In the case of Short v. M'Carthy, 3 B. & Ald. 626, the plaintiff sued the defendant for that he did not diligently and sufficiently search at the Bank of England to ascertain whether certain stock was standing in the names of certain persons, having been employed as an attorney to do so. The omission to search took place more than six years before the action was brought, although it was not discovered by the plaintiff till within the six years. The plaintiff had bought the interest of a person who had no right to sell, and had paid £340. The statute being pleaded by the defendant, it was held that it ran from the time of his breach of duty in not searching, and not from the time the plaintiff was damnified by finding that he got nothing for his money. The other case was that of Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259, in which the defendant, the attorney, had not used due diligence in ascertaining whether a mortgage would be a sufficient security for the plaintiff's money. The insufficiency of the security was not discovered until after six years had elapsed from the time the transaction had been settled; and on the plaintiff suing for the negligence, and the defendant pleading the statute, it was held that the cause of action arose at the time the defendant broke his contract to use due care and diligence, and, consequently, that the action was barred. The same doctrine that the statute ran from the breach of contract pervaded all the cases (see also the cases of Battley v. Faulkner, 3 B. & Ald. 288 and Bree v. Holbeck, 2 Douglas Rep. 654). In the latter case, Lord Mansfield threw out a suggestion to the effect that fraud might take the case out of the statute. By fraud was here meant fraud practised by the defendant in order to prevent the plaintiff from discovering his cause of action. The point was raised indirectly in several subsequent cases at common law, but was never directly decided until recently, in the case of Hunter v. Gibbons, 1 Hurl. & Norman, 459. The remedy of the plaintiff was, as stated in that case, in equity; as to the nature of which, and the circumstances in which it would be given, reference must be made to the case of the South Sea Company v. Wymondsell, 3 P. Wms. 143.

With regard, then, to those causes of action, the remedy for which by suit was barred by the six years' limitation, it would be easy to recollect that they were of two sorts:—

1. Causes of action arising from torts to real and personal property. 2. Causes of action arising from simple contract.

1. Torts to real property here meant injuries to the property itself, not injuries to the right of property trespass:—quare cl. freg., or trespass for mesne profits, were torts to real property in the former sense, and in that which involved a six years' limitation. Similar in its nature to the action of trespass for mesne profits, usually brought after a judgment on ejectment, was the action for arrears of dower, or damages on account of such arrears. This was usually an action on the case for keeping the doweress out of possession, and therefore an action quasi ex delicto, or of tort, in which, by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 41, six years' arrears only could be recovered. With personal property, again, were included detinue and trover, replevin and trespass de bonis asportatis, or case for carrying away goods, the count usually joined with trespass quare clausum fregit.

2. Causes of action arising from contract might be said to include all the claims one man might have against another, which were not founded on a specialty, for which there was a twenty years' limitation.

The 3rd section of the statute of James mentioned actions of debt, for arrearages of rent. This was, of course, debt on simple contract; for if the demise were by deed, the limitation was twenty years. The 42nd section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, which enacted that not more than six years' arrears of rent or interest in respect of money charged on land should be recovered, extended these words to all actions whatever, but did not overrule the previous sections prescribing the twenty years' limitation in actions on specialties; so that, where the contract was by specialty, arrears of rent or interest for twenty years might be recovered (Puget v. Foley, 2 Bing. N. C. 679; Strachan v. Thomas, 12 Ad. & Ell. 536).

There being, then, two sorts of causes of action to which the six years' limitation was applicable, it was easy to recollect—

1. That the cause of action in all cases of tort arose the instant the plaintiff received the injury complained of; for instance, it arose at once from a wrongful entry on his land, or a wrongful conversion of his goods; and 2. That in all cases of contract the cause of action arose when the contract was broken.

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION—NINTH GENERAL MEETING.

FEBRUARY 23rd, 1857.

Mr. Serjeant WOOLRYCH took the chair, at eight o'clock. Among those present were—Mr. W. Hawes, Mr. D. Power, Mr. Edgar, Mr. Elliott, Mr. E. Webster, Mr. Howell, Mr. Aspland, Mr. F. Hill, Mr. Tudor, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Reed, Mr. Linklater, Mr. C. Webster, Mr. Twamley, Mr. Manning, Mr. Fisher, &c.

The following new members were ballotted for, and elected: The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor; Samuel Pope, Esq.; Edward Nugent Ayrton, Esq.

Mr. EDGAR read a report of the Partnership Law Committee, on a resolution lately brought before the society by Mr. E. Lawrance on the laws now in force relative to the winding up of the estates of joint-stock companies. The report proceeded to state under what acts of Parliament the different species of joint-stock companies may be wound up, and gave the effect of the different enactments. With reference to the interests of creditors in cases where the winding up of a company is in Chancery, under the 11 & 12 Vict. and 12 & 13 Vict., the property becomes vested in the official manager, who is the nominee of the shareholders, and in whose appointment or proceedings the creditors have no voice, the control of the estate being thus taken from them. The estate was liable to be seized at the instance and for the exclusive benefit of creditors obtaining judgment, and the registering of judgments so obtained entitles the creditor to preference by affecting the title to real and leasehold estates of the company. There is no power to defeat fraudulent preferences or other unfair dealings with the property of the debtors. The winding up of an insolvent company under these acts is a quasi bankruptcy, without the incidents of bankruptcy. With reference to the interests of shareholders, where the winding up is under the 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 111, or under the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 45, and 12 & 13 Vict. cap. 108, there is no protection to shareholders or their property against the executions of creditors, however numerous, even where the shareholders may be willing to pay far more than their just proportion towards the liabilities of the company. Shareholders are therefore compelled to seek the protection of the bankrupt laws, or are induced to make away with their property and leave the country. In cases where the winding up is under the Joint-Stock Companies' Act, 1856, shareholders will only be liable under sections 61, 62, and 63. A company registered under that act being constituted a corporation, the shareholders are not liable to creditors, and cannot be reached by any proceedings on the part of the latter. It was obvious to the committee that the mode of winding up under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, is by far the most advantageous both to shareholders and creditors. How far the division of jurisdictions, which that act provides, is necessary or expedient, was a question well worthy of consideration. The committee recommended that the winding up provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, should, with additional powers to creditors and shareholders, be extended to all trading companies—That, in order to insure equal distribution of assets, and to prevent undue pressure upon shareholders after an order for winding up, no proceedings should be taken by any shareholder except by leave of the court—That the court should have power, on sufficient cause being shown, to arrest the person or attach the estate of any shareholder who should be proved to be intending to abscond or to make away with his property—That the court should have authority to direct the registration of a petition as a lis pendens against the estate of any shareholder. If it should be thought expedient, instead of enacting the larger measure indicated by the preceding resolutions, to amend the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, provision might be made for the administration of an estate in bankruptcy, when the bankruptcy is subsequent to the appointment of the official manager, and also for allowing the creditors to nominate a representative in any winding up, and to provide for the protection of shareholders and for equal distribution of assets.

Mr. EDGAR moved that the report be adopted, and remarked that it was of extreme importance that the Legislature should at once pass some measure for carrying into effect the suggestions made by the committee.

Mr. E. LAWRANCE seconded the motion, and alluded to the case of the Royal British Bank, as showing the necessity of some alteration in the existing law.

Mr. LINKLATER also supported the resolution, which was carried nem. con.

Mr. Serjeant Woolrych then left the chair, which was taken by Mr. Edgar, and the learned Serjeant proceeded to read a paper on official trustees.

This paper was referred to the council and ordered to be printed.

The meeting adjourned till Monday next, the 2nd of March, when Mr. E. Nugent Ayrton will read a paper on a mode of giving an indefeasible title to land.

Juridical Society.

The following is an abridgement of the conclusion of the Rev. Mr. Maurice's paper on the moral grounds of the distinction between law and equity:—

"The struggles for existence in Henry the Second's time brought to light, along with the monstrous claim of the clergy to be exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals, the assertion that there is a justice to which kings themselves must bow, along with the passionate efforts of the monarch to establish his own will, a most precious defence of his position as the representative of the whole nations, and the equal judge of all classes of persons within it. The position of the Anglo-Norman King is so closely associated with the idea of equity as distinguished from merely literal or positive law, that I cannot tell whether it is not from the study of this distinction that our knowledge of his functions and his authority is best derived. We have seen that Aristotle was obliged to associate justice and equity with just and equitable men, even when he most desired to view them abstractedly or to connect them with the state. The vagueness which belonged to Cicero's beautiful conception of equity could not be removed, much as he desired to escape from it, because it was impossible for him to consider political justice as embodied in a person without violating all his republican traditions. How much he felt this perplexity—how much he traced it in his most eminent countrymen—his frequent appeals to the republic sufficiently prove. The catastrophe of the republic showed that the necessity for the sway of a single man, which was reluctantly inferred by the noblest citizens, was one from which th re was no escape. But the catastrophe of the empire was surely as decisive a witness that if this single man were a god-gerant of a world, he must effectually stifle all the desires and hopes which had called him into existence. How could they be satisfied? Blackstone tells us that the practice of the Court of Equity is derived from the clerical chancellors. I have no doubt he is right in the charges which he brings against them, as having set up their own notions of what was equitable against law, and that legal chancellors may have done a great service by introducing a more even rule. But it is, surely, not an unimportant reflection that these clerical chancellors were regarded as keepers of the king's conscience. However ill some of them may have performed that task, the fact that the king was regarded as the fountain of equity, because a conscience was believed to be present at his decisions, or to pronounce them in his name, is one of the most pregnant of all facts; one that explains some of the most interesting points of our history; one that receives light from the opinions of moralists, and throws back a light upon them; one which shows how much deeper and more real the faith which is written in the heart of a nation, and is developed by its actual experience, is, than all the speculations of philosophers, of divines, and of jurists. I know how easy it is to speak of this faith as a fiction. Nay, fictitious it might no doubt become; a fiction it may have been from the first in the hearts of many kings and chancellors. As they laboured to keep it alive, feeling it to be a fiction, for certain purposes of theirs, or to procure respect for their authority, they will have done what in them lay to make the moral feeling of the nation fictitious, and, with her, suffered the just recompense of being incapable of living except in a fiction themselves. But the doctrine itself was a protest against fiction—was the witness that there is an eternal truth to which every one, in his own practice, owes homage, the acknowledgment and perception of which is the security of the throne as well as of the law. It went far beyond Aristotle's notion of equity, not only providing for the feebleness of the law, but asserting Aristotle's great principle that equity deals with particulars of which literal law cannot take notice. The conscience in each of us assuredly takes cognizance of particulars, not of generalities. It has to do with one's acts and circumstances, at each moment, not with some imaginary or possible acts or circumstances in which another might find himself. It cuts through letters, not to find excuses and indulgencies, but to ascertain obligations. At the same time, it confesses these obligations to be contained in laws which are of universal import, and which it cannot twist or contract to suit any purposes or notions of its own. If there is such an equity as the Stagyrite spoke of, there must be such an organ as this through which it makes itself known. If there is an equity for nations as well as individuals, our ancestors cannot have been wrong in assuming that there must be a national conscience. And Cicero would also have felt that the doctrine thus impressed upon our institutions supplied the defects in his idea of law and justice. It would do so most imperfectly if it recognised a monarch as the depositary of law and justice; for he supposes that law must have provided some perfect commanding reason, and must also have that which responds to it in the nature of man. But when the king is reminded that all his acts are inconsistent and monstrous, except as he recognises obedience to a law of rights which is not a dead law, but is perfectly embodied and livingly administered, which will make itself good both against king and subjects, which can use both as its instrument, the Republican Equity and the Imperial appear to have each their justification.

These principles asserted themselvs through the conflicts of orders in our country during the ages before the Reformation.

One cannot attribute to that event a change in the relation of the king and the priest, so far as the keeping of the conscience was concerned. Sir Thomas More, the lawyer and the enemy of Protestants, had accepted the office of Chancellor without scruple, not feeling that he was breaking any tradition, or, perhaps, being aware that the old practice could not any longer be maintained. But, in another way, the Reformation had a great effect upon the feeling, among moralists as well as among the people, respecting law and equity. The distinction between a righteousness, which is merely according to law, and a high righteousness belonging to the new dispensation, was never so vehemently asserted before. But it appeared as if they belonged to different classes of persons; as if formal law was for mankind at large, the more perfect righteousness, though needful for all men, only intended for some. Hence it could never be the ground of national instruction, or expressed in the national jurisprudence. When such an opinion prevails, equity begins to be regarded as a mitigation of the rigour of the law for certain persons, not as expressive of the very intent and purposes of the law. The king is rather relied upon as one who had the prerogative of pardoning certain transgressions, than as representing the conscience which acknowledges the right whether it is favourable or unfavourable to particular persons, whether it is more or less severe than the decree of the lawgiver. A notion so feeble as this must be unacceptable to all accurate thinkers, to whatever school they may belong. It is worth while to observe, how it affected these men of the most dissimilar characters and tendencies, and to what different conclusions respecting the nature and worth of equity it conducted them. Richard Hooker speaks of this in his 5th Book.

The reverend reader read the passage at length, and continued:—Hooker's doctrine you will perceive is little more than an expression of Aristotle. Law is with him as with the Greek the assertor of universal maxims; Equity the rectification of it, because it descends to special cases. But he as little as Aristotle could tolerate this notion, that equity is merely a more indulgent law. John Selden lived in a very different atmosphere from Hooker. Those against whom the divine had reasoned were, in the latter days of the accomplished antiquary and lawyer, victorious. He had been tormented with their notion of an ecclesiastical supremacy which was to ride over the law and the state, as he had been before tormented in his earlier days by similar pretensions proceeding from another quarter, and taking another form. Nothing seemed to him so desirable as to assert law in its literal strictness, and to mock at the attempts which were made, under one plea or another, to set it aside and explain it away. Therefore he writes in his "Table Talk," words with which, I doubt not, many of you are familiar: "Equity in law is the same that the spirit is in religion, what every one pleases to make it. Sometimes they go according to conscience, sometimes according to law, sometimes according to the rule of Court. Equity is a roguish thing. For law we have a measure—know what to trust to. Equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. It is all one as if they should make the standard for the measure that we call a foot, a Chancellor's foot. What an uncertain measure would this be. One Chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot. It is the same thing in the Chancellor's conscience." But by far the most important writer for the illustration of the whole subject is, I think, the Philosopher of Malmesbury. No one had ever the imperial notion so strongly rooted in his mind as Hobbes; no one set himself so resolutely to destroy the difference between the Emperor and the Gothic or Christian King. All equity is with him absorbed into authority; authority is a mere synonyme of power. Lex is the decree which goes forth from one who can command; jus is what is left to a man which lex has not taken from him. Extract from Greek, Roman, English lawgivers, judges, and moralists, everything which appertains to the idea of a conscience, and the residuum is the doctrine of the Leviathan. Any amount of religion is compatible with this doctrine, provided it is the religion of fear, not of trust. Any kind of government is compatible with this doctrine, provided that government is absolute, and confesses no obligations due from it to the subject, or from the subject to it. One is curious to know how the idea of law and equity would present itself to such a thinker. In his able dialogue between a lawyer and a philosopher on the common law, he handles it in these words:—"Lawyer: How would you have a law defined? Philosopher: Thus; A law is the command of him or them that have the sovereign power, given to them that are his or their subjects, declaring publicly and plainly what every of them may do, and what they must forbear to do. Lawyer: Seeing all judges in all courts ought to judge according to equity, which is the law of reason, a distinct court of equity seemeth to me to be unnecessary and a burden to the people, since common law and equity are the same law. Philosopher: It were so, indeed, if judges could not err. But since they may err, and that the King is not bound to any other law than that of equity, it belongs to him alone to give a remedy to them that, by the ignorance or corruption of a judge, shall suffer damage." Equity, according to this able and consistent writer, is not in any sense a qualification or weakening of the command which has gone forth from the lips of the utterer of law. It is that command coming forth with greater completeness and determination from the absolute judge, whose decrees express the fate by which gods and men are bound, who is the head of that great huge monster, "the flakes of whose flesh are joined together, all firm in themselves that they cannot be moved, whose heart is as firm as a stone,—yea, hard as a piece of the nether millstone," a creature with no life or freedom or natural movement, which, according to Hobbes, has taken its pastime in the waters of our world for some thousands of years, and which one hopes may one day sink, and be lost in them altogether. But though I cannot acquiesce in either Hooker's, or Selden's, or Hobbes' view of this subject as decisive and satisfactory, each, it seems to me, teaches us something which the other does not teach, and which we should not forget. Selden's protest against a moveable equity and a moveable conscience is surely of the highest worth. If either equity or conscience means what he supposed it to mean, the sooner we have done with them the better. And as we cannot get rid of them, as they force themselves upon us in every experience of our lives, and in every page of history, the more pains we take to find out what is their true meaning and their true relation to each other, the more we are likely to deliver ourselves from the counterfeits of both, which are not less injurious in our day than they were in Selden's.

Again, with respect to Hobbes, though I cannot think his imperial doctrine is at all a good exchange for that regal doctrine which is embodied in the English constitution—though I hope we shall never become worshippers of naked power, but shall always cultivate in ourselves a hatred and contempt of it—I yet would be far from denying the twofold service which he has rendered us, first, in showing us that there must be a dependence in all the different parts of the commonwealth upon each other; secondly, in shewing how dreadful the necessity of such a dependence would be if the parts of it were merely united artificially together—if no great moral principle caused them to cohere. You must not wonder if Blackstone's language, about law and equity being both purely artificial systems, makes those who reverence both and feel the unspeakable necessity of both, tremble lest such a notion should ever pervade the minds of the members of his profession, or of Englishmen generally. For certainly it is the existence of the opposite notion to that—of a very deep and settled belief that law and equity have both their foundation in principles of morality and reason, and that each sustains the other—positive decrees implying a justice or equity which they can but imperfectly express—equity continually referring back to fixed letters and forms as a witness against the caprice of judges and rulers, and as a protection from it—has been the strength of the English character, has given a stability to our nation which nothing else could give. This belief has found various ways of expressing itself; some of them have become quite unmeaning and obsolete. But that which they embodied does not perish when they perish. It may become stronger by being freed from the restraint which they imposed upon it. As the thought of a keeper of a sovereign's conscience is lost, the idea of a national conscience, which the sovereign embodies, of which every inferior functionary who acts for him is the guardian, which every man does something to make clearer or darker, more pure or more corrupt, may be fully working itself out. How the idea of a national equity and a national conscience may unfold itself in countries where there is no one visible head—especially how this can be effected among people of our own race—is one of the deeply interesting problems which our Transatlantic children must solve, and which, no doubt, some of their accomplished jurists are assisting them to solve.

And, to speak of our own country, with which we are chiefly concerned, I apprehend that the distinction between law and equity is upheld in many other ways than by the separation of the courts bearing those names—a separation which some of you may think it expedient to abolish. The rude equity of country magistrates, the irregular equity of courts martial, has served, and may serve, to keep up the sense of the justice, which, as Bracton says, rests in the breast of the just man, even as the wrongs which proceed from these tribunals drive us back to those of a more organised character, and make us rejoice in the severity of their rules. Nothing, I am sure, is truer than the assertion that a very high equity may be found in the courts of law; that there, also, men are continually asserting their right to penetrate through the letter of documents to the spirit which is contained in them. It is not for the purpose of disputing these assertions, or from a presumptuous wish to meddle with questions which are entirely out of my sphere, that I have ventured to put together a string of what may appear to some of you truisms, or, to some, exploded fallacies. It is because I am sure that the more we connect the details of all our professions with great moral principles which concern us as men, the more we shall understand each other, the more we shall do the work which is given us to do for the whole land.

The annual meeting of this Society took place on Monday evening last, when the Hon. Baron Bramwell, the president for the past year, delivered an address on the objects and prospects of the Society. He congratulated its members upon the very great success which had attended its operations, referring particularly to the reputation which its published transactions had acquired not only amongst the profession in this country, but on the continent and in America.

Among the new members whose election was announced, were the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Channell.

VOTES AND MINUTES OF THE HOUSE.

Earl STANHOPE moved that a select committee be appointed to consider whether any, and if so, what improvements can be effected in the printing of the minutes and journals of the House, and especially as to putting upon record both the numbers and the names of peers who take part in the divisions. As one among several instances adduced of the value of the system he proposed, his lordship alluded to perhaps the most remarkable scene which had occurred either in this or the other House of Parliament—what was generally called the dying scene of Lord Chatham. There was in existence a letter of Lord Camden describing this scene, in which it was said that all the peers put on the appearance of distress, with the exception of a certain Lord M., who seemed entirely unmoved. On reference to the journals of the House, it was shown that two Earls of M. were present (Lord Marchmont and Lord Mansfield), and the noble and learned lord (Lord Campbell) had clearly proved that the peer referred to was Lord Chief Justice Mansfield. This showed the value of records of the House in an historical point of view.

Lord GRANVILLE concurred in the expediency of the motion; which was agreed to.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, at the request of Lord Lyndhurst, postponed the second reading to Tuesday, the 3rd of March.

Lord CAMPBELL protested against a clause which had been added to the bill, allowing the dissolution of marriages without the intervention of any legal tribunal; and stated that he should feel it his duty to oppose such an alarming provision.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this bill. He said it was intended to remedy an evil which had been cried out against for many years as arising from the numerous petty jurisdictions (for the most part ecclesiastical) existing throughout the country in regard to the granting of probates of wills and letters of administration. There were no fewer than a hundred different courts which exercised this jurisdiction, besides which there were other courts whose jurisdiction was rather of a theoretical than a practical character. There was the Prerogative Court of Canterbury sitting in London, and the Prerogative Court of York sitting at York, each of which exercised in its own province a certain jurisdiction in cases where the deceased possessed property out of the locality over which the jurisdiction of the inferior court extended. That was a state of things which in practice was found to be extremely inconvenient. It was obviously inconvenient that the next representative of a person dying in Lancashire, for instance, should not know, as regarded third parties, whether the probate should be taken out in Lancashire or at the Prerogative Court at York. Another grievance in the constitution of these courts was, that they all possessed contentious jurisdiction. There was a great number of other small matters requiring remedy, but he would content himself with referring to two points, the inconvenient multiplication of small courts throughout the country, and the cumbrous mode of procedure in the larger court in London. In the first place, he proposed to abolish all the existing courts; because, supposing the present Prerogative Court to be as perfect as its greatest admirers could wish, still he thought it was the general opinion that the court should be her Majesty's Court of Probate, and not the court of any ecclesiastical authority. He, therefore, proposed to abolish all local jurisdictions, and to constitute one Queen's Court of Probate, reserving the question of who was to be judge for future consideration. As he did not see where the present practice of the prerogative court could be improved, he proposed that it should be adopted, giving the judge power to make new rules when they might be necessary. In order to exclude all suspicion that patronage had anything to do with legislation, he intended that the whole of the present staff of the prerogative Court should retain their offices, subject only to the usual reasons for retirement. But the great change he proposed was that, instead of having disputed questions of fact tried in the present imperfect mode, they should be decided by oral evidence taken before a judge, or an issue sent before a jury. With regard to matters of detail, they should all be left to the judge; but, with regard to the great questions, he proposed that they should be dealt with in the well-known constitutional mode —namely, by the issue to be tried on the circuit; so that it would have the advantage at once of the intellect of the judge and the common sense of the jury. He proposed that all non-contested matters should be left where they now were, and that they should be confined to the proctors and advocates of the courts. This part of the plan would, no doubt, create great difference of opinion, mainly on account of the exorbitant fees alleged to be charged by the proctors. Compensation had been suggested, but the case of the six clerks showed what exorbitant sums might be paid under that arrangement; he therefore proposed that the proper authority should have power to reduce the fees. When they came to contentious business, he proposed that the cases should be thrown open to the profession generally. He intended to abolish all the district and diocesan courts, but to retain the district offices for the registration of uncontested wills. The number of districts would be thirty-six, instead of twenty-seven, as at present. Uncontested wills he proposed should be filed in the district, and a list sent up every fortnight to London; and in case of small wills contested, say under £200, he proposed that jurisdiction should be given to the county courts. With regard to personal and real estate, he proposed that, in case of dispute, the inheritor of real estate should be cited before the Court of Probate. He proposed also that there should be a place of security in London in which wills might be deposited during the life of the testator. There only remained for him to justify the appointment of the judge of the new court. He did not propose to transfer the probate jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, but merely to give to one of the Vice-Chancellors of that court the office of judge of the Court of Probate. This was doing no more than what had already been done in the case of bankruptcy jurisdiction, in which, up to the time of the appointment of the Lords Justices, one of the Vice-Chancellors had acted as a Court of Review. He would proceed at once to state why he selected a Vice-Chancellor as judge. The judge of the Prerogative Court sat for the disposal of non-contentious business twenty-five times—or, at the outside, thirty times—during the year, and the average length of these sittings was two hours each. At other times the judge was occupied in deciding contentious cases, in which, having to wade through long masses of written evidence, great length of time was necessarily occupied. All this would, however, be swept away, and there would be only left to the judge the one contentious business, and the duty of deciding, where a verdict was unsatisfactory, upon the granting a new trial. There being, then, a necessity for a new judge whose duties would be thus light, the question was, to whom should those official duties be given? There was only a choice between one of the vice-chancellors and a common law judge. Between these two personages there did not seem to him room for a moment's hesitation. The common law judge had to go on circuit twice, and would not improbably soon have to go thrice a-year, while the Vice-Chancellor was constantly on the spot. He ought to state that no extra salary or privileges would be bestowed upon the Vice-Chancellor. The power of granting new trials he proposed to vest in the Vice-Chancellor. In cases of misdirection, no doubt a court of common law would be better enabled to judge of the necessity of granting a new trial, but these were not the kind of cases which would be likely to arise. In any other case the care and attention which the judges of the Court of Chancery habitually gave to the question of the granting of new trials, would render the Vice-Chancellor a competent and proper person to exercise the discretion of granting or withholding the right of further proceedings. His lordship gave a history of previous attempts at legislation on this subject, stating that he had endeavoured to avoid the less satisfactory portions of those attempts, and concluded by moving the second reading of the bill.

Lord ST. LEONARDS complained of the perpetual changes of intention which were manifested in these measures. First, the jurisdiction was to be given to equity; then there was to be a separate court; and now they came back to the original idea, with but little variation, for a judge of an equity court was to take the probate cases. When the idea was first started of giving this jurisdiction to courts of equity he had opposed it; but at the same time urged, that, if given, it should be given to one judge only, so he did now. The present equity system was working admirably; but he feared that the introduction of new duties might derange its working, and hence his opposition. Besides, there now existed a competent judge of a testamentary court: if his office were destroyed, he must be compensated. He could not understand why the judge of the Prerogative Court was to be allowed to spend his days in retirement, his pay being continued, and a Vice-Chancellor appointed to do his work in addition to his own. His noble and learned friend proposed to take from heirs-at-law of real estate in this country a right which they had hitherto always possessed—the right to have the validity of a will tried by issue. This was a vested right, which belonged to them by the law of England; and he trusted that such persons would always be in a position to say that they would not yield up real estate till a jury of their countrymen had decided against them. [The Lord Chancellor intimated that the bill would not have that effect.] He (Lord St. Leonards) had read the bill carefully, and that was the construction he put upon it. As to the extension of probate of real estate, he observed, that if they consented to that, they might rest assured that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, in addition to the succession duty, favour them with a probate duty on real estate. He would never agree that where there was no contention the heir-at-law should be called in as a party to a suit with regard to the testator's real estate. It must be remembered that those who were interested in the personal estate were seldom entitled to the realty. With regard to the thirty-six district courts, he would be glad to be informed what compensation was to be paid, and what would be the amount of the salaries. Even though the business were non-contentious, the duties to be performed would often be very important; and it was desirable to ascertain whether the registrars were to be simple clerks, or men of experience and capacity. In different parts of the country, where there were neither proctors nor judge, the registrars would be called upon to perform, in many respects, the duties of both; and the more the district courts were multiplied the more mischief might they inflict. He regretted to be obliged to differ from his noble and learned friend, but he would be happy to render any assistance in his power in endeavouring to make it acceptable to the country.

Lord LYNDHURST said, that in consequence of there being only a few peers present, he should postpone his remarks till the measure was more advanced.

Lord CAMPBELL said he was not at all satisfied with the measure before the House, the sum and substance of which was that where there was a contested probate the case was to become a Chancery-suit. The operation of the bill would be this: when the case came before the Vice-chancellor, he would first have to see whether there was ground for an issue or not, which he would ascertain by means of affidavits, or of viva voce evidence. If he thought there was sufficient ground, an issue would be directed accordingly; and, after the matter had been before a jury, it would come back to him, and he would say whether he were satisfied or not. After that, there might be an appeal to the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices, which would be argued, like any other appeal, in the Court of Chancery; and lastly, an appeal to that House. He did not believe that mode of proceeding would be at all better than the present state of things, under which there was first the proceedings in the Prerogative Court, and then an appeal from that Court to the Committee of Council, whose judgment was final. Much as he (Lord Campbell) might value the Court of Chancery, he did not wish to see the Court of Probate, any more than the courts of common law, absorbed by that court. His noble and learned friend would do well to recollect that the Court of Chancery was by no means so popular that its absorbing power was likely to be viewed with favour by the public. If he wished—as he was sure he did—to see the professed object of the bill carried out, let him abjure the intention to make the Court of Chancery the Court of Probate, and propose to establish a new Queen's Court independent of the Court of Chancery. He trusted that the bill would be greatly improved in committee, and that the present session would not pass away without witnessing the accomplishment of the object.

Lord WENSLEYDALE said, in the principle of the provisions, with respect to the appointment of registrars to do all the preliminary work, he entirely concurred; and he thought all the details of the measure might be fitly reserved for consideration in committee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR wished to say a few words in explanation on one or two points. He had never intended to deprive an heir-at-law of his right to have the validity of a will disinheriting him tested by the verdict of a jury; and if there was anything in the bill to that effect, he would be ready to alter it. As to the appeal, the reason why he proposed to make it to their Lordships' House instead of to the Privy Council, was, that there might be cases in which real estate was involved as well as personal, and he doubted whether their Lordships would be satisfied to have appeals on the subject of the freehold inheritance of land in this kingdom referred to the Privy Council. He would not discuss the other objections, including the question as to the judge, as he thought they were all matters for the committee. He did not think he would have been justified in proposing the appointment of a new judge, when the work could very well be done by one of those at present existing.

The bill was then read a second time.

LAW OF LIBEL AS APPLICABLE TO REPORTS.

Lord CAMPBELL, in proposing the resolutions of which he had given notice, observed that a decision had recently been given by the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the question whether or not a true report of the proceedings of what was called a public meeting, in which statements were made reflecting upon the character of an individual, was privileged, or whether the newspaper which published the report was not amenable to the law of libel. That decision had been severely criticised. It was urged that the court ought to have held that a faithful report of such proceedings was privileged, however libellous, and that it was sufficient to give a remedy as against the speaker of the libel. That doctrine was said to be founded upon the case of the Earl of Northampton, as reported in Coke; but that decision was entirely extra-judicial. It was the dictum of certain lords, who were members of the Star Chamber, in reference to oral statements, and went merely to say that if a man simply repeated a verbal accusation as having been made by another person, he was not liable. To suppose that the publication of all proceedings of public meetings was privileged—whether libellous or not—would be most alarming. If such a doctrine were laid down, the publication of sedition might be held lawful, nor would there be any safety for private character, for a man might then get up at one of these meetings and calumniate his neighbour, knowing that his statements would be made public. At the same time, there ought unquestionably to be a privilege extended to journalists in doing that which was for the public benefit. If there were no reports published of the debates in either House of Parliament, their lordships and the members of the other House would probably feel dissatisfied, while the public would suffer a great inconvenience. As the law stood, the fairness and impartiality of such reports, however, did not protect the newspapers that published them from the operation of the law of libel on account of any libellous statements they might contain. Without going so far as to say that the reports of all public meetings ought to be privileged in the same way, there were meetings of a public character, from the publication of whose proceedings
