There is a rule in the common lawe, that in nouo casu nouum remedium est apponendum. Et concordent clerici de breue faciundo, ita quod nullus recedat à Cancellaria sine remedio: for the Chaucery is properly officina iustitie et aquitatis; where all original writs (which in auncient times were the grounds of all suites; are deuised and framed. And these clerici were graue and auncient men; skilfull, and long experienced in the course of the Chaucerie; and called 'clerici de prima forma:' and of late time 'magistri Cancellariae;' who in new and strange cases, besides their owne knowledge and experience, had oftentimes conference with the graue iudges for the deuising and framing of new writtes when neede requir- ed. And this I take to bee the same which is in the statute W. 2, cap. 24, [St. W. 2, cap. 24, anno 13 Ed. 1.] 'Et quotiescunque de cæ- tero euencrit in Cancellaria, quod in vno casu reperitur breue, et in consimili casu, ca- dente sub eodem iure et simili indigente reme- dio, non reperitur, concordent clerici de Can- cellaria in breui faciundo, vel attinent quereptes in proximum parliamentum: et scribantur casus in quibus concordare non possunt, et referant eos ad proximum parlia- mentum: et de consensu iurisperitorum fiat breue, ne contingat de cætero, quod curia regis deficiat conquerentibus in iusticia perqui- renda.'

Wherein I note these three things. First, the clerkes are to agree; and if they agree, that is an end, and standes for lawe, and then no referment to the parliament. Second, if the clerkes agree not, and so the case be referred to the parliament; then 'de consensu iurisperitorum fiat breue,' so 'consensus iurisperitorum' is the rule, and not the multitude of vulgar opinions. The third is, that iustice faile not them which complaine; which will often faile, if you stay vntill a parliament; for parliaments are not to be called for the wrong of a few priuate subiects, but for the great and vrgent affaires of the king and the realme.

I finde also a like rule in the ciuile lawe; 'vbi non est directa lex standum est arbitrio iudicis, vel producendum ad similia.' And another saith, 'de similibus ad similia iudicium et arguematatio recipiuntur.'

4. Besides these, there is another generall and certaine rule in the ciuile lawe, which I reserue to the last parte of that which I meane to speake in this matter.—So, leauing that vnto a more proper place, I will hereupon conclude, that if there bee no former iudgements, nor examples, nor precedents to bee found, then 'concordia clericorum, et arbitrium iudicium' is to seeke out the true and solide reason; and thereupon to ground their iudgements in all new cases: for it was truly saide by a learned gentleman of the lower house, 'deficiente lege recurrendum est ad consuetudinem: deficientis

'consuetudine recurrendum ad rationem.' And so from the iudges we shall haue responsa prudentum to decide all such new cases and questions. And according to this rule, all such new doubts and questions haue bene resolu'd and decided by the graue iudges in former times.

But here, before I proceede further, I am to make a suite, which is this:—That whatsoever I haue spoken, or shall happen to speake of the ciuile lawe; or whatsoever I shall cite out of any writer of that law, I pray fauor of my masters that professe it. I acknowledge that lawe to be auuncient and generall in many parts of the world; and I reuerence the professors of it, as men of great learning, wisdom, and iudgement. I professe it not; I haue learned little of it; but in that little I haue found that in the reall and essentiall partes of iustice, the ciuile and common lawe doe in many things concurre, though they differ much in the forme and manner of proceeding. And that which I shall haue occasion to produce of that lawe, will bee to shew how the common law and ciuile doe agree in one reason and iudgement in those things which I shall speake of.

Yet I must take libertie to say, that neither in Spaine, nor in France (those two great monarchies) it is not generally receiued nor allowed as a concluding and binding law.—They take there the reason of it onlie as a direction to their proceeding and iudgement: but to produce or alleadge it as a concluding or binding law, was no lesse than capitis pena.

This I make not of my selfe; for, besides common practice and experience, I haue an honest and substantiall witness, master Adam Blacwood a Scottishman, a man of singular learning in the ciuile lawe, who defendeth in like manner the lawes of Scotland, [Blacwood cap. 10.] as appeareth in his learned booke intituled, Pro Regibus Apologia, written by him against a seditious Dialogue or Libell made by George Buchanan, De Iure Regni apud Scotos, where he tells him, aliud sceptrum, aliud plectrum. But it is not amisse to recite his owne words, which are thus; 'Philippus cognomen-
'to Pulcher, cum Lutetia: supremæ iurisdictionis curiam institueret, eam Romano iure

'manarum legum auctoritatem vel in foro laudarent, vel in puluere scholastico profiterentur. Sed si quid occurreret patrijs legibus ac moribus indefinitum quod iudicanti religionem adferret, vnicum erat eximend. scrupulo regis consulendi remedium. Alaricus Tolosæ regnans, idem Gothis imperauit, vt si quis aduersus ipsius leges ciuile Romanorum ius citaret, temerè factum morte lueretur.'

Now to returne to that which I haue touched before, I say, that when there is no direct lawe, nor precise example, we must 'recurrere ad rationem, et ad responsa prudentum:' for, although 'quod non lego, non credo,' may bee a true and certaine rule in diuinitie; yet for interpretation of lawes, it is not alwaies so: for wee must distinguish betweene 'fidem moralem,' and 'fidem diuinam,' or else wee shall confound many things in the ciuile and politike gouernement of kingdomes and states. For, the first precedent, which wee haue now, had no precedent when it began; but as Tacitus saith, 'quæ nunc vetustissima creduntur noua fuerunt; et quod hodie exemplis tuemur, inter exempla futurum est.' And to those that hold, that nothing is to bee done but by former examples, Horace speaketh thus; 'O imitatores seruum pecus:' and Cicero saith, 'non exempla maiorum querenda, sed consilium est eorum à quibus exempla nata sunt explicandum.'

Thus hath iustice bene duely administred in England, and thereby the kings haue ruled, the people haue bene gouerned, and the kingdom hath flourished for many hundred yeeres; and then no such busie questionis is moued any quarrell against it.—Thus haue all doubts growing vpon Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, made in King Henry the thirds time, and vpon the statutes of Westmin. 1, Westm. 2, Westm. 3, and many other statutes made in Edw. 1. time: and vpon Prærogatiua Regis, and many o'her statutes made in Ed. 2. time, bene from time to time expounded; and so of later times, the statutes of fines, of vses, of willes, and many more.—Thus also haue all doubts and cases, whereof there was no statute or positieue lawe, bene alwaies expounded: for such are most of the cases which wee haue in our yeere-bookes, and bookes of reports, which are in effect nothing but responsa prudentum, as iustice Crooke did truely say.—Vpon this reason it is, that some lawes, as well statute lawe as common law, are obsolete and worne out of vse: for, all humane lawes are but leges temporis: and the wisdom of the iudges found them to bee vmeete for the time they liued in, although very good and necessarie for the time wherein they were made. And therefore it is saide 'leges humanæ nascuntur, vigent, et moriuntur, et habent ortum, statum, et occasum.'

By this rule also, and vpon this reason it is, that oftentimes auuncient lawes are changed by interpretation of the iudges, as well in cases criminall as ciuile.—In criminall cases the law was voluntas reputabitur pro facto; but it is not so now, sauing in treason onely.—In an appeale of mainie Britton, fol. 48, saith 'soit le iudgement, que il perde autiel member, 'come il auer tolle a le plainti'e;' but it is not so now.—In auncient time, one present, aiding, comforting, and assisting to a murder, was taken to bee no principall, but an accessorie, as it appeareth M. 40 Edw. 3, fol. 42. et 40. Li. Ass. p. 8. and p. 25. But now in that case he is iudged a principall. And so it was ruled by all the iustices M. 4 Hen. 7, 18. and so Plowden affirmeth the lawe to be, in his Commentaries fol. 99. and 100.—In ciuile causes in auncient time, the lawe was houlden, that hee in remainder in taile could not haue an action of waste, nor be receiued vpon default of tenant for life: but afterwards, the lawe was often iudged otherwise; and so is the common experience and practise at this day.—In anno 40 Edw. 3, 28. Fynchden, chiefe iustice of the Common Place, saith, that in auncient time the vicar could not haue an action against the parson; but hee saith the contrarie is vsed at this day, which is the better.—In auncient time a disseisee could not enter vpon the feoffee of the disseisor, for sauing of the warranty; but for many yeeres the lawe hath bene houlden otherwise, and so the common practise yett remaineth.

By this rule it is also, that words are taken and construed, sometimes by extension; sometimes by restriction; sometimes by implication; sometimes a disjunctiue for a copulatiue; a copulatiue for a disjunctiue; the present tense for the future; the future for the present; sometimes by equity out of the reach of the wordes; sometime words taken in a contrary sence; sometime figuratiuely, as contemns pro contento, and many other like: and of all these, examples be infinite, as well in the ciuile lawe as common lawe.

And oftentimes the reuerend iudges haue had a graue regarde in their proceeding, that before they would resolue, or giue iudgement in such new cases, they desired to consult with the kings priuie counsell; as appeareth in diuerse cases in king Edward the third his time.—R. W. assaulted Adam Brabson in presence of the iustices of assise at Winchester, [59 E. 3, li. As. p. 1.] for which A. B. complained by bill before the said iustices, alledging this offence to bee in despite of the king and his iustices, to his damage of 100*l.* R. W. pleaded, not guiltie; and was found guiltie, and damages taxed to 10*l.* Thereupon the iudges awarded him to prison in the sherifes keeping. And for the fine, and that which should be further done for the king, for the assault done in the presence of the iudges, they would haue the aduise of the kings counsell: for in a like case, [M. 19 Edw. 3, iudgement 174.] because R. C. did strike a iurour at Westminster, which passed in an enquest against one of his friends; it was adiudged by all the counsell, that his right hand should be cut off, and his lands and goods forfeited to the king. These be the words in the booke.

In this case I note three things.—1. The iudges consulted with the counsell.—2. They haue a like case before when the counsell was also consulted with, viz. anno 19 E. 3, and yet they would not proceede in this case before they had againe consulted with the counsell.—3. That before anno 19 Edw. 3, there was no like case nor precedent for such a iudgement; and therefore the iudges would not of themselues pronounce that heauy iudgement before they had conferred with the counsell touching the same. And after they had the opiniou and aduise of the kings counsell, they proceeded to that iudgement.

Thomas Vghtred knight brought a forme-done against a poore man and his wife; [M. 39 Ed. 3, 35.] they came and vielded to the demaundant, which seemed suspitious to the court: whereupon they examined the matter, and staid iudgement, because it was suspitious. And Thorpe saide, that in the like case of Giles Blackett it was spoken of in parliament: and wee were commaunded, that when any like case should come, we should not go to iudgement without good aduise. Wherefore sue to the counsell, and as they will haue vs to doo, wee will; and otherwise not, in this case.

Greene and Thorpe were sent by the iudges to the kings counsel [M. 40 Ed. 3, 34.] (where there were 24 bishops and earles) to demand them, whether by the statute 14 E. 3, ca. 6. a word may be amended in a writ, as well as a letter or a sillable; for, the statute speakes but of a letter or a sillable; and it was answered, that it may well be amended: for, there cannot be a word without a sillable; and that it was a nice question of so sage men.

Thus arbitria iudicum and responsu prudentum haue bene receiued, allowed and reuerenced in all times as positive lawe; and so it must be still; for, otherwise much mischiefe and great inconuenience will ensue. For new cases happen every day: no lawe cuer was, or cuer can be made, that can provide remedie for all future cases, or comprehend all circumstances of humane actions which iudges are to determine. Therefore, when such happen, and complaint is made; what shall iudges doe? Shall they giue no remedie to the partie grieved? Shall they stay for a parliament? Interim patitur iustus. They must therefore follow dictamen rationis; and so giue speedie iustice. And in many matters of materiall circumstances they must guide themselues by discretion.

As in iudging vpon presumptions; to discerne which be presumptiones temerariae, which probabiles, which violenta.—So for time; what is a conuenient time, and what not.—So for waste; what is waste punishable, and what not.—So for tenders of money; what is a conuenient place for tender of money, and what not: and what is a lawfull tender, and what not.—So for disparagement; what is a disparagement, and what not: and so of other the like cases, which are infinite.

If it be said (for so some haue said) that if this be thus, then the common lawe of England is vncerten; and so the rule of iustice, by which the people are gouerned, is too pliable, and too weake, and vncerten.—By the same reason it may be said, that all the lawes of all nations are vncerten: for, in the ciuile lawe, which is taken to be the most vniuersall and generall lawe in the world, they hould the same rule and order in all cases which be out of the direct words of the lawe; and such cases be infinite; for as I saide, new cases spring euery day, as malice and fraude increaseth. And since the Roman empire beganne, most of their laws bee either edicta principum, or arbitria iudicum, or responsa prudentum. And in their iudgements they are guided by arrests and former iudgements, as may appeare in the books of many that haue collected such arrests. And they attribute so much to such former iudgements, that as Prysot equalleth them to a positieue lawe, so they hould, that ‘sententia facit ius, et res iudicata pro veritate accipitur, et legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet.’—Nay (which is more vncerten) sometimes they relie vpon doctours opinions deliuered in their prelections and treatises. And when they finde them varying, and differing one from another (as sometimes they doe) then they preferre that which is communior opinio: and so in good reason they may: for, ‘pluralitas idem sententium semper superat; quia facilius inuenitur quod à pluribus quaeritur.’

But to conclude this point, I would aske of these nouelists, what they would haue done in Sibill Belknapes case, if they had liued in Henry the fourths time?

Sir Robert Belknappe, that reuerend and learned iudge, [M. 2. H. 4. 7.] of whom sundrie noble and worthy persons, and some now of great and eminent place in England, are descended, was banished out of the realme, (relegatus in Vasconiam) not for any desert or offence of his, but by the might of his potent enemies, and malice of the time. The lady his wife continued in England; she was wronged; she brought a writ in her owne name alone, not naming her husband. Exception was taken against it, because her husband was liuing; and it was adiudged good, and shee recovered; and the iudge Markeham said;

Here was a rare and a new case, yet it was not deferred vntill a parliament: it was iudged, and her wrong was righted by the common law of England, and that ‘ex arbitrio iudicum, et ex responsis prudentum;’ and yet it was counted mirum with an ecce.

Now to apply this to R. Caluines case. His case is rare and new: so was that. There is no direct law for him in precise and expresse tearmes; there was neuer iudgement before touching any borne in Scotland, since king James beganne his happie raigne in England; hee is the first that is brought in question: so there was no direct lawe for Sibill Belknap to sue in her owne name without her husband, who was then liuing; nay rather there was direct lawe against it. Yet by the lawe of England shee had iudgement to recouer with an ecce modo mirum: so by the lawe of England iudgement ought to bee giuen for Robert Caluine, but not with an ecce modo mirum; but vpon strong arguments deduced à similibus, and ex dictamine rationis.

But before I come to those arguments, I will vse a few words more touching some rules which I haue read for the interpretation of lawes.—There is a graue and learned writer in the ciuile law that setteth downe foue waies and formes of interpretation of lawes: that is, first, interpretatio historica; secondly, etymologica; thirdly, analogica; fourthly, practica.—In the argument of this case all these formes haue bene vsed, and largely handled: and the two first be those that seeme but light to me, and therefore in mine opinion haue bene too much stoude vpon, and ouerweighed.

For the historical interpretation, it is alwaies darke, obscure, and vncerten, of what kingdome, countrey, or place soener you speake; I doe alwaies and onely except the diuine histories written in the bible.—Liuy saith, ‘in tanta rerum vetustate multi temporis errores implicantur.’—Saint Augustine speaking of the supposed bookes of Henoch saith, ‘libri istius nimiam antiquitatem reiiciuntur.’—Wherefore, for this parte let this suffice, whether in the beginning there were one or severall kingdomes in Great Britaine; or one or seuerall monarches and kings of these two great and famous kingdomes in Great Britaine. The kin- our soueraigne is lawfully and lineally descended of the first great monarches and kings of both the kingdomes; [Fergus, Inas.] and that by so long a continued line of lawfull descent, as therein he exceedeth all the kings that the world now knoweth; and therefore to inquire further of historical knowledge in this case, I hould it needlesse.

For the etymological interpretation, there hath bene very much saied, euen as much as wit and art could devise. There haue bene alleddged manie definitions, descriptions, distinctiours, differences, diuisions, subdivisions, alusion of wordes, extension of wordes, construction of wordes; and nothing left vnsearched to finde what is ligeantia, allegiantia, fides, obedientia, subiectio, subditi; and who bee aborigines, indigene, alienigene, aduenticij, denisati, &c. And much of this hath bene drawne out of some writers of the ciuile lawe; amongst whome the etymological interpretation of the words ligeus, and ligeantia, is as vncerten and doubtfull, as it is with our common lawyers; and so vpon any of these there cannot be any certain rule found for iudges to iudge by, especially in new and rare cases.

As for definition, Vlpian teacheth vs, ‘omnis definitio in iure ciuili est periculosa.’ and it is said, that ‘definitio est duplex: propria, quae constat ex genere, et differentia: impropria, quae et descriptio vocatur, et est quaelibet rei designatio.’ so definition and description are often confounded, and both vncerten. Then, since both be vncerten and dangerous, I will leaue both, and seeke a more certen rule to iudge by.

As for etymologie of words, I agree with him which saith, it is 'leuis et fallax, et plerumque 'ridicula.' It is a pedant grammarians fault. Marcus Varro and others haue bene noted for it. And if you examine the examples which some doe bring, you will perceiue how ridiculous and vaine it is. So this rule will not serue to finde out that which wee seeke for. These bee but 'tendiculæ verborum, et aucupationes 'syllabarum,' as one calleth them: it may haue some vse, and serue a turne in schooles, but it is too light for iudgements in lawe, and for the seates of iustice.—Aquinas setteth downe a more certen rule, 'in vocibus videndum, non 'tam à quo, quam ad quid sumantur.' And words should be taken sensu currenti: for vse and custome is the best expositor both of lawes and wordes, 'quem penes arbitrium et ius et 'norma loquendi.'—Wherefore, of the many and diuerse distinctions, diuisions, and subdiuisions, that haue bene made in this case, I will say no more but, 'confusum est quicquid in pul-'uerum sectum est:' and will conclude with hishop Juel; 'a man may wander and misse 'his way in mists of distinctions.'

Then leauing these historicall and etymologi- call interpretations, and these curious and sub- tile distinctions and diuisions, I say, ligeantia, or allegiantia, vnderstood sensu currenti, is vinculum fidei et obedientie, as iustice Daniel said well. And hee that is borne in any of the kings dominions, and vnder the kings obedience, is the kings liege subiect; and borne 'ad fidem 'regis' (for that is the proper and ancient word which the lawe of England hath vsed; 'ad fi-'dem regis Angliæ, ad fidem regis Franciæ') and therefore hee cannot bee a stranger or alien to the king, or in any of his kingdomes; and by consequence, is inhabed to haue lands in England, and to sue, and be sued in any reall action for the same.—And ligeantia hath some- times a more large extension: for, hee that is an alien borne out of the kings dominions, vnder the obedience of another king, if hee dwell in England, and be protected by the king and his lawes, hee oweth to the king the duetie of alle- geance; and so hee is ligatus regi, and ligens regis: and if hee commit treason, the indict- ment shall bee 'contra ligeantie sue debitum,' as it was in Shirley the Frenchmans case: yet is hee not the kings subiect: for, hee was not borne 'ad fidem regis.' But, this is not that ligeance which wee must finde: for, in a true and lawfull subiect, there must bee subiectio, fides, et obedientia; and those cannot bee se- uered, no more than true faith and charitie in a true Christian. And hee that hath these three à natiuitate, is ligens regis, and cannot bee a stranger or alien to the king, or in his kingdomes. And that it is so, may be proued by the rule of the other two interpretations of lawe; that is, analogica, et practica.

King James hath now the kingdomes of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the isles of Gernsey and Iersey by descent; all these bee his dominions, and vnder his subiection and obedience.—King Henry 2, had England and Normandy by descent from his mother Maud the emperesse; and Aniw and Maine by descent from his father, G. Plantagenet; and Ireland by conquest.—Henry 3, had England and Ireland by descent from his grandfather Henry 2; and Aquitany by descent from his grand-mother queene Elenor, wife to king Hen. 2, and daughter to the duke of Aquitany.—Edw. 1 had all the same by descent; and parte of Scot- land by conquest.—Edw. 2 and Edw. 3 had all the same by descent also: and besides, Edw. 3. claimed all France by descent from his mother queene Isabell, and had the most part of it in possession; and so had Henry 5 and Henry 6 also.

Now if in these kings times, subiectes borne in those countries, being then vnder their obedi- ence, were no aliens but capable of landes in England: and if at this time subiects borne in Ireland, or Gernsey and Iersey, be no aliens, but capable of lands in England; then, by an analogicall interpretation, why should not sub- iectes borne in Scotland be at this time in like degree? For, in proportion, and in likeness, and conueniencie, there can bee no difference at all.

But whether the subiects borne in those countries in the time of those kings were then capable of lands in England as naturall sub- iects; or were deemed aliens, is the question: and therein inter etatio practica is to bee con- sidered; and so the case is brought to be ex- amined per similia. And in diuinitie 'praxis 'sanctorum est interpres præceptorum.'—Now then the question is, whether the kings subiects of England and Scotland, that be Post-nati, may be resembled to the kings subiects of Ire- land, and the isles of Gernsey, &c. as now they bee; and to the subiectes of Normandie, Aniw, and Gascoyne, and parte of Scotland in former times, when the same were the dominions, and vnder the obedience of the king of England; for I speake alwaies, and would be vnderstoode of kingdomes and dominions in possession, and vnder obedience, and not of those whereunto the king hath right, but hath no possession or obedience, I holde, that in all points materiall concerning this question they are alike, though not in all things: (for, then it were idem, and not simile: and this can not bee better vnderstoode, than by examining the ob- iections to the contrary: which in substance may be reduced to foure in number.)

First for Ireland, it was gotten by conquest, and the conquerour may impose what lawes hee will vpon them: but it is otherwise of king- domes conning by descent.—This is a concei- pted difference, and lacks the foundation of reason, and hath not the true parts of a differ- ence: for those that are borne in Ireland, and those that are borne in Scotland, are all alike for their birth within the kings dominions, and are borne vnder the like subiection and obedience to the king and have the like bond; nay, even the same bond of allegiance; that is, they are borne ad fidem regis.—Besides where it is said, the conquerour may impose what laws hee will: then consider how it was in the interim before king Iohn gave lawes to Ireland.—Nay, which is more, I aske whether the conquerour of Ireland can give new lawes to England, and make Irishmen to bee as naturall borne subjectes in England (if their birth-right doe not give it them) which before the conquest they were not? For, that is properly the question. But if any difference bee, the case of descent is the stronger: for, (as iustice Yelverton saide) that is by an vndoubted title made by lawe; the other by a doubtfull title wonne by the sword.

But leave Ireland gotten by conquest; what say you to the great kingdome of France; which Edward 3 had first in right by lawfull descent, and after in possession by triumphant conquest; and which Henry 6 held after in possession by descent? Was euer doubt made, whether the subjectes borne there, so long as it was in subiection and obedience to the king, were capable of landes in England?

I will now turne the case, and aske another question; if king Iames our soueraigne had first bene king of England by lawfull descent (as now hee is) and after Scotland had descended vnto him, should not the subjectes of Scotland (I speak still of Post-nati) have bene iudged as naturall subjectes in England, as those of France were in Edward 3's time?—Then, he hauing now both kingdomes by lineall, true, and lawfull descent, it can make no difference touching the capacite of subjectes, which kingdome descended to him first, and which second; but both to him alike. And it is cleere, Post-nati in England are now capable and inheritable in Scotland, though some haue made a causelesse and needelesse doubt of it: and so on the other side those of Scotland are in England.

It is said, Normandie and Aquitania were no monarchies or kingdomes, but dukedomes or seignories in France, and holden of the crowne of France, and therefore not to bee resembled to Scotland, which is an ancient and absolute kingdome. This obiection reacheth not to the reason of our question: for, bee they kingdomes, be they seignories, yet the subjectes borne there were borne out of the kingdome of England, and so in that respect aliens: but in that they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his subiection and obedience, they were no aliens, but liege and naturall borne subjectes to the king; and so capable and inheritable in England.—I say besides, the dukes of Normandie and Aquitany were absolute princes, and had soueraigne power in those countries, although they did not beare the name of kings; as at this time the duke of Sauoy; the duke of Florence: the duke and state of Venice; and of late, the great duke of Russin; the duke of Burgundy; the archduke of Austria, &c.—So the difference in stile and name makes no difference in souerainty: for, king Henry 8 had as absolute soueraigne in Ireland, when his stile was lord of Ireland, as when hee changed his stile and was called king of Ireland.—And to say, that the tenure of the crowne of Fraunce should give any priuiledge to them of Normandie and Aquitania in England is a strange conceipt; it might rather bee objected against them. But, as I saide before, they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his obeisance, and therefore as subjectes borne in England.—And if men may beleeeve some auncient stories, Aquitany and Normandy had sometimes kings and were kingdomes of themselues; and not depending nor subject to the crowne of France: and the kingdome of France was then a small portion of Gallia, and but a little one, in comparison of that which it is at this day. And some say, that there were 24 kings in Gaule: but as the kings of France increased in power and strength, they subdued their neighbor-princes, and so that kingdome grew to that greatnesse that now it is at; euen as the heptarchie in England was dissolved, and made an intire kingdome, when one of the kings mightier than the rest subdued his neighbors.

It is saide further, that Normandie and Aquitany were subjectes to the crowne of England; and to the great seale of England: but so is not Scotland: ergo, &c.—This standeth not well with that which was objected before; that they were but seignories boulden of the crowne of France. And it is true, that before Edward the thirds time, those kings of England, that held those great seignories, did acknowledge, that they held the same of the crowne of France.—But these obiections be light, and not worth the time that hath bene spent about them. The soueraintie is in the person of the king; the crowne is but an ensigne of soueraintie; the inuesture and coronation are but ceremonies of honour, and maiestie; the king is an absolute and perfect king before he be crowned, and without those ceremonies.

The seale is to be altered and changed at the will and pleasure of the king; hee may haue one, he may haue many, as pleaseth him. The king did vse queene Elizabeth seale, for diuerse moneths after his comming into England; queene Elizabeth vsed king Philip & queene Maries seale for a time; and queene Marie vsed king Edwards seale. And all that was so done, was well and lawfully done. Many things were done by auncient kings of England before the conquest by their signature, and signe manuell without anie seale at all; and some such since the conquest also: as graunts made by Maude the empress to Alberick de Vere, and others.—The king may by his great seale command all his subjects that bee vnder his obedience, wheresoeuer they bee in the world: so hee did in Normandie; so hee did in Aquitany; so hee did in that part of Scotland that he had in possession. And in 24 Edw. 1, his iudges kept ordinary courts of iustice there: and I haue seene the records of placita azeroi.

tus regis apud Edinburgh, apud Roxburgh, apud S. Johns-towne, &c. in Scotia. So hee may command his subjects, if they be in France, Spaine, Rome, or Turkie, or the Indies. And for seuerall seales the earle of Chester had a speciall seale for that his auncient county palatine. The duke of Lancaster had a speciall seale for his new countie palatine. And after, when these counties came to the kinges possession, the kinges continued seuerall seales in them both for the administration of iustice; but as subordinate to the great seale of England.—And I make little doubt, but if the king shall now command any of his subjects of Scotland vnder his great seale of England, they will, as they ought, dutifully obey him. As in king Edward the 1st, Edward the 2nd, and Edward the 3rd times, they commanded many of the lords of that parte of Scotland which then was vnder their obedience.—I finde, that in 18 Edw. 3rd quarto die Iunij, the king 'constituit Adomari de Valentia comitem Pembrochie custodem regni sui; ac locum suum tenentem quamdiu rex in partibus transmarinis moram fecerit.' And the next day, viz. die Iouis quinto die Iunij, 'rex ordinavit, quod magnum sigillum suum remaneret clausum in aliquo loco securo, dum rex esset in partibus transmarinis: et ordinavit quoddam aliud paruum sigillum interim pro regimine regni, ad breuia, &c. consignanda, sub teste Adomari de Valentia comitis Pembrochie.' Nota, heere was a petty seale pro regimine regni, wherein are comprised commissions for iustice, mandatoris, et ad breuia consignanda; which is for remedia, as they are termed.

It is saide, that Scotland hath lawes that are proper for that kingdom, and that they are not subject to the lawes of England, and so de contra.—And lastly it was saide, that in England every person was within the iurisdiction of some leete, and at the age of twelve years every one is to bee sworn in the leete to bee foiall and loiall to the king of England; that is, to the lawes of England (for so hee vnderstood loiall): but Post-nati in Scotland can not be so; and that they have another forme of oathe in Scotland: ergo, &c.

For this laste parte, of the oathe in the leete, the lord chief baron did cleere it so plainly, as more needs not to be said. This is legalis ligeantia, it is not alta ligeantia by birth, which is that which we haue now in question.

The historical discourse that hath bin made of leetes, of law-dayes, of decenna, decennarij, of the tenne-mens tale, and the oath of all male children of twelve yeeres, &c. taken at the leete, is no newes indeede, it is very olde.—Master Lambard hath it all, and more too, at large in explicatione verborum in the word centuris; it was before the conquest.—But it maketh nothing to this naturall allegiance and subjection of birth; it is not alta ligeantia by birth right; it is but legalis ligeantia by policie: and Fitzherbert calleth it 'swearing to the lawe.'—And if that were the onely bond and mark of allegiance, many are out of it, and so at liber-

tie. As, children vnder twelve yeeres; yet sometimes they may commit treason and felony; where, malitia supplet aetatem. So women of all sortes; yet they may be shrewd and daungerous traitours; and if they bee women nobly borne, or widows that were wiues to noble men, they shall be tried per pures.—Also noble men of all sortes, who are neither bound to attend the leete, nor to take that oath, as appeereth by Britton cap. 99, treating of the court called 'the shirifes turne,' out of which the leete seemeth to be extracted: for, whatsoever is not presented in the leete may be presented and punished in the 'shirifs turne.' And M. Kitchin citeth Britton in this point for the leete; and alleadgeth also the statute of Marlebridge cap. 10, to the same purpose.—And at this day the view of francke-pleges, and the putting in of francke-pleges, and the decennarij, are but bare names of things past, the vse and substance is obsolete and gone.—And as it was saide, few in this place haue put in such pleges, or taken that oath, and yet I trust we are good subjects, and beare true faith and allegiance.

But this hath beene so fully answered and cleered by the lord chiefe baron, and the lord Coke, chiefe iustice of the Common Pleas, as I doe wrong to spend time in it.

But touching the seuerall lawes; I say, that seuerall lawes can make no difference in matter of soueraintie; and in the bond of allegiance and obedience to one king: and so it concludeth nothing for the point in question.—Normandy and Aquitany had seuerall lawes differing from the lawes of England: so had Fraunce in king Edw. the 3, and Hen. the 6, his time.—Ireland, before king Iohns time, continued their auncient lawes, and so, for the most part, haue done euer since.—Gernesey and Iersey haue yet at this day seuerall lawes, which, for the most part, were the auncient lawes and customes of Norrandie.—Wales had, and in many things yet haue seuerall lawes: so for the county palatine of Chester also.

Yet these neuer were, nor must not be cancelled and cut off from their allegiance and obedience to the king; nor the kings subjects borne there be incapable of lands and inheritance in England: for where there is but one soueraine, all his subjects borne in all his dominions bee borne ad fidem regis; and are bound to him by one bond of faith and allegiance: and in that, one is not greater nor lesser than another: nor one to bee preferred before another, but all to bee obedient alike; and to be ruled alike; yet under seuerall lawes and customes. And as Saint Gregorie sayeth of the church, 'in una fide nihil officit ecclesie sancte diuersa consuetudo.' So I will conclude for this point, that diuersitie of lawes and customes makes no breach of that vnite of obedience, faith, and allegiance which all liege subjects owe to their liege king and soueraigne lord. And as none of them can be aliens to the king, so none of them can bee aliens or strangers in any of his kingdoms or dominions; nor aliens or strangers one to another, no more than a Kentish-man to a Cheshire-man; or à contra.—And therefore all, that haue bin borne in any of the kinges dominions since hee was king of England, are capable and inheritable in all his dominions without exception.

And as to the other parte of the obiection, that there will be defect of triall; for, things done in Scotland, cannot bee tried in England; I say, that that maketh little to our present question, whether Post-nati in Scotland be aliens in England, and not capable of landes in England: but it trencheth to cast some asperition vpon the common lawe of England; that it is not sufficient to giue iustice to the kinges subiectes for lacke of sufficient meanes of triall of questions of fact. But to this baron Altham gaue so full an aunswere, as more cannot bee said: and so hee did both cleare the doubt, and did vphould the sufficiency of the law of England in that behalfe. And it seemeth strange, that this should now bee found out to bee obiected against Scotland, since it was neuer heeretofore obiected for France, Normandie, Aquitany, nor is at this day for Ireland, Gernesey, and Jersey, &c. whereas all stand vpon the same reason for the point of triall. But the wisdom of the lawe of England hath bene such, as there neuer failed certen rules for triall of all questions in fact; and those were fitted and adapted to the matter which was to be tried. And therefore, whosoeuer doth diligently obserue it, hee shall finde in the course and practise of the lawes of England about twenty seuerall formes of trialls; as by battell; by iurie, and that in diueres kinds; by wager of lawe; by proofes; by examination; by inspection; by certificates of diuers kinds; and by manie other wayes: and lest there should bee any defect in that behalfe, the law hath provided seuerall formes of ioyning of issues; and in that, hath speciall regard of things done out of the realme, as cuerie student may see in the books of reports.

Thus I haue passed these foure obiections, and therefore for this part I conclude, that if argumentum à simili were ever good and concludent in lawe, my lords the iudges haue proued this case by so many plaine and direct examples, and like cases, and by so manie strong arguments and solide reasons drawne out of booke cases, out of statutes, out of the true rules and forme of pleading, and out of ancient records and precedents, some produced by Mr. Attorney, and many more remembred by the iudges, as no one thing can bee more plainly exemplified, nor appeare more like to an other, than this case is to those cases which they haue remembred.

But if examples and arguments à simili doe faile, then it remaineth recurrere ad rationem; and what reason that ought to bee, and how to bee vnderstoude, is to be considered: for, it is said, that 'lex est ratio summa, iubens ea que facienda sunt, et prohibens contraria.' So it must be the depth of reason, not the light and shallow distempered reasons of common discousers walking in Powles, or at ordinaries, in their feasting and drinking, drowned with drinke, or blowne away with a whiffe of tobacco. Lucretius noteth, that in many there is 'rationis egestas;' and Saint Gregory saith, 'qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans cur non videat, rationem videt;' for, although reason and knowledge bee infinite, yet no man can haue more of it than he is capable of; every man must receiue it, and keepe it in his owne vessell; he cannot borrow his neighbours braine-pan to put it in. And therefore it is not without cause, that one of the grauest and best learned lawyers of our age, [Hopperus de vera iuris prudentia p. 118.] and a priuie counsellor to one of the greatest monarches of Europe, describeth those that should bee interpreters of lawes by foure speciall qualities, that is, 1. Ætate graues, 2. Eruditione præstantes, 3. Vsu rerum prudentes, 4. Publica autoritate constituti: so, there must be grauitie, there must be learning, there must be experience, and there must be authoritie: and if any one of these want, they are not to be allowed to be interpreters of the lawe.—How all these qualities concur in these reuerend iudges, whom wee haue heard in this present case, I will spare to speake what I thinke; for, Chrysostom teacheth mee, 'qui laudatur in facie, flagellatur in corde.'—In seeking out this depth of reason, the same author [Hopperus, ibid. page 119.] giueth a caution, which is this; 'vitium quod in hoc genere fugi debet est, ne, si rationem non inuenias, mox legem sine ratione esse clames.' And in 36 H. 6. Fortescue saith the same in effect, which is thus; 'we haue many courses and formes which bee houlden for lawe, and haue bene houlden and vsed because of reason; and notwithstanding the reason be not ready in memory, yet by study and labour a man may finde it.'

Now when wee come to examine by reason, whether Post-nati in Scotland shall be disabled as aliens, or shall be capable of lands in England, as naturall borne subjects there; wee are first to consider what is the reason while aliens in the dominions, and vnder the obedience of other forraine princes, are not capable of landes in England. And surely, the true reason is, that which was noted by baron Altham; and hath since bene ofte remembred, viz. the danger that might thereby come to the king and the common-weale: specially by drawing hither too great multitudes of them: for so the treasure of the realme might bee transported by them into other forraine kingdomes and countries; whereby it might bee vsed against the king, and to the prejudice of the state: and besides, they might vnder-hand practise sedition and rebellion in the kingdome, and cause many other daungers and inconueniences. But that reason cannot serue against Post-nati in Scotland, now that there is but one king of both the kingdomes, no more than it can serue against those that are borne in Ireland, or Gernesey, or Iersey: and therefore in reason they are as capable of landes in England, as the kings subjects of Ireland, and Gernesey, and Iersey are.

Against this, there haue also beene many obiections made, and reasons deuised, that seeme witty, and haue some shew of probability to proue, that Post-nati in Scotland are aliens, and ought not in reason to bee capable of landes in England, videlicet.—1. That England and Scotland were two ancient seuerall kingdomes vnder seuerall kings, and seuerall crownes.—2. That they continue yet seuerall kingdomes.—3. That they haue yet seuerall lawes, seuerall seales, seuerall crownes, and seuerall kings: for, it is said, though king James be king of both, and hath but one naturall body, yet in iudgement of law, he is in respect of his two seuerall kingdomes, as two seuerall kings, and the subjects of each seuerall kingdome are bound to him by distinct allegiance, according to the seuerall lawes of the kingdome where they were borne.—And all this is grounded vpon this rule or fiction in lawe: ‘quando duo iura concurrunt in vna persona, æquum est acsi essent in diuersis.’

And vpon this ground is this new forme of pleading deuised, which the defendants haue vsed in this case, such as cannot be found in any record, euer to haue beene pleaded before; and may as well serue against the kinges subjects of Ireland, as against the Postnati of Scotland. And sithence in former times the like forme of pleading was neuer seene against any of the kinges of Englandes subjects, which were borne in any of his dominions out of England, as in Normandie or Aquitanie, or in France (I meane such part of it as was in the kinges possession, and in subiection and obedience to him, and not in that parte of France which his enemies helde) it may be probably inferred, that it was then generally houlden, that neither such a forme of pleading, nor the matter itselfe was sufficient in lawe to disable anie such plaintife: for, against French-men that were not vnder the kinges obedience wee finde it often pleaded. And as those that were not subjects to the king, nor borne vnder his obedience, did then presume to bring suites and actions in England; so it can not bee thought, but that the king hauing then so large and ample dominions beyond the seas, as Normandie and Aquitany, and many other parts of France, some of his subjects borne there, had cause to haue, and did bring the like suites in England. And sithence no such plea is found to haue beene then vsed against them, it can not in lawe and reason bee now allowed against the Post-nati in Scotland: for, I may say as Ascue saied in 37 H. 6. ‘Our predecessors were as sage and learned as we be.’

And I see not, but that in this case a good argument may bee reasonably deduced from the negatiue, as it was in the case reported by the great learned, and most graue and reue-rend iudge sir James Dyer, chiefe iustice of the Common Pleas, anno 23 Elizab. The question there, was, whether an erroneous iudgement giuen in Bie, which is a member of the cinque-portes, might bee reuersed in the Kings Bench, or Common Place at Westminster; and it was thus resolued; ‘sed pro eo quod nullum tale breue in Registro, nec in aliquibus præcedentibus curiarum prædictarum inueniri poterat, dominus cancellarius Bromley per opinionem capitalium iusticiariorum vtriusque banci denegauit tale breue concedere.’ And so iustice Fenners argument houldeth well, viz. there is in this case no lawe to exclude the complainant, ergo hee is a liege and a naturall borne subject.

But the forme of pleading in the time of king Ed. 1. in Cobledickes case, which was cited out of Hengham, (and the booke shewed heere by the lord chiefe iustice Coke) is so direct and plaine for this our question, as nothing can be more plaine: and therefore I thinke it not amisse to report it againe.—That case was in effect and substaunce, thus:—A woman brought a writte of ayel against Roger Cobledicke, and declared of the seisin of Roger her grand-father, and conueied the discent to Gilbert her father; and from him to the demaundant, as his daughter and heire. The tenant pleaded, that the demaundant was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance nor of the fidelitie of England; and demaunded iudgement if shee ought to haue the action against him. This plea was houlden to bee insufficient; and thereupon the tenant amended his plea, and pleaded further, that the demaundant was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king; and demaunded iudgement, &c. And against that plea none exception was taken, but thereupon the demaundant prayed licence to depart from her writ. By this it appeareth plainly, that the first plea, alledging that shee was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance, nor of the fidelitie of England, was insufficient (and so declared by Berreford the chiefe iustice); for, there can bee no fidelitie nor allegiance due to England, respecting the land and soile without a soueraigne and king. But the second plea, alledging, that shee was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king, was good and sufficient: for, to the king fidelitie and allegiance is due; and therefore, since shee failed in that, shee was not to be answered: and thereupon shee praied licence to departe from her writte, and so she left her suite.

Now, for the reasons which haue beene drawne and strained out of the statute an. 14 Edw. 3. If they bee well examined, they serue little for this point which we haue in hand.—It is to be considered, at what time, and vpon what occasion that statute was made. King Edward the third being right heire to the crowne and kingdome of Fraunce by descent from his mother, and hauing spent many yeres for the recouering of the same, resolued to take vpon him the name and stile of king of France; being advised thereunto by them of Flaunders. Hereupon he did take the stile of king of Fraunce; and altered his seale and his armes; and after a while, placed the armes of France before the ancient armes of England, as they are borne at this day. This gave occasion for the making of this statute: for some people (uscum gentes, saith the statute) seeing this change, and considering the large and ample extent, and the magnificence of that great kingdome, beganne to doubt that the king would make his imperiall seate there; and conceiued thereby, that the kingdome of England, being the lesser, should bee in subiection of the king and kingdome of France, being the greater, and to bee governed and ruled by a vice-roy, or deputy, as they saw Ireland was. And though in the kings stile, England was placed before France, yet they sawe the armes of France marshalled before the armes of England; though at the first bearing thereof some say it was not so.—To cleere this doubt, and to take away this feare from the subiects of England, was this statute made, as doth plainly appeare by the wordes of the statute itselfe.

Now if you will make an apt and proper application of that case then betwene England and France, to this our case now, betwene Scotland and England, it must be thus:—1 Edw. 3, then king of England (being the lesser) had afterwards the kingdome of France (being the greater) by descent, and tooke the stile of king of France. King Iames king of Scotland (being the lesser) hath afterward the kingdome of England (being the greater) by descent, and taketh the stile of king of England.

2. King Ed. 3, altered his seale, and his armes, and placed the armes of France before the armes of England.—King Iames hath changed his seale, and his armes in England, and hath placed the armes of England before the armes of Scotland.

3. It was then doubted, that king Edw. 3 would remove his court out of England, the lesser, and keepe his imperiall seate and state in France, the greater.—King Iames hath indeede remooued his court out of Scotland, the lesser, and doth in his royall person (with the queene and prince, and all his children) keepe his imperiall seate in England, the greater.

4. In all these the cases agree; but yet one difference there is, and that is in the stile: for king Ed. 3, in his stile placed England, the lesser, being his ancient kingdome, before France, the greater, being newly descended vnto him.—But king Iames in his stile placeth England, the greater, though newly descended vnto him, before Scotland; the lesser, being his ancient kingdome.

5. Now, this being thus; perhaps Scotland might out of this example haue conceiued the like doubt against England, as England did then against France: but as there was then no doubt made, whether the kings subiects borne in England should be capable of lands in France; so, out of this statute, and vpon this example no doubt can bee inferred, whether the kings subiects now borne in Scotland, shall be capable of lands in England.

But, all these obiections, and the ground whereupon they are framed, viz. quando duo iura, &c. haue bene so thorowly and profoundly examined, and so learnedly and fully answered and cleered by the iudges, as I make no doubt but all wise and indifferent hearers be well satisfied therein.—And if there be any so possessed with a preiudicate opinion against trueth, and reason, that will say in their owne heartes, ‘licet persuaseris non persuadebis;’ and so, either serpent-like stop their eares, or else wilfully absent themselves, because they would not heare the weaknesse and absurdities of their owne conceits laied open and confuted: if there bee any such I say (as I trust there bee but few, and yet I feare there bee some) I would they had learned of Tertullian, that ‘veritas docendo suadet, non suadendo docet.’ And I wish that they bee not found among the number of those to whome St. Paul saith, ‘si quis ignorat, ignoret;’ and St. Iohn in the Apocalips, ‘qui sordidus est, sordescat adhuc.’ And I will exhort with St. Paul: ‘qui tenet, teneat;’ and not wauer or doubt by such weakke arguments and obiections.

But in this new learning, there is one part of it so strange, and of so dangerous consequent, as I may not let it passe, viz. that the king is as a king divided in himselfe: and so as two kings of two severall kingdomes; and that there be severall allegiances, and severall subiections due vnto him respectiue in regarde of his severall kingdomes, the one not participating with the other.

This is a dangerous distinction betwene the king and the crowne, and betwene the king and the kingdome: it reacheth too farre; I wish euery good subiect to beware of it. It was neuer taught, but either by traitours, as in Spencers bill in Edward the seconds time (which baron Snig, and the lord chiefe baron, and lorde Coke remembred) or by treasonable papists, as Harding in his confutation of the apologie maintaineth, that kings haue their authority by the positive lawe of nations, and haue no more power, than the people hath, of whome they take their temporall iurisdiction; and so Eiclerus Sinanca, and others of that crew. Or by seditious Sectaries and Puritans, as Buchanan de Iure Regni apud Scotos, Penry, Knox, and such like. For, by these, and those that are their followers, and of their faction, there is in their pamphlets too much such traitorous seede sowne.—But leaving this, I will adde a little more, to prooue, that in reason Robert Caluine, and other like Post-nati in Scotland, ought by lawe to be capable of landes in England: and for that, I wil remember one rule more which is certain and faileth not, and ought to bee obsrved in all interpretation of lawes; and that is, ‘ne quid absurdum, ne quid illusorium admittatur.’

But, vpon this subtile and dangerous distinction of faith and allegiance due to the king, and of faith and allegiance due to the crowne, and to the kingdome (which is the onely basis and fundamentall maine reason to disable the plaintife, and all Post-nati) there follow too many grosse, and fowle absurdities, whereof I will touch some few, and so conclude, that in lawe and reason this subtile, but absurd and dangerous distinction, ought not to be allowed. — His bond of allegiance, whereof wee dispute, is vinculum fidei; it bindeth the soule and conscience of every subiect severally and respectively, to be faithfull and obedient to the king: and as a soule or conscience cannot bee framed by policie; so faith and allegiance cannot bee framed by policie, nor put into a politike bodie. An oath must be sworne by a naturall bodie; homage and fealtie must be done by a naturall bodie, a politike body cannot doe it.

Now then, since there is but one king, and soueraigne, to whom this faith and allegiance is due by all his subiects of England and Scotland, can any humane policie diuide this one king, and make him two kings? Can 'cor regis Angliæ' be 'in manu Domini,' and 'cor regis Scotiæ' not so? Can there bee warres betweene the king of England and the king of Scotland, or betweene the kingdome of England and the kingdome of Scotland, so long as there is but one king? Can the king of England now send an army ruinal into Scotland against the king of Scotland? Can there bee any letters of marke or reprisall now granted by the king of England, against the subiects of the king of Scotland? Can there bee any protections now, 'quia profecturus in exercitu Iacobi regis Angliæ in Scotiam?' Nay shortly, can any man bee a true subiect to king Iames as king of England, and a traitor or rebell to king Iames as king of Scotland? Shall a foote breadth, or an inch breadth of ground, make a difference of birth-right of subiects borne vnder one king; nay, where there are not any certen bounds or limites knowne at all, but an imaginarie partition wall, by a concepted fiction in lawe? It is enough to propound these and such like questions, whereof many more might be remembered: they carry a sufficient and plaine answer in themselves: 'magis docet qui prudenter interrogat.'

As the king nor his heart cannot bee diuided, for he is one entire king ouer all his subiectes, in which soeuer of his kingdomes or dominions they were borne, so hee must not bee serued nor obeyed by halues; he must haue intire and perfect obedience of his subiects: for 'ligientin' (as baron Heron saied well) must haue foure qualities; it must bee '1. pura et simplex: 2. integra et solida: 3. vniuersalis non localis: 4. permanens, continua, et illæsa.' Diuide a man's heart, and you lose both parts of it, and make no heart at all; so he that is not an intire subiect, but halfe-faced, is no subiect at all: and hee, that is born an intire and perfect subiect, ought by reason and lawe to haue all the freedomes, priuiledges, and benefites pertaining to his birth-right in all the kinges dominions: and such are all the Post-nati in England and Scotland. And the inconuenience of this imaginarie local allegiance hath beene so lately, and so fully declared by the lorde chiefe iustice Coke, as more needes not bee saied in it.—In some special cases there sometime may bee a king of subiects without land in possession, as iustice Fenner noted in the gouernment which Moses had ouer the people of Israel in the wilderness; and as in the case which sir Iohn Popham the late lord chiefe iustice did put in the parliament. If a king and his subiects bee driuen out of his kingdome by his enemies, yet notwithstanding hee continueth still king ouer those subiects, and they are still bound vnto him by their bond of allegiance, wheresoeuer he and they bee. But there can not bee a king of land without subiects: for, that were but 'imperium in belluas,' and 'rex et subditi sunt relatiua.'

I saied there was an other generall rule for expounding of lawes, which I reserued to bee last spoken of. I will now but touch it; for, I will not stand to examine by humane reasons whether kings were before lawes, or lawes before kinges; nor how kinges were first ordained: nor whether the kings or the people did first make lawes; nor the seueral constitutions and frames of states and common-weales: nor what Plato or Aristotle haue written of this argument. They were men of singular learning and wisdom; but wee must consider the time, and the countrie, in which they liued, and in all their great learning they lacked the true learning of the knowledge of God. They were borne and liued in Greece, and in popular states: they were enemies, or at least mislikers of all monarchies; yet one of them disdaind not to bee a seriant or mercenarie hireling to a monarch. They accompted all the world barbarous, but their owne countrie of Greece: their opinions therefore are no canons to give lawes to kinges and kingdomes, no more than sir Thomas Moores Vtopia, or such pamphlets as wee haue at euerie marte.

I beleue him that saieih, 'per me reges regnant, et principes iusta decernunt;' [Prou. c. 3.] and I make no doubt, but that as God ordained kinges, and hath giuen lawes to kinges themselves, so hee hath authorized and giuen power to kinges to giue lawes to their subiects; and so kinges did first make lawes, and then ruled by their lawes, and altered and changed their lawes from time to time, as they sawe occasion, for the good of themselves, and their subiects.—And this power they haue from God Almighty; for, as saint Augustine saieih 'in hoc reges Deo seruiunt sicut eis diuinitus præcipitur, in quantum sunt reges, si in suo regno bona iubeant, mala prohibeant, non solum quæ pertinent ad humanam societatem, verumetiam quæ ad diuinam religionem.'

And I should Thomas Aquinas his opinion to be good, 'rex solutus a legibus quoad vim coactiuam, subditus est legibus quoad vim directiuam propria voluntate.' And for this opinion there is a stronger authoritie, euen from God himself in Ecclesiastes, c. 8. ver. 2. 'ego os regis obseruo; et præcepta iuramenti Dei: aud ver. 4. 'sermo illius potestate plenus est: nec dicere ei quisquam potest, quare ita facias?'

Now being led a little from the common law to the ciuile lawe, I finde in the ciuile lawe [Cod. 1. li. tit. 14, le. 1.] a direct text, warranting that generall rule which I reserued to this place, which is this; 'inter æquitatem iusque interpositam interpretationem nobis solis et licet et oportet inspicere.'

And another like text [ibidem le. 12.] in these words, 'sententia principis ius dubium declarans, ius facit quoad omnes.' And some graue and notable writers in the ciuile lawe say, 'rex est lex animata: some say, 'rex est lex loquens: some others say, 'interpretantur legem consuetudo et princeps: another saith, 'rex solus iudicat de causâ iure non definita.'

And as I may not forget saint Augustines words, which are these; 'generale pactum est societatis humanæ regibus suis obtemperare: so I may not wrong the iudges of the common lawe of England so much as to suffer an imputation to bee cast vpon them, that they, or the common lawe does not attribute us great power and authoritie to their soueraignes the kinges of England, as the Romane lawes did to their emperours: (a) for, Bracton, the chiefe iustice in the time of king Henry the 3rd, hath these direct wordes, 'de chartis regijs et factis regum, non debent, nec possunt iusticiari nec priuata personæ disputare. Nec etiam, si in illa dubitatio oriatur, possunt eam interpretari. Et in dubijs et obscuris, vel si aliqua dictio duos contineat intellectus, domini regis erit expectanda interpretatio et voluntas: cum eius sit interpretari cuius est condere.' And Britton in the time of king Ed. 1, writeth as much in effect.

So as now if this question seem difficult, that neither direct law, nor examples and precedents, nor application of like cases, nor discourse of reason, nor the graue opinion of the learned and reuerend iudges, can resolue it, here is a true and certen rule, how both by the ciuile lawe, and the ancient common lawe of England it may and ought to be decided: that is, by sentence of the most religious, learned, and iudicious king that euer this kingdome or island had.—But this case is so cleare as this needeth not at all.—And in this I would not be mis-vnderstoode, as though I spake of making of new lawes, or of altering the lawes now standing; I meane not so, but I speake only of interpretation of the lawe in new questions and doubts, as now in this present case: neither doe I mean hereby to derogate any thing from the high court of parliament; (farre be it from my thought) it is the great councill of the kingdome, wherein euery subiect hath interest. And to speake of the constitution or forme of it, or how, or when it was first begunne, is for busie questionists: it ought to bee obeyed and reuerenced, but not disputed; and it is at this time impertinent to this question.—But certen it is, it hath bene the wisdom of the kinges of this realm to reserue in themselves that supream power to call their nobles, clergie, and commons together, when they sawe great and vrgent causes; and by that great counsell to make edicts and statute for the weale of their people, and safetie of the kingdome and state, as in anno 10 Edw. 3, the assembly at Nottingham for the great wars in France: and in anno 20 H. 3, Prouisiones Merton, which I remembred before.

(a) This language is surely very unguarded.
EDITOR.

There haue bene made some obiections of inconueniencie, as for bearing of scot and lot, and such other charges; and some out of frugalitie, that the king shall lose his profit of making denizens, and such like. These are so light as I leaue them to the winde; they are neither fit for parliament, nor councill, nor court.

Another argument and reason againe the Postnati hath bene lately made out of diffidence and mistrust, that they will come into England sans number, and so as it were to surcharge our common; and that this may be in secula secularum. I know not well what this meanes. The nation is ancient, noble, and famous; they haue many honourable and wortie noblemen and gentlemen, and many wise and wortie men of all degrees and qualities; they haue lands and faire possessions in Scotland. Is it therefore to bee supposed, or can it in reason bee imagined, that such multitude sans number will leaue their natie soile, and all transport themselves hither? Hath the Irish done so, or those of Wales, or of the isles of Man, Gernesey, and Iersey? Whye should we then suspect it now more for Scotland?

Nay, doe you suppose that the kinge of England will euer suffer so great a parte of his dominions, and so great and famous a kingdome as Scotland is to be dispeopled? It is a doubt imagined without any foundation or ground of reason. But if it were to bee doubted, the twelue iudges that haue concurred in opinion, and that late worthy iudge Popham, had as great cause to feare it as any others. They are wise; they are learned; they haue faire possessions and good estates; they haue posteritie to care for as others haue.—Yet, admit it bee a matter worth the doubting of, what is that to the young Postnati that are not like in many yeares to come hither in such number? Shall we vpon this causelesse feare deprive them of their lawfull birth-right? Haue wee seene in these five yeeres past anie more of them than this one alone that haue gotten any lands in England? And this litle that he hath is so small and poore a portion, that his purchase is not great, and therefore no iust cause of offence to any.

Nay, if you looke vpon the Antenati, you shall find no such confluence hither, but some few (and very few in respect of that great and populous kingdome) that haue done long and worthie seruice to his maiestie, haue, and still doe attend him, which I trust no man mislikes: for, there can bee none so simple, or childish (if they haue but common sense) as to thinke that his maiesty should haue come lither alone amongst vs, and haue left behinde him in Scotland, and as it were caste off, all his ould and worthie seruants.

And if these noble and worthie gentlemen of Scotland, I meane the Antenati, be louingly and brotherly entertained amongst vs, with mutuall loue and beneuolence, that so we may coalescere, and be vnited together, by marriage, and otherwise (as in some particular cases wee see it already happily begunne) no doubt God will blesse this vnion of both these nations, and make them, and the king, and Great Britaine to be famous through the world; and feared and redoubted of our enemies, and of all that wish vs ill: for, 'vis vnita fortior, et concordia multos facit vnum.' But what may follow vpon such arguments of diffidence and suspition, which seeme but to hinder vnion, and to breede discord and dissention, I will not speake. Let euery wise man consider it well: for, 'humana consilia castigantur vbi celestibus se præferunt.' And remember St. Pauls caution, 'si inuicem mordetis, videte ne ab inuicem consumamini.'

And for the resemblance that hath bin made of this case of Postnati, but indeed for the vnion of both kingdomes, with the houswives cutting of her cloth by a threede, I will say but this, that if shee cut her peece of cloth in length aswell as in breadth, all the threads will be cutte, and the cloth marred. And this cutting in this our case, is, to cutte all aswell in length as in breadth, euen through all the kinges dominions; and so will rent asunder the whole frame of the vnion, and cut in peeces all the threeds of allegiance.

But now I will aske this question: how long shall this suspition and doubt continue? Shall there bee a dis-vnion for euer? If it be saied, no, but vntill the lawes and customes of both kingdomes bee made one and the same: then I aske; how, and when that shall be done? and it may bee, that the constitutions of the countries bee such as there can hardly in all things bee such an absolute and perfect reconciling or vniting of lawes as is fancied. Is it yet so betweene England and Wales, or betweene Kent and Cornwall, or betweene many other parts of this kingdome? I say no; and I speake it confidently and truly, it is not so, nor well can be so. Therefore let England and Scotland be in like degree now, as England and Wales were for many hundred yeeres, and in many things are yet still; and yet let vnion and loue increase amongst vs, euen in secula seculorum. Let vs not be such as St. Bernard noteth, 'amant quod non decet, timent quod non oportet, doleant vanè, gaudent vanids.' And let vs no longer make question, whether seuerall lawes and customes bee markes of seperation and dis-vnion, or of seuerall allegiances; for certainly they are not.

One other reason remaines against these Postnati, and that is out of a prouident foresight, or as it were a prophesying: what if a seperation of these kingdomes fall hereafter?

Of this I can say but absit omen. It is potentia remota (as iustice Williams saied) and I trust in God remotissima: and I will euer pray to God that it neuer fall so, vntill the king of all kinges resume all scepters and kingdomes into his owne hands. And let vs take heede of sinnes of ingratitude and disobedience; and remember, that Adam and Eue were punished, 'non propter pomum, sed propter vetitum.' And for such prophets, let the prophet Ezechiel, ca. 13. answer them, 'væ prophetis insipientibus, qui sequuntur spiritum suum, et nihil vident.' And the prophet Esay speaketh to all such with an other væ, 'væ illis qui dispergunt.'

Now then, as M. Solicitor beganne with seeking out the truth; so I will conclude with Esdras words, 'magna est veritas et præualet.' and with this further, 'eatenus rationandam donec veritas inueniatur: cum inuenta est veritas, figendum ibi iudicium: et in victoria veritatis, soli veritatis inimici pereunt.'

THE CONCLUSION.

Thus I haue heere deliuered my concurrence in opinion with my lordes the iudges, and the reasons that induce and satisfie my conscience, that Ro. Caluine, and all the Post-nati in Scotland, are in reason, and by the common lawe of England, naturall-borne subjects within the allegiance of the king of England; and inabled to purchase and haue free-hould and inheritance of lands in England; and to bring reall actions for the same in England.

For, if they haue not this benefit by this blessed and happie vnion, then are they in no better case in England, than the king of Spaines subjects borne in Spaine, &c. And so by this vnion they haue gotten nothing: what they haue lost iustice Yeluerton did well note.

And therefore I must giue iudgement in the Chancery, that the defendants there ought to make direct answer to Ro. Caluines bill for the lands and euidences for which he complaines.

86. The Trial of GEORGE SPROT, in Scotland, for High Treason, in conspiring with John Earl of Gowrie to murder King James I. 6 JAMES I. August 12, A. D. 1608. [Spotiswood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 509.]

GEORGE SPROT, a notary, inhabiting at Aymouth, having given cause of suspicion by some Words which fell from him, and afterwards by some Papers found upon him, that he was privy to and acquainted with the Plotting of the late earl of Gowrie* and Robert Logane, for the cruel murdering of king James, was seized and committed to prison; and after divers Examinations, being moved with remorse of conscience for the long concealing his fore-knowledge of this Conspiracy, confesseth, declareth, and deponeth, That he knew perfectly, that Robert Logane, late of Restalrig, was privy and upon the fore-knowledge of Gowrie's treasonable Conspiracy. And for the greater assurance of his knowledge, deponeth, That he knew that there were divers Letters interchanged betwixt them, anent the treasonable purpose aforesaid, in the beginning of the month of July 1600. Which letters James Bour, called laird Bour, servitor to Restalrig, (who was imployed mediator betwixt them, and privy to all that errand) had in keeping, and shewed the same to Sprot in the place of Fast-Castle. The first of Gowrie's Letters, containing in effect as followeth:

' Good laird of Restalrig, you understand what Conditions should have been betwixt us, of before. Indeed I purposed to have come by your house, but understanding of your absence in Lothian, I came not. Always I wish you either yourself to come West, or else to send some sure messenger, who may confer with me anent the purpose you know. But rather would I wish yourself to come, not only for that errand but some other thing that I have to advise with you.'

To the which Letter Restalrig wrote an Answer, and sent the same to the earl of Gowrie, by the said James Bour, of the tenour following:

' My lord, my most humble duty and service heartily remembered. At the receipt of your lordship's Letter I am so comforted, that I can neither utter my joy, nor find myself sufficiently able to requite your lordship with due thanks. And persuade your lordship in that matter, I shall be as forward for your lordship's honour, as if it were my own cause. And I think there is no living Christian that would not be content to revenge that Machiavellian massacring of our dear friends; yea, howbeit it should be, to venture and hazard life, lands, and all other things else. My heart can bind me to take part in that matter, as your lordship shall find better proof thereof. But one thing would be done, namely, That your lordship should be circumspect and earnest with your brother, that he be not rash in any speeches touching the purpose of Padua. My lord, you may easily understand, that such a purpose as your lordship intendeth, cannot be done rashly, but with deliberation. And I think for myself, that it were most meet to have the men your lordship spake off, ready in a boat or bark, and address them as if they were taking pastime on the sea, in such fair summer-time. And if your lordship could think good, either yourself to come to my house of Fast-Castle by sea, or to send your brother, I should have the place very quiet and well provided after your lordship's advertisement, where we should have no scant of the best venison can be had in England: And no others should have access to haunt the place, during your lordship's being here, but all things very quiet. And if your lordship doubt of safe landing, I shall provide all such necessities as may serve for your lordship's arrival, within a flight-shot of the house. And persuade your lordship you shall be as sure and quiet here, while we have settled our Plot, as if you were in your own chamber: for I trust and am assured we shall hear word within a few days from them your lordship knoweth of; for I have care to see what ships comes home by. Your lordship knoweth I have kept the lord Bothwell quietly in this house in his greatest extremity, say both king and council what they liked. I hope, if all things come to pass, as I trust they shall, to have both your lordship and his lordship at one good dinner afore I die. Hæc jocosè, to animate your lordship: I doubt not, my lord, but all things shall be well. And I am resolved, whereof your lordship shall not doubt, of any thing on my part, yea, to peril life, land, honour and goods; yea, the hazard of hell shall not affray me from that, yea, although the scaffold were already set up. The sooner the matter were done, it were the better, for the king's back-hunting will be shortly; and I hope it shall prepare some dainty cheer for us to dine against the next year. I remember well, my lord, and I will never forget so long as I live, that merry sport which your lordship's brother told me of a nobleman at Padua; for I think that a Persecere to this purpose. My lord, think nothing that I commit the secrecy hereof and credit to this bearer; for I dare not only venture my life, lands, and all other things I have else, on his credit, but I durst hazard my soul in his keeping if it were possibly in earthly men; for I am so persuaded of his truth and fidelity. And I trow, as your lordship may ask him if it be true, he would go to Hell-Gates for me; and he is not beguiled of my part to him.

‘ And therefore I doubt not but this will persuade your lordship to give him trust in this matter, as to myself. But I pray your lordship direct him home with all possible haste, and give him strait command, that he take not a wink sleep while he see me again, after he come from your lordship. And as your lordship desireth in your Letter to me, either rive or burn, or else send back again with the bearer; for so is the fashion, I graut.’

Which Letter, written every word with Restalrig's own hand, was subscribed by him after his accustomed manner, ‘ Restalrig,’ and was sent to the earl Gowrie by the said James Bour. After whose return, within five days, with a new Letter from Gowrie, he staid all night with Restalrig in Gunnes-Green,* and Restalrig rode to Lothian the morn thereafter, where he staid five or six days. Then after his returning, past to Fast-Castle, where he remained a certain short space.

And farther deponeth, That he saw and heard Restalrig read the last Letter, which Bour brought back to him from Gowrie, and their conference there-aneut. And heard Bour say; Sir, if ye think to make any commodity by this dealing, lay your hand to your heart. And Restalrig answered, That he would do as he thought best. And farther said to Bour, Howbeit he should sell all his own land that he had in the world, he would pass thorow with the earl of Gowrie, for that matter would give him greater contentment, nor if he had the whole kingdom; and rather or he should falsify his promise, and recall his vow that he had vowed to the earl of Gowrie, he should spend all that he had in the world, and hazard his life with his lordship. To whom Bour answered: You may do as you please, sir, but it is not my counsel, that you should be so sudden in that other matter. But for the condition of Dirlton, I would like very well of it. To whom Restalrig answered, Content yourself, I am at my wit's end.

And farther, Sprot deponeth, That he entered himself thereafter in conference with Bour, and demanded what was done betwixt the Laird and the earl of Gowrie. And Bour answered, That he believed that the Laird should get Dirlton without either gold or silver, but feared that it should be as dear unto him. And Sprot inquiring how that could be; Bour said, They had another pie in hand, nor the selling of any land; but prayed Sprot, for God's sake, that he would let be, and not trouble himself with the laird's business; for he feared, within few days, the laird would be either land-less or life-less.

And the said George Sprot being demanded, if this his Deposition was true, as he would answer upon the Salvation and Condemnation of his Soul; and if he will go to death with it, seeing he knoweth the time and hour of his death to approach very near; deponeth for Auswer, That he hath not a desire to live, and that he knows the time to be short, having care of no earthly thing, but only for clearing of his conscience in the truth of all these things, to his own shame before the world, and to the honour of God, and safety of his own soul; that all the former points and circumstances, contained in this his Deposition, with the Deposition made by him the 5th of July last, and the whole remanant Depositions made by him sen that day are true, which he will take on his conscience, and as he hopeth to be saved of God, and that he would seal the same with his blood.

And farther, being demanded, where this above-written Letter, written by Restalrig to the earl of Gowrie, which was returned again by James Bour, is now; deponeth, That he abstracted it quietly from Bour, in looking over and reading Bour's Letters, which he had in keeping of Restalrig's; and that he left the above-written Letter in his chest among his Writings, when he was taken and brought away, and that it is closed and folded within a piece of paper.

This aforesaid Deposition was made by him the 10th of August 1608, written by James Primerose, clerk of his majesty's privy-council, and subscribed with the said George Sprot's own hand, in the presence of the earl of Dunbar, the earl of Lothiane, the bishop of Rosse, the lord Schune, the lord Halyrudehouse, the lord Blantyre, sir W. Hart, his majesty's justice, Mr. John Hall, Mr. Patrick Galoway, Mr. Peter Hewart, ministers of the Kirks of Edinburgh. Subscribed with all their Hands.

And also the 11th day of the aforesaid month and year, the said George Sprot being re-examined, in the presence of a number of the council and ministers aforesaid, and it being declared to him, that the time of his death now very near approached, and that therefore they desired him to clear his conscience with an upright declaration of the truth; and that he would not abuse the Holy Name of God, to make him, as it were, a witness to untruths; and especially being desired that he would not take upon him the innocent blood of any person dead or quick, by making and forging lyes and untruths against them:

“ Deponeth, That he acknowledgeth his grievous offences to God (who hath made him a reasonable creature) in abusing his holy Name with many untruths, sen the beginning of this Process: but now being resolved to die, and attending the hour and time when it shall please God to call him, he deponeth with many attestations, and as he wisheth to be participant of the kingdom of Heaven, where he may be countable and answerable, upon the salvation and condemnation of his soul, for all his doings and speeches in this earth, that all that he hath deponed sen the 5th day of July last, in all his several Depositions, were true in every point and circumstance of the same; and that there is no untruth in any point thereof.”

And having desired Mr. Patrick Galoway to make a Prayer, whereby he might be comforted now in his trouble; which was done: the said Deponer, with many tears after the Prayer, affirmed this his Deposition to be true; and for the confirmation thereof, declared, that he would seal the same with his blood.

And the next day thereafter, being the 12th of the aforesaid month of August, upon the aforesaid Confession, the said George was brought forth and presented in Judgment upon Pannel, within the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, before sir Wm. Hart of Preston, his majesty's Justice, and there in a fenced Court holden by him that day, assisted by the honourable persons following, his assessors in that errand: they are to say, Alexander earl of Dumfermling, lord chancellor, George earl of Dunbar, treasurer, John abp. of Glasgow, David bp. of Rosse, Gawin bp. of Galloway, Andrew bp. of Brechine, David earl of Crawford, Mark earl of Lothian, John lord Abirneyth of Saltoun, James lord of Balmerineth, secretary, Walter lord Blantyre, John lord Hallyrudehouse, Michael lord Burley, sir Rd. Cokburne of Clarkintoun, kt. Mr. John Preston of Fenton Barnes, collector-general, sir John Skeyne of Curahil, knight, clerk of register: was delated, accused, and pursued by sir Tho. Hamilton of Binning, knight, advocate to our sovereign lord for his highness's entries, of the Crimes contained in his Indictment, produced by the said Advocate; whereof the Tenour followeth:

George Sprot, notary in Ayemouth, You are indicted and accused, forsomuch as John, sometime earl of Gowrie, having most cruelly, detestably, and treasonably conspired in the month of July, the year of God 1600 years, to murder our dear and most gracious sovereign the king's most excellent majesty: and having imparted that devilish purpose to Robert Logan of Restalrig, who allowed of the same, and most willingly and readily undertook to be partaker thereof: The same coming to your knowledge at the times and in the manner particularly after specified, you most unnaturally, maliciously, and treasonably concealed the same, and was art and part thereof in manner following. In the first, in the said month of July 1600 years, after you had perceived and known, that divers Letters and Messages had past betwixt the said sometime earl of Gowrie, and the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, you being in the house of Fast-Castle, you saw and read a Letter written by the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, with his own hand, to the said John, sometime earl of Gowrie, of the tenour following:

My Lord, my most humble duty and service heartily remembered. At the receipt of your lordship's Letter I am so comforted, that I can neither utter my joy, nor find myself sufficiently able to requite your lordship with due thanks. And persuade your lordship in that matter, I shall be as forward for your lordships honour, as if it were mine own cause. And I think there is no living Christian that would not be content to revenge that Machiavellinn massacring of our dear friends, yea, howbeit it should be, to venture and hazard life, lands and all other thing else. My heart can bind me to take part in that matter, as your lordship shall find better proof thereof. But one thing would be done: namely, That your lordship should be circumspect and earnest with your brother, that he be not rash in any speeches touching the purpose of Padua.

And a certain space after the execution of the aforesaid Treason, the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, having desired the laird of Bour to deliver him the aforesaid Letter, or else to burn it; and Bour having given to you all Tickets and Letters, which he then had either concerning Restalrig, or others, to see the same, because he could not read himself; you abstracted the above-written Letter, and retained the same in your own hands, and divers times read it, concerning farther in substance nor is formerly set down, according to the words following:

My Lord, you may easily understand, that such a purpose as your lordship intendeth, cannot be done rashly, but with deliberation. And I think for myself, that it were most meet to have the men your lordship spake of, ready in a boat or bark, and address them as if they were taking pastime on the sea, in such far summer time. And if your lordship could think good, either yourself to come to my house of Fast-Castle by sea, or to send your brother, I should have the place very quiet, and well provided after your lordship's advertisement, where we should have no scant of the best venison can be had in England. And no others should have access to haunt the place during your lordship's being here, but all things very quiet. And if your lordship doubt of safe landing, I shall provide all such necessaries as may serve for your lordship's arrival, within a slight-shot of the house. And persuade your lordship you shall be as sure and quiet here, while we have settled our Plot, as if you were in your own chamber: for I trust, and am assured, we shall have word within few days from them your lordship knoweth of; for I have care to see what ships comes home by. Your lordship knoweth I have kept the lord Bothwell quietly in this house in his greatest extremity, say both king and council what they liked. I hope, if all things come to pass, as I trust they shall, to have both your lordship and his lordship at one good dinner afore I die. Hæc jocosè, to animate your lordship: I doubt not my lord but all things shall be well. And I am resolved, whereof your lordship shall not doubt, of any thing on my part, yea to peril life, land, honour and goods; yea, the hazard of hell shall not affray me from that, yea, although the scaffold were already set up. The sooner the matter were done, it were the better; for the king's buck-hunting will be shortly; and I hope it shall prepare some dainty cheer for us to dine against the next year. I remember well, my lord, and I will never forget so long as I live, that merry sport which your lordship's brother told me of a nobleman at Padua: for I think that a Parasceve to this purpose. My lord, think nothing that I commit the secrecy hereof and credit to this bearer; for I dare not only venture my life, lands, and all other things I have else, on his credit, but I durst hazard my soul in his keeping, if it were possibly in earthly men; for I am so persuaded of his truth and fidelity. And I trow, as your lordship may ask him if it be true, he would go to bell-gates for me; and he is not beguiled of my part to him. And therefore, I doubt not but this will persuade your lordship to give him trust in this matter as to myself. But I pray your lordship direct him home with all possible haste, and give him strait command, that he take not a wink sleep, while he see me again, after he come from your lordship. And as your lordship desireth in your Letter to me, either rive or burn, or else send back again with the bearer; for so is the fashion, I grant.

Which Letter, written every word with the said Robert Logan his own hand, was subscribed by him after his accustomed manner, with this word, Restalrig.

And albeit by the contents of the aforesaid Letter, you knew perfectly the truth of the said most treasonable Conspiracy, and the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, his foreknowledge, allowance, and guiltiness thereof; like as you were assured of the same by his receiving of divers Letters sent by Gowrie to him, and by his sending Letters to Gowrie for the same purpose, and by sundry Conferences betwixt the said Robert Logane of Restalrig, and the said James Bour in your presence and hearing concerning the said Treason, as well in the said month of July immediately preceding the attempting of the said Treason, as at divers other times shortly thereafter, as likewise by the revealing thereof to you by the said James Bour, who was upon the knowledge and device of the said Treason, and was employed as ordinary messenger by the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, to the said sometime earl of Gowrie, in the traffick of the said damnable Treason, whereby your knowledge, concealing and guiltiness of the said Treason was undeniable: yet, for further manifestation thereof, about July 1602 years, the said R. Logan of Restalrig shewed to you that Bour had told him, that he had been somewhat rash to let you see a Letter which came from the earl of Gowrie to the said Robert Logan of Restalrig, who then urged you to tell what you understood by that Letter. To whom you answered, That you took the meaning of it to be, that he had been upon the counsel and purpose of Gowrie's Conspiracy. And he answered you, Whatever he had done, the worst was his own: but if you would swear to him, that you should never reveal any thing of that matter to any person, he should be the best sight that ever you saw; and in token of farther recompense he then gave you twelve pound of silver. Nevertheless, albeit you knew perfectly the whole practices and progress of the said Treason, from the beginning thereof as said is, as well by the sight of the said Letters, as also by your Conferences with the said James Bour, called Laird Bour, and Robert Logan of Restalrig; yet during all the days of their life-time, who lived till the year of God 1606 years, or thereby, and so by the space of six years after that, you knew the guiltiness of the treasonable Conspiracy aforesaid, you most treasonably concealed the same; and so you was and is art and part of the said most heinous, detestable and treasonable Conspiracy, and of the knowledge and concealing thereof; and therefore you ought and should incur, underlie and suffer the sentence and pain of High-Treason. To the token, that ye have not only by your Depositions subscribed with your hand, and solemnly made in presence of many of the lords of his majesty's Council, and of the ministers of the Borough of Edinburgh, of the dates, the 5th, 15th and 16th days of July last by-past, and 10th and 11th days of August instant, confessed every head, point, and article of the Indictment above written, but also, by divers other your Depositions subscribed likewise with your hand, you have ratified the same, and sworn constantly to abide thereat, and to seal the same with your blood, which you cannot deny.

Which Indictment being read openly in judgment to the said George Sprot, before he was put to the knowledge of an inquest, he confessed in the presence of the said Lord Justice and whole Assessors above-named, the same and every point thereof to be true and of verity. And therefore the justice ordained the same Indictment to be put to the knowledge of a condign Inquest of the honest, famous and discreet persons under-written. They are to say: Wm. Trumbill of Ardre, Wm. Fisher, Merchant, Burgess of Edinburgh. Robert Stuart, there, Edward Johnston, Merchant, Burgess there, Harbert Maxwell of Cavens, James Tennent of Linhouse, Wm. Trumbill, Burgess of Edinburgh, John Hucheson, Merchant, Burgess of Edinburgh, John Leyis, Merchant Burgess there, James Somervell, Merchant, Burgess there, Wm. Simintoun, Burgess there, John Cunnison in Dirlton, Thomas Smith, Merchant, Burgess of Edinburgh, J. Cowtis, Burgess there, and G. Brown in Gorgymill. Which persons of Inquest being chosen, sworn and admitted, after the Accusation of the said George Sprot, before them, of the said treasonable, heinous, and detestable Crimes contained in the Indictment aforesaid, and reading of the said Indictment of new again in his and their presence; the said George Sprot of new confessed in the audience of the said Inquest the aforesaid Indictment, and every point thereof, to be true and of verity. Whereupon the said sir Thomas Hamilton of Binning, knt. his majesty's advocate, as before, asked Act and Instrument: and in respect thereof protested, in case the said Inquest cleasid him of the said

Crimes for wilful and manifest error. And therefore the whole forenamed persons of Inquest removed all together forth of Court to the Inquest House, where they being inclosed, by plurality of votes elected and made choice of the said Harbert Maxwell of Cavens, to be Chancellor, or Foreman. And having with great deliberation gravely considered the effect and whole circumstances of the said Indictment, and constant judicial Confession made by the party pannelled, as well before the said Lord Justice and his assessors, as thereafter in presence of the Inquest themselves, they all voted upon the whole effect of the said Indictment. And being ripely and well advised therewith, re-entered again in court, where they all in one voice, by the mouth of the said Chancellor or Foreman, found, pronounced, and declared the said George Sprot (according to his own Confession judicially made in their presence and audience) to be guilty, culpable, filed and convict of art and part of the said most heinous, detestable and treasonable Conspiracy contained in his Indictment above-written, and of the knowledge and concealing thereof. For the which cause the said Justice, by the mouth of the Dempster of Court, by his Sentence and Doom demerced and ordeined the said George Sprot to be taken to the Market-cross of Edinburgh, and there to be hanged upon a gibbet till he be dead, and thereafter his head to be stricken from his body, and his body to be quartered and demeaned as a traitor, and his head to be affixed and set up upon a prick of iron upon the highest part of the Toll-booth of Edinburgh, where the traitor Gowrie, and others of the Conspirators heads stand; and his whole lands, heritages, tacks, stedings, rooms, possessions, goods and geere to be forfeited and eschet to our sovereign lord his use, for his treasonable and detestable crimes above specified. Which was pronounced for doom.

Extractum de libro Actorum Adiorialis S. D. N. Regis per me D. Johannem Coburne de Ornestoun militem, Clericum Justitiarie ejusdem generalium. Sub meis signo et subscriptione manualibus.

The Doom being pronounced, the said George was conveyed to a privy house, where he remained at his secret meditation, and afterwards in conference with the ministers and others, unto the time all things was provided necessary for his execution: and being brought to the place where he was to die, he in public audience of the whole people, at the three sides of the scaffold, ratified the former Depositions made by him concerning the treasonable practices intended and devised betwixt Gowrie and Restalrig, for the murdering of our most gracious sovereign, and bereaving his highness of his life, and his own knowledge and concealing of their guiltiness. For the which he humbly craved God and his majesty forgiveness, being most sorry and grieved that he had offended God and the king's majesty in concealing such a vile, detestable and unnatural Treason, enterprized by them against his gracious sovereign, who hath been ever so good and gracious to his subjects: protesting that if he had a thousand lives to render, and were able to suffer ten thousand deaths, it were not a sufficient satisfaction and recompense for his offence. And that God had preserved him from many great perils, when his life was in extreme danger, to bring him to this public Declaration of that detestable and horrible fact, in presence of all the people, uttered by him in these words following: 'To my own shame, and to the shame of the devil, but to the glory of God.' And for satisfaction of the consciences of all those that have or can make any doubt of the truth of this so clear a matter, he acknowledged that his haunting with Restalrig, who was a man without religion, and subject to many other vices, as also his continual being in company with the laird of Bour, who likewise was irreligious and without fear of God, and his being ingyred by them into their matters after his first sight of Restalrig's Letter written by him to Gowrie, brought him from one sin to another, and consequently upon this grievous crime, for the which most justly, worthily and willingly, he is now to render his life. And thereupon he desired all the people there present to beware of evil company, and namely of the society of those who are void of religion; saying to them, That this was the most glorious day that ever his eyes did see. In the midst almost of these Speeches, he had prostrate himself, and fell upon his knees in presence of the whole people, making a very pithy Prayer, in the form following:

'O Father, how shall I call thee Father, that am so unworthy to be called thy son? I have wandered astray like a lost sheep, and thou of thy mercy hast brought me home unto thee, and hast preserved my life from many dangers until this day, that I might reveal these hidden and secret mysteries, to mine own shame, and thy glory. Thou hast promised, that whensoever a sinner from his heart will repent and call to thee, that thou wilt hear him, and grant him mercy.'

And thus he continued a good space in a most fervent prayer, to the great admiration of all the standers by. And having ended the same, one of the Ministers prayed again, and the Prisoner joined with him, 'That God would forgive his sins, and receive his soul to mercy.' After which, Sprot standing up made divers requests: 1. That what he had delivered by his Confession on the scaffold, might be put into his Process, that the world might take notice of it. 2. That such as were present (as they might have opportunity) would be suitors unto the king, that his majesty would forgive him this offence; for the which, he said, he craved pardon of God, of his sovereign, and the world. And 3, he desired those of the ministry which were present, that wheresoever they came they would proclaim in the pulpit his Confession of his crime, his sorrow for the same, and his full hope that God would pardon him. And to the end that this might be performed, he took the hands of such ministers as stood near about him, so binding a promise on them. And here, being told by the said ministers and other persons of quality, that being so near his departure out of the world, it concerned him to speak nothing but the truth, and that upon the peril of his soul: he answered, 'That to the end they should know, that he had spoken nothing but the verity, and that his Confession was true in every respect, he would (at the last gasp) give them some apparent token for the confirmation of the same. Then fitting himself to the ladder, the Executioner cometh to him, and, as the manner is, asking forgiveness of him; 'With all my heart,' saith he, 'for you do but your office, and it is the thing I desire; because suffering in my body, I shall in my soul be joined to my Saviour.'—Afterward, ganging up the ladder with his hands loose and untied, being on the upper part thereof, he desired liberty to sing the 6th

Psalm, and requested the people to accompany him in the singing thereof. Which being granted, he took up the Psalm himself with a very loud and strong voice, far by his accustomed form, being before his coming to the scaffold a weak-spirited man, of feeble voice and utterance; and was assisted with the number of a thousand persons at the least, who accompanied him in singing that Psalm. After the ending whereof he again openly repeated and ratified his said former Confession: and with that, recommending his soul to God, he fastened a cloth about his own eyes, and was cast over the ladder, so ending this mortal life. Before his last breath, when he had hung a pretty space, he lift up his hands a good height, and clapped them together aloud, three several times, to the great wonder and admiration of all the beholders. And very soon thereafter he yielded his spirit.

87. The Process and Trial of ROBERT LOGAN, of Restalrig, for High Treason, in conspiring with John Earl of Gowrie, to murder King James I. 7 JAMES I. A. D. 1609.

IN the year 1608, the earl of Dunbar, walking in his own garden, and conversing with a country gentleman, who lived near the place, falling accidentally to discourse on the matter of Gowrie's Forfeiture; this gentleman told the earl, that he being lately in company with one Sprott, a Notary, who lived in Eyemouth, who was ordinarily employed in the laird of Restalrig's service as a notary and trustee, and who was long acquainted with this gentleman who was speaking to the earl; told the earl, That this Sprott had told him things concerning that Treason which he had never heard before; but that he had never told it, so long as those concerned were alive. The Earl was curious to have the information, which the gentleman told him, and was in short:

'That unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig, then dead, was a co-partner and contriver with the earl of Gowrie, and his brother Mr. Alexander, in all that affair; and that Sprott had several letters, yet lying by him, which he had found amongst Restalrig's Papers, and some papers belonging to one, commonly called laird Bour, the greatest confident of any man that Restalrig had, and who was also intimate with Sprott the notary.'—Whereupon the earl of Dunbar acquainted the King's Advocate, and Sprott was seized and carried into Edinburgh; who, before several lords of the Council, did, with great remorse of conscience, acknowledge,

'That he knew perfectly that Robert Logan, late of Restalrig, was privy to, and upon the fore-knowledge of Gowrie's treasonable Conspiracy: and for the greater assurance of his knowledge, deponeth, That he knew, that there were divers Letters interchanged betwixt them, anent the treasonable purposes aforesaid, in the beginning of the month of July 1600; which Letters, James Bour, called laird Bour, servitour to Restalrig (who was employed mediator betwixt them; and privy to all that errand) had in keeping; and shewed the same to Sprott, in the place of Fastcastle.—And deponed, 'That he did abstract (i. e. steal) quietly from James Bour, the principal Letter written by Restalrig to the earl of Gowrie, which Bour had brought back from the earl of Gowrie (as was the custom amongst them at that time); and that when James Bour employed him (Sprott) to look over his Papers; that he did keep the same, and that it was yet in his keeping, and was in his chest, among his writings, where he left it when he was taken; (and accordingly, the Letter was found there by the Sheriff-depute who was ordered by sir Wm. Hart, Lord-Justice of Scotland, to seize the said chest, and search for this Letter, which was found, and delivered to the King's advocate).

Whereupon the king's advocate produced the summons of Treason, which was raised by warrant under the seals, on the 5th of Feb. 1609; against all the defenders and others concerned, to compare before our sovereign lord, or his Commissioner, and the estates of parliament, and justice-general, on the 19th day of April, 1609, to answer, &c. And likewise produced the verifications of the Executions, which were sworn to, by the heralds, messengers and witnesses, in plain parliament: all which are contained at length in the Records of parliament; as are also the letters of relaxation and executions thereupon; relaxing Robert Logan, eldest son to unquhil Robert Logan the accused, from the horn, and all perils thereby: which relaxations were registered in publick Records before the day of comparence: and then the Lord Advocate produced for verifying of the dittay and crimes, the priprincipal letters, and did put them in the Clerk-Register's hands (where they lie among the public records); as likewise the Depositions of the witnesses, taken by the Lords of the Articles, in common form.

All which being produced in presence of his majesty's Commissioner, and the estates of parliament, upon the day of 1609, the defenders cited, and not comparing; the Advocate desired the Estates declaration on the relevancy: the true extracts whereof are as follow:

Sir Thomas Hamilton of Binnie, kt. Advocate to our sovereign lord, in his highness's name, for proving of the points of the said summons, and reason and cause of Treason and Lese Majesty contained therein, repeated divers missive bills, all written and subscribed by the said unquhill laird of Restalrig. All the Depositions of the witnesses, examined before the Lords of Articles before; and before the lords of secret council, George Sprott's Depositions, and conviction and execution to the death, for the same cause of Treason as Gowrie: together with divers writs and other probations, which were presently produced, before the said estates, by the said Lord-Avocate, in our sovereign lord's name, for proving of the foresaid summons of Treason, and the reason and cause of lese majesty contained therein: of the which missive bills and depositions produced by the said advocate in our sovereign lord's name, for proving the said Summons of Treason, and reasons therein contained, against the said Robert Logan and his foresaids; the tenour follows:

"Right Honourable Sir; my duty, with service remembered: Please you understand, my lord of Gowrie, and some others his lordship's friends and well wishers, who tenders his lordship's preferment, are upon the resolution you know, for the revenge of that cause: and his lordship has written to me anent that purpose; whereto I will accord in case ye will stand to and bear a part; and before ye resolve, meet me and Mr. Alex. Ruthven in the Caanongate, on Thursday the next week, and be as wary as you can: indeed Mr. Alex. Ruthven spoké with me, four or five days since; and I have promised his lordship an answer within ten days at farthest. As for the purpose, how Mr. Alex. Ruthven and I has set down the course, it will be a very easy done turn: and not far by that form, with the like stratagean, wherof we had conference in T. S. But in case you and Mr. Alex. Ruthven forgather, because he is somewhat uncautious; for God's sake beware with his recklessness as to this of Padua; for he told me one of the strangest tales of a nobleman of Padua that ever I heard in my life, resembling the like purpose; I pray you, sir, think nothing, although this bearer understand of it, for he is the special secretary of my life; his name is laird Bour, and was old Manderston's man for dead and life, and even so now for me. And for my own part, he shall know of all that I do know in this world, so long as ever we live together; for I make him my household-man: he is well-worthy of credit; and I recommend him to you. Always to the purpose I think best, for our Plot, that we meet all at my house of Fast-castle: for I have concluded with Mr. Alexander, who I think shall be meetest to be conveyed quietly in a boat by sea; at which time, upon sure advertisement, I shall have the place very quiet and well provided; and as I receive your answer, I will post this bearer to my lord: and I pray you, as you love your own life, (because it is not a matter of mouse) be circumspect in all things, and take no fear but all shall be well. I have no will, that either my brother, or yet Mr. N. R. my lord's old pedagogue, know any thing of the matter till all be done that we would have done; and then I care not who gets wit, that loves us. When ye have read, send this my letter back again with the bearer, that I may see it burnt myself; for so is the fashion in such errands: and if you please write your answer on the back hereof, in case ye will take my word for the credit of the bearer, and use all expedition; for the turn would not be long delayed. Ye know the king's hunting will be shortly; and then shall be best time, as Mr. Alexander has assured me, that my lord has resolved to enterprize that matter. Looking for your answer, commits you to Christ's holy protection. From Fastcastle, the 18th day of July, 1600." Sic subscribitur, Yours to utter power ready,

"Laird Bour, I pray you haste you west to me about the errand I told you; and we shall confer at length of all things. I have received a new letter from my lord of Gowrie, concerning the purpose that Mr. Alexander his lordship's brother spoke to me before: and I perceive that I may have advantage of Dirleton; in case his other matter take effect; as we hope it shall. Always, I beseech you, be at me the morn and even; for I assured his lordship's servants, that I shall send you over the water, within three days, with a full resolution of all my will, anent all purposes; and I shall indeed recommend you and your trustiness to his lordship, as ye shall find an honest recompence for your pains in the end. I care not for all the land I have in this kingdom, in case I can grip of Dirleton; for I esteem it the pleasantest dwelling in Scotland. For God's cause keep all things secret, that my lord, my brother, get no knowledge of our purposes; for I rather be earded quick. And so looking for you, I rest till speering. (Sic subscribitur,) Yours to power ready,

RESTALRIG.

"From the Caanongate, the 18th day of July. P. S. I am very ill at ease, therefore speed you hither."

"Right honourable sir; all my hearty with humble service remembered. Since I have taken in hand to enterprize with my lord of Gowrie, your special and only best beloved; as we have set down the plot already, I will request you, that you will be very circumspect and wise, that no man get an advantage of us. I doubt not but you know the peril to be both life, lauds and honour, in case the matter be not wisely used. And, for my own part, I shall have a special respect to my promise that I have made to his lordship, and Mr. Alexander his lordship's brother, although the scaffold were set up. If I cannot come to Falkland the first night, I shall be timely in St. Johnston on the morn. Indeed, I lippered for my lord himself, or else Mr. Alexander his lordship's brother, at my house of Fastcastle, as I wrote to them both. Always I repose on your advertisement of the precise day, with credit to the bearer; for howbeit he be but ane sillie glyed old carle, I will answer for him, that he shall be very true. I pray you, sir, read, and either burn or send again with the bearer; for I dare hazard my life, and all I have else in the world, on his message, I have such proof of his constant truth. So commits you to Christ's holy protection. (Sic subscribitur.) Yours to all power, with humble service ready,

“My lord, my most humble duty with service, in most hearty manner remembered: at the receipt of your lordship's Letter, I am so comforted, especially as your lordship's purpose communicated to me therein, that I can utter my joy, nor find myself able how to encounter your lordship with due thanks. Indeed, my lord, at my being last in the town, Mr. Alexander, your lordship's brother, imparted somewhat of your lordship's intention, anent that matter, unto me. And, if I had not been busied about some turns of my own, I thought to have come over to St. Johnston, and spoken with your lordship. Yet always, my lord, I beseech your lordship, both for the safety of your honour, credit, and more than that, that your life, my life, and the lives of many others, who may, perhaps, innocently smart for that turn afterwards, in case it be revealed by any, and likewise the utter wraking of our lands and houses, and extirpating of our name; look that we be all as sure as your lordship, and I myself shall be, for my own part. And then, I doubt not, but with God's grace, we shall bring our matter to ane fine, which shall bring the contentment to us all, that ever wished for the revenge of Machiavelian massacring of our dearest friends. I doubt not, but Mr. Alexander, your lordship's brother, has informed your lordship what course I laid down, to bring all your co-associates to my house of Fast-castle by sea; where I should have all materials in readiness, for their safe receiving on land and into my house; making, as it were, but a manner of passing time in ane boat on the sea, in this fair summer-tide; and no other strangers to haunt my house, while we had concluded on the laying our plot; which is already devised by Mr. Alexander and me. And I would wish, that your lordship would either come, or send Mr. Alexander to me; and thereafter, I would meet your lordship in Leith, or quietly at Restalrig; where we should have prepared ane fine batted kit, with sugar, and comfits, and wine; and thereafter confer on matters; and the soqner we brought our purpose to pass, it were the better, before harvest. Let not Mr. W. R. your old pedagogue, ken of your coming: but rather would I, if I durst be so bold to intreat your lordship, once to come and see my own house, where I have kept my lord Bothwell in his greatest extremities; say the king and his council what they would: and in case God grant us happy success in this errand, I hope both to have your lordship, and his lordship, with many others of your lovers and his, at a good dinner before I die. Always I hope, that the king's buck-hunting at Falkland this year, shall prepare some dainty cheer for us, against that dinner, the next year, jocose hoc to animate your lordship, at this time: but afterwards we will have better occasion to make merry. I protest, my lord, before God, I wish nothing with a better heart, nor to atchieve to that which your lordship would fain attain unto; and my continual prayer shall tend to that effect; and with the large spending of my lands, goods, yea, the hazarding of my life, shall not afray me from that, although the scaffold were already set up, before I should falsify my promise to your lordship, and persuade your lordship thereof: I trow, your lordship has ane proof of my constancy already or now: but, my lord, whereas your lordship desires, in your letter, that I crave my lord, my brother's mind anent this matter, I utterly disassent from that, that he ever should be ane counselor thereto; for in good faith, he will never help his friend, nor hurt his foe. Your lordship may confide more in this old man, the bearer hereof, my man, laird Bour, than in my brother, for I lippen my life, and all that I have else, in his hands: and I trow he would not spare to ride to hell's-gate to pleasure me; and he is not beguiled of my part to him. Always, my lord, when your lordship has read my letter, deliver it to the bearer again, that I may see it burnt with my own eyes: as I have sent your lordship's letter to your lordship again; for so, it is the fashion I grant: and I pray your lordship to rest fully persuaded of me, and all that I have promised; for I am resolved, howbeit it were to die in the morn. I must intreat your lordship to expedite Bour, and give him strait directions upon pain of his life, that he take never a wink of sleep, until he see me again; or else he will utterly undo us. I have already sent another letter to the gentleman your lordship knows, as the bearer will shew your lordship, of his answer, and forwardness with your lordship; and I shall shew your lordship farther at meeting, when and where your lordship shall think it meetest. Till which time, and ever, I commit your lordship to the protection of Almighty God. Your lordship's own sworn and bunden man, to obey and serve with effold and ever ready service, to his utter power, to his life's end. (Sic subscriptur)

 “ From Gunn's Green, the 29th day of July, 1600. P. S. Prays your Jordship hold me excused for my unseemly letter, which is not so well written, as mister were; for I durst not let any writers ken of it; but took two sundry idle days, to do it myself. I will never forget the good sport that Mr. Alexander, your lordship's brother, told me of a nobleman of Padua. It comes so oft to my memory; and indeed, it is Aparastur to this purpose we have in hand.”

“ Right honourable; my hearty duty remembered, ye know, I told you, at our last meeting, in the Cannongate, that Mr. Alexander my lord of Gowrie's brother, had spoken with me anent the matter of our conclusion; and for my own part, I shall not be hindmost. And sinsyne, I got a letter from his lordship's self, for that same purpose. . . And upon the receipt thereof, understanding his lordship's frankness and forwardness in it; God knows, if my heart was not lifted ten stages. I posted this same bearer to his lordship, to whom you may concredit all your heart in that, as well as I: For, and it were my very soul, I durst make him messenger thereof, I have such experience of his truth, in many other things. He is a silly old glyed carle, but wonder honest; and as he has reported to me his lordship's own answer, I think all matters shall be concluded at my house of Fastcastle; for I, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven, concluded, That ye should come with him and his lordship, and only another man with you, being but only four in company, intil one of the great fishing-boats be sea to my house, where ye shall land als safely, as on Leith-shore; and the house against your lordship's coming to be quiet; and when you are about half a mile from shore, as it were passing by the house, to gar set forth a waff. But for God's sake, let neither any knowledge come to my lord, my brother's ears, nor yet to Mr. W. R. my lord's old pedagogue; for my brother is kittle to shoe behind, and dare not enterprize for fear, and the other will dissuade us from our purpose with reasons of religion, which I can never abide. I think there is none of a noble heart, or carries a stomach worth a penny, but they would be content and glad, to see ane contented revenge of Greyteill's death; and the sooner the better his lordship be quick; and bid Mr. Alexander remember on the sport he told me of Padua: for I think with myself, that the cogitation on that should stimulate your lordship. And, for God's cause, use all your courses cum discretione. Fail not, sir, to send back again this letter: for Mr. Alexander learned me that fashion, that I may see it destroyed myself. . . So, till your coming, ever commits you heartily to Christ's holy protection. From Gunn's Green, the last day of July, 1600.”

The superscription is torn away from the last letter.

The DEPOSITIONS of the Witnesses produced, are as follow :

“ Mr. Alexander Watson, minister at Coldingham, of the age of 50 years, married, depones, The five missive Letters subscribed by the laird Restalrig, and produced in process by the Lord Advocate, for proving of the reasons of Treason pursued against Robert Logan, son and apparent heir to Robert Logan of Restalrig, being shown to this deponent; and he having at length sighted and considered the same, depones, That he takes upon his conscience, that he verily believes, that the said five missive Letters, and every one of them, are verily and truly written by the said unquhile Robert Logan of Restalrig, with his own hand: and proves this of some of his knowledge, that not only he thinks, that the character of every letter resembles perfectly the said unquhile Robert's hand-writ every way; but also agrees with his fashion of spelling, which he has particularly remembered in every one of the said missive Letters, in thir points following: First, That he never used to write ane x in the beginning of any word, such as zou, sor's, zeld, sea, and sick-like; but ever writ y, instead of the said x. That he writ all words beginning with w, with single v; and when that letter w fell to be in the midst or end, he put ane double w. That when he writ quhan, quhair, qtk, or any such words, whilk uses to be written and spelled by others, with which he wrote only qh, quhen, quhair, and sick-like. Whensver a word began with con, he never wrote con at length, but wrote with an l. Whenever t fell to be in the end of a word, he wrote it without a stroke through t, and did the like whenever it fell in any part of ane word. And for farther confirmation of the premises, he produced three Letters written every word, and subscribed by the said unquhile Robert Logan of Restalrig, and comparing them to the five other Missives produced by the Advocate, show evidently the direct conformity of the same, as well in the character and true resemblance of the hand-writ, as in the spelling and writing of divers writs, syllables and letter, according to the particulars above-specified. (Sic subscriptur.) Mr. ALEXANDER WATSON.”

“ Mr. Alexander Smith, minister of Chirneside, of the age of 30 years, or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with the unquhile laird of Restalrig, by reason he was pedagogue to his bairns, and has seen very many of his hand-writs; and having seen, read, and at length considered the five missive Letters produced by the Advocate; and inquired, if he knew the same to be the laird of Restalrig's proper hand-writ? Declared, upon his great oath, That he certainly believes the saids five letters, and every word thereof, to be the laird of Restalrig's proper hand writ; because he finds the character thereof to agree every way with the shape of his ordinary writing; and remarked very particularly the manner of Restalrig's spelling of many words, otherwise nor other men commonly uses to write and spell, according to the hail particulars remarked of before, by Mr. Alexander Watson, the witness immediately preceding; and, in these points, and in all others, conform to the said Mr. Alexander Watson's deposition in all things; reddens causam scientie, because he was perfectly acquainted with the laird of Restalrig's hand-writ in his lifetime; and was pedagogue to his bairns many years, and in his company. (Sic subscriptur.)

Mr. ALEXANDER SMITH.
 " Sir John Arnott, Provost of Edinburgh, of the age of threescore ten years, or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with Robert Logan of Restalrig, and with his hand-writ, because he had received divers of his letters himself, and seen many other letters written by him. And the five missive Letters produced by the Advocate being shown to him; and he having seen and considered the same, remembered that he had seen, read, and perfectly considered the Laird of Restalrig's hand-writ, as the letters written by the deponent at any time, or his own hand-writ. And so takes on his conscience, That the foresaids five missive Bills, produced by the Advocate, are the proper hand-writ and subscription of the said unquihle laird of Restalrig, be his judgment. And, for verification thereof, has produced four writs, all written be the said unquihle laird of Restalrig, and sent to this deponent, to Archibald Johnston, agreeing perfectly in spelling and character, with the saids missives. (Sic subscriptur,) Sir JOHN ARNOTT."

" Alexander Cuik, Sheriff-Clerk of Berwick of the age of 50 years, or thereby, married, depones, That he was well acquainted with the unquihle laird of Restalrig, and has seen many and sundry of his writs, and received divers of his letters directed to himself; and being desired to see and consider the five Letters produced by the Advocate, and to declare whether he knew and esteemed to be all written by unquihle laird of Restalrig; depones, upon his conscience, That he believes and esteems the saids hail letters to be all written by the laird of Restalrig; reddens causam scientie, because, not only the character agrees every way with the shape of Restalrig's hand-writ; but also the spelling in many particulars, wherein Restalrig differed from other men's form of writing. And in the particulars thereof, depones conform to the two first Witnesses, the ministers of Coldingham and Chirnside; reddens eandem causam scientie. (Sic subscriptur,) ALEXANDER CUIK."

" William Home in Aytoun-mill, of the age of 33 years, or thereby, married, depones, That all the five Missives above-written, being shown to this deponent, and having at length considered every one of them, takes upon his conscience, That to his knowledge, that the saids five missive letters are all written and subscribed by the unquihle laird of Restalrig; for the special reasons contained in the Depositions made by Mr. Alex. Watson, and Mr. Alex. Smith, ministers; and Alex. Cuik, Sheriff-Clerk of Berwick; to whom he is conform in all things, reddens eandem causam scientie. (Sic subsc.) WM. HOME."

" John Horne, Notary in Aymouth, of the age of 42 years, or thereby, solutus, depones, The foresaids five missive bills, being at length sighted and considered by this deponent, depones and declares, upon conscience, to his knowledge, all the saids five Missives are the laird of Restalrig's proper hand-writ and subscription, for the reasons above-written in the deposition of Wm. Home, reddens eandem causam scientie. (Sic subsc.) JOHN HORNE."

" Mr. Wm. Hogg, minister at Aytoun, of the age of 30 years, or thereby, married, depones, That he knew well the laird of Restalrig, and has seen of his writs, and produced one letter, written by Restalrig to the laird of Aytoun, as written with Restalrig's own hand-writ. And having considered the five writs produced by the Advocate; declares, That he thinks them likely to be his writs; and that the same appears to be very like his writ, by the conformity of letters and spelling. (Sic subsc.) WM. HOGG."

The DEPOSITION and DECLARATION of George Sprott, as emitted by him, both before the Jury, judicially; and also upon the scaffold, at the time of his Execution, on the 12th of Aug. 1608. Which Deposition and Declaration was made before the Council, on the 10th Aug. 1608, written by the Clerk of Council, James Primrose; and subscribed by Sprott's own hand, in the presence of the earl of Dunbar, the earl of Lothian, the bishop of Ross, the lord Holy-rood-House, the lord Scoon, the lord Blantyre, sir William Hart, Lord Justice, Mr. John Hall, Mr. Patrick Galloway, Mr. Peter Hewart, all three Ministers of the Kirks of Edinburgh.

George Sprott, notary in Aymouth, being brought to the scaffold and place of execution, he, in public audience of the hail people, at the four nooks of the scaffold, ratified his former Deposition, anent his knowledge, and concealing of Restalrig's guiltiness of Gowrie's Treason: for the which, he craved God and his majesty humble forgiveness; being most sorry and grieved that he had offended God, and the king's majesty, in concealing such a vile, detestable, and unnatural Treason, enterprized by the earl of Gowrie and laird of Restalrig, against his natural king, so good and so godly a prince, who has ever been so gracious to his subjects, and to this hail island: protesting, That if he had a thousand lives to render, and were able to suffer ten thousand deaths, it is not sufficient satisfaction and recompence for his so foul and horrible offence; and that God had preserved him from many great perils, when his life was in extreme danger, to bring him to this public declaration of that detestable and horrible fact, in testifying of the truth; as he said publickly, in presence of all the people, in these words following: ' To my own shame, the shame of the devil, and the 'glory of God; for satisfying the consciences of all these (if any be), that has, or can make any doubt of the truth of this so clear a matter.' And he acknowledges, that his haunting with Restalrig, who was a man without religion, and subject to many other vices; and his thoughts of himself in thir matters, after the first sight of Restalrig's Letter written to Gowrie, and his continual bearing of company with Restalrig and laird Bour, who was irreligious, and without fear of God, brought him from one sin to another, and consequently to this grievous crime, for the which, most justly, worthily and willingly, he is now to render his life. And he desired all the people to beware of ill company; and namely, of the company of those who are void of religion. And he desired, that this his Declaration might be inserted in his Process: as also, he desired the ministers of God's Word to publish this Declaration to their folks, from their pulpits; and took every one of them who were present by the hand, with their promise to do the same: saying unto them, That this was the most glorious day that ever his eyes did see; and with these words he prostrates himself, and falls upon his knees, in presence of the hail people, and made a very pithy Prayer. (See p. 706). And so he continued a good space, in a most fervent prayer, to the great admiration and rejoicing of all the people; and in a better form and manner nor any of the beholders and hearers can be able to set down in writ, the same not being written in the present time, because there was no place of writing upon the scaffold, in respect of the prease and multitude of people. And going up the ladder, he desired liberty to sing the 6th Psalm, and requested the people to accompany him in singing thereof; which being granted, and he being at the ladder-head, the same was tane up and sung by himself, with a very loud and mighty voice, and was assisted with above the number of 500 persons, who with tears accompanied him in singing of that song. After the ending thereof, he repented and ratified his former Deposition: and with that, recommending his soul to God, he was thrown over, and so ended his mortal life. In witness whereof, we under-subscribers, who, for the most part, were all of us upon the scaffold with him, and remained with him unto the time of his death; and others of us in so convenient places near to the scaffold with him, that we did bear all that was spoken by him, have subscribed this presents with our hands. (Sic subsc.) Glasgow, B. Galloway, M. B. Brechin, Balfour of Borley, Holy-rood-house, John Preston, Thomas Regra, Peter Sharp, Balcanquhal, Mr. Hewat, Mr. George Blyth, Mr. Patrick Galloway, John Hall, Walter Charles Lamsden, Richard Tobie, Baillie of Edinburgh, William Speir, Baillie, James Ainsly, Baillie of Edinburgh, &c.

What is contained in this speech being consonant to his Deposition made before the Privy Councill, as also before the Inquest; here is added the Deposition, as emitted by him.—

This Sprott, after diuers Examinations, being moved with remorse of conscience, for the long concealing of the foreknowledge of this treasonable Conspiracy; confesseth, declareth, and deponeth, with the peril of his own life:

"That he knew perfectly, that Robert Logan*, late of Restalrig, was privy, and upon the foreknowledge of Gowrie's treasonable Conspiracy. And for the greater assurance of his knowledge, deponeth, that he knew that there were divers Letters interchanged betwixt them, anent the treasonable purpose aforesaid, in the beginning of the month of July, 1600. Which letters, James Bour, called laird Bour, serritor to Restalrig, (who was employed mediator betwixt them, and privy to all that errand) had in keeping, and shewed the same to Sprott in the place of Fastcastle. And producing the earl of Gowrie's letter to Restalrig; Which Letter, written every word with Restalrig's own hand, was subscribed by him after his accustomed manner, (Restalrig;) and was sent to the earl of Gowrie, by the said James Bour. After whose return within five days, with a new letter from Gowrie, he staid all night with Restalrig in Gun's Green (a house of Restalrig's): and Restalrig rode to Lothian, the morn thereafter, where he staid five or six days. Then after his returning passed to Fastcastle, where he remained a certain short space. And further deponeth, That he saw and heard Restalrig read the last letter, which Bour brought back to him from Gowrie, and their conference thereanent. And heard Bour say, sir, if you think to make any commodity by this dealing, lay your hand to your heart. And Restalrig answered, that he would do as he thought best. And further said to Bour, howbeit he should sell all his own land that he had in the world, he would pass through with the earl of Gowrie; for that matter would give him greater content-

* Great part of this Evidence is in the Trial of George Sprot, No. 86, though not so full. For the earl of Cromerty, in his Account of the Conspiracies of the earl of Gowrie, (from whence this is taken) says, p. 126, 'Mr. Crawford did bring a pamphlet printed at London, anno 1609, published by Dr. George Abbot, then archbishop of Canterbury, who being providentially in Scotland in the year 1608, the doctor's curiosity brought him in amongst the multitude of hearers of that Trial, of G. Sprott, whereby he was so convinced of the truth of Gowrie's Treasons, and of the malice of the king's calumniators, as moved the good doctor to intreat for an extract and account of the whole process, attested by sir William Hart, Lord Justice of Scotland, at that time (which the doctor brought with him to England, and caused it to be printed, with a long Preface, from which the Trial of G. Sprott, is taken.) But that Paper, printed at London, being drawn out as a Memorial for Dr. Abbot's own use, and not as a full Abstract of what is recorded, which I now publish from the original Depositions, Letters, and other Writs, lying in record.

ment, nor if had the whole kingdom: and rather or he should falsify his promise, and recall his vow that he had vowed to the earl of Gowrie, he should spend all that he had in the world, and hazard his life with his lordship. To whom Bour answered, You may do as you please, sir; but it is not my counsel that ye should be so sudden in that other matter. But for the condition of Dirltoun, I would like very well of it. To whom Restalrig answered, content yourself, I am at my wit's end.—And farther Sprott deponeth, That he entered himself thereafter in conference with Bour, and demanded what was done betwixt the laird and the earl of Gowrie? And Bour answered, That he believed that the laird should get Dirltoun without either gold or silver, but feared that it should be as dear unto him. And Sprott enquiring how that could be: Bour said, they had another pye in hand nor the selling of any land; but prayed Sprott, for God's sake, that he would let be, and not trouble himself with the laird's business; for he feared, within few days, the laird would either be landless or lifeless.—And the said George Sprott being demanded, If this his Deposition was true, as he would answer upon the salvation and condemnation of his soul; and if he would go to death with it, seeing he knoweth the time and hour of his death to approach very near? deponeth for answer, "That he hath not a desire to live, and that he knows the time to be short, having care of no earthly thing, but only for clearing of his conscience in the truth of all these things to his own shame, before the world, and to the honour of God, and safety of his own soul: That all the former points and circumstances contained in this his deposition, with the deposition made by him the 5th of July last, and the whole remanent depositions made by him sen that day, are true; which he will take on his conscience, and as he hopeth to be saved of God, and that he would seal the same with his blood."—And farther, being demanded, where this above-written Letter, written by Restalrig to the earl of Gowrie, which was returned again by James Bour, is now? deponeth, "That he abstracted it quietly from Bour, in looking over and reading Bour's letters which he had in keeping of Restalrig's; and that he left the above-written letter in his chest among his writings, when he was taken and brought away, and that it is closed and folded within a piece of paper." This foresaid Deposition was made by him the 10th August, 1608, written by James Primrose, Clerk of his majesty's Privy-Council; and subscribed with the said George Sprott's own hand; in the presence of the earl of Dunbar, the earl of Lothian, the bishop of Ross, the lord Scoon, the lord Holy-rood-house, the lord Blantyre, sir W. Hart, his majesty's justice, Mr. John Hall, Mr. Patrick Galloway, Mr. Peter Hewart, ministers of the kirks of Edinburgh. (Subscribed with all their hands.)

And also the 11th day of the foresaid month and year, the said George Sprott being ex-

mined in the presence of a number of the Council and ministers foresaid; and it being declared to him, That the time of his death now very near approached, and that therefore they desired him to clear his conscience with an upright declaration of the truth; and that he would not abuse the holy name of God, to make him, as it were, a witness to untruths; And specially being desired, that he would not take upon him the innocent blood of any person dead or quick, by making or forging lies and untruths against them:

"Deponeth, That he acknowledgeth his grievous offences to God, (who hath made him a reasonable creature) in-abusing his holy name with many untruths sen the beginning of this Process; but now being resolved to die, and attending the hour and time when it shall please God to call him, he deponeth with many attestations, and as he wisheth to be participaut of the kingdom of heaven, where he may be countable and answerable upon the salvation and condemnation of his soul, for all his doings and speeches in this earth, that all that he hath deponed sen the fifth day of July last, in all his severall depositions, were true in every point and circumstance of the same; and that there is no untruth in any point thereof."

And having desired Mr. Patric Galloway to make a prayer, whereby he might be comforted now in his trouble; which was done. "The said deponer, with many tears after the prayer, affirmed this his deposition to be true; and for the confirmation thereof, declared, that he would seal the same with his blood."

I had almost forgotten that, which in this action of his death was strange, and in a manner marvellous. For being urged by the minister and other of good rank upon the scaffold, that now at this end he should declare nothing but the truth (touching the matter for which he suffered) on the peril of his own salvation and condemnation of his soul; he for the greater assurance of that his constant and true Deposition, promised (by the assistance of God) to give them an open and evident token before the yielding of his spirit. Which he accomplished thereafter: for before his last breath, when he had hung a pretty space; he lift up his hands a good height, and clapped them together aloud three several times, to the great wonder and admiration of all the beholders. And very soon thereafter he yielded his spirit.

As in the Account of Gowrie's and his brother's Process, I did not insert the Libel and Summons, nor Executions, verbatim: as being very tedious and useless to readers; on the same motives I do so here, but I insert the Doom and Sentence verbatim: the Libel, Summons and Autographons of these and others being at full, in the public Records, and patent to all enquirers.

June 1609. To which Summons, with the Executions and Indorsations thereof respective foresaids, being this instant day read in presence of his majesty's Commissioner and Retutes of parliament, first in Latin, and thereafter in Scots; The said Robert Logan being oft times called of new, at the Tolbooth window of the said Court of Edinburgh, to have appeared and answered to the said Summons of Treason, and Reasons and Causes therein contained: And he not comparing to have defended in the said matter: and to have answered to the said Summons, The said air Thomas Hamilton of Byynie, kt., Advocate to our sovereign lord, desired the said estates declaration, if the Reasons of the said Summons were relevant: the which Estates found the said summons and Reasons and Causes therein contained relevant. Therefore the said Advocate of new for proving of the foresaid Summons of Treason raised against the said Robert Logan, bearing and containing as is above-written; repeated all the foresaid missive Bills, and the said Depositions of the said Witnesses examined before the saids Lords of Articles and Lords of Secret Council respective; and also George Sprotts Deposition, Conviction and Confession, in Judgment, and at his Execution to the death, for the said cause of Treason; with the hail other Writs and probations produced and repeated by him of before; for proving of the foresaid Summons of Treason, and Reasons therein contained; and desired the saids Estates of parliament yet, as of before, to advise the probations foresaid, led and deduced in the said matter; and to pronounce their sentence of parliament thereuntil, according to the said probations and their consciences: And thereafter, the hail Depositions of the Witnesses, missive bills, and hail writs, and probations, being read, seen, and considered by the foresaid hail estates of parliament; and they therewith being ripely advised, the said lord commissioner and estates of parliament findes, discerns, and declares, That the foresaid unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig committed and did in his life-time, open and manifest Treason, in all the points, articles, and manner, contained in the said Summons: and therefore it was given for doom by the mouth of Divid Lindsay, Dempster of parliament, in manner and form as follows:

‘ This court of parliament shows for law, that the said unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig, in his life-time committed the foresaid crime of treason and lese majesty; and that he was art and part guilty, and partaker thereof, against our sovereign lord and authority royal; and that the foresaid cruel, wicked and treasonable crimes were interpreted, by his causing, persuasion, counsel and help. Likeas, the said unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig, treasonably counselled the foresaid crime of lese majesty to his death, and in his death, in all manner, at length contained in the said summons: and therefore, depones and declares the name, memory and dignity of the said unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig, to be extinct and abolished, and his arms cancelled, riven and delete furth of the books of arms, and nobility; so that his posterity shall be excluded, and be unhabile to possess or enjoy any offices, honours, dignities, lands, tenements, rooms, rents, possessions or goods, moveable or unmoveable, rights and others whatsoever, within the kingdom, in all time coming; and that all the said goods, lands, rooms, tenements and other goods, moveable and unmoveable, rights and others whatsoever pertaining to the said unquhil Robert Logan of Restalrig; or which might otherways have pertained to him, at any time, since his conspiring of the said treasonable crimes, to be escheat and forefaulted to our sovereign lord; to appertain and remain perpetually with his majesty in property. And this I give for Doom.’

Note, Here, as in Gowrie’s Process, that the citing of dead persons is among the legal forms, prescribed both by our laws, and laws of several other nations.

88. The Trial of the Lord BALMERINOTH,* at St. Andrews, for High Treason: the 10th of March, 7 JAMES I. A. D. 1609. [Copied from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, Rotulæ in Archivo, A. 3033. 44, 10. And though short, is a more perfect Copy than that in the Cotton Library, Julius, F. 6. N. 34.]

THE Lords being set, the lord Balmerinoth was sent for; and being come, the Lord Advocate told him, There was a Warrant come from his majesty for his Trial, and therefore desired to know, whom he had entertained to speak for him.

He answered, “ He had great necessity to speak, the cause being such as concerned his

* The lord Balmerino was a professed Protestant: but, upon what motive is not known, he often pressed the king to write a Letter of Compliment to the Pope, which, it seems, his majesty had as often refused to do. Hereupon, as the thing is related, Balmerino writ the Letter, and bringing the king several Dispatches at a time when his majesty was in haste to be gone a hunting, thrust it in among the rest; and the king, through inadvertency, in that hurry, signed it. The Letter thus signed, was sent away, and no more heard of it till some years after, cardinal Bellarmine mentioning of it to the king’s disadvantage, his majesty was obliged to take notice of, and to question the Secretary about it.

life and estate; but he had greater necessity to hold his peace, by reason of his offence, which was such as it admitted no excuse; and my grief for it so great, as it will not suffer me to extenuate my crime: and therefore I will neither make any friend but rested in that, whereunto myself fell with out the advice of any; nor will I desire a lawyer to make that seem less, which I would have all the world know to be such as it is.—Herein are two points in which I would have all men satisfied concerning his majesty: First, for his majesty's innocency in the writing of the letter; for I protest I could never draw him to hear with patience my notion. But he did utterly and absolutely refuse to take that course against conscience, which would neither satisfy me, who in a politic natural course had conceived it might be becomful for his majesty; and so applied myself to that crooked device, which hath worthily brought me to this estate wherein I now stand.—The second thing concerning his majesty, is this: That whereas some in malice to his majesty, or my friends in commiseration of my estate, may think and report it too rigorous and cruel a course, which is held against me in a matter of this moment, the suggesting of a letter of recommendation, to proceed against my life and estate; I would have such know, that his majesty's clemency is many ways testified unto the world, in cases that have seemed more nearly to concern him; and therefore men should not judge of his majesty's disposition to mercy by this action: but rather cast their eyes upon my unhappiness, who have offended in such a point as his majesty can extend no favour to me without the damage of his own honour, which being dearer to him than his life, it must needs be more tendered than twenty thousand such lives as mine. And therefore I desire not to be spared at so dear a rate as the impeachment of his majesty's honour.—There are likewise two things concerning myself, which I desire all men to understand. First, That I had no aim at the alteration of Religion, or to bring in a Toleration, or what you will term it, by the writing of that letter: but merely a politic course, as I have said, which, as a natural man, I conceived might further his majesty's right. And this I protest to be true, as I shall answer God in the Day of Judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed.—Next, I would have no man think that it was gain or any private advantage that drew me to that: for I protest I never received or expected the least reward from any prince in the world, save from the King my master. And this, as I shall answer the great God in heaven."

This said, the Jury was called, and in their hearing was read the Indictment, which aggravated his crime by his majesty's favours to him, which had deserved more regard: by his majesty's refusal; by the dangers which did follow, or might have done: imputing all the Treasons which have been a-foot since, to be fruits of that letter; and lastly, charging him with having intelligence with foreign estates, and encroaches of the Gospel, for the subversion of the state of Religion.

To all these he replied not one word.

Then was read his Confession taken in Frankland, the effect of that which he made in London. Then was read the Speech he uttered before the Council at Whitehall, containing his sorrow, his sins, the favours he had received, his unworthiness of them, his desire to give his majesty satisfaction for his offence to the last drop of his blood. Last, was read a Letter from his majesty to the Lord Advocate, shewing his majesty's refusal to listen to the Lord President's motion, and setting down some circumstances which passed betwixt his majesty and the Lord President at the time of the refusal; against all which the President said nothing.

So the Jury going together, after a time returned, and found him Guilty of all the parts of the Indictment.

Then the Lords conferring upon the Bench; my Lord Justice signified, That they were not to proceed further till they knew more of the king's pleasure. And so advising the Lord President to fit himself for God; and giving the Jury thanks for their pains and care they had of his majesty's honour; the court rose.

He was by order from court detained a prisoner for some time; and afterwards made a sort of prisoner at large: till at last, in consideration of his submissive behaviour, and the sufferings he had undergone; the king was pleased to pardon him, and to restore his blood and estate.*

89. The Case of PROCLAMATIONS. Mich. 8 JAMES I. A. D. 1610. [12 Coke's Reports, 74.]

MEMORANDUM, that upon Thursday, 20 Sept. Regis Jacobi, I was sent for to attend the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, lord privy seal, and the chancellor of the duchy, there being present the attorney, the solicitor, and recorder; and two questions were moved to me by the lord treasurer; the one, if the king by his proclamation may prohibit new buildings in and about London, &c. the other, if the king may prohibit the making of starch of wheat; and the lord treasurer said, that these were preferred to the king as grievances, and against the law and justice: and the king hath answered, that he will confer with his privy council, and his judges, and then he will do right to them. To which I answered, that these questions were of great importance. 2. That they concerned the answer of the king to the body, viz. to the commons of the house of parliament. 3. That I did not hear of these questions until this morning at nine of the clock; for the grievances were preferred, and the answer made when I was in my circuit. And lastly, both the Proclamations, which now were shewed, were promulgated, anno 5 Jac. after my time of attorneyship: and for these reasons I did humbly desire them that I might have conference with my brethren the judges about the answer of the king, and then to make an advised answer according to law and reason. To which the lord chancellor said, that every precedent had first a commencement, and that he would advise the judges to maintain the power and prerogative of the king; and in cases in which there is no authority and precedent, to leave it to the king to order in it, according to his wisdom, and for the good of his subjects, or otherwise the king would be no more than the duke of Venice: and that the king was so much restrained in his prerogative, that it was to be feared the bonds would be broken: and the lord privy seal said, that the physician was not always bound to a precedent, but to apply his medicine according to the quality of the disease: and all concluded that it should be necessary at that time to confirm the king's prerogative with our opinions, although that there were not any former precedent or authority in law; for every precedent ought to have a commencement.

To which I answered, that true it is that every precedent hath a commencement; but when authority and precedent is wanting, there is need of great consideration, before that any thing of novelty shall be established, and to provide that this be not against the law of the land: for I said, that the king cannot change any part of the common law, nor create any offence by his proclamation, which was not an offence before, without parliament. But at this time I only desired to have a time of consideration and conference with my brothers, for 'deliberandum est diu, quod statuendum est semel'; to which the solicitor said, that divers sentences were given in the Star-chamber upon the proclamation against building; and that I myself had given sentence in divers cases for the said proclamation: to which I answered, that precedents were to be seen, and consideration to be had of this upon conference with my brethren, for that 'melius est recurrere, quam male currere'; and that indictments conclude, 'contra leges et statuta,' but I never heard an indictment to conclude, 'contra regiam proclamationem.' At last my motion was allowed, and the lords appointed the two chief justices, chief baron, and baron Altham to have consideration of it.

Note, the king by his proclamation, or other ways, cannot change any part of the common law, or statute law, or the customs of the realm, 11 H. 4, 37. Fortescue De laudibus Angliæ legum, cap. 9, 18 Ed. 4, 35, 36, &c. 31 H. 8, cap. 8, hic infra: also the king cannot create any offence by his prohibition or proclamation, which was not an offence before, for that was to change the law, and to make an offence which was not; for 'ubi non est lex, ibi non est transgressio': ergo, that which cannot be punished without proclamation, cannot be punished with it. Vide le stat. 31 Hen. 8, cap. 8, which act gives more power to the king than he had before, and yet there it is declared, that proclamations shall not alter the law, statutes, or customs of the realm, or impeach any in his inheritance, goods, body, life, &c. But if a man should be indicted for a contempt against a proclamation he shall be fined and imprisoned, and so impeached in his body and goods. Vide Fortescue, cap. 9, 18, 34, 36, 37, &c.

But a thing which is punishable by the law, by fine, and imprisonment, if the king prohibit it by his proclamation, before that he will punish it, and so warn his subjects of the peril of it, there if he permit it after, this as a circumstance aggravates the offence; but he by proclamation cannot make a thing unlawful, which was permitted by the law before: and this was well proved by the ancient and continual terms of indictments, for all indictments conclude, 'contra legem et consuetudinem Angliæ, or 'contra leges et statuta, &c.' But never was seen any indictment to conclude 'contra regiam proclamationem.'

So in all cases the king out of his providence, and to prevent dangers, which it will be too late to prevent afterwards, he may prohibit them before, which will aggravate the offence if it be afterwards committed: and as it is a grand prerogative of the king to make proclamation, for no subject can make it without authority from the king, or lawful custom, upon pain of fine and imprisonment, as it is held in the 22 H. 8, Procl. B. But we do find divers precedents of proclamations which are utterly against law and reason, and for that void; for 'quæ contra rationem juris introductæ sunt, non debent trahi in consequentiam.'

An act was made, by which foreigners were licensed to merchandize within London; H. 4, by proclamation prohibited the execution of it; and that it should be in suspense 'usque ad proximum parliament,' which was against law. Vide dors. claus. 8 H. 4. Proclamation in London. But 9 H. 4, an act of parliament was made, that all the Irish people should depart the realm, and go into Ireland before the feast of the Nativity of the blessed Lady, upon pain of death, which was absolutely in terrorum, and was utterly against the law.

Hollished 722. anno Domini 1546, 37 H. 8, the whore-houses, called the stews, were suppressed by proclamation and sound of trumpet, &c.

In the same term it was resolved by the two chief justices, chief baron, and baron Altham, upon conference betwixt the lords of the privy council and them, that the king by his proclamation cannot create any offence which was not an offence before, for then he may alter the law of the land by his proclamation in a high point; for if he may create an offence where none is, upon that ensues fine and imprisonment: also the law of England is divided into three parts, common law, statute law, and custom; but the king's proclamation is none of them: also 'malum aut est malum in se, aut prohibitum,' that which is against common law is 'malum in se, malum prohibitum,' is such an offence as is prohibited by act of parliament, and not by proclamation. Also it was resolved, that the king hath no prerogative, but that which the law of the land allows him.

But the king for prevention of offences may by proclamation admonish his subjects that they keep the laws, and do not offend them; upon punishment to be inflicted by the law, &c.

Lastly, if the offence be not punishable in the star-chamber, the prohibition of it by proclamation cannot make it punishable there: and after this resolution, no proclamation imposing fine and imprisonment, was afterwards made, &c. But see 12 Coke's Reports 20.

90. The Cases of BARTHOLOMEW LEGATT and EDWARD WIGHTMAN, for Heresy: 10 JAC. I. A. D. 1612. [Fuller's Church Hist. B. 10. § 4.*]

A true Relation of the Commission and Warrants for the Condemnation and Burning of Bartholomew Legatt and Edward Wightman; the former at West Smithfield, the latter at Litchfield.

BUT leaving the outlandish, let us come to our English Vorstinus (though of far less learning, of more obstinacy, and dangerous opinions) I mean that Arian, who this year suffered in Smithfield: his name Bartholomew Legate, native county Essex, person comely, complexion black, age about 40 years: of a bold spirit, confident carriage, fluent tongue, excellently skilled in the Scriptures; and well had it been for him, if he had known them less, or understood them better; whose ignorance abused the word of God, therewith to oppose God the word. His conversation (for ought I can learn to the contrary) very unblameable; and the poison of heretical doctrine is never more dangerous, than when served up in clean cups, and washed dishes.—King James caused this Legate ofieu to be brought to him, and seriously dealt with him to endeavour his conversion. One time the king had a design to surprize him into a confession of Christ's Deity, as his majesty afterwards declared to a right reverend prelate, by asking him, Whether or no he did not daily pray to Jesus Christ? Which, had he acknowledged, the king would infallibly have inferred, that Legate tacitly consented to Christ's divinity as a searcher of the hearts. But herein his majesty failed of his expectation, Legate returning, That indeed he had prayed to Christ in the days of his ignorance, but not for these last seven years. Hereupon the king in choler spurned at him with his foot; 'away base fellow' (said he) it shall never be said, that one stayeth in my presence, that hath never prayed to our Saviour for seven years together.—Often was he convened before the bishops in the consistory of St. Paul's, where he persisted obstinate in his opinions, flatly denying the authority of that court. And no wonder that he slighted the power of earthly bishops, denying the divinity of him, who is 'the shepherd and bishop of our souls.' 1 Pet. ii. 25. The disputation against him, was principally managed by John King, bishop of London, who gravelled and utterly confuted him with that place of Scripture, John xvii. 5. 'And now O Father, glorify thou me with thine ownself, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.' This text, I say, was so seasonably alledged, so plainly expounded, so pathetically enforced by the eloquence, and gravity of that bishop (qualities wherein he excelled) that it gave marvellous satisfaction to a multitude of people there present, that it is conceived, it happily unproselyted some inclinable to his opinions; though Legate himself remained pertinacious, both against the impressions of arguments, and scripture, daily multiplying his enormous opinions. It is the happiness nature indulgeth to monsters that they are all barren; whereas on the contrary, monstrous positions are most procreative of the like, or worse than themselves.

Before we set down his pestilent opinions; may writer and reader fence themselves with prayer to God, against the infection thereof; lest otherwise, touching such pitch (though but with the bare mention) defile us, casually tempting a temptation in us, and awaking some corruption which otherwise would sleep silently in our souls. And, if notwithstanding this our caution, any shall reap an accidental evil to themselves, by reading his damnable opinions, my pen is no more accessory to their harm, than that apothecary is guilty of murder, if others, out of a liquorish curiosity, kill themselves with that poison, which he kept in his shop for sovereign use to make antidotes thereof. His damnable Tenets were as followeth: 1. That the Nicene creed, and Athanasius creed, contain not a profession of the true Christian faith. 2. That Christ is not God of God begotten, not made; but begotten, and made. 3. That there are no persons in the Godhead. 4. That Christ was not God from everlasting, but began to be God, when he took flesh of the Virgin Mary. 5. That the world was not made by Christ. 6. That the Apostles teach, Christ to be man only. 7. That there is no generation in God, but of creatures. 8. That this assertion, God to be made man, is contrary to the rule of faith, and monstrous blasphemy. 9. That Christ was not before the fulness of time, except by promise. 10. That Christ was not God, otherwise than an anointed God. 11. That Christ was not in the form of God equal with God, that is, in substance of God, but in righteousness, and giving salvation. 12. That Christ by his Godhead wrought no miracle. 13. That Christ is not to be prayed unto.—For maintaining these opinions, Legate had long been in prison in Newgate, yet with liberty allowed him to go abroad; not contented wherewith he openly boasted, and often threatened to sue the court, which committed him, for reparations for false imprisonment; so that his own indiscretion in this kind, hastened his execution. For hereupon bishop King finally convented him in the consistory of St. Paul's, and that worthy prelate, foreseeing that his proceedings herein would meet with many listening ears, prying eyes, and prating tongues, chose many reverend bishops, able divines, and learned lawyers to assist him. So that the consistory, so replenished for the time being, seemed not so much a large court, as a little convocation. By the counsel and consent of these, by his definitive sentence, he pronounced, decreed and declared the foresaid Bartholomew Legate an obdurate, contumacious, and incorrigible heretic. And by an instrument called a Significavit, certified the same into the chancery, delivering him up unto the secular power, the church-keys in such cases craying the help of the civil sword. Whereupon, king James, with his letters, dated March 11, under the privy-seal, gave order to the broad-seal to direct the writ De Hæretico comburendo, to the sheriffs of London, for the burning of the foresaid Legate. * Now as the bishop herein surrendered Legate to the secular power, my Ecclesiastical History in like manner resigns him to the Civil Historian, together with all the doubts, difficulties, and legal scruples attending on, or resulting from his condemnation. Let the learned in the law consider on what statute the writ for his burning was grounded, whether on those old statutes enacted in the reigns of Richard the 2nd, and Henry 4th; or on the branch of some other new sta-

* Some learning concerning Heresy and the writ De Hæretico comburendo, is to be found in 5 Co. Rep. Caudrey's case, 12, Co. Rep. 20, 56, 89, 92 (Legatt's case) Barrington's Obs. on Stat. 2 H. 4. 2 H. 5. See also in 1 Hale's P. tute to that effect. Let them satisfy us, how far those laws were repealed in 1mo Elizabeth, and how far they still stand in force; as, though not to [pretended] Lollardism, yet to blasphemy. Let them examine the judgment of the learned Fitz-Herbert, whether sound in his assertion, That heretics, before the writ of their burning be issued out against them, must first be convicted of heresy before a provincial convocation; whilst others affirm, That they being convicted before their ordinary, sufficeth, provided it be for such opinions which convocations have formerly condemned for heretical.—To Smithfield he was brought to be burned. See here, it is neither the pain nor the place, but only the cause makes a Martyr. In this very Smithfield how many Saints in the Marian days, suffered for the testimony of Jesus Christ? Whereas now one therein dieth in his own blood for denying him. Vast was the conflux of people about him. Never did a scare-fire at midnight summon more hands to quench it, than this at noon-day did eyes to behold it. At last, refusing all mercy, he was burned to ashes. * And so we leave him, the first that for a long time suffered death in that manner: and, oh that he might be the last to deserve it! In the next month Edward Wightman of Barton upon Trent, convicted before Richard Neile bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, was burned at Litchfield for far worse opinions (if worse might be) than Legate maintained. Mary Magdalen indeed was once possessed with seven devils, but ten several heresies were laid to Wightman's charge; namely, those of Ebion, Cerinthus, Valentinian, Arrius, Macedonius, Simon * Hume tells us (appendix to the reign of James 1st.) "Stowe says that these Arians were offered their pardon at the stake if they would merit it by a recantation." The following are the words of Stow: "Wednesday the 18th of March, Legat, an obstinate Arian heretique, was burned in Smithfield: he refused all favour and contemned all ecclesiastical government, and upon Easter Eve, the 11th of April following, Edward Wightman, another obstinate miscreant heretique, was burned at Litchfield, having likewise more favour offered him than he had grace to accept." Stow's Annales, 1004. He has not one syllable of pardon, or the stake, or recantation. Thus it is, as bishop Butler has observed in his excellent Sermon on the government of the tongue, that "Some persons, when they have heard the least imperfect hint of an affair, will, out of their own head, add the circumstances of time and place and other matters to make out their story." Mrs. Macaulay says that "one of these heretics was lunatic at the time of his condemnation:" for which assertion I cannot find the slightest trace or pretence of authority, unless it be what Hume farther says, that "a madman who called himself the Holy Ghost," probably he had in his mind Wightman, "was without any indulgence for his frenzy condemned to the same punishment."

Magus, Manes, Manichæus, Photinus, and of the Anabaptists. Lord! What are we when God leaves us? Did ever man maintain one heresy, and but one heresy? Chains of darkness, we see, have their links, and errors are complicated together. God may seem well-pleas'd with this seasonable severity. For the fire thus kindled, quickly went out for want of fuel. I mean, there was none ever after that openly avowed these heretical doctrines. Only a Spanish Arias, who, condemned to die, was notwithstanding suffered to linger out his life in Newgate, where he ended the same. Indeed, such burning of heretics much startled common people, pitying all in pain, and prone to asperse justice itself with cruelty, because of the novelty and hideousness of the punishment. And the purblind eyes of vulgar judgments looked only on what was next to them, (the suffering itself) which they beheld with compassion, not minding the demerit of the guilt, which deserved the same. Besides, such being unable to distinguish betwixt constancy and obstinacy were ready to entertain good thoughts even of the opinions of those heretics, who sealed them so manfully with their blood. Wherefore king James politely preferred, that heretics hereafter, though condemned, should silently, and privately waste themselves away in the prison, rather than to grace them and amuse others with the solemnity of a public execution, which in popular judgments usurped the honour of a persecution.

James R. James by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our right trusty, and right well beloved Counsellor, Thomas, lord Ellesmere, our Chancellor of England, Greeting. Whereas the reverend father in God John bishop of London having judicially proceeded in a cause of heresie against Bartholomew Legatt, of the city of London, in the diocess of the said bishop of London, concerning divers wicked errors, heresies, and blasphemous opinions, holden, affirmed and published by the said Bartholomew Legatt, and chiefly in the thirteen blasphemous positions following, viz. 1. That the creed called the Nicene Creed and Athanasius's creed, contain not a profession of the true Christian faith, or that he will not profess his faith according to the same creeds. 2. That Christ is not God of God begotten, not made, but begotten and made. 3. That there are no persons in the Godhead. 4. That Christ was not God from everlasting, but began to be God, when he took flesh of the Virgin Mary. 5. That the world was not made by Christ. 6. That the Apostles teach Christ to be Man only. 7. That there is no generation in God, but of creatures. 8. That this assertion, God to be made Man, is contrary to the rule of faith, and monstrous blasphemy. 9. That Christ was not before the fullness of time, except by promise. 10. That Christ was not God otherwise than anointed God. 11. That Christ was not in the form of God equal with God, that is, in substance of God, but in righteousness and giving salvation. 12. That Christ by his Godhead wrought no miracle. 13. That Christ is not to be prayed unto.—Wherein he the said Bartholomew Legatt hath before the said reverend father, maintained his said most dangerous and blasphemous opinions, as appeareth by many of his confessions publickly made and acknowledged. For which his damnable and heretical opinions, he is by definitive sentence, by the said reverend father, John, bishop of London, with the advice and consent of other reverend bishops, learned divines, and others learned in the laws, assisting him in judgment, justly adjudged, pronounced, and declared to be an obstinate and incorrigible heretic, and is left by them under the sentence of the great excommunication, and therefore, as a corrupt member, to be cut off from the Church of Christ, and society of the faithful, and is to be, by our secular power and authority, as an heretick, punished; as by the Significavit of the said reverend father in God, the said bishop of London, bearing date at London the third of March, in the year of our Lord 1611, in the ninth year of our reign, and remaining in our court of Chancery, more at large appeareth. And although the said Bartholomew Legatt hath, since the said Sentence pronounced against him, been often very charitably moved and exhorted, as well by the said bishop, as by many grave and learned divines, to disswade, revoke and remove him from the said blasphemous and heretical opinions, yet he arrogantly and willfully persisted and continueth in the same. We therefore, according to our regal function and office, minding the execution of justice in this behalf, and to give example to others, least they should attempt the like hereafter, have determined, by the assent of our council, to will and require, and do hereby authorize and require you, our said chancellor, immediately, upon the receipt hereof, to award and make out, under our great seal of England, our writ of execution according to the tenor in these presents ensuing. And these Presents shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge for the same.

Rex vicecomitibus London, salutem. Cum reverendus in Christo pater, Johannes, London episcopus, nobis Significavit, quod, cum ipse in quodam hereticæ pravitatis negotio contra quendam Bartholomeum Legatt, subditum nostrum, civitatis London, dicti London episcopi diocess. et jurisdictionis, ritè et legitime procedens, per acta inactitata, ducta, proposita, et per confessiones ipsius Bartholomei Legatt, coràm præfato episcopo judicialiter factas et recognitas, comperit et invenit præfatum Bartholomeum, Legatt quamplurimos nefandos errores, falsas opiniones, hæreses, et blasphemias execrandas, et scelerata dogmata catholicæ et orthodoxæ fidei et religioni et sacrosancto Dei verbo expressè contraria et repugnantia, scienter, maliciôsè, animoque pertinaci, obdurato, plandque incorrigibili, credere, tenere, affirmare, et publicare; idem reverendus pater, London episcopus, cum consilio et consensu tam reverendorum episcoporum et aliorum theologorum quam juris etiam peritorum in judicio assiden. et assisten., eundem Bartholomeum Legatt, per sententiam suam definitivam, obduratum, contumacem, et incorrigibilem hæreticum pronuntiavit, decrevit, et declaravit, eaque occasione, tanquam protervum hæreticum et membrum putridum et contagiosum, ab ecclesiâ Christi et fidelium communione recisum et amputatum fore. Cum igitur sancta mater ecclesia non habeat quod ulterius facere et exequi valeat in hac parte, idem reverendus pater præfatum Bartholomeum Legatt, ut blasphemum hæreticum brachio nostro seculari reliquit condignâ animadversione plectend', prout per literas patentes præfati reverendi in Christi patris, London episcopi, in hac parte superinde confect' nobis in chancellar' nostram certificat' est. Nos igitur ut zelator justitiæ et fidei catholicæ defensor, volentesque ecclesiam sanctam ac jura et libertates ejusdem et fidem catholicam manuteneere et defendere, ac hujusmodi hæreses et errores ubique, quantum in nobis est, eradicare et extirpare, ac hæreticos sic convictos animadversione condignâ puniri; attendentesq; hujusmodi hæreticum in formâ præd' convictum et damnatum juxtâ leges et consuetudines regni nostri Angliæ in hac parte consuet' ignis incendio comburi debere: Vobis præcipimus quod dictum Bartholomeum Legatt in custodiâ vestrâ existen' apud West-Smithfield in loco publico et aperto ex causâ præmissâ eorâum populo publicè igni committi, ac ipsum Bartholomeum Legatt in eodem igne re-liter comburi fac' in hujusmodi criminis detestationem, aliorumque Christianorum exemplum manifestum, ut in simile crimen labantur. Et hoc sub periculo incumbentis nullatenus omitatis. Teste, &c. HENRY HIBIRTE.

This containeth a Warrant to be granted by your majesty unto the lord chancellor of England for the awarding of a writ under the great seal of England to the sheriff of the city of London, for the burning of Bartholomeum Legatt, who is convicted of divers horrible heresies before the bishop of London, and by his sentence left to the secular power, as is by the said bishop certified to your majesty into your highness's court of Chancery. And is done by force of your majesty's commandment to me given under your highness's sign-manual.

HENRY HIBIRTE.

The King to the Sheriffs of London, greeting. Whereas the reverend father in Christ, John, bishop of London, hath signified unto us, that, when he in a certain business of heretical pravity against one Bartholomeum Legatt, our subject, of the city of London, of the said bishop of London's diocess and jurisdiction, rightly and lawfully proceeding, by acts enacted, drawn, proposed, and by the confessions of the said Bartholomeum Legatt, before the said bishop judicially made and acknowledged, hath found the said Bartholomeum Legatt very many wicked errors, false opinions, heresies, and cursed blasphemies, and impious doctrines, expressly contrary and repugnant to the Catholick faith and religion, and the holy word of God, knowingly and maliciously, and with a pertinacious and obdurate plainly incorrigible mind, to believe, hold, affirm, and publish; the same reverend father, the bishop of London, with the advice and consent, as well of the reverend bishops and other divines, as also of men learned in the law, in judgment sitting and assisting; the same Bartholomeum Legatt by his definitive sentence hath pronounced, decreed, and declared to be an obdurate, contumacious and incorrigible heretick, and upon that occasion as a stubborn heretick, and rotten contagious member to be cut off from the church of Christ, and the communion of the faithful; and whereas the holy mother church hath not power to do and execute any thing further in this matter, the same reverend father hath left the aforesaid Bartholomeum Legatt as a blasphemous heretick to our secular power, to be punished with condign punishment; as by the letters patents of the said reverend father in Christ, the bishop of London, in this behalf, above made, is certified unto us in our chancery. We therefore, as a zealous promoter of justice, and a defender of the Catholick faith, and being willing to maintain and defend the holy church, and rights and liberties of the same, and the Catholick faith; and such heresies and errors every where, what in us lieth, to root out and extirpate, and to punish with condign punishment hereticks so convicted; and considering that such an heretic, in form aforesaid convicted and condemned, ought according to the laws and customs of this our kingdom of England in this part accustomed, to be burned with fire; We do command you, that the said Bartholomeum Legatt, being in your custody, you do commit publicly to the fire, before the people, in a public and open place in West-Smithfield, for the cause aforesaid, and that you cause the said Bartholomeum Legatt to be really burned in the same fire, in detestation of the said crime, for the manifest example of other Christians, lest they slide into the same fault: And this you are in no wise to omit, under the peril that shall follow thereon. Witness, &c. HENRY HIBIRTE.

James R.—James, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our right trusty and right well-beloved Counsellor, Thomas, lord Ellesmere, our chancellor of England, Greeting. Whereas the reverend father in God, Richard, bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, having judicially proceeded in the examination, hearing, and determining, of a cause of heresy against Edward Wightman, of the parish of Burton upon Trent, in the diocess of Coventry and Lichfield, concerning the wicked heresies of the Ebionites, Cerinthians, Valentinians, Arians, Macedonians, of Simon Magus, of Manes, Manichees, of Photinus, and Anabaptists, and of other heretical, execrable, and unheard-of, opinions, by the instinct of Satan, by him excogitated and holden, viz. :

1. That there is not the trinity of persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the unity of the Deity. 2. That Jesus Christ is not the true natural Son of God, perfect God, and of the same substance, eternity and majesty with the Father in respect of his Godhead. 3. That Jesus Christ is only man and a meer creature, and not both God and man in one person. 4. That Christ, our Saviour, took not human flesh of the substance of the Virgin Mary his Mother; and that, that Promise, 'The Seed of the Woman shall break the serpent's head,' was not fulfilled in Christ. 5. That the person of the Holy Ghost is not God coequal, coeternal, and coessential with the Father and the Son. 6. That the three creeds, The Apostles Creed, the Nicene Creed, and Athanasius's Creed, are the heresies of the Nicolaitanes. 7. That he the said Edward Wightman is that prophet spoken of in the eighteenth of Deuteronomy in these words, 'I will raise them up a prophet,' &c. And that, that place of Isaiah, 'I alone, have troden the wine-press;' and that place, 'Whose fan is in his hand,' are proper and personal to him, the said Edward Wightman. 8. And that he the said Wightman is that person of the Holy Ghost spoken of in the Scriptures; and the Comforter spoken of in the 16th of St. John's Gospel. 9. And that those words of our Saviour Christ of the Sin of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, are meant of his person. 10. And that, that place, the fourth of Malachy, of Elias to come, is likewise meant of his person. 11. That the soul doth sleep in the sleep of the first death, as well as the body, and is mortal as touching the sleep of the first death, as the body is: And that the soul of our Saviour Jesus Christ did sleep in that sleep of death as well as his body. 12. That the souls of the elect saints departed, are not members possessed of the triumphant Church in Heaven. 13. That the baptizing of infants is an abominable custom. 14. That there ought not to be in the church the use of the Lord's Supper to be celebrated in the Elements of Bread and Wine; and the use of Baptism to be celebrated in the Element of Water; as they are now practiced in the Church of England: But that the use of Baptism is to be administered in water, only to converts of sufficient age of understanding, converted from infidelity to the faith. 15. That God hath ordained and sent him, the said Edward Wightman, to perform his part in the work of the Salvation of the world, to deliver it by his teaching, or admonition, from the heresy of the Nicolaitanes; as Christ was ordained and sent to save the world, and by his death to deliver it from sin, and to reconcile it to God. 16. And that Christianity is not wholly professed and preached in the Church of England, but only in part. Wherein he the said Edward Wightman, hath before the said rev. father, as also before our commissioners, for causes ecclesiastical within our realm of England, maintained his said most perilous and dangerous opinions, as appeareth by many of his confessions, as also by a book written and subscribed by him, and given to us. For the which his damnable and heretical opinions, he is, by definitive sentence, declared by the said rev. father, the bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, with the advice and consent of learned divines, and other persons learned in the laws assisting him in judgment, justly adjudged, pronounced and declared to be an obstinate and incorrigible heretic, and is left by them under the sentence of the great excommunication, and therefore, as a corrupt member, to be cut off from the rest of the flock of Christ, lest he should infect others professing the true Christian faith: and is to be by our secular power and authority, as an heretic, punished: as by the Significavit of the said rev. father in God, the bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, bearing date at Lichfield, the 14th of December, in the 9th year of our reign, and remaining in our court of Chancery, more at large appeareth. And, although the said Edward Wightman hath, since the said sentence pronounced against him, been often very charitably moved and exhorted, as well by the said bishop, as by many other godly, grave and learned divines, to dissuade, revoke, and remove him from the said blasphemous, heretical, and anabaptistical opinions; yet he arrogantly and wilfully persisteth and continueth in the same. We therefore, according to our regal function and office, minding the execution of justice in this behalf, and to give example to others, lest they should attempt the like hereafter, have determined, by the assent of our council, to will and require, and do hereby authorise and require you, our said chancellor, immediately upon the receipt hereof, to award and make out under our great seal of England, our writ of execution according to the tenour in these presents ensuing. And these presents shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge for the same.

Rex vic' civitatis nostræ Lich. salutem. cum reverendus in Christo pater, Richardus, providentiâ divinâ Coventr' et Lich' episcopus, nobis Significaverit, quod ipse contra et adversus quendam Edwardum Wightman, parochiæ de Burton super Trent, Coventr' et Lich' dioces., de et super nephandis heresibus Ebionis, Cerinthi, Valentiniani, Arii, Macedonii, Simonis Magi, Manetis, Manechorum, Photini, et Anabaptistarum, aliorumq; heresiarcharum, et insuper de aliis execrandis opinionibus instinctu Satana excogitatu et antehac inauditis, juxta canonum ecclesiasticorum, legumque et consuetudinum hujus regni nostri Angl' exigentiam, judicialit' procedens, prædictus Edwardus Wightman, coram præfato rev. patre, ac aliis theologis et jurisperitis sibi in judicio assistentibus, comparens, prædicta nephanda crimina, hæreses, ac alia detestanda blasphemia et errores, contumaciter et ex quâdam pertinaciâ, scienter, maliciose, animo; obdurato, publicavit, defendebat, et

Nos igitur, ut zelator justitiæ et fidei catholicæ defensor; volentesque ecclesiam sanctam, ac jura et libertates ejusdem, et fidem catholicam, manuteneri et defendere, ac hujusmodi hæreses et errores ubique (quantum in nobis est) eradicare et extirpare, ac hæreticos sic convictos animadversione condignà puniri, attendentesq; hujusmodi hæreticum, in formâ prædictâ convictum et damnatum, juxtâ leges et consuetudinem regni nostri, Angliæ in hac parte consuetem ignis incendio comburi debere; tibi præcipimus quod dict. Et hoc sub periculo incumbenti nullatenus omittas. Teste, &c. HENRY HIBIRTE.

This containeth a Warrant to be granted by your majesty unto the lord chancellor of England, for the awarding of a writ under the great seal of England, to the sheriff of the city of Lichfield, for the burning of Edward Wightman, who is convicted of divers horrible heresies before the bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and by his sentence left to the secular power, as is by the said bishop certified to your majesty, into your highness's court of Chancery.

And is done by force of your majesties commandment to me given under your highness's sign manual. HENRY HIBIRTE.

The King to the Sheriff of our city of Lichfield, Greeting. Whereas the rev. father in Christ, Richard, by Divine Providence of Coventry and Lichfield, Bishop, hath signified unto us that he judicially proceeding, according to the exigence of the ecclesiastical canons, and of the laws and customs of this our kingdom of England, against one Edward Wightman of the parish of Burton upon Trent, in the diocese of Coventry and Lichfield, of and upon the wicked heresies of Ebion, Cerinthus, Valentinian, Arius, Macedonius, Simon Magus, of Manes, the Manichees, Photinus, and of the Anabaptists, and other arch heretics; and moreover of other cursed opinions by the instinct of Satuo excogitated and heretofore unheard of, the aforesaid

VOL. II.

Edward Wightman appearing before the aforesaid rev. father, and other divines, and persons learned in the law, assisting him in judgment, the aforesaid wicked crimes, heresies and other detestable blasphemies and errors stubbornly and pertinaciously, knowingly, maliciously, and with an hardened heart, published, defended and dispersed; by definitive sentence of the said rev. father, with the consent of divines, and persons learned in the law aforesaid, justly, lawfully and canonically against the said Edward Wightman in that part passed, stands adjudged and pronounced an heretic, and therefore, as a diseased sheep, out of the flock of the Lord, lest our subjects he do infect by his contagion, he hath decreed to be cast out and cut off. And whereas the holy mother church hath not power to do or execute any thing further in this matter, the same reverend father, the same Edward Wightman as a blasphemous and condemned heretic, hath left to our secular power to be punished with condign punishment; as, by the letters patents of the aforesaid reverend father the bishop of Coventry and Lichfield in this behalf thereupon made, is certified unto us into our Chancery. We therefore, as a zealous promoter of justice and a defender of the catholic faith, and being willing the holy church, and the rights and liberties of the same, and the catholic faith, to maintain and defend, and such like heresies and errors every where, so much as in us lies, to root out and extirpate, and heretics so convicted, to punish with condign punishment; and considering that such an heretic in the aforesaid form convicted and condemned, ought, according to the laws and customs of this our kingdom of England in this behalf accustomed, to be burned with fire; do command thee that thou cause the said Edward Wightman, being in thy custody, to be committed to the fire in some public and open place within the city aforesaid, for the cause aforesaid, before the people, and the same Edward Wightman in the same fire cause really to be burned; in detestation of the said crime, and for a manifest example to other Christians, that they may not fall into the same crime. And this you are in no wise to omit, under the peril that shall follow thereon. Witness, &c.

91. The Earl of SHREWSBURY'S Case; or the Case of Dignities: 10 JAMES I. A. D. 1612. [12 Coke's Reports, 106.]

BY force of certain letters (bearing date 28 Martii 1612), of the lords of the privy council, directed to sir Humphrey Winch, sir James Lay, sir Anthony Saintleger, and sir James Hulleston; they did certify to their lordships the claim of Gilbert earl of Shrewsbury, to the dignities of the earldom of Waterford, and barony of Dangarvan in Ireland, in such manner as followeth;

King Henry the sixth, by his letters patent, in the twentieth year of his reign, did grant to his thrice beloved cousin John earl of Shrewsbury, in consideration of his approved and loyal services, in the city and county of Waterford, 'pro eo quoque eundem consanguineum nostrum prædicta terra nostra Hiberniæ in partibus illis contra inimicorum et rebellium nostrorum insultus potentius defendat, ipsum in comitem Waterford, una cum stilo et titulo ac nomine et honore cideam debitum ordinamus et creamus, habendum,' to the said earl and his heirs males of his body; and further by the said letters patent did grant the castles, lordships, honours, lands, and manors of Dungarvan to the said earl and the heirs males of his body, to hold the premises of the king and his heirs, by homage and fealty, and by the service of being his majesty's Seneschall in the realm of Ireland: afterwards in the parliament called Des Absentees, holden at Dublin in Ireland, the 10th of May the 28th of Henry the eighth, by reason of the long absence of George earl of Shrewsbury out of his realm; it was enacted, that the king, his heirs, and assigns, shall have and enjoy in the right of his crown of England, all honours, manors, castles, lordships, franchises, hundreds, liberties, count-palatines, jurisdictions, annuities, fees of knights, lands, tenements, &c. and all and singular possessions, hereditaments, and all other profits, as well spiritual as temporal whatsoever, which the said George earl of Shrewsbury and Waterford, or any other person or persons had to his use, &c. King Henry the eighth, by his letters patent, the twenty ninth year of his reign, reciting the said statute De Absentees; 'nos præmissa considerantes, et nolentes statum, honorem, et dignitatem prædicti Comitum diminueri, sed amplius augere, de certâ scientiâ et mero motu, &c.' did grant to the said earl and his heirs, the abbey of Rufford, with the land thereto belonging in the county of Nottingham, and the lordship of

Rotherham in the county of York, the abbies of Chesterfield, Shirbrook, and Glossadel in the county of Derby, with divers other lands and tenements of great value, to be holden in capite; and the questions were;

1. Whether by the long absence of the earl of Shrewsbury out of Ireland, by reason whereof the king and his subjects wanted their defence and assistance there, the title of the honour be lost or forfeited, the said earl being a peer of both realms, and residing here in England.

2. Whether by the said act De Absentees, an. 28 H. 8. the title of the dignity of the earl of Waterford, be taken from the said earl, as well as the manors, lands, tenements, and other hereditaments in the said act specified.

And afterwards by other letters patent of the lords of the council, dated the 27th of Sep. 1612, the two chief justices and the chief baron were required to consider of the case which was inclosed within their letters, and were to certify their opinions of the same.

Which case was argued by counsel learned in the law, in behalf of the said earl, before the said chief justices and chief baron, upon which they have taken great consideration and advisement, after they had read the preamble, and all the said act of the 28 H. 8. it was unanimously resolved by them all, as followeth.

As to the first it was resolved, that forasmuch as it does not appear what defence was requisite, and that the consideration executory was not found by office to be broken as to that point, the said earl of Shrewsbury notwithstanding does remain earl of Waterford.

As to the second, it was resolved, that the said act of the twenty eighth of H. 8. De Absentees, doth not only take away the possessions which were given to him at the time of his creation, but also the dignity itself, for although one may have a dignity without any possession 'ad sustinendum nomen et onus,' yet it is very inconvenient that a dignity should be clothed with poverty: and in cases of writs, and such other legal proceedings, he is accounted in law a nobleman, and so ought to be called, in respect of his dignity; but yet if he want possessions to maintain his estate, he cannot press the king in justice to grant him a writ to call him to the parliament; and so it was resolved in the case of the lord Ogle, in the reign of Ed.

6th, as the baron of Burleigh, lord treasurer of England, at the parliament anno 35 Eliz. did report: and therefore the act of the 28 H. 8, (as all other acts ought to be) shall be expounded to take away all inconvenience, and therefore by the general words of the act, viz. 'of honours and hereditaments, the dignity itself, with the lands given for maintenance of it, are given to the king, and the dignity is extinct in the crown:' and the cause of degradation of George Nevill, duke of Bedford, is worthy the observation, which was done by force of an act of parliament, 16 June 17 Ed. 4, which act reciting the making of the said George Duke, doth express the cause of his degradation in these words: 'and forasmuch as it is openly known, that the said George hath not, or by inheritance may have any livelihood to support the same name, estate, and dignity, or any name of estate;' and oftentimes it is to be seen, that when any lord is called to high estate, and hath not convenient livelihood to support the same dignity, it induceth great poverty and indigence, and causeth oftentimes great extortion, imbracery and maintenance to be had, to the great trouble of all such countries where such estate shall happen to be: wherefore the king by advice of his lords spiritual and temporal, and by the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, ordaineth, establisheth, and enacteth, that from henceforth the same creation and making of the said duke, and all the names of dignity given to the said George, or to John Nevill, his father, be from henceforth void and of none effect, &c. In which act, these things are to be observed.

1. That although the duke had not any possessions to support his dignity, yet his dignity cannot be taken away from him without an act of parliament.

2. The inconveniences do appear where a great state and dignity is, and no livelihood to maintain it.

3. It is good reason to take away such dignity by act of parliament; and therefore the said act of the 28 H. 8, shall be expounded according to the general words of the writ, to take away such inconvenience: and although the said earl of Shrewsbury be not only of great honour and virtue, but also of great possessions in England, yet it was not the intention of the act to continue him earl in Ireland, when as his possessions in Ireland were taken away from him, but that the king at his pleasure might confer as well the dignity as the possessions to any other, for the defence of the said realm. And the said letters patent de anno 29 H. 8, have no words to restore the dignity which the act of parliament hath taken away; but it was not the intent of the king 'diminuere statum, honorem, et dignitatem ipsius Comitum,' but 'augere' his possessions for maintenance of his dignity, for so much appears by this word 'augere'; for he doth by the said letters patent, with exceeding great bounty, increase the revenues of the said earl in England, which the king did think was an increase of large possessions in England, instead of all that which was taken away from him by the act of the 28 H. 8.

And whereas it was objected, that the general words 'honours and hereditaments' are explained and qualified by the said words relative subsequent, 'which the said George, or any to his use hath;' and therefore it shall not be intended of any honour or hereditament, but of such whereof others are seized to his use, and no man can be seized of the dignity, and therefore that the said act doth not extend to it; but that it is to be understood 'reddendo singula singulis,' and these words, 'which the said George earl hath,' are sufficient to pass the dignity; and with this agrees the opinion of all the judges of England in Nevill's case upon the like words in the statute of the 28 H. 8, in the seventh part of my Reports, fol. 33 and 34.

92. The Arraignment and Confession of the Lord SANQUIRE, (who being a Baron of Scotland, was arraigned by the Name of Robert Creighton, esq.) at the King's-bench Bar, in Westminster-hall, the 27th of June, for procuring the Murder of John Turner, a Master of Defence, whom he caused to be shot with a Pistol by one Carliel, a Scottish-man, for thrusting out one of his Eyes in playing at Rapier and Dagger.* 10 JAMES, I. A. D. 1612. [From an authentic MS. lent the Editor of the second edition of this Work.]

ALL things according to the usual form being prepared, and the prisoner brought to the bar, his Indictment was read.

some years before, meeting with a sturdy fencer, one John Turner, who was a master of the weapon-trade in his own school, the young lord strove to put some affront upon him, (making it no little conquest to disgrace a master in the art, as they termed it) and the man apprehensive of the attempt, with a bold rudeness pressed so hard upon him, that he thrust out one of the baron's eyes. This mischief was much regretted by Turner, and the baron being conscious to himself that he meant his adversary some ill, took the accident with as much patience, as men that lose one eye by their own default use to do for the preservation of the other. Some time after, being in the court of the late great Henry of France, and the king (courteous to strangers) entertaining discourse with him, asked him, How he lost his eye: He (cloathing his answer in a better shroud than a plain fencer's) told him; It was done with a sword: The king replies, Doth the man live? And that question gave an end to the discourse, but was the beginner of a strange confusion in his working fancy, which neither time nor distance could compose, carrying it in his breast some years after, till he came into England, where he hired two of his countrymen, Gray and Carlisle, men of low and mercenary spirits, to murder him; which they did with a case of pistols in his own house in White-friars, many years after the loss of his bodily eye: Thus the baron lost the eye of his reason. This bold nefarious act was very deeply resented at court, and the king's commands were so active for apprehension of the murderers, that they were all three taken; one upon the borders of Scotland, so far had his fears carried him; another in a ship bound for Hamburgh, who escaping in a storm, the seas delivered up; and the lord himself being obscured, in this tempest of his soul, hearing 1,000*l.* was offered to bring his head, so liberal was the king for justice, threw himself into the arms of his mercy, by the mediation of the archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he presented himself an object of pity; but no intercession could prevail, their lives satisfied the law, the baron not having the honour of a noble death." He then was demanded by the Clerk of the Crown, whether he was guilty of procuring the murder of John Turner, or not guilty? He made answer to this effect:

"My Lords; That which at my Arraignment the other day I pleaded to the contrary, was not that I could be so unworthy to deny any syllable of that I had formerly professed before so honourable personages, nor out of any desire that the least thing might be concealed, which might serve for evidence to convince me of this foul fact, whereof I now stand accused and indicted, and whereof I formerly have, and now do most willingly and penitently confess myself to be guilty; my purpose then was only to gain time for the disposing of some temporal affairs, and for the better preparing of my soul for her departure from this body; for that I should long live, I neither expect, nor much desire. And now, my lords, if that may stand with the course of the laws of the land (whereof I am altogether ignorant) I will ease this jury, the king's counsel, and your lordships, and will confess myself guilty of this fact in the same manner as it is laid in the Indictment.—Or if that may not be permitted by law, yet shall I give such evidence against myself, as I shall not leave it needful in any point to be aggravated; only in some circumstances I will endeavour, if not to extenuate the fact, yet at least to move your lordships and this worthy audience to pity my case; wherein as I know I can say nothing of substance that can help in a legal course of proceeding, so I much fear that those circumstances I would deliver, I shall not be able at all to express my own thoughts, both by reason of my own imperfections, and also for that I lack the perfect use of the phrase of this country. But for that point, in such passages as I shall not be understood in, I will humbly intreat your lordships in your wisdom, and this audience in their charity to conceive, that my meaning is, to make a full and true relation of all the passages of this business.—The first motive of this fatal accident was (as it is well known,) that Turner playing with me at foils, now about seven years past, at my lord Norria's house in Oxfordshire, put out one of my eyes, and that (as my soul and conscience was over-persuaded) willingly and of set purpose. At the taking up of the foils, I protested unto him, I played but as a scholar, and not as one that would contend with a master in his own profession, and thereupon requested him, That he would play as with a scholar; the order whereof, though it be unknown to your lordships, yet to divers honourable personages that are present it is known to be, to spare the face. After this loss of mine eye, and with it the great hazard of the loss of life, I must confess I ever kept a grudge of my soul against him, but had no purpose to take so high a revenge; yet in the course of my revenge, I considered not my wrongs upon terms of Christianity, for then I should have sought for other satisfaction; but being trained up in the courts of princes and in arms, I stood upon the terms of honour, and thence befel this act of dishonour; whereby I have offended, 1. God; 2. My prince; 3. My native country; 4. This country; 5. The party murdered; 6. His wife; 7. Posterity; 8. Carliel, now executed; and lastly 9. My own soul. And am now to die for mine offence.—1. First towards God; I hope that my earnest prayer and supplications unto him, have, (now at last) obtained his grace and pardon for this my horrible sin, for at my return from this place, the people (of whom I expected scorn and disgrace) did by their pity and clemency move that in me, which the pride of mine own heart would not till then suffer me to see; then I became to have a sense and feeling of the fulness of my offence, which formerly I could not persuade myself was any more than a just revenge for so foul a wrong; and since that time such inward comfort and consolation have I felt in my soul, that

I doubt not but that my hearty contrition and true repentance is accepted before God, and that he of his mercy hath pardoned mine offence.—2. For my offence unto the king's majesty; if I had more than my life to make satisfaction unto him, I would think myself happy: and this favour I request of your lordships, that the king may be truly informed of the sincerity of my confession, and of my hearty repentance, and if it please him not of his favour and clemency to pardon me this offence, yet I humbly desire, That I may die in his grace and favour.—3. For mine own country, let me intreat you that this my singular offence may not be laid as an aspersion or blemish unto my country; but that myself alone may bear the shame of it, and my body the punishment.—4. Of this country, because I do deserve no favour, I desire that of Christianity, you would be pleased to pity me as a repentant and sorrowful man.—5. For the party murdered, my blood must satisfy the law, to which I shall add such true repentance and hearty sorrowfulness, as I hope, by Christ's mercy, will make satisfaction for my offence.—6, 7. For his wife and posterity, some relief I have given already, and more, God willing, I will add unto it.—8. For Carliel, his too much affection to me made him too forward an executioner of my will and wicked purpose; but I hope by his repentance, he is pardoned his offences to God: in him I must confess my sin is doubled, and I pray God to pardon it me; for the manner of the murder, I neither commanded, nor gave allowance to pistol him. But I confess, that at the request of Carliel and Graye, I gave either of them a pistol to bring themselves off, after they should kill him. For him who is now suspected, I protest before God and all this company, I never knew him, nor spake with him, nor dealt either directly or indirectly with him in all my life.—9. Lastly, For myself, I commit my body to the king, and my soul to God.

“But, my lords, besides mine own offence, which in its own nature needs no aggravation, divers scandalous reports are given out, which blemish my reputation, which is more dear to me than my life—First, That I made shew of reconciliation with Turner, the which I protest is utterly untrue; for what I have formerly said, I do again assure your good lordships, That ever after my hurt received, I kept a grudge in my soul against him, and never made the least pretence of reconciliation with him; yet this, my lords, I will say, that if he would have confessed and sworn he did it not of purpose, and withal would have forsworn arms, I would have pardoned him: for, my lords I considered that it must be done either of set purpose or ignorantly: if the first, I had no occasion to pardon him; if the last, that is no excuse in a master: and therefore for revenge of such a wrong I thought him unworthy to bear arms.—The second obloquy is, That to defer the revenge so long, argues an inveterate malice, and an ill disposition. For the deferring of my revenge, I answer, that at the receiving the hurt I was so astonished that I thought I had been slain; and by the opinion of my physicians from Oxford and other places, my life was then in much danger for many days after; yet after some months recovering my strength, and getting some ease in mine eye, I went immediately over into France, and there continued two years, hoping of the recovery of mine eye again. At the king of Denmark's coming hither, I came out of France, and then hearing at Greenwich that Turner played there before the two kings; I must confess, that after those prizes done, I sought for him up and down; and if I had met him in any place of the court, I was then resolved to have run him through; though I must confess the place had made my offence far greater. But missing him there that day, the next day I went after him to London, and there sought after him for two days, but could not meet with him; the first news then I heard of him was, that he was gone into the country unto the lord Norris's, and so for that time I was prevented of my purpose. Before his return I went into Scotland; and after my return again, I laid about for him, ever intending all this while to have acted it myself. But seeing the difficulty of it, both for that I was well known about the White-friars, where he dwelt and kept school, and yet did not myself know Turner, but carried others with me for my direction, I afterward agreed with two of my countrymen, who undertook the acting of this tragedy; but nothing ensued upon it, and therefore I desire I may conceal their names. After this, my occasions called me over into France and other parts, so that my residence in this country was very little, till now at last I dealt with this unfortunate Carliel, who took unto him one Graye for his partner, and brought him unto me; and those two I directed to take a lodging in the Fryers, the better to discover how myself might come to revenge myself on the person of Turner. But after some delay they told me, I could with no conveniency come myself to do it: but they said, they would undertake it: to which I assented, but prescribed neither time nor manner how they could effect it. After this, Graye fell quite off, and went to the ships for Denmark, which Carliel came and told me, and withal that Turner was then gone out of town; but since Graye had deceived him, he would have nobody but himself, and would assuredly kill him at his return, though it were with the loss of his own life. But I being long delayed by two others whom formerly I spake of, and now also by these two, and seeing Graye gone, I thought that Carliel had spoken this but to give me content, and the more to insinuate himself into my favour, so that I left him without any further direction, or much regard to his speech; and never heard more of him till I heard that Turner was slain; the time whereof, and the manner, I protest before God and his angels, I was altogether ignorant of; for had I expected it to have been done, I would not have staid myself here at the last cast, for before that time I could with ease have gone over into France, for I had a licence to travel, and for transporting some horses.—Another aspersion is laid on me, that this was God's just judgment, for that I was an ill-natured fellow, ever revengful and delighted in blood. To the first, I confess I was never willing to put up a wrong, where upon terms of honour I might right myself, nor never willing to pardon where I had a power to revenge. To the second I say, that I was never guilty of blood till now, yet I have had occasion to draw my sword both in the field, and upon sudden violences, and have both given and received hurts, and yet was never guilty of blood unto death till now; only I must confess that upon commission from the king to suppress wrongs done me in my own country, I put divers of the Johnsons to death; but for that I hope, I shall need neither to ask God nor man forgiveness.—Lastly, The objection that since my imprisonment I have attempted, by the means of my countrymen, to break prison and escape, a course which I protest upon my salvation was never moved unto me by any, nor did I ever lodge such a thought in my breast; and for the further confirmation of that, I refer myself unto the marshal, and his officers, who in the prison have seen and best know my deportment during my imprisonment.—“ Thus, my lords, have I troubled you with a tedious discourse, whereof I know no circumstance can in any point of law do me any good, nor would I be thought all this while to plead for my life; my desires only are, that my life might satisfy for mine offence, and that my reputation might not be left defamed.

“ Lastly, my lords, and the rest of the honourable and worshipful presence, I desire in charity, that you will consider these few circumstances to move you to pity. 1. The indignity I received from so mean a man. 2. That it was done willingly, for I have been informed he bragged of it after it was done. 3. The perpetual loss of mine eye. 4. The want of law to give satisfaction for such a loss. 5. The continual blemish I received thereby. Lastly, Unto this, I add my voluntary and free confession. Let me now add my last request to your lordships, that the king may be truly informed of these things. Contrition, confession, and satisfaction are the means to obtain pardon from God for our sins; and these many times do move the mercy of princes, which if his highness shall extend to me, I shall desire my life may be spent to do him service; or if not, I shall most willingly submit myself to his majesty's good pleasure, and yield to die.”

Sir Francis Bacon. In the case of life and death the Jury's part is in effect discharged; for after a frank and formal confession their labour is at an end: so that what hath been said by Mr. Attorney General, and shall be by myself, is rather convenient than necessary.—My lord Sanquair, your fault is great; it cannot be extenuated, and it needs not be aggravated; and (if it needed) you have made so full an anatomy of it, out of your own feeling, as it cannot be matched by myself, or any man else out of a conceit.—This Christian and penitent course of yours, draws me thus far, that I agree, that even in extreme evils there are degrees: so this instance of your offence is not of the highest strain; for if you had sought to take away a man's life for his vineyard as Ahab did, or for envy as Cain did, or to possess his bed as David did, surely this offence had been more odious. Your temptation was revenge, which the more natural it is to man, the more have laws, both divine and human, sought to repress it: (mihi vindicta.) But in one thing you and I shall never agree, that generous spirits (you say) are hard to forgive; no, contrariwise, generous and magnanimous spirits are readiest to forgive; and it is a weakness and impotency of mind to be unable to forgive.—But to the purpose; howsoever murder may arise upon several motives less or more odious, yet the law both of God and man involves them in one degree; and therefore you may read that in Job's case, which was a murder upon a revenge, and matched with your case; he for a dear brother, and you for a dear part of your own blood; yet there was a severe charge given, 'it shall not pass unpunished.'—And certainly the circumstance of time is heavy unto you; it is now five years since this unfortunate man, Turner, be it upon accident or despite, gave the provocation, which was the seed of your malice. All passions are assuaged with time; love, hatred, grief, &c. all fire burns out with time, if no fuel be put to it: for you to have been in the gall of bitterness so long, and to have been in a restless case of his blood, is a strange example. And I must tell you plainly, that I conceive you have sucked those affections of dwelling in malice rather out of Italy, and outlandish manners, where you have conversed, than out of any part of this island of England and Scotland.—But now farther, my lord, I would have you look a little upon this offence in the glass of God's judgment, that God may have the glory. You have friends and entertainment in foreign parts: it had been an easy thing for you to have set Carliel, or some other bloodhound on work, when your person had been beyond the seas; and so this news might have come to you in a packet, and you might have so looked on how the storm would pass: but God bereaved you of this providence, and bound you here under the hand of a king, that is, though abundant in clemency, yet no less zealous of justice.—Again, when you came in at Lambeth, you might have persisted in the denial of the procurement of the fact, Carliel (a resolute man) might have cleared you: for they that are resolute in mischief, are commonly obstinate in concealing their procurers; and so nothing should be against you but presumption. But then God; to take away all obstruction of justice, gave you the grace (which ought indeed to be more comfort unto you than any evasion, or device, whereby you might have escaped) to make a clear confession.—Other impediments there were not a few, which might have been an interruption to this day's justice.—But God in his providence removed them.—But now, that I have given God the honour, let me also give it where it's next due, which is to the king our sovereign. This murder was no sooner committed, and brought to his majesty's ears, but his indignation (wherewith at first, he was moved,) cast himself presently into a great deal of care and providence to have justice done.—First, came forth his proclamation somewhat of a rare form, and devised and in effect directed by his majesty himself, and with that he did prosecute the offenders (as it were) with the breath and blasts of his mouth. Then did his majesty stretch forth his long arms, (for kings you know have long arms) one of them to the sea, where he took Gray shipped for Sweden, who gave the first light of testimony; the other arm to Scotland, and took hold of Carliel, ere he was warm in his house, and brought him the length of this kingdom under such safe watch and custody, as he could have no means to escape, nor learn no lessons to stand mute; in which case perhaps this day's justice might have received a stop. So that I may conclude that his majesty hath shewed himself God's true lieutenant, and that he is no respecter of persons, but English, Scots, noblemen, fencer, (which is but an ignoble trade) are all to him alike in respect of justice.—Nay, I may say farther, that his majesty hath had in this matter a kind of prophetic spirit; for at what time Carliel and Gray, and you, my lord, yourself, were fled no man knew whither, to the four winds; the king ever spake in a confident and undertaking manner, that wheresoever the offenders were in Europe, he would produce them forth to justice; of which words God hath made him master.—Lastly, to return to you, my lord, though your offence hath been great, your confession hath been free, and your behaviour and speech full of discretion; and this sheweth, that though you could not resist the temptation, yet you bear a generous and Christian mind, answerable to your noble family of which you are descended. This I commend in you, and take it to be an assured testimony of God's mercy and favour; in respect whereof all worldly things are but trash: and so it is fit for you, as your state now stands, to account them.

Then being demanded, whether he would speak any more for himself, he said, no; only desired that the king might be made acquainted with what he had already said.

Whereupon Judgment being required for the king; Mr. Justice Yelverton gave Sentence of death against him as followeth:

“ My Lord Squire; You are a nobleman of Scotland, and (as I have heard yourself say) a baron of above three hundred years antiquity; which I believe to be true. But now you have most wonderfully dishonoured the nobility of your ancient house by this unhappy action; an action of murder so base and so barbarous, as the like I never heard of, nor saw the like a man shall never read of.—The manner of it is such, as is exceeding strange: done upon the sudden! done in an instant! done with a pistol! done with your own pistol! under the colour of kindness: As Cain talked with his brother Abel, he rose up and slew him.—Your executioners of the murder left the poor miserable man that was murdered no time to defend himself; no time to pray for himself; scant any time to breathe out these last words, Lord have mercy upon me! The ground of this malice that you bore him grew not out of any offence that he ever willingly gave you, but out of the pride and haughtiness of your own self; for that in the false conceit of your own skill, you would needs importune him to that action, the sequel whereof did most unhappily breed your blemish, the loss of your eye.—And you have prosecuted this malice very long; for you solicited others, four or five years at the least, to have committed this foul and heinous murder. And this your fault is far greater than if you had committed the fact yourself; for then it had been but your own single murder only; but now have you made them who were the executioners of your malice, murderers also with you: so you have made their bodies subject to the justice of man, and their souls subject to the justice of God, which, without his great mercy, they must endure.—All these circumstances do exceedingly aggravate your offence.—This offence of yours is called one of the crying sins; for God said unto Cain, 'The voice of thy brothers blood' (a strange phrase, a voice of blood!) crieth unto 'me from the ground.'—And for the punishment of it, it is said elsewhere in the sacred word of God, 'That he that sheddeth man's blood, by 'man shall his blood be shed.' Again, 'But this 'punishment of blood is not indeed to shed 'blood; for it is better that one should die by 'the law, than many without it.'—You are, my lord, to take a serious consideration of the short estate of your life wherein presently you stand; for by the justice of the law, you must suffer the pains of death, and be assuredly persuaded, the time is not far off: for though the king be exceeding merciful, yet is he also exceeding just. And he hath had such an extraordinary care of justice in this case, that though it were plotted by you, my lord, that the murderer should escape, and fly into his own country of Scotland, far remote from the justice of the law of England; yet his majesty's care hath so pursued him, that there he was quickly apprehended, and that country could be no protection for him. Nay, his majesty most religiously, and most like a just prince, protested, that if he were in any part of Christendom to be found, he would surely have him; so zealous is he of justice in this so heinous an offence of murder. And in a matter that concerns justice, he respects not his own native nation of Scotland, more than he doth his own hereditary realm of England.—Therefore, my lord, prepare yourself to die; and though the manner of your death be by the law of England unfitting (as you perhaps may think) for a man of your honour and blood, yet surely it is fit enough for a man of your merit and offence. And the law of England makes no difference of subjects in matters of felony for the manner of their deaths, when there is no difference of subjects in the manner of their offences; and not where, but how a man dieth, maketh to the purpose: for the way to Heaven is of like difference from all places. And, indeed; there is no death miserable, which the death of the soul doth not follow.—Death is the way of all the world, the passage of all the earth, and the end of all men; and not men alone, but all worldly things are mortal, the soul of man only excepted.—Therefore, my lord, provide carefully that your soul may have a good and godly departure from the body, which will surely be by your unfeigned confession and earnest repentance of all your sins, and especially of this most bloody, this most heinous and crying sin, by your humble calling and crying upon God for his mercy and forgiveness, and by confident and steadfast faith in Christ Jesus, to receive and accept it.—For repentance is an act of all acts, and faith in the mercies of God is the Star that goeth before the face of repentance, and very exceeding available by these three syllables, peccavi. And so with this short exhortation I will end; and wish, whatsoever your life hath been heretofore, yet that your death may be happy now. And so I will proceed to Judgment.

"You have been indicted as accessory to wilful murder, as accessory in procuring the murder; and upon this indictment you have been arraigned, and upon your arraignment you pleaded Not Guilty; but since, upon better advisement and judgment, you have confessed the fact: The court therefore doth award, That you shall be had from hence to your former place of imprisonment, and from thence to the place of execution, and there be hanged till you be dead. And God have mercy upon your soul."

And then the judge, speaking to the sheriff, said, Mr. Sheriff, see execution be done.

On Monday following, being St. Peter's day, the 29th of June, 1612, the lord Sanquair was brought from the prison somewhat early in the morning, into the Great Palace-yard, before Westminster-hall great gate, there to suffer death on a gibbet erected for that purpose; where being ascended the ladder, he spake to the people a good while, excusing himself for the fact no otherwise than formerly he had done at the King's-bench bar: Asking God and the world forgiveness for the same, protesting his detestation thereof, now that he truly understood the foolishness of it; affirming, that till he first was brought to his trial, the devil had so far blinded his understanding, that he could not apprehend that he had done amiss, or otherwise than was fitting for a man of his rank and quality, having been trained up in the wars, and lived the life of a soldier, which sort of men, he said, stood more on points of honour than religion. He humbly thanked God that had opened his eyes, and given him the grace to see his offence, and truly to apprehend the foulness of it. At length, he professed himself to die a Roman catholic, and desired all Roman catholics there present to pray for him. He said, that for worldly respects, he had long neglected the public profession of his faith in that kind, and he thought God was angry with him for it; and he knew not but God might inflict this just punishment upon him for that neglect; and therefore he advised all men that stood so affected in heart, not to procrastinate nor delay; for delays, he said, are dangerous. The religion, he said, was a good religion, a saving religion, and if he had been constant in that religion, he was verily persuaded he had never fallen into that misery. So falling to his prayers for a while in private, and after in public praying for the king and queen, their royal issue, and the state both of England and Scotland, with the lords of the council and church, he submitted himself to the will of the executioner; who casting him off the ladder, suffered him there to hang a long time, that people in this great man might take notice of the king's greater justice.

Note, That this lord was tried by the country, but challenged his trial by peers, which was denied him, because though he were a lord in Scotland, yet he was no lord of the parliament here in England, nor had any English barony.—Note also, That Carliel, and another with him, but whether it were Gray or no, I cannot certainly affirm; but sure I am, it was one that was with Carliel when he did the fact (and I take it to be my lord's page), were hanging on two gibbets set up in Fleet-street, over against the great gate of the White friars, very early in the morning, before the lord Sanchar had his trial*.—Note also, That one of those gibbets was higher than the other by the length of a man, or thereabouts; and I demanding the reason thereof, was answered by a stander-by, that the manner of Scotland is, that when a gentleman is hanged with a man of meaner quality than himself, the gentleman hath the honour of the higher gibbet, and thinks himself much wronged if he be not so disposed of. Whether this answer was serious, or by way of scorn, let him that desireth to be resolved by enquiry resolve himself.

Sir Edward Coke, in his ninth Report, p. 117, et seq. gives the following Account of

THE LORD SANCHAR'S CASE.

ROBERT Creighton, lord Sanchar†, a baron of Scotland, of his malice prepenze at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, incited and procured Robert Carliel to kill John Turner, who accordingly associating himself with one James Irweng, the 11th of May now last past, killed the said John Turner within the city of London. And the king in his zeal to justice in this case, immediately sent for the two chief-justices, and chief-baron, and commanded there should be speedy proceeding against the lord Sanchar, according to law. To which the justices answered, That the lord Sanchar was but an accessory in this case, and therefore he (a) could not by law be convicted before the principal is attained; but if the principal could be apprehended, then both might be attained with more expedition than could be, if the principal should be attained by utlagary. Then it was asked, how the lord Sanchar, being an ancient baron of Scotland, should be tried: And it was answered by them, That none within this realm of England is accounted (b) a peer of the realm, but he who is a lord of the parliament of England; for every subject either is a lord of the parliament, or one of the commons, and the lord Sanchar was not a lord of the parliament within this kingdom, and therefore should be tried by the commons of the realm, viz. knights, esquires, or others of the commons; and therewith agree our books, as well ancient as others, (c) 11 E. 3, Brief 473, 8 R. 2. (d) Process. pl. ult. (e) 20 E. 4, 6, a. b. 20 E. L. (f) 360. Then the king asked, in what court, after the principal is attained, the lord Sanchar should be tried? And the justices answered, that forasmuch as the procurement was in Middlesex, it was most convenient to try him in the King's-bench: And thereupon the king resolved, that he should not be committed to the Tower, but to the prison of the King's-bench, where he might be, if occasion required, sooner and easier examined, than if he should be committed to the Tower: And the king commanded the said justices, that all things should be prepared for the legal proceeding; and that he would endeavour to cause not only the principal, but others also who might discover the truth of the fact, to be apprehended. And thereupon the said chief-justices conferred with the other justices of the king's-bench, before whom the lord Sanchar should be tried. And before them divers questions were moved concerning the legal proceeding in this case. 1. Upon the statute of (g) 2 E. 6, c. 24, by which it is enacted, as to this point in this manner: 'And further be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That where any murder or felony hereafter shall be committed or done in one county, and another person or more shall be accessory or accessories by any manner of wise to any such murder or felony in another county, that then an indictment found or taken against such acces-ory, or accessories, upon the circumstance of such matter before the justices of the peace, or other justices or commissioners, to enquire of felonies, where such offence of accessory or accessories in any manner of wise shall be committed or done, shall be as good and effectual in law, as if the principal offence had been committed or done within the same county where such indictment shall be found: and that the justices of gaol-delivery, or oyer and terminer, or two of them, of or in such county where the offence of any such accessory shall be hereafter committed and done, upon suit to them made, shall write to the Custos Rotulorum, or keepers of the Records, where such principal shall be hereafter attainted or convicted, to certify them whether such principal be attainted, convicted, or otherwise discharged of such principal felony; who upon such writing to them, or any of them directed, shall make sufficient certificate in writing, under their seal or seals, to the said justices, whether such principal be attainted, convicted, or otherwise discharged or not. And after they that so shall have the custody of such records, do certify that such principal is attainted, convicted, or otherwise discharged of such offence by the law; that then the Justices of gaol-delivery or of oyer and terminer, or other there authorised, shall proceed upon every such accessory, in the county or counties where such accessory or accessories became accessory, in such manner and form as if both the said principal offence and accessory had been committed and done in the said county where the offence of the accessory was or shall be committed or done. And that every such accessory, and other offenders above expressed, shall answer upon their arraignments, and receive such trial, judgment, order, and execution, and suffer such forfeitures, pains and penalties, as is used in other cases of felony: any law or custom to the contrary heretofore used in any wise notwithstanding. And upon this statute, divers (A) questions were moved; 1. If the indictment in the county of Middlesex of the accessory should recite, that the principal was indicted before Commissioners of oyer and terminer in the city of London (as in truth he was) or if the indictment should recite in facto, that the principal committed the murder in London, &c.? And it was resolved, that the indictment in Middlesex should recite, de facto, that the principal committed the murder in London. For the recital, that the principal is indicted of murder in London, is no direct affirmation that the principal committed the murder; for the indictment is but an accusation, and in lieu of the king's Declaration, which may be true or false; and this agrees with former precedents. And accordingly the indictment was drawn; upon which the accessory was convicted, as appears before by the indictment itself.

2. The second question moved upon the

statute, was, If the (i) justices of the King's-bench are within these words, justices of Gaol-delivery, or Oyer and Terminer? And it was objected, That the King's-Bench is the highest court of ordinary justice in criminal causes within the realm, and paramount the authority of justices of Gaol-delivery, and commissioners of Oyer and Terminer; and as it is held in 27 Ass. 1. is (k) more than the eyre; for they shall examine the errors of the justices in eyre, gaol-delivery, and oyer and terminer; and therefore inasmuch as the justices of the King's bench are paramount and superiors over all the others, they cannot be included within their inferiors, viz. justices of gaol-delivery, or of oyer and terminer. Also the justices of the King's-bench have a distinct and supreme court; and the justices of gaol-delivery, and oyer and terminer, other distinct and subordinate courts. And therefore it was adjudged, Hill. 30 El. Reg. in the King's-bench, that where R. (l) Smith was indicted of forgery of a false deed at the sessions of (m) peace in the county of Oxford; and the statute of 5 El. c. 14, which inflicts the punishment, and upon which act the indictment was grounded, provides, that the indictment shall be taken before justices of assize, and justices of oyer and terminer: and although the justices of peace by their commission have power to hear and determine felonies, trespass, &c. and have an express clause ad audiendum et terminand' so that they are, as it was urged, justices of oyer and terminer; yet it was resolved per tot' cur' that because there was a commission of oyer and terminer known distinctly by that name, and the commission of the peace known distinctly by another name, that the said indictment was not well taken, and therefore was quashed. But it was resolved, that the (n) justices of the King's-bench are the sovereign justices of gaol-delivery, and of oyer and terminer; and therefore they are included within the said words: and therefore it is held in 7 E. 4, 18. a. & 4 H. 7, 18. that if an indictment of forcible entry be removed into the King's-bench, the justices of the King's (o) bench shall award restitution; and yet the statute of 8 H. 6. c. 9, speaks only of justices of the peace; but the reason is, because they have the sovereign and supreme authority in such cases. And according to this resolution, the justices of the King's-bench wrote according to the said act to the justices of gaol-delivery in London, before whom the principal was, &c. who certified the record, &c. as appears before at large.

3. It was moved, if the lord Sauchar could not in term-time be indicted, arraigned, and convicted, at Newgate before commissioners of (p) oyer and terminer for the county of Middlesex, and it was resolved he could not; for the King's-bench, as hath been said, is (q) more than eyre, and therefore in (r) term-time no commissioner of oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery, by the common law, can sit in the same county where the King's-bench sits; for (s) in presentia majoris cessat potestas minoris, and therewith agrees 27 Ass. p. 1. But Carliel and Irweng were indicted and attainted in London, where the murder was committed, before justices of oyer and terminer in the (t) term-time, because in another county than where the King's-bench sits.

4. It was moved, if the lord Sauchar being indicted in the king's-bench, if there must be (u) fifteen days for the return of the re. fa. for if fifteen days are requisite, he cannot be arraigned this term. And it was resolved not, because the offence was committed in Middlesex, where the court sits; but if the indictment had been taken in any other county, and removed thither, there ought to be 15 days, &c. and therewith agree the precedents, and the continual usage of the same court.

5. It was resolved, that forasmuch as there was not any direct proof, that James Irweng was commanded or procured by the lord Sauchar to commit the murder, but that he associated himself to Robert Carliel who was procured by him, that the (v) best way is to indict the lord Sauchar, as accessory to Robert Carliel only: for indictments which concern the life of men ought to be framed as near the truth as may be, et eo potius because they are to be found by the oath of the grand inquest, which finding is called (x) verdictum, quasi dictum veritatis: and yet it was resolved, that if one is indicted as accessory to (y) two, and he is found accessory to one, the verdict is good. upon appeal of commandment, force, aid, or receipt, until, be that is appealed of the deed be attainted, so that one like law be used therein through the realm: which is but an affirmance of the common law: for there cannot be an accessory unless there be a principal, no more than there can be a shadow unless there be a body. But this word Appeal has two significations in law; one general, and that is taken for an accusation, generally, and accusatio est duplex, either by inquisition, i. e. by indictment, and that is at the suit and in the name of the king; or by the party, and in his name, as in appeal by writ or bill: or by appeal, i. e. accusation of an approver; and therewith agree all our books, and Stamf. l. 9. de Plac' cur' c. 52. f. 142. b. where he saith, after the confession of the crime, the felon may appeal, s. accuso others condutors with him to do the felony: and in this particular sense for accusation of the party it is often taken. And as there are two manner of accusations, so there are two manner of attainders of felony, s. by judgment given, s. one at the king's suit, and the other at the suit of the party; and both these attainders are in two manners, one after appearance, and the other upon default after appearance, two ways, s. either by verdict or confession; and at the suit of the party, a third way, s. by battle, upon default by process of outlawry, where judgment is given by the (a) coroners, or by those whom an act of parliament and custom have enabled. And in the statute of W. (b) 1. these words, upon appeal of commandment, &c. are to be intended of an accusation generally, s. by indictment, as by writ or bill, &c. and these words, until he that is appended of the deed be attainted, are meant of all manner of attainders, either at the king's suit, or at the suit of the party, and either upon appearance or upon default. And afterwards in the same act, provision is made for the appeal of the party, which implies that the word appeal shall be taken in the general sense.

6. It was resolved, that if the principal is (c) erroneously attainted, either for error in the process, or because the principal being out of the realm, &c. is outlawed, or that he was in prison at the time of the outlawry, &c. yet the accessory shall be attainted, for the attainder against the principal stands till it is reversed; and therewith agrees (d) 2 R. 3, 12, the resolution of all the justices in the King's-bench. And in 18 E. 4, 9. b. the (c) principal was erroneously outlawed for felony, and the accessory taken, indicted, arraigned, convicted, attainted, and hanged; and afterwards the principal reversed the outlawry, and was indicted and arraigned of the said felony, and found not guilty, by which he was acquitted; and all this appears in the said-book; then it will be demanded, that forasmuch as there cannot be an accessory unless there is a principal, and in case there is no principal, how the heir of the accessory shall be restored to the land which his father had forfeited by the said unjust attainder? To that it is to be answered that the heir may enter, or have his action; for now upon the matter by act in law, the attainder against his father is without any writ of error utterly annulled, for by the reversal of the attainder against the principal, the attainder against the accessory, which depends upon the attainder of the principal, ipso facto is utterly defeated and annulled; and this notably appears in an ancient book, in the time of E. 1, tit. Mort-damnest, 46. where the case is, A was indicted of felony, and B. of the receipt of A. A. elained himself (and is outlawed): B. was taken, and put himself upon inquest, and found guilty, for which B. was attainted, and hanged, and the lord entered as into his escheat; and afterwards A. came, and reversed the outlawry, and pleaded to the felony, and was found not guilty, by which he was acquitted; whereupon the heir of B. brought a (f) Mortdauncester against the lord by escheat, who came and shewed all this matter, and there was a demur upon it; and it was awarded, that the heir of B. should recover seison of the land; for if B. was now alive, he should go quit by the acquittal of A. because he could not be receiver of a felon, when A. is no felon; and all this appears in the said book Vide A. Nota* reader, to oust all quest. to what gaol offenders shall be committed, it is enacted by the statute of (i) 5 H. 4, c. 10. that none shall be imprisoned by any justice of the peace, but only in the common gaol, saving to lords and others, who have gaols, their franchises in that case. By which it appears, how justices of peace offend, who commit felons, &c. to either of the Counters in London, and other prisons, which are not common gaols.

But forasmuch as several persons have earnestly desired to know the circumstances, as well of the proceeding, as of the fact itself, I will comply with their request.

pened that Turner in playing struck out the baron's eye with his foil; upon which the baron, finding himself impatient under so great an affront, and not able to bear the loss of his eye without having his revenge, resolved to procure somebody to kill Turner; and among his other servants, he prevailed upon Gilbert Gray and Robert Carliel, Scotchmen, two of his followers, to shoot Turner upon the first opportunity that should offer. These two then undertook to accomplish this design, and industriously endeavoured to execute it; but the ninth day of May last, Gray repenting of a purpose and act so barbarous, vile and bloody, being touched with the moion of the Holy Ghost, resolved to proceed no farther; which the baron of Sanchar being informed of, and that Gray slackened in his promise, Robert Carliel, as is aforesaid, undertook to execute what he had promised: who, the eleventh of May following, associating himself with James Irweng a Scotchman, of the frontiers, about seven o'clock in the evening came to a house in the Friars, which Turner used to frequent as he came from his school, which was near that place; and finding Turner there, they saluted one another; and Turner with one of his friends sat at the door asking them to drink; but Carliel and Irweng turning about to cock the pistol, came back immediately, and Carliel drawing it from under his coat, discharged it upon Turner, and gave him a mortal wound near the left pap; so that Turner, after having said these words, Lord have mercy upon me! I am killed; immediately fell down. Whereupon Carliel and Irweng fled, Carliel to the town, and Irweng towards the river; but mistaking his way, and entering into a court where they sold wood, which was so thorough-fare, he was taken. Carliel likewise fled, and so did also the baron of Sanchar. The ordinary officers of justice did their utmost, but could not take them: for in fact, as appeared afterwards, Carliel fled into Scotland, and Gray towards the sea, thinking to go to Sweden, and Sanchar hid himself in England.

The impediments of justice, difficulties of law, and impossibilities of legal proceeding to take Carliel, the principal, which were in this case, are remarkable, and worthy of consideration. The cure and remedy of the whole ought to be only and wholly attributed to the great care of his most excellent majesty, and to his perpetual love and zeal for justice, as will clearly appear by what follows.

The impediments of justice were two: The truth of this fact, touching the baron of Sanchar, could not appear, because it consisted only in the words of his mouth by incitation and procurement; but by Gray and Carliel, who were fled, or by himself; and he was likewise gone.—2. It was not as yet known whither they were fled, and it could not be found out by all the search and diligence which was used by the officers and magistrates of justice.

The difficulties of law are manifest by the foregoing resolutions.

Impossibilities of legal proceeding.—1. It was impossible by legal process to apprehend the body of Carliel, being in Scotland.—It was impossible also to proceed against the baron of Sanchar, who was but an accessory, before the principal was attainted; a thing which would have required a very long proceeding, if he had not been taken.—Now therefore let us behold here the love and zeal which his majesty always had for justice, who being informed by some of his principal judges, with whom he had consulted touching the nature of this present case, and finding if this fact should be left to the ordinary proceeding of the law, Carliel the assassin could not be taken, and that no ordinary power had been able to find Gray the witness, nor Sanchar the author; lo! the king by proclamation gives authority to any person whatsoever to apprehend these three, with a promise of great reward.

Upon this, the baron of Sanchar, well knowing that the principal assassin and the witness were fled, surrendered himself, and denied that he incited or procured the fact: wherefore his majesty sent post to the sea-ports (the gates of the kingdom), as also into Scotland, and other places of his dominions, where his admirable prudence had hopes of finding them; and the Lord so crowned his royal thoughts, and gave such a blessing to his zeal for justice, that some of his couriers took Gray at the port of Harwich, ready to embark for Sweden; and Carliel in Scotland, thinking to cross the sea for his greater safety. Gray then, being by his majesty's command examined, confessed the whole truth of the fact against the baron of Sanchar, who likewise by his majesty's direction being confronted with Gray, and particularly examined touching certain articles, special and pertinent sayings by his majesty himself, confessed by writing under his own hand, that he had incited and procured this assassination; and being pressed thereupon by the questions, he discovered a long and inveterate malice which he had had, with all the occasions and material circumstances of this murder.

His majesty having regard to that which the Holy Ghost admonishes us of ('quia nan profertur cito contra malos sententia, absque timore ullo filii hominum perpetrans mala' (k)) gave orders two days after, that Carliel the principal should be brought to London; that he and James Irweig, in full term, (a thing not usual) might be carried before the justices at Newgate, and attainted and convicted. And a few days after the baron of Sanchar was likewise attainted and convicted at the King's Bench in full term; and in a short time after, to accomplish his majesty's zeal for justice, the baron Sanchar was (l) hanged publicly in term-time at the palace of Westminster, according to the judgment and sentence he had before received.

I have reported this case with all the circumstances, because this example has not its parallel: for although it is true, that the late queen Mary is very famous on account of the exemplary justice which she caused to be executed upon baron Sturton, for the barbarous murder of Harquill; yet this present example of the baron of Sanchar very much surpasses that of the baron of Sturton, and that for many considerations. 1. Because the baron of Sturton was taken by the ordinary course of the law, even within the kingdom; but the principal in this case could not be taken by any common power, but by the means of his majesty's royal and absolute power only. 2. The baron of Sturton's offence was very apparent, and without any difficulty of law: on the contrary, this of Sanchar was thereof (as appears) very full; but by his majesty's command, all these difficulties, with the conference and grave consideration of his principal judges, after search of cases precedent, were resolved and cleared up, and notwithstanding the impediments, difficulties and impossibilities in legal proceeding, greater expedition was used in this case than in that. In short, the accomplishment of the whole, the clearing up the truth of the fact in the case of the baron of Sanchar, must be attributed to the great wisdom, power and vigilance of his majesty, as appears by that which has been thereof said before.

The baron of Sanchar was a man of a very ancient and noble family in Scotland; he was a man of great courage and wit, endowed with many excellent gifts, as well natural as acquired. The eloquence of his discourse, with the civility and discretion of his behaviour, when he came before and went from the judges, compelled the people (who honoured him on account of his moral virtues, and those for his sake) to bewail his fall with great grief (although the occasion of it was this base and barbarous assassination, premeditated for five years together with a malice bloody and inveterate): this extraordinary affection of the people was, as he himself confessed, a very great consolation to him in his last troubles and afflictions. But at last their compassion abated, because they perceived he died a true Catholick.

93. Proceedings against Mr. JAMES WHITELOCKE, in the Star-Chamber, for a Contempt of the King's Prerogative: 11 JAMES I. 1613.

[" Mr. Whitelocke, the subject of this Prosecution, is supposed to have been the same gentleman, as afterwards became sir James Whitelocke, the judge of that name, and father of Mr. Belstrode Whitelocke, the famous writer of the Memorials. See the note in vol. 3, of lord Bacon's Works, 4to ed. p. 471. He appears to have been prosecuted simply for giving a private verbal Opinion as a barrister, on a point of Prerogative, against the crown, to sir Robert Mansell; who, being Treasurer of the Navy and Vice-Admiral, had consulted Mr. Whitelocke, on the legality of a commission issued by king James for examining into and reforming the Disorders and Abuses of the Navy. Ibid. At the same time, sir Robert Mansell was himself charged, for questioning the prerogative of the crown, and animating the lord-admiral against the commission. Ibid. same page, and the note in p. 472. The hearing was at Whitehall before the Lords of the Council, with the intervention of lord chief justice Coke, lord chief baron Tanfield, and the Master of the Rolls; the king's Attorney and Solicitor speaking against Mr. Whitelocke, and Mr. Henry Montagu, the king's serjeant, against sir Robert Mansell. Ibid. Both humiliated themselves; in consequence of which they were recommended to the crown as proper objects of pardon, and were accordingly enlarged on the terms of subscribing a submission. Ibid. & Reliq. Wotton, p. 421. 3rd ed. there cited. The following Speech of lord Bacon, who was at this time Attorney-General, is the only remnant we meet with of the proceedings in the Case, exclusive of the circumstances before-mentioned. The Speech seems imperfect, it ending abruptly. What there is of it, though not without passages characteristic of lord Bacon's nervous eloquence and curiosity of argument, is in our opinion far from stating any thing like a just ground of prosecution. In the present age it would be deemed a monstrous doctrine to assert, that lawyers were not at liberty to give Opinions to their clients on questions of prerogative. Little apology can be made for such a doctrine even in lord Bacon's time; for it was ever lawful for the subject to contest questions of prerogative in the king's courts; and if it was so, how could it be contrary to law to take the advice of council on such subjects? Indeed lord Bacon professes not to controvert the right of asking and giving counsel in law. But then he qualifies this right by a distinction; for he exempts and gives a privilege to high commissions of regimen and cases of state; a description so large and indefinite, that, if it should be acquiesced in, it would leave few acts of the crown on which a lawyer could safely give an opinion. Particular delicacy and caution certainly ought to be used, where the prerogative of the crown is drawn into question; and it may be possible for a lawyer to exercise the right of giving Opinions so indecently and licentious, as to render himself responsible criminally. But then the crime arises from the abuse, not from the want of the right. It may also be possible to put a case so strong, as to be beyond the line of a professional Opinion. Thus if a private lawyer should be consulted, whether the king had a right to the crown, who can doubt that he would answer such a question at his peril? But the question, on which Mr. Whitelocke gave his opinion, was not of this kind, being on a commission from the crown, the legality of which it was competent to the subject to controvert, and consequently to take legal advice about. On the whole, the true rule seems to be, that a barrister may give his opinion on every question, however relative to the king or his prerogative, which the subject may contest with the crown in a court of justice; but that in exercising this right he must keep so within the bounds of an opinion, as not under the color of it to obtrude either private or public scandal. In respect to Mr. Whitelocke's particular case, the subject of the Opinion he gave seems perfectly unexceptionable; nor could it be an offence, that his Opinion was against the extent of the prerogative, or that it was erroneous. The only ground then, on which he could be criminally responsible, was for some licentious and extraneous matter introduced into the Opinion; in respect to which no judgment can now be decisively formed, as the words of the Opinion do not appear; though as far as a conjecture may be made from lord Bacon's manner of observing on the Opinion, it was equally innocent both in subject and language." Hargrave.]

SPEECH of the Attorney-General sir FRANCIS BACON, from the 3d volume of the last 4to edition of his Works, p. 471.

MY Lords; The offence wherewith Mr. Whitelocke is charged, (for as to sir Robert Mansell, I take it to my part only to be sorry for his error) is a Contempt of a high nature, and resting upon two parts: on the one, a presumptuous and licentious censure and defying of his majesty's prerogative in general; the other, a slander and traducement of one act or emanation hereof, containing a commission of survey and reformation of abuses in the office of the navy.—This offence is fit to be opened and set before your lordships, as it hath been well begun, both in the true state and in the true weight of it. For as I desire, that the nature of the offence may appear in its true colours; so, on the other side, I desire, that the shadow of it may not darken or involve any thing that is lawful, or agreeable with the just and reasonable liberty of the subject.—First, we must and do agree, that the asking and taking, and giving of counsel in law is an essential part of justice; and to deny that, is to shut the gate of justice, which in the Hebrews commonwealth was therefore held in the gate, to shew all passage to justice must be open: and certainly counsel in law is one of the passages. But yet, for all that, this liberty is not infinite and without limits. If a jesuited papist should come, and ask counsel (I put a case not altogether feigned) whether all the acts of parliament made in the time of queen Elizabeth and king James are void or no: because there are no lawful bishops sitting in the upper house, and a parliament must consist of lords spiritual and temporal and commons; and a lawyer will set it under his hand, that they be all void, I will touch him for high treason upon this his counsel. So, if a puritan preacher will ask counsel, whether he may stile the king defender of the faith, because he receives not the discipline and presbytery; and the lawyer will tell him, it is no part of the king's stile, it will go hard with such a lawyer.—Or if a tribunitious popular spirit will go and ask a lawyer, whether the oath and band of allegiance be to the kingdom and crown only, and not to the king, as was Hugh Spenser's Case, and he deliver his opinion as Hugh Spenser did; he will be in Hugh Spenser's danger.—So as the privilege of giving counsel proveth not all opinions: and as some opinions given are traitorous; so are there others of a much inferior nature, which are contemptuous. And among these I reckon Mr. Whitelocke's; for as for his loyalty and true heart to the king, God forbid I should doubt it.—Therefore let no man mistake so far, as to conceive, that any lawful and due liberty of the subject for asking counsel in law is called in question, when points of disloyalty or of contempt are restrained. Nay, we see it is the grace and favour of the king and his courts, that if the case be tender, and a wise lawyer in modesty and discretion refuseth to be of council, for you have lawyers sometimes too nice as well as too bold, they are then ruled and assigned to be of council. For certainly counsel is the blind man's guide; and sorry I am with all my heart, that in this case the blind did lead the blind.—For the offence, for which Mr. Whitelocke is charged, I hold it great, and to have, as I said at first, two parts; the one a censure, and, as much as in him is, a circling, nay a clipping, of the king's prerogative in general: the other, a slander and depravation of the king's power and honour in this commission.—And for the first of these, I consider it again in three degrees: first, that he presumed to censure the king's prerogative at all. Secondly, that he runneth into the generality of it more than was pertinent to the present question. And lastly, that he hath erroneously, and falsely, and dangerously given opinion in derogation of it: First, I make a great difference between the king's grants and ordinary omissions of justice, and the king's high commissions of regiment, or mixed with causes of state. For the former, there is no doubt but they may be freely questioned and disputed, and any defect in matter or form stood upon, though the king be many times the adverse party. But for the latter sort, they are rather to be dealt with, if at all, by a modest, and humble intimation or remonstrance to his majesty, and his council, than by bravery of dispute or peremptory opposition.

Of this kind is that properly to be understood, which is said in Bracton, 'de chartis et factis regis non debent, aut possunt, justitiam rii aut private personæ disputare; sed tutius est, ut expectetur sententia regis.'—And the king's courts themselves have been exceeding tender and sparing in it; so that there is in all our law, not three cases of it. And in that very case of 24 Ed. 3, Ass. pl. 2. which Mr. Whitelocke vouched, whereas it was a commission to arrest a man, and to carry him to prison, and to seize his goods without any form of justice or examination preceding; and that the judges saw it was obtained by surreption; yet the judges said they would keep it by them, and shew it to the king's council.—But Mr. Whitelocke did not advise his client to acquaint the king's council with it, but presumptuously giveth opinion, that it is void. Nay, not so much as a clause or passage of modesty, as that he submits his opinion to censure: that it is too great a matter for him to deal in; or this is my opinion, which is nothing, &c. But illotis manibus, he takes it into his hands, and pronounceth of it, as a man would scarcely do of a warrant of a justice of peace, and speaks like a dictator, that 'this is law,' and 'this is against law,' &c.

94. Proceedings against MARY Countess of SHREWSBURY, before a Select Council, for a Contempt, in refusing to answer fully before the Privy Council, or to subscribe her Examination. Trin. 10 JAMES I. A. D. 1612. [Coke's Report, p. 94.]

["The occasion of examining lady Shrewsbury before the Privy Council, was her conduct in respect to the marriage of lady Stuart. This latter lady was first-cousin to James I.; for she was the daughter of Charles earl of Lenox, the younger brother of James's father lord Darnley. Her mother was Elizabeth daughter of sir William Cavendish. The countess of Shrewsbury was aunt to lady Arabella, being sister to her mother. A marriage took place between lady Arabella and sir William Seymour, who at the Restoration recovered the dukedom of Somerset for his family. Being a marriage with one so nearly related in blood to the king, and without his consent, it was deemed an offence against the royal prerogative,* on which account lady Arabella and her husband were imprisoned; the former in a private house at Lambeth, the latter in the Tower. But both escaped from their confinement with a view to retire abroad; and the countess of Shrewsbury was taken into custody as privy and accessory to the escape of lady Arabella. On being examined by the privy-council, the countess refused to discover what she knew of the affair of the Marriage and Escape, or to subscribe her Examination; and for this refusal she was brought before a select council, whose proceedings on the occasion are the subject of the following Case. What we shall first lay before the reader is lord Coke's Account of the Case, from his 12th Report. Lord Bacon's Speech, which is next given, was first printed in the Cabala, but is here taken from the last edition of his Works, vol. 3, p. 265. For further particulars, relative to the Marriage of lady Arabella Stuart, and the Proceedings against her, sir William Seymour her husband, and lady Shrewsbury, the curious reader may consult Winwood's Memorials of State, vol. iii. p. 117. 119. 201. 279. 280. 281. 454." IN this term, before a select council at York-house; scil. the lord chancellor, the archbishop, the duke of Lenox, the earl of Northampton, lord privy seal, the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, the earl of Worcester, the earl of Pembroke, viscount Erskin, viscount Rochford, the lord Zouch, the lord Knolls, the lord Wootton, the chancellor of the exchequer, the chancellor of the duchy, Fleming chief justice of the king's Bench, Philips master of the rolls, Coke C. J. of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield chief baron. The countess of Shrewsbury (the wife of Gilbert earl of Shrewsbury) then prisoner in the Tower, was brought before the said lords, and by the attorney and solicitor of the king was charged with a high and great contempt of * dangerous consequence; for they declared that the lady Arabella, being of the blood royal, had married - - - - Seymour, second son of the earl of Hertford, without privity or assent of the king, for which contempt the said Seymour was committed to the Tower, and had escaped and fled beyond the seas; the lady Arabella being under restraint escaped also, and embarked herself upon the sea, and was taken before she got over; of which flight of the said lady Arabella, the said countess, being her aunt, very well knew and abetted, as is directly proved by Crompton, and not denied by the lady Arabella; and admit it, that the lady Arabella had no evil intent against the king (who had always a great and special care of her, and was very bountiful unto her, until her marriage with the said Seymour, which was the ponum velitum;) yet when she fled, and when she should be environed with evil spirits, cum perversis perversi possit, and when she shall be in another sphere, she will not move within the same orb.

And the lords of the Privy Council, knowing the arcana imperii, did shew divers perilous consequences, and the rather for this, that the said countess is an obstinate popish recusant, and as was said, perverted also the lady Arabella. Now the Charge was in two points.

1. That the said countess of Shrewsbury, by commandment of the king, being called to the council-table, before the lords of the council at White-hall, and there being required by the lords to declare her knowledge touching the said points, and to discover what she knew concerning them, for the safety of the king, and quiet of the realm; she answered, that she would not make any particular answer; and being again asked by the king's command by the council at Lambeth, and being charged again to answer to the said point, she refused for two causes. 1. For that she had made a rash vow that she would not declare any thing in particular touching the said points; and for that (as she said) it was better to obey God than man. 2. She stood upon her privilege of nobility, scil. to answer only when she was called judicially before her peers; for that such privilege was allowed (as she said) to William earl of Pembroke, and to the lord Lumley.

2. The second point of her charge was, that when such answer which she had made was put in writing, and read to her, yet she refused to subscribe to it. Which denial to discover and discharge her conscience in a case which toucheth the safety of the king, and quiet of the realm, was urged by the king's council to be a great and high contempt, and that nobility hath not any such privilege as is alleged, nor any such allowance as was supposed; and that rash and illegal vows make not an excuse, and that this precedent being now upon the stage, was of very dangerous consequence: and the said countess hearing the charge, yet persisted in her obstinate refusal, for the same reasons and causes upon which she had insisted before: and the lord chancellor began, and the archbishop, and all the other lords began with the first, and adjudged it a great and high contempt, and the lord chancellor said, that that was against the law of England, with which all the lords agreed.—And that no such allowance was given to the said earl of Pembroke, or to the lord Lumley in respect of their privilege of nobility, but that they were voce populi, et ideo non audiende: and the lord archbishop principally proved, that as well the contempt, as the said rash vow was against the law of God, which he and the earl of Northampton principally proved by divers texts and examples in holy scripture. And the effect of all that which the three justices said, was, that after the sentences of all the learned, prudent, and honourable personages and counsellors of estate, they might well be silent; but in regard that silentium in senatu est vitium, they would speak something briefly, viz.

That three things in this case are to be well considered: 1. Whether the refusals aforesaid of the said countess were offences in law against the king, his crown and dignity. 2. What manner of proceeding this is, and whether it was justifiable by precedent or reason. 3. What is the demerit of the offences, and how punishable.

As to the first, it was resolved by the justices and master of the rolls, that the denying to be examined was a high and great contempt in law, against the king, his crown and dignity; and that if it should be permitted, it would be an occasion of many high and dangerous designs against the king and the realm, which cannot be discovered: and upon hope of impunity it will be an encouragement to offenders, as Fleming justice said, to enterprize dangerous attempts.

And the Master of the Rolls said; that it was not any privilege of nobility, to refuse to be examined in this case, no more than of any subject.

Also, if one that is noble, and a peer of the realm, be sued in the Star Chamber, or in Chancery, they ought to answer [Quere the ex officio oath 12 Co. 26, 27.] upon their oaths, (a) and may be examined in the Star Chamber upon interrogatories upon their oaths: and if one who is noble be produced as a witness between

(a) "But in 1628, the house of lords came to a Resolution, declaring it to be the ancient right of the nobility of this kingdom and the lords of the upper house of parliament, to answer in all courts as defendants upon Protestation of Honour only. Journ. Dom. Proc. 6. May, 1628. This Resolution was in consequence of an order, made about two years before by the Star Chamber against the earl of Lincoln, to answer a bill on oath; though this order had passed after great deliberation, and was founded on an unanimous opinion of the lords of the privy council, and of all the judges except Doderridge who was absent. See the earl of Lincoln's Case, W. Jo. 152. Hutt. 87. Cro. Cha. 64. In 1640, the lords renewed the declaration of this privilege in answering as defendants without oath, with an explanation, that it extended to all answers and examinations on interrogatories, in all causes as well criminal as civil, and in all courts and commissions, and also to the widows and dowagers of temporal peers. Journ. Dom. Proc. 31 Dec. 1640. The present practice of our courts of equity conforms to this order of the lords." Hargrave.

A Peer, sitting in judgment, gives not his verdict upon oath, like an ordinary jurymen, but, upon his honour. 2 Inst. 49.—He answers also to Bills in Chancery upon his honour and not upon his oath; 1 P. W. 146; but when he is examined as a witness either in civil or criminal cases, he must be sworn, (whether in inferior courts, or in the high court of parliament) for the respect which the law shows to the honour of a peer does not extend so far as to overturn a settled maxim, that 'in judicio non creditur nisi juratis.' Salk. 512. Cro. Car. 64.—In many cases, the protestation of honour shall be sufficient for a peer; as in trial of peers, they proceed upon their honour, (though formerly it was to be on oath), and in action of debt upon account the plaintiff being a peer, it shall suffice to examine his attorney, and not himself upon oath; but where a peer is to answer interrogatories, or make an affidavit, as well as where he is to be examined as a witness, he must be upon his oath. Bract. lib. 5. c. 9. 4 Rep. 49. 3 Inst. 29. W. Jones 152. 2 Salk. 512.—Sir Thomas Meers contra lord Stourton, in Case. Sir Thomas Meers exhibited a Bill against the lord Stourton, and it was ordered, that the lord Stourton should be examined upon interrogatories touching his title; and it was objected, That he being a peer of the realm, ought to answer upon his honour only; and it was ruled by Harcourt, Lord Keeper, that where a peer is to answer to a Bill, his answer put in upon his honour is sufficient; but where a peer is to answer interrogatories, to make an affidavit, or be examined as a wit-party and party, he ought to be sworn, or otherwise his testimony is of no value; and so is the common experience in the said courts: and the chief justice said, that forasmuch as where order is neglected, confusion will follow, he would recite some of the honourable privileges which the law of England (more than any other law) attribute to the nobility of England in legal proceedings; and they will not be impertinent, but give a great light to the case now in hand.

(1.) If a baron, viscount, earl, or other lord of parliament and peer of the realm be plaintiff in any action, and the defendant will plead that the plaintiff is not a baron, viscount, earl, &c. as he is named in the writ, this shall not be tried at the common law by jury, who may be corrupted, nor by witnesses, as in the Star Chamber, or Chancery, who may be suborned; but it shall be tried by the record in Chancery, which imports by itself solid truth; so great regard hath the law to the trial of their honour and dignity, &c.

(2.) Their persons have many honourable privileges in law. 1. At the suit of a subject their bodies shall not be arrested, neither capias nor exigent lieth against them. 2. For the honour and reverence which the law gives to nobility, their bodies are not subject to torture in causâ criminis læsæ majestatis. (a). 3. They are not to be sworn in assizes, juries, or other inquests. 4. If any servant of the king, named ness, he must be upon his oath.—In the pleas of parliament, 18 Edw. 1, between the earl of Gloucester and earl of Hereford, on long debate whether John de Hasting, a baron, ought to be sworn, because he was a peer of the realm, it was resolved that he ought to lay his hand on the book. The like was resolved, 10 Car. in B. R. by the court, where the lord Dorset's testimony was requisite. See Dy. 314. b. marg. pl. 98. See also 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1202.—A bill was against a Peeress to discover deeds; she answers on her honour and confesses deeds. She shall produce them only upon her honour, and not on oath. Ch. Prec. 92. Jacob's Law Dict. Title, Peers.—In a case the earl of Shaftsbury against lord Digby, reported in 2 Mod. 98. Trin. T. 28 Car. 2. When this cause was tried at the bar, which was in Easter Term last, the lord Mohun offered to give his testimony for the plaintiff, but refused to be sworn, offering to speak upon his honour. But Wyld, Justice, told him, in causes between party and party he must be upon his oath. The lord Mohun asked him, whether he would answer it. The judge replied, that he delivered it as his opinion. And because he knew not whether it might cause him to be questioned in another place, he desired the rest of the judges to deliver their opinions, which they all did, and said he ought to be sworn. And so he was, but with a salvo jure; for he said there was an order in the house of Peers, 'that it is 'against the privilege of the house for any 'lord to be sworn.'

in the cheque roll, compass or intend to kill any lord of parliament, or other lord of the king's council, this is felony. 5. In the Common Pleas, a lord of parliament shall have knights returned on his jury. 6. He shall have day of grace. 7. A lord of parliament shall not be tried in case of treason, felony, or misprision of them, but by those who are noble and peers of the realm. 8. In trial of a peer, the lords of parliament shall not swear, but they give their judgment super fidem et ligeantiam domino regi debitam, so that their faith and allegiance stands in equipoise with an oath in the case of a common person in trial of life: and the writs of parliament, directed to the lords of parliament, are sub fide et ligeantia, &c.

And the reason and cause, that the king gives them many other privileges, is for this, because all honour and nobility is derived from the king as the true fountain: and the king honours with nobility, for two causes. 1. Ad consulendum, and for that reason he gives them a robe. 2. Ad defendendum regem et regnum, and for that cause he gives them a sword.—And forasmuch as they derive their dignities, accompanied with all those honourable privileges, from the king, to deny to answer, being required thereto by the king, to such points as concern the safety of the king and quiet of the realm, is a high contempt and disobedience, accompanied with great ingratitude.

(a) "It is surprising, that doctrine so reflecting on the law of England should escape from one of lord Coke's character. His language as attorney general at the Trials of the earls of Essex and Southampton implies the same obnoxious tenet. But in his third Institute he gives it as his opinion most decisively, that all Tortures of accused persons are contrary to our law; and to prove it cites lord chancellor Fortescue's famous book 'De laudibus legum Angliæ,' where he argues for a preference of our law to the civil law from the latter's allowance of torture. 3 Inst. 35. In the case of Felton, for the murder of the duke of Buckingham, the judges were unanimous, that Felton could not be tortured by the rack; for 'no such punishment,' said they, 'is known or allowed by our law.' 1 Rush. 638. 639. As to the instances of Torture collected by a most respectable writer of the present time, they only prove an irregularity of practice. Barrington Ant. Stat. 4th ed. 33. 88. 395. If torture was lawful, we should find rules to direct its application." Hargrave.

The use of Torture appears to have been continued in Scotland until the Revolution, at which time it was complained against with other grievances. See 2 M'Dowall's Instit. of the Laws of Scotland 660. The use of torture in Scotland is abolished by "An act for improving the two kingdoms." Stat. 7 Anne, c. 21, § 5. Concerning the use of Torture among the Romans see Tit. 8. de Questionibus:—See vol. 1, p. 505, note (c).

'debitam,' against the faith and allegiance of a person noble, due to the king, and which the law greatly esteems. And that this denying is against her faith and allegiance appears by the ancient oath of allegiance, which is imprinted in the heart of every subject, 'scil. ero verus et fidelis, et veritatem præstabo domino regi de vitâ et membro, et de terreno honore, ad vivendum et moriendum contra omnes gentes, &c. Et si cognoscam aut audiam de aliquo damno aut malo quod domino regi evenire poterit, quod non revelato,' &c. And this oath of allegiance is common to all subjects, as well those of the nobility as commonalty. But the law hath greater account of the faith and allegiance of a nobleman, than of one of the commons, for this, that the breach of their allegiance is more dangerous to the king and estate, for 'corruptio optimorum est pessima;' and for this reason, the countess by her allegiance was bound, without being demanded, to reveal to the king what she knows concerning the premises, upon which great mischief may happen to the king and the realm. But being commanded by the king to declare her knowledge, the denying of it doth greatly aggravate the offence. 'Qui contemnit præceptum, contemnit præcipientem.' Command and obedience are the ligament of government, and 'ligeantia est legis essentia;' for without allegiance and obedience, the law cannot proceed.

As to the second point, viz. concerning the manner of this proceeding. 1. Privative, it is not to fine and imprison, or inflict corporal punishment upon the countess; for fine and imprisonment ought to be assessed in some court judicially.* 2. Positive, the fine is 'ad monendum,' or at the most 'ad minuendum;' it is 'ad instruendum non ad destruendum.'

This selected council is to express what punishment this offence justly deserved, if it be judicially proceeded within the Star-Chamber; for which reason this manner of proceeding is out of the mercy and grace of the king against this honourable lady, that she seeing her offence may submit herself to the king, without any punishment in any court judicially.

If Sentence shall be given in the Star-Chamber according to justice, you the lords shall be agents in it: but in this manner according to the mercy of the king, the king is only agent; the law hath put rules and limits to the justice of the king, but not unto his mercy, that is transcendent and without any limits of the law; 'et ideo processus iste est regalis plane et rege dignus.'

Also inasmuch as the allegiance and obedience of the subject, is the best flower in his imperial-garland. to the intent, that it may neither be blasted, nor impaired by this dangerous example, to the prejudice of his royal prerogative and posterity, this proceeding hath been thought necessary: and this is fortified by the precedent of the earl of Essex, against whom such proceedings were in this very place, anno 42 and 43 Eliz. reg.

And as to the last point it was resolved by all quasi una voce, that if a sentence should be given in the Star-Chamber judicially, she should be fined 20,000*l.* and imprisoned during the king's pleasure. Vide 12 Co. 69, &c.

'Hoc in terrorem, sed quære quid inde venit?'

Your lordships do observe the nature of this Charge: my lady of Shrewsbury, a lady wise, and that ought to know what duty requireth, is charged to have refused, and to have persisted in refusal to answer, and to be examined in a high cause of state, being examined by the council-table, which is a representative body of the king. The nature of the cause, upon which she was examined, is an essential point, which doth aggravate and increase this contempt and presumption; and therefore of necessity with that we must begin. How graciously and parent-like his majesty used the lady Arabella before she gave him cause of indignation, the world knoweth. My lady notwithstanding, extremely ill-advised, transacted the most weighty and binding part and action of her life, which is her marriage, without acquainting his majesty; which had been a neglect even to a mean parent; but being to our sovereign, and she standing so near to his majesty as she doth, and then choosing such a condition as it pleased her to choose, all parties laid together, how dangerous it was, my lady might have read it in the fortune of that house wherewith she is matched; for it was not unlike the case of Mr. Seymour's grandmother.—The king nevertheless so remembered he was a king, as he forgot not he was a kinsman, and placed her only 'sub libera custodia.' But now did my lady accumulate and heap up this offence with a far greater than the former, by seeking to withdraw herself out of the king's power into foreign parts.

That this flight or escape into foreign parts might have been seed of trouble to this state, is a matter whereof the conceit of a vulgar person is not uncapable. For although my lady should have put on a mind to continue her loyalty, as nature and duty did bind her; yet when she was in another sphere, she must have moved in the motion of that orb, and not of the planet itself: and God forbid the king's felicity should be so little, as he should not have envy and enviers enough in foreign parts. It is true, if any foreigner had wrought upon this occasion, I do not doubt but the intent would have been, as the prophet saith, 'they have conceived mischief, and brought forth a vain thing.' But yet your lordships know that it is wisdom in princes, and it is a watch they owe to themselves and to their people, to stop the beginnings of evils, and not to despise them. Seneca saith well, 'non jam amplius levia sunt pericula, si levia videantur;' dangers cease to be light, because by despising they grow and gather strength.

And accordingly hath been the practice both of the wisest and stoutest princes to hold for matter pregnant of peril, to have any near them in blood to fly into foreign parts. Wherein I will not wander; but take the example of king Henry the seventh, a prince not unfit to be paralleled with his majesty. I mean not the particular of Perkin Warbeck, for he was but an idol or a disguise; but the example I mean, is that of the earl of Suffolk, whom the king extorted from Philip of Austria. The story is memorable, that Philip, after the death of Isabella, coming to take possession of his kingdom of Castile, which was but matrimonial to his father-in-law Ferdinand of Aragon, was cast by weather upon the coast of Weymouth, where the Italian story saith, king Henry used him in all things else as a prince, but in one thing as a prisoner; for he forced upon him a promise to restore the earl of Suffolk that was fled into Flanders. And yet this I note was in the 21st year of his reign, when the king had a goodly prince at man's estate, besides his daughters, nay, and the whole line of Clarence nearer in title; for that earl of Suffolk was descended of a sister of Edward the fourth. So far off did that king take his aim. To this action of so deep consequence, it appeareth, you, my lady of Shrewsbury, were privy, not upon foreign suspicions or strained inferences, but upon vehement presumptions, now clear and particular testimony, as hath been opened to you; so as the king had not only reason to examine you upon it, but to have proceeded with you upon it as for a great contempt; which if it be reserved for the present, your ladyship is to understand it aright, that it is not defect of proof, but abundance of grace that is the cause of this proceeding; and your ladyship shall do well to see into what danger you have brought yourself. All offences consist of the fact which is open, and the intent which is secret. This fact of conspiring in the sight of this lady may bear a hard and gentler construction; if upon overmuch affection to your kinswoman, gentler; if upon practice or other end, harder. You must take heed how you enter into such actions; whereof if the hidden part be drawn unto that which is open, it may be your overthrow; which I speak not by way of charge, but by way of caution.

For that which you are properly charged with, you must know that all subjects, without distinction of degrees, owe to the king tribute and service, not only of their deed and hand, but of their knowledge and discovery. If there be any thing that imports the king's service, they ought themselves undemanded to impart it; much more if they be called and examined, whether it be of their own fact or of another's, they ought to make direct answer. Neither was there ever any subject brought in causes of estate to trial judicial, but first he passed examination; for examination is the entrance of justice in criminal causes; it is one of the eyes of the king's politic body; there are but two, information and examination; it may not be endured that one of the lights be put out by your example.

Your excuses are not worthy your own judgment; rash vows of lawful things are to be kept, but unlawful vows not; your own divines will tell you so. For your examples, they are some erroneous traditions. My lord of Pembroke spake somewhat that he was unlettered, and it was but when he was examined by one private counsellor, to whom he took exception. That of my lord Lumley is a fiction; the pre-eminences of nobility I would hold with to the last grain; but every day's experience is to the contrary. Nay, you may learn duty of lady Arabella herself, a lady of the blood, of an higher rank than yourself, who declining, and yet that but by request neither, to declare of your fact, yieldeth ingenuously to be examined of her own. I do not doubt but by this time you see both your own error, and the king's grace in proceeding with you in this manner.

95. Case of Mr. WILLIAM TALBOT, Hilary-Term, on an Information ore tenus, for maintaining a Power in the Pope to depose and kill Kings: 11 JAMES I. A. D. 1613.

[“In lord Bacon's Works there is a Speech by him as Attorney-General and prosecutor in this Case. 2 Bac. last 4to ed. 577. According to the title of the Speech, the cause of the prosecution appears to have been this. Mr. Talbot, who was a counsellor at law of Ireland, being asked, whether the doctrine of Suarez in respect to the deposing and killing of kings excommunicated was true or not, answered, that he submitted his opinion to the judgment of the Roman Catholic church. This answer he subscribed, and we presume, that it was given on being examined before the Privy-Council; though that circumstance is not expressly stated by lord Bacon. What the Judgment of the Star-Chamber was, we do not find noticed.” Hargrave.]

SPEECH of SIR FRANCIS BACON, Attorney-General, the last day of Hilary-Term, 11 Jan. 1.

MY Lords; I brought before you the first sitting of this term the cause of Duels. But now this last sitting I shall bring before you a cause concerning the greatest Duel which is in the Christian world, the duel and conflict between the lawful authority of sovereign kings, which is God's ordinance for the comfort of human society, and the swelling pride and usurpation of the see of Rome in temporalibus, tending altogether to anarchy and confusion. Wherein if this pretence in the pope of Rome, by cartels to make sovereign princes as the banditti, and to proscribe their lives, and to expose their kingdoms to prey; if these pretences, I say, and all persons that submit themselves to that part of the pope's power in the least degree, be not by all possible severity repressed and punished, the state of Christian kings will be no other than the ancient torment described by the poets in the hell of the heathen; a man sitting richly robed, solemnly attended, delicious fare, &c. with a sword hanging over his head, hanging by a small thread, ready every moment to be cut down by an accusing and accursed hand. Surely I had thought they had been the prerogatives of God alone, and of his secret judgments: 'solvam ciugula regum, I will loosen the girdles of kings;' or again, 'he poureth contempt upon princes;' or, 'I will give a king in my wrath and take him away again in my displeasure:' and the like. But if these be the claims of a mortal man, certainly they are but the mysteries of that person, which 'exalts himself above all that is called God,' 'supra omne quod dicitur Deus.' Note it well, not above God, though that in a sense be true, but 'above all that is called God;' that is, lawful kings and magistrates.

But, my lords, in this duel I find this Talbot, that is now before you, but a coward; for he hath given ground, he hath gone backward and forward; but in such a fashion, and with such interchange of repenting and relapsing, as I cannot tell whether it doth extenuate or aggravate his offence. If he shall more publicly in the face of the court fall and settle upon a right mind, I shall be glad of it; and he that would be against the king's mercy, I would he might need the king's mercy: but nevertheless the court will proceed by rules of justice. The offence, therefore, wherewith I charge this Talbot, prisoner at the bar, is this in brief and in effect: that he hath maintained and maintaineth under his hand a power in the pope for the deposing and murdering of kings. In what sort he doth this, when I come to the proper and particular charge, I will deliver it in his own words without pressing or straining.

But before I come to the particular charge of this man, I cannot proceed so coldly; but I must express unto your lordships the extreme and imminent danger wherein our dear and dread sovereign is, and in him we all, nay, all princes of both religions, for it is a common cause, do stand at this day, by the spreading and enforcing of this furious and pernicious opinion of the pope's temporal power; which though the modest sort would blanch with the distinction of in ordine ad spiritualia, yet that is but an illusion; for he that maketh the disinction, will also make the case. This peril, though it be in itself notorious, yet because there is a kind of dullness, and almost a lethargy in this age, give me leave to set before you two glasses, such as certainly the like never met in one age; the glass of France and the glass of England. In that of France the tragedies acted and executed in two immediate kings; in the glass of England, the same, or more horrible, attempted likewise in a queen and king immediate, but ending in a happy deliverance.

In France, Henry 3, in the face of his army, before the walls of Paris, stabbed by a wretched Jacobine frier. Henry 4, a prince that the French do surname the Great, one that had been a saviour and redeemer of his country from infinite calamities, and a restorer of that monarchy to the ancient state and splendor, and a prince almost heroical, except it be in the point of revolt from religion, at a time when he was as it were to mount on horseback for the commanding of the greatest forces that of long time had been levied in France, this king likewise stilletted by a rascal votary, which had been enchanted and conjured for the purpose.

In England, queen Elizabeth, of blessed memory, a queen comparable and to be ranked with the greatest kings, oftentimes attempted by like votaries, Someville, Parry, Savage, and others, but still protected by the Watchman that slumbereth not. Again, our excellent sovereign king James, the sweetness and clemency of whose nature were enough to quench and mortify all malignity, and a king shielded and supported by posterity; yet this king in the chair of majesty, has vine and olive branches about him, attended by his nobles and third estate in parliament; ready in the twinkling of an eye, as if it had been a particular doomsday, to have been brought to ashes, dispersed to the four winds. I noted the last day my lord chief justice, when he spoke of this Powder Treason, he laboured for words; though they came from him with great efficacy, yet he truly confessed, and so must all men, that that treason is above the charge and report of any words whatsoever.

Now, my lords, I cannot let pass, but in these glasses which I speak of, besides the facts themselves and danger, to shew you two things: the one, the ways of God Almighty, which turneth the sword of Rome upon the kings that are the vassals of Rome, and over them gives it power; but protecteth those kings, which have not accepted the yoke of his tyranny, from the effects of his malice: the other, that, as I said at first, this is a common cause of princes: it involveth kings of both religions; and therefore his majesty did most worthily and prudently ring out the alarm-bell, to awake all other princes to think of it seriously and in time. But this is a miserable case the while, that these Roman soldiers do either thrust the spear into the sides of God's anointed, or at least they crown them with thorns; that is, piercing and pricking cares and fears, that they can never be quiet or secure of their lives or states. And as this peril is common to princes of both religions, so princes of both religions have been likewise equally sensible of every injury that touched their temporals.

Thuanus reports in his story, that when the realm of France was interdicted by the violent proceedings of pope Julius the second, the king, otherwise noted for a moderate prince, caused coins of gold to be stamped with his own image, and this superscription, 'perdam nomen Baby-louis à terra.' Of which Thuanus saith, himself had seen divers pieces thereof. So as this catholic king was so much incensed at that time in respect of the pope's usurpation, as he did apply Babylon to Rome. Charles the 5th, emperor, who was accounted one of the pope's best sons, yet proceeded in matter temporal towards pope Clement with strange rigour; never regarding the pontificality, but kept him prisoner thirteen months in a pestilent prison; and was hardly dissuaded by his council from having sent him captive into Spain; and made sport with the threats of Frosberg the German, who wore a silk robe under his cassock, which he would shew in all companies; telling them that he carried it to strangle the pope with his own hands. As for Philip the fair, it is the ordinary example, how he brought pope Boniface the 8th to an ignominious end, dying mad and enraged; and how he stiled his rescript to the pope's bull, whereby he challenged his temporals, sciat satuitas vestra, not your beatitude, but your stultitude; a stile worthy to be continued in the like cases; for certainly that claim is mere folly and fury. As for native examples here, it is too long a field to enter into them. Never kings of any nation kept the partition-wall between temporal and spiritual better in times of greatest superstition. I report me to king Edw. 1, that set up so many crosses, and yet crossed that part of the pope's jurisdiction, no man more strongly. But these things have passed better pens and speeches: here I end them.

But now to come to the particular charge of this man, I must inform your lordships the occasion and nature of this offence. There hath been published lately to the world a work of Suarez a Portuguese, a professor in the university of Coimbra, a confident and daring writer, such an one as Tully describes in derision; 'nihil tam verens, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videretur:' one that fears nothing but this, lest he should seem to doubt of any thing. A fellow that thinks with his magistrality and goose-quill to give laws and menages to crowns and sceptres. In this man's writing, this doctrine of deposing or murdering kings seems to come to a higher elevation than heretofore; and it is more arted and positived than in others. For in the passages which your lordships shall bear read anon, I find three assertions which run not in the vulgar track, but are such as wherewith mens ears, as I suppose, are not much acquainted. Whereof the first is, that the pope hath a superiority over kings, as subjects, to depose them; not only for spiritual crimes, as heresy and schism, but for faults of a temporal nature: forasmuch as a tyrannical government tendeth ever to the destruction of souls. So by this position, kings of either religion are alike comprehended, and none exempted. The second, that after a sentence given by the pope, this writer hath defined of a series, or succession, or substitution of hangmen, or bourreaux, to be sure, lest an executioner should fail. For he saith, that when a king is sentenced by the pope to deprivation or death, the executioner who is first in place is he to whom the pope shall commit the authority, which may be a foreign prince, it may be a particular subject, it may be general; to the first undertaker. But if there be no direction or assignation in the sentence special nor general, then, de jure, it appertains to the next successor, a natural and pious opinion; for commonly they are sons, or brothers, or near of kin, all is one, so as the successor be apparent; and also that he be a catholic. But if he be doubtful, or that he be no catholic, then it devolves to the commonalty of the kingdom; so as he will be sure to have it done by one minister or other. The third is, he distinguisheth of two kinds of tyrants, a tyrant in title, and a tyrant in regiment; the tyrant in regiment cannot be resisted or killed without a sentence precedent by the pope; but a tyrant in title may be killed by any private man whatsoever. By which doctrine he hath put the judgment of kings titles, which I will undertake are never so clean but that some vain quarrel or exception may be made unto them, upon the fancy of every private man; and also couples the judgment and execution together, that he may judge him by a blow, without any other sentence.—Your lordships see what monstrous opinions these are, and how both these beasts, the beast with seven heads, and the beast with many heads, pope and people, are at once let in, and set upon the sacred persons of kings.

Now to go on with the narrative. There was an extract made of certain sentences and portions of this book, being of this nature that I have set forth, by a great prelate and counsellor, upon a just occasion; and there being some hollowness and hesitation in these matters, wherein it is a thing impious to doubt, discovered and perceived in Talbot, he was asked his opinion concerning these assertions, in the presence of the best: and afterwards they were delivered to him, that upon advice and sedato animo, he might declare himself. Whereupon, under his hand, he subscribes thus;

'May it please your honourable good lordships: concerning this doctrine of Suarez, I do perceive, by what I have read in this book, that the same doth concern matter of faith, the controversy growing upon exposition of scriptures and councils, wherein, being ignorant and not studied, I cannot take upon me to judge; but I do submit my opinion therein to the judgment of the catholic Roman church, as in all other points concerning faith I do. And for matter concerning my loyalty, I do acknowledge my sovereign liege lord king

' James, to be lawful and undoubted king of all the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and I will bear true faith and allegiance to his highness during my life.

WILLIAM TALBOT.'

My lords, upon these words I conceive Talbot hath committed a great offence, and such a one, as if he had entered into a voluntary and malicious publication of the like writing, it would have been too great an offence for the capacity of this court. But because it grew by a question asked by a council of estate, and so rather seemeth, in a favourable construction, to proceed from a kind of submission to answer, than from any malicious or insolent will; it was fit, according to the clemency of these times, to proceed in this manner before your lordships. And yet let the hearers take these things right; for certainly, if a man be required by the council to deliver his opinion whether king James be king or no; and he deliver his opinion that he is not, this is high treason. But I do not say that these words amount to that; and therefore let me open them truly to your lordships, and therein open also the understanding of the offender himself, how far they reach.

My lords, a man's allegiance must be independent and certain, and not dependent and conditional. Elizabeth Barton, that was called the holy maid of Kent, affirmed, that if king Henry 8, did not take Catharine of Spain again to his wife within a twelvemonth, he should be no king: and this was treason. For though this act be contingent and future, yet the preparing of the treason is present.—And in like manner, if a man should voluntarily publish or maintain, that whensoever a bull of deprivation shall come forth against the king, that from thenceforth he is no longer king; this is of like nature. But with this I do not charge you neither; but this is the true latitude of your words, that if the doctrine touching the killing of kings be matter of faith, then you submit yourself to the judgment of the catholic Roman church: so as now, to do you right, your allegiance doth not depend simply upon a sentence of the pope's deprivation against the king; but upon another point also, if these of doctrines be already, or shall be declared to be matter of faith. But, my lords, there is little won in this: there may be some difference to the guilt of the party, but there is little to the danger of the king. For the same pope of Rome may, with the same breath, declare both. So as still, upon the matter, the king is made but tenant at will of his life and kingdoms, and the allegiance of his subjects is pinned upon the pope's acts. And certainly it is time to stop the current of this opinion of acknowledgment of the pope's power in temporalibus; or else it will sap and supplant the seat of kings. And let it not be mistaken, that Mr. Talbot's offence should be no more than the refusing the oath of allegiance. For it is one thing to be silent, and another thing to affirm. As for the point of matter of faith, or not of faith, to tell your lordships plain, it would astonish a man to see the gulph of this implied belief. Is nothing excepted from it? If a man should ask Mr. Talbot whether he do condemn murder, or adultery, or rape, or the doctrine of Mahomet, or of Arius, instead of Suarez; must the answer be with this exception, that if the question concern matter of faith, as no question it doth, for the moral law is matter of faith, that therein he will submit himself to what the church shall determine? And, no doubt, the murder of princes is more than simple murder. But to conclude, Talbot, I will do you this right, and I will not be reserved in this, but to declare that that is true; that you came afterwards to a better mind; wherein, if you had been constant, the king, out of his great goodness, was resolved not to have proceeded with you in course of justice: but then again you started aside like a broken bow. So that by your variety and vacillation you lost the acceptable time of the first grace, which was not to have convicted you.

Nay, I will go farther with you. Your last submission I conceive to be satisfactory and complete. But then it was too late; the king's honour was upon it; it was published and a day appointed for hearing. Yet what preparation that may be to the second grace of pardon, that I know not: but I know my lords, out of their accustomed favour, will admit you not only to your defence concerning that that hath been charged; but to extenuate your fault by any submission that now God shall put into your mind to make.

pendant, he most favours; with which of them he is most conversant, and to which he would confer the better-of-the-day, if in his power.

4. Whether he has communicated to any body, or any body has conferred with him concerning the nature and substance of his deposition in this cause; And if he answer in the affirmative, then let him declare with whom he so conferred, and what the discourse that passed between them. 5. Whether he came of his own accord, or by compulsion, to give his testimony in this cause. 6. Let him depose what he knows of the contents in, the 4th article of the libel put in, in this cause; or any part thereof: And in what month and year the earl of Essex attained to the full age of 18 years; and in what place and places the earl and the plaintiff, for the whole space of three years after such time, had society of bed and board, cohabited and lay together; and for how long together in each distinct place. 7. Let him likewise depose what he can say to the contents in the sixth article of the aforesaid libel; and whether he knows what perpetual and incurable impediment the earl did and does labour under; and let him express the nature and quality thereof, and when he knew it; and let him give the causes of such his knowledge in every circumstance. 8. Let him depose likewise what he can say to the contents in the 10th Article of the said libel: And of the time and place, and how often, and before whom the earl confessed and acknowledged, as in the said Article is contained and specified.

Katharine Fines, daughter of Thomas lord Clinton, aged about 18 years, deposeth, that she hath known the lady Frances for about a year and a half, and the lord of Essex for above a year.—To the 1st, 2d, and 3d Article, cannot depose.—To the 4th Art. says, That from Midsummer last to All-hollantide, the earl of Essex and lady Frances remained and kept company together as man and wife; first in the countess of Leicester's house at Drayton in Warwickshire; and after at the earl's own house at Chartley in Staffordshire: And that for two of the nights they lodged at Drayton, being on a Sunday at night, and on a Monday at night, they to her knowledge lay together in one chamber; she seeing the earl go into the said chamber undressed and ready for bed; and she verily believes they did lie together in the same bed those two nights, for that she knows there was but one bed in the said chamber. That before Christmas last the said lady Frances lying at Salisbury-house in the Strand, the earl came thither and went into the chamber where lady Frances was in bed, and went to bed to her, and there was no other bed in that chamber; and this deponent heard the earl and lady Frances talking together a good part of that night.

Her DEPOSITIONS to the Interrogatories administered for the other side.

To the 1st Art. Speaks as to her birth and abode.—2d Art. That she is cousin-german to the lady Frances.—3d Art. That as to this cause, she favours the parties equally; that her conversation is most with the plaintiff; and that if it were in her power, she would give the decision according to right.—4th Art. Answers in the negative.—5th Art. That she was not compelled, but was made acquainted by some that she should be used as a Witness in this cause, and had notice given her when she should come.

The DEPOSITION of Elizabeth Raye, the daughter of William Raye, of Woodstock in Oxfordshire, gent. taken to the Libel: Aged above 20 years.

That she has known the lady Frances for above two years; and the earl of Essex for the same time.—To the 4th Art. That she served the lady Frances for above twelve months, and that shortly after she came to serve her, my lady went to my lord Knowles's house at Cawsam in Oxfordshire, where she stayed about a fortnight, and the lord Essex came thither to her, and laid in naked bed with the said lady Frances divers nights, as this deponent hath heard them report that attended the lady in her chamber: That the deponent herself at Drayton attending the said lady in her chamber, did see them in naked bed together as man and wife for divers nights; as they did likewise afterwards at Chartley, for above a quarter of a year, and at Michaelmas after that, at Durham-house at London.

Her Examination to the Interrogatories on the other side.

To the 1st Art. Speaks as to her abode at distinct times.—2d Art. Answers in the negative.—3d Art. That she favours both parties equally; converses with neither of them; and if in her power, would have right take place.—4th Art. Answers negatively.—5th Art. That she was requested to come to testify in this cause, but was not compelled by any process.—6th Art. Hath heard it reported that the earl of Essex was 29 years old in January last.—7th and 8th Art. No wise concern this deponent.

The DEPOSITION of Frances Britten, Widow, taken to the Libel.

That she is aged about 55 years, and hath known both the parties respectively from their infancy.—To the 4th Art. That the deponent having oftentimes occasion of business with the lady Frances, hath come to her since her marriage to the earl, and hath seen the earl and she dine and sup together as man and wife: That between Michaelmas and All-hollantide was three years, this deponent coming to lady Frances's lodging at Hampton-Court early in the morning, she was brought into the bed-chamber, where she did see them in naked bed.

said lady Frances hath been, and is fit and able to have copulation with a man, and such a one as may be carnally known; neither hath in this regard any impediment. VIII. Moreover, the said lady Frances remaineth, and is at this present a Virgin. Also at the time of the pretended Marriage, the said lady Frances was unacquainted with the Earl's want of ability and impediment, formerly mentioned. IX. And furthermore the said Earl, long before this suit commenced, hath very often, and at sundry times, confessed in good earnest, before Witnesses of good credit, and his friends and kinsfolks, that although he did his best endeavour, yet he never could; nor at this time can, have copulation with the said lady Frances, no not once. X. And lastly in regard of womanish modesty, the lady Frances hath concealed all the former matters, and had a purpose ever to conceal them, if she had not been forced, through false rumours of disobedience to the said Earl, to reveal them.—She requireth, since this pretended Matrimony is but in fact, and not in right, it may be pronounced, declared, and adjudged as none, and of none effect; and she may be quiet and free from all knots and bonds of the same, by your sentence and authority.

The Earl of Essex put in his ANSWER the 5th of July, 1614.

The 1st and 2nd he answereth affirmatively.—To the 3rd, he thinketh that at the time of his Marriage, he was full 14 years, and is now 22 and upwards; neither since hath had, or hath any sickness or impediment to hinder him, but that he might have had copulation with a woman, saving in the time of his sickness of the small pox, for two or three years after his marriage, which continued for a month or six weeks, and at another time, when he had a few fits of an ague.—To the 4th, he affirmeth, that for one year he divers times attempted; that the two other years, when he was willing, she shewed herself sometimes willing, but other times refused, and he lay in bed most commonly with her, but felt no motions or provocations.—To the 5th, he answereth, that he never carnally knew her, but found not any defect in himself, yet was not able to penetrate into her womb, nor enjoy her.—To the 6th, he believeth, that before and after the Marriage, he hath found an ability of body to know any other woman, and hath oftentimes felt motions and provocations of the flesh, tending to carnal copulation, but for perpetual and natural impediments, he knoweth not what the words mean; but that he hath lain by the lady Frances two or three years last past, and had no motion to know her, and he believes never shall.—To the 7th, he believeth not that the said lady Frances is a woman able and fit for carnal copulation, because he hath not found it.—To the 8th and 9th, he believeth them both to be true, and thinketh that once before some witnesses of credit, he did speak to this purpose, 'That he oftentimes had endeavoured carnally to know her, but that he did not, nor could not.

Doubts conceived out of the Fact and Process in the Suit between the lady Frances Howard, and the Earl of Essex.

1. Whether the Libel be defective, especially in the 4th Article, where it is said, that 'Dominus Comes Essex pluribus et iteratis vicibus' (which may be verified and satisfied in two or three times) 'dictam dominam Franciscam ejus uxorem prætersam cognoscere tentavit,' &c.—2. Whether the Answer of my lord of Essex to the said 4th Article in that behalf, being but thus, 'That he did divers times attempt, &c.' be full, certain and sufficient.—3. Whether in this case my lord of Essex his oath 'cum 7 manu propinquorum' be not by law requisite, as well as my lady's.—4. Whether my lord of Essex would be inspected by physicians, to certify (so far as they can by art) the true cause and nature of the impediment.—5. Whether by triennial cohabitation, there having been no carnal copulation between them '(Impedimentum malefici' being accidental), 'presumatur præcessisse vel potius subsecutum fuisse matrimonium contractum et solemnizatum.—6. Whether they ought 'post præceptum judicis' (notwithstanding their triennial cohabitation before the suit begun) to cohabit together, 'saltem per aliquod temporis spatium arbitrio judicis moderandum,' for further trial, &c.'

DEPOSITIONS taken in the case of the Earl of Essex, and the Lady Howard.

The Oath taken by the Lady Frances Howard.

"That since the earl of Essex was 18 years of age, he and I have for the space of 3 years divers and sundry times lain together in naked bed all night. And at sundry of the said times the said earl hath purposely endeavoured and attempted to consummate marriage with me, and to have carnal copulation with me for procreation of children: and I have at such times, as the said earl hath attempted so to do, yielded myself willing to the same purpose. All which notwithstanding, I say and affirm upon my Oath, that the said earl never had carnal copulation with me, FRANCES HOWARD."

Let him depose likewise what he can say to the contents in the 10th Article of the said libel: And of the time and place, and how often, and before whom the earl confessed and acknowledged, as in the said Article is contained and specified.

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's REASONS against the Nullity.

Inasmuch as we firmly believe, that the Scripture doth directly, or by consequence, contain in it sufficient matter to decide all controversies, especially in things appertaining to the church, as that Marriage among Christians can be no less accounted than a sacred thing, as being instituted by God himself in Paradise, honoured by the presence of our Saviour himself, declared by St. Paul to be a sign of the spiritual conjunctions between Christ and the Church:—I would be glad to know, and by what text of scripture, either by the Old or New Testament, a man may have a warrant to make a nullity of a marriage solemnly celebrated, propter maleficium versus hanc.—Which I do the rather ask, because I find warrant expressly in the scriptures to make a nullity of a marriage propter frigiditatem, by the words of our Saviour, Mat. xix. 12. 'For there be some chaste, or Eunuchs, which are so born of their mothers' belly, and there be some which are made chaste of men, and there be some which have made themselves chaste for the kingdom of heaven.'—I would also know gladly, what antient father amongst the Greeks or Latins, by occasion of interpretation of scripture, or any disputation, hath mentioned maleficium versus hanc.—The like I demand touching antient councils, either general or provincial, and concerning stories ecclesiastical, whether any such matter be to be found in them.—If for aught that appeareth never mention was made of this, till Hircanus, Rhemisis episcopus, who lived 400 years after Christ; it may well be conceived that this was a concomitant of darkness or popish superstition, which about that time grew to so great an height (God permitting them) that punishment might fall upon the children of unbelief.—But since the Light of the Gospel is now in so great a measure broken forth again, why should not I hope that those, who have embraced the gospel, should be free from this maleficium; especially since amongst a million of men in our age, there is but one found in all our country, who is clearly and evidently known to be troubled with the same? And if there should be any which should seem to be molested, we are taught to use two remedies, the one temporal physic, the other eternal.—For the first, our Saviour said, 'Hoc genus demoniorum non eicitur, nisi per orationem et jejunium;' and St. Peter speaking of the devil, 'Cui resistite firmè in fide;' and the Canonists themselves prescribe alms, fasting and prayer to be used in this case; but that they join supplication and their exorcisms therunto, and for corporeal medicine to be applied therewith as against a disease: so is the judgment of our late divines, whether they speak of maleficium or not. Now admit the earl of Essex might be imagined to be troubled with maleficium versus hanc; I demand what alms hath been given, what fasting hath been used, and what prayers have been poured forth to appease the wrath of God towards him or his wife; or what physic hath been taken, or medicine hath been applied for three years together? Not one of these things; but the first hearing must be to pronounce a nullity in the marriage, of which declaration we know the he-ginning, but no mortal man's wit can foresee the end, either in his person, or in the example.

Then the Archbishop, for confirmation of his Opinion, shewed the Testimony of Melancthon, Pezelius, Hemingius, Polanus, Arcularius, Beza, Zanchius.

Personæ quæ non sunt idoneæ ad commixtionem conjugalem nequaquam sunt conjuges, sed cum explorata est frigiditas, Judex pronunciet illas personas liberas esse. Nec fit tunc divortium, quia non erat conjugium, juxta dictum Mat. 19. sed fit declaratio, ut alii sciant, illam societatem non esse conjugium, et personæ quæ habet naturæ vires integras, concedi aliam felicioris copulationem legitimam. Sed ad explorandum frigiditatem Jura tempus constituunt, si res dubia est, ne ante triennium fiat sejunction. Eodem modo pronunciant de iis in quibus natura ita læsa est fascino aut veneficio, ut ope medica sanari non possit, si toto triennio frustra tentata est medicatio.—Tanta autem est virtus aliquarum mulierum, ut occultent imbecillitatem virorum, sicuti viri doctissimi Simonis Grynei soror narravit, se, mortua prima conjugē, duxisse viduam virginem, quæ undecim annos nupta fuerit viro frigido, nec unquam ulli, ante mortem viri, hanc rem patefecit. Hæc Melancthon in locis: Loco de conjugio, quæ Christopherus Pezelius suis in Melancthonis examen explicationibus inseruit, et eis adjecit hanc annotationem. Impotentia alia naturalis, alia accidentalis est. Naturalis, cum quis natura non est idoneus ad commixtionem conjugalem. Accidental, cum quis est castratus, aut veneficio corruptus. Rursus quæ ex veneficio accidit impotentia, aut curari potest medicamentis, aut est perpetua. Ex his distinctionibus sumitur explicatio questionis, an, et quomodo impotentia sit causa divortii. Nam inter impotentes, non potest constare conjugium, quia deest causa sufficiens et finalis. Primum, si persona illa quæ sana est, decepta fuit, et ignorans duxit impotentem, non igitur potuit esse consensus, qui est causa efficiens Matrimonii. Secundò, duplex est finis conjugii; unus est generatio sobolis, sicut dicitur, Crescite et multiplicamini: Alter finis est, Vitatio confusionis libidinum, juxta dictum; Vitandæ fornicationis causa unusquisque habeat uxorem, Hæc Pezelius 2 parte explicat. In Examen Melancthon.

Inhabilitas corporum ad usum matrimonii divortii causa est, et nonnunquam fascino et veneficio adeo inhabiles redduntur viri, ut nunquam sanari possint. Sed plura sunt judicii perpendenda, antequam divortii sententiam ferat. Primum, an impotentia præcesserit Nuptias. Secundum, an sit subsecuta Nuptias. Tertium, an sit curabilis. Quartum, an ejus rei mulier conscia fuerit ante Nuptias. Si præcesserit Nuptias, potest liberari persona sana divortium petens, non enim fuit verum conjugium, siquidem non legitime consentiunt, cum unus fallit, alter errat, fallit impotens, errat potens. Cum ergo Deus nec fallaciam nec errorem probat, non est dicendus eos conjunctis. Proinde Judex, si intellexerit ex probationibus incusabile esse vitium, mox declarabit suo testimonio, non fuisse Matrimonium; verum si spes sit curationis, triennium statuatur, in quo patienter expectetur curatio; quæ si frustra tentata fuerit, Judex pronuntiabit Conjugium nullum fuisse.—Si subsecutum est vitium post nuptias et complexum maritalem conjugum, nullo pacto permittendum est divortium: fortuna enim afflicta, et absit culpa, patienter in conjugio ferenda est. Si alter fuerit conscius infirmitatis alterius ante nuptias, cogantur simul habitare, et alia officia sibi mutuo præstare: Nam persona conscia vitii alterius absque dubio fraudem meditata est; quæ fraus non debet illi prodere, si postea divortium petat. Hæc Hemingius libello de Conjugio, Repudio, et Divortio.

Conjugium inire possunt, qui non sunt natura vel arte Spadones, aut quibus natura non est læsa fascino aut veneficio. Tales enim personæ nequaquam fiunt conjuges. Ideo etiam nuptiis celebratis, cum trienni spatium explorata est spadonis frigiditas, aut toto triennio tentata est naturæ læsæ medicatio, Judex pronuntiare potest illas personas liberas esse. Polanus lib. 10. Syntag. cap. 53.

Inter personas quæ propter frigiditatem aliudve naturæ vitium ad usum conjugii sunt ineptæ, cum non sit conjugium, teste Christo Mat. 19. divortium hic locum habere poterit. Si quam igitur personam talem alteri jungi contingat, Judex explorata frigiditate aut naturæ vitio, utramque personam liberam pronuntiabit. Porro ad explorandam frigiditatem Jura triennii tempus præscribunt, præsertim si res dubia sit. Idem judicium est de eis quorum natura vel fascino vel veneficio ita sit læsa, ut ad conjugii usum reddantur inepti; et omnem medicorum operam intra triennium inanem fuerint experti. Hæc Arcularius in arca fœderis, cap. 28.

Sponsalia cum personis paralyti immedicabili, quæ corpus prorsus enervavit, frigiditate insanabili, genitalium partium privatione, vel adeo insigni læsione, ut perpetua coitus impotentia necessario consequetur, affectis contracta prorsus inutilia sunt, cum ad matrimonium a Deo vocati videri non possint, qui fidem in sponsalibus datam præstare, naturali objecto vitio nequeunt. Quod si sponsalibus factis, conjugio tamen nondum re ipsa consummato, ejusmodi malum supervenerit, sentio ejusmodi sponsalia, veluti Deo ipso jubente, dirimenda; ut quid objecto perpetuo impedimento, palam demonstrat, sibi istiusmodi sponsalia non placere. Beza lib. de Divort. et Repud. pag. 91. Genev. 1591. impress.—Atque hanc suam doctrinam Beza multis ex sacras scripturæ testimoniis probat: sed tantum pag. 91. e duas cautiones adjecit. Primum, si frigidus postea convaleuit, repetere priorem uxorem, errore, viz. Separatam oportet, etiamsi alteri postea esset conjuncta: secundam cautionem, recte omnino in istiusmodi controversiis constitutum est, (ne quid videlicet fieret, quod postea mutari sine magno offendiculo non posset) ut triennium saltem ab ipso copulationis, i. e. ductæ uxoris die expectaretur, priusquam isti morbi insanabiles esse, et sponsalia conjugium dirimenda pronuntiarentur. Hoc autem omnino de his vitiiis accipiendum est quæ per se non patent. Nam alioqui, ut in executione, vel siquis naturæ vitio, testibus aut genitali membro careat, quorsum ullum temporis intervallum?

Quemadmodum Beza, sic nec Zanchius impotentiam ex veneficio attiget, sed tantum docet, quosdam esse casus, quibus matrimonia in ipsa Ecclesia benedicta nulla sint, et subinde hæc exempla subiungit. Si cum eo contrahitur, qui vir non erat, sed spado, aut propter perpetuum ei insanabilem morbum, officium conjugii præstare nullo modo potest. Hæc Zanchius lib. 4. de op. Dei, cap. 3. sed illam nec scripturæ testimoniis nec rationibus confirmat.

To these Arguments of the Archbishop, the king vouchsafed to give an Answer himself which was as follows:

The King's Answer.

To the first article, that the Scripture doth directly or by consequence contain sufficient matter to decide all controversies, especially in this appertaining to the church: this in my opinion is preposterous, and one of the puritans arguments, without a better distinction or explanation.—For the orthodox proposition is, that the Scripture doth directly, or by consequence, contain in it sufficient matter to decide all controversies in points of faith and salvation, of which sort a nullity of marriage cannot be accounted for one; and therefore your consequence upon the former proposition must fail.—For further satisfaction of your following question (I say) your second question doth answer it: if there be warrant in Scripture for pronouncing a nullity propter frigiditatem, then all the means which may make him frigidus versus hanc, must be comprehended therein; for why doth the church justly condemn the marriage of a man with his sister's daughters, or the marriage of two sisters, but ut paritate rationis, for none of them are in terminis prohibited by the Scripture? Only the conclusion gathered à paritate rationis. For if it be not lawful to marry the father's wife, because thereby you discover your father's shame; nor his sister, because she is his kinswoman; nor your own sister, because thereby you discover your father's and your mother's shame: it can no more be lawful to marry your sister's daughter, for thereby also you discover your own shame; as also the same reason serves for ascending or descending in points of consanguinity, quia par est ratio.—The like is in this case; for although Christ spake only of three sorts of eunuchs, yet ‘Ratio est quia non potest esse copulatio inter eunuchum et mulierem,’ and therefore St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. telleth us clearly, that it is not ‘Conjugium sine copulatione.’ I conclude, therefore, a paritate rationis, that Christ did comprehend under these three sorts all inability which doth perpetually hinder ‘copulationem versus hanc,’ whether it be natural or accidental; for what difference is there between cutting off the hand, and being made impotent thereof? ‘Amputatio et mutilatio membri,’ is all one in the civil law; and that is a like defrauding of the woman, when either he who is to be her husband is gelded, or when the use of that member towards her is by any unlawful means taken from him. Neither is it any way needful to crave the particular warrant of Scripture for a nullity, no more than of warrant in this place for any nullity at all; for Christ doth not directly say, that a marriage so made shall be nullified, neither doth he teach us what form or process shall be used in that, neither makes he mention of the triennial probation, no more than he forbiddeth marriage within the fourth degree, without leave obtained of the bishop of the diocese. It is then sufficient to all moderate Christians to be taught out of the Word of God, that marriage is nulla sine copulatione; and these words, quos Deus conjunxit, are never found in Scripture, where et erunt ei doth not proceed, viz. they two shall be one flesh.—But whether the impediment be universal, or versus hanc only; or whether the fault thereof hath been born with him, or done to him by violence, or fallen unto him by disease, or disproportion, or inaptitude betwixt the parties, or unnatural practices, that is ever par ratio, he is eunuchus versus hanc et omnes alias, seeing to him only was she married.—Then paritate rationis, such nullities are grounded upon the aforesaid warrant of Scripture, neither had Christ any occasion to speak of the Jews marriage concerning maleficium versus hanc; for though it be apparent that God made king Abimelech and his servants unable to abuse Sarah, Abraham’s wife, and so was he made by God himself eunuchus versus hanc, and that it be not improbable that the devil being God’s ape, should imitate God’s works, by his filthy witchcraft, by making such as God will permit him, unable versus hanc: howbeit, it is very probable that it was long after that time the devil put that trick upon the earth.—As for the third and fourth Questions, what mention the Fathers and Councils do make of maleficium versus hanc, I answer, that it may be (if they were well searched) that either something to this purpose in them, or at the least aliquid analogum, with a paritate rationis, or by consequence, may serve to decide the question.—But leaving this to search, my main Answer is, That we must distinguish oft-times: for in all the first ages, as long as persecution lay heavy upon the church, and before the empire became Christian, the church did not meddle with anything, which drew a consequence after it of possessions, or inheritance, as marriage doth; nay, even divers hundred years after the conversion of the emperors, the judgment and decision of all such questions did still remain in foro civili, till the popedom began to wax great, and assume, or rather usurp to herself a supreme and independent judicatory in all ecclesiastical causes: and therefore the Fathers and Councils had no occasion to make mention of that which was not de prefori at that time.—And besides, that is an evil argument to say such a thing is not lawful, because the Fathers and Councils made no mention of it: for you know much better than I, divers and many points betwixt the Papists and us are never mentioned by the Fathers, because they could never have dreamed that such questions would arise; and therefore are the Fathers exact only in such questions as were agitated upon the state at that time, as ‘De Trinitate, de duobus in Christo Naturis,’ and such like: and therefore it is sufficient that there can be nothing found which may justly be understood to contradict this opinion.—And it is very probable (as I said before) that this trick of maleficium had not then been put in practice in the world, and therefore not known or mentioned by them; for why may not the Devil as well find out new tricks of witchcraft (when God will permit him) as he did daily new sects of heresies? For his malice can never end until the end of times.—To the fifth Argument, my former answer doth also serve; for till the 400th year after Christ, it may be that devilish trick came never to be discovered. You know the old Proverb, ex malis moribus bona leges: and it is not unlikely that the time of darkness gave the Devil occasion to devise such new tricks (look my Dæmonology); and yet was that law for which you cite Hircanus, by Charles the Great, who in many great points (as you know) had so great light, as I do scarce term this time a time of blindness: but howsoever the darkness was in points of superstition, I will still maintain (as I have ever done) that for matters of order and policy, all the world shall never be able to find out any so good and so old an order of argument to be put in the place of it: in sign whereof there is no well governed commonwealth in the Christian world, wherein the common-law is not received to judge in questions of that nature; and it is certain, that this question now in hand, is only a question of order and policy: for the ground of this question, that the essential point of matrimony cannot be accomplished sine copula, is warranted by express Scripture, and confessed by yourself.—To your sixth Argument (or rather hope) I fear that hope shall prove contrary to faith; for as sure as God is, there be Devils, and some Devils must have some power, and their power is in this world, neither are the Elect exempted from this power; Job was not, Paul was not: Christ said to all his disciples, 'Cribaverit vos Sathanas;' and if the Devil hath any power, it is over the flesh, rather over the filthiest and most sinful part thereof, whereunto original sin is soldered; as God, before and under the law, to show officium of purging man's original sin, ordained the præputium of the foreskin: and to exempt this of our profession from the power of witchcraft, is a paradox never yet maintained by any learned or wise man.—That the Devil's power is not so universal against us, that I freely confess; but that it is utterly restrained quoad nos, how was then a minister of Geneva bewitched to death, and were the witches daily punished by our law? If they can harm none but the papists, we are too charitable for avenging of them only.—Satan is permitted to punish man, as well for his breach of the second as of the first table, and thereof are we no less guilty than the papists are; and if the power of witchcraft may reach to our life, much more to a member, not so governed by the fancy, wherein the Devil hath his principal operation; and he may so estrange the husband's affection towards the wife, as he cannot be able to perform that duty to her; for that is a common thing in many men's natures, that they cannot do that thing but where they love, nor fight but where they are angry. God keep us therefore from putting the trial of our profession upon miracles; let the miracle-mongers live by their own trade.—To the seventh Argument touching Remedies, what do you know, whether both parties, or either of them hath used these means of remedy or not? And that special remedy should be used publicly, for there I can see no necessity; for 'Non interest reipub. nec eccles.' and private persons are commanded to do their fastings and alms, secretly and in private: no such cure also is likely to succeed well, except the parties own hearts and desires be set thereupon.—And as for your Conclusion upon your incommodum, whether upon his person or the example, I can see none in either, so as to the couple, between them marriage was never accomplished truly; they will peradventure both of them by the declaration of the nullity be capable to accomplish marriage with others, which they could never do between themselves; wherein they may have the satisfaction of their hearts, and enjoy the blessing of procreation of children.—And as for the Example, the law shall be fulfilled with due administration of justice, which cannot prove for an example or precedent of a counterfeit nullity hereafter, 'Auctoritas facti,' or rather 'non facti, sed luce clarior' in this case, besides the many probations and confessions of the parties which have been taken in this process: whereas by the contrary, they shall be forcibly kept together, but never their persons or affections, and they still be forced to live in perpetual scandal, or misery, or both; and what such a kind of forced continency may avail, the monks continency may teach us: and for a precedent in time to come, that reacheth no further, than to open a way of lawful relief, to any person who shall chance to be distressed in that sort.—And for legal Doubts, they concern none of your calling; if your conscience be resolved in points of divinity, that is your part to give your consent to the nullity, and let the lawyers take the burden of making that firm; and as for the triennial probation, I hope no man can be so blind as to make a doubt, whether that be taken before or after the suit begun; and in conclusion of divine solution of this question proved clearly, that this resolution of this doubt, howsoever it was in blindness as you think, that is now proved in the greatest time of light and purity of the profession of the gospel.—And for your Extract upon the late Divines Opinions upon this Question, I cannot guess what your intent was in sending them to me, for they all agree in terms with my opinion: but there is such a thing as 'maleficium, et maleficiale versus hanc;' and your very interlude passages prove that clearest: and for that advice concerning the remedies, that is but 'consilium non decretum,' not imposing a necessity: but is to be used by discretion, as occasion shall prove and require it.—To conclude then, if this may satisfy your doubts, I will end with our Saviour's words to St. Peter, 'Cum conversus fueris, confirma fratres tuos;' for on my conscience, all the doubts I have yet seen, are nothing but 'nodos in scirpo querere.'"

Notwithstanding the Confessions in the Earl's Answer, the Court thought it necessary to satisfy themselves of the truth by the inspection of midwives and matrons. Whereupon it was decreed by the Court, that six midwives of the best note, and ten other noble matrons, out of which they themselves would chuse two midwives, and four matrons, should inspect the Countess, the Entry whereof is as follows:

"Tunc Domini, viz. Arch. Cant. Lond. Eliens. Covent. et Licht. Cæsar, Parry, Donne, Bennet, Edwards, habita inter eos privata deliberatione, ex numero matronarum predicta elegerunt; the lady Mary Tirwhit, wife of sir Philip Tirwhit, bart.; lady Alice Carew, wife of sir Matthew Carew; lady Dalison, wife of sir Roger Dalison; lady Anne Waller, widow. Ex ex obstetricum numero, &c. Margaritam Mercer et Christianam Chest. Et assignarunt procuratorem dictæ dominæ Franciscæ ad sistendum hujusmodi inspectrices coram reverendo Patre Episc. London. Cæsar, Donne, &c. inter cæteros nominat. isto die inter horas quintam & sextam post meridiem, juramentum in hac parte subituras, atque inspectione facta fideliter relaturas earum judicium juxta earum scientiam et experientiam, &c. coram dictis Dominis delegatis, sicut præfertur, assignatis quam cito fieri possit ante horam quartam et sextam post meridiem diei Jovis proxime, alioquin ad comparend. hoc in loco, coram Commissariis dicto die Jovis inter horas quartam et sextam post meridiem ejusdem diei, earum judicium hanc in parte tunc relaturas, et ad interessendum hora et loco respective predictis, ad videndum inspectrices predictas juramento in hac parte onerari; nec non quibuscunque aliis diebus hora et loco predictos dominos Commissarios nominat. dictis inspectricibus, ad referendum earam judicium assignat."

Accordingly between the hours of that day aforesaid, were presented before the delegates the said ladies, and sworn ad inquirend. et inspicieud. 1. Whether the lady Frances were a woman fit and apt for carnal copulation without any defect, which might disable her for that purpose. 2. Whether she were a virgin carnally unknown by any man. Whereupon they went from the presence of the Commissioners into the next room where the countess was, who was left alone with the said ladies.* After some convenient time they returned, and delivered in their Report under their hands; all persons being removed except the Register, that so the ladies and midwives might more freely deliver their secret Reasons, &c. which were not fit to be inserted into the Record; and this is in sum their Report:

1. That they believe the lady Frances fitted with abilities to have carnal copulation, and apt to have children. 2. That she is a virgin uncorrupted.

And to corroborate all this, the countess in open court produced seven women of her consanguinity, that inasmuch as the truth was best known to herself, she might by virtue of her Oath discover the same, and her oath should be no farther regarded than as it was confirmed by the oath of her kinswomen. In order hereto the Countess took an oath, That since the earl was 18 years old, for three years he and she had lain in bed, &c. as in the Libel.

And then the seven noble women, viz. Katharine countess of Suffolk, Frances countess of Kildare, Elizabeth lady Walden, Eliz. lady Knevet, lady Katharine Thynne, Mrs. Katharine Fiennes, Mrs. Dorothy Neale, being sworn, deposed that they believed the same was true; and in particular because, 1. That after they were both grown to years of puberty, they both endeavoured copulation. 2. That notwithstanding, on her part, as appeared by the inspectors, she remained a Virgin uncorrupted. 3. That the Earl had judicially sworn, That he never had, nor could, nor should ever know her carnally.

THE SENTENCE.

Whereupon the Delegates declared the law to be, That impotentia coeundi in viro whatsoever, whether by natural defect, or accidental means, whether absolute towards all, or respective to his wife only, if it precede matrimony, and be perpetual (as by law is presumed, when after three years trial, after the man is of the age of 18 years, there has been nil ad copulam, and the marriage not consummated) is a just cause of Divorce à vinculo matrimonii; and that the Proofs produced in this Case were abundantly sufficient to convince them, of the Earl's Impotency; and therefore pronounced Sentence that they should be divorced from each other, and be at liberty to marry again; which Sentence was as follows:

' That Robert earl of Essex, and the lady Frances Howard, contracted by shew of Marriage, did cohabit in one house, and lie together in one bed; nudus cum nuda, et solus cum sola; and that the said lady Frances did shew herself prompt and ready to be known of him, and that the said Earl neither did nor could have knowledge of her, although he did think himself able to have knowledge of other women; and that the said lady Frances by inspection of her body by midwives, expert in matter of Marriage, was proved to be apt for carnal copulation with man, and yet a virgin: Therefore we the said Judges deputed in the Cause, first invoking the name of Christ, and setting God before our eyes, do pronounce, decree, and declare, That the earl of Essex, for some secret, incurable, binding impediment, did never carnally know, or was or is able carnally to know the lady Frances Howard: And therefore we do pronounce, have decreed, and do declare, the pretended Marriage so contracted and solemnized de facto between them, to have been, and to be utterly void and to no effect, and that it did want, and ought to want the strength of the law: And that the lady Frances was, and is, and so ought to be free, and at liberty from any bond of such pretended marriage, de facto, contracted and solemnized. And we do pronounce, that she ought to be divorced, and so we do free and divorce her, leaving them as touching other marriages to their consciences in the Lord.

' Which our definitive Sentence and Decree we ratify and publish. Thomas Wint.; Lancel. Ely; Rich. Coven. and Lichf.; John Roffen. bishops.—Julius Cæsar, Thomas Farry, Daniel Donue, Doctors.'

The following Commissioners could not agree to this Sentence, and therefore absented themselves. George Cant.; John London.; bishops.—John Bennet, Francis James, Thomas Edwards, doctors.

Dec. 5. Soon after this Sentence, the countess was married to the viscount Rochester, lately made earl of Somerset.

The foregoing Account of the Proceedings between the Earl of Essex and Lady FRANCES HOWARD, being but short and very imperfect, wanting the Arguments of the Civilians, &c. the following Account, written by Dr. George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Speech he intended to have made, and King James's Letter to him, will throw much light upon that affair, and help greatly to explain it.

THE CASE OF ROBERT EARL OF ESSEX, AND THE LADY FRANCES HOWARD.

Some MEMORIALS touching the Nullity between the Earl of Essex and his Lady, pronounced September 25, 1613, at Lambeth (and the Difficulties endured in the same), by George, Archbishop of Canterbury.

BEING at the Court at White-Hall, on the 12th of May, 1613, or thereabouts, his majesty moved me, that I would be a commissioner in a controversy to be begun between the earl of Essex and his lady for the separating of them; and when his majesty had ended those few words with me, my lord chamberlain, who was then in the gallery, spake also unto me to that purpose. It was unto me a matter very strange, having heard before of some contentments between that noble couple; but never imagining that matters were come to that head. My answer was alike to both, "That I did not know the ground whereupon they intended to move; but that, if I were to be a judge in any such question; I would pray, that other bishops, being near the town and court, might be joined with me." The persons that were named then, were, my lord of London, my lord of Ely, and my lord of Litchfield (for at that time was my lord of Bath with the queen's majesty at Bath). Besides, I prayed both the king's majesty, and my lord Chamberlain, 'That before any such thing were entered into, I might speak privately with my lord of Essex, for the satisfying of mine own mind;' which by both was permitted unto me. The day after I sent for the earl; and having private speech with him, only about the ability of his body, and nothing else, I found him generally much reserved in talk, but only avowing the ability of himself for generation; and that he was resolved never to lay any blemish upon himself that way. I knew not well what to make of this; for I did not then understand, that some lords had met before at White-Hall on both parts, (the lord privy-seal, the lord chamberlain, the earl of Southampton, and the lord Knowles, as afterwards I heard) to settle an order by consent, how this prosecution should be; that is to say, That a separation should be made, and my lord's honour every way preserved.

Within a day or two, coming to White-Hall, I had speech with the lord chamberlain, in the gallery going towards St. James's Park. I might not reveal all particulars of that which passed in private; but yet I told his lordship, 'That I had spoken with the earl of Essex, and I perceived it was like to be a matter of great difficulty, and therefore wished his lordship to be well advised, before any thing was brought into publick." I told him, 'That he must proceed either upon confession or proof: that it was probable, the earl would not confess his own impotency, for then he blemished himself: that my lady's oath in that case was not sufficient; and how other proofs might be had, I could not conceive: that the earl in open estimation was to be thought an able man; that his father was not thought in that kind insufficient.' The lord chamberlain replied, 'That, perhaps, the father's sin was punished upon the son: that it was truth, that the earl had no ink in his pen: that himself had confessed, that he could not know a woman, and that before divers noblemen, and some of them his own friends, naming, as I remember, the earls of Northampton and Worcester, and the lord Knowles.' All this while I never dreamed of 'impotentia versus hanc', but conceived, that they would charge the earl simply with disability. The lord chamberlain then seemed unto me fully resolved to proceed, and told me whom he would have in the commission, the bishops of London, Ely, and Litchfield, the two Chancellors of the Exchequer and Dutchy, my Judges; (for so he called them) sir Daniel Dun, sir John Bennet, Dr. James, and Dr. Edwards. I told his lordship, 'That I liked the persons very well.' The next news I heard was about a day or two after, 'That the commission was out under the great seal;' which I wondered at, by reason that I thought, that my words to the lord chamberlain being well weighed, would have moved some longer consideration. Well: the commission is brought; it is accepted, and proceeding decreed; the earl of Essex is called; the libel is put in. When we saw it, and that it contained 'impotentia versus hanc', most of us, who were not acquainted with the project before, were much amazed at it. I told the counsel for my lady, 'That they had laid a very narrow bridge for themselves to go over.' So said my lord of London, and divers of the rest; only my lord of Ely was still silent. My lord of Litchfield, two several times, uttered speeches, as much grieving and repining at this controversy: 'That he was ordinary to the earl of Essex, and had been in his house at Chartley, which he saw to be well governed; and the earl did bear himself most religiously therein, to his great comfort: that his wife had the honour to be cousin-german to the countess of Suffolk; and therefore he had no reason but to wish well to the earl of Essex and his lady both. Yet, if he had been worthy to be consulted withal, he should have thought that seven years had been little enough to have deliberated, whether it were fit to bring such a business into question before the world.' Another time he told us, 'That it was very good, that we should proceed with great wariness in this cause: for,' saith he, 'the world looketh on us what we do; and there were not more eyes upon the earl's father losing his head, than there be upon the earl now losing his wife.' He told me afterwards, 'That he had ill-will for those speeches, and complained that some among us did tell tales of all that was said and done.' (And so it appeared afterwards, that sir J. Cæsar and sir Daniel Dun did.) Sir Thomas Parry, in all his speeches, privately murmured against this nullity, till he came to Windsor: where, the day that the king heard us, the lord chamberlain, in my presence, spake privately with him and sir Julius Cæsar about this matter; and from that time forward, Mr. Chancellor of the Dutchy was altered. My lord of Ely, also, for a great while, was in dislike of the separation, (as I have credibly heard he opened himself to sir Henry Savile) until such time as the king spake with him, and then his judgment was reformed. But truth it is, that among us he said nothing.

Now the earl's answer is taken, which appeareth. In it there were divers things very-observable. He used no ill speech of his lady, for which we all much commended him. I gave him so strict a charge to speak the truth, requiring him, as he would answer me before God, at the last day, to deliver nothing for favour or affection, but to inform us in the verity, that it wrung from him something which I supposed he intended not to speak so plainly. He gave the reason of his having no motions to know his lady carnally, and of his thinking that he never should, 'When I came out of France, I loved her; I do not so know, neither ever shall I.' When he was to answer to the article, that she was 'Virgo incorrupta;' he smiled, and said, 'She saith so, and she is so for me.' Sir Daniel Dun caught these words, and bid the register set down then, 'credit articulum esse verum.' These things gave me no great encouragement to the business; but yet being at very little leisure, I let matters go on, and in mine own part resolved nothing. Then the witnesses were deposed, but not published. The inspectresses were chosen, who came most unwillingly unto it; and howsoever sir Julius Cæsar and sir Daniel Dun, whom we never suspected to be as parties in the cause, as afterwards they appeared to be, made all clear and fair weather; yet my lord of London told us openly, 'That he being with them, found that the ladies knew not well what to make of it; that they had no skill, nor knew not what was the truth; but what they said, was upon the credit of the midwives, which were but two, and I knew not how tampered with.' Then came the lady Frances to take her oath, with the seven Compurgators. I noted therein some things. A paper was brought, containing, verbis præcisiss, what her ladyship would swear. We saw it, and considered it, and found it too bare and slight to enforce any thing. The commissioners advised, that it should be more full. Dr. Steward accordingly drew it; but he must go forth to the lady, to know whether she would swear it. At last it was agreed unto. When she came to subscribe it, after the oath taken, one or two of her brothers standing at her back, put her in mind that she must not write her name Frances Essex, which she most willingly remembered, and subscribed Frances Howard. We saw my lord of Litchfield's wife to be one of the seven. We were afterwards informed very credibly, That the lady Knevet had declared her sorrow, that she was used in such an action, and said, 'That she wept all the day about it.' These things pleased me little, that nobody took comfort in the business.

Things go on in a course till Midsummer day. Then did the king deal with me privately, as if he had received divers complaints against me. The first was, 'That we delayed the proceeding, inasmuch as the meeting was put off, from the 18th of June, till the 2d or 3d of July.' My answer was, 'We had rather gone too fast: we had sat forenoon and afternoon. The term now grew to an end, and we had many businesses to dispatch of the king's: That the commission day for causes ecclesiastical was put off for a week, by reason of Midsummer day falling on a Thursday; and consequently, that our proceeding in this cause, which commonly attended the other commission, was of necessity to be deferred.' But my principal answer was, 'That we could not shorten it; for the counsel on both parts had agreed upon that day in July, and so it was upon the acts: howsoever, therefore, the counsel for my lady moved openly in court to abbreviate the time, yet the counsel for my lord would not renounce nor alter their term probatory, but kept them close unto it.' Another objection was, 'That I acquainted not the king, from time to time, how matters did go.' I answered, 'That I knew not myself: for as yet there was no publication of witnesses; when any thing came to my knowledge, his majesty should understand it.' It was added, 'That divers persons repaired unto me, who wished not well to the business.' 'Belike,' said I, 'they mean the earl of Southampton, who came in the other day, when we were all sitting together: but his coming was about John Cotton's cause; and I never had a word with him in all my life, touching this business.' 'No,' said the king, and smiled, 'it is sir Henry Nevile.' 'Indeed,' quoth I, 'he was with me the other day, and this very morning: but your majesty well knows what was the reason. It was touching that cause, which your majesty commanded me to send for him about. I delivered him your mind the one day, and he gave me an answer the other.' At this time, his majesty cast out some words, as if he wished well to the nullity; but it was so obscurely, that I did not conceive that earnestly he desired it. After this day, the complaints were many which were made to the king against me, and many threats were used, and divers tricks were played to urge me to yield to the nullity. One was, 'That I should suffer the earl of Essex to go out of town.' I answered, 'He had made his answer, and had his proctor, and it was our custom then not to stay men.' His majesty commanded me to inquire, if his presence were not necessary; and if it were, then I should stay him. I sent to sir Daniel Dun, to sir John Bennet, and to Dr. Steward; and they all agreed, that there was no need of his lordship's being in town. And of this I sent word to the lord chamberlain; and my lord of Essex was permitted to depart. One while it was given out, that I was moved by the queen to cross them; when, in truth, I had not spoke with her thereabout: another while, that I had spoke with the earl of Essex at first, and hence his lordship grew less pliable; when they knew about what it was, and were told of it before. And it was not forgotten, that when I gave charge to the earl of Essex, to answer truly to the positions in the libel, I named the case of my lord of Devonshire and the lady Rich, as if I had compared this cause unto theirs. When afterwards the earl's counsel took exception to the libel, it was given out, that they were animated by me to oppose; whereas I never spake with them, nor knew any thing of their purpose. And ever that was one, that there were delays used. Yea, it was to my face delivered as a threat, that archbishop Grindal had been overthrown for not giving consent to the divorce of Dr. Julio, as implying, that the same would be my case.

About this time, the lords, and the rest of the seoffees, were to meet at Mr. Sutton's hospital, about the settling of it. The day that we were to come thither, my lord chamberlain, in the privy gallery at Whitehall, shewed his anger towards me, that we had not sent for the keys to his lordship, and that he might deliver over the cause. But when I came to the Charter-house, there was delivered me a letter, written all with my lord's own hand, and directed to the lord archbishop, the lord chancellor, and the lord privy seal; wherein he did twice take exception to me by name, and, in a sort, braved me, that so he might pick a quarrel to me; whereunto I replied not, but bore it with patience.

A little before Whitsuntide, his lordship was very kind to me, and of his own accord proffered me a chamber at Greenwich, which my lord, my predecessor, had; but after twice proffering of it, and my accepting of the same, his lordship fell off strangely, and I never spake of it more. These complaints and threats made me to suspect all was not well; for what needed these things to me, in a matter of justice?

The time now grew on, that his majesty was to go abroad in progress on a Sunday, which was the day before the counsel for my lord were to put in their answers and exceptions to the libel. The lord privy seal shewed me a letter of the king's to his lordship, wherein he was to expostulate with me for delaying the business. I gave his lordship answer what was done, and his lordship professed that he was satisfied, and that no man could do more than I did. On the Monday, the counsel for my lord put in their answer, which was round and picquant. The lord chamberlain had notice of it, and complained thereof to the king. I sent his majesty the copy thereof, and received from the king a letter written all with his majesty's own hand, shewing dislike thereof. At that time, sir Wm. Button threatened sir Daniel's servant hard for that answer, as the said sir Daniel divers weeks after told me. The commissioners considered of the answer, and disallowed it, giving order, that no record should remain of it, but that it should be utterly defaced. This was very well accepted, and now my lord of Canterbury was a very honest man. But till this was done, their followers gave out, that the king had in two letters so schooled the archbishop, as he was never schooled in all his life.

Things now being quiet, I called sir William Button one commission-day unto me, and spake thus to him: 'Sir William Button, you have followed this business from the first, and have been present at the acting of all things. Have you ever seen me, in word or deed, do any matter that doth not become me?' (for indeed hitherto I had no way declared myself, because we were not come to consider of the proofs.) 'What is then the cause that I am thus complained upon, that I cannot one day be quiet?' His answer unto me was, 'That the lord chamberlain was every way a kind father to his children; but in this of his daughter, he was so passionate till it had an end, that he lay as on a grid-iron, broiling till the matter were accomplished.' Quoth I, 'It shall not be delayed by me.' Now, the counsel on both sides drew on to inform us, wherein I noted, that whereas the libel was laid in nature of maleficium versus hanc, my lady's counsel, upon the shutting up of the cause, would not apply themselves thereunto, neither would they willingly hear of it; which seemed strange, since all the books which they brought, particularly to the cause, did mention that; and Doctor Steward had publicly and expressively said, 'That it was that which they did mean.' This troubled me somewhat, because I perceived that they themselves could not tell what to make of it. But afterwards fell out another matter, which very much alienated my judgment from the cause: It appeared, that sentence could not be given, till the time that the king entering his progress, was gone as far as Windsor, and then his majesty was soon to depart to Farnham. Sir Daniel Dun told us, 'That he was to attend the king in progress; that he must be at Farnham; that he was old and lame; that it would be too great a trouble for him, to come back again at the day of sentence.' He therefore prayed, 'That we would hear him deliver his judgment of the whole matter.' This proffer seemed woodrous strange to most of us ; and putting it by handsomely, we resolved not to trouble him therewith : And in this opinion we arose. But afterwards, my lord of Litchfield cometh to my study door, where I and my lord of London were about another business, and telleth us, That my lord of Ely, and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, were very desirous to hear sir Daniel speak ; and that he, for his part, was of the mind that it would do very well, and therefore he importuned us both to give consent unto it. We imagining no great harm could come thereby, assented, and the next day is appointed for that purpose. There sir Daniel cometh with a formal declaration, divided into six parts ; to every one of which he spake so largely, that with a little replying of ours, it spent a whole afternoon. Matters which I most observed therein, were these : He told us, ' That by our commission we might hear this cause summarily.' He brought a book, ' That he who hath power to hear a matter summarily, is in nature of an arbiter chosen by both parties, and therefore may judge in discretion, as he shall think fit ;' and more to that purpose. I thought with myself, that this was strange doctrine in a matter of marriage ; that as arbitrators, we might adjudge a wife to her husband, or not adjudge her, according to our discretion. In his discoursing of my lord's impotency versus hanc, he beat upon the matter of maleficium, and yet by no means he would have it to be that apparently. He insisted much, ' That the sentence was to be given in general terms, not naming any particular impotency.' I told him, ' In such a sentence, the world look that we should yield a reason of that which we did.' He replied, ' That it was fit to give no reason.' ' And here,' said Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, ' a judge is not to give a reason of his sentence, but only to God. I would give no reason to any prince in the world. I was once called before queen Elizabeth, about a sentence which I gave, and she demanded of me the reason thereof ; I told her, ' A judge was bound to give no reason of that which he pronounced, but only to God.' I marvelled much at these things, and at last replied, ' Well, let it be we acquaint not the world with the reason of that which we do ; yet is it not fit, that I who am the judge, and must pronounce the sentence, know the ground of that which I am to pronounce?' Here, after a little pausing, one of them said, ' Yes, for you may see that in the books and depositions.' Quoth I, ' But I cannot see that there which may satisfy me. But Mr. Chancellor,' said I, ' and sir Daniel Dun, commissioners, you perhaps be not driven to it, yet I shall be forced of necessity to tell men the reason of the sentence : For as soon as this cause is sentenced, every man who is discontented with his wife, and every woman discontented with her husband, which can have any reasonable pretence, will repair to me for such nullities. If I yield unto them, here will be strange violations of marriages ; if I do not, I must not tell them, that it was fit for my lord of Essex, but it is not so for you ; for the law knoweth no persons, but is indifferent to all. If I then repel them, I must shew a reason : Your case is not like that of my lord of Essex ; for his case was thus, yours is thus. And so must I deliver the reason, or men will not be answered.' In this time of debating, I asked sir Daniel Dun, ' I pray you, master of the requests, what examples have we of any nullity in England, pronounced in this kind? Might a man see any precedent of it? For I would be loath to do any thing that never was done before.' ' Yes,' saith he, ' there be precedents thereof. In Anne of Cleve's case we have an example, and another in one Bury, which I have here in my book ;' and thereupon out of a note-book of his own, he read now a line or two, and then two or three other lines in another place, and so forward. My answer was, ' I did not think that king Henry's separation from Anne of Cleve, was for any such matter, but upon a precontract.' I said, ' King Henry the 8th was a strange prince in that kind : He put himself into many marriages ; and when he began that with Anne of Cleve, he feared lest the emperor, and king of France, should combine with the pope against him, and therefore he was desirous to strengthen himself with the protestant princes in Germany ; and for that he thought this marriage was much be-beneficial. But afterwards growing into peace with one or both of those princes, he grew soon weary of the marriage, because he liked not the woman.' But then I promised to consider further of these two cases. This was the end of that day's labour, which when at night I had recounted with myself, I thought it was an audacious part, for such a one as sir Daniel was, to teach us out of such poor grounds, both what to do, and how to do. I found by my observation, that it was a set match, that thus he should be heard ; that he was prepared for the purpose ; for no man upon the sudden, or one day's warning, could deliver so much, and so digested. And now I began to assure myself, that he did not shew himself a judge, but was a stickler for the nullity. I much suspected the conscience of the man, knowing him reasonably well before, both out of mine own estimation of him, and out of the judgment of my two predecessors, the lords Whitgift and Bancroft, who held him for a man most corrupt. Yet the next day I sent unto him for his note-book, and I caused the record of Anne of Cleve to be brought unto me. Reading over all the latter, I found not one word tending to the present case. Good Lord! thought I, how doth this man deceive me! Perusing his own book for that of Bury, I found it to be nothing but the pleadings of advocates on both sides, when about the 40th of Eliz. there was some question in the common law courts about Bury's land, Bury himself being dead many years before. But I saw more in this book against the cause now in his hand, than for it ; and by some other writings in my house, I discovered that Bury's divorce, anno 1561, was for want of his s—s; which Dr. Steward also, being now of counsel for my lady, and who formerly stood for Bury's brother against the supposed son, publicly acknowledged. These things made me in my heart much dislike the cause, and procured in me a hard opinion touching sir Daniel Dun, who should not have wronged me, being my officer, as dean of the arches.

Within few days after, the message cometh to us, that we were all to attend the king at Windsor. This accordingly was done. The morning before the hearing, the lord chamberlain in my presence spoke first earnestly with the chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterward with the chancellor of the Duchy, who that day fell from us, as appeared by the few words that he had before the king. Some few days before that, had sir John Bennet, by sir William Batton and Dr. Edwards been otherwise dealt withal, earnestly to give consent to the nullity; but that day we dealt in it more than three hours. His majesty propounding the matter, asked, 'How things did stand?' Sir Julius Cæsar said, 'That sir Daniel Dun was best able to speak unto it.' And then, ex composito, sir Daniel begins, and tells a great tale, and especially insisteth upon Non potuit. When he had done, I answered him, and showed the want of ground for that conclusion, out of other the earl's evident answers, 'That the Non potuit was for lack of love, and not for want of ability.' I challenged sir Daniel for abusing the king with a false report, and especially for his two precedents of Bury's case, and that of Anne of Cleve. Amongst us, was divers ways showed the insufficiency of the proofs; that the libel was laid short to the cause, and the proofs were short of the libel; that we had very many times called upon the counsel for my lady, that they should look that they rightly laid their matter, and made their proof strong; that, in the end, they complained not of the judges, when the fault was in themselves: (Where my lord of Litchfield added, 'That himself fearing the worst, had gone to Doctor's Commons, and warned the counsel for my lady, that they should look to it.') Among other things there uttered, sir Daniel Dun said, 'What a disgrace will this be to my lord chamberlain and his daughter, if it should not now go forward!' My answer was, 'they should have looked to that before they did begin it: we were not the men that set the matter on foot; if it were a disgrace, they put it on themselves. But,' quoth I, 'must I, to save any man from disgrace, send my soul unto hell, to give a sentence whereof I saw no ground? I will never do it.' My lord of London, sir John Bennet, and Dr. Edwards, did carry themselves well that day, although sir John Bennet had much opposition from the king himself. When we saw the king earnest, I fell down on my knee, and with tears in mine eyes, I said, 'I beseech your majesty, if ever I have done you any service, whom I do serve with a faithful heart, or may do you any service, rid me of this business.' I had said before, 'That I was the unfittest man that might be, to judge of such a cause; I was no married man, I was no lawyer, and I had not had the time, by reason of my infinite businesses, to read so much of that matter, as other men had.' I observed that day many things in his majesty's carriage of the matter: he was earnest, but gracious and moderate. He found fault with the libel, and said, 'that complaints were made that we went too slow, but he perceived we went too fast.' He marvelled that my lord of Worcester, and the lord Knowles, were not examined as witnesses. He constantly professed, 'That he believed that my lord of Essex was impotent for a woman.' He told us, 'that some of the earl's friends had put a woman to him, and he would not touch her.' His majesty said, 'that the earl was once purposed to have gone to Poland, to have tried whether he might be unwitched.' To which things my reply was, 'I would to God we might see these things legally proved.' That his majesty much disliked that course, and therefore he set the course now in prosecution; and therefore if there were any error in it, he had done the lord chamberlain wrong, and he must take it upon him.' In sum, I found his majesty much troubled what to do, as I gathered, especially by these words, 'if my lord of Canterbury, and my lord of London, have a negative voice, we must either begin all again, and have a new libel, or we must have a new commission, and put other adjuncts.' The conclusion from his majesty was, 'That we should all meet at Lambeth on the morrow, and if we could unanimously consent, then go to the sentence; if not, we should put it off unto another day, and certify him of it, and so farther understand his pleasure. When the king was risen from his chair he fell to inveighing against these marryings of young couples, before they be acquainted one with another. He told us the inconvenience of it, how he knew in Scotland a father who married his only child to a man against her will: that she withstood it; yet her father forced her to marry him: that being gone home with her husband, after a very few days she run away from him: that her father jerked her, and sent her home again: that not long after, she poisoned her husband, and was burnt for it, while the king was in Scotland. After his majesty's going out, I followed him, and told him, I evidently perceived, that it was in the earl of Essex, 'Vitium Animi non Corporis.' His majesty swore he thought so. There passed some other speech from the king to me, touching his own lying with the queen the first night that he married her. But at the last, I kissed his hand and departed. After I was gone, the lord chamberlain speaking somewhat against me, the king replied, 'The archbishop hath so adjured me to be rid of this matter, that I cannot tell what to say to him.' This did sir Julius Cæsar tell me that day at dinner, at Eaton-College, letting me know, that the king found no fault with me. But afterward, the king coming to dinner, after his meat had stayed for him on the table more than a quarter of an hour, he sate him down in his chair, and casting his leg over one side of it, he eat no meat for a great space of time, neither said he any word, but sat musing to himself; which every man observed. And it was given out by some in the court, that I was gone away in the king's displeasure. Within some few days after, it was also more ways than one brought credibly to my ears, That the archbishop and my lord of London should be hereafter kept to their spiritualities, and should meddle no more in temporal matters: and within a while it came so far, as that they should have their temporalities taken from them. Sir John Bennet was at Windsor moved by sir Thomas Lake in the lord Fenton's name, and afterwards by the lord Fenton himself, That he should alter his opinion, and make his peace with the king, for his majesty was not well pleased with him.

As I came homeward from Windsor in my coach, and all that same night, two things did run much in my mind; the one of them was, what a strange and fearful thing it was, that his majesty should be so far engaged in that business: that he should profess, that himself had set the matter in that course of judgment: that the judges should be dealt withal beforehand, and, in a sort, directed what they should determine: that the like example had not been seen: that his majesty did win himself much honour in the case of Sutton's hospital; that notwithstanding all importunity, he had suffered the judges to do their conscience. This strange moving to the contrary, did make me marvelously suspect, that it was no direct matter; and, as a dutiful servant to my most gracious master, I wished in my heart, that his majesty's hand might be taken off the business. The other point was, that we had all this while, in our debates, never, or very little meddled with points of divinity. And I thought with myself, that much might be said therein against Maleficium, and the nullity to be pronounced thereupon 'versus hanc;' for out of this we could never get in all our talking, though they would never cleave fast to it. I therefore, having formerly revolved some such things in my mind, rose early on the day that we were to debate things at large, and set down my mind in writing out of something in divinity. The copy of this appeareth. The day after we came from Windsor, (being Tuesday) we met, and all the forenoon we insisted on that which I had briefly written: but to deliver my conscience freely before God, I received no kind or shew of satisfaction. My lord of Ely sat little less than dumb, as if he had never dreamed of any such matter. Divers of the commissioners wondered at him; that he, who had spent so much time in reading of the canonists touching this question, should not think upon divinity. Briefly up and down by others somewhat was said, but nothing to contentment. After dinner, sir John Bennet propounded reasons out of the law, but without any satisfaction. I observed two special points that afternoon: the one was, that we all thought my lord of Essex his answer to the libel was neither plain nor sufficient. And now it was remembered, that my lord of Litchfield had put to him certain questions, that four things were necessary to generation; 'membrum virile,' erection, penetration, and 'ejaculatio seminis;' which, although they were then smiled at, and since that time much sport had been made at the court and in London about them; yet now our married men on all hands wished that punctually his lordship might have been held to give his answer unto them. This instructed me, that the proofs were not full. A second thing was, that when towards the evening, I wished that a reconciliation might be laboured between my lord and my lady, that it should best become us; my lord of Ely, who from the first beginning of the process had been always very silent, spake home about that, much disliking that any such thing should now be sought; that it was too late; that it might be the cause of poisoning and destroying one of another to bring them together again. Well, when we could not agree upon our conclusion, we were inforced to put all off unto a longer day; and as the king commanded, I was to certify his majesty of it. I wrote a letter to the king, praying humbly that I might be freed from the trouble of this cause, or, at least, give no sentence in it till I were a married man, and so might better understand the business. I inclosed also six reasons of sir John Bennet, taking exceptions in law against the nullity. And withal I joined mine own reasons in divinity, of which I said in my letter, that I knew not where to seek an answer to them; meaning, that the commissioners had given me none. These reasons afterwards cost me a great deal of trouble.

The next progress in this controversy was, that I was advertised, that it was his majesty's pleasure that the cause should be put off until the 18th of September; and withal there was brought a new commission of adjuncts, whereinto my lords of Winchester and Rochester were put. The day that I perceived this, acquainting the two chancellors of the exchequer and Dutchy therewith, in the gallery at Lambeth, I told them, "That I hoped now, that for my part, I should be freed from any trouble therein farther, for I did desire to be rid of it." They both answered me, "That they desired in like sort to be quit of the matter." A good business, thought I, that nobody taketh comfort of it, unless it be sir Daniel Dun; of whom I forgot before to note, that on the day of meeting, next after our coming from Windsor, he, with a great deal of insolency, challenged me for my speech before his majesty the day before. "Do not abuse the king, sir Daniel Dun." I remembered it was in mine own house, and if I had rattled him according to his deserts, my lord chamberlain would have said it had been done for his sake; and in the progress, sir Daniel having the king's ear, would have made things worse than they were; and I therefore forbore him with such patience, that some of the commissioners told me afterwards, that they wondered how I could endure those behaviours, at the hands of a man of his quality: But yet they commended me for it. Now grew I to consider what were the reasons why these two Commissioners were joined to us; and therein I had many advertisements from divers friends, divers ways. We resolved for my lord of Winton, that it was supposed, that there was no great amity between him and me: That when I was Dean there, there was some disagreement between us, which they supposed yet continued: That he had an old grudge to me, for having the archbishoprick, which his lordship so much desired. Besides, it was some tickling unto him, that his gravity and learning should either win in the archbishop, or lay some blemish upon him, if he stood out. Certain it is, that sir William Button was with him; and, doubtless, would tell him how acceptable this service would be to his majesty. I heard of good credit, and secretly, that he was put in hope to be made a privy counsellor; and the fame was general, that for the father's labour the son should be made a knight. It seemeth, at the first, that he had no great fancy unto it; but being wrought upon, he consented; so that he might be required by his majesty to be present. This was done by a letter from Salisbury, which, at his being at Lambeth, he shewed me; that I should take notice, that he had not comè, unless he had been commanded. I leave him for the time, only signifying, that in the vacation, he sent for divers books from London, and had Dr. Steward much with him, to inform him in all particulars. Yet I may not forget, that while he held off his consent, some hard opinions were raised of him at court; as I found by a letter from my lord of Litchfield to me. For there he was found fault with, that he attended not the king at Farnham, or at Andover. And there blame was laid, that Mr. Love, who was so great with my lord of Winton, was like to get the Warden's place at Winchester, Dr. Harmer being reported to be dead. Concerning the bishop of Rochester, it was well known that he had opened himself before the king's going in progress, that he liked well of the nullity. Coming once or twice while we were about it, he, with some in my house, disputed earnestly for it. He was a great dependant of my lord of Litchfield. This was a way to make him well esteemed, and to arise high in preferment. But, in truth, he should not have verified the report which archbishop Bancroft on his death-bed gave of him, together with Butler and Carrier, to the king by a message, unless he did some such thing. When he was put into the Commission, he in divers places seemed to be much offended that he was made one. His grief was, that he was set in opposition against me; He would never give his voice to it, unless I consented. These, and the like things he spake, as elsewhere, so to some of my servants in my house at Croydon: For, under another colour, he came three times in the vacation to me; but I never spake a word with him about that matter, as knowing it would be an argument against me, that I laboured to draw away the king's Commissioners; and the end shewed, that I had no great reason to trust him. Besides these two adjuncts, the new commission itself seemed very strange unto me. There were eight made of the quorum; and it was so laid, that if three of them, with two other, consented, the sentence might be given; so that, by the words thereof, if seven had denied, five might have pronounced and prevailed. A matter so uncouth, that, as I credibly heard, my lord of Winton himself found much fault therewith. Again there was a clause, 'Legibus, Statutis, Ordinationibus, Constitutionibus quibuscunque non obstantibus;' so resolved they were to have it dispatched. Every thing now stood at a pause; and my lord of Ely (who, at first, delivered his judgment against it to sir Henry Savile, as I heard it avowed upon good credit; but afterwards said, he was better instructed by the king) began to hearken what men said of the matter, as appeared by speech which he had with sir John Peyton: to whom, notwithstanding, he told some things of the insufficiency of my lord of Essex. The weather grew fair; he hoped the overflowing of the Isle of Ely would cease; he would go down in his visitation; he came and took his leave of me, but not one word of the nullity.

Now was his majesty abroad, and I had more leisure to consider of this question, I read what I could; I conferred with many men about divers circumstances, so to inform myself the better. I prayed frequently to God to direct me aright. I often perused the depositions, but I found little satisfaction. I perceived most of the lords had a great dislike of this proceeding: that the better sort of men had generally a detestation of it; that the judges and lawyers much condemned it. I heard many strange stories of the lady's carriage. Something was freely spoken of a woman arraigned at Buty; and how to shut that up, and so to free the earl, this course was consented upon.

These things, though out of charity I entertained not as absolutely true, yet the concurrence of them from so many, made me that I could not contemn them. Besides, now grew the rumour strong, that a new husband was readily provided for her: Whereof I called to mind the opinion of sir Henry Nevile, delivered to me at Windsor; and I did not forget a speech of Overbury's once to me in that kind. I understood, that at Christmas last there was a reconciliation wrought between the earl and his lady, howsoever it fell out. Yea, that when the lords met at Whitehall about the matter of separation, there was three times that day a likelihood to make them friends; which we thought implied no disability of my lord of Essex, even in their own opinion. I farther understood, that whereas it was whispered among us, the commissioners, That at Christmas last my lord of Essex being in bed with his lady should labour a quarter of an hour carnally to know her, and in the end should say, "Frankey, it will not be," and so kissed her, and bid her good night: That this was not true; but that the earl, the night before his going from London, at the end of Trinity Term, said, with tears in his eyes, "That when he went to bed to her at Christmas last, he had forgiven all things as clearly as he wished that God should forgive him his sins; but when they were alone, she reviled him, and miscalled him, terming him cow, and coward, and beast;" And he added, "That she was as bitter a woman as any was in the world: Which things so cooled his courage, that he was far from knowing, or endeavouring to know her." These matters, together with the small joy which the commissioners had to deal in the business, made me have no great fancy unto it. On the other side, I heard that my lord chamberlain, or his followers, gave out, that what was done, was performed by the king's direction, otherwise it had not been begun; and therefore, they expected that his majesty should see it effected; that they rested themselves on him. I was much grieved that they had this advantage on my master, who being so engaged, as I thought, could not well go backward or forward: And, to increase my sorrow, I was privately advertised from court, that his majesty did mean himself to give an answer to my reasons above-mentioned. I heard another way, that his majesty in the progress wrote much with his own hands. From another friend I was told, That the king, with his answer to the reasons, had written to me a sharp letter. Yea, by another I learned the contents of the letter, which was full of sharpness.

These things in the summer kept me full of expectation of some great discontentment. Yet my heart still assured me, that I was guilty of no wickedness. I found all persons with whom I spake, of my mind, for the dislike of the nullity. In many businesses to and from the king by letters, I found nothing but well. His majesty sent me warrants for three bucks, as formerly he had done, and with some kindness joined.

Thus I was tossed in my thoughts; and in all my troubles I had recourse to God in prayer.

By this time, the 18th of September draweth nigh, and I am informed, That my lord of Winchester, the Tuesday before, was come to town; and that besides my lady's counsel, sir Julius Cæsar, and sir Daniel Dun, did, at St. Mary Overy's house, daily attend his lordship. I expected no great good of this: only from the king I heard nothing but well. For some few days before, his majesty had been at Whitehall, where I kissed his hand, and he did not only look merrily upon me, but he gave me promise of the bishoprick of Lincoln for my brother, as I understood it. Some other matters also passed quietly in speech, and I found no disturbance. But on the 17th of September, the day before our new meeting at Lambeth, my lord of Litchfield being sent from the king, bringeth divers papers unto me sealed up. I opened them, and found there my reasons first; secondly, an answer to them*; and, thirdly, a letter, all written with the king's hand unto me. I read them all presently, without any abatement, whereunto I was helped by my foreknowledge that such things would come. I said little unto it; only I asked my lord of Litchfield, "Whether he knew what those papers contained?" He told me, "That the king had read unto him the answers to the reasons, and had given him the letter to seal up in a paper; but in reverence to his majesty, he held it not his duty to look into it." Growing afterward in some speech of our next day's business, I told him plainly, "That having spent much time in this vacation, in perusing the books, I could not find any where, but especially in the answer of my lord of Essex, that which would give me contentment." I read the places, and my lord confessed with me, "That there was not enough." He told me also, "That unless I gave my consent to the separation, that he would never give his." So much reverence in him did I find both then, and divers times before, against this divorcement. At last he mentioned one thing which pleased me wondrous well, and that was, That he should call for my lord of Essex again, and new examine him, upon some points to be farther declared, ad informandum animum judicis. For hence, either we should know so much as might persuade us to decree a separation, or the world might be satisfied that we had no reason for it. These things thus settled, his lordship separateth. Then I withdrew myself to my study, and read over again and again the papers from the king. I found them very sharp, and perceived by the time that they arrived unto me, that they were detained till that day, that I might be overwhelmed with them on the sudden, and have no time to deliberate, before we were to come the second time to sit in judgment. These things did much trouble me, so that I did sleep but a little that night. I revolved many things, and much tumbling I had in my mind. It grieved me infinitely, that the king should make himself a party therein; that some unthankfulness, and other matters, were little less than reproaches unto me: Methought, my faithful heart to my master deserved no such sharpness. I devised how I might give the king contentment, and it was some comfort to me, that we thought upon a course of new examining my lord of Essex. But as things stood, I could not force my conscience, which cried upon me, "That it was an odious thing to God and men, to give such a sentence, without better warrant." I here cast what might befall to the church in my disgrace; how Papists would scorn at it; how it might be my own ruin, and that divers ways; a hazard to my friends, and to the commissioners which were of my mind; how my lord of London had a wife and children, which might all be overthrown at one blow. But after midnight sleeping, towards the morning, I considered on the other side, That my conscience was more to me than all the world; that it was a fearful thing, in place of judgment, to give a sentence against mine own heart; that Olivarius, the chancellor of France, upon such an occasion, grew mad, and died in it; that the manner of our sentence must be, 'Solum Deum præ oculis habentes, à rei veritate inspecta: All which, and the like meditations, did much preponderate with me. Then I slept again, and now rising, I found my heart much settled, to persist in that which I held to be truth. I poured out earnestly my prayers to God, and was now strongly resolved to leave all to God, remembering, That he had preserved me from my mother's womb; that he had from time to time rid me out of all my troubles; that his power was the same still; that he would never forsake me, if I turned not from him. I forgot not, "That the hearts of kings were in the hand of the Lord;" that I had experience of the graciousness, both of God and the king, the year before; when standing earnestly in a good cause, that prince Henry should not marry a Papist, I received some sharp words from the king for my labour; but the next day his majesty used me very kindly again. To this I added, That poverty, imprisonment, death itself, were things contemptible to a resolved mind: that some of my predecessors, as archbishop Cranmer, and my lord Grindal, had given good examples of these sufferings, and they were recorded in the catalogue of the righteous. These thoughts thus revolved, I read again the letter from the king, and drawing out into a paper all the sharp words, I considered them again and again, and methought they were not altogether so bitter as I apprehended them; that they were wrung from his majesty by my lord chamberlain's importunity; that my master had deserved at my hands, that I should bear patiently twenty times more; and that all was nothing, so the clearness of my conscience might be preserved. With these resolutions on the Saturday I came to Lambeth, where I met with the news of Overbury's death, and the sound of some fearful apprehensions thereupon bruited about the city. I made trial of my lord of London's constancy, telling him aut cecidit, aut cadendum. I found him most resolved, avowing unto me, "That if he should pronounce for the dissolution of the marriage, he thought the devil would that night fetch away his soul." Yea, he was earnest on me to persist where I began, telling me, "That the eyes of the whole church of England were upon me, and expected of me, that I should shew myself a worthy man." At last we came to sit, where my lords of Winchester and Rochester took their places. The commission was read, the fact, and manner of the process was opened, and nothing notable done, saving that my lord of London proposing, that it was fit that my lord of Essex should be called to explain himself farther, for the fishing out of the truth. All the commissioners most willingly assented thereunto (yea, my lord of Winchester and Rochester expressly), saving sir Julius Cæsar, who softly declared his dislike thereof, in my hearing. When the court was risen, I spake with my lord of Litchfield, and not thinking fit to return any thing to the king in writing, I prayed him to acquaint his majesty how things stood; and to tell him, that upon this course of new calling my lord of Essex, I hoped in the end, we should give his majesty satisfaction. The Sunday I spent at Croydon, and preached on that text of Christ's raising the widow's son of Naim, to the great comfort of my own heart. That day I conferred with a friend, and settled some courses, if any trouble should befall unto me. I was also by a good friend informed, that my lord of Essex, on that Sunday morning, having five or six captains and gentlemen of worth in his chamber, and speech being made of his inability, rose out of his bed, and taking up his shirt, did shew to them all so able and extraordinarily sufficient matter, that they all cried out shame of his lady, and said, That if the ladies of the court knew as much as they knew, they would tread her to death.

On the Monday we met at Lambeth again, and information was given on the part of my lady. These things passed quietly. When the court was risen, my lord of Litchfield told me, That he had made his majesty acquainted with our proposition on Saturday; but that his majesty was strongly against it, my lord of Essex should any more be called, and that by no means he would endure it, for that peradventure the said earl, either being provoked by the late challenge between him and Mr. Henry Howard, or otherwise instigated by the earl of Southampton, might speak somewhat which might unarr the business. This made me still suspect, that all was not right; and I replied to my lord, "If that be denied us, and we have no farther proof, I shall never give sentence for the nullity: As good declare my mind at first, as at last, and I pray you so acquaint his majesty." When I went homeward, I much revolved this in my heart, thinking, good Lord! What a case is this? Shall any truth be kept from us? Are they afraid to have all out? Do they only look to attain their own ends, and care not how our consciences be entangled and ensnared? On the Wednesday we met again, and now Dr. James is come to us, and by and bye cometh in my lord of Ely, who, as it seemed, had meant to have kept him away, but the king sent an express messenger for him, requiring him, by letter, to be there on the Tuesday night. Now are we plena curia. Before we sate down, sir Thomas Lake delivereth a message unto me from the king, that his majesty desired a speedy end of this business; that it had hung long, and the world was in expectation of it; that the terms grew on, which would be full of businesses: That his majesty on Monday was to go to Windsor to meet the queen, and my lord chamberlain with him; that therefore he would have us to fall close to our work, not to trouble ourselves on the morrow to come see the king, who would come late to Whitehall, because some ceremonies were to be performed, as upon the last day of hunting; that we should not attend his majesty till Friday, but that the sentence must be given on Saturday. My answer was publicly, "That there should be no stay in me, and that therefore on the morrow we would sit forenoon and afternoon, if the commissioners so pleased; and if they thought good, I would not refuse to sit until midnight." But in mine own heart I perceived, that all the care was, that the matter might be dispatched before the queen spake with the king, whom they supposed not to wish well to the business. We go to our court, and sir Thomas Lake stayed to hear the information on my lord's part. It was strange to see how my lord of Winchester carried himself that day, partly to play his prizes before sir Thomas Lake, who might make report of it to his fame, and partly to shew his ludimagisterial disposition. He snapped up my lord's counsel, that they could not speak a word, but he caught it before it was out. "I know what you will say," when indeed he knew not, neither was it any such matter as he imagined. God Almighty will tell you a tale for that; "I tell you, Dr. Bennet, I have as much law as you, I am as good a lawyer as you are." He fell divers times on my lord of London personally, and would needs know of him openly, "How many times in a year a man was bound carnally to know his wife?" In a word, with scoffs, and imperious behaviour, he played the advocate all that day, to the great offence of the standers-by, so that it was publicly spoke of in London, which, I think, came to his ears; so that ever afterward he carried himself more tractable. I was forced to bear it, because of avoiding new complaints.

The point most observable that day, was, that both my lord of Winchester, and my lord of Ely, did deny maleficiation, so that by no means they would have this question to proceed in that nature, which I openly did thank them for, and bound it upon them, before all the commissioners and standers-by, telling them, 'That the same was my opinion.' But I asked my lord of Winchester, who sat by me, 'What he then held it to be?' He told me privately, 'That he held it to be a natural impotency, which was before the marriage.' I asked him, 'What that might be, and whence he gathered it?' He answered, 'I have heard divers particulars, which are enough to persuade me, if they be true.' 'Yea, my lord,' said I, 'if they be true, I have heard as many to the contrary. I wish that we might examine whether they be true or no; that were fair proceeding. It is my grief that it is not permitted unto us, to try whether all these matters be so or not. This might satisfy a man's conscience.' So we parted that night.

On the Thursday at ten of the clock, we met in Lambeth-hall, where my lady's counsel took on them to answer some scruples objected by Dr. Ferrand. But Dr. Martin, when nobody spake of it, fell to wipe away that objection, that my lord had not sworn, cum septima manu. Upon his speech, the commissioners took hold of it, and it then being urged strongly; my lady's counsel stood at first, as if they had been blasted with lightning. Afterward they grew extreme angry with Dr. Martin, that he had proposed it; but the issue was, there could no answer be given unto it; but in the sight of all the standers-by, this was broke off with shame and confusion of faces. We dined not that day; but about one or two of the clock we withdrew ourselves privately into the parlour. I had thought there to have had Dr. Edwards, and the rest who liked not of the nullity, to propound their doubts, and so in order; and last of all, I would have spoken. But there I found a contrary course resolved, which my lord of Winchester seemed much to dislike. But my lord of Litchfield, sir Julius Cæsar, and sir Daniel Dun, had set the clock, and they must have their will. The six reasons are produced, which sir John Bennet had delivered the day after we came from Windsor, and the copy whereof was by me sent to the king. All these must in their order be debated. One was about the unperfectness of the libel, in which we all received satisfaction, that the libel was well to so much purpose as now they declared they would have it. The other five, my lord of London, sir John Bennet, Dr. James, and Dr. Edwards, maintained: I allowed of three of them absolutely; and the other two, that was inspection of my lord's body, and a time to be assigned by the judge, to try whether they might carnally know one another, I held to be fit, when those reasons were proposed; but now such flames and quarrels were arisen, I thought not amiss now to be forbore. My lord of Litchfield, with a pen, did note what every man resolved, but principally my words, with a purpose to shew them to the king, as I conceived, and afterwards I found it to be so. I was desirous therefore, that his majesty might see I was not obstinate, but settled to yield to reason. And again, I supposed that this candour of mine would make some of them yield to us, where they saw there was unevitable truth. But I found it far otherwise; for our afternoon's work was, that they gave shuffling and shifting answers to the objections, such as themselves had studied all the vacation; but no care was, whether they were true and satisfactory, or not. And to what sir Daniel proposed, all seven of them consented, without sticking or scruple, so that I might imagine it was a set play. Upon the first scruple debating, sir Julius Cæsar finding the difference of opinions, and that our lawyers stuck strongly unto it, 'Let us,' saith he, 'put it to the question, and let the major part of voices determine it.' When I saw this to be the proceeding, the Lord, thought I, deliver me from such judges! But yet, observing their manner, I possessed my soul in patience. When it grew to be dark, that the king might understand that I was willing to allow time to all that might be said, I remembered sir John Bennet to read the sentence of the Rota Romana, where, in the pope's own consistory, about the year 1585, a judgment was reversed which an archbishop in Spain had given for a nullity, in a case being ours altogether, because, after the triennial cohabitation, he had not assigned a time for the married couple to make trial again, and to use fasting and prayer. This repeal was read at large, and so was another of the Rota, in the same kind. But both these were slighted, as matters of nothing, and so I think had St. Paul been, if he had been there. I urged that of Alexander 3. That even in France itself, no nullity had been allowed; but that it was Consuetudo generalis Ecclesie Gallicane; and that Ecclesia Romana did know or practise no such thing. This was slighted like the former, and I perceived it was but in vain to speak to them, for they were resolved, and be it good, or be it bad, the matter should be done.

On the Friday morning I went to Whitehall, and looking somewhat heavily, the king cometh to me, and to my lord chanceller, and offereth us both his hand to kiss. He might perceive by my countenance that I was not a little troubled, and that was perceived by divers of the lords, who privately let me know their minds, that we had a foul and strange matter in hand at Lambeth. At last, the king takes me aside, and after propounding three or four businesses, walking, he took me to the window, and asked me, 'How that great cause did go forward?' I told his majesty, 'That I had no liking of it; that I had received a letter and writing from him which very much troubled me, for I knew myself to be his dutiful servant, and had not deserved ill of him; that it was nothing to me whether she remained wife to the earl of Essex, or were married to another man; but that I might not give sentence where I saw no proof; that I had lived 51 years, almost, and had my conscience uncorrupted in judgment; that I knew not how soon I was to be called before God, and I was loath, against that time, to give a wound to mine own soul; that all my grief was, that his majesty's hand was in it; that for other men I cared not; that I chose rather to die an honest man than a wise man; that he must never afterward expect true service of me, for how could I be true to him, who was false unto God? That if he marked it well, this was no time to disgrace his good servants.' I told him, 'That if his majesty pleased to let the matter alone, as he did all other causes, I would make good my part against all England, on the peril of my head.' The king answered, 'That I would have no lawyers.' I replied, 'Yes, enough, there is not an honest lawyer in England that would not be on my side.' His majesty asked me, 'Whether the rest of the commissioners, yesterday, did not persuade me?' I told him, 'No; but their dealing rather drove me the contrary way. For (said I) I came thither ingenuously to yield to any truth that should be shewed me; but they, on the contrary part, in a factious course went wholly together, and what one said, another said, be it well, or be it ill, without any scruple.' To my speech, 'That it was an example that never had been in England;' the king said, 'Yes, Bury's case.' I beseeched his majesty, 'That he would not believe that cause to be any such matter; for if he would pardon me, it should not be long before that I would shew, that his separation was for lack of his —s.' In this debating, the king was very desirous to know, what should be the reasons whereupon I stood, that I might have satisfaction. My answer was, 'That when I was in place of judgment, I would not conceal the reasons of my sentence, but it was to no purpose to speak them now; it would but put his majesty to a new trouble to hear them, and then some man must answer them, who looked to his own end, and to make a plausible answer, which would not content me, without ground of truth.' A great part of the time, that I had this speech with the king, my eyes were full of tears, which I saw much moved my gracious master, and especially my earnest desire, 'That I might do my conscience.' I perceived the king was much overcome by this my honest dealing: And then, whilst his majesty went to speak with my lord privy-seal, and my lord chamberlain, who stood all this while at the further end of the gallery; and to whom, I conceived, the king told much of that which I had spoken; I went my ways to Lambeth, to dinner. Now grew I confident to do my conscience right, whatsoever came of it. That day I dined privately; but yet my lord bishop of Bath was with me, whom when I had acquainted with so much of the cause as I thought fit, I received no discouragement from him. My heart was much eased, and now I thought I should no more be troubled. Yet between three and four o'clock, after dinner, my lord of Litchfield cometh to me from the king, and bringeth a written treatise upon the present argument, which was the work of a Scotchman, I know not who. I received it, and promised that night to read it; as indeed I did, riding in my coach to Croydon; for thither I thought fit to withdraw myself, though it were late, for avoiding of more perturbation. This treatise no way pleased me; but I thought it the work of some hungry fellow, who lacked 20s. to buy food to his belly. Here, finding it the day of the end of my quarter, I settled much of my domestic business. I forgot not to commend myself, and the whole cause, to God by prayer. I meditated many things in my bed: in the morning I rose early, and before day, in my study, I set down some heads, what I would speak unto. Then went I early to Lambeth, and there supplied my brief notes, digesting my matter of sentence into order; being resolved to speak large, and home to the cause, without touch of any person more than I must needs. By this time most of the commissioners were come. I sent for my lord of London, sir John Bennet, Dr. James, and Dr. Edwards, singly and severally into my study: I required them, before God, not to speak any thing for respect to me, but to do that, which in their learning and conscience they thought to be just, and to speak that intrepid, without blemish to any man, but soundly to the matter. I found them all avowing, that in their souls, they found no warrant for the nullity. I then wished severally, Dr. James and Dr. Edwards, to deliver their sentence, with some reasons adjoined, not many, but of the strongest. I told sir John Bennet, that this day I expected he should shew himself a worthy man, that he should deliver his judgment per extensum; that they had laboured to blemish his skill, and to slight his learning especially; therefore, both for his conscience and his credit, he should shew what was in him, to maintain an honest cause. If sir Daniel Dun, and sir Julius Cæsar, who came after him, should bespatter him in their choler, or lay any imputation upon him, he should find that some of us would take it off him. To my lord of London, I said, "We have three that speak first, who, I trust, will lay such a foundation in the hearts of the hearers, as shall not be removed. But the other side have this advantage over us, they are seven of them, lawyers and bishops, to answer what our three have said; and, perhaps, with weak men, such a stream of such persons may much prevail: but let not that dismay you, my lord, only take this course: deliver, first, your own meditations; and then, having taken with your pen some of the absurdities, which, in the sentence, some of them will deliver, blast those, and let the auditors see, that by you the stream is turned. Then leave it to me, and I doubt not, in Almighty God, but to batter their nullity to dust: that, though they have it by the major part of voices, yet the world shall see what the cause is, and they shall have little comfort by it. I am very well provided; I am no way afraid; and you shall see I will not be tongue-tied." So confident was I in the honesty of the cause, and in the helps of Almighty God, that I was not now afraid of ten thousands of people; but did long to be at the business, as the Lord truly knoweth.

When now I was alone, revolving my meditations, sir Julius Cæsar cometh into my study to me, telleth me, 'That he wondered that my lord of Winchester was not come; that it was even ten o'clock; that therefore it was fit, that the hour should be continued from ten to twelve.' I assented thereto; and by some of the commissioners the time was prorogued. Then cometh in sir Thomas Lake, with a message from the king, which he must not deliver till all the commissioners were come together. So he was forced to stay. Between ten and eleven cometh in my lord of Winchester; who, as afterwards found, had been all the morning at the court. I told him, 'We had stayed for him two hours and a half.' His lordship slightly excused it. Then, in the gallery, sir Thomas Lake told us, 'That his majesty had sent him unto us, to deliver two things.' The one was, 'That in our sentence we should take heed of gauling of any person.' My answer was, 'That from the beginning of this process, we had ever been wary not to offend in that kind; and that he should be much to blame, who in the conclusion, would transgress that way.' And so said the rest. The other was, 'That we should not in any long manner, but compendiously, deliver what we had to say.' I prayed sir Thomas Lake to explain that farther, whether we were only to say yea or no, and no more: for I would obey the king's commandment.

'Tu, Regina, jube, mihi jussa capessere fas est.' He answered, 'That he could not say so, but that we were to speak briefly.' 'Yea,' but said sir Julius Cæsar, 'I know the king's mind; for I was yesterday with him, and he told me, that he expected we should go no farther than yea or nay, for of reasons there would be no end. Yea, saith he, the king told me he was promised so much.' 'By whom?' said I. 'I think,' quoth he, 'by your grace.' 'Not so,' said I: but I said, indeed, 'Let every man deliver his own conscience, I will not perturb the sentence. No more indeed will I.' Then he replied, 'I know the king expecteth we should say no more, than I do like this sentence, or, I do not like it. And that you know, sir Daniel Dun, is the manner of the delegates, and not to go farther.' 'It is so,' saith sir Daniel. Upon this the bishops all said, 'We were best to proceed in that fashion.' To which I replied, 'I will not be wilful; but if it be agreed upon, and it be the king's pleasure, I will obey. But look you to it; for if any man give a reason, I am no more bound than he, but that I will return the reason of my opinion and judgment.' They all said, they would be observant of it. Thus sir Thomas Lake was dismissed. Then we called for the sentences on both sides, which the counsel had ready. They disliked that which was absolvatory of the earl of Essex, and we approved it. We found fault with the other sentence, annullatory, both for the whole, and because some parts in it, in our judgment, were apparently false. But they persisted in their intention. So we went into the hall, where myself, my lord of London, sir John Bennet, Dr. James, and Dr. Edwards, freed my lord of Essex. The bishops of Winton, Ely, Litchfield, and Rochester, together with the two chancellors, and sir Daniel Dun, pronounced for the nullity, and subscribed the sentence, my lord of Winton pronouncing it. We perceived that they were afraid we should at large speak our reasons openly, being the last who were to speak.

The three bishops of Winton, Ely, and Litchfield, went immediately to the court, hoping to receive great thanks for their service, but they waited a full hour ere they could speak with the king; however, they sped afterward. And we were glad that we were freed of the trouble. And now, I, who would not have given the Sentence for all the gold in India, do expect God's pleasure, what will become of this business hereafter, and submit myself to God's providence, who ever preserveth those that trust in him.

“ This narration is wholly written with mine own hand, and was finished the second of October, 1613, being the eighth day after the giving of the sentence. And I protest before Almighty God, that I have not willingly written any untruth therein: but have delivered all things fairly, to the best of my understanding; helping myself with such memorials and notes as I took from time to time, that if there were occasion, I might thus at large set down the truth to posterity, when this case shall be rung from Rome gates, or the fact hereafter be questioned. GEORGE Canterbury.”

Some observable Things, since September 25, 1613, when the Sentence was given in the Cause of the earl of Essex, continued unto the day of the Marriage, December 26, 1613.

THE Sentence being given for the Nullity, the minds of men in their several places were wonderfully distracted, and every one spake according to their fancies. But for the most part there was a detestation of the thing, and a great dislike of those that gave the sentence, which was expressed by all courses that men durst adventure upon. On the other side, there was a strange applauding and commending of those who withstood the separation; and from all parts a testimony came unto them, that they had done like honest men, albeit the only scope which they aimed at, was the discharge of their conscience, and not vain popular applause. The archbishop, the day after the sentence, went to the court, to Whitehall, and waited on the king to chapel, standing also by him in the closet, where he was strangely looked on by the king, as he was also by some of the lords; but nothing being said unto him, he took no notice of it, but bore all patiently. This strangeness of the king held on at Hampton Court, and elsewhere; and it came to the archbishop's ear, that the king spake divers times hardly of him, but much magnified them of the affirmative part, and especially my lord of Winchester, as the worthiest man in the kingdom. Some things were done also in recompence to divers of them; as sir Julius Cæsar's son was made a knight, my lord of Winton's son also had the same reward, which some merry fellow blighted with the name of sir Nullity Bilson; and the bishop of Litchfield must remove to Lincoln; and as for Litchfield, it must be bestowed on Mr. Dean of St. Paul's, that so doctor Cary might be preferred to the deanery of Paul's, for which it was generally supposed he should pay well. But now it run current, that the archbishop must no more have to do with naming any to church-livings, but some lords in court should dispose of all; and principally it must be provided, that Dr. Abbot must never be preferred, no, not so much as to Litchfield, so far was he from Lincoln, which was formerly promised unto him. These things grew detestable to the people, who feared that even religion would smart for it; but the parties most maligned were silent and patient, expecting God's leisure, and malice enough from some other man. The first thing of bitterness that appeared, was a letter from Royston, under the king's hand and signet, directed to the commissioners in the former sentence, but brought to the archbishop about three weeks after the sentence. This was a most sharp letter, complaining that they of the negative part, for so they were stiled, had hindered the act to be made upon the sentence; had solemnly protested against that which was done; had given unto themselves other titles than were in the king's commission; had glorified themselves in that which was done; by which they laid an imputation upon the king's conscience, who had declared himself for the divorce, and other things of the like nature. This letter being read to the commissioners, the archbishop said, that he knew not what it meant; for he understood of no man that protested, nor knew nothing of any man's arrogating of titles to him, or glorifying himself: and as for the act, he supposed it to be made up in common form, and never heard ought to the contrary, neither meddled with any thing therein, but left it to the Register, and what he had done with it, he could not tell. Furthermore, he asked all the commissioners particularly, if they knew what this meant, or if any of them were able to charge those of the negative with the points quarrelled at; who all, with one consent, denied that they could, and expressly averred, that there was no such thing done at the time of the sentence as had been complained upon. When standing thus in admiration, sir Daniel Dun took upon him to understand the matter, and said, that if the register were called, it would appear there was something in it. Barker, the register, is sent for, and being demanded whether he had made up the act, he said, that he had drawn it up in a form that he liked, but some other of the commissioners did dislike it. And thereupon he shewed two forms, the one more large, the other more brief; but both of them having in it, that the archbishop, and the rest of the negative party, protested against the sentence. Here every man wondered at him, out of what ground he should do this; and all the commissioners, with one consent, very much rebuked him, professing that there was no such protestation used. For the rest of the charge in the king's letter, Barker freed all in all things, save only Dr. Edwards, who was absent by reason of his sore eyes. The archbishop, upon this, desired the commissioners to suspend their judgment touching Dr. Edwards, till he might answer for himself; saying, that honour, justice, and charity, required so much in his behalf; and adding withal, that he doubted not but it would prove some mistaking of the register's part, to whom it was apparent that small credit was to be given, since he had so grossly set down of them, that they protested, when all the commissioners could witness the contrary. Moreover, he desired Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and sir Daniel Dun, to certify the lord Chamberlain, how free and innocent from those aspersions the rest were found, and that from top to toe it was nothing but misprision. Before this truth was discovered, it was known that a gentleman of the earl of Northampton's had said to sir John Levison, and that, as from his lordship, 'That there was something descried, which would break the archbishop's back:' such account was made of this business.

Thus things passed silently until the next week, when, upon the Thursday, being high commission day, Dr. Edwards being amended, repaired to Lambeth. His coming was watched; and then was delivered to the archbishop a second letter from the king, commending the concurrence of all to the act, to be made up in common form; but requiring the commissioners to convene Dr. Edwards and the register before them, and to charge them with all the fore-remembered matters, and to learn where the fault did lie. It was also commanded that they should require the said doctor and register, to set down in writing what had passed between them; and if it were found that Dr. Edwards were to blame, he should be suspended till the king's pleasure were further known.

These things are fallen upon; and Dr. Edwards shewed that the register had wronged him, and that no part of the accusation was true, in modo et forma, appealing to the commissioners, what faith might be given to Barker contesting against him, when it had been manifestly proved, that he had forged the matter of protestation against my lord of Canterbury, my lord of London, and the rest. Time is assigned to them to deliver in their writings; and accordingly, about two days after, Dr. Edwards bringeth to the archbishop his answer, denying the points whereon he was accused. But Barker brought nothing till a fortnight after; and then, by candle-light, when the high commission was risen, and the commissioners were departed, he delivereth a long writing to the archbishop, who could not read it that night; but reproved him for detaining it so long.

On the morrow, my lord of Canterbury perused this declaration: and as he found it to be uncertainly and dissidently set down for some other circumstances, so he discovered there one thing much to be observed, and that was, that Barker delivered, That some few days after the sentence, the lord chamberlain sent for him, finding fault that the act was not made up. And there speech was, That some desired to have their titles put in, as well as the titles of others; and for that, Barker named sir John Bennet. Whereunto the lord chamberlain said, "I know no title that he hath:" "Yes," said Barker, "he is judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury." But Barker concludeth the narration, That himself finding that he had named sir John Bennet unjustly, therefore was in mind to excuse him, and was about to say, that he had done him wrong; but the lord chamberlain was so angry that he could not bring it forth; but went his way, leaving the lord in that opinion.

By this it was descried, that in the first letter sir John Bennet was aimed at, as well as Dr. Edwards, to put some disgrace upon him, which made men wondrously marvel at the vindicative mind of some men, who sought for an occasion to do other men disgrace. The end of the matter was, That no man could be touched; and therefore the archbishop, taking sir Julius Caesar with him, acquainted the king (who was now returned from Royston) with the state of the whole matter; informing his majesty, that fault fell on no man save the register; and therefore, if his highness were pleased to have him punished, it might be so: But for the thing itself, since the report was more than there was cause, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer said, It was better to let it die, and stir in it no further. To this the king assented, being not willing that any punishment should be laid on the register: whereby it appeared, that the intendment was, in the stirring of these coals, to have burnt some greater persons than Barker, the register.

All this while it was confidently given out, That because the sentence had been opposed, there should a book be written in the defence of it; and one while it should be by a divine, and that sometimes was my lord of Winton, and sometimes my lord of Ely: and it was said, they were earnestly about it: Another while, it should be by a Civilian, and then sir Daniel Dun must do it: But at other times it must be by a Scotchman, who had written somewhat of that argument before the sentence; and other while, two Scotchmen must join together about it: And to make the thing the more probable, the lord Felton sent to the archbishop for the copy of the Scotchman's writings, which was sent unto him; and after copying of it out, it was returned to my lord of Canterbury again. This speech of a book continued about nine weeks in all; but at last Dr. Stuart, and Dr. Bird, were sent for to the lord chamberlain, and their judgment was asked concerning that point. Their advice was, That it should by no means be meddling withal, but that things should die of themselves: But no questioning by writing; for so it might go on to the world's end: for one book might breed another: and so, they whom it concerned should never be in rest. This was resolved on; and afterwards there was no more speech of writing, saving only faintly and whisperingly, but nothing to the purpose. It seemed that the commissioners who were for the nullity had enough of it, and desired no more to bring themselves on the stage, being so by all men exclaimed upon for that which they had done.

The bishop of Winton, after the sentence, went down with great jollity, full of hope and glory; but within a while after he grew much daunted, as some about him, and namely his own daughter, reported; for he heard many ways of the strange detestation which the world had of the deed; and the nick-naming of his son much affected him; But his advertisements from sir Richard Norton, his son in-law, did much trouble him: For sir Richard wrote divers times from London to his wife, That he could come in no place, but his father-in-law was raised upon: That men told him, that he thought he had a wife, but it was no longer than my lord of Winton pleased; for whensoever he offended him, he could make a nullity between them. Besides, the said sir Richard told Mr. John More, of Lincoln's-Inn, divers times, "That it was such a disgrace unto him to hear how the world talked of that sentence, that although my lord of Winton promised to give him, his wife, and family, their diet and entertainment so long as he lived, yet he would get him to his own house, and live there, where he had means sufficient, and not be subject to that perpetual scorn, which would follow him so long as he remained in his father-in-law's company."

By these, and the like passages, it was guessed, that the rest of the commissioners, who were for the sentence, had little comfort in themselves of that which they had done. On the other part, the archbishop, and those who stood with him, had their honesty and justice sounded out every day more and more; and many messages were brought them, and divers letters written unto them, or shewed them by some friends, from sundry of the bishops in the land, from the universities, from many godly preachers out of all parts, which was an exceeding consolation unto them, among the many frowns which they did bear, That there was an universal concurrence of all honest men to approve that which they had done. And the archbishop had privately, from many great ones in court, and nobles and worthy personages elsewhere, such significations of their good acceptance which he did, that it cheered him much inwardly, and he was nothing dismayed.

Now, about the middle of November, the wheel was turned about: For since nothing could be gained by speaking hardly of the negative part, they thought they would make use of them another way, and that should be by making the world believe, that they had now given approbation of the fact. And thereupon it was, in court and London, asseverantly given out, and the fame of it went far and near, That the archbishop, and the rest, after more mature deliberation, had testified their concurrence with the rest of the commissioners, and all now were of one mind. Men did not hastily believe this; but yet divers of good rank came and sent to the archbishop and the rest, to know whether those things were so or no. And when it was found to be but a jargon, it gave a great deal of contentment, and removed away much scandal which formerly was taken. Yet again afterward it was bruited, the second time, That my lord of Canterbury had given the king satisfaction in the matter; and my lord of London, on such a Sunday, had come and submitted himself to my lord chamberlain, and the rest had relented. Nay, it went so far, that Yelverton, the king's solicitor, and a great dependent upon the house of Suffolk, told Mr. Pye, the counsellor, and Mr. Cholmely, the earl of Essex's solicitor, coming unto him about books to be drawn up, for passing back the jointure of the lady Frances's part, and the portion of the earl of Essex's part; "That the gainsaying commissioners were now consenting, and the great man beyond the water was come over; which he knew so assuredly, that he had seen it ratified by the subscription of the archbishop and the rest." Yea, further, he added, "That there was great reason, at the first, wherefore my lord of Canterbury, and the others, should stand against the separation; for they had just cause, at the first, to fear that this fact might be drawn into example, and so marriages ordinarily be violated; but now it was resolved that no more such should be permitted, and thereupon they assented." These things were enforced to be endured with silence, for the avoiding of clamour, and making of trouble.

But now behold an admirable device of the bishop of Litchfield, which sheweth what his own opinion was of the validity of the sentence. I will set it down as it came to be acted.

On the 26th of November Searle the proctor cometh to my lord of Canterbury at Lambeth, and bringeth with him a writ of Certiorari out of the Chancery, directed to the commissioners in the cause between the lady Frances and the earl of Essex. The archbishop was prayed to open it; and so he did, and there found that four of them, sub sigillis vestris, were required to certify Recordum Sententie into the Chancery. The archbishop asked Searle, 'If this were an usual thing?' Who answered, 'No, he had not known any such thing before.' It is replied, 'What then should be the reason thereof?' Answer was made, 'That since the matter was controverted in the sentence, lest there should be question of the marriage afterwards, the earl of Somerset would have the sentence lying by him under the great seal of England ratified.' The archbishop thought that to be but a weak hold, yet charged Searle to see such an instrument drawn, and a certificate should accordingly be made. On the Wednesday after, Barker, the register, cometh to Lambeth, and sheweth a form of a draught in paper, how the certificate should be returned in the names of all the commissioners specially put down. The archbishop, in the reading of it, found five or six lines having a black line drawn under them; and there upon the more marking the words contained in them, found that which he liked not. Thereupon he asked Barker, 'Who lined those words?' Barker said, 'He himself did.' The other asked, 'What was the reason of it?' And it was answered, 'Because sir John Bennet, and some other of the doctors with him, had disliked that sentence.' Quoth the archbishop, 'And they had reason for it: Who put them first in?' Barker said, 'None but himself.' Quoth the archbishop then, 'May not the certificate stand as well without those words as with them?' To which Barker answered, 'Yes.' Then said the archbishop, 'Let them be stricken out.' Here the register, with somewhat ado, faintly made answer, 'That the commissioners on the other side would by no means have them out.' The archbishop said, 'Then I perceive it is a device to entangle us: I am ready to certify the sentence as the writ requireth, but I will none of this. Barker, I am first in the commission, and for my place sake, I would have looked, that I should have been conferred withal, what had been fit to return, and not to have had this trick put upon me, that either I must certify that which crosseth my judgment at the time of giving the sentence, or I must be forced not to certify at all.' So Barker departed, and all was quiet until the Monday after; at which time the archbishop was early at Whitehall, the council sitting that morning. There, in the waiting-chamber, at the end of the privy-gallery, the bishop of Litchfield cometh to him, and saith, 'My lord, we have received a writ of Certiorari out of the Chancery, to certify the sentence for the nullity.' 'Yea,' saith the archbishop, 'and I am ready to certify it.' 'But,' saith the bishop, 'He who framed the writ hath made it sub sigillis vestris, and doth not know that there is a seal of office for the delegates; it should have been sub sigillo communi.' Before the archbishop could reply, in cometh the lord chancellor, and to him cometh out of the next chamber the lord chamberlain; and then those two lords, together with the bishop of Litchfield, drew themselves to a window, and there had they secret communication about the altering of the form of the writ, as the effect declared; for that afternoon, a cause being to be heard touching alimony, from sir Pexal Brocas to his lady; and the committees in it being the bishop of Litchfield, and Mr. Chancellor of the duchy, and my lord of Canterbury being umpire; before Mr. Chancellor was come, Bembo, deputy to the clerk of the crown, came into the parlour at Lambeth, and had private speech with the bishop of Litchfield. The archbishop going out into the garden, Litchfield followed him, and told him, 'That Mr. Bembo had brought another form of a writ;' and thereupon shewed him the words sub communi sigillo. The archbishop bid him do as he thought good, and withdrew himself into the low stone gallery, whither Litchfield followed him, and used these words: 'My lord, here is a form of a certificate, which hath been thought fit to use in the business of my lord chamberlain; and I hear your grace taketh exception to some things in it.' Then he pulled out the very paper which Barker formerly had shewed. The archbishop answered, 'My lord, have I not reason to take exception to these words, that 'post omnimodam veritatis disquisitionem, post probationes idoneas et de jure requisitas,' we gave such a sentence? For to subscribe this, were to proclaim myself a dishonest man upon record: For if these things be true, why did I deny to join in the sentence?' Quoth Litchfield, 'This here is true; for it cannot be denied, but some 'probationes idoneas et de jure requisitas' were used; and we do not say that all were.' The archbishop answered, 'You shall do well, therefore, to certify 'post probationes aliquas,' and I will join with you; but as it standeth now indefinitely, it will be taken as if all have been used; I pray you therefore to alter the certificate, and make things plain.' 'My lord,' quoth Litchfield, 'I will deal plainly with you: Because the words were in, and doubt was made, whether they should pass or no; the king's majesty hath been acquainted with the business; and he, by a letter from sir Thomas Lake, hath sent word expressly that he will have them in.' The archbishop said, 'Let them then certify, who will avow those words, for I cannot condescend unto them. And hath not that person done a good office, who hath informed the king hereof; that distraction may still be among the commissioners, and there may never be an end of difference?' The bishop said, 'My lord, I could wish that you would yield unto the king, and so give him satisfaction.' The archbishop answered, 'What would you have me do? I gave the sentence as I was persuaded in conscience, and since that time I have been silent, and meddling no way in the matter: I did what I did upon long deliberation; and I may not in private, upon no ground since appearing to me, cross that which I have done in public.' It was further added, 'That there was reason to suspect that they did ill offices who held those things still on foot: That there never was any man, who sought to grace himself by disgracing others, but it met him at the lane's end, at one time or another.' These things passed then; and after the cause heard between sir Pexal Brocas and his wife, the bishop of Litchfield said to the archbishop at his parting, 'My lord, you will give us leave to certify then as we purpose?' To which the archbishop answered, 'Yes, with all my heart.'

The next morning the archbishop remembered, that by the carriage of things in such fashion as was pretended, he might be tricked: For if the names of all the commissioners were put into the certificate, and four of them might certify under a common seal, it should not be known hereafter, but that he and his fellows concurred therein, and that, with the words which were excepted against: He therefore sent for Barker, and in the presence of sir John Bennet, and two servants, being public notaries, he expostulated with Barker, as serving men's turns, rather than caring for peace; and then punctually he delivered these things.

First, 'The writ requireth me to certify the sentence, and I am ready to do it.'—Secondly,

'If the whole process be desired, I am willing to certify that also.'—Thirdly, 'For the words in question, because they were put in without my privy, and they may as well be left out as put in, by your own saying, I pray to be forborn for returning of them.'—Fourthly, 'I require you to conceal these things as much as you may, that the world take no new alarm of any difference between the commissioners.'

The archbishop spake of returning the whole process, because he had heard, that at the first it was meant it should be so; but Dr. Stuart, and perhaps some other of the Civilians, dissuaded that by all means; lest, if the whole were on record in the chancery, every man that list, hereafter might censure that sentence, and sift the grounds whereon the commissioners proceeded; it was good, therefore, to take away that occasion.

When matters were thus resolved, the bishop of Litchfield, who meant to play his prizes in this service, speaketh to Bembo, to draw some preface or conclusion to add to the certificate; that it might not only be signed with the great Seal, as after the form of an inopsimus: but that his majesty might add a confirmation to it: and when Mr. Bembo, as unacquainted with this fashion, did not fit the bishop's humour, his lordship took on him to do it himself. He drew up therefore, a strange writing, as was informed by a credible person that saw it, containing barbarous Latin, and no good congruity of sense. But the matter of it was, that his majesty having the authority of the pope now in himself, and in scrinio pectoris, having power to ratify, did, ex plenitudine potestatis, confirm that divorce to all intents and purposes. In an evening Dr. Martin was sent for to the lord chamberlain, and there was the bishop with his papers. The doctor, as it hath been credibly delivered, being shewed that writing, and his opinion thereupon being asked, did utterly dislike it, and said, "That the king claimed nothing of the pope's power; but took that as his own, which the pope had usurped: that the king had spoke before by his judges delegate, and had nothing more to do: that if the sentence were not good already, no confirmation could make it good." And when the bishop was earnest in defence of his device, there was a little heat stricken between the doctor and him, so that these words passed from the said doctor: "You do, as much as in you lieth, spit in the face of the king our master by laying on him all the matter; whereas the scandal that hath already been is this, that his majesty is said to deal so much in the matter. My lord, you are to blame to enter into these things without advice of men skilful in the law: hath Dr. Stuart or Dr. Bird been acquainted herewithal?" The bishop said, "No; but for this matter, I know as much law as the best of you all." Dr. Martin replied, "No; your lordship thinketh, that because you have read two or three chapters of the canon law about this late business, you know as much as we do, who have spent all our lives in that profession:

I tell your lordship, I have studied the law these two-and-thirty years; and therefore, you shall give me leave to believe, that I know more therein than you can. I am the king's advocate, and therefore may suffer nothing with my consent to pass dishonourable to my master."

Upon these contestations, the lord chamberlain was much troubled, saying, "What a matter is this, that men should be of such contrary opinions! What shall we do?" When the bishop murmured much that his counsel was not followed, Dr. Martin said thus: "My lord, in a business of this importance, I will not wish your lordship to follow my single advice, but let this be done; to-morrow let sir William Button, in your lordship's name, come to Doctor's-Commons; and let him get together sir Daniel Daa, Dr. Stuart, and Dr. Bird, and I will attend them: and then we will consult jointly what is fit to be done."

This advice was much liked; and on the morrow, being Friday, they all assembled, and for two hours all points were debated; but the conclusion was, "That there should be no farther confirmation: for this was to proclaim, that the sentence was defective in itself, which would make a great buzz in the world;" and therefore, the counsel was in general, "That too much had been done, and for the time to come, the care must be, how to lay it asleep fairly."

This resolution being taken, the next knock was, that so many of the commissioners as were for the sentence, should be called together; and they should be made acquainted with this, that the bishop might be fairly put off. On the Saturday night, therefore, in the dark, at sir Julius Cæsar's house in the Strand, met the bishops of Ely, Litchfield, Rochester, the two chancellors of the Exchequer and Dutchy, and sir Daniel Daa, and well near for an hour, they privately debated what they thought fit; but, as it seemeth, resolved as before, and so departed.

A friend being the next day with the lady Cæsar, and knowing of the meeting, asked her, "What about it was?" She answered, "It is something about the late nullity; but what it is, I do not know. It seemeth, that they who were the doers in it, think somewhat is amiss. They suppose all is not well about it, and I for my part think so also."

A man would have supposed, that all these things should have contented the bishop of Litchfield; but he was so far in love with his own invention, that yet he would not be beat off; and therefore, to merit the more, he once again moveth the lord chamberlain to send to sir Francis Bacon and to Mr. Yelverton, being of the king's learned counsel, to know their opinion: which being done; and they two, for the reasons above-named, concurring with the civilians, the bishop, as it hath been credibly related, said of them, together with the rest, "They are all fools." And so ended this stratagem; but the worker thereof was not yet for an end.

From the beginning of this whole question of the nullity, the bishop of Litchfield had carried himself variously, sometimes being vehement in words, publicly against the separation, and other times in deed, giving furtherance to it. Many speeches he had privately with the archbishop, making shew of much honesty and respect to him, which the archbishop ever warily observed; thinking, notwithstanding, that these had been testimonies of the working of his conscience, conflicting in itself, but not resolved what to do. In the mean time, from the court, from London, and out of the country, the archbishop was still called upon by divers worthy friends, "That he should take heed of that bishop: That he was ever, and in all things naught: That he did all the worst offices that possibly he could, and was still stirring the coals, to procure to himself a reputation; that he was zealous of the house of Suffolk." The archbishop forgot not those many warnings, but carried himself very warily towards him: Yet out of charity it still came in his mind, "He is a bishop, I know no evil of him; I ought not to condemn a man upon a generality; I have no particular proof of his misbehaviour in this behalf: Although he dealt ill with the late lord treasurer, and most falsely with the archbishop Bancroft in his life-time, and after his death; and for that cause was detested by both of them; yet an honest man may think, that experience hath reformed him, and now he is amended." Yet it much affected the archbishop, that all men spake so ill of him; and one speech of an old courtier, a very honest knight, entered far with him. For about a fortnight before the marriage, the said courtier speaking privately with the archbishop, among other words, he used this: "I know not what the bishop of Litchfield doth among you; but he hath made a shift to be taken for a knave generally with us in the court." Now, whether the next prank will verify so much or no, let the reader judge. Eight days before the marriage, on a Saturday morning, that bishop cometh to Lambeth, and in private conference with the archbishop, he telleth him, "That out of his love and respect to his grace, he was come voluntarily, as of himself, to know his mind about one matter, and it was this. On St. Stephen's day, said he, the lord chamberlain meaneth to have this great marriage go forward: Now, it may, perhaps, be desired, that a licence should be given by you, that the banes may not be asked; which if you like not to grant, I may be the means to free you from being moved to it." The archbishop said, "What have I to do with granting of a licence? It belongeth not to me: But wherefore should there be any need of a licence? The marriage is intended to be public; masks and shews are made for the same; all England taketh notice of it, and therefore it were good that the banes were openly asked, as the manner is of such marriages as are made in the king's chapel. Yea, the lady Elizabeth herself had her banes asked." "My lord, saith Litchfield, there is some cause why it should be done without publishing the banes: For, peradventure, somebody may step up, and make a disturbance. You know what a mad, naked fellow came into St. James's, after the death of the prince; if such a one should come in now, what a work would it make?" The archbishop wondered within himself, to hear such a reply, and thought surely, that it was no mad body that they should need to stand in fear of, but they suspected some what else. But his answer was, "My lord, there come no such into the king's chapel; there be doors and officers to keep such out. But if it should be suspected that any would oppose, it is best the banes be asked, for then there will be some warning of the gain-saying; whereas, otherwise, if at the time of the marriage one should suddenly start up, it would make a greater trouble." Notwithstanding the bishop went on, "That a licence would cut off all the doubt." The archbishop answered, "But what have I to do with granting a licence in the king's chapel? It belongeth to the ordinary of the place, and that is my lord of Bath, as dean of the chapel." Litchfield replied, "He never granted any, and he hath no seal for that office." It was answered, "He never granted any, because nobody ever desired it; but the manner was, that the banes were published. But as for the seal of the office, who doth not know that any seal will serve? And none better than this bishop's seal, it being said, 'Datum sub sigillo nostro Episcopali, quo in hoc casu, or hoc tempore, utimur.' King James, at the first, did use the seal of queen Elizabeth, till a new one was made." The bishop proceedeth, "Yet it would be fit that you granted the licence, if it be requested." To this the archbishop said, "I shall do that which never any of my predecessors did." "Yes," quoth Litchfield, "if you would seek your records, you should find some so granted." The archbishop answered, "I have inquired of my officers, and they tell me, That no such thing was heard of, in omni hominum memoria. But, my lord, I know that my lord of Bath hath it under the great seal of England exclusively to the archbishop; so that in direct words there is a restraint, that he may not meddle there." "Yea, but," quoth Litchfield, "you have an act of parliament, enabling you to grant dispensations to the king and his children; and therefore it belongeth to you." Said the archbishop, "do not you think that I understand the act of parliament as well as you? My lord, do you think that that statute was made for these ordinary graces and dispensations? Why, is not your lordship able, within your diocese, to grant a licence, that a marriage may be solemnized, and not the banes asked?" "Yes," saith he, "I may: nay, every archdeacon may do it within his jurisdiction." "Then, my lord," quoth the archbishop, "must an act of parliament be made to grant the abb. power to do that which every archdeacon may do within his precinct? There is surely some other matter in it. But I marvel, my lord, that you are now so earnest for the archbishop's licences, when, as I have heard, in the days of my predecessor, when you were bishop of Rochester, you would not suffer the archbishop's licences to pass within your diocese.' 'No,' saith he, 'it was for Westminster that I did strive, not for the diocese of Rochester. And it is true, that there be records in that church, that the monks did contend with the king about divers questions. I had reason, therefore, to stand for the privileges of my church.' It was answered, 'So hath my lord of Bath to stand for the right of the king's chapel.' The archbishop seeing how earnest the man was, in so unreasonable a thing, said farther 'My lord, you have mine answer; but let me now tell you one thing. It is six weeks ago, that I heard from the court, and many times since I have had it reiterated, that such a trick should be put upon me: that although it needed not, yet I should be moved for granting this licence, because thereby I should be constrained, either to grant it, and so cross my former sentence, and involv'dly give my consent to the nullity, or I should deny it, and so grate once again upon the king's displeasure. You see now I have given you a fair answer, which may free me from both. But, my lord, I pray God you do good offices in this business. I fear you put yourself into many things, which may be better forborn. But let me tell you, there was never any man who sought to raise himself by wronging another, but at one time or other he had enough of it. It is now almost three months since this sentence was given, and since that time, I have not meddled with the matter, for offending the king. I am silent, and no way oppose, and men have their end; yet cannot I be quiet. I would have you know that God beholdeth these things, and remembereth them. And for my part, I am not blind, I see well what is done; and I shall not always be silent. The time will come, that I must speak; and it shall appear I am not tongue-tied.' This made the bishop not so forward as before; but occasion of a farther speech being offered, the archbishop went on, and said, 'The sentence which I gave, was in the fear of God, and according to my conscience: and if that had been done, which was convenient, and we called for, there needed not to have been any division in judgment. For, my lord, you may remember when you came to me at Croydon, and brought these papers from the king, after the reading whereof I slept little that night, how desirous I was to give his majesty satisfaction; and therefore prayed you, fetching out the process unto you, to tell me whereupon I should ground my sentence. You shewed me one article, That he had not known her, nor he thought that he never should. I told you then, Yea, that was for want of love, for he said, When I came out of France, I loved her; I do not so now, neither ever shall I. It is want of love.' To this the bishop said, 'Yea, and the earl added, That he had done his best oftentimes, carnally to know her, but he found an imperfection in himself.' The archbishop replied to this, 'Oh, my lord! never say so; for his lordship's answers, upon his oath, are to the contrary: He found no defect, or impediment in himself. And if I shall speak my private opinion, although I would not have you believe it, I think the earl as able a man for a woman, as any is in England.' 'And I think to the contrary,' quoth Litchfield. The archbishop went on: 'But, my lord, when your lordship and I had these difficulties in our mind at Croydon, you told me of one thing, which I embraced as an oracle from heaven. And that was, that to rid ourselves of these distractions, we had no other way but to call the earl of Essex again upon his oath, that so giving us a fuller answer, we might either have good ground to pronounce for the nullity, or matter to give reason why we might not condescend unto it. I approved this; and you know how the next day, in public court, it was moved, and my lords of Winchester, Ely, Rochester and yourself, gave very good liking to it; and no man said any thing against it, except Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, who softly spake, I know not whether that will be permitted. But you may remember, you were intreated to deliver this to the king at Theobalds, from whom you brought word, That it should not be granted, because the earl of Essex, being partly provoked by his falling out with Mr. Henry Howard, and partly being counselled by the earl of Southampton, would speak all things to hinder the nullity. My answer then was, That he was to speak upon his oath, and we would most strictly examine him. When that was denied, which should have led us to the truth, I must confess I had never any mind to pronounce for the separation.' The bishop seemed to take no great pleasure to hear these things thus repeated, but fared, as if he could have wished, that they had all been forgotten. The conclusion of all was, that the bishop seemed to be well satisfied that no licence was given, and promised the archbishop to take care that he should no farther be troubled with it; assuring him, 'that he did ever good offices to him, whereof the king could give witness, and would; and he would ever make the best of things.' To which the archbishop said, 'If he did, he would take it for a kindness at his hands;' and so he departed.

Accordingly, the next day the banes were asked in the chapel, and there was nothing but fair weather; the archbishop attended the king in the closet. On the Monday the king went to Hampton-Court; and that day the bishop of Bath and Wells came to Lambeth: he told the archbishop, that he had a direct message unto him from the king, and that was, that his majesty did much marvel, that he spake not with him about the sentence: that the king expected satisfaction and submission. His lordship added, that he perceived that the king had some scruple in his mind, which he wished should be removed before his going to the communion on Christmas-Day. The archbishop knew not that the bishop of Litchfield had dealt any way treacherously with him, and therefore was constrained to answer, in general, that he knew not what to say to his highness. He persuaded himself, that in giving of the sentence he had done his duty, and therefore could not tell how to make a submission where he conceived no fault. If in any circumstance he had erred, he was ready to testify his sorrow for it; but he knew no such thing; yet if his majesty was displeas'd at him, to signify his obedience to his king and sovereign, to whom he was so much bound, he would not refuse, if the king were pleas'd to restrain him of his liberty, and lay him in the Tower all the days of his life, to submit himself unto it patiently, without murmuring.

Furthermore, he pray'd the bishop of Bath (who, on the morrow, was to go to Hampton-Court) to signify humbly to his majesty, that he had nothing in this world more precious than his life; and that he wis'd, that he had given that life as a redemption, that the king's hand had never been in that business. And withal he said, that at the coming of the king, he would attend his majesty.

On Wednesday night, the king came to Whitehall; and on the Thursday, after dinner, my lord of Canterbury went to the court, where they were all busy about plate and jewels against the marriage. Notwithstanding, he had hastily speech of divers matters with the king; and in the end, he said privately unto his highness, 'May it please your majesty, I understand by my lord of Bath and Wells, that your majesty expects that I should give you an account about the matter of the lord of Essex and the lady Frances: I can say nothing more than this, that I was put into the commission as a judge, and at the time of sentence I did my conscience; and since I have not meddled with the matter.' 'Yes,' saith the king, 'I hear you deny'd a licence to be granted, for not asking of the banes; which I wonder you would do, since the sentence was pass'd.' 'No,' said the archbishop, 'I deny'd no licence; but I advis'd, that the best course was, that the banes should be ask'd, according to the custom used in the chapel.'

Secondly, I said, 'That if any licence should be granted, it belonged not to me to give it, but to the ordinary of the place, the dean of the chapel, who hath it under your majesty's great seal, exclusive to the archbishoprick.' 'Yea,' said the king, 'my lord of Bath said so; but I am told it is otherwise.' The archbishop replied, 'Nay, it is so indeed.'

And thirdly, said he, 'My answer was, that never any of my predecessors granted a licence for any thing done in the king's chapel: I have received information so, from my officers. It had then been presumption in me to attempt that which belonged not unto me.' 'This is another matter,' saith the king. 'Were these your answers? I was told otherwise. But I will take some other time to speak with you.' The archbishop, after this, attend'd half an hour, and nothing being said, he departed.

The same night, a friend coming to Lambeth, told my lord, 'That he had been that day with the lord Knowles, where he found, that the bishop of Litchfield had exceedingly wrong'd my lord of Canterbury: for he had reported all the speech about the licence, in a spiteful manner; said, it was absolutely deny'd: that the archbishop gave out, that the earl of Essex was very potent for a woman; and that he intended to question this new marriage, at one time or other, that it should never take effect.'

This, said the gentleman, made a great stir among them; and the archbishop was much blamed, that he would never make an end; but they were much troubled at it, as fearing themselves, that all was not sure. 'But,' quoth he, 'when I had told them, that this was some ill office of the bishop of Litchfield, who had every day new inventions to puzzle them, that he might so much the more indear himself, unto them, by signifying his zeal for them; and that I know how fairly my lord of Canterbury had answer'd him, (for so indeed he did) and that he was so far from disturbing the marriage, that he intended to be present at it; they were not only appeas'd, but seem'd much content that his grace would be there: and this I assure you to be true.'

When the archbishop heard this, he was now satisfied, that the man who had done him all the wrong, was the bishop of Litchfield; from whom he resolv'd afterward to be very wary how he trust'd him. Yet, professing that he forgave him with all his heart, on the Christmas-Day he attend'd the king, and receiv'd the communion with his majesty; and so, coming home to dinner, sir Charles Cornwallis came along with him. This gentleman is one, to whom, for his love, the archbishop was much beholden; and after dinner they grew privately into speech of all these fore-remember'd stirs; where the knight found much fault that so many tricks were put upon the archbishop; blamed infinitely the bishop of Litchfield; promis'd to acquaint some of his great friends with his qualities, and assur'd to make things be rightly understood; and took away with him that report, wherein he seem'd much to joy, that the archbishop would be at the marriage.

On the morrow, being St. Stephen's day, the archbishop went to the court, attending the king to chapel, went down to the marriage, (where, not the king, but the lord Chamberlain gave the bride) had a pair of wedding-gloves, and so came home to dinner; where he sat with much comfort, as being glad, that since things must be so, they were come to an end: and so pray'd God to bless his church, the king and kingdom, and himself; that he might be free from so many vexations, as for a long space undeserv'dly had follow'd him.

The SPEECH intended to be spoken at Lambeth, Sept. 25, 1613, by George, Archbishop of Canterbury, when it came to his turn to declare his mind concerning the Nullity of Marriage between the Earl of Essex and the Lady Frances Howard.

[Seven of the Commissioners having before declared themselves that they would give Sentence for a Nullity, and great reason being to think, that the bishop of London, sir John Bennet, Dr. James, and Dr. Edwards, would give voices against the Nullity.]

My Lords, and you the rest of the Commissioners; I have had a great contention and deliberation within myself, in what manner I should utter my judgment in this present cause, since, after the speech of those three who first began, so great a stream and concurrence together of the rest (my lord excepted, who spoke last) have given their opinions for the annulling of the marriage. But yet I hold not myself concluded thereby, but that I may declare my judgment, having learned that suffragia among wise men are as well appendenda and ponderanda, as numeranda: and it was no shame for Phocion in Athens, upon good ground, to contradict the whole city; neither was Paphnusius in the council of Nice the less respected, when he stood against the whole Synod; nay, it was his honour, that by delivering of his sentence, he altered the resolution which that whole assembly had intended to take, which I freely acknowledge I have no hope to effect at this time. And yet, though I have not that hope, but might very well spare this labour, yet my conscience telleth me, that it becometh me to speak in a matter of this importance, because, not only, Deum timeo, I fear God, which I doubt not but all of this company doth; but I am afraid of God, lest he should be angry with me, if in this case I be silent. And I think it is expected of me, since I am here present, that I should not sit as an idol, and only fill a room; for that were to lay an imputation on myself, that I had undertaken a cause, which in public I durst not offer to maintain.

I must acknowledge, that in delivering of my mind in this business of so great weight, I do find two defects, that I cannot so pertinently speak unto the purpose as divers of the judges here: the one is, That I am no lawyer; and the other is, That I am no married man; by both which I am disabled, that I cannot speak with that confidence concerning some particulars, as most of you, the commissioners, are able to do; but in lieu thereof, I have endeavoured to furnish myself some other way concurrent to this purpose: as by reading, by conferring with some whom I do trust, with pondering thereupon, so that it hath lost me much sleep at several times, with frequent prayer unto God, that he would direct me aright; which I have more begged of God in this cause, than ever in any that was before me in judgment. And besides, I bring with me animus candidum, a mind devoid of passion, or any perturbation, which inclineth to no part for fear or for favour, for spleen or for hatred: from which, I thank God, in pronouncing of sentence, I ever have been free, remembering that judges are in the place of God; and as Jehosaphat said, 2 Chron. xix. 'Non hominis judicia exercetis sed Domini, et quicquid judicaveritis in vos redundavit.' He then who sitteth in the place of God, and in pronouncing of sentence will vary from justice, he leaveth God, and sheweth himself worthy to lie in the flames of hell, for abusing of the trust which is committed unto him, which I hope I shall not do. And e bono? To what end should I transgress in judgment for either side, when I have no reason to be partial for either, since it is indifferent to me, in any particular, whether this question receive one or other determination?

Where, lest I should be mistaken, I think it not amiss, as publicly I have done divers times before, to let the world know what my judgment is concerning the impotency of a husband towards his wife: that since marriage in young couples is for carnal copulation and procreation thereupon, and that it is the intentment of those which contract matrimony to receive satisfaction in that kind, that if this nobleman be not able to perform those marital rights unto his lady, he doth unto her a very great injustice to retain her as his wife; and we shall perform a great part of injury and cruelty towards her, if we do not free her from this burthen and yoke. We are bound in conscience to do it, since it is in truth no marriage, but a pretended matrimony, that consummation being wanting, which was one of the first things in intention when they two came together: for impossibilitas officii, by a received maxim, solvit vinculum conjugii. But the point is, that before the separation be pronounced, it must appear unto the church, that there is good cause for the same; which must not be upon light surmises, or questionable suggestions, but upon evident declarations and proofs, which may give full contentment to the conscience of the judge. The marriage was overt and in the face of the church, whereby they were joined into one; let the reason of separation be as clear as that was, if it possibly may be; or let it be so apparent, that the church may well know, that there is ground to stand upon for pronouncing of a Nullity. Now this is it which I doubt will not fall out in this case of my lord of Essex; there is not proof sufficient to inform the minds of the judges that this knot should be dissolved, and themselves set at liberty the one from the other. And then you understand what the general rule is, Quod dubitas, ne feceris. And in this controversy there seem in my judgment many reasons of doubting, that the separation desired ought not to be granted. You shall hear some few of them.

1. The first scruple which ariseth in my mind, is from the uncertainty of that proceeding, which we have had in this business. For in the handling of it formerly, we had it propounded, that there must be a Nullity propter maleficium versus hanc. That was it which we debated, and for the which we turned our books; that the counsel for my lady did still insist upon, not naming the words indeed, but by a periphrasis, or circumlocution, describing the same. And it cannot be forgotten, how Dr. Stuart, being told by one or more of the commissioners sitting then in court, that his whole speech did still point out maleficium; he answered, It is true, that is it which we intend. The authorities always brought out of the canonists were in direct terms upon maleficium, the proofs intended nothing else. And we all understand, that to have an impotency unto a man's own wife, and an ability unto other, and that incurably, and that for some latent reason, which cannot be known, is the case of maleficium; and that is the matter alleged in the libel, and whereupon my lord is examined. And yet, now since we sit upon the second commission, maleficium is disclaimed. One of my lords (my lord of Winchester) hath avowed it, that he dislikes that maleficium; that he hath read Del-Rio, the Jesuit, writing upon that argument, and doth hold him an idle and fabulous fellow; that he rather supposeth it to be God's own handy-work, than any thing from the devil. Another of my lords (my lord of Ely) hath assented thereunto, and maleficium must be gone. Now I for my part will not absolutely deny, that witches by God's permission may have a power over men, to hurt all, or part in them, as by God they shall be limited; but how shall it appear that this is such a thing in the person of a man? The question is, An factum sit, and how it shall be discovered? But to make it a thing ordinary, as the Romish writers do beyond the seas, I take it to be a fable, acknowledging that for truth, which a bishop well versed in that argument did lately write, that maleficia is the very garbage of popery: a thing so base, that we who have learnt Christ aright, should despise and contemn, allowing it no place amongst us. Which course it were a shame if we should not observe, since the papists themselves grow very weary of it; and that even in France, where there hath been more ado with this maleficia than in any other country; for there the common sort, at the time of their marriages, were wont to be afraid to have the words of conjunction in matrimony to be spoken aloud, 'Quos Deus conjunxit, nemo separet;' or the benediction to be publicly given, lest some witch or sorcerer in the same instant should tie a knot upon a point, or play some other sorcerous trick, whereby the new bridegroom, so long as that knot lasted, should be disabled from actual copulation with her whom he had married. And for avoiding of that hazard, they had therefore their matrimonies celebrated in the night-time, and in some private place, were none came but such friends as they dared to trust. This superstition grew so common, and men were so abused by the fright that came thereof, that the prelates of France, about thirty years since, in a council at Rheims, made this decree against it. * Peccare graviter admonemus eos, qui noctu vel clanculum benedictionem nuptialem sibi dari procurant propter metum maleficii: Maleficium enim se vitare posse, credere debent, si eo pietatis affectu ad conjugium accedant, qui prescribitur in sacris literis, videlicet, ut cum timore Domini, et amore filiorum, magis quam libidine impulsu copulentur, devote susceptis prementia et Eucharistia Sacramentis.† And the year after that, another council in that kingdom doth speak yet more plainly. † Et quia Christiano nomine indignus error nostro secula molevit, ut signationibus, consignationibus, vinculis et nexibus matrimonii impediatur:—Hæc Synodus communiione Ecclesie interdicat omnes eos, qui hujusmodi superstitionibus utuntur: monetque fideles, ne hujusmodi commentis fidem habeant, sed in Deo veritatem certam constituent, nec idcirco matrimonia noctu fiant, sed in luce et frequentia hominum. If it be rotten ripe in France; if it be error indignus Christiano nomine; if men must not fidem habere hujusmodi commentis; what do we with it here in England? Let it be cast away as a rotten rag of popery. And yet I do now find, that in the very sentence which is this day to be given, it falleth directly upon the description of maleficium versus hanc. So that what should I think of this case of my lord's, which is built on such a foundation as no man will stand to? We are on it, and off it, and avow it we dare not, yet fly from it we will not. This moveth scruple in me, how I should assent to that whereof I can learn no certainty from the counsel of my lady, nor from you that be the judges, who speak for this nullity: I dare not rest my building on such a sandy foundation.

2. Another matter which troubleth my mind, is the novelty of that which is now set on foot; a thing unheard of in our church, and unknown in our kingdom. We have many stories, old and new, of things done in this land: we have registers extant in every diocese; we have acts and records which specify those accidents which have fallen out in the days of our forefathers, I have caused search in many places to be made, and so I know have some of you, the Commissioners; and I have called upon you for the same, but I can have no precedent of any such example that hath passed in our kingdom. No memory of man can express unto me the name of that person, whose marriage was annulled for impotency towards his wife, when he found an ability of carnal copulation with any other woman. It is this year 1613, that hath set abroad this present imagination, for the former ages knew it not. It is safe walking in the ways which are treaded out unto us. We have great reason for our doings in these human actions, when we do those deeds which formerly were done by our predecessors. I have had many worthy men, which have gone before me in the place which I now hold, men learned, men judicious, great discoverers of impostures? Men that have done great services for the nation where we live; but of them never any had such a case before them, they never gave sentence for a nullity of marriage upon such an inability. I know not whether it be a happiness, or unhappiness, that I must be the first to sit in a Commission for determining such a controversy.

I know, to meet with this objection, it is whispered sometimes, that there is an example, and that is Bury's case, which is urged as a precedent unto this now in question. But, indeed, that is no pattern of this; the dissimilitude is great between the one case and the other; for Bury had his —s stricken off with an horse, that nothing but a little of one of them remained. I will read you the very case, which if any man doubt of, shall be avowed unto him. Thus then it doth follow:

John Bury, esquire, was lawfully seized in his demesnes as of fee, of, and in divers manors, lands and tenements within the county of Devon. The said John Bury did, the 20th day of November, in the first year of queen Mary, marry one Willimot Gifford, and they lived together three years; and the said Bury could not carnaliter cognoscere dictam Willimotam.

Afterwards, viz. the 17th of May, 1561, the said Willimot called the said Bury before the ecclesiastical judge, and charged him to be 'impotent ad coeundum cum dicta Willimota, propter vitium perpetuum, et incurabile impedimentum ad generationem, et ejus inhabilitatem,' &c. and thereupon desired to be divorced. In the proceeding before the judge, it was proved by divers witnesses, of which two were physicians, that the said Bury had but one little s—e, and that no bigger than a bean. It was also deposed by divers matrons, that the said Willimot Gifford remained a virgin, and incorrupt; and the said Bury confessed no less: upon which proof, and confession of John Bury, the ecclesiastical judge pronounced sentence of divorce, and did thereby separate them.

Afterward the said John Bury took to wife one Philippa Monjoy, his first wife, Willimot Gifford, being then alive; and the said Philippa had a son in the time of their continuing together, John Bury's first wife being alive.

Afterwards, the said Willimot being still living, the said Monjoy, of her own accord, without any sentence of divorce, forsook the said John Bury, and married one Langeden, with whom she continued. The said John Bury, and his first wife, Willimot, died; the said Monjoy and Langeden then living, married together.

The question is, Whether, John Bury being divorced from Willimot Gifford for impotency, the second marriage, solemnized between the said John Bury and Monjoy, during which time the issue male was born, be in law a marriage or not?

It appeareth by the process made in the cause, and the words of the sentence grounded upon the same process, that the first marriage was pronounced to be void, 'propter defectum et vitium testicularum,' which made the said John Bury 'impotentem et ineptum ad actum generandi, et coitum conjugalem.' And so in all respects this second marriage with Monjoy is void, and of no effect: for either this cause of the dissolution of the first matrimony is true, which is always to be presumed, until the contrary do appear, and then the same cause doth make the second marriage void also; or else, if it any ways appear, this cause of the dissolution of the first marriage to be false: 'Et ecclesia erat decepta, quia satis potens ad generandum, et quod in ipsa generavit.' And in that case the first marriage is good in law, 'et debet redire ad priora connubia.' And so the second marriage is utterly void.

* In the short case of Mrs. Catharine Weld, (daughter to lord Aston) and Edward Weld, esq. her husband, printed in 1733, the cases of Bury and Essex are thus quoted in pp. 42, 43: "The famous case of John Bury, esq. of the county of Devon, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, is a proper caution in respect to such demands for annulling contracts of marriage, since such nullities often occasion much noise and confusion; and instead of hurting none, as has been asserted on the other side, almost always have stirred up implacable malice in the party declared incapable, and the consequences have not seldom brought a disreputation on the court who pronounced it.—In order to which, let us return a little to the history of Bury's case. His first wife Willimot libelled him for insufficiency as to carnal encounters, and upon inspection it appeared he had but one little testicle, of the size of a small bean. The ecclesiastical court, on this and other corroborating evidence, gave sentence with the libel, and, so far as they were able, annulled the marriage.—Willimot quickly took the advantage of this sentence, and married again. Bury was, it seems, not at all satisfied with this juridical sentiment of his incapacity, but married also a second wife, Philippa, by whom he had a son. This afterwards drew the succession to Bury's estate into question, on the legitimacy of this son. The common lawyers were unanimously of opinion, that the church authority exerted in pronouncing the nullity being plainly deceived in the very ground upon which it went, that sentence was in itself void, and the first marriage between Bury and Willimot remained, notwithstanding it, good.—It is with some reluctance I mention the case of the earl of Essex and lady Frances Howard, the most famous instance in our kingdom of a sentence of this kind, which was given by the majority of a court of delegates, composed of the greatest bishops and men who were skilled in the civil law; yet, notwithstanding, the solemnity of in-

Whether this be true or no, I appeal to Dr. Stuart, who is here in presence, and of counsel for my lady, who, I know, will affirm it, because, not long since, being asked by me of it, he confessed the same. And here is Dr. Farland, now of counsel for my lord, who was used for his advice in this case of Bury; and Dr. Hone is yet living, who can testify the same. For I will suppose, that a man cannot forget such a famous case as that was wherein himself was employed: but if all these were dead, I know where records be, which still will continue. If this then were the matter in question touching Bury 'defectus testicularum,' what is this to the great controversy now depending before us? and if this be the only precedent, that should be the inducement, that the sentence to be given in this cause is not new, but the like hath been heard of before; I am where I was: We are now to act a novelty, a thing strange, and unheard of in the church of England, whereof let other men be the managers, I may have no hand in it.

But perhaps it will be said, that in some other countries, and especially in France, these things are well known; and the examples of one kingdom, especially, being so near unto us, may be an inducement for us to do the like, since the reason is the same. My answer thereunto is, that I that live in England, am to frame myself to those things, which I find in the church of England, whereof I see no reason but there should be as great esteem, as of any church in the world. In the days of our forefathers, as our nation was held a very noble nation, so was the church of England held a very famous church. Ecclesia Anglicana, as might easily be shewed out of Matthew Paris, and by divers things in some later general councils, did carry a greater sway. And why should we at this time, in any thing, yield unto any church in the world, since it is a thing well known, that the knowledge of divinity doth abound here beyond all other nations? and terrogatories, the earl of Essex's direct answer that she was a virgin for him, the verdict of inspectresses, the pomp of compurgators, and all the other colours which could be invented to gloss their proceeding; yet so scandalous was this decision in the eyes of the world, that it lost the characters of all those judges who concurred in pronouncing sentence, and fastened the nick-name of ſir Nullity on one of the sons of a bishop concerned in it, when he was soon after knighted."—And p. 47. "Bury's case was indeed an odd one, but it had no effect when quoted to the bishops and doctors in my lady Essex's case; and though so many hard censures have fallen on those who decided it against the validity of the marriage, yet the event did in some measure justify their opinions; since the lord Essex, though he ventured on a second marriage, yet had not issue by the lady."—Their Case is cited and considered in the Duchess of Kingston's Case, A. D. 1776, infra.

open of this land have beat down the power of the pope, and made evident divers questions in matters of theology, beyond all the parts of Christendom: but beyond this, I do know, that the customs of churches, even by the determination of the pope himself, ought to be the rule of judgment in this matter. We have a famous place interserted into the body of the law, written by pope Alexander the 3rd, unto the bishop of Amiens in France. It is worth your bearing: "Quod sedem Apostolicam consulisti super his, quæ tibi dubia existunt, gratam gerimus et acceptum, et tua exinde fraternitas non parum commendanda videtur. Ex tua siquidem parte nobis est intimatum, quod quædam mulier tui episcopatus cuidam viro nupsertit, asserens quod ob utriusque inguinis rupturam, genitalia ejus abscissa fuissent, necdum ab eo cognita fuisset, qui utique factus leprosus, se pariter et sua domui reddidit infirmorum. Mulier vero ad domum patris reversa sicut asserit inveniis, alio viro nubere desiderat, et conjugali affectu conjungi. Unde licet Romana Ecclesia non consueverit propter talem infirmitatem, vel propter alia maleficia, legitime conjunctos dividere, si tamen consuetudo generalis Gallicanæ Ecclesiæ habet, ut hujusmodi matrimonium dissolvatur; nos patienter tolerabimus, si secundum eandem consuetudinem, eidem mulieri cui voluerit nubendi in Domino concesseris facultatem." By this we do find, that the church of Rome itself doth grant no separations in matters of matrimony, where the church of France doth; and if the pope permit, in France itself, that a divorce should be made, it is but a toleration, and not this neither, but where it is, consuetudo generalis Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ; which if you will apply unto this cause in question, you must shew me, that in England it hath been a general custom, that a nullity in marriage may be pronounced 'propter impotentiam versus hanc;' which if you cannot shew, as indeed you cannot, nor give any true example that ever hath been of any such separation within this church, I may both in law and conscience conclude, that I dare not introduce any novelty, and so consequently pronounce for the nullity of this marriage. Many things are done in France, whereof if we in England had the examination, we should, peradventure, find the fact different from that which they conceived; or if we agree in the fact, we should give another sentence. It is not unknown how, within the space of one year, there hath been much ado in France about two women, Magdalen and Louyse, pretended to be possessed with a great many devils, and how Verrine, a principal spirit in one of them, hath avowed and maintained the mass, invocation of saints, adoration of images, and a great many other points of the grossness of popery; and a book hereof hath been printed and reprinted in Paris, with the approbation of the state, and allowance of learned men; in which the church of England would certainly dissent, and proclaim the whole business to be but an imposture; as the very like was in the days of queen Elizabeth, when the devils of Denham were said to possess Sarah Williams and her sister, and some other persons; and much ado was made of it, and divers fond people believing those knacks, turned papists thereupon; yet the issue of all was, that it proved no better than a shameful delusion, and a great abusing of credulous and light-believing persons.

3. But now to proceed farther; If it shall be said, it is not the novelty, nor the want of custom here in England, which should prejudice the truth; nuleat veritas wheresoever or whensoever it appears: The Proofs are evident whereupon we do stand, and that will enforce the sentence. My answer thereunto is, Let that be made manifest, and clear, and perspicuous unto the conscience of an understanding man, and I shall concur with you: But how shall I find this in a matter of this quality? Because it is nothing else but truth which we do aim at, it were fit that all probations, if not which are possibly, yet at the least which reasonably may be had, should be got together to enforce a conclusion of this consequence. My books tell me, 'In valore matrimonii investigando quæcunque probationes possibles adhibendæ sunt, et potius debent esse superflue quàm diminutæ.' It is Solomon's saying, Prov. xxv. It is the honour of a king to find out a thing. And wherein can judges bestow their time better in a point of difficulty, than to search and search again, by all honest and good means, to know what is the bottom of that which lieth secret, that they may satisfy their own conscience, and the conscience of others, in the sentence which they give, and leave no kind of scruple, which may trouble their own thoughts; Whether these things have been done in this present case, I appeal to your own consciences; whether the writers do not mention divers things; whether the counsel for my lord have not spoke of sundry matters; whether we that be the judges, have not thought of divers courses convenient to be held; of all which no piece or parcel hath been permitted unto us. The proofs then which we have had, do arise only out of the depositions, and if there be not proof sufficient where shall we seek for it: Let us then consider them. I will tell you my opinion of them. I find nothing in them all, which is not in substance contained in the Answers of my lord of Essex: A noble personage saith, That in the hearing of divers things, the earl hath said, that he was not able to know his lady carnally; the earl thinking this to be true. But this is but a relation of wonder spoken extrajudicially; and therefore, for the understanding of the truth therein, we are to have recourse unto that, which by the said earl is judicially deposed. Divers witnesses do speak, that the earl and the lady have lived and lain together for divers years; my lord doth acknowledge it in his answer; the matrons and midwives do declare, that in their judgment my lady is a virgin, and therefore, that she was never known carnally by the earl; himself confesseth that he did never know her. So that now, all in substance depending upon his lordships answer, it ought to be our labour to scan that exactly, and to judge of it circumspectly. Doth not he then say, in responsione ad quartum, That though divers times, in the first year of their cohabitation, he did attempt to know her, (which divers times may be twice or thrice, and no more) yet in the two latter years he did never attempt it? But doth he not say plainly, responsione ad tertium, That since the time of his marriage, he had not, nor hath any sickness or impediment to hinder him, but that he might have had, and may have, carnal knowledge with a woman? This is for the general, that he hath no impediment: But, in responsione ad quintum, doth he not descend more particularly unto his own lady: that it is true that he did never carnally know the said lady Frances? Mark now what followeth; but that to the act of carnal copulation he did not find any defect in himself. Indeed he was not able to penetrate into her body; but he layeth the fault of that upon her, as may be seen in his answer unto the 7th article. And it may not be forgotten, that in the end of the answer to the 4th article, he saith, That sometimes she refused him. These things are evident, and cannot be denied. The only matter which maketh shew against this is, that he acknowledgeth that he hath lain by her, and hath had no motion to have carnal knowledge of her; but especially, that in the end of his answer unto the 6th article, "And believeth he never shall." These words are the shield and buckler of the contrary part; but how easily do they vanish away, or fall to the ground! For I appeal unto you all, who were present at the examinations, (and those were ten of us in number, who now sit here present) whether the earl did not openly subjoin that to his answer; "When I came out of France, I did love her; but I do not so now, neither ever shall I." I appeal unto the conscience of you all, except my lord of Winton, and my lord of Rochester, who were not then commissioners; whether this be so or no: Here then is the matter, it is the want of love, which restraineth all motions of carnal concupiscence, and not any impotency; it is defectus voluntatis, and not defectus potestatis. Let discontentment be removed, and there will be an end of all the inability: Married men best know these things; but out of common reason, there can be no great longing, where there is no great liking: many things they say fall out between man and wife, that for some good space of time there is no carnal conjunction, and yet no impotency concluded thereby may be. The case is famous of Pulcheria, sister unto the emperor Theodosius the younger, who having vowed virginity, was notwithstanding afterward, for great reason of state, thought fit to be married unto Martianus, who thereupon was chosen emperor; she would not condescend thereunto, till she had promise from him, that her virginity should be preserved, and with such a promise he did marry her; so that they lived together in shew as man and wife, but indeed as a brother and a sister. Our stories do make mention, that he who was called saint Edward in England, I mean king Edward the confessor, did marry a lady, the knowledge of whose body he never had, neither did this wedded couple ever endeavour to break their virginity. The writers do declare no other reason hereof, but that they had an opinion, that to live in virginity was the more meritorious, according to the superstition of those times. Now were it not a strange argument, to conclude in this manner, that because Martianus had not conjugal copulation with Pulcheria, therefore he was a man impotent; or, because king Edward had not carnal knowledge of his wife, therefore he could not know her? I know the circumstances of this present question do differ from those, but the ground of the argument is the same. Want of act, upon private reason, will never enforce a want of power. And this is our case, as I understand it, which maketh me unwilling to consent to this nullity.

4. There followeth now another argument, which I shall deliver briefly. We have always agreed, that the chapter in the law which containeth our case, is the chapter 'Litra de Frigidis et Maleficiatis;' for if it be not there, it is no where to be found. When we have delivered many things appertaining to this cause out of the best writers of the former ages, or of our own time; as that my lord should be inspected, or that physicians should use their art to discern and remove impotency, if any were to be found, or that fasting, prayer, and alms, should be exercised to overcome this evil, and divers other points of like nature; it hath still been answered to us, So say the interpreters, but it is not in the law; or it is in the decrees which bind not, but it is not in the decretals; or it is a counsel and exhortation, but it is no mandate or injunction. I now therefore mention something, which is in the law, and in the very body of this law, and it is the Pope's mandate; and that is, that my lord should have given his jugamentum cum septima manu, as well as my lady: for want whereof, the whole proceeding is annulled. This is the pope's commandment, 'Quocirca mandamus;' and it requireth the oath of both, 'ipsis cum septima propinquorum manu firmitibus juramento, se commiseri carnaliter nequivisse,' then 'proferatis divortii sententiam inter eos.' This is a thing so clear, that when on Thursday last, by chance there fell mention of it; the counsel for my lady (Dr. Stuart and Dr. Bird) were so far from giving answer to it, that to speak plainly, they stood as men blasted or blighted with lightning, and knew not which way to turn them: as was manifest not only unto us, but to all the standers-by; which I do not utter to do them any wrong, for they are worthy men, both learned and faithful to the cause which they undertake; but the note is, that this objection can receive no true answer. I know, that since that time there hath been labour made, to give a salve to this sore, but no man's wit can do it. I said, and say still, that no man's loquence, neither any man's cloquence, can persuade me, that 'ipsis firmitibus juramento' is of the singular number. I know there hath been tumbling and turning of books, to find some shew to meet with this objection; but nothing can be found which will hold out this water. The proceeding therefore doth appear to be imperfect and defective in that, which is mainly required by the law, which makes me to conclude in this fashion against some imperfect speech touching my lord of Essex his affirming or denying of his own inability towards my lady; that either he doth confess it, or deny it: If he do acknowledge it, where is then his oath 'cum septima manu,' which the law imposeth? If he do deny it, where is then your proof of his inability, since you ground the whole substance of the nullity upon his lordship's answer, That he could not know her carnally?

I must yet crave patience to go a little farther. One other exception which I take unto this nullity, is the manner of the sentence, which by us is to be given, which hath ever been resolved should be in general, not expressing any reason particular wherefore we do give it. To say that my lord is 'impotens in genere versus hanc,' and not to tell wherein, is to propound a riddle to the world, which no man understandeth. It were a strange thing in learning to say, that such a creature is animal, and not to tell whether it be a man, or a horse, or a fish, or a bird. And although it hath been said, and strongly maintained (by sir Julius Caesar and sir Daniel Don), 'That it is enough in a sentence to pronounce a thing in general, and that the judge is bound to give no reason of it;' yet I would be glad to know whether, howsoever I will conceal the particular reason from the hearers or standers-by, yet were it not fit, that I who am the judge, and must give the sentence, or at least consent unto it, should know the ground whereupon I do give it? Give me leave to speak my conscience; I think a sentence, 'propter latens aliquod impedimentum,' which is 'perpetuum et incurabile versus hanc,' is nothing but a device to serve a present turn, which we must deliver in such obscure words, to blind posterity that comes after, and to amuse those which will enquire into it, as if we had known something which we held not fit to utter, when in truth we know nothing. I find the texts of the law do still set down the reason, and give a case particular, as frigidity, or section, or unfitness of the generative part, or some such other matter; but for an inability, 'propter latens impedimentum,' my dullness is such, that in the whole book I cannot discover: And it is a mystery that cannot enter into me, how a man should be potent unto other women, and impotent to his wife, if it be not in case of pluresny; which is not 'latens impedimentum,' and which also findeth ' lucida intervalla.' It was the assertion of him in the law, (Cap. Litteræ) ' That he did not know his wife, but that he had a power to know other women.' But what wise man doth believe him? Or what is there in the text which doth declare it to be true? I will end this point with that of our Saviour in the 29th of St. Matthew, That there are three sorts of Eunuchs, or men unfit to marry; the one is of God's making, the second is of men's making, and the third is of their own making. The first are they that are past from their mother's belly, who either are frigidi, or such as have not members fit for generation, or some apparent debility. The second are those who are castrated by men, or by some violence have that hindred in them, whereunto by nature they are fit in respect of procreation. I will not here dispute that idle maleficium, because yourselves are flown from it. The third hath no coherence with this nobleman. Let me know then, in which of the former two you do place it. Is he past from his mother's womb? Why then do you give him leave to marry again, that he who hath deluded and frustrated one, may also delude another? If he be in the second rank, why do you not tell us what the violence is which he had sustained from men, or from any other creature? Let us have, I pray you, some kind of satisfaction, and let not this enigma in general blind us, lest the world should say, that wilfully we shut our eyes against the truth.

6. One reason I have more, why I yield not to this nullity, and then I have done. It is drawn from the inconveniences which will follow thereupon, if we dissolve the matrimony in such case as is now desired. I look first on the detriment and harm which will follow, if the marriage do continue in force and in vigour, and I do find, that all the inconvenience doth redound but to one person. Between a lady and her husband there is some discontentment, which time and God's grace may easily remove: There is then an end of that controversy. Or, if the disagreement shall never be appeased, it is no more but one lady doth want that solace which marital conjunction would afford unto her; which many a good woman is enforced to endure, and yet commits no sin, neither labours to violate the laws of the church: For suppose the husband be sick of some long disease, or languishing weakness, must not the wife sustain it with patience and quietness? Suppose the husband be captive in some foreign nation, or prisoner in his own country, whereby occasion of marital connexion is taken from the wife, no divine will pronounce, that a separation is in this case to be sought. Let a woman do that in modesty, which others are enforced to do out of necessity; and let her expect God's leisure, in fasting and in prayer, and in other humiliation. This is all the inconvenience which ariseth to one person, if she have not the performance of conjugal duty.

But look on the other side, what are the incongruities, or other absurdities, which will easily follow, if such dissolutions of marriages be permitted. I will name only two. The first is the hazard of violating and annulling of marriage by an ordinary practice; for if the gap be open, who will not run in? And the judge must dispense the law indifferently to all, if the proofs be accordingly; for we may not say, that it is for noble personages, and great peers in the state, and not for others of inferior rank. Whatsoever couple therefore have no children, and live discontented, come presently to take part of this general jubilee: And albeit they know in their consciences, that it which they attempt is unlawful; yet, to satisfy their fancy, they will collude the one with the other, and enter a prosecution secretly agreed upon, howsoever in open shew they seem to differ the one from the other: And who can doubt, but for money or favour, they may procure wickednesses, and others who are to be used by the formality of the law, to testify and depose so much as serves the turn? By which means we are at a fair pass, when not only the marriage-bed shall be defiled, and adulteries made frequent, which is against the second table of the law, but perjury shall be committed, and God's name taken in vain, which is repugnant unto the first table.

A second inconvenience is the danger, lest both parties which are freed from their matrimony, should divers years after be returned to it again, when perhaps the husband by a second wife hath children, and the wife by a second husband hath store of issue also; for there is no doubt in the law, but if a man supposed to be frigidus, and therefore divorced, shall afterwards marry, and by begetting of children shew himself not to be impotent, but apt for generation, this man is to be taken from his second woman, and returned to his first wife; and the woman for whose marriage a nullity was pronounced in respect of the insufficiency of her mate, must be now taken from her second companion, and returned to the first. Of this the reason is apparent, quia decepta est ecclesia; they adjudged him to be impotent upon wrong information, whom experience and truth hath declared to be potent. And what man can foretel, how variety of times may produce other judgments? There may be question of land or inheritance, of legitimation or illegitimation; and a wise man would be unwilling to bring it on the stage when he is dead and gone, and to make it the fable of the world, whether his children be born lawfully, or to be reputed in the rank of bastards. The world is subject to much mutability, and judges of future times may peradventure be led with the power of some great persons, and perhaps may think upon other considerations, that it is but a conceit, that a man should be potent unto another woman, and impotent to his wife; or that the common law doth not know any maleficium; or that they do not believe, that there may be ' latens impedimentum, perpetuum et incurabile versus hanc,' when they see that the husband is, in shew of the world, a lusty able man, and hath well proved his potency, by begetting three, or five, or seven, or ten children upon another woman. These are pretty things, if a man do well consider them, and will serve to make distraction between kinsman and kinsman, and make work for the lawyers, and keep the courts at Westminster that they shall not be idle; which if we could not learn otherwise, yet Bury's case before remembered doth teach us, who was divorced from his wife in the third or fourth year of queen Elizabeth; and when his brother had enjoyed his land until the fortieth year of the said queen, then was he thrust out of it, and the questioned son, or his heir, was put into possession of it by trial of law; a great deal of money being spent in that contention, and both civilians and common lawyers in great numbers were entertained of both sides; and yet the controversy was not so appeased, but that of my certain knowledge, within these three years it had been raised again, and a strong device was laid how to bring this about again; only myself withstood it, and would not give way unto it, when I was divers times consulted thereabout; conceiving very well that it would not be long before some prohibition would come out of some of the king's courts, because the common law disliked, that men's inheritance, especially after judgments, should be disturbed, when the parties whom most of all it concerned, are dead long before, and cannot answer for themselves; whereas, peradventure, if themselves had been living, they could have answered that for themselves which other men knew not. And there ought to be a settled course in all things appertaining to inheritance.

By this time, I hope you see, that it is not out of wilfulness, or prejudicate conceit, that I have impugned this nullity, but out of ground of reason, and out of scruple of conscience, which is it that must accuse me, or excuse me before the ever-living God. I know you have heard what other men have said, and they have answered for themselves. Upon all which grounds I make this conclusion, That howsoever this matter of separation with great earnestness hath been pursued, yet it is the surer and the safer way to leave it as we find it, and in no case to dissolve it. I oft remember that saying, which is frequent among the canonists, 'Tolerabilius est aliquos contra statuta hominum dimittere copulatos, quam conjunctos legitime contra statuta Domini separare.' That concerneth us who be the judges; and for the parties themselves, who perhaps can be content to be severed, and to marry elsewhere, let them know this from me, that they may best expect a blessing from God when they live in that state where fewest scruples shall arise in their mind: From which whether they shall be free in leaving their old conjunction, and betaking themselves unto a new, I refer to their wiser thoughts, when in all probability, if any cross or thwart shall arise in their new-intended matrimony, this perplexity and anguish will still follow their souls, that they have done that whercof in their truest meditations they have no ground of conscience, and therefore that it is the hand of God upon them, who giveth not a blessing unto that which was unduly sought.

You have thus at large heard my opinion against the annulment of this marriage. Now, if you ask me, What would you then have done concerning this couple of noble personages? My answer is, That I would have a reconciliation by all means to be laboured; and although that be difficult to bring about, yet it is the more honour when it is effected. Charity will forgive and forget the highest offences. It is St. Augustine's judgment, "That in the greatest breaches between man and wife, reconciliation is the best; and the worthiest pains that can be bestowed, is to bring that about." There wanteth only one or more good mediators, and then great things will be compassed. The disagreement was unconceivable between God and man, yet Christ, that great mediator, did take it away. The breach was very bitter between England and Spain, yet our most blessed sovereign, as a gracious intercessor, did give an end unto it. Let devices be used now, as much as lawyers have been used heretofore. Take the goodly counsel of the one, which will be given freely, as you have taken the advice of the other with much expence of money. This I wish for, this I pray for; and if my counsel had been used, before things grew to this height, I would have used my best means to have wrought an atonement. But because there is no hope thereof, and this doth expect a legal decision, proceed you that please unto this separation. Give your sentence in scriptis as you have declared your opinion in verbis. Five might have served the turn by the words of the Commission, if seven had dissented; but you have seven suffrages, and therefore proceed; only this I crave of the register, that he do make his act, that this sentence is given, Joanne Episcopo London.; D. Joanne Bennet milite; D. Francisco James; D. Thomas Edwards; dissentientibus, potissimum verò Georgio Archiepiscopo Cantauriensi renitente.

This is the substance of that matter which the Archbishop of Canterbury, out of certain Notes which he had drawn up, was ready to have uttered, and no one material point is added thereunto, as appeareth unto me, the writer hereof, comparing it with the Notes at such time as I ended the writing of this, which was on the 28th Sept. 1613, three days after the time when it should have been spoken.

THE KING'S LETTER to the Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

My Lord; After I had received, and read your papers, which the bishop of Litchfield brought me, I found it very necessary that I should make answer therunto at my first leisure: for whereas, before, at my last meeting with you, ye seemed to me to be only as yet unresolved what sentence to give in this business, till you had heard it thoroughly disputed, that by that means ye might be fully informed of the state of the cause; it appears now by these papers, that you have, after your last day's consultation, put on a negative resolution, grounded upon fundamentals of divinity and conscience, as you think, which hath moved me to send you herewith my judgment upon your arguments, in regard that I did ever hold it necessary, that in a matter of this weight all my commissioners should be as near of one mind, as might be; and therefore I would be sorry that your private conceits should so blind your judgment, as to make you and your followers draw the catharrows (perplex or torment) against your yoke-fellows; for that I may now open plainly my heart unto you, at my first reading of your papers from the bishop, I chanced to cast mine eye first upon the paper of your arguments, before I had looked upon your letter, and lighting upon your first words, 'Inasmuch as we do firmly believe, &c.' I protest I thought it had been some strange confession of faith, that you had intercepted amongst some of the sectaries; but when I had read out the rest of that first article, God is my judge, I thought that paper had been some pasquil made against this divorce, which coming to your hands ye had sent me, and therefore without reading any farther therein, I looked upon your letter, which resolved me of all these doubts; but after that I had fully perused, and rightly considered of all your papers, I found your principles so strange, and your doubts so far sought, that I thought it necessary, as I have already said, to set down unto you my observations upon them. But to conclude my letter with that plainness that becometh one of my quality, I must freely confess, that I find the grounds of your opposition so weak, as I have reason to apprehend, that the prejudice you have of the persons is the greatest motive of breeding these doubts into you; which prejudice is the most dangerous thing that can fall in a judge for misleading of his mind. And the reason moving me to this apprehension, is partly grounded upon your last words to me at your parting from Windsor, and partly upon a line scraped out in your paper of doubts: for I am sure you think me not so blunt a secretary, but that I can read a line so scraped out. In your last speeches with me, you remember you told me what assurance you had of the earl's ability out of his own mouth, which you said you could not but trust, because he was so religious a nobleman. But when I told you of the other party's contrary affirmation, you remember how you used the word of iniquity; and how far your interlined line seems to have a harmony with this word, yourself can best judge. Now then, if I would ask you what proof you have of the one's religion more than the other's, you must answer me, by judging upon the exterior; and how deceivable that guess is, daily experience teaches us.—But with a holy protestation that I never knew any thing but good in the young earl. Was not this the ground of master Robert Bruse's incredulity, because he knew the earl of Gowry to be truly religious; and did not beg a register. See Bothwell in his preface of his book 'De viris illustribus.' And as for your judgment of the other party, Christ's precept is the best answer unto you, 'Nolite judicare.' But if the question were to judge of the earl's inclination, whether is it likely that you or I could best judge of it; I, he having been bred with my late son, and served him so long; or you, that never spoke with him but once or twice in your life, and never knew either good or evil of him but out of his own mouth? I will conclude, therefore, with inverting the argument; that if a judge should have a prejudice in respect of persons, it should become you rather to have a kind of faith implicit in my judgment, as well in respect of some skill I have in divinity, as also that I hope no honest man doubts of the uprightness of my conscience; and the best thankfulness that you that are so far my creature, can use towards me, is, to reverence and follow my judgment, and not to contradict it, except where you may demonstrate unto me that I am mistaken, or wrong informed; and so farewell. JAMES R.

97. The Earl of NORTHAMPTON'S Case: Mich. 10 JAMES I. A. D. 1613. [Coke's Reports, 132.]

THE Attorney-general informed against Tho. Gooderick, gent. sir Richard Cox, kt. Hen. Vernon, gent. Henry Minors, serjeant of the waggons, Tho. Lake, gent. and James Ingram, merchant, ore tenus in the Star-chamber, the last day of the Star-chamber, and charged Gooderick that he had spoken and published of the earl of Northampton, one of the grandees and peers of the realm, one of the king's Privy Council, lord Privy Seal, and lord guardian of the Cinque-ports, divers false and horrible scandals, scil. that more Jesuits, Papists, &c. have come into England, since the earl of Northampton was guardian of the Cinque-ports, than before.

2. That the said earl had writ a book openly against Garnet, &c. but secretly he had writ a letter to Bellarmine, intimating that he writ the said book 'ad placandum regem, sive ad 'faciendum [placendum] populum,' and requested that his book might not be answered; and that the archbishop of Canterbury had certified it to the king, and that the said Gooderick did relate it to one Dewsbury, a bachelor in divinity, who had acquainted the said earl with it. Gooderick being examined, confessed the words spoken; but to extenuate his offence said that he was not the first founder: and he vouched the said sir Richard Cox, who confessed that he related to Gooderick the matter concerning the book of the earl, and his letter to Bellarmine, but not the words concerning the Cinque-ports; and that the archbishop of Canterbury had informed the king of it, to the intent that the earl of Northampton should not be lord treasurer, and to extenuate his offence, he vouched the said Vernon, who upon examination confessed that which Richard Cox had published, but that he was not the first author, but he cited the said Luke, who did likewise confess what Vernon had said, but that he heard it from serjeant Nichols, who being examined confessed it; and with all, that one Speake related it to him, and that he had heard it from one James Ingram, and James Ingram being examined, confessed the words concerning the said book of the earl, and of the letter to Bellarmine; and that in the month of October he heard the said words of two English fugitives at Leghorn, and never did publish them until the death of the earl of Salisbury, treasurer, who died in May last: and all the said defendants confessed at the bar, all that with which they were charged, and at the hearing of this case were eleven judges of law, Fleming justice being absent propter aegritudinem.

And so it was resolved, that the publishing of false rumours, either concerning the king, or of the high grandees of the realm, was in some cases punished by the common law: but of this were divers opinions. Yet it was resolved in general:

1. Touching the matter and quality of the words: 2. Touching the persons of whom they are spoke. 3. The manner of contrivance, or publishing of them. 4. Touching the punishment, for which cause divers acts have made declaration, and have put things in certainty.

And first of all, as to the words or rumours themselves.

1. They ought to be false and horrible. 2. Of which discord or slander may arise betwixt the king and his people, or the grandees of the realm, West. 2. cap. 24, or between the lords and commons, 2 R. 2, c. 53, by which great peril and mischief may come to all the realm. Ib. The subversion and destruction of the realm. ibidem. And for this the said act of 2 R. 2, against rumours, false and horrible messages (mesoignes) i. e. lies.*

2. As to persons, they are declared to be prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and other nobles and grandees of the realm, and also of the chancellor, treasurer, clerk of the privy seal, steward of the household of our sovereign lord the king, justice of the one bench and of the other, or of any the great officers of the realm' at 2 R. 2, c. 5, and the king is contained within the act of West. 1. cap. 34, as appears in Dyer 5. Mar. 155.

3. As to the third point it was resolved, that if one hear such false and horrible rumours, either of the king, or of any of the said grandees, it is not lawful for him to relate to others, that he hath heard J. S. to say such false and horrible words; for if it should be lawful, by this means they may be published generally, &c. And this doth appear by the said statute, viz. that the party shall be imprisoned until he find out the party who spoke them, which proves that it was an offence, or otherwise he should not be punished for it by fine (for this is implied) and imprisonment.

4. It was also resolved, that the offenders at bar, if against them the proceedings had been by indictment upon these statutes, no judgment could be had against them that they should be imprisoned until they found their author: for, for example, Gooderick did not relate to Dewsbury that he heard from sir Richard Cox, but he related the same words as of himself: and for this no judgment can be given against him, that he shall be imprisoned until he find his author; for this that he ought to be indicted for the words which he himself did speak, and then, 'de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio.' When the indictment is general without any relation to a certain author, the judgment, which always ought to be given of matter apparent within the record, cannot be that he shall be imprisoned, until he hath found his author.

And it was resolved, that if A. say to B. "did you not hear that C. is guilty of treason," &c. this is tantamount to a scandalous publication: and in a private action for slander of a common person, if J. S. publish that he hath heard J. N. say, that J. G. was a traitor or thief; in an action of the case, if the truth be such, he may justify.

But if J. S. publish that he hath heard generally without a certain author, that J. G. was a traitor or thief, there an action sur le case lieth against J. S. for this, that he hath not given to the party grieved any cause of action against any, but against himself who published the words, although that in truth he might hear them; for otherwise this might tend to a great slander of an innocent: for if one who hath lesam phantasiam, or who is a drunkard, or of no estimation, speak scandalous words, if it should be lawful for a man of credit to report them generally, that he had heard scandalous words, without mentioning of his author, that would give greater colour and probability that the words were true in respect of the credit of the reporter, than if the author himself should be mentioned, for the reputation and good name of every man is dear and precious to him: and a record was vouched in Mich. 33 and 34 Ed. and in the 30 Ass. pl. 10, and in the exchequer, Mich. 18 E. 1, rot. 4.

Note, that all the Commissions of Oyer and Terminer give authority to enquire, 'de illicitis verborum prolationibus.' Vide le stat. 5 R. 2, cap. 6, and 17 R. 2, cap. 8, concerning rumours, and in 3 Ed. 2, in the exchequer, Henry Bray spoke of John Foxlee baron of the exchequer: it was resolved, that the judgment in an indictment upon the said statutes, when the words are spoken generally, without relation to a certain author, is, that the offender shall be fined and imprisoned, for this is implied and included in the said statutes, as an incident to the offence, although that it is not expressed. Also the party grieved may have an action 'de scandalo magnatum,' and recover his damages. Also the party grieved, and the king's attorney, if the offenders deny it, may exhibit a bill in the Star-chamber against the offender, in which the king shall have a fine, and the party shall be imprisoned, and the court of Star-chamber may inflict corporal punishment, as to stand upon the pillory, and to have papers about his head.

And if the offenders confess it, then to proceed ore tenus upon their own confession; and for the publication of the said words, all the defendants were punished by all the presence, 'una voce nullo contradicente,' by fines and imprisonments; and Gooderick and Ingram were fined the most, for that Gooderick had no authority for the words concerning the Cinqueports, nor could Ingram find any author for to vouch, that he heard by persons unknown at Leghorn in foreign parts; and therefore it was taken as a fiction of his own.

98. Proceedings against Dr. RICHARD NEILE, Bishop of Lincoln, for Words spoken in the House of Lords: 12 JAMES, A. D. 1614.* [1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1259.]

ON May 28, 1614, a Message from the House of Commons was sent up to the Lords, by sir Edw. Hobby and others, in these words:

"That at such time as the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament sent up to the Lords a Message, praying a Conference with their lordships about Impositions: they hoped that, neither out of the words' nor matter of the Message, it had been possible to have framed any sinister or unworthy construction. That notwithstanding, by public and constant fame, they had heard, to their heart's grief, that one in this place and within these walls, namely, the lord bishop of Lincoln (Richard Neile), in order to dissuade the Lords from a Conference so desired, as aforesaid, did use words to the effect following, or the same words, viz. 'That the matter, whereof conference was by that house desired, is a noli me tangere; in conferring, also, that the taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy is an impediment; so, as whoso had taken the said oaths might not enter, safely, into conference of the said matter. Affirming farther, That it did strike, not at a branch, but at the root of the prerogative of the imperial crown; and that he doubted lest in such a Conference, as was desired, there would, from some of the committees of that house, proceed some undutiful and seditious speeches, unfit for their lordships to hear, tending to a dangerous rent and distraction of both houses, and to make an alienation between the king and his subjects.' That of such scandal their house is so sensible, that they have sent these messengers to signify their grief, and that they held the Lords so honourable, that they cannot but also take notice thereof. Wherefore, that house did desire that their lordships will join with them in some course to give them satisfaction for so great a wrong done to the Commons; which they have taken so to heart, that they have determined to forbear all parliament matter, until they may

* The following story, printed in the account of Waller the poet's Life, 1712, and repeated by Harris in his Life of James 1, and also by Hume in his History, and Johnson in his Life of Waller, throws some light on this bishop's character. "Waller frequented the Court of James 1, where he heard a very remarkable conversation, which the writer of the Life prefixed to his Works, who seems to have been well informed of facts, though he may sometimes err in chronology, has delivered as indubitably certain: He found Dr. Andrews, bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Neale, bishop of Durham, standing behind his majesty's chair; and there happened something extraordinary, continues this writer, in the conversation those prelates had with the king, on which Mr. Waller did often reflect. His majesty asked the bishops, 'My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money, when I want it, without all this formality of parliament?' 'The bishop of Durham readily answered, 'God forbid, sir, but you should: you are the breath of our nostrils.' Whereupon the king turned and said to the bishop of Winchester, 'Well, my lord, what say you?' 'Sir,' replied the bishop, 'I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases.' The king answered, 'No put-offs, my lord; answer me presently.' 'Then, Sir,' said he, 'I think it is lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money; for he offers it.' Mr. Waller said, the company was pleased with this answer, and the wit of it seemed to affect the king; for a certain lord coming in soon after, his majesty cried out, 'Oh, my lord, they say you lig with my lady —.' 'No, Sir,' says his lordship in confusion; 'but I like her company, because she has so much wit.' 'Why-then,' says the king, 'do you not lig with my lord of Winchester there?'

receive Answer from the Lords; wherein they doubt not but their lordships will deal nobly with them, and they desire it may be speedily."

Sir Edward Hobby being asked by the lord chancellor, Whether he had in writing the Message so delivered, as aforesaid? Answered, He had not. The lords then returned Answer, "That they had taken notice of the Message, and will take the same into further consideration, as the weight thereof requireth: wherein they will have respect both to their honours and the honour of the other house; and will send them further Answer." After this, a short Memorandum is entered on the Journals, intimating, That before the Answer, above specified, was agreed on, the serjeant of the Lower House came to the gentleman usher of the Lords, to learn, Whether their lordships would send Answer to the Message on that day, or not? To which the gentleman usher, with the privacy of the Lords, answered, as from himself, That he knew not.

May 30. The Lord Chancellor moved the house to consider and resolve of an Answer to be sent to the Message or Complaint, which they lately received from the other house, touching the bishop of Lincoln. And, by order, the archbishop of Canterbury produced a copy of one ready drawn, for that purpose, which being read, was to this effect: "That the Lords, having received from the Commons a Complaint against the bishop of Lincoln, have seriously entered into consideration of it, and do now return this Answer, That their lordships would take very tenderly that any unworthy aspersion should be laid on that body, which they so much respect; and with whom they desire to hold all good correspondence and agreement. But forasmuch as the Complaint seemeth to be grounded, not upon direct or certain proof, but only upon common public fame; their lordships do not think that Common Fame only is a sufficient ground, whereon they may proceed as in this cause is required. Nevertheless, their lordships are so respective of any thing that may concern that house, that when they shall be more certainly informed, in direct and express terms, what the words were wherein the lord bishop of Lincoln is to be charged, and how the same are to be proved, they will proceed therein so effectually, according to honour and justice, as it shall thereby well appear how careful they are to give to that house all good satisfaction in this business that may be, and to omit nothing that can be justly or lawfully done in that behalf." This Answer was approved on by the whole house, and sent in writing to the Commons, by messengers of their own; with this instruction, That if they, of the Lower House, should require to have the Paper, then the messengers were authorized to deliver the same, which they did accordingly.

May 31st. Another Message from the commons, brought by sir Roger Owen and others; who, having first repeated the substance of their lordships Answer of yesterday, acquainted this house: "That though the commons did not take common and public Fame to be a sufficient ground or proof, by a legal and ordinary course of justice, in proceeding against any man; yet they held it enough to induce the lords of that house to take the matter into consideration. And albeit they did not set down the words, in particular; yet was the matter, as they conceive, sufficiently laid down when in effect they said, "That the lord bishop of Lincoln, in this house to dissuade the lords from a Conference with them touching Impositions, termed the prerogative, &c. a noli me tangere; insinuating that the taking of the Oath of Supremacy and Allegiance did restrain a man from treating of that business: also he doubted but in the Conference would be used, or spoken, some undutiful and seditious words, not fit for their lordships to hear, or words to the like or worse effect. That now the Commons do desire the Lords, if these words were not spoken, so to signify it to the house; otherwise, if they were used, then they hope their lordships will do as they have promised. Lastly, from the Commons, he said further, That they knew not what other course they could have taken to bring this matter to examination, or otherwise have any undutiful speech which may be moved in either house, called in question."

After sir Roger Owen had delivered his Message, the lord chancellor asked him, If he had it in writing? To which he answered in the negative. The lord chancellor then acquainted him, That the house would take his message into consideration, and send Answer, if they could, before they rise: otherwise, will let them know as much. Accordingly, the same day, the lords sent to acquaint the other house, "That they had considered of their last Message, and, in debating thereupon, the lord bishop of Lincoln had humbly intreated that he might be heard to explain himself; which being granted unto him, he had made a solemn protestation, on his salvation, that he did not speak any thing with any evil intention to the House of Commons, which he doth with all hearty duty and respect highly esteem. Expressing, with many tears, his sorrow that his words were so misconceived and strained further than he ever intended them; and that his speech should occasion so much trouble to their lordships, or that the lower house should take offence at it. Which submissive and ingenuous behaviour of his, had given this satisfaction to their lordships, that, howsoever the words might sound, his intention was not as it hath been taken. And their lordships do assure the Commons, That if they had conceived the said bishop's words to have been spoken or meant to have cast any aspersion of sedition, or undutifulness unto their house, (as it seems, report has carried it to them) their lordships would forthwith have proceeded to the censuring and punishing thereof with all severity. Nevertheless, though their lordships have thought fit to signify their carefulness at this time to give them contentment, for the better expediting his majesty's great business, and to

* On this transaction Hume's observations are, "So little fixed at this time were the rules of parliament, that the commons complained to the peers of a speech made in the upper house by the bishop of Lincoln; which it belonged only to that house to censure, and which the other could not regularly be supposed to be acquainted with. These at least are the rules established since the parliament became a real seat of power, and scene of business. Neither the king must take notice of what passes in either house, nor either house of what passes in the other, till regularly informed of it. The retain all good correspondence with them; yet their lordships are of opinion, That hereafter no member of their house ought to be called in question, when there is no other ground for it, but public and common fame."* commons, in their famous protestation 1621, fixed this rule with regard to the king, though at present they would not bind themselves by it. But as liberty was yet new, those maxims which guard and regulate it were unknown and unpractised."—Concerning the sufficiency of Common Fame as a ground for parliamentary proceedings, see the Debates in the House of Commons in 1626 concerning the duke of Buckingham: 2 Cobb. ### 99. The Case of EDMUND PEACHAM, for Treason: 12 JAMES I.* A. D. 1615. [Croke Car. 125. Bacon's Works.]

THE Report of this Case is so extremely scanty, that it would not be inserted as a distinct article but for the important matters which arose out of the Case, and are here inserted after the Report; which is merely this:

"Edmund Peacham was indicted of Treason for divers treasonable passages in a Sermon which was never preached, nor intended to be preached, but only set down in writings, and found in his study: he was tried and found guilty, but not executed.—Note, That many of the Judges were of opinion, that it was not Treason."

The following passages relating to this Case are extracted from Birch's edition of Bacon's Works, and are all taken from lord Hailes's Memorials, &c. and Rawley's Resuscitatio:

INTERROGATORIES whereupon Peacham is to be examined.

Questions in general.

1. Who procured you, moved you, or advised you, to put in writing these traitorous slanders which you have set down against his majesty's person and government, or any of them?

2. Who gave you any advertisement or intelligence touching those particulars which are contained in your writings; as touching the sale of the crown lands, the deceit of the king's officers, the greatness of the king's gifts, his keeping divided courts, and the rest; and who hath conferred with you, or discoursed with you, concerning those points?

3. Whom have you made privy and acquainted with the said writings, or any part of them? and who hath been your helpers or confederates therein?

4. What use mean you to make of the said writings? was it by preaching them in sermon, or by publishing them in treatise? if in sermon, at what time, and in what place meant you to have preached them? if by treatise, to whom did you intend to dedicate, or exhibit, or deliver such treatise?

5. What was the reason, and to what end did you first set down in scattered papers, and after knit up, in form of a treatise or sermon, such a mass of treasonable slanders against the king, his posterity, and the whole state?

6. What moved you to write, the king might be stricken with death on the sudden, or within eight days, as Ananias or Nabal; do you know of any conspiracy or danger to his person, or have you heard of any such attempt?

7. You have confessed that these things were applied to the king; and that, after the example of preachers and chronicles, kings infirmities are to be laid open: this sheweth plainly your use must be to publish them, shew to whom and in what manner.

8. What was the true time when you wrote the said writings, or any part of them? and what was the last time you looked upon them, or perused them before they were found or taken?

9. What moved you to make doubt whether the people will rise against the king for taxes and oppressions? Do you know, or have you heard, of any likelihood or purpose of any tumults or commotion?

10. What moved you to write, that getting of the crown-land again would cost blood, and bring men to say, This is the heir, let us kill him? Do you know, or have you heard of any conspiracy or danger to the prince, for doubt of calling back the crown land.

11. What moved you to prove, that all the king's officers ought to be put to the sword? Do you know, or have you heard if any petition is intended to be made against the king's council and officers, or any rising of people against them?

12. What moved you to say in your writing, that our king, before his coming to the kingdom, promised mercy and judgment, but we find neither? What promise do you mean of, and wherein hath the king broke the same promise?

"Upon these Interrogatories, Peacham this day was examined before torture, in torture, between torture, and after torture; notwithstanding, nothing could be drawn from him, he still persisting in his obstinate and insensible denials, and former answers. To the King, concerning Peacham's Cause.

It may please your excellent majesty; It grieveth me exceedingly that your majesty should be so much troubled with this matter of Peacham, whose raging devil seemeth to be turned into a dumb devil. But although we are driven to make our way through questions, which I wish were otherwise, yet, I hope well, the end will be good. But then every man must put to his helping hand; for else I must say to your majesty, in this and the like cases, as St. Paul said to the centurion, when some of the mariners had an eye to the cock-boat, 'Except these stay in the ship ye cannot be safe.' I find in my lords great and worthy care of the business; and for my part, I hold my opinion and am strengthened in it by some records that I have found. God preserve your majesty. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. Jan. 21, 1614. [O. S.]

To the King, touching Peacham's Cause.

It may please your excellent majesty; This day in the afternoon was read your majesty's letters of direction touching Peacham; which because it concerneth properly the duty of my place, I thought it fit for me to give your majesty both a speedy and a private account thereof; that your majesty, knowing things clearly how they pass, may have the true fruit of your own wisdom and clear-seeing judgment in governing the business.

First, for the regularity which your majesty, as a master in business of estate, doth prudently prescribe in examining and taking examinations, I subscribe to it; only I will say for myself, that I was not at this time the principal examiner.

For the course your majesty directeth and commandeth for the feeling of the judges of the King's Bench, the several opinions, by distributing ourselves and enjoining secrecy; we did first find an encounter in the opinion of my lord Coke, who seemed to affirm, that such particular and, as he called it, auricular taking of opinions was not according to the custom of this realm; and seemed to divine, that his brethren would never do it. But when I replied, that it was our duty to pursue your majesty's directions, and it were not amiss for his lordship to leave his brethren to their own answers; it was so concluded: and his lordship did desire that I might confer with himself; and Mr. serjeant Montague was named to speak with justice Crook; Mr. serjeant Crew with justice Houghton; and Mr. Solicitor with justice Dodderidge. This done, I took my fellows aside, and advised that they should presently speak with the three judges, before I could speak with my lord Coke, for doubt of infusion; and that they should not in any case make any doubt to the judges, as if they mistrusted they would not deliver any opinion apart, but speak resolutely to them, and only make their coming to be, to know what time they would appoint to be attended with the papers. This sorted not amiss; for Mr. Solicitor came to me this evening, and related to me that he had found judge Dodderidge very ready to give opinion in secret; and fell upon the same reason which upon your majesty's first letter I had used to my lord Coke at the council-table; which was, that every judge was bound expressly by his oath, to give your majesty counsel when he was called; and whether he should do it jointly or severally, that rested in your majesty's good pleasure, as you would require it. And though the ordinary course was to assemble them, yet there might intervene cases, wherein the other course was more convenient. The like answer made justice Crook. Justice Houghton, who is a soft man, seemed desirous first to confer; alledging that the other three judges had all served the crown before they were judges, but that he had not been much acquainted with business of this nature.

We purpose therefore forthwith, they shall be made acquainted with the papers; and if that could be done as suddenly as this was, I should make small doubt of their opinions: and howsoever, I hope, force of law and precedent will bind them to the truth; neither am I wholly out of hope, that my lord Coke himself, when I have in some dark manner put him in doubt that he shall be left alone, will not continue singular. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. Jan. 27, 1614. [O. S.]

It may please your excellent majesty; I received this morning, by Mr. Murray, a message from your majesty, of some warrant and confidence that I should advertise your majesty of your business, wherein I had part: wherein I am first humbly to thank your majesty for your good acceptance of my endeavours and service, which I am not able to furnish with any other quality, save faith and diligence. For Peacham's case, I have, since my last letter, been with my lord Coke twice; once before Mr. Secretary's going down to your majesty, and once since, which was yesterday: at the former of which times I delivered him Peacham's papers: and at this latter the precedents, which I had with care gathered and selected: for these degrees and order the business required. At the former I told him that he knew my errand, which stood upon two points; the one to inform him of the particular case of Peacham's treasons, for I never gave it other word to him, the other, to receive his opinion to myself, and in secret, according to my commission from your majesty. At the former time he fell upon the same allegation which he had begun at the council-table; that judges were not to give opinion by fractions, but entirely according to the vote whereupon they should settle upon conference: and that this auricular taking of opinions, single and apart, was new and dangerous; and other words more vehement than I repeat. I replied in civil and plain terms, that I wished his lordship, in my love to him, to think better of it: for that this, that his lordship was pleased to put into great words, seemed to me and my fellows, when we spake of it amongst ourselves, a reasonable and familiar matter, for a king to consult with his judges, either assembled or selected, or one by one. And then to give him a little out-let to save his first opinion, wherewith he is most commonly in love, I added, that judges sometimes might make a suit to be spared for their opinion, till they had spoken with their brethren; but if the king upon his own princely judgment, for reason of estate, should think it fit to have it otherwise, and should so demand it, there was no declining: nay, that it touched upon a violation of their oath, which was to counsel the king, without distinction whether it were jointly or severally. Thereupon, I put him the case of the privy counsel, as if your majesty should be pleased to command any of them to deliver their opinion apart and in private; whether it were a good answer to deny it, otherwise than if it were propounded at the table. To this he said, that the cases were not alike, because this concerned life. To which I replied, that questions of estate might concern thousands of lives, and many things more precious than the life of a particular: as war and peace, and the like. To conclude, his lordship tanquam critum querens, desired me for the time to leave with him the papers, without pressing him to consent to deliver a private opinion till he had perused them. I said I would; and the more willingly, because I thought his lordship, upon due consideration of the papers, would find the case to be so clear a case of treason, as he would make no difficulty to deliver his opinion in private; and so I was persuaded of the rest of the judges of the king's bench, who likewise, as I partly understood, made no scruple to deliver their own opinion in private; whereunto he said, which I noted well, that his brethren were wise men, and that they might make a shew as if they would give an opinion, as was required; but the end would be that it would come to this: they would say, they doubted of it, and so pray advice with the rest. But to this I answered, that I was sorry to hear him say so much, lest, if it came so to pass, some that loved him not might make a construction, that that which he had foretold, he had wrought. Thus your majesty sees, that as Solomon saith, 'gressus volentis tanquam in sepi spinarum', it catcheth upon every thing. The latter meeting is yet of more importance; for then, con-

ing armed with divers precedents, I thought to set in with the best strength I could, and said that before I descended to the record, I would break the case to him thus: that it was true we were to proceed upon the ancient statute of king Edward the 3rd, because other temporary statutes were gone; and therefore it must be said in the indictment, 'Imaginatus est et compassavit mortem et finalem destructionem domini regis': then must the particular treasons follow in this manner, namely, 'et quod ad perimplendum nefandum propositum suum, composuit et conscripsit quendam detestabilem et venenosum libellum, sive scriptum, in quo, inter alia proditoria, continetur, &c.' And then the principal passages of treason, taken forth of the papers, are to be entered in hac verba; and with a conclusion in the end, 'Ad intentionem quod ligeus populus et veri subditi domini regis cordialem suum amorem à domino rege retraherent, et ipsum dominum regem selinquerent, et guerram et insurrectionem contra eum levarent et facerent, &c.' I have in this form followed the ancient stile of the indictments for brevity sake, though when we come to the business itself, we shall enlarge it according to the use of the latter times. This I represented to him, being a thing he is well acquainted with, that he might perceive the platform of that was intended, without any mistaking or obscurity. But then I fell to the matter itself, to lock him in as much as I could, namely, That there be four means or manners, whereby the death of the king is compassed and imagined. The first by some particular fact or plot. The second, by disabling his title; as by affirming, that he is not lawful king; or that another ought to be king; or that he is an usurper; or a bastard; or the like. The third, by subjecting his title to the pope; and thereby making him of an absolute king a conditional king. The fourth, by disabling his regiment, and making him appear to be incapable or indigne to reign. These things I relate to your majesty in sum, as is fit: which, when I opened to my lord, I did insist a little more upon, with more efficacy and edge, and authority of law and record, than I can now express. Then I placed Peacham's treason within the last division, agreeable to divers precedents, whereof I had the records ready; and concluded, that your majesty's safety and life and authority was thus by law incompassed and quartered; and that it was in vain to fortify on three of the sides, and so leave you open on the fourth.

It is true, he heard me in a grave fashion more than accustomed, and took a pen and took notes of my divisions; and when he read the precedents and records, would say, this you mean falleth within your first, or your second, division. In the end I expressly demanded his opinion, as that whereto both he and I were enjoined. But he desired me to leave the precedents with him, that he might advise upon them. I told him the rest of my fellows would dispatch their part, and I should be behind with mine; which I persuaded myself your majesty would impute rather to his backwardness than my negligence. He said, as soon as I should understand that the rest were ready, he would not be long after with his opinion. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. Jan. 31, 1614. [O. S.]

“ For Peacham, the rest of my fellows are ready to make their report to your majesty at such time, and in such manner, as your majesty shall require it. Myself yesterday took my lord Coke aside, after the rest were gone, and told him all the rest were ready, and I was now to require his lordship's opinion, according to my commission. He said, I should have it; and repeated that twice or thrice, as thinking he had gone too far in that kind of negative, to deliver any opinion apart, before; and said, he would tell it me within a very short time, though he were not that instant ready. I have tossed this business in omnes partes, whereof I will give your majesty knowledge when time serveth. God preserve your majesty. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. Feb. 11, 1614. [O. S.]

It may please your excellent majesty; I send your majesty inclosed my lord Coke's answers; I will not call them rescripts, much less oracles. They are of his own hand, and offered to me as they are in writing; though I am glad of it for mine own discharge. I thought it my duty, as soon as I received them, instantly to send them to your majesty; and forbear, for the present, to speak farther of them. I, for my part, though this Muscovia weather be a little too hard for my constitution, was ready to have waited upon your majesty this day, all respects set aside; but my lord treasurer, in respect of the season and much other business, was willing to save me. I will only conclude touching these papers with a text, divided I cannot say, ‘Oportet isthæc fieri,’ but I may say, ‘Finis autem nondum.’ God preserve your majesty. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. 14 Feb. 1614. [O. S.]

Sir FRANCIS BACON, to King JAMES.

It may please your excellent majesty; I perceive by the bishop of Bath and Wells, that although it seemeth he hath dealt in an effectual manner with Peacham, yet he prevailleth little hitherto; for he hath gotten of him no new names, neither doth Peacham alter in his tale touching sir John Sydenham.

Peacham standeth off in two material points de novo.

The one, he will not yet discover into whose hands he did put his papers touching the consistory villainies. They were not found with the other bundles upon the search; neither did he ever say that he had burned or defaced them. Therefore it is like they are in some persons hands; and it is like again, that that person that he hath trusted with those papers, he likewise trusted with these others of the treasons, I mean with the sight of them.

The other, that he taketh time to answer, when he is asked, whether he heard not from Mr. Paulet some such words, as he saith, he heard from sir John Sydenham, or in some lighter manner.

I hold it fit, that myself and my fellows, go to the Tower, and so I purpose to examine him upon these points, and some others; at the least, that the world may take notice that the business is followed as heretofore, and that the stay of the trial is upon farther discovery, according to that we give out.

I think also it were not amiss to make a false fire, as if all things were ready for his going down to his trial, and that he were upon the very point of being carried down, to see what that will work with him.

Lastly I do think it most necessary, and a point principally to be regarded, that because we live in an age wherein no counsel is kept, and that it is true there is some bruit abroad, that the judges of the King's Bench do doubt of the case, that it should not be treason; that it be given out constantly, and yet as it were a secret, and so a fame to slide, that the doubt was only upon the publication, in that it was never published, for that (if your majesty marketh it) taketh away, or least qualifies the danger of the example; for that will be no man's case.

This is all I can do to thridd your majesty's business with a continual and settled care, turning and returning, not with any thing in the world, save only the occasions themselves, and your majesty's good pleasure. God preserve your majesty. Your majesty's most humble and devoted subject and servant, FR. BACON. Feb. 28, 1614. [O. S.]

Sir FRANCIS BACON to King JAMES.

May it please your majesty; I send your majesty inclosed a copy of our last examination of Peacham, taken the 10th of this present, whereby your majesty may perceive, that this miscreant wretch goeth back from all, and denieth his hand and all. No doubt, being fully of belief that he shall go presently down to his trial, he meant now to repeat his part which he purposed to play in the country, which was to deny all. But your majesty, in your wisdom, perceiveth, that this denial of his hand, being not possible to be counterfeited, and sworn to by Adams, and so oft by himself formally confessed and admitted, could not mend his case before any jury in the world, but rather aggravateth it by his notorious impudence and falsehood, and will make him more odious. He never deceived me; for when others had hopes of discovery, and thought time well spent that way, I told your majesty, ‘pereuntibus mille figuræ,’ and that he did but now turn himself into divers shapes, to save or delay his punishment. And therefore submitting myself to your majesty's high wisdom, I think myself bound, in conscience, to put your majesty in remembrance, whether sir John Sydenham shall be detained upon this man's impeaching, in whom there is no truth. Notwithstanding that further inquiry be made of this other person, and that information and light be taken from Mr. Paulet and his servants, I hold it, as things are, necessary. God preserve your majesty. Your majesty's most humble and devoted, &c. FR. BACON. March 12, 1614. [O.S.]

Being asked, when he was last at London, and where he lodged when he was there; he saith he was last at London after the end of the last parliament, but where he lodged, he knoweth not.

Being asked, with what gentlemen, or others in London, when he was here last, he had conference and speech with? he saith he had speech only with sir Maurice Berkeley, and that about the petitions only, which had been before sent up to him by the people of the country, touching the apparitors and the grievances offered the people by the court of the officials.

Being asked, touching one Peacham, of his name, what knowledge he had of him, and whether he was not the person that did put into his mind divers of those traitorous passages which are both in his loose and contexted papers? he saith this Peacham, of his name, was a divine, a scholar, and a traveller; and that he came to him some years past, the certainty of the time he cannot remember, and lay at this examinee's house a quarter of a year, and took so much upon him, as he had scarce the command of his own house or study; but that he would be writing, sometimes in the church, sometimes in the steeple, sometimes in this examinee's study; and now saith farther, that those papers, as well loose as contexted, which he had formerly confessed to be of his own hand, might be of the writing of the said Peacham; and saith confidently, that none of them are his own hand-writing or inditing; but whatsoever is in his former examinations, as well before his majesty's learned council, as before my lord of Canterbury, and other the lords and others of his majesty's privy-council, was wholly out of fear, and to avoid torture, and not otherwise.

Being required to describe what manner of man the said Peacham that lay at his house was; he saith that he was tall of stature, and can make no other description of him, but saith, as he taketh it, he dwelleth sometimes at Honslow as a minister; for he hath seen his letters of orders and licence under the hand of Mr. D. Chatterton, sometime bishop of Lincoln. He denieth to set his hand to this examination. Examinat' per FR. BACON, GER. HELWYSSE, RAN. CREWE, H. YELVERTON.

The true State of the Question, whether Peacham's Case be Treason or not.

In the hand-writing of king James.

The Indictment is grounded upon the statute of Edward the Third, that he compassed and imagined the king's death; the indictment then is according to the law, and justly founded. But how is it verified? First, then, I gather this conclusion, that since the indictment is made according to the prescription of law, the process is formal, the law is fulfilled, and the judge and jury are only to hearken to the verification of the hypothesis, and whether the miour be well proved or not.

That his writing of this libel is an overt act, the judges themselves do confess; that it was made fit for publication, the form of it bewrays the self; that he kept not these papers in a secret and safe facon, (manner) but in an open house and lidless cask, both himself and the messenger do confess; nay, himself confesseth, that he wrote them at the desire of another man, to whom he should have shown them when they had been perfected, and who craved an account for them, which though it be denied by the other party, worketh sufficiently against the deponer himself. Nay, he confesses, that in the end he meant to preach it; and though, for diminishing of his fault, he alledges, that he meant first to have taken all the bitterness out of it, that excuse is altogether absurd, for there is no other stuff in, or through it all but bitterness, which being taken out, it must be a quintessence of an alchimy spirit without a body, or popish accidents without a substance; and then to what end would he have published such a ghost, or shadow without substance, cui bono; and to what end did he so farce (stuff) it first with venom, only to scrape it out again; but it had been hard making that sermon to have tasted well, that was once so spiced, quo semel est imbuta recens, &c. But yet this very excuse is by himself overthrown again, confessing, that he meant to retain some of the most crafty malicious parts in it, as, &c. [So the manuscript.]

The only question that remains then is, whether it may be verified and proved, that, by the publishing of this sermon or rather libel of his he compassed or imagined the king's death: which I prove he did by this reason; had he compiled a sermon upon any other ground, or stuffed the bulk of it with any other matter, and only powdered it here and there, with some passages of reprehension of the king; or had he never so bitterly railed against the king and upbraided him of any two or three, though monstrous vices, it might yet have been some way excusable; or yet had he spued forth all the venom that is in this libel of his, in a railing speech, either in drunkenness, or upon the occasion of any sudden passion or discontentment, it might likewise have been excused in some sort; but upon the one part, to heap up all the injuries that the hearts of men, or malice of the devil, can invent against the king, to disable him utterly, not to be a king, not to be a Christian, not to be a man, or a reasonable creature, not worthy of breath here, nor salvation hereafter; and, upon the other part, not to do this hastily or rashly, but after long premeditation, first having made collections in scattered papers, and then reduced it to a method, in a formal treatise, a text chosen for the purpose, a prayer premittid, applying all his wits to bring out of that text what he could, in malam partem, against the king.

This, I say, is a plain proof that he intended to compass or imagine, by this means, the king's destruction. For, will ye look upon the person or quality of the man, it was the far likeliest means he could use to bring his wicked intention to pass; his person an old, unable and unwieldy man; his quality a minister, a preacher; and that in so remote a part of the country, as he had no more means of access to the king's person than he had ability of body, or resolution of spirit, to act such a desperate attempt with his own hands upon him; and therefore, as every creature is ablest, in their own element, either to defend themselves, or annoy their adversaries, as birds in the air, fishes in the water, and so forth, what so ready and natural means had he whereby to annoy the king as by publishing such a seditious libel? and so, under the specious pretext of conscience, to inflame the hearts of the people against him. Now, here is no illation nor inference made upon the statute, it stands in puris naturalibus, but only a just inference and probation of the guilty intention of this party. So the only thing the judges can doubt of, is of the delinquent's intention; and then the question will be, whether if these reasons be stronger to enforce the guiltiness of his intention, or his bare denial to clear him, since nature teaches every man to defend his life as long as he may; and whether, in case there were a doubt herein, the judges should not rather incline to that side wherein all probability lies: but if judges will needs trust better the bare negative of an infamous delinquent, without expressing what other end he could probably have, than all the probabilities, or rather infallible consequences upon the other part, caring more for the safety of such a monster, than the preservation of a crown, in all ages following, whereupon depend the lives of many millions; happy then are all desperate and seditious knaves, but the fortune of this crown is more than miserable. Quod Deus aréruit.

Upon the subject of consulting the Judges in Crown Causes before hand, lord Coke, 3 Inst. 29, 30, thus expresses himself on a case in the Year Book, 1 H. 7, 26. "Hussey, chief justice, besought king Henry the 7th, that he would not desire to know their opinions beforehand for Humfrey Stafford, for they thought it should come before them in the kings bench judicially, and then they would do that which of right they ought: and the king accepted of it. And therefore the judges ought not to deliver their opinions before-hand upon a case put, and proofs urged of one side in absence of the party accused; especially in cases of high nature, and which deserve so fatal and extreme punishment. For how can they be indifferent, who have delivered their opinions before-hand without hearing of the party, when a small addition, or subtraction may alter the case: And how doth it stand with their oath, who are sworn, that they should well and lawfully serve our lord the king and his people in the office of a justice? and they should do equal law, and execution of right to all his subjects, &c."—This passage is cited in Mr. Luders's Chapter "On the Station and Character of the Judges in the 16th and 17th centuries," the whole of which is well worth perusal.

100. The Case of JOHN OWEN, otherwise COLLINS, for Treason :
B. R. Easter, 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.* [1 Rolle's Rep. 185.]

JOHN Owen otherwise Collins, of Godstowe in the county of Oxford, was indicted, for that he intending the death of the king, falsely and maliciously said these words of the king, "The king, being excommunicate by the pope, may be lawfully deposed, and killed by any whatsoever, which killing is not murder: and being demanded by H. White, how he durst utter such a bloody and fearful conclusion, answered, the matter is not so heinous as you suppose; for the king, being the greater: and it is all one as a malefactor, being convicted by a temporal judge, is delivered to execution: so the king, being convicted by the pope, may be lawfully slaughtered by any whatsoever: for this is the execution of the supreme sentence of the pope, as the other is the execution of the law." Upon this Indictment of Treason, the defendant pleads Not Guilty. Mount. [qu. Mountague?] king's Serjeant, opens the Indictment, and Bacon the king's Attorney then made a speech and produces the Evidence. And Note, that the Solicitor being there does not speak in the matter, and it seems that it is not his business* for the cryer in the beginning charges the jury to hear the evidence that should be given by the king's serjeants and the attorney. The Attorney in his speech said, that to compass the king's death is the highest treason that can be, and this appears by 25 Ed. 3, which is but a declaration of the common law, where this is named first: and by the law of nations, if an ambassador * compass and intend death to the person of the king in whose land he is, he may be condemned and executed for treason; but if he commit any other treason than this, it is otherwise: then he should be sent to his own country. And in this case, though the words are in the future tense, still it is treason before the time or the act done. At the end of the report of this Case in the court of King's-Bench is the following note: "Nota, That sir Francis Bacon, attorney, being to move, a serjeant at law having a short motion, offered to move before him; at which he was much moved, saying, That he marvelled he would offer this to him.—Upon this Coke, chief justice. No serjeant ought to remove before the king's attorney, when he moves for the king: but for other motions any serjeant at law is to move before him. And, when I was the king's attorney, I never offered to move before a serjeant, unless it was for the king."—See also as to pre-audience, Burr. 57, and 2586.

be king, but should die as _____, and this was held treason. So the duke of Buckingham said, that if the king should arrest him for treason, he would stab him * and this was an immediate treason. And one Stanley said that if he knew that Perkin Warbeck was the son of Edward 4th, he would take part with him against E. 6, † and this was an immediate treason, notwithstanding the words are spoken with the word 'if.' And it seems that these words ‡ are treason by the common law.—Note, that upon the evidence it appeared, that the defendant held that it was not lawful to murder the king, because it was not lawful to murder any man, but he held that it was lawful to kill the king being excommunicate by the pope, for this he held lawful, and so thought to escape the former question, Whether it were lawful to murder the king.—After the Indictment had been fully proved, the defendant was found guilty by the jury, and Coke said that he and all his brethren were agreed that this is treason, and he said that he agreed in all that had been said by the Attorney, and said moreover that by these words the defendant gives not only power to the pope to dispose of the king's realm, but he made the king to hold that and his crown only at the will of the pope. And the defendant said that it was lawful to kill the king being excommunicate, and the king had been long excommunicate by the pope, and from thence he concludes that it was lawful to kill the king at this time. And he cites some books where it is said that the pope every Maunday Thursday excommunicates all Calvinists, heretics, schismatics, and all those who have withdrawn their obedience from the pope, and in his charge against Talbot supra, 778. Carte, vol. 3, p. 123, says, "the death of a villain." See more of her in lord Herbert (2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 169, 174, 176.) 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 521. She and her accomplices were attainted by a special act of parliament, 25 H. 8, c. 12; and lord Coke, P. C. 14, says they could not have been attainted of treason within 25 E. 3.

* See his case, vol. 1, p. 287 of this collection. The words are stated more fully in p. 295 of that vol. The case is also in the Year-Book 13 H. 8, 11, b. 12, a. from whence it is cited in 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 117. It is scarcely necessary to mention here, that the words about stabbing by no means constituted the whole of the offence charged upon the duke. For this and the motives of the prosecution of the duke, see his Case in the preceding volume. See also that admirable historian Shakespear, in his play of Henry 8th.

† This should doubtless be Henry 7th. The case apparently was that of sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain to Henry 7. See 1 Hale's H. P. C. 113. The words are stated somewhat differently in his case, which is given at p. 277 of vol. 1. of this collection.

the king comes within these; ergo, he is excommunicate. And Faux, who was condemned for the Gunpowder Treason, said that it was lawful to kill the king being excommunicate. And being asked, when the king was excommunicated, answered, That he had been excommunicated on the last Maunday Thursday as aforesaid. The law by which the defendant is to be condemned is the old common law of England. And this is in 25 E. 3, which is but a declaration of the common law. And this law is derived originally from the crown, and not from any other foreign power, of which I will repeat some examples; 16 R. 2, cap. 5, says, That the crown of England had not been subject to any nor is it subject to the pope or to any other. 40 E. 3, Rot. Parliament. Numb. 7. King John being forsaken of God and man, to have relief from the pope did homage to the pope, and acknowledged to hold his crown by (payment of) one thousand marks a year. And afterwards E. 1. was cited to Rome to perform his homage and to pay the thousand marks, which never were paid. And two questions were proposed in parliament: 1. Whether king John could subject the crown to the pope? 2. Whether he ought to be cited to appear at Rome before the pope? And the whole parliament answered that king John did not subject, and could not subject his crown to the pope: and if the pope cites him, they would defend him with their blood. 28 E. 1. Exchequer 12 Feb. Rot. 1200. The pope writes to the king to submit to him the controversy concerning the crown of Scotland, but the king disdains to answer this. But the nobles and commons wrote a letter to the pope, in which they write that they had read his letter, in which were inaudita et admiranda. but we say that the king ought not to be called before you for his crown or antient possessions, but this is against the laws of England; and if the king be willing, still we will not suffer it, even to death. And we will not suffer any ambassador to be sent to you. Register. 61, b ad jura regia recurritur when any one impugns the common law: And it is now necessary to extirpate such locusts as the defendant is, for there are twenty colleges which are popish for Englishmen beyond sea in one country and another. The judgment upon a traitor is, that he shall be drawn to execution, forasmuch as he is not worthy to walk upon the earth: 2. His privy members cut off: 3. His bowels burned, because in them he hatched the treason: 4. Beheaded: 5. Dismembered. And in this judgment are included five punishments: 1. All his goods are forfeited: 2. Life and limb: 3. His honours: 4. His members cut off, which shews that his issue is disinherited with corruption of blood: 5. The dowry of his wife is forfeited: 1. Because he is a traitor to God. 2. To the king who is God's vicegerent upon earth. 3. To the king and realm. 4. To the law; and 5, to his own allegiance. And Judgment was given against the defendant to be drawn and quartered, &c. by Coke, with the assent of the whole court.

101. Proceedings against JOHN OGILVIE, for High Treason, on Tuesday the 28th Day of February, at Glasgow, in Scotland: 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

JOHN Ogilvie, alias Watson, came into Scotland, in 1613; and making his residence for the most part of that winter in the north parts of Scotland; took his journey to England a little before Easter. Where, giving out to some of his countrymen, that he had a supplication for some wrongs to present to his majesty, he attended the court some two months; and falling in acquaintance with a gentleman of the West-country, after his pretended business was done, or the occasion disappointed, he returned into Scotland with the said gentleman in the beginning of June thereafter. Upon this familiarity, and other intelligence given him, he came to Glasgow in August following; and finding a kinder receipt by certain persons in that city, (who have since been justly condemned) he made some haunt and resort thither at sundry times, till at last he was detected, and by the direction of the archbishop of Glasgow, who at that time kept his residence within the city, apprehended and committed to prison on the 4th of October.

In his Examination, which was the next morning, before the archbishop of Glasgow, the bishop of Argyle, the lords Fleming, Boyde, and Kilsyth, the provost of the city of Glasgow, sir Walter Stewart, and sir George Elphinston, knights, he confessed his true name to be John Ogilvie, that he was born in the north of Scotland, and had been forth of the country twenty-one years; that he lived at Gratz, in a college of the Jesuits, and was received in their order: that he returned into Scotland by the command of his superior, and was to stay there until he was recalled, if no other impediment should offer. Being required to give his oath, that he should declare nothing but truth in such things as he should be demanded; he answered, That he would take his oath, but with some exceptions, namely, if he were demanded any thing that touched his estate and life, or that might endanger these or any of them, he would not answer; likewise if the same tended to the prejudice of others. And when it was replied, that his exceptions being admitted, his oath was as good as no oath, seeing any questions that could be proposed would concern some of these; he was induced at last to give a simple oath, which he did upon his knees; and rising up from the ground, said, 'I will neither lye nor equivocate, but what I say shall be truth; and what I am asked, if I find it impertinent for me to answer, I will say nothing, or declare plainly I will not tell.'

Then being enquired of his coming into Scotland, the time and business he came to do, answered, his business was to save souls. Touching the time when he came into Scotland, answered in the June before: where he was apprehended to equivocate, notwithstanding of his protestation; for he meant of his last coming, and was asked concerning the first. But the time at that examination was not understood. Being enquired of the places where he had been received, denied to tell; and if he had said mass in any place, he answered, 'he would not say any thing that might work prejudice to himself or others:' and because he had professed, that he would not lye, the reply he commonly made to such question was, 'I will not tell you.'

The lords finding him thus obstinate, returned to a chamber in the castle, which was prepared for him.

The 12th of December, he was presented at Winburgh, before the lords commissioners, appointed by his majesty's missive for his examination and trial: namely, The lord of Binning, secretary, the lord of Kilsyth, sir Gideon Murray, the thesaurer deputy, and sir William Oliphant, his majesty's attorney-general: to whom he answered in all that was proponed, as of before at Glasgow. There the letters intercepted with him were presented, which he acknowledged to be his: yet being demanded touching certain particulars contained in them, he denied to give their lordships any satisfaction. So as their lordships perceiving nothing but a pertinacious refusing in him to answer to points most reasonable, and withal apprehending his stay at court in the last summer, to have been for some worse service than he could speed in, determined, according to the power given them, to extort by torments another confession; which being intimated to him, and he replying that he was ready to suffer what they pleased, it was thought fit to prove him with the easiest form of trial that could be used.

It pleased his majesty in this time, while he was remaining at Glasgow, to send a commission to the archbishop of Glasgow, the lord bishop of Argyle, the lord Fleming, sir George Elphinston, and James Hamilton provost of the city of Glasgow, for trying the said Ogilvie.

His opinion touching his highness's royal power, and the pope's claimed jurisdiction, maintained by Bellarmine, Suarez and others of that sort: The questions were these.—1. "Whether the pope be judge, and have power in spiritualibus over his majesty, and whether that power will reach over his majesty, even in temporalibus, if it be 'in ordine ad spiritualia,' as Bellarmine affirmeth?—2. Whether the pope have power to excommunicate kings, (especially such as are not of his church) as his ma-

esty?—3. Whether the pope have power to depose kings, by him excommunicated; and in particular, whether he have power to depose the king his majesty?—4. Whether it be no murder to slay his majesty, being so excommunicated and deposed by the pope?—5. Whether the pope have power to assail subjects from the oath of their born and natural allegiance to his majesty?"

Upon the 18th of Jan. the foresaid questions being read distinctly unto him, and he required to declare his opinion thereanent, answered as followeth:

"To the first, that he thought the pope of Rome judge to his majesty, and to have power over him in spiritualibus, if the king be a christian: and where it is asked, if that power will reach over his majesty in temporalibus, he says, he is not obliged to declare his opinion therein, except to him that is judge in controversies of religion, which he acknowledges to be the pope, or some one having authority from him.—To the second he answered, That the pope hath power to excommunicate his majesty: and where it is said, that the king is not of the pope's church; he saith, that all who are baptized are under the pope's power.—To the third, where it is asked, if the pope have power to depose his majesty, being excommunicated; answered, that he will not declare his mind, except to him that is judge in controversies of religion.—To the fourth, whether it be lawful to slay his majesty, being excommunicated and deposed by the pope: answered ut supra.—To the fifth, whether the pope hath power to assail subjects from their born and natural allegiance to his majesty? answered, ut supra."

In all these articles he was particularly reasoned with, by the archbishop of Glasgow, Mr. Robert Boyde principal of the college, (a man of rare erudition) and Mr. Robert Scot, one of the ministers of the city; where it was also signified unto him, that it concerned him in no less than his life, what answer he should make; if he should stand obstinate in these he had given, he might know what favour was to be expected for his other crimes. Not the less ratifying all that formerly was said, he added this further, "that he condemned the oaths of supremacy and allegiance proponed to be sworn in England," and would needs have the writer to insert those words, to all which he put his hand, subscribing thus, "JOHANNES OGILVIEUS, Societatis Jesu."

These Answers being sent to his majesty, under the testification of the foresaid commissioners, his highness gave orders to the lords of the privy-council for his trial, which was appointed to be at Glasgow, the last of February. Immediately after, the archbishop of Glasgow directed the provost and bailiffs of the city unto him, to signify, that Tuesday following was appointed for arraignment, and that "he would not be accused for mass-saying, or any thing else that concerned his profession, but for the Answers that he had made to the demands proposed to him by his majesty's commissioners."

They declared also, that if he should upon better resolution recal those Answers, and apply himself to give his majesty satisfaction in other points, which of duty he was obliged unto, the said archbishop would use his credit with his highness, and the lords of the privy-council for his safety. His answer was, "that he thanked his lordship, for the good will and kindness offered, but he was so little minded to recal any thing he had said, as when he came to the place he would make a commentary upon his answers."

The Arraignment of JOHN OGILVIE, Jesuit, on Tuesday the 28th of February, in the Town-house of Glasgow, before James Hamilton, Provost of Glasgow, James Bell, Colin Campbell, and James Bradwood, Bailiffs of the City, Justices appointed by special Commission for that Business, by the Lords of the Privy-Council.

THE foresaid Judges being assisted by the honourable lords there present :

John, archbishop of Glasgow; James marquis of Hamilton; Robert, earl of Lothian; William, lord Sanquhar; John lord Fleming; Robert, lord Boyde; And sir Walter Stewart, baily-deputy of the regality of Glasgow.

On Tuesday the last of February, a little after eleven of the clock in the forenoon, the court being set, Mr. William Hay, of Baro, commissary of Glasgow, deputed by special commission from sir William Oliphant of Newton, his majesty's Attorney General, produced the Indictment following; together with the citation used against those who were to pass upon the Jury, and the roll of their particular names, subscribed with his hand, according to the custom observed in those cases.

THE INDICTMENT of John Ogilvie, Jesuit, after the form of the law of Scotland.

"JOHN OGILVIE, by your subscription, a priest of the late execrable order of Jesuits, you are indicted and accused, That for as much as God, the author of all righteous government, having established kings and magistrates his lieutenants upon earth, for repressing of violence, oppression, and vice, and the promoting of piety and justice, hath in his particular grace and favour, blessed this country with a more ancient, just and permanent descent of lawful kings than any other nation of the world, and extended our felicity beyond the happiness of our ancestors, by the justice, wisdom and clemency of his majesty's prosperous reign; and hath not only rewarded his majesty's zeal and righteousness with wealth and peace, but also honoured and strengthened him with the accession of the most mighty and flourishing kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland. Which visible favours proceeding directly from God's most bountiful hand, moved the whole estates of this kingdom assembled in the parliament holden at Perth, the 9th of July, 1606, to acknowledge his majesty's sovereign authority, princely power, royal prerogative, and privilege of his crown over all estates, persons and causes whatsoever, within the kingdom: and all in one voice faithfully to promise, maintain, defend, obey and advance the life, safety, honour, dignity, sovereign authority and prerogative royal of his sacred majesty, and privileges of his crown: and to withstand all persons, powers, and estates, who should presume, press, or intend any ways to impugn, hurt, or impair the same: As also his majesty, with advice of the whole estates of this kingdom, in the parliament holden at Edinburgh, the 22d of May, anno 1584, ratified, approved, and perpetually confirmed, his majesty's royal power and authority over all estates, as well spiritual as temporal, within this realm; and statuted and ordained, that his highness, his heirs and successors by themselves and their counsellors, were, and in all times coming should be, judges, competent; to all persons his highness's subjects, of whatsoever estate, degree, function, or condition, that ever they be of, spiritual or temporal, in all matters wherein they or any of them should be apprehended, summoned, or charged to answer unto such things as should be inquired of them by our said sovereign lord and his council; and that none of them who should be apprehended, called or summoned, to the effect aforesaid, should presume or take in hand to decline the judgment of his highness, his heirs and successors, or their council in the premises, under the pain of treason. And likewise, by the 48th act of king James I, his parliament, and divers other parliaments thereafter, it is ordained that all the king's lieges live and be governed under the king's laws and statutes, and under no laws of other countries and realms, under the pain of treason, and other, particularly expressed in the acts before-mentioned, and other laws of this Kingdom. Notwithstanding whereof, it is of truth and verity, that you having renounced your natural allegiance and duty to your native and righteous king, and cast off all reverence, respect, and obedience to his sovereign authority and laws, and dedicated your mind and actions to the unlawful obedience of foreign powers, adversaries to his majesty: and resolving, so far as in you lieth, to seduce his majesty's subjects from the faith and allegiance due to his majesty, repaired to this country in the month of June last past, or thereabout. And by our conferences, inticements, auricular confessions, mass-sayings and other subtle and crafty means, endeavoured yourself not only to corrupt many of his majesty's lieges in religion; but so to pervert them from their dutiful obedience due to his majesty, till you were discovered and apprehended by the archbishop of Glasgow, who, with divers his majesty's counsellors and others his good subjects, used all christian and charitable means to bring you to the sense of your heinous offences, and desire of amendment thereof: but they losing all their well-intended labours, were (in respect of your perverse obstinacy) commanded by his majesty to enter to your examination, and the trial of your heinous crimes and transgressions. And especially the said archbishop of Glasgow, and many others of good rank and quality adjoined to him, by his majesty, for your examination, having upon the 18th of January last, called you before them, to examine you upon some particular interrogatories, prescribed by his majesty to be demanded of you; as directly concerning his majesty's most sacred person, life, crown, and estate: And chiefly you being demanded by them, whether the pope hath power to depose kings, being excommunicated? and in particular, if he have power to depose the king's majesty, our sovereign, being excommunicated by him? You answered treasonably, that you would not declare your mind, except to him that is judge in the controversies of religion, whom (by your answer made to the latter part of the first interrogatory, demanded of you that day) you declared to be the pope, or any having authority from him; albeit by the acts of parliament and laws of this realm, made in the years of God 1560 and 1567, it is statuted and ordained, that the bishop of Rome (called the pope) shall have no jurisdiction nor authority within this realm, in any time coming: and thereby not only declining treasonably his majesty's jurisdiction, allowing of the pope's jurisdiction, which is discharged by acts of parliament, as said is; but hath committed most damnable and high-treason, in not acknowledging that the pope hath no power to depose his majesty, who holding his crown and authority absolutely, sovereignly, and immediately of God, may not be deposed by any earthly person, power, or authority. And thereafter you being demanded if it be lawful to slay his majesty, being excommunicated and deposed by the pope? You answered "ut supra:" which was, that you would not declare your mind till you were before the pope, or others having authority from him; thereby not only declining treasonably his majesty's jurisdiction and authority royal, but by your not answering clearly, that it is altogether unlawful, damnable, and diabolical, once to think that it is lawful to slay his most sacred majesty, you have committed most heinous, pernicious, and unpardonable treason. And lastly, being demanded, if the pope had power to assail his majesty's born subjects from their natural allegiance? You answered, "ut supra:" and thereby both declined treasonably his highness's jurisdiction and authority-royal, in refusing to answer before his majesty's counsellors and commissioners aforesaid, in one matter merely concerning his royal power over his people, and their subjection to his majesty; and also committed wilful and detestable treason, in not acknowledging professedly and presently, that none on earth had power to assail his majesty's subjects from their natural subjection and allegiance to him.

But that it may be known that your treason proceeded of forethought of felony, and obstinate resolution, you freely and unrequiredly did add to your foresaid answers this damnable conclusion, that you condemned the oaths of supremacy and allegiance given to his majesty by his subjects in his dominions: whereby it is apparent, that your errand to this country, hath been to infect his highness's subjects with the poison of your pestilent and treasonable opinion foresaid, to the subversion of religion, overthrow of his majesty's authority and crown, and destruction of his most sacred person. And albeit the course of all his majesty's life and reign hath manifested how unwilling he hath ever been to use the severity of his laws against those who have said and heard mass, and otherwise contravened the acts of parliament made against idolatrous papistry, and practisers thereof within this kingdom, desiring rather to reclaim them by instruction, from their errors, to the knowledge and profession of the truth: and when he found them obdurate, and of desperate resolution, relieving the country of the dangerous progress of their courses, by their imprisonment and banishment, whereof you had such experience in the persons of your own accomplices, condemned for their manifest crimes, as might very probably have made you to have expected the like, if any memory of your native duty and born allegiance had possessed your mind: but you being altogether destitute thereof, by the three last articles of your depositions above written, you have so plainly discovered, that you professedly approve the means, and wish the effect of the overthrow of his majesty's estate, the destruction of his highness's person, and seduction of his native subjects from their subjection and dutiful obedience: that thereby, and by every one of your foresaid answers, you have committed most heinous, detestable, and unpardonable treason, and deservedly incurred the most rigorous pains thereof to be executed upon your body, lands, and goods, with all extremity, to the terror of others."

The Indictment being read, Mr. William Hay, substitute for his majesty's Attorney, opened the same, to the effect following:

Albeit the Indictment of itself be clear enough, and representeth sufficiently to my lords justices, their honourable lordships here assisting, and to yourself John Ogilvie, who stands there accused, the weight and gravity of the crime by you committed, yet I shall resume it to you in few words, that your answers may be the more distinct, and without mistaking.

You are not accused of saying mass, nor of seducing his majesty's subjects to a contrary religion, nor of any point touching you in conscience properly; but for declining his majesty's authority, against the laws and statutes of the land, and for maintaining treasonable opinions: such as we of this realm have not heard by any avowed. The statutes mentioned in your Indictment, make it treason not to answer the king's majesty, or his council in any matter which shall be demanded; you being examined by my lord archbishop of Glasgow, and other honourable persons adjoined to him by his majesty's special commission, refused to answer to divers interrogatories proponed to you by their lordships, and at the same time professedly avouched the pope of Rome his jurisdiction, which by the laws of the country is many years since plainly discharged: therefore have you incurred the penalty contained in the statutes, and the same ought and should be executed upon you.

It is further laid unto your charge, that you being demanded in the particulars, namely, Whether the pope hath power to depose the king's majesty, our sovereign? 2ndly, Whether it be lawful to slay his majesty, being deposed by the pope? 3rdly, Whether the pope hath power to assoil his majesty's subjects, from their natural allegiance, or not? You denied to give any answer, touching any of these points, except ye were enquired thereof by the pope, or others having authority from him: and so not acknowledging, that his majesty's crown and authority is held immediately and sovereignty of God, the author of all government; that it is detestable once to think, that his sacred majesty may be lawfully killed, and that no man has power to assoil his majesty's subjects from their natural allegiance to his highness: you have in these points, and every one of them, committed most heinous treason; for the which what you say in your own defence I see not. And yet further that it may be seen, how desperate your resolution is in all these points, although you were not required concerning the oaths of supremacy and allegiance given to his majesty, by his subjects, ye freely, and out of your own motives, condemned these oaths as impious and unlawful; thereby hath it appeared what a wicked and treasonable mind you foster against his majesty, our sovereign. If you should deny it, here are your answers subscribed with your own hand, which ye cannot but acknowledge; them I desire to be read, as likewise the several statutes of parliament, which you are alledged to have transgressed, and thereafter, since his majesty is pleased, that the ordinary course of trial be kept unto you; you shall have liberty to say for yourself, either against the relevancy of the Indictment, or verification produced, what you think best.

Then were read the statutes of parliament mentioned in the Indictment, and the said John Ogilvie's Answers to the Demands proponed unto him, which he acknowledged for his own, and the subscription thereto subjoined; after which, having license of the court to say what he could for himself, he spake to this effect:

First under protestation, that I do no way acknowledge this judgment, nor receive you, that have that commission there produced, for my judges, I deny any point laid against me to be treason: for if it were treason, it would be treason in all places, and in all kingdoms; but that, saith he, is known not to be so. As for your acts of parliament, they are made by a number of partial men, the best of the land not agreeing with them, and of matters not subject to their forum, or judicatory, for which I will not give a rotten fig.

Where I am thought an enemy to the king's majesty's authority, I know no other authority he hath, but that which he received from his predecessors, who acknowledged the pope of Rome's jurisdiction. If the king, saith he, will be to me as his predecessors were to mine, I will obey and acknowledge him for my king; but if he do otherwise, and play the runnagate from God, as he and you all do, I will not acknowledge him more than this old hat.

Here the archbishop of Glasgow interrupted his speech, desiring him to deliver his mind in a greater calm and with more reverend speeches of his majesty (for he uttered those things in a vehement passion, and as one transported with fury). He remembered him, that he was accused upon his life, before judges that were authorized by his majesty's commission: to decline the judgment, or rail against his majesty's authority, was bootless, and in a man of his profession, being an ecclesiastic, very scandalous. He should rather take another course, to amend what he had offended in, and recal his former answers; if they had not proceeded from a deliberate purpose, or if he were resolute to maintain them, to do it with reason, and in a moderate sort; that this were his best, either for justifying himself, and the opinions he held, or for moving the judges, and their lordships that were assisting, to commiserate his case. He advertised him withal to be more temperate in his speeches concerning his majesty, otherwise he would not be licensed thus to offend.

To this Ogilvie made some little answer, That he would take the advertisement, and speak more coolly; howbeit, he would never acknowledge the judgment, nor think they had power to sit on his life; but said, And for the reverence I do you, to stand bare-headed before you, I let you know it is, 'Ad redemptionem vexationis, et non ad agnitionem judicii.'

The Advocate here insisted, that seeing all his answers tended to decline the judgment, and that he brought no reason why the indictment should not go to a trial, that the jury should be chosen and sworn at the bar, according to the custom.

The Names of the Jury: sir George Elphinston, of Blythswood; sir Thomas Boyd, of Boneshaw; sir James Edmeston, of Dunraith, elder; James Murhead, of Lachop; James Robertson, of Ernock; Hugh Crawford, of Jordan-hill; John Carschore, of that ilk; Hugh Kennedy, provost of Aire; William Makarrel of Hill-house; James Blaire, baillie of Aire; James Dunlop, of Powmillne; John Steward, burgess of Aire; John Dumber, burgess there; James Johnston, burgess there; John Cunningham, of Ravess.

It was allowed the prisoner to challenge any of the fore-named persons, and to oppose unto their admission: who said,

He had but one exception for them all: they were either enemies to his cause, or friends: if enemies, they could not be admitted upon his trial; and if they were his friends, they should stand prisoners at the bar with him.

The Jury were instantly sworn and admitted.

Then was the Indictment read again in the hearing of the Jury, and the evidences shewed them for verification thereof, which of before were produced. And the prisoner being of new remembered to say what he would for himself, for the better information of the Jury, spake these things following:

I wish these gentlemen to consider well what they do. I cannot be tried nor judged by them; and whatever I suffer here, it is by way of injury, and not of judgment. Injuria est, non judicium. I am accused of treason, but have done none offence, neither will I beg mercy.

Archbishop. This is strange, you have done none offence, and yet you are come in his majesty's kingdom, and have laboured to pervert his highness's subjects; both of these are against the law: In this have ye not offended?

Ogilvie. I came by commandment, and if I were even now forth of the kingdom, I should return: neither do I repent any thing, but that I have not been so busy as I should, in that which ye call perverting. I hope to come to Glasgow again, and to do more good in it. If all the hairs of mine head were priests, they should all come into the kingdom.

Archbishop. And do you not esteem it a fault to go against the king's commandment, especially in this point of discharging you his kingdom? If a king have any power within his kingdom, it seems he may rid himself and his country of those with whom he is offended; and it savours of great rebellion to say otherwise.

Ogilvie. I am a subject as free as the king is a king; he cannot discharge me if I be not an offender, which I am not.

And being asked for what offences he might be discharged by the king? answered, in the cases of theft and murder.

Archbishop. You come not to answer any thing to the points of your indictment. Why did you decline his majesty's authority, and refused to shew your opinion anent the pope, his power in deposing kings, and loosing subjects from their oath of allegiance? And when it was asked you, if it were lawful to slay the king, being deposed, and excommunicated by the pope, which any loyal-hearted subject will abhor to think of, why did you not simply condemn it as unlawful? For in that you do not condemn it, you shew yourself of the opinion of the rest of your sect, who in their books maintain, that it is both lawful and commendable to slay kings, if the pope's commission go forth once for it.

Ogilvie. For the declining of the king's authority, I will do it still in matters of religion; for with such matters he hath nothing to do: neither have I done any other thing, but that which the ministers did at Dundee; they would not acknowledge his majesty's authority in spiritual matters more than I; and the best ministers of the land are still of that mind, and if they be wise, will continue so.

The Archbishop replied, That he was mistaken, both in the place and matter; for it was not at Dundee, but Aberdeen, where eight ministers meeting in a general assembly, contended not against the king's authority, but that the assembly called to that place and time could not be discharged by his majesty's commissioner: neither should the fact of a few, take it at the worst, be esteemed the deed of the whole. These have been punished for their offences, and some of them have confessed their error, and been graciously pardoned by his majesty. All good ministers profess otherwise, and our religion teaches us to acknowledge his majesty our only supreme judge in all causes. The king is keeper of both tables, and his place bears him not only to the ruling of his subjects in justice, and preserving equity amongst them, but even to maintain religion and God's pure worship, of which he should have principal care. Your lord the pope hath not only denied this authority to kings, which God giveth them, but usurpeth to himself a power of deposing and killing when he is displeased; and it were the less to be regarded, if this his usurpation had gone no further than your pens: but you have entered, by this pretended right, the throats of the greatest kings, as your practice upon the two last Henrys of France bears witness. You are not able to lay such imputation upon us, nor our profession, which teaches, that next unto God Almighty, all men are bound to fear, serve, and honour their kings. But what answer you touching these demands? Hath the pope power to depose the king? or is it not murder to kill him, being deposed by the pope?

Ogilvie. I refused before to answer such questions, because in answering, I should acknowledge you judges in controversies of religion, which I do not. I will not cast holy things to dogs.

Archbishop. Is it a point of faith, that the pope may depose his majesty? or do you think it a controversy in religion, whether his majesty (whom God save) may be lawfully killed, or not?

Ogilvie. It is a question amongst the doctors of the church, and many hold the affirmative not improbably. A council hath not yet determined the point: and if it shall be concluded by the church, that the pope hath such power, I will give my life in defence of it; and if I had a thousand lives, I would bestow them that way, if they will make an article of faith of it.

Being urged by the court to declare his own opinion, especially in that point, whether it were murder to kill his majesty, being deposed by the pope?

Ogilvie. I would not say it were unlawful, though I should save my life by it. That if the king offended against the catholic church, the pope might punish him as well as a shepherd, or the poorest fellow in the country. That in abrogating the pope's authority, the estates of parliament had gone beyond their limits, and that the king in usurping the pope's right, had lost his own. 'Nan qui rapit jus alienum, perdit jus ad suum.'

Being asked touching the oath of allegiance, Why he did condemn it? and the same being read unto him; He said, It was a damnable oath against God and his truth, and that it was treason to swear it, because it brought the king's person and state in danger. Since this kingdom, said he, was Christian, the pope's supreme power was always acknowledged: this being cast off (as we see in the act of your parliament) against all reason and conscience, and subjects forced to swear to a matter so unlawful, what marvel that attempts and dangerous courses be taken against him. 'Justissima lex est, ut quæ agit aliquis, talia patiatur.' But would the king leave off his usurping upon the pope, he might live without fear, as well as the king of Spain, or any other Christian prince. Neither bishop, nor minister, nor all the bishops and ministers in his majesty's kingdoms had done, nor could do the like.

The Archbishop of Glasgow did close all to the jury, to this effect:

Gentlemen, and others, who are named upon this assize, though I minded to have said nothing, but sitted here a witness of the proceeding, I have been forced by his proud and impudent speeches, somewhat to reply, and must, with your patience, say a little more. It is this same day, two-and-twenty weeks past, that this prisoner fell into mine hands; since that time he hath had leisure to think enough what course was fittest for himself to take, for satisfying his majesty whom he had offended; neither hath he lacked counsel and advice, the best that we could give him: besides he hath found on our part nothing but courteous dealing, and better entertainment, than I must now say it, he hath deserved. Mine own hopes were, that he would have followed another course than I see he hath taken, and not stand to the answers which he made to those demands which were moved unto him by his majesty's commissioners, and you have seen: but if his answers at the first were treasonable, they are now so little bettered, as in all your hearings, he hath uttered speeches most detestable, made a commentary worse than the text was, and shewed himself to carry the mind of an arrant and desperate traitor. You perceive he obscures not his affection towards the king's majesty, our sovereign, in all his speeches preferring the pope to his majesty: and which is more intolerable, affirmeth the king's majesty to have lost the right of his kingdom by usurping upon the pope. He will not say, it is unlawful to kill his majesty; he saith, it is treason for subjects to swear the oath of allegiance; and meaneth so much in his last words, as the king's majesty's life and estate cannot be assured, except he renders himself the pope's vassal.

Thus hath he left you little to do, except that his majesty's pleasure is, the ordinary form be kept with him, you should never need once to remove: all his speeches have been so stuffed with treason, that I am sure the patience of the noblemen, and others here present, hath been much provoked.

In all that he hath said, I can mark but two things alledged by him for the pope's authority over kings; the words of our Saviour to St. Peter, 'Pasce oves meas,' feed my sheep: and the subjection of kings, especially of our kings, since the kingdom became Christian, to the pope. For the words of our saviour, how little they serve his purpose, I have no need to tell you. To feed the sheep of Christ, is not, I hope, to depose kings from their estates, nor to enflame the hearts of subjects against princes, much less to kill and dispatch them: we are better taught than to be deceived with such glosses. Saint Peter made never that sense of those words, and teacheth us a far other doctrine, in his first epistle, 5th chapter, and second and third verses.

I will not spend time with such purpose; only this I must say, that whatsoever was St. Peter's prerogative, the pope of Rome hath nothing to do with it: for he cannot be St. Peter's successor that hath forsaken his doctrine, and gone against his practice directly, both in that and other points of Christian faith. And for the antiquity of his usurped power, I may justly say, that Mr. Ogilvie is not well seen in antiquity, or then speaketh against his knowledge, when he saith, that this power of the pope was ever acknowledged by Christian kings: the bishops of Rome for many years made no such claim, neither did emperors or kings ever dream of such subjection: long it was ere the pope of Rome came to the height of commanding kings, and not till he had oppressed the church, under the pretext of St. Peter's keys, bearing down all the bishops within Christendom; which having done, then he made his invasion upon princes, and that by degrees. The histories of all ages make this plain, and the resisting he found by kings in their kingdoms, testified that they never acknowledged his superiority. Of our own, howbeit as we lie far from his seat, so had we less business and fewer occasions of contradiction; yet I can make it seen in divers particulars, when any question fell out anent the provision of bishops and archbishops to their places, the bulls of Rome were so little respected, as the king's predecessors have always preferred and borne out their own choice; and the interdictions made upon the realm, by these occasions, not without some imputation of weakness to the see apostolick, have been recalled. The superstitions of Rome were amongst us last embraced, and with the first, by the mercies of God, shaken off.

Whatsoever you brag of your antiquity, it is false both in this and in all the points of your profession else, which I could clear, if this time or place were fitting. But to you of this jury, I have this only more to say, you are to enquire upon the verity of the indictment, whether such and such things as are alledged to be committed by him, have been so or not: you have his subscription, which he acknowledgeth; you hear himself, and how he hath most treasonably disavowed his majesty's authority: it concerns you only to pronounce as you shall find verified by the speeches that you have heard, and the testimonies produced. For the rest, the justices know sufficiently what to do, and will serve God and his majesty, according to the commission given them.

Master William Hay, Advocate for his majesty, asked instruments upon the prisoner's reasonable speeches, uttered in the hearing of the jury, and his ratification of the former answers made to his majesty's commissioners: likewise, for the further clearing of the indictment, repeated the acts of parliament mentioned in the said indictment, with the act of privy-council, made anent his majesty's supremacy and the oath of allegiance. And desired the jury deeply to weigh and consider the perverse and devilish disposition of the party accused; to the effect they might without scruple proceed in his conviction. And according to his place, protested for wilful error, if they should acquit him of any point contained in the said indictment.

The persons named upon the jury, removed to the higher house, which was prepared for them; and having elected sir George Elphinston, chancellor, all in one voice found the prisoner guilty of the whole treasonable crimes contained in the indictment.

Which being reported by the said sir George Elphinston, and confirmed by the whole jury; then returned into the court, judgment was given by direction of the justices, That the said John Ogilvie, for the treasons by him committed, should be hanged and quartered.

The Archbishop of Glasgow demanded if Ogilvie would say any thing else?

Ogilvie answered, No, my lord. But I give your lordship thanks for your kindness, and will desire your hand.

The Archbishop said, If you shall acknowledge your fault done to his majesty, and crave God and his highness's pardon, I will give you both hand and heart; for I wish you to die a good Christian.

Then Ogilvie asked, If he should be licensed to speak unto the people?

The Archbishop answered, If you will declare, that you suffer according to the law, justly for your offence, and crave his majesty's pardon for your treasonable speeches, you shall be licensed to say what you please; otherwise you ought not to be permitted.

Then said he, God have mercy upon me? And cried aloud, If there be here any hidden Catholics, let them pray for me; but the prayers of heretics I will not have.—And so the Court arose.

A true Relation of such things as passed at the EXECUTION of John Ogilvie, upon the last day of February, anno 1615.

AFTER judgment was given, by the space of some three hours, he remained in the place where he was convicted, having leisure granted him to prepare himself for death. He continued a while upon his knees at prayer, with a cold devotion; and when the hour of execution approached, his hands being tied by the executioner, his spirits were perceived much to fail him. In going towards the scaffold, the throng of people was great, and he seemed much amazed; and when he was up, Mr. Robert Scott, and Mr. William Struthers, ministers, very gravely and christianly exhorted him to an humble acknowledgment of his offence, and if any thing troubled his mind, to disburthen his conscience. In matters of religion, they said, they would not then enter, but prayed him to resolve and settle his mind, and seek mercy and grace from God, through Jesus Christ, in whom only salvation is to be found.

Ogilvie answered, That he was prepared and resolved. Once he said, that he died for religion; but uttered this so weakly, as scarce he was heard by them that stood by upon the scaffold. Then addressing himself to execution, he kneeled at the ladder-foot, and prayed; Mr. Robert Scott in that while declaring to the people that his suffering was not for any matter of religion, but for heinous treason against his majesty, which he prayed God to forgive him. Ogilvie hearing this, said, he doth me wrong. One, called John Abircrumie, a man of little wit, replied, No matter, John, the more wrongs the better. This man was seen to attend him carefully, and was ever heard asking of Ogilvie some token before his death; for which and other business he made with him, he was put off the scaffold.

Ogilvie ending his prayer, arose to go up the ladder, but strength and courage, to the admiration of those who had seen him before, did quite forsake him: he trembled and shook, saying, 'he would fall,' and could hardly be helped up on the top of the ladder. He kissed the hangman, and said, 'Maria, mater gratiæ, ora pro me; omnes Angeli, orate pro me; omnes Sancti Sanctæque, orate pro me:' but with so low a voice, that they which stood at the ladder foot had some difficulty to hear him.

The executioner willed him to commend his soul to God, pronouncing these words unto him, 'Say John, Lord, have mercy on me, Lord, receive my soul:' which he did with such feebleness of voice, that scarcely he could be heard. Then was he turned off, (his left foot for a space taking hold of the ladder, as a man unwilling to die) and hung till he was dead. His quartering, according to the judgment given, was, for some respects, not used; and his body buried in a place that is kept for malefactors.

We have understood, by some persons who visited him at times during his imprisonment, that amongst other his speeches with them, he said this, That if he had escaped his apprehension at this time, and lived till Whitsunday next, he should have done that which all the bishops and ministers both in England and Scotland, should never have helped. And if he might have lived at liberty unto that time, he would willingly have been drawn in pieces with horses, and have given his body to have been tormented.

102. The Case of Mr. OLIVER ST. JOHN, on an Information ore tenus, in the Star-Chamber, 15th April, for writing and publishing a Paper against a Benevolence collected under Letters of the Privy-Council: 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

["All that we have in print of the proceedings on this Case is lord Bacon's Speech as attorney-general and prosecutor. See 2 Bacon's works, last 4to edit. 583. The paper which was the ground of the prosecution is in the Cabala. See page 332, of 2d part, 3d. edit. The Judgment of the court was, that Mr. St. John should pay a fine of 5000*l.* and be imprisoned during the king's pleasure. See the note in 3 Bacon, last 4to edit. 267, and the Introd. to Bas. Lett. by Stevens, p. xxiii. The case appears to have been prosecuted with great anxiety; for, according to a letter from lord Bacon to the king, lord chancellor Egerton, who from the infirmities of age, was then on the point of resigning the great seal, expressed a wish to attend the hearing, and so make it the conclusion of his services. 3 Rac. 264. The grand argument of lord Bacon in favour of the Benevolence was, that it was without compulsion. If in the representation of the conduct of a rival and enemy, lord Bacon can be trusted, lord Coke, then chief justice of the King's-bench, at first gave it as his opinion, that the king could not so much as move any of his subjects for a Benevolence, but afterwards retracted in the Star-Chamber, and there delivered the law in favour of it strongly. Ibid. 483. 274.

"In our introductory note to the Case of Impositions, Benevolences were enumerated as one of the devices of extra-parliamentary taxation. Ante, page 371. As such the statute of 1 R. 3, c. 2, stiles them an unlawful invention, and annuls them for ever. But the Benevolences, mentioned in this statute, are described to have been so in name only, and to have been taken by coercion. Still therefore it was insisted, that gifts to the crown out of parliament, if really voluntary, were lawful. So lord Bacon argued in the following case; so in the same sense lord Coke is stated to have declared the law; so lord Coke himself gives his opinion in his notes on Benevolences in the 12th Report; and so according to him all the judges resolved in the 40th of Elizabeth, 19 Co. 119. Lord Coke lays a stress on the statute of 10 Hen. 7, c. 10, which, after reciting that many of the king's subjects had severally granted to him diverse sums of money of their free wills and benevolence, and that some of these were in arrear, provides a remedy for compelling the payment. See Rastall's edit. of the Statutes. This statute, it must be confessed, seems to give a legislative sanction to such Benevolences as were really free offerings. But there is a later statute, with words strongly importing, that Benevolences to the crown, though voluntary, cannot regularly be made out of parliament. The statute we mean is the 13 Cha. 2, c. 4, which authorises the king to issue commissions under the great seal, for receiving voluntary subscriptions for the supply of his occasions; but limits commoners to 200*l.* and peers to 400*l.* a-piece, and also the time for subscribing, and concludes with declaring, that no commissions or aids of this nature can be issued out or levied but by authority of parliament. This in effect concurs with lord Coke's first opinion in Mr. St. John's case, as represented by lord Bacon; the aim of the statute being to condemn Benevolences by the solicitation of commissions from the crown, and so to supply the defect of the statute of Richard the Third and of the Petition of Right, both of which point at compulsive Benevolences. The inducement to such a declaration of the law probably was an idea, that a formal solicitation from the crown must necessarily operate, on the minds of those to whom it was addressed, with an influence almost equal to compulsion.—Thus at length it seems to be settled by the legislature, not only that compulsive Benevolences are unlawful, but that all commissions from the crown to solicit and receive voluntary gifts are also unconstitutional." Hargrave.]

LETTER from Mr. Oliver St. John to the Mayor of Marlborough, which was the subject of the Prosecution; taken from the Cabala, 3d edition, part 2; page 332.

ASI think, this kind of benevolence is against law, reason and religion:

1. The law is in the statute called Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3, cap. 29, that no free-man be any way destroyed, but by laws of the land. Secondly, besides that the said statute of Magna Charta is by all princes since established and confirmed, it is, in the special case of voluntary or free grants, enacted and decreed 25 E. 1, cap. 5, that no such be drawn into custom: and cap. 6, that henceforth be taken no such aids, tasks, free grants, or prizes, but by assent of all the realm, and for the good of the same. And in primo R. 3, cap. 2, that the subjects and commons in this realm, from henceforth shall in no wise be charged by any charge or imposition called a Benevolence, or any such like charge; and that such exactions, called a Benevolence, shall be damned and annulled for ever.

First, it is not only without, but against reason, that the commons, in their several and particulars, should be relievers or suppliers of his majesty's wants, who neither know his wants, nor the sums that may be raised to supply the same.

Secondly, it is against reason, that the particular and several commons, distracted, should oppose their judgment and discretion to the judgment and discretion of the wisdom of their land assembled in parliament, who have there denied any such aid.

It argueth in us want of love and due respect of our sovereign lord and king, which ought to be in every of us towards each other, which is, to stay every one which we see falling, and reduce the current. What prosperity can be expected to befall either our king or nation, when the king shall, haply out of ignorance, or ('tis I hope) out of forgetfulness or headiness, commit so great a sin against his God, as is the violating of his great and solemn oath taken at his coronation, for the maintaining of his laws, liberties and customs of this noble realm; and his subjects, some for fear, some in pride, some to please others, shall join hands to forward so unhappy an achievement? Can he any way more highly offend the divine majesty (whom he then invocated?) As also, can he then give unto another Hen. 4, (if such a one should rise up, which God forbid) a greater advantage? Let those articles put up against R. 2, be looked on, it will appear, that the breach of laws, infringing the liberties, and failing in this oath, were the main blemishes wherewith he could distain and spot the honour of that good and gentle prince; who indeed was rather by others abused, than of himself mischievously any way disposed.

2. As very irreligiously and uncharitably, we help forward the king's majesty in that grievous sin of perjury; so into what a hellish danger we plunge ourselves, even so many of us as contribute, is to be learned out of the several curses and sentences of excommunication given out against all such givers, and, namely, the two following, viz. the great curse given out, tho 36 Hen. 3, against all breakers of the liberties and customs of the realm of England, with their abettors, counsellors and executioners; wherein, by the sentence of Boniface archbishop of Canterbury, and the chief part of all the bishops of this land, are ipso facto excommunicated. And that of 24 Edw. 1, denounced immediately upon the acts made against such benevolence, free grants and impositions, had, and taken without common assent; which, because it is not so large as that former, I will set down as our books deliver the same.

"In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. Whereas our sovereign lord the king, to the honour of God, and of the holy church, and for the common profit of the realm, hath granted, for him and his heirs for ever, these articles above written: Robert archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, admonished all his province, once, twice, and thrice, because that shortness will not suffer so much delay, as to give knowledge to all the people of England of these presents in writing. We, therefore, enjoin all persons, of what estate soever they be, that they, and every of them, as much as in them is, shall uphold and maintain those articles granted by our sovereign lord the king in all points; and all those that, in any point, do resist, or break those ordinances, or go about it by word or deed, openly or privately, by any manner of pretence or colour. We therefore, the said archbishop, by our authority in writing expressed, do excommunicate and accurse, and from the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and from all the company of Heaven, and from all the sacraments of the holy church, do sequester and exclude."

Sir, hearing that to-morrow the justices will be here about this busy work of Benevolence, wherein you have both sent unto, and talked with me, and thinking that it may be, you would deliver up the names of the non-givers: forasmuch as, I think, I shall scarcely be at home to make my further answer, if I should be called for, I pray you, both hereby to understand my mind yourself, and if cause so require, to let the justices perceive as much. So leaving others to their own consciences, whereby in that last and dreadful day they shall stand or fall before him who will reward every man according to his deeds, I commend you to the grace of the Almighty, and rest your loving neighbour and friend,

OLIVER ST. JOHN.

SPEECH of SIR FRANCIS BACON as Attorney-General, addressed to the Court of Star-Chamber, from his Works, vol. ii. p. 583.

My Lords; I shall inform you ore tenus, against this gentleman Mr. I. S. a gentleman, as it seems, of an ancient house and name; but, for the present, I can think of him by no other name, than the name of a great offender. The nature and quality of his offence, in sum, is this. This gentleman hath, upon advice, not suddenly by his pen, nor by the slip of his tongue; not privately, or in a corner, but publicly, as it were, to the face of the king's ministers and justices, slandered and traduced the king our sovereign, the law of the land, the parliament, and infinite particulars of his majesty's worthy and loving subjects. Nay, the slander is of that nature, that it may seem to interest the people in grief and discontent against the state: whence might have ensued matter of murmur and sedition. So that it is not a simple slander, but a seditious slander, like to that the poet speaketh of, 'calamosque amare veneno.' A venomous dart that hath both iron and poison.—To open to your lordships the true state of this offence, I will set before you, first, the occasion whereupon Mr. I. S. wrought: then the offence itself in his own words: and lastly, the points of his charge.—My lords, you may remember that there was the last parliament an expectation to have had the king supplied with treasure, although the event failed. Herein it is not fit for me to give opinion of an house of parliament, but I will give testimony of truth in all places. I served in the lower house, and I observed somewhat. This I do affirm, that I never could perceive but that there was in that house a general disposition to give, and to give largely. The clocks in the house perchance might differ; some went too fast, some went too slow; but the disposition to give was general: so that I think I may truly say, 'solo tempore lapsus amor.'—This accident happening thus besides expectation, it stirred up and awaked in divers of his majesty's worthy servants and subjects of the clergy, the nobility, the court, and others here near at hand, an affection loving and cheerful, to present the king, some with plate, some with money, as free-will offerings, a thing that God Almighty loves, a cheerful giver: what an evil eye doth I know not. And, my lords, let me speak it plainly unto you: God forbid any body should be so wretched as to think that the obligation of love and duty, from the subject to the king, should be joint and not several. No, my lords, it is both. The subject petitioneth to the king in parliament. He petitioneth likewise out of parliament. The king on the other side gives graces to the subject in parliament: he gives them likewise, and poureth them upon his people out of parliament: and so no doubt the subject may give to the king in parliament, and out of parliament. It is true the parliament is intercursumagnus, the great intercourse and main current of graces and donatives from the king to the people, from the people to the king: but parliaments are held but at certain times; whereas the passages are always open for particulars: even as you see great rivers have their tides, but particular springs and fountains run continually. To proceed therefore: as the occasion, which was the failing of supply by parliament, did awake the love and benevolence of those that were at hand to give; so it was apprehended and thought fit by my lords of the council to make a proof whether the occasion and example both, would not awake those in the country of the better sort to follow. Whereupon, their lordships devised and directed letters unto the sheriffs and justices, which declared what was done here above, and wished that the country might be moved, especially men of value.—Now, my lords, I beseech you give me favour and attention to set forth and observe unto you five points. I will number them, because other men may note them; and I will but touch them, because they shall not be drowned or lost in discourse, which I hold worthy the observation, for the honour of the state and confusion of slanderers; whereby it will appear most evidently what case was taken, that that which was then done might not have the effect, no nor the shew, no nor so much as the shadow of a tax; and that it was so far from breeding or bringing in any ill precedent or example, as contrariwise it is a corrective that doth correct and allay the harshness and danger of former examples.—The first is, that what was done was done immediately after such a parliament, as made general profession to give, and was interrupted by accident: so as you may truly and justly esteem it, 'tanquam posthuma proles parliamenti,' as an after-child of the parliament, and in pursuit, in some small measure, of the firm intent of a parliament past. You may take it also, if you will, as an advance or provisional help until a future parliament; or as a gratification simply without any relation to a parliament; you can no ways take it amiss.—The second is, that it wrought upon example, as a thing not devised or projected, or required; no nor so much as recommended, until many, that were never moved nor dealt with, ex mero motu, had freely and frankly sent in their presents. So that the letters were rather like letters of news, what was done at London, than otherwise: and we know 'exempla ducunt, non trahunt;' examples they do but lead, they do not draw nor drive.—The third is, that it was not done by commission under the great seal; a thing warranted by a multitude of precedents, both ancient, and of late time, as you shall hear anon, and no doubt warranted by law: so that the commissions be of that stile and tenour, as that they be to move and not to levy: but this was done by letters of the council, and no higher hand or form.—The fourth is, that these letters had no manner of shew of any binding act of state: for they contain not any special frame or direction how the business should be managed; but were written as upon trust, leaving the matter wholly to the industry and confidence of those in the country; so that it was an absque compoto; such a form of letters as no man could fitly be called to account upon.—The fifth and last point is, that the whole carriage of the business had no circumstance compulsory. There was no proportion or rate set down, not so much as by way of a wish; there was no menace of any that should deny; no reproof of any that did deny; no certifying of the names of any that had denied. Indeed, if men could not content themselves to deny, but that they must censure and inveigh, nor to excuse themselves, but they must accuse the state, that is another case. But I say, for denying, no man was apprehended, no nor noted. So that I verily think, that there is none so subtle a disputer in the controversy of libe*rum arbitrium*, that can with all his distinctions fasten or carp upon the act, but that there was free-will in it.—I conclude therefore, my lords, that this was a true and pure benevolence; not an imposition called a benevolence, which the statute speaks of; as you shall hear by one of my fellows. There is a great difference, I tell you, though Pilate would not see it, between 'rex Judæorum,' and 'se dicens regem Judæorum.' And there is a great difference between a benevolence and an exaction called a benevolence, which the duke of Buckingham speaks of in his oration to the city; and defineth it to be not what the subject of his good-will would give, but what the king of his good-will would take. But this, I say, was a benevolence wherein every man had a prince's prerogative, a negative voice; and this word, excuse moy, was a plea peremptory. And therefore I do wonder how Mr. I. S. could foul or trouble so clear a fountain. Certainly it was but his own bitterness and unsound humours.—Now to the particular charge. Amongst other countries, these letters of the lords came to the justices of D—shire, who signified the contents thereof, and gave directions and appointments for meetings concerning the business, to several towns and places within that county: and amongst the rest, notice was given unto the town of A. The mayor of A. conceiving that this Mr. I. S. being a principal person, and a dweller in that town, was a man likely to give both money and good example, dealt with him to know his mind. He intending, as it seems, to play prizes, would give no answer to the mayor in private, but would take time. The next day then being an appointment of the justices to meet, he takes occasion, or pretends occasion to be absent, because he would bring his papers upon the stage: and thereupon takes pen in hand, and instead of excusing himself, sits down and contriveth a seditious and libellous accusation against the king and state, which your lordships shall now hear, and sends it to the mayor: and withal, because the feather of his quill might fly abroad, he gives authority to the mayor to impart it to the justices, if he so thought good. And now, my lords, because I will not mistake or mis-repeat, you shall hear the Seditious Libel in the proper terms and words thereof.—[Here the papers were read.]—My lords, I know this paper offends your ears much, and the ears of any good subject; and sorry I am that the times should produce offences of this nature: but since they do, I would be more sorry they should be passed without severe punishment: 'non tradite factum,' as the verse says, altered a little, 'aut si tradatis, facti quoque tradite penam.' If any man have a mind to discourse of the fact, let him likewise discourse of the punishment of the fact.—In this writing, my lords, there appears a monster with four heads, of the progeny of him that is the father of lyes, and takes his name from slander. The first is a wicked and seditious slander: or, if I shall use the scripture phrase, a blaspheming of the king himself; setting him forth for a prince perjured in the great and solemn oath of his coronation, which is as it were the knot of the diadem; a prince that should be a violator and infringer of the liberties, laws, and customs of the kingdom; a mark for an Henry the 4th; a match for a Richard the 2d. The second is a slander and falsification, and wresting of the law of the land gross and palpable: it is truly said by a civilian, tortura legum pessima, the torture of laws is more than the torture of men. The third is a slander and false charge of the parliament, that they had denied to give to the king; a point of notorious untruth. And the last is a slander and taunting of an infinite number of the king's loving subjects, that have given towards this benevolence and free contribution; charging them as accessory and co-adjutors to the king's perjury. Nay you leave us not there, but you take upon you a pontifical habit, and couple your slander with a curse; but thanks be to God we have learned sufficiently out of the scripture, that as the bird flies away, so the causeless curse shall not come. For the first of these, which concerns the king, I have taken to myself the opening and aggravation thereof; the other three I have distributed to my fellows. My lords, I cannot but enter into this part with some wonder and astonishment, how it should come into the heart of a subject of England to vapour forth such a wicked and venomous slander against the king, whose goodness and grace is comparable, if not incomparable, unto any of the kings his progenitors. This therefore gives me a just and necessary occasion to do two things: the one, to make some representation of his majesty; such as truly he is found to be in his government, which Mr. I. S. chargeth with violation of laws and liberties: the other, to search and open the depth of Mr. I. S. his offence. Both which I will do briefly; because the one, I cannot express sufficiently; and the other, I will not press too far. My lords, I mean to make no panegyric or laudative; the king delights not in it, neither am I fit for it: but if it were but a counsellor or nobleman, whose name had suffered, and were to receive some kind of reparation in this high court, I would do him that duty as not to pass his merits and just attributes, especially such as are limited with the present case, in silence: for it is fit to burn incense where evil odours have been cast and raised. Is it so that king James shall be said to be a violator of the liberties, laws, and customs of his kingdoms? Or is he not rather a noble and constant protector and conservator of them all? I conceive this consisteth in maintaining religion and the true church; in maintaining the laws of the kingdom, which is the subject's birth-right; in temperate use of the prerogative; in due and free administration of justice, and conservation of the peace of the land. For religion, we must ever acknowledge in the first place, that we have a king that is the principal conservator of true religion through the christian world. He hath maintained it not only with sceptre and sword, but likewise by his pen; wherein also he is potent. He hath awaked and re-authorized the whole party of the reformed religion throughout Europe; which through the insolency and divers artifices and enchantments of the adverse part, was grown a little dull and dejected: he hath summoned the fraternity of kings to enfranchise themselves from the usurpation of the see of Rome: he hath made himself a mark of contradiction for it. Neither can I omit, when I speak of religion, to remember that excellent act of his majesty, which though it were done in a foreign country, yet the church of God is one, and the contagion of these things will soon pass seas and lands: I mean, in his constant and holy proceeding against the heretic Vorstius, whom, being ready to enter into the chair and there to have authorized one of the most pestilent and heathenish heresies that ever was begun, his majesty by his constant opposition dismantled and pulled down. And I am persuaded there sits in this court one whom God doth the rather bless for being his majesty's instrument in that service. I cannot remember religion and the church, but I must think of the seed-plots of the same, which are the universities. His majesty, as for learning amongst kings he is incomparable in his person; so likewise hath he been in his government a benign or benevolent planet towards learning: by whose influence those nurseries and gardens of learning, the universities, were never more in flower nor fruit. For the maintaining of the laws, which is the hedge and fence about the liberty of the subject, I may truly affirm it was never in better repair. He doth concur with the votes of the nobles, 'nolumus leges Angliæ mutare.' He is an enemy of innovation. Neither doth the universality of his own knowledge carry him to neglect or pass over the very forms of the laws of the land. Neither was there ever king, I am persuaded, that did consult so oft with his judges, as my lords that sit here know well. The judges are a kind of council of the king's by oath and ancient institution; but he useth them so indeed; he confers regularly with them upon their returns from their visitations and circuits: he gives them liberty both to inform him, and to debate matters with him; and in the fall and conclusion commonly relies on their opinions. As for the use of the prerogative, it runs within the ancient channels and banks. Some things that were conceived to be in some proclamations, commissions, and patents, as overflows, have been by his wisdom and care reduced; whereby, no doubt, the main channel of his prerogative is so much the stronger. For evermore overflows do hurt the channel. As for administration of justice between party and party, I pray observe these points. There is no news of great seal or signet that flies abroad for countenance or delay of causes; protections rarely granted, and only upon great ground, or by consent. My lords here of the council and the king himself meddle not, as hath been used in former times, with matters of meum and tuum, except they have apparent mixture with matters of estate, but leave them to the king's courts of law or equity. And for mercy and grace, without which there is no standing before justice, we see, the king now hath reigned twelve years in his white robe, without almost any aspersion of the crimson dye of blood. There sits my lord Hobart, that served attorney seven years. I served with him. We were so happy, as there passed not through our hands any one arraignment for treason; and but one for any capital offence, which was that of the lord Sanquhar; the noblest piece of justice, one of them, that ever came forth in any king's time. As for penal laws, which lie as snares upon the subjects, and which were as a nemo scit to king Henry 7; it yields a revenue that will scarce pay for the parohment of the king's records at Westminster. And lastly for peace, we see manifestly his majesty bears some resemblance of that great name, a prince of peace: he hath preserved his subjects during his reign in peace, both within and without. For the peace with states abroad, we have it usque ad satietatem: and for peace in the lawyers phrase, which count trespasses, and forces, and riots, to be contra pacem; let me give your lordships this token or taste, that this court, where they should appear, had never less to do. And certainly there is no better sign of omnia bene, than when this court is in a still. But, my lords, this is a sea of matter; and therefore I must give it over, and conclude, that there was never king reigned in this nation that did better keep covenant in preserving the liberties and procuring the good of his people: so that I must needs say for the subjects of England,

'O fortunatos nimium sua si bona norint;' as no doubt they do both know and acknowledge it; whatsoever a few turbulent discourses may, through the lenity of the time, take boldness to speak. And as for this particular, touching the Benevolence, wherein Mr. I. S. doth assign this breach of covenant, I leave it to others to tell you what the king may do, or what other kings have done; but I have told you what our king and my lords have done: which, I say and say again, is so far from introducing a new precedent, as it doth rather correct, and mollify, and qualify former precedents. Now, Mr. I. S. let me tell you your fault in few words: for that I am persuaded you see it already, though I woo no man's repentance; but I shall, as much as in me is, cherish it where I find it. Your offence hath three parts knit together: your slander, your menace, and your comparison. For your slander, it is no less than that the king is perjured in his coronation oath. No greater offence than perjury; no greater oath than that of a coronation. I leave it; it is too great to aggravate. Your menace, that if there were a Bullingbroke, or I cannot tell what, there were matter for him, is a very seditious passage. You know well, that how-soever Henry 4's act, by a secret providence of God, prevailed, yet it was but an usurpation; and if it were possible for such a one to be this day, wherewith it seems your dreams are troubled, I do not doubt, his end would be upon the block; and that he would sooner have the ravens sit upon his head at London-bridge, than the crown at Westminster. And it is not your interlacing of your 'God forbid,' that will save these seditious speeches: neither could it be a forewarning, because the matter was past and not revocable, but a very stirring up and incensing of the people. If I should say to you, for example, 'if these times were like some former times, of king Henry 8, or some other times which God forbid, Mr. I. S. it would cost you your life;' I am sure you would not think this to be a gentle warning, but rather that I incensed the court against you. And for your comparison with Richard 2, I see, you follow the example of them that brought him upon the stage, and into print, in queen Elizabeth's time, a most prudent and admirable queen. But let me intreat you, that when you will speak of queen Elizabeth or king James, you would compare them to king Henry 7, or king Edward 1, or some other parallels, to which they are alike. And thus I would wish both you and all to take heed of, how you speak seditious matter in parables, or by tropes or examples. There is a thing in an indictment called an inuendo; you must beware how you beckon or make signs upon the king in a dangerous sense. But I will contain myself and press this no farther. I may hold you for turbulent or presumptuous; but I hope you are not disloyal: you are graciously and mercifully dealt with. And therefore having now opened to my lords, and, as I think, to your own heart and conscience, the principal part of your offence, which concerns the king, I leave the rest, which concerns the law, parliament, and the subjects that have given, to Mr. Serjeant and Mr. Solicitor.

To the King, reporting the state of lord chancellor Ellesmere's health.

I found him [the lord Chancellor] in bed, but his spirits fresh and good, speaking stoutly, and without being spent or weary; and both willing and beginning of himself to speak, but wholly of your majesty's business: wherein I cannot forget to relate this particular; that he wished that his sentencing of O. S. at the day appointed might be his last work, to conclude his services, and express his affection towards your majesty. I told him, I knew your majesty would be very desirous of his presence that day, so it might be without prejudice: but otherwise your majesty esteemed a servant more than a service; especially such a servant. Jan. 29, 1614. Old Style.

For Mr. St. John, your majesty knoweth, the day draweth on; and my lord chancellor's recovery, the season, and his age, promising not to be too hasty. I spake with him on Sunday at what time I found him in bed, but his spirits strong, and not spent or wearied, and spake wholly of your business, leading me from one matter to another; and wished and seemed to hope, that he might attend the day for O. S. and it were, as he said, to be his last work to conclude his services, and express his affection towards your majesty. I presumed to say to him, that I knew your majesty would be exceeding desirous of his being present that day, so as that it might be without prejudice to his continuance; but that otherwise your majesty esteemed a servant more than a service, especially such a servant. Surely in mine opinion your majesty were better put off the day than want his presence, considering the cause of the putting off is so notorious; and then the capital and the criminal may come together the next term. FR. BACON. Jan. 31, 1614. O. S.

To the King, touching my Lord Chancellor's amendment, &c.

He [the Lord Chancellor] had sent also to my lord treasurer, to desire him to come to him about that time. His lordship came; and, not to trouble your majesty with circumstances, both their lordships concluded, myself present and concurring, that it could be no prejudice to your majesty's service to put off the day for Mr. St. John till the next term: the rather, because there are seven of your privy-council, which are at least numerus and part of the court, which are by infirmity like to be absent; that is, my lord chancellor, my lord admiral, my lord of Shrewsbury, my lord of Exeter, my lord Zouch, my lord Stanhope, and Mr. chancellor of the dutchy; wherefore they agreed to hold a council to-morrow in the afternoon for that purpose. It is true, that I was always of opinion that it was no time lost; and I do think so the rather, because I could be content, that the matter of Peacham were first settled and put to a point. For there be perchance that would make the example upon Mr. St. John to stand for all. FR. BACON. Feb. 7, 1614. O. S.

To the King.

It may please your excellent majesty; Mr. St. John his day is past, and well past. I hold it to be Janus bifrons; it hath a good aspect to that which is past, and to the future, and doth both satisfy and prepare. All did well: my lord chief justice delivered the law for the Benevolence strongly; I would he had done it timely. Mr. chancellor of the exchequer spake finely, somewhat after the manner of my late lord privy seal; not all out so sharply, but as elegantly. Sir Thomas Lake, who is also new in that court, did very well, familiarly and counsellor-like. My lord of Pembroke, who is likewise a stranger there, did extraordinary well, and became himself well, and had an evident applause. I meant well also; and because my information was the ground; having spoken out of a few beads which I had gathered, for I seldom do more, I set down as soon as I came home, cursorily, a frame of that I had said; though I persuade myself I spake it with more life. I have sent it to Mr. Murray, sealed: if your majesty have so much idle time to look upon it, it may give some light of the day's work: but I most humbly pray your majesty to pardon the errors. God preserve you ever. FR. BACON. April 29th, 1615.

103. The Trial of RICHARD WESTON,* at the Guild-hall of London, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury,† 19 Oct. 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

THE Commissioners were, the Lord Mayor, Hayes; the Lord Chief Justice of England, Coke; Justice Crook; Justice Doderidge; Justice Haughton; Serjeant Crew; and sir Henry Montague, Recorder.

The Court being set, and the king's special commission read, the Lord Chief Justice gave the Charge; the effect whereof was,

First, To express the king's pious inclinations and command unto just proceedings against all such as should be any way proved to be guilty of the murdering and poisoning † of sir T. Overbury, his majesty's prisoner in the Tower.

Secondly, To aggravate the manner and quality of the murdering, in shewing the baseness of poisoning above all other kinds of murder, declaring the vengeance of God, and his justness in punishing offenders: He alledged 9 Gen. 6. 'Quicumque effuderit humanum sanguinem, effundetur sanguis illius; ad imaginem Dei quippe factus est homo.' He also took the example of Uriah by David; he therein observed how adultery is most often the begetter of that sin.

Then he declared, That of all felonies, murder is the most horrible; of all murders, poisoning the most detestable; and of all poisoning, the lingering poisoning.

He shewed how that by an act of parliament, 22 H. 8, cap. 9, it was made treason, and that wilful poisoners should be boiled to death; rehearsing the example of one Richard Rowse, that had poisoned a man and woman, and was therefore scalded to death.

Then he laid open to the jury the baseness and cowardliness of poisoners, who attempt that secretly, against which there is no means of preservation or defence for a man's life; and how rare it was to hear of poisoning in England, so detestable it was to our nation: But that since the devil had taught divers to be cunning in it, so that they can poison in what distance of space they please, by consuming the nativum calidum or humidum radicale in one mouth, two, or three or more, as they list; which they four manner of ways do execute, 1. gustu, 2. haustu, 3. odore, 4. contactu.

He finished his charge with serious exhortations to the jury to do justice in presenting the truth, notwithstanding the greatness of any that upon their evidence should appear to be guilty of the same offence: comforting both judges and jury with the scripture, Psal. 5, v. ultimo, 'For thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass them as with a shield.'

The charge being ended, the jury, consisting of 14 persons, did for the space of an hour, depart the court into a private room, where they received their evidence from Mr. Fenshaw, his majesty's Coroner, and his highness's counsel prepared and instructed for that purpose, with the examinations and confessions as well of the prisoner himself, as of divers other witnesses, before that time taken by the lord chief justice of England, and others the lords of his majesty's council.

In the mean time, Mr. William Goare, sheriff of London, was commanded to fetch his prisoner, remaining at his house, to be ready in court for his arraignment.

So a certain space after, the Grand Jury returned to the bar, and delivered in their bill of indictment, signed Billa Vera. Whereupon the prisoner was set up to the bar, and the Indictment read by Mr. Fenshaw, which contained in effect as followeth:

That Richard Weston, being about the age of sixty years, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but instigated and seduced by the devil, devised and contrived not only to bring upon the body of sir Thomas Overbury, knight, great sickness and diseases, but also to deprive him of his life: and to bring the same to pass, but these two murderers." Weldon's Court and Character of king James, 76.

* He had been an apothecary's man, but was now made under-keeper to the new lieutenant of the Tower, sir Jervis Elwes.

† He was son to sir Nicholas Overbury of Burton-upon-the-hill in Gloucestershire, educated at Queen's-College in Oxford, and at the Middle-Temple, of which his father was a benchler. See a full relation of the manner of his death, Bacon's Works, vol. 1. p. 77, 79, and its discovery, ibid. p. 80.

‡ "Franklyn and Weston came into Overbury's chamber, and found him in infinite torment, with contention between the strength of nature, and the working of the poison, and it being very like nature had gotten the better in that contention, by the thrusting out of boils, blotches, and blains: they fearing it might come to light upon the judgment of physicians that foul play had been offered him, consented to stifle him with the bed-cloaths, which accordingly was performed, and so ended his miserable life, with the assurance of the conspirators that he died by poison, none thinking otherwise

9 Maii 1613, 11 Jacobi, &c. at the Tower of London, in the parish of Allhallows Barking, did obtain and get into his hand certain poison of green and yellow colour, called Rosalgar, (knowing the same to be deadly poison) and the same did maliciously and feloniously mingle and compound in a kind of broth poured out into a certain dish; and the same broth so infected and poisoned, did give and deliver to the said sir Thomas Overbury as wholesome and good broth, to the intent therewith to kill and poison the said sir Thomas, which broth he took and did eat.

Also the said Weston upon the first of July, 11 Jacobi, as aforesaid, did in like manner get another poison or poisons compounded, called White Arsenick, and (knowing the same to be deadly poison) did give unto the said sir Thomas Overbury, as good and wholesome to eat, who took and did eat.

Also that Weston, upon the said 19th of July following, did get another poison called Mercury Sublimate, (knowing the same to be mortal poison) and put and mingled the same in tarts and jellies, and gave the same unto sir Thomas Overbury, as good and wholesome to eat, which he in like manner took and did eat.

Also the said Weston, and another man being an apothecary, afterwards, upon the 14th of September, feloniously did get a poison, called Mercury Sublimate, (knowing the same to be deadly poison) and put the same into a clyster mingled with the said poison: and the said clyster the said apothecary, for the reward of 20*l.* promised unto him, did put and minister (as good and wholesome) into the guts of said sir T.; and that Weston was present and aiding to the said apothecary in ministering and infusing the said clyster; and that immediately after, as well the taking of the said poisoned meats, and ministering the said clyster, the said sir T. did languish, and fell into diseases and distempers; and from the aforesaid times of taking and eating the said poisoned meats, and ministering the said clyster, he died: and so the jury gave their verdict, That Weston in this manner had killed, poisoned, and murdered the said sir T. against the king's peace and dignity.

Which Indictment being read, he was demanded if he were guilty of the felony, murdering, and poisoning, as aforesaid, yea or no. To which he answered, doubling his speech, 'Lord have mercy upon me! Lord have mercy upon me!' But being again demanded, he answered, Not Guilty. And being then demanded how he would be tried, he answered, he referred himself to God, and would be tried by God; refusing to put himself and his cause upon the jury or country, according to the law or custom.

Hereupon the lord chief justice, and all other in their order, spent the space of an hour in persuading him to put himself upon the trial of the law; declaring unto him the danger and mischief he ran into by resisting his ordinary course of trial, being the means ordained by God for his deliverance, if he were innocent; and how by this means he would make himself the author of his own death, even as if he should with a knife or dagger kill or stab himself, exhorting him very earnestly either with repentance to confess his fault, or else with humility and duty to submit himself to his ordinary trial. Whereupon he stubbornly answered, Welcome by the grace of God; and he referred himself to God. And so when no persuasions could prevail, the lord chief justice plainly delivered his opinion*, That he was persuaded that Weston had been dealt withal by some great ones, guilty of the same fact, as accessory, to stand mute, whereby they might escape their punishment: and therefore he commanded (for satisfaction of the world) that the queen's attorney there present should declare, and set forth the whole evidence, without any fear or partiality: and yet notwithstanding, he once more used much persuasion to the prisoner to consider what destruction he brought upon himself by his contempt; and declaring unto him how his offence of contempt was, in refusing his trial, and how the laws of the land had provided a sharper and more severe punishment to such offenders than unto those that were guilty of high treason: and so he repeated the form of judgment† given against such, the extremity and rigour whereof was expressed in these words, onerè, frigore et fame. For the first, he was to receive his punishment by the law, to be extended, and then to have weights laid upon him, no more than he was able to bear, which were by little and little to be increased.

For the second, that he was to be exposed in an open place, near to the prison, in the open air, being naked.

And lastly, that he was to be preserved with the coarsest bread that could be got, and water out of the next sink or puddle to the place of execution, and that day he had water he should have no bread, and that day he had bread he should have no water; and in this torment he was to linger as long as nature could linger out, so that oftentimes men lived in that extremity eight or nine days: adding further, that as life left him, so judgment should find him. And therefore he required him, upon consideration of these reasons, to advise himself to plead to the country, who notwithstanding absolutely refused.

* The chief justice had intelligence underhand, that Yelverton, an obliged servant to the house of the Howards, had advised this counsel for Weston, in order to prevent the prosecution from reaching any farther: Yelverton was at this time Solicitor-general, but does not appear to have had any share in any of the trials for the murder of sir Thomas Overbury, though the Attorney and other counsel of the king had their parts in them.

† Concerning standing mute and the punishment of penance or peine fort et dure, See 2 Hale's P. C. c. 43, but now by st. 12 G. 3, c. 30, standing mute shall have the same judgment and all other consequences as a conviction by verdict or confession.

Hereupon the lord chief justice willed sir Lawrence Hyde, the queen's attorney, and there of counsel for the king, to manifest unto the audience the guiltiness of the said Weston by his own confession, signed with his own hand; and if in the declaration thereof they may meet with any great persons whatsoever, as certainly there were great-ones confederate in that fact, he should boldly and faithfully open whatsoever was necessary, and he could prove against them. Whereupon Mr. Attorney began his accusation:

First, he charged the countess of Somerset and the earl to be principal movers unto this unhappy conclusion, Mrs. Turner to be of the confederacy, and the pay-mistress of the prisoner's reward; in which the Attorney's boldness was very observable, in terming the countess a dead and rotten branch, which being lopt off, the noble tree, meaning that noble family, would prosper the better.

Secondly, he proceeded to the cause, which he affirmed to be the malice of the countess; and the ground of this malice he alledged, and by many inducements he evidently affirmed, that sir Thomas Overbury had dissuaded the viscount Rochester from that adulterate marriage with the countess of Somerset, then countess of Essex. And for this he alledged as followeth:

Sir T. Overbury having divers times dissuaded the earl, then viscount Rochester, from seeking by any means to procure marriage with the countess of Essex, to which he saw the earl too much inclined; and having very earnest conference with the earl one night in private in the gallery at White-Hall concerning his intentment, perceiving the earl too much at that time to desire that unlawful communication; in the ardency of his fervent affection unto the earl, and great presence of the future misery it would inevitably bring unto him, (his well-beloved lord and friend) used speeches to this effect:

'Well, my Lord, if you do marry that filthy base woman, you will utterly ruin your honour and yourself; you shall never do it by my advice or consent; and if you do, you had best look to stand fast.'

My lord replied, bewitched with the love of the said countess, moved with sir T. Overbury for so slighting her, answered, 'my own legs are straight and strong enough to bear me up; but, in faith, I will be even with you for this:' and so parted from him in a great rage.

This conference was over-heard by some in an adjoining room, and their depositions for the truth thereof were read in court.

Although this conference moved the earl to such a sudden choler, yet it seemed sir T. Overbury conceived it no otherwise than a sudden extreme distemperature or passion, and not a final conclusion of their bosom-friend as before, in which the earl seemed reciprocal: howsoever, in his double-dealing it seemed to be clearly otherwise.

For upon this the earl moved the king to appoint sir T. Overbury ambassador for Russia. The king, willing to prefer sir T. Overbury, as one whose worth and valour was not unknown to his majesty, accordingly adjoined him that service; the which sir T. was most willing to accept of, as a gracious aspect of the king towards him: which willingness of his was proved by the deposition of two or three several witnesses read in court, and by the oath of sir Dudley Diggs, who voluntarily, at the arraignment in open court, upon his oath, witnessed how sir Thomas had imparted to him his readiness to be employed on an embassy.

The earl as well abusing the king's favours, in moving to shew favour where he meant the party should take no benefit, as bearing dishonest friendship, in conference with sir Thomas concerning that employment, persuaded him to refuse to serve ambassador, where (quoth he) I shall not be able to perform such kindness to your advantage, as having you with me: and (quoth he) if you be blamed or committed for it, care not, I will quickly free you from all harm. Sir Thomas, thus betrayed by a friend, refused to serve in that nature; whereupon he was committed to the Tower.

Being thus committed, he was presently committed close prisoner, and a keeper he must have; and who must that be but this Weston, who was commended by the countess of Essex to sir T. Monson, to be by him recommended over unto the lieutenant of the Tower, to be keeper to sir T. Overbury. Sir T. Monson, according to the countess's request, commended the said Weston to sir Jervis Elwes; whereupon the said lieutenant entertained the said Weston, and appointed him to keep sir T. Overbury. The said Weston, upon his own confession read in court, signed with his mark, had during the time that she was countess of Essex, been a procurer and pandar to the said earl, then viscount Rochester, and the countess of Essex, for the conveying and effecting of their adulterate desires, which they did divers times consummate, meeting in Mrs. Turner's house once between the hours of eleven and twelve, and at Hammersmith, and at divers times elsewhere, for that purpose; that now, by the procurement of the countess, (who hated sir T. Overbury, for being a good means to keep them from contaminating themselves with such lustful embracements, and from the purposed marriage they mutually laboured to compass) her pandar was become his keeper, a fit agent for lust and murder.

Weston now being become sir T. Overbury's keeper, kept him so close, that he scarce had the comfort of the day's brightness; neither suffered he any one to visit him, father, brother, his best friends, his nearest kindred were strangers to him from the beginning of his imprisonment unto the end.

Mrs. Turner, upon the first day's keeping, promised to give him a contenting reward, if he should administer such things to sir T. Overbury as should be sent unto him, thinking him a fit instrument to compass black murder, that was so well acquainted with foul lust; and so indeed they found him, for he agreed and did promise to administer whatsoever she would send him. Mrs. Turner, upon this murderous promise, the very same day that Weston became sir T. Overbury's keeper, being the 6th day of May, 1613, sent unto him the said Weston certain yellow poison, called Rosalgar, in a vial.

Weston having received that poison, the aforesaid 6th of May at night, bringing sir T. Overbury's supper in one hand, and the vial of poison in the other, meets with the lieutenant, and asks him in these terms, 'Sir, shall I give it him now?' Upon this word 'now,' the lord chief justice demurs, to aggravate the maliciousness; affirming that this particle 'now,' shewed a resolution to poison him. 'What shall you give him?' replies the lieutenant. Weston replies, 'as if you did not know, sir.' The lieutenant blaming him, he carries the poison into an inner room, which Weston, the 9th of May, did administer to sir T. Overbury in broth. This was proved both by Weston and the lieutenant's confession.

Weston having given this poison, which wrought very vehemently with him by vomits and extreme purging, he presently demands his reward of Mrs. Turner, who replies, 'That the man is not yet dead: perfect your work, and you shall have your hire.' This was also confessed by Weston under his marks.

Sir T. Overbury, by his close imprisonment, growing sick, and daily languishing, after three or four weeks space (considering he had not got his freedom and release, having no friends suffered to come unto him, but only such as the earl sent to comfort him, of his own followers) writ to the earl to remember his imprisonment; who received answer, 'The time would not suffer, but so soon as possible might be, he would hasten his delivery;' so indeed it seems he intended to do, but not so as sir T. Overbury conceived, whose true affection would not admit his judgment to debate the strangeness of his imprisonment, which he might well think the earl might easily have relieved.

The 5th of June, viscount Rochester sent a letter to sir T. Overbury; in the letter he sent him a white powder, willing sir T. to take it: 'It will,' quoth he, 'make you more sick; but fear not, I will make this a means for your delivery, and for the recovery of your health.' Sir T. Overbury never dreaming of base treachery, but conceiving it as a friendly policy, received the said powder, which wrought upon him more vehemently; whereupon his sickness grew more vehement or violent, and his languishment increased: which white powder, upon Weston's confession, was poison.

Sir T. Overbury's sickness increasing, and with it his wondering that he could not in two months space be released, after his physick taking, he thus writes to the earl, lamenting his own estate; for his faith being thus shaken with the earl's unkindness, gave way for his judgment to scan those actions, rather like an understanding man, than like a loving friend, as appeareth by his letter sent to viscount Rochester, the effect whereof was thus, as it is avowed by the deposition of sir T. Overbury's servants, who saw the letter.

Sir Thomas Overbury's Letter to the Viscount Rochester.

"Sir; I wonder you have not yet found means to effect my delivery; but I remember you said, you would be even with me [not suspecting, as it seemeth, any poisoning, but an unkind forgetfulness of my lord of Rochester] and so indeed you are; but assure yourself, my lord, if you do not release me, but suffer me thus to die, my blood will be required at your hands."

My lord comforts him, and excuses, that it cannot yet be compassed: Sir Thomas, after the powder taken, languisheth deadly; and to comfort him, some followers of my lord of Rochester's are sent to him daily, in the name of my lord, by the appointment and procurement too of the lady of Essex (as Weston confessed) to visit and comfort him, and to intreat him if he desired any meat, that he should speak, and it might be better perhaps provided for him, than he should have in the Tower: this was about three months after his imprisonment.—He, as men sick desire luscious meats, desired tarts and jellies, which were provided by Mrs. Turner, with the knowledge of the said countess, and sent unto him, of which he did eat; the which tarts were poisoned with Mercury Sublimatè, not being so well coloured as other tarts are, and Weston confessed that he was straitly charged not to taste thereof.

Sir T. thus continuing languishing with the extremity of sickness, until the 6th of Sep. when the aforesaid Mrs. Turner did procure an apothecary's boy for twenty pounds to poison a clyster, which was by the boy and Weston afterwards administered as good physick, upon the 7th day of October; after the receipt of the clyster, he fell into a great extremity of vomiting, and other purging, which left him not, till it caused his soul to leave his poisoned body: this Weston confessed and signed.—Being thus dead, he was presently and very unreverently buried in a pit, digged in a very mean place; on his body thus venomously infected, appeared divers blains and blisters: whereupon they, to take away as well his good name, as his life, did slanderously report, that he died of the French pox; but this report was cleared in court, by the depositions of his servants, and other men of worth there read.—That before his imprisonment, he had a clean and sound body, only he had an issue in his left arm, purposely made for the benefit of his nature, for the avoiding of rheum and ill humours, which, with continual sitting at his study, he had subjected himself unto.—He further observed the confession of the Lieutenant to be, that if any prisoner died there, his body was to be viewed, and inquisition to be taken by the coroner.

But sir T. Overbury's friends and others by no means might be suffered to see his body; and although it was reported, that there was an inquisition taken, yet it could by no means be found.

After Mr. Attorney had ended his speech, Mr. Warr, also of counsel for the king, declared to the court what familiarity he had with sir T. being both of the Temple together, much commending his singular honest and virtuous conversation; affirming, That he was addicted to no dishonest actions: and from this he proceeded to urge his sad usage in the Tower, where he might have no company, but the apothecary and the Walloon; and repeating the sending of the tartis and jellies in my lord of Somerset's name, he ended his speech with this saying, 'Pereat unus, ne pereant omnes; pereat peccans, ne pereat Respub.' Then, by the commandment of the court, were read by Mr. Fenshaw the Examinations of divers witnesses taken before my lord chief justice and others, which in effect were as follows:

Laurence Davies, servant to sir T. Overbury, examined the 15th of October, before the Lord Chief Justice.

He saith, That he had served sir T. Overbury eight or nine years; in all which time he was very healthful, and never kept his bed for any sickness, only he was sometimes troubled with the spleen, for ease whereof, he had by the advice of his physician an issue made in his left arm; but before his imprisonment, he had no sores, blisters, or other defects in all his body.—Also he saith, sir T. would have gone over upon the embassage, but was dissuaded by Somerset, who promised to bear him out: he complained, he needed not to be prisoner if Somerset would; and that if he died, his blood would be required at his hands.—That Somerset was as good as his word, who told him at Newmarket, he would be even with sir T. Overbury.

Henry Payton, another servant of sir T. Overbury's, examined the 15th of October, 1615.

He affirmeth, that sir T. was of a very good constitution of body; that he used sometimes to run, to play at foils, and such like; that he was of a moderate diet, never had any sores, saving the issue in his arm. That sir T. wrote letters to Somerset, signifying that he needed not to lie in prison if Somerset would, and if he died, his blood should be required at his hands.—That sir T. at one of the clock at night, meeting Somerset in the gallery at Whitehall, had speeches with him touching the countess, whom he called base woman, and told Somerset, he would overthrow all the king's favours and honours; and upon displeasure between them at this conference, sir T. Overbury desired Somerset that he might have his portion due, and he would shift for himself. Whereunto Somerset answered, And my legs are straight enough to carry me; and so flung away in anger. All which this examine heard, being in a chamber next to the gallery.

Sir Dudley Diggs being present in court, and sworn, declared vixs voce, that he was sent by a privy-counsellor, a great man, to sir T. Overbury, to bring him to this great man, which he did; and coming back together over the water in a boat, sir T. was much discontented; the reason whereof he said was, That he was persuaded by the great man to withdraw himself from the court for some reasons which he disclosed not: And sir Dudley afterwards being sent by the lords, to know the resolution of sir T. touching the embassage, he found him to rely upon the lord of Somerset, saying, My precious chief knows the king's mind better than any, and I the mind of my precious chief.

Richard Weston, the prisoner, examined, the 6th of October, 1615, coram Coke & Crew.

He affirmeth, That before sir T. Overbury was in the Tower, he, this examinant, carried three letters to Somerset, from the lady Essex, to Royston, Newmarket, and Hampton-court, and he delivered answer to Mrs. Turner; and that upon the letter to Hampton-court, he had answer only by word of mouth, That his lordship would come: And that coming back, he met with the countess and Mrs. Turner half way, in the coach, whom he told, that the lord only answered so; whereupon the countess strook out of the way into a farmer's house hard by, whither within a little space Somerset came, and that afterwards they met in the night at Mrs. Turner's house in Paternoster Row. And he confesseth, that of a year before sir T.'s imprisonment, no man carried letters between them but he.

Sir Thomas Monson examined the 5th of October, coram Coke & Crew.

He saith, that he never knew Weston until sir T. Overbury was prisoner in the Tower; and that he preferred him to the Lieutenant, to be keeper of sir T. Overbury, at the request of the countess.

Anne Turner, widow, examined the 11th of October, 1615, coram Coke & Crew.

She saith, That Weston was an antient servant, and her husband's bailiff in the country: She denieth to have any thing to do in placing him in the Tower; but saith, that the countess of Essex did effect it, and used the help of sir Thomas Monson therein.

Sir Jervis Elves examined the 3d of October, 1615, coram Coke & Crew.

He saith, He had a letter from sir T. Monson, requesting him, that Weston might be keeper of sir T. Overbury, and that he did perform it; and afterwards having conference with sir T. Monson, he told him, That his keeper was not to suffer any letters or tokens, or any things to be delivered unto him.

Richard Weston the prisoner examined again,

He confesseth, He shewed him the glass that was delivered him by his son from the countess to the Lieutenant, and told him, that it came from the countess of Essex, and that he persuaded him not to give it to sir Thomas.

He saith, That he had divers tarts from the countess, to give to sir T. with caveats that he himself should not taste of them; and confesseth, that he thought they were poisoned.

He saith, Mrs. Turner appointed him to come to White-hall, and that she dealt with him to give sir T. Overbury the water, and told him, he should not drink thereof; and was promised a great reward, and he suspected it was poison. His son afterwards delivered him the glass, which he shewed to the Lieutenant, who rebuked him, and so he set the glass in a study near to sir T.'s chamber, but gave it him not; although he told Mrs. Turner, the next day, he had given the water, which made sir T. to vomit often, and to be exceeding sick.

He saith, Mr. James and Mrs. Rawlins, servants to the countess, came often to know of the examinant, how sir T. Overbury did, and what he would eat; and they delivered him jellies and tarts, which he gave sir T. who did eat thereof.

He saith, he demanded of Mrs. Turner his reward, who answered, he was to have no reward until sir T. was dead, and he was promised a pursuivant's place; but confesseth, that afterwards, at two several times, he received secretly after the death of sir T. for a reward of Mrs. Turner from the countess, 160*l*.

Wm. Weston, son to the prisoner, examined.

He confesseth, he received a glass from the countess, by her servant, two inches long, being wrapped in paper, which he delivered to his father in the Tower.

Then was read the Confession of the Lieutenant to the King.

He saith, That Weston met him, carrying sir T.'s supper in the one hand, and the glass in the other, and demanded of the Lieutenant this, 'Sir, shall I give it him now?' Whereat the Lieutenant stepped to him, and asked him, 'What?' To which Weston said, 'Why, sir, know you not what is to be done?' And so the Lieutenant having made him to confess the matter, dissuaded him, and he seemed to be resolved not to do it; and afterwards this Weston confessed, that an apothecary had 20*l*. for administering a clyster to sir T. Overbury.

Weston, the prisoner, examined before the lord Zouch and others;

Confesseth, That sir T. had a clyster which gave him sixty stools and a vomit; also being confronted with the writings of sir Jervis Elwes, and charged therewith, he confesseth the same to be true.

Simon Marson, musician, examined;

Saith, He served sir T. Monson six years, and is preferred by him to the king's service, but waiteth sometimes upon sir T. Monson; he saith, That he received divers tarts and jellies from the countess of Essex, to be carried to the Lieutenant of the Tower for sir T. Overbury.

Paul de la Bell, examined;

Saith, That on the 3d of July, he made sir

T. Overbury a bath by Dr. Micham's advice, to cool his body, and that he saw his body very exceeding fair and clear; and again, he saw his body, being dead, full of blisters, and so consumed away, as he never saw the like body. George Rawlins, a kinsman to sir T. Overbury, examined;

Saith, That upon the bruit of the murder of sir T. he was taxed by some, why he made no prosecution; he thereupon made a petition, and delivered it to the king, that the examination of the cause might be referred to law, and denieth that he was persuaded by any to the contrary: he saith, that he coming often to the Tower to see sir T. could not be suffered to see him so much as out at the windows; and Weston told him, it was the commandment of the council, and of the Lieutenant.

He saith, That after the death of sir T. Weston came to him, and told him he was much neglected and slighted by the countess, and could receive no reward; but afterwards he confessed he had received 100*l*. and should receive more: and the Lieutenant also saith, that sir T. Overbury was very angry with his apothecary at certain vomits which he had, and also at the tarts and jellies he had, which would be found within a day or two standing, ill-coloured, and that nobody did eat thereof but sir T.; and Weston confessed unto him, that the apothecary had 20*l*. for administering the clyster.

These Examinations being read, and applied to the purpose, the Lord Chief Justice said, he would discharge his duty, first to God, in giving all glory, for the bringing to light of so horrible and wicked a fact; and next to the king his great master, who as in case of the like nature, as in the case of Sanquer and Turner, so especially in this, hath given straight charge of just and due examination to be had without any manner of partiality or fear in the world; to the intent, that as well the innocent might be freed, as the nocent and guilty severally punished.

And for this purpose, his majesty hath with his own hand written two sheets of paper on both sides, concerning justice to be administered to all parties which were to be examined; which writing the Lord Chief Justice shewed to the Lord Mayor, and the rest of the commissioners; and then he declared the king's justice, who, albeit the many favours and honours which his majesty had bestowed on the lord Somerset, and his nearness to his person, by reason of his office, yet he had committed him prisoner to the dean of Westminster's house, under the custody of sir Oliver St. John, and also had committed his lady. So having last of all, again, demanded of the prisoner, if he would put himself to be tried by the country? which he refused;

The court was adjourned until Monday following, at two of the clock in the afternoon.

On Monday the 25<sup>d</sup> of Oct. 1615, to which day the court was adjourned by the said commissioners, after proclamation made, the jury of life and death called, the prisoner Weston was set to the bar, and Mr. Fenshaw, Clerk of the Crown, declared unto him, that he had been formerly arraigned, and had pleaded Not Guilty; so he demanded of him, how he would be tried: whereupon the prisoner answered, By God and his country. And thereupon the jury being sworn, and the indictment being read as before, sir Lawrence Hyde, the queen's Attorney, being of counsel with the king, having briefly rehearsed the effect of the indictment, shewed how that he must necessarily mention others that were guilty of the same fact, wherein if any other man or woman were touched, the cause it was, and not he that touched them.

And therefore Weston being but a stranger to sir T. Overbury, and one, who by himself could reap no benefit by his death, it was against all reason that he would do it of himself, therefore, said he, I must needs open the whole plot; and he first declared the worth and honesty of sir T. Overbury, shewed his familiarity with Rochester, and how often he would him to forbear the company of the lady Essex, terming her a vile and base woman, which stirred up the anger and malice of the countess against him.

And that afterwards, the king intended, for the honour and preferment of sir T. Overbury, to send him upon an embassy; whereunto he was willing, but was dealt with and persuaded by the lord Rochester, to disobey the king's direction and counsel, with promises that he would bear him out; by which contempt sir T. was committed to the Tower the 22<sup>d</sup> of April, 1613, Sir W. Wade being Lieutenant of the Tower: the 6th of May following, sir W. was removed, and sir J. Elwes put in his place. And the next day after, Weston, by the procurement of the countess, was preferred to the service of the Lieutenant, and to be keeper of sir Thomas; which Weston had been servant to Mrs. Turner, and the only agent in conveying letters and messages between Rochester and the countess; and he, whose office should have been to save and keep, was now appointed to kill and murder him. He shewed how the very same day of his entertainment at the Tower, he was sent for to the countess, who persuaded him, that if he would give sir T. a water that should be delivered him, he should be well rewarded, and she bid him not taste of it himself. And that on the 9th of the same month of May, the said water was secretly sent from the countess to Weston by his son; and the same night Weston meeting with the Lieutenant, and having sir T.'s supper in one hand, and the said glass in the other, he demanded of the Lieutenant, 'Sir, shall I give it him now?' Whereupon the Lieutenant took him aside, and dissuaded him so far forth, that he confessed, he thanked God upon his knees, that he had met with him.

But Mr. Attorney observed this notwithstanding that the Lieutenant did let him go away with the poison; and albeit he now denieth he ever gave the poison, yet said he delivered it: he confessed to Mrs. Turner he had done it, saying, it made him very sick, and to vomit often, demanding of her his reward; to which she answered, He was not to have his reward until sir T. were dead. Then he shewed how the last of June following, a certain powder was sent in a letter to sir T. Overbury from Rochester, persued him not to fear though it made him sick, for that should be his reason to move the king for his enlargement. And that the 14th of Sept. Weston and the apothecary ministered the clyster to sir T. which gave him sixty stools and vomits, and that he died the next day; he remembered the strangeness of the blatches and blisters on his body, being dead; he shewed how Weston came to Mrs. Turner for his reward, which was deferred till his death; and that he had received in secret from the countess by Mrs. Turner at several times for his reward 180*l.*, and that the apothecary had for his reward 20*l.* All which Weston had confessed to be true. Then remembering how ignominiously they buried him, not suffering any to see him, for fear he should be digged up again, and without any coroner's inquest that should be found; and thus he ended his speech.

And to all this opened and set forth by Mr. Attorney, Mr. Warr only added thus much, which he desired the Jury to consider. That Weston was servant to Mrs. Turner when sir T. was committed, and then he was entertained and made keeper to sir T. Overbury; and having dispatched his business (sir T. being dead and poisoned), he stayed no longer at the Tower, but returns again to Mrs. Turner.

Then the lord chief justice exhorted the jury to take God before their eyes, and with equal balance to weigh as well the answer of the prisoner, as the proofs and examinations against him; declaring unto them how quietly and freely he had examined him from time to time, without menacing or rough usage, which the prisoner confessed: and my lord, for matter of law, satisfied the Jury, That albeit the poisoning in the indictment be said to be with Rosinagar, White Arsenick, and Mercury Sublimate, yet the Jury were not to expect precise proof in that point, shewing how impossible it were to convict a poisoner who useth not to take any witnesses to the composing of his siber sauces: wherefore he declared the law in the like case; as if a man be indicted for murdering a man with a dagger, and it fall out upon evidence to have been done with a sword or with a rapier, or with neither, but with a staff; in this case the instrument skilleth not, so that the Jury find the murder. And so in this prisoner's case, if they would be satisfied of the poisoning, it skilleth not with what; therefore he requirith them to attend the proof. [3 Co. Inst. 49. 135.]

Then were read first the Examinations of Laurence Davier, as at the first Arraignment;

then of Henry Payton, both servants to sir T. Overbury; then of Weston himself formerly read.

Then the Examination of sir David Wood, taken the 21st of October 1615, since the first Arraignment.

He saith, He had obtained the king's consent to a suit, for which he was a petitioner, and that he was crossed by the lord Rochester and sir T. Overbury: that for certain words he had received from sir T. Overbury, he intended to bastinado him; that his suit would have been worth 2200*l.* and that Rochester would not let it pass, unless he might have 1200*l.*

That the lady Essex sent for this examinant upon the day that the king and queen went to Rochester with the lady Elizabeth, and told him, she understood that he had received much wrong from sir T. Overbury, and that he was a gentleman that could revenge himself; and that sir T. had much wronged her; and sir David answered, That sir T. had refused him the field; she persuaded him to kill him, and promised him 1000*l.* for his reward, and protection from his enemies; which he refused, saying, He would be loth to hazard going to Tyburn upon a woman's word; but she still persuaded him he might easily do it, as he returned late home from sir Charles Wilnot's in his coach.

Then were read the Examinations of sir T. Monson, and Mrs. Turner, as at the first Arraignment.

Next, the examination of Weston before the lord Zouch and sir Ralph Windwood, sir T. Parry, and sir Foulke Grevill, at the Duchy-house, the 29th of Sept. 1615, where Weston did confess, that he was preferred to the keeping of sir T. Overbury by Mrs. Turner, upon the means and request of sir T. Monson to the Lieutenant; and that she told him, If he would give sir T. Overbury a water which the countess would send him, he should be well rewarded; and being confronted with a relation in writing, which sir J. Elves had made to the king, as touching sir T. Overbury, he confessed the same to be all true.

The Examination of the Lieutenant, taken the 5th of October, 1615.

He saith, That having conferred with his servants about the time of Weston's coming to the Tower, he found it to be the very next day after himself was made Lieutenant, and had the possession of the Tower; and that he had letters from sir Thomas Monson, that Weston might be keeper to sir T. Overbury; which letters he had lost. Sir Thomas Monson told him the chief purpose of Weston's keeping of sir T. Overbury, was, to suffer no letters or other messengers to pass to or from him, and to that purpose he advised the Lieutenant.

Weston's Examination the 5th of Oct. 1615.

He confesseth, That the next day he was preferred to the Tower, he had the keeping of sir

T. Overbury, and soon after he received the glass by his son secretly from the countess; and that the Lieutenant told him, all the tarts came likewise from her: and he confesseth, the countess willed him to give them to sir T. but not to taste of them himself.

Weston's Examination the 1st of Oct. 1615.

Confesseth, That Mrs. Turner appointed him to come to Whitehall to the countess, the next day that he was at the Tower; and that he went, and the countess did request him to give to sir T. Overbury a water, which she would deliver him, but not to drink of it himself; she promised to give him a good reward, and he suspected it was poison: he received the glass by his son, and told the Lieutenant of it, who did rebuke him, and he set the glass into a little study. He confesseth, he told Mrs. Turner he had given it him, and demanded his reward; that Mr. James and Mr. Rawlins, my lord of Somerset's men, came often to know of him what tarts, jellies, or wine sir T. would have, and that they brought divers times tarts and jellies, whereof he did eat.

He confesseth to have received of the countess in rewards, after sir T. Overbury's death, by Mrs. Turner secretly, in all 180*l.*

The Confession of the Lieutenant to his majesty.

After Weston was placed in the Tower, he met with me with sir Thomas's supper, and the glass, and asked me, 'Sir, shall I give it him now?' wherein I protest unto your majesty my ignorance, as I would also be glad to protest the same to the world: so I privately conferred with Weston, and by this means made him assured unto me, and knew all, but dissuaded him; and Weston has since the death of sir T. Overbury, confessed to me, that the clyster was his overthrow, and the apothecary had 2*q*l. for administering it. Your majesty's servant, sir JERVIS ELVES.

Here the lord chief justice observed by this question of Weston to the lieutenant, 'Shall I give it him now?' that it was certainly agreed and plotted before what should be done, and that nothing more was doubted on but the time when it should be done.

The Testimony of Lawrence Davies, taken upon Oath before Coke and Crew.

He affirmeth, that Weston delivered him a letter from sir Thomas Overbury to Rochester, the effect whereof was, that he would do his endeavour in being a means of friendship between Rochester and some others; but as touching the marriage with the countess of Essex, he would never give his consent: and also bringing a letter from Rochester to sir T. Overbury, he delivered it to Weston, and a paper of white powder fell out, which Rochester persuaded sir T. to eat, and not to fear, though it made him sick, for that should be a means for his enlargement; so they put the powder into the letter again. He saith, that he saw some part of the powder in Weston's hands after the death of sir T. Overbury.

Then were read the Examinations of William Weston and Paul de la Bell, as at the first Arraignment.

The Examination of George Rawlins.

George Rawlins, esq. the 15th of October, 1615, saith, That upon the bruit of poisoning of sir T. Overbury, being taxed of divers, for that he stirred not in the matter, sir T. being his kinsman and means of his preferment; he did of himself prefer a petition to the king, that the cause might be referred to the judges of the law, for ordinary course of justice, rather than to the lords of the council, by them to be examined; of which he had a gracious answer: and saith, that of fourteen days before the death of sir T. Overbury, he could never be suffered to see him, either in his chamber, or at the window; which, Weston said, was the commandment of the lords and the Lieutenant.

And here the Lord Chief Justice declared what a scandal they put upon his majesty and the state, that a gentleman and a freeman, being only committed upon contempt, should be more straightly and closely kept than a traitor or a bond slave, so that neither his father, brother, nor friend might possibly see him. And to that point, Mr. Overbury, father to sir T., swore, being present in court; who said, That his son being prisoner in the Tower, and himself not being suffered to have access unto him, found at last, that Rochester was the man that withstood it.

The Lieutenant examined the 5th of October.

Saith, That after the death of sir T. Overbury, Weston told him, that he was neglected by the countess, and demanded his reward: Mrs. Turner told him, the countess had not money; but afterwards he confessed, he had received some, and should have more; and that Mr. James told him, my lord of Somerset would reward him for the pains he took with sir T. Overbury. He saith, That the tarts were sent from the countess to sir T. which looked ill-favouredly, and that the jellies with a little standing would be furred, and thinketh they were poisoned: also Weston told him, that the apothecary had 20*l.* for giving the clyster, and that he was poisoned with that clyster.

Here was well observed by the court, as by the queen's attorney, That Weston was not single in his Confession, but whensoever he had confessed any thing in any of his Examinations, it was likewise confirmed by the Examinations of others, as the Lieutenant, his son, &c.

The EXAMINATION of William Goare, one of the Sheriffs of London.

Saith, Weston being in his custody, he often persuaded him to put himself to be tried by his country, telling him, he would first kill himself, and ask God forgiveness afterwards: and Weston answered, He hoped he would not make a net to catch little birds, and let the great ones go.

Then Mr. Warr craving leave of the court to speak, protested, in his experience he never found a business so prosecuted with degrees of malice, which was the ground of sir T. Overbury's overthrow: he urged the evidence in the examination of sir David Wood, and shewed the reasons of the malice against him to be, for that he was so great an impediment to affections. Then he made the dependency Mrs. Turner had to the lady, and Weston to Mrs. Turner, and how they all concluded to kill sir T. Overbury, the like whereof he said our fathers never saw before us; and he lamented the place from whence the poison came, should be from the court, the place (said he) from whence all men expect their safeties and protection.

Lastly, he observed the finger of God, even in this, that the poison had been scarcely suspected at all, or enquired after, had it not been for the extraordinary strange things appearing after his death, which was the first only cause of suspicion and muttering.

The evidence being given, Weston was demanded what he could say for himself? Who, although he had before confessed all his examinations to be true, yet he seemed to excuse himself in a kind of ignorance or unawares: he said, he received the said glass, and thought it was not good, but desired the giving of it to sir Thomas; being demanded, why he had formerly accused one Franklin, for delivering him the said glass from the countess? (from whom indeed it was sent;) he confessed it was to save his child, and finally could say nothing that had any colour of material or substantial point to excuse or argue innocency in him. So the court referred him to the jury; who went together, and within a short space returned, being agreed upon their verdict, and there at the bar gave in, that Weston was guilty of the felonious murdering and poisoning of sir T. Overbury. And then the clerk of the crown demanded of Weston, what he could say for himself, why judgment should not be pronounced against him according to law? To which he answered, He referred himself to my lord, and to the country. And then the lord chief justice, before he pronounced sentence of death, spake to this effect, that for the duty of the place, he must say somewhat; and that to two several persons: First, to the auditory: and, secondly, to the prisoner.

And that which he spake to the auditory, he divided into four parts: 1st, The manifestation of the glory of God, and honour of the king. 2dly, The preventing of other damned crimes of poisoning. 3dly, An Answer to certain objections. 4thly, That there is no practice of conspiracy in prosecuting of the business.

For the 1st, he observed the finger of God in the manifestation and bringing to light of this matter, having slept two years, being shadowed with greatness, which cannot overcome the cry of the people.

He observed also the providence and goodness of God, who put into the hearts of himself and the rest of the judges, the day of the prisoner's last arraignment, when he stood mute, not to give judgment against him for that time, but defer it till now; and how in the mean time it pleased his majesty out of his gracious care and pity, to send to the prisoner first the bishop of London, next the bishop of Ely, to admonish and persuade him for the saving of his soul; who, after each of them had spent two hours with him, it pleased God (when they had left him) to move his heart, so that now he did put himself to be tried by the country; by which means (using Weston's own words) he said, the great flies shall not escape, but receive their punishment. For conclusion of his first point he lastly observed, 'Divinum quiddam in vulgi opinione,' that notwithstanding so many uncertain rumours touching this case, at last it proved to be true.

2dly, He declared, how for prevention of this damned crime of poisoning, justice was the golden mean, and declared his majesty's resolution straightly to execute justice for that treason; and he used this saying, 'Nemo prudens,' &c. and desired God that this precedent of Overbury might be an example and terror against this horrible crime, and therefore it might be called, 'The great Oyer of poisoning.'

3dly, He said, that at the arraignment there were certain criticks, who had given out, the prisoner should deny his examinations; and found much fault, for that the examinations were read, the prisoner standing mute. But for the first, how untrue it was, all the world saw, the prisoner here confessing them all, being read and shewed unto him: and for the second, besides that it was exceeding discreet and convenient the world should receive some satisfaction in a cause of that nature, he cited and shewed, that by the laws of the land they ought and were bound to do so, notwithstanding the greatness of any, who might thereby be impeached; of whom he said, although this was 'unum crimen,' yet it was not 'unicum crimen.'

4thly, As touching the supposed practice or conspiracy, he solemnly protested to God, he knew of none, nor of any semblance or colour thereof; and therefore he much inveighed against the baseness and unworthiness of such as went about so untruly and wickedly to slander the course of justice. And so he came, last of all, to that which he had to speak of Weston the prisoner.

First, touching the wickedness of his fact, he very seriously exhorted him to an unfeigned confession and contrition for the same, declaring unto him, how that his confession would be a satisfaction to God and the world, and that by his faith and true repentance he would lay hold upon the merits of his Saviour.

He persuaded him, that no vain hope (which is a witch) should keep him back from giving satisfaction to the world, by discovering the guiltiness of the great-ones; assuring him, that after this life, as death left him, so judgment should find him.

And lastly, taking occasion there to remember this poisoning to have been a popish trick, which he instanced by examples of one Gurnandus de Birlanus; mentioned 22 Edw. 1. Squier, that attempted to poison queen Elizabeth's saddle; Lopez, and Mrs. Turner: he then proceeded to give judgment, which was,

That the prisoner should be carried from thence to the place from whence he came, and from thence to Tyburn, and there to be hanged by the neck till he was dead.

Judgment being given, the lord chief justice commanded, that the prisoner might have convenient respite, and the company of some godly learned men to instruct him for his soul's health.

He was afterwards executed at Tyburn, pursuant to the sentence. At the time of his execution, sir John Hollis (afterwards earl of Clare) and sir John Wentworth, out of friendship to the earl of Somerset, rode to Tyburn, and urged Weston to deny all that he had before confessed: but Weston being prepared for death, resisted their temptations, sealing penitently the truth of his confessions with his last gasp; and sir John Hollis, sir John Wentworth, together with Mr. Lumsden, who had published a relation of the proceedings against Weston at his arraignment, were afterwards prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, for traducing the king's justice in those proceedings.*

104. The Trial of ANNE TURNER,* Widow, at the King's-Bench, the 7th of November, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, Mich. 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

THE indictment whereupon Richard Weston took his trial being repeated verbatim, she was

* "And now poor Mrs. Turner, Weston and Franklyn, began the tragedy. Mrs. Turner's day of mourning being better than the day of her birth, for she died very penitently, and shewed much modesty in her last act, which is to be hoped was accepted with God; after that died Weston, and then was Franklyn arraigned, who confessed that Overbury was smothered to indicted for comforting, aiding and assisting the said Weston, in the poisoning to death sir death, not poisoned to death, though he had poison given him. Here was Coke glad how to cast about to bring both ends together, Mrs. Turner and Weston being already hanged for killing Overbury with poison, but he, being the very quintessence of law, presently informs the jury, that if a man be done to death with pistols, poniards, swords, halter, poison, &c. so he

T. Overbury; to which she pleaded Not Guilty, putting herself upon God and the country.* Whereupon a sufficient Jury of two knights, and the rest esquires and freeholders of Middlesex, were sworn and impanelled for the trial, whereof sir T. Fowler was foreman.

Sir Ed. Coke, lord chief justice, told her, that women must be covered in the church, but not when they are arraigned, and so caused her to put off her hat; which done, she covered her hair with her handkerchief, being before dressed in her hair, and her hat over it.

Sir Laurence Hyde, the queen's attorney, opened the matter much to the effect as he did at Weston's Arraignment, shewing the wickedness and heinousness of poisoning: he shewed further, that there was one Dr. Forman, dwelling in Lambeth, who died very suddenly, and a little before his death desired that he might be buried very deep in the ground, or else (saith he) I shall fear you all.—To him, in his life-time, often resorted the countess of Essex and Mrs. Turner, calling him father:† their cause of coming to him was, that by force of magick, he should procure the now earl of Somerset, then viscount Rochester, to love her, and sir Arthur Manwaring to love Mrs. Turner, by whom, as it was there related, she had three children. About this business, the countess of Essex wrote two Letters, one to Mrs. Turner, another to Dr. Forman, as followeth:

The Countess's LETTER to Mrs. Turner.

[Burn this Letter.]

"Sweet Turner; I am out of all hope of any good in this world, for my father, my mother, and my brother said, I should lie with him; and my brother Howard was here, and said, he would not come from this place all winter; so that all comfort is gone; and which is worst of all, my lord hath complained, that he hath not lain with me, and I would not suffer him to use me. My father and mother are angry, but I had rather die a thousand times over; for besides the sufferings, I shall lose his love if I lie with him. I will never desire to see his face, if my lord do that unto me. My lord is very well as ever he was, so as you may see in what a miserable case I am. You may send the party word of all; he sent me word all should be well, but I shall not be so happy as the lord to love me. As you have taken pains all this while for me, so now do all you can, for never so unhappy as now; for I am not able to endure the miseries that are coming on me, but I cannot be happy so long as this man liveth: therefore pray for me, for I have

be done to death, the indictment is good, if but indicted for any of those ways: but the good lawyers of those times were not of that opinion, but did believe that Mrs. Turner was directly murdered by lord Coke's law as Overbury was without any law." need, but I should be better if I had your company to ease my mind. Let him know this ill news: if I can get this done, you shall have as much money as you can demand, this is fair play.—Your sister, FRANCES ESSEX."

"Sweet Father; I must still crave your love, although I hope I have it, and shall deserve it better hereafter: remember the galls, for I fear though I have yet no cause but to be confident, in you, yet I desire to have it as it is yet remaining well; so continue it still, if it be possible, and if you can you must send me some good fortune, alas! I have need of it. Keep the lord still to me, for that I desire; and be careful you name me not to any body, for we have so many spies, that you must use all your wits, and all little enough, for the world is against me, and the heavens favour me not, only happy in your love; I hope you will do me good, and if I be ingrateful, let all mischief come unto me. My lord is lusty and merry, and drinketh with his men; and all the content he gives me, is to abuse me, and use me as doggedly as before: I think I shall never be happy in this world, because he hinders my good, and will ever, I think so; remember, I beg for God's sake, and get me from this vile place.—Your affectionate, loving daughter, FRANCES ESSEX.—Give Turner warning of all things, but not the lord: I would not have any thing come out for fear of the Lord Treasurer, for so they may tell my father and mother, and fill their ears full of toys."

There was also shewed in court certain pictures of a man and woman in copulation, made in lead, as also the mould of brass, wherein they were cast, a black scarf also full of white crosses, which Mrs. Turner had in her custody. At the shewing of these, and enchanted papers and other pictures in court, there was heard a crack from the scaffolds, which caused great fear, tumult and confusion among the spectators, and throughout the hall, every one fearing hurt, as if the devil had been present, and grown angry to have his workmanship shewed, by such as were not his own scholars: and this terror continuing about a quarter of an hour, after silence proclaimed, the rest of the cunning tricks were likewise shewed.

Dr. Forman's wife being administratrix of her husband, found Letters in packets, by which much was discovered; she was in court, and deposed that Mrs. Turner came to her house immediately after her husband's death, and did demand certain pictures which were in her husband's study; namely, one picture in wax, very sumptuously apparelled in silks and satins, as also one other sitting in form of a naked woman, spreading and laying forth her hair in a looking-glass, which Mrs. Turner did confidently affirm to be in a box, and that she knew in what part or room of the study they were.—Mrs. Forman further deposeth, that Mrs. Turner and her husband would be sometimes three or four hours locked up in his study together.

She did depose further, that her husband had a ring would open like a watch.

There was also a Note shewed in the court, made by Dr. Forman, and written in parchment, signifying what ladies loved what lords in the court; but the Lord Chief Justice would not suffer it to be read openly in the court.—

Mr. Turner sent Margaret her maid to Mrs. Forman, and wished that all such Letters and Papers as concerned the earl of Somerset, or the countess of Essex, or any other great personages, should be burnt; telling her, that the Council's Warrant should come to search the study, and that all his goods might be seized: whereupon she and her maid Margaret, with the consent of Mrs. Forman, burnt divers Letters and Papers; but yet she kept some without their privity.—There was also enchantments shewed in court, written in parchment, wherein were contained all the names of the blessed Trinity, mentioned in the scriptures; and in another parchment, + B. + C. + D. + E. and in a third likewise in parchment, were written all the names of the Holy Trinity, as also a figure, in which was written this word Corpus; and upon the parchment was fastened a little piece of the skin of a man.—In some of these parchments, were the devils particular names, who were conjured to torment the lord Somerset and sir Arthur Manwaring, if their loves should not continue, the one to the countess, the other to Mrs. Turner.

Mrs. Turner also confessed, that Dr. Savories was used in succession after Forman, and practised many sorceries upon the earl of Essex's person.—Mrs. Turner being in a manner kept close prisoner in one of the sheriff's houses in London, before she was brought to the bar, knew not that Weston was executed; but by the proceedings, having understanding thereof, and hearing divers Examinations read, it so much dejected her, that in a manner she spake nothing for herself. Also Examinations and Witnesses, visa voce, that were produced at Weston's Arraignment, and divers others, were now read again, as the Examinations of one Edward Pain, John Wright, and Robert Freeman.

Symcots, Rawlins, Payte, and Williams, at one of these examinations, gave evidence, that one Franklin, being an apothecary and druggist, was the provider of all the poisons given to sir Thomas Overbury.—A Chirurgeon there deposed, that he cured Franklin of the pox, and that at several times he demanded of this Chirurgeon, what was the strongest poison? The Chirurgeon demanding of him what he would do with it, Franklin replies, Nothing but for his experience, and to try conclusions. Another Examination of one Mercer, who had conference with the said Franklin, calling him cousin, who demanded of this examinant, What news? He answered, I hear ill news, I am sorry that my old lord and master's son is found insufficient, and not able to content the lady.—Franklin replies, I have a hand in that business; I have a great friend of my lady of Essex, she allows me 2s. 6d. a-day for my boat-hire, and 10s. a-week for my diet, I could have any money I would. Mercer replies, But, cousin, how can God bless you in this business? Franklin answers, Let them talk of God that have to do with him, my lord of Somerset and the countess will bear me out in any thing I do; if you have any suit, wherein you may do yourself any good, and I may gain by it, I will warrant you I will get it.—Frances deposes, that Franklin married his sister, and that he thinketh in his conscience she was poisoned; and that upon some discontent, he heard him say, He would be hanged never a whore or quean of them all.

The Lord Chief Justice made a Speech upon divers Examinations there read, That the earl of Somerset gave directions, that of the powder he sent to Overbury, that which should be left, should be brought back again: his pretext was, that it should make him sick: which should be the ground to make the king grant his liberty, saying further, It would do Overbury good: and he had tarts and jellies likewise sent him by the countess, with express commandment, that none must eat of them but sir Thomas, saying, they will do him no harm.—At another time, the countess sent tarts, jellies and wine, with directions, that those which had been formerly sent, should be brought back again: and those last brought, should be given him at supper, and then all should be well: but directions given, that neither the Lieutenant nor his wife might eat of them, but they might drink of the wine, for in the tarts and jellies there might be letters, but in the wine there might be none. And afterwards it was openly related, and proved by divers Witnesses, that those words letters were private tokens between the countess, and the Lieutenant, and Weston, to give notice what things were poisoned, and what not.—In the examinations that were of Weston, it was related, that Mr. James told him, that the earl his master would pay him for his pains about sir T. Overbury.

Then the Lord Chief Justice gave in charge to the jury, concerning the Evidence they had formerly heard, and told them, That Weston at his Examination, had confessed that all he had said formerly was true.—He further related, what a great vexation and grief it was to the king, that Somerset only by making use of his favour and love, so foul a fact was done; as, 1st, To be the occasion to put sir T. Overbury to employment for the embassage at Russia; and, 2dly, to make him refuse the same, and to give right cause for his commitment: 3dly, To bear him in hand, that he would work his liberty, but still aggravated and laboured the contrary, and gave directions to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to look surely to him, and to keep him close prisoner, and that he should send to none of his friends, or they to him, urging great matters against him.—Sir Thomas Monson was often employed to give directions to the Lieutenant therein; which was a most barbarous course to be so dealt withal, only for a contempt: concluding, that Overbury was a close prisoner to all his friends, but open to all his enemies, such as Somerset would have or send unto him.

Then the Lord Chief Justice told Mrs. Turner, that she had the seven deadly sins: viz. a whore, a bawd, a sorcerer, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer, the daughter of the devil Forman; wishing her to repent, and to become a servant of Jesus Christ, and to pray to him to cast out of her those seven devils.

She desired the Lord Chief Justice to be good unto her, saying, she was ever brought up with the countess of Somerset, and had been of a long time her servant, and knew not that there was poison in any of those things sent to sir T. Overbury.

Then the Jury went forth, and not long after returned, finding her Guilty. — Who being asked, what she had to say for herself why Judgment should not be pronounced against her? she only desired favour, but could not speak any thing for weeping.

Then Judge Crook made another grave Speech exhorting her to repentance, and to prepare herself ready for death; and that the little time which should be assigned her to live, she should not spend it either in hope or in imagination to get life, for that hope was but a witch. Upon conclusion of which Speech, he gave Judgment, and told her she had had a very honourable Trial, by such men as he had not seen for one of her rank and quality; and so was delivered to the sheriffs.

Upon the Wednesday following, she was brought from the sheriff's in a coach to Newgate, and was there put into a cart; and casting money often among the people as she went she was carried to Tyburn, where she was executed, and whither many men and women of fashion came in coaches to see her die: to whom she made a speech, desiring them not to rejoice at her fall, but to take example by her; she exhorting them to serve God, and abandon pride, and all other sins; relating her breeding with the countess of Somerset, having had no other means to maintain her and her children, but what came from the countess: and said farther, that when her hand was once in this business, she knew the revealing of it would be her overthrow. The which, with other like speeches, and great penitency there shewed, moved the spectators to great pity and grief for her.

105. The Trial of Sir JERVIS ELWES, knt. Lieutenant of the Tower, at the Guildhall of London, the 16th of November, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury: 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

THE form of the Indictment was the malicious aiding, comforting, and abetting of Weston in the poisoning and murdering of Overbury, whereupon it was laid against him as follows;*

1st, When Weston received the vial of poison of two inches long, to give sir T. he having the glass in one hand, and broth for sir T. in the other hand, meeting the Lieutenant, asked him thus, 'Sir, shall I give it him now?' The Lieutenant reproved him; yet that night he gave it him in his broth: Ergo, the Lieutenant knew of the practice and poisoning of sir T. Overbury, 'et qui non propulsat injuriam cum posuit,' infert. Cicero.—After this was known to be poison, yet he kept Weston still: he favoured, countenanced, and graced him, and one time sent him a cup of sack, and bid his man tell him, that he loved him as well as ever he did: all this while he paid him no wages, and as soon as Overbury died, Weston was removed.—The countess wrote a letter to the Lieutenant; with the letter she sent poisoned tarts to Overbury, and wine to the Lieutenant's wife; and bade him give the tarts to Overbury, for there were letters in them, but his wife and children might drink the wine, for she was sure there were no letters in it.—The earl of Northampton writ a letter to the Lieutenant concerning the imprisonment of Overbury; the said earl writ two Letters to Rochester containing these words:

The Earl of Northampton's LETTER to Rochester.

"Sweet lord; Think not I find pain in that which gives me sweetest pleasure, which is any thing that falls from your pen; three things concur to my exceeding joy in your worthy letters, proof of your love, comfort in your words, and judgment in your writing; you may believe the words of him that will rather die than flatter you; my heart is full of the love of you; your characters are no more pain for me to peruse, being as well acquainted with your hand as my own, the pain is no more than the cracking of a nut for the sweet kernel, or my niece's pain, in the silver-dropping stream of your pen.— [There the Lord Chief-Justice left off reading for the bawdiness of it; then after in the Letter followed] I spent two hours yesterday, prompting the Lieutenant with cautions and considerations; observing with whom he is to deal, that he might the better act his part, for the adventure in which he dealeth.—H. NORTHAMPTON."

Another LETTER to Rochester.

"Sweet lord; I cannot deliver unto you with what caution and consideration, &c. and the Lieutenant looking to his business, which concerns no more than text affords, that marched in his affairs, I shall hold him discreet, and love him better whilst I live, for this his conclusion: For this Negro can no more change his skin than a Leopard his spots. HENRY NORTHAMPTON."

Another LETTER to Rochester.

"Sweet lord; Overbury being viewed, there was found in his arm an issue, and on his belly twelve kernels likely to break to issue, each as big as three-pence; one issue on his back, with a tawny plaister on it; this was strange and ugly. He stunk intolerably, in so much that he was cast into the coffin with a loose sheet over him. God is gracious in cutting off ill instruments from off the factious crew: If he had come forth, they would have made use of him. Thus, sweet lord, wishing you all increase of happiness and honour, I end, Your lordship's more than any man, HENRY NORTHAMPTON."

The Lieutenant writ a Letter * to the earl of Northampton, certifying him, That he undertook sir T. Overbury according to his instructions: That as soon as he came to the place, sir T. protested his innocency upon the bible; and then (quoth he) he asked me what they meant to do with him? I answered, 'They mean to refine you, that your pureness may appear a little better.' After I walked with him in his chamber, and advised him to give way to the match between Rochester and the countess; but then he grew hot against your lordship and the countess of Suffolk, saying, 'If he were the countess of Suffolk's prisoner,' (as he thought he was) 'then' (said he) 'let her know that I care as little to die as she to be cruel.' The countess of Suffolk I find to be joined with you

* The effect of this letter is given more at large, in an old book called "Truth brought to Light by Time, or the Hist. of the first 14 years of King James 1." p. 58, thus:

"My special good lord; Having undertaken my prisoner according to your instructions, after long silence, as standing betwixt hope and fear, he takes his bible, and after he had read upon it, laid it by and protested his innocency, afterward upon further conference concerning the countess, he said that he had justified her already, and that he can do no more than what he had done already. But for myself, alas, (quoth he) what will they do with me, I answered, so reason [q. refine] you as you shall make no question hereafter of your pureness. And I left him in some sense to work upon him; as I was going, he concluded, That in the generality she was so worthy that she might be a wife in particular for my lord of Rochester, he would not say it, lest my lord should condemn him for weighing his worth. At my next coming to him, I found him, not in sense, but in fury, he let fly at you, but was respectful to my lord of Rochester whose part he took altogether; I see the event, I desire it may be safely carried, what my service may do in this or any thing else, I will be faithful to your lordship, and so I rest, Yours, JERVIS ELVES."

in this plot, though the chamberlain knows not of it, nor any one else. But Rochester's part I shall much fear, until I see the event to be clearly conveyed. And so he concluded his letter. JERVIS ELVES.

The ANSWER of sir Jervis Elwes to the Points proposed.

"My lord; Before I answer to the matter of charge against me, let me remember your lordship of one speech which I learned from your mouth: I have heard you speak it at the council-table, and you have delivered it at the assizes in the country, That when a prisoner stands at the bar for his life, comfortless, allowed no counsel, but strong counsel against him, perchance affrighted with the fear of death, his wife and children to be cast forth out of doors, and made to seek their bread; you have always pitied the cause of such a one: You have protested you had rather hang in hell for mercy to such a one, than for judgment.—My lord, you have not observed your own rule in my cause; you have paraphrased upon every examination, you have aggravated every evidence, and applied it to me, so that I stand clearly condemned before I be found guilty: If I be so vile a man as your lordship conceives me, I were unworthy of any favour; but I hope your lordship shall not find it.—So I will deny nothing that hath evidence of truth against me, I will not tell a lye to save my life, and I beseech your lordship so to conceive of me, move your charity towards me."

Then desired he the court, that the heads of the Accusations might be collected by the counsel for the king, which were the same which were mentioned before; to which he severally answered, &c.

"To the first, Shall I give it him now? He answered, that when Weston asked him the question, he saw no poison in his hand, and therefore, said he, in Weston's and mine examination, the question was, Shall I give it him now? not, Shall I give him this now? for there is a great difference between hoc and id in matter of prevention.—But further, when Weston had told me that it was poison which he meant to give, I reprov'd and beat him down with God's judgment; nay, I humbled him so, that upon his knees he thanked God and me, and told me, that he and his had cause to bless God for me, for that I withheld him from doing that act; and if you call this comforting and abetting, to terrify a man for his sins, and to make him so confess his faults to God, and to abhor and detest the act, then was I an abettor and comforter of Weston.

"To the second, after I had thus terrified Weston with God's judgments, and saw him cast down for his offence; I could do him no better office than of charity, to raise him up, who was thus down, and therefore favoured him; I shewed him kindness, I drank to him, to the intent I might encourage the intentions of his mind, which I found then resolved in abhorring the fact: and that I gave him no wages, it is true, I took him from the commendations of my lord of Northampton, and sir Thomas Monson, whom I took to be my friends, and thought they would commend no man to be a keeper, which might any way endanger me.

"To the third, I never knew any other meaning to the countess's words in her letters, but the bare literal meaning; and sure (quoth he) after I had received the tarts, and they had stood a-while in my kitchen, I saw them so black and foul, and of such strange colours, that I did cause my cook to throw them away, and to make other tarts and jellies for him.

"To the fourth, he said, the earl of Northampton's letter to me, was not any thing touching the poisoning of Overbury, but for a close restraint; to the end, that Overbury might agree to their purposes concerning the marriage to be had between Rochester and the countess: if the earl of Northampton had any other plot to take away his life, I was not any thing of his council, or had knowledge therein.

"To the fifth, whereas it is said, I received him according to my instructions, I meant none other thing than I have delivered before, which was concerning the closeness of his imprisonment."

But being asked what he meant by these words; 'Rochester's part I shall greatly fear, 'ntil I see the event to be clearly carried;' in this, he staggered, and wavered much, and gave his answer: "It was long since I wrote this letter, and for the particular circumstances that induced me to this speech, I cannot now call to memory; but sure I am, that at that time, knowing myself to be innocent, I could the better have satisfied my remembrance, so that I meant nothing the taking away of his life: but because I was a stranger to Rochester, and had heard and known of that great league that was between them; I might well think, suspect, and fear, whether he would always countenance these projects for his restraint."

These were the Answers he made to his Accusations, and after he had made many protestations between God and his soul, of his innocency of this malicious plotting and abetting of Overbury's death, he applied himself to the Jury, and told them thus:

"I will prove unto you by many infallible and unanswerable reasons, that I could not be aider and comploter with Weston in this poisoning. First, I made a free and voluntary discovery of it myself, I was not compelled: will any man imagine, that I would discover a thing, whereof I could not clear myself? Nature is more kind than to be its own accuser. Besides, that my clearness might more appear, and remain in the world without any suspicion, I proceeded and accused the murderer Weston: it had been a senseless thing, and absurd in me, if I had not thought myself clear, to have accused him, who might have done as much for me. Nay, Weston himself proved me to be an honest man before the chancellor of the exchequer; for he confessed to him and others being present, that he thought that the Lieutenant knew not of the poison: and in his examination before the lord chief justice and serjeant Crew, being asked the meaning of these words, Shall I give it him now? he answers, that he thought that those which had set him on work, had acquainted the Lieutenant with their plot. Also I was so confident in my own innocency, that I told my lord chief justice, and my lord Zouch, the way to make Weston confess, and to discover all; which was by fair and gentle intreaty of him, and so by this means they might search the bottom of his heart: in this the lord chief justice witnessed with him. And after sir T. Overbury was dead, Weston and Mrs. Turner were sent to know of me whether I had any inkling of the death of sir Thomas? What need they have made this question, if I had known any thing thereof? Also that which I do know concerning the poisoning of sir T. was after his death, by relation of Weston; and here I am indicted as accessory before the fact, when I knew nothing till after the fact."

After that he had confirmed these reasons by sundry proofs and witnesses, he went further in his own defence: "If I be in the plot, the lord treasurer is, I have his letter to shew, in it: he called me to his lodging, and said, The plots you know them as well as I, the plots were only to repair her honour: my wife hath the letters from my lord treasurer and Monson; for these plots I will run willingly to my death, if circumstances be knit with any manner of fact."

He proceeded further and told the lord chief justice, that he spake not this to justify himself, so that no blemish or stain might cleave unto him: "for," said he, "this visitation is sent me from God; and whether I live or die, it is the happiest affliction to my soul, that I ever received, I have laid open my whole heart for blood-guiltiness: I have not repeated me other than of errors of my judgment, in not detecting what I suspected, and yet I do ask God forgiveness daily for lesser sins; but of this I know no other, but the gross error of my judgment, in not preventing it, when I saw such intentment and imagination against him."

Then he put to my lord chief justice this case: "If one that knoweth not of any plot to poison a man, but only suspecteth, is no actor or contriver himself, only imagineth such a thing, Whether such a one be accessory to the murder; for the words of the indictment are, abetting and comforting with malice: Now if there be any man that charges me expressly, or in direct terms, that I was an abettor, or if the court shall think in this case which I have put that such a concealing without malice, is an abetting, I refuse not to die, I am guilty." This was the sum of his speech.

Then the Lord Chief Justice replied; That to his knowledge, he spake no more concerning the evidence than he could in conscience justify, which was only to express the evidence of things, and not wresting any thing in prejudice of his life. But further he said him, That two days before sir T. Overbury died, you wished his man to bring his best suit of hangings to hang his chamber, which you knew were your fees. And after he told him, that his accusation of the lord treasurer was very malicious; for in the examinations he had taken, and in all the exact speech he could work for the finding out of the truth, he saw not that honourable gentleman any way touched. In conclusion he told him, It is not your deep protestations, nor your appealing to God, that can sway a Jury from their evidence, which is not yet answered unto. But to leave you without excuse, and to make the matter as clear as may be, here is the Confession of Franklin, (which he then drew out of his bosom) saying, This poor man, not knowing sir Jervis should come to his trial, this morning he came unto me at five o'clock, and told me, That he was much troubled in his conscience, and could not rest all that night until he had made his confession; and it is such a one (these were his words) as the eye of England never saw, nor the ear of Christendom never heard.

"Mrs. Turner came to me from the countess, and wished me from her to get the strongest poison I could for sir T. Overbury. Accordingly I bought seven, viz. aquafortis, white arsenick, mercury, powder of diamonds, lapis costitus, great spiders, and cantharides: All these were given to sir T. Overbury at several times. And further confesseth, that the Lieutenant knew of these poisons; for that appeared, said he, by many letters which he writ to the countess of Essex, which I saw, and thereby knew that he knew of this matter; One of these letters I read for the countess, because she could not read it herself, in which the Lieutenant used this speech; 'Madam, the scab is like the fox, the more he is cursed, the better he fareth;' and many other speeches. Sir T. never eat white salt, but there was white arsenick put into it: Once he desired pig, and Mrs. Turner put into it lapis costitus.—The white powder that was sent to sir T. in a letter he knew to be white arsenick.—At another time he had two partridges sent him from the court; and water and onions being the sauce, Mrs. Turner put in cantharides instead of pepper; so that there was scarce any thing that he did eat, but there was some poison mixed. For these poisons the countess sent me rewards: She sent many times gold by Mrs. Turner.—She afterwards wrote unto me to buy her more poisons. I went unto her, and told her I was weary of it; and I besought her upon my knees, that she would use me no more in those matters: But she importuned me, bad me go, and enticed me with fair speeches and rewards; so she overcame me, and did bewitch me.—The cause of this poisoning, as the countess told him, was, Because sir T. Overbury would pry so far into their suit, as he would put them down. He did also say that the toothless maid, trusty Margaret, was acquainted with the poisoning; so was Mrs. Turner's man Stephen; so also Mrs. Horne, the countess's own hand-maid.—He saith, On the marriage-day of the countess with Somerset she sent him 20*l.* by Mrs. Turner; and he was to have been paid by the countess 200*l.* per annum during his life.—That he was urged and haunted two hundred several times, at least, by the countess to do it against his conscience. He saith, she was able to bewitch any man; and then he wrought the love between Rochester and her; and that he had 12 several letters from her to prosecute it, and was to have 200*l.* to continue their loves until the marriage; and that all things were burnt since the first discovery."

Those were all the materials in Franklin's Confession. To this sir Jervis Elwes knew not what to answer, or to make of his own letters.

Then presently the Jury departed from the bar, and shortly after returned, and found him guilty; and the Lord Chief Justice gave judgment of death against him.

On Monday the 20th of November, 1615, he was executed at Tower-hill, upon a gibbet there set of purpose, about six o'clock in the morning. He came on foot to the gibbet from Sheriff Goare's house, between Dr. Whytting and Dr. Felton, two of his majesty's chaplains; and coming to the ladder's foot, he talked a word or two to the executioner.—Then he went up the ladder four or five steps, the executioner sitting over his head, upon the top of the gibbet: Sir Jervis finding the ladder to stand too upright for his ease, spake to have it amended, which forthwith, he coming down, was done, being fastened in the ground; and then he went up again six steps, where after a while, sitting easily, he said:

"Nobles, right worshipful, and others, I am here come, as well to shew, explain, and unfold that which, at the time of my arraignment, so many of you as were present expected; as also to shew that then I perceived I had lost the good opinion of many, in standing so long upon my innocency, which was my fault, I confess, hoping now to recover the same, and your good charitable opinions of me; which fault I then saw not, being blinded with mine errors, which made me account it no sin.—But since my condemnation, by means and help of these two gentlemen here present (the two Doctors) I was persuaded of the greatness of my sin, and that it was so much the greater, by how much the more I did conceal it; which by God's mercy I perceiving, consulted not with flesh and blood, but thought, in this my condemnation, my best way for my soul's health, to reveal to the omnipotent and all-seeing God, the most secret and inward intentions and thoughts of my deceitful heart, not once suspecting the pains or dispraises of the world, which I regard not at all.—It may be some will say, that this place was most unfit for my execution, appointed to terrify and daunt me so much the more; but alas! I fear not death, place, nor any such like thing, for I account it the king's and council's special favour that I die here; for that I requesting the same, it was granted; whereby I see now this Tower, wherein of late I have been called to the state business, and still might, if I had performed a more loyal service to my king and country than I did.—Next, that I was not appointed to Tyburn, a place of more public reproach than now I am brought, being worthy to die by due and lawful justice, in prosecuting this bloody and enormous act against a kind gentleman, who deserved not ill at my hands, nor at any man's else for aught I know.—But were it I had not trusted him, who was a most perfidious wretch, I had not fallen into this same; which may warn all here present to take heed whom they trust in a bad matter, and to admonish you that are trusted never to break honest and just fidelity.—I was by divers tricks drawn into this action, which I received from the earl of Northampton, sir Thomas Monson, and none other: but had I remembered the 119th Psal. 115th verse, and said with that holy prophet, 'Away from me, ye wicked, for I will keep the commandments of my God;' then had I refused such like tricks. Alas! now too late; there was my fault, that I did not refuse them, and cast myself upon God's providence, without any dependency on man, though never so honourable. Was ever any deceived that did trust in God? There was never any.—Therefore I admonish you all; let none, how honourable soever he be, or the king himself, move you to any thing not agreeable to God's word, do it not, reject it; for this was my fault, that I had not at the first opened this plot to his majesty, who no doubt would most justly and righteously have punished the same.—You nobles, worshipful, and others, let my example teach you thus much, That you prophane not the holy sabbath of the Lord, nor his good creatures, nor that you turn, by a lascivious course, nights into days and days into nights, as I have done; and that in serving God, you must not only read the scriptures, but join practice therewith: for what good else will the same effect, if the heart be foul, bloody, and impure?—Some here knew my forwardness therein; but I plead not innocency that way, but cast it off, and confess, that of this great assembly I am the most wretched sinner.—You expect speeches from me of some concealed matters, and upon some of my speeches used at the closing up of my arraignment; but I stand here 'loco peccatoris, non oratoris;' yet I will shew you that I have opened to my Lord Chief Justice of England, since my arraignment, that which to the uttermost of my power I was able to verify, upon which then I took the body and blood of Jesus Christ; and in further testimony thereof, I will now seal it with my last and dearest breath.

"Nobles and others, to see your faces it rejoiceth me, whereby you manifest your love in granting my request, to be witnesses of my death; I see a number of my friends, there, there, [pointing as he spake] whom, out of their loves, I entreat to beseech God to strengthen me in death; though ignominious to some, yet to me, a bitter cup, mingled to me with God's mercy, a special favour this way to call me home, whereas he might have taken away my life by shooting the bridge, or some fall, or otherwise; and then this unrepented sin, which I accounted no sin (such was my blindness) had been damnation to me; for God is just, and the unrepented sinner shall have no salvation.—There is none of you present here, that knows how or in what sort he shall die, it may be in his bed, it may be otherwise (God knows); I protest before you all, I never came over this hill, in the chiefest of all my prosperity, with more joy than now I have at this present; for I now know that presently I shall behold the glorious face and sight of my Creator.—Take heed, and let my example incite you to serve God truly and uprightly, better than I have done, lest a shameful death overtake you, as it doth me, who am unworthy of my parents care in bringing me up.—It may be some will say I have a flinty heart, because I shed no tears; my heart is flesh as any others, and I am as faint-hearted to look death in the face as any others: but because my use hath been not to shed tears, I cannot now easily, except it be for the loss of some great friend; albeit now my heart beginneth to melt within me, being wounded [with that the tears stood in his eyes] to see the faces of some there present, whom I most earnestly love, and now must depart from with shame: for worldly regard I respect not, for well Mr. Sheriff knows, that (to shame this my sinful flesh the more) I wish (if he had pleased) to have been brought from Westminster through the city, to have warned all spectators how they should not escape without judgment for blood; for God is just.—I had almost forgotten to shew you a strange thing, which God brought to my memory the last night, which was this: I confess I have been a great gamester, and especially on the other side, have wasted and played many sums of money, which exhausted a great part of my means; which I perceiving, vowed seriously (not slightly or unadvisedly) to the Lord in my vows and prayers, 'Lord, let me be hanged if ever I play any more!' which not long after is most justly come upon me, whereof you are all eye-witnesses, because a thousand times since I brake this my vow."

Then he espied one sir Maximilian Dallison standing near the gibbet on horseback, and said unto him: "You know, sir Maximilian, what gaming we have had, and how we have turned days into nights, and nights into days; I pray you in time to leave it off, and dishonour God no more by breaking his sabbaths, for he hath always enough to punish, as you now see me, who little thought to die thus."

To which sir Maximilian answered him: "sir Jervis, I am much grieved for you, and I shall never forget what you have here said;"

whereunto sir Jervis said, "Look to it, do then." —Further, he continued his speech, saying, "Let no man boast of the abilities and gifts of nature, which God giveth him; for therein I displeas'd God, being transported with over-much pride of my pen; which obsequious quill of mine procured my just overthrow, upon the knitting of my Lord Chief Justice's speech at my arraignment, by reason of two or three passages at the bottom of my letter, subscribed with my own hand, which I utterly had forgotten, because I felt not any sin; which when I heard, I saw none other but the finger of God could thus point to this fact; by this means I do protest before God, and confess before you all, that I was so far overtaken by this bloody fact, that for satisfaction of the same, I willingly yield my dearest blood, to the shame of this my carcass, not being so much grieved for the same as for others, that I wish I had hanged in chains perpetually, so that I had revealed at first the heinous plot.—Then should I have saved the lives of some already dead, some in the Tower, some in the city, some over seas; so should I have prevented many from being widows, some from being fatherless, and some from being childless, among whom mine own wife for one, and eight fatherless children of mine, which I leave now behind me, and God knows how many be guilty of this fact, and when it will be ended.—The Lord Chief Justice upon closing up of my speeches at my arraignment, said I was an Anabaptist: I would to God I were as clear from all other sins, as from that, for I always detested that condition.—As for my wife, some say she is a papist; but true it is, she comes so short from a sincere protestant, (I mean in that respect) that when she is among papists she cannot well forbear them."

Then he spake to the Sheriff, saying, "If it may be permitted without offence, I have somewhat to say, and that is this, Is it lawful for any one here to demand of me any questions?" To which the Sheriff answered, "It is not lawful;

* His Prayer is thus given in "Truth brought to Light," p. 90. "O Eternal, Omnipotent and Omniscient God, the Creator of heaven and earth, and of me a most miserable and horrible wretch, by reason of my unmeasurable sins and transgressions, whereof I am wholly guilty, take pity on me, who have so many ponderous sins, that without especial favour and mercy, they will be ready to press me into perpetual destruction; thy full and free pardon in Jesus Christ, I humbly crave, with this assurance, that immediately my soul shall be translated hence into those inestimable joys, which the heart of man is unable to conceive, the tongue to utter, or the ear to hear. Hear then, Lord, the petition of me, a most intolerable wretch, according to thy promise made to the repentant sinner; my sins yet unknown and unrepented, which are my secret sins, Lord, call not to account; disburthen me, O Lord, of my unknown sins, I desire to give a true sigh for them all; my sins of youth and wherefore, good sir Jervis," (quoth he) "forbear." Sir Jervis thereunto said, with doubling his words, "It is enough, it is enough." —"I have here," quoth he, "one that holdeth my cloak, may I bestow somewhat on him?" The Sheriff answered, "That you may, sir;" whereupon he called the young man to him by his name, who stood waiting at the ladder's foot, and gave him out of his pocket some pieces of gold, or silver, "Here, take this, spend it;" which he with bitter tears thankfully accepted. Dr. Whyting and Dr. Felton strained courtesy, which of them should begin a publick prayer, fitting for this party's condition; one of them willed the other: but at last Dr. Whyting said, "If you, sir Jervis, can perform it yourself, you of all men are the fittest to do it, with efficacy both of soul and spirit:" whereupon he said, "I shall do my best then; but my hearers, I crave your charitable construction, if with half words, and imperfect speeches, I chatter like a crane."*

His prayer being ended, he asked if he might pray privately; the doctor said, "Yes, sir." —Then made he a short prayer to himself; with his face covered; and after he uncovered it, and said, "Now I have prayed, now I must pay, I mean, do the last office to justice." With that Dr. Whyting said, "Sir Jervis, you may stand one step lower on the ladder: "To whom the sheriff answered, "It is better for him, Mr. Doctor, to be where he is." "Stay," quoth the doctor to the executioner, "for he hath given a watch-word, he is in private prayer again." "Yea," quoth he, "I know that, for he hath given me a watch-word, when I shall perform my office to him."—He uncovered his face after his second short prayer, and first took his leave of all the assembly, saying, with a chearful voice and countenance, "I pray you pray for me, who shall never more behold your faces." Then he said with a great fervency of spirit, "Lord, I desire at thy hands this bitter cup of death, as the patient receiveth riper years, Lord call not to account; thou, O Lord, knowest how many they are: let the misty clouds of all my sins whatsoever, be so scattered by the bright beams of thy mercies to me in Christ Jesus, that those my weak and poor prayers may be available in thy sight: this comfort, this I have, that I am thine, for were I not thine, then out of the root of me could not the buds of repentance appear; by which I know thou lovest me: it is not I, but thou, Lord, hast drawn me to thee, for thine own mercies sake, on which mercy and thy promises made to the true repentant sinner, once again I rely, for if thou killest me by this or any other ignominious death, yet will I trust in thee, and crave thine assistance: protect my soul from that great adversary of mine, Satan, who with pale death and the infirmities of the flesh, do bandon them as balls together, then especially at the last gasp, in which great conflict, Lord, strengthen me, that they may not overcome, but be overcome. Amen."

a bitter potion, not once demanding what is in the cup, but takes and drinks it off, be it never so bitter."—As soon then as he had audibly said, "Lord Jesus, receive my soul;" which, it seems, was the executioner's watch-word, he presently turned him off the ladder; and being off, the executioner's man caught hold of one of his feet, his own man on the other foot, whereby they suddenly weighed his life; where hanging a small distance of time, his body not once stirred, only his hands a little stirred and moved, being tied with a little black ribband, which a little before he had reached to the executioner, putting up his hands to him for that purpose. All which being ended, both corpse and high gibbet were from thence removed.

106. The Trial of JAMES FRANKLIN, at the King's Bench, 27th of November, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury: Mich. 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

AFTER he had put himself for his trial upon the country, a Jury of esquires and gentlemen was impannelled to pass upon his life. Then Weston's Indictment was read, and Franklin accused as accessory to the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, and in his Examination formerly taken were these words: *

JAMES FRANKLIN'S CONFESSION.

He confesseth, That in a house near to Doctors-Commons, Mrs. Turner did first come unto him about the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, and prayed him to provide that which should not kill a man presently, but lie in his body for a certain time, wherewith he might languish away by little and little; at the same time she gave him four angels, wherewith he bought a water called aqua fortis, and sent it to Mrs. Turner, who, to try the operation thereof, gave it to a cat, wherewith the cat languished, and pitifully cried for the space of two days, and then died.

Afterwards Mrs. Turner sent for Franklin to come to the countess, who told him, that aqua fortis was too violent a water; but what think you (quoth she) of white arsenick? He told her, it was too violent. What say you (quoth she) to powder of diamonds? He answers, I know not the nature of that. She said, then he was a fool; and gave him pieces of gold, and bade him buy some of that powder for her. Franklin demands of the countess, what was the reason she would poison sir T. Overbury? She told him, He would pry so far into their estate, that he would overthrow them all.

A little before sir T. Overbury's death, the countess sent for Franklin, and shewed him a letter written from the lord of Rochester, wherein he read these words: "I marvel at these delays, that the business is not yet dispatched." Whereby Franklin thinketh in his conscience, was meant the poisoning of sir T. Overbury. And in another letter from the lord of Rochester was written that sir Thomas was to come out of the Tower within two days, and they all should be undone: whereupon the countess sent for Weston, and was very angry with him that he had not dispatched sir T. Overbury. Weston told her, that he had given him a thing that would have killed twenty men.

Also a fortnight after Weston's apprehension, the countess sent for Franklin to her house at St. James's park, where he found the earl and the countess walking together; and as soon as he came, the earl went apart into a chamber. Then she told him, Weston had been sent for by a pursuivant, and had confessed all, and we shall all be hanged: but on your life (quoth she) do not you confess that you brought any poison to me, or to Mrs. Turner: for if you do, you shall be hanged, for I will not hang for you; and, says Mrs. Turner, I will not hang for you both. The countess told him, That the lord who was to examine him would promise him a pardon to confess; but believe him not, for they will hang thee when all is done. Weston comes to Franklin's house, and told him, Now the countess's turn is served, she used him unkindly, and they should be poisoned, and that two were set of purpose to poison him.

Franklin having confessed his former Examinations under his own hand, being permitted to speak for himself, said, That at the entreaty of the countess and Mrs. Turner, he did buy these poisons, but protested his ignorance what they meant to do with them; and for the rest, he referred himself to the conscience of the Jury: who went from the bar, and within a quarter of an hour, did return, and pronounced him Guilty.

Then Judge Crook, after a brief exhortation, gave the sentence of death upon him.

The Lord Chief Justice made a short exhortation also, with addition of these words: That knowing as much as he knew, if this had not been found out, neither the court, city, nor any particular family had escaped the malice of this wicked cruelty.

He was afterwards executed according to the Sentence.

107. The Arraignment of Sir THOMAS MONSON, knt. at the Guildhall of London, 4th December, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury: 12 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

WHEN he came to the bar, he made a motion to the Lord Chief Justice; That, whereas he had written unto his lordship to ask the lord treasurer two questions, which my lord would do; he desired then an answer, and that sir Robert Cotton might be present.

After the questions were read, he was indicted for conspiring with Weston to poison sir T. Overbury; to which he pleaded, Not Guilty, and would be tried by God and his country.

The Lord Chief Justice broke up the proceedings, and made a speech to this effect, viz. He saw a great assembly, and though it had been shewed them often, yet it could not be said too often, that the city was much bound to God, and to his deputy on earth the king, his master, for their great deliverance, and exact justice; for God was always just; and for the king, though they were never so high in place, nor so dear to him, though his own creatures, yet his justice is dearer to him, for which we are upon our knees to give him thanks; as also for so mild a proceeding in so great an affair: for neither the great man's house in the Tower, nor his lady's house nor this prisoner's house (to my knowledge) have been searched, neither hath this prisoner been committed to the sheriff, but to an alderman, a man who of all others might be most kind to him; for, as I take it least I should be mistaken, sir Francis Anderson married sir Stephen Some's daughter, and sir Thomas Monson married sir Francis Anderson's sister; I never knew the like favour, nor do I like it so well, but do declare it as a gentle proceeding from the king. For other things, I dare not discover secrets; but though there was no house searched, yet such letters were produced, which make our deliverance as great, as any that happened to the children of Israel. For Weston and Mrs. Turner, they died penitently, as is worthy to be written in letters of gold; and for the Lieutenant, though with great imprecations, and a high hand he denied, yet for the great glory of the king's justice, he died most penitently and resolutely: this is spoken to the praise of God that hath crowned these just proceedings, though not having need of it, "Justitia confirmata non eget autoritate;" wherein we may see the great hand of God; for that morning the Lieutenant was arraigned, Franklin came to me as one afflicted in conscience, not knowing of his arraignment, with evidence, against him: which being delivered to the Jury, one of them heard him say, "Then Lord have mercy on me." But for this present, "Non est cunctatio longa de vita hominis:" therefore he must be conveyed to the Tower as a safer place, till further order be taken.—Then the Lord Chief Justice addressed his speech to sir Thomas Monson, saying, Whereas you name my Lord-Treasurer, every man's fame is dear unto him, and he hath ever been honourable, you shall hear what he hath answered to my Letter.—"After my hearty commendations, I have heard that sir Thomas Monson thinks I can clear him, but I know nothing of him to accuse or excuse him; but I hope he is not guilty of so foul a crime."—You hear (quoth he) that he will neither accuse you, nor excuse you.

Monson. I do not accuse the Lord-Treasurer, nor calumniate him, for I know he is very honourable, but I desire to have an answer to my two questions.

L. C. J. You shall hear more of that when the time serveth; do you as a Christian, and as Joshua bad Achan, "My son, acknowledge thy sin, and give glory to God."

Monson. If I be guilty, I renounce the king's mercy and God's; I am innocent.

L. C. J. There is more against you than you know of.

Monson. If I be guilty, it is of that I know not.

L. C. J. You are popish, that pulpit was the pulpit where Garnet died, and the Lieutenant as firmly; I am not superstitious, but we will have another pulpit.

Doderidge. It is an atheist's word to renounce God's mercy; you must think the change of your lodging means somewhat.

Hyde. I have looked into this business, and I protest, my lord, he is as guilty as the guiltiest.

Monson. There was never man more innocent than I; in this I will die innocent.

After this speech, certain yeomen of his majesty's guard, attending for that purpose, conducted him to the Tower, where between the yeomen and the warders, there was some contention about his entertainment.

The Lord Chief Justice having at this Trial let drop some insinuations* that Overbury's

* See the passage in Weldon cited in the note to the Earl of Somerset's Case, p. 966. Wilson says, "Sir Tho. Monson, another of the countess's agents in this poisoning contrivance, had past one day's trial at Guildhall. But the lord chief justice Coke, in his rhetorical flourishes at his arraignment, vented some expressions (which he either deduced from Northampton's assuring the Lieutenant of the Tower, that the making away of sir T. Overbury would be acceptable to the king; or from some other secret hint received) as if he could discover more than the death of a private person; intimating, though not plainly, that Overbury's untimely remove had something in it of retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the same crime against prince Henry; blessing himself with admiration at the horror of such actions. In which he flew so high a pitch, that he was taken down by a prince Henry, sir Thomas Monson's Trial was laid aside, and himself soon after set at liberty, and the lord chief justice was rebuked for his indiscretion, and before the next year expired, removed from his post.*

108. The Trial of the Lady FRANCES Countess of SOMERSET,* the 24th of May, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury: 14 JAMES I. A. D. 1616.

The SUMMONS of the Peers to the Trial.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your lordship; whereas the king's majesty has resolved, that the earl of Somerset, and the countess his wife, lately indicted of felony, for the murder and poisoning of sir Thomas Overbury, then his majesty's prisoner in the Tower, shall now receive their lawful and public Trial, by their peers, immediately after the end of this present Easter term; at the Trial of which noble personages your lordship's presence, as being a peer of the realm, and one of approved wisdom and integrity, is requisite to pass upon them: These are to let your lordship understand, that his majesty's pleasure is, and commandeth by these our Letters, that your lord-

* "In the next place comes the countess to her Trial, at whose Arraignment, as also at Mrs. Turner's before, were shewed many pictures, puppets, with some exorcism and magic spells, which made them appear more odious as being known to converse with witches and wizards, and amongst the tricks Forman's book was shewed; this Forman was a fellow dwelt in Lambeth, a very silly fellow, yet had wit enough to cheat ladies and other women by pretending skill in telling their fortunes. As whether they should bury their husbands, and what second husbands they should have, and whether they should enjoy their loves, or whether maids should get husbands, or enjoy their servants to themselves without corivals; but before he would tell any thing they must write their names to his alphabetical book, with their own handwriting. By this trick he kept them in awe if they should complain of his abusing them; as in truth he did nothing else; besides it was believed some meetings were at his house, and that the art of bawd was more beneficial to him than that of a conjuror, and that he was a better artist in the one than in the other, and that you may know his skill, he was himself a cuckold; having a very pretty wench to his wife, which would say, she did it to try his skill, but it fared with him as with astrologers, that cannot foresee their own destiny. I well remember there was much mirth made in the court upon the shewing this book, for it was reported the first leaf my lord Coke lighted on, he found his own wife's name." The Form of their Sitting, and their Ceremonies.

When my Lord Chancellor, who for this time was High-Steward of England, came into the court, there came before him six serjeants at arms, with their maces; sir Geo. Coppin with his patent; sir Rd. Coningsby with his white staff; Mr. Manwaring with the great seal; he himself, at the upper end of the court, sitting under a cloth of estate; on both hands of him the peers, under them the judges; at the farther end the king's counsel, below the judges; on one side Finch, keeper of the records of attainders; the clerk of the crown and his deputy, in the midst of the court, the serjeant-crier standing by him; sir Rd. Coningsby, sir Geo. Coppin, the seal-bearer, &c. at my Lord Steward's feet. The Prisoner at the Bar behind the king's counsel; the Lieutenant of the Tower in a little place adjoining to the Bar.

All being silent, sir Geo. Coppin rises and delivers the patent to the Lord High Steward, upon his knee; he receives it and kisses it, then redelivers it to Mr. Fenshaw, who takes it kneeling. Then the serjeant-crier makes a proclamation in the Lord High-Steward's name, to keep silence; then Mr. Fenshaw reads the commission,* which bears date the 10th of May: then there is another O-yes, to certify my Lord Steward, whether Weston were convicted as principal, for the murder of sir T. Overbury. Then the Lord Chief Justice delivers a Schedule indorsed with a Certificate of four judges of the King's-Bench, and others the Commissioners. This Fenshaw, turning to my Lord Steward, reads. A third O-yes, for certifying of other indictments: my lord Coke delivers another schedule indorsed with the Certificate of my lady Somerset's indictment; which Fenshaw, as before, read. A fourth O-yes, for Walter Lee, serjeant at arms, to return the Precept for the peers of Frances countess of Somerset; which accordingly, after his three reverences to the Lord High-Steward, he delivered to Mr. Fenshaw: he reads the indorsement. A fifth O-yes, to call the lords summoned by the command of the Lord High-Steward, to answer to their names, which they accordingly did, beginning at the first; and as every one was named they put off their hats, and stood up till the next was named. A sixth O-yes to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to return his Precept, and bring the Prisoner to the Bar; which he did, and gave his Precept to the serjeant, who gave it to Mr. Fenshaw, and he, as before, read the indorsement. The Prisoner made three reverences to his grace and the peers; she was in black tammell, a cypress chaperon, a cobweb lawn ruff and cuffs.

L. H. S. My lords, the reason why you be called hither this day, is to sit as peers of Frances countess of Somerset.

Mr. Fenshaw, Clerk of the Crown. Frances countess of Somerset, hold up thy hand.

She does so, and held it up till Mr. Lieutenant told her she might put it down; and then he read the Indictment, containing Weston's accounts, in the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, and her abetting of him, the 8th of May, 1613.—The countess of Somerset, all the while the indictment was reading, stood, looking pale, trembled, and shed some few tears; and at the first naming of Weston in the indictment, put her fan before her face, and there held it half covered till the indictment was read.

Mr. Fenshaw. Frances countess of Somerset, what sayest thou? Art thou guilty of this felony and murder, or not guilty?

The lady Somerset making an obeisance to the Lord High Steward, answered Guilty, with a low voice, but wonderful fearful.

My lady, upon her Arraignment, having pleaded Guilty,* the proceeding after was thus:

Mr. Attorney. May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, I am glad to hear this lady's so free acknowledgment, for confession is noble. Those that have been formerly indicted, at their Arraignment persisted in denial, as Weston, Elwes, Franklin and Turner; but you see this lady's humility and repentance by so pleading; and certainly she cannot but be a spectacle of much commiseration, if you either respect the sex, a woman, or her parentage, honourable; but this day and to-morrow is to crown justice: the mercy-seat is the inner part of the temple, the throne publick, and therefore I shall now only pray a record of the confession and judgment: but since the peers are met, for honour's sake it is good to declare the king's justice. This is the second time since the king's coming, these thirteen years, that any peers have been arraigned, and both these times your grace had the place of High-Steward; the first were Grey and Cobham, and though they were convicted, yet execution followed not. No noble blood hath yet been spilt since his majesty's reign. The first was revenge of treason amongst malecontents; and this of a particular offence to a private subject, against those that have been so high in the king's grace and favour, and therefore deserve to be written in a sun-beam. But his being the best master in the world, hinders him not from being the best king; for he can as well plane a hill, as raise a valley: a good lesson to put to my lords the peers; he is lieutenant to him that is no respecter of persons. This that I should now speak of, may be reduced to that which was acted in the vault, and since upon the stage: the first I will not now enter into, because I will neither grieve a lady that is present, nor touch a lord that is absent; my duty requires it not, and my humanity forbids it. For that which hath been upon the stage, which is the theatre of God's justice, you shall understand that which hath been worthily acted by the king, in this noble work of justice, and right well by his ministers. Overbury died poisoned the 15th of Sept. 1613, in the Tower of London: he was no sooner dead, but there was a certain rumour and muttering, that was vox populi, that Overbury came strangely to his death: and in that time, on the contrary hand, there was another rumour, but that was vox diaboli, that he died of a foul disease, so foul a one as is not fit for me to name. But for two years after this, though Overbury's blood cried for revenge, vox Dei was not heard. 'Gloria Dei celare, regis perscrutare rem:' It is the glory of God to conceal a thing, of a king to find it out; yet all the while God so dazzled the eyes of these two great procurers, and their instruments, that the first looked not about them, the other fled not. About the beginning of the last progress it first brake forth; and as all murders are strange in their discovery, so this was miraculous, for it came out in a compliment thus: my lord of Shrewsbury, who is now with God, commended sir J. Elwes to a counsellor of estate; and it was by him that sir J. in respect of the good report he had heard made of his honour and worth, desired to be made known unto him. That counsellor answered, That he took it for a favour from him; but withal added, there lies a kind of heavy imputation on him, about Overbury's death: I could wish he would clear himself, and give some satisfaction in the point. This my lord Shrewsbury related back, and presently Elwes was struck with it, and makes a kind of discovery, that some attempts were undertaken against Overbury, but took no effect, as checked by him. Though the truth be, he lacked rather fortitude in the repulse, than honesty. This counsellor weighing well this narration from Elwes, acquainted the king with the adventure; who commanded presently that Elwes should set down his knowledge in writing, which accordingly he did, but still reserving himself within his own compass, not to touch himself, endeavouring rather to discover others than any else should undertake that office, and so accuse him. The king still endeavours to search the truth of this business, gives direction for the examination of the truth of it, commits it to certain counsellors; they pick something out of Weston; then the further enquiry is delivered over to my lord Coke, who in this cause was very painful, took two or three hundred examinations: but when he found it might touch upon greater persons, then he desired some others might be joined with him, which was accordingly granted; namely, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Steward, the lord Zouch. But then there were no practices left untried for the suppression of the discovery; Weston was solicited to stand mute, but at last this dumb devil was cast out. Then follows Elwes, Turner, Franklin, all of which were actors in this tragedy, without malice, but no authors. Now when this lady comes to her part, she meets justice in the way, by confession, which is the corner-stone either of mercy or judgment; yet it is said, that mercy and truth be met together. Truth you have in her confession, and that may be a degree to mercy, which we must leave to him in whose power it resides; in the mean time this day must be reserved for judgment. Now to conclude, and give you an account of the often procrastinations in this business; the first was due to humanity, her child-birth; the second was for reason of state; and the last had a grave and weighty cause. Those directions the king at the first gave written with his own hand, for the examination of his business, I desire may be read.

The King's Instructions read.

There be two things in this cause to be tried, and the verity can be but in one of them; first, Whether my lord of Somerset and my lady were the procurers of Overbury's death; or, that this imputation hath been by some practised to cast an aspersion upon them. I would first have you diligently enquire of the first; and if you find them clear, then I would have you as carefully look after the other, to the intent such practices may be discovered, and not suffered to pass with impunity.

Mr. Att. There be other directions in these instructions, by way of interrogatories, that are not now necessary to be read.

L. H. S. Let the lords the peers view these directions from the king.

Lord Coke. None of these interrogatories, which the king desired there should be examinations upon, came away empty; and whatsoever whisperings there be abroad of the death of Weston, they all (some before the hour of their death) confessed the fact; and died penitent; and if need should require, I have brought their confessor along (namely, Dr. Whyting).

L. H. S. My lords, you see, and have heard those directions under the king's hand; give the glory to God, and honour to the king.

Mr. Att. May it please your grace, &c. whereas Frances countess of Somerset hath been indicted as accessory before the fact, of the wilful poisoning and murder of sir T. Overbury; upon her Indictment, she hath been arraigned; upon her Arraignment, pleaded Guilty: I desire that her Confession may be recorded, and Judgment given against the Prisoner.

Fenshaw. Frances countess of Somerset, hold up thine hand: Whereas thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded Guilty, as accessory before the fact, of the wilful poisoning and murder of sir T. Overbury; what canst thou now say for thyself, why Judgment of Death should not be pronounced against thee?

C. of Som. I can much aggravate, but nothing extenuate my fault; I desire mercy, and that the lords will intercede for me to the king. (This she spake humbly, fearfully, and so low, the Lord Steward could not hear it, but Mr. Attorney related it.)

Mr. Att. The lady is so touched with remorse and sense of her fault, that grief surprizes her from expressing of herself; but that which she hath confusedly said, is to this effect, That she cannot excuse herself, but desires mercy.

Sir R. Coningsby sitting before the Lord High Steward, rises, and upon his knee delivers him the white staff.

L. H. S. Frances countess of Somerset, whereas thou hast been indicted, arraigned, pleaded Guilty, and that thou hast nothing to say for thyself, it is now my part to pronounce Judgment; only thus much before, since my lords have heard with what humility and grief you have confessed the fact, I do not doubt they will signify so much to the king, and mediate for his grace towards you: but in the mean time, according to the law, the sentence must be this, That thou shalt be carried from hence to the Tower of London, and from thence to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged by the neck till you be dead; and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

The following articles are extracted from Birch's 4to ed. of Bacon's works, vol. 3. p. 493:

The CHARGE of the Attorney General, sir Francis Bacon, against Frances, countess of Somerset, intended to have been spoken by him at her Arraignment, on Friday, May 24, 1616, in case she had pleaded Not Guilty.

Ir may please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and you my lords the peers;—You have heard the Indictment against this lady well opened; and likewise the point in law, that might make some doubt, declared and solved; wherein certainly the policy of the law of England is much to be esteemed, which requireth and respecteth form in the Indictment, and substance in the proof.—This scruple it may be hath moved this lady to plead not guilty, though for the proof I shall not need much more than her own confession, which she hath formerly made, free and voluntary, and therein given glory to God and justice. And certainly confession, as it is the strongest foundation of justice, so it is a kind of corner-stone, whereupon justice and mercy may meet.—The proofs, which I shall read in the end for the ground of your verdict and sentence, will be very short; and, as much as may, serve to satisfy your honours and consciences for the conviction of this lady, without wasting of time in a case clear and confessed; or ripping up guiltiness against one, that hath prostrated herself by confession; or preventing or deflowering too much of the evidence. And therefore the occasion itself doth admonish me to spend this day rather in declaration, than in evidence, giving God and the king the honour, and your lordships and the hearers the contentment, to set before you the proceeding of this excellent work of the king's justice, from the beginning to the end; and so to conclude with the reading the confessions and proofs.—My lords, this is now the second time within the space of 13 years reign of our happy sovereign, that this high tribunal seat of justice, ordained for the trial by peers, hath been opened and erected; and that, with a rare event, supplied and exercised by one and the same person; which is a great honour to you, my Lord Steward.—In all this mean time, the king hath reigned in his white robe, not sprinkled with any drop of blood of any of his nobles of this kingdom. Nay, such hath been the depths of his mercy, as even those noblemen's bloods, (against whom the proceeding was at Winchester,) Cobham and Grey, were attainted and corrupted, but not spilt or taken away; but that they remained rather spectacles of justice in their continual imprisonment, than monuments of justice in the memory of their suffering.—It is true, that the objects of his justice then and now were very differing. For then, it was the revenge of an offence against his own person and crown, and upon persons, that were malcontents, and contraries to the state and government. But now, it is the revenge of the blood and death of a particular subject, and the cry of a prisoner. It is upon persons, that were highly in his favour; whereby his majesty, to his great honour, hath shewed to the world, as if it were written in a sun-beam, that he is truly the lieutenant of him, with whom there is no respect of persons; that his affections royal are above his affections private: that his favours and nearness about him are not like popish sanctuaries to privilege malefactors: and that his being the best master of the world doth not let him from being the best king of the world. His people, on the other side, may say to themselves, 'I will lie down in peace; for God and the king and the law protect me against great and small.' It may be a discipline also to great men, especially such as are swoln in fortunes from small beginnings, that the king is as well able to level mountains, as to fill vallies, if such be their desert.—But to come to the present case; the great frame of justice, my lords, in this present action, hath a vault, and it hath a stage: a vault, wherein these works of darkness were contrived; and a stage with steps, by which they were brought to light. And therefore I will bring this work of justice to the period of this day; and then go on with this day's work.—Sir T. Overbury was murdered by poison in the 15th of September, 1613, 11 Reg. This foul and cruel murder did, for a time, cry secretly in the ears of God; but God gave no answer to it, otherwise than by that voice, which sometimes he useth, which is vox populi, the speech of the people. For there went then a murmur, that Overbury was poisoned: and yet this same submiss and soft voice of God, the speech of the vulgar people, was not without a counter-tenor, or counter-blast of the devil, who is the common author both of murder and slander: for it was given out, that Overbury was dead of a foul disease, and his body, which they had made a corpus judaicum with their poisons, so as it had no whole part, must be said to be leproisous with vice, and so his name poisoned as well as his body. For as to dissoluteness, I never heard the gentleman noted with it: his faults were insolency, and turbulency, and the like of that kind: the other part of the soul, not the voluptuous.—Meantime, there was some industry used, of which I will not now speak, to lull asleep those that were the revengers of blood; the father and the brother of the murdered. And in these terms things stood by the space almost of two years; during which time, God so blinded the two great procurers, and dazzled them with their own greatness, and bind and nail fast the actors and instruments, with security upon their protection, as neither the one looked about them, nor the other stirred or fled, nor were conveyed away: but remained here still, as under a privy arrest of God's judgments; insomuch as Franklin, that should have been sent over to the Pala-grave with good store of money, was, by God's providence, and the accident of a marriage of his, diverted and stayed.—But about the beginning of the progress last summer, God's judgments began to come out of their depths: and as the revealing of murders is commonly such, as a man may say, a Domino hoc factum est; it is God's work, and it is marvellous in our eyes; so in this particular it was most admirable; for it came forth by a compliment and matter of courtesy.—My lord of Shrewsbury, that is now with God, recommended to a counsellor of state, of especial trust by his place, the late lieutenant Helwisse, only for acquaintance as an honest worthy gentleman; and desired him to know him, and to be acquainted with him. That counsellor answered him civilly, that my lord did him a favour; and that he should embrace it willingly: but he must let his lordship know, that there did lie a heavy imputation upon that gentleman, Helwisse; for that sir T. Overbury, his prisoner, was thought to have come to a violent and untimely death. When this speech was reported back by my lord of Shrewsbury to Helwisse, perculit illico animum, he was stricken with it; and being a politic man, and of likeliho of doubting, that the matter would break forth at one time or other, and that others might have the start of him, and thinking to make his own case by his own tale, resolved with himself, upon this occasion, to discover to my lord of Shrewsbury and that counsellor, that there was an attempt, whereto he was privy, to have poisoned Overbury by the hands of his under keeper, Weston; but that he checked it, and put it by, and dissuaded it, and related so much to him in deed: but then he left it thus, that was but an attempt, or untimely birth, never executed; and, as if his own fault had been no more, but that he was honest in forbidding, but fearful of revealing and impeaching or accusing great persons; and so with this fine point thought to save himself.—But that great counsellor of state wisely considering, that by the lieutenant's own tale it could not be simply a permission or weakness; for that Weston was never displaced by the lieutenant, notwithstanding that attempt: and coupling the sequel by the beginning, thought it matter fit to be brought before his majesty, by whose appointment Helwisse set down the like declaration in writing.—Upon this ground, the king playeth Solomon's part, gloria Dei celare rem; et gloria regis investigare rem; and sets down certain papers of his own hand, which I might term to be claves justitie, keys of justice; and may serve for a precedent both for princes to imitate, and for a direction for judges to follow; and his majesty carried the balance with a constant and steady hand, evenly and without prejudice, whether it were a true accusation of the one part, or a practice and factious device of the other: which writing, because I am not able to express according to the worth thereof, I will desire your lordship anon to hear read.—This excellent foundation of justice being laid by his majesty's own hand, it was referred unto some counsellors to examine farther, who gained some degrees of light from Weston, but yet left it imperfect.—After it was referred to sir Edward Coke, chief justice of the King's-bench, as a person best practised in legal examinations, who took a great deal of indefatigable pains in it, without intermission, having, as I have heard him say, taken at least three hundred examinations in this business.—But these things were not done in a corner. I need not speak of them. It is true, that my lord chief justice, in the dawning and opening of the light, finding that the matter touched upon these great persons, very discreetly became suitor to the king to have greater persons than his own rank joined with him. Whereupon your lordship, my lord high steward of England, to whom the king commonly resorteth in arduis, and my lord steward of the king's house, and my lord Zouch, were joined with him.—Neither wanted there this while practice to suppress testimony, to deface writings, to weaken the king's resolution, to slander the justice, and the like. Nay, when it came to the first solemn act of justice, which was the arraignment of Weston, he had his lesson to stand mute: which had arrested the wheel of justice. But this duab devil, by the means of some discreet divines, and the potent charm of justice, together, was cast out. Neither did this poisonous adder stop his ear to these charms, but relented, and yielded to his trial.—Then follow the proceedings of justice against the other offenders, Turner, Helwisse, Franklin.—But all these being but the organs and instruments of this fact, the actors and not the authors, justice could not have been crowned without this last act against these great persons. Else Weston's censure or prediction might have been verified, when he said, he hoped the small flies should not be caught, and the great escape. Wherein the king being in great straits, between the defacing of his honour and of his creature, hath, according as he useth to do, chosen the better part, reserving always mercy to himself.—The time also of this justice hath had its true motions. The time until this lady's deliverance was due unto honour, Christianity, and humanity, in respect of her great belly. The time since was due to another kind of deliverance too; which was, that some causes of estate, that were in the womb, might likewise be brought forth, not for matter of justice, but for reason of state. Likewise this last procrastination of days had the like weighty grounds and causes. And this is the true and brief representation of this extreme work of the king's justice.—Now for the evidence against this lady, I am sorry I must rip it up. I shall first shew you the purveyance or provisions of the poisons; that they were seven in number brought to this lady, and by her billeted and laid up till they might be used: and this done with an oath or vow of secrecy, which is like the Egyptian darkness, a gross and palpable darkness, that may be felt.—Secondly, I shall shew you the exhibiting and sorting of this same pumber or volley of poisons: white arsenic was fit for salt, because it is of like body and colour. The poison of great spiders, and of the venomous fly cantharides, was fit for pigs sauce, or partridge sauce, because it resembled pepper. As for mercury-water, and other poisons, they might be fit for tarts, which is a kind of hotch-pot, wherein no one colour is so proper: and some of these were delivered by the hands of this lady, and some by her direction.—Thirdly, I shall prove and observe unto you, the cautions of these poisons; that they might not be too swift, lest the world should startle at it by the suddenness of the dispatch: but they must abide long in the body, and work by degrees: and for this purpose there must be essays of them upon poor beasts, &c. And lastly I shall shew you the rewards of this impoisonment, first demanded by Weston, and denied, because the deed was not done; but after the deed done and perpetrated, that Overbury was dead, then performed and paid to the value of 180*l*.—And so without farther aggravation of that, which in itself bears its own tragedy, I will conclude with the confessions of this lady herself, which is the strongest support of justice; and yet is the foot-stool of mercy. For, as the scripture says, mercy and truth have kissed each other; there is no meeting or greeting of mercy, till there be a confession, or trial of truth. Questions legal for the Judges in the Case of the Earl and Countess of Somerset.

Whether the ax is to be carried before the prisoner, being in the case of felony?

Whether, if the lady make any digression to clear his lordship, she is not by the Lord Steward to be interrupted and silenced?

Whether, if my lord of Somerset should break forth into any speech of taxing the king, he be not presently by the Lord Steward to be interrupted and silenced; and, if he persist, he be not to be told, that if he take that course, he is to be withdrawn, and evidence to be given in his absence? And whether that may be; and what else to be done?

Whether if there should be twelve votes to condemn, and twelve or thirteen to acquit, it be not a verdict for the king?

Questions of Convenience, whereupon his majesty may confer with some of his Council.

Whether, if Somerset confess at any time before his trial, his majesty shall stay trial in respect of farther examination concerning practice of treason, as the death of the late prince, the conveying into Spain of the now prince, or the like; for till he confess the less crime, there is [no] likelihood of confessing the greater?

Whether, if the trial upon that reason shall be put off, it shall be discharged privately by dissolving the commission, or discharging the summons? Or whether it shall not be done in open court, the peers being met, and the solemnity and celebrity preserved; and that with some declaration of the cause of putting off the farther proceeding?

Whether the days of her trial and his shall be immediate, as it is now appointed; or a day between, to see, if, after condemnation, the lady will confess of this lord; which done, there is no doubt but he will confess of himself?

Whether his trial shall not be set first, and hers after, because then any conceit, which may be wrought by her clearing of him, may be prevented; and it may be he will be in the better temper, hoping of his own clearing, and of her respiting?

What shall be the days; for Thursday and Friday can hardly hold in respect of the summons; and it may be as well Friday and Saturday, or Monday and Tuesday, as London makes it already?

A particular Remembrance for his Majesty.

It were good, that after he is come into the hall, so that he may perceive he must go to trial, and shall be retired into the place appointed, till the court call for him, then the lieutenant should tell him roundly, that if in his speeches he shall tax the king, that the justice of England is, that he shall be taken away, and the evidence shall go on without him; and then all the people will cry away with him; and then it shall not be in the king's will to save his life, the people will be so set on fire.

Indorsed.—Memorial touching the course to be had in my lord of Somerset's arraignment.

The Heads of the Charge against Robert Earl of Somerset.

First it is meant that Somerset shall not be charged with any thing by way of aggravation, otherwise than as conduceth to the proof of the imposition.

For the proofs themselves, they are distributed into four :

The first to prove the malice, which Somerset bore to Overbury, which was the motive and ground of the imposition.

The second is to prove the preparations unto the imposition, by plotting his imprisonment, placing his keepers, stopping access of friends, &c.

The third is the acts of the imprisonments themselves.

And the fourth is acts subsequent, which do vehemently argue him to be guilty of the imposition.—[Apostyle of the king. 'Ye will doe well to remember lykeways in your præmble, that insigne, that the only zeal to justice maketh me take this course. I have comandit you not to expatiate, nor digresse upon any other points, that may not serve clearlie for probation or inducement of that point, quhair of he is accused.']

For the first two heads, upon conference, whereunto I called serjeant Montagu and serjeant Crew, I have taken them two heads to myself; the third I have allotted to serjeant Montagu; and the fourth to serjeant Crew.

In the first of these, to my understanding, is the only tenderness: for on the one side, it is most necessary to lay a foundation, that the malice was a deep malice, mixed with fear, and not only matter of revenge upon his lordship's quarrel: for periculum periculo vincitur; and the malice must have a proportion to the effect of it, which was the imposition: so that, if this foundation be not laid, all the evidence is weakened.

On the other side, if I charge him, or could charge him, by way of aggravation, with matters tending to disloyalty or treason, then he is like to grow desperate.

Therefore I shall now set down perspicuously what course I mean to hold, that your majesty may be pleased to direct and correct it, preserving the strength of the evidence: and this I shall now do, but shortly and without ornament.

First, I shall read some passages of Overbury's letters, namely these: "Is this the fruit of nine years love, common secrets, and common dangers?" In another letter; "Do not drive me to extremity to do that, which you and I should be sorry for?" In another letter; "Can you forget him, between whom such secrets of all kinds have passed? &c."

Then will I produce Suncock, who deposeth from Weston's speech, that Somerset told Weston, that, if ever Overbury came out of prison, one of them must die for it.

Then I will say what these secrets were. I mean not to enter into particulars, nor to charge him with disloyalty, because he stands to be tried for his life upon another crime. But yet by some taste, that I shall give to the peers in general, they may conceive of what nature those secrets may be. Wherein I will take it for a thing notorious, that Overbury was a man, that always carried himself insolently, both towards the queen, and towards the late prince: that he was a man, that carried Somerset on in courses separate and opposite to the privy council: that he was a man of nature fit to be an incendiary of a state; full of bitterness and wildness of speech and project: that he was thought also lately to govern Somerset, inso-much that in his own letters he vaunted, that from him proceeded Somerset's fortune, credit, and understanding.

This course I mean to run in a kind of generality, putting the imputations rather upon Overbury than Somerset; and applying it, that such a nature was like to hatch dangerous secrets and practices. I mean to shew likewise that jargons there were and ciphers between them, which are great badges of secrets of estate, and used either by princes and their ministers of state, or by such as practise against princes. That your majesty was called Julius in respect of your empire; the queen, Agrippina, though Somerset now saith it was Livia, and that my lady of Suffolk was Agrippina; the bishop of Canterbury, Unctius; Northampton, Dominic; Suffolk, first Lerma, after Wolsey; and many others; so as it appears they made a play both of your court and kingdom; and that their imaginations wrought upon the greatest men and matters.

Neither will I omit Somerset's breach of trust to your majesty, in trusting Overbury with all the dispatches, things, wherewith your council of estate itself was not many times privy or acquainted: and yet this man must be admitted to them, not cursorily, or by glimpses, but to have them by him, to copy them, to register them, to table them, &c.

I shall also give in evidence, in this place, the slight account of that letter, which was brought to Somerset by Ashton, being found in the fields soon after the late prince's death, and was directed to Antwerp, containing these words, that "the first branch was cut from the tree; and that he should, ere long, send happier and joyfuller news."

Which is a matter I would not use, but that my lord Coke, who hath filled this part with many frivolous things, would think all lost, except he hear somewhat of this kind. But this it is to come to the leavings of a business.

—[Apostyle of the king. 'This evidence cannot be given in without making me his accuser, and that upon a very slight ground. As for all the subsequent evidences, they are all so little evident, as una litura may serve to shame all.']

And for the rest of that kind, as to speak of that particular, that Mrs. Turner did at Whitehall shew to Franklin the man, who, as she said, poisoned the prince, which, he says, was a physician with a red beard.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing to Somerset, and declared by Franklin after condemnation.’]

That there was a little picture of a young man in white wax, left by Mrs. Turner with Forman the conjurer, which my lord Coke doubted was the prince.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing to Somerset, and a loose conjecture.’]

That the viceroy of the Indies at Goa reported to an English factor, that prince Henry came to an untimely death by a mistress of his.—[Ap. &c. ‘No better than a gazette, or passage of Gallo Belgicus.’]

That Somerset, with others, would have preferred Lowbell the apothecary to prince Charles.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing yet proved against Lowbell.’]

That the countess laboured Forman and Gresham, the conjurers, to enforce the queen by witchcraft to favour the countess.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing to Somerset.’]

That the countess told Franklin, that when the queen died, Somerset should have Somerset-house.—[Ap. &c. ‘Declared by Franklin after condemnation.’]

That Northampton said, the prince, if ever he came to reign, would prove a tyrant.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing to Somerset.’]

That Franklin was moved by the countess to go to the Palgrave, and should be furnished with money.—[Ap. &c. ‘Nothing to Somerset.’]

The particular reasons, why I omit them, I have [inserted between crotchets]; but the general is partly to do a kind of right to justice, and such a solemn trial, in not giving that in evidence, which touches not the delinquent, or is not of weight; and partly to observe your majesty’s direction, to give Somerset no just occasion of despair or flushes.

But I pray your majesty to pardon me, that I have troubled your majesty with repeating them, lest you shall hear hereafter, that Mr. Attorney hath omitted divers material parts of the evidence. Indorsed,

Some curious particulars, concerning the proceedings against the Somersets, are to be found in Bacon’s Correspondence as given in the late editions of his works.

The earl and his lady were released from their confinement in the Tower in January 1621-2, the latter dying August 23, 1632, leaving one daughter Anne, then sixteen years of age, afterwards married to William lord Russel, afterwards earl, and at last duke of Bedford. The earl of Somerset-survived his lady several years, and died in July 1645, being interred on the 17th of that month in the church of St. Paul’s Covent-Garden.

109. The Trial of ROBERT CARR* Earl of Somerset, † May 25, for the Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury: 14 JAMES I. A. D. 1616.

Ser. Cryer. O YES, my Lord High Steward of England purposes this day to proceed to the Trial of Robert earl of Somerset. O yes, Whosoever have any Indictments touching this cause, publicly give them in.

* Co. Inst. 50. Bacon’s Works, vol. i. p. 87.

† “And now begins the game to be played, in which Somerset must be the loser, the cards being shuffled, cut, and dealt between the king and sir Edward Coke, chief justice, whose daughter Purbeck Villers had married or was to marry, and therefore a fit instrument to ruin Somerset and secretary Winwood; these all played the stake; Somerset’s life and his lady’s, and their fortunes, and the family of Suffolk: some of them played booty, and in truth the game was not played above-board. The day the king went from Whitehall to Theobald’s, and so to Royston, the king sent for all the Judges (his lords and servants encircling him) where kneeling down in the midst, he used these words: “My Lords the Judges; It is lately come to my hearing that you have now in examination a business of poisoning: Lord, in what a most miserable condition shall this kingdom be (the only famous nation for hospitality in the world), if our tables should become such a snare as none could eat without danger of life, and that Italian custom should be introduced amongst us; therefore my lords I charge you, as you will answer it at that great and dreadful Day of Judgment, that you examine it strictly without favour, affection, or partiality; and if you shall spare any guilty of this crime, God’s curse light on you and your posterity; and if I spare any that are guilty, God’s curse light on me and my posterity for ever.”—But how this dreadful thunder, curse or imprecation was performed, shall be shewed hereafter; and I may pray God the effect be not felt amongst us, even at this day, as it hath been, I fear, on that virtuous lady Elizabeth and her children; for God treasures up such imprecations and deprecations, and pours them out when a nation least dreams, even when they cry, Peace, peace to their souls; and it may well be (at this time our sins concurring) pouring out upon king, judges, and the whole state.—It appears how unwilling the king was to ruin Somerset,

My lord Coke delivers in the Indictment of my lord of Somerset to Mr. Fenshaw indorsed.

Ser. Cryer. O yes, Walter Lee, Serjeant at Arms, return the Precept for the lords, which thou hast warned to be here this day. O yes.

[He calls every lord by his name, and they stand up as they be called.]—My Lord High Steward excuses the lords Mounteagle and Russel of their absence, in respect of their sickness.

Ser. Cryer. O yes, Lieutenant of the Tower, return thy Precept, and bring the Prisoner to the Bar.—Which he did, and my lord makes three reverences to the Lord High Steward and the lords.

He holds it up so long, until Mr. Lieutenant had him hold it down. The Indictment is read, containing Weston's actions in the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, and his abetting of him, the 8th of May 1613.—My lord of Somerset was apparelled in a plain black sattin suit, laid with two sattin laces in a seam; a gown of unrent velvet lined with unshorn: all the sleeves laid with sattin lace; a pair of gloves with sattin tops, his george about his neck, his hair curled, his visage pale, his beard long, his eyes sunk in his head. Whilst his Indictment was a creature of his own making, 'sed immedicabile vulnus, ense rescindendum est.' Grace was offered by the king, had he had grace to have apprehended it. The king with this, took his farewell for a time of London, and was accompanied with Somerset to Royston, where, no sooner he brought him, but instantly took leave, little imagining what viper lay amongst the herbs; nor must I forget to let you know how perfect the king was in the art of dissimulation, or, to give it his own phrase, king-craft. The earl of Somerset never parted from him with more seeming affection than at this time: when he knew Somerset should never see him more, and had you seen that seeming affection, as the author himself did, you would rather believe he was in his rising than setting. The earl when he kissed his hand, the king about his neck, slabbering his cheeks, saying, 'for God's sake when shall I see thee again? on my soul I shall neither eat nor sleep until you come again;' the earl told him, on Monday (this being on the Friday). 'For God's sake let me,' said the king, 'shall I? shall I?' Then lolled about his neck; then 'for God's sake give thy lady this kiss for me;' in the same manner at the stairs-head, at the middle of the stairs, and at the stairs foot. The earl was not in his coach, when the king used these very words (in the hearing of four servants, of whom one was Somerset's great creature, and of the bed-chamber, who reported it instantly to the author of this History) 'I shall never see his face more.'—I appeal to the reader, whether this motto of 'Qui nescit dissimulare nescit regnare,' was not as well performed in this passage as his Beati Pacifici, in the whole course of his life; and his love to the latter, made him to be beaten with his own weapon in the other, by all princes and states that had to do with him." Weldon's Court and Character of King James, p. 99.

reading, he three or four times whispered to the Lieutenant.

Mr. Fenshaw. Robert earl of Somerset, What sayest thou, art thou Guilty of this felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

My lord of Somerset making an obeisance to the Lord High Steward, answered, Not Guilty.

Mr. Fenshaw. How wilt thou be tried?

Ld. Som. By God and the country; but presently recalling himself, said, By God and my peers.

Ser. Cryer. O yes, All you that be to give in evidence against Robert earl of Somerset, who stands now at the bar upon his deliverance, make your appearance, and you shall be heard what you have to say against him.

My lord of Somerset, upon his arraignment, having pleaded Not Guilty, the proceeding after was thus:

Lord High Steward. [Ellesmere, Lord Chancellor.] Robert earl of Somerset, you have been arraigned, and pleaded Not Guilty; now I must tell you, whatsoever you have to say in your own defence, say it boldly, without fear; and though it be not the ordinary custom, you shall have pen and ink to help your memory: but remember that God is the God of truth; a fault defend'd is a double crime; hide not the verity, nor affirm an untruth; for, to deny that which is true, increases the offence; take heed lest your wilfulness cause the gates of mercy to be shut upon you. Now for you, my lords the peers, you are to give diligent attention to that which shall be said; and you must not rest alone upon one piece of evidence, but ground your judgment upon the whole. This moreover I would have you remember, that though you be not sworn as common juries, upon a book, yet that you are tied in as great a bond, your own honour and fidelity, and allegiance to the king; and thus I leave the whole proceeding to your censures. And for you that be of the king's counsel, free your discourse from all partiality, but let truth prevail, and endeavour to make it appear.

Sej. Montague. My Lord High Steward of England, and you my lords, this cannot but be a heavy spectacle unto you, to see that man that not long since in great place, with a white staff, went before the king, now at this bar hold up his hand for blood; but this is the change of fortune, nay, I might better say, the hand of God, and work of justice, which is the king's honour.—But now to the fact; Robert earl of Somerset stands indicted as accessory before the fact, of the wilful murder and poisoning of sir T. Overbury, done by Weston, but procured by him; this, my lord, is your charge. The Indictment hath been found by men of good quality, seventeen knights and esquires of the best rank and reputation, some of whose names I will be hold to read unto you; sir T. Fowler, sir W. Slingsby, and fifteen more; these have returned billā vera. Now an Indictment is but an accusation of record in form thus: Weston, at four several times, gave Overbury four several poisons, the first May 9th, 1613, that was rosalgar, carrying this poison in one hand, and his both in the other; the second was June following, and that was arsenick; the third was July the 10th following, and that was mercury sublimate in tarts; the fourth was Sept. 14th following, and that was mercury sublimate in a clyster, given by Weston and an apothecary yet unknown, and that killed him. Of these four several poisons ministered by Weston, and procured by you, the 15th of Sept. 1615, Overbury died, and the author is ever worse than the actor. The first poison laid in the Indictment, that Weston gave sir T. Overbury, was the 9th of May; and therefore we say, That the lord Somerset, the 8th of May, hired, counselled and abetted Weston to this fact: and as this day, my lord, I do charge you for a king, so heretofore king David was charged in the like case, for the murder of Uriah; and though David was under his pavilion, and Uriah in the army, yet David was the cause of his murder: so though you were in the king's chamber, and Overbury in the Tower, yet it was you that killed him. It was a stronger hand than Weston's that wrought this. The proof, Mr. Attorney, will follow; and I will now conclude with two desires to the peers: first, That they will not expect visible proofs in the work of darkness. The second is, That whereas in an Indictment there be many things laid only for form, you are not to look that the proof should follow that, but only that which is substantial; and the substance must be this, Whether my lord of Somerset procured or caused the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, or no?

L. H. S. That indeed, my lords, is that which you are to look after, Whether my lord of Somerset was the cause of his poisoning, or not?

Lord Coke. This was very well moved by Mr. Recorder, and the law is clear in this point, that the proof must follow the substance,* not the form.

The Judges all rising, affirmed this to be true.

Att. Gen. (sir Francis Bacon). May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and you my lords the peers, you have here before you Robert earl of Somerset to be tried for his life, concerning the procuring and consenting to the poisoning of sir T. Overbury, then the king's prisoner in the Tower of London, as an accessory before the fact.—I know your honours cannot behold this noble man, but you must remember the great favours which the king hath conferred on him, and must be sensible, that he is yet a member of your body, and a peer, as you are; so that you cannot cut him off from your body, but with grief: and therefore you will expect from us that give in the king's evidence, sound and sufficient matter of proof to satisfy your honours consciences.—As for the manner of the evidence, the king our master, who, amongst other his virtues, excelleth in that virtue of the imperial throne, which is justice, hath given us command, that we should not expatiate nor make invectives, but materially pursue the evidence, as it conduceth to the point in question.—A matter, that, though we are glad of so good a warrant, yet we should have done of ourselves: for far be it from us by any strains of wit or arts, to seek to play prizes, or to blazon our names in blood, or to carry the day otherwise than upon sure grounds; we shall carry the lantern of justice (which is the evidence) before your eyes upright, and so be able to save it from being put out with any ground of evasion or vain defence, not doubting at all, but that the evidence itself will carry that force, as it shall need no advantage or aggravation.—First, my lords, the course that I will hold in delivering of that which I shall say, for I love order, is this: 1st, I will speak somewhat of the nature and greatness of the offence, which is now to be tried, not to weigh down my lord with the greatness of it, but rather contrarywise to shew, that a great offence needs a good proof. And that the king, howsoever he might esteem this gentleman heretofore as the signet upon his finger (to use the Scripture phrase), yet in such a case as this, he was to put it off.—2dly, I will use some few words touching the nature of the proofs, which in such a case are competent.—3dly, I will state the proofs.—And, lastly, I will produce the proofs, either out of examination and matters of writing, or witnesses in voce.

For the offence itself, it is of crimes, next unto High-treason, the greatest; it is the foulest of felonies. It hath three degrees; First, It is murder by imposition: Secondly, It is murder committed upon the king's prisoner in the Tower: Thirdly, I might say, That it is murder under the colour of friendship; but that is a circumstance moral, and therefore I leave that to the evidence itself. For murder, my lords, the first record of justice which was in the world, was judgment upon a murderer, in the person of Adam's first-born Cain: and though it was not punished by death, but banishment, and marks of ignominy, in respect of the population of the world; yet there was a severe charge given, that it should not go unpunished. So it appeareth likewise in Scripture, that the murder of Abner by Joab, though it were by David respited in respect of great services past, or reason of state, yet it was not forgotten. But of this I will say no more, because I will not discourse; it was ever admitted and ranked in God's own tables, that murder is, of offences between man and man, next unto High-Treason, and disobedience to authority, (which sometimes have been referred to the first table, because of the lieutenantancy of God in princes) the greatest.—For imposition, I am sorry it should be heard of in our kingdom; it is not 'nostri generis, nec sanguis

'nis peccatum;' it is an Italian comfit for the court of Rome, where that person that intoxicateth the kings of the earth is many times really intoxicated and poisoned himself. But it hath three circumstances which make it grievous beyond other matters.—The first is, that it takes a man away in full peace, in God's and the king's peace, that thinks no harm, but is comforting of nature with refection and food: so that, as the Scripture saith, 'his table is made a snare.'—The second is, that it is easily committed, and easily concealed; and on the other side, hardly prevented, and hardly discovered: For murder by violence, princes have guards, and private men have houses, attendants and arms: neither can such murder be committed, but cum sonitu, with some overt and apparent acts, that may discover and trace the offenders: but for poison, the cup itself of princes will scarce serve in regard of many poisons that neither discolour nor distaste; it comes upon a man when he is careless, and without suspicion, and every day a man is within the gates of death.—And the last is, because it concerneth not only the destruction of the maliced man, but of every man, 'Quis modo tutus erit?' For many times the poison is prepared for one, and is taken by another, so that men die other men's deaths, 'concidit infelix alieno vulnere;' and it is as the Psalmist calleth it, 'sagitta nocte volans,' the arrow that flieth by night, that hath no aim nor certainty. And therefore if any man shall say to himself, here is great talk of imposition, but I am sure I am safe, for I have no enemies, neither have I any thing another man should long for: Why, that is all one, he may sit next him at the table, that is meant to be poisoned, and pledge him of his cup: As we may see in the example of 21 Hen. 8. That where the purpose was to poison one man, there was poison put into barm or yeast, and with that barm, pottage or greuel was made, whereby sixteen of the bishop of Rochester's servants were poisoned; nay, it went into the alms-basket likewise, and the poor at the gate were poisoned. And therefore with great judgment did the statute made that year, touching this accident, make imposition High-Treason, because it tends to the dissolving of human society; for whatsoever offence doth so, is in the nature thereof High-Treason.—Now for the third degree of this particular offence, which is, that it is committed upon the king's prisoner, who was out of his own defence, and wholly in the king's protection, and for whom the king and the state were a kind of respondent: it is a thing that aggravates the fault much, for certainly (my lord of Somerset) let me tell you this, that sir T. Overbury is the first man that was murdered in the Tower of London, save the murder of the two young princes, by the appointment of Richard 3.

Thus much of the offence; now to the proofs.—For the matter of proofs, you may consider that imposition, of all offences, is most secret, even so secret, that if in all cases of imposition you should require testimony, you should as good proclaim impunity.—Who could have impeached Livia by testimony, for the poisoning of her figs upon the tree, which her husband was wont to gather with his own hands? Who could have impeached Parasctis for the poisoning of the one side of the knife she carried with her, and keeping the other side clean, so that herself did eat of the same piece of meat that they did whom she did poison? These cases are infinite, and need not to be spoken of the secrecy of imposition; but wise men must take upon them, in these secret cases, Solomon's spirit, that when there could be no witnesses, collected the act by the affection: but yet we are not at our cause, for that which your lordships are to try, is not the act of imposition, for that is done to your hands; all the world, by law, is concluded to say, that Overbury was poisoned by Weston: but the question before you is, of the procurement only, and, as the law, termeth it, as accessory before the fact; which abetting is no more, but to do or use any act or means which may aid or conduce to the imposition.—So that it is not the buying, nor the making of the poison, nor the preparing, nor confecting, nor commixing of it, nor the giving or sending, or laying of the poison, that are the only acts that do amount unto the abetment: but if there be any other act or means done, or used to give opportunity of imposition, or to facilitate the execution of it, or to stop or divert any impediments that might hinder it, and that it be with an intention to accomplish and achieve the imposition; all these are abetments and accessories before the fact. As for example, if there be a conspiracy to murder a man, as he journeyeth on the way, by invitation, or by colour of some business; and another taketh upon him to dissuade some friend of his company, that he is not strong enough to make his defence; and another hath a part to hold him in talk till the first blow be given: all these, my lords, without scruple, are accessories to the murder, although none of them give the blow, nor assist to give the blow.—My lords, he is not the hunter alone, that lets slip the dog upon the deer, but he that lodgeth him and hunts him out, or sets a train or trap for him, that he cannot escape, or the like. But this, my lords, little needeth in this case; for such a chain of acts of impositions as this, I think, was never heard nor seen. And thus much of the nature of the proofs.

To descend to the proofs themselves, I shall keep this course: First, I will make a narration of the fact itself. Secondly, I will break and distribute the proofs, as they concern the prisoner. And, thirdly, according to the distribution, I will produce them, and read them, to use them. So that there is nothing that I shall say, but your lordship shall have three thoughts or cogitations to answer it.—1st. When I open it, you may take your aim. 2dly, When I distribute it, you may prepare your Answers without confusion. And, 3dly, When I produce the witnesses, or the examinations themselves, you may again ruminate, and re-advise to make your defence.—And this I do, because your memory and understanding may not be oppressed or overladen with length of evidence, or with confusion of order; nay more, when your lordship shall make your Answer in your time, I will put you in mind, where cause shall be of your omission.

First, therefore, sir T. Overbury, for a time, was known to have great interest and strait friendship with my lord of Somerset, both in his meaner fortunes, and after; insomuch that he was a kind of oracle of direction unto him, and if you will believe his own vaunt (being indeed of an insolent and thronical disposition) he took upon him that the fortunes, reputation and understanding of this gentleman (who is well known to have an able teacher) proceeded from his company and counsel: and this friendship rested not only in conversation and business at court, but likewise in communication of secrets of state: for my lord of Somerset exercising at that time by his majesty's special favour and trust, the office of secretary, did not forbear to acquaint Overbury with the king's packets and dispatches from all parts of Spain, France, and the Low-Countries; and this then not by glimpses, or now and then rounding in the ear for a favour, but in a settled manner; packets were sent, sometimes opened by my lord, sometimes unbroken unto Overbury, who perused them, copied them, registered them, made table-talk of them, as they thought good. So I will undertake the time was, when Overbury knew more of the secrets of state, than the council-table did; nay, they were grown to such inwardness, as they made a play of all the world besides themselves, so as they had ciphers and jargons for the king and queen, and great men of the realm; things seldom used, but either by princes to their confederates, or at the least, by such as practise and work against, or at the least, upon princes.—But understand me, my lord, I shall not charge you with disloyalty at this day; and I lay this for a foundation, that there was great communication of secrets between you and sir T. Overbury, and that it had relation to matters of state, and the great causes of this kingdom.—But, my lords, as it is a principle in nature, that the best things are, in their corruption, the worst, and the sweetest wine maketh the sourest vinegar; so it fell out with them, that this excess, as I may say, of friendship, ended in mortal hatred on my lord of Somerset's part. I have heard my Lord Steward say sometimes in the chaucery, that frost and fraud end foul; and I may add a third, and that is, the friendship of ill men, which is truly said to be conspiracy and not friendship. For it fell out some twelve months or more before Overbury's imprisonment in the Tower, that the earl of Somerset fell into an unlawful love towards that unfortunate lady the countess of Essex, and to proceed to a marriage with her; this marriage and purpose did Overbury mainly impugn, under pretence to do the true part of a friend, for that he accounted her an unworthy woman. But the truth was, Overbury, who (to speak plainly) had little that was solid for religion, or moral virtue, but was wholly possessed with ambition and vain-glory, was loth to have any partners in the favour of my lord of Somerset; and especially not any of the house of the Howards, against whom he had always professed hatred and opposition.—And, my lords, that this is no sinister construction, will appear to you, when you shall hear that Overbury made his brags, that he had won him the love of the lady, by his letters and industry; so far was he from cases of conscience in this point.—And certainly, my lords, howsoever the tragical misery of this poor gentleman, Overbury, might somewhat obliterate his faults, yet, because we are not upon point of civility, but to discover the face of truth, before the face of justice, for that it is material to the true understanding of the state of this cause, Overbury was naught and corrupt; the ballads must be mended for that point.—But to proceed: when Overbury saw that he was like to be possessor of my lord's grace, which he had possessed so long, and by whose greatness he had promised himself to do wonders, and being a man of an unbounded and impudent spirit, he began not only to dissuade, but to deter him from the love of that lady; and finding him fixed, thought to find a strong remedy: and supposing that he had my lord's head under his girdle, in respect of communication of secrets of state, as he calls them himself secrets of nature; and therefore dealt violently with him, to make him desist with menaces of discovery and the like: hereupon grew two streams of hatred upon Overbury, the one from the lady, in respect that he crossed her love, and abused her name (which are furies in women); the other of a more deep nature from my lord of Somerset himself, who was afraid of Overbury's nature, and if he did break from him and fly out, he would wind into him, and trouble his whole fortunes. I might add a third stream of the earl of Northampton's ambition, who desires to be first in favour with my lord of Somerset; and knowing Overbury's malice to himself, and to his house, thought that man must be removed and cut off, so as certainly it was resolved and decreed, that Overbury must die.—That was too weak, and they were so far from giving way to it, as they crossed it; there rested but two ways of quarrel, assault and poison. For that of assault, after some proposition and attempt, they passed from it, as a thing too open and subject to more variety of shame; that of poison likewise was an hazardous thing, and subject to many preventions and caution, especially to such a working and jealous brain as Overbury had, except he was first fast in their hands: therefore the way was first to get him into a trap, and lay him up, and then they could not miss the mark. And therefore in execution of this plot, it was concluded, that he should be designed to some honourable employment in foreign parts, and should underhand, by my lord of Somerset, be encouraged to refuse it; and so, upon contempt, he should be laid prisoner in the Tower, and then they thought he should be close enough, and death should be his bail. Yet they were not at their end, for they considered, that if there were not a fit Lieutenant of the Tower for their purpose, and likewise a fit Under-keeper of Overbury; 1st, they should meet with many impediments in the giving and exhibiting of the poison; secondly, they should be exposed to note and observation, that might discover them; and, thirdly, Overbury, in the mean time, might write clamorous and furious letters to his friends, and so all might be disappointed. And therefore, the next link of the chain was to displace the then Lieutenant Wade, and to place Elwes, a principal abettor to the imposition; to displace Cary, that was Under-keeper in Wade's time, and to place Weston, that was the actor in the imposition; and this was done in such a while, that it may appear to be done as it were in a breath.—Then when they had this poor gentleman in the Tower, close prisoner, where he could not escape, nor stir; where he could not feed, but by their hands; where he could not speak or write, but through their trunks; then was the time to act the last day of his tragedy.—Then must Franklin, the purveyor of the poisons, procure five, six, seven several poisons, to be sure to hit his complexion; then must Mrs. Turner, the lay-mistress of the poisons, advise what works at present, and what at distance: then must Weston be the tormenter, and chase him with poison after poison, poison in salt-meats, poison in sweet-meats, poison in medicines and vomits, until at last his body was almost come by use of poisons to the state of Mithridates's body, by the use of treacle and preservatives, that the force of the poisons was blunted upon him; Weston confessing, when he was chid for not dispatching him, that he had given him enough to poison twenty men.—And, lastly, because all this asked time, courses were taken by Somerset, both to divert all the true means of Overbury's delivery, and to entertain him with continual letters, partly with hopes and protestations for his delivery, and partly with other fables and negotiations, somewhat like some kind of persons which keep in a tale of fortune-telling, when they have a felonious intent to pick pockets and purses. And this is the true narration of this act, which I have summarily recited.

Now, for the distribution of the proofs, there are four heads to prove you guilty, whereof two are precedent to the imposition, the third is present, and the fourth is following or subsequent: for it is in proofs, as it is in lights, there is a direct light, and there is a reflexion of light, and a double light.—The first head or proof is, That there was a root of bitterness, a mortal malice or hatred, mixed with a deep and bottomless mischief, that you had to sir T. Overbury.—The second is, That you were the principal actor, and had your hand in all those acts, which did conduce to the imposition, and gave opportunity to effect it, without which the imposition could never have been, and which could seem to tend to no other end, but to the imposition.—The third is, That your hand was in the very imposition itself, that you did direct poison, and that you did deliver poison, and that you did continually hearken to the success of the imposition, and that you spurred it on, and called for dispatch, when you thought it lingered.—And lastly, That you did all things after the imposition, which may detect a guilty conscience, for the smothering of it, and the avoiding of punishment for it; which can be but of three kinds.—That you suppressed, as much as in you was, testimony; that you did deface, destroy, clip and misdire all writings that might give light to the imposition; and you did fly to the altar of guiltiness, which is a pardon of murder, and a pardon for yourself, and not for yourself.

In this, my lord, I convert my speech unto you, because I would have you alter the points of your charge, and so make your defence the better. And two of these heads I have taken to myself, and left the other to the king's two serjeants.—For the first main part, which is the mortal malice coupled with fear, that was in you to sir T. Overbury, although you did palliate it with a great deal of hypocrisy and dissimulation, even to the very end; I will prove it, my Lord Steward, the root of his hate was that which cost many a man's life, that is, fear of discovering secrets; I say, of secrets of a dangerous and high nature: wherein after the course that I will hold, shall be this. I will shew that a breach and malice was betwixt my lord and Overbury, and that it burst forth into violent threats and menaces, on both sides. Secondly, That these secrets were not of a light, but of an high nature. I will give you the elevation of the pole: they were such, as my lord of Somerset had made a vow, that Overbury should neither live in court, nor country; that he had likewise opened himself so far, that 'either he or himself must die for it:' and of Overbury's part, he had threatened my lord, 'that whether he did live or die, my lord's shame should never die,' but that, 'he would leave him the most odious man in the world.' And farther, that my lord was like enough to repent where Overbury wrote, which was in the Tower of London; he was a prophet in that: so there is the highest of the secret. Thirdly, I will shew you that all the king's business was, by my lord, put into Overbury's hands, so as there is work enough for secrets whatsoever; they write them, and like princes they had confederates, their ciphers, and their jargons.—And, lastly, I will shew you that it was but a toy, to say the malice was only in respect he spake dishonourably of the lady, or for doubt of breaking the marriage, for that Overbury was coadjutor to that love, and the lord of Somerset was as deep in speaking ill of the lady as Overbury: and again, it was too late for that matter, for the bargain of the match was then made and past; and if it had been no more than to remove Overbury for disturbing the match, it had been an easy matter to have lunded over Overbury, for which they had a fair way, but that would not serve. And, lastly, 'Periculum periculo vincitur:' to go so far as an imprisonment, must have a deeper malice than flashes, for the cause must have a proportion in the effect.

For the next general head or proof, which consists in the acts preparatory, or middle acts, they are in eight several points of the compass, as I may term them.

1st, There were divers devices and projects to set Overbury's head on work, to dispatch him, and overthrow him, plotted between the countess of Essex, and the earl of Somerset, and the earl of Northampton, before they fell upon the imprisonment; for always before men fix upon a course of mischief, there will be some reflection: but die he must one way or other. 2dly, That my lord of Somerset was principal practiser, I must speak it, in a most perfidious manner; to set a trap and train for Overbury, to get him into the Tower, without which they durst not attempt the imprisonment. 3dly, That the placing of the Lieutenant Elwes, one of the imprisoners, was done by my lord of Somerset. 4thly, That the placing of Weston the Under-keeper, who was the principal imprisoner, and displacing of Cary, and the doing all this within the space of fifteen days after Overbury's commitment, was by the means and countenance of my lord of Somerset: and these were the active instruments of the imprisonment, and this was a business the lady's power could not reach unto. 5thly, That because there must be a cause of this tragedy to be acted, and chiefly because they would not have the poisons work upon the sudden, and for that the strength of Overbury's nature, on the very custom of receiving the poisons into his body, did overcome the poisons that they wrought not so fast; therefore Overbury must be held in the Tower, as well as he was laid in: and as my lord of Somerset got him into the trap, so he keeps him in, and amuseth him with continual hope of liberty, but diverted all the true and effectual means of his liberty, and makes light of his sickness and extremities. 6thly, That not only the plot of getting Overbury into the Tower, and the devices to hold and keep him there, but the strange manner of the close keeping of him, being in but for a contempt, was by the device and means of my lord of Somerset, who denied his father to see him, denied his servants that offered to be shut up close prisoners with him, and in effect handled it so, that he made him close prisoner to all his friends, and exposed to all his enemies. 7thly, That all the advertisement the lady received from time to time, from the Lieutenant or Weston, touching Overbury's state of body and health, were ever sent nigh to the court, though it were in progress, and that from my lady; such a thirst and listening he had to hear that he was dispatched. Lastly, That there was a continual negotiation to set Overbury's head on work, that he should make some offer to clear the honour of the lady, and that he should be a good instrument towards her and her friends; all which was but entertainment: For your lordship shall see divers of my lord of Northampton's letters, (whose hand was deep in this business) written I must say in dark words and clauses, that there was one thing pretended, and another thing intended; that there was a real charge, and somewhat not real; a main drift and dissimulation. Nay, farther, there be some passages which the peers, in their wisdoms, will discern to point directly at the imprisonment.

And now for producing of my proofs, I will use this course: Those examinations that have been taken upon oath, shall be here read; and the witnesses also I have caused to be here, that they may be sworn, and to justify or deny what they hear read, and to diminish or add to their examinations; and besides that, my lord of Somerset, and you my lords the peers, may ask them what farther questions you please.

He saw a letter of his master's, whose hand he knew, to my lord of Somerset, wherein were these words, 'If I die, my blood lie upon you.' And in that or another letter there was this clause, 'My lord, you are now as good as your word, you have kept your vow to me.' Moreover, that in the privy-gallery at White-hall, my lord of Somerset coming late to his chamber, met there sir T. Overbury; 'How now,' said my lord, 'are you up yet?' 'Nay,' answers sir T. Overbury, 'what do you here at this time of night? Will you never leave the company of that base woman? And seeing you do so neglect my advice, I desire that to-morrow morning we may part; and that you will let me have that portion you know is due to me; and then I will leave you free to yourself, to stand on your own legs.' My lord of Somerset answered, 'His legs were strong enough to bear himself;' and so departed in great displeasure. And to his certain knowledge, they were never perfectly reconciled again. And being asked how he heard this discourse, he said, it was in the dead of the night, and he, being in a room within the gallery, heard all that passed.

H. Payton. I acknowledge every part of this examination to be true: And more, That my master being in the Tower, he sent a letter by Weston to me, to carry to my lord; and withal, to deliver my lord this message, That that powder he had sent him had made him very sick, and given him in one night 60 stools besides vomits. This latter I carried to the court, and delivered to Mr. Pawlins to carry to my lord, who was then in his chamber. My lord presently came out; asked me how my master did. I told him very sick; and withal, this message how the physic had wrought with him. My lord smiled, and cried pish; and so turned him away.

L. DAVIS, sometime servant of sir T. Overbury, now of sir H. May, his Examination before the lord Coke.

Smith, that he hath heard his master say, That he would have gone ambassador, but that my lord of Rochester dissuaded him. He hath seen some letters of sir T. Overbury's, wherein he writ that the lord of Rochester was even with him: But he thinks he (i. e. the lord Rochester) never saw those passages.

Lord of Som. I pray you, my lords, note he says, I never saw those passages.

Mr. Att. It is true: For those letters were lost; but after found by him, who knew them to be his master sir T. Overbury's hand.

Sir Thomas Overbury's first Letter to my lord Somerset.

"Is this the fruit of my care and love to you? Be these the fruits of common secrets, common dangers? As a man, you cannot suffer me to lie in this misery; yet your behaviour betrays you. All I intreat of you is, that you will free me from this place, and that we may part friends. Drive me not to extremities, lest I should say something that you and I both repent. And I pray God that you may not repent the omission of this my counsel, in this place, whence I now write this letter."

L. Wentworth. How did you know these letters were sent from him to my lord of Somerset?

L. Coke. They were found in a cabinet, among some other things, left in trust by my lord of Somerset with sir R. Cotton: And thus they were discovered; sir R. Cotton, fearing searches, delivers them to a friend of his in Holborn, one Mrs. Farnesforth; she, to the intent they might be safely kept, sent them to a merchant's house in Cheapside, where some nine months before she had lodged, and desired that they might safely be kept for her, pretending they were some writings that concerned her jointure. On St. Thomas's day she herself comes to have them again, saying, she must carry them to her counsel to peruse. He said, 'If you will suffer me to open it before you, and that there be nothing else, you shall have them.' But she by no means would consent to the breaking of it open. Then he answered, 'It is a troublesome time; I will go to my Lord Chief Justice, and if he find no other writings than such as concern you, you shall have them again.' So coming to my chamber, and not finding me within, (for I was gone to St. Paul's to the sermon) he went to my lord Zouch, one of the appointed commissioners for this cause; who himself alone would not break it up, but came to St. Paul's to me; where in a by-room we broke it up, and in it found these letters, and divers from my lord of Northampton, besides many other papers.

L. Zouch. I affirm this relation of my lord Coke's to be true.

Sir Thomas Overbury's second Letter to my lord Somerset.

"This comes under seal; and therefore shall be bold. You told my brother Lidcote, that unreverend style might make you neglect me. With what face could you do this, who know you owe me for all the fortune, wit, and understanding that you have?" [Here were inserted some borrowed names.]

Mr. Att. Under these false names they meant great persons; Julius, the king, Dominic, my lord of Northampton, Unclius, my lord of Canterbury.

The rest of the Letter.

"And yet pretend the reason why you seek not my liberty, to be my unreverend style; whilst, in the mean time, you sacrifice me to your woman, still holding friendship with those that brought me hither. You bade my brother Lidcote keep my desire of liberty secret: Yet this shall not serve your turn; for you and I, ere it be long, will come to a public trial of another nature. I upon the rack, and you at your ease: and yet I must say nothing! when I heard (notwithstanding my misery) how you went to your woman, curled your hair, preferred Gibbe into the bed-chamber, and in the mean time send me nineteen projects, how I should cast about for my liberty; and give me a long account of the pains you have taken, and then go out of town. I wonder to see how you should neglect him, to whom such secrets of all kinds have passed: and suffer my mother and sisters to lie here in town, expecting my liberty; my brother Lidcote to be in a manner quite overthrown, in respect of my imprisonment; and yet you stand stupid: Nor have neither servant nor friend suffered to come to me. Well, all this vacation I have written the story betwixt you and me: How I have lost my friends for your sake; what hazard I have run; what secrets have passed betwixt us; how after you had won that woman by my letters, and then you concealed all your after-proceedings from me; and how upon this there came many breaches betwixt us; of the vow you made to be even with me, and sending for me twice that day that I was caught in the trap, persuading me that it was a plot of mine enemies to send me beyond sea; and urging me not to accept it, assuring me to free me from any long trouble. On Tuesday I made an end of this, and on Friday sent it to a friend of mine under eight seals; and if you persist still to use me thus, assure yourself it shall be published. Whether I live or die, your shame shall never die, but ever remain to the world, to make you the most odious man living."

H. Payton and L. Davis. We both, upon our oaths, know this to be sir T. Overbury's hand.

SIMCOCKS'S Examination before my lord Coke, writ with his own hand.

He says that Weston many times, when sir T.

Overbury was in the Tower, told him, That my lord of Somerset charged him to look to Overbury well; for if ever he came out, one of us two must die.

L. Som. I would fain know whether Weston were examined, or no.

L. Wentworth. How long is it since this familiar acquaintance betwixt Simcocks and Weston?

Simcocks. He and I were of antient and familiar acquaintance long since.

Mr. Attorney. Weston had continually access to my lord, had rewards from him: My lord charged him to look to Overbury well. It could not be his marriage that made him so much fear; but what the secrets were that caused it, it is not the work of this day. Now to shew that the greatest matters of state were communicated to him, read Davis.

L. Davis examined. There was a packet of letters, and sealed, which as he takes, came from sir J. Digby, directed to the king; and his master sir T. Overbury opened it, took brief notes for my lord of Somerset, and sealing it again, sent both the notes and packets to him. Another of this he saw his master had at Newmarket from sir Thomas Edmundes to the king, out of which, after he had taken extracts, he sealed it up again, and sent both back by this examinant to my lord Somerset.

Mr. Attorney. I will not now, my lords, endeavour to press the greatness of this offence: But I urge it thus, That you may see there were no mean secrets betwixt my lord and sir T. Overbury, that might rather cause him to fear him, than the hindrance of his marriage: If that had been it alone, his going beyond sea would have served the turn.

L. of Som. exam. says, That amongst many other characters for names, that passed between sir T. Overbury and him, Simonist was for sir H. Nevil, Wolfy for the now lord treasurer, Ductius for my lord of Canterbury.

Mr. Attorney. In good faith, these two made plays of all the world besides themselves; but though it were a play then, it hath proved tragical since.

A LETTER of my lord of Northampton to my lord of Somerset.

"Now all is concluded about the form of the non-ality, I doubt not but God will bless the next bargain. I hope hereafter to find better pen and ink in this lady's chamber. Be st. ll happy. Underneath subscribed H. Northampton, and I am witness to this bargain. Fra. Howard."

This Letter was shewed my lord of Somerset, and he confessed the hand.

Mr. Attorney. For the second branch that I mean to follow; and that is, That you used the means to expose him to the Tower, and there to keep him close prisoner. It is a chain of eight links, and shall be shewed you upon eight points of the compass. But before we come to these, it is to be considered, that as no consultation is ripe in an hour, so no more was theirs: for they purposed at first to have taken away his life by assault. And Franklin tells you the cause of this malice.

FRANKLIN examined before my lord Coke, but not upon oath.

He saith, That my lady Somerset said the cause of this hatred of sir T. Overbury was, that he would pry so far into my lord of Somerset, that he would put him down.

Sir D. WOODES examined before lord Coke.

He saith, My lady Somerset knowing there was some discontent betwixt Overbury and him, in respect of a suit that he crossed him in, told him, that if he would kill sir T. Overbury he should have 1000*l.* and besides, she would make his greatest enemy to become his greatest friend: and he knew no enemy he had in court but my lord of Rochester. He answered, That if my lord of Rochester would give him his hand, or but pass his word, if he did it, that he should escape, and have his pardon, he would do it. Upon this she paused, and desired some time to give her answer; and when he came again to her, she told him that could not be: but promised all favour possible unto him, and warranted him to go on upon her life.

L. of Som. exam. saith, It was once resolved somebody in court should fall out with Overbury, and offer him some affront; but that was not followed.

Mr. Attorney. Note, my lords, he does not say it was disliked. And now to the puddle of blood: the first link of which is, that the means to entrap Overbury for the Tower, was by the means of my lord of Somerset.

Sir DUDLEY DIGGS sworn.

Sir T. Overbury once told me, that he went to undertake the employment offered him to go beyond sea; but afterwards he sent me word by sir R. Mansel, that he had changed his mind. And sir R. Mansel told me farther, that he saw a letter from the lord of Somerset to Overbury, that dissuaded him from that course. Seeing Mr. Attorney hath called me so far out of the country for this small testimony, I wish sir R. Mansel were here to justify it.

My lord of Somerset's DECLARATION in writing to the king.

Being told by my Lord Chief-Justice that I was indicted, and was shortly to expect my Arraignment, I did not then believe him; for I did not look for that way. Your majesty hath three kingdoms, wherein to exercise the prerogative of your power, and but few that taste of the first of your favours; in which number I did think myself, if not the first, yet inferior to very few. And having committed no offence against your person, nor the state, I hope your majesty will not for this bring me to a public trial, which for my reputation's cause, I humbly desire to avoid. Grace truly given may be a benefit; for it is not enough to give life, and not to save reputation. But if I must come to my trial, knowing the presumptions may be strong against me, in respect I consented to, and endeavoured the imprisonment of sir T. Overbury (though I designed it for his reformation, not his ruin), I therefore desire your majesty's mercy, and that you will be pleased to give me leave to dispose of my lands and goods to my wife and child, and graciously to pardon her, having confessed the fact. For myself, being uncertain how I shall be judged upon presumptions, I humbly desire that in the mean time you will be pleased to give my lord Hays and sir Robert Carr leave to come to me.

Mr. Attorney. The second link is, how that Elwes came to be Lieutenant of the Tower by your means: and yet that must have a colour; my lord of Shrewsbury and lord chamberlain must prefer him to you as their friend, though it was resolved before he should have the place.

Sir J. Elwes examined, but not on oath. He saith, sir T. Monson told him that Wade was to be removed; and that if he succeeded sir W. Wade, he must bleed, that is, give 2000*l.* And ten days after Wade was removed he came into the place, and paid 1400*l.* of the money at his uncle alderman Elwes's house to Dr. Campian.

Mr. Attorney. You may see they had ciphers for money. He must bleed; a strange pre-stage! And as it is impossible to serve God and man, so in that kind it is hard to serve a king.

Sir Thomas Monson examined, but not on oath, saith, my lord of Northampton, upon the displacing of Wade, moved the king for sir J. Elwes; and that he directed sir J. Elwes to go to the lords of Shrewsbury and Pembroke, to move my lord of Somerset to speak for him to the king.

Sir Jervis Elwes's examinat. When it was resolved Wade should be removed, and he to succeed him, then he was advised to desire my lord of Somerset to move for him; which he did accordingly: but took that only to be but for a colour, because it was resolved before.

Mr. Attorney. Now the third link concerns the placing of Weston for his keeper.

Sir Thomas Monson exam. Saith, he recommended Weston to the service of sir J. Elwes, and to keep sir T. Overbury, upon the countess of Somerset's entreaty: and farther saith, that my lord of Northampton was acquainted with the placing of him.

R. Weston exam. My lord and lady Somerset gave good words of him to the lieutenant.

L. of Som. exam. He denies the knowledge of Weston, either before his coming into the Tower, or since.

Simcocks exam. Weston, during the time sir T. Overbury was in his keeping, came often to my lord, had much money of him, and wondered sir T. Overbury had so good an opinion of my lord; and thought he had not so much wit as the world esteemed, for there was no man hindered his liberty but he: and whenever he came to my lord, he might use such means as Rawlins his man must not know.

[In this interim a scaffold broke, and there was a great noise and confusion; but after silence was proclaimed, all hushed and quiet.]

Mr. Attorney. All the confessions of Weston were taken before conviction: and these two last witnesses are merely to his denying the knowledge of Weston. Now for the fourth link, which is the placing and displacing officers.

Sir Jervis Elwes exam. Saith, that Overbury was committed April 30th, and May 6th himself came to be Lieutenant of the Tower; and that Weston was preferred to be sir T. Overbury's keeper May 7th; and that all this time he served, he never had wages from him.

Mr. Attorney. Now the fifth link or point of the compass I promised to shew you, was, that this must not be done suddenly, but by degrees; and so he must be poisoned leisurely, to avoid suspicion. And in the mean space you entertained his father and mother with frivolous hopes; and yet indeed hindered and made opposition (but underhand) to all the means that were used for his delivery.

Mr. Overbury the father sworn. After my son was committed, I heard that he was very sick; I went to the court, and delivered a petition to the king: the effect whereof was, that in respect of my son's sickness some physicians might have access unto him. The king answered, that his own physician should go to him: and then instantly sent him word by sir W. Button, that his physician should presently go. Upon this I only addressed myself to my lord of Somerset, and none else; who said my son should be presently delivered, but dissuaded me from preferring any more petitions to the king: which notwithstanding, I (seeing his freedom still delayed) did deliver a petition to the king to that purpose; who said I should have a present answer. And my lord of Somerset told me, he should be suddenly relieved; but with this, that neither I nor my wife must press to see him, because that might protract his delivery; nor deliver any more petitions to the king, because that might stir his enemies up against him. And then he wrote a letter to my wife, to dissuade her from any longer stay in London.

My Lord of Somerset's LETTER to Mrs. Overbury.

"Mrs. Overbury; Your stay here in town can nothing avail your son's delivery; therefore I would advise you to retire into the country, and doubt not before your coming home you shall hear he is a freeman."

Mr. Overbury. Then after my son's death, he writ another letter to me.

My Lord of Somerset's LETTER to Mr. Overbury.

"Sir; Your son's love to me got him the malice of many, and they cast those knots on his fortune that have cost him his life; so, in a kind, there is none guilty of his death but I: and you can have no more cause to commiserate the death of a son, than I of a friend. But though he be dead, you shall find me as ready as ever I was to do all the courtesies that possibly I can to you and your wife, or your children. In the mean time, I desire pardon from you and your wife for your lost son, though I esteem my loss the greater. And for his brother that is in France, I desire his return, that he may succeed his brother in my love."

Mr. Attorney. By this you see my lord's dissimulation. And I think he was a piece of a lawyer, by his insinuating with his next kindred, for fear of appeals. Now to come to the sixth link, which shews how light my lord of Somerset made both of sir T. Overbury's fortunes and sickness, read Simcocks.

Simcocks exam. Saith, That Weston told him he wondered sir T. Overbury should have so great confidence in my lord of Somerset, and think that he loved him so well; for he knew that he could not abide him, and thought of nothing less than his liberty.

Sir John Lidcote sworn. Saith, he desired my lord of Somerset that either he or sir R. Killigrew might have leave to see sir Thomas Overbury in his sickness, which my lord obtained from the king. And so they had a warrant from my lord of Northampton, and some other counsellors, to see him; and found him very sick in his bed, his hand dry, his speech hollow. And at this time he desired me to write his will; I proposed to come to him again the next day. Now being ready to depart, the Lieutenant going out before, Overbury asked me softly this question, Whether Somerset juggled with him, or not? But I then told him, as I believed, that I thought not. But the Lieutenant looking back, and perceiving that some whispering had passed, swore that I had done more than I could justify. But afterwards, coming to press my lord of Somerset about sir T. Overbury, I perceived he dealt not plainly with him. And once speaking with my lord about him, he gave a counterfeit sigh, (as this deponent conceived) for at that instant he smiled in my face.

Mr. Attorney. The seventh link is to shew you the manner of his keeping; which was close prisoner in the Tower, his offence being only a contempt: And who was the author of this, read sir Thomas Monson.

Sir Thomas Monson examined, but not upon oath, saith, My lord of Northampton and my lord of Somerset gave directions to the Lieutenant of the Tower to keep him close prisoner.

L. Davis exam. Saith, That he was a suitor to my lord of Somerset, that he might wait upon his master sir T. Overbury in the Tower, though he were shut up with him. But my lord answered, He shortly purposed to procure his total liberty, and this might hinder it.

Mr. Attorney. Now the eighth and last link is, in the interim that Overbury in the Tower was plyed with poisons, my lord thirsted after the news, to know what became of him, and continual posts went between him and my lady; and all this while bore him in hand with other pretences.

Franklin (but not upon oath) saith, That being with my lady Essex, she told him that she had that day received a letter from my lord of Rochester, wherein he writ, That if Weston did not presently dispatch, sir T. Overbury would be out.

Sir Jervis Elwes exam. Saith, He received divers letters from my lady Essex, wherein she desired to know how Overbury did, that she might certify to the court.

Lord of Som. exam. Saith, That there passed many letters betwixt my lady and him, but not concerning Overbury. But then desired that this point might be altered; for it might be that some letters concerning Overbury might have then past betwixt them.

Mr. Attorney. My lord knew not whether any of these letters were extant, and therefore desired that this might be altered.

Loubell, an apothecary, a Frenchman, saith, That coming to my lord of Somerset, he asked him of Overbury, and how he did? and he said, ill. Another time also he sent for him to enquire about Overbury; and then he answered him, That he was ill, but hoped he might recover. What, says my lord, do you think he would recover if he were at liberty? And he answered, yes. Agam, my lord sent for him a third time; and carrying him into the gallery at Whitehall, asked him how Overbury did. He answered, He was very sick: And farther added, He found him ill before the 25th of June, that he came to him.

L. of Som. exam. Denies that ever he saw Loubell but once at Theobalds.

Mr. Attorney. Here again you see my lord falsified: But it seems, imagining or not knowing that Loubell could say more against him than he hath done, he denied the knowledge of him, as he did of Weston.

L. Coke. It was doubted Loubell might be a delinquent; and therefore I durst not examine him upon oath, no more than I did Franklin. But when in their testimony they accuse themselves, it is as strong as if upon oath.

Mr. Attorney. Now in respect Overbury had a working brain, my lord of Northampton must in shew negotiate about his delivery, and the terms of his coming out, whilst they intended his poisoning: That was real, and the other but in pretence.

My lord of Northampton's First LETTER to my Lord of Somerset.

"In this business concerning Overbury there must be a main drift, and a real charge: You may imagine the meaning."

My Lord of Northampton's Second LETTER to my Lord of Somerset.

"I yesterday spent two hours in prompting the Lieutenant, with as great caution as I could, and find him to be very perfect in his part. And I long exceedingly to hear his report of this adventure."

My Lord of Northampton's Third LETTER to my Lord of Somerset.

"You need not use many instruments, so long as I am in town, with the Lieutenant."

My Lord of Northampton's Fourth LETTER to my Lord of Somerset.

"I cannot deliver with what caution and discretion the Lieutenant hath undertaken Overbury. But for his conclusion, I do and ever will love him the better; which was this, That either Overbury shall recover, and do good offices betwixt my lord of Suffolk and you; which if he do not, you shall have reason to count him a knave: or else, that he shall not recover at all, which he thinks the most sure and happy change of all; for he finds sometimes from Overbury many flashes of a strong affection to some enemies of his."

L. of Som. I acknowledge these Letters to be my Lord of Northampton's; and all those that I sent to him were delivered me after his death by sir R. Cotton: all which the evening before my commitment to the dean of Westminster's, I burnt.

Mr. Attorney. These Letters of Northampton were found in the box sir R. Cotton gave Mrs. Farnforth. And here my part ends: and that that rests behind, I leave to the two Sergeants.

L. H. S. My lord, you have heard what hath been urged against you, and may imagine that there rests much behind: And therefore you had best confess the truth; otherwise you will but more and more wind in yourself.

L. of Som. My lord, I came with a resolution to defend myself.

After this my Lord High-Steward and the rest of the lords retired themselves.

Serj. Montague. May it please your grace, my Lord High-Steward of England, it falls to my part to discover those secrets that were concurrent and present with the murder of sir T. Overbury. And there be three things that make evidently that my lord of Somerset was the principal procurer: 1. A powder that was sent sir T. from your own hand, which was poison, and taken by him. 2. Poison in tarts, which you occasioned to be sent. 3. That you thirsted after the success, and wondered that he was no sooner dispatched. How the first general light of this poisoning came out, Mr. Attorney yesterday excellently observed that it was by a compliment; so now I shall shew how out of the compunction of an offender's heart these came to be discovered: Franklin confesses the poisons he bought for this purpose, and the trial that he made of them before they were sent.

And 1. For the powder, it was sent in a letter written with my lord's own hand to Overbury: And you writ that it would make him a little sick (which it did in a high degree;) and that upon this you would take occasion to speak for him to the king. And this letter, with the powder, you sent to him by Davis; and the powder was poison. 2. For the poisoned tarts: At first you sent them good, to disguise the bad; but after came the poisoned tarts which you sent him. And to make this appear that they came from you, continual posts ran between you and my lady; and she writes to the Lieutenant, "I was bid to tell you, That in the tarts and jellies there are letters; but in the wine none: And of that you may take yourself, and give your wife and children: but of the other, not. Give him these tarts and jelly this night, and all shall be well." And it appears that the letters did signify poison. 3. The third charge that I lay upon you, is, That you writ to my lady that you wondered these things were not dispatched. She presently sent for Franklin, and shewed him your letters; which he read, and remembers the words. She then also sent for Weston to dispatch him quickly: who answered, That he had already given him as much as would poison twenty men. And in all these things, my lord, I shall prove you as guilty as any who-soever hath been formerly arraigned: And Weston, upon his Arraignment, affirmed all these things to be true. Now to the proof: He sends a petition to the lord Coke, to desire to speak with him, the very night before Elwes's arraignment, he knowing nothing of it; and says, That his conscience troubles him so, that he cannot sleep, and therefore desires to reveal something to him; and that until he had done it, he could never be at quiet.

Franklin's exam. Mrs. Turner desired him to buy some of the strongest poisons he could get; which he did, and brought them to Mrs. Turner and my lady, and at that time they both swore him to secrecy. And afterwards he perceived that these poisons were sent to the Tower; and amongst the rest a kind of white powder called arsenick, which she told him was sent Overbury in a letter; and after shewed him, and told him of many more poisons that were sent, and to be sent by Weston to Overbury. And those poisons which my lady shewed him, were wrapped in a paper, written with a Roman hand. And they tried some of the poisons upon a cat, or a dog, which was wonderfully tormented, and died.

Weston's exam. My lady told him that he should be well rewarded; but before she could procure that, the fact must be done: And that he had already given him as many poisons as would poison twelve men.

Ld. of Som. exam. Saith, That he caused a vomit to be sent him at his own request, which was a white powder; and it was the same that he had had before of sir R. Killegrew, and sent by Rawlins; and it may be that this second sent by Davis was in a letter.

L. Davis exam. Saith, That three weeks after sir Jervis Elwes came to be Lieutenant of the Tower, my lord sent, in a letter by him, a white powder to sir T. Overbury; and that it would make him a little sick, so he might have the better opportunity to speak for him to the king; and he saw this letter. Next day Weston told him how sick Overbury had been, and shewed him what loathsome stuff he had vomitted, which he would have had to have carried to the lord Somerset; but Weston would not let him, saying, It was an unfit sight to shew him.

H. Payton exam. Saith, That this powder gave sir Thomas fifty or sixty stools and vomits for four or five days.

Serj. Mont. Four several juries have found that this powder was poison, and of this poison sir T. Overbury died; now for the proof of the poisoned tarts.

La. of Som. exam. She saith, She knoweth of no tarts were sent sir T. Overbury, but either from herself or my lord.

Sir Jervis Elwes exam. Saith, By letters my lady meant poison, but the word was then used to clear his eyes.

The Lady Somerset's Letter to Sir Jervis Elwes.

"I was bid to bid you say, that these tarts came not from me; and again, I was bid to tell you, that you must take heed of the tarts, because there be letters in them, and therefore neither give your wife nor children of them, but of the wine you may, for there are no letters in it; sir T. Monson will come from the court this day, and then we shall have other news."

La. of Som. exam. Saith, That by letters she meant poison.

Serj. Mont. Now for my lord's haste to spur this on, (and here I end) read Franklin's Examination.

Franklin exam. Saith, in a letter which my lady told him was sent her from my lord, there were these words, 'That he wondered things were not yet dispatched,' and that he thinks was meant about Overbury, by reason of her then speeches to him, and present sending for Weston.

Serj. Crew. My part is now to discover those acts that succeeded the fact, and then my lord begins to sew fig-leaves: 1. Practices to suppress all testimonies. 2. To surprize all letters. 3. To get a pardon, and desires a pattern of the most large pardon. Now for your practice to suppress the testimony of Franklin; you come from court and tell my lady, that Weston was apprehended; then Mrs. Turner sends to Franklin to come to my lady at one o'clock at night. Then my lady tells him that Weston had confessed all, and that we shall all be hanged; and at that time did again give him another oath for secrecy. And during this dialogue, she went into an inner room, to speak with one (whom he took to be my lord of Somerset); when she came out, then she instructs Franklin what to say, if he were examined, but by no means to confess the knowledge of her, or of Mrs. Turner: That the lords will promise him, upon his confession, hope of a pardon, but that by no means he should believe their fair words; for if he did, then they should all be hanged. Now for the course you took in suppressing of letters: Lawrence Davis, after his master's death, made suit to serve my lord, then his suit was rejected; but last summer, fearing this might break out, sends Rawlins to him, proffers him all courtesy, and desires that he would send to him all those letters and copies of letters, which had past between sir T. Overbury and him. Davis did so; and upon this my lord gave him 30*l.* After Weston and Mrs. Turner were committed, there was a trunk, wherein were many letters: This trunk stood at the house of Weston's son's master. For this trunk, my lord (after he was commanded to forbear the court) makes a warrant to the constable to break it open, and to send unto him those bundles of writings that were in it; pretending they were certain bonds and writings belonging to Mrs. Hide, a sister of Mrs. Turner's. According to this direction, those letters that were in the trunk were brought unto him. Now for those letters that passed betwixt my lord of Northampton and you; thirty of those you had sent him, were delivered you after his death by sir R. Cotton; and all these the night before your commitment to the dean of Westminster you burnt. For those letters of Overbury's that you had, sir R. Cotton advised you not to burn, but keep them: And all of them being without dates, Cotton told you there might be such dates given them as would be much to your advantage: So you gave him order for that purpose, to give dates to those letters. According to your directions he did so; but not till after Weston's Arraignment: And then understanding at what time the poisons in the indictment were said to be delivered, he dated some of them with a purpose to cross the indictment: and some of the letters he razes, some pastes, some pares, as they were advantageous or disadvantageous to him; and all this to obscure the fact. My next aggravation is, that my lord went about to get a pardon: and that precedents should be sought of the largest that ever were granted; and they were brought him. Why should he seek this, but to be freed from this murder? And in the precedent of Henry 8th's pardon to cardinal Wolsey, after many offences were forgiven, both in the beginning and ending, then in the midst come in all treasons and murders. Lastly, now I urge this declaration you sent to the king; wherein you seemed to doubt yourself, because that you endeavoured and consented to the punishment of sir T. Overbury: and in respect you had formerly been so much in the king's favour, thought you might expect mercy: and seeing you had never done any offence against the king, nor the state, hoped that you should never be called in question for this; But if you should, then you implored grace for your wife: but you never sought a pardon for her, as you did for yourself. And then, lastly, you desire to have leave to dispose of your lands to your wife and child. Now for the proofs of all this that I have said, first read Franklin, for the suppression of his testimony.

Franklin's exam. When my lord of Somerset came to town, after Weston's apprehension, he (Franklin) was sent for to the Cock-Pit; and there my lady swore him again to secrecy, told him Weston was taken, and that it was likely he should be so shortly, and that they should all be hanged. Then retiring into an inner-room, to speak with one, (whom he verily believes to be my lord of Somerset) she came again, and told him, that the lords, if they examined him, would put him in hope of a pardon upon confession: But, said she, believe them not; for when they have got out of you what they would, we shall all be hanged. Nay, saith, Mrs. Turner, madam, I will not be hanged for you both.

MARY ERWIN'S Examination, (not upon oath)
Mrs. Turner's maid.

Mrs. Turner sent her for Franklin, to bring him to the Cock-pit, at ten o'clock at night; and is sure that night my lord of Somerset came from court, and was at the Cock-pit when she came.

Lady Som. exam. She confesseth all that Franklin said concerning her discourse with him; and that my lord was with her that night in the Cock-pit.

Mr. Serj. Crew. Next follows the proof for surprizing letters.

L. Davis exam. Saith, that in summer last my lord sent Rawlins to him, to desire that if he had any letters, either from my lord to sir T., or from him to my lord, that he would send them by him; which he did: And for this my lord did afterwards send him by Rawlins 30*l*.

GEORGE ERRAT the Constable's Examination.

Saith, that Poulter, a messenger, brought him a warrant from my lord of Somerset, to break open and search a house for certain writings, which were pretended to be one Mrs. Hide's, a sister of Mrs. Turner's; and that he shewed him a part of the warrant only, but not all; so that for that cause he would not execute it. Whereupon, Poulter got sinths himself to break open the house and doors, and found in the cellar a box and bag of writings, where he saw the name of Mrs. Turner; and those were carried to my lord.

L. of Som. For these letters, sir R. Cotton delivered them me back after my lord of Northampton's death; and concerning the dates, you need not trouble yourself, for it now grows late, and I shall have very little time to answer for myself. I confess, sir R. Cotton delivered me back those letters I had sent my lord of Northampton, and that I burnt them; and that some parts were cut off as impertinent.

Sir R. Cotton exam. Saith, my lord delivered into his hands many of sir T. Overbury's letters; and that he cut and dated them by my lord's direction; and that he put in dates the next day to some of the letters, after Weston's arraignment.

Mr. Serj. Crew. I desire my lord will be pleased to look upon this book of Overbury's letters. And now for the copy of the largest pardon:

Sir R. Cotton saith, that at my lord of Somerset's intreaty, a little before Michaelmas last, he got him a draught of the largest pardon, and the precedent was of one that king Henry 8th granted to cardinal Wolsey; and if he desired such a one, I told him the best way was to follow precedents.—The pardon was read; wherein, amongst other offences, before and after, of small account, treason and murder be foisted in.

Mr. Serj. Crew. And this was it that made Weston fear that the net was for the little fishes, and that the great ones could break through.

Alderman Bowles exam. Saith, that after he had persuaded Weston from standing mute, he told him, That he feared the net was laid for the little fishes, and that the great ones would break through.

Mr. Serj. Crew. The last thing I urge, is my lord's Declaration to the king, which I desire should be read.—The same that were noted before, after he understood by my lord Coke that he was to be arraigned, &c.

Mr. Attorney. You see, my lords, in this Declaration of my lord Somerset there is a brink of confession; I would to God it had a bottom. He urges that in respect he hath formerly been so great in the king's favour, and had never committed any treason, neither against his person nor state, that he should never have been called to an account for this fault, though he had been guilty: That grace timely given is a benefit; and that it is not only enough to give life, but to save reputation. But if he must be urged, then he desires his wife might be pardoned, having confessed the fact: And that if he must be put upon the hazard of a trial, the king will before give him leave to dispose of his lands and goods to the use of his wife and child; and that in the mean time he will give my lord Hay and sir R. Carr leave to come to him.

Mr. Serj. Crew. This declaration is an implicative confession.

Mr. Attorney. I think there is none here but wonders, seeing that all poisons be works of darkness, how this should so clearly appear: But it seems, his greatness in fortune caused this grossness in offending.

L. H. S. My lord of Somerset hath behaved himself modestly in the bearing: And only this, (before you speak for yourself) by way of advice, I will say unto you, in giving you two examples: Your wife, that yesterday confessed the fact; and there is great hope of the king's mercy, if you now mar not that which she made. On the contrary, Byron, who when the king of France used all the means he possibly could, to bring him to the acknowledgment of his offence, which if he had done, there was no question to be made of the king's grace. And I think there never was, nor is, a more gracious and merciful king than our master. But Byron still persisting in the denial of his fact, you know his end.

L. of Som. I am confident in mine own cause, and am come hither to defend it. And in respect the king's counsel have been so long in speaking against me, that neither my memory nor notes will give me leave to answer every particular in order, I will begin with some of the last things that they seemed most to urge against me, and so answer the rest that I think do any thing at all touch me. For the powder that was sent Overbury to make him sick, that so I might have the better occasion to speak for him to the king for that purpose, he himself desired it, and upon his letter I sent it. And though it be true that I consented to his imprisonment, to the end he should make no impediment in my marriage; yet I had a care of his lodgings, that they should be where he might have the best air, and windows both to the water and within the Tower, so that he might have liberty to speak with whom he would. So you see it was against my intention to have him close prisoner.—Whereas the breach of friendship betwixt Overbury and me is used for an aggravation against me; it is no great wonder for friends sometimes to fall out, and least of all with him; for I think he had never a friend in his life that he would not sometimes fall out with, and give offence unto: And this they termed insolence in him; but I give it a better name.—For the great trust and communication of secrets between Overbury and me, and for the extracts that he took of ambassadors' letters, I confess this; I knew his ability, and what I did was by the king's commission. For other secrets, there were never any betwixt us.—And for his fashion of braving both in words and writing, there was none that knew it better, nor feared it less than myself. At that time he was in disgrace with the queen, and for that cause was enforced for a time to absent himself from court, and this was for some particular miscarriage of his towards her majesty; and though I laboured his reconciliation and return, yet he with main violent terms laid the cause of his disgrace upon me. And another time my lord of Salisbury sent for him, and told him, That if he would depend upon his favour, he would presently help him with a suit that should benefit him 2000*l.*—which presently Overbury, coming to me, told me of: To which I answered, He did not need to rely upon any body but me; and that, if he would, he might command my purse, and presently have more than that; and so he had. And yet afterwards, upon some causeless discontent, in a great passion he said, That his love to me had put him out of my lord of Salisbury's favour, and made him lose 2000*l.* Whereas it was urged that I caused him to refuse the employment that was imposed upon him; it is not so; for I was very willing he should have undertaken it, but he not. My lord of Canterbury moved him to it, but not without my privy; for I should have been glad to have removed him, both in respect of my marriage and his insolence. But Overbury came to me, and said, I will tell sir Dudley Diggs I will undertake this embassy, that he may so return answer to my lord of Canterbury; but then you must write to me not to do so, and so take it upon you. Whereas it is pretended that I should cause poisoned tarts to be sent him to the Tower; my wife in her confession saith, That there were none sent but either by me or her; and some were wholesome, and some not: Then it must needs follow, that the good ones were those which I sent, and the bad hers.

L. Liste. If you had sent him good tarts, you should have seen them conveyed by a trusty messenger.

L. Compton. My lady, in her letter to the Lieutenant, writes, I was bid to bid you do this. Who should bid her?

Mr. Serj. Montague. The continual letters between my lord and her argues that.

L. of Som. If Franklin knew me so well, and that I was privy to the plot, why should then my wife and I (as he pretends) when he was there, speak so closely, and always out of his hearing and sight? But for Overbury, my furthest intent in his imprisonment was, that he should be no impediment to my marriage; and this I communicated to my lord of Northampton and Elwes.

Serj. Montague. You could not couple yourself worse than with them two.

L. of Som. Whereas Simcocks says, from the relation of Weston, That he so often came to me; I protest I never saw him till after Overbury's death, and then Rawlins brought him to me.

Serj. Crew. Sir Jervis Elwes in his examination saith, that Weston many times told him, that my lord of Somerset many times sent for him; And for this purpose you shall have Weston's examination.

Weston's examin. Saith, That my lord of Somerset many times sent him directions, before Overbury's going to the Tower, to appoint meetings betwixt him and my lady.

L. of Som. This may hold, and yet that I never spake to him: So for those messages he spoke of, he might receive directions from me by a third person. And for that which Payton alledges about the powder which I sent, and made sir T. Overbury so sick; that powder I sent was one of them which I received from sir R. Killegrew.

Serj. Crew. But this, my lord, was none of the powders you received from sir R. Killegrew, for you had three from him: The first was lost; the second you sent him by Rawlins; and the third yourself took at Buly: Now a fourth, which was sent by Davis, was that that made him so sick, and gave him so many stools; and that was poison, and sent three weeks after that that Rawlins carried.

Sir R. Killegrew saith, That my lord desired him to give him powders, which he himself sometimes used to take for a vomit; but he thought it had been only for himself, not that he had had a purpose to send it to sir T. Overbury; and that my lord never had of this powder of him but thrice.

Mr. Rawlins, exam. Saith, That the first vomit sir R. Killegrew gave my lord, was laid upon a tester of a bed, and lost; and that then upon that he got another, which my lord sent to sir T. Overbury by him; and afterwards a third, which my lord took at Boly: But he never heard that sir T. Overbury desired my lord to send him any.

Franklin exam. Saith, That he provided a white powder, which was poison, for my lady called it arsenick; which, as my lady did afterwards tell him, was sent to sir T. Overbury in a letter.

L. of Som. I do not think you can take Franklin for a good witness. Now for the antedates which are used as a circumstance against me; Sir R. Cotton moved me to it, saying, That the dates might prove useful to me at this time. Whereas my lord of Northampton writes in one of his letters, that he had prompted the Lieutenant: I conceive his meaning to be, That he should endeavour to make Overbury be a good instrument betwixt my lord of Suffolk and me; and to that end, those whom he thought to be his principal enemies should be the only causers of his freedom. And what I understand by Elwes's conclusion, which my lord of Northampton relates in the end of one of his letters to me. That death is the best way; I wish that my answers to those letters were now to be seen: and if I had ever thought that those letters of my lord of Northampton's would be dangerous to me, it is likely I would never have kept them. For the warrant I made, my wife desired me to do it for Mrs. Turner's sake: Packer forged it; and told me, I might do it as a counsellor alone, without other hands; for I would have had at that time my lord Knowles to have joined with me, but that he was at council. And when this warrant was sent, I was not commanded from court, as is pretended.

L. H. S. All the council together could not justify the making of such a warrant.

L. of Som. For my endeavouring to get a pardon; having had many things of trust under the king, and the custody of both the seals, without particular warrant, I desired by this means to be exonerated. And for all general words, the lawyers put them in without my privacy. And for the precedent of the largest pardon, which I had from sir R. Cotton, it was upon this occasion: Sir R. Cotton said, In respect you have received some disgrace in the opinion of the world, in having past that pardon which the last summer you desired, especially seeing there be many precedents of larger; I would have you now get one after the largest precedent, that so by that addition you might recover your honour. And upon this I had him search for the largest.

Serj. Mont. Sir R. Cotton says otherwise.

Sir R. Cotton's exam. Saith, My lord desired to seek precedents of the largest pardons.

L. of Som. For the Declaration which I lately sent to the king, and particularly the word [mercy], which is now so much urged against me, it was the Lieutenant's; for I would have used another, but he said it could be nothing prejudicial unto me: But when I writ it, I did not think thus to be sifted in this Declaration; for I in that, in all humility, did so far endeavour to humble and yield myself, that the king might the better express his grace. And for the words, [That I did consent to and endeavour the imprisonment of sir T. Overbury] it is true, for the reason there alledged.

Mr. Attorney. May it please your grace, my lord here hath had a most gracious hearing, and hath behaved himself modestly and wittily.

L. H. S. If you have any more to say, my lord, you shall be heard at length; we will not straiten you in time.

L. of Som. For Loubell, I never saw him but twice: he affirms the contrary, I deny it; and there is none else that proves it but himself. For sir R. Cotton, I could wish that he were here to clear many things that now be obscure.

Mr. Attorney. If he were here he could not be sworn for reason of state, being held for a delinquent.

L. of Som. For sir D. Wood, there was a suit wherein he might have benefited himself 1200*l.* which I was willing to further him in, conditionally, that Overbury should have been a sharer: But for the not effecting of it, it seems, he took some dislike of sir T. Overbury. The money that is said sir J. Elwes gave for his place, I had no part of it. Whereas the shifting of offices is urged against me, to make the more easy way for Elwes's entrance; it is well known, the reason of Wade's displacing was in respect of his carelessness, in suffering the lady Arabella to have a key, by which she might have conveyed herself out of prison. More I cannot call to mind; but desire favour.

Mr. Attorney. It hath, my lord, formerly at arraignments, been a custom, after the king's counsel and the prisoner's defence hath been heard, briefly to sum up what hath been said: But in this we have been so formal in the distribution, that I do not think it necessary: And therefore now there is no more to be done, but that the peers will be pleased to confer, and the prisoner to withdraw until the censures be past.

E. of Som. My lords, before you go together, I beseech you give me leave to recommend myself and cause unto you: As the king hath raised me to your degree, so he hath now disposed me to your censures. This may be any of your own cases, and therefore I assure myself you will not take circumstances for evidence; for if you should, the condition of a man's life were nothing. In the mean time, you may see the excellence of the king's justice; which makes no distinction, putting me into your hands for a just and equal censure. For my part, I protest before God I was neither guilty of, nor privy to, any wrong that Overbury suffered in this kind. A man sensible of his own preservation, had need to express himself.

So he being withdrawn from the bar, my Lord High Steward briefly reported to the lord the proofs against my lord of Somerset. Then the lords by themselves (and my Lord Steward for his case, but returning before the rest) staid some time together; in which interim they sent for the two chief justices. Being returned, the serjeant-cryer, Mr. Fenshaw, called every lord by his name, Robert lord Dormer, and so to the rest, before my Lord High Steward spake.

L. H. S. Robert lord Dormer, how say you? Whether is Robert earl of Somerset Guilty of the felony, as accessory before the fact, of the wilful poisoning and murder of sir T. Overbury, whereof he hath been indicted and arraigned, or Not Guilty? And so particularly to every lord, one by one.

L. Dormer. Guilty, my lord: (Standing up, and bare-headed; then sitting again.) My lord Norris, when it came to him, said, Guilty of Murder: But being told by my Lord High-Steward, that he must say either Guilty, or Not Guilty, to the indictment, he said, Guilty. Then Mr. Lieutenant brought the Prisoner again to the Bar: But he had before taken off his George himself.

Mr. Attorney. My Lord High-Steward, Robert earl of Somerset hath been indicted and arraigned, and put himself upon his peers, who all, without the difference of one voice, have found him Guilty; I pray Judgment.

Mr. Fenshaw. Robert earl of Somerset, hold up thy hand. Whereas thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded Not Guilty, as accessory before the fact, to the wilful poisoning and murder of sir T. Overbury, and hast put thyself, upon thy peers, who have found thee Guilty, what hast thou to say for thyself, why Sentence of Death should not be pronounced against thee?

L. of Som. The sentence that is past upon me must be just: I only desire a death according to my degree. For that Simcocks said —

L. H. S. My lord, you are not now to speak any more in your defence: but why Judgment of Death should not be pronounced.

L. of Som. Then I have no more to say; but humbly beseech you my Lord High-Steward and the rest of the lords to be intercessors to the king for his mercy towards me, if it be necessary.

My Lord High-Steward, taking the white-staff from sir R. Coningsby, pronounced sentence.

L. H. S. Robert earl of Somerset, whereas thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and found Guilty, as accessory before the fact, of the wilful poisoning and murder of sir T. Overbury; you are therefore to be carried from hence to the Tower, and from thence to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged till you be dead: And the Lord have mercy upon you.

L. of Som. My lords the peers, I beseech you, as you have been the judges of this day, so you will be my intercessors.

Then my Lord Steward broke his staff, the court dissolved, and the prisoner was carried away.

Afterwards the Earl and his countess received several reprieves, during which he wrote to the king the following obscure Letter*.

“ May it please your majesty; By this gentleman, your majesty's Lieutenant, I under-

* It is not improbable that some expressions in this letter may have relation to a report spread about at that time, of Somerset's threatening message sent to king James by the Lieutenant of the Tower, that if he had not his pardon, he would discover an important secret, which it was the king's interest to have concealed.

The following passage in Weldon throws some light on this matter; “ And now for the last act enters Sotherset himself on the stage, who being told as the manner is by the Lieutenant, that he must provide to go next day to his Trial, did absolutely refuse it, and said they should carry him in his bed: that the king had assured him, he should not come to any trial, neither durst the king to bring him to trial; this was in an high strain, and in a language not well understood by George Moore, Lieutenant in Elwes his room) that made Moore quiver and shake, and however he was accounted a wise man yet was he near at his wits end; yet away goes Moore to Greenwich, as late as it was, being 12 at night, bounceth at the back stairs as if mad, to whom came Jo. Loveston, one of the grooms, out of his bed, enquires the reason of that distemper at so late a season; Moore tells him, he must speak with the king; Loveston replies, he is quiet, which, in the Scottish dialect, is fast asleep; Moore says, you must awake him; Moore was called in (the chamber left to the king and Moore); he tells the king those passages, and desired to be directed by the king, for he was gone beyond his own reason to hear such bold and undutiful expressions, from a faulty subject against a just sovereign: the king falls into a passion of tears. ‘ On my soul, Moore, I wot not what to do, thou art a wise man, help me in this great straight, and thou shalt find thou dost it for a thankful master,’ with other sad expressions; Moore leaves the king in that passion, but assures him he will prove the utmost of his wit to serve his majesty, and was really rewarded with a suit worth to him 1500*l.* (although Anandale, his great friend, did cheat him of one half) so there was friendship in friendship.—Sir George Moore returns to Somerset, about three o'clock next morning of that day he was to come to trial, enters Somerset's chamber, tells him he had been with the king, found him a most affectionate master unto him, and full of grace in his intentions towards him, but said he, to satisfy justice you must appear, although return instantly again without any further proceeding, only you shall know your enemies and their malice, though they shall have no power over you: With this trick of wit he allayed his fury, and got him quietly, about eight in the morning, to the Hall, yet feared his former bold language might revert again, and being brought by this trick into the toil, might have more enraged tand of some halt you made, and the cause of it, at such time as he offered to your majesty my letters; but soon after your majesty could resolve yourself, and behold me nothing so diffident of you, but in humble language petitioning your favour; for I am in hope that my condition is not capable of so much more misery, as I need to make my passage to you by such way of intercession.—This which follows after, I offer your majesty, though not as to yourself, for upon less motive you can find favour for me.—Now I need only move, not plead before your majesty, as my case doth stand; for what I seek to have done, follows upon what you have already done, as a consequence and succeeding growth of your own act.—But to the intent that your majesty may see that there is enough to answer those (if

him to fly out into some strange discovery, that he had two servants placed on each side of him, with a cloak on their arms, giving them a peremptory order, if that Somerset did anyway fly out on the king they should instantly hoodwink him with that cloak, take him violently from the bar, and carry him away; for which he would secure them from any danger, and they should not want also a bountiful reward. But the earl finding himself over-reached recollected a better temper, and went on calmly in his trial, where he held the company until seven at night. But who had seen the king's restless motion all that day, sending to every boat he see landing at the bridge, cursing all that came without tidings, would have easily judged all was not right, and there had been some grounds for his fear of Somerset's boldness; but at last one bringing him word he was condemned, and the passages, all was quiet. This is the very relation from Moore's own mouth, and this told to two gentlemen, of which the author was one, that had no assurance of their honesty, but though he failed in his evidence, or rather doted at this instant, yet they never failed not in that worth, inherent in every noble spirit, never speaking of it till the king's death, both the gentlemen being now alive, and had this verbatim from Moore in Wanstead Park.—And there were strong inducements to believe Somerset knew that by him, he desired none other in the world should be partaker of, and all that was not peace within the peacemaker himself: for he ever courted Somerset to his dying day, and gave him 4000*l.* per ann. for fee farm rents, after he was condemned, which he took in his servants names, not his own (as then being condemned not capable of) and he then resolved never to have pardon. I have heard it credibly reported, he was told by a wizard, that could he but come to see the king's face again, he should be reinvested in his former dearness: this had been no hard experiment, but belike he had too much religion to trust to wizards: or else some friends of his had trusted them, and been deceived by them, and he had little reason to put confidence in them.—Many believe him guilty any such there be) as do go about to pervert the exercise of your power, and to turn it from its own clear excellency, for to minister unto their passions; I have presumed to this end to awake your majesty's own conceit upon this subject, which can gather to itself better and more able defences in my behalf upon this view. For though the acts of your mercy which are not communicable, nor the causes of them with others; as derived from those secret motives which are only sensible and privy to your own heart, and admit of no search or discovery to any general satisfaction; and that under this protection I might guard my particular sufficiently; yet my case need not hide itself, but attend the dispute with any, that would put upon it a monstrous and heavy shape: though that I must acknowledge, that both life and of Overbury's death, but the most thought him guilty only of the breach of friendship (and that in a high point) by suffering his imprisonment, which was the high way to his murder; and this conjecture I take to be of the soundest opinion; for by keeping him out of the action (if it were discovered) his greatness fortified with innocence, would carry their nocencies through all dangers. For the gentleman himself, he had misfortune to marry such a woman in such a family, which first undermined his honour, afterwards his life (at least to be dead in law): nor did any thing reflect upon him in all his time of favourite, but in, and by that family, first in his adulterous marriage, then in so hated a family, and the bringing in Cranfield and Ingram, as projectors, all by his wife and friends means; otherwise he had been the bravest favorite of our time, full of majesty, employing his time like a statesman, and the king kept correspondency with him by letters almost weekly to his dying day. And here have we brought this great man to his end with his countess, Mrs. Turner, Weston, Franklyn, and Elwes died in the Tower, and here died this great business, Weston ever saying it never troubled him to die with so many blue ribbands: and it is verily believed, when the king made those terrible imprecations on himself, deprecations of the judges, it was intended the law should run in its proper channel, but was stopt and put out of course, by the folly of that great clerk sir Edward Coke, though no wise man, who in a vain-glorious speech to shew his vigilancy, enters into a rapture as he sate on the bench, saying "God knows what became of that sweet babe prince Henry" (but I know somewhat) and surely in searching the cabinets he lighted on some papers that spake plain in that which was ever whispered, which had he gone on in a gentle way, would have fallen in of themselves, not to have been prevented; but this folly of his tongue stopt the breath of that discovery of that so foul a murder, which, I fear, cries still for vengeance." Weldon, Court and Character of king James, 115.

It does appear that there was in Somerset's estate are forfeited to you by law; yet so forfeited, that the same law gives you the same power to preserve, as it doth to punish, whereby your majesty's higher prerogative doth not wrestle with it, nor do you infringe those grounds by which you have ever governed, so as the resistance is not great, that your majesty hath for to give life, and which is less in the gift of estate, for that the law casts wholly upon yourself, and yields it as fit matter for exercise of your goodness.—Once it was your majesty's gift to me, so it may be better not taken, for to avoid to take that, which hath been once their own; and I may say farther, that the law hath not been severe upon the ruin of innocent posterity, nor yet cancelled nor cut off the merits of ancestors, before the politick hand of state had contrived it into these several forms, keeping an important secret of which the king dreaded a discovery. "Some," says Harris, "have thought the discovery dreaded was the manner of prince Henry's death, which was believed to have been by poison; but if I may be allowed to offer a conjecture, it was the revealing of that [most unnatural] vice to which James seems to have been addicted, that was the object of his fear." See Harris's Historical Account of James 1st, 69, 205, and Osborn, Weldon, and Peyton, as quoted in pp. 70, 71, of that work.

It is certain a suspicion extensively prevailed that prince Henry was killed by poison. The following Report of the state of his body after death is extracted from "Truth brought to light by Time, &c."

Dissecto illustrissimi Principis corpore hæc à nobis notata sunt inspectione.

Mortuus est illustrissimus Princeps sexto die Novembr. 1612, tempore vespertino: ejusque funus celebratum septimo die Decembris proxime sequentis."

The Dissection of the Body of prince Henry.

"1st, We found his liver paler than ordinary, in certain places somewhat wan, his gall without any choler in it, and distended with wind.—2dly, his spleen was in divers places more than ordinarily black.—3dly, his stomach was in no part offended.—4thly, his midriff was in divers places black.—5thly, his lungs were very black, and in divers places spotted, and full of a thin watery blood.—Lastly, the veins as fitted to their ends of government.—To this I may add, that whereupon I was judged, even the crime itself might have been none, if your majesty's hand had not once touched upon it, by which all access unto your favour was quite taken from me. Yet as it did at length appear, I fell rather for want of well defending, than by the violence or force of any proofs; for I so far forsook myself, and my cause, as that it may be a question whether I was more condemned for that, or for the matter itself, which was the subject of that day's controversy.—Then thus far nothing hath appeared, wherein your majesty hath extended for me your power, beyond the reasonable bound; neither doth any thing stand so in the way of your future proceedings, but rather make easy your majesty's favour for my relief.—What may then be in the hinder part of his head were fuller than ordinary, but the ventricles and hollowness of the brain were full of clear water.

In witness whereof, with our own hands we have subscribed this present relation, the 7th day of November, 1612.—Mayerne; Atkins; Hammond; Palmer; Gifford; Butler."

In 2 Kennett's Compl. Hist. 689, is the following note on Wilson's intimations that the prince's death was caused by poison. "How well or ill grounded our author's conjectures were about the death of prince Henry, I shall not take upon me to determine; since few princes of so great hopes die an untimely death, but the world is apt to attribute it to foul play.

—This is certain, the court was full of suspicions about it; and it was whispered about, that the prince having entertained a mortal prejudice to the favourite Carr, he was taken off to prevent the effects of it. These surmises came likewise to be insinuated in the pulpit; and we have yet extant in print, a sermon preached at St. James's upon the dissolution of his family, wherein the preacher that had been his domestic chaplain made such broad hints about the manner of his death, that melted the auditory into a flood of tears, and occasioned his being dismissed the court.—Some years after, when the murder of sir Tho. Overbury came upon the stage, at one of the trials before the Lord Chief Justice Coke, there escaped him some words in heat, that plainly imported his suspicion that Overbury had been poisoned, to prevent the discovery of another crime of the same nature committed upon one of the highest rank, whom he termed a sweet prince, which was taken to be meant prince Henry; for which rashness the Lord Chief Justice lost the king's favour, and some time afterwards his place."

Mr. Fox writing to Lord Lauderdale says "I recollect that the impression upon my mind was, that there was more reason than is generally allowed for suspecting that prince Henry was poisoned by Somerset, and that the king knew of it after the fact." See lord Holland's preface to Fox's History of the early part of the Reign of James the Second.

the cause that malice can pitch upon, wherefore your majesty should not proceed to accomplish your own work? aspersions are taken away by your majesty's letting me loose to the utmost power of law, with the lives of so many offenders, which yieldeth the world subjects of sorrow rather than appetite to more blood. But truth and innocency protect themselves in poor men, much more in kings, neither was there such aspersion (God knows) in any possibility towards your majesty, but among those who would create these pretences to mislead your majesty, and thereby make me miserable; if not this (whereof the virtue and use was in the former time, and is now determined) there is not any but your pleasure.—It is true, I am forfeited to your majesty, but not against you by any treasonable or unfaithful act; besides, there is to be yielded a distinction of men, as in faults; in which I am of both under the nearest degrees of exception.—Yet your majesty hath pardoned life and estate to traitors and strangers, sometimes the one, sometimes the other; nay, to some concerned in this business, wherein I suffer, you have pardoned more unto them, than I desire, who (as it is reputed) if they had come to the test, had proved copper, and should have drunk of the bitter cup as well as others.—But I do not by this envy your favours to any persons, nor seek I to draw them into the yoke with myself, but applaud your majesty's goodness, being in that respect in a near possibility to come at me; besides this, to Elwes your majesty has given an estate, (which is a greater gift than life, because it extends to posterity) who was the worst deserver in this business, an unoffended instrument, who might have prevented all after-mischief, but for his own ends suffered it, and by the like arts afterwards betrayed it.—To this I may add Tresham in the Powder-treason, upon whose successors I do not cast any of his infamy, yet he preserved himself to posterity; so as what he, or others such as he, have defrauded by the arts of law, and whom their own unfaithfulness made safe; I have much ado to hold my ingenuity and confidence, how it may be, because I distrusted not your majesty, or because it returned in your power from whom I had it. Is it in danger to be broken or dismembered? Let me hope that there is nothing, which by favour may be excused, or by industry might have been avoided, that will fail me, where your majesty is to determine. It is not I, that put your majesty in mind opportunely, it is he, that was your creature; it is Somerset, with all your honours and envious greatness, that is now in question. Kings themselves are protected from the breach of law, by being favourites and God's anointed; which gives your majesty like privilege over yours, as I took from Dr. Donne his sermon, That the goodness of God is not so much acknowledged by us in being our Creator, as in being our Redeemer: nor in that he hath chosen us, as that nothing can take us out of his hand; which in your majesty's remembrance let me challenge and hope for: for the first accesses of favour, they may be ascribed unto one's own pleasing themselves, but that appears to be for our sakes, and for our good, when the same forsakes not our civil desires.—This redemption I crave, not as to my own person, but with your benefits once given; nor do I assume them very deep, for I have voluntarily departed from the hopes of my pension, place, office, I only cleave to that which is so little, as that it will suffer no parting or diminution.—And as in my former letters, so by this, I humbly crave of your majesty not to let the practices of court work upon your son the prince, not fearing the sufferings of my loss in that particular so much (for I cannot lose it but willingly all with it), as for to take off the stage, that which in the attempt may prove inconvenient.—But if your majesty have any respects to move you to suspend your goodness towards me, let that which is mine rest in your own hands, till that you find all opposite humours conformed to your purpose.—I have done wrong to myself, thus to entertain such a doubt of your majesty; but the unrelenting of adversaries, which, when you will have them, will soon alter; and that all this while I have received nothing of present notice for direction, or to comfort me from your majesty, hath made me to expostulate with myself thus hardly: for God is my judge, sir, I can never be worthy of it, if I have these marks put upon me of a traitor, as that tumbling and disordering of that estate, would declare. The divorce from your presence, lays too much upon me, and this would upon both.—I will say no further, neither in that which your majesty doubted my aptness to fall into: for my cause nor my confidence is not in that distress, as for to use that mean of intercession or any thing besides; but to remember your majesty that I am the workmanship of your hands, and bear your stamp deeply imprinted in all the characters of favour; that I was the first plant ingrafted by your majesty's hand in this place, therefore not to be unrooted by the same hand, lest it should taint all the same kind with the touch of that fatalness; and that I was even the son of a father, whose services are registered in the first honours and impressions I took of your majesty's favour, and laid there as a foundation stone of that building.—These and your majesty's goodness for to receive them, is what I rely upon, praying for your majesty's prosperity; I am in all humbleness, your majesty's loyal servant and creature, R. SOMERSET."

On the 18th of January, 1621, the king by order of council granted them the liberty of retiring to a country house.

Present, L. Keeper; L. Treasurer; L. President; L. M. Hamilton; Earl Marshal; L. Vis. Falkland; L. Digby; L. Brooke; Mr. Treasurer; Mr. Secretary Calvert; Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer; Master of the Rolls.

"Whereas his majesty is graciously pleased to enlarge and set at liberty the earl of Somers-set and his lady, now prisoners in the Tower of London; and that nevertheless it is thought fit that both the said earl and his lady be confined to some convenient place: it is therefore, according to his majesty's gracious pleasure and command, ordered, That the earl of Somerset and his lady do repair either to Grays or Cowsham, the lord Wallingford's houses, in the county of Oxon, and remain confined to one or either of the said houses, and within three miles compass of either of the same, until farther order be given by his majesty."

At last in the year 1624, about four months before the death of the king, they obtained their Pardons; notwithstanding the king had formerly made a solemn declaration,* that he would never pardon any person who should appear to have been concerned in this murder.

"May it please your excellent majesty: This Bill containeth your majesty's gracious pardon unto the lady Frances late countess of Somerset, for being accessory before the fact, of the death and imposition of sir T. Overbury.—It hath inserted, as motives to your majesty's mercy, four respects; that is to say: The respect of her father, friends and family.—Her voluntary confession, both when she was prisoner, and at the bar.—The promise made publicly by the Lord High Steward, and her peers, to intercede for your majesty's mercy.—And that the crime was not of a principal, but of an accessory, before the fact, by the instigation of base persons.—The like pardon formerly passed your majesty's signature, and is now amended by your majesty's special direction from your royal mouth, in two points: The one is, That imprisonment in the Tower, or other confining at your majesty's pleasure, is not pardoned. The other, that the solemn promise made at her arraignment by the Lord Steward and the peers to intercede to your majesty for your mercy, is inserted. FRANCIS BACON."

The aforesaid BILL translated into English.

"JAMES Rex; The king to whom, &c. greeting. Whereas the fountains, as well of mercy as justice, are wont and ought to flow from the king's throne; of which the former of justice in the memorable case of the death and murder of sir T. Overbury, in a constant and right course, hath flowed and is derived from us and our royal court, for the full satisfaction of ourself and subjects. And whereas divers and manifold causes of our clemency occur, which may move our regal mercy towards Frances Carr, late countess of Somerset; chiefly, that murder, with so many and such examples of justice, before this time expiated; especially two, whereof the first respecteth her father, and friends, and family, and noble progeny; the other hath respect to herself, because she freely and willingly confessed her offence, submitting and prostrating herself at the altar of our mercy, not only during the time of her imprisonment, but also publicly, and in her trial. And forasmuch as T. lord Ellesmere our Chancellor of England, and being our High Steward of England in that behalf, and all her peers, by whose judgment she was convicted, at the humble petition of the said Frances publicly made, solemnly bound themselves by their promise, to intercede for our royal mercy towards her: And first weighing with ourselves the nature of her offence, upon which she was indicted, arraigned, convicted and condemned, viz. That the process and judgment were not as of a principal, but as of an accessory before the fact, and that she seemed to have begun by the procurement and wicked instigation of certain base persons: Know ye, that we, moved with pity, of our special grace, and of our certain knowledge, and our mere motion, have pardoned, remitted and remised, and by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do pardon, remise, and release to the aforesaid Frances Carr, late countess of Somerset, or by whatsoever other name, or surname, or addition of name, or of her surname of dignity, place, or places, the same Frances may be known, esteemed, called, or named, or lately was known, esteemed, called or named, the slaughter, killing, poisoning, bewitching, death, felony and felonious murdering of the aforesaid sir T. Overbury; or by whatsoever other name, surname, or addition of name or surname, of place or places, the said sir T. Overbury may be known, esteemed, called or named, by the said Frances, by herself alone, or with any other person, or any other persons whatsoever, howsoever, in what manner soever, whensoever, or wheresoever done, committed, or perpetrated; and all, and all manner of conspiracies, felonies, abetments, procurements, incitations, partnerships, maintainances, helps, hirings, commands, counsels, crimes, transgressions, wrongs, offences and faults whatsoever, the aforesaid death, slaughter, killing, poisoning, bewitching, felony and felonious murdering of the aforesaid sir T. Overbury, in any wise touching or concerning. And the accessory of them, as before the fact, as after the fact, and flight and flights made thereupon, although the said Frances of the said premises, or any of the premises stand, or not stand indicted, impeached, appellat. vocat. reat. wariat. convicted, condemned, attainted, or adjudged by the judgment of her peers, before the aforesaid High Steward of England, or otherwise howsoever, or thence in time to come shall appear to be indicted, impeached, appellar, rectori, vocari, wariari, convicted, condemned, attainted or adjudged. And all and singular indictments, judgments, condemnations, executions, pains of death, pains of corporal punishments, and all other pains and penalties whatsoever of, for, or concerning the death, slaughter, killing, poisoning, bewitching, felonies, and felonious murdering of the aforesaid sir T. Overbury, in, upon, or against the same Frances, had, made, returned, or adjudged; or hereafter to be had, made, returned, or adjudged, or which we against the said Frances may have in time to come (imprisonment at our royal pleasure, or restraint, confining to a certain place, only excepted). Moreover, we do pardon, and by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, remit and remise to the aforesaid Frances, all and every outlawries which against the same Frances, by reason or occasion of the premises, or any of them, have been proclaimed, or hereafter shall be proclaimed; and all, and all manner of suits, complaints, impeachments, and demands whatsoever, which we against the same Frances, for the premises, or any of the premises, have had, have, or in time to come shall have; and the suit of our peace which appertained to us against the same Frances, or may appertain by reason of the premises, or any of them. And by these presents, We do give and grant our firm peace to the same Frances, willing that the same Frances, by the justices, sheriffs, escheators, bailiffs, or any other our ministers, by the occasions aforesaid, or any of them, be not molested, troubled, or in any manner vexed; so as nevertheless she stand right in our court: if any towards her should speak concerning the premises, or any of the premises, although the said Frances do not find good and sufficient security, according to the form of a certain act of parliament, of the sovereign lord Edward 3, late king of England, our progenitor, held at Westminster, in the tenth year of his reign, for her good behaviour from henceforth toward us, our heirs and successors, and all our people. And farther, for us, our heirs, and successors, of our more ample special grace, and out of our certain knowledge, and our mere motion, we will and grant by these presents, That these our letters-patent of pardon, and all and singular the things contained in the same, shall stand, and be good, firm, valid, sufficient and effectual in the law, and from henceforth shall by no means become void. And that in time to come, the said Frances, by any means, shall not be indicted, arrested, accused, vexed or troubled of, for, or concerning the death, murder, slaughter, poisoning, bewitching, felony, or felonious killing of the aforesaid sir T. Overbury, howsoever, or by whatsoever means the said sir T. Overbury came to his end: The statute of the sovereign lord Richard 2, late king of England, in the 13th year of his reign, or any other statute, act, ordinance, provision, or restriction to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

When king Charles came to the crown, Somerset used great solicitations for the recovery of his estate; for which end he presented the following Petition:

“To the King's most Excellent Majesty: The humble PETITION of Robert earl of Somerset.

“Sheweth; THAT in the year 1616, after your petitioner's troubles were over, the king (your majesty's father) was pleased by the earl of Suffolk, the Lord Treasurer, the earl of Worcester, Lord Privy Seal, and the duke of Richmond, Lord Steward, to make known to your petitioner his favourable intentions towards him, as well touching his pardon and enlargement, and the payment of his debts, as for his estate, of which they shewed him that his majesty did mean to take some part to the crown; but would make up to your petitioner in other lands to as much in value: and in particular, that with a maner which he had in Northamptonshire, of 1,000*l.* per ann. there was 4,000*l.* of the king's lands to be given him, which should be improvable, and be esteemed at 6,000*l.* per ann. But your petitioner, in that he had never taken any lands of gift from the king, as for some other reasons, did delay to take hold of that offer, desiring that he might be allowed to keep that estate which he had formerly got, without prejudice to his majesty or any person. In which hope he rested, until he found that some pieces of it had been disposed of. Whereupon, being urged by his wife's friends, he was content, in the behalf of her and his daughter, to give way that they should sue to his majesty for the performance of that which had been proffered to your petitioner; but in that he would not appear therein himself, (doubting lest that might be understood to imply an assent on his part to that which had been done with his estate) it was given otherwise than as it was at first intended. Notwithstanding whereof, and that your petitioner continued in the same mind, without craving any reparation therein for the space of eight or nine years after, yet he found cause at last to sue both for his freedom and pardon, and for that part of his estate which rested in the crown; which pardon he had not above four months before God took the king. And his majesty being moved a little before concerning your petitioner's estate (he being then at Newmarket) professed that he would give order therein at his coming to Whitehall; which it pleased God to prevent.

"Since that time he hath sued to your majesty by the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Portland, and afterwards by my lord of Canterbury, my lord of Cottingham, and others. At the marriage of his daughter with the now earl of Bedford, he was by the duchess of Buckingham and the earl of Pembroke desired, for reasons they then gave him, not to press your majesty therein at that time; being assured by them, that what-ever he had to demand justly of your majesty, or should make appear to have been meant of him by your father, you would do him right in it. Whereupon he went on, and engaged himself to the late earl of Bedford, and for his use, in which he stands yet bound, to his exceeding great prejudice: all which notwithstanding, and that he afterwards did petition your majesty for a reference in this same cause, yet he could not then neither obtain any.

"Your Petitioner humbly prayeth, That your majesty will be pleased to take into your consideration this suit of his, of a nature far differing from all others that are made to you; that which he craves being only the performance of what your father intended for him, in lieu of so much as he had taken of his, and the same no otherwise in your majesty to give him, than as he hath forborn to take hold of it; and for which your majesty may conceive there hath been a cause, and that not a common one, which hath made him so long dispute with himself the receipt of so great a benefit, and wherein his whole fortune consisted, and all that he had been getting for many years. However, he being the first that hath left in the crown that which he might have had from it, may well hope that his confidence will not be imputed to him for a crime, or that your majesty (if he had thereby given you any advantage) would think fit to make use of it, against one whom you may have cause to find, when it comes to be enquired into, that he hath been more than any trusted by the crown, and hath more proofs to shew than any other, that he hath deserved well of the king your father, of your majesty, and of all these your three kingdoms.

"His last and humble suit to your majesty is, That in respect of the many crosses he hath met with in this present cause, and that time hath taken away those great men before-mentioned, as also the earl of Carlisle and others, that were employed by the king to your petitioner, or present when he received his message from the lords, there remaining only now some noble persons of a greater number in this kingdom, that can testify so much as will give credit to that which is delivered here; that your majesty will therefore please to be informed by them what your petitioner hath further to say herein for himself, and what they themselves can report touching the intentions of the king, your majesty's father, towards him in this particular which is now sought of you: That after the many losses he hath sustained by his want of access to your majesty, and the assistance of those about you, such course may be taken now at length by your majesty for the repairing him again, either out of that estate which was his own, or otherwise, as may accord with the purpose of the king your father, with your majesty's justice, and is due to the demand of your petitioner.—And he shall pray for your majesty's long and happy reign."

The request of this Petition was never granted, and he and his countess both died in obscurity.

The Book called "Truth brought to Light by Time," &c. part 2d, p. 133, says, "After my lord of Somerset had been proceeded with as is shewed in his Petition, the earl of Carlisle was sent to him, by the king, who told him as from his majesty, that he was sorry for what had past, but he could not hinder the course of justice to go on, but it had concerned his own son, and that to repair him again he would do what he might by law or otherwise. In a few days after, the Lord Treasurer and the other lords came to him and spake to the same effect, and as it is in the Petition a while after, when some pieces of his estate were passed away under the seals, my lord William Howard, my lady Banbury and some of his own friends came and shewed him what was done, willing him that he would take care, if not of himself, yet of his wife and child, and of his children he might have; whereupon, he gave way to have his wife write to my lord of Carlisle, to move the king about that estate which had been tendered them before in his majesty's name; which letter being shewed to the king, his majesty gave order to the Lord Treasurer, that the same should be done accordingly, but this falling out to be not long before the king's going into Scotland, it was expressly delayed till then, at which time the Lord Treasurer sent to him, and lets him know, that he now had order to make ready two warrants, one of lands, and another of fee-farm rents, and if he would not use means, and that by his own suit, to have the king put in mind of his first directions, it was like he should have the worst of them returned to him; but the other apprehending what was meant thereby, would not be induced to make any such suit, for the reason he gives in the Petition, wherefore the king being in his way as far as Huntingdon, the warrant with the fee-farms was sealed with the want of 1,000*l.* a year, besides of the sum formerly offered to him, which altogether took off, of the value of the whole, about the one half. This made some of his court friends then in Scotland with the king, to acquaint his friends here, with those passages, whereupon his sisters, and divers of our greatest lords, went to the king, to whom and to that which was desired his majesty, he made answer.—But after the king's return into England he continued as before without moving either for his estate or any thing else, until the king fell dangerously sick at Royston, then he hastened to pass through those fee-farm rents, taking them for a maintenance in the present, or in part of that which was meant for him, attending a fitter time when to move for the rest, since there was nothing could set him right, or repair him in all, but a reversal of the judgment, which he sought no otherwise than as the means whereby he might in his own person, be enabled to hold an estate or sue for one, for it seems he had some hold which he would not quit, of a hope of having that which had been his own formerly, but the times going on to the worse for him, he found cause seven or eight years after, to seek both for his liberty and pardon; which pardon he had got but four months before the king died immediately after he had his pardon, he moved for that which rested of his estate, which sir Henry Gibb acquainted the king withal. But the king, without looking upon the paper in which the particulars were to be shewed him, told sir Henry that what Somerset had to demand of him in that matter, he should have it, if he had so much land in England. This was at Newmarket, a little before the king sickened at Theobalds.—So afterwards when his majesty came to the crown, he did by my lord of Buckingham, and the other lords he names in the Petition, continue this suit of his without intermission, but he could obtain no answer, nor reference, until about the time that his daughter was to be married, then by the duchess of Buckingham's means, the queen got the king to promise one, and this my lord Cottington told him of also, but it came no further, only this, he benefited thereby, that advising with my lord Cottington upon the time of the reference, for that he had the testimony of a nobleman to produce on his part, who was then troubled with the gout, and 100 miles off in the country, my lord Cottington bid him get it in writing, and it would be as well, and this lord's testimony, who died soon after, we have in a letter to my lord Cottington, yet sealed, but because the reference went not on, was never delivered him; so as here we have this letter which makes good that part of the Petition, which mentions the particulars of the king's gift for the estate, and our report for that which passeth here in Scotland, shews, the continuance of the king in the same mind and disposition, and sir Henry Gibb is now present in this kingdom, who will testify so much as hath been delivered here, in his name."

110. The Proceedings against Sir JOHN HOLLIS, Sir JOHN WENTWORTH, and Mr. LUMSDEN, in the Star-Chamber, for traducing the Publick Justice: 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615.

Present,

THE Lord Chamberlain, archbishop of Canterbury, lord Crew, lord steward, earl of Pembroke, bishop of London, bishop of Winton, lord Zouch, lord Knowles, secretary Winwood, Chancellor of the Duchy, sir Thomas Lake, and the three Chief Justices, being sat, there were brought to the bar, sir John Hollis, (now lord Houghton) sir John Wentworth, and Mr. Lumsden, a Scottish gentleman, as offenders and prisoners, committed by the Lords of the Council. Mr. Attorney-general (sir Francis Bacon) did inform against them ore tenus in this manner:

The offence wherewith I shall charge the three offenders at the bar, is a misdemeanor of a high nature, tending to the defacing and scandal of justice in a great cause capital. The particular charge is this:

The king, amongst many his princely virtues, is known to excel in that proper virtue of the imperial throne, which is Justice. It is a royal virtue, which doth employ the other three cardinal virtues in her service. Wisdom to discover, and discern nocent or innocent: fortitude to prosecute and execute: temperance, so to carry justice as it be not passionate in the pursuit, nor confused in involving persons upon light suspicion nor precipitate in time. For this his majesty's virtue of justice God hath of late raised an occasion, and erected as it were a stage of theatre much to his honour for him to shew it, and act it in the pursuit of the untimely death of sir Thomas Overbury, and therein cleansing the land from blood. For, my lords, if blood spilt pure doth cry to heaven in God's ears, much more blood defiled with poison.—This great work of his majesty's justice, the more excellent it is, your lordships will soon conclude the greater is the offence of any that have sought to affront it, or traduce it. And therefore, before I descend unto the charge of these offenders, I will set before your lordships the weight of that which they have sought to impeach; speaking somewhat of the general crime of imposition, and then of the particular circumstances of this fact upon Overbury; and thirdly and chiefly, of the king's great and worthy care and carriage in this business.—This offence of imposition is most truly figured in that device or description, which was made of the nature of one of the Roman tyrants, that he was latum sanguine maceratum, mire mingled or cemented with blood: for as it is one of the highest offences in guiltiness, so it is the basest of all others in the mind of the offenders. Treasons, magnum aliquid spectant: They aim at great things; but this is vile and base. I tell your lordships what I have noted, that in all God's books, (both in the Old and New Testament) I find examples of all other offences and offenders in the world, but not any one of an imposition or an imposer. I find mention of fear of casual imposition: when the wild vine was shred into the pot, they came complaining in a fearful manner; 'Master, mors in olla.' And I find mention of poisons of beasts and serpents; 'the poison of asps is under their lips.' But I find no example in the book of God of imposition. I have sometime thought of the words in the Psalm, 'let their table be made a snare.' Which certainly is most true of imposition; for the table, the daily bread, for which we pray, is turned to a deadly snare: but I think rather that that was meant of the treachery of friends that were participant of the same table.

But let us go on. It is an offence, my lords, that hath the two spurs of offending; spes perficiendi, and spes celandi: it is easily committed, and easily concealed.

It is an offence that is 'tanquam sagitta nocte volans'; it is the arrow that flies by night. It discerns not whom it hits; for many times the poison is laid for one, and the other takes it: as in Sander's case, where the poisoned apple was laid for the mother, and was taken up by the child, and killed the child: and so in that notorious case, whereupon the statute of 22 Hen. 8, cap. 9. was made, where the intent being to poison but one or two, poison was put into a little vessel of barm that stood in the kitchen of the bishop of Rochester's house; of which barm pottage or gruel was made, wherewith seventeen of the bishop's family were poisoned: nay, divers of the poor that came to the bishop's gate, and had the broken pottage in alms, were likewise poisoned. And therefore, if any man will comfort himself, or think with himself, here is great talk of imposition, I hope I am safe; for I have no enemies; nor I have nothing that any body should long for. Why? that is all one; for he may sit at table by one for whom poison is prepared, and have a drench of his cup, or of his pottage. And so, as the poet saith, 'Concidit infelix alieno vulnere'; he may die another man's death. And therefore it was most gravely, and judiciously, and properly provided by that statute, that imposition should be high-treason; because whatsoever offence tendeth to the utter subversion and dissolution of human society, is in the nature of high-treason.

Lastly, it is an offence that I may truly say of it, 'non est nostri generis, nec sanguinis.' It is (thanks be to God) rare in the Isle of Britain: it is neither of our country, nor of our church; you may find it in Rome or Italy. There is a region, or perhaps a religion for it: and if it should come amongst us, certainly it were better living in a wilderness than in a court.

For in the particular fact upon Overbury. First, for the person of sir Thomas Overbury: I knew the gentleman. It is true, his mind was great, but it moved not in any good order; yet certainly it did commonly fly at good things; and the greatest fault that I ever heard by him was, that he made his friend his idol. But I leave him as sir Thomas Overbury.

But take him as he was the king's prisoner in the Tower; and then see how the case stands. In that place, the state is as it were respondent to make good the body of a prisoner. And if any thing happen to him there, it may (though not in this case, yet in some others) make an aspersion and reflection upon the state itself. For the person is utterly out of his own defence, his own care and providence can serve him nothing. He is in custody and preservation of the law; and we have a maxim in our law, (as my lord the judges know) that when a state is in preservation of law, nothing can destroy it, or hurt it. And God forbid but the like should be for the persons of those that are in custody of law; and therefore this was a circumstance of great aggravation.

Lastly, To have a man chased to death in such manner (as it appears now by matter of record; for other privacy of the cause I know not) by poison after poison, first roseacre, then arsenick, then mercury sublimate, then sublimate again; it is a thing would astonish man's nature to hear it. The poets feign, that the furies had whips, that they were corded with poisonous snakes; and a man would think that this were the very case, to have a man tied to a post, and to scourge him to death with snakes: for so may truly be termed diversity of poisons.

Now I will come to that which is the principal; that is, his majesty's princely, yea, and as I may truly term it, sacred proceeding in this cause. Wherein I will first speak of the temper of his justice, and then of the strength thereof.

First, it pleased my lord chief justice to let me know, (that which I heard with great comfort) which was the charge that his majesty gave to himself first, and afterwards to the commissioners in this case, worthy certainly to be written in letters of gold, wherein his majesty did fore-rank and make it his prime direction, that it should be carried without touch to any that was innocent; nay more, not only without impeachment, but without aspersion: which was a most noble and princely caution from his majesty; for men's reputations are tender things, and ought to be like Christ's coat, without seam. And it was the more to be respected in this case, because it met with two great persons; a nobleman that his majesty had favoured and advanced, and his lady being of a great and honourable house: though I think it be true, that the writers say, that there is no pomegranate so fair or so sound, but may have a perished kernel. Nay, I see plainly, that in those excellent papers of his majesty's own hand-writing, being as so many beams of justice issuing from that virtue which doth shine in him; I say, I see it was so evenly carried without prejudice, (whether it were a true accusation of the one part, or a practice of a false accusation on the other) as shewed plainly that his majesty's judgment was 'tanquam tabula rasa,' as a clean pair of tables, and his ear 'tanquam janua aperta,' as a gate not side open, but wide open to truth, as it should be by little and little discovered. Nay, I see plainly, that at the first (till farther light did break forth) his majesty was little moved with the first tale, which he vouchsafeth not so much as the name of a tale; but calleth it a rumour, which is an headless tale.

As for the strength or resolution of his majesty's justice, I must tell your lordships plainly: I do not marvel to see kings thunder out justice in cases of treason, when they are touched themselves; and that they are 'vindices doloris proprii': but that a king should 'pro amore justitiæ' only, contrary to the tide of his own affection, for the preservation of his people, take such care of a cause of justice, that is rare, and worthy to be celebrated far and near. For, I think, I may truly affirm, that there was never in this kingdom, nor in any other kingdom, the blood of a private gentleman vindicated, 'cum tanto motu regni,' or to say better, 'cum tanto plausu regni.'—If it had concerned the king or prince, there could not have been greater nor better commissioners to examine it. The term hath been almost turned into a justitium, or vacancy; the people themselves being more willing to be lookers-on in this business, than to follow their own. There hath been no care of discovery omitted, no moment of time lost. And therefore I will conclude this part with the saying of Solomon, 'Gloria Dei celare rem, et gloria regis scrutari rem.' And his majesty's honour is much the greater, for that he hath shewed to the world in this business, as it hath relation to my lord of Somerset, (whose case in no sort I do prejudice, being ignorant of the secrets of the cause, but taking him as the law takes him hitherto, for a suspect) I say, the king hath to his great honour shewed, that were any man in such a case of blood, as the signet upon his right hand, (as the scripture says) yet would he pull him off.

Now will I come to the particular charge of these gentlemen, whose qualities and persons I respect and love; for they are all my particular friends: but now I can only do this duty of a friend to them, to make them know their fault to the full.

And therefore, first, I will by way of narrative declare to your lordships the fact, with the occasion of it; then you shall have their confessions read, upon which you are to proceed, together with some collateral testimonies by way of aggravation: and lastly, I will note and observe to your lordships, the material points which I do insist upon for their charge, and so leave them to their answer. And this I will do very briefly, for the case is not perplexed.

That wretched man Weston, who was the actor or mechanical party in this imprisonment, at the first day being indicted by a very substantial jury of selected citizens, to the number of nineteen, who found billu vera, yet nevertheless at the first stood mute; but after some days intermission, it pleased God to cast out the dumb devil, and that he did put himself upon his trial; and was by a jury also of great value, upon his confession, and other testimonies, found guilty: so as thirty-one sufficient jurors have passed upon him. Whereupon judgment and execution was awarded against him. After this, being in preparation for another world, he sent for sir Thomas Overbury's father, and falling down upon his knees, with great remorse and compunction, asked him forgiveness. Afterwards, again, of his own motion, desired to have his like prayer of forgiveness recommended to his mother, who was absent. And at both times, out of the abundance of his heart, confessed that he was to die justly, and that he was worthy of death. And after, again, at his execution (which is a kind of sealing-time of confessions), even at the point of death, (although there were tempters about him, as you shall hear by and bye) yet he did again confirm publickly, that his examinations were true, and that he had been justly and honourably dealt with. Here is the narrative which induceth the charge. The charge itself is this:

Mr. Lumsden, whose offence stands alone single (the offence of the other two being in consort; and yet all three meeting in their end and center, which was to interrupt or deface this excellent piece of justice:) Mr. Lumsden, I say, mean while, between Weston's standing mute and his trial, takes upon him to make a most false, odious, and libellous relation, containing as many untruths as lines, and sets it down in writing with his own hand, and delivers it to Mr. Henry Gibb, of the bed-chamber, to be put into the king's hand; in which writing he doth falsify and pervert all that was done the first day at the arraignment of Weston; turning the pike and point of his imputations principally upon my lord chief justice of England, whose name (thus occurring) I cannot pass by, and yet I cannot skill to flatter. But this I will say of him, and I would say as much to ages, if I should write a story; that never man's person and his place were better met in a business, than my lord Coke and my lord chief justice, in the cause of Overbury.

Now, my lords, in this offence of Mr. Lumsden's, for the particulars of these slanderous articles, I will observe them unto you when the writings and examinations are read; for I do not love to set the gloss before the text. But in general I note to your lordships, first, the person of Mr. Lumsden: I know he is a Scots gentleman, and thereby more ignorant of our laws and forms: But I cannot tell whether this doth extenuate his fault in respect of ignorance, or aggravate it much, in respect of presumption; that he would meddle in that that he understood not: but I doubt it came not out of his quiver; some other man's cunning wrought upon this man's boldness. Secondly, I may note unto you the greatness of the cause, wherein he being a private, mean gentleman, did presume to deal. Mr. Lumsden could not but know to what great and grave commissioners the king had committed this cause; and that his majesty in his wisdom would expect return of all things from them to whose trust he had committed this business. For it is the part of commissioners, as well to report the business, as to manage the business; and then his majesty might have been sure to have had all things well weighed, and truly informed: and therefore it should have been far from Mr. Lumsden to have presumed to put forth his hand to so high and tender a business, which was not to be touched but by employed hands. Thirdly, I note to your lordships, that this infusion of a slander into a king's ear, is of all forms of libels and slanders the worst. It is true, that kings may keep secret their informations; and then no man ought to enquire after them, while they are shined in their breast. But where a king is pleased that a man shall answer for his false information; there, I say, the false information to a king exceeds in offence the false information of any other kind; being a kind (since we are in matter of poison) of imprisonment of a king's ear. And thus much for the offence of Mr. Lumsden.

For the offence of sir John Wentworth and sir John Hollis, which I said was in consort, it was shortly this: At the time and place of the execution of Weston, to supplant his Christian resolution, and to scandalize the justice already past, and perhaps to cut off the thread of that which is to come; these gentlemen, with others, came mounted on horseback, and in a ruffling and facing manner, put themselves forward to re-examine Weston upon questions: and what questions? Directly cross to that that had been tried and judged; for what was the point tried? That Weston had poisoned Overbury. What was sir John Wentworth's question; whether Weston did poison Overbury or no? A contradictory directly: Weston answered only, that he did him wrong; and turning to the sheriff said, You promised me I should not be troubled at this time. Nevertheless, he pressed him to answer; saying, he desired to know it, that he might pray with him. I know not that sir John Wentworth is an Ecclesiastick, that he should cut any man from the communion of prayer. And yet for all this vexing of the spirit of a poor man, now in the gates of death, Weston nevertheless stood constant, and said, I die not unworthily: my lord chief justice hath my mind under my hand, and he is an honourable and just judge. This is sir John Wentworth's offence.

For Sir John Hollis, he was not so much a questionist; but wrought upon the other's questions, and, like a kind of confessor, wished him to discharge his conscience, and to satisfy the world. What world? I marvel! It was sure the world at Tyburn. For the world at Guild-Hall, and the world at London, was satisfied before; teste the bells that rung. But men have got a fashion now-a-days, that two or three busy-bodies will take upon them the name of the world, and broach their own conceits, as if it were a general opinion. Well, what more? When they could not work upon Weston, then sir John Hollis in an indignation turned about his horse (when the other was turning over the ladder) and said, he was sorry for such a conclusion; that was to have the state honoured or justified: but others took and reported his words in another degree: but that I leave, seeing it is not confessed.

Sir John Hollis's offence had another appendix, before this in time; which was, that at the day of the verdict given by the jury, he also would needs give his verdict, saying openly, that if he were of the jury, he would doubt what to do. Marry (he saith), he cannot tell well whether he spake this before the jury had given up the verdict, or after; wherein this is little gained. For whether sir John Hollis were a pre-juror or a post-juror, the one was to pre-judge the jury, the other as to taint them.

Of the offence of these two gentlemen in general, your lordships must give me leave to say, that it is an offence greater and more dangerous than is conceived. I know well, that as we have no Spanish inquisitions, nor justice in a corner; so we have no gagging of men's mouths at their death, but that they may speak freely at the last hour; but then it must come from the free motion of the party, not by temptation of questions. The questions that are to be asked, ought to tend to farther revealing of their own or others guiltiness; but to use a question in the nature of a false interrogatory, to falsify that which is res judicata, is intolerable. For that were to erect a court or commission of review at Tyburn, against the King's Bench at Westminster. And besides, it is a thing vain and idle: for if they answer according to the judgment past, it adds no credit; or if it be contrary, it derogateth nothing: But yet it subjecteth the majesty of justice to popular and vulgar talk and opinion.

My lords, these are great and dangerous offences; for if we do not maintain justice, justice will not maintain us.

But now your lordships shall hear the Examinations themselves. Hereupon the Examinations were read.

Mr. Lumden for Answer to this charge said, that himself was not at the arraignment, but what he had spoken, or set down in writing, he had received of many in common discourse; who being now demanded to justify the same, do deny it; and therefore he would confess that which was written was false. He pleaded ignorance of the law, and that he did it without any purpose of prejudice to the public business, but only as he conceived out of duty; and because he had always lived as a gentleman, he would not so much degenerate from himself and his birth, nor so much offend against human society, as to become a base accuser; but would submit himself and his offence to the censure of the court, and to the favourable interpretation of their lordships.

Mr. Attorney replied, that his answer and submission were modest, and therefore he would not press his offence further; yet he would tell him, that in criminal causes whosoever would raise a slander, and refuse to tell his author, he must tell him that which the laws tell him, that he was the author himself. This kind of slandering judges to kings and princes is common. Popham, a great judge in his time, was complained of by petition to queen Elizabeth; it was committed to four privy-counsellors; but the same was found to be slanderous, and the parties punished in the court. He likewise said, I may not admit of this new learning; I hold it not unworthy a gentleman to discharge his fault upon the first author; and by the law, the not doing thereof maketh him the first author; so he becomes a false accuser of himself.

Sir John Wentworth's answer was, that he would not willingly be conceived to speak more here than he had done heretofore. It was true, that he was at the execution of Weston, and did ask those questions touching the poisoning of sir Thomas Overbury; which he did on two reasons: the one was, because he had seen others do the same at the same time, and especially one Parkes; and he thought he might do it as well as he. Another reason was, because he not being at the arraignment, and hearing that Weston had denied the fact, he was desirous to be satisfied of the truth from himself; yet he purposed not to ask any questions when he came thither; but if to ask questions of a man going to execution were offensive to the state, he did humbly submit to their lordship's censures.

Sir John Hollis answered, that the matter declared against him contained three crimes. The first, that whereas at the first upon the indictment he should fore-judge the jury, by delivering his opinion; saying, that he should doubt what to do; and this he confessed, as a man perhaps more trickish and curious to give his verdict or judgment of life or death than others: and if a bare word of his opinion drawn by discourse (he being but a stander-by in this business) be to be censured, I appeal to your judgments. His second offence was for giving of counsel, and asking questions of Weston at the execution. He said, he confessed he was there, but carried with a general desire which he had to see the execution, as he had done in many like cases before. And he had formerly seen that it was a common thing for men standers-by to ask questions of those that were to be executed: and now many asking this question of the fact of Weston, and he answering in general terms, I die not unworthily; he also, among many others, did ask him the question (as hath been opened;) which was not purposed of him when he came thither, but was occasioned by reason of one that stood behind him at the gallows, who said to Weston, that he should confess the truth of this fact, for if he had had his right, he had been hanged many years ago: whereunto Weston answered, fact or no fact I die worthily. Sir John said, that Mr. Attorney had so well applied his charge against him, that though he carried the seal of a good conscience with him, he would almost make him believe that he was guilty; but he hoped their lordships would take the bird by the body and not by the feathers: his speech, he said, might be well understood, but the worst end of it was turned towards him; he did but the part of a christian to persuade Weston to discharge his conscience, and intended not to contrivert the law and justice that had passed on him. As for the testimony of Bearingborne, I know not what he hath deposed against me; but it seems he is some man of trade, against whom I think I may now put myself in opposition, that my denial may stand against his affirmation. In his youth some of your lordships know, that he [sir John Hollis] had spent some of his time in the wars and travel, and afterwards had lived in place at court, both in the time of queen Elizabeth, and his majesty eight years: he had served the late most worthy prince, the memory of whom, he said, did grieve him that he should plead his name at the bar, whom for the misery of this state it pleased God to take away; since whose death he had been as a fish out of the water. Thus much, he said, was pulled out of his mouth, by reason of his testimony produced against him; but he knew that not words but his cause must help him out of this mire. And therefore if their lordships had determined any thing against him for these offences, he did humbly submit himself to their honourable censures.—The lord chancellor said, that this deposition of Bearingborne was not read but in explanation and aggravation, and not for evidence of condemnation against sir John Hollis.

Mr. Attorney replied upon sir John to this answer of his, that his speech to Weston was occasional, and not resolved on before his coming to the execution; that it was new matter thought upon and devised since his being questioned for his offence; for there was never a word thereof spoken in this examination: and there this is the feather you spoke of, and not the body. Whereunto sir John Hollis answered, that they might very well stand together.

Hereupon sir Edward Coke, the chief justice of the king's Bench, pronounced the Sentence; when he said, that he would say of this business, and his dealing therein, as Abimelech said of himself, 'Tu scis, Domine, quod feci in simplicitate cordis et munditie manuum;' and therefore would also boldly affirm, that there were none brought into question of this great business of poison, but such as in his soul and conscience were apparently guilty: He said he was no fit man for a common-place; yet he had found some records of poisoning which he would shew: as namely in the treasury 31 Ed. 3, as the king indeed had two treasuries, the one of records, the other of gold and silver; where a woman committed adultery, and after poisoned her husband. And 21 Edw. 1, Solomon le Roch, a judge, was poisoned by a monk, who afterwards prayed to be delivered to the censure of the church; and he was denied, because the same was a wrong to the state to poison a judge. And it is to be observed in the first case, that poison and adultery go together; and on the second, that poison and popery go together. From Edward 3, down to 22 Henry 8, (which was a great lump of time) no mention is made of poisoning any man; and then a statute was made, that those that did poison any body should be boiled to death, and were first to be put in at the tiptoes. In this business, he said, he would tell no news, but he was not yet at the root; God forbid that those kinds of offences should be unsearched and unpunished, wheresoever they are found: There are divers sorts of poisoning, by some whereof a man shall die a month or a quarter of a year after, 'ut sic se sentiat mori;' and shall not know in what manner he is poisoned: as one Squire, a priest, should have poisoned queen Elizabeth by poisoning her saddle. This poisoning came first from popery. In this case of Weston he would never confess the indictment, because the indictment was, that he poisoned sir Thomas Overbury with arsenick, roe-eaker and mercury sublimate; whereas indeed it was not known what poison killed him. Here the poor man conceived a scruple, that if he did not know with which of the poisons Overbury was poisoned, he was not guilty of the offence laid in the indictment; and therefore said he was not guilty of the offence. Now 'ut obstruat os iniqui,' that the mouth of the wicked man may be fully stopped; after that it was resolved unto him, that the manner of killing, laid in the indictment, was not the point of the indictment, but the matter of killing; as if the indictment be, that a man was killed with a sword, whereas indeed he was killed with a dagger; yet the party is guilty, because the killing of a man is the point of the indictment; then he confessed the fact. And for this gentleman, Mr. Lumsden, a Scottish gentleman, a nation than he loved well, (and to his majesty both English and Scottish were equally dear) 'Scoti et Angli nullo discrimine, &c.' He that infuseth into his majesty's ears the least falsehood concerning his judges unjustly, is like him that infuseth never so little copper into coin; they both commit a kind of treason; and for the matter of it, which was informed, for 'qui non bene respondet, non respondet;' and a little to divert from this business, you, Mr. Lumsden, were a pandar to the earl of Somerset, and were his favourer in deed, but his follower in evil. 'Afflictio dat intellectum,' let your affliction now give you sense and feeling of your sins; your service of a pandar is apparently to be shewed you by a letter under my lord of Somerset's own hand, and your answer to it. Let it then enter your heart and soul to assure yourself, that there is now no safety, protection, nor assurance, but under a religious faith in Jesus Christ; and that, 'radix justitiæ est pietas,' the foundation and root of justice is piety. I confess I had a great suspicion out of whose quiver the murder came first; but because I had no certain proofs, I would never question them. This resolution of Weston to be mute, was very great. When he was persuaded by the bishop of London and Ely to plead, he would not: and after being promised that if he would speak, he should have a popish priest; he thereunto answered, Have I refused the godly persuasions of the bishop of London, and shall I answer to a popish priest? And for your persuasions, Mr. Lumsden, that you will not be an accuser, this is a contemptuous answer; for this is not to be an accuser, being examined of another to discover him; but your refusal in this kind of answer is a manifest contempt: and for the like offence, a great lady of the land lieth now in the Tower, only for refusing to answer being examined. 'Quod diabolus ad malum exposuit, Deus ad bonum exposuit;' That which the devil exposeth to evil, God disposeth to good. This refusing to discover an offender, is a contempt to a master of a family; if he should command any of his servants to tell him of an offence committed, and by whom; and the servant that is so asked shall refuse to tell him, he shall be worthy of punishment: much more any subject being examined by the king's authority and commissioners, if he shall refuse to make discovery of the truth. The statute of the 1st and 2d of Rich. 2, is, that he that doth raise false news between the king and his nobles, shall be imprisoned for the space of a year; I think fit that Mr. Lumsden's imprisonment should be for a year, and afterwards, until he should produce his author. As for sir John Hollis, his fault of questioning and counselling, it is very great, the same being made after a verdict; for if a man commit treason the 30th day of May, and sell his lands the 5th day, and after is indicted that he did commit the treason the 1st day, which goes before the sale, and after is found guilty of this indictment; he that is to lose the land cannot deny this verdict, and say the treason was committed the 20th day, though it concern him for all that he hath of laying; if that he that is to be undone by a verdict shall not speak cross matter to a verdict (as the books of Ed. 3, and Ed. 1, are, and 11 Hen. 4, 53 Estophel. 137,) what shall be done to him that having no cause in a matter capital, wherein he had nothing to do, would intermeddle? For as the law saith, 'Turpis est admissio rei ad se non pertinentis.' Sir John said, that it hath been a custom to ask questions at those times, and that he did usually go to executions. For his own part, he said, that ever since he was a scholar, and had read those verses of Ovid, Trist. iii. 5.

'Et lupus et vulpes instant morientibus—
'Et quæcunque minor nobilitate fera est,'

he did never like it; and therefore, he said, he did marvel much at the use of sir John. Sir John answers here: at the bar, and saith, that if any thing were determined against him, he did humbly submit himself thereto: by which term so determining, he meant, I think, as if we did give our censures against him by conspiracy. For my own part, I talked with none other, nor I think did any of us onespeak with other before we came together here. Peradventure he thinks, as some have thought, that all the carriage of this business is but a conspiracy against the earl of Somerset. He saith, he hath been since the prince's death but as a fish out of the water. I know not what he means by a fish out of the water: I have heard that 'Clericus in oppido, tanquam piscis in arido,' a clerk in the town is like a fish out of the water: he is a justice of peace, a commissioner of Oyer and Terminer; a man of fair lands, 1500*l.* per annum at the least; this money is enough to be a privy-counsellor: and yet sir John Hollis is like a fish out of the water. I know he hath travelled many countries, speaks many languages, hath seen many manners and customs, and knows much of foreign nations;

yet a little knowledge of the common-law of this land would have been better for him than all these; it would have kept him from asking questions, and counselling in scandal of religion and justice; two of the main pillars of the kingdom, and that in cold blood. Evidence is above eloquence; the party himself acknowledged that he died justly; and those that saw him said he died penitently: so to conclude, as it was sometime said of Rome, 'Et quæ tanta fuit Romam tibi causa videndi,' he might very well now say of sir John Hollis his going to Tyburn, with a little alteration of the words, 'Et quæ tanta fuit Tyburn tibi causa videndi.' For the censure, he agreed with that which had been set; and the acknowledgment of Mr. Lumsden should be also in the court of Common-Pleas and the Exchequer, because the justice of all courts may be wronged with slanderous petitions. He moved that information might be made against the other gentlemen that were asking such questions as these were; and that they might receive their due punishment: he meant, he said, Mr. Sackvil, sir Thomas Vavasor, and sir Henry Vane, who would be a baron if attainders did not lie in the way: If these be not punished, these gentlemen will think that they have wrong; for 'quæ mala cum multis patimur leviora videntur.' He said he would wish gentlemen to take heed how they fell into discourses of these businesses, when they be at their chambers; for in the proceeding of these great businesses and affairs, if a man speak irreverently of the justice thereof, the bird that hath wings will reveal it.

The Sentence was fine, imprisonment, and submission, as followeth:

Lumsden fined 2,000 marks, imprisoned in the Tower for a whole year, and after until he shall, at the King's-bench bar, submit himself and confess his fault, and also produce his authors.

Sir John Hollis was fined 1,000*l.* imprisoned in the Tower for the space of a year.

Sir John Wentworth fined 1,000 marks, imprisoned in the Tower for a year; and both to make submission at the King's-bench bar.

111. The CASE of DUELS; or Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, against Mr. WILLIAM PRIEST for writing and sending a Challenge, and Mr. RICHARD WRIGHT for carrying it: 26th Jan. 13 JAMES I. A. D. 1615. [2 Bacon's Works, 563.]

CHARGE of sir FRANCIS BACON, the King's Attorney-general.

MY lords; I thought it fit for my place, and for these times, to bring to hearing before your lordships some cause touching private Duels, to see if this court can do any good to tame and reclaim that evil, which seems unbridled. And I could have wished that I had met with some greater persons, as a subject for your censure; both because it had been more worthy of this presence, and also the better to have shewed the resolution myself hath to proceed without respect of persons in this business. But finding this cause on foot in my predecessor's time, and published and ready for hearing, I thought to lose no time in a mischief that groweth every day: and besides, it passes not amiss sometimes in government, that the greater sort be admonished by an example made in the meauer, and the dog to be beaten before the lion. Nay, I should think, my lords, that men of birth and quality will leave the practice, when it begins to be vilified, and come so low as to barber-surgeons and butchers, and such base mechanical persons. And for the greatness of this presence, in which I take much comfort, both as I consider it in itself, and much more in respect it is by his majesty's direction, I will supply the meanness of the particular cause, by handling of the general point: to the end, that by the occasion of this present cause, both my purpose of prosecution against Duels, and the opinion of the court, without which I am nothing, for the censure of them, may appear, and thereby offenders in that kind may read their own case, and know what they are to expect; which may serve for a warning until example may be made in some greater person: which I doubt the times will but too soon afford.

Therefore before I come to the particular, whereof your lordships are now to judge, I think it time best spent to speak somewhat 1. Of the nature and greatness of this mischief. 2. Of the Causes and Remedies. 3. Of the justice of the law of England, which some stick not to think defective in this matter. 4. Of the capacity of this court, where certainly the Remedy of this Mischief is best to be found. 5. Touching mine own purpose and resolution, wherein I shall humbly crave your lordships aid and assistance.

For the Mischief itself, it may please your lordships to take into your consideration, that when revenge is once extorted out of the magistrate's hands, contrary to God's ordinance, 'mihi vindicta, ego retribuam,' and every man shall bear the sword, not to defend, but to assail; and private men begin once to presume to give law to themselves, and to right their own wrongs; no man can foresee the danger and inconveniencies that may arise and multiply thereupon. It may cause sudden storms in court, to the disturbance of his majesty, and unsafety of his person. It may grow from quarrels to bandying, and from bandying to trooping, and so to tumult and commotion; from particular persons to dissension of families and alliances; yea to national quarrels, according to the infinite variety of accidents, which fall not under foresight. So that the state by this means shall be like to a distempered and imperfect body, continually subject to inflammations and convulsions. Besides, certainly, both in divinity and in policy, offences of presumption are the greatest. Other offences yield and consent to the law that it is good, not daring to make defence, or to justify themselves; but this offence expressly gives the law an affront, as if there were two laws, one a kind of gown-law, and the other a law of reputation, as they term it. So that Paul's and Westminster, the pulpit and the courts of justice, must give place to the law, as the king speaketh in his proclamation, of ordinary tables, and such reverend assemblies: the Year-Books and statute-books must give place to some French and Italian pamphlets, which handle the doctrine of Duels, which if they be in the right, transeamus ad illa, let us receive them, and not keep the people in conflict and distraction between two laws. Again, my lords, it is a miserable effect, when young men full of towardness and hope, such as the poets call Aurora filii, sons of the morning, in whom the expectation and comfort of their friends consisteth, shall be cast away and destroyed in such a vain manner. But much more it is to be deplored when so much noble and gentle blood should be spilt upon such follies, as if it were adventured in the field in service of the king and realm, were able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a kingdom. So as your lordships see what a desperate evil this is; it troubleth peace; it furnisheth war; it bringeth calamity upon private men, peril upon the state and contempt upon the law.

Touching the Causes of it: the first motive, no doubt, is a false and erroneous imagination of honour and credit; and therefore the king, in his last Proclamation, doth most aptly and excellently call them bewitching Duels. For, if one judge of it truly, it is no better than a sorcery that enchanteth the spirits of young men, that bear great minds with a false shew, species falsa; and a kind of Satanical illusion and apparition of honour against religion, against law, against moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times and valiantest nations; as I shall tell you by and by, when I shall shew you that the law of England is not alone in this point. But then the seed of this mischief being such, it is nourished by vain discourses, and green and unripe conceits, which nevertheless have so prevailed, as though a man were staid and sober-minded, and a right believer touching the vanity and unlawfulness of these duels; yet the stream of vulgar opinions such, as it imposeth a necessity upon men of value to conform themselves, or else there is no living or looking upon mens facts: so that we have not to do, in this case, so much with particular persons, as with unsound and depraved opinions, like the dominations and spirits of the air which the scripture speaketh of. Hereunto may be added, that men have almost lost the true notion and understanding of fortitude and valour. For fortitude distinguisheth of the grounds of quarrels whether they be just; and not only so, but whether they be worthy; and setteth a better price upon mens lives, than to bestow them idly. Nay, it is weakness and dis-esteem of a man's self, to put a man's life upon such liddger performances. A man's life is not to be trifled away: it is to be offered up and sacrificed to honourable services, public merits, good causes, and noble adventures. It is in expence of blood as it is in expence of money. It is no liberality to make a profusion of money upon every vain occasion; nor no more it is fortitude to make effusion of blood, except the cause be of worth. And thus much for the causes of this evil.

For the Remedies, I hope some great and noble person will put his hand to this plough, and I wish that my labours of this day may be but forerunners to the work of a higher and better hand. But yet to deliver my opinion as may be proper for this time and place, there be four things that I have thought on, as the most effectual for the repressing of this depraved custom of particular combats.

The first is, that there do appear and be declared a constant and settled resolution in the state to abolish it. For this is a thing, my lords, must go down at once, or not at all; for then every particular man will think himself acquitted in his reputation, when he sees that the state takes it to heart, as an insult against the king's power and authority, and thereupon hath absolutely resolved to master it; like unto that which was set down in express words in the edict of Charles 9, of France touching duels, that the king himself took upon him the honour of all that took themselves grieved or interested for not having performed the combat. So must the state do in this business; and in my conscience there is none that is but of a reasonable sober disposition, be he never so valiant, except it be some furious person that is like a firework, but will be glad of it, when he shall see the law and rule of state disinterest him of a vain and unnecessary hazard.

Secondly, care must be taken that this evil be no more cockered, nor the humour of it fed; wherein I humbly pray your lordships, that I may speak my mind freely, and yet be understood aright. The proceedings of the great and noble commissioners martial I honour and reverence much, and of them I speak not in any sort. But I say the compounding of quarrels, which is otherwise in use by private noblemen and gentlemen, it is so punctual, and hath such reference and respect unto the received conceits, what is before-hand, and what is behind-hand, and I cannot tell what, as without all question it doth, in a fashion, countenance and authorize this practice of duels, as if it had in it somewhat of right.

Thirdly, I must acknowledge, that I learned out of the king's last proclamation, the most prudent and best applied remedy for this offence, if it shall please his majesty to use it, that the wit of man can devise. This offence, my lords, is grounded upon a false conceit of honour; and therefore it would be punished in the same kind, 'in eo quis rectissime plectitur, in quo peccat' The fountain of honour is the king, and his aspect, and the access to his person continueth honour in life, and to be banished from his presence is one of the greatest eclipses of honour that can be. If his majesty shall be pleased that when this court shall censure any of these offences in persons of eminent quality, to add this out of his own power and discipline, that these persons shall be banished and excluded from his court for certain years, and the courts of his queen and prince; I think there is no man, that hath any good blood in him, will commit an act that shall cast him into that darkness, that he may not behold his sovereign's face.

Lastly, and that which more properly concerneth this court: we see, my lords, the root of this offence is stubborn; for it despiseth death, which is the utmost of punishments; and it were a just but a miserable severity, to execute the law without all remission or mercy, where the case proveth capital. And yet the late severity in France was more, where, by a kind of martial law, established by ordinance of the king and parliament, the party that had slain another was presently had to the gibbet, insomuch as gentlemen of great quality were hanged, their wounds bleeding, lest a natural death should prevent the example of justice. But, my lords, the course which we shall take is of far greater lenity, and yet of no less efficacy; which is to punish, in this court, all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, which I will enumerate to you anon, and so to hew and vex the root in the branches, which, no doubt, in the end will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of law.

Now for the Law of England, I see it excepted to, though ignorantly, in two points. The one, that it should make no difference between an insidious and foul murder, and the killing of a man upon fair terms, as they now call it. The other, that the law hath not provided sufficient punishment, and reparations, for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like. But these are no better than childish novelties against the divine law, and against all laws in effect, and against the examples of all the bravest and most virtuous nations of the world.

For first, for the Law of God, there is never to be found any difference made in homicide, but between homicide voluntary, and involuntary, which we term misadventure. And for the case of misadventure itself, there were cities of refuge; so that the offender was put to his flight, and that flight was subject to accident, whether the revenger of blood should overtake him before he had gotten sanctuary or no. It is true that our law hath made a more subtle distinction between the will inflamed and the will advised, between manslaughter in heat and murder upon premeditated malice or cold blood, as the soldiers call it; an indulgence not unfit for a choleric and warlike nation; for it is true, 'ira furor brevis,' a man in fury is not himself. This privilege of passion the ancient Roman law restrained, but to a case: that was, if the husband took the adulterer in the manner. To that rage and provocation only it gave way, that an homicide was justifiable. But for a difference to be made in case of killing and destroying man, upon a fore-thought purpose, between foul and fair, and as it were between single murder and vied murder, it is but a monstrous child of this latter age, and there is no shadow of it in any law divine or human. Only it is true, I find in the scripture that Cain enticed his brother into the field and slew him treacherously; but Lamech vaunted of his manhood, that he would kill a young man, and if it were to his hurt; so as I see no difference between an insidious murder and a braving or presumptuous murder, but the difference between Cain and Lamech.

As for examples in civil states, all memory doth consent, that Græcia and Rome were the most valiant and generous nations of the world; and, that which is more to be noted, they were free estates, and not under a monarchy; whereby a man would think it a great deal the more reason that particular persons should have righted themselves. And yet they had not this practice of duels, nor any thing that bare shew thereof: and sure they would have had it, if there had been any virtue in it. Nay, as he saith, 'fas eat et ab hoste doceri.' It is memorable, that is reported by a counsellor ambassador of the emperor's, touching the censure of the Turks of these duels. There was a combat of this kind performed by two persons of quality of the Turks, wherein one of them was slain, the other party was convented before the council of bushaws. The manner of the reprehension was in these words: 'How durst you undertake to fight one with the other? Are there not Christians enough to kill? Did you not know that whether of you shall be slain, the loss would be the great seignor's?' So as we may see that the most warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have ever despised this wherein now men glory.

It is true, my lords, that I find Combats of two natures authorized, how justly I will not dispute as to the latter of them. The one, when upon the approaches of armies in the face one of the other, particular persons have made challenges for trial of valours in the field upon the public quarrel. This the Romans called 'pugna per provocationem.' And this was never, but either between the generals themselves, who were absolute, or between particulars by licence of the generals; never upon private authority. So you see David asked leave when he fought with Goliath; and Joab, when the armies were met, gave leave, and said, 'let the young men play before us.' And of this kind was that famous example in the wars of Naples, between twelve Spaniards and twelve Italians, where the Italians bare away the victory; besides other infinite like examples worthy and laudable, sometimes by singles, sometimes by numbers.

The second Combat is a judicial trial of right, where the right is obscure, introduced by the Goths and the northern nations, but more anciently entertained in Spain. And this yet remains in some cases as a divine lot of battle, though controverted by divines, touching the lawfulness of it; so that a wise writer saith, 'taliter pugnantēs videntur tentare Deum, quia hoc volunt ut Deus os: endat et faciat miraculum, ut justam causam habens victor efficiatur, quod sæpe contra accidit.' But howsoever it be, this kind of fight taketh its warrant from law. Nay, the French themselves, whence this folly seemeth chiefly to have flown, never had it but only in practice and toleration, and never as authorised by law; and yet now of late they have been fain to purge their folly with extreme rigour, in so much as many gentlemen left between death and life in the duels, as I spake before, were hastened to hanging with their wounds bleeding. For the state found it had been neglected so long, as nothing could be thought cruelty, which tended to the putting of it down. As for the second defect pretended in our law, that it hath provided no remedy for lies and fillips, it may receive like answer. It would have been thought a madness amongst the ancient lawgivers, to have set a punishment upon the lye given, which in effect is but a word of denial, a negative of another's saying. Any lawgiver, if he had been asked the question, would have made Solon's answer: That he had not ordained any punishment for it, because he never imagined the world would have been so fantastical as to take it so highly. The civilians, they dispute whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather resolve the contrary. And Francis the first of France, who first set on and stamped this disgrace so deep, is taxed by the judgment of all wise writers for beginning the vanity of it; for it was lie, that when he had himself given the lye and defy to the emperor, to make it current in the world, said in a solemn assembly, 'that he was no honest man that would bear the lye:' which was the fountain of this new learning.

As for words of reproach and contumely, whereof the lye was esteemed none, it is not credible, but that the orations themselves are extant, what extreme and exquisite reproaches were tossed up and down in the senate of Rome and the places of assembly, and the like in Græcia, and yet no man took himself fouled by them, but took them but for breath, and the stile of an enemy, and either despised them or returned them, but no blood spilt about them.

So of every touch or light blow of the person, they are not in themselves considerable, save that they have got them upon the stamp of a disgrace, which maketh these light things pass for great matter. The law of England, and all laws, hold these degrees of injury to the person, slaunder, battery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordinary circumstances of despite and contumely, as in case of libels, and bastinadoes, and the like, this court taketh them in hand and punisheth them exemplarily. But for this apprehension of a disgrace, that a fillip to the person should be a mortal wound to the reputation, it were good that men did hearken unto the saying of Gonsalvo, the great and famous commander, that was wont to say, a gentleman's honour should be de tela crassiore, of a good strong warp or web, that every little thing should not catch in it; when as now it seems they are but of cobweb-lawn or such light stuff, which certainly is weakness, and not true greatness of mind, but like a sick man's body, that is so tender that it feels every thing. And so much in maintenance and demonstration of the wisdom and justice of the law of the land.

For the Capacity of this Court, I take this to be a ground infallible: that wheresoever an offence is capital, or matter of felony, though it be not acted, there the combination or practice tending to that offence is punishable in this court as a high misdemeanor. So practice to im poison, though it took no effect; waylaying to murder, though it took no effect; and the like; have been adjudged heinous misdemeanors punishable in this court. Nay, inceptions and preparations in inferior crimes, that are not capital, as suborning and preparing of witnesses that were never deposed, or deposed nothing material, have likewise been censured in this court, as appeareth by the decree in Garzon's Case.

Why then, the major proposition being such, the minor cannot be denied: for every appointment of the field is but combination and plotting of murder. Let them gild it how they list, they shall never have fairer terms of me in place of justice. Then the conclusion followeth, that it is a case fit for the censure of the court. And of this there be precedents in the very point of challenge. It was the case of Wharton, plaintiff, against Ellekar and Acklam defendants, where Acklam, being a follower of Ellekar's, was censured for carrying a challenge from Ellekar to Wharton, though the challenge was not put in writing, but delivered only by word of message; and there are words in the decree, that such challenges are to the subversion of government. These things are well known, and therefore I needed not so much to have insisted upon them, but that in this case I would be thought not to innovate any thing of my own head, but to follow the former precedents of the court, though I mean to do it more thoroughly, because the time requires it more.

Therefore now to come to that which concerneth my part; I say, that by the favour of the king and the court, I will prosecute in this court in the cases following. If any man shall appoint the field, though the fight be not acted or performed. If any man shall send any Challenge in writing, or any message of challenge. If any man carry or deliver any writing or message of challenge. If any man shall accept or return a challenge. If any man shall accept to be a second in a challenge of either side. If any man shall depart the realm, with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the seas. If any man shall revive a quarrel by any scandalous bruits or writings, contrary to a former proclamation published by his majesty in that behalf.

Nay, I hear there be some counsel learned of Duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwise, and thereby incense and incite them to the duel, and make an art of it. I hope I shall meet with some of them too: and I am sure, my lords, this course of preventing duels in nipping them in the bud, is fuller of clemency and providence, than the suffering them to go on, and hanging men with their wounds bleeding, as they did in France.

To conclude, I have some petitions to make first to your lordship, my lord chancellor, that in case I be advertised of a purpose in any to go beyond the sea to fight, I may have granted his majesty's writ of ne exeat regnum to stop him, for this giant bestrideth the sea, and I would take and snare him by the foot on this side; for the combination and plotting is on this side, though it should be acted beyond sea. And your lordship said notably the last time I made a motion in this business, that a man may be as well fur de se, as felo de se, if he steal out of the realm for a bad purpose. As for the satisfying of the words of the writ, no man will doubt but he doth machinari contra coronam, as the words of the writ be, that seeketh to murder a subject; for that is ever contra coronam et dignitatem. I have also a suit to your lordships all in general, that for justice sake, and for true honour's sake, honour of religion, law, and the king our master, against this foud and false disguise or puppetry of honour, I may in my prosecution, which, it is like enough, may sometimes stir coals, which I esteem not for my particular, but as it may hinder the good service, I may, I say, be countenanced and assisted from your lordships. Lastly, I have a petition to the nobles and gentlemen of England, that they would learn to esteem themselves at a just price. 'Non hos quæsitum munus in usus,' their blood is not to be spilt like water or a vile thing; therefore that they would rest persuaded there cannot be a form of honour, except it be upon a worthy matter. But for this, ipsi viderunt, I am resolved. And thus much for the general, now to the present case.

PRESENT, George lord archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas lord Ellesmere, lord chancellor of England, Henry earl of Northampton, lord privy seal. Charles earl of Nottingham, lord high admiral of England, Thomas earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, John lord bishop of London, Edward lord Zouch, William lord Knolles, treasurer of the household, Edward lord Wotton, comptroller, John lord Stanhope, vice-chamberlain, sir Edward Coke, knight, lord chief justice of England, sir Henry Hobart, knight, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, sir Julius Cæsar, knight, chancellor of the Exchequer.

This day was heard and debated at large the several matters of Informations here exhibited by sir Francis Bacon, kt. his majesty's Attorney-General: the one against William Priest, gent. for writing and sending a letter of Challenge, together with a stick, which should be the length of the weapon: and the other against Richard Wright, esq. for carrying and delivering the said letter and stick unto the party challenged, and for other contemptuous and insolent behaviour used before the justices of the peace in Surry at their sessions, before whom he was convented. Upon the opening of which cause, his highness's said Attorney-General did first give his reason to the court, why, in a case which he intended should be a leading case for the repressing of so great a mischief in the common-wealth, and concerning an offence which reigneth chiefly amongst persons of honour and quality, he should begin with a cause which had passed between so mean persons as the defendants seemed to be; which he said was done, because he found this cause ready published, and in so growing an evil, he thought good to lose no time; whereunto he added, that it was not amiss sometimes to beat the dog before the lion; saying farther, that he thought it would be some motive for persons of high birth and countenance to leave it, when they saw it was taken up by base and mechanical fellows; but concluded, that he resolved to proceed without respect of persons for the time to come, and for the present to supply the meanness of this particular case by insisting the longer upon the general point.

Wherein he did first express unto the court at large the greatness and dangerous consequence of this presumptuous offence, which extorted revenge out of the magistrate's hands, and gave boldness to private men to be law-givers to themselves; the rather, because it is an offence that doth justify itself against the law, and plainly gives the law an affront; describing also the miserable effect which it draweth upon private families, by cutting off young men, otherwise of good hope; and chiefly the loss of the king and the common-wealth, by the casting away of much good blood, which, being spent in the field upon occasion of service, were able to continue the renown which this kingdom hath obtained in all ages, of being esteemed victorious.

Secondly, his majesty's said Attorney-General did discourse touching the Causes and Remedies of this mischief that prevailed so in these times; shewing the ground thereof to be a false and erroneous imagination of honour and credit, according to the term which was given to those Duels by a former Proclamation of his majesty's, which called them bewitching duels, for that it was no better than a kind of sorcery, which enchanteth the spirits of young men, which bear great minds, with a shew of honour in that which is no honour indeed; being against religion, law, moral virtue, and against the precedents and examples of the best times, and valiantest nations of the world; which though they excelled for prowess and military virtue in a public quarrel, yet know not what these private duels meant; saying farther, that there was too much way and countenance given unto these duels, by the course that is held by noblemen and gentlemen in compounding of quarrels, who use to stand too punctually upon conceits of satisfactions and distinctions, what is before-hand, and what behind-hand, which do but feed the humour: adding likewise, that it was no fortitude to shew valour in a quarrel, except there were a just and worthy ground of the quarrel; but that it was weakness to set a man's life at so mean a rate as to bestow it upon trifling occasions which ought to be rather offered up and sacrificed to honourable services, public merits, good causes, and noble adventures. And as concerning the Remedies, he concluded, that the only way was, that the state would declare a constaut and settled resolution to master and put down this presumption in private men, of whatsoever degree, of righting their own wrongs, and this to do at once; for that then every particular man would think himself acquitted in his reputation, when that he shall see that the state takes his honour into their own hands, and standeth between him and any interest or prejudice, which he might receive in his reputation for obeying. Whereunto he added likewise, that the wisest and mildest way to suppress these Duels, was rather to punish in this court all the acts of preparation, which did in any wise tend to the duels, as this of Challenges and the like, and so to prevent the capital punishment, and to vex the root in the branches, than to suffer them to run on to the execution, and then to punish them capitally after the manner of France; where of late times gentlemen of great quality that had killed others in duel, were carried to the gibbet with their wounds bleeding, lest a natural death should keep them from the example of justice.

Thirdly, his majesty's said Attorney-General did, by many reasons which he brought and alledged, free the Law of England from certain vain and childish exceptions, which are taken by these duellists. The one, because the law makes no difference in punishment between an insidious and foul murder, and the killing a man upon challenge and fair terms, as they call it. The other, for that the law hath not provided sufficient punishment and reparation for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like. Wherein his majesty's said Attorney-General did shew, by many weighty arguments and examples, that the law of England did consent with the law of God and the law of nations in both those points, and that this distinction in murder between foul and fair, and this grounding of mortal quarrels upon uncivil and reproachful words, or the like disgraces, was never authorised by any law or ancient examples; but it is a late vanity crept in from the practice of the French, who themselves since have been so weary of it, as they have been forced to put it down with all severity.

Fourthly, his majesty's said Attorney-General did prove unto the court by rules of law and precedents, that this court hath capacity to punish sending and accepting of Challenges, though they were never acted nor executed; taking for a ground infallible, that wheresoever an offence is capital or matter of felony, if it be acted and performed, there the conspiracy, combination, or practice tending to the same offence, is punishable as a high misdemeanor, although they never were performed. And therefore, that practice to impositon, though it took no effect, and the like, have been punished in this court; and cited the precedent in Garion's Case, wherein a crime of a much inferior nature, the suborning and preparing of witnesses, though they never were deposed, or deposed nothing material, was censured in this court. Whereupon he concluded, that for as much as every appointment of the field is in law but a combination of plotting of a murder, howsoever men might gild it; that therefore it was a case fit for the censure of this court: and therein he vouched a precedent in the very point, that in a case between Wharton plaintiff, and Ellekar and Acklam defendants. Acklam being a follower of Ellekar, had carried a challenge unto Wharton; and although it were by word of mouth, and not by writing, yet it was severely censured by the court; the decree having words, that such challenges do tend to the subversion of government. And therefore his majesty's attorney willed the standers-by to take notice that it was no innovation that he brought in, but a proceeding according to former precedents of the court, although he purposed to follow it more thoroughly than had been done ever heretofore, because the times did more and more require it. Lastly, his majesty's said attorney-general did declare and publish to the court in several articles, his purpose and resolution in what cases he did intend to prosecute offences of that nature in this court; that is to say, that if any man shall appoint the field, although the fight be not acted or performed; if any man shall send any challenge in writing or message of challenge; if any man shall carry or deliver any writing or message of challenge; if any man shall accept or return a challenge; if any man shall accept to be a second in a challenge of either part; if any man shall depart the realm with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the seas; if any man shall revive a quarrel by any scandalous bruits or writings contrary to a former proclamation, published by his majesty in that behalf; that in all these cases his majesty's attorney-general, in discharge of his duty, by the favour and assistance of his majesty and the court, would bring the offenders, of what state or degree soever, to the justice of this court, leaving the lords commissioners martial to the more exact Remedies: adding farther, that he heard there were certain counsel learned of duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwise, and did incense and incite them to the duel, and made an art of it; who likewise should not be forgotten. And so concluded with two petitions, the one in particular to the lord chancellor, that in case advertisement were given of a purpose in any to go beyond the seas to fight, there might be granted his majesty's writ of ne creat regnum against him; and the other to the lords in general, that he might be assisted and countenanced in this service.

After which opening and declaration of the general cause, his majesty's said Attorney did proceed to set forth the Proofs of this particular challenge and offence now in hand, and brought to the judgment and censure of this honourable court; whereupon it appeared to this honourable court by the Confession of the said defendant Priest himself, that he, having received some wrong and disgrace at the hands of one Huchest, did thereupon, in revenge thereof, write a letter to the said Huchest, containing a challenge to fight with him at single rapier; which letter the said Priest did deliver to the said defendant Wright, together with a stick containing the length of the rapier, wherewith the said Priest meant to perform the fight. Whereupon the said Wright did deliver the said letter to the said Huchest, and did read the same unto him; and after the reading thereof, did also deliver to the said Huchest the said stick, saying, that the same was the length of the weapon mentioned in the said letter. But the said Huchest, dutifully respecting the preservation of his majesty's peace, did refuse the said challenge, whereby no farther mischief did ensue thereupon.

This honourable court, and all the honourable presence this day sitting, upon grave and mature deliberation, pondering the quality of these offences, they generally approved the Speech and Observations of his majesty's said Attorney-General, and highly commended his great care and good service in bringing a cause of this nature to public punishment and example, and in professing a constant purpose to go on in the like course with others: letting him know, that he might expect from the court all concurrence and assistance in so good a work. And thereupon the court did by their several Opinions and Sentences declare, how much it imposed the peace and prosperous estate of his majesty and his kingdom to nip this practice and offence of Duels in the head, which now did overspread and grow universal, even among mean persons, and was not only entertained in practice and custom, but was framed into a kind of art and precepts: so that, according to the saying of the scripture, 'mischiefs are imagined like a law.' And the court with one consent did declare their opinions: That by the ancient law of the land, all inceptions, preparations, and combinations to execute unlawful acts, though they never be performed, as they be not to be punished capitally, except it be in case of treason, and some other particular cases of statute law, so yet they are punishable as misdemeanors and contempts: and that this court was proper for offences of such nature; especially in this case, where the bravery and insolency of the times are such as the ordinary magistrates and justices, that are trusted with the preservation of the peace, are not able to master and repress those offences, which were by the court at large set forth, to be not only against the law of God, to whom, and his substitutes, all revenge belongeth, as part of his prerogative, but also against the oath and duty of every subject unto his majesty, for that the subject doth swear unto him by the ancient law allegiance of life and member; whereby it is plainly inferred, that the subject hath no disposing power over himself of life and member to be spent or ventured according to his own passions and fancies, insomuch as the very practice of chivalry in jousts and tournays, which are but images of martial actions, appear by ancient precedents not to be lawful without the king's licence obtained. The court also noted, that these private duels or combats were of another nature from the combats which have been allowed by the law, as well of this land as of other nations, for the trial of rights or appeals. For that those combats receive direction and authority from the law: whereas these contrariwise spring only from the unbridled humours of private men. And as for the pretence of honour, the court much misliking the confusion of degrees which is grown of late, every man assuming unto himself the term and attribute of honour, did utterly reject and condemn the opinion, that the private duel, in any person whatsoever, had any grounds of honour; as well because nothing can be honourable that is not lawful, and that it is no magnanimity or greatness of mind, but a swelling and tumour of the mind, where there faileth a right and sound judgment; as also for that it was rather justly to be esteemed a weakness, and a conscience of small value in a man's self to be dejected so with a word or trifling disgrace, as to think there is no re-cure of it, but by the hazard of life; whereas true honour in persons that know their own worth is not of any such brittle substance, but of a more strong composition. And finally, the court, shewing a firm and settled resolution to proceed with all severity against these duels, gave warning to all young noblemen and gentlemen, that they should not expect the like connivance or toleration as formerly have been, but that justice should have a full passage without protection or interruption. Adding, that after a strait inhibition, whosoever should attempt a challenge or combat, in case where the other party was restrained to answer him, as now all good subjects are, did by their own principles receive the dishonour and disgrace upon himself.

And for the present Cause, the court hath ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said William Priest and Richard Wright be committed to the prison of the Fleet, and the said

Priest to pay 500*l.*, and the said Wright 500 marks, for their several fines to his majesty's use. And to the end, that some more public example may be made hereof amongst his majesty's people, the Court hath further ordered and decreed, that the said Priest and Wright shall at the next assizes, to be holden in the county of Surry, publicly in face of the court, the Judges sitting, acknowledge their high contempt and offence against God, his majesty, and his laws, and shew themselves penitent for the same.

Moreover, the wisdom of this high and honourable Court thought it meet and necessary, that all sorts of his majesty's subjects should understand and take notice of that which hath been said and handled this day touching this matter, as well by his highness's attorney-general, as by the lords judges, touching the law in such cases. And therefore the Court hath enjoined Mr. Attorney to have special care to the penning of this Decree, for the setting forth in the same summarily the matters and reasons, which have been opened and delivered by the Court touching the same; and nevertheless also at some time convenient to publish the particulars of his Speech and Declaration, as very meet and worthy to be remembered and made known unto the world, as these times are. And this Decree, being in such sort carefully drawn and penned, the whole court thought it meet, and so have ordered and decreed, that the same be not only read and published at the next assizes for Surry, at such time as the said Priest and Wright are to acknowledge their offences as aforesaid; but that the same be likewise published and made known in all shires of this kingdom. And to that end the Justices of Assize are required by this honourable court to cause this Decree to be solemnly read and published in all the places and sittings of their several circuits, and in the greatest assembly; to the end, that all his majesty's subjects may take knowledge and understand the opinion of this honourable court in this case, and in what measure his majesty and this honourable court purposeth to punish such as shall fall into the like contempt and offences hereafter. Lastly, this honourable court much approving that, which the right honourable sir Edward Coke, knight, Lord Chief Justice of England, did now deliver touching the law in this Case of Duels, hath enjoined his lordship to report the same in print, as he hath formerly done divers other cases, that such as understand not the law in that behalf, and all others, may better direct themselves, and prevent the danger thereof hereafter.

† "A sixth species of offences against God and religion, of which our ancient books are full, is a crime of which one knows not well what account to give. I mean the offence of witchcraft, conjuration, enchantment, or sorcery. To deny the possibility, nay, actual existence of witchcraft and sorcery, is at once flatly to contradict the revealed word of God, in various passages both of the old and new testament: and the thing itself is a truth to which every nation in the world hath in its turn born testimony, either by examples seemingly well attested, or by prohibitory laws, which at least suppose the possibility of a commerce with evil spirits. The civil law punishes with death not only the sorcerers themselves, but also those who consult them; (Cod. l. 9. t. 18.) imitating in the former the express law of God, (Exod. xxii. 18.) 'thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.' And our own laws, both before and since the conquest, have been equally penal; ranking this crime in the same class with heresy, and condemning both to the flames (3 Inst. 44.) The president Montesquieu (Sp. L. b. 12, c. 5.) ranks them also both together, but with a very different view: laying it down as an important maxim, that we ought to be very circumspect in the prosecution of magic and heresy; because the most unexceptionable conduct, the purest morals, and the constant practice of every duty in life, are not a sufficient security against the suspicion of crimes like these. And indeed the ridiculous stories that are generally told, and the many impostures and delusions that have been discovered in all ages, are enough to demolish all faith in such a dubious crime, if the contrary evidence were not also extremely strong. Wherefore it seems to be the most eligible way to conclude, with an ingenious writer of our own, (Mr. Addison, Spect. No. 117.) that in general there has been such a thing as witchcraft; though one cannot give credit to any particular modern instance of it. Our forefathers were stronger believers, when they enacted by statute 33 Hen. 8. c. 8. all witchcraft and sorcery to be felony without benefit of clergy; and again by statute 1 Jac. 1. c. 12, that all persons invoking any evil spirit, or consulting, covenanting with, entertaining, employing, feeding, or rewarding any evil spirit; or taking up dead bodies from their graves to be used in any witchcraft, sorcery, charm, or enchantment; or killing or otherwise hurting any person by such infernal arts; should be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy, and suffer death. And, if any person should attempt by sorcery to discover hidden treasure, or to restore stolen goods, or to provoke unlawful love, or to hurt any man or beast, though the same were not effected, he or she should suffer imprisonment and pillory for the first offence, and death for the second. These acts continued in force till lately, to the terror of all ancient females in the kingdom: and many poor wretches were sacrificed thereby to the prejudice of their neighbours, and their own illusions; not a few having, by some means or other, confessed the fact at the gallows. But all executions for this dubious crime are now at an end; our legislature having at length followed the wise example of Louis 14 in France, who thought proper by an edict to restrain the tribunals of justice from receiving informations of witchcraft.* And accordingly up the evill affected humours of corrupt mindes (she becoming now a fit subiect, through this her distemper, to worke upon, having the understanding darkened with a cloude of passionate, and revengefull affections) appeared unto her amidst these discontentments, in the shape of a blacke man, and willed that she should continue in her malice, envy, hatred, banning and cursing; and then he would be revenged for her upon all those to whom she wished evill: and this promise was uttered in a lowe murmuring and hissing voyce: and at that present they entered tearines of a compact, he requiring that she should forsake God, and depend upon him: to which she condescended in expresse tearmes, renouncing God, and betaking herselfe unto him. I am sparing by anie amplification to enlarge this, but doe barely and nakedly rehearse the truth, and number of her owne words unto mee. After this hee presented himselfe againe at sundry times, and it is with us enacted by statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 5. that no prosecution shall for the future be carried on against any person for conjuration, witchcraft, sorcery, or enchantment. But the misdemeanor of persons pretending to use witchcraft, tell fortunes, or discover stolen goods, by skill in the occult sciences, is still deservedly punished with a year's imprisonment, and standing four times in the pillory." See 4 Bl. Comm. p. 60.

"The law against witches," says Selden, (Table Talk) "does not prove there be any, but it punishes the malice of those people that use such means to take away men's lives. If one should profess that by turning his hat thrice and crying Buz, he could take away a man's life (though in truth he could do no such thing) yet this were a just law made by the state that whosoever should turn his hat thrice and cry Buz with an intention to take away a man's life, shall be put to death."

Some curious particulars of Obc, or Obi, the witchcraft of negroes in the West Indies, are to be found in Edwards's Hist. b. 4, c. 3.

Mr. Barrington, Obs. on st. 20 H. 6, thinks "such a law as that suggested by Selden, may be declared to be not only ridiculous and futile, but highly unjust." Among other matter relating to witchcraft, he mentions, from Grey's notes on Hudibras, that Hopkins, the noted witch-finder, hanged sixty suspected witches in one year; and that thirty thousand had been burned within an hundred and fifty years. He also mentions from Etoile, that, in the year 1572, there were supposed to be in France thirty thousand persons addicted to necromancy. And he speaks of an able pamphlet, written by sir Robert Filmer, entitled, "An Advertisement to the Jurymen of England touching witches." King James in his Dæmonologia says, that he was "moved to write that work, by the fearful abounding, at this time in this country, of those detestable slaves of the devil, the witches or enchaunters." Howell, in two letters, one dated Feb. 3, 1646, the other Feb. 20, 1647, says, that in two years there were indicted in Suffolk, and Essex, between 200 and 300 witches, of whom more than half were executed." In 1659 was published, from an original MS. which had belonged to sir Robert Cotton, "A true relation of Dr. Dee's actions with Spirits, &c." It is stuffed with the strangest fancies, that a disordered imagination could conceive. His familiars not only predict matters, relative to those about whom he consults them, but instruct him in their own natures and conduct. Thus we learn that "Trithemius is wrong, when he asserts, that no good angel would ever appear formâ muliebri." Of the morality and piety of these spirits, the following specimen is uttered in the name of the Deity: "adulterizans propter me in sempiternum benedicetur, et premio afficietur celesti." Yet to this book the learned Dr. Meric Casaubon, published a copious preface, in which he affirms the truth and sincerity of all the matters, related in it to have happened, but asserts, that the author mistook false lying spirits, for angels of light. Dr. Johnson's opinions concerning the agency of spirits, and the arguments, which he employed in support of them, are recorded by Hawkins and Boswell. In addition to the very frequent convictions for extorting money, under pretence of telling fortunes, recovering lost or stolen goods, &c. by skill in the occult sciences, the case of Rex v. Mary Bateman, York Spring Assizes, 1809, has just now afforded a very remarkable proof, that a disposition to give credit to the power of witches is by no means extinct in this country. Sir Francis Bacon was a member of the house of commons when the st. 1 Jac. 1. c. 12, was enacted. It is not likely he opposed it, considering the trash he wrote about witches. See 8vo. Edition, 1803, Bacon's works, pp. 27, 46, 62, 69. This act originated in the Upper House, where the committee to which it was referred, contained 12 bishops. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1018. fesse nothing to any of them, but continue constant in her made promise, rely upon him, and hee would save her. This was too high a straine above his reach to have made it good, and a note of his false descant, who having compassed this wretched woman, brought her to a shamefull and untimely end; yet doing nothing herein contrary to his malicious purposes, for hee was a murderer from the beginning, John 8, 44. Now then, to descend to particulars, and the effects of this hellish association made. Being thus ioyned and linked together in a reciprocall league, he beginneth to worke for her, in procuring the mischief of those whom she maligned, whereof these few acknowledged by herselfe, may yeeld some taste of more, though concealed.

The first who tasted of the gall of her bitterness was John Orkton a sailer, and a man of strong constitution of body, who about some five yeares sithence, returning out of Holland in the Netherland, or Low Countries beyond the seas, happened, for some misdemeanors committed by him to strike the sonne of this Mary Smith (but in such sort as could not in reason bee offensively taken) who hearing his complaint, came fourth into the streete, cursing and banning him therefore, as oftentimes shee did, dwelling in the next adjoining house, and wished in a most earnest and bitter manner, that his fingers might rotte off; whereupon presently hee grew weake, distempered in stomacke, and could digest no meate, nor other nourishment received, and this discrasie or feblenesse continued for the space of three quarters of a yeare; which time expired, the forementioned grieffe fel downe from the stomacke into his hands and feete, so that his fingers did corrupt, and were cut off; as also his toes putrified and consumed in a very strange and admirable manner. Nevertheless, notwithstanding these calamities, so long as hee was able, went still to sea, in the goods and shippes of sundry merchants (for it was his onely meanes of living) but never could make any prosperous voyage (as then other men did) eyther beneficiall to the owners, or profitable to himselfe. Whereupon, not willing to bee hindrance to others, and procure no good for his own maintenance by his labours, he left that trade of life, and kept home, where his former grieffe encreasing, sought to obtaine help and remedie by chirurgery, and for this end went to Yarmouth, hoping to be cured by one there, who was accompted very skillfull: but no medicines applyed by the rules of arte and experience, wrought any expected or hoped for effect: for both his handes and feete, which seemed in some measure every evening to be healing, in the morning were found to have gone backward, and growne far worse then before: so that the chirurgian perceiving his labour to bee wholly frustrate, gave over the cure, and the diseased patient still continueth in a most distressed, and miserable estate, unto the which hee was brought by the hellish practises of this malicious woman, who long before openly in the streetes, (when as yet the neighbours knew of no such thing) reioycing at the calamity, said, Orkton now lyeth a rotting. And no marvell though she could tell that which herselfe had done, and her good maister would not suffer to be concealed, but that the testimony of her owne tongue should remane as a record towards her further detection and condemnation, who sought meanes of her voluntary accord to be reconciled with the wofull distressed party, but this was nothing else but to plaister over and disguise her former inhumane and barbarous actions, for no reliefe at all followed thereof: for oftentimes, as hath beene procured, the divells and witches his instruments doe cause such diseases, which neyther the one, nor the other can remove againe. And this is not any vaporous imagination, but a most undoubted truth. For now this poor man continueth still in a lamentable estate, grieffe, and paines encreasing, without hope of helpe, except God in the abundance of his tender mercies vouchsafe to grant comfort and deliverance.

The second person distressed, by this witch, was Elizabeth Hancocke, then widdow, now wife of Iames Scot: the maner, occasion, and proceeding of whose dealing against her was thus. Shee comming out of the towne from the shoppe of one Simon Browne a silkeman, unto whom she had carried home some worke, which was by him put out unto her; Henry Smith, as shee passed by his doore, tooke her by the hand, and smilingly said, that his ducke (meaning his wife, this woman of whom we now speake) tolde him that shee had stolne her henne; which wordes shee then passed over, as onely spoken in merriment, and denying the same: in the meane time, as they were interchanging these words, shee came herselfe, and directly charged her with the henne, and wished that the bones thereof might sticke in her throat, when she should eate the same: which speech also she made no great reckoning of, supposing them to be but words of course, and might bee uttered in jest. Nevertheless, afterward better considering of the same, conceived much grieffe, to bee counted one of so evill quality and disposition, and espying that hen for which she was accused, to sit upon the hatch of her shoppe doore, went to her, and mooved with the indignity of that slaunder, and unjust imputation, told her in some passion and angry manner, that it was a dishonest part thus to blemish the good name of her neighbors with so untrue aspersions: whereupon, breaking fourth in some violence, she wished the pox to light upon her, and named her prowde Inny, prowde flurts, and shaking the hand, bade her go in, for she should repent it; and the same night, within three or foure houres after these curses and imprecations uttered, she was taken and pinched at the heart, and felt a sodaine weaknesse in all the parts of her body; yet her appetite to meate nothing diminished, and so continued for the space of three weekes; in which time, when she was any thing well, would come to the doore, and leane upon the stall, whom this Marie Smith seeing, did ever banne, adding the former curse, the poxe light upon you, can you yet come to the doore? and at the end of these three weekes, being but very weake, came fourth as shee used to doe, to take the ayre, this mischievous woman most bitterly cursed her againe, whereupon she went into the house, fell into such a torturing fit, and nipping at the heart, that she fainted, hardly recoverable for the space of halfe an houre, and so grievously racked and tormented through all parts of her body, as if the very flesh had bene torne from the bones, by the violent paine whereof she could not retrain, but tore the haire from off her head, and became as one distraught, bereaved of sence, and understanding: and the same night the bed whereon she lay, was so tossed, and lifted up and downe, both in her owne feeling, and in the sight of others, then present beholders of her extremities, by the space of one houre or more, that she was therewith exceedingly terrified, and did thinke oftentimes in her sleepe, that she did see this Marie Smith standing before her. And this fit continued sixteene houres, during which passion Edward Drake her father came to the towne, touched with griefe for this torture of his daughter (as parents hearts are relenting and tender, and naturall compassion is soone stirred up in them) tooke her urine, went to one for his advice (whose fact herein is no way justifiable, and argued but a small measure of religion, and the knowledge of God in him) who first tolde unto him the cause of his comming, that is, to seeke help for his daughter, and then added, that she was so farre spent, that if hee had stayed but one day longer, the woman who had wronged her, would have spent her heart, and so become unrecoverable, and thereupon shewed him her face in a glasse; and further, opened the beginning cause of falling out, which was for a hen, which before this, Drake neither knew nor heard of, and then gave his counsell for remedy, which was the matter sought for and desired, and that was in this order. To make a cake with flower from the bakers, and to mix the same instead of other liquor, with her owne water, and bake it on the harth, whereof the one half was to be applied and laid to the region of the heart, the other halfe to the back directly opposit; and further, gave a box of ointment like triacle, which must be spread upon that cake, and a powder to be cast upon the same, and certaine words written in a paper, to be layd on likewise with the other, adding this caveat, that if his daughter did not amend within six houres after the taking of these receipts, then there was no health or recovery to be looked for: and farther, wished silence to be kept herein, for

And being thus furnished with instructions, and returning home, as hee alighted from his horse to enter into that house where his daughter lay (being the next unto Mary Smiths) shee then stood leaning over her shop window, whom hee knew to be that person, which was shewed unto him, and she cursed him passing by, and told his daughter that her father had bene with a wisard. And the next day following after they had put in practice the directions given, she affirmed to divers of the neighbours, that Drake the afflicted womans father, had bene to aske counsell, and made a witch cake, but shee would learne how they came to have that knowledge: yet for the present she found helpe, and was freed from the languishing and other conflicts wherewith she was assaulted by the space of sixe weekes.

After this, being married unto James Scot, a great cat which kept with this witch (of whose infernall both purposes and practises wee now speake) frequented their house; and upon doing some scathe, her husband moved therewith, thrust it twice through with his sword: which notwithstanding those woundes received, ran away: then he stroke it with all his force upon the head with a great pike staffe, yet could not kill her; but shee leapt after this upward almost a yard from the boards of that chamber where she now was, and crept downe: which hee perceiving, willed his lad (a boy of foureteene yeares) to drage her to the muck-hill, but was not able; and therefore put her into a sacke, and being in the same, she still moved and stirred. Whereupon they put her out againe, and cast her under a paire of staires, purposing in the morning, to get more helpe, and carry her away; but then she could not be found, though all the doores that night were locked, and they never heard what afterward became thereof.

Not long after, this witch came forth with a birchin broome, and threatened to lay it upon the head of Elizabeth Scot, and defiled her clothes therewith, as she swept the street before her shop doore, and that in the sight of her husband, who not digesting this indignity offered unto his wife, threatened that if she had any such fits, as she endured being a widow before marriage, hee would hang her. At this shee clapped her hands, and said hee killed her cat. And within two or three dayes after this interchange of words betweene them, his wife was perplexed with the like paine and griefe at her heart, as formerly shee had bene; and that for two dayes and a night: wherefore her husband went to this wrathfull and malicious person, assuring that if his wife did not amend, hee would accuse her to the magistrate, and cause the rigor of the law to be executed upon her, which is due to such malefactors. These things were done some three yeares sithence. The party troubled yet liveth, but in no confirmed health, nor perfect soundnes of body.

A third subject whereupon this wrathfull womans anger wrought, was Cicely Balye, then servant to Robert Coulton, now wife of William Vaux, who sweeping the street before her maisters doore upon a Saturday in the evening, Mary Smith began to picke a quarrell about the manner of sweeping, and said unto her she was a great fat-tailed sow, but that fatnesse should shortly be pulled downe and abated. And the next night being Sunday immediately following, a cat came unto her, sate upon her breast, with which she was grievously tormented, and so oppressed, that she could not without great difficulty draw her breath, and at the same instant did perfectly see the said Mary in the chamber where she lay, who (as she conceived) set that cat upon her, and immediately after fell sicke, languished, and grew exceeding leane; and so continued for the space of halfe a yere together, during the whole continuance in her maister's service; untill departing from him, she dwelt with one mistress Garroway, and then began to bee amended in her health, and recover of her former pining sicknesse: for this witch had said, that so long as she dwelt neare her, she should not be well, but grow from evill to worse.

Thus every light trifle (for what can bee lesse then sweeping of a little dust awry?) can minister matter to set on fire a wrathfull indignation, and inflame it unto desired revenge, the Divell being willing to apprehend and take hold upon such an occasion, that so he might do some pleasing office to his bond-slave, whom she adored in submisse maner, upon her knees, with strange gestures, uttering many murmuring, broken, and imperfect speeches, as this Cicely did both heare and see, there being no other partition between the chamber wherein shee performed these rites, and the house of her maister with whom she then dwelt, but only a thiu seeling of boord, through a cranny or rift whereof she looked, listened attentive unto her words, and beheld diligently her behaviour, and might have seene and heard much more, but that she was with the present spectacle so affrighted, that shee hastened downe in much feare and distemper.

The fourth endammaged by this hagge, was one Edmund Newton: the discontentment did arise from this ground; because hee had bought severall bargaines of Holland cheese, and sold them againe, by which she thought her benefit to be somewhat impaired, using the like kinde of trading. The manner of her dealing with him was in this sort. At every severall time of buying cheese he was grievously afflicted, being thrice, and at the last, either she or a spirit in her likeness did appeare unto him, and whisked about his face (as he lay in bed) a wet cloath of very loathsome savour; after which hee did see one cloathed in russet with a little bush beard, who told him hee was sent to looke upon his sore legge, and would heale it; but rising to shew the same, perceiving hee had cloven feet, refused that offer, who then (these being no vaine conceits, or phantasies, but well advised and 'diligently' considered observances) suddenly vanished out of sight. After this she sent her impes, a toad, and crabs crawling about the house, which was a shoppe planched with boords, where his servants (hee being a shooe-maker) did worke: one of which tooke that toad, put it into the fire, where it made a groaning noyse for one quarter of an houre before it was consumed; during which time Mary Smith who sent it, did endure, (as was reported) torturing paines, testifying the felt grieffe by her out-cryes then made.

The sicknesse which he first sustained, was in manner of a madnesse or phrensie, yet with some interposed release of extremity: so that for thirteene or foureteene weekes together hee would be of perfect memory, other times distracted and deprived of all sense. Also the ioynts and parts of his body were benumbed, besides other pains and griefes from which hee is not yet freed, but continueth in great weaknesse, disabled to performe any labour, whereby hee may get sufficient and competent maintenance. And by the counsel of some, sending for this woman by whom hee was wronged, that he might scratch her (for this hath gone as currant, and may plead prescription for warrant, a foule sinne among Christians to thinke one witch-craft can drive out another) his nailes turned like feathers, having no strength to lay his hands upon her.

And it is not improbable but that she had dealt no better with others then these above mentioned. For Mr. Thomas Yonges of London, fishmonger, reported unto me, that after the demand of a debt due unto Mr. John Mason, silkeman of the same citie, whose widow hee married, from Henry Smith glover her husband, some execrations and curses being wished unto him, within three or foure dayes (being then gone to Yarmouth in Norfolke upon necessary businesse) he there fell sicke, and was tortured with exceeding and massacring griefes, which by no meanes (having used the advise of sundry learned and experienced physicians in Norwich) could in any part be mitigated, and so extraordinarily vexed thirteene moneths, was constrained to go on crutches, not being able to feed himselfe, and amended not before this mischievous woman was committed to prison (accused for other wickednesses of the like kinde) at which time (so neere as he could conjecture) he then received some release of his former pains, though at the present when hee made this relation, which was at Candlemas last past, had not perfectly recovered his wonted strength: for his left hand remained lame, and without use.

But thus much by the way onely, omitting how before this accident a great water-dogge ran over his bed, the doore of the chamber where he lay being shut, no such one knowne (for carefull enquiry was made) either to have beene in that house where hee lodged, or in the whole towne at any time.

I doe not insist upon this, because shee did not nominate him or any other unto us, but onely those foure already expressed: and for the wrongs done to them, she craved mercy at Gods hands, as for all other her sins, and in particular for that of witch-craft, renounced the Divell, embraced the mercies of God purchased by the obedience of Iesus Christ, and professed that her hope was onely by his suffering and passion to bee saued. And all these, that is to say, her former grievous offences committed against God, and his people, her defiance, of the Divell, and reposing all confidence of saluation in Christ Iesus alone, and his merits, she in particular maner confessed openly at the place of execution, in the audience of multitudes of people gathered together (as is usuall at such times) to be beholders of her death. And made there also profession of her faith, and hope of a better life hereafter; and the meanes whereby she trusted to obtaine the same, as before, hath beene specified. And being asked, if she would be contented to have a psalme sung, answered willingly that she desired the same, and appointed it herselfe, the Lamentation of a Sinner, whose beginning is, Lord turne not away thy face, &c. And after the ending thereof thus finished her life: so that in the iudgement of charity we are to conceive the best, and thinke she resteth in peace, notwithstanding her heynous transgressions formerly committed: for there is no malady incurable to the Almighty physitian, Esai. 1, 18. Ezech. 33, 11. Therefore Caius did injury to God, when convicted of the barbarous and unnaturall murder of his righteous brother, he cryed out that his sinne was greater then could be forgiven, Gen. 4, 13. for Gods mercy is greater then mans misery can be. And even for the like unto this very fact, we have a booke case, already adiudged, and over-ruled in those Ephesians, who brought their coniuring bookes, sacrificed them in the fire, estimated at the value of 900*l.* of our money, repented of their sinnes, and obtained mercy, Acts 19, vers. 19.

113. Proceedings against Mr. WRAYNHAM, in the Star-Chamber, for Slandering the Lord-Chancellor Bacon of Injustice, Pasch. 16 JAMES I. A. D. 1618.*

BEFORE the duke of Lenox; the earl of Suffolke, lord treasurer; the earl of Worcester, lord privy seal; the earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain; the earl of Arundel; Viscount Wallingford; sir Fu ke Greville, chancellor of the exchequer; Dr. Abbot, lord archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. King, bishop of London; Dr. Andrews, bishop of Ely; sir Edward Montague, l. c. justice of the Kings-bench; sir Henry Hobart, l. c. justice of the Common Pleas; sir Laurence Tanfield, Lord chief baron of the Exchequer; sir Edward Coke; sir Thomas Lake, principal secretary; sir Henry Cary, comptroller.

Sir Henry Yelverton, Attorney General — May it please your Lordships; It is the honour of this Court, that it represents the highest earthly majesty, and his presence; and it is his majesty's honour, that as himself is clothed with justice, so you, as the greatest and highest next his maesty, should put on the same garment. Clemency and justice are the two lights of every kingdom, without which your persons and estates would be exposed to violence, and without which great monarchies would be but great thefts; and as justice is not to be recompensed in price, so ought not the scandal hereof to go unpunished; especially, when it toucheth so great a person, as, in the sacred seat of justice, is next to the king; the Chief Judge in this Court, and the sole Judge in Chancery, who is much defamed by the gentleman at the bar, in the most precious point of all his virtues, his Justice: be it spoken without offence, basely and blamelessly is my Lord Chancellor traduced, as if he deserved that all the thunderbolts of heaven should fall upon him.

At my lord's first coming into this place, he found a Cause in Chancery, between this gentleman at the bar, and one Mr. Fisher, not controverted in the title, but concerning the value of the lease, which Fisher held of Wraynham; in which, the Lord Chancellor perused the proceedings of the cause, called the parties to give a summary end to so tedious a cause; and because the success answered not the desire of this gentleman, therefore he kicks against authority, who before was not more grieved at the expence, than now impatient at the sentence; which was not want of justice in my lord, but of equity in the cause.

I confess I was of counsel with Mr. Wraynham, and pressed his cause as far as equity would suffer; but I know that Judges look with other eyes than Counsellors do; they go not by tale, but by weight. And therefore, their judgment must answer the counsel, and quiet the mind of the party; and though in gaming losers may speak, yet in judgment they must be silent; because it is presumed that nothing is taken from them but what is none of theirs. But this gentleman being of an unquiet spirit, after a secret murmuring, breaks out into a complaint to his majesty; and not staying his return out of Scotland, but fancying himself, as if he saw some cloud arising over my lord, wearying and tiring his majesty with infinite supplications in this case. And now, my lords, as if all his former cause had been lost, he presents it no more in parts, or loose papers, but compiling his undigested thoughts into a Libel, though the volume was but in quarto, fastens it on the king on Good Friday last. And his most princely majesty, finding it stuffed up with most bitter reviling speeches against so great and worthy a Judge, hath of himself commanded me this day to set forth and manifest his fault unto your lordships, that so he might receive deserved punishment.

In this velvet pamphlet (for this Book is bound in velvet) is set forth his cause, the work of this day; wherein Mr. Wraynham saith, he had two decrees in the first Lord Chancellor's time, both under the great seal, and yet both are altered since the last lord chancellor's death, and cancelled by this lord chancellor in a preposterous manner; and 1, without cause; 2, without matter; 3, without any legal proceeding; 4, without precedent; 5, upon the party's bare suggestions; and 6, without calling Mr. Wraynham to answer. And of this, my lords, spitefully he imagines a threefold end: 1, to reward Fisher's fraud and perjuries; 2, to palliate his unjust proceedings, and to rack things out of joint; and 3, to confound Wraynham's estate: and that my lord was therein led by the rule of his own fancy. Yet he stayed not here; but, as if he would set spurs against my lord, he aggravates my lord's injustice to be worse than murder; saying, That in his Sentence, he hath devoured him and his whole family. And secondly, as if one sin should follow upon another, he doubles it upon my lord, and, in a manner, plainly gives my lord the lye. And hearing that my lord had satisfied his majesty in this case; he saith in his Book, that he that did it unjustly, must, to maintain it, speak untruly, adding falsehood to my lord's injustice; saying in his Book, it is given out my lord hath begged Wraynham's pardon: which, though it be the shew of a gentle heart, yet argues a guilty conscience, and is but my lord's cunning to avoid the hearing of the cause. And as if my lord should know his own disease to be foul, and were unwilling to have it searched or discovered; he charged my lord with shifts, and tells him that he hath palliated oppression with greatness, wit and eloquence; and that the height of authority makes men presume. And to make this yet more sharp, he urgeth, that my lord, to maintain this, useth secret means, whereby the soundness of his actions may not be seen, and so to avoid censure; and, as if my lord should have skill in magic, he saith, That my lord hath raised a report from hell of the late Master of the Rolls, which was confuted before his face, and damned before his death; not content to scandalize the living, but so far, my lords, doth his malice overspread his wisdom, that he doth not cease, with his nails, to scrape the dead out of their graves again. When it is well known unto your lordships, that the Master of the Rolls was a man of great understanding, great pains, great experience, great dexterity, and of great integrity; yet, because this cause fell by casualty into his hands, by reverence from the last lord chancellor, and he followed not this man's humour in his report; therefore he brands him with these aspersions, and adds this to the rest, That he grounded this report upon witnesses that swore impossibilities, gross absurdities, and apparent untruths. How can you but think, my lords, but that this gentleman's head is full of poison, seeing it fell out so fast then into his pen, trampling upon the dead? And this is an addition unto his punishment, the injury of him that is dead, because the state yet lives, wherein his justice is scandalized.

And now, my lords, that you may the more detest his slanders, whereby he goeth about to slander my Lord Chancellor's justice; give me leave to open the plain and even way, wherein this great judge walks in this particular case. The questions in Chancery at first were two, between Wraynham and Fisher, upon cross suits, either against the other; Wraynham complains of trust broken, whereby he was defrauded; Fisher upon a debt of a private reckoning detained by Wraynham. Upon proof of both these, it was by assent ordered, That Fisher should assign the lease made unto him upon trust, and Wraynham should pay the money, so well proved to be due to Fisher: so by assent was the decree had, which is the first decree.

But Mr. Wraynham, wisely suspecting that Mr. Fisher had incumbered his lease, and if it should be assigned to him according to the decree, it would be merely illusory; he exhibits a new bill to discover what charge, and in what sort, Fisher had charged the land with incumbrances. And Mr. Wraynham finding the incumbrances greater, upon the reference of the lord chancellor to the master of the rolls, a bargain was mediated between them, that Fisher should hold the lease in question, and Wraynham should have after the rate of twelve years purchase; and to this both assented; so that your lordships see that the first decree was not cancelled by my Lord Chancellor, but discharged by himself; for by the decree he might have had the lease; but he contented himself with twelve years purchase.

After this, the question grew upon the value, which being referred to the last Master of the Rolls, how the value was at first, before the improvement, when it was in lease to one Harply, and there, upon proof and oath of divers witnesses, the Master of the Rolls returned and certified the constant produce of the lease to be worth 200*l.* by the year; whereupon Wraynham was to have it at twelve years purchase, amounting to 2,400*l.* Mr. Wraynham seeing the land was much improved by a defence made against the sea and other means, whereby the nature of the land was altered, and the profit much raised, moves the Lord Chancellor not to recede from the bargain, but saith, that the value returned was not the true value, for the land was worth 400*l.* by the year, and yet excepts by retainer in his hands, 2000 marks which he owed to Fisher, 1,066*l.* odd money; whereby now Mr. Wraynham had received his 2,400*l.* in his purse. And when he saw himself thus fleeced, having received 2,400*l.* for that which cost but 200*l.* now he stirs up new suits, and moves the Lord Chancellor by a commission to refer the value to two knights that had been farmers to the land, that they might certify the true value: the one, sir J. Strange Mordaunt, who certifies the value 313*l.* yearly; and the other, sir Henry Spillman, certified the value to be 364*l.* yearly; and my Lord Chancellor strikes between them, and makes it 340*l.* So here is a difference of values, the first of 200*l.* upon oath yearly, and this at 340*l.* yearly, without oath. The first value is at the time of Harply's lease, the second is at the time of the commission granted; and after improvement of which, your lordships well know in your wisdom, the difference between land barren, and improved in value. The last Lord Chancellor, according to the amounting value of 340*l.* a year, annexed the increase to Wraynham's bargain, and that he should have it, as if the lands were worth 340*l.* per ann. So that now, the 2,400*l.* in his purse, had been worth 1,680*l.* annexed above 4,000*l.* Mr. Fisher finding this annexed to the bargain, and that he should be pressed to pay the surplusage, and that he had choice either to pay the money, or to part with the lease; Fisher moved the court, that he might give up the lease, and desire his first 2,000 marks with damages, which Wraynham assented to, so that he might have defalcation of that which Fisher had received of the profits of the land. Upon this, upon consent of parties, it was again decreed (and this is the second Decree, which Wraynham so much triumphs upon, not being an absolute and positive Decree, but qualified with this): 1. That Wraynham should pay the 2,400*l.* with damages to Fisher; and 2. That Wraynham should have defalcation of such profits as Mr. Fisher had received out of the land.

Mr. Wraynham strives with this second Decree, being willing to have the value of the land, not according as Fisher had received, but what he might have recovered.

Now my Lord-Chancellor finding the case thus standing, thought it no injustice against Wraynham's own offer, nor that Fisher should lose his damages, having forborn 2400*l.* ten years, nor that Wraynham should be allowed more defalcation than Fisher could receive, because he was tyed to a dry rent; and finding that Wraynham was neither willing nor able to return the 2400*l.* with damages unto Fisher, my Lord-Chancellor thought fit to establish the bargain, according to the first certificate of the master of the rolls upon oaths; because the last certificate without oath, was not so equal in the balance of justice, as that with oath, certified by the master of the rolls, upon the examination of divers witnesses.

Now, my good lords, if this case stands thus, what injustice is there committed? What un-soundness is there in this action? or, what cause is there for my Lord-Chancellor to hide himself, that this gentleman should in this case declaim against him this day? If it were, my lords, to make my Lord-Chancellor, for fear, to take off his hand; he will let the world know he is more constant and courageous in the points of justice, than that which he did so justly, so slightly to revoke. And if it were to this end, to make my Lord-Chancellor to dispute with Mr. Wraynham; I am to let you know from his majesty, that he will not let him forego, nor forget his place, so much as to enter into debate with Mr. Wraynham, knowing that it were not fit for him to stand to wrestle or wrangle with Mr. Wraynham, but rather to despise so mean an adversary.

My lords, you know, that wise and just men may walk the same way, though not the same passage; there are divers courses and divers ways to the same end, justice: for justice sake, they are both to be honoured, neither to be blamed. For, my lords, if judges should be traduced as unjust, because they differ in opinion, they should have thankless offices. Justice is the harmony of heaven, but ‘Lingua detractio est lancea triplex.’ Though this gentleman hath sweat hard to scoff and dare so high a judge, yet the razor of his tongue cannot charge him that any thing came between God and his own conscience, but the merits of the cause; though it be certainly true, whilst a man carries this flesh about him, his judgments and faculties will be imperfect. Yet, my lords, I know that my lord is the branch of such a tree, who, though he blossom'd last, yet took more sap from the root than any of the rest: the son living in the memory of so worthy a father, the father living in the memory of so virtuous a son, who may say, as Agesilaus once said to his father, ‘I obey you in judging nothing contrary to law.’

I am glad this gentleman is so naked of excuse, yet heartily sorry his defamation is so foul, as to draw such a smart of punishment as this will be upon him; and here if necessity (the true defender of man's wickedness) should step in, I answer, Though necessity break through all laws, yet flying into the face of justice, it must be broken by justice; else no subject can be safe, nor no court keep itself from infamy.

It is well, my lord, that this fault falls out but seldom; for being exorbitant when it happens, it cannot but be foul. It is a pernicious example; for by this, when slanders are presented instead of complaints, that is but to set divisions between the king and his great magistrates, to discourage judges, and vilify justice in the sight and mouths of all the people. Therefore I beseech your lordships to pardon me, if I be too long, and suffer me to shew your lordships what this court, in like cases, hath done.

In the second year of his majesty's reign, when sir Edward Coke, according to his place, informed against Foorth in this court, ore tenus, for petitioning his majesty against the last Lord-Chancellor, for granting an injunction for staying of a suit at the common law, (which your lordships know how necessary it is) he being convicted upon his own confession, received a sharp censure. I will conclude with this one, and I shall desire your lordships, in this place, to hear it read; and then do humbly beseech your lordships to hear the gentleman at the bar, either for his defence, or excuse.

Then Wraynham's Examinations were read in this Book and Epistle.

Then he was charged with these words following, in the end of his Epistle to his majesty: 'He that judgeth unjustly, must, to maintain it, speak untruly; and the height of authority maketh men to presume.' Also, in shewing of his majesty reasons why the Master of the Rolls was faulty, he said, 1. The master of the rolls had omitted many of his material proofs. 2. He shifted off other some. 3. That he sometimes wrested the equity of his cause. 4. That he did falsely cite Fisher's proofs. 5. That he grounded the report upon the deposition of witnesses that swore absurdities, untruths, and mere impossibilities. And, lastly, as if the report had been condemned and damned before to the pit of hell, he said it was raised as ab inferno.

In his Epistle to his majesty, he is charged with these words: 'I understand my Lord-Chancellor hath begged my pardon: it is outwardly the shew of a great heart, but inwardly it argueth a guilty conscience; otherwise, if first I had been found guilty, and his lordship should then have interceded with his majesty for me, it had been an argument of an indulgent nature; but to beg pardon where there is no need, was manifestly done to avoid an hearing, and not in pity towards me; for he that despoils me of my goods, I will not trust him with my person. And therefore, far be it from me to hope, or trust in his goodness: I disclaim his favour, and infinitely deplore the judgment of his majesty.'

And in the conclusion of his Epistle were these words: 'I desire to suffer at your gates, if I shall dare to slander so great and eminent a judge, unto so great and wise a king. If he should not desire to reward the Fishers for their fraud and perjuries, I know not why he should have racked all out of joint. My lord, with this his last cunning and rhetorick, hath palliated his unjust proceedings against me; for my lord's gesture and pronunciation in his speech is wanting in my writing, out of which a cloudy mist may rise to hide the verity of your princely judgment.—I could never see by what reasons or words his lordship hath coloured his dealings to excuse himself unto your majesty, understanding only a piece, and not the whole from your majesty. This must move me most humbly to beseech your majesty to save my wife and children; and out of your princely justice to appoint a day of hearing, whereby there shall appear unto your majesty, as well the sincerity of my affirmations, as the unsoundness of his lordship's actions. For I never sought corners, but openly, and sometimes in my lord's presence, have notified and complained of my wrongs, and desire a public hearing before your majesty, which the greatest subject dares not do without truth and justice.'

And in another place, Wraynham saith, My lord chancellor proves nothing by record, nor delivers any thing by writing, to answer the things objected against him; but would hide himself from the eyes of your majesty's justice.'

His majesty saith, though he receive petitions from his subjects against his highest justices; yet he will have his judges know, that they are subject to his account only, and to none else upon earth. His majesty received this petition on Good-Friday last, in which this gentleman hath so far exceeded the measure of an humble complaint, that I must appeal to your lordships against him.

Then was Foorth's precedent read, bearing date 14th Nov. termino Mich. 2 Jac. 1. And likewise Foorth's two last Petitions against my lord-chancellor, touching which reference is had. And the lords asked Mr. Wraynham what he could say for himself.

Mr. Wraynham. Right honourable, and my very good lords; from a man so perplexed with so many miseries, what can be expected? and what marvel, if I should faultier, or might let fall any speech that might seem uncomely? My lords, I know not how to behave myself, I will not willingly offend any, but especially the king's most excellent majesty; yet nature commands me to defend myself, for it cannot be thought he can be faithful to another, that is not so to himself. And therefore I humbly desire that what I offer in extenuation, or defence, that neither the meanest that hear it, nor your lordships, which are to judge of it, would take it offensively. My Book consisteth of three parts. 1. An Epistle to his majesty. 2. The body of the book, which relateth the truth of all the proceedings. And, 3. a conclusive Speech in the nature of an epilogue.

Touching the body of the Book, and the truth of the cause, I conceive it not now called in question, for I think your lordships will not enter into the particulars; but because it hath pleased Mr. Attorney to speak something of it, I will not be silent. My accusations, my lords, are set forth in two things: 1, that the complaint is of the right-hon. the lord-chancellor. 2. That it is in bitter and unreverend terms.—

For the 1st, I must fly for succour and protection unto our dread sovereign lord the king; for it pleased his majesty, sitting here in the sacred seat of justice, to declare, that if any were wronged in point of justice, to him they might come and have redress; and for proof thereof, I humbly desire your lordships to hear me read a sentence or two in his majesty's Book. 'For,' saith he, 'if any were wronged, their complaint should have come unto me; none of you but will confess you have a king of a reasonable understanding,' &c. And in another place, 'Why then should you spare to complain unto me, being the high-way; therefore as you come gaping to the law for justice, &c.' 'But if you find bribery or corruption, then come boldly; but beware of the justness of your cause.' 1st, therefore, in his majesty's opinion, a man may be wronged in a court of justice. 2dly, In that case, his majesty is not only willing to receive a complaint, but to reform what is amiss: so that his majesty publishing this much to all his subjects, I hope your lordships will not conceive that barely to complain is a fault; especially seeing that his majesty saith, 'Why do you spare to complain?'

The second part of my Accusation is, because I have used unreverend and bitter terms. 1st, I divided the collections objected against me into two parts. 1. Into two sentences, which Mr. Attorney hath endeavoured to fasten on the lord-chancellor by inference. 2. Into words, applied to his lordship.

My lords, touching the first, I hope general speeches shall have no such construction. In the 116th Psalm, the prophet saith of himself, 'I have said in my fury, all men are liars.' And in the 14th Psalm, it is said of all men, 'They have all gone out of the way, and are abominable; there is none that doeth good, no not one.' And in the Epistle to the Romans, it is said, 'Let God be just, and all men liars.' And again it is said in Scripture, 'That the poison of asps is under their lips, that their throats were open sepulchres.' And yet it was never heard, that any of the prophets and apostles (godly men) found fault with David, saying, 'You have said my throat is an open sepulchre; that I am a liar; and abominable;' because they were but general speeches. And therefore, my lords, I humbly pray, that any general speeches may not be applied to my lord-chancellor, for I had no such meaning.

For particular words, they are, as I take it, these; unsoundness of his lordship's actions; unjust proceedings, oppression, and injustice. Now, my lords, I must again fly to the king for succour, in these words; for his majesty points forth the things for which a subject may complain. For his majesty saith in his Book, 'If a man be wronged in the course of justice.' What is it but injustice? 2dly, His majesty saith, 'That if one find bribery, corruption, injustice, &c.' and then we should come boldly.

1st, For the word Injustice: he that proves the justice of his cause, proves the judgment given against it injustice: for, my lords, I conceive, under your lordships favour, that this very word contains all the rest, and that all other words that I have used are but synonymies unto this; and I used them all, yea all, I protest, to avoid tautology, and to avoid always using of the same word, injustice. And that also which urged me to use it, was necessity: and that twofold necessity; 1st, For that unless I particularly accused his lordship of injustice, I was out of hope ever to obtain an hearing of his majesty.

Secondly, My miseries enforced me unto it: And therefore it may please your lordships to understand, that in my first position to his majesty, there was no such word as Injustice, or that tended near unto it: but only it did set forth what the then Master of the Rolls, this lord, and the last Lord Chancellor had done; and desired his majesty to judge, whether the last Lord Chancellor or the now lord keeper, had most justly distributed justice: It pleased his majesty to give answer, 'That he would take some other course, when he came near London.' When his majesty came to Theobalds, I framed two other petitions, and delivered the one to his majesty, and the other to secretary Winwood; and in neither of these petitions was there mention of injustice, or a word savouring of it. And when I besought his majesty, at that time, to hear the cause, or to refer the examination, he gave me this answer: 'If myself, and the lords should trouble themselves about hearing of sentences, no other business would be done by us, for every man would be ready to complain.' And thus I had fallen off, but that his majesty said further unto me, 'Will you charge my Lord Chancellor with injustice or bribery?' I blanch'd the matter again, and desired his majesty would be pleased to grant me an hearing of the cause.

After which, when I had mediated again of his majesty's question, I found great coherence between this question and the words in his majesty's Book, and thereupon was bold to use the word injustice. Unto which his majesty was pleased to answer, 'These accusations are too common: but I will have relation of the cause from my lord himself.'

After all this, understanding that the Lord Chancellor had endeavoured to answer this matter unto his majesty, and to this end had produced the Master of the Rolls, Phillips, his report; which, I confess, taken by itself, may not only satisfy my Lord Chancellor, but the king himself, or any man else living: and therefore, fearing that my lord endeavoured to satisfy the king with that report, I saw there was no other course, but to give an answer unto it, which I could not do without the book. In making whereof, something was required, both before and after which drew me to make the Epistle and the Epilogue. In the making whereof, I mustered together all my miseries; I saw my land taken away, which had been before established unto me; and after six and forty Orders, and twelve Reports, made in the Cause; nay, after motions, hearings, and re-hearings, fourscore in number, I beheld all overturned in a moment, and all overturned without a new bill preferred. I discerned the representation of a prison gaping for me, in which I must from thenceforth spend all the days of my life without release: for in this suit I have spent almost 3000*l.* and many of my friends were engaged for me, some damnified, many undone: and with this, did accompany many eminent miseries, likely to en-sue upon me, my wife and four children, the eldest of which being but five years old; so that we that did every day formerly give bread to others, must now beg bread of others, or else starve, which is the miserablest of all deaths: and there being no means to move his majesty to hear the cause, but to accuse his lordship of injustice; this, and all these, moved me to be sharp and bitter, and to use words, though dangerous in themselves, yet I hope pardonable in such extremities.

And now I hope, if this will not acquit me, yet your honours will be pleased to move the king for his gracious pardon: for misery made patient Job break out and swell against God himself; and therefore, my lords, how much more may it make me so compleatly miserable, to swell and transgress against man!

And if, my good lords, you should hear all the passages of the cause, I should the better conceive your lordships will not be troubled with it; and Mr. Attorney hath already set it forth in that fashion, as it makes much against me: but if your lordships will vouchsafe me that favour, I hope I shall alter, or at least extenuate your lordships opinions in this cause. In the year 1606, I preferred a bill in chancery against Edward Fisher, for defrauding me of a lease of 60 years: Fisher forswears the trust, and preferred another bill against me for debts; both bills came to be heard before Kinglosse: Fisher offered to purchase the lease, and the debts were referred to two masters. These took great pains concerning the debts; after which the Lord Chancellor referred the whole business to those two masters of the Chancery, and then having examined both trust and debts, they report the trust proved; and for the debts, they think fit that I should give Fisher 2000 marks, whereof 500 marks were for damages. Fisher, not satisfied, moves my Lord Chancellor to hear the cause himself, and this was in 1608; and my lord, upon an hearing, decreed, with the consent of Fisher and his counsel, that he should assure the land, and I pay him 2000 marks within six months.

After this, my lord having made this decree by consent, I served Fisher with it; but his contempt was such, that after three commissions of rebellion, I was enforced to take a serjeant at arms to attach him, and had a commission awarded to the sheriff of Norfolk, to put me in possession. Fisher perceiving that the hiding of his head could not keep me from having possession of the land, takes another course by fraudulent conveyances between him and his brother, and others; and in a motion made in the name of sir Thomas Challoner, (for they lodge the fast interest in him) they inform that this conveyance was before my bill exhibited, and therefore desire I might be put out of possession; and so it was ordered, that the possession should remain then as it was.

Then I, to discover those frauds, preferred a new Bill against Fisher the deceiver and three others. They in their answer set forth matter sufficient to shew the fraud. For sir Thomas saith, that this conveyance from sir Edward his brother, was made and sealed when he never thought of it; that 1700*l.* was to be paid; but yet he never saw the land, he never bargained or conditioned for it, but bearing the trouble of it, assured it to Richard, the younger son of Fisher the deceiver; and so because he also was unable to go on in the purchase, he lodged it in the hands of sir Thomas Challoner.

Hobart, Attorney, informs my Lord Chancellor of these frauds; my lord gave them a day, to shew cause why I should not have the land till they could make better proofs. Then those witnesses which were both Fisher's men, were examined by my Lord Chancellor in open court, and one of them swears that the conveyance, which must defeat the decree, was sealed in the hall; the other swears it was done in the parlour; one, that it was read, the other, that it was not read: the one, that it was signed: the other, that it was not signed: one swears, that sir Edward Fisher was present; the other, not present; and both, that it was done at such a time, when the deed bears date twelve months after.

Then what remains after all this, but that I should have a confirmation of the old decree, or else a new? But I find it true, 'Nemo leditur nisi a seipso.' For then the lord chancellor made a motion, that Fisher should buy the land; against which, I not gainsaying, his lordship referred the mediation of the bargain to the master of the rolls, where it appeared, that sir Edward Fisher had made a lease of half the land for 200*l.* the year; and therefore it was agreed, that Fisher should give 2400*l.* out of the which he was to deduct 2,000 marks for his debts, due by the first decree, and the residue about 1,066*l.* I received, because it did not appear what the lands were worth. A commission was awarded out to sir L'Estrange Mordaunt and three others, to find out the true value of the land, and a bargain was not commanded, but propounded by the court: and I beseech your lordships to observe, that the master of the rolls being to consider of all the examinations, lawfully taken in the cause, nine witnesses were taken by the commission and duly examined; five witnesses more were examined in the examiner's office, without any privy or consent, and contrary to an order in court: which witnesses being examined, swore point-blank in all things; and according to those proofs, the master of the rolls made his certificate, and found 200*l.* a-year to be as much as the lands were worth. Hereupon the Lord Chancellor gave a day to shew cause, why the cause should not be decreed, which was the Order, quarto Maii, 1610. After this the lord Hobart, then Attorney, in the presence of the master of the rolls himself, did set down the defects of his own report.

Lord-Treasurer. My lords, this is contrary to all course, this must not be; for we mean not to enter into the merits of the cause.

Mr. Attorney Yelverton. Mr. Wraynham, for you to shift it off, doth but aggravate your offence; for when you say, you used the rest of your phrases as synonymics to injustice, that implieth a taxation of his lordship in point of justice; and so likewise do your words imply, when you say, by the greatness of his wit and eloquence he doth palliate the injustice of the cause: therefore tax my lord particularly with one point of injustice.

Here Mr. Wraynham would not instance in any one particular.

Wrayn. Had I thought his majesty would not have heard my cause, I would have sat down in silence, and have devoured my sorrow. I have formerly set down to your lordships, that my decree was reversed without a bill.

Mr. Attorney. That is, when the bill is absolute and constant, for there it must have a bill of revivor; but when it depends upon subsequent acts, and is qualified and conditional, there it may be reversed without bill.

Wrayn. I humbly submit myself in all things to your honourable and clement censure: for the manner, I beseech your lordships pardon; and for the matter, I humbly crave compassion.

Mr. Serjeant Crew. May it please your lordships, the prisoner at the bar hath made a good submission at the last, I would he had begun with it. My lords, the flux of foul mouths must be stopped, otherwise the greatest magistrates will be traduced and slandered to majesty himself; and though it be not treason, yet I have heard it from a great and honourable person sitting in this place, that it is arimen lesa majestatis. My lords, for the two lords, the one that lives, the other that is dead, and their demeanor in this case, in honour of him that is dead, and without flattery to him that is alive; I say, they both judged according to their consciences. The Lord Chancellor that is dead, gave his judgment according to his conscience, and not according to the conscience of another man, but according to the integrity of his own heart: for the judges are to judge secundum æquum et bonum in foro conscientiarum. And this lord also judged out of his noble conscience and integrity of his heart; for, my lords, there was no binding decree. As for the merits of the cause, it must not be examined of the one side, nor of the other, for both lords have done according to conscience coram Deo et hominibus. And each hath delivered his own sense according to their consciences. The lord which is dead, when he was alive, was one of the oracles of the wisdom of the time; and my living lord attributes very much unto him, whom God hath also enriched with great ornaments of nature; for no man, no magistrate, hears with more attention, nor no magistrate of justice attends with more understanding and patience. You then, Mr. Wraynham, thus to traduce my lord, is a foul offence, with that black mouth of yours: you cannot traduce him of corruption, for thanks be to God, he hath always despised riches, and set honour and justice before his eyes; and where the magistrate is bribed, it is a sign of a corrupted estate. For the justice of the cause; my lords, I was of counsel with Fisher, and I knew the merits of the cause; for my Lord Chancellor seeing what recompence Fisher ought in justice to have received, and finding a disability in Wraynham to perform it, was enforced to take the land from Wraynham to give it to Fisher, which is hardly of value to satisfy Fisher's true debt and damages. And this, my lords, was the true course of it; so it stands upon these parts your lordships have heard. I am glad at last to hear Mr. Wraynham's Submission, and do humbly crave your lordship's censure.

Sir Edward Coke. The cause before you, my lords, is a very great cause, for a man must tread in this course upon a very slender bridge: I will single out, as near as I can, the state of the question, and then I will shew you in others, upon what words, and in what I shall ground my sentence: for a complaint to the king's majesty, or a petition by any man that thinks himself wronged, I hold that regularly to be no offence. God forbid it should be so: I can make no hedge between the sovereign and the subject; nay, in some kingdoms, Querelas subditorum detrahere in principe desercentur capitale est. And that would be derogation from a monarch, that no subject should complain unto him; yet upon the statute of Westminster, and at common law, I make no question, but to shew you, that where petitions were made to the king in an unfit manner, they have been severely punished. Our case is now particularly in a sentence given by my Lord Chancellor, an eminent Judge in this Court, and a sole Judge in the highest Court of Equity that is in this kingdom; yea, this case is after sentence, and against the sentence, and with many such scandalous and opprobrious terms against so high a Judge; and that not in paper, in a book presented to the king; this book in my hand, which the king hath delivered to the attorney-general, that it might come before us for due punishment. Whether this Book be justifiable, or no; that is the question.

It is a black Book, Est jam conveniens luctibus iste color. And it is a strange Book for some things that I will shew you, for it is no petition; and yet I will confirm every word I say by ancient and modern authorities; whereof, I am sorry, very sorry in good faith, for the excellent and worthy parts that are in you, Mr. Wraynham. Now mark your own words in your Book; you call it a Review, or Revivor of the Report of the Master of the Rolls, Phillips, and the Decree of my Lord Chancellor: the High Commissioners have sometimes a Commission of Review, but it is very rare: and that is a Commission of Grace, not of Right: such a Review is presented unto his majesty by Wraynham, in which he deals not like a petitioner, but like a censurer, censuring every man that deals in the cause.

Mark how the Common Law sets forth a petitioner: it gives no ill words, it toucheth not men of injustice; for take this from me, that what grief soever a man hath, ill words work no good; and learned counsel never use them. And therefore the petitioner at the Common Law, is, 'Si placet majestati,' &c. 'et quod justitia et rectum fiat,' &c. Now in your Petition, see whether you have behaved yourself well: first, you make your major proposition; The unjust sentence of a Judge, is far worse than a particular murder: then your minor is, That my Lord Chancellor hath satisfied his majesty, that I have informed him falsely; but his majesty knoweth, that he that judgeth unjustly, must, to maintain it, speak untruly; and that your lordships and all logicians know, the conclusion followeth necessarily.—First, he chargeth my Lord Chancellor with injustice, not complaining of any particular to be referred to examination; but saith in general, 'He hath done unjustly, and is worse than a murderer; and that he hath informed the king falsely.'

My Lords; You know, if a man put false metal into the king's coin, it is treason; and if my Lord Chancellor shall infuse poison and false information into the king's ear, it was an heinous offence. Yet this contents not Wraynham; but he saith at all, saying, 'That the height of authority maketh men presume.' And hath a place of Scripture in his Book, 'Woe be to them that write wicked Decrees;' and in another place he saith, 'Oppression is palliated with wit and eloquence.' My Lords, ought these things to be in a petitioner? A petitioner must go meekly and humbly to work, without shew of touch of any man.

I will not omit a dead man; for, though spoken of him, it is a living fault. As for this Master of the Rolls, never man in England was more excellent for the Chancery than that man; and for ought I heard, (that had reason to hear something of him) I never heard him taxed of corruption, being a man of excellent dexterity, diligent, early in the morning, ready to do justice: for him to be taxed in such a high degree, as to omit some of the material proofs, to shift off others, to wrest the equity of the cause, and such-like: and in another place, 'That the Master of the Rolls made an unjust and corrupt gloss upon a false text, &c.' And in another place, he saith, 'That sir Edward Phillips's report was raised ab inferno.'

My Lords; You know that the slander of a dead man is punishable in this court, as Lewis Pickering is able to tell you, whom I caused here to be censured for a slander against an Archbishop that is dead; for justice lives, though the party be dead; and such slanders do wrong the living posterity and alliance of the man deceased. But Mr. Wraynham spares not the king himself; for in one place of his Book he saith, 'assurgat rex,' &c. as if the king slept. And in another place he saith, 'That the Decree is reversed without precedent.' But that is not so, as I will satisfy you anon.

For Mr. Wraynham's censure, I will never judge a man without authority and reason: 18 E. 1, in Rotulo Parliament 3, my Lord-Abbot there complained that Solomon of Wragg, and Hugh Courtney then Chief-Justice, had confederated to give judgment against the Abbot. And the king answered, 'Shall we, upon this petition, call a judgment in question?' And in the end, the answer is, 'Rex rogabit, et aliter facere non potest per legem terre.' And my Lord-Abbot, because he was a lord, escaped punishment at that time.

Another precedent I will shew you, is, Mich. 18 E. 3, Rot. 151, coram Rege: Thomas Wilbraham petitioned against the Justices of the King's-bench, 'That they had not done according to law and reason.' And the petition was delivered to the representative body of the king and his council; for the which the said Wilbraham was indicted, convicted, fined, and ransomed in the King's-bench.—19 Ass. p. 3, Between sir William Scott and Humphrey Hunney, who complained to king Edw. 3. 'That sir William Scott, Chief-Justice, had awarded an assize contrary to law.' And the king sent it to the Judges; whereupon Hunney was imprisoned, judged, fined, and ransomed: yet he had no remedy but in parliament.

The Statute hath made a sharp law against such as speak scandalous news of the Chancellor, justice of the King's-bench, &c. And because divers were punished for slanders, in petitions to his majesty; therefore, 13 R. 2, rot. parl. numb. 45, the commons desired they might not be troubled for any matter that should be contained in petitions to the king: and the king answered, 'Let every man complain, so it be with law and reason.'

Wraynham objected a place of Scripture for himself, where the Psalmist saith, 'I have said in my fury, that all men are liars.' The text is, 'Dixi in excessu:' so Wraynham saith, 'It was not in his fury, but in his excess.'—And another thing that Wraynham offered in his defence, was the king's words, where he saith, in his Book, 'Be bold to complain.' But of what? Of corruption? So likewise, in Rot. Parl. 24 Edw. 3, parl. 3, numb. 16. 'If any man mix corruption with his censures, Anathema sit.' So likewise it is extant in the Rolls of the Parliament de la plbe, that the great de la Pole was convicted of bribery, and put from his place; and Cardinal Wolsey was convicted of a foul corruption.

But ~~the~~ according to sincerity, give judgment, though he differ from another Judge, this is no injustice. Parnous Dyer gave judgment in the Common Pleas, and this was reversed in the King's-Bench; yet he discharged his conscience: and although it was afterwards reversed, yet it was no injustice. The like instance might be made of sir Christ. Wray, and others. Now, in this case, my Lord-Chancellor that is living, differs from the Lord-Chancellor that is dead. This is not strange, it hath ever been, and ever will be; but if a judge's conscience be oiled and moistened with corruption, then all is naught.

The king hath the Pleas of the Crown, and upon every Judgment one of the parties is angry and displeas'd: but this must not presently produce a new hearing, for that will hinder all other businesses. For I will put you a great case between a nobleman here, and divers other noblemen that were trusted by the countess of Southampton, who were all Plaintiffs, and sir Moyle Finch Defendant: and this was Mich. 42 and 43 Eliz. The main point that was controverted in the cause, was upon an exception of a manor (as I remember) in the habendum of the deed, which my lord-chancellor then thought void. And therefore decreed, 'That my lady of Southampton should have all.' Whereupon sir Moyle Finch petitioned queen Elizabeth, that she should refer the examination of the decree to some of the judges; but the queen would never refer any thing to those that were named unto her, but she referred it to two other judges not named in the petition, who attended my lord-chancellor; and they then resolved it against the decree, and my lord reversed his own decree.

I know I have held your lordships long; yet I cannot tell, in these critical days, whether men will be satisfied, which hath made me longer than I would have been. Therefore, to conclude, I agree, in all things, with the sentence given in Foorth's Case of 2 Jac.

Sir Fulke Greville, Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Court hath no intent to discourage the meanest subject of his lawful appeal unto his prince; for that were to dishonour the people of law, and the king of the intelligence of the oppression that might fall upon his people. But this case I suppose not to be within the first. The matter in such cases, is but a review of an inferior sentence of a superior magistrate, my Lord Chancellor of England: and that before he be heard, making the king his speedy executioner.

But examine the nature of these accusations, and you shall find them mere scandals, and impossibilities; as breking decrees, rewarding frauds and perjuries, palliating oppressions with greatness, wit, and eloquence. Why, my lords, if this liberty should spread, then I desire the indifferent hearers to see in what a miserable case the subject stands, when the right of every good man shall stand in the malignity, and unquiet nature of every turbulent spirit? And, my lords the judges, in what a case stand they, if by such clamours every delinquent shall be made judge over them? and what privilence shall the king my master have? For if this humour should take a little head, will it not carry both him and justice into the field? And therefore I conclude, that this is severely to be punished; and is not a petition, but a presumptuous challenge, and of so far a worse nature beyond duels, as honour and universal justice is beyond particular right: and therefore I agree with him that went before me, leaving his good parts to mercy, and his ill parts to the censure of Foorth's Case.

Lord Chief Baron, Sir Laurence Tantfield. This cause is a cause of a high nature, being a scandal of a great and principal officer of the kingdom, and of one that is an high and eminent person: which scandal is set forth in this Book, which certainly I cannot call a petition: for the petitioner hath presumed too far, that it is a plain revise of a decree. Every man knoweth, that the Chancellor hath the keeping of the great-seal, whereby is managed mercy and justice: and if this great person so trusted shall be thus traduced by every offender, how insufferable will this mischief be?

I doubt not but that by a right way, you may, by a petition in an humble course, and submissive manner, desire his majesty that he would be pleased to review a Sentence in Chancery, or else grant a commission to others to review the same. But doth this man observe this course? No, but he will be his own judge, sentencing his own cause. I can call this Book no better, than a scandalous and malicious invective against the Lord Chancellor; and that not without great bitterness, as I have heard. First, he taxeth him with injustice: then mark the circumstances; he saith, 'My Lord Chancellor hath reversed the Decree, without cause, without new matter, without legal proceeding, without precedent, and upon a bare suggestion.' Then he goeth further, saying, 'Injustice is worse than murder; for this Decree hath devoured him and his whole family.' And, not content with this, chargeth him with oppression, and palliating it with greatness, wit, and eloquence; than which, a greater and heavier scandal cannot be!

You shall not be barred of access to his majesty; but that by a petition you may desire to have a Decree reviewed, and that his majesty would grant a commission to review it. But these things must be done legally, and then the law protects us, though it be against a nobleman. Sir Richard Crofts did sue an action for forgery of false deeds against the lord Beauchamp; whereupon my lord Beauchamp sued an action upon the statute de Scand. Magnat. But that would bear no action, because it was done legally: for a man may suppose in his writ such a fact, by the use of the said writ; but he must beware that he prove it well, or else he shall be well fined in the same court. But much more shall he deserve a fine, if he shall do it without writ, or without ground or proof, as Wrayham hath done. And therefore, because I must be short, I think him fully worthy of the censure before given, in all points.

Lord Hobart, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Mr. Attorney hath very worthily and like himself, according to his place, brought this man into this court, to give answer for the greatest and most outrageous offence that of this kind hath been committed; in which case, I will first tell you, what I do not question, and then what I do question.

For the first, Petitions may be exhibited to the king without controversy; nay, in some cases they must be exhibited; and God forbid, that any man's way should be locked up, or that any subject should be barred of access to his majesty; for when appeals fail, and when ordinary remedy is wanting, so that there is no judge above the highest judge; yet, you may still resort unto your sovereign for extreme remedy: this is proper to a king, 'Cessas regnare, si cessas judicare;' for it is an inherent quality to his crown. So that without controversy a man may petition against a sentence; for God forbid, that we that are judges, should draw that privilege to ourselves, to give sentence, and not to hear it examined. But it is true, it must be presented as a supplication, and you must go formally to work: ordinarily you must go to the proper courts of justice; if that fails, the extraordinary course is open by the king: and this is no more than to shew to his majesty, how you find yourself grieved, and then remit the cause and form to the king's wisdom.

But now see what this man hath done, he hath made neither the matter nor form of a petition. First, for matter, he pretends, that is not saying that my lord-chancellor hath expressly infringed two decrees, when he hath done nothing, only crossed an order, than which, there is nothing more common, for they are but interlocutory, and not definitive.—And for form, this is no petition, no book, as he would call it, but an express, peremptory and audacious libel. Then the manner offends yet more: for whereas a supplication imports, that a man should speak it upon his knees, for as it is in some realmes, men attempt nothing against law, but they must do it with a rope about their necks: so that he that goeth about to attempt any thing against a decree, he doth it with a rope of the king's censure about his neck: but mark the carriage of this man, how insolently he proceeds in this case!

First, for the king, as hath been well observed, he saith, 'assuat Rex;' as if he should bid the king arise and take revenge.

Therefore for the Decree, he saith, that the foundation of it came from hell: if that be so, then this sentence must needs be hellish, when he falls upon a poor man, the master of the rolls: I call him poor man, because he is not living to answer for himself, but yet he was a worthy minister of justice, (for I had much cause to know him) and he was of as much dexterity and integrity, as ever man that sat in his place, and I believe the chancery will find want of such a man. But not content with this, he scorns my lord-chancellor's courtesies, and carries himself, as if he would trample all under foot.

So much for the manner: as for the matter, it is odious: the person with whom he hath to do, is the principal officer and magistrate of justice in the kingdom, one that hath the nomination of all the justices of peace, and the principal that names all the sheriffs: one that keeps and carries the seal, and sits chief judge in this court, and sole judge in the chancery.—And shall we think that this man is bought and sold to corruption, to injustice, to murder? What more tends to the king's dishonour, than that he should place in the judicature such an unworthy man? a man infinitely the more wronged, because he deserves his place, as well as any man that went before him: and yet his last predecessor was very excellent, and deserved no small commendations. But Wraynham I condemn, as a man barbarous both toward the living and the dead: wherefore, there is a justice and tribute due to the master of the rolls deceased. I would have mention made of it in the decree, and with that addition to the sentence, I concur in all things with the president of the court.

Sir Edward Mountague, Lord Chief-Justice. My lords, it is a true saying, 'Judicium non redditur nisi in invitum.' For I yet never saw any man sit down satisfied with a sentence that went against him. I would not so far have blamed Wraynham as to have censured him for complaining to the king: yet this restraint I find in law, which any man may see in king Edgar's law. "Let no man complain to the king in matters of variance, except he cannot have right at home, or that right be too heavy for him. Then let him complain to the king." Whereby it is meant, that if the laws be so strict, he shall complain in a court of equity to the king himself. Then, to complain is not denied to any man, for all justice comes from the king, and though he distribute his justice to be ministered in several courts, yet the primitive power resides still in his person. Therefore, to the justice of his majesty may any subject have resort: but this must be humbly as a petitioner, not as Mr. Wraynham hath done here, who is not a suitor, but a censurer: and doth not complain, but proudly rails upon a high judge.

Can you, Mr. Wraynham, charge your judge with corruption, through fear or affection? (for I make them both alike;) Spare not the chief judge nor highest counsellor: I say, spare us not, whenever you can take us. But a judgment is pronounced from the sincerity of our consciences, and warranted by our judgment and learning: shall we then undergo the censure of every suitor? No state, at no time, ever suffered this.—My lords, it lies upon us Judges as a duty, to restrain this boldness: our places as Judges, give us no privilege to do what we list, nor have suitors liberty to speak as they list of judges: God, and order, hath set bounds to both.

For the matter heretofore handled in the Chancery, it is not a work of this day to deal with that; we meddle not with your Decrees, we censure you only for your scandals. I saw in your Book a smooth pen, and from your tongue I have heard fair speeches; but in both I see a fiery spirit. For you would raise up dissention between the two Lord-Keepers of the king's conscience, him that now is, and him that was, and now is, with God: of these two worthies I shall not say much; I will neither wrong the dead, nor flatter the living. The matter of difference, for any thing I can see, or you can say, is but an order against an order, wherein judgment may be varied by occasions, and through circumstances: true attributes are no flatteries. This honour let me give to these two great men: of greater parts, better fitted for that place, never sat in this place: nay, a man may truly say, that the world hath scarce yielded two such men of so excellent gifts, in this latter age of the world.

But you, Mr. Wraynham, wronged both the living and the dead. Of the Master of the Rolls, that is dead, you spake your pleasure: but all that hear you, and know him, will be ready to give you the lye. You say that he should omit some of the proofs, and rest otherwise, and ground himself upon witnesses that swore impossibilities, and absurdities, &c. Whoever knew that man, knows him to be a true reporter, and a judicious collector upon proofs, as ever was. I will not dissemble what others thought a fault in him, to be over-swift in judging: but this was the error of his greater experience, and riper judgment, than others had.

Now, for my Lord-Chancellor, by the words you use, you lay four of the greatest crimes upon him, that can be laid upon a judge: Presumption, Oppression, Falsity, and Injustice: all these you utter, with one breath, charging him with all in one sentence: for you say, 'Height of authority makes great men presume: there is presumption and oppression. And in these words, 'He that judges unjustly, must, to maintain it, speak untruly: there you accuse him of falsity and injustice. 'Ex ore tuo te judico, serve nequam.' For in your book you say, 'Let me suffer as a traitor, if all that I say prove not an entire truth, if I should dare to slander so great a judge to so wise a king.' Therefore, out of your own mouth I pronounce sentence against you, lese majestatis; and though not as a traitor, yet as a great scandalizer. And if all were true that is said in your book, yet would I censure you for your quarrel with my Lord-Chancellor for form; and yet yourself use no form, no, not common civility. So that if it were against a common man, it were punishable, to utter such words to the eye of a King, as here you give to my Lord-Chancellor, calling him a rewarder of frauds and perjuries, an afflicter of the afflicted, a rack of things out of joint, a confounder of your estate, and the like.

These are not words fitting a Petitioner, to be spoken of a Lord-Chancellor, to be offered to a king. And, my Lords, this man's fault goeth one step higher, touching the person of majesty itself. I am a judge of crown-matters; and in this libel, I think he hath scandalized the king in four things: First; he saith, 'The king is but a man, and so may err;' implying an error in the king. Secondly, 'That my Lord-Chancellor defends himself by secret means, and that you are not called to answer.' Than which, what greater tax unto so high a majesty, to condemn and not to hear! Thirdly, 'That my Lord-Chancellor doth cover his injustice with wit and eloquence.' When we all know, that we have a sovereign of those high and excellent gifts, that it is not rhetorick, or eloquence, that can cast dust in the king's eyes, or cause him any ways to turn aside from justice. Lastly, you say, 'That a man may distaste truth, and suspect judgment;' applying it unto his majesty. Which offences reaching so high, my censure shall be the heavier upon you.

Now it will rest, what shall be done with this man? As I give my sentence from his own mouth, so I will take advice from himself; he saith, 'State super viis antiquis.' Look what our ancestors have done of old, so let us do. In this then, you shall see what they did in like cases.—Mich. 13. of the queen, Rot. 39. Henry Blaunsford, a counsellor at law, was committed to the Fleet, and fined for false reporting the opinion of the lord Leicester, and secretary Cecil, with these words, 'Humanum est errare.'

So likewise, 19 Hen. 8. my lord Stourton was committed by the court, and fined, for saying these words, 'I am sorry to see rhetorick rule where law should.'—Sir Rowland Flaxing was committed, and fined, for reporting to the king, 'That he could have an indifferency before the lords of the council.' For which he was deeply fined, 7 Feb. 18 H. 8.—So likewise, in the time of Hen. 7. sir R. Terres was committed, fined, sent to the pillory, and adjudged to lose both his ears for his slanderous complaint exhibited to the king in a written Book; and that against the chief-justice Fitz-James: the punishment of him that depraved the good judge sir James Dyer, is fresh in memory.—So that party which said judge Catlyne was an unjust judge, 8 Eliz. Rot. 10. whose name was Thomas Welch, of London, who was indicted in the King's-Bench for this as for an offence against the common-law. His words that were delivered, were these: 'My Lord-Chief-Justice Catlyne is indicted against me, I cannot have justice, nor can be heard; for that court now is made a court of conscience.' This Indictment was found, and the record was, that it was 'in magnam contempt. Dominæ Regiæ ac curi suæ, ac in magni scandalum, ac ignominiam legi Angliæ, ac in scandalum cap talis just. ac in malum exemplum omnium subditum.'

So it is that this offence of Wraynham's is against the law, the commonwealth, and the justice of the kingdom; and therefore, according to the last judgment in law, and with the sentence that was pronounced against Fourth,

I concur and pronounce the same against Wraynham in all things. And this right I would have done to the Lord-Chancellor living, the Lord-Chancellor and Master of the Rolls that are dead, that those things be fitly expressed to their honours, in the drawing up of the decree.

Sir Thomas Lake, Principal Secretary. My Lords, If I had been the first that had spoken in this case, I should have thought it the greatest difficulty how to walk evenly between the not discouraging the king's subjects, and in judging the prisoner at the bar. But for that, my lords before me have so well spoken, that no man may be discouraged to come to his majesty in a discreet manner: And very good learning hath been delivered by all my lords the judges, such as may satisfy every man; yea, and not satisfy only, but direct them what to do in such cases: therefore I may be the shorter.—I will not be long in speaking of the honour due unto magistrates; he that wades into that, shall have little of his own invention; nor of the offence that is now before us; for the king's counsel hath so fully and perfectly delivered it, that perhaps by this time, he knows his own error. And my lords the Judges have made it appear so, whereby I think it as great an offence, as ever was in this nature; and much more deserveth punishment, because it is against a man no less eminent in virtue, than in place. Three things the prisoner urgeth for himself. First, for the word Injustice, he saith, 'That admitting the thing were unjust, then he might call it unjust.' But I answer, for a private man to call a public sentence, Injustice, herein he sheweth his error. Secondly, He urgeth, that it causeth a great loss unto him, and therefore he would be the rather excused.—It is true, I think, that men, by sentence, have lost, for 'Judicium redditur in invitum': but though it be a loss, it is 'Damnum absque injuria.' Thirdly, He went the wiser way, when he urgeth commiseration unto us. For my own part, I could commiserate the man, but I commiserate the Commonwealth much more; for if this should be suffered, tumults, and a multitude of other inconveniences, would arise. And therefore I judge him as the rest have done before me.

Sir Henry Cary, Comptroller. My lords before me have spoken so much, that I shall not need to speak, neither do I make any scruple of the said sentence. When I consider how fully this man hath behaved himself, in scandal and invectives against so high a magistrate, I must concur with the rest of the lords that have gone before me.

Bishop of Ely, (Dr. Launcelot Andrews.) Though the ground of the complaint had been just, yet I believe my lords the judges, that the complaint being in so foul a manner, against so great a person, in so high a place, deserves sharp punishment: and therefore I agree with the former sentence.

Bishop of London, (Dr. John King.) I shall borrow a phrase of him, though spoke to another purpose: 'That in a senate, where many assistants were, after two or three have well

'spoken, and well agitated a cause, there is required nothing of the rest, but their assent.' It is a worthy saying, but when I find here before me an honourable person fully and despitfully spoke against, being one of the three vital parts of this court, and without which it cannot have its subsistence; and of the three vital parts, the principal, and also a judge of another court; and (as I learned of my lords the Judges) of such a temporal court, where if the edge of the law be too keen, the equity of the Chancery doth abate it:—In regard of this duty, it becometh me to speak, and because the party wronged is a great counsellor and officer of the state:

The first thing I say and lay hold of, is this, interest reipublicæ, it stands not with the honour of the king, with the safety and peace of the kingdom, nor with the quiet of his majesty, that counsellors of state, and judges in the seat of justice and conscience, should be deprived, 'anima et vita regnorum autoritas,' take it away from the magistrate of state, take it away from the king himself, 'et subversa jacet pristina sedes soliorum.' For the place wherein this honourable person sits, is great between blood and blood, plea and plea, plague and plague, for the Judge shall end the controversy.—So that the first lesson which I shall make, is that which Cambyses made to another, 'emento ex quo loco,' they sit in God's seat, and execute his, and not their own judgments: it is their art, their faculty, their profession, their learning to judge, and it is not open to every man, but it is 'peregrina et unusquisque in arte sua artifex;' and therefore, for mine own part, I shall ever bend the best of my thoughts, the favourablest of my wishes, and the most of my prayers, that sitting in seats as they do, they may judge as they ought. I know, that while they carry flesh about them, their faculties and judgments will be imperfect; they are but men, 'et scientia juris infinita:' so that I know not (amongst the number of mortal wights) that man that can conceive every particularity of the law.

No marvel then, if one Judge differ from another, when the same man differs from himself; 'Socrates puer differt a Socrate sene.' And though the Judges walk not in the same way, they tend to the same end; and though there be not idem cursus, yet there is the same, 'idem portus, et non mutant, sed aptant legem,' according as the matter comes before them is varied, shaped, and fashioned.

It is unreasonable then to complain of a Judge, or unusual to go to the king with complaints; nay, it must be done with 'calamo et atramento temperato;' and it must be done, 'libello supplici, non famoso,' not as a sycophant and slanderer, but as a supplicant with a petition; not with a petulant invective declaration against a person of so great and honourable a place. This is a fact so unnatural, and unlawful, that all laws are broke both of God and nations, and civility, and good manners, and all: nay, I know not how the laws of speech are kept, they are but three, quid, de quo, cuique, the matter foul, spoken of so honourable a person, and to so transcendent a magistrate.

Wraynham is a man, that did not only curse in the bitterness of his soul, but he comes 'in amaritudine linguæ et chartæ.' It is not fit, God gives not blessing to these histricks and porcupine quills: it shoots far, it enters deep, it wounds sore, it is not to be tolerated! Let him keep his poison in his surmatico and invective Book. Wherein, let me add for my last, the manner of presenting it, the writing it self; and then withal the defence now made, which, when I heard it, I was more offended than with the Book itself; and I may justly make a question, whether he were more foolish in writing it, or more vain in defending it? His defence is a two-fold necessity: first, a necessity to induce the king to hear him; like Absalom, that would needs set Tobias's fields on fire, to get his ear. The other, a necessity of estate, proceeding out of the laws of necessity; 'Gravisimi sunt morsus irritatæ necessitatis.' One part of speech was general: in that he meant not my Lord Chancellor: but in the general there is a major, and in the particular there is the application, and then every man can make the conclusion, as hath been well observed by sir Edward Coke.—You are a man of a private and profane spirit, and if you know not of what spirit you are, I can teach you; I say, of that spirit, that you compare yourself with apostles and prophets, and you misapply scripture; your 'dixi in excessu et trepidatione,' sheweth a difference between sinning upon passion, and deliberation. It comes fully home into your own bosom, 'et pulchrum patet guttur in ore.' The best part of this answer, was the last, and I would it had been all in all; and so I agree with the Sentence given before me.

Viscount Wallingford. I am sorry a man should deserve so great a censure as this man's foul fault will make; yet I am very glad in this bold and quick-sighted age, that other men, by his example, may take heed not to exceed the bounds of modesty. This humour, it seemeth self-love (which believes nothing but itself) hath begot that, that hath bred this gentleman up so unmannerly, that he spares not to accuse the highest and greatest judge of the kingdom, of oppression, injustice, murder, nay, of any thing; which is not only spoken by so ill a tongue, but aggravated by his answer.—For it seems, he would encourage other men by the king's Book to do the like, wherein we may see the malice of this man, that will get poison from the fairest flower; yet every subject may take comfort in his majesty's Book, and God forbid, that he which is wronged, should be restrained to complain to his sovereign; yet, this complaint is no petition, but a very libel, and deserves no better name.—The king's will is, that you should be bold, and that you should come to him; but yet you must be sure that your cause must be just and right. This is a good and gracious speech of a king; but it is pity Mr. Wraynham alleges scripture to maintain an ill cause: and

I do clear my Lord Chancellor dead, and alive, to be as worthy men as any in my time, and yet I have lived a long age; and God forbid their consciences should be led by private men's humours.—I say no more, but let every man that hears us this day, take heed, that their humours lead them not into these outrageous courses, but carry themselves with modesty. I shall not need to enlarge, but consent with my lords before me.

Earl of Arundel. I shall not need to use many words for the matter; in brief, Wraynham hath forgot himself fully against a great and high instrument of justice, renewing complaints upon complaints; after the king had told him in my hearing, that the Lord Chancellor had done justly, as he himself would have done; and therefore I think him very much to blame, and well deserving the censure given. And the use is, as you see by him, for malicious men not to suck honey, but venom and poison out of the wholesome flowers; as his presumption is to be hated, so his humiliation and submission is to be pitied; yet I agree with my lords in all things.

Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain. No man's mouth is so stopped, but in case of grief he may seek redress. I think there is little scruple, that either the Master of the Rolls that is dead, or this Lord Chancellor that is living, did proceed without justice; because it is but an order against an order, a thing very frequent and usual in this, and in all other arbitrary courts. For the sentence, I agree with the court, being sorry, since his last submission was humble, that before he hath abused this good part, and used his wit to his own confusion.

Duke of Lenox. I am sorry that Wraynham hath not the grace of God to make use of his majesty's Book, which is not to complain without just cause; and without he could make proof of his complaint. I will not repeat the worth of my Lord Chancellor living, or dead: but I am sorry that a man of so great parts should deserve so heavy a sentence; whereunto in all things I agree.

Worcester, Lord Privy-Seal. My lords, I am of opinion, as formerly my lords have been: I do hold this a very scandalous libel, being against a person of such worth; the greater the person is, the more severe should the punishment be for the offender: and so I concur in opinion with my lords before me, and do think this offence to have exceeded his punishment; and therefore if a great fine had been laid upon him, I should have agreed unto it.

Abbot, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. The Lord, the Fountain of Wisdom, hath set this glorious work of the world in the order and beauty wherein it stands, and hath appointed princes, magistrates, and judges to hear the causes of the people, not so much out of authority, as out of justice and reason: for if no such persons were to hear and determine other men's causes, every man must be his own judge, which would tend to nothing but ruin and preposterous confusion : God therefore, in his wisdom, ordered and ordained their bounds, in the magistrate on the one side with instruction, and the subject on the other side with protection ; which instruction when he shewed them, the king's throne is upheld by justice : and David was commanded to rule his people with justice and judgment ; and the like commandment is given to others in subordinate places, not to pity the person of the poor, nor to stand in awe of the face of the mightiest, but to weigh the simplicity and integrity of conscience. For mark the example of the most holy and reverend judges, Moses, Samuel, and the rest, to whom their greatest comfort was, that they could say, ' Whose ox or ass have I taken ? From whom have I received a reward ?' And by the course of piety and divinity, we that sit sometimes to judge others, are at another time to stand at an higher bar, to receive judgment from heaven.—With the great grace, and benefit of protection, God calls them by his own name, God's children of the highest ; God being present amongst them to direct them, and defend them ; God standeth in the congregation of princes, he is amongst all the people : thou shalt not detract nor slander the judge, nor speak evil of the princes of the people. And in two several epistles, both in Peter and in Jude, it is said, ' That in the latter days there shall be wicked men, that shall speak evil of magistrates, and men of authority, blaspheming them ;' as if it were blasphemy, though not against God, yet against those that are the image of so great a God.—And therefore, since Wraynham hath blasphemed, spoken evil, and slandered a chief magistrate as any in the kingdom ; it remaineth, that in honour to God, and in duty and justice to the king and kingdom, that he should receive severe punishment ; for it is his cause to-day, and it may be ours every day : and have not some, for justice sake, been enforced to endure the threatening of their heads ? Wherefore, if greater punishment had been given him, I should have assented ; for justice belongeth to us, but mercy to our gracious sovereign. Wherefore I agree in all things with the sentence before given.

Suffolk, Lord Treasurer. I perceive, as the prisoner at the bar was charged at first, that he had fully offended, and ought to have yielded himself at the first, and not to have made his offence greater, by defending a bad cause. My lords who have heard his fault in part laid out, and censured him, I think they have done very worthily. For the party himself, I would I could come to him with a little better charity than I can, for his answer did more displease me, than his censure ; for I see his spleen and his humour grows, rather to defame a worthy man, than to free himself, how unjustly, I appeal to the whole world ; who came to his place with as much satisfaction to all hearts, and applause, with as good carriage as any man I ever heard came before him.—The thing that I would conclude with, is, that I would be glad that all that hear us might take us aright that are judges ; we desire not to be forborn by any subject's tongue, that hath cause to complain : and therefore do it not for any particular respect to ourselves, but for the public course of justice, and for the care we have of the public good, and for nothing else.—For the fault itself, it hath been so well opened by all the lords, that I will spare to hold you longer in speaking of it. And for the sentence, I think it very fit and just : and therefore agree with the rest.

114. The Case of WILLIAMS, of Essex, for Treason : B. R. Easter, 17 JAMES I. A. D. 1619. [2 Rolle's Reports, p. 88.]

WILLIAMS, a Papist and barrister of the Middle Temple, but expelled seven years ago for his religion, was indicted for High Treason for the writing of two books, one called " Balaam's Ass," and the other was called " Speculum Regali," in which he took upon himself the office of a prophet, and affirms that the king which now is, will die in the year of our Lord 1621, which opinion was grounded upon the prophecy of Daniel, where that prophet speaks of a time and times and half a time, [Dan. ch. 7, v. 25. ch. 12, v. 7.] and then Antichrist shall be revealed until the end of the world, viz. five years and a half before the end of the world, which contradicts the popish opinion of Williams ; and Williams holds that the time in which Antichrist shall be revealed, is the time in which sin shall be at the highest, and then the end is nigh, but such is our time, sin is now at the highest, ergo, &c. And he also says, that this land is the abomination of desolation mentioned in Daniel, [In king James's translation, the phrase in Daniel is, " the abomination that maketh desolate ;" See chap. 11, v. 31. ch. 12, v. 11, yet it is quoted, in the same translation of the New Testament, from Daniel in the words " abomination of desolation." See Matthew ch. 24, v. 15. Mark ch. 13, v. 14.] and that it is full fraught with desolation, and that it is a habitation of devils, and the Antimark of Christ's Church ; and upon these and many other such opinions contained in his book, all the court clearly agreed that he was Guilty of High Treason, and this by the common law, for these words import the end and destruction of the king and his realm, and that Antichristianism and false religion is here maintained, which is a motive to the people to commit treasons, rebellions, &c. for, by Mountague, treason is defined to be crimen lesa majestatis, and how can the king be more hurt than by the branching and bearing of such opinions in the ears and hearts of the people, being his subjects, and Glanvil defines treason to be, viz. qui aliquid machinatur in nocum regis, see 25 E. 3.—But Williams for himself objects, that what he did and wrote, was not out of any malicious or disloyal heart towards the king, but proceeded out of his love, and that he intended this as a caveat and admonition, whereby the king should avoid these mischiefs which were very like for to happen to him, which appears many times in his book, as he says, for when he has declared the judgment and destruction, &c. he concludes the sentence thus, viz. (which God avert) or such like words. 2. This matter rests only in opinion and thought, and it was not carried to any overt act in execution, for no rebellion, treason, or other mischief ensued upon it. 3. He inclosed his Book in a box sealed up, and so secretly conveyed it to the king, and never published it.—As to the first objection, the court answer, that no respect shall be paid to the good intention of a man, when his words and actions appear to the contrary, and when a man had talked treason in the previous part of a sentence, he cannot qualify it by ‘God save the king.’ As to the second objection, howbeit rebellion, treason, &c. did not ensue upon it, yet Doddridge said that the rule is in atrocioribus delictis, puniatur affectus, licet non sequatur effectus; for if an attempt be made to imprison the king, albeit his death is not intended, still this is high treason, for it is the means by which his death may ensue, and this was the case as Mountague said of king E. 2. * and he cited sir Nicholas Throgmorton’s Case in Dyer, * where was only a conference concerning the death of the queen, and it did not take effect, and still it was resolved to be high treason, and it cannot be said in this case that this matter rests in thought, since it is reduced to writing, for scribere est agere, † and if words can amount to treason, (as clearly they may) à fortiori when they are reduced to writing, and although they were never spoken, still it now appears that his intent was treasonable; and therefore, as to the third objection, it was clearly agreed that although this Book was inclosed in a box sealed or in his study, still because by this act his intent appears, therefore it is high treason, and Yelverton, the king’s Attorney, said, that at common law there be four manners of treasons, 1. Rebellion. 2. To deny the king’s title and power, temporal or spiritual. 3. To advance and maintain superior power to the king. 4. In bearing his subjects in hand that the king’s government is erroneous, heretical, and unjust, whereby the manner of his government is impeached, and called in question; which Doddridge affirmed, and said that these are undeniable maxims.

and Mr. St. John’s Argument in lord Stafford’s case, (infra) as there quoted.

Proceedings in Parliament against FRANCIS BACON Lord Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, upon an Impeachment for Bribery and Corruption in the Execution of his Office: And also against Dr. THEOPHILUS FIELD, Bishop of Llandaff, &c. 18 & 19 JAMES, A. PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
March 15, 1620.

SIR Robert Phillips reports from the Committee appointed to enquire into Abuses in the Courts of Justice, viz.

“I am commanded from the said Committee to render an account of some Abuses in the Courts of Justice, which have been presented unto us. In that which I shall deliver, are three parts. First, The Person against whom it is alledged. Secondly, The Matter alledged. Thirdly, The Opinion of the Committee.

1. The Person against whom it is alledged, is no less than the Lord Chancellor, [Francis lord Verulam, viscount St. Albans,] a man so endued with all parts, both of nature and art, as that I will say no more of him; being not able to say enough. 2. The Matter alledged, is Corruption. 3. The Persons by whom this is presented to us, are two, viz. Awhrey and Egerton. Awhrey’s Petition saith, that he having a Cause depending before the Lord-Chancellor, and being tired by delays, was advised by some that are near my lord, to quicken the way by more than ordinary means, viz. by presenting my lord with 100*l*. The poor gentleman not able by any means to come to his wished-for port, struck sail at this, and made a shift to get an 100*l*. from the u-rer; and having got it, went with sir George Hastings and Mr. Jenkins to Grays-Inn: and being come to my lord's house, they took the money of him, and carried it in to my lord Chancellor, and came out to him again, saying, my lord was thankful, and assured him of good success in his business. Sir George Hastings acknowledgeth the giving of advice, and carrying in of the money to my lord, and saith he presented it to my lord as from himself, and not from Awbrey.

"This is all confirmed by divers Letters, but it wrought not the effect which the gentlemen expected; for notwithstanding this, he was still delayed. Egerton sheweth, that he desiring to procure my lord's favour, was persuaded by sir George Hastings and sir Richard Young, to present my lord with a sum of money. Before this advice, he had given a present of 52*l.* and odd shillings in plate, as a testimony of his love; but is doubtful whether before his calling to the seal, or since: but now by mortgaging his estate he got up 400*l.* and sends for sir George Hastings and sir Richard Young, desires their assistance in presenting this money, and told them how much it was. They took it and carried it to my Lord Chancellor as a gratuity from the gentleman; for that my lord (who he was Attorney) stood by him. My lord (as they say) started at first, saying it was too much, he would not take it; but at length was persuaded, because it was for favours past, and took it, and the gentleman returned him thanks; saying that their lord said, that he did not only enrich him, but laid a tie on him to assist him in all just and lawful business. Sir George Hastings, and sir Richard Young, acknowledged the receiving and delivery of the purse; but said they knew not what was in it. Then a question was proposed, Whether there were any suit depending during those offerings, either in the Chancery or the Star-chamber; but there was no certain Evidence of it. Thus you see Corruption laid to the charge of a Judge too, a great judge; nay, to the great keeper of the king's conscience.

"Another point came in by-the-bye, shewing that some indirect means are sometimes open (I fear too often) to the courts of justice,

"It concerns no less a man than a divine, who is now a bishop,* but then called Dr.

* He was made bishop of Landaff 1619. His share in this transaction does not seem to have impeded his preferment. He was translated to St. David's 1627, and to Hereford 1635. He died 1636. Some of Howell's letters are addressed to him. The fact is, corruption was, as Bacon himself stiles it in his Submission of April 22, 1621, vitiū temporis: all the contemporary writers prove this. See also Luders's Considerations on the Law of High Treason in the article of Levying War, cap. iv." Mr. Luders indeed says, "Bacon was conscious that he did justice better and with more expedition than his contemporaries: it is remarkable that he was not accused of selling injustice. The sale of justice would have been sufficiently bad ('nulli vendemus justitiam,' Magna Charta VOL. II.

Field, Mr. Egerton and he being acquainted, and Mr. Egerton's mind being troubled with the ill success of his business, vented it to the divine, who (contrary to his profession) took upon him to broke for him, in such a manner as was never preceded by any. He made Egerton to acknowledge a recognizance of 10,000 marks, with a defeazance, that if my Lord Chancellor did decree it for him, 6,000 marks was to be distributed among those honourable persons that did solicit it for him: but if it did not go as they desired, he promised, in verbo sacerdotis, that he would deliver up the bonds.

"This appeared by Letters from the now reverend bishop, but then practical doctor. Mr. Johnson (a moral honest man) perceiving that Mr. Egerton, finding no relief, did intend to prefer a Petition against the Lord Chancellor by one Heales's means, took occasion to talk with Mr. Egerton; asking him, why he would prefer such a scandalous Petition against my lord; he would have him take the money out of the Petition, and then his cause, by the mediation and conference of some other judge with my lord, might be brought to a good end; and for money, if he had lent any, he might be satisfied again.

"Afterwards upon a Petition to the king by sir Rowland Egerton, there was a reference of this matter to the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Edward Egerton entered into a bond for ten thousand marks. He had treated with one Dr. Sharp, that if he would give 1100*l.* he should have his desire. We sent for Sharp, but he denied that he ever contracted with him. The desire of the committee was, to reform that which was amiss; and they thought fit to give as much expedition as might be, because so great a man's honour is soiled with it, and therefore do think meet that farther inquisition be made this afternoon, and when the truth of the matter is found, then to be sent to the lords. Thus I have faithfully related what hath passed, and with as much duty and respect, as I might to my Lord Chancellor; I desire it to be carried out of the house with a favourable construction."

Ordered, That this matter be further considered by the committee this afternoon. Then the house adjourned.

March 17. Sir Robert Phillips made Report from the Committee of the Abuses in the Courts of Justice, viz.

"We met on Thursday in the afternoon; the principal thing wherein I desired to be satisfied was, whether at the time of giving those Gifts to the Lord Chancellor there were any suit depending before him. In Awbrey's Case it appeared plainly there was: Something accidentally fell out in this Examination, and that is, a Declaration of sir George Hastings, who hath been struggling with himself betwixt gratitude and honesty; but public and private

goods meeting, he preferred the public, and owned, that he taking pity on Awbrey's suit, did give in a box of 100*l.* to the Lord Chancellor, in these terms, or the like, 'That it was 'to help Awbrey in his Cause.' Notwithstanding, not long after, a very prejudicial and murdering order was made against Awbrey in his cause: whereupon sir George Hastings moved my Lord Chancellor to rectify this order. My lord promised to do it, but did it not. The Order was put into the hands of one Churchill (one of the Registers in Chancery) by a servant of the Lord Chancellor's. There are Letters of Awbrey's to the Lord Chancellor touching this business. Now for Mr. Egerton's Case: As the matter was of more weight, the sum was of larger extent, for there was 400*l.* given them, and a suit then depending in the Star-Chamber; about which time sir Rowland Egerton did prefer a Petition to the king for a reference unto the Lord Chancellor: Whereupon my lord caused him to enter into a bond for 6000 marks to stand to his award. An award was afterwards made, which was refused by Mr. Edward Egerton; thereupon a suit by the Lord Chancellor's direction was commenced against him, and the bond of 6000 marks assigned over to sir Rowland Egerton. About this time Edward Egerton became acquainted with Dr. Field, and related his cause unto him; who pitying him, sent him to two worthy gentlemen, Mr. Dampont and sir John Butler (who is now dead); he makes known his case to them, and desires them to be a means to put off his cause from hearing, because his witnesses were not here. Whereupon Dampont wrote to the duke of Buckingham to have had his letter to the Lord Chancellor to stop it: But the duke said he would not write, because the matter was already decreed, and he would not receive it. Mr. Egerton was drawn into a bond of 10,000 marks for the payment of 6000: and Mr. Dampont being asked, what he and Dr. Field should have had of this money, he said, he did not remember what certain sum: but he said it was more than any cause could deserve in any court of justice.

"In Awbrey's Case this is to be said. That sir George Hastings being at Hackney, where he dwelt, was sent for by the Lord Chancellor, and accordingly he came to him and found him in bed, who bid him come near him, and willed the rest to depart the room; and then said unto him, 'Sir George, I am sure you love me, and I know that you are not willing that any thing done by you shall reflect any dishonour upon me. I hear, that one Awbrey pretends to petition against me; he is a man that you have some interest in; you may take him off if you please.'

"Sir George Hastings afterwards met with Awbrey, and asked him whether he intended any such thing, and desired to see it, to shew my Lord Chancellor: which sir George accordingly did, and desired my lord to do the poor man justice. My lord promised to do it, and bid him bring his counsel; and they did, but could have no remedy, so the Petition went on. Sir George Hastings, some time since, had conference with my Lord Chancellor: and he told him, 'He must lay it upon his lordship.' 'If you do, George,' said he, 'I must deny it upon my honour.' Thus you see the Relation of what hath passed.

"Now for our Proceedings in it; it is a cause of great weight, it concerns every man here: for if the fountains be muddy, what will the streams be? If the great dispenser of the king's conscience be corrupt, who can have any courage to plead before him? I will present one thing unto you, and then make a request. That which I move, is, that we present his business singly to the lords, and deliver it without exasperation; 1. Because there is but one precedent* for it, in the like case for a chancellor in a cause of corruption. 2. Because the party accused is a peer of the kingdom, sitting in the higher house, whom we cannot meddle with. 3. Because we have no power to give an oath. That which I request is, that those people which have been fettered with much calamity by these courses, may by petition to his majesty, or otherwise, have their cause revived and revised.

Sir Edward Sackville. This honourable lord stands but yet suspected, and I hold not those gentlemen that have testified against him competent witnesses. 1. Because they speak to discharge themselves. 2. Because if he be guilty, they were those that tempted him. But yet, if notwithstanding you resolve to send it up to the lords, let it be presented without any prejudicial opinion, to be weighed in the balance of their lordships judgments. And if they think fit to examine these witnesses, let them.

Sir George Hastings. This adds to my grief; but this is my resolution, I had rather perish with a just sentence here, than escape with a guilty conscience.

Some moved that sir George Hastings and sir Richard Young should be sequestered from parliament till the matter was ended; but there was nothing ordered therein.

Mr. Nevill. After some reluctance within me, I am resolved to speak what my conscience leads me unto. I speak for the good of my country, the honour of my king, and advancement of justice. Justice is the fountain, the king the head thereof, clear as the waters of Siloah, pure as the river of Damascus: but there is a derivative justice brought unto us by channels, those are often muddy and more bitter than the waters of Marah: Such waters flow abundantly in chancery. I will not touch upon the person of him that sits in court, for he is the dispenser of the king's conscience; but because some motions are made against the testimony of those gentlemen, I will say this, I think them fit to sit here, because they are neither delinquents nor accused. My lord means to deny it upon his honour: but I would not have that serve his turn, for he himself hath made the nobility swear in chancery. Therefore I would have their lordships informed what privileges they have lost. Next, I would have them note the luxuriant authority of that court, and how it is an inextricable labyrinth, wherein resideth such a monster as gormandizeth the liberty of all subjects whatsoever.

Mr. Recorder Finch. If we shall make but a presentation of this, we do in a sort accuse him, nay judge him: if the gentlemen be admitted to give testimony, before it shall condemn another it must agree with itself. First, I heard him say, he gave it as a present from himself: yet afterwards he saith, he told my Lord Chancellor he had it from Awbrey.—Again, Awbrey speaks not of any delivery of money himself to my Lord Chancellor. Then again it is urged, that a discontented suitor writ letters to my lord: the letters are rejected, not hearkened unto; what doth this but free him? In the other case, if Egerton, out of a desire to congratulate him at his coming to the seal, made my lord a present for his kindnesses and pains in former businesses, what wrong hath he done if he hath received a present? And though a suit were depending, yet who keeps a register in his heart of all causes? Nay, who can, among such a multitude? And for the 6000 marks, there is no colour to say that ever he was to have any part thereof. For taking away the privilege of the nobility in requiring an oath, he found the court possessed of it before he came there; so that we have no sufficient grounds to accuse so great a lord upon that account.—But if we shall present Articles to the lords, what do we (as I said before) but accuse him?

Sir Edward Coke. It is objected, that we have but one single witness; therefore no sufficient proof. I answer, That in the 37th of Eliz. in a complaint against Soldier-Sellers, for that having warrant to take up soldiers for the wars, if they pressed a rich man's son they would discharge him for money, there was no more than singularis testis in one matter; but though they were single witnesses in several matters, yet agreeing in one and the same third person, it was held sufficient to prove a work of darkness. For in such works it is a marvel there are any witnesses.—But some object that these men are culpable; and therefore no competent witnesses. I answer, They came not to accuse, but were interrogated.—If I be interrogated, I had rather speak truth than respect any man; and you will make Bribery to be unpunished, if he that carrieth the Bribe shall not be a witness. In this, one witness is sufficient; he that accuseth himself by accusing another, is more than three witnesses: and this was wrought out of them.

Ordered, That the Complaint of Awbrey and Egerton against the Lord Chancellor and the bishop for Corruption, for the 100*l.* and 400*l.* and the recognizance, should be drawn up by sir Robert Phillips, sir Edward Coke, Mr. Noy, and sir Dudley Diggs; and that the same be related to the lords without prejudice of opinion at a conference; and that a Message be sent to the lords for this purpose on Monday next. Adjourned, &c.

March 19.

A Message was sent to the lords by sir Robert Phillips, to desire a Conference touching the Lord Chancellor and the bishop of Landaff, being petitioned against by Awbrey and Egerton.

Sir Robert Phillips reports that the lords had agreed to a Conference.

Mr. Secretary Calvert brings a Message from the king, "That this parliament hath sat a long time, and Easter is near come, and thinks it is fit there should be a cessation for a time; yet the king will appoint no time, but leaves it to yourselves. But for the beginning again, he thinketh the 10th of April a fit time, but will appoint none; only he would have you take care that there be no impediment in the Subsidies.—The king also took notice of the Complaints against the Lord Chancellor, for which he was sorry, for it hath always been his care to have placed the best; but no man can prevent such accidents; but his comfort was, that the house was careful to preserve his honour. And his majesty thought not fit to have the affair hang long in suspense; therefore would not have any thing to hinder it. But for the furtherance thereof, he proposed a Commission of six of the higher house, and twelve of the lower house, to examine it upon oath. This proposition if we liked well, he would send the like to the lords, and this he thought might be done during this Cessation: and though he hoped the Chancellor was free, yet if he should be found guilty, he doubted not but you would do him justice."

Sir Edward Coke said, We should take heed the Commission do not hinder the manner of our parliamentary proceedings.

The Answer returned to the King was, To render him thanks for the first Part of his gracious Message. And for the second, we desired that the like Message may be sent to the lords; for there being so great a concurrence betwixt us, we may have conference with them about it. And then adjourned, &c.

March 20.

Sir Edward Giles made a motion that one Churchill should be called in. Whereupon there was a Petition of one Montacute, Wood, &c. against the Lord Chancellor for taking 300*l.* of the lady Wharton, and making orders, &c. which was read. Churchill and Keeling were said to be Witnesses, and a committee was appointed to examine them.

Sir Robert Phillips reports from the Conference, that according to the commandment of this house he had delivered those Heads which were agreed on at the Conference yesterday; excusing himself if he had failed in any point. That the lords accepted it with a great deal of affection, as sensible of the wrongs done to the Commonwealth; and returned Answer by the Lord Treasurer; First, by way of Question, Whether we would not reduce them into writing. Resolved No, for no cause; this only consisting of two or three points, clear and plain; and as for the Letters and other things which the lords desired, we would acquaint the house, and doubted not but it would be yielded.

The lords further returned for Answer, That they would proceed in this matter with care, diligence and expedition.

A Message from the lords to signify, that they have taken into consideration the last Conference, and shall need the testimony of two members of this house; and therefore desire, that voluntarily, and without ordering, as private persons, they make declaration upon Oath, and the like for others if occasion were.

The Answer returned was, That the gentlemen would attend voluntarily as private gentlemen, and upon private notice be examined.

Sir Robert Phillips reports from the committee appointed to examine Churchil; from which particular a general may be extracted, conducing to the discovery of Corruption in the Lord Chancellor.

"The lady Wharton having a Cause depending in-chancery, many orders were made in it. Amongst the rest, there was an Order made for the dismission of the Bill, by the consent of the counsel on both sides; which my lady disliking, took Churchil the Register into her coach, and carried him to my Lord Chancellor's, and so wrought that he was willed not to enter the last Order; so that my lady was left at liberty to prosecute it in chancery, brought it to a hearing, and at length got a Decree.

"Keeling being examined, saith, That near about the time of passing this Decree, my lady took an hundred pound (he saw it), and she made him set down the words and style which he should use in the delivery of it. Then she goes to York-house, and delivered it to my Lord Chancellor, as she told him. She carried it in a purse. My lord asked her, 'What she had in her hand?' She replied, 'A purse of my own making,' and presented it to him; who took it and said, 'What lord could refuse a purse of so fair a lady's working?'

"After this my lord made a Decree for her, but it was not perfected; but 200*l.* more being given (one Gardiner being present) her Decree had life. But after the giving of the 100*l.* because she had not 200*l.* ready in money, one Shute dealt with her to convey the land to my Lord Chancellor and his heirs, reserving an estate to herself for life; but she knowing no reason to disinherit her own children, asked Keeling her man what he thought of it; he (like an honest servant) was against it.

"Shute knowing this, sets upon Keeling, and brings him to be willing my lady should do it, with power of revocation upon the payment of 200*l.* but that not being liked, they made a shift to pay 200*l.* in a reasonable time. Keeling lets fall some speeches, as if he had left York-house for the Corruption which was there, which he himself knew in part. Gardiner, Keeling's man, confirmed the payment of the 300*l.* for the Decree, viz. 100*l.* before, and 200*l.* after. This purchased Decree being lately damned again by my Lord Chancellor, was the cause of this Complaint.

"Keeling saith, 'Sir John Trevor did present my Lord Chancellor with 100*l.* by the hands of sir Richard Young, for a final end to this cause.'

"Sir Rd. Young answered, 'That when he attended my Lord Chancellor, sir John Trevor's man brought a cabinet and a letter to my Lord Chancellor, and intreated me to deliver it, which I did openly; and this was openly done, and this was all I knew of it.'

Sir Edward Coke. Strange to me that this money should be thus openly delivered, and that one Gardiner should be present at the payment of the 200*l.*

Ordered, That sir Robert Phillips do deliver to the lords this afternoon the bishop of Landaff and Awbrey's Letters, and all other Writings that he hath. And then adjourned, &c.

March 21.

Sir Robert Phillips reports from the committee appointed to examine Keeling and Churchil, who informed many Corruptions against the Lord Chancellor.

"1. In the cause betwixt Hull and Holeman, Hull gave or lent my lord 1000*l.* since the suit began. 2. In the cause between Wroth and Manwaring, there were 100 pieces given, of which Hunt had 20*l.* 3. Hoddy gave a jewel which was thought to be worth 500*l.* but he himself said it was a trifle of a hundred or two hundred pound price: it was presented to the Lord Chancellor by sir Thomas Peryn and sir Henry Holmes. 4. In the cause between Peacock and Reynell, there was much money given on both sides. 5. In the cause of Barker and Bill, Barker said he was 800*l.* out in gifts since this suit began. 6. In the cause between Smithwick and Welsh, Smithwick gave 300*l.* yet my lord decreed it against him; so he had his money again by piecemeal.—In this and other causes, my lord would decree part; and when he wanted more money he would send for more, and then decree another part. In most causes my lord's servants have undertaken one side or another; insomuch as it was usual for counsel, when their clients came unto them, to ask what friend they had at York-house."

Mr. Mewtis. Touching the persons that inform, I would intreat this honourable house to consider that Keeling is a common solicitor (to say no more of him); Churchil a guilty Register by his own confession: I know that fear of punishment, and hopes of lessening it, may make them to say much, yea more than is true. For my own part, I must say I have been an observer of my lord's proceedings; I know he hath sown the good seed of justice, and I hope that it will prove that the envious man hath sown those tares. I humbly desire that these Generals may not be sent up to the lords, unless these men will testify them in particular.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the lords by sir Robert Phillips, to relate the Case of the lady Wharton, and the informations of Churchil.

Sir Robert Phillips reports from the lords, That they acknowledged the great care of this house in these important businesses; return thanks for the correspondence of this house with them, and assure the like from them for ever to this house. In these and all other things they will advise, and return answer as soon as possible.—And then adjourned, &c.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

On Monday the 19th day of March 1620, in the afternoon, the Commons had a Conference with the Lords: which Conference was reported the next day by the Lord-Treasurer; That it was the desire of the commons to inform their lordships of the great Abuses of the Courts of Justice, the Information whereof was divided into these three parts. 1. The Persons accused. 2. The Matters objected against them. 3. The Proofs.

The Persons are the Lord Chancellor of England, and the now bishop of Landaff, being then no bishop, but Dr. Field. The incomparable good parts of the Lord Chancellor were highly commended, the place he holds magnified, from whence bounty, justice and mercy were to be distributed to the subjects, with which he was solely trusted; whither all great causes were drawn, and from whence no appeal lay for any injustice or wrong done, save to the parliament.

That the Lord Chancellor was accused of great Bribery and Corruption* committed by him in this eminent place; whereof two cases were alledged. The one concerning Christopher Awbrey, and the other concerning Edward Egerton.

1. In the cause depending in the Chancery between the said Awbrey and sir William Bronker, Awbrey feeling some hard measure, was advised to give the Lord Chancellor 100*l.* the which he delivered to his counsel, sir George Hastings, and he to the Lord Chancellor: this business proceeding slowly notwithstanding, Awbrey did write divers letters, and delivered them to the Lord Chancellor, to which he never obtained any answer from his lordship; but at last delivering another letter, his lordship answered, 'If he importuned him, he would lay him by the heels.'—The Proofs of this Accusation are five. 1. Sir George Hastings relating it long since unto sir Charles Montague. 2. The Lord Chancellor fearing this would be complained of, desired silence of sir George Hastings. 3. Sir George Hastings' testimony thereof, which was not voluntary, but urged. 4. The Lord Chancellor desired sir George Hastings to bring the party Awbrey unto him, and promised redress of the wrongs done him. 5. That the Lord Chancellor said unto sir George Hastings if he should affirm the giving of this 100*l.* his lordship would and must deny it upon his honour.

2. The case of sir Edward Egerton is this: There being divers suits between Edward Egerton and sir Rowland Egerton in the chancery, Edward Egerton presented his lordship, a little after he was Lord Keeper, with a bason and ewer of the value of 50*l.* and upwards; and afterwards he delivered unto sir George Hastings, and sir Richard Young, 400*l.* in gold.

Sir Rd. Young presented it to his lordship, who took it, and poised it, and said it was too much; and returned answer, that Mr. Egerton had not only enriched him, but had laid a tye upon his lordship to do him favour in all his just causes.

The Proofs for this are the testimony of sir George Hastings, and the testimony of Merfill a scrivener thus far, that he took up 700*l.* for Mr. Egerton; Mr. Egerton then telling him that a great part of it was to be given to the Lord Chancellor, and that Mr. Egerton afterwards told him that the 400*l.* in gold was given to the Lord Chancellor.

At this Conference was farther declared somewhat relating to a Bishop, who was touched in this business upon the bye, whose function was much honoured, but his person touched herein. The business depending between the Egertons being ordered against Edward Egerton, he procured a new reference thereof from the king to the Lord Chancellor; his lordship demanded the parties to be bound in 6000 marks to stand to his lordship's award; they having entered into that bond, his lordship awarded the matter against Edward Egerton for sir Rowland Egerton; but Edward Egerton refusing to stand to the said award, a new Bill was exhibited in the Chancery, and thereupon his lordship ordered that this bond of 6000 marks should be assigned unto sir Rowland Egerton, and he to put the same in suit in his lordship's name.

The bishop of Landaff, as a friend to Mr. Edward Egerton, adviseth with Randolph Dampart, [otherwise Davenport] and Butler (which Butler is now dead) that they would procure a stay of the decree of that award, and procure a new hearing; upon which it was agreed, that the said 6000 marks should be given for this by Edward Egerton, and shared amongst them, and amongst certain noble persons. A recognizance of 10,000 marks was required from Mr. Egerton to the bishop for the performance hereof; the bishop his share of this 6,000 marks was so great, as no court of justice would allow.

To prove this they produce Letters of the bishop, naming the sum, and setting down a course how these 6000 marks might be raised, viz. the land in question to be decreed for Mr. Egerton, and out of that the money to be levied; and if this were not effected, then the bishop, 'in verbo sacerdotis,' promised to deliver up this recognizance to be cancelled; the new recognizance is sealed accordingly, and Randolph Dampont rides to court, and moved the Lord Admiral [duke of Buckingham,] for his lordship's letter to the Lord Chancellor herein: but his lordship denied to meddle in a cause depending in suit.

Then the said Randolph Dampont assayed to get the king's letter, but failed therein also; so that the good they intended to Mr. Egerton was not effected, and yet the bishop, though required, refused to deliver up the said Recognizance, until Mr. Egerton threatened to complain thereof unto the king.

The Lord Treasurer shewed also, that the Commons do purpose, that if any more of this kind happen to be complained of before them, they will present the same to your lordships, wherein they shall follow the antient precedents, which shew that great persons have been accused for the like in parliament.—They humbly desire, that forasmuch as this concerneth a person of so great eminency, it may not depend long before your lordships, that the examination of the Proofs may be expedited, and if he be found Guilty, then to be punished; if not Guilty, the now Accusers to be punished. This being reported, the Lord Admiral presented to the house a Letter written unto their lordships; the tenor whereof follows:

Lord Bacon's LETTER to the House of Lords.

My very good lords; I humbly pray your lordships all to make a favourable and true construction of my absence; it is no feigning nor fainting, but sickness both of my heart, and of my back, though joined with that comfort of mind, that persuades me, that I am not far from heaven, whereof I feel the first fruits: and because whether I live or die, I would be glad to preserve my honour and fame as far as I am worthy: hearing that some Complaints of base Bribery are coming before your lordships, my Requests unto your lordships are,—First, That you will maintain me in your good opinion without prejudice, until my cause be heard.—Secondly, That in regard I have sequestered my mind at this time in great part from worldly things, thinking of my Accompt and Answer in a higher court, your lordships would give me convenient time, according to the course of other courts, to advise with my counsel, and to make my Answer; wherein nevertheless my counsel's part will be the least, for I shall not by the grace of God trick up an innocency with cavillations, but plainly and ingeniously, as your lordships know my manner is, declare what I know or remember.—Thirdly, That according to the course of justice, I may be allowed to except to the Witnesses brought against me, and to move questions to your lordships for their cross Examination, and likewise to produce my own witnesses for discovery of the truth.—And lastly, That if there come any more Petitions of like nature, that your lordships would be pleased not to take any prejudice or apprehension of any number or muster of them, especially against a Judge, that makes two thousand Orders and Decrees in a year; not to speak of the courses that have been taken for hunting out Complaints against me; but that I may answer them according to the rules of justice severally and respectively. These requests I hope appear to your lordships no other than just; and so thinking myself happy to have so noble peers, and reverend prelates to discern of my cause, and desiring no privilege of greatness for subterfuge of guiltiness, but meaning, as I said, to declare fairly and plainly with your lordships, and to put myself upon your honours and favours, I pray God to bless your councils, and your persons; and rest your lordships humblest servant, FRA. ST. ALBAN.

March 19, 1620.

Upon which Letter, Answer was sent from the lords unto the said Lord Chancellor on the said 20th of March, viz. "That the lords received his lordship's Letter delivered unto them by the Lord Admiral: They intend to proceed in his Cause now before their lordships, according to the right rules of justice; and they shall be glad, if his lordship shall clear his honour therein; to which end they pray his lordship to provide for his just Defence."

Farther COMPLAINTS against the LORD CHANCELLOR.

And afterwards on the 21st of March, the commons sent a Message unto the lords concerning their further Complaint against the said Lord Chancellor; which consisted of these four points, viz.

"The first in Chancery being between the lady Wharton plaintiff, and Wood and others defendants, upon cross-bills; the Lord Chancellor upon hearing wholly dismissed them, but upon entry of the Order, the cross-bill against the lady Wharton was only dismissed, and afterwards for a bribe of 300*l.* given by the lady Wharton to the Lord Chancellor, his lordship decreed the Cause further; and then hearing that Wood and the other defendants complained thereof to the house of commons, his lordship sent for them, and damned that Decree as unduly gotten: and when the lady Wharton began to complain thereof, his lordship sent for her also, and promised her redress; saying, the Decree is not yet entered.

"Secondly, In a suit between Hall plaintiff, and Holman defendant, Holman deferring his Answer was committed to the Fleet, where he lay twenty weeks; and petitioning to be delivered, was answered by some about the Lord Chancellor, the Bill shall be decreed against him pro confesso, unless he would enter into 2,000*l.* bond to stand to the Lord Chancellor's Order; which he refusing, his liberty cost him one way or other 1,000*l.* Holman being freed out of the Fleet, Hall petitioned to the Lord Chancellor, and Holman finding his cause to go hard with him on his side, complained to the commons; whereupon the Lord Chancellor sent for him, and to pacify him, told him, 'He should have what Order he would himself.'

"Thirdly, In the Cause between Smithwick and Welsh, the matter in question being for Accompts, it was referred to certain merchants, who certified in the behalf of Smithwick; yet Smithwick to obtain a Decree, was told by one Mr. Burrough, one near to the Lord Chancellor, that it must cost him 200*l.* which he paid to Mr. Burrough or Mr. Hunt to the use of the Lord Chancellor, and yet the Lord Chancellor decreed but one part of the certificate, whereupon he treats again with Mr. Burrough, who demanded another 100*l.* which Smithwick also paid to the use of the Lord Chancellor. Then his lordship referred the Accompts again to the same merchants; who certified it again for Smithwick; yet his lordship decreed the second part of the certificate against Smithwick, and the first part, which was formerly decreed for him, his lordship made doubtful. Smithwick petitioned to the Lord Chancellor for his money again, and Smithwick had all his money again, save 20*l.* which was kept back by Hunt for a year."

The Lord Chief Justice (sir James Ley) also delivered three Petitions, which his lordship received yesterday from the commons, the first by the lady Wharton, the second by Wood and others, and the third by Smithwick.

The fourth part of the Message consists only of Instructions delivered unto the commons by one Churchill, a register, concerning divers Bribes and Abuses in the Chancery, which the commons desire may be examined.

The lords in the mean time proceeded to the Examination of the Complaints, and took divers Examinations of Witnesses in the house, and appointed a select Committee of themselves, to take Examination of Witnesses to the Briberies and Corruptions of the Lord Chancellor; which being ended and collected, were ordered to be transcribed with the proofs, and were as follow:

April 24, the Prince his highness signified unto their lordships, that the said Lord Chancellor had sent a Submission unto their lordships, which was presently read in hac verba:

The Lord-Chancellor's Submission.

'May it please your lordships; I shall humbly crave at your lordships hands a benign interpretation of that, which I shall now write; for words, that come from wasted spirits, and an oppressed mind, are more safe in being deposited in a noble construction, than in being circled with any reserved caution.—This being moved, and as I hope obtained in the nature of a Protection for all that I shall say, I shall now make into the rest of that, wherewith I shall at this time trouble your lordships, a very strange entrance: for in the midst of a state of as great affliction, as I think a mortal man can endure, (honour being above life) I shall begin with the professing of gladness in some things.—The first is, that hereafter the greatness of a Judge or Magistrate shall be no sanctuary or protection of guiltiness, which (in few words) is the beginning of a Golden World.—The next is, that after this example, it is like that Judges will fly from any thing that is in the likeness of Corruption (though it were at a great distance) as from a serpent; which tendeth to the purging of the Courts of Justice, and the reducing them to their true honour and splendor. And in these two points, God is my witness, that, though it be my fortune to be the anvil whereupon these good effects are beaten and wrought, I take no small comfort.—But to pass from the motions of my heart, wherof God is only judge, to the merits of my Cause, wherof your lordships are Judges unto God, and his lieutenant; I do understand there hath been heretofore expected from me some Justification, and therefore I have chosen one only Justification instead of all other, one of the justifications of Job: for after the clear Submission and Confession, which I shall now make unto your lordships, I hope I may say and justify with Job in these words, 'I have not hid my sin, as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my bosom;' (Job, c. 31. verse 33.) This is the only Justification, which I will use: it resteth therefore, that without fig-leaves I do ingenuously confess and acknowledge, that having understood the particulars of the Charge, not formally from the house, but enough to inform my conscience and memory, I find matter sufficient and full both to move me to desert the Defence, and to move your lordships to condemn and censure me.—Neither will I trouble your lordships by singling those Particulars, which I think may easiest be answered, 'Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?' Neither will I prompt your lordships to observe upon the Proofs, where they come not home, or the scruples touching the credit of the Witnesses; neither will I represent to your lordships how far a Defence might in divers things extenuate the offence in respect of the time or manner of the Gift, or the like circumstances; but only leave those things to spring out of your own noble thoughts and observations of the Evidence and Examinations themselves, and charitably to wind about the particulars of the Charge here and there, as God shall put you in mind, and so submit myself wholly to your pity and grace.—And now that I have spoken to your lordships as Judges, I shall say a few words to you as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending my cause to your noble minds and magnanimous affections.—Your lordships are no simple Judges, but parliamentary Judges; you have a farther extent of arbitrary power, than other Judges; and if your lordships be not tied by the ordinary course of courts or precedents in points of strictness and severity, much less are you in points of mercy and mitigation.—And yet if any thing which I shall move, might be contrary to your honourable and worthy end to introduce a reformation, I should not seek it; but herein I beseech you give me leave to tell your lordships a Story. Titus Manlius took his son's life for giving battle against the prohibition of his general: not many years after the like severity was pursued by Papirius Cursor the Dictator against Quintus Maximus; who, being upon the point to be sentenced, by the intercession of some principal persons of the senate, was spared; whereupon Livy makes this grave and gracious observation: 'Neque minus firmata est disciplina militaris periculo Quinti Maximi, quam miserabili supplicio Titi Manlii.' 'The discipline of war was no less established by the questioning of Quintus Maximus, than by the punishing of Titus Manlius.' And the same reason is of the Reformation of Justice; for the questioning men of eminent place hath the same terror, though not the same rigour, with the punishment.—But my Case stayeth not there; for my humble desire is, that his majesty would take the Seal into his hands, which is a great downfall, and may serve, I hope, in itself for an expiation of my faults.—Therefore if mercy and mitigation be in your powers, and do no way cross your noble ends, why should I not hope of your lordships favours and commiseration? Your lordships will be pleased to behold your chief pattern, the king our sovereign, of most incomparable clemency, and whose heart is inscrutable for wisdom and goodness: your lordships will remember that there sat not these 200 years before a Prince in your house, and never such a prince, whose presence deserves to be made memorable by records and acts mixt of mercy and justice. Yourselves, either nobles (and compassion ever beats in the veins of noble blood) or reverend prelates, who are the servants of him that would not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smouldering flax; you all sit upon an high stage, and therefore cannot but be more sensible of the changes of the world, and of the fall of any of high place. Neither will your lordships forget, that there are vitia temporis as well as vitia hominis;* and that the beginning of reformations hath the contrary power of the Pool of Bethesda; for that had strength to cure only him that is first cast in, and this hath strength to hurt him only that is first cast in: and for my part, I wish it may stay there, and go no further. Lastly, I assure myself your lordships have a noble feeling of me as a member of your own body; and one thing there was, that in this very session had some taste of your loving affections, which I hope was not a lightning before death, but rather a spark of that grace, which now in conclusion will more appear. And therefore my humble suit unto your lordships is, that my penitent Submission may be my Sentence, and the loss of the Seal my Punishment, and that your lordships will spare my farther Sentence: But recommend me to his majesty's grace and pardon for all that is past. God's holy spirit be among you! Your lordships humble servant and supplicant,

FRAN. ST. ALBANS, Canc.

* The judicial corruption of those times may be inferred from my lord Bacon's address to Serjeant Hutton upon becoming a judge of the Common Pleas, wherein Bacon particularly cautions the new judge to beware of corruption: "That your hands and the hands of your hands (I mean those about you) be clean and uncorrupt from gifts, from meddling in titles, and from serving of turns, be they great ones, or small ones." See Luders's chapter "on the station and character of the Judges in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries." Mr. Barrington, in his Observations on Magna Charta, has collected some particulars of Judicial Corruption in different periods.

The Lords having considered of this Submission, and heard the Collections of Corruptions charged upon the said Lord Chancellor, and the Proofs thereof read, they sent a Copy of the same without the Proofs unto the Lord Chancellor by Mr. Baron Denham, and Mr. Attorney General, (sir Thomas Coventry) with this Message from their lordships, viz. "That the Lord Chancellor's Confession is not fully set down by his lordship in the said Submission, for three causes. 1. His lordship confesseth not any particular Bribe or Corruption. 2. Nor sheweth how his lordship heard the Charge thereof. 3. The Confession, such as it is, is afterwards extenuated in the same Submission. And therefore the Lords have sent him a particular of the Charge, and do expect his Answer to the same with all convenient expedition."

Unto which Message the Lord Chancellor answered, That he would return the Lords an Answer with speed. And on the 25th of April, the Lords considered of the Lord Chancellor's said Answer sent unto their Message yesterday, and sent a second Message unto his lordship to this effect, by the said Mr. Baron Denham, and Mr. Attorney General, viz. "The Lords having received a doubtful Answer unto the Message their Lordships sent him yesterday, therefore they now send to him again to know of his lordship directly, and presently, whether his lordship will make his Confession, or stand upon his Defence."

Answer returned by the said Messengers, viz. "The Lord Chancellor will make no manner of Defence to the Charge, but meaneth to acknowledge Corruption, and to make a particular Confession to every point, and after that an humble Submission; but humbly craves liberty, that where the Charge is more full than he finds the truth of the fact, he may make Declaration of the truth in such particulars, the Charge being brief, and containing not all circumstances."

The Lords sent the same Messengers back again to the Lord Chancellor, to let him know, that their lordships have granted him time until Monday next the 30th of April, by ten in the morning, to send such Confession and Submission as his lordship intends to make.

On which Monday the Lord Chancellor sent the same accordingly, which follows in hæc verba, viz.

To the right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in the High Court of Parliament assembled:

The humble Confession and Submission of Me the Lord Chancellor.

"Upon advised consideration of the Charge, descending into my own conscience, and calling my memory to account so far as I am able, I do plainly and ingenuously confess, that I am guilty of Corruption, and do renounce all Defence, and put myself upon the grace and mercy of your lordships.—The Particulars I confess and declare to be as followeth:

To the first Article of the Charge, viz. 'In VOL. II.

'the Cause between sir Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, the Lord Chancellor received 300*l.* on the part of sir Rowland Egerton, before he had decreed the Cause:—I do confess and declare, that upon a reference from his majesty of all suits and controversies between sir Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, both parties submitted themselves to my Award by recognizances reciprocal in 10,000 marks a-piece. Thereupon, after divers hearings, I made my Award, with the advice and consent of my lord Hobart. The Award was perfected and published to the parties, which was in February. Then some days after, the 300*l.* mentioned in the Charge, were delivered unto me. Afterwards Mr. Edward Egerton flew off from the Award. Then in Midsummer Term following a suit was begun in Chancery by sir Rowland, to have the Award confirmed: and upon that suit was the Decree made, mentioned in the Article.

The second Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the same Cause he received from Edward Egerton 400*l.*—I confess and declare, that soon after my first coming to the Seal, being a time when I was presented by many, the 400*l.* mentioned in the said Charge, was delivered unto me in a purse, and as I now call to mind, from Mr. Edward Egerton; but, as far as I can remember, it was expressed by them that brought it, to be for favours past, and not in respect of favours to come.

The third Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause between Hody and Hody, he received a dozen of buttons of the value of 50*l.* about a fortnight after the Cause was ended:—I confess and declare, that as it is laid in the Charge about a fortnight after the Cause was ended, it being a suit for a great inheritance, there were gold buttons, about the value of 50*l.* as is mentioned in the Charge, presented unto me, as I remember, by sir Thomas Perrot, and the party himself.

To the fourth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In a Cause between the lady Wharton and the coheirs of sir Francis Willoughby, he received of the lady Wharton 310*l.*—I confess and declare, that I did receive of the lady Wharton, at two several times, as I remember, in gold 200*l.* and 100 pieces, and this was certainly pendente lite: But yet I have a vehement suspicion, that there was some shuffling between Mr. Shute and the Register, in entering some orders, which afterwards I did distaste.

To the fifth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In sir Thomas Monk's Cause, he received from sir Thomas Monk, by the hands of sir Henry Holmes, 110*l.* but this was three quarters of a year after the suit was ended:—I confess it to be true that I received 100 pieces, but it was long after the suit ended, as is contained in the Charge.

To the sixth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause between sir John Trevor and Ascue, he received on the part of sir John Trevor 100*l.*—I confess and declare, that I received at New-Year's-Tide 100*l.* from sir John Trevor; and because it came as a New-Year's Gift, I neglected to inquire, whether the Cause was ended or depending: but since I find that though the Cause was then dismissed to a trial at law, yet the equity was reserved, so as it was in that kind pendente lite.

To the seventh Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause between Holman and Young, he received of Young 100*l.* after the Decree made for him:—I confess and declare, that as I remember, a good while after the cause ended, I received 100*l.* either by Mr. Toby Mathew or from Young himself: but whereas I have understood, that there was some money given by Holman to my servant Hatcher, to that certainty I was never made privy.

To the eighth Article of the Charge, 'In the Cause between Fisher and Wrenham, the Lord Chancellor, after the Decree passed, received a suit of hangings worth 160*l.* and better, which Fisher gave him by advice of Mr. Shute:—I confess and declare, that some time after the Decree passed, I being at that time upon remove to York-house, I did receive a suit of hangings of the value, I think, mentioned in the Charge, by Mr. Shute, as from sir Edward Fisher, towards the furnishing of my house, as some others, that were no ways suitors, did present me with the like about that time.

To the ninth Article of the Charge, 'In the Cause between Kenneday and Vanlore, he received a rich cabinet from Kenneday, appraised at 800*l.*:—I confess and declare, that such a cabinet was brought to my house, though nothing near half the value; and that I said to him that brought it, that I came to view it, and not to receive it, and gave commandment that it should be carried back, and was offended when I heard it was not. And about a year and an half after, as I remember, sir John Kenneday having all that time refused to take it away, as I am told by my servants; I was petitioned by one Pinkney, that it might be delivered to him, for that he stood engaged for the money that sir John Kenneday paid for it; and thereupon sir John Kenneday wrote a letter to my servant Sherborne, with his own hand, desiring I would not do him that disgrace as to return that gift back, much less to put it into a wrong hand: and so it remains yet ready to be returned to whom your lordships shall appoint.

To the tenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'He borrowed of Vanlore 1000*l.* upon his own bond at one time, and the like sum at another time upon his lordship's own bill, subscribed by Mr. Hunt his man:—I confess and declare, that I borrowed the money in the article set down; and that this is a true debt, and I remember well, that I wrote a letter from Kew about a twelvemonth since to a friend about the king, wherein I desired, that whereas I owed Peter Vanlore 2,000*l.* his majesty would be pleased to grant me so much out of his fine set upon me in the Star-chamber.

To the eleventh Article of the Charge, viz. 'He received of Richard Scott 200*l.* after his Cause was decreed, but upon a precedent promise; all which was transacted by Mr. Shute:—I confess and declare, that some fortnight after, as I remember, that the Decree passed, I received 200*l.* as from Mr. Scott, by Mr. Shute, as upon some precedent promise or transaction by Mr. Shute: Certain I am I knew of none.

To the twelfth Article of the Charge, viz. 'He received in the same Cause on the part of sir John Lentall 100*l.*:—I confess and declare, that some month after, as I remember, that the Decree passed, I received 100*l.* by my servant Sherborne, as from sir John Lentall, who was not the adverse party to Scott, but a third person relieved by the same Decree in the suit of one power.

To the thirteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'He received of Mr. Worth 100*l.* in respect of the Cause between him and sir Arthur Manwaring:—I confess and declare, that this Cause being a Cause for inheritance of good value, was ended by my arbitrement and consent of parties, and so a Decree passed of course; and some month after the cause was ended, the 100*l.* mentioned in the said article, was delivered to me by my servant Hunt.

To the fourteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'He received of sir Ralph Hansbye, having a Cause depending before him, 500*l.*:—I confess and declare, that there were two Decrees, one, as I remember, for the inheritance, and the other for the goods and chatties, but all upon one bill: and some good time after the first Decree, and before the second, the said 500*l.* was delivered unto me by Mr. Toby Mathew; so as I cannot deny but it was upon the matter pendente lite.

To the fifteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'William Compton being to have an extent for a debt of 1200*l.* the Lord Chancellor staid it, and wrote his letter; upon which part of the debt was paid presently, and part at a future day. The Lord Chancellor hereupon sends to borrow 500*l.* and because Compton was to pay 400*l.* to one Huxley, his lordship requires Huxley to forbear six months, and hereupon obtains the money from Compton. The money being unpaid, suit grows between Huxley and Compton in Chancery, where his lordship decrees Compton to pay Huxley the debt, with damage and costs, when it was in his own hands:—I do declare, that in my conscience the stay of the extent was just, being an extremity against a nobleman, by whom Compton could be no loser. The money was plainly borrowed of Compton upon bond with interest, and the message to Huxley was only to intreat him to give Compton a longer day, and in no sort to make me debtor or responsible to Huxley; and therefore, though I was not ready to pay Compton his money, as I would have been glad to have done, save only 100*l.* which is paid, I could not deny justice to Huxley in as ample manner as if nothing had been between Compton and me: But if Compton hath been damnified in my respect, I am to consider it to Compton.

To the sixteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause between sir William Bronker and Awbrey, the Lord Chancellor received from Awbrey 100*l.*':—I do confess and declare, that the money was given and received; but the manner of it I leave to the witnesses.

To the seventeenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the lord Montague's cause he received from the lord Montague 6 or 700*l.* and more was to be paid at the ending of the cause:—I confess and declare, there was money given, and as I remember, to Mr. Bevis Thelwall, to the sum mentioned in the article, after the cause was decreed; but I cannot say it was ended, for there have been many orders since caused by sir Francis Inglesfield's contempts: and I do remember, that when Thelwall brought the money, he said, that my lord would be yet farther thankful if he could once get his quiet. To which speech I gave little regard.

To the eighteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause of Mr. Dunch, he received from Mr. Dunch 200*l.*':—I confess and declare, that it was delivered by Mr. Thelwall to Hatcher my servant, for me, as I think some time after the Decree; but I cannot precisely inform myself of the time.

To the nineteenth Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause between Reynell and Peacock, he received from Reynell 200*l.* and a diamond-ring worth 5 or 600*l.*':—I confess and declare, that at my first coming to the seal, when I was at Whitehall, my servant Hunt delivered me 200*l.* from sir George Reynell, my near ally, to be bestowed upon furniture of my house; adding farther, that he had received divers former favours from me: And this was, as I verily think, before any suit began. The ring was received certainly pendente lite: and though it were at New-Years-tide, it was too great a value for a new year's gift, though, as I take it, nothing near the value mentioned in the Article.

To the twentieth Article of the Charge, viz. 'That he took of Peacocke 100*l.* without interest, security, or time of payment:—I confess and declare, that I received of Mr. Peacocke 100*l.* at Dorset-house, at my first coming to the seal, as a present; at which time no suit was begun: and at the summer after I sent my then servant Lister to Mr. Rolfe, my good friend and neighbour, at St. Albans, to use his means with Mr. Peacocke (who was accounted a monied man) for the borrowing of 500*l.* and after by my servant Hatcher, for borrowing of 500 more; which Mr. Rolfe procured, and told me at both times it should be without interest, script, or note, and that I should take my own time for payment of it.

To the twenty-first Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the cause between Smithwick and Welsh, he received from Smithwick 200*l.* which was repaid:—I confess and declare, that my servant Hunt did upon his account, being my receiver of the fines upon original writs, charge himself with 200*l.* formerly received of Smithwick, which after that I had understood the nature of it, I ordered him to repay, and to defalk it out of his accounts.

To the twenty-second Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the Cause of sir Henry Ruswell he received money from Ruswell, but it is not certain how much:—I confess and declare, that I received money from my servant Hunt, as from Mr. Ruswell, in a purse: And whereas the sum in the Article is indefinite, I confess it to be 3 or 400*l.* and it was about a month after the cause was decreed: in which decree I was assisted by two of the judges.

To the twenty-third Article of the Charge, viz. 'In the cause of Mr. Barker, the Lord Chancellor received from Barker 700*l.*': I confess and declare, that the sum mentioned in the Article was received from Mr. Barker some time after the decree passed.

To the 24th, 25th, and 26th Articles of the Charge, viz. the 24th; 'There being a reference from his majesty to his lordship of a business between the grocers and the apothecaries, the Lord Chancellor received of the grocers 200*l.*' The 25th Article; 'In the same cause he received of the apothecaries, that stood with the grocers, a taster of gold, worth between 4 or 500*l.* and a present of ambergrease.' And the 26th Article; 'He received of a new company of apothecaries, that stood against the grocers, 100*l.*' To these I confess and declare, That the several sums from the three parties were received: and for that it was no judicial business, but a concord of composition between the parties, and that as I thought all had received good, and they were all three common purses, I thought it the less matter to receive that which they voluntarily presented; for if I had taken it in the nature of a corrupt bribe, I knew it could not be concealed, because it needs must be put to account to the three several Companies.

To the twenty-seventh Article of the Charge, viz. 'He took of the French merchants 1000*l.* to constrain the Vintners of London to take from them 1500 tuns of wine: To accomplish which he used very indirect means, by colour of his office and authority, without bill or suit depending, terrifying the Vintners by threats, and by imprisonment of their persons, to buy wines, whereof they had no need nor use, at higher rates than they were vendible:—I do confess and declare, that sir Thomas Smith did deal with me in behalf of the French company, informing me that the Vintners, by combination, would not take off their wines at any reasonable prices; that it would destroy their trade, and stay their voyage for that year; and that it was a fair business, and concerned the state: and he doubted not but I should receive thanks from the king, and honour by it; and that they would graffy me with a thousand pounds for my travail in it. Whereupon I treated between them by way of persuasion, and to prevent any compulsory suit, propounding such a price as the Vintners might be gainers 6*l.* in a tun, as it was then maintained unto me. And after the merchants petitioning to the king, and his majesty recommending this business unto me as a business that concerns his customs and the navy, I dealt more earnestly and presumptorily in it, and as I think, restrained in the messenger's hand for a day or two some that were the most stiff; and afterwards the merchants presented me with 1000*l.* out of their common purse; and acknowledging themselves, that I had kept them from a kind of ruin, and still maintaining to me that the Vintners, if they were not insatiably minded, had a very competent gain. These are the merits of the cause, as it then appeared to me.

To the twenty eighth Article of the Charge, viz. 'The Lord Chancellor hath given way to great Exactions by his servants, both in respect of private seals, and otherwise for sealing of injunctions:—I confess it was a great fault of neglect in me, that I looked no better to my servants.

"This Declaration I have made to your lordships with a sincere mind, humbly craving, that if there should be any mistake, your lordships would impute it to want of memory, and not to any desire of mine to obscure truth, or palliate any thing; for I do now again confess, that in the points charged upon me, though they should be taken as myself have declared them, there is a great deal of corruption and neglect, for which I am heartily sorry, and submit myself to the judgment, grace and mercy of the Court.—For extenuation, I will use none concerning the matters themselves; only it may please your lordships, out of your nobleness, to cast your eyes of compassion upon my person and estate: I was never noted for an avaricious man, and the apostle saith, 'That covetousness is the root of all evil.' I hope also that your lordships do rather find me in the state of grace, for that in all these particulars there are few or none that are not almost two years old; whereas those, that have an habit of Corruption, do commonly wax worse. So that it hath pleased God to prepare me by precedent degrees of amendment to my present penitency: and for my estate, it is so mean and poor, as my care is now chiefly to satisfy my debts.—And so fearing I have troubled your lordships too long, I shall conclude with an humble suit unto you, That if your lordships proceed to Sentence, your Sentence may not be heavy to my ruin, but gracious and mixed with mercy: and not only so, but that you would be noble intercessors for me to his majesty likewise, for his grace and favour. Your lordships' most humble servant and suppliant, FRANC. ST. ALBANS, Canc."

The Lords having heard this Confession and Submission read, these Lords under-named, viz. the earl of Pembroke lord chamberlain, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Southampton, the bishop of Durham, the bishop of Winchester, the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield; the lord Wentworth, the lord Cromwell, the lord Sheffield, the lord North, the lord Chandois, the lord Hundon, were sent to him the said Lord Chancellor, and shewed him the said Confession, and told him, that the Lords do conceive it to be an ingenious and full Confession; and demanded of him, whether it be his own hand that is subscribed to the same, and whether he will stand to it or not. Unto which the said Lord Chancellor answered, 'My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart; I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed.' The which Answer being reported to the house, it was agreed by the house to move his majesty to sequester the Seal: and the Lords intreated the prince's highness that he would be pleased to move the king; whereunto his highness condescended. And the same Lords which went to take the acknowledgment of the Lord Chancellor's hand, were appointed to attend the prince to the king, with some other lords added. And his majesty did not only sequester the Seal, but awarded a new Commission unto the Lord Chief Justice, to execute the place of the Chancellor, or Lord Keeper.

This was on the 1st of May: and on Wednesday, the 2d of May, the said Commission being read, their lordships agreed to proceed to sentence the Lord Chancellor to-morrow morning. Wherefore the Gentleman Usher, and Serjeant at Arms, attendants on the upper house, were commanded to go and summon him, the said Lord Chancellor, to appear in person before their lordships to-morrow morning by nine of the clock. And the said Serjeant at Arms was commanded to take his mace with him, and to show it unto his lordship at the said summons: but they found him sick in bed; and being summoned, he answered, that he was sick, and protested that he feigned not this for any excuse, for if he had been well he would willingly have come.

JUDGMENT

given against the Lord Chancellor.

The Lords resolved to proceed notwithstanding against the said Lord Chancellor. And therefore, on Thursday, the 3d of May, their lordships sent their Message to the commons to this purpose, viz. "That the Lords are ready to give Judgment against the lord viscount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor, if they, with their Speaker, will come to demand it." And the Commons being come, the Speaker came to the bar; and, making three low obeisances, said:

"The knights, citizens, and burghesses of the commons house of parliament, having made complaints unto your lordships of many exorbitant offences of Bribery and Corruption committed by the Lord Chancellor, understand that your lordships are ready to give Judgment upon him for the same; Wherefore I, their Speaker, in their name do humbly demand, and pray Judgment against him the said Lord Chancellor, as the nature of his offence and demerits do require."

The Lord Chief Justice answered: "Mr. Speaker, Upon complaint of the Commons against the visc. St. Albans, Lord Chancellor, this high Court hath thereby, and by his own Confession, found him Guilty of the Crimes and Corruptions complained of by the Commons, and of sundry other Crimes and Corruptions of like nature.<sup>2</sup> And therefore this high Court having first summoned him to attend, and having his excuse of not attending, by reason of infirmity and sickness, which he protested was not feigned, or else he would most willingly have attended, doth nevertheless think fit to proceed to Judgment: and therefore this high Court doth adjudge;

“That the lord viscount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, shall undergo a fine and ransom of 40,000*l.*—That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower during the king’s pleasure.—That he shall for ever be incapable of any office, place, or employment, in the state or commonwealth.—That he shall never sit in parliament, nor come within the verge of the Court.”—“This is the Judgment and Resolution of this High Court.”<sup>3</sup>

“Most gracious and dread Sovereign; Before I make my petition to your majesty, I make my prayers to God above, pectore ab imo, that if I have held any thing so dear as your majesty’s service, nay, your heart’s ease, and your honour’s, I may be repulsed with a denial: but, if that hath been the principal wish me, that God, who knoweth my heart, would move your majesty’s royal heart to take compassion of me, and to grant my desire.

“I prostrate myself at your majesty’s feet, I, your ancient servant, now 64 years old in age, and three years five months old in misery. I desire not from your majesty means; nor place nor employment, but only, after so long a time of expiation, a complete and total remission of the sentence of the upper-house, to the end that blot of ignominy may be removed from me, and from my memory with posterity; that I die not a condemned man, but may be to your majesty, as I am to God, vox creatura. Your majesty hath pardoned the like to sir John Bennet, between whose case and mine, not being partial with myself, but speaking out of the general opinion, there was as much difference, I will not say as between black and white, but as between black and grey, or ash-coloured: look therefore down, dear sovereign, upon me also in pity. I know your majesty’s heart is inscrutable for goodness; and my lord of Buckingham was wont to tell me, you were the best natured man in the world; and it is God’s property, that those he hath loved, he loveth to the end. Let your majesty’s grace, in this my desire, stream down upon me, and let it be out of the fountain and spring-head, and ex vero motu, that, living or dying, the print of the goodness of king James may be in my heart, and his praises in my mouth. This my most humble request granted, may make me live a year or two happily; and denied, will kill me

Thus he lost the privilege of his Peerage, and his Seal; and it was for some time doubtful, whether he should be allowed to retain his Titles of Honour, which was all he did, having only a poor empty being left, which lasted not long with him, his honour dying before him. Though he was afterwards set at liberty, and had a Pension from the king, he was in great want to the very last, living obscurely in his chambers at Grays-inn, where his lonely and desolate condition so wrought upon his melancholy temper, that he pined away; and after all his height of abundance was reduced to so low an ebb, as to be denied beer to quench his thirst: for having a sickly stomach, and not liking the beer of the house, he sent now and then to sir Fulk Grevile lord Brook, who lived in the neighbourhood, for a bottle of his beer; and, after some grumbling, the butler had orders to deny him. So sordid, says Wilson, was the one, that advanced himself to be called sir Philip Sidney’s friend, and so friendless was the other, after he had dejected himself from what he was.

He died on the 9th of April, 1626, being Easter-day, early in the morning, in the 66th year of his age, at the earl of Arundel’s house in Highgate, near London, to which place he had casually repaired about a week before. The distemper of which he died was a gentle fever, accidentally accompanied with a violent cold; whereby the defluxion of rheum was so great upon his breast, that he was quite suffocated. He was buried in St. Michael’s church at St. Alban’s, being the place directed for his burial by his last Will, both because his mother had been buried there before, and because it was the only church then remaining within the precincts of old Verulam; where he hath a monument erected for him of white marble, by sir Thomas Meautys, formerly his lordship’s secretary, afterwards clerk of the king’s privy-council, with an inscription composed by the famous sir Henry Wotton.

Howell thus writes of Bacon: “My lord chancellor Bacon is lately dead of a long languishing weakness; he died so poor that he scarce left money to bury him, which, though he had a great wit, did argue no great wisdom; it being one of the essential properties of a wise man to provide for the main chance. I have read that it had been the fortunes of all poets commonly to die beggars, but for an orator, a lawyer, and philosopher, as he was, to die so, is rare. It seems the same fate befel quickly. But yet the last thing that will die in me, will be the heart and affection of your majesty’s most humble, and true devoted servant, FR. ST. ALBAN. July 30, 1624.”

King James readily granted him a full and entire pardon of his whole sentence. Notwithstanding this pardon, he was never again summoned to parliament in this reign, but he was summoned to the first parliament called by Charles I. See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 38.

him that attended Demosthenes, Seneca, and Cicero (all great men), of whom the two first fell by Corruption. The fairest diamond may have a flaw in it, but I believe he died poor out of a contempt of the pelf of fortune, as also out of an excess of generosity, which appeared as in divers other passages, so once when the king had sent him a stag, he sent up for the under-keeper, and having drank the king's health to him in a great silver gilt bowl, he gave it him for his fee. He wrote a pitiful Letter to king James not long before his death, and concludes 'Help me dear sovereign lord and master, and pity me so far that I who have been worn to a bag, be not now in my age forced to bear a wallet, nor that I who desire to live to study may be driven to study to live;' which words, in my opinion, argued a little abjection of spirit as his former Letter to the prince did of profaneness, wherein he hoped that 'as the Father was his Creator the Son will be his Redeemer.' I write not this to derogate from the noble worth of the lord viscount Verulam, who was a rare man, a man reconдите, scientio et ad salutem literarum natus, and I think the eloquentest that was born in this isle." James Howell to Dr. Pritchard, Jan. 6, 1625 (1626, N. S.) Letters, B. 1. § 4, Letter 8.

It will be observed that this Letter, unless the date be misprinted, falsifies the account given above of the time of Bacon's death. The dates to Howell's Letters are not to be depended on. Dr. Birch's account of the time of Bacon's death, agrees with that given in the text: but Birch has not given very great accuracy to his dates. He says that Bacon was born Jan. 23d, 1561, and entered of Trinity College, Cambridge, June 16th 1573, in his twelfth year. Now in June 1573, Bacon was in his thirteenth year, if he were born Jan. 23d, 1561, N. S.; and in his fourteenth year if born on Jan. 24d, 1561, O. S. Dr. Birch in the life of Bacon, prefixed to the Doctor's edition of Bacon's Works, expresses an opinion that the representations of his poverty are exaggerated. Bacon's Will certainly indicates a condition far removed from indigence. It is printed at the end of the third volume of Birch's edition.

It must, however, be observed, that though in his Will he named six executors, none of them would undertake the office; for on July 23d, 1627, administration 'juxta tenorem et effectum testamenti,' was granted to two of his creditors.—Rushworth thus speaks of Bacon: "This learned peer, eminent over the Christian world for his many writings extant in print, was known to be no admirer of money, yet had the unhappiness to be defiled therewith: He treasured up nothing, either for himself or his family; for he both lived and died in debt; he was over indulgent to his servants, and connived at their takings, and their ways betrayed him to that error; they were profuse and expensive, and had at command whatever he was master of. The gifts taken were, for the most part, for interlocutory Orders; his Decrees were generally made with so much equity, that though gifts rendered him suspected for injustice, yet never any Decree made by him was reversed as unjust, as it hath been observed by some knowing in our laws."

As to bishop Field, on May 16th a message was sent from the commons to remind the lords of the Complaint against the bishop of Landaff for an offence proved to the house of commons by the testimony of Randolph, Davenport, and divers other witnesses, wherefore the commons demand Judgment against him for the same answer. The lords have been busied with many matters of great importance, but they shall hear from them shortly touching the said complaint.

May 30.

The first thing of moment the Lords went upon this day, was to hear the Report of the earl of Huntingdon, one of the committee appointed to take Examinations concerning Dr. Field, now bishop of Landaff. A collection was made thereof, which, with divers letters, sent up by the Commons, concerning that cause, were delivered by his lordship into court. The bishop having withdrawn, the king's serjeant, Crewe, came to the clerk's table and read the said collection in hec verba—"Edw. Egerton having a suit in chancery with sir Rowland Egerton, for lands of good value; and supposing he had some hard measure therein, was commended to Dr. Field, now lord bishop of Landaff, for the procuring of some great friends to assist him in this cause. Upon conference between Edw. Egerton and the lord bishop about this matter, and to the end to procure such assistance and friendship, he acknowledged a recognizance of 10,000*l.* to the bishop, and one Randolph Davenport a gentleman belonging to the late lord chancellor; which was dated March 13th, in the 16th year of this reign. Whereupon there was a draught of a defeasance conceived, but not perfected, as it seems; by which it was agreed between them, That if, by means or mediation of the said commissaries, or either of them, the said Egerton should prevail, either by decree in chancery, or at common law, to recover so much of the ancient inheritance of the said Edward, as is mentioned in the defeasance, then to pay the lord bishop or Davenport, or either of them, 6000*l.* within two years after.—On the 15th of March 1618, Dr. Field writes a letter to Edw. Egerton, in the nature of a defeasance of that recognizance, which containeth, that the sum of 6000*l.* is for gratuities to such honourable friends as shall be made in his business, if he recover, by the power of those friends, his ancient inheritance; or, otherwise, a third part of whatsoever shall be added to that which had been formerly awarded to the said Edward in chancery. And, if nothing was done, then he promised, in verbo sacerdotis, to return the recognizance.—After this the lord bishop writes another letter without date, to Mr. Egerton, letting him know thereby, that there was a stay made of decreeing the lord chancellor's award till next term, by the means of one of my lord chancellor's gentlemen, who would have conferred with Mr. Egerton, but that his leisure permitted him not then to do it; he therefore required some further warrant and direction to proceed in his behalf. Underneath this letter one Woodward, brother-in-law to Mr. Egerton, writes this postscript, That he thinks his cause will do well, and that he hath assured this gentleman he shall find Mr. Egerton faithful in his promise, and wisheth he would write back to Woodward to that purpose.—Woodward writes another letter to Mr. Egerton without date, letting him know, that Dr. Field is sorry my lord hath not sent an answer as he expected, but that my lord chancellor shall be moved this night for a stay of the decree; which he hopes to get by such means as he shall use; and that he hath assured him Mr. Egerton would perform his promise.—Davenport being examined in this high court, touching the sharing the 6000*l.* betwixt him, Butler, the bishop, and others, saith, He himself should have had nothing; Butler was to have 3000*l.* and 1000*l.* was thought fit to be given to the lord chancellor; but his lordship knew not of it, and Butler dared not to move it. Davenport and Butler meant to have shared that 1000*l.* For the other 3000*l.* he knew not how it should be shared. The matter promised was a letter from the lord admiral, and a reference from the king to the lord chancellor.—Francis Joyner being examined in this cause, confesseth, he was the means to make Mr. Egerton and Dr. Field acquainted; and that the doctor had conference with Butler and Davenport about Mr. Egerton's business; and that the doctor drew in the lord Haddington to be a furtherer of it. He spoke to the recognizance; and that the doctor confessed he was trusted from the lord Haddington, and that his lordship was to dispose of the money at his pleasure. Tristram Woodward being likewise examined, confessed, Joyner told him Dr. Field had friends at court; and how Mr. Egerton was drawn to the doctor's house. The recognizance was taken for Butler and the lord Haddington, as he thinks; but out of it the doctor expected recompence, as he heard amongst them: and confessed he wrote the postscript to Dr. Field's letter sent to Mr. Egerton.—Edw. Egerton saith, "That he agreed with Dr. Field for the recognizance, that he should have his land decreed to him: that 6000*l.* was to be paid on the event of the suit. He was to pay the money to Dr. Field and Davenport; but how much each should have he knoweth not. He further said, That Woodward, his brother-in-law, and Dr. Field, procured him to acknowledge the recognizance; but he did not pay the charge of it: that Dr. Field told him he would bring him to one Butler, who would procure an order from my lord chancellor for his relief in the cause as he would desire: thereupon the doctor demanded a recognizance of 10,000*l.* for payment of 6000*l.* when this examinant should have such an order from the court as he desired. The recognizance was entered accordingly; after which, this examinant finding no good thereby, demanded back his recognizance; when, after many delays, and a year's distance of time, he had the same delivered.—Lastly, that Woodward told him Dr. Field, capt. Field his brother, and Butler should have shared the money amongst them; but how, he knoweth not."

Then the king's serjeant read also the Proofs, which consisted of all the letters and examinations before mentioned. After which the bishop of Durham* stood up, and, in a speech, repeated the manner how this matter was first complained of by the commons to this house, with the several proofs thereof; but added, "That since there was nothing proved but an intent, at the most, he moved that the consideration thereof be referred to the archbishop of Canterbury, and he to give the bishop an admonition for the same in the convocation house." The archbishop (George Abbot) then rose up and said, "That Dr. Field, the now bishop of Landaff, could not be excused from Brokage in Bribery; for which he was to blame: but hoped that he might bear his fault as Dr. Field, and not as bishop of Landaff; and that, if it was referred to him, he would do that which belongs unto him."

Whereupon it was ordered, That the affair of the lord bishop of Landaff should be referred to the archbishop of Canterbury, and he to be admonished by his grace in the Convocation House, before the bishops and clergy there. The Lords also taking into consideration the complaint of the Commons, touching this matter, agreed upon a message to be sent to that house, to this purpose: viz. "Whereas the house of commons informed this house of a great misdemeanor committed by Dr. Field, now bishop of Landaff, and hath also sent since to demand judgment in that cause; the Lords having taken full examination thereof upon oath, do not find it proved in the same manner as, it seems, they were informed by examinations taken in their house. And, for further satisfaction of the commons therein, their lordships have sent them the examination of Randolph Davenport."—"Ans. The commons returned great thanks for their lordships honourable and just proceedings in the cause of the lord bishop of Landaff, and for sending the examination of Davenport; by which it doth appear, that his examination, taken by them, doth differ much from that taken upon his oath before their lordships."—Then the question was put, Whether the said bishop should take his place in the house before he received his admonition from the archbishop or not?

* Richard Neile, who had himself been complained of by the Commons, when bishop of Lincoln, for some expressions in the house of lords, tending to advance the prerogative royal. See No. 98, p. 885.

Agreed, per plures, that he should: whereupon his lordship was called in by the gentleman usher, and went to his place. Thus ended this affair.

The following characteristic Letter from this bishop Field to Buckingham is printed in the Cabala, p. 117.

“ My gracious good lord; In the great library of men, that I have studied these many years, your grace is the best book, and most classick author, that I have read, in whom I find so much goodness, sweetness and nobleness of nature, such an heroic spirit, for boundless bounty, as I never did in any. I could instance in many, some of whom you have made deans, some bishops, some lords, and privy-counsellors; none that ever looked towards your grace did ever go away empty. I need go no further than myself, a gum of the earth, whom you raised out of the dust, for raising but a thought so high as to serve your highness. Since that, I have not played the truant, but more diligently studied you than ever before: and yet, dunce that I am, I stand at a stay, and am a non proficient, the book being the same that ever it was, as may appear by the great proficiency of others. This wonderfully poseth me, and sure there is some guile, some wile, in some of my fellow students, who hide my book from me, or some part of it; all the fault is not in my own blackishness, that I thrive no better; I once feared this before, that some did me ill offices. Your grace was pleased to protest no man bad; and to assure me no man could. My heart tells me it hath been always upright, and is still most faithful unto you. I have examined my actions, my words, and my very thoughts, and found all of them, ever since, most sound unto your grace. Give me leave, to comfort myself with recordation of your loving kindnesses of old, when on that great feast day of your being inaugurated our chancellor [of Cambridge] my look was your book, wherein you read sadness, to which I was bold to answer, I trusted your grace would give me no cause. You replied (with loss of blood rather.) But God forbid so precious an effusion. (I would rather empty all my veins than you should bleed one drop,) when as one blast of your breath is able to bring me to the haven where I would be. My lord, I am grown an old man, and am like old household stuff, apt to be broke upon often removing. I desire it therefore but once for all, be it Ely, or Bath and Wells; and I will spend the remainder of my days in writing an history of your good deeds to me and others, whereby I may vindicate you from the envy, and obloquy of this present wicked age wherein we live, and whilst I live in praying for your grace, whose I am, totally and finally.

116. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir GILES MOMPESSEON, a Monopolist and Patentee: 18 JAMES I. A. D. 1620. [Journals of both Houses. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1198.]

WE shall now present the reader with a Narrative of the Proceedings against sir Giles Mompesson, a member of parliament, a Projector, and a great Dealer and Patentee. This man the Commons convened before them, and ordered him into custody of the serjeant at arms; but he, being conscious of his guilt, found means to make his escape, and fled beyond sea. The particulars of this affair will best appear from the Journals of the Lords, to whom the Commons carried their Complaint against the said sir Giles, and others concerned with him in the execution of his projects: all the judicial proceedings both against this man, and others of much higher rank, in the sequel, being transacted before this supreme Court of Judicature.

March 3, 1620. A Message from the Lower House was delivered to the Lords by sir Edw. Coke, attended by several knights, citizens and burgesses, to this effect:

“ That the House of Commons had entered into a due consideration of divers heavy Grievances, and do desire a Conference about them; leaving the time, number and place to their lordships appointment. He further added, as part of what they had enjoined him to say, that whilst their house was thus, amongst themselves, in treaty and advise, the principal offender, sir Giles Mompesson, was escaped. Therefore, the Commons did desire strict scrutiny should be made for finding him out within the realm.” The messengers being withdrawn, the Lords agreed to the Conference: the number, the whole house: the time and place, March 5th at two in the afternoon, in the Painted Chamber. Sir Edw. Coke and the rest were again called, and the Lord Chancellor acquainted them, That the house had agreed to meet with the Commons, as above; and that their lordships would give their best aid and assistance for finding out the offender. On which Answer, sir Edw. desired to explain his Message a little further; and declared that the Commons were not fully provided for a Conference so soon: but that his meaning was, That if their lordships would be pleased to yield to one, then the other house would prepare the business so as it might give least interruption to their lordships greater affairs: and, when they were ready, would return and acquaint their lordships with it. The Chancellor answered, That the lords would suspend the time, till the Commons were ready for the Conference.

Several proposals were then made for the apprehending of sir Giles Mompesson; and a Message was sent to the Lower House to acquaint them, "That they had appointed a committee of 40 lords, of which the Prince was the first, to confer with a number of the Commons, immediately, about that point." The lord Zouch, warden of the Cinque-Ports, was ordered to send his warrant thither, to search for and apprehend the said sir Giles, if he should attempt to escape that way. The two lords presidents, of Wales and of the Council at York, were ordered to cause strict search to be made in the several ports under their charge. The Lord Treasurer had the same charge given him, to take care that all officers of the Customs and other officers, within the ports, havens and creeks of this land, be warned of this business. Lastly, orders were given to the Lord-Admiral that he should instruct all vice-admirals and other maritime officers under his jurisdiction, to make the like search for this extraordinary runagate.

All these orders and directions of the Lords being told to the Committee of the Commons, they approved of them, with thanks; and only desired that a more private search might be made for the offender. Accordingly, a warrant was ordered to be drawn, as from the Lords, and signed by the Chancellor, as their Speaker: and the lord chamberlain, the earls of Arundel and Southampton, the lords Hunsden and Houghton, were appointed for that purpose. Which warrant, was ordered to be directed to the deputy-clerk of the crown, and clerk of parliament; and to all mayors, bailiffs, &c.—In the midst of these orders and directions, the Lord Admiral, the marquis of Buckingham, declared openly to the house how much he had been deceived and abused by this offender, sir Giles Mompesson; who, but very lately, had wrote to him, protesting his innocency, affirming that what was objected against him was but matter of civil, and that he desired only a legal trial by due course of law.

March 5. The Lord Chancellor acquainted the Lords, that the deputy-clerk of the crown, and the clerk of parliament, with others, had, according to their lordships direction, made search into the several houses of sir Giles Mompesson, sir Francis Mitchell, and in the house called and used as for the exercise and execution of letters patents, concerning Gold and Silver Thread, &c. in Wood-street; and that in each search the said clerks had brought away divers books and writings, concerning such matters wherewith the said sir Giles standeth charged; which they had sealed up, according to the direction of the house. The Lords ordered that the said things so sealed up, should be safely kept by the clerk of parliament, until their lordships should be pleased to give further direction, about delivering them to such members of that house as should be assigned to receive the said books and papers, for the better manifestation of the truth in such matters as the said sir Giles stood charged with.

March 6. The lords received a message from the commons, "That they had taken notice of some Warrants, issued by their lordships, for search in certain places for papers concerning sir Giles Mompesson. That the parties, therein employed, had found and brought in certain papers sealed up, also, a trunk and a bag in which other papers and books are sealed up, which they desire may be delivered to them. That one question had been made by the persons so employed, concerning their power, and they desire further warrant, from the lords, to authorize them to open locks, doors or chests, that their search may be more enlarged." Answer, "That the lords do grant the request of the commons in all its points; and will give direction for the proper additional words to be added to the warrant."

March 12th. The Lord Chancellor reported what passed at the last Conference of both houses; the inducement of which was, to clear the king's honour touching Grants to sir Giles Mompesson, and the means of procuring the same. The effect of this Conference was, "That the king, on the Petition of the said sir Giles, to have a Patent to reform abuses in divers Innkeepers, and a warrant to compound for the penalty of obsolete laws touching the prices of horse-meat, had referred the same to several judges, for the point of law; and to divers lords, for the point of conveniency. That his majesty had shewn the like care, in granting the Patent for Monopoly of the sole making of Gold and Silver Thread. That sir Henry Yelverton, Attorney-General to the king, had advised the same to be returned into his majesty's own hands, and then by indentures to authorize divers persons to manage it; but that this also was referred by his majesty to the consideration of several of his council. That the benefit arising to the king was made over to others, pro tempore; that the authority granted by the king, was much abused in the execution thereof, to the intolerable grievance of the subject; and lastly, that much imposture was used in the trade."

March 15th. The lord Wentworth moved, and it was ordered, That no bill but the Prince's bill should be read, until the business of sir Giles Mompesson be past and determined. The house to sit on convocation days, for the more speedy dispatch of that business.

March 22d. The Lord Chamberlain, one of the committee appointed to enquire into the Grievances of the Patent concerning Inns and Hostelries, reported, "That in the said Patent were three things considerable: 1st, the legality of it granted to Mompesson; but in that the committee had no power to judge. Next the inconvenience. Lastly, the abuses in the execution. That the inconvenience appeared in the patent, where the judges are made subject to a base of fee 5s.; and, in the execution, because that sir Giles Mompesson affronted the justices of the peace, and threatened several of them with the council-table. And, because there were certificates sent him, from time to time, of those Alehouse-keepers, who were suppressed for ill behaviour, he made this use of it, to make them Inn-keepers. That he granted licences to divers base fellows to keep inns; and sued out processes against 4000, for keeping inns without licence, and for the price of horse-meat, of which he only tried two suits. Lastly, his lordship delivered a collection of the several abuses and the proofs of them."

The Earl of Arundel reported, "That the consideration of the Grievances by the Patents of sole Manufacturing Gold and Silver-Thread, complained of, being committed to his lordship and other lords joined with him in committee, That they had often met, the business being attended with great difficulty, and consisted of many particulars. That they had examined many witnesses, and more were produced who were fit to be examined, if the time of recess was not so near at hand. The lords committees have thought good to present to the house those proofs they have made, not to delay the time, but that their lordships were not to be excluded from giving further proofs hereafter.—His lordship observed, That the committee dealt, chiefly, with the execution, not with the legality of these patents. They found in the execution thereof, that the authority given by these patents, which ought to have been rarely used, was used by them familiarly, to the undoing of thousands. That the warrants dormant, to seize and imprison, &c. exceed all kinds of warrants; of which there are three, and one of them is without date and razed; and the other hath a date by a new hand. That sir Giles Mompesson committed divers to prison, without examination, which they could not do by that warrant. Several were threatened with imprisonment. That one Fowlis did lock up divers in his own house. That several houses were violently broke up and the parties goods seized. That others were compelled to enter into bonds, not to exercise their own trade and to stand to their orders; and to make oath what quantity of Gold and Silver-Thread they sold, and to whom. That sir Giles confessed divers of these wrongs, and made restitution unto many. That this work of Gold and Silver-Thread was much sophisticated, since the grant of the sole manufacture thereof. He further declared, That the lords committees urged none to accuse himself, and admonished every man not to accuse another out of passion. He desired, That though sir Giles be fled, yet that Fowlis and other delinquents may be heard here, what they can say in their own defence."

The Earl of Southampton, one of the committee to consider of the Grievances complained of for concealments, reported to the house, "That they find his majesty to be much abused in the pretence and execution of this grant. They find that sir Giles Mompesson obtained a commission to himself, to call all officers before him; by virtue whereof he fetched up, from all parts, the king's officers, and kept them here to fill his book, granted unto him, of 200*l.* per annum on concealed lands, in recompence of his service. The proceedings, warrants, and the abuses in the execution, are all set down in the declaration, delivered by the commons. Their lordships labour was to look into these informations, wherein they desired the help of divers gentlemen of the lower house; who, not as members of that house, but as private gentlemen and friends, gave their lordships full satisfaction therein. In this search, they found proofs of every point, set down in the said declaration: and, for their more full satisfaction, they reviewed the Records themselves, wherein they found some proceedings, not mentioned in the declaration, and not warranted by any commission, viz. 1. Process used by George Geldard, sir Giles Mompesson's agent, in the king's attorney's name; the said Geldard confessing to one and but one. 2. Sir Giles used Geldard and his man, as his agents; Geldard to be Commissioner and Geldard's man to be his clerk. Their lordships found likewise, That Geldard's man gave the evidence to the Jury, and, though the jury found an imperfect verdict, yet Geldard proceeded as upon a perfect one. That Geldard compounded with divers who were questioned for their lands, as concealed, and employed those parties, as commissioners, for their own compositions. That they set down in their book an Advowson and a Rectory at 4*d.* per annum; and lands, called Pease Marsh, at 10*s.* a year; which was affirmed by sir George Moore, the tenant to it, to contain 700 acres, and to be better worth than 300*l.* a year. That there was no time limited to sir Giles to fill up his book; whereby, his vexing the subject, to fill the same, might continue 7 years. Lastly, their lordships conceived, That as his majesty had been abused in the Grant and in the Execution of it, so he should also have been in the end."—After this last Report was ended,

The Lord Admiral (Buckingham) stood up and moved the house, "That care might be taken hereafter, that the sophistication of the manufacture of Gold and Silver-Thread be prohibited; and none be permitted to work thereon, to waste and consume the bullion of the land." He commended the trade that set so many thousands on work; and, if order was first taken for bringing in bullion, and against the sophistication, it might be gainful both to the king and commonwealth; and to new patentees, if another patent thereof should be thought fit. He shewed further, "that the motive for the grant of Concealments was, that sir Giles Mompesson offered his service to consider how the multitude of officers in the exchequer might be cut off. In which his majesty first asked the opinion of the Judges; and his majesty's pleasure was not to prejudice any officer, during his life, but to provide for the future; which was, and yet is, his majesty's resolution to do; in consideration whereof, this Patent of Concealments was first granted to the said sir Giles. It was ill foreseen, that a man of his corrupt disposition should be admitted to view the Records, which he might embezzle, blot or raze out for his own profit; but, at that time, sir Giles had the reputation of an honest man. That sir Giles had abused this grant many ways, but, as yet nothing was past under seal. That the abuse, partly, grew out of this, that sir Giles had compounded with one Geldard for the same, who, to make his best commodity thereof, put into the book matters of great value at small rates; which when his lordship heard of, he rebuked sir Giles and willed him to look to it, and not to suffer any thing to be past but what the chancellor of the exchequer should first allow of. That, thereupon, the said sir Giles, in the hearing of his lordship, delivered his book to Mr. Chancellor to be viewed, and whatsoever he thought good to be put out. Lastly, though much was intended to the prejudice of his majesty and the subject, yet nothing was past."—When the minister had ended his speech, a motion was made and agreed to, "That, although the Proofs given before the Lords against sir Giles Mompesson and others his agents, for their misdemeanors, were good and manifold, yet their lordships will hear the parties themselves what they can say in their own defence. But, because Easter is drawing on, and the time of recess very near, in which short space all the delinquents cannot be heard and proceeded against; it was further agreed, That a collection be made of all the proofs, concerning sir Giles only; which being read to the house, the Lords would proceed to sentence sir Giles, though absent; for that his flight is an eviction in law: and for that the expectation thereof is great as well as the grievance, therefore the proceedings should be with expedition, that the whole kingdom might hear of the Punishment imposed upon Delinquents, by this parliament, as well as of the granted Subsidies."

A debate arising, in what manner to proceed against the said sir Giles, whether by Indictment in that house, or otherwise? And there being some confusion amongst the speakers, the Prince of Wales, who constantly attended this business morning and afternoon, made a motion, "That by the ancient Orders of the House, no lord was to speak twice, though to explain himself, except some other lord mistake his meaning in any part of his speech." This was commanded to be entered, and ordered to be observed.

March 23. The Earl of Huntingdon, one of the committee appointed to search Precedents of Sentences, &c. reported, "That they had searched the records, and the earl of Warwick read the heads of several precedents, and then delivered the notes taken out of the records, and signed by the officers, to be kept by the clerk"—The collection of sir Giles Mompesson's offences, touching Inns and Hosteries, and the proofs thereof, were read, with the patent and commission concerning the same.

March 26. The King came to the House of Lords, the peers being all in their robes, and the Prince with his coronet on his head; the earl of Oxford, as lord great chamberlain, bearing his white staff, and the earl of Montgomery the sword. His majesty being seated on the throne, made the following Speech to the Lords only:

"My lords; The last time I came hither, my errand was to inform you (as well as my memory could serve me, of things so long passed) of the verity of my proceedings, and the cautions used by me in the passing of those Patents, which are now in question before you; to the effect, that they might not be abused in the execution; and this I did by way of declaration. But now I am come (understanding the time of your censure to draw near) to express my readiness to put in execution (which is the life of the law) those things, which ye are to sentence (for even the law itself is a dead letter without execution) for which office God hath appointed me in these kingdoms. And though I assure myself, that my former behaviour, in all the course of my life, hath made me well known for a just king; yet in this special case I thought fit to express my own intentions, out of my own mouth, for punishment of things complained of. The first proof whereof I have given by the diligent search I caused to be made after the person of sir Giles Mompesson, who though he were fled, yet my Proclamation pursued him instantly: and as I was earnest in that, so will I be to see your sentence against him put in execution.—Two reasons move me to be earnest in the execution of what ye are to sentence at this time: first, that duty I owe to God, who hath made me a king, and tied me to the care of government by that politic marriage betwixt me and my people. For I do assure you in the heart of an honest man, and by the faith of a christian king (which both ye and all the world know me to be) had these things been complained of to me before the parliament, I would have done the office of a just king; and out of parliament have punished them as severely, and peradventure more, than ye now intend to do.—But now that they are discovered to me in parliament, I shall be as ready in this way, as I should have been in the other. For (I confess) I am ashamed (these things proving so, as they are generally reported to be) that it was not my good fortune to be the only author of the reformation and punishment of them, by some ordinary courts of justice. Nevertheless since these things are now discovered by parliament which before I knew not of, nor could so well be discovered otherwise, in regard of that representative body of the kingdom, which comes from all parts of the country: I will be never a whit the slower to do my part for the execution. For, as many of you that are here have heard me often say, so I will still say: so precious unto me is the public good, that no private person whatsoever, were he never so dear unto me, shall be so respected by me, by any degrees, as the public good, not only of the whole commonwealth, but even of any particular corporation that is a member of it: and I hope that ye, my lords, will do me that right to publish to my people this my heart and purpose.—The 2nd reason is, That I intend not to derogate or infringe any of the liberties or privileges of this house, but rather to fortify and strengthen them. For never any king hath done so much for the nobility of England as I have done, and will ever be ready to do. And whatsoever I shall now say or deliver unto you as my thought, yet when I have said what I think, I will afterwards freely leave the judgment wholly to your house. I know ye will do nothing, but what the like hath been done before: and I pray you be not jealous, that I will abridge you in any thing that hath been used. For whatsoever the precedents in times of good government can warrant, I will allow. For I acknowledge this to be the supreme court of justice, wherein I am ever present by representation. And in this ye may be the better satisfied by my own presence, coming divers times amongst you: neither can I give you any greater assurance, or better pledge of this my purpose, than that I have done you the honour to set my only son among you; and hope that ye with him, shall have the means to make this the happiest parliament that ever was in England. This I profess, and take comfort in, that the Commons at this time have shewed greater love, and used me with more respect in all their proceedings, than ever any house of commons have heretofore done to me, or (I think) to any of my predecessors. As for this house of yours, I have always found it respective to me; and accordingly do I, and ever did favour you as ye well deserved. And I hope it will be accounted a happiness for you, that my son doth now sit amongst you, who, when it shall please God to set him in my place, will then remember that he was once a member of your house; and so be bound to maintain all your lawful privileges, and like the better of you all the days of his life. But, because the world at this time talks so much of bribes, I have just cause to fear, the whole body of this house hath bribed him to be a good instrument for you upon all occasions: he doth so good offices in all his reports to me, both for the house in general, and every one of you in particular. And the like I may say of one that sits there. (Buckingham.) He hath been so ready upon all occasions to do good offices, both for the house in general, and every member thereof in particular. One proof thereof, I hope my lord of Arundell hath already witnessed unto you, in his report made unto you of my answer, touching the privileges of the nobility, how earnestly he spake unto me in that matter.—Now, my lords, the time draws near of your recess: whether formality will leave you time for proceeding now to sentence against all, or any the persons now in question, I know not. But for my part since both houses have dealt so lovingly and freely with me, in giving me, as a free gift, two Subsidies in a more loving manner than hath been given to any king before, and so accepted by me; and since I cannot yet retribute by a general pardon, which hath by form usually been reserved to the end of a parliament: the least I can do (which I can forbear no longer) is to do something in present, for the good and ease of my people.—Three patents at this time have been complained of, and thought great Grievances: 1. That of the Inns and Hosteries. 2. That of the Alehouses. 3. That of Gold and Silver Thread. My purpose is to strike them all dead, and (that time may not be lost) I will have it done presently. That concerning the Alehouses, I would have to be left to the managing of the justices of peace, as before. That of Gold and Silver Thread was most vilely executed, both for wrongs done to men's persons, as also for abuse in the staff; for it was a kind of false coin. I have already freed the persons that were in prison: I will now also damn the patent: and this may seem instead of a pardon. All these three I will have recalled by proclamation, and wish you to advise of the fittest form for that purpose.—I hear also that there is another bill amongst you against Informers: I desire you, my lords, that as ye tender my honour, and the good of my people, ye will put that bill to an end so soon as ye can; and at your next meeting to make it one of your first works. For I have already shewed my dislike of that kind of people openly in Star Chamber; and it will be the greatest ease both to me, and all those that are near about me at court, that may be. For I remember, that since the beginning of this parliament Buckingham hath told me, he never found such quiet, and rest, as in this time of parliament from projectors and informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours.—And now I confess, that when I looked before upon the face of the government, I thought (as every man would have done) that the people were never so happy as in my time. For even, as at divers times I have looked upon many of my coppices, riding about them, and they appeared on the outside very thick, and well grown unto me: but when I entered into the midst of them, I found them all bitten within, and full of plaius and bare spots; like an apple or pear, fair and smooth without, but when ye cleave it asunder, ye find it rotten at the heart: even so this kingdom, the external government being as good as ever it was, and I am sure as learned judges as ever it had (and I hope as honest) administering justice within it; and for peace, both at home and abroad, I may truly say, more settled, and longer lasting, than ever any before, together with as great plenty as ever: so as it was to be thought, that every man might sit in safety under his own vine, and his own fig-tree: yet I am ashamed, and it makes my hair stand upright, to consider, how in this time my people have been vexed, and polled by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and such like; which, besides the trouble of my people, have more exhausted their purses, than subsidies would have done.—Now, my lords, before I go hence, since God hath made me the great judge of this land under him: and that I must answer for the justice of the same: I will therefore (according to my place) remember you of some things, though I would not teach you. For no man's knowledge can be so good, but their memories will be the better to be refreshed. And now because ye are coming to give judgment, all which moves from the king, that you may the better proceed, take into your care two things: 1st to do bonum; 2ndly, next to do it benè. I call bonum when all is well proved, whereupon ye judge, for then ye build upon a sure foundation; and by benè I understand, that ye proceed with all formality and legality: wherein you have fit occasion to advise with the judges, who are to assist you with their opinions in cases of that nature; and woe be to them, if they advise you not well. So the ground being good, and the form orderly, it will prove a course fitting this high court of parliament.—In sentence ye are to observe two parts: 1st, to recollect that which is worthy of judging and censuring; and 2ndly, to proceed against these, as against such like crimes properly. We doubt there will be many matters before you, some complained of out of passion, and some out of just cause of grievance. Weigh both; but be not carried away with the impertinent discourses of them, that name as well innocent men, as guilty. Let your judgments only take hold of the guilty: proceed judicially, and spare none where ye find just cause to punish: but let your proceedings be according to law. And remember, that laws have not their eyes in their necks, but in their foreheads. For the moral reason of the punishment of vices, in all kingdoms and commonwealths is, because of the breach of laws standing in force: for none can be punished for breach of laws by predestination, before they be made. There is yet one particular, which I am to remember you of, I hear that sir Henry Yelverton who is now in the Tower, upon a sentence given in the Star Chamber against him, for deceiving my trust) is touched concerning a warrant dormant, which he made while he was my attorney: The which my lord treasurer* here refused to set his hand unto, like an honest man, when it was brought unto him. I protest, I never heard of this warrant dormant before, and I hold it as odious a matter, as any is before you: and if, for respect to me, ye have forbore to meddle with him in examination, because he is my prisoner; I do now here freely remit him unto you, and put him into your hands.—And this is all I have to say unto you, at this time; wishing you to proceed justly and nobly, according to the orders of your house: and I pray God to bless you: and ye may assure yourselves of my assistance; wishing that what I have said this day, amongst you, may be entered into the records of this house."

The King having ended his Speech, the Lords conceived so much joy thereat; that they ordered the whole house to go to him, at one in the afternoon, with their most humble thanks for it.

The collection of Offences and Abuses committed by sir Giles Mompesson, in the three patents which were granted to him, being all read: it was resolved by the whole house, "That it did appear to the lords, and they were fully satisfied, sir Giles Mompesson had erected a court without warrant; and, also, that he imprisoned the king's subjects and exacted bonds from them by threats, without warrant; and, afterwards, by undue practices, procured a proclamation and other warrants to colour such his doings. And yet that he executed all these ills, and seized the goods of divers persons, contrary to such authority, so unduly procured by him. That he neither paid the 10*l.* reserved rent to the king, nor brought in the 5000*l.* of bullion yearly, as he pretended and covenanted to have done. And that all his other offences and abuses had been fully proved against him." Hereupon it was agreed, "That the lords would give sentence against sir Giles, in their robes, in the afternoon. The lord admiral, Buckingham, desired to be excused if he should be absent; but he gave his assent to their lordships censure of the said sir Giles; affirming, That he had highly abused the king, and also himself, more than any other lord of that house."

March 26, p. m. The whole house met again. The lords were in their robes, in order to give sentence against the offender, it was much debated first, amongst them, what punishment sir Giles deserved for his high crimes: and, because the punishment inflicted heretofore on Empson and Dudley was much spoken of, the lords desired to hear their indictments. The indictment of Rd. Empson, taken at Northampton, 1 Hen. 8. was read; by which it was observed, that the said Empson was indicted for treason against the king. The attorney-general also certified to their lordships, that Dudley was indicted, in London, for treason. But to the end that these matters might be more freely discussed, and what punishment was fit to be inflicted on the offender, the house adjourned ad libitum; when, after a long debate, the lords agreed upon a Judgment against sir Giles: the earl of Arundel observing, that their lordships might proceed against him hereafter, if more matter, or matter of a higher nature, was found out.—Accordingly a Message was sent from the Lords to the Commons, "That if they and their Speaker, according to the ancient custom of parliaments, come to demand of the lords, that judgment be given against sir Giles, for the heinous offences by him committed, they shall be heard: also that the Lords desire a conference with them, in the Painted Chamber, to-morrow morning." Answer returned, "That they would come to demand judgment; and that they agreed to the conference."—In the mean time the lord treasurer reported, "That, according to the order of the house made this morning, the Prince's highness, accompanied with many lords, did present unto his majesty most humble thanks for his majesty's most gracious Speech to the Lords that morning; which thanks, with the manner of presenting the same, was most joyfully accepted by him, as he expressed in many kind and favourable words; adding, "That the Lords had taken the right way to catch a king, by speaking to him by his son."

The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, with their Speaker, being come up to the bar, the Speaker repeated the last message which the lords had sent unto them, and said, "The Commons, by me, their Speaker, demand judgment against sir Giles Mompesson, as the heinousness of his offences doth require."

The Lord Chief Justice, as Speaker of the house of peers, answered: "Mr. Speaker, the Lords spiritual and temporal have taken knowledge of the great pains the Commons have been at, to inform their lordships of many complaints brought unto them against sir Giles Mompesson, and others, whereof their lordships received several instructions from them; and, thereupon, proceeding by examination of divers witnesses upon oath, they find sir Giles, and several others, guilty of many heinous crimes against the king's majesty, and against the commonwealth.—Time will not permit their lordships to deal with all the offenders now; therefore they proceed to give judgment against sir Giles, according to your demand; and, hereafter, their lordships will proceed against the other offenders. The Judgment of the lords against the said sir Giles is, and, the Lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parliament, do award and adjudge, 1. That sir Giles shall, from henceforth, be degraded of the order of Knighthood, with reservation to his wife and children; the ceremonies of degradation to be performed by direction of the earl marshal's court, whensoever he shall be taken. 2. That he shall stand perpetually in the degree of a person outlawed for misdemeanors and trespasses. 3. That his testimony be received in no court; and that he shall be of no assize, inquisition, or jury. 4. That he shall be excepted out of all general pardons to be hereafter granted. 5. That he shall be imprisoned during life. 6. That he shall not approach within 12 miles of the courts of the king or prince, nor of the king's high courts usually holden at Westminster. 7. That the king's majesty shall have the profits of his lands for life, and shall have all his goods and chattels as forfeited; and he shall undergo fine and ransom, which their lordships assess at 10,000*l.* 8. That he shall be disabled to hold or receive any office under the king, or for the commonwealth. 9. Lastly, That he be ever held an infamous person."

March 27. The Lord Admiral delivered his majesty's hearty thanks to the Lords, for their Sentence given yesterday against Mompesson, it being so just, and yet moderate, in respect of the heinousness of the offence. And said, That the king, out of regard to his people and detestation of the said crimes, is pleased, à abundante, to inflict perpetual banishment on the said Mompesson, out of all his majesty's dominions.

The Commons being ready in the Painted Chamber, for the conference; before the Lords went to them, the lord treasurer first reported the heads of what he was to deliver, by direction from the house. "To make a short recital of his majesty's gracious speech here yesterday. His majesty's good allowance and approbation of the sentence given against Mompesson; and that, out of his grace and favour to the people, he had added, to the punishment, perpetual banishment. That the lords of this house yesterday presented, by the prince, their humble thanks unto his majesty for his said speech to their house; which was well accepted of. To let them know that the lords did consider of the precedents for Empson and Dudley; but found they did not concur with this case of Mompesson, they being both indicted for treason.—The conference being over, it was ordered, That the whole Proceedings against Mompesson should be drawn up by the king's council, perused by a committee of lords appointed for that purpose, and entered in the records of parliament.

117. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir FRANCIS MICHELL, a Monopolist and Patentee, and Co-Partner with Sir Giles Mompesson: 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1621. [Lords' Journals. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1242.]

Charge against Sir Francis Michell.

April 26, 1621.

THIS day, Mr. serjeant Crew came to the house of lords, and opened the Offences committed by sir Francis Michell, Prisoner in the Tower, and the Proofs thereof: viz.

Offences wherewith sir Francis Michell is charged, and their Proofs.

1. "That he received an annuity of 100*l.* per ann. (to be continued for five years), for executing the Commission concerning Gold and Silver Thread. Proved by the Deed of the Grant thereof from Ed. Dike and sir Nich.

Salter, kat. unto him the said sir Francis, dated 27th May, 1619.

2. "He and Henry Tweedy took upon them the execution of the first Commission touching Gold and Silver Thread, dated 22nd Aprilis, 16 Jac. and therein exceeded and abused their power, by committing divers to prison before conviction, and by committing to prison divers for refusal to enter into bond required by them; which was not then warranted by the commission. Proved by Robert Moore, Wm. Symondes, John Wakeland, and Hugh Underhill, committed for refusing to be bound from their free trades, in May 1618, 16 Jac. and by the bonds of divers others.

3. "That, there being a second Commission, touching Gold and Silver Thread, dated 26th Oct. 16 Jac. he alone committed divers to prison; the authority being unto two. Proved by Eleanor Tower, committed to prison by him alone, in Sept. 1618.

4. "That he erected an Office, kept a Court, made Officers, and divers unwarrantable Orders, and exacted bonds for the observance of the same. Proved by two books of Orders of that Court, and by the deposition of William Acton, S. Paske, James Grove, and Edm. Page, sent for to that Office, before Mompesson and him, for the exacting of Bonds; and by the Bonds themselves, dated June, 1619, and the Bond of Nath. Deards unto Mompesson and Michell, dated 25th Sept. 1620.

5. "That, in the Suit brought by Fowles, in the Star-chamber, against Francis Lake and others, he took of Francis Lake three 22 shilling pieces to compound the same. Proved by Frau. Lake."

Sir Francis Michell's Defence.

Sir Francis Michell, being called to the bar, was charged with the said Offences; and made his Answer unto them particularly.

1. To the first, touching the Annuity of 100*l.* per annum. He denied, that he received that Annuity as he was Commissioner, but in consideration of his pains to be taken to settle the controversies betwixt Mathias Fowles (the king's agent for gold and silver thread, as he termed him) and divers Goldsmiths, and others; which controversy he appeased, and settled what profit should be answered to any for that business; and said, he knew not whether he were a Commissioner or no at that time, when the annuity was granted unto him.

2. That he and Henry Tweedy committed to prison, contrary to the power given by the Commission, dated 22nd April, 16 Jac.; and exacted Bonds, &c. which was not then warrantable. He denied, that he committed any to prison before the 7th of May, 17 Jac.

The Depositions of — were read, who deposed that they were committed unto Prison before.

He denied also, that he took Bonds of any man before there was a Proclamation to warrant the same. Many Bonds were produced, dated in —. And the Proclamation was read, dated in Oct. following, in the same year. Unto which he answered, That many Bonds were taken by Mompesson, but not by him; he confesseth, that he and Mr. Tweedy entered into this business alone, the other Commissioners not having leisure. That he trusted Mr. Tweedy with the examinations of any brought before them; and that they dealt with an even hand, and acquainted the king's Attorney, from time to time, with their courses, and had his advice; and, if Mr. Tweedy be not in more blame than he, then they have done nothing contrary to the Commission.

3. "That, there being a second Commission, touching Gold and Silver Thread, dated 26th Oct. 16 Jac. he alone committed divers unto prison, the authority being unto two. He denies, that he did ever sit down, or do any thing alone, as a Commissioner.—The Deposition of Eleanor Towne being read, it appeared, that he alone had committed to prison; and he being demanded why he recalled his mittimus to the keeper of Newgate, for the commitment of Robert Moore, William Symons, Hugh Underhill, John Wakeland, Robert Patrickson, Jo. Mason, Wm. Whiting, Anth. Sauds, and Thomas Ledsham, committed by him and Henry Tweedy, dated 6th June, A. D. 1618. He confessed he did so, and gave his reason why he did it; viz. because he would write with his own hands, in the margin thereof, the discharge of the said persons.

4. "Touching the erection of the Office, keeping of a Court, making Officers and Orders, and exacting Bonds, to observe those laws: He denied not the erection of an Office, nor keeping of a Court; but said, that he joined with the other Commissioner Mompesson therein.

Some of the Orders contained in the Book of Orders being read; he denied them not; but said, that all the Orders contained in that book were made by the parties consent, of whom they took Bonds; and confessed they were all made by Mompesson and him.

5. "And, touching his taking of money of Lake, in the Star-chamber suit, being then a Commissioner: he denied it not; but said, that Lake had more of him since."

The Prisoner, having leave to speak for himself, made a Discourse, commending the first Commission, touching Gold and Silver Thread; and that he misliked the second Commission, and the proceedings, and would not have meddled with it, if he could have avoided it; but Mompesson told him weekly, that he had command from the king to do thus and thus, and what should he do to withstand Mompesson. Sir Francis was then withdrawn from the bar."

Judgment against Sir FRANCIS MICHELL.

May 4. The Offences wherewith sir Francis Michell is charged, 26 April, being read, the house was adjourned ad libitum.

Mr. Serjeant Crew having opened the Charge, and the Proofs, the house was resumed again. It was put to the question, Whether sir Francis Michell be so guilty of the Offences, or any of them, charged upon him, that is worthy to be censured. Agreed unto, per omnes.

The Lords, being agreed of the Sentence upon sir Francis Michell, sent a Message unto the house of commons: That the Lords have proceeded against sir Francis Michell, upon Complaint of the Commons; they have found him guilty of many exorbitant offences, and are ready to give Judgment against him, if they, with their Speaker, will come to demand it.

Answered, They will come accordingly, with all convenient speed. In the mean time, the lords put on their robes.

The Commons being come, and the Speaker at the bar, after low obeisances, he said:

"There was heretofore related unto their lordships, by the house of commons, a Complaint of many Grievances against Mompesson and sir Francis Michell, for many offences committed by them against the king and the commonwealth; your lordships have proceeded with Mompesson, and given Judgment against him. Understanding that you are ready to pronounce Judgment also against sir Francis Michell, I the Speaker, in the name of the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the commons house of parliament, do demand and pray, that Judgment be given against him the said sir Francis Michell, according to his demerits."

The Lord Chief Justice pronounced the Judgment, in hec verba:

"Mr. Speaker, the lords spiritual and temporal have taken into due consideration the great care and pains taken by the Commons to inform their lordships of the great Complaints, and the qualities and natures thereof, presented unto them against sir Francis Michell and others, whereof their lordships being well prepared by them, to the true understanding of the same, and thereupon having proceeded for the perfect discovery thereof, by examination of divers witnesses upon oath, do find thereby, the said sir Francis Michell clearly guilty of many great Crimes and Offences against his majesty and the commonwealth, and have resolved, at this time, to proceed to Judgment against him for the same.

"And therefore the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of this great and high court of parliament do award and adjudge: 1. That the said sir Francis Michell shall stand, and be from henceforth, degraded of the order of knighthood, with reservation of the dignity of his now wife and children; and the ceremonies of degradation to be performed by direction of this court to the earl Marshal's court. 2. That he shall be imprisoned, during the king's pleasure, in Finsbury Gaol, in the same chamber there, where he provided for others; The Tower, where he now remains, being a prison too worthy of him. 3. That he shall undergo the fine of 1000*l*. 4. That he shall be disabled to hold or receive any office under the king, or for the commonwealth."

118. Proceedings against Sir HENRY YELVERTON, the King's Attorney-General,* for Misdemeanors: 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1621. [1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1232.]

April 17, 1621.

THE lords ordered, That the lord chief justice should grant a special warrant to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to bring sir Henry Yelverton and sir Francis Mitchel before their lordships at the same time.

ARTICLES of Charge against Sir H. Yelverton, with his ANSWERS.

April 18. The house adjourned themselves into a committee, to debate and settle in what manner to proceed against sir Henry Yelverton, then Attorney General, and, being agreed, the Chief Justice resumed his place.

* Of this case Wilson (2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 734) says, "Sir Henry Yelverton, the king's attorney, had found the effects of Buckingham's anger, by not closing with his desires in such patents as he required: so that all his actions being anatomized, some miscarriages are made criminal; he is committed to the Tower, and another put in his place that should be more observant. The king now lays upon him a warrant dormant, which did not much startle him; for he was not long after released, and Judge, carrying with him this character

Sir Henry Yelverton being brought by the gentleman usher to the bar, and kneeling until he had leave, and was willed to stand up; the Lord Chief Justice read the Particulars where-with he was charged; unto the which the said sir Henry Yelverton made several Answers immediately.

The Particulars and the Answers follow, in hec verba: "Sir Henry Yelverton is charged: 1. That he did commit divers, for refusing to enter into bonds, to restrain their own trade, &c. before he had any authority to require any such bonds."—Resp. He confesseth, he committed divers to prison; and justifieth the of honesty, That he was willing to lay down his preferment at the king's feet, and be trod upon by the growing power of Buckingham, rather than prosecute his patron Somerset, that had advanced him, as his predecessor Bacon had spitefully done his."—The Historian's reproach of Bacon is for his conduct in the prosecution of the Earl of Essex; ante, vol. 1, p. 1333, as to which, see Bacon's Apology addressed to the Earl of Devonshire, printed in the second vol. of Birch's edition of his Works in 4to."

same. That he committed none to restrain them of their trade, but for their stubbornness, in not obeying the king's commandment; which he did to advance the lawful profit of his majesty; and that he had authority to do it.

II. That he first signed and directed the warrants for warrants, having no authority for the same, and yet containing many unwarrantable clauses.—Resp. He drew one, and first signed it, and no Clause unwarrantable in that. He justifieth that. For the others, he neither demeth nor confesseth, but remembers not whether he drew them or not.

III. That he advised the Patent of gold and silver Thread to be resumed into the king's hands, conceiving the same to be a monopoly, and advised the Patentees to proceed by contract with the king.—Resp. He advised it not alone. He was the weakest amongst many that advised the contract. He denies that he conceived it to be a monopoly, and doubts not but to prove it to be no monopoly. He denies that he confessed any such thing to the commons. He denies his advice in the contract to colour a monopoly. He advised it in his duty to the king.

IV. He, to procure a Proclamation to take Bonds; signed a Docket, shewing his advising thereupon with the Recorder of London and the City, whereas the Recorder was not acquainted with it.—Resp. He utterly denies he made any such Docket; he did sign a Docket, that he had acquainted the Lord Chancellor and Recorder of London with it; and he did acquaint the Lord Chancellor and the Recorder of London with it, and willed the Recorder to acquaint the City; but denies that the Docket is, that he acquainted the City with it.

V. That 3401 Quo Warrantos (to the vexation of the people) were brought by him, touching the Patent of Inns, and but two came to trial.—Resp. He cannot particularly answer it; if it appear upon record, that there be so many signed by him, he confesseth it; until then, he humbly desires to be retained in their lordships favour; adding, that if he ever deserved well of his majesty, it was in this. And added, that the king and subject were more abused by that Patent than by any other; and that he suffers at this day for that Patent, as he takes it.

VI. That he commenced divers suits in the exchequer, touching the gold and silver Thread, but did not prosecute the same.—Resp. It may be he did.

These Answers and Confessions being read, the said sir Henry Yelverton (having leave to speak) said, he thought himself happy, that, in these misdeeds of his majesty's disfavour, his majesty was pleased to cast that grace upon him, as to send him to this honourable house. That innocency hath her present Answer; wisdom requites time: therefore he made his humble suit, to have a particular of his Charge in writing, and time to answer the same; and that he might have leave to repair to his chamber at Gray's-Inn, and to his house, to search his Papers, for that the matters objected against him did look into his actions of 4, 5, and 7 years of his serving his majesty.

The Speech ended, sir Henry Yelverton was withdrawn; and the house having taken this into their consideration, he was brought to the bar again; and the said Answers and Confessions were read unto him by the clerk, and acknowledged by sir Henry to be truly set down; yet desiring that the same might not preclude him, touching his future defence, desiring a seven-night for his further Answer.

The Lord Chief Justice signified unto him, That the lords were pleased that he should have a copy of the Charge objected against him, and leave (under the Lieutenant's charge) to go to his house in Aldersgate-street, and unto his chamber in Gray's Inn, to view his Papers, and to have time until Saturday come seven-night, to make his further Answer, which was more than his own request. And an order of the house was made for it accordingly.

April 30. Sir Henry Yelverton was brought to the bar; when the Lord Steward informed the house, That his majesty is satisfied concerning the charging sir Henry, in this house, with the matter of Inns and Hosteries. Then the chief justice read the Charge, which was made against him on the 18th of April, with his Answers thereto, and demanded of him, Whether he now would affirm those Answers? Unto which he replied, "That the six Charges against him may be reduced into two, the one of Gold and Silver Thread, the other of Inns and Hosteries. He humbly desired, therefore, that he might then Answer to every particular charge, in seric temporis."

May 2. The Lord Treasurer acquainted the house, "That he had his majesty's commands to deliver a Message to their lordships of a double nature; 1st, an Account of what was done; and, 2ndly, a Signification of what was to be done.—As to the first, his highness had presented their lordships request to his majesty, that he would be pleased, as the case then stood, to command the Seal from the Lord Chancellor. Accordingly, yesterday, his lordship, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the earl of Arundel, at the king's command, went to the Lord Chancellor, and received from him the Great Seal, and delivered the same to his Majesty; who, by commission, hath appointed the keeping of it to him and the other lords with him.—To the second, his majesty hath commanded him to signify to their lordships, "That he understands sir Henry Yelverton, being called here before them the other day, as a delinquent, answered not as such, but as a Judge or Accuser of a member of this house, the lord of Buckingham. And whereas, in his first Speech, here in this house, he touched the king's honour; saying, He suffered for the Patents of Inns, or to that effect, he was so far from extenuating or excusing the offence, that the last day he had aggravated the same. Wherefore his majesty's pleasure is, that himself will be the Judge as to what concerns his own person; and, as to what relates to the lord of Buckingham, since he had besought his majesty that it might be left to this house, so he leaves it wholly to their lordships."

This Message being delivered, the Lords conceived by it, that the king intended to take the Judgment of sir Henry Yelverton out of their hands, as touching his own honour; his majesty having been misinformed, that the Lords had referred it back to him: wherefore a motion was made, "That the house should be humble suitors to his majesty that he would be pleased not to resume this out of their hands, but give their lordships leave to continue Judges thereof." After some debate, it was resolved, That a committee of the whole house should attend his majesty at his pleasure; and that the archbishop of Canterbury, in the name of the whole house, should deliver the following Message to him: "Whereas it has pleased your majesty in a late speech to this house, to require us to do justice upon sir Henry Yelverton, in a matter concerning your own honour; since which time some words have been used in this house, which your majesty conceives do rather aggravate than extenuate his fault: whereupon your majesty did this day signify by the lord treasurer, 'That of what concerns your own honour, yourself would be the judge:' the lords knowing your majesty's tenderness of the privileges of this house, and their own zeal unto your majesty's honour, do humbly beseech your majesty to alter your resolution; otherwise, this change may strike some fear into us, that we are not held so tender and zealous, in our dutiful affections, in point of your majesty's honour, as we desire you should think us to be, and are most ready to yield due proofs thereof."

May 7. The Archbishop of Canterbury reported, "That yesterday, according to the direction of the house, he presented their lordships Petition unto the king, humbly desiring that his majesty would be pleased that this house might continue judges of sir Henry Yelverton, for the matter concerning his majesty's honour." At which time his majesty said, "That, in example of that most famous queen Elizabeth, when this whole house was suitors to her, he must return Answer, Answer-less." But that this morning his majesty's Answer was, "The lords knowing they enjoy their Honours from him, and under him, he doubts not but they will be more tender of his Honour for that cause; therefore he doth return back unto their lordships the whole and final ordering of that Business of sir Henry Yelverton."

May 8. The Lord Chamberlain declared, "That the king had commanded him to acquaint their lordships, That although nothing is so dear unto him as his honour: yet, as before, so he doth now, put into their lordships hands the Cause of sir Henry Yelverton, not mistrusting their affections to him, nor their judgments."

Whereas it was ordered yesterday, That

Thomas Emerson be examined, touching the Message which he brought sir Henry Yelverton, from Mompesson; Mr. Attorney read the Message, which sir H. alledged in his Speech here the 30th of April; viz. That sir H. Y. was not to keep his place (of the king's Attorney General) long, if he withstood the proceedings of the writs of Quo Warranto for the Inns: the said Thomas Emerson was this day called in, and being examined, said: "I never delivered any Message unto sir H. Y. from Gyles Mompesson; but I delivered him some Speech by way of advertisement (not by way of a Message), which past from Mompesson to me concerning him, which, I confess, Mompesson imparted to me, as a Message to be delivered unto sir H. Y. viz. Mompesson told me to this effect: There is a business concerns sir Edw. Villiers, of the Mint-masters place in the Tower; one pretends a former grant: the rest of the king's counsel had or would deliver their opinion, That the former Grant is void in law, and the party unfit to execute the place; only Mr. Attorney opposeth; but, if he takes these courses, and refuseth to concur with the rest of the king's council, to certify his opinion in things that are honest, convenient and agreeable to law, he must not think to be Attorney a month to an end; and tell him so. But I answered, You will not have me tell him so. Yes (quoth Mompesson) I pray tell him so; and, after supper, I took him aside, and asked him whether he would have me deliver that Message to sir H. Y. or no. He answered, Yes, by any means, if you love him.—When I imparted this unto sir H. Y. he answered me, This cannot be true, for I never was in better terms with my lord of Bucks, than now; and sir Edward Villiers is one of the best friends I have, and this suit I commended to him by the means of one Palmer.—Sir H. Y. either by word or writing, acquaints sir Edw. Villiers with this, as I heard: and sir Edw. Villiers was discontented with Mompesson for it: whereupon Mompesson came to me, to know, whether I had been with Mr. Attorney, and wished I had not imparted this Message unto him; and told me, that sir Edw. Villiers was much discontented with him for it. He began to wave it at the first: but afterwards yielded, that he would me to tell Mr. Attorney of it; and afterwards Mompesson went with me to sir H. Y. and acknowledged the Speeches which were delivered by me; and they seemed to be well satisfied the one with the other, and departed friends, for ought I could perceive: since which time I never spake with sir H. Y. but upon one business; and I never had any Speech with him touching the Patent of Inns, nor the granting of any Quo Warranto; neither had this Message any relation to the Patent of Inns, or Quo Warranto; neither did I ever hear of any message to him, touching the lord of Buckingham."

This was read unto him, and he did acknowledge it to be true, and affirmed it upon his oath.

For that his majesty conceives that sir H. Yelverton hath, by his second Speeches, aggravated the former, the lords directed Mr. Attorney General to open unto the house as well the first as the second. And Mr. Attorney, coming to the clerk's table, read: 1. Part of the copies of the first Charge upon sir H. Y. and his Notes for Answer, written in the margin thereof by him. 2. The Notes written by sir H. Y. of his second Speech. 3. The Speech abstracted by sir H. Y. out of those Notes, which he sent to the king, and which, he said, he did speak in the house, and would have spoken, if he had been permitted.—The day being far spent, the lords determined not to proceed against sir H. Y. at this time; but to take another day, to consider upon what point of those Speeches to think him worthy of censure.

May 12. The Lords being put in mind, that, by a former agreement, they are to proceed this morning in the Business of sir H. Yelverton; after long consultation, a double question was propounded: viz.

1. Whether the Words, or any of them, spoken by sir H. Yelverton, in this house, do much touch the king's Honour, as we yet conceive? 2. Whether the Words, or any of them, spoken by sir H. Yelverton, in this house, may touch the king's Honour, as we yet conceive?

Mem. Before the question was put, the house was moved to determine, That they are not concluded by assenting unto either of the two Questions; but that they may alter their opinions upon the hearing of sir H. Y.; which was agreed unto. It was also agreed, 1. To hear sir H. Y. speak, how he will explain himself, before he be censured. 2. That the first question only, and not the second, should be put; which being put, it was agreed unto.

Ordered, That sir H. Yelverton be brought into the Court, to answer for himself, on Monday next, and that an Order be made, and directed to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to bring him at the time appointed, before their lordships.

The king's counsel are to make a collection of the Words spoken by sir H. Yelverton in this house, and to confer with the Judges about them, and to deliver their opinion unto the house, on Monday next, before sir H. Y. be heard; and the king's counsel are to enforce the Words against him.

Sir Henry Yelverton lately sentenced in the Star-chamber.

May 14. The Lord Treasurer delivered a Petition, which sir H. Yelverton exhibited to his majesty; with his majesty's pleasure, that it be read in the house; and the same was read accordingly:

Sir H. Yelverton, in Michaelmas term last, was sentenced in the Star-chamber, for breach of trust, in the unwarrantable passing of a Charter to the city of London, tending to the disberison of his majesty, both in matter of kingly power and high prerogative, and also in matter of revenue and profit of the Crown, and also to the oppression and grievance of the subject, by raising excessive Fees and Exactions. The Sentence consisted of these parts: 1. Imprisonment in the Tower. 2. A fine of 4000*l.* 3. A Declaration of disability and unfitness to hold the place of Attorney.

Sir Henry Yelverton's Speech.

Under this Sentence, sir H. Y. suffereth at this day, for he is a prisoner in the Tower, removed from the place of Attorney, and the fine is leviabie upon him at his majesty's pleasure.

18th of April last, he was brought to the bar in parliament; and being there charged, inter alia, with some miscarriage touching the Patent of Inns, he said, "If he ever deserved well of his majesty, it was in that;" adding, "That the king and subject were more abused by that patent than by any other; and that he suffers at this day for that patent, as he takes it."

30 April, he was again brought to the bar; and, in his Speech, uttered as followeth:

"I cannot but present myself this day before your highness and my lords with much fear, with more grief; for I am compassed with so many terrors from his majesty as I might well hide my head with Adam. His lordship's displeasure wounds me more than the conscience of any of these facts; yet had I rather die, than the commonwealth should receive so much as a scratch from me.—I, that in none of my actions feared the great man, on whom they (by sir Edward Villiers and sir Gyles Mompesson) did depend, much less would I fear them, who were but his shadows; but, my most noble lords, knowing that my lord of Buck. was ever at his majesty's hand, ready, upon every occasion, to hew me down, out of the honest fear of a servant not to offend so gracious a master as his majesty hath ever been to me, I did commit them, viz. the Silkmen."

And, speaking concerning the Patent of Inns, he said, "I cannot herein but bemoan my unhappiness, that, in the last cause, labouring by all lawful means to advance the honest profit of his majesty, and in this (with the sight almost of my own ruin) to preserve his majesty's honour and the quiet of the people, I am yet drawn in question, as if I had equally dishonoured his majesty in both.—When sir Gyles saw, I would not be wooed to offend his majesty in his direction, I received a message from Mr. Emerson, sent me by sir Gyles, That I would run myself upon the rocks; and that I should not hold my place long, if I did thus withstand the Patent of Inns, or to this effect: soon after came sir Gyles himself, and, like an herald at arms, told me to this effect: he had this message to tell me from my lord of Buck. That I should not hold my place a month, if I did not conform myself in better measure to the Patent of Inns; for my lord had obtained it by his favour, and would maintain it by his power.—How could I hut startle at this message? For I saw here was a great assuming of power to himself, to place and displace an officer. I saw myself cast upon two main rocks, either treacherously to forsake the standing his majesty had set me in, or else to endanger myself by a by-blow, and so hazard my fortune. I humbly beseech your lordships, to think nature will struggle, when she sees her place and means of living thus assaulted: for now it was come to this; whether I would obey his majesty, or my lord, if sir Gyles spake true: yet I resolved, in this, to be as stubborn as Mordecai; not to stoop, or pass those gracious bounds his majesty had prescribed me.—Soon after, I found the message in part made good; for all the profits almost of my place were diverted from me, and turned into an unusual channel, to one of my lord's worthies, that I retained little more than the name of Attorney. It became so fatal, and so penal, that it became almost the loss of a suit to come to me; my place was but as the seat of winds and tempests.

"Howbeit I dare say, if my lord of Buck had but read the Articles exhibited in this place against Hugh Spencer, and had known the danger of placing and displacing officers about a king, he would not have pursued me with such bitterness.—But my opposing my lord in this Patent of Inns, in the Patent of Alehouses, in the Irish Customs, in sir Robert Naunton's Deputation of his place in the Court of Wards; These have been my overthrow; and for these I suffer at this day, in my estate and fortune, not meaning to say as I take it, but as I know, for my humble opposition to his lordship, above 20,000*l.* I suffer in my estate by my lord of Buck's means; knowing well, that I suffer in my restraint justly, for my offence. My heart tells me I was faithful to him; I sought no riches but his grace."

Which being read, and sir H. Yelverton brought to the bar, Mr. serj. Crewe and Mr. Attorney General opened the Charge against him; and shewed, that those Speeches of his did directly point at the lord marquis of Buck, and by consequence fastened a scandal on his majesty.

And sir Henry Yelverton (having leave) explained himself touching the said Speeches, and did make his Defence unto the same Charge, which was very long. Then he was withdrawn; and ordered, That he should be brought again to-morrow in the afternoon, and at that time to be proceeded against.

May 15. The lords, being put in mind of their appointment yesterday, to proceed against sir H. Yelverton at this time, it was put to the question, Whether the said sir H. Y. is worthy to be censured for Words spoken by him in this house, which touch the king's honour; and generally agreed unto by all, nem. diss.

The time being spent, and most of the lords having not their robes ready, as not expecting to give Sentence against sir H. Y. at this day, they agreed notwithstanding what Censure they will give against him: viz. 1. To be fined to the king's majesty, at 10,000 marks. 2. To be imprisoned in the Tower, during the king's pleasure. 3. To make such Acknowledgment of his fault and Submission to his majesty, as shall be prescribed unto him by this court; the same to be here at the bar, either in the king's presence or in his absence, at the king's pleasure.

The Lieutenant of the Tower had warning given him by the gentleman usher, to bring sir H. Yelverton thither to-morrow morning, by 9 o'clock.

The lords agreed to be here to-morrow morning in their robes, and to proceed to Sentence sir H. Yelverton:

1. For the matter touching the king's Honour. 2. For the Scandal of the marquis of Buck, Lord Admiral. 3. For the matter complained against him by the Commons.

Mcm. That the house agreed to move the king's majesty, to mitigate sir H. Yelverton's fine. Whereupon the Prince his highness offered to move his majesty therein.

Sir Henry Yelverton's first Judgment.

Sir Henry Yelverton being this day at the bar, and the lords being in their robes, the Lord Chief Justice pronounced the Judgment, in hec verba:

"The lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parliament do award and adjudge: 1. That he, the said sir H. Yelverton, for his Speeches uttered here in this court, which do touch the king's majesty in Honour, shall be fined unto the king's majesty at 10,000 marks. 2. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower, during the king's pleasure. 3. That he shall make such Acknowledgment of his fault, and such Submission to his majesty, as shall be prescribed unto him by this court; the same to be made here, at the bar, either in the king's presence, or in his absence, at the king's pleasure."

Sir Henry Yelverton's second Judgment.

This Judgment being pronounced against the said sir H. Yelverton, for the said Speeches which touched his majesty in Honour, and the prisoner being withdrawn; the lords took into their consideration that the said Words, and many others spoken here in this house, at the same time, by the said sir H. Y. did directly tend to the scandal of the marquis of Buck, lord high admiral of England; and therefore, by their lordships' appointment, the said sir H. Y. was called in again, and brought to the bar, and was charged with the same scandalous Speeches, by the said king's serjeant and attorney general; and whereas the greatest matter of averment, on his part, did depend on a Message which he the said sir H. Y. affirmed was delivered him by Mr. Tho. Emerson from Giles Mompesson, the Deposition of the said Mr. Emerson, taken here in court the 8th of May, was read by the clerk, wherein the said Tho. Emerson did, upon his oath, absolutely deny the said Message: and the said sir H. Y. having leave to speak for himself, and being heard without interruption, he did not give the house any good satisfaction for the scandalous

Speeches here by him uttered against the said lord marquis of Buck. Wherefore, he being withdrawn from the bar, and the said marquis also withdrawing himself out of the parliament presence, the lords spiritual and temporal having long debated the matter, their lordships did resolve; That the said sir H. Y. was worthy to be censured, for false and scandalous Words spoken by him in this house, against the said Lord Marquis; and being fully agreed on their Censure for the same, the lord marquis of Buckingham was called in; and, the prisoner being brought to the bar, the Lord Chief Justice pronounced the Judgment against him, in Ass. verba:

“The lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parliament do adjudge and award: 1. That sir Henry Yelverton, knight, for his false and scandalous Words, uttered in this high court of parliament, against the lord marquis of Buckingham, lord high admiral of England, shall pay 5000 marks unto the said marquis. 2. That he shall be imprisoned. 3. That he shall make such Submission in this court to the said lord marquis, as this court shall prescribe.”

This Judgment being given, it pleased the lord marquis of Buck. freely to remit unto the said sir H. Yelverton the said 5000 marks; for which the said sir H. Yelverton humbly thanked his lordship. The lords also agreed to move his majesty to mitigate sir Henry's Fine, and his royal highness the Prince offered to undertake that office.

Soon after the king wholly relinquished the Fine due to him from sir Henry on the Sentence; he was set at liberty, reconciled to the marquis, and was esteemed, says Rushworth, ‘a man valde eruditus lege, in his time.’—In the succeeding reign he was made a Judge of the Common Pleas. He was author of the Reports: his father was Speaker of the house of commons, anno 1597, see 1. Cobb. Parl. Hist. 895.

119. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir JOHN BENNETT, knt. for Bribery and Corruption: 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1621. [Lords' Journals. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1236.]

April 24, 1621.

THE Lords received a message from the Commons to this effect: “That they had received Complaints of divers exorbitant Oppressions and Bribery, committed by sir John Bennet, knt. late a member of their house, but now expelled by them for the same; that they desire a conference also about him.” Agreed, that the Lords will meet the Commons at four this afternoon, in the Painted Chamber.

April 25. The Lord Treasurer made report of the Conference yesterday with the commons, touching sir John Bennet; the effect whereof was, That whereas the said sir John Bennet, knight, Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, being directed by the law both what to do, and what Fees to take, he did both contrary to the law, exacting extreme and great Fees, and much Bribery; some Complaints against him were opened, with a request of the commons, that they might send up more against him hereafter, if any came unto them.

The Petition of sir John Bennet unto the Lords of this house, was read; humbly shewing, that he is kept close prisoner, under the custody of the sheriffs of London, in his own house; and humbly desiring to have the liberty of his own house, upon good security.

Many motions being made by the Lords, in what sort, and how far, the Petitioner should have this liberty granted him, it was at last agreed and ordered, in manner following: viz.

“Whereas sir John Bennet, knt. this day presented his humble Petition unto the lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parliament, shewing, that he is now kept close prisoner, under the custody of the sheriffs of London, in his own house; and humbly desiring that their lordships would permit him the liberty of his own house, upon good security by him given; it is this day ordered, by their lordships, That, if the said sir John shall nominate unto this court the names of such sufficient persons, that will be bail for his forth-coming, and the court shall like of their sufficiency, then, upon their bond of 40,000*l.* given here in open court, he the said sir John shall have his liberty, or else he shall be committed prisoner to the Tower of London, and have the liberty thereof. And it is left to the choice of sir John Bennet, either to put in such good bail as is required, or to be committed prisoner to the Tower.”

May 30. The Earl of Huntingdon reported, That his lordship, and the other lords joined in committee with him, have taken divers Examinations in the Cause of sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court of the province of Canterbury, by which they find him guilty of much Bribery and Corruption; of which a collection was made, and his lordship delivered the same to Mr. Serjeant Crewe.

The Earl of Southampton also made the like Report, and delivered the Examinations, and the Collections of the Bribery and Corruptions wherewith the said sir John is charged by the same, unto Mr. Attorney General.

Sir John Bennet's CHARGE.

The several Collections, with the names of the Witnesses examined for proof thereof, being first read, sir John Bennet was brought to the bar.

Mr. Serjeant Crewe shewed, That the said

sir John Bennett, being Judge of the Prerogative Court of the province of Canterbury, and being directed by the law what fees to take for probate of wills, and unto whom to grant letters of administration, he had perverted the course of law for Bribes; and, being therewith corrupted, he granted administrations contrary to the law. He charged the said sir John with these particular Bribes and Corruptions; and read the Examinations of these Witnesses, for Proof thereof: viz.

"R. Luther, 1619, died intestate, without issue; Abigail his widow, requiring administration, paid 44s.; but, being opposed by Thomas Luther (a brother), at two several times, gave sir John Bennet, 44l. more; and yet he granted administration unto her and Thomas Luther jointly. Proved by the Examination of Tho. Tyler, Wm. Owen, Abigail the widow.

"Before sir John joined Tho. Luther in administration with the widow, he promised sir John Bennett 100l.; and, after he was joined, he gave him 120l. Proved by the Examination of Thomas Luther.

"For allowance of the Administrators Accounts, sir John had 100l. to distribute amongst the kindred of the intestate, and 50l. for pious uses, and seemed discontent he had not 50l. more. Proved by the Examination of John Worsley, Abigail now his wife.

"William Bannester, 1615, died intestate. His widow gave to sir John 30l. 16s. for administration. Proved by the Examination of Richard Williamson, James Godscall.

"Hercules Wytham claiming to be executor by will, first gave sir John 5 pieces; then Sampford (sir John's man) undertook for 20 pieces more to his master, and 5 to himself, to procure him a good end; which end was against the Will. Proved by the Examination of Hercules Wytham.

"Sir W. Whorwood died 7 years past. Field Whorwood, a younger son, and a daughter, offered to prove a Will; Thomas Whorwood, the elder brother, offered to prove a second Will; Badsor, the proctor, promised sir John 100l. for his hand to Field Whorwood, but paid only 34l. to him, and to his man Sampford 6l. Proved by John Badsor.

"Thomas Whorwood, by advice of Sampford, gave sir John 38l. yet sir John gave Sentence against him. Proved by the Examination of Thomas Whorwood, John Babham.

"George Sturges dying intestate, Francis Sturges, his kinsman, offered sir John, for administration, 20l. in gold, which, sir John said, was too light; then he gave him 40l. and had them. Proved by the Examination of Robert Davies, Robert Sturges, Robert Labourne.

"Phillip Hollman died 1619. Phillip Hollman exhibited his father's Will; a caveat being entered, he sent by Kelvert 20 pieces to sir John for his favour; which he accepted, and demanded 20l. more, which Kelvert promised, but paid not. Proved by the Examination of Phillip Hollman, Rd. Kilvert, proctor.

"James Lingard, 1618, died intestate. John his brother, and James his nephew, contended for administration; for 50l. paid sir John, and 5l. to Sampford, John the brother obtained administration, which after was revoked. Proved by the Examination of William Basse, proctor.

"Robert Seyers, 1618, died intestate, his children minors. Simon Spachurst gave sir John, by direction of Sampford, 20l. for administration (durante minore etate), which was revoked two days before Spachurst to have had a cause heard in the Chancery, which concerned that estate. Proved by the Examination of Wm. Basse, proctor.

"Henry Rylie, 1610, died intestate. John Rylie sued for administration. He gave sir John 50l.; and sir John procured from John Rylie nine rings, set with diamonds, pawned to the intestate for 30l., but were not worth 10l.; Anthony Ashly and Tho. Welles, two of the kindred of the intestate, agreed with Sampford to give sir John 30l., and 10l. to Sampford, to procure sir John to order them part of the intestate's estate; then he ordered them 300l., which John Rylie was enforced to pay; and the said 40l. for the Bribes to sir John and his man. More, sir John had a piece of plate, which cost 4l. 16s. 6d., to change the great bond for true administration into a less. Proved by the examination of John Rylie, Anth. Ashley, Tho. Welles.

"Jane Corne, widow, died intestate; yet Francis Winscombe pretended a Will, pendente lite. Sir John received of Wm. Pound, her next kinsman, 40l., to grant him administration, which this deponent paid. Sir John would not give administration, unless he might have 40l. Proved by the Examination of Lewes Lashbrooke.—The deponent's administrators in trust to perform her Will, for obtaining of administration, gave 50l. in hand to sir John, and their bond to pay 50l. more three months then next after, and 25s. for forbearing the last 50l. Proved by the Examination of John Davies, Rowland Johnson."

The day being far spent, the house was moved, not to have any more read at that time; whereupon the Prisoner was withdrawn; and ordered, That he be brought hither again tomorrow morning.

May 31. Sir John Bennett being called in, Mr. Attorney General opened another part of Bribery and Corruptions, wherewith the said sir John is charged, and the Proofs thereof: viz.

"He received of Mr. Megges, on the behalf of Mrs. Pill, for the continuance of an administration formerly granted to her, and sought to be revoked, the sum of 46l. 13s. 4d. Proved by the Examination of Edw. Willett.

"He received of the widow of Hugh Lee, for the administration of her husband's goods, wherein she was crossed by Caveat, put in by the means of Stamford, sir John's man, 35l. Proved by the Depositions of Edw. Willett.

"He received of sir Edw. Scory, for the administration of his father's goods, 100l. Proved by sir Edw. Scory.

"He contracted with Edmund Malton to have 20*l.* for the administration of the goods of John Clovill: and, the money being brought, there fell 5*l.* more casually out of his pocket; whereupon he took that also, and would not otherwise grant the administration. Proved by the Examination of Edmund Malton.

“ He received of sir John Brand, for an administration of his grandfather's goods, 50*l.*; and this was by way of contract, sir John pressing to have more. Proved by the Examination of Tho. Newman, sir Rob. Hichem.

“ He received of John Hull, for favour in a suit touching the probate of the will of one Holtman, 20*l.* - Proved by the Examination of John Hull.

“ He received of Wm. Huckmore, for the administration of the goods of Philip Huckmore, 15*l.* Proved by Rd. Williamson.

“ He received of Tho. Allen, for the administration of his father's goods, 5*l.* Proved by Rd. Williamson.

“ He received of Solomon and John Mansell, for a dividend out of their brother's estate, 20*l.*; and then gave them but 300*l.*, out of an estate of 8000*l.*; having received, from the widow of the intestate, as she hath confessed, 100*l.*, to the intent he should allot them no more. Proved by Solomon Mansell.

“ He received of sir Rd. Coningsby, for an administration of the goods of George Pollard, 20*l.* Proved by Edw. Willett.

“ He received of Edw. Willett, for an administration, 10*l.* Proved by Edw. Willett.

“ He received of Samuel Neast, for his favour in proving a nuncupative will of John Neast, 10*l.* at one time, and 5 pieces at another, and enforced him to pay a debt of 514*l.* to one Fishburne, for which Fishburne had neither specialty, nor so much as a subscription of the testator to his book. Proved by Samuel Neast.

“ He received of the same Samuel 60*s.* for making a report into the court of Chancery. Proved by Samuel Neast.

“ He received on the behalf of Hester Michell, for administration of the goods of Edward Michell her father, 20*l.* Proved by William Basse.

“ Flower Henshaw, widow, died intestate, in March, 1615, possessed of a personal estate of 14,249*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* and for the granting of the administration of her said goods unto Benj. Henshaw, the said Benjamin did deliver unto Samford 200*l.* of which sum he verily believeth sir John had the greatest part, besides 90*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* to pious uses. Proved by Benj. Henshaw.

“ Andrew More, about two years since, died intestate; the administration of whose goods was, by consent of one Clearke, and others, granted to the eldest brother of the said More; for which sir John had 60*l.* besides a gratuity given to Samford. Proved by Wm. Oland, John Ode.

“ Humphrey Rasearrock, of Pynchley, in Nov. 1616, made his will, and did make Philipp his wife his executrix, and died; which will being controverted, she first gave 20 old angels to sir John to have the same will proved in common form; and, after sentence given, for the proof of the said will, 40*l.* Proved by Rd. Williamson.

“ Dr. Tighe, in Sept. 13 Jac. made his last will, and died; and made Mary his wife executrix, upon condition that she should prove the will in due form of law. And that Wm. Tighe, brother of the said doctor, could not have a copy of the said Will from sir John until he had given him 10 pieces; and afterwards; the said Wm. Tighe having spent a great part of his estate about the probate of the said Will, and being delayed therein, one Lister, sir John's man, said unto the said Tighe, that, if he would give unto his master 100*l.* and a gelding of 10*l.* and unto the said Lister 10*l.* then his master, sir John, would sentence the will for him; who answered, he could not provide so much money presently, but he would put in good bonds for the payment thereof. But the said Lister said, he would not have any bonds: and that, if he would not bring his master 40 pieces, that then one Dr. Bancrofte, brother to the said executrix, should have Sentence; whereupon he procured 15 pieces, and brought them to sir John, who would not accept thereof; saying, He would not take paper for gold. And thereupon the administration of the goods of the said Dr. Tighe was granted unto the said Mary, by the procurement of the said Dr. Bancrofte; upon which the said Lister said that a halting proctor had brought gold from the said Dr. Bancrofte, and that he had over-weighed him. Proved by Wm. Tighe, Tho. Stiles, Rd. Maxey.

“ Sir Henry Middleton, kt. made his last will and testament, and therein made David Middleton his brother, and Henry Middleton his son, executors thereof; and that Alice Middleton the wife of the said David, did give 40*l.* to sir John to have the administration of the goods of the said sir Henry Middleton granted unto her, during the minority of the said Henry the son. Proved by Rd. Williamson.

“ Mary Hawley, about six years since, died intestate, of an estate worth 6 or 700*l.* and Robert Hanbury gave to sir John 60*l.* and more, for the administration of her goods, as it was confessed by John Ray, upon his death-bed. Proved by Jane Fenwick, Eliz. Haley.

“ That Mr. Ashton, by the hands of Phillip King, did give to sir John's lady a Spanish caronnet, or girdle, about the value of 100 marks, for the kindness he had received of sir John about an administration of the goods of—. Proved by Philip King.

“ That Rd. Hawley, about five years since dying intestate, and the administration of his goods being granted to one Henbury during the minority of his children, sir John had 20*l.* or 20 pieces, given him by the said Henbury. Proved by Tho. Geares.

“ That George Scarlett, in June, 1615, died intestate; and that sir John would not grant the administration of his goods unto Peter Scarlett, until the said Peter had given the said sir John 10*l.* in gold in hand, and 5*l.* more to be paid shortly after; which was paid accordingly. Proved by Peter Scarlett."

Sir John Bennett's DEFENCE.

This being read by Mr. Attorney General, the lord chief justice demanded of sir John Bennett what Answer he would make unto the same; who answered to the effect following: viz.

"I come, in all humility, to prostrate myself at your lordships feet. If your lordships expect a speedy and perfect Answer at this time, I hope you will excuse me, as being surprised with such a tempest of affliction.—The particulars of my Answer run through the compass of 19 years, (the whole time of my being Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury), which doth constrain me to beseech your lordships to give me some time not only to call to mind the acts of judicature of mine own court, but to confer with others also.—I humbly desire to have a copy of my Charge; and what I am justly charged with I will confess, after I have had time to consider thereof. Those whereof I am otherwise accused (as of many), I desire (as by the law of nations I ought) to have liberty to peruse the Accusations, to exhibit cross Interrogatories, and to procure Witnesses to be examined, and to have counsel allowed me; and, lastly, I humbly beg at your lordships hands, even for justice sake, time proportionable to the multitude of these Accusations, to make my Answer. And I doubt not but so to extenuate them all, that, when your lordships shall see and consider the ground of them, you will not hold me so foul a guilty man as I am accused for. I am the first ecclesiastical officer charged in this manner, and whereas I am charged to have taken money in pious uses, amounting to a great sum, I will gage my life, that, upon proclamation made thereof, proof cannot be produced of 4000*l.* which is not above 200*l.* per annum, since I was judge; whereof if I cannot give good account, I will beg my bread all my life."

The Prisoner being removed, the house took into their consideration these Requests of sir John Bennet; and, after deliberation thereof, their lordships were pleased to grant the same thus far: viz. "That he should have, 1. Time till the next access of the parliament, to make his Answer. 2. Counsel to advise with only; but no counsel here in court to defend his cause. 3. Liberty to examine Witnesses ex sua parte; not to examine any upon cross Interrogatories. And his Witnesses are to be sworn here in court upon such Interrogatories as he should deliver and the court allow. 4. To have copies of the Heads of the Charge; but no names of any Witnesses or Proofs. 5. To have leave, at the hearing, to take Exceptions unto the witnesses produced against him; and the names of the witnesses are to be delivered him at the hearing. 6. Liberty to search the records of his own court, and his own writings.

And it is ordered, That the king's counsel shall only open the Charge and Proofs against him, but not to inform any thing against him at the hearing.

It is ordered, also, That sir John Bennett may be bailed, upon 20,000*l.*; bonds to be taken here in court, with such sureties as the court shall allow of; and, if he cannot procure sureties that amongst them will be bound in so great a sum, then he shall remain prisoner with the sheriffs of London."

Sir John Bennett being called in again, and at the bar, the lord chief justice told him, how far forth the lords had granted his Requests; and also that their lordships were pleased he should be bailed.

And the Lord Chief Justice, by commandment of the house, did admonish him not to impair his estate, but that it remain in the same plight as when he was first complained of here in court; and also to satisfy Mrs. Eliz. Skorye for 1,100*l.* which he hath of her money, as left with him in deposito; and to satisfy the 1000*l.* which remains in his hands, of sir Tho. Bodley's legacy to the university of Oxon.

Unto which sir John Bennett answered, "I do acknowledge the honourable favour of this Court, the goodness and grace of God, to put me into your hands, and these favours towards me in your hearts. Mrs. Skorye's money I confess due, and will give her satisfaction for the same. As for the other 1000*l.* I have performed as much as sir Tho. Bodley required, having laid out other moneys for the University of Oxford, which I intended to have done (whatsoever I may do yet) out of my own estate, had not these cross fortunes happened. As for my Bail, I am in debt and disgrace; and doubt whether I can procure bail to enter into so great a sum. I humbly beseech your lordships, that myself may be bound in 1000*l.* and my Sureties in another 1000*l.* more."

Sir John Bennett being withdrawn, it was put to the question, Whether the former Order touching his Bail should stand, or to be altered according to his request; and agreed, The former Order to stand.

June 4th. The parliament was adjourned. At the next meeting we hear no more of the Proceedings against sir John, than that he made his appearance to save his bail, and was ordered to attend from day to day; which proved so tedious, that he petitioned the house either to be tried, or discharged from so close an attendance. This was not complied with, and he was obliged to wait, without any Trial, till the 17th of Dec. on which day it being signified to the house, That sir John was so sick that he could not, without great danger of his life, make his personal appearance, it was agreed that the said sir John should stand upon his bail for his appearance, but not to incur any danger of forfeiture for his non-appearance, at this time, by reason of his indisposition. Thereupon the Lord Keeper acquainted the house, That many Petitions were exhibited, every morning against the said sir John, which were much called upon. It was agreed, "That, lest the justice and care of this house, to question the said sir John for the same, may be doubted of, notice shall be given to the petitioners that this time was designed for greater affairs, and too short now to proceed against him upon those Complaints; but that the lords did resolve, at the next access, to proceed against him effectually."

As this next meeting never took place, in this reign, it is very probable, if sir John did not die of this illness, that he got off his trial and censure by the confusion of the times; for his bail would be discharged in course, at the dissolution of the parliament.

120. Proceedings in Parliament against EDWARD FLOYDE, for scandalizing the Princess Palatine: 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1621. [Journals of both Houses. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1250.]

May 5, 1621.

THE House of Lords was moved to take into consideration an act, lately done by the Commons, in conveying before them the person of one Edward Floyde, in examining of witnesses, giving Judgment upon him, and entering it as an act of their own. That this proceeding trespassed deep into the privileges of their house, for that all Judgments do, properly and only, belong unto the Lords. Therefore, it was resolved not to suffer any thing to pass, which might prejudice their right in this point of judicature; and yet, so to proceed, as that the love and good correspondency between both houses might be continued.

The Commons had been some time engaged in examining witnesses against this Floyde; and having sufficient proof of his speaking the Words he was accused of, on the 1st of May proceeded to give Judgment against him. Many arguments ensued on what punishment to inflict upon him; and, among the rest, sir Edwin Sandys said, "That the house ought to be well advised, since there was much difficulty in the case: that their Sentence would be censured in a great part of the Christian world: that the root of this man's malice was ill-affection to Religion, and consequently, to the state. There were but two eminent persons before, viz. king Edward 6, and Queen Jane, who had escaped the virulent tongues of opposites in Religion. This lady Elizabeth was the third, who was much praised by all her enemies.* That he was for joining with the Lords in this proceeding; was it not for the great business they had, and should soon bring before them: In the Sentence not to meddle with his religion, but his offence in tongue; for that would make him be canonized: that the words he had spoken were words of contempt, not of slander; therefore to punish him with as much contempt as may be, &c."

Sentence of the Commons.

On the whole, the Commons agreed on a Sentence, which the Speaker denounced against the offender, kneeling at their bar; which Sentence, was ordered to be entered in their Journals, and is, "Be it remembered, that upon

Tuesday, the 1st day of May, in the year of the reign of our sovereign lord James, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. the 19th; Edward Floyde, late of Clannewayne, within the county of Salop, esq. was impeached before the Commons assembled in this parliament, for that the said Edward sithence the summons of this parliament in the prison of the Fleete, having communication concerning the most illustrious princess the lady Elizabeth, only daughter of our said sovereign lord, and the most excellent prince her husband, did use and utter, openly and publicly, false, malicious and spiteful speeches, of the said two princes; saying in this manner, 'I have heard, that Prague is taken; and Goodman Palsgrave and Goodwife Palsgrave have taken their heels, and run away; and as I have heard, Goodwife Palsgrave is taken prisoner;' and that those words were spoken by him, in most spiteful and scornful manner, with a sneering and scoffing countenance, and with a purpose to disgrace, as much as in him lay, those two princes; and that at other times he did, in like spiteful and reproachful manner, use other malicious and opprobrious words of them. Whereupon the said Commons of their love and zeal to our said sovereign lord, and not minding to let pass unpunished those things, that tended to the disgrace of his majesty's issue, a part of himself, who is head of the parliament, did call before them the said Edward Floyde, and thereof did question him; and thereupon so far proceeded, that after upon the same day, for that the said matters, whereof the said Edward was impeached, were true and notorious, therefore the said Commons in the Commons House assembled in parliament did adjudge and award, that the said Edward should be returned that night prisoner to the Fleete, where before he remained in prison, and to lie that night in a place there, called Bolton's Ward: and shall the next morning be brought to Westminster, into the great yard before the door of the great hall of pleas, and be there set, and stand, upon the pillory, from 9 untill 11 of the clock, in the forenoon, with a paper upon his hat, with this inscription, in capital letters, of these words; 'For false, malicious, and spiteful Speeches, against the King's Daughter, and her Husband;' and from thence shall presently ride to the Exchange within the city of London, upon a horse without a saddle, with his face backwards toward the horse's tail, holding the tail in his hand, with the former paper on his head; and be there again set, and stand, upon the pillory, two hours: and from thence shall ride, in like manner, to the Fleete, and there to remain until the next Friday morning; and, on that morning, to ride in like manner, into Cheshside, in the city of London, and there shall be set, and stand, upon the pillory, with the former paper and inscription, by the space of two hours, that is, from 10 until 12 of the clock in the forenoon of that day; and ride back to the Fleete, in like manner as before: And that there is set, and assessed upon him, a fine of 1000*l*."

This Proceeding the Lords judged to be a great infringement of their privileges; and, on the day aforesaid, after mature deliberation of the matter, the lords sent a message, in writing, to the commons, by two of the Judges, importing, "That the Lords, during all this parliament, have had much contentment in the good correspondency that hath been between both houses: that their lordships have an earnest affection, and an assured confidence of the happy continuance of it to the end; with a full resolution of all possible endeavours, on their parts, tending thereunto. Their lordships having heard of a Censure lately passed in that house, against one Edward Floyde, are desirous of a Conference for the accommodation of that business, in such sort as may be without any prejudice to the privileges of either house. This Conference they desire, if it may stand with the occasions of that house, may be between the whole houses, at 3 in the afternoon, in the Painted Chamber; with power to each committee to treat and confer freely, and to understand each other's reasons."—To the end that the Lords might agree amongst themselves in what manner to proceed at the said Conference, the house adjourned ad libitum; and, being returned, it was resolved, That the archbishop of Canterbury should begin, and the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Chamberlain, and the earl of Southampton, should argue and dispute about it.—Answer returned from the Commons by sir Lyonel Cranfield and others: "The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, have commanded me to let your lordships understand, that they take great comfort in the message which your lordships sent them, and desire the happy continuance of the love and unity of both houses. Their whole house, as a committee, will attend your lordships at the conference desired, and at the time and place appointed."

May 5. p. m. After consulting a precedent shewn their lordships by Mr. Serjeant Crew, 1 Hen. 4. which proved, That the Commons were not Judges in parliament; but that judicature belongs unto the King and Lords alone, the whole house went, as a committee, into the Painted Chamber. And, being returned, the house was resumed; when it was agreed, that the judges and king's council should make a report of the collections of what the Commons alledged for their right of judicature.

The Lords having considered the precedents alledged by the Commons at the last Conference, do find that they tended to prove, 1. "That the house of commons is a Court of Record. 2. That they have administered an Oath in matters concerning themselves. 3. That they have inflicted punishments on delinquents, where the cause has concerned a messenger of their house, or the privilege thereof."—Their lordships determined, "That the question, at this time, is not Whether that house be a Court of Record; nor whether the Oath by them alledged to be ministered, in a matter concerning that house, was given by the house, or by a master in Chancery, then one of their members; nor whether they have a right of judicature in matters concerning themselves? But the question is, Whether that house may proceed to Sentence any man, who is not a member of their house, and for a matter which does not concern them, for which the Commons alledged no proofs, nor produced any precedents? Therefore their lordships agreed to pray a Re-conference about the same; and, at the said Conference, to stick to this only, "That the house of commons have no power of Judicature, no coercion against any, but in matters concerning their own house."

May 8. p. m. The house being to meet the Commons at the Re-conference, this afternoon, concerning the Judicature in which the Lords conceived the others had trenched into their liberties and privileges; and wherein their lordships were not satisfied with the precedents alledged by the Commons, at the former Conference in their defence thereof: yet being desirous to continue that good respect and correspondency which hath been all this parliament between both the houses, they thought proper to order, That the archbishop of Canterbury should begin the introduction to the Conference, and propound any thing that might tend to a gentle ending of the same. And, that if the Commons would agree to a sub-committee, to end this business, then the Archbishop, the Lord Admiral, the Lord Chamberlain, the earls of Arundel and Southampton were appointed for that purpose; and it was further agreed, That this sub-committee should be limited not to yield to any thing, in point of Judicature, which they of the commons have done, lest it may in time become a precedent to wrong the privileges of the lords. The Commons agreed to a sub-committee, to end this difference.

May 12. The archbishop of Canterbury reported the Conference held yesterday between the sub-committees of both houses, to this effect; "1. The Commons shewed their constant resolution to maintain the love and good correspondency between the two houses. 2. Their resolution not to invade the privileges of this house, that have dealt so nobly with them. Lastly, that out of their zeal they sentenced Floyde; but they leave him to the Lords with an intimation of their hope that this house will censure him also. Then they proposed a Protestation to be entered with the Lords for a mean to accommodate the business between them.—A Protestation was immediately drawn up and agreed to, in these words; "That the proceedings lately passed in the House of Commons, against Edward Floyde, be not at any time hereafter drawn or used as a precedent to the enlarging or diminishing of the lawful rights or privileges of either house: but that the rights and privileges of both houses shall remain in the self-same state and plight as before." This Protestation is also entered in the Journals of the Commons, without any addition or alteration by them.

Proceedings before the Lords.

May 25. The archbishop of Canterbury, first of the committee appointed by the House to take Examinations in the Cause of Edward Floyde, reported, That they had taken several, and were satisfied of the Proof of the Crimes objected against him; and moved the house that Mr. Attorney General might read the said Examinations. Accordingly, the Deposition of six persons were read, and then it was ordered, That Floyde should be brought to the bar the next morning, in order to proceed to Judgment against him.

The Attorney General's Charge.

May 26. Edward Floyde being brought to the bar, Mr. Attorney charged him with notorious Misdemeanors and high Presumption: viz. 1. For rejoicing at the losses happened to the king's daughter and her children. 2. For discouraging of others, which bear good affection unto them. 3. For speaking basely of them. 4. For taking upon him to judge of the rights of kingdoms.

The first, Mr. Attorney shewed, that, in Dec. last, Floyde, being prisoner in the Fleet, having advertisement that Prague was taken, did, upon all occasion, shew himself joyful and glad of that calamity and afflictions which had happened unto the prince and princess Palatine, the king's only daughter, and their children.

And for the second, Mr. Attorney shewed, that this Floyde, relating unto Henry Pennington this loss of Prague, and the captivity, as he believed, of the king's son in law, and of the king's daughter and her children; and the said Pennington wishing that himself, and all the convenient men of this kingdom, were pressed forth, not to return with their lives, till they had redeemed her from captivity; he the said Floyde replied: 'I am sorry, thou art such a fool.' And the said Pennington reproving him for saying so, he the said Floyde replied, 'That, if he had been out of his chamber, he would have struck him.'

And for the third, Mr. Attorney shewed, That the said Floyde taking occasion to speak of these matters, did term the prince and princess Palatine, the king's daughter, by the ignominious and despitiful terms of 'Goodman Palsgrave,' and 'Goodwife Palsgrave;' and termed him 'that poor lad;' and scoffingly, and with great jollity, related a stage play of the princess running away with two children, the one under one arm, and the other under the other arm, and the third in her belly, and the Palsgrave following with the cradle.

And for the fourth, Mr. Attorney shewed, That one Abdias Cole going to preach on a Sunday morning in the Fleet, the said Floyde called to him, and told him that Prague is taken; and the said Abdias Cole answering, 'That is little comfort to me,' Floyde replied, 'Nay, now we may freely speak it, for any nobleman has as good right to be king of Wales, as he, meaning the Palsgrave, to be king of Bohemia.'

Here Mr. Attorney opened that point of the ancient Oath of Allegiance: * Of which oath and the danger to the offender in such case, the said Floyde (being a lawyer) could not be ignorant and that therefore his offence was greater. And Mr. Attorney did further shew, That this Floyde; being a man of good estate, was a justice of peace in the county of Salop, and for that he was put out of the commission (which was affirmed to be true, by Mr. Baron Bromley, being this day present). And also that this Floyde, having heretofore studied the common laws of this land in the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar, was put out of that society by the benchers of that house.

Floyde's Answer.

This being said, the Lord Chief Justice demanded of Floyde what Answer he could make unto these Misdemeanors, wherewith he was charged by Mr. Attorney. Floyde thereupon began with a long discourse, to traduce the persons of such as had deposed against him; but, being demanded to make a direct Answer to the Charge; He said, 'I cannot remember that these Words were ever spoken by me.'

Whereupon the Clerk read the Depositions and Examinations of Lettice Harris, Henry Pennington, John Broughton, George Hardman, Edward Aldred, Abdias Cole. Which being read, the L. C. Justice demanded of Floyde, whether he spake these Words, 'Goodman Palsgrave,' and 'Goodwife Palsgrave.' He the said Floyde said, 'I spake not those Words in such sort as they are laid down in the said Examinations.'—The L. C. Justice demanding of him again, whether he spake those Words, or words to that effect; He answered, 'It is but a folly for me to deny them, because so many have proved them.' And afterwards he said, 'I will not deny them, because so many have proved them.' And he being demanded, whether he spake the other words, or used the insolent behaviour towards the prince and princess Palatine; answered, 'I remember it not.'

lords were fully satisfied by these Examinations, and Floyd's Answers, yet, for order sake, it was put to the question, Whether Edward Floyd be so guilty of the offences wherewith he is charged, as that he deserves to be censured; and agreed unto by all, non. diss.

The Censure against E. Floyd being pronounced in this manner: viz. "1. Not to bear Arms as a gentleman, &c. 2. To ride with his face to the horses tail, to stand on the pillory, and his ears nailed, &c. 3. To be whipped at a cart's tail. 4. To be fined at 5000*l.* 5. To be perpetually imprisoned in Newgate." It was put to the question, first, Whether the said Floyd shall be whipped or no, which some lords doubted to yield unto, because he was a gentleman; yet it was agreed, per plures, that he shall be whipped.—Then it was put to the question, Whether Floyd's ears shall be nailed to the pillory or no; and agreed, per plures, not to be nailed.

Sentence of the Lords.

Then the form of the Sentence being read, it was put to the question, Whether those Punishments therein mentioned shall be inflicted on the said Floyd or no; and agreed unto generally. And he being brought to the bar again, Mr. Attorney General came to the clerk's table, and making a short repetition of Floyd's offence, prayed the lords to proceed to Judgment against him.

Whereupon the Lord Chief Justice pronounced the Sentence in these words: viz.

"The lords spiritual and temporal, considering of the great Offence of the said Edward Floyd, do award and adjudge: 1. That the said Edw. Floyd shall be incapable to bear arms as a gentleman; and that he shall be ever held an infamous person, and his testimony not to be taken in any court or cause. 2. That on Monday next, in the morning, he shall be brought to Westminster-hall, and there to be set on horse back, with his face to the horse tail, holding the tail in his hand, with papers on his head and breast, declaring his offence, and so to ride to the pillory in Cheapside, and there to stand two hours on the pillory, and there to be branded with a letter K in his forehead. 3. To be whipped at a cart's tail, on the first day of the next terms, from the Fleet, to Westminster-hall, with papers on his head, declaring his offence, and then to stand on the pillory there two hours. 4. That he shall be fined to the king in 5000*l.* 5. That he shall be imprisoned in Newgate, during his life."

Mem. The clerk signed a warrant to the Serjeant at Arms, and the Warden of the Fleet, to see the Sentence executed; with a clause therein, for the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and all other his majesty's officers to whom it might appertain, to be aiding, and assisting unto them. And Mem. That these Words were written in the Paper to be on Floyd's head, declaring his offence: viz. "Forguominous and despicable Words and malicious and scornful behaviour towards the Prince and princess Palatine, the king's only daughter, and their children."

Cambden tells us, That every part of this Sentence was executed on Floyd; but the Lords Journals assure us, That some days after on a motion from the Prince it was ordered, That the punishment of whipping, with all that belongs to it, to be inflicted upon Edward Floyd, be suspended and forborn, until the pleasure of the house be further known; the rest of the punishment to be executed according to the former order. It was also ordered, That, hereafter, when any Censure beyond imprisonment be agreed on, that judgment thereupon be not then given, but on another day, or sitting, that time may be taken to consider thereof.

121. Proceedings against GEORGE ABBOT,* Archbishop of Canterbury, for the killing of Edward Hawkins, one of the Lord Zouch's Keepers: 19 JAMES I. A. D. 1621. [2 Collier's Eccl. Hist 720. Fuller's Ch. Hist. Book 10, Cent. Heylin's Life of Laud, 80. Hacket's Life of Williams, 66. Sir Henry Spelman's Remains.]

THE next summer, (1621,) archbishop Abbot being invited by lord Zouch to kill a buck at his Park at B. amzil, in Hampshire, met with a very calamitous accident, for shooting at a deer with a cross bow, the keeper, coming up unwarily too forward, was struck with the arrow under the left arm, and died about an hour after.† The king informed of this misfortune,

* James Howell in a letter to sir Thomas Savage, Nov. 9, 1622, writes, "Since that sad disaster which befel Archbishop Abbot, to kill the man by the glancing of an arrow as he was shooting at a deer (which kind of death befel one of our king's once in New Forest) there hath been a commission awarded to debate whether upon this fact, whereby he hath shed human blood, he be not to be deprived of his archbishoprick; and pronounced irregular: some were against him; but bishop Andrews, and sir Henry Martin, stood stiffly for him, that in regard it was no spontaneous act, but a mere contingency, and that there is no degree of men and apprehensive scandal might be given if the matter was passed over, resolved to have the case thoroughly examined.] To this purpose the following Letter was directed to the Lord Keeper Williams, the bishops of London, Winchester, Rochester, and the elects of St. Davids and Exeter, sir Henry Hobart, knight, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Mr. Justice Doddridge, of B. R. sir Henry Martin Dean of the Arches, and Mr. Dr. Steward, or any six of them, whereof the Lord Keeper (then bishop of Lincoln elect) the bishop of London, Winton, and St. David's elect, to befour.]]

‘ It is not unknown unto you what happened this last summer unfortunately to our right trusty, and our right well beloved counsellor the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, who shooting at a deer with a cross bow in Bramail Park, did with that shoot casually give the keeper a wound whereof he died, which accident, though it might have happened to any other man, yet because his eminent rank and function in the Church hath (as we are informed) ministered occasion but is subject to misfortunes and casualties, they declared positively that he was not to fall from his dignity or function, but should still remain a regular, and in statu quo prius. During this debate, he petitioned the king that he might be permitted to retire to his alms-house at Guildford where he was born, to pass the remainder of his life; but he is now come to be again rectus in cursu, absolutely quitted, and restored to all things: but for the wife of him who was killed, it was no misfortune to her, for he hath endowed herself, and her children with such an estate, that they say her husband could never have got.”

‡ Heylia and bishop Hacket both give a letter (which is also in the Cabala, p. 55.) expressing his opinion, that Abbot by this mischance, had become irregular and incurred forfeiture, and his desired hope that the king would shew him mercy.

¶ It is elsewhere stated “quorum unum Mevensium, &c.” It happened very unluckily, as it is expressed in an article in the British Museum, that there were four bishops elected but not consecrated, viz. Dr. John Williams, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, to the see of Lincoln, Dr. John Davenant to that of Salisbury, Dr. Valentine Cary to that of Exeter, and his old antagonist Dr. Wm. Laud, whose preferment on this occasion he had warmly opposed, to that of St. David's; and all except Dr. Davenant scrupled the archbishop's capacity to lay hands on them till he was cleared from all imputation as to this fact. It seems not unlikely that this scrupulosity arose from a cautious apprehension, that the validity of their consecrations might afterwards be questioned if performed by a metropolitan who was irregular, or to whom any imputation or suspicion of irregularity might be reproached.

‘ of some doubts, as making the case different in his person in respect of the scandal, (as is supposed) we therefore, being desirous (as it is fit we should) to be satisfied therein, and reposing especial trust in your learning and judgment, have made choice of you to inform us concerning the nature of the ease: and do therefore require you to take it presently into your consideration, and the scandal that may have risen thereupon, and to certify us, what in your judgments the same may amount unto, either to an irregularity or otherwise, and lastly what means may be found to redress the same (if need be) of all which points, we shall expect to hear your reports with what diligence, and expedition, you possibly may. Dated at Theobalds, 3 Oct. 1621.’

To this Letter the bishops and others to whom the consideration of the Archbishop's Case was referred, returned their Answer in these words:

‘ May it please your majesty; Whereas we received a command from your majesty under your royal siget, to deliver our opinions unto your majesty, whether an irregularity or scandal might arise by this unfortunate act, which God permitted to come to pass by the hand of the most reverend Father in God, the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, shooting in a cross-bow at a deer in Bramail Park: as also of the cure and remedy of the same irregularity. For the first; Whether any irregularity be contracted by this act, in the person of my Lord Archbishop or not? No greater part of our number could assent or agree, because the Canons and Decrees themselves are so general, and so ready to entertain distinctions and limitations, the doctors and glosses so differing, inferences and disputes so peculiar to every man's conceit and apprehension, authorities of canonists and casuists, so opposite in this very case in hand, that we could not return unto your majesty any unanimous resolution or opinion in the same. For the second; Whether any scandal may arise out of this act? We are of opinion a scandal may be taken by the weak at home, and the malicious abroad, though most of us believe there was no scandal given by the said right reverend father. For the third; We are all agreed not only that a restitution or dispensation may be granted by your majesty, either immediately under the great seal, or (which most of us in all humility represent unto your majesty) by the hands of some clergyman delegated by your majesty for that purpose, or what other way your majesty shall be pleased to extend that favour, but withal we are of opinion that it is most fitting for the said reverend father, both in regard of his person, and the honour of the church, to sue unto your most gracious majesty for the said Dispensation in majorum cautelam si qua forte sit irregularitas. All which, craving pardon for our weakness, we do in all humbleness submit to the decision of your majesty's most profound and incomparable wisdom.”

Jo. Linc. elect, C. S.; Geo. London.; La. Winton.; * Jo. Roffens.; Guil. Meneveus. elect; Valen. Exon. elect; Henr. Hubart, Jo. Doddridge, H. Marten, Ny. Stewarde."

The Archbishop governed by this advice, and applying to the king, his majesty directed a Commission to the bishop of Lincoln, lord keeper, to the bishops of London, Winchester, Norwich, Coventry, and Litchfield, to the bishop of Bath and Wells, Ely and Chichester, empowering them or any six of them, of which the bishops of Lincoln, London, Winchester and Norwich were to be of the quorum, to dispense with any irregularity, in case the late accident had drawn any such blemish or imputation upon the Archbishop. By this Instrument the canons, in case there was need, were over-ruled and dispensed with, the force of Abbot's character is revived, and he is fully restored to the exercises of his function. This is a wonderful relief from the crown; and supposes a patriarchal at least, if not a papal authority vested in the king. The Record lays the death of the Keeper upon his own rashness and want of care, makes the homicide perfectly casual, that the Archbishop was in no degree to blame for the misfortune: and that this requesting his majesty for a dispensation was only ad cautelam ex superabundantiis. And that the reader may better remark how far the dispensation reaches, he may please to observe, that irregularity lays the sacerdotal powers as it were asleep, forfeits all preferments, and makes the person incapable of any for the future.

To return: Besides the favourable report of the Archbishop's case in the commission, there was a learned Apology† drawn up for him. The author proves hunting for health allowed clergymen. This point he makes good from several authorities, and disables some objections from the canon law. From hence he advances to prove that casual homicide sticks no blemish, * Heylin, in his life of Laud, ascribes the inclination of bishop Andrews (between whom and Abbot there had been some disgust) towards the protection of Abbot, to two motives, 1st, an unwillingness too rigidly to construe the canons, lest afterwards a rigid construction of those canons might hurt himself or his brethren. 2d, An apprehension that if Abbot should be deprived Williams would succeed him, who Andrews thought would make a dangerous head of the church. In other respects all the historians agree that Andrews was no friend to Abbot. Of sir Henry Martin, Heylin says that he had received his offices and preferments from Abbot, and so was bound by gratitude to maintain his cause. He farther observes that it required not the gift of prophecy to foretel that Williams would be a dangerous head to the church. He was in 1641 the contriver of the injudicious and mischievous protestation of the bishops, and of their secession from parliament.

nor incurs any irregularity, where the person committing it was engaged in no unlawful business or recreation, and took all necessary precaution to guard against accidents. That all this might be fairly pleaded in behalf of the Archbishop, is not only taken for granted in the Dispensation, but farther made out by this Apologist.* For the purpose, he takes notice that the canon de clerico venatore, cited in the Decretum against the Archbishop, has a mark of censure and unauthenticness put upon it by Gratian: he brings the gloss for evidence, that whereas this canon is cited out of the 4th Council of Orleans, there is no such thing there to be found. Thirdly, the pretended canon is levelled only against clamosa venatio, but quieta or modesta is allowed by the canonists. Now this latter was the recreation in which the misfortune happened at Bramzil, as may be seen in the dispensing instrument. The Apologist reinforces his argument by observing that by 35 H. 8. cap. 16, no canon is in force in England, which clashes with the laws and statutes of this realm or the prerogative royal; and that the canon urged against Abbot is of this nature. For by Charta de Foresta, archbishops and bishops have express liberty to hunt; and that from 13 R. 2, cap. 13, it follows by necessary implication, that a clergyman who has 10*l.* per annum or upwards, may keep greyhounds or hounds to hunt. And to mention nothing farther from him, he argues, that Lindwood who was very well skilled in the English ecclesiastical constitutions, condemns only the excesses of hunting in clergymen, and the undue application of that liberty, but does no where pronounce it as absolutely unlawful for their profession: After this he gives several instances of bishops who have used this diversion without censure or imputation.

And, lastly, the famous sir Edward Coke, upon the question being put to him by sir Henry Saville, Whether a bishop may hunt in a part by the laws of the realm? answered affirmatively in these words: 'He may hunt by the laws of the realm, by this very token, that there is an old law, that a bishop when dying is to leave his pack of dogs (called muta canum, i. e. muti de chiens) to the king's free use and disposal.'

To this Apology there is an Answer returned, as it is said by sir Henry Spelman, but this discourse looks strained, and discovers something of a prosecuting humour, and I cannot help saying it falls short of that strength and candour customary to this learned gentleman, and therefore, being a posthumous work, I would willingly believe some part of it at least was the work of another hand.

But, notwithstanding the Archbishop's recreation, and his precaution against misfortune, was defensible, yet his being excused the forms of * Lord Coke 3 Inst. cap. 73. p. 309. All canons against the laws or customs of the realm are void and of none effect.

† See Acc. 3d. Inst. 308, 339; and the very ancient authorities there cited.

law, and not brought to a trial for this casual homicide, was something remarkable. His being thus screened from customary prosecution, is, I suppose, owing to the protection of the Dispensation above mentioned.

AN APOLOGY for Archbishop Abbot; touching the Death of Peter Hawkins the Keeper, wounded in the Park at Bramsall, July 24, 1621.

1. It is certain that in foro conscientie, this case may not only deservedly produce a fear and trembling in him who was the accidental cause thereof; but may justly make the tallest cedar in Lebanon to shake, in recounting with his inward man, what sin it is that hath provoked God to permit such a rare and unusual action to fall out by his hand: which maketh him, for the time, to be fabula vulgi, and giveth opportunity to the enemies of religion of all kinds, to rejoice, to speak their pleasure, to fill their books and libels, within the realm, and perhaps, beyond the seas. And that, concerning his calling as well as his person, not only for the present, but also in future ages; beside grief to his friends, and some scandal to the weak, who do not rightly apprehend things, but raise questions which few men can resolve. To all which may be added, the interpretation of it by his majesty, graciously or otherwise; and the forfeiture, that in rigorous construction of law may be put upon him, although held for no great delinquent; besides the providing for a widow and four fatherless children. All which may pierce a heart that is not senseless; and day and night yield him matter enough of troubled meditations.

2. And yet, lest he that intended no ill (much less to that person, a poor man and a stranger to him) should be swallowed up with sorrow; he is not devoid of some comfort, as that consensus facit peccatum, and voluntas facit reatum; and where those concur not, misdemeanours are properly contra nullum decalogi præceptum. And that when God, speaking of such casual death (Exod. 21. 13.) useth these words, 'If a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him (the slain man) into his hands; divines collect thereupon, that it is not humanum but à Deo, which no man's providence can absolutely prevent. For what God will have done, shall be; and no creature way dare to set him to school in what manner, or by what person he will have it performed. And Deuteronom. xix. 6, 10. God putting the case of the man slain by the iron of his neighbour's ax slipping off, appointeth cities of refuge, lest he should be slain also; who (as he saith) was not worthy of death: and again, that innarius sanguis, innocent blood be not shed in the land. Where we may collect, that such cases are foreseen and ordered by God himself; and that no calling, no not that of the priest, is free from that which God will have accomplished; since he must communem hominum subire sortem. Homo sum, humani nihil à me alienum puto. And, Quod cuique contingere potest, cuius potest; although of all others, the priest should be most wary, what he attempt and how.

4. See then in the ecclesiastical law, what grace is afforded to him, who against his will, hath casually been the death of another. There is in the decretals, a title De Homicidio Voluntario vel Casuali: concerning the latter of which, there be many rescripts; which demonstrateth, that in human life such things do frequently fall out. In these, there are five chapters, Cap. Lator: Cap. Dilectis filiis: Cap. Ex Litteris: Cap. Ex Litteris tue: Cap. Johannes: where the Rubrick is, 'Homicidium casuale non imputatur ei qui non fuit in culpa;' and 'Homicidium casuale non imputatur ei qui dedit operam rei licite, nec fuit in culpa.' And there the decision is evermore, that there is no irregularity 'in promovendo,' or 'in promotio ad sacros ordines.'

This is the more to be noted, because it is not the interpreters, but the body of the law. And the gloss thereupon hath; 'Nota, quod homicidium casu commissum, culpa non præcedente non est imputandum.' And, 'Sibi imputari non debet, quia fortuitos casus, qui prævideri non possunt, non prævidit.' And, 'De casu fortuito nullus tenetur, cum prævidere non possit.' And upon this the stream of the Canonists do run, as by a multitude of books may be shewed: with whom our Bracton, a great civilian and common lawyer too; 'Homicidium casuale non imputatur.'

5. The two heads whereto the law looketh, freeing a man from blame, and expressly from irregularity, are; that the person by whom the action is performed, do not dare operam rei, illicite, and that he use diligence of his part that no hurt be committed. Azorius the Jesuite saith, 'Irregularitas, cum ob delictum constituitur, non nisi ex lethali peccato contrahitur: nisi ex homicidio fiat quis irregularis, eo quod det operam rei vetite et interdictæ; nam tunc quamvis homicidium causa sequatur, ob culpam nostram levem vel levissimam, multum est opinio irregularitatem contrahi.' And Ivo in his canons, some hundreds of years before him; 'Si quo fratres in sylva arbores acciderint, et appropinquante causa unius arboris, frater fratri dixerit Cave, et ille fugiens, in pressera arboris inciderit, ac mortuus fuerit, vivens frater innocens de sanguine germani dijudicatur.' Now, the case at Bramsil, is within the compass of these two conditions. For the party agent, was about no unlawful work: for what he did, was in the day, in the presence of forty or fifty persons, the lord Zouch, who was owner of the park, not standing by, but inviting to hunt and shoot; and all persons in the field were called upon to stand far off, partly for avoiding harm, and partly lest they should disturb the game; and all in the field performed what was desired. And this course did the lord archbishop use to take, when or wheresoever he did shoot; as all persons at any time present can witness: never any man being more solicitous than he evermore was. And the morning when the deed was done, the keeper was twice warned to stay behind, and not to run forward; but he carelessly did otherwise, when he that shot could take no notice of his galloping in before the bow; as may be seen by the verdict of the coroner's inquest.

6. This case at Bramsil is so favourable; that the strictest writers of these times, directly conclude, that if a clergy-man committing cassate homicidium be about a forbidden and interdicted act, yet he is not irregular. if the interdicted act be not therefore forbidden, because it may draw on homicide. And thereupon, inasmuch as hunting is forbidden in a clergy-man, not in respect of danger of life, but for decency, that he should not spend his time in exercises which may hinder him from the study fit for his calling, or for other such reasons; irregularity followeth not thereupon. And to this purpose, writeth at large Soto, Covarravias, and Suarez, who are great canonists and schoolmen. And if this be true, (as out of great reason it may be so held) how much further is the present case in question from irregularitie.

7. But some go directly to the point, and say, that the lord archbishop did negare operam rei illicite, because he was on hunting; for that was interdicted to a bishop by the canon De Clerico Venatore; and so by a consequent he must needs be irregular. To which objection, see how many clear and true answers there be. As first that the canon being taken out of the decrees, is by Gratian himself branded to be pala, no better than chaff. Secondly, it is cited out of the fourth council of Orleans; and there is no such thing to be found, as the gloss well observeth. Thirdly, it forbiddeth hunting cum canibus aut accipitribus; and none of these were at Bramsil. And if you will enforce it by comparison or proportion, the rule of the law is, 'Favores sunt ampliandi, odia restringenda:' where mark, when hunting with dogs or hawks is forbidden, it is not for fear of slaughter, for there is no such danger in either of them. Fourthly, the canon forbiddeth hunting obseptatis causa, but not recreationis or vulneribus gratis, which the books say is permitted etiam episcopo. Fifthly, the canon hath, 'Si suppius dentatus fuerit,' if he make a life or occupation of it; which the world knoweth, is not the archbishop's case, but a little one time in the year, directed so by his physician, to avoid two diseases, whereunto he is subject, the stone and the goat. Sixthly, it is clamor venantis against which the canon speaketh, not quies or modestia, which the canonists allow; and this whereof the question ariseth, was most silent and quiet; saving that this accident, by the keeper's unadvised running in, hacht afterwards made a noise over all the country.

8. These exceptions, as they naturally and without any enforcing, give answer to this objection of the canon; so there is another thing that may stop the mouth of all gainers; if any reason will content them. And that is, that by the stat. of Hen. 8, 35. ca. 16, no canon is in force in England, which was not in use before that time, or is not contrary or derogatory to the laws or statutes of this realm, nor to the prerogatives of the royal crown: of which nature this is. For in Charta de Foresta, archbishops and bishops by name have liberty to hunt: and 13 Rich. 2, cap. 13, a clergy-man who hath 10*l.* by the year, may keep grey-hounds to hunt. And Linwood, who lived soon after that time, and understood the ecclesiastical constitutions and the laws of England very well, in treating of hunting, speaketh against clergy-men using that exercise unlawfully; us in places restrained or forbidden; but hath not one word against hunting simply. And the arch-bishop of Canterbury had formerly more than twenty parks and chases of his own, to use at his pleasure; and now by charter hath freewarren in all his lands. And by ancient record, the bishop of Rochester, at his death, was to render to the arch-bishop of Caunterbury his kennel of hounds as a mortuary, whereof (as I am credibly informed) the law taketh notice for the king sede vacante, under the name of muta canum and muttura. To this may be added, the perpetuated use of hunting by bishops in their parks, continued to this day without scruple or question. As that most reverend man the lord arch-bishop Whiggysse used in Hartlebury-park while he lived at Worcester; in Ford-park in Kent; in the park of the lord Cobham, near Caunterbury; where by the favour of that lord, he killed twenty bucks in one journey; using hounds, grey-hounds, or his bow, at his pleasure, although he never shot well. And the same is credibly reported of the lord arch-bishop Sandes. And it is most true, that the deans and chapter of Winchester use it as they please in their franchise. To say nothing of Dr. Renard, whose hounds were long famous throughout all England; and yet he was by profession a canonist; and knew well what induced irregularity.

I will add two things more, which directly appertain to the arch-bishop of Canterbury. The one is the famous record, that at the coronation of queen Eleanor, wife to Hen. 3. the earl of Arundel (who was by his place cup-bearer for that day) was enforced to serve by a deputy, because he was excommunicated by the archbishop, for taking up his hounds coming into the earl's grounds to hunt; where the archbishop pleaded and alledged that it was lawful for him to hunt within any forest of England, whensoever he would. The other, is that which is written of archbishop Cranmer, in his life; where I will cite the very words: Permisserat ei pater aucupium, venationem, equitationem, &c. Quibus quidem, cum jam archiepiscopus relaxare animum et abducere se à rebus gravius vellet, ita utebatur, ut in famulatu suo non fuerit quisquam qui in generosum equum salire ac tractare elegantius, aut aves ferasque aucupio aut venatione inaequi commodius intelligentisque potuisset: saepe etiam, etsi oculis infirmis esset, arcum tendens, sagitta percussit feram. Out of all which, and many more records and cases that are to be shewed, the conclusion is clear, that howsoever the canon may touch bishops and clergymen beyond the seas, it meddleth not with the bishops of England, who by favour of princes and the state have baronies annexed to their sees. So that it doth arise out of true collection from these heads, that there is no danger of irregularity in the lord archbishop's case, either toward himself or other men. His majesty's princely grace giveth an end to all; and this he most humbly craveth. For other things, God being appeased (as he hopeth that he is) he dreadeth not the tongue or pen of any enemy: among whom, the popes and cardinals have wilfully committed many poisonings, murders, and outrageous acts; and yet they must believe that they are the head and chiefest members of the church.

An ANSWER to the foregoing Apology for Archbishop Abbot; By Sir Henry Spelman, kt.

TOUCHING the first, second, and third sections: It may be that the priests in the old law, whose ministry was altogether in blood, were not prohibited but that upon just occasion they might shed even the blood of man as well as of beasts; and put on an armour as well as an ephod. For the tabernacle was covered with red skins, to signify 'cruentum seculum, cruentum ministerium': and Moses, whose hands were dypt in blood, was not forbidden to be the chief founder thereof. But when the temple came to be built, which was the image of the church of Christ, then the hands of David, though they had fought the battles of God, yet because they were seasoned with blood, they might not lay one stone in that foundation. Therefore, when the old law and this bloody priesthood were grown to an end, and going out of the world, and that the priests of the gospel were entering in their room into the world; our Saviour commanded Peter to put up his sword; for now, 'arma horrentia Martis rejicienda'; and 'stola candida induenda fuit.' Though then some priests in the old law and many thousand Levites were martialmen, yet for many hundred years in the time of the gospel, I read not of any: insomuch, that the succeeding ages desiring a martial saint, were driven to suppose St. George. Whether therefore these laws of the church, which at this day prohibit clergymen to meddle with matters of blood, be merely ex jure positivo, or ex divino mixto, I leave it to the determination of the reverend divines.

4. Concerning the cases alledged out of the decretals: it is true that the rubrick is, 'Homicidium casuale non imputatur ei qui non fuit in culpa'; and 'Homicidium casuale non imputatur ei qui dedit operam rei licitæ, nec fuit in culpa.' And so likewise, is that alledged out of the gloss thereupon, and out of Bracton. But let us parallel the case in these with them, which are as followeth.

A and P two clerks sporting together, A by chance threw P down, who having a knife by his side, the same happened to wound A that he died. Pope Alexander 3. commanded the bishop of Exeter in this case to admit P to holy orders; for sporting was lawful.

A sickly chaplain being gotten upon an unruly horse, and he checking him with bridle and spur to stay him, the horse brake his bridle, cast his master, and running over a woman coming by, killed a child in her arms! This chaplain was admitted to holy orders, for that neither in will nor act he committed homicide, but also did a lawful act.

One being to unlade a cart of hay, looked round about to see if any were near, and seeing none, threw a stack off the cart, and having unladed it, a boy was after found dead with a little stripe in his face. This priest after canonical purgation was admitted to his place.

A monk helping to take a bell down out of a steeple, casually thrust down a piece of timber, which bruised a boy to death. The monk is judged not incapable of further ecclesiastical preferment, for that the business was necessary, and the place not for ordinary resort.

A priest tolling a bell to prayers, the same fell and killed a boy. The bishop is commanded to suffer the priest to execute his function, for 'Nihil potuit imputari, si casus omnes fortuitos non prævidit.'

Though there be many points in all these cases, and more in some than others, to excuse the parties agent; yet will I meddle only with those two which are most eminent, and offered canon either supposititium or paleam; but rather to be, as it is indeed, valde, antiquum, or ex antiquis. According to which sense, the canons of like nature in the laws of the Wisigoths or Western-Goths are in every passage intitled by the very Latin word, not the Greek, antiqua. And Justinian himself seemeth to have had this distinction in his eye, when he called his later constitutions Novæ, i. e. novellas, that so they might be marked from those of old, which Cedrinus in Justinian's life calleth res valde vetus, leges antiquas.

His second objection is, That it is cited out of the fourth council of Orleans, and it is not there. This we have already answered, and shewed where it is.

Thirdly, he saith it forbiddeth hunting cum canibus et accipitribus, and none of these were there. It is strange, a keeper should go about to strike a deer, and not have his lime-hound to draw after him. But the canon goeth further, 'Canes ad venandum, aut accipitres, aut hujusmodi res habere non licet.' Where 'hujusmodi res,' seemeth to contain all instruments used in hunting.

Fourthly, voluptatis causa; not recreationis or valetudinis, which the books say is permitted etiam episcopo. What his books say, I know not; but my book saith thus: 'Dic breviter, quod venari causa voluptatis est mortale peccatum, et in laico; sed venari causa necessitatis vel indigentie corporis non est mortale peccatum; in clerico tamen potius prohibetur.' But he adjoineth, 'In venatione, potius delectatio quam actus attenditur.' Atho. in Othob. fol. 114, b. Neither is there here any mention of recreatio, unless delectatio and it be all one; as commonly we use it, and then forbidden. Besides, what action or recreation belonging to health is there, in letting off a cross-bow; wherein neither bend, hand, nor foot, no, not the nimblest member of the body, the eye, stirreth all that while.

Fifthly, the canon hath, 'Si sæpius detentus fuerit,' if he make a life or occupation of it, 'which his lordship did not.' Burchard saith detectus, and with more reason: and I suppose his lordship useth it very temperately: yet the apologist in his fifth section insinuateth, that his lordship doth it often.

Sixthly, whereas he saith that the canon speaketh against clamosa venatio, not quieta or modesta; I find no such word or distinction in the canon; yet is there no doubt, that if the deer be not killed out of hand; but in recovering him, there must be both clamor and venatio.

Thus he counteth the mouth of the canon to be stopt. Yet because it is good to make sure work with so dangerous an object, now he setteth law upon law, the common against the canon or at least the statute, which indeed hath cracked a great sort of canons. 'That by the statute of Henry 8, 35, ca. 16. No canon is in force in England, which was not in use, or is contrary or derogatory to the laws or statutes of this realm; or to the prerogatives of the royal crown.' Of which sort (he saith) this is one, and gives his reasons: for in Charta de Foresta arch-bishops and bishops by name have liberty to hunt: and 13 Ric. 2, ca. 13. 'A clergy-man who hath 10*l.* by the year, may keep grey-hounds to hunt.'

The name of Charta de Foresta (and also of hunting,) is, 'Claro lachrimabile nomen.' For the first breach that ever was made into the freedom of clergy-men, and which gave passage to all that followed, rose from the occasion of clergy-mens hunting in forests: which Henry 2, greatly discontented with, never rested, till by assent of the pope's legate Hugo Petroliconis, he obtained a law in the 21st year of his reign, A. D. 1157, to convent them therefore before secular judges, and there to punish them.

But to our purpose: There is no contradiction (as I take it) between the canon de Clerico Venatore, and Charta or Statutum de Foresta. The canon doth say, they shall not hunt; and the statute doth not say they shall. The words of the statute, ca. 17, are thus: 'An arch-bishop, bishop, earl, or baron coming to us upon our command and passing through our forest,' 'Licent ei capere unam bestiam vel duas, per visum forestarii, si præsens fuerit; sin autem, faciat cornare, ne videatur furtum facere.' Here is no word of hunting; but that they may take a deer; and this they will say cannot be but either with dogs or engine, and so consequently by hunting. But the very words of Charta de Foresta seem to shew, that it was not meant, the bishop should be an huntsman, for that it admitteth him not to have so much skill in hunting as to wind an horn, though that by no law or canon be forbidden to him. And therefore saith not corniat ipse, but faciat corniare, let him cause an horn to be blown, &c. I conceive the meaning to be, that the bishops and barons shall each of them take as they may; the barons by hunting (if they will) in their own persons; the bishops as they may, by the hands of their officers and servants. It is a common phrase in all old Charters, that the bishops shall have Sac and Soc, Toll and Team, &c. i. e. cognisance of plea, suit of court, toll, and such other customs: shall we intend, that he must take these in his own person? No; it was not Henry 3d's meaning, when he granted the charter of the forest, to break the laws of the church: for at the same time in Magna Charta, ca. 1, he granteth, that the church shall have 'Omnia jura sua intacta et libertates suas illæsas;' which could not possibly be, if by his charter he changed the canons of the church, especially in matters of doctrine and conscience: as, when the church teacheth that a clerk may not be a huntsman, for him to say that he shall be. Doubtless, if he would, the clergy would not then accept it.

In the person of a bishop there be three distinct faculties: his spiritual function, wherein he is a bishop; his legal ability, wherein he is a lay-man and hath liberty to contract, &c. and his temporal dignity, wherein he is a baron and peer of the realm, and participateth their priviledges. I could put cases wherein every of these may be seen severed from the other; but I should then wander from my matter. Only, I present them thus anatomized, that it may appear what portion the church had in them, what the common-wealth, and what the king; that so it may also the better appear how the laws both of the church and kingdom are to be applied unto them respectively.

When therefore the king granted temporal lands unto them; though they took them as lay-barons, and in their temporal capacity, yet might they not otherwise use them than might stand with their spiritual function: no more than when he granted ecclesiastical possessions to a lay-man, the grantee might otherwise use them than as a lay-man. For example; it was a common thing in old time, that the king granted churches to lay-men, by the name of Ecclesiam de Dale and Ecclesiam de Sale; yet it was never intended that the grantee, though he had the churches to order and dispose, should (contrary to his vocation) meddle with the divine service, but present his clerk only. So in like manner, when the king granted to clergy-men, chaces, parks, and warrens; it was not intended that, contrary to the rules of their profession and laws of the church, they should or might become hunters and foresters.

My long stay upon this point, is a preparative to an answer to the next, which is the statute of Ric. 2, being in the negative, 'That no priest nor other clerk, not advanced to 10*l.* a year, shall have or keep any greyhound, nor other dog to hunt; nor they shall not use ferrets, haves, nets, hare-pipes, nor cords, nor other engines, for to take and destroy deer, hares, nor cones, &c. upon pain of one year's imprisonment.' The statute, I say, is in the negative, and saith that none under 10*l.* a year shall keep; but saith not in the affirmative, that it shall be lawful for them that have 10*l.* a year to keep, &c. I should therefore think, that this statute doth not discharge a priest, having 10*l.* a year using hunting, against the canon-law: no more than the statute of Usury, forbidding a man to take above 10*l.* loan for an 100*l.*, giveth him liberty to take that 10*l.* or doth discharge him against the canons of Usury.

Touching his inference, that Linwood speaketh not one word against hunting simply by clergy-men, but against their using it in places restrained; it is true, for the text of the canon led him no further; being only 'De Clerico, de transgressione Forestæ aut parci alijus diffamato,' and made to no other intent than to aggravate the censure of the ecclesiastical law, which before was not sharp enough against offenders in that kind. But Johannes de Athon, as great a canonist and somewhat elder, when Linwood often citeth and relieth upon as one well understanding the ecclesiastical constitutions and the laws of England, hath apparently condemned it in the place by me recited. Yet is it to be noted, that neither Athon nor Linwood intended to gloss upon all the constitutions of the church of England; but Athon only upon those of Otho and Othobon; and Linwood, beginning where Athon left, upon those of Stephen arch-bishop of Canterbury and his successors. There are therefore a great number of canons and constitutions of the church of England, which neither of these canonists have either meddled with or so much as touched: as also there be many statutes in force, which are no where mentioned in any of the abridgements. But Jo. de Burgo (another English canonist and chancellor of Cambridge, who wrote in Richard 2d's time) taketh notice of this canon, and that hunting was thereby forbidden to our clergy-men, as appeareth in his Pupilla Oculi, part. 7. ca. 10, m.

To go on. The Apology saith, 'That the arch-bishop of Canterbury had formerly more than twenty parks and chases, to use at his pleasure, and by charter hath free-warren in all his lands.'

Habuisse, lugubre: it seemeth the wisdom of the latter times, the more pity, dissented from the former; yet did not the former approve that bishops should use them at their pleasure, but as the laws and canons of the church permitted. For as they had many parks and warrens; so had they many castles and fortresses, and might for their safety dwell in them: but as they might not be soldiers in the one, so might they not be hunt-men in the other. In like sort, the abbot and monks of St. Alban's (as Mat. Paris reporteth the case, in an. 1240, pa. 205.) had free-warren at St. Alban's, &c. by grant of the kings, and recovered damages against many that entered into the same and hunted; for the having of it was lawful, as appeareth in the Clementines Tit. de Statu Monast. § Porro à Venatoribus. But it is there expressly forbidden, that either they should hunt in it themselves, or be present when others do hunt, or that they should keep, 'Canes venaticos aut infra monasteria sedomus quas inhabitant, aut eorum clausuras, pa. 207.' Radulphus de Diceto in an. 1189, saith, that the bishops of that time affected to get into their hands 'Comitatus, vice-comitatus, vel castellarias,' Counties, sheriffwicks, and constable-ships of castles; but shall we think they either did or might use them in their own persons, us with banners displayed to lead forth the soldiers of their county, or with sword and target to defend the walls of their castles, or with a white wand to collect the king's revenues, &c. It is true, that Walter, bishop of Durham, having bought the county of Northumberland of William the conqueror, would needs sit himself in the county-court; but he paid dearly for it; for his country-men furiously slew him, even sitting there. Mat. Paris in an. 1075. So Hugh bi-hop of Coventry exercised the sheriff's place, but was excommunicate for it, as 'contra dignitatem episc.' and so acknowledged his error. Dicet. in an. 1190.

But every one will say, it was a common thing in old time for bishops to be judges in secular courts. I confess it; and think it godly and lawful as it was used at the first. For the bishop and the earl sat together in the county court: the bishop as chancellor, to deliver Dei rectum and populum docere; the earl as secular judge, to deliver rectum seculi and populum coercere; as is manifest by the laws of king Edgar and others. But when the bishops began to supply both places, and to be meer judges of secular courts, then were they prohibited by many canons. And therefore Roger bishop of Salisbury being importuned by the king to be his justice; would by no means accept it, till he had obtained dispensation, not only from his metropolitan the archbishop of Canterbury, but from the pope himself, as Dicitur affirmeth in an. 1190, and no doubt but others of wisdom did the like. In those things therefore that bishops did against canons, we must take no example to follow them: for though their public actions be manifest, yet their dispensations and matter of excuse is for the most part secret. Neither doth every thing done against a canon produce irregularity, if some criminous mischance follow not thereon.

For the record that relateth that the bishop of Rochester was at his death to render to the archbishop of Canterbury his kennel of hounds as a mortuary, and that the law takes notice of it for the king sede vacante, under the name of muta canum and multura: I must (as they say in the law) demand Oyer of the record; we shall otherwise spend many words in vain. But that dogs should be given for a mortuary is against all likelihood. For a mortuary, is as an offering given (by him that dieth) unto the church, in recompence of his tithes forgotten; and it is a plain text, Deuter. xxviii. 18. 'Non offeres mercedem prostibuli, nec pretium canis in domo Domini.' But if there be no other word to signify a kennel of hounds, than muta canum and multura, the exposition may be doubtful, though it come somewhat near it. Freder. 2. emp. in the prologue to his second book de Venatione, speaking of an hawk-mue, saith, Domicula quæ dicitur muta; following the Italian vulgar, which cometh á mutando, because the hawk doth there change her coat. And for the affinity between dogs and hawks, it may be ~~not~~ transferred to a dog-kennel; and whether to the hounds themselves or no, it is not much material. For, no doubt, they that may have parks and warrens, may have dogs and hounds for hunting: but every body that may have hounds may not use them themselves, as appeareth by that which I said before out of the Clementines, and by the opinion of justice Brudnel, with the rest of the judges, 12 Hen. 8, fol. 5. where it is said, a man may keep hounds notwithstanding the statute of 13 R. 2, but he must not hunt; as he may keep apparel of cloth of gold, notwithstanding the statute of apparel, but he must not wear it. Besides, religious persons in ancient times were driven to have dog-kennels for the king's hounds: for Rad. Niger in an. . . . . saith, that king Henry 2, 'Abbatem, hypodromos et canum custodes fecit.'

After all this, his lordship is defended with the perpetual use of hunting by bishops in their parks; and by the particular examples of some eminent men his predecessors, and others. This point of use and example I have in a manner answered before; speaking, as it fell in my way, of bishops being secular judges. One line serveth to level at them both: yet for further and more perspicuous resolution of the matter, see both the example and the use censured in the decret. 34. distinct. ca. 1. by pope Nicholas, ad Albinum archiepisc. alias Aluinum. 'Quemadmodum relatione fidelium nostris auribus intimatum est, quod Lanfredus episcopus, qui et juvenis esse dicitur, venationi sit deditus; quod vitium plurimos etiam de clericali catalogo, genere duntaxat Germanos et Gallos irreverenter implicat, verum iste (si ita est ut audivimus) merito juvenis dicitur, qui juvenilibus desideriis occupatus, nulla gravitate constringitur.' Et infra: 'Nam (ut Beatus dicit Hieronymus) Venatorem nunquam legimus sanctum.' Then blaming him also for being too familiar with his daughter, he saith, 'Oportet ergo fraternitatem tuam synodale cum episcopis et suffraganeis tuis convocare concilium, et hunc salutis tuis colloquiis episcopum convenire, atque illi pastoralis auctoritate precipere quatenus ab omnium bestiarum vel volucrum venatione penitus alienus existat: or (in short) to excommunicate him.

Here he sheweth hunting to be used both by a bishop and by a multitude of clerks, (plurimos.) But neither the person and dignity of the one, nor the multitude nor frequent use in the other, maketh the pope to abstain from condemning it. Howbeit, they whose example the Apologist alledgeth, little respected (as I think) the whole volume of canons.

Touching the record of the earl of Arundel's excommunication for taking up the archbishop of Canterbury's hounds coming into the earl's grounds to hunt; and the archbishop's pleading that it was lawful for him to hunt in any forest of England whensoever he would, we must (as we before said) pray Oyer of the record; for parola font plea, and their certainty appears not here, nor what became of the issue: which, though it fell out to be found for the archbishop, yet perhaps it discharged him not against the canon. And well might he be as bold with the canon, as he was with the law. For it is directly against the law both of England and France, to excommunicate a peer of the realm without the king's assent: and therefore Henry 3 was sore offended with the archbishop for this excommunication: (and the bishops of London and Norwich were called in question for the like in Henry the second's time; as Matthew Paris reporteth, p. 99.) But because his case aways the cause to the ground; I must dwell a little the longer upon it, to shew what became of it. The truth is, it was ended by compromise in the chapel at Slyndon upon Friday after the circumcision of our Lord, 1256, that is, 43 Hen. 3; in this manner: 'quod idem archiepiscopus et successores sui semel in quolibet anno et non plus, cum transierint per dictam forestam

‘(i. e. de Arundel) cum una lesia de sex leporaris sine aliis canibus et sine arcu habeant unum cursum in eundo et alium in redeundo; ita quod si capiant unam feram, illam habebunt; si nihil capiant in illo cursu, nihil habebunt. Si vero capiant plus quam unam feram, archiepiscopi qui pro tempore fuerint, habeant quam elegerint, et residuum habeant dictus Dominus Johannes et heredes ejus,’ &c. Then is it further awarded, that the said earl, his heirs, and assigns, shall yearly for ever pay unto the said archbishop and his successors, 13 bucks and 13 does, (capias de jermysun as the record saith) at times there appointed. And then followeth this close, which maketh all plain; ‘Et licet ista expresse inter partes de præcepto et ordinatione dictorum arbitratorum, quod dictæ partes procurabunt confirmationem domini papæ et domini regis super præsentis confirmatione.’

By this record it appeareth, that neither the earl could make this grant without licence from the king, (for that all forests are the king's, and no subject can have them otherwise than in custody) nor the archbishop could safely use the privilege of hunting without dispensation from the pope: and though I yet find not where the one was obtained from the pope, yet I find where the other was granted from the king; and namely from Edward the first in the 2nd year of his reign; where all the award and composition beforesaid, is (by way of inseximus) recited and confirmed. But the composition for the bucks and does, was after in Edward the third's time released by the archbishop Simon Islip, having taken for the same 240 marks; as witness Antiqq. Britann. ca. 55.

And it seemeth further by this record, that the archbishops of Canterbury had not at that time dispensation from the pope, to hunt where they liked in any forest of England; for then should he not have needed special dispensation in this case. But howsoever the dispensation or confirmation was hereupon obtained; it is apparent that it stretched no further than to hunt with grey-hounds; for the bow is expressly forbidden and excepted.

It may be, some will extend the word confirmation, to be meant of some right of hunting, which the arch-bishop (upon this arbitrement) was to disinherit his church of: which I leave to the judgment of lawyers. For it may contain both; though I never saw any precedent of the popes in that kind for so small a matter: but of the other kind, we have before made mention of one to Roger bishop of Salisbury, and a multitude of others are to be produced.

Again, if they have a dispensation for hunting, yet it hath some limitation either for the place or the manner; which his lordship (if he justify under that) must shew particularly.

To come now at last to the last point of the Apology, drawn from the particular example of arch-bishop Cranmer; who, in the description of his life (Britannicarum Antiqq. ca. 68.) is set forth to hunt, shoot, and ride a great or stirring horse with notable activity, even when he was arch-bishop, and in the words recited by the apologist. But these be exercises of war, not of religion; fit for barons not for bishops; who in ancient time, following the example of our Saviour and his apostles, walked on foot, as appeareth by Bede, Eccl. Hist. l. 3. ca. 14. and lib 4. ca. 3. and beginning to ride, used here in England mares, as Bede also witnesseth, lib. 2. ca. 13. in other places mules, not horses; for ‘Bellum hæc armenta minantur,’ as not only the poet saith, but as the scripture also, Prov. 21. ult. ‘Equus paratur ad diem belli.’ And such belike, did this arch-bishop Cranmer mount upon and manage, as the word simply, ‘ut in sauculatu suo non fuerit quisquam qui in generosum equum salire, ac tractare elegantius — potuisset.’ Besides the shooting here mentioned seemeth not to be the long-bowe, which stirreth the body and is profitable to health, but that deadly engine (which imagineth mischief as a law) the cross-bowe, whose force a man cannot mitigate as in other weapons, and is properly numbered amongst the instruments of war; and therefore by a multitude of canons prohibited to clergy-men, so that they may not use them ‘pro justitiâ exercenda’ (as appeareth by the constit. of Othob. Tit.) ‘de Clericis arma portan.’ nor ‘equitantes per loca periculosa,’ as it is in the gloss upon the decret. of Gratian p. 992. where the text is, ‘Clerici arma portantes et usurarii excommunicantur.’ But I have gone the length of my tedder, I mean as far as the Apology leaith me; and therefore now ‘mamum de tabula.’

The case of this reverend and most worthy person deserveth great commiseration and tender handling: for who can prevent such unexpected casualties? Yet may the consequence prove so mischievous both to himself and those that are to receive their consecration from him, as of necessity it must be carefully looked into and provided for. Let me remember an ancient precedent, even in one of his own predecessors, Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury in the time of the conquest, who, because he had not canonically received his consecration, but from the hands of pope Benedict (who stood excommunicate and sacris interdictus) was not only deprived himself by authority of a council, but also the bishops and abbots which had taken their consecration from him. Therefore the bishops of Wells and Hereford fore-seeing that evil; to make all clear, fetch their consecration at Rome from pope Nicholas: Vitabant enim (saith Flor. Wigorn. in an. 1070.) ‘à Stigando qui tunc Archiepiscopatu Doroberniæ præsedebat, ordinari: quia noverant illum non Canonice Pallium suscepisse.’ It is good to follow the counsel of Gratian in the like matter: ‘Consultius est in hujusmodi dubio abstinere quam celebrare,’ ca. 24. 1716.

But because we are fallen into a case, wherein perhaps some extraordinary consecration may be required; let me also relate a strange consecration used in the entrance of the reign of Henry 1, an. 1100. where Eadmere a monk of Canterbury being elected by the clergy and people of Scotland to be bishop of St. Andrews, with the great good liking of king Alexander and the nobility. Yet by reason of some discontentments the same king had conceived against the arch-bishop of York, within whose province Scotland then was, he would by no means agree that Eadmere should take his consecration from that arch-bishop; and after much consultation how then it might otherwise be performed, it was at last agreed, that the staff of the bishoprick should be solemnly laid upon the altar, and that Eadmere taking it from thence, should receive it as delivered him from God himself: which accordingly was done. This calleth to my mind another of like nature, somewhat more ancient: where Wulstan, the good bishop of Worcester, both resigned his bishoprick by laying the staff thereof upon the shrine of St. Edward the confessor (by the agreement of a council holden under Lanfranc) and in like manner received the same again from thence, in the presence of king William, the arch-bishop Lanfranc, and many others; not without some miracle, as Matthew Paris writeth in an. 1095. These as τῆρενα.

And thus, in this matter of shooting, If I have done as the proverb saith, shot like a gentleman, that is fair, though far off, it sufficeth. I humbly crave pardon.

The subsequent rustication of the Archbishop to his house at Foord was altogether unconnected with the unfortunate event which gave rise to the proceedings related above, and resulted, according to bishop Hackett, merely from his refusal to license Dr. Sibthorpe's

122. Proceedings on the Impeachment of the Lord Treasurer MID-DLESEX, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 22 JAMES I.
 A. D. 1624. [Journal of both Houses of Parliament. 1 Cobb.
 Parl. Hist. 1406.]

April 2, 1624.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, (George Abbot) reported, That, in a Committee appointed to examine the Stores and Ammunitions of War, some speeches had past, the day before, which concerned the honour of a Lord of that House; and that the said lord desired Examinations might be taken, upon oath, for the clearing thereof. Whereupon the house ordered, That a sub-committee should be constituted to take such Examinations, and the witnesses to be sworn in court. Also, That the following officers of the crown should be sent for, to be examined on oath, relating to this affair, viz. sir Edw. Wardour, clerk of the pells, sir Rob. Pye, sir Thomas Mounson, sir Thomas Dallison, sir Rd. Morrison, sir John Keyes, sir A. Ingram, sir Thomas Cook, sir Thomas Morris, clerk of the ordnance, and sir John Male.

April 3. It appeared who the noble lord was whose conduct had been objected to; for, some orders being made this day, relating to the sittings of the Committee on Munitions, Stores, &c. we are told, by the Journal, that the Lord Treasurer (Middlesex) stood up and said, "That he would desire no favour but expedition; and, when they had done, his lordship would shew a dangerous plot, conspiracy, and combination against him; which, if it was suffered, no man would be in safety in his place."

April 8. The Lords received from the Commons, the following Message: "That whereas they yesterday sent to desire a conference with them, for the better accommodating the bill of Monopolies, to be this morning at nine, which their house intended to have done accordingly: but, that now a great and weighty Affair, as ever yet came before them, intervening; and many of their committee being employed in the Examination and enquiry thereof, who were formerly appointed to attend their lordships at this Conference, they humbly desire to be spared at this time, and they will attend at any other which their lordships shall appoint."

April 9. The Lords being reminded of the words used by the Lord Treasurer, April 5, of "a dangerous plot, conspiracy, and combination against him;" and because the words were doubtful and generally spoken, his lordship was required to name the parties that had so conspired against him; for, otherwise, an imputation might rest upon that house, or some of the members, there being, at that time, a Committee on Munitions, &c. who had taken divers Examinations concerning his lordship as lord treasurer. Whereupon his lordship cleared the house, absolutely, from any combination against him; and further protested, that at that time, he did not name or mean any member of that house.

April 12. A Message came from the Commons in order to put off the intended conference again; because they said, That a lord of that house had desired to be heard, by his counsel, in theirs in the afternoon; which they had yielded to. On this a motion was made to consider, that it might trench deep into their privileges, for a lord of that house to answer an Accusation in the house of commons, either by his counsel, or by sending his answer in writing. But, upon the humble request of the Lord Treasurer, the house gave him leave to send his Answer to the complaint of the Commons if he pleased. However, an order was made, "That no lord of that house shall hereafter without licence, answer any complaint in the house of commons, either in person or by his counsel."

Then the arch-bishop of Canterbury reported, That a committee being appointed to consider of the Stores, Munitions, &c. somewhat had happened in their Examination thereof, which touched the honour of the Lord Treasurer. Whereupon the said lord desired, that the utmost truth thereof might be enquired into. Accordingly witnesses had been sworn here, and a sub-committee appointed to take their Examinations; which, being reduced into writing, his grace delivered to be read. But, before that was done, the Lord Keeper signified to the house that he had received a Petition from sir Tho. Dallison, delivered unto him by a member of this house, who desired it might be read before the said Report. Which Petition was addressed, "To the right hon. the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled," and ran in these words:

"The humble Petition of sir Thomas Dallison, son of sir Roger Dallison, knt. and bart. deceased.

"Whereas there was an Examination, before a committee of your honours, concerning the lands of his said father, compounded for with my Lord Treasurer; whereupon there is an Account given to your lordships, by one Mayle, a scrivener, on his lordship's behalf, of 26,000*l.* or thereabouts, to be given by the said Lord Treasurer for the said lands, as Mayle reported; now, for that this petitioner and his mother were forced out of their estate therein by his lordship for a very small matter, by colour of his majesty's extent; and is able to make appear to your lordships that there hath not been much more than half the sum of 26,000*l.* really either in money or money's worth, given for the same by his lordship; and for that the said lands are of far greater value; and this petitioner ought, in all equity, to have the benefit of compounding his father's debts, and the benefit that should accrue by the surplusage of the estate: he most humbly desireth your honours to stay the Report, and grant your petitioner a copy of the account before the same pass from the lords of the committee; and that your petitioner may be allowed to make such just exceptions thereunto, as to the honourable lords of the committee shall seem reasonable.

THO. DALLISON."

A motion was made, Whether by the orders of the house, the Lord Treasurer may be present when the Report is read; because the same concerns his honour? It was agreed, That he might be present, at the first reading, but not when the same shall be debated by the house. Then the Attorney General read the Report in hæc verba:

"The State of the Business referred to the Sub-Committee for Munitions, &c.

"On the 28th of May, 6 Jac. 1608, a privy seal was directed to the Lord Treasurer and under treasurer of the exchequer, for the time being, for the issuing out such sums of money, not exceeding 6000*l.* per ann. as by quarter-books should appear to be due to the office of Ordnance for Wages or Provisions.—The allowance was duly paid until the 1st of April 1614; but then, or shortly after, by the default of sir Roger Dallison and the officers of the exchequer, sundry payments were unorderly made, whereby the office was unfurnished; and Dallison, who had received those moneys and not employed them as he ought, became indebted in great arrears to his majesty.—Upon complaint whereof, in Nov. 1617, his majesty made a reference to divers lords of the council; who, in Dec. 1617, returned under their hands a proposition of Supply, estimated at 54,078*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*

4 G

—In February 1619, his majesty's commission was awarded to the commissioners for the navy, whereof the now Lord Treasurer was one of the chief, to survey the Office of Ordnance; and they, in July 1620, made a Return hereof to the council, with their opinions how the Magazines might be furnished with a present supply of 13,640*l.* 1*4s.* 2*d.*; how the ordinary allowance of 6,000*l.* per ann. might be reduced to 3,000*l.* and how by cutting off many unnecessary charges and other means, his majesty might have yearly near 10,000*l.* And those propositions made by them, in Michaelmas term 1620, received allowance from the lords, and, at last, from his majesty himself.—In Dec. 1620, the lord viscount Mandeville became Treasurer; and in May 1621, a privy-seal was drawn by the officers of the Ordnance, for settling the said 3,000*l.* yearly, and for payment of the said 13,640*l.* 1*4s.* 2*d.* But the same, being considered of by the commissioners of the navy, was rejected, because it swerved from their propositions; and so, the lord Mandeville leaving the treasurership about Michaelmas 1621, nothing was done. In Oct. 1621, the earl of Middlesex became Lord Treasurer, and having continued in that place 2 years and 6 months, in all that time none of the three establishments, viz. that of 6 Jac. by the dormant privy-seal; that of 1617 by the lords; nor that of the commissioners of the navy in 1620, have been observed; whereas, if that of the commissioners of the navy (being the least chargeable to his majesty and in which the Lord Treasurer himself was principal agent,) had been observed, it is conceived, that the Stores had been in much better case, and a course had therein been settled to have retrenched a needless charge of near 10,000*l.* per ann. as aforesaid.—And whereas, in April 1621, a contract was made with Mr. Evelyn, to serve his majesty yearly with 80 lasts of Powder, at 7*d.* per lb. the want of the payment of about 500*l.* a month, hath deprived his majesty of the benefit of that contract; which, for 20 months of the time since that contract, hath been forborn for want of payment; which 20 months proportion, if it had been served in, there would have been in store at this present above 260 lasts of Powder, besides 60 lasts of Salt-Petre, which would have made 80 lasts of Powder more: but, by the want of due payment, not only the store is unfurnished of so considerable a proportion, but his majesty, it is conceived further, hath lost the benefit of 3*d.* in every lb. of 80 lasts, which hath been sold to the subject, amounting to 4,050*l.* or thereabouts.—And whereas it was intimated, that the Lord Treasurer hath made other payments, less importing the public, to the said Office of Ordnance for old arrears; which have a dependency upon another point referred to the sub-committees, touching the lands and debts of sir Roger Dallison: It appears that 28 July 1621, which was about 2 months before the earl of Middlesex became treasurer, he made an agreement with the officers of the Ordnance for buying their extent and interest in the lands of sir Roger Dallison and sir Thomas Mounson, which they had by assignment from his majesty for a debt of 13,062*l.* and thereby his lordship did agree, so soon as conveniently he might, to do his best endeavour to procure from his majesty a certain assignment and order for the payment of the sum of 8,000*l.* to the use of the servants and creditors of the office of Ordnance, before the last day of Nov. next, for and towards the payment and clearing of all such sums of money, as, by the pay books of the said office, should appear to be due unto them, over and above the said 13,062*l.* and his lordship was, before the same last of Nov. to pay them 1,062*l.* and, at the Annunciation, in the year 1623, 500*l.* and afterwards, 500*l.* half-yearly, till the 13,062*l.* were paid: but his lordship before the prefixed last of Nov. becoming Lord Treasurer, did not procure any such order or assignment from his majesty; but, by warrant of the first-mentioned dormant privy-seal of 6 Jac. did, in the first Michaelmas term after he became treasurer; and the two terms of Easter and Michaelmas following, (being all within a little more than a year after his becoming treasurer) pay to them 9,131*l.* of arrears due to the office; and hath, at other times since, paid to them other sums; which make up the former payment of 19,034*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* whereof was paid since the beginning of this parliament 2,480*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* And touching the payment, which, by the aforesaid agreement, his lordship was to make unto them of his own money, it appeareth that, upon a second payment, those payments due from him were discharged; and, in lieu thereof, his lordship assigned to them his part in the petty-farms of the Wines and Currants; which they estimated to be worth for the first two years 1,000*l.* per ann. and for 7 years after 1,400*l.* per ann. and odd pounds. It also appeareth, that about the same time when he made the said agreement with the officers, he bargained with sir Tho. Mounson for his estate in Dallison's lands; for which he agreed to give him 3,000*l.* in money, the making of six baronets, and some fit suit from his majesty when sir Thomas could find it. This 3,000*l.* was duly paid by his lordship; and then it was agreed that the baronets were not to proceed, but, in lieu thereof, his lordship gave way to a suit, which sir Thomas made to his majesty, for the benefit of compounding with the copyholders of Wakefield, for reducing their fines to a certainty; which his lordship did estimate at 2,000*l.* and promised him further recompence; yet sir Tho. Mounson affirms, He had neither benefit thereby, nor further recompence.—In this bargain, nevertheless, there are some things favourable for the Lord Treasurer, especially two. 1st, That, by this bargain, his majesty is freed from all future demands from the officers of the Ordnance, concerning the debt of 13,062*l.* owing by Dallison; which his majesty upon the assigning those extents, had covenanted to satisfy, in case the incumbrances should hinder them of satisfaction; and this appeareth in be true. 2ndly, some intimation hath been, that this bargain was no bargain of advantage, but of loss to the Lord Treasurer; and therefore not probable that he should have undertaken, but for his majesty's service, and the good of the office. And touching this point, it appears, by the good testimony of sir Tho. Dallison, that, before the troubles of his father, the lands and leases being of about 60 years to come, bought by the Lord Treasurer, were rented at 1,500*l.* per ann. or thereabouts; whereof the lease-lands are about 300*l.* per ann.: and that, besides the recompence given to the officers of ordnance and sir Thomas Mounson, there is allowed to him and his mother, for clearing their interests, 200*l.* per ann. for their lives: but sir Arthur Ingram offereth to lett the whole, for 40 or 50 years, or any other reasonable time, at 1,100*l.* per ann. And it appears, by the testimony of him, and Mr. Mayle, that the lands were incumbered with an annuity of 200*l.* per ann. to Mr. Beddingfield for life; for which, and the arrears, about 1,200*l.* hath been given, by way of computation; and with 140*l.* to Mr. Smith for life, for which, and the arrears hath been given, by way of composition, about the value of 800*l.* and with an assurance, on the part of sir R. Smith and sir J. Davey, for which is to be given 3,000*l.* besides many other incumbrances not yet brought in. But the certainty thereof appears not, nor that any of them, of any considerable value, are precedent to sir Roger Dallison's becoming officer."

This report being read, the Lord Treasurer put the house in mind of the imputation laid on him by sir Robert Pye, some time since, touching the extent of sir Roger Dallison's lands; and that therein they had desired witnesses to be sworn and examined, and he hoped he had fully satisfied their lordships in that cause. But, as for any other matter relating to the Ordnance, Munitions, &c. they never came into his thoughts, as yet, what answer to make; wherefore he desired he might have a copy thereof, in writing, with liberty to examine his witnesses, and he would answer the same fully in writing. He also desired that his actions might not be examined by pieces, but totally and together; and then he doubted not but that his care, touching the store for munitions, &c. would appear to be such that their lordships will clear his honour therein. This being said, the Lord Treasurer left the house whilst the matter of the report was in debate. After some time spent therein, it was agreed, That another committee should be appointed to draw up the heads of a charge against the Lord Treasurer, out of a brief of the last report, and examinations taken by the former committee.

April 15. A Message was brought from the commons to this effect; "That whereas they had received divers and sundry Complaints against a member of that house, which are of a high and grievous nature, they desire a Conference thereon to impart the same to their lordships. This was agreed to by the lords.

The Lord Keeper reported the said Conference held the day before, between the two houses, in this manner: At this conference, Sir Edward Coke, on the behalf of the commons, shewed, "That in their inquisition the commons had met with, what they scarce ever found before, many great exorbitancies and heinous offences, against a member of this house, the earl of Middlesex, the Lord Treasurer; and they found him guilty after a strange manner; for, in all their house, not one man said "No, but concluded against him nem. con."—Sir Edward said further, "The house had appointed him to present three Enormities to their lordships, much against his mind: others being far more sufficient, as well in regard of his great years as of other accidents; yet, he said, he would do it truly, plainly and shortly. There were two great offences in general, which they had distributed into two parts; one of which should be represented by him, and the other by his colleague: That which he should speak to was to consist of two charges. The 1st, gross and sordid bribery. The 2nd, for procuring the good orders of the court of wards to be altered; for that this was done by his principal procurement, to the deceit of the king, oppression of the subject, and the enriching of his own servants. He would begin with presenting to their lordships the bribery. Here he craved favour if he should seem long in touching some circumstances; for circumstances to things, he said, were like shadows to pictures, to set them out in fuller representations; but herein he promised to observe seriem temporis.

The first Charge against the Lord Treasurer for Bribery, opened by sir Edward Coke.

"By the Lord Treasurer's privity (for it concerned his skill properly which was merchandise) a lease of the subsidy and imposts of the French wines, was lett to the farmers of the petty farm, 17 Jac. at 44,000*l.* yearly rent, and for 50,000*l.* fine; with a covenant from the king that no more impost should be laid during their lease: because that they knew that the impost would overthrow their trade. Yet the farmers were not content with this covenant for their money and their trade, (for money is their plow, and trade their life) they desire the addition of the king's word for this covenant. Accordingly they had access to the king, and the covenant was confirmed and repeated by him, verbo regio, in the presence of the lord treasurer. Then they thought themselves in tuto, and that they did in portis navigare, free from all storms and tempests. But behold, anno 1621, the first thing my lord did in his office, was the laying of an extreme impost of 3*l.* per ton upon the French wines, which the king, by reason of his covenant, could not, and, by reason of his word, would not surely do. This imposition was against justice, the covenant, and the honour of the king. The king, surely, had he been rightly informed, would never have done it. Upon this the trade sunk, and they became suitors to his lordship for relief, for 10 months together; but with no success. In Michaelmas, 1622, they petitioned his lordship that the trade was overburdened, and themselves quite undone. It is a rule, that a commodity overburdened enricheth not the king, but quite destroyeth the trade; but hereof they have no success.—Then they prefer a bill of right against the king in the exchequer, because of the breach of covenant; but to this they could obtain no answer in Michaelmas term. The king's attorney knew well enough of the bill, but could not for his heart devise an answer for it.—In December 22, 1622, the term is out, they are out of their money, and the trade is gone. They appeal, therefore to the fountain of justice, the king's majesty. The king is very gracious to them, and said, God forbid that any man should lose by him. He knew nothing of this. It was the Lord Treasurer's act and device. And so his majesty allowed them a deduction of 9,500*l.* to be made to them in 9 years time. Well, verba sunt hæc; these were but good and gracious words, but filled not their purses: they must have a warrant from the Lord Treasurer to put this favour of the king's into a public act; and this they could not obtain from December to the end of June. The men understand themselves very well, and look about them how this stay comes: one of them tells another, the business sticks, my lord looks for somewhat: and the man was in the right, for so the sequel proved. A 500*l.* bribe was paid to Jacob for my lord's use, and straightway all was well; the warrant went current, and all was passing well.—One thing remarkable: This was taken, out of the petty farms, set down in their monthly and yearly books, and called a gratuity speciosoque nomina culpe. Some great spice after this, there was a voice of a parliament (Oh! said sir Edward, parliaments work wonderful things.). Then the Lord Treasurer began to cast a circle, and fall to his conjuring. He calls upon Jacob and commands him to transfer it to the great farm. Here was observed, that suppressio veri, is, in law, an argument of guilt. Here sir Edward also observed in a parenthesis, That is a blessed thing of those that love parliaments; and that surely this lord, of all others, loved them not; because he cast himself into dark mists, when he should meet them; 'nescio quid peccati portat ista purgatio.' This argues much guiltiness.—Then he nominated his witnesses: which he said were without exception. This bribe is proved by Hide, Daws, Bishop, and by Jacob; the last is a witness with a witness. For Jacob blanched this bribe as well as he could, and was taken in three notorious falsities. 1. Being charged, that the money was delivered to him by Hide, he vowed he had never received it; yet, being confronted with Hide, he confessed it: there was one. 2. He pretended he had received the money, but gave his bond for it. Hide affirming to his face, the bond was for other money, and no bond at all for this; then he likewise confessed this: there were two.

3. He said he never had any warrant to enter the same in the petty farm; yet afterward, he avowed he had: and this is the third falsity.—Here sir Edward observed, That Jacob was my lord's necessary creature and petty chapman, and had a son that was his secretary; and because he was a Jacob, that is a supplanter, he desired their lordships to take good care of him. About the beginning of this parliament my lord sent for this Jacob; asked him if he had entered this money in the petty farm? he said yea. Then said my lord, go about it presently, and see that the coquets, and all things else, be suppressed in the petty farms, and that this money be removed to the great farm; for I would have all hid and suppressed.—Here sir Edward observed, That sordid bribery is like Adam, and would fain get some fig leaves, if it could tell but where to gather them.

Upon the delivery of this Charge (as was desired by his friends) to the Lord Treasurer, they of the commons expected an answer of some rare wit: for so this nobleman was reputed in that house: but his lordship deceived their expectation; for he declared it was utterly, in every point, he would not say false, but surely untrue. Four things he denied as he was a christian; and these were all directly proved and made good against him. And so much was delivered against the first bribe.—The second bribe was of a strange strain: and both these bribes were received by him in the quality of a Treasurer. The farmers of the great Customs were to renew their farms, and put in security of 48,000*l.* rent, July 29, 1622. Here sir Edward said he would not enlarge himself; for the business lay in a narrow room. The bribe is the point. My lord liked the sureties well; but some of them fell off, and he would not accept of the rest; and 7,500*l.* of the rent was reserved for a year and a quarter. After delay of their lease, and 500*l.* in gold paid unto him by the hands of Jacob, then the security formerly rejected was now accepted: which act of his lordship the knight confuted by this syllogism. The sureties were sufficient, or insufficient: if sufficient, the bribe was too much, and the farmers oppressed; if insufficient, the bribe was too little, and the king was cozened. The second bribe was proved by Wolstenholme, Garroway, Williams, and, if you please, Abraham Jacob; and so much of these two bribes taken in the capacity of a Treasurer.

“Now he comes to the Court of Wards, and shewed, That the Lord Treasurer's offences herein are of a rare strain. First, the knight noted, by way of preface, That honos, the honour, must be given to him that deserved it. All the good artifice began under Treasurer Salisbury. Then were articles invented that helped the king to all his revenues, and tied the officers to their own fees and places. The king's revenues prospered well then: and these articles, by the advice of the judges, were confirmed under the great seal.—When this last lord came to be master of that court, (for now, with the knight, he is not charged as a lord, but a master) he complained he had not elbow-room for those articles; he was too much bound by them: (and bound he was indeed), and therefore he projects new articles; and these new articles are charged with high extortion; for in them are raised double fees; one fee the surveyor formerly had, and still retains justly, another parallel fee to this my lord hath raised unjustly and oppressingly. For extortion is a grievous and consuming enormity in a commonwealth. It was the greatest evil the high God could foresee would befall the enemies of God. 'Let the extortioner consume what he hath, and the stranger devour his labour.' Psalm cix. v. 10.—In these Articles his lordship created a new officer, a secretary. The chief proceedings there go by way of petition. In the former articles these petitions were received by the court, and entered by the clerk without any fee, and so were to be found on record; but, in the new articles, this new officer is to receive these petitions, and may, for any rule to the contrary, suppress them; and for his fee he taketh what he pleaseth; and it is proved he hath taken 10*l.* 20*s.* 4*d.* 5*d.* three dishes of silver; and the like: he is altogether unlimited, unless, peradventure, his oath doth limit him.—Another Charge in this Court, is this Abuse, viz. The Lord Treasurer's place requires a whole man, and so doth the mastership of the Court of Wards; whereupon his lordship was fain (as unable to wield those two great places) to invent a new device, a stamp even with his own name, Middlesex. Now this hand moves and guides the seal of the court, and therefore, being turned by the hand of a young secretary, may produce strange consequences. Never any king did suffer a subject to use a Stamp. Old lord Burleigh had a Stamp, because of his gout, but never suffered it to be used but in his own presence. Henry 8, had also a Stamp; but, suffering it to be employed by another, an act of parliament was overthrown thereby. Sir Edward said, he would conclude with one example: if a ward be not found within one year, he is reputed concealed, and so falls within the dispose of the master of the Court of Wards: now, by the secretary's keeping of this Stamp and Petitions, he may so carry the matter, that any ward may prove concealed: and that is no remote possibility. He brought this instance, à posse ad esse. My lord's secretary hath put to, and used this stamp for, the deferring of an office for half a year; and it is possible it may be done for a whole year. The knight said he never knew any man before trust a stamp, in the hand of another man, to command the king's revenue. He concluded this point with this observation, That my lord was a man raised very high, and very lately, and for expectation of service: that the king had been very beneficial to him; and for him to be so supine in the king's revenue, and so vigilant in his own, was the highest ingratitude. 'Et si ingratum dixeris, omnia dixisti.'—Sir Edward said, That all this he spake by command; and so he prayed their lordships to weigh it well with due consideration, and to give judgment according to the demerits of the cause."

Sir Edwin Sandys proceeded to this effect. "The Commons had commanded him (undesirous of any such employment) to second this Charge to their lordships; That he was undesirous thereof, for he had rather defend the innocent than discover the culpable: yet he was the son of obedience, and must perform what, by that house, he had received in command. To decypher out this great lord, upon whom the Charge lay, he would give of him this character to your lordships. 'Nescia mens hominum est, satique ignara futuri, et servare modum rebus sublata, secundis.'—The want of measure and moderation most men complain of in this great personage. That he would make his entrance with two protestations; which (as you know) are exclusions, not intended conclusions. His first Protestation, That in this crimination against new impositions, and impositions upon impositions, the Commons intended not to question the power of imposing claimed by the king's prerogative. This they touch not upon now; they continue only their claim, and when they shall have occasion to dispute it, they will do it with all due regard to his majesty's state and revenue.—For this time, he desired the word Imposition might be forborn, and the word Oppression taken up in lieu thereof; yet with a reference to the Lord Treasurer only, but in no means to the king. The second Protestation, That they intend to lay none, no not the least aspersion upon the council table, or any one member thereof, the Lord Treasurer only excepted. The Commons remain fully satisfied that he was the first propounder. These protestations premised, he branched the oppressions into three natures, used in the Wines, Sugars, and Grocery-Wares. And he promised to use this method to discover, first, some general matters, then fall to Particulars.—The Generals are two; 1. The Commons conceive, that my Lord Treasurer cannot be ignorant, that in the lay of the first Imposition, in the time of the earl of Salisbury, it was promised, That his majesty would never lay any more imposition upon commodities, without the consent of the people. 2. That my Lord Treasurer knew well that, in that assembly of parliament complaint was made in the lower house, that the overburthening of trade was the destroying it; and that he was himself employed by the house to the king to negotiate for redress therein; and he promised there, that he would make it his master-work. 'Quid dignum tanto foret hic promissor.' The issue of all was this, for his lordship to devise new burthens. These were the two generals, from these the knight descended to particulars, and began with the Wines. He put their lordships in remembrance, that the merchants had the king's covenant under seal, and promise by his royal word, to lay no further impositions: They had reason to desire it, for they paid a great fine and rent for the farm, which your lordships knew best; yet for all this, 19 Jan. 19 Jac. there issued forth a privy seal of imposing 3*l*. per tun on the French Wines: a grievous imposition in the matter, yet worse in the manner: for if it had been just, yet, in equity, it should have been laid before the voyage undertaken, and the vintage made; then it had been known, and, if known, the merchants had stay'd at home, deserted and given up trading. But this imposition was not laid till 2700 Tun of Wine were arriv'd in the Thames; and yet the Lord Treasurer gave command, that no entry thereof be made in the custom-house until security was taken to pay this intolerable imposition.—He left your lordships there to consider these circumstances. 1. Ships all laden with this perishing commodity. 2. Great and excessive leaking, by being upon the river, and abuse in the passage. 3. 30 shillings per tun formerly imposed by the Rochelers. 4. 20*s*. per tun laid by the merchants, for their several Apparel taken away by the Rochelers. 5. This 3*l*. per tun to fill up the measure of their afflictions.—Yet, instead of compassion in this extremity, such as refused to pay, were cess'd at the double the imposts; others, who could not put in bonds, after asperity of language and petitioning to the king, were committed to pursuivants; yet the king's privy-council used the merchants honourably; for they sent for the vintners, and, to help the merchants, they raised the wine a penny in a quart.—Notwithstanding this the merchants fell into the hands of customers, who used them rigorously, and they lost great part of their principal: first, they paid half of this new imposition in hand, and gave security to pay the other half; afterwards, the payment was divided into 3 parts, and secured by the merchants accordingly. On the 20th of Aug. following, another privy-seal was issued to determine the former; yet 40*s*. only of this imposition was taken off thereby, and 20*s*. laid on the French Wines partially and without limitation; viz: 20*s*. the tun for London, and 13*s*. 4*d*. for the out-ports, whereof the Londoner complained; and it was inserted in the privy-seal, to be at the humble and voluntary assent of the merchants; which is absolutely deny'd, for they only consented to pay 20*s*. the tun, until the remainder of the former imposition, so secured as aforesaid, were paid, and no longer; yet they were haunted by pursuivants till they had paid: and they complain they are undone, unless their bonds be delivered up. They further complain, That they do pay for their trade cent. per cent. and shewed the particulars, viz. One merchant had paid 800*l*. to the king for his part in a short time, and now unable to pay any more.—Here the knight said, That he would willingly suppress what follows, for acerbity of speech is no breeder of good blood; but the Commons had commanded him to speak it, and to declare further, That the merchants compared their sufferings under these impositions, to the sufferings of the old Israelites in Egypt, when they were commanded to make brick with less straw; and generally confess, that they would drive twice as much trade, if their trade were not overburthened. Hereupon they thought they had sufficient ground to complain; this being dishonourable to the king and oppressive to the people, the king's promise, word, and covenant being violated; these impositions, double the value, being grievous to the subject and fearful to posterity; for besides the old imposition, by statute, upon Wines, there are three more upon one another, 'et quis erit modus,' of feeding upon trade."

Then sir Edwin proceeded to the Complaint of the lease of Sugars procured by the Lord-Treasurer, viz. "That whereas George Heriot held the Farm of Sugars, upon a rent of 10,000 marks per ann. the Lord-Treasurer procured him to surrender that lease, and obtained a new lease thereof unto two of his lordships servants to his own use, at 2000*l*. per ann. for the same. What merits had his lordship in the great extreme want of money, as to draw from his majesty so great a reward as 4000*l*. per ann. for 21 years? but the Commons' Complaint herein is of a higher nature. That the king having granted, that the merchants importing any merchandize, and paying the duties for the same, if they export the same within 13 months, their imposition is restored: This is observed in all other merchandizes, save that of Sugars. The reason is plain, if your lordships know who is the farmer of it. The Commons further complained, That the Lord-Treasurer had turned the Composition for Groceries into an imposition; which his lordship did, without any warrant, whereby he usurped regal authority. That the city of London had yielded to a Composition for Groceries, but the out-ports refused, and especially the city of Bristol; and that in the Lord-Treasurer Salisbury's time, 11 Jac. that city had a decree in the exchequer, that they should be freed from any such Composition, upon condition to yield to purveyance in kind, when the king or queen comes within 20 miles of their city; which purveyance cost them 800*l*. when the queen's majesty was there. Nevertheless the Lord-Treasurer had directed his warrant to levy a composition upon the merchants of that city and the other out-ports, against their will, with commandment to stay the landing of their goods until it be paid. And this, he said, was the substance of their crying Complaint; what more can they say, but, with wise king Solomon, 'If thou seeest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at it; for he that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than he. Eccl. v. 8.' Their Complaint is of an high lord, the Lord-Treasurer: but your lordships are higher than he; the king higher; and God higher than all; whose justice your lordships execute. This justice they, humbly and instantly, demand of your lordships against these oppressions."

This Report being ended, the lords took into their consideration how to proceed in the business, and then referred the Examination thereof to the sub-committee on Manitions, &c. adding to the said committee the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Steward, the bishop of Bath and Wells, the lords Wentworth and Spencer: and their lordships may divide themselves into several committees, if they please, for expediting this business; and may send for any witnesses to be sworn here in court, that may conduce to the Examination thereof.

April 24. The archbishop of Canterbury reported to the house, That the Committee appointed to examine into the Complaint against the Lord Treasurer, had met, and examined divers witnesses, who were sworn here in the house, and had made a collection of Part of the said Charge; which Mr. Attorney read in form following:—

"Part of the CHARGE against the Lord Treasurer.

"I. The farmers of the Petty Farms of Wines and Currants, having sustained great loss in their farm, by an impost of 3*l.* per tun of Wines newly set, were long and instant suitors to the Lord Treasurer for relief; but finding none, exhibited their bill into the exchequer, and afterwards a petition to the king, for reparation of their loss; to which having received a gracious answer from his majesty, the Lord Treasurer agreed with them upon a recompence of 9,500*l.* to be defalked by 1,000*l.* per ann. out of their rent; yet, after this agreement made, he protracted their warrant about six months, and, in the end, took of them a bribe of 500*l.* for their dispatch, which was set upon the account of the Petty Farms: but since the summons of the parliament the same was, by his lordship's direction, posted to the account of the Great Farms.—II. The Lord-Treasurer being presented with a tun of Wine, by the farmers of the Petty Customs, was not contented therewith, but exacted money of them also; who were thereupon drawn to give him 100*l.*—III. The farmers of the Great Farm having, by their lease, covenanted to give security for the payment of their rent, divided their farm into 32 parts, appointing every partner to give security of 1,500*l.* for every part. Five of the partners relinquishing their parts, the security fell short 7,500*l.* Whereupon the 4 patentees, resuming those five parties to themselves, tendered their own security; which his lordship agreed to accept, yet protracted about 3 quarters of a year, until they gave him 500*l.* for his dispatch. And whereas his lordship pretends, by his Answer to the house of commons, that he had this 500*l.* and the other 500*l.* first mentioned in one entire sum, for four 32 parts of that Great Farm, it appeareth his lordship had no parts at all in that farm.—IV. George Herriot having the farms of Sugars upon the rent of 1000 marks per ann. the Lord Treasurer procured Herriot to surrender that lease; and, to effect the same, gives order for the payment of 14,865*l.* due to Herriot for jewels; all which was paid between the 15th Dec. 1621, and 10th Jan. following. The lease was no sooner surrendered, but the said treasurer procures a lease to two of his servants, by indenture, dated January 13, 1621, for 21 years, at 2,000*l.* rent per ann.; which rent his lordship paid so slowly, that there having only 4,000*l.* thereof grown due since the lease, 3,000*l.* thereof was paid out and since the 31st of December last: and whereas the merchants, importing any merchandize, and paying the duties, are freed to export within the year, without any new payments; that custom was observed in all other farms, but denied in this, for the said Lord Treasurer's benefit.—V. The city of London having yielded to a Composition for Grocery Ware, which the out-ports, particularly Bristol, refused; upon long debate and advisement, in the time of the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, it was resolved they should not be pressed thereto: nevertheless, the Lord Treasurer hath given warrant to levy that Composition upon the merchants of the out-ports against their wills, or else to stay the landing of their goods; which hath been put in execution accordingly.—VI. In December 1618, his majesty, upon great deliberation and advisement, did set forth instructions, very fitting and necessary for the well ordering of the Court of Wards; the Lord Treasurer becoming master of the wards: and, for his own private gains, aiming at an alteration of those instructions, first procured a reference to divers of the council to consider thereof, yet after waded that reference; and, by his own power and greatness with the officers of the court, (though much against their wills) and by misinformation of his majesty, (though much to the disadvantage of the king and subject) in the year 1622, procures new instructions; thereby taking the petitions from the clerk of the court, and appropriating them to himself and his secretary, who takes great rewards of the subject for procuring answers to the same; and, by colour of those new instructions, he doubles fees of continuance of liveries; and, having concealed the wardships to himself, he may easily make wardships concealed by the course of the new instructions.—Also he hath made a Stamp, and delivered the same to his secretary to be used; thereby, unlawfully, putting into the hands of his secretary the greatest part of the power and trust appertaining to the office of master of the wards. This the secretary hath used, stamping therewith, in the absence of the master, tenders, continuances, warrants to the great seal, grants of wardships and leases, indentures of liveries, &c. And whereas, by a privy seal of 6 Jacobi, there was an allowance settled for the ordinary of the Office of Ordnance; which, being put out of order in the time of sir Roger Dallison, in 1617, the lords, upon reference from his majesty, set, under their hands, a proportion, both for present supply and future upholding of that office: but his lordship, being Treasurer for the space of 2½ years, hath observed none of these proportions or establishments; whereby the stores are, in effect, wholly unfurnished.—And there being a Contract made with Mr. Evelyn, by himself and other commissioners for his majesty, for serving his majesty with Gun Powder, being a bargain of high consequence to have been kept, his lordship hath also neglected and broken that bargain, to the hazard of the kingdom and prejudice of the king. He hath also made unlawful bargains for the lands of sir Roger Dallison; wherein, for compassing those lands, he has contracted to do his endeavour to procure payment of 8,000*l.* of old arrears, (which he performed when he became Treasurer) and to pay for the land with making of baronets and suits to the king; and, in particular, a suit, for compound- ing with his majesty's copyholders of Wakefeld by himself, worth 2,000*l.* And, having, agreed with sir Tho. Dallison and the officers of the Ordnance, he, to gain, indirectly, and by oppressive means, an estate which sir Roger Dal- lison had passed to sir R. Smith and sir John Davy, he setteth on foot an outlawry of sir Roger Dallison, and thereby dispossesseth sir Rd. Smith and sir John Davy, who had been in possession, by a trial at law; using the power of his place, and countenance of the king's ser- vice, to wrest them out of a lease and estate of great value."

After the reading of this, it was ordered, That the said part of the Lord Treasurer's Charge should be sent unto him to-day. And that he be warned to appear here at the bar, on the 28th inst. at 9 in the morning, to answer it. Like- wise, if he had Witnesses to be examined, he may present their names to the house to be sworn between this and the same day. And this is said to be Part of the Charge, because there are other things against him which are yet in examination; and, when reported to the house, he shall be charged therewith, if thought fit.

April 26. The messengers that were sent to deliver the Charge, &c. to the Lord Treasurer, declared they had done it; but he gave no other Answer to them than, "It is well."

April 27. A Petition from the Lord Treasurer to the House of Lords was read, in hac verba:

"The humble PETITION of the Lord Treasurer of England.

"Most humbly representing to this most honourable house the names of such persons (by the schedule annexed) as the Lord Treasurer humbly desireth may be sworn and examined for discovery of the truth, upon such Articles as he shall exhibit, touching the several matters con- tained in that part of his Charge, which has been delivered to him. For which purpose he humbly prayeth such warrant for calling in those witnesses, and such others as he shall give notice of to the clerk of the parliament, as the form of this high court requireth. And, withal, humbly propoundeth to the considera- tion of this most honourable house, Whether your lordships will think fit to proceed to exa- mination of witnesses to be produced on his part, before he hath made his Answer; where- by it may first appear to your lordships what things he will deny and what confess and avow, and in what manner he will avow the same; upon which, as upon issue joined, he may par- ticularly examine his witnesses, and, after cop- ies of the Depositions taken both for and against him, the cause may be prepared for your lordships honourable judgments; which he pre- testeth to further, on his part, to a hearing with all possible expedition. Lastly, his most hum- ble suit is, That, in respect of the nature and multiplicity of the matters objected against him, which do necessarily require the assistance of learned counsel, this most honourable court will be pleased to assign the following gentlemen to be of counsel with him, in this cause of weight so much concerning him; viz. Mr. Dr. Stew- art, Mr. Rd. Hide, of the Middle Temple, Mr. W. Hackwell, of Lincoln's-inn.—M1202.2222.

Then follow the names of nearly forty wit- nesses.

This Petition being read, the lords appointed a special committee to consider what Answer should be made to it, consisting of the Lord Pre- sident, lord Rochford, the bishop of Rochester, and the lords Wentworth, Howard, and Say. These lords having withdrawn themselves some time, and being returned, the Lord President re- ported to the house the Answer agreed on, in these words:

"1. That warrants shall be given for calling in of such witnesses, whose names shall be ex- hibited in writing, and thought fit by the house to be examined; the interrogatories and wit- nesses names to be sent to the house to-morrow in the afternoon, and the witnesses themselves to appear, that such of them may be sworn and examined as the house shall think fit. 2. The house sees no cause, when the witnesses names and interrogatories are sent in, why the exami- nation of them should be deferred: but the day for his appearance and answer was to hold. 3. His lordship may use what counsel he pleases to advise for his defence; but it stands not with the orders of this house to allow counsel at the bar, in cases of this nature."

This Answer, being read and approved, was sent to the Lord Treasurer. A Memorandum is made, That the earl of Bridgewater, one of the committee to search precedents, &c. reported, That they could find none where a member of this house did answer, by his counsel, to a com- plaint exhibited against him: but that divers members of this house and others had answered in person and not by counsel; and that coun- sel was denied to Michael de la Pole, lord chan- cellor, 10 Ed. 2. when he required the same.

April 28. Another Petition from the Lord Treasurer to the house, was presented and read, in hac verba:

"The humble PETITION of the Earl of Middle- sex, Lord Treasurer of England.

"Most humbly sheweth, That, according to your lordships' directions, in Answer to his Petition humbly presented yesterday, he had appointed the witnesses there named to attend the most honourable house this afternoon, to be sworn to answer such interrogatories as, on his behalf, shall be exhibited.—But, whereas your lordships did further direct that the said interrogatories should be presented this day: he most humbly desires your lordships to be truly informed, that having neglected no time since he received his Charge to prepare his Answer, he finds the matters objected so many and of such divers natures, that he cannot yet, possibly, furnish the same, in such perfect and particular manner, as he ought and desires to do for your lordships' best satisfaction, and the clearing the matters laid to his Charge in all points. And therefore, his Answer being not yet ready, upon which all the interrogatories must properly be grounded, and without which your lordships' judgments of the pertinencies of the interrogatories cannot be rightly informed, he humbly beseecheth your lordships to respite them, and as soon as his Answer is finished he will forward them with all possible speed. And, he doth, once again, humbly propound to the consideration of this most hon. house (because therein your lordships have not been pleased to give Answer unto his former Petition) whether your lordships will not, in your noble justice, permit him to have copies of the Depositions taken and to be taken in this cause, on both sides, without which he shall be utterly disabled to make that just defence, which a cause of that importance to him, doth necessarily require.—MIDDLESEX."

The lords, upon reading this Petition, did all agree, "That it is against the order of this court, as well as of all other courts, for a delinquent to have Copies of the Examinations before he answers." And, as to the rest of the Petition, the following Answer was agreed on to it; "The lords expected to be obeyed and not to have been directed; and hold for a disrespect unto the house. That witnesses should be produced and sworn, and no interrogatories sent whereon to examine them as was required. The Copies of Depositions already taken, for Proof of the Charge, was not directly prayed in the former Petition, therefore it was not precisely answered; but it is so unfit a desire that the lords think the petitioner ill-advised to make such a request. And, according to the former order of the house, the lords expect the Lord Treasurer's appearance to-morrow morning, to hear such Answers as he shall make."

April 29th. Another Petition from the Lord Treasurer was presented to the house, and read in hæc verba:

"Most humbly shewing, That besides the weighty cares of mind which now do lie upon him, by the Charge he hath received from that most honourable house, he is fallen into such an indisposition of body, as he is once more enforced to beseech your lordships, in your noble justice and favour, to grant him a farther day for presenting his Answer and Interrogatories, which fall out to be much longer than he himself expected. It being no small addition to his sorrows, that in a case so nearly concerning him, he cannot conceive by their lordships former Answers to his former humble Petition, that they purposed to allow him Copies of the Depositions, where by, after his Answer delivered in writing, he shall prepare himself for his just defence against the hearing.—MIDDLESEX."

To back this Petition, the Prince moved "That in respect of the Lord Treasurer's great office, and sickness pretended by his lordship, he might have a longer day given him, and that day to be absolute." On which the following Answer to the Petition was agreed on. "That the lords, only in respect of the Lord Treasurer's indisposition of health, are pleased to respite his appearance this day; but do enjoin that on May 1, at 9 in the morning, if his health so permit, he bring his Answer; if not, that then he send his Answer to his Charge in writing, and all such Interrogatories as he would have his witnesses examined upon. Likewise, the lords do peremptorily assign the 7th of May next, for his appearance in person, and for the final hearing and determining the cause."

On the same day the Attorney General read the following Additional ARTICLES to the Charge against the Lord Treasurer.

"I. He undertook the office of the Wardrobe, in the 16th year of his majesty's reign, and continued in the service of that place from Michaelmas, anno 16, to the same time, anno 19. This office he took upon him under pretence of doing his majesty special service; and for that purpose, obtained a certain assignment of 20,000*l.* per ann. or thereabouts, which was duly paid unto him by way of imprest. Instead of doing service, he hath brought that place into disorder and confusion; he hath not duly served the warrants which he should have served, nor paid the workmen and creditors; he hath neither kept orderly accounts, nor yielded any; but under colour of pretended service of great importance, hath procured gifts and discharges of great sums of money, which he received for the execution of that place, and for the queen's funeral. II. Whereas, in the former Charge delivered to his lordship it is mentioned that merchants, importing Sugars, have been denied to export the same without paying new duties; it appears, upon further consideration of that business, That the prejudice the merchants have sustained concerning their Sugars, is, that they have been denied, upon exportation of sugars, the imposts paid on importation; which is contrary to the direction given by his majesty's letters patents 5 Sept. 8 Jac."

May 1. The Lord Treasurer sent another Petition to the lords, with his Answer to his Charge, and the Interrogatories to four parts of the same; which being read, were referred to a committee, who were to report to the house what interrogatories they reject. The tenor of the Petition was as follows :

"The Lord Treasurer, with most humble thanks, acknowledgeth the honourable favour of this house, by their noble order made in this house on Thursday last; and doth most humbly take hold of the liberty thereby granted him, in respect of his indisposition, (which yet continueth) most humbly to present to your lordships herewith all his Answer, in writing, as well to the Charge he received the 21th of April, as to the Additions thereto which he received the 29th of the same, together with as many of his interrogatories for Examination of Witnesses as he could possibly make ready by this time, which are full and perfect for four of the Articles of his Charge; most humbly desiring Mouday morning at the sitting of the court for the bringing in the rest; and that your lordships will pardon the length of his Answer; the variety and multiplicity of the particulars necessarily requiring it, as well for the readier informing of your lordships judgment as for relief of his own weak memory, whom as yet you have been pleased to appoint to stand alone without counsel at the hearing: he doth withal humbly explain his meaning in the former Petitions, which were not to desire Copies of the Depositions before his Answer were put in, and all Witnesses for and against him fully examined: but when that shall be done, he hopes it will stand with the honour and justice of that most honourable house to allow him Copies of the Depositions on both sides.—MIDDLESEX."

The tenor of the Lord Treasurer's Answer to his Charge followeth ;

"The humble ANSWER of the Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer of England, to the part of the Charge which was delivered him from the most honourable Court of the higher House of Parliament, on Saturday the 21th of April 1624.

"To the 1st and 3rd Articles concerning the two pretended Bribes of 500l. a-piece. His Answer is that no such several sums were ever paid unto him, nor any money at all for any of the causes mentioned in the said Charge; but he acknowledgeth that, the 27th of June last past, he, by his servant, did receive at the hands of Jacob, one entire sum of 1,000l. in consideration of his interest in four 3rd parts of the Great Farm, which he had formerly reserved unto himself, upon settling the new lease thereof; and for no other cause, as he hath truly alledged in his Answer to the Commons: and, for better satisfaction of this most honourable house therein, he hath here set down a true and particular Declaration of the state and carriage of that business, as followeth:— He is very well assured that as his general course, in all bargains of the like nature for the king; hath been to look to his own duty and the king's service, as the husband of his majesty's estate; so in this particular, touching the 9,500l. allowed to the Petty Farms in recompence of their losses, he carried himself so carefully and strictly for the king, as he could no ways expect so much as thanks, much less any gratuity or reward from them: in though, at first, they demanded of his majesty a very great sum, pretending, that the interruption they complained of was 10,000l. disadvantage to them in their first year only; yet upon good reasons, shewed by the Lord Treasurer, on his majesty's behalf, they were brought to accept of 9,500l. whereof, though they earnestly pressed to have present satisfaction, yet he over-ruled them to take it in 9½ years, (which was not worth more than 5,000l. a hand) and that, also, to be in full satisfaction of all their demands, not for one year, but in the whole term of 9½ years; so, as, in that particular, the Lord Treasurer was so far from doing them favour, that he thinks, they have maliced him ever since, rather for looking them to hard to it, than for any regard to the king's service. And for the Great Farm, he said Treasurer saith, That the old farmers becoming suitors to renew their lease, proposed to leave the Silk-Farm upon his majesty's hands: and, withal, to have an abatement of the rent they then paid for the Great Farm: whereupon the Lord Treasurer, finding how much that offer tended to his majesty's disadvantage, desired sir A. Ingram, by himself and his friends, to get a better offer made to the king, which was done accordingly; and thereby his majesty's rent was not impaired (as at first was proposed), but increased 4,000l. per ann.; and the Silk Farm Rent was also made good; which otherwise, to have been left by itself, would not have yielded the old rent by 5. or 6,000l. per ann.; so that the bargain was better to the king than the old farmers first offered by 9, or 10,000l. per ann.; notwithstanding, it was thought fit by his majesty that the old farmers, coming to the rate offered by others within 1,000l. per ann. should have the preference of the bargain. But withal, the Lord Treasurer, to gratify those, who, by the said offers, had done the king service, by advancing the rent as aforesaid, did, at the instance of sir A. Ingram, on his and their behalf, reserve certain parts of the said Farm, with no other intention but to dispose the same among them; and then gave order for the lease to proceed to the patentees, who were named, in trust, for themselves, and all the partners. And afterwards, the said Lord Treasurer did dispose of the said parts, reserved to the said sir A. Ingram and others, according to the first intention; 4 of which parts, the parties which had them did afterwards, at several times, give up to the said Lord Treasurer, and left the same at his disposing. Some months after, sir Philip Carey, who had one of the Lord Treasurer's parts, and some others placed by the farmers, upon some mislike of carriages of that farm, did also relinquish and give up their parts; upon occasion whereof, the Lord Treasurer, being put in mind by sir A. Ingram of the said 4 parts, which were returned unto him by those to whom he had formerly disposed them; and being asked what he would do with them, did, upon Jacob's next coming to him, ask him, how the farmers meant to use him for his four 32 parts of the farm? He answered, That because his lordship had formerly signed a warrant, for the king's security of all the 32 parts, and said nothing of those 4 parts, they thought his lordship had waived them: but he would speak with the partners about it, and then give him a full answer. Within few days after, Jacob returned to him, and very freely offered 1,000*l.* for his parts, according to the rate which, he said, they had lately given to Mr. Chancellor for his: which the Lord Treasurer was contented to accept: and within 4 days after he told Mr. Chancellor what bargain he had made with the farmers, for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm, viz. That he had sold them to the Farmers for 1,000*l.*—This Agreement being thus made with Jacob, and the 1,000*l.* paid accordingly; it falls out, by that which was since discovered, That he and his partners which shared those 4 parts, agreed together, to ease themselves of that money, (which should have been properly borne upon their own private accounts,) by laying the same upon the general accounts of the Great and Petty Farms; (themselves being farmers in both) and thereupon, the 1,000*l.* as is since discovered, was by them divided into two parts; the one half entered upon the books of the Petty Farmers, and the other upon the general account of the Great Farm, as gratuities to the Lord Treasurer; who little knew of their unjust proceedings, both with himself and their partners, until about Christmas last; when he had first intimation of some such Charge laid upon the Petty Farms, not hearing then that which was done upon the Great Farm's account: hereupon he presently sent for Jacob, and was much offended with him, that he should suffer any such unjust thing to be done; who, at first, denied it; but, the next day, confessed it, and said, it was ill done; and said, he was over-ruled in it; and promised to set all straight again, according to the truth and right of the case: which, the Lord Treasurer understands, was done accordingly; not by posting the 500*l.* from the Petty Farm's Account to the Great Farm's, but by discharging both unjust charges out of both accounts; the patentees returning back the money which they had taken off the Petty Farmers, upon the Lord Treasurer's just exception thereto; and also making like restitution, of their own accord, to their partners in the Great Farm, whom they had likewise wronged; whereof the Lord Treasurer heard nothing till of late: so, he hopes, the proofs of this cause will make it evidently appear, that all this scandal hath fallen upon him, by this underhand working of the patentees for their own private gain; by wrongfully charging their partners in both farms, to ease themselves, without the Lord Treasurer's privity or knowledge: and though the patentees, to make their own tale good, have lately denied that the Lord Treasurer had any part in the farm; yet it will manifestly appear upon proof, by the oaths of men of good reckoning, that themselves have acknowledged, that his lordship had reserved part of that farm at his disposing.—For the 100*l.* and the tun of wine, alledged, in the 2nd Article, to be received: the truth is this, That Jacob being with the Lord Treasurer about other business, told him, That the Farmers of the Petty Farms, had, or did intend, to present him with a tun of wine, for a new year's gift. The Lord Treasurer then answered him merrily, That other Lord Treasurers had been better respected by those farmers, and that he would have none of their wine; and shortly after, Bernard Hyde brought him 100*l.* for a new year's gift only, and for no other cause.—To the 3rd Article, concerning Herriot's Reckoning and the Sugar Farm, the Lord Treasurer makes this Answer, That in 1620, a lease was granted to Herriot, of the Impost upon Sugars for three years, not at the rent of 10,000 marks per ann. as is alledged in the Charge, but at less by 1000*l.* per ann. viz. 5,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* rent. Afterwards, the 17th of Nov. 1620, in the time the Lord Mandeville was Treasurer, Herriot obtained a privy-seal of assignment, whereby he had power to pay himself out of the Sugar Farm-Rent, by way of retainer, a debt of 13,089*l.* 16*s.* formerly due to him, viz. for his free-arrear in the exchequer 187*l.* 10*s.* and upon six privy-seals for jewels, formerly bought of him, 12,902*l.* 6*s.* in which privy-seal of assignment, there was one special clause, That if the said three years rent would not suffice to pay the whole debt, by reason of defalcations which might fall out upon the farm, the rest should be made good out of the exchequer; and afterwards, in May and August 1621, in the viscount Mandeville's time, Herriot obtained two other privy-seals, for two other debts due to him, amounting to 1,962*l.* 15*s.* which, being added to the former debts by privy-seal, makes up the great sum of 14,865*l.* mentioned in the Lord Treasurer's Charge.—And whereas it is alledged, that this whole sum of 14,865*l.* was paid to Herriot by the now Lord Treasurer's order within the space of 26 days of Nov. the truth is, There was not one penny paid at all in money, but Herriot being indebted to his majesty 7,799*l.* upon account of the rents and profits of the Sugar-Farm until Christmas 1621, the same was allowed in discharge of so much of his debt of 14,865*l.* viz. 5,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* which he had power to pay himself, by virtue of the said privy-seal of assignment; and 2,122*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* which was done by him upon his account before the lease of the Sugar-Farm began. And whereas he might, by the said privy-seal of assignment, have paid himself the other 7,066*l.* within less than 15 months; the Lord Treasurer did, by Herriot's consent, transfer the same to be paid out of the Tobacco Farm, viz. 4,000*l.* at Michaelmas 1622, and the rest at Michaelmas 1623, which was a longer time and more advantageous assignment for the king than the former was: so, although there were several orders signed, as if the money had been paid immediately out of the exchequer; yet that was done, of necessity, to enable the striking tallies, for the tellers charge and discharge, as the form of the exchequer required, without issuing any money at all: so that it will appear upon record, this Charge upon the Lord Treasurer is wholly mistaken; and that he was so far from paying so much ready money as he is charged with, that he paid no ready money at all, but by assignment; which he made at longer days, than it was formerly settled in his predecessor's time. And thereupon Herriot, having his debt thus settled and paid to his content, did surrender up his lease; which he had procured to no other end, but to secure the payment of the debts owing to him by the king. Afterwards, it is true, his majesty granted a new lease of the Sugar-Farm to the Lord Treasurer's use, at the rent of 2,000*l.* per ann.; in the granting whereof his majesty was truly informed of the state of the same, and particularly made acquainted, That the said Farm of Sugars might be improved to 6,000*l.* per annum, though Herriot had it but at 5,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* it being his majesty's pleasure, out of his own grace and goodness, to grant the same, in form aforesaid, to the Lord Treasurer, for his many services, and for considerations best known to himself.—For the slow paying his rent, it is true, that one of the 3,000*l.* was paid three or four days after the rent-day, and the other two half-years rents were forborne in respect of some private disbursements of his lordship's for the king; upon bills of exchange to the commissioners for Ireland; and other engagements for his majesty; which his lordship intended should be discharged and cleared by the said rent.—And, lastly, The liberty of transporting Merchant's Sugars, formerly imported, remaineth now in the same estate and condition, without any alteration, since the Lord Treasurer's lease, as it did at any time before; neither is there any such restraint or denial made by him, or under him, to the merchant's prejudice or his own profit, as is alledged in the Charge.—To the 4th Article, touching the Composition for Grocery-Wares in Bristol and the out-ports; the Lord Treasurer saith, That complaint being made unto him on his majesty's behalf, That the said Composition-Money being no less due in the out-ports than in the port of London, no certain course was settled for the receiving of it, or bringing it to account for his majesty's use, so as little or no benefit thereof came to the king: he thereupon thought fit to send a general warrant to the out-ports, to authorize Jacob to take care of that collection; and receive such duties of that nature, as had been formerly used to have been paid; to the end the whole collection thereof might come in upon one man's account; with no intention to raise a new charge upon the subject, but only to settle the collections of the king's duties in order: and, as soon as the said Lord Treasurer had notice, That the citizens of

Bristol had formerly yielded to furnish his majesty's household with grocery in specie, upon purveyance, at the king's coming into those parts; and, thereupon, had obtained an order in the exchequer, to exempt them from the payment of the composition; the Lord Treasurer did presently discharge the former warrant sent thither before, and referred the merchants (who acquainted them with it) to sir Simon Harvey, one of the officers of the Green-Cloth, who certified his lordship, that he had agreed with them to their good contentment.—To the 5th Article, concerning the business of the Court of Wards, the Lord Treasurer makes this humble Answer, That in Dec. 1618, his majesty did set forth instructions for the ordering of the Court of Wards; which orders were set forth by the procurement and solicitation of some of the officers, without the privity of the lord Wallingford, then master, and some other of the council of that court, and near about the time of his lordship's leaving the place: divers of which articles tended to the abridgement of the antient authority and profits of the master's place, and for the profit of others of the officers of the court.—Whereupon the Lord Treasurer, being made master, was an humble suitor to his majesty to restore him to the former rights of the place, by altering the said instructions in some points, not prejudicial to his majesty's profits, nor grievous to his subjects; upon which it pleased his majesty to refer the same to some privy counsellors, as is mentioned in the Charge: after which time, and before any thing was done, upon the humble motion of the Lord Treasurer, his majesty was pleased to direct, That the master and officers should first confer and agree (if they could) among themselves, and resort to the referees, if they agreed not; whereupon the master and all the officers, upon sundry meetings and debates, agreed among themselves for the new Instructions, and thereupon voluntarily subscribed their names. There was no misinformation used to his majesty, neither are the points contained in the new Instructions disadvantageous to the king or subjects more than the former, and, in some points, of much more advantage both to the king and subject. Touching the taking Petitions from the Clerk of the court; and appropriating them to himself and the secretary, who is charged with taking great rewards for procuring answers to the same, he saith, That, until the said Instructions of 1618, all Petitions were delivered to the master; which, by the said Instructions of 1618, were (to the great prejudice of the subject, and delay of his majesty's service) delivered to the clerk of the court, who was to present it at the sitting of the Council, which could be only in term time; whereas, by the former antient course, and by the last Instructions, the Petition being delivered to the master, he only giveth order for finding and returning an office, which must also be entered with the clerk; and, the office being returned, the grant is made by the master and council, at the council table. By this course the suitor hath expedition at all times, and the master no profit at all; and the secretary neither hath taken, nor exacted, any reward of the subject for procuring Answers, to the knowledge of him, the Lord Treasurer. Touching the doubling fees for Continuance of Liveries, by the new Instructions, he saith, That, ever till the Instructions of 1618, the suitor might continue his livery, either with the master, or surveyor; and the master's fees for such continuance was ever 10s. The Instructions of 1618 appropriated the Continuance only to the surveyor, which was an encroachment by the surveyor upon the master; now the new Instructions enjoin the Continuances to be with both, for which the master taketh no other fee than 10s. which was the ancient fee for Continuances taken by all masters before him: and, for tenders, the master doth now take but 5s. whereas the ancient fee is 10s.—By the Continuance before both houses, men are rather forced to sue out their liveries to the benefit of the king, and good of such as have cause to sue against them. Touching the having of concealed Wardships, and, to that point, that the master may easily make wardships concealed by the course of the new Instructions, the Lord Treasurer saith, That although he hath the disposing of concealed wardships, yet the benefit of them is to the king's own use; and it is not in his power to make a concealed wardship: for if the petition should be suppressed, or not answered, yet it is no concealment, by the new Instructions, if any suit be made for it within a year after the death of the tenant; neither is the Lord Treasurer charged to have done, or so much as to have attempted any such act.—Touching the Stamp, which he is charged with having delivered to the secretary, he doth humbly acknowledge the same; but, withal, desireth your lordships to take into consideration, that the whole purpose and scope of doing thereof was only for the present dispatch of suitors in ordinary matters of course; and for such business as could not be effected by the Stamp alone, without the assistance or joining of other officers therewith, either before or after putting the Stamp: and the Lord Treasurer was rather induced to give way thereto, because he had understood that the lord Burleigh, when Lord Treasurer, made use of the like; and for that Stamps are in use in other offices at present: yet, if the Lord Treasurer had ever conceived, or been informed, that it had been unlawful or unfit, he should not have used it: also he directly affirmeth, That, by the use thereof, neither his majesty nor the subject, hath hitherto any charge or prejudice, but much ease in their dispatch.—And as to Dallison's unsettling the Office of Ordnance, that fell out 8 or 9 years since; and the supply set down by the lords, in 1617, was 4 years before the Lord Treasurer was in office; neither did the commission of the treasury, nor his predecessors, pursue any point thereby directed; but it lay wholly neglected, and now only revived against the Lord Treasurer, who never saw it but in this parliament: and for the book made up by the commissioners of the navy, in 1620, for supplying the Stores and furniture upholding of the Office of Ordnance, (though, being the last of the three settlements mentioned in the Articles, it might be sufficient to suspend both the former) it was so far from being an establishment to govern the office by, that all the officers have, and still do oppose it, and protest against it to this day; so as there being only propositions without resolutions, and no settled rule of establishment and direction, why should the Lord Treasurer be bound to keep it? or why the breach thereof be made his fault now, when it was broken and neglected in his predecessor's time, who was then the only proper officer to have put it in execution, the now Lord Treasurer being but one of the propounders of it.—Notwithstanding, he humbly conceives, and hopes to prove clearly, that there hath been no such wilful negligence as is alledged; for though it be true, that the officers of the Ordnance, always opposing that Book of the commissioners, would never sue out the two warrants thereby required, the one of 13,640*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* for Supply of the Stores, and the other of 3,000*l.* per ann. for the Ordinary; yet there have been other privy seals of the same nature sued out, whereupon hath been issued to that office, since that book of the commissioners was delivered, as follows, viz. for the supply of the Stores, 11,096*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* which sums want not much of the commissioners preparations, considering that the ordinary quarter-books are yet unpaid for a year and a quarter; all which argue no wilful negligence in the payments, howsoever the officers have disposed of the monies; nor any great unfurnishing of the stores, which, if they have less proportion of some stores of provisions than were set down in the commissioners books, yet they have more of other stores of provisions, which have since been thought more useful and more necessary.—As to what concerns neglecting the supplies for Gun-powder, the Lord Treasurer saith, 'That the bargains with Evelyn were made in the lord Mandeville's time, who continued in the office the first 5 months after; in which time Evelyn served in Powder for the first 3 months; but, getting no money for it, made a stop of his delivery, according to the liberty of his contract: so that the same was broken in the lord Mandeville's time, and left wholly in distraction to the now Lord Treasurer, with a debt for three months powder, delivered as aforesaid; his predecessor not paying one penny upon that contract in all that time.—Neither did that bargain with Evelyn suffer any small interruption, by the continual complaints stirred up against him by Mr. Sadler, and new propositions made by him for settling the powder-making otherwise; whereby Evelyn's contract stood under question, and both the Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Chancellor, and the commissioners of the navy, had several times the trouble to examine the same; the Lord Treasurer having a purpose to bring Evelyn to account for the profit, made by him, of the surplusage of the price of the powder put to sale: by this means, and by reason of other mishaps, of blowing up the powder-mills by fire, Evelyn grew discouraged; and the service was neglected, till Sudler's suggestions were found frivolous, which was near a year's interruption of the service.—Besides, when the Lord Treasurer entered, he found in the Stores but 116 lasts odd hundreds of powder; and, the 20th of March last, he left in store above 111 lasts, notwithstanding the great expence of powder, upon extraordinaries, in the now Lord Treasurer's time, which also might have been 194 lasts, if the lord Mandeville had settled and maintained the contract in his time, by addition of his 5 months provision, and the 3 months which he left the now Lord Treasurer to pay for; whereas the whole proportion of Gun-Powder, assigned by the commissioners of the navy's book to be in store, was but 143 lasts of powder; and good reasons given wherefore there should be no more.—Lastly, It will appear, by comparing the quantity of Powder, paid for by the now Lord Treasurer, with the time before, that his lordship had paid for as much, in this short term of 2½ years, as hath been paid for in the next 7 years before; so as never, in the king's time, were the Stores so well furnished with powder for quantity and goodness, as they are now; and yet never more want of money in the Exchequer these 20 years, than hath been in the now Lord Treasurer's time.—To the last Article of the Charge, about the bargain for the land which was sir Roger Dallison's, the Lord Treasurer saith, That he hath not made any unlawful bargain for the lands of the said Dallison; neither hath he paid for the said lands with making of baronets, or freeing copyholders, or any other suit to the king, as by that Article is pretended; but hath really paid for the same in money and money's worth, out of his own estate, to the full value of the lands and more: and, for more full declaration of the truth, he saith, That the said sir Roger being indebted to the king in 13,062*l.* 4*s.* 10½*d.* whereof sir Tho. Mounson, his surety, was found debtor 3,100*l.* the said Dallison's lands were extended for 9,962*l.* 4*s.* 10½*d.* thereof, and the said sir Tho. Mounson's lands for the said 3,100*l.* and these so extended, together with the said several debts, were granted by his majesty's letters patent the 20th of July, 16 Jacobi unto Francis Morrice, and other officers and creditors of the Ordnance for 13,062*l.* owing to them by his majesty; with a special command to the Lord Treasurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer, to make out such writs and process for the said debts as should be required; and, with a covenant, on the king's part, that if, by reason of incumbrances, they could not receive the same in convenient time, then it should be paid unto them out of the Exchequer.—These lands of the said sir Roger were so incumbered by former charges, that the said officers and creditors of the Ordnance could not raise, by the said extent thereof, near so much as the bare interest of the said 9,962*l.* 4*s.* 10½*d.* parcel thereof; and therefore did not conceive how it could give satisfaction unto them for the said 9,962*l.* due debt, long forborne; but that they must of necessity have recourse to his majesty again for their better satisfaction according to his majesty's covenant contained in the said lease, made unto them in that behalf; and yet there was nothing allowed to relieve the poor distressed lady of the said sir Roger Dallison and her son: whereupon the now Lord Treasurer, in July, 1621, being then but one of his majesty's commissioners for his debts, was made acquainted by the said Francis Morrice, and other the said officers and creditors of the Ordnance, of their intent and purpose; and, being willing to do his majesty the best service he could therein, after divers conferences, did come to an agreement with them for their interest in the said extents, and to make them payment of the said 13,062*l.* for the same, as follows, v*z.* 1,062*l.* before the last day of November following 1621, and the rest by 500*l.* every 6 months, at and after the Annunciation, 1623: after which agreement made for the extents, he not perceiving how he could make any use thereof, unless he compounded also with such as had the inheritance and other estates in the said Dallison's lands, did deal with some of them for the same; and then came to a second agreement with the said Francis Morrice, and the rest of the officers and creditors of the Ordnance, to convey to them an estate, which he then had for 9 or 10 years to come, in the Petty Farms of Currants and Wines, of the yearly value of 1,400*l.* (and worth 7,000*l.* and more, to be sold) which he did grant, and they did accept in full satisfaction of the said 13,062*l.* 4*s.* 10½*d.* and for their interests in the said extents accordingly.—Not long afterwards, the Lord Treasurer, being desirous to free himself of any further trouble or care, by reason of many other the incumbrances which were upon the said lands, did, in or about November 1621, agree with sir Arthur Ingram, to deliver the said lands, with other lands then of him the said Lord Treasurer in the county of York unto the said sir Arthur, in exchange for other lands of his, and to give unto him 9,000*l.* in money, for the compounding and freeing the said estate and incumbrances, which were upon the said lands, late Dallison's, and of a lease he had of one Anthony Meers, of other lands, intermixed with the said Dallison's lands, esteemed of the yearly value of 400*l.* per ann.; of which 9,000*l.* the said Lord Treasurer, afterwards, in February and March 1621, by the consent of the said sir Arthur, did pay unto sir Thomas Mounson, for his interest in Dallison's lands, the sum of 3,000*l.* besides the freeing of his the said sir Thomas Mounson's own lands of the said other extent for the said 3,100*l.* and all the residue of the said 9,000*l.* he the said Lord Treasurer hath paid and satisfied, as it hath been required by the said sir A. Ingram accordingly; which said several sums of 7,000*l.* and 9,000*l.* amounting together to 16,000*l.* and more than the said lease and lands are worth, at and from the time of the said agreement for the exchange so made between the said Lord Treasurer and the said sir Arthur: and thereupon the lady Dallison, and sir Thomas Dallison, her son, upon a composition made with them by the said sir Arthur, did, in February 1621, make an assignment of the said lease, to certain persons named by the said sir Arthur in trust for his use; and, since the said agreement and that time, the Lord Treasurer had no more to do therein than as the duty of the place requires, and, as he hath been advised by his majesty's learned council, convenient and fit to be done on his majesty's behalf: and therefore, as touching the rest of the said last Charge, That the Lord Treasurer having agreed with sir Thomas Dallison, and the officers of the Ordinance, he, to gain, indirectly, and by oppressive means, an estate which sir Roger Dallison had passed to sir Richard Smith and sir John Davey, did set on foot an outlawry of sir Roger Dallison's, and thereby dispossessed sir Richard Smith and sir John Davey, who had been in possession, by a trial at law, using the power of his place, and countenance of the king's service, to wrest them out of a lease and estate of great value, the Lord Treasurer saith, The same is wholly mistaken; and that the truth is, That the said sir Richard Smith, having a conveyance of all the freehold lands, which were the said sir Richard Dallison's in Scutten, as a mortgage for payment of 1,300*l*. and the said sir John Davey having an assignment of the said lease, as a mortgage for the payment of 600*l*. by year, for 10 years, upon a very hard contract for money, he the said sir Richard Smith, long before the said Treasurer had any thing to do with the said lands or lease, was dispossessed of freehold lands, by virtue of the said extent, for the king; and, after such time as the said Lord Treasurer had so bargained and agreed with the said sir A. Ingram, and had left the said whole business to him as aforesaid, it was found that the said sir Roger Dallison stood outlawed, after judgment, at divers several men's suits, whereby the same lease and interest was in his majesty, by means whereof some difference grew between the said sir Richard Smith, sir John Davey, and the said sir A. Ingram, which the said Treasurer used the best means he could to reconcile; and, to that end, endeavoured to have the same arbitrated and ended by sir Thomas Savage and sir Nicholas Fortescue: but their travel therein taking no effect, after some suits in the prerogative court, the exchequer, and common pleas, between sir Richard Smith, sir John Davey, and sir A. Ingram, in conclusion, by and with the consent of all parties, the said differences were heard and ended by sir Henry Hobart, lord chief justice of the common pleas, and by the rest of the justices of the same court; by whose mediation and order, there is to be paid to the said sir Richard Smith and sir John Davey, in satisfaction of their estates and interest in the said lands and lease, over and besides other great sums of money by them formerly received, the sum of 3,000*l*. And touching the Charge of the Contract, about paying the 8,000*l*. old arrears, the Lord Treasurer saith, That all the 8,000*l*. was not old arrears, as is pretended, for that 3,800*l*. thereof was then newly due by quarter-book, for certain quarters ending at Midsommer, the next before the said year 1621. And also saith, That his promise therein was made before he became Lord Treasurer; and that promise was but to do his endeavour to get the 8,000*l*. paid; the same being a just and due debt owing to about 100 poor families, whose pressing necessities would have forced him, after he came to the place of Treasurer, to have given them satisfaction, if he had made no such uncertain promise before: and the said debt was paid at 18 several times, by several portions, as money could be best spared, between March 1621, and May 1623; and the king was so far from being prejudiced by the Lord Treasurer's dealing in this bargain, that his majesty was thereby eased from the repaying of the said 13,06*l*. 4*s*. 10*d*. according to the said covenant: and, to make it appear that no oppression or power was used in this purchase, for any private benefit, or otherwise, nor that the same was paid for by making of baronets, and suits to the king, as is pretended, the said Treasurer will undertake, and freely offereth, that the lands shall be conveyed again to whom this honourable house shall appoint, upon payment of the said 9,000*l*. and reassessing of his said leases and interests in the said Petty Farms, with repayment of the monies received upon the same. It being also apparent by his declaration, That if any such suits, oppressions, or other hard measure, had been offered touching the said lands or lease, as is alledged in the said Charge, the same were no way done by the Lord Treasurer, or by his privity or direction, or whilst the said lands remained in his hands, which was not for above 5 months; so as the same can in no manner concern the Lord Treasurer, neither doth he know of any thing done therein by any other, but what hath been just and lawful.— And as to the Baronets, the same nothing at all concerneth this matter; but was a grace of his majesty, upon the suit of a nobleman, who was assisted by the Lord Treasurer, which he was pleased to confer upon sir Thomas Mousson, in regard of the loss of his office of Hawkes; and the same taking no effect, his majesty upon the said sir Thomas Mousson's late Petition, was pleased, in lieu of the Baronets formerly intended him, to grant another suit for the compounding with certain of the copyholders in Wakefield, for the value of 50*l*. by the year; whereof as yet he hath received no fruit at all.

“The humble ANSWER of the said Lord Treasurer to the Addition of his CHARGE received from the most honourable court of the higher House of Parliament, on Thursday the 29th of April, 1624.”

"To that part which concerns him, as he was master of the Great Wardrobe, the said Treasurer saith, 'That he held that office for the 3 years mentioned in the Charge, and that, within that time, he did receive the ordinary assignment of 20,000*l.* per annum or thereabouts; wherein, he conceives, he did no ill service to the king when he did reduce the vast charge of that office to 20,000*l.* per ann. and, by 3 years experience, to shew his majesty the means how that 20,000*l.* might be again reduced to 12,000*l.* which he conceives, is no argument that he hath brought that place to any disorder or confusion, as, in a generality, is objected.—It is true that he made no account, for his time, neither for the Wardrobe, nor for the queen's Funeral; neither was there any cause why he should so do, for that, by his majesty's contract with him for the Wardrobe, he was to discharge the ordinary charges thereof for 20,000*l.* at his own hazard; and, for the said Funeral, having warrant, by privy seals, to receive 20,000*l.* he received but the sum of 13,500*l.* and yet saved some part thereof, besides what he yearly saved upon the ordinary allowance of the Wardrobe: with all which savings he, from time to time, truly and particularly acquainted his majesty, not being willing to gain so much by the same as he found he did, without his majesty's privy and gracious allowance; who, being rightly and truly informed of all the particulars, did, upon the said Lord Treasurer's voluntary surrendering of that beneficial Contract for the Wardrobe, for advancement of his majesty's service, having therein an estate for his life, grant him a general release and pardon, by indenture under the great seal of England, for all matters concerning the said Office of the Wardrobe and Funeral aforesaid.—'He further saith, 'That in the time of his being in that office, he paid divers extraordinary sums, which were not within his bargain, upon several warrants and privy seals; as, 3,000*l.* to the earl of Carlisle, about 2,000*l.* for new-furnishing Ely house for the Spanish ambassador, above 1,000*l.* for a new rich barge-cloth, and other extraordinary disbursements of about 1,000*l.* more; for all which, amounting to 7,000*l.* or thereabouts, he never yet received, or demanded, any allowance; and, if any man hath any thing owing to him, in the time that the said Lord Treasurer was officer, (as he is well assured there is none, except some small remains upon the foot of some private reckonings) the same are no way chargeable upon the king; the said Lord Treasurer being their proper debtor, and bound by that indenture, to discharge the same, which he hath been ever ready, upon their demand, to do accordingly; it being acknowledged by the creditors of the Wardrobe, that they have been better paid and used in his time, than either before or since. And, concerning the Charge of his not duly serving the Lord Chamberlain's Warrants for Supplies, it may well be that some few parcels, in some warrants, which could not then be suddenly provided, were upon that occasion, or by some fault or negligence of his servants trusted in that business, left unserved: but that neither hath been, is, or shall be, any loss to the king; for he acknowledgeth it to be just and fit, that he should provide and furnish the same at his own charges: though the neglect of that kind is no great matter, considering he has disbursed so much for his majesty in extraordinary, as aforesaid, for which he never yet had any allowance.—To that explanation of the same Charge, concerning his not repaying the merchants the imposts due unto them, upon the exportation of sugars formerly imported, according to his majesty's letters patent, of the 5th of Sept. 1610, the Lord Treasurer saith, 'That the usage in that particular is such now, as hath been ever since the impost was first laid, without any alteration by him, or any for him, in his time: neither did any merchant bring his certificate, and make his demand for the allowance, according to the form prescribed by these letters patent, as the Lord Treasurer is informed by those that farm the impost of him; and therefore there could be no demand when there was no demand made. And, besides, this is so far from being a matter of benefit to the Lord Treasurer, that the farmers of the impost under him, (who should have that profit, if there be any) have been, and are willing to give the merchants content in their desire, if they will petition his majesty and see out a privy seal to warrant it; without which, it hath ever been understood, it could not be done in respect to the king's interest therein, and a regard it never hath been allowed heretofore.—All which the said Lord Treasurer doth aver to be true in all points, and shall be ready to justify and maintain the same, in such manner as this honourable court shall award.—M 1624. 22. 12.

After these affairs were all read, the Lord received a Message from the Commons, importing, 'That they desired a conference with their lordships, on the subject of two bills, then before them; and at the same time, they presented a Petition to the house from divers merchants, whose names are thereunto subscribed, containing a complaint against the Lord Treasurer, for an imposition on Hops: which complaint they humbly referred unto their lordships, and compared the same with the imposition laid on French wines, even when their merchandize was in the river of Thames; and affirmed that this had doubled the oppression on the merchants; for that the archduchess, out of whose country the Hops came, did thereupon lay new impositions upon the manufactures of this land. Lastly, The commons conceive, that this new imposition on Hops was laid, without any other warrant than the Lord Treasurer's letter."

This Petition from the merchants was ordered to be read, and was as follows:

The humble Petition of sundry Merchants whose names are here under subscribed.

"Most humble shew, That whereas in the reign of the late queen Elizabeth continually, and until the 2nd year of the king's majesty's reign that now is, Hops were rated for the custom thereof at 12*d.* per every cwt. Afterwards, in the time when the earl of Salisbury was Lord Treasurer, there was imposed on hops 6*d.* upon every cwt. which was done by consent of the merchants; which said custom and impost hath continued so until October 1622. At the time, when your petitioners, and others, had brought into this kingdom, and into the river Thames, great quantities of Hops, the now Lord Treasurer wrote his letter to the Custom house, That no entries of any Hops should be taken till further order from him; so that your petitioners Hops lay long in ships and lighters, to their great charges, and damage of the said Hops; which was done without your petitioners knowledge, they nothing mistrusting any such composition; so that before your petitioners could be suffered to take up their goods, they were forced to pay 10*s.* for every cwt. of Hops, over and above the duty and impost aforesaid.—That divers strangers of Flanders, and others, have received up their goods upon bonds by reason of the archduchess's ambassadors; but divers of them have not yet paid their monies, nor entered to pay, as they themselves have given forth in speeches; notwithstanding the petitioners, most of them, were forced to pay in their monies, without any favour, to their great and intolerable loss and hindrance; and others have entered into bonds for the same, which are yet in force.—That, by reason of the said impost, so exacted from the petitioners, and others as aforesaid, there was a great impost laid on in Flanders, in the archduchess's country, from whence the said Hops came, upon fustians and other of our native commodities; which have been to the great loss of the petitioners, and to the great hurt and prejudice of the common wealth in general, and of no benefit to his majesty for the present; for that, since this great imposition there hath not come hither the 20th part of those commodities as formerly.—The petitioners humbly intreat the honourable assembly to take consideration of the premises, and to be a means unto his majesty that the said petitioners may be repaid the said money so exacted; and that the imposts upon the Hops as aforesaid, which are still continued, may be reduced unto the former rate of 12*d.* upon every hundred weight of the said Hops; whereby your petitioners may be the better enabled to continue their trade, which otherwise they must of necessity desert. And further, that their bonds, formerly entered into, may be re-delivered unto them to be cancelled."

May 5. The house waited upon his majesty at the Banqueting house at Whitehall, and on the 7th, the Lord Keeper made a report to the lords of his majesty's speech to them; but because the said speech, he said, was ruinable, his lordship desired that he might read the same, which he did in these words:

His Majesty's Speech at Whitehall, to the upper house of Parliament, May 5, 1624, concerning the Lord Treasurer.

"My Lords! Of mercy and of judgment both, my lords, my speech shall be unto you. There is a great officer of mine shortly to come before you, accused of divers misdemeanors. I am the judge in whose room you are to exercise judgment; for as I am under God in this throne, so you are under me: therefore I have been desirous that I might open myself unto you, anent this matter and occasion; and, as I have once said in a parliament before to you, so will I promise to shew you, as in a chrysal, my heart out of my mouth, in such sort as no false heart or tongue shall be able to blemish what I shall represent unto you.—It is my judgment, next under God, which you are to exercise at this time; and therefore, as a judge instructs the jury before the prisoner departs from the bar, so it becomes me to tell you how to carry yourselves in this great business; and the cause hereof is this, because I am bound in conscience to be careful of your carriage herein; for, if your judgments should fall contrary to my approbation, I protest to God it would be a great misery to me, and a greater grief unto your hearts.—Before the last parliament, I never saw any precedent of this nature: in the last, against another great officer of mine (lord Bacon) there needed no admonition from me, because ye had 'reum confitentem;' in this the party stands upon his justification; and therefore ye have more need to take and examine it well. There is no doubt at all of your doing justice; you are most of you nobly born, the rest are noble by their places; you are the most honourable jury of England; nor do I intend further to instruct you, than to give your eyes, many eyes see more than one, some light into this matter. No king is the worse for the advice of his council, nor shall you be for receiving my advice and instruction.—In all matters of trial where are denials, two things are specially to be considered, the verity of the fact and greatness of the guilt. For the 1st, you cannot be too diligent in the search of the verity of the fact; for 'satius est reum dimittere quam innocentium damnare.' For the 2nd, You are to consider duly the quality of the offence; for, if your punishment be far inferior to the crime, it is an invitation to commit new offences. And, if it be over and above the offence, it is plain injustice and tyranny: therefore your punishment must be ever bounded in measure and moderation, according to the quality of the offence. You will do, I am sure, what a jury doth, for you have taken a greater oath than they; you have sworn, upon your honour, to me; by your conscience, towards God.—And here I shall give a touch of two things; 1st, I shall speak of the Person of the Man, and then of my Opinion of the Course which you are to hold in your judicature at this time.—For the Person of the Man; the first acquaintance that I had with him was by the lord of Northampton (who is with God, who often brought him unto me a private man, before he was so much as my servant. He then made so many projects for my profit, that Buckingham tell in liking with him, after the earl of Northampton's death, and brought him into my service. For I profess it here openly, and I am glad he is not by to hear me. That, besides him, I never saw young countier that was so careful for the king's profit, without my respect, as Buckingham was. He found this man so studious for my profits, that he backed him against great personages and men, without sparing any name. Buckingham laid the ground and bare the envy; he took the laborious and ministerial part upon him, and thus he came up to his preferment.—I was deceived if he was not a good officer; he was an instrument, under Buckingham, for reformation of the Household, the Navy, and the Exchequer; Buckingham setting him on, and taking upon himself the envy of all the officers. And he himself protested many a time to me, That he had not been able to do me any service, in the ministerial part, if Buckingham had not backed him in it. Hereupon I thought him the fittest man for this place; he had seen before the Abuses in the Exchequer, in the Navy, and in a thousand other particulars.—I must therefore put you in mind of one thing, and justice forceth me so to do: he cannot but have a many enemies; all Treasurers, if they do good service to their masters, must be generally hated, as M. Rosny was in France. And a Treasurer cannot oblige me more, than when I find suitors beg from me, and pray me not to send my reference to the Treasurer, because he gives them no good Answer. Two kinds of people are continually hated in court, Treasurers and Ushers; because this latter must of necessity put disgraces upon men, and the Treasurers must keep the king from importunity of many suitors. I pray judge not by the affections of the people, nor by the hatred of the people; you must avoid both these; and therefore judges of old were painted blind.—The 2nd thing I recommend to your consideration is, That you look upon a sound trial, so that the Offence be clear; and, in the next place, when you find a cause of punishment, let it be within and not without the limits of his desert.—Now I shall recommend to you some Generals; not for his respect or particular, but my own, my son's and posterity's, and your own, my lords, whose part God knows when it may fall unto. Let no man's particular ends bring forth a precedent, that may be prejudicial to you all and your heirs after you; precedents there are none of many years, before this and the last sessions. The inferior are the Lower House, and the Upper House are the judges. If the accusation come in by the party wronged, then you have a fair entrance for justice; if by men that search and hunt after other men's lives, beware of it, it is dangerous; it may be your own undoing. No man can stand upright before God and man, if every act of his should be enquired after and hunted out by every man, though it concerns him not.—The main ground in reformation is this, The party complaining should say, This wrong he hath done me; if he take corrupted judicature in judgment, or take a Bribe to the hurt of the innocent; if, in Execution, he hath wrested, by violence, from the party; here is a just ground for an accusation. But for every busy fellow to turn inquisitor a thing insufferable; how far it falls thus, in this particular, I know not. Bribery, as I would define it, is where a judge receives reward against the innocent; Extortion is done, when money is wrung from the subject by the greatness of a man's power, and by the denial of justice; Misdemeanor is, when a man abseth his place, and oppresseth the poor subjects. I have discussed this point, and I do not doubt but, when he comes before you, you will hear him with temper and patience.—Now, my lords, I speak for justice; if this party had done so, after such an example shewed the last session, his fault is double; for he came upon a reformation, and he discovered the corruptions of others. This I would say to you, if I was to die this hour: errors by mistaking, God forbid that you should be rigorous in censuring them; but errors that are wilful, spare them not.—Some curious men may say, peradventure, he might, in some points, have done better; but this is not criminal in him: Let it be by deceit and cozenage, by helping himself, he hath hindered my estate, he is worse than a devil. Treasurers cannot be barred from seeing, and the king's liberality no man can controul. If he hath helped himself, with the king's loss, I speak not for him.—Lastly, there are divers things laid to his charge, which were done with my knowledge and approbation; let him bear no charge for that, for that is mine, and I must bear it. For if you question him for any such thing, you punish me; if any thing touches upon him in that kind, either meddle not with it, or stay and know the vent from me. I love my servants, God is my witness, but it is only for virtue's sake; and he is an unhappy master that doth not love a faithful servant. But, if there appear in any of them falshood and treachery, and deceit under trust, my love is gone. If, of an angel, he become a devil, I will never excuse him: I will never maintain any man in a bad cause: 'Et sic finitur fabula.'

The Report of the King's Speech being made, the lord keeper observed further, "That his majesty said, he did not deliver this speech out of any suspicion of their lordships, but only in discharge of his duty and conscience." Which the house ordered to be entered.—The Lord Treasurer being to appear this day at the bar, it was first reported, That when his lordship came he should kneel. And being brought to the bar, by the gentleman usher, not having his staff in his hand as Lord Treasurer, he was told that the lord keeper willed him to stand up.

The Attorney General opens the Charge against the Lord Treasurer as Master of the Wardrobe.

Then Mr. Serjeant Crewe came to the clerk's table, and opened the Charge against him to this effect:

"The Commons of England, being the general inquisitors of the sores and grievances of the kingdom, have presented their Complaint against this great lord and officer; whereof, and of other misdemeanors, their lordships have before taken cognizance. That he is to charge him the Lord Treasurer, with Violation and Breach of Trust, in defrauding the king who trusted him; and with Bribery and Oppression.—That he would begin with his lordship's misdemeanors in the office of the Wardrobe: and shew, That heretofore, that office being very expensive to his majesty by reason of the charge and provision of his majesty for the queen, for prince Henry, the queen of Bohemia, and the prince's highness that now is, he, the said Lord Treasurer, informed his majesty of the greatness of his charge, and that he would save his majesty a great part thereof; whereupon he procured the office to himself; but he stood charged with nothing, save the ordinary provision for his majesty.—He is made Master of the Wardrobe, Sept. 14, 16 Jac. And Dec. 26, 18 Jac. the king reciting, "Whereas we had certain notice that sir Lionel Cranfield, in the execution of the said office, hath so directly and carefully performed the said trust, in that behalf committed to him, as that, by the small time of his service there, great sums of money have been, and are likely, yearly, to be abated, in comparison of former expences therein for some years past: and also that, by the continuance of his care and good endeavours in the said service, our former great yearly expence of the Wardrobe hath been reduced within the sum of 20,000*l.* and yet with the maintenance of the former state thereof; and that of 20,000*l.* assigned for the queen's Funeral, he had received 15,500*l.* and no more: and that the said sir Lionel by his discreet and careful performance of that trust, hath, with the said 15,500*l.* discharged the said Funeral honourably, and in such sort as was requisite, and hath brought the said charge within the sum of 15,500*l.* and yet there were black cloths and stuffs to the value of 2,000*l.* or thereabouts, and some part also of the said money saved:" the king, thereupon, grants him all that he had saved of 20,000*l.* for the year ended at Michaelmas, 1619, and for another year ended at Michaelmas, 1620, the ordinary charges deducted; for which sums he agrees to discharge the ordinary charge of the Wardrobe; and the king grants the black cloths, stuffs, and monies unto the said sir Lionel, remaining of the said 15,500*l.* for the Funeral, for his disbursements for the ordinary of the Wardrobe, for which he was to account; but not for the surplusage, which he saved of the 20,000*l.*—Dec. 27, 18 Jac. the king makes the same Recital, ut supra; and, having given the surplusage for 2 years before, doth now continue it for life, yearly at Michaelmas, upon his account, for the Wardrobe, the necessary disbursements deducted, and gives him the surplusage without further account.—Jan. 11, 19 Jac. the Lord Treasurer surrenders his Patent. Not, He got, in these last three years, 8,000*l.* per ann. and had 6,000*l.* given him at his farewell. In toto, 30,000*l.*—Jan. 18, 19 Jac. the king pardons him all sums of money received by him for the Funeral or Wardrobe; and he covenants to discharge the king of such debts as were due by him for the Wardrobe. By this it appears how the king trusts the Lord Treasurer, being master of the Wardrobe, and what expectation the king had of his extraordinary service; that the expences should be much abated and diminished, and yet the state of the Wardrobe maintained by competent and sufficient supplies, and that what the supplies were, should appear upon account; and thereupon the account was directed by the patent.—And now, see, my lords, how the Wardrobe is brought into confusion, and how far it is from the old state thereof: which by the patent of my lord, should have been maintained. And, in this, will appear unto your lordships plainly, Breach of Trust and Fraud.—The warrants to be served for the Wardrobe, came from my Lord Chamberlain, from the master of the household, and from the groom of the stole. The warrants and emptions thereupon were usually, heretofore, entered in the clerk of the Wardrobe's books, that the provisions and particulars supplied might appear; but, in my Lord Treasurer's time, no warrants are brought in or entered; no emptions entered, nor book of expences kept by the clerk, as it ought to be.—The clerk should have surveyed the parcels; but could not, through my lord's default: neither is there any Account made as ought to have been: and all this is contrary to the patent, to the prejudice of the king, and of the officers and workmen in the Wardrobe. And, to the end his proceedings in that office might not be discovered, this ensued further upon it, that the warrants were served short, and many not served at all; those that were served, were base and ill, stuffed with great delay and long suit; and yet the suitors for the same were slighted by my lord and his officers.—And although my lord had his money impressed to him, yet he made slack and slow payments with great abatements of the prices formerly allowed. And at my lord's departing from the office, in Jan. 19 Jac. he gets a pardon for all he hath received, without any account, and obtained a lease of the Sugars, for a recompence of his surrender of that office."

Mr. Serjeant Crew having thus far opened the Charge; the clerk by his direction, read the Depositions of Witnesses taken to prove the same: which Depositions will be found at length in the Lords' Journals, vol. 3. p. 345, after which the Lord Keeper moved, That the Lord Treasurer might answer his particular Charge touching the Wardrobe. His lordship thereupon demanded ink and paper, and had it.

The Lord Treasurer's ANSWER as to the Wardrobe.

Then the Lord Treasurer answered, "That his majesty used his service in many particulars touching his estate; as, in the Navy, the Household, and Wardrobe. That he found the expences of the Wardrobe of a vast sum; every one made what bills they would, and did set what prices they would. When he was master of that office, he sent for the artificers, and told them, That he would not look upon what was past; but that hereafter, the prices should be reasonable, and the king's money should be ready, and they duly paid. That there were many fees to be quarterly paid in the Wardrobe; all which were duly paid. As for Canning and Pulford, he gave them 2s. in the pound more than another would have said for: he bought little of those of the Wardrobe, but chiefly much of the merchants; and had a good merchants shop in the Wardrobe, and bought of the best.—That Pulford complains not of a hard price, but that he had not the ancient price.—As touching the not serving of divers warrants, That his business being many, he referred those to his servant Colebeck: That not above the value of 7 or 800*l.* remained unserved; whereas he hath laid out 6 or 7,000*l.* upon the extraordinaries of that office; as, for furnishing Fly-house for the Spanish ambassador, a rich barge cloth for the king, and many other things; and that he gave the earl of Carlisle, his predecessor in that office, 3,000*l.*—As touching the baseness of the stuff served in, he desired they might be compared with those formerly served in; and affirmed they were much better.—And whereas some complain they were slighted, when they were suitors for the warrants to be served, his lordship desired they might be examined, whether they were slighted by him or no.—As touching the Account, his lordship answered, That, by the patent, which was read, he was to account; but that he had another patent, if he be not deceived, without account; which his lordship delivered: and the clerk read the same; and also his majesty's explanation upon the lease of Sugars, granted to the Lord Treasurer, upon his surrender of the Wardrobe."

Then Mr. Serjeant Crew observed to the Lords, out of both those, "That his lordship was to account for the ordinary disbursements of the Wardrobe."—The Lord Treasurer answered, "That he conceived he was not to account: That he first reduced that office from the vast charge he told the king of; and whereas he was allowed 20,000*l.* per ann. for the same, he told the duke of Buckingham, 2 years since, that he got too much thereby; and that it might be defrayed for 12,000*l.* per ann.; and that he, having reduced that office from 30, nay 40,000*l.* per ann. unto 12,000*l.* is a good account."—Hereupon divers lords presently affirmed, That the duke of Buckingham had acknowledged, that the Lord Treasurer, when he was to surrender the Wardrobe to the earl of Denbigh, did acquaint his grace with the greatness of gains in that office; but, to the end he might have a great recompence, first he named 4,000*l.* per ann. and afterwards 8,000*l.* and that this drew on the lease of Sugars to his lordship. Then Mr. Serjeant Crew observed, That the Charge against the Lord Treasurer is upon proof; his lordship's Answer upon averment, which he humbly referred to their lordships consideration. And thus ended the Charge touching the Wardrobe. And then the Lord Treasurer was withdrawn.

The Lord Keeper removed to the bench, to satisfy the house touching the Lord Treasurer's speech, That the duke of Buckingham knew of his gains in the Wardrobe; and told their lordships, "That he well remembers, that when the duke of Buckingham moved his majesty to place sir Lionel Cranfield Treasurer, (which he desired, though afterwards he seemed unwilling) that then the king required the surrender of the Wardrobe to the earl of Denbigh. That when the Lord Treasurer heard of it, he magnified the profits of the place; first to the duke, that it was 4,000*l.* per ann. and to the king, that it was worth 6 or 7,000*l.* per ann.; whereby he got the Lease of Sugars at 4,000*l.* per ann. less than they are worth; and his successor, the earl of Denbigh, had 4,000*l.* per ann. less than his lordship, for disbursements of that office of the Wardrobe. That the duke being moved at this, the Lord Treasurer then told his grace, that his gains in that office had been 8,000*l.* per annum; nay, more than he could well tell; and, till then, his grace knew not of the great gains of that office; and if his grace, who hath been ever careful for the king's profit, had known of it sooner, the Lord Treasurer had not held that place so long; for his grace is 'amicus usque ad aras.'—Then it was ordered, That the Lord Treasurer be warranted to be here again, at two in the afternoon at the bar."

May 7, p. m. The Lord Treasurer being brought to the bar, as before, kneeled not until he was remembered thereof by the Lord Keeper; then he kneeled, and the Lord Keeper willed him presently to stand up. The king's Attorney being commanded to open the second Charge against the Lord Treasurer, his lordship said "He was unprovided in the morning for the Wardrobe; and besought their lordships to take into their consideration, that he is denied counsel to speak for him, being charged with great matters, for it may be their own case; and he hath precedents, as he is informed, that he might have counsel allowed him: that, however, he would speak out of his own strength; but desired their lordships, that, if he forget any thing, no advantage be taken against him," unto which their lordships agreed.—The Lord Treasurer made two other requests; the one "for that his witnesses have not fully answered touching the Wardrobe, that he might have a re-examination upon the same interrogatories."—This the house denied, as not usual to be granted in other courts, after publication, for that it might produce perjury. His lordship's other request was, "That he might produce his proofs, or records, that the workmen of the Wardrobe were paid:" which was also denied; for that the non-payment of the workmen is but an accident to his Charge.

The Attorney General proceeds on the Charge of Bribery.

Then Mr. Attorney was willed to proceed: and he proceeded in this manner, viz.—"The second Charge wherewith the Lord Treasurer is charged, is for three several Corruptions; two of them disguised under the shadow and pretext of a bargain; and the third of a new year's gift. Concerning the two former: it cannot be denied, That, Feb. 6, 17 Jac. his majesty did lease unto sir Nich. Salter, and others, the customs and imposts of French and Rhenish Wines, from Michaelmas, 1622, for 9½ years; and did covenant with the lessees not to lett any new imposition upon the wines, during the continuance of that lease, without the assent of the lessees. And, Jan. 19 Jac. the king made a lease unto sir John Wolstenholme, and others, for divers years, of the great customs; in which lease there was a covenant, on the part of the farmers, that they should put in security for the payment of their rents; and, for performance of this covenant, they were to have the allowance and warrant of the Lord Treasurer, without which the king's remembrancer would not take their bonds. Jan. 14, 19 Jac. a new impost of 3*l.* per tun, was set upon the Wines; and the same being done without the consent of the farmers, and to their great damage, they were to expect recompence for the same upon their covenant. Upon these two occasions, the farmers of the several farms were necessarily occasioned to become suitors to the Lord Treasurer; the one for recompence and reparation of their loss, the other for allowance of their security, and his warrant to accept it.—The farmers of the Wines begin their suit to the Lord Treasurer about January or February, anno 19 Jacobi, and continued it with much instance until December, anno 20 Jacobi, ten or eleven months together without success; whereupon they found means to have access to the king himself, and represented their grief by an humble Petition: which his majesty answered most graciously, and gave straight charge to the Lord Treasurer to give them a speedy dispatch, and conclude with them upon such a recompence, as in honour and justice was fit. And thereupon, Dec. 31, 1622, the Lord Treasurer did agree with them, that they should be allowed 9,500*l.* to be defalked in 9½ years out of their rent, after the rate of 1,000*l.* per ann. This being agreed on, they were to have his lordship's warrant to the king's attorney, for drawing a book according to the agreement; which warrant was speedily prepared and drawn by his lordship's secretary; but delayed from Dec. 31, an. 20 Jac. until June 24, an. 21 Jac. And the farmers of the Great Customs having divided the farms into 32 parts, every of which part was to give his majesty security of 1,500*l.*

for payment of their rent, they presented their security to the Lord Treasurer, who allowed and gave warrant to the king's remembrancer to receive it; but the parties unto whom five of these 32 parts were allotted, falling off and relinquishing their parts, the four patentees of the farm resolved to resume those parts to themselves; and thereupon tendered the Lord Treasurer their own security for those five parts; which he agreed to accept, yet protracted them till June, an. 21 Jac.—The business of both farms thus delayed, and it being conceived that money was expected, the farmers of the Wines resolved to present the Lord Treasurer with 500*l.* and they of the Great Farm resolved of the like sum; and Mr. Abraham Jacob being a partner in either farm, was entrusted severally by the farmers of each farm, viz. 500*l.* a-piece, to be presented to the Lord Treasurer; which he paid in one entire sum of 1,000*l.* to Mr. Catchmay, the Lord Treasurer's steward, June 27, an. 21 Jac. by the Lord Treasurer's appointment; and thereupon the business of both farms had a dispatch by the Lord Treasurer's means.—But to palliate and disguise these two corrupt gifts, the Lord Treasurer then pretended to have 4 parts of the Great Farm divided into 32 parts; and, in his Answer touching these Corruptions, justifieth the taking of 1,000*l.* by way of bargain for those 4 parts from the farmers of the Great Customs: this Answer being disproved, and it being made plain that he had no part in that farm, it must needs follow that the money was taken corruptly, for the dispatch of the farmers business, and, for manifestation hereof, it stands proved.—That upon the treaty of the bargain for the Great Farm, the Lord Treasurer propounded to the farmers to have some parts in the farm, not for his own benefit, but to dispose of amongst his friends; but this was rather a proposition than any settled resolution or conclusion: for the farmers doubting, lest, by this pretence, some partners might be put on them with whom they were unwilling to join, desire the Lord Treasurer, that they might make choice of their own partners, and, if their farms prospered, they would be thankful unto his lordship.—This thankfulness was afterwards performed on their part, for they raised his usual new year's gift from 1,000 marks to 1,000*l.* and, upon this request of the merchants, the Lord Treasurer waved his proposition of having the disposal of any parts in the farm; which appeareth not only by the plain and express testimony of many witnesses, but by these proofs following, viz. 1. The lease of the Great Farm bears date, Jan. 1, an. 19 Jac. between which time and April 29, an. 20 Jac. the farmers divided the whole farm into 32 parts, allowing to each man his part, and reduced the same into writing, expressing therein the sum of the security which every man was to give, without mentioning therein any parts reserved to the Lord Treasurer, or his friends; and this writing, being tendered to the Lord Treasurer, April 29, 1622, was by him allowed, and warrant signed by him to the king's remembrancer to take security accordingly. 2. When the partners, to whom 5 of these parts were allotted, fell off, and would not give security, the patentees resolving to take those parts to themselves, tendered their own security to the Lord Treasurer, and he agreed to accept it; and, though he protracted it long, yet he did not, in that long time of delay, challenge any parts until about June, 1623. 3. The farmers resting secure about that proposition, did, after the 29th of April, 1622, divide the whole farm by indentures, allotting to each man his due part, without reserving any for the Lord Treasurer. 4. At Christmas, 1622, the first year of the farm ended; and this year's profit was, by account, in April 1623, divided among the partners, reserving no share to the Lord Treasurer. 5. But the truth is, That all this time the Lord Treasurer rested quiet, and neither did nor would challenge any parts; the farm being of that small expectation of benefit, as five partners gave over their parts, rather than they would give security; but, about June 1623, the farm being grown more hopeful by the return of some East India ships, the Lord Treasurer having in his hands the business of both farms, which he had so long delayed, meaning to make this a veil and cover for taking those corrupt gifts, then pretended to have four 32 parts, which he had waved so long before. 6. The Lord Treasurer appointing Catchmay, his servant, to receive the 1,000*l.* of Jacob, which was received the 27th June, 1623, forbade him to give any acquittance for the money, but to leave that to himself and Jacob; which, had it been paid upon a plain bargain, he never would have done. 7. This money was entered into the Accounts and Books of the said Farms; for in the Journal Books of the Petty Farms, July 31, 1623, there is 500*l.* entered to be paid and presented to the Lord Treasurer, by the hands of Mr. Jacob, for a gratification of his favour in accommodating an allowance of 1,000*l.* per ann. to be abated of their rent for the time to come; and the like entry was made in the ledger of the same farm. And, Dec. 20, 1623, upon the general Account of that farm, this 500*l.* is put to account, as a gratuity given to the Lord Treasurer, and is borne rateably by all the partners of the farm, of which account many copies were given out to the partners; and, for the other 500*l.* there is extant a warrant, dated July 29, 1623, subscribed by sir John Wolstenholme and Henry Garraway, two of the farmers of the Great Farm, directed to Williams, the cashier of that farm, to pay to Mr. Jacob 500*l.* given by him, by order of the farmers, to the Lord Treasurer, for a gratuity, and to put it to the account of the farm; which was done accordingly; and these Accounts stood in this manner till Feb. last, after the parliament was summoned; and then the Lord Treasurer caused Jacob to procure the 500*l.* that was set upon the Petty Farms, to be altered from thence, and to be charged upon the farmers of the Great Farm; and satisfaction to be given to the partners of the Petty Farms of their proportionable parts they were charged with for that 500*l.* upon the aforesaid Account of the 20th Dec.; and as many as could of the dispersed copies of that Account to be gotten in. He also procures Jacob to write a letter to his lordship and to antedate the same in June before; by which Jacob did insinuate, that the 1,000*l.* was given his lordship for four 32 parts of the Great Farm; and himself made an acquittance to Jacob with the like antedate, acknowledging that 1,000*l.* to be received for those four parts; which indirect courses of changing the accounts, and antedating the said acquittance and letter, manifesteth that the former proceedings were not sincere, but were to be converted and blanched with these devices. Touching the said Corruption, shadowed under pretext of a New-Year's-Gift, it stands proved, That, at Christmas last, 1623, the farmers of the Petty Customs presented the Lord Treasurer with a tun of wine, intending to have added to it a pipe of Canary wine, or the best sack; but the Lord Treasurer mising the smallness of their present, urged them to a further gratuity in money, and thereby obtained from them, besides the wine, 100*l.* in money."—The Charge being thus opened by Mr. Attorney, the clerk read the Proofs, which will be found in vol. 3, p. 352, of the Lords' Journals.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer to the Charge of Corruption.

The Lord Treasurer answered, "That the greatest part of these proofs swear not that they of the Petty Farm gave him the 500*l.* That it is true the great farmers paid it to his lordship and laid it on the Petty Farm, and deceived them and abused his lordship thereby. He denied that the petty farmers were suitors to his majesty at such time as is affirmed; but they complained to his lordship and he directed them to exhibit their bill into the exchequer chamber, and ordered Mr. Attorney to answer it: that they liked it not; but, by some powerful means, delivered a Petition to the king (a very scandalous petition against his lordship) which the king referred to the chancellor and himself: that they demanded an allowance of 10,000*l.* to be presently made, and he allowed them but 9,500*l.* to be paid in 9½ years; for which he deserved no bribe: that his warrant to the Attorney was delayed for these two causes: 1. For that his lordship propounded to buy in their farm for the king. 2. For that their warrant was not drawn as it ought to be."—Touching the Great Farm, his lordship said, "He would make it appear, that he had reserved four 32 parts therein for himself and his friends; and alledged, That those farmers have confessed that, their farms prospering, he thereupon did demand a recompence for his part." Here his lordship read the Heads of his Proofs out of a paper, and then required that the examinations taken on his part might be read; which were read accordingly by the clerk.—See Lords' Journals, v. 3, p. 358.

Then the Lord Treasurer made a brief repetition of his proofs of his interest in some 32 parts of the Great Farm; and took exception against the testimony of Jacob, for it varied in time of payment of his 1,000*l.* from the testimony of Hyde. And his lordship affirmed, "That the 500*l.* was misplaced by him, the said Jacob and two more, on the farmers of the Petty Farms; whereas he received the same only for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm." And as touching the antedated letter, and the antedated acquittance, his lordship said, "That they were so done, lest Jacob should die, and so his testimony be lost." Unto which Mr. Attorney replied, "That it is sufficiently proved, that the said Lord Treasurer, neither when he received the 1,000*l.* nor long before, had any right to the said 32 parts:" and thereupon he stated the case as before, and rehearsed the seven reasons by him formerly alleged, to prove that the Lord Treasurer had waved his proposition of having the disposing of any part in the Great Farm. And, as touching the Lord Treasurer's exception to the testimonies of Jacob, for that it varied in time from Hyde, Mr. Attorney shewed, that Jacob deposed, that he paid the money to the Lord Treasurer on the 27th of June, 1623, by direction from the farmers, and Hyde swears, that the money was delivered to Jacob the 31st July, 1623; which was by way of allowance back again, so no contradiction between them.

Then the Lord Treasurer protested, "That, as he shall answer it at the fearful day of Judgment, he received that 1,000*l.* for no other consideration than for his share in the four 32 parts." And as touching the third Corruption, by way of a New-Year's-Gift, he said, "That nothing belongs to the Lord Treasurer's place but 20*s.* per diem, the sale of the places when they fall, and the New-Year's-Gifts; and denied, that he urged them to any certain sum. All which, he said, he would humbly leave to their lordships honourable consideration; and, withal, requested their lordships to forbear his further attendance here till Monday next, because he had spent his spirits so far, that his cause might otherwise suffer through his weakness." And so withdrew himself.—The Lords granted his request, and commanded the gentleman usher to signify so much to his lordship; and further ordered, that he should attend their lordships here again on Monday next, at eight in the morning, at the bar. An order was signed by the clerk accordingly, and sent to the Lord Treasurer.

May 8. The Lords received from the Commons this message "That the Commons do humbly desire to know, what time their lordships will please to appoint for a conference touching the bill on Monopolies. They do also desire a conference touching some Accusation against the lord bishop of Norwich, unto which his lordship has not yet been heard; humbly leaving the time and place to their appointment. And they do earnestly recommend to their lordships consideration, that general peace-maker of England, the bill of Conceal-ments."—Ans. The Lords have appointed a conference concerning Monopolies this afternoon, at three in the Painted Chamber. They have not yet resolved of a time for the conference touching Accusations against the lord bishop of Norwich; for that divers of the lords are now absent: but, as soon as they can conveniently appoint a time for the same, their lordships will send to them by messengers of their own. As touching the bill of Concealments, their lordships have taken the same into their serious consideration; and it is only deferred for that all the king's council, who are appointed to attend the same, are, at this time, otherwise employed: but their lordships do promise all possible expedition therein.

Proceedings against the Lord Treasurer on the Lease for Sugars.

May 10. The Lord Keeper put the house in mind of the business concerning the Lord Treasurer, to be proceeded in this morning. And his lordship being brought to the bar, Mr. Serjeant Crew opened the Charge against him on the Lease of Sugars, in this manner:

"Quarto Decembris, 18 Jac. The king leaseth to George Herriot the impost on Sugars, to hold from Christmas following, for three years, at the rent of 5,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per ann. payable at Midsummer and Christmas. Duodecimo Jan. anno 19 Jac. The Lord Treasurer procures Herriot to surrender that lease; and, the next day, takes a lease thereof from the king, unto Nicholas Harman and Tho. Catchmay (two of his servants) unto his own use, at 2,000*l.* rent per ann. and lets the same unto the farmers at 6,000*l.* per ann. and, to effect this surrender, gives order, in a time of scarcity of money, for the payment of 14,865*l.* due unto the said Herriot for jewels, which was paid, between the 15th of Dec. 1621, and the 10th Jan. following, in this manner, viz. 7,000*l.* odd money, out of the arrears of the said Herriot's rents, and 7,000*l.* odd money, out of the Tobacco Farm, by way of anticipation.—The crime objected against the Lord Treasurer herein is this: had Herriot's lease continued, Herriot's debt had been paid out of his rent; and the said Treasurer has not only caused the said lease to be surrendered, and procured a new lease thereof unto his servants, to his own use, at a far less rent; but hath laid 7,000*l.* of that debt upon the Farm of Tobacco: and this he hath done in a time of scarcity of money, even then when he caused the impositions to be laid on the wines for a supply for the Palatinate: and further he hath paid the smaller rent of 2,000*l.* per ann. very slowly unto the king; an arrear of 3,000*l.* thereof being paid since the 31st of Dec. last, after the summons of this parliament. And whereas, for the advancement of trade, the merchants, upon the exportation of their merchandizes, are repaid their custom, which they formerly paid upon the importation, this is denied upon the exportation of Sugars, to the damage of the merchants, and for the Lord Treasurer's private gain." Then the clerk read the Proofs; see Lords' Journals, v. 3, p. 364.

The Lord Treasurer's Defence.

As to this part of the Charge, the Lord Treasurer confessed, "That the lease to Herriot was at the rent of 5,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and the lease to his own use, (upon the surrender) at 2,000*l.* rent, and that he hath let the same at 6,000*l.* per ann. and affirmed, That his majesty was first acquainted with it, and well allowed thereof."—Hereupon the Lord Keeper signified to the house, that the king had commanded him to tell their lordships, That his majesty understood that the Lord Treasurer should gain by his lease 4,000*l.* per ann. So there was no further proceeding in that point of the charge.—The Lord Treasurer also confessed, "That he paid Herriot 14,000*l.* odd money;" but affirmed, "That it was a just debt, and that Herriot had a power to pay himself, by a privy seal, out of his rent." His lordship denied, "That he paid 7,000*l.* of that debt out of the Tobacco Farm, by way of anticipation; and said he only transferred it from the Sugars to the Tobacco, and justified the same; for that the king's meaning was, That he should have 4,000*l.* per ann. out of the impost for Sugars, presently upon his surrender of the Wardrobe: and the king lost not by it, for he, the Lord Treasurer, had, for the disbursements of the Wardrobe, 20,000*l.* per ann. which he hath now settled at 16,000*l.* per ann. and yet the king's state therein maintained and a noble gentleman rewarded."—Touching the slow payment of his rent, he denied it not; but said, "He had disbursed as much or more, before-hand, for the king in other matters."—As touching the impost not returned upon the exportation of Sugars, his lordship denied, That it was ever demanded of him; and affirmed, "that if it be due, then the farmers are tied by his lease to them to repay it; but if they be not so tied, that then he will pay it all, both for the time past and to come." And thus ended the Charge for the Sugars.

The Charge as to Groceries.

Then Mr. Serjeant Crew opened the Charge against the Lord Treasurer, touching his lordship's warrants to levy compositions for purveyance of Groceries in the out-ports, after this manner, viz. "That the city of London did compound with the king for Groceries: but the out-ports refused, especially Bristol, and yielded to purveyance in kind; and that Bristol had an order for this in the exchequer, in the time of Robert earl of Salisbury, late Lord Treasurer: yet, notwithstanding this, the Lord Treasurer directed his warrants to levy this composition; and, although it was not due to the king, nor any such composition entered into the compting-house, his lordship commanded their goods, then in the ports, to be stayed, and not entered, till it was paid, or bonds given for it; and thereby constrained some ports to pay it, and the merchants of Bristol, who denied it, to attend his lordship ten weeks together, to be discharged; and yet bonds were exacted from the merchants of Bristol for the payment thereof, after the Lord Treasurer was acquainted with the said order in the exchequer, even till the summons of parliament; for which Mr. Serjeant Crew charged the Lord Treasurer with oppression and extortion, contrary to his lordship's oath, 'To do right to the poor and rich in all things as concern his office.'—Then the clerk read the proofs. See Lords' Journals, vol. 3, p. 365.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

The Lord Treasurer answered, "That true he did but his duty; and that if he had neglected it, he had not done his duty; that he required nothing to be done, by his Warrants, but what was accustomed in queen Elizabeth's time, and in all the king's time; that his Warrants were according to the usual form, as general to all the ports, not knowing that Bristol was exempted by the order in the last Treasurer Salisbury's time until afterwards, that when he knew of it, he yielded to their request, and Guy went away well satisfied with his Answer: and that none had benefit by the composition, but the king only." The Clerk read the Examinations taken on his lordship's behalf, after which,

Mr. Serjeant Crew replied, "That there is a table in the Custom-House, to shew any composition for the out-ports; and caused the Clerk to read the Examination of John Guy, on the part of the Lord Treasurer, taken May 12, 1624, which agrees, in effect, with his former Examination, taken for the king; and that six he, and others of Bristol, had long petitioned the Lord Treasurer to have their bond cancelled and delivered, which they had entered for the payment of the said composition, they could not obtain any thing, save some good hopes and fair words from sir Simon Harvey; and that their bonds are yet detained."

The Lord Treasurer affirmed to the Lords, "That himself knew this Composition to be paid by the out-ports, and that his warrant was only to levy the same, as formerly it had been paid; and promised to send Barret's books and some notes out of the compting-house, to prove the payments thereof heretofore by the out-ports."

The Charge as to unlawful bargaining for sir Roger Dallison's Lands.

May 10, p. m. Mr. Attorney General proceeded to the charge concerning the Office of the Ordinance, and the unlawful Bargain for sir R. Dallison's Lands, in this manner, viz. "That another Charge wherof the Lord Treasurer is accused, is concerning the Office of Ordinance, and the unlawful Bargain for Dallison's Lands; in which will appear that the Lord Treasurer, for his own private benefit, contrived and prosecuted divers unlawful bargains; and in the mean time neglected wholly that which concerned the public, which was the furnishing the Office of Ordnance with emptions and stores, for the safety of the king and his kingdoms.—Concerning the Bargains, it stands proved, That sir Roger Dallison, being lieutenant of the Ordnance, became indebted to the king in 9,962*l.* for monies impressed for that office, but not employed; and that sir Roger Dallison and sir Tho. Mounson were indebted to the king by bonds to the value of 3,100*l.* which bonds were forfeited for not bringing certain stores to that office; both which debts amounted to 13,062*l.* and the lands of Dallison were extended for 9,962*l.* and the lands of Mounson for 3,100*l.* And that July 20, 18 Jac. the king assigned these extents to Francis Morrice, clerk of the Ordnance, and others, in trust for the officers and creditors of that office, towards satisfaction of so much of their debts. The Lord Treasurer, being a commissioner for his majesty's debts, July 28th, 1621, bargained for those extents; and by the articles under his hand agreed to give for them 1,062*l.* in hand, and 12,000*l.* more, by 1,000*l.* per ann. for 12 years, beginning at Lady-Day, 1623; and also to do his endeavour to procure payment of an arrear of 8,000*l.* more, due to that office from his majesty, but before this bargain was performed, at Michaelmas following, he became Lord Treasurer; and when they expected payment of the 1,062*l.* and security for the rest, he propounded that, in lieu of the 12,000*l.* to be secured, they should have his part in the Farms of the Petty Customs for 9 years, valued to be worth 1,000*l.* per ann. for the two first years, and afterwards 1,400*l.* per ann. which, according to that rate, would yield in 9 years 11,800*l.* but cost his lordship only 3,750*l.*—He being then Lord Treasurer, on whom they must depend both for the payment of the arrears, and for future favours, they accepted it; not meaning to lose their 1,062*l.* payable in hand, but it was then again directly agreed they should be paid their 8,000*l.* arrear out of his majesty's coffers. In 1621, Assurances were prepared, and the creditors required to seal, being promised to have at the sealing their 8,000*l.* arrears, and expecting their 1,062*l.* from the Lord Treasurer, whereof they never conceived a doubt; but so soon as they had sealed, they were sent away without any money, being promised to receive their 8,000*l.* within 3 or 4 days after, which was not performed in so short a time; but was, after, paid in divers several payments out of his majesty's money; but the 1,062*l.* which was to have come from himself was absolutely denied, the Lord Treasurer affirming, that as well that 1,062*l.* as the other 12,000*l.* was all concluded and recompensed by the interest in the Petty Farms; whereupon a new difference grew against them; but in the end they were enforced, in lieu of that 1,062*l.* to accept of a further interest, which his lordship had in the Petty Farms, for an half-year after the 9 years were expired, esteemed worth not above 400*l.* to be sold: and it was then further agreed that his lordship should then pay them out of the king's money 4,000*l.* due to the office over and besides the former 8,000*l.* of which 4,000*l.* his lordship hath since caused to be paid 3,303*l.* But whereas the Petty Customs were valued to them to be worth for the first 2 years 1,000*l.* per ann. it appeareth that, in the two first years, it yielded them but 1,419*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* being all the money that grew due to them out of the profits of those farms at Michaelmas last; whereas if they had kept their extents of Dallison's and Mounson's lands, they should have received by Lady-Day last almost 7,000*l.* for part of their debt. In which bargain, (besides the oppressions and extremities put on the poor creditors and officers of the Ordnance, that might ill undergo a bargain of so much disadvantage and loss) are observed two corruptions; the one, in bargaining to pay the 8,000*l.* arrears, for though that was agreed before he was Lord Treasurer, yet he then was trusted as a commissioner for the king's debts; and, being after Lord Treasurer, performed that corrupt agreement made before.—The other Corruption was, in agreeing to pay the other 4,000*l.* for as it is a corruption in a treasurer to pay the king's due debt for money given unto himself; so it is to pay the king's debt, for gaining to himself a bargain by which he either had or did expect advantage; and though the Lord Treasurer, in his Answer, doth pretend he is a loser by Dallison's lands, it is certain that whatsoever his gain or loss prove upon the other bargains for the inheritance of the lands, this bargain with the officers, taken by itself alone, was beneficial; and if it were not, it is all one: for if a judge, or treasurer, bargain for a Bribe, though he never receive it, he is corrupt; for it skills not what he had, but what he aimed at and expected.—About the same time that the Lord Treasurer bargained for the extent aforementioned, viz. 28 July, 19 Jac. he contracted with sir Tho. Mounson, for the inheritance of the same lands.—For sir Roger Dallison, after he became lieutenant of the Ordnance, conveyed the inheritance of his lands to secure sir Thomas Mounson of divers great debts and engagements; so as the inheritance of those lands, after the king's extent, was in the dispose of sir Tho. Mounson, who bargained for it with the now Lord Treasurer; and upon that bargain, the Lord Treasurer agreed to free sir Tho. Mounson's own land of the 3,100*l.* debt, to pay in 3,000*l.* in money, and to procure the making of him six baronets and some other fit suit from the king; and when the baronets could not be obtained, the number being full then, the Lord Treasurer procured him another suit of 2,000*l.* value, as his lordship esteemed it, viz. For compounding with the king's copyholders of Wakefield, to reduce their fines to certainty, for which suit the Lord Treasurer was a referee from the king; and, for accomplishment of this bargain made for his own private gain, he gave way to that suit, whereby so much was to be taken for his majesty, yet there rested another bargain to be made, for sir Tho. Dallison, the son and heir of sir Roger Dallison, pretended title to those lands by an old entail; and the lady Dallison, widow of sir Roger Dallison, claimed to have the third as her dower; and the Lord Treasurer having entered into treaty with them, and finding their demand not suitable to his desires, he, to make them the more compliant, threatens them by his extent, to keep them without any thing for 100 years; to lay upon sir Tho. Dallison certain forfeited bonds, which, upon the agreement with the officers of the Ordnance, were transferred to him; and he sends for sir J. Wolstenholme, whose son had married sir Thomas Dallison's sister, and rebukes him as a hinderer of his lordship's proceedings with Dallison: and by these and other like means, for an annuity of 200*l.* per annum, procures a release of their title; and whereas sir Roger, being possessed of a lease of great value, had assigned the same to sir John Davis, for security of money owing to him and sir R. Smith, which lease, for non-payment, had been long forfeited, and the possession gotten by sir John Davis upon a trial and recovery at common law, which possession had continued divers years; the Lord Treasurer, by this agreement with sir Tho. Dallison and his mother, by way of unlawful maintenance and champarty, bought their title to this lease; and having hedged in those lands and the title to this lease, exchanged the same with sir Arthur Ingram for other lands; and then to gain the possession of those lease-lands from sir J. Davis, and sir R. Smith, and to make good this exchange, an old outlawry against sir Roger Dallison, before the assignment made by him to sir John Davis, is sought out, the debt being many years past satisfied; by colour of which outlawry, and the power and countenance of the Lord Treasurer, this lease was seized into the king's hands, and sir R. Smith and sir John Davis thrust out of possession; whereupon they endeavoured to reverse the outlawry in the Common Pleas, and the better to effect it, they procured an administration of the goods of sir Roger Dallison to be taken by one Camhen, a creditor of sir Roger's, to the intent the said administrator might sue to reverse this outlawry; but the Lord Treasurer to prevent them therein, interposeth in the king's name, and in his majesty's behalf, to revoke that administration; and the better to countenance the business, sends a case to the king's attorney grounded upon other matters without mentioning the outlawry, which was the chief thing in question; and having obtained his opinion in that case, sends a warrant to the king's advocate, to proceed in the ecclesiastical court as for the king; and in a matter much touching the king, to proceed for reversal of the administration; and in the end, by his means the administration was revoked; and afterwards, the matter coming in question in the Common Pleas, there also he interposed himself; and sent to the judges of that court, whereby sir R. Smith and sir John Davis were at last enforced to accept of a composition: now, in truth, this matter no ways concerned the king, for this lease was never extended for Dallison's debt; and before the Lord Treasurer interposed in the ecclesiastical court he had caused a petition to be made in the name of sir Tho. Dallison and his mother to the king; and a reference thereupon to himself for the lease, among other things; it being secretly agreed between him and Dallison, that the whole benefit of this lease, when his majesty should be pleased to pass it, should be at the dispose of the Lord Treasurer.—And whereas the Lord Treasurer would excuse those proceedings, as being after he had transferred all to sir Arthur Ingram; it is evident that the Lord Treasurer thus interposed; which must be either for his own benefit, to support his own bargain, or merely by way of maintenance; and either way, his doings are most unwarrantable, to use such rigour in the king's name, either for himself or sir Arthur Ingram.—Mr. Attorney having thus opened the former part of this Charge, the clerk, by his directions, read the Proofs.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

The Lord Treasurer said, "It is true that he being a commissioner for the king's debts, he advise the said officers of the Ordnance to accept of a lease of the lands of sir Roger Dallison and sir Tho. Mounson, extended for the king for 13,062*l.* viz. Of sir Roger Dallison's lands, extended for 9,962*l.* and of sir T. Mounson's lands for 3,100*l.* and they did accept of them for payment of 13,062*l.* due to them by the king, with a covenant to resort to the king, if they were interrupted in the possession of those lands. And that he did then find, that there was due unto the said officers by the king, about 20,000*l.*—That the said lands of sir Tho. Mounson were worth 1,600*l.* per annum, and were extended but at 200*l.* per annum, sir Tho. Mounson hoping to have had the benefit thereof for himself: but, by sir Edward Coke's rule, it was passed over to the creditors. That sir Tho. Mounson often petitioned the king, and his majesty referred sir Tho. to the Lord President and him: that they treated with the officers, who answered, That they relied on sir Tho. Mounson's lands, for that sir Roger Dallison's lands were so much incumbered, that they would yield little; yet the Exchequer Chamber would have relieved sir Tho. Mounson, if he had paid the debt for which the lands were extended; and then the officers must have resorted to the king for recompense: and that if his lordship gained in that covenant, by his bargain with the said officers, so it was beneficial to his majesty. And his promise to the officers to help them to their 8,000*l.* arrear, being a just debt, was before he was Treasurer; and that it is Hebraic-Greek to him, how this should be prejudicial to the king."

To this Mr. Attorney replied, and affirmed the bargains to be unlawful as before; and that there was not 8,000*l.* arrear due by the king before his lordship was Treasurer; and then proceeded to the reading of the other Proofs.—

These being read, the Lord Treasurer again affirmed, "That his bargain with the officers of the Ordnance was beneficial for the king, for it gained in his majesty's covenant of resort from the officers." And said further, "That it was not prejudicial to the officers; for if his second bargain be not as beneficial to them as the first should have been, he is to make it good. And that sir Tho. Dallison, and his lady mother have relief thereby, and himself a great loser, at least 4,000*l.* having taken up 16,000*l.* for it, for which he pays interest at this day."—And his lordship denied, "That he drew the case, delivered to Mr. Attorney, touching the Administration of Dallison's goods;" and said, "He deserved to be hanged that drew it." And having spoken as much as he could, the clerk read the Heads of the Examinations taken on his part; and Mr. Attorney confessed them, and avoided them all; wherewith his lordship seemed to rest satisfied, for he did not require any thing else to be read: but said further, "That he had paid arrears to the officers of the Navy, as well as those of the Ordnance; which shews he did not pay them by way of a bargain only." And then saying, "He would add no more," he was withdrawn.

The Lord Treasurer's Petition for further Time, on account of Sickness.

May 11. A Petition of the Lord Treasurer to the Lords was read, in hec verba:

"With most humble and thankful acknowledgement of your lordships honourable patience, in hearing those parts of my Cause which are already opened, I am now most humbly to beseech your pardon of mine appearance before your lordships this day; finding myself so distempered in my body, and my spirits so weakened and spent, as, out of necessity, enforceth me to be an humble petitioner unto your lordships for this little respite of time; my end and desire herein being to enable myself to obey all your commands, and to hasten the end of this Cause of mine; whereof I doubt not but your lordships, in a true and noble sense of my Cause, will honourably consider accordingly.—MIDDLESEX."

The house having considered of this Petition, appointed the earls of Southampton and Essex, the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, the bishop of Bangor, lord Cromwell, lord Say and Seale, to go presently to the Lord Treasurer's house, and to take a physician with them; and to signify to his lordship the displeasure of the house, for that he hath first taken leave of himself to be absent, and now craves pardon for it; whereas his lordship ought first to have craved leave to be absent. And also to signify unto his lordship (unless they shall see cause to the contrary by reason of his sickness) that the pleasure of the house is, That his lordship appear here this afternoon, at 2 o'clock; and that if his lordship shall fail to come accordingly, that the house will proceed, as well touching such parts of his Charge as are already opened, as for the rest of his Charge also.—These lords being returned from Chelsea, where the Lord Treasurer then lay, the earl of Southampton reported, That they delivered the said Message unto his lordship, whom they found in his bed, but not sick, for ought their lordships or the physician could perceive; neither did his lordship pretend any sickness. And their lordships having delivered their Message unto him, he excused his not asking of leave first to be absent; "for that he had not warning to be here this morning until after the house was risen the last night; and since the pleasure of the house is such, he will attend this afternoon, if he hears not, by some Message from their lordships, that they will be pleased to respite him till tomorrow morning."—And the earl of Essex made this further report, viz. "Having this day delivered to the Lord Treasurer the Message we were commanded by the house, his lordship (besides the answer that hath been returned to the house) did let fall these speeches in substance; "for a man to be thus followed, morning and afternoon, standing 8 hours at the bar, till some of the lords might see him ready to fall down; two lawyers against him, and no man of his part, was such proceedings as never were heard of; and he knew not what it meant, for it was unchristian-like and without example; and desired they would deal with him as he would deal with one of them; for it was his case to-day and might be their's tomorrow." This answer was signed by these lords, viz. H. Southampton, Ro. Essex, Tho. Cov. and Lich. Lewis Bangor, Tho. Cromwell, W. Say and Seale.

The Charge as to Munitions.

May 11, p. m. The Lord Treasurer being brought to the bar, as before, the clerk read that part of the charge against his lordship that concerned the Munitions. The Lord Keeper moved that Mr. Attorney do keep himself to that charge. Mr. Attorney then proceeded in this manner, viz.

"As in the bargains and proceedings, which were opened yesterday, the Lord Treasurer was over much attentive to his own private profit, so in the supply of the office of ordnance (a matter of high importance for the safety of the king and his kingdoms, and in a time when all christendom besides ourselves was in a combustion) he was wholly remiss: For whereas, by a privy seal in 6 Jac. there was a private establishment of 6,000*l.* per ann. for the office of ordnance, which being put out of order in the time of sir Roger Dallison, about 12 Jac. the lords of the council, in November 1617, upon reference from the king, set down a proportion of supply, amounting to 54,078*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* and the standing allowance of 6,000*l.* per ann. to continue. And after in February 1619 there being a commission awarded to the commissioners of the navy to survey the Office of Ordnance, the said commissioners (the Lord Treasurer himself being a chief man among them) set down a proportion of supply amounting to but 13,640*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* and a yearly allowance of 3,000*l.* retrenching it to that rate from 6,000*l.* and did set down a course that this being observed a needless charge of about 10,000*l.* per ann. should be cut off, and this was allowed both by the lords and by the king himself.—The earl of Middlesex becoming Treasurer about Michaelmas 1621, and having continued in that office about two years and a half, did observe none of these establishments; whereby the office is at this present both unpaired and unsupplied, and the kingdom of Ireland destitute of any considerable quantity of arms and munition: for it appears by the records of the king's receipt, That all the monies which the Lord Treasurer in his time issued for a supply of the ordinary of the office of Ordnance, was but 13,034*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* of which 8,000*l.* and odd pounds was for old arrears, 3,300*l.* more grew due of latter time, but were paid, not out of duty, or care of the public, but by bargain and contract, and most of these monies issued (beside old arrears) were for wages and allowances of officers, and little or nothing for stores and provisions. For upon the quarter-books paid by his lordship beginning at the quarter-book ended ultimo Junii 1620, unto the quarter-book ended ultimo Decembris 1622, there being about 5,500*l.* paid, 4,600*l.* and odd the rest went to the officers, but the stores and provisions amounted to but 90*l.* and odd pounds: a weak supply in so long time.—And whereas in April 1621, a contract was made with Mr. Evelyn for serving his majesty with 80 lasts of powder yearly, by monthly proportion, at 7*d.* the lb. which proportion being kept would have yielded a plentiful supply into the office of Ordnance, and the overplus might have been sold at 3*d.* the lb. profit to his majesty. The Lord Treasurer (though he was continually solicited by Evelyn) did not make the payment, which should have been made upon that contract; whereby Evelyn, according to the liberty that was allowed by his contract, sold his powder to others; and, in 35 months after that contract, served into the stores but 15 months proportion; and upon breach of this contract did ensue these inconveniences, viz. That the stores which, for the service of all his majesty's kingdoms, might have had in readiness 266 lasts of powder, and 60 lasts of saltpetre, which would have really made 80 lasts of powder more (in all 346 lasts), are greatly injured by this neglect: for upon a late survey there were in all but 130 lasts in the stores, and yet Ireland wholly deservish'd: and besides, his majesty by sale of the overplus of the powder alone, above the proportion thought fit to be kept by the commissioners of the navy, might have gained 3*d.* in every lb. which would have amounted to 4,050*l.* and above, all which his majesty lost by this default of the Lord Treasurer. And whereas his lordship excuseth these things by pretence of Sadler's complaints, it appeareth that those complaints grew by occasion of Evelyn's selling of powder to others, not to the king: which had never been if he had had due payment: and the Lord Treasurer was warned, both by the Lord Crew and by the commissioners of the navy, to have special care of these points, to save the contract, it being of high consequence."

The proofs being read, the Lord Treasurer answered, "I had need, in the first place, to pray for patience, so much pains being taken by Mr. Attorney to make me appear faulty man." Unto which the Lord Keeper replied, "That the lords conceive that these words are a wrong done unto them; and he conceived, that they are a greater unto his lordship, the Lord Treasurer who being a judge, makes no difference of a charge. The Lord Treasurer answered, "That he is injuriously dealt withal, and that no peer hath been charged in his place before by the king's counsel."—And being demanded by the Lord Keeper, wherein he is injuriously dealt withal, he answered "by Mr. Attorney's opening the proofs by parcels, and by directing parts of the depositions to be read, which should have been done wholly and together."—The Lords conceived themselves to be wronged by these words, for that Mr. Attorney had done nothing but as attendant to the house, and by their direction; and therefore the prince his highness willed him (the Lord Treasurer) to clear Mr. Attorney, or else this aspersion might very heavy upon him. And the house did acquit Mr. Attorney for any thing he had said or done herein.

Then Mr. Attorney opened the heads of the Charge again, viz. The 1st settlement of the Office of the Ordnance, anno 6 Jac. The 2d settlement by the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, in 1617. And the 3rd settlement by the Commissioners of the Navy, 1620. And that the Lord Treasurer had observed none of them.

The Lord Treasurer answered, as touching the second settlement, "Nothing hath been done upon it to this day; and yet it was made 4 years before he was Treasurer." As touching the 3rd settlement, "It was propounded only, and opposed, but never allowed; if allowed, it was 15 months before he was Treasurer, and yet nothing done in it, as by Cook's own oath: That he had no privy seal for it. And how then can he be charged for the breach of that settlement which was never settled? but he will not give that for Answer." And then his lordship affirmed, "That the stores are furnished, and that he had paid all the said ordinary of 3,000*l.* per ann. save 300*l.* though no privy seal was issued out upon that book presented by the Commissioners of the Navy; and paid divers other sums of money for provisions of the stores; whereof his lordship received the particular sums: and whereas that office was unsettled by sir Roger Dallison, he, being a Commissioner for the king's debts, found due to the office 18,000*l.* and caused 13,000*l.* of it to be paid by Dallison's lands, and the rest to be paid also afterwards; so that a small sum will now settle that office, which was then so unsettled."—As touching the powder, "That when he came to be Treasurer, he found but 116 lasts powder, whereof 21 lasts, delivered by Evelyn, were left unpaid for; and that he paid him £,000*l.* arrears: though 60 lasts of salt petre be not in the king's stores, yet there is so much in Evelyn's warehouse; and then it is the king's. Neither can the king receive such detriment or loss; for when Evelyn is paid, he is to make allowance of the powder by him sold.' And affirmed, 'That he had paid more for powder than was paid for 7 years before.'

The Charge as to the Court of Wards.

Mr. Serjeant Crew next opened the Charge of the Court of Wards, viz. "That whereas, in Dec. 1618, Instructions for the Court of Wards were set out, (upon great advisement with the lord chancellor of England, the two lord chief justices, and the officers of that court) the Lord Treasurer, by his importunity and power with the officers, and by his misinformation to the king, (waving a reference to divers lords of the council) procured those instructions to be altered, to the prejudice of the king, and oppression of the subject.—For, by the former instructions, anno 1618, petitions for Wardships were to be delivered to the clerk of the court, who was to enter them without fee: but, by these instructions, anno 1622, the petitions are first to be delivered to the master, to the end he may subscribe his directions, and then the master's secretary to make entry thereof the same day it is delivered, and return it to the suitor, who is to present it to the clerk, and the clerk to enter it without fee.—So the clerk of the court stands still restrained by these latter instructions to take any fees for entering of petitions, but the master's secretary is not restrained; and, being unlimited, he hath taken great fees for entering of these petitions.—And whereas, by the former instructions, anno 1618, all tenders and continuances of liveries were to be made unto the surveyor of that court: now, by these latter instructions, they are to be made to the master first, and afterwards to the surveyor; whereby the fees for continuance of liveries are raised from 10*s.* the term, to 20*s.* the term.—And whereas, before, no ward was esteemed a concealed ward, unless no suit had been made within 3 years after the death of the tenant: now, by these latter instructions, the master hath power, alone, to dispose of Wardships concealed but one year; so that the master may make any a concealed ward, by concealing the petition, and not entering it with the clerk; the petition being hereby appointed to be delivered to the master first.—And that the master of this Court of Wards, the Lord Treasurer, hath committed unto his secretary a stamp of his name, and hath hereby put his own power into the hands of his secretary: for his secretary hath used his stamp, in the absence of the master, for signing of tenders and continuances for warrants to the great seal for liveries; and warrants to find offices, for grants of wardships, leases, indentures, and the like; and for expediting of judicial acts in the court: and that this stamp may be a ready way to make concealed Wardships, and may take away mean processes due to the king for want of livery; and may antedate tenders, continuances, and petitions; by reason whereof the king may be prejudiced great sums, by preferring one before another by Wardships."

This being said, the clerk was directed to read the Proofs. And for that, in opening of this Charge, the lord keeper delivered to the lords a message from the king, viz. "That the alteration of these Instructions was debated before his majesty at Wansted, by the master and officers of that court; and that his majesty understood that the alteration was for the honour and profit of the master, and intended that the master should enjoy that office as amply as the earl of Salisbury, or the lord Wallingford: but if any new fees are exacted since, his majesty disavows that; and if the master hath used the new Instructions to the prejudice of the king or subject, he disavows that also; but allows his precise knowledge of the alteration of the said Instructions."—Therefore no Examinations were read to prove the Lord Treasurer's importunity and pressure to have those Instructions altered.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

After the other Examinations were read, the Lord Treasurer answered unto this Charge, "That he is not to be blamed for putting his office into such plight as it was before an encroachment. As touching his secretary's fees, as he is not restrained, so nothing is allowed; and if he hath exacted any thing, his lordship will be the severest censurer of him. He never heard of any till now. That the secretary to former masters received whatsoever any man gave voluntarily, so it was lawful for his.—As touching the Fee for Continuances, Why should he lose any thing due for a favour to the subject? by this means there be fewer Continuances; and so the king has his moneys sooner, and the party is free for the subjects suit the sooner.—As for concealed Wardships within a year, it is beneficial to the king; otherwise, within 3 years, the ward might die, and the king lose the wardship. Neither hath the master such power, alone, therein by these new Instructions: he is only trusted with the direction unto whom the concealed wardship shall be granted; the composition is left to the council-board: but it is not shewed that he ever made one concealed wardship. They say this may be done, but do not shew what was done amiss."—And his lordship justified, "That these new Instructions were more beneficial to the king and subject than the former, and not prejudicial; for as touching the petitions, if the ward happen in a vacation, the petition must be delivered within a month; if to the clerk, perhaps he is out of town: now they are to be delivered to the master first, and he may direct the finding of the office in the interim; but it is of no force till the petition be afterwards entered by the clerk, and composition is made by all the officers. Indeed the officers yielded, hardly, to the new Instructions; because they had, by the former, shared the master's power and authority among themselves." His lordship confessed, "That he yielded to have a Stamp made by the precedent of the lord Burleigh's Stamp: which, he said, he could not prove but by hear-say: and Stamps are used in the Subpena Office and the Outlawries. And that it is no more prejudicial to commit a Stamp to his secretary, than it hath been heretofore to leave the seal with the clerk. Neither is it shown that this Stamp hath been to the prejudice of any man, the same things that were stamped, being to pass other officers either first or last."

Before the Lord Treasurer was withdrawn, the earl of Carlisle remembered their lordships, That the Lord Treasurer the other day, had charged him with 3,000*l.* given him; whereas, about 12 months after the Lord Treasurer was made master of the wards, his lordship paid the earl of Carlisle 3,000*l.* in part of 20,000*l.* given him by the king. And whereas the Lord Treasurer spoke of the vast expences of the wardrobe in former times, the earl of Carlisle said, That the expences grew so great by reason of the extraordinary charges then happening; as, by the queen of Bohemia's Marriage, which came to 60,000*l.* alone; for furnishing divers of the king's houses; for many rich presents sent to foreign states; for the king's voyage to Scotland; and the like.

And the earl of Denbigh, now master of the wardrobe, shewed, That he cannot get any allowance for the extraordinaries of that office from the Lord Treasurer.—Whereunto his lordship answered, "That the king referred unto him the earl of Denbigh's demands of the extraordinaries, wherein his lordship was unwilling to meddle, for he could not conceive how they could amount to the sum demanded." And as touching the earl of Carlisle, "If he had said that he had given him that 3000*l.* he did his lordship wrong, for he had warrant from his majesty to pay it."

And then the Lord Treasurer desired he might be heard to clear some words that might pass from him this day, where it is reported that his lordship should say, That he had unchristian dealing: "He meant it not by their lordships, whose dealings he acknowledged to be to him both just and honourable; but he meant it by the king's counsel, who have dealt so unchristianly with him, as to make white black, and black white:" and humbly desired, "That this his acknowledgment of the justice of the house might be accepted of him, and to be understood only of the king's counsel." And said further, "That he had precedents, that he ought not to answer in this place, (at the bar) and that he ought to have counsel; and prayed that the next might not suffer by his example."

The Lord Treasurer being withdrawn, the house agreed, That he should appear here again to-morrow at 9 of the clock; and Mr. Maxwell, the gentleman usher, warned him to appear accordingly.—The lord keeper cleared the proceedings of the king's counsel in their several Charges against the Lord Treasurer; and the house gave them thanks for their carriage therein.

The Lord Treasurer's general Defence against the whole Charge.

May 12. The Lord Treasurer being at the bar, and being admitted to speak in his Defence, his lordship first repeated the several heads of the matters wherewith he is charged, viz. 1. Touching the Wardrobe. 2. Touching two Bribes received of the Farmers of the Customs. 3. Compositions of the Out-Port for Groceries. 4. The Officers of the Ordnance. And, 5. The Court of Wards. As for the first, "That his omission of an account in the Wardrobe did neither add to nor diminish the charge the king was at: and that, although his lordship omitted to serve some of the lord chamberlain's warrants, amounting to a matter of 700*l.* yet he had laid out, in the Extraordinaries of that office, which he was not bound to do, about 6,000*l.* and that the good service which he had done his majesty in that office is well known. Touching the two Bribes, termed 'disguised Corruptions,' howsoever the farmers of the customs presented the same, he could not know their thoughts but by their words and deeds. And his lordship protested, that he received the same no otherwise than for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm of the said Customs. As touching the Lease for Sugars, he will say no more than formerly he had spoken. Nor, for the Compositions for Groceries, save only, That his lordship had sent Burrel's son unto Mr. Serjeant Crew, to satisfy him that Barret had formerly collected the said compositions, by virtue of the warrant of former Treasurers. As touching the Office of the Ordnance, his lordship would speak no more touching the provision for arms and gun-powder, than he had done. But, as touching Dallison's business, his lordship said, It began originally before he was Treasurer: he therein settled the king's debt unto the officers, and hath parted with that estate, which he had from them in Dallison's lands, within a month after he was Treasurer; yet, if the second bargain made with these officers prove not as beneficial to them as the first should have been, they have his word to make it as good; which he would perform. And his lordship further proffered, That any one should have Dallison's lands again at a far less sum than they cost him. Then he desired their lordships to take into consideration his disability to answer, and the ability of those that did oppose him; and, if he had been as well able to speak for himself, as they that spoke against him, he doubted not but that he should have given their lordships very good satisfaction. His lordship spake much in excuse for those matters complained of against him as Lord Treasurer, saying, That the king's necessity and want of money was the cause of much thereof. He acknowledged, That the king had been a good and bountiful master unto him; and avowed, That he had been a good and faithful servant unto his majesty, not for impositions, for, those two only excepted, which are presented by the commons, he ever stood against them, deeming them a partition-wall between the king and the subject. That his service has been in reformatiōns, viz. Of the household; of the navy; of the wardrobe; and of the kingdom of Ireland; which are things of that nature that they beget enemies; and if, in doing service to his majesty he hath procured to himself many enemies, their lordships will not impute that to him for a fault.— His lordship also affirmed, That he had done his majesty good service in the Palatinate, by advancing the exchange of the king's money thither, wherein he saved the king 60,000*l.* And affirmed, That he had advanced the profits of the crown at least 80,000*l.* though not by Impositions; these he meddled not with, the other two excepted, and they were agreed unto by the council-board. The ships indeed were in the river, but the vintners were sent for, and made to pay what was imposed on the merchants. That he offered to pay the arrear due for Ireland, a third part from the one deputy, and the one half from the other; wherewith he acquainted his majesty and turned it all to his majesty's profit. That he hath been a judge these 8 years, and no complaint brought against him for Corruption or Bribery; which he hoped would weigh much with their lordships." And as for the offence taken yesterday against him, touching the king's counsel, "whom he ever loved well, "He knew them to be of that loving nature, that he doubted not but that they would impute it to his rashness, and forgive him. Then he craved pardon of their lordships, if he had omitted any thing, or spoken ought that might discontent them; and so, with humble thanks for their favour to him, he concluded his speech."

The Lord Treasurer having ended his speech, he was answered by the Lord keeper, "That the council-table disavowed the Imposition on Wines to begin from them; it came from his lordship as belonging to his place of Lord Treasurer: the matter was his alone; the manner also was contradicted by the rest of the council, for that the merchant ships were then in the river; only they gave way to it, upon his lordship's undertaking that the merchants would yield thereunto, and that they should be no way prejudiced thereby." Whereunto the Lord Treasurer replied, "That this was no part of his Charge."

The Lords take into Consideration the several Articles of the Charge, and the Lord Treasurer's Answers.

The Lord Treasurer being withdrawn, and the house adjourned, ad libitum, Mr. Attorney General read that part of the Charge against the Lord Treasurer which concerned the Wardrobe. And the Lords having duly considered of the crimes objected against the Lord Treasurer, for not entering into a book of Accounts the warrants and emptiōns, as he ought to have done, whereby the settlement and antient institution of that office is altogether broken; and for not serving the warrants directed unto him for the king's own person, though he was often urged thereunto; nor paying divers of the creditors for such stuff as they served in, although he received 20,000*l.* per ann. by way of imprest, for the ordinary charge only of that office; which a far less sum would have fully defrayed; And for that he had not performed that good service, which he pretended unto his majesty, but, under pretence thereof, had procured to himself great and large gifts from his majesty and pardon of divers great sums of moneey. And the king's counsel having satisfied their lordships, That the said pardon to the Lord Treasurer did not pardon his lordship's not accounting; the house was resumed, and the question put; "Whether the Lord Treasurer, for his carriage in the office of the Wardrobe, be censurable, or no?" and it was agreed, nem. diss. "To be censured."

May 12, p. m. Mr. Attorney read that part of the Charge against the Lord Treasurer which concerned his taking of 500*l.* of the farmers of Wines and Currants for a Bribe, and 500*l.* of the farmers of the Great Customs, for a Bribe; and for exacting 100*l.* of the said farmers of Wines and Currants. And their lordships took into their consideration the Lord Treasurer's Answer unto the said two Bribes, viz. "That he accepted of 1,000*l.* paid him, at one entire payment, by the farmers of the Great Customs, upon a bargain of his four 32 parts of the Great Farm." And it appeared plainly unto them, by the examination of divers witnesses, as well of those taken 'ex parte domini regis,' as of those taken 'ex parte domini thesaurarii,' that 500*l.* of the said sum was given to the farmers of the wines and currants, called the Petty Customs, to procure his lordship's warrant for defalcation of 1,000*l.* per ann. of their rents, for 9½ years, in recompence of their loss, according to his lordship's farther agreement with them on the king's behalf, upon his majesty's reference unto his lordship, and that the other 500*l.* was given, by the farmers of the Great Customs, to procure his lordship's warrant unto the king's remembrancer, to take security for payment of the rent to his majesty of the 4 patentees of that farm, in lieu of 5 partners who had relinquished their parts therein: and that his lordship had not reserved to himself any parts of the said Great Farm, as his lordship pretends; and if he had, it had been a great deceit unto his majesty for the Lord Treasurer of England to contract with others for his majesty's customs, and secretly to reserve parts therein unto his own benefit; and when, as his lordship affirms, that he received the 100*l.* of the Farmers of the Wines and Currants, for a new-year's gift, it appeared also by the examinations, That the said farmers did present his lordship with a tun of wine for his new-year's gift, and his lordship exacted the 100*l.* of them afterwards; which divers of their lordships conceive to be extortion.' All which being fully discussed, the house was resumed, and the question was put, "Whether, upon this whole Charge, the Lord Treasurer be censurable, or no?" and agreed generally, "To be censured."

The house being again adjourned ad libitum, Mr. Attorney General read that part of the Charge against the Lord Treasurer, which concerned his procuring of Herriot to surrender his lease of the farm of Sugars, which he held at the rent of 10,000 marks per ann. to the king, and for procuring a new lease thereof immediately to two of his lordship's servants, to his own use, at 2,000*l.* per ann. and for denying the merchants, upon their exportation of sugars, the imposts paid therefore upon the importation, as his lordship ought to have done by the directions of his majesty's letters patent of the 5th of December ann. 8 Jac.—Upon reading whereof the Lord Keeper signified to their lordships, That he had received a message from the king touching this charge, viz. "That his majesty did freely give unto the Lord Treasurer 4,000*l.* per ann. out of the said lease of Sugars, the same to begin presently after the date thereof."—Their lordships taking into consideration, that this was the king's free gift, they did not think it fit to censure the Lord Treasurer for the same; although his lordship had unduly informed his majesty of good services done in the office of the wardrobe, which his lordship performed not, for which this lease of sugars was given him. Neither did his lordship inform his majesty (for ought appears) that a debt of 7000*l.* was installed upon that lease; the which his lordship transferred to the farm of tobacco.—And as touching the denial of the impost unto the merchants, upon the exportation of sugars, for that his lordship affirms, That the under-farmers of the said sugars from him are liable to the re-payment of the said imposts, if any be due, their lordships did not think it fit to censure the Lord Treasurer for the same. And the house being resumed, the question was put, "Whether the Lord Treasurer shall be freed from any censure in this particular charge, or no?" And generally agreed, "To be freed."

The house was again adjourned ad libitum, and Mr. Attorney General read that part of the charge against the Lord Treasurer, which concerns the composition for grocery wares in the city of Bristol, which city had refused to yield unto any composition for the same; and yet the Lord Treasurer had given warrant to levy the same against their wills, and to stay the entering of their goods until the same was paid accordingly. But for that it appeared, that the Lord Treasurer Dorset's letter, dated 1610, for levying the same composition, agreeth with the letter written by this Lord Treasurer; and for that divers of Bristol had paid the like composition; and for that it did not appear that the Lord Treasurer did thereby seek any benefit to himself, the lords did not think him fit to be censured for the same. Wherefore the house being resumed, it was put to the question, "Whether the Lord Treasurer shall be free of censure, in this Charge of Grocery, or no?" And agreed, "To be freed."

The house being again adjourned ad libitum, Mr. Attorney General read another part of the Lord Treasurer's Charge, viz. the charge against him by the officers of the Ordnance. And their lordships having fully discussed the great neglect of the Lord Treasurer to issue the king's money for the furnishing of the king's stores of munitions, with armour and powder; and that yet he paid the arrear of debts to that office for his own particular profit upon a contract with the said officers: and having considered his lordship's great means in the bargains for the said lands of sir Roger Dallison extended for that debt; and his lordship's propounding, for part of payment thereof, the making of baronets and a suit for compounding with his majesty's copyholders of Wakefield. And his lordship's answer, "That he preferred this suit unto the king, in pity of sir Tho. Mounson's estate, a man heretofore of good account in his country, and now decayed;" which their lordships thought most sordid for a Lord Treasurer to make use of to his own benefit: And it appearing unto their lordships, That the said Lord Treasurer had set on foot an old outlawry, upon a debt long time since paid by the said sir Roger Dallison; and that his lordship upon pretence of a debt to the king where there was none, procured a revocation of letters of administration granted of sir Roger Dallison's goods; and had written his letter to the judges of the common pleas for the countenancing of this indirect course, to wrest the said lease from the said sir Rd. Smith and sir John Davy, formerly granted unto them by the said sir Roger: All this being fully debated, the house was resumed and it was put to the question, "Whether the Lord Treasurer be worthy of censure in regard of this whole charge, both for the three bargains, and for not supplying, the office of the Ordnance?" and generally agreed "To be censured."

The house was again adjourned ad libitum, and Mr. Attorney read the rest of the Charge against the Lord Treasurer touching the Court of Wards. And their lordships considering, that it was not proved by the examination of witnesses, that the secretary was appointed to take any fees for the said petitions, either for himself or for the Lord Treasurer; nor that the Lord Treasurer had made any benefit to himself for concealed wards by virtue of the said new instructions: Therefore their lordships thought his lordship not censurable for those two points of his charge. But as touching the doubling of fees of continuances of liveries, they thought his lordship worthy to be censured, both in respect of the grievance of the subject, and of his lordship's answer unto the same, viz. "It is the king's grace to the people, let them pay for it." And for that he delivered a stamp, unto his secretary, whereby he committed the great trust, reposed in him by his majesty, unto his servant, not deigning to sign the petitions, liveries, and warrants, to the great seal, with his own hand, their lordships thought him worthy to be highly censured for the same. And thereupon the house being resumed, the question was put, "Whether the Lord Treasurer deserves a censure upon the whole Charge or no?" and agreed, nem. dis. "To be censured for the same."

May 13. The lords ordered the gentleman usher and the serjeant at arms, attending on that house, to summon the earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer of England, to appear presently before their lordships. The house being adjourned ad libitum, the clerk read the heads of the six Charges against the Lord Treasurer, and the six several votes of the house which were yesterday past upon the same. And their lordships having duly considered upon the proofs of bribery, extortions, oppressions, wrongs and deceits, objected against the Lord Treasurer, found the same to be most apparently proved. And, as to the allegations of the Lord Treasurer of his good and profitable services to the king; in the reformation of the king's household; of the navy, of the wardrobe, and the kingdom of Ireland, their lordships entering into debate thereof, it was made manifest to them, by many particulars then declared, That, as touching the reformation of the king's household, wardrobe, Ireland, he, the Lord Treasurer, had deserved very ill of his majesty, and, as touching the navy, though his lordship was but a commissioner with others, who were more skilful, and did more good than he, yet, he assumed to himself the whole glory thereof; and his manner was so to do, in all other business wherein his lordship and others were joined.

The Lords also considered of the Lord Treasurer's allegation of his advancing the exchange of the king's money, sent to the Palatinate, for payment of the king's forces there; and it appeared unto them plainly, That his services therein deserved no such respect, as his lordship assumed unto himself; the soldiers of Frankendale being yet unpaid. Then the house being resumed, the first question was put, 1. "Whether the Lord Treasurer, in regard of these misdemeanors proved against him, shall lose all his offices which he holds in the kingdom, or no?" It was unanimously agreed, "That he should lose them all." 2. "Whether the Lord Treasurer shall for ever, hereafter, be incapable of any office, place or employment, in the state or common-wealth, or no?" Agreed, "That he should be incapable of them all." 3. "Whether he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London, during his majesty's pleasure, or no." Agreed, "For Imprisonment." 4. "Whether the Lord Treasurer for these offences shall pay a fine to the king, or no?" Agreed "to pay a fine."—Then the house was adjourned ad libitum, that the lords might more freely discuss what fine to impose on the Lord Treasurer. And, being resumed, the fifth question was put by the lord keeper, 5. "Whether a fine of 50,000*l.* be sufficient to be imposed on the Lord Treasurer, or no?" Agreed to this Article. 6. "Whether he shall, hereafter, sit in parliament, or no?" Agreed, "That he shall never sit again in parliament." 7. "Whether the Lord Treasurer shall come within the verge of the court, or no?" These questions being all put and agreed to, the whole censure against him was drawn up in form, read by the lord keeper, and passed by a general vote of the house.

SENTENCE against the Lord Treasurer.

Then a Message was sent to the Commons, That the Lords were now ready to give Judgment against the Lord Treasurer, if they, with their Speaker, will come and demand the same. Ans<sup>w</sup>. That they will attend, presently, as the manner is. Accordingly, the Lords being all in their robes, to the number of 62, the Lord Treasurer was brought to the bar, by the gentleman usher and the serjeant at arms; when his lordship making a low reverence, kneeled, until the lord keeper willed him to stand up. The Commons came in with their Speaker, and the serjeant attending him let down his mace, when the Speaker addressed himself to the lords as follows:

"The knights, citizens, and burghesses in this parliament assembled, have, heretofore, transmitted unto your lordships several offences against the right honourable Lionel, earl of Middlesex, Lord High Treasurer of England, for Bribery, Extortions, Oppressions, and other grievous Misdemeanors committed by his lordship; and now the Commons, by me their Speaker, demand Judgment against him for the same."

The Lord Keeper answered, "This high court of parliament doth adjudge, That Lionel earl of Middlesex, now Lord Treasurer of England, shall lose all his offices which he holds in this kingdom; and shall, hereafter, be made incapable of any office, place, or employment in the state and commonwealth. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the king's pleasure. That he shall pay unto our sovereign lord the king a fine of 50,000*l.* That he shall never sit in parliament any more, and that he shall never come within the verge of the court."

May 14. A committee of lords was appointed by the house to attend the king, and to acquaint him with the Judgment awarded by the lords against the earl of Middlesex, and to desire his majesty to take away the staff and the seal of the Court of Wards from him.—Ordered also, "That the king's counsel do draw up a bill, and present the same to the house, to make the lands of the earl of Middlesex liable unto his debts; unto his fine to the king; unto accounts to the king hereafter; and to restitution to such whom he had wronged, as shall be allowed by the house." Which bill afterwards passed into a law.

"The marquis of Buckingham continueth still in fullness of grace and favour; the countess, his mother, sways also much at court. She brought sir Henry Montague from delivering law on the King's-bench to look to his bags in the Exchequer, for she made him Lord High Treasurer of England, but he parted with his white staff before the year's end, though his purse had bled deeply for it (above 20,000*l.*) which made a lord of this land to ask him at his return from court, whether he did not find that wood was extreme dear at Newmarket, for there he received the white staff. There is now a notable stirring man in the place, my lord Cranfield, who, from walking about the Exchange, is come to sit Chief Justice in the Chequer-chamber, and to have one of the highest places at the council-table. He is married to one of the tribe of fortune, a kinswoman of the marquis of Buckingham." James Howell to his Father, March 22, 1622, Letters, Book I, § 3, letter 1.

123. Proceedings in Parliament against SAMUEL HARSNET, Bishop of Norwich, for Extortion and other Misdemeanors: 22 JAMES I. A. D. 1624. [Lords Journals. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1478.]

THE Bishop of Norwich besought the Lords to remember the Message from the Commons, on the 8th instant, for a Conference touching some Accusations against his lordship, which their lordships then deferred, by reason of the thinness of the house; and desired them to appoint a time for the same, with what expedition they conveniently may; whereupon a Committee was then named for that purpose.

May 19. A Report was made by the arch-bishop of Canterbury, of a Conference with the Commons, touching a Complaint against the bishop of Norwich, to this effect: "That the Commons had received a Complaint exhibited against the said lord bishop, by the citizens of Norwich: and to shew, that it was ordinary for the Commons to complain against the governors of the church, divers records of parliament were cited; annis, 18 Ed. 3, 35 Ed. 3, 50 Ed. 3, 17 Rich. 2, and 11 Hen. 4, which were cited to satisfy tacit objections for their meddling with a cause of this nature.—That the Charge against the said bishop consisted of six parts: I. That he inhibited or disheartened preachers on the Sabbath day in the forenoon. II. That images were set up in the churches, and one of the Holy Ghost fluttering over the font; that a marble tomb was pulled down, and images set up in its room, and the bishop blessed them that did it. III. That he punished those who prayed not towards the east. IV. That he punished a minister for catechizing his family, and singing of psalms. V. That he used extortion many ways. VI. That he did not enter Institutions, to the prejudice of patrons. To the 1st Article it was said, That there were 34 churches in Norwich; and in those parishes 30 or 40,000 people: That the lord bishop sent for the preachers, by the apparitors, and told them, there was no need of preaching on Sunday in the forenoon, except in the cathedral church; although 2 or 3000 could only hear there; many dwelling three quarters of a mile off, and many were old, and not able, for their age, to come so far. That this inhibition was when the king had commanded more preaching. That his lordship connived at Recusants, all which was the disheartening of the good professors. It may be objected he allowed of catechizing; ergo, no preaching necessary: but he commanded to ask bare questions, and nothing else; ergo, no instructions. That this is done against the canons of the church, and that there is no obedience without knowledge. The outward man is not confirmed, unless the inward man be reformed; and cited the canon, 'quicumque contristaverit doctorem veritatis peccat in Christum;' with the canon, 1 Jac. c. 45; for commanding preaching.—For the 2nd touching the setting up of Images: It was said to be against acts of parliament, against the canons of the convocation, the book allowed in the time of Hen. 8, 28 Hen. 8, c. 30, against Images, Pilgrimages, &c. against the 3 Edw. 6, and the Homilies approved, anno 1 Eliz. forbidding images in churches.—The 3rd, for prayer to the east. Which Gratian affirms came by tradition, pars 1, dict. 11, and that it is superstitious, Linwood in the Glosses, lib. 2, tit. de Feriis, 'non refert si versus Orientem,' &c. That the bishop excommunicated many, and enjoined penance unto divers, for praying to the east; and some did their penance with a withy rod in their hand; the proof thereof is under the bishop's hand.—The 4th, one Peck, a minister, catechized his family, and sung psalms, his neighbours coming in, of a Sunday after evening prayers. The bishop enjoined them to do penance, for this their resorting to catechize and sing psalms, and to say, 'I confess my errors, &c.' which acknowledgment is under the bishop's hand. They who refused, were excommunicated, and paid 7*l.* charges. And it was particularly observed by the Commons, that this Peck was a conformable preacher.—5thly, Touching Extortion. It was shewn, That, in the Table of Fees is set down, for Institution 3*s.* 8*d.* whereof to the bishop

he had been sifted through the whole course of his life; that this Peck was sent to him by the justices of the peace, for keeping an assembly late at night at his house; his catechizing being but a colour to draw them thither. That this Peck had infected the parish with strange opinions; as not to kneel when they came to church; that the name of Jesus is no more than a common name, and that it is superstition to bow down at it. His lordship affirmed, that this Peck had formerly been convicted of nonconformity, annis 1615 et 1617; also, for simony and conventicles in his neighbour's house, as appears by an act in the register. And that anno 1622, he was taken in his house with 22 of his neighbours, at a conventicle; that he was then bound over by a justice and brought to his lordship, and his sentence against him was, only, that he should confess his fault. The others, mentioned in this part of the Charge, were punished for their opinions also; making no difference between an alehouse and the church, till the preacher was in the pulpit. He said, he must confess his fault, That in the penance which he enjoined, he caused them to confess their errors, omitting their resort to conventicles, which he did at their own earnest suit. V. His lordship absolutely denied that he imposed any Fees, and affirmed that he had not any of those fees which were complained of; only the fees for Institution, which he took as his predecessors did. If therein he had committed any error, erratum cum patribus; and denied that he had ever seen that Table of Fees which is spoke of by the Commons. VI. His lordship affirmed, That he had registered all the Institutions."

When the bishop had ended his Defence, his royal highness the Prince stood up and told him, "That he had not answered concerning the Paraphrase of the Catechism which he had taken away." To which the Bishop replied, "That the preachers used to chuse a text from the Creed, &c. and to ask the child some one question, and then to dilate very long upon it, but never descended to the capacity of the child. That he did not forbid the explanation, but ordered that it should be done catechetically."

Thus ended the bishop of Norwich's Answer to the said Complaint. Immediately after which, an Order is entered in the Lord's Journals, "That in respect to the shortness of time and the multiplicity of business, now depending to be determined, the complaint of the Commons, against the bishop of Norwich, shall be referred to the High Commission, to be examined by them; and they to make report thereof to the house, and then the house will judge of it."

The same day the bishop exhibited a Complaint to the house against one Thomas Stokes, clerk, "That whereas the said Thomas Stokes had preferred a Petition to the Commons against his lordship, for excessive fees, pretended to be taken by his lordship, and for other grievances therein mentioned. He acknowledged the proceedings of the said Stokes to be legal, and humbly submitted himself to an examination and strict trial. However, he complained that the said Stokes had sent his lordship this message: 'That if he would suffer a judgment in the court of common pleas for him, the said Stokes, to be archdeacon of Norfolk, that then Stokes would prosecute no further against his lordship: otherwise, he would smoke him with more Complaints.' Moreover, that the said Stokes reported that his lordship did drink a health to Spinola, and refused to pledge a health to the prince of Orange, for that the said prince was a general unto traitors. And that Stokes affirmed his lordship did take 30*l.* of every one of the archdeacons when he came first to his see. All which his lordship affirmed to be false."

This Complaint, with the witnesses the bishop produced to prove it, was referred to the examination of the archbishop of Canterbury, who was to make report thereof to the house for their judgment of the matter. But we hear no more of this, or the former affair, in the Journals or elsewhere; for neither Wilson nor Rushworth mention one word of it.*

* This bishop of Norwich, Le Neve tells us, had been guilty of several scandalous practices, whilst he was master of Pembroke hall in Cambridge. He came into high favour, at court, in the next reign; for in 1628, he was made archbishop of York.

124. Proceedings in Parliament against RICHARD MOUNTAGUE,* Clerk, for publishing a factious and seditious Book: 1 CHARLES I. A. D. 1625. [3 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 1 Rushw. Coll. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 6.]

July 7, 1625.

MR. Richard Mountague, canon of Windsor, and fellow of Eaton, rector of Stamford Rivers, and chaplain in ordinary to his majesty, was brought to the bar of the house of commons, to answer for his Book intituled 'An Appeal to Cæsar,' which was there charged upon him, to be contrived and published to put a jealousy between the king and his well affected subjects, and to contain many things contrary to the Articles of Religion established by parliament; and that the whole frame thereof was an encouragement to popery.

under his broad seal to handle the points in difference. But the church never submitted to any other judge, neither indeed can she though she would. And we humbly desire your grace to consider, and then to move his most gracious majesty (if you shall think fit) what dangerous consequences may follow upon it. For, first, If any other judge be allowed in matter of doctrine, we shall depart from the ordinance of Christ, and the continual course and practice of the church. Secondly, If the church be once brought down beneath herself, we cannot but fear what may be the next stroke at it. Thirdly, It will some way touch the honour of his majesty's dear father, and our most dread sovereign of glorious and ever blessed memory, king James, who saw and approved all the opinions of this book. And he in his rare wisdom and judgment, would never have allowed them, if they had crossed with truth and the Church of England. Fourthly, We must be bold to say, that we cannot conceive what use there can be of civil government in the commonwealth, or of preaching, or external ministry in the church, if such fatal opinions as some which are opposite and contrary to these delivered by Mr. Mountague are shall be publicly taught and maintained. Fifthly, We are certain that all or most of the contrary opinions were treated of at Lambeth, and ready to be published; but then queen Elizabeth of famous memory, upon notice given how little they agreed with the practice of piety and obedience to all government, caused them to be suppressed; and so they have continued ever since, till of late some of them have received countenance at the Synod of Dort. Now this was a synod of that nation, and can be of no authority in any other National Church till it be received there by publick authority. And our hope is, that the Church of England will be well advised, and more than once over, before she admit a foreign synod, especially of such a church as condemneth her discipline and manner of government; to say no more.

“ And further we are bold to commend to your grace's wisdom this one particular. His majesty (as we have been informed) hath already taken this business into his own care, and most worthily referred it in a right course to church consideration. And we well hoped, that without further trouble to the state, or breach of unity in the church, it might so have been well and orderly composed, as we still pray it may.

“ These things considered, we have little to say for Mr. Mountague's person: only thus much we know, he is a very good scholar, and a right honest man: a man every way able to do God, his majesty, and the Church of England great service. We fear he may receive discouragement; and (which is far worse) we have some cause to doubt this may breed a great backwardness in able men to write in the defence of the Church of England, against either home or foreign adversaries, if they shall see him sink in fortune's reputation, or wealth, upon occasion of his book. And this we most humbly submit to your grace's judgment, and care of the church's peace and welfare. So commending your grace to the protection of Almighty God, we shall ever rest at your grace's service, Jo. ROFFEN. Jo. OXON. GUIL. MENNERA. Apr. 2, 1625.”

The duke's espousing this cause, and the king's reproving the house of commons for meddling in it, did but more exasperate the adverse party, who were now enemies to Mountague not as an Arminian, but as an instrument (in their thoughts) of arbitrary power. And it was indeed the state interest that gave the great distinction to the school opinions. Those divines who adhered to the more rigid opinions of St. Austin, Calvin, and the synod of Dort, they were at this time of the country party, in favour with the people, and with the prevailing side in parliament; so they established to themselves the reputation of being sound and orthodox Protestants: while the other divines who went back to the foundations of religion, and to the import of the Scriptures, and to the sense of the primitive fathers, in rejecting the hard decrees of reprobation, and in reconciling the will of man with the grace of God; they were eminently of the court-party, and favourites of the king and the duke: and under a prejudice upon this civil more than a religious account, they were charged with Popery and Arminianism, only to make them the more odious to the common people. Even the Arminians in Holland suffered more as a state faction than as a religious sect; they were found adversaries to the rights and liberties of the people; and it was under that character they were made heretics, rather than for their abstracted notions in divinity. And it was the same now in England; the doctrinal controversy would have created no great difference, if there had not been a political division in it.

It was this very reason that now inflamed the commons against Mr. Mountague; and they would have shewn their indignation at his having such an interest at court, if this parliament had not been so very abruptly dissolved. And this again increased the prejudice against what they now called the Arminian party; and the cry against them was so popular, that many divines were encouraged to confute the principles of Mr. Mountague's Book, and to represent them as false and pernicious. In this design Dr. Sutcliff, Mr. Burton, Mr. Rowse, Mr. Yates, Mr. Wotton, and even a bishop of the church, Dr. Carleton, engaged themselves. Their writings served to heighten the jealousies of the wiser, and to confirm the prejudices of the weaker men. This was soon improved into such a universal dislike of the dreadful name of Arminianism, that even the king and the duke began to think it not safe and honourable to support a cause that was generally run down by the voice of the people: and therefore at the opening of the second parliament, summoned to meet Feb. 1625-6, the duke seemed inclinable to drop his concern for out any danger of his soul at all; a man may resolve to oppose this or that without peril of perishing for ever.

IV. "Whereas in the 2d Homily entitled 'Against peril of Idolatry,' contained in the aforesaid book of Homilies, approved by the 35th article aforementioned, it is declared, that 'Images teach no good lesson neither of God nor godliness, but all error and wickedness;' he the said Richard Mountague, in the book 'Gugg' aforesaid, doth affirm and maintain, that 'Images may be used for the instruction of the ignorant, and excitation of devotion.'

V. "That in the same Homily it is plainly expressed, that 'the attributing the defence of certain countries to saints is a spoiling God of his honour, and that such saints are but dii tutelares of the Gentile Idolaters;' the said Richard Mountague hath notwithstanding, in his said book entitled 'A Treatise concerning the Invocation of Saints;' affirmed and maintained, 'That saints have not only a memory, but a more peculiar charge of their friends, and that 'it may be admitted that some saints have a peculiar patronage, custody, protection and power, as angels also have, over certain persons and countries by special deputation,' and that it is no impiety so to believe.

VI. "Whereas in the 17th of the said Articles it is resolved, 'that God hath certainly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation; wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose working in due season, they through grace obey the calling, they be justified freely, walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, attain to everlasting felicity.' He the said Richard Mountague, in the said book called 'The Appeal,' doth maintain and affirm, that 'Men justified may fall away, and depart from the state which once they had; they may arise again and become new men possibly, but not certainly nor necessarily;' and the better to countenance this his opinion, he hath in the same book wilfully added, falsified, and changed divers words of the 16th of the Articles before mentioned, and divers other words both in the book of Homilies and in the book of common prayer, and so miscited and changed the said places. He doth alledge in the said book called 'The Appeal,' endeavouring thereby to lay a most wicked and malicious scandal upon the church of England, as if she did herein differ from the reformed churches of England, and from the reformed churches beyond the seas; and did consent to those pernicious errors which are commonly called Arminianism, and which the late famous queen Elizabeth and king James of happy memory did so piously and diligently labour to suppress.

VII. "That the said Rd. Mountague, contrary to his duty and allegiance, hath endeavoured to raise great factions and divisions in this commonwealth, by casting the odious and scandalous name of Puritans upon such his majesty's loving subjects as conform themselves to the doctrine and ceremony of the church of England, under that name laying upon them divers false and malicious imputations, so to bring them into jealousy and displeasure with his most excellent majesty, and into reproach and ignominy with the rest of the people, to the great danger of sedition and disturbance in the state, if it be not timely prevented.

VIII. "That the scope and end of the said Rd. Mountague, in the books before mentioned, is to give encouragement to popery, and to withdraw his majesty's subjects from the true religion established to the Roman superstition, and consequently to be reconciled to the see of Rome: all which he laboureth by subtle and cunning ways, whereby God's true religion hath been much scandalized, those mischiefs introduced which the wisdom of many laws hath endeavoured to prevent, the devices and practices of his majesty's enemies have been furthered and advanced, to the great peril and hazard of our sovereign lord the king, and of all his dominions and loving subjects.

IX. "That the said Rd. Mountague hath inserted into the said book called 'The Appeal,' divers passages dishonourable to the late king his majesty's father of famous memory, full of bitterness, railing, and injurious speeches to other persons, disgraceful and contemptible to many worthy divines both of this kingdom and of other reformed churches beyond the seas, impious and profane in scoffing at preaching, meditating, and conferring pulpits, lectures, bible, and all shew of religion: All which do aggravate his former offences, having proceeded from malicious and envenomed heat against the peace of the church, and the sincerity of the reformed religion publicly professed and by law established in this kingdom.

"All which offences being to the dishonour of God, and of most mischievous effect and consequence against the good of this church and commonwealth of England, and of other his majesty's realms and dominions; the commons assembled in parliament do hereby pray, that the said Rd. Mountague may be punished according to his demerits, in such exemplary manner, as may deter others from attempting so presumptuously to disturb the peace of church and state, and the book aforesaid may be suppressed and burnt."

It does not appear whether these Articles were presented to the king or preferred in any judicial manner, or whether Mr. Mountague gave in any Answer, or made any other public Vindication. It is most probable that the commons were so immersed in the Impeachment of the duke of Buckingham, that they had not leisure to prosecute this inferior cause before their dissolution: Nor did the king take any notice of this Complaint, or suffer it to be debated in convocation. He thought it a dispute fitter to be silenced than to be determined;

pensions from the king, and having employed the subsidies to other ends than the grant intended. His grand-child, William duke of Suffolk, for the like was censured 28 Henry 6. The great bishop of Winchester, 50 Edward 3, was put upon the king's mercy by parliament, for wasting in time of peace, the revenues of the crown, and gifts of the people; to the yearly oppression of the commonwealth. Offences of this nature were urged, to the razing of the last duke of Somerset in the time of Edward 6. More fearful examples may be found, too frequent in records. Such improvidence and ill counsel led Henry 3 into so great a strait, as after he had pawned some part of his foreign territories, broke up his house, and sought his diet at abbeys and religious houses, engaged not only his own jewels, but those of the shrine of St. Edward at Westminster; he was in the end not content, but constrained to lay to pawn (as some of his successors after did) magnam coronam Anglie, the crown of England. To draw you out to life the image of former kings' extremities, I will tell you what I found since this assembly at Oxford, written by a reverend man, twice vice chancellor of this place; his name was Gascoign; a man that saw the tragedy of De la Pole: he tells you that the revenues of the crown were so rent away by ill counsel, that the king was enforced to live 'de tallagis populi:' that the king was grown in debt 'quinque centena millia librarum:' that his great favourite, in treating of a foreign marriage, had lost his master a foreign duchy: that to work his ends, he had caused the king to adjourn the parliament 'in villis et remotis partibus regni,' where few people, 'propter defectum hospitii et victualium,' could attend; and by shifting that assembly from place to place, to enforce, I will use the author's own word, 'illos paucos, qui remanebant de comunitate regni, concedere regi quamvis pessima.' When the parliament endeavoured by an act of resumption, the just and frequent way to repair the languishing state of the crown, for all from Henry 3, but one, till the 6 Henry 8, have used it, this great man told the king it was 'ad dedecus regis,' and forced him from it: to which the Commons answered, although 'vexati laboribus et expensis, nunquam concederent taxam regi,' until by authority of parliament, 'resumeret actualiter omnia pertinentia coronæ Angliæ:' and that it was 'magis ad dedecus regis,' to leave so many poor men in intolerable want, to whom the king stood then indebted. Yet nought could all good counsel work, until by parliament that bad great man was banished; which was no sooner done, but an act of resumption followed the inrollment of the act of his exilement. That was a speeding article against the bishop of Winchester and his brother, in the time of Edward 3, that they had ingrossed the person of the king from his other lords. It was not forgotten against Gaveston and the Spencers, in the time of Edward 2. The unhappy ministers of Rd. 2, Hen. 6, and Edw. 6, felt the weight, to their ruin, of the like errors. I hope we shall not complain in parliament again of such.

"I am glad we have neither just cause, or undutiful dispositions, to appoint the king a counsel to redress those errors in parliament, as those 42 Hen. 3. We do not desire, as 5 Hen. 4, or 29 Hen. 6, the removing from about the king any evil counsellors. We do not request a choice by name, as 14 Edw. 2. 3. 5. 11. Rd. 2, 8 Hen. 4, or 31 Hen. 6, nor to swear them in parliament, as 35 Edw. 1, 9 Edw. 2, or 5 Rd. 2, or to line them out their directions of rule, as 43 Hen. 3, and 8 Hen. 6, or desire that which Hen. 3 did promise in his 42d year, 'se acta omnia per assensum magnatum de concilio suo electorum, et sine eorum assensu nihil.' We only in loyal duty offer up our humble desires, that since his majesty hath, with advised judgment, elected so wise, religious, and worthy servants, to attend him in that high employment; he will be pleased to advise, with them together, a way of remedy for those disasters in state, brought on by long security and happy peace; and not be led with young and single counsel."

On the 12th of August, less than a week after the delivery of this Speech, this first parliament of King Charles was dissolved. He soon afterwards convened a second, which assembled on Feb. 6th, 1636, presently after which the house of commons busied itself in getting materials for exhibiting Articles against the duke of Buckingham. Their Committee on Grievances made several reports, "That they had learned the reason why our merchant ships and goods were seized in France, was because our admirals had seized the goods of that nation in several ports of England, particularly in the ship called the Peter of Newhaven; which was brought into Plymouth by order of the duke, after the king and council had ordered it to be restored upon a just claim, and the court of admiralty had also released her: that 23 bags of silver and 8 bags of gold, taken out of this ship, were, by sir Francis Stewart, delivered to the lord duke: that till this action, the French did not begin to seize any English ships or goods; and that the duke, having notice of it, said, he would justify the stay of the ship by an express order from the king."

The king in a speech expressed his strong attachment to Buckingham, * but the spirit

* "Some men," says May, "wondered to see the new king suddenly linked in such an intimate friendship with the duke of Buckingham, for extraordinary favourites do usually eclipse and much depress the heir apparent of a crown, or else they are conceived so to do, and upon that reason hated and ruined by the succeeding prince, in which kind all ancient and modern histories are full of examples. In the beginning of king Charles his reign a parliament was called and adjourned to Oxford, the plague raging extremely at London, where the duke of Buckingham was highly questioned, not without the grief and sad presage of many people raised against the minister could not be suppressed by any thing the king could do; and no Supply was to be expected till the Duke was given up to the public vengeance. The Commons followed the chace very warmly against him; and, in some of their Debates, very severe expressions were used against the court; particularly Mr. Clement Coke (son of sir Edward Coke,) said, "That it was better to die by an enemy than to suffer at home." And another member, Dr. Turner, a physician, proposed to the house the following Queries, against the Duke, grounded upon Public Fame.

1. "Whether the Duke, being Admiral, be not the cause of the loss of the king's royalty in the narrow seas? 2. Whether the unreasonable, exorbitant, and immense gift of money and lands, on the Duke and his relations, be not the cause of impairing the king's revenue, and impoverishing the crown? 3. Whether the multiplicity of Offices conferred upon the Duke, and others depending upon him, whereof they were not capable, be not the cause of the evil government of this kingdom? 4. Whether Recusants, in general, by a kind of connivancy, be not borne out and increased, by reason the duke's murther and father-in law were known papists? 5. Whether the Sale of Offices, Honours, and places of judicature, with ecclesiastical livings and promotions, a scandal and hurt to the kingdom, be not through the Duke? 6. Whether the Duke's staying at home, being Admiral and General in chief of the sea and land army, was not the cause of the bad success and overthrow of the late action; and whether he gave good direction for the conduct of that design?"

Upon occasion of this Speech of Mr. Coke, and these Queries of Dr. Turner, the king thought fit to send a reprehensive Message to the House of Commons. These transactions gave rise to Debates reported in 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. in which part was taken by Selden, Rolle, Wentworth, Wyld, and other eminent persons, among whom the notable Mr. Noy spoke in the Duke's disfavour. Other parliamentary proceedings respecting Buckingham are reported in 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. and Rushw. Coll. but they do not assume the character of a State Trial, till we find Digby Earl of Bristol, so much concerned in the late Negotiations in Spain, about the Match, &c. on his return from thence, committed prisoner to the Tower. This Earl had been also examined by a Committee of lords, appointed by the king, touching those affairs; and certain Propositions were made to him in order to his release, and composing the differ-that private affections would too much prevail on him against the public. He was protected against the parliament, which for that only purpose was dissolved, after two Subsidies had been given, and before the kingdom received relief in any one Grievance, as is expressed in the first and general Remonstrance of this present parliament, where many other unhappy passages of those times are briefly touched."

ences between the duke of Buckingham and him. On his refusal, in some measure, to comply with the terms, the lord Conway, secretary of state, wrote to him the following Letter, and received his Answer to it:

The Lord Conway to the Earl of Bristol.

"My lord; I received a letter from your lordship, dated the 4th of this month, written in answer to a former letter which I directed to your lordship, by his majesty's commandment. This last letter, according to my duty, I have shewed unto his majesty, who hath perused it, and hath commanded me to write back to you again, that he finds himself nothing satisfied therewith. The question propounded to your lordship, from his majesty, was plain and clear, Whether you did rather chuse to sit still without being questioned for any errors passed in your Negotiations in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon granted in parliament, whereof you may have the benefit: or whether, for the clearing of your innocency, (whereof yourself, and your friends and followers, are so confident) you will be content to waive the advantage of that pardon, and put yourself into a legal way of examination for the trial thereof. His majesty's purpose thereby, is not to prevent you of any favours the law hath given you; but if your assurance be such as your words and letters import, he conceives it stands not with that public and resolute profession of your integrity to decline your trial. His majesty leaves the choice to yourself, and requires from you a direct answer, without circumlocution or bargaining with him for future favours before hand; but if you have a desire to make use of that pardon which cannot be denied you, nor is any way desired to be taken from you, his majesty expects you should at the least forbear to magnify your service, and, out of an opinion of your innocency, cast an aspersion upon his majesty's justice, in not affording you that present fulness of liberty and favour which cannot be drawn from him, but in his good time, and according to his good pleasure. Thus much I have in commandment to write to your lordship, and to require your answer clearly and plainly by this messenger, sent on purpose for it, and so remain,

Your lordship's humble servant,
Whitehall, March 24, 1626. "CONWAY."

The Earl of Bristol to the Lord Conway.

"My lord; I have received your Letter of the 24th of March, the 28th, and I am infinitely grieved to understand, that my former answer to yours of the 4th of March hath not satisfied his majesty, which I will endeavour to do to the best of my understanding; and, to that end, shall answer to the particular points of your present letter with the greatest clearness I am able. First, Whereas you say in your letter, That the question propounded to me was plain and clear, viz. Whether I would chuse to sit still without being questioned for any errors passed in my negotiations in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon, whereof I may take the benefit? Or whether, being content to wave the advantage of that pardon, I should put myself into a legal way of examination for the trial thereof? &c.

1st, Your lordship may be pleased to remember your last proposition was, Whether I desired to rest in the security I was in? which you now express, Whether I will chuse to sit still?

2ndly, Your proposition was, Whether I would acknowledge the gracious favour of his majesty that now is, who had been pleased not to question my actions? When it is best known to your lordship, That, by a commission of the lords, I was questioned upon 20 Articles, divers involving felony and treason: although it be true, That, when I had so answered (as I am confident their lordships would have cleared me) I was so unhappy as their lordships never met more about that business.—But now your proposition is, Whether I will now chuse to sit still without being further questioned for errors passed? Whereas before it was required I should acknowledge that I have not been questioned at all; which is a different thing. But conferring both your letters together, and gathering the sense and meaning, by making the latter an explanation of the former, which I could have wished your lordship would have more clearly explained, I return unto your lordship this plain and direct answer. That I understand, by the security I am in, and sitting still, and not being further questioned, that I am restored to the bare freedom and liberty of a subject and peer: for if a man be called in question by his majesty, yet afterwards his majesty shall be pleased, out of his goodness, that he rest quiet and secure, and that he shall not be further questioned; I conceive that it is not apparent that his liberty naturally revolveth unto him, when by his majesty's grace he is pleased to declare he shall not be further questioned, but may live in further security. So that, understanding your letter in this sort, (for no direct answer can be made, until the sense of the question be truly stated) I do most humbly acknowledge and accept his majesty's grace and favour, and shall not wave any thing that shall come to me by the pardon of the 21 Jac. nor by the pardon of his majesty's coronation. And am so far from bargaining, as you are pleased to express it, for future favour (though I hope my humble and submissive courses of petitioning his majesty neither hath nor shall deserve so hard an expression) that I shall not presume so much as to press for any favour, until my dutiful and loyal behaviour may move his majesty's royal and gracious heart thereunto; but receive, with all humbleness, this my freedom and liberty, the which I shall only make use of in such sort, as I shall judge may be most agreeable to his majesty's pleasure. As for the 2nd part of your letter, wherein you say, That if I desire to make use of that pardon, his majesty expects that I should at least forbear to magnify my services; or, out of an opinion of my own innocency, cast an aspersion upon his majesty's justice; to this point I answer, That as I hope I shall never err in that sort of immodesty, of valuing my services, which I acknowledge to have been accompanied with infinite weakness and disabilities; so I trust it shall not displease, that I make use, to mine own comfort, and the honour of my posterity, of those many written testimonies, which my late most blessed master hath left me, of his gracious acceptance of my services for the space of 20 years; And likewise I hope the modest avowing of mine innocency will not be thought to cast any aspersion upon his majesty's honour or justice. I must freely confess unto your lordship, I am much afflicted to see inferences of this nature made, both in your lordship's last letter and in this. For if it shall be inferred, as a thing reflecting upon the king's honour, then a man questioned shall not endeavour to defend his own innocency before he be convicted, it will be impossible for any man to be safe; for the honour of his majesty is too sacred a thing for any subject, how innocent soever, to contest against. So likewise, God forbid that it should be brought into consequences, as in your former letter, as a tax upon the government and justice of his late majesty, and majesty that now is, that I should have suffered so long time, not being guilty. For as I never have been heard so much as to repine of injustice in their majesties, in all my sufferings, so I well know, that the long continuance of my troubles may well be attributed unto other causes, as to my own errors of passion, or other accidents; for your lordship may well remember, that my affairs were, almost two years since, upon the point of a happy accommodation, had it not been interrupted by the unfortunate mistaking of the speeches I used to Mr. Clark. I shall conclude by intreating your lordship's favour, that I may understand from you, as I hope for my comfort, that this letter hath given his majesty satisfaction; or if there should yet remain any scruple, that I may have a clear and plain signification of the king's pleasure; which I shall obey with all humility. Your Lordship's humble servant, BAISTOL."

After this the Earl petitioned the house of lords, and shewed, "That he, being a peer of this realm, had not received a summons to parliament, and desired their lordships to mediate with the king, that he might enjoy the liberty of a subject and the privilege of his peerage, after almost two years restraint without being brought to a trial: and, if any charge was brought against him, he prayed that he might be tried by parliament." Upon the receipt of this petition, the lords referred it to the committee of privileges: from whom the earl of Hertford reported, "That it was necessary for their lordships humbly to beseech his majesty to send a writ of summons to the earl of Bristol; as also to such other lords whose writs are stopped, except such as are made incapable to sit there by judgment of parliament, or some other legal course." Hereupon the duke of Buckingham signified to the house, That upon the earl's Petition to the king, his majesty had sent him his writ of summons; and, withal, shewed the lords a copy of a letter, wrote from the king to the said earl, dated Jan. 20, 1625, the tenor of which followeth:

"We have read your letter addressed unto us by Buckingham, and cannot but wonder that you should, through forgetfulness, make request to us of favour, as if you stood evenly capable of it, when you know what your behaviour in Spain deserved of us, which you are to examine by the observations we made, and know you well remember; how, at our first coming in Spain, taking upon you to be so wise, as to foresee our intention to change our religion, you were so far from dissuading us, that you offered your advice and secrecy to concur in it: and, in many other conferences, pressing to shew how convenient it was to be a Roman Catholic, it being impossible, in your opinion, to do any great action otherwise; and how much wrong, disadvantage, and disservice you did to the Treaty, and to the right and interest of our dear brother and sister, and their children; what disadvantage, inconvenience, and hazard you intangled us in by your artifices, putting off and delaying our return home; the great estimation you made of that state, and the low price you set this kingdom at; still maintaining, that we, under colour of friendship to Spain, did what was in our power against them, which they said you very well knew: And, last of all, your approving of those conditions, that our nephew should be brought up in the emperor's court; to which sir Walter Aston then said, That he durst not give his consent for fear of his head: Your replying unto him, That without some such great action, neither marriage nor peace could be had."

There is no Answer to this Letter in the Journals; but, instead of it, we find another Petition from the Earl, addressed to the lords, on his receiving his writ of summons; to which he annexed the Lord Keeper's Letter and his Answer, and desired to be heard in Accusation of the Duke.

"Humbly shewing unto your lordships, That he hath lately received his writ of summons to parliament, for which he returned unto your lordships most humble thanks; but, jointly with it, a Letter from my Lord Keeper, commanding him, in his majesty's name, to forbear his personal attendance; and although he shall ever obey the least intimation of his majesty's pleasure, yet he most humbly offereth unto your lordships wise considerations, as too high a point for him, how far this may trench upon the liberty and safety of the peers, and the authority of their letters patents, to be in this sort discharged by a letter missive of any subject, without the king's hand; and, for your lordships due information, he hath annexed a copy of the said Lord Keeper's Letter, and his Answer thereunto.—He farther humbly peti-tioneth your lordships, That having been, for the space of two years, highly wronged in point of his liberty and of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which have been cast upon him, without being permitted to answer for himself; which hath been done by the power and industry of the duke of Buckingham, to keep him from the presence of his majesty and the parliament, lest he should discover many crimes concerning the said duke:—He therefore most humbly beseecheth, That he may be heard, both in the point of his Wrong, and of his Accusation of the said duke: Wherein he will make it appear, how infinitely the said duke hath abused their majesties, the state, and both the houses of parliament. And this, he is most confident, will not be denied, since the court of parliament never refuseth to hear the poorest subject seeking for redress of wrongs, nor the accusation against any, be he never so powerful. And herein he beseecheth your lordships to mediate to his majesty for your suppliant's coming to the house, in such sort as you shall think fitting; assuring his majesty that all he shall say, shall not only tend to the service of his majesty and the state, but highly to the honour of his majesty's royal person, and of his princely virtues: and your suppliant shall ever pray for your lordships prosperity. BRISTOL."

The Lord Keeper to the Earl of Bristol; dated Dorset-court, March 31, 1626.

"My very good lord; By his majesty's commandment, I herewith send unto your lordship your writ of summons for the parliament; but withal signify his majesty's pleasure herein further, That howsoever he gives way to the awarding of the writ, yet his meaning is thereby not to discharge any former directions for restraint of your lordship's coming hither; but that you continue under the same restriction as you did before; so as your lordship's personal attendance here is to be forborn. And herein I doubt not but your lordship will readily give his majesty satisfaction: And so I commend my service very heartily unto your lordship, and remain, your lordship's assured friend and servant,
THOMAS COVENTRY, C. S."

The Earl of Bristol's Answer to the Lord Keeper; dated Sherborn, April 12, 1626.

"May it please your lordship; I have received your lordship's letter of the 31st of March, and with it, his majesty's writ of summons for the parliament. In the one his majesty commandeth me, that all excuses set aside, upon my faith and allegiance I fail not to come and attend his majesty; and this under the great seal of England. In the other, as in a letter missive, his majesty's pleasure is intimated by your lordship that my personal attendance should be forborn. I must crave leave ingenuously to confess unto your lordship that I want judgment rightly to direct myself in this case; as likewise, that I am ignorant how far this may trench upon the privileges of the peers of this land, and upon mine and their General to charge his lordship with High Treason, and other Offences and Misdemeanors of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal course against him, according to the justice and usual proceedings of parliament."

Then the Attorney General, sir Rob. Heath, exhibited the following Articles, as a Charge against the said Earl.—But when he had begun to read the said Charge, the Earl interrupted him, and said, "That he had exhibited his Petition to the house, that he might come up and be heard in his Accusation against, the duke of Buckingham; and that, thereupon, he, being a peer of this realm, was charged with High Treason. That he had heretofore informed the late king, of blessed memory, of the unfaithful service of the said duke; and thereupon the duke laboured that he might be clapped up in the Tower, presently after his return out of Spain: and called upon the lord chamberlain to testify whether the lord marquis Hamilton had not told him as much. That the duke had, since, laboured to keep him from this king's presence, and now he was charged with Treason. That he had been often employed, as ambassador, in weighty affairs, and never came home tainted; and, at his last coming out of Spain, he laboured the late king James, that he might be heard before himself, and his majesty promised it. I pray God, (said the Earl) that promise did him no hurt, for he died soon after. For the said king's promise, he vouched the lord chamberlain: and earnestly desired their lordships to take all these into their considerations; and to consider, also, that this house is already possessed of his said Petition and his Accusation of the said duke; and required that their lordships would first receive his Charge against the lord Conway, and not to invalidate his testimony against them by the king's charge against him. He protested, that he spoke for the king; that he was a peer and a free man of the realm; and desired not to be impeached until his Charge, which was of so high a nature, was first heard."

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AGAINST THE EARL OF BRISTOL.

The Earl then tendered to the house his Articles, in writing, against the lord Conway, which the lords received; and, being withdrawn, the Petition of the said Earl presented to the house on the 10th of April, wherein he desired he might be heard in his Accusation against the Duke, was read; and, after a long debate, it was agreed upon the question, That the Earl's Charge against the Duke and against the lord Conway, should be presently read; all which were read by the Attorney General, as follows:

"ARTICLES of several High Treasons, and other great and enormous Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, committed by John Earl of Bristol, against our late Sovereign Lord King James, of blessed memory, deceased, and our Sovereign Lord the King's Majesty, which now is; wherein the said

Earl is charged, by his Majesty's Attorney General, on his Majesty's behalf, in the most High and Honourable Court of Parliament, before the King and his Lords there.

"OFFENCES done and committed by the Earl of Bristol, before his majesty's going into Spain when he was Prince.

I. "That the said earl being trusted and employed by the said late king as his ambassador to Ferdinando, then and now emperor of Germany: to Philip 4, then and now king of Spain, in annis 1621, 2, and 3. And having commission, and particular and special direction, to treat with the said emperor and the king of Spain, for the plenary restoring of such parts of the dominions, territories, and possessions of the count Palatine of the Rhine, who married the most excellent lady Elizabeth his now royal consort, the only daughter of the late king James; which were then wrongfully, and in hostile manner taken, and possessed with and by the armies of the said emperor, and king of Spain, or any other: and for preserving and keeping such other parts thereof, as were not then lost but were then in the protection of the said late king James; and to the use of the said count Palatine and his children: and for the restoring of the electoral dignity unto them: and also to treat with the said king of Spain, for a Marriage to be had between the most high and excellent prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only son and heir apparent of the said king James, and now our most sovereign lord, and the most illustrious lady Donna Maria the Infanta of Spain, sister to the now king of Spain: he the said earl, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an ambassador, at Madrid in the kingdom of Spain, to advance and further the designs of the said king of Spain, against our said sovereign lord, his children, friends, and allies; falsely, wilfully, and traiterously, and as a traitor to our said late sovereign lord the king, by sundry letters and other messages sent by the said earl from Madrid, in the years aforesaid, unto king James and his ministers of state of England, did confidently and resolutely inform, advise, and assure the said late king, that the said emperor and king of Spain would really, fully, and effectually make restitution and plenary restoration to the said count Palatine and his children of the said dominions, territories, and possessions of the said count Palatine, and of the said electoral dignity: and that the said king of Spain did really, fully, and effectually intend the said Marriage between the said lady his sister, and the said prince our now sovereign lord, according to articles formerly propounded between the said kings: whereas in truth, the said emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution as aforesaid: and whereas the said king of Spain never really intended the marriage according to those articles propounded; but the said emperors free toleration, and silencing of all laws made, and standing in force against them.

VI. "That by the false Informations and Intelligence of the said earl of Bristol, during the time aforesaid, unto his said late majesty and to his majesty that now is, being then prince, concerning the said Treaties, and by the assurances aforesaid given by the said earl: his said late majesty, and the prince, his now majesty, being put in hopes, and by the said long delay used, without producing any effect, their majesties being put into jealousies, and just suspicion that there was no such sincerity used towards them as they expected, though so many assurances from the earl on their part had been undertaken; the said prince, our now gracious sovereign, was enforced, out of his love to his country, to his allies, friends, and confederates, and to the peace of Christendom, who all suffered by such intolerable delay, to undertake in his own person, his long and dangerous journey into Spain; that thereby he might either speedily conclude those Treaties, or perfectly discover that, on the emperor's and the king of Spain's part, there was no true and real intention to bring the same to conclusion, upon any fit and honourable terms and conditions: and did accordingly and speedily break them off. By which journey, the person of the said prince, being then heir apparent to the crown of this realm, and in his person, the peace and safety of this kingdom, did undergo such apparent and such inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good subjects do even tremble.

OFFENCES done and committed by the said Earl, during the Time of the Prince's being in Spain.

VII. "That at the Prince's coming into Spain during the time aforesaid, the earl of Bristol, cunningly, falsely, and traitorously, moved and persuaded the prince, being then in the power of a foreign king of the Romish religion, to change his religion, which was done in this manner. At the prince's first coming to the said earl, he asked the prince for what he came thither; the prince, at first not conceiving the earl's meaning, answered, 'You know as well as I.' The earl replied, 'Sir, servants can never serve their masters industriously, although they do it faithfully, unless they know their meanings fully. Give me leave therefore to tell you what they say in the town is the cause of your coming, That you mean to change your religion, and to declare it here.' And yet cunningly to disguise it, the earl added further; 'Sir, I do not speak this that I will persuade you to do it, or that I will promise you to follow your example, though you will do it; but, as your faithful servant, if you will trust me with so great a secret, I will endeavour to carry it the discreetest way I can.' The prince being moved at this unexpected motion again, said unto him, 'I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you should conceive I would be so base and unworthy, as 'for a wife to change my religion.' The said earl replying, 'He desired the prince to pardon him, if he had offended him, it was but out of his desire to serve him.' Which persuasions of the said earl were the more dangerous, because the more subtle; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful servant to God and his master, if he had found the prince staggering in his religion, to have prevented so great an error, and to have persuaded him against it, so to have avoided the dangerous consequence thereof, to the true religion and to this state, if such a thing should have happened.

VIII. "That afterward, during the Prince's being in Spain, the said earl having conference with the said prince about the Romish religion, he endeavoured, falsely and traitorously, to persuade the prince to change his religion as aforesaid, and become a Romish Catholic, and to become obedient to the usurped authority of the pope of Rome; and, to that end and purpose, the said earl traitorously used these words unto the said prince: 'That the state of England did never any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the pope of Rome; and that it was impossible they could do any thing of note otherwise.'

IX. "That, during the time of the Prince's being in Spain as aforesaid, the prince consulting and advising with the said Earl and others about a new offer made by the king of Spain, touching the Palatinate; which was, that the eldest son of the prince Palatine should marry with the emperor's daughter, but must be bred up in the emperor's court; the said Earl delivered his opinion, that the proposition was reasonable; whereat when sir Walter Aston, then present, falling into some passion, said, that he durst not for his head consent unto it, the earl of Bristol replied, that he saw no such great inconvenience in it, for that he might be bred up in the emperor's court in our religion. But, when the extreme danger, and in a manner the impossibility thereof, was pressed unto the said Earl, he said again, that, without some such great action, the peace of Christendom would never be had; which was so dangerous and desperate a counsel, that one so near to the crown of England should be poisoned in his religion, and put into the power of a foreign prince, enemy to our religion, and an unfriend to our state, that the consequence thereof, both for the present and future times, were infinitely dangerous: And yet hereunto did his disaffection to our religion, the blindness in his judgment, misled by sinister respects, and the too much regard he had to the house of Austria, lead him.

X. "That, when the Prince had clearly found himself and his father deluded in these Treaties, and thereupon resolved to return from the court of Spain; and yet, because it behoved him to part fairly, he left the powers of the desposorios with the said earl of Bristol, to be delivered upon the return of the dispensation from Rome (which the king of Spain insisted upon, and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the marriage); the Prince, foreseeing and fearing lest, after the desposorios, the infanta, which should then be his wife, might be put into a monastery, wrote a letter back to the said earl from Segovia, thereby commanding him not to make use of the said powers, until he could give him assurance that a monastery might not rob him of his wife; which letter the said earl received, and with speed returned an answer thereunto into England, persuading against this direction, yet promising obedience thereunto. Shortly after which, the prince sent another letter to the said earl into Spain, discharging him of his former command; but his late majesty, by the same messenger, sent him a more express direction, not to dispatch the desposorios, until a full conclusion were had of the other Treaty of the Palatinate, with this of the Marriage; for his majesty said, 'That he would not have one daughter to laugh, and leave the other daughter weeping.' In which dispatch, although there were some mistaking, yet in the next following, the same was corrected, and the earl of Bristol tied to the same restriction; which himself confessed in one of his dispatches afterwards, and promised to obey punctually the king's command therein; yet, nevertheless, contrary to his duty and allegiance, in another letter sent immediately after, he declared, 'That he had set a day for the desposorios,' but without any assurance, or so much as a treating of those things which were commanded to him as restrictions; and that so short a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good success in the journey, had not concurred, the prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither sure of a wife, nor any assurances given of the temporal articles. All which, in his high presumption, he adventured to do, being an express breach of his instructions; and, if the same had not been prevented by his late majesty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite dishonour and prejudice of his majesty.

XI. "Lastly, That he hath offended in a high and contemptuous manner, in preferring a scandalous Petition to this honourable house, to the dishonour of his majesty of blessed memory deceased, and of his sacred majesty that now is, which are no way sufferable in a subject towards his sovereign; and in one Article of that Petition specially, wherein he gives his now majesty the lie, in denying and offering to falsify that relation which his majesty affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both houses of parliament.

ROBERT HEATH."

The Duke of BUCKINGHAM impeached by the Earl of Bristol.

ARTICLES of the Earl of Bristol, whereby he chargeth the Duke of Buckingham; bearing date the 1st day of May 1626.

I. "That the Duke of Buckingham did secretly combine and conspire with the Conde of Gondamar, ambassador for the king of Spain, before his the said ambassador's last return into Spain, in the summer 1622, to carry his majesty (then prince) into Spain, to the end that he might be informed and instructed in the Roman religion, and thereby have perverted the prince, and subverted the true religion established in England; from which misery this kingdom (next under God's mercy) hath, by the wise, religious, and constant carriage of his majesty, been almost miraculously delivered, considering the many bold and subtle attempts of the said duke in that kind.

II. "That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and sent into Spain; and such messages at his return framed, as might serve for a ground to set on foot this conspiracy; the which was done accordingly, and thereby the king and prince highly abused, and their consents thereby first gotten to the said Journey; that is to say, after the return of the said Mr. Porter, which was about the end of Dec. or the beginning of January, 1622; whereas the said duke had plotted it many months before.

III. "That the said Duke, at his arrival in Spain, nourished the Spanish ministers, not only in the belief of his own being popishly affected; but did (both by absenting himself from all exercises of religion, constantly used in the earl of Bristol's house, and frequented by all other Protestant English, and by conforming himself, to please the Spaniards, in divers rites of their religion, even so far as to kneel and adore their Sacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the prince's conversion; the which conversion he endeavoured to procure by all means possible; and thereby caused the Spanish ministers to propound far worse conditions for religion than had been formerly by the earl of Bristol and sir Walter Aston settled, and signed under their majesties hands; with a clause, in the king of Spain's Answer, of the 12th of December 1622, that they held the article agreed upon sufficient, and such as ought to induce the pope to the granting of the dispensation.*

* Wilson after mentioning how highly Buckingham had been esteemed, adds, "But when Bristol came over, and (as afterwards he) did discover, that the duke carried the prince purposely into Spain to be the better instructed in popery: that he gave hope to the Spanish ministers of state of the prince's conversion, which made them propound far worse conditions for religion than had been formerly agreed on: that he professed himself a papist there, going to mass, kneeling to and adoring their Sacraments; which the pope being informed of, sent the duke a Bull, to persuade and encourage him to pervert the king and prince, with other pernicious crimes laid to his charge in the next king's reign, (as may appear in due time) none can blame the people for mutable affections: for when falshood is so impudent as to hoodwink such an assembly, with the veil that truth herself is wont to put on, who can at an

IV. "That the duke of Buckingham, having several times, in the presence of the earl of Bristol, moved and pressed his late majesty, at the instance of the Conde of Gondomar, to write a letter unto the pope; and to that purpose having once brought a letter ready drawn, wherewith the earl of Bristol, by his majesty being made acquainted, did so strongly oppose the writing of any such letter, that, during the abode of the said earl of Bristol in England, the said duke could not obtain it; yet, not long after the earl was gone, he procured such a letter to be written from his late majesty unto the pope, and to have him styled Sanctissime Pater.

V. "That the pope, being informed of the duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of religion, sent unto the said duke a particular Bull, in parchment, for to persuade and encourage him in the perversion of his majesty, then prince.

VI. "That the said duke's behaviour in Spain was such, that he thereby so incensed the king of Spain and his ministers, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor further dealing with him; whereupon, the said duke seeing that the match would be now to his disadvantage, he endeavoured to break it; not for any service to the kingdom, nor dislike of the match in itself, nor for that he found (as since he hath pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the said match, but out of his particular ends and his indignation.

VII. "That, after that he intended to cross the marriage, he put in practice divers undue courses; as namely, making use of the letters of his majesty (then prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended, as likewise concealing divers things of high importance from his late majesty, and thereby overthrew his majesty's purposes, and advanced his own ends.

VIII. "That the said duke, as he had with his skill and artifices formerly abused their majesties; so, to the same end, he afterwards abused both houses of parliament, by his sinister relation of the carriage of affairs, as shall be made appear almost in every particular that he spake unto the said houses.

IX. "As for the scandal given by his personal behaviour, as also the employing of his power with the king of Spain for the procuring of favours and offices, which he bestowed upon base and unworthy persons, for the recompence and hire of his lust: these things, as neither fit for the earl of Bristol to speak, nor indeed for the house to hear, he leaveth to your lordships wisdoms how far you will be pleased to have them examined; it having been indeed a great instant discover it?" Upon which Hume observes, "Wilson says, that Buckingham lost his popularity after Bristol arrived, not because that nobleman discovered the falshood of his narrative, but because he proved that Buckingham, while in Spain, had professed himself a papist; which is false, and which was never said by Bristol."

infamy and dishonour to this nation, that a person of the duke's great quality and employments, a privy counsellor, an ambassador, eminent in his master's favour, and solely trusted with the person of the prince, should leave behind him in a foreign court so much scandal as he did by his behaviour.

X. "That the said duke hath been, in great part, the cause of the ruin and misfortune of the prince Palatine, and his estates, in as much as those affairs had relation unto this kingdom.

XI. "That the duke of Buckingham hath, in his relations, to both houses of parliament, wronged the earl of Bristol, in point of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which he hath laid upon him; and in point of his liberty, by many undue courses, through his power and practices.

XII. "That the earl of Bristol did reveal unto his late majesty, both by word and letter, in what sort the said duke had disserved him, and abused his trust; and that the king, by several ways, sent him word, that he should rest assured he would hear the said earl; but that he should leave it to him to take his own time. And thereupon, few days before his sickness, he sent the earl word, that he would hear him against the said duke, as well as he had heard the said duke against him; which the duke himself heard, and not long after his blessed majesty sickened and died, having been in the interim much vexed and pressed by the said duke. BRISTOL."

Lord CONWAY impeached by the Earl of Bristol.

ARTICLES of the Earl of Bristol concerning the lord CONWAY, bearing date the 1st of May 1696.

I. "That the lord Conway is so great a servant of the duke of Buckingham's, that he hath not stook to send the earl of Bristol plain word, that if businesses could not be accommodated betwixt him and the duke, he must then adhere and declare himself for the said duke, and therefore unfit to be a judge in any thing that concerneth the duke or the earl.

II. "That the said lord Conway professeth himself to be a secretary of the duke of Buckingham's creation, and so acknowledgeth it under his own hand; and, although he be the king's secretary of state, and a privy counsellor, he usually beginneth his letters to the duke, 'Most gracious patron.'

III. "That, as a creature of the said duke's, the said lord Conway hath been made the instrument of keeping the earl of Bristol from the king's presence, and of imprisoning of him, by warrants only under his own hand, for which he cannot (as the earl conceiveth) produce any sufficient warrant.

IV. "That, by the space of 12 months last past, the said lord Conway hath been the cause of the earl's restraint, only by misinforming his majesty, and procuring a letter of restraint upon undue grounds; and when it was made apparent unto him that the said earl was restored to his liberty, freely to follow his own affairs, by his late majesty of blessed memory, he replied, That that liberty, given him by his majesty, expired with the king's death.

V. "That the earl of Bristol's mother, lying sick, upon her death-bed, desired, for her comfort, to see her son, and to give him her last blessing; whereupon the earl wrote to the said lord Conway, to desire him to move the king for his leave; which he putting off from day to day, told the person employed, that, by reason of the duke's sickness, he could not find opportunity to get the duke's leave to move the king; and having spoken with the duke, he made a negative answer in the king's name; wherewith the earl acquainting the king by some of his bed-chamber, his majesty was in a very great anger, swearing the secretary had never moved him; and that to deny the said earl leave was a barbarous part; and thereupon sent him presently free leave; which the secretary hearing of, sent likewise afterwards a letter of leave, but with divers clauses and limitations, differing from the leave sent him from the king's own mouth.

VI. "That having the businesses of the earl of Bristol in his hands, and the earl being commanded by the king to address himself, in his occasions, unto his lordship, he would never deliver any message from the said earl, without first acquainting the said duke, and receiving his directions; and, in a noble manner of freeness, stuck not to send him word.

VII. "That the earl of Bristol having received from the lord Conway twenty Interrogatories, in his late majesty's name, drawn up by a commission of the lords appointed to search into the proceedings and employments of the said earl; in which search there was more than two months spent, divers of the said Interrogatories involving felony and treason; and his majesty having been pleased to assure the said earl, both, by message and letters, that, upon satisfaction given to himself and the commissioners by his answers, he would presently put an end to the earl of Bristol's business; the earl of Bristol having so fully answered as would admit of no reply, and that many of the commissioners declared themselves to be fully satisfied; the said lord Conway being the secretary in the commission (to whom it properly belonged to call the lords to assemble), perceiving that the earl of Bristol was like to be cleared, never moved for any further meeting; neither have they ever been permitted to meet until this day, whereby the troubles of the earl of Bristol have been kept on foot: till this present, and the said earl's imprisonment hath been enlarged twenty months: and, by the artifices of the said duke of Buckingham and the said lord Conway (as shall be made appear), the said earl hath been insensibly involved and stalked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your lordships will judge to be a very considerable case.

VIII. "That for a colour of keeping the earl from his late majesty's presence, it being pretended after the answer to the 20 Interrogatories, that there were some few questions more to be added, whereunto when he should have answered, his majesty swore solemnly, that without any delay, he should be admitted to his presence, and that within 2 or 3 days he should have the said questions sent unto him; the lord Conway, notwithstanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his majesty's directions for the sending of the said articles, and was often thereunto solicited on the behalf of the said earl, would never send the said questions; and at last answered, That he had no more to do with the earl's business.

IX. "That the earl of Bristol being set free by his late majesty to come to London, to follow his own affairs as he pleased, and thereupon having his writ of parliament sent unto him, without any letters of prohibition; yet the earl of Bristol, out of his great desire to conform all his actions to that which he should understand would best please his majesty, sent to know, 'Whether his coming or stay would be most agreeable unto his majesty?' Who was pleased to answer by a letter from my lord duke of Buckingham, 'That he took in very good part the said earl's respect unto him: but wished him to make some excuse for the present.' The which accordingly he did, and moved, 'That he might have a letter under the king's hand, to warrant his absence;' but under colour of this letter of leave, upon the earl of Bristol's own motion and desire, the lord Conway sent a letter from his majesty absolutely forbidding his coming to parliament; and therein likewise was inserted a clause, 'That the earl should remain restrained as he was in the time of his late majesty,' and so thereby a colour of restraint, under his majesty's hand, was gotten, which could never be procured in his late majesty's time: whereby the earl of Bristol hath been unduly restrained ever since, without being able to procure any redress, or to make the lord Conway willing to understand his case, although he sent him all the papers, whereby he might clearly see, that the earl was not under restraint in his late majesty's time; but never other answer could be procured from him, but, 'That he judged the said earl to be under restraint, and that his liberty was expired by the late king's death, as is aforesaid.'

X. "That the lord Conway, knowing that the Match for the marrying of the king of Bohemia's eldest son with the emperor's daughter, and being bred in the emperor's court, was allowed and propounded by his late majesty: and that his majesty by his letters to his son-in-law, declareth, 'That he thinketh it the fairest and clearest way for the accommodation of his affairs, and that he will take sufficient care of his breeding in true religion.' And notwithstanding that the said earl received a copy of the said letter by the said late king's order, with other papers, setting down all that had been done in the said business, and his majesty's assent thereunto, from the lord Conway himself; yet hath he suffered it to be charged as a crime against the earl of Bristol, both in the 20th Interrogatory and in his majesty's last letter, that he should consent to the breeding of the young prince in the emperor's court. And, further in the Interrogatory, he alledged it as an aggravation against the said earl, That the breeding of the said prince in the emperor's court, referred to the perversion of his religion, when he knew that his said breeding was never thought nor spoken of by the king, nor any other, but with that express clause and condition, 'That he should be bred in his own religion, and have such tutors and servants as his father should appoint.

XI. "That the lord Conway hath been the cause of all the earl of Bristol's troubles, by his dubious and intrapping dispatches, and inferring, That the said earl hath failed in his directions, when it shall be made appear, that his dispatches contained no such directions as he hath alledged were given. BRISTOL."

After the reading of these very different Accusations, the house not being satisfied to commit the Earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the gentleman usher; and further ordered, "That the king's Charge against the Earl of Bristol be first heard, and then the Charge of the said Earl against the Duke: yet so that the Earl's testimony against the Duke be not prevented, prejudiced, nor impeached."

May 2. The Lord-Keeper delivered a Message from the King to the Lords: viz.

"That his majesty taketh notice of the Articles exhibited against the duke of Bucks by the earl of Bristol; and he observeth, That many of them are such, as himself is able to say more of his own knowledge than any man, for the duke's sincere carriage in them: that one of them touching the Narrative made in parliament in the 21st of king James, trencheth as far upon himself, as the duke: for that his majesty went as far as the duke in that declaration: and that all of them have been closed in the Earl's own breast, now for these two years, contrary to his duty, if he had known any crime of that nature by the duke; and now he vents it by way of recrimination against the duke, whom he knows to be a principal witness to prove his majesty's Charge.—And therefore, That his majesty gave them thanks, that they gave no way to the earl of Bristol's unreasonable motion, of putting the duke under the same restraint that they had put the earl; thereby eschewing what the earl aimeth at, to alter their dutiful proceedings toward his majesty so often in this parliament expressed. That thereby they had made his majesty confident, that as they have, so they will put a difference between his majesty's Charge against one that appeareth as a delinquent, and the recrimination of the earl of Bristol against his majesty's witness; and not to equal them by a proceeding pari passu; nor to match the imprisonment of the one with the other, as the earl of Bristol desired; the ground being so different and unequal."

The Earl of Bristol's Defence.

Mr. Attorney having read the Charge, and the earl of Bristol permitted to speak for himself; he first craved pardon of their lordships for his earnest speeches here the other day; confessing he spake in passion; saying, "That an unexpected Accusation of high treason would warm an honest heart; and I like my heart never the worse for it; but he would hereafter amend that fault."

Then he rendered their lordships all most humble thanks for this manner of proceeding against him, and desired to know from Mr. Attorney, "Whether this be his whole Charge or no?"

Mr. Attorney answered, "That he hath commandment to open no more against him; peradventure, in the opening of the Charge, upon some incidents of his Answer, some other Particulars may arise, and be urged; but no new matter should."

Then the Earl desired to know of Mr. Attorney the relator, as he might understand who is his accuser. And Mr. Attorney answered, "That the king himself, out of his own mouth, had given him directions for his own relation against the Earl, and corrected many things which were added."

Unto which the Earl replied, and said to this effect: viz.

"I will not contest with the king; neither doth it beseech me so to do; neither esteem I my life or my fortunes so much as to save them by contesting with my sovereign; and therefore I would make no reply nor answer, were it not that my honour and religion were jointly questioned with my life; but, they being to descend to my posterity, for their sake I am an humble suitor to his majesty, that he would not take indignation at my own just defence. Yet I will be ready to make any humble submission to his majesty; and I heartily desire that some means may be made that I may make it personally unto himself; wherein I will submit myself most willingly to any act of humiliation and submission (not wronging my innocency,) that ever subject did towards his sovereign; and I also desire that his majesty would be pleased to set himself here on his throne of justice, and declare that, out of his royal justice, he leaves the duke of Buckingham and me upon equal terms; and that neither of their causes shall be advanced before the other.

"These my humble Petitions I beseech your lordships to present unto his majesty, on my behalf; and withal what a disservice it will be unto his majesty hereafter, in embassages, if my accuser shall be my judge, his own witness, and have my confiscation.

"As touching the Charge itself, I have once answered it all (except that of my Petition); and I doubt not but to clear myself of every particular thereof. I expected not to have heard of these again. I expected a remonstrance of some practice with Spain against the state; or to be charged with the receipt of 10 unto me; what fair propositions I should make; only to retire into the country, and not come to the court; but permit his grace to dispose of the vice-chamberlain's place. And I shewing Mr. Clerke, by way of private conference, what papers I had to produce against the duke, his grace then required a retraction; which I denied; and so all reconciliation brake off. Afterwards the duke sent me a certain proposition in a letter, which I should acknowledge; and the preface of that proposition saith, 'It is not granted that the earl of Bristol hath, by his Answer, satisfied either the king, the prince, or me, of his innocency' (a strange conjunction of a subject!); and the duke would not be satisfied with less than a direct acknowledgment.

"Upon this, I petitioned the late king, that I might be at liberty to follow my affairs freely; which his majesty condescended unto, and signified his pleasure by the duke, that he was satisfied; and that therefore I had my freedom. But, when I had an intent to come to my lodging at Whitehall, and made the duke acquainted therewith, he seemed much displeas'd thereat; and moved his majesty that I might first make an acknowledgment of my fault, which his majesty refused to compel me unto; saying, He might then be thought a tyrant; to force a man to acknowledge that which he was not guilty of; and his majesty sent me word, that I should make no acknowledgment unless I would freely confess myself guilty. Yet the duke caused a message to be sent me, that his majesty expected that I should make the said acknowledgment, and confess myself guilty. And thus it stood with me when the late king, my blessed master, sickened and died.

"When his majesty that now is came to the crown, he was pleas'd to send me a gracious message, upon the occasion of a great sickness I had; and my writ of parliament was freely sent me; but, out of respect, I desired to know what would best please the king, my consing, or my stay from the parliament. And the duke of Buckingham did write unto me, that his majesty took that respect very well at my hands, but would have me excuse my coming; for which I crav'd a letter of licence from the parliament; instead whereof I received from the lord Conway a letter of prohibition, and restraint and confinement, under the king's own hand, whereas before I was restrained only by the lord Conway.

"After this, I continued quiet almost a year in the country, until the coronation; and then I wrote a most humble letter unto his majesty, and to the duke of Buckingham; but received a letter from his majesty, written in a great Roman hand, inclosed in one from the duke, so differing from those gracious messages his majesty had formerly sent me, and several professions his majesty had made to my wife and others, that I knew not what judgment to make of the said letters; and divers copies of them were divulged abroad.

"Then, my writ of parliament being denied, I several times caused the Lord Keeper to be moved for it; but could procure no redress. And when I petitioned the house for my writ, the duke thereupon took occasion, to my great disgrace, to read the above-specified letter in the open house; and a letter of prohibition was sent me, with my writ, to stay me from the parliament. Upon this I petitioned the house for redress against the duke of Buckingham's wrongs unto me, and accused him of divers crimes; and, since the house was possessed of this my petition, I have been charged with treason; having been offered from his majesty but few days before to rest in security, and not to be questioned; but I, thinking it fit for the clearing of mine honour, to have recourse unto this house, do find myself a restrained man, and the duke at liberty, sitting as one of my judges; which I hope your lordships will speedily redress. And I humbly desire your lordships to take my cause into your lordships consideration, having put myself wholly into your hands."

This being spoken by the Earl of Bristol, he was withdrawn.—Then the Lord Chamberlain being required by the house to deliver his knowledge of that which the earl had vouch'd of him, he said, "The marquis Hamilton told me, in a speech which he the said marquis had with the duke of Buckingham, that the duke told him, that his niceness, the duke of Richmond's and mine, in not giving way to the earl of Bristol's commitment to the Tower, would prejudice the cause; for if he came to the king, he would put new hopes into his majesty, whereby the breach of Treaties with Spain, touching the Marriage and the Palatinate, would be hindered."

The house having debated and agreed, how far to allow of the Earl's requests, he was brought to the bar again, and the Lord Keeper signified unto him, That their lordships require him the said earl to put in writing the short Heads of those Petitions, which he desires this house to present unto the king on his behalf, and of what else he will desire their lordships to be mediators for him to his majesty; Which the earl promised to do on Monday next. The Lord Keeper further told him, "That the house had granted him a copy of the king's Charge against him, and that he should have counsel allowed him to plead his cause. And that he is to let their lordships know at what time he shall be ready to make his Answer." The Earl desired to have time till this day's evening, for that many of his dispatches are in the country, which he would send for up in all speed.

Mr. Attorney signified to their lordships (being demanded from what time he would charge the said Earl) that he had directions to charge him no further than with the dispatches of 1621, and downwards; whereupon the Earl besought their lordships, that on Monday next he might signify when he may be ready to make his Answer, which being granted by the house, he rendered their lordships most humble and hearty thanks for their honourable proceedings; and so he was withdrawn.

interim may happen wherein he may need your lordships further order, that your lordships would be pleased now to order, that Mr. Maxwell may present unto your lordships such further petitions or requests, on the behalf of the said earl, as he shall have occasion to prefer unto your lordships.

Bristol.

Hereupon it was ordered, That Mr. Maxwell may present unto the house any Petition which the Earl shall have occasion to make hereafter. Then the house was put into a Committee, that their lordships might the more freely debate the contents of this Petition; and the petitions were read in parts, and each part considered of by itself; but before any conclusion was had thereof, a Message came from the commons, whereupon their lordships proceeded no further herein at this time, and the house was resumed.

Message from the commons, by Mr. Vice-Chamberlain and others, "That the Commons desire a Conference between a Committee of both houses, if it shall so please their lordships, and at such time after this morning as their lordships shall appoint." Answer. "A committee of this whole house will meet a committee of the whole house of commons at two this afternoon, in the Painted Chamber, to receive what shall be propounded to their lordships." The messengers being departed, the house appointed these lords to report what the commons should propound at this Committee, viz. The Lord President; the Lord Chamberlain; the earls of Dorset, Bridgwater, Devonshire, Clare; lord visc. Say and Seale; lord bishop of Norwich. And it was agreed, that these eight lords should have the first and most convenient places at this committee.—We shall now go back a little, in order to take a view of the duke of Buckingham's affair in the house of commons.

April 22. The commons had perfected their Charge against the Duke, and sent him notice of it by sir John Hippley and Mr. Giffard, two of their members. The heads of it, from the clerk's books, they were allowed to deliver to him, verbatim, but to leave no notes of them with him. His Answer was also required in two days time, before them, if he pleased.

April 24. The gentlemen sent to the Duke made this report to the house, "That they had acquainted the Duke with the Message, who told them he could not give Answer to it, till he had informed the lords about it." That this forenoon having asked leave of the lords, they would by no means consent to it. However, he dictated some Answer to them, which being put into writing was read to the house, as follows:

"That he should, with great care, make all due acknowledgment of your respect and favours in giving him this notice; which though it do invite him to render unto you such a satisfaction that, he hopes, may acquit and restore him to your good opinions, and might prevent your proceedings, which otherwise by a parliamentary course are like to follow: yet according to his duty, he moved the lords of the Upper House, upon your notice given him; who would by no means, as things now stand, give him leave to answer, in regard he is not ignorant you are presently to enter into consideration of his majesty's Message; and that by a delay therein your own purposes will be in some sort disappointed, and the affairs of Christendom much prejudiced; but for that, upon a resolution, you have deferred and respited that service until those things depending against him be first determined, he, out of fear that his necessary defence would spin out a great deal of time, which is more precious, is the willinger to obey their lordships; that so he might hasten, without obstacle or interruption given unto him, to keep day with his majesty; and this he doth, as he conceives, to his own infinite prejudice, knowing how grievous it is to be transmitted as a grievance by the voice of this house; but he doth profess he will rather hazard the safety of his fortune, reputation and himself, than to be the least occasion of any thing that may work disaffection or misunderstanding between the king and his people; and it is his protestation, that whatsoever interpretation is made of his actions, his endeavours shall be, as long as he hath any favour with his gracious master, to take opportunity of doing good offices to this house, and of rendering all that he can be able for the safety of the state, and the general good of the common-wealth. And this he saith you may the easier believe, because his majesty can witness that he hazarded in his father's time the loss of the best affection of the best of masters to obtain for them their desire. In this zeal he was desirous to have appeared unto you ever since the beginning of this parliament, and in this zeal he doth now present himself unto you. But to return to the main point, he, lest we should be mistaken, gave us occasion, in plain words, to remember you, that it is not he that doth refuse to answer, but the lords commanded him not to answer; which he the cheerfullier obeyed, in respect of his fidelity to prefer the universal weal before his own particular; and, in the mean time, he desireth the charitable opinion of this noble house, until he be convinced that he shall appear not worthy of it, which his own innocency maketh him confident that he shall not."

A further Charge against the Duke of Buckingham.

April 27. A new matter was started against the duke of Buckingham, concerning a Plaister and a Posset given to the late king James, in his last sickness. Mr. Glanville made the Report of it from the committee of Examinations into the Duke's conduct: and said, That the sworn physicians had testified before them, that they had agreed upon certain directions in the king's sickness, particularly that he should have neither meat nor drink for some hours before his fit. That upon this and other matters, the committee were of opinion this should be aa-innocency. For as touching the occasions against him, I myself can be a witness to clear him in every one of them. I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent speeches against myself. And now I hope ye will be as tender of my honour, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours."

After which his majesty departed. The king's coming to the house and making this speech, was occasioned by the behaviour of two of the managers for the commons against the duke; who in their Speeches had let fall some expressions, as was reported, that were highly resented by his majesty; and he had accordingly committed them both to the Tower. The consequence of which will fall better in another place.

The Commons desire the Duke of Buckingham may be committed to safe Custody.

The same day a Message came from the commons, brought by sir Nath. Rich and others, which was to this purport:

"The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament; taking into their serious consideration the main mischiefs and inconveniences which this renowned kingdom doth now suffer, threatening apparent danger to the king and commonwealth, have by search and disquisition into the causes thereof, found that they do principally flow from the exorbitant power and abusive carriage of the duke of Buckingham; whereof he hath in this parliament been impeached before their lordships by the commons, besides an accusation of a peer in their own house, who hath charged him (as they are informed) of high treason: They therefore with one voice make an entire declaration, That they hold it a thing of dangerous consequence both for the present and future times, that a man of so great eminence, power, and authority, being impeached and accused of such high crimes and offences, should yet enjoy his liberty, hold so great a part of the strength of the kingdom in his hands, sit as a peer in parliament, and be acquainted with the counsels thereof, whereby inevitable mischief may suddenly fall upon the kingdom. Wherefore they have thought it their duty to recommend this their unanimous desire to their lordships, as agreeable to law and reason, That they would be pleased forthwith to commit the person of the said duke to safe custody."

The Duke of Buckingham's DEFENCE.

The reply the lords made to the messengers was, That they would take their Message into consideration, and return an Answer to it in convenient time. And, after the commons were withdrawn, the duke of Buckingham got up and spake as follows:

"My Lords; If I hold my peace, it will argue guilt, and if I should speak, it may argue boldness; being so foully accused. Your lordships see what complaints are made against me, by the house of commons; how well I stood in their opinions, not long since, your lordships know; and, what I have done since to lose their good opinion, I protest, I know not.—I cannot so distrust my own innocency and heart, which abhors guilt, as to offer to decline any course or court of justice; and, had they not brought my cause to your lordships, I so much trust in the justice and equity of this house, that it should have been my work to have done it. So as in this, only, they have done me a favour, to deliver me out of their hands into your lordships.—And now, my lords, whilst I protest mine innocency, I do not justify myself from all errors, as if I was an angel amongst men; I know, very well, that offices and places of high trust and eminence, may be discharged by men whose abilities are better than the best of mine, and still the management of them may lay open to exceptions.—The king and the state shall have few to serve them, if for their reward of service, if for every particular that may happen in the success of things, or for doing things better than some could wish, for refusing to do all they wish, they shall be given up, in the time of their master's wants, for a grievance, or a sacrifice. But, for this I shall confidently speak, from such crimes as truly deserve punishment from the state, I hope I shall ever prove myself free, either in intention or act. My lords, I speak not this arrogantly; nor will I speak any thing else to cast dirt at those who have taken pains to make me so foul; but, to protest mine innocency, in that measure, which I shall ever hope to prove, nay, am confident of, being before such just judges.—I humbly beseech your lordships to be sensible of me in this point, what dishonour I have sustained, not only at home but abroad; wherefore, I humbly desire your lordships to hasten my trial, as soon as may be, that I may no longer suffer than I must needs; and yet I further desire of your lordships that no such precipitation may be used, as may disadvantage or may prejudice my cause.—And here, my lords, I had a purpose to offer unto your lordships my voluntary absence from this place, even now in the beginning of the handling of my cause; as your lordships may perceive in part, by my former carriage towards the earl of Bristol. For, doubting lest my presence might any way disturb him and put him into passion, or any other way disadvantage him in his cause, I did voluntarily, as your lordships saw, absent myself. But, now that my accusers have, not only, been content to make my process, but to prescribe to your lordships the manner of my judgment, and to judge me before I am heard; I shall not give way, in my own particular, to any of their unjust demands; but yet, I do submit myself in this, and in all things else, to your lordships consideration."

The lords took no further notice of the Message that day; and only ordered, that the eight lords, appointed to report what was delivered by the commons, against the Duke, at the conference, should do it fully and entirely. And, to that end, if they pleased, they were to read the same out of their notes; and it was further agreed that each lord is and ought to report all to the house, not to qualify the same in any part; and that nothing, so spoken and delivered, should be imputed to the reporter. Also, that they might help their memories with the gentlemen of the house of commons, who spoke at that conference.

The Judges forbid by the King to give their Opinions in the Earl of Bristol's Case.

May 13. An order of the house was read, concerning the Judges Opinions, of the two Questions in the Earl of Bristol's Case before-mentioned; whereupon they were called on for that purpose. When the Lord Chief Justice said:

“ May it please your lordships; According to your commands, we appointed a time to have taken into our consideration the two Questions propounded by your lordships, 1st, ‘ Whether in case of treason and of felony the king's testimony is to be admitted? ’ 2ndly, ‘ Whether words spoken to the prince, being afterwards king, made any difference in the case? ’ But, before our meeting, Mr. Attorney General, to whom it belongs, according to the duty of his place, to have an eye of care and vigilancy in cases concerning the king, desired to know the time of our meeting, and we told him accordingly. But, before that time, he brought unto us a message from the king, signifying his pleasure to this effect: That his majesty was resolved, in this and all other causes, to proceed justly and with that moderation as became a just and gracious king. And that his majesty was so sensible of his honour, that he would not suffer the right of his crown, which may justly be preserved, to be diminished in his time. Therefore, his majesty's pleasure was, That in any particular case or question, which may arise in the Cause of the earl of Bristol, and wherein the lords desired our opinions, that, upon mature deliberation, we should deliver the same according to our consciences. His majesty assuring himself, that in all things we will deliver ourselves, with that justice and evenness, between the king and his people, as shall be worthy of our places. That to these general Questions, of which his majesty could not discern the consequence which might happen to the prejudice of his crown, each particular case varying according to circumstances, so as it was very hard and dangerous to give a general rule, according to the latitude of those Questions; his majesty's pleasure was, therefore, that we should forbear to give an answer thereto.”

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AGAINST THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

May 8. The Commons brought up their Articles of Impeachment against the duke of Buckingham, which Articles are as follow:

“ For the speedy redress of great evils and mischiefs, and of the chief cause of these evils and mischiefs, which this kingdom of England now grievously suffereth, and of late years hath suffered, and to the honour and safety of our sovereign lord the king, and of his crown and dignity, and to the good and welfare of his people; the Commons in this present parliament, by the authority of our said sovereign lord the king assembled, do, by this their Bill, shew and declare against George, duke, marquis, and earl of Buckingham, earl of Coventry, viscount Villiers, baron of Whaddon, great admiral of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the principality of Wales, and of the dominions and islands of the same, of the town of Calais, and of the marches of the same, and of Normandy, Gascoigne, and Guienne, general governor of the seas and ships of the said kingdoms, lieutenant general, admiral, captain general and governor of his majesty's royal fleet and army lately set forth, master of the horse of our sovereign lord the king, lord warden, chancellor, and admiral of the cinque ports, and of the members thereof, constable of Dover castle, justice in eyre of all the forests and chases on this side the river of Trent, constable of the castle of Windsor, gentleman of his majesty's bed-chamber, one of his majesty's most honourable privy council in his realms both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and knight of the most honourable order of the garter; the Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences, Crimes, and other matters, comprised in the Articles hereafter following; and him the said duke do accuse and impeach of the said Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences, and Crimes.

Plurality of Offices.

I. “ First, that whereas the great Offices expressed in the said duke's stile and title heretofore have been the singular preferments of several persons eminent in wisdom and trust, and fully able for the weighty service and greatest employment of the state, whereby the said offices were both carefully and sufficiently executed, by several persons of such wisdom, trust, and ability; and others also that were employed by the royal progenitors of our sovereign lord the king, in places of less dignity, were much encouraged with the hopes of advancement; and whereas divers of the said places, severally of themselves, and necessarily, require the whole care, industry, and attendance of a most provident and most able person; he the said duke, being young and unexperienced, hath, of late years, with exorbitant ambition, and for his own profit and advantage, procured and engrossed into his own hands the said several offices, both to the danger of the state, the prejudice of that service which should have been performed in them, and to the great discouragement of others, that, by this procuring and engrossing of the said offices, are precluded from such hopes, as their virtues, abilities, and public employments, might otherwise have given them.

Buying the Admirals Place.

II. “ Whereas, by the laws and statutes of this kingdom of England, if any person what soever give or pay any sum of money, fee, or reward, directly or indirectly, for any office or offices, which in any wise touch or concern the administration or execution of justice, or the keeping of any of the king's majesty's towns, fortresses, or castles, being used, occupied, or appointed for places of strength and defence, the same person is immediately, upon the same fee, money, or reward, given or paid, to be adjudged a disabled person in the law, to all intents and purposes, to have, occupy, and enjoy the said office or offices, for the which he so giveth or payeth any sum of money, fee, or reward; he the said duke did, in or about the month of January, in the 16th year of the late king James, of famous memory, give and pay unto the right hon. Charles then earl of Nottingham, for the office of great admiral of England and Ireland, and the principality of Wales, and office of the general governor of the seas and ships, to the intent that the said duke might obtain the said offices to his own use, the sum of 3,000*l.* of lawful money of England; and did also, about the same time, procure from the said king a further reward, for the surrender of the said office to the said earl, of an annuity of 1,000*l.* by the year, for and during the life of the said earl; and, by the procurement of the said duke, the said king, of famous memory, did, by his letters patents, dated the 27th of Jan. in the said year of his reign, under the great seal of England, grant to the said earl the said annuity, which he the said earl accordingly had and enjoyed during his life; and, by reason of the said sum of money so as aforesaid paid by the said duke, and of his the said duke's procurement of the said annuity, the said earl of Nottingham did, in the same month, surrender unto the said late king, of famous memory, his said offices, and his letters patents of them; and thereupon, and by reason of the premises, the said offices were obtained by the said duke, for his life, from the said king of famous memory, by letters patents made to the said duke of the same offices, under the great seal of England, dated the 28th of Jan. in the said 16th year of the said king, of famous memory: and the said offices of great admiral and governor, as aforesaid, are offices that highly touch and concern the administration and execution of justice, within the provision of the said laws and statutes of this realm; which notwithstanding, the said duke hath unlawfully, ever since the first unlawful obtaining of the said grant of the said offices, retained in his hands, and exercised them, against the laws and statutes aforesaid.

Buying the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports.

III. "The said duke did likewise, in and about the month of December, in the 22nd year of the said late king James, of famous memory, give and pay unto the right hon. Edward late lord Zouch, lord warden of the cinque ports, and of the members thereof, and constable of the castle of Dover, for the said offices, and for the surrender of the said offices of lord warden of the cinque ports and constable of the said castle of Dover, to be made to the said late king, of famous memory, the sum of 1,000*l.* of lawful money of England; and then also granted an annuity of 500*l.* yearly to the said lord Zouch, for the life of the said lord Zouch, to the intent that he the said duke might thereby obtain the said offices to his own use; and for and by reason of the said sum of money so paid by the said duke, and of the annuity so granted to the said Edward lord Zouch, he the said lord Zouch, on the 4th of Dec. in the year aforesaid, did surrender his said office, and his letters patents of them, to the said late king: and thereupon, and by reason of the premises, he the said duke obtained the said offices for his life, of the said late king, by his letters patents under the great seal of England, dated the 6th of Dec. in the aforesaid year. And the said office of lord warden of the cinque-ports, and of the members thereof, is an office that doth highly touch and concern administration and execution of justice; and the said office of constable of the castle of Dover, is an office that highly concerneth the keeping and defence of the town and port of the said castle of Dover, which is, and hath ever been esteemed for a most eminent place of strength and defence of this kingdom; the which notwithstanding, the said duke hath unlawfully ever since the first unlawful obtaining of the said office, retained them in his hands, and exercised them against the laws and statutes aforesaid.

"IV. Whereas the said duke, by reason of his said offices of great admiral of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the principality of Wales, and of the admiral of the cinque ports, and general governor of the seas and ships of the said kingdoms, and by reason of the trust thereto belonging, ought at all times, since the said offices obtained, to have safely guarded, kept, and preserved the said seas and the dominion of them; and ought also, whensoever they wanted either men, ships, munition, or other strength whatsoever, that might conduce to the better safeguard of them, to have used, from time to time, his utmost endeavour for the supply of such wants, to the right honourable the lords and others of the privy council, and by procuring such supply from his sovereign or otherwise: He the said duke hath, ever since the dissolution of the two Treaties mentioned in the act of subsidies of the 21st of the late king James, of famous memory, (that is to say the space of three years last past) neglected the just performance of his said office and duty, and broken the said trust therewith committed unto him; and hath not, according to his said offices, during the time aforesaid, safely kept the said seas: insomuch, that by reason of his neglect and default therein, not only the trade and strength of this kingdom of England hath been, during the said time, much decayed; but the same seas also have been, during the same time, ignominiously staying, but that having heard the motion with much earnestness in the lords house of parliament, he could do no less than give the order they had done; and therefore he willed them to set down the reasons of their suit, which he would acquaint the house withal; yet in the mean time gave them leave to let their said ships and pinnaces fall down as low as Tilbury. And the 10th of March following, an unusual joint action was, by his procurement, entered in the chief court of Admiralty, in the name of the said late king and of the lord admiral, against them, for 15,000*l.* taken piratically by some captains of the said merchant ships, and pretended to be in the hands of the East-India Company; and thereupon the king's advocate, in the name of advocate for the late king and the said lord admiral, moved and obtained one attachment, which, by the serjeant of the said court of Admiralty, was served on the said merchants in their court, the 16th of March following: Whereupon the said merchants, though there was no cause for their molestation by the lord admiral, yet the next day they were urged in the said court of Admiralty to bring in the 15,000*l.* or go to prison. Wherefore immediately the company of the said merchants did again send the deputy aforesaid, and some others, to make new suit unto the said duke, for the release of the said ships and pinnaces; who unjustly endeavouring to extort money from the said merchants, protested, That the ships should not go, except they compounded with him; and when they urged many more reasons for the release of the said ships and pinnaces, the answer of the said duke was, That the then parliament must first be moved. The said merchants therefore being in this perplexity, and in their consultation, the 23d of that month, even ready to give over that trade, yet considering that they should lose more than was demanded by unlading their ships, besides their voyage, they resolved to give the said duke 10,000*l.* for his unjust demands. And he the said duke, by the undue means aforesaid, and under colour of his office, and upon false pretence of rights, unjustly did exact and extort from the said merchants the 10,000*l.* and received the same about the 28th of April following the discharge of those ships, which were not released by him, till they the said merchants had yielded to give him the said duke the 10,000*l.* for the said release, and for the false pretence of rights made by the said duke as aforesaid.

His putting some Ships into the hands of the French.

“ VII. Whereas the Ships of our sovereign lord the king, and of his kingdoms aforesaid, are the principal strength and defence of the said kingdoms, and ought therefore to be always preserved, and safely kept, under the command, and for the service, of our sovereign lord the king, no less than any the fortresses and castles of the said kingdoms: and whereas no subject of this realm ought to be dispossessed of any his goods or chattels without order of justice, or his own consent first duly had and obtained: the said duke, being great admiral of England, governor-general and keeper of the said ships and seas, and who therefore ought to have and take a special and continual care and diligence how to preserve the same; did nevertheless, in or about the end of July last, in the 1st year of our sovereign lord the king, under colour of the said office of great admiral of England, and by indirect and subtle means and practices, procure one of the principal ships of his majesty's navy-royal, called the Vanguard, then under the command of captain John Pennington, and six other merchant ships of great burthen and value, belonging to several persons inhabiting in London, the natural subjects of his majesty, to be conveyed over, with all their ordnance, munition, tackle and apparel, into the ports of the kingdom of France; to the end that, being there, they might the more easily be put into the hands of the French king, his ministers and subjects, and taken into their possession, command and power: and accordingly the said duke, by his ministers and agents, with menaces, and other ill means and practices, did there, without order of justice, and without the consent of the said masters and owners, unduly compel and enforce the said masters and owners of the said six merchant-ships, to deliver the said ships into the said possession, command and power of the said French king, his ministers and subjects: and by reason of his compulsion, and under the pretext of his power as aforesaid, and by his indirect practices as aforesaid, the said ships aforesaid, as well the said ship royal of his majesty as the others belonging to the said merchants, were there delivered into the hands and command of the said French king, his ministers and subjects, without either sufficient security or assurance for re-delivery, or other necessary caution in that behalf taken and provided, either by the said duke himself, or otherwise by his direction; contrary to the duty of the said offices of great admiral, governor-general, and keeper of the said ships and seas, and to the faith and trust in that behalf reposed, and contrary to the duty which he oweth to our sovereign lord the king in his place of privy-counsellor; to the apparent weakening of the naval strength of this kingdom, to the great loss and prejudice of the said merchants, and against the liberty of those subjects of our sovereign lord the king that are under the jurisdiction of the admiralty.

His practice for the employment of them against Rochelle.

“ VIII. The said duke, contrary to the purpose of our sovereign lord the king, and his majesty's known zeal for the maintenance and advancement of the true religion established in the Church of England, knowing that the said ships were intended to be employed by the said French king against those of the same religion at Rochelle, and elsewhere, in the kingdom of France, did procure the said ship royal, and compel, as aforesaid, the said six other ships to be delivered unto the said French king, his ministers and subjects, as aforesaid; to the end the said ships might be used and employed, by the said French king, in his intended war against those of the said religion in the said town of Rochelle, and elsewhere within the kingdom of France: and the said ships were, and have been since, so used and employed by the said French king, his ministers and subjects, against them. And thus the said duke did, as aforesaid, in great and most apparent prejudice of the said religion, contrary to the purpose and intention of our sovereign lord the king, and against his duty in that behalf, being sworn counsellor to his majesty, and to the great scandal and dishonour of this nation. And notwithstanding the delivery of the said ships by his procurement and compulsion, as aforesaid, to be employed, as aforesaid, the said duke, in cunning and cautelous manner, to mask his ill intentions, did, at the parliament held at Oxford in August last, before the committee of both houses of parliament, intimate and declare, that the said ships were not, nor should they be so used and employed against those of the said religion, as aforesaid; in contempt of our sovereign lord the king, and in abuse of the said houses of parliament, and in violation of that truth which every man should profess.

“IX. Whereas the Titles of Honour of this kingdom of England were wont to be conferred, as great rewards, upon such virtuous and industrious persons as had merited them by their faithful service; the said duke, by his importunate and subtle procurement, hath not only perverted that antient and honourable way, but also unduly, for his own particular gain, he hath enforced some that were rich (though unwilling) to purchase honour; as the lord Roberts, baron of Truro, who, by practice of the said duke and his agents, was drawn up to London, in or about October in the 22nd year of the reign of the late king James of famous memory, and there so threatened and dealt withal, that by reason thereof he yielded to give, and accordingly did pay the sum of 10,000*l.* to the said duke, and to his use; for which said sum, the said duke in the month of Jan. in the 22nd year of the said late king, procured the title of baron Roberts of Truro, to the said lord Roberts. In which practice, as the said lord Roberts was much wronged in this particular, so the example thereof tendeth to the prejudice of the gentry, and dishonour of the nobility of this kingdom.

His selling Places of Judicature.

“X. Whereas, no Place of Judicature in the courts of justice of our sovereign lord the king, nor other like preferments given by the kings of this realm, ought to be procured by any subject whatsoever for any reward, bribe, or gift; he the said duke in or about the month of Dec. in the 18th year of the reign of the late king James of famous memory, did procure of the said king, the office of high treasurer of England to the lord viscount Mandeville, now earl of Manchester; which office, at his procurement, was given and granted accordingly to the lord viscount Mandeville: and, as a reward for the said procurement of the same grant, he the said duke did then receive to his own use, of and from the said lord viscount Mandeville, the sum of 20,000*l.* of lawful money of England. And also in or about the month of Jan. in the 16th year of the reign of the said late king, did procure of the said late king of famous memory, the office of master of the wards and liveries to and for sir L. Cranfield afterwards earl of Middlesex, which office was, upon the same procurement, given and granted to the said sir L. Cranfield: and, as a reward for the same procurement, he, the said duke, had, to his own use, or to the use of some other person by him appointed, of the said sir L. Cranfield, the sum of 6,000*l.* of lawful money of England, contrary to the dignity of our sovereign lord the king, and against the duty that should have been performed by the said duke unto him.*

His procuring Honours for his poor Kindred.

“XI. That he the said duke hath, within these ten years last past, procured divers Titles of Honour to his mother, brothers, kindred and allies; as, the title of countess of Buckingham to his mother, while she was sir Tho. Compton's wife; the title of earl of Anglesey to his younger brother, Christ. Villiers; the titles of baron of Newnham Padocks, viscount Fielding, and earl of Denbigh, to his sister's husband, sir Wm. Fielding; the titles of baron of Stok and viscount Purbeck, to sir John Villiers, elder brother unto the said duke; and divers more of the like kind to his kindred and allies; whereby the noble barons of England, so well deserving in themselves, and in their ancestors, have been much prejudiced, and the crown disabled to reward extraordinary virtues in future times with honour, while the poor estates of those for whom such unnecessary advancement hath been procured, are apparently likely to be more and more burthensome to the king, notwithstanding such annuities, pensions, and grants of lands annexed to the crown, of great value, which the said duke hath procured for those his kindred, to support these their dignities.”

His exhausting, intercepting, and misemploying the King's Revenue.

“XII. He the said duke, not contented with the great advancement formerly received from the late king, of famous memory, did, by his procurement and practice, in the 14th year of the said king, for the support of the many places, honours and dignities conferred on him, obtain a grant of divers manors, parcel of the revenue of the crown, and of the duchy of Lancaster, to the yearly value of 1,697*l.* 2*s.* 0*d.* of old rent with all woods, timber, trees, and advowsons; part whereof, amounting to the annual sum of 747*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was rated at the sum of only 820*l.* though, in truth, of so far greater value. And likewise, in the 16th year of the same king's reign, did procure divers other manors, annexed to the crown, of the yearly value, at the old rent, of 1,338*l.* or thereabouts, according as in a schedule hereunto annexed appeareth. In the warrant for passing of which lands, he, by his great favour, procured divers unusual clauses to be inserted, viz. That no perquisites of courts should be valued, and that all bailiff-fees should be reprised in the particulars upon which those lands were rated; whereby a precedent hath been introduced, which all those who, since that time, have obtained any lands from the crown, have pursued to the damage of his late majesty and of our sovereign lord the king that now is, to an exceeding great value. And afterwards he surrendered to his said majesty divers manors and lands, parcel of those lands formerly granted unto him, to the value of 723*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* per annum; in consideration of which surrender, he procured divers other lands of the said late king to be sold and contracted for, by his own servants and agents, and thereupon hath obtained grants of the same to pass from his late majesty to several persons of this kingdom; and hath caused tallies to be stricken for the money, being the consideration mentioned in those grants in the receipt of the exchequer, as if such monies had really come to his majesty's coffers; whereas the duke (or some other by his appointment) hath indeed received the same sums, and expended them upon his own occasions. And notwithstanding the great and inestimable gain made by him, by the sale of offices, honours, and by other suits by him obtained from his majesty, and for the countenancing of divers projects, and other courses, burthensome to his majesty's realms, both of England and Ireland; the said duke hath likewise, by his procurement and practice, received into his hands, and disbursed to his own use, exceeding great sums that were the monies of the late king, of famous memory, as appeareth also in the said schedule hereunto annexed; and, the better to colour his doings in that behalf, hath obtained several privy-seals from his late majesty and his majesty that now is, warranting the payment of great sums to persons by him named, causing it to be recited in such privy-seals, as if those sums were directed for secret services concerning the state, which were, notwithstanding, disposed of to his own use; and other privy-seals have been procured by him for the discharge of those persons without account; and by the like fraud and practice, under colour of free gifts from his majesty, he hath gotten into his hands great sums which were intended by his majesty to be disbursed for the preparing, furnishing and victualling of his royal navy; by which secret and colourable devices the constant and ordinary course of the exchequer hath been broken, there being no means, by matter of record, to charge either the treasurer or victualler of the navy with those sums which ought to have come to their hands, and to be accounted for to his majesty: and such a confusion and mixture hath been made between the king's estates and the duke's, as cannot be cleared by the legal entries and records, which ought to be truly and faithfully made and kept, both for the safety of his majesty's treasure, and for the indemnity of his officers and subjects whom it doth concern. And also in the 16th and 20th years of the said king, he did procure to himself several releases from the said king, of divers great sums of money of the said king by him privately received, and which he procured, that he might detain the same for the support of his places, honours, and dignities. And these things, and divers others of the like kind, as appeareth in the schedule annexed, hath he done, to the exceeding diminution of the revenue of the crown, and in deceit both of our sovereign lord the king that now is, and of the late king James, of famous memory, and to the detriment of the whole kingdom.

His transcendent Presumption in giving Physic to the King.

“XIII. Whereas special care and order hath been taken by the laws of the realm, to restrain and prevent the unskilful administration of physic, whereby the health and life of man be much endangered: and whereas most especially, the royal persons of the kings of the realm, in whom we their loyal subjects humbly challenge a great interest, are, and always have been esteemed by us, so sacred, that nothing ought to be prepared for them, or administered unto them, in the way of physic or diet, in the times of their sickness, without the consent and direction of some of their sworn physicians, apothecaries, or surgeons: and the boldness of such (how near soever to them in place and favour) who have forgotten their duties so far as to presume to offer any thing unto them beyond their experience, hath been always ranked in the number of high offences and misdemeanors. And whereas the sworn physicians of our late sovereign lord king James, of blessed memory, attending on his majesty in the month of March, in the 22nd year of his most glorious reign, in the times of his sickness, being an ague, did, in due and necessary care of, and for the recovery of his health, and preservation of his person, upon and after several mature consultations in that behalf had and holden, at several times in the same month, resolve and give directions, that nothing should be applied or given unto his highness, by way of physic or diet, during his said sickness, but by and upon their general advice and consents, and after good deliberation thereof first had; more especially by their like care, and upon like consultations, did justly resolve, and pub-

Conclusion.

“ And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said duke, and also of replying to the Answers that the said duke shall make unto the said Articles or to any of them, and of offering further proof also of the premisses, or of any of them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray, that the said duke may be put to answer all and every the premisses; and that such proceeding, examination, trial and judgment, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.”

REPORT OF THE CONFERENCE TOUCHING THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

The above Articles were delivered by the commons to the lords at a Conference of both houses, which spun out two days time. It was managed by eight members, and sixteen more as assistants. The eight chief Managers were sir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Pym, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Wandesford, and sir John Elliot.

Sir Dudley Diggs, by way of prologue, made this speech;

“ My Lords; There are so many things of great importance to be said in very little time to-day, that I conceive it will not be unacceptable to your lordships, if (setting by all rhetorical affectations) I only in plain country lan-king his successor for dissolving that parliament, to preserve one that was accused by them for poisoning his father.”

“ Dr. Eglisbam, one of the king's physicians, was obliged to flee beyond seas for some expressions he had muttered about the manner of his majesty's death, and lived at Brussels many years after. It was there he published a Book, to prove king James was poisoned; giving a particular account of all the circumstances of his sickness, and laying his death upon the duke of Buckingham and his mother. I have read the book some 15 years ago in the hands of Don Pedro Ronkillor, the Spanish ambassador, who told me it had been translated into High-Dutch, about the time Gustavus Adolphus was entering into Germany for recovering of the Palatinate: and that by a secret order of the court of Brussels, to throw dirt upon the royal family of England. Among other remarkable passages I remember in the Book, there is one about the Plaister that was applied to the king's stomach. He says, It was given out to have been mithridate, and that one Dr. Remington had sent it to the duke, as a medicine with which he had cured a great many of agues in Essex. Now Eglisbam denies it was mithridate, and says, Neither he nor any other physicians could tell what it was. He adds, That sir Matthew Lister and he being guage, humbly pray your lordships favour to include many excuses necessary to my manifold infirmities, in this one word, I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons house, to present to your lordships their most affectionate thanks for your ready condescending to this Conference; which, out of confidence in your great wisdoms, and approved justice, for the service of his majesty, and the welfare of this realm, they desired upon this occasion.

“ The House of Commons, by a fatal and universal concurrence of Complaints, from all the sea-bordering parts of this kingdom, did find a great and grievous interruption, and stop of Trade and Traffic; the base pirates of Sally ignominiously infesting our coasts, taking our ships and goods, and leading away the subjects of this kingdom into barbarous captivity; while, to our shame and hinderance of commerce, our enemies did (as it were) besiege our ports, and block up our best rivers mouths. Our friends, on slight pretences, made embargoes of our merchants goods, and every nation (upon the least occasion) was ready to contemn and slight us. So great was the apparent diminution of the antient honour of this crown, and once strong reputation of our nation. Wherewith the Commons were more troubled, calling to remembrance, how formerly, in France, in Spain, in Holland, and every where by sea and land, the valours of this kingdom had been better valued, and even in latter times, within remembrance, when we had no the week after the king's death at the earl of Warwick's house in Essex, they sent for Dr. Remington, who lived hard by, and asking him, What kind of Plaister it was he had sent to Buckingham for the cure of an ague, and whether he knew it was the king the duke designed it for? Remington answered, That one Baker, a servant of the duke's, came to him in his master's name, and desired him, if he had any certain specific remedy against an ague, to send it him; and accordingly he sent him mithridate spread upon leather, but knew not till then that it was designed for the king. But, continues Eglisbam, sir Matthew Lister and I shewing him a piece of the Plaister we had kept after it was taken off, he seemed greatly surprised, and offered to take his corporal oath, that it was none of what he had given Baker; nor did he know what kind of mixture it was.—But the truth is, this Book of Eglisbam's is wrote with such an air of rancour and prejudice, that the manner of his narrative takes off much from the credit of what he writes.”

Other curious circumstances concerning king James's death are reported by Wilson. Howell says in a letter written apparently about a fortnight after the king's death (the printed date, 11 Dec. 1625, is clearly wrong) “ He died of a fever which Legan with an ague, and some Scotch doctors mutter at a Plaister the countess of Buckingham applied at the outside of his stomach.”

(long may he live to our comfort, and the good of the Christian World) and also his blessed father, who is dead; on whom, to the grief of the Commons, and their great distaste, the lord duke did (they conceive) unworthily cast some ill odour of his own foul ways; whereas servants were antiently wont to bear, as in truth they ought, their master's faults, and not cast their own on them undeservedly. It is well known, the king (who is with God) had the same power, and the same wisdom, before he knew this Duke, yea, and the same affections too; through which (as a good and gracious master) he advanced and raised some stars of your lordships firmament; in whose hands, this exorbitancy of will, this transcendancy of power, such placing and displacing of officers, such irregular running into all by-courses of the planets, such sole and single managing of the great affairs of state, was never heard of.

“ And therefore, only to the lord duke, and his procurement, by mis-informations, these faults complained of by the Commons, are to be imputed.

“ And for our most gracious sovereign that lives, whose name hath been used, and may perhaps now be for the Duke's justification, the Commons know well, that among his majesty's most royal virtues, his piety unto his father hath made him a pious nourisher of his affections ever to the lord duke, on whom, out of that consideration, his majesty hath wrought a kind of wonder, making favour hereditary, but the abuse thereof must be the lord duke's own: and if there have been any commands, such as were, or may be pretended, his mis-informations have procured them; whereas the laws of England teach us, That kings cannot command ill or unlawful things, whenever they speak, though by their Letters Patents, or their Seals. If the things be evil, these Letters Patents are void, and whatsoever ill event succeeds, the executors of such commands must ever answer for them.—Thus, my lords, in performance of my duty, my weakness hath been troublesome unto your lordships; it is now high time humbly to intreat your pardon, and give way to a learned gentleman to begin a more particular Charge.

The First, Second, and Third Articles enlarged by Mr. Herbert.

Then were read the First, Second, and Third Articles, see p. 1308.

These three Articles were discoursed upon by Mr. Herbert, and touching Plurality of Offices, he observed, That in that vast power of the duke (a young experienced man) there is an unfortunate complication of danger and mischief to the state, as having too much ability, if he be false, to do harm, and ruin the kingdom; and if he be faithful, and never so industrious, yet divided amongst so many great Places (whereof every one would employ the industry of an able and provident man) there must needs be in him an insufficiency of performance, or rather an impossibility, especially considering his necessary attendance likewise upon his court places.

To the Second and Third, namely, ‘The buying the Office of Admiralty and Cinque-Ports,’ (both which he comprised in one) he said, That to set a price upon the walls and gates of the kingdom, is a crime which requires rather a speedy remedy than an aggravation, and is against the express law of 5 Edw. 6, upon this foundation, ‘That the buying of such Places doth necessarily introduce corrupt and insufficient officers.’ And in the parliament of 12 Edw. 4, it is declared by the whole assembly, ‘That they who buy those Places’ (these are the express words) ‘bind themselves to be Extortioners and Offenders;’ as if they did lay an obligation upon themselves to sell again. And though the buying of such Places be not against any particular law, enjoining a penalty for them (the breach whereof is a particular offence) yet as far as they subvert the good, and welfare, and safety of the people, so far they are against the highest law, and assume the nature of the highest offences.

The Fourth Article enlarged by Mr. Selden.

Then were read the Fourth and Fifth Articles; these were enlarged by Mr. Selden, who said, “ That by nature of his Office the duke as Admiral ought to have guarded the Seas: by his Patent he is made ‘Magnus Admirallus Angliæ, Hiberniæ, et Walliæ, Normaniæ, Aquitanæ, Villæ Calesii et Marchiarum ejusdem, et Præfectus generalis Classium Marium dictorum regnorum.’ The seas of England and Ireland are committed to the Admiral, as a part of the demesne and possessions of the crown of England; not as if he should thereby have jurisdiction only, as in case of the admirals in France or Spain. The state of Genoa, Catalonia, and other maritime parts of Spain, the sea-town of Almain, Zealand, Holland, Friesland, Denmark, Norway, and divers other parts of the empire, shew, that the kings of England, by reason that their said realm hath used, time out of mind, to be in peaceable possession, are lords of the seas of England, and of the islands belonging to them. And although Grotius that Hollander wrote of purpose to destroy all Dominion in the East-Ocean; yet he speaks nothing against the Dominion of our English Seas, howsoever he hath been misapprehended; but expressly elsewhere saith, ‘Meta Britannicis littora sunt oris;’ the utmost limits of the demesne of the crown of England, are the shores of the neighbouring countries; the whole sea, or the Territorium Maximum that intervenes, being parcel of the possession of the crown: the keeping and safe-guard of these committed to the lord admiral by the name of the ‘Præfectus Marium et Admirallus,’ being but the same antiently: before the use of the word Admiral came in, which was under Edw. 1, the Admiral had the titles of Custodes Maris. And this Prefectura or Custodia, or office of safe-guarding the seas, open with as much brevity and perspicuity as I may: The substance of several cases concerning the same; the evidence to make them good, together with such observations as naturally arise out of the matter; whereby your lordships may the better discern wherein the duke's faults do consist, and what punishment may be answerable to such offences.

"The Sixth Article is a distinct charge, different from the other two; wherefore I will handle it, with the incidents thereof, by itself. The Seventh and Eighth Articles being of one nature and subject, are indeed several parts of one charge, rather than several charges, and have such a connection in themselves, that, with your lordships leaves, I will handle them both together without dividing them, which I hold will be the shortest and fittest way to do right to the cause, and to your lordships.

"The Sixth Article giveth me occasion, my lords, thus to enlarge myself. In a Treaty the 18th of August 1604, between our late sovereign king James of glorious memory, and Philip 3, king of Spain, it was agreed, That there should be perfect amity and peace to endure for ever by land, sea, and fresh-waters, between these kings, their heirs and successors, their dominions, liege-men and subjects, then being, or which should be; And that either party should then after abstain from all depredations, offences and spoils, by sea, land, and fresh-waters, in what dominions or government soever of the other, and should cause restitution to be made of all depredations which then after should be committed, and the damages growing by means thereof; and that the said kings shall take care that their subjects should from thence abstain from all force and wrong doing, and that they likewise should revoke all commissions and letters-patents of reprisal or mart, or otherwise, containing licence to take prizes; all which are declared by the said Treaty itself to be void, and that whosoever should do any thing contrary should be punished not only criminally, according to the merit of his offence, but should also be compelled to make restitution and satisfaction for the losses to the parties damaged, requiring the same. Lastly, it was concluded, That between them and every of their subjects might be free commerce in all the dominions by sea, land, and fresh-waters, in which before the wars, there hath been commerce, and according to the use and observance of the ancient leagues and treaties before the wars, the customs as they were at that present rated according to the ordinance of the places being paid.

"This Treaty being settled and continuing, his late majesty king James by his highness letters patents bearing date the 14th of Sept. an. 13, of his reign, did grant unto the governors of the merchants of London trading into the East-Indies, and to their successors, in case they be justly provoked or driven thereunto, in defence of their persons, goods or ships, by any disturbance or hinderance in their quiet course of trade, or for recompence or recovery of the persons, ships or goods of any of his majesty's subjects that had been formerly in, or near the East-Indies, or for any other just cause of their defence, or recompence of losses sustained; That then the captains or principal commanders of the said Company, or any other under their government, should or might attempt, surprise, or take the persons, ships, and goods of any prince or state, by whose subjects they should sustain any wrong or loss in manner as aforesaid, as by the said letters-patents appeareth: Some years after the granting of these letters-patents, under pretext that the said Treaty was broken, there was some interruption and violence offered by the king of Spain's subjects in the ports of East-India to the merchants of the East-India Company trading into those parts, whereby they were much damaged; and thereupon suspecting that it might be in vain to complain for redress in an ordinary course of justice in the East-India, or in default thereof to return into Spain to make complaint to that purpose, where nothing was likely to be done till they had sent from thence again into the East-Indies, and received an answer; and after all this, upon denial of justice in Spain, to come into this kingdom for letters of request, without which in ordinary course they should not use reprisal, and many years would be spent before they could come to have an end of their suits; It is true, that thereupon, partly in their defence, and partly for amends, and partly for revenge, they did by pretext of the said letters-patents take some goods of the Portugals in the East-Indies, subjects to the king of Spain; and afterwards being commanded by the king of Persia to transport certain forces of his in Ormus, an island situate in the country of Persia, some goods of Portugals subjects to the king of Spain were there taken by captain Blith and captain Wedell, and others of their Company, being servants and in pay under the East-India Company.

"In July 1623, two ships called the Lyon and the Jonas, being part of a fleet belonging to the said Company, returned from Ormus aforesaid out of an East-Indian voyage, and arrived in the Downs richly laden with goods and merchandise lawfully belonging to the said Company, and estimated to the value of 100,000*l.* The duke of Buckingham, in or about Oct. 1623, being advertised thereof, well knowing the Company to be rich, and apprehending in himself a probable ground how he might exact and extort some great sum of money from the said Company out of the profit of these ships and their lading, by colour of his office of Lord Admiral of England, and out of his power and greatness, his office being used for a groundwork of his design therein, did thereupon pretend, that the lading of the said ships was for the most part with goods piratically taken at sea in the parts about Ormus aforesaid, and that a tenth part, or some other great share thereof, did belong to him in the right of his said office of Lord Great Admiral of England, and by virtue of his letters-patents and grant from his late majesty in that behalf; alledging withal, howsoever the said Company might peradventure answer the matter, yet there would and might be strong opposition against them. These words were used to possess them with fear, and to make them stand in awe of his power, when he should come afterwards particularly to press them to yield to his unjust demands. Having once resolved of his ends, which was to get money, he thus proceeded to effect the same. In the months of Nov. Dec. Jan. and Feb. then next following, he had divers times treaties by himself and his agents with the then governor and others of the said Company, for the effecting of his said designs; wherein he still unlawfully pretended that a tenth part, or some other great share, out of the lading of the said ships, belonged unto him; albeit the said Company upon right information of their cause to their council, both civilians and common-lawyers, were advised that there did no tenths or other such shares belong to the said duke, as he pretended.

“ And whereas the said duke by this time finding that he could not prevail to get his ends by any fair course, continued yet resolute to make his gain upon the Company by right or wrong, as he might; and to that purpose made use of the following opportunities and advantages; in such cunning and abusive manner as I shall further open to your lordships. The said duke well knowing that the said Company had then four ships, called the Great James, the Jonas, the Star, and the Eagle, and two pinnaces called the Spy and the Scout, the said ships and pinnaces, with their victuals, store and ordnance, were of the value of 54,000*l.* and more, laden with lead, cloth, and other merchandize in them to the value of 20,000*l.* and more, and having in them also about 30,000*l.* in rials of Spanish money; in all, 100,000*l.* and more.

“ These ships and pinnaces were well near ready to set sail for a voyage into the East-Indies by the first day of March, in the 21st year of his said late majesty's reign; and he well-knowing how great a hindrance it would be to the said Company, if the said ships and pinnaces should be stayed for any long time, the rather in regard if they did not set sail about that time of the year, or within twenty days after, they had utterly lost their voyage for that year; the reason whereof dependeth upon a secret of winds, called the Marsounds, which are constantly six months easterly, and six months westerly, every year at their set times, in those parts of Africa, about the Cape of Bona Speranza; (for of those winds, all ships going hence into the East-Indies, are to make their use, in the usual and due time; which yet cannot be done, if men take not their opportunity by coming to the Cape in their proper and due season, and in so long and dangerous a voyage, wherein the Equinoctial Line is twice to be passed, it is no good discretion to stay the utmost time in going from hence, in confidence of fair winds, but rather to take time enough before-hand, for fear of the contrary: Nor can the lord admiral of England, who is custos marium domini regis, and hath jurisdiction of all foreign parts, super altum mare, be admitted to pretend himself ignorant of this secret, or of any other particulars belonging to the seas and voyages. The duke therefore apprehending, and well weighing how great a hindrance, or rather what an absolute loss it would be to the Company, if these their ships and pinnaces of so great value, and bound forth in so instant and difficult a voyage, should be stayed for any long time, now they were ready to set sail, and the season of going upon point to expire: The said duke upon the said first day of March, 1623, to effect his designs upon the said Company, and to get that by circumvention and surprisal, which in a legal and due course of justice he had not hopes to obtain: Not thinking it sufficient, that the sense of his displeasure lying over the Company as an ominous cloud threatening a storm, if they did not appease him by some great sacrifice; and to cast them yet further into a farther strait, not sparing to abuse your lordships in parliament, by making you unwilling instruments to give colour and advantage to his secret and unlawful practise. Upon the said first day of March, he put your lordships, sitting in parliament, in mind, touching the great business likely to ensue upon dissolution of the then treaties with Spain, and that a speedy resolution thereof was necessarily required, for that the enemy would pretermitt no time; and if we should lose the benefit of that spring, he said it would be irrevocable; and thereupon he took occasion to move that house, whether he should make stay of any shipping that were then in the ports, as being high admiral he might, and namely, the said ships prepared for the East-India voyage, which were of great burthen, well furnished, and fit to guard our own coasts: Which motion was generally approved of the whole house, knowing nothing of the duke's secret designs and private intentions. And the same day a motion was made amongst the commons in parliament to the same effect, by sir Edward Seymour, kt. the vice-admiral to the duke of the county of Devon; which in respect of the time when, and person by whom it was propounded, is very suspicious, that it issued all from one spirit, and that he was set on by the duke, or some of his agents; the truth whereof, your lordships may be pleased to search out and examine as you shall see cause. By colour of this Order of the lords house of parliament, the duke caused John Pexal marshal of the Admiralty, to make stay to be made of the said ships and pinnaces; howbeit notwithstanding all the occasion pretended for the defence of the realm, there were not any other ships staid at this time.

“ The Company perceiving, by the course of things, from whence these evils moved, upon the 5th of March, 1623, became earnest suitors to the said duke for a releaseiment of their said ships and pinnaces; whereunto the said duke replied, That he had not been the cause of their stay: but having heard the motion in the lords house, he could do no less than order as they had done: Yet to attain his ends, and put them in some hope of favour by his means; he told them withal, That he had something in his pocket might do them good, and willed them to set down what reasons they would for their suit, and he would acquaint the house therewith: Nevertheless about this time he presumed of himself at Theobalds, to give leave for the ships and pinnaces to fall down as far as Tilbury, there to attend such further directions as should be given unto them, with leave so to signify by word of mouth to the serjeant of the Admiralty, for that the duke had then no secretary with him. Thus somewhile by threatening of strong oppositions and terrors, and otherwhile by intimating hopes of favour, and good assistance, the duke sought to accomplish his purpose, yet prevailed not; and so the 10th of March, 1623, the king's advocate Dr. Reeves, advocate for the king and lord-admiral, made allegation in the Admiralty on the duke's behalf; and by his procurements, that it appeared by examinations there taken, that 15,000*l.* and more, piratically taken by the said Captain Blith and Wedel, and their complices, upon the sea near Ormus, and in other parts within the jurisdictions of the Admiralty, was come into the possession of the treasurers of the East-India Company, and remained in their hands, and prayed it might be attached; and the said treasurers be monished to appear the Wednesday then next following, and there to bring in the 15,000*l.* to remain in deposit with the register of that court.

“The same 10th of March, a Warrant issued forth accordingly directed to the marshal of the said court; and upon the same next Wednesday, the 17th of March, the said warrant was returned by the said marshal, that the day before he had attached the said monies in the hands of Mr. Stone, then present in the court, and had admonished him, and Mr. Abbot, the deputy-governor of that Company, and divers others then present, to bring the same into court. Upon the same Wednesday also, it was prayed by the king's advocate, That Mr. Stone, and all that had an interest in this money, might be pronounced as in contumacy, and therefore be arrested and detained until 15,000*l.* were brought into the register. Hereupon sentence of contumacy was pronounced, but the payment thereof was respited until Friday following. Upon which 17th of March, this sentence being pronounced, Mr. Stone, Mr. Abdy, and others, officers of the said Company, then present, informed how the Governor was lately dead, and buried but the day before; and that upon Wednesday then next following, they had appointed a Court for Election of a new Governor, and until then they could resolve of nothing, and therefore desired further respite. The Advocate nothing relenting at this reasonable excuse, and desire of the Company, did again earnestly press their imprisonments, but the judge took time to consider of it. The Company finding by these extraordinary and extreme courses, the drift of the duke, whose greatness and power seemed irresistible, and his mind implacable, without satisfaction to his own content, and withal observing what a strait they were cast into, by reason of the stay of their ships; which, if it were much longer, they must needs lose their voyage utterly for this year, and the very unloading of them would endamage them to the value of the sum extorted: And being told, that the eye of the state was upon this business, and that it would light heavy upon them; and hearing the duke protest, their ships should not go, unless they compounded with him; and finding that he made difficulty of releasing their ships, by saying, The parliament must be moved, before they could be discharged, albeit the wind were now fair for them. And making overture of some reasonable grounds of composition, by offering to grant letters of mart to the said Company for the future, against the subjects of the king of Spain, while yet the peace and treaty between his late majesty and the king of Spain, were not broken or dissolved.

“The said Company being intangled by the duke's subtilty, and overcome at last by the terror of his power and greatness, was drawn to make offer of 6,000*l.* to the said duke, which was rejected as a base offer. And now the time pressing them on very hard, some consultations were had amongst them, Whether it were better for them to make use of a clause in their patent, allowing them three years to draw home their estates, and so to let their Company die, and be dissolved, or else to yield to the duke's desire: yet in conclusion, they were drawn in to offer him 10,000*l.* for their peace, if it could serve; which offer was made unto him accordingly, but at first he would not accept it; howbeit, about the 23rd of March, 1623, they agreed to give him the said 10,000*l.* which he accepted; and forthwith moving the lords of parliament, or acquainting them therewith, he retracted their ships, and gave them leave to depart on their voyage; which they accordingly did, setting sail the 27th day of the same month from the Downs. And afterwards upon the 5th of April, 1624, the duke signified unto the lords house of parliament, That his majesty, at the humble petition of the East India Company, had commanded him to discharge the East India ships, which he had once stayed, according to the order of this house, made the 1st day of March then last past; and moved, That the said order might be countermanded: and thereupon it was ordered, That the clerk of that house should cross the said order of the 1st of March out of his book, which was done accordingly; and afterwards the said 10,000*l.* was paid unto the said duke; which he received and accepted accordingly. And upon the 28th day of April aforesaid, suffered a colourable sentence in the Admiralty to be given against him for their discharge, in such sort, as by the were true, That the goods, whereof he claims his share, were piratically taken. From which allegation, as he may not now recede, so it is clear by reason and authority, That of such goods, no part or share whatsoever is due to the Lord Admiral, in right of his office, or otherways.

“ For that the parties from whom the same were taken, ought to have restitution, demanding it in due and reasonable time; and it were an injury to the intercourse and law of nations, if the contrary should be any way tolerated.

“ 2. By law; so are the statutes of this kingdom, and more especially in 27 Edw. 3, 13. whereby it was provided, That if any merchant, privy or stranger, be robbed of his goods upon the sea, and the same came afterwards into this realm, the owner shall be received to prove such goods to be his, and upon proof thereof, shall have the same restored to him again.

“ Likewise 1, 2, 3 Edw. 6, 18, in the act of parliament, touching sir Thomas Seymour, great admiral of England,* who therein amongst divers other things, is charged with this, That he had taken to his own use goods piratically taken against the law, whereby he moved almost all Christian princes to conceive a grudge and displeasure, and by open war to seek remedy by their own hands: and therefore for this amongst other things, he was attainted of High Treason, as appeareth by that act, wherein the law is so declared to be as before is expressed.

“ But if it should be admitted, that the Duke had right in this case, for which he might compound; yet the manner of his seeking to try and recover his right, is, in itself, an high offence, and clearly unlawful in many respects, whereof I will touch but a few: as, in making the most honourable house of parliament an instrument to effect his private ends for his profit: in proceedings to arrest and stay the ships of men not apt to fly, but well able to answer and satisfy any just suits which he might have against them though their ships had gone on in their voyage: in prosecuting things so unseasonably, and urging them so extremely by his advocate, for bringing in of so great a sum of money upon the sudden, and formally under colour of justice and service for the state: in reducing that Company into that strait and necessity, that it was as good for them to compound, though the duke had no title, as to defend their own just right against him upon these disadvantages, which by his power and industry he had put upon them.”

Then he read the Seventh and Eighth Articles, which he handled jointly, as being not two Charges, but two several parts of one and the same Charge; and when he had read them, he went on speaking further to their lordships, as followeth:

* See vol. 1. p. 489.

“ Your lordships may have observed, how in handling the former Articles, I have in my discourse used the method of time, which I hold to be best for the discovery of the truth: I shall therefore by your lordships patience, whereof now I have had some good experience, use the like order in my enlargement upon the latter Articles; touching which, that which I have to say, is thus:

“ In or about the 22d year of the reign of our late dear sovereign lord, king James, of famous memory, there being then a treaty between our said late sovereign and the French king, for a Marriage to be had between our then most noble prince now our most gracious king, and the French king's sister, now our queen, and for entering in'o an active war against the king of Spain, and his allies in Italy, and the Valtoline. Our said late sovereign passed some promise to the French king's ambassador here, the marquis D'Effiat, for procuring, or lending some ships to be employed by the French in that service, upon reasonable conditions; but without thought or intent that they should be employed against the Rochellers, or any others of our religion in France: for it was pretended by the French king's ministers to our king, That the said ships should be employed particularly against Genoua, and not otherwise. But afterwards some matter of suspicion breaking forth from those of our religion in France, that the design for Italy was but the pretence to make a body of an army fall upon the Rochellers, or other of our religion in that kingdom; the king grew so cautious in his conditions, that as he would perform his promise to lend his ships, so to preserve those of our religion, he contracted or gave directions, that the greatest part of the men in the same ships should be English, whereby the power of them should be ever in his hands.

“ And the duke of Buckingham, then, and yet, lord great admiral of England, well knowing all this to be true, pretended he was and would be very careful, and proceed with art, to keep the said ships in the hands of our king, and upon our own coasts, and yet nevertheless underhand he unduly intended, practised and endeavoured the contrary: for afterwards by his direction or procurement, in or about the 29d year aforesaid, a ship of his majesty's called the Vanguard, being of his majesty's royal navy, was allotted and appointed to be made ready for the service of the French king, and seven other merchant's ships of great burthen and strength belonging to several persons, natural subjects of our said late sovereign lord, were by the duke's direction impressed as for the service of his said late majesty, and willed to make themselves ready accordingly. The names and tunnage of the said seven merchant ships were as followeth. 1. The Great Neptune, whereof sir Ferdinando Gorge was captain. 2. The Industry, of the burden of 450 tuns, whereof James Moyer was captain. 3. The Pearl; of which Anthony Teach was captain.

ambassador should direct, &c. there to expect directions of the party that should be admiral of the said fleet, so prepared, with a requiry of all officers to be assistant hereunto.

“All things being now in readiness, capt. Pennington being admiral of this whole Fleet, in May 1625, went with the king's said ship the Vantguard, and the seven merchants ships aforesaid, to Diep in France; there instantly the duke of Momorancy, admiral of France, would have put 200 French soldiers aboard the ship called the Industry, being no more men than she could stow, but a far greater proportion of men than her proper company was able to command or master; and offered also to do the like to every one of the said ships, telling the said capt. Pennington, and other the said English captains, and owners, and their companies, in direct terms, that they were to go, and should go to serve against the city and inhabitants of Rochel, and against those of our religion: whereunto they all shewing themselves unwilling, there were chains of gold and other rewards offered unto some of the captains, masters, and owners, to induce them: all which they utterly refused, protesting unanimously against the design, and would not take in above a fit number of men, such as they might be able to command.

“Also the company of the king's ship did there inform capt. Pennington of this overture made to go against Rochel, and exhibited a petition to him against the same, subscribing their names to the petition in a circle or compass, that it might not appear who was the beginner of the same, and then they laid it under his prayer-book, where he found and read it. Whereupon capt. Pennington and the rest consulted more seriously of the matter, and by a general assent returned all back to the Downs, where they arrived about the end of June, or beginning of July 1625. From thence capt. Pennington sent a letter to the duke of Buckingham by one Ingram, with the said petition, and employed him to become a suitor to get a discharge from serving against Rochel: Ingram delivered the letter to the duke, and saw him read it together with the said petition: whereby, as by other former and later means, he had full notice of the design, and intent of the French to go against the Rochellers: James Moyer also about the same time came to the court, and had conference with my lord Conway and sir John Cook, (now secretary) acquainting them what had passed at Diep, praying them to acquaint the duke, which they did, and the duke delivered the said letter and petition to sir John Cook. The duke of Chevereux and M. de Villocleer being now come into England, as extraordinary ambassadors from the French king, they and the said marquis D' Effiat, more especially D' Effiat, solicited and got a letter from the lord Conway by the duke's means, dated July 10, 1625, directed to capt. Pennington, whereby he took upon him to express and signify his majesty's pleasure to be, that his majesty had left the command of the ships to the French king, and that now capt. Pennington should receive into them so many men as that king should please for the time contracted, and recommended his letter to be as a sufficient warrant in that behalf. All this while the king or body of the council were never made acquainted with any other design than that of Genon, nor heard any thing of the passages at Diep, nor of the design of Rochel, nor of our masters and companies petitions, informations or complaints thereupon. This letter of the lord Conway's was sent by Parker from Hampton-Court unto Pennington, being now about the Downs, and was not long after delivered into his hands. About this time M. de la Touche, and others, as from the duke de Rohan, and others of the Protestant party in France, solicited our king and council against the going of the ships, and had good words and hopes from both, but from the duke the contrary, who told them, the king his master was obliged, and so the ships must and should go.

“The ships remained still in the Downs, and afterwards, viz. about July 15, 1625, there was a treaty at Rochester between the three ambassadors extraordinary of France, and James Moyer, and Anthony Touchin for themselves and other English captains, and masters of ships, &c.

“The said Moyer and Touchin being by message commanded to attend the duke of Buck. at Rochester, for conclusion and settlement to be had of this business, the said ambassadors did there proffer and offer to the said Moyer and Touchin an Instrument in French purporting thus, viz.

“1. That the said English captains and their companies should consent and promise to serve the French king against all, none excepted but the king of Great Britain, in conformity of the contract formerly passed between d' Effiat and them. 2. That they should consent and agree, in consideration of the assurance given them by the ambassadors, to the Articles of March 25, 1625, whereby the French king should be made master of the said ships, by indifferent inventory; that then they should by him be warranted against all hazards of sea-fight, and if they miscarried, then the value thereof to be paid by the French king, who would also confirm this new proposition within fifteen days after the ships should be delivered to his use by good caution in London. 3. That if the French king would take any men out of the said ships, he might, but without any diminution of freight for or in respect thereof.

“The said James Moyer having gotten the French instrument interpreted, answered, 1. They would not go to serve against Rochel; 2. nor send their ships without good warrant for their going; and 3. not without sufficient security to their liking for payment of their freight and riddition of their ships, or the value thereof; for the ambassadors security was by them taken not to be sufficient, and they protested against it, and utterly refused this peraffected yea or no, offering to procure them a sufficient discharge to their contentment, for their so doing.

“The same day also, sir Ferdinando Gorge, and the rest, by writing, under their hands subscribed, did declare as followeth; namely,

“That they were willing to obey our king, but held not the security peraffetted at Rochester, by the three ambassadors, to be sufficient (though honourable) and so they absolutely refused to deliver their ships upon that security, desiring better caution in that behalf. 1. By merchants of Paris. 2. To be transferred to London. 3. Irrevocable. 4. And such as might not be protected by prerogative; and to have this under the hands and seals of both kings.”

“All this while our king, or body of the council, knew nothing in certain of any other design of the French, than only of their pretence against Genoa, and believed, that all the Articles and Instruments that had passed between the French and us, or the captains, masters, and owners of the English ships, had been penned and contrived with full and good cautions accordingly, for prevention of all dangers that might grow to the contrary. Also the same 28 July, the captains and masters taking notice of Mr. Nicholas pressing them to deliver their ships before security given to their content, contrary to former propositions, which they held unreasonable, did make answer unto the marquis in writing, That until they should have security to their contentment, they would not quit the possession of their ships unto the French, (which was but reasonable) and they sent therewith a valuation of their several ships, as they would stand to. They likewise demanded a performance of all things, formerly sent to his lordship from them by Mr. Nicholas (save only for the security by money deposited) saying, That for all the rest they durst not proceed otherwise.—Lastly, They prayed for a speedy Answer, that the delay in this business may not seem to be in them.

“But D’Efiat being confident of the duke of Buck’s letters, promises, and proceedings aforesaid, would not consent to these reasonable demands of the captains and masters of the English ships, protracting the time till he might hear further from the said duke out of England.

“While these things were thus in handing both in France and in England, there were written over out of France into England letters of advertisement, how, and upon what ground, or by what act or means procured or occasioned, appeareth not; yet from one Mr. Larking, a servant to the earl of Holland, and a kind of agent, a person some way employed by our state, or under some of our ambassadors or ministers in France; that the peace was concluded with those of our religion in France; and that within fourteen days the war would break forth, or begin in Italy, with a design upon Genoa; a matter of great importance for annoying the Spaniard.

“This letter of Larking came to the English court at Richmond, 28 July, when the duchess of Cheveraux’s child was there christened, and the contents thereof (as hath been alleged) were confirmed by the ambassadors of Savoy and Venice: by the advantage and colour whereof, the duke of Buck. drew the king, who all this while knew nothing of the design upon Rochel, or those of our religion, but thought the former articles had been safe and well penned, both for him and his subjects, (according to the most religious and politic intention, and instructions in that behalf originally given by his late father) to write a letter dated at Richmond the same 28 July, directed to the said capt. Pennington, to this effect, viz.

“His majesty did thereby charge and command the said captain Pennington, without delay, to put his highness’s former command in execution, for consigning the Vantguard into the hands of the marquis D’Efiat for the French, with all her furniture, assuring her officers, his majesty would provide for their indemnity; and to require the seven merchants ships, in his majesty’s name, to put themselves into the service of the French king, according to the promise his majesty had made unto him; and in case of backwardness or refusal, commanding him to use all forcible means to compel them, even to sinking; with a charge not to fail, and this letter to be his warrant.

“This letter was sent by captain Thomas Wilbraham to captain Pennington, who was yet in the Downs. In the beginning of August, 1625, captain Pennington went over again to Diep, carrying with him the said letters of his majesty, and certain instructions in writing from the duke of Buckingham to Mr. Nicholas, agreeable in substance to the former verbal instructions given by the duke to him at Rochester, as the said Nicholas alledged: who also affirmeth, that in all things what he did touching that business, he did nothing but what was warranted by the duke’s instructions to him: which, if it be true, then the duke of Buckingham, who commanded and employed him therein, must needs be guilty of the matters so acted by the said Mr. Nicholas. If there be any subsequent act or assent of council, or of some counsellors of state for the going of these ships to the French, or for putting them into their power, it was obtained only for a colour, and was unduly gotten, by mis-informing the contents of the sealed articles, and concealing the truth, or by some other undue means: neither can any such latter act of council in any sort justify the duke’s proceedings, which, by the whole current of the matter, appears to have been indirect in the business even from the beginning. About the time of captain Pennington’s coming over to Diep the second time, Mr. Nicholas did, in his speeches to the captains and masters of the seven merchants ships, threaten and tell them, that it was as much as their lives were worth, if they delivered not their ships to the French, as he required; which put them in such fear, as they could hardly sleep: and thereupon two of them were once resolved to have come again away with the ships; and because the former threats had made them afraid to return into England, therefore to have brought and left their ships in the Downs, and themselves, for safety of their lives, to have gone into Holland.

“ Captain Pennington being the second time come into Diep, there forthwith delivered and put the said ship the Vanguard into the absolute power and command of the said French king, his subjects and ministers, to the said French king's use, to be employed in his service at his pleasure; and acquainted the rest of the fleet with the effect of his majesty's letter and command, and demanded and required them also to deliver and put their ships into the power and command of the French king accordingly. The captains, masters, and owners of the seven merchants ships refused so to do, as conceiving it was not the king's pleasure they should so do, without security for delivery of their ships, or satisfaction for the same to their good contentment. Whereupon Pennington went on shore at Diep, and there spake with D'Effiat the ambassador, and shortly after returned aboard, and gave the captains, masters, and owners, an answer, resting upon the validity, and urging the performance of the former contract made and perfected in England.

“ Then the said masters and captains prepared to be gone, and weighed anchor accordingly. Whereupon captain Pennington shot at them, and forced them to come again to anchor, as yielding themselves for fear to his mercy and disposal. Upon this, captain Pennington and the Frenchmen, that now commanded the Vanguard, came aboard the merchants ships, and there proposed unto them a new way for their security touching their ships, namely, to accept the security of the town of Diep: Whereupon they all went ashore, except sir Ferdinando Gorge, who, with his ship, the Great Neptune, adventured to come away, as not liking these new and unreasonable propositions. At their coming ashore they spake with Mr. Nicolas, and there by his intercession came to a new agreement to accept the security of the town of Diep, upon certain hard conditions; namely, the said marquis D'Effiat as extraordinary ambassador in England, and as having power by deputation from the duke of Chevereux and Villocleer, on or about August 15, 1625, did agree and promise to the said Moyer, Touchin, Thomas Davies, Dard, John Davies, Lewen, as captains and owners of the said ships, called the Industry, the Pen, the Marygold, the Loyalty, the Peter and John, and the Gift of God, that the French king should give and furnish to the said owners (they being present, and accepting it in this town) this sufficient security, That within 15 days after the said French king should be in possession of the said ships, he should give sufficient caution in London, for the sum of 215,000 livres, whereto the said ships were estimated, with all that appertaineth to them, as cannons and other munitions of war, viz. 50,000*l*. And in or about the same 15th August 1625, the commonalty of the said town of Diep entered security, and bound the goods of their commonalty to the said English captains and owners, that the said French king and his ambassadors should furnish the security within the city of London within the time, and for the sum aforesaid.

“ On or about August 16, 1625, the said marquis d'Effiat, as well in his quality of bear ambassador, as by virtue of his said deputation, did by public act promise unto the said Moyer, Touchin, &c. to give and furnish to them (they being present and requiring it in the town of Diep) sufficient security in the city of London, within 15 days after the French king should be in peaceable possession of the said ships, for the sum of 215,000 livres turnovs, whereto the said ships were valued, namely, for the said ship called the Industry, and so a several sum for every ship, which security should remain for assurance to pay to every of them the price of their ships, before specified in that act, in case they should be left in the French king's hands, with other particulars in the said act mentioned: without derogating nevertheless from the clauses of the said contract, March 25, 1625. Albeit, because the said ambassadors had found it good to discharge the said English mariners out of the said ships, that therefore the freight agreed upon by the said former contract should not be wholly paid, but only for the space of the first six months; and if the French king would use them for twelve months longer, or for any less time, that then he should pay freight for the same according to a new particular rate and manner expressed in the said Articles, and bound the goods of himself and the said duke of Chevereux and M. Villocleer for the performance hereof, as by the said article itself, reference being thereunto had, amongst other things more fully appeared.

“ This Article being passed and recorded at Diep, all the said seven merchants ships, except the Great Neptune, who was gone away in detestation of the action intended by the French, were forthwith delivered into the absolute possession, power, and command of the French king, and of his said ambassador d'Effiat, and other the ministers and subjects of the French king; to be employed by him in his service at his pleasure, and not one of the English company, man or boy, (other than one only man, a gunner as it should seem) would stay in any of those ships, to serve against the Rochellors, or those of our religion.

“ As soon as these ships were thus delivered into the possession and power of the French, the said ambassador then moved them, and dealt earnestly with them for the sale of their ships. Mr. Nicholas having finished the work he went for, at his coming from Diep he received a diamond ring worth 50*l*. and an husband set with sparks of diamonds, worth 100 marks, of the ambassador, as a recompence for his pains taken in this employment, which (though ambassadors do confer greater rewards sometimes at their parting upon persons of ill Nicholas's quality, for less service done) yet was it more than so ill an office as he was employed in, could in any sort deserve.

"The said Capt. Pennington returned speedily into England, and took his journey towards the city of Oxford, where the parliament was then sitting, by adjournment from Westminster thither, and there several propositions were taken into debate for the good of our religion, and the supply of his majesty's occasions: For the well resolving and settling whereof, the true knowledge how, and upon what occasions and terms the several ships were sent, delivered, employed, and to be employed, was very requisite. Afterwards nevertheless upon or about Aug. 6th, 1625, at a meeting and conference between both the houses of parliament in Christ-Church-Hall, after the reading there of his majesty's most gracious answer to a petition of the lords and commons formerly exhibited unto his majesty touching our religion, and much for the good thereof, the duke of Buckingham well knowing all the passages which I have now related to your lordships to be true, did not only cautelously conceal the same, but also much boldly and untruly, by colour of a message delivered from his majesty to both the houses, affirm unto them touching those ships to this effect; That it was not always fit for kings to give account of their counsels, and that about five of the six months were already past and yet the said ships were not employed against Rochel; willing and advising the said lords and commons to judge the things by the event, to which he seemed to refer the matter. By which cunning speeches the duke intended, and accordingly did make the lords and commons then to believe that the said ships were never meant, or any way in danger to be employed against the Rochellors or those of our religion in France; and herein he did great injury and disservice to his majesty, to the great scandal and prejudice of our religion and affairs, and highly abused both the lords and commons by this cautelous and subtle speech and insinuation, and thereby gave both houses occasion to forbear petitioning or suing to his majesty for redress in this business, while the time was not then passed; for his ships were not as then actually employed against the Rochellors, albeit in truth they were then delivered into the French king's power.

"And the same time before the parliament was dissolved, Capt. Pennington, who could have opened the whole truth of the business for the service of the king and the realm, came to Oxford, but was there drawn to conceal himself by means of the duke, and not to publish in due time his knowledge of the premises, as was there shortly after reported. The truth whereof, the lords in this parliament may be pleased to examine, as they shall see cause; the parliament at Oxford being shortly after, viz. Aug. 12, unhappily dissolved.

"In or about Sept. 16, 1625, the said ships were actually employed against the Rochellors, and their friends, to their exceeding great prejudice, and almost utter ruin. It hath been said by some of the French, that the Vanguard she mowed them down like grass; to the great dishonour of our nation, and the scandal of our religion, and to the disadvantage of the great affairs of this kingdom, and all Christendom.—Also the ships themselves were in eminent peril to be utterly lost, for lack of sufficient cautions. If they be come home since this parliament sate down, long after the matter was here expounded and taken into examination; it may be well presumed, that it is by some underhand procuring of the duke, and the secret complying of the French with him, to colour out the matter; which the lords may examine as they see cause. The one and only Englishman that presumed to stay in one of the ships, and serve against the poor Rochellors of our religion, at his return, was slain in charging a piece of ordnance, not by him well sponged.

"In Feb. last, 1625, M. de la Touche having speech with Mr. Thimos Sherwell, a member of the commons house of parliament, at Salisbury, as he was coming up to the parliament, and M. de la Touche going down into Somersetshire to Mr. John Paulet's to M. Sobysa; He told Mr. Sherwell in the hearing also of one Mr. John Clements of Plymouth, who is now in town, the words that the duke had spoken to him the last summer, touching these ships; and thereupon used these words, 'Ce duque est un meschant homme.'

"Upon this whole Narration of the fact touching the manner of delivery of the ships to the French, divers things may be observed, wherein the duke's offences do consist: us, in betraying a ship of the king's royal navy unto a foreign prince's hands, without good warrant for the same; the dispossessing the subjects of this realm of their ships and goods by many artifices and subtilties, and, in conclusion, with high hand and open violence, against the good will of the owners; In breaking the duty of lord admiral and guardian of the ships and seas of this kingdom; in varying from the original good instructions, and presuming to give others of his own head in matters of state; In violating the duty of a sworn privy-counsellor to his majesty; In abusing both houses of parliament by a cautelous misinformation, under a colour of a message from his majesty; and in disadvantaging the affairs of those of our religion in foreign parts: Offences of an high and grievous nature.

"For the Proof of some parts thereof, which are not the least, I offer to your lordships consideration the statute of the 2 & 3 of E. 6, touching the duke of Somerset; wherein is recited, That amongst other things, he did not suffer the piers, called the Newhaven and Blackerst, in the parts beyond the seas, to be furnished with victuals and money, whereby the French were encouraged to invade and win the same; and for this offence, amongst others, it was enacted, That a great part of his land should be taken from him. And if non-feas-ance in a matter tending to lose a fixed castle belonging to the king, be an high offence; then the actual putting of a ship-royal of the king's, into the hand of a foreign prince, which is a moveable and more useful castle and fortress of the realm, must needs be held a greater offence.

"I will forbear to cite any more precedents of this kind, because some of those who have gone before me, have touched at divers precedents of this nature, which may be applied to this my part. Only, because the abuse of the parliament, which is the chiefest council of state and court of judicature in the realm, is not the least offence in this business, I shall desire your lordships to take it into consideration the statute of Westm. 1, cap. 30, whereby such as stem to beguile courts of justice, are to be sore judged in the same courts, and punished, as by that statute appeareth."—So he concluded, and left the duke to their lordships equal justice.

Mr. Pym enlargeth the Ninth, Tenth, and Eleventh Articles.

The Ninth and Tenth Articles were read next. These, as also the Eleventh Article, were enlarged and aggravated by Mr. Pym, in this manner.

"My lords: Although I know that I shall speak to my own disadvantage, yet I shall labour to speak with as little disadvantage to the matter as I can. I have no learning or ornament whereby I might shew myself, and I shall think it enough plainly to shew the matter: For all that I am at, is, that I may lose nothing of the cause. And therefore, my lords, I shall apply myself with as much convenient brevity, as one that knows that your lordships time is much more precious than my words: Your lordships being such judges, as will measure things by true and natural proportions, and not by the proportion of the action or expression. The first entrance into my service, must be reading the Articles.

"My lords, this Charge for matter of fact, is so notorious and apparent, that it needs no proof, that these honours have been procured: And therefore I will only insist upon the consequence. 1st, I will shew, that by this fact the duke hath committed a great offence: And 2. That this offence hath produced a great grievance to the commonwealth. And I will conclude, in strengthening the whole by some precedents of former times, that parliaments have proceeded in that course, in which your lordships are like to proceed.

"1. To prove it a fault or an offence, I must prove that there was a duty; for every fault presupposeth a duty: And in this case the first work is to shew, that the duke was bound to do otherwise: For which I need to alledge nothing else, than that he is a sworn servant and counsellor to the king, and so ought to have preferred his majesty's honour and service before his own pride, in seeking to ennoble all that blood that concerned him. And it is not enough to say, that it is not questionable: if there have been great men questioned in like cases. There be some laws made in particular, according to the temper and conditions of several states: There are other that be essential and collateral with government; and if those laws be broken, things run to disorder and confusion. Such that rule observed in all states, of suppressing vice to encourage virtue, by apt punishment and rewards: And this is the best law to insist upon in a court of parliament when the proceedings are not limited either by the civil or common laws, but matters are judged according as they stand in opposition or conformity with that which is Suprema lex, cui omnia subj.

2. "By this late law, whoever moves to king to bestow honour, which is the greatest reward, binds himself to make good a double proportion of merit in that party who is to receive it; the first, of value and excellence; the second of continuance and durability. And as this honour sets men up above others, it they should be eminent in virtue beyond others as it is perpetual, not ending with their persons, but descending upon their posterity: it there ought to be in the first root of this honour some such active merit in the service of the commonwealth, as might transmit a vigorous example to his successors, whereby they may be raised to an imitation of the like virtues.—He said, he would forbear to urge this point further, out of a modest respect to those persons whom it did collaterally concern, professing his Charge to be wholly against the duke of Buckingham.

3. "From the consideration of Honour, together with the price of money; the which being compared together, may be reduced to two heads (may it please your lordships); the one being earthly and base, may be bought with a proportionable price of white and red earth, gold and silver: the other, which is spiritual (which is sublime) to which, money cannot be a proportionable price. Honour is transcendent, in regard it was held a sacred and divine thing; insomuch that there was a temple dedicated to her by the Romans: and so I conclude by prescription, that honour is a divine thing; for the Scripture calls kings, Gods; and then those that are about kings must needs be resembled to those powers and principalities that attend next to the throne: and if honour be such a divine thing, it must not be bought with so base a price as money.

4. "Lastly, Honour is a public thing, it is the reward of public deserts.

"And thus your lordships have seen, that the sale of Honour is an offence unnatural, against the law of nature. Now what an offence this is, your lordships may discern, considering the kinds of the offence, and the adjuncts which I now fall upon. 1. It extremely deflowers the flowers of the crown; for it makes them cheap to all beholders. 2. It takes from the crown the most fair and frugal reward of deserving servants: for when honour comes to be at so mean a rate as to be sold, there is no great man will look after it. 3. It is the way to make a man more studious for lucre and gain, than of sufficiency of virtue; when they know that they shall be preferred to titles of honour according to the heaviness of purse, and not for the weightiness of their merit. 4. It introduceth a strange confusion, mingling the meaner with the more pure and refined metal. 5. Lastly, It is a prodigious scandal to this nation, (as the house of commons think).

“ For Examples and Precedents, I am confident there are none; and your lordships can look for none, because it is not paralleled to any precedent. But certainly it is now a fit time to make a precedent of this man, this great Duke, that hath been lately raised to this transcendent height in our sphere; who thinketh he cannot shine enough, unless he dim your lordships honours, in making the same contemptible through the sale of it, by the commonness of it.

“ Yet I am commanded further to observe another step of unworthiness in this gentleman, who hath not only set honour to sale by his agents, but compelled men likewise, unwilling, to take titles of Honour upon them. For the particular, that noble gentleman that this concerns, I am commanded to say of him from the house of commons, That they conceive of him, that he was worthy of this honour, if he had not come to it this way; they can lay no blame upon him, that was constrained to make this bargain to redeem his trouble. But we must distinguish of this, as divines do betwixt the active and the passive usurers; they condemn the active, speaking favourably of the passive.

“ And I must here observe to your lordships, by the direction of the house of commons, That it seems strange to them, that this great man, whom they have taken notice of to be the principal patron and supporter of the semipelagian and a popish faction, set on foot to the danger of the church and state, whose tenets are Liberty of Free-will, though somewhat mollified; that a man, embracing these tenets, should not admit of liberty in moral things: and that he should compel one to take honour and grace from a king whether he will or no; what is that, but to add inhumanity and oppression, to injury and incivility.

“ But here I must answer a precedent or two, which may be by misunderstanding enforced against me: 5 H. 5, there was Martin and Babington, and others, which were chosen to be sergeants, and they did decline from it out of their modesty, and doubted that their estates were not answerable to their place: yet upon the charge of the warden of England, they accepted it, and appeared to their writs. Likewise there is a writ in the register, that many, by reason of the tenure of their lands, may be compelled to be made knights. But this makes rather against, than for this faction: for it is true, that this is the wisdom and policy of the common-law, that those that be thought fit men for employment, may be drawn forth to be employed for the good of the commonwealth, where otherwise they would not take it upon them: but that any man, for his gain, should force a man to take degrees of Honour upon him; certainly this is beyond all precedents, and a thing not to be exemplated, either in our nation, or any other.

“ And further, I am commanded to tell your lordships, That it is dangerous, that if a great lord, by his power or strength, may compel a subject to take such honours, why may he not compel them as well to take his lands at what price he will, and to sell them again as he thinks fit; yea, to marry his children as it pleaseth him? The consequence of this is great, if that it be well considered; and they conceive that it is of so great a consequence, that if it be not stopped, it may come in time to make way for a dangerous subversion, and demonstrates a great tyranny of a subject, under a most wise, most gracious, and most moderate king.

“ And thus, my lords, I have done with the first Article allotted to my Charge, and so I proceed to the next.

“ My lords; Before I enter into the enforcement of this Article, I shall, by way of protestation from the house of commons, do in this, as I did in the other Article. And first, for the king's majesty, under whom we are now happily governed and placed, I must, by their direction, say, for his honour and our comfort, and, with humble acknowledgment, confess, that since his coming to the crown, there have been men of as great parts and learning advanced into places in church and commonwealth, as any have been heretofore. And then for the first of those lords, whose names are mentioned in this Article, I must say, that they do not intend to reflect at all upon him; nay, they think his person so worthy, as to be advanced to as high a place, without any price at all; and that he ought to have kept it longer, if those that shuffled in those times, had not shuffled him out.

“ Now to the matter of this Article, which is the Sale of Places of Judicature, being an offence: and to prove this, is all one as to make the glass clear by painting of it. The grounds whereon I shall go, shall be laid open; Magna Charta, chap. 29. The words are these: ‘Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus justitiam.’ It may be said, this comes not close to my purpose; yet, by your lordships favour, I shall make it good, that it doth, and I shall begin with the latter of the two first, ‘Nulli negabimus;’ for if any that hath power or favour with the king, should procure him to delay the making of judges, when there were judges to take it, it will not be denied, that they do their best endeavour to make the king break his word; for if any use their favour about the king to procure places of judicature for money, they do what in them lies to make justice saleable; for it is plain, that he that buys must sell, and cannot be blamed if he do sell.

"I shall open the evil consequences that depend upon the sale of the places of judicature, or any places of great trust. 1. By this means, unable men shall be sure of the precedence unto places; for they being conscious of their own want of merits, they must be made up by the weight of gold. 2. It must needs hence follow, that suits, contentions, brawls, and quarrels shall be increased in the common-wealth. For when men come to seats of judicature by purchase, they must, by increase of suits, increase their own profit. 3. Men will not study for sufficiency of learning to be able to discharge their places, but how they may scrape together money to purchase places. 4. It will follow, that those that have the best purses, though worst causes, will carry away the victory always. 5. It will follow, that when they be preferred for money to those places, they are tied to make the best of those places, 'vis et modis:' and then the great man that sold those places to them, must uphold them in their bribery; and he is tied to it, because they are his creatures; nay, further, he is tied to support them in their bribery, to advance their places upon the next remove. 6. And, lastly, when good men, and well-deserving, come to any place, they shall not continue there, but they shall be quarrelled at, so that there may be a vacancy in that place, and then some other shall suddenly step into the saddle, by giving a competent price.

"Upon these and the like reasons, this fact of selling and buying Places and Offices of trust, hath not only been declaimed against by Christians, but also by moral Pagans. Aristotle in his 5 lib. of Ethicks, cap. 8. gives it as a caveat, That no man amongst the Thebans was to take upon him any place of government in the common-wealth, if that he were a merchant, unless there were ten years distance between. And the reason is this, because merchants are used to buying and selling; it is their trade and art to get money, so that their fingers are accustomed to that which they cannot leave, when they come to places of trust and judicature. Nay further in honour of the merchant, he is accounted the wisest merchant that gains most; so that if such comes to offices and places of trust, he thinks it best to advance his profit.

"Next to the Pagans, the popes, a generation full of corruption, yet they, by their bulls, are full of declamation against such. And this is plain by a bull of Pius Quintus, who lays the penalty of confiscation of goods of any that do for money acquire any offices, and condemns them by his papal sentence to be great sinners. So Gregory 13th condemns the like.

"And now to come nearer home, to come to that which will principally lead your lordships, which are the judgments of your ancestors in parliament; wherein it appears by the statute of 5 Hen. 6, that the same statute condemns the seller and receiver, as well as the buyer and giver. It further appears by the preamble of that statute, that such offences were against the law, and they foresaw the corruptions of those that came into those places by those means, and that it is a hindrance of sufficient and worthy men from those places. And also 2 & 3 Edw. 6, which was likewise cited in the case of the duke of Somerset, by which he was to forfeit his estate, that one thing was for selling of places in the common-wealth for money. And certainly, with your lordships favour, it is most just and probable, that they that profess themselves to be patriots, and shew by their actions, that they aim at their own lucre, and labour to hinder the distributing of justice; it is most just and proper, that those men should return back again to the public treasury of the king and kingdom, what they have by their unsatisfied lucre gotten.

"And so, my lords, craving pardon of you for my boldness, confusion, and distractions, in going through this business, I humbly leave myself to the judgments of your favours and charities, and this great man the duke to your wise censure and justice."

Mr. Sherland enlargeth upon the Twelfth Article.

Then was read the Twelfth Article.

Before Mr. Sherland entered to open and enlarge upon it, he discoursed in general concerning Honours, mentioned in the preceding Article, and spake as followeth:

"My lords; It hath pleased God, who hath the disposing even of all things in his hands, to cast this service now upon me, who did formerly my endeavour to decline it, considering the weightiness of the business, the greatness of this presence, and my manifold defects, best known to myself: But another that should have with better contentment, I doubt not, performed this service, being fallen now sick, there is a necessity imposed on me by the house of commons, wherein I shall be very plain and short, according to the warning I had; yet I shall deal plainly and faithfully, according to the sense of that house by whose command I now appear: And since I am now thrust as a bush into the gap, I hope your lordships will not expect such a composure and strength of speech which you have had from others of my companions. The subject that falls to my lot to speak of before your lordships, are honour and justice, two great flowers of the crown: I confess myself exceeding unfit and unable to speak of these points before so great an assembly of such persons of so great honour, and such superior judges of this kingdom; but I must take my lot: it pleaseth your lordships, as in sphere, to take knowledge of the grievances presented by the commons house, which I desire and hope your lordships will not take presumption.

"May it please your lordships, the parts of this Charge, as you discern upon the reading of it, are two; the one general, the other particular: The general is perverting the ancient and noble course of attaining to the titles of honour. 2. The other, the compulsion or inforcement of men unwilling to purchase honour.

“For the first by way of protestation, I am commanded by the house of commons, to say, that they repine not at their advancement upon whom those honours were conferred, but they think them worthy thereof; yet they wish, for their sakes, and the safety of this nation, their virtues had solely raised them, and that they had not been forced and constrained to contribute to this bottomless gulf to attain their titles.

“They complain again of this unworthy way brought in by this great man, they fall upon this in this manner, and found the evils under which the common-wealth suffers, and the causes of them being two principal evils, which are the decay and stopping of the trade, and the termination of honour. In examination of which second evil, the trade and commerce of honour, we have, as the commons do, receive, confitentem ream: For he endeavouring to colour the matter says for himself, That he was not the only introducer and first bringer in of this: but they find that he was the first that defiled this virgin of honour so publicly, making an account, that all things and persons should stoop and subject themselves to his vain desires and extravagancy. Now that this commerce of honour is an offence; then to prove what kind of offence it is, is the only thing I shall trouble your lordships with.

1. “And first that it is an offence, I shall draw my first argument from the Nature of Honour; honour is a beam of virtue; now this honour can be no more fixed upon an undeserving person for money, than fire can be struck out of a stick.

2. “From the Subject of Honour, which is merit, for the which no price ought to be paid to any great man by any undeserving person for the same, but their own merit and desert.”

Then he passed to the Grievances which are caused by the selling of Titles, and they are three. 1. “It is prejudicial to the noble barons of this kingdom. 2. To the king, by disabling him to reward extraordinary virtues. 3. To the kingdom, which comprehends both kings, lords, and people.

“For the first he said, He would not trouble their lordships with recital, how antient, how famous the degree of barons hath been in these western monarchies; He said, the haronage of England hath longer upheld that dignity; and doth yet retain a greater height than in any other nation: they are great judges, a court of the last resort, they are great counsellors of state, and not only for the present, but as law-makers, counsellors for the time to come; and this not by delegacy and commission, but by birth and inheritance; so that when any man shall be made a member of this great body, who is not qualified for the performance of such noble functions, it must needs be a prejudice to the whole body, and dishonour to the head. As if a little water be put into a great vessel of wine, as it receives spirit and strength from the wine, so it doth impart some degrees of its own infirmity and coldness to the wine.

2. “It is prejudicial to the king: now that it can disable him from giving honour, for that it is a power inseparable, but by making honour ordinary, it becomes as an incompetent reward for extraordinary virtue; when men are noble, they are taken out of the press of the common sort, and how can it chuse but fall in estimation, if honour itself be made a press?

3. “It is prejudicial to the kingdom; the stories and records are full of the great assistance which the crown hath received from the barons, both in foreign and domestic actions, not only by their own persons, but by their retinue and tenants, and therefore they are called by Bracton, ‘robur belli,’ how can we now expect the like from such as have no tenants, and are hardly able to maintain themselves?

“But this is not all; for the prejudice grows not primitively by defect of that assistance which they might give the state, but positively they have been a great burthen to the kingdom by gifts and pensions already received, and yet stand in need of more for the future support of their dignities. This makes the duke's offence the greater, that in this weakness and consumption of the commonwealth, he hath not been contented alone to consume the public treasure, (which is the blood and nourishment of the state) but hath brought in others to help him in this work of destruction. And that they might do it more eagerly by enlarging their honours, he hath likewise enlarged their necessities; and their appetites. He did second his Charge with two precedents; the first, 28 Hen. 6, in the Complaint against the duke of Suffolk, in the 31st Article of that Complaint this was one of his Charges, that he William de la Pool, duke of Suffolk, had procured one who had married his niece, to be made earl of Kendal, and obtained for him 1,000*l.* per annum in the duchy of Guienne; and yet this party was the son of a noble and well-deserving father. So you see this is no new thing for the house of commons to complain, that those that are near the king should raise their kindred to an unnecessary honour; and if that were worthy of punishment for advancing of one, then what punishment is he worthy of that hath advanced so many?

“The second precedent is 17 Edw. 4. There passed an act of parliament for the degrading of John Nevil, marquis Montague, and duke of Bedford; the reason expressed in the act is, because he had not a revenue sufficient for the maintaining of that dignity; to which is added another reason of that nature, that when men of mean birth are called to a high estate, and have not livelihood to support it, it induceth great poverty, and causeth briberies and extortions, imbraceries and maintenance. And now my lords, how far these reasons shall lead your judgments in this case, I must leave it to your lordships.”

Then he read the Twelfth Article, being the second part of his Charge; the title whereof was, the Exhausting, intercepting and misemploying the King's Revenues.

"My lords, this Article consists of several clauses, which in some respects may be called so many distinct charges: for though they all tend to one end and scope, the diminishing the king's treasure, yet it is by divers ways, so that every clause is a particular branch. Therefore he desired to break it into parts, and to select the most material, either in point of offence or grievance, intending to pass through them with this order; first, to declare the state of the proof, and then to add such reasons and reinforcements as he did conceive most conducing to that judgment which the commons were to expect from their lordships."

He made two main branches of this Article. The first concerns Lands obtained from the crown; the second concerns Money in Pensions, Gifts, Farms, and other kind of profit.

Touching the Lands he observed four things,

"1. The sum of 3,035*l.* per annum of old rent, besides the forest of Layfield of which we have no value, and we can find no schedule granted by the late king to my lord of Buckingham within ten years past, as appeareth by the several grants vouched in the schedule annexed; and it was in itself a great grievance that in a time of such necessity, when the king's revenues are not able to support such a great charge, that so much land should be conveyed to a private man: this he acknowledged was not the duke's case alone, for others had received divers grants from the king, but none in so great measure.—And because the commons aim not at judgment only, but at reformation, he wished, that when the king should bestow any land for support of honours, that the caution which was wont to be carefully observed might again return into use; that is, to annex these lands to the dignity, lest being obtained and wasted, the party repair to the king for a new support; by which provision the crown will reap this benefit; that as some lands go out of new grants, others will come in by spent entails.—He said he would not trouble their lordships with repetition of the laws heretofore made for preventing the alienation of the king's lands, and for resuming those that had been alienated, nor of the ordinances made in this high court for the same purpose, and fines set upon those that presumed to break such ordinances; he only added as a further enforcement of the grievance, that when the king's revenues be unable to defray public necessities, the commons must needs be more burthened with supplies.

"2. His second point was, the unusual Clauses which the Duke by his greatness hath procured to be inserted into the Warrants for passing of those Lands, of which two were mentioned; the first, That the casual profits should not be rated in the particulars; the second, That all bailiffs fees should be repaid: Both which are to be proved by the Warrants remaining with the auditors of the rates, and other auditors; whereupon he presented these considerations:

"1. That it was a mark of ingratitude and insatiableness in the duke, thus to strain the king's bounty beyond his intention; and that he would not receive this bounty by the ordinary way, but by the way of practice. 2. It argued unfaithfulness in him, that being a sworn counsellor, he should put the king into such courses of so much prejudice, deceitfully, in concealing the value of that which he bought; so that the king gave he knew not what; for under the proportion of 2,000*l.*, he gives it may be 4,000*l.* And by this the king did not only sustain great loss for the present, but it opened a way of continual loss, which hath ever since been pursued by all those who have passed lands from the crown. 3. The king is hereby not left master of his own liberality, neither in proportion nor certainty; for it might so fall out, that the quantity passed from him, might be treble to that he intended.

"3. The third was, 'The surrender of divers parcel of these lands back to the king, after he had held them some years, and taking others from the king in exchange.' Where he noted, That the best of the Lands and most vendible being passed away, the worst lay upon the king's hand; that if he should have occasion to raise money by sale of lands, that course is not like to furnish him. Besides, that in the mean time betwixt the grants and the surrenders, opportunity was left to the duke to cut down woods, to enfranchise copyholds, to make long leases, and yet the old rent remaining still; the land may be surrendered at the same value. Whether this have been practised, he could not affirm, not having had time to examine it; yet he desired the lords to enquire after it, the rather for that the manor of G. in Lincolnshire being dismembered, and 17*l.* of the old rents sold out of it, was by a surrender turned back upon his majesty.

"4. The fourth point of this branch was, The colourable Tallies divers parcels of these lands had from the crown in lieu of this surrender, being sold and contracted for by his own agent, and the money received by himself or to his use, and yet Tallies were stricken out, as if it had really come to the exchequer for his majesty's service. This is to be proved by his own officers, by the officers of the exchequer, and by the Tallies themselves, which Tallies amount unto 90,563*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* Whence he observed, 1. That there ran a trade of falsehood toward the king throughout all this his dealing. 2. That this was a device thought upon to prevent the wisdom of parliament; for by this means the grant seems to have the face of valuable purchases, whereas they were indeed free gifts. 3. If the title of those lands should prove questionable, it appearing by record, as if the king had received the money, he was bound in honour to make restitution, and yet the duke had the profit.

"But it may be said, This was the porchasers desire for their own security. Of which objection he made this use, That the subjects generally took notice of so much lands given to the duke, that there is good cause to expect resumption.

“ In the second general branch of this Article concerning Money, the first point observed was, the total sum received by him in ten years space, amounting to 162,995*l.* besides the grant he hath of the overplus above 3,000*l.* per annum to be made of the third imposed upon strangers goods, and besides the moiety of 7,000*l.* out of the customs of Ireland, which he is bound to pay to the king; but whether it hath been paid, or no, is doubtful.

“ This he delivered as a sum estimative, yet so computed as it may be more, but no less. And this total ariseth by free gifts or pensions to himself, else by profit of farms, by pensions to others; for offices, whereof he received the profits, as the Admiralty, and Mastership of the Horse. All which appear by a schedule annexed to his charge.

“ The Grievances consist in this; That the common-wealth hath been bereaved of the use and employment of so public treasure in a time of as great want, and great occasions in this state, as it hath had in many ages, when the expences of the king's court can hardly be supplied, when his house and castles were unfurnished, when the seas have been unguarded, the coast subject to the incursion and spoil of enemies by default of provision in the navy, to the dishonour of the nation, and damage of the subjects, and hazard of the whole. And the offence is this, that the wants in the navy and stores being within his own charge, he was no more sensible of them; whereby it appears, he preferred the serving of his own turn before his duty and before the safety of this state.

“ The second point observed in this branch, was, That the Duke, under pretence of secret services, had procured great sums of money to be issued by Privy-seals to sundry persons named by himself, but afterward employed to his own use. Hereof two instances are propounded: the one of 8,000*l.* paid to sir Robert Pye, 12 Aug. 1610, and by him disbursed for the duke's purchase of Hurlleigh, and sir Robert Pye discharged by another Privy Seal, 4 Junii following. The second instance is of 60,000*l.* paid to Hurlimach by a Privy Seal, in Sept. 1625. Which time they rather noted, because the parliament at Oxford was broken up a little before out of discontent that the king was not supplied for the setting out of the fleet, which would have been done with a less sum. For the proof of that the house of commons will offer to your lordships witnesses.

“ The quality of this offence he left to their lordships judgment; yet propounding some things by way of enquiry from whence it might receive measure and proportion. 1. Whether it had not affinity with the crime in the civil law, called crimen peculatus; which was when a man did unjustly turn to his own use that money which was either sacra, dedicated to God's service religiously; or religiosa, used about funerals and monuments of the dead; or publica, of which kind the matter now in question is? And this offence by that law was death and confiscation of goods and estate. Which he notes the rather, that their lordships might perceive, that in the wisest state the public treasure was held in the same reputation with that which was dedicated to God and religion. 2. And whether it doth not resemble another crime in the same law termed crimen falsi, and is defined to be when a man shall ‘imitatione veri sum compendium alieno dispendio per dolum facere,’ by semblance of truth make gain to himself of other mens losses: which in the case of a bondman was death, and in case of another man banishment and confiscation, or otherwise very penal, as the judges should find cause of moderation, or rigor, in the nature and circumstances of the fact. 3. Whether their lordships will estimate it according to any sentences in the Star-chamber, which have been very frequent in cases of fraud: or according to the common-law, which so much detests this kind of dealing, as that they term it Covin, and make it vitiate ordinary and lawful actions. Or lastly, whether they will measure it by that judgment which the duke hath passed against himself in the guilt of his own conscience? (direct actions are not afraid to appear open-faced; but injustice and fraud desire to be masked with subtily and closeness.) It were offence enough, if there were no more but a cunning concealing of unthankfulness to hide his majesty's bounty; or guilt of unworthiness, as if he durst not avow the receipt of that which he hath not merited; both which proceed from malum culpa, or else that other kind of guilt which proceeds from malum pance, the fear of punishment, foreseeing this inquisition into his actions, and hoping, under this disguise of public service, to escape their lordships censure.

“ The third point in this branch is, That he hath received sundry sums of money intended for the maintenance of the Navy; whereof there are two instances: the one whereof is 20,000*l.* the other of 30,000*l.* both in Jan. 1624. By Privy Seal, by the which these sums are issued, they appear to be free gifts: but by the affirmation of some in answer for the duke, it hath been said, He was only the hand to convey them to the treasury of the navy. If the truth be according to the Privy Seal, they are to be added to the former total as parcel of his own gain: If according to that allegation, it may prove a precedent of greater damage to the king, than the money is worth; for by this way his majesty hath no means by matter of record to charge the Treasurer of the Navy with these sums, and may lose the benefit of the act of parliament 13 Eliz. whereby accountants lands are made liable to the payment of their debts to the king, and in many cases may be sold for his majesty's satisfaction. The Treasurer of the Navy is a worthy man, but if he should die, the king loseth the benefit,

"The fourth point of this branch is, That he hath caused so great a mixture and confusion between the king's estate and his own, that they cannot be distinguished by the records and entries which ought to be kept for the safety of his majesty's treasure, and indemnity of the subject. This is proved in divers instances, whereof the last alleged is one, and others follow.

"By the wisdom of the law in the constitution of the Exchequer, there be three guards set upon the king's treasure and accounts. The first is a legal impignoration, whereby the estates personal and real of the accountants are made liable to be sold for the discharge of their debt, which I mentioned before. The second an apt controlment over every office; by which the king relies not upon the industry and honesty of any one man: but if he fail in either, it may be discovered by some other sworn to take notice of it, and either to correct his errors, or amend his faults. The third is a durable evidence and certainty, not for the present time only, but for the perpetuity, because the king can neither receive, or pay, but by record.

"All these guards have been broken by the duke, both in the cases next before recited, and in these two which follow. The custom of the Exchequer is the law of the kingdom, for so much as concerneth the king's revenue. Every breach of a law by a particular offence, is punishable; but such an offence as this, being destructive of the law itself, is of a far higher nature.

"The fifth point of this second branch, is concerning two Privy Seals of Release; the one 16, the other 20 Jac. whereby this duke is discharged of divers sums secretly received to his majesty's use, but by virtue of these releases to be converted to the support of his own estate. The proof hereof is referred to the Privy Seals themselves. From which he made one observation, of the subtily he used to wind himself into the possession of the king's money, and to get that by cunning steps and degrees, which peradventure he could not have obtained at once. A good master will trust a servant with a greater sum than is out of his purse, than he would bestow upon him being in his purse; and yet after it is out of his hands, may be drawn more easily to make a release, than at first to have made a free gift. This is a proper instance to be added to the proof of the point of mingling his own estate with the king's; and of the same kind be other particulars mentioned in the schedule, though not expressed in the charge; as 20,000*l.* received in composition for the earl of M. his fine, which cannot be discovered whether part or all be converted to the duke's benefit, and yet it appears by a private seal to be clearly intended to the king's own service for the household and wardrobe, till by the duke's practice it was diverted into this close and by-way.

"Another instance in this, is, his endeavour to get the money which should be made of Prize goods into his own hands; and for this purpose he first laboured to procure that his man Gabriel Marsh might receive it; and when it was thought fit some partner should be joined with him, trial was made of divers, but none of credit would undertake the charge with secret consort. And the commons have reason to think there was good cause of this refusal: for he is so ill an accountant, that he confessed at their house (being examined) that by authority from the duke he received divers bags of gold and silver out of the St. Peter of Newgate, which he never told.

"When this practice of employing his own man would take no effect, then he procured a commission from sir William Russell, who is indeed without exception an able and worthy officer; but that is not enough for the king's security; for however he was to receive the money, it was to be disbursed by and to the duke's warrant and profit. Which clause has been altered since this was questioned in parliament; and now it is to be issued from an immediate warrant from his majesty: but as it was before, it may be noted as an encroachment upon the office of my Lord Treasurer, whereby he might make a more easy way, to some sinister end of his own; so that upon the matter, sir William was but a safeguard of the money for the duke himself. And this I must note some guilt in the very act of it.

"The last point upon this whole Charge, was a reduction of the value of the land, together with the money into one total, and to that purpose he rated the land, being valued at a reasonable value, at 40 years purchase; for although some of it was sold for 30, yet a great part was worth more than 100 years purchase, so as 40 years is conceived to be an easy medium; at this rate, 3,035*l.* amounteth to 121,400*l.* which being added to the total of the money received, 162,995*l.* both together make the sum of 284,395*l.* besides the forest of Leyfield, and besides the profit made out of the thirds of strangers goods, and the moiety of the profit made out of the customs of Ireland.

"This is a great sum in itself, but much greater by many circumstances; if we look upon the time past, never so much came into any private man's hands out of the public purse; if we respect the time present, the king never had so much want, never so many foreign occasions, important and expensive; the subjects have never given greater supplies, and yet themselves unable to furnish these expences. But as the circumstances make the sum greater, so there be other circumstances which make it less, if it be compared with the inestimable gain he hath made by the sale of honours and offices, and by projects hurtful to the state, both of England and Ireland; or if it be compared to his profusion, it will appear but a little sum. All these gifts, and other ways of profit, notwithstanding he confessed before both houses of parliament, that he was indebted 100,000*l.* If this be true, how can we hope to satisfy his prodigality? if false, how can we hope to satisfy his covetousness? and therefore their lordships need not wonder, if the commons desire, and that earnestly, to be delivered from such a grievance.

“That this complaint and proceedings of theirs may appear to be suitable to the proceedings of their predecessors in like cases; he alleged three precedents, which he said were precedents in kind, but not in proportion, because there hath never been the like. The first, 10 Rich. 2, in the complaint against Michael de la Pool, earl of Suffolk; out of which he took three Articles: the first, That being chancellor, and sworn to the king's profit, he had purchased divers lands from the king, more than he had deserved, and at under rate; yet this was thought to be an offence against the state.—The second, That he had bought of one Tydman an annuity of 500*l.* per annum; which grant was void by the laws, yet he being chancellor, procured the king to make it good by a new grant, upon surrender of the old. This was complained of in parliament, and there punished.—The third, Whereas the muster of St. Anthony's, being a schismatic, had forfeited his possessions into the king's hand; this earl took them in farm at 20 marks a year, converting the overplus, which was 1,000 marks, to his own profit, which would have come to the king.—The next precedent, 11 Rich. 2, in the Judgment against Robert de Vere of Oxford, and others; out of which he took two Articles, the fifth and seventh: the fifth was for taking manors and lauds annexed to the crown, whereby they themselves were enriched, and the king made poor. The seventh was for intercepting the subsidies granted for the defence of the kingdom.—The third precedent is that of 28 Hen. 6, in the Parliament Roll, out of the complaint against William de la Pool, duke of Suffolk, article 29. That he being next and primest of council to the king, he had procured him to grant great possessions to divers persons, whereby the king was much impoverished, the expence of his house unpaid, wages, wardrobe, castles, navy, debts, unsatisfied; and so by his subtle counsel, and unprofitable labour, the revenues of the crown, and the duchy of Lancaster, and other the king's inheritances, so much diminished, and the commons of the kingdom so extremely charged, that it was near to a final destruction. The fourth was, That the king's treasure was mischievously distributed to himself, his friends and well willers; so that for lack of monies, no army, nor ordnance, could be provided in time; and because these great persons were not brought to judgment upon these articles alone, but for other misdemeanors, he made this observation, That ravening upon the king's estate, is always accounted with other great faults that deserve judgment.”

Then he said, he had done with that which had been left to him; and so he left the duke to their lordships' justice, That as he had exceeded others in this offence, so he might not come behind them in punishment. And so he humbly desired their lordships to be pleased to pardon his delivery, and to give a favourable censure of him.

The Thirteenth Article enlarged by Mr. Wandesford.

Lastly, The Thirteenth Article was read.

Mr. Wandesford, deputed to enlarge and aggravate upon the Thirteenth Article, commended the charity and providence of that law, which makes it penal for unskilful empirics, and all others, to exercise and practise physic upon common persons, without a lawful calling and approbation, branding them who thus transgress as ‘improbos, ambitiosos, temerarios, et audaces homines.’ But he that without skill and calling shall direct a medicine, which upon the same person had wrought bad effects, enough to have dissuaded a second adventure; and then when physicians were present, physicians selected for learning and art, prepared by their office and oaths, without their consent, nay, even contrary to their direction, and in a time unseasonable; he must needs (said he) be guilty, albeit towards a common person, of a precipitate and unadvised rashness, much more towards his own sovereign. And so pious are ourselves to put the subjects in mind of their duty towards their princes, persons so sacred, that in the attempt of a mad-man upon the king, his want of reason, which towards any of his fellow subjects might acquit him of felony, shall not excuse him of treason. And how wary and advised our ancestors have been not to apply things in this kind to the person of a king, may appear by a precedent, 32 H. 6, where John Arundel, and others the king's physicians and chirurgeons, thought it not safe for them to administer any thing to the king's person, without the assent of the privy council first obtained, and express licence under the great seal of England.

“This medicine found his majesty in the declination of his disease, (and we all wish it had left him so) but his better days were shortly turned into worse; and instead of health and recovery, we hear, by good testimony (that which troubles the poor and loyal commons of England) of great distempers, as droughts, raving, fainting, an intermitting pulse, strange effects to follow upon the applying of a treacle plaister. But the truth is, testimony tells us, that this plaister had a strange smell, and an infective quality, striking the malignity of the disease inward; which nature otherwise might have expelled outward. Add to this the drink, twice given to his majesty, by the duke his own hands, and a third time refused, and the following complaint of that blessed prince, the physicians telling him, to please him for the time, That his second impairment was from cold taken, or some other ordinary cause: ‘No, no,’ said his majesty, ‘it is that which I had from ‘Buckingham.’ And though there be no precedent (said he) of an act offered to the person of a king, so insolent as this; yet it is true, that divers persons as great as this, have been questioned and condemned for less offences against the person of their sovereign. It was an Article amongst others laid against the duke of Somerset, for carrying Edward the sixth away in the night time, out of his own head, but from Hampton-Court to Windsor; and yet he was trusted with the protection of his person. Precedents failing us in this point, the common law will supply us. The law judgeth a deed done in the execution of an unlawful act, manslaughter, which otherwise would but have been chance-medley; and that this act was unlawful, the house of commons do believe, as belonging to the duty and vocation of a sworn and experimented physician, and not the unskilfulness of a young lord. And so precious are the lives of men in the eye of the law, that though Mr. Stanford saith, If a physician take one into his cure, and he die under his hands; it is not felony, because he did it not feloniously. Yet it is Mr. Bracton's opinion, That if one that is no physician or chirurgeon undertake a cure, and the party die under his hands, this is felony. And the law goeth further, making physicians and chirurgeons themselves accountable for the death of their patients, if it appear they have transgressed the rules of their own art; that is, by undertaking a thing wherein they have no experience, or having yet failed in their care and diligence.

“Lastly, he said, He was commanded by the house of commons to desire their lordships, that seeing the duke hath made himself a precedent in committing that which former ages knew not, their lordships will, out of their wisdom and justice, make him an example for the time to come.”

Sir John Elliot's Speech concluding the Duke's Impeachment.

The several Articles being thus enlarged and aggravated by the said respective members, sir John Elliot was appointed to make the Epilogue to the Impeachment, who spake thus:

“My lords; Your lordships have heard, in the labours of these two days spent in this service, a representation from the knights, citizens and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, of their apprehension of the present evils and dangers of this kingdom; of the causes of the same; and of the application of them to the duke of Buckingham, so clearly and fully, as I presume your lordships expect I should rather conclude, than add any thing to his Charge.—Your lordships have heard how his ambition was expressed in procuring and getting into his hands the greatest offices of strength and power of this kingdom; by what means he had attained them, and how money stood for merit.—There needs no argument to prove this, but the common sense of the miseries and misfortunes which we suffer; adding but one, the regality of our narrow seas, the ancient inheritance of our princes, lost or impeached.

“This I need not further to press, but from hence my observation must descend to his other virtues, and that by way of perspective; I shall give it so near and short, as rather to exercise your lordships memory, than to oppress your patience.

“First, I propose unto your lordships, the inward character of the duke's mind, which is full of collusion and deceit; I can express it no better than by the beast, called by the antients Stellionatus; a beast so bluffed, so spotted, so full of foul lines, that they knew not what to make of it: so do we find in this man's practice, who first invieged the merchants, drawing them to Diep to be intralled; then dealt deceitfully with the king to colour his offences, his design being against Rochel and the religion: Next with the parliament, to disguise his actions; a practice no less dangerous and disadvantageous to us, than prejudicial to our friends and allies.

“Next, I present to your lordships, the duke's high oppression, and that of strange latitude and extent, not to men alone, but to laws, and statutes, to acts of council, to pleas and decrees of court, to the pleasure of his majesty, all must stoop to him, if they oppose or stand in his way. This hath been expressed unto you in the ship called the St. Peter, and those of Diep; nay, he calls on the colour of his majesty's great name to shadow his design.

“It had been his duty, nay, the rest of the place, not to have translated them into the hand of strangers; that had his majesty yielded in that point, the duke should have opposed it by his continual prayers and intercessions, making known unto his majesty the inconveniences likely to ensue, and not to rest there, but to have reported it to your lordships sitting in council, to have desired and prayed your aid and assistance, in a matter of so great importance: And if this had failed, he should have entered into a protestation against it. This hath been done by worthy predecessors in that office, and this hath been the worthy discharge of the great trust reposed in his place. I heard the ships were returned, but I know it; but if I knew so, this neither excuseth, nor qualificth the duke's offence. The French in this case are to be commended, not be excused; he left them in the hands of a foreign power, who when they once had them, for any thing he knew, might easily have kept them.

“The third head is, The duke's Extortion, in exacting from the East-India Company, without right or colour, 10,000*l.*, exquisitely expressed, and mathematically observed by the gentleman, you know by whom employed, who, by his marine experience, learned this observation, That if the fleet gained not the wind by such a time at the Cape, the voyage was lost.”—

Here one of the lords interposing privately, ‘It was the king that employed him;’ sir John Elliot, in the name of the commons, makes this Protestation:

“Far be it from them to lay an odium or aspersion on his majesty's name; they hold his honour spotless, nor the least shadow of blemish can fix upon him in this business. Next to the fool extortion, is Bribery and Corruption in the sale of Honour and Offices of Command. That which was wont to be the crown of virtue and merit, is now become a merchandize, for the greatness of this man, and the justice itself made a prey unto him. All which particulars your lordships have heard opened, and enforced with reasons and proofs, what in themselves they are; and therefore I spare further to press them.

“ In the fifth place, I observe a wonder in policy and in nature, how this man, so notorious in evil, so dangerous to the state in his immense greatness, is able to subsist of himself, and keep a being: To this I answer, That the duke hath used the help of art to prop him up: It was apparent, that by his skill he hath raised a party in the court, a party in the country, and a main party in the chief places of government in the kingdom: So that all the most deserving offices that require abilities to discharge them, are fixed upon the duke, his allies and kindred. And thus he hath drawn to him and his, the power of justice, the power of honour, and the power of command, and, in effect, the whole power of the kingdom, both for peace and war, to strengthen his allies; and in setting up himself, hath set upon the kingdom's revenues, the fountain of supply, and the nerves of the land.

“ He intercepts, consumes, and exhausts the revenues of the crown, not only to satisfy his own lustful desires, but the luxury of others; and by emptying the veins, the blood should run in, he hath cast the body of the kingdom into an high consumption. Infinite sums of money, and mass of land, exceeding the value of money, contributions in parliament have been heaped upon him, and how have they been employed? Upon costly furniture, sumptuous feasting, and magnificent building, the visible evidences of the express exhausting of the state; and yet his ambition, which is boundless, resteth not here, but, like a violent flame, bursteth forth, and getteth further scope: Not satisfied with injuries, and injustice, and dishonouring of religion, his attempts go higher, to the prejudice of his sovereign, which is plain in his practice. The effects I fear to speak, and fear to think. I end this passage, as Cicero did in a like case, ‘ Ne gravioribus utar verbis quam rei natura fert, aut levioribus quam cause necessitas postulat.’

“ Your lordships have an idea of the man, what he is in himself, what in his affections. You have seen his power, and some, I fear, have felt it; you have known his practice, and have heard the effects. It rests then to be considered, what, being such, he is in reference to the king and state; how compatible or incompatible with either? In reference to the king, he must be stiled the canker in his treasure; In reference to the state, the moth of all goodness. What future hopes are to be expected, your lordships may draw out of his actions and affections; I will now see, by comparison with others, to what we may find him likened; I can hardly find him a match or parallel in all precedents; none so like him as Sejanus, who is thus described by Tacitus, ‘ Audax, sui obtegens, in alios criminator, juxta adulator et superbus.’

“ To say nothing of his vencies, if you please to compare them, you shall easily discern wherein they vary; such boldness of the one hath lately been presented before you, as very seldom or never hath been seen. For his secret intentions and calumniation, I wish this parliament had not felt them, nor the other before. For his pride and flattery, it is noted of Sejanus, that he did, ‘ Clientes suos provincias adornare.’ Doth not this man the like? Ask England, Scotland, and Ireland, and they will tell you. Sejanus's pride was so excessive, as Tacitus saith, He neglected all council, mixed his business and service with the prince, seeming to confound their actions, and was often stiled ‘ Imperatoris laborum socius.’ How lately and how often hath this man commixed his actions in discourses with actions of the king's?

“ My lords, I have done, you see the man; only this which was conceived by the knights, citizens, and burgesses, should be boldly by me spoken, That by him came all these evils, in him we find the cause, and on him we expect the remedies, and to this we met your lordships in conference; to which, as your wisdom invites us, so we cannot doubt, but in your lordships wisdom, greatness and power, we shall, in due time, find judgment as he deserves.

“ I conclude, by presenting to your lordships the particular censure of the bishop of Ely, reported in the 11 Rich. 1, and to give you a short view of his faults. He was first of all noted to be luxurious; Secondly, He married his own kindred to personages of highest rank and places; Thirdly, no man's business was done without his help; Fourthly, he would not suffer the king's council to advise in matters of state; Fifthly, he grew to such a height of pride, that no man was thought worthy to speak unto him; And lastly, his castles and forts of trust, he did ‘ obscuris et ignotis hominibus tradere.’ His doom was this, ‘ Per totam insulam publice proclamatur, periat qui perdere cuncta festinat, opprimatur ne omnes opprimat.’”

The Duke of Buckingham charges sir Dudley Diggs with treasonable Words at the foregoing Conference.

After the Report of the Duke's Charge was made to the lords, his grace rose up and affirmed to the house, “ That some Words were spoken at the late Conference by sir Dudley Diggs, which so far trenched on the king's honour, that they were interpreted treasonable. And that, had he not been restrained by the order of the house, he would have reprehended him for them. He, therefore earnestly desired, because that divers constructions had been made of those Words, and variously reported, that the eight lords would be pleased to pro-

This motion occasioned a long debate, the house being often put into a committee and resumed again, till, at last, 30 lay-lords and 6 bishops, though there was no order for it, made a voluntary Protestation, upon their honours, "That the said sir Dudley Diggs did not speak any thing at the said Conference, which did or might trench upon the king's honour; and, if he had, they would presently have reprehended him for it."—The lord president, the earl of Manchester, affirmed, That he had reported the words in the same sense they were delivered unto him by the party himself; and, though the dislocation of them required to be explained, yet he agreed with the rest of the lords for the party's good meaning, and made the same protestation. Some other lords affirmed, They did not hear them at all; others said, They would make no Protestation until they were commanded by order; and only one, the earl of Holland, thought the words were fit to be explained and the party questioned about them.

Sir John Elliot and sir Dudley Diggs committed to the Tower.

Sir Dudley Diggs having made the prologue, and sir John Elliot the epilogue, in the impeachment of the duke, they were both by the king's command committed to the Tower.

Private Suggestions to the King, in behalf of the Duke.

Upon the Impeachment of the duke, a Paper was privately conveyed to the king, importing,

"That this great opposition against the Duke, was stirred up and maintained by such as seek the destruction of this free monarchy. Because they find it not yet ripe to attempt against the king himself, they endeavour it through the sides of the duke. The persons agreeing in this one mischief, are of divers sorts and humours: 1st, meddling and busy persons, who love popular speeches: 2. covetous landlords, inclosers, depopulators, &c. who being of the parliament, ease themselves in Subsidies, and lay it on the true commons, and cry out, the Grievances are caused by the duke. 3dly, Recusants, who hate the duke for the breach of the Spanish match. 4thly, persons indebted, who, by privilege of parliament, avoid payment. 5thly, puritans and sectaries, though two of them scarcely agree in what they would have: haters of government, and would have the king's power extinguished in matters ecclesiastical, and limited in civil. 6thly, male-contented, who look upon the duke with an evil eye, because themselves are not preferred. 7thly, lawyers, who are very fit in parliaments to second any complaint against both church and king, and all his servants, with their customs, antiquities, records, statutes, precedents, and stories. 8thly, merchants and citizens, who deceive the king of custom. 9thly, innovators, plebeicola.

"That since the time of Henry the 6th, these parliamentary discouragements might be suffered, as being but certain symptoms of subsequent rebellions, civil wars, and the degrading our king, and no one patriot daring to oppose them, lest he incur the reputation of a fool or coward in his country's cause.—E. majesty therefore strengthened himself with some favourite, as whom he might see trust, than many of the nobility, tainted with this desire of oligarchy.

"It behoveth, without doubt, his majesty uphold the Duke against them, who if he be decurted, it will be the corner-stone, on which the demolishing of his monarchy will be based: for if they prevail with this, they will hatch a thousand other demands to his feathers of royalty. They will appear in counselors, servants, alliances, limits of pences, and accompts of his revenues; and if they can, they will now dazzle him in the beginning of his reign.

"Lastly, king James and king Charles the duke's Accusers, in all the asperities are laid upon him. King James, for the most destined for the wars in this time, spent treaties, &c. And his majesty can testify the things done in his time. And although actions of the king, are imputed to the duke: who, if he suffer for obeying his sovereign, the next attempt will be to call the king to account for any thing he undertakes, which doth not prosperously succeed, as all we would desire it.

"If it pleases his majesty to remove and aside all these disadvantages, he shall find a charge against the duke very crapsy, and of small moment: and if his majesty and the duke grace thank it no impeachment to their honour, all that the parliament hath objected against the duke, except two or three things that may receive an answer, is pardoned at the king's coronation, which benefit every poor subject enjoyeth."

The King's Speech concerning the Duke.

May 11. The King came to the parliament, and spake to the house of peers, as followeth:

"My lords; The cause, and only cause of my coming to you this day, is to express in sense I have of all your honours; for he that toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great measure. I have thought fit to take order for the punishing some insolent Speeches lately spoken. I have been too remiss heretofore in punishing such Speeches as concern myself; not that I was greedy of their money, but that Buckingham through his importunity would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his Trial. And to approve his innocency, as touching the matters against him, I myself will be a witness to clear him in every one of them. I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent speeches against myself. And now I hope you will be as tender of my honour, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours."

And so his majesty was pleased to depart.

The Commons' Message to secure the Duke.

The same day this following Message was brought from the commons to the lords, by sir Nathanael Rich:

"The commons taking into serious consideration the main mischiefs and inconveniences which this renowned kingdom doth now suffer, threatening apparent danger to the king and commonwealth, have by search and disquisition into the causes thereof, found that they do principally flow from the exorbitant power, and abusive carriage of the duke of Buckingham, whereof he hath this parliament been impeached before their lordships by the commons, besides an accusation of a peer in their own house, who hath charged him (as they are informed) of High Treason: they therefore with one voice make an entire Declaration, That they hold it a thing of dangerous consequence both for the present and future times, that a man of so great eminence, power, and authority, being impeached and accused of such high crimes and offences, should yet enjoy his liberty; hold so great a part of the strength of the kingdom in his hands, sit as a peer in parliament, and be acquainted with the counsels thereof, whereby inevitable mischief may suddenly fall upon the kingdom. Wherefore they have thought it their duty, to recommend this their unanimous desire to their lordships, as agreeable to law and reason, That they would be pleased forthwith to commit the person of the said duke to safe custody."

The Duke's Speech against the Commons.

Whereupon, the Duke made this Speech in the Lords House:

"My lords; If I should hold my peace, it would argue guilt; if I should speak, it would argue boldness, being so foully accused. Your lordships see what complaints are made against me by the house of commons. How well I stood in their opinions not long since, your lordships know it. What I have done since to lose their good opinions, I protest I know not. I cannot so distrust my own innocency, and my heart which abhors guilt, as to decline any course, or court of justice: and had they not brought my cause to your lordships, it should have been my own work; and they have done me a favour to deliver me out of their hands, into your lordships.

"I will not speak any thing to cast dirt at those, who had taken pains to make me so foul; but to protest my innocency in that measure, which I shall ever hope to prove, it being before such just judges. I desire my trial may be hastened, that I may no longer suffer than I must needs. And now that my accuser hath not been content only to make my process, but to prescribe to your lordships the manner of your judgment, and to judge me before I am heard, I shall not give way to any of their unjust demands, &c."

The Commons resent the Imprisonment of their Members.

The Commons, upon the imprisonment of their Members, and the offence taken by the king at the words spoken by those two gentlemen in impeaching the duke, resolved to proceed in no other business, till they were righted in their Liberties, and ordered, That the house be turned into a Grand Committee presently, to sit and consider of the best ways and means to effect the same, and that no member be suffered to go forth.

Sir Dudley Carlton's Speech on that occasion.

At which time, sir Dudley Carlton observing that unusual, and as he termed it, sullen silence of the house, made this Speech:

"I find (by a great silence in this house) that it is a fit time to be heard, if you please to give me the patience. I may very fitly compare the heaviness of this house unto some of my misfortunes by sea in my travels: for as we were bound unto Merseillis, by oversight of the mariners we mistook our course, and by ill fortune met with a sand; that was no sooner over past, but we fell on another; and having escaped this likewise, we met with a third, and in that we stuck fast. All of the passengers being much dismayed by this disaster, as now we are here in this house for the loss of those two members: at last, an old experienced mariner, upon consultation, affirmed, that the speediest way to come out from the sands, was to know how we came there; so, well looking and beholding the compass, he found by going in upon such a point, we were brought into that straight; wherefore we must take a new point to rectify and bring us out of danger.

"This house of parliament may be compared to the ship; the sands to our messages; and the commitment, to the sands that the ship did stick fast in; and lastly, the compass, to the table where the book of orders doth lie. Then, I beseech you, let us look into the book where the orders are, whether the gentlemen did go no farther than the order did warrant them. If they did not, it is fit that we should defend them whom we employed in our behests: but if they have exceeded their commission, and delivered that which they had not warrant for, it is just that we let them suffer for this presumption; and this our course will bring us from these rocks.

"I beseech you, gentlemen, move not his majesty with trenching upon his prerogatives, lest you bring him out of love with parliaments. You have heard his majesty's often messages to you, to put you forward in a course that will be most convenient. In those messages he told you, That if there were not correspondency between him and you, he should be forced to use new counsels. Now, I pray you, consider what these new counsels are, and may be: I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all

Christian kingdoms, you know that parliaments were in use anciently, by which their kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner, until the monarchs began to know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to stand upon their prerogatives, and at last overthrew the parliaments throughout Christendom, except here only with us.

“And indeed, you would count it a great misery if you knew the subjects in foreign countries as well as myself; to see their look, not like our nation, with store of flesh on their backs, but like so many ghosts, and not men, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing only wooden shoes on their feet; so that they cannot eat meat, or wear good clothes, but they must pay and be taxed unto the king for it. This is a misery beyond expression, and that which yet we are free from: let us be careful then to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth this happiness to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his majesty and his commons; lest we lose the repute of a free-born nation, by turbulency in parliament. For, in my opinion, the greatest and wisest part of a parliament are those that use the greatest silence, so as it be not opiniatory, or sullen, as now we are by the loss of these our members that are committed.

“This good correspondency being kept between the king and his people, will so join their love and favour to his majesty with liking of parliaments, that his prerogative shall be preserved entire to himself, without our trenching upon it; and also the privilege of the subject (which is our happiness) inviolated, and both be maintained to the support of each other. And I told you, if you would hear me patiently, I would tell you what exception his majesty doth take at those gentlemen that are committed. You know that eight members were chosen to deliver the charge against the duke, but there were only six employed for that purpose; insomuch that there was no exception.

“As for sir Dudley Diggs his part, that was the Prologue, and in that his majesty doth conceive that he went too far beyond his commission, in pressing the death of his ever blessed father in these words, ‘That he was commanded by the house, concerning the Plaister applied to the king, That he did forbear to speak further in regard of the king's honour,’ or words to that effect; this his majesty conceiveth to be to his dishonour, as if there had been any under-hand dealing by his majesty, in applying of the plaister, and this may make his subjects jealous of his doings: in this point his majesty is assured, that the house did not warrant him. Now, for that which is excepted against sir John Elliot, his over bitterness in the aggravation upon the whole Charge, and specially upon some of the heads of it: for, if you please to remember, when I moved for putting of the St. Peter of Newhaven on the Charge against the duke of Buckingham and shewed my reasons for that purpose, you know how tender sir John Elliot was of it, as if he had been a child of his own, and so exact in the handling thereof by a stranger, that he would not suffer it to be touched, though never so tender a hand, for fear it may prove changeling: which did manifest, how special soever his pretences were, that he had in cauda: and I must confess, I was very sorry when he delivered his aggravation to the Lords, to see his tartness against the duke when as he had occasion to name him, he gave him the title of ‘This man,’ and ‘This man;’ whereas the other observed more respect and modesty in their Charges against so great a person as the duke is, considering that he was not convicted, but stood reatus in re. Lastly, for pressing the death of his majesty, you know that the sense of the house concluded, That it is only an act of precession; nay, some of them expressly said, ‘God forbid that I should lay the death of the king to his charge.’ If he without warrant from the house, insisted upon the compass of the plaister, as if there were ‘Aliquid quod non patet’; this was beyond his commission from our house, and this is that which his majesty doth except against; and thus drew his majesty, with other insolent invective to use his regal authority in committing us to the Tower.

The Commons' Protestations touching what is imputed to sir Dudley Diggs.

Sir Dudley Diggs being charged for saying the matter of applying the Plaister to his majesty, ‘That he did forbear to speak further of that in regard of the king's honour,’ words to that effect; there passed a Protestation of every man in particular for himself, and it was ordered in the house, That they were sick in the town, should have three of the house sent to them to take this Protestation likewise:

‘I protest before Almighty God and us house of parliament, That I never gave consent that sir Dudley Diggs should speak these words that he is now charged withal, or words to that effect; and I have not assented to any that he did speak such words, or words to that effect.’

Sir D. Diggs released out of prison, protested never spake the Words charged on him.

Within few days after, sir Dudley being released out of prison, came into the house, and made Protestation concerning the passage whereat his majesty had taken offence: the speaking of the plaister applied to the body of the late king, he said, ‘He would forbear to speak any further of it, in regard of the king's honour,’ he protested, that this was not from his words, and that it never came into his thoughts. And he gave the house great thanks for their respect unto him, and said, that if had received from his majesty a gracious testimony of his satisfaction.

And the king himself signifieth to the house by the Vice-Chamberlain, That he understood, out of some Notes which were taken at the Conference, that sir Dudley Diggs had spoken the words wherewith he was charged, but now was satisfied that he did not speak them, nor any words to such effect: nevertheless, the Duke affirmed to the house of peers, that some words were spoken at this late Conference by sir Dudley Diggs, which so far did trench upon the king's honour, that they are interpreted treasonable; and that (had he not been restrained by order of the house) he would then have reprehended him for the same: he therefore earnestly desired, for that divers constructions have been made of those words, and for that they have been diversly reported, that every one of the said reporters would be pleased to produce their notes taken at the conference.

This matter was much debated, and the house of peers often put into a committee, and reassumed again, but they came to no resolution therein. In fine, 36 lords made this voluntary Protestation upon their honours; "That the said sir Dudley Diggs did not speak any thing at the said conference, which did or might trench on the king's honour; and if he had, they would presently have reprehended him for it."

The Lord President affirmed, That he had reported the Words in the same sense they were delivered unto him by the party himself, and though the connexion of them require to be explained, yet he agreed with the rest of the lords, for the party's good meaning, and made the same Protestation.

Sir John Elliot released out of the Tower.

Not long after, sir John Elliot also was released out of the Tower, and sent for to come into the house. Then the Vice-Chamberlain stood up, and by way of explanation of his former speech, said,

"That he intended not to charge him, but to give him an occasion to discharge himself. 1st. That all the others had used respective words in the conference; but for the manner of his speech, he conceived it was too tart and harsh to the person of the duke, and that in representing a character of his mind, by comparing him with a strange beast, he had out-gone his commission. 2dly. That contrary to the sense of the house, as if they were ignorant of the return of the ships out of France, he said, 'They say they are come, but I know it not;' when the house knew it full well. That speaking of the duke, he said, 'That man,' which phrase in all languages, is accounted a great indignity to persons of honour: That he made scandalous comparisons between the duke and Sejanus, and the bishop of Ely, which was likewise besides his charge: That he brake off ambiguously and abruptly with a sentence of Cicero, as if something else might be which was not yet discovered."

VOL. II.

Sir John Elliot thanked the Vice-Chamberlain for dealing so plainly with him, and giving him occasion to clear himself: and to the particulars charged against him, he answered, 1. "Considering the duke's plurality of great and different offices, together with his deceit and fraud, in persuading the merchants to go to Diep, there to entrap them; in colouring the designs to the king, which he had plotted to serve against those of his religion; in abusing the parliament at Oxford; and disguising his purpose, as if the ships were to go to Rochel. These particulars being so various, and of such a nature, he called by the name of Stellionatus, from a beast discoloured, uncertain and doubtful, that they knew not by what name to call it, or by what colour to describe it; and these he called a character of the mind, because they lie in the heart, and were deceits to abuse the king and parliament. 2. As to his saying, 'He knew not the ships were come,' he answered, he did not know it then, and as yet he knew it not, though it was true that he heard it. 3. He denied not, that speaking of the Duke, he sometimes used this word, 'that man,' though at other times he was not wanting to give him his due titles; and said, That the Latines, speaking of Cæsar, called him 'Ille Cæsar,' and that the same is usual in all languages; nor did he think the duke to be a God. 4. He confessed, That he paralleled him with the bishop of Ely and Sejanus; and though there were many particular censures of that bishop, yet he produced none but such as were within the compass of his charge; nor did he apply the venericies and venefices of Sejanus to the duke, but excluded them. Lastly, touching the Physic of the king, he said, he brake off so abruptly in aggravation of the duke's Offence, who, not content with the injury of justice, the wrong of honour, the prejudice of the state, nor that of the revenue, his attempts go higher, even to the person of the king, making on that his practice in such a manner, to such an effect, that he said, he feared to speak, nay, he doubted to think; in which regard he left it, as Cicero did another thing, 'Ne gravioribus, &c.'"

It was then resolved on the question, That sir John Elliot hath not exceeded the commission given him in any thing that passed from him, in the late conference with the lord; the like for sir Dudley Diggs, both passed without a negative: the like vote did pass for Mr. Selden, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Glauville, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Wandesford, who were also managers at that Conference.

On May 26, the Lord Keeper having delivered this Message from the king, viz. "That his majesty hath willed him to signify unto their lordships, that he doth marvel his meaning in his last Answer, about lord Arundel's imprisonment, should be mistaken: and for the better clearing of his intention, hath commanded him to signify unto their lordships his further Answer, which is, That their lordships last Petition was so acceptable to his majesty that his intent was then and is still, to satisfy their lordships fully in what they then desired."—Hereupon it was ordered, That all business be adjourned till that day se'nnight. At the same time the duke of Buckingham signified unto their lordships his desire to have the king's counsel allowed him to plead his Cause: but the lords would not hear him, because they would entertain no business: and so the house was adjourned to the 2d of June.

May 15. The lords took into consideration the king's Message, sent to them on the 8th, about allowing the earl of Bristol counsel in his Trial. And, upon some former orders of the house being read, it was agreed, upon the question, That the Lord Keeper should deliver an humble Answer from their lordships to the king concerning the said Message, which was to this effect:—"Whereas his majesty had lately sent to them a Message concerning the allowance of counsel to the earl of Bristol, their lordships had with all duty advised of that business, and thereupon did humbly signify to him, that the allowance of counsel to the earl of Bristol was ordered before his majesty's Message to them. And that order, as they conceive, did not prejudice any fundamental law of the realm; for, in the parliament of the 22nd of his majesty's blessed father, a general Order was made touching the allowance of counsel to delinquents questioned in parliament; at the voting whereof his majesty, then prince, was present; and that order extended further than this late one for the earl of Bristol."

May 17. The Lord Keeper brought a Reply from the king to the said Answer, viz. "That his majesty had advised of it, and as he considered that himself had recommended this cause to their honour and justice, although he knew that by the fundamental laws of the land, or custom and use of parliaments, counsel was not to be allowed to a person accused of high treason; yet, since his majesty might at his own pleasure descend from his own right and prerogative; and that it may appear to all the world that his majesty in his gracious goodness, is pleased to allow the earl of Bristol all ways of defence, in a more ample measure than is due unto him by law; he is content, and doth hereby give full licence, that, in this particular case, the earl of Bristol may have counsel, both to advise him, and to speak and plead for him. But whereas their lordships Message put his majesty in mind of a general order, made in the 22nd of his blessed father's reign; he remembered that upon the occasion of the earl of Middlesex's Cause, which was only criminal and not capital, an Order was made in the house, which his majesty never, until now, conceived to extend unto causes capital; and he is well assured, that neither the judges were advised with in making that order, nor his late majesty's learned counsel heard for him; therefore his majesty was not satisfied about that general Order, nor that counsel should be allowed in cases capital, without his licence; and would advise further thereof, and then would send again to their lordships touching the general."—Upon the hearing of this Answer from the king, the lords ordered that Mr. Serj. Hedley, Serj. Bramston, Serj. Crawley, and Mr. Anthony Low, should be allowed as Counsel, to speak and plead for the earl of Bristol.

The same day, the duke of Buckingham moved the house, to know whether he should answer the whole Charge, exhibited by the Commons against him, or such parts thereof only as their lordships should appoint: also, whether he should answer the Aggravations of the commons, reported to this house? which he was desirous to do, that he might clear all matters therein.—Upon consideration of this, the lords ordered, "That those Aggravations should be delivered to the clerk, to be kept by him close from all except the members of this house; and no copies to be given to any but them. Likewise, That the duke of Buckingham should answer the engrossed Articles of the Charge sent up by the commons, but not the Aggravations; unless, upon perusal thereof, he should find any thing fit to be answered, or that the house think proper for that purpose. And, for expedition's sake, the duke to have the use of the original Aggravations."

The Earl of Bristol's Speech, by way of Introduction, before he gave in his Answer.

May 19. The Earl of Bristol was brought again to the bar of the lords; when the duke of Buckingham desired that he might have leave to retire, lest his presence should give some distaste to the earl; and he withdrew himself accordingly. Then the Lord Keeper told the earl, That their lordships did expect his answer unto Mr. Attorney's Charge. Upon which he said,

"I am not insensible upon what disadvantages I come to trial in this cause; For first, I am fallen into his majesty's heavy displeasure, and am to encounter with a potent adversary, highly in favour, and am accused for treason; for which, all counsel and friends abandon me, as a man infected with the plague; I am become bound and under restraint; whereas a man who is to encounter for his life and honour, and with a strong adversary, had need to come upon equal terms.

"But as to the matter, I mind myself charged with divers Articles of High Treason; but looking into them with the eyes of my best understanding, with the opinion also of my counsel lately assigned me, and taking them apart one Article from another, I find not any thing in them like treason, or that hath so much as the shew or countenance of a fault, either in act or words: only by laying all things together, and by wresting the wrists with a strained construction, directly contrary to the true sense and meaning of them, and the occasion whereupon they were spoken, it is informed, and that by way of inference only, That the intent was evil, and the matter to prove the intent to be evil, depends upon two props, viz. Ill affection to religion, and too much affection to Spain; which, if I shall clear, the inference grounded upon these props, will fall of itself.—Therefore I crave leave of your lordships, before I give my Answer to the Charge, that I may give you an account of these two particulars; and I humbly beseech you, that what I shall speak in my just defence, may not be conceived to proceed of vain ostentation.

“And first for Religion, I was in my childhood bred in the Protestant religion, and rather after the stricter manner than otherwise. When I grew in years fit, I travelled into France, Italy, and Rome itself: In all which travels, I can produce some that I consorted withal, who will witness with me, that I ever constantly used the religion I professed, without the least prevarication; no man being able to charge me, that so much as out of curiosity I ever was present at any of the exercises belonging to the Roman religion, or did the least act of conformity to any their rites or ceremonies.

“Secondly, after my return home, I was received into the service of his late majesty of blessed memory, whom I served some years as a gentleman of his privy chamber, and carver; in which time, none of his majesty’s servants received the Holy Sacrament, frequented sermons, and other exercises of our religion more than I.

“Thirdly, in that time of my youth, not to avoid idleness, but out of affection to religion, I translated that excellent Book of our faith, and great points of our religion, written by Mr. Moulins; which his late majesty having sometimes after seen, approved so well, that he would needs have it printed; which accordingly was printed in the name of Mr. Sampford my chaplain, to whom I gave the honours: But it was my own act, as Mr. Sampford will not deny, though, to this hour, I had never before spoken it.

“Fourthly, about seven or eight and twenty years of my age, I was employed ambassador into Spain, in that great business of the Treaty of the Marriage; and whereas others before me carried with them but one chaplain, I had two, viz. Mr. Sampford and Mr. Boswel; and at my arrival at the court of Spain, I caused it to be published, that such a day (God willing) I purposed to have a communion, to the end that such English as were in the town, might resort thither. Whereat the duke de Lerma, and other the great ministers of Spain, took offence, and told me, they might well perceive, I brought no good affection to the business I came about, that would so publicly and avowedly in that court, where never the like was done, proclaim there a communion; and with high expressions persuaded me to decline it. Whereunto I answered, I came to do my master’s service, which I would heartily and effectually endeavour, but would not omit my service to God, no, though my master commanded. And at the communion there were present 100 persons, some of them brothers, kinsmen, and near dependants upon some of their lordships, whom I see there in my eye. This I did in Spain; the like I did in Germany, in the emperor’s courts, in my ambassage thither.

“Fifthly, I had in my several employments into Spain and Germany, above 500 persons of all qualities attending upon me, and never one perverted in religion: my children carefully instructed and bred in the same religion. I had constantly every sabbath a sermon in my house; and sacraments, and other exercises of our religion frequented.

“Sixthly, a foul-mouthed Shimei railed against our late king and religion in Spain; how I caused that to be revenged by a near kinsman of my own, is well known.

“Seventhly, one of the English dying in the town of Madrid, of whose religion there was some question made; and the king’s chaplains telling me, that they at the day of his death had been with him, and taken an account of his faith, and that he died a Protestant: I caused him to be brought home to my house, and there buried according to our rites; whereat much ado was made, and it was threatened, that the inquisitors and other officers, would come and fetch him out, and bury him after their manner: I stood upon it, and that it was the king of England’s house, and openly protested, that whosoever should come thither with such intent, I would shoot at him with a piece; and exhorted all my people, that if such an attempt should be, they should, rather than suffer such a dishonour to our religion, die with me in that quarrel, and hoped such English as were in the town would do the like.

“Eighthly, There having been a monastery for English Jesuits, founded and settled at Madrid before my coming thither, and the English arms set up, I laboured to suppress it, and having written thereof to the late king, his majesty advised me not to run my head against the rock, for it was an impossible thing for me to do: yet I undertook it, and it pleased God so to bless my endeavours, that I absolutely dissolved and overthrew it. For which, the bishop of Winchester, Montague, (now with God) wrote unto me by his majesty’s direction, a letter of his majesty’s gracious acceptance of so great a service: telling me, besides the service I had done to the church and commonwealth, it should remain a trophy of honour to me and my posterity for ever: and the king himself, with his own hand, wrote unto me, beginning his Letter, ‘Good fortune Digby, your good luck in your service well deserves that stile.’

“Ninthly, In all negotiations in Spain, in point of religion, I ever straitened my Instructions.

“Tenthly, The Match with Spain was not moved by me, I ever advised a Protestant Match, and shewed many reasons both of conscience and state; but if with a Catholic, then rather with Spain than France, so as good conditions might be made for religion, as appears by a letter I wrote, and delivered to the prince, at his first going upon the employment; for which I had like then to have been ruined for being a Puritan, as I am now for being a Papist, and all by one and the same hand.

“ Eleventhly, And I appeal to the testimony of Dr. Mason and Dr. Wren, the king’s chaplains with me in Spain; and to Mr. Sampford, Mr. Boswel, and Mr. Frewen, my own chaplains there. And that such Papists as have been my ancient acquaintance and friends, being men of worth, well known to many of their lordships, may be examined upon oath, whether I have not in all places, as well in Spain as in England, and at all times upon fit occasions, avowed myself a Protestant, without the least prevarication? Or whether I did ever any the least act that was not suitable to the same profess on? And that Mr. Frewen, Mr. Wake, my own chaplains, may give their testimonies, whether in the time of several dangerous sicknesses, which I had of late years fallen into, I have not in the time of such my sicknesses (when no man can be supposed to dissemble with the world, being ready to leave it) made before them a confession of my faith, and made my peace with God, resolving to die as belittled a Protestant and a good Christian. This I tell your lordships, was my religion I was bred in, have ever professed and lived in, and was resolved by God’s grace, to die in; and yet was so unhappy, by reason of employment, to be distasteful to many good men, that I have been suspected even by them, not well knowing me: and this hath been the rise the duke hath now taken against me. Then for my love to Spain, I wonder from whence that opinion should grow, since I was there hated and shamed, as the man whom, of all others, they desired to have the least to do withal, having stood ever stricter in point of religion, than by my instructions I might have done; as after the capitulation concluded on, they understood by some intelligence, which caused their hatred towards me.

“ Sure I am, I shewed it not by the service I did them; for divers years together there was not a letter sent by that king to any other state, that the king my master had not a copy of before, or by that time it came to the place whither it was directed. There was not any great action on foot, whereof I had not the private instructions, and sent them thither; not any expedition by sea or land, wherein I had not some ministers or intelligencers, that gave me from time to time advertisements of their actions, and most private intentions, whereof I advertised his majesty from time to time. I used such industry, as to get all the papers of that king’s private cabinet into my hands; took copies and notes of such of them as I thought useful; and upon every of them set my private mark before they were conveyed back again, to the end, that if I should have had an occasion to have charged him with any thing mentioned in the same papers, I might have let him see I knew it, by telling him in what paper it was, and marked with such a mark.

“ There was not a port in Spain, that I had not caused the depth of it to be sounded, nor a fort whereof I knew not the strength, both for the garrison, munition, and other matters of advantage and disadvantage; insomuch as if it should please the king to appoint a committee of the lords to take an account of me, I should, by the stores I gathered there, and brought with me, make it appear, I was as useful a servant to his majesty in a war, as in peace. Whereas at his majesty’s coming out of Spain, the powers of the Desponsories were to be deposited in some man’s hand; and the duke upon pretence of doing me honour, but intending to break my neck by it, moved they might be left with me, and the king of Spain was contented; and so they were put into my hands, not as an attorney only for the prince; but the king of Spain having taken the substitution of them by his secretary of state, entered in legal form; whereby that king was then become interested in them by their occupation, as well as the prince by granting of them. And becoming the instrumentum stipulatum, wherein they were both interested, they were deposited into my hands, as an indifferent person, trusted between the king of Spain and the prince, with a declaration of the trust. And now the duke was returned out of Spain, he plotted my ruin, and put it in execution in this manner. He concealed, that the powers were to expire at Christmas, and procured his majesty to write a letter, (not a direct commandment) but expressing a desire, that the Desponsories should not be till one of the days in Christmas, intending thereby to draw me into a dilemma, that if I proceeded in the match, this letter should, as now it is, have been enforced against me, as a breach of instructions: if I had not proceeded, then I had broken my trust between the prince and king of Spain, overthrown the Marriage, so long sought and laboured, it being the main scope of my ambassage, contrary to express warrant, and that upon a letter I must needs know to be a mistake. And when I had written into England, to have a direct warrant in the point, the duke then seeing that plot would not take, he dealt with divers great lords, as was well known to some of their lordships there present, to have me, upon my arrival in England, committed to the Tower, before I should ever come to speak with the king; which the Spanish ambassador, here in England, having gotten private notice of, gave advertisement thereof to that king: who thereupon foreseeing my danger, and consulting with his council and divines, what were fit for him in honour and conscience to do in that case, they resolved, that seeing my sufferings grew by being an honest man, and endeavouring to perform the trust reposed in me by that king, as well as the prince; that king was bound both in honour and conscience, not only to preserve me from ruin, but to make me a reparation for any loss I should sustain by occasion of the trust: Whereupon, at his departure, going to court to take his leave, the conde

Olivares told me, what was plotted against me in England; and in respect of the danger, by reason of the greatness of my adversary, persuaded me to stay there, and in his master's name made an offer, not in secret, but in the presence of sir Walter Aston."

Here he repeated those offers of reward, honour, and preferment, he then proceeded, and said: "Upon what grounds and hope came I to encounter with those dangers? Not upon hope of my greatness in court, and strength of friends there, to bolster out an ill cause; no sure, my strength was too weak, and my adversaries too powerful. But I knew my conscience was clear, and my cause good, and trusted in God Almighty. And to him now, and to their lordships' judgments, recommend myself, and my cause."

THE ANSWER OF THE EARL OF BRISTOL TO THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT.

And then he delivered his ANSWER, desiring their lordships it might be after recorded in parchment, that it might remain to posterity; which being read by one of his council, the Lord Keeper asked him, Whether he desired to say any more than he had done? he answered, That he had something more to say, but knew not the order, or whether Mr. Attorney would speak first; but he being desired to speak, he desired their lordships he might put them in mind of what he conceived they had already premised; which was, That the duke, whom he accused in that house of far higher offences, than any with which he was charged, might be proceeded with as he was, and that they might be upon equal conditions. And that such heads as he had delivered against the duke, being of such matters as he met withal in his negotiation as an ambassador, and which he had, according to his duty, acquainted the state withal, might, by their lordships care and order, be put into legal form, and prosecuted; for so was the use, when he had the honour to sit at the council table. He said, he conceived he had already done his part to inform, and would be ready to make it good, it concerning their lordships to see it prosecuted, it not being to be expected that he should solicit it; or if he would, he could not, being under restraint. And he desired likewise, that the judges might deliver their opinions, Whether the matter charged against him were treason; that if it should not be so in their opinions, he might not lie under so heavy a burden.—He put their lordships in mind, that it was a strange manner of proceeding, that upon a displeasure, a peer of the kingdom complaining of those that had practised against him, and had been the causers of his sufferings, should then, and never but then, be charged with treason. He told them, it was not his case alone, but it equally concerned them, and their posterity, and, it might be, some others hereafter, more than him now. For, he said, he thanked God, he had some experience in the world, and thereby, and by those things he had kept, was able to make his innocency appear, which, perhaps, would not be every man's hereafter; and so many an honest heart in a good cause distracted with fears, and abandoned of friends, might perish through the malice of a potent adversary.

The lords again asked him whether he had any thing more to say? he answered, No, but desired leave only to explain himself in two things; one in his speech now spoken, and the other when he was first brought to the house. That in his speech this day, was, where he affirmed, he had like to have been ruined in his negotiation: first, for being a Puritan, and now for being a Papist, and both by one hand; he explained it to be by the hand of the duke of Buckingham. And the other when he first came to the house, saying there, for redress of former sufferings, and meeting on the sudden with treason charged upon him, he spake in passion, expressing the wrongs and injuries done him by the duke; and told their lordships, he had used means to convey part of his sufferings to the late king his master, who, in the duke's hearing, swore he would (after he had heard the duke against him) hear him also against the duke; for which his majesty suffered much, or to some such purpose. Now he understandeth this speech to reflect upon what was in agitation in the lower house; but he said, although he could not well excuse the duke's indiscretion in that point, yet he spake it not any ways to corroborate that opinion; for howsoever the duke were his enemy, yet he could not think so dishonourably of him.

The house was pleased to allow that his own Counsel might read his Answer, as follows; the Earl sitting by on a stool all the while, and explaining or enforcing any part thereof.

"The ANSWER of JOHN Earl of BRISTOL to the ARTICLES of several HIGH TREASONS, and other great and enormous Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, supposed to be committed by him against our late sovereign lord king James of blessed memory, deceased; and our sovereign lord the king's majesty that now is; wherewith the said Earl is charged by his majesty's Attorney General, on his majesty's behalf, in the most high and honourable Court of Parliament, before the king and the lords there.

"The said earl not acknowledging any of the supposed treasons, crimes, offences, or contempts wherewith he is charged in and by the said Articles to be true; and saving to himself all advantage and benefit of exception, to the uncertainty and insufficiency of the said Articles, and several Charges in them contained: and humbly praying that his cause may not suffer for want of legal form, whereunto he hath not been inured; but may be adjudged according to such real and effectual grounds and proofs, as may be expected from an ambassador, the ground of the charge growing thence: and that he may have leave to explain himself and his own meaning, in any thing that may seem to admit of a doubtful construction, for Answer saith as followeth :

“ I. To the First Article he saith, That he did not advance or further the design of the king of Spain against our late sovereign lord the king, his children, friends, and allies ; or traitorously, falsely, wilfully, or as a traitor to our late sovereign lord the king, by any letters, or other messages, sent in the years 1621, 2, 3, or at any other time, inform, advise, or assure the said late king, that the emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, would really, fully, or effectually make restitution, or plenary restoration, to the count Palatine and his children, of the dominions, territories, and possessions of the said count, or of the electoral dignity ; or that the king of Spain did really, fully, or effectually intend the Marriage between the lady his sister, and the prince our said sovereign lord, according to the articles formerly propounded between the said two kings, as by the said Article is alledged ; neither does or did he, the said earl, know that the emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution or restoration as aforesaid, or that the king of Spain never really intended the said Marriage, as by the said Article is alledged ; nor doth he the said earl know that the emperor or king of Spain, or either of them, intended by the said Treaties, in the Article mentioned, to give time for compassing their own ends or purposes, to the detriment of this kingdom, as by the said Article is also alledged ; neither was the said late king James made secure upon any such false assurances given unto him by the said earl, or thereby lost the opportunity of time ; nor were the dominions, territories, and possessions of the count Palatine, or the electoral dignity, thereby lost, or any part thereof taken out of the possession of the said king James : nor the said count Palatine, the lady Elizabeth his wife, or their children, dispossessed, disinherited, or bereaved thereof, or of any part thereof, by any act or default of him the said earl ; nor did, nor was he, the said earl, the cause of any thing to the dishonour of our said late sovereign lord king James, or to the disherison of the said late king's children, or their posterity ; to the disanimating or discouraging of any of the rest of the princes of Germany, nor any other kings or princes in amity and league with his said late majesty ; nor did any thing in or concerning the same contrary to his duty and allegiance, or contrary to the trust and duty of an ambassador, or falsely, wilfully, or traitorously, or as a traitor to our said sovereign lord the king, in any such sort, or by any such means, ways, or inducements, as by the said Article is supposed, or by any other ways or means whatsoever : but the said earl dealt therein, and in all his said trusts as an ambassador, carefully, faithfully, and honestly, and as became a faithful and loyal subject, servant, counsellor, and ambassador. And for a clear demonstration of the truth and manner of his proceedings, touching the matter contained in the said Article, the same consisting of several parts, viz. the loss of the said Palatinate, and the Match with the said lady of Spain, and of his several employments ; as of one extraordinary Ambassage to the emperor, of another to the king of Spain, in the years 1621, 2, and 3, aforesaid, he humbly craveth leave of this most high and honourable court to separate the business, and to distinguish the times.

“ And, beginning with the Palatinate first, to give an Account of his Ambassage to the Emperor ; and so to make as brief a deduction as he can of his whole carriage in that business, from the beginning of his employment to the time he left it. In this ambassage to the emperor he propounded all things faithfully according to his instructions ; and the answers which he returned to his late majesty were the very same, and none other, than such as were given him by the emperor, under his hand and the imperial seal ; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully sent unto his said majesty ; and withal, did honestly, faithfully, and truly advertise his said majesty what he understood and thought then upon the place : but was so far from giving unto his said majesty any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote unto the lords of the council, here in England, from Vienna, the 26th of July, 1621, in sort as followeth, viz. “ I am further to move your lordships, that there may be a dispatch made presently into Spain, to his majesty's ambassador and Mr. Cottington, that they there deal effectually for the preparing and ripening of the business against my coming ; and that they use some plain and direct language, letting the ministers there know, that the late letter sent by the king of Spain to the emperor, was colder and more reserved than his majesty had reason to expect. I shall conclude with telling your lordships, that though I despair not of good success in this knotty business, yet I hope his majesty and your lordships lay not aside the care of all fitting preparations for a war, in case a peace cannot honourably be had ; and amongst other things, I most earnestly recommend unto your lordships, and, by your lordships, unto his majesty, the continuing abroad, yet for some small time, of sir Robert Mansel's fleet upon the coasts of Spain ; which, in case his majesty should be ill-used, will prove the best argument he can use for the restitution of the Palatinate.”—And the said earl further saith, That this his advice was really seconded by his actions, by being the cause, as he returned homeward out of Germany, of the bringing down of the count Mansfelt, whereby the town of Frankendale was relieved, and, by supplying of his majesty's army, then in great distress, with money and plate, to the value of 10,000*l.* merely out of his zeal and affection to the good of the king and his children, having no order or warrant for the doing of it ; but might easily have excused it, either through want of order, or want of means ; but that his heart was ever really bent in effects, more than shews, to serve the king's son-in-law and his cause, as by the discourse of this business will appear. And how acceptable these services then were, will appear by the Letters of the Queen of Bohemia, dated in Oct. 1621, in these words following:—"My lord; Having understood from Heidelberg, how you have shewn your affection to the king and me in all things, and in the help of money you have lent our soldiers, I cannot let such an obligation pass without giving you many thanks for it by these lines, since I have no other means to shew my gratefulness unto you; howsoever, assure yourself, that I shall never be forgetful of the testimonies you give me of your love, which I entreat you to continue, in doing the king and me all the good offices you can to his majesty; you have been an eye-witness of the miserable estate our countries are in: I intreat you therefore to solicit his majesty for our help. You have given me assurance of your affection, I intreat you now to shew it by helping us, in your good endeavours to his majesty, and you shall ever bind me to continue, as I am already, your very affectionate friend,

"The Earl likewise received several other letters, about the same time, both from the king of Bohemia and council of Heidelberg, to the same effect. And how much satisfaction his late majesty received in that behalf, and touching that business, will several ways appear, and particularly by his speech to the parliament. And the said earl likewise appealeth to both houses of parliament, to whom, by his late majesty's order, he gave a just and true Account of that employment; with what true zeal he proceeded, and how he pressed that single treaties and promises might no longer be relied on, but that a fitting preparation for a war might go, hand in hand, with any treaty of accommodation; and, for a conclusive testimony of his late majesty's approbation of his carriage in this employment, he humbly desireth that a letter of the duke of Buckingham's, under his own hand, bearing date the 11th of Oct. 1621, may be read: viz.—"My lord, I am exceeding glad your lordship hath carried yourself so well in this employment, that his majesty is not only infinitely pleased for the service you have done, for which he commanded me to give your lordship thanks in his name, until he see you himself; but that you have given all men cause to commend his majesty's choice of such a man, that, unless your heart had gone with the business, could never have brought it to so good a pass. Amongst other things his majesty liketh very well the care of clearing his honour, whereof he will advise further with your lordship at your coming over. I hope you will not find your negotiation with the infantina of such difficulty as you seem to fear in your letter, seeing my brother Edward hath brought with him a letter from his majesty's son-in-law, whereby he putteth himself wholly to his majesty's advice and pleasure for his submission. And as for the money your lordship hath so very seasonably laid out, his majesty will see you shall sustain no loss; holding it very unreasonable you should suffer any thing by the care of his service, which you have shewed so much to his contentment, and the great joy of your lordship's faithful servant,

G. BUCKINGHAM."

"Having given this Account of his Employment with the Emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make it known in what sort, before this his employment, he endeavoured to serve the prince Palatine and his cause; which will best appear by his majesty's own testimony, upon the going of sir Francis Nethersale to the prince Palatine; at which time his majesty being, out of his royal and just heart, desirous to do a faithful servant right, commanded sir Francis Nethersale to let the prince Palatine understand how good a servant the said earl had been unto him, and how active in his affairs; as will best appear by a dispatch of sir Francis Nethersale, written all in his own hand, to sir George Calvert, in answer to what was commanded him, dated at Prague 11th August 1622, and sent by his late majesty to the said earl for his comfort, being as followeth:—"Right honourable; That you may the better be assured, that I have neither forgotten nor neglected the commandment received from his majesty by your honour, you will be pleased to have the patience to hear me report what I said to the king upon delivery of my lord Digby's letters to his majesty, which was, that the king my master, whose justice is so much renowned over the world, did use to shew it in nothing more than in vindicating his servants from wrongful opinions, whereof he knew noble hearts were more sensible than of injuries done to their persons or fortunes; that, out of his royal disposition, his majesty having found my lord Digby mistaken by some of his people at home, by occasion of his being by him employed in the affairs with Spain; and having thereupon conceived a jealousy that the said noble lord might also be misrepresented hither to the prince Palatine, had, in that respect, given me a particular commandment to assure the prince, that his highness had not a more truly affectionate servant in England; and, for proof thereof, to let the prince understand, that whereas the baron Donagh, now his highness's ambassador in England, had, since his coming thither, obtained but three great points for his master's service, to wit, the Loan of Money from the king of Denmark, the Contributions in England of the city and country, and the sending of ambassadors to the contrary party: that the lord Digby had been the first propounder of all those to the king my master, before his highness's ambassador, or any other of his servants in England; although his lordship had been contented, that others who were but set on should carry away the thanks and prize; because his lordship being known to be the first mover therein, might possibly weaken the credit he hath in Spain, and so render him the more unable to serve both his own master and the prince; in which respect I humbly prayed his highness also to keep this to himself.—By which testimony it may appear, as the said earl conceiveth, how he the said earl behaved himself before his said ambassage and in his said ambassage, with his said late majesty's approbation thereof.—Now he most humbly craveth leave to give your lordships an Account how he proceeded after his Return from the emperor's court: as soon as he came into England, he discovered to his majesty and the lords of his council, in what great want he had left the forces in the Palatinate, and solicited the present sending away of money; and thereupon 30,000*l.* was borrowed of sir Peter Vanlore, sir Baptist Kirks, and sir Wm. Cockaine, and presently sent into the Palatinate, besides the 10,000*l.* which he had lent, for which he paid the interest out of his own purse 6 months; having also given, not long before, 500*l.* by way of Benevolence, to the service of the said Palatinate. Now, in the interim betwixt his return from the emperor, which was in November 1621, and his going into Spain, in May, 1622, he first gave an Account, as is aforesaid, of his embassage, to both the houses of parliament; and moved them to be as effectual as was possible for the supplying of his majesty, and that the money might be wholly employed for the succour of the Palatinate. The parliament being dissolved, he solicited, with great care and industry, the settling of some course for the supplying of the Palatinate; and his majesty was persuaded to maintain 8,000 foot and 1,600 horse under his own standard, and in his pay, in the Palatinate, and to establish a certain course for the due payment of the said army: and the lord Chichester was upon his, the said earl's motion, sent for out of Ireland; and he the said earl, by his majesty's commandment, took care of his dispatch. In this estate the said earl left this affair at his departure towards Spain, in 1622, nothing doubting but all things would have effectually and constantly been pursued, according to the order which was settled and resolved on at his departure. On his arrival at the court of Spain, he presently proceeded according to his instructions, pressing the business of the Palatinate as effectually as could be, and faithfully laboured, and effected from time to time, (as far as the point of Negotiation) all the particulars that were given him in charge; as will appear by his late majesty's letters upon every particular occasion. And, if by accident, such as the marquis of Baden, count Mansfelt, and the duke of Brunswick's receiving each of them an overthrow that summer; or by neglect, or ill-ordering the affairs there, (whereof his late majesty so far complained to his son-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his majesty's letters of the 3d of June, 1622, as also by his letter to sir Horace Vere and the lord Chichester, if there were not a speedy redress,) those businesses have miscarried, the earl hopeth he shall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him or his employment; having so far, and so honestly, with his best affections, employed his care and utmost service in the business: and his majesty was pleased, by many several letters, upon several occasions, to signify his gracious acceptance of his service, as in his letter of the 24th of November 1622, from Newmarket, writing as followeth, viz. "Your dispatches are in all points so full, and in them we receive so good satisfaction, as in this we shall not need to enlarge any further, but only to tell you we are well pleased with the diligent and discreet employing of your endeavours in all that concerneth our service; so are we likewise with the whole proceedings of our ambassador, sir Walter Aston. Thus we bid you heartily farewell."—And afterwards his majesty was likewise pleased, in his letter of the 7th of January 1623, a little before our gracious sovereign lord the king, then prince, his coming into Spain, to write as followeth, viz. "Concerning that other unfortunate knotty affair of the Palatinate, to say the truth, as things stand, I know not what you could have done more than you have done already."—And whereas it is objected, that the Palatinate should be lost by the hopes he, the said earl, gave by his letters out of Spain, it is an objection of impossibility; for there was nothing left but Manheim and Frankendale, when his first letters, out of Spain, could possibly come to his late majesty's hands; for he did not begin there to negotiate in that business until August, 1622; and about that time Heidelberg, and all but Manheim and Frankendale, was lost; and Manheim he had saved by his industry, had it not been so suddenly delivered, as is by his majesty acknowledged, by his letter of the 24th Nov. 1622, writing thus, viz. "And howsoever the order given to the Infanta, for the relief of Manheim, came too late, and after the town was yielded into the hands of Tilly; yet must we acknowledge it to be a good effect of your negotiation, and an argument of that king's sincere and sound intention."—And Frankendale being by the said earl's means once saved, was again the second time saved merely by his the said earl's industry in procuring a letter from the king of Spain, dated the 2nd of Feb. 1623, whereupon followed the Treaty of Sequestration, which hath since continued: and he the said earl was so far from hindering succours, by any letter or counsel of his, that he was the solicitor, and, in great part, the procurer of most of the succours that had been sent thither, as is formerly set down: and when his royal majesty that now is, arrived at the court of Spain with the duke of Buckingham, they found the said business of the Palatinate in so fair a way, that the Spanish ministers told them the king should give his late majesty a blank in that business to frame his own conditions, as appeareth by his late majesty's letter of the 8th Oct. 1623, as followeth, viz.

'Our son did write to us out of Spain, that that king would give us a blank in which we ' might frame our own conditions, and the same he confirmeth to us now.'—And the like touching the blank was also acknowledged by the duke of Buckingham, in his speech in parliament, after the return of his majesty out of Spain. It will appear by the testimony of sir Walter Aston, and by his and the earl's dispatches, that the said earl wanted not industry and zeal in this business; insomuch that the last answer the earl procured therein from the king of Spain, was fuller than he, the said earl, was ordered by his late majesty's latest letters to insist upon; so as by that which hath been alledged, the said earl hopeth your lordships will be satisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor industry; but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully served their majesties and the prince Palatine in this cause. And forasmuch as, in that affair, he had all the assurances that could be betwixt Christian princes; if therein there hath been any deceit (as by the said Article is intimated), which he never knew, nor believed, he referreth it to God to punish their wickedness; for, betwixt princes, there can be no greater tye than their words, oaths, hands, and seals; all which he procured in that behalf: and both he, the said earl, and sir Walter Aston, were so confident that the business would be ended to his late majesty's satisfaction, that, in a joint dispatch to his said late majesty of the 23rd of Nov. 1623, after his now majesty's return into England, they wrote as follows:—" We hope that your majesty may, according to your desire, signified to me the earl of Bristol, by the letter of the 8th Oct. give to your majesty's royal daughter, this Christmas, the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and sufferings; as also unto the prince, your son, the congratulation of being married to a most excellent princess."

" Having thus given your lordships an account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will, by your lordships good favour, proceed to the other part of the Charge concerning the Marriage. And, first, touching the hopes and assurances, that he is charged to have given to his late majesty and ministers of state here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the said Match, when it is said he knew they never meant it; he saith, He never gave any hopes of their real proceeding, but such and the very same that were first given unto him, without adding or diminishing; neither could he have done otherwise with honesty or safety. And he further saith, That the hopes he gave were not upon slight and vain intelligence, but, as well in that of the Match as the other of the Palatinate, his advertisements were grounded upon all the assurances, both upon word and writing, that could pass betwixt Christians; as will be made evidently appear by his dispatch of the 9th Sept. 1623; which he humbly desired may be read, if the length of it may not displease: the substance of it being to shew by all the engagements and promises of the king of Spain, that he really intended the Match; and the cause why the conde D'Olivares pretended to the duke of Buckingham, that the Match was not formerly meant, was only thereby to free himself from the treating any longer with the said earl, so the end he might treat for larger conditions, in point of religion, with the said duke; the said conde D'Olivares taking advantage of having the person of his majesty, then prince, in their hands: and with this dispatch the said earl acquainted his majesty that now is, then in Spain, before he sent it. And his majesty upon the reading of it, was pleased to say, That the earl had proceeded with so much caution and care, that, in case the Spaniards should be false, he might be sure to shame them for their falshood. By this dispatch the said earl doubteth not but it will appear to this most honourable court, That whilst the treating of that business was in his hands he proceeded in it, not only with care and industry, but with some measure of vigilancy.—For the clearing of an objection that hath been alledged, viz. That the Match was never meant before the duke's going into Spain, nor after; the earl craveth leave to set down some few reasons, of many, which caused him to believe that the said Match had been really meant; and that it was so conceived, by both their majesties and the king of Spain, and their chief ministers on both sides, for the following reasons: 1. The duke of Buckingham certified to his late majesty, That the business of the Marriage was brought to a happy conclusion; whereupon his late majesty was pleased to give order to the said duke and earl to proceed in other business, which his said late majesty would not have treated until the Marriage was concluded; as will appear by a letter of his late majesty jointly to the duke of Buckingham, and the said earl, of the 23d July, 1623. 2. It will appear by letters of the lord Conway to the duke of Buckingham, bearing date 3rd and 4th Sept. 1623, that the said duke had good assurance of the conclusion of the said Match; and, upon this confidence, all things were put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and the lord Conway, and others, fully settled and agreed all the points of immunity and liberty for the Roman Catholics for the use of their religion, as was set down in the Declaration of the 9th Aug. 1623, hereafter mentioned in the Answer to the 5th Article of this Charge. 3. The very day that his now majesty and the duke of Buckingham departed from the Escorial, in Spain, towards England, the said duke solemnly swore to the Treaty of the said Marriage, and the furthering of it all that should be in his power, upon the Holy Evangelists, in the presence of the said earl and sir Walter Aston. 4. The Treaty of Marriage had formerly been signed, sealed, and solemnly sworn to by the king of Spain; and when his majesty and that king took their leaves, the king of Spain did solemnly protest, on the word of a king, faithfully and punctually to perform all that had been capitulated in the Treaty of the Marriage; and hereupon embraced his majesty at his departure; and the very next day sent a letter unto his majesty all written with his own hand, and protesting to make good all that he had capitulated or promised to his majesty at his departure the day before; so that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the Marriage, as by Mr. Attorney is pretended, yet certainly the said earl hath not been slightly deceived: neither can it be, as he conceiveth, any fault in him; since not only his late majesty but his majesty that now is, and the duke of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, (and that upon other grounds than the informations, suggestions, or persuasions of the said earl) that the Marriage was really intended; and to that effect, both his late majesty and his majesty that now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him, the said earl, several letters, assuring him that their intents and pleasures were to have the said Match proceeded in: and thereupon the powers of his majesty then prince, were again renewed, and sent unto the said earl; so that the said earl having so many and so great causes to be assured that the Match was really intended on both sides, he conceiveth it will be hard for Mr. Attorney to make good that part of his Charge, wherein he affirmeth, That the earl should know the contrary, or give assurances upon false grounds, as in the said Article is alleged."

"II. To the Second Article the said earl saith; That he did not falsely, wilfully, or traitorously, or contrary to his allegiance, or the trust or duty of an ambassador, continue the Treaties upon Generalities, without effectual pressing the king of Spain unto particular conclusions, according to his late majesty's instructions or directions; nor intended to have continued the said Treaties upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties or direct conclusions; nor did therein any thing to the dishonour of his said late majesty or to the danger or detriment of his majesty's person, his crown or dominions, or of his confederates or allies, as by the said Article is alledged; but directly denieth all the supposed offences wherewith he standeth charged by the said Article: and, for a clear declaration and manifestation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, that it may appear to this high and most honourable court, how far he hath been from offending in that kind, nor continuing the said Treaties one day longer than necessity enforced, but rather pressing beyond than coming any way short of his instructions and directions: he farther saith, first, as to the continuing of the Treaties upon generalities, that the temporal articles were, by agreement on both sides, not to be treated or settled, until such time as the articles of religion were fully agreed; for that it was held most proper and honourable for both sides, first to see if the difficulties of religion might be reconciled before they passed into further engagements; and the said articles of religion, by reason of the pope's new demands sent into England by Mr. Gage, were not signed nor condescended unto by his late majesty nor his majesty that now is, then prince, until the 5th Jan. 1622, and then were sent away post out of England to the said earl by Mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid in Spain, about the 25th of the same month: but the earl's care was such to have no time lost in the settling the temporal articles, that before he would condescend (so much as de leue esse) unto the articles of religion that they should be sent back again unto Rome, he procured the king of Spain to promise that within the time limited for the procuring of the dispensation (which was by March or April following at the farthest) all the temporal articles should be settled and agreed; to the end the Infanta might be delivered at the spring, as, by the king of Spain's answer in writing, was declared to be that king's intention; and accordingly sir W. Aston and the said earl did, not in general, but most industriously, labour to settle all particular articles, (as they did most of them,) viz. That the portion should be two millions, it appearing that it was so agreed by the late king of Spain, the present king's father; that, the dispensation coming, the desponsories should be within 40 days after, and the Infanta's departure from Madrid should be within 20 days after that; and that don Duarte de Portugal should be the man that should attend the Infanta in the journey: and all other particulars necessary for the conclusion of the said Treaty, were by sir W. Aston, the said earl, and the Spanish commissioners, drawn up into heads in writing; and after many debates they were consulted with that king, and the 2nd of March, 1622, O. S. the conde de Gondomar and the secretary don Andreas de Prada, were appointed to come home to the house of the said earl, to signify unto sir W. Aston and himself, (as they did) that the king of Spain had declared his resolution in all the particulars, and given them order to come to a speedy conclusion with them of all things: and that king's answer to that conclusion the earl saw and read, all written with the said king of Spain's own hand.— On the 7th of the same month of March, the king's majesty then prince, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid, and then the Spaniards took new hopes, and the negotiation was put into a new form; so that where it is objected against the earl, that he entertained and continued the Treaty so long upon Generalities, he conceiveth it is not meant of the spiritual articles, for they were such as were sent from Rome to England, and from thence they came to the earl; and for the temporal articles, they not being to be settled or treated till the articles of religion were concluded, he conceiveth it cannot be alledged with any colour, that in them his majesty was entertained with generalities; since from the time that the said articles of religion were brought unto the said earl by Mr. Simon Digby, being about the 25th of Jan. there were but six weeks until the 7th of March following, when his majesty then prince, arrived in Spain; and in the interim all the above specified particulars were settled: and the time that hath been spent in this Treaty hath not been through his the said earl's default, in continuing upon generalities, without pressing to particulars, but hath been caused as well by difficulties which the business brought with it, as also by exterior accidents, viz. the wars of Bohemia, the death of two popes, and of the late king of Spain, without the least fault of the said earl's, as is acknowledged by his late majesty in the said earl's instructions of the 14th March, 1621; neither could any delay therein be attributed unto him the said earl, for he was employed in those times into Flanders and Germany; and sir Walter Aston and sir Francis Cottington, for the space of three or four years, were resident in Spain; from whence the hopes they gave were upon all the discreet grounds that ministers can expect from a state: but the earl resumed this business only six months before his majesty's coming into Spain; and he was so desirous to see his majesty, then prince, bestowed, that he pressed nothing so much, both to the king and the prince, as that the prince might lose no more time, and rather break the Match with Spain, than suffer any further delays, as will appear by the dispatches from his first arrival at the court of Spain, until his majesty, then prince, his coming; for in his letters of the 20th June, 1622, being the first he wrote after his first audience, he was so desirous that no time might be lost, that in them he craveth leave of his then majesty that in case he should find any delays in Spain, he might (without expecting any new order) take his leave and come home. And upon the return of sir Francis Cottington in Sept. following, he wrote both to the king and his majesty then prince, viz. to the king as followeth: 'I shall presume to add to that which Mr. Cottington shall deliver unto your majesty by word of mouth, of the present state of the Match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a speedy issue; that your majesty will be pleased positively to declare what will do in point of religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this king shall procure the dispensation, or conclude the Match without it; that in case there should be any further delay therein, then, I may declare your majesty disengaged, and free to bestow the prince in such sort as you shall judge most convenient.' And to the prince at the same time he wrote in the subsequent words, viz. 'That which will be necessary for his majesty presently to do on his majesty's part, is to declare himself how far he will be pleased to extend in point of religion, in such form as Mr. Cottington will propound unto your highness; and that he set me a prefixed limited time to break or conclude the Match, either with the dispensation or without it; and for the rest it may be left to my negotiation; but your highness may be pleased to hasten this his majesty's resolution with all possible

'speed.' And the said earl saith: that having received from his said late majesty the resolution in point of religion, and a limited time, according to his desire; he was so precise and punctual therein, that although the making or breaking of the Marriage depended upon it, he would not give one month's longer time, for the procuring of the dispensation, until he had first acquainted his said late majesty therewith, and received his directions under his own hand; as will appear by his said majesty's letters of the 25th Oct. 1622, as followeth:—"Right trusty and well beloved cousin and counsellor, we greet you heartily well. Whereas by your last letters written to our secretary, dated 29th Sept. you are desirous to have our pleasure signified unto you under our own hand, whether we will be contented or not to have a month's longer time for the coming of the dispensation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in case they shall there conclude all things else to our contentment, with a resolution to send the Infanta hither next spring; we do hereby declare unto you, that in such case you shall not break with them for a month's longer delay; we also wish you not to trouble yourself with the rash censure of other men, in case your business should not succeed, resting in that full assurance of our justice and wisdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful servant by the effect of things so contingent and variable; and with this assurance we bid you heartily farewell."—And he further said, That when he had agreed unto the Articles of Religion, and that a settled time was appointed for the coming of the dispensation and a conclusion of the Match, although he would bind himself to nothing without his majesty's approbation, yet, for that no time might be lost, he agreed to the propositions, de bene esse, sent by Mr. Porter on the 10th Dec. 1622; to the end the Articles might be sent immediately to Rome, without losing so much time as to hear first from England, and humbly moved, that in case his majesty should approve of the said Articles, he would send his approbation directly to Rome, for the gaining of time, which his majesty was pleased to do: and at that time he wrote both to his said late majesty and his now majesty then prince, viz. to his majesty as followeth: 'This is the true state of the business as it now standeth; if your majesty approve of what is done, I hope it will have a happy and short conclusion; if your majesty think it not fit to allow of these articles, I have done the utmost of my endeavours, and shall humbly persuade your majesty not to lose a day longer in the Treaty; so much it importeth your majesty and your kingdoms that the prince were bestowed.'—And to the prince, in letters of the like date, in this sort: I presume now to write unto his majesty that which I think my duty to say likewise unto your highness; That in case you should not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be lost in this ‘ Treaty; for it is of so great consequence that your highness were bestowed, that it importeth almost as much that you were speedily, as willingly, married; but I hope that his majesty and your highness, will in such sort approve of this last agreement, as you will speedily bring this long Treaty to a happy conclusion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better terms, and therefore I deal clearly with your highness; and do not only most humbly persuade, but, on my knees, beg it of you, that you either resolve to conclude this Match as you may, or speedily to break it off, and bestow yourself elsewhere; for no less than the happiness of your kingdoms, and the security of the king your father and yourself, depend upon it.—All which things being considered, the earl most humbly submitteth himself to the judgment of this most high and honourable court, whether those delays, which several accidents have brought forth in this business, can be attributed to his fault; since, on the one side, he hopeth it will evidently appear unto your lordships, That he ever moved his majesty and the prince to admit of no delays, but rather to think of some other course; and on the other side, it will appear by all his dispatches, that he pressed things with the ministers of Spain to as speedy a conclusion, as the utmost terms of fair negotiation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended that the Spaniards should take occasion, by entertaining the said Treaties, to abuse his late majesty (which he knoweth not) yet he saith, That he used all the industry and vigilancy that a careful minister could do, and got from the Spaniards all the assurances, by oaths, words, and writings, which could be expected from Christians, the which he faithfully, without adding or diminishing, represented unto his said majesty; and his said majesty in those times, was pleased to conceive upon those assurances, that they dealt really with him: and he conceiveth that his majesty that now is, then prince, and the duke of Buckingham, were pleased to write as much to the late king’s majesty, at their first coming into Spain; and that all which the said earl had written touching that employment, was there avowed by the conde D’Olivares, and conde de Gondomar, to the said prince and duke, at their arrival at Madrid; and he hopeth that, when his dispatches are perused, it will appear and be adjudged, That he served his majesty with some measure of vigilancy, as well as fulness of fidelity.”

“ III. To the Third Article the said earl saith; That he did not, either by word or letters to his late majesty or his ministers, extol or magnify the greatness or power of the king of Spain; nor represented to his late majesty the supposed dangers, that would ensue unto him if a war should happen between him and the said king of Spain; nor affirmed, nor insinuated, as in the said Article is mentioned, to any such intent as by the said Article is alleged. But if he did at any time speak or write of the power or greatness of the king of Spain, or represented any dangers to his late majesty that might ensue, by entering into hostility with the said king, it was as a faithful counsellor and servant to his muster, by way of advice and opinion, which he ever delivered sincerely, faithfully and truly, according to the present occasion; and in no wise to any such intents as in the said Article is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpose whatsoever. But he hath been so far from dissuading his late majesty to take arms, that he hath upon all just occasions advised, that all fitting preparations for war might be made, as (beginning with the year 1621, from which time he is only charged,) will appear by his speech in parliament presently upon his return out of Germany, ‘ That he hoped his majesty would rely no longer upon single treaties, but make all fitting preparations for a war, and that the parliament would enable his majesty thereunto:’ and by the care he took before his going again upon his ambassage into Spain, that the establishment of an army, under his majesty’s own standard, of horse and foot, and in his own pay, might be fully settled and provided for, as likewise his advice to the lords of the council, that his majesty might have a curb upon the king of Spain upon all occasions, by continuing of sir Rob. Mansel’s fleet upon the coasts of Spain, as will appear by his letter written from Vienna, 26th July, 1621, mentioned in the Answer to the first Article: by all which it will appear that he laboured and endeavoured, as much as in him lay, that his majesty might be well prepared for any occasion of war which should happen; and he no way remembereth to have discouraged, or to have spoken or written any thing that might have been understood to have tended to the discouraging, his said late majesty from the taking of arms or entering in hostility against Spain: or for resisting of him or his forces from attempting the invasion of his said late majesty’s dominions, or the dominions of his late majesty’s confederates, friends, or allies, as by the said Article is charged against him; nor remembereth that he hath had any cause so to do: but if he hath in any kind spoken or written of Spain, or the power of it, it may have been to his late majesty or to his majesty that now is, by way of discourse, speaking of the solidness of the Spanish proceedings, of their serious and deliberate debating of business before they resolved upon them, and of their constant pursuing of them when they were once resolved; wishing that England and other nations would herein imitate them; for that he supposed the right way to impede the Spanish greatness, was to grow as wise as they, and so beat them at their own weapons: but, otherwise, he is confident he hath never been heard to speak, or write, any thing that might give any terror or discouragement to his late majesty; or his chief ministers; knowing that England need but little fear the power of Spain, having almost in all attempts and enterprizes won honour upon them. And as for his representing the dangers that might ensue upon a war, though he knoweth not what is aimed at in that particular, yet he is most confident, out of the integrity of his own conscience, that he hath neither said or advised any thing but what befitted a faithful counsellor and an ambassador; which was truly to deliver his opinion as he understood it upon the present occasion: and as for the affirming that his majesty's quiet should be disturbed, and he not permitted to hawk or hunt, he remembereth not what discourse he may have had or written to any person how fit it might be, upon the being embroiled in so great a war, seriously to attend it, and make it our whole work: but as he is confident it will appear, that what discourse soever it may have been, it wanted not the true zeal and affection which he hath ever borne to the king's service: so he hopeth it will be found not to want that due respect and reverence, on his part, which he ought to shew to so gracious a master; neither can it be conceived, that the considerations of hunting, hawking, or ease, should be considerations worthy so great and prudent a king, to withhold him from a war for the good of Christendom and his kingdoms, if he should be unjustly provoked thereunto.

“ IV. To the Fourth Article the said earl saith;—That he did not any thing contrary to his duty and allegiance, or contrary to the faith and trust of an ambassador, as by the Article is alledged; but did endeavour the service and honour of his late majesty, and no corrupt or sinister ends of his own, or his own advancement, as by the Article is alledged. And as for the conference which is pretended he should hold concerning the Treaty, that being told there was little probability that the said Treaties would or could have good success, and that he should acknowledge as much; and yet say that he cared not what the success thereof would be, but that he would take care to have his instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually; and would make his fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not remember to have held any such discourse, though it is true, that the time hath been, many years since, when he thought the Match very unlikely to be effected, in regard of the unequal Answers which were given in prince Henry's time, and the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of religion and faith. Further, as to the reviving of the said Match for his majesty that now is, that in the first he wished and advised a Protestant Match; but, in the duty of a servant, understanding that both their majesties really desired the Match with Spain, he did seriously and faithfully intend the service and honour of their majesties, and effectually endeavoured to procure their ends; and it is very likely he might say he would get his instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually, as he conceiveth was lawful and fit for him to do; but for the latter part of this conference, that he should say he would make a fortune by it, or any words to that effect, he was in the year 1641, and ever since, of that rank and quality, both in regard of his employment, fortunes, and his master's favour, that he assureth himself he did not; and dare answer so far for his own discretion, that it was impossible for him to hold so mean and unworthy a discourse.

“ V. To the Fifth Article the said earl saith;—That he did not intend or resolve, that if the Marriage in the former Articles mentioned should have been effected, that thereby the Romish religion or the professors thereof should be advanced; or the true religion and the professors thereof discouraged or discountenanced, as by the said Article is alledged; nor did he, to any such end or purpose or otherwise, at any time, counsel or persuade the late king's majesty to set at liberty the Jesuits and priests of the Romish religion; or to grant or allow unto the Papists and professors of the Romish religion a free toleration or silencing of the laws made and standing in force against them, as in the said Article is also alledged; but contrarily, upon all occasions, to the utmost of his power, did labour to prevent all the inconveniences in point of religion, that might come by matching with any princess of a differing religion; as well appeareth by a Paper of his own opinion, That his majesty should marry with a lady of his own religion, as hereafter mentioned in his Answer to the 7th Article: and for further proof thereof he saith, that in the whole Treaty with Spain he ever stood stricter in point of religion than by his instructions he needed to have done, as will appear by the testimony of sir W. Aston, and his dispatches 12th December 1622, and other dispatches, which he desireth may be read: and as for counselling or persuading to set at liberty Jesuits or priests, he utterly denieth to have done any such thing, as before he hath answered; although it be true that the embassy of Spain being far different from employments in other places, where there is a body of our reformed religion, and where his majesty hath kindred and allies, whereby his majesty's ministers may be informed of the necessary occurrences of state, without the help of a priest or Jesuit; but in Spain there being none but Roman Catholics, nor any other manner of correspondency or intelligence but by them, the ambassadors must make use of all sorts of people, especially of Jesuits and priests; and to that purpose ambassadors thither have always a particular warrant under the king's hand, to treat and make use of priests, Jesuits, and all other sorts of men, unless it be such as he proclaimed rebels; and divers times the ministers employed in Spain, to gratify some whom they there employed for the king's service as he believeth, at their particular suit, moved his majesty to extend grace and favour to some particular friend or kinsman of theirs, being a Roman-Catholic and imprisoned in England; and this he remembereth to have happened to others, but doth not remember to have written himself to his late majesty in that kind: and, as concerning his advice and counsel to set at liberty Jesuits and priests, the granting to the Papists a toleration, or a silencing of the laws against them, he saith, That his late majesty was engaged by the Treaty of Madrid in 1617. in divers matters concerning religion, as likewise by promises to the comde de Gondomar, and his letters to the king of Spain, of the 17th April, 1620, wherein he is pleased to promise some particulars in favour of Roman-Catholics, as by the said letter will appear. And, notwithstanding the said earl had sufficient warrant, under the king's own hand, to assure the king of Spain, that whatsoever was agreed in the said Articles, or in the said letter, his majesty would sincerely perform; yet the said earl was so cautious in that point, that when, for the conclusion of the Match, the other articles of religion being all agreed, it was pressed by the Spanish ministers, that a clause, if convenient, might be inserted, with protection, that the form and way thereof should be wholly left to his majesty's wisdom and clemency; and that his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects should acknowledge this grace only to come from the king's mercy and goodness; yet the said earl would not descend or assent therunto, but only de bene esse, as by his letters to Mr. Sec. Calvert, bearing date 8th Oct. 1622, will appear; thereby to give his majesty time to take it into consideration, before he would engage or bind him in this point.—And the said earl saith, That he did not by letters, or otherwise, ever counsel or persuade his late majesty to grant unto the Papists and professors of the Romish religion, a free toleration or silencing of the laws made and standing in force against them, but ever protested against any such toleration; and when any such proposition hath been offered to be made in Spain, he hath ever refused so much as to give ear unto it, or to suffer it to be propounded; although it be true he hath since seen a writing touching Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations, for the Roman Catholics, bearing date 9th Aug. 1623, signed by the lord Conway and others in England, where-with he was never acquainted; which paper is that which followeth:

For the satisfaction of their excellencies, the marquis Ynojosa and Don Carlos de Colonia, the lords ambassadors for the king of Spain; and to the end it may appear that his majesty of Great Britain will presently and really put in execution the grace promised and intended to the Roman Catholics his majesty's subjects, and of his own grant more than he is tied to by the Articles of Treaty of Marriage.—We do declare in his majesty's name, That his majesty's will and pleasure is, that a legal and authentical pardon shall be passed under the great seal, wherein shall be freely pardoned all those penalties, forfeitures and seizures, indictments, convictions, and incumbrances whatsoever, whereunto the Roman Catholics are liable or have been proceeded against, or might be, as well priests, as others, for matters of conscience only, and to which the rest of his majesty's subjects are not liable. And to the end his majesty may make himself clearly understood, where it shall happen that any of those forfeitures and pecuniary mulcts have been given away under his majesty's great seal; his majesty will not hide that it is not his power so to make void those letters patent, except they be voidable by law; and thereby his majesty is well pleased that all Roman Catholics may in these cases plead in law, if they find it good, and shall have equal and legal trial. And his majesty is likewise pleased that his general pardon shall remain in being five years, to the end, all that will, may in due time take it out; and his majesty will give order for the comfort of the poorer sort, that the pardon shall not be costly, but such a course shall be taken as was in a like occasion at his majesty's coming into England; so that it shall be lawful to put as many as are possible into one pardon.—And we do hereby declare, That his majesty's will and pleasure is, to the end the Roman Catholics his majesty's subjects may have a present and immediate fruition of as much as is intended them by the Articles of Treaty of Marriage, to cause a present suspension under his majesty's seal of all those penal laws, charges and forfeitures, whereunto the Roman Catholic subjects of his majesty have heretofore been subject, and which the rest of his majesty's subjects have not been liable; and in the same grant and under the same seal, to give a dispensation and toleration to all the Roman Catholics his majesty's subjects, as well priests, as temporal persons and others, of and from all the penalties, forfeitures, troubles, and incumbrances, which they have been or may be subject to by reason of any statute or law whatsoever, to the observation whereof the rest of his majesty's subjects are not bound. We do likewise declare, that his majesty hath promised on his royal word, that the execution shall be no ways burthensome or penal to the Roman Catholics, but that for the manner of privileging, and freeing them from that, he must confer with bishops and advocates, into which he will presently enter and expedite by all means.—And we do further declare, That his majesty's intention is presently to pursue his former directions (which had been before executed if their excellencies had so thought good) to put under his seal severally the said pardon and suspension, and dispensation; and that his majesty's attorney and learned counsel shall have referred to them the charge to open them with all those effectual words, clauses, expressions, and reservations, which may presently give fruition to the Roman Catholics his majesty's subjects, and make them available in the fruition of all that is intended and promised by his majesty in the Articles of Marriage, and his majesty's further grace.—And we do declare, That his majesty's further will and pleasure is, for the better satisfaction and discharge of the care and endeavour of their

‘ must be of necessity for the exercise of her religion for herself and family, within your highness’s courts, and thereby by degrees these two different religions shall grow to an equality of power; it will be great hazard and disquiet to the state, and not to be redressed without great danger, and courses of more violence, than is usual for this state to put in practice. But in case his majesty out of his wisdom and consideration best known to himself, hold it fittest that your highness match with France or Spain or any other catholic, either for that the present time affordeth no protestant princess, who is for years or blood suitable for your highness, or that can in any considerable measure by the portion, supply his majesty’s present wants, I then conceive that the match by which this state shall suffer least inconveniency and cumbers, and whereby his majesty’s necessities shall by the greatness of the portion be the most relieved, is with Spain, if such a match may be made with such conditions of religion, as other catholic princes will contract themselves withal.—Thus much I thought fit humbly to present unto your highness, for that I see my employment liable to the censure of many worthy persons, with whom, though I concur in my opinion, yet I seem much to differ from them many ways; for that it is more proper to me to be true to my master’s ends and services, than by the declaring this, to procure their satisfaction: Only to your highness I thought fit to make this declaration, and shall be a suitor to you for your favour, as you shall see me really labour to put this in effect. And if his majesty shall, either upon motion of parliament, or any other proposition that can be made unto him, think fit to proceed with a protestant match, as I shall wish as well unto it as any man living, so, I hope, in such sort to manage the present business that I have in hand, that it shall rather much further, than any way cross or hinder it. But in case his majesty shall not be drawn to any proposition for a protestant match, I then conceive, that your highness both doth, and will approve, that I really and effectually labour to procure a match for your highness in Spain, upon such conditions, in point of religion and portion, as to his majesty shall seem fit.’

“ Besides which declaration of the said earl’s opinion, he hath all his life, in all places, lived and avowed himself a Protestant, never having done the least act that was not suitable to the same profession; and that in all his foreign employments, for the space of fourteen years, of more than 500 persons of all qualities that have attended him, there was never any one perverted in his religion, save two Irish footmen, who in Ireland had been bred Papists: and he humbly desireth the testimony of Dr. Mawe and Dr. Wrenn, and of Mr. Sampford, one of the prebends of Canterbury, Mr. Boswell, parson of St. Lawrence in London, and Mr. Frewen, divinity-reader in Magdalen-College in Oxon, (all of whom were his majesty’s chaplains in Spain) as well for the frequent use of the sacrament, and constant profession and exercises of religion; and the testimony also of such catholics as are known to have been his ancient acquaintance and friends, and to examine them upon oath, whether either publicly or privately, in Spain or in England, they have known him in any kind to make shew, or so much as forbear upon all occasions avowedly to declare the religion that he professeth; and that the said Mr. Frewen and Mr. Wake, his now chaplains, may be also examined, whether in extremity of several sicknesses, whereunto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever settled his conscience with them towards God, and made a confession of his faith, resolving as befitted a Protestant and a good Christian.

“ VIII. To the Eighth Article the said earl saith:—That he did not at any time, or in any place, endeavour to persuade the prince to change his religion, and to become a Roman Catholic, or to be obedient to the usurped authority of the pope of Rome; neither did the said earl, to that end or purpose, or otherwise, use unto his majesty, then prince, the words in the Article mentioned, viz. “ That the state of England did never any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the pope of Rome, and that it was impossible they should do any thing of note otherwise,” as in the said Article is charged: but the said earl acknowledgeth, that upon occasion of a letter, which came to his majesty then prince, putting his majesty in mind of the great actions of his royal progenitors in the Holy Wars; and that the great kings of those times did not only employ their forces, but, in their persons, went into the Holy Land; the earl believeth, that, by way of discourse only, and not otherwise, he may have said, that in regard of the difference of religion, it were of more difficulty to undertake such great actions now than in former ages; and it might well be instanced in the present Treaty of Marriage, wherein the pope’s consent was to be obtained; and to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he was confident there were very many that have, may few of nearness about his late majesty that have not often heard his majesty say, that he was the true martyr, that suffered more for his religion than all the princes of Christendom besides; instancing in divers particulars, but especially in that he could not match his children with kings of their own rank, without the pope’s leave. But the said earl saith, That he never alledged any such thing to other purpose, than to shew that only conscience and love to truth, (in which regard protestants suffered much) and not any temporal respects, made us constant and zealous to the profession of our religion; by which discourses he ever attributed much to the sincerity and honour of the protestant religion; but never used it as an argument to persuade, as in the accusation is insinuated. Besides, he conceiveth, that, by way of Answer thereunto, the same question may be asked which his majesty was pleased to ask of the said earl in the 7th Article, viz. 'What the said earl saw in his majesty that he should think him so unworthy as to change his religion for a wife, or any earthly respect whatsoever?' So why should it be thought, that the becoming more fit to undertake great actions in the world, (being a mere moral temporal respect) should be an argument to persuade, in conscience, so religious and wise a prince, and so well instructed as his majesty is; as though the soul of a Christian prince was to be wrought upon, in point of truth and belief, by temporal and worldly respects of conveniences and greatness. It were necessary, for proof of this assertion, 'The earl's persuading his majesty touching his religion,' to produce some arguments that he used out of the scriptures to satisfy him, in point of conscience, in some tenet of the Romish church; or that he procured any conference with learned men for his satisfaction in point of religion; otherwise, the argument used in this Article against the said earl doth, as he conceiveth, carry little strength to prove the charge of persuading of his majesty either in regard of itself, or indeed in regard of his majesty's piety."

"IX. To the Ninth Article the said earl saith, That there was a discourse in Spain, of the way of accommodating the prince Palatine's affairs; and, by way of discourse, it was moved, That the marriage of his eldest son with a daughter of the emperor, and his son to be bred in the emperor's court, would be the fairest way for pacifying and accomodating those businesses; and the earl, by way of such discourse, and not otherwise, did say, That he thought his late majesty would not be averse, either to the said Match or the breeding of the prince Palatine's son with the emperor: so as thereby the whole patrimonial estate of the prince Palatine, with the dignity electoral, might be fully restored; that his son might be brought up in his own religion and have such preceptors and such a family as his said late majesty and his father, (meaning the prince Palatine) should appoint, and they to have free exercise of their religion; for so his late majesty had often declared himself to the said earl, and wished him to lay hold of any occasion for entertaining of any such proposition; and otherwise than so; and upon the terms aforesaid, and by that way of conference and discourse only, he delivered not any opinion to his majesty at his majesty's being in Spain; for the said earl is very confident that his majesty was returned out of Spain, before any proposition was made for the said Marriage, other than by way of discourse as aforesaid; the same as the said earl believeth, being first moved and debated on, by way of proposition, here in England betwixt Mr. Secretary Calvert and the ambassador of the king of Spain, about the 2d of Oct. 1623; and his late majesty upon relation made unto him by a letter of Mr. Secretary Calvert, approved of the proposition, and declared the same to be the only way, as he sepossed with honour, to accommodate those great businesses; and wrote to that purpose to his son-in-law, the prince Palatine, by his letter, dated 19th Oct. 1623, a copy of which letter together with a copy of Mr. secretary Calvert's relation, the lord Conway by his late majesty's commandment, sent unto the said earl, the tenor of which, translated out of French, is as followeth:

'We have thought good, that we may provide best and most soundly for your affairs, not only to procure, but also to assure your peace, were to cut up by the very roots that evil which hath been settled in the heart of the emperor, by the great displeasure and enmity he hath conceived against you. For the removing and quite extinguishing of which, it seemeth to us no better or more powerful means can be used, than a good alliance, which may be proposed by us between your eldest son, and the daughter of the said emperor, upon the assurance we have, we shall not be refused in this nature, if you on your part will give your consent. And for the more surety of the good success thereof, we are determined, before any such proposition be made to the emperor, to interest the king of Spain with us in the business, who, we trust, will lend us his helping hand, as well for the effecting of it, and bringing it to a good conclusion, as in procuring likewise, that the condition be duly observed. Amongst which conditions, if it happen that the emperor should demand, that your son, during his minority, should be brought up in his court, we shall tell you, that we, for our own part, see no reason why you should stick at it, upon such conditions as he might be tied unto, to wit, That the young prince should have with him such governor, as you shall please to appoint him, although he be no Roman Catholic; and that neither he, nor any of his, should be any way forced in matter of their conscience. And our meaning is, so to order our proceeding in this Treaty, that before your said son be put into the hands of the emperor, he will have a clear and certain assurance of an honourable, entire, and punctual restitution of all whatsoever belonging to you: As also we will take care to provide accordingly, as fully and exactly for the assurances requisite for the liberty of conscience, for him and his domesticks, as they have done here with us touching those that have been granted them for the Infanta. And therefore seeing there is no inconvenience at all, that may cause your averseness or backwardness in this business, which we, for our parts, think to be the best, shortest, and most honourable way that you can take, for the compassing of the entire restitution, and making your peace sure with the emperor, we hope your opinion will concur with us therein, and shall intreat you, by the first, to send us your answer.'

By which letter, written after his majesty's coming out of Spain, it appeareth unto your lordships that there was no proposition of the Marriage betwixt the son of the prince Palatine and the emperor's daughter when that letter was written: for therein his majesty saith, he was determined to interest the king of Spain in the business before any such proposition should be made to the emperor: and it will also thereby appear, what his late majesty's opinion was of the conveniency thereof, which he, the said earl, hopeth will acquit him, if, by way of discourse only, he declared what he knew was his majesty's inclination; which with honesty, he could not have concealed. And the said earl saith, That he doth not remember what answer sir Walter Aston made upon that discourse which he then delivered, nor what replies the said earl made; but sure he is, that whatsoever the said earl said, or what answers or replies soever were made, as it was by way of discourse, and not otherwise, so it was according to that which he then truly conceived to be the best and easiest way to accommodate the business, and to be his majesty's pleasure, which the said sir W. Aston might be ignorant of, as he is confident he was; and not out of any disaffection to our religion, or any sinister respect or regard to the house of Austria, as by the said articles is intimated; for he did not conceive the breeding of the Palatine's son with the emperor, having a governor appointed by his late majesty and his father, and he and his domestics to have the free use of their own religion, to be a matter of impossibility, or of such dangerous consequence in point of religion, as to imply his conversion, as by the articles is intimated; well knowing that, in the emperor's court, all princes there, though his prisoners, and others his counsellors and servants about his person, and of great command in his armies, being avowed protestants, have the free use of their religion: and it is not to be supposed that the son of the prince Palatine, grand-child to the king of Great Britain, should be matched, and no care taken to capitulate for the use of his religion, it being ever granted to the meanest princess that is bestowed; and his majesty's special care in this point is fully seen in the said letter."

"X. To the Tenth Article the said earl saith, That by comparing the above Article, of his too much forwardness, with the second, whereby he is charged with 'continuing the Treaties upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties and direct conclusions, your lordships will perceive how impossible it was for him to avoid exception: but for direct answer to the present Charge, he saith, That he did not presumptuously, nor to his yet knowledge, break his instructions, nor set any day at all for the desponsories; but was therein merely passive, in admitting the day nominated by the king of Spain, according to the capitulation long before made; nor did he presumptuously, wittingly, or willingly, disobey any commandment or direction of his late majesty or his majesty that now is, then prince, which he could understand not to be countermauded, or, by precedent or future instructions, otherwise explained. And for the better manifestation of the truth of his proceedings in and concerning the same, he saith, That on the day of the departure of his majesty, then prince, from the Escorial in Spain, his highness delivered unto him, in the presence of the commissioners on both sides, the powers, with public declaration taken in writing by Serica, secretary to the king of Spain, of the prince's pleasure, and how he, the said earl, should use them, viz. That he should deliver them unto the king of Spain, upon the coming of the dispensation cleared from Rome, according to that which had been agreed, which was to have been within ten days after the coming of the said dispensation. And he further saith, That it is true, that the prince afterwards, by his letters, sent by one Mr. Clark, commanded him, the said earl, not to deliver the said powers till he should have received security that the Infanta, after being betrothed, should not enter into any religious order; and that before he proceeded, he should send unto his majesty then prince, such security as should be offered, that he might judge whether it were sufficient or not; whereupon the said earl, as became a faithful servant, presented unto his late majesty and to his majesty that now is, then prince, such assurances as were offered unto him for securing of that point, together with such reasons as, he conceived, were fit to be offered to their considerations; which gave unto his late majesty and his majesty that now is, then prince, such satisfaction, as they were pleased to dispatch a post presently unto him, absolutely discharging him of that commandment; as by their several letters, dated the 8th of Oct. 1623, will appear: as followeth,

"We have received your letters by Grisley, and the copy of them to our dear son; and we cannot forbear to let you know, how well we esteem that dutiful, discreet, and judicial relation, and humble advice to our son: whereupon, having fully deliberated with ourself, and communicated with our dear son, we have resolved, with the good liking of our son, to rest upon that security, in point of doubt, for the Infanta's taking a religious order, which you, in your judgment, shall think meet."

"And by that other Letter of his majesty that now is, then prince, as followeth; viz.

"Your letter to the king and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Laurence, hath so satisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting."

"Hereby the said Earl was absolutely freed from that commandment; and being so freed thereof, he then remained under the order which his majesty then prince, had left with him at his departure; which was to proceed according to the capitulations, and his highness's declaration when he delivered the said powers unto him; and so he intended to have done, till, by his highness's declaration, of the

as appeareth by his late majesty's letters of the 7th Jan. 1622.—Concerning the Temporal Articles, the said earl saith, When the desponsories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembereth, on the 9th Aug. before the departure of his majesty then prince, (which was only hindered by the not coming of the dispensation) the prince appointed him and sir W. Aston to meet with the Spanish commissioners; and they drew up the heads of the Temporal Articles, wherewith the prince and duke of Buckingham were acquainted; and in case the dispensation had come, and the desponsories been performed on that day, there had then no other provision been made for them before the Marriage; but presently upon the prince's departure, he, the said earl, caused them to be drawn into form, and sent them to his late majesty the 24th Sept. 1623, desiring to understand his majesty's pleasure with all speed, especially if he disapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any dislike thereof until the aforesaid letters of the 13th Nov. 1623, which put off the desponsories. So it appeareth the said earl was so far from breaking his instructions, or from having any intention to have proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before his majesty and the prince were satisfied in the point of the Infanta's entering into religion; or before convenient assurance as well of the restitution of the Palatinate as for performance of the Temporal Articles, that he deserved, as he conceiveth, (under favour) no blame, so much as in intention: but if he had erred in intention only, as he did not, and the same never reduced into act, the fault, as he conceiveth, was removed by his obedience before the intention was put in execution; for so it is in cases towards God himself.—And as to the matter of aggravation against him, 'That he appointed so short a day for the desponsories, as that without extraordinary diligence, the prince had been bound.' he thereto saith as before, That he set no day thereto at all, nor could defer it after the dispensation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the Match so long laboured in, and so much desired; yet he and sir W. Aston used all possible industry to discover how the motion of deferring the Match would be taken; and finding an absolute resolution in the king of Spain to proceed punctually in requiring the powers, according to the capitulations, within ten days after the coming of the dispensation: and at that time also getting advertisement from Rome, that the dispensation was granted, and would presently be there: he, the said earl, to the end that, in so great a case, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late majesty's pleasure, sent a dispatch, of the 1st Nov. with all diligence to the king; letting his majesty know that it would not be possible for him to protract the Marriage above 24 days, unless he should hazard the breaking of it, for which he had no warrant; but that this was no new resolution, nor the king so straitened in time as by the said Article is pretended, will appear by the said earl's dispatch of the 24th Sept. 1623; in which, upon the scruple that was then made of the Infanta's entering into religion, he wrote to the same effect, viz. "That if the dispensation should come, he knew no means how to detain the powers above 24 days." So that although that difficulty happened not until about the middle of Nov. 1623, yet it was foreseen that it must of necessity happen whensoever the dispensation should come; and there was warning of two months time given thereof; viz. from the 24th Sept. to the 29th Nov. which was the time appointed for the desponsories: so he humbly submitteth himself to your lordships which of the two ways was the safer and most dutiful for him to take; whether upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown so great a business; or, on the other side, first to have presented to his majesty with truth and sincerity, as he did, the true state of his affairs, with his humble opinion therein; with an intention, if his majesty should resolve to break the Match, that, for the said earl's honest discharge of the public trust reposed in him, when the powers were deposited in his hands, and for his sufficient warrant in so great a cause, his majesty would be graciously pleased to give him clear and express orders, which he then had not; and, in the interim, whilst his majesty might take into consideration the great inconveniences that might ensue, the said inconveniences might be suspended; and the business kept upon fair terms, that his majesty might have his way and choice clear and unsoiled before him; and as for the evil consequences which are pretended would have followed, if the said earl had proceeded to the consummation of the Match before he had express warrant to the contrary, he must, and doth confess, he then understood the clean contrary; for he supposed that his majesty should speedily have seen the Marriage (which he had so long sought) effected, and the prince should have a worthy lady whom he loved; that the portion was much greater than was ever given in money in Christendom; and that the king of Spain had engaged himself for the Restitution of the Palatinate; for which the said earl conceived a daughter of Spain and two millions had been no ill pawn, besides divers other additions of advantage to the crown of England: whereas, on the contrary side, he foresaw the prince would be kept at least one year longer unmarried, a thing which highly concerneth these kingdoms; he doubted that the Recovery of the Palatinate from the emperor and duke of Bavaris, by force, would prove of great difficulty; and that Christendom was like to fall in a general combustion; so desiring that his majesty should have obtained his ends, and have the honour and happiness not only to have given peace, plenty, and increase to his own subjects and crowns; but to have compounded the greatest differences that had been these many years in Christendom; and, by his piety and wisdom, to have prevented the shedding of so much Christian blood, as he feared would ensue, if these businesses were disordered. These reasons he confesseth, and his zeal unto his majesty's service, made him so earnestly desire the effecting of this business: and he cannot but think himself an unfortunate man, that his majesty's affairs being so near the settling to his majesty's content, as he conceived they were, and hoping to have been to his master not only a faithful but a successful servant, to see the whole state of affairs turned upside down, without any the least fault of his; and yet he the only minister on the English or Spanish side, that remaineth under disgrace.

"XI. To the Eleventh Article the said Earl saith, That the said Article is grounded upon a Petition, preferred by him to this most honourable house, supposed to be scandalous; which your lordships, as he conceiveth, according to the custom and privileges of the house of peers, would have been pleased first to have adjudged so to have been, either for matter appearing in itself, or upon hearing of the said earl; for if the matter appearing in the Petition itself be not excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral averment, be taken for a scandal, till it be examined and found false: but, for a plain and direct Answer thereunto, he saith, That the said Petition doth not warrant any such inference, as by the said Article is enforced; and that he hopeth to justify the contents of his said Petition in such sort as shall not displease his majesty nor deserve that expression which is used in the Charge; but contrarily, what he hath said, or shall say therein, in his defence, shall, in all things, tend to the honour and service of his most royal majesty, by reducing unto his memory divers circumstances, and laying before him the passages of divers particulars, which, by undue practices, have been either concealed from his majesty or misrepresented unto him.

"Having thus offered unto this high and honourable court such proofs and reasons as, he hopeth, shall, in your lordships wisdom and justice, clearly acquit him of any capital crime, or wilful offence: if it shall appear that, out of error or judgment, too much fervency of zeal to his majesty's service, or ignorance in the laws, wherewith he hath not been able to be so well acquainted as he ought, by reason of his foreign employments for the space of 14 years, or by any other ways or means, he hath fallen into the danger of the laws, for any thing pardoned in the general Pardon made in the 21st year of our late sovereign lord king James of England, of blessed memory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the said Pardon, and the benefit thereof; with this clause, That he doth and will approve that he is none of the persons excepted out of the same; and though he is very confident that he shall not need the help of any Pardon, having received several significations, as well from his majesty's own mouth, that he had never offended his majesty, as lately by several letters from the lord Conway, that he might rest in the security he was, and sit still, and should not be further questioned; yet he hopeth your lordships will find him so free from blame, that he shall need no Pardon: but he hath served his late majesty of blessed memory, and his most gracious sovereign that now is, with fidelity, care, and industry; and that your lordships will take such course, as you, in your wisdom, shall think fit, not only for the upholding of the honour and reputation of a peer of this realm, after so many employments, but will likewise become humble and earnest suitors to his majesty on his behalf, (which he humbly prayeth) that he may be restored to his majesty's gracious favour, which, above all worldly things, he most desireth."

The Earl of Bristol's Answer being ended, the lord keeper demanded of him if he had any thing more to say. Whereupon the Earl complaining of the inequality between himself and the duke of Buckingham, and that, by reason of his restraint, he was disabled from proceeding against the duke, and that his counsel was disheartened to give him their free advice; he earnestly urged their lordships promise to make them both equal: and said, That his counsel informed him there was no treason in all the Charge against him, save only what came near a statute touching religion, which he humbly submitted to the house; and besought their lordships to take some course, by the resolution of the judges, or otherwise as they should please, that it may be declared whether his case be treason or not, before he be further proceeded with: likewise, that he might have liberty to examine his witnesses, and that Mr. Attorney might not take hold of any matter of form or legality to his prejudice.

To this Mr. Attorney replied, "That he would not, but only insist upon the matter of the Charge;" and desired, as the earl had done, that the house would direct the course how the witnesses might be examined, and the manner of his further proceeding against the said earl. The earl being withdrawn, the house agreed to give his counsel encouragement for their free and faithful advice to him; and it was further ordered that the said earl should have liberty to go abroad in the custody of Mr. Maxwell, the usher, to take the air for his health's sake; which was granted at his humble request. The Earl being called in again was made acquainted with this order, as the king's own consent, for which he returned his majesty and their lordships his most humble thanks.

ANSWER* to the Articles of Impeachment.

June 8. The duke of Buckingham gave in * While under impeachment the Duke was elected Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, which much offended the Commons, but pleased the King. See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 164, 1 Rushw. 371 et seq.

his Answer to the house of lords concerning the Articles of his Impeachment, see p. 1307. But before he delivered it, he made the following Speech:

“ My Lords, In a case of pressure considered by itself, I have a fair beginning; as it is a debt due to your lordships for this noble favour in leaving it to my choice, whether I would answer to every particular in the aggravation, or not. I may without lessening any obligation, say, the favour is of greater extent than at first may be imagined; for what is my cause now may be yours or your posterities hereafter. I have in a manner tied myself only to my Charge, hoping, if I give your lordships satisfaction in that, the aggravations will fall of themselves. I could not well have followed the aggravations, being composed of words, which, I hope, my actions have not deserved, and I am sure my ears have not been acquainted with, without some distraction of spirit: yet I have left nothing of them unanswered that is material. I have used as much speed to come to my Answer as conveniently I could, without prejudice to my cause, having already had my reputation too long upon the stage; and had your lordships called for it sooner, I had been as ready as now I am desirous to detain your lordships as little as may be, with the expectation of my particular, from weightier business. I was also grieved that my business should be the cause of the loss of this year for foreign attempts, and the hindrance of those resolutions that would have comforted our friends abroad, and secured ourselves at home: but, in this, my lords, I am sure, you will easily acquit me in your thoughts. When I look upon my Charge in general, as the commons did, without searching into the integrity of my own heart and actions, which are yet unknown to most of them, I wonder not so much at their proceedings, the particulars not being voted against me unanimously; but, had they taken the means to have been better and more truly informed of the particulars, or had given me cause to have informed them, I assure myself they had not troubled your lordships with this Charge. I confess there hath been that contestation in the house of commons concerning my justification, that I cannot but acknowledge much favour there from many, and if the actions of some others of that house do not make them conclude me of a worse disposition than I shall hereafter be found, there is none but may say with me, ‘ I am at peace with all.’ I shall now, for the present, only apply myself to the clearing my reputation, and for the future to those actions and endeavours which may repossess me of that I have accounted one of my greatest losses, their good opinions. I would not speak nor profess this before your lordships, if reason and my own disposition did not warrant the performance of it. For, first, who accused me? Common Fame. Who gave me up to your lordships? The house of commons. The one is too subtle a body, if a body; the other too great a one, for me to contest with: I am confident, when my Cause shall be tried, neither the one or the other, or part of either, will be found to have any ground to be my enemy. But as Fame is subtle, so it is often, and especially in accusations, false: therefore though the house of commons have not willingly wronged me: yet I am confident it will at length be found, that Common Fame hath abused both them and me. I presume the house of commons have proceeded against me, out of an hearty and zealous affection, to do their king and country service; and, I hope, out of Christian charity, to punish or amend my faults, (if Fame could have proved them) and not to ruin my reputation, or destroy my fortune. I shall never call such proceedings wrong, which, seeking to cure my errors, give me opportunity to clear and publish my innocency. For the state itself, I have a little to say: it is but a little: I will not abuse your lordships patience. I was born and bred in it, I owe it my life. I have been raised to honours and fortunes in it, I freely confess, beyond my merits. What I wanted in sufficiency and experience for the service of it, I have endeavoured to supply by care and industry. Could there be the least alienation hereafter of my heart from the service of the state, for anything that hath past, I should be the ungratefullest man living. Should but such a thought stain my heart, I should be content it were let blood. If my posterity should not inherit the same fidelity, I should desire an inversion in the course of nature, and be glad to see them earthed before me. My Answer to the several points of my Charge I shall crave leave to deliver briefly in writing and in form of law: but as naked as truth loves to be: and so I leave myself and my Cause to your lordships justice.”

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM'S ANSWER TO THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT.

Then his grace presented his ANSWER, and gave the same to the lord keeper, and his lordship to the clerk, which followeth in hæc verba:

“ The humble ANSWER and Plea of George Duke of Buckingham, to the Declaration and Impeachment made against him, before your Lordships, by the Commons House of Parliament.* (See p. 1307.)

“ The said duke of Buckingham being accused, and sought to be impeached before your lordships, of the many misdemeanors, misprisions, offences, and crimes, wherewith he is charged by the commons house of parliament, and which are comprised in the Articles preferred against him, and were aggravated by those whose service was used by that house in the delivery of them; doth find in himself an inexorable pressure of deep and hearty sorrow, that so great and so worthy a body should hold him suspected of those things which are objected against him, whereas, had that honourable house first known the very truth of those particulars, whereof they had not there the means to be rightly informed; he is well assured, in their own true judgments, they would have forbore to have charged him therewith. But the integrity of his own heart and conscience, being the most able and most impartial witness, not accusing him of the least thought of disloyalty to his sovereign or to his country, doth raise his spirits again to make his just defence before your lordships; of whose wisdom, justice, and honour he is so well assured, that he doth with confidence, and yet with all humbleness, submit himself and his cause to your examinations and judgments; before whom he shall, with all sincerity and clearness, unfold and lay open the secrets of his own actions, and of his heart; and, in his Answer, shall not affirm the least substantial, and as near as he can, the least circumstantial point, which he doth not believe he shall clearly prove before your lordships. The Charge consisteth of 13 several Articles, whereunto the duke, saying to himself the usual benefit of not being prejudiced by any words, or want of form, in his Answer; but that he may be admitted to make further explanation and proof, as there shall be occasion; and saving to himself all privileges and rights belonging to him as one of the peers of this realm, doth make these several and distinct Answers following, in the same order they are laid down unto him.

* Rushworth says, that sir Nicholas Hide was employed in drawing up this Answer, and that to this service he owed his being appointed Chief Justice of the King's-bench, when sir Randolph Crew was removed for refusing to forward the Loan.

"I. To the First Article, which concerneth the Plurality of Offices which he holdeth, he answereth thus:—That it is true that he holdeth those several places and offices, which are enumerated in the preamble of his Charge, whereof only three are worthy the name of offices, viz. the Admiralty, the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, and Mastership of the Horse; the others are rather titular and additions of honour: for these offices he humbly and freely acknowledgeth the bounty and goodness of his most gracious master, who is with God; who, when he had cast an eye of favour upon him, and had taken him into a more near place of service about his royal person, was more willing to multiply his graces and favours upon him than the duke was forward to ask them; and, for the most part, as many honourable persons, and his now most excellent majesty above all others, can best testify, did prevent the very desires of the duke in asking: and all these particular places, he can and doth truly affirm, his late majesty did bestow of his own royal motion, except the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports only; and thereto also he gave his approbation and encouragement. And the duke denieth, that he obtained these places either to satisfy his exorbitant ambition, or his own profit or advantage, as is objected against him, and he hopeth he shall give good satisfaction to the contrary in his particular Answers ensuing, touching the manner of his obtaining the places of the Admiralty, and the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports; whereunto he humbly desireth to refer himself.—And for the Mastership of the Horse to his majesty, he saith, It is a mere domestic office of attendance upon the king's person, whereby he receiveth some profit; yet but as a conveniency to render him more fit for his continual attendance; and in that place, the times compared, he hath retrenched the king's annual charge, to a considerable value, as shall be made apparent.—And for the Number of Places he holdeth, he saith, That if the commonwealth doth not suffer thereby, he hopeth he may, without blame, receive and retain that which the liberal and bountiful hand of his majesty hath freely conferred upon him. And it is not without many precedents, both in ancient and modern times, that one man, eminent in the esteem of his sovereign, hath, at one time, held as great and as many offices: but when it shall be discerned, that he shall falsely or corruptly execute those places, or any of them; or that the public shall suffer thereby, he is so thankful for what he hath freely received, that, whensoever his gracious master shall require it, he, without disputing with his sovereign, will readily lay down as his royal feet, not only his places and offices, but his whole fortune and his life, to do him service.

"II. To the Second Article, his buying the Admiral's Place, the said duke maketh this clear and true Answer.—That it is true, that in Jan. in the 16th year of his late majesty's reign, his late majesty did, by his letters patent, grant unto the duke the office of Lord Admiral for his life; which grant, as he well knoweth it, was made freely, and without any contract or bargain with the late lord admiral, or any other, and upon the voluntary surrender of that noble and well-deserving lord, so he is advised it will appear to be free from any defect in law, by reason of the statute 5 Edw. 6, mentioned in the Article of his Charge, or for any other cause whatsoever; for he saith the true manner of his obtaining this office, and of all the passages thereof, which he is ready to make good by proof, was thus: that honourable lord, the late earl of Nottingham, the lord admiral, being grown much in years, and finding that he was not then so able to perform that which appertained to his place, as in former times he had done to his great honour; and fearing lest his majesty's service and the commonwealth might suffer by his defect, became a humble and earnest petitioner to his late majesty to admit him to surrender his office. His late majesty was at the first unwilling unto it, out of his royal affection to his person, and true judgment of his worth, but the earl renewed his petitions, and in some of them nominated the duke to be his successor, without the duke's privity or forethought of it. And, about that time, a gentleman of good place about the navy, and of long experience, of himself came to the duke, and earnestly moved him to undertake the place. The duke apprehending the weight of the place, and considering his young years and want of experience to manage so great a charge, gave no ear unto it; but excused it, not for form, but really and ingenuously out of the apprehension of his then unfitness for it. The gentleman not thus satisfied, unknown to the duke, applied himself to the late king, and moved his majesty therein, and offered these reasons for it: that the duke was the fittest man at that time, and as the state of the navy then stood, for that place, for he said it was then a time of peace: that the best service that could be done for the present, was to repair the navy and ships royal, which then were much in decay, and to retrench the king's charge and to employ it effectually; that before there was like to be personal use of service otherwise, the duke, being young and active, might gain experience, and make himself as fit as any other: and that, in the mean time, none was so fit as himself, having the opportunity of his majesty's favour and means to his person, to procure a constant assignment and payment of money for the navy; the want whereof was the greatest cause of the former defects. These reasons persuaded his late majesty, and, upon his majesty's own motion, prevailed on the duke to take the charge upon him: and thereupon the earl voluntarily, freely, willingly, and upon his own earnest and often suit, surrendered the place; without any precedent contract or promise whatsoever, which might render the duke in the least degree subject to the danger of the law, which was not then so much as once thought upon: and upon that surrender, the grant was made to the duke: but it is true, that his majesty out of his royal bounty, for recompence of the long and faithful service of the said earl, and for an honourable memory of his deserts to him and the crown of England, did grant him a pension of 1,000*l.* per ann. for his life; which, in all ages, hath been the royal way of princes, wherewith to reward antient and well-deserving servants in their elder years; when, without their own faults, they are become less serviceable to the state: and the duke also voluntarily and freely, and as an argument of his noble respect towards so honourable a predecessor, who to his death, he called father; and whose estate, as he then understood, was fallen very low; did, with his late majesty's privity and approbation, send him 3,000*l.* in money; which he hopeth no person of worth and honour will esteem to be an act worthy of blame in him. And when the duke had thus obtained this place of great trust, he was so careful of his duty, that he would not rely upon his own judgment or ability; but of himself humbly besought his then majesty to settle a commission of fit and able persons for the affairs of his navy, by whose counsel and assistance he might manage that weighty business with the best advantage for his majesty's service; which commission was granted, and yet continueth; and without the advice of those commissioners he hath never done any thing of moment; and, by their advice and industry, he hath thus husbanded the king's money, and furthered the service, that where before the ordinary Charge of the Navy was 54,000*l.* per ann. and yet the ships were very much decayed, and their provisions neglected, the charge was reduced to 30,000*l.* per ann.; and with that charge the ships all repaired and made serviceable, and 2 new ships built yearly; and for the two last years, when there were no new ships built, the ordinary charge was reduced to 21,600*l.* per ann. And now he dare boldly affirm, that his majesty's navy is in better state by much than ever it was in any precedent time whatsoever."

"III. To the Third Article, his buying the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, he maketh this plain, ingenuous, and true Answer:—That in Dec. in the 22nd year of his late majesty's reign, he obtained the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Constable of the Castle of Dover (being one entire office) upon the surrender of the lord Zouch, then lord warden. The manner of obtaining whereof, was thus: the lord Zouch being grown in years, and with his almost continual lameness being grown less fit for that place, he discovered a willingness to leave it, and made several offers thereof to the duke of Richmond, and Rd. earl of Dorset, deceased; but he was not willing to part with it, without recompence. Notice whereof coming to the duke, by an offer made from the lord Zouch, he finding by experience how much, and how many ways both the king's service might, and many times did suffer; and how many inconveniences did arise to the king's subjects in their goods, ships, and lives, by the intermixture of the jurisdictions of the admiralty and wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, and by the emulation, disaffection, and contention of their officers, as clearly appear by these particulars, amongst many others which may be instanced. 1. Whereas the admiral-jurisdiction extends generally to all the narrow seas; the warden of the Cinque-Ports hath and exerciseth admiral-jurisdiction on all the sea-coasts, from Show-Beacon in Essex, to the Red Norc in Sussex; and within those limits there have been continual differences between the lord admiral and the lord warden, whether the lord warden's jurisdiction extends into the main sea, or only as far as the low-water-mark, and so much further into the sea, as a man on horseback can reach with a lance; which occasioneth questions between those chief officers themselves. 2. There are many and continual differences in executing of Warrants against offenders: the officers of the one refusing to obey or assist the authority of the other; whereby the offenders protected or countenanced by either, easily escape. 3. Merchants and owners of goods questioned in the admiralty, are often enforced to sue in both courts, and often enforced, for their peace, to compound with both officers. 4. The king's service is much hindered; for the most usual and ordinary rendezvous of the king's ships being at the Downs, and that being within the jurisdiction of the lord warden; the lord admiral or captains of the king's ships have no power abroad, but it hath been so far from endangering the dominion of the narrow seas thereby, as it is suggested, that his majesty's ships or men of war, were never yet mastered, nor encountered by them, nor will they endure the sight of any of our ships; and when the duke himself was in person, the Dunkirkers run into their harbours. But there is a necessity that, according to the fortune of wars, interchangeable losses will happen; yet, hitherto, notwithstanding their more than wonted insolency, the loss on the enemy's part hath been as much, if not more, than what hath happened to us; and that loss that hath fallen, hath chiefly come by this means, that the Dunkirkers ships being of late years exercised in continual hostility with the Hollanders, are built of a mold as fit for flight as for fight; and so they pilfer upon our coasts, and creep to the shore, and escape from the king's ships: but to prevent that inconvenience for the time to come, there is already order taken for the building some ships, which shall be of the like mold, light and quick of sail, to meet with the adverse party in their own way. And for the pirates of Sallie, and those parts, he saith, it is but very lately that they found the way unto our coasts, where, by surprize, they might easily do hurt; but there hath been that provision taken by his majesty, not without the care of the duke, both by force and treaty, to repress them for the time to come, as will give good satisfaction. All which he is assured will clearly appear upon proof."

"V. To the Fifth Article the duke maketh this Answer; That about September last, this ship called the St. Peter, amongst divers others, was seized on as a lawful prize by his majesty's ships, and brought into Plymouth, as ships laden by the subjects of the king of Spain: in the end of October or beginning of November, they were all brought to the Tower of London, all of them were there unladen but the Peter, and the bulk of her goods was not stirred, because, they were challenged by the subjects of the French king; and there did not then appear so much proof against her, and the goods in her, as against the rest. About the middle of November allegations were generally put in against them all in the Admiralty-court, to justify the seizure; and all the pretendants were called in: upon these proceedings, divers of the ships and goods were condemned, and divers were released in a legal course; and others of them were in suspense till full proof made. The 28th of Dec. complaint was made on the behalf of some Frenchmen at the council board, concerning this ship and others, when the king by advice of his council, his maj. being present in person, did order, That the ship of Newhaven, called the Peter, and the goods in her, and all such other goods of the other prizes, as should be found to appertain to his majesty's own subjects, or to the subjects of his good brother the French king, or the States of the United Provinces, or any other princes or states in friendship or alliance with his majesty, should be delivered: but this was not absolute, as is supposed by the Charge, but was thus qualified, so as they were not fraudulently coloured; and it was referred to a judicial proceeding. According to this just and honourable direction, the king's advocate proceeded upon the general allegations formerly put in the 26th of Jan. after there was a sentence in the admiralty, that the Peter should be discharged; and the king's advocate, not having then any knowledge of further proof, consented to it: but this was not a definitive sentence, but a sentence interlocutory, as it is termed in that court. Within few days after, this ship prepared herself to be gone, and was falling down the river: then came new intelligence to the lord admiral by the lieutenant of the Tower, that all those ships were laden by the subjects of the king of Spain; that the Amirantasco waded them beyond the North-Cape; that they were but coloured by Frenchmen; that there were witnesses ready to make good this new allegation; neither was it improbable to be so, for part of the goods in that ship have been confessed to be lawful prize. This ship being now fallen down the river, and being a ship of the most value of all the rest, the duke acquainted the king therewith; and by his commandment, made stay of the ship, lest otherwise it should be too late; which the duke, in the duty of his place of admiral, as he believeth, ought to have done, without such command: and if he had not done so, he might worthily have been blamed for his negligence; and then instantly he sent for the judge of the admiralty, to be informed from him, how far the sentence already passed, did bind, and whether it might stand with justice to make stay of her again, she being once discharged in such manner as before. The judge answered, as he was advised, That it might justly be done, upon better proofs appearing; yet discreetly, in a matter of that moment, he took time to give a resolute answer, that in the interim he might review the acts which had passed. The next day, or very shortly after, the judge came again to the duke, and, upon advice, answered resolutely, That the ship and goods might justly be stayed, if the proofs fell out to be answerable to the informations given; whereof, he said, he could not judge, till he had seen the depositions. And according to this resolution of the judge, did five other learned advocates, besides the king's advocate, concur in opinion, being intreated by the duke to advise thereof; so cautious was the duke not to do any unjust act. Then he acquainted the king again therewith, and his majesty commanded him to re-seize this ship, and to proceed judicially to the proofs; and the duke often required the king's advocate to hasten the examination of the witnesses; and many witnesses were produced and examined in pursuance of this new information. But the French merchants, impatient of any delay, complained again to the council-board, where it was ordered, not barely, That the ships and goods should be presently delivered, but should be delivered upon security;

pared and furnished, was not out of any respect, to draw them the rather to the composition; but really out of an apprehension, that there might be need of their strength for the defence of the realm at home; and, if so, then all private respects must give way to the public interest. These ships, upon the importunity of the merchants, and reasons given by them, were suffered, nevertheless, to fall down to Tilbury, by his late majesty's directions; to speed their voyage the better, whilst they might be accommodated for this voyage, without prejudice to the public safety; and they were discharged when there was an accommodation propounded and allowed, which was, that they should forthwith prepare other ships for the home service, whilst those went over with their voyage: which they accordingly did. That the motion made in the Commons' house, was without the duke's knowledge or privity. That when there was a rumour that the duke had drawn on the composition by staying of the ships which were then gone, the duke was so much offended thereat, that he would have had the former composition to have broken off, and have proceeded in a legal course; and he sent to the company for that purpose; but the company gave him satisfaction, that they had raised no such rumour, nor would, nor could avow any such thing, and intreated him to rest satisfied with such public acts to the contrary. That after this, their ships being gone, and, being careful of their future security, they solicited the dispatch of the composition; consulted with counsel about the instruments which passed about it, and were at the charge thereof; and the money was paid long after the sentence; and the sentence given after the ships were gone; and no security given at all for the money, but the sentence; and when this money was paid to the duke, the whole sum (but 200*l.* thereof only) was borrowed by the king, and employed by his own officers, for the service of the navy. If these things do, upon proof, appear to your lordships, as he is assured they will, he humbly submitteth it to your judgments, how far verbal affirmations or informations extrajudicial, shall move your judgments, when judicial acts, and those things which were acted and executed, prove the contrary."

"VII. To the Seventh Article, which is so mixed with actions of great princes, as that he dares not in his duty publish every passage thereof, he cannot for the present make so particular an Answer as he may, hath, and will do to the rest of his Charge. But he giveth this general Answer, the truth whereof he humbly prayeth may rather appear to your lordships by the proofs, than by any discourse of his; which, in reason of state, will haply be conceived fit to be more privately handled.*—

* Since the duke's Answer delivered into the house, he hath himself openly declared to their lordships, that for the better clearing of his honour and fidelity to the state, in that part

That these ships were lent to the French king at first, without the duke's privity: that when he knew it, he did that which belonged to an admiral of England, and a true Englishman: and he doth deny that, by menace or compulsion, or any other indirect or undue practice or means, he, by himself, or by any others, did deliver those ships, or any of them, into the hands of the French, as is objected against him. That the error which did happen, by what direction soever it were, was not in the intention any ways injurious or dishonourable, or dangerous to this state, or prejudicial to any private man, interested in any of those ships; nor could have given any such offence at all, if those promises had been observed by others, which were professed and really performed by his majesty and his subjects on their parts."

"VIII. To the Eighth Article, wherein he is taxed to have practised for the employment of the ships against Rochel, he answereth;— That he was so far from practising or consenting that the said ships should so be employed, that he shall make it clearly appear, that when it was discovered that they would be employed against those of the religion, the protestation of the French king being otherwise, and their pretence being that there was a peace concluded with those of the religion, and that the French king would use those ships against Genoa, which had been an action of no ill consequence to the affairs of Christendom, the duke did, by all fit and honourable means, endeavour to divert that course of their employment against Rochel, and he doth truly and boldly affirm, that his endeavours, under the royal care of his most excellent majesty, have been a great part of the means to preserve the town of Rochel; as the proofs, when they shall be produced, will make appear. And when his majesty did find, that, beyond his intention, and contrary to the faithful promises of the French, they were so misemployed, he found himself bound in honour to intercede with the most christian king, his good brother, for the peace of that town, and of the religion, lest his majesty's honour might otherwise suffer; which intercession his majesty did so sedulously, and so successfully pursue, that the town and the religion there do, and will, acknowledge the fruits thereof. And whereas it is further objected against him, That when in so unfaithful a manner he had delivered those ships into the power of a foreign state, to the danger of the of his Charge which is objected against him by this Seventh Article, he hath been an earnest and humble suitor to his majesty, to give him leave in his proofs, to unfold the whole truth and secret of that great action; and hath obtained his majesty's gracious leave therein; and accordingly doth intend to make such open and clear proof thereof, that he nothing doubteth, but the same, when it shall appear, will not only clear him from blame, but be a testimony of his care and faithfulness in serving the state.

ed, though he confesseth that they exceed his merit, yet they exceed not precedents of former times. But whatsoever it is he hath, or hath had, he utterly denieth that he obtained the same, or any part thereof, by any undue solicitation or practise, or did unduly obtain any release of any sums of moneie he received; but he having, at several times, and upon several occasions, disposed of divers sums of the moneys of his late majesty and of his majesty that now is, by their private direction, he hath releases thereof for his discharge; which was honourable and gracious in their majesties, who granted the same for their servant's indemnity; and he hopeth, was not unfit for him to accept of, lest, in future times, he or his might be charged therewith, when he could not be able to give so clear an account thereof, as he hopeth he shall now well be able to do.

“ XIII. To the Thirteenth Article of the Charge, which is set forth in such an expression of words, as might argue an extraordinary guiltiness in the duke; who by such infinite bonds of duty and thankfulness, was obliged to be tender of the life and health of his most dread and dear sovereign and master, he maketh this clear and true answer,—That he did neither apply nor procure the plaister or posset-drink, in the Charge termed to be a potion, unto his late majesty, nor was present when the same was first taken or applied: but the truth is this; that his majesty being sick of an ague, took notice of the duke's recovery of an ague not long before, and asked him how he had recovered, and what he found did him most good? The duke gave him a particular answer thereto, and that one, who was the earl of Warwick's physician, had ministered a plaister and posset-drink to him; and the chief thing that did him good was a vomit; which he wished the king had taken in the beginning of his sickness. The king was very desirous to have that plaister and posset-drink sent for; but the duke delayed it: whereupon the king impatiently asked, Whether it was sent for or not? And finding by the duke's speeches he had not sent for it, his late majesty sent J. Baker the duke's servant, and, with his own mouth, commanded him to go for it: whereupon the duke besought his majesty not to make use of it but by the advice of his own physicians, nor until it should be tried by James Palmer, of his bed-chamber, who was then sick of an ague, and upon two children in the town; which the king said he would do. In this resolution the duke left his majesty and went to London; and in the meantime, in his absence, the plaister and posset-drink was brought and applied by his late majesty's own command. At the duke's return his majesty was in taking the posset-drink, and the king then commanded the duke to give it him; which he did in presence of some of the king's physicians, they then no ways seeming to dislike it, the same drink being first tasted of by some of them, and divers others in the king's bed-chamber: and he thinks this was the second time the king took it. Afterwards, when the king grew somewhat worse than before, the duke heard a rumour as if his physic had done the king hurt, and that the duke had ministered that physic to him without advice. The duke acquainted the king therewith; to whom the king, with much discontent, answered thus, 'They are worse than devils that say it.' So far from the truth it was; which now notwithstanding as it seemeth, is taken up again by some, and with much confidence affirmed. And here the duke humbly prayeth all your lordships, not only to consider the truth of this Answer, but also to commiserate the sad thought which this Article had revived in him.

“ This being the plain, clear, and evident truth of all those things which are contained and particularly expressed in his Charge, the rest being general and requiring no Answer: and he being well assured that he hath herein affirmed nothing which he shall not make good by proof, in such way as your lordships shall direct, doth humbly refer it to the judgment of your lordships, how full of danger and prejudice it is to give too ready an ear, and too easy a belief unto reports or testimony without oath, which are not of weight enough to condemn any. He humbly acknowledgeth how easy it was for him in his younger years, and unexperienced, to fall into thousands of errors in those ten years wherein he had the honour to serve so great and open-hearted a sovereign and master; but the fear of Almighty God, his sincerity in the true religion established in the church of England, (though accompanied with many weaknesses and imperfections, which he is not ashamed humbly and heartily to confess) his awfulness, not willing to offend so good and gracious a master, and his love and duty to his country, have restrained and preserved him, he hopeth, from running into heinous and high misdemeanors and crimes: but whatsoever, upon examination and mature deliberation, they shall appear to be; lest in any thing, unwittingly, within the compass of so many years, he shall have offended, he humbly prayeth your lordships, not only in those, but as to all the said misdemeanors, misprisions, offences, and crimes wherewith he standeth charged before your lordships, to allow him the benefit of the free and general Pardon granted by his late majesty in parliament in the 21st year of his reign, out of which he is not excepted; and of the gracious Pardon of his now majesty granted to the said duke, and vouchsafed in like manner to all his subjects at the time of his most happy inauguration and coronation: which said Pardon, under the Great Seal of England, granted to the said duke, beareth date the 10th day of February now last past, and is here shewn forth unto your lordships, on which he doth most humbly rely; and yet he hopeth your lordships, in your justice and honour, upon which with confidence he puts himself, will acquit him of and from those misdemeanors, offences, misprisions, and crimes wherewith he hath been charged; and he hopeth, and will appears upon the proofs. The 2nd, for that if they should declare his cause to be Treason, then his testimony against the duke of Buckingham would be weakened; and the lord keeper having read the 2nd, 3rd and 4th orders also, the earl of Bristol gave their lordships humble thanks, and so was withdrawn.

The Lord Conway's ANSWER to the Earl of Bristol's Charge against him.

June 13. The lord Conway put their lordships in mind of several Articles delivered to them by the earl of Bristol against himself, the 1st of May last; and besought the lords that he might then give in his Answer to the same; which being granted, it was read in hæc verba:

“ The ANSWER of the Lord CONWAY to the ELEVEN ARTICLES, delivered against him into the Upper House of Parliament by the Earl of BRISTOL, the 1st day of May. (See p. 1290.)”

“ I. To the First Article he saith;—He doth acknowledge to owe a great deal of respect, love, and service, to the duke of Buckingham; and doth well remember that a worthy gentleman did invite him to endeavour the reconciliation of the earl of Bristol with the duke; to which also he made answer, That he had both affection and readiness to do all the good offices in his power, and that for the general duty which every man oweth to the works of reconciliation, and for other special motives, as being born in one and the same county, of long acquaintance, nothing having ever passed between the persons of the earl of Bristol and the lord Conway, but demonstrations of goodwill, and an interest of blood being between the lord Conway's children and the earl, acknowledging withal many lovely parts and powers in him; and it is not unlikely but the lord Conway might say, (according to the ingenuous freedom which he useth and cherisheth in himself) that if things should not be reconciled, but break out into opposition between the duke and the earl, he must then declare his greater love to be to the duke than to him; but this the lord Conway limited to their particular persons, and hopes it cannot, by any justice, be interpreted to stain him as he is a public minister, a magistrate, or a peer of the realm. All offices and obligations, in those respects, he owes to God and the king, but to no subject; and doth profess and is confident he hath paid them hitherto; and hopes in God to continue so with unblameable integrity.

“ II. To the Second Article he saith,—That the artifice the earl of Bristol useth, in mingling truth with untruth, makes it hard to clear it without much prolixity; which the lord Conway thinks this Article not worthy of, comparing it with the honour and reverence he owes to this great and noble council; yet, by your lordships good favours he gives it this Answer, That he verily believes he never wrote in those terms of being a secretary by the duke's creation; although he never was, nor is, unapt to acknowledge infinite obligations to the duke, for his favours freely conferred upon him; which he was ever, as he is yet, ready to testify by all due attributes and expressions: but for the lord Conway to have acknowledged this in those terms, had been to have forgotten what he owed to his gracious master of glorious memory: who when he gave him the seals, in the presence of divers lords of the council (the duke being also present) told him, and took the duke to witness, that it was his own proper choice to make lord Conway his secretary: yet it may well be when our now gracious king and the duke were in Spain, his late majesty having commanded the lord Conway to write, that they both might know it, that he had appointed him only to be secretary to receive the dispatches from thence and return the answers, that he might then write to the duke that he was his secretary: and as to the beginning of the lord Conway's letters, with Gracious Patron, which the earl of Bristol is pleased to note, it is true that, ever since the king gave him the creation of duke (which carries the style of grace) the lord Conway hath given him that title, with the addition of patron: with as true and plain a heart as it is given ordinarily in other countries, without particular intention or meaning: and the first time that ever the lord Conway gave the style, was, when his late majesty told him, he must in his letters give the duke the style of grace; and that this letter he showed to his majesty and 20 others of the same style, and his majesty neither reprov'd it nor forbid it.

“ III. To the Third Article he saith;—That it is a scandalous Article without foundation; and that the lord Conway never did any thing to keep the earl of Bristol from his late majesty's presence, but by express commandment from his majesty which, as he was secretary, he conceives to be sufficient warrant.

“ IV. To the Fourth Article he saith;—This is in all a scandal; and in one part unthankfully and untruly wrested; for Mr. Grisle, coming to the lord Conway under the pretext of faith and confidence, for advice, to know of him whether it might be safe for his lord, upon consideration of several restraints and leaves, to come to London to follow his business; hereupon the lord Conway answered him in the presence of God (as a man that would not betray another to save his own head) that he thought he might not safely come without leave from his majesty; but this advice he gave as a friend, not as a secretary, nor any way from his majesty or in his name.”

“ V. To the Fifth Article he saith;—He denies the Charge in general; and, for that part, touching his speaking with the duke, he remembereth that the earl of Bristol did in the postscript of a letter, desire him to move his majesty in that point; but the lord Conway conceiving the state of affairs to stand so between the earl and the duke, that good respect required that an office of grace to the earl should not pass without the knowledge of the duke, it is possible he might stay the opportunity to acquaint the duke; it being no part of his duty to his master of glorious memory, but a thing free in the choice of him, the lord Conway, to do or not, and further, the lord Conway doth verily believe, that he was informed that it was the desire of the earl that the duke should be made acquainted with it.—To the rest of the Article he answereth, “That it gives him, the lord Conway, the first notice of any displeasure taken by his late majesty against him, for not moving him; or that he should call the denying the earl leave a barbarous act: and the lord Conway denies that he retarded the leave from his majesty; but so soon as he received the warrant, he obeyed it, without any clause or limitations more than the king commanded; and that he delayed not the dispatch of it.

“VI. To the Sixth Article he saith;—It appears by the earl of Bristol’s acknowledging that he was directed to the lord Conway for his business, that the king had not found any fault in the lord Conway’s handling of the earl of Bristol’s occasions, as is alledged in the 5th Article: and for the lord Conway’s refusing to do any thing without the duke, it is true that the duke being so far engaged by the relation he made to both houses of parliament, in the presence, and with the assistance, avowal, and testimony, (in many things) of the then prince, now our gracious king: his late majesty commanded the lord Conway that nothing should be moved or done in the earl of Bristol’s business, without the knowledge of the duke.

“VII. To the Seventh Article he saith;—It is true that Commissioners were appointed for forming the Charge against the earl of Bristol, in sundry articles; which were the longer in handling by reason that some of the committee were at London, for occasion of the king’s service, and the lord Conway tyed to attend the court; yet the lord Conway did come expressly to London, to attend the committee, to give that business the greater expedition: and doubteth not but the commissioners will witness that the lord Conway did shew all manner of forwardness to give speed to that work: and as touching the king’s promises, the lord Conway knows not any thing of them, but he well knows that the king bestowed the reading of all the Charge, and Answers, both at large and in brief, as they were made by the earl of Bristol and directed to his majesty; and doth verily believe that if the earl of Bristol’s Answers had been so full as to have admitted no reply, his majesty would have presently put an end to the earl’s business; especially if he had promised it, as is alledged. Touching the commissioners Declaration, the lord Conway never heard any one of them declare himself satisfied; and the earl of Bristol’s Answers being given to the king, it was in his majesty’s heart and pleasure to give directions; which, if the lord Conway had ever received, he would have obeyed them; but the commissioners had done their work in forming the Charge; and for ought the lord Conway knows, had neither warrant nor matter to proceed further upon. The lord Conway knows of no artifice of the duke of Buckingham, to the ends mentioned in this Article; nor was ever made acquainted with, or believes there was any: and, for himself, when the supposed articles are made appear, as is undertaken, the lord Conway will be ready to make his just Answer.

“VIII. To the Eighth Article he saith;—He never knew or heard of any such solemn protestation of the king, touching the admitting of the earl of Bristol to his presence; but his late majesty told the lord Conway, That there was a further Charge to be laid against the said earl, which, perhaps, the lord Conway might accordingly write unto him: the king never gave the lord Conway directions for any further charge, but moving his majesty upon some solicitation of the earl of Bristol, his majesty was pleased to answer, that the earl was upon other ways and solicitations; by which the lord Conway took himself to be discharged of that business, and, perhaps, answered the earl of Bristol so.

“IX. To the Ninth Article he saith;—He knows not what passed from the earl of Bristol to his majesty or from his majesty to him, by the duke’s hand; but for his majesty’s letter, which the lord Conway acknowledgeth passed through his hands, there was nothing inserted but by the king’s directions; and the letter read, approved, and signed by his majesty: for the latter part of this Article, the lord Conway refers himself to his Answer to the 4th Article, where the same charge is laid against him.

“X. To the Tenth Article he saith;—That the Treaty for marrying the king of Bohemia’s eldest son with the emperor’s daughter, and bringing him up in that court, was handled by the lord Baltimore; and the lord Conway had never any part in that treaty, nor knew that his majesty gave consent to it, or advised it; but on the contrary, he ever understood that his majesty was against the breeding of the young prince in the emperor’s court; and ever said, That he would take upon him the care of his breeding: but the lord Baltimore giving an account of that treaty, by his letter to his majesty then at Newmarket, and there being then a dispatch going for Spain, his majesty commanded the lord Conway to send that dispatch from the lord Baltimore, in the packet to the earl of Bristol, which is all the lord Conway had to do in it; and the lord Baltimore being a party in the treaty, and a commissioner in forming the Charge against the earl of Bristol, the earl may as well take exceptions against him and the rest of the commissioners, as against the lord Conway for that part of the Charge: but the earl of Bristol is not charged for conforming himself to his majesty and his proceedings here, in that point; but further, for moving it, and carrying it in such a fashion in Spain, as sir W. Aston told him, ‘He durst not consent to it for his head.’ For the late letter from his majesty, the lord Conway answereth, That he did nothing therein but by direction from his majesty and by his majesty's own words or pen.

"XI. To the Eleventh Article he saith;— That he never sent any dispatches to the earl of Bristol into Spain, without his majesty's directions, and first shewing them unto his majesty and receiving his approbation and warrant of them; whose judgment would not have let dubious or entrapping directions pass him without reformation; and if the earl be charged with any thing more than the directions import, the dispatches will clear that: but the lord Conway conceives that the cause of the earl of Bristol's troubles proceeds, truly, from his own large promises on the behalf of Spain and the emperor, and the little grounds the effects shew he had for drawing of his majesty into so deep and disadvantageous engagements.—The lord Conway having thus made a true and clear Answer to the several Articles exhibited against him, he humbly leaveth the same to your lordships grave consideration; reserving to himself, as well all just advantages against any part of those Articles in the varieties and contradiction of the Charge; as also, the supply of any thing in these his humble Answers that may be defective in point of form; or which, by further instance, or doubtful interpretation, may require a clearer explanation."

This Answer being read, it was ordered, "That the earl of Bristol may reply thereunto if he pleases."

June 9. The Commons dispatched the Chancellor of the Duchy to the lords, to desire a copy of the duke of Buckingham's Answer; that, upon consideration thereof, a Reply might be made by them, with as much speed as possible. The lords said, That they would take this Message into consideration with all speed. Hereupon the Duke stood up, and declared, "That for the better clearing of his honour and fidelity to the state, in that part of his Charge which is objected against him by the 7th Article, he hath been an earnest and humble suitor to his majesty to give him leave in his Proofs, to unfold the whole truth and secret of that great action; and hath obtained his majesty's gracious leave therein; and accordingly doth intend to make such open and clear proof thereof, that he nothing doubteth, but the same, when it shall appear, will not only clear him from blame, but be a testimony of his care and faithfulness, in serving the state."

June 10. The copy of the duke's Answer was brought down to the commons, by Mr. baron Trevor and sir C. Cæsar; and they further signified, "That the Duke had made a request to their lordships, which they, also, recommended to this house, that the commons would proceed, with all expedition, in their Reply to this Answer; that so they might go on with business of much higher concern."—By the further proceedings on the Journals, the Commons seem to have fallen upon the consideration of the duke's Answer immediately; though nothing is particularly entered about it.—This second parliament the King thought proper abruptly to dissolve on the 15th of June, notwithstanding the House of Lords had with great humility and earnestness laid before his majesty their Advice "To continue this parliament, by which" say they, "those great and apparent dangers at home and abroad, signified unto us by your majesty's command, may be prevented, and your majesty made happy in the duty and love of your people, which we hold the greatest safety and treasury of a king; for the effecting whereof, our humble and faithful endeavour shall never be wanting."

Saunderson, in his Life of Charles 1, says, that the king's words to the lords, who came to intercede for a longer sitting, were, 'No, not a minute!' And that on the very day the parliament was dissolved, the earl of Arundel was confined to his house, and the earl of Bristol committed to the Tower by the king's order.

Rushworth has given a copy of a Remonstrance, which, he says, the commons intended to have presented to the king; as also another of a Declaration from his majesty containing his Reasons for the Dissolutions of this and the foregoing parliaments. They are inserted also in 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. pp. 194 et seq.

These Impeachments were put a stop to* by the dissolution of the parliament on the 15th

* In the year 1791 it was resolved, in the case of Warren Hastings (infra), that a Parliamentary Impeachment was not determined by a dissolution of parliament. Besides the long discussions, which this question then received in parliament, it was at the same time much agitated in print. See "An Examination of Precedents and Principles, from which it appears that an Impeachment is determined by a Dissolution of Parliament, &c. by Edward Christian, esq." published in 1791. "A Dissertation, shewing, &c. and containing some farther Observations on the effect of a Dissolution of Parliament, upon an unfinished Impeachment," published by the same gentleman in the following year. "State of the Question, how far Impeachments are affected by a Dissolution of Parliament," 1791. "Series of Letters to the Right Hon. Edmund Burke, in which are contained Inquiries into the Constitutional Existence of an Impeachment against Mr. Hastings, by the Hon. George Hardinge, esq." 1791; and, "A Review of the Arguments in favour of the Continuance of Impeachments, notwithstanding a Dissolution, by a Barrister," 1791. The last of these publications was said to be written by the hon. Spencer Perceval, who was afterwards successively Solicitor General and Attorney General, and is now (May, 1809) Chancellor of the Exchequer and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It is written with very great clearness and strength of argument, and relates the History of Parliamentary Impeachments, affecting the point in question, in a most interesting and impartial manner. The great distinction between legislative and judicial sides, it will afford your grace more leisure to look into your own affairs, which lie confused and unsettled. Lastly, (which is not the least thing) this act will be so plausible, that it may much advantage his majesty in point of subsidy.

“Secondly, It were expedient (under correction) that your grace would be pleased to allot some set hours for audience and access of suitors; and it would be less cumber to yourself and your servants, and give more content to the world, which often mutters for difficulty of access.

“Lastly, It were not amiss that your grace would settle a standing mansion-house and family, that suitors may know whither to repair constantly, and that your servants, every one in his place, might know what belongs to his place, and attend accordingly: for though confusion in a great family carry a kind of state with it, yet order and regularity gains a greater opinion of virtue and wisdom: I know your grace doth not (nor needs not) affect popularity. It is true that the people's love is the strongest citadel of a sovereign prince, but to a great subject it hath often proved fatal; for he who pulleth off his hat to the people, giveth his head to the prince; and it is remarkable what was said of a late unfortunate earl, who, a little before queen Elizabeth's death, had drawn the axe upon his own neck, ‘That he was grown so popular, that he was too dangerous for the times, and the times for him.’

“My lord, now that your grace is threatened to be heaved at, it should be above every one that oweth you duty and good-will, to reach out his hand some way or other to serve you: among these, I am one that presumes to do it, in this poor impertinent paper; for which I implore pardon, because I am, my lord, your grace's most humble and faithful servant, J. H. London, 13th Feb. 1626.”

126. The Case of GEORGE ABBOT, Archbishop of Canterbury, for refusing to licence a Sermon preached by Dr. Sibthorp, in order to promote the Loan, and to justify the King's imposing Public Taxes without consent of Parliament: 3 CHARLES I. A. D. 1627. [1 Rushw. Coll. 422—431.]

KING Charles finding himself much straitened by not obtaining the four Subsidies and three Fifteenths voted to him in his second parliament, which he rashly dissolved before the bills for raising that supply were perfected, endeavoured, as is well known, to relieve his necessities by means of forced loans from his subjects (many curious details concerning which are to be found in Rushworth). For the advancement of this project, one Dr. Sibthorp, (who appears to have been an eager seeker of preferment by an injudicious bustling course in recommending the measures of the court), published in print * a Sermon preached by him at Northampton, February 22d, 1627, at Lent assizes, intituled, ‘Apostolical Obedience.’ This book was licensed by the bishop of London, who did approve thereof, as a Sermon learnedly and discreetly preached. It was dedicated to the king, and expressed to be the doctor's meditations, which he first conceived upon his majesty's instructions unto all the bishops of this kingdom, fit to be put in execution, agreeable to the necessity of the times; and afterwards brought forth upon his majesty's commission, for the raising of monies by way of loan. His text was, Rom. xiii. 7, ‘Render therefore to all their dues.’ Among other passages he had this, ‘And seriously consider how as Jeroboam took the opportunity and breach betwixt Rehoboam and his subjects, to bring idolatry into Israel; so the papists lie at wait, if they could find a rent between our sovereign and his subjects (which the Lord

* This matter is thus mentioned in Kennett: “Another great unhappiness was this; the bishops at the king's request were most of them zealous to promote this Supply of the public necessities; and earnestly pressed their clergy to contribute their best assistance in it. Hence, some were more officious than became their function in such a secular affair: And others were so indiscreet as to make it a doctrine of their pulpits to urge the duty of answering whatever the king demanded. In particular, Dr. Sibthorp, vicar of Brackley, preached upon this subject at Northampton on Feb. 22, 1627, at the Lent assizes; and having his Sermon licensed by the bishop of London, he published it under the title of ‘Apostolical Obedience,’ with a Dedication to the king. The whole scope of it was to advance the Loan, and to justify the king's imposing public taxes without consent of parliament; and to prove that the people, in point of conscience, were bound to submit to the regal will and pleasure. For which he was afterward called in question, and censured by the parliament: But yet he gained his ends at court, being made Chaplain in Ordinary to his majesty, prebendary of Peterborough, and rector of Burton Latimers in Northamptonshire; from which he was ejected in the Civil Wars, and enjoyed them again at the Restoration, dying in April 1662. One who speaks most favourably of the royal party, says, He was a person of little learning, and of few parts, only made it his endeavours, by his forwardness and flatteries, to gain preferment.”

‘forbid) to introduce superstition in England. I speak no more than what I have heard from themselves, whilst I have observed their forwardness to offer double, according to an act of parliament so providing; yea, to profess, that they would depart with the half of their goods. And how, or why can this forwardness be in them, but in hope to cast the imputation of forwardness upon us? And so to them, that which the Jesuit will not suffer them to be, loving and loyal subjects.’

Also the said Sermon holds forth, ‘That the prince, who is the head, and makes his court and council, it is his duty to direct and make laws. Eccles. viii. 3 and 4, He doth whatsoever pleases him. Where the word of the king is, there is power, and who may say unto him, What doest thou?’ And in another place he saith, ‘If princes command any thing which subjects may not perform, because it is against the laws of God, or of nature, or impossible: Yet subjects are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resisting, or railing, or reviling, and so to yield a passive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one. I know no other case,’ saith he, ‘but one of those three, wherein a subject may excuse himself with passive obedience; but in all other he is bound to active obedience.’

The Commission to sequester Archbishop Abbot from all his Ecclesiastical Offices.

Archbishop Abbot having been long slighted at court, now fell under the king’s high displeasure, for refusing to licence Dr. Sibthorp’s Sermon, as he was commanded, intitled, “Apostolical Obedience;” and not long after he was sequestered from his office, and a commission was granted to the bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Oxford, and doctor Laud, bishop of Bath and Wells, to execute archiepiscopal jurisdiction. The Commission was as followeth:

CHARLES, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To the right rev. father in God, George, bishop of London; and to the right rev. father in God, our trusty and well-beloved counsellor, Richard, lord bishop of Durham; and to the right rev. father in God, John, lord bishop of Rochester; and John, lord bishop of Oxford; to the right rev. father in God, our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, William, lord bishop of Bath and Wells, greeting;

“Whereas George, now archbishop of Canterbury, in the right of the archbishopric, hath several and distinct archiepiscopal, episcopal, and other spiritual and ecclesiastical powers and jurisdictions, to be exercised in the government and discipline of the church within the province of Canterbury, and in the administration of justice in causes ecclesiastical within that province, which are partly executed by himself in his own person, and partly, and more generally, by several persons nominated and authorised by him, being learned in the ecclesiastical laws of this realm, in those several places whereunto they are deputed and appointed by the said archbishop; which several places, as we are informed, they severally hold by several grants for their several lives; as namely, sir Henry Martin, knight, hath and holdeth by the grants of the said archbishop, the offices and places of the Dean of the Arches, and Judge, or Master of the Prerogative Court, for the natural life of the said sir Henry Martin.—Sir Charles Caesar, knight, hath and holdeth by the grant of the said archbishop, the places or offices of the Judge of the Audience, and Master of the Faculties, for the term of the natural life of the said sir Charles Caesar.—Sir Thomas Ridley, knight, hath and holdeth by the grant of the said archbishop, the place or office of Vicar General to the said archbishop.—And Nathaniel Brent, doctor of the laws, hath and holdeth by grant of the said archbishop, the office or place of Commissary to the said archbishop, as of his proper and peculiar diocese of Canterbury.—And likewise the several Registers of the Arches, Prerogative, Audience, Faculties, and of the Vicar General, and the Commissary of Canterbury hold their places by grants from the said archbishop respectively.

“Whereas the said Archbishop, in some or all of these several places and jurisdictions, doth or may sometimes assume unto his personal and proper judicature, order, or direction, some particular causes, actions, or cases at his pleasure. And forasmuch as the said archbishop cannot at this present, in his own person, attend the services which are otherwise proper for his cognisance and jurisdiction, and which, as archbishop of Canterbury, he might and ought in his own person to have performed and executed in causes and matters ecclesiastical, in the proper function of archbishop of that province: we therefore, of our regal power, and of our princely care and providence, that nothing shall be defective in the order, discipline, government, or right of the church, have thought fit by the service of some other learned and reverend bishops, to be named by us, to supply those things which the said archbishop ought or might in the cases aforesaid to have done, but for this present cannot perform the same.

“Know you therefore, That we reposing special trust and confidence in your approved wisdoms, learning, and integrity, have nominated, authorized, and appointed, and do, by these presents, nominate, authorise, and appoint you the said George, lord bishop of London; Richard, lord bishop of Durham; John, lord bishop of Rochester; John, lord bishop of Oxford; and William, lord bishop of Bath and Wells, or any four, three, or two of you, to do, execute, and perform all and every those acts, matters, and things, any way touching or concerning the power, jurisdiction, or authority of the archbishop of Canterbury, in causes or matters ecclesiastical, as amply, fully, and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as the said archbishop himself might have done.

“And we do hereby command you, and every of you, to attend, perform, and execute this our royal pleasure, in, and touching the premisses, until we shall declare our will and pleasure to the contrary.—And we do further hereby will and command the said archbishop of Canterbury, quietly, and without interruption, to permit and suffer you the said George, bishop of London; Richard, bishop of Durham; John, bishop of Rochester; John, bishop of Oxford; and William, bishop of Bath and Wells, any four, three, or two of you, to execute and perform this our commission, according to our royal pleasure thereby signified. And we do further will and command all and every other person and persons, whom it may any way concern, in their several places or offices, to be attendant, observant, and obedient to you, and every of you, in the execution and performance of this our royal will and command, as they and every of them will answer the contrary at his utmost perils.

“Nevertheless we do hereby declare our royal pleasure to be, That they the said sir Henry Martin, sir Charles Cæsar, sir Thomas Ridley, and Nathaniel Brent, in their several offices and places aforesaid, and all other registers, officers, and ministers, in the several courts, offices and jurisdictions, appertaining to the said archbishop, shall quietly, and without interruption, hold, use, occupy and enjoy their said offices and places, which they now hold, by the grant of the said archbishop, or any other former archbishop of Canterbury, in such manner and form, and with those benefits, privileges, powers, and authorities, which they now have, hold, and enjoy therein, or thereout severally and respectively, they, and every of them, in their several places, being attendant and obedient unto you the said George, bishop of London; Richard, bishop of Durham; John, bishop of Rochester; John, bishop of Oxford; and William, bishop of Bath and Wells, or to any four, three, or two of you, in all things according to the tenor of this our commission, as they should or ought to have been, to the said archbishop himself, if this commission had not been had or made.

“In witness whereof, We have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself at Westminster, the ninth day of October, in the third year of our reign. Per ipsum Regem. EDMONDS.”

ARCHBISHOP ABBOT'S NARRATIVE.

Pars Prima.

It is an example, so without example, that in the sunshine of the gospel, in the midst of profession of the true religion, under a gracious king, whom all the world must acknowledge to be blemished with no vice; a man of my place and years, who have done some service in the Church and Commonwealth, so deeply laden with some furious infirmities of body, should be removed from his ordinary habitation, and by a kind of deportation should be thrust into one end of the island (although, I must confess, into his own diocese) that I hold it fit, that the reason of it should be truly understood, lest it may someways turn to the scandal of my person and calling.—Which Declaration notwithstanding, I intend not to communicate to any, but to let it lie by me privately, that it being set down impartially, whilst all things are fresh in memory, I may have recourse to it hereafter, if questions shall be made of any thing contained in this relation.

And this I hold necessary to be done, by reason of the strangeness of that, which by way of censure was inflicted upon me, being then of the age of 65 years, incumbered with the gout, and afflicted with the stone, having lived so many years in a place of great service, and, for ought I know, untainted in any of my actions, although my master king James, who resteth with God, had both a searching wit of his own, to discover his servants whom he put in trust, whether they took any sinister courses, or no; and wanted not some suggesters about him to make the worst of all mens actions whom they could misreport: yet this innocency and good fame to be over-turned in a month, and a Christian bishop suddenly to be made fabula vulgi, to be tossed upon the tongues of friends and foes, of Protestants and Papists, of court and country, of English and foreigners, must needs in common opinion, presuppose some crime, open or secret: which being discovered by the king, albeit not fully appearing to the world, must draw on indignation in so high a measure.

I cannot deny, that the indisposition of my body kept me from Court, and thereby gave occasion to maligners to traduce me as withdrawing myself from public services, and therefore mishaking some courses that were taken; which abstaining perhaps neither pleased the king, nor the great man that set them on foot.—It is true, that in the turbulency of some things, I had no great invitements to draw me abroad, but to possess my soul in patience, till God sent fairer weather: but the true ground of my abstaining from solemn and public places, was the weakness of my feet, proceeding from the gout; which disease being hereditary unto me, and having possessed me now nine years, had deliberated me more and more: so that I could not stand at all, neither could I go up or down a pair of stairs, but besides my staff, I must have the service of one, at least, of my men, which was not fit to be admitted in every place where I was to come.

And although I was oft remembered, by the wisest of my friends, that I might be carried as the old lord treasurer Burleigh was, yet I did not think my service so necessary for the commonwealth, as his lordship's, by long experience, was found to be. I did not value gassed unto him by some malicious body, that thereby the Archbishop might be put to some remarkable strait. For if the king should send the Sermon unto him, and command him to allow it to the press, one of these two things would follow, that either he should authorise it, and so all men that were indifferent, should discover him for a base and unworthy beast; or he should refuse it, and so should fall into the king's indignation, who might pursue it at his pleasure, as against a man that was contrary to his service.

Out of this fountain flowed all the water that afterwards so wet: in rehearsing whereof, I must set down divers particulars, which some men may wonder how they should be discovered unto me. But let it suffice once for all, that in the word of an honest man, and of a bishop, I recount nothing, but whereof I have good warrant, God himself working means.

The matters were revealed unto me, although it be not convenient, that in this Paper I name the manner how they came unto me, lest such as did by well doing further me, should receive blame for their labour. Well! resolved it is, that I must be put to it, and that with speed; and therefore Mr. William Murrey, nephew (as I think) unto Mr. Thomas Murrey, sometimes tutor unto prince Charles, and the young man now of the king's bed-chamber, is sent unto me with the written Sermon; of whom I must say, That albeit he did the king his master's business, yet he did use himself civilly and temperately unto me. For, avoiding of inquit and inquam (as Tully saith) I said this, and he said that, I will make it by way of Dialogue, not setting down every day's conference exactly by itself, but mentioning all things of importance in the whole, yet distinguishing of times, where, for the truth of the relation, it cannot be avoided.

Murrey. My lord, I am sent unto you by the king, to let you know, that his pleasure is, That whereas there is brought unto him a Sermon to be printed, you shall allow this Sermon to the press.

Archb. I was never he that authorised Books to be printed; for it is the work of my chaplains to read over other men's writings, and what is fit, to let it go; and what is unfit to expunge it.

Murrey. But the king will have you yourself to do this, because he is minded, that no books shall be allowed, but by you and the bishop of London: And my lord of London authorised one the other day (Cousens his Book) and he will have you do this.

Archb. This is an occupation that my old master king James did never put me to, and yet I was then young, and had more abilities of body than now I have; so that I see I must now learn a new lesson: but leave it with me, and when I have read it, I shall know what to say unto it; a day or two hence you shall understand my mind. When I had once or twice perused it, I found some words which seemed unto me to cross that which the king intended, and in a sort to destroy it; and therefore upon his return, a day or two after, I expressed myself thus:

Mr. Murrey, I conceive, that the king intendeth, that this Sermon shall promote the service now in hand about the Loan of Money, but in my opinion it much crosseth it; for he layeth it down for a rule, and because it shall not be forgotten, he repeateth it again, 'That Christians are bound in duty one to another, especially all subjects to their princes, according to the laws and customs of the kingdom, wherein they live.' Out of this will men except this Loan, because that there is neither law nor custom for it in the kingdom of England.—Secondly, In my judgment, there followeth a dangerous Speech, 'Habemus necessitatem vindicandæ libertatis.' For this was all that was then quoted out of Calvin, no mention being made of any the other words which are now in the printed copy: For when by the former rule he hath set men at liberty, whether they will pay or no, he imposeth upon them a necessity to vindicate this liberty, and vindicare may be extended to challenge with violence cum vi. But for my part, I would be most unwilling to give occasion to sedition and mutiny in the kingdom.—Again, here is mention made of Poll-money, which, as I have heard, hath already caused much distaste where the Sermon was preached.—Moreover, what a speech is this, 'That he observes the forwardness of the Papists to offer double,' according to an act of parliament so providing, yea, to profess, that they would part with the half of their goods, where he quoteth in the margin, anno 1 Caroli; the Act for the Subsidy of the laity, whereby Popish Recusants were to pay double; when indeed there is no such act.—And in the fifth place it is said in this Sermon, 'That the princes of Bohemia have power to depose their kings,' as not being hereditary, which is a great question. Such a one as hath cost much blood, and must not in a word be absolutely defined here, as if it were without controversy. I pray you make his majesty acquainted with these things, and take the Book with you, (where it is to be noted, that all this time we had but one single copy, which was sometime at the court, and sometime left with me.)

Murrey. I will faithfully deliver these things to the king, and then you shall hear further from me.

Some two or three days after he returned again unto me, and telleth me, That he had particularly acquainted the king with my Objections; and his majesty made this answer: First, for the laws and customs of the kingdom, he did not stand upon that, he had a precedent for that which he did, and thereon he would insist.

Archb. I think that to be a mistaking, for I fear there will be found no such precedent. King Henry the 8th, as the Chronicle sheweth, desired but the sixth part of men's estates, ten groats in the pound; our king desireth the whole six parts full out, so much as men are set at in the Subsidy Book: and in the time of king Henry, although he were a powerful king, yet, for that taxation, there began against him little less than a rebellion; so that he held it wisdom to desist, and laying the blame upon cardinal Wolsey, professed, that he knew nothing of the matter.

Murrey. Secondly, The king saith, for the words, 'Habemus necessitatem vindicandæ libertatis,' he taketh them to be for him; and he will stand on his liberty. Thirdly, For poll-money, he thinketh it lawful. Fourthly, It is true, there was no such act passed, and therefore it must be amended (and yet in the printed book it is suffered still to stand. Such slight, and, I may say, slovenly care was had by them that published this Sermon.) And Fifthly, For that of Bohemia, he hath crossed it out of the Book.

Some other matters there were, against which I took exception, but Mr. Murrey being a young gentleman, although witty, and full of good behaviour, I doubted, that being not deeply seen in divinity, he could not so well conceive me, nor make report of my words to his majesty: and therefore I being lame, and so disabled to wait on the king, did move him, That he would, in my name, humbly beseech his majesty to send the bishop of Bath and Wells unto me, and I would, by his means, make known my Scruples; and so I dismissed Mr. Murrey, observing with myself, that the Answers to my five Objections, especially to two or three, were somewhat strange: as if the king were resolved, were it to his good or to his harm, to have the Book go forth.

After one or two days more, the young gentleman cometh to me again, and telleth me, That the king did not think it fit to send the bishop of Bath unto me; but he expected I should pass the Book. In the mean time, had gone over one High Commission day, and this bishop, who used (otherwise) very few days to fail, was not there; which being joined to his majesty's Message, made me in some measure to suspect that this whole business might have that bishop's hand in it, especially I knowing in general the disposition of the man.

The minds of those that were actors for the publishing of the Book, were not quiet at the court, that the thing was not dispatched; and therefore one day the duke said to the king, Do you see how this business is deferred? If more expedition be not used, it will not be printed before the end of the term; at which time it is fit that it be sent down into the countries. So eager he was, that either by my credit his undertakings might be strengthened, or, at least, I might be contemned and derided as an unworthy fellow. This so quickened the king, that the next Message which was sent by Mr. Murrey was, in some degree, minatory. That if I did not dispatch it, the king would take some other course with me.

When I found how far the Duke had prevailed, I thought it my best way to set down in writing many objections, wherefore the Book was not fit to be published: which I did modestly, and sent them to the king. The words were these, which I culled out of the written Sermon:

1. Page 2. Those words deserve to be well weighed, 'And whereas the Prince pleads not 'the power of Prerogative.'

2. Page 8. 'The king's duty is first to direct and make laws.' There is no law made till the king assent unto it; but if it be put simply to make laws, it will make much starting at it.

3. Page 10. 'If nothing may excuse from 'active obedience, but what is against the law 'of God, or of nature, or impossible.' How doth this agree with the first fundamental position? page 5. 'That all subjects are bound to 'all their princes according to the laws and 'customs of the kingdom wherein they live.'

4. Page 11. 'The Poll-money,' mentioned by him in St. Matthew, was imposed by the emperor as a conqueror over the Jews, and the execution of it in England, although it was by a law, produced a terrible effect in king Richard the 2nd's time, when only it was used, for ought that appeareth.

5. Page 12. It is in the bottom, view the reign of Henry the 3rd, and whether it be fit to give such allowance to the book, being surreptitiously put out?

6. In the same page, let the largeness of those words be well considered, 'Yea all antiquity to be absolutely for absolute Obedience 'to princes in all civil and temporal things.' For such cases as Naboth's vineyard may fall within this.

7. Page 14. Sextus Quintus was dead before the year 1580.

8. In the same page, weigh it well, How this Loan may be called a Tribute; and when it is said, 'We are promised, it shall not be immoderately imposed;' how that agreeth with his majesty's commission and proclamation, which are quoted in the margin?

It should seem, that this Paper did prick to the quick, and no satisfaction being thereby accepted, bishop Laud is called, and he must go to answer to it in writing: this man is the only inward counsellor with Buckingham, sitting with him sometimes privately whole hours, and feeding his humour with malice and spite. His life in Oxford was to pick quarrels in the Lectures of the publick readers, and to advertise them to the then bishop of Durham, that he might fill the ears of king James with discontent, against the honest men that took pains in their places, and settled the truth (which he called Puritanism) in their auditors. He made it his work to see what Books were in the press, and to look over Epistles Dedicatory, and Prefaces to the Reader, to see what faults might be found.

It was an observation what a sweet man this was like to be, that the first observable act that he did, was the marrying of the earl of D. to the lady R. when it was notorious to the world, that she had another husband, and the same a nobleman, who had divers children then living by her. King James did for many years take this so ill, that he would never hear of any great preferment of him; insomuch that the bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, who taketh upon him to be the first promoter of him, hath many times said, That when he made mention of Laud to the king, his majesty was so averse from it, that he was constrained oftentimes to say, That he would never desire to serve that master, which could not remit one fault unto his servant. Well, in the end he did conquer it, to get him to the bishoprick of St. David's; which he had not long enjoyed, but he began to undermine his benefactor, as at this day it appeareth. The countess of Buckingham told Lincoln, that St. David's was the man that undermined him with her son: and verily, such is his aspiring nature, that he will underwork any man in the world, so that he may gain by it.

This man, who believeth so well of himself, framed an Answer to my Exceptions. But to give some countenance to it, he must call in three other bishops, that is to say, Durham, Rochester, and Oxford, tried men for such a purpose; and the whole style of the speech runneth, 'We and We.' This seemed so strong a confutation, that for reward of their service, as well as for hope, that they would do more, Dr. Neal, bishop of Durham, and the bishop of Bath, were sworn of the privy council.

The very day, being Sunday, Mr. Murrey was sent unto me with a Writing; but finding me all in a sweat by a fit of the stone, which was then upon me, he forbore for that time to trouble me, and said, That on the morrow he would repair to me again. I got me to bed, and lying all that night in pain, I held it not convenient to rise the next day: and on the Monday, Mr. Murrey came unto me, which was the eighth time that he had been with me, so incessantly was I plied with this noble work: I had shewed it before to a friend or two, whereof the one was a learned doctor of divinity, and the other had served many times in parliament with great commendation. We all agreed, That it was an idle work of a man that understood not logic, that evidently crossed himself, that sometimes spake plausibly, and in the end of his Sermon fell so poor and flat, that it was not worth the reading.

Mr. Murrey coming to my bed-side, said, That he was sent again by the king, and had a Paper to be shewed unto me.

Archb. You see in what case I am, having slept little all this last night, but nevertheless since you come from the king, I will take my spectacles and read it.

Murrey. No, my lord, you may not read it, neither handle it; for I have charge not to suffer it to go out of my hands.

Archb. How then shall I know what it is?

Murrey. Yes, I have order to read it unto you, but I may not part with it.

Archb. I must conceive, that if I do not assent to it, his majesty will give me leave to reply upon it; which I cannot do, but in my study, for there are my Books.

Murrey. I must go with you into your study, and sit by you till you have done.

Archb. It is not so hasty a work, it will require time, and I have not been used to study, one sitting by me: but first read it, I pray you.

The young gentleman read it from one end to the other, being two or three sheets of paper.

Archb. This Answer is very bitter, but giveth me no satisfaction. I pray you leave the Writing with me, and I shall batter it to pieces.

Murrey. No, my lord, I am forbidden to leave it with you, or to suffer you to touch it.

Archb. How cometh this about? Are the authors of it afraid of it, or ashamed of it? I pray you tell his majesty, that I am dealt with neither manly nor scholar-like. Not manly, because I must fight with adversaries that I know not; nor scholar-like, because I must not see what it is that must confute me. It is now eight and forty years ago that I came to the university, and since that time I have ever loved a learned man: I have disputed and written divers books, and know very well what appertaineth to the schools. This is a new kind of learning unto me. I have formerly found fault, that the Author of this Sermon quoteth not the places whereupon he grounds his doctrine; and when I have oft called for them, it is replied unto me, That I must take them upon the credit of the writer, which I dare not do: for I have searched but one place, which he quoted in general, but sets down neither the words, nor the treatise, nor the chapter, and I find nothing to the purpose for which it is quoted; and therefore I have reason to suspect all the rest. I pray you therefore, in the humblest manner, to commend my service to the king my master, and let him know, that unless I may have all the quotations set down, that I may examine them, and may have that Writing, wherein I am so ill used, I cannot allow the Book.

Before I go further, it shall not be amiss to touch some particulars of that which I sent in writing to the King.

The first was page 2. Those words deserve to be well weighed, 'And whereas the prince pleads not the power of prerogative.' To this Mr. Murrey said, The king doth not plead it: But my reply was, By what then doth he coerce those Refractories? For I have not heard of any law whereby they are imprisoned, and therefore I must take it to be by the king's prerogative.

To the second, page 8. 'The king's duty is first to direct and make laws.' There is no law made till the king assent unto it; but if it be but simply to make laws, it will cause much startling at it. To this I remember not any material thing answered, neither to the third.

Page 10. 'If nothing may excuse from active obedience, but what is against the law of God, or of nature, or impossible.' How doth

It seemed therefore strange unto me; that in the upshot of the business, I was called in to make that good by divinity, which others had done; and must have no other inducements to it, but Dr. Sibthorp's contemptible Treatise. I imagined this, for the manner of the carriage of it, to be somewhat like unto the earl of Somerset's Case, who abused the wife of the earl of Essex, must have her divorced from her husband, and must himself marry her: and this must not be done, but that the archbishop of Canterbury must ratify all judicially. I know the Cases are different, but I only compare the manner of the carriage.

When the approbation of the Sermon was by me refused, it was carried to the bishop of London, who gave a great and stately allowance of it; the good man being not willing that any thing should stick which was sent unto him from the court, as appeareth by the Book, which is commonly called, 'The Seven Sacraments,' which was allowed by his lordship, with all the errors; which since that time have been expunged, and taken out of it.

But before this passed the bishop's file, there is one accident which fitly cometh in to be recounted in this place. My lord of London hath a chaplain, Dr. Worrall by name, who is scholar good enough, but a kind of free fellow-like man, and of no very tender conscience: Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon was brought unto him, and, 'hand over head' (as the proverb is) he approved it, and subscribed his name unto it. But afterwards, being better advised, he sent it to a learned gentleman of the Inner Temple, and writing some few lines unto him, craveth his opinion of that which he had done; the gentleman read it: but although he had promised to return his judgment by letter, yet he refused so to do, but desired, that Dr. Worrall would come himself; which being done, he spake to this purpose: What have you done? You have allowed a strange Book yonder; which, if it be true, there is no meum or tuum, no man in England hath any thing of his own: If ever the tide turn, and matters be called to a reckoning, you will be haaged for publishing such a Book. To which the doctor answered, Yea, but my hand is to it; what shall I do? For that, the other replied, you must scrape out your name, and do not so much as suffer the sign of any letter to remain in the paper. Which accordingly he did, and withdrew his finger from the pye.

But what the chaplain well advised would not do, his lord, without sticking, accomplished; and so being insensibly hatched, it came flying into the world: but in my opinion, the Book hath persuaded very few understanding men, and hath not gained the king sixpence.

Pars Secunda.

Hitherto I have declared at length all passages concerning the Sermon, and, to my remembrance, I have not quitted any thing that was worthy the knowing. I am now in the second place to show what was the issue of this not allowing the worthy and learned Treatise: In the height of this question, I privately understood, from a friend in the court, that for a punishment upon me, it was resolved, that I should be sent away to Canterbury, and confined there. I kept this silently, and expected God's pleasure; yet laying it up still in my mind, esteeming the Duke to be of the number of them, touching whom Tacitus observeth; 'That such as are false in their love; are true in their hate.' But whatsoever the event must be, I made that use of the report, that 'Jacula prævisâ minus feriunt.' The Duke, at the first, was earnest with the king, that I must be presently sent away before his going to sea; for, saith he, if I were gone, he would be every day at Whitehall, and at the Council Table, and there will cross all things that I have intended: To meet with his objection, I got me away to Croydon a month sooner than in ordinary years I have used to do: but the term was ended early, and my main fit of the stone did call upon me to get me to the country, that there on horse-back I might ride upon the downs; which I afterwards performed, and, I thank God, found great use of it, in recovering of my stomach, which was almost utterly gone.

The Duke hastened his preparations for the Fleet; but still that cometh in for one memorandum, That if he were once absent, there should no day pass over, but that the archbishop would be with the king, and infuse things that would be contrary to his proceedings. What a miserable and restless thing ambition is, when one talented, but as a common person, yet by the favour of his prince, hath gotten that interest, that, in a sort, all the keys of England hang at his girdle, (which the wise queen Elizabeth would never endure in any subject) yet standeth in his own heart in such tickle terms, as that he feared every shadow, and thinketh, that the lending of the king's ear unto any grave and well-seasoned report, may blow him out of all; which, in his estimation, he thinketh is settled upon no good foundation, but the affection of the prince, which may be mutable, as it is in all men more or less: If a man would wish harm unto his enemy, could he wish him a greater torment, than to be wrested and wringed with ambitious thoughts? Well, at first it went current, that with all haste I must be doffed, but upon latter consideration, it must be staid till the duke be at sea, and then put in execution by the king himself, that, as it seemeth, Buckingham might be free from blame, if any should be laid upon any person. Hence it was, that after his going, there was new prosecution of the Yorkshire men, and the refusing Londoners were pursued more fervently than before; and it is very likely, that the arrow came out of the same quiver; that the bishop coming to the election at Westminster, was driven back so suddenly to Bugden. Take heed of these things, noble duke, you put your king to the worst parts, whereof you may hear one day: So when your sovereign in the parliament time had spoken sharply to both houses, commanding them to go together again, and to give more money, and commanding them to meddle no more with the duke of Buckingham; you came the next day, and thought to smooth all, taking the glory of qualifying disturbances to yourself; whereas if you had read books of true state government, wherewithal you are not acquainted, sweet things are personally to be acted by kings and princes, as giving of honours, and bestowing of noted benefits; and those things that are sour and distasteful, are to be performed by their ministers; you go the contrary way.

But as before the whole house falleth on fire, some sparks do fly out; so, before the Message of the king was brought me by the Secretary, there were some inklings that such a thing would follow. And upon the naming of me (by occasion) it was said by a creature of the Duke's, That it would not be long, before the Archbishop should be sequestered (that was the word). So well acquainted are the duke's followers with great actions that are ready to fall out in state.

Accordingly, on Tuesday the 5th of July, 1627, the lord Conway came unto me to Croydon, before dinner time, having travelled, as he said, a long journey that morning, even from Oatlands thither; he would say nothing till he had dined: then, because he was to return to Oatlands that night, I took him into the gallery, and when we were both sat down, we fell to it in this manner.

Archb. My lord, I know you, coming from court, have somewhat to say to me.

Secretary. It is true, my lord, and I am the most unwilling man in the world to bring unpleasing news to any person of quality, to whom I wish well, and especially to such a one, as of whose meat I have eaten, and been merry at his house: But I come from the king, and must deliver his pleasure: I know who you are, (and much more, with very civil language.)

Archb. I doubt not, my lord, but you have somewhat to say; and therefore I pray you in plain terms let me have it.

Secret. It is then his majesty's pleasure, that you should withdraw yourself unto Canterbury; for which he will afford you some convenient time.

Archb. Is that it? Then I must use the words of the psalmist, 'He shall not be afraid of any evil tidings, for his heart standeth fast, and believeth in the Lord.' But, I pray you, what is my fault that bringeth this upon me?

Secret. The king saith, you know.

Archb. Truly I know none, unless it be that I am lame, which I cannot help; it is against my will, I am not proud of it.

Secret. The king bad me tell you, that if any expostulation were used —

Archb. No, I will not use any expostulation; if it be his pleasure I will obey, I know myself to be an honest man, and therefore fear nothing. But, my lord, do you think it is for the king's service in this sort to send me away?

Secret. No, by God! I do not think it, and so yesterday I told the king with an oath; but he will have it so.

Archb. I must say as before, 'He shall not be afraid of any evil tidings, for his heart standeth fast, and he believeth in the Lord.' But I pray you, my lord, is the king precisely set upon my going to Canterbury? There are questions in law between me and that town about the liberty of my archbishopric, which I, by my oath, am bound to maintain; and if I should be among them, I have many adversaries of the citizens; I have there some tenants, and the dean and chapter are interested in the question; I would be unwilling that my servants and their people should fall together by the ears, while I am in the town: his majesty knows this difference to be between us, by the token that a suit which I lately brought against them, by a quo warranto in the King's Bench, was stopped, justice being denied me, which is not usual to be denied to any subject; and the king will knoweth by whose means it was stayed. I have thereore another house, called Foord, five miles beyond Canterbury, and more out of the way; his majesty may be pleased to let me go thither.

Secret. I can say nothing to that, but I will acquaint the king with it; and I conceive nothing to the contrary, but that his majesty will yield so much unto you. I have a second charge to deliver unto you, and that is, That his majesty will not have you from henceforth to meddle with the High Commission; he will take care that it shall be done otherwise.

Archb. I do not doubt but it shall be better managed, than it hath been by me: And yet, my lord, I tell you, that for these many years that I have had the direction of that court, the time is to come that ever honest man did find fault, that he had not there justice done.

Secret. It is now vacation time, and so consequently little to do; and by Michaelmas his majesty may set all in order.

Archb. I am sorry that the king proceedeth thus with me, and letteth me not know the cause.

Secret. Although I have no commission to tell you so, it is for a Book which you would not allow, which concerned the king's service.

Archb. If that be it, when I am questioned for it, I doubt not but to give an honest answer.

Secret. You will never be questioned for it.

Archb. Then am I the more hardly dealt withal, to be censured, and not called to my answer.

Secret. Well, my lord, I will remember that of Foord; and will your grace command me any more service?

Archb. No, my lord, but God be with you; only I end where I began, with the words of the Prophet, 'He shall not be afraid for any evil tidings, for his heart standeth fast, and believeth in the Lord.'

It comforted me not a little, that the word was now out: my conceiving must be for not allowing of a Book! I had much ado to forbear smiling when I heard it, because now it was clear it was not for Felony or Treason that was laid to my charge, nor for intelligence with the Spaniards or French, nor for correspondence with Jesuits or Seminary Priests, or any other grievous crime, I thank God for that. I had almost forgotten, that among many other memorable Speeches that passed between us, I used this one, That peradventure the king might be offended at me, because I was no more present at the matter of the Loan; but, said I, my lameness hindered me therein, and I hoped thereby to do my master better service, because if ever course be taken to reconcile the king and his people, (which if it be not, this kingdom will rue it in the end) I would hope among many other, to be a good instrument therein, since my hand hath not been in those bitterness which have of late fallen out. You say well, saith the Secretary: Would you that I should tell the king so much? Yea, said I, if you please; I hold it not unfit that his majesty should know it.

What he reported therein, I do not know; but matters proceeded in the former course, as if there were no regard had of any such thing.

The lord Conway being gone from me for two or three days, I expected to hear the resolution, to what place in Kent I should betake myself; and receiving no news, I tossed many things in my mind, as perhaps, that the king desired to hear somewhat from the duke, how he sped in his journey; or that peradventure he might alter his purpose, upon report of my ready obeying; or that it might so fall out, that some of the lords of the court understanding, upon the Secretary's return from Croydon, that which was formerly concealed from them, might infuse some other counsils into the king. These thoughts I resolved, at last, not forgetting the courses of the court, and imprinting that into my heart, That there was no good intended towards me, but that any advantage would be taken against me, I sent a man to Whitehall, whither the king was now come for a night or two, and by him I wrote to the lord Conway, in these words:

My very good Lord; I do not forget the Message which you brought unto me on Thursday last, and because I have heard nothing from you since that time, I send this messenger on purpose to know what is resolved touching the house, or houses where I must remain: there belong to the archbishopric three houses in Kent, one at Canterbury, another five miles beyond, called Foord, and a third on the side of Canterbury, but two miles off, the name whereof is Becksburn.—I pray your lordship to let me know his majesty's pleasure, whether he will leave the choice of any of those houses to me to reside in: I have reason to know the resolution hereof, because I must make my provision of wood, and coals, and hay, for some definite place; and when I shall have brewed, it is fit I should know where to put it, or else it will not serve the turn: it is an unseasonable time to brew now, and as untimely to cut wood, being green in the highest degree, and to make coals, without all which, my house cannot be kept. But when I shall know what must be my habitation, I will send down my servants presently to make the best provisions that they can. And so expecting your lordship's Answer, I leave you to the Almighty, and remain, Your lordship's very loving friend, G. CANT. Croydon, July 10, 1627."

He made my servant stay, and when he had gone up to know the king's further pleasure, he returned me the Answer following:

May it please your grace; I am ashamed, and do confess my fault, that I wrote not to your grace before I received your reproof, though a gracious one, but, in truth, I did not neglect nor forget. But the continual oppression of business would not permit me to advertise to your grace the king's Answer. His majesty heard seriously your professions and Answers, and commanded me to signify unto you, That he knew not the present difference between you and the town; and if he had, he would not have cast you into that inconvenience. He was well pleased you should go to your house at Foord, and said, he did not expect when the question was ended between your grace and the town, that you should go to Canterbury.—And he further said, He would not tie you to so short a time, as might be any way inconvenient, but doth expect, that your grace will govern it so, as his majesty shall not need to warn you a second time.—I will not fail to move his majesty, to give you liberty to chuse either of your houses you name, and give you knowledge of his pleasure, and in all things be ready to obey your commandments, or take occasion to serve you in the condition of, Your grace's most humble servant, CONWAY. Whitehall, July 10, 1627.'

I could not but observe therein that passage, That the king doth expect, that your grace will govern it so, as his majesty will not need to warn you a second time: I needed no interpreter to expound those words, and therefore did take order, that one of my officers was presently dispatched unto Foord, to see the house ready.

While necessaries were caring for, and I lay for some days at Croydon, and afterwards at Lambeth, the city of London was filled with the report of my confining (for so they did term it) and divers men spake diversly of it. I will not trouble myself to mention some idle things, but some other of them require a little consideration. A main matter that the Duke was said to take in ill part, was, the resort which was made to my house at the times of dinner and supper, and that oftentimes of such as did not love him.

My answer unto that is, That by nature I have been given to keep a house according to my proportion, since I have had any means, and God hath blessed me in it. That it is a property by Saint Paul required in a bishop, of spite, I conceived it to be agreeable to the proceedings with the lords and gentlemen which refused to contribute to the Loan, they all being laid aside in the commissions for lieutenancy, and the peace, in their several countries. For my part, I had no cause to grieve at this, since it was his majesty's pleasure; but it was by the actors therein understood otherwise, they supposing, that this power gave me the more authority and splendor in the church and commonwealth.

To deliver therefore truly the state of this question, it cannot be denied, but that it was a great point of policy, for the establishing of order in the Ecclesiastical, and consequently Civil Estate also, to erect such a Court, whereby churchmen that exorbitated in any grievous manner, might be castigated, and rectified; and such sort of crimes in the laity might be censured, as were of ecclesiastical cognizance. And verily this is of great use in the kingdom, as well for the cherishing the study of the civil law, as otherwise: so that it be kept incorruptible, and with that integrity, as so grave a meeting and assembly requireth. That was principally my care, who took much pains, and spent much money, that in fair and commendable sort, justice was indifferently administered to all the king's people that had to do with us: But every one might see, that this was to my singular trouble; for besides that to keep things in a straight course, sometimes in fits of the gout, I was forced by my servants to be carried into the court, where I could not speak much, but with difficulty; I was at no time free from petitions, from examinations, from signing of warrants, to call some, to release others, from giving way to speeding and forwarding acts of courts; suitors, as their fashion is, being so importunate, as that in summer and winter, in the day, and in the night, in sickness and health, they would not be denied.

These things were daily dispatched by me out of duty, and more out of charity, no allowance of pay being from the king, or of fee from the subject, to us that were the judges: Nay, I may say more, the holding of that court in such sort as I did, was very expenceful to me out of my private purse, in giving weekly entertainment to the Commissioners; the reason whereof was this: King James being desirous, when he made me Archbishop, that all matters should gravely and honourably be carried, defected me, that I should always call some of the bishops that were about London, and some divines and civilians, that by a good presence, causes might be handled for the reputation of the action; and willed me withal to imitate therein the lord archbishop Whitgift, who invited weekly some of the Judges to dinner, the rather to allure them thither. This advice proceeded from the bishop of Durham that now is, which was not ill, if it came from a good intention.

I obeyed it singly, and did that which was enjoined: But whereas in those times the commissioners were but few, since that time there hath been such an inundation of all sorts of men into that company, that without proportion, both Lords spiritual and temporal, commissioners and not commissioners, resorted thither, and divers of them brought so many of their men, that it was truly a burthen to me. I think it may by my officers be justified upon oath, That since I was archbishop, the thing alone hath cost me out of my private estate 1,000*l.* and a half, and if I did say 2,000*l.* it were not much amiss, besides all the trouble of my servants; who neither directly, nor indirectly, gained 6*d.* thereby in a whole year, but only travel and pains for their master's honour, and of that they had enough: My house being like a great hostry every Thursday in the term; and for my expences, no man giving me so much as thanks.

Now this being the true case, if the Church and Commonwealth be well provided for in the administration of justice, and regard be had of the public, can any discreet man think, that the removing of me from this molestation, is any true punishment upon me? I being one that have framed myself to reality, and not to opinion, and growing more and more in years, and consequently into weakness, having before surfeited so long of worldly shews, whereof nothing is truly gained temporally, but vexation of spirit; I have had enough of these things, and do not dote upon them: The world, I hope, hath found me more stayed and reserved in my courses.

Nevertheless, whatsoever was expedient for this, was dispatched by me while I lived at Lambeth and Croydon, albeit I went not out of door. 'Yes, but you were otherwise inutile, not coming to the Star-Chamber, nor to the Council-Table.' My pain, or weakness by the gout, must excuse me herein. When I was younger, and had my health, I so diligently attended at the Star-Chamber, that for full seven years I was not one day wanting. And for the Council-Table, the same reason of my indisposition may satisfy: but there are many other things that do speak for me. The greatest matters there handled, were for Money, or more attempts of War: For the one of these, we of the clergy had done our parts already; the clergy having put themselves into payments of Subsidy, by an act of parliament, not only for these two last years, when the temporality lay in a sort dry, but yet there are three years behind, in which our payments run on with weight enough unto us; and no man can justly doubt, but my hand was in those grants in a principal fashion.

And concerning the Provisions for War, I must confess mine ignorance in the feats thereof; I knew not the grounds whereupon the controversies were entered in general; I thought, that before wars were begun, there should be store of treasure; that it was not good to fall out with many great princes at once; that the turning of our forces another way, must needs be some diminution from the king of Denmark, who was engaged by us into the quarrel for the Palatinate and Germans, and hazarded both his person and dominions in the prosecution of the question. These matters I thought upon, as one that had sometimes been acquainted with councils; but I kept my thoughts unto myself.

Again, I was never sent for to the Council-Table, but I went, saving one time, when I was so ill, that I might not stir abroad. Moreover, I was sure that there wanted no counsellors at the board, the number being so much increased as it was. Besides, I had no great encouragement to thrust my crazy body abroad, since I saw what little esteem was made of me in those things which belonged to mine own occupation; with bishoprics and deanries, or other church-places, I was no more acquainted than if I had dwelt at Venice, and understood of them but by some Gazette.

The duke of Buckingham had the managing of these things, as it was generally conceived: For, what was he not fit to determine, in church, or commonwealth; in court, or council; in peace, or war; at land, or at sea; at home, or in foreign parts? Mountague had put out his Arminian Book; I three times complained of it, but he was held up against me, and by the Duke, magnified as a well-deserving man. Cosens put out his Treatise, which they commonly call "The Seven Sacraments:" which, in the first edition, had many strange things in it, as it seemeth: I knew nothing of it, but as it pleased my lord of Durham, and the bishop of Bath: So the world did read.

We were wont in the High Commission, to repress obstinate and busy papists: In the end of king James's time, a letter was brought me under the hand and signet of the king, That we must not meddle with any such matter, nor exact the 12*d.* for the Sunday of those which came not to the church, (with which forfeit we never meddled.) And this was told us to be in contemplation of a Marriage intended with the lady Mary, the daughter of France.

After the death of king James, such another Letter was brought from king Charles, and all executions against Papists were suspended.

But when the term was at Reading, by open divulgation in all courts, under the great seal of England, we and all magistrates are set at liberty to do as it was prescribed by law: And now our pursuivants must have their warrants again, and take all the priests they can; whereof Mr. Cross took 14 or 15 in a very short space. Not long after, all these are set free; and letters come from the king, under his royal signet, That all warrants must be taken from our messengers, because they spoiled the catholics, and carried themselves unorderly unto them, especially the bishop's pursuivants: Whereas we had in all but two; Cross, my messenger, for whom I did offer to be answerable; and Thomlinson, for whom my lord of London, I think, would do as much. But the caterpillars indeed, were the pursuivants used by the secretaries, men of no value, and shifters in the world, who had been punished and turned away by us for great misdemeanors.— But truth of religion and God's service, was wont to over-rule human policies, and not to be over-ruled; and I am certain, that things best prosper, where those courses are held. But be it what it may be, I could not tell what to make of this variation of the compass, since it was only commanded unto me to put such and such things in execution. But I never understood any thing of the counsel, whereby I might give my judgment how fit or unfit they were, or might speak to alter the tenure, whereunto in former times I had been otherwise used. Variety of reasons breedeth variety of actions.

For the matter of the Loan, I knew not a long time what to make of it: I was not present when the advice was taken; I understood not what was the foundation whereupon the building was raised, neither did ever any of the council acquaint me therewith. I saw on the one side the king's necessity for money, and especially it being resolved, that the war should be pursued; and on the other side I could not forget, that in the parliament great sums were offered, if the petitions of the commons might be hearkened unto. It ran still in my mind, That the old and usual way was best; that in kingdoms, the harmony was sweetest, where the prince and the people tuned well together; that whatsoever pretence of greatness, he was but an unhappy man, that set the king and the body of the realm at division; that the people, (though not fit to be too much cockered, yet) are they, that must pray, that must pay, that must fight for their princes; that it could not be, that a man so universally hated in the kingdom as the duke was, must, for the preservation of himself, de-perately adventure on any thing, if he might be hearkened unto.

These meditations I had with myself; and, God knoweth, I frequently in my prayers did beg, that he, whom these things did most concern, would seriously think upon them. It ran in my mind, that this new device for Money could not long hold out; that then we must return into the highway, whither it were best to retire ourselves betimes, the shortest errors being the best. But these thoughts I suppressed within my soul; neither did I ever discourage any man from lending, nor encourage any man to hold back: which I confidently avouch.

At the opening of the Commission for the Loan, I was sent for from Croydon. It seemed to me a strange thing; but I was told there, That howsoever it shewed, the king would have it so, there was no speaking against it. I have not heard, that men throughout the kingdom should lend money against their will; I knew not what to make of it: but when I saw the Instructions, the refusers should be sent away for soldiers to the king of Denmark, I began to remember Urias, that was set in the fore-front of the battle; and, to speak truth, I durst not be tender in it. And when afterwards I saw, that men were to be put to their oath, with whom they had had conference, and whether any did dissuade them? And yet further beheld, that divers were to be imprisoned: I thought this was somewhat a new world. Yet all this while I swallowed my own spittle, and spake nothing of it to any man. Nay, when after some trial in Middlesex, the first sitting was for Surrey in my house at Lambeth, and the lords were there assembled with the justices of the whole county, I gave them entertainment in no mean fashion: and I sate with them, albeit I said nothing; for the confusion was such, that I knew not what to make of it: things went on every day, and speech was, of much money to be raised out of some counties; yet afterwards it was not so readily paid, as preferred; and at length some refused even in London itself, and Southwark, besides many gentlemen of special rank, and some lords, as it was said. And though it was reported, that they were but a contemptible company, yet the prisons in London demonstrated, that they were not a very few, but persons both of note and number. The Judges besides concurring another way, That they could not allow the legality of the demand, and the enforcement that is used thereupon, did somewhat puzzle me for being too busy in promoting of that, for which I might one day suffer. Yet hitherto I remained silent, hoping that time would break that off, which was almost come to an absolute period. But instead of this, by the permission of God, I was called up to the king to look clearly into the question. When the allowance of Sibthorp's Pamphlet was put upon me, I then had some reason, out of the grounds of that Sermon, to fear, (and I pray God that my fear was in vain) that the duke had a purpose to turn upside down the laws, and the whole fundamental courses, and liberties of the subject, and to leave us not under the statutes and customs which our progenitors enjoyed, but to the pleasure of princes; of whom, as some are gentle and benign, so some others, to ingrate themselves, might strain more than the string will bear.

Besides, now it came in my heart, that I was present at the king's coronation, where many things on the prince's part were solemnly promised; which being observed, would keep all in order, and the king should have a loving and faithful people, and the commons should have a kind and gracious king. The contemplation of these things made me stay my judgment; not any unwillingness to do my prince any dutiful service, whom I must and do honour above all the creatures in the world, and will adventure as far for his true good, as any one whatsoever. But I am loath to plunge myself over head and ears in these difficulties, that I can neither live with quietness of conscience, nor depart out of the world with good fame and estimation. And perhaps my sovereign, if hereafter he looked well into this paradox, would, of all the world, hate me, because one of my profession, age, and calling, would deceive him, and with base flattery swerve from the truth. 'The hearts of kings are in the hand of God, and he can turn them as the rivers of water.'

I draw to a conclusion; only repute it not amiss (because so much filleth in here) to observe a few words of the duke of Buckingham, not as now he is, but as he was in his rising. I say nothing of his being in France, because I was not present, and divers others there be that remember it well; but I take him at his first repair to court. King James, for many insolencies, grew weary of Somerset; and the kingdom groaning under the triumvirate of Northampton, Suffolk, and Somerset, (though Northampton soon after died) was glad to be rid of him. We could have no way so good to effectuate that which was the common desire, as to bring in another in his room; one nail (as the proverb is) being to be driven out by another. It was now observed, that the king began to cast his eye upon George Villiers, who was then cup-bearer, and seemed a modest and courteous youth. But king James had a fashion, that he would never admit any to nearness about himself, but such an one as the queen should commend unto him, and make some suit on his behalf; that if the queen afterwards, being ill intreated, should complain of this 'Dear one,' he might make his answer, 'It is long of yourself, for you were the party that commended him unto me.' Our old master took delight strangely in things of this nature.

That noble queen (who now resteth in heaven) knew her husband well; and having been bitten with favourites both in England and Scotland, was very sly to adventure upon this request. King James, in the mean time, more and more loathed Somerset, and did not much conceal it, that his affection increased towards the other; but the queen would not come to it, albeit divers lords (whereof some are dead, and some yet living) did earnestly solicit her majesty thereunto. When it would not do, I was very much moved to put to my helping hand, they knowing, that queen Anne was graciously pleased to give me more credit than ordinary, which all her attendants knew she continued till the time of her death. I laboured much, but could not prevail; the queen oft saying to me, 'My lord, you and the rest of your friends know not what you do: I know your master better than you all; for if this young man be once brought in, the first persons that he will plague, must be you that labour for him; yea, I shall have my part also: the king will teach him to despise and hardly intreat us all, that he may seem to be beholden to none but himself.' Noble queen! how like a prophetess or oracle did you speak!

Notwithstanding this, we were still instant, telling her majesty, that the change would be for the better: for George was of a good nature, which the other was not; and if he should degenerate, yet it would be a long time before he were able to attain to that height of evil, which the other had. In the end, upon importunity, queen Anne condescended, and so pressed it with the king, that he assented thereunto: which was so stricken while the iron was hot, that in the queen's bed-chamber, the king
