

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

74. The Trial of Sir WALTER RALEIGH, knt. at Winchester, for High Treason: 1 JAMES I. 17th of November, A. D. 1603.

THE Commissioners were, Henry Howard, earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain; Charles Blunt, earl of Devon; lord Henry Howard, afterwards earl of Northampton; Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury; Edward lord Wotton of Morley; sir John Stanhope, Vice Chamberlain, L. C. Justice of England, Popham; L. C. Justice of the Common-Pleas, Anderson; Mr. Justice Gawde; Justice Warburton; and sir W. Wade.

First, the Commission of Oyer and Terminer was read by the Clerk of the Crown Office; and the prisoner bid to hold up his hand.

And then presently the INDICTMENT, which was in effect as followeth:

"That he did conspire, and go about to deprive the king of his Government; to raise up Sedition within the realm; to alter religion, to bring in the Roman Superstition and to procure foreign enemies to invade the kingdom. That the lord Cobham, the 9th of June last, did meet with the said sir Walter Raleigh in Durham-house, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, and then and there had conference with him, how to advance Arabella Stuart* to the crown and royal throne of this kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, that Cobham should treat with Aremberg, ambassador from the archduke of Austria, to obtain of him 600,000 crowns, to bring to pass their intended treason. It was agreed that Cobham should go to the archduke Albert, to procure him to advance the pretended title of Arabella: from thence knowing that Albert had not sufficient means to maintain his own army in the Low Countries, Cobham should go lady was daughter to Charles Stuart, (younger brother to our king's father) by Elizabeth Cavendish, and was married some years past to sir William Seymour, son to the lord Beauchamp, and grandchild to Edward earl of Hertford; both at some distance allied to the crown, therefore such a conjunction would not be admitted in the Royal Almanack; so dreadful is every apparition that comes near princes titles. Sir William Seymour for the marriage was committed to the Tower, and the lady Arabella confined to her house at High-gate. But after some imprisonment, they conclude to escape beyond sea together; appointing to meet at a certain place upon the Thames. Sir William leaving his man in his bed, to act his part with his keeper, got out of the Tower in a disguise, and came to the place appointed. She, dressed like a young gallant in man's attire, followed him from her house; but staying long above the limited time, made him suspicious of her interception; so that he went away, leaving notice if she came, that he was gone away before to Dunkirk. She, good lady, fraught with more fears, and lagging in her flight, was apprehended, brought back to the Tower, and there finished her earthly pilgrimage. She being dead, sir William Seymour got leave to return home, and married since to the lady Frances, daughter to the late earl of Essex."

* This Arabella Stuart was daughter of Charles Stuart earl of Lennox, brother of Henry lord Darnley father of king James the 1st. These Charles and Henry were sons of Margaret the daughter of Margaret eldest sister of Henry 8th, and mother of James the 5th of Scotland; father of the celebrated Mary the mother of James the 1st of England. The contemporary historian Wilson, after mentioning the poisoning of Overbury, writes thus: "The lady Arabella dying about this time in the Tower, set mens tongues and fears at work, that she went the same way. Such mischief doth one evil action introduce, that it makes a great road for jealousy to pursue after it. The

to Spain to procure the king to assist and further her pretended title.—It was agreed, the better to effect all this Conspiracy, that Arabella should write three Letters, one to the Archduke, another to the king of Spain, and a third to the duke of Savoy; and promise three things:—1. To establish a firm Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate the Popish and Roman Superstition. 3. To be ruled by them in contracting of her Marriage.—And for the effecting of these traitorous purposes, Cobham should return by the isle of Jersey, and should find sir Walter Raleigh captain of the said Isle, there, and take counsel of Raleigh for the distributing of the aforesaid crowns, as the occasion or discontentment of the subjects should give cause and way.—And further, That Cobham and his brother Brook met on the 9th of June last, and Cobham told Brook all these Treasons: to the which Treasons Brook gave his assent, and did join himself to all these. And after, on the Thursday following, Cobham and Brook did speak these words; ‘That there would never be a good world in England, till the king’ (meaning our sovereign lord) ‘and his cubs’ (meaning his royal issue) ‘were taken away.’—And the more to disable and deprive the king of his crown, and to confirm the said Cobham in his intents, Raleigh did publish a Book, falsely written against the most just and royal Title of the king, knowing the said Book to be written against the just Title of the king; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Further, for the better effecting these traitorous purposes, and to establish the said Brook in his intent, the said Cobham did deliver the said Book unto him the 14th of June. And further, the said Cobham, on the 16th of June, for accomplishment of the said Conference, and by the traitorous instigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed princes, to procure them to advance her Title; and that she after she had obtained the crown, should promise to perform three things, viz. 1. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate with impunity the Popish and Roman Superstitions. 3. To be ruled by them three in the contracting of her marriage.—To these motions the said Brook gave his assent. And for the better effecting of the said Treasons, Cobham on the 17th of June, by the instigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to count Aremberg, and did deliver the said Letters to one Matthew de Lawrency, to be delivered to the said count, which he did deliver, for the obtaining of the 600,000 crowns; which money by other Letters count Aremberg did promise to perform the payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the 18th of June. And then did Cobham promise to Raleigh, that when he had received the said money, he would deliver 8000 crowns to him, to which motion he did consent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he should receive the said crowns, he would give to him 10,000 thereof; to which motion Brook did assent.”

To the Indictment, Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded Not Guilty.

The Jury were sir Ralph Conisby, sir Thomas Fowler, sir Edward Peacock, sir Wm. Rowe, knights; Henry Goodyer, Thomas Walker, Roger Wood, Thomas Whitby, esquires; Tho. Highgate, Robert Kempton, John Chawkey, Robert Bromley, gentlemen.

Sir Walter Raleigh, Prisoner, was asked, Whether he would take exceptions to any of the Jury?

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Christians, and honest gentlemen, I except against none.

E. of Suffolk. You gentlemen of the king’s learned Counsel, follow the same course as you did the other day.

Raleigh. My lord, I pray you I may answer the points particularly as they are delivered, by reason of the weakness of my memory and sickness.

L. C. J. Popham. After the king’s learned council have delivered all the Evidence, sir Walter, you may answer particularly to what you will.

Heale, the King’s Serjeant. You have heard of Raleigh’s bloody attempts to kill the king and his royal progeny, and in place thereof, to advance one Arabella Stuart. The particulars of the Indictment are these: First, that Raleigh met with Cobham the 9th of June, and had Conference of an Invasion, of a Rebellion, and an Insurrection, to be made by the king’s subjects, to depose the king, and to kill his children, poor babes that never gave offence. Here is blood, here is a new king and governor. In our king consists all our happiness, and the true use of the Gospel; a thing which we all wish to be settled, after the death of the queen. Here must be Money to do this, for money is the sinew of war. Where should that be had? count Aremberg must procure it of Philip king of Spain, five or six hundred thousand crowns; and out of this sum Raleigh must have 8000. But what is that count Aremberg? Though I am no good Frenchman, yet it is as much as to say in English, earl of Aremberg. Then there must be Friends to effect this: Cobham must go to Albert archduke of Austria, for whom Aremberg was ambassador at that time in England. And what then? He must persuade the duke to assist the pretended title of Arabella. From thence Cobham must go to the king of Spain, and persuade him to assist the said title. Since the Conquest, there was never the like Treason. But out of whose head came it? Out of Raleigh’s, who must also advise Cobham to use his brother Brook to incite the lady Arabella to write three several Letters, as aforesaid in the Indictment: all this was on the 9th of June. Then three days after, Brook was acquainted with it. After this, Cobham said to Brook, ‘It will never be well in England, till the king and his ‘cubs’ are taken away.’ Afterwards, Raleigh delivered a book to Cobham, treacherously written against the Title of the king. It appears that Cobham took Raleigh to be either a God, or an idol. Cobham endeavours to set up a new king, or governor; God forbid mine eyes should ever see so unhappy a change. As for the lady Arabella, she, upon my conscience, hath no more Title to the crown than I have, which before God I utterly renounce. Cobham, a man bred in England, hath no experience abroad; but Raleigh, a man of great wit, military, and a sword-man. Now, whether these things were bred in a hollow tree, I leave to them to speak of, who can speak far better than myself.—And so sat him down again.

Attorney General (Sir Ed. Coke) I must first, my lords, before I come to the cause, give one caution, because we shall often mention persons of eminent places, some of them great monarchs: whatever we say of them, we shall but repeat what others have said of them; I mean the Capital Offenders in their Confessions. We professing law, must speak reverently of kings and potentates. I perceive these honourable lords, and the rest of this great assembly, are come to hear what hath been scattered upon the wrack of report. We carry a just mind, to condemn no man, but upon plain Evidence. Here is Mischief, Mischief in summo gradu, exorbitant Mischief. My Speech shall chiefly touch these three points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.—The Imitation of evil ever exceeds the Precedent; as on the contrary, imitation of good ever comes short. Mischief cannot be supported but by Mischief; yea it will so multiply, that it will bring all to confusion. Mischief is ever underpropped by falshood or foul practices: and because all these things did concur in this Treason, you shall understand the main, as before you did the bye.—The Treason of the bye consisteth in these Points: first, that the lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the rest, intended by force in the night to surprize the king's court; which was a Rebellion in the heart of the realm, yea, in the heart of the heart, in the Court. They intended to take him that is a sovereign, to make him subject to their power, purposing to open the doors with musquets and cavaliers, and to take also the Prince and Council: then under the king's authority to carry the king to the Tower; and to make a stale of the admiral. When they had the king there, to extort three things from him: first, A Pardon for all their Treasons: Secondly, A Toleration of the Roman Superstition; which their eyes shall sooner fall out than they shall ever see; for the king hath spoken these words in the hearing of many, 'I will lose the crown and my life, before ever I will alter Religion.' And thirdly, To remove Counsellors. In the room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have placed one Watson a priest, absurd in Humanity and ignorant in Divinity. Brook, of whom I will speak nothing, Lord Treasurer. The great Secretary must be Markham; Oculus patriæ. A hole must be found in my Lord Chief Justice's coat. Grey must be Earl-Marshal, and Master of the Horse, because he would have a table in the court; marry, he would advance the earl of Worcester to a higher place. All this cannot be done without a multitude: therefore Watson the priest tells a resolute man, that the king was in danger of Puritans and Jesuits; so to bring him in blindfold into the action, saying, That the king is no king till he be crowned; therefore every man might right his own wrongs: but he is rex natus, his dignity descends as well as yours, my lords. Then Watson imposeth a blasphemous Oath, that they should swear to defend the king's person; to keep secret what was given them in charge, and seek all ways and means to advance the Catholic Religion. Then they intend to send for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the king's name, to the Tower; lest they should make any resistance, and then to take hostages of them; and to enjoin them to provide for them victuals and munition. Grey, because the king removed before Midsummer, had a further reach, to get a Company of Sword-men to assist the action: therefore he would stay till he had obtained a regiment from Ostend or Austria. So you see these Treasons were like Sampson's foxes, which were joined in their tails, though their heads were severed.

Raleigh. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray remember, I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treason of the priest.

Attorney. You are not. My lords, you shall observe three things in the Treasons: 1. They had a Watch-word (the king's safety); their Pretence was Bonum in se; their Intent was Malum in se; 2. They avouched Scripture; both the priests had Scriptum est; perverting and ignorantly mistaking the Scriptures: 3. They avouched the Common Law, to prove that he was no king until he was crowned; alledging a Statute of 13 Eliz. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the course of all Traitors.—In the 20th of Edw. 2. Isabella the Queen, and the lord Mortimer, gave out, that the king's Person was not safe, for the good of the Church and Commonwealth. The Bishop of Carlisle did preach on this Text, 'My head is grieved,' meaning by the Head, the King; what when the Head began to be negligent, the people might reform what is amiss. In the 3rd of Henry 4, sir Roger Clarendon, accompanied with two priests, gave out, that Richard 2, was alive, when he was dead. Edward 3 caused Mortimer's head to be cut off, for giving counsel to murder the king. The 3rd of Henry 7, sir Henry Stanley found the crown in the dust, and set it on the king's head: when Fitzwater and Garret told him, that Edward 5 was alive, he said, 'If he be alive, I will assist him.' But this cost him his head. Edmund de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, killed a man in the reign of king Henry 7, for which the king would have him hold up his hand at the bar, and then pardoned him: Yet he took such an offence therat, that he sent to the noblemen to help to reform the Commonwealth; and then said, he would go to France and get power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treason, and discovered Windon and others that were attainted. He said, there was another thing that would be stood upon, namely, that they had but one Witness. Then he vouched one Appleyard's Case, a Traitor in Norfolk, who said, a man must have two accusers. Hehns was the man that accused him; but Mr. justice Catlin said, that that Statute was not in force at that day. His words were, 'Thrust her into the ditch.' Then he went on speaking of Accusers, and made this difference: an Accuser is a speaker by report; when a Witness is he that upon his oath shall speak his knowledge of any man.—A third sort of Evidence there is likewise, and this is held more forcible than either of the other two; and that is, when a man, by his accusation of another, shall, by the same accusation, also condemn himself, and make himself liable to the same fault and punishment: this is more forcible than many Witnesses. So then so much by way of Imitation.—Then he defined Treason: there is Treason in the heart, in the hand, in the mouth, in consummation: comparing that in corde to the root of a tree; in ore, to the bud; in manu to the blossom; and that which is in consummatione, to the fruit.—Now I come to your Charge, You of the Jury: the greatness of Treason is to be considered in these two things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediourum. This Treason excelleth in both, for that it was to destroy the king and his progeny. These Treasons are said to be Crimen læsæ majestatis; this goeth further, and may be termed, Crimen extirpanda regie majestatis, & totius progenici suæ. I shall not need, my lords, to speak any thing concerning the King, nor of the bounty and sweetness of his nature, whose thoughts are innocent, whose words are full of wisdom and learning, and whose works are full of honour: although it be a true Saying, Nunquam nimis quod nunquam satis. But to whom do you bear Malice? to the Children?

Raleigh. To whom speak you this? You tell me news I never heard of.

Attorney. Oh, sir, do I? I will prove you the notorious Traitor that ever came to the bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: as you sir Walter Raleigh, have followed them of the Bye in Imitation: for I will charge you with the Words.

Raleigh. Your words cannot condemn me; my innocency is my defence. Prove one of these things wherewith you have charged me, and I will confess the whole Indictment, and that I am the horriblest Traitor that ever lived, and worthy to be crucified with a thousand thousand torments.

Attorney. Nay, I will prove all: thou art a monster; thou hast an English face, but a Spanish heart. Now you must have Money: Arenberg was no sooner in England (I charge thee Raleigh) but thou incitedst Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to bestow on discontented persons, to raise Rebellion on the kingdom.

Raleigh. Let me answer for myself.

Attorney. Thou shalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my life.

L. C. J. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney is but yet in the General: but when the king's Counsel have given the Evidence wholly you shall answer every Particular.

Attorney. Oh! do I touch you?

Lord Cecil. Mr. Attorney, when you have done with this General Charge, do you not mean to let him answer every Particular?

Attorney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Arenberg, which he did by his instigation: Raleigh supped with Cobham before he went to Arenberg; after supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham-house; from thence Cobham went with Lawrency, a servant of Arenberg's, unto him, and went in by a back way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertained this motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Arenberg answered, The Money should be performed, but knew not to whom it should be distributed. Then Cobham and Lawrency came back to Durlam-house, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawrency below, where they had secret conference in a gallery; and after, Cobham and Lawrency departed from Raleigh. Your jargon was Peace: What is that? Spanish Invasion, Scottish Subversion. And again, you are not a fit man to take so much Money for procuring of a lawful Peace, for peace procured by money is dishonourable. Then Cobham must go to Spain, and return by Jersey, where you were Captain: and then, because Cobham had not so much policy, or at least wickedness, as you, he must have your advice for the distribution of the Money. Would you have deposed so good a king, lineally descended of Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward 4? Why then must you set up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a Titular Queen, of whose Title I will speak nothing; but sure you meant to make her a stale. Ah! good lady, you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me news, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Oh, sir! I am the more large, because I know with whom I deal: for we have to deal to-day with a man of wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever speak with this lady?

Att. I will track you out before I have done. Englishmen will not be led by persuasion of words, but they must have books to persuade.

Raleigh. The Book was written by a man of your profession, Mr. Attorney.

Att. I would not have you impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with yourself; I say nothing.

Att. By this Book you would persuade men, that he is not the lawful king. Now let us consider some circumstances: My lords, you know my lord Cobham (for whom we all lament and rejoice; lament in that his house, which bath stood so long unspotted, is now ruined; rejoice, in that his Treasons are revealed :) he is neither politician nor sword man; Raleigh was both, united in the Cause with him, and therefore cause of his destruction. Another circumstance is, the secret contriving of it. Humphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treason. Raleigh, in his Machiavelian policy, bath made a Sanctuary for Treason: He must talk with none but Cobham; because, saith he, one Witness can never condemn me. For Brook said unto sir Griffith Markham, 'Take heed how you do make my lord Cobham acquainted; for whatsoever he knoweth, Raleigh the witch will get it out of him.' As soon as Raleigh was examined on one point of Treason concerning my lord Cobham, he wrote to him thus; 'I have been examined of you, and confessed nothing.' Further, you sent to him by your trusty Francis Kemish, that one Witness could not condemn; and therefore bad his lordship be of good courage. Came this out of Cobham's quiver? No: but out of Raleigh's Machiavelian and devilish policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it; why then did ye urge it? Now then see the most horrible practices that ever came out of the bottomless pit of the lowest hell. After that Raleigh had intelligence that Cobham had accused him, he endeavoured to have intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young sir John Payton: but I think it was the error of his youth.

Raleigh. The lords told it me, or else I had not been sent to the Tower.

Att. Thus Cobham, by the instigation of Raleigh, entered into these actions: So that the question will be, Whether you are not the principal Traitor, and he would nevertheless have entered into it? Why did Cobham retract all that same? First, Because Raleigh was so odious, he thought he should fare the worse for his sake. Secondly, he thought thus with himself, If he be free I shall clear myself the better. After this, Cobham asked for a Preacher to confer with, pretending to have Dr. Andrews; but indeed he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway; a worthy and reverend preacher, who can do more with the king (as he said) than any other; that he, seeing his constant denial, might inform the king thereof. Here he plays with the preacher. If Raleigh could persuade the lords, that Cobham had no intent to travel, then he thought all should be well. Here is Forgery! In the Tower Cobham must write to sir Thomas Vane, a worthy man, that he meant not to go into Spain: which Letter Raleigh devised in Cobham's name.

Raleigh. I will wash my hands of the Indictment, and die a true man to the king.

Att. You are the absolutest Traitor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your phrases will not prove it.

Att. Cobham writeth a Letter to my lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis's man to lay it in a Spanish Bible, and to make as though he found it by chance. This was after he had intelligence with this viper, that he was false.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me; I never had it.

Att. No, my lord, you had it not. You, my masters of the jury, respect not the wickedness and hatred of the man, respect his cause: if he be guilty, I know you will have care of it, for the preservation of the king, the continuance of the Gospel authorized, and the good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have spoken one word against me; here is no Treason of mine done: If my lord Cobham be a Traitor, what is that to me?

Att. All that he did was by thy instigation, thou Viper; for I thou* thee, thou Traitor.

Raleigh. It becometh not a man of quality and virtue, to call me so: But I take comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Att. Have I angered you?

Raleigh. I am in no case to be angry.

C. J. Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney speaketh out of the zeal of his duty, for the service of the king, and you for your life; be valiant on both sides.

The Lord COBHAM'S Examination.

"He confesseth, he had a Passport to go into Spain, intending to go to the Archduke, to confer with him about these Practices; and because he knew the Archduke had not Money to pay his own army, from thence he meant to go to Spain, to deal with the king for the 600,000 crowns, and to return by Jersey; and that nothing should be done, until he had spoken with sir Walter Raleigh for distribution of the Money to them which were discontented in England. At the first beginning, he breathed out oaths and exclamations against Raleigh, calling him Villain and Traitor; saying he had never entered into these courses, but by his instigation, and that he would never let him alone."—[Here Mr. Attorney willed the Clerk of the Crown-Office to read over these last words again, 'He would never let him alone.'] "Besides he spake of Plots and Invasions; of the particulars whereof he could give no account, though Raleigh and he had conferred of them. Further he said, he was afraid of Raleigh, that when he should return by Jersey, that he would have delivered him and the Money to the king. Being examined of sir Arthur Gorge, he freed him, saying, They never durst trust him: but sir Arthur Savage they intended to use, because they thought him a fit man".

Raleigh. Let me see the Accusation: This is absolutely all the Evidence can be brought against me; poor shifts! You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you understand this. This is that which must either condemn, or give me life; which must free me, or send my wife and children to beg their bread about the streets:

* Shakespear, in all probability, alludes to this, when he makes sir Toby in giving directions to sir Andrew for his challenge to Viola, say, If thou thou'st him some thrice, it may not be amiss." See Twelfth Night.

This is that must prove me a notorious Traitor, or a true subject to the king. Let me see my Accusation, that I may make my Answer.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and shew you all the Examinations.

Raleigh. At my first Examination at Windsor, my lords asked me, what I knew of Cobham's practice with Aramberg, I answered negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I protest before God, I never heard one word of it. If that be proved, let me be guilty of ten thousand Treasons. It is a strange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard so much as the name of Arabella Stuart, but only the name of Arabella.—After being examined, I told my lords, that I thought my lord Cobham had conference with Aramberg; I suspected his visiting of him: for after he departed from me at Durham-house, I saw him pass by his own stairs, and passed over to St. Mary Saviours, where I knew Lawrency, a merchant, and a follower of Aramberg, lay, and therefore likely to go unto him. My lord Cecil asked my opinion concerning Lawrency; I said, that if you do not apprehend Lawrency, it is dangerous, he will fly; if you do apprehend him, you shall give my lord Cobham notice thereof. I was asked who was the greatest man with my lord Cobham; I answered, I knew no man so great with him as young Wyt of Kent.—As soon as Cobham saw my Letter to have discovered his dealing with Aramberg, in his fury he accused me; but before he came to the stair-foot he repented, and said he had done me wrong. When he came to the end of his Accusation, he added, that if he had brought this money to Jersey, he feared that I would have delivered him and the money to the king. Mr. Attorney, you said this never came out of Cobham's quiver; he is a simple man. Is he so simple? No; he hath a disposition of his own, he will not easily be guided by others; but when he has once taken head in a matter, he is not easily drawn from it: he is no babe. But it is strange for me to devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain, to persuade the king to disburse so much money, he being a man of no love in England, and I having resigned my room of chiefest command, the Wardenship of the Stannaries. Is it not strange for me to make myself Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade? I knowing England to be in better estate to defend itself than ever it was. I knew Scotland united; Ireland quieted, wherein of late our forces were dispersed; Denmark assured, which before was suspected. I knew, that having lost a lady whom time had surprized, we had now an active king, a lawful Successor, who would himself be present in all his affairs. The State of Spain was not unknown to me: I had written a Discourse, which I had intended to present unto the king, against peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniards had six repulses; three in Ireland, and three at sea, and once in 1588, at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was discouraged and dishonoured. I knew the king of Spain to be the proudest prince in Christendom; but now he cometh creeping to the king my master for peace. I knew, whereas before he had in his port six or seven score sail of ships, he hath now but six or seven. I knew of 25,000,000 he had from his Indies, he hath scarce one left. I knew him to be so poor, that the Jesuits in Spain, who were wont to have such large allowance, were fain to beg at the church-door. Was it ever read or heard, that any prince should disburse so much money without a sufficient pawn? I knew her own subjects, the citizens of London, would not lend her majesty money, without lands in mortgage. I knew the Queen did not lend the States money, without Flushing, Brill, and other towns for a pawn. And can it be thought, that he would let Cobham have so great a sum?—I never came to the lord Cobham's, but about matters of his profit; as the ordering of his house, paying of his servants board-wages, &c. I had of his, when I was examined, 4,000*l.* worth of jewels for a purchase; a pearl of 3,000*l.* and a ring worth 500*l.* If he had had a fancy to run away, he would not have left so much to have purchased a lease in fee-farm. I saw him buy 300*l.* worth of Books to send to his Library at Canterbury, and a cabinet of 30*l.* to give to Mr. Attorney, for drawing the conveyances: and God in heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to travel or no. But for that practice with Arabella, or letters to Aramberg framed, or any discourse with him, or in what language he spake unto him; if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the indictment, and acknowledge myself worthy ten thousand deaths.

The lord Cobham being required to subscribe to an Examination, there was shewed a Note under sir Walter Raleigh's hand; the which when he had perused, he paused, and after brake forth into those Speeches: Oh Villain! Oh traitor! I will now tell you all the truth; and then said, His purpose was to go into Flanders, and into Spain, for the obtaining the aforesaid Money; and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jersey as he returned home, to be advised of him about the distribution of the Money.

L. C. J. Popham. When Cobham answered to the Interrogatories, he made scruple to subscribe; and being urged to it, he said, if he might hear me affirm, that a person of his degree ought to set his hand, he would: I lying then at Richmond for fear of the Plague, was sent for, and I told he ought to subscribe; otherwise it were a Contempt of a high nature: then he subscribed. The lords questioned with him further, and he shewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my lord Cecil: he desired to see the Letter again, and then said, 'Oh wretch! Oh traitor!' whereby I perceived you had not performed that trust he had reposed in you.

Raleigh. He is as passionate a man as lives; for he hath not spared the best friends he hath in England in his passion. My lords, I take it, he that has been examined, has ever been asked at the time of his Examination, if it be according to his meaning, and then to subscribe. Methinks, my lords, when he accuses a man, he should give some account and reason of it: It is not sufficient to say, we talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham some arguments, whereby to persuade the king of Spain, and answer his objections? I knew Westmoreland and Bothwell, men of other understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their bread.

Sir Tho. Fowler, one of the Jury. Did sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my lord before he was examined concerning him, or not?

Lord Cecil. I am in great dispute with myself to speak in the Case of this gentleman: A former dearness between me and him, tyed so firm a knot of my conceit of his virtues, now broken by a discovery of his imperfections. I protest, did I serve a king that I knew would be displeas'd with me for speaking, in this case I would speak, whatever came of it; but seeing he is compacted of piety and justice, and one that will not mislike of any man for speaking a truth, I will answer your question.—Sir Walter Raleigh was staid by me at Windsor, upon the first news of Copley, that the king's Person should be surprized by my lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I suspected Cobham, then I doubted Raleigh to be a partaker. I speak not this, that it should be thought I had greater judgment than the rest of my lords, in making this haste to have them examined. Raleigh following to Windsor, I met with him upon the Terrace, and willed him, as from the king, to stay; saying, the lords had something to say to him; then he was examined, but not concerning my lord Cobham, but of the surprizing Treason. My lord Grey was apprehended, and likewise Brook; by Brook we found, that he had given notice to Cobham of the surprizing Treason, as he delivered it to us; but with as much sparingness of a brother, as he might. We sent for my lord Cobham to Richmond, where he stood upon his justification, and his quality; sometimes being froward, he said he was not bound to subscribe, wherewith we made the king acquainted. Cobham said, if my L. C. Justice would say it were a Contempt, he would subscribe; whereof being resolved, he subscribed. There was a light given to Aremburg, that Lawrency was examined; but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was examined, is more than I know.

Raleigh. If my lord Cobham had trusted me in the Main, was not I as fit a man to be trusted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by his Letters acquaint us that my lord Cobham had sent Lawrency to Aremburg, when he knew not he had any dealings with him.

Lord Hen. Howard. It made for you, if Lawrency had been only acquainted with Cob-ham, and not with you. But you knew his whole estate, and were acquainted with Cobham's practice with Lawrency: and it was known to you before, that Lawrency depended on Aremburg.

Attorney. 1. Raleigh protested against the surprizing Treason. 2. That he knew not of the matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, sir Walter, with a matter of falsehood: you say you suspected the Intelligence that Cobham had with Aremburg by Lawrency.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but such as might be warranted.

Attorney. Then it was but lawful suspicion. But to that whereas you said, that Cobham had accused you in passion, I answer three ways:

1. I observed when Cobham said, Let me see the Letter again, he paused; and when he did see that count Aremburg was touched, he cried out, Oh Traitor! Oh Villain! now will I confess the whole truth. 2. The accusation of a man on hearsay, is nothing; would he accuse himself on passion, and ruinate his case and posterity, out of malice to accuse you? 3. Could this be out of passion? Mark the manner of it; Cobham had told this at least two months before to his brother Brook, 'You are fools, you are on the bye, Raleigh and I are on the main; we mean to take away the king and his cubs:' this he delivered two months before. So mark the manner and the matter; he would not turn the weapon against his own bosom, and accuse himself to accuse you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confessed that?

L. C. J. This is spoken by Mr. Attorney to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of passion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham said so.

Attorney. Cobham saith, he was a long time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would send him and the money to the king. Did Cobham fear lest you would betray him in Jersey? Then of necessity there must be Trust between you. No man can betray a man, but he that is trusted, in my understanding. This is the greatest argument to prove that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh has a deeper reach, than to make himself, as he said, 'Robin Hood, a Kett, or Cade;' yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traitor; they say he was an outlaw. And whereas he saith that our king is not only more wealthy and potent than his predecessors, but also more politic and wise, so that he could have no hope to prevail; I answer, There is no king so potent, wise and active, but he may be overtaken through Treason. Whereas you say Spain is so poor, discoursing so largely thereof; it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been so well acquainted with the state of Spain. Besides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joined, you might have hoped to prevail a great deal the better. For his six Overthrows, I answer, he hath the more malice, because repulses breed desire of revenge. Then you say you never talked with Cobham, but about leases, and letting lands, and ordering his house; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchen, &c. If you had fallen on your knees at first, and confessed the Treason, it had been better for you. You say, He meant to have given me a Cabinet of 30*l.*; perhaps he thought by those means to have anticipated me therewith. But you say all these are Circumstances: I answer, all this Accusation in Circumstance is true. Here now I might appeal to my lords, that you take hold of this, that he subscribed not to the Accusation.

Lord Hen. Howard. Cobham was not then pressed to subscribe.

Attorney. His Accusation being testified by the lords, is of as great force, as if he had subscribed. Raleigh saith again, If the Accuser be alive he must be brought face to face to speak; and alledges 25 Edw. 3rd that there must be two sufficient Witnesses, that must be brought face to face before the accused; and alledgeth 10 and 13 Elizabeth.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spanish Inquisition, if you proceed only by the Circumstances, without two Witnesses.

Raleigh. Evertere Hominem justum in causa sua injustum est. Good my lords, let it be proved, either by the laws of the land, or the laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witnesses appointed; yet I will not stand to defend this point in law, if the king will have it so: it is no rare thing for a man to be falsely accused. A Judge condemned a woman in Sarum for killing her husband on the testimony of one Witness; afterwards his man confessed the Murder, when she was executed; who after being touched in conscience for the Judgment, was used to say, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in vita sua purgaret. It is also commanded by the Scripture; Allocutus est Jehova Moesen, in Ore duorum aut trium Testium, &c. If Christ requireth it, as it appeareth, Mut. xviii. if by the Canon, Civil Law, and God's Word, it be required, that there must be two Witnesses at the least; bear with me if I desire one. I would not desire to live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings. I have been a slave, a villain, a fool, if I had endeavoured to set up Arabella, and refused so gracious a lord and sovereign. But urge your proofs.

L. C. Justice. You have offered Questions on diverse Statutes, all which mention two accusers in case of Indictments; you have deceived yourself, for the laws of 25 Edw. 3d, and 5 Edw. 6th are repealed. It sufficeth now if there be Proofs made either under hand, or by testimony of Witnesses, or by oaths; it needs not the Subscription of the party, so there be hands of credible men to testify the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an error in me; and if those laws be repealed, yet I hope the equity of them remains still; but if you affirm it, it must be a law to posterity. The Proof of the Common Law is by witness and jury: let Cobham be here, let him speak it. Call my accuser before my face, and I have done.

Attorney. Scientia sceleris est mera ignorantia. You have read the letter of the law, but understand it not. Here was your anchorhold, and your rendezvous: you trust to Cobham, either Cobham must accuse you, or nobody; if he did, then it would not hurt you, because he is but one Witness; if he did not, then you are safe.

Raleigh. If ever I read a word of the law or statutes before I was Prisoner in the Tower, God confound me.

Attorney. Now I come to prove the Circumstances of the Accusation to be true. Cobham confessed he had a Pass-port to travel, hereby intending to present overtures to the Arch-Duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have conference with the king for Money. You say he promised to come home by Jersey, to make merry with you and your wife.

Raleigh. I said in his return from France, not Spain.

Attorney. Further in his Examination he saith, nothing could be set down for the Distribution of the Money to the discontented, without conference with Raleigh. You said it should have been for procurement of Peace, but it was for raising Rebellion. Further, Cobham saith, he would never have entered into these courses, but by your instigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your scholar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots; that is enough for you to do, that are his master. You intended to trust sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an honest and true gentleman, but not sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is but one Accusation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accusation he never subscribed nor avouched it. I beseech you, my lords, let Cobham be sent for, charge him on his soul, on his allegiance to the king; if he affirm it, I am guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accusation of my lord Cobham, it is the Evidence against you: must it not be of force without his subscription? I desire to be resolved by the Judges, whether by the law it is not a forcible argument of evidence.

Judges. My lord, it is.

Raleigh. The king at his coronation is sworn In omnibus Judiciis suis equitatem, non rigorem Legis, observare. By the rigour and cruelty of the law it may be a forcible evidence.

L. C. J. That is not the rigour of the law, but the justice of the law; else when a man hath made a plain Accusation, by practice he might be brought to retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my lord, you may use equity.

L. C. J. That is from the king; you are to have justice from us.

Lord Anderson. The law is, if the matter be proved to the jury, they must find you guilty; for Cobham's Accusation is not only against you, there are other things sufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that sir Walter Raleigh is satisfied, that Cobham's Subscription is not necessary, I pray you, Mr. Attorney, go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attorney, be patient, and give me leave.

Lord Cecil. An unnecessary patience is a hindrance; let him go on with his proofs, and then refer them.

Raleigh. I would answer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a table and pen and ink, you shall.

Then paper and ink was given him. Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter, which the lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the effect of his former Examination; further saying, I have disclosed all: to accuse any one falsely, were to burden my own conscience.

Attorney. Read Copley's Confession the 8th of June; He saith, He was offered 1000 crowns to be in this action.

Here Watson's Additions were read. 'The great mass of Money from the count was impossible,' &c.

Brook's Confession read. 'There have Letters passed, saith he, between Cobham and Aremburg, for a great sum of Money to assist a second action, for the surprizing of his majesty.'

Attorney. It is not possible it was of passion: for it was in talk before three men, being severally examined, who agreed in the sum to be bestowed on discontented persons; That Grey should have 12,000 crowns, and Raleigh should have 8000, or 10,000 crowns.

If the money might be procured (saith he) then a man may give pensions. Being asked if a pension should not be given to his brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrency's Examination.

Within five days after Aremburg arrived, Cobham resorted unto him. That night that Cobham went to Aremburg with Lawrency, Raleigh supped with him.

Attorney. Raleigh must have his part of the Money, therefore now he is a traitor. The crown shall never stand one year on the head of the king (my master) if a Traitor may not be condemned by Circumstances: for if A. tells B. and B. tells C. and C. D. &c. you shall never prove Treason by two Witnesses.

He confesseth Cobham offered him 8000 crowns, which he was to have for the furtherance of the Peace between England and Spain, and that he should have it within three days. To which he said, he gave this answer; When I see the Money, I will tell you more: for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle conceits, and therefore made no Account thereof.

Raleigh. The Attorney hath made a long narration of Copley, and the Priests, which concerns me nothing, neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me if I would agree to further the Peace, he would get me 8000 crowns. I asked him, Who shall have the rest of the money? He said I will offer such a nobleman (who was not named) some of the Money. I said, he will not be persuaded by you, and he will extremely hate you for such a motion. Let me be pinched to death with hot irons, if ever I knew there was any intention to bestow the money on discontented persons. I had made a discourse against the Peace, and would have printed it; if Cobham changed his mind, if the Priests, if Brook had any such intent, what is that to me? They must answer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremburg came, that is difference of time.

Serj. Philips. Raleigh confesseth the matter, but avoideth it by distinguishing of times. You said it was offered you before the coming of Aremburg, which is false. For you being examined whether you should have such Money of Cobham, or not; you said, Yea, and that you should have it within two or three days. Nem moriturus presumitur mentiri.

Ld. Hen. Howard. Alledge me any ground or cause, wherefore you gave ear to my lord Cobham for receiving Pensions, in matters you had not to deal with.

Raleigh. Could I stop my Lord Cobham's mouth?

Ld. Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh presseth, that my lord Cobham should be brought face to face. If he asks things of favour and grace, they must come only from him that can give them. If we sit here as commissioners, how shall we be satisfied whether he ought to be brought, unless we hear the Judges speak?

L. C. J. This thing cannot be granted, for then a number of Treasons should flourish: the Accuser may be drawn by practise, whilst he is in person.

Justice Gawdy. The Statute you speak of concerning two Witnesses in case of Treason, is found to be inconvenient, therefore by another law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England is by Jury and Witnesses.

L. C. J. No, by Examination: if three conspire a Treason, and they all confess it; here is never a Witness, yet they are condemned.

Justice Warburton. I marvel, sir Walter, that you being of such experience and wit, should stand on this point; for so many horse-stealers may escape, if they may not be condemned without witnesses. If one should rush into the king's Privy-Chamber, whilst he is alone, and kill the king (which God forbid) and this man be met coming with his sword drawn all bloody; shall not he be condemned to death? My lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been laboured withal; and to save you, his old friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath said.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

L. C. J. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. The wisdom of the Law of God is absolute and perfect Hac fac et vives, &c. But now by the Wisdom of the State, the Wisdom of the Law is uncertain. Indeed, where the Accuser is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuser may; he is alive, and in the house. Susanna had been condemned, if Daniel had not cried out, 'Will you condemn an innocent Israelite, without examination or knowledge of the truth?' Remember, it is absolutely the Commandment of God: If a false witness rise up, you shall cause him to be brought before the Judges; if he be found false, he shall have the punishment which the accused should have had. It is very sure, for my lord to accuse me is my certain danger, and it may be a means to excuse himself.

L. C. J. There must not such a gap be opened for the destruction of the king, as would be if we should grant this. You plead hard for yourself; but the laws plead as hard for the king. I did never hear that course to be taken in a case of Treason, as to write one to another, or speak one to another, during the time of their imprisonment. There hath been intelligence between you; and what under-hand practices there may be, I know not. If the circumstances agree not with the Evidence, we will not condemn you.

Raleigh. The king desires nothing but the knowledge of the truth, and would have no advantage taken by severity of the law. If ever we had a gracious king, now we have; I hope, as he is, such are his ministers. If there be but a trial of five marks at Common Law, a witness must be deposed. Good my lords, let my Accuser come face to face, and be deposed.

L. C. J. You have no law for it: God forbid any man should accuse himself upon his oath!

Attorney. The law presumes, a man will not accuse himself to accuse another. You are an odious man: for Cobham thinks his cause the worse that you are in it. Now you shall hear of some stirs to be raised in Scotland.

Part of Copley's Examination.

"Also Watson told me, that a special person told him, that Aremberg offered to him 1000 crowns to be in that action; and that Brook said, the stirs in Scotland came out of Raleigh's head."

Ld. Hen. Howard. This Examination was taken before. Did I teach him his lesson?

Raleigh. I protest before God, I meant it not by any privy-counsellor; but because money is scant, he will juggle on both sides.

"The way to invade England, were to begin with Stirs in Scotland."

Raleigh. I think so still: I have spoken it to divers of the Lords of the Council, by way of discourse and opinion.

Attorney. Now let us come to those words of destroying the king and his cubs?

Raleigh. O barbarous! If they, like unnatural villains, should use those words, shall I be charged with them? I will not hear it; I was never any Plotter with them against my country, I was never false to the crown of England. I have spent 4000 pounds of my own against the Spanish Faction, for the good of my country. Do you bring the words of these hellish spiders, Clark, Watson, and others, against me?

Attorney. Thou hast a Spanish heart, and thyself art a Spider of Hell; for thou confessest the king to be a most sweet and gracious prince, and yet hast conspired against him.

"He said, that George Brook told him twice, That his brother, the lord Cobham, said to him, that you are but on the bye, but Raleigh and I are on the main."

"Being asked what was meant by this Jargon, the Bye and the Main? he said, That the lord Cobham told him, that Grey and others were in the Bye, he and Raleigh were on the Main. Being asked, what exposition his brother made of these words? He said, he is loath to repeat it. And after saith, by the main was meant the taking away of the king and his issue; and thinks on his conscience, it was infused into his brother's head by Raleigh."

"Being asked, if ever he had said, 'It will never be well in England, till the king and his cubs were taken away;' he said, he had answered before, and that he would answer no more to that point."

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: there is a law of two sorts of Accusers; one of his own knowledge, another by hear-say.

E. of Suffolk. See the Case of Arnold.

L. C. J. It is the Case of sir Will. Thomas, and sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have any man's life in a week.

Attorney. Raleigh saith, that Cobham was in a passion when he said so. Would he tell his brother any thing of malice against Raleigh, whom he loved as his life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his brother had accused me, he said nothing.

Ld. Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think that Brook accused you, he was only in the surprizing Treason: for by accusing you he should accuse his brother.

Raleigh. He doth not much care for that.

Ld. Cecil. I must judge the best. The accusation of his brother was not voluntary; hepared every thing as much as he could to save his brother.

"He saith he had a Book written against the Title of the King, which he had of Raleigh, and that he gave it to his brother Brook: and Raleigh said it was foolishly written."

Attorney. After the king came within 12 miles of London, Cobham never came to see him; and intended to travel without seeing the queen and the prince. Now in this discontentment you gave him the Book, and he gave it his brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my table. For I well remember a little before that time I received a Challenge from sir Amias Preston, and for that I did intend to answer it, I resolved to leave my estate settled, therefore laid out all my loose Papers, amongst which was this Book.

Ld. Howard. Where had you this Book?

Ld. Cecil. Did you ever shew or make known the Book to me?

Raleigh. No, my Lord.

Ld. Cecil. Was it one of the books which was left to me or my brother?

Raleigh. I took it out of the study in my Lord Treasurer's house in the Strand.

Ld. Cecil. After my father's decease, sir Walter Raleigh desired to search for some Cosmographical descriptions of the Indies, which he thought were in his Study, and were not to be had in print; which I granted, and would have trusted sir Walter Raleigh as soon as any man: though since for some infirmities, the bands of my affection to him have been broken; and yet reserving my duty to the king my master, which I can by no means dispense with, by God, I love him, and have a great conflict within myself: but I must needs say, sir Walter used me a little unkindly to take the Book away without my knowledge: nevertheless, I need make no apology in behalf of my father, considering how useful and necessary it is for privy-counsellors and those in his place to intercept and keep such kind of writings; for whosoever should then search his study may in all likelihood find all the notorious Libels that were writ against the late queen; and whosoever should rummage my Study, or at least my Cabinet, may find several against the king, our Sovereign Lord, since his accession to the throne.

Raleigh. The Book was in Manuscript, and the late Lord Treasurer had wrote in the beginning of it with his own Hand; these words, 'This is the Book of Robert Snugg.' And I do own, as my lord Cecil has said, that I believe they may also find in my house almost all the Libels that have been writ against the late queen.

Att. You were no privy-counsellor, and I hope never shall be.

Ld. Cecil. He was not a sworn counsellor of state, but he has been called to consultations.

Raleigh. I think it a very severe interpretation of the law, to bring me within compass of Treason for this Book, writ so long ago, of which nobody had read any more than the Heads of the Chapters, and which was burnt by G. Brook without my privity; admitting I had delivered the same to the lord Cobham, without allowing or approving, but discommending it, according to Cobham's first Accusation:

and put the case, I should come to my lord Cecil, as I have often done, and find a stranger with him, with a packet of Libels, and my lord should let me have one or two of them to peruse: this I hope is no Treason.

Att. I observe there was intelligence between you and Cobham in the Tower; for after he said it was against the king's Title, he denied it again.

Sir W. Wade. First, my lord Cobham confesseth it, and after he had subscribed it, he revoked it again: to me he always said, that the drift of it was against the king's Title.

Raleigh. I protest before God, and all his works, I gave him not the Book.

Note, Sir Robert Wroth speaketh, or whispereth something secretly.

Att. My lords, I must complain of sir Robert Wroth; he says this Evidence is not material.

Sir R. Wroth. I never spake the words.

Att. Let Mr. serjeant Philips testify whether he heard him say the words or no.

Ld. Cecil. I will give my word for sir R. Wroth.

Sir R. Wroth. I will speak as truly as you, Mr. Attorney, for by God, I never spake it.

L. C. J. Wherefore should this Book be burnt?

Raleigh. I burned it not.

Serj. Philips. You presented your friend with it when he was discontented. If it had been before the queen's death, it had been a less matter; but you gave it him presently when he came from the king, which was the time of his discontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book supposed to be treasonable; I never read it, commended it, or delivered it, nor urged it.

Attorney. Why, this is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh against me is probable.

Att. Lord Cobham saith, that Kemish came to him with a letter torn, and did wish him not to be dismayed, for one witness could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor man hath been close prisoner these 18 weeks; he was offered the rack to make him confess. I never sent any such message by him; I only writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attorney; having of his at that time a great pearl and a diamond.

Ld. H. Howard. No circumstance moveth me more than this. Kemish was never on the rack, the king gave charge that no rigour should be used.

Commissioners. We protest before God, there was no such matter intended to our knowledge.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack sent for, and he threatened with it?

Sir W. Wade. When Mr. Solicitor and myself examined Kemish, we told him he deserved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commissioners. It was more than we knew.

He saith, Kemish brought him a Letter from Raleigh, and that part which was concerning the Lords of the Council was rent out; the Letter contained that he was examined, and cleared himself of all; and that the lord H. Howard said, because he was discontent, he was fit to be in the action. And further, that Kemish said to him from Raleigh, that he should be of good comfort, for one witness could not condemn a man for treason.

Ld. Cecil. Cobham was asked, whether, and when he heard from you? He said, every day.

Raleigh. Kemish added more, I never bade him speak those words.

Note, Mr. Attorney here offered to interrupt him.

Ld. Cecil. It is his last Discourse; give him leave, Mr. Attorney.

Raleigh. I am accused concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My L. C. Justice saith, a man may be condemned with one Witness, yea, without any Witness. Cobham is guilty of many things, Conscientia mille testes; he hath accused himself, what can be hope for but mercy? My lords, vouchsafe me this grace: let him be brought, being alive, and in the house; let him avouch any of these things, I will confess the whole Indictment, and renounce the king's mercy.

Ld. Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinswoman of the king's. Let us not scandal the innocent by confusion of speech: she is as innocent of all these things as I, or any man here; only she received a Letter from my lord Cobham, to prepare her; which she laughed at, and immediately sent it to the king. So far was she from discontentment, that she laughed him to scorn. But you see how far the count of Aremberg did consent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the lady Arabella, spake to the court: The lady doth here protest upon her salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things; and so she willed me to tell the court.

Ld. Cecil. The lord Cobham wrote to my lady Arabella, to know if he might come to speak with her, and gave her to understand, that there were some about the king that laboured to disgrace her; she doubted it was but a trick. But Brook saith, his brother moved him to procure Arabella to write Letters to the king of Spain; but he saith, he never did it.

Raleigh. The lord Cobham hath accused me, you see in what manner he hath forsworn it. Were it not for his Accusation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the letter which Lawrency brought to him from Aremberg. Let me speak for my life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not accuse me. If you grant me not this favour, I am strangely used; Campian* was not denied to have his accusers face to face.

L. C. J. Since he must needs have justice, the acquitting of his old friend may move him to speak otherwise than the truth.

Raleigh. If I had been the infuser of all these Treasons into him; you Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this, he said I have been the cause of all his miseries, and the destruction of his house, and that all evil hath happened unto him by my wicked counsel: if this be true, whom hath he cause to accuse and to be revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as revengful as any man on earth.

Attorney. He is a party, and may not come; the law is against it.

Raleigh. It is a toy to tell me of law; I defy such law, I stand on the fact.

Ld. Cecil. I am afraid my often speaking (who am inferior to my lords here present) will make the world think I delight to hear myself talk. My affection to you, sir Walter, was not extinguished, but slaked, in regard of your deserts. You know the law of the realm (to which your mind doth not contest), that my lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my lord.

Ld. Cecil. But dare you challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

Lord Cecil. You say that my lord Cobham, your main accuser, must come to accuse you. You say he hath retracted: I say, many particulars are not retracted. What the validity of all this is, is merely left to the Jury. Let me ask you this, If my lord Cobham will say you were the only instigator of him to proceed in the Treasons, dare you put yourself on this?

Raleigh. If he will speak it before God and the king, that ever I knew of Arabella's matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the surprising Treason; I put myself on it, God's will and the king's be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How! if he speak things equivalent to that you have said?

Raleigh. Yes, in the main point.

Lord Cecil. If he say, you have been the instigator of him to deal with the Spanish king, had not the council cause to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put myself on it.

Lord Cecil. Then, sir Walter, call upon God, and prepare yourself; for I do verily believe my lords will prove this. Excepting your faults (I call them no worse), by God, I am your friend. The heat and passion in you, and the Attorney's zeal in the king's service, makes me speak this.

Raleigh. Whosoever is the workman, it is reason he should give an account of his work to the work-master. But let it be proved that he acquainted me with any of his conferences with Aremberg: he would surely have given me some account.

Lord Cecil. That follows not: If I set you on work, and you give me no account, am I therefore innocent?

Att. For the lady Arabella, I said she was never acquainted with the matter. Now that Raleigh had conference in all these Treasons, it is manifest. The Jury hath heard the matter.

There is one Dyer a pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal gentleman who asked him if the king of England was crowned yet: To whom he answered, 'I think not yet, but he shall be shortly,' Nay, saith the Portugal, that shall never be, for his throat will be cut by Don Raleigh and Don Cobham before he be crowned.

DYER was called and sworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a merchant's house in Lisbon, to see a boy that I had there; there came a gentleman into the house, and enquiring what countryman I was, I said, an Englishman. Whereupon he asked me, if the king was crowned? And I answered, No, but that I hoped he should be so shortly. Nay, saith he, he shall never be crowned; for Don Raleigh and Don Cobham will cut his throat ere that day come.

Raleigh. What infer you upon this?

Att. That your Treason hath wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practise with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treason, and the duke of York with Jack Cade, but that it was to countenance his Treason? Consider, you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no cause so doubtful which the king's counsel cannot make good against the law. Consider my disability, and their ability: they prove nothing against me, only they bring the Accusation of my lord Cobham, which he hath lamented and repented as heartily, as if it had been for an horrible murder: for he knew that all this sorrow which should come to me, is by his means. Presumptions must proceed from precedent or subsequent facts. I have spent 40,000 crowns against the Spaniard. I had not purchased 40 pound a year. If I had died in Guiana, I had not left 300 marks a year to my wife and son. I that have always condemned the Spanish Faction, methinks it is a strange thing that now I should affect it! Remember what St. Austin says, Sic judicate tanquam ab alio max judicandi; unus iudex, unum Tribunal. If you would be contented on presumptions to be delivered up to be slaughtered, to have your wives and children turned into the streets to beg their bread; if you would be contented to be so judged, judge so of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this so clear, as that the wit of man shall have no colour to answer it. The matter is Treason in the highest degree, the end to deprive the king of his crown. The particular Treasons are these: first, to raise up Rebellion, and to effect that, to procure Money; to raise up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a treasonable Book against the king's right to the crown; the purpose, to take away the life of his majesty and his issue. My lord Cobham confesseth sir Walter to be guilty of all these Treasons. The question is, whether he be guilty as joining with him, or instigating of him? The course to prove this, was by my lord Cobham's Accusation. If that be true, he is guilty; if not, he is clear. So whether Cobham say true, or Raleigh, that is the question. Raleigh hath no answer but the shadow of as much wit, as the wit of man can devise. He useth his bare denial; the denial of a Defendant must not move the Jury. In the Star Chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in question, his denial on his oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in propria causa; therefore much less in matters of Treason. Cobham's testification against him before them, and since, hath been largely discoursed.

Raleigh. If truth be constant, and constancy be in truth, why hath he forsworn that that he hath said? You have not proved any one thing against me by direct Proofs, but all by circumstances.

Att. Have you done? The king must have the last.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attorney, he which speaketh for his life, must speak last. False repetitions and mistakings must not mar my cause. You should speak secundum allegata et probata. I appeal to God and the king in this point, whether Cobham's Accusation be sufficient to condemn me.

Att. The king's safety and your clearing cannot agree. I protest before God, I never knew a clearer Treason.

Raleigh. I never had intelligence with Cobham since I came to the Tower.

Att. Go to, I will lay thee upon thy back, for the confidentest Traitor that ever came at a bar. Why should you take 8,000 crowns for a peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not so impatient, good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to speak.

Att. If I may not be patiently heard, you will encourage Traitors, and discourage us. I am the king's sworn servant, and must speak; If he be guilty, he is a Traitor; if not, deliver him.

Note, Here Mr. Attorney sat down in a chafe, and would speak no more, until the Commissioners urged and intreated him. After much ado, he went on, and made a long repetition of all the Evidence, for the direction of the Jury; and at the repeating of some things, sir Walter Raleigh interrupted him, and said, he did him wrong.

Att. Thou art the most vile and execrable Traitor that ever lived.

Raleigh. You speak indiscreetly, barbarously and uncivilly.

Att. I want words sufficient to express thy viperous Treasons.

Raleigh. I think you want words indeed, for you have spoken one thing half a dozen times.

Att. Thou art an odious fellow, thy name is hateful to all the realm of England for thy pride.

Raleigh. It will go near to prove a measuring cast between you and me, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Well, I will now make it appear to the world, that there never lived a viler viper upon the face of the earth than thou. And therewithal he drew a Letter, out of his pocket, saying further, 'My lords, you shall see, this is an Agent that hath writ a Treatise against the Spaniard, and hath ever so detested him; this is he that hath spent so much Money against him in service; and yet you shall all see whether his heart be not wholly Spanish. The lord Cobham, who of his own nature was a good and honourable gentleman, till overtaken by this wretch, now finding his conscience heavily burdened with some courses which the subtilty of this Traitor had drawn him into; my lords, he could be at no rest with himself, nor quiet in his thoughts, until he was eased of that heavy weight: out of which passion of his mind, and discharge of his duty to his prince, and his conscience to God, taking it upon his salvation that he wrote nothing but the truth, with his own hands he wrote this Letter. Now, sir, you shall see whether you had intelligence with Cobham, within four days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spanish, that desired a Pension of 1500*l.* a year from Spain, that Spain by him might have intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traitor: He hath taken an apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my lord Cobham's window; the contents whereof were this, 'It is doubtful whether we shall be proceeded with or no; perhaps you shall not be tried.' This was to get a retraction. Oh! it was Adam's apple, whereby the devil did deceive him. Further, he wrote thus, 'Do not as my lord of Essex did; take heed of a Preacher; for by his persuasion he confessed, and made himself guilty.' I doubt not but this day God shall have as great a conquest by this Traitor, and the Son of God shall be as much glorified, as when it was said, Vicisti, Galilae; you know my meaning. What though Cobham retracted, yet he could not rest nor sleep till he confirmed it again. If this be not enough to prove him a Traitor, the king my master shall not live three years to an end.

Nota, Here Mr. Attorney produced the lord Cobham's Letter, and as he read it, inserted some speeches.

'I have thought fit to set down this to my lords, wherein I protest on my soul to write nothing but the truth. I am now come near the period of my time, therefore I confess the whole truth before God and his angels. Raleigh, four days before I came from the Tower, caused an apple (Eve's apple) to be thrown in at my chamber window; the effect of it was, to intreat me to right the wrong that I had done him, in saying, 'that I should have come home by Jersey;' which under my hand to him I have retracted. His first Letter I answered not, which was thrown in the same manner; wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He sent me word, that the Judges met at Mr. Attorney's house, and that there was good hope the proceedings against us should be stayed:

'he sent me another time a little tobacco. At Aremburg's coming, Raleigh was to have procured a pension of 1500*l.* a year, for which he promised, that no action should be against Spain, the Low Countries, or the Indies, but he would give knowledge beforehand. He told me, the States had audience with the king.—(Attorney, 'Ah! is not this a Spanish heart in an English body?') 'He hath been the original cause of my ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremburg, but by his instigation. He hath also been the cause of my discontentment; he advised me, not to be overtaken with preachers, as Essex was; and that the king would better allow of a constant denial, than to accuse any.'

Att. Oh, damnable atheist! He hath learned some Text of Scripture to serve his own purpose, but falsely alledged. He counsels him not to be counselled by preachers, as Essex was: He died the child of God, God honoured him at his death; thou wast by when he died*: Et lupus et turpes instant morientibus Urse. He died indeed for his offence. The king himself spake these words; 'He that shall say, Essex died not for Treason, is punishable.'

Raleigh. You have heard a strange tale of a strange man. Now he thinks, he hath matter enough to destroy me; but the king and all of you shall witness, by our deaths, which of us was the ruin of the other. I bid a poor fellow throw in the Letter at his window, written to this purpose; 'You know you have undone me, now write three lines to justify me.' In this I will die, that he hath done me wrong: Why did not he acquaint him with my dispositions?

L. C. J. But what say you now of the Letter, and the Pension of 1500*l.* per annum?

Raleigh. I say, that Cobham is a base, dishonourable, poor soul.

Att. Is he base? I return it into thy throat on his behalf: But for thee he had been a good subject.

L. C. J. I perceive you are not so clear a man, as you have protested all this while; for you should have discovered these matters to the king.

Nota, Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his pocket, which the lord Cobham had written to him, and desired my lord Cecil to read it, because he only knew his hand; the effect of it was as follows:

Cobham's Letter of Justification to Raleigh.

'Seeing myself so near my end, for the discharge of my own conscience, and freeing myself from your blood, which else will cry vengeance against me; I protest upon my salvation I never practised with Spain by your procurement; God so comfort me in this my affliction, as you are a true subject, for any thing that I know. I will say as Daniel, Purus sum à sanguine hujus. So

God have mercy upon my soul, as I know no Treason by you.

Raleigh. Now I wonder how many souls this man hath! He damns one in this Letter, and another in that.

[Here was much ado: Mr. Attorney alledged, that his last Letter was politicly and cunningly urged from the lord Cobham, and that the first was simply the truth; and that lest it should seem doubtful that the first Letter was drawn from my lord Cobham by promise of mercy, or hope of favour, the Ld. C. J. willed that the Jury might herein be satisfied. Whereupon the earl of Devonshire delivered, that the same was mere voluntary, and not extracted from the lord Cobham upon any hopes or promise of Pardon.]

This was the last Evidence*: whereupon a marshal was sworn to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and staid not a quarter of an hour, but returned, and gave their verdict, Guilty.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded Not Guilty, for all these several Treasons; and for Trial thereof, hast put thyself upon thy country; which country are these, who have found thee Guilty. What canst thou say for thyself, why Judgment and Execution of Death should not pass against thee?

Raleigh. My lords, the Jury have found me Guilty: they must do as they are directed. I can say nothing why Judgment should not proceed. You see whereof Cobham hath accused me: you remember his Protestations, that I was never Guilty. I desire the king should know of the wrongs done unto me since I came hither.

L. C. J. You have had no wrong, sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attorney. I desire my lords to remember three things to the king. 1. I was accused to be a practiser with Spain: I never knew that my lord Cobham meant to go thither; I will ask no mercy at the king's hands, if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my lord Cobham's practice with Aremberg, nor of the surprizing Treason.

L. C. J. In my conscience, I am persuaded that Cobham hath used you truly. You cannot deny, but you were dealt with to have a Pension to be a spy for Spain; therefore you are not so true to the king as you have protested yourself to be.

mercy; I know his mercy is greater than my offence. I recommend my wife, and son of tender years, unbrought up, to his compassion.

L. C. J. I thought I should never have seen this day, to have stood in this place to give Sentence of Death against you; because I thought it impossible, that one of so great parts should have fallen so grievously. God hath bestowed on you many benefits. You had been a man fit and able to have served the king in good place. You had brought yourself into a good state of living; if you had entered into a good consideration of your estate, and not suffered your own wit to have intrapped yourself, you might have lived in good comfort. It is best for man not to seek to climb too high, lest he fall; nor yet to creep too low, lest he be trodden on. It was the Poesy of the wisest and greatest Counsellor of our time in England, In medio spatio mediocria firma locantur. You might have lived well with 3000*l.* a year, for so I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be discontented; but if you had been down, you know fortune's wheel, when it is turned about, riseth again. I never heard that the king took away any thing from you, but the Captainship of the Guard, which he did with very good reason, to have one of his own knowledge, whom he might trust, in that place. You have been taken for a wise man, and so have shewed wit enough this day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. if the king had said, It is a matter that offends my people, should I burden them for your private good? I think you could not well take it hardly, that his subjects were eased, though by your private hindrance. Two vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager ambition, the other corrupt covetousness. Ambition, in desiring to be advanced to equal grace and favour, as you have been before time; that grace you had then, you got not in a day or year. For your covetousness, I am sorry to hear that a gentleman of your wealth should become a base Spy for the enemy, which is the vilest of all other; wherein on my conscience Cobham hath said true: by it you would have increased your living 1500*l.* a year. This covetousness is like a canker, that eats the iron place where it lives. Your case-being thus, let it not grieve you, if I speak a little out of zeal, and love to your good. You have been taxed by the world, with the Defence of the most heathenish and blasphemous Opinions, which I list not to repeat, because Christian ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the authors and maintainers of them be suffered to live in any Christian Commonwealth. You know what men said of Harpool. You shall do well, before you go out of the world, to give satisfaction therein, and not to die with these imputations on you. Let not any devil persuade you to think there is no eternity in Heaven: for if you think thus, you shall find eternity in Hell-fire. In the first accusation of my lord Cobham, I observed his manner of speaking; I protest before the living God, I am persuaded he spoke nothing but the truth. You wrote, that he should not in any case confess any thing to a Preacher, telling him an example of my lord of Essex, that noble earl that is gone; who, if he had not been carried away with others, had lived in honour to this day among us: he confessed his offences, and obtained mercy of the Lord; for I am verily persuaded in my heart, he died a worthy servant of God. Your conceit of not confessing any thing, is very inhuman and wicked. In this world is the time of confessing, that we may be absolved at the Day of Judgment. You have shewed a fearful sign of denying God, in advising a man not to confess the truth. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuser come face to face: for such an one is easily brought to retract, when he seeth there is no hope of his own life. It is dangerous that any Traitors should have access to, or conference with one another; when they see themselves must die, they will think it best to have their fellow live, that he may commit the like Treason again, and so in some sort seek revenge.—Now it resteth to pronounce the Judgment, which I wish you had not been this day to have received of me: for if the fear of God in you had been answerable to your other great parts, you might have lived to have been a singular good subject. I never saw the like Trial, and hope I shall never see the like again;

* Kennett says that "Upon the trial, sir Walter Raleigh denying the fact, pleaded, That though it were proved, it could not amount to Treason against king James, being done in the reign of the late queen; and no acts of parliament made to entail the crown upon him after her death."

But since you have been found guilty of these horrible Treasons, the judgment of this court is*, That you shall be had from hence to the place whence you came, there to remain until the day of execution; and from thence you shall be drawn upon a hurdle through the open streets to the place of execution, there to be hanged and cut down alive, and your body shall be opened, your heart and bowels plucked out, and your privy members cut off, and thrown into the fire before your eyes; then your head to be stricken off from your body, and your body shall be divided into four quarters, to be disposed of at the king's pleasure: And God have mercy upon your soul.

Sir Walter Raleigh besought the earl of Devonshire, and the lords, to be suitors on his behalf to the king; that in regard of places of estimation he did bear in his majesty's time, the rigour of his Judgment might be qualified, and his death be honourable, and not ignominious. Wherein after they had promised him to do their utmost endeavours, the court rose, and the prisoner was carried up again to the castle.

Fourteen years sir Walter had spent in the Tower, and being weary of a state wherein he could be only serviceable by his pen, but not in a capacity of serving and enriching his country any other way, (of whom prince Henry would say, 'that no king but his father would keep such a bird in a cage;') at length he fell upon an enterprize of a golden mine in Guiana in the Southern parts of America. The proposition of this was presented and recommended to his majesty by sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, as a matter not in the air, or speculative, but real, and of certainty: for that sir Walter had seen of the ore of the mine, and tried the richness of it, having gotten a pound from thence by the hands of Captain Kemish's ancient servant.—Sir Ralph's recommendations of the design, and the earnest solicitations for his enlargement by the queen and prince, and the French Leiger, (with much affection to his deserts, not without some politic designs on Spain) together with the asseverations of sir Walter of the truth of the mine, worked upon his majesty, who thought himself in honour obliged, nay, in a manner engaged, as the Declaration which he published after the death of sir Walter tells us, not to deny unto his people the adventure and hope of so great riches to be sought and achieved at the charge of volunteers, especially since it stood so well with his majesty's politic and magnanimous courses in these his flourishing times of peace to nourish and encourage noble and generous enterprizes for plantations, discoveries, and opening of a new trade.—Count Gondomar, an active and subtle instrument to serve his master's ends, took alarm at this, and represented to his majesty the Enterprize of sir Walter to be hostile, and predatory, intending a breach of the peace between the two crowns. But notwithstanding, power at last is granted to sir Walter to set forth ships and men for that service. However, the king commanded him upon pain of his allegiance, to give him under his hand, promising, on the word of a king, to keep it secret, the number of his men, the burden and strength of his ships, together with the country and river which he was to enter: Which being done accordingly by sir Walter, that very original Paper was found in the Spanish governor's closet at St. Thomas's. So active were the Spanish ministers, that advertisement was sent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before the English Fleet got out of the Thames.—But as we have just cause to admire the more than usual activity of the Spanish agents, so may we wonder no less at the miscarriage of his majesty's present ministers, who, notwithstanding he had passed his royal word to the contrary, yet they did help count Gondomar to that very Paper; so much both king and court were at Gondomar's service. A Commission* indeed is granted, but by Gondomar's means is limited, That the

Fleet should commit no outrages upon the king of Spain's subjects by land, unless they began first. With this commission, and the company of several brave captains, and other knights and gentlemen of great blood and worth, he set out in quest of the Mine with a compleat fleet of 12 sail; letting fall a Speech at his departure, which was rather an argument of his wit than his wisdom; 'That his whole History of the World had not the like precedent, of a king's prisoner to purchase freedom, and his bosom favourite to have the halter, but in Scripture, Mordecai and Haman;' meaning himself and the earl of Somerset. To which he was told, that the king replied, 'He might die in that deceit.' Which he did, for Somerset was saved. Of whom was made good what sir Walter used to say of Favourites, 'That minions were not so happy as vulgar judgments thought them, being frequently commanded to uncomely, and sometimes to unnatural employments.' On the 17th of Nov. he arrived at Guiana having been much retarded by contrary winds, and having lost several of his volunteers in the voyage, by a violent calenture. When sir Walter was returned to Plymouth, sir Lewis Steukly, Vice-Admiral of the county of Devon, seized him, being commissioned by his majesty to bring him to London; which could add no terror to a person who could expect nothing less. When he was brought to London, he was permitted the confinement of his own house: but finding the court wholly guided by Gondomar, he could hope for little mercy; therefore he wisely contrived the design of an escape into France; which sir Lewis Steukly betrayed.

The Voyage proving unsuccessful, king James was willing to sacrifice the life of sir Walter* to the advancement of peace with Spain, but not upon such grounds as the ambassador had designed; for he desired a Judgment upon the pretended breach of peace, that by this occasion he might silyly gain from the English an acknowledgment of his master's right in those places, and hereafter both stop their mouths, and quench their heat and valour.

Hence they resolved to proceed against him upon his old condemnation †, for having had experience upon a former Trial, they cared not to run the hazard of a second. Accordingly upon Wednesday, the 28th of Oct. 1613, the Lieutenant of the Tower, in pursuance of a Writ of Habeas Corpus to him directed, brought sir Walter Raleigh from the Tower to the King's-bench bar at Westminster. Where Mr. Attorney (Mr. Henry Yelverton,) spake in effect thus: My lords, sir Walter Raleigh, the prisoner at the bar, was 15 years since, convicted of High-Treason, by him committed against the person of his majesty, and the state of this kingdom, and then received the Judgment of death to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; his majesty, of his abundant grace, hath been pleased to shew mercy upon him 'till now, that justice calls unto him for Execution. Sir Walter hath been a statesman, and a man, who, in regard of his parts and quality, is to be pitied: he hath been as a star, at which the world hath gazed; but stars may fall, nay they must fall, when they trouble the sphere wherein they abide. It is therefore his majesty's pleasure now to call for Execution of the former Judgment, and I now require order for the same.

Then Mr. Fanshaw, Clerk of the Crown, read the Record of the Conviction and Judgment, and called to the Prisoner, to hold up his hand, which he did. Then was the Prisoner asked, What he could say for himself, why execution should not be awarded against him?

Sir Walter Raleigh. My lords, my voice is grown weak, by reason of my late sickness, and an ague, which I now have; for I was even now brought hither out of it.

Sir Walter. Then, my lord, all I can say is this; That the Judgment which I received to die so long since, I hope it cannot now be strained to take away my life; for that since it was his majesty's pleasure to grant me a commission to proceed in a Voyage beyond the seas, wherein I had power as marshal, on the life and death of others, so, under favour, I presume I am discharged of that Judgment: for, by that Commission I departed the land, and undertook a Journey, to honour my sovereign, and to enrich his kingdom with gold, of the ore whereof this hand hath found and taken in Guiana; but the Voyage, notwithstanding my endeavour, had no other success, but what was fatal to me, the loss of my son, and wasting of my whole estate.

Being about to proceed, he was by the L. C. Justice interrupted, who spake:

L. C. J. Sir Walter Raleigh, this which you now speak, touching your Voyage, is not to the purpose, neither can your Commission any way help you, by that you are not pardoned; for by words of a special nature, in case of treason, you must be pardoned, and not implicitly. There was no word tending to Pardon in all your Commission, and therefore you must say something else to the purpose; otherwise, we must proceed to give execution.

Sir Walter Raleigh. If your opinion be so, my lord, I am satisfied, and so put myself on the mercy of the king, who I know is gracious; and, under favour, I must say I hope he will be pleased to take commiseration upon me, is concerning that judgment, which is so long past, and which, I think, here are some could witness, nay, his majesty was of opinion, that I had hard measure therein.

L. C. J. Sir Walter Raleigh, you must remember yourself; you had an honourable Trial, and so were justly convicted; and it were wisdom in you now to submit yourself, and to confess your Offence did justly draw upon you that Judgment which was then pronounced against you; wherefore I pray you attend what I shall say unto you. I am here called to grant Execution upon the Judgment given you 15 years since; and which time you have been as a dead man in the law, and might at any minute have been cut off, but the king in mercy spared you. You might think it heavy, if this were done in cold blood, to call you to Execution, but it is not so; for new Offences have stirred up his majesty's justice, to remember to revive what the law hath formerly cast upon you. I know you have been valiant and wise, and I doubt not but you retain both these virtues, for now you shall have occasion to use them. Your faith hath heretofore been questioned, but I am resolved you are a good Christian; for your Book, which is an admirable work, doth testify as much. I would give you counsel, but I know you can apply unto yourself far better than I am able to give you; yet will I, with the good neighbour in the Gospel, who finding one in the way, wounded and distressed, poured oil into his wounds, and refreshed him, I give unto you the oil of comfort; though, in respect that I am a minister of the law, mixed with vinegar. Sorrow will not avail you in some kind: for, were you pained, sorrow would not ease you; were you afflicted, sorrow would not relieve you; were you tormented, sorrow could not content you; and yet, the sorrow for your sins would be an everlasting comfort to you. You must do as that valiant captain did, who perceiving himself in danger, said, in defiance of death; 'Death, thou expectest me, but maugre thy spite, I expect thee.' Fear not death too much, nor fear not death too little: not too much, lest you fail in your hopes; not too little, lest you die presumptuously. And here I must conclude with my prayers to God for it; and that he would have mercy on your soul.—And so the L. C. Justice ended with these words: 'Execution is granted'.

Sir Walter Raleigh. My lord, I desire thus much favour, that I may not be cut off suddenly; for I have something to do in discharge of my conscience, and something to satisfy his majesty in, something to satisfy the world in; and I desire I may be heard at the day of my death. And here I take God to be my judge, before whom I shall shortly appear, I was never disloyal to his majesty, which I will justify where I shall not fear the face of any king on earth: and so I beseech you all to pray for me.

The Court having awarded Execution, the Sheriffs of Middlesex were commanded for that purpose to take him into their custody, who presently carried him to the Gatehouse. The following is a Copy of the Warrant for his Execution:

'JAMES, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our right trusty and well-beloved Counsellor Frances lord Verulam, our chancellor of England; greeting.—Whereas sir Walter Raleigh, knight, late of the parish of Saint Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, with others, hath been indicted of divers High Treasons by him committed against us, and thereupon hath been tried, and found Guilty of the same, before our dear cousin and counsellor, Thomas earl of Suffolk, then Chamberlain of our Household, Gilbert late earl of Shrewsbury, Charles late earl of Devon, Henry lord Howard, Robert lord Cecil, of Essington, then our principal Secretary, Edward lord Wotton then our Comptroller of our Household, and other our Justices of Oyer and Terminer, at our city of Winchester, in our county of Southampton, concerning Treasons, and other offences, lately assigned; which said sir Walter Raleigh was, for the same his Treasons, by them adjudged to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, according to the laws and customs of this our realm of England, in that case provided; which said Commission, with the said Judgment, indictment, and the Trial and proceedings thereupon, were returned, and do remain in our said Court of Pleas, before us to be holden; and although the said sir Walter Raleigh be adjudged to die as aforesaid; yet we, minding to dispense with that manner of Execution of Judgment, do therefore, by these presents, pardon, remit, and release the said sir Walter Raleigh, of and from such Execution of his Judgment to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, as abovesaid, and instead thereof, our pleasure is to have the head only of the said sir Walter Raleigh cut off, at, or within our palace of Westminster, in, or upon some fit and convenient place, or scaffold, to be provided in that behalf, and that in such sort and order, as in such cases have been heretofore done; the said Judgment to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, or any law, or other thing, or matter, whatsoever, to the contrary notwithstanding: willing, charging, and hereby expressly commanding you our said Chancellor, That, upon receipt hereof, you do forthwith direct, under our great seal of England, two several Writs, one to the Lieutenant of our Tower of London, or his deputy there, for the delivery of the said Walter Raleigh to the sheriff of Middlesex, at, or within our said palace of Westminster aforesaid; and another Writ to the said sheriff of Middlesex, for the receiving the said sir Walter Raleigh of and from the hands of our said Lieutenant, or his deputy, and for the executing of him there, at some fit and convenient place, to be there, by our said sheriff, erected and provided for that purpose, in such manner and form as in such cases hath heretofore been done, or used to be done; and these presents shall be your warrant and discharge for the same, against us, our heirs and successors for ever. Witness our self at Westminster, the 28th day of October 1618.

But all persons have wondered how that old Sentence, that had lain dormant 16 years and upwards against sir Walter, could have been made use of to take off his head afterwards: considering the then Lord Chancellor Verulam told him positively, (as sir Walter was acquainting him with that proffer of sir Wm. St. Geon for a Pecuniary Pardon, which might have been obtained for a less sum than his Guiana preparations amounted to) in these words: 'Sir, the knee-timber of your Voyage is Money; spare your purse in this particular, for upon my life you have a sufficient Pardon for all that is passed already, the king having, under his broad-seal, made you admiral of your fleet, and given you power of the martial law, over the officers and soldiers.'

It was the opinion of most lawyers, That he, who by his majesty's patent had power of life and death over the king's liege people, should be esteemed or judged Rectus in curia, and free from all old convictions. But sir Walter hath made the best defence for his Guiana actions, in his letter to his majesty, which is here inserted.

'May it please your most excellent majesty; In my Journey outward-bound, I had my men murdered at the island, and yet spared to take revenge: if I did discharge some Spanish barques taken without spoil; if I did forbear all parts of the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken 20 of their towns on the sea-coasts, and did only follow the Enterprize I undertook for Guiana, where, without any directions from me, a Spanish village was burnt, which was new set up within three miles of the Mine, by your majesty's favour, I find no reason why the Spanish Ambassador should complain of me. If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder 26 Englishmen, binding them back to back, and then cutting their throats, when they had traded with them a whole month, and came to them on the land without so much as one sword; and that it may not be lawful for your majesty's subjects, being charged first by them, to repel force by force; we may justly say, O miserable English! If Parker and Metham took Campench and other places in the Honduræes, seated in the heart of the Spanish Indies, burned towns, killed the Spaniards, and had nothing said to them at their return, and myself forbore to look into the Indies because I would not offend; I may justly say, O miserable sir W. Raleigh! If I spent my poor estate, lost my son, suffered by sickness, and otherwise, a world of miseries; if I have resisted with the manifest hazard of my-life, the robberies and spoils which my company would have made; if when I was poor, I might have made myself rich; if when I had gotten my liberty, which all men, and nature itself do so much prize, I voluntarily lost it; if, when I was sure of my life, I rendered it again; if I might elsewhere have sold my ship and goods, and put 5 or 6000*l.* in my pocket, and yet have brought her into England: I beseech your majesty to 'believe, that all this I have done, because it should not be said to your majesty, that your majesty had given liberty and trust to a man whose end was but the recovery of his liberty, and who had betrayed your majesty's trust. My mutineers told me, that if I returned for England I should be undone; but I believed in your majesty's goodness, more than in all their arguments. Sure I am, that I am the first that being free, and able to enrich myself, have embraced poverty and peril: and as sure I am, that my example shall make me the last. But your majesty's wisdom and goodness I have made my judge; who have ever been, and shall ever be, your majesty's most humble vassal, WALTER RALEIGH.'

But this Apology, though never so persuasive, could not satisfy Gondomar's rage, who was resolved to sacrifice the only favourite left of queen Elizabeth, to the Spanish interest: and who, as Osburn remarks, was the only person of Essex's enemies that died lamented; and the only man of note left alive, that had helped to beat the Spaniard in the year 1588.

THE night before the Execution, sir Walter wrote the following Letters, the one to the King, the other to his Wife:

'The life which I had, most mighty prince, the law hath taken from me, and I am now but the same earth and dust, out of which I was made. If my offence had any proportion with your majesty's mercy, I might despair, or if my deserving had any quantity with your majesty's unmeasurable goodness, I might yet have hope; but it is you that must judge, and not I. Name, blood, gentility, or estate, I have none; no not so much as a being, no not so much as a vitam plantæ: I have only a penitent soul in a body of iron, which moveth towards the loadstone of death, and cannot be withheld from touching it, except your majesty's mercy turn the point towards me that expelleth. Lost I am for hearing of vain man, for hearing only, and never believing nor accepting: and so little account I made of that speech of his, which was my condemnation (as my forsaking him doth truly witness) that I never remembered any such thing, till it was at my trial objected against me. So did he repay my care, who cared to make him good, which I now see no care of man can effect. But God (for my offence to him) hath laid this heavy burden on me, miserable and unfortunate wretch that I am! But for not loving you (my sovereign) God hath not laid this sorrow on me; for he knows (with whom I am not in case to lie) that I honoured your majesty by fame, and loved and admired you by knowledge; so that whether I live, or die, your majesty's loving servant I will live and die. If now I write what seems not well-favoured, most merciful prince, vouchsafe to ascribe it to the counsel of a dead heart, and to a mind that sorrow

‘hath confounded. But the more my misery
‘is, the more is your majesty’s mercy, if you ‘please to behold it, and the less I can de‘serve, the more liberal your majesty’s gift
‘shall be: herein you shall only imitate God,
‘by giving free life; and by giving it to such a
‘one, from whom there can be no retribution, ‘but only a desire to pay a lent life with the ‘same great love, which the same great good‘ness shall bestow on it. This being the first ‘letter that ever your majesty received from a ‘dead man: I humbly submit myself to the ‘will of God, my supreme lord, and shall wil‘lingly and patiently suffer whatsoever it shall ‘please your majesty to afflict me withal.

‘WALTER RALEIGH.’

Sir WALTER RALEIGH’s Letter to his Wife.

‘YOU shall now receive, my dear wife, my ‘last words in these my last lines. My love I ‘send you, that you may keep it when I am
‘dead; and my counsel, that you may re‘member it when I am no more. I would not
‘by my Will present you with sorrows, dear ‘Besse, let them go into the grave with me,
‘and be buried in the dust. And seeing that ‘it is not God’s will that I should see you any ‘more in this life, bear it patiently, and with a ‘heart like thyself. First, I send you all the ‘thanks which my heart can conceive, or my ‘words can rehearse, for your many travails, ‘and care taken for me; which though they ‘have not taken effect as you wished, yet my ‘debt to you is not the less; but pay it I never ‘shall in this world. Secondly, I beseech you,
‘for the love you bare me living, do not hide ‘yourself many days, but by your travels seek ‘to help your miserable fortunes, and the right ‘of your poor child. Thy mourning cannot ‘avail me, I am but dust. Thirdly, you shall ‘understand that my land was conveyed bona ‘fide to my child: the Writings were drawn at ‘Midsummer was 12 months, my honest cousin
‘Breit can testify so much, and Dolberry too
‘can remember somewhat therein. And I ‘trust my blood will quench their malice that ‘have cruelly murdered me, and that they will ‘not seek also to kill thee and thine with ex‘treme poverty. To what friend to direct thee
‘I know not, for all mine have left me in the ‘true time of trial. And I perceive that my ‘death was determined from the first day.
‘Most sorry I am, God knows, that being thus ‘surprised with death I can leave you in no ‘better estate. God is my witness, I meant ‘you all my office of wines, or all that I could ‘have purchased by selling it, half my stuff,
‘and all my jewels, but some one for the boy;
‘but God hath prevented all my resolutions, ‘that great God that ruleth all in all: but if ‘you can live free from want, care for no more,
‘the rest is but vanity. Love God, and begin ‘betimes to repose yourself upon him, and ‘therein shall you find true and lasting riches,
‘and endless comfort: for the rest, when you ‘have travelled and wearied your thoughts ‘over all sorts of worldly cogitations, you shall
‘but sit down by sorrow in the end. Teach

‘your son also to love and fear God whilst he ‘is yet young, that the fear of God may grow
‘with him; and then God will be a husband ‘to you, and a father to him; a husband and ‘a father which cannot be taken from you.
‘Bailey oweth me 200*l.* and Adrian 600*l.* in ‘Jersey. I also have much owing me besides.
‘The arrearages of the wines will pay your ‘debts. And howsoever you do, for my soul’s ‘sake, pay all poor men. When I am gone, no ‘doubt you shall be sought to, for the world
‘thinks that I was very rich. But take heed
‘of the pretences of men, and their affections, ‘for they last not but in honest and worthy ‘men; and no greater misery can befall you in ‘this life than to become a prey, and after‘wards to be despised. I speak not this, God ‘knows, to dissuade you from marriage, for it ‘will be best for you both in respect of the ‘world and of God. As for me, I am no more ‘yours, nor you mine, death hath cut us ‘asunder; and God hath divided me from the ‘world, and you from me. Remember your ‘poor child for his father’s sake, who chose
‘you, and loved you in his happiest times. Get ‘those Letters, if it be possible, which I writ ‘to the lords, wherein I sued for life: God is ‘my witness, it was for you and yours that I ‘desired life; but it is true that I disdained ‘myself for hegging of it: for know it, my dear ‘wife, that your son is the son of a true man,
‘and who, in his own respect, despiseth death,
‘and all his misshapen and ugly forms. I ‘cannot write much, God he knows how hardly ‘I steal this time while others sleep, and it is ‘also time that I should separate my thoughts ‘from the world. Beg my dead body, which ‘living was denied thee; and either lay it at ‘Sherburne (and if the land continue) or in ‘Exeter church by my father and mother. I ‘can say no more, Time and Death call me ‘away; the everlasting, powerful, infinite, and ‘omnipotent God, that Almighty God, who is ‘goodness itself, the true life and true light, ‘keep thee and thine, have mercy on me, and ‘teach me to forgive my persecutors and accu‘sers, and send us to meet in his glorious king‘dom. My dear wife, farewell. Bless my ‘poor boy. Pray for me, and let my good God ‘hold you both in his arms. Written with the ‘dying hand of sometime thy husband, but

Upon Thursday the 29th of Oct. 1618, sir
Walter Raleigh was conveyed by the Sheriffs of London to a scaffold in the Old Palace-Yard at Westminster, about 9 in the morning of the same day. Whereupon, when he came, with a cheerful countenance he saluted the lords, knights, and gentlemen there present. After which, a Proclamation was made for silence, and he addressed himself to speak in this manner, ‘I desire to be borne withal, for this is ‘the third day of my fever; and if I shall shew ‘any weakness, I beseech you to attribute it to ‘my malady, for this is the hour in which it is ‘wont to come.’

Then pausing a while, he sat, and directed himself towards a window, where the lords of Arundel, Northampton, and Doncaster, with some other lords and knights, sate, and spake as followeth: 'I thank God, of his infinite goodness, that he hath brought me to die in the light, and not in darkness;' (but by reason that the place where the lords, &c. sat, was some distance from the scaffold, that he perceived they could not well hear him, he said) 'I will strain my voice, for I would willingly have your honours hear me.'

But my lord of Arundel said, Nay, we will rather come down to the scaffold; which he and some others did. Where being come, he saluted them severally, and then began again to speak as followeth, viz.

'As I said, I thank God heartily, that he hath brought me into the light to die, and that he hath not suffered me to die in the dark prison of the Tower, where I have suffered a great deal of misery and cruel sickness; and I thank God that my fever hath not taken me at this time, as I prayed to God it might not. —Here are two main points of Suspicion that his majesty, as I hear, hath conceived against me. To resolve your lordships wherein his majesty cannot be satisfied, which I desire to clear, and to resolve your lordships of: One is, That his majesty hath been informed that I have often had Plots with France, and his majesty had good reason to induce him thereunto. One Reason that his majesty had to conjecture so was, that when I came back from Guiana, being come to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go in a bark to Rochel, which was, for that I would have made my peace before I had come to England. Another reason was, That upon my flight, I did intend to fly into France, for the saving of myself, having had some terror from above. A third reason, that his majesty had reason to suspect, was the French agent's coming to me; besides, it was reported that I had a Commission from the French king at my going forth: These are the Reasons that his majesty had, as I am informed, to suspect me.—But this I say, for a man to call God to witness to a falsehood at the hour of death, is far more grievous and impious, and that a man that so doth cannot have salvation, for he hath no time of repentance; then what shall I expect, that am going instantly to render up my account? I do therefore call God to witness, as I hope to be saved, and as I hope to see him in his kingdom, which I hope I shall within this quarter of an hour, I never had any Commission from the French king, nor never saw the French king's hand-writing in all my life; neither knew I that there was a French Agent, nor what he was, till I met him in my gallery at my lodging unlooked for: If I speak not true, O lord! let me never enter into thy kingdom.—The second Suspicion was, That his majesty had been informed, that I should speak dishonourably and disloyally of my sovereign; but my Accuser was a base Frenchman, and runnagate fellow, one that hath no dwelling, a kind of a chymical fellow, one that I knew to be perfidious; for being by him drawn into the action of fearing myself at Winchester, in which I confess my hand was toucht, he being sworn to secrecy over-night, revealed it the next morning.—But this I speak now, what have I to do with kings? I have nothing to do with them, neither do I fear them; I have only now to do with my God, in whose presence I stand; therefore to tell a lye, were it to gain the king's favour, were vain: Therefore, as I hope to be saved at the last Judgment-day, I never spoke dishonourably, disloyally, or dishonestly of his majesty in all my life; and therefore I cannot but think it strange that that Frenchman, being so base and mean a fellow, should be so far credited as he hath been.—I have dealt truly, as I hope to be saved, and I hope I shall be believed; I confess I did attempt to escape, I cannot excuse it, but it was only to save my life.—And I do likewise confess, that I did feign myself to be ill-disposed and sick at Salisbury; but I hope it was no sin, for the prophet David did make himself a fool, and suffered spittle to fall down upon his beard, to escape from the hands of his enemies, and it was not imputed unto him: so, what I did, I intended no ill, but to gain and prolong till his majesty came, hoping for some commiseration from him.—But I forgive this Frenchman and sir Lewis Steukley, with all my heart, for I have received the Sacrament this morning of Mr. Dean of Westminster, and I have forgiven all men; but that they are perfidious, I am bound in charity to speak, that all men may take heed of them.—Sir Lewis Steukley, my keeper and kinsman, hath affirmed that I should tell him, that my lord Carew, and my lord of Doncaster here, did advise me to escape; but I protest before God, I never told him any such thing, neither did the lords advise me to any such matter, neither is it likely that I should tell him any such thing of two privy counsellors; neither had I any reason to tell him or he to report it; for it is well known he left me 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 days together alone, to go whither I listed, whilst he rode himself about the country.—He further accused me, that I should shew him a Letter, whereby I did signify unto him that I would give him 10,000*l.* for my Escape; but God cast my soul into everlasting fire, if I made any such proffer of 10,000*l.* or 1000*l.* but indeed I shewed him a Letter, that if he would go with me, there should be order taken for his Debts when he was gone; neither had I 10,000*l.* to give him; for if I had had so much I could have made my peace better with it other way, than in giving it to Steukley.—Further, When I came to sir Edw. Pelham's house, who had been a follower of mine, and who gave me good entertainment; he gave out that I had there received some draue of poison, when I answered him that I feared no such thing, for I was well assured of them in the house, and therefore wisht him for no such thought. Now God forgive him, for I do, and I desire God to forgive him: I will not only say, God is a God of Revenge; but I desire God, to forgive him, as I do desire to be forgiven of God.

Then looking over his note of remembrance, Well, said he, thus far I have gone; a little more, a little more, and I will have done by and by.—It was told the king that I was brought per force into England, and that I did not intend to come again; but sir C. Parker, Mr. Tresham, Mr. Leake, and divers know how I was dealt withal by the common soldiers, which were 150 in number, who mutinied, and sent for me to come into the ship to them, for unto me they would not come, and there I was forced to take an Oath that I would not go into England till that they would have me; otherwise they would have cast me into the sea, and therewithal they drove me into my cabbin, and bent all their forces against me.—Now after I have taken this Oath, with wine and other things such as I had about me, I drew some of the chiefest to desist from their purposes; and at length I persuaded them to go into Ireland, which they were willing unto, and would have gone into the North parts of Ireland, which I dissuaded them from, and told them that they were Red-Shankes that inhabited there: and with much ado I persuaded them to go into the south parts of Ireland, promising them to get their pardons, and was forced to give them 125*l.* at Kinsale, to bring them home, otherwise I had never got from them.—I hear likewise there was a report that I meant not to go to Guiana at all, and that I knew not of any Mine, nor intended any such thing or matter, but only to get my liberty, which I had not the wit to keep. But I protest it was my full intent, and for Gold; for Gold, for the benefit of his majesty and myself, and of those that ventured and went with me, with the rest of my countrymen: but he that knew the head of the Mine would not discover it, when he saw my son was slain, but made away himself.” And then turning to the earl of Arundel, he said, ‘My Lord, being in the gallery of my ship, at my departure, I remember your honour took me by the hand, and said, You would request one thing of me, which was, That whether I made a good voyage or a bad, I should not fail, but to return again into England; which I then promised you, and gave you my faith I would; and so I have.’

To which my Lord answered, and said, It is true I do very well remember it, they were the very last words I spake unto you.

Another slander was raised of me, That I would have gone away from them, and left them at Guiana. But there were a great many worthy men that accompanied me always; as my serj. major, George Raleigh, and divers others, which knew my intent was nothing so.—Another opinion was held of me, that I carried with me to sea 16,000 piece and that was all the Voyage I intended, on to get money into my hands. As I shall answer it before God, I had not in all the world in my hands, or others to my use, either directly or indirectly, above a 100*l.*, where when I went I gave my wife 25*l.* thereof but the error thereof came, as I perceived, looking over the Scrivener’s Books, where they found the Bills of Adventure arising to great sum, and so raised that false report.—Only I will borrow a little time of Mr. Sheriff to speak of one thing, that doth make me bound to bleed to hear that such an imputation should be laid upon me; for it is said, that should be a persecutor of the death of the earl of Essex, and that I stood in a window over-against him when he suffered, and puff out tobacco in disdain of him. God I take my witness, I shed tears for him when he died and as I hope to look God in the face hereafter, my lord of Essex did not see my face when he suffered, for I was afar off in the Armory where I saw him, but he saw not me.—I confess indeed I was of a contrary faction but, I know my lord of Essex was a noble gentleman, and that it would be worse wisdom when he was gone; for I got the hatred of those which wished me well before, and those that set me against him, afterward set themselves against me, and were my greatest enemies, and my soul hath many times been grieved that I was not nearer him when he died because, as I understood afterwards, that he asked for me at his death, to have been recalled unto me.—And these be the matters which points I thought good to speak of, and I am now at this instant to render up an account to God; and I protest, as I shall appear before him, this that I have spoken is true, and I hope I shall be believed.’

Then a Proclamation being made, that a man should depart the scaffold, he prepared himself for death; giving away his hat, his cap with some money, to such as he knew, that stood near him. And then taking his leave of the lords, knights, gentlemen, and others of his acquaintance, and amongst the rest, taking his leave of my lord of Arundel, he thanked him for his company, and intreated him to desire the king that no scandalous Writing to defame him might be published after his death; saying further unto him, I have a long journey to go, and therefore I will take my leave.—And then putting off his doublet and gown, desired the head man to shew him the ax; which not being suddenly granted unto him, he said, I pray thee let me see it, dost thou think that I am afraid of it? So it being given unto him, he felt along upon the edge of it, and smiling, spake unto Mr. Sheriff, saying, ‘This is a sharp medicine but it is a physician that will cure all diseases.’

Then going to and fro upon the scaffold every side, he intreated the company to pray God to give him strength.

Then having ended his Speech, the executioner kneeled down and asked him forgiveness

the which laying his hand upon his shoulder he forgave him. Then being asked which way he would lay himself on the block, he made answer and said, So the heart be straight, it is no matter which way the head lieth: So laying his head on the block, his face being towards the east, the headsman throwing down his own cloak, because he would not spoil the prisoner's gown, he giving the headsman a sign when he should strike, by lifting up his hands, the Executioner struck off his head at two blows, his body never shrinking nor moving. His head was shewed on each side of the scaffold, and then put into a red leather bag, and his wrought velvet gown thrown over it, which was afterwards conveyed away in a mourning coach of his lady's.—He was 66 years old.

"This Conspiracy of sir Walter Raleigh's," writes Bishop Kennett in a note to Wilson's Life of James the first, "is variously represented by the Historians and Writers of that time, but acknowledged by all of them to have been a Riddle of State. I have seen most of the Accounts that have been published on this subject; and from them and from some sheets of Cecil earl of Salisbury, and a Manuscript of one Buck, who it seems was secretary to Chancellor Egerton, I take the case to have been this:—The earl of Salisbury and sir Walter Raleigh had been open and declared enemies of the unhappy earl of Essex, and the chief promoters of his ruin: Though king James could easily digest the death of queen Mary Stuart his mother, it is notoriously known he never heartily forgave any of Essex's enemies; which both Cecil and Raleigh were aware of, but took contrary measures to avoid his resentment. Raleigh trusting in the justice of his procedure in that affair, made no steps towards the making his peace with her successor, contenting himself with the favour of that mistress who raised him, which he enjoyed to her death. On the contrary, Cecil, by the mediation of Hume, that was afterwards earl of Dumbard, had been long before entirely reconciled to king James, had done him important services, and kept a correspondence with him, while queen Elizabeth was alive.—When king James came into England, Cecil was not only continued in his places, but, contrary to all men's expectations, was indeed made the first minister of state, and Raleigh neglected. The latter knowing the former to be at least equally concerned with him in the fall of Essex, his great mind could not bear the distinction made between them by their new master; and the rather, that Cecil acted the courtier, in frowning upon his old friend and acquaintance, and giving him fresh mortifications upon every occasion. In Buck's Manuscript there is mentioned a Memorial of Raleigh's to king James, wherein he reflects heavily upon Cecil in the matter of Essex, and vindicating himself, throws the whole blame upon the other. At the end of that Memorial, he lays open the conduct of Cecil and his father the lord Burleigh, in the matter of queen Mary Stuart, and, with a singular bitterness of style, not only vindicates the memory of queen Elizabeth, but lays the death of that unfortunate queen chiefly at the door of Cecil and his father; for which he appeals to Davison, then in prison, the man that had dispatched the Warrant for her Execution, contrary to queen Elizabeth's express command. All this had no influence on king James, and irritated Cecil the more against Raleigh; which helped to sour a temper that of itself was impatient of injuries, and for all his other excellent qualities, was not fitted for this reverse of fortune.—This brought him into the acquaintance and familiarity of other men, as discontented as himself, though of different religions and interests; and occasioned probably more discourses than one, of having recourse to foreign powers to mend their present fortunes. It is also not unlikely, that the lady Arabella's name might, upon these occasions, be mentioned by sir Walter Raleigh, as one that had a near title to the crown: but that he ever entered into any form or design of altering the established religion, (as was said at his Trial) no body then nor since did ever believe."

The eminent merits, high reputation, and uncommon fate of sir Walter Raleigh, together with the obscurity of the transactions concerning him, will justify the insertion of the following Articles which throw light on his interesting story:

TWO LETTERS of Sir Dudley Carleton (afterwards Viscount Dorchester) concerning Sir WALTER RALEIGH'S PLOT; inclosed in the following Letter from Mr. Dudley Carleton to Philip Lord Wharton.

[Extracted from the Hardwicke State Papers, vol. 1. p. 377.]

MY noble lord; The two letters inclosed are those, of which, when I told your lordship, you shewed yourself very desirous to have sight and therefore I have sent them to you. That Dudley Carleton, whose name you will find subscribed to them, was my uncle, who died secretary to his late majesty, who had likewise honoured him with the title of viscount Dorchester; and I suppose you knew him. He was, at the time he wrote them, secretary to my lord of Northumberland's father, and both an ear and eye witness of most that passed in the Arraignment and Execution at Winchester, in anno 1603. I wish they may serve your Lordship to such use as you desire; and if I could give you any farther light, I should be most ready to serve you, as being your Lordship's, &c.

DUDLEY CARLETON.

London,
Feb. 14th, 1651.

Sir Dudley Carleton, to Mr. John Chamberlain.

Sir; I was taking care how to send unto you, and little looked for so good a means as your man, who came to me this morning; and though he would in all haste be gone, I have stayed him this night, to have time to discourse unto you these tragical Proceedings. I was not present at the first or second Arraignment, wherein Brooke, Markham, Brookesby, Copley, and the two Priests were condemned, for practising the surprize of the king's Person, the taking of the Tower, the deposing of Counsellors, and proclaiming Liberty of Religion. They were all condemned upon their own Confessions, which were set down under their own hands, as Declarations; and compiled with such labour and care, to make the matter they undertook seem very feasible, as if they had feared they should not say enough to hang themselves. Pirra was acquitted, being only drawn in by the priests as an assistant, without knowing the purpose; yet had he gone the same way as the rest (as it is thought), save for a word the lord Cecil cast in the way as his cause was in handling, That the king's glory consisted as much in freeing the innocent, as condemning the guilty.

The Commissioners for this Trial were, the Lord Chamberlain, lord of Devon, lord Henry Howard, lord Cecil, lord Wotton, the Vice Chamberlain, the two Chief Justices, Justice Gawdy, and Warburton. Of the King's Council, none were employed in that, or the arraignment, but the Attorney (Coke,) Heals, and Philips; and in effect, none but the Attorney. Sir Walter Raleigh served for a whole act, and played all the parts himself. His cause was disjoined from the Priests, as being a practice only between himself and the lord Cobham,* to have brought in the Spaniard, to have raised Rebellion in the realm, by fastening money upon discontents, to have set up the lady Arabella, and to have tied her to certain conditions; as to have a perpetual peace with Spain; not to have bestowed herself in marriage but at the direction of the Spaniard; and to have granted Liberty of Religion. The Evidence against him, was only Cobham's Confession, which was judged sufficient to condemn him; and a Letter was produced, written by Cobham the day before, by which he accused Raleigh as the first practiser of the Treason betwixt them: which served to turn against him; though he shewed, to countervail this, a Letter written by Cobham, and delivered to him in the Tower, by which he was clearly acquitted. After Sentence given, his request was, to have his Answers related to the king, and pardon begged; of which, if there were no hope, then that Cobham might die first. He answered with that temper, wit, learning, courage and judgment, that save that it went with the hazard of his life, it was the happiest day that ever he spent. And so well he shifted all advantages that were taken against him, that were not fama multum gravior quam res, and an ill name half hanged, in the opinion of all men, he had been acquitted.—The two first that brought the news to the king, were Roger Ashton and a Scotchman; whereof one affirmed, That never any man spoke so well in times past, nor would do in the world to come; and the other said, That whereas when he saw him first, he was so led with the common hatred, that he would have gone a hundred miles to have seen him hanged, he would, ere he parted, have gone a thousand to have saved his life. In one word, never was man so hated, and so popular, in so short a time. It was thought the lords should have been arraigned on Tuesday last, but they were put off till Friday and Saturday; and had their trials apart before the Lord Chancellor (Ellesmere, as Lord Steward for both those days), eleven earls, nineteen barons. The duke<sup>o</sup>, the earl of Marr, and many Scottish lords, stood as spectators; and of our ladies, the greatest part, as the lady Nottingham, the lady Suffolk, and the lady Arabella, who heard herself much spoken of these days. But, the arraignment before, she was more particularly remembered, as by sir Walter Raleigh, for a woman, with whom he had no acquaintance, and one, whom, of all that he ever saw, he never liked; and by Serj. Hale, as one that had no more right to the crown than himself; and for any claim that he had to it, he utterly disavowed it. Cobham led the way on Friday, and made such a fasting day's piece of work of it, that he discredited the place to which he was called; never was seen so poor and abject a spirit. He heard his indictment with much fear and trembling, and would sometimes interrupt it, by forswearing what he thought to be wrongly inserted; so as, by his fashion, it was known ere he spake, what he would confess or deny. In his first answer, he said, he had changed his mind since he came to the bar; for whereas he came with an intention to have made his confession, without denying any thing, now seeing many things inserted in this indictment with which he could not be charged, being not able in one word to make distinction of many parts, he must plead to all not guilty. For any thing that belonged to the lady Arabella, he denied the whole accusation; only said, she had sought his friendship, and his brother Brooke had sought her's. For the other purposes, he said, he had hammered in his brains some such imaginations: but never had purpose to bring them to effect. Upon Raleigh, he exclaimed as one who had stirred him up to discontent, and thereby overthrown his fortunes. Against him he said, that he had once propounded to him a means for the Spaniard to invade England, which was, to bring down an army to the Groyne, under pretence to send them into the Low Countries, and land them at Milford Haven: that he had made himself a pensioner to Spain for 1500 crowns by the year, to give intelligence; and, for an earnest of his diligence, had already related to the Count D'Aremberg, the particularities of what passed in the states audiences at Greenwich. His brother's confession was read against him, wherein he accused him of a contract made with Aremberg for 500,000 crowns to bestow amongst discontents, whereof Raleigh was to have had 10,000, Grey as much, and Brooke 1000; the rest, as they should find fit men to bestow it on. He excepted against his brother as an incompetent accuser, baptizing him with the name of a viper; and laid to his charge (though far from the purpose) the getting of his wife's sister with child; in which it is thought he did young Coppinger some wrong.

A letter was produced which he wrote to Aremberg's for so much money; and Aremberg's answer, consenting for the furnishing of that sum. He then flew to his former retreat, that in this likewise he had no ill meaning, and excused Aremberg as one that meant only thereby to further the peace. When particularities were farther urged, that, in his intended travel, he meant to have gone into the Low Countries to the archduke; from thence into Savoy; so into Spain; then have returned by Jersey; and there to have met Raleigh, and to have brought some money from the well-spring where it was to be had, he confessed imaginations, but no purposes, and still laid the fault upon his own weaknesses, in that he suffered himself to be misled by Raleigh. Being asked of his two letters to different purposes, the one excusing, the other condemning Raleigh; he said, the last was true, but the other was drawn from him by device in the Tower, by young Harvey the lieutenant's son, whom Raleigh had corrupted, and carried intelligence betwixt them (for which he is there committed, and is likely to be arraigned at the King's-bench). Having thus accused all his friends, and so little excused himself, the peers were not long in deliberation what to judge; and after sentence of condemnation given, he begged a great while for life and favour, alleging his confession as a meritorious act. Grey, quite in another key, began with great assurances and alacrity: spake a long and eloquent speech, first to the lords, and then to the judges, and lastly to the king's council; and told them well of their charges, and spake effectually for himself. He held them the whole day, from eight in the morning till eight at night, in subtle traverses and scapes; but the evidence was too perspicuous, both by Brooke's and Markham's confessions, that he was acquainted with the surprize;* yet the lords were long ere they could all agree, and loth to come out with so hard censure against him. For though he had some heavy enemies, as his old antagonist, who was mute before his face, but spake within very unnotably against him; yet most of them strove with themselves, and would fain (as it seemed) have dispensed with their consciences to have shewed him favour. At the pronouncing of the opinion of the lords, and the demand whether he had any thing to say why sentence of death should not be given against him, these only were his words, "I have nothing to say;" there he paused long; "and yet a word of Tacitus comes in my mind, Non eadem omnibus decora: the house of the Wiltons had spent many lives in their prince's service, and Grey cannot beg his. God send the king a long and prosperous reign, and to your lordships all honour."

After sentence given, he only desired to have one Travers,* a divine, sent for to come to him, if he might live two days. If he were to die before that, then he might have one Field, whom he thought to be near. There was great compassion had of this gallant young lord; for so clear and fiery a spirit had not been seen by any that had been present at like trials. Yet the Lord Steward condemned his manner much, terming it Lucifer's pride, and preached much humiliation; and the judges liked him as little, because he disputed with them against their laws. We cannot yet judge what will become of him or the rest; for all are not like to go one way. Cobham is of the surest side, for he is thought least dangerous, and the lord Cecil undertakes to be his friend. They say the priests shall lead the dance tomorrow; and Brooke next after: for he proves to be the knot that tied together the three conspiracies; the rest hang indifferent betwixt mercy and justice, wherein the king hath now subject to practise himself. The lords are most of them returned to the court. The Lord Chancellor and Treasurer remain here till Tuesday, to shut up the term. My lord goeth from hence to Petworth; but I pick quarrel to stay behind, to see an end of these matters.

I do call to mind a pretty secret, that the lady of Pembroke hath written to her son Philip, and charged him, of all her blessings, to employ his own credit, his friends, and all he can do, for Raleigh's pardon: and though she does little good, yet she is to be commended for doing her best, in shewing veteris vestigia flammæ. And thus being come round where I began, it is time to leave you, desiring you to excuse me to my cousin sir Rowland Litton, for not writing; and so you well may, for you have enough for yourself and all my kindred and friends, to make you all weary. Sir Walter Cope is in this town, and sir Hugh Beston likewise, who often asks for you as your friend, and therefore you are the more to lament that he is untimely come to a night-cap. Many marvel at his sudden breaking, but most ascribe it to a thought he took at a word which sir Walter Raleigh spoke at his examinations: who asked if sir Hugh Beston was not apprehended and tortured, because he was always of his chieftest council. I shall never end, unless I abruptly bid you farewell. From Winchester, the 27th

Sir: I know not when or how to send to you; yet here happening an accident worth your knowledge, I cannot but put it in record whilst the memory of it is fresh; and for the rest, stand to the venture. But because I have taken a time of good leisure, and it is likely this letter will take his leisure, ere it come at you; I may as well leap in where I left, when I wrote to you by your man, and proceed in an order by narration; since this was a part of the same play, and that other acts came betwixt, to make up a tragical comedy.

The two priests that led the way to the execution, were very bloodily handled; for they were both cut down alive; and Clarke, to whom more favour was intended, had the worse luck; for he both strove to help himself, and spake after he was cut down. They died boldly both; and Watson (as he would have it seem) willing: wishing he had more lives to spend, and one to lose, for every man he had by his treachery drawn into this treason. Clarke stood somewhat upon his justification, and thought he had hard measure: but imputed it to his function, and therefore thought his death meritorious, as a kind of martyrdom. Their quarters were set on Winchester gates, and their heads on the first Tower of the castle. Brooke was beheaded in the castle-yard, on Monday last; and to double his grief, had Sr. Croftes in his sight, from the scaffold, which drove him first to discontent*. There was no greater assembly than I have seen at ordinary executions; nor no man of quality more than the lord of Arundel and young Somerset; only the bishop of Chichester who was sent from the court two days before, to prepare him to his end, could not get loose from him; but, by Brooke's earnest entreaty was fain to accompany him to the scaffold, and serve for his ghostly father. He died constantly (and, to seeming, religiously); spake not much; but what he said was well and assured. He did somewhat extenuate his offences, both in the treasons, and the course of his life; naming these rather errors than capital crimes; and his former faults, sins; but not so heinous as they were traduced; which he referred to the God of truth and time to discover; and so left it, as if somewhat lay yet hid, which would one day appear for his justification. The bishop went from him to the lord Cobham; and at the same time, the bishop of Winchester was with Raleigh: both by express order from the king; as well to prepare them for their ends, as likewise to bring them to liberal confessions, and by that means reconcile the contradictions of the one's open accusation, and the other's peremp-tory denial. The bishop of Chichester had soon done what he came for, finding in Cobham a willingness to die, and readiness to die well; with purpose at his death to affirm as much as he had said against Raleigh; but the other bishop had more to do with his charge; for though, for his conscience, he found him well settled, and resolved to die a Christian and a good Protestant, for the point of confession, he found him so strait-laced, that he would yield to no part of Cobham's accusation; only the pension, he said, was once mentioned, but never proceeded in. Grey in the mean time, with his minister Field, having had the like summons for death, spent his time in great devotions; but with that careless regard of, that with which he was threatened, that he was observed neither to eat or sleep the worse, or be any ways distracted from his accustomed fashions. Markham was told he should likewise die: but by secret message from some friends at court, had still such hope given him, that he would not believe the worst news till the last day; and though he could be content to talk with the preacher which was assigned him, it was rather to pass time, than for any good purpose; for he was catholicly disposed; to think of death no way disposed. Whilst these men were so occupied at Winchester, there was no small doings about them at court, for life or death; some pushing at the wheel one way, some another. The lords of the council joined in opinion and advice to the king, now in the beginning of his reign to shew as well examples of mercy as severity, and to gain the title of Clemens, as well as Justus; but some others, led by their private spleen and passions, drew as hard the other way; and Patrick Galloway, in his sermon on Tuesday, preached so hotly against remissness and moderation of justice, in the head of justice, as if it were one of the seven deadly sins. The king held himself upright betwixt two waters; and first let the lords know, that since the law had passed upon the prisoners, and that they themselves had been their judges, it became not them to be petitioners for that, but rather to press for execution of their own ordinances; and to others, gave as good reasons, to let them know that he would go no whit the faster for their driving; but would be led as his own judgment and affections would move him; but seemed rather to lean to this side than the other, by the care he took to have the law take his course, and the execution hastened.

Warrants were signed, and sent to sir Benjamin Tichborne, on Wednesday last at night, for Markham, Grey, and Cobham, who in this order were to take their turns, as yesterday, being Friday, about ten of the clock. A fouler day could hardly have been picked out, or fitter for such a tragedy. Markham being brought to the scaffold, was much dismayed, and complained much of his hard hap, to be deluded with hopes, and brought to that place unprepared. One might see in his face the very picture of sorrow; but he seemed not to want resolution; for a napkin being offered by a friend that stood by, to cover his face, he threw it away, saying, he could look upon death without blushing. He took leave of some friends that stood near, and betook himself to his devotions, after his manner; and those ended, prepared himself to the block. The sheriff, in the mean time, was secretly withdrawn, by one John Gib, a Scotch groom of the bedchamber; whereupon the execution was stayed, and Markham left upon the scaffold to entertain his own thoughts, which, no doubt, were as melancholy as his countenance, sad and heavy. The sheriff, at his return, told him, that since he was so ill prepared, he should yet have two hours respite, so led him from the scaffold, without giving him any more comfort, and locked him into the great hall, to walk with prince Arthur. The lord Grey, whose turn was next, was led to the scaffold by a troop of the young courtiers, and was supported on both sides by two of his best friends; and coming in this equipage, had such gaiety and cheer in his countenance, that he seemed a dapper young bridegroom. At his first coming on the scaffold, he fell on his knees, and his preacher made a long prayer to the present purpose, which he seconded himself with one of his own making, which, for the phrase, was somewhat affected, and suited to his other speeches; but, for the fashion, expressed the fervency and zeal of a religious spirit. In his confession, he said, though God knew this fault of his was far from the greatest, yet he knew, and could but acknowledge his heart to be faulty; for which he asked pardon of the king; and thereupon entered into a long prayer for the king's good estate, which held us in the rain more than half an hour; but being come to a full point, the sheriff stayed him, and said, he had received orders from the king, to change the order of the execution, and that the lord Cobham was to go before him; whereupon he was likewise led to prince Arthur's hall, and his going away seemed more strange unto him, than his coming thither; for he had no more hope given him, than of an hour's respite; neither could any man yet dive into the mystery of this strange proceeding.

The lord Cobham, who was now to play his part, and by his former actions promised nothing but matiere pour rire, did much cozen the world; for he came to the scaffold with good assurance, and contempt of death. He said some short prayers after his minister, and so outprayed the company that helped to pray with him, that a stander-by said, 'He had a good mouth in a cry, but was nothing single.' Some few words he used, to express his sorrow for his offence to the king, and craved pardon of him and the world; for sir Walter Raleigh, he took it, upon the hope of his soul's resurrection, that what he had said of him was true; and with those words would have taken a short farewell of the world, with that constancy and boldness, that we might see by him, it is an easier matter to die well than live well.

He was stayed by the sheriff, and told, that there resteth yet somewhat else to be done; for that he was to be confronted with some other of the prisoners, but named none. So as Grey and Markham being brought back to the scaffold, as they then were, but nothing acquainted with what had passed, no more than the lookers-on with what should follow, looked strange one upon the other like men beheaded, and met again in the other world. Now all the actors being together on the stage (as use is at the end of a play,) the sheriff made a short speech unto them, by way of the interrogatory of the heinousness of their offences, the justness of their trials, their lawful condemnation, and due execution there to be performed; to all which they assented; then, saith the sheriff, see the mercy of your prince, who, of himself, hath sent hither to countermand, and given you your lives. There was then no need to beg a plaudite of the audience, for it was given with such hues and cries, that it went from the castle into the town, and there began afresh, as if there had been some such like accident. And this experience was made of the difference of examples of justice and mercy; that in this last, no man could cry loud enough, 'God save the King;' and at the holding up of Brookes's head, when the executioner began the same cry, he was not seconded by the voice of any one man, but the sheriff. You must think, if the spectators were so glad, the actors were not sorry; for even those that went best resolved to death, were glad of life. Cobham vowed openly, if ever he proved traitor again, never so much as to beg his life; and Grey, that since he had his life, without begging, he would deserve it. Markham returned with a merrier countenance than he came to the scaffold. Raleigh, you must think (who had a window opened that way), had hammers working in his head, to beat out the meaning of this stratagem. His turn was to come on Monday next; but the king has pardoned him with the rest, and confined him with the two lords to the Tower of London, there to remain during pleasure. Markham, Brooksby and Copley, are to be banished the realm. This resolution was taken by the king without man's help, and no man can rob him of the praise of yesterday's action; for the lords knew no other, but that execution was to go forward, till the very hour it should be performed; and then, calling them before him, he told them, how much he had been troubled to resolve in this business; for to execute Grey, who was a noble young, spirited fellow, and save Cobham, who was as base and unworthy, were a manner of injustice. To save Grey, who was of a proud insolent nature, and execute Cobham, who had shewed great tokens of humility and repentance, were as great a solecism; and so went on with Plutarch's comparisons in the rest, till travelling in contrarieties, but holding the conclusion in so different balance, that the lords knew not what to look for till the end came out, and therefore I have saved them all. The miracle was as great there, as with us at Winchester, and it took like effect; for the applause that began about the king went from thence into the presence, and so round about the court.

I send you a copy of the king's letter, which was privately written the Wednesday night, and the messenger dispatched the Thursday about noon. But one thing had like to have marred the play; for the letter was closed, and delivered him unsigned; which the king remembered himself, and called for him back again.

And at Winchester, there was another cross adventure; for John Gib could not get so near the scaffold, that he could speak to the sheriff, but was thrust out amongst the boys, and was fain to call out to sir James Hayes, or else Markham might have lost his neck. There were other by-passages, if I could readily call them to mind; but here is enough already for un petit mot de lettre, and therefore I bid you heartily farewell. From Salisbury this 11th of Dec. 1603. Your's, &c.

DUDLEY CARLTON.

Account of the GUIANA EXPEDITION; with a Character of Sir Walter Raleigh.

To Sir James Crofts, kt. at St. Osith.

"THE news that keeps greatest noise here now, is the return of sir Walter Raleigh from his Mine of Gold in Guiana, the South parts of America, which at first was like to be such a hopeful boon Voyage, but it seems that that golden mine is proved a mere Chimera, an imaginarily airy mine; and indeed his majesty had never any other conceit of it: But what will not one in captivity (as sir Walter was) promise, to regain his freedom? who would not promise; not only mines, but mountains of gold, for liberty? and it is pity such a knowing well-weighted knight had not had a better fortune; for the Destiny (I mean that brave ship which he built himself of that name, that carried him thither) is like to prove a Fatal Destiny to him, and to some of the rest of those gallant Adventurers which contributed for the setting forth of 13 ships more, who were most of them his kinsmen and younger brothers, being led into the said Expedition by a general conceit the world had of the wisdom of sir Walter Raleigh; and many of these are like to make shipwreck of their estates by this Voyage. Sir Walter landed at Plymouth, whence he thought to make an escape; and some say he hath tampered with his body by physic, to make him look sickly, that he may be the more pitied, and permitted to lie in his own house. Count Gondamar the Spanish ambassador speaks high language; and sending lately to desire audience of his majesty, he said he had but one word to tell him; his majesty wondering what might be delivered in one word when he came before him, he said only, 'Pirates, Pirates, Pirates,' and so departed.

It is true that he protested against this Voyage before, and that it could not be but for some predatory design: And that if it be as I hear, I fear it will go very ill with sir Walter, and that Gondamar will never give him over, till he hath his head off his shoulders; which may quickly be done, without any new Arraignment, by virtue of the old Sentence that lies still dormant against him, which he could never get off by Pardon, notwithstanding that he mainly laboured in it before he went: but his majesty could never be brought to it, for he said he would keep this as a curb to hold him within the bounds of his commission, and the good behaviour.

Gondamar cries out, that he hath broke the sacred Peace betwixt the two kingdoms; That he hath fired and plundered Santo Thoma, a colony the Spaniards had planted with so much blood, near under the line, which made it prove such hot service unto him, and where, besides others, he lost his eldest son in the action: And could they have preserved the magazine of Tobacco only, besides other things in that town, something might have been had to countervail the charge of the Voyage. Gondamar allegeth farther, That the enterprize of the Mine failing, he propounded to the rest of his fleet to go and intercept some of the plate Gallies, with other designs which would have drawn after them apparent acts of hostility; and so demands justice: besides other disasters which fell out upon the dashing of the first design, captain Remish, who was the main instrument for discovery of the mine, pistoled himself in a desperate mood of discontent in his cabin, in the Convertine.

This return of sir Walter Raleigh from Guiana, puts me in mind of a facetious tale I read lately in Italian (for I have a little of that language already) how Alphonso king of Naples sent a Moor, who had been his captive a long time, to Barbary, with a considerable sum of money to buy horses, and return by such a time. Now there was about the king a kind of Bulboon or jester, who had a table-book or Journal, wherein he was used to register any absurdity, or imperiannce, or merry passage that happened upon the court. That day the Moor was dispatched for Barbary, the said Jester waiting upon the king at supper, the king called for his Journal, and asked what he had observed that day; thereupon he produced his Table-Book, and among other things, he read how Alphonso king of Naples had sent Beltrame the Moor, who had been a long time his prisoner, to Morocco (his own country) with so many thousand crowns, to buy horses. The king asked him why he inserted that: Because, said he, I think he will never come back to be a prisoner again, and so you have lost both man and money. But if he do come, then your Jest is marred, quoth the king: 'No sir: for if he return I will blot out your name, and put him in for a fool.' The application is easy and obvious: But the world wonders extremely, that so great a wise man as sir Walter Raleigh would return to cast himself upon so inevitable a rock, as I fear he will; and much more, that such choice men, and so great a power of ships, should all come home and do nothing."

"Sir: Whereas you seem to except against something in one letter that reflects upon sir Walter Raleigh's voyage to Guiana, because I term the gold mine he went to discover, an airy and suppositious mine, and so infer, that it toucheth his honour; truly, sir, I will deal clearly with you in that point, that I never harboured in my brain the least thought to expose to the world any thing that might prejudice, much less traduce in the least degree that could be that rare renowned knight, whose fame shall contend in longevity with this Island itself, yea, with that great World which he historiseth so gallantly. I was a youth about the town when he undertook that expedition, and I remember most men suspected that Mine then to be but an imaginary politic thing; but at his return; and missing of the enterprize, these suspicions turned in most to real beliefs that it was no other. And K. James, in that Declaration which he commanded to be printed and published afterwards, touching the circumstance of this action, (upon which my letter it grounded, and which I have still by me) terms it no less. And if we may not give faith to such public regal instruments, what shall we credit? Besides, there goes another printed kind of remonstrance annexed to that declaration which intimates as much: and there is a worthy captain in this town, who was co-adventurer in that expedition, who upon the storming of St. Thomas, heard young Mr. Raleigh encouraging his men in these words: Come on, my noble hearts, this is the mine we come for; and they who think there is any other are fools. Add hereunto, that sir Richard Baker, in his last historical collections, intimates so much. Therefore, it was far from being any opinion broached by myself, or bottomed upon weak grounds; for I was careful of nothing more, than that those letters being to breath open air, should relate nothing but what should be derived from good fountains. And truly, sir, touching that apology of sir Walter Raleigh's you write of, I never saw it, I am very sorry I did not; for it had let in more light upon me of the carriage of that great action, and then you might have been assured, that I would have done that noble knight all the right that could be.

"But, sir, the several arguments that you urge in your Letters are of that strength, I confess, that they are able to rectify any indifferent man in this point, and induce him to believe that it was no chimera, but a real mine; for you write of divers pieces of gold brought thence by sir Walter himself, and capt. Kemys, and of some nugots that were found in the governor's closet at St. Thomas's, with divers crucibles, and other refining instruments: yet, under favour, that might be, and the benefit not countervail the charge, for the richest mines that the king of Spain hath upon the whole continent of America, which are the mines of Potosi, yield him but six in the hundred, all expences defrayed. You write how K. James sent privately to sir Walter, being yet in the Tower, to intreat and command him, that he would impart his whole design to him under his hand, promising upon the word of a king to keep it secret; which being done accordingly by sir Walter Raleigh, that very original paper was found in the said Spanish governor's closet at St. Thomas's: whereat, as you have just cause to wonder, and admire the activeness of the Spanish agents about our court at that time, so I wonder no less at the miscarriage of some of his late majesty's ministers, who notwithstanding that he had passed his royal word to the contrary, yet they did help Count Gondomar to that paper; so that the reproach lieth more upon the English than the Spanish ministers in this particular. Whereas you alledge, that the dangerous sickness of sir Walter being arrived near the place, and the death of (that rare spark of courage) your brother, upon the first landing, with other circumstances, discouraged capt. Kemys from discovering the mine, but would reserve it for another time; I am content to give as much credit to this as any man can; as also that sir Walter, if the rest of the fleet, according to his earnest motion, had gone with him to revictual in Virginia, (a country where he had reason to be welcome unto, being of his own discovery) he had a purpose to return to Guiana the spring following to pursue his first design. I am also very willing to believe that it cost sir W. Raleigh much more to put himself in equipage for that long intended Voyage, than would have paid for his liberty, if he had gone about to purchase it for reward of money at home; though I am not ignorant that many of the co-adventurers made large contributions, and the fortunes of some of them suffer for it at this very day. But although Gondomar, as my letter mentions, calls sir Walter Pirate, I for my part am far from thinking so; because, as you give an unanswerable reason, the plundering of St. Thomas was an act done beyond the equator, where the articles of peace betwixt the two kings do not extend. Yet, under favour, though he broke not the peace, he was said to break his patent by exceeding the bounds of his commission, as the foresaid declaration relates: For K. James had made strong promises to Count Gondomar, that this fleet should commit no outrages upon the king of Spain's subjects by land, unless they began first; and I believe that was the main cause of his death, though I think if they had proceeded that way against him in a legal course of trial, he might have defended himself well enough.

great catholic master to have been begged for at the church-doors by friars, as he was once brought in the latter end of queen Elizabeth's days: I believe it had much damnified him, and interrupted him in the possession of his West-Indies, but not brought him, under favour, to so low an ebb. I have observed, that it is an ordinary thing in your popish countries, for princes to borrow from the altar, when they are reduced to any straits; for they say, The riches of the church are to serve as anchors in time of a storm. Divers of our kings have done worse, by pawning their plate and jewels. Whereas my letter makes mention that sir W. Raleigh mainly laboured for his pardon before he went, but could not compass it; this is also a passage in the foresaid printed relation: But I could have wished with all my heart he had obtained it; for I believe, that neither the transgression of his commission, nor any thing that he did beyond the Line, could have shortened the line of his life otherwise; but in all probability we might have been happy in him to this very day, having such an heroic heart as he had, and other rare helps, by his great knowledge, for the preservation of health. I believe without any scruple what you write, that sir Wm. St. Geon made an overture to him of procuring his pardon for 1500*l.* but whether he could have effected it, I doubt a little, when he had come to negotiate it really. But I extremely wonder how that old sentence which had lain dormant above sixteen years against sir W. Raleigh, could have been made use of to take off his head afterwards, considering that the Lord Chancellor Verulam, as you write, told him positively (as sir Walter was acquainting him with that proffer of sir Wm. St. Geon for a pecuniary pardon) in these words, Sir, the knee-timber of your voyage is money; spare your purse in this particular, for upon my life you have a sufficient pardon for all that is passed already, the king having under his broad-seal made you admiral of your fleet, and given you power of the martial law over your officers and soldiers. One would think that by this royal patent, which gave him power of life and death over the king's liege people, sir W. Raleigh should become rectus in curia, and free from all old convictions. But, sir, to tell you the plain truth, count Gondomar at that time had a great stroke in our court, because there was more than a mere overture of a match with Spain; which makes me apt to believe, that that great wise knight being such an anti-Spaniard, was made a sacrifice to advance the matrimonial treaty. But I must needs wonder, as you justly do, that one and the same man should be condemned for being a friend to the Spaniard, (which was the ground of his first condemnation) and afterwards lose his head for being their enemy by the same sentence. Touching his return, I must confess I was utterly ignorant that those two noble earls, Thomas of Arundel, and William of Pembroke, were engaged for him in this particular; nor doth the printed relation make any mention of them at all: Therefore I must say, that envy herself must pronounce that return of his, for the acquitting of his fiduciary pledges, to be a most noble act; and waving that of king Alphonso's Moor, I may more properly compare it to the act of that famous Roman commander, Regulus, as I take it, who to keep his promise and faith, returned to his enemies where he had been prisoner, though he knew he went to an inevitable death. But well did that faithless cunning knight, who betrayed sir W. Raleigh in his intended escape, being come a-shore, fall to that contemptible end, as to die a poor distracted beggar in the isle of Lundy, having for a bag of money falsified his faith, confirmed by the tie of the holy sacrament, as you write; as also before the year came about, to be found clipping the same coin in the king's own house at Whitehall, which he had received as a reward for his perfidiousness; for which being condemned to be hanged, he was driven to sell himself to his shirt, to purchase his pardon of two knights.

"And now, sir, let that glorious and gallant cavalier sir W. Raleigh (who lived long enough for his own honour, though not for his country, as it was said of a Roman consul) rest quietly in his grave, and his virtues live in his posterity, as I find they do strongly, and very eminently in you. I have heard his enemies confess that he was one of the weightiest and wisest men that this island ever bred. Mr. Nath. Carpenter, a learned and judicious author, was not in the wrong when he gave this discreet character of him: 'Who hath not known or read of this prodigy of wit and fortune, sir Walter Raleigh, a man unfortunate in nothing else but in the greatness of his wit and advancement, whose eminent worth was such both in domestic policy, foreign expeditions, and discoveries in arts and literature, both practick and contemplative, that it might seem at once to conquer example and imitation!'"

75. The Trial of Sir GRIFFIN MARKHAM, knt. Sir EDWARD PARHAM, knt. GEORGE BROOKE, esq. BARTHOLOMEW BROOKESBY, esq. ANTHONY COPLEY, WILLIAM WATSON, Priest; WILLIAM CLARKE, Priest, for High Treason, at Winchester: 1 JAC. I. Nov. 15, A. D. 1603. [From a MS. in the Bodleian Library, Rotulæ in Archivo. A. 3033. 44. 8.]

THE Commissioners were, the earl of Suffolk, Lord-Chamberlain, Charles earl of Devonshire, Henry lord Howard, Robert lord Cecil, Secretary; Edward lord Wotton, Comptroller; John Staunpe, Knight and Chamberlain; Lord-Chief-Justice of England, Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, Justice Gawdy, Justice Walmedey, Justice Warburton, sir William Wade, knight.

On Tuesday the 15th of November, were arraigned at Winchester, George Brooke, esq. sir Griffin Markham, knight, Bartholomew Brookesby, esq. Anthony Copley, gent. Wm. Watson, priest; Wm. Clarke, priest, and sir Edward Parham, knt.

For consulting with the lord Gray and others, traitorously to surprize the king and young prince at Greenwich, to carry them to the Tower guarded with some, that after the slaughter of many of the guards, should put on the guards coats, and so bring them, sending the Lord-Admiral before to signify the distress where the king was, and escape be made by the guards from Greenwich; and therefore desired to be taken in there for more safety. Which, if they could have effected, the treasures and jewels in the Tower should serve the turn for the effecting of their further purposes; that some of those of the privy-council, viz. the Lord-Chancellor, treasurer Cecil, Chief-Justice, should be removed and cut off: and Mr. Watson should be chancellor, Brooke lord treasurer, and Markham secretary; Gray lord marshal and master of the horse, if the now master of the horse were otherwise preferred; but for the lord-chief-justice no man named. If their project for bringing them to the Tower failed, then to convey the king to Dover, where George Brooke presumed upon his interest with Thomas Vands; but Mr. Attorney justified his assurance of the lord Cobham. In one of these places they meant to have kept the king for the space of three months, and at their first entrance, they should require three things. 1. A general pardon of all their purposes and intentions against the king and prince. 2. The king should yield to a toleration of religion; with an equality of all counsellors and other officers, as well papists as protestants, within his court or otherwise. 3. That he should remove and cut off the fore-mentioned counsellors, and others who should be thought to hinder this designment, for which purpose Watson named Veale, alias Cole, to alledge sufficient matter against them.—And for the better effecting of this their purpose, Watson had devised under writing an oath should be administered for the preservation of the king's person, for the advancement of the catholic religion, and for the concealing of all secrets that should be revealed unto them. That all the actions should be proceeded withal in the king's name, and they meant to send for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, that the king would speak with them: whom they meant to keep in safe custody, till they had delivered hostages to them not to withstand their assignments, and to furnish them with all such necessaries as they should require from them. Watson was the villainous hatcher of these Treasons; and Brooke, upon the learning of them, was as eager a prosecutor; and the lord Gray more eager and violent than he, purposing to make a suit to the king for carrying over a regiment for the relief of Ostend, which he would have ready for the defence of his own person in this action, fearing the greatness of the catholic forces according to the promises of George Brooke, Markham and Watson, and knowing not how he might be dealt withal amongst them.

Mr. George Brooke said little or nothing in his own defence, only he made a ridiculous argument or two in the beginning: viz. that, that only could be the judge, and examiner of any action, which was the rule of the action; but the Common Law was not the rule of the action, ergo, it could not be judge or ruler of the action: and therefore appealed to the person of the king. 2. That the Commissioners or Common Law had no authority over them; because it is a maxim in the law, ejus esse condemnare, cujus est absolere: but the Common Law could not absolve him, being guilty, therefore could not condemn him.

Mr. Attorney to this would have answered particularly, but was by the Commissioners and Judges willed to reduce himself to his own element.

Lord Henry Howard undertaking to have answered him, my L. C. Justice told him, that the king, by reason of his many causes, had many under him to execute the law of justice; but he kept in his own hands the key of mercy, either to bind or loose the proceedings, as in his own princely wisdom he should think fit.

Therefore said Mr. Attorney, you, Mr. Brooke, professing yourself to be learned, cannot be ignorant that both your ancestors have been, and you must be liable and subject yourself to the trial of the law of this nation, wherein you were born, and under which you live, & ignorantia juris non excusat. These treasons were termed by the lord Cobham 'The Bye,' as Mr. George Brooke confessed to Watson and the lord Gray; but, said he, Walter Raleigh* and I are chanced at the Main. Whereupon Mr. Attorney gave a touch of the Treasons of the lord Cobham and Raleigh, who had procured from Aremberg five or 600,000 crowns, to be disposed by the lord Cobham, who should therewith raise forces for the extirpation of the King and his Cubbes, and putting both

* Sir John Hawles (Solicitor-General temp. Will. 3.) in his reply to sir Bart. Shower's "Magistracy and Government of England vindicated, &c." pag. 32, says, the king came to London in May, and in July following was the pretended plot discovered; and in November following, the pretended delinquents were tried at Winchester, together with Watson and Clarke. Their Accusations were in general, 1. To set the Crown on the lady Arabella's head, and to seize the king. 2. To have a toleration of Religion. 3. To procure Aid and assistance from foreign princes. 4. To turn out of court such as they disliked, and place themselves in offices.—Of these the first Article is Treason; what crimes the rest are, is doubtful. What of them was proved against the lords Cobham and Gray, Watson and Clarke, or how their Trials were managed, doth not appear: but sir Walter Raleigh's Trial does appear, and is much like the lord Russel's, and therefore of some circumstances of it, I think, it is fit to take notice. Instead of Consults, &c. in the lord Russel's Trial, the cant words of the surprizing the Bye, and the Main, were made use of in sir Walter's, interpretable as the Council thought fit; at least it was astonishing to the Jury, which was all that was designed by the Council, and fatal to the prisoners. I have no mind to run through all the ramble of sir Walter Raleigh's Trial, as it is printed before his History of the World, because the parallel is too exact, and sticks too close to the memory of persons gone: only I will say, That if sir Walter Raleigh was guilty of the thing he was accused of by the Witnesses, though the accusation did not amount to a legal proof, it was High-Treason; but if the lord Russel was guilty of the thing he was accused of, he was not guilty of High-Treason.—And the same author, says, p. 35, "I think it is plain at this day, that of sir Walter Raleigh's is thought a sham Plot; what the lord Russel's is thought, let the author say, I am loath to enumerate all, but if any person will give himself the trouble of reading and comparing the Trial of the lord Russel with that of sir Walter Raleigh, they will find them exactly parallel in a number of other particulars."

Scotland and England in combustion; and so upon Cobham's return out of Spain, to meet Raleigh at the isle of Jersey, and so to put on foot both titles, both within and without the land.

Mr. George Brooke, after his first arguments, spake little or nothing for himself, more than his own Confession led him otherwhiles to excuse or qualify his own offence; only he gave cast of a Letter, which, he said, he received from his majesty, wherein he had liberty and authority to deal in the sounding out of these practices; but neither at any time before nor at his Arraignment, could shew the said letter. And the king being by some of the Lords Commissioners questioned withal on that point, requireth his Letter to be produced, and denieth he wrote any such letter.

Sir Griffin Markham answered exceeding well, and truly to all things; denying nothing for his fault of Treason; but that he deserved death upon the persuasion of Watson, by whom he was misled, and assured that the king before his coronation was not an actual, but a political king: only he desired to avoid the imputation of effusion of blood in that enterprize, and (if it were possible) the brand of a Traitor for his house and posterity, protesting how careless he was of his own life, which he desired to be exposed to any hazard or sacrifice (though it was never so desperate;) which if the king would not (in mercy) yield him, yet he desired their lordships to be intercessors, that he might die under the axe, and not by the halter.

Watson spake very absurdly and deceivingly, without grace, or utterance, or good deliverance; which (added to his foresaid villainy) made him more odious and contemptible to all the hearers.

Clarke, the other Priest (an excellent nimble-tongued fellow), of good speech, more honest in the carriage of the business, of an excellent wit and memory, boldly, and in well-bebecoming terms, uttering his mind, not unwilling to die, but desireth to avoid the imputation of a traitor.

Copley, a man of a whining speech, but a shrewd invention and resolution.

Brookesby drawn in merely by Watson to take the Oath before-mentioned, for some of the particularities, as the bringing the king to the Tower for the advancement of Religion; but spake with nobody to incite them to the business nor came himself according to his time appointed by Watson, the 23rd or 24th of June, but at that instant attended upon the queen.

Sir Edward Parham was also by that villain Watson dealt withal after he had tendered him the oath to this purpose: that he understood the lord Gray meant with forces to set upon the king, and to surprize him, that against that time, whether he would not draw his sword against the lord Gray with the King's servants and friends? And if the king's servants were discomfited, whether with the rest of the Catholics he would not encounter the lord Gray, and if he could bring him to the Tower for his relief and the advancement of the Catholic religion?

Parham told him, that he would so, if he was persuaded that his intendment of the lord Gray were true, which at that time Watson could not assure him of; for he did but hear of so much: but said he, when I have better assurance thereof, which will be within these three days, you shall further hear of me. He staying the time, Watson came not, and so Parham's proceedings went no further: but being urged in the point for bringing the king to the Tower, for the advancement of the Catholic religion, he said, he made no doubt, but that he with others, adventuring their lives for the rescuing the king from the lord Gray, and bringing him for his safety to the Tower; this then would not but merit some grace from the king, for the advancement of the Catholic religion.

Sir Francis Darcy being Foreman of the Jury, and excellently commended for this day's carriage and behaviour, made two or three doubts concerning sir Edward Parham's Case, and received resolution from the Bench in some points, and the rest left to his conscience and understanding, went with the rest of the Jury, and found all Guilty, saving Parham, and so he was discharged; and upon the rest Sentence of death was pronounced by the Lord-Chief-Justice.

The Copie of a LETTER written from master T. M. neere Salisbury, to Master H. A. at London, concerning the Proceeding at Winchester; where the late lord Cobham, lord Gray, and sir Griffin Markham, all attainted of his Treason, were ready to be executed, on Friday the 9th of Dec. 1603. At which time his majesties Warrant, all written with his own hand, (whereof the true Copie is here annexed) was deliuered to sir Benjamin Tichbourne, High Sheriffe of Hampshire, commanding him to suspend their execution till further order. Imprinted at London, 1603.

Sir; I have receiued a letter from you; by which I perceiue howe much you desire to be particularly enfourmed of the cause and manner of the stay of the late lord Cobham's, lord Gray's, and sir Griffin Markham's Execution, appointed at Winchester; wherein, although there are many better able to discourse at large of such an action then myselfe, yet I conceiue when you have perused this plaine and true relation, of that which all men there behelde that day, and many more since haue heard, from persons of the best qualitie and knowledge, you will thanke me more, for suffering the truth to shew itself vnclouted, then if I had laboured to haue deliuered you a tale well painted with curious words and fine phrases.— You must therefore vnderstand, that as soone as the Arraignments were passed at Winchester, his majesties Priue-counsel (to the number of 14 or 15, of which companie all of them had either bene tryers of the noblemen as their peers, or sitten as high Commissioners vpon the gentlemen) were called before his majestie (in his Priue-chamber, at Wilton, where he commanded them to deliuer (without respect to any person) the true narration onely; of the order in the Triall of these persons that had bene condemned by the lawe, and of the nature and degree of their offences, as had appeared in every one of them, by their seuerall answeres.—All which being cleerely and justly reported by them (each speaking in the hearing of the rest) his majestie for his part, used himself so grauely and reseruedly in all his speeches, as well to himselfes at that time, as also to all other persons after, in priuate or publique, as neither any of his priue-counsel, nobilitie, or any that attended nearest to his sacred person, durst presume to mediate for any, or so much as to enquire what should be the conclusion of this proceeding.

In the meane time, while the Court was full of variety of discourse, some speaking out of probabilitie, others arguing out of desire, what was like to be the fortune of all, or of any of these Offendours, his majestie hauing concluded onely in his own secret heart (which is the true oracle of grace and knowledge) in what manner to proceed; and that without asking counsel of any earthly person it pleased him to resolute betweene God and himselfe, that their execution should be stayed, euen at the instant when the axe should be layde to the trees rootes. For the secret and orderly carriage whereof, his majestie was careful to preuent all cause or colour of suspicion, of that judicious, royall, and vnexpected course which followed. And therefore, after the two Priests were executed, on Tuesday the 29th of Nov. and master George Brooke on Monday following, his majestie on the same day, being the 1st of Dec. signed three Warrants, for the execution of the late lord Cobham, lord Gray, and sir Griffin Markham, knt. with particular direction to the Sheriffe, to performe it on Friday after, before ten a clocke in the morning.—All these directions being now become notorious, both by the Writs of Execution (which passed vnder the great seale) and by the making readie the Scaffolds at Winchester, his majestie verry secretly (as now appeareth by the sequele) drewe himselfe into his cabinet, on Wednesday before the day of execution, and there priuately framed a Warrant, written all with his own hand, to the Sheriffe, by vertue whereof he countermaunded all the former directions, alledging the Reasons therein mentioned. Of which seeing no man's pen can so well expresse, as his owne, I send you the Copie verbatim, as I took it out of the originall, which many read in my cousin sir Benjamin Tichbourne's hand.

And now to come to the ordering of this business; among many other circumstances, it is verry remarkable, with what discretion and foresight that person was elected, which must be vsed in carriage of the Warrant. First, his majestie resolved it should be a Scottishman; being thereby like to be freest from particular dependencie vpon any nobleman, counsellors, or others, their friends or allies. Next hee resolved, to send a man of no extraordinarie ranke, because the standers-by should not obserue any alteration, nor the delinquents themselves should take any apprehension of such a man's being there at that time: this being his majesties speciall desire, that euery one of them (being generally brought vpon the scaffold) might quietly breath forth their last wordes, and true Confession of his secretest conscience. And so, to be short, his majestie made choice of Mr. John Gibb, a Scottishman, as aforesaid, a man that had never dealt with any counsellor, or other, for suite or businesse, but one that had, within short while after the king's first entrie, bene sent backe into Scotland, from whence he was but freshly arriued at Wilton, some fewe dayes before.

This party being by the king approoued for an ancient, trustie, and secret seruant, as a groome of his majesties bed-chamber, and a man, as is said before, little knowne, and less bound to any subject in England for any benefit, receiuing the Warrant secretly, on Thursday, from the king's owne hand, and telling his fellowes (who would otherwise haue missed him) that he must lie that night at Salisbury vpon some priuate businesse of his owne, he rode directly to Winchester, and there, keeping himselfe priuate all night, rose early in the morning on Friday, and went obscurely to the Castle-greene, where the people flocking in all the morning, as the time drewe neere, he put himselfe with the throng, close by the Scaffold, and there leaned till the Sheriffe brought up sir Griffin Markham to the place, who was the man appointed first to die.

There, the sayd sir Griffin Markham, hauing ended his prayer, and made himselfe readie to kneele downe, Mr. John Gibb finding it fit time, while the axe was preparing, to giue some secret notice of his charge, called to my cousin Tichbourne, the Sheriffe, to speake with him, and then deliuered him (priuately) his majesties Warrant, with further directions uerballly, how he should vse it.

Herevpon the Sheriffe, perceiuing fully his majesties intention, so warily and discreetly marshalled the matter, as hee onely called sir Griffin Markham vnto him on the Scaffold, and told him, that he must withdraw himselfe into the Hall, to be confronted (before his death) before those two lords, that were to follow him, about some points that did concern his majesties seruice; and so carrying Markham into the Hall, he left him there, and went vp hastily, for the lord Gray, to the Castle, who being likewise brought vp to the Scaffold, and suffered to powre out his prayers to God, at great length, and to make his last Confession, as he would answere it upon his soule, when he was readie to kneele downe, to receiue the stroke of death, Master Sheriffe caused him to stay, and told him that he must goe downe for a while into the Hall, where finding sir Griffin Markham, he willed him to tarry there till he returned.

Last of all, he went for the lord Cobham, who hauing also ended his deuotion to God, and making himselfe ready to receiue the same blow, the Sheriffe finding the time come to publish the king's mercie to the worlde, and to reueale his mysterie, he caused both the lord Gray and sir Griffin Markham to be brought backe to the Scaffold, and there, before them all three that were condemned, and in the hearing of all the company, notified his majesties Warrant, by which he was authorised to stay the Execution. Which strange and vnderdeserved grace and mercie, proceeding from a prince, so deeply wounded without cause, or colour of cause giuen by himselfe toward them in any thing, but meereley contrary (to both the lords especially) bred in the hearts, as well of the offenders as of the standers-by, such sundry passions, according to the diuers tempers of their minds, as to some that shall receiue those things by report, which others did behold with their eyes, my relation may rather seeme to be a description of some ancient History, expressed in a well-acted comedy, than that it was euer possible for any other man to represent, at one time, in a matter of this consequence, so many liuely figures of justice and mercy in a king, of terror and penitence in offenders, and of so great admiration and applause in all others, as appeared in this action, carried only and wholly by his majesties owne direction.

The lord Cobham (holding his hand to heaven) applauded this incomparable mercie of so gracious a soueraigne, aggrauating his owne fault, by comparing it with the princes clemencie, wishing confusion to all men aliue, that should euer thinke a thought against such a prince, as neither gaue cause of offence, nor tooke reuenge of ingratitude.

The lord Gray, finding in what measure this rare king had rewarded good for euill, and forborne to make him an example of discouragement and terror to all men that hereafter might attempt to break the bonds of loyalty, vpon the passions of any ambition, began to sob and weep for a great while, with most deep contrition, protesting now, that such was his zeale and desire to redeeme his fault by any meanes of satisfaction, as he could easily sacrifice his life, to prevent the losse of one finger of that royall hand, that had dealt so mercifully wih him, when he least looked for it.

Sir Griffin Markham (standing like a man astouished) did nothing but admire and pray. The people that were present witnessed, by infinite applause and shooting, the joy and comfort which they took in these wonderfull effects of grace and mercy, from a prince whome God had inspired with so many royall gifts for their conseruation, and would conserue for his owne glorie.

The crie being carried out of the Castle-gates into the town, was not onely sounded with acclamation of all sexes, qualities and affection, but the true report, diuulged since in all partes, hath bred in the woorst disposed mindes, such remorse of iniquitie, in the best such encouragement to loyaltie, and in those that are indifferent such feare to offend, and generally such affection to his majesties person, as perswades the whole world, that Nathan himselfe can neuer so far prevail with any, as to make them lift vp their hearts or hands against a prince, from whom they receive such true effects of justice and goodness.

To conclude, therefore, I haue now done my best to satisfy your desire, though I feele to my griefe, how short I come to my own wish; because I would haue expressed to the life, if it had been possible, both the matter and the forme of this proceeding; of both which the wisest men, that haue seene and vnderstoode all particular circumstances, are at the ende of their wits, to giue an absolute censure, whether of them both deserue greater recondemnation: this being most assured, that there is no record extant, wherein so great wisdome and vnderstandinge, so solid judgement, so perfect a resolution, to giue way to no request, or mediation: so inscrutable a heart, so royall and equal a tempered mercie, after so clear and publike justice, haue euer concurred so demonstratiuely as in this late action, wherein this blessed king hath not proceeded after the manner of men and of kings, Sed caelestis Iudicis, aeternique Regis more, whereof he shall be most assured to reape these lasting fruites, of being beloued and feared of all men, obeyed with comfort, and serued with continuall joy and admiration. And so forbearing to hold you any longer at this time, I end. From my house, neere Salisbury, the 15th of Dec. 1603. Your lovin cousin and friend, T. M.

AND now, because there was a general expectation of a parliament, suddenly to succeed, the Presbyterian party, that they might not be surprised, before they had their tackling about them, went about to get hands of the ministers to a petition, which they intended seasonably to present to the king and parliament. Mr. Arthur Hildersham, and Mr. Stephen Egerton, with some others were chosen, and chiefly intrusted to manage this important business. This was called The Millenary Petition,* as, One of a thousand, though indeed there were but seven hundred and fifty preachers hands set thereunto: but those all collected only out of five and twenty counties. more rotundity of the number, and grace of the matter, it passeth for a full thousand; which, no doubt, the collectors of the names (if so pleased) might easily have completed. I dare not guess what made them desist before their number was finished; whether they thought that these were enough to do the deed, and more were rather for ostentation than use; or, because disheartened by the intervening of the Hampton-court Conference, they thought, that these were even too many to petition for a denial. It is left as yet uncertain, whether this Conference was by the king's favour graciously tendered, or by the mediation of the lords of his council powerfully procured; or by the bishops, as confident of their cause, voluntarily proffered; or by the ministers importunity effectually obtained. Each opinion pretends to probability, but the last most likely. And, by what means soever this Conference was compassed, Hampton-court was the Place, the 14th of January the time, and the following Nuncios the persons which were employed therein.

FOR CONFORMITY.—Archbishop of Canterbury, Whitgift.—Bishops of London, Bancroft; Durham, Mathew; Winchester, Bilson; Worcester, Babington; St. David's, Rudd; Chester, Watson; Carlisle, Robinson; Peterborough, Dove.—Deans of the Chapel,* Christ-Church; Worcester; Westminster, Andrewes; St. Paul's, Overall; Chester, Barlow; Salisbury, Bridges; Windsor.—Drs. Field; King.

Moderator, king James.—Spectators, All the Lords of the Privy Council, whereas some at times, interposed a few words.—Place, A withdrawing room within the Privy chamber.

AGAINST CONFORMITY, Doctors Reynolds; Sparks.—Messrs. Knewstubs; Chaderton.—These remaining in a room without, were not called in the first day.

To omit all gratulatory preambles, as necessary, when spoken, as needless, if now repeated, we will present only the substance of this day's Conference, his majesty thus beginning it:

His Majesty. It is no novel device, but according to the example of all Christian princes, for kings to take the first course for the establishing of the Church, both in doctrine and policy. To this the very Heathen related in their proverb, a Jove principium, particularly in this land, king Henry the 8th, towards the end of his reign, altered much, king Edward the 6th more, queen Mary reversed all, and lastly, queen Elizabeth, (of famous memory) settled religion as now it standeth.—Herein I am happier than they, because they were fain to alter all things they found established, whereas I see yet no such cause to change, as confirm what I find well settled already. For blessed be God's gracious goodness, who hath brought me into the promised Land, where religion is purely professed, where I sit amongst grave, learned, and reverend men, not as before, elsewhere, a king without state, without honour, without order, where beardless boys would brave us to the face.—And I assure you, we have not called this Assembly for any innovation, for we acknowledge the government ecclesiastical, as now it is, to have been approved by manifold blessings from God himself, both for the increase of the Gospel, and with a most happy and glorious peace. Yet because nothing can be so absolutely ordered, but that something may be added thereunto, and corruption in any state (as in the body of man) will insensibly grow either through time or persons; and because we have received many complaints since our first entrance into this kingdom of many disorders, and much disobedience to the laws, with a great falling away to popery; our purpose therefore is, like a good physician, to examine and try the complaints, and fully to remove the occasions thereof, if scandalous; cure them, if dangerous; and take knowledge of them, if but frivolous, thereby to cast a sop into Cerberus's mouth, that he bark no more. For this cause we have called you bishops and deans in, severally by yourselves, not to be contented by the contrary opponents, that if any thing should be found meet to be redressed, it might be done without any visible alteration.—Particularly there be some special points wherein I desire to be satisfied, and which may be reduced to three heads: 1. Concerning the Book of Common-prayer, and divine service used in the Church. 2. Excommunication in ecclesiastical courts. 3. The providing of fit and able ministers for Ireland. In the Common-prayer Book I require satisfaction about three things:—First about Confirmation: For the very name thereof, if arguing a Confirming of Baptism, as if this sacrament without it were of no validity, is plainly blasphemous. For though at the first use thereof in the Church, it was thought necessary, that baptised infants, who formerly had answered by their patrini, should, when come to years of discretion, after their profession made by themselves, be confirmed with the blessing of the bishop, I abhor the abuse wherein it is made a sacrament, or corroboration to Baptism.—As for Absolution, I know not how it is used in our Church, but have heard it likened to the pope's pardons. There be indeed two kinds thereof from God: One general, all prayers and preaching importing an Absolution. The other particular to special parties, having committed a scandal, and repenting: otherwise, where Excommunication precedes not, in my judgment there needs no Absolution.—Private Baptism is the third thing wherein I would be satisfied in the Common-prayer: If called private from the place, I think it agreeable with the use of the primitive Church; but if termed private, that any, besides a lawful minister, may baptise, I utterly dislike it. [And here his Majesty grew somewhat earnest in his expressions, against the baptising by women and laicks.]

* Though all these Deans were summoned by letters, and present in the Presence-chamber; yet only five. (viz. of the Chapel; Westminster, Paul's, Chester and Salisbury) on the first day were called in.

I offer two things to be considered of: first the Matter, secondly the Persons. For the first, I would be satisfied, whether it be executed (as it is complained of to me) in light causes, and that too commonly, which causeth the undervaluing thereof. For the Persons, I would be resolved, why Chancellors and Commissaries, being laymen, should do it, and not rather the bishops themselves, or some minister of gravity and account, deputed by them for the more dignity to so high and weighty a censure. As for providing ministers for Ireland, I shall refer it in the last days Conference to a consultation.

Abp. of Canterbury. Confirmation hath been used in the Catholic Church ever since the Apostles; and it is a very untrue suggestion (if any have informed your highness) that the Church of England holds Baptism imperfect without it, as adding to the virtue and strength thereof.

Bishop of London. The authority of Confirmation depends not only on antiquity, and the practice of the Primitive Church, but is an Apostolical Institution, named in express words, Heb. vi. 2. and so did Mr. Calvin expound the very place, earnestly wishing the restitution thereof in the reformed Churches. [The bishop of Carlisle is said gravely and learnedly to have urged the same, and the bishop of Durham noted something out of S. Matthew for the imposition of hands on children.]

The conclusion was this, For the fuller explanation that we make Confirmation, neither a Sacrament nor a Corroboration thereof, their lordships should consider whether it might not without alteration (whereof his majesty was still very wary) be intitled an Examination with a Confirmation.

Abp. of C. As for the point of Absolution (wherein your majesty desires satisfaction) it is clear from all abuse or superstition, as it is used in our Church of England, as will appear on the reading both of the Confession and Absolution following it, in the beginning of the Communion book. [Here the king perused both, and returned]

His Maj. I like, and approve them, finding it to be very true what you say.

Bp. of Lond. It becometh us to deal plainly with your Majesty. There is also in the book a more particular and personal Absolution in the Visitation of the Sick. [Here the dean of the chapel turned unto it and read it.]

Bp. of Lond. Not only the confessions of Augusta, Boheme, and Saxon, retain and allow it, but Mr. Calvin also doth approve, both such a general, and such a private (for so he terms it) Confession and Absolution.

His Maj. I exceedingly well approve it, being an Apostolical and Godly Ordinance, given in the name of Christ, to one that desireth it, upon the clearing of his conscience.

The conclusion was this, That the bishops should consult, whether unto the rubric of the general Absolution, these words, Remission of Sins, might not be added for explanation sake.

Abp. of C. To the point of Private Baptism, the administration thereof by women and laypersons is not allowed in the practise of the Church, but enquired of, and censured by bishops in their visitations.

His Maj. The words of the Book cannot but intend a permission of women and private persons to baptise.

Bp. of Worc. The doubtful words may be pressed to that meaning; yet the Compilers of the Book did not so intend them, as appeareth by their contrary practice. But they propounded them ambiguously, because otherwise (perhaps) the Book would not (then) have passed the parliament.

Bp. of Lond. Those reverend men intended not by ambiguous terms to deceive any, but thereby intended a permission of private persons to baptise, in case of necessity. This is agreeable to the practice of the ancient Church, Act. ii. when three thousand being baptised in a day, (which for the Apostles alone to do, was [at the least] improbable) some being neither priests nor bishops, must be presumed employed therein, and some Fathers are of the same opinion. Here he spake much, and earnestly about the necessity of Baptism.

His Maj. That in the Acts was an act extraordinary, and done before a Church was settled and grounded, wherefore no sound reasoning thence to a Church established and flourishing. I maintain the necessity of Baptism, and always thought the place John iii. 5. "Except one be born again of water," &c. was meant thereof. It may seem strange to you, my lords, that I think you in England give too much to Baptism, seeing fourteen months ago in Scotland, I argued with my divines there, for attributing too little unto it; Inso-much that a pert minister asked me, if I thought Baptism so necessary, that, if omitted, the child should be damned. I answered, no: But if you, called to baptise a child, though privately, refuse to come, I think you shall be damned.—But, this necessity of Baptism I so understand, that it is necessary to be had, if lawfully to be had, that is, ministered by lawful ministers, by whom alone, and no private person in any case, it may be administered: though I utterly dislike all Re-baptization on those whom women or laics have baptised.

Bp. of Winch. To deny private persons to baptise in case of necessity, were to cross all antiquity, and the common practice of the Church, it being a rule agreed on amongst divines, that the minister is not of the essence of the sacrament.

His maj. Though he be not of the essence of the sacrament, yet is he of the essence of the right, and lawful ministry thereof, according to Christ's commission to his disciples, "Go preach and baptise," &c.

The result was this, To consult, whether in the rubric of Private Baptism, which leaves it indifferently to all, these words, Curate, or lawful Minister, may not be inserted.—For the point of Excommunication, his majesty propounded, whether in causes of lesser moment the name might not be altered, and the same censure retained. Secondly, whether in place thereof another coercion, equivalent thereunto, might not be invented? Which all sides easily yielded unto, as long and often desired; and so was the end of the first day's Conference.

On Monday Jan. 16, they all met in the same place, with all the deans and doctors above mentioned; (Patrick Galloway, minister of Perth in Scotland, admitted also to be there) And hopeful prince Henry sat on a stool by his father. The king made a pithy Speech to the same purpose which he made the first day, differing only in the conclusion thereof, being an address to the four opposers of conformity, there present, whom he understood the most grave, learned, and modest of the aggrieved sort, professing himself ready to hear at large what they could object, and willed them to begin.

Dr. Reyn. All things disliked or questioned, may be reduced to these four heads;

1. That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserved in purity, according to God's Word.—2. That good pastors might be planted in all Churches to preach the same.—3. That the Church-government might be sincerely ministered according to God's Word.—4. That the Book of Common-Prayer might be fitted to more increase of piety.—For the first, may your majesty be pleased, that the Book of Articles of Religion concluded on 1562, may be explained where obscure, enlarged where defective, viz. Whereas it is said, Arr. 16. "After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace." Those words may be explained with this or the like addition, Yet neither totally, nor finally. To which end it would do very well, if the nine orthodoxal Assertions, concluded on at Lambeth, might be inserted into the Book of Articles.—Secondly, whereas it is said in the 23rd article, "that it is not lawful for any in the congregation to preach, before he be lawfully called:" these words ought to be altered, because implying one out of the congregation may preach, though not lawfully called.—Thirdly, in the 25th article there seemeth a contradiction, one passage therein confessing Confirmation, to be a depraved imitation of the Apostles, and another grounding it on their example.

Bp. of Lond. May your majesty be pleased, that the ancient Canon may be remembered, Schismatici contra Episcopos non sunt audiendi. And, there is another Decree of a very ancient council, That no man should be admitted to speak against that whereunto he hath formerly subscribed.—And as for you doctor Reynolds, and your sociates, how much are ye bound to his majesty's clemency, permitting you contrary to the statute 1 Eliz. so freely to speak against the Liturgy, and Discipline established. Fain would I know the end you aim at, and whether you be not of Mr. Cartwright's mind, who affirmed, that we ought in ceremonies rather to conform to the Turks than to the Papists. I doubt you approve his position, because here appearing before his majesty in Turkey-gowns, not in your scholastic habits, according to the order of the universities.

His Majesty. My Lord Bishop, something in your passion I may excuse, and something I must mislike. I may excuse you thus far, That I think you have just cause to be moved, in respect that they traduce the well-settled government, and also proceed in so indirect a course, contrary to their own pretence, and the intent of this meeting. I mislike your sudden interruption of doctor Reynolds, whom you should have suffered to have taken his liberty; For, there is no order, nor can be any effectual issue of disputation, if each party be not suffered, without chopping, to speak at large. Wherefore, either let the doctor proceed, or frame your answer to his motions already made, although some of them are very needless.

Bp. of Lond. Upon the first motion concerning Falling from Grace, may your majesty be pleased to consider how many in these days neglect holiness of life, presuming on persisting in Grace upon Predestination, "If I shall be saved, I shall be saved." A desperate doctrine, contrary to good divinity, wherein we should reason rather ascendendo than descendendo, from our obedience to God, and love to our neighbour, to our election and predestination. As for the Doctrine of the Church of England, touching Predestination, it is in the very next paragraph, viz. "We must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture, and in our doings the will of God is to be followed, which we have expressly declared unto us in the Word of God."

His Majesty. I approve it very well, as consonant with the place of Paul, "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling." Yet let it be considered of, whether any thing were meet to be added for clearing of the doctor's doubt, by putting in the word often, or the like. Mean time, I wish that the doctrine of Predestination may be tenderly handled, lest on the one side God's omnipotency be questioned by impeaching the doctrine of his eternal Predestination, or on the other side a desperate presumption arreared, by inferring the necessary certainty of persisting in Grace.

Bp. of Lond. The second Objection of the doctor's is vain, it being the doctrine and practice of the Church of England, that none but a licensed minister may preach, nor administer the Lord's Supper.

His Majesty. As for Private Baptism, I have already with the bishops taken order for the same.

Then came they to the 2nd point of Confirmation, and upon the perusal of the words of the Article, his majesty concluded the pretended contradiction a cavil.

Bp. of Lond. Confirmation is not so much founded on the place in the Acts of the apostles, but upon Heb. vi. 2. which was the opinion, besides the judgment of the Fathers, of Mr. Calvin, and doctor Fulk; neither needeth there any farther proof, seeing (as I suppose) he that objected this holds not confirmation unlawful; but he and his party are vexed that the use thereof is not in their own hands, for every pastor to confirm his own parish; for then it would be accounted an Apostolical institution, if Dr. Reynolds were pleased but to speak his thoughts therein.

Dr. Reyn. Indeed seeing some diocese of a bishop hath therein six hundred Parishes, it is a thing very inconvenient to permit Confirmation to the bishop alone; and I suppose it impossible that he can take due examination of them all which come to be confirmed.

Bp. of Lond. To the matter of fact, I answer, that bishops in their Visitations appoint either their chaplains, or some other ministers, to examine them which are to be confirmed, and lightly confirm none but by the testimony of the parsons and curates, where the children are bred and brought up.—To the Opinion I answer, that none of all the Fathers ever admitted any to confirm but bishops alone. Yea, even St. Jerome himself (otherwise no friend to bishops) confesseth the execution thereof was restrained to bishops only.

Bp. of Winch. Dr. Reynolds, I would fain have you, with all your learning, shew wherever Confirmation was used in ancient times by any other bishops; These used it partly to examine children, and after examination by imposition of hands (the Jewish ceremony of blessing) to bless and pray over them; and partly to try whether they had been baptised in the right form or no. For in former ages some baptised (as they ought) in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Some (as the Arians) in the name of the Father as the greater, and the Son as the less. Some in the name of the Father by the Son, in the Holy Ghost. Some not in the name of the Trinity, but only in the Death of Christ. Whereupon Catholic bishops were constrained to examine them who were baptised in remotis, concerning their Baptism, if right to confirm them, if amiss to instruct them.

His Majesty. I dissent from the judgment of St. Jerome in his assertion, that bishops are not of divine ordination.

Bp. of Lond. Unless I could prove my Ordination lawful out of the Scriptures, I would not be a bishop four hours longer.

His Majesty. I approve the calling and use of bishops in the Church, and it is my aphorism, 'No Bishop, No King;' nor intend I to take Confirmation from the bishops, which they have so long enjoyed. Seeing as great reason that none should confirm, as that none should preach without the bishop's license. But let it be referred, whether the word Examination ought not to be added to the rubrick in the title of Confirmation in the Communion-book. And now Dr. Reynolds you may proceed.

Dr. Reyn. I protest I meant not to gail any man, though I perceive some took personal exceptions at my words, and desire the imputation of schism may not be charged upon me. To proceed on the 37th Article, wherein are these words, "The Bishop of Rome hath no authority in this land." These are not sufficient, unless it were added, nor ought to have any.

His Majesty. Habemus jure, quod habemus, and therefore in as much as it is said he hath not, it is plain enough that he ought not to have.

Here passed some pleasant discourse betwixt the king and lords about puritans, till returning to seriousness: There began the

Bp. of Lond. May it please your majesty to remember the Speech of the French ambassador, monsieur Regnee, upon the view of our solemn service and ceremony, viz. That if the Reformed Churches in France had kept the same order, there would have been thousands of Protestants more than there are.

Dr. Reyn. It were well if this proposition might be added to the Book of Articles. 'The intention of the minister is not of the essence of the sacrament,' the rather, because some in England have preached it to be essential; and here again I could desire that the nine orthodox Assertions concluded at Lambeth, may be generally received.

His Maj. I utterly dislike the first part of your motion, thinking it unfit to thrust into the Book of Articles every position negative, which would swell the book into a volume as big as the Bible, and confound the reader. Thus one M. Craig in Scotland with his, I renounce and abhor his multiplied detestations and abrenunciations, so amazed simple people, that not able to conceive all their things, they fell back to popery, or remained in their former ignorance. If bound to this form, the confession of my faith must be in my table-book, not in my head.—Because you speak of Intention, I will apply it thus. If you come hither with a good intention to be informed, the whole work will sort to the better effect: But if your intention be to go as you came, whatsoever shall be said, it will prove the intention is very material and essential to the end of this present action.—As for the nine Assertions you speak of, I cannot suddenly answer, not knowing what those Propositions of Lambeth be.

Bp. of Lond. May it please your majesty, this was the occasion of them, by reason of some controversies arising in Cambridge about certain points of divinity, my lord's grace assembled some divines of special note to set down their Opinions, which they drew into nine Assertions, and so sent them to the University for the appeasing of those quarrels.

His Maj. When such questions arise amongst scholars, the quietest proceedings were to determine them in the University, and not to stuff the Book of Articles, with all Conclusions theological.—Secondly, the better course would be to punish the broachers of false doctrine, than to multiply Articles, which, if never so many, cannot prevent the contrary opinions of men till they be heard.

Dean of Pauls. May it please your majesty, I am nearly concerned in this matter, by reason of a Controversy betwixt me and some other in Cambridge, upon a Proposition, which I there delivered, namely, that whosoever (though before justified) did commit any grievous sin, as adultery, murder, &c. do become ipso facto, subject to God's wrath, and guilty of damnation, quoad presentiam statum, until they repent. Yet, so that those who are justified according to the purpose of God's Election (though they might fall into grievous sin, and thereby into the present estate of damnation) yet never totally nor finally from Justification; but were in time renewed by God's spirit unto a lively faith and repentance. Against this doctrine some did oppose, teaching that persons once truly justified, though falling into grievous sins, remained still in the state of Justification, before they actually repented of these sins; yea, and though they never repented of them through forgetfulness or sudden death, they nevertheless were justified and saved.

His Maj. I dislike this doctrine, there being a necessity of conjoining repentance and holiness of life with true faith, and that is hypocrisy, and not justifying faith, which is severed from them. For although Predestination and Election depend not on any qualities, actions, or works of man which are mutable, but on God's eternal Decree: yet such is the necessity of Repentance after known sins committed, that without it no Reconciliation with God, or Remission of Sins.

Dr. Reyn. The Catechism in the Common Prayer-Book is too brief, and that by Mr. Nowel (late dean of Pauls) too long for novices to learn by heart. I request therefore that one uniform Catechism may be made, and none other generally received.

His Maj. I think the doctor's request very reasonable, yet so, that the Catechism may be made in the fewest and plainest affirmative terms that may be, not like the many ignorant Catechisms in Scotland, set out by every one who was the Son of a good man; insomuch that what was Catechism-doctrine in one congregation, was scarcely received as orthodox in another; and herein I would have two rules observed: First, That curious and deep questions be avoided in the fundamental instruction of a people, secondly, That there should not be so general a departure from the papists, that every thing should be accounted an error wherein we agree with them.

Dr. Reyn. Great is the profanation of the Sabbath day, and contempt of your majesty's Proclamation, which I earnestly desire may be reformed.

This motion found an unanimous consent.

Dr. Reyn. May your majesty be pleased that the Bible be new translated, such as are extant not answering the original, and be instanced in three particulars.

Gal. iv. 25.—In the original, συνεχῆ; ill-translated, Bordereth.—Ps. cv. 28. Orig. They were not disobedient; ill-trans., They were not obedient.—Ps. cvi. 30. Orig. Phinehas executed judgment; ill-trans., Phinehas prayed.

followed, there would be no end of translating.

His Maj. I profess I could never yet see a Bible well translated in English; but I think, that of all, that of Geneva is the worst. I wish some special pains were taken for an uniform translation; which should be done by the best learned in both Universities, then reviewed by the bishops, presented to the privy council, lastly ratified by royal authority, to be read in the whole church, and no other.

His Maj. That caveat is well put in, for in the Geneva translation, some notes are partial, untrue, seditious, and savouring of traitorous conceits: As; when from Exodus i. 19. Disobedience to kings is allowed in a marginal note. And 2 Chron. xv. 16, king Asa taxed in the note for only deposing his mother for idolatry, and not killing her. To conclude this point, let errors, in matters of faith, be amended, and indifferent things be interpreted, and a gloss added unto them. For as Bartolus de Regno saith, that a king with some weakness, is better than still a change; so rather a Church with some faults, than an innovation. And surely, if these were the greatest matters that grieved you, I need not have been troubled with such importunate complaints.

Dr. Reyn. May it please your majesty, that unlawful and seditious books be suppressed, such as Ficerus, a Papist, De Jure Magistratus in Subditos, applied against the late queen for the Pope.

Bp. of Lond. There is no such licentious divulging of those books, and none have liberty, by authority, to buy them, except such as Dr. Reynolds, who was supposed would confute them. And, if such books come into the realm by secret conveyances, perfect notice cannot be had of their importation. Besides, Ficerus was a great disciplinarian, whereby it appears what advantage that sort gave unto the Papists, who, mutatis personis, apply their own arguments against princes of their religion, though for my part I detest both the author and applier alike.

The Ld. Cecil. Indeed the unlimited liberty of dispersing Popish and seditious pamphlets in Pauls Church-yard, and both the Universities, hath done much mischief; but especially one called Speculum Tragicum.

His Maj. That is a dangerous book indeed.

L. H. Howard. Both for matter and intention.

L. Chan. Of such Books, some are Latin, some are English, but the last dispersed do most harm.

Secret. Cecil. But my lord of London (and no man else) hath done what he could to suppress them.

His Maj. Dr. Reynolds, you are a better college-man than a states-man, if meaning to tax the bishop of London for suffering those books, between the Secular Priests and Jesuits, to be published, which he did by warrant from the council, to flourish a schism betwixt them.

Ld. Cecil. Such books were tolerated, because by them the title of Spain was confuted.

Ld. Treasurer. And because therein it appears, by the testimony of the priests themselves, that no Papists are put to death for conscience only, but for treason.

Dr. Reyn. Indeed I meant not such books as were printed in England, but only such as came from beyond the seas. And now to proceed to the second general point, concerning the planting of learned ministers, I desire they be in every parish.

His Maj. I have consulted with my bishops about it, whom I have found willing and ready herein: but, as sabita evacuatio is periculosa; so sabita mutatio: It cannot presently be performed, the Universities not affording them. And yet they afford more learned men, than the realm doth maintenance, which must be first provided. In the mean time, ignorant ministers, if young, are to be removed, if there be no hope of amendment; if old, their death must be expected, because Jerusalem cannot be built up in a day.

Bp. of Winch. Lay patrons much cause the insufficiency of the clergy, presenting mean clerks to their cures (the law admitting of such sufficiency) and, if the bishop refuseth them, presently a quare impedit is sent out against him.

Bp. of Lond. Because this I see is a time of moving Petitions, may I humbly present two or three to your majesty: First, That there may be amongst us a praying ministry, it being now come to pass, that men think it is the only duty of ministers to spend their time in the pulpit. I confess, in a Church newly to be planted, preaching is most necessary, not so in one long established, that prayer should be neglected.

His Maj. I like your motion exceeding well, and dislike the hypocrisy of our time, who place all their religion in the ear, whilst prayer (so requisite and acceptable, if duly performed) is accounted and used as the least part of religion.

Bp. of Lond. My second motion is, that until learned men may be planted in every congregation, godly homilies may be read therein.

His Maj. I approve your motion, especially where the living is not sufficient for the maintenance of a learned preacher. Also, where there be multitudes of sermons; there I would have homilies read divers times. [Here the king asked the assent of the plaintiffs, and they confessed it.]

A preaching ministry is best, but where it may not be had, godly prayers and exhortations do much good.

Ld. Chan. Livings rather want learned men, than learned men livings; many in the Universities pining for want of places. I wish therefore some may have single coats (one living) before others have doublets (pluralities). And this method I have observed in bestowing the king's benefices.

Bp. of Lond. I commend your honourable care that way; but a doublet is necessary in cold weather.

Ld. Chan. I dislike not the liberty of our church, in granting to one man two benefices, but speak out of mine own purpose and practice, grounded on the aforesaid reason.

Bp. of Lond. My last motion is, that Pulpits may not be made Pasquils, wherein every discontented fellow may traduce his superiors.

His Maj. I accept what you offer, for the Pulpit is no place of personal reproof, let them complain to me, if injured.

Bp. of Lond. If your majesty shall leave yourself open to admit of all complaints, your highness shall never be quiet, nor your under-officers regarded, whom every delinquent, when censured, will threaten to complain of.

His Maj. I mean they shall complain to me by degrees, first to the Ordinary, from him to the Archbishop, from him to the lords of the council; and, if in all these no remedy be found, then to myself.

Dr. Reyn. I come now to Subscription, as a great impeachment to a learned ministry, and therefore intreat it may not be exacted as heretofore: for which many good men are kept out, though otherwise willing to subscribe to the Statutes of the Realm, Articles of Religion, and the King's Supremacy. The reason of their backwardness to subscribe, is, because the Common-prayer enjoineth the Apocrypha books to be read in the church, although some chapters therein contain manifest errors repugnant to Scripture. For instance, Eccclus. xlviii. 10. Elias in person is said to come before Christ, contrary to what is in the New Testament, Mat. xi. 14. Luke i. 17. of Elias in resemblance, that is, John the Baptist.

Bp. of Lond. Most of the objections against those books, are the old cavils of the Jews, renewed by S. Jerome (who first called them Apocrypha) which opinion, upon Ruffinus his challenge, he, after a sort, disclaimed.

His Maj. To take an even order betwixt both, I would not have all canonical books read in the church, nor any chapter out of the Apocrypha, wherein any error is contained; wherefore let Dr. Reynolds note those chapters in the Apocrypha books, wherein those offences are, and bring them to the abp. of Canterbury against Wednesday next; and now Doctor, proceed.

Dr. Reyn. The next scruple against Subscription, is, because it is twice set down in the Common-prayer-book, Jesus said to his disciples, when by the text in the original, it is plain, that he spake to the Pharisees.

His Maj. Let the word Disciples be omitted, and the words, Jesus said, be printed in a different letter.

Mr. Knewstub. I take exceptions at the Cross in Baptism, whereat the weak brethren are offended, contrary to the counsel of the apostle, Romans xiv. 2 Corinth. viii.

His Maj. Distingue tempora, & concordant Scriptura, great the difference betwixt those times and ours. Then, a Church not fully settled; now, ours long established. How long will such brethren be weak? Are not forty-five years sufficient for them to grow strong in? Besides, who pretends this weakness? We require not Subscriptions of laicks and ideots, but of preachers and ministers, who are not still (I trow) to be fed with milk, being enabled to feed others. Some of them are strong enough, if not head-strong; conceiving themselves able enough to teach him who last spake for them, and all the bishops in the land.

Mr. Kncwest. It is questionable whether the Church hath power to institute an outward significant sign.

Bp. of Winch. Kneeling, lifting up of the hands, knocking of the breast, are significant ceremonies, and these may lawfully be used.

D. of the Chup. The Rabbins write, That the Jews added both signs and words at the institution of the Pas-sover, viz. when they eat sour herbs, they said, 'Take and eat these in remembrance,' &c. When they drank wine, they said, 'Drink this in remembrance,' &c. Upon which addition, and tradition, our Saviour instituted the Sacrament of his last Supper, thereby approving, a Church may institute and retain a sign significant.

His Maj. I am exceedingly well satisfied in this point, but would be acquainted about the antiquity of the use of the Cross.

Dr. Reyn. It hath been used ever since the Apostles time; but the question is, how ancient the use thereof hath been in Baptism.

D. of Westm. It appears out of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Origen, that it was used in immortali lacro.

Bp. of Winch. In Constantine's time it was used in Baptism.

His Maj. If so, I see no reason but that we may continue it.

Mr. Kncwest. Put the case the Church hath power to add significant signs, it may not add them where Christ hath already ordained them, which is as derogatory to Christ's institution, as if one should add to the great seal of England.

His Maj. The case is not alike, seeing the Sacrament is fully finished, before any mention of the Cross is made therein.

Mr. Kncwest. If the Church hath such a power, the greatest scruple is, how far the ordinance of the Church bindeth, without impeaching Christian liberty.

His Maj. I will not argue that point with you, but answer as kings in parliament, Le Roy s'avisera; This is like Mr. John Black, a beardless boy, who told me, the last Conference in Scotland, (Dec. 1602,) that he would hold conformity with his majesty in matters of Doctrine: but every man for Ceremonies was to be left to his own liberty. But I will have none of that, I will have one Doctrine, one Discipline, one Religion, in substance, and in ceremony. Never speak more to that point, how far you are bound to obey.

Dr. Reyn. Would that the Cross, being superstitiously abused in Popery, were abandoned, as the Brazen Serpent was stamped to powder by Hezekias, because abused to idolatry.

His Maj. In as much as the Cross was abused to superstition in time of Popery, it doth plainly imply that it was well used before. I detest their courses, who peremptorily disallow of all things, which have been abused in Popery, and know not how to answer the objections of the Papists, when they charge us with novelties, but by telling them, we retain the primitive use of things, and only forsake their novel corruptions. Secondly, no resemblance betwixt the Brazen Serpent, a material visible thing, and the sign of the Cross, made in the air. Thirdly, Papists (as I am informed) did never ascribe any spiritual Grace to the Cross in Baptism. Lastly, material Crosses, to which people fell down in time of Popery (as the idolatrous Jews to the Brazen Serpent) are already demolished, as you desire.

Mr. Kncwest. I take exception at the wearing of the Surplice, a kind of garment used by the priests of Isis.

His Maj. I did not think, till of late, it had been borrowed from the Heathen, because commonly called a rag of Popery. Seeing now we border not upon heathens, neither are any of them conversant with, or commorant amongst us, thereby to be confirmed in Paganism; I see no reason but for comeliness-sake, it may be continued.

Dr. Reyn. I take exception at these words in the Marriage, 'with my body I thee worship.'

His Maj. I was made believe, the phrase imported no less than divine adoration, but find it an usual English term, as when we say, 'a gentleman of worship,' and it agreeth with the Scriptures, 'giving honour to the wife.' As for you, Dr. Reynolds, many men speak of Robin Hood, who never shot in his bow. (This the king spake smiling.) If you had a good wife yourself, you would think all worship and honour you could do her, were well bestowed on her.

Dr. Reyn. I approve it well enough.

His Maj. I was married with a Ring, and think others scarce well married without it.

Dr. Reyn. Some take exceptions at the Churching of Women, by the name of Purification.

His Maj. I allow it very well, women being loath of themselves to come to church, I like this, or any other occasion to draw them thither.

Dr. Reyn. My last exception is against committing Ecclesiastical Censures to lay-chancellors, the rather, because it was ordered, anno 1571, that lay-chancellors, in matters of Correction, and anno 1589, in matters of Instance, should not excommunicate any, but be done, only by them who had power of the Keys, though the contrary is commonly practised.

His Maj. I have conferred with my bishops about this point, and such order shall be taken therein as is convenient. Mean time go on to some other matter.

Dr. Reyn. I desire, that according to certain provincial constitutions, the clergy may have meetings every three weeks.—1. First in Rural Deaneries, therein to have prophesying, as arch-bishop Griadall, and other bishops, desired of her late majesty.—2. That such things, as could not be resolved on there, might be referred to the arch-deacons visitations.—3. And so to the Episcopal Synod, to determine such points before not decided.

His Maj. If you aim at a Scottish Presbytery, it agreeth as well with monarchy, as God and the Devil. Then Jack, and Tom, and Will, and Dick, shall meet and censure me and my council. Therefore I reiterate my former speech, Le Roy s'aviserà; Stay, I pray, for one seven years, before you demand, and then if you find me grow pury and fit, I may, perchance, hearken unto you, for that government will keep me in breath, and give me work enough. I shall speak of one matter more, somewhat out of order, but it skilleth not; Dr. Reynolds, you have often spoken for my Supremacy, and it is well: but know you any here, or elsewhere, who like of the present government ecclesiastical, and dislike my Supremacy?

His Maj. Why then I will tell you a tale: after that the religion restored by king Edward the sixth, was soon overthrown by queen Mary here in England, we in Scotland felt the effect of it. For thereupon Mr. Knox writes to the queen regent (a virtuous and moderate lady) telling her that she was the supreme head of the Church; and charged her, as she would answer it at God's tribunal, to take care of Christ his Evangel, in suppressing the Popish prelates, who withstood the same; but how long trow you did this continue? Even till by her authority, the Popish bishops were repressed, and Knox, with his adherents, being brought in, made strong enough. Then began they to make small account of her supremacy, when, according to that more light, wherewith they were illuminated, they made a farther reformation of themselves. How they used the poor lady my mother, is not unknown, and how they dealt with me in my minority. I thus apply it. My lords, the bishops, I may [This he said putting his hand to his hat] thank you that these men plead thus for my Supremacy. They think they cannot make their party good against you, but by appealing unto it; but if once you were out, and they in, I know what would become of my Supremacy, for No Bishop, No King. I have learned of what cut they have been, who, preaching before me, since my coming into England, passed over, with silence, my being Supreme Governor in causes ecclesiastical. Well, doctor, have you any thing else to say?

Dr. Reyn. No more if it please your majesty.

His Maj. If this be all your party hath to say, I will make them conform themselves, or else I will harrie them out of the land, or else do worse.

Thus ended the second day's Conference, and the third began on the Wednesday following, Jan. 18, many knights, civilians, and doctors of the law, being admitted thereunto, because the High Commission was the principal matter in debate.

His Maj. I understand, that the parties named in the High Commission are too many, and too mean, and the matters they deal with, base, such as ordinaries at home in their courts might censure.

Abp. of Cant. It is requisite their number should be many, otherwise I should be forced often-times to sit alone, if in the absence of the lords of the council, bishops, and judges at law, some deans and doctors were not put into that Commission, whose attendance I might command with the more Authority: I have often complained of the meanness of matters handled therein, but cannot remedy it. For though the offence be small, that the Ordinary may, the offender oft-times is so great, and contumacious, that the Ordinary dare not punish him, and so is forced to crave help at the High Commission.

A nameless Lord. The proceedings in that court, are like the Spanish Inquisition, wherein men are urged to subscribe more than law requireth, and by the oath ex officio, forced to accuse themselves, being examined upon twenty, or twenty four Articles on a sudden, without deliberation, and for the most part against themselves.—In proof hereof, he produced a Letter of an ancient honourable counsellor, An. 1584, verifying this usage to two ministers in Cambridgeshire.

Abp. of Cant. Your lordship is deceived in the manner of proceeding; for, if the Article touch the party for life, liberty, or scandal, he may refuse to answer; I can say nothing to the particulars of the Letter, because twenty years since, yet doubted not, but at leisure, to give your lordship satisfaction.

Lord Chan. There is necessity, and use of the oath ex officio, in divers courts, and causes.

His Maj. Indeed civil proceedings only punish facts; but it is requisite that Fame and Scandals be looked unto in courts ecclesiastical, and yet great moderation is to be used therein.

1. In gravius criminibus. 2. In such whereof there is a public fame, caused by the inordinate demeanour of the offender.—And here he soundly described the oath ex officio, for the ground thereof, the wisdom of the law therein, the manner of proceeding thereby, and profitable effect from the same.

Abp. of Cant. Undoubtedly your majesty speaks by the special assistance of God's spirit.

Bp. of Lond. I protest my heart melteth with joy, that Almighty God, of his singular mercy, hath given us such a king, as, since Christ's time, the like hath not been.

Then passed there much discourse between the king, the bishops, and the lords, about the quality of the persons, and causes in the High Commission, rectifying Excommunications in matters of less moment, punishing Recusants, providing Divines for Ireland, Wales, and the Northern Borders. Afterwards the four preachers were called in, and such alterations in the Liturgy were read unto them, which the bishops, by the king's advice, had made, and to which, by their silence, they seemed to consent.

His Maj. I see the exceptions against the Communion-book, are matters of weakness, therefore if the persons reluctant be discreet, they will be won betimes, and by good persuasions: if indiscreet, better they were removed, for by their factions many are driven to be Papists. From you Dr. Reynolds and your associates, I expect obedience and humility (the marks of honest and good men) and that you would persuade others abroad by your example.

Dr. Reyn. We here do promise to perform all duties to bishops, as reverend fathers, and to join with them against the common adversary for the quiet of the Church.

Mr. Chaderton. I request the wearing of the Surplice, and the Cross in Baptism may not be urged on some godly ministers in Lancashire, fearing, if forced unto them, many won by their preaching of the Gospel will revolt to Popery, and I particularly instance in the vicar of Ratsdale.

Abp. of Cant. You could not have light upon a worse, for not many years ago (as my lord chancellor knows) it was proved before me, that by his unreverent usage of the Eucharist (dealing the bread out of a basket, every man putting in his hand, and taking out a piece) he made many loath the Communion, and refuse to come to Church.

His Maj. It is not my purpose, and I dare say it is not the bishops intent, presently, and out of hand, to enforce these things, without fatherly admonitions, conferences, and persuasions, premised; but I wish it were examined, whether such Lancashire ministers, by their pains and preaching, have converted any from Popery, and withal be men of honest life, and quiet conversation. If so, let letters be written to the bishop of Chester [Rich. Vaughan, afterwards bishop of London] (who is a grave and good man) to that purpose, that some favour may be afforded unto them, and let the lord archbishop write the letters.

Bp. of Lond. If this be granted, the copy of these Letters will fly all over England, and then all non-conformists will make the like request, and so no fruit follow of this Conference, but things will be worse than they were before. I desire therefore a time may be limited, within the compass whereof they shall conform.

His Maj. I assent thereunto, and let the bishop of the diocese set down the time.

Mr. Kneast. I request the like favour of forbearance to some honest ministers in Suffolk. For it will make much against their credits in the country, to be now forced to the Surplice, and Cross in Baptism.

Abp. of Cant. Nay, sir—

His Maj. Let me alone to answer him. Sir, you shew yourself an uncharitable man. We have here taken pains, and, in the end, have concluded on unity and uniformity, and you, forsooth, must prefer the credits of a few private men before the peace of the Church. This is just the Scotch argument, when any thing was concluded, which disliked some humours. Let them either conform themselves shortly, or they shall hear of it.

Ld. Cecil. The indecency of Ambulating Communion, is very offensive, and hath driven many from the Church.

Bp. of Lond. And Mr. Chaderton, I could tell you of Sitting Communion in Emanuel college.

Mr. Chad. It is so, because of the seats so placed as they be, and yet we have some kneeling also in our chapel.

His Maj. No more hereof for the present, seeing they have jointly promised hereafter to be quiet and obedient.—Whereat he rose up to depart into an inner chamber.

Bp. of Lond. God's goodness be blessed for your majesty, and give health and prosperity to your highness, your gracious queen, the young prince, and all the royal issue.

Thus ended the three days Conference, wherein how discreetly the king carried himself, posterity (out of the reach of flattery) is the most competent judge, such matters being most truly discerned at distance. It is generally said, that herein he went above himself; that the bishop of London appeared even with himself, and Dr. Reynolds fell much beneath himself. Others observed that abp. Whitgift spake most gravely; Bancroft (when out of passion) most politely; Bilson, most learnedly. And of the divines, Mr. Reynolds most largely; Kneestubs most affectionately; Chaderton most sparingly. In this scene, only Dr. Sparks was ἀφρον πρόσωπον, making use of his hearing, not speech, converted (it seems) to the truth of what was spoken, and soon after setting forth a Treatise of Unity and Uniformity.—But the nonconformists complained, that the king sent for their divines, not to have their scruples satisfied, but his Pleasure propounded; nor that he might know what they could say, but they what he would do, in the matter. Besides, no wonder if Dr. Reynolds a little lost himself, whose eyes were partly dazzled with the light of the king's majesty, partly daunted with the heat of his displeasure. Others complain, that this Conference is partially set forth only by Dr. Barlow, dean of Chester, their professed adversary, to the great disadvantage of their divines. And when the Israelites go down to the Philistines, to what all their iron tools, no wonder if they set a sharp edge on their own, and a blunt one on their enemies weapons.—This Conference produced some alterations in the Liturgy, womens baptizing of infants, formerly frequent, hereafter forbidden; in the rubric of Absolution, Remission of Sins inserted, Confirmation termed also an Examination of Children, and some words altered in the Dominical Gospels, with a resolution for a new Translation of the Bible. But whereas it was hitherto disputable, whether the north, where he long lived, or the south, whither he lately came, should prevail most, on the king's judgment, in Church-government; this doubt was now clearly decided. Hence forward many cripples in conformity, were cured of their former halting therein, and such, who knew not their own, till they knew the king's mind in this matter, for the future, quietly digested the Ceremonies of the Church.

“The humble Petition of the Ministers of the Church of England, desiring Reformation of certain Ceremonies, and Abuses of the Church.

“To the most christian, and excellent prince, our gracious and dread sovereign, James by the grace of God, &c. We the Ministers of the Church of England, that desire Reformation, wish a long, prosperous, and happy reign over us in this life, and in the next everlasting salvation.

“Most gracious and dread Sovereign; Seeing it hath pleased the Divine Majesty, to the great comfort of all good Christians, to advance your highness, according to your just title, to the peaceable government of this Church and Common-wealth of England: We the Ministers of the Gospel in this land, neither as factious men, affecting a popular parity in the Church, nor as schismatics aiming at the dissolution of the state ecclesiastical; but as the faithful servants of Christ, and loyal subjects to your majesty, desiring and longing for the redress of divers abuses of the Church; could do no less, in our obedience to God, service to your majesty, love to his Church, than acquaint your princely majesty, with our particular griefs: for, as your princely pen writeth, The king, as a good physician, must first know what peccant humours his patient naturally is most subject unto, before he can begin his cure. And, although divers of us that sue for Reformation, have formerly, in respect of the times, subscribed to the Book, some upon protestation, some upon exposition given them, some with condition, rather than the Church should have been deprived of their labour, and ministry; yet now, we, to the number of more than a thousand, of your majesty's subjects and ministers, all groaning, as under a common burden, of human rights and ceremonies, do, with one joint consent, humble ourselves at your majesty's feet, to be eased and relieved in this behalf. Our humble suit then unto your majesty is, that these offences following, some may be removed, some amended, some qualified.—1. In the Church Service. That the Cross in Baptism, Interrogatories ministered to infants, Confirmation, as superfluous, may be taken away. Baptism not to be ministered by women, and so explained. The Cap and Surplice not urged. That Examination may go before the Communion. That it be ministered with a sermon. That divers terms of Priests, and Absolution, and some other used, with the Ring in Marriage, and other such like in the Book, may be corrected. The long-someness of Service abridged. Church songs, and Music moderated to better edification. That the Lord's day be not profaned. The rest upon Holy days not so strictly urged. That there may be an uniformity of doctrine prescribed. No Popish opinion to be any more taught, or defended. No ministers charged to teach their people to bow at the name of Jesus. That the canonical Scriptures only be read in the Church.—2. Concerning Church Ministers. That none hereafter be admitted into the ministry, but able and sufficient men, and those to preach diligently, and especially upon the Lord's day. That such as be already entered, and cannot preach, may either be removed, and some charitable course taken with them for their relief; or else to be forced, according to the value of their livings, to maintain preachers. That Non-Residence be not permitted. That king Edward's statute, for the lawfulness of Ministers Marriage, be revived. That ministers be not urged to subscribe, but, according to the law, to the Articles of Religion, and the king's supremacy only.—3. For Church Livings, and Maintenance. That bishops leave their Commendams; some holding prebends, some parsonages, some vicarages with their bishoprics. That double beneficed men be not suffered to hold, some two or three Benefices with Cure: and some, two, three, or four Dignities besides. That Impropropriations annexed to bishoprics and colleges, be demised only to the preachers incumbents, for the old rent. That the Impropropriations of Laymen's fees may be charged with a sixth or seventh part of the worth, to the maintenance of the preaching minister.—4. For Church Discipline. That the Discipline, and Excommunication may be administered according to Christ's own institution; or at the least, that enormities may be redressed. As namely, That excommunication come not forth under the name of lay-persons, chancellors, officials, &c. That men be not excommunicated for trifles, and twelve-penny matters. That none be excommunicated without consent of his pastor. That the officers be not suffered to extort unreasonable fees. That none, having jurisdiction, or registers places, put out the same to farm. That divers Popish Canons (as for restraint of marriage at certain times) be reversed. That the long-someness of suits in ecclesiastical courts (which hang sometimes two, three, four, five, six, or seven years) may be restrained. That the oath ex officio, whereby men are forced to accuse themselves, be more sparingly used. That Licenses for Marriage, without Banns asked, be more cautiously granted.—These, with such other abuses, yet remaining, and practised in the Church of England, we are able to shew, not to be agreeable to the scriptures, if it shall please your highness farther to hear us, or more at large by writing to be informed, or by conference among the learned to be resolved. And yet we doubt not, but that, without any farther process, your majesty (of whose Christian judgment we have received so good a taste already) is able of yourself, to judge of the equity of this cause: God, we trust, hath appointed your highness our physician to heal these diseases. And we say with Mordecai to Hester, “who knoweth, whether you are come to the kingdom for such a time?” Thus your majesty shall do that, which, we are persuaded, shall be acceptable to God, honourable to your majesty in all succeeding ages, profitable to his Church, which shall be thereby increased, comfortable to your ministers, which shall be no more suspended, silenced, disgraced, imprisoned for men's traditions; and prejudicial to none, but to those that seek their own quiet, credit, and profit in the world. Thus, with all dutiful submission, referring ourselves to your majesty's pleasure, for your gracious answer, as God shall direct you: we most humbly recommend your highness to the Divine Majesty: whom we beseech for Christ his sake to dispose your royal heart to do herein, what shall be to his glory, the good of his Church, and your endless comfort.—Your majesty's most humble subjects, the Ministers of the Gospel, that desire not a disorderly Innovation but a due and godly Reformation.

77. The CASE between Sir FRANCIS GOODWIN and Sir JOHN FORTESCUE, relative to a Return for the County of Buckingham; as it stands upon the Journals of the House of Commons: 1 JAC. I. A. D. 1604.

INTRODUCTION.

ON the 26th of March 1604, upon a motion of the lord Cecil, a Conference was agreed upon to be had with a certain number of the Lower House, concerning the public State of the Nation; and on two things, in particular, Purveyors and Respite of Homage. To which the Commons desired might be added another article concerning the matter of Wards: answer was returned back, by the Lords, “That they liked well the motion for a Conference, touching the last mentioned matter. But, with all, because there were several other things that did concern the public state; of which it was likewise proper to have conference, before hand, for the better furtherance of the public service; and, in regard, the said matters were of importance, their lordships desire them to increase the number of their committee as they intended to do theirs.” A large Committee of lords were accordingly appointed, consisting of nine earls, one viscount, six bishops, and 13 barons; who were to be attended by the two lord chief justices, four judges, Mr. Serjeant Crook, and Mr. Attorney-General. The commons deputed about 60 knights and burgeses of their house; and this is all that the Journals of the Lords mention of this matter. But the Journals of the Commons are not so silent; for it was, indeed, a business of importance to the Liberties and Privileges of that House. Rapin, (from Coke) represents this affair as another instance of this king's aiming at absolute power. In order to introduce this matter, we shall give a paragraph from this author's History of England, (v. ii, p. 168) and then subjoin the whole Account, as it stands in the Journals of the Commons at this day. “Immediately after the opening of the Parliament the Commons examining according to custom, the contested Elections, there was a debate in the house about the return of sir Francis Goodwin, and sir John Fortescue, for knight of the shire for the county of Bucks, and upon a full hearing, sir Francis was declared duly elected. Three days after, the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, that there might be a Conference about Goodwin's election. The Commons, surprized at so extraordinary a Message, answered, They did not think themselves obliged to give an account of their proceedings, and therefore could not grant the Conference required. The Lords replied, the king having been acquainted with what had passed in Goodwin's Case, thought himself engaged in honour to have the affair debated again, and had ordered them to confer with the Commons upon it. Whereupon, the Commons, by their Speaker, gave their Reasons to the king, why they could not admit of this innovation. But all they could obtain was, that instead of a Conference with the Lords, the king commanded them to confer with the Judges. This pleased them no more than the other. They set down their Reasons in writing, and delivered them at the Council-Chamber, to desire their lordships to intercede for them to the king, not to violate their privileges. The Answer was, the king absolutely commanded them to have a Conference with the Judges. The Commons were extremely surprized at so absolute an order. Meanwhile, fearing to be accused of too easily engaging in a quarrel with the King, they thought it more proper to yield, than stand out, fully bent however to adhere to what had been de-terminated in the Case of the contested election. Certainly, the king had engaged in a very nice affair, and probably would not have come off with honour, had he not been disengaged by Goodwin's moderation. Sir Francis, chusing to forfeit his right rather than occasion a quarrel between the King and the Commons, desired the house to order the County of Bucks to elect another knight in his stead. The King and Commons equally accepted of this expedient, which prevented them from coming to extremities; but the king found from hence, that no great account was made of the proclamation upon calling the parliament whereby he meant to be master of the elections." Thus far Mr. Rapin. This Case of sir Francis Goodwin was printed, by order of the House of Commons, in 1704, under the direction of Robert Harley, esq. (afterwards earl of Oxford) then Speaker, on occasion of the famous Debate, at that time, upon the Aylesbury Election.

THE CASE.

THE first motion was made by sir William Fleetwood, one of the knights returned for the County of Bucks, on the behalf of sir Francis Goodwin, knight; who, upon the first Writ of Summons directed to the Sheriff of Bucks, was elected the first Knight for that shire: but the Return of his Election being made, it was refused by the Clerk of the Crown (quia utlagatus): and because sir John Fortescue, upon a second Writ, was elected, and entered in that place, his desire was, that this Return might be examined, and sir Francis Goodwin received as a member of the house. The House gave way to the motion; and for a more deliberate and judicial proceeding in a case of privilege so important to the house,

Ordered, 'That the Serjeant (the proper officer of the house) should give warning to the Clerk of the Crown to appear at the bar at eight o'clock the next morning, and to bring with him all the Writs of Summons, Indentures, and Returns of Election for the county of Bucks, made and returned for this Parliament; and to give warning also to sir Francis Goodwin to attend in person, whom their pleasure was to hear, ore tenus, to deliver the state of his own cause, and the manner and reasons of the proceeding in the Election of the Knights of the Shire for that County.'

This being a motion tending to Matter of Privilege, was seconded with another by Mr. Serjeant Shirley, touching an arrest of sir Tho. Riley, &c.

Sir George Copping, knight, Clerk of the Crown in the Chancery, this day, (according to former order) being attended by the Serjeant of the House with his mace, appeared at the bar, and produced all the Writs of Summons, Indentures, and Returns made of the Knights for Buckinghamshire for this Parliament; which were severally read by the Clerk of the House, and then the Clerk of, the Crown commanded to retire to the door: And after, sir Francis Goodwin himself (whom it specially concerned) attending to know the pleasure of the house, was called in, to deliver the state of his own cause, ore tenus; wherein he was heard at large, and commanded again to retire until the house had determined what to do.

In this mean time the whole case was at large opened, and argued pro et contra by sundry learned and grave Members of the house, and after much dispute the question was agreed upon, and made.

Quest. 'Whether sir Francis Goodwin were lawfully elected and returned one of the Knights for Bucks; and ought to be admitted and received as a Member of this House?'

Upon this question it was, Resolved in the affirmative, "That he was lawfully elected and returned, and, de jure, ought to be received." Hereupon the Clerk of the Crown was commanded to file the first Indenture of Return: and order was given, that sir Francis should presently take the Oath of Supremacy usual, and his place in the House; which he did accordingly.

Sir Francis Bacon, in reporting a conference with the lords, touching Wardship and other things, reported that a lord touched the Case of sir Francis Goodwin as a thing he had heard at large, but did not understand it; and therefore desired to know it more particularly from this house.

Answer was made, That they had no Warrant from the house to speak of it.

Sir Edward Coke, his majesty's attorney-general, and Mr. Dr. Hone, bring a Message from the lords, expressing with what acceptance their lordships entertained their motion yesterday, not only for the matter being of very great weight and consequence, but especially for the manner; namely, That, touching Wardship, they would not petition for ease in it as a matter of wrong, but of grief; and pray to be relieved by grace, and not by justice. And their lordships for answer were desirous, and moved at that time to couple in the same petition the matter of grievance, of Respite of Homage, which his majesty, out of his gracious favour and love to his people, had himself taken knowledge of. 'And as they conceive it to be likely, that the conference may continue between the two houses, touching the said matters: as they are very zealous of the furtherance of their purpose, so are they jealous of any impediment that may breed lett, or hindrance therein: therefore they desire, for a more clear proceeding and removing of all stumbling-blocks, that the former committees may, in a second conference to be had, have authority to treat touching the Case of sir Francis Goodwin, the Knight for Buckinghamshire, first of all, before any other matter were farther proceeded in.'

A. The answer to this Message, (as in such

Upon this Message it was argued by some, 'That in no sort they should give account to the lords of their proceedings in the house; but that Mr. Speaker should from the house be a suitor to his majesty, to have access, and as their common mouth give his highness satisfaction by direction from the house: 'That now the Judgment of sir Francis Goodwin's case having passed the house, it could not, nor ought not, to be reversed by them. 'A Precedent, 27 Eliz. cited; where a Bill brought down from the lords, upon the first reading was rejected; the lords sent messengers to demand a reason of their Judgment. 'It was denied to yield any reason.'

This Argument brought forth this Question, which Mr. Speaker was ordered by the house presently to make, viz.

Quest. 'Whether they should confer with the lords, touching the Case of sir Francis Goodwin the Knight for Buckinghamshire?' And Resolved, That they should not.'

It was then considered as fit to return some Answer of the Message from the lords; and Mr. Secretary Herbert, with some other of the Committees, were appointed to deliver to their lordships, from the house; 'That they did conceive it did not stand with the Honour and Order of the house, to give account of any their proceedings or doings: but if their lordships have any purpose to confer for the residue, that then they will be ready at such time and place, and with such number as their lordships shall think meet.'

Upon the last Message to the lords, the messengers return, 'That their lordships would presently send answer by messengers of their own.'

Sir Edward Coke, his majesty's Attorney-General, Mr. Dr. Carew, Mr. Dr. Hone, and Mr. Tyndall, delivered from the lords, 'That their lordships taking notice in particular of the Return of the Sheriff of Bucks; and acquainting his majesty with it, his highness conceived himself engaged and touched in honour that there might be some conference of it between the two houses: and to that end, signified his pleasure unto them, and by them to this house.'

Upon this Message, so extraordinary and unexpected, the house entered in some consideration what were fit to be done; and Resolved, 'That his majesty might be moved for access the next day.' And afterwards they understood his pleasure to be, 'That they should attend at Whitehall at eight the next morning.' But because the time was then somewhat far spent, they Ordered, 'That the House with Mr. Speaker, should meet at six the next morning in the house.'

Yet afore their rising, they thought fit to name a Committee, to set down the effect of that which Mr. Speaker was to deliver from the house to the king, viz. sir Francis Bacon,

Mr. Wentworth, Mr. Martin, Mr. Serj. Sing, sir Rob. Wroth, Mr. Fr. Moore, sir Henry Mountague, sir Wm. Fleetwood, Mr. Fuller, Mr. Serj. Tanfield, Mr. Serj. Hubbard, sir Robert Wingfield, Mr. Hide, Mr. Diet, Mr. Winch, sir Edwin Sandis, sir Fr. Hastings, Mr. Wiseman, sir Geo. Moore, sir Edw. Hobby, sir Rob. Cotton, sir Tho. Lake, sir Oliver St. John, sir Edw. Stafford, Mr. Anthrobus, Mr. Serj. Dodridge, sir Roger Wilbraham, Mr. Solicitor, sir Edw. Tyrrel, to meet at 4 o'clock this afternoon at the Parliament-Chamber in the Middle-Temple.

Mr. Speaker, with a great number of the house, assembled at 6 a-clock this morning, with a purpose to treat and resolve what should be delivered to his majesty, (being appointed to attend him the same morning at 8 a-clock) touching the Reasons of their Proceedings in sir Francis Goodwin's Case: but because the house was not then thought full enough for a matter of that consequence, they proceeded to the reading of Bills.

Upon motion touching Mr. Speaker's attendance on the king, a Committee was named to accompany him, viz. All the Privy-Council, being members of the house: Sir George Carew, Vice-Chamberlain to the queen, sir Francis Bacon, Mr. Serj. Dodridge, sir Henry Mountague, Mr. Serj. Hubbard, Mr. Serj. Lee, Mr. Fuller, Mr. Hide, Mr. Francis Moore, Mr. Winch, Mr. Tate, Mr. Rd. Martin, Mr. Serj. Shirley, Mr. Serj. Tanfield, sir John Heigham, sir Rob. Oxenbridge, sir Wm. Fleetwood, sir Edw. Sandis, sir Rob. Wroth, sir George Fleetwood, sir John Scott, sir Herbert Crofts, sir James Scudamore, sir Jerome Horsey, sir Edw. Radcliffe, sir Tho. Holcroft, sir Anthony Rowse, sir Henry Nevill, sir Edw. Mountague, sir Tho. Hobby, sir Michael Sandis, Mr. Tho. Benson, sir Fr. Fane, sir Fr. Hastings, sir Geo. Moore, sir Edw. Hobby, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Maurice Berkley, sir Edw. Tyrrell, sir Wm. Killegrew, sir Fr. Popham, Mr. Fr. Clifford, sir John Savill, sir Tho. Waller, sir Wm. Lower, Mr. Nath. Bacon, sir Rd. Verney, sir George Fane, Mr. Toby Matthew, sir Tho. Ridgway, Mr. Edw. Scymour, sir Wm. Bourlacy, sir Rob. Moore, sir Jona. Trelawney, sir Edw. Denny, sir Tho. Walsingham, sir Fr. Barrington, sir Robert Nappier, sir Valentine Knightley, sir George Carew, Master of the Chancery, sir Nich. Halswell, sir John Thynne, sir Tho. Frenke, sir Jerome Bowes, sir Edw. Herbert, sir John Leveson, Mr. Dudley Carleton.

Mr. Speaker, together with these Committees, were this day, at 8 in the morning, appointed to attend his majesty, and to relate the Reasons of the Proceeding of the house in sir Francis Goodwin's Case; where, upon Answer or Reply, such lawyers as be of the Committee are to give their assistance.

Mr. Speaker relateth what he had delivered to the king by warrant from the house the day before, touching their Proceeding in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, and his majesty's Answer; whereof, because part was afterwards penned by select Committees, read in the house, and offered in writing to the king, "I have but touched the Heads, omitting many circumstances." He said, he first delivered, 1. The Manner and Matter. 2. Then such Precedents as had been vouched and stood upon. 3. He opened the body of the Law for Election.—The first Writ of Summons, dated ultimo Januarii before the Parliament: the Writ issued duly; the liberty was free, by that writ, to chuse in plano comitatu: the Election was made according to that writ, and the Indenture duly returned; and therefore adjudged by the house, "That this first election being good, the second was consequently void."—For the matter of Utlawry against sir Francis Goodwin, there was one prosecuted against him at the suit of Johnson, 31 Eliz. for 60*l.* and was laid and proceeded in the Hustings, London. Another, at the suit of one Hacker, for 16*l.* 39 Eliz. That sir Francis had since been chosen, admitted, and served as a member of this house, in the several parliaments holden 39 and 43 Eliz. That the Utlawry remained in the Hustings, so as the law could not take notice of it; neither was it pleadable.—1 Eliz. One Smith was found utlawed, and privileged by the house.—23 Eliz. One Vaughan utlawed; and, upon the question and division of the house, privileged: being carried with the difference of six voices.—35 Eliz. Three precedents vouched.—39 Hen. 6.* Fitz-Herbert. —Mr. John Killebrew having 52 utlawries returned against him, was admitted to serve in the house. Sir Wm. Harecourt was found 18 times utlawed, and yet was admitted to serve.—The manner of the Election is limited by the Statute. The supposed Utlawry, 31 Eliz. against sir Francis, was no utlawry at all; for wheresoever a man is sued, the proclamation ought to go into the country where the party dwelleth; or else the utlawry is not good.—39 & 43 Eliz. The general Pardon is good for Utlawries, against all, saving the party at whose suit.—31 Eliz. It was Franciscus Goodwin, Gen.—39 Eliz. Franciscus Goodwin, Armig. The sheriff is no judge of the utlawry, neither could take notice it was the same man; and therefore could not properly return him utlawed."

His Majesty answered, "He was loth he should be forced to alter his tune; and that he should now change it into matter of grief, by way of contestation. He did sample it to the murmur and contradiction of the people of Israel.—He did not attribute the cause of his grief to any purpose in the house to offend him; but only to a mistaking of the law. For matters of fact, he answered them all particularly. That, for his part, he was indifferent which of them were chosen, sir John, or sir Francis: that they could suspect no special affection in him, because this was a Counsellor not brought in by himself.—That he had no purpose to impeach their privilege; but since they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected they should not be turned against. That there was no Precedent did suit this case fully: Precedents in the times of Minors, of Tyrants, of Women, of Simple Kings, not to be credited; because for some private ends. By the law this house ought not to meddle with Returns, being all made into the Chancery, and are to be corrected or reformed by that court only, into which they are returned. 35 Hen. 6. it was the Resolution of all the Judges, that matter of Utlawry was a sufficient cause of dismissal of any member out of the house. That the Judges have now resolved, That sir Francis Goodwin standeth utlawed according to the laws of this land. In conclusion, it was his majesty's special charge unto us;—That, 1. The course already taken, should be truly reported. 2. That we should debate the Matter, and resolve among ourselves. 3. That we should admit of Conference with the Judges. 4. That we should make report of all the Proceedings unto the Council."

This Relation being made, the House did not enter into any further consideration of the matter at that time; but Resolved and Ordered, "That it should be the first matter moved the next morning."

Moved and urged by one, touching the Difference now on foot between the King and the House, "That there is just fear of some great abuse in the late Election. That in his conscience the King hath been much misinformed; and that he had too many misinformers, which, he prayed God, might be removed or lessened in their number. That now the Case of sir John Fortescue and sir Francis Goodwin was become, the case of the whole Kingdom. That old Lawyers forget, and commonly interpret the law according to the time.—That by this course the free Election of the country is taken away, and none shall be chosen but such as shall please the King and Council. Let us therefore, with fortitude, understanding and sincerity, seek to maintain our Privilege; which cannot be taken or construed any contempt in us, but merely a maintenance of our common right, which our ancestors have left us, and is just and fit for us to transfer to our posterity."

Another, for a law to be made, "That never any man outlawed, should shew his face here again. The difference, he observed, was some unrespective carriage towards his majesty in this matter; and therefore let our proceeding be dutiful and careful towards him, in advising of some speedy course to give his majesty satisfaction; that is (as he conceived) according to the king's project, first, to advise amongst ourselves, and then to confer with the Judges, not as Parliament-men, but as Counsellors; not as though they were to reverse our errors, but that we might be better informed; not now the Case of sir John and sir Francis, but a Case of great difference between the king and us, wherein we are deeply to consider the consequence if this pique be bruited in the country, abroad or beyond the seas. It is fit we let the king see how much we take to heart this matter, since our affections have so much appeared in the passing and present expediting of the Act of Recognition, &c."

Conclus. That we should tender our humble Petition to his majesty, for leave to make a Law for the banishing of all Outlaws hereafter from the Parliament, and pray, that we may hold all our Privileges entire.

A Third, "That we ought not to contest with the king; that it is fit to have a Conference: that by it we shall lose no Privilege, but rather gain; for the matters of the Conference will be two, satisfaction of the king, and putting in certainty our Privilege. All is not yet said that may be said; we are not to dispute with one that is governor of thirty legions. Confitemur est ne frustra interrogasset. Let us deal plainly and freely with the Lords, and let them know all the reasons. They are jealous of the Honour of a Privy-Counsellor, we of the Freedom of Election. It is fit great men maintain the Prerogative; so is it fit that we maintain our Privileges. This is a Court of Record, therefore ought we by all means seek to preserve the honour and dignity of it. If a burges be chosen for two places, the burges makes his choice for which he will serve, and a warrant shall be directed from Mr. Speaker, in the name of the house, to the Clerk of the Crown to send forth a Writ for a new Election for the other place left; which is a direct proof that it is a Court of Power and Record. We have a Clerk and a Register; all matters that pass here are entered of Record, and preserved. As they stand for the honour of a Counsellor, so we for our Privileges. It is to be wished, that we had a law to declare our Privileges, that we have a Court of Record and a Register."

Obj. We (they say) are but half of the body, and the Lords are the parts nearest the head.

Ans. Nothing ascends to the Head but by the Breasts, &c.—Concl. That we may pray it may be explained by a law what our Privileges are; and that no man outlawed may hereafter be admitted.—There must be a Judge of the Return before we sit; and this is now judged according to the positive laws of the realm by the king, which infringeth not our liberty, since we judge after the court is set, according to discretion.—No precedent, that any man was put out of the house for outlawry; therefore it had been fit we should have desired to inform the king that he was informed.—Let us now leave this particular Case to the king, and consider and resolve of the material Questions that will fall out in the debate of it. 1. Whether this Court hath power to take notice of Returns made before we sit here? 2. Whether men outlawed may be of the house? 3. Whether a man pardoned, having not sued forth a writ of Scire facias, may be called in question? 4. Whether the Writ were returned the 17th of Feb. or no, upon oath of the sheriff?"

Some others were strong in opinion, That we ought not to confer nor to commit; saying, "That majesty had conferred with Justice; yet majesty had left the stopping of the wound to us. We should taint ourselves with three great blemishes, if we should alter our Judgment, levity, cruelty and cowardice. There be three degrees of upright Judgment, motion, examination, judgment: all these have passed us. No Court can reform their own judgment. Every day a Term here. Every act that passeth this house is an Act of Parliament. Shall justice float up and down? Shall he be a member to-day, and shall we tear him off to-morrow? If the member be sound, it is violence: if the hand tear the rest, it is cruelty. No part torn, but it may bleed to the ruin of the whole. Let sir Francis Goodwin stand as he is: duty and courage may stand together; let not the house be inveigled by suggestions. This may be called a Quo Warranto to seize our Liberties.

There hath been three main Objections.

1. The King's Exception. 'We could shew no precedent in this kind.'

Ans. 'The King could show no such Writ before. Our hands were never sought to be closed before, nor we prevented. It opens a gap to thrust us all into the Petty-Bag. A Chancellor may call a Parliament of what persons he will by this course. Any suggestion by any person, may be cause of sending a new Writ.'

2 Obj. by the Lord-Chief-Justice. 'By the Law we had nothing to do to examine Returns.'

Ans. 'Judges cannot take notice of private Customs or Privileges: but we have a Privilege which stands with the law.' The Judges informed the king of the law, but not of a case of privilege. It is true, 35 Hen. 6. all the Judges resolved, That no outlawed man ought to be admitted; but that was controlled by parliament. It is the same Opinion now; let us control it as then: we have done no offence to the state; let us therefore be constant in our own Judgment.

3 Obj. Another, 'The king's pleasure, that we should deliver the Reasons of that we have done to be just.'

If we clear our contempt, we have discharged ourselves. The king's Bench cannot reverse their Judgment the same Term; therefore not the Parliament. Let us send a message to the lords, that we are ready so to do, as we do not undo this house.

Others, Non coronabitur qui non legitime

certaverit. Not to be termed a difference between his majesty and the commons. Rogamus, Auguste, non pugnamus. The Question is not of matter of Privilege, but of Judgment. Let us attend them as lords of the council, and not as lords of parliament.—We do no ways contest or contend with his majesty. The king is no way bound in honour. If writs go forth unduly, they may be controlled without impeachment to the king's honour. It is the act of his inferior officers. It is now come to this question, 'Whether the Chancery or Parliament ought to have authority?'

Quest. Whether we ought to satisfy the king in his commandment?

The King's message was that we should consider within ourselves, and resolve of ourselves; then no need to confer with the Judges: if we cannot, then it is fit to be resolved by the Judges. The Judges have judged, and we have judged: what need then of Conference? Let there be no spark of that grace taken from us, which we have had already from his majesty. Let our reasons be put into Articles, and delivered in all humbleness unto him.

Upon the conclusion of this Debate in this manner, the House proceeded to question; and the first was,

1. Quest. Whether the House was resolved in the matter?

And the Question was answered by general voice, That the whole house was resolved.

2. Quest. Whether the Reasons of their proceeding shall be set down in writing?

Resolved, That they shall be set down in writing: and ordered further, That a Committee should be named for that purpose, and appointed first to set them down in writing, and to bring them to the House, there to be published, and to receive their allowance.

The Committees were instantly named, viz. sir Rob. Wingfield, sir Geo. Moore, sir Fr. Bacon, Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Dyett, sir Fr. Hastings, Mr. Hedley, Mr. Recorder of London, sir Edw. Hobby, sir Fr. Barrington, Mr. Wiseman, Mr. Hide, Mr. Fuller, sir Edw. Mountague, Mr. Ravenscroft, sir W. Fleetwood, Mr. Winch, sir Tho. Challoner, Mr. Solicitor, sir Roger Wilbraham, sir John Thynne, Mr. Martin, sir Arthur Atye, Mr. Francis Tate, sir Roland Litton, sir Henry Nevill, Mr. Attorney of the Wards, sir John Hollis, sir Rob. Wroth, sir John Scott, Mr. Hitcham, sir Edw. Stafford, sir John Mallory, sir Herbert Crofts, sir Fr. Fane, sir Rd. Molyneux, sir John Hungerford, sir Edw. Herbert. All the Serjeants at Law. Mr. Nath. Bacon, Mr. Hext. To meet this afternoon in the Exchequer-Chamber.

The authority given unto them by the House, was this:

"The House being resolved upon the question, That the Reasons of their precedent Resolution, touching the Return, Admittance and Retaining of sir Francis Goodwin as a member of this house, should be set down in writing: these Committees were specially appointed to perform that service, and have Warrant from the house to send for any officer, to view and search any Record, or other thing of that kind, which may help their knowledge or memory in this particular service: And having deliberately by general consent set down all such reasons, they are to bring them in writing into the house, there to be read and approved, as shall be thought fit."

It was then moved, That Committees might be named to take the examination of the sheriff of Buckinghamshire, who was by former order sent for, and now come. And to that end were named, Mr. Solicitor, sir Rob. Wroth, sir W. Fleetwood, sir Tho. Challoner, sir Rob. Wingfield, Mr. Serj. Tanfield, Mr. Serj. Lee, Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Fr. Moore. Who were appointed to take his Examination presently.

Sir Charles Cornwallis moveth in excuse of sir Francis Goodwin's absence from the house, and prayeth, "That they would as well in their own judgment pardon it, as witness and affirm his care and modesty upon all occasions to the king, in that he hath forborne, during all the time of this question, to come into the house."

The Examination was presently taken by these Committees, and returned in this form.

Interr. 1. Why he removed the county from Aylesbury to Brickhill?

He saith, It was by reason of the Plague being at Aylesbury, the county being the 25th of Jan. at which time three were dead of the plague there. This was the only motive of removing his county.

Interr. 2. Whether he were present at the first Election?

Saith, He was present; and was as faithful to wish this second place to sir Francis Goodwin, as the first to sir John Fortescue: sent sir Francis Goodwin word, before the election, he should not need to bring any freeholders, for the election he thought would be without scruple for them both; first to sir John, second to sir Francis. About 8 of the clock he came to Brickhill; was then told by sir George Throckmorton, and others, that the first voice would be given for sir Francis; he answered, He hoped it would not be so, and desired every gentleman to deal with his freeholders. After eight of the clock went to the election a great number, there being at the county, * * * After the Writ read, he first intimated the points of the Proclamation; then jointly propounded sir John Fortescue and sir Francis Goodwin. The Freeholders cried first, 'A Goodwin, a Goodwin!' Every Justice of Pence on the Bench said, 'A Fortescue, a Fortescue!' and came down from the Bench before they named any for a second place, and desired the Freeholders to name sir John Fortescue for the first. Sir Francis Goodwin being in a chamber near, was sent for by the Sheriff and Justices; and he came down and earnestly persuaded with the Freeholders, saying, Sir John was his good friend, had been his father's, and that they would not do sir John that injury: notwithstanding the Freeholders would not desist, but all cried, 'A Goodwin, a Goodwin!' some crying, 'A Fortescue,' to the number of 60, or thereabouts; the other for sir Francis Goodwin, being about 2 or 300: and sir Francis Goodwin, to his thinking, dealt very plainly and earnestly in this matter for sir John Fortescue; for that sir Francis Goodwin did so earnestly protest it unto him.

Interr. 3. Who laboured him to make the Return so long before the day of the Parliament?

He being here in London, Mr. Attorney General, the 2nd of March, at his chamber in the Inner Temple, delivered him two Cap. Utlagat. against sir Francis Goodwin; and before he made his Return, he went and advised with Mr. Attorney about his Return, who penned it, and so it was done by his direction: and the Return being written, upon Friday after the king's coming through London, near about my Lord Chancellor's Gate, in the presence of sir John Fortescue, he delivered the Writ to sir George Coppin: and at this time (it being about 4 in the afternoon) and before they parted, sir John Fortescue delivered him the second Writ sealed; sir John Fortescue, sir George Coppin, and himself, being not above an hour together at that time, and never had but this new Writ of Parliament to him delivered. Subscribed, FRANCIS CHLYNE.

This was returned by the Committee to the hands of the Clerk, but not at all read in the house.—Mr. Speaker remembereth the matter of Conference with the Judges, and offered to repeat and put again the Questions that were formerly made; being before uncertainly and imperfectly left (as he said) in the Case of Buckinghamshire, viz. 1. Whether the House were resolved in the matter? 2. Whether they should confer with the Judges? And at length induced the house to entertain the latter Question; and being made, was carried by general voice in the negative, no conference.

Upon this passage, it was urged for a rule, That a Question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again; but must stand as a Judgment of the house.

It was thought fit that Mr. Speaker should attend the Committee for penning the Reasons in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, not by commandment, but voluntary of himself.

The Reasons of the proceeding of the house in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, penned by the Committee, were, according to former order, brought in by Mr. Francis Moore, and read by the Clerk, directed in form of a petition.

"To the King's most excellent Majesty, The humble Answer of the Commons House of Parliament to his Majesty's Objections in sir Francis Goodwin's Case.

"Most gracious, our dear and dread sovereign; Relation being made to us by our Speaker, of your majesty's royal clemency and patience in hearing us, and of your princely prudence in discerning; shewing affectionate desire rather to receive satisfaction to clear us, than cause to pardon us: we do in all humbleness render our most bounden thanks for the same; protesting, by the bond of our allegiance, that we never had thought to offend your majesty; at whose feet we shall ever lie prostrate, with loyal hearts, to sacrifice ourselves and all we have for your majesty's service: and in this particular, we could find no quiet in our minds, that would suffer us to entertain other thoughts, until we had addressed our answer to your most excellent majesty; for which nevertheless we have presumed of the longer time, in respect we have prepared some precedents, requiring search, to yield your majesty better satisfaction.

There were objected against us by your majesty and your reverend Judges, four things to impeach our proceedings, in receiving Francis Goodwin, knight, into our house.

Objection 1st, 'The first, That we assume to ourselves power of examining of the Elections and returns of knights and burgesses, which belonged to your majesty's Chancery, and not to us: for that all Returns of Writs were examinable in the courts wherem they are returnable; and the parliament writs being returnable into the Chancery, the returns of them must needs be there examined, and not with us.'

Our humble Answer is. That until the 7th Hen. 4. all Parliament-Writs were returnable into the parliament; as appeareth by many precedents of record ready to be shewed, and consequently the returns there examinable: in which year a Statute was made, That thenceforth every Parliament-Writ, containing the day and place where the parliament shall be holden, should have this clause, viz. 'Et electionem tuam in pleno comitatu factam distincte et aperte sub sigillo tuo et sigillis eorum qui electioni illi interuerint nobis in Cancellarium nostram ad diem et locum in breui content' certifies indilate.'

By this, although the form of the Writ be somewhat altered, yet the power of the parliament, to examine and determine of elections remaineth; for so the statute hath been always expounded ever since, by use to this day: and for that purpose, the Clerk of the Crown hath always used to attend all the Parliament-time, upon the Commons House with the Writs and Returns; and also the commons, in the beginning of every parliament, have ever used to appoint special committees, all the parliament-time, for examining controversies concerning elections and returns of knights and burgesses: during which time, the writs and Indentures remain with the Clerk of the Crown, and after the Parliament ended, and not before, are delivered to the Clerk of the Petty-bag in Chancery, to be kept there; which is warranted by reason and precedents: Reason, for that it is fit that the returns should be in that place examined, where the appearance and service of the writ is appointed. The appearance and service is in parliament, therefore the return examinable in parliament.

Precedents: One in the 29th of the late queen Eliz. where, after one Writ awarded into Norfolk for choice of knights, and elections made and returned, a second was before the Parliament-day awarded by the Lord Chancellor, and thereupon another election and return made; and the Commons being attended with both Writs and Returns by the Clerk of the Crown, examined the cause, allowed the first, and rejected the second. So anno 23 Eliz. a Burgess was returned dead, and a new chosen, and returned by a new Writ, the party returned dead appeared; the Commons, notwithstanding the Sheriff's return, admitted the first chosen, and rejected the second. Also, the said 23d year, a Burgess chosen for Hull was returned a lunatic, and a new chosen upon a second writ: the first claimed his place; the Commons examined the cause, and finding the return of Lunacy to be true, they refused him; but if it had been false, they would have received him. Anno 43 Eliz. the Sheriff of Rutlandshire returned himself elected; the Commons finding that he was not eligible by law, sent a Warrant to the Chancery for a new writ to choose a new. Anno 43 Eliz. also a Burgess was chosen for two Boroughs; the Commons, after he had made election which he would serve for, sent Warrant to the Chancery for a Writ to choose a new for the other borough: of which kind of precedents there are many other, wherewith we spare to trouble your majesty. All which together, viz. Use, Reason and Precedents, do concur to prove the Chancery to be a place appointed to receive the returns, as to keep them for the Parliament, but not to judge of them; and the inconvenience might be great, if the Chancery might, upon suggestions or sheriffs returns, send Writs for new elections, and those not subject to examination in parliament: for, so, when fit men were chosen by the counties and boroughs, the Lord-Chancellor, or the sheriffs, might displace them, and send out new Writs, until some were chosen to their liking; a thing dangerous in precedents for the time to come, howsoever we rest securly from it at this present by the now Lord Chancellor's integrity.

Objection 2. 'That we dealt in the cause with too much precipitation, not seemly for a council of gravity, and without respect to your most excellent majesty, our sovereign, who had directed the writ to be made; and being but half a body, and no court of record alone, refused conference with the lords, the other half, notwithstanding they prayed it of us.'

Our humble answer is, to the precipitation, That we entered into this cause, as in other parliaments of like cases hath been accustomed, calling to us the clerk of the crown, and viewing both the writs, and both returns; which in cases of * * * and motions, though not of bills requiring three readings, hath been warrant by continual usage amongst us: and thereupon, well finding that the latter writ was awarded and sealed before the Chancery was repossessed of the former, which the clerk of the crown, and the sheriff of the county, did both testify, and well held to be a clear fault in law, proceeded to sentence with the less respect of the latter election. For our lack of respect to your majesty, we confess, with grief of our hearts, we are right sorry it shall be so conceived; protesting that it was no way made known unto us before that time, that your majesty had taken to yourself any special notice, or directed any course in that cause, other than the ordinary awarding writs by your highness's officers in that behalf: but if we had known as much as some will have, by your majesty's royal mouth, we would not, without your majesty's privity, have proceeded in that manner. And further, it may please your majesty to give us leave to inform you, That in the examination of the cause of the sheriff avouched unto us, That Goodwin agreed to yield the first place of the two knights to sir John Fortescue, and in his own person, at the time of election, with extraordinary earnestness, entreated the electors it might so be, and caused the indentures to be made up to that purpose; but the electors utterly refused to seal them. Concerning our refusing conference with the lords, there was none desired until after our sentence passed; and then we thought, That in a matter private to our house, which, by rules of order, might not be by us revoked, we might, without any imputation, refuse to confer. Yet understanding by their lordships, That your majesty had been informed against us, we made haste (as in all duty we were bound) to lay open to your majesty, our good and gracious sovereign, the whole manner of our proceeding; 'not doubting, though we were but part of a body, as to make new laws, yet for any matter of privileges of our house, we are and ever have been a court of ourselves, of sufficient power to discern and determine without their lordships, as their lordships have used always to do for theirs without us.'

Objection 3. 'That we have, by our sentence of receiving Goodwin, admitted, That outlaws may be makers of laws; which is contrary to all laws.'

Our humble Answer, That notwithstanding the precedents which we truly delivered, of admitting and retaining outlaws in personal actions in the commons house, and none remitted for that cause; yet we received so great satisfaction delivered from your royal majesty's own mouth, with such excellent strength and light of reason, more than before, in that point, we heard or did conceive, as we forthwith prepared an act to pass our house, That all outlaws henceforth shall stand disabled to serve in parliament: but as concerning Goodwin's particular, it could not appear unto us, having thoroughly examined all parts of the proceedings against him, that he stood an outlaw, by the laws of England, at the time of the election made of him by the county; and that for two causes: the first is, That where the party outlawed ought to be five times proclaimed to appear in the sheriff's county court; and then not appearing, ought to be adjudged outlawed by the judgment of the coroners of the county; there appeareth no record made in the Hustings of London that Goodwin was five times proclaimed, or that the coroners gave judgment of outlawry against him: but a clerk, lately come to that office, hath now, many years after time, and since this election, made entries, interlined with a new hand, that he was outlawed: to which new entries we could give no credit, for that the parties, at whose suit Goodwin was sued, have testified in their writings of release, That they never proceeded further than to take out the writ of Exigent for an outlawry; and being then paid their money desisted there: by which we find, That Goodwin was not five times proclaimed, nor adjudged outlawed, being a thing usual in London to spare that proclamation and judgment, if the party call not upon it; and no record being made for many years together, that either of them was done.

The second Cause was, for that the Writ of Exigent by which the sheriff was commanded to proclaim him five times, was never lawfully returned, nor certified by Certiorari; without which, we take it, That Goodwin stood not disabled as an outlaw.

To this, adding the two general Pardons by Parliament, which had cleared the outlawry in truth and substance, (if any were) and that Goodwin could not apply the pardons by Scire fa. for that no record nor return was extant of the outlawry, wherupon he might ground a Scire fa. we were of opinion, and so your majesty's most reverend judges would have been if they had known thus much, That Goodwin stood not disabled by outlawry to be elected or serve in parliament: but when we considered further, That the course taken against Goodwin for drawing him into this outlawry of purpose to disable him to serve in this place, whereto the county had freely elected him, was unusual; we could not, with the reputation of our places, serving as a council of gravity, in allowance or continuance of that course, censure him to be rejected as an outlaw: the particulars of which were these, viz.—Two exigents awarded, * * * the other seven years past to the Hustings in London; no entry made of five proclamations; nor of any judgment of the coroners; nor any return of the exigents made or endorsed; the party plain if satisfied; the pretended outlawries being but upon a mean process; and as to your majesty's duties and contempts pardoned now since Goodwin was elected knight, the exigent now sought out since the election procured to be returned in the name of the sheriffs that then were, and are long since dead, and new entry made of the five proclamations and coroners judgment; and now a return made of that old exigent, which could be of no use, but only for a purpose to disable him for that place. Upon

Objection 4. 'That we proceeded to examine the truth of the fact of Outlawry, and gave our Sentence upon that: whereas we ought to have been bound by the Sheriff's return of the Outlawry from farther examining, whether the party were outlawed or not.'

Our humble Answer is, That the Precedents cited before, in our answer to the first objection, do prove the use of the Commons House to examine veritatem facti in elections, and returns, and have not been tied peremptorily to allow the return; as if a knight or burgesse be untruly returned dead or lunatic, yet when he appeared to the house to be living and sound, they have, contrary to the return, received him into the house, preferring the truth manifest before the return. By which discreet proceeding there is avoided that great inconvenience above-mentioned of giving liberty to Sheriffs, by untrue returns, to make and remove whom they list to and from the parliament service, how meet soever the parties be in the judgment of the county or borough that elected them.—Thus, in all humility, we have presented to your most excellent majesty the grounds and reasons of our late action, led with no affections, but guided by truth, warranted in our consciences, imitating precedents, maintaining our ancient privileges, honouring your excellent majesty in all our services; to which in all loyalty and devotion we bind us and ours for ever, praying daily on the knees of our hearts, to the majesty of the Almighty, that your majesty and your posterity may in all felicity reign over us and ours to the end of the world."

These Reasons so set down and published to the House, Mr. Secretary Herbert was sent with message to the lords, That the house had resolved of their Answer to his majesty, (in sir Francis Goodwin's Case) and had set it down in writing, and that it should be sent to their lordships before 4 of the clock in the afternoon; who immediately returned their Lordships Answer, That they would be ready at that time in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, with 30 of the lords, to receive what then should be delivered. Then were named threestore to attend the delivery of the said Reasons at the time and place aforesaid.

The House entering seriously into consultation what course was to be held with the lords; as also falling into more length of disputation touching the Bill of Merchants, than were expected, sent some messengers to the lords, to excuse their long tarrying, viz. Sir Edward Hobby, sir Ro. Wilbraham, sir Hen. Nevil, sir Fr. Hastings, Mr. Martyn.

This afternoon about 5 o'clock the Committee appointed did attend to deliver the Reasons aforesaid at the Council-Chamber according to appointment and order of both houses; and they were delivered by sir Francis

Sir Francis Bacon having the day before delivered to the lords in the Council-Chamber of Whitehall, (according to the Direction of the house) the Reasons in writing, penned by the Committee, touching sir Francis Goodwin's Case, maketh report of what passed at the time of the said delivery. First, That though the Committees employed were a number specially deputed and selected; yet that the lords admitted all burgeses without distinction; that they offered it with testimony of their own speed and care in the business, so as they said no one thing had precedency, but only the Bill of Recognition; that they had such respect to the weight of it, as they had not committed it to any frailty of memory, or verbal relation, but put it into writing for more permanent memory of their duty and respect to his majesty's grace and favour: that in conclusion they 'prayed their lordships, sithence they had nearer access, they would co-operate with them for the king's satisfaction; and so delivered the Writing to the Lord-Chancellor, who receiving it, demanded, Whether they should send it to the king, or first peruse it? To which was answered, That since it was the king's pleasure they should concur; they desired their lordships would first peruse.

The lord Cecil demanded, Whether they had Warrant to amplify, explain, or debate any doubt or question made upon the reading? To which it was said, They had no Warrant. And so the writing was read, and no more done at that time.

Mr. Speaker by a private commandment attended the King this morning at eight o'clock, and there staid till ten.

Mr. Speaker excuseth his absence, by reason he was commanded to attend upon his majesty. And bringeth Message from his majesty to this effect: That the King had received a parchment from the house. Whether it were an absolute resolution, or reason to give him satisfaction, he knew not: He thought it was rather intended for his satisfaction. His majesty protested, by that love he bare to the house as his loving and loyal subjects, and by the faith he did ever owe to God, he had as great a desire to maintain their privileges, as ever any prince had, or as themselves. He had seen and considered of the manner and the matter; he had heard his judges and council; and that he was now distracted in judgment. Therefore, for his further satisfaction, he desired, and commanded, as an absolute king, that there might be a Conference between the House and the Judges; and that for that purpose there might be a Select Committee of grave and learned persons out of the house: that his Council might be present, not as Umpires to determine, but to report indifferently on both sides.

Upon this unexpected Message there grew some amazement and silence. But at last one stood up and said: The Prince's command is like a thunder-bolt; his command upon our Allegiance like the roaring of a lion. To his command there is no contradiction; but how, or in what manner we should now proceed to perform obedience, that will be the question.

Another answered, Let us Petition to his majesty, that he will be pleased to be present, to hear, moderate, and judge the case himself. Whereupon Mr. Speaker proceeded to this question:

Quæst. Whether to confer with the Judges in the presence of the king and council? Which was resolved in the affirmative. And a select Committee presently named for the conference; viz. Lawyers; Serjeants Tanfield, Hobbard, Leigh, Shirley, Dodridge, sir Tho. Hesketh, sir Fr. Bacon, Mr. Recorder of London, Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Crewe, Mr. Lawrence Hide, Mr. Fr. Moore, Mr. Rd. Martin, Mr. Winche, Mr. Dyett, Mr. Fuller, sir Roger Wilbraham, Mr. Fr. Tate, Mr. Dr. James, sir Daniel Dunn, sir John Bennet.—Gentlemen; sir George Carew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen; sir Fr. Hastings, sir Edw. Hobby, sir Robert Wroth, sir Henry Nevill, sir John Savile, sir George Moore, Mr. Nath. Bacon, sir Edw. Stafford, sir Wm. Fleetwood, sir Tho. Chalonner, sir Roger Aston, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Edw. Mountague, sir Edwyn Sandis, sir Robert Cotton.

These Committees were selected and appointed to confer with the Judges of the Law, touching the Reasons of proceeding in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, set down in Writing, and delivered to his majesty in the presence of the lords of his majesty's Council, according to his highness's pleasure, signified by Mr. Speaker this day to the house.—It was further Resolved and Ordered by the house. (upon the motion to that end by Mr. Laurence Hide) that the aforesaid Committee should insist upon the fortification, and explaining of the Reasons and Answers delivered unto his majesty; and not proceed to any other Argument or Answer, what occasion soever moved in the time of that debate.

Sir Francis Bacon was expected, and called to make a Report of the late Conference with the Judges in the presence of his majesty and the lords of the Council: but he made excuse, saying, He was not warranted to make any Report; and tantum permissum quantum commissum: nevertheless, upon a Question, he was over-ruled to make a Report; and a motion thereupon made, That the Committees might first assemble in the Court of Wards, and confer among themselves, and then the report to be made.

Sir Francis Bacon, after the meeting of the Committees in the Court of Wards, reporteth

The king said, He would be president himself. This attendance renewed the remembrance of the last, when we departed with such admiration. It was the voice of God in man : the good spirit of God in the mouth of man. I do not say, the voice of God, and not of man. I am not one of Herod's flatterers. A curse fell upon him that said it : a curse on him that suffered it. We might say as was said to Solomon, We are glad, O king ! that we give account to you, because you discern what is spoken.—We let pass no moment of time, until we had resolved and set down an answer in writing, which we now had ready. That sithence we received a message from his majesty by Mr. Speaker, of two parts : 1. The one paternal. 2. The other royal. 1. That we were as dear unto him as the safety of his person, or the preservation of his posterity. 2. Royal, that we should confer with his Judges, and that in the presence of himself and his council. 'That we did more now to king James than ever was done since the conquest, 'in giving account of our judgments.' That we had no intent, in all our proceedings, to encounter his majesty, or to impeach his honour or prerogative.

This was spoken by way of preamble by him who employed.

How to report his majesty's Speech he knew not ; the eloquence of a king was inimitable. The King addressed himself to him as deputed by the house, and said, He would make three parts of what he had to say. The cause of the meeting was to draw to an end the difference in sir Francis Goodwin's Case. If they required his absence, he was ready ; because he feared he might be thought interested, and so breed an inequality on their part. He said, That he would not hold his Prerogative or honour, or receive any thing of any or all his subjects. This was his magnanimity. That he would confirm and ratify all just Privileges. This his bounty and amity. As a king, royally : as king James, sweetly and kindly out of his good-nature.—One point was, Whether we were a Court of Record, and had power to judge of Returns. As our court had power, so had the Chancery ; and that the court that first had passed their judgment should not be controlled.—Upon a surnise, and upon the sheriff's return, there grew a difference. That there are two powers. 1. Permanent : the other, transitory. That the Chancery was a confidenciary court to the use of the parliament during the time.—Whatever the Sheriff inserts beyond the authority of his mandate, a negation. The parliaments of England not to be bound by a sheriff's return.—That our Privileges were not in question. That it was private jealousies without any kernel or substance. 'He granted it was a Court of Record, and a Judge of Returns.' He moved, That neither sir John Fortescue, nor sir Francis Goodwin might have place ; sir John losing place, his majesty did meet us half-way. That when there did arise a schism in the church between a Pope and an Antipope, there could be no end of the difference until they were both put down.

Upon this Report, a motion was made, That it might be done by way of warrant ; and therein to be inserted, That it was done at the request of the king : and was further said, (as anciently it hath been said) That we lose more at a Parliament than we gain at a battle. That the authority of the committee was only to fortify what was agreed on by the house for answer, and that they had no authority to consent.—It was further moved by another, That we should proceed to take away our dissention, and to preserve our Liberties ; and said, that in this we had exceeded our commission ; and that we had drawn upon us a note of inconstancy and levity. But the acclamation of the house, was, That it was testimony of our duty, and no levity. So as the question was presently made.

Quest. Whether sir John Fortescue and sir Francis Goodwin shall both be secluded ; and a warrant for a new writ directed ? And upon the question resolved, That a writ should issue for a new choice, and a warrant directed accordingly.

A motion made, That thanks should be presented by Mr. Speaker to his majesty, for his presence and direction in this matter ; and thereupon ordered, That his majesty's pleasure should be known, by sir Roger Aston for their attendance accordingly.

Because it hath been conceived by some, that sir Francis Goodwin being the member specially interested, it were fit he should give testimony of his liking and obedience in this course : being dealt withal to that end, he writ his letter to Mr. Speaker ; which, before this question made, for better satisfaction of the house, was read in these words :

'Sir ; I am heartily sorry to have been the least occasion either of question between his majesty and that honourable house, or of interruption to those worthy and weighty causes, which by this time, in all likelihood, had been in very good furtherance : wherefore, understanding very credibly, that it pleased his majesty, when the committees last attended him, to take course with them for a third writ and election for the knightship of the county of Buckingham : I am so far from giving any impediment thereunto, that contrariwise, I humbly desire his majesty's direction in that behalf to be accomplished and performed. So praying you, according to such opportunity as will be ministered, to give furtherance thereunto, I take my leave, and rest yours, most assured to be commanded, FRA. GOODWIN. Westminster, 11 Apr. 1604.'

A motion made, That Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the house, should pray access to his majesty, and present their humble Thanks for his gracious presence and direction, upon the hearing of sir Francis Goodwin's cause; which was assented unto; and sir Roger Aston, a servant of his majesty's bed-chamber, and one of the members of the house, was presently appointed to know his majesty's pleasure; which he did accordingly; and returned, That his majesty was willing to give them access in the gallery at Whitehall, at two o'clock in the afternoon, the same day. Thereupon a Committee was named to attend Mr. Speaker to the king, with a general warrant to all others that should be pleased to accompany them.

Mr. Speaker returneth to the house the effect of his Message of Thanks, delivered the last day in the name of the house to his majesty; as also his Majesty's answer, viz. "That he related to this house the humble and dutiful acceptance of what his majesty had done, together with the humble thanks of the house for his zealous and paternal delivery of his grace unto us, by his own mouth: what wonder they conceived in his judgment, what joy in his grace, what comfort they had in his justice, what approbation they made of his prudence, and what obedience they yielded to his power and pleasure. That his direction gave all men satisfaction. That they were determined to pursue the course he had prescribed. That now they were become suitors, he would be pleased to receive a representation of the humble thanks and service of the house."

His majesty answered. "That upon this second access, he was forced to reiterate what he had said before. That this question was unhappily cast upon him, for he carried as great a respect to our privileges as ever any prince did; he was no ground searcher; he was of the mind that our privileges were his strength: that he thought the ground of our proceeding was our not understanding that he had intermeddled before we had decided: that he thought also we had no wilful purpose to derogate any thing from him, for our answer was a grave, dutiful, and obedient answer. But as the devil had unhappily cast this question between them, so he saw God had turned it to two good ends and purposes, One, That he knew, and had approved our loyalty. Another; That he had so good an occasion to make testimony of his bounty and grace. That as we came to give him thanks, so did he redouble his thanks to us. That he had rather be a king of his subjects, than to be a king of many kingdoms."

The second part of his Speech directed to the Lords and Us, "That this Parliament was not like to be long: that we would treat of such matters as most concerned the Commonwealth; and the last, of any thing that concerned himself. Three main businesses in our hands. 1. The Union. 2. Sundry public and commonwealth-Bills. 3. Matter of religion, and reformation of Ecclesiastical discipline. For the Union, that it might be now prepared, and prosecuted the next session. That Union which with the loss of much blood could never be brought to pass, as now it is. That the better to bring it to pass, we should be in affections united. That we should first with all care proceed in such laws as concern the general good. That all heresies and schisms might be rooted out, and care taken to plant and settle God's true religion and discipline in the church. That this wish above all things was at his death to leave, 1. One Worship to God. One Kingdom entirely governed. One Uniformity in Laws. Lastly, That his occasions were infinite, and much beyond those of his predecessors; and therefore that in this first parliament we would not take from him that which we had yielded to others. That in his affections he was no ways inferior to others, nor in his desire to ease us."

The Warrant for a new Election of a knight for Bucks, read and allowed in this form:

Whereas the right honourable sir John Fortescue, knight, Chancellor of his majesty's Dutchy of Lancaster, and sir Francis Goodwin, knight, have been severally elected and returned knights of the Shire for the county of Bucks, to serve in this present parliament: upon deliberate consultation, and for some special causes moving the commons house of parliament, It is this day ordered and required by the said house, That a Writ be forthwith awarded for a new election of another knight for the said Shire: And this shall be your Warrant.'

Directed, 'To my very loving friend, sir George Coppin knight, Clerk of the Crown in his majesty's High Court of Chancery.'

78. The CASE of MIXED MONEY in Ireland, Trin. 2 JAMES I. A. D. 1605. [Davies's Reports.]

["As the following Case relates to the King's Prerogative of regulating the Coinage* and Value of Money, in which the whole State is so immediately and essentially interested, it

* The royal prerogatives of regulating the Coinage and Value of Money, and the history of the exercise of those prerogatives are well exhibited in the earl of Liverpool's Treatise on the Coins of this realm.

properly falls within the scope of this Collection. It is taken from the English edition of sir John Davies's Reports." Hargrave.]

QUEEN Elizabeth in order to pay the royal army which was maintained in this kingdom for several years, to suppress the rebellion of Tyrone, caused a great quantity of Mixed Money, with the usual stamp of the arms of the crown, and inscription of her royal stile, to be coined in the Tower of London, and transmitted this money into this kingdom, with a Proclamation, bearing date 24 May, in the 43d. year of her reign, by which her majesty declared and established this Mixed Money, immediately after the said proclamation, to be the lawful and current money of this kingdom of Ireland, and expressly commanded that this money should be so used, accepted and reputed by all her subjects and others, using any traffic or commerce within this kingdom; and that if any person or persons should refuse to receive this Mixed Money according to the denomination or valuation thereof, viz. shillings for shillings, sixpenny pieces for sixpenny pieces, &c. being tendered for payment of any wages, fees, stipends, debts, &c. they should be punished as contemners of her royal prerogative and commandment. And to the intent that this Mixed Money should have the better course and circulation, it was further declared by the same proclamation, that after the 10th day of June immediately following, all other money which had been current within this kingdom, before the said proclamation, should be cried down and annulled and esteemed as bullion, and not as lawful and current money of this kingdom.

In April, before this Proclamation was published, when the pure coin of England was current within this kingdom, one Brett of Drogheda, merchant, having bought certain wares of one Gilbert in London, became bound to the said Gilbert in an obligation of 200*l.* on condition that he should pay to the said Gilbert, his executors or assigns, 100*l.* sterling, current and lawful money of England, at the tomb of earl Strongbow in Christ-church, Dublin, at a certain day to come; at which day and place, Brett made a tender of the 100*l.* in the Mixed Money of the new standard, in performance of the condition of the obligation; and whether this tender was sufficient to save the forfeiture of the obligation, or whether the said Brett should now, upon the change or alteration of money within this kingdom, be compelled to pay the said 100*l.* in other or better coin than in the Mixed Money, according to the rate and valuation of it, at the time of the tender, was the question at the council table, where the said Gilbert, who was a merchant of London, exhibited his Petition against the said Brett, for the speedy recovery of his debt aforesaid.

And, inasmuch as this case related to the kingdom in general, and was also of great importance in consideration and reason of state, sir George Carew, then Lord Deputy and also Treasurer, required the Chief Judges, (being of the privy council) to confer on and consider this Case, and to return to him their Resolution touching it; who upon conference and consideration on all the points of the said Proclamation, resolved, That the tender of the 100*l.* in the Mixed Money, at the day and place aforesaid, was good and sufficient in the law, to save the forfeiture of the said obligation, and that Brett should not be obliged at any time after, to pay other money in discharge of the debt, than this Mixed Money, according to the rate and valuation that it had, at the time of the tender; and this Resolution was certified by them to the Lord-Deputy, and the certificate entered in the Council-Book. And in this case divers Points were considered and resolved.

First, it was considered, that in every commonwealth, it is necessary to have a certain standard of money. [Cotton 4.] For no Commonwealth can subsist without contracts, and no contracts without equality, and no equality in contracts without money. For although in the first societies of the world, permutation of one thing for another was used, yet that was soon found cumbersome, and the transportation and division of things was found difficult and impossible; and therefore money was invented, as well for the facility of commerce, as to reduce contracts to an equality. 'Cum non facile concurrebat, ut cum tu haberes quod ego desiderarem, ego invicem haberem quod tu accipere velles, electa materia est, cujus publica et perpetua mensuratio difficultatibus permutationem subveniret.' Paul. lib. 1. ff. de contrahendis empt. and therefore money is said by Bodin to be mensura publica; and Budelius lib. 1. De re nummariâ, ca. 3. saith 'moneta est justum medium et mensura rerum commutabilium, nam per medium monetæ fit omnium rerum, quæ in mundo sunt, conveniens et justa æstimatio.' And to this purpose Keble saith, 12 H. 7. 23: b. that every thing ought to be valued per argent; by which word argent, he meaneth money coined. And the great utility of a certain standard of money and of measures is well expressed by Budelius in this verse,

Una fides, pondus, mensura, moneta sit una,
Et status illæsus totius orbis erit.

Secondly, it was resolved, That it appertaineth only to the king of England, to make or coin Money within his dominions; [2 Ro. ab. 166. 1 Co. 146. 5 Co. 114. 1 H. H. P. C. 188.] so that no other person can do it without special license or commandment of the king; and if any person presume to do it of his own head, it is treason against the person of the king by the common law; and this appears by the stat. of 25 Edw. 3, c. 2, (which is only a declaration of the common law,) and by Glanvil, Britton and Bracton, before that statute, Stamford fol. 2 and 3. And in the case of Mines, Plowd. 316, a. this point is expressed more clearly, where it is said, That the king shall have mines of gold and silver; for if a subject had them, he by law could not coin such metals, nor stamp a print or value upon them, for it appertaineth to the king only to put a value upon coin, and make the price of the quantity, and to put a print to it; which being done the coin is current; and if a subject doth this it is high treason at common law, as appears, 23 Ass. p. 2. and it is high treason to the king, because he hath the sole power of making Money, &c.

And in this book three things are expressed, which are requisite to the making of lawful money, viz. The authority of the Prince, the Stamp, and the Value. But upon the consideration of the case in question, it was observed, that six things or circumstances ought to concur, to make lawful and current money, viz. 1. Weight. 2. Fineness. 3. Impression. 4. Denomination. 5. Authority of the Prince. 6. Proclamation. [See 1 H. H. P. C. 196, that Proclamation is not always necessary] For every piece of money ought to have a certain proportion of weight or poise, and a certain proportion of purity or fineness, which is called alloy. Also every piece ought to have a certain form of impression, which may be knowable and distinguishable; for as wax is not a seal without a stamp, so metal is not money without an impression: 'Et moneta dicitur a monendo, quia impressione nos monet, cujus sit moneta. Cujus imago est hæc? Cæsaris: Date Cæsari quæ sunt Cæsaris.' Also every piece of money ought to have a denomination or valuation for how much it shall be accepted or paid, as for a penny, a groat or a shilling. And all this ought to be by authority and commandment of the prince, for otherwise the money is not lawful; and it ought to be published by the proclamation of the prince, for before that, the money is not current.—These circumstances appear in the antient ordinances made by the king for the coining of money, as well in this kingdom as in England, which are to be found in the Tower of London there, and in the Castle of Dublin here. Also the indentures between the king and the masters of the mint prescribe the proportion of weight, fineness, and alloy, the impression or inscription, the name and the value. See the stat. 2 Hen. 6, c. 12, where mention is made of these indentures; see also Wade's case, 5 Co. 114. b. that the king by his proclamation may make any coin lawful money of England; à fortiori, he may, by his proclamation only, establish the standard of money coined by his authority within his own dominions.

And that the king by his Prerogative may also put a price or valuation on all coins, appears by a remarkable case, 21 Edw. 3, 60, b. In the time of Will. the Conqueror, the abbot of St. Edmundsbury complained to the king in parliament, that whereas he was exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary by divers antient charters, the bishop of Norwich had visited his house, contrary to those charters of exemption; upon which it was granted and ordained in parliament, that if from thenceforward the bishop of Norwich or any of his successors should go against the aforesaid exemption, they should pay to the king or his heirs thirty talents or besants. Afterwards in the time of Edw. 3, the bishop of Norwich visited the house again, against the ordinance aforesaid; and this contempt being found in the King's-beach, a scire facias issued against the bishop to shew why he should not pay to the king the thirty talents or besants; and upon an insufficient plea pleaded by the bishop, the court awarded that they should recover the talents or besants, and that it should be interpreted by the king himself of what value they should be, more or less; by which it is manifest that where talents or besants, or such other pieces or quantities of gold or silver are of uncertain value, for Budelius saith that 'tanta lenta sunt varia, et pondera sunt, potius quam numismata', the king hath a power to put a certain value upon them, according to the rule well known to the civilians, 'monetæ æstimationem dat, qui cudendi potestatem habet.' And in this point the common law of England agrees well with the rules of the civil law, 'jus cudendæ monetæ ad solam principem, hoc est, imperatorem, de jure pertinet. Monetandi jus principum ossibus inhæret. Jus monetæ comprehenditur in regalibus, quæ nunquam a regio sceptro abdicantur.'—Yet by antient charters, this privilege or prerogative hath been communicated to some subjects in England; as, to the archbishop of Canterbury by charter of king Athelstan, Lamb. peramb. Kant. fol. 291. The archbishop of York and bishop of Durham had mines and power of coining money, as appears by the statute of 14 Hen. 8, c. 12; and the dean of St. Martin's-le-grand had the same privilege, as is manifest from the stat. of 19 Edw. 4, c. 1. And this right of coining money hath been granted to several great personages in France heretofore, as Choppinus relates, lib. de Dominio Franc. fol. 217, a. And this prerogative at this day is imparted too generally to all the inferior princes and states of Germany by grant or permission of the emperor; for it is a law of the empire, 'Jus cudendæ monetæ, nisi cui ab imperatore concessum fuerit, nemo usurpato.'

Thirdly it was resolved that as the king by his prerogative [1 H. H. P. C. 192] may make money of what matter and form he pleaseth, and establish the standard of it, so may he change his money in substance and impression, and enhance or debase the value of it, or entirely decay and annul it, so that it shall be but bullion at his pleasure. And note, that bullion, which in Latin is called bullio, 'est moneta defensa et prohibita, quæ videlicet usu caret.' And that the king hath used this Prerogative in England, appears, by several notorious changes of money, made in the time of several kings since the Norman conquest. 26 Hen. 2, 'Monetâ veteri reprobata, nova successit.' Matt. Paris Hist. mag. fol. 35. a.—Anno 7 Joh. a new money was coined, at which time the first sterling money was coined, according to the opinion of Camden, where he speaketh of Sterling-Castle in Scotland, fol. 700 b.—32 Hen. 3, the king was obliged to make new money, 'cum moneta Angliæ circumcidetur batur à circumcisis Judæis,' as Matt. Paris saith, fol. 703. a.—7 Ed. 1, the standard of money was renewed, when the sterling penny was established to contain 'vicesimum partem uncie,' as appears by the old Magna Charta, in the ordinance called Compositio Mensurarum, where it is ordained, 'quod viginti denarii faciant unciam.'—Anno 29 Ed. 1. when the money called Pollards was cried down, a new sterling money was also coined; see 6 Ed. 6. Dyer 82. b. et lib. rubr. Scacc. Dubl. part 2. fol. 1. b. After this new monies were made, 9 Ed. 3, and 13 Hen. 4, and 5 Ed. 4, and 19 Hen. 7, and 36 Hen. 8; and lastly 2 Eliz., when all mixed and base money was cried down, and the standard of pure silver established, which continues to this day, of which Bodin maketh honourable mention, Libro 6 de Republica, cap. 3.

And it seems these changes of money in England were made by the authority of the king without Parliament: although several acts of parliament have been made for the ordering of exchange, and to prohibit the exportation of money made and ordained by the king, and the importation and utterance of foreign and false money, under certain pains and penalties, of which some were capital and some pecuniary. And several ordinances of the king made without the parliament are called statutes; as Statutum de Monetâ magnum, et Statutum de Monetâ parvum: which are called statutes, because the ordinance of the king with proclamation in such case hath the force of an act of parliament.

And as the king hath used to change the standard of his money, to wit, the form and the substance, so hath he used by his prerogative to enhance or debase the value of it, notwithstanding that the form and substance continueth as it was before. [1 H. H. P. C. 192.] And this was done, 5 Ed. 4, as appears by the book, of 9 Ed. 4. 49, where Danby saith, that a Noble was better then, than it was anno 20 of that king, by 20*d.* in each Noble. And king Hen. 8, by special commission dated 24 July, anno 18 of his reign, authorised cardinal Wolsey, with the advice of other of the privy council, to put a value on all the moneys of England, from time to time, according to the rates and values of the monies of foreign nations, which were then too much enhanced, especially by the emperor and the king of France, as is expressed in the said commission. See also 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82 and 83. several cases on the debasement of money.—And it is to be observed, that between the 36 of Hen. 8, when several sorts of debased money were coined in England, and 2 Eliz., when the pure standard of silver money was established, there were three notorious falls or cry-downs, of base monies, published by proclamation: the first, 9 July, 5 Ed. 6.; the second, 17 August, the same year, as is mentioned, Dyer 83, a.; the third, 28 Sep. 2 Eliz.

And as the king hath always used to make and change the money of England, he hath also used the same prerogative in Ireland ever since the 12th year of king John; when the first standard of English money was established in this kingdom, as is recorded by Matt. Paris, Magn. Hist. 220. b. where it is said, that this king being in Ireland, 'constituit ibidem leges et consuetudines Anglicanas, ponens ibidem vicecomites, aliosque ministros, qui populum

'regni illius juxta leges Anglicanas judicarent. Præfeci autem ibidem Johannem de Gray episcopum Norwicensem, justiciarium, qui denarium terræ illius ad pondus numismatis Angliæ fecerat publicari, et tam obolum quam quadrantem rotundum fieri præcepit: jussit quoque rex, ut illius monetæ usus tam in Angliâ quam in Hiberniâ communis ab omnibus haberetur, et utriusque regni denarius in thesauris suis indifferenter poneretur.'—By which it appeareth that the standard of money in England and in Ireland was equal at first, and that the English money was not a fourth part better in value than the Irish, as it hath been since the time of Ed. 4., for before that, as there was one and the same standard of money in both kingdoms, so always when the money was changed in England, it was also changed in Ireland. As in the year 1279, viz. 7 Ed. 1. when that king established new money in England, as is shewn before, there was likewise a change of money in Ireland, as is observed in the annals of this kingdom, published by Camden in his Britannia, where it is said, that in the year 1279, 'Dominus Robertus de Ufford justiciarius Hiberniæ intravit Angliam, et constituit loco fratrem Robertum de Fulborne episcopum Waterford, cujus tempore mutata est moneta.' So 29 Ed. 1. when by special ordinance of the king the Pollards and Crockards were decried and annulled, the same ordinance was transmitted into this kingdom and enrolled in the Exchequer here, as is found in Lib. Rubr. Scacc. part 2, fol. 2. b. Also in the annals aforesaid it is observed in the same year, 'numisma pollardarum prohibetur in Angliâ et Hiberniâ. And as the standard of the monies was equal, so the mints and coinage in this kingdom were ordered and governed in the same manner as in England, as appears by the account of Donat and Andrew de Sperdshols, assay masters in Dublin, 9 and 10 Ed. 1. in Archivis Castri Dublin, and in Libr. Rubr. Scacc. hic part 2. fol. 1. and in Rot. Parl. in Castri Dublin, 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. See also several ordinances there touching the mint and monies, 7 Ed. 4. c. 9. 10 Ed. 4. c. 4. 16 Ed. 4. c. 2. 19 Ed. 4. c. 1. 1 R. 3. c. 7.

But the first difference and inequality between the standard of English and Irish monies, is found in 5 Ed. 4. for then it was declared in parliament here, that the Noble made in the time of Ed. 3, Rich. 2, Hen. 4, Hen. 5, and Hen. 6, should be from that time forth current in this kingdom for 10*s.* and so of the demynoble, and all other coins according to the same rate. See Rot. Parl. 5 Ed. 4. c. 40. and 11 Ed. 4. c. 6. and 15 Ed. 4. c. 5. in the Roll's-office in the Castle of Dublin. After which time the money made in Ireland or for Ireland was always less in value than the money of England, and the usual proportion of the difference was the fourth part only, viz. the Irish shilling was only 9*d.* English. See the proclamation aforesaid, dated the 24 of May, 43 Eliz. enrolled in the Chancery here, where the queen makes mention of this difference made by her progenitors between the standard of money made for this kingdom; and the money of England. And note, that that which is called the standard of money in this case, is the same which is called by the French piéd de money, by Bodin pes monetarum; as if the prince there pedem figat, having established the weight and purity of money in a certain proportion, which should not be transgressed by the moneyers.

And so it is manifest, that the kings of England have always had and exercised this prerogative of coining and changing the form, and when they found it expedient of enhancing and abasing the value of money within their dominions: and this prerogative is allowed and approved not only by the common law, but also by the rules of the imperial law. Budeus de re nummariâ, libr. 1. c. 5. 'Princeps ad arbitrium suum, irrequisito assensu subditorum; valorem monetæ constituere potest; quia populus, quantum ad hoc, omnem potestatem et jurisdictionem in principem seu imperatorem transtulisse dicitur.' And a little after in the same chapter, although some doctors are of opinion, 'principem sine assensu populi monetam mutare non posse,' yet he concludes, 'si princeps consuevisset mutare monetam auctoritate propriâ, sine consensu populi, a tempore cuius initii memoria non existit, tunc libere imposterum eum hoc facere posse. L. hoc jure Paragr. ductus aquæ. ff. de aqua quotid. &c.' And Covarruvias, libro de collatione veterum numismatum, cap. De mutatione monetæ, saith, 'princeps potest mutare monetam ratione publicæ utilitatis, viz. tempore belli, vel si alias utile populo sit futurum, ita etiam, ut ex corio fieri possit.' And it is observed by Molineus, libro de mutatione monetæ, cap. 100, that the state of Rome in the first Punick war, when Hannibal had possession of a great part of Italy, and all their treasure was exhausted, enhanced base money to a great value, for the payment of their armies; and yet the justice of that state was then famous throughout the world. But 'nihil est magis justum, quam quod necessarium,' by which it appears, that the mixed money was made by queen Eliz. on a just and honourable cause.

Fourthly, it was resolved, that the said mixed money having the impression and inscription of the queen of England, and being proclaimed for lawful and current money within this kingdom of Ireland, ought to be taken and accepted for sterling money; and on consideration of this point, the name and the nature of Sterling Money were enquired and discovered. As to the name of Sterling some doctors of the civil law, being deceived by the erroneous report of Polydore Virgil, have conceived, that this English money was called Sterling, because the form of a stare, the diminutive of which is sterling, was imprinted or stamped upon it, and therefore Covarruvias, lib. de collatione veterum numismatum, c. 2. 'sterling' (saith he) 'est argenteus nummus

'Anglicus ex vicesima sexta parte uncie, nam viginti sex nummi argentei sterlingi pendebant unciam, autore Polydore Virgilio, in Hist. Anglicâ, lib. 16. Dicitur autem est hic nummus, ut idem author tradit, sterling, quod sturnus avis, Anglice a sterling, in altera parte nummi esset impressa.' To the same purpose Choppinus de Domano Franc. lib. 2. tit. 7. hath this note, ceterum Errico 3. Britannie rege, primum percussa est nunc usitatissima sterlingorum moneta, ab effigie sturni sic dicta, anno 1249.' These doctors being strangers, were, it seems, misinformed by Polydore Virgil, who was also an alien and a stranger. But our Liwood also (who made his Gloss on the provincial constitutions of England, in the time of Hen. 6.) tit. de testam. C. Item, quia, verbo, Centum solidos, saith, 'sterling nomen erat argentæ monetæ, et habebat similitudinem denarii usualis, hoc salvo, quod in unâ quartâ habebat effigiem avis, quæ vocatur sturnus, Anglice, sterling.'

Others have been of opinion, that this English money had the name of Sterling, because the first money of this standard was coined in the Castle of Sterling in Scotland by king Ed. 1. But this is also an erroneous opinion, as is noted by Cambden in Scotia, pag. 700. where speaking of Sterling-Castle, he saith, that 'quidam monetam probam Angliæ quæ sterling money dicitur, hinc debominatam volunt, frustra sunt; a Germanis enim, quos Angli Esterlingos ab orientali situ vocarunt, facta est appellatio; quos Johannes rex, ad argentum in suam puritatem redigendum, primus evocavit; et ejusmodi nummi, Esterlingi, in antiquis scripturis semper reperuntur.'

And this latter opinion, without doubt, is the better and more probable, by the judgment of all the most learned antiquarians of England. For in all the antient statutes which make mention of this money, it is called esterling. As 9 Ed. 3. c. 2. &c. 'no false money counterfeit esterling shall be imported into our realm;' and the same year c. 3. 'no esterling halfpenny or farthing shall be molten to make vessel,' &c. and 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. 'the money of gold and silver, which is now current, shall not be impaired in weight or alloy, but shall be put in the antient state as in the esterling.' And Matt. Paris, Magn. Hist. fol. 403. where he expresses the form of the obligation made by the clergy of England to the pope's bankers resident in London, makes mention of this money by the name of esterling; 'Noveritis nos recipisse ab (A. and B. &c.) centum uncias bonorum et legalium esterlingorum, tresdecim solidis et quatuor sterlingis pro qualibet uncia computatis.' And the same author, fol. 710, saith, 'eodem tempore moneta Esterlingorum, propter sui materiam desiderabilem, detestabili circumcissione cæpit deteriorari et corrumpi.' And fol. 575. 'Comitissa de Biarde venit ad regem cum 60 militibus, ducta cupidine Esterlingorum, quibus noverat regem Angliæ abundare, et accepit a rege

'qualibet die pro stipendio tresdecim libras Esterlingorum, &c.' And Hoveden, in Rich. 1. fol. 377. b. makes mention of this money in these words, 'videns igitur Galfridus Eboracensis electus, quod nisi mediante pecuniâ amorem regis fratris nullatenus habere possit, promisit ei tria millia librarum Sterlingorum pro amore ejus habendo;' and this was before the time of king John; from whence it seems, that the time when this money was first coined is uncertain; for some say that it was made by Osbriht a king of the Saxons 160 years before the Norman Conquest. And so as Nummus is called from Numa, who was the first king who made money in Rome, so Sterling is called from the Esterlings who first made the money of this standard in England, by a metonymia, substituting the name of the inventor for the thing invented, as Ceres pro frumento, Bacchus pro vino, &c.

And it is to be observed, that the Esterlings were the first founders of the four principal cities of Ireland, viz. Dublin, Waterford, Cork and Limerick, and of the other maritime towns in this kingdom, and were the sole maintainers of traffic and commerce, which was utterly neglected by the Irish. These cities and towns were under the protection of king Edgar and Edward the Confessor before the Norman Conquest: and these Esterlings in the antient records of this kingdom are called Ostmanni. And therefore, when Hen. 2. upon the first conquest, thought it better to people these cities and towns with English colonies taken from Bristol, Chester, &c. he assigned to these Ostmen certain proportion of land next adjoining to each of these cities, which portion is called in the records of antient times, Cantreda Ostmannorum. And all this was observed on the name of Sterling.

For the nature or substance of this money, first it was observed, that the coin which was properly called the Sterling was the denier or silver penny, as appears in the ordinance called compositio mensurarum made in the time of E. 1. where it is said, 'denarius Angliæ, qui nominatur sterlingus rotundus, sine tonsura, ponderabitur triginta et duo grana in medio spicæ,' &c. and every other coin or piece of silver was measured by the sterling penny, as the groat contained the value of four sterlings, and the half groat the value of two sterlings, 25 Edw. 3. c. 6. and the shilling consisted of twelve sterlings, Linwood de Testamentis, C. item quia, verb. Centum solidos; and the Mark consisted of 13s. and four sterlings, as before is shewn from Matt. Paris; and the maile (half-penny) was the half of a sterling; and the farthing the fourth part of a sterling. See an ordinance without date in the Magna Charta printed by Tottel, anno 1556, fol. 167, and in Rastall's old Abridgment, money 52, 'quia multorum regum temporibus provisum fuit, quod propter pauperes denarius argenti, viz. sterlingus, divideretur in obolum et quadrantem, ex parte domini regis precipitur, quod quicumque recusaverit obolum vel quadrantem

'debitam habentem formam, capiatur.' See 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82, in the case of Pollards, where it appears that a sterling and a denier were the same; for there it is said that two pollards passed for one sterling, and accordingly two sterlings* were paid for one denier. And indeed in antient time, every sort of money, made of the several metals of which money was usually coined, was properly called a denarius; and therefore the French and Italians speak properly, when they call all money deniers and denarii, for coins (nummi) were either copper, silver or gold: each silver one was worth ten of copper, and so was called a denier; and each gold one was worth ten of silver, and in this respect these were likewise deniers. And the antient proportion of gold to silver was as ten to one; and this proportion, as it seems, David observed in the treasure of gold and silver which he prepared for the building of the temple; for the text says, Chron. chap. xxii. ver. 14, 'that he provided for that purpose 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of silver.' So the first and proper sterling coin was a denier.

And for the substance of this denier or sterling penny in Weight and Purity: as to the Weight, it was at first the 20th part of an ounce, viz. an ounce was cut into 20 sterling deniers and no more. See the compositio mensurarum made in the time of Ed. 1. 'in veteri libro de magnâ chartâ,' fol. 113. b. and in Rastall's old abridgment, tit. weights and measures, 4. where it is said, that 'viginti denarii faciunt unciam, et duodecim uncie faciunt libram;' and so it was until 9 Ed. 3. at which time the ounce of silver was cut into 26 pence. Annal. de Rob. de Avesbury MS. See several ordinances touching the new sterling money, made 9 Ed. 3. Rastall, money 345. And such proportion was continued until 2 Hen. 6. when the ounce of silver made 32 pence; and this appears by the statute of 2 Hen. 6. c. 13, and also by Linwood, 'de testamentis, cap. item quia, verb. cent. solid. 'Hic solidus,' saith he, 'sumitur pro duodecim denariis Anglicanis; horum 26 ponderabant unciam, cum tamen jam 32 denarii vix faciunt unciam.' And this gloss was wrote in the beginning of the reign of Hen. 6. as it is mentioned in the preface to his book. This standard was continued until the 5 Ed. 4. and then the ounce of silver made 40 pence; 9 Ed. 4. 49. a. and 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. in Rot. Parl. Dublin. And this continued until 36 Hen. 8. when the king prepared for his journey to Bullogne; and then an ounce of silver was cut into 60 pence, and that standard remains to this day. And so the sterling penny, which was at first the 20th part of an ounce, is now the 60th part of an ounce; and by consequence, the antient sterling penny contained as much silver as is contained in the three-penny piece that is now current.

And as to the purity of this sterling [1 H. H.

* So in the original; but quæ, whether it should not be pollards?

P. C. 190.] money, 18s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. of the purest silver was contained in each pound, and each pound of sterling money had 1s. 6d $\frac{1}{2}$ . alloy of copper, and no more; and of this alloy of sterling money, the ordinances or statutes of 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. and 2 Hen. 6. c. 13. make mention. But this is well known to all moneyers, and is contained in all the indentures made between the king and the masters of the mint.

Then the Sterling Money being of such weight and fineness, the doubt primâ facie, was, how this Mixed Money should be said to be sterling. And for the clearing of this doubt, it was said, that in each common piece of Money, there is 'bonitas intrinseca, et bonitas extrinseca: intrinseca consistit in præiositate materie et pondere,' viz. fineness and weight; 'extrinseca bonitas consistit in valuatione seu denominatione, et in formâ seu caractere.' Budel. de re nummariâ, lib. 11. cap. 7. And this bonitas extrinseca, which is called 'estimatio sive valor impositivus, est formalis et essentialis monetæ,' and this form giveth name and being to money; for without such form, the most precious and pure metal that can be is not money; and therefore, Molinæus, lib. de mutat. Monetæ, saith, 'non materia naturalis corporis monetæ, sed valor impositivus est forma et substantia monetæ, quæ non est corpus physicum sed artificiale,' as Aristotle saith, Ethic. lib. 5. And so Polit. lib. 1. he saith to this effect, that money was first signed and imprinted with a certain character, to the intent, that the people might accept it on the credit of the prince or state who publishes it, without examination or trial of the weight or purity. And to this purpose Molinæus hath this rule, Q. 99. 'de jure non refert sive plus sive minus argenti insit, modo publica, proba, et legitima monetæ sit.' Et Balau. l. singulari, saith, 'in pecunia potius attenditur usus et curâ sus quam materia.' And Seneca, lib. 5. de beneficiis, 'Æs alienum habere dicitur, et qui aureos debet, et qui corium formâ publicâ percussus.' And it was said that the king hath the same prerogative to give value to base metal by his impression or character, as he hath to give estimation to a mean person by imparting the character of honour to him; 'sic fiet viro quem rex honorare desiderat.'

And so it was concluded, that after the Esterlings, by command of the king of England, had made this pure English money, which from the name of the makers was called esterling or sterling money, the standard of which hath been always the most fixed and unchanged in all the world, (which hath been a great honour to our nation, for in all other kingdoms and states, the standards of their money are more unsteady and variable,) all money coined by the authority of the king of England, and having his character and impression, not only in England, but also in Scotland and Ireland, hath been sterling money, and so called, reputed and taken by all people, whether the matter of it were mixed or pure. And this appears by the ordinance which is called 'sta-tutum de moneta magnum,' by which all money is prohibited, only the money of England, of Ireland and of Scotland, which was properly the sterling money. And therefore Freherus, lib. de re nummariâ, where he enumerates the different money of different nations; 'sterlingi,' saith he, 'habentur in Angliâ, Scotia et Hiberniâ.' And Bodin, lib. 6. de republ. c. 3. speaking of the money of Scotland; in Scotland, saith he, are two pounds, (livres) very different; one of esterlings, the other customary. And certainly the usual Scottish pound (livre) is like the French livre, and the pound (livre) esterling current there is that of England. And that base or Mixed Money may be current for sterling, appears by the said case of Pollards, Dyer 82. b. where it is said, 'quod currebat quædam moneta in Angliâ loco sterlingi quæ vocabatur pollards, viz. duo pollardi pro uno sterlingo.'

Fifthly, it was resolved, that although this Mixed Money was made to be current within this kingdom of Ireland only, yet it may well be said, current and lawful money of England, for two causes.—1. Because this kingdom is only a member of the imperial crown of England; and this appears 3 Hen. 7. 10. a. where a question was propounded to the justices by Hobart, Attorney general, 'si quis sciens monetam ad similitudinem monetæ regis Angliæ contrafactam, talem monetam in Angliam extra Hiberniam deferat, si sit proditio necne: et dixerunt quod Hibernia est quasi membrum Angliæ, et ibidem legibus Angliæ utuntur, et autoritate regia faciunt monetam.' And to this purpose it is recited in the statute of faculties, enacted in this kingdom, 28 Hen. 8. c. 19. 'that this the king's land of Ireland is a member appendant, and rightfully belongeth to the imperial crown of the realm of England, and united unto the same.' And in the act of 33 Hen. 8. c. 1. by which the stile and title of king of Ireland was given to Hen. 8. his heirs and successors, it is moreover enacted, that the king shall enjoy that stile and title, and all other royal pre-eminences, prerogatives and dignities, 'as united and annexed to the imperial crown of the realm of England.'—2. It is called lawful money of England, in respect to the place of coinage which was in England, viz. in the Tower of London. For although in antient times the king had several mints in this kingdom, as he had in England, yet since the commencement of the reign of queen Elizabeth, all the mints have been reduced to one place, viz. The Tower of London; and this was done upon good reason of state, to prevent the falsification of money. And therefore, before the Norman conquest, all money was coined in monasteries; for it was presumed, that in such places no falsity or corruption would be found. And this agrees with the prudence of the Roman state, which had but one mint for all Italy, and that was in the temple of Juno at Rome, who for this cause was called 'Juno moneta.' And for this purpose, the emperor Charlemain made a law, in these words, viz. 'de falsis monetis, quia in diversis locis contra justitiam fiunt, volumus, ut in nullo alio loco moneta, nisi in patrio nostro, fiat.' Choppinus de Domino Franciæ, 217. a. Yet in 38 Ed. 1. this prudent king, for the facility of exchange, caused several mints to be established in several towns in England; one in the Tower of London with thirty furnaces, another at Canterbury with eight furnaces, another at Kingston upon Hull with four furnaces, another at Newcastle upon Tyne with two furnaces, another at Bristol with four furnaces, and another at Exeter with four furnaces. Tractat. de monetâ Angliæ, made in the time of Ed. 1. which I found in the library of sir Robert Cotton, which was the book of lord Burleigh, late lord high treasurer of England. See also the close rolls of 29 Ed. 1. in the Tower of London. And this appears also by the inscription of divers ancient coins, on which are expressed the names of the cities where they were coined, according to a verse made in the time of Ed. 1. and taken by Stow out of Robert le Brun, an ancient manuscript: 'Edward did smite round penny, half-penny, farthing.'

And then followed,

'On the king's side, was his head and his name written,

'On the cross side, the city where it was smitten.'

And this same king having established a mint at Dublin with four furnaces, and having constituted Alexander Norman of Lusk master of the mint there, as appears in several records in the archives of the Castle of Dublin; afterwards, viz. 32 Ed. 1, when he had altered the form of the coin, he caused divers stamps consisting of two parts, of which the one contained the pile, and the other the cross, to be transmitted to the treasurer of this kingdom, as is recorded in the red book of the Exchequer here in this manner. 'Magister Gulielmus de Wilmundham, custos cambiorum domini regis in Anglia, de precepto venerabilis patris Bathon. et Wellensis episcopi, thesaurarij ejusdem domini regis, misit domino Gulielmo de Esenden, thesaurario in Hibernia, viginti quatuor pecias cuneorum, pro moneta ibidem faciende, viz. tres pilas cum sex crucellis pro denarijs, tres pilas cum sex crucellis pro obolis, et duas pilas cum quatuor crucellis pro ferlingis, per Johannem le Minor, Thomas Dowle, et Johannem de Shorditch, clericos, de societate operariorum et monetariorum London, per eosdem ad monetam prædictam operandam et monetandam.' And there it is likewise mentioned, before what witnesses the said stamps were delivered; for 'cuneus monetæ tanquam sigillum regni custodiri debet,' as it is said in the treatise 'de moneta Angliæ' before mentioned; and the reason is, because to counterfeit the one or the other is high treason.

And at this time there was but one mint in Ireland, to wit, at Dublin. But long afterwards, viz. 3 Ed. 4. a mint was established at Waterford, another at Trim, and another at Galway; Rot. Parl. 3 Ed. 4. in Castro Dublin. And 12 Ed. 4. Rot. Parl. ibid. it is ordained, that the masters of the mint in Ireland should make, in the castles of Dublin and Trim, and in the town of Drogheda, five sorts of coin, the groat, the half-groat, the penny, half-penny and farthing; by which it is manifest that in former times, there were five several mints in Ireland, in the several towns aforesaid. But all these were discontinued in the time of Ed. 6, so that since the reign of that king, all the money made in Ireland hath been coined in England; and therefore this mixed money, coined in the Tower of London, may be properly called current and lawful money of England.

Sixthly and lastly, it was resolved, that although at the time of the contract and obligation made in the present case, pure money of gold and silver was current within this kingdom, where the place of payment was assigned; yet the mixed money, being established in this kingdom before the day of payment, may well be tendered in discharge of the said obligation, and the obligee is bound to accept it; and if he refuses it, and waits until the money be changed again, the obligor is not bound to pay other money of better substance, but it is sufficient if he be always ready to pay the mixed money according to the rate for which they were current at the time of the tender. And this point was resolved on consideration of two circumstances, viz. the time and the place of the payment; for the time is future, viz. that if the said Brett shall pay or cause to be paid 100*l.* sterling, current money, &c. and therefore such money shall be paid as shall be current at such future time; so that the time of payment, and not the time of the contract, shall be regarded.

Also, the future time is intended by the words current money; for a thing which is passed is not in cursu; and therefore all the doctors, who write 'de re nummaria,' agree in this rule, 'verba currentis monetæ tempus solutionis designant.' And to this purpose are several cases ruled in our books, 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 81. b. After the fall and embasement of money, 5 Ed. 6. debt was brought against the executors of lessee for years, for rent in arrear for two years, ending Mich. 2 Ed. 6. at which time the shilling (which at the time of the action brought, was cried down to 6*d.*) was current for 12*d.* the defendants pleaded a tender of the rent on the days when it became due, 'in peciis monetæ Angliæ vocat. shillings, qualibet pecia vocat. shilling, ad tunc solubili pro 12*d.*' and that neither the plaintiff nor any other for him was ready to receive it, &c. and concluded that they are still ready to pay the arrears 'in dictis peciis vocat. shillings, secundum ratam,' &c. On this plea, although the plaintiff demurred, yet he was content to take the money at the rate aforesaid, without costs or damages. To the same purpose is the case of Pollards adjudged, 29 Ed. 1. and reported by Dyer 82. b. where in debt on an obligation for payment of 2*l.* at two several days, the defendant pleads, that, at the days limited for payment of the debt in demand 'currebat quædam moneta quæ vocabatur Pollards, loco sterlingi,' &c. and that the defendant at the first day of payment tendered the moiety of the debt in the money called Pollards, which the plaintiff refused, and that he is still ready, &c. and offered it in court, which is not denied by the plaintiff; ideo concessum est, that he recovered one moiety in Pollards, and the other in pure sterling money. See 9 Ed. 4. 49. a remarkable case on the change of money, where it is said, that if a man in an action of debt demands 40*l.* it shall be intended money which is current at the time of the writ purchased. And there a case in the time of Ed. 1. is put, which is directly to this purpose. In debt brought upon a deed for 30 quarters of barley, price 20*l.* it was found for the plaintiff, and the jury was charged to enquire of the price at the time of the payment, and it was said that at the time of the payment a quarter was at 13*s.* but at the time of the making of the deed, it was only at 3*s.* and the plaintiff recovered 18*l.* for the corn according to the price of it at the time of the payment. To this purpose also, Linwood hath a notable gloss on the constitution of Simon Mepham, lib. 3. de Testamentis cap. item quia. For where the constitution is such, 'pro publicatione testamenti pauperis, cujus inventarium bonorum non excedit centum solidos sterlingorum, nihil penitus exigatur,' he maketh this gloss, 'hic solidus sumitur pro duodecim denarijs Anglicanis, &c. Sed quæro,' saith he, 'numquid circa hos centum solidos debeat considerari valor in moneta jam currente, vel valor sterlingorum qui currebant tempore statuti; and there he resolveth, 'quod ubi dispositio surgit ex statuto, ut hic, licet moneta sit diminuta in valore, tamen debet considerari respectu monetæ novæ currentis, et non respectu antiquæ. Nam mutata moneta, mutari videtur statutum, ut scilicet intelligatur de nova, et non de veteri.' See Reg. st. 50. a. and 54. b. where the king issues his writ, to be certified of the value of a church. The words of the writ are secundum taxationem decimæ jam currentis. And 31 Ed. 3. Fitz. H. Annuity 28. an annuity was granted to I. S. until he was promoted by the grantor to a sufficient benefice; I. S. brings a writ of annuity against the grantor, who pleads that he had tendered to the plaintiff a sufficient benefice; and there issue was taken on the value of the benefice at the time of the tender.

But it was said that, although in contracts

these words 'currentis monetæ' shall relate to the time of the payment; yet in wills, they shall relate to the time of making the will; for the bequest is in the present tense, 'I give and bequeath,' &c. and therefore legacies shall be paid in such money as is current at the time of the making the testament, or according to the rate thereof. It was also said, that if a man hath 1000*l.* of pure silver in marriage with his wife, and afterwards they are divorced causa præcontractus, by which the wife is to receive her portion: or if a man recovers by an erroneous judgment 100*l.* in debt, and hath execution in pure silver money, and afterwards the judgment is reversed, so that he is to be restored to all that he hath lost, although base money be established in the mean time, restitution shall be in such money as was current at the time of the marriage, and at the time of the recovery. But these latter cases were not resolved.

And as to the circumstance of place, it was resolved, that although the contract was made in London, yet, the place of payment being appointed in Dublin, of necessity the obligor must make his tender in the mixed money at the time of the payment; for all other money was cried down and made bullion by the proclamation aforesaid, and this money only established; so that if the obligor had refused this mixed money, he had committed a contempt, for which he might be punished. Also the judges are not bound to take notice of any money, that is not current by proclamation. And therefore Prisot saith, 34 Hen. 6. 12. a. 'we are not apprised of 6*l.* Flemish, as we are of 100 nobles;' and therefore in all contracts of merchants, 'consuetudo et statuta loci, in quem est destinata solutio, respicienda sunt.' Budelius de re nummariâ, lib. 2. c. 21. And it was said, that if at this day the law should be taken, as it was taken in the time of Ed. 1. that upon judgment in debt given in England, on a testatum that the defendant hath nothing in England, but that he hath goods and lands in Ireland; a writ of execution shall be awarded to the chief justice or deputy of Ireland, to levy the debt there, (which writ is found in Registro Brev. Jud. 43. b.) the sum in such case shall be levied according to the rate of Irish money, and not of English money, and in such coin as shall be current in this kingdom, at the time of the execution.

And according to this Resolution, several other Cases on the same point were afterwards ruled and adjudged in the several Courts of Record in Dublin.

79. ARTICULI CLERI: Articles (so intitled by Lord Coke) of Complaint against the Judges of the Realm; exhibited by RICHARD BANCROFT, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Name of the whole Clergy: Michaelmas Term, 3 JAC. A. D. 1605. Together with the ANSWERS thereunto by all the Judges and Barons. [Lord Coke's 2d Inst. 601.]

LORD Coke, in treating of the Stat. 9 Ed. 2. called ARTICULI CLERI, says:

“ Long before the making of this statute, that is, anno 42 H. 3. A. D. 1258, Boniface younger sonne of Thomas earle of Savoy, archbishop of Canterbury, uncle of Elianor queen of England, who was daughter of Reymond earle of Provence by Beatrix daughter of Thomas earle of Savoy, and sister to the said Boniface, made divers and many canons and constitutions provinciall directly against the lawes of the realme, which canons begun thus: ‘Universis Christi fidelibus ad quos præsens pagina pervenerit, Bonifacius miseracione divina Cantuariensis archiepiscopus, totius Angliæ primas, et sui suffraganei in verbo salutari salutem.’ And ending thus: ‘Actum apud Westm’, sexto iduum Junii A. D. 1258. In quorum omnium robor et testimonium, &c.’ which being exceeding long, we could not here insert. But the effect of them is, so to usurp and inroach upon many matters, which apparently belonged to the common law, as, amongst many others, the tryall of limits and bounds of parishes, and right of patronage, against tryall of right of tithes (by indicavit) against writs to the bishop upon a recovery in a quare impedit, &c. in the king’s courts. That none of their possessions or liberties, which any of the clergy had in the right of their church, should be tryed before any secular judge; (so as they would not have consurance of things spirituall, but of temporall also) and concerning distresses and attachments within their fees, and in effect, that no quo warranto should be brought against them, when they had been long in possession, with an invective against the perverse interpretation by the judges of the realme (so they termed it) of charters, &c. granted to them, and in substance against the ancient and just writs of prohibition in cases, where by the lawes of the realme they are maintainable: and commandement given to admonish the king and interdict his lands and revenues, and thundred out excommunications against the judges and others if they violated, or obeyed not the said canons and constitutions. And this was the principall ground of the controversies between the judges of the realme and the bishops: for this caused ecclesiasticall judges to usurp and inroach upon the common law. But notwithstanding the greatnesse of the archbishop Boniface, and that divers of the judges of the realm were of the clergy, and all the great officers of the realm, as chancellor, treasurer, privie seale, &c. were prelates; yet the judges proceeded according to the lawes of the realm, and still kept, though with great difficulty, the ecclesiasticall courts within their just and proper limits. The courts by pretext of these canons being at variance, at length at a parliament holden in the 51 yeare of Henry the third, Boniface, and the rest of the clergy, complained (which was ultimum refugium, and yet the right way) and exhibited many Articles as grievances, called Articuli Cleri. The Articles exhibited by the clergy either by accident or industry are not to be found; some of the Answers are extant, viz. ‘Ad 16 Articulum de usuris, respondetur, quod licet episcopus, &c.—Ad 17 articulum de defamacione, &c. respondetur, si aliquis defamatus, &c. si autem certæ personæ nominatæ fuerint, per quas rei veritas melius scire poterit, nominantur, ad proband’ matrimonium vel testamentum: et similiter in accusationibus tales personæ impediendæ non sunt, quia testimonium perhibent veritati, sed propter hoc non est congregatio laicorum faciend’, quia per congregationem hujusmodi servitia domus possit deperire.—Ad 18 Artic’ dominas possit remedium.—Ad 19 Artic’ respondetur, quod archiepiscopus de episcopatu vacante non se intronittat quantum ad temporalia, sed tantum se de spiritualibus intronittat, &c.—Ad 20 Artic’ respondetur, quod de clericis occisis, et de hiis qui forsan occidi contigerit, in futurum fiat justitia, secundum legem et consuetudinem terræ, &c.—Ad 21 Artic’ respondetur, quod excommunicatus per ordinarium, aut alium judicem competentem, et denunciatus taliter, debet ab aliis evitari, nisi forsan excommunicatus conqueratur se esse injuste excommunicatum pro aliqua re temporali, de qua non debeat coram ordinario respondere, ad cujus probationem debet admitti, sed in cæteris quæ proponit, ut actor, est interim evitandus.—Ad 22 Artic’ mandabitur justiciariis, quod non fiant aliquæ prisæ per totam terram de bonis aliquorum, nisi debitæ prisæ et consuetæ.—Ad 23 Artic’ respondetur, quod cum aliqui teneant aliquod de rege in capite unde custodia debeatur, custodiæ omnium terrarum de quibuscunque tenentes illi tenementa illa teneant cum acciderint (si inde custodia habere debeatur) hactenus ex consuetudine approbata spectarant ad regem, sed episcopi si expedire videant, inhibeant tenentibus suis, ne aliqua tenementa sibi perquirant de feodis regis.’

These Answers are yet extant of record, and are worthy to be read at large as they yet remaine; whereunto we referre the reader.

This is to be observed, that none of Boniface's Canons against the laves of the realm, and the crowne and dignity of the king, and the birth-right of the subject, are here confirmed.

What the residue of the Articles and the Answers were, may be collected by that act of parliament entitled 'Prohibitio formata de statuto Articuli Cleri,' which was made in the time of Edward the first, about the beginning of his reign, which beginneth thus: Edwardus, &c. prelati, &c. wherein divers points are to be observed against the canons of Boniface:

1. Quod cognitiones placitorum super feodalibus et libertatibus feodalium, districtioibus, officii ministrorum, executionibus contra pacem nostram factis, felonum negotiationibus, consuetudinibus secularibus, attachiamentis, vi laica malefactoribus rectatis, robberiis, arrestationibus, maneriis, advocacionibus ecclesiarum, sufficientibus as sisis juratis, recognitionibus laicam feodum contingentiibus, et rebus aliis, et causis pecuniarum, et de aliis catallis et debitis que non sunt de testament' vel matrimon' ad coronam et dignitatem regiam pertinent, et de regno de consuetud' ejusdem regni approbata, et hactenus observata. 2. Et proceres, et magnates, aut alii de eodem regno temporibus nostrorum predecessorum regum Angliæ, seu nostra autoritate alicujus non consueverunt contra consuetudinem illam super hujusmodi rebus in causa trahi vel compelli ad comparandum coram quocunque judice ecclesiastico. 3. Et quod vicecomes non permittant, quod aliqui laici in baliva sua conveniant ad aliquas recognitiones per sacramenta sua faciend', nisi in causis matrimonialibus et testamentariis. Of the substance of this prohibition, Britton speaketh in these words, 'et queux ount suffert plender en court christian auters pleas, que de testament on matrimonie, et de pure spirituelte sans deniers prender de lay home. Ou suffert lay home iorred de vant lordinary.'

After this the Clergy, at a Parliament holden in the reign of the same king E. 1. preferred Articles intituled 'Articuli contra prohibitionem regis,' fearing lest by reason of some general words therein they might be prohibited in causes, which of right belonged to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in these words, 'sub hac forma impetrant laici prohibitionem in genere super decimis, oblationibus, obventionibus, mortuariis, redemptionibus penitentiarum, violenta manuum injectione in clericum vel commissarium, et in causa defamationis, in quibus casibus agitur ad penam canonicam imponendam.' And a just and legall Answer was made thereunto, as thereby appeareth. But it is to be observed, that they claimed nothing which was against the true meaning of the said act, called 'Prohibitio formata de statuto Articuli Cleri,' nor any of Boniface's canons to be confirmed; and so these matters rested, untill the parliament holden at Lincoln in the ninth yeare of Edw. 2, where Walter Reynolds bishop of Canterbury (whom the king favoured, saith one, singularly for the opinion he had of his fidelity and great wisdom, and 'Walterus archiepiscopus Cantuariensis regi gratiosissimus fuit, hæc regis æquissima responsa ad prelatorum petita obtinuit') in the name of himselfe and of the clergy, preferred these 16 Articles, and by authority of parliament had the Answers here following seriatim to every one of them.—And now it may seeme high time that we should descend to the perusal of the preamble, and the Articles and Answers. But before we come to it, it shall conduce much to the right understanding of divers parts of this act of parliament, to report unto you what Articles Richard Bancroft archbishop of Canterbury exhibited in the name of the whole clergy in Michaelmas terme anno 3 Jacob. regis to the lords of the privie counsell against the judges of the realm, intituled,

Certain ARTICLES of ABUSES, which are desired to be reformed, in granting of Prohibitions, and the Answers thereunto:

Upon mature deliberation and consideration, in Easter terme following, by all the Judges of England, and the barons of the exchequer, with one unanimous consent under their hands (resolutions of highest authorities in law) which were delivered to the lords of the counsell. And we for distinction sake (because we shall have occasion often to cite them) call them Articuli Cleri 3 Jacobi.

1. His majesty hath power to reforme abuses in Prohibitions.

Objection. The clergy well hoped, that they had taken a good course in seeking some redresse at his majesties hands concerning sundry abuses offered to his ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, by the over frequent and undue granting of prohibitions; for both they and we supposed (all jurisdiction, both ecclesiasticall and temporall being annexed to the imperial crowne of this realme) that his highnesse had been held to have had sufficient authority in himselfe, with the assistance of his counsell, to judge what is amisse in either of his said jurisdictions, and to have reformed the same accordingly; otherwise a wrong course is taken by us, if nothing may be reformed that is now complained of, but what the temporall judges shall of themselves willingly yeeld unto. This is therefore the first point, which upon occasion lately offered before your lordships by some of the judges, we desire may be cleared, because we are strongly perswaded as touching the validity of his majesties said authority, and doe hope that we shall be able to justify the same, notwithstanding any thing that the judges, or any other can alledge to the contrary.

Answer of the Judges. No man maketh any question, but that both the jurisdictions are lawfully and justly in his majesty, and that if any abuses be, they ought to be reformed: but what the law doth warrant in cases of prohibitions to keep every jurisdiction in his true limits, is not to be said an abuse, nor can be altered but by parliament.

2. The formes of Prohibitions prejudiciall to his majesties authority in causes ecclesiasticall.

Objection. Concerning the forme of prohibitions, forasmuch as both the ecclesiasticall and temporall jurisdictions be now united in his majestie, which were heretofore de facto, though not de jure derived from severall heads, we desire to be satisfied by the judges, whether, as the case now standeth, the former manner of prohibitions heretofore used importing an ecclesiasticall court to be aliud forum à foro regio, and the ecclesiasticall law not to be legem terra, and the proceedings in those courts to bee contra coronam et dignitatem regiam, may now without offence and derogation to the kings ecclesiasticall prerogative be continued, as though either the said jurisdictions remained now so distinguished and severed as they were before, or that the lawes ecclesiasticall, which wee put in execution, were not the kings and the realmes ecclesiasticall lawes, as well as the temporall lawes.

Answer. It is true, that both the jurisdictions were ever de jure in the crowne, though the one sometimes usurped by the see of Rome; but neither in the one time, nor in the other hath ever the forme of prohibitions been altered, nor can bee but by parliament. And it is contra coronam et dignitatem regiam for any to usurp to deale in that, which they have not lawfull warrant from the crowne to deale in, or to take from the temporall jurisdiction that which belonged to it. The prohibitions doe not import, that the ecclesiasticall courts are aliud then the kings, or not the kings courts, but doe import, that the cause is drawne into aliud examen then it ought to be: and therefore it is alwaies said in the propositions (be the court temporall or ecclesiasticall, to which it is awarded) if they deale in any case which they have not power to hold plea of, that the cause is drawn ad aliud examen then it ought to be; and therefore contra coronam et dignitatem regiam.

3. A fit time to be assigned for the defendant, if he will seek a Prohibition.

Objection. As touching the time when Prohibitions are granted, it seemeth strange to us, that they are not onely granted at the suit of the defendant in the ecclesiasticall court after his answer (whereby hee affirmeth the jurisdiction of the said court, and submitteth himselfe unto the same;) but also after all allegations and proofes made on both sides, when the cause is fully instructed and furnished for sentence: yea, after sentence, yea after two or three sentences given, and after execution of the said sentence or sentences, and when the party for his long continued disobedience is laid in prison upon the writ of excommunicato capiendo, which courses, forasmuch as they are against the rules of the common law in like cases, as we take it, and doe tend so greatly to the delay of justice, vexation, and charge of the subject, and the disgrace and discredit of his majesties jurisdiction ecclesiasticall, the judges, as we suppose, notwithstanding their great learning in the lawes, will be hardly able in defence of them to satisfie your lordships.

Answer. Prohibitions by law are to be granted at any time to restraine a court to intermeddle with, or execute any thing, which by law they ought not to hold plea of, and they are much mistaken that maintaine the contrary. And it is the folly of such as will proceed in the ecclesiasticall court for that, whereof that court hath not jurisdiction; or in that, whereof the kings temporall courts should have the jurisdiction, And so themselves, by their extraordinary dealing, are the cause of such extraordinary charges, and not the law: for their proceedings in such case are coram non iudice. And the kings courts that may award prohibitions, being informed either by the parties themselves, or by any stranger, that any court temporall or ecclesiasticall doth hold plea of that, whereof they have not jurisdiction, may lawfully prohibit the same, as well after judgement and execution, as before.

4. Prohibitions unduly awarded heretofore in all causes almost of ecclesiasticall cognizance.

Objection. Whereas it will be confessed, that causes concerning testaments, matrimony, benefices, churches, and divine service, with many offences against the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, and 10 commandements, are by the lawes of this realm of ecclesiasticall cognizance, yet there are few of them, wherein sundry prohibitions have not been granted, and that more ordinarily of latter times, then ever heretofore, not because we that are ecclesiasticall judges doe give greater cause of such granting of them, then before have been given, but for that the humour of the time is growne to be too eager against all ecclesiasticall jurisdiction. For whereas, for examples sake, during the raigne of the late queen of worthy memory, there have been 488 prohibitions, and since his majesties time 82 sent into the court of the arches; we humbly desire your lordships, that the judges may be urged to bring forth one prohibition of ten, nay the twentieth prohibition of all the said 488, and but 2 of the said 82, which upon due considerations with the libels in the ecclesiasticall court, they shall be able to justifie to have been rightly awarded: we suppose they cannot; our predecessors, and we our selves have ever been so carefull not to exceed the compasse and limits of the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction: which if they shall refuse to attempt, or shall not be able to performe, then we referre our selves to your lordships wisdomes, whether we have not just cause to complaine, and crave restraint of this over lavish granting of prohibitions in every cause without respect. That which we have said of the prohibitions in the court of the arches, we verily perswade our selves may be truly affirmed of all the ecclesiasticall courts in England,

Answer. It had been fit they should have set downe some particular cases, in which they find the ecclesiasticall courts injured by the temporall (as their lordships did order) unto which we would have given a particular answer; but upon these generalities nothing but clamour can be concluded. And where they speake of multitudes of Prohibitions; for all granted to, or in respect of any ecclesiasticall court, we have heretofore caused diligent search to be made in the kings bench and common pleas, from the beginning of his majesties raigne, unto the end of Hilary term, in the third yeare of his raigne; in which time we find, that there were granted unto all the ecclesiasticall courts in England out of the kings bench but 251; whereof 149, were de modo decimandi, upon unity of possession, for trees of 20 yeares growth and upwards, and for barren and heath ground; and all out of the common pleas, but 62, whereof 31 were such as before, and the rest grounded upon the bounds of parishes, or such other causes as they ought to be granted for; but for that which was done in the late queenes time, it would be too long a search for us to make, to deliver any certainty thereof. And for his majesties time, they requiring to have but two to be lawfully warranted upon the libell in the ecclesiasticall court, we have six to shew to be lawfully warranted upon the libell there, and so are all the rest of like kind, by which it will appeare, that this suggestion is not onely untrue, but also, that the extraordinary charges growing unto poore men, are of necessity by meanes of the undue practices of ecclesiasticall courts.

5. The multiplying of Prohibitions in one and the same cause, the libell being not altered.

Objection. Although it hath been anciently ordained by a statute, that when a consultation is once duly granted upon a prohibition made to the judge of holy church, the same judge may proceed in the cause, by vertue of that consultation, notwithstanding any other prohibition to him delivered, provided that the matter in the libell of the same cause be not engrossed, enlarged, or otherwise changed; yet notwithstanding prohibitions and consultations in one and the same cause, the libell being no waies altered according to the said statute, are lately so multiplied, as that in some one cause, as aforesaid, two, in some three, in some other six prohibitions, and so many consultations have been awarded, yea divers are so granted out of one court: as for example, when after long suit a consultation is obtained, it is thought a sufficient cause to send out another prohibition in revocation of the said consultation, upon suggestion therein contained, that the said consultation minus commode emanavit. By which pretty devide the judges of those courts which grant prohibitions, may, notwithstanding the said statute, upon one libell not altered, grant as many prohibitions as they list, commanding the ecclesiasticall judges in his majesties name, not to proceed in any cause that is so divers times by them prohibited, whereby the poore plaintifes doe not know when their consultations (procured with great charge) will hold, and so finding such and so many difficulties, are driven to goe home in great grieve, and to leave the causes in Westminster-hall, the ecclesiasticall judges not daring to hold any plea of them. Now may it please your lordships, the premisses being true, we humbly desire to heare what the judges are able to produce for the justifying of these their proceedings.

Answer. It were fit they should set downe particular causes, whereupon this grievance is grounded, and then we doubt not but to answer it sufficiently, without using any pretty device, such as is set downe in this article.

6. The multiplying of Prohibitions in divers causes, but of the same nature, after consultations formerly awarded.

Objection. We suppose, that as well his majesty's ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, as also very many of his poore, but dutifull subjects, are greatly prejudiced by the granting of divers severall prohibitions, and consultations in causes of one and the same nature and condition, and upon the selfe same suggestions: for example, in case of beating a clerke, the prohibition being granted upon this suggestion, that all pleas de vi et armis belong to the crowne, &c. notwithstanding a consultation doth thereupon ensue, yet the very next day after, if the like suggestion be made upon the beating of another clerke, even in the same court another prohibition is awarded. As also, where 570 prohibitions have been granted since the late queenes time into the court of arches (as before is mentioned) and but 113 consultations afterwards upon so many of them obtained: yet it is evident by the said consultations, that (in effect) all the rest of the said prohibitions ought not to have been awarded, as being grounded upon the same suggestions, whereupon consultations have been formerly granted: and so it followeth, that the causes why consultations were awarded upon the rest of the said prohibitions, were for that either the plaintifes in the court ecclesiasticall were driven for saving of furtlier charge, to compound, to their losse, with their adversaries, or were not able to sue for them; or being able, yet through strength of opposition against them, were constrained to desist; which is an argument to us, that the temporall judges doe wittingly and willingly grant prohibitions, whereupon they know, before hand, that consultations are due: and if we mistake any thing in the premisses, we desire your lordships, that the judges, for the justification of their courses, may better enforme us.

Answer. It shall be good, the ecclesiasticall judges doe better enforme themselves, and that they put some one or two particular cases to prove their suggestions, and thereupon they will find their owne error; for the case may be so, that two severall ministers suing in the ecclesiasticall court for beating of them in one and the selfe same forme, that the one may and ought to have a consultation, and the other not. And so it is in cases of prohibitions, de modo decimandi; and hereof groweth the oversight in making this objection. And we assure our selves, that they shall not find 570 prohibitions granted into the arches since her late majesties death; for we find (if our clerkes affirme truly upon their search) that out of the kings bench have been granted to all the ecclesiasticall courts in England but 251 prohibitions (as before is mentioned) from the beginning of his majesties raigne, unto the end of Hilary terme last; and out of the common pleas not 63. And therefore it cannot be true, that so many have passed to the arches in that time, as is set downe in the article; and this article in that point doth exceed that which is set downe in the fourth article by almost 500, and therefore whosoever set this downe, was much forgetfull of that which was before set downe in the fourth article, and might well have forborne to lay so great a scandall upon the judges, as to affirme it to be a witting and willing error in them, as is set downe in this article.

7. New formes of Consultations, not expressing the cause of the granting of them.

Objection. Whereas upon the granting of Consultations, the judges in times past did therein expresse and acknowledge the causes so remitted to be of ecclesiasticall cognizance, which were presidents and judgements for the better assurance of ecclesiasticall judges, that they might afterward hold plea in such cases, and the like; and were also some barre as well to the temporall judges themselves, as also to many troublesome and contentious persons from either granting or seeking prohibitions in such cases, when so it did appeare unto them upon record, that consultations had been formerly granted in them; they the said temporall judges have now altered that course, and doe onely tell us, that they grant their consultations certis de causis ipsos apud Westm<sup>o</sup> moventibus, not expressing the same particularly, according to their ancient presidents. By meanes whereof the temporall judges leave themselves at liberty without prejudice, though they deny a consultation; at another time upon the same matter contentious persons are animated, finding no cause expressed, why they may not at another time seeke for a prohibition in the same cause; and the ecclesiasticall judges are left at large to thinke what they list, being no way instructed of the nature of the cause which procured the consultation: the reason of which alteration in such consultations, we humbly intreat your lordships, that the judges, for our better instruction, may be required to expresse.

Answer. If we find the declaration upon the surmise, upon which the prohibition is granted, not to warrant the surmise, then we forthwith grant a consultation in that forme which is mentioned, and that matter being mentioned in the consultation would be very long and cumbersome, and give the ecclesiasticall court little information, to direct them in any thing thereafter; and therefore in such cases, for brevity sake, it is usuall: but when the matter is to receive end by demurrer in law, or tryall, the consultation is in another forme. And it is their ignorance in the arches, that will not understand this, and we may not supply their defects with changing our formes of proceedings, wherein if they would take the advice of any learned in the lawes, they might soon receive satisfaction.

8. That Consultations may be obtained with lesse charge and difficulty.

Objection. The great expences and manifold difficulties in obtaining of Consultations are become very burthensome to those that seeke for them; for now a dayes, through the malice of the plaintifes in the temporall courts, and the covetous humours of the clerkes, Prohibitions are so extended and enlarged, without any necessity of the matter (some one prohibition containing more words and lines then forty prohibitions in ancient times) as by meanes thereof the party in the ecclesiasticall court, against whom the prohibition is granted, becomes either unwilling, or unable to sue for a consultation, it being now usuall and ordinary, that in the consultations must be recited in eadem verbis the whole tenour of the prohibition, be it never so long; for the which (to omit divers other fees, which are very great) he must pay for a draught of it in paper viii. d. the sheet, and for the entry of it xii. d. the sheet. Furthermore, the Prohibition is quicke and speedy; for it is ordinarily granted out of court by any one of the judges in his chamber, whereas the Consultation is very slowly and hardly obtained, not without (oftentimes) costly motions in open court, pleadings, demurrers, and sundry judiciall hearings of both parties, and long attendance for the space of two or three, nay, sometimes of eight or nine yeares before it be obtained. The inconvenience of which proceedings is so intolerable, as we trust, such as are to grant consultations will by your lordships meanes not onely doe it expeditely, and moderate the said fees; but also reforme the length of the said consultations, according to the formes of consultations in the Register.

Answer. It were fit the particular cause were set downe, whereupon the generall grievance, that is mentioned in this article, is grounded; and that done, it may have a full answer: for a Prohibition is grounded upon the libell, and the Consultation must agree therewith also; and therefore we doubt not, but the ground of this grievance, when it is well looked into, will grow from themselves in interlacing of much nugatory and unnecessary matter in their libells: and for the fees taken; wee assure our selves, none are taken, but such as are anciently due and accustomed; and it will appeare, that we have abridged the fees, and length of pleadings, and use no delays, but such as are of necessity, and we wish they would doe the like, and upon examination it will appeare of which side it grows, that the fees or delays are so intolerable. And where in ancient time such as sued for tithes, would not sue but for things questionable, and never sought at their parishioners hands their tithes in other kinds then anciently they had been used to have been paid; how many turbulent ministers do infinitely vex their parishioners for such kinds of tithes as they never had, whereby many parishes have been much impoverished: and for example, we shall shew one record, wherein the minister did demand seventeen severall kinds of tithes, whereupon the partie suing a prohibition had eight or nine of them adjudged against the minister upon demurrer in law, and other passed against him by tryall, and this must of necessity grow to a matter of great charge; but where is the fault, but in the minister that gave occasion? and we will shew one other record, wherein the party confessed to some of us, that hee was to sue his parishioner but for a calfe and a goose; and that his proctor neverthelesse put in the libell or demand of tithes, of seven or eight things more then he had cause to sue for: this enlarged the Prohibition, and gave occasion of more expence then needed; and where is the fault of this, but in the ecclesiasticall courts? and as in these, so can wee approve in many others; and therefore wee must retort the cause and ground of this grievance upon themselves, as more particularly may appeare by the severall presidents to be shewed in this behalfe.

9. Prohibitions not to be granted upon frivolous suggestions.

Objection. It is a prejudice and derision to both his majesties ecclesiasticall and temporal jurisdictions, that many prohibitions are granted upon trifling and frivolous suggestions, altogether unworthy to proceed from the one, or to give any hinderance or interruption to the other: as upon a suit of tithes brought by a minister against his parishioner, a Prohibition flyeth out upon suggestion, that in regard of a special receipt, called a cup of butted beare, made by the great skill of the said parishioner to cure a grievous disease called a cold, which sorely troubled the said minister, all his tithes were discharged. And likewise a woman being convicted for adultery committed with one that suspiciously resorted to her house in the night time, the suggestion of a Prohibition in this case was, that 'omnia placita de nocturnis ambulationibus' belong to the king, &c. Also where a legatary sued for his legacy given in a will, the prohibition was, 'Quia omnia placita de donis et consessionibus spectant ad forum regium, et non ad forum ecclesiasticum, dummodo non sint de testamento et matrimonio;' as if a legacy were not donatio de or in testamento, with many other of like sort. The reformation of all which frivolous proceedings, so chargeable notwithstanding to many poore men, and the great hinderance of justice, we humbly referre to your lordships consideration.

Answer. We grant none upon frivolous suggestions, but for the case put, it is ridiculous in the minister to make such a contract (if any such were) but that maketh not the contract void, but discovereth the unworthiness of the party that made the same, and yet no fault in granting the prohibition; but when it shall appeare unto us, that such a matter is suggested by fraud of any clerke or counsellor at law, we will not remit such offences, but will exclude such attorney from the court, and such counsellors from their practice at the barre. And if they will suggest adultery to one, against whom they prove but night walking, and doe adjudge him for it, we are in such a case to prohibite their proceedings: for that is a matter meerly pertinent to the temporall court; so, if it appeare hee hath entred the house as a thiefe, or a burglarer, and so in many other cases also. And if any surmise a legacy from the dead, where it was but a promise of payment in his life time, in that case such a suit is to be prohibited: but if in these cases the parties were named, then we might see the record, and thereupon be directed to shew upon what consideration these prohibitions were granted, otherwise we shall think that these are cases newly invented.

10. No Prohibition to be granted at his suit, who is plaintife in the spirituall court.

Objection. We suppose it to be no warrantable nor reasonable course, that prohibitions are granted at the suit of the plaintife in the ecclesiasticall court, who having made choice thereof, and brought his adversary there into tryall, doth by all intendment of law and reason, and by the usage of all other judiciall places conclude himself in that behalfe; and although he cannot be presumed to hope for helpe in any other court by way of prohibition, yet it is very ussual for every such person so proceeding onely of meere malice for vexation of the party, and to the great delay and hinderance of justice, to find favour for the obtaining of prohibitions, sometimes after two or three sentences, thereby taking advantage (as he must plead) of his owne wrong, and receiving aide from that court, which by his owne confession, he before did contemne; touching the equity whereof, we will expect the answer of the judges.

Answer. None may pursue in the ecclesiasticall court for that which the kings courts ought to hold plea of, but upon information thereof given to the king's courts, either by the plaintife, or by any meere stranger, they are to be prohibited, because they deale in that which appertaineth not to their jurisdiction, where if they would be carefull not to hold plea of that which appertaineth not to them, this needed not: and if they will proceed in the kings courts against such as pursue in the ecclesiasticall courts for matter temporall, that is to be inflicted upon them, which the quality of their offence requireth; and how many sentences howsoever are given, yet prohibitions thereupon are not of favour, but of justice to be granted.

11. No Prohibition to be granted, but upon due consideration of the libell.

Objection. It is (we are perswaded) a great abuse, and one of the chiefe grounds of the most of the former abuses, and many other, that prohibitions are granted without sight of the libell in the ecclesiasticall court; yea, sometimes before the libell be there exhibited, whereas by the lawes and statutes of this realme (as we thinke) the libell (being a briefe declaration of the matter in debate betweene the plaintife und defendant) is appointed as the only rule and direction for the due granting of a prohibition, the reason whereof is evident, viz. upon diligent consideration of the libell it will easily appeare, whether the cause belong to the temporall or ecclesiasticall cognizance, as on the other side without sight of the libell, the prohibition must needs range and roave with strange and forraigne suggestions at the will and pleasure of the devisor, nothing pertinent to the matter in demand: whereupon it cometh to passe, that when the judge ecclesiasticall is handling a matter of simony, a prohibition is grounded upon a suggestion, that the court tryeth 'placita de advocacionibus ecclesiarum, et de jure patronatus.' And when the libell containeth nothing but the demand of tithes wooll, and lamb, the prohibition surmiseth a custome of paying of tithes pigeons. So that if it may be made a matter of conscience to grant prohibitions only, where they doe rightly lye, or to preserve the jurisdiction ecclesiasticall united to his majesties crowne, it cannot (we hope) but seem necessary to your lordships, that due consideration be first had of the libell in the ecclesiasticall court, before any prohibition be granted.

Answer. Who hath an advowson granted to him for money, being sued for simony, shall have a Prohibition; and it is manifest, that though in the libell there appeare no matter to grant a prohibition, yet upon a collateral surmise the prohibition is to be granted: as where one is sued in a spirituall court for tithes of silva cadua, the party may suggest, that they were grosse or great trees, and have a prohibition, yet no such matter appeareth in the libell. So if one bee sued there for violent hands laid on a minister by an officer, as a constable, hee being sued there may suggest, that the plaintife made an affray upon another, and he to preserve the peace laid hands on him, and so have a prohibition. And so in very many other like cases, and yet upon the libell no matter appeareth why a prohibition should be granted: and they will never shew, that a custome to pay pigeons was allowed to discharge the payment of wooll, lamb, or such like.

12. No Prohibition to be granted under pretence, that one witness cannot be received in the ecclesiasticall court, to ground a judgment upon.

Objection: There is a new devised suggestion in the temporall courts commonly received and allowed, whereby they may at their will and pleasure draw any cause whatsoever from the ecclesiasticall court: for example, many prohibitions have lately come forth upon this suggestion, that the lawes ecclesiasticall do require two witnesses, where the common law accepteth of one; and therefore it is contra legem terra, for the ecclesiasticall judge to insist upon two witnesses to prove his cause: upon which suggestion, although many consultations have been granted (the same being no way as yet able to warrant and maintaine a prohibition) yet because we are not sure, but that either by reason of the use of it, or of some future construction, it may have given to it more strength then is convenient, the same tending to the utter overthrow of all ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, we most humbly desire, that by your lordships good meanes, the same may be ordered to be no more used.

Answer. If the question be upon payment, or setting out of tithes, or upon the proove of a legacy, or marriage, or such like incidence, we are to leave it to the tryall of their law, though the party have but one witness; but where the matter is not determinable in the ecclesiasticall court, there lyeth a prohibition either upon, or without such a surmise.

13. No good suggestion for a Prohibition, that the cause is neither testamentary, nor matrimoniall.

Objection. As the former device last mentioned endeavoureth to strike away at one blow the whole ecclesiasticall jurisdiction; so there is another as usuall, or rather more frequent then the former, which is content to spare us two kind of causes to deale in, viz. testamentary, and matrimoniall: and this device insulteth mightily in many prohibitions, commanding the ecclesiasticall judge, that he the cause never so apparently of ecclesiasticall cognizance, yet hee shall surcease; for that is neither a cause testamentary, nor matrimoniall: which suggestion, as it grew at the first upon mistaking, and omitting, the words, de bonis et catallis, &c. as may appeare by divers ancient prohibitions in the Register; so it will not be denied, but that, besides those two, divers and sundry other causes are notoriously knowne to be of ecclesiasticall cognizance, and that consultations are as usually awarded, if suit in that behalfe be prosecuted, notwithstanding the said suggestion, as their prohibitions are easily granted; which, as an injury, marching with the rest to wound poore men, protract suits, and prejudice the courts ecclesiasticall, we desire that the judges will be pleased to redresse.

Answer. If they observe well the answer to the former objections, they may be thereby satisfied, that we prohibit not so generally as they pretend, nor doe in any wise deale further then we ought to doe, to the prejudice of that which appertaineth to that jurisdiction; but when they will deale with matters of temporall contracts, coloured with pretended ecclesiasticall matter, wee ought to prohibit them with that forme of prohibitions, mentioning, that it comcerneth not matter of marriage, nor testamentary: and they shall not find that we have granted any, but by form warranted, both by the Register, and by law: And when suggestions, carrying matter sufficient, appeare to us judicially to be untrue and insufficient, we are as ready to grant consultations as prohibitions: and we may not alter the forme of our prohibitions upon the conceits of ecclesiasticall judges, and prohibitions granted in the forme set downe in the article, are of that forme which by law they ought to be, and cannot be altered but by parliament.

14. No Prohibition upon surmise onely to be granted, either out of the kings bench, or common pleas, but out of the chancery onely.

Objection. Amongst the causes whereby the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction is oppressed with multitude of prohibitions upon surmises onely, this hath a chiefe place, in that through incroachment (as wee suppose) there are so many severall courts, and judges in them, that take upon them to grant the same, as in the kings bench five, and in the common pleas as many, the one court oftentimes crossing the proceedings of the other, whereas wee are perswaded, that all such kinds of prohibitions, being originall writs, ought onely to issue out of the chancery, and neither out of the kings bench, nor common pleas. And that this hath been the ancient practice in that behalfe, appeareth by some statutes of the realme, and sundry judgements at the common law; the renewing of which practice carrieth with it an apparent shew of great benefit and conveniency, both to the church, and to the subject: for if prohibitions were to issue onely out of one court, and from one man of such integrity, judgement, sincerity, and wisdom, as we are to imagine the lord chancellour of England to be endued with, it is not likely, that he would ever be induced to pre-judge and pester the ecclesiasticall courts with so many needlesse prohibitions; or, after a consultation, to send out in one cause, and upon one and the same libell not altered, prohibition upon prohibition, his owne act remaining upon record before him to the contrary. The further consideration whereof, when, upon the judges answer thereunto, it shall be more thoroughly debated, wee must referre to your lordships honourable direction and wisdom.

Answer. A strange presumption in the ecclesiasticall judges, to require that the kings courts should not doe that which by law they ought to doe, and alwayes have done, and which by oath they are bound to doe! and if this shall be holden inconvenient, and they can in discharge of us obtaine some act of parliament to take it from all other courts then the chancery, they shall doe unto us a great ease: but the law of the realme cannot be changed, but by parliament: and what reliefe or ease such an act may worke to the subject, wise men will some finde out and discern: but by these articles thus dispersed abroad, there is a generall unbeseeing aspersion of that upon the judges, which ought to have been forborn.

15. No Prohibition to be awarded under a false pretence, that the ecclesiasticall judges would hold no plea for customes for tithes.

Objection. Amongst many devices, whereby the cognizance of causes of tithes is drawn from ecclesiasticall judges, this is one of the chiefest, viz. concerning the tryall of customes in payment of tithes, that it must be made in a temporall court; for upon a quirke and false suggestion in Edward the fourth his time, made by some sergeants, a conceit hath risen (which hath lately taken greater strength then before) that ecclesiasticall judges will allow no plea of custome or prescription, either in non decimando, or in modo decimandi; and thereupon, when contentious persons are sued in the ecclesiasticall court for tithes, and doe perceive, that upon good prooffe judgement will be given against them, even in their owne pleas, sometimes for customes, doe presently, knowing their own strength with jurors in the country, fie unto Westminster hall, and there suggesting that they pleaded custome for themselves in the ecclesiasticall courts, but could not be heard, doe procure thence very readily a prohibition; and albeit the said suggestion be notoriously false, yet the party prohibited may not bee permitted to traverse the same in the temporall court, directly contrary to a statute made in that behalfe: neither may the judge prohibited proceed without danger of an attachment, though himselfe doe certainly know, either that no such custome was ever alledged before him, or being alledged, that he did receive the same, and all manner of proofes offered thereupon: which course seemeth the more strange unto us, because the ground thereof laid in Edward the fourth his time, as aforesaid, was altogether untrue, and cannot with any sound reason be maintained: divers statutes and judgements at the common law doe allow the ecclesiasticall courts to hold plea of such customes; all our bookes and generall learning doe therewith concurre, and the ecclesiasticall courts, both then and ever since, even until this day, have, and still doe admit the same, as both by our ancient and recent records it doth and may to any most manifestly appeare. And besides, there are some consultations to bee shewed in this very point, wherein the said surmise and suggestion, that the ecclesiasticall judges will heare no plea of customes, is affirmed to be insufficient in law to maintaine any such prohibition: and therefore we hope, that if we shall be able, notwithstanding any thing the judges shall answer thereunto, to justify the premisses, your lordships will be a meanes, that the abuses herein complained of, having so false a ground, may be amended.

Answer. The temporall courts have alwayes granted prohibitions as well in cases de modo decimandi, as in cases upon reall compositions, either in discharge of tithes, or the manner of tithing: for that modus decimandi had his originall ground upon some composition in the kinde made, and all prescriptions and compositions in these cases are to be tryed at the common law, and the ecclesiasticall courts ought to be prohibited, if in these cases they had plea of tithes in kind: but if they will sue in the ecclesiasticall court de modo decimandi, or according to composition, then we prohibit them not: and the cause why the ecclesiasticall judges find fault herewith, is, because many ministers have growne of late more troublesome to their parishioners, then in times past; and thereby worke unto these courts more commodity, whereas in former ages they were well contented to accept that which was used to be paid, and not to contend against any prescription or composition; but now they grow so troublesome to their neighbours, as were it not for the prohibition (as may appeare by the presidents before remembred) they would soone overthrow all prescriptions and compositions that are for tithes, which doth and would breed such a generall garboile amongst the people, as were to be pitied, and not to be permitted. And where they say, there bee many statutes that take away these proceedings from the temporall courts, they are much deceived; and if they looke well unto it, they shall find even the same statutes, they pretend, to give way unto it. And it is strange they will affirme so great an untruth, as to say, they are not permitted to traverse the suggestion in the temporall court; for both the law and daily practice doth allow it.

16. The Customes for Tithes are onely to be tried in the ecclesiasticall courts, and ought not to be drawne thence by Prohibitions.

Objection. Although some indiscreet ecclesiasticall judges, either in the time of king Edward the 4th, or Edward the 6th, might, against law, have refused in some one cause to admit a plea of custome of tithes, to the prejudice of some person whom he favoured, and might thereby peradventure have given occasion of some one prohibition, but whether they did so or no, the suggestion of a lawyer for his fee is no good prooffe, yet forasmuch as by three statutes made since that time, wherein it is ordained, viz. both that tithes should be truly paid, according to the custome, and the tryall of such payments, according to custome upon any default or opposition, should be tryed in the kings ecclesiasticall courts, and by the kings ecclesiasticall lawes, and not otherwise, or before any other judges then ecclesiasticall, we most humbly desire your lordships, that if according to the said lawes we be most ready to heare any plea of custome your lordships would be pleased, that the judges may not be permitted hereafter to grant any prohibitions upon such false surmises; or if they shall answer, that we mistake the said statutes, that then the said three statutes may bee thoroughly debated before your lordships, lest under pretence of a right, which they challenge, to expound these kind of statutes, the truth may be over-borne, and poore ministers still left unto country tryalls, there to justifie the rights of their tithes before unconscionable jurors in these cases.

Answer. The answer to the former article may serve for this; and where the objection seemeth to impeach the tryall at the common law by jurors, we hold, and shall be able to approve it to be a farre better course for matter of fact upon the testimonie of witnesses, sworne viva voce, then upon the conscience of any one particular man, being guided by paper prooffes; and we never heard it excepted unto heretofore, that any statute should be expounded by any other then the judges of the land; neither was there ever any so much over-seen, as to oppose himselfe against the practice of all ages to make that question, or to lay any such unjust imputation upon the judges of the realme.

17. No Prohibition to be granted, because the treble value of tithes is sued for in the ecclesiasticall court.

Objection. Whereas it appeareth plainly by the tenour of the statute of Edw. 6, cap. 13, that judges ecclesiasticall, and none other, are to heare and determine all suits of tithes, and other duties for the same, which are given by the said act; and that nothing else is added to former lawes by that statute, but onely certaine penalties, for example, one of treble value: forasmuch as the said penalty, being onely devised as a meane to worke the better payment of tithes, and for that there are no words used in the said statute to give jurisdiction to any temporall court, we hold it most apparant, that the said penalty of treble value, being a duty given in the said statute for non-payment of tithes, cannot bee demanded in the temporall court, but onely before the ecclesiasticall judges, according to the expresse words of the said statute: and the rather, we are so perswaded, because it is most agreeable to all lawes and reason, that where the principall cause is to bee decided, there all things incident and accessory are to bee determined. Besides, it was the practice of all ecclesiasticall courts in this realme, immediately after the making of the said statute, and hath continued so ever since, to award treble damages, when there hath been cause, without any opposition, untill about ten yeares past, when, or about which time, notwithstanding the premisses, the temporall judges began to hold plea of treble value, and doe now accompt it so proper and peculiar to their jurisdictions, as by colour thereof they admit suits originally for the said penalty, and doe make thereby, very absurdly, the penalty of treble value to bee principall, which is indeed but the accessory; and the cognizance of tithes to bee but the accessory, which in all due construction is most evident to be the principall, thereby wholly perverting the true meaning and drift of that statute, whereupon if in the spirituall court the treble value be now demanded by the libell as a duty, ac-

ording to that statute, or that sentence be awarded directly and sincerely upon the said libell, presently, as contentious persons are disposed, a prohibition is grauted, and some sharp words are further used, as if the ecclesiasticall judges were in some further danger for holding of these kind of pleas: and therefore we most humbly desire, that if the judges shall insist in their answers upon such their straining of the said statute, your lordships will be pleased to heare the same further debated by us with them.

Answer. If they observe well the statute, they shall find, that the ecclesiasticall court is by that statute to hold plea of no more, then that which is specially thereby limited for them to hold plea of; and the temporall court not restrained thereby, to hold plea of that which is not limited unto the ecclesiasticall court by that act, and of that they had jurisdiction of before: and the forfeiture of double value is expresly limited to be recovered before the ecclesiasticall judges; but where a forfeiture is given by an act generally not limiting where to be recovered, it is to be recovered in the kings temporall courts, and the cause why it is so divided, seemeth to be for that, where by that act, temporall men were to sue for their tithes in the ecclesiasticall court, where it was then presumed they were to have no great favour: therefore the party grieved might, if he would, pursue for the forfeiture of the treble value in the temporall court, where hee was to recover no tithes; but if he would sue where he might also recover the tithes, then hee would pursue for the double value: for that is specially appointed to be recovered in the ecclesiasticall court, but not the treble value. And although they alledge, that they sometimes used to maintaine suit for the treble value, yet as soon as thnt was complained of to the kings courts, they gave remedy unto it as appertained.

Objection. As the said statute of Edward the 6th last mentioned assigneth a penalty of treble value, if a man upon pretence of custome, which cannot be justified, shall take away his corne before he hath set out his tithes; so also in the said statute it is provided, that if any man having set out his tithes, shall not afterwards suffer the parson to carry them away, &c. he shall pay the double value thereof so carried away, the same to be recovered in the ecclesiasticall court. Howbeit the clearnesse of the statute in this point, notwithstanding meanes are found to draw this cause also from the ecclesiasticall court; for such as of hatred towards their ministers are disposed to vex them with suits at the common law (where they finde more favour to maintaine their wrangling, then they can hope for in the ecclesiasticall court) will not faile to set out their tithes before witnesses, but not with any meaning or intent that the parson shall ever carry them away; for presently thereupon they will cause their owne servants to load them away to their owne barnes, and leave the parson as he can to seek his remedy; which if he do attempt in the ecclesiasticall court, out cometh a Prohibition, suggesting, that upon severance and setting forth of the tenth part from the nine, the same tenths were presently by law in the parsons possession, and being thereupon become a lay chattell, must be recovered by an action of trespasse at the common law, whereas the whole pretence is grounded upon a meere perverting of the statute, which doth both ordain, that all tithes shall be set forth truly and justly without fraud and guile; and that also the parson shall not be stopped or hindered from carrying them away, neither of which conditions are observed when the farmer doth set them forth, meaning to carry them away himselfe, for that is the fraudulent setting of them out; and also, when accordingly hee taketh them away to his own use; for thereby hee stoppeth the parson to carry them away: and consequently the penalty of this offence is to be recovered in the said ecclesiasticall courts, according to the words of the said statute, and not in any court temporall: wherefore we most humbly desire your lordships, that either the judges may make it apparant to your lordships, that we mislike this statute in this point, or that our ecclesiasticall courts may ever hereafter be freed from such kinds of prohibitions.

Answer. For the matter of this article it is answered before, and where the truth of the case is, that he that ought to pay prediall tithes, doth not divide out his tithes, or doth in any wise interrupt the parson or his deputy, to see the dividing or setting of them out: that appearing unto us judiciously, we maintaine no prohibition upon any suit there for the double value, but if after the tithes severed, the parson will sell the tithes to the party that divided them; upon the surmise thereof, we doe, and ought to grant a prohibition; but if that surmise doe prove untrue, we do as readily grant a consultation, and the party seeking the same, is, according to the statute, to have his double costs and damages.

Objection. We conceive it to be great injury to his majesties ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, that prohibitions are awarded to his ecclesiasticall courts upon every by, and every incident plea or matter alledged there in barre, or by way of exception, the principall cause being undoubtedly of ecclesiasticall cognizance: for example, in suit for tithes in kind, if the limits of the parish, agreements, compositions, and arbitrations, as also whether the minister that sueth as parson, be indeed parson or vicar; doe come in debate by way of barre, although the same particulars were of temporall cognizance (as some of them wee may boldly say are not) yet they were in this case examinable in the ecclesiasticall court, because they are matters incident, which come not in that case finally to be sentenced and determined, but are used as a meane and furtherance for the decision of the maine matter in question. And so the case standeth in other such incident pleas by way of barre; for otherwise either party in every cause might at his pleasure, by pleading some matter temporall by way of exception, make any cause ecclesiasticall whatsoever subject to a prohibition, which is contrary to the reason of the common law, and sundry judgments thereupon given, as wee hope the judges themselves will acknowledge, and thereupon yeeld to have such prohibitions hereafter restrained.

Answer. Matters incident that fall out to be meere temporall, are to be dealt withall in the temporall, and not in the ecclesiasticall court, as is before particularly set downe in the eleventh article.

20. That no temporall judges, under colour of authority to interpret statutes, ought, in favour of their Prohibitions, to make causes ecclesiasticall to be of temporall cognizance.—

Objection. Although of late dayes it hath been strongly held by some, that the interpretation of all statutes whatsoever doe belong to the judges temporall, yet we suppose, by certain evil effects, that this opinion is to bee bounded within certaine limits; for the strong conceit of it hath already brought forth this fruit, that even those very statutes which doe concerne matters meere ecclesiasticall, and were made of purpose with great caution, to preserve, enlarge, and strengthen the jurisdiction ecclesiasticall, have been by colour thereof turned to the restraining, weakening, and utter overthrow of the same, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said statutes: as for example (besides the strange interpretation of the statutes before mentioned, for the payment of tithes) when parties have been sued in the ecclesiasticall courts, in case of an incestuous marriage, a prohibition hath been awarded, suggesting, under pretence of a statute in the time of king Hen. 8. that it appertaineth to the temporall courts, and not to the ecclesiasticall, to determine what marriages are lawfull, and what are incestuous by the word of God. As also a minister, being upon point of deprivation for his insufficiency in the ecclesiasticall court, a prohibition was granted, upon suggestion that all pleas of the fitnessse, learning, and sufficiency of ministers belong only to the kings temporall courts, relying, as wee suppose, upon the statute of 13 Eliz. by which kind of interpretation of statutes, if the naming, disposing, or ordering of causes ecclesiasticall in a statute shall make the same to be of temporall cognizance, and so abolish the jurisdiction of the ecclesiasticall court, without any further circumstances, or expresse words to warrant the same, it followeth, that foras-

much as the common Book and Articles of religion are established and confirmed by severall acts of parliament, the temporall judges may challenge to themselves an authority to end and determine of all causes of faith and religion, and to send out their prohibitions, if any ecclesiasticall judge shall deale or proceed in any of them: which conceit, how absurd it is, needeth no prooffe, and teacheth us, that when matters meere ecclesiasticall are comprized in any statute, it doth not therefore follow, that the interpretation of the said matters doth belong to the temporall judges, who by their profession, and as they are judges, are not acquainted with that kind of learning: hereunto, when we shall receive the answer of the judges, we shall be ready to justifie every part of this article.

Answer. If any such have slipt, as is set downe in this article, without other circumstances to maintaine it, we make no doubt, but when that appeared to the king's temporall court, it hath been presently remitted; and yet there be cases, that we may deale both with marriages and matters of deprivation, as where they will call the marriage in question after the death of any of the parties, the marriage may not then be called in question, because it is to bastard and disinherit the issues, who cannot so well defend the marriage, as the parties both living themselves might have done; and so is it, if they will deprive a minister not for matter appertaining to the ecclesiasticall cognizance, but for that which doth meere belong to the cognizance of the king's temporall courts. And for the judges expounding of statutes that concern the ecclesiasticall government or proceedings, it belongeth unto the temporall judges; and wee thinke they have been expounded as much to their advantage, as either the letter or intencion of lawes would or could allow of. And when they have been expounded to their liking, then they could approve of it; but if the exposition be not for their purpose, then will they say, as now they doe, that it appertaineth not unto us to determine of them.

21. That persons imprisoned upon the writ of de excommunicato capiendū are unduly delivered, and Prohibitions unduly awarded for their greater security.

Objection. Forasmuch as imprisonment upon the writ of excommunicato capiendū is the chiefest temporall strength of ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, and that by the lawes of the realme none so committed for their contempt in matters of ecclesiasticall cognizance, ought to be delivered untill the ecclesiasticall courts were satisfied, or caution given in that behalfe, we would gladly be resolved by what authority the temporall judges do cause the sherifes to bring the said parties into their courts, and by their owne discretions set them at liberty, without notice thereof first given to the ecclesiasticall judges, or any satisfaction made either to the parties at whose suit he was imprisoned, or the ecclestistical court, where certaine lawfull fees are due: and after all this, why doe they likewise send out their prohibitions to the said court, commanding, that all censures against the said parties shall be remitted, and that they be no more proceeded with for the same causes in those courts. Of this our desire, we hope your lordships do see sufficient cause, and will therefore procure us from the judges some reasonable answer.

Answer. We affirme, if the party excommunicate be imprisoned, wee ought upon complaint to send the kings writ for the body and the cause, and if in the returne no cause, or no sufficient cause appeare, then we doe (as we ought) set him at liberty; otherwise, if upon removing the body, the matter appeare to be of ecclesiasticall cognizance, then we remit him againe; and this we ought to doe in both cases; for the temporall courts must alwaies have an eye, that the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction usurp not upon the temporall.

22. The King's authority in ecclesiasticall causes is greatly impugned by Prohibitions.

Objection. We are not a little perplexed touching the authority of his majestie in causes ecclesiasticall, in that we find the same to be so impeached by Prohibitions, that it is in effect thereby almost extinguished; for it seemeth, that the innovating humour is growne so rank, and that some of the temporall judges are come to be of opinion, that the commissioners appointed by his majesty for his causes ecclesiasticall, having committed unto them the execution of all ecclesiasticall jurisdiction annexed to his majesties imperiall crowne, by virtue of an act of parliament made in that behalfe, and according to the tenour and effect of his majesties letters patents, wherein they are authorised to imprison, and impose fines, as they shall see cause, cannot otherwise proceed, the said act and letters patents notwithstanding, then by ecclesiasticall censures onely: and thereupon of latter dayes, whereas certaine lewd persons (two for example sake) one for notorious adultery and other intolerable contempts, and another for abusing of a bishop of this kingdome with threatenng speeches, and sundry railing termes, no way to be endured, were thereupon fined and imprisoned by the said commissioners, till they should enter into bonds to performe further orders of the said court; the one was delivered by an habeas corpus out of the kings bench, and the other by a like writ out of the common pleas: and sundry other prohibitions have been likewise awarded to his majesties said commissioners upon these suggestions, viz. that they had no authority either to fine or imprison any man; which innovating conceit being added to this that followeth, That the writ of de excommunicato capiendo cannot lawfully be awarded upon any certificate or significavit made by the said commissioners, wee find his majesties said supreme authority in causes ecclesiasticall, so largely amplified in sundry statutes, to be altogether destitute in effect of any meantes to uphold it, if the said proceedings by temporall judges shall be by them maintained and justified; and therefore wee most humbly desire your lordships, that they may declare themselves herein, and be restrained hereafter, if there be cause found, from using the kings name in their prohibitions, to so great prejudice of his majesties said authority, as in debating the same before your lordships will hereafter more fully appeare.

Answer. We doe not, neither will we in any wise impugne the ecclesiasticall authority in any thing that appertaineth unto it; but if any by the ecclesiasticall authority commit any man to prison, upon complaint unto us that he is imprisoned without just cause, we are to send to have the body, and to be certified of the cause; and if they will not certifie unto us the particular cause, but generally, without expressing any particular cause, whereby it may appeare unto us to be a matter of the ecclesiasticall cognizance, and his imprisonment be just, then we doe and ought to deliver him: and this is their fault, and not ours. And although some of us have dealt with them to make some such particular certificate to us, whereby wee may bee able to judge upon it, as by law they ought to doe, yet they will by no meanes doe it; and therefore their error is the cause of this, and no fault in us: for if we see not a just cause of the parties imprisonment by them, then we ought, and are bound by oath to deliver him.

23. No Prohibition to be granted, under pretence to reforme the manner of proceedings by the ecclesiasticall lawes, in causes confessed to be of ecclesiasticall cognizance.

Objection. Notwithstanding that the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction hath been much impeached heretofore through the multitude of prohibitions, yet the suggestions in them had some colour of justice, as pretending, that the judges ecclesiasticall dealt with temporall causes: but now, as it seemeth, they are subject to the same controlments, whether the cause they deale in be either ecclesiasticall or temporall, in that prohibitions of late are wrestled out of their owne proper course, in the nature of a writ of error, or of an appeal: for, whereas the true and onely use of a prohibition is to restraine the judges ecclesiasticall from dealing in a matter of temporall cognizance, now prohibitions are awarded upon these surmises, viz. that the libell, the articles, the sentence, and the ecclesiasticall court, according to the ecclesiasticall lawes, are grievous and insufficient, though the matter there dealt withall be merely ecclesiasticall: and by colour of such prohibitions, the temporall judges to alter and change the decrees and sentences of the judges ecclesiasticall, and to moderate the expences taxed in the ecclesiasticall courts, and to award consultations upon conditions: as for example, that the plaintife in the ecclesiasticall court shall except of the one halfe of the costs awarded, and that the register shall lose his fees; and that the said plaintife shall be contented with the payment of his legacy, which was the principall sued for, and adjudged due unto him at such day, as they the said temporall judges shall appoint, or else the prohibition must stand. And also where his majesties commissioners, for causes ecclesiasticall, have not been accustomed to give a copy of the articles to any party, before he hath answered them; and that the statute of Hen. 5. touching the delivering of the libell, was not onely publikely adjudged in the kings beuch, not to extend to the deliverance of articles, where the party is proceeded with ex officio, but likewise imparted to his majestie, and afterwards divulged in the starre-chamber, as a full resolution of the judges, yet within 4 or 5 moneths after, a prohibition was awarded to the said commissioners out of the kings bench, upon suggestion that the party ought to have a copy of the articles, being called in question ex officio, before he should answer them; and notwithstanding that a motion was made in full court shortly after for a consultation, yet an order was entred, that the prohibition should stand untill the said partie had a copy of the said articles given him; which novell and extraordinary courses doe seem very strange unto us, and are contrary not onely to the whole course of his majesties lawes ecclesiasticall, but also to the very maximes and judgement of the common law, and sundry statutes of this realme, as wee shall be ready to justifie before your lordships, if the judges shall endeavour to maintaine these their proceedings.

Answer. To this we say, that though where parties are proceeded withall ex officio, there needeth no libell, yet ought they to have the cause made knowne unto them for which they are called ex officio, before they be examined, to the end it may appeare unto them before their examination, whether the cause be of ecclesiasticall cognizance, otherwise they ought not to examine them upon oath. And touching the rest of this article, they doe utterly mistake it.

24. That temporall Judges are sworne to defend the Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction.

Objection. We may not omit to signifie unto your lordships, that, as wee take it, the temporall judges are not onely bound by their ancient oath, that they shall doe nothing to the disherison of the crown, but also by a latter oath unto the king's supremacy, wherein they doe sweare, that, to their power, they will assist and defend all jurisdictions, priviledges, preheminences, and authorities united and annexed to the imperiall crowne of this realme; in which words the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction is specially aimed at: so that whereas they doe oftentimes insist upon for their oath, for doing of justice in temporall causes, and do seldome make mention of the second oath taken by them for the defence of the ecclesiasticall juris-dition, with the rights and immunities belonging to the church; we think, that they ought to weigh their said oaths better together, and not so farre to extend the one, as that it should in any sort prejudice the other: the due consideration whereof (which we most instantly desire) would put them in mind, any suggestion to the contrary notwithstanding, to be as careful not to doe any thing that may prejudice the lawfull proceedings of the ecclesiasticall judges in ecclesiasticall causes, as they are circumspect not to suffer any impeachment, or blemish of their owne jurisdictions and proceedings in causes temporall.

Answer. We are assurcd, than none can justly charge any of us with violating our oaths, and it is a strange part to taxe judges in this manner, and to lay so great an imputation upon us; and what scandall it will be to the justice of the realme to have so great levity, and so foule an imputation laid upon the judges, as is done in this, is too manifest. And we are assured it cannot be shewed, that the like hath been done in any former age; and for lesse scandalls then this of the justice of the realme, divers have been severely punished.

25. That Excommunication is as lawfull, as Prohibition, for the mutual preservation of both his majesties supreme jurisdiction.

Objection. To conclude, wherens for the better preserving of his majesties two supreme jurisdictions before mentioned, viz. the ecclesiasticall and the temporall, that the one might not usurp upon the other, two meanes heretofore have of auncient time been ordained, that is to say, the censure of Excommunication, and the writ of Prohibition; the one to restraine the incroachment of the temporall jurisdiction upon the ecclesiasticall, the other of the ecclesiasticall upon the temporall, we most humbly desire your lordships, that by your meanes the judges may be induced to resolve us, why excommunications may not as freely be put in ure for the preservation of the jurisdiction ecclesiasticall, as prohibitions are, under pretence to defend the temporall, especially against such contentious persons, as doe wittingly and willingly, upon false and frivolous suggestions, to the delay of justice, vexation of the subjects, and great scandall of ecclesiasticall jurisdictions, daily procure, without feare either of God or men, such undue prohibitions, as we have heretofore mentioned.

Answer. The excommunication cannot be gain-said, neither may the prohibition be denied upon the surmise made, that the matter pursued in the ecclesiasticall court is of temporall cognizance, but as soon as that shall appeare unto us judicially to be false, we grant the consultation.

For the better satisfaction of his majesty, and your lordships, touching the objections delivered against Prohibitions, we have thought good to set downe (as may be perceived by that which hath been said) the ordinary proceeding in his majesties courts therein: whereby it may appeare both what the judges doe, and ought to doe in those causes; and the ecclesiastical judges may doe well to consider, what issue the course they herein hold can have in the end: and they shall find it can be no other, but to cast a scandall upon the justice of the realme; for the judges doing but what they ought, and by their oaths are bound to doe, it is not to be called in question; and if it fall out, that they erre in judgement, it cannot otherwise be reformed, but judicially in a superiour court, or by parliament.—Subscribed by all the judges of England, and the barons of the exchequer, Pasch. 4 Jacobi, and delivered to the lord chancellour of England.

Which answers and resolutions, although they were not enacted by authority of parliament, as our statute of Articuli Cleri in 9 E. 2. was; yet, being resolved unanimously by all the judges of England, and barons of the exchequer, are for matters in law of highest authority next unto the court of parliament*.

* Mr. Justice Foster, before he was made a judge, published a Tract entitled "An Examination of the Schism of Church power, laid down in the Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani, &c." It is ably written, and contains much learning relative to the ecclesiastical law and history of England, but it is composed with too much spleen towards bishop Gibson, the author of the Codex. This Case is much considered in it, and the following passage is thought worth insertion here: "It may easily be made appear, if it shall be thought necessary, that Prohibitions have gone from the temporal to the spiritual courts, as from a superior to an inferior jurisdiction, ever since the two jurisdictions have been separated; and, indeed, the notion of a subordination of jurisdictions implies that it is the province of the one to restrain and correct the excesses of the other. This supremacy of the Courts of Westminster-hall over the Ecclesiastical, hath in all ages given great disturbance to that part of the Clergy who have affected an absolute independance on the state. The arguments, indeed, which have been employed against it, have been different, as the temper of the times and the circumstances of the Church have varied. But the point in view hath been generally the same, the independance of the Church. In popish times, when the Church could scold and thunder with impunity, this independency was claimed in direct terms; and the king and all his civil ministers were admonished not to disturb the Church in the exercise of spiritual discipline by prohibitions and attachments grounded on them, under pain of excommunication, suspension, and interdict. But since the supremacy of the crown in ecclesiastical causes hath been esteemed a fundamental principle of our constitution, that very supremacy hath been thought a sufficient argument for overthrowing the ancient jurisdiction of the temporal, over the spiritual courts. Archbishop Bancroft made this use of the regal supremacy, in the Articles he exhibited to the lords of the Privy Council against the Judges of Westminster Hall upon the head of Prohibitions. His lordship (Gibson bishop of London) hath adopted the argument, and pressed it with all the advantage it is capable of: 'The authority of spiritual courts and temporal courts of law flowing equally from the crown, and it being of so great importance to the good of the community that each be kept within its proper bounds, it seems by no means agreeable to that equality of original and descent, nor a way in any degree likely to attain that important end, that the one should be set as a judge over the other, and prescribe bounds to it and take to itself the cognizance of whatever matters itself shall please. I shall not say how well the bounds in the present case are preserved upon that foot, but certainly it would not be thought a good expedient for preserving bounds of any other kind to empower one to judge for both (i. e. to empower him to encroach upon his neighbour and enlarge his own bounds at pleasure) as oft as any controversy shall arise.'—The force of this reasoning from the equality of original, I think lies here: the temporal and spiritual courts flow equally (or rather alike) from the crown, or are equal in point of original and descent; therefore they are or ought to be equal in point of jurisdiction; the one ought not to have a restrictive power over the other. If this be not his lordship's inference how can it be said that the setting one of the courts as judge over the other seems not agreeable to their equality of original and descent? But if his lordship intended to infer an equality in point of jurisdiction from what he is pleased to call an equality of original and descent, he will be pleased to apply the same reasoning to every other court in the kingdom from the high court of Parliament to the court of Pipowder, and if it should appear that they all flow equally or alike from the same original law and immemorial custom, I fear his argument will conclude against any manner of subordination among them in point of jurisdiction, which would be carrying the matter much farther than he intended; though, I confess, I do not know where to stop, if the argument grounded on the equality of original, with regard to the spirituals and temporals, concludes at all in favour of the former. But his lordship has favoured us with another train of reasoning against Prohibitions, grounded on the seeming absurdity and inconvenience of setting one court as judge over the other, in questions touching the bounds of their several jurisdictions: and if the case was, as his lordship represents it, the absurdity and inconvenience would be great indeed, if the temporal court might lawfully take to itself the cognizance of whatever matters itself shall please; or was empowered to encroach upon the spiritual, and to enlarge its own bounds at pleasure: if this, I say, was implied in the right claimed by the temporal courts, of giving remedy against the encroachments of the ecclesiastical,

(which is all that is intended by the writ of Prohibition) the absurdity would be as great as his lordship endeavours to represent it. But his lordship will forgive me, if I say the absurdity lies only in his state of the case. Our excellent constitution is not chargeable with it. The bounds of ecclesiastical jurisdiction are already settled by law and immemorial custom, to which the judges are obliged by oath and by the duty of their place to conform themselves. The granting Prohibitions is not a power to be exercised or not at the pleasure of the court. It is not the court's taking to itself the cognizance of whatever matters itself shall please, or enlarging its own jurisdiction, at pleasure; no, it is a matter of mere right, in which the judges are to be guided by the known laws of the land, and not by will and pleasure."—See also "A short View of the Conduct of the English Clergy so far as relates to civil affairs from the Conquest to the Revolution," published 1737, and said to be written by sir Edmund Thomas, bart. Collier argues resolutely against the authority of these determinations of the Judges. He maintains that the questions arising out of a contest for jurisdiction between the temporal and ecclesiastical judges ought not to be determined by either of those parties. Against lord Coke, he cites lord Co. 8 Rep. 117 et seq.; and other common law authorities. See Coll. Eccl. Hist. vol. 1, 510, et seq.: vol. 2, 688. Repeated instances of a collision between the Judges, and Bishops occur in lord Coke's 12th Report.

80. The Trials of ROBERT WINTER, THOMAS WINTER, GUY FAWKES, JOHN GRANT, AMBROSE ROOKWOOD, ROB. KEYES, THOMAS BATES, and SIR EVERARD DIGBY, at Westminster, for High Treason, being Conspirators in the Gunpowder-Plot: *
3 JAC. I. 27th Jan. A. D. 1606.

THE Commissioners were, the Earls of Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, Devonshire, Northampton, and Salisbury; the Lord Chief Justice of England, sir John Popham, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Thomas Fleming; and sir Peter Warburton, knight, one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas.

THAT whereas our sovereign lord the king had, by the advice and assent of his council, for divers weighty and urgent occasions concerning his majesty, the state, and defence of the church and kingdom of England, appointed a Parliament to be holden at his city of Westminster; That Henry Garnet, Superior of the Jesuits within the realm of England, (called also by the several names of Wally, Darcy, Roberts, Farmer, and Henry Philips) Oswald Tesmond, Jesuit, otherwise called Oswald Greenwell, John Gerrard, Jesuit, (called also by the several names of Lec and Brooke) Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, gentlemen, Guy Fawkes gent. otherwise called Guy Johnson, Robert Keyes gent. and Thomas Bates yeoman, late servant to Robert Catesby esquire; together with the said Robert Catesby, and Thomas Percy esquires, John Wright and Christopher Wright gentlemen, in open Rebellion and Insurrection against his majesty, lately slain, and Francis Tresham esq. lately dead; as false Traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, did traitorously meet and assemble themselves together; and being so met, the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and other Jesuits, did maliciously, falsely, and traitorously move and persuade as well the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christopher Wright, and Francis Tresham, That our said sovereign lord the king, the nobility, clergy, and whole commonalty of the realm of England, (papists excepted) were heretics; and that all heretics were accursed and excommunicate; and that none heretic could be a king; but that it was lawful and meritorious to kill our said sovereign lord the king, and all other heretics within this realm of England, for the advancing and enlargement of the pretended and usurped authority and jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome, and for the restoring of the superstitious Romish religion within this realm of England. To which traitorous persuasions, the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, Thomas Catesby, Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christopher Wright, and Francis Tresham, traitorously did yield their assents; And that thereupon the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and divers other Jesuits; Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as also the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, traitorously amongst themselves did conclude and agree, with Gunpowder, as it were with one blast, suddenly, traitorously and barbarously to blow up and tear in pieces our said sovereign lord the king, the excellent, virtuous, and gracious queen Anne, his dearest wife, the most noble prince Henry, their eldest son, and future hope and joy of England; and the lords spiritual and temporal, the reverend judges of the realm, the knights, citizens and burgesses of parliament, and divers other faithful subjects and servants of the king in the said parliament, for the causes aforesaid to be assembled in the house of parliament; and all them, without any respect of majesty, dignity, degree, sex, age or place, most barbarously and more than beastly, traitorously, and suddenly to destroy and swallow up. And further did most traitorously conspire and conclude among themselves, That not only the whole royal issue-male of our said sovereign lord the king should be destroyed and rooted out; but that the persons aforesaid, together with divers other false traitors, traitorously with them to be assembled, should surprize the persons of the noble ladies Elizabeth and Mary, daughters of our said sovereign lord the king, and falsely and traitorously should proclaim the said lady Elizabeth to be queen of this realm: And thereupon should publish a certain traitorous Proclamation in the name of the said lady Elizabeth; wherein, as it was especially agreed by and between the said conspirators, That no mention should be made at the first, of the alteration of religion established within this realm of England; neither would the said false traitors therein acknowledge themselves to be authors, or actors, or devisers of the aforesaid most wicked and horrible treasons, until they had got sufficient power and strength for the assured execution and accomplishment of their said conspiracy and treason; and that then they would avow and justify the said most wicked and horrible treasons, as actions that were in the number of those, quæ non laudantur, nisi peracta, which be not to be commended before they be done: but by the said feigned and traitorous proclamation they would publish, That all and singular abuses and grievances within this realm of England, should, for satisfying of the people, be reformed. And that as well for the better concealing, as for the more effectual accomplishing of the said horrible treasons, as well the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, by the traitorous advice and procurement of the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and other Jesuits, traitorously did further conclude and agree, that as well the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, thereupon severally and traitorously should receive several corporal Oaths upon the holy Evangelists, and the Sacrament of the Eucharist, That they the treasons aforesaid would traitorously conceal and keep secret, and would not reveal them, directly or indirectly, by words or circumstances, nor ever would desist from the execution and final accomplishment of the said treasons, without the consent of some three of the aforesaid false traitors first in that behalf traitorously had: And that, thereupon as well the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, did traitorously take the said several corporal Oaths severally, and did receive the Sacrament of the Eucharist aforesaid, by the hands of the said Henry Garnet, John Gerrard, Oswald Tesmond, and other Jesuits. And further, that the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, together with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, by the like traitorous advice and counsel of the said Henry Garnet, John Gerrard, Oswald Tesmond, and other Jesuits, for the more effectual compassing and final execution of the said treasons, did traitorously among themselves conclude and agree to dig a certain mine under the said House of Parliament, and there secretly, under the said house, to bestow and place a great quantity of gunpowder; and that according to the said traitorous conclusion, the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, together with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, and Christ. Wright, afterwards secretly, not without great labour and difficulty, did dig and make the said mine unto the midst of the foundation of the wall of the said House of Parliament, the said foundation being of the thickness of three yards, with a traitorous intent to bestow and place a great quantity of gunpowder in the mine aforesaid, so as aforesaid traitorously to be made for the traitorous accomplishing of their traitorous purposes aforesaid. And that the said Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, together with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, and Christ. Wright, finding and perceiving the said work to be of great difficulty, by reason of the hardness and thickness of the said wall; and understanding a certain cellar under the said House of Parliament, and adjoining to a certain house of the said Thomas Percy, then to be letten to farm for a yearly rent, the said Thomas Percy, by the traitorous procurement, as well of the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and other Jesuits, Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as of the said Robert Catesby, John Wright, and Christ. Wright, traitorously did hire the cellar aforesaid for a certain yearly rent and term: and then those traitors did remove twenty barrels full of gunpowder out of the said house of the said Thomas Percy, and secretly and traitorously did bestow and place them in the cellar aforesaid, under the said House of Parliament, for the traitorous effecting of the treason, and traitorous purposes aforesaid. And that afterwards the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and other Jesuits, Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, together with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, and Christ. Wright, traitorously did meet with Robert Winter, John Grant, and Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham, esquires; and traitorously did impart to the said Robert Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham, the treasons, traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid; and did require the said Robert Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham, to join themselves as well with the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, and Christ. Wright, in the treasons, traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid; and traitorously to provide horse, armour, and other necessaries, for the better accomplishment and effecting of the said treasons. To which traitorous motion and request, the said Robert Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham, did traitorously yield their assents, and as well with the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, as with the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christ. Wright, and Francis Tresham, in the said treasons, traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid, traitorously did adhere and unite themselves. And thereupon several corporal Oaths, in form aforesaid, traitorously did take, and the Sacrament of the Eucharist, by the hands of the said Jesuits did receive, to such intent and purpose, as is aforesaid; and horses, armour, and other necessaries for the better effecting of the said treasons, according to their traitorous assents aforesaid, traitorously did provide. And that afterwards all the said false traitors did traitorously provide, and bring into the cellar aforesaid ten other barrels full of gunpowder, newly bought, fearing lest the former gunpowder, so as aforesaid bestowed and placed there, was become dankish; and the said several quantities of gunpowder aforesaid, with billets and faggots, lest they should be spied, secretly and traitorously did cover. And that afterwards the said false traitors traitorously provided, and brought into the cellar aforesaid, four hogsheds full of gunpowder, and laid divers great iron bars and stones upon the said four hogsheds, and the aforesaid other quantities of gunpowder: And the said quantities of gunpowder, bars, and stones, with billets and faggots, lest they should be espy'd, secretly and traitorously did likewise cover. And that the said Guy Fawkes, afterwards, for a full and final accomplishment of the said treasons, traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid, by the traitorous procurement, as well of the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, and other jesuits, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, John Grant, and Ambrose Rookwood, as of the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christopher Wright, and Francis Tresham, traitorously had prepared, and had upon his person touchwood and match, therewith traitorously to give fire to the several barrels, hogsheds, and quantities of gunpowder aforesaid, at the time appointed for the execution of the said horrible treasons. And further, that after the said horrible treasons, were, by the great favour and mercy of God, in a wonderful manner discover'd, not many hours before it should have been executed, as well the said Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, John Gerrard, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, John Grant, and Ambrose Rookwood, as the said Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, and Christopher Wright, traitorously did fly and withdraw themselves, to the intent traitorously to stir up and procure such popish persons, as they could, to join with them in actual, publick, and open rebellion against our said sovereign lord the king; and to that end did publish divers feigned and false rumours, that the papists throats should have been cut; and that thereupon divers papists were in arms, and in open, publick, and actual rebellion against our said sovereign lord the king, in divers parts of this realm of England.

To this Indictment they all pleaded, Not Guilty; and put themselves upon God and the country.

Then did Sir Edward Philips, knight, his majesty's Serjeant at Law, open the Indictment to this effect, as followeth:

The matter that is now to be offer'd to you my lords the commissioners, and to the trial of you the knights and gentlemen of the jury, is matter of Treason; but of such horror, and monstrous nature, that before now, the tongue of man never deliver'd; the ear of man never heard; the heart of man never conceited; nor the malice of hellish or earthly devil ever practised: For, if it be abominable to murder the least; if to touch God's anointed be to oppose themselves against God; if (by blood) to subvert princes, states and kingdoms, be hateful to God and man, as all true Christians must acknowledge; then, how much more than too monstrous shall all Christian hearts judge the horror of this treason; to murder and subvert such a king; such a queen; such a prince; such a progeny; such a state; such a government, so complete and absolute, that God approves, the world admires, all true English hearts honour and reverence; the pope and his disciples only envies and maligns?—The proceeding wherein, is properly to be divided into three general heads. 1. Matter of Declaration. 2. Matter of Aggravation. 3. Matter of Probation. Myself am limited to deal only with the Matter of Declaration, and that is contain'd within the compass of the Indictment only.

For the other two, I am to leave to him to whose place it belongeth. The substance of which declaration consisteth in four parts. 1. In the Persons and Qualities of the conspirators. 2. In the Matter conspired. 3. In the Mean and Manner of the Proceeding and Execution of the Conspiracy. And 4thly, Of the End and Purpose why it was so conspired.

As concerning the first, bring the Persons; they were, Garnet, Gerrard, Tesmond, jesuits not then taken. Thomas Winter, Guy Fawkes, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, Everard Digby, Ambrose Rookwood, John Grant, Robert Winter, at the bar. Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, John Wright, Christopher Wright, slain in rebellion. Francis Tresham, lately dead. All grounded Romanists and corrupted scholars of so irreligious and traitorous a school.—As concerning the second, which is the Matter conspired; it was, 1. To deprive the king of his crown. 2. To murder the king, the queen, and the prince. 3. To stir rebellion and sedition in the kingdom. 4. To bring a miserable destruction amongst the subjects. 5. To change, alter, and subvert the religion here established. 6. To ruinate the state of the commonwealth, and to bring in strangers to invade it.—As concerning the third, which is the Mean and Manner how to compass and execute the same; they did all conclude, 1. That the king, and his people (the papists excepted) were hereticks. 2. That they were all cursed, and excommunicated by the pope. 3. That no heretick could be king. 4. That it was lawful and meritorious to kill and destroy the king, and all the said hereticks.—The mean to effect it, they concluded to be, that, 1. The king, the queen, the prince, the lords spiritual and temporal, the knights and burgesses of the parliament, should be blown up with powder. 2. That the whole royal issue male should be destroyed. 3. That they would take into their custody Elizabeth and Mary the king's daughters, and proclaim the lady Elizabeth queen. 4. That they should feign a Proclamation in the name of Elizabeth, in which no mention should be made of alteration of religion, nor that they were parties to the treason, until they had raised power to perform the same; and then to proclaim, all grievances in the kingdom should be reformed.—That they also took several oaths, and received the sacrament; first, for secrecy; secondly for prosecution; except they were discharged thereof by three of them.—That after the destruction of the king, the queen, the prince, the royal issue male, the lords spiritual and temporal, the knights and burgesses, they should notify the same to foreign states; and thereupon sir Edmund Baynam, an attainted person of treason, and styling himself prime of the damned crew, should be sent and make the same known to the pope, and crave his aid: an ambassador fit both for the message and persons, to be sent betwixt the pope and the devil.—That the parliament being prorogued till the 7th of Feb. they in December made a mine under the house of parliament, purposing to place their powder there; but the parliament being then further adjourned till the 3d of October, they in Lent following hired the vault, and placed therein 20 barrels of powder.—That they took to them, Robert Winter, Grant, and Rookwood, giving them the oaths and sacrament as aforesaid, as to provide munition.—July 20. They laid in ten barrels more of powder, laying upon them divers great bars of iron, and pieces of timber, and great massy stones, and covered the same with faggots, &c.—September 20. They laid in more, 4 hogsheds of powder, with other stores and bars of iron thereupon.—Nov. 4. (The parliament being prorogued to the 5th) at 11 a clock at night, Fawkes had prepared, by the procurement of the rest, touchwood and match, to give fire to the powder the next day.—That the Treason being miraculously discovered, they put themselves, and procured others to enter, into open Rebellion: and gave out most untruly, it was for that the Papists throats were to be cut.

Attorney General. (Sir Edward Coke.) It appeareth to your lordships, and the rest of this most honourable and grave assembly, even by that which Mr. Serjeant hath already opened, that these are the greatest treasons that ever were plotted in England, and concern the greatest king that ever was of England. But when this assembly shall further hear, and see discovered the roots and branches of the same, not hitherto published, they will say indeed, Quis hæc posteris sic narrare poterit, ut facta non ficta esse videantur? That when these things shall be related to posterity, they will be reputed matters feigned, not done. And therefore in this so great a cause, upon the carriage and event whereof the eye of all Christendom is at this day bent; I shall desire that I may with your patience be somewhat more copious, and not so succinct, as my usual manner hath been; and yet will I be no longer than the very matter itself shall necessarily require. But before I enter into the particular narration of this cause, I hold it fit to give satisfaction to some, and those well affected amongst us, who have not only marvelled, but grieved, that no speedier expedition hath been used in these proceedings, considering the monstrousness and continual horror of this so desperate a cause.—1. It is ordo nature, agreeable to the order of nature, that things of great weight and magnitude should slowly proceed, according to that of the poet, Tarda solet magnis rebus adesse fides. And surely of these things we may truly say, Nunquam ante dies nostros talia acciderunt; neither hath the eye of man seen, nor the ear of man heard the like things to these.—2. Veritas temporis filia, Truth is the daughter of time; especially in this case, wherein by timely and often examinations, 1. Matters of greatest moment have been lately found out. 2. Some known offenders and those capital, but lately, apprehended. 3. Sundry of the principal arch-traitors before unknown, now manifested, as the Jesuits. 4. Heretical, treasonable and damnable books lately found out; one of equivocation, and another, 'De officio Principis Christiani,' of Francis Tresham's.—3. There have been already twenty and three several days spent in Examinations.—4. We should otherwise have hanged a man unattainted, for Guy Fawkes passed for a time under the name of John Johnson: so that if by that name greater expedition had been made, and he hanged, though we had not missed of the man, yet the proceeding would not have been so orderly or justifiable.—5. The king out of his wisdom and great moderation, was pleased to appoint this trial in time of assembly in parliament, for that it concerned especially those of the parliament.—Now touching the offences themselves, they are so exorbitant and transcendent, and aggregated of so many bloody and fearful crimes, as they cannot be aggravated by any inference, argument or circumstance whatsoever; and that in three respects: First, Because this offence is prima impressio, and therefore sine nomine, without any name which might be adequatum, sufficient to express it, given by any legist, that ever made or writ of any laws. For the highest treason that all they could imagine, they called it only crimen lese majestatis, the violating of the majesty of the prince. But this treason doth want an apt name, as tending not only to the hurt, but to the death of the king, and not the death of the king only, but of his whole kingdom, Non Regis sed Regni, that is, to the destruction and dissolution of the frame and fabrick of this antient, famous, and ever-flourishing monarchy; even the deletion of our whole name and nation: 'And therefore hold not thy tongue, O God, keep not still silence, refrain not thyself, O God; for so lo thine enemies make a murmuring, and they that hate thee have lift up their heads: They have said, Come, and let us root them out, that they be no more a people, and that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance.' Psal. lxxxiii. 1—5.—Secondly, It is sine exemplo, beyond all examples, whether in fact or fiction, even of the tragick poets, who did beat their wits to represent the most fearful and horrible murders.—Thirdly, It is sine modo, without all measure or stint of iniquity; like a mathematical line, which is, divisibilis in semper divisibilia, infinitely divisible.—It is treason to imagine or intend the death of the king, queen, or prince.—For treason is like a tree whose root is full of poison, and lieth secret and hid within the earth, resembling the imagination of the heart of man, which is so secret as God only knoweth it. Now the wisdom of the law provideth for the blasting and nipping, both of the leaves, blossoms, and buds which proceed from this root of Treason; either by words, which are like to leaves, or by some overt act, which may be resembled to buds or blossoms, before it cometh to such fruit and ripeness, as would bring utter destruction and desolation upon the whole state.—It is likewise Treason to kill the lord Chancellor, lord

Treasurer, or any justice of the one bench or other; justices of assize, or any other judge mentioned in the statute of 25 Edw. 3. sitting in their judicial places, and exercising their offices. And the reason is, for that every judge so sitting by the king's authority, representeth the majesty and person of the king; and therefore it is crimen lese majestatis, to kill him, the king being always in judgment of law present in court. But in the high court of parliament, every man by virtue of the king's authority, by writ under the great seal, hath a judicial place; and so consequently the killing of every of them had been a several Treason; and crimen lese majestatis. Besides that to their treasons were added open rebellion, burglary, robbery, horse-stealing, &c. So that this offence is such, as no man can express it, no example pattern it, no measure contain it.—Concerning foreign princes; there was here a protestation made for the clearing of them from all imputation and aspersion whatsoever.—First, For that whilst kingdoms stood in hostility, hostile actions are holden honourable and just. Secondly, It is not the king's serjeant, attorney, or solicitor, that in any sort touch or mention them: for we know that great princes and personages are reverently and respectfully to be spoken of; and that there is lex in sermone tenenda. But it is Fawkes, Winter, and the rest of the offenders, that have confessed so much as hath been said: and therefore the king's counsel learned doth but repeat the offender's confession, and charge or touch no other person. They have also slandered unjustly our great master king James, which we only repeat, to shew the wickedness and malice of the offenders. Thirdly, So much as is said concerning foreign princes, is so woven into the matter of the charge of these offenders, as it cannot be severed, or singled from the rest of the matter; so as it is inevitable, and cannot be premitted.—Now as this Powder-Treason is in itself prodigious and unnatural, so it is in the conception and birth most monstrous, as arising out of the dead ashes of former Treasons. For it had three roots, all planted and watered by Jesuits, and English Romish Catholicks: the first root in England, in December and March; the second in Flanders, in June; the third in Spain, in July. In England it had two branches, one in December was twelve months before the death of the late queen of blessed memory; another in March wherein she died.—First in December, A. D. 1601, do Henry Garnet superior of the jesuits in England, Robt. Tesmond, jesuit, Robt. Catesby (who was bono subacto et versuto ingenio et profunda perfidia) together with Francis Tresham and others, in the names, and for the behalf of all the English Romish Catholicks, imploy Thomas Winter into Spain, as for the general good of the Romish Catholick cause; and by him doth Garnet write his letters to father Creswell, jesuit, residing in Spain, in that behalf. With Thos. Winter doth Tesmond, alias Greeneway the jesuit, go as an associate and confederate in that conspiracy. The message (which was principally committed unto the said Winter) was, that he should make a proposition and request to the king of Spain, in the behalf and names of the English Catholics, That the king would send an army hither into England, and that the forces of the Catholics in England should be prepared to join with him, and do him service. And further, that he should move the king of Spain to bestow some pensions here in England, upon sundry persons Catholics, and devoted to his service: and moreover, to give advertisement, that the said king of Spain, making use of the general discontentment that young gentlemen and soldiers were in, might no doubt, by relieving their necessities, have them all at his devotion.—And because that in all attempts upon England, the greatest difficulty was ever found to be the transportation of horses; the Catholics in England would assure the king of Spain to have always in readiness for his use and service, 1500 or 2000 horses, against any occasion or enterprise. Now Thomas Winter undertaking this negotiation, and with Teasmond the Jesuit coming into Spain, by means of father Creswell the legier Jesuit there, as hath been said, had readily speech with Don Pedro Francesa second secretary of state, to whom he imparted his message, as also to the duke of Lerma; who assured him, that it would be an office very grateful to his master, and that it should not want his best furtherance.—Concerning the place for landing of the king of Spain's army, which from the English Romish Catholics he desired might be sent to invade the land; it was resolved, That if the army were great, then Essex and Kent were judged fittest, (where note by the way, who was then lord Warden of the Cinque Ports): if the army were small, and trusted upon succour in England, then Milford-haven was thought more convenient.—Now there being at that time hostility betwixt both kingdoms, the king of Spain willingly embraced the motion, saying, that he took the message from the Catholics very kindly, and that in all things he would respect them with as great care as his proper Castilians. But for his further answer, and full dispatch, Thos. Winter was appointed to attend the progress. In the end whereof, being in summer time, count Miranda gave him this answer in the behalf of his master, That the king would bestow 100,000 crowns to that use, half to be paid that year, and the rest the next spring following; and withal required that we should be as good as our promise, for the next spring he meant to be with us, and set foot in England. And lastly, he desired on the king's behalf, of Winter, that he might have certain advertisement and intelligence; if so it should in the mean time happen that the queen did die. Thos. Winter laden with these hopes, returns into England about a month before Christmas, and delivered answer of all that had passed, to Henry Garnet, Robert Catesby, and Francis

Tresham. But soon after set that glorious light, her majesty died: 'Mira cano; Sol occubuit, Nox nulla secuta est.—Presently after whose death was Christ. Wright, another messenger, sent over into Spain by Garnet, (who likewise did write by him to Creswell, for the furtherance of the negotiation) Catesby and Tresham, in the name and behalf of all the Romish Catholics in England; as well to carry news of her majesty's death, as also to continue the aforesaid negotiation for an invasion and pensions, which by Tho. Winter had before been dealt in. And in the Spanish court, about two months after his arrival there, doth Christopher Wright meet with Guy Fawkes; who upon the 22nd of June was employed out of Flanders from Brussels by sir William Stanley, Hugh Owen, (whose finger hath been in every treason which hath been of late years detected) and Baldwyn the legier Jesuit in Flanders; from whom likewise the said Fawkes carried letters to Creswell in Spain, for the countenancing and furtherance of his affairs.—Now the end of Fawkes's employment was, to give advertisement to the king of Spain, how the king of England was like to proceed rigorously with the Catholics, and to run the same course which the late queen did; and withal to intreat that it would please him to send an army into England to Milford-haven, where the Romish Catholics would be ready to assist him; and then the forces that should be transported in Spinola's Gallies, should be landed where they could most conveniently. And these their several messages did Christopher Wright and Guy Fawkes in the end intimate and propound to the king of Spain. But the king as then very honourably answered them both, that he would not in any wise further listen to any such motion, as having before dispatched an embassy into England, to treat concerning peace. Therefore this course by foreign forces failing, they fell to the Powder-plot, Catesby and Tresham being in at all; in the treason of the earl of Essex, in the treason of Watson and Clarke seminary priests, and also in this of the Jesuits; such a greedy appetite had they to practise against the state.

The rest of that which Mr. Attorney then spake continuedly, was by himself divided into three general parts. The first containing certain Considerations concerning this Treason. The second Observations about the same. The third a Comparison of this Treason of the Jesuits, with that of the seminary priests, and that other of Raleigh and others.

For the considerations concerning the Powder-treason, they were in number eight: that is to say, 1. The persons by whom. 2. The persons against whom. 3. The time when. 4. The place where. 5. The means. 6. The end. 7. The secret contriving. And lastly, the admirable discovery thereof.

1. For the Persons offending, or by whom, they are of two sorts; either of the clergy, or laity: and for each of them there is a several objection made. Touching those of the laity, it is by some given out, that they are such men, as admit just exception, either desperate in estate, or base, or not settled in their wits; such as are sine religione, sine sede, sine fide, sine re, et sine spe; without religion, without habitation, without credit, without means, without hope. But (that no man, though never so wicked, may be wronged) true it is, they were gentlemen of good houses, of excellent parts, howsoever most perniciously seduced, abused, corrupted, and jesuited, of very competent fortunes and states. Besides that Percy was of the house of Northumberland, sir William Stanley, who principally employed Fawkes into Spain, and John Talbot of Grafton, who at the least is in case of misprision of high-treason, both of great and honourable families. Concerning those of the spirituality, it is likewise falsly said, That there is never a religious man in this action. For I never yet knew a treason without a Romish priest; but in this there are very many jesuits, who are known to have dealt and passed through the whole action: three of them are legiers and statesmen, as Henry Garnet alias Walley, the superior of the jesuits, legier here in England; father Cresswell, legier jesuit in Spain, father Baldwyn legier in Flanders, as Parsous at Rome; besides their cursory men, as Gerrard, Oswald, Tesmond, alias Greeneway, Hammond, Hall, and other jesuits. So that the principal offenders are the seducing jesuits; men that use the reverence of religion, yea, even the most sacred and blessed name of Jesus, as a mantle to cover their impiety, blasphemy, treason and rebellion, and all manner of wickedness; as by the help of Christ shall be made most apparent to the glory of God, and the honour of our religion. Concerning this sect, their studies and practices principally consist in two dd's, to wit, in deposing of kings, and disposing of kingdoms: their profession and doctrine is a religion of distinctions, the greatest part of them being without the text, and therefore in very deed, idle and vain conceits of their own brains: not having membra dividenda, that is, all the parts of the division warranted by the Word of God; and 'ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus.' And albeit that princes hold their crowns immediately of and from God, by right of lawful succession and inheritance inherit by royal blood; yet think these jesuits with a goose-quill, within four distinctions to remove the crown from the head of any king christened, and to deal with them, as the old Romans are said to have done with their viceroys, or petty kings, who in effect were but lieutenants unto them, to crown and uncrown them at their pleasures. Neither so only, but they will proscrib and expose them to be butchered by vassals, which is against their own canons, for priests to meddle in cause of blood. And by this means they would make the condition of a king far worse than that of the poorest creature that breatheth. First saith Simanca;

'Hæretici omnes ipso jure sunt excommunicati, et à communione fidelium diris proscriptionibus separati et quotannis in cæna Domini excommunicantur à Papa.' So then every heretick stands and is reputed with them as excommunicated and accursed, if not de facto, yet de jure, in law and right, to all their intents and purposes; therefore may he be deposed, proscribed and murdered. I, but suppose he be not a professed heretick, but dealeth reservedly, and keepeth his conscience to himself; how stands he then? Simanca answers 'Quæri autem solet an hæreticus occultus excommunicatus sit ipso jure, et in alias etiam pœnas incidat contra hæreticos statutas?' 'Cui quæstioni simpliciter jurisperiti respondent, quod etsi hæresis occulta sit, nihilominus occultus hæreticus incidit in illas pœnas.' Whether he be a known or a secret heretick, all is one, they thunder out the same judgment and curse for both; whereas Christ saith, 'Nolite judicare,' judge not, which is, saith Augustine, 'Nolite judicare de occultis,' of those things which are secret. But suppose that a prince thus accursed and deposed, will eftsoons return and conform himself to their Romish Church, shall he then be restored to his state, and again receive his kingdom? Nothing less: for saith Simanca, 'Si reges aut alii principes Christiani facti sint hæretici, protinus subjecti et vassali ab eorum dominio liberantur; nec jus hoc recuperabunt, quamvis postea reconcilientur ecclesiæ.' O but, 'sancta mater ecclesia nunquam claudit gremium redeunti;' our holy mother the church never shuts her bosom to any convert. It is true, say they, but with a distinction, quoad animam: therefore so he may, and shall be restored; that is, spiritually, in respect of his soul's health. Quoad animam, he shall again be taken into the holy church; but not quoad regnum, in respect of his kingdom, or state temporal, he must not be restored; the reason is, because all hold only thus far, 'Modo non sit ad damnum ecclesiæ,' so that the church receive thereby no detriment. I, but suppose that such an unhappy deposed prince have a son, or lawful and right heir, and he also not to be touched or spotted with his father's crime, shall not he at least succeed, and be invested into that princely estate? Neither will this down with them: heresy is a leprosy, and hereditary disease: 'Et ex leprosis parentibus leprosi generantur filii;' 'Of leprous parents, come leprous children.' So that saith Simanca, 'Propter hæresim regis, non solum rex regno privatur, sed et ejus filii a regni successione pelluntur, ut noster lupus' (who is indeed, 'Vir secundum nomen ejus,' a wolf as well in nature as name) 'luculentè probat.' Now if a man doubt whom they here mean by an heretick, Cresswell in his book called Philopatèr, gives a plain resolution; 'Regnandi jus amittit' (saith he) 'qui religionem Romanam deserit,' he is the heretick we speak of; even whosoever forsakes the religion of the Church of Rome, he is accursed, deprived, proscribed, never to be absolved but by the pope himself, never to be restored either in himself, or his posterity.

One place amongst many out of Creswell's Philopater, shall serve to give a taste of the jesuitical spirits and doctrine; which is, sect. 2. page 109. 'Hinc etiam infert universa theologorum ac jurisconsultorum ecclesiasticorum schola (et est certum et de fide) quemcunque principem Christianum, si à Religione Catholica manifesto diflexerit, et alios advocare voluerit, excidere statim omni potestate ac dignitate, ex ipsa vi juris tum humani tum divini, hocque antedictam sententiam supremi pastoris ac judicis contra ipsum prolatam, et subditos quoscunque liberos esse ab omni juramenti obligatione, quod de obedientia tanquam principi legitimo præstitissent; posseque et debere (si vires habeant) istiusmodi hominem tanquam apostatam, hæreticum, ac Christi Domini desertorem, et reipub. suæ inimicum hostemque ex hominum Christianorum dominatu ejicere, ne alios inficiat, vel suo exemplo aut imperio à fide avertat. Atque hæc certa, definita et indubitata virorum doctissimorum sententia.' That is, this inference also doth the whole school both of divines and lawyers make, (and it is a position certain, and to be undoubtedly believed) that if any Christian prince whatsoever, shall manifestly turn from the Catholic religion, and desire or seek to reclaim other men from the same, he presently falleth from all princely power and dignity; and that also by virtue and force of the law itself, both divine and human, even before any sentence pronounced against him by the supreme pastor and judge. And that his subjects, of what estate or condition soever, are freed from all bond of oath of allegiance, which at any time they had made unto him as to their lawful prince. Nay, that they both may and ought, provided they have competent strength and force, cast out such a man from bearing rule amongst Christians, as an apostate, an heretic, a backslider and revolter from our Lord Christ, and an enemy to his own state and commonwealth, lest perhaps he might infect others, or by his example or command turn them from the faith. And this is the certain, resolute, and undoubted judgment of the best learned men. But Tresham in his book, De Officio Principis Christiani, goeth beyond all the rest; for he plainly concludeth and determineth, that if any prince shall but favour, or shew countenance to an heretick, he presently loseth his kingdom. In his fifth chapter, he propoundeth this problem, 'An aliqua possit secundum conscientiam subditis esse ratio, cur legitimo suo regi bellum sine scelere moveant?' Whether there may be any lawful cause, justifiable in conscience, for subjects to take arms without sin, against their lawful prince and sovereign? The resolution is, 'Si princeps hæreticus sit et obstinate ac pertinaciter intolerabilis, summi pastoris divina potestate deponatur, et aliud caput constituatur, cui subditi se jungant, et legitimo ordine et autoritate tyrannidem amo-veant. Princeps indulgendo hæreticos non solum Deum offendit, sed perdit et regnum et gentem.' Their conclusion therefore is, that for heresy, as above is understood, a prince is to be deposed, and his kingdom bestowed by the pope at pleasure; and that the people, upon pain of damnation, are to take part with him whom the pope shall so constitute over them. And thus whilst they imagine with the wings of their light-feathered distinctions to mount above the clouds and level of vulgar conceits, they desperately fall into a sea of gross absurdities, blasphemy, and impiety. And surely the Jesuits were so far engaged in this treason, as that some of them stick not to say, that if it should miscarry, that they were utterly undone, and that it would overthrow the state of the whole society of the Jesuits: And I pray God that in this, they may prove true prophets, that they may become like the Order of Templarii, so called for that they kept near the sepulchre at Jerusalem, who were by a general and universal edict in one day throughout Christendom quite extinguished, as being ordo impietatis, an order of impiety. 'And so from all sedition and privy conspiracy, from all false doctrine and heresy, from hardness of heart, and contempt of thy word and commandment, Good Lord, deliver us.' Their protestations and pretences, are to win souls to God; their proofs weak, light, and of no value; their conclusions false, damnable, and damned heresies: The first mentioneth God, the second savoureth of weak and frail man, the last of the devil; and their practice easily appeareth out of the dealing of their holy father.

Henry 3rd of France for killing a cardinal was excommunicated, and after murdered by James Clement a monk: That fact doth Sixtus Quintus then pope, instead of orderly censuring thereof, not only approve, but commend in a long consistory oration. 'That a monk, a religious man, saith he, hath slain the unhappy French king, in the midst of his host, it is rarum insigne, memorabile facinus, a rare, a notable, and a memorable act: yea further, it is facinus non sine Dei optimi maximi particulari providentia et dispositione, &c. A fact done not without the special providence and appointment of our good God, and the suggestion and assistance of his holy spirit; yea, a far greater work than was the slaying of Holofernes by holy Judith.' Verus monachus fictum occiderat, A true monk had killed the false monk; for that, as was reported, Henry 3 sometimes would use that habit when he went in procession: and for France, even that part thereof which entertaineth the popish religion, yet never could of ancient time brook this usurped authority of the see of Rome, namely, that the pope had power to excommunicate kings, and absolve subjects from their oath of allegiance: which position is so directly opposite to all the canons of the church of France, and to all the decrees of the king's parliament there, as that the very body of Sorbonne, and the whole university at Paris, condemned it as a most schismatical, pestilent, and pernicious doctrine of the Jesuits; as may appear in a treatise made to the French king, and set out 1602, intitled, 'Le franc Discours.' But to return to the Jesuits, Catesby was resolved by the Jesuits, that the fact was both lawful and meritorious; and herewith he persuaded and settled the rest, as they seemed to make doubt.

Concerning Thomas Bates, who was Catesby's man, as he was wound into this treason by his master, so was he resolved, when he doubted of the lawfulness thereof, by the doctrine of the Jesuits. For the manner, it was after this sort: Catesby noting that his man observ'd him extraordinarily, as suspecting somewhat of that which he the said Catesby went about, called him to him at his lodging in Puddle-wharf; and in the presence of Thomas Winter, asked him what he thought the business was they went about, for that he of late had so suspiciously and strangely marked them. Bates answer'd, that he thought they went about some dangerous matter, whatsoever the particular were: whereupon they asked him again what he thought the business might be; and he answer'd that he thought they intended some dangerous matter about the parliament-house, because he had been sent to get a lodging near unto that place. Then did they make the said Bates take an oath to be secret in the action; which being taken by him, they then told him that it was true, that they were to execute a great matter; namely, to lay powder under the parliament-house to blow it up. Then they also told him that he was to receive the sacrament for the more assurance, and thereupon he went to confession, to the said Tesmond the Jesuit: and in his confession told him, that he was to conceal a very dangerous piece of work, that his master Catesby and Thomas Winter had imparted unto him, and said he much feared the matter to be utterly unlawful, and therefore therein desired the counsel of the Jesuit; and revealed unto him the whole intent and purpose of blowing up the parliament-house upon the first day of the assembly; at what time the king, the queen, the prince, the lords spiritual and temporal, the judges, the knights, citizens and burgesses, should all have been there convented and met together. But the Jesuit being a confederate therein before, resolved and encouraged him in the action; and said that he should be secret in that which his master had imparted unto him, for that it was for a good cause. Adding moreover, that it was not dangerous unto him, nor any offence to conceal it: and thereupon the Jesuit gave him absolution, and Bates received the sacrament of him, in the company of his master Robert Catesby and Thomas Winter. Also when Rookwood in the presence of sundry of the traitors, having first received the oath of secrecy, had by Catesby imparted unto him the Plot of blowing up the king and state; the said Rookwood being greatly amazed thereat, answered, that it was a matter of conscience to take away so much blood: but Catesby replied, that he was resolved, and that by good authority, as coming from the Superior of the Jesuits, that in conscience it might be done, yea, tho' it were with the destruction of many innocents, rather than the action should quail. Likewise father Hammond absolved all the traitors at Robert Winter's house, upon Thursday after the discovery of the Plot, they being then in open rebellion: And therefore, 'Hos O Remagne caveto:' and let all kings take heed, how they either favour or give allowance or connivance unto them.

2. The second Consideration respecteth the Persons against whom this treason was intended; which are, 1. The king, who is God's anointed. Nay, it hath pleased God to communicate unto him his own name; 'Dixi, Dii estis,' not substantially or essentially so, neither yet on the other side Usurpativè, by unjust usurpation, as the devil and the pope; but Potestativè, as having his power derived from God within his territories. 2. Their natural liege lord, and dread sovereign, whose just interest and title to this crown may be drawn from before the conquest; and if he were not a king by descent, yet deserved he to be made one for his rare and excellent endowments and ornaments both of body and mind. Look into his true and constant religion and piety, his justice, his learning above all kings christened, his acumen, his judgment, his memory; and you will say that he is indeed, 'Solus præteritis major, meliorque futuris.' But because I cannot speak what I would, I will forbear to speak what I could. Also against the queen, a most gracious and graceful lady, a most virtuous, fruitful, and blessed vine, who hath happily brought forth such olive-branches, as that 'in benedictione erit memoria ejus,' her memory shall be blessed of all our posterity. Then against the royal issue male, next under God, and after our sovereign, the future hope, comfort, joy, and life of our state. And as for preserving of the good lady Elizabeth the king's daughter, it should only have been for a time to have served for their purposes, as being thought a fit project to keep others in appetite for their own further advantage; and then God knoweth what would have become of her. To conclude, against all the most honourable and prudent counsellors, and all the true-hearted and worthy nobles, all the reverend and learned bishops, all the grave judges and sages of the law, all the principal knights, gentry, citizens and burgesses of parliament, the flower of the whole realm. Horret animus, I tremble even to think of it: Miserable desolation! no king, no queen, no prince, no issue male, no counsellors of state; no nobility, no bishops, no judges! O barbarous, and more than Scythian or Thracian cruelty! No mantle of holiness can cover it, no pretence of religion can excuse it, no shadow of good intention can extenuate it; God and heaven condemn it, man and earth detest it, the offenders themselves were ashamed of it; wicked people exclaim against it, and the souls of all true Christian subjects abhor it:

miserable, but yet sudden had their ends been, who should have died in that fiery tempest, and storm of gunpowder. But more miserable had they been that had escaped; and what horrible effects the blowing up of so much powder and stuff would have wrought, not only amongst men and beasts, but even upon insensible creatures, churches, and houses, and all places near adjoining; you who have been martial men best know. For my self, 'Vox faucibus hæret:' so that the king may say with the kingly prophet David; 'O Lord, the proud are risen against me, and the congregation, even synagogoga, the synagogue of naughty men have sought after my soul, and have not set thee before their eyes,' Psal. lxxxvi. 14. 'The proud have laid a snare for me, and spread a net abroad, yea, and set traps in my way.' Psal. cxl. 5. 'But let the ungodly fall into their own nets together, and let me ever escape them,' Psalm, cxli. 11. We may say, 'If the Lord himself had not been on our side; yea, if the Lord himself had not been on our side, when men rose up against us, they had swallowed us up quick, when they were so wrathfully displeas'd at us; but praised be the Lord, which hath not given us over for a prey unto their teeth. Our soul is escaped even as a bird out of the snare of the fowler, the snare is broken, and we are delivered; our help standeth in the name of the Lord which hath made heaven and earth.' Psalm cxxiv.

3. The third consideration respects the Time when this Treason was conspired; wherein note that it was primo Jacobi, even at that time when his majesty used so great lenity towards Recusants, in that by the space of a whole year and four months, he took no penalty by statute of them. So far was his majesty from severity, that besides the benefit and grace before specified, he also honoured all alike with advancement and favours; and all this was continued until the priests Treason by Watson and Clarke. But as there is misericordia puniens, so is there likewise crudelitas parcens: for they were not only by this not reclaimed but (as plainly appeareth) became far worse. Nay, the Romish Catholics did at that very time certify that it was very like, the king would deal rigorously with them, and the same do these traitors now pretend, as the chiefest motive; whereas indeed they had Treason on foot against the king, before they saw his face in England: neither afterwards, for all the lenity he used towards them, would any whit desist or relent from their wicked attempts. Nay, (that which cometh next to be remembered in this part of their arraignment) they would pick out the time of parliament for the execution of their hideous Treasons, wherein the flower of the land being assembled, for the honour of God, the good of his Church and this Commonwealth; they might as it were with one blow, not wound, but kill and destroy the whole state: so that with these men, impunitas continuum affectum tribuit peccandi, lenity having once bred a slope of impunity, begat not only

4. We are to consider the Place, which was the sacred senate, the house of parliament. And why there? For that, say they, unjust laws had formerly been there made against catholicks: therefore that was the fittest place of all others to revenge it, and to do justice in. If any ask who should have executed this their justice, it was justice Fawkes, a man like enough to do according to his name. If by what law they meant to proceed; it was gunpowder-law, fit for justices of hell. But concerning those laws which they so calumniate as unjust, it shall in few words plainly appear, that they were of the greatest both moderation and equity that ever were any. For from the year 1 Elizabeth, unto 11, all papists came to our church and service without scruple I myself have seen Cornwallis, Beddingfield, and others at church: so that then for the space of 10 years, they made no conscience nor doubt to communicate with us in prayer. But when once the Bull of Pope Pius Quintus was come and published, wherein the queen was accused and deposed, and her subjects discharged of their obedience and oath, yea cursed if they did obey her; then did they all forthwith refrain the Church, then would they have no more society with us in prayer: so that recusancy in them is not for religion, but in an acknowledgment of the pope's power, and a plain manifestation what their judgment is concerning the right of the prince in respect of regal power and place. Two years after, viz. 13 Elizabeth, was there a law made against the bringing in of Bulls, &c. Anno 18, came Mayne a priest to move sedition. Anno 20, came Campion the first Jesuit, who was sent to make a party here in England, for the execution of the former Bull: then follow treasonable books. Anno 23 Elizabeth, after so many years sufferance, there were laws made against recusants and seditious books: the penalty or sanction for recusancy, was not loss of life, or limb, or whole state, but only a pecuniary mulct and penalty, and that also until they would submit and conform themselves, and again come to Church, as they had done for 10 years before the Bull. And yet afterwards the Jesuits and Romish priests both coming daily into, and swarming within the realm, and infusing continually this poison into the subjects hearts, that by reason of the said Bull of Pius Quintus, her majesty stood excommunicated and deprived of her kingdom, and that her subjects were discharged of all obedience to her, endeavouring by all means to draw them from their duty and allegiance to her majesty, and to reconcile them to the Church of Rome; then 27 Eliz. a law was made, that it should be Treason for any (not to be a priest and an Englishman, born the queen's natural subject, but for any) being so born her subject, and made a Romish priest, to come into any of her dominions, to infect any of her royal subjects with their treasonable and damnable persuasions and practices; yet so, that it concerned only such as were made priests sithence her majesty came to the crown, and not before.

Concerning the execution of these laws, it is to be observed likewise, that whereas in the quinquenny, the five years of qucen Mary, there were cruelly put to death about 360 persons for religion; in all her majesty's time by the space of 44 years and upwards, there were for treasonable practices executed, in all not 30 preests, nor above five receivers and harbourers of them; and for religion not any one. And here by the way, I desire those of parliament to observe, that it is now questioned and doubted, whether the law of recusants and reconciled persons do hold for Ireland also, and the parts beyond the seas that is, whether such as were there reconciled be within the compass of the statute or not, to the end it may be cleared and provided for.

Now against the usurped power of the see of Rome, we have of former times about 13 several acts of parliament: so that the crown and the king of England is no ways to be drawn under the government of any foreign power whatsoever, neither oweth duty to any, but is immediately under God himself. Concerning the pope, for 43 of them, namely unto Sylvester, they were famous martyrs. But 'Quicumque desiderat primatum in terris, inveniet confusionem in caelis.' He that desires primacy upon earth, shall surely find confusion in heaven.

5. The fifth Consideration is of the end, which was to bring a final and fatal confusion upon the state. For howsoever they sought to shadow their impiety with the cloke of religion, yet they intended to breed a confusion fit to get new alterations; for they went to join with Romish Catholicks, and discontented persons.

6. Now the sixth point, which is the means to compass and work these designs, were damnable: by mining, by 36 barrells of powder, having crows of iron, stones and wood laid upon the barrells to have made the breach the greater. Lord, what a wind, what a fire, what a motion and commotion of earth and air would there have been! But as it is in the book of Kings, when Elias was in the cave of the mount Horeb, and that he was called forth to stand before the Lord, behold a mighty strong wind rent the mountains, and brake the rocks: 'sed non in vento Dominus,' 'but the Lord was not in the wind.' And after the wind, came a commotion of the earth and air; 'Et non in commotione Domini,' 'the Lord was not in that commotion;' and after the commotion came fire; 'et non in igne Domini,' 'the Lord was not in the fire.' So neither was God in any part of this monstrous action. The authors whereof were in this respect worse than the very damned spirit of Dives, who, as it is in the gospel, desired that others should not come 'in locum tormentorum.'

7. The next consideration is, the secret continuing and carriage of this treason; to which purpose there were four means used:

First, Catesby was commended to the marquis for a regiment of horse in the Low-Countries, (which is the same that the lord Arundel now hath) that under that pretence he might have furnished this treason with horses without suspicion. The second means was an oath, which they solemnly and severally took, as well for secrecy, as perseverance and constancy in the execution of their plot. The form of the oath was as follows: 'You shall swear by the blessed Trinity, and by the sacrament you now purpose to receive, never to disclose directly nor indirectly, by word or circumstance, the matter that shall be proposed to you to keep secret, nor desist from the execution thereof, until the rest shall give you leave.'—This oath was, by Gerrard the Jesuit given to Catesby, Percy, Christ. Wright, and Thomas Winter at once; and by Greenwell the Jesuit, to Bates, at another time, and so to the rest.—The third, was the Sacrament; which they impiously and devilishly profaned to this end.—But the last, was their perfidious and perjurious equivocating, abetted, allowed, and justified by the Jesuits, not only simply to conceal or deny an open truth, but religiously to aver, to protest upon salvation, to swear that which themselves know to be most false; and all this, by reserving a secret and private sense inwardly to themselves: whereby they are, by their ghostly fathers, persuaded, That they may safely and lawfully elude any question whatsoever.

And here was shewed a Book written not long before the qucen's death, at what time Thomas Winter was employed into Spain, entitled, 'A Treatise of Equivocation.' Which book being seen and allowed by Garnet, the superior of the Jesuits, and Blackwel the arch-priest of England, in the beginning thereof, Garnet with his own hand put out those words in the title 'of equivocacion,' and made it thus; 'A Treatise against Lying and fraudulent Dissimulation.' Whereas in deed and truth it makes for both, 'Speciosaque nomina culpæ imponis, Garnette tuæ.' And in the end thereof, Blackwel besprinkles it with his blessing, saying, 'Tractatus iste, valde doctus et vere pius, et Catholicus est; certe S. Scripturarum, parum, doctorum, scholasticorum, canonicorum, et optimarum rationum præsidis plenissime firmat æquitatem equivocacionis; ideoque dignissimus est qui typis pagetur, ad consolationem afflictorum Catholicorum, et omnium piorum instructionem.' That is, 'This Treatise is very learned, godly, and Catholick, and doth most fully confirm the equity of equivocacion, by strong proofs out of holy Scriptures, fathers, doctors, schoolmen, canonists, and soundest reasons; and therefore worthy to be published in print, for the comfort of afflicted Catholicks, and instruction of all the godly.'

Now, in this Book there is propositio mentalis, verbalis, scripta, and mixta; distinguishing of a mental, a verbal, a written, and a mixed proposition; a very labyrinth to lead men into error and falsehood.—For example, to give you a little taste of this art of eozening: A man is asked upon his oath this question, Did you see such a one to-day? He may by this doctrine answer, No, though he did see him, viz. reserving this secret meaning, not with purpose to tell my Lord Chief Justice: Or, I see him not visiona beatifica, or, not in Venice, &c. Likewise to answer thus; I was in the company; reserving and intending secretly as added, this word not: As Strange the Jesuit did to my Lord Chief Justice and myself. Take one or two of these out of that very book, as for purpose: A man cometh unto Coventry in time of a suspicion of plague, and at the gates the officers meet him, and upon his oath examine him: Whether he came from London or no, where they think certainly the plague to be: This man knowing for certain the plague not to be at London, or at least knowing that the air is not there infectious, and that he only rid through some secret place of London, not staying there, may safely swear, he came not from London; answering to their final intention in their demand, that is, whether he came so from London that he may endanger their city of the plague, although their immediate intention were to know, whether he came from London or no. That man, saith the book, the very light of nature would clear from perjury.—In like manner, one being convented in the bishop's court, because he refused to take such a one to his wife, as he had contracted with, per verba de presenti, having contracted with another privily before, so that he cannot be husband to her that claimeth him; may answer, That he never contracted with her per verba de presenti: understanding that he did not so contract that it was a marriage; for that is the final intention of the judge, to know whether there were a sufficient marriage between them or no.

Never did father Cranmer, fytter Latimer, futher Ridley, those blessed martyrs, know these shifts, neither would they have used them to have saved their lives. And surely let every good man take heed of such jurors or witnesses, there being no faith, no bond of religion or civility, no conscience of truth in such men; and therefore the conclusion shall be that of the prophet David, 'Domine libera animam meam a labiis iniquis et à lingua dolosa;' 'Deliver me, O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.'

S. P. Q. R. was sometimes taken for these words, Senatus Populusque Romanus; The Senate and People of Rome: but now they may truly be expressed thus, Stultus Populus querit Romam; A foolish People that runneth to Rome. And here was very aptly and delightfully inserted and related the apologue or tale of the cat and the mice: The cat having a long time preyed upon the mice, the poor creatures at last, for their safety, contained themselves within their holes; but the cat finding his prey to cease, as being known to the mice, that he was indeed their enemy and a cut, deviseth this course following, viz. changeth his hue, getteth on a religious habit, shaveth his crown, walks gravely by their holes: And yet perceiving that the mice kept their holes, and looking out, suspected the worst, he formally, and father-like, said unto them, 'Quod fueram non sum, frater; caput aspice tonsum!' 'Oh brother, I am not as you take me for, no more a cat; see my habit and shaven crown!' Hereupon some of the more credulous and bold among them, were again, by this deceit, snatched up; and therefore, when afterwards he came as before to entice them forth, they would come out no more, but answered, 'Cor tibi restat idem, vix tibi presto fidem;' 'Talk what you can, we will never believe you, you have still a cat's heart within you.' You do not watch and pray, but you watch to prey. And so have the Jesuits, yea, and priests too, for they are all joined in the tails like Sampson's foxes, Ephraim against Manasses, and Manasses against Ephraim, but both against Judah.

8. The last consideration is concerning the admirable Discovery of this treason, which was by one of themselves, who had taken the oath and sacrament, as hath been said, against his own will: the means was by a dark and doubtful Letter sent to my lord Mounteagle*.

And thus much as touching the Considerations: the Observations follow, to be considered in this Powder-Treason, and are briefly thus: 1. If the cellar had not been hired, the mine-work could hardly, or not at all have been discovered; for the mine was neither found nor suspected until the danger was past, and the capital offenders apprehended, and by themselves, upon examination, confessed. 2. How the king was divinely illuminated by Almighty God, the only ruler of princes, like an Angel of God, to direct and point as it were to the very place, to cause a search to be made there, out of those dark words of the letter concerning a terrible blow. 3. Observe a miraculous accident which befel in Stephen Littleton's house, called Holbach in Staffordshire, after they had been two days in open rebellion, immediately before the apprehension of these traitors: for some of them standing by the fire-side, and having set two pound and an half of powder to dry in a platter before the fire, and underset the said platter with a great linen bag full of other powder, containing some fifteen or sixteen pounds; it so fell out, that one coming to put more wood into the fire, and casting it on, there flew a coal into the platter, by reason whereof the powder taking fire and blowing up, scorched those who were nearest, as Catesby, Grant, and Rookwood, blew up the roof of the house: and the linen-bag which was set under the platter being therewith suddenly carried out through the breach, fell down in the courtyard whole and unfired; which if it had took fire in the room, would have slain them all there, so that they never should have come to this trial: and 'Lex justior nulla est, quam necis artifices arte perire sua?' 4. Note, that gunpowder was the invention of a fryer, one of the Romish rabble, as printing was of a soldier. 5. Observe the sending of Bainham, one of the damned crew, to the high-priest of Rome, to give signification of this blow, and to crave his direction and aid. 6. That for all their stirring and rising in open rebellion, and notwithstanding the false rumours given out by them, That the throats of all Catholicks should be cut; such is his majesty's blessed government, and the loyalty of his subjects, as they got not any one man to take their parts besides their own company. 7. Observe, the sheriff, the ordinary minister of justice, according to the duty of his office, with such power as he on a sudden by law collected, suppressed them. 8. That God suffered their intended mischief to come so near the period, as not to be discovered, but within few hours before it should have been executed. 9. That it was in the entering of the Sun into the Tropick of Capricorn when they began their mine; noting, that by mining, they should descend; and by hanging, ascend. 10. That there never was any Protestant minister in any treason and murder as yet attempted within this realm.

I am now come to the last part, which I proposed in the beginning of this discourse; and that is, touching certain comparisons of this Powder-Treason of the Jesuits, with that of Raleigh, and the other of the priests Watson and Clarke. 1. They had all one end, and that was the Romish Catholick cause. 2. The same means, by Popish and discontented persons, priests and lay-men. 3. They all plaid at hazard; the priests were at the bye, Raleigh at the main, but these in at all; as purposing to destroy all the king's royal issue, and withal the whole estate. 4. They were all alike obliged by the same oath and sacrament. 5. The same proclamations were intended, after the fact, to be published for reformation of abuses. 6. The like army provided for invading, to land at Milford-Haven, or in Kent. 7. The same pensions of crowns promised. 8. The agreeing of the times of the treason of Raleigh and these men, which was when the constable of Spain was coming hither: and Raleigh said, there could be no suspicion of any invasion, seeing that the constable of Spain was then expected for a treaty of peace; and the navy might be brought to the Groyn under pretence of the service in the Low-Countries. And Raleigh further said, That many more were hanged for words than for deeds. And before Raleigh's treason was discovered, it was reported in Spain that Don Raleigh and Don Cobham should cut the king of England's throat.

I say not, that we have any proofs, that these of the Powder-Plot were acquainted with Raleigh, or Raleigh with them: but as before was spoken of the Jesuits and priests, so they all were joined in the ends, like Sampson's Foxes in the tails, howsoever severed in their heads.

The conclusion shall be from the admirable clemency and moderation of the king, in that howsoever these traitors have exceeded all others their predecessors in mischief, and so 'Crescente malitia, crescere debuit et poena;' yet neither will the king exceed the usual punishment of law, nor invent any new torture or torment for them; but is graciously pleased to afford them as well an ordinary course of trial, as an ordinary punishment, much inferior to their offence. And surely worthy of observation is the punishment by law provided and appointed for High-Treason, which we call crimen laesæ majestatis. For first after a traitor hath had his just trial and is convicted and attainted, he shall have his judgment to be drawn to the place of execution from his prison as being not worthy any more to tread upon the face of the earth whereof he was made: also for that he hath been retrograde to nature, therefore is he drawn backward at a horse-tail. And whereas God hath made the head of man the highest and most supreme part, as being his chief grace and ornament, 'Prouaque cum spectent animalia cætera terram os homini subline dedit;' he must be drawn with his head declining downward, and lying so near the ground as may be, being thought unfit to take benefit of the common air. For which cause also he shall be strangled, being hanged up by the neck between heaven and earth, as deemed unworthy of both, or either; as likewise, that the eyes of men may behold, and their hearts condemn him. Then is he to be cut down alive, and to have his privy parts cut off and burnt before his face as being unworthily begotten, and unfit to leave any generation after him. His bowels and inlay'd parts taken out and burnt, who inwardly had conceived and harboured in his heart such horrible treason. After, to have his head cut off, which had imagined the mischief. And lastly his body to be quartered, and the quarters set up in some high and eminent place, to the view and detestation of men, and to become a prey for the fowls of the air.

And this is a reward due to traitors, whose hearts be hardened: For that it is physick of state and government, to let out corrupt blood from the heart. But, 'Pœnitentia vera nunquam, sera sed pœnitentia sera raro vera.' True repentance is indeed never too late: but late repentance is seldom found true: Which yet I pray the merciful Lord to grant unto them, that having a sense of their offences, they may make a true and sincere confession both for their souls health, and for the good and safety of the king and this state. And for the rest that are not yet apprehended, my prayer to God is, 'Ut aud convertantur ne perent, aut confundantur ne noceant;' that either they may be converted, to the end they perish not, or else confounded, that they hurt not.

ney-General, were their several examinations (subscribed by themselves) shewed particularly unto them and acknowledged by them to be their own, and true, wherein every one had confessed the treason. Then did master Attorney desire, That albeit that which had been already done and confessed at the bar, might be all-sufficient for the declaration and justification of the course of justice then held, especially seeing we have reus confitentes, the traitors own voluntary confessions at the bar; yet for further satisfaction to so great a presence and audience, and their better memory of the carrying of these treasons, the voluntary and free confessions of all the said several traitors in writing subscribed with their own proper hands, and acknowledged at the bar, by themselves to be true, were openly and distinctly read; By which, amongst other things, it appeared that Bates was absolved for what he undertook concerning the Powder-treason, and being therein warranted by the Jesuits. Also it appeared, that Hammond the Jesuit, after that he knew the Powder-treason was discovered, and that these traitors had been in actual rebellion, confessed them, and gave them absolution: and this was on Thursday the 7th of November.

Here also was mention made by master Attorney of the Confessions of Watson and Clarke, seminary priests, upon their apprehension; who affirmed, that there was some treason intended by the Jesuits, and then in hand; as might appear. 1. By their continual negotiating at that time with Spain, which they assured themselves tending to nothing but a preparation for a foreign commotion. 2. By their collecting and gathering together such great sums of money, as then they had done, therewith to levy an army when time should serve. 3. For that sundry of the Jesuits had been tampering with Catholicicks, as well to dissuade them from acceptance of the king at his first coming, saying, That they ought rather to die than to admit of any heretick (as they continually termed his majesty) to the crown; and that they might not, under pain of excommunication, accept of any but a Catholicick for their sovereigns; as also to dissuade Catholicicks from their loyalty after the state was settled. Lastly. In that they had both bought up store of great horses throughout the country, and conveyed powder and shot, and artillery secretly to their friends; wishing them not to stir, but keep themselves quiet until they heard from them.

After the reading of their several Examinations, Confessions, and voluntary Declarations as well of themselves, as of some of their dead Confederates, they were all by the Verdict of the jury found Guilty of the Treasons contained in their Indictment. And then being severally asked, What they could say, wherefore Judgment of Death should not be pronounced against them? there was not one of these (except Rookwood) who would make any continued speech either in defence or extenuation of the fact.

Thomas Winter only desired, that he might be hanged both for his brother and himself.

Guy Fawkes being asked, Why he pleaded Not Guilty, having nothing to say for his excuse: answered, That he had so done in respect of certain conferences mentioned in the indictment, which he said that he knew not of: which were answered to have been set down according to course of law, as necessarily pre-supposed before the resolution of such a design.

Keys said, That his estate and fortune were desperate, and as good now as at another time, and for this cause rather than for another.

John Grant was a good while mute; yet after, submissively said, he was guilty of a conspiracy intended, but never effected.

But Ambrose Rookwood first excused his denial of the Indictment, for that he had rather lose his life than give it. Then did he acknowledge his offence to be so heinous, that he justly deserved the indignation of the king, and of the lords, and the hatred of the whole commonwealth; yet could he not despair of mercy at the hands of a prince, so abounding in grace and mercy: and the rather, because his offence, though it were incapable of any excuse, yet not altogether incapable of some extenuation, in that he had been neither author nor actor, but only persuaded and drawn in by Catesby, whom he loved above any worldly man: and that he had concealed it not for any malice to the person of the king, or to the state, or for any ambitious respect of his own, but only drawn with the tender respect, and the faithful and dear affection he bare to Mr. Catesby his friend, whom he esteemed dearer than any thing else in the world. And this mercy he desired not for any fear of the image of death, but for grief that so shameful a death should leave so perpetual a blemish and blot unto all ages, upon his name and blood. But howsoever that this was his first offence, yet he humbly submitted himself to the mercy of the king; and prayed that the king would herein imitate God, who sometimes doth punish corporaliter, non mortaliter, corporally, yet not mortally.

Then was related how that on Friday immediately before this Arraignment, Robert Winter having found opportunity to have conference with Fawkes in the Tower, in regard of the nearness of their lodgings, should say to Fawkes, as Robert Winter and Fawkes confessed, that he and Catesby had sons, and that boys would be men, and that he hoped they would revenge the cause; nay, that God would raise up children to Abraham out of stones: also that they were sorry, that nobody did set forth a defence or apology of their action, but yet they would maintain the cause at their deaths.

Here also was reported Robert Winter's dream, which he had before the blasting with powder in Littleton's house, and which he himself confessed and first notified, viz. That he thought he saw steeples stand awry, and within those churches strange and unknown faces.

And after, when the foresaid blast had the day following scorched divers of the confederates, and much disfigured the faces and countenances of Grant, Rookwood, and others; then did Winter call to mind his dream, and to his remembrance thought, that the faces of his associates so scorched, resembled those which he had seen in his dream.

Then was Sir Everard Digby arraigned, and after his Indictment was read; wherein he was charged, not only to have been acquainted with the Powder-treason, and concealed it, and taken the double oath of secrecy and constancy therein, but likewise to have been an actor in this conspiracy; and lastly to have exposed, and openly showed himself in the rebellion in the country amongst the rest of the traitors. All which after he had attentively heard and marked, knowing that he had confessed it, and the strength and evidence of the proofs against him, and convicted with the testimony of his own conscience, shewed his disposition to confess the principal part of the said Indictment, and so began to enter into a discourse. But being advertised that he must first plead to the Indictment directly, either Guilty, or not Guilty; and that afterwards he should be licensed to speak his pleasure; he forthwith confessed the treason contained in the Indictment, and so fell into a speech, whereof there were two parts, viz. Motives, and Petitions. The first motive which drew him into this action, was not ambition or discontentment of his estate, neither malice to any in parliament, but the friendship and love he bare to Catesby, which prevailed so much, and was so powerful with him, as that for his sake he was ever contented and ready to hazard himself and his estate. The next motive, was the cause of religion, which alone, seeing (as he said) it lay at the stake, he entered into resolution to neglect in that behalf, his estate, his life, his name, his memory, his posterity, and all worldly and earthly felicity whatsoever; though he did utterly extirpate, and extinguish all other hopes for the restoring of the Catholick Religion in England. His third motive was, that promises were broken with the Catholicks. And lastly, that they generally feared harder laws from this parliament against recusants, as that recusants wives, and women should be liable to the mulet as well as their husbands and men. And further, that it was supposed, that it should be made a premunire, only to be a Catholick.

His Petitions were. That sithence his offence was confined and contained within himself, that the punishment also of the same might extend only to himself and not to be transferred either to his wife, children, sisters, or other: and therefore for his wife he humbly craved, that she might enjoy her jointure; his son the benefit of an entail made long before any thought of this action; his sisters, their just and due portions, which were in his hands; his creditors their rightful debts, which that he might more justly set down under his hand, he requested that before his death, his man (who was better acquainted both with the men, and the particulars than himself) might be licensed to come unto him. Then prayed he pardon of the king and lords for his guilt. And lastly he entreated to be beheaded; desiring all men to forgive him, and that his death might satisfy them for his trespass.

To this speech forthwith answered sir Everard Coke, Attorney-General, but in respect of the time (for it grew now dark) very briefly:

1. For his Friendship with Catesby, that it was mere folly and wicked conspiracy. 2. His Religion, error, and heresy. 3. His Promises, idle and vain presumptions, as also his Fears, false alarms, concerning wives that were recusants, if they were known so to be before their husbands (though they were good Protestants) took them, and yet for outward and worldly respects whatsoever, any would match with such; great reason there is, that he or they should pay for it, as knowing the penalty and burden before: for 'volenti et scienti non sit injuria'; no man receives injury in that, to which he willingly and knowingly agreeth and consenteth. But if she were no recusant at the time of marriage, and yet afterwards he suffer her to be corrupted and seduced, by admitting priests and romanists into his house; good reason likewise that he, be he papist or protestant, should pay for his negligence and misgovernment.—4. Concerning the Petitions for wife, for children, for sisters, &c. O how he doth now put on the bowels of nature and compassion, in the peril of his private and domestical estate! But before, when the publick state of his country, when the king, the queen, the tender princes, the nobles, the whole kingdom were designed to a perpetual destruction; where was then this piety, this religious affection, this care? All nature, all humanity, all respect of laws both divine and human, were quite abandoned; then was there no conscience made to extirpate the whole nation, and all for a pretended zeal to the Catholick Religion, and the justification of so detestable and damnable a fact.

Here did Sir Everard Digby interrupt Mr. Attorney, and said, that he did not justify the fact, but confessed that he deserved the vilest death, and most severe punishment that might be: but he was an humble petitioner for mercy, and some moderation of justice.—Whereupon Mr. Attorney replied, that he should not look by the king to be honoured in the manner of his death, having so far abandoned all religion and humanity in his action: but that he was rather to admire the great moderation and mercy of the king, in that for so exorbitant a crime, no new torture answerable thereunto was devised to be inflicted upon him. And for his wife and children, whereas he said that for the Catholick cause he was content to neglect the ruin of himself, his wife, his estate, and all; he should have his desire as it is in the Psalm, 'Let his wife be a widow, and his children vagabonds, let his posterity be destroyed, and ‘in the next generation let his name be quite ‘put out.’ For the paying of your creditors, it is equal and just; but yet fit the king be first satisfied and paid, to whom you owe so much, as that all you have is too little: yet these things must be left to the pleasure of his majesty, and the course of justice and law.

Earl of Northampton. You must not hold it strange, sir Everard Digby, though at this time being pressed in duty, conscience and truth, I do not suffer you to wander in the labyrinth of your own idle conceits, without opposition, to seduce others, as yourself have been seduced, by false principles, or to convey yourself by charms of imputation, by clouds of error, and by shifts of lately devised equivocation, out of that straight wherein your late secure and happy fortune hath been unluckily entangled, but yet justly surprized by the rage and revenge of your own rash humours. If in this crime (more horrible than any man is able to express) I could lament the estate of any person upon earth, I could pity you; but thank yourself and your bad counsellors for leading you into a crime of such a kind, as no less benumbeth in all faithful, true and honest men, the tenderness of affection, than did in you the sense of all humanity.—That you were once well thought of and esteemed by the late queen, I can witness, having heard her speak of you with that grace, which might have encouraged a true gentleman to have run a better course. Nay, I will add further, that there was a time wherein you were as well affected to the king our master’s expectation, though perhaps upon false rumours and reports, that he would have yielded satisfaction to your unprobable and vast desires; but the seed that wanted moisture (as our Saviour, himself reporteth) took no deep root: that zeal which hath no other end or object than the pleasing of itself, is quickly spent; and Trajan, that worthy and wise emperor, had reason to hold himself discharged of all debts to those that had offended more by prevarication, than they could ever deserve by industry.—The grace and goodness of his majesty in giving honour at his first coming unto many men of your own affection, and (as I think) unto yourself; his facility in admitting all without distinction of Trojan or of Tyrian, to his royal presence, upon just occasions of access; his integrity in setting open the gate of civil justice unto all his subjects equally and indifferently, with many other favours that succeeded by the progression of peace; are so palpable and evident to all men, that have either eyes of understanding, or understanding of capacity, as yourself and many others have been driven of late to excuse and countenance your execrable ingratitude with a false and scandalous report of some further hope and comfort yielded to the Catholics for toleration or connivance, before his coming to the crown, than since hath been performed, made good or satisfied.—I am not ignorant, that this seditious and false alarm hath awaked and incited many working spirits to the prejudice of the present state, that might otherwise have slept as before with silence and sufferance; it hath served for a shield of wax against a sword of power: it hath been used as an instrument of art to shadow false approaches, till the Trojan horse might be brought within the walls of the parliament, with a belly stuffed, not as in old time with armed Greeks, but with hellish gunpowder. But howsoever God had blinded you and others in this action, as he did the king of Egypt and his instruments, for the brighter evidence of his own powerful glory; yet every man of understanding could discern, that a prince whose judgment had been fixed by experience of so many years upon the poles of the North and the South, could not shrink upon the sudden: no nor since with fear of that combustion which Catesby that arch-traitor, like a second Phaeton, would have caused in an instant in all the elements. His majesty did never value fortunes of the world, in lesser matter than religion, with the freedom of his thoughts: he thought it no safe policy (professing as he did, and ever will) to call up more spirits into the circle than he could put down again; he knew, that omne regnum in se divisum desolabitur, philosophy doth teach, that whatsoever any man may think in secret thought, that where one doth hold of Cephas, another of Apollo, openly dissension ensues, quod insitum alieno solo est, in id quo alitur natura vertente degenerat; and the world will ever apprehend, that Quorum est commune symbolum, facillimus est transitus.—Touching the point itself of promising a kind of toleration to Catholics, as it was divulged by these two limbs of Lucifer, Watson and Percy, to raise a ground of practice and conspiracy against the state and person of our dear sovereign, let the kingdom of Scotland witness for the space of so many years before his coming hither, whether either flattery or fear, no, not upon that enterprize of the 17th of Nov. which would have put the patience of any prince in Europe to his proof, could draw from the king the least inclination to this dispensative indifference, that was only believed, because it was eagerly desired.—Every man doth know how great art was used, what strong wits sublimed, how many ministers suborned and corrupted many years both in Scotland and in foreign parts, to set the king’s teeth an edge with fair promises of future helps and supplies, to that happy end of attaining his due right in England, when the sun should set, to rise more gloriously in the same hemisphere, to the wonder both of this island and of the world. But all in vain; for jacta erat alea, the king’s compass had been set before, and by a more certain rule, and they were commonly cast off as forlorn hopes in the king’s favour, that ran a course of ranking themselves in the foremost front of foreign correspondency.—Upon notice given to his majesty from hence some years before the death of the late queen, that many men were grown suspicious of his religion, by rumours spread abroad, that some of those in fereign parts, that seemed to be well affected to his future expectation, had used his name more audaciously, and spoken of his favour to the Catholics more forwardly than the king's own conscience and unchangeable decree could acknowledge or admit (either with a purpose to prepare the minds of foreign princes, or for a practice to estrange and alienate affections at home) not only utterly renounced and condemned these encroachments of blind zeal, and rash proceedings, by the voices of his own ministers, but was careful also for a caution to succeeding hopes, so far as lay in him, that by the disgrace of the delinquents in this kind, the minds of all English subjects chiefly might be secured, and the world satisfied.—No man can speak in this case more confidently than myself, that received in the queen's time, for the space of many years, directions and warnings to take heed, that neither any further comfort might be given to Catholics, concerning future favours, than he did intend, which was to bind all subjects in one kingdom to one law, concerning the religion established, howsoever in civil matters he might extend his favour as he found just cause: nor any seeds of jealousy and diffidence sown in the minds of Protestants by Semeis and Achitophels, to make them doubtful of his constancy, to whom he would confirm with his dearest blood, that faith which he had sucked from the breast of his nurse, apprehended from the cradle of his infancy, and maintained with his uttermost endeavour, affection and strength: since he was more able out of reading and disputing, to give a reason of those principles which he had now digested and turned to nutriment.—He that wrote the Book of Titles before the late queen's death, declares abundantly by seeking to possess some foreign prince of the king's hereditary crowns, when the cause should come to the proof, and may witness instead of many; what hope there was of the king's favour or affection to Catholics in the case of toleration or dispensation, with exercise of conscience. For every man may guess that it was no slight or ordinary degree of despair, that made him and other of his suit renounce their portion in the son and heir of that renowned and rare lady Mary queen of Scotland, a member of the Roman church; as some did in David, Nulla nobis pars in David, nec hereditas in filio Isai: For hereof by letters intercepted in their passage into Scotland, the records and proofs are evident. His majesty, so long as he was in expectation of that which by the work and grace of God he doth now possess, did ever seek to settle his establishment upon the faith of Protestants in generality, as the most assured sheet anchor. For though he found a number on the other side, as faithful and as well-affected to his person, claim and interest, as any men alive, as well in respect of their dependency upon the queen his mother, as for the taste which they had of the sweetness of himself; yet finding with what strength of blood many have been over-carried out of a fervency in zeal in former times, observing to what censures they were subject, both in points of faith, and limitation of loyalty: And last of all, forecasting to what end their former protestation would come, when present satisfaction should shrink; he was ever fearful to embark himself for any further voyage and adventure in this strait, than his own compass might steer him, and his judgment level him.—If any one green leaf for Catholics could have been visibly discerned by the eye of Catesby, Winter, Garnet, Fawkes, &c. they would neither have entered into practice with foreign princes during the queen's time for prevention of the king's lawful and hereditary right, nor have renewed the same both abroad and at home by missions and combinations, after his majesty was both applauded and entered.—It is true, that by Confessions we find, that false priest Watson, and arch traitor Percy, to have been the first devisers and divulgers of this scandalous report, as an accursed ground, whereon they might with some advantage, as it was conceived, build the castles of their conspiracy.—Touching the first, no man can speak more soundly to the point than myself; for being sent into the prison by the king to charge him with this false alarm, only two days before his death, and upon his soul to press him in the presence of God, and as he would answer it at another bar, to confess directly whether at either of both these times he had access unto his majesty at Edinborough, his majesty did give him any promise, hope or comfort of encouragement to Catholics concerning toleration; he did there protest upon his soul that he could never win one inch of ground, or draw the smallest comfort from the king in those degrees, nor further than that he would have them apprehend, that as he was a stranger to this state, so till he understood in all points how those matters stood, he would not promise favour any way; but did protest that all the crowns and kingdoms in this world, should not induce him to change any jot of his profession, which was the pasture of his soul, and earnest of his eternal inheritance. He did confess that in very deed, to keep up the hearts of Catholics in love and duty to the king, he had imparted the king's words to many, in a better tune, and a higher kind of descant, than his book of plain song did direct; because he knew that others like sly bargemen looked that way, when their stroke was bent another way. For this he craved pardon of the king in humble manner, and for his main treasons of a higher nature than these figures of hypocrisy; and seemed penitent, as well for the horror of his crime, as for the falsehood of his whisperings.—It hindered not the satisfaction which may be given to Percy's shadow (the most desperate Bouteseu in the pack), that as he died impenitent, for any thing we know: so likewise he died silent in the particulars. For first, it is not strange that such a traitor should devise so scandalous a slander out of the malice of his heart, intending to destroy the king by any means, and to advance all means that might remove obstructions and impediments to the plot of gunpowder. The more odious that he could make him to the party malecontent, and the more sharply that he could set the party malecontent upon the point and humour of revenge: the stronger was his hope at the giving of the last blow, to be glorified and justified. But touching the truth of the matters, it will be witnessed by many, that this traitor Percy after both the first and second return from the king, brought to the Catholicks no spark of comfort, of encouragement, of hope; whereof no stronger proof of argument doth need, than that Fawkes and others were employed both into Spain and other parts, for the reviving of a practice suspended and covered, after Percy's coming back; as in likelihood they should not have been, in case he had returned with a branch of olive in his mouth, or yielded any ground of comfort to resolve upon.—Therefore I thought it thus far needful to proceed, for the clearing of those scandals that were cast abroad, by these forlorn hopes and graceless instruments. It only remains that I pray for your repentance in this world for the satisfaction of many, and forgiveness in the next world, for the saving of yourself; having had by the king's favour so long a time to cast up your account, before your appearance at the seat of the great auditor:

Then spake the Earl of Salisbury, especially to that point, of his majesty's breaking of promise with Recusants, which was used and urged by sir Everard Digby, as a motive to draw him to participate in this so hideous a treason. Wherein his lordship, after acknowledgment that sir Everard Digby was his ally, and having made a zealous and religious protestation concerning the sincerity and truth of that which he would deliver: shortly and clearly defended the honour of the king herein, and freed his majesty from all imputation and scandal of irresolution in religion, and in the constant and perpetual maintaining thereof; as also from having at any time given the least hope, much less promise of toleration. To which purpose he declared how his majesty, as well before his coming to this crown, as at that very time, and always since, was so far from making of promise, or giving hope of Toleration, that he ever professed he should not endure the very motion thereof from any.—And here his lordship shewed what was done at Hampton-Court at the time of Watson's treason, where some of the greater recusants were convented: And being found then not to have their fingers in treason, were sent away again with encouragement to persist in their dutiful carriage, and with promise only of thus much favour. That those mean profits which had accrued since the king's time to his majesty for their recusancy, should be forgiven to the principal gentlemen, who had both at his entry shewed so much loyalty, and had kept themselves so free since from all conspiracies.—Then did his lordship also (the rather to shew how little truth sir Everard Digby's words did carry in any thing which he had spoken) plainly prove, that all his protestations wherein he denied so constantly to be privy to the Plot of Powder, were utterly false, by the testimony of Fawkes (there present at the bar) who had confessed, that certain months before that session, the said Fawkes being with Digby at his house in the country, about what time there had fallen much wet: Digby taking Fawkes aside after supper, told him that he was much afraid that the powder in the cellar was grown dank, and that some new must be provided, lest that should not take fire.—Next, the said earl did justly and greatly commend the lord Mounteagle for his loyal and honourable care of his prince and country, in the speedy bringing forth of the letter sent unto him; wherein he said, that he had shewed both his discretion and fidelity. Which speech being ended, Digby then acknowledged, that he spake not that of the breach of promise out of his own knowledge, but from their relation whom he trusted; and namely from sir Tho. Tresham.

Now were the Jury returned, who having delivered their Verdict, whereby they jointly found those seven prisoners, arraigned upon the former Indictment, Guilty; Serjeant Philips craved Judgment against those seven upon their conviction and against sir Everard Digby upon his own Confession.

Then the Lord Chief Justice of England, after a grave and prudent relation and defence of the laws made by queen Elizabeth against recusants, priests, and receivers of priests, together with the several occasions, progresses and reasons of the same; and having plainly demonstrated and proved that they were all necessary, mild, equal, moderate, and to be justified to all the world: pronounced Judgment.

Upon the rising of the court, sir Everard Digby bowing himself towards the lords, said, If I may but hear any of your lordships say, you forgive me, I shall go more chearfully to the gallows.—Whereunto the lords said, God forgive you, and we do.

And so according to the Sentence, on Thursday following being the 30th of January, execution was done upon sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, at the West end of Paul's church; and on Friday following, upon Thomas Winter, Ambrose Rookwood, Robert Keyes, and Guy Fawkes, within the old Palace-Yard, at Westminster, not far from the Parliament-House.

The following History of the GUNPOWDER-PLOT, written by King James himself, is extracted from the first Collection of his Works published during his life-time by Mountague, Bishop of Winchester.

WHILE this land and whole monarchy flourished in a most happy and plentiful peace, as well at home, as abroad, sustained and conducted by these two main good pillars of all good government, piety and justice, no foreign grudge, nor inward whispering of discontentment any way appearing: the king being upon his return from his hunting exercise at Royston, upon occasion of the drawing near of the parliament-time, which had been twice prorogued already, partly in regard of the season of the year, and partly of the term: as the winds are ever stillest immediately before a storm; and, as the sun bleaks often hottest to foretel a following shower; so, at that time of greatest calm, did this secretly hatched thunder begin to cast forth the first flashes, and flaming lightnings of the approaching tempest. For, the Saturday of the week immediately preceding the king's return, which was upon a Thursday, being but ten days before the parliament, the lord Monteagle, son and heir to the lord Morley, being in his own lodgings ready to go to supper, at seven of the clock at night, one of his footmen, whom he had sent of an errand over the street, was met by a man of a reasonable tall personage, who delivered him a Letter, charging him to put it in my lord his master's hands; which my lord no sooner received, but that, having broken it up, and perceiving the same to be of an unknown, and somewhat unlegible hand, and without either date or superscription, did call one of his men unto him, for helping him to read it. But no sooner did he conceive the strange contents thereof, although he was somewhat perplexed what construction to make of it, as whether of a matter of consequence, as indeed it was, or whether some foolish devised pasquil by some of his enemies to scare him from his attendance at the parliament, yet did he, as a most dutiful and loyal subject, conclude not to conceal it, whatever might come of it. Whereupon, notwithstanding the lateness and darkness of the night in that season of the year, he presently repaired to his majesty's palace at Whitehall, and there delivered the same to the earl of Salisbury, his majesty's principal secretary. Whereupon, the said earl of Salisbury having read the Letter and heard the manner of the coming of it to his hands, did greatly encourage and commend my lord for his discretion, telling him plainly, that, whatsoever the purport of the Letter might prove hereafter, yet did this accident put him in mind of divers advertisements he had received from beyond the seas, wherewith he had acquainted, as well the king himself, as divers of his privy-counsellors, concerning some business the Papists were in, both at home and abroad, making preparations for some combination amongst them against this parliament-time, for enabling them to deliver at that time to the king some petition for toleration of religion, which should be delivered in some such order, and so well backed, as the king should be loth to refuse their requests; like the sturdy beggars, craving alms with one open hand, but carrying a stone in the other, in case of refusal. And therefore did the earl of Salisbury conclude with the lord Monteagle, that he would, in regard of the king's absence, impart the same Letter to some more of his majesty's council, whereof my lord Monteagle liked well, only adding this request, by way of protestation, That whatsoever the event hereof might prove, it should not be imputed to him, as proceeding from too light and too sudden an apprehension, that he delivered this Letter; being only moved thereunto for demonstration of his ready devotion, and care for preservation of his majesty and the state. And thus did the earl of Salisbury presently acquaint the lord chamberlain with the said Letter. Whereupon they two, in presence of the lord Monteagle, calling to mind the former intelligence already mentioned, which seemed to have some relation with this letter; the tender care which they ever carried to the preservation of his majesty's person, made them apprehended, that some perilous attempt did thereby appear to be intended against the same, which did the more nearly concern the said lord chamberlain to have a care of, in regard that it doth belong to the charge of his office to oversee, as well all places of assembly where his majesty is to repair, as his highness's own private houses. And therefore did the said two counsellors conclude, that they should join unto themselves three more of the council, to wit, the lord admiral, the earls of Worcester and Northampton, to be also particularly acquainted with this accident, who having all of them concurred together to the re-examination of the contents of the said letter, they did conclude, That, how slight a matter it might at the first appear to be, yet was it not absolutely to be contemned, in respect of the care which it behoved them to have of the preservation of his majesty's person: but, yet resolved for two reasons, first, to acquaint the king himself with the same, before they proceeded to any further inquisition in the matter, as well for the expectation and experience they had of his majesty's fortunate judgment, in clearing and solving obscure riddles and doubtful mysteries; as also, because the more time would, in the mean time, be given for the practice to ripen, if any was, whereby the discovery might be more clear and evident, and the ground of proceeding thereupon more safe, just, and easy. And so according to their determination did the said earl of Salisbury repair to the king in his gallery upon Friday, being Allallow's-day, in the afternoon, which was the day after his majesty's arrival, and none but himself being present with his highness at that time, where, without any other speech, or judgment given of the Letter, but only relating simply the form of the delivery thereof, he presented it to his majesty. The contents whereof follow :

My Lord ; Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation : therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse, to shift off your attendance at this parliament. For God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advertisement, but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety. For, though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be condemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is past so soon as you have burnt the Letter ; and I hope God will give you grace to make good use of it ; to whose holy protection I commend you.*

The king no sooner read the letter, but after a little pause, and then reading it once again, he delivered his judgment of it in such sort, as

* " Who it was " observes Kennett, " that wrote this Letter to the Lord Montegle was never known, or how it came that king James suspected its meaning to be what it really was, is in a great part a mystery to this day. Yet I cannot give myself leave to doubt, but king James had some light given him from Henry 4th of the designs of the Papists against him ; for in the duke of Sully's Memoirs, there is more than once mention made of some ' sudden Blow ' they intended in England about that time : and in one Letter, king James is desired to take warning from the fate of Henry 3. I am the more confirmed in this opinion, that in the Harangue pronounced at Rome in praise of Ravillac the Assassin of Henry 4, which has since been so often quoted by several authors, both Papist and Protestant, as an argument that the Jesuits approved the murder : it is there said, ' That Henry 4, was not only an inveterate enemy to the Catholick religion in his heart, but had obstructed the glorious enterprizes of those that would have restored it in England, and occasioned them to be crown'd with Martyrdom.' Now it's well known, Garnet and the rest that were executed for the Gun-Powder-Plot, were reputed Martyrs for the Catholick cause by the college of Jesuits at Rome, where that Harangue was pronounced." See also Welwood.—It is now a common opinion that the above Letter to lord Mountegle was sent by his sister Mary the wife of Thomas Habington or Abingdon. Some particulars of this family and of their concern with the treasonable transactions in the reigns of Elizabeth and James 1st. are to be found in Nash's History of Worcestershire.

he thought it was not to be contemned, for that the stile of it seemed to be more quick and pithy, than is usual to be in any pasquil or libel, the superfluities of idle brains. But the earl of Salisbury, perceiving the king to apprehend it deeper than he looked for, knowing his nature, told him, that he thought, by one sentence in it, that it was like to be written by some fool, or madman, reading to him this sentence in it : ' For the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt the letter ; ' which, he said, was likely to be the saying of a fool ; for, if the danger was past, so soon as the letter was burnt, then the warning behoved to be of little avail, when the burning of the letter might make the danger to be eschewed. But the king, on the contrary, considering the former sentence in the letter, ' That they should receive a terrible blow at this parliament, ' and yet should not see who hurt them, joining it to the sentence immediately following, already alledged, did thereupon conjecture, that the danger mentioned should be some sudden danger by blowing up of powder ; for no other insurrection, rebellion, or whatsoever other private and desperate attempt could be committed, or attempted, in time of parliament, and the authors thereof unseen, except only if it were by a blowing up of powder, which might be performed by one base knave in a dark corner : Whereupon he was moved to interpret and construe the latter sentence in the letter, alledged by the earl of Salisbury, against all ordinary sense and construction in grammar, as if by these words, ' For the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt the letter ; ' should be closely understood the suddenness and quickness of the danger, which should be as quickly performed and at an end, as that paper should be a blazing up in the fire ; turning that word of ' as soon ' to the sense of ' as quickly ; ' and therefore wished, that, before his going to the parliament, the under-rooms of the parliament-house might be well and narrowly searched. But, the earl of Salisbury wondering at this his majesty's commentary, which he knew to be so far contrary to his ordinary and natural disposition, who did rather ever sin upon the other side, in not apprehending, nor trusting due advertisements of practices and perils, when he was truly informed of them, whereby he had many times drawn himself into many desperate dangers ; and interpreting rightly this extraordinary caution at this time to proceed from the vigilant care he had of the whole state, more than of his own person, which could not but have all perished together, if this designment had succeeded, he thought good to dissemble still unto the king, that there had been any just cause of such apprehension ; and, ending the purpose with some merry jest upon this subject, as his custom is, took his leave for that time. But, though he seemed so to neglect it to his majesty, yet, his customable and watchful care of the king and the state still boiling within him, and having, with the blessed virgin Mary, laid up in his heart the king's so strange judgment and construction of it, he could not be at rest, till he acquainted the foresaid lords what had passed between the king and him in private. Whereupon they were all so earnest to renew again the memory of the same purpose to his majesty, that it was agreed, that he should the next day, being Saturday, repair to his highness; which he did in the same privy gallery, and renewed the memory thereof, the lord chamberlain then being present with the king. At which time it was determined, That the said lord chamberlain should, according to his custom and office, view all the parliament-houses, both above and below, and consider what likelihood or appearance of any such danger might possibly be gathered by the sight of them: But yet, as well for staying of idle rumours, as for being the more able to discern any mystery, the nearer that things were in readiness, his journey thither was ordained to be deferred till the afternoon before the sitting down of the parliament, which was upon the Monday following. At which time he (according to this conclusion) went to the parliament-house, accompanied with my lord Montecagle, being, in zeal to the king's service, earnest and curious to see the event of that accident, whereof he had the fortune to be the first discoverer; where, having viewed all the lower rooms, he found, in the vault, under the upper house, great store and provision of billets, faggots, and coals; and, inquiring of Whyneard, keeper of the wardrobe, To what use he had put those lower rooms and cellars? He told him, That Thomas Percy had hired both the house, and part of the cellar, or vault, under the same; and that the wood and coal therein were the said gentleman's own provision. Whereupon, the lord chamberlain, casting his eye aside, perceived a fellow standing in a corner there, calling himself the said Percy's man, and keeper of that house for him, but indeed was Guido Fawkes, the owner of that hand, which should have acted that monstrous tragedy.

The lord chamberlain, looking upon all things with a heedful indeed, yet, in outward appearance, with but a careless and rackless eye, as became so wise and diligent a minister, he presently addressed himself to the king in the said privy gallery; where, in the presence of the lord treasurer, the lord admiral, the earls of Worcester, Northampton, and Salisbury, he made his report what he had seen and observed there; noting, that Montecagle had told him, That he no sooner heard Thomas Percy named to be the possessor of that house, but, considering both his backwardness in religion, and the old dearness in friendship between himself and the said Percy, he did greatly suspect the matter, and that the letter should come from him. The said lord chamberlain also told, That he did not wonder a little at the extraordinary great provision of wood and coal in that house, where Thomas Percy had so seldom occasion to remain; as likewise it gave him in his mind, that his man looked like a very tall and desperate fellow.

This could not but increase the king's former apprehension and jealousy; whereupon, he insisted, as before, That the house was narrowly to be searched, and that those billets and coals should be searched to the bottom, it being most suspicious, that they were laid there only for covering of the powder. Of this same mind also were all the counsellors then present; but upon the fashion of making of the search was it long debated: For, upon the one side, they were all so jealous of the king's safety, that they all agreed, That there could not be too much caution used for preventing his danger; and yet, upon the other part, they were all extreme loth and dainty, that, in case this letter should prove to be nothing but the evaporation of an idle brain, then a curious search being made, and nothing found, should not only turn to the general scandal of the king and the state, as being so suspicious of every light and frivolous toy, but likewise lay an ill-favoured imputation upon the earl of Northumberland, one of his majesty's greatest subjects and counsellors, this Thomas Percy being his kinsman and most confident familiar. And the rather were they curious upon this point, knowing how far the king detested to be thought suspicious or jealous of any of his good subjects, though of the meanest degree; and therefore, though they all agreed upon the main ground, which was to provide for the security of the king's person, yet did they much differ in the circumstances, by which this action might be best carried with least din and occasion of slander. But, the king himself still persisting, that there were divers shrewd appearances, and that a narrow search of those places could pre-judge no man that was innocent, he at last plainly resolved them, That either must all the parts of those rooms be narrowly searched, and no possibility of danger left unexamined, or else he and they all must resolve not to meddle in it at all, but plainly to go the next day to the parliament, and leave the success to fortune; which, he believed, they would be loth to take upon their conscience; for, in such a case as this, an half-doing was worse than no doing at all. Whereupon it was at last concluded, That nothing should be left unsearched in those houses; and yet, for the better colour and stay of rumour, in case nothing were found, it was thought meet, that, upon a pretence of Whyneard's missing some of the king's stuff, or hangings, which he had in keeping, all those rooms should be narrowly ripped for them. And, to this purpose, was sir Thomas Knevet, (a gentleman of his majesty's privy-chamber) employed, being a justice of peace in Westminster, and one, of whose ancient fidelity both the late queen and our now sovereign have had large proof; who, according to the trust committed unto him, went, about the midnight next after, to the parliament house, accompanied with such a small number as was fit for that errand: but, before his entry in the house finding Thomas Percy's alledged man standing without the doors, his clothes and boots on, at so dead a time of the night, he resolved to apprehend him; as he did, and thereafter went forward to the searching of the house, where, after he had caused to be overturned some of the billets and coals, he first found one of the small barrels of powder, and afterwards all the rest, to the number of 36 barrels, great and small; and thereafter, searching the fellow, whom he had taken, found three matches, and all other instruments fit for blowing up the powder, ready upon him; which made him instantly confess his own guiltiness; declaring also unto him, That, if he had happened to be within the house, when he took him, as he was immediately before (at the ending of his work) he would not have failed to have blown him up, house and all.

Thus, after sir Thomas had caused the wretch to be surely bound, and well guarded by the company he had brought with him, he himself returned back to the king's palace, and gave warning of his success to the lord Chamberlain, and earl of Salisbury, who immediately warning the rest of the council, that lay in the house; as soon as they could get themselves ready, came, with their fellow counsellors, to the king's bed-chamber, being, at that time, near four of the clock in the morning. And at the first entry of the king's chamber-door, the lord chamberlain, being not any longer able to conceal his joy for the preventing of so great a danger, told the king, in a confused haste, that all was found and discovered, and the traitor in hands and fast bound.

Then, order being first taken for sending for the rest of the council that lay in the town, the prisoner himself was brought into the house, where, in respect of the strangeness of the accident, no man was stayed from the sight, or speaking with him. And, within a while after, the council did examine him; who, seeming to put on a Roman resolution, did, both to the council, and to every other person that spoke with him that day, appear so constant and settled upon his grounds, as we all thought we had found some new Mutius Scævola born in England. For, notwithstanding the horror of the fact, the guilt of his conscience, his sudden surprizing, the terror which should have been struck in him, by coming into the presence of so grave a council, and the restless and confused questions, that every man, all that day, did vex him with; yet was his countenance so far from being dejected, as he often smiled in scornful manner, not only avowing the fact, but repenting only, with the said Scævola, his failing in the execution thereof, whereof, he said, the devil, and not God, was the discoverer; answering quickly to every man's objection, scoffing at any idle questions which were propounded unto him, and jesting with such as he thought had no authority to examine him. All that day could the council get nothing out of him, touching his accomplices, refusing to answer to any such questions, which he thought might discover the plot, and laying all the blame upon himself; whereunto, he said, he was moved, only for religion and conscience sake, denying the king to be his lawful sovereign, or the Anointed of God, in respect he was an heretick, and giving himself no other name, than John Johnson, servant to Thomas Percy. But, the next morning, being carried to the Tower, he did not there remain above two or three days, being twice or thrice, in that space, re-examined, and the rack only offered and shewed unto him, when the mask of his Roman fortitude did visibly begin to wear and slide off his face; and then did he begin to chuse a part of the truth, and, thereafter, to open the whole matter, as doth appear, by his Depositions immediately following.

"I confess, that a practice, in general, was first broken unto me, against his majesty, for relief of the Catholick cause, and not invented or propounded by myself. And this was first propounded unto me about Easter last was twelve-month, beyond the seas, in the Low-Countries, of the archduke's obeisance, by Thomas Winter, who came, thereupon, with me into England, and there we imparted our purpose to three other gentlemen more, namely, Robert Catesby, Thomas Percy, and John Wright, who, all five, consulting together, of the means how to execute the same; and taking a vow, among ourselves, for secrecy, Catesby propounded to have it performed by gunpowder, and by making a mine under the upper house of parliament; which place we made choice of, the rather, because, religion have been unjustly suppressed there, it was fittest that justice and punishment should be executed there.—This being resolved amongst us, Thomas Percy hired an house at Westminster for that purpose, near adjoining to the parliament-house, and there we began to make our mine, about the 11th of December, 1604.—The five, that first entered into the work, were Thomas Percy, Robert Catesby, Thomas Winter, John Wright, and myself, and, soon after, we took another unto us, Christopher Wright, having sworn him also, and taken the Sacrament for secrecy.—When we came to the very foundation of the wall of the house, which was about three yards thick, and found it a matter of great difficulty, we took unto us another gentleman, Robert Winter, in like manner, with the Oath and Sacrament as aforesaid.—It was about Christmas, when we brought our mine unto the wall, and, about Candlemas, we had wrought the wall half through: and, whilst they were in working, I stood as sentinel, to descry any man that came near, whereof I gave them warning, and so they ceased, until I gave notice again to proceed.—All we seven lay in the house, and had shot and powder, being resolved to die in that place, before we should yield or be taken.—As they were working upon the wall, they heard a rushing in a cellar, of removing of coals;

whereupon we feared we had been discovered; and they sent me to go to the cellar, who finding that the coals were a selling, and that the cellar was to be let, viewing the commodity thereof for our purpose, Percy went and hired the same for yearly rent.—We had, before this, provided and brought into the house 20 barrels of powder, which we removed into the cellar, and covered the same with billets and faggots, which were provided for that purpose.—About Easter, the parliament being prorogued till October next, we dispersed ourselves, and I retired into the Low-Countries, by advice and direction of the rest; as well to acquaint Owen with the particulars of the plot, as also, lest, by my longer stay, I might have grown suspicious, and so have come in question.—In the mean time, Percy, having the key of the cellar, laid in more powder and wood into it. I returned, about the beginning of September next, and, then, receiving the key again of Percy, we brought in more powder, and billets to cover the same again, and so I went, for a time, into the country, till the 30th of October.—It was further resolved amongst us, that the same day, that this act should have been performed, some other of our confederates should have surprised the person of the lady Elizabeth, the king's eldest daughter, who was kept in Warwickshire, at the lord Harrington's house, and presently have proclaimed her queen, having a project of a proclamation ready for that purpose; wherein we made no mention of altering religion, nor would have avowed the deed to be ours, until we should have had power enough to make our party good, and then we would have avowed both.—Concerning duke Charles, the king's second son, we had sundry consultations, how to seize on his person: but, because we found no means how to compass it, the duke being kept near London, where we had not force enough, we resolved to serve our turn with the lady Elizabeth."

The Names of other principal persons, that were made privy afterwards to this horrible conspiracy.—Everard Digby, knt. Ambrose Rookwood, Francis Tresham, John Grant, Robert Keyes.

Commissioners; Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, Devonshire, Northampton, Salisbury, Marre, Dunbarr, Popham.—Edward Coke, W. Waad.

And in regard, that, before this discourse could be ready to go to the press, Thomas Winter, being apprehended, and brought to the Tower, made a Confession, in substance agreeing with this former of Fawkes, only larger in some circumstances: I have thought good to insert the same likewise in this place, for the further clearing of the matter, and greater benefit of the reader.

THOMAS WINTER'S CONFESSION, taken the 23rd of November 1605, in the presence of the Counsellors, whose names are under-written.

"My most honourable lords; Not out of hope to obtain pardon; for, speaking of my temporal part, I may say, the fault is greater than can be forgiven; nor affecting hereby the title of a good subject; for I must redeem my country from as great a danger, as I have hazarded the bringing of her into, before I can purchase any such opinion; only at your honours command I will briefly set down my own accusation, and how far I have proceeded in this business: which I shall the faithfuller do, since I see such courses are not pleasing to Almighty God, and that all, or the most material parts, have been already confessed.

I remained with my brother in the country from Alihallow's-tide, until the beginning of Lent, in the year of our Lord 1603, the first year of the king's reign; about which time Mr. Catesby sent thither, intreating me to come to London, where he, and other my friends, would be glad to see me. I desired him to excuse me; for I found myself not very well disposed; and, which had happened never to me before, returned the messenger without my company. Shortly I received another letter, in any wise to come. At the second summons, I presently came up, and found him with Mr. John Wright, at Lambeth, where he broke with me, how necessary it was not to forsake our country, for he knew I had then a resolution to go over, but to deliver her from the servitude in which she remained, or at least to assist her with our uttermost endeavours. I answered, that I had often hazarded my life upon far lighter terms, and now would not refuse any good occasion, wherein I might do service to the Catholic cause; but for myself, I knew no mean probable to succeed. He said that he had thought him of a way at one instant to deliver us from all our bonds, and without any foreign help to replant again the Catholic religion; and withal told me in a word, it was to blow up the Parliament-house with gunpowder; for said he, in that place have they done us all the mischief, and perchance God hath designed that place for their punishment. I wondered at the strangeness of the conceit, and told him that true it was, this struck at the root, and would breed a confusion fit to beget new alterations; but if it should not take effect, as most of this nature miscarried, the scandal would be so great which the Catholic religion might hereby sustain, as not only our enemies, but our friends also would with good reason condemn us. He told me, the nature of the disease required so sharp a remedy, and asked me if I would give my consent. I told him Yes, in this or what else soever, if he resolved upon it, I would venture my life. But I proposed many difficulties, as want of an house, and of one to carry the mine, noise in the working, and such like. His answer was, Let us give an attempt, and where it faileth, pass no further. But first, quoth he, because we will leave no peaceable and quiet way untried, you shall go over and inform the Constable of the state of the Catholics here in England, intreating him to solicit his majesty, at his coming thither, that the penal laws may be recalled, and we admitted into the rank of his other subjects; withal, you may bring over some confident gentleman, such as you shall understand best able for this business, and named unto me Mr. Fawkes. Shortly after, I passed the sea, and found the Constable at Bergen near Dunkirk, where, by help of Mr. Owen, I delivered my message; whose answer was that he had strict command from his master, to do all good offices for the Catholics, and for his own part, he thought himself bound in conscience so to do, and that no good occasion should be omitted, but spoke to him nothing of this matter.

Returning to Dunkirk with Mr. Owen, we had speech, whether he thought the Constable would faithfully help us, or no. He said he believed nothing less, and that they sought only their own ends, holding small account of Catholics. I told him that there were many gentlemen in England, who would not forsake their country, until they had tried the uttermost, and rather venture their lives, than forsake her in this misery. And to add one more to our number, as a fit man both for counsel and execution of whatsoever we should resolve, wished for Mr. Fawkes, whom I had heard good commendations of; he told me the gentleman deserved no less, but was at Brussels, and that, if he came not, as happily he might, before my departure, he would send him shortly after into England. I went soon after to Ostend, where sir William Stanley, as then, was not, but came two days after. I remained with him three or four days, in which time I asked him, if the Catholics in England should do any thing to help themselves, whether he thought the archduke would second them? He answered, No, for all those parts were so desirous of peace with England, as they would endure no speech of other enterprise; neither were it fit, said he, to set any project a-foot, now the peace is upon concluding. I told him there was no such resolution, and so fell to discourse of other matters, until I came to speak of Mr. Fawkes, whose company I wished over into England; I asked of his sufficiency in the wars, and told him we should need such as he, if occasion required; he gave very good commendations of him. And as we were thus discoursing, and ready to depart for Newport, and taking my leave of sir William, Mr. Fawkes came into our company, newly returned, and saluted us. This is the gentleman, said sir William, that you wished for, and so we embraced again. I told him, some good friends of his wished his company in England, and that, if he pleased to come to Dunkirk, we would have further conference, whither I was then going: so taking my leave of them both, I departed. About two days after came Mr. Fawkes to Dunkirk, where I told him that we were upon a resolution to do somewhat in England, if the peace with Spain helped us not, but as yet resolved upon nothing; such or the like talk we passed at Graveling, where I lay for a wind, and when it served came both in one passage to Greenwich, near which place we took a pair of oars, and so came up to London, and came to Mr. Catesby, whom we found in his lodging; he welcomed us into England, and asked me what news from the Constable. I told him, Good words, but I feared the deeds would not answer. This was the beginning of Easter term; and about the midst of the same term, whether sent for by Mr. Catesby, or upon some business of his own, up came Mr. Thomas Percy. The first word he spoke, after he came into our company, was, Shall we always, gentlemen, talk, and never do any thing? Mr. Catesby took him aside, and had speech about somewhat to be done, so as first we might all take an oath of secrecy, which we resolved within two or three days to do; so as there we met behind St. Clement's, Mr. Catesby, Mr. Percy, Mr. Wright, Mr. Guy Fawkes, and myself; and having upon a Primer given each other the oath of secrecy, in a chamber where no other body was, we went after into the next room and heard mass, and received the blessed sacrament upon the same. Then did Mr. Catesby disclose to Mr. Percy, and I, together with Jack Wright, tell to Mr. Fawkes, the business for which we took this oath, which they both approved. And then was Mr. Percy sent to take the house which Mr. Catesby in my absence had learned did belong to one Ferris, which with some difficulty, in the end, he obtained, and became, as Ferris before was, tenant to Whinniard. Mr. Fawkes underwent the name of Mr. Percy's man, calling himself Johnson, because his face was the most unknown, and received the keys of the house, until we heard the parliament was adjourned to the 7th of February. At which time, we all departed several ways into the country to meet again at the beginning of Michaelmas term. Before this time also, it was thought convenient to have a house that might answer to Mr. Percy's, where we might make provision of powder and wood for the mine, which being there made ready, should in a night be conveyed by boat to the house by the parliament, because we were loth to foil that with often going in and out. There was none that we could devise so fit as Lambeth, where Mr. Catesby often lay; and, to be keeper thereof, by Mr. Catesby's choice, we received into the number Keys, as a trusty honest man; this was about a month before Michaelmas.

Some fortnight after towards the beginning of the term, Mr. Fawkes and I came to Mr. Catesby at Morcrofts, where we agreed that now was time to begin and set things in order for the mine. So as Mr. Fawkes went to London, and the next day sent for me to come over to him; when I came, the cause was, for that the Scottish lords were appointed to sit in conference of the union in Mr. Percy's house. This hindered our beginning until a fortnight before Christmas, by which time both Mr. Percy and Mr. Wright were come to London, and we, against their coming, had provided a good part of the powder; so as we all five entered with tools fit to begin our work, having provided ourselves of baked-meats, the leap to need sending abroad. We entered late in the night, and we never saw, save only Mr. Percy's man, until Christmas-Eve. In which time we wrought under a little entry to the wall of the parliament-house, and underpropped it, as we went, with wood.

Whilst we were together we began to fashion our business, and discoursed what we should do after this deed was done. The first question was, how we might surprise the next heir; the prince haply would be at the parliament with the king his father, how should we then be able to seize on the duke? This burthen Mr. Percy undertook, that by his acquaintance, he, with another gentleman, would enter the chamber without suspicion, and having some dozen others at several doors to expect his coming, and two or three on horseback at the court-gate to receive him, he would undertake (the blow being given, until which he would attend in the duke's chamber) to carry him safe away; for he supposed most of the court would be absent, and such as were there not suspecting, or unprovided for any such matter. For the lady Elizabeth, it were easy to surprise her in the country, by drawing friends together at an hunting, near the lord Harrington's, and Ashby, Mr. Catesby's house, being not far off, was a fit place for preparation.—The next was for money and horses, which if we could provide in any reasonable measure, having the heir apparent, and the first knowledge by four or five days, was odds sufficient.—Then what lords we should save from the parliament, which was first agreed in general, as many as we could that were catholicks, or so disposed: but after we descended to speak of particulars.—Next, what foreign princes we should acquaint with this before, or join with after. For this point we agreed, that first we could not enjoin princes to that secrecy, nor oblige them by oath, so to be secure of their promise; besides, we knew not whether they will approve the project, or dislike it. And, if they do allow thereof, to prepare before might beget suspicion; and, not to provide until the business were acted, the same letter that carried news of the thing done, might as well intreat their help and furtherance. Spain is too slow in his preparations, to hope any good from in the first extremities, and France too near and too dangerous, who with the shipping of Holland, we feared of all the world, might make away with us.

But while we were in the middle of these discourses, we heard that the parliament should be anew adjourned until after Michaelmas; upon which tidings, we broke off both discourse and working until after Christmas. About Candlemas, we brought over in a boat the powder which we had provided at Lambeth, and laid it in Mr. Percy's house, because we were willing to have all danger in one place.—We wrought also another fortnight in the mine against the stone wall which was very hard to beat through; at which time we called in Kit Wright, and near to Easter, as we wrought the third time, opportunity was given to hire the cellar in which we resolved to lay the powder and leave the mine.

Now, by reason that the charge of maintaining us all so long together, besides the number of several houses, which, for several uses, had been hired, and buying of powder, &c. had lain heavy on Mr. Catesby alone to support, it was necessary for him to call in some others to ease his charge; and to that end desired leave, that he, with Mr. Percy, and a third, whom they should call, might acquaint whom they thought fit and willing to the business; for many, said he, may be content that I should know, who would not therefore that all the company should be acquainted with their names: to this we all agreed.—After this, master Fawkes laid into the cellar (which he had newly taken) a thousand billets, and five hundred faggots, and with that covered the powder, because we might have the house free, to suffer any one to enter that would. Mr. Catesby wished us to consider, whether it were not now necessary to send Mr. Fawkes over, both to absent himself for a time, as also to acquaint sir William Stanley and Mr. Owen with this matter. We agreed that he should (provided that he gave it them with the same oath that we had taken before) viz. To keep it secret from all the world. The reason, why we desired sir William Stanley should be acquainted herewith, was, to have him with us as soon as he could: and for Mr. Owen, he might hold good correspondency after with foreign princes. So Mr. Fawkes departed about Easter for Flanders, and returned, the latter end of August. He told me, that, when he arrived at Brussels, sir William Stanley was not returned from Spain, so as he uttered the matter only to Owen, who seemed well pleased with the business, but told him, that surely sir William would not be acquainted with any plot, as having business now a foot in the court of England; but he himself would be always ready to tell him, and send him away as soon as it were done.

About this time did Mr. Percy and Mr. Catesby meet at the Bath, where they agreed, that, the company being yet but few, Mr. Catesby should have the others authority to call in whom he thought best; by which authority he called in after sir Everard Digby, though at what time I know not, and last of all master Francis Tresham. The first promised, as I heard Mr. Catesby say, fifteen hundred pounds; the second two thousand pounds; Mr. Percy himself promised all he could get out of the earl of Northumberland's rents, which was about four thousand pounds, and to provide many galloping horses, to the number of ten.—Mean while Mr. Fawkes, and myself alone, bought some new powder, as suspecting the first to be dank, and conveyed it into the cellar, and set it in order, as we resolved it should stand. Then was the parliament a-new prorogued until the fifth of November, so as we all went down until some ten days before, when Mr. Catesby came up with Mr. Fawkes to an house by Enfield-Chace, called White-Webbes, whither I came to them, and Mr. Catesby willed me to enquire, whether the young prince came to the parliament. I told him, that I heard that his grace thought not to be there. Then must we have our horses, said Mr. Catesby, beyond the water, and provision of more company to surprise the prince, and leave the duke alone.—Two days after, being Sunday at night, in came one to my chamber, and told me, that a letter had been given to my lord Monteagle, to this effect: that he wished his lordship's absence from the parliament, because a blow would there be given. Which letter he presently carried to my lord of Salisbury.—On the morrow I went to White-Webbes, and told it Mr. Catesby, assuring him withal, that the matter was disclosed; and wishing him in any case to forsake his country. He told me, he would see further as yet, and resolved to send Mr. Fawkes to try the uttermost, protesting, if the part belonged to himself, he would try the same adventure.—On Wednesday master Fawkes went, and returned at night, of which we were very glad.—Thursday I came to London, and Friday master Catesby, master Tresham, and I met at Barnet, where we questioned how this letter should be sent to my lord Monteagle, but could not conceive, for master Tresham forswore it, whom we only suspected.—On Saturday night I met Mr. Tresham again in Lincoln's-Inn walks; wherein he told such speeches, that my lord of Salisbury should use to the king, as I gave it lost the second time, and repeated the same to Mr. Catesby, who hereupon was resolved to be gone, but staid to have master Percy come up, whose consent herein we wanted. On Sunday Mr. Percy, being dealt with to that end, would needs abide the uttermost trial.

The suspicion of all hands put us into such confusion, as master Catesby resolved to go down into the country, the Monday that master Percy went to Sion, and master Percy resolved to follow the same night, or early the next morning. About five of the clock, being Tuesday, came the younger Wright to my chamber, and told me, of a nobleman, called the lord Monteagle, saying, Arise, and come along to Essex house, for I am going to call up my lord of Northumberland; saying withal, the matter is discovered. Go back, master Wright, quoth I, and learn what you can about Essex gate. Shortly he returned, and said, Surely all is lost; for Lepton is got on horseback at Essex door, and, as he parted, he asked, if their lordships would have any more with him; and being answered, No, is rode fast up Fleet-street as he can ride. Go you then, quoth I, to Mr. Percy, for sure it is for him they seek, and bid him be gone, I will stay and see the uttermost. Then I went to the court-gates, and found them straightly guarded, so as no body could enter. From thence I went down towards the parliament-house, and, in the middle of King-street, found the guard standing, that would not let me pass. And, as I returned, I heard one say, There is a treason discovered, in which the king and the lords should have been blown up. So then I was fully satisfied that all was known, and went to the stable where my gelding stood, and rode into the country. Mr. Catesby had appointed our meeting at Dunchurch, but I could not overtake them until I came to my brother's, which was Wednesday night. On Thursday we took the armour at my lord Windsor's, and went that night to one Stephen Littleton's house, where the next day, being Friday, as I was early abroad to discover, my man came to me, and said, that an heavy mischance had severed all the company, for that Mr. Catesby, Mr. Rookwood, and Mr. Grant were burnt with gunpowder, upon which sight the rest dispersed. Master Littleton wished me to fly, and so would he. I told him, I would first see the body of my friend, and bury him, whatsoever befel me. When I came, I found Mr. Catesby reasonable well, master Percy, both the Wrights, Mr. Rookwood, and master Grant. I asked them what they resolved to do. They answered, We mean here to die. I said again, I would take such part as they did. About eleven of the clock came the company to beset the house, and, as I walked into the court, I was shot into the shoulder, which lost me the use of my arm; the next shot was the elder Wright struck dead; after him the younger Mr. Wright; and fourthly, Ambrose Rookwood. Then said Mr. Catesby to me, (standing before the door they were to enter) Stand by me, Tom, and we will die together. Sir, quoth I, I have lost the use of my right arm, and I fear that will cause me to be taken. So, as we stood close together, Mr. Catesby, Mr. Percy, and myself, they two were shot, as far as I could guess, with one bullet, and then the company entered upon me, hurt me in the belly with a pike, and gave me other wounds, until one came behind, and caught hold of both my arms. And so I remain, Yours, &c."

Commissioners; Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, Devonshire, Northampton, Salisbury, Marr, Dunbar, Popham.—Edw. Coke. W. Waad.

The Names of those that were first in the treason, and laboured in the mine; Robert Catesby, Robert Winter, esqrs. Thomas Percy, Thomas Winter, John Wright, Christopher Wright, Guido Fawkes, gentlemen. And Bates, Catesby's man.

Those that were made acquainted with it, though not personally labouring in the mine, nor in the cellar; Everard Digby, knt. Ambrose Rookwood, Francis Tresham, esqrs. John Graunt, gent. Robert Keyes.

But here let us leave Fawkes in a lodging fit for such a guest, and taking time to advise upon his conscience, and turn ourselves to that part of the history, which concerns the fortune of the rest of their partakers in that abominable treason. The news was no sooner spread abroad that morning, which was upon a Tuesday, the fifth of November, and the first day designed for that session of parliament; the news, I say, of this so strange and unlooked-for accident was no sooner divulged, but some of those conspirators, namely, Winter, and the two brothers of Wright's, thought it high time for them to hasten out of the town (for Catesby was gone the night before, and Percy at four of the clock in the morning the same day of the discovery) and all of them held their course, with more haste than good speed, to Warwickshire toward Coventry, where the next day morning, being Wednesday, and about the same hour that Fawkes was taken in Westminster, one Graunt, a gentleman, having associated unto him some others of his opinion, all violent papists, and strong recusants, came to a stable of one Benocke, a rider of great horses, and, having violently broken up the same, carried along with them all the great horses that were therein, to the number of seven or eight, belonging to divers noblemen and gentlemen of that country, who had put them into the rider's hands to be made fit for their service. And so both that company of them which fled out of London, as also Graunt, and his accomplices, met all together at Dunchurch, at sir Everard Digby's lodging, the Tuesday at night, after the discovery of this treacherous attempt; the which Digby had likewise, for his part, appointed a match of hunting, to have been hunted the next day, which was Wednesday, though his mind was, Nimrod-like, upon a far other manner of hunting, more bent upon the blood of reasonable men than brute beasts.

This company, and bellish society, thus convened, finding their purpose discovered, and their treachery prevented, did resolve to run a desperate course; and, since they could not prevail, by so private a blow, to practise, by a public rebellion, either to attain to their intents, or, at least, to save themselves in the throng of others. And, therefore, gathering all the company they could unto them, and pretending the quarrel of religion, having intercepted such provision of armour, horses, and powder, as the time could permit, thought, by running up and down the country, both to augment piece and piece their number (dreaming to themselves, that they had the virtue of a snow-ball, which, being little at the first, and tumbling down from a great hill, groweth to a great quantity, by increasing itself with the snow that it meeteth by the way) and also, that they, beginning first this brave shew, in one part of the country, should, by their sympathy and example, stir up and encourage the rest of their religion, in other parts of England, to rise, as they had done there. But, when they had gathered their force to the greatest, they came not to the number of fourscore; and yet were they troubled, all the hours of the day, to keep and contain their own servants from stealing from them; who, notwithstanding all their care, daily left them, being far inferior to Gideon's host in number, but far more, in faith or justness of quarrel.— And so, after that this Catholick troop had wandered a while through Warwickshire to Worcestershire, and from thence to the edge and borders of Staffordshire, this gallantly armed band had not the honour, at the last, to be beaten with a king's lieutenant, or extraordinary commissioner, sent down for the purpose, but only by the ordinary sheriff of Worcestershire were they all beaten, killed, taken, and dispersed. Wherein ye have to note this following circumstance so admirable, and so lively displaying the greatness of God's justice, as it could not be concealed, without betraying, in a manner, the glory due to the Almighty for the same.— Although divers of the king's Proclamations were posted down after these traitors with all the speed possible, declaring the odiousness of that bloody attempt, the necessity to have had Percy preserved alive, if it had been possible, and the assembly together of that rightly damned crew, now no more darkened conspirators, but open and avowed rebels; yet the far distance of the way, which was above an hundred miles, together with the extreme deepness thereof, joined also with the shortness of the day, was the cause that the hearty and loving affections of the king's good subjects, in those parts, prevented the speed of his proclamations. For, upon the third day after the flying down of these rebels, which was upon the Friday next after the discovery of their Plot, they were most them all surprized by the sheriff of Worcestershire, at Holbeech, about the noon of the day, and that in manner following:— Graunt, of whom I have made mention before, for taking the great horses, who had not, all the preceding time, stirred from his own house till the next morning, after the attempt should have been put in execution; he then laying his accounts without his host, as the proverb is, that their Plot had, without failing, received the day before their hoped-for success; took, or rather stole, out those horses, as I said before, for enabling him, and so many of that foulest society, that had still remained in the country near about him, to make a sudden surprise upon the king's elder daughter, the lady Elizabeth, having her residence near by that place, whom they thought to have used for the colour of their treacherous design, his majesty, her father, her mother, and male children being all destroyed above, and to this purpose, also, had that Nimrod, Digby, provided his hunting-match against that same time, that, numbers of people being flocked together, upon the pretence thereof, they might the easier have brought to pass the sudden surprise of her person.

Now the violent taking away of those horses, long before day, did seem to be so great a riot, in the eyes of the common people, that knew of no greater mystery: And the bold attempting thereof did ingender such a suspicion of some following rebellion in the hearts of the wiser sort, as both great and small began to stir and arm themselves, upon this unlooked-for accident. But, before twelve or sixteen hours past, Catesby, Percy, the Winters, Wrights, Rookwood, and the rest, bringing then the assurance, that their main Plot was failed and bewrayed, whereupon they had built the golden mountain of their glorious hopes: They then took their last desperate resolution, to flock together in a troop, and wander, as they did, for the reasons aforesaid. But as, upon the one part, the zealous duty to their God, and their sovereign, was so deeply imprinted in the hearts of all the meanest and poorest sort of the people, although then knowing of no further mystery, than such publick misbehaviours, as their own eyes taught them, as, notwithstanding of their fair shews and pretences of their Catholick cause, no creature, man or woman, through all the country, would, once, so much as give them, willingly, a cup of drink, or any sort of comfort or support, but, with execrations, detested them: so on the other part, the sheriffs of the shires, through which they wandered, conveying their people with all speed possible, hunted as hotly after them, as the evilness of the way, and the unprovidedness of their people, upon that sudden, could permit them. And so at last, after sir Richard Verney, sheriff of Warwickshire, had carefully and straightly been in chace of them to the confines of his county, part of the meaner sort being also apprehended by him; sir Richard Walsh, sheriff of Worcestershire, did likewise dutifully and hotly pursue them through his shire: And, having gotten sure trial of their taking harbour at the house above-named, he did send trumpeters and messengers to them, commanding them, in the king's name, to render unto him, his majesty's minister; and knowing no more, at that time, of their guilt, than was publicly visible, did promise, upon their dutiful and obedient rendering unto him, to intercede, at the king's hands, for the sparing of their lives; who received only, from them, this scornful answer, they being better witnesses to themselves of their inward evil consciences, 'That he had need of better assistance, than of those few numbers that were with him before he could be able to command or controul them.' But here fell the wonderous work of God's justice, that, while this message passed between the sheriff and them, the sheriff's and his people's hearts being justly kindled and augmented by their arrogant answer; and so, they preparing themselves to give a furious assault, and the other party making themselves ready, within the house, to perform their promise by a defence as resolute; it pleased God, that, in the mending of the fire, in their chamber, one small spark should fly out, and light among less than two pound-weight of powder, which was drying a little from the chimney; which, being thereby blown up, so inaimed the faces of some of the principal rebels, and the hands and sides of others of them, blowing up with it also a great bag full of powder, which, notwithstanding, never took fire, as they were not only disabled and discouraged hereby, from any further resistance, in respect Catesby* himself, Rookwood, Grant, and divers others of greatest account among them, were, thereby, made unable for defence, but, also, wonderfully struck with amazement in their guilty consciences, calling to memory, how God had justly punished them with that same instrument, which they should have used for the effectuating of so great a sin, according to the old Latin saying, 'In quo peccetumus, in eodem plectimur;' as they presently, (see the wonderful power of God's justice upon guilty consciences,) did all fall down upon their knees, praying God to pardon them for their bloody enterprise; and, thereafter, giving over any further debate, opened the gate, suffered the sheriff's people to rush in furiously among them, and desperately sought their own present destruction: The three specials of them joining backs together, Catesby, Percy, and Winter, whereof two, with one shot, Catesby and Percy, were slain, and the third, Winter, taken and saved alive.

And thus these resolute and high aspiring Catholicks, who dreamed of no less than the destruction of kings and kingdoms, and promised to themselves no lower estate, than the government of great and ancient monarchies, were miserably defeated, and quite overthrown in an instant, falling in the pit which they had prepared for others; and so fulfilling that sentence, which his majesty did, in a manner, prophesy of them, in his oration to the parliament; some presently slain, others deadly wounded, stripped of their clothes, left lying miserably naked, and so dying, rather of cold, than of the danger of their wounds; and the rest, that either were whole, or but lightly hurt, taken and led prisoners by the sheriff, the ordinary minister of justice, to the Jail, the ordinary place, even of the basest malefactors, where they remained till their sending up to London, being met with a huge confluence of people of all sorts, desirous to see them, as the rarest sort of monsters: fools to laugh at them, women and children to wonder, all the common people to gaze, the wiser sort to satisfy their curiosity, in seeing the outward cases of so unheard of a villainy; and, generally, all sorts of people, to satiate and fill their eyes with the sight of them, whom, in their hearts, they so far admired and detested; serving so for a fearful and publick spectacle of God's fierce wrath and just indignation.

What, hereafter, will be done with them, is to be left to the justice of his majesty and the state; which, as no good subject needs to doubt, will be performed in its own due time, by a public and exemplary punishment; so have we, all that are faithful and humble subjects, great cause to pray earnestly to the Almighty, that it will please him, who hath the hearts of * Catesby, who was the first inventor of this treason in general, and of the manner of working the same by powder, in special, himself now first maimed with the blowing up of powder, and, next, he and Percy both killed with one shot proceeding from powder.

all princes in his hands, to put in his majesty's heart, to make such a conclusion of this tragedy to the traitors, but tragi-comedy to the king, and all his true subjects, as, thereby, the glory of God, and his true religion, may be advanced; the future security of the king, and his estate, procured and provided for; all hollow and dishonest hearts discovered and prevented; and this horrible attempt, lacking due epithets, to be so justly avenged; that whereas they thought, by one Catholick indeed, and universal blow, to accomplish the wish of that Roman tyrant, who wished all the bodies, in Rome, to have but one neck, and so, by the violent force of powder, to break up, as with a petard, our triple-locked peaceful gates of Janus, which, God be thanked, they could not compass by any other means; they may justly be so recompensed, for their truly viperous intended parricide, as the shame and infamy that, otherwise, would light upon this whole nation, for having unfortunately hatched such cockatrice-eggs, may be repaired, by the execution of famous and honourable justice upon the offenders, and so the kingdom purged of them may, hereafter, perpetually flourish in peace and prosperity, by the happy conjunction of the hearts of all honest and true subjects, with their just and religious sovereign.

And thus, whereas they thought to have effaced our memories, the memory of them shall remain, but to their perpetual infamy; and we, as I said in the beginning, shall, with all thankfulness, eternally preserve the memory of so great a benefit. To which let every good subject say Amen.

There is in the 3rd Volume of the Harleian Miscellany, p. 116, a History of the Gunpowder Treason, compiled from various authors, but the compiler seems to have made no use of King James's Work. In the same volume, p. 127, is an Account of the Arraignment and Execution of Digby, the two Winters, Grant, Rockwood, Keyes, Bates, and Johnson alias Fawkes. It was published at the time, but is very indistinct and insulting, and no part of it, except perhaps the following, is at all worth insertion here:

"Now, after their Condemnation and Judgment, being sent back to the Tower, there they remained till the Thursday following; upon sledges and hurdles they were drawn into St. Paul's church-yard, four of them, viz. Everard Digby, the elder Winter, Grant, and Bates, of whom I forgot to speak, having no great matter to speak of, but only that, being a villain, and hoping for advancement by the same, he had the reward of a traitor.

Now these four being drawn to the scaffold, made on purpose for their execution: first went up Digby, a man of a goodly personage, and a manly aspect, yet might a wary eye, in the change of his countenance, behold an inward fear of death, for his colour grew pale and his eye heavy; notwithstanding that he inforced himself to speak, as stoutly as he could, his speech was not long, and to little good purpose, only, that his belied conscience, being, but indeed, a blinded conceit, had led him into this offence, which, in respect of his religion, alias, indeed idolatry, he held no offence, but, in respect of the law, he held an offence, for which, he asked forgiveness of God, of the king, and the whole kingdom; and so, with vain and superstitious crossing of himself, betook him to his Latin prayers, mumbling to himself, refusing to have any prayers of any, but of the Romish Catholics; went up the ladder, and with the help of the hangman, made an end of his wicked days in this world.

After him went Winter up to the scaffold, where he used few words to any effect, without asking mercy of either God, or the king, for his offence; went up the ladder, and, making a few prayers to himself, staid not long for his execution.

After him went Grant, who abominably blinded with his horrible idolatry, though he confessed his offence to be heinous, yet would fain have excused it by his conscience for religion; a bloody religion, to make so bloody a conscience; but better that his blood, and all such as he was, should be shed by the justice of law, than the blood of many thousands to have been shed by his villainy, without law or justice; but to the purpose, having used a few idle words to ill effect, he was, as his fellows before him, led the way to the halter; and so, after his crossing of himself, to the last part of his tragedy.

Last of them came Bates, who seemed sorry for his offence, and asked forgiveness of God, and the king, and of the whole kingdom; prayed to God for the preservation of them all, and as he said, only for his love to his master, drawn to forget his duty to God, his king and country, and therefore was now drawn from the Tower to St. Paul's church-yard, and there hanged and quartered for his treachery. Thus ended that day's business.

The next day, being Friday, were drawn from the Tower to the Old Palace in Westminster, over-against the Parliament-house, Thomas Winter the younger brother, Rockwood, Keyes, and Fawkes the minor, justly called, 'the Devil of the Vault;' for had he not been a devil incarnate, he had never conceived so villainous a thought, nor been employed in so damnable an action.

The same day, being Friday, were drawn from the Tower, to the Old Palace in Westminster, Thomas Winter, Rockwood, Keyes, and Fawkes, where Winter, first being brought to the scaffold, made little speech, but seeming, after a sort, as it were, sorry for his offence, and yet crossing himself, as though those were words to put by the devil's stoccadoe, having already made a wound in his soul, of which he had not yet a full feeling, protesting to die a true Catholick, as he said; with a very pale and dead colour, went up the ladder, and, after a swing or two with a halter, to the quartering-

Next him came Rockwood, who made a speech of some longer time, confessing his offence to God, in seeking to shed blood, and asking therefore mercy of his Divine majesty; his offence to the king, of whose majesty he likewise humbly asked forgiveness, his offence to the whole state, of whom in general he asked forgiveness; beseeching God to bless the king, the queen, and all his royal progeny, and that they might long live to reign in peace and happiness over this kingdom. But last of all, to mar all the pottage with one filthy weed, to mar this good prayer with an ill conclusion, he prayed God to make the king a catholic, otherwise a papist, which God for his mercy ever forbid; and so, beseeching the king to be good to his wife and children, protesting to die in his idolatry, a Romish Catholic, he went up the ladder, and, hanging till he was almost dead, was drawn to the block, where he gave his last gasp.

After him came Keyes, who like a desperate villain, using little speech, with small or no shew of repentance, went stoutly up the ladder; where, not staying the hangman's turn, he turned himself off with such a leap, that with the swing he brake the halter, but, after his fall, was quickly drawn to the block, and there was quickly divided into four parts.

Last of all came the great devil of all, Fawkes, alias Johnson, who should have put fire to the powder. His body being weak with torture and sickness, he was scarce able to go up the ladder, but yet with much ado, by the help of the hangman, went high enough to break his neck with the fall: who made no long speech, but, after a sort, seeming to be sorry for his offence, asked a kind of forgiveness of the king and the state for his bloody intent; and, with his crosses and his idle ceremonies, made his end upon the gallows and the block, to the great joy of the beholders, that the land was ended of so wicked a villainy."

81. The Trial of HENRY GARNET, Superior of the Jesuits in England, at the Guildhall of London, for a High Treason, being a Conspirator in the Gunpowder Plot: 4 JAC. I. 28th of March, A. D. 1606.

THE Commissioners present were, sir Leonard Holyday, Lord Mayor; the earls of Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, Northampton, and Salisbury; L. C. Justice of England, sir John Popham; the L. C. Baron of the Exchequer; sir Christopher Yelverton, kt. one of his majesty's Justices of the King's-Bench.

The substance and effect of the Indictment of Henry Garnet, superior of the Jesuits in England, appeareth before in the Relation of the former Arraignment, and therefore unnecessary to be repeated again; [3 Co. Inst. 27.] which Indictment was summarily and effectually repeated by sir John Croke kt. his majesty's Serjeant at law, in this manner:

Sir John Croke. This person and prisoner here at the bar, this place, and this present occasion and action, do prove that true, which the Author of all Truth hath told us; That 'nihil est occultum, quod non manifestabitur; et nihil est secretum, quod non revelabitur et in palam veniet.' There is nothing hid that shall not be made manifest, there is nothing secret that shall not be revealed and come in publick. And that God by whom kings do reign, 'Consilium pravorum dissipat,' doth scatter and bring to nought the counsel of the wicked.—That he spake with fear and trembling, and with horror and amazedness, against that rotten root of that hideous and hateful tree of treason, and of that detestable and unheard of wickedness, he did crave pardon for it; affirming that no flesh could mention it without astonishment.—He shewed that Henry Garnet, of the profession of the Jesuits, otherwise Wally, otherwise Darcy, otherwise Roberts, otherwise Farmer, otherwise Philips, (for by all those names he called himself) stood indicted of the most barbarous and damnable treasons, the like whereof was never heard of: That he was a man 'multorum nominum,' but not 'boni nominis;' of many names, as appeared by the indictment, but of no good name; adorned by God and nature, with many gifts and graces, if the grace of God had been joined with them: but that wanting, 'quanto ornatior' in other gifts 'tanto nequior'.—That this Garnet (his majesty summoning his parliament to be holden at Westminster the 19th of March, in the first year of his reign, and by divers prorogations continuing it till the third of October last) together with Catesby lately slain in open rebellion, and with Oswald Tesmond a Jesuit, otherwise Oswald Greenwell, as a false traitor against the most mighty and most renowned king our sovereign lord king James; the 9th of June last, traitorously did conspire and compass: To depose the king, and to deprive him of his Government: To destroy and kill the king, and the noble prince Henry his eldest son: such a king, and such a prince, such a son of such a father, whose virtues are rather with amazed silence to be wondered at, than able by any speech to be expressed: To stir sedition and slaughter throughout the kingdom: To subvert the true religion of God, and whole government of the kingdom: To overthrow the whole state of the commonwealth.—The manner how to perform these horrible Treasons, the Serjeant said 'Horreo dicere,' his lips did tremble to speak it, but his heart praised God for his mighty deliverance. The practice so inhuman, so barbarous, so damnable, so detestable, as the like was never read nor heard of, or ever entered into the heart of the most wicked man to imagine. And here he said, he could not but mention that religious observation so religiously observed by his religious majesty, wishing it were engraven in letters of gold, in the hearts of all his people; the more hellish the imagination, the more divine the preservation.—This Garnet, together with Catesby and Tesmond, had speech and conference together of these Treasons, and concluded most traitorously and devilishly: That Catesby, Winter, Pawkes, with many other traitors lately arraigned of high-treason, would blow up with gunpowder in the parliament-house, the king, the prince, the lords spiritual and temporal, the judges of the realm, the knights, citizens and burgesses, and many other subjects and servants of the king assembled in parliament, at one blow, traitorously and devilishly to destroy them all and piecemeal to tear them in asunder, without respect of majesty, dignity, and degree, age or place.—And for that purpose, a great quantity of gunpowder was traitorously and secretly placed and hid by these Conspirators under the Parliament-House.

This being the Substance and the Effect of the Indictment, Garnet did plead Not Guilty to it; and a very discreet and substantial Jury, with allowance of challenges unto the prisoner, were sworn at the bar for the trial of him*.

To whom the Serjeant shewed that they should have Evidences to prove him Guilty, that should be 'luci clariores,' that every man might read them running. They should have 'testimonia rerum,' and 'loquentia signa,' Witnesses and Testimonies of the things themselves. 'Reum confitentem,' or rather 'reos confitentes, accusantes invicem.' That every one may say unto him, 'serva nequam,' thou wicked subject, thou wicked servant, 'ex ore tuo te 'judico', of thine own mouth I judge thee, of thine own mouth I condemn thee. And this shall be made so manifest by him that best can do it, as shall stop the mouth of all contradiction.

Attorney General. (Sir Ed. Coke.) Your lordships may perceive by the parts of the Indictment which have been succinctly opened, that this is but a latter act of that heavy and woful tragedy, which is commonly called the Powder-Treason; wherein some have already played their parts, and according to their demerits suffered condign punishment and pains of death. We are now to proceed against this prisoner for the same treason; in which respect the necessary repetition of some things before spoken, shall at the least seem tolerable: for that 'Nunquam nimis dicitur, quod nunquam satis dicitur;' It is never said too often, that can never be said enough. Nay, it may be thought justifiable to repeat in this case; for that in respect of the confluence and access of people at the former arraignment, many could not hear at that time: and yet, because I fear it would be tedious for the most of all my lords commissioners, and of this honourable and great assembly, were present at the arraignment, and for that I am now to deal with a man of another quality, I will only touch, and that very little, of the former discourse or evidence; and that little also shall be mingled with such new matter, as shall be worth the hearing, as being indeed of weight and moment: and all this with very great brevity.

But before I further proceed to the opening of this so great a cause, I hold it fit and necessary to give satisfaction to two divers and adverse sorts of men, who, according to the divers affections of their hearts, have divined and conjectured diversly of the cause of the procrastination and delay of proceeding, especially against this person: the matter wherewith he stands charged being so transcendent and exorbitant as it is. The first sort of these, out of their hearty love and loyalty to their natural liege lord and king, and to their dear country and this state, have feared the issue of this delay, lest that others might be animated by such protraction of judgment, to perpetrate the like: for they say, and it is most true, 'Quia non profertur cito contra malos sententia, absque timore ullo filii hominum perpetrant mala;' Because speedy justice is not executed against wicked men, the people without all fear commit wickedness. And pity it were that these good men should not be satisfy'd. The other sort are of those, who in respect no greater expedition hath been used against this prisoner at the bar, fall to excusing of him, as gathering these presumptions and conjectures: first, that if he, or any of the Jesuits, had indeed been justly to be touched with this most damnable and damned treason, surely they should have been brought forth and try'd before this time. Secondly, That there was a bill exhibited in parliament concerning this treason, and this traitor, but that it was deferred and proceeded not, for want of just and sufficient proofs. Nay, Thirdly, There was a particular apology spread abroad for this man, and another general for all Jesuits and priests, together with this imputation, That king-killing and queen-killing was not indeed a doctrine of theirs, but only a fiction and policy of our state, thereby to make the popish religion to be despised and in disgrace.

Now for these men, pity it were that the eye of their understanding should not be enlightened and cleared, that so being by demonstrative and luculent proofs convinced, they may be to their prince and country truly converted. First therefore concerning the delay, (though it be true, 'Quod flagellat in corde, qui laudatur in ore') yet must I remember the great pains of my lords the commissioners of his majesty's privy council in this cause: for Garnet being first examined upon the 13th of the last month, hath sithence been again examined and interrogated above twenty several times, which lasted to the 26th of March, within two days of this arraignment. Touching the bill in parliament, it was indeed exhibited before Garnet, was apprehended; but his majesty's gracious pleasure was, that albeit this treason be without all precedent and example, yet they should quietly and equally be indicted, arraigned, publickly heard, and proceeded withal in a moderate, ordinary, and just course of law. Concerning their apologies, and the fictions of state (as they term them), answer shall be made, by God's grace, in the proper place, when I come to lay open the plots and practices of the Jesuits, to the satisfaction of all this honourable and great assembly. But first I have an humble petition to present to your lordships, and the rest of this grave auditory for myself, in respect that I am necessarily to name great princes, yet with protestation and caution, that no blot is intended to be laid upon any of them. I know there is 'Lex in sermone tenenda,' A law and rule to be observed in speaking, especially in this kind; and that kings and great princes and the mighty men of this earth are to be reverently and respectfully dealt withal: and therefore I humbly recommend unto you these considerations, concerning this point of mentioning foreign states. 1st, That the kingdoms were at those times in open enmity and hostility, and that might be honourable at one time which was not so at another; so that hostile actions were then justifiable and honourable, as being in times of hostility and war. 2dly, In these things it is not the king's attorney that speaks, but Garnet the Jesuit: as also that it proceedeth from an inevitable necessity; for that the examinations as well of this, as of the rest of the traitors, cannot otherwise be opened and urged against them: so is the mention of great men, by the impudency of these wicked traitors, woven into their confessions, as they cannot be severed.—And with this comfort I conclude the Preface, That I hope in God this day's work, in the judgment of so many as shall be attentive and well disposed, shall tend to the glory of Almighty God, the honour of our religion, the safety of his most excellent majesty and his royal issue, and the security of the whole commonwealth.

For Memory and method, all that I shall speak may be contracted to two general heads. 1. I will consider the Offences, together with certain circumstances, precedent before the Offence, concurrent with the Offence, subsequent after the Offence. 2. I will lay down some Observations concerning the same.—For the proper name of this Offence, because I must speak of several Treasons for distinction and separation of this from the other, I will name it the Jesuits Treason, as belonging to them both 'ex congruo et condigno;' they were the proprietaries, plotters and procurers of it: and in such crimes 'plus peccat autor, quam actor;' 'the author, or procurer, offendeth more than the actor or executer:' as may appear by God's own Judgment given against the first sin in Paradise, where the serpent had three punishments inflicted upon him, as the original plotter; the woman two, being as the mediate procurer; and Adam but one, as the party seduced.—Circumstances precedent and subsequent so termed here, are indeed in their proper natures all High-Treasons; but yet in respect of the magnitude, nay monstrosity of this treason, may comparatively, without any discountenance to them in this case, be used as circumstances. And because I am to deal with the superior of the Jesuits, I will only touch such treasons, as have been plotted and wrought by the Jesuits, of whom this man was superior; and those treasons also sithence this Garnet his coming into England; whereof he may truly say, 'Et quorum pars magna fui.'

The coming of this Garnet into England (which very act was a treason) was about 20 years past, viz. in July 1586, in the 28th year of the reign of the late queen, of famous and blessed memory: whereas the year before, namely the 27th year of Elizabeth, there was a statute made, whereby it was treason, for any, who was made a Romish Priest by any authority from the See of Rome, sithence the first year of her reign, to come into her dominions: which statute the Romanists calumniate as a bloody, cruel, unjust and a new upstart law, and abuse that place of our Saviour, 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, &c.' Mat. xxiii. 37. to that purpose: but indeed it is both mild, merciful and just, and grounded upon the antient fundamental laws of England. For (as hath already in the former Arraignments been touched) before the bull of Impius Pius Quintus, in the 11th year of the queen, wherein her majesty was excommunicated and deposed, and all they accused who should yield any obedience unto her, &c. there were no recusants in England, all came to church (howsoever popishly inclined, or persuaded in most points) to the same divine service we now use; but thereupon presently they refused to assemble in our churches, or join with us in publick service, not for conscience of any thing there done, against which they might justly except out of the Word of God, but because the pope had excommunicated and deposed her majesty, and cursed those who should obey her: and so upon this Bull ensued open rebellion in the north, and many garboils. But see the event: now most miserable, in respect of this Bull, was the state of Romish recusants; for either they must be hanged for treason, in resisting their lawful sovereign, or cursed for yielding due obedience unto her majesty. And therefore of this pope it was said by some of his own favourites, that he was 'Homo pius et doctus, sed nimis credulus;' a holy and a learned man, but over credulous; for that he was informed and believed that the strength of the Catholics in England was such, as was able to have resisted the queen. But when the Bull was found to take such an effect, then was there a dispensation given, both by Pius Quintus himself, and Gregory the 13th, That all Catholicks here might shew their outward obedience to the queen, 'ad redimendam vexationem, et ad ostendendam externam obedientiam;' but with these Cautions and Limitations: 1. 'Rebus sic stantibus,' Things so standing as they did. 2. Donec publica bullæ 'executio fieri posset;' that is to say, They might grow into strength, until they were able to give the queen a mate, that the publick execution of the said Bull might take place. And all this was confessed by Garnet under his own hand, and now again openly confessed at the bar.

In the 20th year of queen Elizabeth, came Campion* the Jesuit and many others of his profession with him, purposely to make a Party in England for the Catholick cause, to the end that the Bull of Pius Quintus might be put in execution. And though all this while recusancy, being grounded upon such a disloyal cause, were a very dangerous and disloyal thing; yet was there no law made in that behalf until the 23rd year of her majesty's reign; and that also imposing only a mulct or penalty upon it, until conformity were offered and shewed. Anno 26 Eliz. came Parry † with a resolution from Cardinal de Como, and others, that it was lawful to kill her majesty, as being excommunicated and deposed. Whereupon her majesty entering into consultation how (together with her safety, and the protection of her subjects) she might avoid the imminent dangers, and yet draw no blood from these Priests and Jesuits, found out this moderate and mild course as the best means, to prohibit their coming at all into her land; there never being any king who would endure, or not execute any such persons, within their dominions, as should deny him to be lawful king, or go about to withdraw his subjects from their allegiance, or incite them to resist or rebel against him. Nay, the bringing in of a Bull by a subject of this realm against another, in the time of Edward 1. was adjudged Treason. But by the way, for that Garnet had exclaimed, saying, Shew us where was your church before Luther, design the place, name the persons, and so forth; it is answered by a comparison of a wedgo of pure gold, which coming into the hands of impostors, is by their sophistications and mixtures, for gain and worldly respects, increased and augmented into a huge body and mass, and retaining still an outward fair shew and tincture of gold. Where is now the pure gold, saith one, shew me the place? I answer, in that mass; but for the extracting thereof, and purifying it from dross, that must be done by the art of the workman, and the trial of the touchstone. So the true religion and service of Almighty God, being for human respects and worldly pomp, mixed and overladen with a number of superstitious ceremonies and inventions of man; yet ever had God his true church, holding his truth, which hath been the skilful workmen, with the touchstone of the Word of God, refined and separate from the dross of man's inventions.

But to proceed: in the 28th year of queen Elizabeth, being the year 1586, in June, came Garnet into England, breaking through the wall of treason; being in truth, totus compositus ex proditione: and this was at that time when the great Armada of Spain, which the pope blessed, and christened by the name of 'The Invincible Navy,' was by the instigation of the high-priest of Rome, preparing and collecting together of many parcels, out of divers parts where they could be bought, or hired, or borrowed; and therefore may be called a compounded navy, having in it 158 great ships. The purveyors and fore-runners of this navy and invasion, were the Jesuits; and Garnet among them being a traitor, even in his very entrance and footing in the land. But the queen with her own ships, and her own subjects, did beat this Armada, God himself (whose cause indeed it was) fighting for us against them, by fire, and seas, and winds, and rocks and tempests, scattering all and destroying most of them: for 'offenso creatore, offensa ditur omnis creatura,' The Creator being offended, every creature is readily armed to revenge his quarrel: In which respect he is called the Lord of Hosts. So that of 158 scarce 40 of their ships returned to the bar of their own haven; and as it is reported, most of them also perished: inasmuch, that in this respect, we may say of queen Elizabeth, as the poet writeth of the Christian emperor:

'O nimum dilecta Deo, cui militat æther,
'Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti.'

Observe here, that about the time of this invasion, there being in Spain met in consultation about that business, the Cardinal of Austria, the duke of Medina, count Fuente two Irish bishops, with sundry military men and amongst other Winstlade, an Englishman the Irish bishops perceiving that they expected a party of Catholicks in England, resolved that true it was, that it was not possible to do any good here in England, unless there were a party of Catholicks made before-hand. But such said they, was the policy of England, as this could never be effected: for if any suspicion of fear arose, the Catholicks should quickly be either shut up, or quite cut off. Oh, saith an old soldier there present, 'Hoc facit pro nobis That makes for us; for by that means the souls shall go to heaven for their religion, the bodies to the earth for their treasons, and their lands and goods to us as conquerors: this was indeed that they principally aimed at.—Note here, that since the Jesuits set foot in this land, there never passed four years without a most pestilent and pernicious treason tending to the subversion of the whole state.

After that hostile Invasion in 88, the Jesuit fell again to secret and treasonable practices for in the year 92, came Patrick Cullen, who was incited by sir William Stanley, Hugh Owen, Jaques Fraunces, and Holt the Jesuit, and resolved by the said Holt to kill the queen; to which purpose he received absolution, and then the sacrament, at the hands of the said Jesuit, together with this ghostly counsel, that it was both lawful and meritorious to kill her. Nay, said Jaques, that base laundress's son, (who was a continued practiser both with this Cullen and others, to destroy her majesty) the state of England is and will be so settled, that unless mistress Elizabeth be suddenly taken away, all the devils in Hell will not be able to prevail against it, or shake it.

Now Cullen's Treason was accompanied with a Book called 'Philopater,' written for the abetting and warranting of such a devilish act in general, by Cresswell the legier Jesuit in Spain, under the name of Philopater.

Anno 94, came Williams and Yorke to the same end, viz. to kill the queen; being wrought to undertake so vile and detestable a fact by father Holt the Jesuit, and other his complices: and thereupon the said Williams and Yorke in the Jesuits college received the Sacrament together of father Holt, and other Jesuits, to execute the same. And that treason likewise was accompanied with a book written by the legier Jesuit and rector of Rome, Parsons, under the name of Doleman, concerning titles, or rather titles; a leud and a lying book, full of falsehood, forgery, and malediction.

Anno 97, came Squire from Spain, to poison her majesty, incited, directed, and warranted by Walpole a Jesuit, then residing there; at whose hands likewise, after absolution, he received the Sacrament, as well to put the practice in execution, as to keep it secret. All these treasons were freely and voluntarily confessed by the parties themselves under their own hands, and yet remain extant to be seen.

In the year 1601, when practices failed, then was foreign force again attempted; for then, as in the former Arraignment hath been declared, was Thomas Winter employed to the king of Spain, together with Tesmond the Jesuit, by this Garnet, who wrote his letters to Arthur, alias Joseph Creswell, the only man whom I have heard of, to change his Christian name, the legier Jesuit in Spain, for the furtherance of that negotiation; which was, as hath been said, to offer the services of the English Catholics to the king, and to deal further, concerning an invasion, with promise from the Catholics here of forces, both of men and horses, to be in readiness to join with him. This negotiation, by the means of Creswell, to whom Garnet wrote, took such effect, that the two kingdoms standing then in hostility, the proposition of the English Romish Catholics was accepted and entertained; an army to invade, as hath been specified in the former Arraignment, promised, and 100,000 crowns to be distributed amongst Romanists and discontented persons, making of a party in England, and for the furtherance of the said service, granted. In the mean time the king earnestly desired, That if the queen of England should happen to die, he might receive present and certain advertisement thereof.—Now this Treason was accompanied with the Pope's own writing: for now doth the holy father cause to be sent hither to Garnet two Briefs or Bulls, one to the clergy, and another to the laity; wherein observe the Title, the Matter, the Time. The Title of the one was, 'Dilectis Filiis, Principibus, et Nobilibus Catholicis Anglicanis, Salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem:' that is, To our beloved Sons the Nobles and Gentlemen of England, which are Catholics, Greeting and Apostolical Benediction. The Title of the other was, 'Dilectis Filiis, Archipresbytero, et reliquo Clero Anglicano, &c.' To our beloved Sons, the Archpriest, and the rest of the Catholic Clergy. The Matter was, that after the death of her majesty, whether by course of nature, or otherwise, whosoever should lay claim or title to the crown of England, though never so directly and nearly interested therein by descent and blood royal; yet unless he were such an one as would not only tolerate the Catholic (Romish) religion, but by all his best endeavours and force promote it, and according to the ancient custom would, by a solemn and sacred oath religiously promise and undertake to perform the same, they should admit or receive none to be king of England: his words are these, 'Quamcumque propinquitate sanguinis niterentur, nisi ejusmodi essent qui fidem Catholicam non modo tolerarent, sed omni ope ac studio promovrent, et more majorum jurejurando se id præstituros suscipere, &c.'

As for king James (at whom the pope aimed) he hath indeed both propinquitatem and antiquitatem regalis sanguinis, propinquity and antiquity of blood royal, for his just claim and title to this crown, both before and since the conquest. To insist upon the declaration and deduction of this point, and pass along through the series and course of so many ages and centuries, as it would be over long for this place, so further I might herein seem as it were to gild gold: Only in a word, his majesty is lineally descended from Margaret the saint, daughter of Edward, son of king Edmund, grandchild of great Edgar, the Britain monarch. Which Margaret, sole heir of the English-Saxon king, was married to Malcolm king of Scotland; who by her had issue David the holy their king, from whom that race royal at this day is deduced; and Maud the good, wife of the first and learned Henry king of England, from whom his majesty directly and lineally proceedeth, and of whom a poet of that time wrote:

'Nec decor efficit fragilem, non sceptrum superbam,

'Sola potens humilis, sola pudica decens.'

And lastly, his majesty cometh of Margaret also the eldest daughter of Henry 7. who was descended of that famous union of those two fair roses, the white and the red, York and Lancaster; the effecting of which union cost the effusion of much English blood, over and besides fourscore or thereabouts of the blood royal.

But a more famous union is by the goodness of the Almighty perfected in his majesty's person of divers lions, two famous, ancient and renowned kingdoms, not only without blood, or any opposition, but with such an universal acclamation and applause of all sorts and degrees, as it were with one voice, as never was seen or read of. And therefore most excellent king, for to him I will now speak :

‘Cum triplici fulvum conjunge leone leonem,
‘Ut varias atavus junxerat ante rosas :
‘Majus opus varios sine pugna unius leones,
‘Sanguine quam varias consociasse rosas.’

These four noble and magnanimous lions, so firmly and individually united, are able, without any difficulty or great labour, to subdue and overthrow all the Letters and Bulls, and their calves also, that have been, or can be sent into England.

Now for the time, observe that these Bulls or Briefs came upon the aforesaid negotiation of Thomas Winter into Spain, at what time an army should shortly after have been sent to invade the land : And this was to be put in execution, ‘quandocunque contingeret miseram illam feminam ex hac vita excedere ;’ whensoever it should happen that that miserable woman, for so it pleased the high priest of Rome to call great queen Elizabeth, should depart this life. Was queen Elizabeth miserable ? It is said that ‘Miseria constat ex duobus contrariis, scilicet, copia et inopia ; ex copia tribulationis, et inopia consolationis.’ Was she, I say, miserable, whom Almighty God so often and so miraculously protected, both ‘from the arrow that flieth by day,’ their great Armada, ‘and from the pestilence that walketh in the darkness,’ their secret and treacherous conspiracies ? that did beat her most potent enemies ? that set up a king in his kingdom ? that defended nations, and harboured and protected distressed people ? that protected her subjects in peace and plenty, and had the hearts of the most and the best of her subjects ? that reigned religiously and gloriously, and died Christianly and in peace ? Oh blessed queen, our late dear sovereign, ‘semper honos nomenque tuum laudesque manebunt.’ But queen Elizabeth of famous memory, (for ‘Memoria ejus semper erit in benedictione’) as a bright morning-star, in fulness of time lost her natural light, when the great and glorious sun appeared in our horizon. And now sithence the coming of our great king James, there have not passed, I will not say four, nay not two months, without some treason. First, in March 1603, upon the death of her majesty, and before they had seen his majesty's face, was Christ. Wright employed into Spain, by Garnet, Catesby, and Tresham, to give advertisement of the queen's death, and to continue the former negotiation of Thomas Winter ; and by him also doth this Garnet write to Creswell the Jesuit, in commendation, and for assistance and furtherance of his business. As also on the 22nd of June following, was Guy Fawkes sent out of Flanders, by Baldwin the Jesuit, by sir William Stanley and Hugh Owen about the same treason ; and by letters from Baldwin directed and commended to Creswell the legier Jesuit in Spain, for the procuring of his dispatch, as in the former arraignment hath been declared.—In the same June doth Garnet the Superior, together with Gerrard and other Jesuits and Jesuited Catholics, labour not only in providing of horses, which by Thomas Winter and Christopher Wright, upon their several negotiations, they, in the names of all the Catholics in England, had promised the king of Spain, to assist and do him service withal, at such time as the said king should send his forces to invade, either at Milford Haven, or in Kent, as hath before been shewed ; but also did, by force of the said two Bulls or Briefs, dissuade the Romish Catholics from yielding their due obedience to his majesty, for that he was not of the Roman religion : contrary to the practice of the true church and churchmen, that undergo wars, ‘ferendo, non feriendo,’ with patience not with strokes ; their weapons being properly ‘orationes et lacrymæ,’ prayers and tears.

On the same June 9, which was in 1603, 1 Jac. brake out likewise the Treason of the Romish priests, Watson and Clarke, as also that other of sir Walter Raleigh and others. But the Jesuits seeing that the peace was now in great forwardness, and having advertisement, also, that the king of Spain did now distaste their propositions, so that there was no further hope left for force ; then fall they again to secret practice. As for the bulls or briefs before mentioned, when Catesby had informed Garnet that king James was proclaimed, and the state settled, they were by Garnet, as himself hath affirmed, burnt. But to proceed :

In March 1603, Garnet and Catesby (a pestilent traitor) confer together, and Catesby in general telleth him (though most falsly), That the king had broken promise with the catholicks, and therefore assuredly there would be stir in England before it were long. In September following, meets Catesby and Thomas Percy : and after an unjust, but a grievous complaint made by Catesby of the king's proceedings, for that contrary to their expectations, his majesty both did hold, and was like continually to run the same course which the queen before had held ; Percy presently breaks forth into this devilish speech, That there was no way but to kill the king, which he the said Percy would undertake to do. But Catesby, as being ‘versuto ingenio et profunda perfidia,’ a cunning, a wily, and a deep traitor, intending to use this so furious and fiery a spirit to a further purpose, doth as it were stroke him for his great forwardness, yet with sage and stayed counsel tells him ; No Tom, thou shalt not adventure thyself to so small purpose : If thou wilt be a traitor, there is a plot to greater advantage, and such a one as can never be discovered, viz. the Powder-treason.

In January, in the 1st year of his majesty, Garnet took out a General Pardon under the Great Seal of England of all treasons (which pardon his majesty of his grace granted to all men at his first entrance into his kingdom) under the name of Henry Garnet of London, gent. but therein he never used any of his 'alias dictus,' Walley, Farmer, or any other of his feigned names. But Catesby fearing lest any of those whom he had or should take into confederacy, being touched in conscience with the horror of so damnable a fact, might give it over, and endanger the discovery of the plot, seeks to Garnet, (as being the superior of the Jesuits, and therefore of high estimation and authority amongst all those of the Romish religion) to have his judgment and resolution in conscience, concerning the lawfulness of the fact, that thereby he might be able to give satisfaction to any who should in that behalf make doubt or scruple to go forward in that treason. And therefore Catesby coming to Garnet, propounded unto him the case, and asketh, Whether for the good and promotion of the Catholick cause against hereticks, (the necessity of time and occasion so requiring) it be lawful or not amongst many nocents to destroy and take away some innocents also. To this question Garnet advisedly and resolvedly answered, That if the advantage were greater to the Catholic part, by taking away some innocents together with many nocents, then doubtless it should be lawful to kill and destroy them all. And to this purpose he alledged a comparison of a town or city which was possessed by an enemy, if at the time of taking thereof there happen to be some few friends within the place, they must undergo the fortune of the wars in the general and common destruction of the enemy. And this resolution of Garnet, the superior of the Jesuits, was the strongest, and the only bond, whereby Catesby afterwards kept and retained all the traitors in that so abominable and detestable a confederacy; for in March following, Catesby, Thomas Winter, and others, resolve upon the Powder-Plot: and Fawkes as being a man unknown, and withal a desperate person and a soldier, was resolved upon as fit for the executing thereof, to which purpose he was in April following by Thomas Winter sought and fetched out of Flanders into England.

In May, in the 2d year of his majesty, Catesby, Percy, John Wright, Thomas Winter, and Fawkes meet: And having, upon the holy evangelists, taken an oath of secrecy and constancy to this effect:

'You shall swear by the blessed Trinity, and by the sacrament you now purpose to receive, never to disclose directly or indirectly, by word or circumstance, the matter that shall be proposed to you to keep secret, nor desist from the execution thereof, until the rest shall give you leave.'

They all were confessed, had absolution, and received thereupon the sacrament, by the hands of Gerrard the Jesuit then present.

In June following, Catesby and Greenwell the Jesuit confer about the Powder-Treason. And at Midsummer, Catesby having speech with Garnet of the Powder-Treason, they said,

That it was so secret, as that it must prevail before it could be discovered. Then Garnet seemed to desire that the Pope's consent might be obtained: but Catesby answered, That he took that as granted by the pope in the two Bulls or Briefs before; for that, said he, if it were lawful not to receive, or to repel him, as the said Bulls or Briefs did import, then is it lawful also to expel or cast him out.

Upon the 7th of July, 1604, was the parliament prorogued until the 7th of February. And in November following, Thomas Bates, being (as hath been declared more at large in the former arraignment) fetched in by Catesby, his master, to participate in the Powder-Treason, for better assurance of his secrecy, and prosecution thereof, is by Greenwell the Jesuit confessed, encouraged, and told, That being for a good cause, he might and ought, not only conceal it as committed unto him in secret by his master; but further said, That it was no offence at all, but justifiable and good.—About this time was Robert Keyes taken into the confederacy, and by Catesby resolved of the lawfulness thereof from the Jesuits.

On the 11th of December, they entered the mine: and in March following, which was in 1605, was Guy Fawkes sent over to sir William Stanley, with letters from Garnet to Baldwin the legier Jesuit there, to take order, That against the time of the blow, the forces might be brought near to the sea-side, to the end that they might suddenly be transported into England. And there doth Fawkes, by consent of the confederates, give Owen the oath of secrecy and perseverance, and then acquaints him with the whole treason: Who having been a most malicious and inveterate traitor, greatly applauded it, and gave his consent and counsel for the furtherance thereof.

In May 1605, fell out certain broils in Wales by the Romish Catholics; at what time also Rookwood was by Catesby acquainted with the Powder-Treason, and resolved of the lawfulness of the fact by him as from the Jesuits.

Now doth Garnet write to the Pope, That commandment might come from his holiness, or else from Aquaviva the general of the Jesuits, for the staying of all commotions of the Catholics here, in England, intending indeed to set their whole rest of the Catholick Romish cause upon the Powder-Plot, and in the mean time to lull us asleep in security, in respect of their dissembled quietness and conformity; as also lest impediment might be offered to this main plot by reason of any suspicion of the stirring of Papists, or of inquiry after them upon occasion of any petty commotions or broils. But when he further desired, that it might be so enjoined upon censure, that latter request was not granted, lest it might indeed be an impediment to the Powder-Plot.

In June following doth Greenwell the Jesuit consult with Garnet his superior, of the whole course of the Powder-Treason at large; wherein observe the politick and subtle dealing of this Garnet. First, he would not, as he saith, confer of it with a layman, (other than Catesby whom he so much trusted) why so? Because that might derogate from the reverence of his place, That a Jesuit and a superior of them, should openly join with laymen in cause of so much blood. And therefore, secondly, as he would consult of it with a priest and a Jesuit, one of his own order, and his subject; so for his further security, he would consult thereof with Greenwell the Jesuit, as in a disguised confession. And being informed that the discourse would be too long to repeat kneeling, he answered that he would consult with him of it in confession walking; and so accordingly in an ambulatory confession, he at large discoursed with him of the whole plot of the Powder-Treason; and that a protector, after the blow given, should be chosen out of such of the nobility as should be warned and reserved.

In this month likewise was there a great conference and consultation betwixt Garnet, Catesby, and Francis Tresham, concerning the strength of the Catholicks in England, to the end that Garnet might by letters send direct advertisement thereof to the Pope; for that his holiness would not be brought to shew his inclination concerning any commotion or rising of the Catholick party, until such time as he should be certainly informed that they had sufficient and able force to prevail.

And in August following, Garnet in a conference had about the acquainting of the Pope with the Powder-Treason, named and appointed sir Edmund Baynam for to carry that message to the pope; yet not to him as pope, but to him as a temporal prince: and by him doth Garnet write letters in that behalf; as also for staying of commotions, under pain of censures, well knowing that before his letters could be answered, the house of parliament, according to their designs, should have been blown up, and the whole state overthrown. But this trick he used like a thief, that going to steal and take partridges with a setting-dog, doth rate his dog for questing, or going too near, until he hath laid his net over them, for fear the game should be sprung, and the purpose defeated.

In this month also doth Garnet write to Baldwin the legier Jesuit in the Low-Countries, in the behalf of Catesby, that Owen should move the marquis for a regiment of horses for him the said Catesby; not with any intent, as it was agreed, that Catesby should undertake any such charge, but that under colour of it, horses and other necessaries might be provided without suspicion to furnish the traitors.

In September following doth Parsons the Jesuit write to Garnet to know the particulars of the project in hand, for the journey to St. Winifred's well in this month. It was but a jargon, to have better opportunity, by colour thereof, to confer and retire themselves to those parts.—In October doth Garnet meet the other traitors at Coughton in Warwickshire, which was the place of rendezvous, whither they resorted out of all countries.—Upon the first of November, Garnet openly prayeth for the good success of the great action, concerning the Catholick cause in the beginning of the parliament: and prayer is more than consent; for 'Nemo orat, sed qui sperat et credit.' He in the prayer used two verses of a hymn, 'Gentem auferite peridam credentium de finibus ut Christo laudes debitas persolvamus alacriter.'

Now was the Letter with the lord Montea-gle, * whose memory shall be blessed, on the 4th of November; by the providence of the Almighty, not many hours before the Treason should have been executed, was it fully discovered.

On the 5th of November, being the time when the Traitors expected that their devilish practice should have taken effect, they convened at Dunchurch, under colour of a great hunting-match, appointed by sir Everard Digby, as being a man of quality and account thereabout; purposing by this means to furnish themselves with company for their intended insurrection and rebellion: for that men being gathered together, and a tumult suddenly raised, the traitors thought that every or most of them would follow the present fortune, and be easily persuaded to take part with them; and that they might easily surprize the person of the lady Elizabeth, then being in those parts, in the lord Harrington's house.

Upon the 6th of November, early in the morning, Catesby and the said confederates dispatched Tho. Bates with a Letter to Garnet the superior of the Jesuits, who was (as they well knew) then ready at Coulton, near unto them, earnestly entreating his help and assistance for the raising of Wales, and putting so many as he could into open rebellion. At what time Garnet and Greenwell (who then of purpose was there with Garnet) then certainly perceiving that the plot was indeed discovered, and knowing themselves to be the chiefest authors thereof, prophesied the overthrow of the whole order of the Jesuits; saying, that they feared that the discovery and miscarrying of this practise, would utterly undo and overthrow the whole society of the Jesuits. But Greenwell the Jesuit being carried with a more violent and fiery spirit, posteth up and down to incite such as he could to rise up in open rebellion: and meeting in master Abington's house with Hall, another Jesuit, adviseth him the said Hall likewise to lose no time, but forthwith to seek to raise and stir up so many as he could; but Hall seeming to deliberate thereof, whether seeing no end of so rash an attempt, or fearing by that means to be himself apprehended, Tesmond told him that he was a flegmatick fellow: and said, a man may herein see the difference betwixt a flegmatick man (such as he meant Hall was) and a choleric, as he said himself was: and further added, that he was resolved to do his best endeavours for the raising of a rebellion, under this false pretext and colour, that it was concluded that the throats of all the catholics in England should be cut; so persuading himself to incite them to take arms for to stand upon their guard and defence: and with this devise he posted away into the county of Lancaster. Afterwards Hall the Jesuit, otherwise called Oldcorn, being urged by Humphrey Littleton with the evil success of their intended Treason, that surely God was displeased and offended with such bloody and barbarous courses, instead of an humble acknowledgment of the justice of God, and a sense of the wickedness of the Treason, fell rather Satanically to argue for the justification of the same: and said, Ye must not judge the cause by the event; for the eleven tribes of Israel were by God himself commanded to go and fight against Benjamin, yet were they twice overthrown: so Lewis of France fighting against the Turk, his army was scattered, and himself died of the plague: and lastly, the Christians defending of Rhodes, were by the Turks overcome. And these he applied to the Powder-Treason, and persuaded Littleton not to judge it ungodly or unlawful by the event.

Observe here a double consequent of this Powder-Treason. First, open rebellion, as hath been shewed both immediately before, and more at large in the former arraignment; and since that, blasphemy in Garnet the superior of the Jesuits; for, he having liberty in the Tower to write, and sending a letter (which letter was openly shewed in the court before him) to an acquaintance of his in the Gate-House, there was nothing therein to be seen but ordinary matter, and for certain necessities: but in the margin, which he made very great and spacious, and underneath, where there remained clean paper, he wrote cunningly with the juice of an orange, or of a lemon, to publish his innocency, and concerning his usage; and there denieth those things which before he had freely and voluntarily confessed: and said, that for the Spanish Treason, he was freed by his majesty's pardon; and as for the Powder Treason, he hoped for want of proof against him, to avoid that well enough: but concludeth blasphemously, applying the words which were spoken of our blessed Saviour, to himself in this damnable Treason, and saith, 'Necesse est ut homo moriatur pro populo: 'It is necessary that one man die for the people: which words Caiaphas spake of Christ. Wherein note his prevarication and equivocation; for before the Lords Commissioners he truly and freely confessed his Treasons, being (as himself under his own hand confesseth) overwhelmed 'tanta nube testium;' and yet 'ad faciendum populum,' in his Letters which he wrote abroad, he clearth himself of the Powder-Treason. And thus much concerning the two circumstances subsequent, which were rebellion and blasphemy.

The Circumstances concurring, are concerning the persons both offending and offended. For the principal person offending, here at the bar, he is, as you have heard, a man of many names, Garnet, Wally, Darcy, Roberts, Farmer, Philips: and surely I have not commonly known and observed a true man, that hath had so many false appellations: he is by country an Englishman, by birth a gentleman, by education a scholar, afterwards a corrector of the common law print, with Mr. Tottle the printer; and now is to be corrected by the law. He hath many gifts and endowments of nature, by art learned, a good linguist, and by profession a Jesuit, and a superior, as indeed he is superior to all his predecessors in devilish Treason; a doctor of Jesuits, that is, a doctor of five DD's, as dissimulation, deposing of princes, disposing of kingdoms, daunting and deterring of subjects, and destruction.

Their dissimulation appeareth out of their doctrine of equivocation: concerning which it was thought fit to touch something of that which was more copiously delivered in the former arraignment, in respect of the presence of Garnet there, who was the superior of the Jesuits in England, concerning the treatise of equivocation seen and allowed by Garnet, and by Blackwell the archpriest; wherein, under the pretext of the lawfulness of a mixt proposition to express one part of a man's mind, and retain another, people are indeed taught not only simple lying, but fearful and damnable blasphemy. And whereas the Jesuits ask, why we convict and condemn them not for heresy; it is for that they will equivocate, and so cannot that way be tried or judged according to their words.

Now for the antiquity of equivocation, it is indeed very old, within little more than three hundred years after Christ; used by Arius the heretick, who having in a general council been condemned, and then by the commandment of Constantine the emperor sent into exile, was by the said emperor, upon instant intercession for him, and promise of his future conformity to the Nicene faith, recalled again: who returning home, and having before craftily set down in writing his heretical belief, and put it into his bosom, when he came into the presence of the emperor, and had the Nicene faith propounded unto him, and was thereupon asked, whether he then did indeed, and so constantly would hold that faith, he (clapping his hand upon his bosom where his paper lay) answered and vowed that he did, and so would constantly profess and hold that faith (laying his hand on his bosom where the paper of his heresy lay) meaning fraudulently (by way of equivocation) that faith of his own, which he had written and carried in his bosom.

For these Jesuits, they indeed make no vow of speaking truth, and yet even this equivocating and lying is a kind of unchastity, against which they vow and promise: For as it hath been said of old, 'Cor linguæ federat natura: sanctio, veluti in quodam certo connubio: ergo cum dissonent cor et loquutio, sermo concipitur in adulterio.' That is, The law and sanction of nature, hath, as it were, married the heart and tongue, by joining and knitting of them together in a certain kind of marriage; and therefore when there is discord between them two, the speech that proceeds from them, is said to be conceived in adultery, and he that breeds such bastard-children offends against chastity.

But note the heavy and woeful fruit of this doctrine of equivocation: Francis Tresham being near his natural death in the Tower, had of charity his wife permitted, for his comfort, to come unto him: Who understanding that her husband had before directly and truly accused Garnet of the Spanish treason, lest belike her husband should depart this life with a conscience that he had revealed any thing concerning the superior of the Jesuits, a very little before he died, drew him to this; that his own hand being so feeble as that he could not write himself, yet he caused his servant then attending on him, to write that which he did dictate, and therein protested upon his salvation, That he had not seen the said Garnet of 16 years before, and thereupon prayed that his former confession to the contrary might in no wise take place; and that this paper of his retractation which he had weakly and dyingly subscribed, might, after his death, be delivered to the earl of Salisbury: Whereas master Garnet himself hath clearly confessed the Spanish treason, and now acknowledged the same at the bar; and he and Mrs. Fawkes, and others, directly confess and say, That Garnet and Tresham had, within two years space, been very often together, and also many times before: But, 'qualis vita, finis ita.' And Garnet himself, being at the bar afterwards urged to say what he thought of such the departure of Francis Tresham out of this life, answered only this; I think he meant to equivocate.

Thus were they stained with their own works, and went a whoring with their own inventions, as it is in the psalm. So that this is indeed 'Gens perfida,' according to the hymn, A perfidious people; and therefore, 'Jurat? crede minus, non jurat? credere noli. Jurat, non jurat hostis, ab hoste cave.'

For their doctrine of deposing of princes, Simeon and Philopater are plain, as hath in the former arraignment been more amply declared, and was now again at large to Garnet's face repeated: If a prince be an heretick, then is he excommunicated, cursed, and deposed; his children deprived of all their right of succession, himself not to be restored to his temporal estate upon repentance. And by an heretick, they profess, that he is intended and meant, namely, whosoever doth not hold the religion of the church of Rome. Nay, there is an easier and more expedite way than all these to fetch off the crown from off the head of any king christened whatsoever; which is this, That 'Princeps indulgendo hereticis, amittit regnum;' If any prince shall but tolerate or favour hereticks, he loseth his kingdom. Nay, whereas Garnet, in defence of this usurped power of the high-priest of Rome, alledged, 'Nos sanctorum, &c. out of the decretals; in the very next title before that, there is another decree that passeth all we have recited; wherein it is shewed, that Zachary the pope deposed Childerick of France, for nothing else there specified, 'sed quia inutilis,' but only for that he was reputed unprofitable to govern.

Now as concerning their daunting and deterring of subjects, which is a part of the Jesuits profession; it were good that they would know and remember, how that the most noble and famous kings of England never were afraid of pope's bulls, no not in the very midnight of popery, as Edward the Confessor, Henry 1, Edward 1, Richard 2, Henry 4, Henry 5, &c. And in the time of Henry 7, and in all their times, the pope's legate never passed Calais, but staid there, and came not to England, until he had taken a solemn oath to do nothing to the detriment of the crown or state.

For the Persons offended, they were these: 1. The King, of whom I have spoken often, but never enough: A king of high and most noble ancient descent, as hath been briefly declared; and in himself full of all imperial virtues, religion, justice, clemency, learning, wisdom, memory, affability, and the rest. 2. The Queen; and she, in respect of her happy fruitfulness, is a great blessing; insomuch that of her, in that respect, may be said, she is 'Ortu magna, viro major, sed maxima prole;' great in birth, greater in her marriage, but to all posterity greatest, in the blessed fruit of her womb, as having brought forth the greatest prince that ever England had. 3. The noble Prince, of whom we may say, with the poet, 'Quæ te tam læta tulere secula? Qui tanti talem genuere parentes?' Never prince, true heir-apparent to the imperial crown, had such a father, nor ever king had such a son. 4. Then the whole royal issue, the council, the nobility, the clergy, nay our religion itself, and especially this city of London, that is famous for her riches, more famous for her people, having above 500,000 souls within her and her liberties, most famous for her fidelity, and more than most famous of all the cities in the world for her true religion and service of God: Hold up thy head, noble city, and advance thyself, for that never was thy brow blotted with the least taint or touch, or suspicion of disloyalty: Thou mayest truly say with the prophet David, 'I will take no wicked thing in hand, I hate the sin of unfaithfulness, there shall no such cleave unto me.' Therefore for thy fidelity thou art honoured with the title of 'The King's Chamber,' as an inward place of his greatest safety: And for thy comfort and joy this day, hath Britain's great king honoured thee with the proceeding upon this great and honourable commission: after the heavy and doleful rumours this other day, when it was certainly known that king James was in safety, well did the fidelity of this city appear, (whereof I was an eye-witness) 'Una voce conclamaverunt omnes, salva Loadinum, salva patria, salva religio, Jacobus rex noster salvus;' 'Our city, our country, our religion is safe, for our king James is in safety.'

The Observations are many, and only in a word to be touched : 1. That in the Spanish treason before-mentioned, and this Powder-treason, there was the same Order, Cause and End. The Order was, first, to deal by secret practice and treason, and then by force and invasion. The Cause which they pretend, was the Romish Catholick Religion. The End was the final destruction of the royal succession, yea, even 'occidere regnum,' to overthrow and dissolve the whole kingdom. 2. Note, that even the enemy hath acknowledged, that our state is so settled and established, as neither strength nor stratagem can prevail, unless there be a party made in England. 3. We shall never have Bull more to come from Rome to England, because they shall never have a party strong enough to encounter with so many lions. 4. All their canons, decrees, and new-found doctrines tend to one of these two ends ; either worldly pride, or wicked policy ; for the amplitude and enlargement of the pope's authority, and for the safety of the jesuits, priests, &c. 5. Observe that Baynam, a layman, and one of the damned crew, and so naming himself, was sent to inform the pope as a temporal prince. 6. I conceive their fall to be near at hand, both by divinity and by philosophy. For the first, there are now in England about 400 priests : so many were there in Israel in the days of Ahab ; 'Who,' saith God, 'shall go and deceive Ahab, that he may fall?' A lying spirit in the mouths of his 400 prophets undertook and effected it ; their fall was near, when once a lying spirit had possessed the priests, according to the vision of Micheas, as it now hath possessed the Jesuits : 3dly, the imitation of good for the most part comes short of the pattern ; but the imitation of evil ever exceeds the example. Now no imitation can exceed this fact, and therefore their time is at an end. 7. Many condemn it now, that would have commended it, if it had taken effect ; for this, say they, is 'E numero eorum quae non laudantur nisi peracta.' 8. They and their adherents spread abroad false rumours ; as that the king should have broken promise with them concerning toleration : which mixture of God's service, rather than he would suffer, he would lose children, crown, life, and all. Nay, they may see there is no such hope left, for that his majesty bringeth up his royal issue in the true religion and service of the Almighty.

Lastly ; Observe the wonderful Providence of God in the admirable Discovery of this Superior Jesuit to be party to this Treason ; and that in two respects : 1. In respect of the means of secrecy, used by him in conference only with Catesby of the laity. 2. They had a strong and a deep oath given them both for secrecy and perseverance. 3. They hereupon received the holy Sacrament. 4. They were allowed and taught by the Jesuits, to equivocate upon oath, salvation or otherwise : and how then should it be discovered ? 5. Their secret intelligence was such, as that it was impossible by the wit of man to be found out. And therefore,

2. The second thing is, How this Treason being long sithence plotted, the Providence of God did continually from time to time divert and put off the executing thereof, by unexpected putting off the times of assembly in parliament. For the parliament began the 19th of March, in the first year of his majesty's reign, and continued till the 7th of July following, before which time the conspirators could not be ready : from thence it was prorogued until the 7th of Feb. against which time they could not make the mine ready, in respect that they could not dig there, for that the commissioners of the union sat near the place, and the wall was thick, and therefore they could not be provided before the 7th of Feb. ; and on the 7th of Feb. the parliament was prorogued until the 5th of October. After this, they found another course, and altered the place from the mine to the cellar. O blessed change of so wicked a work ! Oh ! but these fatal engineers are not yet discovered, and yet all things are prepared. Oh prorogue it once more ! And accordingly, God put it into his majesty's heart (having then not the least suspicion of any such matter) to prorogue the parliament ; and further, to open and enlighten his understanding, out of a mystical and dark letter, like an angel of God, to point to the cellar, and command that to be searched ; so that it was discovered thus miraculously, but even a few hours before the design should have been executed.

The Conclusion thereof shall be this ; 'Qui cum Jesu itis, non itis cum Jesuitis.' For, 'They encourage themselves in mischief, and commune among themselves secretly, how they may lay snares, and say, that no man shall see them. But God shall suddenly shoot at them with a swift arrow, that they shall be wounded : insomuch that whoso seeth it shall say, this hath God done ; for they shall perceive that it is his work.'

Then were repeated the proofs for every of the particular accusations aforesaid, by the express and voluntary confessions of Garnet, and of his complices themselves, and of two credible witnesses sworn at the bar, and openly heard viva voce, and acknowledged by Garnet himself to be men without exception.

Then Mr. Garnet having licence of the court to answer what he could for himself, spake, and divided all which had been objected, to his remembrance, into four parts, viz. Containing matter of, 1st, Doctrine. 2dly, Recusants. 3dly, Jesuits in general. 4thly, Himself in particular.

1st, In Doctrine, he remembered two points : 1. Concerning Equivocation : whereunto he answered, That their church condemned all lying, but especially if it be in cause of religion and faith, that being the most pernicious lye of all others, and by St. Augustine condemned in the Priscillianists : nay, to lye in any cause is held a sin and evil ; howsoever of eight degrees which St. Augustine maketh, the lowest indeed is to lye for to procure the good of some, without hurting of any. So then our equivocation is not to maintain lying, but to defend the use of certain propositions: for a man may be asked of one, who hath no authority to interrogate, or examined concerning something which belongeth not to his cognizance who asketh, as what a man thinketh, &c. So then no man may equivocate, when he ought to tell the truth, otherwise he may. And so St. Augustine upon John saith, That Christ denied he knew the day of judgment, viz. with purpose to tell it to his disciples; and so St. Thomas and others who handle this matter, chiefly under the title of Confession.

2. For the second point, which was the power of the pope in deposing of princes, his Answer was threefold. 1. That therein he only propounded and followed the general doctrine of the church. 2. That this doctrine of the power of the pope, was by all other Catholick princes tolerated without grievance. 3. That yet for his own part, he always made a difference in the matter of excommunicating and deposing of princes, betwixt the condition and state of our king and of others, who having sometimes been Catholicks, did or shall afterwards fall back. As for Simanca, and other writers, whatsoever they set down of the deposing of hereticks, it is to be understood of those princes, who, having sometimes professed the faith of the Church of Rome, do afterwards make a defection from the same.

3dly, For Recusants; 1. I desire them not to impute any offence or crime of mine, to the prejudice of the cause of religion. 2. Concerning their not going to church; whereas it was urged by Mr. Attorney, that the ground of their not going to church, was the excommunication and Bull of Pius Quintus; and that now they may go, for that his majesty is not denounced excommunicate: I answer, That it followeth not; for the Arians and Catholicks had the same service in their churches, yet came they not together; and I know divers myself, who, before that Bull, refused to go to church all the time of queen Elizabeth, though perhaps most Catholicks did indeed go to church before. It was about the end of the council of Trent, where this matter was discussed by twelve learned men, and concluded not lawful. And this was occasioned, for that Calvin himself held it not lawful for any Protestant to be present, not only at our mass, wherein perhaps they may say there is idolatry, but not at our even-song, being the same with theirs.

3dly, Concerning the Jesuits, he said, That if any were privy to such horrible treasons, it was impious, especially in men of their profession; but said, that he talked with some of them about it, and that they denied it.

4thly, Touching myself, The Negotiation into Spain was indeed propounded unto me, and I was also acquainted with the negotiation for money, but ever intended it should be bestowed for the relief of poor Catholicks: but when they were there, they moved for an army; which when they afterwards acquainted me withal, I misliked it, and said, it would be much disliked at Rome: only I must needs confess I did conceal it after the example of Christ, who commands us, when our brother offends, to reprove him, for if he do amend, we have gained him; yet I must needs confess, that the laws made against such concealing, are very good and just, for it is not fit the safety of a prince should depend upon any other man's conscience. So that I am verily persuaded, if they yielded to me, it had been good: but what their intent and meaning was, in desiring an army, I knew not, and I was charged not to meddle therein, nor not with the money which was to be sent for pensions, though it was to maintain the Title of the king.

The Earl of Salisbury then demanded, To maintain whose Title?

The earl of Northampton asked him, Why he did not oppose himself against it, and forbid it, as he might have done? For 'Qui cum possit non prohibet, jubet.'

Whereupon Garnet answered, That he might not do it: and for sending of letters, and commending some persons thereby, he confessed he did it often, as they were commended to him without knowing either their purposes, or some of their persons; for he never knew Mr. Wright, for whom he writ.

The earl of Salisbury then replied to Garnet, I must now remember you, how little any of your answers can make for your purpose, when you would seek to colour your dealing with Baynam, by professing to write to Rome to procure a countermand of conspiracies; and yet you know, when he took his journey towards Rome, the blow must needs have been passed, before the time he could have arrived to the pope's presence, (such being your zeal and his haste for any such prevention) as it was about the 20th of our October when he passed by Florence towards Rome.

To which Garnet made no great answer, but let it pass: and then went on with his Defence of sending Letters in commendation of many of those with which he had been formerly charged, and so confessed that he had written commendation of Fawkes, thinking that he went to serve as a soldier, not knowing then of any other purpose he had in hand. And as for sir Edmund Baynam, what he or Mr. Catesby intended, he knew not in particular; only Mr. Catesby asked him in general, the question of the lawfulness to destroy innocents with no-cents, as had been before objected against him; which at first, I thought, said Garnet, had been an idle question, though afterwards I did verily think, he intended something that was not good. Whereupon having shortly after this, received letters from Rome, to prohibit all insurrections intended by Catholicks, which might perturb this state; Garnet informed Catesby thereof, and told him, That if he proceeded against the pope's will, he could not prevail: but Catesby refused and said, he would not take notice of the pope's pleasure by him. Notwithstanding, he shewed to Catesby the general letter which he had received from Rome, but said he would inform the pope, and tell Garnet also in particular, what attempt he had in hand, if he would hear it; which afterwards he offered to do, but Garnet refused to hear him, and at two several times requested him to certify the pope what he intended to do.

And when sir Edmund Baynam (as he pretended) was to go over into Flanders for a soldier, Garnet thought good to send him to the pope's nuncio, and to commend him to other friends of his, that they should send him to inform the pope of the distressed estate of Catholicicks in England: the rather, that the pope having a lay-man there, might be acquainted with all their proceedings; and that Baynam might then learn of the pope, what course he would advise the Catholicicks in England to take for their own good: but wished Baynam in no case to use Garnet's name to the nuncio in that behalf.

Then were the two Witnesses called for; both of them persons of good estimation, that over-heard the interlocution betwixt Garnet and Hall the Jesuit, viz. Mr. Fauset a man learned and a justice of peace, and Mr. Lockerson. But Mr. Fauset being not present, was sent for to appear; and in the mean time Mr. Lockerson, who being deposed before Garnet, delivered upon his oath, that they heard Garnet say to Hall, They will charge me with my Prayer for the good success of the great action, in the beginning of the Parliament, and with the Verses which I added in the end of my Prayer:

- ' Gentem auferte perfidam
- ' Credientium de finibus,
- ' Ut Christo laudes debitas
- ' Persolvamus alacriter.

It is true, indeed, said Garnet, that I prayed for the good success of that great action; but I will tell them, that I meant it in respect of some sharper laws, which I feared they would then make against Catholicicks; and that answer shall serve well enough.

Here Garnet replied, that for the two gentlemen that heard the Interlocution, he would not charge them with perjury, because he knew them to be honest men; yet he thought they did mistake some things, though in the substantial parts, he confessed, he could not deny their relation. And for the main Plot, he confessed, that he was therewithal acquainted by Greenwell particularly; and that Greenwell came perplexed unto him to open something, which Mr. Catesby with divers others intended: to whom he said, He was contented to hear by him what it was, so as he would not be known to Mr. Catesby, or to any other, that he was made privy to it. Whereupon father Greenwell told him the whole Plot, and all the particulars thereof, with which he protested that he was very much distempered, and could never sleep quietly afterwards, but sometimes prayed to God, that it should not take effect.

To that the earl of Salisbury replied, That he should do well to speak clearly of his devotion in that point; for otherwise he must put him in remembrance, that he had confessed to the lords, that he had offered sacrifice to God for stay of that plot, unless it were for the good of the Catholic cause; and in no other fashion (said his lordship) was this state beholden to you for your masses and oblations. Adding thus much farther, That he wondered why he would not write to his superior Aquaviva, as well of this particular Powder-Trenson, as to procure prohibition for other smaller matters.

Garnet faintly answered, he might not disclose it to any, because it was matter of secret confession, and would endanger the life of divers men.

Whereunto the earl of Northampton replied, That that matter of confession, which before he refused to confess, because he would save lives, he confessed it now to endanger his own life; and therefore his former answer was idle and frivolous.

Then Garnet told the lords, That he commanded Greenwell to dissuade Catesby, which he thought he did; and if Catesby had come to him upon Allhallow-day, he thought he could so far have ruled him, as he would have been persuaded to desist.

Then said the earl of Salisbury, Why did you refuse to hear Catesby tell you all the particulars, when he would have told you, if you had been desirous to prevent it?

Garnet replied, That after Greenwell had told him what it was which Catesby intended, and that he called to mind what Catesby said to him, at his first breaking with him in general terms, his soul was so troubled with mislike of that particular, as he was loth to hear any more of it.

Well then, said the earl of Salisbury, you see his heart: and then turning to the Lords Commissioners, he desired leave of them, that he might use some speech concerning the proceeding of the state in this great cause, from the first beginning until that hour; and so began to this effect: That although the evidence had been so well distributed and opened by Mr. Attorney, as he had never heard such a mass of matter better contracted, nor made more intelligible to the Jury, to whom it was not his part to speak, nor his purpose to meddle with Mr. Garnet in divinity, or in the doctrine of equivocation, in which latter he saw how he had played his master-prize; yet because he had been particularly used in this service with other of the Lords Commissioners, by whom nothing was more desired, next the glory of God, than to demonstrate to the world, with what sincerity and moderation his majesty's justice was carried in all points, he would be bold to say somewhat of the manner of this arraignment, and of the place where it was appointed. For the first, he said, That seeing there was nothing to which this state might more attribute the infinite goodness and blessings of God, than to the protection of the true religion, which had groaned so long under the bitter persecutions of men of his profession; he confessed, that he held himself greatly honoured, to be an assistant amongst so many great lords at the seat of justice, where God's cause should receive so much honour, by discrediting the person of Garnet, on whom the common adversary had thought to confer the usurpation of such an eminent jurisdiction: for otherwise, who did not know, that the quality of poor Henry Garnet might have undergone a more ordinary form of trial, and haply in some other place of less note and observation? And so his lordship took an occasion to declare, That the city of London was so dear to the king, and his majesty so desirous to give it all honour and comfort, as when this opportunity was put into his hands, whereby there might be made so visible an anatomy of popish doctrine, from whence these treasons have their source and support, he thought he could not chuse a fitter stage than the city of London, which was not only rightly termed, 'The Chamber of his Empire,' but was by his majesty esteemed as his greatest and safest treasury; who accounteth no riches comparable to his subjects hearts, and acknowledgeth that such a circuit did never contain so many faithful subjects within the walls: a matter well appearing to his own eyes amongst others, upon the decease of the late queen of precious memory, when he attending most of the peers and privy-counsellors of this kingdom, who were accompanied with no small number of noble and faithful gentlemen, had seen them all stayed from entry within the gates of this city, until they had publickly declared with one voice, that they would live and die with the king our sovereign lord. To you, therefore, Mr. Garnet, (said the earl of Salisbury) must I address myself, as the man in whom it appeareth best what horrible treasons have been covered under the mantle of religion, which heretofore had been petty treason for a Protestant to have affirmed. Such hath been the iniquity of false tongues, who have always sought to prove the truth a lyar. Of which impudent calumnies the state is so tender, as you do best know, Mr. Garnet, that since your apprehension, even till this day, you have been as christianly, as courteously, and as carefully used, as ever man could be, of any quality, or any profession: yea, it may truly be said, that you have been as well attended for health or otherwise, as a nurse-child. Is it true or no, said the earl?

It is most true, my lord, said Garnet, I confess it.

Well then, said the earl, if your strange doctrine of Equivocation be observed, and your hardness of heart to deny all things; let it not be forgotten, that this interlocution of yours with Hall, over-heard by others, appears to be digitus Dei: for thereby had the lords some light, and proof of matter against you, which must have been discovered otherwise by violence and coercion, a matter ordinary in other kingdoms, though now forborn here: but it is better as it is, for the honour of the state, for so were your own words, that you thought it best to tell the truth at last, when you saw you were confounded tanta nubetestium. In which I protest, that I do confidently assure myself, that you would as easily have confessed yourself to be the author of all the action, as the concealer, but that his majesty and my lords were well contented to draw all from you without racking, or any such bitter torments.

Then speaking to Garnet, he said; I pray you, Mr. Garnet, what encouraged Catesby that he might proceed, but your resolving him in the first proposition? What warranted Fawkes, but Catesby's explication of Garnet's arguments? as appears infallibly by Winter's confession, and by Fawkes, that they knew the point had been resolved to Mr. Catesby, by the best authority.

Then Garnet answered, That Mr. Catesby was to blame to make such application.

To that the Earl replied, That he must needs be bold with him, to drive him from the trust he had, to satisfy the world by his denials, by putting him in mind, how after the interlocution betwixt him and Hall, when he was called before all the lords, and was asked, not what he said, but whether Hall and he had conference together, desiring him not to equivocate; how stiffly he denied it upon his soul, reiterating it with so many detestable execrations, as the earl said, it wounded their hearts to hear him; and yet as soon as Hall had confessed it, he grew ashamed, cried the Lord's mercy, and said, he had offended, if equivocation did not help him.

To this Garnet answered, That when one is asked a question before a magistrate, he was not bound to answer before some witnesses he produced against him, 'Quia nemo tenetur prodere seipsum.' Then Garnet falling into some professions of his well-wishing to his majesty, and being put in mind of the answer he made concerning the excommunication of kings, wherein he referred himself to the canon of 'Nos Sanctorum,' he answered, that his majesty was not yet excommunicated.

Then the earl of Salisbury bade him deal plainly, for now was the time, Whether in case the pope, per sententiam orthodoxum, should excommunicate the king's majesty of Great Britain, his subjects were bound to continue their obedience. To this Garnet denied to answer.

From that matter he began to make request, That where he had confessed the receiving of two briefs or bulls from the pope, in the queen's time, by which all Catholicks were forbidden to adhere to any successor that was not obedient to the church of Rome, his majesty would be pleased to make a favourable interpretation, because he had shewed them to very few Catholicks in England, in the queen's time; and when he understood that the pope had changed his mind, then he burnt the bulls.

To that it was said, That belike the pope changed his mind, when the king was so safely possessed of his estate, and Garnet with his complices began to feel their own impiety, and so as Catesby said to Percy, did resolve roundly of that Treason, which would speed all at once.

Then Garnet began to use some Speeches, that he was not consenting to the Powder-Treason. Whereupon the earl of Salisbury said, Mr. Garnet, give me but one argument that you were not consenting to it, that can hold in any indifferent man's ear or sense, besides your bare negative. But Garnet replied not.

Then Mr. Attorney-General spake in answer to Garnet more particularly, to this effect.

1. For Equivocation, it is true indeed, that they do outwardly to the world condemn lying and perjury, because the contrary were too palpable, and would make them odious to all men: But it is open and broad lying and forswearing, not secret and close lying and perjury, or swearing a falsehood, which is most abominable, and without defence or example. And if they allow it not generally in others, yet at least in themselves, their confederates and associates in treasonable practices they will both warrant and defend it, especially when it may serve their turn for such purposes and ends as they look after.

2. Concerning the usurped power of the pope in deposing of princes; neither is it the general doctrine of the church, as he falsely said, neither allowed or tolerated by all princes, who are otherwise of their religion, as may appear out of the French discourse written to the French king against the re-admitting of the Jesuitical faction. And whereas he would pick-a-thanke in seeming to spare and exempt king James our sovereign, it is not possible to avoid their distinction of being excommunicated de jure if not de facto, howsoever it be true also, that the pope doth de facto curse all hereticks. For recusants not going to church, the example of the Catholicks not joining in service and prayer with the Arians, who denied a main article of the Christian creed, doth no ways hold, neither can it agree to us, of whom no such impious blasphemy can be shewed or imagined. That Garnet said, he knew some, who before the bull came, went not to church, it may be true perhaps in some one or two perverted and perverse men like himself; but whereas he produced the council of Trent, as if there the matter had been determined, and thereupon inferreth, that after that all Romish Catholicks refused to meet with us at Church in time of prayer, it is a gross error: for the last session of that council was in the year of our Lord 1563, which was in the fifth year of queen Elizabeth; whereas I shewed, and am able to justify and prove, That their Romish English Catholicks came to our service in our churches until the nineteenth year of her majesty, which was many years after that council was ended.

Concerning Garnet himself; 1st, For that answer of his, That he knew of the Powder-

Treason by confession, it is true which before was spoken, that such acts as this is, Non laudantur nisi peracta, are then only commended, when they are performed: but otherwise, first, Greenwell's was no sacramental confession, for that the confitent was not penitent: nay, himself hath clearly delivered under his hand that the Powder-Treason was told him, not as a fault, but by way of consultation and advice. 2dly, It was a future thing to be done, and not already then executed. 3dly, Greenwell told it not of himself; that he should do it, but of Fawkes, Percy, Catesby, Winter, and others; and therefore he ought to have discovered them, for that they were no confitents. 4thly, He might and ought to have discovered the mischief, for preservation of the state, though he had concealed the persons. 5thly, Catesby told it unto him extra confessionem, out of confession; saying, they might as well turn him out, as have kept him out. Lastly, By the common law, howsoever it were (it being crimen lese Majestatis) he ought to have disclosed it.

Now, for that Garnet denied that he was a principal author and procurer of this Treason, but only that he had received knowledge thereof; the contrary is clear and manifest, both out of his own confessions, by himself acknowledged, and apparently proved, in that he resolved Catesby concerning the lawfulness and merit thereof, and that he prayed for the good success of the Powder-Treason, which is more than either consultation or consent. Besides, he must remember him of the old versicle, 'Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest consentire videtur.' Garnet might have commanded Greenwell, that told him of the Powder-Treason, to have desisted, but did not: But Greenwell went still on with the Treason, and when it was disclosed, went into the country to move rebellion, which doubtless he would never have done, if Garnet had forbidden him; therefore, he said, he might say with the orator Tully, 'Cui adsunt testimonia rerum, quid opus, est verbis?' Moreover, Mr. Attorney added, how Garnet writ first for Thomas Winter, then for Kit Wright, after that for Guy Fawkes, then for sir Edward Baynam, and afterwards for Catesby, for a regiment of horse; and that Garnet was for the Infanta, and by his briefs intended to keep out the king, except he should tolerate and swear to maintain the Romish religion.

Then Mr. Attorney spake of the Interlocution betwixt Garnet and Hall, and said, That in all their speeches they never named God, nor confessed their innocency: But as soon as they spake together, Hall spake first; and then Garnet said he suspected one, whose name they that were set to overhear them, could not hear, to have disclosed something against them: But it may be otherwise, for he said he was much subject to that frailty of suspicion. He said he received a note from Rookwood, that Greenwell was gone over seas; and another, that Gerrard was gone to father Parsons, and that mistress Ann was in town, meaning mistress Ann Fawkes, and many other things were by them uttered in that conference.

By this time came in Mr. Forset, who being deposed, affirmed likewise, that their Examination, and the matter therein contained, were true: saying further, that both of them took notes of that which they heard from Garnet and Hall, as near as possibly they could, and set down nothing in their Examinations, but those things, wherein both their notes and perfect memories agreed and assented; and that many things that were very material, and of great moment, were left out of their examinations, because both their notes and memories did not perfectly agree therein.

And now one of the Letters, which were written with sack, was shewed to the court; by which appeared that Hall and Garnet had interlocution together. Mr. Attorney here inferred that the necessary end of justice was ut panu ad paucos, metus ad omnes perveniat; and urged the Examination of Garnet, wherein he confessed that when Tesmond alias Greenwell, made relation to him of the great blow by the Powder-Treason, who should have the protection, Greenwell said, the lords that should be left alive should chuse a Protector. And further, Mr. Attorney urged the writing of another letter, written with sack, to Sayer alias Rookwood, a priest in the Gatehouse: But of this point much is formerly mentioned.

Here Mr. Attorney ending, my lord of Northampton spake to the prisoner this Speech following:

Earl of Northampton. Though no man alive can be less apt or willing than myself, to add the least grain or scruple of improvement to the weight of any man's calamity, that groans under the heavy burden of a distressed state, Vel gravatis addere gravamina, whereof I have as many witnesses as the world hath eyes; yet as the case stands now in this Trial, Mr. Garnet, between my dear sovereign, ex cuius spiritu, as one said of Alexander, nos omnes spiritum ducimus; and you that were so well content, to let the course of conspiracy run forward to the stopping of this breath before the time, which God by nature doth prescribe, between his honour and your error, his just proceedings and your painted shews, his sincerity and your hypocrisy; I could wish it possible that in any person of some other quality, you might hear the echoes of your unperfect and weak answers, and thereupon judge more indifferently and evenly of the true state of the cause than you have done hitherto; being distracted with fear, or forestalled by prejudice, or, to borrow your own phrase, which is more proper to the point than any I can use, oppressed tanta nube testium, with so thick a cloud of witnesses, as concur with one voice, heart, and spirit, for the confusion of your audacity.

I confess that never any man in your state gave less hold or advantage to examiners, than you have done in the whole course of proceeding to us that were in Commission; sometime by forswearing, as upon the Confession of Hall your fellow; sometime by dissembling, as about the places of your rendezvous, which was the Lapwing's Nest; sometime by earnest expostulation; sometime by artificial equivocation; sometime by sophisticating true substances; sometime by adding false qualities; yet ut suprest, as may appear, to the defeat of your inventions, and the defence of the king's majesty, quia magna est veritas, et prevalet.

Your parts by nature simply considered and in another person, would rather move compassion, than exasperate humanity; for whom would not the ruin of such a person touch, as is in appearance temperate, and in understanding ripe? But our end at this time is the same with Decius in Livy, ut quem vos obrutum reliquistis ignem, &c. that we may quench that fire by prevention, which you have only raked up in ashes; ut novum daret incendium, that it might cause a new combustion so soon as it might hit upon matter that were fit and suitable. Wherefore I must rather draw your answers to the true touch for discharge of rumors, than verberare aërem, beat the air: For the substance of all your evasions and sly shifts, is as the inn-keeper of Chalvus confessed of his dishes to his guests, admiring tantam ferculorum diversitatem, that they were only compounded of pork, howsoever your fine cookery may vary them.

The two Bulls that in the late queen's time entered the land (with a purpose by their loud lowing to call all their calves together, for the making of a strong party, at the shutting up of the evening, against your dread sovereign) were grazed in your pastures, Mr. Garnet; or to speak more properly (because they durst neither endure the light, nor admit the air) they were stall-fed at your crib, as yourself confess; and therefore serve nequam, ex ore tuo te judico. And what answer make you to this? Marry, that the purpose was imparted to very few; so much the worse: For out of publication grows discovery; and yet experience hath justified, that those very few were the very souls and spirits of that pack of conspirators, and such as for want of patience and temperance to tarry the time, when the game had been brought to bearing, should have played the chiefest parts in the late smoaking tragedy. You say the Bulls were after sacrificed in the fire by yourself: But not before the king's good angel had cut their throats, and the best part of their proof were past, and your hopes dead of that good which in likelihood they should have brought with them. For to what use could these dumb beasts serve, in seeking to prevent that lawful and undoubted right, which heaven had now proclaimed, and earth acknowledged? But let the proof be what it will, I look into the root. I wonder, Mr. Garnet, what apostle warrants you in undertaking wicked Plots, in hope that good may follow; neglecting what all laws, and the laws of England above all, what all states and nations conclude of men, that slyly practise and combine for anticipation of the future rights of lawful successors.

In excuse of Letters written with your own hand by Thomas Winter to father Creswell, when he was employed about the procurement of an army to invade with supplies of treasure proportionable for the quicker execution of so desperate an enterprize; you answer, that the persons were commended in your letters, not the plot: spectatum admissi, risum teneatis, amici? as though the minister had any other errand or instruction, than the main plot itself: as though you, Mr. Garnet, being then Magister in Israel and Rector Chori, could or would be ignorant of their prefixed end; as though so grave a person as yourself, were likely to set his hand to blanks like a baby, and to leave the rest to the disposition of a man wholly transported with fiery humours: Or, as though in this very point other men's confessions in particular, besides your own in generality, had not left us marks and traces evident and plain enough to descry doubleness with diversity. You confess privy to a practice, but not for an army; foreknowledge of a course for getting treasure, but with a purpose, as you conceived, to employ it wholly for the relief of catholics. So as the reason of the reservedness of Catesby, Winter, and the rest toward you, must be undoubtedly their suspicion of your over great affection and duty to the queen: For otherwise it is certain they would have trusted you as well with their intention, as with their means; with their hopes, as with their instruments; especially considering how hard it was for them to compass their own vast desires, without help both of your credit, and of your industry.

Wright was in like manner, and with like expedition, commended by you afterward for the quickening of Winter's project, if any life were in it, upon the slacking of the passions of Spain, with the propositions of peace, that no time might be lost, no stone left unremoved that might give a knock to the peace of our policy; your head wrought upon all offers, your head walked in all regions, your spirit steered all attempts and undertakings: and yet if protestations, qualified and protected by equivocations, may carry weight, all this while your mind was, as good pastors ought to be, patient, your thoughts were obedient, and your counsels innocent. But now to search your cunning somewhat nearer to the quick, we must observe, that when your hopes of invasion began to cool by likelihood of peace, your desires of supplies by the cold answers that came from Spain, your expectation of new mischief, to be wrought at home without complots abroad; when malice itself was cast into so desperate a swoon, as neither Rosasolis when Spain relented, nor Iscobah when Tyrone submitted, nor dissension within the kingdom when discontentments ended, could put it by any fresh adventure into life; when you for your own part, Mr. Garnet, having been once washed and regenerated in the fountain of the king's free pardon, from the leprous spots of former treasons, were determined to begin upon another stock, and return as a dog to the vomit: though washing can avail no man (as the preacher warns) that iterum tangit mortuum, toucheth the dead the second or third time after he hath been made clean; for secretly Catesby resorts to you, as Mahomet might to Sergius, for now I speak according to the matter, and not the men, to enquire whether it were lawful, considering the necessity of the time, to undertake an enterprize for the advancement of the Catholic religion, though it were likely that among many that were nocent, some should perish that were innocent. A man that is religious in any kind, or but morally honest in his own kind; would expect that a priest, a Jesuit, (which title doth imply salvation, and not destruction; nay the Superior of English Jesuits) upon this rash demand, should have resorted for a safe resolution to God's own book; where he should have found that God was pleased to withdraw his wrathful hand from Sodom, so as there had been only decem justi, ten just men within that town, and for their sakes; that the wise householder in St. Mauhew, marking how hard it would be before the corn was ripe to make separation, gave order to his servants to abstain from plucking up the tares, ne simul eradicarent triticum, lest withal they plucked up the wheat by the roots. Ye should have found in the stories of the church, that the godly bishops in the first spring of religion, suspended process against the Priscillian heretics, ne Catholici cum illis perirent, lest the Catholics might also perish with them. And the church of Milan taxed Theodosius the emperor, quod insonites una cum scitibus trucidasset, that he had proceeded both against the guilty and the guiltless with one stroke, and in one measure of severity. But far beside the warrant either of holy writ, or holy precedents, your answer, Mr. Garnet, was such, as I both abhor to think, and quake to utter; that if any great advantage were to grow to the church this way, they might destroy them all.

Tantene animis caelestibus ira? O Mr. Garnet, be not offended though I ask of you, as a worthy emperor did once of a traitor in a case by many degrees inferior to this, Quid facit in peccatore humano lupi feritas, canis rubies, serpentis venenum? But that which ought most to torture and afflict the spirit (if you be the child of him whose name and badge you bear) is, that your doctrine was confidently delivered, and so speedily digested, and converted to nutriment from such a mouth as yours, considering that (according to the prophet) knowledge should depend upon the lips of a priest, as Rookwood, Bates, and others, that did shrink at the horror of the project when it was first laid down, received satisfaction upon the very sound of your assent, though masked with the title of a man, as grave and learned as any in the land. And Catesby doubting of the fickleness of men's affections, in cases that concern the soul, used your admittance as a charm or spell, to keep quick spirits within the circle of combined faith; which otherwise perhaps, when hell brake loose, would have sought liberty. Your charter only (whereupon I beseech you for your own soul's health, to meditate for the time you tarry in this world) for the base whereon some grounded their bad conscience in proceeding with this plot, not only to the destruction of their bodies, but to the peril of their souls, without sound and true repentance, which by the merit of Christ's Passion will serve in quacunq; hora peccator ingemuerit. For though Christ were joyful that he had not lost one of those whom his father gave him in charge, and came to save and not to destroy; yet your advice was to destroy them all: such was your burning charity!

Some man surprized with a question upon the sudden, might answer sharply and shrewdly at some time, I confess, without thinking or intending ill: but this man, Mr. Garnet, cannot be you, that have confessed clearly under your own hand, your suspicion and fear of some mischief purposed and intended in their hearts, by this quick question of nocents and innocents: and therefore quod dubitas ne feceris. It seems the heart of Catesby was a fertile soil for sprouting of stinking weeds hastily, into which the seed of your securing confidence was cast. For the Powder Plot, which in January was barely embryo, became formatus fetus in the March next following; it quickened the next December, when the pioneers began to dig in the thick wall: Catesby not long after imparted his conceit secretly to you of the great likelihood he foresaw of a lucky time of birth; and thereupon was Guy Fawkes sent over by your knowledge and encouragement, to deal with sir William Stanley, about the drawing down of forces somewhat nearer to the sea side for speedy transport, which if need were, might carry torches at the solemnity. But what is your answer to this employment of Guy Fawkes? Forsooth, that your purpose was only to commend him as a soldier, but not as a conspirator. O unlucky treason, that comes to be excused by so poor an advocate! when Fawkes himself meant nothing less than to be a soldier, having so strange a part to play soon after in the Powder Train, but used this retreat as a colour to disguise the secret purpose that did only tarry time, and to eschew those watchful eyes, that nearer hand would have observed both his inlets and his outlets in that place more narrowly. The point is clear, the confessions are direct, the purpose is palpable. All the lines of your level are drawn to the center of the Powder-mine. All letters are either drawn or interlined manu scorpionis, to use the word of Hierome; and yet under pain of censure we must believe, That all this while you were in charity, because all this while (which it grieves me to remember) you were not afraid to communicate.

But now to weigh your Answers that concern the Powder-Plot itself; which is paramount in respect of the longitude and latitude to all that have been or ever shall be: yourself cannot deny, Mr. Garnet, that Greenwell's overture, as you say in confession, coming after the notice which you took of Catesby's question about innocents, was but a fruit of your own doctrine, an effect of your own instruction, and a conclusion drawn wholly out of your own propositions and principles. Now when we press to know what reason drew you to the concealment of a project so pernicious both to prince and state, without revealing it either to the king himself, tanquam precellenti, to use St. Peter's term, or to his ministers subordinate; you start to the shift of confession for a formal help, which comes too short in respect of Catesby's first discovery, which your own words aver plainly to have wrought with you. I will not argue in this place what course a confessor should take, or how far he ought to strain for the securing of a prince's life, that otherwise is sure to perish by the rage and ignorance invincible of a base villain, (whose life answers not in value the least hair of a prince's head) because time suffers not: but I am sure that for a matter of less weight than this, and a crime of less importance than the life both of prince and state; confession received a deep wound for a long time, more than a thousand years past, in the church of Constantinople. For God forbid that matters of such weight should hang by such feeble threads. But to this excuse of tenderness in the point of confession, I would answer by making a great doubt, Whether this course of conference were a confession or not; for against your bare words, which equivocation supports, I object some likelihood, That since you kneeled sometimes, and sometimes walked up and down; since matter of conspiracy were interlaced with matter of confession, not for ease of conscience as should appear, but for advice in execution; since Greenwell was absolved instantly, which excludes the shift of reference: and Greenwell should be found to lye to the holy Ghost in case this were a true confession: in promising, Mr. Garnet, as you say, to dissuade the project which he prosecuted even to the last point, as is evident, and after the powder camp brake up: I conclude that tho' this discovery were by confession, yet it was no supersedeas to your former knowledge from Catesby your trusty friend; and if it were none, then it can be no protection for faith petrified. What need we seek light through cobweb-lawns, when the drift of your whole device in seeking to conclude from one, what you learned of another, and from all what you affected and abetted in your heart, doth evidently prove your counsels to have been carried along with such a temper of reservedness, as whensoever mischief should be brought to light, the world might rather wonder at your caution, than commend your fidelity.

By shaping such weak Answers to Demonstrations so manifest, you must either work by the ring of Gyges, in making your audacity and presumption invisible, or hold a very weak conceit of our capacities, in supposing that they can be either dazzled or deluded by such poor sophistry. For though you pretend to have received a deep wound in conscience at the first revealing of the plot, to have lost your sleep with vexation of spirit, to have offered and prayed to God for his preventing grace, to have required Greenwell's help and furtherance in crossing and diverting the design; yet all this while you suffered the project to proceed, you helped and assisted their endeavours that were labourers, you wrote earnest letters both to Baldwin and to Creswell for their furtherance of ordinary means; you gave order for a prayer to be said by Catholics for their prosperous success; you kept measure with the two first dimensions of fryar Bacon's brazen-head; Time is, Time was, till, thanks be to God, the third Time was past: you had ever an ear open to listen for the crack, and were in the same agony for the Powder-Plot, that Charles 5 was for the pope's dress, giving order in all his dominions, that prayers should be made for his release, when in the mean time he kept and held him in his own hand prisoner. The least word of your mouth, or labour of your pen, might have secured both prince and state, while you pretend to have broken both your sleeps and your brains, and that with a greater advantage to the cause which you would advance, than can ever grow by combustion and conspiracy. But your tenderness herein was suitable with another dutiful desire of yours to dissuade Catesby from the plot, at his coming into Warwickshire, who never meant to come thither, but as to the rendezvous, when the parliament had been blown up, and the storm had been blown over. It may be that your mind was perplexed and disquieted upon the meditation of strange events; for so was the mind of Cain, Achitophel, and Judas that betrayed his master; the reason is very pregnant in the word of God itself, That cum sit timida nequitia dat testimonium condemnationis, since wickedness is cowardly and timorous, it gives evidence of condemnation against itself; et semper præsumit seæa perturbata conscientia: but Satan prevailing his angels execute.

I will now conclude this address to you, Mr. Garnet, by observing some special points how strangely and preposterously the devil in his last Project of Powder hath altered his old properties. For the curse that God laid upon the Serpent after the first transgression, was ut gradiretur super pectus suum, to creep upon his breast: but now we find him mounted upon the wings of an esprairie to the highest region of the air, and among the fire-works. The other part of his curse was, that he should eat Pulverem; that is, dust or powder: but now since Sodom was destroyed by sulphur, and the wife of Lot transmuted into salt, the proper materials of that mean by which Satan wrought in this hot fire; it appears that the Serpent from eating powder, which was a plain device, fell, for a worse purpose, to snuff gunpowder. Then the serpent did insidiari calcaneo, now capiti, from which the body draweth both sense and influence. Then he began to Eve, with a modest question, Cur præcepit Deus? Why hath God commanded? now with a resolution, præcepit Deus, God hath commanded. His words in those carried a flourish of great comfort, Nequaquam moriemini, but now terror, Moriemini: for a great advantage destroy them all. The devil at that time did only nibble about the text of holy writ, tantum mus ponticus, as Tertullian terms Marcion: but now he draws the grounds of equivocation concerning princes lives out of the very scripture and by scholastical authority. Satan tempted Christ with a fair offer, dandi omnia; of giving all upon the top of the pinnacle: but now he sets upon the great lieutenant of God's authority and dignity, with an auferam tibi omnia, both life and crown, ex penetralibus ubi Christus non est, as we are taught by his evangelist. The dragon's ambition extended no further than the sweeping away with his tail of the third part of the stars in the firmament: but now the plot of him and his disciples, was to sweep away the sun, the moon and the stars, both out of Star-Chamber and parliament, that no light be given in this kingdom to the best labourers. In the time of Saul, the devil was so modest, as to suspend his illusions and oracles till the visions of the prophets began to cease: but now though we have both Moses and the prophets et firmiorem sermonem propheticum, yet he rustles among the robes, et inaudita fundit oracula. In the beginning of the Christian church, the very name of Christ was sufficient to make Satan pack, and to quit the possession of tormented men: but he hath learned a more cunning trick of late, under the banner of Christ to fight against the lieutenants of his imperial majesty. In one point I find no change; that is, in labouring and working by all means to draw men from their trust in God's direction, to a tickle kind of confidence in themselves, and their own weak knowledge of good and ill. And as that error was the cause of Adam's exile from Paradise which was hortus conclusus; so had such another almost divided us and our heirs both from our lives and estates: Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos.

I have stood the longer on this point, to let you know how idly, and yet how wilfully you strive both against the providence of God, and the justice of the law, Quæ tuo te jugulavit gladio: The more you labour to get out of the wood, having once lost the right way, the further you creep in. For the wisdom of the world is folly before God: and impossible it is, that those counsels or proceedings should either have good proof in this world, or reward in the next, that are embued with blood, and pursued with tyranny. If then there be no other way to heaven than by the destruction of God's anointed and their heirs, I will conclude with you, Mr. Garnet, as Constantius did with Ascepius, Erigito tibi scalam, et in calum solus ascendito; Set up a ladder for yourself, and climb up to heaven alone; for loyal minds will not suit themselves with such bad company. The worst I wish to your person standing now to be convicted at the bar, is remorse and repentance for the safeguard of your soul; and for the rest, Fiat justitia, currat lex, et vincat veritas.

Hereunto Garnet said, That he had done more than he could excuse, and he had dealt plainly with them, but he was bound to keep the secrets of Confession, and to disclose nothing that he heard in Sacramental Confession. Whereupon the earl of Nottingham asked him, if one confessed this day to him, that to-morrow morning he meant to kill the king with a dagger, if he must conceal it? Whereunto Garnet answered that he must conceal it. Then the earl of Salisbury desired liberty of him to ask him some questions of the nature of confession. Garnet said, His lordship might, and he would answer him as well as he could. Why then (said he) must there not be confession and contrition before absolution? Yes, said Garnet.—Then he demanded whether Greenwell were absolved by him or no? Garnet said, He was.

The Earl then asked him, What Greenwell had done, to shew that he was sorry for it, and whether did he promise to desist? Garnet answered, that Greenwell said, he would do his best.

To that the Earl replied, that it could not be so; for as soon as Catesby and Percy were in arms, Greenwell came to them from Garnet, and so went from them to Hall, at Mr. Abington's house inviting them most earnestly to come and assist those gentlemen in that action. Hereby, saith he, it appears, that either Greenwell told you out of confession, and then there needs no secrecy; or if it were in confession, he professed no penitency, and therefore you could not absolve him. To which the earl added, That this one circumstance must still be remembered, and cannot be cleared; That when Greenwell told you what Catesby meant in particular, and you then called to mind also what Catesby had spoken to you in the general before, if you had not been so desirous to have the plot take effect, you might have disclosed it out of your general knowledge from Catesby: but when Catesby offered to deliver you the particulars himself, as he had done to Greenwell, you refused to hear him, lest your tongue should have betrayed your heart.

To this Garnet weakly replied, That he did what he could to dissuade it, and went into Warwickshire with a purpose to dissuade Mr. Catesby, when he should have come down. And for Mr. Greenwell's going to father Hall, to persuade him to join, Garnet said he did very ill in so doing.

To that the earl of Salisbury replied, That his first Answer was most absurd, seeing he knew Catesby would not come down till the 6th of November, which was the day after the blow should have been given, and Garnet went in the country ten days before. And for the second, he said, That he was only glad that the world might now see, that Jesuits were condemned by Jesuits; and treason and traitors laid naked by the traitors themselves: yea, Jesuits by that Jesuit, that governs all Jesuits here, and without whom no Jesuit in England can do any thing.

Garnet (as it should seem) being here mightily touched with remorse of his offence, prayed God and the king, that other Catholics might not fare the worse for his sake.

Then the earl of Salisbury said, Mr. Garnet, is it not a lamentable thing, that if the Pope or Claudius Aquaviva, or yourself, command poor Catholics any thing, that they must obey you, though it be to endanger both body and soul? And if you maintain such doctrine among you, how can the king be safe? Is it not true therefore, the king and the state should look to you, that spend your time thus in his kingdom?

Garnet said very passionately, My lord, I would to God I had never known of the Powder-Treason.

L. C. J. Garnet, you are Superior of the Jesuits; and if you forbid, must not the rest obey? Was not Greenwell with you half an hour at sir Everard Digby's house, when you heard of the discovery of your treason? And did you not there confer and debate the matter together? Did you not send him to Hall, to Mr. Abington's house, to stir him up to go to the rebels, and encourage them? yet you seek to colour all this; but that's but a mere shift in you. And notwithstanding all this, you said, No man living, but one, did know that you were privy to it: then belike some that are dead did know it. Catesby was never from you (as the gentlewoman that kept your house with you confessed) and by many apparent proofs, and evident presumptions, you were in every particular of this action, and directed and commanded the actors: nay, I think verily you were the chief that moved it.

Garnet said, No, my lord, I did not.

Then it was exceedingly well urged by my L. C. Justice, how he writ his letters for Winter, Wright, Fawkes, Baynam, and Catesby, principal actors in this matchless Treason. Besides, his lordship told him of his keeping the two Bulls to prejudice the king, and to do other mischief in the realm; which, when he saw the king peaceably to come in, then being out of hope to do any good, he burnt them.

Here Mr. Attorney caused to be read the Confession of Hall, alias Oldcorne, the Jesuit, under his own hand (which he said was Omni exceptione major) against him; wherein he confessed, that Humphry Littleton told him, that Catesby and others were sore hurt with Powder, and said that he was exceeding sorry that things took no better effect; whereat Hall wished him not to be discouraged, nor to measure the cause by the event: For though the eleven tribes of Israel went twice by the special commandment of God against the tribe of Benjamin, yet they both times received the overthrow. So Lewis the French king in his voyage into the Holy Land against the Infidels, was overthrown, and his whole army discomfited, though his cause were good. And so likewise the Christians, when they defended Rhodes against the Turks, lost the city, and the Turks had the upper-hand. And this he confessed, and applied to the fact of Catesby and others for the Powder-Treason; and said, It would have been commendable when it had been done, though not before.

After this, Mr. Attorney opened, how Francis Tresham, a delinquent Romanist, even in articulo mortis (a fearful thing) took it upon his salvation, That he had not seen Garnet in 16 years before, when Garnet himself had confessed he had seen him often within that time; and likewise, that Garnet knew not of the Spanish Invasion, which Garnet himself confessed also, and which two things Tresham himself had formerly confessed to the lords; yet for a Recantation of these two things upon his death-bed, he commanded Vavasor, his man, whom I think (said Mr. Attorney) deeply guilty in this Treason, to write a letter to the earl of Salisbury. And to shew this his desperate Recantation, Mr. Tresham's Letter was offered to be read.

But before the reading thereof, my lord of Salisbury said, because there was matter incident to him, and to that which should be read, he thought fit to say something. To which purpose he said his desire was, truly to lay open what cause there was for any faith to be given to these men's protestations; when they, to colour their own impieties, and to slander the king's justice, would go about to excuse all Jesuits, how foul soever, out of an opinion that it is meritorious so to do, at such time as they had no hope of themselves. Such is it to be doubted, that sir Everard Digby's protestations might be at the bar, who sought to clear all Jesuits of those practices which they themselves have now confessed ex ore proprio. That such was also Tresham's labour, who being visited with sickness, and his wife in charity suffered to come to him, this Letter was hatched by them, and signed by himself some few hours before his death, wherein he taketh that upon his salvation, which shall now by Garnet be disproved.

Then the Letter was read, being to this effect: That whereas since the king's time he had had his pardon, and that to satisfy the lords who heretofore examined him, he had accused Garnet; that now, he being weak, desired that his former examinations might be called in, because they were not true; and set down upon his salvation, that he had not seen Garnet in 16 years before.

Then my lord of Salisbury shewed and said, it was a lamentable thing: for within three hours after he had done this, he died: and asked Garnet what interpretation he made of this testamental protestation?

Garnet answered, It may be, my lord, he meant to equivocate. Here was the Examination and Confession of Mrs. Anne Fawkes offerred to be read, also to confirm Tresham's perjury, who confessed that she had seen Mr. Tresham with Garnet at her house three or four times since the king's coming in, and divers times before, and that he had dined with him; and that Garnet always gave him good counsel, and would say sometimes to him, and others, Good gentlemen, be quiet; for we must obtain that which you desire by prayer. She confessed also, that they were at Erith together the last summer.

After all this, Garnet being demanded if these Examinations were true, he affirmed they were. And then were his own Examinations likewise read to the same effect: wherein he both confessed the seeing of Mr. Tresham, and his sending into Spain about an invasion.

Here my lord of Salisbury concluded, That that which was said of Mr. Tresham, and others, was not done against charity to the dead, but upon inevitable necessity, to avoid all their slanderous reports and practices; for he said that even now there was current throughout the town, a report of a retractation under Btes's hand, of his accusation of Greenwell, which are strange and grievous practices to think upon. But this day shall witness to the world, that all is false, and yourself condemned not by any but yourself, your own confessions and actions. Alas! Mr. Garnet, why should we be troubled all this day with your poor man, were it not to make the cause appear as it deserveth? wherein God send you may be such an example, as you may be the last actor in this kind.

Hereupon my Lord Admiral said to Garnet, that he had done more good this day in that pulpit which he stood in (for it was made like unto a pulpit wherein he stood) than he had done all the days of his life-time in any other pulpit.

Then was another Examination of Mrs. Anne Fawkes read, wherein she confessed that Mr. Garnet and she were not long since with Mr. Tresham, at his house in Northamptonshire, and stayed there.

After this, my lord of Salisbury said; Mr. Garnet, if you have not yet done, I would have you to understand, that the king hath commanded, that whatsoever made for you, or against you, all should be read, and so it is; and we take of you what you will. This gentlewoman that seems to speak for you in her Confessions, I think would sacrifice herself for you to do you good, and you likewise for her: therefore, good Mr. Garnet, whatsoever you have to say, say on in God's name, and you shall be heard.

Then Garnet desired the Jury, that they would allow of, and believe those things he had denied and affirmed; and not to give credit unto those things whereof there was no direct proof against him, nor to condemn him by circumstances or presumptions.

The earl of Salisbury demanded of him, saying, Mr. Garnet, is this all you have to say? if it be not, take your time, no man shall interrupt you.

To whom Garnet answered, Yea, my lord.

Mr. Attorney humbly desired all the Lords Commissioners, that if he had forgotten to speak of any thing material, that their lordships would be pleased to put him in mind of it; who was assured by my lord of Salisbury, that he had done very well, painfully, and learnedly.—Then Mr. Attorney desired the Jury might go together, who upon his motion going together forth of the court, within less than a quarter of an hour returned, and found Henry Garnet, Guilty.

Whereupon Mr. Serjeant Crooke prayed Judgment.

Then Mr. Waterhouse, the clerk of the crown, demanding what he could say for himself, why Judgment should not be given against him?

Garnet made answer, that he could say nothing, but referred himself to the mercy of the king, and God Almighty.

The following report of the Speech of the Earl of Northampton exceeds the proportion wherein it was first uttered, and is now inserted as it was afterwards amplified and enlarged by the Earl, when he delivered it to the Bookseller:

Earl of Northampton. Though some of Plato's followers, and those not of the meanest rank, have rather apprehended in conceit, than demonstrated by straight lines, that nothing is which hath not been before: if it were possible to take right observations out of true records, and that all counsels and attempts as well as Configurations and Aspects, return as it were 'ex postliminio,' by revolution to the point from whence they first began: yet if my Ephemerides fail me not in setting up the Figure of this late intended Plot, I may confidently pronounce with a grave senator, 'Reperitum esse hodierno die facinus, quod nec poeta fingere, nec histrio sonare, nec mimus imitari poterit.' So desperately malicious, and so unkindly and unseasonably fruitful is our age in producing monsters, when the force and heat of charity decays, and so violent are the damned spirits of Satan's black guard now before the winding up of the last bottom of terrestrial affairs, in spinning finer threads of practice and conspiracy under the mask of piety and zeal, which the Spirit of Truth termeth most significantly, 'Spiritualis nequitia in celestibus.'

Upon this ground I am moved at this instant, Mr. Garnet, to address my discourse to you, not so much in respect of your own person, 'aut quia te nostra sperem prece posse moveri' (though from my heart I pity the shameful shipwreck of your obedience and conscience upon so false a sand) as for their sakes that have not yet learned in our Saviour, that in one element a man cannot 'duobus servire dominis:' and withal in the king our sovereign's behalf, to exact at your hands (that hold the hearts of many followers by lease for life) a precise account of the lives of all those Cast-away, 'Quos vel apud te perditos invenit vel per te perdidit.' For either you that are an object unto many watching eyes, may be drawn by God's grace working with my charitable wishes, to lament, not the bad success (for so do men that are desperate) but the wicked purpose and intent of this crying sin (which is proper only to the penitent) or be brought so far at the least out of the black deeps of induration, with the mother of Petrus Lombardus, as to be sorry that you cannot be sorry.

The straits of time, the length of the trial, and the weariness of the auditors, may be and are great discouragements to such a Discourse as craves time, and were better not begun at all, than not perfected. But since the Law and Prophets in this case in hand, stand chiefly as the ground-work of deposing kings, and absolving subjects from the right which they owe to their own natural and lawful sovereigns by the laws of God and man, I shall be forced in discharge of my duty at this instant, to borrow so much time of these attentive hearers, as must be payed again forthwith to the service of the state: for otherwise, 'vix mihi,' as the Prophet threatens, 'quia tacui:' and yet we may conclude with another of the same rank, that 'etiamsi ego tacuero, clamabunt lapides.'

But, first, I am to let both you and the whole world know, that you are not called this day to the bar for any matter of your Conscience, as some perhaps may publish out of rancour or perversity of heart, to set a fairer gloss upon the ground of your profession. Since the first time of your coming to the Council-board, you have not been so much as asked any question about the places of your resort, the supporters of your employment, or the means of your maintenance, before the Powder-project, which hath no kind of affinity with religion or caution, but with fury and implacability came to be resolved on by a pack of Boutefeux: though you cannot be ignorant what the Parliament hath decreed, and some persons of your Society have suffered in the late Queen's time, for presuming to exercise a kind of jurisdiction within this realm, that neither policy of state can admit, nor allegiance can justify. I will add somewhat more for the greater improvement of the king's mercy, and the more just aggravation of your ingratitude: You are not pressed to any peril of your life, with publishing those Bulls which in the Queen's time neither had (as by Confession appears) nor could have other end than the forestalment of the king's lawful claim, when the fruit shall fall from the wasted tree, and the fainting sun (whose beams about that time begun to wax both dim and waterish) must of necessity set in our hemisphere.

The king's free Pardon (which, as the times stood then, should have called for a 'melius inquirendum,' before it had found passage without obstruction of any doubt) was applied by you, and other of your ghostly complices, to many festered and filthy ulcers of this kind. By this free Pardon (so far as you have not since relapsed into worse attempts) even yourself, Mr. Garnet, stand at this present, 'rectus in curiâ:' wherein though it become me not to descant about the measures and proportions of my master's infinite grace, yet I may tax you, for the bad requital of so high a benefit, and lament the king's misfortune, that like an eagle was in so great peril of receiving wounds (almost to the death) by the quills of his own clemency. These are not the true grounds, nor proper motives of your standing-forth; but your art in cherishing, your malice in encouraging, your impiety in strengthening a kind of practice, never heard nor thought upon before in any age, against the life of the most gracious and just King that ever reigned on either side of Trent; of a Queen renowned both for her own worth, and for her happy fruit; and of a prince, whom without ostentation I may be bold to call, the sweetest and the fairest blossom that ever budded, either out of the white or the red Rosary. God's law forbids a man that would live long and see cheerful days, to destroy 'matrem cum filiis,' even in those creatures that are not images of the Deity: but you, Mr. Garnet, out of your anointed influence of superabundant grace, endeavoured your best and uttermost to bruise the very nest-egg of this royal and high-flying airey, if it had been possible: peers, bishops, knights, burgesses, judges, serjeants, and all sorts of officers were drawn in by a writ of 'Corpus cum causa' to this 'feu de joy,' that it might blaze more gallantly. It is not the wearing of a crucifix, which you compare to the sign of Tau, that could have secured any of your own affection, if they had been left unwarmed, though it had been hallowed at Rome. No relique (instead of the red List that was a token of protection to Rahab and her family) could have distinguished a Catholick from a Protestant, when Guy Fawkes had the match in his hand. No kind of holy grains could have added the weight of one grain to the reputation of any Romanist, after once the hand of Greenwell had written the sense of the Hebrew word 'Thekell' upon the wall, (that is) 'Appensi in statera, inventi sunt minus habentes,' being weighed in the scales of your schools, should have been found over-light in the balance. Your end, as I imagine, was according to the threats of the Stoicks to purge this world by fire, or in some way with Democritus, to create a new world 'ex atomis:' or because Catesby did set Thomas Percy's offer light, which was 'tollere unum,' your desire was by this one act 'tollere,' not the man but humanity, not 'unum' but unity. The Plot whereof Livy speaks, of dispatching the whole Senate of Rome in an hour; the Device at Carthage, to cut off one whole faction, by one enterprize: the Conspiracy of Brutus and Cassius to kill Cæsar in the senate: the project of destroying one Conclave, the greatest part of the cardinals: the Sicilian Evensong, and the Parisian Mattins: nay, the wish of Nero, that Rome had but one head, which he might cut off at one blow, came far short to the mischief of this invention, which spared neither age, sex, nor degree. And therefore I confess, if Catesby your disciple were alive, thus far he might vaunt, and without exception, that he had surmounted and transcended Catiline in the sphere of his own treachery. But thus we learn by Tertullian, that 'favos etiam vespæ faciunt,' Wasps as well as bees make combs, though instead of honey, we find gunpowder.

Surely this was not the Fire that appeared unto Moses in the burning Bush: it was not the fire that should purge the Sons of Levi, though your Levites conceived so: it was not that Fire which was cast into the world by Christ, with a purpose that it might burn: It was not that, by which men should be saved that build over weakly upon the true foundation of faith. But it resembles more lively that false fire which began to glimmer, 'Post commotionem, quando in commotione non erat Dominus.' It is like to that strange Fire which Nadab and Abihu would have offered upon God's Altar, with a zeal that was preposterous: it hath the wasting quality of that Wildfire, which issuing 'ex rhamno,' out of the bramble, would have destroyed the stately cedars of Libanus. Nay, to speak properly, or draw nearest to the nature of that quick dispatching fire, which you and your disciples, Mr. Garnet, utterly despairing to draw down from heaven (because you know that such a like demand received a repulse, whilst Christ was conversant on earth, among your betters) sought by a trick to obtain at the hand of Satan (the great master of the Fire-works) and as the Poet writeth, 'Flectere cum nequeas superos Acheronta movebas.' But God wrought so, that by this Fire (since 'per illum fides proborum collucet') the faith of subjects that are dutiful doth shine more brightly, and the State wins honour. Look not now therefore that the Ladies of Israel shall meet you with their timbrels in the honour of this attempt: for all actions are not praise-worthy, which some persons of your profession study to enamel with pretence of godliness. In thinking of Telemachus, we set little by Astynax: easily may affections wander, where the rules of conscience do shift: and we find, that 'umbra' is not ever 'eo major quo serior:' but if bloody passions can thus far prevail 'in arido' what hope is there of better proof 'in viridi,' which in comparison is but 'linum fumigans?' You seek to raise your glory out of your sin, but 'quæ est gratia?' What thank is it to you, according to the demand of an Apostle, if for your evil deserts you suffer stripes? for what the Jews objected to our Saviour (though impudently) we dare speak truly and confidently to all those that were privy to this pack with you, that 'Non de bono opere lapidantur, sed de blasphemia.' Saint Augustine speaketh of some hot-headed fellows in his time, that notwithstanding their life led in this world, 'more latronum,' yet in their ends affected 'cultum et honorem martyrum:' among whom I shall ever rank (with just cause) these Powder-men. But if as saint Peter saith, 'Bene facientes patienter sustinetis, (which is far from the rage of your hot spirits) 'hæc est apud Deum gratia,' which your projects merit not. These are perhaps the days which Nabal meant, complaining 'hodie increbuisse servos qui fugiunt;' nay, which is worse, 'qui persecuntur Dominos:' and therefore if you will not learn of Balaam, to beware of speaking more than that which God putteth into your mouth; yet howsoever passions may spur you forward, learn of Balaam's Ass to shrink when you find the Angel of God's wrath opposed, lest as Abigail spake religiously and wisely to king David, 'cum mors advenerit,' when Death shall approach, who stands upon the threshold, and begins to knock at the door of your heart, 'sit tibi in singultum,' it cause you to sigh inwardly, not 'quod effuderis, sed quod effundere volueris,' not for having shed, but because you would have shed blood that is most innocent.

How well the Project of supplanting Princes, and subverting States, agrees either with the title of a Jesuit, or the duty of a Priest, who should rather temper passion, than disclaim charity; the Pharisees themselves express in teaching 'non licere,' that it was not lawful for them to kill any man; much less would they, as it is more than probable in the warp of youth, when their hair began to wax as white as snow, have taken eyes into their heads like burning-glasses to give fire to this train: and yet Truth itself hath said (which both sides must believe) that unless our righteousness exceeds theirs, we must not expect to be heirs of eternity. It will be long before some of you can protest with Paul, that you are 'mundi,' clean and pure from all men's blood, or with Gregory to Mauritius the Emperor, that he would never 'miscere se in cujusquam mortem,' or call to mind either the piety of that godly Bishop in a better time, that would not suffer those hands to be imposed on his head by Ordination, that were 'respersæ sanguine,' or the mishap of David that might not rear the Temple, for the staining and einbruing of his hands with blood. Resort to the very text itself, (or if it please you, to your own Canons) to enquire whether Paul's Restraint of intermeddling with secular affairs were enjoyed with a 'non obstante,' so far only as concerned Projects and Plots for Gunpowder. Your safest course, Mr. Garnet, as I suppose, is to stay your judgment with that Staff of old Jacob, whereof mention is made in Genesis, in these break-neck passages, that is, with that advised Sentence which he pronounced against Levi the Father of succeeding Priests, for killing the Sons of Hemor after circumcision, the same being in that case as well a Bond of Promise, as a Seal of Faith; since I do verily believe that the Protestants accord with the Catholics in more points of Faith and grounds of Doctrine at this day, than those of Sicheim did with Jacob and his family. By resolving this passage into parts, we shall find a great resemblance both in the point of fact, and in the resolution of right with this present case, upon which we have reason to fix both our eyes and observation. For first, Jacob out of conscience and humanity resolves, 'Non ituram animam suam in concilio Levi,' that his soul should never march in the council of Levi, 'Nec in cœtu illorum futuram gloriam,' nor his honour shine in their society: What is the reason? Because in their rage they have slain a man (much less than the destruction of a prince with his posterity and whole estate) 'Et in malitia suffoderunt murum,' and in their malice digged down a wall; which in my opinion either misseth hardly one hair, or very narrowly, your project's invention, in digging at the wall of the parliament. What is Jacob's sentence upon the fact? 'Maledictus illorum furor quia peritax, et indignatio quia dura:' which curse in a more lively manner (if possible it be) than the very fact itself, suits the comparison. For who knoweth not, that when malice taketh hold of humour only, as fire doth of straw, tho' it cause a great blaze at the first kindling, yet it is quickly spent, and only the smoke remains? but when it taketh hold of conscience, as fire doth of steel, 'Quod tardè acquisivit diu retinet,' then such marks are monuments. Touching the title which Jacob bestoweth for their labours, calling them 'Vasa iniquitatis bellantia,' I may protest that both you and Greenwell, and all they that were privy to this accursed Plot, deserve this style upon better ground than Simeon and Levi; by so much as your indignation compared with theirs by due circumstances, was by infinite degrees 'durior,' more hard than theirs. For though the feat (God's name be praised) were not fully wrought, yet you know, Mr. Garnet, who it is that compriseth our consent both within the compass and the censure of a deadly sin, and what father saith that, 'Quod deest operi inest voluntati.' The common law would punish Treason in the very heart, if the eye of inquisition could extend so far; and therefore the providence of God in preventing by his mercy this destruction, is no discharge to your intention in contriving it. By the course and recourse of times and accidents, wise men observe, that very seldom hath any mischievous attempt been undertaken for disturbance of a state, without the counsel and assistance of a priest in the first, in the middle, or last act of the tragedy; and that all along with such a chorus of Confederates to entertain the stage, while the lives and fortunes of great princes being set upon the tenterhooks, have put all in hazard. For while Moses stood in conference with God upon the mount, his brother Aaron impatient, as for the most part churchmen are in their desires, of pauses or delays, fell instantly to mould and worship the golden calf, to their commander's vexation and God's dishonour. Abiathar was condemned for plotting with the Shunamite, and Joab lieutenant-general against his sovereign. With what distemper and disorder some priests have rock'd the cradle of the churches infancy in raising heresies, the seeds of factions, only to that end, no man can be ignorant; that hath run over the churches histories.

Odo, bishop of Bayonne, was imprisoned by his brother the first William, as a stirrer of Sedition, and after conspired with Robert earl of Mortaigne, to depose his son, against whom also Geoffrey, bishop of Constance, fortified in actual rebellion the castle of Bristol. The captivity of the lion-hearted Richard, champion of the holy wars, was by the practice of Savaricus, bishop of Bath. Gervas the great preacher enter'd with Lewis the French king's son, purposing to root out the race of our kings, and to plant himself and his progeny. Of the rebellious army that usurped against Henry 3, the title of 'Exercitum Dei' (alho' by the pope's legate, 'reputati sunt filii Belial) 'Clerici fuere erant,' saith the monk of Chester. For conspiracy against the first Edward was the archbishop of Canterbury exiled the kingdom. And before that Isabel, the wife of the second, durst undertake the plot of deposing her husband by a damnable device, for the raising of her son, she sent in a pack of preachers, poisoned with prejudice against the present state, to prepare the people's minds by false suggestions, to the change which was intended to follow. And Adam de Orleton, bishop of Hereford, that was the first deviser, continued the chiefest feeder of that dissension between the husband and the wife, taking occasion in a sermon preached at Oxford, in the presence of the queen, and all the rebels, upon that text of the Scripture, 'Caput meum doleo,' to express by depravation of his lawful sovereign, how many mischiefs grew to the commonwealth by a corrupted head that governed them. For aiding the enemies of Edward 3 was the bishop of Hereford arraigned. And the chaplain of Wat Tyler, that advised his chieftain, as you Mr. Garnet did your followers, to destroy all the clergy and nobility, was Ball a mass-priest. With Gloucester's duke against his sovereign Richard, was Oswald, bishop of Gallaway, the chief comploter. Priests and Friars they were that suborned a false Richard against the fourth Henry, whereof eight being Minors, were hang'd at Tyburn: And Maudelen himself, that took upon him the habit and person of the king, was a priest also, to keep them company. Scroope, the archbishop of York, for plotting a conspiracy with the earl of Northumberland against the same king, lost his head for his labour. Beverly, an anointed priest, not to be behind some other of his fellows in these seditious attempts, conspired against the fifth Henry, with the lord Cobham, sir John Oldcastle.

I have seen the copy of a learned and wise Letter, written by bishop Chicheley, a prelate of your own, chancellor to that king, gravely advising him to beware of admitting a legate resident in the realm, in respect of the sharp effects by stirs that have been raised in former times by persons of that habit; pointing as it were to Henry Beauford, who afterwards was both author and actor of more mischief than almost could be expected or feared.

They were priests and friars that in the first of Edward 4, conspired with Jasper, earl of Penbroke, and were afterward attainted and executed by act of parliament.

Dr. Shaw was a priest, whom Richard 3 made the trumpet at Paul's Cross of his wrongful claim against the rightful possession of his innocent nephews.

That Impostor that suborned Lambert, to take upon him the person, and usurp the right of the duke of York, against the blessed union of the two Roses, was a priest in Ireland. Wherein I note, that as a priest would then have forestalled, so now two priests, Greenwell and Garney, would have cut off the union. He was a monk of Henton that inticed the duke of Buckingham by seducing hopes, to the ruin of as great a house as any subject in Europe (bearing not the surname of a king) can demonstrate: whereof both I receive a wound, and all that descend of him.

I speak not of those popes, that exercising more the sword of Paul with passion, than the keys of Peter with instruction, have been kindlers of great broils: nor of the three powerful cardinals, York, Lorraine, and Arras in our age, that during their times were not much answerable for sloth or idleness, whatsoever they are otherwise for time ill employed, being persons of great spirit and too great activity: nor of those churchmen, that by their doctrine in the pulpit, and subscription of hands to traitorous decrees, embased the two daughters of king Henry 8, both before and after the death of king Edward 6, for satisfaction to the pride and ambition of an aspiring humour.

I pass over the brainsick opposition of Knox and Goodman, against the two renowned Marys, both queens of Scotland, regent and inheritrice in our days: nor of the fiery triplicity of Ballard, Clarke, and Watson, of which number, the first practised the slaughter of the queen deceased, the other two of the king our sovereign. I rip not up the complots of Sergius the monk, to bring the Turk into the empire of the east: nor of those false prophets, that established the race of Xerif in Barbary. My only drift and purpose is, to compare former practices with the late attempt, (tho' far exceeding and surmounting all that went before) to make true subjects see for the better trial and examination of spirits, that as well some priests in Christendom, as those Sallii that were chaplains to Mars at Rome in the reign of idolatry, took delight by fits in tossing firebrands from camp to camp, for the inflammation of evil affections and worse practices. But the circle of a crown imperial cannot be soldered, if it once receive the smallest crack.

Sinews that are cut in sunder, can never knit: neither is it possible that there should be 'integralis unitas in solutione continui.' I will therefore conclude this point with the grave and learned judgment of Sozomen, an ancient writer of the Church Primitive, 'Universim accidere in sacerdotum disidiis, ut respublica motibus et turbis agitur:' that it happens generally in the dissensions of priests, that the commonwealth itself is shaken with the convulsions of conspiracy.

It is very probable, Mr. Garnet, that the late queen, in case the thread of her worn life could have been spun further on toward these misty days, (that have somewhat overcast the brightness of your enticing lopes upon the settling of this state in the succession of so rare a king) should have run some strange hazard both of her state and person, among your mines and powder trains (having indeed imbrued her sword in the blood of some choice persons of your society by the warrant of her laws;) since this sweet prince our sovereign, that before his coming always wrote his laws in milk, and ever since hath been very careful not to write in blood, can thus hardly either by his own gracious deserts, or his council's incessant care, be secured from the stumbles. I have not read, neither do I believe, that the murder of any anointed king hath been accounted in any religious or just age, either an act of prowess, or a step to martyrdom. I could not have thought, without this demonstration of proof, that any man had been left in the world, since the death of George Buchanan, to proclaim prizes for the slaughter as well of kings as of tygers. But if it were not impossible (which now I find with grief of heart) for any one spark of loyalty to live in an ocean of immoderate and exorbitant affections; surely I should have expected from you and your friends, Mr. Garnet, effects of better inclinations toward so mild and gracious a prince, as never searcheth ulcers but with a shaking hand, and in searching all, hath a more earnest desire, 'non invenire quod querit, quam invenire quod puniat.' For, to speak truth without flattery, (which I abhor as the canker of all generous and worthy minds) have not both you and yours received and enjoyed many favours from the king, which in all likelihood were not in the last time to be looked for? Would the late queen, think you, have bestowed honour, by laying the sword of knighthood upon the heads of so many Catholics, as the king hath done since his entrance? Would the queen have allowed unto all, or any of the Recusants, that free kind of access both to her person, or to her court, which the king hath done (not only upon just occasions, but for their comfort) and in effect, at their pleasure, without making any separation between those, that before his coming saluted the fair promise of his hopeful day, and others that would have prevented it? Was not the gate of justice opened Trojano Tyrique to Protestants and Catholics alike, with that indifferent and equal regard, that it hath been since to the shutting up of those mouths that were most mutinous? Was the late queen so confident in the fidelity of any Catholics, as to employ them without distrust to foreign princes in embassy? Would the queen have called the chief Catholics to her council-board, that upon the laying open of their just complaints, they might have redress with favour? Might the recusants of best behaviour and countenance in the late queen's time, live in their own countries, dispose of their estates and tenants, and enjoy their pleasures, without any other muilt, than the former laws had laid on them? Was it free for recusants in those days, that had been cast behind in arrearages (for want of answering their payments in due time to the crown) to compound with a commission directed only to that end, almost for what term and at what rates he might best satisfy? Did the compassion of the late queen extend so far in favour of recusants, as to put them in possession of their whole estates, drawn out of the farmers hands upon due proof made of spoil, without further demand of any other contribution or taxation than the law limited? Was it any part of the late queen's care, to give order for the chastisement of informers and messengers, that preyed upon the prostrate fortunes of recusants with harder measure than the justice of the state warranted? Was it free for subjects of all affections and religions (during the late queen's life) that delighted in the wars, to serve what prince or state it pleased them, without either exception or punishment? Did the late time leave it to the choice of young gentlemen that had licence to travel, during the time of their abode in foreign parts, to frequent what places, courts or companies they would, without yielding an account at their return of their adventuring? Had it been possible to have drawn from the late queen either restitutions or pensions for the maintenance of recusants, in respect of service done to antecessors or aicestors? Was the late queen as cautious and tender in forbearing to take the lives of priests and Jesuits upon the point of summum jus, before she were made acquainted by the judges thoroughly with the state of their evidence? Was any magistrate ever called to his answer for proceeding in cold blood against a priest, that for want of means to procure a pardon had been kept in prison since the time of the queen deceased? Was the late queen ever pleased, that in the pardon general at the closing up of the parliament, priests and Jesuits should be comprised in the list, and among others you and Greenwell, that at the first opening of the spring resorted thither with as violent a thirst as ever you did to Jubilee; and yet in recompence thereof since that time, have been well content that the distributor of so great a portion of grace and bounty, should be blown up by your Boute-feux? A man would think in likelihood, that both you, and all they that were encouraged and warranted in this attempt by you, having received at the hands of so gracious a king so many talents in a royal kind of trust, should rather have studied by your best endeavours to encrease the stock, than to lessen the principal, by burying your talent under ground among the powder works; especially considering that our king is not like the other mentioned in St. Luke, 'homo austerus, qui tollit quod non posuit, et metit quod non seminat.' but rather desirous with Moses to be raised out of the book of life; with Paul to be made Anathema for the common good of those subjects that live under him. Our royal master travels not as the other did, 'in longinquam regionem ut accipiat regnum,' into a foreign region to obtain a kingdom, but brought a kingdom with him out of the next region to ours, that hereafter we may live 'unanimis,' that have been so long severed and divided in fraternity. But such are the qualities of many men, and especially of you and your complices in this complot, that as one saith, 'Non tam agant gratias de tribunatu, quam querunt quod non sunt erecti in consulatum.' But when you, or any man of your affection and humour, shall be able, out of quintessence of wit, or positions of state, or grounds of common sense, to prove, that a prince as opposite to your religion as you are to his, and that vows to set up his whole rest and adventure not only of all his crowns, but of his life and succession, upon those principles of faith (which he hath sucked from his infancy with his nurse's milk) to take a milder course with the Catholics than he hath hitherto done, without offence or scandal to the tender conscience of his own church, which he doth chiefly regard, I will acknowledge that you had more reason to bemoan yourselves (which is the furthest period of a subject's power) than, as your case is now, I can admit, looking into sundry circumstances of peril with a single eye, which is neither dazzled with self-love, nor distracted by slight appearance. For though you may perhaps conceive, that there wanted somewhat to the full measure of your vast desires; yet all men know that you prevailed far above the likelihood of any reasonable hope; which may move you to call to mind with more evenly poised thoughts, that judgment of a wise author, that 'inter voluptates tam numeratur id quod habes, quam id quod speras:' a good rule for a perverse interpreter.

The quicksand upon which you plant the great artillery of your sentences and decrees against the states and persons of all princes that square not with your rules, I take to be that idle impression, rather than true supposition of a certain kind of prerogative, thought to be left by our Saviour to his spouse the church 'in deposito,' for the deposing of princes, upon conviction of contumacy, from their seat of government. For as the great philosophers conclude the whole world to be composed of three certain concurrent principles, that is, matter, form, and privation, holding the last of the three to be rather a principle of transmutation than of establishment: so likewise the schoolmen within these last 600 years, have dragged into the discipline a new kind of privation also beside the matter, which is the flock, and the form which is the government. And this privation hath undoubtedly metamorphosed as many states and policies as the other hath done shapcs and figures, if either the complaints of majesty, or the smart of patience may be accounted of in our audit. I confess with the woman of Samaria, that this well is not only deep, but that I want the bucket, which from such a well may be fit to draw: for every plummet is not for every sound, nor every line for every level: neither is it possible out of every block to carve Mercury; but yet since it is confessed by Robert Winter, Rookwood, Guy Fawkes, and others, that their error in believing this conclusion upon the warrant of a learned man (which as appeareth now, was yourself) hath been the greatest cause, and the strongest motive of their fatal fault; since in like sort, it agreeth fitly with my desire to reduce as many of those silly erring sheep that followed Absalom, 'sed corde simplice et penitus causam ignorantes,' as I can from your 'acheldama,' or 'eger sanguinis,' (considering how many priests have practised in these late years to sound points of war) it were as meet that somewhat were set down for confutation, as for caution: and therefore I have been the more willing to engage my zeal and duty, though perhaps above the measure of my strength, upon this argument, 'et quantum in me est,' to shake the whole foundation of future conspiracies.

But before that I prepare myself to this encounter, or that I enter into this narrow list, wherein I expect as many adversaries as there be men that have humours, to limit or to conquer kings, I hold myself bound in duty as well as drawn by method, to wipe away that weak excuse which you make of your disloyal heart, in publishing this doctrine of curbing, suspending, or deposing princes of high estate, upon this ground only, that in foreign parts you found it neither severely taxed, nor capitally punished. To let go that maxim which binds all sorts of subjects to frame their actions rather to the law of the country wherein they live, than wherein they wander; and likewise the great improbability of so gross ignorance in yourself, and your friends, as not to take notice of a point of state so deeply riveted in all the courts of justice within the realm; I must tell you further also, that princes fear not those fires which are kindled in foreign states, before that some spark light either upon their neighbours houses, or their own palaces. Idle lookers-on, and frank adventurers have not an equal sense of the danger, which the ships and vessels richly freighted endure at the sea, either by false pirates or foul weather. 'Qui sani sunt,' according to your construction of 'sanitas,' Mr. Garnet, 'nec medicis egent, nec metuunt medicinam.' Their ears are very dull, and unapt to musick, that cannot keep time when fortune plays, and all sorts of instruments are set in one key to make full harmony. So long doth the great brood-hen cluck her chickens, as she takes them to be hers: but if once they fly from the protection and safe defence of her wings, she leaveth them as a prey to the puttock. I will search no further than our own time for satisfaction in this point, how far princes would be patient in case they were as violently pursued and plied as the king our sovereign hath been; than by observing what kind of obedience hath been performed by some of that rank when they were shot with the same arrow. For many men are very slack in making a hue-and-cry after the thief that stealeth their neighbour's goods, which are very forward to fly with the wings of an eagle, when they find themselves pressed in their own particular. 'Et hic si fuerint sentiant aliter,' and in like cases wise men out of experience resort to like remedies.

But if there be no drugs in your shop to purge that sharp humour, that hath been the cause of so many burning fevers, and distempers in this state, than your diacatholicon, I may tell you plainly, that it strives so much against the stomach of the king, and worketh upon nature with that violence and loathsomeness, as he doth rather chuse to feel the pain, than take the pill, and to endure the worst of the disease, than to make the best use of that remedy. In this case he will trust his own receipts that are made familiar by time and use, leaving other princes to their own free choice, which may make all drugs to taste in their mouths like manna, that is agreeable to their own appetite. Princes cannot be too suspicious when their lives are sought, and subjects cannot be too curious when the state brandles. I remember that when Joshua took notice of a single man that came from Jericho, standing with a sword in his hand ready drawn, he asked instantly, 'Noster es, an adversariorum?' 'Art thou of our side, or of our adversaries?' Directing us that are now in commission, as it were by line and level, in what manner and with what caution we should examine you and Hall, since Greenwell is out of our reach, for you draw not one sword, as the other did, but two at once, that is, both the spiritual and the temporal, against our sovereign, and to enquire withal at what time, and in what place, and upon what advantage you and your suborned confederates intend to wound his royal majesty.

For since we find, that to secure litigious possessions, that lie subject to surprize, it is usual and ordinary, even among persons merely private, so long as they live in fear, to sound the dispositions and affections of their own dependents, followers and tenants, upon suspicion of a false trick: At a dead-lift, it much more behoveth great princes, upon whom whole states and successions depend, to take the surest hold that is possible of their subjects affections and hearts, lest if they should chance, in the day of trial, not to be 'nostri sed adversariorum,' and thereby draw their swords of another side, and deceive the trust that is reposed in their faith, we might with Rachel, 'Plorare filios nostras quia non sunt,' and call for help too late, when destruction were in the door of desolation.

This doctrine, Mr. Garnet, is not drawn out of the fusty vessels, as some call them, nor from the lees of the latter times which you suspect: It carries not the least taste of prejudice or festered suspicion upon particulars. It knew no difference either of name or reputation, between catholick and protestant, when it was first set on broach by those princes, states, and divines, which are accounted catholicks, and some of them canonized for saints in the rubricks of your own register. For proof whereof you shall find a patent in the records of Rich. 2, granted to one Waleton, for the searching of all ships and vessels inward or outward-bound in the port of London, and for the sifting of all persons likewise, 'qui bullas, vel alia papalia instrumenta deferebant.' In the same prince's reign, sir William Brian was sent to the Tower, only for procuring the pope's bull against certain burglars that robbed his own house, 'quamvis abundans cautela non nocet' by the civil law, and the bulls themselves were adjudged prejudicial to the king's prerogative. With these I match Stephanus de Malolacu, sharply fined in the reign of Edward 1, for putting a bull in execution against a certain knight his adversary, without acquainting first the king or the counsellors. Roger Sherbrook was called in question for procuring bulls from Rome, in 'contemptum regis et coronæ exheredandæ periculum,' which was the best construction that was then made of these traverses. Edward 2 sent a commission, as appeareth by records, to enquire of any process or sentence brought over from Rome into this land 'sæ inconsulto,' without his privy. It appeareth again in the time of Edward 3, all the ports were laid for interception of bulls by the king's order. To the archbishop of Ravenna was granted a safe conduct at his coming into England, by the same king, with this proviso, that he should only report 'Sanctas papæ exhortationes,' but neither send out process, nor give sentence, 'in coronæ et regni præjudicium.' It was not lawful in those days to bring in any letters either from the pope, or any foreign prince, without imparting them first to the chancellor, or the warden of the Cinque Portuum, which in time of the best correspondence, as it seems to me, implies weak confidency. Edward 3 gave instructions to certain noblemen that were to treat of a peace with France, in the presence of the pope, to proceed with great caution, that is, not 'tanquam coram iudice, sed coram privata persona,' and not as 'in figura iudicii, sed amicaliter.' When the Scots would have had all differences between both kingdoms referred to the conscience and discretion of the pope, the peers of England utterly refused to give their assent, though the king's own facility should incline so far, because their king, as they vouched, was not to make his answers in matters of that quality before any judge whatsoever, 'vel ecclesiastico vel seculari,' either ecclesiastical or secular. To be short, these sparks of jealousy, were so far kindled between the Church of Rome and our ancestors in former times, although they were no Lutherans nor Huguenots, (as our countrymen are termed in these days) but Catholics according to the Roman Catechism, that an order was set down by the wisdom of the state, that the pope's collector at his first arrival on our coast, should swear solemnly to be faithful to his crown, to attempt nothing to the king's prejudice, or in disgrace of the laws established; to put none of the pope's orders in execution, to the weakening of the king's prerogative; to deliver no mandates or letters from the pope, before they had been viewed and allowed by the council of the king; to write nothing to the pope from hence, without the king's leave; to deal no further in the business of benefices than the privy-council should allow; nor without the king's privy-seal to depart out of the kingdom.

These points are tender, and such as during peace were never offered by the kings of England to the ministers of any other foreign prince; and yet we read of no such iovectives or decrees against prince and state, in our days are ordinary. Other princes in like manner stood upon their guard, and with like circumspection, as is evident by Philip le Beau the French king; who being advertised of the pope's peremptory proceeding upon the committing of a bishop for evil words against himself, inquired of all his peers both ecclesiastical and temporal at a public convention, how far he might rest assured of their fidelity and loyalty notwithstanding that decree; who answered, 'Unanimi consensu se illius tantummodo esse beneficiarios;' and that what pope or potentate soever durst adventure to put out his horns, or to raise his crest by opposition to his royal prerogative, they would live and die with him.

If princes that were absolutely Catholics, according to the Roman list, that were directed by one canon, tuned by one wrest, obedient to the voice of one high shepherd, and between whom and the pope there was but 'cor unum et anima una,' found so just cause and so great reason (notwithstanding union in points of conscience, and orders of conformity) to be tender and suspicious of their temporal prerogative, and to cast a watchful eye upon the pope's encroaching steps, in quarters that pertained neither to the churchyard, nor the church: how much more jealous ought true subjects and sworn servants in our days to be of that prince's state, who being, as the case standeth now, sustained and fed by another root, directed by the voice of other pastors, and as careful to reform, as his antecessors to conform, while they sailed by another compass, and upon another coast? And whosoever will not be instructed by the records, let him search in the vaults and the powder-trains of the parliament. If in the time of Henry 2. (who, touching point of conscience, was 'obedientissimus ecclesie filius') Vivian, the pope's legate, was precisely sifted and examined by the bishops of Ely and

Winchester, (that were of his own profession, and wore the same badge) by what warrant he durst presume to land without special licence from the king; and therefore give oath 'in verbo veritatis,' to do nothing against the king's authority: how much more watchful and reserved ought this state to be, in admitting Greenwell, Hall, and Garnet with their Bulls or censures, 'in regis et coronæ prejudicium,' without inquisition or search, since their end is not as before, 'implere manum,' to fill the hand, but to replenish the churchyard, and to stir up all conceited or discontented men, to the taking of arms against their lawful and redoubted sovereign king James? And though the pope, shewing himself (in this point) more moderate and discreet than other of his predecessors, hath not as yet cut off the king formally as a withered or unfruitful branch; yet to their precipitate and brainsick giddiness it was thought sufficient, as Guy Fawkes and others did confess, that the pope on Maunday Thursday censures schismatics in general, (though the most judicious among the schoolmen, divines and canonists, of their part, hold directly ad oppositum, and dare not warrant any conscience according to the rules of their own discipline) by that censure which we may probably conceive to be more narrative than active, in respect the process follows not. This record concerning Henry 2. draws to my memory a message of the same effect, sent to a Scottish legate by Alexander the king of Scotland after that time: for it is true, that legate proposing to sess every parish at four marks of silver, and every monastery in that kingdom at twenty times so much, for the supply of maintenance to the wars in the Holy Land, was commanded by king Alexander, 'intra regni fines consistere,' to stay upon the border of the realm, 'et per literas mandata exponere,' and by letter to deliver his instructions; for neither Scotland could forbear or spare so great a sum as the legate would exact, neither (albeit the realm could,) yet his meaning was, to send it by so unlucky a messenger as the legate was; complaining that he had been robbed of the money gathered in foreign states before, to the loss both of his own labour, and of the charities of other Catholics. In conclusion, a fair offer was made of men for increase of strength, which was not the legate's aim, but of no treasure to fill coffers, which was the chiefest end; and a thousand marks were sent to the pope as a mere benevolence, which sealed up the drift and purpose of this embassy. This answer was exceedingly commended by the king of England, 'qui idem expertus sapiebat;' who having tasted of the same cup, grew wise, as I find by Hector Boetius, a Roman Catholic. I mean not in this place to insert or add the judgment of a Scottish bishop, that these kind of exactions were tyranny; advising further all that state in a full convention, that the legate might not only be sent away empty-handed, (and with like success to those, which, as the prophet saith, 'Dormierunt somnum suum, et

'nihil invenerunt viri divitiarum in manibus eius') but further, that an act might pass in that assembly, to cut off all such errands by provisional accord, as might 'in futuro' tend to the state's impoverishment: which was universally agreed and determined.

I did very well approve, and was glad to hear the distinction and difference which you made in one part of your speech, between the king our sovereign (that was never swathed in the bands, nor danced in the lap of the Roman Church) and other princes Roman Catholics, that were first incorporated by union, and after cast off for their contumacy: for this is somewhat, though I hold it not to be sufficient. And beside that every grain in measure is well gotten at your hand, that held the balance so unevenly and unsteadily: that passage also of St. Paul, prohibiting the church, or at the least confessing himself prohibited to judge those 'qui foris sunt,' as you repute the king inclined to that side, which your own admission and exposition doth bear. But as it is impossible for any man that is not a perfect Gileadite, without lipping to pronounce Sibboleth, howsoever otherwise they drank water 'curvatis genibus:' so the mischief is, that you flee too suddenly from that foundation which your own hands had fastened; and upon the question asked, what you would think of any sentence privative, proceeding from the pope against our king, in case either this man, or any successor of his should hereafter take any course differing from that moderation which hath been used hitherto, your vocales or vowels were changed into mutes, your demonstrations into doubts, and your eloquence into so deep silence, as the passing-bell might have been tolled for a man so quickly stricken speechless with one demand, to make your last testament, 'Ut unusquisque Theophrasti discipulum te posset agnoscere.'

It now remains, that in discharge of promise, and for satisfaction to curiosity, I make it clear by the fairest evidence, the most pure and uncorrupted witnesses, and with the shortest cut that my compass in so vast an ocean will admit, that none of the patriarchs before the law, none of the priests and prophets under the law, nor Christ or his apostles at the last expiring of the old law, nor any of the godly bishops that governed the church of God for the space of one thousand years in 'auditu novo,' by the new law, did ever exercise, approve, or claim that kind of jurisdiction or any branch of it that is extended to deprivation of right, suspension from rule, or sequestration from royalty. For this I take to be that ball of wildfire, which hath caused so great loss of lives and states by combustion in monarchies.

Before the law, tho' it pleased God upon the breach of his decree to drive Adam out of Paradise, the lively figure of the church, that in 'pœnâ culpæ,' he might work for that, 'sua dore vultus,' which before sprung up naturally, 'beneficio Creatoris,' yet he left him monarch of the universal world; a course far different from the manner of proceeding among many of those Roman pastors, which claiming the dispensation and distribution of St. Peter's keys, as Keys, have only by the strength and virtue of that supposed warrant, sought upon displeasure, and sometimes 'causa inaudita,' not only to expel great princes out of the state of grace, but very often also to strip them out of the robes of majesty.

In the sequestration of ungodly Cain, 'à Dei facie,' from the face or presence of God, (which is in effect the same censure which the church useth at this day, 'tradendo Sathanæ,' because these two lords are in one regiment incompatible) we read not that immediately upon the sentence this grievous sinner was set up for a reproachful mark, whereat either justice might shoot, or error might aim, as the king our sovereign, who hath been roaved and pricked at of late: for so far was the providence of God from arming any creature in this world to the least harm, much less the disinherison of Cain, as for so much as concerned life he set upon him his own mark of sure defence, with a seven-fold curse against that that should rid him out of the way; and beside left him a large scope wherein to walk upon his own ground almost all the world over. To these two I will only add a third, which is Esau the lost child, whom, notwithstanding deprivation of that heavenly blessing, by which all nations should by the merit of the blessed seed, and holy covenant, 'in plenitudine temporis,' prefixed by his providence, be reconciled to himself, yet we find that he was enlarged in his temporal possession, secured in his person, and increased far and near in the wide spread of his posterity. Nay, that which maketh more to the blemish and reproof of our rash empiricks, that can hit upon no other way to cure diseases than by letting blood, I infer, and that upon a sure foundation, that Jacob, Esau's younger brother, but yet by mercy the true and lawful heir to the promise, and the chief commander after Esau's fall, among the Saints of God, did a long time after, not only call him Dominum, his Lord, which the Holy Ghost approveth, by the title which is given by Sarah to her husband, to be a word of power; but falling prostrate in a humble manner at his feet, with words expressing as great love as reverence, did respectfully and truly honour him; for 'nondum venit hora,' nor many thousand years after, wherein persons excommunicated must ex consequente be deprived of dominion, rather than left to God's chastisement.

Between the roots of Judah and of Levi, by the law of Moses, the separations and distances are so wide, as neither need to cross another's walk, to intermeddle with another's office, or to eclipse another's dignity. Beside, I observe, that among all the conditions affirmative and negative, positive and privative, religious and politick, that are enjoined by the first institution to kings, this kind of tenure holden of Aaron or his successors ad placitum is neither expressed in the grant, embroidered on the skirt, nor engraven in the seat of his office; unless some will argue that the kings of Judah were as well bound to submit their scepter to the priests direction, as to receive the book of the law at their hands: tho' we find that it was entailed by strong words to the tribe of Judah, without any reservation of superintendency. Beside, the plague which God doth threaten with his own mouth, to send princes in his anger, and hypocrites 'propter peccata populi' for the people's sin, were merely idle, if it were free for us at all times, upon these visitations and sharp corrections, by the pope's help, either to abate our penance, or to end our punishment. It is expressed and improved in the scriptures, as a portion of the divine prerogative to chastise kings; then belike no part of a priest's jurisdiction, that is consigned to another element. 'Per Deam regnant reges,' by God they reign: then not at the pope's pleasure. Of God only they hold their crowns and dignities: then not bound by divine laws to yield up their crowns 'in manus Papales,' in fear of process, as some more fearfully than royally have done in other ages, when the popes summoned them. From his mouth they receive their charge; therefore to him only and no other, they are bound to yield a just account of their stewardship. It is said by holy Job, that God places kings in their thrones 'in perpetuum,' then far from these weak tenures by copy of court-roll, at will, or in courtesie. But suppose they wax violent, and apt to quarrel upon the pride of their own strength, who shall censure them with any prejudice to their estates? not the pastor by commission, but God by prerogative. It is the property of God himself 'Regna transferre et constituere,' if we believe the prophet Daniel; and of no pastor upon earth. And he will take it for as great presumption in any mortal man that carries 'spiritum in naribus,' and is but earth and dust, to call his viceregents to account, as any earthly prince would esteem in any ordinary subject, to oppose or strive against his deputies. God giveth no commandment in his law, for observation whereof we need to ask leave of any deputy subordinate; for then were men more absolute in his election, than God in his ordinance. The reverend regard which Aaron had of Moses in respect of the civil stroke, may tender unto all the sons of Adam (how high or how great soever) that live under kings, a scale whereby to take the true latitude of a pastor's liberty so far as concerns this comparison. For no man shall aver, that God did ever give a state to any prince (so as the same were merely independant upon the challenge of any superior command) but he made him likewise free from check in the scope of his sovereignty. If then the question be put in this sort, as it ought, before it work that effect which you desire, whether the crown of England remain free from dependency upon superior command or not; if Simancha, Navarre, Sylvester, or any of the scholastical divines will either examine our records, or resort to our parliament, where matters of like quality ought to be argued and decided, (because according to the rules of all divines, religion alters not the forms of civil governments) or search the reports of the pope's own rolls; undoubtedly they would receive the same answer which popes in former times have had, and with the same quick dispatch that our antecessors in this case have thought to be requisite.

By observing with careful heed the respective manner which was used to the kings of Israel and Judah, by the legal priests, upon their transgression in those matters and degrees which are now drawn within the compass of the censures of the church, it will appear that within the five books of Moses, and all the stories of the kings, no one decree, reason, or example can be found to make good the formal process which within some few hundreds of years have been rashly put in practice against kings and emperors, upon supposition of contumacy. For though I grant that many of them did err, and in the same degrees, yet not one flower of their crowns was blasted; no not one hair of their heads ruffled, nor one grain of their royal dignity diminished. I doubt not, but if for many priests that were deposed during the practice of the legal censures by anointed kings, and those of the best kind also, as David, Solomon, Joas, Ezechias, and Josias, there could be drawn but one example of a king deposed by a Levitical anointed priest, all the schools, and pulpits of Italy would ring of it; but it falls out happily 'ut quod præcepto non jubetur, exemplo caret.'

It was hard to pick out any grievous sin against the first table of the law, whereof Saul was not guilty in his declining days: for he despaired of God's protection, he consulted with Satan's instruments, he slew the prophets: and yet it is clear, that 'ex solo indelebili unctionis caractere,' only by the character of regal unction uncancelable, he was so far privileged and secured, as well against lay-practices as Levitical decrees, that David himself entitles him 'Christum Domini,' God's anointed (which may seem strange, even after God had appointed David himself to be anointed in his place.) And the same king and prophet likewise forbears at two sundry times to take those advantages against him upon fit occasion, which the laws of God and man allow against an unlawful usurper to a lawful magistrate, without a 'non obstante' from above to moderate.

But one instance above all closeth up the mouth of contradiction itself, and unlooseth the hardest knot, that the Gordians of our age can devise to tie upon so smooth and plain a thread: for God himself by his own injunction, lays a heavy charge upon his own elect, during the time of their distress, while they sat mourning by the streams of Babylon, and hanged their harps upon the willows, that they should not only 'querere pacem illius civitatis,' seek the peace of that state, which was the seat of their exile by divine direction; but, which is much more pregnant to this purpose, that they should pray for it, 'Et in pace illius civitatis' 'suam stabilirent pacem,' and in the peace of that state politic, unfold, settle and establish their own peace and tranquillity. So hard it is for the policies or passions of men either to work or to dispense against the directions of God: and so far is the purpose and providence of God, from leaving the reins of order loose in the neck of precipitate audacity.

Now Mr. Garnet, whether your scope and drift hath been to pray for the peace and prosperity of the king's estate, (which of necessity must enjoy the privilege of Babylon, if you will needs account it Babylon) I will not appeal to your own scared conscience, but to that hymn, 'Gentem aulerto perdidam,' foolishly wrested and abused by your wreckful rage.

And touching the second point, whether you have sought to enwrap the peace of your profession in the peace of the state, or not, I will be tried by the Powder-works. But to be short, these reasons and examples drawn out of the law of Moses maketh the matter clear, how far the Levites might undertake to deal in censuring the crimes of kings, their office consisting altogether in humility and piety. For though I grant, that assaults were made in those days; on the persons of some kings, sometimes by express direction from God, which ceaseth in our days, and sometimes by the practice and presumption of traitors, which are no more to be justified, than the robberies that are committed daily at Stangate-hole, or at Shooters-hill: yet for our instruction it ought to suffice, that no such plain songs are set out in the books of divine tablature, and therefore upon false grounds no state ought to suffer, either any kind of new descent to make new division in old integrity, or such a conceited kind of voluntary, as only serveth to please factious humours. Sure I am, that though the rod of Moses were once only turned into a Serpent to give terror, yet the rod of Aaron was preserved ever, not 'in campo Martio,' but 'in testimonii tabernaculo,' sprouting forth green leaves and sweet blossoms.

But now to draw nearer to the life of that discipline, which among Christians ought rightly to be reputed regular, to examine principles, and enter into the school of Christ orderly; we must refresh your memory, Mr. Garnet, in putting you in mind, that our Saviour himself, who ought to be the highest object of your imitation, lived obediently to the laws of the state in which he was born, though perverted by pharisaical constructions and glosses 'in sensum reprobam,' and 'ex diametro,' repugnant to that scope of reformation which he only aimed at, without practising with discontented persons against the Roman tyranny, either to displace the governors, or to change the government. He commanded his disciples to give unto Cæsar what is due to Cæsar, reserving unto God what of right belongs to him. Christ would not take upon him to divide a temporal inheritance, though pressed earnestly by the party that was in suit: much less is it possible that out of passion he would have disturbed monarchies, or transformed monarchies.

To prove further that his kingdom is not of this world, he reasons à consequenti, because his followers did not put themselves in arms in his defence, as otherwise undoubtedly, in case his empire had been squared by the common rules of secular affections and devotions, they would have done; though in our days that argument was easily discharged, and that want powerfully supplied by others of that suit, that account it a breach of the church's liberty to dissolve or forbid garrisons. It is true that change of accidents may breed a change of temper, as well in bodies ecclesiastical as natural; for the church may be at one time more quiet, safe, and prosperous, as we may be better or worse disposed, more hot or cold, more sick or whole at one time than another. But as it were a strange kind of it that could transform a man with Apuleius into an ass; so were it as strange a variation in the compass of the church, to alter patience into power, the spirit into the flesh, and humility into cruelty. For philosophy doth teach, that external accidents change inward qualities: but without an absolute transmutation 'ipsius speciei,' of the very kind itself, they change no substances. Therefore I wonder how Gregory 7th and after him Boniface 8th durst adventure to claim the exercise of two swords, like wary fencers, in one scabbard, out of a text pitifully set upon the rack for the countenance of a two-fold jurisdiction; the pursuit whereof hath and will cost many lives, 'priusquam sententia judicis,' touching that particular, 'in rem judicatam transeat.' Yet I am sure that Christ the law-maker gives them over in the plain field, when they fall to dealing blows, and instead of sounding a point of war, cries out to all his own followers, 'Cur non potius patimini?' Since it is certain that 'in patientia possidentur anime,' souls are possessed in patience: a maxim far more sound and honest, than that other of the school-men, 'precipitantur principes,' by censuring and skirmishing. From the consistory of our Saviour cometh a direct prohibition, that his disciples should not 'dominari sicut reges gentium,' domineer in that fashion or manner that the kings of the Gentiles did: but if those bishops, that derive their painted and pretended right of deposing kings, from the power of Christ, might be justified according to the nature of the plea which they put in, they should 'dominari plusquam regis,' more than kings, both by setting themselves above all kings in their temporal estates, and presuming by censure to deprive them of their dominions; which (setting aside the due homage by such kings as owe suit and service to superiors) none could expect, much less demand of other; nor did ever set their foot so hard in the necks of their peers, as pope Alexander did in the neck of Frederick. For, is it likely, that when Christ not only commanded Peter to put up his sword, drawn with greater zeal in passion, than judgment upon deliberation, but added also to that charge a commination in generality, that whosoever drew the sword should perish by the sword; his purpose was to bind the hands of his apostles? but yet to leave the passions of those that should succeed them, at full liberty. Christ paid tribute unto Cæsar, as appeareth, as well for Peter as for himself; thereby moulding the measures and proportions of the church's conformity. For strange it were, that 'hæres succedens in defuncti locum,' the heir succeeding in the place of the deceased, should by any law be strengthened and enabled to do more than the testator himself might have done; or the party to whom delegation is transmitted, than the principal that did delegate. One rule can never fail, That 'discipulus' is not 'supra magistrum,' because he can never fail that gave out that rule: and if a man observe it well between the function of Christ which was 'magisterium,' and the scope now shot at, which is 'imperium,' the difference is infinite. Our Saviour acknowledged to Pilate, that the power which he both had and exercised over him, was not terrestrial, nor temporary, but it was from above: to which doctrine nothing can be more repugnant, than the schoolmen's dream, that our princes having at this day the like jurisdiction with piety, to that which Cæsar held with pride, should be subject touching their estates and dignities, to the censure of his disciples, who in person, whilst his conversation was here on earth, renounced that prerogative out of disparity to the scope and end of his office. For as our Saviour doth prove à minori in another place, that his disciples ought in reason to wash one another's feet, because he that was their master had vouchsafed out of humility to wash theirs; by the same consequence I prove, that whosoever professeth to be 'imitator Petri,' (as Peter was 'imitator Christi') ought to desist from forcible intrusion upon these undue claims of more than imperial prerogatives, which were neither challenged by any Levitical predecessor, nor possessed by the testator, nor conveyed by the testament. For the grant which was conveyed by God the Father to his Son, 'omnis iudicii,' of universal judgment both in heaven and earth, is absolute; whereas the Charter which the church of Christ receiveth of her spouse, is limited and tied to the validity of the evidence and the strength of witnesses, with the prescription of antiquity. When Christ knew that some would even in passion make him a king perforce, and mangre his affection and resolution, 'fugit in montem solus;' whereas they themselves, as 'Successores Christi, et hæredes apostolorum,' descend from the mount of contemplation into the valleys of secular agitation, to make a party for their advancement 'ad regalia Christi,' made a difference between his disciples, following a master that had not so much as the fox, a hole wherein to put his head, and those that dwell in 'regum domibus;' whereas now the difference, if there be any, is on the other side. This orderly and modest manner of proceeding, recommended by the Lycurgus of the gospel, which is Christ, was continued by the reverend apostles during their time; and likewise by the godly bishops that succeeded them, for the space of a thousand years: for further than the censure of esteeming those as ethnicks and publicans that wilfully refused to give ear to the doctrine of the church, I find not that the church presumed, the popes challenged, nor princes acknowledged.

St. Peter, from whose prerogative many seek to derive this privilege of deposing kings upon conviction, or rather supposition, as it happened for the most part, of contumacy, commands the faithful to obey even that prince that was a butcher of the flock, and a bloody tyrant in his time (because he was superexcellent) and all magistrates that were subordinate in charges and employments under him. He forbiddeth all good pastors also, which ought to be 'forma gregis,' the pattern of the flock, 'providere coacte,' to provide by compulsion, or 'in cleris dominari,' to domineer among the clergy, tho' that be within the compass of their own square, much less meant he to set them over emperors and kings that are fixed in the highest element; nay, which is more, he denies flatly, if we may give any credit to that author which bears the title of Saint Clement, that any of his successors were ordained by God, to be 'cognitores negotiorum secularium,' examiners or judges of causes that are secular, which is now become the chiefest scope and object of your primacy.

Wherefore if Peter were commanded to put up his sword, when Christ was at his elbow to heal, as he did, the greatest wound that it could make; how much more ought his successors to keep the sword within the scabbard, since it is soberly and orderly put up, and that they may do more hurt in their passion, than they can help by their privilege? St. Paul, his fellow martyr and apostle, would never have subjected 'omnem animam,' every soul, whether they were bishops or monks, regular or secular, as Chrysostom notes, to superior authority, in case he had been privy to an exemption of some souls by express warrant. The quality of evil princes ought not in reason to extenuate the force of the inhibition, tending to the peace and order both of church and state: for then St. Peter would not have commanded servants to be subject to their lords, 'non solum bonis & modestis, sed etiam dyscolis,' not only to those that are good and modest, but also to those that are perverse: 'Non propter metum, sed propter conscientiam,' not for fear but for conscience, saith God's spirit. Neither would St. Jude have censured those malecontents so sharply that do 'spernere potestatem,' 'blasphemare majestatem,' not in respect of their glory, but of their lieutenantancy. This is not the readiest and best resolution, 'manendi in vocatione,' of continuing in our vocation without impatience or strife, to wind our obedience out of that obligation wherein the gospel found us, and God hath elected us. The servants of God had recourse in all times to lawful remedies, upon the offer of unlawful wrongs: and tho' there could not be a worse prince, or rather a more ugly monster upon earth, than he that held the place of Cæsar in the time of Paul; yet 'Paulus appellavit Cæsarem,' and being taken at his word, was sent thither to be tried orderly. It was lawful for the prophet Nathan to reprove David for his sin, tho' he did not pluck him out of his chair of state. Our Saviour describing Herod's quality, in crafty circumvention of God's saints, did properly and aptly term him, 'vulpen,' a fox, tho' he did not undertake to hunt him out of his earth. And tho' to warn, admonish, and assure the Tetrarch, 'non licere,' that it was not lawful for him to keep his brother's wife, were an office fit for a John Baptist, and a worthy pastor of a holy church; yet he neither would nor durst adventure to release his subjects of their faith which they ought him by their homage. Polycarpus the disciple of St. John, as we find him reported by Eusebius, dispensed with no breach of any bond, tho' in cases that intend peril to salvation, as idolatry, and the like. The Christians of the first age were neither Albinians nor Negrians, sayeth Tertullian; that is, stained with no faction either to those aspiring parties, or affections of the time, but devoted the service of the sovereign, 'quomodo licuit & ipsi.s expedierit,' so far as it was lawful for the person, and expedient for the prince himself. How far is that? Even so far as they honour him, 'ut hominem a Deo secundum, & solo Deo minorem,' as the next person to God, and inferior to him alone, without making him, as some did, a competitor with the Omnipotent.

Honest men will start and shrink at those loud alarms, when they read with how great obedience and humility, that blessed father Athanasius, upon whose shoulders our aged mother the church of God leaned, in the time of sharpest persecution, to take her rest, cleared himself of the false suspicions and wrongful aspersions, that were cast on him by device of speaking evil of Constantius the great Arian emperor: his dutiful respect was grounded upon that warning of the Holy Ghost, not to curse the king in the secret of our conscience, nor in the most private and inward corner of our cabinet to wish evil to him. St. Hilary would not so much as moderate or stint himself, but leaves it wholly to the discretion of a wicked emperor, 'quatenus et quomodo eum loqui jubeat,' how and how far he would bid him speak. St. Ambrose acknowledgeth no weapons of defence to be so proper to the priest, as tears and prayers: for I can pray, saith he, I can sigh and weep, but I cannot resist any other way. And therefore St. Jerome to Heliodorus saith, a king ruleth men whether they will or no; a bishop those that are willing. 'Ille terrore subjecit, hic servituti donatur.'

friction and scorn, 'Quia imperatori cum ecclesia?' What hath the emperor to deal or intermeddle with the church? Optatus a learned father, answers tunably to the note and ditty of Tertullian that is mentioned before, that, since God only is above the sovereign, Donatus in extolling himself above the emperor, as Antichrist out of pride shall above all that is called God, 'jam hominum excessit metas,' hath now transcended the bounds of humanity. The patience and piety of thirty popes laying down their heads upon the block successively, at the first planting of the church, to seal the bond of conscience with the blood of innocency, may teach those that come after, as well to follow their example, as to claim their primacy. For though Liberius, a pastor of that rank, was unjustly banished and exiled from his church; yet he never sought to right himself by the bloody sword, but rather by that golden rule of obedience and patience, which our Saviour left to his disciples 'sub sigillo,' and they to the church in 'deposito.' Simaucha with his fellows may perhaps answer to these passages, that the church was swathed all this while in the bands of weakness, that the sickle carried not at that time an edge sharp enough for those stubborn weeds, and that the faithful had not as yet raised themselves to that height of credit, that might give life to their execution. But if the constancy of obedience had been squared by the liberty of men's election, and this had been the latitude of loyalty in those well disposed times when bishops only sought God's honour, not their own prerogatives: surely the church of Christ had wanted a great part of those martyrs and confessors, which are ranked at this day in the Roman calendar. They that take this scope, may conceive and publish when it pleaseth them, that lay subjects in like manner are no longer bound to obedience and loyalty, than they find themselves over-weak to make powerful opposition to ungodly magistrates; and so confound all laws of justice in the state, and all degrees of subjects that in private are bound to live orderly. Tertullian doth notably convince this paradox, as well of falshood as levity, by making a clear demonstration of the strength and potency of godly christians in his own time, (which was among the first) in case they would have put their forces to the strongest proof, since all public places, as courts, consistories, camps, and forts, were stored and furnished with men of that profession and quality.

The legions that were entertained by faithless princes in pay, and prospered in the greatest actions they undertook, might have purchased a far better fortune at an easier rate, in case they could have satisfied their own consciences, by opposing against order. If the godly christians that lived under Constantius the Arian, would have sought their ease, by stepping over to the service of Constance and Gratian that were religious; they might have caused their own sovereign to shrink at their transport, that before made advantage of their humility. If any man will take upon him more in these days, saith Chrysostome, than was granted heretofore to subjects that were under infidels, 'Quod majora sibi concredita esse dixerint,' because they say that more is committed unto them; they must be taught, 'non ' nunc honoris sui tempus esse,' that it is not the time and place of their preferment, since they are as pilgrims in this world, but they shall in another shew appear more bright and glorious to all men, 'quando Christus apparuerit, ' et tunc cum Christo comparebunt in gloria,' when Christ appears, and they with him then shall appear in glory. Though St. Gregory confesseth himself to have been so powerful in Italy, that he needed not to have left among the Lombards either duke or count, in case he would have opposed confidently his endeavour against their rage: yet finding Theodolinda the queen to have been seduced slyly by some serpent of that sort from the sincerity of her profession, and dangerously withdrawn from God to Belial, from piety to heresy; took no harder course than by forewarning her with a fatherly affection, and in humble terms to take heed in time, that she tainted not the sweet bread of many moral virtues (worthy to be served in the supper of the Lamb) with the leaven of the falshood and impiety of those misbelieving teachers that abused her credulity.

It had not been hard for Chrysostom, in respect of the tender love which was borne him by his flock, not 'ad aras' only, but 'ultra ' aras,' if his patience had been pliant to their desires, to have wearied that ungodly princess Eudoxia, that would never give him rest nor breath in the crooked ways of her own wickedness. But if the doctrine of some schoolmen in this age be found to differ so much from the former demonstrations of obedience and truth, why should I not complain, 'That ' nunc definit ' esse remedio locus, ubi quæ fuerant olim vitia, ' nunc mores sint?' It is true that long after this, the officers of the French king, Philip the Fair, complained, and upon just cause, 'augenda sacerdotum jura, jura regia minuit,' that the king's rights or liberties were appeared by raising the rights and privileges of the priests. It may be likewise true that is written by a countryman of ours, that Gregory the seventh confessed on his death-bed, (but with what remorse or touch of conscience God knows) 'ex minutione laicorum se sacerdotum promovisse gloriam,' which in divers words is of one effect: but yet all bishops were not of that mind, but keeping fast in memory that observation of the prophet David, That to drink of waters drawn from the springs of Bethel, with peril and hazard of men's lives, was 'san- ' guinem bibere,' to drink blood, were as cautious in quenching sparks of dissension and strife by charity, as others were to kindle them out of ambition and vain-glory. For in cases of this nature, 'Non est opus servientis animæ, sed ' medentis studio,' for charity is patient and courteous, 'Nec inflatur nec est ambitiosa,' Peter hath two keys, one of knowledge, another of power: these are prepared and fitted also to two locks, that is, induration and ignorance: and hardly shall we find, that without both, and a sure use of both, any strong locks of opposition or obstruction have been opened. Wherefore no man need to doubt, but that among so many godly, grave, and learned bishops, as will ever rank themselves 'tanquam ' in acie ordinata,' to discourage and affright the forlorn hopes of Simancha's school, these positions will sink: and some that have been loth to yield out of humour, yet will be forced to faint out of cowardice.

The godly learned never once vouchsafed to lend their ears to the deceitful tunes of bewitching charms; rather grounding their opinions upon the fourth council of Toledo, by which all sorts of persons are condemned without distinction or exception, 'Qui fidem regibus suis sacramento promissum observare contemnerent,' that contemned or scorned to keep the faith which they promised by oath to their sovereign; taking by this first part, all perfidious traitors in general.

But that which follows, pincheth Navarre and his disciples at the very heart: 'Ut ore ' simularent juramenti professionem, cum mente ' retinerent perfidiam impietatem,' and with their mouth dissembled a profession by oath, when in their minds, or mentally, to use the very word of our school-men at this day, they retained still the wicked purpose of treason. Indeed Pythagoras imprinted nothing in the minds of his scholars more deeply, than that profane verse, 'Jura, perjura, secretum prodere noli.'

The Epicuro on the other side was satisfied 'modo mentem injuratum gereret, etiamsi lingua juraret.' And you, Mr. Garnet, (to make up such a triangle as can never be reduced to a cube, that is, a perfect square) divulge and publish to your auditory (which those blind philosophers durst not profess beyond the compass of their schools) that it is lawful to draw words to the sense of thoughts, to cast a mist of error before an eye of single trust, and to deceive your brother for your own security. I am very sure the learned fathers neither knew the way, nor had the will to escape by such a kind of 'deceptio visus,' as directly tends 'ad destructionem animæ.' For when Athanasius was overtaken by a pursivant, and asked 'Quantum inde abesset Athanasius?' how far Athanasius was from thence? though it stood upon his life in a time, as you make of this, of persecution, and he a person far more choice and dainty for the defence of God's own quarrel, as appeared by his quick and sharp encounters with the professed enemies of truth in that holy Nicene council, than you are in this kingdom for the justification of those bad attempts and impious actions, which you take in hand, yet he answered as freely without fraud as fear, 'non ' longè abesse Athanasium:' which was very true, because he was the man for whom the party sought, and cared little, as appears, how soon they met him. A man of weak conceit may apprehend how far our Saviour himself was from these chymical constructions and evasions sophistical, by that universal proposition, 'Qui-

'cunque me negaverit,' whosoever denied him before men, should be denied by him before his Father, &c. For to put out cautious equivocators from all hope of succour in this streight by their distinction of verbal and mental negatives, I urge the precedent warning in that very text before, 'Non timere eos qui occidunt corpus, et animam non possunt occidere;' not to fear those which have power only to kill the body, and not the soul. For if our Saviour had left his disciples such a strength of surety for retreat upon pursuit, as verbal flourishes, whatsoever were conceived or resolved in the mind, he needed not so carefully to arm them with encouragement and hope against assaults of cruelty.

The passages which both you and other of your complices wrest from the mouth of Christ himself for a fair countenance of cozenage in this labyrinth, would rather 'commovere nau-
'seam quam bilem:' though I must tell you, that singular examples drawn from our Saviour, that was both God and man, and not only knew by his eternal wisdom, but was also by his matchless power to rectify whatsoever seemed to our dull conceits obscure, are neither rules of our encouragement, nor warrants for our imitation. I make no doubt for my part, but these eggs of equivocation and mental reservation, never engendered nor covered by fairer birds in better times, were hatched, as the poets feign of osprays, with a thunder-clap. For among the martyrs and pastors primitive, their praises were resounded with the loudest and sweetest cries, that were most resolute, without evasions or tricks, to lay down a transitory life in a moment, to the purchase of a better in eternity; so far they were from forcing wit, or straining craft to secure cowardice. But to pass over this just motive of digression, I will conclude the chief point, which is the care best men have ever had, to prefer obedience before security, loyalty before life, with a discreet answer of a pope to a king of ours, which may serve you for a better precedent in the course of patience, than that either of Gregory 7, Boniface 8, or Alexander 6, in their practices of extremity, if it so stand with your pleasure. Richard the holy warrior, having committed a Norman bishop prisoner, whom he took in field against him with his coat armour upon his back, received within a while after an urgent request, if not a powerful instance, from the pope, at the earnest desire of other bishops, for the prisoner's enlargement; whom it pleased his fatherhood in the letter, by a word of indulgency, but yet without that ground of equity which moved the apostle, 'obsecrare pro filio suo, quem genuit in vinculis,' to press Philemon for his son Onesimus, whom he begat to Christ and his church in duress, to call his son. The king wittily alluding by his answer to that place in Genesis, where Joseph's parti-coloured and pied coat was offered to the aged father stained and sprinkled with blood, sent not the prisoner who remained fast, but the coat armour, which was loose, to the pope, inquiring 'à beatissimo Pa-

'tre' (by this mild question) 'an hæc esset filii
'sui tunica?' whether this were the coat of his son? The pope surprized with a demonstration, and observing heedfully the marks which could not lye, returned a grave answer to the king, 'Nec hanc esse filii sui tunicam,' That neither this was the attire of his son, nor he purposed so to acknowledge the party that was taken in that coat, and therefore left him wholly to civil justice, and the king's gracious pleasure. For it is true, that ambition, which is most bold upon advantage, is most cowardly upon surprize: and howsoever humours may sometimes urge minds that are not evenly balanced with discretion and conscience, to undertake attempts ever above duty, and oftentimes above their strength; yet second wits observe the slips and errors of the first, and thereupon concluding at more leisure out of judgment, that 'vis expers
'consilii mole ruit sua,' they begin likewise to fear that vast desires as well as buildings, where foundations are not firm, sink by their own magnitude. It is not possible that humours should be durable, considering that 'materia
'præma,' the first matter, out of which they spring, like Proteus, is capable of as many shifts and forms as the world hath variations and accidents, wearing and consuming like a garment with incessant use: but the moral virtues which have their root in the Deity itself, and derive their influence from grace, must of necessity be co-eternal with their author, who doth not only plant, but water, and produce out of his own goodness, correspondent fruits that suit their original.

By these demonstrations we learn what laws were current, what bounders kept, and what course and manner of proceeding was observed towards princes by modest bishops, which either lived very near, or imitated those that lived next to the precedents of apostolic humility. Now therefore it shall not be impertinent, the subject moving in due place and with due circumstance, to describe, not by idle imaginations, but by evident impressions, how covertly, and as it were by stealth, incroachments crept upon the carpet, before they durst by any forcible attempt invade the seat of power: 'et cum
'dormirent homines, venit homo inimicus;' and when men were in sleep, the devil came, 'et
'superseminavit zizania.' It is confessed indifferently by all persons of all sorts, that are either judicious or sensitive, that those maxims which pierce to the center, and touch the very life of conscience, ought rather to be fixed upon the poles of constancy, than carried upon the wheels of change; and that not Israel alone, but all moral and indifferent affections ought to answer Amen to the curse which God pronounced with his own mouth against all men of whatsoever quality, that dare presume to remove or put aside land-marks, or bounders of jurisdiction, which preserve peace: and yet by tract of time and long experience, we see that 'ab illo motu, trepidationis,' ever since that trepidation or quivering, as it is termed by astrologers, which prevailed in the minds of fearful princes, under powerful strains, there have been many variations of degrees and distances in the conclusions of church government, especially within these last 600 years; which moves wise men to resort to the judgment of a grave philosopher, discoursing of diversity of times and persons that did sway those times, either by predominance or art, 'quo minus ob ortu aberant,' the less distant they were from the first original, the more perfectly they discerned truth: and of the same mind is Tertulian, 'perfectiora prima,' the nearer the spring head, the purer streams: which is the scope of our industry.

To rip up matters therefore from the very root, without obstruction or passion, we may observe, that so long as the plough of persecution did not only make deep furrows on the backs of godly bishops by torture, (which the prophet by the text in the Psalm, 'Super dorsum meum fabricaverunt peccatores,' seemeth to touch) but by vexation and anguish also in their very souls, which those humble spirits feel that are most sensitive of the least scratch given to loyalty; it rent up by the roots all those weeds of ambition and emulation which in calm seasons are apt to spring out of the rank grounds of original infirmity: for till the blessed reign of Constantine, wherein the rage of persecution began to cease, I find almost universally no other kind of strife among the godly fathers, than whose counsel or endeavour, by a religious and modest kind of emulation, might be of best use to the propagation of the Church's limits, and of God's glory. The Church itself (which is the body mystical of Christ) might by analogy be properly resembled to the stomach of a body natural, which though it receive much, yet makes equal distribution, by dividing and dispersing that which it receives, to the use and sustenance of all the other parts, which would otherwise decay, and by degrees waste and perish.

If all this while a tribune had stood up to complain against the Church of Rome, as Menenius Agrippa did against the senate, comparing it to the belly, which devoured all, and did no good, the poorest and the weakest member would have utterly disclaimed and disavowed the least sense of such a wrong: but if the belly afterwards by caring only how to feed itself, did pine the other parts (as the populars did then suggest) and by transforming the orderly and well compacted body of the state poltick into a monster, by so great disproportion of nourishment, did violate the laws of nature, and dissolve the bonds of union, we must confess, that both Menenius with them, and, if the case be like, all faithful patriots and members among us, have reason to require remedy.

It is certain, that the end of these first bishops was then to feed the flock, not to fill the pail; to spread the faith, not to extend the line; to draw kings to perfection, not to depose them from their states; to settle peace, not to raise dissension; to prepare the subjects hearts to obedience, not to inflame it with prejudice; to be at peace with all the world, holding peace of conscience to be all in all, so they might gain to Christ, and in no case to shew themselves 'percursores,' or 'violentes,' which the canons of the church, beside the prohibition of Paul himself, will not suffer.

Some of the latter, but best learned, writers, finding by the curious examination of sundry passages, and infinite interpreters, how hard, or rather how impossible it is to prove their title to this high prerogative of deposing kings, by direct evidence out of the word of God, and such witnesses of record as are above exception; resort to prove by charter, grant, and privilege from princes' pieties: as for example, from Constantine the first and best, Phocas the first and worst, Ina king of the West Saxons that was religious, and king John that was impious, as well 'sans foye,' as his title was 'sans terre.' In which crew, some intending serious devotion, others pretending feigned satisfaction to other ends; and all, as the times then taught, that no seeds spring up more speedily than those which are sown 'in area Dominica,' for redemption of souls, left them better earnest of their hopes by gift, than our Saviour did in his testament by legacy. Against the pretended charter or donation, which some of the canonists more zealous than judicious seek to derive from Constantine to Sylvester, though I need say little, because the best grounded judgments and most modest spirits of that sort, have torn away the painted visard from that warped face; yet because in matters of this moment too much cannot be said, I mean, more succinctly than the nature of that subject, being once undertaken, doth permit, to press some short arguments. First, how unlike it is that Sylvester, the next bishop but one to that worthy and renowned rank of martyrs that lost their lives for the profession of Christ, should upon the first pause of respiration to take breath, after so many manful combats against God's enemies, abuse the favour of so gracious a time, by hunting after the vain tenures of principality. The bishops that have kept themselves above water all this while, by the strength and favour of that powerful hand, which supported Peter on the seas when he was at the point to sink, by learning now to swim suddenly with the bladders of the world's ambition, might have cast themselves into greater danger of drowning in the rivers of Damascus, than in the Red-Sea that the saints passed over.

Platina reports out of the pope's own records, that Sylvester refused at the hand of Constantine 'diadema gemmis distinctum,' a crown or diadem set with precious stones, as an ornament not convenient nor agreeable to a pastor in his place. Though godly Nestor calls it only 'signum superbie,' a sign or badge of pride; Sylvester should have been found guilty not of a sign, but of pride itself, and that in the highest kind, by the grand jury of all his predecessors saints in heaven, in case he had accepted what these men certify to have been offered. Among the fathers and histories of the church (how copious and large soever in expressing the great favours which the spouse of Christ received by the piety and bounty of this emperor in other kinds) appears no scrip of evidence to make good this grant; which were an argument of great ingratitude, if they had either heard of any disposition in the prince to give it, or in the pope to accept it. Neither is it like that so religious a prince would have left that to his son, that he gave to the church, nor from thence his godly successors, as Theodosius, would have detained it. Besides, all writers prove how powerful the lieutenants of the Greekish empire, whom they called Exarchs, were long after the date of this pretence, which could not stand with the strength wherein hereby they strive to plant the papacy. I find by direct acknowledgement, 'venisse proventus, &c.' that revenues came from certain places for the maintainance of the church of St. Paul, erected at the humble suit of Sylvester by Constantine; and from Sardinia, by the report of some, to that church which his holy mother built. Again, that the tributes were conferred on the churches, which some cities payed into the exchequer in former times: and these I take to be the shadows and colours of this idle dream. For of the charter itself, which exceedeth ten times in value all that is recorded touching churches in particular, and in respect of a greater eminency and prerogative, should have carried a far greater reputation, and made a fairer shew, there is not so much as a mark whereby they may take their aim that are most ambitious. How little credit, strength or honour any church can gain by deriving charters from Phocas, a lascivious faithless tyrant, wickedly enbrued with the slaughter of Mauritius his master, wife, and heirs, and usurping that estate unjustly, by the countenance whereof he was bold to give more than either of right he ought or could, I leave to their opinions that love to measure claims and titles rather by the line of equity, than by the last of ambition. But yet to make more of a tyrant by vouchsafing a short answer to his shadow, than in conscience is requisite; I first infer that such charters granted chiefly upon ground of cunning, and with a purpose to maintain the plot by party, which was undertaken and begun by fraud, might either have been afterward revoked by himself, or annulled and repealed by his successors: and further say, by judgment of the best civilians, that no prince's act is warrantable, without the publick assent, according to that maxim, 'Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus approbari debet,' that tendeth to the state's prejudice.

Last of all, I prove that our country in particular could take no copper by this transposition; admitting it to have been sound and absolute, because we were excluded from the care, protection and providence of the Roman empire, very near two hundred years before that Phocas with his bloody hand began to steer that monarchy. For after that, Flavius, lieutenant for the Roman emperor in the parts of France, did only send instructions and orders to the wasted Britons how to range their battles, and dispose their fights, with a careful, and yet a final answer, not to look for any more supplies or aids for that estate, which then fell into faction, and was no longer able to support itself; the Britons holding themselves abandoned, (in which case all laws free them both of duty, and dependency) after many bloody battles under their own kings against the Scots and Picts, fell into the Saxons hands, who like a Pharaoh that never knew Joseph or his father's house, erected a brave monarchy, tho' sometimes quartered and divided into many parts among themselves, and maintained it in absolute authority, without acknowledgment of any foreign or superior command, till by a second or third relapse, it became a prey to the Norman conquest. Wherefore Phocas having neither possession nor right in this state (left by negligence, or abandoned by necessity so many years before,) could convey no more to the church, than he either had, or ought to have, which was 'accidens sine subjecto, individuum vagum,' and a 'nihil indeclinabile.' The contribution of Peter-pence to Rome by Ina, being called in the Saxon histories the king's Almeson, in the laws of Canutus, 'Larga Regis benignitas,' and in that abstract which is left of the Confessor's and Conqueror's decrees, 'Regis eleemosyna,' proceeded, as the words import, not of duty but of charity; and in respect of any temporal prerogative, which is the key of these aspiring claims, doth rather prove the pope then sitting to have been king Ina's headsmen, than king Ina then reigning, to have been the pope's homager.

I could alledge also an allowance of a special mansion for English pilgrims that were drawn to Rome about affairs, bearing that title to this day, in respect of the great piety and bounty of the Saxon kings; which falling within the compass of that natural contract 'Do ut des,' copiously handled by the civil laws, and compared with the contribution, may rather prove an exchange than an imposition.

To the colour of king John's donation, who was as likely to have parted with his soul as with his crown, and upon the same conditions, if necessity had pressed him; I could give satisfaction by that sound note of a monk of Saint Albans, according tunably with that former concerning Phocas out of the civil laws, that, 'Regis non est dare regnum, quod est republica, sine assensu Baronum qui tenentur regnum defendere:' and therefore he cannot give away the ports and cities, which are branches and members of the main. But I will take it up a straighter link, and avow by Matthew Paris, that so far was the parliament, which he termeth 'Regni universitatem,' from assenting 'detestanda obligationi' to this detestable and hateful band, as it is fitly called by the monk of Westminster, that the metropolitane himself, 'pro universitate contradixit,' contradicted and withstood it in the behalf of the whole parliament.

The judgment of Philip the French king upon the publication of this charter is much commended by a writer of that age, for the defence of this Paradox, which he thought would prove 'perniciosum regibus et regnis exemplum,' a dangerous example, and fearful precedent both to kings and kingdoms. He would have men resort to Peter's successors about matters that concern the soul, and not 'de regnis, guerris, vel militia,' which do not belong to him. Last of all, the saying which was luckily inserted in this charter or donation, namely, 'Salvis nobis et herædibus nostris justitiis, libertatibus et regalibus nostris,' makes it absolutely void and of no effect: the main prerogative being safely preserved, by God's providence, which the king would otherwise have let slip, by a circumvented and over-awed facility. It is reported by the monk of Westminster, a witness, according to the state of those times, of best regard, that the pope residing and abiding at Lyons, this detestable grant was burnt. The author of Eulogium addeth further, that it was released 'cum omni fidelitate et homagio,' by the pope's direction to the English parliament. And sir Thomas More, that lost his life in defence of the pope's primacy, deserves best of any to be credited in my conceit, avowing first a weakness in the king seeking to subject his crown to superior commands; and next, in the grant a nullity. Besides, not only sir Thomas More affirms, that the pope's imposition, with the king's concession, was never paid; but it is further fortified by addition out of the roll of parliament, in the fiftieth year of Edward 3rd, that when the king was threatened with a citation from Rome for detaining dues upon this grant, with large arrearage, the whole body spiritual and temporal of the kingdom there assembled, after grave deliberation and long advisement, 'resisterent et contradicerent, avec toute leur puissance;' and upon these grounds, that the charter was against the king's oath at his coronation, and without the voice of his parliament.

Since therefore Phocas, Ina, John, nor Constantine, add any further weight to the pretence of a deposing interest, than was in charge before; discretion and observation will judge whether the state of the Roman bishops were not had in greater reverence while they sought to win by piety, than to strain in passion, to bow than to break, and to temper than to exasperate. Religion and humility then were the corner-stones of that stately front which the world so much at the first admired in the church of Rome, tho' afterward by the change of bishops in that see, and of humours in those bishops, so great alteration was found, as Minerva coming afterward to Athens, could hardly take notice of her own ship, nor Constantine at Rome of his own nurse: nor, as St. Hierome notes of painted women, that cast up their eyes to heaven, if we consider how many false colours have been set upon the pillars of church government, hardly Christ of his own creature in the time of pope Alexander the 6th, if he had been put in mind to call on him. In the beginning it agreed with Daniel's image in the head of gold for godly government, in the breast of silver for unspotted conscience, and in the legs of brass for incessant industry. But afterward in succeeding ages, the heads of many popes grew humourous, their breasts avaricious, and their legs idle.

That holy Nicene Council, whereof I never speak without reverence and due regard, in that great division which was made of the patriarchal jurisdictions according to the state of the church in those days, for establishment of discipline and preservation of unity, speaks not one word of any temporal command, much less of any right in suspending or deposing kings, or absolving subjects from their oaths of obedience and loyalty, to be left in the nature of an Hierome to the Roman bishops by primitive acknowledgment. But as Sallust, very gravely and like a faithful patriot, complains touching the state politick of Rome in his own time, that 'postquam divitiæ honori esse cœpere et eas gloria, imperium, potentia sequerentur;' Faction and pride began to creep up to the seats of senators, and the publick justice of the state to shake: So likewise in the church we find, that upon like corruption like disorders grew, and many weaknesses began daily more and more to disclose themselves in those bright sun-shine days which the saints enjoyed by the bounty of a better prince, as cockle starts up when corn grows ripe, which before was either shadowed with discouragement, or suppressed by discipline. I speak not this, because some such kinds of heats and quick distempers have not sometimes happened, and may not by occasions fall out again between God's own elect, as Peter and Paul, Paul and Barnabas, and the godly bishops in this very council, which I press, tho' with that measure which becomes the ministers of God and his apostles successors, because it pleaseth him sometimes out of our error to raise his own honour, and to make virtue perfect and compleat by infirmity: but to make it plain, that plenty is the daughter of prosperity, ambition of plenty, and corruption of ambition. For after that bishops were admitted to appeal from civil courts by the emperor himself, and their sentences by imperial authority were made equal to his own; they began to raise their crest, and within a while, as it is testified by one of the most antient approved writers of the church, 'Episcopatus Romanus non aliter quam Alexandrinus quasi extra sacerdotii lines egressus, ad secularem principatum jam antè delapsus est.' The see of Rome, in the same manner as that of Alexandria, as it were exceeding the limits and bounds of priesthood, had slid into secular principality; tho' the bishops of neither of those sees, as we may assure ourselves, were ignorant of Paul's prohibition to all degrees of pastors, that they should not intermeddle with secular affairs; so far as concerns an over-dropping of the regal plants, because a bishop should no more live out of the element of the church, nor a monk out of a desert, than a fish out of water. For Christ fled into the mountains when the people would have made him king: and bishops ought with Joseph rather to leave their cloaks behind them, than to consent to the charms and vain enticements of the world, which like the wanton wife of Potiphar stretcheth forth her arms, and, with the Syrenes, straineth her voice to draw them within the compass of temptation, and then taketh hold to drown them in sensuality.

Now, whereas it is said by Socrates, 'Jam ante delapsus est,' that the see of Rome did slip before that time, whereof he speaks, into secular principality, I am induced by the report of Ammianus Marcellinus, a grave writer, though no christian, to take my level somewhat higher for the finding of my mark: for he living in that time about the court, and observing as it were from the main top of the temporal estate, what course was kept among all sorts and qualities of persons in divers elements, makes mention of a bloody slaughter in a church of Rome, where the christians were wont to meet for the celebration of their mysteries, about the violent competition and contention between Damasus and Ursicinus for the papacy; and taketh notice of 137 carcasses drawn out of that church where they met about election: and further writeth, that Vivianus, then lieutenant to the emperor, was glad to make retreat into the suburbs, till the rage were tempered, or the strife ended. After this, as a man partial to neither part, and therefore in all likelihood the more indifferent and just in deeming rightly of the true state of the cause, he gathers the chiefest motive of contention and emulation about the means of compassing this height, to proceed from the great ease, wealth, and honour, that prevailed and were surely settled and established in that dignity. His reasons are, for that 'Matronarum oblationibus ditabantur,' they were enriched with the offerings of matrons or great ladies: they rode in coaches publicly: they were choicely suited in their apparel; their diet dainty, and sometimes above the rate and use of princes in the times of their banqueting. That Damasus a competitor was one of these, Ammianus doth not affirm; much less do I believe, finding with what respect and reverence St. Hierom that had been himself a priest of Rome doth speak of him: yet the manner of his climbing and aspiring to the seat was scandalous, not only unto such as were religiously devout, but even to Ammianus Marcellinus that was but morally precise: as doth appear by that grave judgment which he gives of the blessed state, which as he thinks the bishops of Rome might enjoy, in case they lived in that sober manner, with that bare diet, mean apparel, and humble looks cast to the ground, which other bishops in the country did, neither tasting nor esteeming those choice pleasures and delights which the delicacy and great abundance of that place afforded them.

This passion of a writer whom we account prophane, in respect he was unregenerate to Christ, nor nursed by the breast of his spouse the church, puts me in mind of a zealous passion in Hector Boetius, a great Roman Catholic, upon this very subject in the Scottish history, 'Hujusmodi antistites quàm sunt illorum dissimiles quia diversa ingrediuntur via cum locum illorum occupent, &c.' He wonders at the difference between those bishops, and others at this day, which succeeding in their places, take another course: they glistered not in gold, they were not resiant in princes courts, they were not attended by guards, nor skilful in the art of dissembling, more gainful by many degrees than that of poetry, which the universities use to crown with laurel. This moved Boniface, I mean the martyr, not the challenger, to prefer the devotion of the golden bishops, that in the church's poverty administered with greater fervency in wooden chalices, before the vanity of many blockish bishops that in a richer state with more solemnity and less zeal, administer in chalices of gold; because, as Hierom notes, external riches add not to the worth of him, 'qui corpus Domini in canistro vimineo, sanguinem in vitro portat;' that carries the body of our Lord in a wicker basket, and his blood in a glass. I would not be conceived by this speech, to favour their ridiculous conceits, that labour to draw the substance or the value of those vessels in which sacraments are administrated, to the first simplicity: for, the reason of David's judging it indecent for him to lodge in 'domo cedrina cum arca Dei' 'esset sub pellitis,' draws me to a greater estimation of vessels appertaining to so high a mystery. For sure I am, that the value of the content, doth infinitely surmount the content; and 'in adiaphoris,' that is, things indifferent, we are left to the rule of decency.

My only purpose is but to observe and tax the declination of piety, together almost at one instant with multiplication of metals and minerals, the labour which is made for charges and employments for commodity alone without conscience; and to limit those excessive grants 'in manu viva,' which our antecessors did 'in manu mortua,' and the ranging of internal piety to external pomp, though of both it were better, that we wanted means that are superfluous, than the moderation that is necessary. For Chrysostom notes two great absurdities in cranning churches till satiety constrain them to regeorge; the one, that laymen are deprived of occasion to shew charity; the other, that the pastors themselves often neglect their duties, to become collectors. This is no ground for gleaming from the church, which at this day doth rather need 'largitore hilari, quàm interpretate maledico:' but to prove that arguments against excess and height, are the surest tenures, and the strongest pillars of stability: for 'in se magna ruunt, summisque negatima est stare diu.' In defence of Ammianus Marcellinus from exception either of partiality or ignorance in that which he speaketh of the matrons, I vouch a manifest decree set forth, not by the leeches and blood-suckers of the Church, but by Valentinian and Gratian, religious and worthy princes, against any gain to be made by the priests of the church by ladies offerings; and this decree was published by Damasus himself, according to direction of state: which proves that Ammianus in the judgment which he gave touching the motives of dissention, and opposition, spake not idly.

To make the case more plain, whosoever raiseth any further doubt, may learn of St. Hierom, that some such excess (or at least oversight) was censured about that time: where he seems not to be so much grieved and perplexed with the publishing of such a law lighting upon just desert, as with the motive of that law, which was greediness. Therefore our English bishops in the time of Edward 3, assented (though unwillingly) to the limiting of church revenues, when the state's necessity put in a caveat. And the pope himself pretended neither quarrel nor unkindness to St. Lewis of France, for inhibiting the grant of any more lands or revenues, than had been converted in former times to churches without his privy.

The ground of this respective caution and moderation, I take to be derived from the course which Moses held, being a person as well publicly wise, as spiritually devout, in commanding all the peoples offerings of benevolence and piety to cease, after he had drawn in that proportion which was sufficient for the furniture of the tabernacle, where God was to be served and honoured. For the least excess in things (which with moderation are laudable) doth easily degenerate into vice, and all turns to humour that transcends the due proportion of nourishment. We may soon be taught in Genesis, that they which could be satisfied with no moderate degrees of altitude, in seeking to build castles in the air, before their spires and battlements might touch the clouds, were confounded in their own idleness.

You have heard how the churches of Rome and Alexandria were engulfed in the depths of secular principality to the wound of monarchy, although 'spiritualis potestas non ideo præsidet, ut terrenæ in suo jure prejudicium faciat,' saith a learned schoolman. But how hardly in the mean time the civil state did brook these slips, let us learn (if we deal indifferently) of Orestes, who was then lieutenant for the emperor, and complaineth bitterly of some bishops, 'Quod per eos non nihil de auctoritate eorum detractum esset, qui ad magistratus gerendos designati essent,' that they drew much from the authority of those persons which were appointed to bear office. This gallant gentleman began very early to discover (and by the break of day) by what degrees the mystery of ambition began to mine into the strength of monarchy: he feared (and not without great likelihood) lest princes seeking to resume their rights, might in time be dealt withal, as the badger was by the hedgehog: for being wounded with the prickles of his offensive guest, whom at the first he welcomed and entertained in his cabin as an inward friend, he mannerly desired him to depart in kindness as he came, but yet could receive no other satisfaction to his just expostulation, than, That he for his own part found himself to be very well at ease, and they that were not, had reason to seek out another seat that might like them better. He foresaw by this forerunning light, That misletoe and ivy sucking by their strait embraces, the very sap that only giveth vegetation from the roots of the oak and hawthorn, must bloom and flourish of necessity, when the trees should wither.

I know that civil jurisdiction in that good measure which is compatible with a pastor's charge, is so far from that inconvenience of hindering the growth of piety, as some conceive, as it rather ripens the fruits which in a further distance from the sun, are either nipped by the frost, or blasted by some bitter wind: so according to that of Nahum, 'Residuum locustæ brucus devoret.' I tax those only that presume by forged evidence to contend and strive with mighty princes for their seats, or attempt to set them besides their thrones, which the blessed Virgin makes a portion of God's own prerogative. Otherwise I say with Paul of all the faithful, 'Si in illis modus judicabitur, indigni sunt qui de minimis judicent?' If the world shall be judged by them, are they unworthy to decide matters of least account? And again, 'Si Angelos judicent, quanto magis secularia?' and therefore Epiphanius the bishop of Cyprus is highly commended in the stories of the church, for the discreet temper and decent order he held in managing affairs both ecclesiastical and temporal. The council of Carthage understood very perfectly the way to moderate between both extremes, and in fanning away the smoke of pride, to preserve the gloss of unsoiled modesty. But the patriarch of Constantinople finding by careful observation of times and accidents, what strange effects the church of Rome had wrought in raising patriarchal jurisdiction as high as the jealousy of government and incompatibility of imperial prerogative would endure, adventured upon the wings of pride, to mount so far above the pitch of his other partners, as if St. Gregory himself had not abated this presumption, more by the strength of arguments than the edge of power, it is not unlike but he would have made himself in the end by faction of adherents 'similem altissimo.'

Thus easy it is for many grains of sand by Neptune's blessing to make a shelf; for many Peter-pence by Ina's bounty to make a bank; and by gathering a great heap of sticks together by Minerva's providence, to make a nest high and wide enough for long winged hawks to breed in the proportion of their own earnestly affected, and long laboured sublimity. Such were the drifts and devices for the space of many years of certain Roman bishops, often straining, but never reaching to their end, which was, to make a rise so high, as might carry them over the heads of emperors, till more than 300 years after the succession of Constantine and his successors into the east; their lieutenants wanting now that Gorgon's head of universal regiment and united strength, whereof they had disposed formerly; till that unlucky division of one eagle's neck into two, which made the fairest bird a monster, as according to that one noted maxim of our Saviour, 'Omne regnum in se divisum desolabitur,' gave way, though much against their wills, to that improvement of the jurisdiction of Peter's keys, which hath not since that time been less feared, than at the first it was favoured. The first motive of the translating of the western empire into the east, as Socrates reports, was chiefly to this end, 'ut vulnera quae erant à tyrannis inflictæ, illis jam sublatis tollerentur,' for the cure of those wounds which were given by tyrants, now that they were rid out of the way. Men liked of this, and commended the discourse that urged it, till experience, together with their own disasters, made them find, that, of both extremes, it is better to admit an outward distemper, than an inward combustion. The ebb hath not been greater by the waning of the empire, than the flood hath been 'ex consequente' by the waxing of the church; which finding that the beams are brightest, and her glory greatest while the sun is under our horizon, from whence she borrows and derives her light, hath sought ever since with her best diligence to quit herself to those rays imperial which by vicinity may weaken, or by conjunction may darken her. It is true that Constantine upon the change did at the first exempt bishops only, but not priests, from convention in civil courts; the first step to that greatness, which was 'in objecto,' to the papacy. Gratian in the year 380, and Honorius in the year 406, confirmed it, Theodosius and Valentinian were pleased for increase of favour, that priests also in lieu of civil judges, might take their trial before bishops, if the parties interested in the cause could be satisfied. Justinian more reservedly than his antecessors, expounds the meaning of the grant of matters only appertaining to the church, not otherwise, and for his labour receiveth a wipe at the hands of Bellarmine. Heraclius exempteth bishops and priests absolutely from all courts, excepting only that of delegates from the emperor. But Guicciardine, no Lutheran or Zuinglian, as many term persons of a diverse judgment in our days, but a Roman Catholic; no German or Helvetian, but an Italian; no simplest, but a man as deeply learned, as discreetly judicious, observeth, That though some dark cloud had overcast a portion of the beams imperial in the highest sphere, yet till this time of the translation of the seat to Constantinople, and a good space after, many tokens both of humble reverence, and respective regard to the civil state, were evident. For the popes without admittance either of the emperors themselves, or of their lieutenants called Exarchs, ascend not to the throne. The popes in all their grants and public dispatches, set down the date by these words, 'regnante domino nostro,' such or such an emperor. Though by variation of times, which breeds a change in all bodies, states or governments beneath the moon, this good manner began to be first abated, and in time determined. After this unlucky separation of the Greek head from the Latin body, first, it fell into a kind of giddiness; after, into imbecility, the cause of dangerous convulsions in those estates; and like top branches that are not duly fed and nourished with the lively sap of their own native root, they fell afterward to warp and wither both in beauty and glory. The princes grew daily more and more into contempt, either out of want of desire, or ability, or both, to defend 'caput imperii' from incursions of infidels, oppressions of usurpers, and attempts of conspirators. Then fell the grands of Italy to renounce all duty, contributions, or reliefs to the far distant parallel; from which as from a gulf they found no relax. They drew back obedience from lieutenant-governors, who gasping, almost at the very last point, for breath, could light upon no true cordial to comfort them; posts could not ply so fast between Rome and Constantinople, as occasion of state did urge; and beside, which is the most desperate effect of a declining fortune, messengers were employed oftentimes with intercession, but returned ever without remedy; disputations were lame, expectations idle, affections mutinous. And though I find by the best writers, that during this time of staggering, so long as any spark of hope could live, either of secure defence, or timely and sufficient supplies, the bishops endeavoured their best to preserve the life of loyalty in the breast of fear; yet at the last the civil state declining, the church fainting, and all hope languishing, when both peers and bishops wasted like images of wax 'à petit feu,' felt the fury as well of the domestical as the foreign sword, and waxed weary of the fruitless comforts that were sent out of the east; they resolved jointly to call in their next neighbours the French for protection, who were able to defend them with a stronger arm, a quicker dispatch, and a better purse, than this sunk estate surrounded with an ocean of incurable extremities. That there wanted in the pope both then and ever since, affection, invention, or expedition, to raise Rome once again, though in another element, 'ex Albæ ruinis,' to draw their generation of greatness out of the corruption of power, and to make their best advantage of their errors that were wont to give them a commanding check, they may believe that find no grounds of judgment, of experience and truth to conceive otherwise. For being put into possession, by this long desired and lately planted emperor, of a satisfaction, both for profit and for power, proportionable to the pains which they had taken, 'Cum sudore vultus et tremore cordis,' about the new establishment, they found other means to multiply their strength and credit every day, by taking sure hold of opportunity, which being lost with idleness, returns no more to expectation. They began then to establish their estates in that height of security, from the frowns of predominant commands, which many of their predecessors had eagerly apprehended, 'Tanquam spado mulierem amplexans, et suspirans,' as the prophet speaks significantly in another point, but yet failed of the final scope and reward of their industry.

The strongest adamant that drew reverence and love to the church of Rome, in the first spring of religion, was the constancy of so many godly bishops, as with the streams of their blood watered the plants of their profession, desiring rather to die with honour, than to deny with infamy. Besides, it is certain, that during the short time of their sitting in that seat, their chiefest end was to bind subjects to superiors with so great obedience, and superiors to subjects with so great conscience, as those men were esteemed both most godly and most happy, that were either inspired with their pity, or grounded upon their principles. St. Peter's galley might very well hold on a constant and happy course for a-while after the main stroke of oars did cease, that was set out at the first with the force and industry of so many worthy mariners, as made for no other port than heaven: which observation cannot be thought strange, by men that understand how hard, or almost impossible it is for one prince that is humorous, succeeding many that were godly and judicious, to work upon the sudden any dangerous effect, by countermotion or opposition to the spheres of the former government.

For to the raising of this height upon the foundation of religion and integrity, some brought stone, some timber, some lime, some sand, and some gave their own labour and direction gratis; every one affording supplies and helps according to the measure of their strength, or the proportion of his ability. But after that the bishops began to find the strength of their own estates by removes of emperors, and that instead of little ease, they got elbow-room; it was a means to make them stretch their arms, and extend their forces into elements, which like 'terra incognita,' were before unknown to them.

Some of the most artificially and refinedly ambitious, finding by the Itoman histories, as it is probable, that Cæsar was never absolute in power, 'Priusquam potestatem pontificiam cum Cæsarea potentia conjunxisset,' hold it as sound a course for them, seeking the like in another climate, 'Cæsaream cum pontificia conjungere': making no doubt but as 'in abstracto' they had been regarded with reverence; so 'in concreto' they might be feared with observation. The necessity which enforced all Italians after the departure of Charlemaigne, to rely upon the pope's aid for common defence: the bond of conscience, which moved the greater part of the world in those days to resort to Rome, either for satisfaction to souls, or for preservation of unity: the confidence of emperors and kings in compromising causes of unkindness or dissensions to such a bishop, as professing like a father equal affection and tenderness, was not suspected of halting on either side: the strife and emulation of mighty potentates to assure themselves of the love and friendship of that party, whom the greater number regarded as a judge, and few or none for many years suspected as an opposite: the fear and peril into which some emperors were drawn of hazarding their own fortunes, by disputing his prerogative: the contribution of, all states, qualities and degrees of Christians, according to the custom and manner of those times, to the maintenance of St. Peter's successor: the secret interest which the pope had in many kingdoms, by the merit of his predecessors, that did first send learned pastors and doctors to preach unto them redemption by Christ crucified: the exercise of St. Peter's keys, by binding and loosing sins in a kind of excellency, and supereminency above other bishops in all parts of Christendom: the conceit which was holden of a bishop's conscience, whom the canons will not suffer to be 'Solicitus de iis quæ sunt mundi,' in comparison of any secular authority, whose only object is the seal of longitude and latitude: the danger of offending one, whom the greatest part endeavoured with studious affections to please: the subtle union of St. Peter's keys with St. Paul's sword, to this end, that while the one did open locks, the others, like that of Nehemias, might cut off impediments: the great revenue and demain, which was annexed to St. Peter's chair, first by the charter of Charlemaigne, and then by the great countess Maude's legacy: the pope's art in contriving the manner of the choice of emperors by the co-esters of Germany, rather than by occasion of making their returns to Rome, their teeth might be set on edge with a fresh appetite, to taste of the forbidden fruit which grows 'in horti medio,' and thereby compassing the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, covered with the leaves of limitation for so many years, to make their estates once again absolute: the pope's caution in reserving to himself as it were 'in deposito,' a special interest, only for pretence, of crowning and confirming emperors at Rome, even after they had been elected and crowned in Germany, though when they sought it, they seldom compassed it: the pope's eye to the retaining of those rights and royalties in the princes electors hands, which were mortgaged by precedent emperors, lest the bruised feathers of the eagle, impeded once with these hard quills, might again be able to carry her up to the spire of the capitol: the long lasting, and strongly working faction in Italy of the Guelphes and Gibellines, imperial and pontifical: the fast league between the pope and the French kings, ever labouring to maintain the strength of the holy arms, against all violent and sturdy storms, as a plant of his own policy: the rule which hath been ever providently observed and kept by the popes, in eschewing quarrel or contention with any powerful prince in Europe, before he make himself sure of a party opposite in the same degree, and likely so far as the wit or aim of any mortal creature is able to extend to make the match too hard for him: the sure hold which the pope hath of the hearts and services of all the clergies, in as many kingdoms as are Romanly catholique, by exercising the interest either of investing or confirming metropolitans, that have the highest charge in the church, and draw the consciences and devotions of lay souls after them, by direct dependency: the pope's custom of sorting cardinals and officers for the church out of such powerful and worthy families, as may make both them and all their allies and friends to be in their devotion and gratitude more fast to them: the reservation of certain cases, wherein the pope only will give himself commission of oyer and terminer, thereby pressing the greatest bell-weather of the flock, without an express relaxation, 'ab ipso ore apostolico,' to appear personally: the device of sending princes to the Holy-Land, so soon as ever they began either to pick quarrels with the church of Rome, or might be made by their absence of better use to it: the local interdictions of priests by warrant from the pope, to celebrate for the satisfaction of souls, which, so far as I have read, was first set on broach among our English bishops by Alexander the third, about the year 1170, but not very luckily to those that by observing them with a stricter kind of obedience and awe, than the laws of the realm would admit, were in great peril of their own possessions, with loss of liberties.

Last of all, the garrisons and forts which have been erected and maintained in defence of St. Peter's patrimony, were high steps to carry and convey the pope to that height of crushing princes in their own element, which many quarrel, some tolerate; but in very truth, if the case once come to be their own, none favour. So long, saith a grave and learned writer, and a Roman Catholick, as the popes attended those charges only that concerned the soul, their chiefest care, desire, and study was to be protected under the wings of the secular estate: but the state of the emperors declining faster than they rose, the popes began to neglect both their arms and amity; then fell they to defend by writing and discourse, that it belonged rather to the church to give laws to the empire, than to receive from the emperor; pressing forward still without looking back, for fear, perhaps of being transformed with the wife of Lot, 'in statuam salis,' and abhorring nothing more than the very sound of a remitter to the creeping state of their first simplicity, the wrested censures of the church, either to the passions of humour, or proportion of state: they studied more industriously the ways of making wars and heaping treasure, than of steering Peter's ship, or instructing souls; they sought more slyly than sincerely to make their consistory strong by the support of tyrants and usurpers, which having cast off Cæsar's yoke with contempt of disarmed ostentation, found no means so proper as the countenance of the church of Rome, for their establishment both in dignity of security. For proof whereof, I wish it may be tried by inquisition, whether Robert Guiscard having filched Puglia from the sacred empire, that is a fair feather from a feeble bird, sought not after that to hold it of the pope in fee; and whether Roger king of Sicily in the year 1130, possessed not himself of that kingdom by such a trick of legerdemain, (for all was fish that came to Peter's net about that time) and many his successors in that corruption both of conscience and conversation, became now rather 'Piscatores imperiorum quam hominum;' tho' the ceasure of St. Paul extended only 'ad interitum carnis,' but not 'peritatis vel diadematis.'

After this some of them mounted to that point of challenge, as they were not ashamed to take upon them the prerogative of deposing emperors. For Boniface the 8th after he had presented himself, as the German catholiques report, to the eye of the world in his habit merely secular, that is with a crown on his head, a sword girt by his side, and with profession that he was as well a Cæsar as a pope, at the next leap gave a greater strain, claiming precedence of Philip the French king, 'Tam in spiritualibus quam in temporalibus,' tho' some of the most learned among the schoolmen oppose absolutely to this paradox: and might as fitly wonder at this armed pope, as the prior of Duresme did of his earled bishop, 'O quam manifeste jam exorbitat noster Episcopus transformatus a vestigiis sancti Cuthberti!' Urban withdrew not only the persons, but bona the goods of the clergy from the trials of civil courts. In case of treason the popes would oftentimes have exempted bishops from the bar, tho' princes absolute would never yield to this demand as a right by acknowledgment: howsoever at the pope's request some of them have been pleased to remit wrongs out of indulgency. Let Platina give evidence concerning strange devises vented, and plots undertaken, to bring all the princes of the world to hold their crowns 'ad placitum,' and in effect at the will of Peter's successor: Some being called in question for personal transgressions, some for idle words, some for taking part with princes whom popes hated, some for refusing to participate in actions which the pope favoured; some that the pope might prefer his own friends to their seats, some for standing stilly against humours out of suspicion, some to make the pope himself more strong, some to make his enemies more weak. And sure I am by confession of those that in religion were ever consonant to the Roman canons, that after once the rule of Gregory was riveted into the conscience of Christians, which in those days were more fearful to offend, that studious to learn, 'Sententiam judicis quamvis injustam timendam esse,' that the sentence of a judge is to be feared, tho' unjust: howsoever all the laws of Europe in this case by the grounds of nature grant appeals, what quarrel soever it pleased the pope out of displeasure, just or unjust, to pretend, himself being ever, for the most part, both judge and party, that must be satisfied to the full, though it cost an emperor his crown.

And because 'Homo spiritualis judicatur à nemine,' some of the canonists proceeded so far in flattery after these encouragements, as to exempt the pope's censure from examination, though they carry with them heaps of souls to hell: which though the wiser and the better sort reject, as a doctrine fitter for the school of Mahomet than a scholar of the church; yet it will be ever reckoned and reputed probably as well 'error prædicationis,' as 'conversationis,' so long as it shall pass the print without reproof; and to use the phrase of St. Hierom upon like occasions, 'priusquam Asterisco juguletur.' Emmanuel the Greek emperor craving earnestly of Alexander 3rd that both empires of the East and West might be reunited for a greater strength and a more assured support against the enemies of the faith, his answer was, 'Se nolle id unire quod majores sui de industria disjunctissent;' that he would not unite that which his predecessors had of set purpose severed; though in very truth it may be proved a worse part in those that laid their heads, and set their hands together, being as they were, but men 'ad illud separandum quod Deus conjunxit,' to make a separation in that which God had conjoined and fastened. Though Alexander the pope had modestly forbore to answer the request of Emmanuel in so plain language as might move the world to say to him as the maid did to St. Peter, in the palace of the high-priest, 'Verè tu ex illis, nam et loquela tua te manifestum facit:' yet by the course which this pope's predecessors took in planting 'Sedem Imperii,' the seat of the empire, rather among the Germans, where by larger distance he might less offend, than 'in Romana Metropoli,' than in Rome itself, where he might eclipse the glory of the pope, we might easily have apprehended both what was the object, and where would be the end of that policy. Hereunto I add an indenture made by another of that rank, with Cha. duke of Anjou before his establishment in the kingdom of Sicily, that neither he during his own time, nor any of his heirs and successors after him, should accept of any offer which the German princes might be drawn to make to him of the empire; much less that he or they should hunt after it: his fear was, after an experiment, by the long bustling between the pope and Frederick, who was by right both emperor and king of Sicily, that the vicinity and neighbourhood of so great a state as that kingdom to Rome, in case it fell into the hand of an evil neighbour, with the least colour or advantage of a title, might stir up easily in the disposition of a prince that were courageous, an earnest desire of a discontinued estate: because howsoever questions be overruled among private persons upon the ground of prescription in point of law, yet where the sword must flourish for the master's prize, 'Præ-

'scriptio nulla, quantumvis diuturni temporis, occurrit Cæsari.' I need not at this present to name that provident and discreet cardinal, who in one of the late conclaves, put in a timely caution to the rest of his fellows at the choice of a pope, to beware of too servile a regard of the partialities and passions of potent princes, that 'sede vacante' recommended their chiefest favourites to St. Peter's chair, to no other end than that they might again, by quintessence of craft, reduce the modern majesty of the church of Rome to that bare 'jus patronatus,' wherein it stood during the reigns of domineering emperors; and while they were able to free themselves of that servile yoke, which by the loss of many lives, by the waste of great treasure, and the highest improvement of their predecessors art, that set their own lives light in respect of the churches liberty, was cast off. These are the steps by which, so far as I can gather, either by observing the current of time, the reports of histories, or the deep impressions of experience, the popes have ascended sometime warily sometime confidently, but almost ever, after the translation of the empire into the east, powerfully to this height of prerogative, which have made them sufficiently strong, as it is said of David in the Scripture, 'Cum leonibus tanquam cum agnis ludere,' and to tread upon the asp and the basilisk. What Soto, Sylvester, Simancha, Navarre, or Bellarmine, either think or publish in their chymical distinctions of 'directè' and 'indirectè,' 'propriè' and 'impropriè,' 'simpliciter' and 'secundùm quid,' 'absolutè' and 'tantummodo in ordine ad spiritualia,' it much matters not; because in this point they do merely transgress 'mandata Dei propter traditionem suam,' leaping like sheep that are frightened with their own shadow, over hedges one in the neck of another, without forethinking of the ditch on the other side, vouching no one title rightly to this purpose out of the word of God, regarding nothing that is ancient, nor adding any reason of importance that is new; filling the schools with clamours, the church with errors, and all Christian estates with tragedies. Yet in disproof of their distinctions, which are only circles and sharp angles of scholastical conceits; beside the grounds of sober judgment formerly set down, I will produce a learned jury of those bishops whom these school-men repute firmly and completely catholic, whom they emblason by descent of pedigree the only true and lawful heirs of Christ, and whom their reverence as his apostles successors, that did absolutely refuse in the most servile times to subscribe the pope's private and peremptory censures against their own sovereigns. They did observe their oaths of loyalty out of the bond of conscience, without regard of canonical absolution; and never shrunk upon threats or terrors that thundered at Rome, from the positive laws and duties of their own countries. They were not ignorant that the high-priest in the law was 'circundatus infirmitate,' and bound by the law to offer sacrifice as well for his own private sins as for the sins of the multitude. They had read that St. Peter the first founder of the church of Rome was called Sathan, for giving counsel that was not sound to our Saviour, after the bestowing of those titles of prerogative which many urge. They find him pinched not behind his back, but reproved to his face by St. Paul, for that he did not hold a strait course for the propagation of the faith. They learned of an apostle, so far only to follow others, as they were found to follow Christ. They heard that many popes had revoked their first censures upon better information: that Alexander 3 gave free liberty to the archbishop of Ravenna of abstinence from satisfaction to his own directions, so as withal he gave the reason which moved him to abstain; and that Adrian himself enforced not of sentence 'manente dubio,' so long as the point was in question, or traversed. They were greatly moved with the precedents of those religious and faithful auditors at Thessalonica, that examined the passages of holy writ alledged by St. Paul, for the better trial of the doctrine 'an ita se habent,' whether they were vouched in a right and proper sense or no. Last of all, because they found the privilege of not erring in the pope to be limited by the school-men themselves to matter of faith, not of policy, and to be rather cathedral than personal; it was a course familiar and usual among many grave bishops of that age, to examine papal censures as well by the standard of God's word, as by the weights of the consistory; and so far only to give way to insurgent jurisdiction, as it might not at the issue of their lives unhappily fall out to them 'in singulum cordis,' that they had run counter. If they have either cause or colour to challenge any one or more of this jury that is impanelled, 'ex hominibus legalibus,' for trial of this point in question, as prejudicial either to the cause, or to the church, I will undertake to set him 'rectum' upright, 'in ipsa curia Romana,' by the warrant of their own records, though that be greater pain than I need against any of the school-men, that mould daily new distinctions out of the quiddessence of their own conceited and self-pleasing wits, without the right stamp of antiquity.

I have touched by discourse precedent, how far Philip the French king, surnamed for his personage, Le Beau, was secured by the whole clergy of his realm, so far as concerned the bond of their allegiance and loyalty, 'non obstantè' the rash proceedings and peremptory censures of pope Boniface. To this I add the answer which was made by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, to pope Adrian, forbidding him under pain of censure to yield either reverence or service to the king, as to his lawful sovereign, that persons of all qualities, as well ecclesiastical as secular within the realm of France, assembled upon the publication of the pope's censure, had set down this conclusion with a kind of astonishment, 'nunquam ulli prædecessorum suorum,' that no such injunction was ever sent to any of their predecessors before that time. A strong evidence in my conceit, as well of novelty as of injury.

By another grave report touching the kingdom of Sicily, I find in an epistle of the archbishop's of Panormum, how strange the bishops of that state held an oath of obedience to the see of Rome, tendered by the pope's nuncio to one of them at the receiving of the pall, and with this strong exception, 'Non inveniri de hujusmodi juramento statuta in conciliis,' that in the councils no canon could be found, whereby to press the taking of such an oath by an archbishop. Yet can I not deny, that Sicily did more depend upon the directions of the pope, by the condition of some former contract between that kingdom and the church of Rome, than many other provinces.

When Gregory 4 had a purpose in his head peremptorily to proceed against Lewis le Debonaire, the French bishops in flat terms answered, 'Se nolle,' &c. that they would not submit their judgments to that offer; but the ground thereof being both weak and unjust, he should well know, that 'Si excommunicatus veniret excommunicatus discederet.' If he came with a purpose to excommunicate, he should depart excommunicated. Add unto this out of a French record, an instance of one John Tanquerell, condemned by the divines of Paris, for labouring to defend that the pope in some cases might depose the king. So strange was the doctrine of deposing princes, and transposing crowns, esteemed ever in those very times which are thought to carry the strongest tincture of affection, which many call servitude. But if heresy and infidelity were the proper causes, as they are made the ordinary motives of these brave attempting and undertaking censures against crowned potentates, there might be some better colour of excuse, though no better ground of justification, because neither we have any such custom, nor the church of God: but we know that prerogative is the Magna Charta which they study that pursue this point; and let the prince, against whom the pope intends or pretends a quarrel, be as Catholic in all points of profession as the pope himself, yet he cannot save his stake in seeking to save his soul; for the challenge being once on foot, until the supposition be acknowledged, the censure qualified, or the pope satisfied, there shall be no other ground nor object of the process than heresy. This moved many bishops, notwithstanding their obedience to the high-priest, yet to examine the condition, and whether the direction were 'ab initio secundum legem Dei,' as Moses limited. The best learned among the school-men make not obedience either an abstract in the clouds, or an 'individuum vagum,' or, as some do the prerogative of princes, a 'nemo scit,' but they conceive it as a duty ranged by prescription 'ad leges Evangelicas.'

Upon this ground of reason, equity and conscience, Gerbartus archbishop of Rheims was drawn to an absolute renunciation of any grant that can be made to any mortal man in particular, of so large capacity, 'ut quicquid libet liceat;' lest that person being forestalled, corrupted, or seduced by fear, gain, or ignorance, might put all courses out of frame: with this further advice, that in limitation of power, the holy gospels, the prophets and apostles, and the canons of the church indited by God's spirit, and observed in all ages by those pastors whom the Holy Ghost appointed to direct and govern the Church of God, might be 'Lex communis Ecclesie Catholicæ.' This rule gives a round supersedeas to Mr. Garnet, and his schoolmasters: and further we find Ino, the learned bishop of Chartres, so far a friend (how hardly soever the French king dealt with him in respect of his absence from that convention, wherein the pope's proceedings against the king were sharply censured by all the states) as to deny the subjection or subordination of a king to any superior in his temporal estate. And though the king should refuse out of contumacy to give ear to the counsel of the godly bishops, (which was the case as he conceived at that time, being infinitely addicted to the pope) 'Divino tamen judicio relinquent dum esse,' yet he must be left only to the divine chastisement. And as Bracton saith, 'Sufficit ei ad pœnam quod Deum expectat ultorem.' How confidently and how often the synods, parliaments, and schools of France have run upon the pikes of papal censures, in defence of the king's estate paramounte, sometime by their decrees provincial, sometime by their sanctions pragmatial, and sometime by prohibitions, which cut the sinews of all superlative commands with so sharp an edge, as after that they were never able either to march or move, I need not amplify, but only point with my finger to the coronation of the king now regnant at his first entrance, by bishops, Roman Catholicks, (without either awe of superior, or fear of censure, or conceit of irregularity) while he stood within the danger of the curse; and conclude this point with one example very pregnant, as I imagine, of St. Lewis, inserted by the pope himself into the list of holy confessors and saints in the Roman Calendar, notwithstanding his severe decree, that no kind of levies or taxations should be made in France by the pope's instruments, without the knowledge of his privy-council or himself; nor then also, but in cases of evident necessity.

But now lest Mr. Garnet or his accomplices should except against the state of France, as over-tickle in the seat of satisfaction, when the scope of the church is gain; though we must add some greater weight of credit to these courses, in respect the bishops were both orthodoxal and canonical that assented to their publication with the other peers: I will prove further, that in tenderness of care to preserve the prerogative of monarchy within the bounds and limits of itself, the kings of England have neither been inferior, nor least sensitive. May it therefore please Mr. Garnet, and so many other of that suit as hold the subject bound to follow whatsoever is decreed at Rome upon supposition of heresy, or suggested shews of infidelity against their sovereign, to take notice of the titles, names, and judgments of these persons which I shall present to their consideration; not from the presbyteries, which may distaste their relish, but out of the list of English authors, limned among Catholicks with golden characters.

I will begin with the first of our kings 'post conquestum,' and proceed to others as they fall into the circle of exception in their courses, and proceeding orderly. 'Quid papæ cum imperii vel regni libertate?' What hath the pope to do with the liberty of an empire or kingdom (saith William the conqueror) to whom it rather belongeth to take care of souls, and of the church's security? Afterwards, in that quick contention that fell out between William 2, and Anselme the archbishop about the pope, (though I will never avow this king to have been an holy confessor, nor all his expostulations to have been regular demands) yet they must give me leave to note with what affection and resolution, notwithstanding the pope's intercoming to make himself a party in the quarrel, the bishops did adhere to their own sovereign. 'Notum habeat sanctitas vestra,' your 'holiness,' saith Henry 1, 'must understand, that by God's help the dignities and liberties of this kingdom shall receive no wipe of abatement during my reign: for though I had an humour of embasing myself so much, as to shrink upon so sure a ground; 'tamen optimates mei, in d totius Angliæ populi id nullo modo paterentur;' yet my peers, nay, all the commons of my realm would never suffer it.' And after this, the bishop of Exeter sent to Rome, received a very gracious and mild answer of the pope, touching the kingdom's liberties. Henry 2 would admit no legate from thence, nor repair of any of his subjects to that see, before they gave security, 'quod malum suum vel regno suo non quærerent.'

The Suffragan of Canterbury in very modest and humble manner advised Thomas, his archbishop, rather to appease the king's wrath by a submissive letter, which had ever been the course of proceedings among the pastors primitive, than by heaping coals to inflame his passions in so violent and desperate a kind, as might perhaps cause a revolt from the Roman hierarchy.

Nubrigensis, another countryman of ours, compareth the archbishop's opposition at that time to the king, to St. Peter's zeal, in the question between him and St. Paul. For though no man denies, saith he, that the archbishop in this particular was 'zelo fervidus;' yet 'an plene et secundum justitiam, Deus novit,' whether sufficiently, and according to the right, God knoweth; since it is written in the Proverbs, that 'prudens in tempore tacebit, quia tempus malum;' a wise man will hold his peace in time, because the time is evil, as he thought that to be. The speech is modest, and yet declareth, that even in those times men that were void of passion, though of one and the same profession, coming to scan the point of conscience, judged indifferently, without either smart to the subject, or wrong to the sovereign: which makes me the more to praise the wisdom of that canon of the church, which (with great reason) dissuades over-rough searching of sores deeply festered, or over-quickly proceeding in a time when censures are set light; for experience hath taught that this were but to cast pearls before swine, and to give that which is 'sanctum canibus.'

The whole reign of king John, being in effect nothing but a tragedy acted in the eye, and to the scorn of England over all the world, between the pope and him, our bishops skirmishing sometimes (out of conscience) on the king's side against the pope in this fraction of the politick estate, and sometimes (out of faction) on the pope's side against the king; yet the greatest part of them at Windsor, as one of our authors writes, 'Non obstante sententiâ quâ rex erat innodatus,' did communicate and religiously receive with him.

Henry 3, suspecting some hard measure (as it seems upon the smart and horror of examples past) expected a formal oath of his bishops that repaired to the council of Lions before their setting forth, that they should assent to nothing there debated, or to be decreed to his or his crown's prejudice. At the same council the king complained (not by the virtue of his letters, but by the voice of his bishops) of a wrongful claim pretended by the pope of an imposition, under the mask and colour of episcopal assent; which in the behalf of all the rest, was roundly contradicted by the metropolitan. Upon notice taken of this complaint, the pope alluding to the spleen of Frederick the emperor against his predecessor, said that the king of England began to Frederize: but it skills not much, said he; for, 'habet rex Angliæ suum consilium, et ego meum;' as he might very well, and yet be no gainer.

Edward 1, sent sir John Lexington to all the bishops as they were assembled in the house of convocation, with an express Caveat, that they should in no ways yield to the pope's earnest instance for satisfaction in a demand: to which prohibition, as my author writes, 'et ipsi paruerunt,' they obeyed accordingly.

Edward 2, stood resolutely upon the maintenance of his gift of the treasurership of York against the pope's Breves, striving forcibly by the colour of a former grant, to prefer a nephew of his own; and upon what ground? Because (saith the king) the peers of this kingdom are bound by their oath of homage, to maintain the rights and liberties of the state, whereof collation of dignities hath ever been reputed a special branch, and therefore cannot 'salva conscientia,' admit or indure the least blemish of an invested honour. For if it were not lawful for the bishops of those ages, as appeareth by record, 'Feodum Laicum Romanæ Ecclesiæ obligare,' to tie a lay-tee upon the Church of Rome; how much less is it reasonable, lawful or convenient at this day, to engage either the prince's right, or the subjects loyalty?

To these I add a very earnest letter written to the pope by the same prince, in such a style, and with ink tempered with so sharp ingredients, as 'ex unguibus leonem:' for he doth there protest, and that with some fervency, 'se jus regni sui contra papam et omnes detensurum:' that he would defend the right and title of his crown against all persons whatsoever, without distinction or diversity. I note by this occasion the temperance of the pope at that time, who neither replies with passion, nor thunders in heat. For though it be true that England by position and site hath a great advantage of many other states and kingdoms of Europe, that are neither so well fenced, nor so compleatly compassed by sea, proposing to stand resolutely in defence of itself, though the cause were good, and the prince martial; yet it appeareth, that the pope for his part also was more patient than some of his successors (impeached by more difficulties and stronger impediments) have been since that time; or else considering the claim which he pretended to collations and investitures in many other estates, where he found princes more afraid, he might at the least have made an offer (though to small effect) of his virulent exceptions, which being used without discretion, are indeed but the vessels of an indiscreet pastor, to take the words of Zachary.

Neither law nor nature do allow to any agent, 'potestatem operandi,' for the maintenance of itself, 'sine preparatione mediorum,' without the preparation of means proportionable to that faculty which it affords: and therefore in this case we must infer, that either the pope wanted passion or power, or instruments to further his ends (according to the scope of his desire) powerfully. The abbot of Tavestock was fined at five hundred marks, for receiving a bull from Rome, wherein there were but 'aliqua verba regi, et coronæ suæ præjudicialia.' The whole court of parliament, wherein the party of the bishops and abbots among the lay-peers, for the number was not weak, gave their promise to king Richard 2, with protestation to defend his regal rights and immunities against all opposition, though it were made by the pope himself. And herewithal I note the reason in the record, suitable to the resolution (which was spoken of before) lest the crown of England, which had been ever free from the restraint of any superior command, might on a sudden slip unawares into the snare of servitude; and therefore the main article in parliament enforced for the deprivation of Richard 2, was, That he had by admitting bulls from Rome, enthralled the crown of England, which was free from the pope and all other foreign power.

The pope's ignorance in the state of English affairs, was the motive by which the wisdom of the state was drawn during the reign of the same prince and all that succeeded, to condemn, disable, and reject all bulls or breves of direction from Rome, that stood upon no warrant of certificate from some bishop in the land to guide his aim; and those bishops (as we find by the reports of history and record) were ever the worse esteemed, and the less regarded by their own prince and country, that posted over to seek foreign aid, when they might have found greater ease, by resorting to their home bred oracles, and 'non ad transmarina judicia;' which they ought to do by the council of Carthage.

They that desire to be more particularly informed of the prosperous success of some bishops, that were forward in execution of the pope's orders without licence from the king, may find a seizure made upon all the temporalities of those bishops of Ely and Norwich, for the publication of a bull against Hugh earl of Chester: and further observe also, that the bishop of Ely was condemned of felony by a jury at the King's bench, notwithstanding his bold challenge to be 'unctus Domini et frater papæ,' the pope's brother; but a younger it seems, by bearing his dignity with so great a difference. The bishop of Carlisle in like manner notwithstanding the privilege of unctio) was condemned of High-Treason at the bar, (though not in the pope's cause) in the time of Henry 4th, and that worthily. For though Solomon spared the life of Abiathar out of a special favour, and a kind of reverence to religion, 'Quia portavit arcam Domini,' because he had once carried the ark of God; yet by that he calls him 'virum mortis,' I may lawfully conclude, what in justice he might have done concerning life: but of his deprivation the text itself gives clear evidence.

I add to this example the learned judgment of Baptista Baiardus, a profound civilian, that a bishop offending in case of Treason, cannot be exempted by his function from trial before a judge merely secular: and for proof hereof no man can witness better than Philip de Comines, what slight answer was given by the French king his master, to the pope's incessant suit by the Nuncio, for the release of a cardinal whose place and dignity was more eminent.

In Spain itself, which seems in this age to be most precise and tender of that point which is termed the church's liberty, (though neither circumscribed within any certain limits of admittance, nor defined till this day by any doctor of either law) their own writers avow, that the bishop of Coimbra was constrained by the state to recall a sentence against the king, which the pope himself hath both encouraged and justified. Don Pedro king of Arragon, in scorn of the pope's charge, under pain of censure not to take upon him any longer the title of that crown; which, out of his own particular affection he had settled before upon another prince's head, intitled himself 'imperatorem maris, et regnorum dominum;' meaning rather to advance than dismiss his style by the pope's ladder.

Many of their kings, as I could express at better leisure, have withstood peremptory censures of the Church of Rome, almost 'ad deliquium animæ:' sometime upon supposition of incontinency; sometime upon the stay of the main stroke of that oar in their estate; sometime about collations, transpositions, investitures, without any inward gall or vexation of conscience, for exasperating a pope's humour in defence of their own prerogative. Let the walls and battlements of the castle Saint Angelo in Rome, bear record of the piety, patience and humility of Charles the fifth, grandfather to the king of Spain now regnant, when the pope in passion overstrained both the duty of a child, and the patience of so great a potentate. I think Mr. Garnet will admit, that these thousand years there was not a more obedient daughter to the church of Rome than queen Mary, that could never rest in quiet, till she had reduced the straying sheep of her dominions, as she conceived, to Saint Peter's fold: and yet without regard or awe of the pope's sharp censures against the king her husband, she never gave over aiding him with money, and assisting him with force, till he was perfectly reconciled to the church, and the strife determined. For as by the law of God she found herself precisely bound in cleaving to her husband, with whom by union she became 'una caro,' to forsake all the world; so in the same law she finds in-point of fact no straiter bond, nor stronger warrant of obedience to the sentence of the priest, than she observes the priest to ground himself upon the law of God; that is, 'quem ipse secundum legem docuerit;' which rest is indeed that 'lapis Lydius' to which we ought all to resort for the trial of all coins that are current among Christians, whose image or stamp soever they seem to bear, in case we find them oftentimes embased by an allay, and apt to mine into the foundation of equity and piety. For till I see it clear either by doctrine or experience, that God created all men Stoicks, or rather as void of sense as stocks, and instituted popes not only 'dispensatores mysteriorum,' distributors of his mysteries, but 'tanquam angelos lucis,' as angels of light, or more than angels of light, because in those, as Job records, 'invenit provitatem:' I must borrow leave in discerning matters of this quality, to make use of the little reason, and the great respect I have: leaving those that are of another mind, to borrow such discretion by observation, which in this world all persons at all times neither ever had, nor can ever have.

By these precedents and many more, which time serves not to dilate or to enlarge, I hold it very clear, that both princes and their bishops have obeyed these papal censures in matters touching their prerogative and state, neither longer nor oftener than debility or necessity enforced them to abate their sails, in a storm of distress: Though decrees privative have been often squared by laws positive; and that albeit many kings have made a shew to be mild spectators of their neighbours harms, yet if the case came once to touch either their own affection or their right, they were content to read without the ordinary consonants of the Roman alphabet. If then the weapons with which our antecessors fought against ambition and wrong, have been eaten into by the cankers of superstitious fears, or overawed by wretched sloth; let us scour them with the powder of experience, since these hot alarms begin to sound, before we be surprized in over-great security; and by resorting often to the rule of God's direction, which is 'verus Judex et sui et obliqui,' we shall the better understand, according to the quality of superior commands, either to lay down our lives, or submit our conformity. It was in my conceit a pain well taken of late years to reduce the feast of our Saviour's nativity as near to the right term or period, as art and industry could devise, by taking up the loose minutes which by tract of time and multiplication of degrees had drawn out a wider distance by certain days, than was consonant to the first calendar: and therefore the like labour in another kind might worthily reduce the challenge which popes have pretended in some cases above kings, to the same proportion which it held under Gregory the first, Leo, and all other bishops of that see before that date, by cutting off encroachments, which by fractions of time have brought the church into scandal, and the greatest part of princes into jealousy: For all this while boldness undertakes, wit contrives, assistance furthers, conscience prepares, scrupulosity consents, strength prevails, and majesty suffers.

Now must I begin either by Mr. Garnet's leave or against his leave, to rip up the false stitches of the canon, 'Nos sanctorum predecessorum,' confidently vouched at his first approach to the council-board, after justified before the lords in commission, and at this instant stood upon, as our own ears can witness, in defence of that supposed interest of deposing or dispatching lawful kings, which is the binding knot of the late Gordian conspiracy. For though wise men that either follow learned conscience, or any certainty of direction or rule, will tax Mr. Garnet's haste in presupposing censures, which the pope did never yet pronounce, in dealing worse with his own sovereign, than any other prince in his condition, running without an errand, and rebelling without a colour; yet I will take this canon for the time 'de bene esse' as it lies, 'ut concusso fundamento arx ipsa concidat.' This only principle, if I err not, hath more afflicted, discredited, and disabled the pope's means and instruments, in working his own ends, than all the batteries that have been bent against the Vatican for the space of 500 years. For what prince under heaven can repute his state secure, so long as every small distaste to the pope's desire may ground a challenge, the challenge may procure a citation, the citation may produce a sentence, the sentence either neglected or not satisfied, infers contumacy, and contumacy deprives the supposed delinquent of that honour which nature gives, conscience avows, and consent fortifies? so as in this case either Gregory the seventh in respect of his ill hap, or no other person upon earth, hath reason to acknowledge that rule of the Holy Ghost, that 'in quo peccamus, in eodem plectimur.' The words of the canon strongly bent against the crown imperial of Henry 4, are not many, but yet heavy, and in English thus: "We observing the statutes of our holy predecessors, do absolve those that are bound by fidelity and oath to persons excommunicated, from their oaths, and do forbid them to observe or keep their fealty toward them, 'quousque ipsi ad satisfactionem veniant,' till they come to yield satisfaction."

Thus far the text of the canon 'expressis verbis:' but since this is that 'pillula aurea,' or rather 'deaurata,' that pill not of gold but guilt, which is preserved in the cabinet of the church of Rome to purge princes of their choler 'in morbis acutis,' in hot fevers; that is, whensoever they begin to square with the pope about any point of ecclesiastical prerogative: and since Mr. Garnet for his own part likes the composition so well, as that he shrinks not in defence thereof to hazard the life and state of his matchless sovereign, and his royal issue, supposing them to be more sick, God be thanked, than they find themselves; it beboveth me out of affection and duty to my dear sovereign, though otherwise unworthy so much as to gather 'herbas agrestes' with that child of the prophet, 'in die critico,' upon this day critical, to examine the first 'recipe' as I find it formally subscribed by the pope's own hand, that by more heedful looking into the quality of particular ingredients, I may the better understand, by understanding judge, and out of judgment resolve, how well it agrees with the precepts 'melioris ævi,' both in proportion and property.

The first ingredient, of observing statutes, I confess to be of great effect in working the cure of any grievance to the church or commonwealth: but yet I find it not of use among the canonists, that exempt the pope from the regular observation of any law or statute, that out of his own election he likes not to follow. But to the matter, I would learn whose statutes they are, or by whom enacted, or in what parliament, that Gregory 7, intending to depose an emperor, established by the providence of God, and taking God's own office into his hand, by making himself in this point 'similem Altissimo,' will observe thus tenderly. Surely the prophet David was never in the number of those predecessors that promulged any such decree, condemning persons with all kinds of presumption or discontent, that shall induce a subject to lift up his hand 'contra unctum Domini.' Our Saviour was none of them, commanding his disciples to give unto Cæsar what is Cæsar's, and rather to endure, than offer violence to any man, much less to magistrates. St. Peter, that ought to be the first in respect of the descent which the popes derive, gave never any voice to any such decree: for he enjoins obedience even to tyrants, whose authority was absolute. Saint Paul was none:

for he commandeth prayers to be made by the faithful, 'pro regibus, et omnibus qui in sublimitate constituti sunt,' for kings, and all those that are placed in sublimity, as at that instant Nero the tyrant was; and to what end? that under them the Christians might peaceably live.

Out of the rank of these predecessors, he must exclude Pope Xistus, who touching the rule of conscience, resolved rather to obey God than man: but touching the point of obedience, made no kind of resistance nor opposition to tyranny. And Origen's opinion was, That 'omnia crimina quæ vindicari vult Deus, non per Antistites, et Principes Ecclesiarum, sed per mundi Judices voluit vindicari.' He must exclude Marcellinus, that offended no magistrate any further, than to make the church of God know that Cæsar's decrees were no lawful warrants, as some taught, for idolatry. He must exclude Cornelius, who being charged with a course of entertaining intelligence by letter with St. Cyprian the bishop of Carthage (at that time) protested at his death, that the contents of those letters had no other end or drift, than preservation of souls. So far were they from derogation of obedience to authority, as St. Gregory had never read this statute; for unless they will avow that 'servus' may be 'supra Dominum,' which Christ denies, they must confess that Gregory acknowledging himself a servant to Mauritius, he could neither overtop him, nor reign over him.

Neither is it probable that Pope Anastasius to an emperor of that name would have written, That the breast of his clemency was the shrine of public happiness, and that his height carried the place of that lieutenant, which God commanded to rule and govern upon earth, if he had held him a tenant of his crown to the see Apostolick: and therefore with our venerable countryman I must conclude, that the master-rule of our life, is 'Ecclesiæ primitivæ actus imitari,' to imitate the examples of the church primitive.

But if, notwithstanding this obedience, they will enforce a man to reign who with his own mouth doth profess the contrary, which is to serve; let them call to mind that observation of the wisest king that ever was, That one of the chief instruments, 'Per quæ movetur terra,' by which the earth is shaken, is 'Servus cum regnaverit.' I know not what pope can pretend a better title to the prerogative of making laws and statutes, than all or some of these which had their course, and held that chair; and yet we find not that all this while the case was put (much less ruled) by such laws or statutes, as might either countenance the pope's challenge, or excuse his intrusion. But why should we thus puzzle or afflict our spirits in turning over both the Testaments, in ransacking the volumes of the Councils, or in sounding the judgment of the learned Fathers about the names of those holy predecessors which are only recorded in their library? In singling some of the principals from the body of the herd, and hearing them express their own conceits in their own words, it may perhaps be found that their reputations in this point have been further charged, than they can be blemished: bare words are not to be recorded without demonstrations of right, or impressions of acknowledgement. But in the course of my own reading, which were sufficient to find out a black swan if any were, though not so well able to resolve a doubt as many are, I may protest that I could never light upon a precedent of any pope before Gregory 7th that took notice of any statute, much more enacted or approved any for the maintenance of this deposing challenge; although in case there had been such, I would hardly have preferred the practice of any sinner that may swerve, before the precepts of a Saviour that derives doctrine from Deity.

The civil laws decree, That 'Si princeps causam inter partes audierit et sententiam dixerit, est lex in omnibus similibus.' If a prince have heard a cause among the parties and pronounced sentence, in all like cases it shall stand for law; much more in cases of obedience and sufferance, which 'Rex Regum,' the King of all Kings hath both heard and determined. For if the schoolmen have resolved truly and advisedly, that the pope cannot remit sins without sacramental ministrations, nor alter forms essential, nor 'ad placitum' release vows; because this absolute prerogative only appertains to the key of him which opens and no man shuts; much less can any pope out of the strength of passion, though warped and involved within many folds of fair appearances, deprive magistrates.

Whether the chair of Gregory 7th brake or not, as one writer notes, at the pronouncing of the sentence, because the pope or the sentence, or both pope and sentence, were too heavy for a chair that had not been so far pressed or surcharged for the space of a thousand years, it is not my purpose at this present to dispute: but I am very sure, that the policy, the discipline, and order of the church received a great crack, when the force of the spirit was perverted and abused to the satisfaction of inordinate desires, which mortification should rather suppress, than ambition execute. For St. Bernard writeth with great judgment to pope Eugenius, that 'Episcopi et ministri Ecclesiæ cum tractant politica,' when bishops and pastors of the church intermeddle with civil policy, I mean so far as may put princes to their plunge, they invade the limits, they disturb the functions, and thrust their sickle into the harvest of other men. If none of the predecessors of Gregory 7th, in which many were religious, regarding more internal piety, than external pomp, were privy to the reason or promulgation of such a law, but Gregory himself first undertook the exercise 'duorum gladium,' of two swords upon a weak text in St. Luke, (which is not taken in that sense by any of those fathers whom Thomas Aquinas voucheth 'in catena aurea.')

Is it not then more than probable, that this law was both enacted and proclaimed

Trithemius, a grave and learned writer, living in the year 1005, who was about the time wherein the pope was put into this heat, affirms, That this question was then argued, but not determined: and where? not 'inter Episcopos,' but 'inter Scholasticos,' among the schoolmen, Whether it belonged to the spiritual jurisdiction of the pope, to depose an emperor from sovereign dignity.

The church of Liege in like manner in the same quarrel, and soon after the same time, avow by letter to pope Pascal, that none of those holy predecessors of which Gregory 7 speaks, ever drew the sword against any emperor, before himself, commanding that great lady the countess Maud, that in her life depended wholly upon his direction, and on her death-bed left a rich legacy to the church, and that 'in remissionem peccatorum,' to persecute this prince: whereas Christ himself, whom Gregory should imitate upon the same condition 'peccatorum remissionis,' that is, as we forgive the trespasses, enjoineth his disciples to forgive their enemies, and that not seven times only, which agrees well with the number of 'septimus Gregorius,' but seventy times seven, using the number of finite for infinite, which agrees better with the duty of 'Gregorius Episcopus.'

Otho Frisingensis, another author of those times, concurring formally with the two precedent witnesses, affirms, that 'legendo et relegendo,' in reading and reading over again the lives and actions of emperors, he could not hit upon any one in that rank, that before Henry 4th was expelled or deposed by the papacy. Wherefore the proof standing very clear and pregnant, as I take it on this side, as well 'Quia probatur manifestum,' as 'Quia non probatur contrarium;' that this act of Gregory found no right antecedent whereupon to ground a reasonable consequent; I would gladly learn for my own instruction of any writer modern or ancient, whether it were a just part in a judge to condemn an emperor, 'causa inaudita,' or a wise part in an emperor, to put his crown 'in manus Papalis,' into the pope's hands without surer hold; or a religious part in a pope, to vouch such records as are not any where set down, if they be not in tables of ice, 'Idque flantibus auris,' the winds blowing southerly. But it may be I have mistaken by error, or overshot with haste, or omitted by prejudice some such predecessor to Gregory, as was author of some such act, without any kind of exception made in the behalf of the prince, either of invalidity of the sentence, or of peril in the precedent. For this pope voucheth Zachary a predecessor of his own, that deposed Childerick the king of France; though, as Galasius reports to Anastasius, this heavy sentence fell not on him, so much for any crime committed by himself, as because he was reputed 'inutilis,' unprofitable, or of no use to so great a monarchy.

I would be loth that any man should hold me so presumptuous or undiscree, as to carry over a question of this importance with a peremptory strain, as if no author had reported this suppression of Childerick to have been in deed the powerful act and execution of Zachary. For I acknowledge that some such there are (though earnestly transported with a desire to raise and improve the reputation of Rome, by an effect of so forcible authority.) My desire is therefore only to be heard in a word or two, and so far to be credited, as the weight of reasons may demonstrate, that only the peers of France deprived Childerick by uniform consent, howsoever they were providently careful afterward, that their proceeding upon tickle terms, might pass more currently the voice and censure of the world, by approbation of so grave an oracle. But herein first I note, that Gregory gives evidence with his own mouth in 'causa propria,' in a cause that concerns himself, which Isaiah did not, appealing 'ad legem et testimonium;' nor our Saviour excluding any man's report, 'Qui de seipso perhibet testimonium;' nor St. Peter upon advantage 'Sermonis prophetici.' The Civilians allow not this prerogative to Casar, nor the bishops of Africa to Zozimus, nor Johannes de Parisiis to any pope, 'nisi scripturæ fulciatur auctoritate,' unless he be supported by the warrant of holy writ; nor the canons themselves to any mortal man that may be subject to afflictions. But I will let this advantage pass, though it may seem strange, that whereas the figure of St. Peter's person was sufficient whilst he conversed upon earth, to cure private men of their infirmities, it happens after his translation into the mount, that the shadow of his function should prevail so far as to the suppression of monarchies.

First therefore, in disproof of absolution from oath, and deprivation of regal jurisdiction ascribed to this pope, I take hold of the gloss itself expounding this word 'deposuit,' for 'deponentibus consentit:' for hereby it appears that this honest man being far from their ambition and presumption, that hold it a great honour for a pope to depose a king, sought carefully and modestly to acquit that chair of an imputed crime, (or error at the least) applying the text of his own record to the testimony of the best histories. For in a story found in the library of the Abbey of Fulda among the Germans it is plain, and by the report of a French writer very ancient, that king Pepin of France was surrogated into the place of Childerick by the whole nation of the Franks, 'relatione tantummodo missa ad sedem apostolicam,' report being only made to the see Apostolick.

It is likewise evident by the same author, that before any ambassador was sent to Rome from France, this silly cypher of a king, 'non re sed nomine tantummodo regnabat,' was a king in title, not in truth, and did only fill the place of royalty upon the stage of scorn: and therefore when the reals were all converted into nominals, let no man wonder at the voice of ratification, but rather note the reproof of imbecility. The whole sway and stroke of affairs in the state rested at that time in the hand of one person only, that was Maire du Palais, his sole act was authentical, his word was law: to him they resorted for resolution; to him they gave thanks for satisfaction: and therefore if it be true that 'privatio præsупponit habitum,' it must likewise be true that Childerick could not be deprived of a state whercof he was not possessed at that instant, without new grounds of philosophy. Another author writes 'missis baronibus ad Zacharian papam,' that the barons of France sent to pope Zachary as it were to consult, whether 'ignavum pécus' a drone that devours, or a bee that labours, were more sufficient to command so great a state; and that Zachary, not unlike in this to Alexander the Great, bestowed his voice of approbation on him that should be reputed 'dignissimus.' Gagwin makes a question to be moved to pope Zachary from the whole estate of France, by this kind of comparison, Whether of these two persons, 'datâ electione,' free choice being given, were more capable of government, he that spends his time at home 'nilil agens' idly, or he that bending his whole endeavours to affairs 'industria virtuteque publica negotia moderaretur.' But the pope's answer being, by the report of this author, as was testified before, 'hoc adducti responso proceres sibi regem delegerunt,' the peers induced by the same, chose Pepin king. But as we know, that a question in point of fact submits no claim of right, so the pope's answer out of discretion, implies no bond or obligation of necessity. With this opinion concurs another writer of that state, proving by an express deduction of the whole cause, that the choice of Pepin proceeded originally from the free consent of the French peers; though for prevention of all doubts and scruples, lest malecontents might ascribe the process rather to respective factions than to single faith, there was great use of the pope's authority 'disponentis' 'in dubio procerum,' resolving the doubt which caused the peers to stagger. This would have been the end, whatsoever clouds were cast, or the pope had said: but 'abundans cautela non nocet,' and the persons that either are not at all, or very little interested by their own particular in the point in question, are presumed by the law to regard the matters with eyes of greatest equity. This manner of proceeding is not strange; for Joab fearing at the height of his fortune the shot of envy, pressed David with a powerful argument, to come in person, and receive the honour of giving up of the fort of Rabbath, that by his industry was brought to the last pinch, lest his own glory in the world might swell too much by the fortunate addition of so prosperous an accident. We count that doctor happy, that resorts to the sick patient 'in declinatione morbi,' and it hath ever been accounted an effect of skill, to wind in the conscience of an upright judge for the countenance of a cause humorously undertaken by the first author, that works under the reputation of unsuspected truth. Wherefore though this 'major du palais,' or superintendant general over all the French affairs, held in his best course to mask religion with the veil of holiness; though Zachary were not unwilling in the end to take hold of this offer for the grounding of a precedent of challenge, and advantage in like causes at another time; though the peers were willing to leave 'Speciem' to Zachary, reserving 'Vim' the strength and execution only to themselves, let this be neither rule nor instrument of curbing princes of better understanding, or emboldening popes of stronger minds. For as well might the poor fly sitting on the cart wheel while it was in moving, wonder at the great cloud of dust which she raised in the beaten way, as Gregory or Zachary draw counsel to power, or make that act their own, which was hummered in the forge of ambition, countenanced with a colour of necessity, and executed by a minister, that being weary of subordination, resolved by this trick, when the means were fitted and prepared to the plot, to make himself absolute. The case of kings were pitiful, if 'ex factis singularibus,' out of special facts and practices, as the chapter of Liege writeth gravely to pope Paschal, it were lawful to draw leaden rules in their disgrace. For some men undertake too much out of presumption; some yield too much out of cowardice; the greater part strain farther than they ought of right; and those weak rules lighting by mishap into the hand of power, not tempered with conscience, are sometime forced by affection, sometime bent with corruption, and for the greatest part applied with subtily. It seemeth not, by the report of Paulus Æmilius, that this manner of proceeding against princes by the chief pastors of the church, though without passion, and at the request of public states, was usual or ordinary in those days; much less humorous, violent, or voluntary decrees. For Zachary himself was at the first so moderate and mannerly, 'ut non auderet tam magni momenti cogitationem suscipere,' so much as apprehend a conceit or thought of so great a business. And therefore though we should dispense with Gregory 7, in vouching this predecessor in point, yet the predecessor himself by daintiness, doth in a sort disclaim the charter which he should pretend, without either enforcing or urging, in so plain a sphere, any external traverse of obliquity.

By this author it is manifest, with what tenderness, advice, and caution the pope opened a vein that is apt to bleed above the measure which the doctor's art prescribes: for finding by equity, that Childerick was the last branch, though sear and withered, of Clouis the first Christian prince among the French, that he was 'sine liberis, sine ingenio,' without either issue or discretion, the strongest sinews both of succession and government, that he was so benumbed with sloth and sensuality, that he could not feel the taking off his crown from his head, that his suppression was not only sought by

France, but applauded by the world: the pope proceeded, having perhaps in his eye the bond whereby he might engage the kindness of king Pepin to the church of Rome, against the Greekish emperors, transported with jealousy. This makes Kransius in his history of Saxe to wonder at the fastness between the French kings and the popes, like hands that wash and help one another by mutual support, in attaining those high objects which both aimed at. Antoninus joins with others in expressing the demand comparative between a prince of judgment, and a 'fact-beant,' an image, and a man; between a king indeed, and one 'qui solo nomine regio regitur,' that was only masked with the name and title of a king; adding, that the states assembled upon the first return of the pope's answer, suppressed Childerick, and raised his competitor. Zachary was so far from levelling at the person or the crown of Childerick 'in hypothesis,' if we give credit to our own countryman Polychronicon, as he only meant 'in this' to set down his judgment of the difference which a wise state ought to make between two princes qualified, not only in a kind of disproportion, but of a direct opposition of gifts and properties. Gotefridus Viterbiensis, striking rather at the root, than at the branches of this enterprize, affirms not 'Francos Zacharia: paruisse decreto, sed acquievisse consilio:' though the difference be as great as between an absolute injunction and a politic advice. Sabellicus, without so much as dreaming of a donative, avows a counsel by these words, 'con- sulto prius pontifice.' Naucleus yet more roundly if it be possible, that after the peers had first elected, the pope ratified: and with him agrees Blondus in one tune, without either rest of violence, or inducement of affection.

Out of Aventine I draw two reasons of conclusion against the jurisdiction of pope Zachary. The first, That being moved by the French peers as before, he takes his ground of answer from the revolt of the ten tribes, (though as aptly as a man might avow the rising of Jack Cade against his anointed sovereign.) For, the sins of that ungodly race, the curses that were pronounced against the rebels themselves, and the censures of God's prophets, evidently prove, that the fact was exorbitant. The same reason may be drawn from Zachary's own paradox at the same return, defending, that since princes hold their crowns and governments of the people's choice, in whom it resteth absolutely 'constituere et destituere,' to constitute and desert; though the doctrine be as dangerous as it is damnable, yet hereby it is evident (for me) that the right of deposition (being, as the pope himself avows, invested in the people) was not in himself, and by consequent, that he was a counsellor, but no commander; an assistant, not a judge; and that he did only approve by admittance, not enjoin by prerogative.

I know that Mr. Garnet and the rest will as unwillingly admit the judgment of the centuries in this circumstance concerning Childerick,

(as other would barons of another side) further than the warrant of their proof makes way; which moves me with a better will to let them pass, and leave the judgment of this point upon the credit of such authors as had no reason to speak more than truth for advantages of either part, because in those days not the manner, but the matter; not the circumstance, but the substance; not 'quo jure,' but 'ad quem finem,' came to be decided between the pope and the parliament.

But touching the pope's process against Henry, the chapter of the church of Liege doth unfeignedly protest, that in their exact perusal of both Testaments, they could find no precedent 'hujusmodi precepti apostolici,' of any such injunction or writ apostolick. A good caution to make us tender in misdeeming of their reports and testimonies, which (living in the time of this distemper void of passion, and qualified with modesty, being learned both in the scriptures and civil laws, and regarding more the peace and quiet of the church, than the partialities or honours of either side): firm soundly out of knowledge, and confidently upon their credit, that this Gregory 7, was the first pope that deposed any prince by the warrant of St. Peter's Keys; or, to use their own phrase, that ever lifted up the priestly lance against Caesar's sword, not dreaming of any formal process sent out by pope Zachary against king Childerick.

The very circle of a crown imperial (so far as any state or fortune beneath the moon can reach) implies a perpetuity of motion: for according to that principle of the mathematicks, as it begins from all parts alike, so 'in seipso desinat,' and ends absolutely in itself, without any other point or scope objectual to move unto. That the pope hath sometimes set the crown imperial upon Caesar's head, since the crowning of king Pepin, (whom I take to be the first) ought to be no reason of his tossing crowns from head to head like tennis-balls; for this were the way by signs to destroy substances, and to oppose formality to necessity, and occasion to institution. The metropolitan of every kingdom, may do as much in form, 'Non conferendo jus, sed implendo justitiam,' not conferring right, but doing what is just and right, as it is aptly said by one of their own partners. For though the pope reserve unto himself this final interest of crowning an elected emperor at Rome, and some flatterers would derive a kind of necessity for consummation and establishment from thence; yet many emperors of an elder date, and Charles 5, in our time, have been ready with their swords in their hands to prove (notwithstanding filial regard and reverence to the mother-church) that the stroke of power is absolute without relative formality. I conclude this question concerning Childerick, with an argument inevitably either by invention or sophistry, not disabling the witnesses. For Soto, both a friar and a learned schoolman, holds, that 'extra causas fidei ipsi pontifices nunquam ausi sunt reges deponere:' the popes themselves durst never depose any king without the compass of such matters as concern faith. But Childerick was deposed not for any point of faith, but as pope Gelasius writes to Anastasius, because he was of no use to the commonwealth; therefore it is not possible that Childerick should be deposed by pope Zachary. What hue-and-cry hath been made in former times against uncivil claims, varnished with religious pretences, nothing proves more plainly than the strong opposition which was made at the Holy-Land to Pelagius the pope's legate, for seeking to draw in all parts to the share of the church, at the taking the rich city Damietta, not unlike to the partition which was made by the lion to other beasts that hunted in his company: for it is true that at the first they wondered, and after complained, that the minister of him, whose office was to strengthen by advice, should discourage by too much greediness.

To that example which is given by Gregory 7 of Alexander 1, another supposed predecessor, absolving Christians from oaths, it were idleness to shape any formal answer; since it hath neither likelihood in common sense, nor ground of antiquity: For, in a thousand years after Alexander 1, this kind of releasing oaths was not hatched, much less practised. It is not probable that a discreet pope, void of humours, as in that first spring of piety all were, would have sought to range a faithless prince to formal discipline, since Paul himself refuseth to judge those that were no sheep of the fold, but 'foris,' that is without. And as unprobable it is, that when the bishops of Rome intended most the winning of souls by obedience, that should give so great cause of distaste to those princes, that by the strength of their own laws were most absolute in authority. It may be that Alexander 1 might comfort and secure the conscience of some Christians that were over-scrupulous and precise in observing wicked and unlawful oaths, which are 'ipso jure nulla,' though the pope should not dispense, and therefore broken with a better conscience towards God, than kept. But how proves that the breach of lawful oaths to princes that are rightly seated in their state, though perhaps not ever good, which the church condemns, and no law justifies? I hold it most absurd, that the church of Rome for greatness, or the church universal for instruction, would not have kept record of such a fact, if any such had been: But it is not hard to prove 'quidlibet ex quolibet,' where men may devise to join their own positions, without care either to answer for presumption, or to account for ignorance, and then to grace them with protestations of piety.

The caution which St. Peter is said to give at the ordination of St. Clement, that no man should be favoured or kindly entertained by the true professors of religion, against whom his successors should conceive offence, may be admitted without prejudice to this point; if we speak of such just offences as God's law pu-nisheth. There are cases wherein a man, that doth but in a word salute and give a God-speed to a grievous sinner, is said 'Communicare operibus ipsius malignis.' But this is not ever; when St. Clement's successors censure more out of passion, than out of reason. Christian princes were not so much as thought upon when this course was set, and therefore far out of pope Alexander's aim, that is, made to wound a king standing so far off, with a headless arrow. Reason satisfies thus far, that the pastors of the church, excluding us out of the fold, can bereave us only of those things which they give us at our coming in, that is, the kingdom of heaven, more in value than ten millions of worlds, but no kingdom upon earth; co-inheritance with saints, not with sinners; eternal blessings, not temporal benefits. It appears the wardrobe is very beggarly, as one of Mr. Garnet's fellows wrote over in such another case, that affords nothing but rags instead of robes; and the stock goes low, that would pay counters for Portagues.

These are all the predecessors which Gregory 7 presents as it were in a nummery, to cast dice for a prince's crown, as the soldiers did for the seamless coat of Christ: For they come, and go out again, without either speaking any word, or giving other notice, than by signs, which is nothing in effect: Their end should rather give evidence, than make appearance, dispute, than dally. It is hard that the pope should flourish in this shameless manner, about the heads of anointed majesty with a rusty sword, which since the time that St. Peter was commanded to put it into the scabbard, was never drawn, nor by the rule of Christ ought to be.

King Edgar in an excellent oration, persuading the Saxon bishops that had the sword of Peter, to join hands with him that had the sword of Constantine for the cleansing of the church, meant nothing less, than that it could be in a bishop's power against himself, to make use of the material sword, which was assigned to his custody. He tells Dunstane in the same speech afterward, that it was he that committed this trust to the bishop's care, that should chastise offenders indeed: But how? 'Episcopuli censura, et autoritate regia,' by the episcopal censure, and the king's authority. Gregory 7 was not yet awake, who putting two swords into one sheath, intends nothing more, than to drive princes out of the field with their own weapons.

But howsoever some weak sovereigns, that received their authority from God for term of life, have notwithstanding been content to hold it of the pope at will, this bars not others of a quicker spirit, to examine evidence concerning the point of right, before they suffer themselves to be concluded in the court of equity. Subjects that are dutiful, and not apt to be transported from their faith with every blast of ambitious spleen, cleave fast to the foundation which is the band of obedience, not voidable by strong intruders, nor partial interpreters. I confess, that a godly pastor ought chiefly to provide, that Christ's humble sheep should be folded in due season, and safely guarded from the persecution of wolves: but the sheep, for their part also, ought to be as cautious, that a wolf be not the bell-weather; which hath happened as often in many churches, as the bishops out of their afflictions and wreakful passions have been authors of a far greater effusion of blood, than hereticks or infidels out of their malignity. Further, if we may give credit to that strange vision which Sozomen in his history reports, there arose a question not only among doctors upon earth, but even among saints in heaven, what course was best to be taken with Julian the renegade, notwithstanding his apostacy, in respect of place: And yet of both, I presume, that Mr. Garnet held him a man of worse condition and affection towards God and godly men, than Henry 4, whom without the least gall of conscience, or supposition of doubt, the pope deprived thus unworthily.

Touching the quality of this afflicted and tormented emperor, and the true state of his cause, which was the ground and motive of the pope's sharp choler, I need not at this time say much, when much cannot be said for want of time; but will leave him with his opposite to their final trial by grand jury at the dreadful bar, where the books of all accounts and evidences shall be laid open, and sentence shall be rather grounded upon just desert, than partial desire: And where no man shall be either charged out of the envy of Crassus, or defended by the eloquence of Anthony. I am not ignorant of that which writes on both sides, imperial and pontifical, Guelphes and Gibelines, have set down touching pope and emperor, according to that humour which infection and distraction of parts envenomed their pens. I know that a man may err easily, bending too much out of partiality or prejudice to the bias of either side: And I want that just measure of discretion and distinction which should level grounds, that are made unequal and uneven by distempered conceits. But whether the pope were vexed and disquieted with Henry's challenge of investiture of bishops 'per baculum et anulum,' and collation of church-preferments, as some think, though many kings, and ours especially, have had, and ever challenged the like prerogative in their own estates, or with the instigation of Sigisfred the archbishop of Mentz, to withdraw subjects over-hastily from their ordinary resort to Rome, as others write, though this hath been the case of some other princes in like sort that escaped thunder-claps, or whether Henry's mean account of the pope's admonitions, or his preparation to withstand force with force, put the pope into choler, as other emperors have done often times, both before and since, with more easy penance for supposed pertinacy: Whether all these or any one of these occasions gave fire to the train, though I presume not to resolve, yet I may be bold to conceive in my own opinion, that the medicine was over-sharp and violent for the malady. True it is, that the grudge of Gregory to this emperor began first to fester in his heart a good space before, in respect of the countenance and aid which Henry gave to Gilbert, bishop of Parma, chosen pope by the cardinals on that side of the Alps, with opposition unto Alexander, whom Gregory, that was then but an arch-deacon, highly favoured.

But supposing all were true that either colourably or justly hath been given out in this cause for truth, I desire to learn of some grave doctor whether these poor motives were proportionable to the pope's glowing indignation, which shutting his gate against the emperor, (I will not say uncivilly, but uncharitably, that came barefoot in a bitter frost to witness true contrition of heart, for satisfaction to wrath) set up a competitor against him in Germany, while he was labouring by this painful pilgrimage to Rome, to work a perfect reconciliation with the pope; and to write to the party opposite, lest they might shrink upon those shews of friendship, likely to ensue between the emperor and him, that he would send him back, as he would use the matter, 'culpabiliorem' more culpable, and by consequence more subject to their violent advantages.

Nay, which is worst of all, after peace and friendship, and absolute forgiveness of offences sworn, and the sacrament received by the emperor, (for the better assurance of the league intended at the pope's own hand) to arm his son against him in the field, under the pretence and mask of zeal, 'ut nomen Augusti ab hæresi vindicaret,' that he might redeem the title of Augustus from the blot of heresy: for to this center all the lines of the pope's disguised exceptions may be drawn, and in this gulf they vanish: as if no man could embrace a sound belief, unless he had a servile heart: as if all that oppose against intruders were hereticks; as if it were not lawful for the emperor to set up a traverse in the church, so long as he resolved to exclude the pope from competition to the chair of state: or as if the supposition of heresy at large without conviction of any point heretical, against the canons of the church by proof, were a common jail, wherein the pope's custom is to lodge all christian princes, that by contradiction to partial demands upon just grounds are condemned as his cast-aways.

Last of all I would know where the pope learned to forgive 'culpam,' but not 'pœnam,' to a prince, that in the end was more willing to solicit union, than to rankle hate; or where he learned to distinguish between restitution to grace and majesty, by suspending that part of his favour that might put him into possession of his own lawful interest. I find by Sigibert the abbot of Gemelack, that in his time it was holden 'hæresis nondum in mundum emersa,' that the chaplains of that powerful God, that oftentimes makes hypocrites to reign 'propter peccata populi,' should cast the rod into the fire, before that faults were chastised according to deserts; or by their absolute commands, displace those instruments, that, as powerful executioners of heavenly judgment, are to discharge the duty which is laid upon them.

But howsoever Gregory might in those dog days scorch an emperor by the combustion of beams that 'ex diametro' were opposite by the strength of a party raised by advantage of the time; yet by succeeding tokens I observe, that God was just, though popes were humorous. For one of those arch-traitors whom the pope erected out of passion, and supported out of pride, was slain afterward at the winning of a town; another in the field, though (as one writes) not impenitent for his treachery. The pope himself, worn as it seems with vexation and strife, lived not many years; and having left his point in this prince, was never able to any great purpose to sting afterwards. The mitinous and rebellious bishops, that had oppressed and resisted by the pope's direction, never held up their heads after the fatal blow which they received at the synods of Mentz and Wormes, but were either slain by their own sheep, or perished in the mountains by a most hard destiny.

Walram bishop of Megburge writing to a German count, gives a very just cause of this concurrence in malignity of sharp accidents; For since by resisting power (saith the bishop) they resisted God, it was not possible for the success to be better. Platina reports, that in the very interim, while the pope was as yet advising and consulting about the best course to be taken with this discontented prince, some wiser than the rest were of the mind, 'Regem non ita cito anathematizandum,' that a prince was not to be accursed in such post-haste. But oppositions were idle, the pope's heart being wholly set upon revenge, and supporting this whole process with the commission which Christ gave to St. Peter to feed his sheep, that is, to teach and instruct the flock: for I make as great difference between instruction and destruction, as between feeding and strangling, though by the very form of the sentence, (as it is set down against this emperor) it be manifest that Gregory commandeth St. Peter and St. Paul, as if they were his bailiffs-errant, to execute the writs of his pontifical and private authority.

Touching the charge of absolving subjects from their oaths, which is the chiefest instrument by which the canon, 'Nos Sanctorum' works in seeking to subvert the seats of kings, upon such grounds of quarrel and exceptions as may be made, I will chiefly note, That Gregory doth in this case assume more to his dignity by deputation, than God himself doth to his deity by prerogative. For admitting oaths to be lawful, voluntary and without derogation from right, (as those are which we make to princes as becomes) he concludes all their ministers, that dare presume to violate faith engaged upon those due respects, within the compass of perjury. The promise which God makes to man in swearing by himself, he will not, though it tend to the quicker and the juster punishment of sin, release unto himself: and yet shall we think that the promise which was made by a sinner to him, can be released without him? 'Frater non redimet, redimet homo? non dabit Deo placationem suam et pretium redemptionis animæ suæ,' as we may conclude in this case with the prophet. Though God were so justly moved with displeasure against man, as he seemed to repent his own free-grace in planting an ingrateful stock in a barren soil: 'et præcavens in futurum, et tactus dolore cordis intrinsecus' which inward wound might very far provoke the wrath of God against his creature; yet in respect of his word engaged, from the beginning of the world, That the blessed seed of a woman, whom all generations call blessed, should bruise the serpent's head; which mystery was to be wrought with effect 'plenitudine temporis;' he would not dispense with his own promise, but suffered the purpose of free-grace to be carried upon the wheels of eternal providence, to the prefixed period of his own benignity. The grievous sins of the prophet David and of his offspring, provoked God's wrath justly to wipe both the blossoms and the root, out of all grace and mercy; and yet in respect of an oath taken long before, that an heir of his line should never want, to keep his throne, it pleased him for the making good of his own promise, to remit his displeasures.

The greatest hope of encouragement that God's people could draw from the prophet Samuel, when they implored his assistance in distress, was this, That God having by a solemn oath selected and in a sort impropriated that nation as a choice people to himself, would neither exclude them out of protection, nor leave them to fury.

The rule of God's own direction is very strict, that if any man hath made a vow to God, 'et se juramento constrinxerit,' and bound himself by oath to keep the same, it shall no longer be in his own election to make it void, but he shall perform precisely what was deliberately promised. It is not known to any man of understanding, what the law sets down concerning the redemption of vows upon just cause in the presence of the priest, and at such a rate as the votary, according to the measure and proportion of his means, is able (without undoing) to afford. Again, all men understand that unlawful vows and oaths (as that of Jephtha, Herod, and many other rash protesters of like sort) force not the point of conscience in the least degree: but when we take an oath advisedly and freely, according to the measures and conditions limited and expressed in the law of God, that is, according to judgment, righteousness, and truth; yea, though it be by duty to a wicked prince, Ezekiel will teach us by the warrant of the Holy spirit, that God himself will nail upon the head of the perjurer, the oath which he hath set light, and the covenant which he hath perfidiously broken.

his warrant of releasing the subjects oaths to Henry the 4th, the prophet Hananias one of the high priests for the time, might as well have dispensed with the oaths of God's people to Nebuchodonosor an infidel, and an idolater. But God himself condemneth all priests and prophets that by false hopes went about to ease the people's burden before the time prefixed for their penance by his imposition: and the days of Hananias the false prophet were cut off for his flattery. Wherefore as the boldness and presumption is very great in any mortal man to dive so deeply into the secret mysteries of Providence, as to judge at what time, in what person, upon what condition, or by what warrant one sinner may release another of his oath: so likewise the charter which the school-men in the pope's behalf pretend upon this claim, must undoubtedly be very weak, whensoever they shall undertake without assurance of God's certainly revealed will, to discharge the conscience of man engaged by election, and obliged with solemnity. The school-men shall never be able to make clear proof by any ground out of either testament, by any canon of the councils primitive, nor any of the fathers living in a purer air than ours, (howsoever they devise distinction upon distinction, rather to entangle than to settle faith) that this doctrine of accusing princes upon light occasions, of releasing oaths, of deposing magistrates, is consonant to those principles of obedience and patience which our Saviour left to his apostles, and they like heirlooms to their successors. If it be clear by St. Matthew, that our peace shall return unto ourselves, when they to whom we wish the peace, declare themselves unworthy of our wish; undoubtedly as true it is, that our curses shall recoil upon our own heads, (and that worthily) when they that are within the bosom of the church, (which is the house of God) declare themselves unworthy of the curses which without desert we cast upon them. For as it is a question well moved in this case of Balaam, 'quomodo maledicat ei, cui non maledixit Dominus?' So it is as discreetly noted by St. Gregory, that 'ligandi et solvendi potestate se privat, qui eam injuste exercet:' he deprives himself of the power of binding and loosing sins, that seeks to practise without grounds that may be justified. Origen writes excellently, that where the motives of sharp sentences are unjust, and not able to endure the touch of due regard, he that is cast out, goes not, 'sed qui munit entus, excluditur.'

It was not in the power of the priest by the law of Moses, to make him a leper that was clean, but to judge (by search) whether he were clean or not: and therefore St. Augustine may more confidently deliver his own conclusion, That rash judgment hurts not the person 'de qua temere judicatur, sed ei qui temere judicat.' The reason may be drawn out of another of the same suit, 'quia dum volumus per iram aliena coercere, graviora committimus:' in seeking to correct the faults of other men in passion, ourselves commit faults that are greater, for want of charity.

Therefore I conclude, and that 'magistrat' liter,' as the school-men speak, out of the very canons themselves, 'manere Letri privilegii, ubicunque fertur ex ipsius a quietate judicium;' that Peter's privilege doth continue so long as the sentence is pronounced out of Peter's equity and not otherwise. To that caution put in by St. Gregory out of scrupulosity of conscience, 'Vel inquam judicis sententiam timendam,' that the sentence of a lawful judge ought to be feared, (yea, though it be unjust) we may give a reasonable answer, by restraining that fear to such a kind of modesty and tenderness as being ever apt to suspect frailty in itself, shall offend less by searching sin with too deep, than too short an instrument; and by supposing out of the sense of an humble spirit, that all men are more apt to flatter themselves in the ways of their own errors, than a learned, discreet and religious judge to censure without a just occasion.

A wise man that desires to preserve his health, receiving pills from the hand of his physician, who understandeth the state of his body out of knowledge and experience, much better than himself, presumeth at the first impression, that some humour may offend either in quantity or quality which serveth correction, though he know it not: but after calling to mind upon advised observation, that his appetite is ordinary, his temper perfect, his digestion strong, and all those other circumstances, which the learned in that faculty regard, suitable to a perfect constitution and state of health, he begins to apprehend (by opposing the sense of his own parts to his doctor's aim) that men, though grave and learned otherwise, may err either by mistaking principles, or giving too light ear to false informations, which are rightly termed the spectacles of error. For God doth only search the hearts and reins, and therefore only knows truly with what ignorance or skill the plaister is applied to the part either festered indeed, or for want of a sound judgment (in those that take upon them as his vicegerents to discern) so deemed of. God hath pronounced in his word, that 'spiritus hominis tantummodo,' the spirit of man only knows those things which are in man, and the spirit of God alone those things which belong to God: and therefore 'de occultis vel de male intellectis,' that spirit which only breathes in the nostrils of mortal men, can neither discern nor judge infallibly. But if any man object, that popes proceeding against princes, arm themselves with sufficiency of proof, before they come to resolve to the defendant's prejudice: I answer, that presumptions too far carried in the scope of passion, have caused many popes to err against emperors in the act of process. And lest we stray too far in seeking an example, even this Gregory 7, condemned Henry, 'Causa inaudita,' before the cause was heard, as some writers of that age testify. That rule of equity which warrants orderly appeals from judges ill informed, to judges grounding sentence upon proof above exception, in matters of less weight than this, hath been current in all policies and times: for 'Lex iusto non est posita.' And howsoever for the maintainance of order, outward forms are to be kept with moderation and reverence, yet to the soul of man, the conscience standeth for a thousand witnesses, and is in very deed the truest touch. And therefore for my own part I shall never tax that patient, that privily, and without disgrace to the doctor, throws the pills out of the window which are sent, if from certain and undoubted knowledge of his own inward state, he be sure, that for the reparation of health, or for the cure of a supposed sickness, his body hath no need of them.

I stand the longer upon satisfaction to this place of Gregory, because it is opposed in defence of all erring judges, to the snaring (or at the least to the frightening) of those souls that are oftentimes most timorous, because they are most innocent. But in the mean time, note that this godly father released no subject of his oath in point of duty; he accused no prince in the chair of royalty; he confounded no state by extent of primacy; but knew very well how easily a judge may err by strong imagination, with Gad in the book of Judges, mistaking 'capita hominum pro umbris montium,' the heads of men for the shadows of hills; 'et hoc errore decipi,' and by this error be deluded and dazzled.

The chapter of Liege utterly rejecting this release of oaths and fealty, might be moved with many grounds. First, because the breach of a lawful oath (as hath been justified before) falls into the compass of a mortal sin. Again, because many of their predecessors were departed to God in peace of conscience, that till the last point of life observed their oath; whose example they had small reason to under-value. Furthermore, they alledged, and not without just cause, that supposing this emperor as impious as the sentence did import, yet it became them no more than Zedekiah (till the fire of correction had eaten out the rust of sin) to withdraw their necks presumptuously from the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar. I conclude this point with a fit example of the wisdom of our kings in former times, drawn out of the cabinet of most ancient records: for nothing could give them satisfaction touching the loyalty and fidelity of their own prelates, till they had inserted into the oath of homage these words, 'In verbo veritatis,' (Which binds conscience) in place of former words of an elder date, 'Salvo ordine,' which left church-men in effect to their own liberty. For it is free, saith an old Roman Catholic, Johannes de Parisiis, for any lawful prince to repel the violence of the spiritual sword by the best means he can, finding that it tendeth to the disturbance of the civil state, 'cujus cura incumbit regi,' the care whereof belongeth to the king: or else he should bear the sword idly.

But now to make the best use that the fitness of this occasion offers upon the worst motive that ever was heard of among men before this accident; and to make all men see that have either eyes of understanding in their heads, or the fear of God's judgments in their hearts, how rashly our late undertakers, who steer Peter's ship in our narrow seas, Mr. Garnet being one of the chief pilots, have run her upon the rock of rebellion, neither looking to the card of conscience, nor regarding the compass of faith: I desire that certain observations may be kept in memory, as certain monuments of God's powerful works were in Israel, 'tanquam signa prædicantia;' that is, forewarning signs and cautions for abstinence to giddy malcontents in future times; which otherwise, upon the motives of like mischief, may be metamorphosed into figures of like inhumanity; for an angel said to Tobit, That to publish and reveal the works of God, is laudable.

I know that strange things happen oftentimes by accident, so far as the weakness of our sense is able to apprehend, though truth assures us, that without the providence of God no sparrow lights upon the ground: and Pericles justly maketh fortune to be nothing else but 'vera causa ignoracionem,' our ignorance of the proper and true causes of all things. But yet where a wild boar by rooting in the ground doth not accidentally express one A, but adds to that so many letters in due course as presents this whole word Agamemnon to the reader's eye; where a man doth not cast three quarters upon three dice, but 3,000 quarters upon 3,000; and where order, which proceeds from reason and election, is kept in coherent forms, chance hath no stroke of predominance by the right grounds of philosophy. Wherefore no man can tell whether some of those confederates alive, because I dare not say that there are none, looking back as it were from the shore upon the rocks and quicksands which they escaped in this storm, (calling to account the had success, not of one or two, but of all their many counsels, labours and events in this luckless action, keeping in mind that observation among the Galenists, that where all simples work against their kind or property, the cure is desperate) finding our Jerusalem to be bait as a city, 'cujus participatio in idipsum;' marking that our gracious, our just, and best deserving king (supported by God's angels, which are 'Spiritus administratorii in ministerium missi propter eos qui capiunt hereditatem salutis') doth dwell 'in adjutorio altissimi;' and that it is in vain to work upon a monarchy, 'cujus cor est unum et anima una,' whose heart and soul in the point of obedience is one and the same; will return to the resolution wherein they stand engaged by the laws of God, and of their own native soil; give ear to the voice of their own shepherd, and acknowledge humbly with Jacob, that 'Dominus erat in loco isto, et ipsi nesciebant;' God with the mighty protection of his powerful hand was in the place, although they knew it not.

First therefore I observe, that when you, master Garnet, and your practising disciples, laid a pack together for a project of invasion against the late queen, and in her later days, with hope to put out a flush of princes with a prime of jacks, which will never stand in this state, I trust, with our right game of 'primus ero.' God took away this lady in her ripe and mellow years, when her head was white with the blossoms of the almond tree, as he did Josias, 'Ne videret mala quæ eventura erant,' lest she should see the mischief which was likely to ensue, and had followed undoubtedly, as men were restrained from the certain knowledge of the only rightful successor, if the 'bonus genius' of our dear sovereign had not, through the preparation of ordinary means and instruments, by supernal grace established this state in the full fruition of their long lasting security.

The bulls which by the practice of you and your Catiline, the lively image of your heart, should, by loud lowing, have called all his calves together with a preparation to band against our sovereign, at the first break of day, and to have cropped those sweet olive-buds that environ the regal seat, did more good than hurt, as it happened, by calling in a third bull, which was Bull the hangman, to make a speedy riddance and dispatch of this forloru fellowship.

In the time of Henry 6, Humphry duke of Gloucester, finding certain bulls that came from Rome to be very prejudicial to the king's estate, without asking leave of any man, cast them roundly into a bonfire. The late queen of happy memory entertaining the bull which Felton set upon the bishop of London's gate, with the same or greater distaste, because the dritt to be embase her title, and transport her crown, gave it as quick dispatch by like destiny: and master Garnet thought his bulls as worthy to be sacrificed in a quick fire as any of the rest, for their idleness and weakness in effecting what was wished, and expected by the friends that invited them. These bulls master Garnet were 'Cornupetae'; you were warned by the state to shut them up, in respect of the mischief that they meant; you regarded not the prohibitions of law, but gave them scope of grazing in certain grounds, where the marks of their impressions are visible. If this be denied, Catesby your apt scholar and choice friend shall charge your conscience, who drew from the direction of these bulls that shrewd argument, That if it were lawful to keep a right heir from his kingdom, in respect of conscience, before establishment, it was as lawful to remove him after he were established. The wisdom of the Holy Ghost ordaineth, That 'Bos lapidibus obruetur si occidetur dominus:' though we leave all to the law's ordinance, and his majesty's good pleasure. But whatsoever happeneth in the process, I must confess that bulls have little reason to require a mittimus into these parts, since neither their access is acceptable, nor their success fortunate. The point whereat I wonder most, in revolving these strange events, is That the bulls which were consumed into ashes at

At the king's first entrance into this happy state, with as great security and ease, as if he had removed after an ordinary fashion from London to Greenwich, and from Greenwich to Hampton-Court, the most expedient device for the disturbance of the general applause, which entertained 'nostrum Solomonem pacificum' with a kind of joy and cheerfulness unspeakable, as was conceived by the brotherhood, was to awake the purpose of invasion, that slept in foreign parts, by a set messenger employed. But though Verus had commended this Petition by letter of request to Mars, it would not have been heard, God having then prepared and disposed the minds of princes on both sides to such a peace, as could admit neither secret operation, nor open execution of hypocrisy. This was not by the method of Divine process, 'eligere infirma ut confundat fortia:' but this was rather by the spirit of Achitophel's suggestion, 'abuti fortibus ut confunderuntur omnia.' But thanks be to God, the lion is alive, out of whose mouth you must have drawn your dropping honey-comb, before your riddle could have had either the grace or the success which you desire among our conspiring Philistines: so that we only find your fixed trust in tumult and vexation, as the prophet speaketh, instead of that hope and silence which should have been your sheet-anchor.

Your end was by possessing princes with the motives of your malice to stir compassion; because it happeneth often that exhalations drawn up to the highest region by the beams of the sun, are there inflamed and sent back again with a fiery effect: but 'multi committunt eadem diverso crimina fato.' A great philosopher observeth to the same effect, that 'Prosperum scelus virtus vocatur.' And notably to this consort another, that though the fact and intent were one in both, yet 'Ille crucem sceleris pretium tulit, hic diadema.' But in this case by the goodness of God it fell out quite contrary; for the princes being as weary of war, as you were of peace, desiring as much to spare blood, as you to let it out; and regarding more the grounds of their own discretion than the storms of your passion, sent away your second Mercury with a flea in his ear, and instead of procuring treasure and supplies, were content to learn, by the scope of this employment, that some professors of the Catholick religion had other views wherein to exercise their inventions and meditations beside the repetition of the Rosary, which without so manifest a proof, perhaps they would either not at all, or not so easily have credited.

The conspirators could not devise a more likely motive of attraction whereby to draw malecontents and beautefeux into the mischief which their malice did intend, than by whispering into the ears of ignorant and ill-advised Catholicks, that his majesty had violated a former promise made to some of them before, of toleration in point of conscience: for ears that itch after light reports, and minds that interpret common fears in that sense which tends to their private harm and prejudice, converting for the most part to rank poison whatsoever is prepared by the best affections to kindle nutriment, take hold of the first overture. But for prevention of this peril, God so wrought, by disposing times and accidents to best effects, as before the poison could pierce to the secret of men's thoughts, Watson the priest had confessed to myself, sent from his majesty to the jail at Winchester, for the finding out of the first author of this lewd report, not past one day or two before his death, at which time no man is presumed by the civil laws to lye, that he never could receive any spark of comfort touching ease of conscience to Catholicks from his majesty, how unjustly soever the world had made him author of that scandal; though withal he added how unwilling he had been to utter the king's answer to the Catholicks at his return in his own words, and with those incurable obstructions, which appeared by the manner, for fear lest over-great discouragement might make them desperate, and drive them to seek other helps, as some did, which this action makes evident.

Besides, there are in England some Recusants at this day, that for a need both could and would avow the like report of Percy after his returns out of Scotland, both before and after the queen's death; advising no man to depend upon the least conceit or apprehension of hope from thence, but make the best shift they could devise for themselves; for in the point of conscience he found the king's intent and final purpose to be peremptory. By this plain dealing many were deprived of their best advantage of improving this shroud circumstance, both as a colour of exception and a mask of conspiracy.

The practice was begun with auricular confession, as the safest lock to which men durst adventure to commit a secret of this weight; for, who could hope to draw that from a confident or a confessor in respect of safety, besides censures of the Church, the peril reaching and extending to the loss of life? But by the streams of Jordan running backwards to the drowning of the worst disposed part, it came to pass that by the words which passed between Greenwell and Bates (Catesby's servant) in confession upon the horror of his conscience against so foul a fact, those circumstances happily fell out, which being brought to light, made a fair introduction into that full discovery which the lords laboured. It may be thought that God himself abhorring the falsehood of a priest, that under the colour of the keys, abusing both his person and his power, is not ashamed to contrive conspiracies so much more perilous and pestilent, as they are countenanced with a more holy shew, hath set a mark of his own wrath both upon the matter and the minister. For the patients are oftentimes beguiled in judging by taste the quality of the simples, and ingredients which they receive, 'decepto sensu cum judicio,' the judgment of the senses being first deceived, 'et corruptis organis.'

It is clear, that for the secreting and concealing of this purpose, till by progression it might be ripened for the desired end, the seal of the Sacrament of union was set to this contract of blood; as if God would be put in trust with the keeping of these prophane bands and obligations of conscience, against the rule and canon of his own written law, 'que versatur tantummodo in bonæ fidei judiciis.' But we that know what desperate effects unworthy eating of the Sacrament, and the presumption of bearing the standard of our Saviour in open field against himself, have wrought in minds polluted with impressions of sins, that are voluntary and premeditate, will not greatly wonder at the bad success of this conjunction, calling to mind that the first work of Judas after the receiving of the sop, was to betray his master, and the next to hang himself; and in such a manner, 'ut creparet medias et effunderentur ejus viscera,' that he brake in the middle, and his entrails came out of him.

The purpose of these gallants in binding faith and promise one to another by solemn oath, though 'Demens est qui fidem præstat errori,' stood upon the distrust that one reposed in another's love and moveless constancy holding themselves as sure after such seal of the contract, as Seleucus did himself in the speculation of a city to be built in the air above the reach of the capacity or wit of man; but yet experience reveals, that the hands of Madian have fought against themselves, the voices of Babel have confounded their own plots, and these forlorn hopes like the knights of Cadmus, as appeareth by the scope of their own confessions, 'mutuis conciderunt vulneribus,' have been wounded to death one by another.

The course of mining into the strong wall of the parliament, was in very deed more laborious and slow, but yet more sure and secret than the latter by the vault, in case the pioneers had proceeded resolutely according to the plot of the first device: For prevention of which almost inevitable stroke, the cellar was set open even in the very heat of their endeavour, as it were by the handy-work of God himself; and not only set open, but almost miraculously put into their hands by a faithful servant of the king's, whose ordinary caution could not possibly have been so far over-shot, without an inward working and contriving favour from above, which took hold of the feet of sinners in that very snare that they had prepared and set for those that were most innocent. They flattered their own conceits so idly, but yet so far with the facility of working upon this unexpected overture, as if it had been the will of God, that to them, as to Jacob hunting for his prey, 'occurreret quod volebant.' But on the other side we may observe with joy and comfort, That though they watched eagerly with Esau for those days of mourning, wherein the death of Isaac might prepare a way for their most bloody and most violent revenge, like rats between the hanging and the wall 'suo perierunt iudicio,' they were first betrayed, and afterwards perished by their own discovery.

Their spleen was even 'sævire in saxa,' bent against the walls and house of parliament, as an instrumental cause for producing many sharp laws, for the space of more than forty years, against the religion, which their own disguised affections did eagerly embrace, with a purpose to convert Hierusalem 'in acervum lapidum,' into a heap of stones. Thus Polymnestor stricken blind, out of rage against Hecuba, sought to murder all the women he could meet. Thus Fulvia by thrusting needles into the tongue of Cicero, after he was dead, sought revenge of his sharp invectives against Anthony: And thus Anthony himself warred against the walls of the senate-house at Rome after Cæsar's death; but yet the place is as it was, the benches stand as they did, and they that set on them have the same affections which before they had; enforced perhaps by this late more than Neronian attempt of endangering both their souls and bodies at one blast, for want of time to call for grace, to strike a deeper wound than any of their ancestors had done before into the cause which the scope and drift of these undertakers pretended by their inventions to rectify. The Roman soothsayers had reason to divine, that when bulls, bandogs and asses, which are beasts created for obedience and use, grew mad upon a sudden, and without a certain cause, 'Bellum servile imminabat;' and of this composition was the late pack of rebels, that with the same barbarous inhumanity, which was well observed at the ruin of Saguntum, 'nihil reliquæ fecerunt ut non ipsis elementis fieret injuria;' left nothing undone for their parts to wrong the very elements. I grant that they might learn their art of building muddy walls of the swallow, which are but summer-birds; and their skill in weaving cobwebs of the spinners, whom Minerva hated; chiefly, because their works were more laborious than durable; and most commonly swept away before they came to finishing. But this trick of subverting and demolishing, they could not learn better than of the Montanists, 'Qui non laborabant,' as Tertullian reports, 'ut ædificarent sua, quam ut destruerent aliena,' to build their own as to destroy other men's; 'Heu genus invisum superis!

The train of powder was laid only for true men by wicked traitors; to this end chiefly, that after innocency had endured, malice might insult, that 'cùm scelera prosunt, peccat qui rectè facit;' and conclude with the rankest atheists of our time, a prejudice of God's anger against faithful subjects, out of the barbarous effects of their own villainy: For this argument is used in defence of the slaughter of the last French king. But as we find just cause to rejoice thus far with Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, 'Nihil potestatis in nostra corpora habuisse ignem?' That the rage of the fire had no force or strength against our bodies, God's angels coming down of purpose both to disperse the flame, and to infuse in lieu thereof 'ventum roris flantem,' a cool wind of mild air breathing, to slack wasting heat, 'Ut neque eos contristaret ignis, nec quicquam molestie inferret;' as it could neither make them sad, nor offend them any way: So on the other side, God wrought so powerfully in this particular, to give a taste and a feeling to some of the chief traitors of those endless flames, that in another world shall never ease, without contrition and confession in this, as in the chiefest puzzle and perplexity of their ill-thriving practices, they were blasted by the rage of their own gunpowder.

Thus Alexander 6 and his darling Borgin, the only monster of that age, were poisoned by error of the cupboard-keeper, out of the bottles that were kept in store, and by Cæsar's own appointment, against supper, for the destruction of certain cardinals. And thus it happens many times, God's justice far surmounting man's capacity, that those instruments which we select for execution of malice, serve for the protection of innocents, 'Et sæpe fugiêdo mala, in majora incurrimus.'

These Catalinians in the raging distemper of their passion, which meeteth their own wants 'et commoda aliena pari dolore,' were so desirous to draw blood even 'ad animæ deliquum,' of the noblest, the truest and best subjects of the state in all degrees, that had not one drop of attainted or infected blood in any vein; and to make sure work, that there might be spare of none, like the Roman triumvir, they held it safest to let out their own, without distinction of kinsmen, allies, or friends; leaving no one man of mark out of the list, which was agreed upon by the conspirators. But mark the proof; For, as Leo writt to Mauritiuſ, 'in victoria veritatis, sola veritatis inimici perierunt,' none but the enemies of truth did perish in truth's victory. For whosoever loves to dive into the waters of contradiction, whose property is, as a learned father notes, rather 'vorare' than 'portare,' may be sure to expect in vain, that the hand of Christ which assisted Peter in his faith, should support them in their fraud: For between truth and falsehood, as well the differences as the degrees are infinite.

It was holden a safe course and of great use for advancement of this bloody project, that a faculty might be granted to some persons, which in that rank were reputed choice for their excess in cruelty, and barbarous inhumanity above all the rest, for the calling in of such other assistants and confederates, as 'Non propter eximias virtutes,' but such as 'pares negotiis erant nec supererant,' and that when the stock grew poor, might be best able to defray expences, to ease burthens, and advance desires. But it fell not out that any good grew to the cause by any person let in at this loop, howsoever their affections were bent: For Francis Tresham the last above, intended much, but effected little by relief; only this I note, that by his passions and words in his first answer at the council-board before the lords, he left so deep impressions both of his fore-foot, and his hinder-feet, as though we could not evidently descry the hare, yet we easily discerned what course she took, and thereupon the better with a full cry upon so hot a scent pursued the game that hasted to get over.

No man can deny but it was in Robin Catesby the trick of a crafty pate, enrouding violently the ruin of our sovereign, and his royal progeny, to engage the fortunes of his dear friends, Rookwood, Grant, &c. to his hungry creditors, in deep bonds, before he would impart to them the secret of his Plot, supposing certainly, that in respect of their own danger by his fall, they would be more apt to undergo the hazard of all events, and rather chuse to die with him, (though the worst should chance) than to beg after him; having in the mean time in their eye so bright an object of enticing hopes, That 'summa scelera incipiuntur cum periculo, peraguntur cum premio.' But as the greatness and inwardness between wicked men (according to the grounds of moral wisdom) is accounted rather conspiracy than amity, (having but 'metum et noxam conscientie pro fœdere;' so likewise in this case, the success was suitable, for one led another by the links of combination to the reward of cozenage. Trust was the trap, false hopes the baits; and all the fruit they could expect by tricks, was of the same quality with the grapes and pomegranates that grew in Sodom, after the ruin of the town, as we read in Origen, (that is) smelling of sulphur, though delightful to the eye. And even as those upon the first touch were apt to dissolve into powder, so were these upon proof to run into Gunpowder.

The scope of some chief actor in this tragedy, more sensitive in that point of compassion, as it seems, than the rest, was to advise a noble gentleman, whom in respect of his approved love and loyalty to the king his sovereign; he durst not trust, by an obscure letter, more resembling the riddle of an Oedipus than the counsel of a friend, that he should abstain from the place prefixed at the time determined. The dark figure of the writing, the strange manner of delivering, the small likelihood of any cloud at that time gathering, might have moved many men rather to have neglected, than apprehended so blind a figure of discovery. But this discreet and worthy gentleman, conceiving that men experienced in mysteries of state were better able than himself, both to discern of spirits, and unloose hard knots; imparted this occurrent to certain of the privy council, and they to the king, who by that spirit of true divination, which is infused into the lips of the king by God, (as the proverb says) never gave over mining into the purpose of this admonition, with due regarding circumstances and presumptions, according to the nature of the motion, till the barrels were brought into light, and order was taken to drive the devils out of their den, the materials out of their opportunities, and the pioneers from all possibility of effecting the powder-works.

The purpose of these gallants 'qui pascuntur scelere,' was to feast their eyes with the sight of our dead carcasses; for since there were no doves, but ravens, the less wonder that they did 'sequi cadavera.' But now by God's providence it comes to pass, that their limbs feed the fowls of the air; unless, the curse of God, the putrefaction of sin, and horror of the fact, move all the creatures of God to loath and abhor to look upon them.

The same sly serpent that seduced Eve, by the deceitful bait of understanding good and evil, to transgress, induced some of these, I doubt not, to undertake more gallantly, upon hope to be reputed holy angels in this life, in case their enterprise succeeded happily, or martyrs in the next; if it fell out otherwise. But by evident confession it appears, that the very night wherein the powder should have wrought the desperate effect, either the light of reason, the horror of vexation, or the powder of revelation, presented to Robert Winter in a dream, the faces of his chief friends, and the highest traitors that should have acted execution upon the bloody stage, in such a ghastly and ugly figure, more like to that 'malus genius' which appeared unto Brutus the night before his death, or the face of Hector that appeared unto Andromache, or the countenance which they themselves held afterward upon the pinnacles of the parliament, than to that figure of beatitude, by which their own fantastical conceits and alluding apprehensions were too much flattered. For it is not only true that God, as Job says, 'terret per somnia,' affrights by dreams, 'et per visiones horrorem concutit,' and by visions shakes the mind with horror: But beside, this ground out of the book of Wisdom can never fail, as I said before, that 'cum timida sit nequitia, dat testimonium condemnationis.' Wickedness gives evidence of condemnation, because it is timorous, 'Et semper præsumit sæva perturbata conscientia.'

While the wisest in this wicked pack, upon the discovery made by that worthy lord of whom I spake before, began to lay their heads together, and in a staggering with great uncertainty what course to take, stood with the king of Babylon, as the poet says 'in bivio querentes divinationem;' some doubting, some securing, some hoping, some despairing, and all setting the cause in such a course, as in case Percy their explorer, that was let out like a raven, and sent as a spy to descry by the best inducements he could find, whether the state took hold of their discoveries or not, brought back ill news, a ship might be prepared on the sudden for the transport of this his pack, God dazzled their eyes with so dark a mist of error and perplexity as they could not find the right way to get out of the wood; and their prophet Percy by securing doubts at his return inspired new life into dead hopes, that the project for speedy rigging of a ship was carelessly cast off, and error left to make full satisfaction by suffering. For God, that caused the first vessel to be built by Noah for the saving of those eight faithful, pure and selected souls, that should with time renew the world which sin had drowned in the depths of despair, would not permit that any other of that mould or fabrick, should preserve these eight unfaithful, unpure and detested souls, whose end was to destroy this perdition of our English orb, which hath been so strongly, so often, and so powerfully protected under the wings of his tenderness.

As Joah kissed Abner when he gave him the stab, Jezebel proclaimed a fast when she cut Naboth's throat, and Judas kissed our Saviour when his end was only to betray him to the Pharisees: So Percy, the right limb of Lucifer, pretended with a colour of devotion to kiss the image of the blessed Virgin, after he had plighted faith and promise to his complices, by blowing up the body of the state, to destroy the king, who is indeed the sacred image of the eternal Son. But God, whose holy purpose was to publish to the world how far his blessed mother is from countenancing and protecting traitors, that by opposing to his deputy revolt from him, branded this act of hypocrisy with so palpable a mark for an admonition everlasting to well-meaning souls, that are oftentimes surprized in their weakness, by false seeming shews of piety, when the practices are foul, as on that very feast of the blessed Virgin, (whose picture Percy did so embrace) which shall set forth to the world's end the memory of Christ's incarnation, whom the traitors would have wounded through the side of his lieutenant in the seat of majesty, an act did pass in parliament for the blowing up of these monsters and their hopes that by an act which never had the voice of any member of the parliament, would have blown up both houses.

To your own drift and purpose, master Garnet, in recommending that ancient hymn, used on the day of All Saints,

for a speedy dispatch of many innocents, that God, which converts both the labours and the prayers of the wicked into sin, and reflecteth execrations of infidelity upon the heads of those that execrate and curse without just ground, gave satisfaction, though in a contrary element; purging the present state of Catesby, Percy, and their complices, which may truly be reckoned, and reputed above all men that ever were, Gens perfidissima, transcending all proportions either of precedent or future inhumanity. As for your fervency in swearing and forswearing manifest untruths, and such as you were forced afterwards to confess with a blushing countenance, it proceeded as I think from a reverent regard to shadow great faults, which breaking out of Chaos into light, might cast scandal as you thought upon your whole society. And this I gather evidently, as well out of your own speeches, as out of your request; that the censure of your weakness might determine personally, within the compass of your fault. But we receive a further benefit thereby in distinguishing between the protestations of plain dealers, and of those that are taught to equivocate; to mark those that pronounce verbally, when they renounce mentally, and those that in point of fact are not ranged unto the rules of faith; and the civil laws have resolved, both justly and judiciously, that construction ought ever to be made against the party that comes masked to the bar, and speaks ambiguously upon advantage, when he should speak plainly for satisfaction.

I dare undertake, it was certainly conceived by you Mr. Garnet, and by Mr. Hall your fellow-prisoner both in profession and bands, that if by any accident you might confer but half an hour after you had passed the file of their examinations, that had both you and your cause in hand, the lips of scandal would have been sealed and shut up so close, as nothing might evaporate to embicmish oaths, since the lords of the commission forbearing torture, dealt so tenderly; and thereupon you found a second vent of whispering between two doors, but with no better proof by this adventure than by the rest. For your former reservedness, being now encouraged and urged by the spur of opportunity, became so confident in running beyond itself through the chief points whereof the state was most eager and desirous to take certain notice at that time, as they that could not reap might glean, and many shifts and subtil traverses were over-wrought by this occasion, which could not be extracted out of your breast either by intreaty or industry.

By writing to the pope in a christian and humble manner for the tempering and cooling of hot humours of some giddy-headed catholicks by his apostolick authority, lest they might cause distemper in the state, carried in appearance a great likelihood of that obedience and patience which the word of God enjoins, and was accordingly divulged both by you Mr. Garnet, and many others of your suit, for the satisfaction of their conceits that were suspicious of your plain faith: But many grew to fear by the forewarnings which Watson left before his death, that this was but a vizard of invention to dazzle trust: And most grew suspicious of a mischief imminent, though they knew not what it was: The world heard rumours of a feat to be wrought for the Catholicks in parliament, though they could not understand the mean, and experience hath taught the ground of this submissive letter to the pope, after the bestowing of all the barrels among the piles of wood, to have only proceeded out of fear, that such another hot alarm as arose in Wales about the giddy mutinies of some light Catholicks might awake those eyes of Argus that were brought into so sweet a slumber by the pipe of Mercury, and put all vices and devices, out of frame, that were to work with leisure, silence, and repose in the great hellish enterprise.

Thus God intended mercifully the prosperous and happy defeat of Achitophel's device, was content that the first contrivers should put it to the highest proof, that upon discovery the practice might be more clear, the state more secure, and the fault more inexcusable. For 'homo inimicus' the envious man sows his tares so slyly and secretly at the first, as the eye of observation cannot reach to the depth of fraud; but like bastard-slips, the higher they grow, the more evidently they discover the true parent's impiety.

Greenwell desiring more the good success of this invention, than the planting of the Roman faith, enjoined Bates in the secret of confession to reveal the purpose to no priest; so jealous and suspicious he was (in respect of the main) both of weakness and error in his own consort: and you Mr. Garnet, no less provident in those things which concerned your own safety or reputation, or as it is said by one spiteful unlike with you,

'Subsedit dubius totam dum colligit iram;' forbade Greenwell to give the least inking to Catesby of your privy to the proceeding, though you were made acquainted with the matter in generality. And more, when you were assured of a likelihood of good success by Catesby's own encouragement, (so much wiser are the children of this world, that do rather 'sapere quæ sunt carnis,' than 'sentire quæ sunt spiritus,' as Paul forewarns, than the children of light, but this is only in their own generation) you were so careful out of fear to be surprized with a lye, (as the wicked judges were by Daniel upon the question 'sub qua arbore,' under what tree) and that your confessions might be consonant, that the quintessence of wit sublimed to the highest point, could not work more precisely and more punctually for prevention of discovery by orderly digestion of all occasions or directions, than you did by this preparative. But against the stroke of Providence all counter-practices are vain: for 'dies diei eructat verbum, et nox nocti indicat scientiam,' as may appear by that 'nubes testium,' that cloud of witnesses, which turning to a Scottish mist, hath not only wet both yourself and your fellows to the skin, but beside, made all their shameful parts so manifest, (even to vulgar eyes, that were to act upon the bloody stage) as the priests themselves appeaching one another, and falling out to be 'suorum fugitorum proditores,' were as much deceived in the theorick of trust, as the lay disciples were in the practick of conspiracy. For it is no less strange than true, that the powerful God (which by his word assureth us that the birds of heaven shall bring those projects and inventions to light, that are contrived in the secret thought, or privy cabinet of any wicked and false-hearted subject against the king) hath so fitted and prepared instruments of overtures, as the mysteries which passed in confession between the priests themselves (revealed by themselves) come this day and in this renowned place to be scanned and censured.

I will now shut up this audit of demonstrations which we descry (God's anger working almost miraculously in the transmutation of substances and change of properties for accomplishment of his own just ends) with the highest object of your wicked aim, which was the destruction of the most just, learned, bountiful, temperate, and tender-hearted king, (I may speak it on my conscience without base flattery) that ever was ranked either in the English or the Scottish register: his right, his heart, his tongue, hath wished happiness, and brought security to this state; which if you and your confederates disdain or wilfully reject, his own good wishes shall return to himself, and the dust of those harmless feet, that never were 'veloces ad effundendum sanguinem,' swift or hasty to shed blood, shall raise a cloud between you and that Eternal Judge in the dreadful day, to plague your ingratitude. For what is the fault (in the name of God) that can offend the most precise and captious conceits (excepting conscience, for which he must neither account to Bruno or Iguatius, but to God alone) wherein the king may be said to have cast dust in their eyes, that were most violent and diligent in preparing fuel, and making fire, for the sacrificing of a lamb, whose innocent blood, like that of Abel, would have cried for vengeance in the ear of God, against the cursed crew of all the conspirators, if their success had been fortunate?

By the way, I cannot cease to wonder at the providence and piety of this thrice happy king, this 'pacator orbis,' (the real attribute of Constantine) who seeketh to establish the throne of his dominion and power, neither with the three feet of Apollo's stool at Delphos, which his own interpreters have understood of nimbleness, observation and subtilty; nor only with the lions and lions whelps, that garnished the six steps ascending to the chair of Solomon, to stir up magnanimity, both in young and old, but according to the rules and ancient precepts of our English government, with the three piles of conscience, honour and the people's love; and that so steadfastly, as the sons of Belial have neither hope nor possibility of compassing their own desires, without cutting off these three, that is bishops, peers and commons at one blow, 'ut cespes unus et regem nostrum, et rempub. tegetet.' Therefore hold not the peril strange wherein you stand at this present, of another kind of triplicity specified by Solomon, for proportionable punishment of your barbarous affection in working (by the quintessence of inhumanity) the ruin both of prince and state, for 'Funiculus triplex non facile rumpitur.' For to men of uncertain wits and aims, it happens often in experience, that by the least swerving either of the eye of judgment, or of the hand of use, instead of the white of ambition, they hit point-blank the mark of execution: therefore no man shall be able to avow either in the present or the future time, that they which sit as judges in this case of execrable treason, wash their hands with Pilate in hypocrisy, when you and your confederates that stand forth to be tried, cannot wash your own hands with the prophet David, 'innocentes,' among those that are innocent.

Princes use not to taste offers without assays: we cannot admit your obstinacy in refusing to pledge the health of this whole estate; and no man knows better (Mr. Garnet) than yourself, by what writ true men are warranted 'in poculo' 'quod nobis miscuistis, miscere vobis duplum,' to give you double measure of the draught which you had prepared for the state's destruction; when your purpose was (if courses had suited to your wish) that it should begin from them. By this it appears, that 'virtutis' 'cursus' (if that were in you which the world did imagine) was 'celerior quàm statis,' that your life had over-run your loyalty.

It is hard for a man so many ways engaged to a prince, and for so many favours as myself, to cut evenly between affection and truth, or to provide so tenderly by preoccupation, as no spider may suck poison out of a rose: but 'juncta' 'est alea,' and therefore since it is neither my delight to sow soft pillows under princes elbows, nor the king's desire that his trusty servants and true counsellors should with the glosing prophets in the days of Mical utter 'placencia potius quam solida,' I would only crave that liberty which is afforded in case of private persons to affections that are most indifferent, which is to present his picture to the eye of observation in true colours and proportions, without swerving too far on either hand, because he must ever be 'iniquus dignitatis iudex, qui' 'aut invidet aut nimium favet,' and to wipe away the wrong which hath been done to him, and hereafter may by false aspersions, from the pencils of prejudicate conceit, awake my spirits in discharge of duty, beside obligations of grace, to raise my compass thus high at the least, and to lend my strongest arms and best endeavours to the just defence of a most just and worthy king, furiously and unjustly set upon. What spirit moved you and yours, Mr. Garnet, to dissolve the quiet of a state that never conceived you in her womb, with a purpose that, like the brood of vipers, you should make your issue into life by eating out the bowels of the dam that gave you both creation and nourishment? for it could not be, but the commonwealth 'in' 'ipsa vindicta libertatis,' as yours termed it, 'esset peritura,' when Catesby and his desperate rout meant not 'subigere nostram urbem,' as the Athenian orator saith of Philip, 'sed' 'funditus evertere;' well knowing that those that escaped, to be slaves 'neque voluerunt esse,' 'neque potuerunt.' What ailed you to mine into the strongest furt of your dear countrymen, who living by the temper of the king's affections under Libra, that is as much as under the golden line of justice, moderation, and grace, can hardly judge out of their own affection, whether the nights or the days pass over their heads more happily. For neither is it possible at this day for Virgo, that barren sign, to endanger us by orbity or age, nor for Taurus the bull to gore our sides with anticipation, nor for Scorpio to sting us in the heart, nor for Sagittarius to wound us in the reins, nor Aries the Roman engine to butt with his offensive head at the walls of our high court of parliament: 'ten-' 'pestat abijt, et ecce nova facta sunt omnia.'

At his majesty's first entrance he found us embroiled and greatly weakened by the deeply festered long running ulcer of a lasting war; what was the cure? A beam of wisdom, seasonably derived from the practice and experience of the wisest king that ever was, to conCLUDE a peace 'cum omnibus nationibus in circuitu,' that every faithful subject might enjoy the shade of his own fig tree, and the fruit of his own vine from Dan to Beersheba. I do easily believe, Mr. Garnet, that this course was nothing agreeable to your affections and ends, that sought a greater gain by fishing in streams that were more troubled; and sitting on a bare bough, like the raven when the lion and the leopard came forth to fight, began bravely to sound a point of war, in hope that whether of both those had the worst, one should serve for a prey for him to feed upon. And with the wicked crew in Lucan your prayer was, but were of another mind and hope to make you pine a good while longer at the calms of our repose, before you put us into these distempers, that have made your own best friends, and fairest fortunes absolutely desperate; to whom so far as in modesty you could ask, I may say with Paterculus, 'quod tumultuando adipisci' 'petiistis, quiete obtulisset respublica.' Peace is the mark wherewith the Holy Ghost would have all religious affections to aim: it is the razor that cuts the throat of crying sins; it is the good angel that drives horror out of the conscience of every Christian, when death threatens to arrest; it is the chiefest badge by which our Saviour would have his true disciples known from hypocrites; and it is both the richest and the last jewel which, departing hence to his Father, he left to his spouse the church for a legacy. And therefore our prayer by opposition to your exorcism must be thus,

'Non pacem petimus, superi, date gentibus' 'iras;'

But how long is it, I pray you, Mr. Garnet, since the heart of every faithful subject in this kingdom was ready to break with a fearful contemplation of those rocks, upon which the vessels of all fortunes both public and particular were likely to have run, at what time soever Deborah was to walk the ways of all flesh, and to be laid up to rest in the grave of her ancestors, for want of a certainly designed successor, upon whom Israel might only fix their eyes, both for satisfaction in conscience, and infallible direction to loyalty? In those days the state was charged by all your pens and pamphlets with an uncivil, or rather an unchristian facility in flattering the present time, with peril to the time to come, in preferring humours personal before real plagues, and in settling the whole weight of this state upon the staff of age, with no less confidence than if it had been a pole of eternity. You could then insinuate for the kindling of undutiful affections at home, how deeply both the queen should be charged in another day for setting the kingdom's rest upon the weak cards of her own particular respects; and others for inclining so much out of awe to the predominance of time; as without the work of God's powerful hand, their fear might have been the cause of the state's overthrow. Nothing was then more rife in the mouths of many Catholics, than the wrong that was done to the true and lawful issue of that worthy queen, who, instead of digging up a turf according to the manner, made her grave an entry in her son's behalf to the title of these crowns; as if she should have said with the conqueror when he took a fall at his first landing, 'Terram capio:' by laying down her life, she took a formal livery and seisin for her son; her life, I say, more precious than either my mind is able to apprehend, or my pen to deliver.

Give me leave therefore to enquire of you in the phrase of Paul, and rather with true zeal than detracting spleen, 'O insensati Galatæ, quis vos suscitavit non obedire veritati?' O ye senseless Galatians, who hath, since that, stirred up your passions against obedience to truth, and moved you in this manner to abhor the most cordial receipts for cure of inveterate infirmities, as if they were compounded of Colocynthis, which in hatred of time past you only sought, as your only restoratives? For though every man that had in his head either half a drachm of discretion, or the least scruple of common sense, knew very well what should become of those which in the day of demonstration durst protest with Sheba the son of Belial by sound of trumpet, 'nullam sibi esse partem in David, neque hæreditatem in filio Jesse;' that since they had neither part in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse, it were free to Israel to return to their pavilions; yet I must confess that the wiser sort 'in omnem eventum,' to make the foundation more sure, would have purchased the public satisfaction in this degree at an excessive rate, which was suppressed by the strength of law, and overcast with a cloud of suspicion. We are not ignorant in those days, Mr. Garnet, how many did expect with Esau, 'diem luctus' for opportunity of revenge. We knew both in what manner, and by what means some heavy bodies, and more heavy spirits were in hope to raise themselves like bustards in fallow fields 'vi turbinis,' by the strength of a whirlwind, to that height which ambition, void of due consideration, did foolishly affect.

It is evident that Ishmael would have been Isaac's play-fellow: and every day more arguments were brought to light of a strong desire in many minds, that Eteocles and Polynices might make partition of their inheritance 'acuto ferro,' with a sharp cutting sword: But as Paterculus reports of the security of the Roman Empire, otherwise than was expected, after the death of Augustus, we felt not so much as a quivering of that commonwealth, of whose ruin we stood in so great fear, 'tanta fuit unius viri majestas, ut nec bonis, neque contra malos opus armis foret:' for so great was the majesty of one man, that not so much as those that were dutiful needed weapons against those that were traitorous; for whatsoever be protected was safe, and whatsoever be rejected did only perish.

And thanks be given to God, we are now so safe and thorowly secured from foreign groans and pining fears by these sweet olive-buds which environed the mercy-seat, as Doleman may indeed dolere, that by no kind of instrument he can dolare, that is, bore or wimble, into this glorious and graceful stock, wherein he would inoculate the griefs of his stinging grievances.

Again, it cannot be denied, that the state of this strong Island, if it be considered by integrity and union of parts, was in a manner paralytical, so long as Scotland was divided from this realm of England as it were in half, by privation as well of motion, as of sense: and by reason of obstructions in divided heads, that stop the free course and passage of the spirits thro' all and every part and member of the main from preservation of health and strength, it was like to fall by the least distemper symptomatical into a dead apoplexy. It was a work of mercy in our Saviour to cure 'manum aridam,' I mean 'aridam' in respect of the small use to us, tho' active, strong and powerful for itself. It was an act of policy in Cæsar to shut up the back-door that let in the Germans to the disturbance and disquiet of those parts in Gaul. And great wisdom it was once in Severus, to part those from us with a wall of hostility, whom since a more divine hand hath happily fastened to us in eternal fraternity: for the Holy Ghost accounteth it a curse to stand alone, because he cannot be sure of his next neighbour to take him up; the branch bears fruit no longer than it continues in the natural and proper vine, fed with the same sap, strengthened from the same root, cut and pruned by the same vinetor. Thus England and Scotland are the twins of Hypocrites, that must ever laugh, and weep together; they are the Castor and Pollux that must ever rise and set together; they are the two hands of one body natural and politic, that ought both to wash one another's spots, and supply weaknesses: to conclude, they are that 'cor' and 'cerebrum,' that heart and brain, so fastened and knit together in harmony and correspondencies, that without a perfect union of both, it is not possible for the isle of Britain to move with power, to feel with tenderness, or to breathe in security.

Our ancestors desired to have seen this happy day, (I will not say as Abraham desired the days of Christ, lest the comparison might perhaps seem over-bold, but yet as they that live under the pole desire to see the sun which is familiar) as may appear by treaties between princes in the times of some of our wisest kings, as the third and seventh Henries: and again, by the continuance of that earnest instance of the Eighth, for a match between the young queen

Mary and prince Edward his eldest son, upon easy conditions. The lets in former times proceeded in part from the practice of foreign potentates envying the greatness of united crowns; and in part from the flaws of domestic factions within the bodies of both kingdoms, neglecting the benefit of opportunity thus offered upon the light impressions of private fears. God himself bestowed this union between the realms of Israel and Judah (sever'd much after the same measure and proportion that ours have been so long), as the strongest pledge of favour, and the richest blessing of eternal bounty that his loving kindness could confer upon both states, 'ut esset rex unus omnibus imperans, ut non esset ultra dug gentes, nec dividerentur amplius in duo regna: that there might be but one king to reign indifferently over all, that they might no longer be reputed two nations; and with a further condition, that from that time forward, they should be no more divided into two monarchies.

Many motives of encouragement have been propounded, many satisfactions to jealousy have been tendered, many instruments of excellent advantage have been set on work in former times, but to small effect, so long as wisdom rather debated, than right determined; and besides, for that 'nondum tempus a somno surgere:' but our age is that 'plenitudo temporis,' that full period of time wherein so many working causes and inducements draw to one conclusion of equality in happiness in both estates, as unless we will embase what our ancestors with less advantage did improve, disable what they did admire, reject what they did recommend, and in a sort repel the grace of God which knocketh at our door, we must acknowledge, 'Non fecisse Deum taliter omni nationi,' That God hath not dealt thus with every nation. For our 'Rex pacificus,' our 'Delicia Britannæ gentis,' our 'Leo Rubens,' (which according to Merlin's prediction, was to hold in one paw the battlements of new Troy, in another 'Sylvam Caledoniam,' which can level in common sense at no other prince that wielded the scepter of this state before) hath by God's blessed providence as well united the parts of England, Scotland and Ireland, in one body of dominion, as the lines of Edgar, Fergus the conqueror, Mac Morrogh, and Cadwallader in one center of conjunction, and thereby compounded out of many waters, that 'margaritam pretiosam,' for the compassing whereof rather than it should escape our hands, we ought to purchase it at as high a rate, as the wise merchant did that other in St. Luke, 'qui, inventa una pretiosa margarita, abiit, et vendidit omnia quæ habuit, ut emeret eam:' having found one precious pearl among the rest, went and sold all that he possessed in the world beside, to purchase it.

I resemble the rare object of the king our master's aim, (in seeking to unite and knit together all his subjects affections, scopes and endeavours, 'nodo indissolubili,' to this end chiefly, that it may not rest hereafter in the power of flesh to sever what hath been conjoined by the hand of grace) rather Margaret than to any other jewel of great price, because her name was Margaret, by whom his majesty derives his lineal descent by just title of the Saxon kings. Her name was Margaret, that being eldest daughter to king Henry 7, invested in the blood of our dear sovereign king James, the most absolutely and radically united interest of the two renowned families of York and Lancaster: wherein we are to note ex abundante, that at the point prefixed of one hundred years, in which this worthy princess was conveyed, by a lucky match for this renowned island, to her husband James 4, her royal offspring James 6, our matchless sovereign, made his happy entrance into the possession of all these crowns with a cheerful jubilee. I would be glad for my private comfort, and in grateful duty to the gracious bounty of this blessed line, (if it be lawful to intermingle 'corpus opacum' with so many glorious aspects) in a light touch to record and view the revolutions and fortunes of my own family. For as the duke of Norfolk was a forward minister in attending this great princess, by the wise king's direction, to the full accomplishing of the nuptial solemnity; so his heir in the third degree, by misconstruction of humble thoughts, and witty workmanship upon weak suspicion, was drawn into the loss both of life and state, for gazing too much upon the gleams of this rising glory; and our royal sovereign, the true and lawful heir of that peerless Margaret, on whom the service did attend, reserved by destiny to restore the honour of that fading house, which was overcast with a cloud of scorn, and as it were to lay new earth to the root of that sapless tree whose leaves were fallen, and the fairest branches withered. Of myself on whom it hath pleased my most gracious master and dear sovereign to cast more favour than either sub spe I could merit, or in re I can utter, this only shall be said in acknowledgement of favour and admiration of grace,

'Ultimus hic ego sum qui quam bene, quam male, nolo dicere, qui de me judicet, alter erit.'

The name of the late old countess of Lenox was also Margaret, by whom as daughter to the queen of Scotland, by an earl of Angus in a second match, the younger branch of that princely line was thoroughly incorporate into the person of the king on his father's side, for a stronger union, if it were possible, both of blood and interest, and for a double ornament of his royal progeny. She was no Margaret I confess, but a worthy Mary, that in the last descent covered 'fermentum acceptum,' the leaven which she had received by descent into three kingdoms, as the discreet woman in the gospel did her own into three lumps of dough, till by her blessed issue, founder of our perpetual quiet, they might be all thorowly and completely leavened.

Now to draw to the conclusion, which is the

'knot of these united ends, that is that worthy sovereign, to whom

'De nostris annis sibi Jupiter augeat annos.'

That you and your disciples, Mr. Garnet, in reward of so great merit of this island, were so hasty to blow up by your Powder-Plots into a higher region, than that wherein his throne was by God established, together with those very walls, which, as I find by antient record, were first by the holy confessor St. Edward raised, of whose family his majesty descends, that one king might be buried, and the chief of his race destroyed within the compass of one monument. But howsoever Mr. Garnet was willing to forget that this place was once sanctified for a refuge and retreat to all sorts of persons in distress, by his own canons; yet God that would not destroy Judah for his servant David's sake, his providence in like sort purposing to continue the piety of that blessed king in this fairest branch of his descent; the justice of that divine majesty holding it an act of Atheism to cast 'tot margaritas porcis,' so many pearls to swine, or 'sanctum canibus,' that which is holy to dogs, bounded the malice of these graceless imps within so narrow streights, as it rested not in their power by the murder of our king to stain the Confessor's walls with his own blood, or under the vizard of St. Edward's profession, to extirp the roots of St. Edward's posterity. For in the Proverbs we are certainly assured, that 'domus justorum permanebit,' the house or generation of the just shall continue: but it falls out in a better consequence, That the skull of faithless Percy should stand sentinel where he was once captain pioneer; and Lambeth should now be Catesby's horizon, that was his arsenal; and their giddy pates are left 'tanquam malus navis,' like the mast of a ship, to use the prophet's phrase, to warn passengers by what just disaster these roving pirates came to their unhappy end; especially for seeking the Golden-Fleece, not by Jason's merit, but by Medæa's sorcery.

To conclude: we may learn of the wise man, that there can be neither wisdom, nor counsel, against God. The ribs of a crazed vessel are too weak to bruise the rock which they rush upon. We spur asses to no purpose, when God's Angel is ad oppositum. Jacob having shrunk a sinew, halted all the days of his life, after he wrestled so long and to so little purpose with God omnipotent. Men are sure to gain no more than their own smart, that kick against the thorn: in such attempts it is neither in him that wills, nor in him that runs, but in God that shews mercy to those that direct themselves according to discipline: for 'sortes mittuntur in sinum,' the lots are cast into the lap, but it is God that disposeth the lottery. Though your purpose were all one with Ahab and Jezabel, in seeking to cut the throat of Naboth for his ground: though you gave out your hymn before this holy act as they proclaimed a religious fast: though you made yourselves sick, as Ahab did, with anguish and vexation, because you could not have your wills; yet since you could neither occidere nor possidere, your luck was worse than theirs: for by God's powerful and preventing grace, you were thrust as well from all the means and advantages of killing whom you hated, as of possessing what you coveted. It were good therefore that, upon so many plain experiments, you would confess with certain wanderers in the book of Wisdom, 'Lassatos esse vos,' that you are wearied and over-laboured in these crooked ways, and have been ever since you leaped out of Via regia, the king's high-way, which neither leads to dishonour, nor ends in misery. Nothing is more proper matéria, to matter, than to flow, say the philosophers, 'nisi à for-

'mā sistitur,' unless it be stayed and fixed by the form; nor any thing more proper to humanity, (according to the rule of truth) than to err, if grace direct it not. Mahomet confesseth in his Alcoran, that the throne of Christ was raised by patience, his by revenge; that by miracle, his by tyranny. The modesty and piety of Christians afflicted for the point of conscience in the time of Terullian, appears by the reason which he gives of their abstinence 'à suffocato et sanguine,' that is, 'ne quo sanguine contaminarentur, vel intra vis-
'cera sepulto,' that they might admit no pollution by blood, though it were buried within their bowels.

Pardon me, Mr. Garnet, though I doubt whether in the point of conscience, alone, you would voluntarily and resolutely abide the saw of Esay, the bolts of Jeremy, the gibbet of Peter, the sword of James, or the stoning of St. Stephen, much less make a gathering among those of your profession, towards the preparing of an humble sacrifice for the life of Nebuchadnezzar (as you esteem the king), that with the rage of a tiger sought his life, and waxed thus impatient of that soft and easy hand, which it pleased him in his gracious compassion and tenderness, before the late intended tragedy, to hold over you; so that with Seneca you might justly say, 'Nihil felicitati meæ deerat, nisi moderatio ejus.' Those golden comforts of the prophets to contrite offenders, ought at this time to be of greater estimation and value in your thoughts, than all the treasures of the Vatican. You cannot steer the ship of your crazed conscience more safely in this sharp storm, which hath been raised by yourselves, than by the council of Lactantius, which doth warrant, that to minds truly penitent, 'Optimus portus est mutatio consilii,' change of resolution is the best haven and safest harbour. After an humble acknowledgment of a grievous sin 'in fratres vestros,' against your brethren, with the sons of Jacob, and withal, that for this cause chiefly tribulation hath taken hold of your highest top; first, yield unfeigned thanks to Almighty God for preventing this destructive project, that would have cast so great a weight of judgment upon your soul, and for turning your ill purpose to his honour: then thank your merciful and tender-hearted king, who seeks not to surprize you suddenly, as Levi did Sichein, 'Quando dolor vulnerum erat gravissimus;' as you would have dealt with him; and to assault you in the greatest horror and the sharpest torture of your crying sin; but by imitation of that eternal object whose person he represents, whose example he regards, agreeably to that record in the book of Wisdom, 'Dat tempus et locum per quæ potestis mutari à malitia,' gives time and place by which you may be changed from your malice: crave pardon of the world, for leaving such a precedent to future times, of a possibility to achieve so desperate an act, which may perchance, according to the dispositions and humours of men diversely affected as well admonere as prohibere, that is, put the world in mind that such a matter may be, as forbid that it be not.

Remember the difference which Theodoret doth discreetly put, between suffering and the cause of suffering, between torture to force conscience, and legal punishments to chastise faults. To conclude my last caution with your last occasion,

'Discite justitiam, moniti, et non temere Divos.'

Because, 'Hæc vos sapere vel mori jubent;' and withal, as Martial did for Trajan, wish to the best of majesty, to whom you meant the worst of malice,

'Dii tibi dent quicquid, princeps Auguste, mereris.'

'Et rata perpetuo, quæ tribuere, velint.'

THEN the Lord Chief Justice making a pithy preamble of all the apparent Proofs and Presumptions of his guiltiness, gave Judgment, that he should be drawn, hanged and quartered.

And my Lord of Salisbury demanded, if Garnet would say any thing else?

Garnet answered, No, my lord; but I humbly desire your lordships all to commend my life to the king's majesty; saying, That at his pleasure he was ready either to die or live, and do him service.

And so the Court arose.

Garnet's Execution.

On the 3d of May, Garnet, according to his Judgment, was executed upon a scaffold, set up for that purpose at the West-end of St. Paul's church. At his arise up the scaffold, he stood much amazed, fear and guiltiness appearing in his face. The Deans of Paul's and Winchester being present, very gravely and christianly exhorted him to a true and lively faith to God-ward, a free and plain acknowledgment to the world of his offence; and if any further treason lay in his knowledge, to unburden his conscience, and shew a sorrow and detestation of it: but Garnet, impatient of persuasions, and ill-pleased to be exhorted by them, desired them not to trouble him, he came prepared and was resolved. Then the Recorder of London, who was by his majesty appointed to be there, asked Garnet if he had any thing to say unto the people before he died: it was no time to dissemble, and now his treasons were too manifest to be dissembled; therefore, if he would, the world should witness what at last he censured of himself, and of his fact; it should be free to him to speak what he listed. But Garnet, unwilling to take the offer, said, His voice was low, his strength gone, the people could not hear him, though he spake to them; but to those about him on the scaffold, he said, The intention was wicked, and the fact would have been cruel, and from his soul he should have abhorred it had it been effected: but he said, He had only a general knowledge of it by Mr. Catesby, which in that he disclosed not, nor used means to prevent it, herein he had offended; what he knew in particulars was in confession, as he said. But the Recorder wished him to be remembered, that the king's majesty had under his hand-writing these four points amongst others: 1. That Greenway told him of this, not as a fault, but as a thing which he had intelligence of, and told it him by way of consultation. 2. That Catesby and Greenway came together to him to be resolved. 3. That Mr. Tesmond and he had conference of the particulars of the Powder Treason in Essex long after. 4. Greenway had asked him who should be the Protector? but Garnet said, That was to be referred till the blow was past. These prove your privity besides Confession, and these are extant under your hand. Garnet answered, Whatsoever was under his hand was true. And for that he disclosed not to his majesty the things he knew, he confessed himself justly condemned; and for this did ask forgiveness of his majesty. Hereupon the Recorder led him to the scaffold to make his Confession publick.

Then Garnet said, 'Good countrymen, I am come hither this blessed day of The Invention of the Holy Cross, to end all my crosses in this life: the cause of my suffering is not unknown to you; I confess I have offended the king, and am sorry for it, so far as I was guilty, which was in concealing it; and for that I ask pardon of his majesty. The Treason intended against the king and state was bloody, myself should have detested it, had it taken effect. And I am heartily sorry that any Catholicks ever had so cruel a design.' Then turning himself from the people to them about him, he made an apology for Mrs. Anne Vaux, saying, 'There is such an honourable gentlewoman who hath been much wronged in report: for it is suspected and said, that I should be married to her, or worse. But I protest the contrary: she is a virtuous gentlewoman, and for me a perfect pure virgin. For the pope's breves, sir Edmund Baynam's going over seas, and the matter of the Powder-Treason, he referred himself to his Arraignment, and his Confessions: for whatsoever is under my hand in any of my Confessions, said he, is true.'

Then addressing himself to execution, he kneeled at the ladder-foot, and asked if he might have time to pray, and how long. It was an-answered, He should limit himself, none should interrupt him. It appeared he could not constantly or devoutly pray; fear of death, or hope of pardon, even then so distracted him: for oft in those prayers he would break off, turn and look about him, and answered to what he overheard, while he seemed to be praying. When he stood up, the Recorder finding in his behaviour as it were an expectation of a Pardon, wished him not to deceive himself, nor beguile his own soul; he was come to die, and must die; requiring him not to equivocate with his last breath; if he knew any thing that might be danger to the king or state, he should now utter it. Garnet said, It is no time now to equivocate; how it was lawful, and when, he had shewed his mind elsewhere: but, saith he, I do not now equivocate, and more than I have confessed I do not know. At his ascending up the ladder he desired to have warning before he was turned off. But it was told him, he must look for no other turn but death. Being upon the gibbet, he used these words: 'I commend me to all good Catholicks, and I pray God preserve his majesty, the queen, and all their posterity, and my lords of the privy council, to whom I remember my humble duty, and I am sorry that I did dissemble with them: But I did not think they had such proof against me, till it was shewed me; but when that was proved, I held it more honour for me at that time to confess, than before to have accused. And for my brother Greenway, I would the truth were known; for the false reports that are, make him more faulty than he is. I should not have charged him, but that I thought he had been safe. I pray God the catholicks may not fare the worse for my sake; and I exhort them all to take heed they enter not into any treasons, rebellions, or insurrections against the king.' And with this ended speaking, and fell to praying; and crossing himself, said, 'In nomine Patris et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti;' and prayed, 'Maria mater gratiæ, Maria mater misericordiæ, tu me a malo protege, et horâ mortis suscipe.' Then 'In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum:' Then, 'Per crucis hoc signum' (crossing himself) 'fugiat procul omnis malignum. Infige crucem tuam in corde meo, Domine;' Let me always remember the cross: and so he returned again to 'Maria mater gratiæ,' and then was turned off, and hung till he was dead.

82. A true Report of the Arraignment, Tryall, Conviction, and Condemnation, of a Popish Priest, named ROBERT DREWRIE,* at the Sessions-house in the Old Baylie, on Friday and Wednesday, the 20th and 24th of February; the extraordinary great Grace and Mercie offered him, and his stubborne, traitorous, and wilfull Refusall. Also the Tryall and Death of HUMPHREY LLOYD, for maliciouslie Murdering one of the Guard. And, lastly, the Execution of the said ROBERT DREWRIE, drawn in his Priestly Habit, and as he was a Benedictine Fryer, on Thursday following to Tiborne, where he was hanged and quartered. London; printed for Iefferie Chorlton, and are to be sold at his Shop adioyning to the great North Door of Paules, A. D. MDCVII. [3 Harl. Misc. 36.] 5 Ja. I. 1607.

IN a case deseruing so well to be spoken off, concerning iniury to God's glory, and apparant wrong of our countrey, ouer-run with too many men of such daungerous quality, I thought it the duty of an honest subiect, to say somewhat, so farre as truth would warrant me, because slaunder and detraction are no meane enemies to such maner of proceedings.

* This Article, though but unsatisfactory and indistiact, has yet been thought worthy of insertion, because it records a transaction curious in itself, and interesting from its connection with the history of the period during which it occurred. It is proper to mention, that this Drewrie was one of thirteen Priests who a little before the death of queen Elizabeth had signed the following Declaration:

THE SECULAR PRIEST'S LOYAL PROTESTATION.

"WHEREAS it hath pleased our dread soveraign to take notice of the faith and loyalty of us her natural-born subjects, Secular Priests, and of her princely clemency hath given a sufficient earnest of some merciful favour towards us, being all subject by the laws of the realm to death, by our return into our country after our taking the order of priest-hood, since the first year of her majesty's reign; and only demandeth of us for this intended favour, an assurance of the said fidelity unto her majesty's person, crown, estate and dignity. We whose names are under-written, in most humble-wise prostrate at her majesty's feet, do acknowledge ourselves infinitely bound unto her majesty

Robert Drewrie being apprehended by his maiesties messengers at the White-Fryers, and afterward brought before the right reverend father in God, the lord bishop of London; declared himselfe there, as Garnet, his maister, had done before, 'Multorum nominum,' to be a man of many names, but yet no one of them being good. For, as no lesse than six severall names would serve Garnets turne, so this man had three to shadow him by, viz. Drewrie, Browne, and Hamden, but Drewrie was the last in his owne deliuering, and appearing to be his true name indeede.—His answers were equiuocall and very confused, denying his priesthoode, and seeming so cunning, as if no hold were to be taken of him. But he being better known to the state then himselfe imagin'd, and his many dangerous practises sufficitherefore; and are most willing to give such assurance and satisfaction in this point as any Catholick priests can give unto their sovereign.

"First, Therefore we acknowledge and confess the queen's majesty to have as full authority, power and sovereignty over us, and over all the subjects of the realm, as any of her highness's predecessors ever had. And farther, we protest that we are most willing and ready to obey her in all cases and respects, as far forth as ever Christian priests within this realm, or in any other Christian country, were bound by the law of God, and Christian religion, to obey their temporal princes.

"Secondly, Whereas for these many years past, divers conspiracies against her majesty's person and estate, and some forcible attempts for invading and conquering her dominions, have been made under we know not what pretences and intendments of restoring Catholick Religion by the sword; (a course most strange in the world, and undertaken peculiarly and solely against her majesty and her kingdoms, among other princes departed from the religion and obedience of the See Apostolick no less than she) by reason of which violent enterprizes her majesty, otherwise of singular clemency towards her subjects, hath been greatly moved to ordain and execute severer laws against Catholicks, which by reason of their communion with the See Apostolick in faith and religion, were easily supposed to favour these conspiracies and invasions, than perhaps had ever been enacted or thought upon, if such hostilities and wars had never been undertaken. We, to assure her majesty of our faithful loyalty also in this particular case, sincerely protest, and by this our publick fact make known to all the Christian world, that in these cases of conspiracies and invasions which hereafter may be made by any foreign prince or potentate for the disturbance and subversion of her majesty's state and dominions, under the aforesaid pretences and intendments; we will according to the rules of Christian religion, defend our prince and country from all these violent assaults and injuries. And moreover, we will not only ourselves resist them, as inconve-ently discovered and scanned; after such private examinations as were thought convenient, time was appointed for his publique tryall, which followed as hereafter shall be declared.

On Friday, being the 20th day of February, in the forenoone, my lord mayor, maister recorder, and other of his maiesties justices of the peace, sitting at the Sessions-House in the Old-Baily, by vertue of his highnesse commission of Oyer and Terminer, for goale deliuerie, for London, and the county of Middlesex: Robert Drewrie, priest, and a fryer of the Benedictine order, was brought before the bench. His enditement, according to forme of lawe in that case made and provided, was openly read vnto him; whereunto he pleaded, Not Guilty, but, for his tryall, did put himselfe vpon God and his country. Then was a verie sufficient nient means to introduce Catholick Religion into our country, but also earnestly perswade Lay-Catholicks to do the same.

"Thirdly, If upon any such invasions the pope should excommunicate every one that would not forsake the foresaid defence of her majesty and the realm, and take part with such conspirators and invaders; in this case we do think ourselves and the Lay-Catholicks not bound in conscience to obey this censure, but will defend our prince and country.—And because nothing is more certain than that whilst we endeavour to assure her majesty of our dutiful affection and allegiance by this our Christian and sincere protestation; there will not want those who will condemn and misconstrue our lawful fact: Yea, and by many sinister suggestions and calumnies discredit our doings with the Christian world, but chiefly with the pope's holiness, to the greatest prejudice and harm of our good names and persons that may be, unless we maturely prevent their malice herein. We most humbly beseech her majesty, that in this our recognizing, and yielding Cæsar's due unto her, we may also by her gracious leave be permitted, for avoiding obloquy and calumnies, to make known by like publick act, that by yielding her right unto her, we depart from no bond of that Christian duty which we owe to our supreme spiritual Pastor.—And therefore we acknowledge and confess the bishop of Rome to be the successor of St. Peter in that See; and to have as ample, and no more authority or jurisdiction over us and other Christians, than had that apostle by the gift and commission of Christ our Saviour. And that we will obey him so far forth as we are bound by the laws of God to do, and may stand with performance of our duty to our temporal prince, in such sort as we have before professed: For as we are most ready to spend our blood in defence of her majesty and our country, so will we rather lose our lives than infringe the authority of Christ's Catholick Church." 2 Coll. Eccl. Hist. 664, 3 Harl. Misc. 37.

This paper, says bishop Bancroft under his own hand, was delivered to me by the priests. Ex Biblioth. R. Harley Armig.

Robert Drewrie, the prisoner, standing at the barre, had traytorously, wilfully, and in contempt of the statute made to the contrarie, departed out of this land, wherein he was borne, and at Valedolid in Spayne, where by Parsons means, a seminary for English students was erected, as the like were at Rome and Rhemes, hadde bin made a prieste by the bishop of Leon, by authority deriued from the pope. Sithence which time, he had returned back into this land, to reconcile, seduce, and withdraw his maiesties subiectes from their naturall dutie, loue, and allegiance, to a forraigne seruice and obedience.

Hauiug libertie graunted to speake, and aunswere for himselfe what he could, Robert Drewrie very shallowly sought to insinuate, that, if it were treason in him to be a priest, then it was the like in saint Augustine, saint Bernard, and other reuerend fathers of the church, who received their priesthoode by authority from God; and so did he presume to haue doone the like, for the saluation of his owne soule, and many others beside; which purposely he came hether to do, according to his office and function. His sillie suggestion was presently reprooued, that, notwithstanding the great difference betweene his priesthoode, and that of the fathers before named, yet priesthoode solie was not imputed to him for treason; for that profession, though neither liked, nor allowed by vs, he might vse and exercise in the parts beyond the seas, keeping himselfe there; but not heere within his maiesties kingdome, where, both he, and all other of his ranke, did very well know, and therefore could not plead any ignorance therein, that sundry good and sufficient lawes, heeretofore made, had enacted it to be treason, for any subiect borne to forsake his natue dutie, and, being made priest by authority deriued from the pope, to com home again into this land, and, in meere contempt of the king and his lawes, to reconcile, seduce, and alienate loyall subiects harts from loue, iust regard, and dutie to their soueraigne, and subiecting them in obedience to a forraigne gouernment. Drewrie made aunswere, he could not, neither would he deny, but that he came hether to exercise the office of a priest, according as he had already doone, in winning of soules; but he would not admit, that he had seduced any, or in any sort diswaded them, but only for the good of their soules. Being afterward vrged with his maiesties great mercy, who had, to him and all other of his coate, granted his generall pardon; and why he did not, according to the proclamation, depart the land, when it was so expressly commaunded? He made aunswere, That he wanted means: When it was prooued to him, that not only did the king allow such conuenient transporting, but also enabled them with mony; and therefore his stay could not be otherwise, but meere-ly in traytorous contempt of the kings lawes: Whereto he could make no reply.

Then diuers traitorous and dangerous papers were shewen, which had bin taken in his custody, and whereof he would gladly haue acquitted himselfe, but that they were manifestly prooued to be his. One of them seemed to be Parsons opinion concerning the oath in the late made statute, which he viterly disallowed any catholique to take, appearing to haue vsed the popes censure therein; whereupon the bull, or breese, to that purpose, seemeth to take effect.—The others were also of, a traytorous nature, tending to the abuse and corrupting of poore simple soules, and stealing all duty and allegiance from them. There were likewise two Letters openly read, the one from certaine priestes, prisoners sometimes in the Clinke, to the arch-priest, maister Blackwell, requiring his iudgement in matters, when they laboured and hoped for tolleration in religion: The other was maister Blackwells aunswere therto; both which though he would haue cunningly auoyded, yet it appeared what reckoning he made of them.

When he had answered for himselfe so much as he could, relying still vpon his priesthoode, and vrging that to be the cheifest matter of his offence, though many times the contrary was deliuered to him, the iurie passed vpon him, and founde him Guilty of high-treason, wherevpon he was sent away til the time of iudgement; which because it was not til Wednesday following, it shall not be much differing from our purpose to handle, and say somewhat, in the mean while, concerning the tryall and conuiction of Humphrey Lloyd, indicted there vpon willfull murder, hauiug slaine master Thomas Morris, one of the ordinary yeomen of his maiesties guardé, not long before, in Chauncery-lane.

Upon Sunday in the afternoone, being the 18th of January, the forenamed Humphrey Lloyd and Thomas Morris meeting together in Aldersgate-streete, in the companie of certaine other of their friendes, went into the Halfe Moone tauerne to drink, where they had no such plenty of wine, as to cause distemper, or otherwise, that way, to procure impatience.—But it was deliuered in euidence, that some speeches concerning religion passed betweene them; wherein Morris touched Lloyd to be a dissembler, as neither hot nor cold, but, if any thing at all, it was, indeede, best affected to popery, as afterwarde it plainly appeared. It hapned, that the lie was retorted between them, which vrged Morris to cast a cuppe of wine in Lloyds face, and Lloyd therevpon threwe a rowle of bread at the head of Morris. A further and more dangerous strife had presently ensued, but that honest friendes on both sides, being present, did so discretely deale with them, that they grew friendes againe, drank to one another, and no hart-burning outwardly perceived; till at length, Lloyde renewing remembrance of the former speeches, a more heauier falling out had thereon hapned, but that the friendes, as before, pacified them again; but yet menacing words passed from eyther, Morris threatening to bee euen with Lloyds bald pate, and Lloyde woulde try acquittance with the others cods-heads; so that they parted with tearmes of enmity.

On the Wednesday next ensuing, Lloyd and a gentleman, in a white coloured cloake, standing talking together at Lincolns Inn Gate, it hapned Morris and a friende of hys with him to passe by; the friende saluted Lloyd, as Lloyd did the like by him; and very soone after, the gentleman in the white cloake, that had stooed talking with Lloyd being sent by him, as it appeared, followed Morris, as Lloyd likewise, and, rounding him in the eare, which the friende then with Morris could not heare, hee perceiued an alteration in the countenance of Morris, and the like in Lloyd, who by this time was come to them; which he being desirous to remooue, as standing an equal friende to them both, desired them, if any thinge were amisse betweene them, to let him persuade a friendly agreement, and not to grow into any vnciuill behauiour in the open street, to the wounding of their credite and reputation, as also, what danger might otherwise ensue, was doubtful to be gathered. Lloyd made answer, that he was good friendes with his cozen Morris, and loued him as deerly as any in England. Whereto Morris instantly replied, Wilt thou neuer leaue thy disembling? Dost thou pretend to loue me so deerly, and hast euen now sent me a challenge by this man? Lloyd immediately returned him this answer: that, if he hadde sent him a challenge, he was come in person to aunswere it, and would performe it there, or any where els. Thus his malicious intent very plainly appeared. What other words passed betweene them, I know not, neither could they bee heard by any standers by; but forthwith they drew out both their weapons, notwithstanding all intreaty to the contrary: and indeede Lloyd did drawe to soone, to expresse his bloody and vnquencheable malice, for he soon gaue to Morris his deaths wound, wherevpon he fell downe presently, not speaking one word.—And, to witnessse the more his cruell and bloodie hatred, he strake twice or thrice at him, when he was downe, cutting him ouer the head, and otherwise wounding him; yet he pleaded, that he did all this but in hys own defence.—All this, which hath bin breiefelie reported, being much more circumstantially deliuered in euidence, and by oath approued to his face, he sought to extenuate his offence by verie shallow speeches, vtterly impertinent, and most against himselfe, in due consideration of his friuolous allegations: for he had bin a man of more dangerous quality, then was conceiued in his present tryall, hauing tasted the kings most gracious mercy, and had bene borne withall beyond his deseruing.—It was also told him, how farre he had waded in Watsons treason, and was also a partaker in the Gunne-powder Plotte, sending shot; and powder also, to them in Wales; in all which the mercie of his maiesty had looked more mildly vpon him, then himselfe coulde desire, or any way deserue. But the justice of heauen very manifestly appeared, that so false and hollow a hart, sullied with the detested guilt of treason, must now, in a wilful and malicious act of blood and murder, declare itselfe to the whole worlde, and the vpright censure of lawe this way depriue him of lie, that had felte mercie before, in a heauier offence. Here is also to be noted, that, as the quarrel first hapned on talk of the popish religion, so now Lloyd discouers him in his colours. For, though it was told him, that he had very confidently deliuered himselfe to be otherwise, and which himselfe was not able to denye; yet nowe Drewrie the prieste (after his iudgement) passing away by him in the docket, gaue him a publicke noted absolution, with his hand crossing him, and vsing some close speeches; wherevpon, thinking this sufficient to wash off his stayne of murder, he forthwith openly confest, that he is a Catholicke, so he had bin alwayes, and so he woulde die; as if that very name should giue fame to his fool fact, and, where he died a murderer, his owne ydle supposition of Popish absolution should make him nowe to die in the case of a martyr, and for his conscience.

When he was drawne in the carte (with others) toward execution, and all the cartes beeing stayed before St. Sepulchers church, where the most christian and charitable deed of Master Dooue, at euery such time, is worthily performed, to moue prayer and compassion in mens harts, for such so distressed: all the while that the man spake, Lloyd stopte his eares, not willing to heare any thing; but, if any Romaine Catholickes were neere, he desired such to pray for him. And so at Tyborne he did in like manner, calling to Romaine Catholickes to praye with him and for him, but no other prayers would be accept of. But, the lawe hauing censured him, and justice likewise beeing past vpon him, what else remaines to be thought, or said of him, let it be so charitably, as such a case requireth, and as becommeth all honest Christians, euermore remembering, that flesh and blood is subject to frailty, and he, that boasteth most of strength, maye soonest fall and be deceiued: therefore let vs measure other mens infirmities by a considerate care of what our owne maye be, and, committing all to him that is the onely iudge of all, desire his heauenly help and assistance neuer to suffer vs to be led into the like temptations. Let vs nowe remember where we lefte before, and returne to the matter concerning the priest.—In this time of respit since his condemnation, bethinking himselfe, belike, of his present dangerous condition, he solicited sundry great persons by his letters, entreating all possible fauour to bee allowed him. Among the rest, he wrote to sir Henry Mountague, recorder of London, requiring to haue some priuate speech with him. The gentleman, being of a milde and mercifull inclination, willing to do good to any, but much more to one at the point of such perill, vpon Monday morning, sent for Drewrie downe into the sessions-house garden to him; where vrging to know what fauour he requested, and alleaging the kings great and gracious mercy to any that expressed themselves to be his louing subjects, and would take the oath of duty and obedience to him, Drewrie made voluntary tender of himselfe, that he would take the oath, acknowledging the greatness of his maiesties mercy; and humbly required, that the like grace might bee afforded to his brother, William Dauies, the other priest, that was condemned with him. Maister Recorder conceiued very well of this his submission, and was in his ruinde perswaded, that, if he had put him to the oath presently, without any refusall he would haue taken it. But he, as an vpright iusticer, very wisely considering, that, his fact being openly knowne, and the people acquainted with his dangerous practises, his publike submission, and taking the oath, would the better witness his obedience and submission, and proue much more pleasing then any thing done in priuate, deferred it till the time of more conueniency; so Drewrie departed vpp to his chamber again, being vsed with all kind and gentle respect.

The extraordinary great Grace and Mercy, offered at the Sessions-house to Robert Drewrie and William Dauies, Priestes, on Wednesday, the 25th of February; and, lastly, the Sentence of Death pronounced against them.

According to the custome in such cases obserued, the tryall and condemnation of Robert Drewrie passing, as hath beene already declared, on the Fryday before; on Wednesday following, being the five and twentieth day of February, the prisoner was brought to the barre againe; where it being tolde him, that he had been already arraigned vpon high-treason, and had pleaded thereto, Not guilty, but, for his tryall, had put himselfe vpon God and his countrey, the countrey had found and deliuered him vpp guilty; it now remained to hear what he could say for himselfe, why Iudgement of Death should not be pronounced against him.—He replied, as he had done before, that he took himselfe not to be conuicted of treason, but onely for his priest-hood; which if the law made treason, he had nothing to say, but appealed to the kinges grace and mercy.

Heereupon, his voluntarie offer, to take oath on the Monday before, was rehearsed to him. And it was further tolde him, that now it was apparently perceiued, how colorably he cloaked his priuate and pernicious dealing, auswering by equiuocation, and setting downe one thing vnder his owne hand, then afterward speaking dyrectly against the same. For prooffe wherof, his owne letter, written sithence the time of his condemnation, to a person of great honor, was there read; and as much thereof, as concerned the present occasion then in hand, was the more insisted vpon. Wherin (if my memory faile me not) it appeared, that he had bin requyred to set downe his censure and opinion, according as himselfe did best gather and conceiue thereof, concerning the oath of legalty and allegiance mentioned in the late statute; whereunto (as I remember) his answer was thus: 'I freelye confesse, that (in my opinion) euery honest and good Catholicke may lawfully and safely take it.' Immediately, because he had made such a free confession of the oathes lawfulness, and safety in taking, himselfe was willed to take the oath, which he had thus censured, to let the world perceiue now publicly, whether his hand and hart held true correspondence together, and whether he were so honest and good a Catholicke, as but to expresse the loyalty of a subject, and give Cæsar his due. Now plainly appeared, both what he and such of his profession inwardly are, for he plainly refused to take the oath: hauing the Booke deliuered into his owne hands, and willed to take and alledge what exceptions he colde agaiust any part or partice of the oath, his answers was, that he did but deliuer his opinion of the oath, what any good or honest Catholicke might do, excluding himselfe out of any such titles. 'Neither (quoth he) can it be any waye aduantageable to me, being condemned as I am, and therefore I haue no reason to take it.' But thou, to meet iustly with such cuning dissembling and equiuocating, and to discour such apparant falshood, that no less admired, then most worthy gentleman, sir Henry Mountague, knight, recorder of the cittie of London, as he had many times before, so still he continued, in displaying the subtil slights of so dangerous a person, and what hurt ensued to the state by such as he was. To driue him nowe from these ydle suggestions, and to lay open the kings most royall mercy, though not so much as in truth it deserued, yet sufficiently able to conuince such impudence, he told him, that he was a poore minister of iustice vnder his maiesty, and hadde such true acquaintance with his ever-royall and mercifull inclination, that hartly sorrow, or repentance, in an offender, no sooner colde be discerned, but he was euen as readie to giue pardon and forgiuenes, and rather did superabound in grace, then seeke after blood; and therefore willed him to let all the people there perceiue, whether he would accept of this proffered grace, or no. Nay, more; because euery one was not acquainted with the oath contained in the statute, and (perchance) might conceite otherwise thereof, then in equity it deserued, the clarke was commaunded to read it there publicly, and himselfe to except against it whatsoever he could alledge. The clarke accordingly began, as followeth, reading it distinctly, as it is in the booke.

"I A. B. do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience, before God and the worlde, that our soueraigne lord king James is lawfull and rightfull king of this realme, and of all other his maiesties dominions and countries: And that the pope, neither of himselfe, nor by any authority of the church or see of Rome, or by any other meanes, with any other, hath any power or authority to depose the king, or to dispose of any of his maiesties kingdomes or dominions: or to authorize any forraigne prince to inuade, or any him, or his countries; or to discharge any of his subiectes of their allegiance and obedience to his maiesty: or to giue licence, or leaue, to any of them to beare armes, raise tumult, or to offer violence or hurte to his maiesties royall person, state, or government, or to any of his maiesties subiectes within his maiesties dominions.—Also I do sweare from my hart, that, notwithstanding any declaration, or sentence of excommunication, or deprivation, made or graunted, or to be made or graunted, by the pope or his successors, or by any authority deriued, or pretended to bee deriued, from him or his see, againste the said king, his heires or successors; or any absolution of the saide subiectes from their obedience. I will beare faith and true allegiance to his maiestie, his heires, and successors; and him and them will defende, to the vttermost of my power, against al conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, which shal be made against his or their persons, their crown and dignity, by reason or colour of anie such sentence or declaration, or otherwise; and will doe my best endeavour to disclose and make knowne vnto his maiesty, his heires and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies, which I shall know, or hear of, to be against him, or any of them.—And I doe further sweare, that I doe from my hart abhorre, detest, and abiure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, that prince, which be excommunicated or deprived by the pope, may be deposed or murdered by their subiects, or anie other whatsoever.—And I do believe, and in conscience am resoled, that neither the pope, nor any person whatsoever, hath power to absolue me of this oath, or any parte thereof, which I acknowledge by good and faithfull authority to be lawfully ministred to me, and do renounce all pardons and dispensations to the contrary. And al these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and sweare, according to these expresse wordes by me spoken, and according to the plaine and common sence, and understanding to the same wordes, without equivocation, or mental eusion, or secret reseruacion whatsoever. And I do make this recognition and acknowledgment heartily, willingly and truly, vpon the true faith of a Christian. So help me God.”

This Oath, which no good subiect will refuse to take, hauing bene very audibly read, well neare in the perfect hearing of euery one there present, he was required to alleadge or inferre against any part thereof what he colde. But he insisting vainely, as he had done before, that he had but giuen his opinion thereof for others, and refusing vtterly to take it himself, gaue eident and manifest testimony, that such priestes, as himselfe was, were not included in the ranke of honest or good Catholickes, but apparant traytors to the king and state, in saying one thing, and dooing the contrary; in making an outward shew of duty and obedience under hand-writing, and reseruing a trayterous intention in their close bosome; wherein the grosse deceiuing and abusing of too many ouer-credulous soules, being falsely perswaded of such men, otherwise then they are indeede, is very much to be pitied and lamented: for they do but judge by the exterior habit of smooth sanctitie and holines, and not by the close seducing of them and their soules. Religion is the cloake cast ouer intended treason, and holy protestations hide hollow-harted practises, more deuillish then (in plaine meaning) can easily be doubted, and far more dangerous, then weake capacities are able to discouer, as, very excellently and elegantly, was there plainly approued.

Another allegation also (as impertinent) did Drewrie make, in saying: That a French priest, or Spanish priest, comming into this land to exercise their function at either of their lord ambassadors, or otherwise, they might, in like manner, be tearmed traytors: whereas all the by-standers were euen ready to hisse him, knowing very well, and, as it was with good discretion, answered him, that such priestes neither were or colde be reckoned subiects to this state, nor were they enabled to deal in such dangerous mannet with our people, wanting our language, and credit, in such a case to countenance them, as (by their slye insinuating) they being borne subiects, and credited more than besemed, did too much preuaile by. And as freely might such ambassadours haue men of spiritual office about them, being of their owne countrey, as ours are allowed the like, within their maisters dominions. So that still he wolde haue maintained that priesthoode, and not the treacherous complotting and practises of priestes, in his understanding, was to bee held for treason. The same grace and fauour, which had been before extended to Drewrie, in as ample maisture was offered to Dauies, the other priest, and he was demaunded whether he would take the oath or no. Hee replied, that he was a poor simple ignorant man, and could hardly censure what thereto belonged. For there were many learned priestes, whose iudgements, in this case, he would first know, and then, perhaps, he might be otherwise altered. Wherein appeareth, that one only Romish rule and obseruation is a lesson or direction to them all, and the buls or breues of the pope are more regarded and respected by them, than the natie loyalty and obedience, they owe to their king and countrey. But mercy hath been ouer-mild too long, and won no such grace from, as iustly was expected, but rather hath armed them with more boldnesse and insolence, than either is fit in them to offer, or standes with the wisdom of so great a state to endure: For, ‘Nunquid colligunt de spinis uvas, aut de tribulis ficus?’ Doo men gather grapes of thorus, or figs of thistles?

When no further good, either by testimonie of their owne shame, or even father-like and most kinde perswasions, could be wrought vpon either of them: first a most graue, learned, and iudicious admonition was made unto them, containing briefely the many and extraordinarie great graces of the kings maiestie towarde menne of their condition, and howe, after granting them first his free and generall pardon, hee neuer left off, but pursued them still with all fauours that could be deuised, as not desiring the death of any one, but rather to live quietly, like a godly, peacefull, and religious king: not enacting any new or seuerer lawes against such dangerous persons, but ratifying and confirming them that he found at his comming, which queen Elizabeth, of euer happy anemory, compulsiuely was compelled and enforced to make against them. And yet the justice of those lawes, which had been of seauen and twenty years continuance before, his maiestie did forbear to execute; and finding manye, whose liues lay vnder the forfeit of the law, not onely did he remitte them in grace, but likewise gave his free pardon to all; sending so manie as were in durance away at his own cost and charge, and publishing the like offer to all other that wolde except of so kind a benefit: as loath to ineddle with their blood, that were enemies to his life, and desirous to win them by mercy, if they were not too monstrous. Nor hath he sentenced any priest with death since his comming to the crowne, but such as were men of most dangerous qualitie, and had their hands buer deep in most barbarous and inhumaine treasons. But when neither perswasions, sufferances, nor proclamations will serue, to keep such dangerous men out of the land, but euen, in spite of the king and his lawes, they will needs come over, and put in practice their treacherous deuyses: mercy, of necessity, must give way to iustice, and pittie preuaile no longer, when grace is dispised.

The many and excelent parts, contained in Maister Recorders learned and elegant speech, I am not able to set downe, and, therefore, do humbly craue fauour, for but glauncing at these few: which though they come farre short of their iust merite, yet let my good will excuse al imperfections. Being come to the very iumpe of giuing iudgement, Drewrie demanded, if, as yet, he might have fauour to speak, and, most honorably, it was answered that he might, for the king's mercy was neuer too late; therefore he was willed, not to trifle the time in friuolous speeches, but, if he wolde yet take the oath, do it and afterwards speak what further he wolde; which made all the standers by euen confounded with amazement, that grace should be so abundantly offered vnto such froward and wilfull refusers. Drewrie wolde not yeeld to take the oath, whereupon the sentence of death was pronounced against them both. To bee conueyed thence to the place from whence they came, and there to be laid vpon an hurddle, and so drawne to the place of execution, where they shoulde hang till they were half deade; then, to haue their secrets cut off, and with their in-trailles throwne into the fire before their faces, their heads to be seuered from their bodies, which seuerally should be deuided into four quarters, and afterward disposed at his maiesties pleasure, in mean while, the Lorde to take mercie vpon their soules: and so they were sent backe to prison againe.

A breefe Report of the Execution of Robert Drewrie, drawne on a hurddle in his Fryer-Benedictine habbet to Tyborne, on Thursday the twenty-fifth of Februarie.

On the next morning, being Thursday, an hurddle being brought to Newgate, Robert Drewrie, hoping yet for life, and not thinking to die, as by the sequell it plainly appeared, hauing put on, after the maner of the Benedictine Fryers beyond the seas, a newe suit of apparrell, being made of black stufte, new shooes, stockings, and garters, and a black new stufte priests gown, or cassock, being buttoned downe before by loops and buttons; two and two together, to the verye foote, a new cornered cap on his heade, and vnder it a fair wrought night-cap; was, in this manner, drawne along to Tyborne, where being by the executioner prepared for death, he was brought vp into the cart, and vsing such ydle speeches, as he had don often before, that he dyed not for treason, but for his priesthooode, hee was willed to deal more iustly, and not to abuse the world nowe at his death, in vttering that which was a manifest lie and untruth. He made answeere, that, in all his life-tiue, he had not told a lie, and then, after a short pause added, not willingly. There were certain papers shewn at Tyborne, which had bin found about him, of very dangerous and traitorous nature. And amonge them also was his Benedictine faculty vnder seale, expressing what power and authority he had from the pope, to make men, women, and children heere, of his order; what indulgences and pardons he colde graunt them, both in this life, and for multitude of yeares after their death, pre-eruing them both from purgatory, and warranting their entrance, by the popes keyes, into Heauen. He confessed himselfe to be a Romaine Catholick, and a priest, and desired all Romaine Catholickes to praye with him, and for him. And often looking about him, as hopinge there was some mercie for him, for fenre appeared very plainly in him, when he felt the cart go away under him, and his expectation to be deceiued, he caught fast holde with his left hande on the halter about hys head, and very hardly was inforced to let it goe, but held so for a pretty while. If this were not an apparant hope of life, I refer it to better judgements then mine own. He hung till he was quite dead, and afterward's his body was quartered.

83. The CASE of IMPOSITIONS, on an Information in the Exchequer by the Attorney-General against Mr. JOHN BATES, Merchant. Michaelmas, 4 JAMES I. A. D. 1606—1610.

[“ This famous Case involved in it a constitutional Question * of the first magnitude; Mr. Bates, the Defendant, having been prosecuted for refusing to pay a Duty on foreign currants imposed by a mere act of the crown. The attempt to enforce a submission to this duty by legal process, was certainly a principal and early part of that rash and unwarrantable scheme to establish in the crown a right of taxing the subject, which disturbed the reigns of the two first princes of the Stuart line. James the first claimed the right of imposing duties on imported and exported merchandize by prerogative. His son and immediate successor, the unfortunate Charles, not only persisted in the claim, but added to it the equally formidable pretension of ship-money. Realized, these claims, with loans, benevolences, monopolies, and the other subsidiary branches of the same extravagant design, would have comprized nearly a compleat system of extraparlimentary taxation; for imposition at the ports was calculated to serve the purpose externally, ship-money to operate internally. Had they been acquiesced in, parliaments would soon have become unnecessary assemblies; the mildness of a limited monarchy would gradually have degenerated into the harshness of an absolute one; a legal government would have been corrupted into a tyranny. To the great disgrace of the profession of the law, some who in other respects were its brightest ornaments, gave their aid to these attempts against the rights of parliament. We make the acknowledgment with concern; but it is a truth, which neither can nor ought to be concealed. The great luminary of science, lord Bacon, exercised his eloquence to reconcile parliament to impositions by prerogative. Sir John Davis, so justly admired for his writings about Ireland, composed a treatise to prove the right of the crown. Both displayed the greatness of their talents on the occasion, though they managed the argument in different ways; the former speciously professing to claim the prerogative in question from and to limit it by law; the latter boldly adventuring to exalt the same prerogative above law, and describing it to be like another Sampson, too strong to be bound. 2. Bac. 4to ed. 1778. p. 223. Dav. on Imposit. 131. Even the judges deigned to be instruments for subjugating their country to an illegal taxation. Though it was incontrovertible, that, by the fundamental policy of our constitution, the legislature consisted of king, lords, and commons in parliament assembled; though the judges had before them the strong testimony of lord chancellor Fortescue in his famous book ‘De Laudibus Legum Angliæ,’ that even in the reigns of Henry the sixth and Edward the fourth the English monarchy stood distinguished as limited from the French monarchy as absolute, notwithstanding their original resemblance to each other; though this noble-minded lord chancellor had instructed the heir apparent to the crown, that one of the most essential differences between the two monarchies arose from the prevalence of the king’s despotism of taxation in France, and from parliament’s having that power in England; though they could not but know, that from the moment the king should succeed in attracting from parliament the commanding power of taxation, parliament must have perished; though the statute-book was full of legislative declarations against taxes without consent in parliament, though not so much as one recognition of the claim could be found in the records of justice, the court of exchequer in Bates’s case unanimously gave judgment for impositions by prerogative on imports and exports; and in Mr. Hampden’s Case, though some very recent admonitions and warnings of duty had intervened, all the judges of Westminster-hall, two only excepted, joined to give the sanction of a judicial opinion to ship-money. Nor were monopolies, loans, and benevolences, wholly uncountenanced by the courts of justice. But, during this crisis, the houses of parliament did not forget their duty. They pursued the several devices for illegal taxation, till all were hunted down, and had yielded to the tide of law and constitution. In 1610, the house of commons, alarmed by the judgment in Bates’s case, formally debated * the right of the crown to impose on merchandize at the ports; and at length by a petition to the king complained of such impositions as a grievance, which in the subsequent parliaments was followed with frequent remonstrances of the like kind. In 1623, monopolies were curbed and regulated by statute. In 1627, † gifts, loans, and benevolences, were pointedly declared contrary to law by the Petition of Right, with general words to comprehend all sorts of taxes and charges out of parliament. In 1610, ‡ the legislature crushed ship-money almost in its birth, by declaring the judgment for it contrary to law and vacating the record. In the same year the final blow was given to taxation by prerogative; an act for tonnage and poundage being passed, with a declaration against the king's claim to impose such duties. Thus the victory over all the several inventions to tax the subject by prerogative became complete; before the civil wars broke out, before the contest with the crown degenerated from resistance of its usurped powers into an invasion of its just claims. Fortunately too, when the country emerged from the anarchy and misery of the scene which followed, the extravagance of joy did not extinguish a due remembrance of the constitution. One of the first acts, after the restoration, was a grant of tonnage and poundage, with words which renewed a part of the former declarations against taxing by prerogative; for it anxiously recited, that 'no rates can be imposed on merchandise imported or exported by subjects or aliens, but by common consent in parliament.' 12 Cha. 2. c. 4. §. 6.—It was once our intention to have traced more fully the history of the long contest about taxes out of parliament, from the accession of the house of Stuart, till it was finally decided against the crown in 1611; our plan being to have minutely and distinctly stated the proceedings on each species of device to elude the constitution, and to have given a general view of the arguments by which each was sustained or repelled. But though we had already made many researches, and collected several materials on the subject, it was found impossible to do justice to it, without more time, than was consistent with present convenience to allow. We therefore reserve the detail of the subject for some future occasion. As to the attempts at extra-parliamentary taxation in the previous period, they are fully investigated in some of the pieces which we now present to the reader.

"So far as respected the general point of taxing by prerogative, it seems to have been the strongest of all cases against the crown. There were such apparent bars to the claim of prerogative in this respect, that it seems surprizing, how lawyers of eminence could submit to the drudgery of being advocates in such a cause. If king James had found himself strong enough by military force to change the form of our government, and to substitute for it a despotic sovereignty in the crown, however monstrous such an abuse of his public trust would have been, its meaning could not have been doubted; for it would have amounted to saying, "I confess the present constitution is otherwise, but I chuse to make a new one; 'sic voleo, sic ju-beo, stet pro ratione voluntas.' However unjustifiable it may be, I will have it so." But whatsoever the inclinations of James the first and his son the unfortunate Charles might be, either they were not in a condition to risk being thus explicit, or had not the courage to try their force; and this being so, the difficulty of accomplishing their design against the constitution became great indeed; for the great lines of argument both on the principle and fact of the constitution were in the teeth of prerogative taxation; whether the attempt had been made in the large and short way, by at once insisting, that the power was inherent in the crown and exerciseable without the two houses of parliament; or, as the experiment was tried, in the detail, by taking advantages of all the irregular practices of former times, and by straining certain allowed rights and prerogatives into abuse, and so giving to them the colour and pretext of a right of a far higher class. It could not be denied, that the legislative power was by our constitution in the king, lords, and commons. To argue then the next moment, that, notwithstanding this, there was latent in the crown a power of taxing, was an inconsistency in principle; for it was saying in the same breath, that the king was and was not the legislature; taxing the subject being undeniably one of the highest exercises of legislative authority. Nor was the argument on the matter of fact much better for the crown. As far back as the reigns of Edward the first and Edward the third, that is, almost as far back as the records of parliament, those most authentic sources of our constitutional history; can be traced, the king has joined with the two houses of parliament in most explicitly declaring, that to tax in any other manner than in parliament is contrary to the law of the land, and that all other forms of taxation are strains of regal power incapable of being justified. It also happened, that exclusively of such general legislative declarations against taxing out of parliament, there was scarce any particular mode of illegal and irregular taxation, but what at one time or another had been specifically condemned. It was no wonder therefore, that lord Coke, when he framed the Petition of Right in the reign of our first Charles, laid his foundation against the prerogative of taxing, as well as against the other excesses of that ill-advised prince, on the code of our ancient statute law; for it is observable, that, throughout that famous declaratory law, every proposition is derived from that highest of all sources for constitutional knowledge. Here one might easily imagine lord Coke, then nearly of the age of eighty years, to address himself exultingly to the speaker of the commons to this effect. "I propose to the house, not a theory of the best kind of government; not a change of our constitution in the way of improvement: but the solemn declaration of an actual and subsisting constitution; one honorably derived to us from our hardy ancestors, one capable of being proved by testimony from the earliest records of parliament; one, which has subsisted for centuries, and survived both the calamity of various and long civil wars, and the tyranny of successive ill administrations of our government, even the sanguinary reigns of the two first princes of the Tudor line; nay, one, which even they found it convenient to add new sanctions to, by resorting to its forms to give currency to their despotism and cruelty. Thus strongly fenced with the highest possible testimonies for a mixed and limited monarchy, I wave all inferior proofs. I might perhaps evince from our antient story, that in all periods of time there was a freedom in our constitution; that it was free to our British, to our Danish, to our Saxon, nay to our Norman ancestors; and that it was beyond the power of traditionary fable to name the period, when our monarchs were unshackled by parliaments. I might perhaps trace the antiquity of our present legislative constitution, as composed of king, lords and commons, or at least the substance of it, as far back as the time when the Roman government ceased amongst us. But I will not travel unnecessarily into such remote periods: I will not unnecessarily waste the precious time of this house, or even my own time, in such traditionary and dubious investigations. I will leave all these topicks to the curious antiquarian as his proper employment; or reserve them for the pastime of private curiosity. Confident in the strength of parliamentary records, I will appeal to them only. If they are not decisive in my favour, or as I should rather say in favour of the constitution and against monarchical despotism, I yield the victory to the devotees of the crown: I agree, that the king shall singly exercise that highest power of legislation, the power of taxing: I agree, that from henceforth the king of England shall be a tyrant: and that the reality of parliament shall expire here; as it has expired in almost every other country in Europe. I will not even ask for aid from the testimony of that honest and generous lawyer, that high example of judicial chastity, that undefiled servant of a court royal, the great lord chancellor Fortescue. Even his admired printed book 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ,' and the still more valuable remains of him in the manuscript treatise on the difference between absolute and limited monarchy, shall be suppressed. I ask only to put into my scale of a free constitution, and of a limited monarchy, the statute rolls and other records of parliament. Saving these only, I consent to put into the scale of regal prerogative, all the fables of British antiquity, all the traditions of our Gothic ancestors, all the imperfect histories of monkish annalists, all the vague arguments from the vague titles of Saxon and Anglo-Norman laws, all the deceptive verbal criticism from words no longer clearly understood, all the volumes of precedents of irregular and condemned practices; nay even the vain arguments from the uncertain origin of the representative part of our English parliaments, with the boasted argument from the arbitrary administration of the executive magistrates whilst our throne was filled with the proud Tudor line. Allow to me the benefit of the Magna Charta of our third Henry as confirmed by our first Edward, with the long series of subsequent statutes and parliamentary records; especially the 34th of our first Edward against talliages and aids without consent of parliament, the 25th of Edward the third against forced loans, and the statutes of the last mentioned king with those of the second and third Richards against benevolences and such like charges. Those on the other side shall have the full and sole benefit of all other records and testimonies whatever; with the additional weight of the king and his whole court; without excepting his accomplished but too pliant judges, or those indefatigable hunters of precedents for violations of constitutional government, the great law officers of the crown. Should the ponderous weight of royal charters and parliamentary records fail me against such an aggregate of influences in the opposite scale, I will agree, that the constitution of parliament must perish; and that our kings inust in future be absolute and despotic sovereigns.— Though too my scale, in consequence of the wisdom, integrity, justice, and firmness of this present house of commons, should at present preponderate; yet from the increasing degeneracy of those out of this honourable house, I prophesy, that the high talents with the low ambition of future lawyers will soon again counteract our present solemn proceedings against the excesses of royal prerogative; and that future judges will soon arise to countenance those excesses by new corruptions of judicial authority. But should the conflict be once more revived, I trust, that the freedom of our constitution will again triumph: and should that contest ever again come, and another victory be gained over the pretended prerogatives of the crown, which events from the course of nature can scarce happen in my time, be it recorded in the journals of this parliament, for the instruction of our latest posterity, that such a time, whenever it shall come, will not be the era of a free government newly established in resistance of the abuses of royal power; but will be the era of mere salvation of a frame of government so antient, that authentic memorials are wanting to trace its origin with any thing like accuracy."—In the speech thus imagined for lord Coke, when he presented the Petition of Rights to the house of commons in the year 1627, there is a succession of thoughts, which are the result of all the now editor's study of the antient contests between the crown and the subject, on the claims of prerogative to a right of taxation and other powers of a legislative kind. The same ideas in substance have often occurred to his mind, and he has long wished to disburthen it by an avowal of them; though till the present moment he has not so much as once made the attempt. True it is, that these thoughts are very general, are mere outlines for argument. To try their force, an investigation of innumerable authorities is requisite. But loose and general as the reasoning is, it may perhaps serve as a preliminary memento for those, who are curious and able to pursue the subject in its fullest compass.

“ With respect to the particular claim of a prerogative to tax at the ports, it was more than liable to the general objections of being a prerogative taxation; because there was the addition of peculiar arguments against yielding to such a precedent. It was this very species of regal impositions, which gave occasion to some of the antient statutes declaratory of the illegality of taxing without the consent of parliament; as will appear by reading the incomparable speeches against impositions at the ports, by those profound constitutional lawyers Yelverton and Hakewill. It was also an apparent bar to such a claim, that it had not only been condemned in the reign of the first and third Edwards; but that from the time of the latter king, there had been a continual habit of granting duties of tonnage and poundage at the ports on the commencement of every reign, either for the life of the new monarch, or for a term of years. Nor is it to be forgotten, that prerogative impositions at the ports appear to have been dormant, from the reign of Edward the third, till after the accession of queen Mary, the elder daughter of our eighth Henry. That princess indeed did cause a resurrection of such impositions, after their having been asleep for near three centuries, by ordering some duties on cloth to be levied beyond what was warranted by the parliamentary grant of tonnage and poundage to her. But the then merchants of London were equally awakened by the measure; and they loudly complained, in the first year of Elizabeth, to that great queen, to be relieved on the ground, that such impost by mere power of the crown was illegal. Their opposition is thus stated in lord Dyer's Reports: and it was aided by an argument against prerogative duties at the ports; for Mr. Hakewill tells us, that Mr. Plowden, one of the most consummate lawyers we have had at any time, composed such an argument against the duties thus irregularly imposed by Mary. From the same authority also, and from the account of the case in lord Dyer's Reports, fol. 165, it is clear, that notwithstanding a conference of the judges on the occasion, no sanction, either judicial or extrajudicial, was ever obtained, in the reign of Elizabeth, for this excess of prerogative; or at least that it was never thought fit to produce any opinion of the judges, or to assert that any such was ever given by them in that reign.

“ Upon this transient view of the attempts to establish a prerogative power of taxation, how can it be wondered at, that the rash attempts of James the first and his son the unfortunate Charles, which latter really was possessed of many pleasing and valuable accomplishments, should terminate in the disgrace of the former, and the personal destruction of the latter? The father had to answer for attempting to systemize prerogative taxation. The son, misled by the father's ill example, and having had instilled into his mind the most extravagant notions of the unbounded extent of regal power, not only adopted his father's illegal plan; but persisted in it, even after giving the royal assent to laws expressly condemning both generally and particularly all taxes of the subject except by act of parliament; and so at length the more deserving son fell himself a victim to the adoption of a system, which the far less deserving father had begun to execute, with no other mischief than one which his mind probably did not sufficiently feel, namely, the disgrace of being odious to and distrusted by his subjects. To the conduct of their predecessor, queen Mary, it was an objection, that she had revived an ill precedent of prerogative taxation after a dormancy of centuries. But on the part of James and Charles, there seems to have been the aggravation of variously extending the bad precedent thus received from Mary; with the still higher aggravation of influencing the judges into a public avowal of judicial opinions, which justified even the principle of taxing without parliament. It may not be useless to add to this long note, that the present editor is in possession of a volume, formerly belonging to sir Christopher Yelverton, father to sir Henry Yelverton; which contains, among other valuable law manuscripts, not only a full report of the arguments of the judges and counsel in the Case of Impositions, but also the copy of a most elaborate argument in that case by lord chief baron Fleming, from original notes written in his book, and in his own hand.* Decided as the present editor is on this sort of subject, he wishes not to conceal an iota of the learning on the contrary side of the question. So far from it is he, that should the present Collection of Tracts be continued, which however is not very probable, it is his design to publish the very argument thus mentioned. Nor is he afraid to apprise his readers in the mean time, that, notwithstanding its great blemishes, it is so able a performance, as in many respects to deserve a very serious attention, even from those the most hostile to the unconstitutional system of taxing without a parliamentary grant. Here our readers, who are curious on subjects of the constitution, may consult what he has remarked about benevolences in a note to Mr. Oliver St. John's Case, (A. D. 1615, infra).—The editor cannot conclude this note without apprizing his readers, that he is possessed of an imperfect manuscript tract, intitled, "Reflections by the Lord Chief Justice Hale on Mr. Hobbs's Dialogue of the Law:" and that this performance, though an unfinished one, contains both a very pointed refutation and a very severe reprehension of Mr. Hobbs for his arbitrary notions concerning the extent of the kings prerogatives. In general lord Hale is the most dispassionate of all writers upon our law and constitution. But he saw the pernicious tendency of Mr. Hobbs's doctrine in so strong a point of view, that in this instance lord Hale appears to have been scarce able to restrain his indignation. The following extract from the manuscript, being on Taxation, will evince this; and at the same time shew, how pure this exemplary judge's opinions were on that high subject.

It is a thing most certain and unquestionable, by the law of England, no common aid or tax can be imposed upon the subjects, without consent in parliament; and no dispensation or non obstante can avail to make it good or effectual; no not for the maintaining of a military force, though in case of necessity. And that man, that will teach, that in all these cases a tacit condition is implied, to let loose laws of this importance, and to subject the estates and properties of the subjects to arbitrary impositions, notwithstanding the solemnest engagements to the contrary.—
 1. Takes upon him to be wiser than the king himself, who hath not only granted, but judged the contrary.—
 2. Takes upon him to be wiser than all the estates of the kingdom, as neither just or prudent advisers for the good and safety of the kingdom.—
 3. Goes about to break down the security of all men's properties and estates.—
 4. Doth mischievously insinuate jealousies in the minds of men, as if all the laws of the kingdom might be abrogated, when the king pleaseth; and thereby does the king and his government more mischief than he can ever recompence.*

* The only state of this important Case, and of the arguments in it, is in Lane's Reports, and in a short note added to Dyer's Reports by the learned editor of the improved edition.* See Lane's Rep. p. 22. and Dy. ed. 1688, fo. 165-b. in the margin. The report in Lane, being the fullest, shall be laid before the reader; to which we shall subjoin a Speech made in parliament by lord Bacon in 1610, when the Judgment of the Exchequer in the Case in question was formally discussed by the House of Commons. We shall next add a transcript from an original Manuscript, described by Mr. Carte to be in the handwriting of the famous sir John Davis; being in substance like the latter part of the printed Treatise on Impositions with his name, but differing much in the language, and more likely to be correct. These pieces together comprize the principal Arguments for the prerogative of Impositions claimed by the crown. But, without something more, it would be a very partial view of the subject. In justice, therefore, as well to that excellent constitution, to the injury of which the claim of Impositions by prerogative operated, as to those who so honourably for themselves and so happily for their country resisted the invasion, we shall add two most learned and able Arguments on the opposite side of the question; one delivered by Mr. Hakewill in the same Parliament with lord Bacon's Argument; the other also contemporary, and said to have been composed by sir Henry Yelverton, afterwards the judge of that name. Both of these valuable remnants of the Debates in Parliament on Impositions by the crown are very rare; having been printed separately, and not being to be found in any published collections of the time. What is very remarkable, they are not only unnoticed by Mr. Hume, Mr. Carte, and the authors of the Parliamentary History; but have even escaped the observation of our deservedly celebrated female historian. That the two former writers should not be studious to draw the attention of their readers to two arguments, so fit to counteract the reception of their particular prejudices, is easy to be accounted for; especially in the instance of Mr. Carte, whose bias in favour of the prerogative is more avowed and apparent than Mr. Hume's. But Mrs. Macaulay's silence cannot be explained in the same way; and therefore we attribute it to the accident of her not having met with either of the arguments. Perhaps our observation on Mr. Hume and Mr. Carte may sound as harsh to some persons. But we can assure such, that it is not intended to write disrespectfully of either of those authors. We feel strongly the merit of Mr. Carte, as a most elaborate historian; as one, to whose familiar knowledge and skilful use of records, with the other most authentick materials of the history of his country, all, who follow him in the same line, are infinitely obliged. For strength, clearness, and elegance of stile, for profoundness in remark, for beautiful arrangement and close compression of matter, we consider Mr. Hume's work as a model of historical composition. Such being the characters of these eminent writers, it becomes the more necessary to know, on which side their prejudices operate. Otherwise the authority of their works might have an improper influence in settling the opinions of their readers on the controverted points of our government and constitution, and so lead to the dissemination of dangerous and pernicious errors. The truth seems to be, that a general History of England, composed with that rigid impartiality so essential to a perfectly just idea of our constitution, is still wanting. Hitherto the best of our writers, who have engaged in that arduous task, have been betrayed into extremes. One is swayed by predilection for the Stuart family; whilst another loses his temper from aversion to them. Some write from favor to absolute monarchy; others are votaries to the passion of republicanism. Too many have been seduced by zeal for a particular party in the state; and so, according to the occasion, have practised the arts of apology, or adopted the severe and vehement language of satire. But the author, who wishes to fix the true point of our antient constitution in the scale of government must banish from his mind all such corruptives of judgment.

“ Besides the arguments by Hakewill and Yelverton, against impositions on merchandize by prerogative, there are some very forcible reasons with the same view by lord Coke in his second Institute, where he comments on the 30th chapter of Magna Charta. See 2 Inst. page 57 to 63. Some observations also occur on the subject in the 12th part of lord Coke's Reports. But, in this latter book, he writes with more favor to the judgment for impositions in Bates's case; for, though he disclaims all idea of the crown's having a right to impose duties at the ports, in form of a tax and for a revenue, yet he contends, that, for the benefit of the subject, and in the way of advancement and regulation of trade, the crown may charge. This distinction seems to be of dangerous tendency, and not quite reconcilable with the same great lawyer's sentiments in his 2d Institute, where he condemns the judgment in Bates's case without any reserve. However it should be considered, that lord Coke's 12th Report contains only his first thoughts, before the question had undergone a parliamentary investigation; and further, that the 12th Report is of small authority, being not merely posthumous, but apparently nothing more than a collection from papers neither digested nor intended for the press by the writer. 12 Co. Extract from Lane's Reports, page 22.

AN information was exhibited against Bates, a merchant of the Levant; and it was recited, that the king by his letters patents under the great seal had commanded his treasurer, that he command the customers and receivers, that they should ask and receive of every merchant denizen, who brings within any port within his dominions, any currants, 5s. a hundred for impost, above 2s. 6d., which was the poundage by the statute of every hundred; and it was alledged, that Bates had notice thereof, and that he had brought in currants into the port of London, and refused to pay the said 5s. in contempt of the king. Whereunto Bates came, and said, that he is an English merchant, and adventurer and a denizen, and that he made a voyage to Venice, and there bought currants, and imported them into England; and he recited the statute of the first of king James cap. 33. which grants 2s. 6d. for poundage, and he said, that he had paid that, and therefore he had refused to pay the 5s. because it was imposed unjustly, and unduly against the lawes of the land; whereupon the king's attorney demurred in law.

This matter hath been divers times argued at the bar, and at the bench, by Snig and Savil, barons, and now by Clark and Flemming, chief baron, whose arguments only I heard.

And Clark, who argued first this day, said, That this case being of so great consequence, great respect and consideration is to be had, and it seemeth to me strange, that any subjects would contend with the king, in this high point of prerogative; but such is the king's grace, that he had shewed his intent to be, that this matter shall be disputed and adjudged by us according to the ancient law and custome of the realm; and because that the judgment of this matter cannot be well directed by any learning delivered in our books of law, the best directions herein are precedents of antiquitie, and the course of this court, wherein all actions of this nature are to be judged, and the acts of parliament recited in arguments of this case prove nothing to this purpose. The best case in law is the Case of Mines in Mr. Plowden Com. where this ground is put, that the precedents of every court ought to be a direction to that court, to judge of matters which are aptly determinable therein, as in the Kings Bench for matters of the crown, in the Common Pleas for matters of inheritance and civil contracts, and in the Exchequer for matters of the king's prerogative, his revenue and government. And

* The case of the king's prerogative in Salt Petre, 4 Jac. 12. Co. Rep. 19, may also be looked into, though not strictly in point.

† This note is not printed as it stood in the last edition of the State Trials; but the additional matter in the learned annotator's preface to his 1st vol. of "A Collection of Tracts, &c." has been here interwoven.

as it is not a kingdome without subjects and government, so he is not a king without revenues, for without them he cannot preserve his dominions in peace, he cannot maintain war, nor reward his servants, according to the state and honour of a king; and the revenue of the crown is the very essential part of the crown, and he who rendeth that from the king pulleth also his crown from his head, for it cannot be separated from the crown. And such great prerogatives of the crown, without which it cannot be, ought not to be disputed; and in these cases of prerogative the judgment shall not be according to the rules of the common law, but according to the precedents of this court, wherein these matters are disputable and determinable. As for example, an action of accompt lies not by the common law against him, who had the land of the accomptant by mean conveyance. But if one be an accomptant to the king, and had land in fee, and alien it unto A. who alien it unto B., B. by reason of this land, shall be charged with this accompt. In 14 E. 3, a coroner was elected by the king's writ as he ought to be, by the countie, and after he was amerced, and because he was not sufficient to ansver the amercement the countie was charged therewith, and that appears of record here. And in 30 E. 3. Rot. 6. as appears also of record, in this court, one William Porter was magister monetæ, and had received bullion of divers merchants, and coyned it in the kings mint, and did not restore the coyne to the merchants, but was insufficient, and the king paid the merchants, and inquired of the sureties for the coyne, and it was found that he had none; then it was inquired who recommended him unto the king, and it was found by whom he was recommended; and they, who only recommended him as friends, were charged with the debt. And if one be outlawed in a personal action, and debt is due to him upon a contract, this shall be forfeited to the king, and this is ordinary by the precedents of this court; and yet this seems to be contrary to law, and is against our books. And the king's debtor shall have a quo minus against executors upon a simple contract, and therein he cannot release, nor be non-suited. And I put these cases to prove, that the precedents of this court ought to be pursued and observed, although they seem to cross the common law, and the books thereof. A case was here betwixt the king and Jourden. Jourden was receiver, and sold his office to one D. and he not being able to pay Jourden for his office at the day limited, it was agreed, that Jourden should come to the next receipt, and when D. received the king's money, that Jourden should take it for his office, which was done accordingly. After D. was indebted to the king, and this matter appearing as above, &c. Jourden was charged with the money which he had received. And as Stamford in his first cap. of prerogative saith, that the king is the most worthy part of a commonwealth, so is he the preserver, nourisher, and defender of the people; and true it is, that the

weal of the king is the public weal of the people, and he for his pleasure may aforrest the wood of any subject, and he thereby shall be subject to the law of the forrest; and he may take the provision of any man by his purveyor for his own use, but at reasonable prices, and without abuse, the abuse of which officer hath been restrained by divers statutes; and the king may take wines for his provision, and also timber for his ships, castles, or houses in the wood of any man, and this is for public benefit; and the king may allay or inhaunce coyne at his pleasure, for the plentie of the king is the peoples peace. And these imposts are not only for the benefit of the people, and for the king's profit, but are also imposed many times for the increase of merchandise and commerce, as the statute of Aulnageors made in the 2 E. 3. cap. 14. which was made principally to make cloathes more vendible. And so corporations granted by the king with immunities and privileges, and to seclude other subjects from them, are well limited and good: for it is for the increase of the peoples wealth, and thereby the kings revenue is increased. And sometimes there is contained in grants a prohibition to other subjects, that they usurp not upon the priviledges of such corporations upon a pain, as in the custome of forraign bought and forraign sold in London, and York; and divers customes are permitted to such corporations, as in the chamberlain of Londons case, Cook 5. and the breach or violation of these customes is a decay of the corporations, and so an impairing of the revenues of the crown; and therefore the king may make them, and also give them priviledges, and make inhibitions to others, not to usurp upon them. King Edward the third in the sixteenth year of his reign proclaimed, that no man should sell wool-fels, or leather, under such a price, so that these staple commodities might not be debased, and this at no place but at Northampton and Anwick; and this proclamation was the cause, wherefore the merchant in 43 assise 38. was punished for using deceit to abate the prices. And for precedents in this matter of impost, there are many of antiquitie. And first for wines. In 16 E. 1. the custom for a tun of wine was 4s. and in 21 and 24 E. 3 it was increased to ———, and 12, 13, & 14, of H. 8. it was increased to 17s. the tun. And after in the 4th of Mary it was increased to 4 marks; and as it appears by the records of this court, it was answered upon accompt for all this time according to that rate. And it is apparent, that no act of parliament gave this to the king, but that it was imposed by his absolute power; and shall it now be doubted if it be lawful? God defend. Praisage, that the king shall have one hogshhead before the mast, and another hogshhead behinde, is not given to the king by any statute, but was only an impost by the kings power. The impost upon cloathes in 31 E. 1. was two shillings for a scarlet, and 18d. for other cloathes in grain, and after in the 37th year of E. 3. it was raised again, and in the 37 E. 3. an act was made for the length of cloathes; in the 33 H. 8. it was raised again; and in the time of queen Mary, because that the making of so many cloathes made the impost of wool to be of so small value, therefore the impost of every cloath was raised by her to a noble: and in the first of Eliz. an impost was imposed, for the overlength of cloathes; and it appears in 30 E. 3. that the impost of the cloath was for a stranger 2s. 8d. and for a denizen 1s. and all for cloathes. Another impost was for woolfels, and leather. The 31 E. 1. it was for wool half a mark for a sack, and after that to 10s. and in the time of E. 3. to 20s. and after to 40s. and after to 3l. and so of woolfels and leather; and as the benefit and price of commodities did rise, so was the impost raised, and no act of parliament for the first imposing, and increase thereof. And so much for woolfels and leather. Now for allom. Upon every kintal of allom was imposed 3s. 4d. which was answered upon account; and in the case of Smith, it was not doubted, if it shall be paid, as here it is, but if it were contained in Smiths patent or not. The imposition imposed upon colcs. Now the 1s. increase is paid. The imposition upon tobacco was never doubted to be unjust as this is. And so much for precedents. And now for statutes. The statute of Magna Charta, cap. 30. which was objected, that thereby all merchants may have safe, &c. to buy and sell, without ill tolneys; but there is a saving, viz. by the ancient and old customs. The statute of Articuli super chartas, cap. 2. hath a saving in the end of it, that the king or his council did not intend thereby to increase the antient prices due and accustomed. So are all the other statutes of purveyors. The statute of the 45 E. 3. cap. 4. which hath been so much urged, that no new imposition shall be imposed upon woolfels, wool, or leather, but only the custome and subsidie granted to the king; this extends only to the king himself, and shall not binde his successors; for it is a principal part of the crown of England, which the king cannot diminish. And the same king 24th of his reign granted divers exemptions to certain persons; and because that it was in derogation of his state imperial, he himself recalled and annulled the same. As to that which was objected, that the defendant had paid poundage granted by the statute of the first of the king, that is nothing to this purpose; for that is a subsidie, and not a custome; for when any imposition is granted by parliament, it is only a subsidie, and not a custome, for the nature thereof is changed, and the impost of wine is paid over and above the poundage, and so should it be here. And whereas it was objected, that if it were in the time of war, it is sufferable, but in peace not, this seems no reason; for the king cannot be furnished to make defence in war, if he provide not in peace, and the provision is too late made, when it ought to be used. And as to that which was said, that the subject ought to have recompence, and valuable satisfaction, it seemeth to me that he hath; for he hath the kings protection within his ports, and his safe conduct upon the land, and his defence upon the sea. And all the ports of the realm belong to the king, and in this court there is a precedent where one in the time of queen Eliz. claimed to have a port to himself, as his own, and it was adjudged that he could not, for it belonged to the queen, and it could not be severed; and the king only shall have the customes, for landing throughout all the land. And in the 17th of E. 3. there is a notable precedent, where he reciteth all the benefits which the subject had in his forraign traffick, by the kings power and protection, and therefore he imposed a new impost. The writ of ne exeat regnum comprehends a prohibition to him to whom it is directed, that he shall not go beyond the seas; and this may be directed at the king's pleasure to any man who is his subject; and so consequently may he prohibite all merchants; and as he may prohibite the persons, so may he the goods of any man, viz. that he shall export or import at his pleasure. And if the king may generally inhibite that such goods shall not be imported, then by the same reason may he prohibite them, upon condition or sub modo, viz. that if they import such goods, that then they shall pay, &c. And if the general be lawful, the particular cannot be unjust; and the words in the writ of ne exeat regnum, viz. 'et quam plurima nobis, et coronæ nostræ prejudicialia' 'ibidem prosequi intendis' are not traversable by the subject, but he ought dutifully to obey his sovereign. As to that which is said, that this command to the treasurer is not sufficient under the great seal, that is otherwise; for before the statute of R. 2. for matter of customes no command was directed to the treasurer, but always the king signified his pleasure to his customers under his privy seal, and this gave authoritie to them to collect customes, and the same authority is given now to the treasurer, and derived from him to the customers. As to that which is said, that the conclusion is evil, because it is in contempt of the king; without doubt it is a contempt, for the king may inhibit traffic into any part of the world, if he will, or inflict a pain upon any who shall trade into such place inhibited. So may he do upon any commodity, either inhibit it generally, or upon a pain or impost; and if a subject use the trade after such inhibition, or import his wares, and pay not the impost, it is a contempt, and the king shall punish him for it at his pleasure. And as to that which is said, that it is a burthen to the merchant, that is not so; for the burthen layeth it only upon the better part of the subjects; and if it were a burthen, it is no more than they themselves imposed, which was in their hands by commission in the time of queen Eliz. and they have raised the prices to subjects more than the value of the impost; and it is not to be intended, that the king by any impost will prejudice the cause of merchants, for the trade in general is to him more beneficial, than any particular impost. The case of the 11 and 14 H. 4. of Aulnegeor is not to be compared to this case; for there the king had made a grant to a subject, and it was also of a thing which was granted before to a maior, and also of a commodity within the land, and not transported. And for the case of Darcy, for the monopoly of cards, it is not like; for that is of a commodity within the land, and betwixt the patentee and the king, and not betwixt the king and the subject. And as to the exception taken to the information, that it is us lat. and doth not prescribe, this needeth not; for it is a prerogative wherein lieth no prescription, for every prerogative is as antient as the crown. And as to the conclusion of the information it was objected, that it is not good, for the informer ought to pray the forfeiture; but this belongs to the court to judge of what shall be lost or forfeited, the offence being a contempt, and therefore the conclusion good enough. And so for all these reasons judgement shall be given for the king.

Fleming, chief baron. Touching the exceptions to the information, they are of no force. For the first us lat. &c. it hath been well said, that the king needs not prescribe in any prerogative, for it is as antient as his crown is, 2 E. 3. and for the conclusion, viz. that he in contempt, &c. that deserves no other answer, but that which hath been given before, for it is enough, without doubt warranted by infinite precedents. But for the bar, it is an increase of the defendant's contempt, and no sufficient matter to answer, an indigested and confused tale, with an improper and disobedient conclusion, and there is in it multa non multum; but the conclusion is without precedent, or example, for he saith, that the imposition, which the king had laid, is 'indebitè, injustè, et contra leges Angliæ imposita,' and therefore he refused, &c. In the Case of Smith for Allom, the conclusion was moderate, and besecming a subject, judgement if he shall have impost by his grant; and in the Case of Mines, the defendant, being a great peer of the realm, concluded upon his grant and interest in the soyl, and that he took the metal, as it was lawful for him, and did not confront his sovereign with terms of injustè indebitè, and the like. And the king, as it is commonly said in our books, cannot do wrong; and if the king seise my land without cause, I ought to sue to him in humble manner, humillimè supplicavit, &c. and not with such terms of opposition in the information; and all his matter had been saved to him then as well as now, or he might have pleaded his matter, and said wherefore he refused, as it was lawful for him. But for the matter, it is of great consequence, and hath two powerful objects, which it principally respecteth. The one is the king, his power, and prerogative, his treasure, and the revenues of his crown; and to impair and derogate from any of these was a part most undutiful in any subject. The other is the trade and traffick of merchantise, transportation in and out of the land of commodities, which further publick benefit ought much to be respected, and nourished as much as may be. The state of the question is touching a new custom. The impositions or customs are duties or sums of money newly imposed by the king without parliament upon merchandise, for the augmentation of his revenues. All the questions arising in the case are, 'aut de personis, de rebus, vel de actionibus' viz. form and proceeding. The persons are, first the king, his power, and authoritie; secondly, not Butes the defendant, nor the Venetians, but all men who import currants. The imposition is properly upon currants, and for them, and is not upon the defendant, nor his goods, who is a merchant; for upon him no imposition shall be, but by parliament. The things are currants, a forraign commodity, and a victual; the 5s. for impost, which is said to be great. The action formed or process is the command by the great seal, and the words therein are petere et recipere, if they be sufficient, and if good without proclamation or other notice, and how notice shall be given, and if it be good without an ad quod damnum. And the Case of Mines in Plowden, which is the sole case in the printed books of law, to this purpose, hath inloure reasons of the judgement. First, the excellency of the king, or his person. Secondly, the necessitie of coyn for his state. Thirdly, the utilitie of coyn for commerce. Fourthly, the inconvenience, if the subject should have such royal possessions. And these reasons are not extracted out of the books of law, but are only reasons of policy; for 'rex est legalis et politicus,' and reasons politick are sufficient guides to judges in their arguments, and such cases and precedents are good directions in cases of judgement, for they are demonstrations of the course of antiquitie. Whereupon my judgement shall consist upon reasons politick, and precedents. The case in Dyer 1. Eliz. fo. 165. was not like to the case in question, but only a conference; and the case there was for an impost upon cloath, a domestick commodity. In this case, are recited their grievances, but it was paid, and it is denied here; but there was no resolution thereof. At the same time, was the impost of wines increased, and paid, no petition or complaint thereof. And the customs for England's commodities were at the first imposed by the king's will, for no statute giveth them, viz. for wool, woollfels and leather, and it was called the great custom; and that it was paid, it will not be denied; and yet now it is doubted, if the king can impose it upon forraign commodities. The king may restrain the person, as it is in Fitz. Nat. Br. à fortiori he may restrain the goods. There was no custom for home commodities, but the great custome aforesaid, which was after increased by parliament, which was called the Petit Custome. It is a great grace in the king to the merchants, that he will command, and permit this matter to be disputed between him and his subject, and the most fit place is in this court, and the best rules herein are the precedents thereof, and politick reasons, which I shall give, and apply them to the particulars before recited. And first, for the person of the king, 'omnis potestas à Deo, et non est potestas nisi pro bono.' To the king is committed the government of the realm and his people; and Bracton saith, that for his discharge of his office, God had given to him power, the act of government, and the power to govern. The kings power is double, ordinary and absolute, and they have several lawes and ends. That of the ordinary is for the profit of particular subjects, for the execution of civil justice, the determining of meum; and this is exercised by equitie and justice in ordinary courts, and by the civillians is nominated jus privatum and with us, common law: and these laws cannot be changed, without parliament; and although that their form and course may be changed, and interrupted, yet they can never be changed in substance. The absolute power of the king is not that which is converted or executed to private use, to the benefit of any particular person, but is only that which is applied to the general benefit of the people, and is salus populi; as the people is the body, and the king the head; and this power is guided by the rules, which direct only at the common law, and is most properly named Policy and Government; and as the constitution of this body varieth with the time, so varieth this absolute law, according to the wisdom of the king, for the common good; and these being general rules and true as they are, all things done within these rules are lawful. The matter in question is material matter of state, and ought to be ruled by the rules of pollicy; and if it be so, the king hath done well to execute his extraordinary power. All customes, be they old or new, are no other but the effects and issues of trades and commerce with forraign nations; but all commerce and affairs with forrainers, all wars and peace, all acceptance and admitting for current forrain coyn, all parties and treaties whatsoever, are made by the absolute power of the king; and he who hath power of causes, hath power also of effects. No exportation or importation can be, but at the kings ports. They are the gates of the king, and he hath absolute power by them to include or exclude whom he shall please; and ports to merchants are their harbours, and repose; and for their better securitie he is compelled to provide bulwarks, and fortresses, and to maintain, for the collection of his customs and duties, collectors and customers; and for that charge it is reason, that he should have this benefit. He is also to defend the merchants from pirates at sea in their passage. Also, by the power of the king they are to be relieved, if they are oppressed by forraign princes, for they shall have his treaty, and embassage; and if he be not remedied thereby, then lex talionis shall be executed, goods for goods, and tax for tax; and if this will not redress the matter, then war is to be attempted for the cause of merchants. In all the kings courts, and of other princes, the judges in them are paid by the king, and maintained by him to do justice to the subjects, and therefore he hath the profits of the said courts. It is reasonable that the king should have as much power over forrainers and their goods, as over his own subjects; and if the king cannot impose upon forrain commodities a custome, as wel as forrainers may upon their own commodities, and upon the commodities of this land when they come to them, then forrain states shall be enriched, and the king impoverished, and he shall not have equal profit with them; and yet it will not be denied, but his power herein is equal with other states. And so much for the person of Bates the subject. It is said, that an imposition may not be upon a subject without parliament. That the king may impose upon a subject, I omit; for it is not here the question, if the king may impose upon the subject or his goods; but the impost here is not upon a subject, but here it is upon Bates, as upon a merchant, who imports goods within this land, charged before by the king; and at the time when the impost was imposed upon them, they were the goods of the Venetians, and not the goods of a subject, nor within the land, but only upon those which shall be after imported; and so all the arguments, which were made for the subject, fail. And where it is said, that he is a merchant, and that he ought to have the sea open and free for him, and that trades of merchants and merchandise are necessary to export the surplus of our commodities, and then to import other necessaries, and so is favourably to be respected; as to that it is well known, that the end of every private merchant is not the common good, but his particular profit, which is only the means which induceth him to trade and traffick. And the impost to him is nothing, for he rateth his merchandise according to that. The impost is imposed upon currants, and he, who will buy them, shall have them subject to that charge; and it is a great contempt to denie the payment. And so much for the person. I will give a brief answer to all the statutes alledged on the contrary part, with this exposition, that the subjects and merchants are to be freed of Maletolt; and this was toll unjustly exacted by London, Southampton, and other ports within this realm; but they are with this saving, that they pay the duties and customes, due, or which hereafter shall be due to the king; which is a full answer to all the statutes. The commodity of currants is no commodity of this land, but forrain. And whereas it is said, that it is victual and necessary food, it is no more necessary than wine, and impost for that hath been always paid, without contradiction; and without doubt, there are many drinkers of wine, who are also eaters of currants. That which should be said victual for the common-wealth is that, which ariseth from agriculture, and of the earth within this land, and not vice and delicate things imported by merchants, such as these currants are. They are rather delicacy or medicine than a victual; and it is no reason that so many of our good and staple commodities should be exported to Venice for such a slight delicacy, and that all the impost shall be paid to the Venetians for them, and the king should have none for their comoditie: and although that the price be thereby raised, this hurteth not the merchant, nor no other, but only a small number of delicate persons, and those also who are of most able and best estate, for their pleasure. But when the king is in want, he is to be relieved by a general imposition or subsidie upon all the subjects. The imposition, which is here, is said to be so great and intolerable as an evil precedent; for, if he may do so much, he may do it in infinitum, and upon all other merchandise. For the imposition I say, that it is reasonable, for it is no more than foure times so much than was before; and that there hath been as much done in antient time in other imposts, as in that of wooll, which was at first but a noble a sack, and is now at 50s. The impost of wine was in antient time 3s. 4d. a tun, and now is foure marks. The lessening of custome and impost is much to be guided by intelligence from forrain nations; for the usage and behaviour of a forrain prince may impose a necessity of raising custome of these commodities. And so it was in the particular of currants. The duke of Venice imposed upon them a ductet by the hundred, which by the wisdom of the state was foreseen to be a means, that in time will waste and consume the treasure of the land; whereupon the queen writ to the duke, that he would abate his custome, which he refused. Wherefore to prevent, that so great a quantitie of this commoditie should not be imported into the land, the queen granted to the company of merchants of the Levant that none should bring in currants, but by their licence; and those merchants imposed upon them who did import, which were not of their company, if he were denizen 5s. if he were a stranger 10s. And this was paid by the merchants without contradiction. But there was a clause in the patent, that when the duke of Venice abated his impost, that the patent should be void, and after the duke was solicited again, that he would abate the impost, but he refused, and the first commission was recalled, and after a new grant was made, which was executed all the queen's life time, which was as aforesaid. And whereas it is said, that if the king may impose, he may impose any quantitie what he pleases, true it is, that this is to be referred to the wisdom of the king, who guideth all under God by his wisdom, and this is not to be disputed by a subject; and many things are left to his wisdom for the ordering of his power, rather than his power shall be restrained. The king may pardon any felon; but it may be objected, that if he pardon one felon he may pardon all, to the damage of the common-wealth; and yet none will doubt, but that is left in his wisdom. And as the king may grant a protection for one year, so it may be said, that he may grant it for many years, which is a mischief, and so ought to grant none, which will not be denied but that he may. So it may be said, that the queen may grant a safe conduct to a stranger; for if she may do that, then she may grant to all, which would be burthensome to the inhabitants; and yet it will not be denied but that she may grant to any or all, as in her wisdom shall seem convenient. And the wisdom and providence of the king is not to be disputed by the subject; for by intendment they cannot be severed from his person, and to argue a posse ad actum to restrain the king and his power, because that by his power he may do ill, is no argument for a subject. To prove the power of the king by precedents of antiquitie in a case of this nature may easily be done, and if it were lawful in antient times it is lawful now; for the authoritie of the king is not diminished, and the crown hath the same attributes, that then it had. And in antient time such imposts were never denied; and that which is given by parliament is not an impost but a subsidie. In antient time small traffick or intercourse was betwixt the inhabitants of this land and forrain nations, so that the principal custom was of the commodities of this land, which were woollens and leather; and that the custome for wooll, which was a noble for a sack, was an imposition, appears by the statute of the 14th Ed. 3. stat. 1. cap. 21. It is objected, that merchants cannot be restrained, but only persons suspected, as the writ of ne exeat regnum is. But as it is said in Dyer before cited, it is without doubt, that the cause is not traversable, and that the king may inhibit any man; for if it be not traversable, it is not material. And the reason, wherefore any man may be restrained, is for the defence of the realm; and it may be done by privie seal, privie signet, great seal, or proclamation; and that appears by the writ of licencia transportandi in the register, which containeth licence for one to travel, and limits him to what place he shall go, and when he shall return, and with what goods, so that the king may prohibit body and goods. And when a man is beyond the seas, the king may command him to return; and if he doth not obey such command, he shall forfeit his goods. Now for restraint of commodities many precedents are to prove it. In the time of H. 3. and E. 1. it was forbidden, that the wooll should be transported into Flanders; and in E. 1. a commission was awarded to enquire, who had done against this ordinance, and the goods of one Freeston were seized: and therefore an attachment awarded against the ships of Hull, for transporting contrary to the ordinance. In the 22 E. 1. it was forbidden, that no merchant should trade with France; for trade with forrainers is a forrain thing, which is only referred to the king. In the 17 H. 6. all merchants were forbidden to import wares from Flanders into this land; and the citizens of London complained of certain merchants, which had done contrary to this ordinance to the lords of the privie council, which I have here ready; for the record mentions it, and the kings attorney was commanded to exhibit an information against the merchants, which he did: and they pleaded that the proclamation was made here upon Easter eve, and that they were then at Bruges, and upon the Wednesday after Bruges market they bought the wares before notice of the proclamation, and before it were possible that they could have notice of it, and pray judgement, &c. And so much for restraint of the person and goods. By the statute of 31 E. 3. cap. 8. times were appointed in which wools should be transported; and also cap. 9. authoritie was given to the chancellor and treasurer, to defer the passage at their pleasure. But that this was the common law, and that the king by his supream authoritie might do it, it seems to me it is apparent by the statute of the 26 H. 8. cap. 10. which gives power to the king by his letters patents, to limit the time for importing of wines against the statute of 23 H. 8. cap. 7. which was no more but a restoring of his power abridged before; and so was the statute of 31 E. 3. for otherwise the parliament would never have given him authoritie to contradict an act of parliament by his letters patents, or to revive these acts. Impositions are merely a new custome. And so are they stiled in the margin of the roll of the 3 E. 1. in this court, where it is recorded, that the king had assigned merchants to receive (using the same words which are used here) half a mark for every sack of wool, and a mark of every last of leather, and that if the merchant, who is so appointed, transport any after, it shall be forfeited; and out of this record I observe, that three hundred pelts make a sack of wool. From the 21 Ed. 1. unto the 28 E. 1. the customs for wools was 40s. a sack, and in 25 E. 1. the imposition of Maletolt was repealed by act of parliament, which Maletolt was an increase of impost upon staple commodities; and therefore was given to the king a great subsidie with this cause, that it should never be drawn into precedent; which shews, that this Maletolt was rightly imposed, otherwise the parliament would never have given him so great a recompence for the abrogation of it. But after in the 13 of E. 3. because it was a thing of so great consequence to the crown, it was revived and made 40s. for wool, and woofels, and 3l. for leather for denizens, and double for strangers. In the 14 Ed. 3. a petition in parliament to abate it; and for a great subsidie it was released; and in the 18. of Ed. 3. it was again revived, and a new petition was made in parliament, and this petition was continued until the 36 Ed. 3. and then it was abated; and also by the 45 E. 3. it was again abated; so that it seems, that between these times it was revived; but after it did not continue long, for in 48 E. 3. it was again revived, and for wool the impost was 50s. et sic de singulis, and in 1 R. 2. after it was answered to the king, as it appears in the accompts here, and in 5 R. 2. it was again suppressed by parliament for a subsidie granted to the king with a saving of antient rights. All these statutes prove expresly, that the king had power to increase the impost, and that upon commodities of the land, and that he continually used this power notwithstanding all acts of parliament against it. And so much for commodities of this land. But for forrain commodities it appears by no act of parliament, or other precedent, that ever any petition or suit was made to abate the impost of forrain commodities, but of them the impost was paid without denial. As for example, for wines in the 16 E. 1. as appears in this court upon record, it was commanded to the bailiff of Dover to levie and collect of every tun of wine of a stranger 4s. and in the 22 E. 1. 2s. thereof was released, at the suit of the French ambassador. In the 26 of E. 3. the king granted priviledges to merchants strangers; but there was given for it an increase of custome; and this was answered as it appears upon accompt in the times of E. 1. and E. 2. The case of Allom was as it hath been recited by my brother Clark. It is objected, that the merchants ought to have free passage upon the sea; but that doth not conclude the king, but that he shall have his impost if he cometh into his ports, and here the question is for merchandise after that they are brought into the port. But it is said, that they cannot come into the port but by the sea. That is true; but if this reason should hold, then the king could not grant morage, pontage, and the like, because the common channel to them is free, and average is for secuurities as well as ports. Another objection, that the defendand here is not restrained; but that is answered, for if a pain be inflicted upon them who import, this is an inhibition upon a pain to all. Another objection was, that there was no consideration of the imposition; and if it be demanded what differences between the cases, I answer, as much as is between the king and a subject; and it is not reasonable, that the king should express the cause and consideration of his actions, for they are arcana regis, and no satisfaction needeth, for if the profits to the merchant faileth he will not trade, and it is for the benefit of every subject, that the kings treasure should be increased. An objection was made against the form of proceeding; because it was by the great seal to the treasurer, and that he by the customers peteret et reciperet; and this could not be better, as it was answered before. It was objected that it should be by proclamation; and that needs not, for it toucheth not all the subjects, but only those who are traders in merchandising, and the best and aptest means to give them notice is by the customers, and it is alledged by the information expresly, that he had notice. It was lastly objected, that there ought to be a quod damnum in the case before the grant. That is not so; for that shall be only when the king granteth any thing which appertaineth to his prerogative, and not when he maketh charters to his servants to levy his duties due to his crown. Wherefore I think, that the king ought to have judgment: which was after given accordingly.

Argument of Sir FRANCIS BACON, the King's Solicitor, in the Lower House of Parliament, in 1610, for Impositions by the Crown; from volume ii. of the last 4to edition of his Works, p. 223.

AND it please you, Mr. Speaker, this question touching the right of Impositions is very great; extending to the prerogative of the king on the one part, and the liberty of the subject on the other; and that in a point of profit and value, and not of conceit or fancy. And therefore, as weight in all motions increaseth force, so I do not marvel to see men gather the greatest strength of argument they can to make good their opinions. And so you will give me leave likewise, being strong in mine own persuasion, that it is the king's right, to shew my voice as free as my thought. And for my part, I mean to observe the true course to give strength to this cause, which is, by yielding those things which are not tenable, and keeping the question within the true state and compass; which will discharge many popular arguments, and contract the debate into a less room.

Wherefore I do deliver the question, and exclude or set by, as not in question, five things. First, the question is de portorio, and not de tributo, to use the Roman words for explanation sake; it is not, I say, touching any taxes within the land, but of payments at the ports. Secondly, it is not touching any impost from port to port, but where claves regni, the keys of the kingdom, are turned to let in from foreign parts, or to send forth to foreign parts; in a word, matter of commerce and intercourse, not simply of carriage or vecture. Thirdly, the question is, as the distinction was used above in another case, de vero et falso, and not de bono et malo, of the legal point, and not of the inconvenience, otherwise than as it serves to decide the law. Fourthly, I do set apart three commodities, wools, woolfells, and leather, as being in different case from the rest; because the custom upon them is antiqua custodia. Lastly, the question is not, whether in matter of imposing the king may alter the law by his prerogative, but whether the king have not such a prerogative by law.

The state of the question being thus cleared and freed, my proposition is, that the king by the fundamental laws of this kingdom hath a power to impose upon merchandise and commodities both native and foreign. In my proof of this proposition all that I shall say, be it to confirm or confute, I will draw into certain distinct heads or considerations which move me, and may move you.

The first is an universal negative. There appeareth not in any of the king's courts any one record, wherein an imposition laid at the ports hath been overthrown by judgment; nay more, where it hath been questioned by pleading. This plea, 'quod summa predicta minus juxta imposita fuit, et contra leges et consuetudines regni hujus Angliæ, unde idem Bates illam solvere recusavit, prout ei bene licuit,' is prima impressionis Bates was the first man ab origine mundi, for any thing that appeareth, that ministered that plea; whereupon I offer this to consideration. The king's acts that grieve the subject are either against law, and so void; or according to strictness of law, and yet grievous. And according to these several natures of grievance, there be several remedies. Be they against law? Overthrow them by judgment. Be they too straight and extreme, though legal? Propound them in parliament. Forasmuch then as impositions at the ports, having been so often laid, were never brought into the king's courts of justice, but still brought to parliament, I may most certainly conclude, that they were conceived not to be against law. And if any man shall think that it was too high a point to question by law before the judges, or that there should want fortitude in them to aid the subject; no, it shall appear from time to time, in cases of equal reach, where the king's acts have been indeed against law, the course of law hath run, and the judges have worthily done their duty.

As in the case of an imposition upon linen cloth for the alnage; overthrown by judgment.

The case of a commission of arrest and committing of subjects upon examination without conviction by jury, disallowed by the judges.

A commission to determine the right of the exigenter's place, secundum sanam discretionem, disallowed by the judges.

The case of the monopoly of cards overthrown and condemned by judgment.

I might make mention of the jurisdiction of some courts of discretion, wherein the judges did not decline to give opinion. Therefore, had this been against law, there would not have been alium silentium in the king's courts. Of the contrary judgments I will not yet speak; thus much now, that there is no judgment, nor plea against it. Though I said no more, it were enough, in my opinion, to induce you to a non liquet, to leave it a doubt.

The second consideration is, the force and continuance of payments made by grants of merchants, both strangers and English, without consent of parliament. Herein I lay this ground, that such grants considered in themselves are void in law: for merchants, either strangers or subjects, they are no body corporate, but singular and dispersed persons; they cannot bind succession, neither can the major part bind the residue: how then should their grants have force? No otherwise but thus; that the king's power of imposing was only the legal virtue and strength of those grants; and that the consent of a merchant is but a concurrence, the king is principale agens, and they are but as the patient, and so it becomes a binding act out of the king's power.

Now if any man doubt that such grants of merchants should not be of force, I will alledge but two memorable records, the one for the merchants strangers, the other for the merchants English. That for the strangers is upon the grant of Chart. Mercator. of three pence in value ultra antiquas custumas; which grant is in use and practice at this day. For it is well known to the merchants, that that which they call stranger's custom, and erroneously double custom, is but three pence in the pound more than English. Now look into the statutes of subsidy of tonnage and poundage, and you shall find, a few merchandise only excepted, the poundage equal upon alien and subject; so that this difference or excess of three pence hath no other ground than that grant. It falleth to be the same in quantity; there is no statute for it, and therefore it can have no strength but from the merchants grants; and the merchants grants can have no strength but from the king's power to impose.

For the merchants English, take the notable record in 17 E. 3. where the commoner complained of the 40s. upon the sack of wool as a mol-toll set by the assent of the merchants without consent of parliament; nay, they dispute and say it were hard that the merchants consent should be in damage of the commons. What saith the king to them? Doth he grant it or give way to it? No; but replies upon them, and saith, it cannot be rightly construed to be in prejudice of the commons, the rather because provision was made, that the merchants should not work upon them, by colour of that payment to increase their price; in that there was a price certain set upon the wools. And there was an end of that matter: which plainly affirmeth the force of the merchants grants. So then the force of the grants of merchants both English and strangers appeareth; and their grants, being not corporate, are but noun adjectives without the king's power to impose.

The third consideration is of the first and most ancient commencement of customs; wherein I am somewhat to seek; for, as the poet saith, 'ingreditarque solo, et caput inter nubila condit,' the beginning of it is obscure: but I rather conceive that it is by common law, than by grant in parliament. For, first, Mr. Dyer's opinion was, that the ancient custom for exportation was by the common laws; and goeth further, that that ancient custom was the custom upon wools, woolfells, and leather. He was deceived in the particular, and the diligence of your search hath revealed it; for that custom upon these three merchandises grew by grant of parliament 3 E. 1. But the opinion in general was sound; for there was a custom before that: for the records themselves, which speak of that custom, do term it a new custom, 'alentour del novel custome,' as concerning the new custom granted, &c. This is pregnant there was yet a more ancient. So for the strangers, the grant in 31 E. 1. Chart. Mercator.

is, that the 3d. granted by the strangers should be ultra antiquas custumas, which hath no affinity with that custom upon the three species, but presupposeth more ancient customs in general. Now if any man think, that those more ancient customs were likewise by act of parliament, it is but a conjecture. It is never recited ultra antiquas custumas prius concessus, and acts of parliament were not much stirring before the Great Charter, which was 9 H. 3. And therefore I conceive with Mr. Dyer, that whatsoever was the ancient custom was by the common law. And if by the common law, then what other means can be imagined of the commencement of it but by the king's imposing?

The fourth consideration is of the manner that was held in parliament in the abolishing of impositions laid: wherein I will consider, first, the manner of the petitions exhibited in parliament; and more specially the nature of the king's answers.

For the petitions I note two things; first, that to my remembrance there was never any petition made for the revoking of any imposition upon foreign merchants only. It pleased the Decemviri in 5 E. 2. to deface Chart. Mercator. and so the imposition upon strangers, as against law. But the opinion of these reformers I do not much trust, for they of their gentleness did likewise bring in doubt the demy-mark, which it is manifest was granted by parliament, and pronounced by them the king should have it, s'il avoit le droit: but this is declared void by 1 E. 3. which reneweth Chart. Mercator. and void must it needs be, because it was an ordinance by commission only, and that in the time of a weak king, and never either warranted or confirmed by parliament. Secondly, I note that petitions were made promiscuously for taking away impositions set by parliament as well as without parliament; nay, that very tax of the neufieme, the ninth sheaf or fleece, which is recited to be against the king's oath and in blemishment of his crown, was an act of parliament, 14 E. 3. So then to infer that impositions were against law, because they are taken away by succeeding parliaments, it is no argument at all; because the impositions set by the parliaments themselves, which no man will say were against law, were nevertheless afterwards pulled down by parliament. But indeed the argument holdeth rather the other way, that because they took not their remedy in the king's courts of justice, but did fly to the parliament, therefore they were thought to stand with law.

Now for the king's answers. If the impositions complained of had been against law, then the king's answer ought to have been simple, tanquam responsio categorica, non hypothetica; as, let them be repealed, or, let the law run. But contrariwise, they admit all manner of diversities and qualifications: for, Sometimes the king disputeth the matter and doth nothing; as 17 E. 3. Sometimes the king distinguisheth of reasonable and not reasonable, as 38 E. 3. Sometimes he abolisheth them in part, and letteth them stand in part, as 11 E. 2. the record of the mutuum, and 14 E. 3. the printed statute, whereof I shall speak more anon. Sometimes that no imposition shall be set during the time that the grants made of subsidies by parliament shall continue, as 47 E. 3. Sometimes that they shall cease ad voluntatem nostram. And sometimes that they shall hold over their term prefixed or assised.

All which sheweth, that the king did not disclaim them as unlawful, for actus legitimus non recipit tempus aut conditionem. If it had been a disaffirmance by law, they must have gone down in solido; but now you see they have been tempered and qualified as the king saw convenient.

The fifth consideration is of that which is offered by way of objection; which is, first, that such grants have been usually made by consent of parliament; and secondly, that the statutes of subsidies of tonnage and poundage have been made as a kind of stint and limitation, that the king should hold himself unto the proportion so granted and not imposed further; the rather because it is expressed in some of these statutes of tonnage and poundage, sometimes by way of protestation, and sometimes by way of condition, that they shall not be taken in precedent, or that the king shall not impose any further rates or novelties, as 6 R. 2. 9 R. 2. 15 H. 4. 1 H. 5. which subsidies of tonnage and poundage have such clauses and cautions.

To this objection I give this answer. First, that it is not strange with kings, for their own better strength, and the better contentment of their people, to do those things by parliament, which nevertheless have perfection enough without parliament. We see their own rights to the crown which are inherent; yet they take recognition of them by parliament. And there was a special reason why they should do it in this case; for they had found by experience, that, if they had not consent in parliament to the setting of them up, they could not have avoided suit in parliament for the taking of them down. Besides, there were some things requisite in the manner of the levy for the better strengthening of the same, which perchance could not be done without parliament; as the taking the oath of the party touching the value, the inviting of the discovery of concealment of custom by giving the money to the informer, and the like.

Now in special for the statutes of subsidies of tonnage and poundage, I note three things. First, that the consideration of the grant is not laid to be for the restraining of imposition, but expressly for the guarding of the sea. Secondly, that it is true, that the ancient form is more peremptory, and the modern more submissive, for in the ancient form sometimes they insert a flat condition that the king shall not further impose; in the latter they humbly pray, that the merchants may be demeaned without oppression, paying those rates. But whether it be supplication, or whether it be condition, it rather implieth the king hath a power; for else both were needless, for 'conditio annectitur ubi libertas præsumitur,' and the word oppression seemeth to refer to excessive impositions. And thirdly, that the statutes of tonnage and poundage are but cumulative and not privative of the king's power precedent appeareth notably in the three-pence overplus, which is paid by the merchants strangers, which should be taken away quite, if those statutes were taken to be limitations; for in that, as was touched before the rates are equal in the generality between subjects and strangers; and yet that imposition, notwithstanding any supposed restriction of these acts of subsidies of tonnage and poundage, remaineth at this day.

The sixth consideration is likewise to an objection, which is matter of practice, viz. that from R. 2.'s time to Mary, which is almost 200 years, there was an intermission of impositions, as appeareth both by records and the custom-books.

To which I answer; both that we have in effect an equal number of years to countervail them, namely, 100 years in the time of the three kings Edwards addod to 60 of our last years; and extrema obruiunt media; for we have both the reverence of antiquity and the possession of the present times, and they but the middle times. And besides, in all true judgment there is a very great difference between an usage to prove a thing lawful, and a non-usage to prove it unlawful: for the practice plainly implieth consent; but the discontinuance may be, either because it was not needful, though lawful; or because there was found a better means, as I think it was indeed in respect of the double customs by means of the staple at Calais.

Transcript of part of Sir John Davis's Manuscript Argument for Impositions by the Crown, from Carte's History, vol. iv. p. 191.—[From the Title to the printed Treatise by Sir John Davis on the same Subject, it appears to have been written the latter end of the reign of James the First.]

The king is the fountain of all justice, as well commutative as distributive. The first is exercised chiefly in the ordering and government of trade and commerce; wherein he is to do justice, or procure it to be done, not only to his subjects who make contracts-real or personal within the land, but to his merchants also, who trade with foreign nations, and to strangers who traffick in his dominions. For the administration of commutative justice within the land, the king receives various profits, which grew first by way of imposition; as finer for original process to recover debts, fines for passing lands from one to another in his courts, and in common recoveries, and the silver pro licentia concordandi, the profits of the seals in his courts for all manner of writs, &c. nor is the taking of these and the like duties any breach of Magna Charta; having been imposed by the king long before that charter was made, and taken as a recompence for the charge of the crown in maintaining the courts of justice. There is the same reason for his charge in doing justice, and procuring justice to be done abroad to merchants, whose commerce is for the most part out of the land, being recompenced out of the merchandizes exported and imported, not according to the will of the merchant, or the pleasure of the people, but in proportion to the king's charge, which being best known to himself, it is fit that the recompence should be fixed by himself. All leagues, truces, and treaties of state, with foreign princes, in which the public trade and commerce of merchants is ever included, are made and concluded at his charge; he maintains a court of admiralty for deciding all marine causes, which generally concern merchants; his council of state is applied to, in case of injuries contrary to the sense of treaties; he is at vast expence in keeping resident ambassadors in different courts, chiefly for procuring justice to be done our merchants; and in case of their being wronged and denied justice abroad, the king, by his prerogative, grants them letters of marque or reprisal, to right themselves; and if those injuries are multiplied or continued with an high hand, it is his office directly to denounce and make war on such prince or state, as refuses to do justice to his merchants. So king Charles had lately done against France. It was for this cause, as Appian says, the Romans began the first Punic war; and Cicero (a) affirms, that they frequently waged war for the injurious treatment of their merchants. The making of war and peace is an undisputed prerogative of the crown: he maintains a fleet, to protect merchants from spoil and piracy (b) (which the Romans thought a just reason for customs) at a charge too great to be defrayed by the poundage laid by Edward 1. at the rate of three-pence, though silver being then at twenty pence an ounce, the grant was intrinsically worth near a shilling, and it being levied at this last rate, in the time of Edward 4. (c) was found insufficient for the maintenance of his navy. The flow of money from the East and West Indies vastly enhanced the price of merchandize, and the charges of the crown, as well in all other articles as in that of the royal navy. Hence arose a necessity of new impositions, it not being fit, that the king's charges, in supporting the trade of merchants, should be unlimited and infinite, and the duty on merchandize be stinted and restrained to such a proportion only as the subject shall be pleased to grant him. Subjects may live as privately as they please; but a king, by reason of the majesty of his estate, cannot well abridge his charge, and would be in a poor situation, if he had no power of himself, without their leave, to improve his revenue.

As he protects the merchants, and gives them convoys at sea, he grants them safe conducts at land (no other being allowed by the law of nations, or acknowledged by Magna Charta) and receives their ships into his harbours. The king is the custos, or guardian, of the whole realm, but he is more particularly lord of the ports, not only of the Cinque ports, where he appoints a warden to exercise his jurisdiction, but of all the rest in the kingdom; and our kings have ever enjoyed the prerogative of opening and shutting them at their pleasure. In the reign of Edward 3. great part whereof was spent in war, there are several petitions in the rolls of parliament for opening the sea, when it was shut by his prerogative: yet he never opened it again, without laying an extraordinary imposition upon merchandize. This prerogative was founded on excellent reason; for commerce is not to be held with all persons. Else enemies might discover the secrets of the realm, and corrupt religion or the manners of the people. Nor are all things fit to be exported, particularly such as the kingdom cannot spare, or may be of advantage to the enemy, as corn in a time of dearth, warlike stores in war, &c. Embargos are of the same nature with the stopping of ports, and equally appropriated to the king, being an incident annexed to his prerogative of making war and peace. When war is denounced, all trade is stopped between the nations engaged therein; and if a king can stop it, he must of course have a power to open it, and lay reasonable impositions on merchants for doing so. It is a rule in law, he that may do more may do less; and he, that can forbid people to trade or pass at all, may dispense with the prohibition, and give them leave to traffick under certain conditions. Our kings have forbid (d) trade, sometimes generally, sometimes between us and particular nations, sometimes for particular merchandizes only; of all which there are examples enough in our records and histories. All companies of merchants are instituted by the king; and he that gives their privileges may likewise prescribe the terms, on which they are to enjoy them, exclusive of others. The king is lord of the sea about this island, not only as to jurisdiction and protection, but as to property (e). Hence all land

drained from the sea belongs, by the common law, to the crown (as Stanford (f) says) de jure gentium; and all seas belong to the next potentate, at least so long as they are formidable, and all navigable rivers, being like arms, of the sea, so far as the tide floweth. Hence, antecedent to any statute, the king (g) might restrain all his subjects, of what quality soever, from going beyond-sea, as Edward I. did in the 22d year of his reign; and the like prohibitions were (h) made in those of his successors. If he allows merchants to pass to and fro, to come in and out of his streams and ports, he may certainly prescribe the conditions, and what duties they shall pay. Trade was carried on by the English many hundreds of years, before there was such a thing known as an house of commons: it was carried on with so great profit, that our riches served for admittance to other nations, even to the Normans at the time of the conquest: but if our kings had not the same authority as other princes, both in commerce, and in Impositions, it could never have been carried on with advantage. They could not without it have held the balance of trade upright, or have preserved an equality between their own subjects and foreigners. Our neighbours might otherwise drain off all our wealth, and ruin our trade at their pleasure: and their princes, having the sole right to lay impositions, might manage the market so, that their subjects should sell dear, and buy cheap, unless our kings had the same powers to prevent the ill effects of their measures, and the ruin of our commerce. Thus when the state of Venice laid a ducat upon every hundred weight of currants carried out of their dominions by the English merchants, queen Elizabeth, by a speciall patent, in the 12th year of her reign, enabled her merchants trading to the Levant, to levy a noble upon every hundred weight of currants brought into England by any merchant stranger. Thus when the Hanse Towns had got the emperor to banish all English merchants out of Germany, the same queen caused their house called the Steelyard to be seized, forbade them to traffick with any of her subjects, and ordered their merchants to quit England, the same day that the English were to depart out of the empire. Nothing is more evident, than the necessity of our kings having the same power, in impositions as well as commerce, as other princes; they always exercised it well, and there was no danger of their abusing it, whilst the best part of their revenue depended thereon: and whoever will consider, how light, easy, reasonable, and calculated for the benefit of trade, the im-

positions of our kings were, must be allowed an uncommon measure of public spirit, if he is very fond of the change into heavier, because they are parliamentary impositions.

These are some of the reasons that may be assigned for the royal prerogative in point of laying impositions, which all monarchs enjoyed by the law of nations, and which the civil law considered as so inherent in the scepter, that it could not be taken away without the destruction of the scepter. In fact, it had been always exercised in this island; the British princes, whose territories were situated on the sea, laid (as Strabo says) heavy duties on the native commodities, which the Gaulic merchants transported hence to their own country; and some pieces of the tribute money paid to Cunobeline, with his image and superscription, are still preserved. The Romans laid the like impositions; the power of laying them was incident to the imperial authority; and when the empire was over-run by the Goths and other northern nations, the princes thereof succeeded to, and exercised the same right, in all the countries which they conquered. The Saxon kings did the same here: and even Magna Charta attests, that there were ancient and right customs paid by merchants, before the making of that charter, and before an house of commons was in being. These customs were indeed but small; such as half a mark on a sack of wool, or 300 woollfells, a mark on a last of leather, those on tin and lead were proportionably easy: and when king John laid 8d. a ton on wine; and Edward I. in his Carta Mercatoria, laid 3d. in the pound upon merchandize imported by strangers, generally called the petit custom, with an increase of all other duties on them: the one was as much a tonnage, and the other a poundage, as if higher rates had been imposed: and the question is only about the king's right in the thing itself, not about the quantum of the imposition. Nor was the difference in point of the rate or quantity any thing considerable, for a poundage of 3d. in those days was more worth to the crown, than that of a shilling now; and the duty of two shillings a tun upon all wine imported by strangers (which Edward I. imposed by the same charter) was, each shilling weighing then as much as three now, double the value of the present tonnage. Those who were for stripping the crown of this branch of its authority, objected to Edward's charter in this point, that it was suspended by his successor's writ (i) in the 3d year of his reign, and in the 5th repealed (k) by ordinance: but this was done not by the king and parliament, but by certain rebellious barons, who assumed the government of the realm, and called themselves Ordainers. It is well known, how turbulent a reign this was, and how weak a prince sate upon the throne, scarce ever master of himself, and so distressed by this violence of the barons (several of whose ordinances were treasonable) that he was forced to take by large sums of money by way of loan (l) from the merchants, which being never repaid, the merchants received thence greater detriment, than they would have done by paying double the poundage imposed by his father. But no sooner did Edward 3rd get possession of the crown, than (m) he revived his grandfather's charter, and ordered by his writs, the poundage and other customs therein contained to be levied to his use, notwithstanding the ordinances made, not by the king his father, but per quosdam magnates.

Edward 3. was a great prince; and being embarked in expensive wars during the most part of his reign, he put extraordinary duties, sometimes of 4s. sometimes 5s. upon wool, and the like upon other commodities. This gave occasion to several petitions of the commons in parliament, upon which a greater stress hath been laid than they deserve. It doth not appear, that these petitions were of right, but rather of grace and favour; they are far from inferring, either that the people had received wrong, or that the king had no right to lay impositions. It never behoved any prince more, than Edward, to be well with his people, to whom he was obliged to apply every year for the support of his wars; he was infinitely careful in this respect: and his answers to their petitions were generally gracious, but wary and circumspect. On some heads he was silent; on others, his answers were general or doubtful; sometimes he granted them in part, for a certain time, and on condition he received a greater recompence; nor did he ever remit any imposition, without receiving a subsidy of more considerable value. In his 14th year, (n) the Commons prayed him not to take above the half mark on a sack of wool, nor more than the old customs on lead, tin, and leather. In his answer, he granted their request, not for tin or lead, but only for wool and leather; yet this grace was not to take place, till after the Whitsontide to come twelvemonth; it was granted but in part, to Englishmen only, not to foreign merchants: and yet though all these new impositions were to continue for above a year, he got a parliamentary grant, not only of 20,000 sacks of wool, but of the 9th lamb, the 9th fleece of wool, and the 9th sheaf of corn, of all persons, both clergy and laity, throughout the kingdom. In his 29th year, (o) the commons wanting to get the 40s. duty, laid on a sack of wool, to be taken off, it was agreed in parliament, that the king should have a greater subsidy out of wool and leather for six years, 'so as, during that time, he laid no other imposition or charge upon the commons.' This is evidently a conditional agreement, (p) and the people would scarce have bought it so dear, if the king had not a right to lay them; and if he suspended his power of imposing for six years, it was in consideration of a recompence of greater value. The punishments of lord Latimer, John Pechy, and Richard Lions, in the 50th of this king, when through age and grief at the Black Prince's death, he was become weak, sickly, languid, melancholy, and almost stupid, made as little to the purpose of those who urge them against the royal power in impositions. Pechy had got a patent, that none should sell sweet wines in the city of London, but himself, his deputies, and assignes; and under colour thereof, extorted ten groats for every pipe of sweet wines sold by others within the city; it doth not appear that he had any warrant for it from his patent, and his being punished for abusing it, and doing the things of his own head, is no argument against the king's right of laying the like imposition. Latimer had, of his own authority, laid several impositions on merchandize at Calais, to the great decay of the staple there. He had likewise played the stock-jobber in buying the debentures, tallies, and ticquets, due from the king to his soldiers and pensioners, at a great discount, giving very little to the parties, and yet, in deceit of his majesty, had an entire allowance for them in the Exchequer. He had also defrauded the king of the pay sent to his forces in Bretagne, had sold a large quantity of provisions for his army there, converting the money to his own use; and had delivered up the towns of S. Sauveur in Normandie, and Becherel in Bretagne, to the enemy, not without the suspicion of corruption and treason. He was censured for all these crimes in the gross, so that nothing can be drawn thence against the right of the crown in laying impositions on merchandize; especially since Latimer was charged with laying the impost at Calais, without any warrant, and purely of his own authority. Lions, a farmer of the customs, was accused (q) of setting on wool and other merchandize, certain new impositions without assent of parliament, converting them to his own use without controul, the lord treasurer not being acquainted therewith; and of assuming to himself in divers other things, as a king. He pleaded, indeed, that he laid them by the king's command, but he produced no warrant, nor could he have any without the treasurer's knowledge: and he was justly punished by fine, ransom, and imprisonment. The king's right could not be any ways affected by this sentence on a man, who had acted of his own head; especially since his charge was, 'that being but a subject, he had taken upon him, as a king, in divers things, particularly

'in laying impositions;' which intimate sufficiently, that a king might do it, but not a subject. This is still more plain in the bill exhibited by the commons in this parliament, (r) praying, 'that those who should set new impositions by their own authority, accroaching to themselves royal power, might have judgment of life and member;' than which there cannot be desired a plainer acknowledgment, by parliament, that the setting of impositions belonged to the crown, and was a mark of sovereignty and royal power.

Mr. Speaker;

The Question now in Debate amongst us is, Whether his Majesty may, by his Prerogative Royall, without Assent of Parliament, at his own Will and Pleasure, lay a new Charge or Imposition upon Merchandizes, to be brought into, or out of this kingdome of England; and enforce Merchants to pay the same?

I MUST confesse, that when this point was first stirred amongst us, and that wee, not contented to seeke redresse for the excesse of the present Impositions, resolved to proceed far-

† This argument was printed in 1641, with this title, 'The Libertie of the Subject: against the pretended Power of Impositions. Maintained by an Argument in Parliament an. 7. Jacobi Regis. By William Hakewill, of Lincoln's Inn, esq.'—It was preceded with the following address from Mr. Hakewill to the reader. 'Being very sensible of a great injury lately done mee, by the extreme false printing of a small treatise of my composing, stoln out without my consent, and hearing accidentally that some part of this also had passed the presse, I thought good for the preventing of the like wrong to stay the forwardnesse of the printer until I had reviewed and corrected it by mine owne notes. For my part, I should have been contented altogether to have restrained it, if I might; but now seeing it must abroad, I shall not bee ashamed to let it beare my name, and owne the errors of it my self (those of the presse excepted) though heretofore it had payned so much reputation by some, as it was attributed to a worthier author. Some there are yet surviving that heard this argument about thirty yeeres since in the commons house of parliament; but it hath now extended itself beyond the probable proportion of a speech or argument, by the insertion of many records and acts of parliament more at large, which, at the delivery of it, ther, by calling his majesty's right of imposing into questions, I was very sorry: for I saw we were then in a faire way to have obtained a very great abatement of the impositions that now are; and besides, we had his majesties promise never to lay any more but in parliament time, by the advice and free consent of his subjects, repaying hither from all parts of the realme. This hope of a present ease, and gracious promise for the time to come, gave me, I confesse, a full satisfaction: especially, seeing I was confidently perswaded, that his majesties right to impose was very cleere and not to be disputed; and that therefore by were but meerey quoted.—The endeavour of it is to prove, that the just prerogative of our kings never warranted them to raise monies at their pleasure, by laying a charge on merchandize to bee exported or imported, without assent of parliament. But, on the contrary, the settled lawes of the land, the precedents of former ages, the acts of our most necessary and powerfull princes, and indeed every thing requisite to make the truth apparent, doe as it were unanimously consent to discharge us of this unjust and heavy burthen.—And you shall see herein, how the policy of active princes hath by many waies attempted to undermine those fortifications, which the wisdom of our ancestors hath rayzed to maintain themselves from this kinde of assault. You shall see with how great difficulty their prevailing was withstood. And (which is the glory of truth) you shall finde those designes, which were laid to overthrow our right, mainly to make for the evidence and confirmation of it. For, whatever unjust impositions were either exacted by a pretended lawfulness, or set up by a commanding power, were by complaint in parliaments presently following taken down, and remain on record as (witnesses against themselves) unlawfull, and against our libertie.—These reasons and arguments of mine (how meane soever) those times, wherein I urged them, accepted favorably; and since, in their private passage in manuscripts, were drawing into question the right, wee might give his majesty just occasion to withdraw from us his gracious purpose of the present abatement, as also his promise for the time to come. For, syr, when the case of Bates, who as you know was called into question for refusing to pay the Imposition laid upon currants, was argued in the Exchequer, in which case his majesties right to impose was solemnly disputed, and there resolved for his majesty, I was then present at all the arguments both at the bar and at the bench; and I doe confesse that by the weighty and unanswerable reasons, as I then conceived them, of those grave and reverend judges, [Fleming, Ch. Bar. Clarke, Savil,] sitting in their seate of justice, I was much perswaded. But by those many records vouched by them, I was altogether overcome, and as it were vanquish't to yeeld to them; for syr, ratio suadet, autoritas vincit. But though I were then, and when the question was first moved in this house, very confident, yet as you shall perceive anon, I was not very constant in that opinion; for being, amongst others, employed by this house to make search in the Exchequer for records, which, by the practise of

'entertained in many judicious hands, which 'made mee somewhat enlarge the conceit that
'before I had of them. And now seeing necessi-
'tie enforceth mee to make them more pub-
'lique, I must adventure them to the censure
'of these nice times. Beneficiall (happily) they 'may be to some, prejudiciall I hope to none.
'In which confidence (having the leave of au'thority) they have likewise my leave to goe
'abroad.—Vale.—W. H.'

There are also prefixed the following heads of the Argument: '1. That there was ever some custome due to the king by the common law.—2. That it was a sum certaine by the common law.—3. That all the revenues which the common law giveth to the king, out of the interest of the subject, are certaine, or reducible to a certainty by some legall course, and none left to the kings pleasure.—4. The reasons why the law requireth such certainty in those revenues which the king hath out of the interest of the subject.—5. Examples of revenues given by the common law to the king, out of the interest of the subject, and that they are all certaine.—6. Answer to an objection, that the king may lay impositions upon extraordinary occasions.—7. Arguments drawn from the actions of our kings, that they had no power to impose.—8. Arguments drawn from the forbearance of our kings to lay impositions, notwithstanding their urgent occasions.—9. The difference between the presidents urged, of impositions laid by the antient kings, and those which are now laid.—10. A particular answer to the imposition of 3*d*. in the pound laid upon merchant strangers by Charta Mercatoria, 31 Ed. 1.—11. The urgent occasions which Ed. 2. had to lay impositions, and yet how he forbore.—12. The severall policies used by Ed. 3. for the introducing of the power of imposing: 1. Impositions taken by colour of a voluntary grant from merchants: 2. By way of dispensation with penall lawes: 3. By way of ordinance in parliament: 4. By colour of a loane by merchants: 5. By grants of merchants for liberties granted to them: 6. By expresse and direct commandement; with severall answers to all those severall wayes.—13. In what statutes impositions are mentioned after Edw. 3*rd*'s time, untill queen Maries; and upon what occasions, and how to be interpreted.—14. The signification of the words imposition, toll, maletoll, custuma et consu- tudo magna et parva.—15. No imposition laid from Ed. 3*rd*'s time till queen Maries.—16. What urgent occasions all the kings from Ed. 3. till queen Maries time, had to lay impositions, and yet did it not. Rich. 2. Hen. 4. Hen. 5. Hen. 6. Edw. 4. Hen. 7. Hen. 8. Edw. 6. with a corollary of all those times and occasions.—17. The impositions laid by queen Mary, and how answered.—18. Admitting the kings had power by the common law to lay impositions, yet how they are barred by statutes.—19. Magna Charta, cap. 30, urged against impositions, and the objection made against it, answered: 1. Objection, That it extendeth onely to merchant strangers: 2. That it was made onely against taxes within the land: 3. That by the exception in the end of the statute, the kings prerogative is saved.—20. The statute de tallagio non concedendo urged, with the answers to the objections made thereunto. The exposition of the words tallage, ayde, subsidie.—21. The statute of 25 Ed. 1. cap. 7. urged against impositions, and cleared from objections: 1. That it is against the excess of impositions, and not against the right: 2. That it is onely against impositions on woolls.—22. The statute of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. urged against impositions, and cleared from objections. That it extendeth onely to impositions within the land, and not upon merchandizes, answered, with an exposition of the word charge.—23. Answers to the reasons urged in maintenance of impositions: 1. That because it cannot appeare that the ancient customes were set by parliament, therefore they were imposed by the king. The antiquity of parliaments.—24. Answer to the second reason urged for impositions, that the king may totally restraine importation and exportation, and therefore may restraine sub modo by laying impositions.—25. Answer to the third reason, that the ports are the kings, and that he may open and shut them on what conditions he pleaseth.—26. Answer to the fourth reason, that the king is bound to protect merchants, and safeguard the seas, and tht therefore he may lay moderate impositions for raising of money to defray his charges.—27. Answer to the fifth objection, that all orreign princes have power to impose; and your king should not have the like, it might be very inconvenient to this state.—28. A ammary conclusion of the whole argument.'

former ages, might guide our judgments in this weighty point, and having diligently collected the arguments made in the Exchequer, and not only so, but compared my owne collections with reports thereof made by divers other of my friends, and finding that some of the records urged in those arguments were untruly vouchèd, and many misaplyed, I then began to stagger in my opinion, and presently fell to examine the weight of the reasons which had been alledged, which in my poore censure, I found not of strength sufficient, without the full concurrence of cleere presidents of former times, to maintaine the judgement given, or my opinion grounded thereupon. And therefore, syr, in love to the truth I did forsake my former opinion as erroneus, and do now embrace the contrary, that is, That his majestie hath no right to impose, and so am now become a convert. Those reasons that moved mee thus to change, and the weakenesse which I discovered in the reasons alledged against the opinion which I now hold, I will, with your patience, open unto you, and will therein follow the commandement of Christ to Peter, being converted, seeke to convert my brethren.

As touching the judgement in the Exchequer standing yet in force, so often cast as a block in our way, though I much reverence the persons of those yet living, and the memory of those that are with God, who gave the judgement: yet seeing, as I hope I shall bee able evidently to prove, the same to bee against the Great Charter of our liberties, I can esteeme no otherwise of it than the statute of 25 Ed. 1. cap. 10. pronounceth of all such judgements; that is, that it is void and to be held for nought. Thus much I thought good to say by way of preamble or introduction to the matter. Now, by your favours, I will enter into the debate of the question; in handling of which I will purposely avoid the repetition of any thing that hath been spokèn by any man that hath argued before, as knowing in what presence I speake. That I may the better convey my selfe through my argument, and be the better conceived of you that are to heare me, I will divide that which I have to say into certain parts, which I will prosecute in order.

First, I hold it necessary to consider, whether Custome were due to the king by the common law.

Secondly, admitting it to bee due by the common law, whether it were a summe certain, not to be increased at the kings pleasure or otherwise.

Thirdly, supposing that by the common law the king might by way of Imposition, have increased his Cutom at his own will, by his absolute power, without assent in parliament, whether or no hee bee not bound to the contrary by acts of parliament. In the handling of which part, I will consider the strength of every act of parliament hitherto vouchèd to this purpose, answering, as I goe, such objections as have ben made against those statutes by such as have maintained that the king is not bound by them. I will also add a statute or two as yet not remembered by any.

Lastly, I will discover unto you the weakenesse of such reasons as have been made in maintenance of the kings right to impose.

In the prosecuting of which parts I will, as occasion is offered, give some answer to that which hath been last spoken, [by sir Robert Hitchain]; as knowing it to be expected at my hands.

FIRST then to consider, 'WHETHER there were by the Common-Law any Duty belonging to the King upon Merchandize to be carried into or out of the Kingdom, known by the name of Custome?'—Though the maintenance of custome to be due by the common-law be a point of such consequence to them that maintained the kings right to impose, as without the upholding of which, their opinion, as I conceive, is not so much as colourably to be maintained, and that to maintain the same, it be not at all necessary to induce my conclusion; and although to admit it, it may seem perhaps no good policy of argument, but rather a great disadvantage to me to admit that, without which the contrary part cannot uphold their opinion, and which being admitted cannot make any thing for me; yet because we are here not as arguers at the bar, but as judges in a high-court, and that all our ends tend to the discovery of the truth: I will therefore not only admit it, but will maintain it as well as I can.

That Custome is due by the common-law I collect, first by the name thereof, for though at this day it bee (and so hath been for more then 350 yeeres, as I shall have occasion more fully anon to open unto you) called in our law-Latin Custuma, yet in ancient time it had no other name here amongst us (for I meane not to wander into forreign-learning) then consuetudo, as may appeare by the statute of Magna Charta cap. 30. 'Per rectas et antiquas consuetudines;' for I shall anon directly prove unto you, that consuetudo in that place is not to be understood an usage, as hath been said, but in that sense which I take it. The name consuetudo in the same sense is also found in many ancient records brought into this house upon the late search. That this name then consuetudo, which implies an approved continuance without a known beginning, should by the common law be given to this revenue more then to any other revenue belonging to the king; nay, that this terme, which is the common and general name to all common and approved usages of what nature or kind soever, should be applied to this dutie rather then to any other amongst all the ancient usages and customes which the common-law imbraceth, cannot but denote the great antiquity thereof, and more then so, the allowance and approbation thereof by the common-law; for doubtlesse, if, beside the antiquity of this dutie, the common-law had not also allowed the reasonableness of it, and in a manner the necessity of it, it would never have denoted it unto us by this name of excellency above all other customes which require reasonableness as well as antiquity. Therefore doubtlesse, this duty, thus favored, is a childe of the common-law. Nay farther, it is of the very essence of a Custome to have his only beginning by allowance of the common-law; for that, which beginneth by private contract of partie, or by act of parliament, and dependeth not wholly upon the allowance of the common-law, by one of which three waies all things considerable in law have their commencements, cannot bee called or bee a custome, in name or deede. Moreover, considering that this custome is not limited to any one place within the realme, wee shall so little neede to be curious in affirming it to bee due by the common-law, as wee may boldly pronounce it to be part of the common-law itselfe. Thus you see, that the very name consuetudo proves Custome to bee a dutie by common-law. To this may bee added, that Magna Charta, cap. 30. which statute was made little more then 150 yeeres after the Conquest, termeth this not only Consuetudo, which, as I have said, implies antiquity beyond all remembrance of a beginning, but antiqua consuetudo; not onely custome, but old and ancient custome. And in comparison to this old custome due at common-law, the custome upon staple commodities, given or increased by act of parliament 3 E. 1. not printed, was called Nova Consuetudo: before the making of which statute of 3 E. 1. you may further see, that custome was due; for an. 52 H. 3. in the statute of the Exchequer, printed, you may read, that the collectors of the Custome of Wools were to yeeld their accompt twice every yeere into the Exchequer. But that, which most of all moveth me to believe that this duty was and is due by the common-law, is this; that in all cases where the common-law putteth the king to sustaine charge for the protection of the subject, it alwayes yeeldeth him out of the thing protected some gaime towards the maintenance of the charge: as, for the protection of Wards, Lunatiques and Ideots, the profits of their lands; for the maintenance of the courts of justice, it giveth him fines for purchase of originall writs, and fines pro licentia concordandi, which in supposition of law are no other then fines paid for not proceeding according to the surety by pledges put in upon purchase of the originall, and for troubling without cause the kings justices, who are maintained in their places at the kings charge. There are many the like profits of court, given by the common-law to the king for the maintenance of his charge in the administering of justice.—This observation, which might be further proved by divers other instances in things of other nature, maketh me to think, that because the common-law expecteth that the king should protect merchants in their trades, by maintaining, repairing, and fortifying the havens at home; by clearing the sea of pirates and enemies in their passage: and by maintaining ambassadors abroad to treat with forreigne princes upon all such occasions; that it also giveth him out of merchandizes exported and imported, some profit for the sustentation of this publique charge. Otherwise were the law very unreasonable and unjust. So as to prove, that by the common-law Custome is due to the king, I shall need to say no more: especially considering it hath not onely been yeelded to, but proved by those, which maintain a contrary conclusion. I will therefore proceed to my SECOND CONSIDERATION ' WHETHER that profit upon Merchandizes, which the Common-law for these respects gave unto the King, were a Duty certaine, not to be increased or inhauced at the Kings Will and Pleasure, without a common Assent in Parliament; or otherwise, whether the Common-law hath left an absolute Power in the King, to demand in this case more or lesse at his owne Pleasure, and to compell his Subjects to pay it?—The resolving of which question will, as I conceive, make an end of this controversie between us; for what are these impositions which wee complaine of other than the enhaucing of the Custome by the king's absolute pleasure?

That this duty given by the common-law, as I have proved, unto the king, was and is a Duty Certain, not to be enhauced by the king at his owne pleasure, without assent in parliament, I hope I shall be able cleerly to prove unto you: in mauteinance of which, I will use some arguments of direct prooffe, and others of great presumption and probability. And first, I lay this as a ground, which will not be denyed me by any man; THAT the common-law of England, as also all other wise lawes in the world, delight in certainty, and abandon uncertainty, as the mother of all debate and confusion, than which nothing is more odious in law:—and therefore the rule is, quod certum est retinendum est, quod incertum est dimittendum; nay further, quod incertum est nihil est. This is the censure of law upon all the acts of men, which fall under the judgment of the law. If then the law so judge of the acts of men, holding them for nought and voyde, that are uncertaine; how much more then doth the law require certainty in her own acts, which are to binde all men? And if in any of the acts of law certainty be to be specially expected, most of all is it requisite that bounds of limitation and certainty be set between the king and his poor subject, between the mighty and the weak, between the lion and the lamb. And if in any case between the king and his subject more than other this certainty be required, most of all it is requisite in cases where the common law giveth the king a perpetuall profit or revenue to be raised out of the interest and property of his poor subjects estate, either in lands or goods. If in all other things the law, as I have said, and wherein I suppose you have yeelded to me, doe require certainty and limitation, and onely in this case where it is most requisite, it hath omitted and neglected it, we must conclude the law to be most unreasonable, improvident, and contrary to it selfe; which to say, were to conclude it to be no law. Out of these grounds, I may then in my opinion safely and with some confidence deduce and maintain this position; That the common-law of England giveth to the king, as to the head of the common-wealth, no perpetuall revenue or matter of profit out of the interest or property of the subject, but it either limiteth a certainty therein at the first; or otherwise hath so provided, that if it be uncertaine in it selfe, it is reducible to a certainty onely by a legal course, that is to say, either by parliament, by judges, or jury; and not by the kings own absolute will and pleasure.—Though this position be grounded upon those sure foundations, out of which I have, as you perceive, drawn it, and needs no farther proof; yet because you shall see how plentiful the truth is in reasons to maintain it selfe, I will further open unto you the particular reasons of this position, which are these:

First, the law requireth certainty in matter of profit, between the king and the poor subject; because to make any man judge in his own case, especially the mighty over the weake, and that in a point of profit to him that judgeth, were to leate a way open to oppression and bondage.—Secondly, Because by reducing it to a certainty, the king may know what certainty to expect; that so he may order his charge accordingly.—Thirdly, That the subject may know likewise what he is to pay, that so he may know certainly what shall remaine to him as his own.—Finally, That the king may not depend upon the good will of his subject for his revenue, seeing the law expecteth he should beare the charge, but may know in certainty what to claime as due to him, and may accordingly compell the subject to pay it; and that the subject may not be under the kings absolute power to pay what the king pleaseth, which may perhaps extend to the whole value of the merchandize.

You see in generall, how the law, by requiring certainty in matter of profit between the king and the subject, preventeth many mischiefs, which would fall out if the law were otherwise; and therefore without more saying, I might here conclude, that custome, being due by the common law, was and is a sum certain, not to be increased at the kings pleasure by way of imposition. But because there are many other revenues due to the king by the common law, as well as custome; if they all, or as many as we can call to minde shall fall out to bee, as I have said, summes certaine and not subject to bee increased at the kings will, this will bee a forcible argument, that custome is likewise certain and not to be inhaunced at the kings pleasure; for, this argument drawne à simili is of great force, and the most usuall of any other in debate of things doubtfull in law. “Quæ legibus decisa non sunt, iudex ex his quæ decisa sunt statuet, et de similibus ad similia procedat.” May it please you to consider in this respect other revenues, which the common-law of this land giveth the king; and according to the rule, to decide that which is in question, by the same rule and measure, by which other things of the same nature have been decided and ordered. The common-law giveth the king a fine for the purchase of an original writ. Is it certaine? It is, and ever hath been. If the debt or damages demanded amount to above 40*l.* the fine is, and ever hath been, 6*s.* 8*d.* and no more; if to 100*l.* then 10*s.* and no more. May the king increase this fine at his pleasure? There is no man that will say he may. There is a fine due by the common-law, pro licentia concordandi. Is it not certainly known, and so hath alwayes been, to be the tenth part of the land comprised in the writ of covenant? And is not also the post-fine thereupon due certainly known to be once and a halfe as much more as the fine pro licentia concordandi, or pre-fine; as for example, when the pre-fine is 10*s.* the post-fine to be 15*s.* And can the king demand any more of the subject? So likewise, when, in a writ of right, the demandant, alleading the seisin of his ancestor, will not be compelled to prove the seisin alleaged, is he not to tender the king a somme certain of deny-mark, to have this benefit? Was it ever more or lesse? Or can it now be more, if the king would? There, amongst many others, are duties belonging to the king by the common-law from the subject, for the maintenance of his charge in the administration of justice, which the civilians call rectoral judicarium. There are also in divers other cases duties certain, belonging to the king by the common-law: as for example, the relicke for an earldome is certainly knowne to be 100*l.*, for a barony 100 markes, for a knights fee 100*s.*; all which in the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 2. are called old and ancient duties. This is rectoral patrimonial; of which sort I could produce many others, all which have like certainty. Nay, there is one duty well known to us all, which the common-law giveth to the king; and is in his nature a custome (our very case) in which the king is bound to a certainty which he cannot exceed; and that is prisage, a duty given by the common-law to the king, upon every ship-loading of wine brought into the kingdom by English merchants; and is one tun of wine before the mast, and another behinde. I am unwilling to trouble you with any more particulars of this kinde. But let any man shew me one particular to the contrary, and I will then yeeld, that my position, being false in one, may be in more: but till my position hath been in this point infringed, this general concordance of the law in all these particulars is argument enough for me, without having alleaged other reasons, to conclude, that custome being, as all these are, a revenue due to the king by the common-law, arising out of the property and interest of the subject, is, as all these are, limited and bounded by the common-law to a certainty, which the king hath not power to increase. Ubi eadem ratio, eadem lex. It may perhaps be here objected, that the ayd paid to the king upon the knighting of his eldest sonne, or marriage of his eldest daughter, was by the common-law uncertaine; and that the king did take more or lesse at his pleasure, untill he was bound to the contrary by statute. To this I make divers answers. Though it were indeed a summe uncertaine, yet the common-law did in some sort give it a limitation; for it is by a special name called Reasonable Ayd: so, as if the summe demanded doe exceed reason, it became from a Reasonable Ayd an Unjust Exaction. Beside, this revenue was a thing happening very rarely, and therefore the certainty thereof not so much regarded by the law. And yet it is to be observed, how the frame of this common-wealth could not long indure uncertainty even in this casuall revenue; but it was reduced to a certainty of 20s. upon a knights fee, and 20s. upon every 20l. socageland, by the stat. of West. 1. cap. 35. 3 Ed. 1. If in this casuall revenue they were so carefull to be at a certainty, to avoid unreasonable exactions, as the words of the statute are, how much more carefull would they have been, for the same cause, to have reduced the great and annual revenue of the custome to a certainty, if they had not thought it to have been certaine by the common-law, or limited by statute law before that time made? But, sir, that, which I rely upon for answer to this objection, is this. Reasonable ayd was and is by the common-law due as well to meane lords as to the king; but meane lords were not limited to a certainty, otherwise than in general, that it must be reasonable, as I have said. Therefore to limit the king any further, was no reason: and this answer may be given for all uncertain revenues belonging to the king, the like of which meane lords have of their tenants; for the uncertainty of which there may also be given special reason; because these duties first began by special contract and agreement between the lord and the tenant, and not directly by operation of the common-law, and so were certain and uncertein as they did at first agree. And therefore you may be pleased to remember, how in laying my position I was wary to say, That such revenues, as are due to the king as to the head of the common-wealth, (by which I purposely excluded such revenues as are common to him with other meane lords) are always certaine.

I am now according to promise, and in maintenance of a second part of my Position, to shew you, That where the common-law giveth the king a revenue not certaine at the first, that is alwayes reducible to a certainty by a legal course, as by act of parliament, judges, or jury, and not at the king's pleasure.—Every man, that by his tenure is bound to serve the king in his warres, and faileth, is to pay, according to the quantity of his tenure, a fine by the name of escuage. This cannot be assessed but in parliament. Upon Forfeitures for Treason, or otherwise, to the king, though it be a kinde of a certainty that the law giveth, in giving him all the estate of the party convict, both in goods and lands, or in goods onely, as the case is; yet for reducing it to a more expresse certainty, the law requireth, that it be found by office. Wayfe, Stray, Wreck, Treasure-Trove, and such like, are no less certaine; for the king hath the things themselves in kinde. Fines for Misdemeanors are alwayes assessed by the judges. Amercements in all cases are to be assessed by the country, and not be assessed by the king; though the forme of the judgement be, et sit in misericordia domini regis, in the king's mercy, pro contemptu predicti. Nay, though for punishment of an offence it be by statute-law enacted, that an offender shall make fine and ransom at the kings pleasure, the law even in this case, which is as strong a case as may be, will not leave the assessing of the fine to the kings pleasure, to be by him rated privately in his chamber; but it must be solemnly and legally done in an open court of justice by the judges, who in all other cases are to judge between the king and his people, where the interest or property of the subject, or any charge or burden upon them doth come in question, as may be proved by the booke of 2 R. 3. fo. 11. Inasmuch that I am of opinion, that if a statute were made, that the king might raise the customes at his pleasure, yet might it not be done as now it is, by the kings absolute power, but by some other legall course, of which the common-law doth take notice; as in the case of the fine and ransom. Much lesse then will the common-law permit, that it should depend upon the king's absolute pleasure, there being no such statute in the case.

You have heard out of what grounds I first deduced this my Position, That the law requireth certainty in matter of profit between the king and his people.—You have heard likewise the particular reasons of that Position. You have also heard what prooffe I have made by particular cases of like nature to this in question; and how I have applyed them to the point. And so leaving the judgement of the whole to your wisdomes, who can best discern whether the argument be of weight, I proceed to my Second Reason, which is drawne from the policy and frame of this common-wealth, and the providence of the common-law: the which, as it requires at the subjects hands loyalty and obedience to their soveraigne, so doth it likewise require, at the hands of the soveraigne, protection and defence of the subject against all wrongs and injuries whatsoever, offered either by one subject to another, or by the common enemy to them all, or any of them. This protection, the law considereth, cannot be without a great charge to the king; and because, as Christ saith, "no man goeth to war upon his own charge," the common-law therefore hath not only given the king great prerogatives and favours touching his own patrimony, more (I beleeve) than any other prince in the world hath; but also hath, for the sustentation of his great and necessary expences in the protection of his subjects, given him, out of the interest and property of the subject, an ample and very honorable revenue in very many particular cases, some of which I will call to your remembrance.—He receiveth out of the subjects purse for Wardships and the dependances thereupon, as we have of late accounted, about 45,000*l.* by the yeare. This is a revenue which no other king of the world hath: and as it appears by the statute of 14 E. 3. c. 1. 'It ought to be employed in maintenance of the warres.' And so doubtlesse was the first institution of the common-law; for the lord hath the profit of the wards lands to no other end, than to maintain a man in the warre during the infancy of him, who otherwise should serve in person.—He hath likewise all forfeitures upon treason and outlawry, and upon penall lawes, fines and amerciaments, profits of courts, treasure-trove, prisage, butlerage, wreck, and so many more, as the very enumeration of the particulars would take up long time. To what other end hath the common-law thus provided for the maintenance of the kings charge, by all these ways and means of raising profit out of the interest and property of the subjects estate in lands and goods, but onely to this end, that, after these duties paid, the poore subject might hold and enjoy the rest of his estate to his owne use, free and cleare from all other burdens whatsoever? To what end hath the law given a part to the king, and left the rest to the subject, if that which is left be also at the kings will, to make his profit thereof as he pleaseth? To give a small portion to him, that may at his pleasure take more or all, is a vain and an idle act; which shall never be imputed to a wise law. But it may be objected that as the revenues are ordinary, so are they by the law provided onely for the sustenting of the kings ordinary charge; and that if the law have not taken further consideration, and limited some certain course, how upon sudden and extraordinary occasions the kings charge may bee sustained, there is yet no reason shewed to the contrary, why the king may not upon such occasion take some extraordinary course for the raising of money, as by the laying of impositions upon merchandizes, or by a tax within the realme, rather than the common-wealth, for want thereof, should perish or be endangered.

And hereupon by the knight that last spake, (Sir Robert Hincham) it was held, that, Upon occasion of a sudden and unexpected war, the king may not only lay Impositions, but levy a tax within the realme, without Assent of Parliament, which Position in my opinion is very dangerous; for to admit this were by consequence to bring us into bondage. You say, that upon occasion of suddaine warre the king may levy a tax. Who shall be judge between the king and his people of the occasion? Can it be tryed by any legall course in our law? It cannot. If then the king himselfe must be the sole judge in this case, will it not follow, that the king may levie a tax at his owne pleasure, seeing his pleasure cannot be bounded by law? You see into what a mischief the admittance of one error hath drawne you. But for a full answer to the objection, I say, that the providence of the common-law is such, and so excellent, as that for the defraying of the kings charge upon any occasions of a sudden warre, it hath, over and above all the ordinary revenues which it giveth the king, which in the time of warre cannot indeed but fall short, made an excellent provision; for, sir, the warre must needs be either offensive or defensive. Offensive must either be upon some nation beyond the seas, or against the Scots, or Welsh, or other borderers within the island. If it be an offensive warre upon some nation beyond the seas, it cannot be a sudden accident; for it is the kings own act; and he may, and it is fitting he should take deliberation; and if it be a just and necessary warre, he may crave, and easily obtaine assistance of his subjects, by grant of ayd in parliament. If an offensive warre upon some of his neighbours within the continent of this island, as the Scots, or the Welsh, which also cannot be sudden or unexpected to the king, being his own act; you know, how politikeley the kings of this realme have provided, by reserving tenures, by which many of their subjects are bound to serve them in those warres in person, at their own charge. Only a defensive warre, by invasion of foreign enemies, may be sodaine: in which case the law hath not left the king to warre upon his owne expence, or to rely upon his ordinary revenue, but hath notably provided, that every subject within the land, high and low, whether he hold of the king or not, in case of foreign invasion, may be compelled at his own charge to serve the king in person, as it appears by the opinion of justice Thirning, in 7 H. 4. The reason of which, in my opinion, was to no other end, than that the king might have no pretence whatsoever for the raising of money upon his subjects at his owne pleasure, without their common assent in parliament. I doe then conclude this argument, that seeing the common-law, for maintenance of the kings ordinary charge, hath given him such an ample revenue out of the interest and property of the subject, and provided also for sodaine occasions; in so doing it hath secluded and secured the rest of the subjects estate from the kings power and pleasure; and consequently, that the king hath not power upon any occasion at his pleasure to charge the estate of his subjects by all impositions, tallages, or taxes, for I hold them in one degree, or any other burden whatsoever, without the subjects free and voluntary assent, and that in parliament. If it were otherwise, you see how it were to the utter dissolution and destruction of that politike frame and constitution of this commonwealth, which I have ordered unto you, and of that excellent wise providence of the common-law, for the preserving of property, and the avoydance of oppression.—These two arguments used by me, that of certainty, and this of the provision made by the common-law, are in my poor opinion, arguments of direct proofe, that the king cannot impose.—I will now, according to my division, urge an Argument or two of inference and presumption; the rather, because arguments of this nature have been much enforced by those, who have maintained the contrary opinion, especially by Mr. Solicitor, (Sir Francis Bacon.) I call them Arguments of Inference; and yet in my opinion, those which I shall urge, are also of good proofe. Such as they are, you shall judge of them. They are drawn, either from the actions or forbearances of the kings of this realme, or from the actions and forbearances of the people.

First, in the actions and forbearances of the kings, I observe, that all the kings of this realm since Hen. 3. have sought and obtained an increase of Custome, more or lesse, by the name of Subsidie, of the gift of their subjects in parliament. Nay, some of them, and those not the weakest in spirit, or power, but the most couragious and potent in that whole ranke, even that mighty and victorious prince, king Ed. 3, being to undertake a just and honourable warre, than which there could not happen a better or juster occasion to have made use of his prerogative of imposing, did neverthelesse at that time stoope so low in this point, that he did, in full assembly of the three states, pray his subjects to grant him a reliefe in this kinde for the maintenance of his warre, and that to endure but for a short time; and further, was well content to suffer his prayer in that behalfe to be entred of record to the memory of all posterity. And the succeeding kings have also suffered the same to be printed, as may appeare by the printed statutes at large, an. 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. Is it likely, that if any or all these kings had thought they had had in them any lawfull power by just prerogative to have laid impositions at their pleasure, they would not rather have made use of that, than have taken this course by act of parliament, so full of delay, so prejudiciall to their right, so subject to the pleasure of their people, who never undergoe burdens but with murmuring and much unwillingness? Can there be any thing more hatefull to the high spirit of a king, than to subject himselfe to the pleasure of his people, especially for matter of reliefe, and that by way of prayer, having lawfull power in his hands to relieve himselfe without being beholding to them?

If perhaps the kings themselves were ignorant of this great prerogative, which cannot be imagined; had they not alwies about them wise counsellors to assist them, and such as for the procuring of favor to themselves would not have failed to have put them in minde of it? Nay, if they had known any such lawfull prerogative, had they not been bound in conscience, so to have done? What an oversight was it of king Edw. 3, and all his counsell, so much to prejudice his right in so beneficiall a prerogative, as to suffer him upon record, and that in parliament, to pray for that, which he might have taken out of his absolute power? Can there almost be a more direct disclaiming in the right? To compare great things with lesse, if the lord by matter of record claime any thing of his villaine, it is a disclaimer of the villenage.

The kings of England have other noble and high Prerogatives. I will only name two of them, the making of warre and peace, and the raising and abasing of coyne at their pleasure. Did they ever crave the assent of their subjects in parliament to make a warre? Their advice indeed they have sometimes sought, and their ayd for treasure to maintaine it. The prerogative of raising and abasing the value of money hath been oftentimes put in practice by them, and sometimes strayned to such a height, that the king might well suppose the subjects could not but be much discontent therewith. And yet never any king of this realme did it by assent of parliament, which perhaps some one milde king among so many would have done, and it may be, would also have prayed his subjects to yield thereto, only to avoid the grudging of the people, if the seeking of assent in parliament had not been thought to have been prejudiciall to the absolute power of their successors: and yet, as for some of these kings, it may be supposed, they made little conscience to prejudice a successor in one point, that made no scruple totally to depose a predecessor from his throne, and all his regalities, and to usurp it to themselves.

And so I proceed to my next Argument of Inference drawn from the actions of our kings. Some of the kings of England, as namely Edw. 2, in the yeere of his reigne, and Edw. 3, in the 1st and 24th yeere of his reigne, as may appeare by the records here amongst us, were contented to accept an increase of their Custome "by way of loane" from the merchants, and solemnly binde themselves to repay it againe. Would any wise man in the world, that thought he had but a colour of right, so much prejudice himself, as to borrow that which he might take without leave, and binde himselfe to repay it? If a poore man perhaps through feare might be enforced so tarre to yeeld to a mighty adversary, yet that a powerful man should stoope so low to one much weaker than he; nay, that a king, in a point of such consequence, should so tarre descend from his greatnesse, as to borrow of his poore subject that, which without being beholding to him he might obtain as his right, and binde himselfe to repay it againe: I say, it cannot with any reason be imagined; but withall it must be concluded, that a king, that shall so doe, doth not thinke that he hath so much as colour of right to impose.—I will not much presse or enforce the actions of Edw. 2, who (I confesse) was but a weake prince; but as for his sonne and successor, Edw. 3, there was not, as I have said, a stouter, a wiser, a more noble and couragious prince than he, and none more careful to preserve the rights of his prerogative, as may evidently appeare by all his answers in parliament, on any complaint of the subject. Besides, never had king of this realme more occasion than he to straine this prerogative of imposing to the utmost. For besides his excessive expence in the warres of France and Ireland, he had also a continual charge of many expensive children. His wife queene Philippa had also for her maintenance a large allowance out of his revenue. But the dowry of queen Isabel his mother, who lived till about the 27th yeere of his reigne, was so great, as it is reported by some writers, that little more than the third part of the certaine revenue of the kingdome was left to him. In-somuch, as through these occasions of extraordinary expence, and the diminution of his revenue, he was driven to such necessity, as his queen in the yeere of his reigne, was enforced to pawne her crowne and jewels to procure money for him, as may appeare by the record of that yeere in the office of the clerke of the pels. Nay, the king himselfe, in these extremities, was oftentimes driven to lay his jewels to pawne for money: and in an. 17, did also pledge his crown for 1000*l.* to certaine merchants of Florence, as by the records of that yeere, in the once of the lord treasurers remembrance in the Exchequer, is manifest. By this you may see, that this powerfull king wanted not urgent and just occasion, if any occasion may be just, to have put in practice his absolute power of imposing; and yet, as you see, it appears of record, that in the midst of his great wants he tooke an increase of custome "by way of loane," and bound himselfe to repay it.

It may be here objected, that he did lay Impositions.—What impositions they were, and how to be compared with the Impositions now in question, I purpose to tell you, when I come to answer objections, which I have referred to the end of my speech. In the meane time I will goe on with my course, and urge one argument more, drawne from the actions of our kings, touching the increase of Custome.

A man would thinke, that the taking of the increase of Custome by all the kings, both one and other, with the assent of their subjects in parliament, and sometimes by way of prayer and intreaty, for a short time; nay, the taking of it by way of loane, and binding themselves to repay it; and that to have been done by the most powerfull kings, in their greatest necessities; were argument enough, that they did not beleere they might justly claime it as their right by their absolute power.—And yet is not this all; for, some of them, by name, Edw. 1, did not onely take it by assent in parliament, or "by way of loane," but (as one that buyes for his money in the market) did give for it a reall and valuable consideration, and that to merchant-strangers, of whom there was more colour to demand it as a duty, than of his naturall subjects. In prooffe of which I produce Charta Mercatoria, made anno 31 Edw. 1, whereby it is recited, that, in lieu of certaine liberties and immunities granted by the king to the merchant-strangers, as also for the release of prisage, they granted to the king an increase of custome. What were all the special liberties that were granted them, I know not, nor whether they continue. But sure I am, that by vertue of that grant they are at this day free of prisage, paying onely 2*s.* upon a tun of wine, by the name of butlerage, which they granted by the same charter; whereas Englishmen pay prisage in specie, viz. one tun before the mast, and one tun behinde.

And it is very worthy the observation, how the same king Edw. 1, in the same yeere of his reign did command his customers throughout England, that, whereas certain English merchants were, as he was informed, of their own accords willing to pay him the like increase of custome which the merchant strangers had granted unto him, so as they might enjoy the like liberties and benefits; nevertheless they should not compell such English merchants, against their wils, to pay it. The words are worth the hearing. Cum quidam mercatores de regno et potestate nostri, ut ipsi dicitis libertat. (having before recited Charta Mercatoria) uti et gaudere, et de prisas nostris quiesse possint, præstationes et custumas hujusmodi, de bonis et mercandizis suis, nobis dare et solvere velint, ut accepimus; assignavimus vos ad præstationes et custumas illas gratis, his, qui præstationes et custumas illas gratis et absque coercione solvere voluerint, colligendum, et ad opus nostrum recipiendum; ita tamen quod aliquem mercatorem de dicto regno nostro ad hujusmodi præstationes et custumas nobis invite solvendum nullatenus distringatis.—What stronger inference can there almost possibly be against the kings absolute power of Imposing, than this: that he was contented, and so specified to all his officers of the ports, that if the merchants did of their own accords pay more than their ancient customes, they should have consideration for it; but if they themselves were not willing to pay more, then they should not be compelled thereunto?

One other Observation I draw from the actions of the kings touching the increase of their Custome, which is this, that those kings, which did lay Impositions (which as I will shew you by and by, was very rarely; though it were never but in time of great necessity, and but to endure for a short time; yet they alwayes did it, not with the advice alone of the merchants, as at this day, but the merchants did alwayes solemnly grant an increase of Custome; and the kings were alwayes wary, for the better justification of their actions to the people, in their commissions for colling of custome, to recite not onely the great necessity which moved them to take an increase of custome, but also the Grant of the Merchants, as may appeare by the records, of which we have the copies amongst us. I dare confidently say, there is not above one or two at the most that are otherwise, if the impositions be of that nature, which these are of which we can please; and yet these impositions also, by the Grant of Merchants, though raised upon a necessity great a necessitie of state, and to indure but for a short time, were always complained of by the commons, when they met in parliament, as may appeare amongst other records, by the parliament roll of 27 Edw. 3, No. 27, where in a petition of the commons, exhibited to the king in parliament, are these words: 'Les Commons monstrent, coment que les marchants ayent grant per eux, sans assent de parliament, un subsidie de xls. de sacc. de layn, outre le droiturel maletout de demy marke; et prion que soit amend a cest parliament; car est encounter reason, que le cominaltie de lour biens soient per marchants charges.' Which I English thus: 'The commons shew, how the merchants have granted by themselves, without assent of parliament, a subsidie of 40s. upon a sack of wooll, over and above the rightful custome of halfe a marke; and pray that it may be redressed at this parliament; for it is against reason that the commonalty should be charged in their goods by merchants.' With this agreeth the printed statute of 36 Edw. 3, cap. 11, in the Statutes at Large, where you shall finde an expresse provision against the raising of Impositions upon Wools, by Grant of Merchants; in which petition I doe observe, that the parliament in those dayes did distinguish, even as we now doe, between Impositions laid by act of parliament, and Impositions laid only by the grant of merchants, acknowledging that Impositions laid by parliament only are lawfull, and condemning all other as unlawfull; for otherwise why should they tearne the demy-marke, which was laid by act of parliament, 3 Edw. 1, (Droiturel maletout) a lawfull Imposition, but with relation to the unlawfulness of these Impositions granted by merchants, which they then did complaine of? Besides, I observe that they say, that it is against reason, that merchants should by their grant, without assent in parliament, charge the whole commonalty; by which it plainly appears, that they complained not so much of the excess or greatness of the impositions, as of the unlawfull manner of the raising of it by grant of merchants, without assent in parliament.*

Hitherto I have, according to my division, drawn arguments from that which our kings have done, and put in practise for the increase of their custome.—I will now make some observations of their forbearance to put this pretended power in practice, considering the severall occasions of the times, which I will prosecute in order.

* As to Voluntary Subscriptions for Defence of the State, see Lord Hardwicke's speech in passing sentence on Lord Kilmarnock and others. Lords Journals, Aug. 1, 1746; Comm. Journ. Ap. 2, 1778; King's Speech and Debates thereon in Parl. History, Dec. 5, 1782, 3 Hats. Prec. 71, 72; See also H. 13. Car. 2. c. 4. § 5, and Rex v. Hendley and others, 1719.

First therefore in general, I observe, that from the Conquest, until the reign of queen Mary, being no lesse then 480 yeeres space, whatsoever the occasions were, whatsoever the disposition of the kings were, yet in the practise of this pretended prerogative of imposing the kings have been so sparing, as, notwithstanding this curious search that hath been made, wherein I suppose nothing that might make for the clearing of the question hath escaped us, it cannot be found or proved by matter of record, that six impositions, such as we now complaine of, were laid by all those kings, who were in number 22. And those six, if they were so many, though they were unlawfull, yet were they in some sort to be born withall. First, by reason they were very moderate. Secondly, that they were laid in the times of great and apparent necessitie, and that they were to endure but for a yeer or two; for none of them, except onely that upon wine, laid 16 E. 1, lasted longer. They were, I say, notwithstanding their unlawfulness, yet in these other respects so farre to be borne withall, as, if the impositions which are now laid had been so qualified, we should, I suppose, never have complained of them. And yet not one of these few impositions laid in former times, but was complained of, and upon complaint taken away, as may appear by the records here amongst us. How much more reason is there then, that we should expect the like justice now; considering that not one merchandise alone, as then, but very neere all the sorts and severall kindes of merchandises that are, are charged; that not a moderate and easy charge is laid upon them, but such, as though we should confesse his majesties absolute power to lay what he list, yet we had just cause to complain of the excessiveness of the burden? For first, the rates of merchandises, for the subsidies of poundage and tonnage, are extremely rayed, a thing also though lawfull, yet hath been rarely put in practise. Then comes the impost upon the back of that, and is as much as the subsidie it selfe is. In some few merchandises, 'tis true, the impost is perhaps lesse then the subsidie; but 'tis as true, that in divers others the impost is farre more. Besides, these impositions were not laid in the time of warre, but even then when we were at pence with all the world, except perhaps there were some sparks of rebellion in Ireland, then not fully quenched. Lastly, these impositions are not, as those in former times were, limited to endure for a yeere or two, but are to come to his majestie, his heirs and successors for ever, as may appear by his majesties letters patents in print, prefixed before the new book of rates. So as if those few impositions laid in former times had been lawfull, yet can they not by any means be a warrant or president for our present impositions, differing so far from them in all these points of consequence. But if even those few, so qualified as they were, were complained of and taken away, what shall we then say of ours, so farre exceeding them in all the degrees of irregularitie? Besides, if so few presidents, as five or six in so many yeeres space, and those in times of so great necessitie, without any expresse judgment in law, or good authoritie in approbation of them, but accompanied with as many complaints against them, be argument enough to prove the lawfulness of the act, I dare undertake, that as well taxes within the land, as impositions upon merchandizes, may be proved to be lawfull. But to alledge the acts of kings, in raising a profit to themselves upon their subjects, to prove thereby their right, is of all other arguments, that are, the weakest. And so I leave it, and call to minde, that when I told you, it could not be proved by the records amongst us, that from the Conquest to queen Mariés time, there had been any more than six impositions laid; I did in that number limit my selfe to such impositions as those are which we now complain of; for I must confesse, that in that space, many more impositions were laid, but they were of a farre differing nature from ours; differing, I say, not only in those circumstances by which I did even now compare the impositions of these times to those five or six of former ages, but in very essence and propertie, insonmuch as they may not properly be called impositions. And yet the frequent practise of them hath been objected and relyed upon, as so many presidents, to prove the lawfulness of the impositions now complained of. It behoveth me therefore, that in maintenance of my assertion, that so few impositions have been laid, as I have affirmed, that I open unto you the difference betwene the one and the other, which being done, your selves will easily judge, that the greater part make nothing towards the defence of these present impositions. For these impositions, which now are in question, are no other then an increase of custome at the kings pleasure, and commaunded by him to be taken, the passage being free and open to all men. Those other, which make such a great shew in number, and are produced as so many presidents in maintenance of these, are no other then so many dispensations or licences for money, to passe with merchandizes prohibited by act of parliament to be exported; as will evidently appeare by comparing the times, and examining the statutes. I will therefore in this place, as shortly as I can, runne over those presidents, that have been, or may be alledged by the contrary part, out of those records which are here amongst us, and leave it to your judgement, whether I maintaine my assertion, or be not rather better then my word for the number.

The first Imposition by them alledged, [Flem. Clark, Doderidge] is that of 16 Edw. 1, which, as it appears by the record, was 4 shillings upon a tun of wine. This indeed, for aught I know to the contrary, was a meere imposition, such as are now in question. And yet if I did deny it, and say that it was layd by assent of parliament, I know not how the contrary could be proved; for though indeed the words of the record are, 'cum rex precepisset, ut de singulis doliis vini caperentur 4 solidi,' it follows not that it was laid therefore only by the kings commandment; for we see that even some acts of parliament, in those auncient times, though they were made by the full assent of all the three estates, yet they have these words in their preambles, rex precepit, rex vult. But as for recitalls of acts of parliament by the king, in his commissions, and otherwise, it was in those times usual to say, cum nuper ordinaverimus; and therefore notwithstanding the recitall be, cum nuper rex precepisset, it is no cleere proof, that therefore it was done onely by the kings commandment. Nevertheless I will, I say, admit this to be a meere imposition, and to be one of the number; and indeed, as this is the first they produce, so is it their best. Only this, amongst all the rest, is not limited to indure for a time certain. But give me leave, I beseech you, to open unto you, with what circumstances this imposition was accompanied, and what followed of it; and then I will leave you to judge, who best are able, how far the present impositions may be justified by this.

The first circumstance to be observed in this Imposition is, that it was laid immediately after the warre against Wales was ended, and at the time, when for the selling of the estate of Gascoigne, the king himself was in person enforced to undertake a voyage thither, as may appeare by our histories of those times, which also may be collected by the very words of the record, which are these, 'cum rex ante ultimum recessum suum ab Anglia precepisset, &c.' That as these times were troublesome, they were also very chargeable to the king, and did put him to try all means for the leyving of money, I shall not need to urge it: it cannot be otherwise.—One other circumstance is this, that this Imposition laid in this time of great necessity was not, as now, upon all merchandizes, nor so much as in generall upon one kind of merchandize, coming from all the parts of the world, but onely upon such wines as were brought hither from two towns in Gascoigne, Bergerac and St. Emilians, as may appear by the records; [16 E. 1. 22 E. 1, in Scaccario.] and it is probable that these towns were then in revolt, and that the sooner to reduce them to obedience, the king laid this burden upon their commodities, thereby to hinder the vent of them.—Another circumstance is this, that though that this imposition were indeed laid without limitation of any time, as touching the continuance thereof, yet within six years following, viz. 5 Dec. a. 22, upon complaint of the merchants the king released two shillings of the foure shillings, as may appear by the records of 22 E. 1, with which the merchants not holding themselves contented, the very same yeare within eight or nine months following, viz. 23 Jun. an. 22, the whole imposition was released, as may appeare by a recitall in the account of our William

Randall, receiver of the impost money, entred an. 26 E. 1. And within three years after the release, viz. an. 25, there followed an act of parliament against all impositions in generall, as when I come to shew you what statutes there are, in the point, I shall I hope cleerly prove unto you. In the meane time I will proceed to examine the rest.

The next precedent urged is an imposition of 40 shillings upon a sack of wooll laid by E. 1. an. 21. For the prooffe of which, a record of the Exchequer of that year hath been vouched. I must confesse I have not seen that record. But by another record of the same court, an. 26 E. 1, it is evident, that the said imposition was not raised by the kings absolute power, but by grant, and that also the same was in the time of warre, and to endure but two or three years, if the warre should so long continue, as will best appear by the words of the record. 'Cum custuma 40s. nobis, in subsidium guerræ nostræ contra regem Franciæ, de quolibet sacco lanæ exeunte regnum nostrum, percipiendum per biennium vel triennium si tantum durasset guerra illa, nuper concess. fuit, &c.'

By this you perceive, by what means, upon what occasion, and with what limitation this Imposition was laid. If you will further know, what followed of it, may it please you to read the printed statute of 21 E. 1, c. 7, where it is said, that the more part of the commonality found themselves sore agreeved therewithall; and by the same statute, not only that imposition of 40 shillings upon a sack of wooll, which was the occasion of the great grief and complaint, was taken away; but upon occasion thereof, there was at the same time provision also made against all other impositions whatsoever, as, I say, I hope I shall anon cleerly prove unto you. Inasmuch as this imposition of 40 shillings upon a sack of wooll ought to be so farre from being urged as a president for the present imposition, and consequently of the grievance of the commonwealth which followes thereupon, as that rather on the contrary part it may be thought to be the happiest accident in the consequence thereof, that ever befell the commonwealth in this kinde. For it was the occasion of the making of the first law that ever was made against impositions, and other charges and burdens of that nature to be imposed by the kings absolute power without assent of parliament.

And so I leave their second precedent, and come to the third, which in time was 31 of the same king E. 1. [Vouched by Fleming, Clark, Dodderidge, Bacon, Attorney Hobart.] It is no other then that increase of Custome, which by the merchant strangers was granted to king Ed. 1. by that charter now familiarly known unto us by the name of Charta Mercatoria, which, by all that have maintained his majesties right to impose, hath been stood upon and urged, as an imposition by the kings absolute power; but more especially by master Solicitor hath been strongly inforced with all the advantage possible for the maintenance of his opinion. Nevertheless I doubt not but I shall give it a very full answer, such as yet this objection hath not received, though divers, that have spoken before, and some this day, have undertaken to cleere it; wherein I will arrogate nothing to my selfe, but leave it wholly to your censure. It hath been said by master Solicitor, that though this increase of custome may seem to some, to proceed from the grant of merchants, yet that this grant of theirs was to no other purpose, nor had other effect, then only thereby to declare their assent; for that, those which did grant were no corporation or body in the estimation of law, and so could not binde any but themselves alone, and not such as should succeed them; and that it was only the authority of the kings pleasure to accept and take this increase of custome, that gave it life at the first, and strength to continue as an imposition till this very day. For 'even at this day, saith he, the three-pence upon the pound, granted by the said charter, is paid by the merchant strangers, and they likewise enjoy some priviledges granted by the said charter.' And it was further by him observed; that notwithstanding all the statutes that have been urged against impositions, yet this imposition hath continually stood, and hath never been denyed to be paid by any man; and that therefore it is likely that no man till now ever conceived, that these statutes were made against impositions upon merchandizes, but were rather to be understood to extend onely to impositions within the realme.

To this Objection I make this answer, that it is indeed true, that the grant of merchants in this case, cannot binde the whole commonwealth; as I have heretofore proved by the petition exhibited in parliament by the commons 27 Ed. 3. No. 27. and by a statute of 36 Ed. 3. c. 11. And therefore I cannot but confesse, that this increase of custome may very truly be called an imposition; for that indeed it did at first take strength, onely by the kings pleasure to accept it, as hath been said, and not by the grant of the merchants. Admitting it therefore to be a meer imposition; let us consider with what extraordinary circumstances it is accompanied.—First, as you may perceive by the Record itself, and as it hath partly been said already, the king took it not without yeelding recompence for it; for the merchants strangers, by submitting themselves unto this charge, obtained divers liberties and immunities from the king, by the same charter, amongst which freedome from prisage is one which at this day they enjoy, in which respect this imposition is in some sort tollerable, though not at all lawfull.—Another considerable circumstance, and difference from our present Impositions, is this, that it was a composition made by the king with merchant strangers, which, though it be by strictnesse of our common law, not of force to binde in perpetuite; yet how farre by the civil law this doth binde strangers, which are governed by these lawes, is not so easily decided; and this may be a good colour to uphold it.

These special reasons, though they may well serve the turne, to make an evident difference betwixt this and our present impositions, and so consequently to avoid the conclusion drawn from the president, and may also seem colourable, and particular reasons to uphold the imposition itself; yet is not this that, which I mean to relie upon for answer. For even this imposition, in recompence of which the king parted with so large priviledges and benefits, and which, because it concerned only merchant strangers, did neither in the burden thereof, nor in the president, so directly touch the English; yet in the detestation, as it seems, of all impositions, of what nature or kinde soever, and upon what pretext or colour soever they were grounded, I say, even this imposition also was complained of in parliament within few yeeres following; and upon complaint, taken away, as may appear by the Close Roll of 3 Ed. 2, mem. 23, where you shall finde inrolled a Supersedes, commanding, that the new custome, granted by the merchant strangers, reciting the particulars as they are contained in Charta Mercatoria, shall cease at the king's pleasure; and this is there said to be yeilded to at the request of the commons, which cannot be but in parliament. But because the renewing of it again rested at the kings pleasure, therefore, within two yeeres after, by a publicke ordinance made by the principall prelates, earles, and barons and other great men of the kingdome, authorised by the king's commission, dated the 16th of May, the same third yeere of his reigne, the charter itselfe was declared to be utterly void; for that it was hurtfull to the commowealth, against Magna Charta, and made without assent in parliament. And not only that charter, but all other new customes or impositions whatsoever, imposed since the coronation of Ed. 1. will that time, were also taken away, saving onely the old custome upon wool, woolfels, and leather. And further it was ordained, that if any man should presume to take any more then the auncient custom rightfully due, and should be thereof convict, he should answer to the partie greeved his costs and damages, be imprisoned according to the quantitie of his offence, and be further punished as an offender against Magna Charta, according to the discretion of the justices. Ro. ordinationum 5 Ed. 2. in the Tower.

Though the force and authoritie of this Ordinance may perhaps be doubted and blemished; because it was made by the barons, at the time when they had the better hand of the king, as hath been in part objected? yet you see, that they deliver not their censures, without alledging also their reasons; and this their ordinance is no more in effect, then that which was thought fit by all the commons in the parliament of 5 Ed. 2. before mentioned.

But it hath been yet further said, that notwithstanding this Ordinance, the Imposition doth nevertheless continue in force, and is at this day paid by the merchant strangers, and that therefore in likelyhood the ordinance prevailed not against it. 'Tis true, that at this day the merchant stranger doth pay three pence more in the pound for subsidie of poundage, then the English doth, and that by vertue of Charta Mercatoria. But let me tell you, that Charta Mercatoria in it selfe had not strength and vertue sufficient to subsist for so long a time. It was, as I have said, suspended by the king himselfe an. 3, condemned by the ordinance of 5 E. 2. and had at this day been of no more force, then it was all the time after 3 Ed. 2. that is, of none at all, had it not been confirmed by act of parliament an. 36 Ed. 3. cap. . This was onely that which protected Charta Mercatoria against all those statutes made against impositions, and that hath kept it in life till this day; and this indeed, I mean an act of parliament, is the only means, that our law acknowledgeth, for the laying or establishing of impositions, and without which they cannot long last.

You have now heard opened three of those six presidents, which are most relied upon for maintenance of these present impositions, which are all that have been urged, or can be found to have been practised from the conquest till the reigne of Ed. 3, during which time there are, as you see, as many publique acts in opposition of them, which are of so much the more force, in that they are the legall regular acts of great counsellis; whereas, on the contrary part, those three impositions were the acts of powerfull kings wills, in the times of extream necessity. As for Ed. 2, his successor, there hath not been one imposition alledged to have been laid by him of one kinde or other. Nay, all the records touching this business found in his time, being onely foure, make directly against them.—The first is anno 3. which was (as you have heard) a release at the kings will, upon complaint of the commons, of the impositions raised by Charta Mercatoria.—The second was the Ordinance made an. 5. declaring Charta Mercatoria and all other impositions to be void, and inflicting punishment upon such as should demand any.—The third was an. 11, which is a supersedeas to discharge certain commodities from yeilding an increase of custome granted by merchants by way of loane, which in great probability the king would never have released, but upon complaint. The rather I think so, because, as the record recites, it was granted in a time of great necessity. The fourth is an. 12, and is much of the same nature, the recitall of which contains some very observable things, which I will open unto you. It shews first in very effectuall words the greatnesse of the kings wants, and the causes thereof. The words are, 'Cum 'pro expeditione guerræ nostræ Scotiæ, et 'aliis arduis necessitatibus nobis multipliciter 'incumbentibus, pro quarum exoneratione 'quasi infinitam pecuniam profundere oportebit, pecunia plurimum indigemus in presenti; ac insuper, pro eo quod exitus regni et ‘terræ nostræ, simul cum pecunia nobis in subventionem præmissorum tam per clericum quam per communitatem regni nostri concessa ad sumptus predictos cum festinatione, qua expedit, faciend. non sufficiunt.’ Here was cause, if any cause may possibly be just, for the king presently to put in practise his prerogative of impositions. His expence by reason of a necessary warre in Scotland was so great, as the whole revenue of the kingdom, together with an ayd which had been lately granted him, could not with that expedition that was requisite supply his present want. Doth hee for all this make use of his prerogative of imposing? Or doth hee hastily, for want of advised proceedings, take some other course prejudiciall to his right? No. The record further sayes, that he enquired by all wayes and meanes, how he might most commodiously and fitly levy money for these occasions. After which advised deliberation, the course at last resolved upon was, not by absolute power to lay impositions, which of all other courses, if it had been lawfull, had been the most speedy and beneficiall. but a course more justifiable; which was, that merchants should be called together, and that they should be intreated to lend the king upon every sack of wool 10s. and upon every last of leather 5s. above the ancient custome; and that for their security of true repayment, without fiction or delay, which are the words of the record, whereby it seems that onely a pretence of a loane and repayment had been before that time used to colour impositions, commandment should be given to the customers to certifie into the Exchequer the names of every particular merchant that should so lend unto the king, that they might accordingly receive full satisfaction. And ’tis worth the observing, that this loane was for no longer time, then from April, till October following. Thus much is warranted by the record. So as you see, that in all this time of this king Ed. 3. impositions were not only altogether forborn even in the times of his greatest necessity, but they were also condemned as unjust and utterly unlawfull.

We come now to the reigne of king Ed. 3. in whose time there was no practice or meanes, that by the policy of man could be thought on to bring the people under this yoke of Impositions without assent of parliament, but it was by him attempted: insomuch, as I have in my observation out of the records collected no lesse then five or six severall waies, all of them very colourable, which in his time were put in practice for the raising of impositions; and yet none of them but was resisted by parliament and condemned.—That which was most usuall with him was, that merchants should grant to pay him so much upon every commodity exported or imported by way of increase of Custome. This seems not unreasonable, for that every man might grant of his own what he listed; and this also, to make it more colourable, was never attempted but in the time of warre. And yet, as it hath been partly said already, this was always held unlawful, as may appeare by the record of 17 E. 3. [No. 27. Ro. Parl.] where the commons in parliament say, that it is a great mischiefe, and against reason, that they should be enforced to pay the deerer for commodities, by reason of a charge upon merchandizes, by the grant of merchants, the which is a charge to the people, though none to the merchant. Anno 25 Edw. 3. [No. 22, Ro. Parl.] the commons reciting, That Whereas merchants have granted a new increase of Custome to the king, pray, that commissions to collect such new increase of custome by singular grant of merchants be not awarded. Anno 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11. amongst the printed statutes, grants of subsidies upon wools by merchants without assent of parliament are declared to be void, which act was made upon a petition of the commons in anno 36 Ed. 3. [No. 26. Ro. Parl.] desiring a law to be made to the same effect. If impositions raised by the grant of merchants, which I suppose to have been by some publicke and solemn instrument, under the hands and seals of the principall merchants of all the great towne of England, being called together for that purpose, were not of force in this behalf, much lesse was their bare assent without any such solemnity, which also was a course in practise in the days of Ed. 3. and was also used in the laying of these present impositions, which wee now complaine of.

Another meanes of raising Impositions used by Ed. 3. was by way of Dispensation for money with some statute in force, which restrained the passage of merchants. Most of his impositions of one kinde or other, laid after 11 E. 3. were of this nature. For anno 11. cap. 1. amongst the printed statutes, you shall find it enacted, ‘that no man upon paine of death, lesse of lands and goods, should export wools.’ Immediately after the making of this statute, impositions by way of dispensations for money came to be so frequent and burdensome, that the very yeere following the king, being in person to undertake a warre in Scotland, and for the raising of treasure having laid heavy impositions in this kinde, which he perceived to be very burdensome to the people, he wrote to the arch-bishop of Canterbury. His letter is extant upon record, [12 E. 3. No. 22. Ro. Aleman.] to this effect; ‘That where- as the people were much burdened with divers charges, tallages, and impositions, which he could not mention but with much greet, but being enforced by inevitable necessity could not as yet ease the people of them, he required the arch-bishop to exhort the people patiently and humbly to bear the burden for a while, and to excuse him towards the people, hoping he should ere long recompence his said people, and give them comfort in due time.’ His necessities were neverthelesse so great, and this meanes of raising money was so colourable, seeing no man was compelled to pay, that did not himself desire to be dispensed with, for the breach of a penal law, by which his life, goods, and lands were forfeited, as he spared not to lay on load in this kinde; insomuch as you shall finde, that in an. 13. [Ed. 3. Orig. de Scac. Ro. 3. & 12.] he took for dispensations to passe onely to Antwerp of Englishmen 40 shillings upon a sack of wool, 40 stillings upon 300 woollfells, and 4*l.* upon a last of leather; of strangers 3*l.* upon a sack of wool, 3*l.* upon 300 woollfells, and 6*l.* for a last of leather; whereas the ancient and due custome was no more then 6*s.* upon a sack of wooll, the like upon 300 woollfells, and 1*s.* 4*d.* upon a last of leather. Immediately hereupon, even this very yeere, was this complained of in parliament, and a petition exhibited by the lords and commons, [No. 5. Ro. Parliam.] that it might be enacted, that this maletolt or imposition, because it was taken without assent of parliament, might be taken away, and that a law might be made, that no such charge might be laid, but by assent of parliament. And they further prayed, that they might have a charter under the great seal, confirmed and enrolled in parliament, to the same effect, which was performed the next parliament, as may appeare by the statutes printed, where, an. 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. you shall see an act of parliament to this effect, and that a most effectual one. And immediately after, follows the charter to the same effect, of both which I shall have more occasion to speak hereafter. But such were the king's wants, that, even in the mean time between the petition and the making of the act, he could not forbear to raise money by this means; for in an. 14 Ed. 3. [Ro. 3. Orig. de Scac.] the eleventh day of March, in the end of which month the next parliament began, as may appeare by the preamble to the statutes of that parliament, he tooke by way of dispensation 40*s.* upon a sack of wooll, when it should be safely landed at Bruxells, and 40*s.* at the port within England, which was indeed an intolerable charge. But the better to colour it, the king, in his commissions for collection thereof, pretended, that the merchants had been humble suiters to him, that the passage for woolls might be open till Whitsontide following; and that to obtaine the same, they had of their free wills offered to give him the said summes, as may appeare by the recital in the beginning of the said record.

In further prevention of this mischief, in an act of parliament printed, made an. 27 Ed. 3. cap. 2. there was a speciall provision made against all licenses to transport. Nevertheless, as it may be collected by a record of the same yeere, (Orig. de Scac. 27. E. 3. Ro. 7.) the king raised 40*s.* upon a sack of wooll, 40*s.* upon 300 woollfells, and 4*l.* upon a last of leather, by the same means, I meane by way of dispensation. For though indeed it be recited to be granted by merchants, yet was it no otherwise granted by them, then for licenses to transport; for at that time the staple of wooll was in England, as may appeare by the printed statute of 27 Ed. 3. cap. 1 and 2.

vation in generall, that, whereas in some other of the records of Ed. 3 there is mention made of Impositions upon Woolls granted by merchants, because the passage of woolls was in those daies so often restrained by statute, as may appeare by very many printed statutes of that time, it is very likely, that these grants of merchants were also for dispensations to transport, as appeares that this of 27 was; (Yet you shall finde an act of parliament for free passage an. 15 Ed. 3.) and it may well be that some of the statutes, being but temporary, were not committed to the presse. This kinde of imposition, by way of dispensation, I finde not to have been at all practised from 27 till 39, where without any colouring of the matter, with pretence of the grant or gut of merchants, or any recital of suite made by merchants to have the passage open, as usually in former times, but plainly and aptly, the king recites, [39 Ed. 3. Ro. 2. Orig. Scac.] 'That Whereas English merchants were by act of parliament restrained to transport woolls, neverthelesse, upon advice with his counsell, he thought fit to give leave that such as would might transport woolls, paying 46 shillings 3 pence upon a sacke, which the king commandeth to be levied.'—This Imposition lasted a very little while; for the next parliament following, the subjects granted to the king a subsidie upon woolls, woollfells, and leather, to endure for a very short time. And yet, as it appears by the words of the record, the king doth thank his people for it, 'with all his heart.' At which time, for the maintenance of his warres in Scotland, he obtaineth the continuance thereof for two yeeres, at the end of which two yeeres he further obtaineth in parliament a continuance of the same from Michaelmas following, for three yeeres, for the supplie of treasure for the warre. [43 Ed. 3. 9 & 10 Ro. Parl.] Two yeeres following, viz. in an. 45, [Num. 42, Rol. Parliam.] the commons doubting, as it seemeth, that the king had secretly concluded to increase, by way of imposition, this subsidie, which was yeilded to in parliament, and granted for three yeeres, made a conditionall petition, that if any imposition be laid upon woolls, wooll-fells, or leather more then the subsidie granted in parliament, that it may be taken away. The king answereth, that if any be laid since the statute, it shall be taken away; and then follows the printed statute, an. 45 Ed. 3. cap. 4. 'That no Impositions be laid upon woolls, wooll-fells, or leather;' which is the first place where I finde Impositions named in our printed books. I finde them first named upon my Latine record, 12 Ed. 3, in the kings letter to the archbishop; and first upon my record in French, not printed, an. 21 Ed. 3. Num. 16. Ro. Parliament.

But to proceed. About a yeere following this parliament of 45; neere which time the subsidie granted an. 43 for three yeeres was expired, there was another subsidie of forty three shillings foure pence upon a sack of wooll, as much upon twelve score wooll-fells, and five pounds upon a last of leather, above the ancient customes, granted in parliament, [46 Ed. 3. No. 10. Ro. Parl.] for the maintenance of the warre in Guyen, to endure for two yeeres; for which, the king likewise gave thanks.

The next yeere following, [47 Ed. 3. No. 12. Ro. Parl.] the subsidie granted the last parliament, was continued from Michaelmas for a yeere without any condition, and for the next yeere upon condition, amongst other things, that no imposition be laid during the two yeeres, and that the money levied be employed upon the warres. In the next yeere following, [48 E. 3. Ho. 2. Orig. de Scac.] the king took, us by the grant of merchants, upon a sack of wool, of denizens fifty shillings, and of strangers foure marks; upon 210 wooll-fells, of denizens fifty shillings, and of strangers foure marks; and upon every last of leather, of denizens five pounds, and of strangers eight marks. Though this record pretendeth nothing but the grant of merchants, yet it is upon the matter no other than a dispensation for so much money; for, at this time, the passage was not open, other than to Callice, where the staple then was, as may appeare by the two records of 38 Ed. 3. Ro. Parl. et 50 Ed. 3. Num. 24. And yet you may see, how hatefull even these impositions by way of dispensation, which are farre more tollerable then our present impositions, were in those dayes. For within two yeeres following, [50 Ed. 3. Nu. 17, 18, 19, Ro. Parl.] one Richard Lions, farmer of the customs, among other things laid to his charge, was accused in parliament for setting or procuring to be set new impositions, not shewing of what nature, without assent of parliament, and was adjudged to forfeit his goods and lands. [Ro. Parl.] But more particularly the lord Latymer, lord chamberlain of England, was expressly accused, that he combined with Richard Lions and others, who for their own profit had procured and counselled the king to grant many licences for the transporting of great quantities of wool beyond the seas, other then to the staple at Callice, against divers ordinances and commandements to the contrary, and had put upon woolls and wooll-fells new impositions. Here you see, that the device of dispensations for money had the name of an imposition in those dayes, though indeed it be not in its nature a meere imposition, or at least not such a one as those are which we complain of: but such as it was, you see how from time to time it hath beene condemned, and how it is reckoned up amongst the most hainous faults of those two great offenders, who, though perhaps they were condemned also for other offences, yet the laying of these to their charge did shew the great hate generally conceived against impositions of this kinde. I might here further adde in prooffe of the invalidity of these dispensations, that certain merchants, having obtained some of these, and having also the advantage of the king's proclamation to dispense with the statute which restrained their passage, yet they never thought themselves secure from this punishment of the statute, till they were provided for by act of parliament, as may appeare by a statute printed anno 35 Ed. 3. cap. 21. To alledge therefore any of this kind, thereby to prove the lawfulness of ours, cannot but argue a weak cause.—For first, as I have said, there is farre more reason and colour for these, then for ours; for in this case no man was compelled to pay, that did it not to avoide a greater mischiefe; for by paying the imposition, he was free from a grievous punishment for breach of a penall law which restrained his passage; whereas in our case a charge is laid upon him for exercising his lawful trade, where no statute law or common law is to the contrary, but rather both the one and the other make for him.

But it may bee here objected, that the king may lawfully restraine, the breach of which restraint is a contempt and against law, and that to impose doth imply a restraint upon a penalty. Suppose it were so, yet, if in case where the restraint is not onely by the king, but the whole estate assembled in parliament, for some urgent cause, it be unlawful to give license for money, as you perceive it is, how much more is it so, where the restraint is for no other purpose then to raise an imposition, as in our case? But of this more largely hereafter.

Another device of raising impositions without assent of the commons in parliament, practised by Ed. 3. was by way of Ordinance, which indeed is in the next degree of strength unto a statute. For it is a constitution made by the king himselfe, and all the prelates, earls, and barons, not at the counsell table, or in the kings chamber, but sitting solemnly in parliament, and hath also the like solemnity of inrollement that a statute hath, onely it is enrolled in a roll by itselfe, which hath the name of the roll of the ordinances. But the only essentiall difference between this and an act of parliament is, that this hath not the assent of the commons.

Some Ordinances have had that estimation amongst us, that they have at this day the force of statutes; as the ordinance of Merton, made 20 Hen. 3. which, though it were no other then an ordinance made by the king, the prelates, earls, and barons, without assent of the commons, yet hath it by continuance of time gotten not onely the strength, but the name also of a statute. There be some others of this nature, and we finde it usuall, that the names of statutes and ordinances have been indifferently and confusedly used to expresse the one or the other. So as there was not any other more probable devise or invention to have brought the people under the yoake of imposition, without their own assent, then was this, by the way of ordinance. Nay, to adde yet a further strength to this high authority of an ordinance in parliament, the assent also of merchants was usually joyned therewithall, to make it have the clearer passage with the subject; and further, it was never but in the time of warre.

The first imposition of this kinde by way of ordinance, which I finde amongst the records, was 7 E. 3. amongst the originals of the Exchequer, where it is said by way of recital, that the king considering how merchants, which make great gaue by trading, ought as well as others to assist him with treasure for his warre, especially considering how at their intreaty he had placed the staple in England; therefore at his parliament held at Yorke, by the prelates earls and barons it was ordained, that the merchants should yield unto the king a subsidie upon merchandizes. This subsidie or rather imposition thus solemnly ordained, and in the times of so great necessity, was no sooner established then revoked, as may appear by the words immediately following in the same record, whereupon the merchants of their own accords yielded, and freely gave 10s. upon a sack of wool, as much upon 300 woolfills, and 20s. upon a last of leather, for a short time, by way of dispensation or licence, towards the maintenance of the warre.

The like is found anno 20 E. 3. [Nu. 18. Ro. Parl.] where the commons complaining of an imposition of this kinde, laid by the prelates earls and barons in parliament, and by the agreement also of merchants, it was not denied unto them, but that their suit was just. Onely it was answered them, that as yet it was not convenient to take it away; for that the king had taken up great summes of money of divers merchants, for his present necessity, to be repayed out of the said subsidie, and therefore it could not be as yet discharged without great damage to the king and the merchants. But the most materiall record, against impositions by way of ordinance, is the yeere following, where the king, in excuse of impositions complained of, answereth that they were laid in times of great necessity, 'and by the assent of the prelates, earles, and barons, and other great men, and some of the commons, then present; nevertheless his pleasure is, that such impositions, not duly laid, be not drawn into consequence, but taken away,' 21 E. 3. No. 17.

There are some others of this kinde, but never any that did abide the triall, though they have alwayes been accompanied with all such circumstances, as were most likely to give them passage without controullment; as to be laid in the time of warre, to be limited to a short time, with consent of merchants. If the authoritie of an ordinance in parliament, joyned with the assent of merchants, were in those dayes not of force sufficient to uphold impositions, much lesse will an order of the king and his counsell out of parliament uphold them at this day, especially after so many yeeres discontinuance.

Another invention to raise Impositions, practised by Ed. 3. and in former times, was by way of a pretended or feigned Loane from the merchants, of so much above the old custome upon merchandise exported or imported, which loane was never repaid to the merchant. That this was an old practise, may be collected by the president, of 12 Ed. 2. already cited, where the king promiseth, that without fiction or delay he would repay them their money; implying thereby, that sometimes fiction had been used: and doubtlesse that loane which was 11 Ed. 2. the very yeere before, was such a fained loane as I speake of; for otherwise, without question, the king would not have released part of it, as may appear by that record that he did. For if the money be, bona fide, borrowed, and truly intended to be repaid, then doubtlesse the course is lawfull; if otherwise, I hold this kinde also as unlawfull as any of the rest.

Edward the third did once or twice borrow in this kinde, as may appear by records already cited to another purpose, with which I will not againe trouble you.

There was yet another device for raising of Impositions, begun indeed by Ed. 1. and condemned in the time of Ed. 2. but revived; and much practised by Ed. 3. which was also by way of Grant of merchants, and yet not altogether the same that I first observed to have been so much practised by Ed. 2. but is much more colourable and tollerable. For whereas that was a grant, or rather a meere gift, without any thing granted back againe in lieu thereof; this, I now speake of, is a soleme grant indeed, made by merchants, of an increase of custome, for liberties and freedoms, and other valuable priviledges and exemptions, granted unto them by the king. That former was dote nihil expectantes. This is, dote et dabitur vobis. And indeed the recompence that the merchants had by this charter granted unto them, made their grant to the king lesse subject to controul, then otherwise without such recompence it would have been. I mean the grant of mercant strangers, so often remembered amongst us by the name of Charta Mercatoria, which though it were damned all the time of Ed. 2. from the third yeere of his reign, yet was it revived by E. 3. even that very yeere, when he likewise deposed the king his father, and usurped to himself his crown. For it appears by the records, [1 Ed. 3. Ro. Fin.] that he commanded the same to be levied the very first yeere of his regne. What hath been said against this kind of imposition, I shall not need here againe to repeat, onely let me call to your remembrance, how this charter, as needing a better prop then his owne strength, and validity in law, was in the same kings regne confirmed by parliament, and onely by that strength continueth in force at this day.

You have heard five or sixe severall politike inventions and devices for the easie drawing on and sweetning of this yoke of Impositions, all practised by this prudent and potent king. Ed. 3. whose times were indeed so troublsome, and his charge every way so excessive, as it is no marvell, that he let not any way unatempted to raise money, without the assent of the commons, whom he always found unwillingly and hardly drawne to matters of charge.

coloured or masked under any such pretence, or politick invention, as you have heard, but plain and direct, only his owne expresse Commandment to his officers, to collect of every merchant so much for such a comoditie, exported or imported, and to answer it into his Exchequer, without any recitall in his commissions, of grant, assent, guilt, loane of merchants, dispensation, or ordinance in parliament, or any other such colourable pretext whatsoever.

These indeed, and only these, are meer Impositions, and may be aptly compared with these of our times. Of this kind, amongst all the records of Edward the 3rd's time, I find only two, which I will truly open unto you. [21 Ed. 3. No. 11. Ro. Par.] The first is in the 21st of his reigne, where it appears, that Lionell, afterwards duke of Clarence, named upon the record Lionell of Antwerp, because I suppose he was there borne, the kings second sonne, being then guardian of England, whilst the king his father was at the siege of Callise, at a counsell by him held the same yeere, which I take to be no other than the privie counsell, assessed without assent of parliament, upon every sack of wooll two shillings, upon every tun of wine two shillings, upon every pound of aver de poys of merchandizes imported sixpence. This Imposition was, I must confesse, for ought I know to the contrary, such as our present Impositions are: I mean, in that it was imposed onely and simply by the kings absolute power, and may in that respect be the fourth, of that number of sixe, which I told you were all that could be found in any degree like to ours, ever to have been practised in this commonwealth, from the conquest till queene Maries time. But though in the authoritie of imposing it be like, yet in circumstances very materiall you shall find an apparent difference between them.

First, this imposition is very moderate in the sum, as you may perceive; for it was but two shillings upon a sack; whereas in 13 Ed. 3. forty shillings upon a sack of wooll was usuall, and sometimes fifty shillings.—Secondly, it was to continue no longer then till Michaelmas following.—Thirdly, it was laid in the time of a most chargable warre, and ordained to be employed for the maintenance of ships of warre at sea, for the safeguard of merchants in their passage, of which it is apparent there was at this instant very great necessitie; for it was, as I have said, imposed then, when king Ed. 3 lay at the siege of Callise.

Besides, such as it was, and so qualified as you perceive, it was neverthelesse complained of in parliament, by a petition from the commons, as may appeare by the records of the same of 21 Edward 3. To which petition or complaint this answer was given, 'that all the said impositions were already taken away, save only the two shillings upon a sack of wooll, which should last no longer than Easter; and seeing the same was ordained for the safeguard of merchants, in which there had been greater sums of money expended by the 'king, than could be collected between that and Michaelmas, therefore to continue the same till Easter; he hoped it would not seeme over-burdensome or grievous unto them.' In the parliament following, viz. anno 22. the commons pray, that writs may bee directed to the customers to forbear at Easter next to take the two shillings upon a sack, according as it was granted at the first parliament, and that it be not any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant. [22 Ed. 3. N. 16. Ro. Par.] The king answereth, 'let it cease at Easter, as it was agreed the last parliament.'

Here you see it was absolutely taken away; and therefore though it had wanted these qualifications and circumstances which I have observed it had, yet, it being a thing so, publickly condemned, it ought to be of little force with you to justifie these present impositions. But that which I observe out of this last record, maketh me rather to incline, that, this imposition was onely by way of dispensation, then that it was an absolute imposition, such as ours are. For to what end, I pray you, should the commons pray that it might not be any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant, except it were likely that merchants for their benefit should pray the longer continuance thereof; and what benefit can any imposition whatsoever bee to a merchant, except it bee by way of dispensation to give him leave to trade, where before such dispensation given he stood altogether restrained? If then it be an imposition by way of dispensation with a penall statute of restraint, then is it no president for our present impositions. But whether or no it be a dispensation or absolute imposition; I leave it to your judgements. You have heard my observation.

And so I come to the next precedent in the times of Ed. 3. produced for maintenance of our impositions, which was in the 24 yeere of his reigne, the record of which [N. 12. Orig. de Scac.] and that which followed thereupon, I will, without any inforcement at all, open unto you, and so leave it to your censures. The king reciting, that whereas the Spanyard and French had joyned in league to make warre against him, and that for the withstanding of his said adversaries, as also for the safeguard of merchants against pirates, he had ordained, that certaine ships should be set forth, and that for maintenance of the said ships there should be paid by merchants two shillings for every sack of wooll, two shillings for three hundred woollfells, foure shillings for a last of leather, a scute of gold, or foure shillings for a tunne of wine, and sixpence of the pound upon all other merchandizes for one yeere following; he commandeth his customers to levy the same accordingly.

The very next yeere and parliament following, the commons exhibite a petition in parliament against impositions and other like charges, without assent of parliament; [25 E. 3. N. 12. Rot. Par.] to which answer is given, 'That it is not the kings intention they should be charged.'

I have now gone through all the materiall

Records here amongst us, of the times of Ed. 3. in which, though his reign were very long, and by reason of his warres, and other excessive charge, more occasion was given him to try the strength of this point of the prerogative, than ever any king before or since; though oftentimes, and by many politicke inventions, as you have heard, he attempted to establish this prerogative, of laying impositions without assent in parliament: yet can there not be produced in all his time, any more then two presidents of impositions like to these of ours: that is, imposed by the kings absolute authority. And yet these two were also, as you perceive, qualified with such circumstances, as, if ours were such, we should have held them tolerable, though perhaps not lawfull. Yet they, such as they were, escaped not without being complained of, and condemned also in parliament, as you have heard.

It may perhaps be, that some one or two of these impositions, which were by assent or grant of merchants in this time of Ed. 3. were in times when the passage was open, and not restrained by act of parliament, and so to be compared to our impositions. But whosoever shall, by looking over the statutes and records with never so much heed, consider the times of opening and shutting of the sea by statutes, shall finde it so intricate, as hee shall be very hardly able directly to say, that, at the time when any of these impositions were granted, the passage was open.

If in my observation I had found any such, I should have admitted it for an absolute imposition, as I have done Charta Mercatoria, which was by grant of merchants; for certainly, as I have yielded, the grant of merchants is in this case of no other effect, then the declaration only of their assent; and the imposition resteth meerly upon the king's authority. But I finde none such. If any such could be produced, you have heard, how they have bene from time to time controlled in parliament.

And so I passe from E. 3 to the times following.—From the end of the reign of E. 3 till the reign of queen Mary, who was the 11th prince of this realme after Ed. 3 (as Ed. 3 was the 11th after the conquest) being the space of 170 yeeres or thereabouts, it hath been confessed by all those that have argued in maintenance of his majesties right to impose, that there hath not been found one record that proves any one imposition to have been laid. There are indeed in our printed bookes some three or foure statutes during that time, in which mention is made of impositions; but they are, as I shall prove, impositions of another nature then those are which we claime of; and so make nothing at all to the prooffe of his majesties right: or if they were such as ours are, yet are they nowhere found mentioned but with disgrace, and to the end to be taken away; which may be the reason, that notwithstanding the great use that might have been made of three or foure presidents of impositions in these times, for the patching up of a continuance of the practise, which otherwise by this long discontinuance receives a great blemish; those which argued for impositions did not take hold of these, but chose rather to confesse, that no impositions at all were laid during all this time, and labored to seek out the reasons of the discontinuance.

I will briefly shew you what Statutes they are, during that time (viz. after the end of Ed. the thirds raigne untill qu. Maries.) which mention impositions. The first is 11 R. 2, cap. 9. No imposition nor charge shall be put upon woolls, leather, or woollfells, other than the custome and subsidie granted to the king this present parliament; and if any be, the same shall be repealed and annulled, as it was another time ordained by statute, saving alway to the king his ancient right. If by this saving the pretended right of imposing should be excepted, as was said in the Exchequer, the saving should then be contrary to the body of the act; and therefore it must needs have some other interpretation, that it may stand with the rest of the act, and not condemn the law-makers of so much want of discretion. Therefore doubtlesse this (saving) is no other then an exception of the ancient rightfull customes, due upon those staple commodities. And for my part I am of opinion, that the statute was made, not so much to take away any imposition laid by this king R. 2, as out of a provident and prudent care in the law-makers, proceeding from the fresh memory of the practise of Ed. 3 in this kinde; for all those that were of this parliament, did live and were at mans age in Ed. 3. time, and could not but well remember the grievousnes of his impositions. Besides, I observe, that they desire, that no imposition be laid by way of addition to the subsidie upon woolls and leather then granted. It was never heard till of late, that an imposition upon any merchandize was charged at the same time with a subsidie; and therefore without question, this was no other then an abundant provision by them, wherein they were no more carefull then any wise man would be in the like case. When they had of their own free wills given the king a liberall gift, they were carefull not to be further charged by him.

The next statute in these times, where impositions are found mentioned, is, 23 H. 6 cap. 18. By which it appears, that English merchants, being restrained from repaying to Gascoigne and Guen, to buy the wines of that country, they were nevertheless suffered to repaire thither paying certaine new impositions, which were demanded of them. Upon complaint hereof, it was enacted, that all English merchants might freely passe into those parts, and buy wines there at their pleasure, without any new imposition or charge to be put upon them; for that such impositions were to the damage of merchants, and to the hinderance of all the kings people: if any were demanded by the kings officers, the officers so demanding them should forfeit 20*l.* besides treble damages, to the party grieved.

That these impositions were by way of dispensation with a statute, which restrained the repaire of English merchants into those parts, and not by the kings absolute power, thereupon to ground an imposition, is evident by the statutes in print. [27 E. 3. c. G. 38 Ed. 3. c. 10. and 38 Ed. 3. cap. . 42 E. 3. c. 8. 43 E. 3. c. 12.] For from 27 E. 3 till this, 23 H. 6 there are five or six statutes in print to this purpose, some more strict then other, which continued in force till 23 H. 6. The reason of the restraint by Ed. 3, I suppose to have been, because Gascoigne and Guien were then in his possession, and he was desirous his subjects, the merchants of those countries, should have the sole profit of their own comodities; and that they onely should import them into England, and not the merchants of England. Whatsoever the cause of the restraint was, it is very clear the restraint was by statute, and that this imposition raised by way of dispensation was condemned; which neverthelesse, suppose it had not been controled, yet, as I have said oftentimes, it is in nature so farre differing from ours, as the practise thereof will not so much as help to salve this long discontinuance.

The next mention of Impositions is found 1 R. 3 cap. 12. The words are, 'The subjects and cominality of this realme shall not from henceforth be charged by any such charge or imposition called a benevolence, nor by such like charge.' You perceive by the words of the statute, what impositions are intended within that statute.

The next mention of Impositions in these times, I finde to be, 7 H. 7. cap. 7. where a charge of 18s. laid upon a butt of malmesie by parliament, is called an Imposition.

Another mention of Impositions, I finde to be, 12 H. 7. cap. 6. In the preamble of the statute the words are, 'That every person ought to use himselfe to his most advantage, without exaction, fine, imposition or contribution to be had, or taken of him, to, or by any English person or persons.'—Though some, that have argued before me against impositions, have urged this statute, as making against our present impositions, yet for my part, I am not of that opinion, but upon perusing the statute, doe rather thinke, that it extendeth only to impositions laid by the merchants of London, upon the merchants of other cities and townes not incorporate into their companies, as will evidently appeare by the statute: so as notwithstanding this statute, that which I have averred, and hath been yeilded to by the kings counsell, that no imposition was laid from Ed. 3. to queene Maries reigne, is not yet impeached.

There is yet one other statute of later time, in which mention is made of impositions, and that is 14 H. 8. cap. 4. The words are 'Every subject borne in England, and sworne to be subjects of other princes, as long as they shall so abide subjects to the other princes, shall pay such customs, subsidies, tolls, and other impositions, within this realme, as strangers doe.' I hold that this word Impositions, in this place, is used as a generall to all the particulars before mentioned, and no otherwise, and is no more in effect then charges; a thing usuall in statutes of this nature, to adde generall words for the more securitie, which I collect by the word 'other' going next before it: for to what end should it be said, no 'other' impositions, if those particulars first named, were not contained within that generall word of impositions? This word 'other' is a relative, and must needs be answered with words going before, when there are no other words following. Besides, it is common in the statutes and records of Ed. 3. No imposition upon wools shall be laid, but in parliament; by which it appears, that a charge laid by parliament may be called an imposition; which is very evident by a statute made not above 28 yeeres before this, I meane the statute of 7 H. 7, cap. 7, which I spake of even now, where a charge of 18s. upon a butt of malunsey, laid by that act of parliament, is called an imposition; and as I have shewed you, the word imposition hath been applied to all these severall inventions, used by Ed. 3 for the charging of merchandizes. Nay, the word maltoll, which is Englished by Rustall an Evill Toll, as indeed it signifies, and in that respect is of a farre harder sense then the word Imposition, is used indifferently for a Charge set by parliament, or a charge set by the kings absolute power upon merchandizes.

Inpositio, derived from the verb imponere, is no other then the act of laying on, or imposing; and therefore in my opinion, impositions are more properly by the merchants called imposts, which signifieth the things imposed. But I shall not need any further to enforce this, considering it hath so liberally been confessed by the kings counsell, that there is no record or statute from Edw. 3, till queen Maries reigne, that giveth any assurance that Impositions, or so much as any one imposition was laid, during all that space of above 170 yeeres. Only it behoves me for further opening the truth, to testifie, that, being one of those that were by you employed to make search in the ancient custome books of those times remaining in the Exchequer, together with some of the best experienced merchants of this house, some of which had sate at the receipt of custome, wee had many meetings, and spent many whole dayes in turning over the old custome books, and as carefully as we could did survey some books of every age and time; but after all our search ended, could not finde any one imposition from the time of Edw. 3, till queen Maries reigne, to have been received by any customer or collector. And if you please to give me leave to remember to you the passages of those times you cannot but marvell, that none of all those princes should so much as attempt to trie the strength of this so beneficiall a prerogative, so much practised by Edw. 3, and when you have heard their occasions, and compared their other actions with their forbearance in this kinde, you will, I think, conclude, and say in your hearts, that surely none of all those kings had so much as any imagination, that any such prerogative belonged unto them, as to raise money at their pleasure, by laying a charge upon merchandizes to be exported or imported, without assent in parliament.

Richard the second, being the grand-child and next successor of Edw. 3, in whose times impositions of all sorts did so much rage, had little lesse occasion then his predecessor had. For first, he had little treasure left him, and he was no sooner in his throne, but news was brought that the French had invaded the realme. They had burned Rye and Hastings in Sussex, they had taken and possessed the Ile of Wight, they had besieged Winchelsey. From the northern parts, the Scots had burned Roxborough, and were ready to overrunne all the north parts of England. Being thus beset with warre on all sides, doth his counsell, which in all likelihood had most of them been of counsell to his grandfather, advise him to raise money by impositions, as his grandfather had done (for this course of raising money by way of impositions, was yet fresh in all their memories)? They do not, but he taketh the ordinary course, by calling a parliament, which for maintenance of his charge in the war, the 2nd yeere of his reign, granteth him a 15th. He calleth another parliament, and hath another 15th granted, the 4th yeere of his reign. The warres increasing, his necessities were such, and so conceived by the parliament, as they granted him a most unusuall tax throughout the whole kingdom, upon every ecclesiasticall person, one and other, 6s. 8d. upon every other man or woman within the realm, 4d. which when it came to be levied, caused (though causelesly, because it was legally granted) that notorious rebellion, of which Wat Tyler was the captaine. This tax, as it was levied not without that great rebellion, so questionlesse was it unwillingly yielded to in parliament; and yet because there was no other course thought lawfull for the raising of treasure upon the subjects goods, then by their own assent in parliament, onely that course was thought fit to be practised, which was such as ought to be obeyed.—From the 5th to the 18th yeere of his reign, he obtained every other yeere one aide or other in parliament; sometimes a tax, sometimes a 15th, sometimes a subsidie of tonnage and poundage. In the 18th yeere, he was enforced to go in person into Ireland, to settle the state of that country, then in rebellion. All these troubles he had from abroad, besides those famous rebellions here at home, which afterwards cast him out of his seat; yet did he never for all this attempt to lay impositions, though he wanted not about him to put him in minde of his absolute power. For Edward Strafford, bishop of Exeter, lord chancellor of England, in a sermon made to the parliament held anno 21, as our chronicles report, did publicly maintain that the king was not bound by any law, but was of himself absolute and above law, and that to controule any of his actions was an offence worthy of death; at which parliament all that were present came armed, for fear of the king; and the parliament house it selfe was beset with 4000 archers by his appointment. I will speak no more of him then this. Though he were a king of a weak spirit, yet did he not spare to practise upon his people the most grievous things that were; insomuch that he so farre discontented them that they deposed him by common consent in parliament, the onely desperate example of that kinde, that our histories doe afford, or I hope ever shall.

His successor Henry the fourth, in respect he held the crown by so weak a title, had cause to give the people all the content he could possible. And yet he was so oppressed with warres on all sides, from France and Scotland, but especially by continuall and dangerous invasions made by the Welsh, as without the aide of his people for the supply of his treasure, it had not been possible for him to have held his crown on his head. And therefore he pressed his people so farre, that in a parliament held the 5th yeere of his reign, they yielded to him so great and so unaccustomed a tax, as that the grantors thereof, as our chroniclers say, tooke speciall order, that no memory thereof should remaine of record onely to avoide the present; and yet the very next yeere following, his wants were againe grown so great, as his subjects, being assembled in parliament to give him further ayde, did resolve, that there was no other way to supply his want, then to take from the clergie their temporall lands and goods, and to give them all to the king; which being understood by the clergie, a resumption of all the gifts of Edw. 3, and Rich. 2, was propounded. At last, after they had sate a whole yeere, they gave him two fiftieths. At this time, most of his counsell and the great officers of the kingdom were spirituall men. Had they not now, if ever, a just occasion given them to have put the king in minde of his prerogative of laying impositions, not onely to the intent to have diverted him from the harkning to that desperate motion, that had been made against them to all their utter undoings; but were they not also bound in duty and conscience, in this time of so great necessitie, seeing the parliament knew not otherwise how to supplie the kings wants, to have advised him to have made use of his lawfull right of imposing; by which means, he might, without troubling the parliament, quickly have raised great summes of money? Certainly it was not, because they were ignorant of any such practise in former times; for none of them that were then of the counsell to Henry the 4th, but they lived in Edw. 3's time; and most of them, doubtlesse, were in Ed. 3's time men of age and discretion. But in all likelihood as they knew that Edw. the 3rd did lay impositions, so likewise they knew, that impositions had been from time to time, in those daies, condemned as unlawfull, and were become hateful to the people; and onely for that reason they did forbear to advise the king to take that course, though the necessitie were never so great.—Another prerogative, as much concerning the interest of the subject as this of impositions; namely the abusing of coyne, this king made no scruple at all to put in practise, because he held it to be lawfull.

His sonne, and next successor, Hen. 5. who, by his many victories over the French, and his noble disposition and behaviour towards his people, was so farre beloved of them, as never was king of this realme more, though the kingdome were now, by one degree of discent, more firmly settled upon him then it was on his father, who usurped it; though also his expence of treasure, by reason of that great warre in France, were as much, as any king's of England ever were; though he had troubles also from his neighbours the Scots, and within his owne realme by rebellions; and lastly, though he spared not, for supplie of treasure, to suppress above 100 priories of aliens; yet neither out of the strength of his love with the people, nor in his extreame necessity, by reason of these honourable warres in France, for the maintenance of which the people would willingly have undergone any burden which he would have laid upon them, especially after the victory at Agencourt, did he ever so much as attempt the laying of impositions.

His successor Hen. 6. though indeed of a meek spirit, yet he was so followed with troubles within the realme, and from abroad, that he was inforced to crave such an extraordinary aide of his subjects in parliament, as the levying thereof was the cause of that famous rebellion of Jack Cade in his time. Besides, in the 18th yeere of his reigne, for the ease of his charge and supply of his wants, all grants by him made, of any lands, rents, annuities, or fees whatsoever, since the first day of his reigne, were resumed: and this is never yielded to, but in cases of extreame necessity. As for impositions, notwithstanding his great wants, he thought not of them.

Edw. 4. that succeeded him, was no lesse free from troubles; for he was, as you know, driven to forsake his kingdome, and to live for a while like a banished man with the duke of Burgundy. He was also inforced in the 5th yeere of his reigne to make a resumption; and the same yeere to abase his coyne. And Comines observeth of him, that he obtained a subsidie of his subjects in parliament, upon condition that he should himselfe in person undertake the war in France; and that only to get the subsidie, he passed the seas into France, but presently returned without doing any thing. What should such shifts as these have needed, if he might, without being beholding to his subjects, lawfully and without controll have raised treasure by laying of impositions? It is well worth the remembering, that which the same Comines, speaking in commendation of the frame of this commonwealth, saith, 'that this state is happy, in that the people cannot be compelled by the king to sustain any publique charge, except it be by their own consent in parliament.'

VOL. II.

I proceed from Ed. 4. to Hen. 7. omitting Ed. 5. and Ric. 3. because of the shortness of their reignes. Hen. 7. had indeed a more peaceable time than any of his predecessors; and yet he was not altogether free from troubles, both within the realme and from abroad*. But his naturall inclination was rather to embrace peace. He was so provident and politique in the gathering and storing up of treasure, as never any prince of this realme was therein to be compared to him. He did himselfe take the accounts of his revenues, which I have seen under his own hand. He had for his assistants about him Empson and Dudley, men learned in the lawes, and by all probability very cunning in all the profitable points of the prerogative; men that intended or studied little else than the advancing of their masters profit; men even till this day infamous for their wicked counsell, in perswading that good king to lay such heavy exactions and burdens upon his people as he did. If these men, who in all likelihood should have best knowne the kings right, especially in so high a point of profit, had but had the least notice of so profitable a prerogative as this, would they not have been at strife which of them should first have put the king in minde thereof? Or if they had held it questionable, would they not have put it to some triall? Certainly there can be no cause imagined, that should make them thus to forbear, but either they were utterly ignorant of any such prerogative; or, that knowing such a thing to be claimed by some of the ancient kings, especially by Ed. 3, they knew likewise, that it was in the same times continually complained of in parliament, and always condemned; and that there were acts of parliament directly against it. And this is more probably to be conceived of them, being men of such searching spirits, and so well studied in point of prerogative, then that they were ignorant of the practice of Ed. 3. considering also that they were neerer to those times by 120 yeeres then wee are.

But that which most of all moves me herein is, that there was in H. 7's time such an occasion offered of making use of this prerogative, as there could not possibly happen any other that might better have justified the laying of impositions, which was this. The Venetians, to the intent to drive our merchants from fetching sweet wines at Candy, that they might the better employ their owne ships and merchants, did impose upon every butt of malmesey brought thence by English merchants foure ducats; by which means the English wholly lost that trade, and the Venetians made the whole profit thereof. This mischief was no other way better to be remedied, than by imposing the like, or a greater charge, upon merchants of Candy bringing malmesey into England; that so they of Candy not being able to afford them better cheape than the English, the English might still fetch them from Candy, as they had wont to doe. I say, there could not possibly be a more justifiable occasion of laying impositions, than this was. And did this king, so carefull in other things of preserving his prerogative, and most of all in matters that concerned his profit, take hold of this occasion to lay an imposition by his absolute power? Nay rather, though he saw it convenient, and in a manner necessary, yet he conceived it to be unlawfull so to do; and therefore did it not by his absolute power, but by assent of parliament, as may appeare by the statute of 7. Hen. 7. cap. 7. printed; where in the preamble of the act, you shall see the occasion of the making of the act to be as I have opened it unto you: and you may perceive by the body of the act, that for the counterpoysing of the imposition of four ducats laid by the Venetians upon our merchants, there was imposed 18s. for a butt of malnesey, upon their merchants bringing it hither, to last as long as the imposition of foure ducats, which, as appeares by the act, came but to 18s. of our money, should endure. It is not probable, that this king, considering his other actions, would have suffered this to have been done by parliament, if he had thought he might have lawfully done it by his absolute power; and therefore it cannot almost be gaine-said, that in these times this pretended prerogative of laying impositions without assent of parliament was held to be against law.

Hen. 8. his sonne and successor, was so farre from the disposition of his father, in this point of thrift and providence, as there was not in the whole ranke of our kings any one like to him, for excessive prodigality.* The great riches stored up by his father with so much care, and left unto him, hee so sodainly consumed in triumphs, masks, mummeries, banquets, pompous and braving warres, as was that of Turwin and Turney, and in the satisfying of his lust, as he was out of very necessity enforced to crave most unreasonable aids of his subjects in parliament, such as never before had been granted, which through very dread and feare were yeilded to him. Yet not so satisfied, that no meanes for the raising of money might bee neglected or unattempted, in the 15th yeere of his reigne, by the councill of that proud prelate cardinall Woolsey, he spared not to send out commissions into every shire throughout the whole realme, with privy instructions to the commissioners, how they should with most advantage behave themselves, in perswading the people to contribute to the king the sixth part of their whole estates, to bee paid presently, either in money or plate; whereupon followed extreme cursing, weeping and exclamation against the king and his councill, and the people were in point to rebell, had not the king stayed the proceedings of the commissioners by his letters. Finding that this way would not serve his turne, hee demanded a benevolence; which not answering his expectation, he did the same yeere raise unto himselfe a great deale of treasure by abasing his gold.

Such things as these, princes never put in practice, but when all other meanes faile them; and yet hee went many degrees beyond this. For, in the 27th yeere of his reigne he suppressed above 370 religious houses, the yearly value of whose revenues I have read to be no lesse than 32,000*l.* per annum in those days; and that of their goods, sold at very low prises, he made above 100,000*l.* in present money. About 4 yeeres after he dissolved all the monasteries, abbeies, priories, nunneries, and all other religious houses of what kinde soever throughout England. By which meanes, and by the sale of their goods, he gathered such a masse of treasure, as it might have been imagined that never any king of this realme should have needed to have sought reliefe at his subjects hands. Yet he himselfe, no longer than within 3 yeeres after following, craved and obtained, as may appeare by the statutes of that time, an excessive great ayde by parliament; and yet the yeere following hee did also abase his coyne more than halfe in halfe, such an abasement as never before or since was heard of, and could not but bee very grievous to the people; but because perhaps they held it lawfull so to doe, they made no publique complaint thereof. And it is worth the observing, that though this prerogative of abasing coyne be a thing which trencheth as deeply into the private interest of the subject as the laying of impositions; for by this meanes a man, that this day is worth in revenues a hundred pounds per ann. shall to-morrow, if the king be so pleased, be worth but fifty or forty, or lesse, in real value; and though also the practise of this prerogative hath not been forborn by any of the kings of this realme, and that some of them have used it very immoderately; yet cannot there be found any one publique complaint, that ever I have met withall, upon record against it, as from time to time there have beene many against impositions; which argues that the subject did make a difference between these two prerogatives; this, of laying impositions; and that, of abasing coyne; thinking the one lawfull and the other not. But to conclude my observations upon the actions of Hen. 8. The next yeere after this unconscionable abasement of his money, he craved a benevolence. The yeere following he tooke the profits of all the chantries, colledges and free chappels, &c. during his life, which ended the next yeere. Can any man imagine, that during this kings reigne it was held lawfull, or any such thing so much as dreamed of, to raise treasure by laying impositions? I will enforce it no farther, but leave it to the judgment of any reasonable man, that shall consider these things which I have remembered, whether or no it bee likely.

Out of the time of his sonne and successor Ed. 6, I can observe little, because of the shortnesse of his reigne. But methinkes, if his governors had imagined that any such prerogative had been due unto him, they should not in honor have forborne the practise thereof for the supplying of the kings great necessities, and instead thereof have craved of the subjects that unaccustomed and unreasonable subsidy, granted an. 2. of a certain sum of money upon every sheep and every cloth within the realme, for 3 yeeres: which afterwards for the unreasonableness thereof was released.

I have now gone through in such sort as you have heard, the times of all the kings from Ed. 3, till Q. Maries reigne; during which time what can there be more imagined, that might possibly have happened to have awakened impositions, if they had not been more than asleepe? Neither the necessity of just and honorable warre, nor the subtilties and curiosity of peace, nor the prodigality of some of these kings for the better satisfying of their pleasures, nor the covetousness of others, nor the softnesse of some of their dispositions, nor the nonage of others apt to be abused by evill counsellors, nor the dreadfull and fearefull awe in which some of them held their subjects, nor the assurance of the peoples extraordinary affection, which might have emboldened some others, nor the evil conscience of usurpers, nor any other motive whatsoever, which happened during this long time, could revive them; untill Q. Mary did at last raise them out of the grave, after they had been so many yeeres dead and rotten.

The first Imposition, that she layd, was that upon cloth, continued till this day, which grew upon a speciall reason; as may appeare by the printed booke of the rates of her customes and subsidies; in the end whereof you shall finde a Declaration expressing the losse sustained by reason of the difference between the customes and subsidies of wool and cloth. By which it appeares, that a sack of wool yeelded in custome six shillings eight-pence, and in subsidie thirty-three shillings four-pence; that the custome upon a short cloth was fourteene-pence, and that a sack of wool did commonly make foure short clothes, the custome of which was foure shillings eight-pence; so that the custome of wool made into cloth was lesse, then the custome and subsidie of so much wool not cloathed, in every sack in short cloathes thirty-five shillings foure-pence; which difference was reduced to an equality by rating upon every short cloth ten shillings. After this declaration made of the difference, and of the rate which reduced both to an equality, follow these words; 'Which difference considered, and the great losse sustained by us in the same, by reason that cloathing is much increased, it is thought convenient by us, with the advice of our councell, towards the reliefe of the losse, for to asseesse, upon the clothes carried out by way of merchandize, some larger rate then heretofore hath been used; and though it were reason to appoint such a rate as might recompence the full of the losse sustained, yet upon divers considerations, at this time us, and our councell moving, we are pleased only to asseesse upon every short cloth, by the name of custome, six shillings eight-pence, &c.'

I thought good to open this at large unto you, that you might see, upon what speciall reason of equity this imposition was grounded, and how it differeth from ours. And it is worthy the observing, how the queene commundeth this increase of custome to be yielded unto her, not as an imposition, or by the name of impost, but by the name of custome; because it cometh in lieu of the ancient custome upon wool; which is the reason, that at this day it is demanded and paid by that name; whereas no other new raised duty hath that privilege, but they are either called subsidie of tonnage or poundage, if they be raised by act of parliament; or impost, if by the kings absolute power.—The name of Custome was anciently given to none but to wools, woolfells, and leather; and upon this occasion, to cloth also.—This imposition, though grounded upon such equity as you have heard, yet in Dyer, 1 Eliz. fo. 165. a. and b. it was, as appears by my lord Dyer, complayned of by the merchants of London with great exclamation, (which are his words,) and suit to the queen to be unburdened of it, because it was not granted in parliament, but assessed by queen Mary of her absolute power: whereupon there were divers assemblies and conferences of the justices and others, but their resolution is no where to be found, at least, by us. It is very probable, that, if they had given judgment for the queen, it would not have benee kept close.* But howsoever the profit was too great to be taken from the crowne, and therefore it continues till this day.

Howsoever the reason in equity in the laying this imposition upon cloth may seeme to bee sound unto some men, and so to allow of this imposition as differing from ours, yet for my part I hold it not so, when I consider what course was taken by Ed. 3, upon the same occasion. An. 11. E. 3. cap. 1. and 2, it was enacted, that no wool should be carried out of England, but by the kings licence; and that no man should weare cloth, other than such as should be made in England. This law tooke such effect, as within ten yeeres the greatest part of the wool in England was made into cloth; and it became to be transported in such abundance, by reason that there was no custome at all due upon cloth, and the custome and subsidie upon wools was very high, that in the 21st yeere, the king, finding his custome of wools so much decreased, doth seeke to remedy it, not by imposing a new charge upon cloth by his absolute power, as queen Mary did, but did it by assent of his subjects in full parliament, as I collect partly by my lord Dyer in the place last mentioned, but more fully by a recitall in a record amongst us, of 24 E. 3. Ro. 13. Orig. de Scaccar. to this effect: 'That, Whereas the customes and subsidies due and granted upon wools are much decreased, because a great part of the wool of England is made into cloth, for which no custome is due; and whereas in consideration thereof, at our council held the 21st yeere of our reigne, by the common assent of the prelates, earles, and barons, and others, it was ordeined and accorded, that 1*sd*. by denizens, and 20*th*. by strangers, should be paid for every cloth of assize, &c. made of English wool, and transported; upon paine of forfeiture of the clothes.' And so followeth an authority given to collect the same.

The next Imposition laid by queen Mary was forty shillings upon a tun of French wines, imposed in the 5th yeere of her reigne: at which time there was first a proclamation made, that no wines at all should be brought from France, being then in enmity with England, upon paine of forfeiture of the wines; which by the way, is a strange clause in a proclamation. Immediately after this restraint there was an order made by the queen and her privy counsell, that such as would might bring in French wines, notwithstanding the proclamation, paying forty shillings upon every tun by the name of impost, as doth appeare by record in the rolls of Easter terme, 1 Eliz. in the office of the kings remembrancer of the Exchequer, in the Case of one Germane Ciol, against whom an information was exhibited for not paying the said imposition. Whereunto, taking it by way of traverse, that there is any law of the land by which he may be charged with impost, he pleads a licence made unto him, an. 1 and 2 Ph. et Mar. to import a certaine number of tunnes of wine within a certaine time, any restraint then made, or afterwards to be made to the contrary, notwithstanding; provided alwayes, that the custome, subsidie, and other duties due and accustomed to be paid to the king and queen, were duly satisfied: and he shewes, that, for all wines brought in by him during the life of queen Mary, he paid the subsidie of tonnage, viz. three shillings for every tun, which was all that was due and accustomed to be paid. Upon this plea a demurrer was joynd, and judgement given thereupon against the queen. This Judgement hath been enforced in the maintenance of Impositions. Whether or no it make not rather against them, I leave to your censures.

Nere about the same time there were Impositions laid also by queen Mary upon all French commodities whatsoever to be imported, as may appear by the port-bookes of those times in the Exchequer; which impositions were received to the use of queene Eliz. in the beginning of the 1st yeere of her reign. But ere the yeer ended they were all taken away, as may appear by the same port-bookes; which in my opinion is a great argument, that they were not then held lawfull. For princes doe not so easily give over their hold in matters of profit, if they be any way able to maintain it. What hath hitherto upheld the imposition upon wines, I know not, except it be the great profit that comes by it to the crown, and because there was never any late judgement given directly against impositions.

You have hitherto heard what reason and direct proofs I have used to maintaine, that by the common-law the king cannot at his will increase his custome by way of imposition. You have, secondly, heard what the practise of former ages hath been in this kinde, till this day; from which I have also drawn reasons of inference, that prove the common-law so to be. But now, admitting that by the common-law it had been cleere and without question that the king might at his will have laid impositions, and that also the same could have been cleerly proved by the practise of the ancient kings; yet I affirme, that so stands the law of England at this day, by reason of statutes directly in the point, as the kings power, if ever he had any, to impose, is not onely limited, but utterly taken away; as I hope I shall be able evidently to prove, notwithstanding any objection that hath been made against the interpretation of the statutes to this sense.

The first statute is in Magna Charta, cap. 30. The words are, 'All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, shall have their safe and sure conducts, to enter and depart, to goe and tarrie in the realme as well by land as by water, to buy and sell without any evill tolls, by the old and rightfull customes, except in the time of warre. And if they be of the land making warre against us, and be found in our realme at the beginning of the warre, they shall be attached without harme of body, or goods, untill it be knowne to us, or our justices, how our merchants be intreated there in the land making war against us, &c.'

The statute, of which this is a branch, is the most ancient statute-law we have, wonne and sealed with the blood of our alicestors; so revered in former times, that it hath been by parliament provided, [25 E. 1, cap. 1, 2, 3, 4.] that transcripts thereof should be sent to all the cathedrall churches of England, there to remaine; that it should be twice every yeere publikely read before the people; that likewise twice every yeere there should be excommunication solemnly denounced to the breakers thereof; that all statutes and all judgements given against it shall be held as void; that it should be received and allowed as the common-law, by all such as have the administration of justice; and it hath been no lesse than 29 times solemnly confirmed in parliament. I will, therefore, with so much the more care, endeavor to free this law from all the objections, that have been made against it.

The first Objection doth tend to the diminishing of the extent of this statute, as touching the persons whom it may concerne; for it hath been collected out of the latter words of the statute, that it should extend onely to merchants-aliens, and not to denizens.—First, it is improbable, that the makers of the law should be more carefull to provide for the in-dempnity of merchant-strangers than of English; except perhaps they might imagine, that English merchants were already sufficiently provided for by the common-law. If that were their reason, as there could be no other that I can imagine, it doth as much maintaine my opinion, as if they had been contained within the statute.—Again, the words are generall, ‘all merchants;’ and, ‘qui omnes dixerit, nullos excipit.’

Besides, the statute is a beneficiall law; in which case particular and speciall words doe alwayes admit a generall extent: and therefore, to restraine generall words, as the objectors would, is against all reason, and rule of law. As for the latter words, ‘tis true, they doe indeede extend onely to merchant-strangers; but the sense of the first sentence is perfect without this: and as long as no absurdity nor contradiction doth follow by interpreting the first words to extend to all merchants in generall, and the latter onely to merchant-strangers, the most ample and beneficiall construction is ever the best, as in all other statutes of this nature.

But this Objection is, in my opinion, clearly removed by two statutes made by Ed. 3, in declaration of this very clause. The first is, 2 Ed. 3, c. 8, the words are, ‘All merchants, strangers and privies, may goe and come with their merchandizes into England, after the tenure of the Great Charter.’ I take it, that ‘privies’ in this place, being the very word that is found in the originall, which is in French, ought to be understood ‘denizens;’ for, otherwise I suppose it would have been joynd to the word ‘strangers’ by a conjunction disjunctive, which is usuall where the words are of one sense; and not by a copulative, as here it is. Besides, I take the word ‘privy’ to be derived from the Latin, privatus, which signifeth a particular property; as res privata, a mans owne private estate; so, mercatores privati, our own merchants. That merchant-strangers should be first named, is common in statutes and records.

The next statute explaining this of Magna Charta, is 14 Ed. 3, c. 2. The words are, ‘Whereas it is contained in the Great Charter, that all Merchants shall have safe conduct, &c. We grant that all Merchants, denizens and forreins, may freely passe, &c.’ which I take to be no other than a meere declaration of Magna Charta.

The second Objection made against this branch of Magna Charta, is, that the meaning thereof was to secure the merchants, not from a new increase of custome to be imposed by the king, to be paid at their entrance or going out of the ports, such as our impositions are; but from certaine petty exactions, as tolls and such like, which were then usually demanded of them within the land, by the townes through which they were to passe, and where they sold their merchandize; for the farther remedy of which there were afterwards divers statutes made, which doe evidently manifest that such was the mischief. And they doe the rather make this collection because of the words, ‘buy and sell without evil tolls;’ for, say they, impositions are not paid upon the buying and selling of merchandize, but when they are to ship or unship. They take hold of the word Toll, which properly is an exaction for passage within the land, or for sale in markets or faires. These objections notwithstanding, I hold it somewhat cleere, that the meaning of this statute was principally to secure merchants touching impositions. My first argument is drawn ab auctoritate, from the authority of the wisest and most sage men in greatest places and offices within this kingdom, in the times wherein they lived, and who also could so much the better judge of the true meaning of this statute, in that they lived so neere the time of the making thereof, even in the beginning of the reign of the next king (save one) to him that made this statute. I meane those, who made the ordinance in 5 Ed. 2, heretofore divers times mentioned by me, who, in alledging their reason against Charta Mercatoria, doe amongst other things say, that the same was made against Magna Charta. What was the cause of the griefe conceived against Charta Mercatoria, other than the impositions by colour thereof laid upon forraine commodities? It appears by the ordinance, that was the onely cause. If then Charta Mercatoria were by them adjudged to be against Magna Charta, only because by colour thereof new impositions were raised without assent of parliament, it is evident, that they interpreted the statute of Magna Charta to be made against impositions. If they had thought it to have extended onely to petty tolls and exactions within the land, as is objected, then could it not have extended to Charta Mercatoria. As for the words, ‘buy and sell, without any manner of evil tolls,’ I denie not but the words may perhaps have that sense which hath been collected out of them, viz. that in buying and selling, they should be free also from unjust exactions within the land. But I say further, that these words, ‘without any manner of evil toll, by the old and rightfull customes,’ do extend not onely to the next precedent words, ‘buy and sell,’ but also to the former words, ‘enter and returne,’ and more principally to them then to any other; for to have provided, that they should be free from those petty exactions of tolls in markets, and for passing through cities and townes, and to leave them subject to impositions to be laid on at the kings pleasure, had been but a slender securitie. This exposition of mine is confirmed by a record here amongst us, of 16 Hen. 3, no longer than seven yeeres after the making of this statute; by which it appears, that the king commanded his officers at the ports, ‘to signifie to all merchants, that they might with safetie enter into his kingdom, paying the rightfull and ancient customes,’ ‘Nec timeant sibi

'maletoltis quas faciet rex.' As touching the word Toll, which they say is to be understood of tolls for passages, and for buying and selling in faires and markets, it behoves me to say something of the derivation thereof; the rather, because it is very often used in our ancient statutes and records in the same sense as it is in this place; and by the derivation thereof the naturall and true meaning of the word shall be best understood. I hold it therefore to be derived from the Latine word Teolonium, which signifies custome, by cutting off the latter part of the word, and retaining onely the first part teol, by contraction toll; of which manner of derivation there are infinite examples in our language. The Latine Teolonium, as saith Calvin in his Lexicon Juris Civilis, is derived from the Greek Τωα, which signifies as well custome as it doth finis. Hence it is, that the customers are called in Latine Telomarii.

Thus you see, that the genuine and primitive signification of our word Toll is no other than custome upon merchandizes. From the word Toll, are come those two barbarous Latine words found in our statutes and records; tollum, which is the word used in the record of 16 H. 3. but even now vouched by me; and tolnetum, the originall word in the statute now in question, which I must confesse is also in our law Latine used by us for Toll in the market and Toll for passage, as may appear by the register and the book of entries. But in this place, malum tolnetum properly signifies, not a toll in the common sense, but an unlawfull charge laid by the king upon merchandizes, as an increase of custome, according to the primitive signification; which is evidently proved, in that it is here opposed to old and rightfull customes, 'sive omnibus malis tolnetis per certas et antiquas consuetudines.' Wherefore it ought so to have been translated, for so it signifies, 'without impositions, by the old and rightfull custome.' This exposition and translation is further warranted by the use of the word maletolt, so often found in our ancient statutes and records, which without scruple is derived from the Latine, malum tolnetum, the very word of our statute. I find it diversely written, maletout, maletolt, maletot, and sometimes maletent; but I never find it any where used in any other sense then for an imposition by way of increase of custome upon merchandizes. Sometimes indeed, but that very rarely, it is taken in the best sense, for lawfull and rightfull custome, as the word imposition sometimes is; but then commonly it is accompanied with another word to free it from the worst sense, as droiturel maletout, &c. That malis tolnetis in this place ought to be translated Impositions, may be farther proved by that which I find in a writer of the French history, one Jean Serres, who saies, that in the time of Philip le Beau, king of France, which was about the time of Ed. 3, king of England, there were rebellions in France because of impositions laid by the king, which in those days they did, saith he, call ma-

louts, the very word then anciently used in Engl. for impositions, as may plentifully appear by the statutes and records of H. 3, Ed. 1, Ed. 2, & Ed. 3; for the word Imposition was not used in any French record, statute, or other, for ought I have seene, till Ed. 3. I find it once used in Latine, 12 Ed. 3, in the letter which king Edward the third writ to the archbishop, to excuse him to the people for laying impositions; and as all that letter throughout is of an eloquent stile, so as it seemeth he was careful to avoid also that barbarous word, malum tolnetum, though common and familiar, and instead thereof to use the pure Latine word impositio. Sylvius, writing upon Tullies oration for Marcus Fonteius, where these words are used by Tully, 'imposuit vectigal,' saith, 'Ita usitatum vulgo est ut Vectigalia nova appellent impositiones.' The word vectigal, in this place, though in a generall sence it may be applyed to any renew whatsoever, yet, with the civill lawyers, it is by way of excellence commonly used for custome, as may appear by Calvin in his Lexicon. 'Vectigal, quod fisco vel reipubl. portorii nomine penditur, id est, pro meritis, quæ invehantur vel evehantur.' Sometimes they use to joyne with it, for a more cleere distinction, the word portorium; as a man would say, the revenue of the ports; agreeable with which, upon some records of Henry the third's time, I have found it to be called aritus portorium. By this it is evident, that impositio in pure Latine, and imposition in English, is the same with maletolt in French and malum tolnetum in our law Latine; and they doe all signifie a new increase of custome, and not any thing else. Wherefore I conclude, that these words, 'sive malis tolnetis,' in our present statute, are naturally and properly to be expounded, and understood of Impositions, and so ought to have been translated, and not as they are. And although the word Imposition itself, as also the word maletout, and malum tolnetum, may be, as I have confessed, taken as well for a new increase of custome by a lawfull means, viz. by assent in parliament, as for an increase of custome by the kings absolute power, which is unlawfull; yet by the words that immediately follow it is evident, that this statute doth onely intend unlawfull impositions, that is, impositions laid by the kings absolute power, without assent in parliament. Otherwise would they not have been opposed to due and rightfull customes, as by the words of the statute they are.

But because there hath been some exception also taken to the exposition of the word Custome in that sense in which I take it, that is, for Custome upon merchandize, for that the word in the originall is consuetudo, which signifies an usage, and not custuma, which is the Latine word we now use for Custome upon merchandize; it behoves me therefore to say something touching these words, consuetudo and custuma, for the clearing of this scruple. This word consuetudo, in his first and proper signification, doth, I confesse, signifie an usage, or practise of a thing time out of minde. But it is evident by the records in the time of H. 3, and Ed. 1, this word in a more speciall manner was applied to all, or most of the duties belonging to the crowne by reason of trade; as 'consuetudo aquæ Thamesis,' 'consuetudo piscis venientis ad vicum pontis London' 'consuetudo quæ vocatur scavegium, consuetudo quæ vocatur gauge.' But yet more specially it was applyed to that dutie, which we, following the same rule, because of the greatnesse of the revenue, doe likewise per excellentiam call Custom. This may appeare by the pipe roll of 52 Hen. 3, with this title Consuetudo Mercandizorum, and by divers other records of Hen. 3's times. The rolls and records of the beginning of Ed. 1, doe likewise prove the same very evidently, insomuch that not onely that which in this kinde belongs to the king by the common-law and by ancient prescription, was called consuetudo; but in later time, if any increase were of that dutie, though it came not by prescription, but by grant in parliament, or otherwise, yet it still retained the name consuetudo, which by continuance of time came to be the proper name to that kinde of dutie howsoever it began. And therefore in 3 Ed. 1. you shall finde, that after the old custome of woolls was increased to a demy-marke by act of parliament, yet the word consuetudo was nevertheless still retained, but with an addition; for it was then called nova consuetudo. Nay, though the increase were by the kings absolute authoritie, and upon the matter a meere imposition, yet the king in his commission did alwayes call it consuetudo; as in 16 Ed. 1. the imposition of foure shillings upon a tun of wine is, in the kings commission to collect it, called consuetudo. Nevertheless, I assure myself, the people called it by some worse name, as maltoft, or the like.

The severall applications of this word consuetudo to all duties whatsoever belonging to the crowne by reason of trade, is the reason, as I conceive, that the word is used in the plurall number in the statute of Magna Charta, 'per antiquas et certas consuetudines;' that so they might bee secure against all unjust exactions upon merchandizes whatsoever. But, as I have said, the principall scope was to provide against impositions; and by reason also that the word consuetudo was taken as well for impositions as for rightfull customes, therefore, to make all sure, they insert the words 'antiquas et rectas.' This word consuetudo in this sense continued till about the twentieth yeere of Ed. 1. after which time I cannot call to minde that I have seene it upon any record. In stead and place thereof came in the word custuma, which I find first in Charta Mercatoria an. 31 Ed. 1. where the increase of custome by the grant of merchant-strangers is called parva custuma; and that which before was called nova consuetudo, doth now begin to lose that name, and to bee called magna custuma; which termes of magna custuma, intending thereby that increase made by parliament, anno 3 Ed. 1. upon the three staple commodities, woolls, woollfells, and leather; and parva custuma, intending thereby the increase granted by the merchants-strangers, an. 31 Ed. 1. are the termes used at this day by the customers, and by which they distinguish their entries. This word custuma, I finde to have been also promiscuously used by E. 1, E. 2, and E. 3, in their commissions, and applied, as well to increase of custome by way of imposition or by acts of parliament of those times, as to ancient custome upon the staple commodities. But regularly none ought to be called custuma, but that which is due upon the staple commodities; and so is it used at this day, except only cloth: for if it bee laid by act of parliament, it is called a Subsidie; if without assent of parliament, Imposit. You see in what sense the words malum tolmetum and the word consuetudo have been used in former times, and are thereby able to judge how they ought to be understood in this present statute, which, as I have said, ought to have the most benign interpretation that the words may beare.

But it hath beene likewise objected, that in this statute there is a special clause of exception, which leaveth the king at his liberty to lay what impositions he pleaseth, this statute notwithstanding. And that is the words in the beginning of the statute, 'All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, shall have their passage, &c.' which implies, say they, that if they be prohibited, which rests wholly in the kings power, then they are not to have benefit of this statute, touching the freedom from impositions; and they say farther, that the very laying of impositions doth imply a restraint sub modo. Though I purpose to speake more fully in answer of this objection, when I come to shew you the weakness of the reasons alledged for impositions, yet I cannot forbear in this place to speake a worde or two in answer thereof, having the statute now before us. 'Except they be prohibited, they shall have free passage' (saith the statute) 'without paying evill-toll.' This doth imply, say they, that if they be prohibited, they may be compelled to pay impositions. But that cannot be necessarily concluded. It implies indeed somewhat strongly, that they may bee prohibited. The statute of 1 R. 2. cap. 12. inhibiteth the warden of the Fleece to deliver any prisoner out of execution, unlesse it bee by writ or other commandment of the king. It may be as strongly implied out of this statute, that the king may, by his commandment without writ, deliver a prisoner out of execution: but the contrary hath alwaies been held. [1 & 5 P. & M. fo. 162, b. Dyer.] The same objection is made, and the same answer may be given to another exception in the latter end of this branch, except in the time of war.

I come to the Second Statute against Impositions, which is the statute de tallagio non concedendo, touching the time of the making of which there is great variety of opinion; for it is not, for ought I could ever learne, found any where upon record. Justice Rastall accounts it to have been made 51 of H. 3, and with him agrees an old manuscript which I have seen. It may well bee; for in one of the statutes you shall finde a pardon to Humfrey earle of Boham earle of Hertford and Essex constable of England, and to Roger Bygott earle of Norfolk and Suffolk marshal of England, who both lived in that time. Thomas of Walsingham in his history of England saith it was made in the 25th yeere of Ed. 1. Hee reciteth the statute de verbo in verbum as it is in our printed bookes; otherwise I should have thought he had meant another statute against impositions made indeede 25 Ed. 1, and found upon the records of that yeere. In our printed statutes at large, it is placed last of all the statutes of E. 1. Though there be some disagreement about the time of the making of this statute, yet they all agree the occasion to be the laying of a great imposition upon wool. The words of Thomas Walsingham; 'Auxit rex tributum lanæ ad 40s. cum prius ultra dimidiam mercam non daretur. Tota. autem communitas sensit se gravatam de vectigali; lana enim Angliæ fere extendit ad medietatem valoris terræ et vectigal ad quintam partem terræ.' The custome of wools, as you perceive, was in those dayes esteemed to bee the fift part of the value of the whole land. It followeth in him, that upon complaint the subject at last obtained the statute I nowe speake of, the words of which are, 'No tallage or ayde shall bee raysed or set by us or our heires in our realm, without the assent and good will of archbishops, earles, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land.' After these generall words, by way of provision against all manner of burthens whatsoever to bee laid in time to come without assent of parliament, followeth in the next branch, save one, especial provision for the taking away of the imposition then in demand upon wools; which latter clause, as it doth cleerely shew the cause of their present griefe to bee the same which our chronicles say it was, so doth it likewise make it evident, what it was which they sought to be secured of for the times to come. Neither are the words themselves so obscure, by reason of the generality of them, but that they also without knowing the occasion of the making of the law doe directly point at impositions; for, though indeede the word Tallage be, as I conceive, to be understood only of charges within the laud, yet the word Ayde extendeth to all charges of what nature soever. Nay, that even impositions themselves have been called Aydes or Subsidies, which is all one, is evident by almost all the records of the Exchequer here amongst us, especially by those of Ed. 3's time; in which, wheresoever you finde any mention made by the king, in his commissions, of an imposition raised by him, hee ever calls it Subsidium or Auxilium. So likewise in the printed statute of 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11, you shall finde, that the imposition by grant of merchants there mentioned is called a Subsidie or Ayde. This exposition of the word ayde, concurring with the occasion of the making of the statute, doth in my opinion strongly enforce this statute against impositions. And 'tis to bee observed, that in this statute there is no saving or exception of the kings antient right, which, as our chronicles say, was a point principally insisted upon at the making of this law, earnestly pressed by the subject to bee without that clause, and for a long while stood upon by the king, but at last yielded unto in such sort as you have heard.

The next statute (third) against Impositions is 25 E. 1, c. 7. The words are, 'Forasmuch as the more part of the cominality hath found themselves sore agrieved with the maletolt of wools, viz. a toll of 40s. for every sack of wool, and have made petition to bee released of the same, wee at their requests have cleerely released it, and have granted for us and our heires, that wee shall take no such things, without their common assent and good will, saving to us and our heires the custome of wools, skins and leather granted before by the cominality aforesaid.' I might, in enforcing this statute, rely upon a rule of law for the exposition of statutes of this nature, 'Omnis impositio est odiosa, ideo stricta contra impositiones, et large ad favorem gravatorum interpretanda est lex contra impositiones data.' But there shall not need any such favourable construction; for the words are in themselves very cleere. The law consisteth of three parts. The first is the kings grant of a petition made by the commons for the releasing of an imposition of 40s. upon a sack of wool, then in demand. When the present grief was ended, the next care was to prevent the like mischief in all times to come. It therefore followeth, 'And wee have granted for us and our heires, that we shall take no such thing without their common assent,' which is the second part of the law. The saving in the end is the third part.

Against this generall provision two objections have bene made.—First, that the words 'no such things,' are to be understood only of the burthensommesse and excesse of impositions, and not otherwise. 'No such things,' that is, say they, no such grievous impositions as this present imposition is. It had bene a poore security for times to come, to have left it to interpretation, whether or no impositions, which might happen to be laid in after ages, be as grievous as the imposition complained of in this time, by comparing one with the other. 'Tis so uncertain a computation, as no man, when hee thinks thoroughly of it, can imagine, that men, worthy to sit at the making of laws, should suffer such a thing to passe them. Who can certainly say, whether our impositions bee more or lesse grievous then the rate of 40s. upon a sack of wool? Beside, how easily had this lawe bene to have bene eluded by abating only 12*d.* or but 1*d.* in the next imposition? For, if it be but a penny lesse, it is no such imposition, for the burden. Therefore it must needes bee expounded of the quality and very nature of the thing complained of, and not of the quantity. No such thing, that is, no such thing as this is, that is to say, an imposition. But that, which will cleere this objection, is a proclamation made the very next yeer after the making of this act, [26 E. 1. Inter brevina retorn. de term. Mich. in Scac. in offic. rem thesaurar. ibidem.] in which the king reciting this act, instead of these words, wee will take 'no such thing,' useth these words, 'nullam aliam customam sine communi consensu capiemus,' not only 'no such,' but 'no other.' By which you may see, that the words were then interpreted in that sence, in which I doe now interpret them.

But admitting, say they, that it bee so to bee expounded that the king will lay 'no other imposition' without assent in parliament, that is to be understood, say they, 'no other imposition upon wools,' and not otherwise; which is their second objection. It were a very strict construction for a statute of so beneficiall an intent as this is so to restraine it; if there were no other words in the statute that did enlarge the exposition. But by the words following it is most evident, that the scope of this law is more liberall then so; and that the kings intent was for ever to secure his subjects, against all charges of this nature, I meane impositions, not upon wools only, but upon any other merchandise whatsoever, which I collect from laying all the parts of the law together.—The petition for present ease is to be released onely of the maltoit of foure shillings upon a sack of wool, which is yielded to. The security for the time to come is 'we will take no such thing.' The saving, which followeth that, is, 'saving the custome of wools, woolfells, and leather.' I observe, the saving extends not to wools alone, as the petition doth, but also to woolfells and leather, by expresse name; by which it is evident, that the securitie for the time to come is of a larger extent than to stretch onely to wools, as hath been objected. For else, to what end should woolfells and leather be excepted in the saving, if they had not been contained in the generall words, 'no such thing?' An exception cannot be but of a thing contained in former words. If therefore the grant would have extended to woolfells, if they had not been specially excepted, then do I conclude by the same reason, that it doth extend to all other merchandizes not excepted; for the words are generall. And so I leave this law cleered of all objections, and very full against impositions.

The next [fourth] statute made against them is 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. By the first part of which law you may perceive, that, whereas the commons had prayed the king not to take of wools, woolfells, leather, tyn, or lead, any more than the ancient custome, the king prayed them to grant him forty shillings upon a sack of wool for a yeer and a halfe, which they granted. Whereupon the king, by way of retribution, and in answer of their petition, as touching the wool, causeth it to be enacted for their security in time to come, 'that neither he nor his heirs would demand, asseesse, nor take more custome of a sack of wooll than sixe shillings

'eight pence: and so likewise upon wools and leather, no more than the ancient custome, without assent of parliament.' All this while there is no answer given touching the tyn and lead mentioned in the petition; upon which, as it appeares, the king had also laid impositions. But there doe follow certain generall words, by which not onely tyn and lead, but all other commodities whatsoever are freed from impositions. The words are, 'the king promised in the presence of his earles, barons, and others of his parliament, no more to charge, set, or asseesse upon the custome, but in manner aforesaid.' Except these words doe extend to lead and tyn, to free them from impositions for times to come, as well as wools, woolfells, and leather are freed by the former speciall words, their petition touching tyn and lead is no way answered. And if they doe extend to tyn and lead, by reason of the generality of the words, they doe by the same reason extend to all commodities; for what more liberall words can there be than these; 'that the king will not charge, set, or asseesse upon the custome?' These words, 'the custome,' being words indefinite, are, you know, equivalent to an universall, according to the rule, 'indefinitum aequipollet universali.' And although the king doe but promise, yet I doubt not but in this case his promise is a law. And it is worthy the observing, that the lords doe in very extraordinary and unusuall manner solemnly undertake, as much as in them lyeth, that they shall procure the king to hold the same, and 'that they shall in no wise assent to the contrary, if it be not by the assent of the prelates, earles, barons, and commons, and that in full parliament;' and for the greater surety, and to give cause to eschew all counsel to the contrary of this ordinance, 'the prelates have promised to give sentence upon them that counsell against the same in any point;' which are the very words of the statute in print.

The statute of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. [No. 5. Ro. Par.] was yielded unto by the king, upon a petition exhibited the parliament before, both by the lords and the commons, praying that a law might be made against impositions, as may appeare by the records of the 13th yeere of Ed. 3. at which time they likewise prayed, that the king would be pleased to grant them a charter to the same effect, to be enrolled in parliament. The statute you have heard. The charter followeth in our printed books immediately after the statute, where the king in the preamble thereof, reciting the great gift that he had given him at the same parliament, that is to say, the 9th fleece, 9th sheep, and 9th lamb throughout the kingdom, which indeed, was a very extraordinary great gift, (and therefore his grant, in regard thereof, is to be intended so much more beneficially) doth in lieu thereof, for him and his heirs, grant to his subjects in these words: 'From henceforth they shall not be charged, nor grieved, to make any ayde, or to susteine charge, if it be

'not by the common assent of the prelates, earles, barons, and other great men, and the commons of our said realme of England, and that in parliament.' It hath been objected, that these words, aide and charge, are to be understood of charges within the land, such as are taxes and tallages, and not of impositions upon merchandizes. And this is the only objection made, or indeed can be made against this statute; for the clearing of which, I can say no more then already I have proved by matter of record for the opening of the sence of this statute, viz. that this charter and the last statute were made upon a petition exhibited in parliament, for a law and charter to be made against impositions upon merchandizes. And therefore that conjecture of theirs, that it should extend only to taxes, and not to impositions, cannot but fall to the ground; especially since there is not in the petition, any mention at all of taxes or tallages, or of any other charge or aide but impositions onely, then which there cannot almost be a clearer proof, then that this law being made upon this petition, is to be expounded against impositions. Which, if this petition had not been extant, would with no lesse cleernesse have been proved, by considering the mischief at the time of the making of this law, which was not tallage or taxes, but those heavie impositions of foure pound and five pound upon a sack of wool, by way of dispensation with the statute of 11 E. 3. cap. 1. of which I have formerly made mention. So as this statute, being made in the first intention against dispensations for money with a penall law, though the occasion were particular, yet, the words being generall, I hold, that with reason it may be extended against all dispensations with penall lawes for money. In particular, I hold, that the raising of money, by Dispensations with the statutes against ale-houses, is, if not by the common law, yet by the force of this law, unlawfull; for certainly, 'quod prohibitum est una via, non debet alia permitti.'

As for the words Ayde and Charge, I have already proved, that it was a terme by which impositions were commonly called in those times. That they were also called Charges is evident by very many records of those times, where complaint is made against them, as 21 Ed. 3. numb. 11. 'Les commons prient que la charge de 21s. sur sack de lane soit ouste,' 21 Ed. 3. numb. 16. 'The commons pray that no Charge be set upon them without assent of parliament.' The kings answer is, if any Imposition be levyed unduely it shall be taken away. Of this kinde there are very many presidents, so as if the precedent petition had not assured us of the scope of this lawe as it doth, the very words themselves, rightly understood, would have made it cleere.

In the same charter there is another clause as beneficiall as this, to this effect, 'all merchants denizens and forreins, except those which be of our comitie, may without let safely come into the realm of England with their

'goods and merchandizes, and safely tarry, and safely returne, paying the customes, subsidies, and other profits reasonably thereof due.' The objection to this clause is very obvious, for what, say they, can these words, 'other profits reasonably due,' signifie other than Impositions; for, by the words going before, custome and subsidies are expressly named, and there is, say they, no other third profit upon merchandize but impositions, and indeed this statute they themselves have vouched in maintenance of impositions. To this objection it might serve for a full answer, that there are other duties then customes and subsidies due upon the landing of wares; for example wharfage, crantage, scavage, and such like, the which with more probability I may conjecture to be intended by these words, 'other duties,' then they can conjecture it to be meant of Impositions. Sed in planis non opus est conjecturis. The best expositors of this act are those that lived in the same times, and they doe cleerely expound this clause to be made against impositions, as may appeare by the record of 21 E. 3. No. 29. for you shall there find a petition exhibited in parliament by the commons to be relieved touching an imposition upon wools, alledging for a reason of their petition, 'that every man ought freely to passe, paying the ancient custome as it was ordained by the kings charter.' This petition against impositions was exhibited by the whole parliament, within six yeeres after the making of the charter, as may appeare by comparing the times; and if they had not then thought, that Impositions had been meant to have been provided against by this charter, they would not certainly have made such a speciall reference thereunto.

In discovering the weaknesse of the reasons alledged in maintenance of Impositions, I shall not greatly neede to say any thing more then hath been said; because the state of the question hath beene already so thoroughly opened unto you, that whatsoever can, with any colour of reason, be said for impositions, may receive an answer out of that which hath beene spoken against them. Nevertheless, I will in a few words recall to your memories their reasons; and in as few apply the answers to them, with some additions of mine owne, that, by laying both together in your view at one time, the weaknesse of the one and strength of the other may the better appeare unto you.

It hath beene said, that the old custome of a demi-marke upon a sack of wool must have his beginning, either by the kings absolute power, or by a legall assent of the people, which can be no where but in parliament, and cannot but appeare of record; but because no such assent can be showne, therefore they conclude, that it began by the kings absolute power, and inferre that the same power remains still. The substance of this argument is found in my lord Dyer in the place cyted by me. It was much enforced in the Exchequer. But as touching the particular of the old custome of a demi-marke upon a sack, and the other old custome upon fells and leather, it is now no longer urged; because it appears expressly by divers records of 3 E. 1. in the Tower—that it was granted ‘per les grandes et al prier des comons et de les merchants de tout Engleterre,’ and by a record of 25 E. 1. cap 7. stat. printed, ‘per communitatem regni nostri Angliæ,’ which concurreth also with the statute of 25 E. 1. cap. 7. in print; [Ro. fin. intus. M. 24.] ‘saving to us and our heires the customes of wools, skins and leather granted heretofore by the communitaty aforesaid.’ The patten roll of 3 E. 1. [M. 1. Ro. Par.] which lieth these words, ‘cum prelati magnates ac tota comunitas mercatorum regni nostri nuper nobis concesserunt quandam novam consuetudinem, viz. de quolibet sacco lanae 6s. 8d. &c.’ being something obscure, are by the concurrence of all those other records so cleerly expounded, as there cannot be, neither now is there, any question made, but that the custome of a demy-marke, and the other old customes, which by my lord Dyér, and by all those who argued for or against impositions in the Exchequer, was held to be due by the common-lawe, was by grant in parliament. Nevertheless the strength of the argument they still retaine. Though the demy-mark and those old customes upon the staple commodities were by act of parliament; yet, say they, before that increase by parliament the king had custome, and no doubt a some certaine. Otherwise could not this increase be called nova consuetudo. Besides, say they, the custome reduced to a certainty by 3 E. 1. is only upon three commodities, wool, skins, and leather. There are many other commodities, which did likewise pay custome. How began that custome, say they, if not by the kings absolute power? And when was that power taken away? I answer, admit it were by the kings absolute power, yet that the king hath cleerly discharged himself of that power by act of parliament, I hope I have cleerly proved. But this question, how began the first customs, is best answered by another question, how began the fine for purchase of originall writs, the fine pro licentia concordandi, the certainty of prisage? Nay, who reduced it first to certaintie, that the tryall of issues should be by twelve jurors, no more nor no lesse; that the full age of a man should be accounted twenty-one yeeres; of a woman fourteene, twelve yeeres her age of consent, and nine yeeres capable to bee endowed; a yeere and a day given to sue an appeale; the like limitation of ayeere and a day in very many other cases? In effect, who reduced all the known grounds of the common-law to that certaintie that now they are? Because wee cannot tell how or when they began, shall wee therefore conclude, that they began by the kings absolute power, and inferre, that by the same reason, they may bee changed at his pleasure? If the king may increase his fines upon the purchase of originall writs (which by the same reason hee may doe, that hee may doe his custome, nay, hee hath more colour for this then for that, because there is no statute against this) hee might easily raise that revenue to the value of his customes. But no man can, nor will I hope offer to mainteine it to bee lawfull. You see the weaknesse and the dangerous consequence of this argument, by comparing it to other cases of like nature. To say the truth, all these things began no man can say certainly when or how, but by a tacit consent of king and people, and the long approbation of time beyond the memory of any man, and yet no man can directly affirm but that most of them might begin by act of parliament, though now there bee no records extant of such antient parliaments. The first parliament was not kept 9 H. 3. though it be the first in our bookes. If we will give credit to other records, and to our best chrouiclers, we shall heare and reade of divers parliaments in the reigne of king John, and of his predecessor Rich. 1. and in the reigne of H. 2 of two famous parliaments, one at Claringdon in Wiltshire, the other at Gedington in Northamptonshire. And although our chrouicles say, that the first parliament kept in this realme was held 19 Aprilis, 16 H. 1. yet I am of opinion, that William the conqueror held parliaments; for what can be else understood by these words, ‘per commune consilium totius regni nostri stabilitum fuit,’ which I finde in Mr. Lamberts collection of the ancient lawes of England, in the beginning of the laws of William the conqueror? Many of the statutes of E. 1. have no other words. Nay, long before him, in the yeere of our Lord 712, in the time of Inas king of the West-Saxons, I assure myself there were parliaments held, and that of the three estates, as at this day; as may appeare by these words in the beginning of the lawes of king Inas, in Mr. Lambert, ‘Suasu et instituto episcoporum nostrorum omnium, senatorum nostrorum, et natu majorum, populi nestri in frequentia magna;’ and more plainly in the conclusion of some other of his lawes; ‘hoc factum fuit per commune consilium et assensum procerum, comitum, et omnium sapientium seniorum, et popalorum totius regni, et per præceptum regis Inæ,’ which are the same in Latine which ours is in English, ‘by the king, the lords spirituall and temporall, and the commons.’ Why might not the custome upon wools be first granted at one of these parliaments, as well as to have it first begun by the kings absolute power? There is no more probability of the one than the other. Because most of the ancient records were burnt in H. 2’s time, when the Exchequer was burnt, shall we conclude therefore that there were never any such? You see the weaknes of this argument in all the points thereof. I leave it, and passe to another.

The king may, say they, restrain the passage of merchants at his pleasure, which they prove by divers records; 2 E. 1. m. 18. Ro. Par. 2 F. 1. m. 17. Ro. fin. 31 E. 1. n. 44. Ro. Pat. 17 H. 6. Ro. Cla. in dorso. Upon which they inferre, that if he may restraine a merchant that he shall not passe at all, he may much more so restraine him that he shall not passe except he pay a certain sum of money: for this, say they, is lesse than totally to restraine him; and cui licet quod majus, licet etiam quod minus. Of this argument my lord Dyer gave light in his Case of Impositions, 1 Eliz. and this hath been diversly enforced by all that have argued for impositions. In answer of which, I will consider, how farre the king may restrain the passage of merchants; and then will examine the consequence of the argument.

For my part, I think the king cannot restrain the passage of merchants, but for some speciall cause; wherein to define certainly and resolutely, to say for what causes he may, and for what not, I will not undertake. Onely let me inform you, that there is not one of these presidents vouched by them to prove the kings power to restraine, but they are upon speciall reasons; as by reason of enmity with such a nation from whence they are restrained, or because such a commodity may not be spared within the kingdome. Besides, they are not restraints from all places, and of all manner of merchandizes, but from certain places onely, and for certain sorts of merchandizes. And for my part I thinke that restraints in all these cases, and of like nature, are by the common-law left to the kings absolute power; for if it were otherwise, it should be in the power of a merchant for a little private lucre to enrich the kings enemies, or to furnish them with munition to be employed against the state, or utterly to ruine the common-wealth, by carrying out a commodity which may not be spared, or by bringing in of some that may be hurtfull. Nay, which is more, such may be the occasion, that the king may, I doubt not, stop the passages of all merchants from all places for a short time, as upon the death of the late queen it was put in practise, to prevent intelligence. There may likewise be such necessary use of their ships, as the want of them upon some sodaine attempts may be a cause of the overthrow of the whole state. In such cases as these, if the common-law did not give the king leave to restrain their passage by his absolute power, it were very improvident in the highest points, which cannot be imagined of so wise a law. And yet the kings of this realme have alwayes been sparing in the practise of their absolute power in this point; for there are little lesse then 30 acts of parliament, touching the opening and shutting up of the passage of merchants, most of which, as I conceive, were made rather for the increase of punishment, then for want of power in the king; for the breach of a restraint by absolute commandment is punishable, as all other contempts, onely by fine and imprisonment, and not by forfeiture of the merchandizes, as in the president of the wines, an. 5. of queene Mary, vouched by me, and is in some of those old presidents. If it be otherwise, I must confesse I know not the reason of the difference of this from other contempts. You see, that I have yielded to their proposition, 'That the king may by his absolute power restraine the passage of merchants,' and have therein granted more then their presidents prove. But is the consequence good, that because the king may restrain, therefore he may impose upon such as passe? First I denie, that in our case there is any restraint at all, as there was in the case of the French wines, by queen Mary, by her proclamation going before the imposition. For prooffe of which I referre you to the kings letters patents prefixed before the last booke of rates; by which instrument, the impositions now complained of were altogether raised. You shall finde it no other then a declaration of the kings pleasure so to have it, and a course prescribed for levying of it. But admitting, that the very laying of an imposition did imple a restraint, yet I denie the consequence, because the king may restrain totally, that therefore, he may restraine for a time, or from certaine places, or certaine commodities, or certaine merchants; this indeed is a good argument, à majori ad minus. But because he may restraine totally, therefore, that he may give passage for money, is no good consequence; for in our case, there is no restraint at all, but it is rather a passage for money. If there be just occasion of restraint, the law giveth the king power to restraine. But when merchants may without hurt to the state have passage, as in our case, to enforce them to pay for that passage is in my opinion as unlawfull, as to enforce any man whatsoever to pay for doing that which he may lawfully doe. Merchants have, as I may so say, as good inheritance in their trade, as any man in his lands; and when it may stand with the good of the state, that they may passe, they ought to passe as freely without charge imposed on them, as any man ought to hold his inheritance, or any artificer or other tradesman ought to exercise their lawfull trades and means of living, free from burdens to be laid on by the kings absolute power. If all others should be free, and onely merchants, who adventure their persons and estates in so many dangers, to bring us from farre places such things, as without which we cannot subsist, and to return us profit for our superfluities, should be subject to involuntarie burthens, their estate were of all other mens most unhappy and slavish, which, of all other trades, is indeed the noblest, and most worthy to be cherished.

And here by the way I note, that; in all other nations of the world, where the merchant is subject to impositions at the kings pleasure, the landlord, the farmer, the artificer, the very plowman, and all others, are in like sort subject to taxes and burdens, when the king pleaseth. The merchant is not the man alone that is subject to taxes, and all other men free. If, in the frame of our common-wealth, it were thought fit to free all other trades and professions from taxes, much more ought it to be thought reasonable, that our merchants should be free, and by all means possible encouraged in their trade; for our case is not as it is with other nations of the continent. We are islanders, and divided by the sea from all the world, and in that respect have such use of merchants as we cannot live without them. If therefore any should be free amongst us, it should be the merchant; and not the quite contrary, onely the merchant charged, and all others free. Plato in his 8th book de Rep. is of opinion, that the merchant, for his encouragement to trade, should be free from all custome whatsoever. We seek only to be free of involuntary impositions. But to return to the argument of restraint, from whence I am a little digressed. If it be a good argument, that because the king may restraints in toto, he may restrain in tanto; it will not be denied unto me, for it followeth necessarily, that in cases where he cannot restraints in toto, he cannot restraints in tanto. But there is no man that will say, that he may restraints the entrance and passage of all merchants, to and from all the parts of the world whatsoever, without any limitation of time, but the restraint to endure for ever, and for all kinds of merchandizes whatsoever, of most necessary and common use, to be brought into, or carried out of the realme. There is no man I suppose will say, that the law hath given the king power to make so unreasonable a restraint as this; for it were to give him a power to destroy merchandize, and consequently to ruine the common-wealth. Beside, it were against the law of nations, and of reason itself. It cannot be imagined, that any wise law in the world should allow it. But if our impositions, as it is said, doe imple a restraint, and that a restraint be always the fore-runner of all impositions, then such an unreasonable restraint, as I have spoken of, must needs be presupposed to have been the ground or fore-runner of our present imposition. For in our impositions, are not all the merchandizes of necessary and common use charged? Are not all the merchants, citizens and strangers, importing from any part, or exporting to any part of the world, subject to the charge? Is there any limitation of time, but to endure for ever? If I say such a restraint had been unlawfull, which I suppose no man will deny, then whatsoever implieth such a restraint, which our impositions doe, is likewise unlawfull. But the ill consequence of this their argument drawne from the kings power of restraint, will best appeare by comparing it to other cases.

I little doubt, but the king upon some occasion may lawfully restraints the passage of all men through the gates of London; as for the purpose, when the citie shall be besieged, or in the time of an extreme plague. Nay, is it not by authoritie derived onely from him, that the gates are shut every night? Doth it follow therefore, that because he may doe it upon some extraordinary occasion, or at some time, that he may shut up the passage for ever; or that presupposing such a restraint by his absolute power, he may lay an imposition upon every barthen of any thing brought in, or carried out, as the duke of Florence and many other states in Italy and Germany doe, or upon every man by the poll, that shall passe through the gates?

You see the weaknesse and danger of the consequence of this argument, and how it tends to justifie impositions within the land. And so I leave it, and proceed to the next.

'The ports and haven townes of England are,' say they, 'the kings; and, in regard thereof, he may open and shut them upon what conditions he pleaseth.' I answer,—1. That the position, that all the ports are the kings, is not generally true; for subjects may also be owners of ports, as may appeare by the patent roll of 3 E. 1. M. 1. parl. where you shall finde, that king Ed. 1 granted to the lords of port townes the forfeitures granted to him by parliament, for not duly paying the new custome of the demy-marke within every severall port of theirs, where the merchandizes should happen to be imported or exported. But admitting the truth of the position, yet is the consequence as weake and dangerous, as of any of the rest of their arguments. For are not all the gates of cities and townes, and all the streets and highways in England the kings, and as much subject to be open or shut at his pleasure, as the ports are? Nay, whensoever we speak of the highway in any law businesse, we call it via regia, the kings highway; and the king in his commissions, speaking of London, or any other citie, calls it civitas nostra London, or civitas nostra Exon. Doth it follow therefore, that the king may lay impositions upon every man, or upon all commodities that shall passe through any of these places? Nay, the gates of the kings owne house, for the purpose his palace of Westminster, are his in a farre neerer degree then any of these. May he therefore by his proclamation impose upon every man that shall passe in or out at Westminster-hall doore a summe of money? Doubtlesse he may not; because the king is a person publike, and his subjects ought to have access to him, as to the fountaine of justice, and to the courts of justice sitting by his authoritie. I make little doubt, but his majestie may upon just occasion cause any of these passages to be shut, as he may also the passage at the havens. But when the passage may without danger to the state be open, and that the subjects may passe, his majestie may not then exact money for their passage; for the law hath given the king power over these things, for the good of the common-wealth, and not thereby to charge and burden the subject. If the king may not exact money for passage in and out of his court gates, because of the publikenesse of his person; nor for passage through the gates of cities; much lesse may he for passage out at the ports, which are the great gates of the kingdom, and which the subject ought as freely to enjoy, us the ayre or the water.

Another of their Arguments [the fourth] is this. 'The king is bound to protect merchants from spoile by the enemy; he ought to fortifie the havens, that their ships may there abide in safety; he ought, if occasion be, to

'send ambassadors to forreine princes, to negotiate for them;' and many the like charges is the king by the law to undergoe for the protection of his merchants. It is reason, therefore, that his expence be defraied out of the profit made by merchants; and consequently, that he may impose upon merchandize a moderate charge, thereby to repay himself. The consequence of this argument is thus farre true. The law expects, that the king should protect merchants. Therefore it alloweth him out of merchandize a revenue for the maintenance of his charge, which is the old custome due, as at first I said, by the common-law. But it is no good consequence, that therefore he may take what he list, no more then he may at his pleasure increase that old revenue, which the law giveth him for protecting of subjects in their suits, or for protecting wards, &c.

Another Argument of theirs [the fifth] is this. 'All other princes of the world may impose upon merchandize at their pleasure; and so may make our merchandizes less vendible with them, by laying an imposition upon them, to be paid by us, when they are brought into their territories, whereby their owne commodities of the same nature may be sold more to the gaine of their merchants, and our merchant impoverished, or driven from his trade. They may also lay impositions upon our merchants fetching commodities from thence, and leave their owne merchants free from any imposition in the same case; by which their merchants shall reape all the profit by that commoditie, in affording it better cheape to us here, then we can fetch it, and consequently our merchants shall be undone.' Many the like cases have been put to prove, that if the king of England may not impose, as other princes may, they shall be able at their pleasure to destroy our trading. This I conceive was the same as now it is, during all that time from Ed. 3, till queen Mary; and doubtlesse it could not but sometimes, during that long space, so fall out, that forreine princes did put their power in practise to our prejudice, and yet we heare not of any imposition laid by any of our kings by their absolute power; which may give any man assurance, that they tooke some other course to meet with the inconvenience; and indeed the meanes are divers, which these our kings used to prevent it.—First, they were carefull in all their leagues and treaties with forraine princes, especially to provide for it; as may appeare by the records of the ancient leagues. Neither is there any league of late time, that hath not had an article for provision in this point; which leagues for the most part are upon oath on both parts. And yet, for further securitie, our kings have always had ambassadors resident in the courts of such forraine princes, to put them in minde of their leagues, if upon any occasion our merchants have in that case happened to be never so little wronged by them; and if upon complaint of the ambassador, our merchants have not found redresse, our kings have held the league as broken, and denounced warre, or seized all the goods of the same princes subjects within England; and I dare say there have been more warres undertaken by our princes against forraine nations onely for this cause, then for any one other cause whatsoever.

Besides, our kings have in this case sometimes made use of that their prerogative of restraint, either by prohibiting our merchants from carrying our commodities into those parts, where they are charged with impositions, that so by the want of our commodities, forraine princes might be enforced to abate their impositions laid upon them; or by restraining the merchants of forraine princes to import or export commodities from hence; by which meanes forraine princes have been compelled to deale favourably with our merchants for the good of their owne subjects. All these are lawfull and ordinary means to prevent or redresse the inconvenience which may grow by the impositions of other princes. If all these ordinary means should happen to faile, which can hardly so fall out, and that the laying of impositions be indeed the only means that is left to redresse the inconvenience, why should not that be done by act of parliament as well in these times, as it was in 7 Hen. 7. c. 7. to take downe the imposition of foure ducates upon a but of malmsey, imposed by the Venetians, and as it was done by queen Eliz. the 19th yeere of her reigne, to prevent the laying of impositions by forraine princes upon salt-fish, as may appeare by the printed statutes of 19 Eliz. c. 10. ? But, as I have said, the providence of the prince and ordinary power of restraint may very well meet with the inconvenience.

These are the chiefe Reasons made in maintenance of Impositions. The weaknesse of them, and their dangerous consequence, you cannot but perceive; for, by the same reasons, taxes within the land may be as well proved to be lawfull. On the contrary part, you have heard the reasons against Impositions fortified by many records and statutes in the point. So as I conclude, that Impositions, neither in the time of warre, or other the greatest necessitie or occasion that may be, much lesse in the time of peace, neither upon forraine nor inlaud commodities of whatsoever nature, be they never so superfluous or unnecessary, neither upon merchants strangers nor denizens, may be laid by the kings absolute power, without assent of parliament, be it for never so short a time, much lesse to endure for ever, as ours. Though this be now my opinion, yet am not I so obstinate therein, but if yet I heare better reason, I will once againe change my minde. In the meane while, you see I had reason to alter my first opinion, as being grounded upon very weak reasons, as now they appeare unto me. And so I suppose they doe also unto you.

MR. YELVERTON'S ARGUMENT AGAINST IMPOSITIONS BY THE CROWN.*

The question is, Whether the King, without Assent of Parliament, may set Impositions upon the Wares and Goods of Merchants exported, and imported, out of, and into this Realme?

THREE things have been debated in this parliament, that have much concerned the right of our whole nation, of which every one of them hath exceeded the other by a gradation in weight and moment.—The first was the change of our Name, which was a point of ho-

* By an order of the commons licencing the publication, this Argument appears to have been first printed in 1641. But it is here extracted from an edition of 1658. The title runs thus: 'The Rights of the People concerning Impositions, stated in a learned Argument; with a Remonstrance presented to the kings most excellent majesty, by the honourable House of Commons, in the parliament, A. D. 1610. annoq. regis Jac. 7. By a late eminent Judge of this nation.—The following Address to the Reader was prefixed. To the courteous Reader. This excellent Treatise of the no less worthy author, happily falling into my hands, I instantly thought it my duty to make that public, which had given so much useful satisfaction to many learned, and judicious, in private; remembering that antient adage, bonum quò communius, eò prætantius.—I hope it is needless to commend either the reverend author deceased, the treatise, its use, or stile; since the authority by which it is published, is a sufficient argument of their known worth.—If thou kindly accept of his good meaning, whose onely aim in the publishing hereof was the common good, it will be an encouragement to him (and others) to present to thy view, what may hereafter fall into his hands worthy thy further perusal. Thine; J. B.'

The Address to the Reader was preceded with the following Remonstrance, which was made to king James by the house of commons 24th May 1610.

A Remonstrance delivered to his majesty in writing, after the inhibition given by him to the commons house of parliament, as well by word of mouth, as by letters, not to proceed in the examining his right to impose without assent of parliament.

To the King's most excellent Majesty.

Most gracious Sovereign; whereas we your majesties most humble subjects, the commons assembled in parliament, have received first by message, and since by speech from your majesty, a command of restraint from debating in parliament your majesties right of imposing upon your subjects goods exported, or imported out of, or into this realm; yet allowing us to examine the grievance of these hour, wherein we shewed ourselves not willing to leave that name, by which our ancestors made our nation famous; yet have we lost it, [the name of Britaine not admitted in legall proceedings,] saving onely in those cases, where our ancient and faithfull protector, the common-law, doth retaine it.—The second was the Union, a question of greater moment; for that concerned the freehold of our whole nation; not in so high a point as having, or not having, but in point of division and participation, that is, whether we should enjoy the be-impositions in regard of quantity, time, and other circumstances of disproportion thereto incident: we your said humble subjects nothing doubting but that your majesty had no intent by that command to infringe the antient and fundamental right of the liberty of parliament in point of exact discussing of all matters concerning them, and their possessions, goods, and rights whatsoever, which yet we cannot but conceive to be done in effect by this command, do with all humble duty make this remonstrance unto your majesty.—First, we hold it an antient, general and undoubted right of parliament, to debate freely on all matters which do properly concern the subject, and his right or estate; which freedom of debate being once fore-closed, the essence of the liberty of parliament is withal dissolved.—And whereas in this case the subjects right on the one side, and your majesties prerogatives on the other, cannot possibly be severed in debate of either: we alledge, that your majesties prerogatives of that kinde concerning directly the subjects right and interest, are daily handled and discussed in all courts at Westminster, and have been ever freely debated upon all fit occasions, both in this and all other former parliaments, without restraint; which being forbidden, it is impossible for the subject, either to know, or to maintain his right and propriety to his own lands and goods, though never so just and manifest.—It may further please your most excellent majesty to understand, that we have no minde to impugn, but a desire to inform ourselves of your highness prerogative in that point, which (if ever) is now most necessary to be known; and though it were to no other purpose, yet to satisfie the generality of your majesties subjects, who, finding themselves much grieved by these new impositions, do languish in much sorrow and discomfort.—These reasons, dread sovereign, being the proper reasons of parliament, do plead for the upholding of this our antient right and liberty. Howbeit seeing it hath pleased your majesty to insist upon that judgment in the Exchequer, as being direction sufficient for us without further examination: upon great desire of leaving your majesty unsatisfied in no one point of one of our intents and proceed-nefits and liberties of the kingdome ourselves onely, as we and our ancestors have done, or admit our neighbour nation to have equall right in them, and so make our own part the less, by how much the greater number should be among whom the division was to be made. This was adjudged against us both legally and solemnly, [Coke l. 7. Calvin's case.] and therefore in that we rest, hoping of that effect of this judgement which we read of in the poet,

The third is the question now in hand, which exceedeth the other two in importance and consequence, concerning the whole kingdome; for it is a question of our very essence; not what we shall be called, nor how we shall divide that we have, but whether we shall have any thing or nothing; for if there be a right in the king to alter the property of that which is ours without our consent, we are but tenants at his will of that which we have. If it be in the king and parliament, then have we property, and are tenants at our own will; for that which is done in parliament is done by all our wills and consents. And this is the very state of the question which is proposed, that is, whether the king may impose without consent of parliament.

Impositions are of two natures, forreigne and intestine.—Intestine be those which are raised within our land in the commerce and dealing that is at home within ourselves, and may aswell for that reason be so called, as for that 'vescuntur intestinis reipublice,' they are fed and nourished with the consuming and wasting of the entrails of the common-wealth. Against these I need not to speake; for the king's learned councill have with great honour

'ings, we profess touching that judgment, that we neither do nor will take upon us to reverse it; but our desire is to know the reasons whereupon the same was grounded; and the rather, for that a general conceit is had, that the reasons of that judgment may be extended much further, even to the utter ruine of the antient liberty of this kingdom, and of your subjects right of propriety to their goods and lands.—Then for the judgment itself, being the first and last that ever was given in that kind (for ought appearing unto us,) and being onely in one case, and against one man, it can binde in law no other but that person; and is also reversible by writ of error granted heretofore by act of parliament; and neither he nor any other subject is debarred by it from trying his right in the same or like case, in any of your majesties courts of record at Westminster.—Lastly, we nothing doubt, but our intended proceeding in a full examination of the right, nature, and measure of these new impositions (if this restraint had not come between) should not have been so orderly and so moderately carried and employed to the manifold necessities of these time, and given and conscience in full councell acknowledged them to be against the law.—Therefore I will apply myself to speak of impositions forreine, being the single question now in hand, and maintained on the king's behalfe with great art and eloquence.

The inconvenience of these impositions to the common-wealth, that is, how hurtfull they are to the merchants, in impoverishing them in their estates: to the king in the increasing of his revenues by decay of traffique; and to the whole people in making all commodities excessive deare, is confessed by all, and therefore need no debate. The point of right is now only in question, and of that I will speak with conscience and integrity, rather desirous that the truth may be knowne, and right be done, than that the opinion of myself or any other may prevaile.—The occasion of this question was given by the Book of Rates lately set out, affronted with the copy of letters patents, dated July 28, 6 Jac. In which book, besides the rates, is set down every kind of merchandise, exported and imported, for the true answering of subsidy to the king, according to the statute of tonnage and poundage.

In the first yeare of his reigne there is an addition of impositions upon all those kind of wares, which within the book are expressed, and the rate of the imposition as high and in some cases higher than the rate of the subsidy; and this declared to be by authority of those letters patents. Hereupon considering with my selfe, that heretofore the setting on of one only imposition without assent of parliament, upon some one kinde of merchandise, and that for a small time, and upon urgent necessity of actual war, did so affect our whole nation, and especially the great councill of the parliament, being the representative body of the whole

' your majesty so true a view of the state and right of your subjects, that it would have been much to your majesties content and satisfaction, (which we most desire,) and removed all causes of fears and jealousies from the royal hearts of your subjects, which is (as it ought to be) our careful endeavour: whereas contrariwise in that other way directed by your majesty, we cannot safely proceed without concluding for ever the right of the subject, which without due examination thereof we may not do.—We therefore your loyal and dutiful commous, not swerving from the approved steps of our ancestors, most humbly and instantly beseech your gracious majesty, that, without offence to the same, we may, according to the undoubted right and liberty of parliament, proceed in our intended course of a full examination of these impositions; that so we may chearfully pass on to your majesties business, from which this stop hath by diversion so long withheld us. And we your majesties most humble, faithful, and loyal subjects shall ever (according to our bounden duty) pray for your majesties long and happy reign over us.'

common-wealth, that neither the sun did shine, nor the rivers run their courses until it was taken off by the public judgment of the whole state; I thought it concerned me, and other members of that councell, that were no less trusted for our country than those in former times, and have their actions to guide and direct us, to have the same care they had in preserving the rights and liberties of the people, having now more cause than they had, for that the impositions now set on without assent of parliament, are not upon one or two speciall kinds of goods, but almost indefinite upon all, and do extend to the number of many hundreds, as appeareth by that printed book of rates, and are set in charge upon the whole kingdome as an inheritance to continue to the king, his heires and successors for ever; which limitation of estate in matter of impositions was never heard of, nor read of before, as I conceive.—The inducements expressed in these letters patents are much upon point of state, and with reference to the rights and practise of forraine princes. For this I will not take upon me to enter into the consideration of such great mysteries of policie and government, but will only put you in minde of that I observe out of Tit. Livius [l. 3.] the Roman historiographer. ‘Omne divini humanique moris memoriam abolemus, cum nova peregrinaque patriis et priscis preferimus.’

To that which hath been spoken for the kings prerogative, I will give answer to so much of it as I may conveniently in my passage through this debate: wherein I will principally endeavour to give satisfaction to such new objections as were made by the worthie and learned counsellor of the king, that spake last in maintenance of his majesties prerogative.

The case in termes is this. The king by his letters patents before recited, hath ordained, willed, and commanded, that these new impositions, contained in that book of rates, shall be for ever hereafter payd unto him his heires and successors, upon paine of his displeasure. [Pat. July 28 Jac. 6.] Hereupon the question ariseth, whether by this edict and ordinance so made by the king himselfe, by his letters patents of his own will and power absolute, without assent of parliament, he be so lawfully intituled to that he doth impose, as that thereby, he doth alter the property of his subjects goods, and is enabled to recover these impositions by course of law.

I think he cannot; and I ground my opinion upon these four reasons.—1. It is against the naturall frame and constitution of the policie of this kingdome, which is jus publicum regni, and so subverteth the fundamentall law of the realme, and induceth a new forme of state and government.—2. It is against the municipall law of the land, which is jus privatum, the law of property and of private right.—3. It is against divers statutes made to restraine our king in this point.—4. It is against the practice and action of our common wealth, contra morem majorum; and this is the modestest rule to limit both king's prerogatives, and subjects liberties.

Upon the first and fourth of these four principal grounds I will more insist then upon the second and third, both for that in their own nature they are a more proper matter for a councel of state, to the judgment of which I apply my discourse, and they have not been enforced by others; as also for that the other two, as more fit for a barre, and the courts of ordinary justice, have by some professors of the law been already most learnedly and exquisitely discussed.

For the first, it will be admitted for a rule, and ground of state, that in every common-wealth and government there be some rights of sovereignty, jura majoritatis, which regularly and of common right doe belong to the sovereign power of that state; unless custome, or the provisional ordinance of that state, doe otherwise dispose of them: which sovereign power is potestas suprema, a power that can controule all other powers, and cannot be controuled but by itself.—It will not be denied, that the power of imposing hath so great a trust in it, by reason of the mischiefs may grow to the common-wealth by the abuses of it, that it hath ever been ranked among those rights of sovereign power.—Then is there no further question to be made, but to examine where the sovereign power is in this kingdome; for there is the right of imposition.—The sovereign power is agreed to be in the king: but in the king is a two-fold power; the one in parliament, as he is assisted with the consent of the whole state; the other out of parliament, as he is sole, and singular, guided merely by his own will. And if of these two powers in the king one is greater than the other, and can direct and controule the other; that is suprema potestas, the sovereign power, and the other is subordinata.—It will then be easily proved, that the power of the king in parliament is greater than his power out of parliament; and doth rule and controule it; for if the king make a grant by his letters patents out of parliament, it bindeth him and his successors: he cannot revoke it, nor any of his successors; but by his power in parliament he may defeate and avoyd it; and therefore that is the greater power.

If a judgement be given in the King's-bench, by the king himselfe, as may be, and by the law is intended, a writ of error, to reverse this judgement, may be sued before the king in parliament; which writ must be granted by the chancellor, upon bill indorsed by the king himselfe as the book is 1 H. 7. 19. 6 [Lib. Intrac. fol. 302. c. 1.] And the forme of the writ of error is, that it being directed to the chiefe justice of the King's-bench; ‘quia in recordo et processu, ac etiam in redditione judicii loquelæ, quæ fuit in curiâ nostrâ coram nobis, error intervenit manifestus ad grave damnum, &c. nos errorem (si quis fuerit) modo debito corrigi, et partibus prædictis plenam et celerem justitiam fieri volentes, in hæc parte vobis mandamus, quod recordum et processum loquelæ illius cum omnibus ea tangentibus, in præsens parliamentum nostrum sub sigillo tuo distinctè et apertè mittas et hoc breve, ut inspectis, &c. nos de consilio et advisamento dominorum spiritualium et temporalium, ac communitatis in parlamento nostro prædicto existentis, ulterius pro errore illo corrigendo fieri faciamus, quod de jure et secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nostri Angliæ fuerit faciendum.' So you see the appeal is from the king out of the parliament, to the king in parliament; the writ is in his name; the rectifying and correcting the errors is by him, but with the assent of the lords and commons, than which there can be no stronger evidence to prove, that his power out of parliament is subordinate to his power in parliament: for in acts of parliament, be they lawes, grounds, or whatsoever else, the act and power is the kings, but with the assent of the lords and commons, which maketh it the most soveraigne and supreme power above all, and controulable by pope. Besides this right of imposing, there be others in the kingdome of the same nature. As the power to make lawes; the power of naturalization; the power of erection of arbitrary government: the power to judge without appeal; the power to legitimate; all which do belong to the king only in parliament. Others there be of the same nature, that the king may exercise out of parliament, which right is grown unto him in them, more in those others by the use and practice of the common-wealth, as denization, coynage, making warre; which power the king hath time out of minde practised, without the gain saying and murmuring of his subjects. But these other powers before-mentioned have ever been executed by him in parliament, and not otherwise, but with the reluctance of the whole kingdome.

Can any man give me a reason, why the king can only in parliament make lawes? No man ever read any law whereby it was so ordained; and yet no man ever read that any king practised the contrary. Therefore it is the originall right of the kingdome, and the very natural constitution of our state and policy, being one of the highest rights of soveraigne power. So it is in naturalization, legitimation, and the rest of that sort before recited.

It hath been alleadged, that those, which in this cause have enforced their reasons from this maxime of ours, 'That the king cannot alter the law,' have diverted from the question.—I say under favor they have not; for that in effect is the very question now in hand; for if he alone out of parliament may impose, he altereth the law of England in one of these two maine fundamental points. He must either take his subjects goods from them, without assent of the party, which is against the law; or else he must give his own letters patents the force of a law, to alter the property of his subjects goods, which is also against the law.

That the king of England cannot take his subjects goods, without their consent, it need not to be proved more than a principle. It is jus indigenæ, an old homeborne right, declared to be law by divers statutes of the realme. As in 34 E. 3, cap. 2. that no officer of the kings, or of his heires, shall take any goods of any manner of person without the assent and goodwill of the party to whom the goods belonged. The same is declared in many other statutes made against prisages and purveyances. Neither have ever any kings attempted to go plainly and directly against that right, but have devised certaine legal colours and shadows for their wrongfull doing in that kind, which I doe find were of three sorts: by way of Commission; by way of Loan; by way of Benevolence. Commissions of all other were the most insolent; for they went out, as it were by authority, to levy ayd of the people upon great necessity of the common-wealth. These were condemned in parliament, 21 E. 3, numb. 16, upon a grievous complaint made of the use of them by the commons, unto the king in parliament: wherein the people doe pray the king, that he would be pleased to remember, how at the parliament held the 17th year of his reign, and at the last parliament, it was then accorded, and granted by their said lord the king and his counsell, that there should goe out no commissions out of Chauncery for hobbeleries, archers, and other charges to be levied upon the people, if they were not granted in parliament; which ordinances were not observed, by reason whereof the people were impoverished and decayed, for which they prayed the king, that he would be pleased to take pity of his people, and the ordinances and grants made to his people in parliament to affirme and hold; and that if such commissions goe out without assent of parliament, that the commons, which are grieved there by, may have writs of supersedeas, according to the said ordinance, and that the people be not bound to obey them.

To this the kings Answer is,—'Si ul tiel imposition fuit fait per grand necessitie, et ceo del assent des prelates, countes, barons, et autres grandes et aautres homes des commons adonq; presents, meant moins nostre seignior le roy ne vuet, que tiel imposition non dument fait soit treit in consequence, eins voet que les ordinances dont cest petition fait mention soit bienment gardes.'

The last time that ever king attempted that course of exaction was 17 H. 8, upon the taking of the French king at Pavia, by the forces of Charles the fifth. [Stowes Annals, 17 H. 8.] Cardinal Wolsey, having a purpose to put the king into a warre about that quarrel, and finding his coffers empty, advised this way, to send out commissions, and by them to levie ayd of the people, according to the value of their estate. But this gave such discontent to the whole realme, that it caused in many places an actual rebellion; and the cardinal, being called to give an account of this bad advice, did justify this fact by the example of Joseph, who advised Pharaoh to take the fifth part of his subjects goods. But when he saw that would not serve the turne, he falsely laid it upon the judges, informing the king, he did it by their advice, being resolved by them of the lawfulness of the fact. So you see, that great churchmen found more safety in matter of government of our common-wealth, in making a false report of a point of the common-law, then in a true text of the scripture. And if any churchmen will endeavor by application of the text of scripture, to overthrow the antient laws and liberties of the kingdom, I would advise them to be admonished by the ill success of the cardinal in this particular action, and by the miserable catastrophe of his whole life and fortunes.

Loans and apprests were those which we call privy seals, which though they were more moderate in shew, yet being made against the good-will of the parties, were as injurious indeed as the other. The commons in parliament, 25 E. 3, [Rot. Par.] num. 16, made a grievous complaint to the king against the use of them, and prayed, that none from henceforth should be compelled to make loans against their will; and they gave this reason, in their petition, for that it is against reason, and the franchise of the land, and prayed that restitution might be made to those that have made such loans.—To this the kings rescript was; 'It pleaseth our lord the king it be so.'

Lastly, came in those kinde of exactions, which were termed by the fair name of Benevolences; but they became so odious, as they gave the occasion of a good law to be made against themselves, and against all other shifts and devices, by what new terms soever imposed upon the subjects. The law is, 1 R. 3, cap. 2. and is thus. The king, remembering how the commons of this his realm, by new and unlawful inventions and inordinate covetise, against the law of this realm, have been put to great servitude and important charges and exactions, and especially by a new imposition called a Benevolence, enacted by the advise, &c. that the subjects and commons of this land from henceforth shall in no wise be charged by any such charges or impositions called the Benevolence, nor by such like thing.—But if you will deny, that the king doth in this case take the goods of his subject without his assent, then you must fall upon mine alternative proposition, that the kings patent hath in this case the power of a law, to alter property; for how can he recover the imposed by a legal course of proceeding, and by judgment in his court, but upon a title precedent him, before the action brought, which title must be a property in the same imposed; and how cometh he by that property, but by his own letters patents, by which he declareth he will have that same as an imposition? For the judgment giveth not the right, but only doth manifest and declare it, and giveth execution of it. So in this point the question is, whether the kings patent hath the force and power of the law, or not; for if it be not maintained that it hath, it can never be concluded, that he can transfer the property of his subjects goods to himself, without the assent of them; for 'quod meum est, sine facto meo alterius fieri non potest.' And if you give this power to the kings patent, you subject the law, and take away all rules and bounds of settled government, and leave in the subject no property of his own, neither do you by this advance the kings power and prerogative, but you make him no king; for, as Bracton saith, [l. 1. c. 8.] 'ex est, ubi dominatur lex, non voluntas.'

So we see, that the power of imposing and power of making laws are 'convertibilia et coincidentia;' and whatsoever can do the one, can do the other. And this was the opinion of sir John Fortescue, that reverend and honorable judge, a very learned professor of the common-law, and chief justice of the Kings-bench, in the time of Henry 6. his words are these, in his book De laudibus Legum Angliæ, cap. 9. 'Non potest rex Angliæ ad libitum leges mutare regni sui; principatu namque nedum regali, sed et politico, ipse dominatur. Si regali tantum præset iis, leges mutare posset; tallagia quoque, et cætera onera imponere, ipsis inconsultis, quale dominium leges civiles indicant, cum dicunt quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem. Sed longè aliter potest rex politicis imperans; quia nec leges ipse sine subditorum assensu mutare poterit, nec subjectum populum renitentem onerare peregrinis impositionibus.' In which place I must interpret unto you, that 'peregrinæ impositiones' be not strange and unheard of impositions, as was urged by the worthy gentleman that spake last; but impositions upon traffick into and out of forrain countries, which is the very thing in question. Further, in the 36th chapter, he saith of the king of England, 'neque rex ibidem per se aut ministros suos tallagia, subsidia, aut alia quævis onera imponit liges suis, aut leges eorum mutat, vel novas condit, sine concessione vel assensu totius regni sui in parlamento.' So he maketh these two powers of making law and imposing to be concomitant in the same hand, and that the one of them is not without the other. He giveth the same reason for this, as we do now, but in other words; because (as he saith) in England it is 'principatus mixtus et politicus,' the king hath his sovereign power in parliament, assisted and strengthened with the consent of the whole kingdom, and therefore these powers are to be exercised by him only in parliament. In other countries they admit the ground of the civil law, 'quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem.' Because they have an absolute power to make law, they have also a power to impose, which hath the force of a law in transferring property. Philip Comines, that lived at that time, in his fourth book, the first chapter, the fifth book, the eighth chapter, taketh notice of this policy of England, and commends it above all other states, as settled in most security; and further to our purpose laith this ground, that a king cannot take one penny from his subjects without their consent, but it is violence. And you may there note the mischiefs that grew to the kingdom of France, by the voluntary impositions first brought in by Charles 7, and ever since continued, and encreased, to the utter impoverishment of the common people, and the loss of their free council of three estates. And if this power of imposing were quietly settled in our kings, considering what is the greatest use they make of assembling of parliaments, which is the supply of money, I do not see any likelihood to hope for often meetings in that kind, because they would provide themselves by that other means. And thus much for my first reason, grounded upon the natural constitution of the policy of our kingdom, and the publike right of our nation.

2. For the point of common-law, which is my second Reason, it hath been well debated, and nothing left unspoken that can be said in it; and therefore I will decline to speak of that, which other men have well discussed; and the rather, for that there is nothing in our law-book directly, and in point of this matter; neither is the word (imposition) found in them, until the case in my lord Dier, 1 Eliz. 165; for we shall finde this business of an higher strain, and alwaies handled elsewhere, as afterwards shall appear. Yet I will offer some answers to such objections as have been made on the contrary in point of common-law, and have not been much stood upon by others to be answered.

The objections that have been made are these; that from the first book of the law to the last, no man ever read any thing against the kings power of imposing. No judgement was ever given against it, in any of the kings courts at Westminster. Other points of prerogative as high as this, disputed and debated, his excess in them limited; as in the book of 42. Ass. pl. 5. where the judges took away a commission from one, that had power given by it to him under the great seal to take ones person, and to seize his goods before he was indicted. So master Scrogs case 1 and 2. Eliz. Dier. 175. the power of the king in making a commission to determine a question of right depending between two parties, notably debated, and ruled against the king, that he could not grant it.

To this I answer, that cases of this nature, of which the question now handled is, have ever been taken to be of that extraordinary consequence, in point of the common right of the whole kingdom, that the state would never trust any of the courts of ordinary justice with the deciding of them; but assumed the cognisance of them unto the high court of parliament, as the fittest place to decide matters so much concerning the whole body of the kingdom. As 2 Ed. 3. 7. it appears that Ed. 1. had granted a charter to the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ships of merchants, coming to the port of Yarmouth, should land their goods at their haven, and not at any other haven at that port, as at Garneston, and Little Yarmouth, which were members of that port. This was very inconvenient for the merchants, and a great hurt to traffick, and therefore the charter was questioned in the time of Ed. 2. and adjudged good by the council. But the parties not contented with this judgment, in the second year of king E. 3. by an order in parliament made upon a petition there exhibited against this grant, brought a scire facias out of the Chaucery returnable in the Kings-bench, to question again the lawfulness of the patent. And in that suit the cause was notably debated, and those reasons much insisted upon that have been enforced in this case; as that of the kings power in the custody of the ports. But the matter so depending in the ordinary court of justice, a writ came out of the parliament, and did adjourn it thither again, where it gave occasion of a good law to be made to prevent the like grants, and to make them void notwithstanding any judgment given upon them, and to make such judgments also void. The statute is 9 E. 3. c. 1. And in the parliament rolls, 2 H. 4. num. 109. we finde a notable record, which gives warrant for the proceeding in parliament in this manner as hath been in this case, notwithstanding the judgment in the Exchequer, and declares to the kingdom, that, notwithstanding the great wonder made by some men, nothing hath been done in this business by those that serve in the parliament, but in imitation of their worthy predecessors in the like case. In the second year of H. 4. the commons shew that in the time of R. 2. by the means of John Waltham, bishop of Salisbury, treasurer of England; wrongfully, without authority of parliament, and by reason of a judgment given in the Exchequer, 16 and 17 R. 2. by the barons there, against certain merchants of Bristol, and other places, passage had been taken for wines otherwise then in ancient times had been, and therefore they prayed, they might pay their prise wines in the manner they had used to pay, notwithstanding any judgment given in the Exchequer, or other ordinance made by the said treasurer, contrary to the antient usage; which petition the king granted, and the judgment thereupon became void, and the prisage wine hath been paid contrary to the judgment ever since.

In 1 El. Dier. 165, upon the complaint, made by the merchants, of the impositions set upon cloth by queen Mary, by her absolute power, without assent of parliament; the cause was thought too weighty to be decided in any one court; but, as it appeareth in the book, it was referred to all the judges of England, who divers times had conference about it. So it may well be, there is nothing against it in our year books, for there is nothing of it.

Another objection was this, which was made in the last argument, viz. that custom is originally due by the common law of England; it can then have no other ground or cause, but meerly by the kings royal prerogative, as a right and duty originally belonging to his crown: which if it be, it must necessarily follow he may impose, for that is but the exercising of that right. To prove this was alleaged the case 39 Eliz. 3. 13. by which case it appeareth, that king John had a custom of 8*d.* on a tun of wine in the port of Southampton, but the book doth not tell you that the king had it by prerogative, and he might have it as well otherwise; as by prescription, or convention, which shall rather be intended, by reason of the certainty of the sum paid; for if it were by prerogative, he might take sometimes more, sometimes less at his will, the right being indefinite, and the quantity limited only by his own discretion. A common person may have such a custom certain, as 18 El. Dier. 352. The mayor of London hath the twentieth part of salt brought into the city by aliens, which is a great imposition, but is good by prescription originally, and hath received greater strength since, by acts of parliament made for the confirmation of the liberties and customs of the city of London. So it appeareth that John of Britain had custom of the ships that arrived at his port of Little Yarmouth, worth 20*l.* per annum. And these instances do infer, that a custom may be otherwise then by prerogative, and therefore it is no good argument to conclude, 'the king had such a custom, therefore he had it by prerogative.'

The book in 30 H. 8. Dier. 43. was much pressed on this point, which saith that custom belonged to the king at common law, and doth instance in wooll, woollfells, and leather, begun at the common law, but abridged by the statute of 14 E. 3. cap. 21. stat. 1. But this appeareth to be a great error, and mistaking in the book; for we do finde, that that custom of woolls, woollfells, and leather, was begun by a grant in parliament, as appeareth in statute 15 E. 1. cap. 7. The words be, 'granted to us by the commonalty aforesaid;' and the last mention before was that the king had granted to the bishops, earls, barons, and all the commonalty of the land, &c. Novemb. 3 Ed. 1. The king recited in his letters patents, that 'prelati, magnates, ac tota communitas mercatorum regni,' granted this new custom. And so the ground and motive of that opinion being false, all grounded upon that must needs be erroneous.—It was objected, that the king holdeth at this day the increase of 4*d.* in the pound, over due custom, paid by merchants aliens according to the purport of the Charta Mercatoria 31 Ed. 1. [Rot. Char. num. 42. in Turri.] by meer right of prerogative at the common law; for by that grant of the merchants he cannot hold it, they being no body politick at the time of the grant; and therefore the grant is meerly void to binde in succession; and yet the merchants aliens do pay it at this day.

It is agreed, that by the common law a contract with a number not incorporate bindeth not succession. But we must take notice, that they, by whom that grant was made, of the augmentation of custom, by 3*d.* in the pound, and other encreases, 31 E. 1. were merchants aliens, who by the law of merchants and nations may contract to bind their successors in matters of traffick. For their contracts are not ruled by the common law of the land, but by the law of nations, et per legem mercatoriam, as the book case is, 3 E. 4. 10. and there was a good consideration given them by the king for this encrease of custome, as discharge of prise wines for 2*s.* the tun, and other immunities, which all merchants aliens hold and enjoy at this day, by force of that contract made, 31 E. 1. for a stranger paieth now but 2*s.* the tun for prisage, whereas it standeth an Englishman in much more. The rule of commutative justice maketh the contract available to the king against the merchants, because he parteth with that part of his prisage to the merchant; and maketh it available to the merchant against the king, because he giveth him encrease of custom above that is due by law. But the statute of 27 E. 3. cap. 26. heretofore cited, doth make this point clear without scruple, which confirmeth the charter of 31 E. 1. entirely; and by that the encrease of custom by 3*d.* in the pound, which is by name mentioned in the statute, is now due by act of parliament.

If you will have the king hold this encrease of custom by prerogative, you go directly against his meaning; for it appeareth by that which presently followed this grant, that the king took this encrease of custom by way of contract onely, and not by way of prerogative; for the same year following he directeth his writs to the officers of his ports, reciting the contract made with the aliens by Charta Mercatoria; adding further, that some denizens were willing to pay the like custom, upon the same immunities to them to be granted, and doth assign his officers to gather it, but with this clause, 'si gratanter et absque coertione solvere voluerint, ita quod aliquem mercatorem de regno et potestate nostrâ ad præstationes et custodias hujusmodi invite solvendas nullatenus distringatis.' Nothing can more plainly express, that the kings intention was not to demand this by way of prerogative, but by force of the contract. If there were such a prerogative in the crown, as of right to have custom, how cometh it to pass this prerogative never yet had fruit or effect? For this I can maintain, that the king of England hath not 1*d.* custom of imposition upon merchandizes, elder then the 4th year of queen Mary, that he holdeth not by act of parliament, and by the peoples grant. The eldest, that he hath, is that of woolls, woollfells, and leather, and that is by act of parliament, as appeareth in the statute 25 E. 1. cap. 7. the tonnage and poundage by parliament in the first year of every kings reign, and the aliens encrease of custom by parliament 27 E. 3. cap. 26. Then this prerogative hath been much neglected, that it was never called on to be put in execution, untill now of late years.

Concerning the statutes made for restraining our kings from the exercise of this pretended prerogative, which is the third matter I stand upon; those that have maintained the kings prerogative in this point, have endeavoured to interpret those statutes to extend onely to restrain him from imposing upon wooll, woollfells, and leather, which are staple commodities. And the reason they give for this restraint, more then for other goods, is, because the king by statute is restrained to a custom certain for those commodities, as the half mark a sack of wooll, and half a mark 300 woollfells, and 13 s. and 4 d. a last of leather; and therefore great reason he should not exceed this custom in these commodities.

This objection receiveth many answers. First, it appeareth both by the express letter of divers of the laws made in this point, by the occasion that induced the making of the laws, and by the execution of them, that all other wares and merchandises, as well as those of the staple, were within the purpose and intent of those laws. Secondly, the reason alledged, why there should be restraint for the staple commodities, rather then for the other, is mistaken; for the lords and commons did grant to E. 1. by act of parliament the custom of the half mark for wooll, woollfells and leather, which was matter of meer grace and liberality, and includeth no restraint in it, but rather a favourable extention, quite contrary to the sence of the objection, according to that rule of interpretation, gratiosa ampliari decet, odiosa restringi. And admit some laws be made expressly to restrain impositions upon wooll, wooll-fells and leather, by reason that the occasion of making such laws was the actual imposing upon those goods at that time, shall we not by good construction, secundum mentem extensivam legis, extend this law to other wares and merchandizes that are within the same mischief? If we look to the reason of the law, we shall make no doubt of it: for that is, because the impositions were without assent of parliament, not because they were upon such and such commodities. Besides, those laws so made are declarative juris antiqui, non introductiva novi.

In the enumeration of those statutes which I conceive make directly to this purpose, I will endeavour rather to answer the objections made against them, then to enforce the sence and meaning of them, which is very plain and open, and needs no interpretation. The first statute enforced is Mag. Charta, cap. 30, made in the ninth year of H. 3. by which it is enacted, that all merchants shall have free egress and regress out of and into this realm, with their goods and merchandizes, to buy and sell, 'sine omnibus malis tolneis per antiquas et rectas consuetudines.' In which words we may infer, that both the use and right of imposing are absolutely excluded, and debarred: for consuetudo, which in this case is to be taken for usage, which is mos, (not improperly for portorium, a duty paid in money, as our English word custom in one sence doth signifie) implieth a beginning and continuance by consent and will of the parties, not by power and enforcement, which cannot be a custom; and therefore it cannot be an imposition; for that ariseth meerly out of the will and power of the imposer, and is against the will of him upon whose goods it is set. But take consuetudo either for mos or portorium, the epithites with which it is qualified, antiquum and rectum, do describe it to be of that nature that it cannot be an imposition. For antiquum, in legal construction, is that which is time out of mind, that is not an imposition; for then by continuance of time it should grow a right by prescription, and were justifiable. Rectum implieth a limited right, which inferreth there may be a wrong, and exceeding of that right, which is not in impositions; for if there be a right in the king to impose, the quantity, time, and other circumstances are in his discretion; the right is illimited. And if he set on never so great an imposition, there is as much right in it, as if it be never so small. The excess maketh it a burthen, but not a wrong.

We may further observe, that, in the statute, malum tolneum, which is evil toll, is set down by way of antithesis to antiqua, and recta consuetudo; by which is inferred, that exactions upon wares and merchandizes not qualified with these two properties of antiquum and rectum, are evil and unjust. This is made more evident by a record in the Tower of 16 H. 3. which was a mandat sent by the king to the customers of his ports for the execution of this law made in 9 H. 3. whereby it is commanded, 'quod omnibus mercatoribus in portum suum venientibus cum viniis, et aliis merchandizis, scire faciant, quod salvo et secure in terram Angliæ veniant cum viniis et merchandizis suis, faciendo inde rectas et dubitas consuetudines, nec sibi timeant de malis tolneis, quæ iis faciat rex, vel in terrâ suâ fieri permittat.' By this record the word consuetudo is interpreted to be mos, not portorium; otherwise it should have been solvendo consuetudines, not faciendo. Also these words antiquum et rectum in the statute in this writ are rectum et debitum, which doth more enforce a certainty of right and duty, which by no means can be intended in impositions.—Objections against this law were made in the last argument. First, that it was made for aliens. This is true; the words of the law do plainly shew it was made for aliens. But if the state was so careful to provide for them, shall we not judge, that with denizens it was so already? And that this statute was made to extend that liberty by act of parliament to aliens, which denizens had by the common law, succeeding times did so conceive of it, as appeareth by the statute of 2 E. 3. cap. 9. The words are, that all merchants strangers and princes may go and come with their merchandizes in England after the tenor of the Great Charter, and that writs be thereupon sent to all the sheriffs in England, and to mayors and bayliffs of good towns, where need shall require.

A second objection was made in the last argument, out of these words of the statute of Magna Charta, that merchants might freely traffique, 'nisi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint:' by which was enforced, that the king had power to restrain and prohibit traffique; therefore to impose.—It is agreed there may be a public restraint of traffique, upon respects of the common good of the kingdom; but whether that which is called publica prohibitio in the statute, be intended by the king alone, or by act of parliament, is a question: for such restraints have still been by parliament. But admit the king may make a restraint of traffique in part for some public respect of the commonwealth, he doth this in point of protection, as trusted by the commonwealth to do that which is for the public good of the kingdom; but if he use this trust to make a gain and benefit by imposing, that is a breach of the trust, and a sale of government and protection. But more of this shall be hereafter spoken in the answering of the main objections.

The next law is that notable statute of E. 1. [cap. 7.] in the 25th year of his reign, made upon the very point in question. The words are these. 'And forasmuch as the most part of the commonalty of this realm find themselves sore grieved with the male toll of wools, that is, to wit, a toll of forty shillings for every sack of wooll, and have petitioned to us for to release the same; we at their request have clearly released it, and have granted for us and our heirs, that we shall not take such things without their common consent and good will, saving to us and our heirs the customs of wools, skins, and leather, granted before by the commonalty aforesaid.'—Against the application of this law to the question now in hand, many objections were made; some out of matter precedent to the law, some out of the law itself, some out of matter subsequent and following after the law.

For matter precedent, it was objected out of Thomas Walsingham, an historiographer of good credit, [fo. 71, 72, 73. edit. per W. Camb. impres. Francof. 1603.] that writ of that time when the statute was made, that in the petition of grievances given to king E. 1. by the people in the 25th of his reign, upon which petition the statute was made, that they found themselves not grieved, in point of right, but in point of excess. The words are, 'communitas sentit se gravatam de vectigali lanarum, quod nimis est onerosum, viz. de quolibet sacco 40s. et de lanà fractâ septem marcus.' So they express the cause of their grief, that it was too heavy; which is to be applied to the point of excess, not of right.

To this I answer, that if the words had been, 'quia est nimis onerosum,' this construction might have been made out of them; because the word quia had induced a declaration of the cause of that which was formerly affirmed: but the words are, 'quod nimis onerosum,' which doth only positively affirm, that the imposition de facto was intolerable for the greatness of it, which doth not therefore admit, that it is tolerable in respect of the right the king had to impose. But this is made clear by the general word precedent in the preamble of the petition, which doth evidently infer, they grounded their complaint upon point of right, not upon point of excess. The words are these, 'tota terræ communitas sentit se valdè gravatam, quia non tractantur secundum leges et consuetudines terræ, secundum quas tractari antecessores sui solebant habere, sed voluntariè excluduntur.' After which preamble, among the particulars, this of forty shillings upon a sack of wooll is ranked, but with a dependency of that expressed in the preamble for the point of right. But seeing we light upon history, which though it be of small authority in a law argument, yet being the history of our own realm, hath fit and proper use in the common council of the realm, I will pursue it a little further, out of Matth. Westm. a writer that lived much nearer the time of the law made, then Thomas Walsingham. He saith, [fo. 430. edit. per H. Savilemil. Francofurti 1601.] that the commons by their petitions required 'ne rex de cætero tallagia usurparet, et voluntarias super his inductas exactiones de cætero quasi in irritum revocaret,' by which it appeareth, that the point of the complaint was that the exactions laid on them were voluntary, that is, at the kings will without assent of parliament.

Out of the law it self it hath much been pressed, as first the commons made petition to the king; whereupon they infer out of the nature of the word petition, that their proceeding was by way of grievance, for the excess and inconvenience, as a matter of grace, not in course of justice for the wrong.—To this I answer, that considering the quality of the parties to this action, it being between the king and the subject, duty and good manners doth induce gentleness and humility of terms, without bluish or diminution of the force of right. It is according to the demeanor of Job, ix. 15. 'though I were just, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge.' But in our forms of law, be the right of the subject never so clear, manifest, and acknowledged by all; yet if his own be detained from him by the king, he hath no other writ or action to recover, but a meer petition supplicat celsitudini, &c. So as if the word petition to the king infer defect of right in the petitioner, there can be no case where the king can do the subject wrong.

A second objection out of the body of the law is, that the king doth release that imposition of forty shillings, which implieth a right settled in him.—But to this I answer, that it is no necessary inference, wheresoever a release of right is; for it is used for claim onely, or where possession was, though wrongful, and that 'in majorem securitatem, quia abundans cautela non nocet.' But in this case, a release was very expedient, and for some respect necessary, to extinguish a right the king had in this imposition against the merchants themselves. For this imposition, though it were not set on by assent of parliament, yet was it not set on by the kings absolute power; but was granted to him by the merchants themselves, who were to be charged with it. So the grievance was the violation of the right of the people, in setting it on without their assent in parliament, not the damage that grew by it; for that did onely touch the merchants, who could not justly complain thereof, because it was their own act and grant. This appeareth by two notable records, the one 22 E. 1. [Origin. in Scac. Rem. Thes.] a writ to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer in Ireland, to discharge the merchants there of impositions on woolls; in which the king reciteth, 'licet in subsidium guerræ regis pro recuperandâ terrâ Vnscopiâ mercatorum gratanter concesserunt per biennium vel triennium, si tantum duravit guerra, de sacco lanae, &c.' The other record is the writ of publication, that in 26 E. 1. [Mem. Scac. Rem. Thes.] went out after the statute of 25, in which writ the king reciteth thus, 'cum nos ad instantium communitatis regni nostri remiserimus custumam 40s. nobis nuper in subsidium guerræ nostræ contra regem Franciæ concessum, &c.'

A third objection made out of the body of the statute, by those which have argued on the contrary part, was upon these words, that the king would take no such things without common consent; by which words they conceived the intention of the law was limited precisely to impositions set upon wooll, and not on other commodities, which are not such things, but other: and for this they alledge this reason, that it was not probable, when the complaint was only for an imposition on wooll, that the king would give a remedy for other things not spoken of, for which there was no cause of complaint.—To this a full answer is given many ways. First, out of the saving in the act, which extends to other things then to wooll, as to wooll-fells and leather; therefore the purview of the act by these words, 'such things,' extendeth to more then the wooll; for there needs no saving, but for that which is contained in the purview. Secondly, the reason alledged, that no more by likelihood should be remedied but for wooll, because onely that was complained of, is false: for the complaint of the commons was not onely for this imposition on wooll, but divers other burthens and grievances of the like nature. And this will appear if we compare all the parts of the law, the one with the other; for this law is in the form of a charter written in French, and beginneth, 'Edward by the grace of God, &c.' and is an entire grant, and instrument without fractions, sections, and chapters, as it is now printed, and contained in it, next before this last clause concerning the impositions on woolls, which in the printed book is cap. 6. that the king, for no business from thenceforth, will take no manner of aids, mises nor prises, but by common assent. This word mises, in French signifieth properly impositions, derived of the word mitto in Latine so put. So the word 'such things,' is a conclusion to all the premises, and hath relation not onely to that which is made cap. 7. by the printer, and concerneth the male toll of woolls, but to that precedent, which is all other aids impositions and takings. The writ of publication of this statute sent out to all parts in 26 E. 1. [Mem. Scac. Rem. Thes.] maketh plain this construction. The words of it are, 'concedentes quod custumam illam vel aliam, sine voluntate vel communi assensu non capiamus.' These words, 'vel aliam,' are indefinite, and extend to any other whatsoever, besides that of woolls. The writ doth further discharge merchants for the commodities of wooll-fells and leather, which are not complained of by name in the statute; and therefore the law was intended to other impositions as well as to those upon woolls.—The objection made out of matter subsequent to the statute was this, that notwithstanding this law of 25 E. 1. impositions, that before the statute had been set on other merchandize then woolls, were still answered after the statute; and for instance of this was alledged, that whereas 16 E. 1. [Orig. R. Thes.] an imposition of 40s. the tun was set upon wines brought into the kingdom, an account was made of this in the Exchequer in 26 E. 1. as by the records there appeareth; by which it seemeth that the law of 25 E. 1. was not taken to extend to wines, and such other commodities, other then woolls named in the statute. It is true, such an imposition was set on by E. 1. in the sixteenth year of his reign, and an account made for it 25. and 26. But it appeareth by the record [T. Mich. R. Thes.] of the account, that it was made for the time ended before the statute made: as from the eighteenth of May, 16 E. 1. to 23 Jul. 22 E. 1. But there is no record, that ever any account was made for any money received for that imposition for the time after the statute made; neither was it very willingly answered before; for it appeareth by the record that it was ten years after the setting of it.

The third statute alledged, on the behalf of the subject, is that 34 E. 1. c. 1. the words are these, 'No tallage or aid shall be taken or levied by us, or our heirs in our realm, without the good will and assent of our arch-bishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land.' Against this was objected, that this statute was intended onely upon the taxes and impositions of things. The word auxilium makes it clear, that it is to be intended further then of things within the realm: for tallagium is commonly intended of domestical taxes, but auxilium is the most usual term for impositions upon goods imported and exported; as by the acts of parliament by which such impositions are given to the king, in which they are called most commonly by the name of aids, as proceeding of good will and benevolence.

The fourth statute alledged on this part is that of 5 E. 2. c. 14. just in point of the matter in question; and therefore I will set it down as I finde it verbatim in the record in the Tower. 'Ensement novelles customes sont levies, et antients enhauces, come sur levies

‘drapes, vine aver du pois, et autre choses, purquoy les merchantes veynont plus vollement, et meynes de bien, menyent en la terre, et les merchants estrangiers demurront plus longment que ils soleyent faier, pur le quel demeure le choses sont le plus enhaunces que ils ne soloyent estre, al damage de roy, et de son people. Nous ordonons que tout manners de male tolls, levies puies de coronement de roy Ed. fils de roy Henry, soient entirement oustes; et de tout estreints pur tout jours, nient contriteant le chartre que le dict roy Ed. fist a merchants aliens, pur ceo que il fuit fait contre le grand chartre et encontre le franchise de la city de Londres, et sans assent de baronage, &c. Savant neque dent al roy le custome de leynas, peulx, et de quirs, &c. si aver les doet.’

By this law is recited, that by the levying of new customes, and by the raising of old, traffique was destroyed, and all things made dear; and therefore all new impositions and customs were discharged Charta Mercatoria, by which, custom, that was increased on aliens, was taken away; and the reason alledged; because it was ‘sans assent de baronage,’ and against the Great Charter. And this is further with this clause, saving to the king his custom of wooll, wooll-fells, and leather, ‘si aver les doet.’

Great wars have been raised against the credit of this law in the parliament house, and three things have been especially objected against it.—First, that it is no law; for it was enforced upon the king by some of the nobility that were too strong for him, the realm being then in tumult and mutiny about the quarrel of Peirce of Gaveston, so never had the kings free consent; but he gave way unto it for fear of greater mischief. Secondly, that in itself it is unjust, as in taking away the custom granted to the king by Charta Mercatoria, 31 E. 1. and in making doubt, whether the king should have the custom of woolls, &c. by those words, saving it to him, ‘si aver les doet.’ The third objection is, that if it were a law, it is repealed. To these I give particular answers.

To the first, that this statute was made both at the instance of the king and people, with a purpose and intention on all parts to settle things in a stay and order, both in the kings house and commonwealth: the king and his nobles standing in good terms, when this business was taken in hand. And it was begun and ended with great solemnity and ceremony. For the king in the third year of his reign gave commission [Com. 16. Mar. 3 E. 2. Rot. Ordin. 5 E. 2.] under his great seal to 32 lords spiritual and temporal; of which there were 11 bishops, 8 earls, and 13 barons; they being as committees of the higher house to devise ordinances for the good government of his house and his realms. In which commission he doth for the honor of God, the good of him and of his realm, of his free will, grant to the prelates, earls, and barons, and others elected by the whole kingdom, full power to ordain the state of his house and realm by such ordinances as by them should be made, to the honor of God, the honor and profit of holy church, the honor of himself, the profit of him and his people, according to right and reason, and the oath he made at his coronation. These joyning with others of discreet commons in parliament, and taking every of them a solemn oath for their sincere demeanor in the business, did make this and other ordinances, which were so well liked of by the king, that, after they were made, he took an oath to observe them, and caused them to be published in Paul's church yard by the bishop of Salisbury, by denouncing excommunication against all that should wilfully infringe them; and by his letters pattents [Public. 8. Kal. Oct. 5 E. 2. Rot. Ord. Pat. 5. Oct. 5 E. 2. Rot. Ord.] dated 5 Oct. 5. regni sui, did send them through the realm to be published, and from thenceforth to be observed, thereby signifying his great liking and approbation of them; after which they had the force and power of laws given unto them in the parliament, in the fifth year of his reign.

The second objection, which is the unjustness of the law, instanced in two points; the taking away of Charta Mercatoria, and the doubting of the kings right to the custom of wooll-fells and leather, &c.—To the first of these, I deny it to be unjust, but to be according to the law of England, and liberty of the kingdom: for that charter did contain in it divers grants of things which were not in the power of the king to grant without assent of parliament; the trial per medietatem linguæ, and other things tending to the alteration of the law, and burdening of the people; and therefore that charter never had his undoubted and settled force, until it was confirmed by act of parliament, but lay asleep almost 20 years together, without being put in execution, between 5 E. 2. and 27 E. 3. when it was confirmed. For the doubt that is supposed to be made in the statute of the kings right to the custom of wooll, wooll-fells and leather, I take it, there is no such doubt made: for the words, ‘saving the kings right to the custom of woolls, si aver les doet,’ have this construction, that is, at such times as he ought to have it: so the word si hath the signification of quando; for it had been a folly to have made a saving of that, of the right whereof they had doubted; neither is it likely but that they would have taken it away, if it had not been lawful. But there was no colour to doubt of the right of it; for it was given by act of parliament, and ever continued in force without challenge or exceptions to the lawfulness of it.

The third objection is, that this statute is repealed. To this I plead, nullum valet recordum. If it be repealed, it must be by act of parliament; for ‘unum quodque dissolvitur iisdem modis quibus est colligatum.’ I and others have searched the records of the realm, and endeavoured by all means to inform our selves of the truth herein, and we can find no act of parliament of repeal. The truth is, some kings, finding these laws not to sort to their wills and humors, have endeavoured to suppress them;

But it is further urged, that although there were no formal repeal of the law, yet it was never put in execution as a law, but even presently upon the making was rejected, and use and practice went quite against it: and for instance hereof, a record was vouched, that E. 2. held himself so little bound by it, as that in the 11th year of his reign he set an imposition without assent of parliament upon wooll, wooll-fells, leather, wines, cloth, aver de pois, and divers other kind of merchandizes. To this I answer, that if it were true, that a weak and impotent king, as he was, did contrary to the law, doth this make the law void, and no law? but if we look into the whole record, and scan this action of E. 2. from the beginning of it unto the end, we shall finde it a very good instance to prove the practice and execution both of this law of 5 E. 2. and of that in 25 E. 1. For it is true, that E. 2. in the 41th year of his reign did borrow of the merchants a certain sum of money, above the due custom of woolls, wooll-fells, wine, aver de pois, leather, and such other goods imported and exported. But it appeareth by the record, [Rot. Claus. 11 E. 2.] he took it but for one year; he took it by the advice and counsel of the merchants; and he took it per viam mutui, as a loan. The direction of the writ is, 'collectoribus mutui nobis per mercatores alienigenas et indigenas de certis rebus et merchandis usque ad certum tempus faciendi.' This was done in good terms, he did not claim it as his right, but did borrow it, which I do think is a good evidence against his right. But what became of this? the state would not abide it, for all these fair shews. And therefore afterwards the king sendeth out other writs, by which he dischargeth all merchandizes of this loan, saving only wooll, wooll-fells and leather; and for the loan taken upon those commodities, it was limited to continue but until Michaelmas after, and good security was given to the merchants by the customers to pay themselves, by way of defalcation, out of the customs which should be due after Michaelmas, those sums which were so borrowed of them. The words of the record are worth the observing, 'cum pro expeditione guerræ Scotiæ, et aliis arduis et urgentibus necessitatibus nobis multipliciter incumbētibz, pro quarum exemptione quasi infinitam pecuniam refundere oportebit, pecunia plurimum indigeamus in præsentī, et nuper pro eo quod exitus regni et terrarum nostrarum, simul cum pecunia nobis in subventi ne præmissorum tam per clerum quam communitatem regni nostri concessa, ad sumptus prædictos cum festinatione qua expediret faciendos, non suffieunt; exquirentes vias et modos, quibus possemus pecuniam habere commodius et decentius pro præmissis, de consilio et advisamento quorundam mercatorum tam alienigenarum quam indigenarum viam invenimus infra script. viz.' and so setteth down the manner of the loan, and the security for the payment of it. This, I take it, was neither an imposition, nor a wrong in any respect. Also by the first record it appeareth, that the loan set on wines, aver de pois, and such other commodities, besides wooll, wooll-fells and leather, were presently discharged by E. 2. which sheweth they were taken to be within the intent of the statute of 25 E. 1.

The fifth statute alledged on the behalf of the subject is that of 13 E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 21. by which the commons pray the king to take no more then the old custom of the half mark. The king prayeth aid of the commons for a time above the custom upon his necessity of wars. And the conclusion is, that by that act the king doth grant, that after the feast of Pentecost, 12 moneths following, he will take no more of woolls, wooll-fells, and leather, but the old custom, and doth promise to charge, set, or assess upon the custom but in manner as aforesaid.

The sixth statute is 14 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 1. The king doth grant by way of charter to the prelates, earls, barons, commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants, that they be not from henceforth charged nor grieved to make any aid or sustain charge, if it be not by the common consent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and commons of the realm, and that in parliament.

These two statutes grew upon an occasion of an imposition set on wooll by the king without assent of parliament. Little hath been objected against them, but only to the first, that it was obtained of grace, and not upon instance of right, which they gather out of the words of the law, which are, 'the commons pray the king that he would stablish, that from henceforth no more then the old custom be taken.' The like reason may be made against the king out of the same words in the same law; for the king in the same act prayeth the commons to give him an imposition upon woolls for a time above the old custom. But the record of the petitions exhibited in parliament, on which these two laws are made, clearerth the objection. The first was delivered by the lords in this form, [Rot. Par. 13 E. 3. num. 5.] les grands volunt, that the male toll, set on woolls, newly, be altogether abated, and that the old custom be held, and that they may have this in point of charter, and by enrolment in parliament. This word, volunt, had been too high for a suit of grace, and therefore must be intended of right. The common petition [lb. num. 13.] in form is somewhat humble, but in effect and purpose is rough and stern. The words are these: 'the commons pray that the male toll of woolls be taken as it was used in antient time, which is now enhanced without the assent of the commons, and grandes, as we conceive; and that if it be otherwise demanded, that every one of the commons may arrest them without being challenged.' According to these petitions, the first of these two laws is by enrolment in parliament; the second is in form of a charter: the first doth express some special commodities; the second doth reach generally at all.

The seventh law directly touching this point is that 14 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. the king doth grant according to the Great Charter, that all merchants, denizens, and foreigners, may without let safely come into the realm of England with their goods and merchandizes, and safely tarry, and safely return, paying the subsidies, customs and other profits reasonably due. Upon the words of this law, was great advantage taken in this, that besides custom and subsidy, which comprehend all the certain and ordinary duties the king hath upon the wares and goods of merchants, there are other profits spoken of to be due. These they affirm cannot be understood but of impositions by the king without assent of parliament.—To this I answer; if they were not duties due to the king besides custom and subsidy, which might satisfy the intention of these words, this objection might have had some colour in it; but it is plain, that besides these two, there are other profits due to the king upon merchants goods, as scavage, tonnage, and the like. And you shall finde a petition in parliament, 50 E. 3. against the raising of these above the old rate.

The eighth law is 15 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 5. whereby it is enacted, that every merchant may freely buy and sell, and pass the sea with their merchandizes of wooll and all other things, paying the custom of old time used, according to the statute made in the last parliament in Mid-Lent, which was the stat. 14 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. This law doth expressly exclude the novelty of impositions.

The ninth law is that 18 E. 3. stat. 1. cap. 3. whereby it is enacted, that the sea be open to all manner of merchants to pass with their merchandizes where it shall please them.

The tenth is, 27 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. for the assurance of merchants-straungers and other, the king doth will and grant for him and his heirs, that nothing shall be taken over the due customs, nor taken of them to his use by colour of suit, or in other manner against their wills.

The eleventh is 38 E. 3. cap. 2. that all manner of merchants aliens and denizens may buy and sell all manner of merchandizes, and freely carry them out of the realm, paying the customs and subsidies thereof due.

The last is 23 H. 8. cap. 8. by which it was enacted, that tables should be set up in ports, by which the certainty and very duty of every custom, toll, and duty, or sum of money, to be demanded and required of wares and merchandizes, shall and may plainly appear and be declared, to the intent that nothing be exacted otherwise then in old time hath been used and accustomed.—By this late law it appeareth, that the judgment of the whole parliament was at that time, that nothing was due upon wares and merchandizes but that which was certain, and had been antiently due; by which impositions are excluded, whose qualities are novelty and uncertainty, as being set on as present occasion moveth, and proportioned for quantity and other circumstances as the will of the king directeth.

These are the laws, which I conceive most directly tend to the restraining the kings of England from the exercise of that irregular power of imposing, at the first offered by them to be put in execution, yet not pressed as their right, and never practised but upon opposition of the whole state, and at last deserted and given over until of late; as by that which followeth in the fourth place will appear.

My fourth and last assertion is, that this practice of imposing without assent of parliament is contra morem majorum. In this I will make an historical perlustration of the times past, whereby I will discover and make known, what passages have been in this business in this kingdom, and especially in the high court of parliament for the space of 300 years and more last past, since the beginning of the reign of E. 1. sithence which time, and not before, this kingdom hath grown into the glory and reputation of forraigne traffique. And as a worthy gentleman of the kings learned council made certain considerations upon this question, framed and strengthened out of the greatness of his wit and reason; so I grounding myself upon the practice of former times, which is the safest rule whereby to square the right both of king and people in this commonwealth, where their right is jus consuetudinarium, a right that groweth by use and practice, I will propose unto you certaine observations out of the action and experience of former times untill the raignes of the two late queens; by which you may the better ground and frame your judgements in the determination of the right in this question.

1. My first observation is in point of circumstance, that there never was any imposition set, but in time of actuall war, and duplucatis vexillis; they were set on very rarely and sparingly, but for a short time, and that certaine and definite, and upon some few commodities, and that by the assent of the merchants that were to beare the burthen. In our time the occasion not so sensible, the continuance to be perpetual, the number many hundreds, almost no kinde of commodity spared. I will give you some few instances of these circumstances out of the records themselves.

The maletole of wooll, set on by E. 1. which gave the occasion of the stat. 25 year of his raigne, was given by merchants. The record saith, mercatores gratanter concesserunt in subsidium guerræ regis. It further sheweth, it was for his necessity of warre, which then was great also.

For the time of E. 3 there need not many instances; for his whole raigne was almost an actuall warfare. As in the 6th year of his raigne for his war in Scotland and Ireland, in the 13th year of his raigne for his war in France, severall impositions were set on.—In the 17th year of E. 3, the record in the Tower mentioneth, that 40s. imposition was upon a sacke of wooll by the grant of merchants, and it was in the time of war.—In the 20th year of E. 3, it appeareth in the record, that the imposition then put upon woolls was by the assent of merchants for two years, for the necessity the king had in his passage over the sea, to recover his right, and to defend the realme.

2. My second observation is, never any imposition was set on by the king out of parliament, but complaint was made of it in parliament; and not one that ever stood after such complaint made, but remedy was afforded for it; 'et quod rex inconsulto fecit, consulto revocavit,' his soveraigne power controlled his subordinate. In which it is a thing very notable, that the king in no one case ever claimed, or so much as ever named his right or prerogative, which no doubt would have been done, if it had been thought due, but gave satisfaction to the complaint by one of these three waies;—Either by discharging them quite, and making some good law against them. 2dly, by entreating the people to hold them some short time by their favour.—3dly, by waving his present possession, and taking that of their gift by act of parliament, as an aide which he had set on by his absolute power as an imposition.

Instances of the first; 25 E. 1. the impositions of woolls taken off, and a law made against it, and the king undertook for him and his successors to doe so no more. 38 E. 3. 26. the imposition of 3s. 4d. on a sacke of wooll put off upon complaint; and a law made against it, 38 E. 3. c. 2. The like statute 45 E. 3. ca. 4. upon a complaint of an imposition on woolls made in parliament, 45 E. 3. n. 47. Rot. Parl.

Instances of the second; 21 E. 3. nu. 11. a petition upon an imposition of 2s. upon a sacke of wool, 2s. upon a tunne of wine, and 6d. upon aver de pois, all discharged presently, saving the 2s. upon a sacke of wool, and for that intreated that it might stay till Easter following, and so it did, and was then taken away.

Instance of the third. 25 E. 3. nu. 22. the commons made petition against an imposition of 40s. upon a sack of wool, granted to the king by the merchants, shewing that they ought not to be bound by their act. The king did not claime right or justice; but because his warres were great, upon his request had it granted unto him for two yeeres by act of parliament, and pretended no title of prerogative, neither was it ever spoken of.

3. My third observation is, that our kings have acknowledged that it is not their right. E. 1. in his writs he sent to the officers of his ports to levie 3d. on the pound over the old custome of the denizens as well as of the aliens, and to suffer the denizens to enjoy those privileges the aliens did enjoy by the payment of the encrease of custome, doth give this direction expressly: that they should not take it of denizens against their will. The words of the record express it very fully: 'cum mercatores extranei et alienigenæ, pro quibusdam libertatibus eis per nos concessis et priscis nostris quibuscunque remissis, nobis de bonis et merchandisiis suis quibuscunque infra regnum et potestatem nostram adducend. ultra anti-quas custumas dare concesserint præstationes et custumas subscriptas, viz.' and so setteth down the increases, and amongst the rest this 3d. upon the pound, and so proceedeth, 'ac quidam mercatores de regno nostro et potestate nostra, ut ipsis dictis libertatibus et immunitatibus uti et gaudere, et quod de prisus nostris quieti esse possint, præstationes et custumas hujusmodi de bonis et merchandisiis suis nobis solvere velint, ut accepimus, assignavimus vos, &c. ad custumas et præstationes predictas de mercatoribus de regno et potestate nostra colligend. qui eas gratanter et sine coercionem solvere voluerint; iter tamen quod aliquem mercatorem de dicto regno et potestate nostra ad præstationes et custumas hujusmodi nobis invito solvend. nullatenus distringatis.' Surely if E. 1. had claimed the prerogative of imposing, he would never have given these cautions in the requiring of that which he had taken to be his due, as that they should not exact it of any of his subjects that were not willing to pay it, nor trouble nor distraigne them for it.

In the twelfth yeere of E. 3. we find the record [Rot. Alem. 12 E. 3. dorm. 21. in Turr.] of certain letters written from the king, being then at Barwick in the Scottish warres, unto the archbishop of Canterburie, in which letters the king seemeth to have a great confidence in the devotion of the archbishop, and therefore earnestly intreateth him to further his enterprises with his prayers to God, and then addeth further: 'Ad hoc pater, cum populus regni nostri variis oneribus, tallagiis, et impositionibus, hactenus prægravetur (quod doleantes referimus) sed inevitabili necessitate compulsi de eisdem oneribus ipsum adiacere levare non valemus dictum populum, ut tantam necessitatem nostram humiliter et benigne patiatur et caritative sustineat, et priorem, quam penes nos concepit de cetero iustanter in orationibus et elemosynis suis, (oneribus predictis, quæ non ex malicia vel presumptione voluntaria ipsum gravant, non obstantibus) exhibeant caritatem, indulgentiam muneribus et aliis modis, quibus secundum Deum videbitis piis exhortationibus inducatis, et nos penes eundem excusetis; speramus namque per Dei gratiam, cujus manus cunctis indigentibus sola sufficiens, et largiflua comprobatur, beneficiis compensatis dictum populum visitare et consolari pro loco et tempore opportunis.'

The principall thing I note out of this record, upon the very point of this my third observation, is, that the king intending to excuse himself of the burthens by him laid on the people, and to avoid the blemish of wrong and injustice in laying thereon, saith they were not 'onera ex presumptione voluntaria,' that is, burthens that he presumed to lay on at his owne will, whereby he condemneth impositions without assent of parliament, which are, 'onera ex voluntate regis,' to proceed of presumption, which doth clearly exclude claime of right, and disproveth the lawfulness of the act.

But there are divers other notable passages in the record worthy our marking. As out of the word 'prægravantur' used by the king, wee may gather he did accept these impositions a grievous burden to his people, which sheweth his owne pity of them. He saith further, 'dolentes referimus,' shewing his griefe and remorse at it; 'et inevitabili necessitate compulsi,' he did it constrained by unavoidable necessity, shewing he was forced to it against his will, by that which violateth and breaketh all law; which inferreth, he would not maintain his action by law. 'Adhuc relevare non valemus;' this insinuates, he would ease them in good time. 'Caritatem exhibent,' they should afford him charity in the bearing of them, as if so be in point of justice or right they need not. 'Penes eundem excusetis,' the bishop should excuse him to the people. By this he did clearly leave the point of justification, and so of right. Lastly, he promiseth he would visit and comfort them 'beneficiis compensativis,' would give them recompence for those summes he had so raised of them; which sheweth that he claimed them not as due, for then he needed not give recompence for them.

In the 21st E. 3, a petition was exhibited in parliament, that levies be not made by commission, so they be in this case, nor other things laid upon the people unless they be granted in parliament. The kings answer is, if any such impositions were made, it was by great necessity, and with assent of the prelates, barons, and some of the commonns present; yet he will not that such impositions not duly made be drawne in consequence. Here the king acknowledgeth an imposition not to be duly made, though with the consent of the higher house and some of the commonns, because it was not in full parliament: much rather he would have thought so, if it had been by the king alone.

King E. 4, that was a rough and warlike prince, and was more beholding to his sword in the recovery of his right to the crowne then to the affection of the people, at a parliament held the seventh yeere of his raigne made a speech to the commonns, sir John Say being then Speaker, in which speech is contained very notable matter, and very pertinent to our purpose; and because the record is not in print, I will set downe the kings speech verbatim as it is entred upon the parliament roll, [Rot. Parl. 7 E. 4. The record begins, 'memorandum quod die Veneris, 3 die Parl.] and then I will make a paraphrase upon it. 'John Say, and ye sirs come to this my court of parliament for the commonns of this my realme. The cause why I have cald and summoned this my present parliament, is, that I purpose to live upon mine own, and not to charge my subjects but in great and urgent causes, concerning more the weale of themselves, and also the defence of them and of this my realme, rather than mine owne pleasure, as heretofore by commonns of this land hath bene done, and borne unto my progenitors

'in time of need; wherein I trust, that yee sirs, and all the commonns of this my land, will be as tender and kinde unto me in such cases as heretofore any commonns have been to any of my progenitours. And for the goodwill, kindness, and true hearts that yee have borne, continued, and shewed to me at all times heretofore, I thanke you as heartily as I can. Also I trust yee will continue in time coming; for which by the grace of God I shall be to you as good and gracious a king, and reigne as righteously upon you, as ever did any of my progenitors upon commonns of this my realme in dayes past, and shall also in time of need apply my person for the weale and defence of you, and of this my realme, not sparing my body nor life for any jeopardy that might happen to the same.'

Out of this, we may observe first the kings protestation to live of his owne, and not to charge his subjects; by which I gather he did acknowledge a certain and distinct property of that which was his subjects from that which was his own, which excludeth the right to impose at his will; for if that be admitted, the subjects property is proprietas precarius, not certaine how much of his is his owne: for that is his which the king will leave him; for there is no limit or restraint of the quantity, the right being admitted, but onely the kings will.—The second thing I observe is this, that in charging of his subjects he would confine himselfe between these two bounds. The one, it should bee in great and urgent causes concerning more the weale of them, and the defence of them and his realme, than his own pleasure; wherein he condemneth those occasions that grew upon excesse of private expence by over great bounty, or otherwise, and admitteth onely such as grow by reason of warres, or other such like publique causes concerning the whole state. The other bound or limit is, that those burdens should be secundum morem majorum, as heretofore had been done and borne by the commonns to his ancestours in time of need.—The third thing I observe is, that he acknowledged these burdens did proceed out of their good-will and kindness, and not out of his right and prerogative; out of these words, that he trusted they would bee as tender and kinde to him in such cases, as heretofore any commonns had been to his progenitors.—And lastly, wee may note the recompence promised by the king to his subjects, for their good wills and kindness, his goodness and grace, his just and righteous government, the jeopardy of his body and life for their weale and defence. Did this king assume to himselfe a right to lay burdens on his subjects at his own will without their assents, that offered to buy them at his need with the price of his blood, the most sacred relique in the kingdome?

4. My fourth observation is, that in all petitions exhibited by the commonns in parliament against impositions, the very knot of their griefe, and the principal cause of their complaint, hath been expressed in those petitions, that the impositions have been without assent of parliament; by which is necessarily inferred, that their griefe was in point of right, not of burden.—In 21 E. 3, nu. 11. the complaint of the imposition of 2s. upon a sacke of wooll, 2s. upon a tonne of wine, 6d. upon over de pois, the cause of grievance expressed, because it was done 'sans assent de commons'.—25 E. 3, nu. 22. In a petition the commons complaine, that an imposition upon woolls was set by the consent of the merchants; they pray that commissions bee not made upon such singular grants, if they be not in full parliament; and if any such grants be made, they may be held as void.—17 E. 3. nu. 28. The commons in their petition informe the king, it is against reason they should be charged with impositions set on by assent of merchants, and not in parliament.

5. My fifth observation is, that, whensoever any petition was exhibited against impositions, there was never any respect had of the quantity, but they were ever intirely abated, as well where they were small, as where they were great; no request ever made to make them less when they were great, nor excuse made of their ease when they were exceeding small; which sheweth, that it was not the point of burden or excess was respected in their complaint, but the point of meere right.—25 E. 3, nu. 22. Fourty shillings set an imposition upon a sacke of wooll, upon complaint, all taken off, and no suit to be eased of part because it was too great.

36 E. 3. nu. 26. 3s. 4d. upon a sacke of wooll all taken off, and no excuse made for the smallness; for 21 E. 3. nu. 11. 2s. a sacke, 2s. tonnage, and 6d. poundage.—50 E. 3. nu. 163. A great complaint was made in parliament by the commons, that an imposition of a penny was set upon woolls for tonnage over and above the ancient due, which was but a penny, and so the subject was charged with 2d.; also that a penny was exacted for mesonage, which impositions the record doth express did amount to 100*l.* a yeere.—This petty imposition was as much stood upon in point of right, as the other great one of 40*s.*, and was taken off upon complaint in parliament, without either justification or excuse for the smallness of it.

6. My sixth observation is, that those which have advised the setting on of impositions without assent of parliament, have been accused in parliament for giving that advice, as of a great offence in the state, and have suffered sharpe censure and great disgrace by it.—Neither doe I finde that the quality of the person hath extenuated the blame; as 50 E. 3. William lord Latimer chamberlaine to the king, and one of his private counsell, was accused by the commons in parliament of divers deceits and extortions and misdeeds, and among other things, that he had procured to be set upon wooll, woollfells, and other merchandizes, new impositions, to wit, upon a sack of wooll 11*s.*, which the lord Latimer sought to excuse, because he had the consent and good liking of the merchants first. But judgment was given against him, that he should be committed to prison, be fined and ransomed at the kings will, and be put from being of the council: and this procuring of impositions to be set on without the assent of parliament is expressly set down in the entry of the judgment for one of the causes of his censure.—Richard Lyons, a farmer of the customs in London, the same year was accused in parliament for the same offence. He pleaded, he did it by the kings command, and had answered the money to the kings chamber: yet was condemned and adjudged in parliament to be committed to prison, and all his lands and goods were seized into the kings hand. And at the last the hate against these authors of impositions grew so, that 50 E. 3. in the same parliament, a petition was exhibited in parliament to make this a capital offence. The record [Rot. Parl. 50. E. 3. n. 17, 18, 19, 20.] is very short, and therefore I will set it down verbatim. 'Item 'prie le dit common, que soit ordaine per statute en cest present parliament de tous ceux, 'queux cy en avant mitton ou font par leur 'singular profit novels impositions per leur 'thortie demesn, accrocheants de eux eny ul 'power de riens que soit establi en parliament, sans assent de parliament, que ils eyent 'judgement de vie et member, et de forisfacture.' To this rough petition the king gave a milde and temperate answer, 'courre la counmon ley come estoit al avant use.'

7. My seventh observation is, the cessation between 50 E. 3. after this censure in parliament, and 4 Maria, almost 200 years, during which time no king did attempt to impose without assent of parliament. And yet we finde in the parliament rolls, that there was not one of those kings that reigned in that time, but had impositions granted him upon fit occasion by act of parliament upon all goods and merchandizers, and at divers times during their reigns, sometimes more, sometimes less upon the ton and pound, but ever for a time certain, and indefinite. So the use of them was not given over, but the power of imposing was so clearly and undoubtedly held to be in the parliament, as no king went about to practice the contrary.—But to this cessation, that was of great weight and credit in our evidence, a colour was given by the other side, to avert the inference made upon it against the kings right, that is, that during that time there was so great a revenue grew to the crown by double custom paid for all merchandizes both in England and at Callais, by reason of an act of parliament made 8 H. 4. which was, that no goods should be carried out of the realm but to Callais, and by reason that the merchants paid customs both there and here for the same goods, that in 27 Hen. 6, the custom of Callais was 68,000*l.* the year; a great sum, if you consider the weight of money then, what price it bare; and by reason hereof princes not delighting to charge their murmuring subjects but when need is, being so amply supplied otherwise, did not put that prerogative in practice.—To this I answer, that if that were true that was urged, it might be some probable colour of the forbearance of imposing. But I finde it quite contrary, and that by record: for there was no such restraint of all commodities not to be transported to any place but Callais, but onely woolls, woolfells, leather, tinn, and lead, that were staple wares, which by the statute 37 E. 3: were to be transported thither, and not to any other place, and the staple continued at that place for the most part from that time untill long after, 27 H. 6. but there was no double custom paid both here and there by the same owner: but the yearly profits of the customs of Callais at those times were so far short of that which hath been alleged in 27 H. 6. that it appeareth in an act of parliament, 27 H. 6. cap. 2. printed in the book at large, that the commons do complain, that, whereas in the time of E. 3. the custom of Callais was 68,000*l.* per annum, at that time, which was 27 H. 6. by reason of the ill usage of merchants, it was fallen to be but 12,000*l.* the year. So then there was great cause in that respect to have set on impositions by reason of that great abatement of customs, and yet it was not then offered to be done without assent of parliament. But if you look a little further into the extreme necessities of those times, you shall finde there never was greater cause to have strained prerogatives; for it appeareth in an act of parliament, 28 H. 6. that it was then declared in parliament by the chancellor and treasurer, who demanded relief of the people for the king, both for payment of his debts and for his yearly livelihood, that the king was then indebted 372,000*l.* which now by the weight of money amounteth to above 1,100,000*l.* and that his ordinary expences were more then his yearly revenue by 19,000*l.* yearly. So if ever there was cause to put a king to his shifts, it was then; yet we see they did not venture to put in practice this supposed prerogative. It further appeareth in that statute, that the people, among those reasons they alleaged, why they were not able to retain the king, gave this for one, that they had so often granted him tonnage and poundage upon merchandizes, by which it appeareth he took nothing of merchants by imposition without grant; for if he had, no doubt they would not have stuck to have put him in mind of it. But I pray consider, what became of this motion of the chancellor and treasurer. The proposition had depended in parliament many years. The effect was, the people entreated the king to resume all grants he had made from the beginning of his reign, untill that time, being the 28th year of his reign, excepting such as were made upon consideration valuable, that he might so enable himself by that mean by which he had impoverished himself and the whole kingdom. This took effect, and the statute of resumptions was thereupon made the same year; which record, because it is not in print, and declareth these things with great gravity and authority, [28 H. 6. Stat. de Resump. in Turri Lond. not printed.] I will set down the very text of it, so much as is material to our purpose.

‘Prayen your commons in this your present parliament assembled to consider, that where your chancellor of your realm of England, your treasurer of England, and many other lords of your coucill, by your high commandment to your said commons, at your parliament holden last at Westminster, shewed and declared the state of this your realm, which was that ye were indebted 372,000*l.* which is grievous, and that your livelihood in yearly value was but 5000*l.* And forasmuch as this 5,000*l.* to your high and notable state to be kept, and to pay your said debts, will not suffice: therefore that your high estate may be relieved. And furthermore it was declared, that your expences necessary to your household without all other ordinary charge came to 24,000*l.* yearly, which exceedeth every year in expence necessary over your livelihood 19,000*l.* Also pleaseth it your highness to consider, that the commons of your said realm be as well willing to their power, for the relieving of your highness, as ever was people to any king of your progenitors that reigned in your said realm of England: but your said commons been so impoverished, what by taking victual to your household, and other things in your said realm, and nought paid for it, and the quinzime by your said commons so often granted, and by the grant of tunnage and poundage, and by the grant of subsidy upon woolls, and other grants to your highness, and for lack of execution of justice, that your said poor commons be full nigh destroyed; and if it should continue longer in such great charge, it would not in any wise be had, ne born. Wherefore pleaseth it your highness, the premisses graciously to consider, and that ye by the advice and assent of your lords spiritual and temporal, and by the authority of this your present parliament, for the consideration of your high estate, and in comfort and ease of your poor commons, would take, resume, seise and retain in your hands and possession all honors, &c.’

This was very plain dealing by the people with their king, and this is the success of the demand of supply and support had in those days, being required in point of gratification, without any recompence or retribution for it. Thus then we have cleared this point, that between 50 E. 3. and 4 Mariz, there was not one imposition set without assent of parliament.

Queen Mary in the fourth year of her reign, upon the wars with France, set an imposition upon clothes for this consideration, that the custom of woolls was decayed, by reason for the most part they were made into clothes, which afforded little custom; for that which in wooll paid for custom and subsidy 40s. made into cloth paid but 4s. 4*d.* To recompence this by an indifferent equality, there was set upon a cloth 5s. 6*d.* which imposition did not make up the loss sustained in the custom of wooll, by

13s. 4d. in 40s. This was justum, but not juste. This religious prince, invironed with infinite troubles in the church and commonwealth, and much impoverished by her devotion, in renouncing the profits of the church-lands that were in the crown by the suppression, was the first that made digression from the steps of her worthy progenitors, in putting on that imposition without assent of parliament; for that very consideration of the loss of custom, by turning of wooll to cloathing, came into treaty in the 24th year of E. 3. when the art of clothing began first to be much practised in this kingdom; and then in the recompence of the loss so sustained in the decay of custom of woolls, there was set upon a cloth by act of parliament above the olde custom, 14d. for a denizen, and for an alien 21d. This is recited in a record in the Exchequer, 48 E. 3. Rot. 2. R. Thes. in origin. But I pray you examine, how this imposition of queen Mary was digested by the people. We see in the case of my lord Dier, 1 El. fol. 165. that the merchant found great grief at it, and made exclamation and suit to queen Eliz. to be unburdened of it. The very reason of their grief expressed in that case is, because it was not set on by parliament, but by the queens absolute power; so that was the ground of that complaint, the very point of right.—This cause was referred to all the judges, to report whether the queen might set on this imposition without assent of parliament. They divers times had conference about it, but have not yet made report for the king; which is an infallible presumption, that their opinions were not for him. For it is a certain rule among us, that if a question, concerning the kings prerogative or his profit, be referred to the judges, if their opinions be for the king, it will be speedily published, and it were indiscretion to conceal it; but if there be no publication, then we make no doubt, but that their opinions are either against the king, or at least they stick, and give none for him.

The same queen Mary, upon restraint of bringing in of French commodities occasioned by the then wars with France, set an imposition upon Gascoyn wines, which continueth yet. So the kingdom of England by the injustice of that prince was clogged with these two heavy impositions, contrary to the right of the kingdom and the acts of her progenitors.

Queen Elizabeth set on that upon sweet wines, which grew also upon the occasion of the troubles with Spain. That upon allome was none. It was rather a monopoly to master Smith the customer of London, for the ingrossing of all allomes into his own hands, for which priviledge he gave a voluntary imposition upon that commodity. It was like the priviledge granted to John Pechey of the sweet wines by E. 3. for which the patentee was called into the parliament house, 50 E. 3. and was there punished, and his patent taken away and cancelled.

What impositions have been set on in the kings time, I need not express. They are set down particularly in the book of rates that in print. They are not easily numbered. The time for which they are raised is not short. The patent prefixed to that book, bearing date 28 Julii, 6 Jacobi, will instruct you sufficientl in that point. They be limited to the king, his heirs and successors; which I suppose is the first estate of fee simple of impositions that ever man read of.

8. My eighth and last observation is upon tannage and poundage given to the king of the realm, upon wares and merchandizes exported and imported, which is an imposition by act of parliament, and, as it will appear, was given out of the peoples good-will, as a very gratification to the king, to enjoyn him thereby from the desire of voluntary impositions, and to conclude him by that gift in parliament from attempting to take any other without assent of parliament. For after the ceasing of voluntary impositions, these parliamentary ones were frequent in the times of the king that succeeded. But they were never given but for year with express caution how the money should be bestowed; as towards the defence of the sea protection of traffic, or some such other public causes. Sometimes special sequestrators made by act of parliament, by whose hands the money should be delivered, as 5 R. 2. c. 3. in a printed statute. The rates that were given were very variable, sometimes 2s. tannage, and 6d. poundage, as 7 R. 2. 3s. tannage, and 12d. poundage, 10 R. 2. which grants were not to endure, the longest of them, above a year 18d. tannage, 6d. poundage, in 17 R. 2. 3 tannage and 12d. poundage granted to H. 4. in the thirteenth year of his reign for a certain time, in which statute there is this clause, that this aide in time to come should not be taken for an example to charge the lords and commons in manner of subsidy, unless it be by the wills of the lords and commons, and thereby a new grant to be made in full parliament in time to come. This clause in good and proper construction may be taken to be a convention between the king and his people in parliament, that he should not from thenceforth, nor any of his successors, set on impositions without assent of parliament. The like imposition was granted to H. 5. in the first year of his reign for a short time towards the defence of the realm, and safeguard of the sea: upon condition expressed in the act, that the merchants denizens and strangers coming into the realm with their merchandizes, should be well and honestly used and handled, paying the said subsidy as in the time of his father, and his noble progenitors kings of England, without oppression or extortion. In the end of which act the commons protested being bound by the grant in time to come, for the purposes aforesaid.

H. 6. in the 31st year of his reign, had tannage and poundage given him for his life. E. 6. had it given him the third year of his reign, as it appeareth in a statute 12 E. 4. cap. 3. H. 6. in the sixth year of his reign, and all since the first year of their reigns have had it given them for term of their life; and being now so certainly settled, do reach further at that, from which they are in conscience and honor excluded by this voluntary gratification. For can any man give me a reason, why the people should give this imposition of tunnage and poundage above the due custom upon all commodities, if the king by his prerogative might set on impositions without assent of parliament? And were not that a weak action in a king, to take that of his people as a benevolence from them, with limitation of the same, and in what it should be employed, and how they will be used for it, and for what time he shall have it, which he might justly take without their consents, unclogged of these unpleasant incumbrances?—The statutes of tunnage and poundage made in our times, that are altogether inclined to flattery, do yet retain in them certain shews and rumours of those ancient liberties, although indeed the substance be lost. As in the statute 1 Jac. cap. 33. we declare, that we trust, and have sure confidence of his majesties good will towards us, in and for the keeping and sure defending of the seas; and that it will please his highness, that all merchants, as well denizens as strangers, coming into this realm, be well and honestly entreated and demeaned for such things whereof subsidy is granted, as they were in the time of the kings progenitors and predecessors, without oppression to them to be done. By this clause, as it now continueth, the true intent of this statute appeareth to be, that there ought no other imposition to be laid upon merchants, besides those given by this statute; and this intention hath been well interpreted by use and practice from the time of E. 3. to the time of queen Mary, as before is declared.

Thus much of this last reason, made from observation, and the action of our nation.

I will answer now such main objections as have been made against the peoples right, and have not been touched by me obiter in my passage through this discourse.

That which hath been most insisted upon is this, that the king by his prerogative royal hath the custody of the havens and ports of this island, being the very gates of this kingdom; that he in his royal function and office is only trusted with the keys of these gates; that he alone hath power to shut them, and to open them when, and to whom he in his princely wisdom shall see good; that by the law of England he may restrain the persons of any from going out of the land, or from coming into it; that he may of his own power and discretion prohibit exportation and importation of goods and merchandizes; and out of his prerogative and pre-eminence, the power of imposing, as being derivative, doth arise and re-ut; for 'cui quod majus est licet, et ei quod est minus licitum est.' So their reason briefly is this; the king may restrain the passage of the person, and of the goods; therefore he may suffer them not to pass, but sub

For the grounds and propositions laid in this objection, I shall not be much against any one or them. Others of them must be qualified, ere they be confessed. But the inference and argument made upon them, I utterly deny; for in it there is mutatio hypothesis, and a transition from a thing of one nature to a thing of another. As the premises are of a power in the king onely fiduciary, and in point of trust and government, the conclusion infers a right of interest and gain—Admi the king had custodiam portuum; yet he hath but the custody, which is trust, and not dominium utile. He hath power to open and shut upon consideration of public good to the people and state, but not to make gain and benefit by it. The one is protection, the other is exipation. The ports in their own nature are publike, free for all to go in and out; yet for the common good this liberty is restrainable by the wisdom and policy of the prince, who is put in trust to discern the times when this natural liberty shall be restrained. In 1 H. 7. fol. 10. in the case of the Florentines for their Allome, the lord chief justice Hussey doth write a case, that in the time of E. 4. a legute from the pope being at Callais to come into England, it was resolved in full council, as the book saith, before the lords and judges, that he should not have licence to come into England unless he would take an oath at Callais, that he would bring nothing with him that should be prejudicial to the king and his crown.—The king by the common law, may send his writ, ne exeat regnum, to any subject of the realm; but the summe of the writ is, 'quia datum est nobis intelligi, quod tu versus partes exteras absque licentia nostra clam destinas te divertere, et quam plurima nobis et coronæ nostræ prejudicia prosequi.' Fitzh. N. B. 85. b. So in point of government, and common good of the realm he may restrain the person. But to conclude therefore he may take money not to restrain, is to sell government, trust and common justice, and most unworthy the divine office of a king.

But let us compare this power of the king in foreign affairs, with the like power he hath in domestick government. There is no question but that the king hath the custody of the gates of all the towns and cities in England, as well as all the ports and havens, and upon consideration of the weal publike may open and shut them at his pleasure. As if the infection of the sickness be dangerous in places vicine to the city of London, the king may command that none from those places shall come into the city. May he therefore set an imposition upon those that he suffereth to come into the city? So, if by reason of infection he forbid the bringing of wares and merchandizes from some cities or towns in this kingdom to any great fair or mart, shall he therefore restrain the bringing of goods thither, unless money be given him by way of imposition? The king in his discretion, 13s. 4d. in 40s. This was justum, but not justū. For the grounds and propositions laid in this objection, I shall not be much against any one of them. Others of them must be qualified, ere they be confessed. But the inference and argument made upon them, I utterly deny; for in it there is mutatio hypothesis, and a transition from a thing of one nature to a thing of another. N. B. 85. b. So in point of government, and common good of the realm he may restrain the person. But to conclude therefore he may take money not to restrain, is to sell government, trust and common justice, and most unworthy the divine office of a king.

But let us compare this power of the king in foreign affairs, with the like power he hath in domestick government. There is no question but that the king hath the custody of the gates of all the towns and cities in England, as well as all the ports and havens, and upon consideration of the weal publicke may open and shut them at his pleasure. As if the infection of the sickness be dangerous in places vicine to the city of London, the king may command that none from those places shall come into the city. May he therefore set an imposition upon those that he suffereth to come into the city? So, if by reason of infection he forbid the bringing of wares and merchandizes from some cities or towns in this kingdom to any great fair or mart, shall he therefore restrain the bringing of goods thither, unless money be given him by way of imposition? The king in his discretion, in point of equity, and for qualifying the rigour of the law, may enjoy any of his subjects by his chancellor from suing in his court of common-law. May he therefore make a benefit by restraining all from suit in his courts, unless they pay him an imposition upon their suits? In 2 E. 3. in the case of the earl of Richmond before-cited, the king had granted unto the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ships that arrived at the port of Yarmouth, which consisted of three several ports, Great Yarmouth, Little Yarmouth, and Gerneston, should arrive all at Great Yarmouth, and at no other place within that port. The lawfulness of this patent being in question in the kings court, it was reasoned in the kings behalf for the upholding of the grant, as it is now, that the king had the custody of the port; he might restrain merchants from landing at all in his kingdom; therefore out of the same power might appoint where, and in what haven they should land, and no other. This patent was demurred on in the Kings-Bench, as being granted against the law; but the case depending was adjourned into parliament for the weight and consequence of it, and there the patent was condemned, and a law made [9 E. 3. cap. 1.] against such and the like grants.—The presidents, that were vouched for maintenance of this power of restraint in the king, were four produced almost in so many hundred years, whereof two were in 2 E. 1. one in 10 E. 3. another in 17 H. 6. since which time we hear of none but by act of parliament, as they had been usually and regularly before. To these I will give answer out of themselves, out of the common-law, out of divers statutes, and out of the practice of the common-wealth. The restraints in the time of E. 1. one of them was to forbid the carrying of wooll out of the realm, the other was to forbid all traffick with the Flemings. That of 10 E. 3. was to restrain the exportation of ship-timber out of the realm. That of 17 H. 6. to prohibit traffique with the subjects of the duke of Burgundy. These presidents are rare, yet they have in them inducements out of publique respects to the common-wealth. For the rule of common-law in this case, I take it to be as the reverend judge sir Anthony Fitzherbert holds in his writ of ne creas regnum in Nat. Br. 85. that by the common-law any man may go out of the kingdom, but the king may upon causes touching the good of the commonwealth restrain any man from going by his writ or proclamation, and if he then go, it is a contempt. This opinion of his is confirmed by the book, 1 Eliz. fol. 165. Dier, 12 & 13 Eliz. Dier, 296. In like manner, if a subject of England be beyond sea, and the king send to him to repair home, if he do it not, his lands and goods shall be seised for the contempt; and this was the case of William de Britain earl of Richmond, 19 E. 2. He was sent by the king into Gascoyne on a message, and refused to return, for which contempt his goods, chattels, lands, and tenements were seised into the king's hands. The record is cited 2 & 3 Philip and Mary, in my lord Dier. fol. 128. b. and the law there held to be so at that time upon a question moved in the queen's behalf against divers, that being beyond the seas refused to return upon commandment sent unto them to that purpose. The same is again for law confirmed in the dutchess of Suffolke's case, 2 Eliz. Dier. 176. But the common-law was altered in this point by the statute of 5 R. 2. cap. 2, by which the passage of all people is defended, that they may not go without licence, except the lords and other great men of the realm, merchants, and souldiers. So for the merchants, which are the people dealt withal, in the business in hand, the common-law remaineth as it was before the statute; and so it was held, 12 Eliz. Dier, 196, where the case was, an English merchant, being a papist, went over-sea, and, being there, did settle himself to remain there for the enjoying the freedom of his conscience. It was moved here in England, that his going without licence should be a contempt; because he went not to traffique as a merchant, but for the cause of religion. It was resolved, no such averment would be taken in this case; for that the very calling and vocation of being a merchant did give him liberty to go out of the kingdom when he would, and therefore the secret intent of his going was not to be enquired after. 'Sed lex inspicit quod verisimilius.' Therefore it was in this case held no contempt. But at this day the law is as it was before, 5 R. 2, cap. 2, for that statute is repealed, 4 Jac. cap. 1. And all men whatsoever are now at liberty by the common-law to pass out of the realm. There is only against this inconvenient liberty a proclamation dated at Westminster, 9 Jul. 5 Jac. to the very same effect in point of restraint of passage with the statute of R. 2. So the subject is in this much the more at ease and liberty then he was before, that his going over-sea without licence doth not induce any forfeiture, but onely incurreth the censure of a contempt; and therefore it were to be wished that some firm law might be made in the case, both for the execution of so good a point of policy, and for the more quiet of the state, in knowing the certainty of the punishment for the offence.

This liberty and freedom of merchants hath been strengthened and confirmed by many notable laws before recited, as 14 E. 3. stat. 2. cap. 2. 15 E. 3, stat. 2, cap. 5. 18 E. 3. stat. 1, cap. 3, and divers other. And therefore though it be admitted that the king may restrain persons and goods, yet it may well be denied, that he hath power of himself alone without assent of parliament simply and indefinitely to restrain all traffique in general, or to shut up all the havens and ports, and to bar the vent and issuing of wares and merchandizes of the whole kingdom; as it appeareth plainly, that this hath been done this 300 years, or near thereabouts, by act of parliament onely, and that the kingdom of England made this matter of traffique so tender a case to deal in, as that it hath ever held it a matter fit for the consulta-

In 11 E. 3, the exportation of woolls was prohibited by act of parliament, in which statute there was this clause, untill that by the king and his council it be thereof otherwise provided: which power so given to the king, to be used for the good of the commonweath, gave occasion to him to abuse it to his profit and commodity, by giving licences of transportation to all; that would give forty shillings upon a sack of wooll above the due custom. This appeareth in the records in the Exchequer, 13 E. 3, Rot. 2. Rem. Thes. I will describe the record, that you may perceive the ground of it the better. 'Rex collectoribus customæ in portu magnæ Jermouth salutem. Quia concessimus dilecto et fideli nostro Hugoni de Wriothsley, quod ipse viginti et septem saccos lanæ et dimid. de lanis suis propriis in portu prædicto carriare, et eas usque Antwerpe ad stapulam nostram ibidem ducere possit, solvendo ibidem dilecto clerico nostro Willielmo de Northwel custodi guarderobæ nostræ 40s. pro quolibet sacco pro custumæ et subsidio inde nobis debitis, &c. vobis mandamus, quod prædict. Hugon. dictos viginti septem saccos lanæ et dimid. in portu prædicto carriare permittatis, &c.' And another the same year. 'Rex collectoribus customæ, &c. Cum nuper ordinaverimus, quod passagium lanarum, &c. apertum existeret, et quod sigillum nostrum, quod dicitur coket, quod prius claudi et sub serra custodiri mandavimus, aperiretur, et apertum teneretur; ideo vobis mandavimus, quod sigillum prædictum in portu prædicto aperiri, et apertum teneri faciatis, et omnes illos, qui hujusmodi lanas carriare et ducere velint, permittatis, receptis prius ab iisdem, viz. de mercatoribus et aliis indigenis 40s. de quolibet sacco lanæ.' Divers other such sales of traffick occasioned by this parliamentary restraint were made between 11 E. 3, that the restraint was made, and 14 E. 3, that this inconvenience being espied, the sea was opened by statute, and the restraint removed, 14 E. 3, stat. 2. c. 2. 15 E. 3, cap. 5. stat. 2. And this 40s. so exacted was complained of as an imposition in parliament, and the occasion and the effect were both taken away together by act of parliament, 14 E. 3, stat. 1. cap. 21. and stat. 2. cap. 1.

It followed in all kings times sithence the death of E. 3, that this opening and shutting of the havens, restraining and enlarging of traffick, was done by act of parliament.—I will give one instance in the reign of every king. 5 R. 2, cap. 2. stat. 2. for the passage of wooll wooll-fells and leathers. 6 H. 4, cap. 4. for the traffique and commerce with merchants aliens. 2 H. 5, cap. 6. stat. 2. for the restraint of staple commodities to places certain, and for the traffique of the merchants of the west. 27 H. 6, cap. 1. that is enacted in parliament, which is contained in the proclamation 17 H. 6, cited for a precedent, that is, because the duke of Burgundy made an ordinance whereby the traffick of the English nation was restrained, that therefore the Englishmen should not traffick with the subjects of the duke of Burgundy. The same thing enacted upon the like occasion, 4 E. 4, c. 1. 19 H. 7, c. 21. the importation of divers commodities forbidden, as being prejudicial to the manufactures within the realm. 6 H. 8, cap. 12. the exportation of Norfolk woolls out of the realm forbidden. 26 H. 8, cap. 10. power is given to the king to order and dispose of the traffick of merchants at his pleasure; and the reason is given, because otherwise the leagues and amities with foreign princes might be impeached by reason of restraint made by divers statutes then standing on foot; whereby it appeareth that it was not then taken to be law, that the king had an absolute power in himself to order and dispose of the course of traffick without help of a statute. 2 E. 6, cap. 9. exportation of leather restrained. 1 et 2 Ph. et Mar. the exportation of herring, butter, cheese, and other victuals forbidden. 18 Eliz. cap. 8. the exportation of tallow, raw hides, leather. So in all times no use of proclamations in matters of this nature, but acts of parliament still procured. Wherefore in mine opinion it behoveth them that do so earnestly urge this argument, the king may restrain traffick, therefore may impose, to prove better then they have done, that the king may restrain traffick of his own absolute power: for as the natural policy and constitution of our commonwealth is, we may better say, that is law which is de more gentis, then that which floweth from the reason of any man guided by his general notion and apprehension of power regal, in genere, not in individuo.

The last assault made against the right of the kingdom, was an objection grounded upon policy, and matter of state; as, that it may so fall out that an imposition may be set by a foreign prince that may wring our people, in which case the counterpoise is, to set on the like here upon the subjects of that prince; which policy, if it be not speedily executed, but stayed until a parliament, may in the mean time prove vain and idle, and much damage may be sustained that cannot afterwards be remedied.—This strain of policy maketh nothing to the point of right. Our rule is in this plain commonwealth of ours, 'oportet neminem esse sapienterem legibus.' If there be an inconvenience, it is fitter to have it removed by a lawful means, then by an unlawful. But this is rather a mischief then an inconvenience; that is, a prejudice in present of some few, but not hurtful to the commonwealth. And it is more tolerable to suffer an hurt to some few for a short time, then to give way to the breach and violation of the right of the whole nation; for that is the true inconvenience. Neither need it be so difficult or tedious to have the consent of the parliament, if they were held as they ought, or might be. But our surest guide in this will be the example of our ancestors in this very case, and that in the time one of the most politick princes that ever reigned in this kingdom. 7 H. 7, cap. 7. you shall finde an act of parliament, in which it was recited that the Venetians had set upon the English merchants that laded malunseys at Candy four duckets of gold upon a butt, which in sterling is eighteen shillings the butt. It was therefore enacted, that every merchant stranger, that brought malunsey into this kingdom, should pay eighteen shillings the butt over and above the due custom used; this imposition to endure, until they of Venice had set aside that of four duckets the butt upon the Englishmen.

Much hath been learnedly uttered upon this argument in the maintenance of the peoples right, and in answering that which hath been pressed on the contrary. But my meaning is not to express in this discourse all that hath or may be said on either side, but only to make a remembrance somewhat larger of that which I myself offered as my symbolum towards the making up of this great reckoning of the commonwealth, which if it be not well audited, may in time cost the subjects of England very dear. My hope is of others, that labored very worthily in this business, that they will not suffer their pains to die, and therefore I have forborn to enter into their province. I will end with that saying of that true and honest counsellor Philip Comines in his fifth book, the 18th chapter, "That it is more honorable for a king to say, 'I have so faithful and obedient subjects, that they deny me nothing I demand,' then to say, 'I levy what me list, and I have priviledges so to do.'"

[“ At the end of the foregoing Argument by Yelverton, an Extract from a Petition of Grievances addressed by the Commons to King James in 1610 is added, one subject of which is Impositions by Prerogative. But the whole Petition is in Mr. Petyt's Jus Parliamentarium; and as we are not aware, that it is to be found either in the Parliamentary History, the Journals of the Commons, or any other printed book, except the two before mentioned, it is here inserted as a fragment of some curiosity. To this Petition, we shall add lord Bacon's Speech on presenting it to the king. The king's Answer to so much of the Petition as regarded Impositions, is in the Parliamentary History, vol. i. p. 1132. Mr. Petyt, in his book before cited, gives some remarks of his own on the subject, with an extract from the Journal of the Lords for 23d May and 6th June 1612, when it was unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the Opinion of the Judges on the Question of Imposition.” Hargrave.]

To the king's most excellent Majesty.

MOST gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most humble commons assembled in parliament, being moved as well out of their duty and zeal to your majesty, as out of the sense of just grief, wherewith your loving subjects are generally through the whole realm at this time possessed, because they perceive their common and ancient right and liberty to be much declined and infringed in these late years, do with all duty and humility present these our just complaints thereof to your gracious view, most instantly craving justice therein, and due redress.—And although it be true, that many of the particulars, whereof we now complain, were of some use in the late queen's time, and then not much impugned, because the usage of them being then more moderate, gave not so great occasion of offence, and consequently not so much cause to enquire into the right and validity of them; yet the right being now more thoroughly scanned, by reason of the great mischiefs and inconveniencies which the subjects have thereby sustained: we are very confident that your majesty will be so far from thinking it a point of honour or greatness to continue any grievance upon your people, because you found them begin in your predeces-sor's times, as you will rather hold it a work of great glory to reform them; since your majesty knoweth well that neither continuance of time, nor errors of men, can or ought to prejudice truth or justice; and that nothing can be more worthy of so worthy a king, nor more answerable to the great wisdom and goodness which abound in you, than to understand the griefs, and redress the wrongs of so loyal and well deserving people.

In this confidence, dread sovereign, we offer these Grievances, the particulars whereof are hereunder set down, to your gracious consideration.—And we offer them out of the greatest loyalty and duty, that subjects can bear to their prince; most humbly and instantly beseeching your majesty, as well for justice sake, more than which, as we conceive, in these petitions we do not seek, as also for the better assurance of the state, and general repose of your faithful and loving subjects, and for testimony of your gracious acceptation of their full affections; declared as well by their joyful receiving of your majesty at your happy entrance into these kingdoms, which you have been often pleased with favour to remember, as also by their extraordinary contributions granted since unto you, such as have been never yielded to any former prince, upon the like terms and occasions, that we may receive to these our complaints your most gracious answer. Which we cannot doubt but will be such as may be worthy of your princely self, and will give satisfaction and great comfort to all your loyal and most dutiful loving subjects, who do and will pray for the happy preservation of your most royal majesty.

New Impositions.

The policy and constitution of this your kingdom appropriates unto the kings of this realm, with the assent of the parliament, as well the sovereign power of making laws, as that of taxing, or imposing upon the subjects goods or merchandizes, wherein they have justly such a propriety, as may not without their consent be altered or changed.

This is the cause that the people of this kingdom, as they ever shewed themselves faithful and loving to their kings, and ready to aid them in all their just occasions with voluntary contributions; so have they been ever careful to preserve their own liberties and rights, when any thing hath been done to prejudice or impeach the same.—And therefore, when their princes, occasioned either by their wars, or their over great bounty, or by any other necessity, have without consent of parliament set impositions either within the land or upon commodities either exported or imported by the merchants; they have in open parliament complained of it, in that it was done without their consents; and thereupon never failed to obtain a speedy and full redress, without any claim made by the kings of any power or prerogative in that point.—And though the law of propriety be originally and carefully preserved by the common laws of this realm, which are as ancient as the kingdom itself; yet these famous kings, for the better contentment and assurance of their loving subjects, agreed, that this old fundamental right should be farther declared and established by act of parliament: wherein it is provided, that no such charges should ever be laid upon the people, without their common consent; as may appear by sundry records of former times.

We therefore, your majesty's most humble commons assembled in parliament, following the example of this worthy care of our ancestors, and out of a duty to those for whom we serve, finding that your majesty, without advice or consent of parliament, hath lately in time of peace set both greater impositions, and far more in number, than any your noble ancestors did ever in time of war, have with all humility presumed to present this most just and necessary Petition unto your majesty, that all impositions set without the assent of parliament may be quite abolished and taken away: and that your majesty, in imitation likewise of your noble progenitors, will be pleased, that a law may be made during this session of parliament, to declare, that all impositions set or to be set upon your people, their goods or merchandises, save only by common assent in parliament, are and shall be void: wherein your majesty shall not give your subjects good satisfaction in point of their right, but also bring exceeding joy and comfort to them which now suffer; partly through the abating the price of native commodities, and partly through the raising of all foreign: to the overthrow of merchants and shipping; the causing of a general dearth and decay of wealth among your people, who will be hereby no less discouraged than disabled to supply your majesty, when occasion shall require it.

Ecclesiastical Commissions.

Whereas by the statute 1 Eliz. cap. 1. intitled 'An Act restoring to the crown the ancient Jurisdiction over the state Ecclesiastical,' &c. power was given to the queen and her successors, to constitute and make a commission in causes ecclesiastical; The said act is found to be inconvenient and of dangerous extent in divers respects: 1. For that it enableth the making of such a commission, as well to any one subject born as to more. 2. For that, whereas by the intention and words of the statute, ecclesiastical jurisdiction is restored to the crown, and your highness by that statute enabled to give only such power ecclesiastical to the said commissioners; yet under colour of some words in that statute, where the commissioners are authorised to execute their commission, according to the tenor and effect of your highness's letters patents, and by letters patents grounded thereupon; the said commissioners do fine and imprison, and exercise other authority not belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction restored by that statute; which we conceive to be a great wrong to the subject; and that those commissioners might as well, by colour of those words, if they were so authorised by your highness's letters patents, fine without stint, and imprison without limitation of time; as also, according to will and discretion, without any rules of law, spiritual or temporal, adjudge and impose utter confiscation of goods, forfeiture of lands; yea and the taking away of a limb, and of life itself; and this for any matter whatsoever pertaining to spiritual jurisdiction. Which never was nor could be meant by the makers of that law. 3. For that by the statute, the king and his successors (however your majesty hath been pleased out of your gracious disposition otherwise to order) may make and direct such commission into all the counties and dioceses, yea into every parish of England; and thereby all causes may be taken from jurisdiction of bishops, chancellors and archdeacons, and laymen solely to be enabled to excommunicate and exercise all other censures spiritual. 4. That every petty offence, pertaining to spiritual jurisdiction, is by colour of the said words and letters patents, grounded thereupon, made subject to excommunication and punishment by that strange and exorbitant power and commission; whereby the least offenders, not committing any thing of any enormous or high nature, may be drawn from the most remote places of the kingdom to London or York; which is very grievous and inconvenient. 5. For that limit touching causes subject to this commission, being only with these words; viz. 'such as pertain to spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction;' it is very hard to know what matters or offences are included in that number: and the rather because it is unknown, what ancient canons or laws spiritual are in force, and what not. From hence ariseth great inconveniency, and occasion of contention.

And whereas upon the same statute a Commission Ecclesiastical is made, therein is grievance apprehended thus: 1. For that thereby the same men have both spiritual and temporal jurisdiction, and may both force the party by oath to accuse himself of any offence, and also enquire thereof by a jury: and lastly, may inflict for the same offence at the same time, and by one and the same sentence, both a spiritual and a temporal jurisdiction. 2. Whereas upon sentences of deprivation or other spiritual censures given by force of ordinary jurisdiction, an appeal lyeth for the party aggrieved, that is here excluded by express words of the commission. Also here is to be a trial by jury, yet no remedy by traverse nor attain; neither can a man have any writ of error, though a judgment or sentence be given against him, amounting to the taking away of all his goods, and imprisoning of him during life, yea, to the adjudging him in case of premunire, whereby his lands are forfeited, and he out of the protection of the law. 3. That whereas penal laws and offences against the same cannot be determined in other courts, or by other persons than by those trusted by parliament with the execution thereof; yet the execution of many such statutes (divers whereof were made since the first of Eliz.) are commended and committed to these commissioners ecclesiastical, who are either to inflict the punishment contained in the statute being premunire, and of other high nature, and so enforce a man upon his own oath to accuse and expose himself to those punishments, or else to inflict other temporal punishments at their pleasure. And yet besides and after that done, the party shall be subject, in the courts mentioned in the acts, to punishment by the same acts appointed and inflicted. Which we think very unreasonable. 4. That the commission giveth authority to enforce men called into question, to enter into recognizance, not only for appearance from time to time, but also for performance of whatsoever shall be by the commissioners ordered.

And also that it giveth power to enjoin parties defendant or accused to pay such fees to the ministers of the court, as by the commissioners shall be thought fit.

And touching the execution of the commission, it is found grievous these ways among other: 1. For that laymen are by the commissioners punished for speaking (otherwise than in judicial places and courses) of the simony and other misdemeanors of the spiritual men, though the thing spoken be true, and the speech tending to the inducing of some condign punishment. 2. In that these commissioners usually appoint and allot to women discontented at and unwilling to live with their husbands, such portion and allowance for present maintenance, as to them shall seem meet; to the great encouragement to wives to be disobedient and contemptuous against their husbands. 3. In that their pursuivants and other ministers employed in the apprehension of suspected offenders in any thing spiritual, and in the searching for any supposed scandalous books, use to break open mens houses, closets, and desks, rifling all corners and secret custodies, as in cases of high treason or suspicion thereof.

All which premises, amongst other things considered, your majesty's most loyal and dutiful commons in all humbleness beseech you, that for the easing of them, as well from the present grievance, as from the fear and possibility of greater in times future, your highness would vouchsafe your royal assent and allowance to and for the ratifying of the said statute, and the reducing thereof, and consequently of the said commission, to reasonable and convenient limits, by some act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

Proclamations.

Amongst many other points of happiness and freedom, which your majesty's subjects of this kingdom have enjoyed under your royal progenitors, kings and queens of this realm, there is none which they have accounted more dear and precious than this, to be guided and governed by certain rule of law, which giveth both to the head and members that which of right belongeth to them; and not by any uncertain or arbitrary form of government.—Which, as it hath proceeded from the original and constitution and temperature of this estate, so hath it been the principal means of upholding the same in such sort, as that their kings have been just, beloved, happy and glorious; and the kingdom itself peaceable, flourishing and durable, so many ages.—And the effect, as well of the contentment that the subjects of this kingdom have taken in this form of government, as also of the love, respect and duty, which they have, by reason of the same, rendered unto their princes, may appear in this, that they have, as occasion hath required, yielded more extraordinary and voluntary contributions to assist their kings, than the subjects of any other known kingdom whatsoever.—Out of this root hath grown the indubitable right of the people of this kingdom, not to be made subject to any punishment that shall extend to their lives, lands, bodies or goods, other than such as are ordained by the common-laws of this land, or the statutes made by their common consent in parliament.—Nevertheless, it is apparent, both that Proclamations have been of late years much more frequent than heretofore, and that they are extended, not only to the liberty, but also to the goods, inheritances, and livelihood of men; some of them tending to alter some points of the law, and make them new: Other some made shortly after a session of parliament, for matter directly rejected in the same session: Other appointing punishments to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction; Some containing penalties in form of penal statutes; Some referring the punishment of offenders to the courts of arbitrary discretion, which have laid heavy and grievous censures upon the delinquents: Some, as the proclamation for starch, accompanied with letters commanding enquiry to be made against transgressors at the quarter sessions: And some vouching former Proclamations, to countenance and warrant the latter; as by a catalogue hereunder written more particularly appeareth. By reason whereof there is a general fear conceived and spread amongst your majesty's people, that Proclamations will by degrees grow up and increase to the strength and nature of laws. Whereby not only that ancient happiness [freedom] will be as much blemished (if not quite taken away) which their ancestors have so long enjoyed; But the same may also in process of time bring a new form of arbitrary government upon the realm. And this our fear is the more increased, by occasion as well of certain books lately published, which ascribe a greater power to proclamations than heretofore hath been conceived to belong unto them: as also of the care taken to reduce all the Proclamations made since your majesty's reign into one volume, and to print them in such form as acts of parliament formerly have been, and still are used to be; which seemeth to imply a purpose to give them more reputation and more establishment than heretofore they have had.

We therefore, your majesty's humble subjects, the commons in this parliament assembled, taking these matters into our consideration, and weighing how much it doth concern your majesty both in honour and safety, that such impressions should not be enforced to settle in your subjects minds, have thought it to appertain to our duties as well towards your majesty, as to those that have trusted and sent us to their service, to present unto your majesty's view these fears and griefs of your people; and to become humble suitors unto your majesty, that thenceforth no fine or forfeiture of goods, or other pecuniary or corporal punishment, may be inflicted upon your subjects, (other than restraint of liberty, which we also humbly beseech may be but upon urgent necessity, and to continue but 'till other order may be taken by course of law) unless they shall offend against some law or statute of this realm in force at the time of their offence committed; and for the greater assurance and comfort of your people, that it will please your majesty to declare your royal pleasure to that purpose, either by some law to be made in this session of parliament, or by some such other course, whereof your people may take knowledge, as to your princely wisdom shall seem most convenient.

1. Proclamations importing alterations of some points of the law, and making new: 11 Jan. 1 Jac. fol. 57. forbiddeth chusing of knights and burgesses bankrupt or outlawed; and commandeth choice of such as are not only taxed to subsidies, but also have ordinarily paid and satisfied the same, fol. 57.—If returns be made contrary to proclamation, they are to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, fol. 60.—25 Aug. 5 Jac. fol. 151. That the Proclamation should be a warrant to any officer or subject to seize starch, and to dispose or destroy any stuff, &c. And restraineth all men not licenced to make starch, fol. 154.

2. A Proclamation made shortly after parliament, for matter directly rejected the precedent session: 1 March, 2 Jac. fol. 112. A proclamation for building with brick, after a bill to that end rejected.

3. Proclamations touching the freehold livelihood of men: 16 Sept. 1 Jac. fol. 41. Raising and pulling down houses authorised, and prohibition to build them again at any time.—12 Oct. 5 Jac. fol. 160. Forbidding building and taking away the materials; and appointing the owners land to be lett by other men at what price they please, fol. 101.

4. Proclamations, referring punishments to be done by justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, constables, and other officers; or seizure by persons who have no authority to enquire, hear and determine of those offences; so it is to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction. 8 Jan. 2 Jac. fol. 72. A proclamation for folding wools, &c. 23 August, 5 Jac. fol. 151. A seizure of starch, &c.

5. Proclamations penned with penalties, in form of penal statutes: 4 Nov. 1 Jac. fol. . . . Pain of confiscation of goods. 18 Jan. 2 Jac. fol. 72. Ten days imprisonment, and standing in the pillory.—Justices of peace to forfeit 20*l.* if they see not the proclamation of folding wools executed. 23 Aug. 5 Jac. fol. 151. Forfeiture of one moiety of starch, &c. seized, &c.

6. Punishment of offenders in courts of arbitrary discretion, as Star-Chamber: 1 March, 4 Jac. fol. 102, Proclamation for building.—12 Oct. 5 Jac. fol. 159, a Proclamation for building.—July, 6 Jac. fol. 177, Proclamation for starch.—25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180, Proclamation for building.

7. Former Proclamations become precedents, and vouched in latter Proclamations. 18 June, 2 Jac. fol. 75, avouched 5 Ed. 6. and 4 Eliz. fol. 73.—25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180, mentioneth former Proclamations against buildings, and explaineth and qualifieth them.

Your majesty's commons, in this session of parliament assembled, do cheerfully acknowledge the spring and fountain of public justice of this state to be originally in your majesty. For the benefit thereof is conveyed and derived into every member of this politic body by your highness's writs.

Amongst which none are more honourable for the support of the common justice of the realm, than the writs of Prohibition, Habeas Corpus, et de homine replegiando: which writs have been ever held and found to be a chief means of relief unto the poor, distressed and oppressed subjects of this kingdom, and can be no inconvenience at all: seeing they are no way conclusive against any man, and do draw no benefit to the procurers, but rather a fruitless charge, if they be obtained upon any unjust ground or pretence.—In the free granting of, and proceeding upon, some of which writs, especially that of Prohibition, there hath of late been observed to be some obstruction, by reason that upon the complaints and the importunity of some, who desire the support of inferior courts against the principal courts of the common law, (wherein your majesty hath been greatly troubled) you have taken into your royal consideration the several extents of the jurisdiction of the said several courts.—Since which time the said writs have been more sparingly granted, and with stricter cautions than anciently hath been accustomed.

It is therefore most humbly desired that it may please your majesty, whose glory is never more conspicuous than when the poorest of the commonalty are blessed with the influence of the ancient beams of justice, to require your judges in the courts of Westminster to grant the said writs, in cases wherein such writs do lye, and by law are grantable; and in such sort as that such persons whose bodies being either committed to prison, or their causes like to recover great prejudice by proceedings against them in times of vacation, may not be debarred nor deferred from having the speedy relief and benefit of those Writs, more than in former times.

Four Shires near Wales.

Forasmuch as the exercise of authority over the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, Wigorn, and Salop, by the president and council of Wales, by way of Instructions upon a pretext of a statute made in the 34th year of the reign of king Henry 8, is conceived not to be warranted by that, or any other law of this realm of England.—And for that in the second session of this present parliament, there did a bill pass the house of commons, whereby it was declared that the true intent and meaning of that before mentioned statute was not thereby to subject these counties to that kind of government by Instructions; and yet notwithstanding the inhabitants of those counties are since utterly discouraged, and in effect debarred from the trial of the right of that kind of jurisdiction over those counties, by the ordinary course of the common laws of this land, by reason of Prohibitions which were heretofore frequently granted, upon suggestion that those counties are not part of Wales, or of the marches of the same, which is the very point in question, are now very hard to be obtained, except in cases where those of that council do exceed the instructions set down to them by your majesty: As also for that, in cases where actions have been brought at the common law, whereby that question might have come to decision, the plaintiffs have been stopped, sometimes by Injunctions out of your majesty's court of Chancery from their proceedings, sometimes before, sometimes after judgments, and also by imprisonment:—The precedents of which proceedings do concern all your majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects of this kingdom, as well in respect of the stopping of the free course of justice, as also by reason that if that kind of jurisdiction were at first extended over these four counties, and be now still continued without warrant of law; the consequence of this example may in future times give countenance to the erecting of like jurisdictions in other places of this realm.

And forasmuch as your majesty was pleased to command all the judges to consider of this question, and that they thereupon bestowed very many days in hearing the cause argued by learned counsel on both sides, and in viewing and considering great numbers of records, produced before them concerning that cause; whereby they have, no doubt, truly informed themselves of the right.

It is therefore the most humble petition of the commons in this present parliament assembled, that your most excellent majesty will also be pleased to command, that the judges may deliver their opinion upon that so exact and deliberate hearing, which was had before them, concerning the right of the afore-said jurisdiction over those four counties, by force of that statute; and that the opinion which they shall deliver therein, may be in such sort published, as that all your majesty's subjects whom it may concern, may have means to take knowledge thereof; and that your majesty will vouchsafe to declare it, by your most princely pleasure, that any of your majesty's subjects, who may have occasion thereof, may try his or their right in that point, by the due and ordinary course of the common law, either by suing out of Prohibitions, or any other your majesty's writs, without restraint; and that if the said jurisdiction over these four counties shall appear to your majesty by the opinion of the judges, or otherwise, not to be warranted by law, that then your majesty will be pleased, out of your most princely and gracious favour towards all your loyal dutiful subjects, to order the ceasing of the said jurisdiction over those counties, to the great comfort of the inhabitants of those counties, and of the rest of your subjects of all the kingdom.

New Drapery.

Complaint was made in all humble manner, the second session of this present parliament, of many disorders, outrages, and oppressions, committed upon occasion of letters patents granted to the duke of Lenox, for searching and sealing of studds and manufactures, called by the name of New Draperies.—Which patent we held in all, or the most part of it, to be questionable, and in many apparently unlawful, and the execution thereof we found stretched by the farmers and deputies beyond the extent of the said letters patents, as appears in the particulars set down in the said grievance.—To which it pleased your majesty to give this gracious answer; 'that the validity of the said patent should be left to be judged by the law, and whensoever any abuse arising in the execution thereof should appear, it should severely be punished.'—Which was for that time to our good satisfaction.—Yet finding by divers complaints made now in parliament, that not only the said letters patents are still in force, and the validity of them undecided by judgment, but disorders in the execution of them, are so far from being reformed, that they multiply every day, to the grievance of your majesty's subjects; and those of the poorer sort, who exercising these manufactures, are subject to much oppression, to the great hindrance of some, and utter undoing of many, as hath appeared in the particularities of the complaints presented to us.

Our humble desire is, that your majesty will be pleased, according to your former resolution, to give order that this cause, which hath thus long hung in suspense, be speedily brought to judgment; and that before all the judges, because it concerneth all the subjects of the land; and in the mean time that the execution of the said letters patents, so far forth as they concern the said New Drapery, may be suspended till judgment be given: whereby your subjects, who do in all humility present this grievance unto your majesty, may be relieved, and have no occasion to reiterate their complaints.

Licence of Wines.

Whereas by ancient and late statutes it hath been enacted, that Wines should be retailed at such low rates and prices, as for this 50 years past they could not be afforded; and for redress thereof, it was ordained by a statute in the 5th year of the late queen Elizabeth, that (those former laws notwithstanding) Wines might be sold at such prices, as by proclamation from time to time to be made by consent of many great officers, should be published and set down: which proclamation, nevertheless, the late queen and your most excellent majesty have been drawn to forbear, upon the earnest suit of certain persons, who therein only intended their private gain: by reason whereof, both great sums of money in fines, rents, and annual payments, have been gotten and raised unto the said persons, and their assignees, and great damage and prejudice hath likewise fallen and light upon your people; not only by enhancing the prices of wines, licencing over-many taverns, and appointing of unmeet persons, in unfit places, to keep the same; but also by reason that corrupt, mingled, evil, and unwholesome Wines have been uttered and sold, to the great hurt of the health of your highness's people: one man sometimes engrossing all the licences designed for that place.

Whereupon complaint being made to your majesty, amongst other grievances of your people, in the second session of this present parliament, your highness was pleased to answer, that your grants in that behalf were no other than such as were warrantable by the laws.—Whereas the grievance was the greater, for that all laws concerning the sale of Wines being intended and conceived to stand and be repealed, there were nevertheless, by the oversight of them which were trusted in that business, casually omitted, and left unrepealed, certain obsolete laws impossible to be observed; as namely, one, in the time of king Edward 1. commanding Wines to be sold at 1s. the sextern; and one other made in the 28th year of king Henry 8, prohibiting all persons, under penalty, to sell any French Wines above 8d. the gallon; and other Wines, as sacks and sweet Wines, above 1s. the gallon:—And one branch of a statute made in the 7th year of king Edward 6, prohibiting men to sell any Wines by retail in their houses.

Whereupon your majesty hath been induced and drawn to ground new patents of dispensation, and to grant the benefit thereof unto the lord admiral:—Whereby the like discommodities and inconveniencies have since ensued unto the commonwealth, as formerly did arise and grow upon the other repealed laws, whereof in the former petitions of your subjects, exhibited unto your majesty in the said second session, your highness never had any direct and clear information:

May it therefore please your most excellent majesty, at the humble request of your commons, (who have taken into consideration the greatest charges and expences which the said lord admiral hath been at in your majesty's service, and have considered likewise the present licences and grants, for valuable considerations unto many hundreds of your highness's subjects, which, without great loss to the said grantees, cannot be so suddenly made void) out of your princely wisdom and goodness, wherein you have professed not to extend and strain your prerogative royal, against the public good of your people, for the particular gain of any private persons, to vouchsafe: that from thenceforth there may no more grants of that nature be made unto any of your subjects whomsoever; but that the said statute of the 5th of Elizabeth for the apprising of Wines, to be published by proclamation, as time and occasion shall require, may be put in execution: and that your majesty will likewise vouchsafe to grant your royal assent to a bill of repeal of the said obsolete statutes, and all other whereupon any such non obstantes and dispensations might be grounded.—In which statute of repeal, provision shall be made for the indemnity of all such, as under your majesty's great seal have already procured Licence for such sale of Wines.

Alc-houses.

Whereas by the laws of this your majesty's realm of England, no taxes, aids, or impositions of any kind whatsoever, ought or can be laid or imposed upon your people, or upon any of their goods or commodities, but only by authority and consent of parliament.—Which being undoubtedly the ancient and fundamental law of the land, is yet for more abundant clearness expressly declared in sundry acts of parliament, made and enacted in the time of sundry your majesty's progenitors, the noblest and most prudent kings of this realm: Your commons with just grief do complain unto your majesty of the late tax and imposition laid and imposed yearly upon such as are allowed to keep Victualling Houses, or sell ale and beer by retail: which imposition not being taxed by assent of parliament, but commanded and directed only by letters and instructions, your commons are persuaded that the same proceeded rather from misinformation, than by the direction and judgment of your most noble and royal heart.

Wherefore your said commons, knowing the grief of your people in this behalf, do (according to their duties) in all humility inform and signify unto your majesty: 1. That the said taxation being singular and without example, and it is in itself a precedent of dangerous consequence, and (as your people fear) may easily (in time) be extended further, as to badgers of corn, makers of malt, drovers of cattle, and such like, who in such sort are to be licenced by justices of the peace, as those persons are, upon whom, at this time, this present tax is charged and laid. 2. Such houses being oftentimes, at the best, harbours of idleness, drunkenness, whoredom, and all manner of villanies, the licences are now, (the honest sort in most places refusing to undergo the new charge,) rented and taken by the looser and baser sort of people, who have no conscience how they gain. By reason whereof all manner of vice and evil behaviour is likely every day to increase. Neither can the justices of the peace conveniently prevent the same: for that the persons licenced under the late contribution, affirm with clamour, that they have a toleration for a year, and that such persons are not friends unto the crown that seek to suppress them, and thereby to diminish your majesty's revenues.

Thirdly, many justices of the peace, (being sworn to execute their office) which for this particular conceive to be, that Ale-house keepers formerly licenced, are not to be suppressed without just and reasonable cause, cannot be satisfied touching their said oath, but are much distracted and perplexed what to do, the late instructions notwithstanding, against such persons, as otherwise being not known to be of evil behaviour, only to refuse to pay this late taxed and imposed sum of money.

In consideration whereof, your humble commons most instantly beseech your most excellent majesty, that the former letters and instructions may be countermanded or stayed, and all further directions and proceedings in that kind forborn.

Among many resemblances which are observed to be between natural and politick bodies, there is none more apt and natural than this, that the diseases of both do not at one instance commonly seize upon all parts; but beginning in some one part, do by tract of time, and by degrees, get possession of the whole, unless by applying of wholesome and proper remedies in due time they may be prevented, which, as it is in many things very visible, so it is in nothing more apparent than in this matter of Impositions: which beginning at the first, either with foreign commodities brought in, or such of your own as were transported, is now extended to those commodities, which growing in this kingdom are not transported, but uttered to the subjects of the same: For proof whereof, we do in all humility present unto your majesty's view the late imposition of one shilling the chaldron of Sea-Coals, rising in Blith and Sunderland, not by virtue of any contract or grant, as in the coals of Newcastle, but under a mere pretext of your majesty's most royal prerogative: Which imposition is not only grievous for the present, especially to those of the poorer sort, the price of whose only and most necessary fuel is thereby to their great grief enhanced, but dangerous also for the future, considering that the reason of this precedent may be extended to all the commodities of this kingdom.

May it therefore please your most excellent majesty, which is the great and sovereign physician of the estate, to apply such a remedy as this disease may be presently cured, and all diseases for time to come of like nature prevented.

Speech of Sir FRANCIS BACON to the King, the 7th of July 1610, on presenting the Petition to his Majesty, who was attended on the Occasion by sir Francis and eleven other Members; taken from 2 Bacon's Works, 4to ed. p. 212.

Most gracious Sovereign; The knights, citizens, and burgesses assembled in parliament, in the house of your commons, in all humbleness do exhibit and present unto your most sacred majesty, in their own words, through by my hand, their Petitions and Grievances. They are here conceived and set down in writing, according to ancient custom of parliament; they are also prefaced according to the manner and taste of these later times. Therefore for me to make any additional preface, were neither warranted nor convenient; especially speaking before a king, the exactness of whose judgment ought to scatter and chase away all unnecessary speech as the sun doth a vapour. This only I must say. Since this session of parliament we have seen your glory in the solemnity of the creation of this most noble prince; we have heard your wisdom in sundry excellent speeches which you have delivered amongst us. Now we hope to

And feel the effects of your goodness, in your gracious answer to these our petitions. For this we are persuaded, that the attribute, which was given by one of the wisest writers to two of the best emperors, 'divus Nerva et divus Trajanus,' so saith Tacitus, 'res olim insociabiles miscuerunt, imperium et libertatem,' may be truly applied to your majesty. For never was there such a conservator of regality in a crown, nor ever such a protector of lawful freedom in a subject.

Only this, Excellent Sovereign, let not the sound of grievances, though it be sad, seem harsh to your princely ears. It is but gemitus columbe, the mourning of a dove, with that patience and humility of heart which appertaineth to loving and loyal subjects. And far be it from us, but that in the midst of the sense of our grievances we should remember and acknowledge the infinite benefits, which by your majesty, next under God, we do enjoy; which bind us to wish unto your life fullness of days, and unto your line royal a succession and continuance even unto the world's end.

It resteth that unto these petitions here included I do add one more that goeth to them all: which is, that if in the words and frame of them there be any thing offensive; or that we have expressed ourselves otherwise than we should or would; that your majesty would cover it and cast the veil of your grace upon it; and accept of our good intentions, and help them by your benign interpretation.

Lastly, I am most humbly to crave a particular pardon for myself that have used these few words; and scarcely should have been able to have used any at all, in respect of the reverence which I bear to your person and judgment, had I not been somewhat relieved and comforted by the experience, which in my service and access I have had of your continual grace and favour.

84. The Conviction and Attainder of ROBERT LALOR, Priest, being indicted on the Statute of the 16th Ed. II. cap: 5, commonly called, The Case of Præmunire in Ireland. Hill. 4 JAMES I. A. D. 1607.

[From Sir John Davies's Reports.]

THIS Robert Lalor, being a native of this kingdom, received his orders of priesthood above 30 years since at the hands of one Richard Brady, to whom the pope had given the title of bishop of Kilmore in Ulster; and for the space of 30 years together his authority and credit was not mean within the province of Leinster. He had also made his name known in the court of Rome, and held intelligence with the cardinal who was protector of this nation; by means whereof he obtained the title and jurisdiction of Vicar-General of the See Apostolick, within the arch-bishoprick of Dublin and the bishopricks of Kildare and Ferris. This pretended jurisdiction, extending well-nigh over all the province of Leinster, he exercised boldly and securely many years together, until the proclamation was published, whereby all Jesuits and priests ordained by foreign authority were commanded to depart out of this kingdom by a certain time prefixed. After which time he began to lurk and to change his name. Howbeit at last he was apprehended in Dublin, and committed to prison in the Castle there. Upon his first Examination taken by the lord-deputy himself, he acknowledged that he was a priest, and ordained by a popish titular bishop; that he had accepted the title and office of the Pope's Vicar-General in the three dioceses before-named, and had exercised spiritual jurisdiction in foro conscientie; and in sundry other points he maintained and justified the pope's authority. Only he said, he was of opinion that the pope had no power to excommunicate or depose his majesty, because the king is not of the pope's religion.

THE next term after he was indicted upon the statute of 2 Eliz. enacted in this realm against such as should wilfully and advisedly maintain and uphold the jurisdiction of any foreign prince or prelate in any causes ecclesiastical or civil within this realm. By which statute the first offence of that kind is punished with loss of goods, and one year's imprisonment; the second offence incurreth the penalty of the præmunire; and the third offence is made high treason. Upon this indictment he was arraigned, convicted and condemned, and so rested in prison during the next two terms without any farther question. He then made petition unto the lord-deputy to be set at liberty: whereupon his lordship caused him to be examined by sir Oliver St. John, sir James Fullerton, sir Jeffery Fenton, the Attorney and Solicitor-General. At first he made some evasive and indirect answers; but at last voluntarily and freely he made this ensuing Acknowledgment or Confession, which being set down in writing word for word as he made it, was advisedly read by him, and subscribed with his own hand, and with the hands of those who took his examination; and afterwards he confirmed it by his oath before the lord-deputy and council.

FIRST, he doth acknowledge, that he is not a lawful Vicar-General in the dioceses of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, and thinketh in his conscience that he cannot lawfully take upon him the said office.—Item, he doth acknowledge our sovereign lord king James, that now is, to be his lawful chief and supreme governor in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil, and that he is bound in conscience to obey him in all the said causes; and that neither the pope, nor any other foreign prelate, prince or potentate, hath any power to controul the king in any cause ecclesiastical or civil within this kingdom, or any of his majesty's dominions.—Item, he doth in his conscience believe, that all bishops ordained and made by the king's authority within any of his dominions are lawful bishops; and that no bishop made by the pope, or by any authority derived from the pope, within the king's dominions, hath any power or authority to impugn, disannul or controul any act done by any bishop made by his majesty's authority as aforesaid.—Item, he profeseth himself willing and ready to obey the king, as a good and obedient subject ought to do, in all his lawful commandments, either concerning his function of priesthood, or any other duty belonging to a good subject.

After this Confession made, the state here had no purpose to proceed against him severely, either for his contempt of the proclamation, or offence against the law: so as he had more liberty than before, and many of his friends had access unto him; who telling him what they heard of his Confession, he protested unto them, that he had only acknowledged the king's civil and temporal power, without any confession or admittance of his authority in spiritual causes. This being reported unto the lord-deputy by sundry gentlemen, who gave faith unto what he said, his lordship thought fit, that since he had incurred the pain of præmunire, by exercising episcopal jurisdiction, as Vicar-General to the pope, that he should be attainted of that offence; as well to make him an example to others of his profession, (for almost in every diocese of this kingdom there is a titular bishop ordained by the pope), as also that at the time of his trial a just occasion might be taken, to publish the Confession and Acknowledgment which he had voluntarily made, signed, and confirmed by oath before the lord-deputy and council, who have likewise subscribed their names as witnesses thereof.

Hereupon in Hill. term, 4 Jacobi, an Indictment was framed against him in the King's Bench upon the statute of 16 Ric. 2, cap. 5. containing these several points.

1. That he had received a bull or brief purchased or procured in the court of Rome, which bull or brief did touch or concern the king's crown and dignity royal, containing a commission of authority from the pope of Rome unto Richard Brady and David Magrath to constitute a Vicar-General for the see of Rome, by the name of the See Apostolick, in the several dioceses of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, within this kingdom of Ireland. 2. That by pretext or colour of that bull or brief he was constituted Vicar-General of the see of Rome, and took upon him the stile and title of Vicar-General in the said several dioceses. 3. That he did exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction as Vicar-General of the see of Rome, by instituting divers persons to benefices with cure of souls, by granting dispensations in causes matrimonial, by pronouncing sentences of divorce between divers married persons, and by doing all other acts and things pertaining to episcopal jurisdiction, within the said several dioceses, against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity royal, and in contempt of his majesty, and disherison of his crown, and contrary to the form and effect of the statute, &c.

To this Indictment Lalor pleaded Not Guilty; and when the issue was to be tried, the name and reputation of the man, and the nature of the cause, drew all the principal gentlemen both of the pale and provinces that were in town to the hearing of the matter. At which time a substantial jury of the city of Dublin being sworn for the trial, and the points of the indictment being opened and set forth by the king's serjeant; the attorney-general thought it not impertinent, but very necessary, before he descended to the particular evidence against the prisoner, to inform and satisfy the hearers in two points. 1. What reason moved us to ground this indictment upon the old statute of 16 Ric. 2, rather than upon some other later law made since the time of Hen. 8. 2. What were the true causes of the making of this law of 16 Ric. and other formal laws against provisors, and such as did appeal to the court of Rome in those times, when both the prince and people of England did for the most part acknowledge the pope to be the thirteenth apostle, and only oracle in matters of religion, and did follow his doctrine in most of those points wherein we now dissent from him.

1. For the first point, we did purposely forbear to proceed against him upon any latter law, to the end that such as were ignorant might be informed, that long before Henry 8. was born divers laws were made against the usurpation of the bishop of Rome upon the rights of the crown of England, well-nigh as sharp and severe as any statutes which have been made in later times; and that therefore we made choice to proceed upon a law made more than 200 years past, when the king, the lords and commons, which made the laws, and the judges, which did interpret the laws, did for the most part follow the same opinions in religion which were taught and held in the court of Rome.

2. For the second point, the causes that moved and almost enforced the English nation to make this, and other statutes of the same nature, were of the greatest importance that could possibly arise in any state. For these laws were made to uphold and maintain the sovereignty of the king, the liberty of the people, the common law, and the commonwealth, which otherwise had been undermined and utterly ruined by the usurpation of the bishop of Rome.

For albeit the kings of England were absolute emperors within their dominions, and had under them as learned a prelacy and clergy, as valiant and prudent a nobility, as free and wealthy a commonalty, as any was then in Christendom; yet if we look into the stories and records of these two imperial kingdoms, we shall find, that if these laws of provision and praemunire had not been made, they had lost the name of imperial, and of kingdoms too, and had been long since made tributary provinces to the bishop of Rome, or rather part of St. Peter's patrimony in demesne. Our kings had had their scepters wrested out of their hands, their crowns spurned off from their heads, their necks trod upon; they had been made laquies or footmen to the bishop of Rome, as some of the emperors and French kings were; our prelates had been made his chaplains, and clerks, our nobility his vassals and servants, our commons his slaves and villains, if these acts of manumission had not freed them. In a word, before the making of these laws, the flourishing crown and commonwealth of England was in extreme danger to have been brought into most miserable servitude and slavery, under colour of religion and devotion to the see of Rome. And this was not only seen and felt by the king, and much repined at and protested against by the nobility, but the commons, the general multitude of the subjects, did exclaim and cry out upon it. For the commons of England may be an example unto all other subjects in the world in this, that they have ever been tender and sensible of the wrongs and dishonours offered unto their kings, and have ever contended to uphold and maintain their honour and sovereignty. And their faith and loyalty have been generally such, though every age hath brought forth some particular monsters of disloyalty, as no pretence of zeal or religion could ever withdraw the greater part of the subjects to submit themselves to a foreign yoke, no not when popery was in her height and exaltation; whereof this act and divers others of the same kind are clear and manifest testimonies. For this act of 16 Rich. 2. was made at the prayer of the commons: which prayer they make not for themselves, neither shew they their own self-love therein, as in other bills which contain their grievances, but their love and zeal to the king and his crown. When after the Norman Conquest they importuned their kings for the Great Charter, they sought their own liberties; and in other bills preferred commonly by the commons against shrieves, escheators, purveyors, or the like, they seek their own profit and ease. But here their petition is to the king, to make a law for the defence and maintenance of his own honour. They complain, that by bulls and processes from Rome, the king is deprived of that jurisdiction which belongs of right to his imperial crown; that the king doth lose the service and council of his prelates and learned men by translations made by the bishop of Rome; that the king's laws are defeated at his will, the treasure of the realm is exhausted and exported to enrich his court; and that by those means the crown of England, which hath ever been free, and subject unto none, but immediately unto God, should be submitted unto the bishop of Rome, to the utter destruction of the king and the whole realm; which God defend, say they: and thereupon, out of their exceeding zeal and fervency, they offer to live and die with the king in defence of the liberties of the crown. And lastly, they pray and require the king by way of justice, to examine all the lords in parliament, what they thought of these manifest wrongs and usurpations, and whether they would stand with the king in defence of his royal liberties, or no. Which the king did according to their petition: and the lords spiritual and temporal did all answer, that these usurpations of the bishop of Rome were against the liberties of the crown, and that they were all bound by their allegiance to stand with the king, and to maintain his honour and prerogative. And thereupon it was enacted with a full consent of the three estates, that such as should purchase in the court of Rome, or elsewhere, any bulls or processes, or other things which might touch the king in his crown and dignity royal, and such as should bring them into the realm, and such as should receive them, publish them, or execute them, they, their notaries, proctors, maintainers and counsellors, should be all out of the king's protection, their lands and goods forfeited to the king, their bodies attached if they might be found, or else process of praemunire facias to be awarded against them. Upon these motives, and with this affection and zeal of the people, was the statute of 16 Rich. 2. made, whereupon we have framed our indictment.

Now let us look higher and see, whether the former laws made by king Edw. 1. and king Edw. 3. against the usurpation of the bishop of Rome, were not grounded upon the like cause and reason. The statute of 38 Edw. 3. cap. 1. expressing the mischiefs that did arise by Breves of Citation, which drew the bodies of the people, and by Bulls of provision and reservation of ecclesiastical benefices, which drew the wealth of the realm, to the court of Rome, doth declare, that by these means the ancient laws, customs and franchises of the realm were confounded, the crown of our sovereign lord the king diminished, and his person falsely defamed, the treasure and riches of the laud carried away, the subjects of the realm molested and impoverished, the benefices of holy church wasted and destroyed, divine service, hospitality, alms-deeds and other works of charity neglected.

Again, 27 Edw. 3. cap. 1. upon the grievous and clamorous complaint (for that phrase is there used) of the great men and commons touching citations and provisions, it is enacted, that the offenders shall forfeit their lands, goods and chattels, and their bodies be imprisoned and ransomed at the king's will.

But in the stat. of 25 Edw. 3. wherein the first law against provisors made 25 Edw. 1. is recited, there is a larger declaration of these inconveniences than in the two last acts before mentioned. For there all the commons of the realm do grievously complain, that whereas the holy church of England was first founded in estate of prelacy by the kings and nobility of that realm, and by them endowed with great possessions and revenues in lands, rents and advowsons, to the end the people might be informed in religion, hospitality might be kept, and other works of charity might be exercised within the realm; and whereas the king and other founders of the said prelacies were the rightful patrons and advowees thereof, and upon avoidance of such ecclesiastical promotions had power to advance thereunto their kinsmen, friends, and other learned men of the birth of that realm, which being so advanced became able and worthy persons to serve the king in counsel, and other places in the commonweal; the bishop of Rome, usurping the seignory of such possessions and benefices, did give and grant the same to aliens, which did never dwell in England, and to cardinals, which might not dwell there, as if he were rightful patron of those benefices; whereas by the law of England he never had right to the patronage thereof; whereby in short time all the spiritual promotions in the realm would be engrossed into the hands of strangers, canonical elections of prelates would be abolished, works of charity would cease, the founders and true patrons of churches would be disinherited, the king's council would be weakened, the whole kingdom impoverished, and the laws and rights of the realm destroyed. Upon this complaint it was resolved in parliament, that these oppressions and grievances should not be suffered in any manner: and therefore it was enacted, that the king and his subjects should thenceforth enjoy the rights of patronage; that free elections of archbishops, bishops, and other prelates elective, should be made according to the ancient grants of the king's progenitors and their founders; that no bulls of provision should be put in execution, but that the provisors should be attached, fined and ransomed at the king's will, and withal imprisoned, till they had renounced the benefits of their bulls, satisfied the party grieved, and given securities not to commit the like offence again.

Now, Mr. Lalor, what think you of these things? Did you believe that such laws as these had been made against the pope 200, 250, 300 years since? Was king Hen. 8. the first prince that opposed the pope's usurped authority? Were our protestants the first subjects that ever complained of the court of Rome? Of what religion, think you, were the propounders and enactors of these laws? Were they good catholics, or good subjects, or what were they? You will not say they were protestants, for you will not admit the reformed religion to be so ancient as those times: neither can you say they were unfaithful, for they strove to uphold their liege lord's sovereignty. Doubtless the people in those days did generally embrace the vulgar errors and superstitions of the Romish church, and in that respect were papists as well as you. But they had not learned the new doctrine of the pope's supremacy, and transcendent authority over kings; they did not believe he had power to depose princes, and discharge subjects of their allegiance, to abrogate the fundamental laws of kingdoms, and to impose his canons as binding laws upon all nations, without their consents; they thought it a good point of religion to be good subjects, to honour their king, to love their country, and to maintain the laws and liberties thereof, howsoever in other points they did err and were misled with the church of Rome.

So as now (Mr. Lalor) you have no excuse, no evasion, but your conscience must condemn you as well as the law; since the law-makers in all ages, and all religious papists and protestants, do condemn you: unless you think yourself wiser than all the bishops that were then in England, or all the judges, who in those days were learned in the civil and canon laws as well as in the common laws of England.

But you, being an Irishman, will say, perhaps, these laws were made in England, and that the Irish nation gave no particular consent thereunto, only there was an implicit consent wrapt and folded up in general terms given in the statute of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 22. whereby all statutes made in England are established and made of force in Ireland. Assuredly, though the first parliament held in Ireland was after the first law against provisors made in England, yet have there been as many particular laws made in Ireland against provisions, citations, bulls and brefs of the court of Rome, as are to be found in all the parliament-rolls in England. What will you say if in the self-same parliament of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 5. a special law were made, enacting, authorizing and confirming in this realm all the statutes of England made against provisors; if before this the like law were made 32 Hen. 6. cap. 4. and again 28 Hen. 6. cap. 30. the like; and before that, the like law were made 40 Edw. 3. cap. 19. in the famous parliament of Kilkenny; if a statute of the same nature were made 7 Edw. 4. cap. 2. and a severer law than all these, 16 Edw. 4. cap. 4. that such as purchase any bulls of provision in the court of Rome, as soon as they have published or executed the same to the hurt of any incumbent, should be adjudged traitors; which act, if it be not repealed by the statute of queen Mary, may terrify Mr. Lalor more than all the acts which are before remembered?

But let us ascend yet higher, to see when the pope's usurpation, which caused all these complaints, began in England, with what success it was continued, and by what degrees it rose to that height, that it well nigh overtopped the crown; whereby it will appear whether he had gained a circle by prescription, by a long and quiet possession, before the making of these laws.

The first encroachment of the bishop of Rome upon the liberties of the crown of England, was made in the time of king William the conqueror. For before that time the pope's writ did not run in England, his bulls of excommunication and provision came not thither; no citation, no appeals were made from thence to the court of Rome; our archbishops did not purchase their palls there, neither had the pope the investiture of any of our bishopricks. For it is to be observed, that as under the temporal monarchy of Rome, Britany was one of the last provinces that was won, and one of the first that was lost again: so under the spiritual monarchy of the pope of Rome, England was one of the last countries of Christendom that received his yoke, and was again one of the first that did reject and cast it off. And truly, as in this, so in divers other points, the course of this spiritual monarchy of the pope may be aptly compared with the course of the temporal monarchies of the world. For as the temporal monarchies were first raised by intrusion upon other princes and commonweals; so did this spiritual prince (as they now stile him) grow to his greatness by usurping upon other states and churches. As the temporal monarchies, following the course of the sun, did rise in the east, and settle in the west; so did the hierarchy or government of the church. Of the four temporal monarchies, the first two were in Asia, the latter two in Europe; but the Roman monarchy did surpass and suppress them all. So were there four great patriarchs, or ecclesiastical hierarchies, two in the east, and two in the west; but the Roman patriarch exalted himself, and usurped a supremacy above them all. And as the rising of the Roman empire was most opposed of Carthage in Africa, (emula Roma Carthago;) so the council of Carthage and the African bishops did first forbid appeals to Rome, and opposed the supremacy of the pope. And doth not Daniel's image, whose head was of gold, and legs and feet of iron and clay, represent this spiritual monarchy as well as the temporal; whereas the first bishops of Rome were golden priests, though they had but wooden chabices, and that the popes of later times have been for the most part worldly and earthly minded? And as the northern nations first revolted from the Roman monarchy, and at last brake it in pieces; have not the north and north-west nations first fallen away from the papacy; and are they not like in the end to bring it to ruin?

But to return to our purpose. The bishop of Rome before the first Norman conquest had no jurisdiction in the realm of England, neither in the time of the Britains, nor in the time of the Saxons. Eleutherius, the pope, within less than 200 years after Christ, writes to Lucius, the British king, and calls him God's vicar within his kingdom: which title he would not have given to that king, if himself, under pretence of being God's vicar-general on earth, had claimed jurisdiction over all Christian kingdoms.—Pelagius the monk of Bangor, about the year 400, being cited to Rome, refused to appear upon the pope's citation, affirming that Britain was neither within his diocese nor his province.—After that, about the year 600, Augustine the monk was sent by Gregory the great into England, to convert the Saxons to the Christian religion. The British bishops then remaining in Wales regarded not his commission nor his doctrine, as not owing any duty, nor having any dependency on the court of Rome; but still retained their ceremonies and traditions which they received from the east church, upon the first plantation of the faith in that island, being divers and contrary to those of the church of Rome, which Augustine did endeavour to impose upon them.—The like doth Beda write of the Irish priests and bishops. For in the year 660, he reporteth, that a convocation of the clergy being called by king Oswif, there rose a disputation between Colman, one of our Irish saints, then present in that synod, and Wilfrid a Saxon priest, touching the observation of Easter, wherein the British and Irish churches did then differ from the church of Rome. Colman, for the celebration of Easter used in Ireland, affirmed it was the same, 'quod beatus evangelista Johannes, discipulus specialiter à Domino dilectus, in omnibus quibus præerat ecclesiis celebrasse legitur.' On the other part Wilfrid alledged, that all the churches of Christendom did then celebrate Easter after the Roman manner, except the churches of the Britains and Picts, 'qui contra totum orbem (saith he) stulto labore pugnant.' Whereunto Colman replied, 'miror quare stultum laborem appellas, in quo tanti apostoli, qui super pectus Domini recumbere digni fuit, exempla sectantur. Numquid reverendissimum patrem nostrum Columbam et ejus successores, viros à Deo dilectos, divinis paginis contraria sapuisse aut egisse credendum est?' In this disputation or dialogue two things may be observed: first, that at this time the authority of the bishop of Rome was of no estimation in these islands, next, that the primitive churches of Britany and Ireland were instituted according to the form and discipline of the east churches, and not of the west, and planted by the disciples of John, and not of Peter. Thus much for the time of the Britains. For the Saxons, though king Ina gave the Peter-pence to the pope, partly as alms, and partly in recompence of a house erected in Rome for entertainment of English pilgrims; yet it is certain, that Alfred and Athelstane, Edgar and Edmund, Canutus and Edward the Confessor, and divers other kings of the Saxon race, did give all the bishopricks in England per annulum et baculum, without any other ceremony, as the emperor and French king and other Christian princes were wont to do. They made also several laws for the government of the church. Among others, St. Edward begins his laws with this protestation, that it is his princely charge, 'ut populum domini, et super omnia sanctam ecclesiam, regat et gubernet.' And king Edgar, in his oration to his English clergy, 'ego,' saith he, 'Constantini, vos Petri gladium habetis: jungamus dextras, et gladium gladio copulemus, ut ejiciantur extra castra leprosi, et purgetur sanctuarium Domini.' So as the kings of England with their own clergy did govern the church, and therein sought no aid of the court of Rome. And the truth is, that though the pope had then long hands, yet he did not extend them so far as England; because they were full of business nearer home in drawing the emperor and the French king under his yoke. But upon the conquest made by the Norman, he apprehended the first occasion to usurp upon the liberties of the crown of England. For the Conqueror came in with the pope's banner, and under it won the battle which got him the garland; and therefore the pope presumed he might boldly pluck some flowers from it, being partly gained by his countenance and blessing. Hereupon he sent two legates into England, which were admitted and received by the Conqueror. With them he called a synod of the clergy, and deposed old Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, because he had not purchased his pall in the court of Rome. He displaced many bishops and abbots, to place his Normans in their rooms. And amongst the rest it is to be noted, that the king having earnestly moved Wolstan bishop of Worcester, being then very aged, to give up his staff; his answer was, that he would give up his staff only to him of whom he first received the same. And so the old man went to St. Edward's tomb, and there offered up his staff and ring, with these words: 'Of thee, O holy Edward, I received my staff and my ring, and to thee I do now surrender the same again.' Which proves, that before the Norman conquest the king did invest his bishops per annulum et baculum, as I said before.

Thus we see, by the admission of the pope's legates, the first step or entry made into his usurped jurisdiction in England. Albeit, the king still retained the absolute power of investing bishops, and seemed only to use the advice and assistance of the legates in ecclesiastical matters; for that no decree passed or was put in execution without his royal assent thereunto. Besides, how far forth he submitted himself to the pope, it appeareth by a short epistle he wrote to Gregory 7, in this form. 'Excellentissimo sanctæ ecclesiæ pastori, Gregorio, gratiâ Dei Anglorum rex et dux Normannorum Willielmus salutem cum amicitia. Hubertus legatus tuus, religiose pater, ad me veniens ex tua parte, me admonuit, ut tibi et successoribus tuis fidelitatem facerem, et de pecunia, quam antecessores mei ad Romanam ecclesiam mittere solebant, melius cogitarem. Unum admisi, alterum non admisi. Fidelitatem facere nolui, nec volo; quia nec ego promisi, nec antecessores meos antecessoribus

'tuis id fecisse comperio. Pecunia, tribus fere annis, in Gallis me agente, negligenter collecta est. Nunc vero divinâ misericordiâ me in regnum meum reverso, quod collectum est per præfatum legatum mittetur; et quod reliquum est, per legatos Lanfranci archiepiscopi fidelis nostri, cum opportunum fuerit, transmittetur, &c.'

But in the time of his next successor, king William Rufus, they attempted to pass one degree farther, that is, to draw appeals to the court of Rome. For Anselme being made archbishop of Canterbury, and being at some difference with the king, besought his leave to go to Rome, under pretence of fetching his pall. The king, knowing he would appeal to the pope, denied him leave to go, and withal told him that none of his bishops ought to be subject to the pope, but the pope himself ought to be subject to the emperor; and that the king of England had the same absolute liberties in his dominions as the emperor had in the empire; and that it was an ancient custom and law in England, used time out of mind before the Conquest, that none might appeal to the pope without the king's leave; and that he that breaketh this law or custom doth violate the crown and dignity royal, and he that violates my crown, saith he, is mine enemy, and a traitor. 'How answer you this?' quoth the king. 'Christ himself answers you,' saith the archbishop, 'tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram, &c.' wherewith the king was nothing satisfied. And thereupon Anselme departing out of the realm without licence, the king seized his temporalities, and became so exasperate and implacable towards the bishop, as he kept him in perpetual exile during his reign; albeit great intercession were made for his return, as well by the pope as the king of France.

In the time of the next king, Hen. 1, though he were a learned and a prudent prince, yet they sought to gain a farther point upon him, and to pluck a flower from his crown of greater value, namely, the patronage and donation of bishopricks and all other benefices ecclesiastical. For Anselme being revoked and re-established in the see of Canterbury, the bishopricks of Salisbury and Hereford fell void, which the king bestowed on two of his chaplains. But Anselme their metropolitan did refuse to consecrate them, so as the archbishop of York was fain to perform that office, who with the chief of the English clergy stood with the king, and withstood Anselme. Hereupon the king requires him to do his homage; the bishop denies it. The king demands of him whether the patronage and investiture of all bishopricks were not his rightful inheritance. The bishop said it was not his right; because pope Urban had lately made a decree, that no lay person should give any ecclesiastical benefice. [Histor. Journalensis M. S. in Archiv. Rob. Cotton, Eq. Aur.] This was the first question, that ever was made, touching the king of England's right of patronage and donation of bishopricks within his dominions. This new question caused many messages and embassages to Rome. At last the king writes plainly to the pope, 'notum habeat sanctitas vestra, quod me vivente, Deo auxiliante, dignitates et usus regni nostri non minuentur; et si ego, quod absit, in tanta me directione ponerem, magnates mei, imo totius Angliæ populus, id nullo modo pateretur.' Besides, William de Warrenast, the king's procurator in the court of Rome, told the pope, that the king would rather lose his kingdom than he would lose the donation of bishopricks. The pope answered, 'Know you precisely, sir, I speak it before God, that for the redemption of my head I would not suffer him to enjoy it.'

After this Anselme being received into the king's favour, in a synod of the English clergy holden at London in the year 1107, a decree was made, 'cui annuit rex Henricus,' saith Matth. Paris, 'that from thenceforth, 'nunquam per donationem baculi pastoralis vel annuli quisquam de episcopatu vel abbatia per regem, vel quamlibet laicam manum, investiretur in Angliam.' In recompence whereof the pope yielded this favour to the king, that thenceforth no legate should be sent from the pope's side into England, unless the king required it; and that the archbishop of Canterbury for the time being should be ever legatus natus; and Anselme, for the honour of his see, obtained, that the archbishop of Canterbury should in all general councils sit at the pope's foot, 'tanquam alterius orbis papa.' Notwithstanding, as the succeeding popes kept not their promise touching the sending of legates, so this self-same king, after the death of Anselme, broke the decree touching the investiture of the bishops. For he gave the archbishoprick of Canterbury to Rodolph bishop of London, saith Matth. Paris, 'et illum per annulum et pastorem baculum investivit;' as before he had invested Willielmum Gifford in the bishoprick of Winchester, 'contra novi concilii statuta,' as the same author reporteth.

The times of the next succeeding king, Stephen were full of civil dissensions, which made the land well-nigh waste, so as St. Peter's successor could not take any fish in such troubled waters. Yet during this king's reign they won that point of jurisdiction, which they attempted to get, but failed thereof, in the time of king William Rufus; namely, that appeals might be made to the court of Rome. For in a synod at London summoned by Henry bishop of Winchester, the pope's legate, it was decreed that appeals should be made from provincial councils to the pope. Before that time 'appellationes in usu non erant,' saith a monk of that time, 'donec Henricus Winton. episcopus malo suo, dum legatus esset, crudeliter intravit.' Thus did the pope usurp three main points of jurisdiction upon three several kings after the Conquest, for of William Rufus he could win nothing, namely, upon the Conqueror, the sending of legates or commissioners to hear and determine ecclesiastical causes; upon Hen. 1. the donation and investitures of bishopricks and other benefices; upon king Stephen, the appeals to the court of Rome.

Now are we come to king Henry 2, in whose time they made a farther encroachment upon the crown, whereby they endeavoured to make him but half a king, and to take away half his subjects, by exempting all clerks from secular power. Hereupon rose that long and great contention between Henry 2, and Thomas Becket, which on Becket's behalf may be rightly termed rebellion and treason; the just cause and ground whereof was the same that made the late difference between the pope and the Venetians. For a priest had committed a foul murder; and being thereof indicted and convicted, prayed the benefit of his clergy; which being allowed unto him, he was delivered to the bishop of Salisbury, being his ordinary, to make his purgation; which the murderer failing to do should by the law have been degraded, and delivered back to the secular power. But the bishop, contemning the law of the land, to enlarge the liberties of the church, sent his prisoner to Thomas Becket then archbishop of Canterbury, who shifted him into an abbey, and so rescued him from the capital punishment he had justly deserved.

This gap of impunity being once opened, the clergy grew so outrageous, as the king was informed of a hundred murders committed by clerks, and yet not one of them executed for the same; for that the archbishop had protected them all after the same manner. For this the king was justly incensed against the archbishop, who justified his doing herein. Whereupon a common council as well of the bishops as of the nobility was called, wherein they did revive and re-establish the ancient laws and customs of the kingdom for the government of the clergy, and ordering of causes ecclesiastical, whereof these were the principal heads or articles:

1. That no bishop nor clerk should depart the realm without the king's licence; and that such as obtained licence should give securities, that they should procure no hurt or damage to the king or realm during their absence in foreign parts.—2. That all bishopricks and abbeys being void should remain in the king's hands as his own demesnes, until he had chosen and appointed a prelate thereunto; and that every such prelate should do his homage to the king before he were admitted into the place.—3. That appeals should be made in causes ecclesiastical in this manner; from the archdeacon to the ordinary, from the ordinary to the metropolitan, from the metropolitan to the king, and no farther.—4. That Peter-pence should be paid no more to the pope, but to the king.—5. That if any clerk should commit felony, he should be hanged; if treason, he should be drawn and quartered.—6. That it should be adjudged high-treason to bring in bulls of excommunication, whereby the realm should be cursed.—7. That no decree should be brought from the pope to be executed in England, upon pain of imprisonment and confiscation of goods.

To these and other Constitutions of the like nature made at Claringdon, all the rest of the bishops and great men did subscribe, and bound themselves by oath to observe the same absolutely. Only the archbishop would not subscribe, and swear, but with a saving, 'salvo suo ordine et honore sanctæ ecclesiæ.' Yet at last he was content to make the like absolute subscription and oath as the rest had done; but presently he repented, and to shew his repentance suspended himself from celebrating mass, till he had received absolution from the pope. Then he began to maintain and justify the exemption of clerks again; whereas the king's displeasure was kindled anew; and then the archbishop once again promised absolute obedience to the king's laws. (See the fickleness and mutability of your constant martyr.) The king, to bind fast this slippery Proteus, called a parliament of the bishops and barons; and sending for the roll of those laws, required all the bishops to set their seals thereunto. They all assented but the archbishop, who protested he would not set his seal, nor give allowance to those laws. The king, being highly offended with his rebellious demeanour, required the barons in parliament to give judgment of him, who being his subject, would not be ruled by his laws; 'cito facite mihi justitiam de illo, qui homo meus ligens est, et stare juri in curia mea recusati.' Whereupon the barons proceeded against him, and being ready to condemn him; 'I prohibit you,' quoth the archbishop, 'in the name of Almighty God to proceed against me; for I have appealed to the pope: and so departed in contempt of that high court, 'omnibus clamantibus,' saith Hoveden, 'quo progredieris proditor? expecta et audi judicium tuum.' After this he lurked secretly near the sea-shore; and changing his apparel and name (like a jesuit of these times,) he took shipping with a purpose to fly to Rome. But his passage being hindered by contrary winds, he was summoned to a parliament at Northampton, where he made default wilfully; for which contempt, his temporalities were seized, and his body being attached, he was charged with so great an account to the king, as that he was found in arrear 30,000 marks, and committed to prison; whence he found means to escape shortly after, and to pass out of the realm to Rome. He was no sooner gone, but the king sends writs to all the sheriffs in England to attach the bodies of all such as made any appeals to the court of Rome. Hereupon many messages and letters passing to and fro, all the suffragans of Canterbury join in a letter to the pope, wherein they condemn the fugitive archbishop, and justify the king's proceedings. Upon this the pope sends two legates to the king, being then in Normandy, to mediate for the archbishop. They, with the mediation of the French king, prevailed so far with king Henry, as that he was pleased to accept his submission once again, and promised the king of France, that if he would be obedient to his laws, he should enjoy as ample liberties as any archbishop of Canterbury ever had; and so sent him into England with recommendation unto the young king his son, then lately crowned; who, hearing of his coming, commanded him to forbear to come to his presence, until he had absolved the archbishop of York and others, whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at his coronation. The archbishop returned answer, that they had done him wrong in usurping his office; yet if they would take a solemn oath to become obedient to the pope's commandment in all things concerning the church, he would absolve them. The bishops, understanding this, protested they would never take that oath, unless the king willed them so to do. King Henry the father, being hereof advertised into France, did rise into great passion and choler, and in the hearing of his servants uttered words to this effect; 'Will no man revenge me of mine enemies?' Whereupon the four gentlemen named in the stories of that time passed into England, and first moving the archbishop to absolve the bishops whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at the young king's coronation, and receiving a peremptory answer of denial from the archbishop, they laid violent hands upon him, and slew him; for which the king was fain not only to suffer corporal penance, but in token of his humiliation to kiss the knee of the pope's legate. And this is the abridgment of Becket's troubles, or rather treasons, for which he was celebrated for so famous a martyr.—And thus you see by what degrees the court of Rome did within the space of 100 and odd years usurp upon the crown of England four points of jurisdiction, viz. First, sending out of legates into England. Secondly, drawing of appeals to the court of Rome. Thirdly, donation of bishopricks and other ecclesiastical benefices. And fourthly, exemption of clerks from the secular power. And you see withal how our kings and parliaments have from time to time opposed and withstood this unjust usurpation.

Now then the bishop of Rome having claimed and well nigh recovered full and sole jurisdiction in all causes ecclesiastical, and over all persons ecclesiastical, with power to dispose of all ecclesiastical benefices in England, whereby he had upon the matter made an absolute conquest of more than half the kingdom, (for every one that could read the psalm of Miserere was a clerk, and the clergy possessed the moiety of all temporal possessions) there remained now nothing to make him owner and proprietor of all, but to get a surrender of the crown, and to make the king his farmer, and the people his villains, which he fully accomplished and brought to pass in the times of king John and of Henry 3.

The quarrel between the pope and king John, which wrested the sceptre out of his hand, and in the end brake his heart, began about the election of the archbishop of Canterbury. I call it election, and not donation or investiture; for the manner of investing of bishops by the staff and ring after the time of king Hen. 1. was not any more used, but by the king's licence they were canonically elected, and being elected, the king gave his royal assent to their election, and by restitution of their temporalities did fully invest them. And though this course of election began to be in use in the time of Rich. 1. and Hen. 2. yet I find it not confirmed by any constitution or charter before the time of king John, who by his charter dated the 15th of January, in the 16th year of his reign, granted this privilege to the church of England in these words, viz. 'Quod qualiscunque consuetudo temporibus prædecessorum nostrorum hactenus in ecclesia Anglicana fuerit observata, et quicquid juris nobis hactenus vindicaverimus, de cætero in universis et singulis ecclesiis et monasteriis, cathedralibus et conventualibus, totius regni Angliæ, liberæ sint in perpetuum electiones quorumcunque prælatorum, majorum et minorum: salvâ nobis et hæredibus nostris custodiâ ecclesiarum et monasteriorum vacantium quæ ad nos pertinent. Promittimus etiam, quod nec impediemus nec impediri permittemus per ministros nostros, nec procurabimus, quin in universis et singulis monasteriis et ecclesiis, postquam vacuerint prælaturæ, quemcunque voluerint libere sibi præficiant electores pastorum, petiti tamen à nobis prius et hæredibus nostris licentiâ eligendi, quam non denegabimus nec differemus. Et similiter, post celebratam electionem, noster requiratur assensus, quem non denegabimus, nisi adversus eandem rationale proposuerimus, et legitime probaverimus propter quod non debemus consentire, &c.'

But to return to the cause of his great quarrel with the pope. The see of Canterbury being void, the monks of Canterbury suddenly and secretly without the king's license elected one Reignold their sub-prior to be archbishop, who immediately posted away to be confirmed by the pope. But when he came there, the pope rejected him, because he came not recommended from the king. Hereupon the monks made suit to the king to nominate some fit person to whose election they might proceed. The king commends John Gray bishop of Norwich, his principal counsellor, who was afterwards lord justice of this kingdom, who with a full consent was elected by them, and afterwards admitted and fully invested by the king. These two elections bred such a controversy as none might determine but the pope, who gave a short rule in the case; for he pronounced both elections void, and caused some of the monks of Canterbury, who were then present in the court of Rome, to proceed to the election of Stephen Langton, lately made cardinal at the motion and suit of the French king: who being so elected was forthwith confirmed and consecrated by the pope, and recommended to the king of England with a flattering letter, and a present of four rings set with precious stones, which were of great value and estimation in those days. Howbeit, the king more esteeming this jewel of the crown, namely, the patronage of bishopricks, returned a round and kingly Answer to the pope, that inconsiderately and rashly he had cussed and made void the election of the bishop of Norwich, and had caused one Langton, a man to him unknown, and bred up and nourished amongst his mortal enemies, to be consecrated archbishop, without any due form of election, and without his royal assent, which was most of all requisite by the antient laws and customs of his realm. That he marvelled much, that the pope himself and the whole court of Rome did not consider what a precious account they ought to make of the king of England's friendship, in regard that his one kingdom did yield them more profit and revenue than all the other countries on this side the Alps. To conclude, he would maintain the liberties of his crown to the death, he would restrain all his subjects from going to Rome. And since the archbishops, bishops and other prelates within his dominions, were as learned and religious as any other in Christendom, his subjects should be judged by them in ecclesiastical matters, and should not need to run out of their own country to beg justice at the hands of strangers.

But what followed upon this? The pope, after a sharp reply, sendeth forth a bull of malediction against the king, and of interdiction against the realm, whereby all the churches in England were shut up, the priests and religious persons were forbidden to use any liturgies or divine service, to marry, to bury, or to perform any Christian duty among the people. This put the king into such a rage, that he on the other part seized the temporalities of all bishops and abbots, and confiscated the goods of all the clergy. Then doth the pope by a solemn sentence at Rome depose the king, and by a bull sent into England dischargeth his subjects of their allegiance, and by a legate sent to the king of France gave the kingdom of England to him and his successors for ever.

These things brought such confusion and misery to all estates and degrees of people in England, as the king became odious to all his subjects, as well to the laity as to the clergy. For as the bishops and religious people cursed him abroad; so the barons took arms against him at home, till with much bloodshed they forced him, by granting the Great Charter, to restore king Edward's laws, containing the ancient liberties of the subjects of England. The pope being a spectator of this tragedy, and seeing the king in so weak and desperate estate, sent a legate to comfort him, and to make a reasonable motion unto him; to wit, that he should surrender and give up his crown and kingdom to the pope, which should be re-granted unto him again to hold in fee-farm and vassalage of the church of Rome: and that thereupon the pope would bless him and his realm again, and curse his rebels and enemies in such sort, as he should be better established in his kingdom then he was before. In a word, this motion was presently embraced by that miserable king, so as with his own hands he gave up the crown to the pope's legate, and by an instrument or charter sealed with a bull or seal of gold, he granted to God and the church of Rome, the apostles Peter and Paul, and to pope Innocent the third and his successors, the whole kingdom of England, and the whole kingdom of Ireland; and took back an estate thereof by an instrument sealed with lead, yielding yearly to the church of Rome over and above the Peter-pence 1,000 marks sterling, viz. 700 marks for England, and 300 marks for Ireland, with a flattering saving of all his liberties and royalties. The pope had no sooner gotten this conveyance, though it were void in law, but he excommunicateth the barons, and repeals the Great Charter, affirming that it contained liberties too great for his subjects; calls the king his vassal, and these kingdoms St. Peter's patrimony; grants a general bull of provision for the bestowing of all ecclesiastical benefices, and takes upon him to be absolute and immediate lord of all. And thus, under colour of exercising jurisdiction within these kingdoms, the pope, by degrees, got the very kingdoms themselves. And so would he do at this day, if the king would give way to his jurisdiction.

But what use did the pope make of this grant and surrender of the crown unto him? What did he gain by it, if our kings retained the profits of their kingdoms to their own use? Indeed we do not find, that the fee-farm of a thousand marks was ever paid, but that it is all run in arrear till this present day. For the truth is, the court of Rome did scorn to accept so poor a revenue as a thousand marks per annum out of two kingdoms. But after the death of king John, during all the reign of Hen. 3, his son, the pope did not claim a seigniory or a rent out of England and Ireland, but did endeavour to convert all the profits of both lands to his own use, as if he had been seized of all in demesne. For who-soever will read Matt. Paris his story of the time of king Hen. 3, will say these things spoken of before were but the beginnings of evils. For the exactions and oppressions of the court of Rome were so continual and intolerable, as that poor monk, who lived in those times, though otherwise he adored the pope, doth call England Balaam's ass laden, beaten, and enforced to speak; doth call the court of Rome Clarybdis and Barathrum avaritiae, the pope's collectors harpys, and the pope himself a stepfather, and the church of Rome a stepmother. He sheweth, that two third parts of the land being then in the hands of church-men, the entire profits thereof were exported to enrich the pope and the court of Rome: which was done for the most part by these two ways and means. First, by conferring the best ecclesiastical benefices upon Italians, and other strangers resident in that court, whose farmers and factors in England took the profits, turned them into money, and returned the money to Rome. Secondly, by imposing continual taxes and tallages, worse then Irish cuttings, being sometimes the tenth, sometimes the fifteenth, sometimes the third, sometimes the moiety of all the goods both of the clergy and laity, under colour of maintaining the pope's holy wars against the emperor and the Greek church, who were then said to be in rebellion against their lady and mistress the church of Rome. Besides, for the speedy levying and safe return of these moneys, the pope had his Lombards and other Italian bankers and usurers resident in London and other parts of the realm, who offered to lend and disburse the moneys taxed, and return the same by exchange to Rome, taking such penal bonds, the form whereof is set down by Matt. Paris, and such excessive usury, as the poor religious houses were fain to sell their chalices and copes, and the rest of the clergy and laity had their backs bowed and their estates broken under the burthen. Besides, the pope took for perquisites and casualties the goods of all clerks that died intestate, the goods of all usurers, and all goods given to charitable uses. Moreover he had a swarm of friars, the first corrupters of religion in England, who perswaded the nobility and gentry to put on the sign of the cross, and to vow themselves to the holy wars; which they had no sooner done, but they were again perswaded to receive dispensations of their vows, and to give money for the same to the church of Rome. I omit divers other policies then used by the pope's collectors to exhaust the wealth of the realm, which they affirmed they might take with as good a conscience as the Hebrews took the jewels of the Egyptians. Briefly, whereas the king had scarce means to maintain his royal family, they received out of England 70,000*l.* sterling at least yearly, which amounteth to 210,000*l.* sterling of the monies current at this day. Besides, they exported 6,000 marks out of Ireland at one time, which the emperor Frederick intercepted. Lastly, the king himself was so much dejected, as at a royal feast he placed the pope's legate in his own chair of estate, himself sitting on his right hand, and the bishop of York on his left, 'non sine multorum obliquantibus oculis,' saith Matt. Paris.

Thus we see the effect of the pope's pretended jurisdiction within the dominions of the king of England. We see to what calamity and servitude it then reduced both the prince and people. Was it not therefore high time to meet and oppose those inconveniences? Assuredly if king Edward 1, who was the son and heir of Hen. 3, had inherited the weakness of his father, and had not resisted this usurpation and insolency of the court of Rome, the pope had been proprietor of both these islands, and there had been no king of England at this day.

'dex Anglicæ libertatis,' the Moses that delivered his people from slavery and oppression: and as he was a brave and victorious prince, so was he the best pater patriæ that ever reigned in England since the Norman Conquest, till the coronation of our gracious sovereign. At the time of the death of his father he was absent in the war of the holy land, being a principal commander of the Christian army there, so as he returned not before the second year of his reign. But he was no sooner returned and crowned, but the first work he did was to shake off the yoke of the bishop of Rome. For the pope having then summoned a general council, before he would license his bishops to repair to it, he took of them a solemn oath, that they should not receive the pope's blessing. Again, the pope forbids the king to war against Scotland; the king regards not his prohibition: He demands the first-fruits of ecclesiastical livings; the king forbids the payment thereof unto him. The pope sendeth forth a general bull prohibiting the clergy to pay subsidies or tributes to temporal princes: a tenth was granted to the king in parliament, the clergy refused to pay it: the king seizeth their temporalities for their contempt, and got payment notwithstanding the pope's bull. After this he made the statute of Mortmain, whereby he brake the pope's chief net, which within an age or two more would have drawn to the church all the temporal possessions of the kingdom, &c. Again, one of the king's subjects brought a bull of excommunication against another: the king commandeth he should be executed as a traitor, according to the ancient law. But because that law had not of long time been put in execution, the chancellor and treasurer kneeled before the king and obtained grace for him, so as he was onely banished out of the realm. And as he judged it treason to bring in bulls of excommunication; so he held it a high contempt against the crown to bring in bulls of provision or briefs of citation; and accordingly the law was so declared in parliament 25 Ed. 1, which was the first statute made against Provisors: the execution of which law, during the life of king Ed. 1, did well-nigh abolish the usurped jurisdiction of the court of Rome, and did revive and restore again the ancient and absolute sovereignty of the king and crown of England.

His successor, king Edward 2, being but a weak prince, the pope attempted to usurp upon him again: but the peers and people withstood his usurpation. And when that unhappy king was to be deposed, amongst many articles framed against him by his enemies, this was one of the most heinous, that he had given allowance to the pope's bulls.

Again, during the minority of king Ed. 3. and after that in the heat of the wars in France, the pope sent many briefs and bulls into England; and at last presumed so far, as that he gave an Italian the title of a cardinal in England, and withal by his bull gave him power to bestow all ecclesiastical promotions as they should fall void from time to time. This moved the king and the nobility to write to the pope to this effect. 'We and our ancestors have richly endowed the church of England, and have founded abbeys and other religious houses for the jurisdiction of our people, for maintenance of hospitality, and for the advancement of our countrymen and kinsmen. Now you provide and place strangers in our benefices, that come not to keep residence thereupon; and if they come, understand not our language; and some of them are subjects to our mortal enemies; by reason whereof our people are not instructed, hospitality is not kept, our scholars are unpreferred, and the treasure of the realm is exported.' The pope returneth answer, that the emperor had lately submitted himself to the church of Rome in all points, and was become the pope's great friend; and in menacing manner advised the king of England to do the like. The king replies, that if the emperor and French king both should take his part, he was ready to give battle to both in defence of the liberties of his crown. Hereupon the several statutes against Provisors before recited were put in execution so severely, as the king and his subjects enjoyed their right of patronage clearly: and their exemption of clerks took no place at all; for that the abbot of Waltham and bishop of Winchester were both attained of high contempts, and the bishop of Ely of a capital offence, as appeareth in the records of this king's reign. Yet during the nonage of Rich. 2. they began once again to encroach upon the crown, by sending legates and bulls and briefs into England, whereof the people were so sensible and impatient, as that at their special prayer, this law of 16 Rich. 2. (whereupon our indictment is framed) was enacted, being more sharp and penal than all the former statutes against provisors. And yet against this king, as against Ed. 2. it was objected at the time of his deprivation, that he had allowed the pope's bulls, to the entralling of the crown.

After this in the weak time of king Hen. 6. they made one attempt more to revive their usurped jurisdiction by this policy. The commons had denied the king a subsidy when he stood in great want of moneys. The archbishop of Canterbury and the rest of the bishops offered the king a large supply of his wants, if he would consent that all the laws against provisors, and especially this law of 16 Rich. 2. might be repealed. But Humphry duke of Gloucester, who had lately before cast the pope's bull into the fire, did likewise cause this motion to be rejected. So as by special providence these laws have stood in force even till this day in both these kingdoms.

The EVIDENCE against LALOR.

Then the Attorney General descended to the Evidence, whereby he proved fully all the parts of the Indictment. First, it was proved by Lalor's own confession, upon several examinations taken before the lord deputy and lord chancellor, and others, that he had accepted the office and title of vicar general in the dioceses of Dublin, Kildare, and Fernes, by virtue of the pope's bull. Secondly, it appeared by the copies of sundry letters found among his papers at his apprehension, that he stiled himself the pope's vicar, in this form, 'Robertus Dublinien. et Kildaren. et Fernen. diocæs. vicarius apostolicus.' Thirdly, there were produced the copies of divers acts and instruments, written for the most part with Lalor's own hand, some of institutions of popish priests to benefices, others of dispensations with marriage within the degrees, others of divorces, others of dispensations for non-payment of tithes. Whereby it was manifestly proved that he did execute the pope's bull, in usurping and exercising episcopal jurisdiction, as vicar general of the see apostolick, within the dioceses before named.

To this evidence he made a three-fold answer. First, that he was no suitor for the office of vicar general, but it was imposed on him, and he accepted virtute obedientie, only to obey his superiors. Next, that he did exercise the office of vicar general in foro conscientie tantum, and not in foro judicii. And lastly, that those copies of institutions, dispensations and divorces, were many of them written with his man's hand, as precedents of such acts and instruments, without his privity or direction. Hereupon sir James Ley, chief justice, told him, that he could not well say, that he accepted that unlawful office virtute obedientie, for there was no virtue in that obedience; that he owed an obedience to the law and to the king, who is the true superior and sovereign over all his subjects, and hath no peer within his dominions; and that the superiors whom he meant and intended were but usurpers upon the king's jurisdiction, and therefore this excuse did aggravate his contempt, in that it appeared he had vowed obedience to those who were apparent enemies to the king and his crown. And though it were manifest that he exercised jurisdiction in foro judicii, (for every institution is a judgment, and so is every sentence of divorce) yet were his offence nothing diminished if he had executed his office of vicar general in foro conscientie tantum; for the court of man's conscience is the highest tribunal, and wherein the power of the keys is exercised in the highest degree.

Hereunto the Attorney General took occasion to add thus much, that Lalor had committed these high offences, not only against the law, but against his own conscience, and that he was already condemned in foro conscientie. For that he upon his second examination had voluntarily acknowledged himself not to be a lawful vicar general, and that he thought in his conscience he could not lawfully take upon him the said office. He hath also acknowledged our sovereign lord king James to be his lawful chief and supreme governor, in all causes, as well ecclesiasticall as civil; and that he is in conscience bound to obey him in all the said causes, &c. as it is contained in his Acknowledgment or Confession before set down; which being shewed forth by the Attorney General, the court caused it to be publickly read; and thereupon demanded of Lalor, if that were not his free and voluntary Confession signed with his own hand, and confirmed by his oath before the lord deputy and council. He was not a little abashed at the publishing of this acknowledgment and confession in the hearing of so many principal gentlemen, to whom he had preached a contrary doctrine; therefore, said he, the shewing forth of this confession is altogether impertinent and besides the matter. Howsoever, he could not deny but that he made it, and signed it, and swore it, as it was testified by the lord deputy and the rest.

Then was it demanded of him, whether since the making of this confession he had not protested to divers of his friends, that he had not acknowledged the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical causes. His answer was, that indeed he had said to some of his friends who visited him in the castle of Dublin, that he had not confessed or acknowledged that the king was his supreme governor in spiritual causes, for that the truth is, in the confession there is no mention made of spiritual causes, but of ecclesiastical.

This is a subtile evasion indeed, said the attorney-general; I pray you what difference do you make between ecclesiastical causes and spiritual causes? This question, said Lalor, is sudden and unexpected at this time, and therefore you shall do well to take another day to dispute this point. Nay, said the attorney-general, we can never speak of it in a better time or fitter place; and therefore, though you, that bear so reverend a title, and hold the reputation of so great a clerk, require a farther time, yet shall you hear that we laymen that serve his majesty, and by the duty of our places are to maintain the jurisdiction of the crown, are never so unprovided, but that we can say somewhat touching the nature and difference of these causes.

First then, let us see when this distinction of ecclesiastical or spiritual causes from civil and temporal causes did first begin in point of jurisdiction. Assuredly, for the space of three hundred years after Christ, this distinction was not known or heard of in the Christian world. For the causes of testaments, of matrimony, of bastardy and adultery, and the rest which are called ecclesiastical or spiritual causes, were merely civil, and determined by the rules of the civil law, and subject onely to the jurisdiction of the civil magistrates, as all civilians will testify with me.

But after that the emperors had received the Christian faith out of a zeal and desire they had to grace and honour the learned and godly bishops of that time, they were pleased to single out certain special causes wherein they granted jurisdiction unto the bishops; namely, in causes of tithes, because they were paid to men of the church; in causes of matrimony, because marriages were for the most part solemnized in the church; in causes testamentary, because testaments were many times made in extremis, when church-men were present, giving spiritual comfort to the testator, and therefore they were thought the fittest persons to take the probates of such testaments. Howbeit these bishops did not proceed in these causes according to the canons and decrees of the church, (for the canon law was not then hatched or dreamed of) but according to the rules of the imperial law, as the civil magistrate did proceed in other causes; neither did the emperors, in giving this jurisdiction unto them, give away their own supreme and absolute power, to correct and punish these judges as well as others, if they performed not their several duties. This then is most certain, that the primitive jurisdiction in all these causes was in the civil magistrate, and so in right it remains at this day; and though it be derived from him, it remaineth in him as in the fountain. For every Christian monarch (as well as the godly kings of Juda) is custos utriusque tabulae; and consequently hath power to punish not only treason, murder, theft, and all manner of force and fraud, but incest, adultery, usury, perjury, simony, sorcery, idolatry, blasphemy. Neither are these causes in respect of their own quality and nature to be distinguished one from another by the names of spiritual or temporal: for why is adultery a spiritual cause, rather than murder, when they are both offences alike against the second table; or idolatry rather than perjury, being both offences likewise against the first table? And indeed if we consider the natures of these causes, it will seem somewhat absurd, that they are distinguished by the name of spiritual and temporal; for, to speak properly, that which is opposed to spiritual should be termed carnal; and that which is opposed to temporal should be called eternal. And therefore if things were called by their proper names, adultery should not be called a spiritual offence, but a carnal. But shall I express plainly and briefly why these causes were first denominated; some spiritual or ecclesiastical, and others temporal and civil?

Truly, they were so called, not from the nature of the causes, as I said before, but from the quality of the persons whom the prince had made judges in those causes. The clergy did study spiritual things, and did profess to live secundum spiritum, and were called spiritual men; and therefore they called the causes wherein princes had given them jurisdiction, spiritual causes, after their own name and quality. But because the lay-magistrates were said to intend the things of this world, which are temporal and transitory, the clergy called them secular or temporal men, and the causes wherein they were judges temporal causes. This distinction began first in the court of Rome, where the clergy having by this jurisdiction gotten great wealth, their wealth begot pride, their pride begot ingratitude towards princes, who first gave them their jurisdiction; and then, according to the nature of all ungrateful persons, they went about to extinguish the memory of the benefit. For whereas their jurisdiction was first derived from Cæsar, in the execution whereof they were Cæsar's judges, so as both their courts and causes ought still to have born Cæsar's image and superscription, as belonging unto Cæsar; they blotted Cæsar's name out of the stile of their courts, and called them courts Christian, as if the courts holden by other magistrates had been in comparison but courts of Ethnicks; and the causes which in their nature were merely civil, they called spiritual and ecclesiastical. So as if the emperor should challenge his courts and causes again, and say, 'reddite Cæsari quæ sunt Cæsaris,' they would all cry out on the contrary part, and say, 'date Deo quæ sunt Dei,' our courts bear the name and title of Christ, the superscription of Cæsar is quite worn out, and not to be found upon them. And this point of their policy is worth the observing, that when they found their jurisdiction in matrimonial causes to be the most sweet and gainful of all other, (for of matrimony they made matter of money indeed) to the end that Cæsar might never resume so rich a perquisite of their spiritual jurisdiction, they reduced matrimony into the number of the seven sacraments: after which time it had been sacrilege, if the civil magistrate had intermeddled with the least matter that had relation to matrimony, or any dependency thereupon. So then it appeareth, that all causes, whereof ecclesiastical or spiritual persons have cognizance or jurisdiction by the grants or permission of princes, are called ecclesiastical or spiritual causes. And as all their courts are called spiritual courts, so all causes determinable in those courts are called spiritual causes. And therefore where M. Lalor hath acknowledged the king's majesty to be supreme goverour in all ecclesiastical causes, he hath therein acknowledged the king's supremacy in all spiritual causes; wherein he hath but rendered to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, and hath given unto his majesty no more than all the bishops of England have yielded to his predecessors, not only in this latter age, but also in former times both before and since the conquest, as hath been before at large expressed.

Here the day being far spent, the court demanded of the prisoner if he had any more to say for himself. His answer was, that he did willingly renounce his office of vicar-general, and did humbly crave his majesty's grace and pardon. And to that end, he desired the court to move the lord-deputy to be favourable unto him. Then the jury departed from the bar, and returning within half an hour, found the prisoner Guilty of the contempts whereof he was indicted. Whereupon the solicitor-general moved the court to proceed to judgment. And sir Dominick Sarsfield, knight, one of the justices of his majesty's chief place, gave judgment according to the form of the statute whereupon the indictment was framed.

subject of other cases besides the preceding one of Præmunire. In particular they are historically discussed in lord Coke's Case of the king's Ecclesiastical Law, in the 5th Report. The publication of this latter case, with the active zeal of lord Coke as attorney-general, in the prosecution of the conspirators in the Gunpowder-plot, gave occasion to a volume of animadversions by the famous Jesuit father Parsons, which was published in 1606, by the title of an Answer to lord Coke's 5th Report, by a Catholick divine. But the asperity with which lord Coke was treated, did not provoke a reply. All that it drew from him was a short notice of the work in the preface to his 6th report, in which he represents the author as a calumniator, and as such disdained to answer him. But the controversy was afterwards continued by Mr. Prynne, who asserted the cause of the crown against the see of Rome, in a work of prodigious extent in the plan, for though the part published consists of three large volumes, of more than 1000 pages each, yet it reaches only to the end of the reign of Edward the first. The work we allude to, is Mr. Prynne's Chronological Vindication of the King's Supreme Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, the publication of which commenced four or five years after the Restoration. The first volume extends to the Conquest. The second, which was published first, concludes with the reign of Henry the third. The third, being in part a supplement to the second, is occupied with the reigns of Henry the third, John, and our first Edward. When the author had advanced thus far, death interposed, and prevented the completion of the undertaking. What he lived to publish is become so extremely scarce, that 20 guineas are the common price of a compleat copy. The cause is the small remnant of copies of the first volume, most of them having been burnt in the great fire of London.—Such as are curious to see an account of the Jesuit Parsons, may consult Cambden's Annals of Elizabeth. ### 85. The Case of the POSTNATI, or of the UNION of the Realm of Scotland with England; *Triu. 6 JAMES I. A. D. 1608.**

[" From the meeting of the crowns of England and Scotland in the person of the first James, grew one of the most important questions of state, which ever engaged the attention of either country. It was, whether the POSTNATI, or those born in Scotland after the accession of James to the crown of England, were in the latter country to be deemed aliens or natives. As to the Auto-nati, all seem to have agreed, that they remained aliens. But there was a great difference of opinion about the condition of the Postnati. The king, anxious for every thing which tended to consolidate the island into one kingdom, was eager to have it declared as law, that the Union of the crowns effected a mutual naturalization of the Postnati in the two countries. His wishes were soon made known by the Proclamation, in which he assumed the stile of King of Great Britain, with an exception however in favor of legal process, instruments, and assurances; and words were introduced, importing, that his succession to the crown of England had made a great change in the law of Naturalization. Rym. Fœd. v. 16. p. 603. 2 Bac. last 4to. ed. 144. The Commissioners, appointed by the respective Parliaments of the two countries to treat for an Union of government and laws, followed the king in this language; for they resolved to propound to both parliaments a declaration of the law to that effect. But when the proposition was made, the English house of commons were found averse to it, notwithstanding the countenance given by the lords, and an opinion delivered to them by ten out of eleven judges. It was therefore determined to settle the point out of parliament in the regular way, by resorting to the English courts of justice. For this purpose, two suits were instituted in the name of Robert Calvin, a Postnatus of Scotland and an infant; one in the King's-bench for the freehold of some land; and the other in Chancery for detainer of writings concerning the title to the freehold of the same estate: and in both it was pleaded by the defendants in abatement, that the plaintiff was an alien born in Scotland at a time which by the pleading appeared to be since the king's accession to the crown of England. A demurrer to this plea necessarily brought forward the intended question about the Postnati; for if Calvin was an alien, he could not maintain either suit, aliens being incapable to sue for the freehold of land. These Causes were adjourned into the Exchequer-Chamber, in order to have the solemn opinion of all the judges; and there the business ended with a Resolution in favour of the Postnati, in which the lord-chancellor and 12 Judges out of 14 concurred. However, very eminent lawyers appear to have entertained a different opinion of the point: In parliament, Dodridge, Hyde, Brock, Crew, Moore, and Hedley, all spoke against the Postnati. What the names of the two dissenting judges were, is not mentioned; except that lord Ellesmere alludes to both having the Christian name of Thomas, the only judges of which name at the time were lord chief justice Fleming, Mr. justice Walmesley, and Mr. justice Foster. It is suspected too, that the known inclinations and wishes of the king had no little influence in the decision. But be this as it may, we are not apprized that the main point of the case has been ever disturbed by any subsequent judicial opinion.

* Some of the law laid down in the following case was discussed in the case of Hall v. Campbell, infra, A. D. 1774. It was much relied on by lord Mansfield in his argument (on a point on which the judgment of the court did not turn) in that case, and is very perspicuously stated and carefully considered by Mr. Baron Maerces in his most learned and elaborate analysis and examination of the whole of lord Mansfield's argument on that occasion. See "The Canadian Freeholder," Dialogue 2d. As to the topics of Allegiance agitated in the case of the Postnati, see more in the duke of Hamilton's case, infra, A. D. 1648. See also East's Pl. Cr. ch. ii. § 3, 41. and the cases and other authorities there cited.

The only regular Report we have of this case is by lord Coke. But there is a great deal of matter relative to it in other books. Lord-chancellor Ellesmere published his Argument separately. Mr. serjeant Moore gives the history of the previous passages in parliament on the great point of law, for deciding which the case was afterwards made. In lord Bacon's Works, there are both his Speeches in Parliament on the subject, and his Argument before the Judges in the Exchequer-chamber, with some other pieces. 152. 159. 170. 2 Bac. 4to. ed. 173. 185. 514. #### CASE OF THE UNION OF THE REALM OF SCOTLAND WITH ENGLAND.

BY act of parliament in the first session anno primo Jacobi regis, certain commissioners of England were appointed to meet with commissioners of Scotland, and to treat for the weale of both kingdoms, and to put their doings in schedules tripartite, to be delivered, one to the king, the other to the parliament of England, and the third to the parliament of Scotland. The commissioners of both nations met in the Painted Chamber at Westminster, anno 2. Jac. regis, and treated long, and in the end made schedules, and delivered them according to the act. The schedule for the parliament of England was presented by the lord Ellesmere lord chancellor of England, to whom the commissioners had delivered the same for that purpose, himself being one of the commissioners, the first day of the session of parliament holden anno 3 Jac. R. the king himself, the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons, being all assembled in the upper house of parliament. But the consideration of that schedule was by another act made in that sessions of an. 3 Jac. R. deferred untill the then next session.

The next session being this instant of an' 4 Jacobi regis, the schedule was considered of dividedly by the lords and commons: the material parts consisting upon 3 heads. The first the commissioners did propose, that all hostile lawes of either nation one against the other might be abrogated, and did enumerate the same lawes. The second, they proposed a course for commerce and merchandizing by merchants of both nations between themselves and with forreiners. Thirdly, they proposed that the common law of both nations should be declared to be, that all born in either nation sithence his majesty was king of both, were mutually naturalized in both. And further, that an act might be made to naturalize all born before, with certain cautions and restrictions for bearing principall offices of the crown, offices of judicature, or having voice in parliament, and with a saving of the kings prerogative.

Upon the two first articles, the lords and commons had sundry conferences in the Painted Chamber, and in effect agreed to give way to the substance of them. But upon the third, the commons could not assent to declare the law as was proposed, and thereupon after long debate amongst themselves, they appointed committees to confer with the lords committees, who mett the 25 of February 1606, in the Painted Chamber. At which conference sir Francis Bacon, appointed by the house to introduce the rest, began in this manner.

That this conference and the subject thereof

was non in deliberativo, but in judiciali, not de bono but de vero, not to consult of a law to be made, but to declare the law already planned, whereto the commons were drawn, by insatisfaction of their judgments, not indisposition of their minds to the happy union intended, to oppose the proposition of the commissioners. And whereas his majesty had by a proclamation expressed the law to be as the commissioners had proposed, the commons did not take them selves prejudicated by the proclamation; first, for that that matter came but obiter in the proclamation, and was not the principal part or purpose thereof; then, for that the proclamation mentioneth the king to be so informed by divers sages of the law, which is not to be understood judges of the law, but some learned in the lawes, whose opinion may the better be opposed: yet the proclamation hath so tempered the tongues of the speakers, as it hath kept down all flashes of heat, which otherwise might have happened in the argument. Howbeit the danger of a declaratory statute, being like Janus Bifrons striking both wayes, raiseth in the commons too much fear to assent to the proposition, leaving the proclamation neverthlesse to its own effect. Pur inducmentur par les auteurs apres cest induction, he shewed that it was a singular commendation to the lawes of England, that it was not in sociable, but contented to hear and be advised by other sciences in matters of dependencie upon them; as in cases of exposition of words, by grammarians; in matters of matrimony, deprivation, bastardy, by civilians; in minerals, by natural philosophers; in uses, by moral philosophers. Upon which consideration the commons had selected out of themselves divers gentlemen, some for inducement, some for argument in the point of law. Those for inducement were to shew the law of nations, and of reason, and the stories of other countries, and the civil law elsewhere put in use upon unions; those for argument were gentlemen of the profession of the common laws of this realm: all which being here ready, he left them to discharge their own proper duties.

Sir Edwyn Sandes shewed that this case was proper to be consulted with the law of nations, which is called 'jus gentium;' for there being no president for it in the law, 'lex deficit,' and 'deficiente lege recurritur ad consuetudinem,' and 'deficiente consuetudine recurritur ad rationem naturalem,' which 'ratio naturalis' is the law of nations called 'jus gentium.' The question of difference is thus, whether subjection to one king make all the people born within the places of that subjection to be naturalized over all places of that kings subjection, which as he thought, if it were to be measured by the law of reason and nations, did not. And therefore shewed 7 reasons for his opinion.—1. That although ab antiquo, when people were together in one heap irregularly, having one head, their subjection gave to every one equal priviledge in all places of their subjection, yet since the world is grown to distribution of people into places, and to discipline in their government, though their subjection still remain in the general to one head; yet the manner of it is locally circumscribed to the places where they are brought forth, and those of one place do not, nor should partake of the discipline, privileges, and birthright of the other places, but every one left to his own, as acquired for patrimony by their antecessors of that place, upon reasons peradventure now not extant nor to be exactly understood.—2. This is in use in other nations, who obtain their naturalization by Charters, and for such time, and with such cautions, as may be granted unto them, and take it not by the general law of that nation whereto they were united.—3. In the time of the old civil Romans, who united unto them divers provinces, they had degrees in naturalizing; for first, the party had 'jus domicili,' then 'jus civitatis,' next 'jus tribus,' and lastly 'jus honoris;' whereas if the law of England should be, that subjection brought all this together, it were a law overliberal, and more bountiful, then the laws of this civil state grounded upon reason and policy.—4. That Scotland being governed by the civil law, alloweth not English by bare subjection to their king to be naturalized within them; and therefore the law of England should be very unequal, if it should allow it to Scots here.—5. This case may give a dangerous example for mutual naturalizing of all nations that hereafter may fall into the subjection of the king, although they be very remote, in that their mutual communality of privileges may disorder the settled government of every of the particulars; and how many of them may happen, is uncertaine; for we see, that where there were 100 kings, they came after to 11, and are now brought to 6 only within Christendome.—6. The Scots shall be in better case by this law of naturalizing then the English, in the English nation; for the English pay all impositions and taxes for services of the crown, which the Scots do not within England.—7. All the reasons given for naturalizing extend as well to them before born, as since the king came to the crown of England; for the subjection is now all one. Therefore, the law that should make a difference is not reasonable; and because the law is confessed to be, that those before born be not naturalized, therefore the law must also be, if it retain the same reason, that those born after are not naturalized.

Nevertheless he concluded, that he held it in reason, that in respect of one subjection, the Scots should not be accounted nor deal withall by our lawes, as aliens, although not enabled to the full rights of Englishmen born amongst us.

Sir Roger Owen for stories, 1. shewed, that in all the presidents of the Romans, and in all their varieties of aristocracy or monarchy, there was no naturalizing ipso jure, but by charters of grace or constitutions special, and that by Nannius begun and introduced. 2. The president of Spain and Castile is not to this point; for Alaricus the emperor first lord of all Spain gave out Castile, and the coming of Castile again is rather a reuniting or a remiter, then a new union, and therefore reasonable they be one naturalized in the other as they were at the first. 3. The president fresh of France and Scotland by marriage of the kings mother with Francis the second king of France, because the subjection made no naturalization ipso jure, therefore the Scots in France and the French in Scotland were naturalized by acts of parliament and with cautions.

Sir John Bennet doctor of the civil law, he shewed that the civil law had no resolution of this point 'in terminis terminantibus;' but of other unions lesser then kingdoms, there were rules, which he divided into these heads; one a maxime, the other a distribution; the maxime, 'cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona æquum est ac si essent in diversis,' as one parson of two churches, one dean of two deaneries: the customes of every place remain still distinct and divided. And he cited an example, that the earldome of Flanders and Artois were holden of the king of France as soveraign by the duke of Brabant and Holland, who within Brabant and Holland was a free state: the question was whether this duke having both the dukedome and the earldome, and owing subjection to France only for the earldome, might make a league with the English for his dukedome, without breaking allegiance with France: and this being debated in the parliament of Paris, it was adjudged he might, because he held the dukedome and the earldome as distinct in his person, and owed no subjection to France for his dukedome. The distribution he made was this, upon the difference of unum and unitum: there was a union subordinate, that is, when an inferiour is united to the superiour, as Ireland to England, in this case 'privilegia communicantur.' There is an union by incorporation, that is, when two be made unum, and not unitum, and then 'privilegia communicantur,' as Wales and England. The third is when disjunct kingdomes are united, and that 'unicum' is 'secundum quid,' and 'non simpliciter;' in which case 'privilegia non communicantur;' and so he concluded that Scottish men were not naturalized in England; and yet he affirmed that it was in the power of the king by the civil law to naturalize them, and give them the privileges.

The earl of Salisbury here interposed, and said, that he was desirous to understand whether the arguments made were upon the point in question; for as he conceived the question now in debate was a legal question of the law of England, and therefore time was to be spent upon argument and discussion of the law of England, and so 'sapiens contentio aut prodest aut non obest.'

The Lord Chancellor then spake and said, that the first man that spake by introduction and inducement of the rest brought the question to the quick, that is, that it was not a question de bono but de vero, not what was fit to be done, but what the law already is, which is what the law of England is; in which question, if it shall be doubtful, it is more then indifferent to declare it as the commissioners have proposed, for three causes. 1. The kings proclamation having divulged it so, it is for his honor to declare it so, if it be not clear otherwise. 2. The opinion of the commissioners whom both houses trusted. 3. The act of recognition, whereby we have acknowledged the king of both, and that we both live under one imperial crown.

The earl of Northampton said, that it appeared by the civilians, that in the civil law there was no president 'in terminis terminantibus;' and therefore from them we could take no rule for this case; nor no stories or examples of forraign states, which are appliable and framed to their own particular policies. Nor as this case is, can we be measured or guided by inconveniences that may be forecast; because we are confined to a point of law already received and planted, and are to reason and discuss what that law is. Nevertheless he desired leave to use a comparison to them, to be commended to their consideration, between the union in a body politick and in a body natural. The head in a body natural hath his influence into all the members by spirits of life and sense. So hath the head of the body politick, to whom all the members be children in obedience, and brothers one to the other. The sinews in a body natural are ligaments that binde together the joynts and flesh. So are lawes in the body politick that tye people in a band of subjection and civil life. The blood, that passeth in the veins of the body natural by continual motion, doth maintain and refresh the spirits of life. So traffick, commerce, and contracts in a body politick, do support, maintaine and refresh the common-wealth. But of all these there is a superior spirit sent by God, which is the soul to the body of man, by which all our blessedness is infused. So may we well say, that the kings majestie is like the soul, a blessedness sent from God to dwell in both these nations as a continual spirit of union amongst them, to pacifie and temper all bitterness, even as the soul by instinct of reason quieteth the natural passions of the natural bodies. Wherefore let us consider how unfit it is to have two spirits or souls in one body; what their opposition may work for distemper and dissolution; what the sweet harmony of one good vertuous and religious soul in every part of the body may do, for consolidating, strengthening, and continuing in the whole body that prosperous estate of life and health that is to be wished: and therefore in the case whatsoever may tend to the happy and firm uniting of these two kingdomes in resemblance of lives and fortunes is to be inclined to, and recommended to your grave consideration.

Dodridge the king's solicitor, Laurence Hyde, Brook, Crewe, & Hedley, professors of the common law, now begin. And for the common law they urged nine reasons or arguments, that those born since his majesty came to the crown of England within Scotland should not be naturalized in England. Which question sprang out of two positions granted, as a third doubtful between, and this third is 'oculus questionis.' The first of these two positions is, that in the kings person there is an union of sovereignty over both nations. The second is, that notwithstanding this union, yet the fundamental lawes of either nation do remaine distinct. The third, which is the doubt between both these, whether naturalization proceed from the king or the lawes. Out of this one head all the reasons were derived as followeth.

1 That 'lex et ligeancia' came out of one root, and as it is called 'lex a ligundo,' so it is called 'legeance, a ligatione;' which proveth allegiance to be tied to laws; and consequently the lawes of these two nations being severall, notwithstanding the union of sovereignty in the kings person, the allegiance of the subjects remaineth still severall; and therefore naturalization being measured by allegiance must still remain severall and distinct in either nations, as allegiance and laws do, and cannot be united and made one in both nations. To enforce this they cited the statute of 25 Ed. 3. statute 2. De Natis Ultra Mare. In many places where it mentioneth ligeance, is added 'out of the 'legeance of England, or within the same legeance of England;' which doth infer, that ligeance is tyed to the kingdome, and not to the person of the king.

2 Reason, that Postnati in Scotland are not subject to the laws of England, and therefore should not have benefit of the laws of England.

3 Reason, that every nation hath a precinct wherein the laws have operation; and naturalization is an act or operation of law; therefore it cannot extend to places out of the precinct for the laws. Which being granted, it followeth, that as English laws extend not into Scotland, so to be naturalized by the laws of England, extends not into Scotland nor to those born in Scotland.

The 4 and 5 reason, that the great seal of England, which is the organ by which the law is conveyed, is not powerful nor binding in Scotland; therefore those born in Scotland not inheritable to the laws of England, nor to be born subjects of England, when they cannot be commanded by the great seal of England.

6 Reason, that in subordinate kingdomes, dukedomes, or seignories, as Ireland, Gascoigne, Aquitane, Angois, the great seal of England is passable, and the parliament of England hath power; as is proved by that a writ of error may be brought in the Kings-bench of a judgment in Ireland, and the parliament of England may make a statute to bind in Ireland, if Ireland be specially named, but without special naming it doth not bind. So 27 R. 3. cap. 7. a statute was made to authorise the steward of Gascoigne to arrest the bodies of such as bargain for wines elsewhere, then in the portes of Bur-deaux and Bayon, and to send them to the Tower of London. An Habeas Corpus hath been directed under the great seal of England into Gascoigne, as appeareth by records of the Kings-bench. And the islanders do send petitions and make proctors to the parliament of England, as is still put in use to this day. By which it appeareth, that the case is not like between England and these kingdomes and dukedomes subordinate to England, as it is between England and Scotland; Scotland being a distinct kingdom not subordinate, and as ancient as England itself. And therefore whereas some have conceived, that when Gascoigne was by marriage united to England, those of Gascoigne were not aliens to England, and enforce this exposition out of the prior Shels case, 27 E. 3. pla. 48. in the book of assizes, in that the prior having his lands seized in time of war, for that he was born in Gascoigne under the kings allegiance, and thereupon the matter being found true, he had restitution; to that, it may be confessed; and yet it matcheth not our case for Scotland, a distinct kingdome, and the reason of that restitution may be the ceasing of the wars as well as being born in Gascoigne; for those of Gascoigne were in those times accounted aliens in England, as may appeare by the statute of 38 E. 3. cap. 11. where it is enacted, that the Gascoignes and other aliens should come into England with their wines; which proveth, that those of Gascoigne could not bring their wines into England, and they were then aliens to England, by the words of Gascoignes and other aliens.

7 Reason, that regnum and rex were relatives, and therefore distinct kingdoms, distinct kings as to the kingdoms; and the person of the king possessing both kingdoms possesseth the people and the laws of them distinct, as the kingdoms are themselves. Therefore the subjection of every people is distinguished to the severall kingdoms, and one not subject to the other, nor naturalized within the other. And this is proved by the statute of 14 E. 3. whereby it is declared, that notwithstanding the king of England were king of France, yet the people of England were not subject unto him as king of France, but only as king of England.

8 Reason, that no man can be born a subject of two allegiances, nor by birth natural of two distinct kingdoms, therefore Scots born in Scotland cannot be naturalized in England.

9 Inconveniencie would ensue in honors, privileges, and things of value, which would be confounded without order, if this commixtion should be planted in both nations without discipline or rules.

The time being thus spent the 25 day of February, the next day was appointed to proceed with the conference, at which time the lords committees desired the judges there attending to deliver their advice and opinions concerning the point of law: for which the lord chief justice Popham had the night before prayed respite until this time. Whereupon the said lord chief justice, and sir Edward Cook chief justice of the Common Pleas, and sir Thomas Flemming chief baron, did openly deliver their opinions and their reasons, the said lord chief justice Popham making these three inducements in commendation of the laws of England. 1 That they had continued as a rock without alteration in all the varieties of people that had possessed this land, namely the Romans, Brittons, Danes, Saxons, Normans, and English, which he imputed to the integrity and justice of these laws, every people taking a liking to them, and desirous to continue them and live by them, for which he cited Fortescues book of the laws of England.

2 Commendation, the price that those laws did cost, which was no lesse then blood; not laws of blood or bloody laws, but laws bought and purchased by the blood of our antecessors, as appeareth by Magna Charta, planted in king H. 3's time, after long and bloody wars between the kings and barons of this realm, the stories whereof do yet live fresh in every chronicle.

3 Commendation is the proceedings of the law, which he divided into 3 parts. 1 Judgments. 2 Trials. 3 Testimonies. The judgments so even and so impartial, as they give way to no mans affection, nor impute blame to any man; but to say the law requireth such judgment, is an excuse satisfactory to all men, for the king, and the judges. And therefore the said lord chief justice cited a resolution in parliament when himself served as Speaker: that whereas it was proposed to have a law made, that the judges might use their discretion in appointing trials in forraine counties, in respect the meaner sort of people were overweighed with the power of great men in some shires that were parties to the suites; it was upon grave advice and consultation denied, with this answer, that it were better to live under a certain known law, though hard sometimes in a few cases, then to be subject to the alterable discretion of any judges. The trials of the law for the most part so equal by the oaths of 12, as he protested that he never knew of the multitude that had passed before himself, scarce two of a hundred passe otherwise then himself should have passed, if he had been in their case. For the testimonies being viva voce before the judges in open face of the world, he said was much to be preferred before written depositions by private examiners or commissioners. First, for that the judge and jurors discern often by the countenance of a witness whether he come prepared, and by his readiness and slackness, whether he be ill affected or well affected, and by short questions may draw out circumstances to approve or discredit his testimony, and one witness may contest with another where they are viva voce. All which are taken away by written depositions in a corner.

For argument the said judges answered with one assent, to the first reason of the commons, that allegiance and laws were not of equiparation for six causes. 1. Allegiance was before laws. 2. Allegiance is after laws. 3. Allegiance is where the laws are not. 4. Between sovereignty and allegiance laws are begotten. 5. Allegiance extends as far as defence, which is beyond the circuit of laws. 6. Allegiance followeth the natural person, not the politick. To prove this, it was said, if a heap of people meet together so near, that they appoint a king, there allegiance is before they have laws proclaimed or prescribed: wherefore allegiance is before laws. If the king be expelled by force and another usurps, yet the allegiance is not taken away, though the law be taken away. If the king go out of England with a company of his servants, allegiance remaineth amongst his subjects and servants, although he be out of his own realm, whereto his laws are confined, as is proved by a case in Fleta, who wrote in Ed. 2 time, which is thus. King Ed. 1. went in person into France, to a marriage; one of his servants in France stole 2 silver dishes, for which he was apprehended by the French: the king required to have him redelivered, being his subject and of his traine; and upon dispute in the parliament of Paris, he was sent to the king of England to do his own justice upon him, whereupon he was tried before the steward and marshal of the kings house, and executed in France in a meadow called St. Jermina meadow. Which proveth that the kings law followeth his allegiance out of the local limit of the laws of England. And even so it is, where the king of England sendeth a lieutenant or general with an army royal out of the realm, the army is to be guided by the martial law of England, as the lord Cook affirmed, who also cited the case of Fleta. If there were not a sovereign to prescribe laws, and people of allegiance to obey them, there could be no laws made nor executed. By which it appeareth, that between sovereignty and allegiance laws are begotten; and therefore in nations conquered there are no laws, yet is there present allegiance; and after allegiance gotten, it is secondary for the king to deliver laws to the people of his allegiance. And to prove the allegiance to be tyed to the body natural of the king, not to the body politick, the lord Cook cited the phrases of divers statutes mentioning the king our natural liege sovereign, and these words 'natural subjects' in acts of recognition usual and familiar. And to prove that allegiance extended further then the laws national, they showed, that every king of divers kingdoms or dukedomes is to command every people to defend any of his kingdoms without respect of that nation where he is born; as if the king of Spain be invaded in Portugal, he may levy for defence of Portugal armies out of Spain, Naples, Castile, Millan, Flanders, and the like, as a thing incident to the allegiance of all his subjects to joyn together in defence of any one of his territories, without respect of extent of the laws of that nation where he was born: whereby it manifestly appeareth, that allegiance followeth the natural person of the king, and is not tyed to the body politick respectively in every kingdom. And therefore, whereas the rule for aliens is this, that those born within the kings allegiance are subjects, and those born out of his allegiance are aliens, it is manifest, that Scots born in Scotland, since the king of England was king of England and Scotland both, are not born out of the kings allegiance; and so not aliens, but subjects, and so to be accounted in England. For further proof of this, the lord Cook shewed statutes, book-cases and pleadings.

For statutes prerogativa regis cap. 12. which was made in the 17 year of king Edward the second, and is a declaration of the prerogative before, wherein it is declared, that the king was to have the escheats of the lands of the Normands, and all others born in parts beyond seas, whose antecessors were of the faith or loyalty of the king of France, and not of the king of England; as it happened of the barony of Monumeta, after the death of John D. Monumeta, whose heirs were of Brittain and elsewhere. By which declaration the judges did infer, that out of the allegiance, and within the allegiance of the king (fides being to be understood allegiance) maketh the oddes between an alien and a denizen, and not the place of birth in England, or without England; for it is declared, that the king should have the escheats of such as were born in parts beyond seas, and whose parents were of the allegiance of the king of France, and not of the allegiance of the king of England. So that although his birth were out of the bounds of the kingdome of England and out of the reach and extent of the laws of England, yet if it were within the allegiance of the kings of England, the king was not to have his escheat as an alien, as at this time divers places that were within the limits of France were in subjection to the kings of England. And for the instance of the barony of Monumeta, they shewed that king H. 2 had four sons, Henry, Richard, Jeffrey, and John, that Jeffrey was married to the heire of Brittain, and was murdered by John, in which time the case of Monumeta happened, Brittain being not within the allegiance of the king of England, by that marriage of the king's third son. They shewed that it was not material, whether a kingdome or dukedome came to the allegiance of the king of England, nor whether by marriage or conquest; for many dukedoms were sometimes kingdoms, and kingdoms were but dukedoms, as Castile at the first but an earldom, now a kingdom; little Brittain once a kingdom, then after and now a dukedom; Ireland a dukedom, now a kingdom. But the matter of difference is, whether they be free and divided states in their laws and government, and so were both these dukedoms of Aquitane, Gascoigne, Guyen, &c. which have been so much insisted upon, and so is Scotland, and yet all under one allegiance and faith to one king: which unity and allegiance to one king, taketh away the rule of alien born from them all, howsoever they were united, be it by marriage or conquest. And yet for Gascoigne and Aquitane, it came by marriage and descent, as Scotland. The next statute is the statute of 42 E. 3. cap. 10, that the commons desired in parliament that children born beyond seas, within the seigniories of Calice and elsewhere within the lands and seigniories that pertain to the king beyond seas, might inherite in England. Whereunto the answer is, it is accorded, that the common law and the statute upon the same point another time may be holden. The judges, examining what statute that was, found it was the statute of 25 E. 3. stat. 2. de natis ultra mare. Which statute contains a preamble, and 3 ordinances. The preamble is a recital of a doubt, whether children should inherite in England, that were born beyond seas out of the legiance of England. The 1 ordinance is a declaration of the law, that the kings children where-soever born are inheritable in England. The 2 is a constitution particular for some named, and which the king shall name, which were born beyond seas, out of the legiance of England, to inherit in England. The 3 is a new law, that children from henceforth born out of the legiance of the king, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and shall be at the faith and of the allegiance of the king of England, shall inherite in England, &c. Out of this they did infer, that the third ordinance only did touch the point now in question; which ordinance nevertheless came not to the question proposed; for the ordinance is for persons born beyond seas, and out of the kings legiance, whose parents are English; whereas our question is for persons born in Scotland, which is within the faith and allegiance of the king, and so much the odds is, as the words import, viz. out of the allegiance and within the allegiance. So as that statute directs not this controversy; and therefore it must be the common law that doth it, whereto the statute of 42 E. 3. doth referr concerning those born at Callis, and other seigniories beyond seas, that pertain to the king: which persons having been ever expounded to inherite in England, it must needs be taken, that they inherite by the common law, and not by statute. 28 H. 6, cap. 5, against extortions used by searchers amongst merchants, the merchants of Gascoigne, Guyen, Ireland and the Isles, are called the kings liege people.

The books and judgments cited by the judges, were first 27 E. 3. in the book of assizes the 48 plea, the case of the prior of Shels, who being a prior alien, and his temporalities being seised in time of war, shewed that he was not an alien, for that he was born in Gascoigne, within the legiance of the king; which plea was found true by verdict, and thereupon his temporalities were restored. And then the same case came again in question in the Common Place in a quare impedit, because in his restitution he had no special words of advowsons, whether the king might not present to the advowsons of the priory notwithstanding the restitution, for that also the restitution was, that the king of his grace did restore, &c. So it was of grace, not of right. But the book is, that the king should not present; and the reason alledged, because the seasure was by wrong, the prior being no alien, and so a restitution in that case, by which the king doth not give but do right, needs not contain special mention of ad-vowsons; neither the recital of the kings grace could escape the justice of the court examining the cause, to say it was not of right. For concurrence with this book, they cited the case of 11 H. 4. fo. 26, that two husbands and their wives parceners brought an assize, and then were summoned and severed: the tenant pleaded to her that was severed, that her husband was an alien, and born out of the realm, and all the legiance, and not made denizen: but in the end in respect of the severance, and that the plea was in disablement of him that was severed, the writ was awarded good. Yet the note special of the case is the manner of the plea, viz. alien born out of the realm, and all the allegiance: whereof it is inferred that allegiance is further then the realm, and not confined to the circuit of the laws of the realm. 14 H. 4. fo. 19. b. one challenged a juror for that he was an alien, and the manner of his challenge is, that he was not a liege to the king, because he was born out of his legiance, and shewed that he was a Flemming; and the triers found that he was born in Flanders, but had lived of a child in England, and was sworn to the king in a leet: nevertheless the court would not allow him to be sworn. But the note of the case is, the manner of the challenge, viz. not a liege to the king, because he was born out of his legiance. So Littleton in his chapter of villenage sheweth him to be an alien that is born out of the kings allegiance. And this distinction of allegiance quatenus king of England, and quatenus king of Scotland, or quatenus duke of Ireland, Aquitane, Gascoigne, &c. is never heard of in the books of our law.

For pleadings they shewed the president in the book of entries, to be, that he that disableth an alien must alledge affirmatively, that he is an alien; and yet that sufficeth not, but he must alledge further that he was born extra obedientiam domini regis; and not that alone, but also he must assigne a place where he was born infra obedientiam of some other king. As in 9 E. 4. fo. 7, in the assize by Bagot of the office of clerk of the crown in the Chancery, the tenant pleaded, that Bagot was an alien in this manner, dicat quod idem Johannes Bagot est alienigena genitus extra ligeanciam domini regis Angliæ, viz. apud Pontoyis infra regnum Franciæ sub obedientia Caroli nuucupantis se regem Franciæ, adversarii et magni inimici domini regis Angliæ. Which course of pleading cannot be held with those of Scotland; for that Scotland is not out of the kings allegiance, neither is the king of Scots enemy to the king of England, but he is also king of England, whereof both nations do and must take notice.

And whereas it hath been urged that the trial of an alien must be within England, so that he which will destroy the plea of an alien against himself must assigne a place in England of his birth, and cannot assigne a place in Scotland; this is easily answered, and proveth nothing on the other part; for so if a deed be made in Ireland or in Gascoigne, or in the isles, you must assigne the making of it in some county of England, to the end a trial may be had by jury, which is not but in England; nevertheless you may give in evidence the making of it in Ireland or the Isles. So is the case of 13 H. 4. pla. 10. [Fitz. Trial pla. 92.] for an obligation made in Gascoigne. And so is 32 H. 6. fo. 26. in debt upon a bond made in the bishoprick of Durham being a county palatine; and there the reason of this case debated, and Brown citeth it to be adjudged, that if the defendant alledge that the plaintiff is a Scot born at St. Johns town in Scotland, out of the legiance, this is a trial where the writ is brought; but if the plaintiff will reply, that he was born at London within the allegiance, the defendant must rejoyn, that the plaintiff was born at St. Johns town in Scotland, without that, that he was born in London, and the issue shall be tried in London. So are affirmative issues allowed for necessity of trial; but evidence of his birth in any place within the kings dominions is sufficient to maintain the issue, although for form of pleading it be laid to be at London. In which case of 13 H. 4. it was put by Ireby, that a liegman of England was killed by another liegman of England in Scotland, and his wife brought her appeal in England in the court of the lord constable of England.

Then the judges examined what should be given to the Scots, if they should be naturalized. First, they being not enemies, if they be aliens, are to be protected in their bodies and goods, and may bring personal actions. But if they buy land, the king, if he will, may seize it. But for dignities of honor, or voices in parliament as barons, Scotchmen cannot have in England, so long as the laws stand distinct. And therefore they cited the case of 11 E. 3. titulu brieve 473. where the writ was brought against the earl of Richmond, who alledged, that he was duke of Brittain, and not so named in the writ, and prayed that the writ might abate; but the judges allowed not his plea, because the dukedom of Brittain is a forraigne dignity, of which we take no notice in England. Yet Edmond Baliol assigning the same cause in abatement of a writ, for that he was not named king of Scots, the exception was held good; for that a king is in notice of all countries, and so is a knight, but not barons, earldoms, dukedoms and the like. Nevertheless 39 E. 3. fo. 35. en tulle de brieve 517. a writ was abated for not naming the defendant earle of Angus, although it be a dignity in Scotland: but the reason is shewed to be, for that he had alway a writ to attend at the parliament of England. And by this, the judges said, that the 9th objection being matter of inconvenience in places of honour was answered with this addition, that no naturalizing could make them barons of parliament of England for their dignities in Scotland, neither did naturalizing give any man a place in parliament, except he were chosen, or gave him any lands or goods except he could purchase them.

For the matter of the great seal the judges shewed, that the seal was alterable by the king at his pleasure, and he might make one seal for both kingdoms, for seals, coyn, and leagues are of absolute prerogative to the king without parliament, not restrained to any assent of the people. But for further resolution of this point, how far the great seal doth command out of England, they made this distinction, that the great seal was current for remedials which groweth upon complaint of the subjects, and thereupon writs are addressed under the great seal of England, which are limited their precinct to be within the places of the jurisdiction of the courts that must give the redresse of the wrong. And therefore writs are not to go into Ireland, nor the Isles, nor Wales, nor the counties palatine; because the kings courts here have not power to hold plea of lands or things there. But the great seal hath a power preceptory to the person, which power extendeth to any place where the person may be found. And for this the lord Cook cited Nicholas Ludlowes case in 4 E. 3, in the Tower record rotulo clausa numero 21; that Ludlow being at Rome, a commandment under the great seal was sent to him to return. So Berties case in queen Maries time, and sir Franc. Inglefields in queen Elizabeths time, the privy seal went to command them to return into the realm, and for not coming their lands were seized, as appeareth by my lord Diers report of both those cases. So the case before of 39 E. 3, fol. 35, a parliament writ was current into Scotland, to the earle of Angus; and 14 H. 8, a Habeas Corpus into the Isle of Man; which Habeas Corpus is a preceptory writ to have the body of his subject, and may be directed into Scotland, or any place where the king hath ministers, otherwise how shall the king come by the person of his subject whom he would command. So as where remedial writs run not, yet preceptories under the great seal do; and therefore the position of the great seal not to be current in Scotland holdeth for remedials, not for preceptories: and this doth answer the objection, that the great seal is current in subordinate kingdoms, or dukedoms, and not in all places of the king's dominions in distinct kingdoms.

And as to the rule taken by the civilians, 'cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diversis,' that holdeth not in things personal but real: and therefore a marquisse, that is a baron and an earle, can by the statute of 21 H. 8, have no more chaplains then his best dignity alloweth, and not for every dignity.—And as to the objection that none can be born a natural subject of two kingdoms, they denied that absolutely; for although locally he can be born but in one, yet effectually the allegiance of the king extending to both, his birthright shall extend to both.—And as to the objection that rex et regnum be relatives, and therefore the allegiance of a king can extend but to that kingdom; they answered, that rex and regna were relatives, but rex et regnum be not so relatives, as a king can be king but of one kingdom, for that were proprium quarto modo. viz. omni, soli et semper, which clearly holdeth not, but that his kingly power extending to divers nations and kingdoms, all owe him equal subjection, and are equally born to the benefit of his protection. And although he is to govern them by their distinct laws, yet any one of the people coming into the other is to have the benefit of the laws wheresoever he cometh, and is to bear the burthens and taxes of the place where he cometh; but living in one, or for his livelihood in one, he is not to be taxed in the other, because laws ordain taxes, impositions, and charges, as a discipline of subjection particularized to every particular nation.

And so these three judges delivered their Opinions openly, and the rest were ready and did affirme the same to be all their Opinions, but only justice Walmesly who differed in the main point, the rest were Warburton and Daniel, of the Common Place, Fenner, Williams, and Tanfield, of the Kings Bench, Snigg and Altham, barons of the Exchequer.

SPEECH OF Lord BACON, as Counsel for Calvin, in the Exchequer Chamber.

[From the last 4to edition of his Works, vol. ii. p. 514.

MAY it please your lordships; This case your lordships do well perceive to be of exceeding great consequence. For whether you do measure that by place, that reacheth not only to the realm of England, but to the whole island of Great Britain; or whether you measure that by time, that extendeth not only to the present time, but much more to future generations,

'Et nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis.' And therefore as that is to receive at the bar a full and free debate, so I doubt not but that shall receive from your lordships a sound and just resolution according to law, and according to truth. For, my lords, though he were thought to have said well, that said that for his word, rex fortissi-

mus; yet he was thought to have said better, even in the opinion of a king himself, that said, veritus fortissimo, et prævalet; and I do much rejoice to observe such a concurrence in the whole carriage of this cause to this end, that truth may prevail.—The case no feigned or framed case; but a true case between true parties.—The title handled formerly in some of the king's courts, and free-hold upon it; used indeed by his majesty in his high wisdom to give an end to this great question, but not raised; occurio, as the schoolmen say, arrepta, non porrecta.—The case argued in the King's bench by Mr. Walter with great liberty, and yet with good approbation of the court; the persons assigned to be of counsel on that side, inferior to none of their quality and degree in learning; and some of them most conversant and exercised in the question. The judges in the King's bench have adjourned it to this place for conference with the rest of their brethren. Your lordship, my lord chancellor, though you be absolute judge in the court where you sit, and might have called to you such assistance of judges as to you had seemed good; yet would not forerun or lead in this case by any opinion there to be given; but have chosen rather to come yourself to this assembly; all tending as I said, to this end, whereunto I for my part do heartily subscribe, ut vincat veritas, that truth may first appear, and then prevail. And I do firmly hold, and doubt not but I shall well maintain, that this is the truth, that Calvin the plaintiff is ipso jure by the law of England a natural born subject, to purchase free-hold, and to bring real actions within England. In this case I must so consider the time, as I must much more consider the matter. And therefore though it may draw my speech into farther length; yet I dare not handle a case of this nature confusedly, but purpose to observe the ancient and exact form of pleadings; which is, First, to explain or induce: Then, to confute, or answer objections: And lastly, to prove, or confirm.

And first for Explanation. The outward question in this case is no more, but whether a child, born in Scotland since his majesty's happy coming to the crown of England, be naturalized in England, or no. But the inward question or state of the question evermore beginneth, where that which is confessed on both sides doth leave.—It is confessed, that if these two realms of England and Scotland were united under one law and one parliament, and thereby incorporated and made as one kingdom, that the Post-natus of such an union should be naturalized.—It is confessed, that both realms are united in the person of our sovereign: or, because I will gain nothing by surreption, in the putting of the question, that one and the same natural person is king of both realms.—It is confessed, that the laws and parliaments are several. So then, whether this privilege and benefit of naturalization be an accessory or dependency upon that which is one and joint, or upon that which is several, hath been, and must be the depth of this question. And therefore your lordships do see the state of this question doth evidently lead me by way of inducement to speak of three things: the king, the law, and the privilege of naturalization. For if you well understand the nature of the two principals, and again the nature of the accessory; then shall you discern to whether principal the accessory doth properly refer, as a shadow to a body, or iron to an adamant.

And therefore your lordships will give me leave in a case of this quality, first to visit and open the foundations and fountains of reason, and not begin with the positions and eruditions of a municipal law; for so was that done in the great case of Mines; and so ought that to be done in all cases of like nature. And this doth not at all detract from the sufficiency of our laws, as incompetent to decide their own cases, but rather addeth a dignity unto them, when their reason appearing as well as their authority doth shew them to be as fine moneys, which are current not only by the stamp, because they are so received, but by the natural metal that is the reason and wisdom of them.

And master Littleton himself in his whole book doth commend but two things to the professors of the law by the name of his sons; the one, the inquiring and searching out the reasons of the law; and the other, the observing of the forms of pleadings. And never was there any case that came in judgment that required more, than Littleton's advice should be followed in those two points, than doth the present case in question.—And first of the king.

It is evident that all other commonwealths, monarchies only excepted, do subsist by a law precedent. For where authority is divided amongst many officers, and they not perpetual, but annual or temporary, and not to receive their authority, but by election and certain persons to have voice only to that election, and the like; these are busy and curious frames, which of necessity do pre-suppose a law precedent, written or unwritten, to guide and direct them. But in monarchies, especially hereditary; that is, when several families or lineages of people do submit themselves to one line, imperial or royal, the submission is more natural and simple, which afterwards by laws subsequent is perfected and made more formal; but that is grounded upon nature. That this is so, it appeareth notably in two things; the one the platforms and patterns which are found in nature of monarchies; the original submissions, and their motives and occasions. The platforms are three:

The first is that of a father, or chief of a family; who governing over his wife by prerogative of sex, over his children by prerogative of age, and because he is author unto them of being, and over his servants by prerogative of virtue and providence (for he that is able of body, and improvident of mind, is natura servus) that is a very model of a king. So is the opinion of Aristotle, lib. iii. Pol. cap. 14. where he saith, 'verum autem regnum est, cum penes unum est rerum summa potestas: quod regnum procuracionem familiæ imitatur.' And therefore Lycurgus, when one counselled him to dissolve the kingdom, and to establish another form of estate, answered, 'Sir, begin to do that which you advise first at home in your own house:' noting, that the chief of a family is as a king; and that those, that can least endure kings abroad, can be content to be kings at home. And this is the first platform, which we see is merely natural.

The second is that of a shepherd and his flock, which Xenophon saith, Cyrus had ever in his mouth. For shepherds are not owners of the sheep; but their office is to feed and govern. No more are kings proprietaries or owners of the people; for God is sole owner of people. 'The nations,' as the scripture saith, 'are his inheritance:' but the office of kings is to govern, maintain, and protect people. And that is not without a mystery, that the first king that was instituted by God, David, for Saul was but an untimely fruit, was translated from a shepherd, as you have it in Psalm 78. 'Et elegit David servum suum, de gregibus ovium sustulit eum,—pascere Jacob servum suum, et Israel hereditatem suam.' This is the second platform; a work likewise of nature.

The third platform is the government of God himself over the world, whereof lawful monarchs are a shadow. And therefore both amongst the Heathen, and amongst the Christians, the word, 'sacred,' hath been attributed unto kings, because of the conformity of a monarchy with a divine majesty; never to a senate or people. And so you find it twice in the lord Coke's Reports; once in the second book, the bishop of Winchester's case; and his fifth book, Cawdrie's case. And more anciently in the 10 of II. 7. fol. 18. 'rex est persona mixta cum sacerdote;' an attribute, which the senate of Venice, or a canton of Swisses, can never challenge. So, we see, there be precedents or platforms of monarchies, both in nature, and above nature; even from the monarch of heaven and earth to the king, if you will, in an hive of bees. And therefore other states are the creatures of law; and this state only subsisteth by nature.

For the original submissions, they are four in number. I will briefly touch them.

The first is paternity or patriarchy, which was when a family growing so great as it could not contain itself within one habitation, some branches of the descendants were forced to plant themselves into new families; which second families could not by a natural instinct and inclination but bear a reverence, and yield an obeisance, to the eldest line of the ancient family from which they were derived.

The second is the admiration of virtue, or gratitude towards merit, which is likewise naturally infused into all men. Of this Aristotle putteth the case well, when it was the fortune of some one man, either to invent some arts of excellent use towards man's life, or to congregate people that dwelt scattered into one place where they might cohabit with more comfort, or to guide them from a more barren land to a more fruitful, or the like: upon these deserts, and the admiration and recompence of them, people submitted themselves.

The third, which was the most usual of all, was conduct in war, which even in nature induceth as great an obligation as paternity. For as men owe their life and being to their parents in regard of generation, so they owe that also to saviours in the wars in regard of preservation. And therefore we find in chap. 18 of the book of Judges, ver. 23. 'Dixerant omnes viri ad Gideon, dominare nostri, tu et filii tui, quoniam servasti nos de manu Ma-

'dian.' And so we read when it was brought to the ears of Saul, that the people sung in the streets, 'Saul hath killed his thousand, and David his ten thousand' of enemies, he said straightways: 'quid ei superest nisi ipsum requam?' For whosoever hath the military dependence, wants little of being king.

The fourth is an enforced submission, which is conquest, whereof it seemed Nimrod was the first precedent, of whom it is said; 'ipse cepit potens esse in terra, et erat robustus venator coram Domino.' And this likewise is upon the same root, which is the saving or gift as it were of life and being; for the conqueror hath power of life and death over his captives; and therefore where he giveth them themselves, he may reserve upon such a gift what service and subjection he will.—All these four submissions are evident to be natural and more ancient than law.

To speak therefore of Law, which is the second part of that which is to be spoken of by way of inducement. Law no doubt is the great organ by which the sovereign power doth move, and may be truly compared to the sinews in a natural body, as the sovereignty may be compared to the spirits: for if the sinews be without the spirits, they are dead and without motion; if the spirits move in weak sinews, it causeth trembling: so the laws, without the king's power, are dead; the king's power, except the laws be corroborated, will never move constantly, but be full of staggering and trepidation. But towards the king himself the law doth a double office or operation. The first is to intitle the king, or design him; and in that sense Bracton saith well, lib. 1. fol. 5. and lib. 3. fol. 107. 'Lex facit quod ipse sit rex;' that is, it defines his title; as in our law, that the kingdom shall go to the issue female; that it shall not be departable amongst daughters; that the half-blood shall be respected, and other points differing from the rules of common inheritance. The second is, that whereof we need not fear to speak in good and happy times, such as these are, to make the ordinary power of the king more definite or regular; for it was well said by a father, 'plenitudo potestatis est plenitudo tempestatis.' And although the king, in his person, be solutus legibus, yet his acts and grants are limited by law, and we argue them every day.

But I demand, do these offices or operations of law evacuate or frustrate the original submission, which was natural; or shall it be said that all allegiance is by law? No more than it can be said, that potestas patris, the power of the father over the child, is by law: and yet no doubt laws do diversely define of that also; the law of some nations having given fathers power to put their children to death; others, to sell them thrice; others, to disinherit them by testament at pleasure, and the like. Yet no man will affirm, that the obedience of the child is by law, though laws in some points do make it more positive: and even so it is of allegiance of subjects to hereditary monarchs, which is corroborated and confirmed by law, but is the work of the law of nature. And therefore you shall find the observation true, and almost general in all states, that their lawgivers were long after their first kings, who governed for a time by natural equity without law. So was Theseus long before Solon in Athens: so was Eurytion and Sous long before Lycurgus in Sparta: so was Romulus long before the Decemviri. And even amongst ourselves there were more ancient kings of the Saxons; and yet the laws ran under the name of Edgar's laws. And in the refounding of the kingdom in the person of William the Conqueror, when the laws were in some confusion for a time, a man may truly say, that king Edward 1 was the first lawgiver, who enacting some laws, and collecting others, brought the law to some perfection. And therefore I will conclude this point with the stile, which divers acts of parliaments do give unto the king; which term him very effectually and truly, 'our natural sovereign liege lord.' And as it was said by a principal judge here present when he served in another place, and question was moved by some occasion of the title of Bullein's lands, that he would never allow, that queen Elizabeth (I remember it for the efficacy of the phrase) should be a statute queen, but a common-law queen: so surely I shall hardly consent, that the king shall be esteemed or called only our rightful sovereign, or our lawful sovereign, but our natural liege sovereign; as acts of parliament speak: for as the common law is more worthy than the statute law; so the law of nature is more worthy than them both.

Having spoken now of the king and the law, it remaineth to speak of the privilege and benefit of Naturalization itself; and that according to the rules of the law of England.—Naturalization is best discerned in the degrees whereby the law doth mount and ascend thereunto. For it seemeth admirable unto me, to consider, with what a measured hand, and with how true proportions, our law doth impart and confer the several degrees of this benefit. The degrees are four.

The first degree of persons, as to this purpose, that the law takes knowledge of, is an alien enemy; that is, such a one as is born under the obeisance of a prince or state that is in hostility with the king of England. To this person the law giveth no benefit or protection at all; but if he come into the realm after war proclaimed, or war in fact, he comes at his own peril, he may be used as an enemy: for the law accounts of him but, as the scripture saith, as of a spy that cometh to see the weakness of the land. And so it is in 2 Rich. 3, fol. 2. Nevertheless, this admitteth a distinction. For if he come with safe-conduct otherwise it is: for then he may not be violated, either in person or goods. But yet he must fetch his justice at the fountain-head, for none of the conduit pipes are open to him: he can have no remedy in any of the king's courts;

but he must complain himself before the king's privy counsel: there he shall have a proceeding summary from hour to hour, the cause shall be determined by natural equity, and not by rules of law; and the decrees of the counsel shall be executed by aid of the Chancery, as in 13 Ed. 4. And this is the first degree.

The second person is an alien friend, that is, such a one as is born under the obeisance of such a king or state as is confederate with the king of England, or at least not in war with him. To this person the law alloteth this benefit, that as the law accounts, that the hold it hath over him, is but a transitory hold, for he may be an enemy; so the law doth indue him but with a transitory benefit, that is, of moveable goods and personal actions. But for free-hold, or lease, or actions real or mixt, he is not enabled, except it be in autre droit. And so it is 9 Ed. 4. fol. 7. 19 Ed. 4. fol. 6. 5 Mar. and divers other books.

The third person is a denizen, using the word properly, for sometimes it is confounded with a natural born subject. This is one that is but subditus infitivus, or adoptivus, and is never by birth, but only by the king's charter, and by no other mean, come he never so young into the realm, or stay he never so long. Mansion or habitation will not indelize him, no, nor swearing obedience to the king in a leet, which doth in law the subject; but only, as I said, the king's grace and gift. To this person the law giveth an ability and capacity abridged, not in matter, but in time. And as there was a time when he was not subject, so the law doth not acknowledge him before that time. For if he purchase free-hold after his denization, he may take it; but if he have purchased any before, he shall not hold it: so if he have children after, they shall inherit; but if he have any before, they shall not inherit. So as he is but privileged à parte post, as the schoolmen say, and not à parte ante.

The fourth and last degree is a natural born subject, which is evermore by birth, or by act of parliament; and he is complete and entire. For in the law of England there is nil ultra, there is no more subdivision or more subtle division beyond these. And therein it seemeth to me, that the wisdom of the law, as I said, is to be admired both ways, both because it distinguisheth so far, and because it doth not distinguish farther. For I know that other laws do admit more curious distinction of this privilege: for the Romans had besides jus civitatis, which answereth to naturalization, jus suffragii. For although a man were naturalized to take lands and inheritance, yet he was not enabled to have a voice at passing of laws, or at election of officers. And yet farther they have jus petitionis, or jus honorum. For though a man had voice, yet he was not capable of honour and office. But these be the devices commonly of popular or free estates, which are jealous whom they take into their number, and are unfit for monarchies. But by the law of England the subject, that is natural born, hath a capacity or ability to all benefits whatsoever; I say capacity or ability: but to reduce potentiam in actum, is another case. For an earl of Ireland, though he be naturalized in England, yet hath no voice in the parliament of England, except he have either a call by writ, or creation by patent; but he is capable of either.

But upon this quadripartite division of the ability of persons, I do observe to your lordships three things, being all effectually pertinent to the question in hand.

The first is, that if any man conceive that the reasons for the Post-nati, might serve as well for the Ante-nati, he may by the distribution which we have made, plainly perceive his error. For the law looketh not back; and therefore cannot, by any matter ex post facto, after birth, alter the state of the birth; wherein no doubt the law hath a grave and profound reason; which is this, in few words, nemo subito fingitur; aliud est nasci, aliud fieri. We indeed more respect and affect those worthy gentlemen of Scotland, whose merits and conversation we know; but the law, that proceeds upon general reason, and looks upon no mens faces, affecteth and privilegeth those which drew their first-breath under the obeisance of the king of England.

The second point is, that by the former distribution it appeareth that there be but two conditions by birth, either alien, or natural born; nam tertium penitus ignoramus. It is manifest then, that if the Post-nati of Scotland be not natural born, they are alien born, and in no better degree at all than Flemings, French, Italians, Spanish, Germans, and others, which are all at this time alien friends, by reason his majesty is in peace with all the world!

The third point seemeth to me very worthy the consideration, which is, that in all the distributions of persons, and the degrees of abilities or capacities, the king's act is all in all, without any manner of respect to law or parliament. For it is the king that makes an alien enemy, by proclaiming a war, wherewith the law or parliament intermeddles not. So the king only grants safe-conducts, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king likewise that maketh an alien friend, by concluding a peace, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king that makes a denizen by his charter, absolutely of his prerogative and power, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. And therefore it is strongly to be inferred, that as all these degrees depend wholly upon the king's act, and no ways upon law or parliament; so the fourth although it comes not by the king's patent, but by operation of law, yet that the law, in that operation, respecteth only the king's person, without respect of subjection to law or parliament. And thus much by way of explanation and inducement; which being all matter in effect confessed, is the strongest ground-work to that which is contradicted or controverted.

There followeth the confutation of the arguments on the contrary side. That which hath been materially objected, may be reduced to four heads.

The first is, that the privilege of naturalization followeth allegiance, and that allegiance followeth the kingdom.

The second is drawn from that common ground, 'cum duo jura concurrunt in una persona, æquam est ac si essent in duobus;' a rule, the words whereof are taken from the civil law; but the matter of it is received in all laws; being a very line or rule of reason, to avoid confusion.

The third consisteth of certain inconveniences conceived to ensue of this general naturalization, ipso jure.

The fourth is not properly an objection, but a pre-occupation of an objection or proof on our part, by a distinction devised between countries devolute by descent, and acquired by conquest.

For the first, it is not amiss to observe that those who maintain this new opinion, whereof there is altum silentium in our books of law, are not well agreed in what form to utter and express that: for some said that allegiance hath respect to the law, some to the crown, some to the kingdom, some to the body politic of the king: so there is confusion of tongues amongst them, as it commonly cometh to pass in opinions that have their foundations in subtilty and imagination of man's wit, and not in the ground of nature. But to leave their words, and to come to their proofs: they endeavour to prove this conceit by three manner of proofs: first, by reason; then, by certain inferences out of statutes; and lastly, by certain book-cases, mentioning and reciting the forms of pleadings.

The reason they bring is this: that naturalization is an operation of the law of England; and so indeed it is, that may be the true genus of it.

Then they add, that granted, that the law of England is of force only within the kingdom and dominions of England, and cannot operate but where it is in force. But the law is not in force in Scotland, therefore that cannot endure this benefit of naturalization by a birth in Scotland.

This reason is plausible and sensible, but extremely erroneous. For the law of England, for matters of benefit or forfeitures in England, operateth over the world. And because it is truly said that 'respublica continetur pœna et præmio,' I will put a case or two of either.

It is plain that if a subject of England had conspired the death of the king in foreign parts, it was by the common law of England treason. How prove I that? By the statute of 35 H. 8, cap. 2; wherein you shall find no words at all of making any new case of treason which was not treason before, but only of ordaining a form of trial; ergo, it was treason before: and if so, then the law of England works in foreign parts. So of contempts, if the king send his privy seal to any subject beyond the seas, commaunding him to return, and he disobey, no man will doubt but there is a contempt, and yet the fact enduring the contempt was committed in foreign parts.

Therefore the law of England doth extend to acts or matters done in foreign parts. So of reward, privilege or benefit, we need seek no other instance than the instance in question; for I will put you a case that no man shall deny, where the law of England doth work and confer the benefit of naturalization upon a birth neither within the dominions of the kingdom, nor king of England. By the statute of 25 Ed. 3, which, if you will believe Hussey, is but a declaration of the common law, all children born in any parts of the world, if they be of English parents continuing at that time as liege subjects to the king, and having done no act to forfeit the benefit of their allegiance, are ipso facto naturalized. Nay, if a man look narrowly into the law in this point, he shall find a consequence that may seem at the first strange, but yet cannot be well avoided; which is, that if divers families of English men and women plant themselves at Middleborough, or at Roan, or at Lisbon, and have issue, and their descendants do intermarry amongst themselves, without any intermixture of foreign blood; such descendants are naturalized to all generations: for every generation is still of liege parents, and therefore naturalized: so as you may have whole tribes and lineages of English in foreign countries.

And therefore it is utterly untrue that the law of England cannot operate or confer naturalization, but only within the bounds of the dominions of England.

The first is out of this statute which I last recited. In which statute it is said, that in four several places there are, these words, 'born within the allegiance of England;' or again, 'born without the allegiance of England;' which, say they, applies the allegiance to the kingdom, and not to the person of the king. To this the answer is easy; for there is no trope of speech more familiar than to use the place of addition for the person. So we say commonly, the line of York, or the line of Lancaster, for the lines of the duke of York, or the duke of Lancaster. So we say the possessions of Somerset or Warwick, intending the possessions of the dukes of Somerset or earls of Warwick. So we see earls sign, Salisbury, Northampton, for the earls of Salisbury or Northampton. And in the very same manner the statute speaks, allegiance of England, for allegiance of the king of England. Nay more, if there had been no variety in the penning of that statute, this collection had had a little more force; for those words might have been thought to have been used of purpose and in propriety; but you may find in three other several places of the statute, allegiance and obedience of the king of England, and especially in the material and concluding place, that is to say, children whose parents were at the time of their birth at the faith and obeisance of the king of England. So that it is manifest by this indifferent and promiscuous use of both phrases, the one proper, the other improper, that no man can ground any inference upon these words, without danger of cavillation.

The second statute, out of which they infer, is a statute made in 32 Hen. 8, touching the policy of strangers tradesmen within this realm. For the parliament finding that they did eat the Englishmen out of trade, and that they entertained no apprentices but of their own nation, did prohibit that they should receive any apprentices but the king's subjects. In which statute is said, that in nine several places there is to be found this context of words, 'aliens born out of the king's obedience;' which is pregnant, say they, and doth imply that there be aliens born within the king's obedience. Touching this inference, I have heard it said, 'qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice;' but this is not worthy the name of cortex, it is but muscus corticis, the moss of the bark. For it is evident that the statute meant to speak clearly and without equivocation, and to a common understanding. Now then there are aliens in common reputation, and aliens in precise construction of law; the statute then meaning not to comprehend Irishmen, or Jersey men, or Calaisien, for explanation sake, lest the word alien might be extended to them in a vulgar acceptance, added those further words, 'born out of the king's obedience.' Nay, what if we should say, that those words, according to the received laws of speech, are no words of difference or limitation, but of declaration or description of an alien, as if it had been said with a videlicet, aliens; that is, such as are born out of the king's obedience? They cannot put us from that construction. But sure I am, if the bark make for them, the pith makes for us; for the privilege of liberty which the statute means to deny to aliens of entertaining apprentices, is denied to none born within the king's obedience, call them aliens or what you will. And therefore by their reason, a Post-natus of Scotland shall by that statute keep what stranger apprentices he will, and so is put in the degree of an English.

The third statute, out of which inference is made, is the statute of 14 E. 3. cap. solo, which hath been said to be our very case; and I am of that opinion too, but directly the other way. Therefore to open the scope and purpose of that statute: after that the title to the crown of France was devolute to king E. 3. and that he had changed his stile, changed his arms, changed his seal, as his majesty hath done, the subjects of England, saith the statute, conceived a fear that the realm of England might become subject to the realm of France, or to the king as king of France. And I will give you the reasons of the double fear, that it should become subject to the realm of France. They had this reason of fear. Normandy had conquered England; Normandy was feudal of France. Therefore because the superior seigniory of France was now united in right with the tenancy of Normandy, and that England, in regard of the conquest, might be taken as a perquisite to Normandy, they had probable reason to fear, that the kingdom of England might be drawn to be subject to the realm of France. The other fear that England might become subject to the king as king of France, grew no doubt of this foresight, that the kings of England might be like to make their mansion and seat of their estate in France, in regard of the climate, wealth, and glory of that kingdom; and thereby the kingdom of England might be governed by the king's mandates and precepts issuing as from the king of France. But they will say, whatsoever the occasion was, here you have the difference authorised of subjection to a king generally, and subjection to a king as king of a certain kingdom. But to this I give an answer three-fold.

First, it presseth not the question; for doth any man say that a Postnatus of Scotland is naturalized in England, because he is a subject of the king as king of England? No, but generally because he is the king's subject.

Secondly, the scope of this law is to make a distinction between crown and crown; but the scope of their argument is to make a difference between crown and person.

Lastly, this statute, as I said, is our very case retorted against them; for this is a direct statute of separation, which presupposeth, that the common law had made an union of the crowns in some degree, by virtue of the union in the king's person, if this statute had not been made to stop and cross the course of the common law in that point; as if Scotland now should be suitors to the king, that an act might pass to like effect, and upon like fear. And therefore if you will make good your distinction in this present case, shew us a statute for that. But I hope you can shew no statute of separation between England and Scotland. And if any man say that this was a statute declaratory of the common law, he doth not mark how that is penned: for after a kind of historical declaration in the preamble, that England was never subject to France, the body of the act is penned thus: "the king doth grant and establish;" which are words merely introductive nove legis, as if the king gave a charter of franchise, and did invest, by a donative, the subjects of England with a new privilege or exemption, which by the common law they had not.

To come now to the book-cases which they put; which I will couple together, because they receive one joint answer.

The first is 4 E. 3. fol. where the book saith, exception was taken, that the plaintiff was born in Scotland at Ross out of the allegiance of England.

The next is 22 H. 4. fol. 38. Adrian's case; where it pleaded, that a woman was born at Bruges out of the allegiance of England.

The third is 13 Eliz. Dyer, fol. 300. where the case begins thus: 'Dr. Story qui astorie

'dignoscitur esse subditus regni Angliæ.' In all these three, say they, that is pleaded, that the party is subject of the kingdom of England, and not of the king of England.

To these books I give this answer, that they be not the pleas at large, but the words of the reporter, who speaks compendiously and narratively, and not according to the solemn words of the pleading. If you find a case put, that it is pleaded a man was seised in fee-simple, you will not infer upon that, that the words of the pleading were in feodo simplici, but tibi et hæreditibus tuis. But shew me some precedent of a pleading at large of natus sub ligeantia regni Angliæ; for whereas Mr. Walter said that pleadings are variable in this point, he would fain bring it to that; but there is no such matter; for the pleadings are constant and uniform in this point. They may vary in the word fides or ligeantia, or obediencia, and some other circumstances. But in the form of regni and regis they vary not: neither can there, as I am persuaded, be any one instance shewed forth to the contrary. See 9 Eliz. 4 Baggot's Assize, fol. 7. where the pleading at large is entered in the book. There you have alienigena natus extra ligeantiam domini regis Angliæ. See the precedents in the book of Entries, pl. 7 and two other places; for there be no more: and there you shall find still sub ligeantia domini regis, or extra ligeantiam domini regis. And therefore the forms of pleading, which are things so reverend, and are indeed towards the reasons of the law, as palmæ and pugnis, containing the reason of the law, opened or unfolded, or displayed, they make all for us. And for the very words of reporters in books, you must acknowledge and say, ilicet obruimur numero. For you have 22 Ass. pl. 25. 27 Ass. the prior of Shells case, pl. 48. 14 H. 4. fol. 19. 5 H. 6. fol. 35. 6 H. 8 in my lord Dyer, fol. 2. In all these books, the very words of the reporters have 'the allegiance of the king,' and not, the allegiance of England. And the book in the 24 Edw. 3. which is your best book, although while it is tossed at the bar, you have sometimes the words 'allegiance of England,' yet when it comes to Thorp, chief justice, to give the rule, he saith, 'we will be certified by the roll, whether Scotland be within 'the allegiance of the king.' Nay, that farther form of pleading beateth down your opinion, that it sufficeth not to say that he is born out of the allegiance of the king, and stay there, but he must shew in the affirmative, under the allegiance of what king or state he was born. The reason whereof cannot be, because it may appear whether he be a friend or an enemy, for that in a real action is all one. Nor it cannot be because issue shall be taken thereupon; for the issue must arise on the other side upon indigena pleaded and traversed. And therefore it can have no other reason, but to apprise the court more certainly, that the country of the birth is none of those that are subject to the king.

As for the trial, that it should be impossible to be tried, I hold it not worth the answering; for the venire factus shall go either where the natural birth is laid, although it be but by fiction, or if it be laid according to the truth, it shall be tried where the action is brought, otherwise, you fall upon a main rock, that breaketh your argument in pieces; for how should the birth of an Irishman be tried, or of a Jerseyman? Nay, how should the birth of a subject be tried, that is born of English parents in Spain or Florence, or any part of the world? For to all these the like objection of trial may be made because they are within no counties: and this receives no answer. And therefore I will now pass on to the second main argument.

It is a rule of the civil law, say they, cum duo jura, &c. when two rights do meet in one person, there is no confusion of them, but they remain still in the eye of law distinct, as if they were in several persons: and they bring examples of one man, bishop of two sees, or one parson that is rector of two churches. They say this unity in the bishop or the rector doth not create any privity between the parishioners or dioceseners, more than if there were several bishops, or several parsons. This rule I allow, as was said, to be a rule not of the civil law only but of common reason, but receiveth no forced or coined but a true and sound distinction or limitation; which is, that it evermore faileth and deceiveth in cases where there is any vigour or operation of the natural person; for generally in corporations the natural body is but suffulcimentum corporis corporati, it is but as a stock to uphold and bear out the corporate body; but otherwise it is in the case of the crown, as shall be manifestly proved in due place. But to shew that this rule receiveth this distinction, I will put but two cases. The statute of 21 Hen. 8. ordaineth that a marquis may retain six chaplains qualified, a lord treasurer of England four, a privy-councillor three. The lord treasurer Paulet was marquis of Winchester, lord treasurer of England, and privy-councillor, all at once. The question was, whether he should qualify thirteen chaplains? Now by the rule cum duo jura he should; but adjudged, he should not. And the reason was because the attendance of chaplains concerned and respected his natural person; he had but one soul, though he had three offices. The other case which I will put is the case of homage. A man doth homage to his lord for a tenancy held of the manor of Dale: there descendeth unto him afterwards a tenancy held of the manor of Sale, which manor of Sale is likewise in the hands of the same lord. Now by the rule cum duo jura, he should do homage again; two tenancies and two seigniories, though but one tenant and one lord, aguum est ac si esset in duobus. But ruled that he should not do homage again. Nay in the case of the king he should not pay a second respect of homage, as upon grave and deliberate consideration it was resolved, 24 H. 8. and usus scaccarii, as there is said, accordingly. And the reason is no other, but because when a man is sworn to his lord, he cannot be sworn over again: he hath but one conscience, and the obligation of this oath trencheth between the natural person of the tenant and the natural person of the lord. And certainly the case of homage and tenure, and of homage liege, which is one case, are things of a near nature, save that the one is much inferior to the other: but it is good to behold these great matters of state in cases of lower element, as the eclipse of the sun is used to be in a pail of water.

The third main argument containeth certain supposed inconveniences, which may ensue of a general naturalization ipso jure, of which kind three have been specially remembered.—The first is the loss of profit to the king upon letters of denization and purchases of aliens.—The second is the concourse of Scotsmen into this kingdom, to the infeebling of that realm of Scotland in people, and the impoverishing of this realm of England in wealth.—The third is, that the reason of this case stayeth not within the compass of the present case; for although it were some reason that Scotsmen were naturalized, being people of the same island and language, yet the reason which we urge, which is, that they are subject to the same king, may be applied to persons every way more estranged from us than they are? as if in future time in the king's descendants, there should be a match with Spain, and the dominions of Spain should be united with the crown of England, by one reason, say they, all the West-Indies should be naturalized; which are people not only alterius soli but alterius celi.

To these conceits of inconvenience, how easy it is to give answer, and how weak they are in themselves, I think no man that doth attentively ponder them can doubt. For how small revenue can arise of such denizations; and how honourable were it for the king to take escheats of his subjects, as if they were foreigners, for seizure of aliens lands are in regard the king hath no hold or command of their persons and services: every one may perceive. And for the confluence of Scotsmen, I think, we all conceive the spring-tide is past at the king's first coming in. And yet we see very few families of them throughout the cities and boroughs of England. And for the naturalizing of the Indies, we can readily help that, when the case comes; for we can make an act of parliament of separation, if we like not their consort. But these being reasons politic, and not legal, and we are not now in parliament, but before a judgment-seat, I will not meddle with them, especially since I have one answer which avoids and confounds all their objections in law; which is that the very self-same objections do hold in countries purchased by conquest. For in subjects obtained by conquest, it were more profit to indenizate by the poll; in subjects obtained by conquest, they may come in too fast. And if king Henry 7 had accepted the offer of Christopher Columbus, whereby the crown of England had obtained the Indies by conquest or occupation, all the Indies had been naturalized by the confession of the adverse part. And therefore since it is confessed, that subjects obtained by conquest are naturalized, and that all these objections are common and indifferent, as well to case of conquest as case of descent, these objections are in themselves destroyed.

And therefore, to proceed now to overthrow that distinction of descent and conquest. Plato saith well, the strongest of all authorities is, if a man can alledge the authority of his adversary against himself. We do urge the confession of the other side, that they confessed the Irish are naturalized: that they confess the subjects of the isles of Jersey and Guernsey, and Berwick, to be naturalized; and the subjects of Calais and Tournay, when they were English, were naturalized; as you may find in the 5 Eliz. in Dyer, upon the question put to the judges by sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper.

To avoid this, they fly to a difference, which is new-coined, and is—I speak not to the disadvantage of the persons that use it, for they are driven to it tanquam ad ultimum refugium, but the difference itself—it is, I say, full of ignorance and error. And therefore, to take a view of the supports of this difference, they alledge four reasons.

The first is, that countries of conquest are made parcel of England, because they are acquired by the arms and treasure of England. To this I answer, that it were a very strange argument, that if I wax rich upon the manor of Dale, and upon the revenue thereof purchase a close by it, that it should make that parcel of the manor of Dale. But I will set this new learning on ground with a question or case put. For I oppose them that hold this opinion with this question, if the king should conquer any foreign country by an army compounded of Englishmen and Scotsmen, as it is like whensoever wars are so it will be, I demand, whether this country conquered shall be naturalized both in England and Scotland, because it was purchased by the joint arms of both? And, if yea, whether any man will think it reasonable, that such subjects be naturalized in both kingdoms: the one kingdom not being naturalized towards the other? These are the intricate consequences of conceits.

A second reason they alledge is, that countries won by conquest become subject to the laws of England, which countries patrimonial are not; and that the law doth draw the allegiance, and allegiance naturalization.

But to the major proposition of that argument, touching the dependency of allegiance upon law, somewhat hath been already spoken, and full answer shall be given when we come to it. But in this place it shall suffice to say, that the minor proposition is false: that is, that the laws of England are not superinduced upon any country by conquest; but that the old laws remain until the king by his proclamation or letters patent declare other laws; and then if he will he may declare laws which be utterly repugnant, and differing from the laws of England. And hereof many ancient precedents and records may be shewed, that the reason why Ireland is subject to the laws of England is not ipso jure upon conquest, but grew by a charter of king John; and that extended but to so much as was then in the kings possession; for there are records in the time of king E. 1, and 2, of divers particular grants to sundry subjects of Ireland and their heirs, that they might use and observe the laws of England.

The third reason is, that there is a politic necessity of intermixture of people in case of subjection by conquest, to remove alienations of mind, and to secure the state; which holdeth not in case of descent. Here I perceive Mr. Walter hath read somewhat in matter of state: and so have I likewise; though we may both quickly lose ourselves in causes of this nature. I find by the best opinions, that there be two means to assure and retain in obedience countries conquered, both very differing, almost in extremes, the one towards the other.

The one is by colonies, and intermixture of people, and transplantation of families, which Mr. Walter spoke of; and it was indeed the Roman manner; but this is like an old relic, much revered and almost never used. But the other, which is the modern manner, and almost wholly in practice and use, is by garrisons and citadels, and lists or companies of men of war, and other like matters of terror and bridle.

To the first of these, which is little used, it is true that naturalization doth conduce; but to the latter it is utterly opposite, as putting too great pride and means to do hurt in those that are meant to be kept short and low. And yet in the very first case, of the Roman proceeding, naturalization did never follow by conquest, during all the growth of the Roman empire; but was ever conferred by charters, or donations, sometimes to cities and towns, sometimes to particular persons, and sometimes to nations, until the time of Adrian the emperor, and the law in orbe Romano;* and that law or constitution is not referred to title of conquest and arms only, but to all other titles; as by the donation and testament of kings, by submission and dedition of states, or the like; so as this difference was as strange to them as to us. And certainly I suppose it will sound strangely in the hearing of foreign nations, that the law of England should ipso facto, naturalize subjects of conquests, and should not naturalize subjects which grow unto the king by descent; that is, that it should confer the benefit and privilege of naturalization upon such as cannot at the first but bear hatred and rancour to the state of England, and have had their hands in the blood of the subjects of England, and should deny the like benefit to those that are conjoined with them by a more amiable mean; and that the law of England should confer naturalization upon slaves and vassals, for people conquered are no better in the beginning, and should deny it to freemen: I say, it will be marvelled at abroad, of what complexion the laws of England be made, that breedeth such differences. But there is little danger of such scandals; for this is a difference that the law of England never knew.

* "The law here alluded to by lord Bacon is one, by which the emperor Antoninus Caracalla communicated the rights of a Roman citizen to the whole Roman empire. It is noticed in Justinian's Digest, lib. 1. tit. 5. l. 17, and in Novell. 79. c. 5. Antoninus Pius and other emperors have been named as authors of the law. But Heineccius, who is very full and satisfactory on the point, is clear in opinion, that this extension was first made by Caracalla. Heinecc. Syntagn. Append. lib. 1. s. 15." Hargrave.

The fourth reason of this difference is, that in case of conquest the territory united can never be separated again. But in case of descent, there is a possibility. If his majesty's line should fail, the kingdoms may sever again to their respective heirs; as in the case of 8 H. 6, where it is said, that if land descend to a man from the ancestor on the part of his father, and a rent issuing out of it from an ancestor on the part of the mother; if the party die without issue, the rent is revived. As to this reason, I know well the continuance of the king's line is no less dear to those that alledge the reason, than to us that confute it. So as I do not blame the pressing of the reason. But it is answered with no great difficulty. For first, the law doth never respect remote and foreign possibilities, as notably appeared in the great case between sir Hugh Cholmley and Houlford in the Exchequer, where one in the remainder, to the end to bridle tenant in tail from suffering a common recovery, granted his remainder to the king; and because he would be sure to have it out again without charge or trouble when his turn was served, he limited it to the king during the life of tenant in tail. Question grew, whether this grant of remainder were good, yea or no. And it was said to be frivolous and void, because it could never by any possibility execute, for tenant in tail cannot surrender; and if he died, the remainder likewise ceased. To which it was answered, that there was a possibility that it might execute, which was thus: put case, the tenant in tail should enter into religion, having no issue; then the remainder should execute, and the king should hold the land during the natural life of tenant in tail, notwithstanding his civil death. But the court una voce exploded this reason, and said, that monasteries were down, and entries into religion gone, and they must be up again ere this could be; and that the law did not respect such remote and foreign possibilities. And so we may hold this for the like: for I think we all hope, that neither of those days shall ever come, either for monasteries to be restored, or for the king's line to fail. But the true answer is, that the possibility subsequent, remote or not remote, doth not alter the operation of law for the present. For that should be, as if in case of the rent which you put, you should say, that in regard that the rent may be severed, it should be said to be in esse in the mean time, and should be grantable; which is clearly otherwise. And so in the principal case, if that should be, which God of his goodness forbid, 'cessante causa cessat effectus,' the benefit of naturalization for the time to come is dissolved. But that altereth not the operation of the law; 'rebus sic stantibus.' And therefore I conclude, that this difference is but a device full of weakness and ignorance; and that there is one and the same reason of naturalizing subjects by descent, and subjects by conquest: and that is the union in the person of the king; and therefore that the case of Scotland is as clear as that of Ireland, and they that grant the one cannot deny the other. And so I conclude the second part, touching confutation.

To proceed therefore to the proofs of our part, your lordships cannot but know many of them must be already spent in the answer which we have made to the objections. For 'corruptio unius, generatio alterius,' holds as well in arguments, as in nature: the destruction of an objection begets a proof. But nevertheless I will avoid all iteration, lest I should seem either to distract your memories, or to abuse your patience; but will hold myself only to these proofs which stand substantially of themselves, and are not intermixed with matter of confutation. I will therefore prove unto your lordships, that the Post-natus of Scotland is by the law of England natural, and ought so to be adjudged, by three courses of proof.—First, upon point of favour of law. Secondly, upon reasons and authorities of law. And lastly, upon former precedents and examples.

1. Favour of law. What mean I by that? The law is equal, and favoureth not. It is true, not persons; but things or matters it doth favour. Is it not a common principle, that the law favoureth three things, life, liberty, and dower! And what is the reason of this favour? This, because our law is grounded upon the law of nature. And these three things do flow from the law of nature, preservation of life natural; liberty, which every beast or bird seeketh and affecteth naturally; the society of man and wife, whereof dower is the reward natural. It is well, doth the law favour liberty so highly, as a man shall enfranchise his bondman when he thinketh not of it, by granting to him lands or goods; and is the reason of it 'quia natura omnes homines erant liberi;' and that servitude or villenage doth cross and abridge the law of nature? And doth not the self-same reason hold in the present case? For, my lords, by the law of nature all men in the world are naturalized one towards another; they were all made of one lump of earth, of one breath of God; they had the same common parents: nay, at the first they were, as the scripture sheweth, 'unus labii,' of one language, until the curse; which ence, thanks be to God, our present case is exempted from. It was civil and national laws that brought in these words and differences of 'civilis' and 'externis,' alien and native. And therefore because they tend to abridge the law of nature, the law favoureth not them, but takes them strictly; even as our law hath an excellent rule, that customs of towns and boroughs shall be taken and construed strictly and precisely, because they do abridge and derogate from the law of the land. So by the same reason all national laws whatsoever are to be taken strictly and hardly in any point wherein they abridge and derogate from the law of nature. Whereupon I conclude, that your lordships cannot judge the law for the other side, except the case be lucrararius. And if it appear to you but doubtful, as I think no man in his right senses but will yield it to be at least doubtful, then ought your lordships, under your correction be it spoken, to pronounce for us because of the favour of the law. Furthermore, as the law of England must favour naturalization as a branch of the law of nature, so it appears manifestly, that it doth favour it accordingly. For is it not such to make a subject naturalized? By the law of England, it should suffice, either place or parents. If he be born in England, it is no matter though his parents be Spaniards, or what you will. On the other side, if he be born of English parents, it skilth not though he be born in Spain, or in any other place of the world. In such sort doth the law of England open her lap, to receive in people to be naturalized: which indeed sheweth the wisdom and excellent composition of our law, and that it is the law of a warlike and magnanimous nation fit for empire. For look, and you shall find that such kind of estates have been ever liberal in point of naturalization: whereas merchant-like and envious estates have been otherwise.

For the reasons of law joined with authorities, I do first observe to your lordships, that our assertion or affirmation is simple and plain: that it sufficeth to naturalization, that there be one king, and that the party be 'natus ad fidem regis,' agreeable to the definition of Litteton, which is: alien is he which is born out of the allegiance of our lord the king. They of the other side speak of respects, and quando and quatenus, and such subtilities and distinctions. To maintain therefore our assertion, I will use three kinds of proofs. The first is, that allegiance cannot be applied to the law or kingdom, but to the person of the king; because the allegiance of the subject is more large and spacious, and hath a greater latitude and comprehension than the law or the kingdom. And therefore it cannot be a dependency of that without the which it may of itself subsist. The second proof which I will use is, that the natural body of the king hath an operation and influence into his body politic, as well as his body politic hath upon his body natural: and therefore, that although his body politic of king of England, and his body politic of king of Scotland, be several and distinct, yet nevertheless his natural person, which is one, hath an operation upon both, and createth a privity between them.—And the third proof is the binding text of five several statutes.

For the first of these, I shall make it manifest, that the allegiance is of a greater extent and dimension than laws or kingdom, and cannot consist by the laws merely; because it began before laws, it continueth after laws, and it is in vigour where laws are suspended and have not their force.

That it is more ancient than law, appeareth by that which was spoken in the beginning by way of inducement, where I did endeavour to demonstrate, that the original age of kingdoms was governed by natural equity, that kings were more ancient than lawgivers, that the first submissions were simple, and upon confidence to the person of kings, and that the allegiance of subjects to hereditary monarchies can no more be said to consist by laws, than the obedience of children to parents.

That allegiance continueth after laws, I will only put the case, which was remembered by two great judges in a great assembly, the one of them now with God: which was; that if a king of England should be expelled his kingdom, and some particular subjects should follow him in flight or exile in foreign parts, and any of them there should conceive his death; upon his recovery of his kingdom, such a subject might by the law of England be proceeded with for treason committed and perpetrated at what time he had no kingdom, and in place where the law did not bind.

That allegiance is in vigour and force where the power of law hath a cessation, appeareth notably in time of wars; for 'silent leges inter arma.' And yet the sovereignty and imperial power of the king is so far from being then extinguished or suspended, as contrariwise it is raised and made more absolute: for then he may proceed by his supreme authority and martial law, without observing formalities of the laws of his kingdom. And therefore whatsoever speaketh of laws, and the king's power by laws, and the subjects obedience or allegiance to laws, speak but of one half of the crown. For Bracton, out of Justinian, doth truly define the crown to consist of laws and arms, power civil and martial, with the latter whereof the law doth not intermeddle: so as where it is much spoken, that the subjects of England are under one law, and the subjects of Scotland are under another law, it is true at Edinburgh or Sterling, or again in London or York; but if Englishmen and Scot-men meet in an army royal before Calais, I hope, then they are under one law. So likewise not only in time of war, but in time of peregrination. If a king of England travel or pass through foreign territories, yet the allegiance of his subjects followeth him; as appeareth in that notable case which is reported in Fleta, where one of the train of king Edward I, as he passed through France from the Holy Land, imbezzeled some silver plate at Paris, and jurisdiction was demanded of this crime by the French king's counsel at law, 'ratione soli,' and demanded likewise by the officers of king Edward, 'ratione personæ:' and after much solemnity, contestation, and interpleading, it was ruled and determined for king Edward, and the party tried and judged before the knight marshal of the king's house, and hanged after the English law, and executed in St. Germain's meadows. And so much for the first proof.

For my second main proof, that is drawn from the true and legal distinction of the king's several capacities; for they that maintain the contrary opinion do in effect destroy the whole force of the king's natural capacity, as if it were drowned and swallowed up by his politic. And therefore I will first prove to your lordships, that his two capacities are in no sort confounded. And secondly, that as his capacity politic worketh so upon his natural person, as it makes it differ from all other the natural persons of his subjects; so e converso, his natural body worketh so upon his politic, as the corporation of the crown utterly differeth from all other corporations within the realm.

For the first, I will vouch you the very words which I find in that notable case of the Duchy, where the question was, whether the grants of king Edward 6th for duchy lands should be avoided in points of nonage. The case, as your lordships know well, is reported by Mr. Plowden as the general resolution of all the judges of England, and the king's learned counsel, Rouswell the solicitor only, excepted. There I find the said words, Comment. fol. 215. 'There is in the king not a body natural alone, nor a body politic alone, but a body natural and politic together: corpus corporatum in corpore naturali, et corpus naturale in corpore corporato.' The like I find in the great case of the lord Berkley set down by the same reporter, Comment. fol. 231. 'Though there be in the king two bodies, and that those two bodies are conjoined, yet are they by no means confounded the one by the other.'

Now then to see the mutual and reciprocal intercourse, as I may term it, or influence or communication of qualities, that these bodies have the one upon the other. The body politic of the crown induceth the natural person of the king with these perfections: that the king in law shall never be said to be within age; that his blood shall never be corrupted; and that if he were attainted before, the very assumption of the crown purgeth it; that the king shall not take but by matter of record, although he take in his natural capacity as upon a gift in tail; that his body in law shall be said to be as if it were immortal; for there is no death of the king in law, but a demise, as it is termed: with many other the like privileges and differences from other natural persons, too long to rehearse, the rather because the question laboureth not in that part. But on the contrary part let us see what operations the king's natural person hath upon his crown and body politic. Of which the chiefest and greatest is, that it causeth the crown to go by descent, which is a thing strange, and contrary to the course of all corporations, which evermore take in succession, and not by descent; for no man can show me in all the corporations of England, of what nature soever, whether they consist of one person, or of many, or whether they be temporal or ecclesiastical, any one takes to him, and his heirs, but all to him and his successors. And therefore here you may see what a weak course that is, to put cases of bishops and parsons, and the like, and to apply them to the crown. For the king takes to him and his heirs in the manner of a natural body, and the word, successors, is but superfluous; and where that is used, that is ever duly placed after the word, heirs, 'the king, his heirs, and successors.'

Again, no man can deny but 'uxor et filius sunt nomina naturæ.' A corporation can have no wife, nor a corporation can have no son. How is it then, that it is treason to compass the death of the queen or of the prince? There is no part of the body politic of the crown in either of them, but it is merely in the king. So likewise we find in the case of the lord Berkley, the question was, whether the statute of 25 H. 8. for that part which concerned queen Catherine Par's jointure, were a public act or no, of which the judges ought to take notice, not being pleaded; and judged a public act. So the like question came before your lordship, my lord chancellor, in serjeant Heule's case; whether the statute of 11 Edward 3. concerning the intailing of the dukedom of Cornwall to the prince, were a public act or no; and ruled likewise a public act. Why? No man can affirm but these be operations of law, proceeding from the dignity of the natural person of the king; for you shall never find, that another corporation whatsoever of a bishop, or master of a college, or mayor of London, worketh any thing in law upon the wife or son of the bishop or the mayor. And to conclude this point, and withal to come near to the case in question, I will shew you where the natural person of the king hath not only an operation in the case of his wife and children, but likewise in the case of his subject, which is the very question in hand. As for example, I put this case. Can a Scotsman, who is a subject to the natural person of the king, and not to the crown of England; can a Scotsman, I say, be an enemy by the law to the subjects of England? Or must he not of necessity, if he should invade England, be a rebel and no enemy, not only as to the king, but as to the subject? Or can any letters of mart or reprisal be granted against a Scotsman that shall spoil an Englishman's goods at sea? And certainly this case doth press exceeding near the principal case; for it proveth plainly, that the natural person of the king hath such a communication of qualities with his body politic, as it makes the subjects of either kingdom stand in another degree of privity one towards the other, than they did before. And so much for the second proof.

For the five acts of parliament which I spoke of, which are concluding to this question.—The first of them is that concerning the banishment of Hugh Spencer in the time of king E. 2; in which act there is contained the charge and accusation whereupon his exile proceeded. One article of which charge is set down in these words: 'Homage and oath of the subject is more by reason of the crown than by reason of the person of the king. So that if the king doth not guide himself by reason in right of the crown, his lieges are bound by their oath to the crown to remove the king.' By which act doth plainly appear the perilous consequence of this distinction concerning the person of the king and the crown. And yet I do acknowledge justly and ingeniously a great difference between that assertion and this, which is now maintained: for it is one thing to make things distinct, another thing to make them separable, 'aliud est distinctio, aliud separatio;' and therefore I assure myself, that those that now use and urge that distinction, do as firmly hold, that the subjection to the king's person and to the crown are inseparable, though distinct, as I do. And it is true that the poison of the opinion and assertion of Spencer is like the poison of a scorpion, more in the tail than in the body: for it is the inference that they make, which is, that the king may be deposed or removed, that is the treason and disloyalty of that opinion. But by your leave, the body is never a whit the more wholesome meat for having such a tail belonging to it. Therefore we see that is 'locus lubricus,' an opinion from which a man may easily slide into an absurdity. But upon this act of parliament I will only note one circumstance more, and so leave it, which may add authority unto it in the opinion of the wisest; and that is, that these Spencers were not ancient nobles or great patriots that were charged and prosecuted by upstarts and favourites: for then it might be said, that it was but the action of some flatterers, who use to extol the power of monarchs to be infinite. But it was contrary; a prosecution of those persons being favourites by the nobility; so as the nobility themselves, which seldom do subscribe to the opinion of an infinite power of monarchs, yet even they could not endure, but their blood did rise to hear that opinion, that subjection is owing to the crown rather than to the person of the king.

The second act of parliament, which determined this case, is the Act of Recognition in the first year of his majesty, wherein you shall find, that in two several places, the one in the preamble, the other in the body of the act, the parliament doth recognise, that these two realms of England and Scotland are under one imperial crown. The parliament doth not say under one monarchy or king which might refer to the person, but under one imperial crown, which cannot be applied but to the sovereign power of regiment comprehending both kingdoms. And the third act of parliament is the act made in the fourth year of his majesty's reign, for the abolition of hostile laws; wherein your lordships shall find likewise in two places, that the parliament doth acknowledge, that there is an union of these two kingdoms already begun in his majesty's person: so as by the declaration of that act, they have not only one king, but there is an union in inception in the kingdoms themselves.

These two are judgments in parliament by way of declaration of law, against which no man can speak. And certainly these are righteous and true judgments to be relied upon; not only for the authority of them, but for the verity of them; for to any that shall well and deeply weigh the effects of law upon this conjunction, it cannot but appear, that although partes integrals of the kingdom, as the philosophers speak, such as the laws, the officers, the parliament, are not yet commixed; yet nevertheless there is but one and the self-same fountain of sovereign power depending upon the ancient submission, whereof I spake in the beginning; and in that sense the crowns and the kingdoms are truly said to be united.

And the force of this truth is such, that a grave and learned gentleman, that defended the contrary opinion, did confess thus far: that in ancient times, when monarchies, as he said, were but heaps of people without any exact form of policy; that then naturalization and communication of privileges did follow the person of the monarch; but otherwise since states were reduced to a more exact form: so as thus far we did consent; but still I differ from him in this, that these more exact forms, wrought by time and custom and laws, are nevertheless still upon the first foundation, and do serve only to perfect and corroborate the force and bond of the first submission, and in no sort to disannul or destroy it.

And therefore with these two acts do I likewise couple the act of 14 Ed. 3, which hath been alledged of the other side. For by collating of that act with this former two, the truth of that we affirm will the more evidently appear, according unto the rule of reason: 'opposita juxta se posita magis elucescunt.' That act of 14 is an act of separation. These two acts formerly recited are acts tending to union. This act is an act that maketh a new law; it is by the words of grant and establish. These two acts declare the common law as it is, being by words of recognition and confession.—And therefore upon the difference of these laws you may substantially ground this position: that the common law of England, upon the adjunction of any kingdom unto the king of England, doth make some degree of union in the crowns and kingdoms themselves; except by a special act of parliament they be dissevered.

Lastly, the fifth act of parliament which I promised, is the act made in the 42 of E. 3, cap. 10. which is an express decision of the point in question. The words are, 'Item, (upon the petition put into parliament by the commons)

‘ that infants born beyond the seas in the seigniories of Calais, and elsewhere within the lands and seigniories that pertain to our sovereign lord the king beyond the seas, be as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England, it is accorded that the common law and the statute formerly made be holden.’

Upon this act I inter thus much; first, that such as the petition mentioneth were naturalized, the practice shews; then if so, it must be either by common law or statute, for so the words report: not by statute, for there is no other statute but 23 E. 3, and that extends to the case of birth out of the king's obedience, where the parents are English; ergo it was by the common law, for that only remains. And so by the declaration of this statute at the common law, ‘ all infants, born within the lands and seigniories (for I give you the very words again) that pertain to our sovereign lord the king, (it is not said, as are the dominions of England) are as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England.’ What can be more plain? and so I leave statutes and go to precedents; for though the one do bind more, yet the other sometimes doth satisfy more.

For precedents, in the producing and using of that kind of proof, of all others it behoveth them to be faithfully vouched; for the suppressing or keeping back of a circumstance, may change the case: and therefore I am determined to urge only such precedents, as are without all colour or scruple of exception or objection, even of those objections which I have, to my thinking, fully answered and confuted. This is now, by the providence of God, the fourth time that the line and kings of England have had dominions and seigniories united unto them as patrimonies, and by descent of blood; four unions, I say, there have been, inclusive with this last. The first was of Normandy, in the person of William, commonly called the Conqueror. The second was of Gascoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, in the person of H. 2; in his person, I say, though by several titles. The third was of the crown of France, in the person of E. 3. And the fourth of the kingdom of Scotland, in his majesty. Of these I will set aside such as by any cavillation can be excepted unto. First, I will set aside Normandy; because it will be said, that the difference of countries accruing by conquest, from countries annexed by descent, in matter of communication of privileges, holdeth both ways, as well of the part of the conquering kingdom, as the conquered; and therefore that although Normandy was not a conquest of England; yet England was a conquest of Normandy, and so a communication of privileges between them. Again, set aside France; for that it will be said that although the king had a title in blood and by descent, yet that title was executed and recovered by arms, so as it is a mixt title of conquest and descent, and therefore the precedent not so clear.

There remains then Gascoigne and Anjou, and that precedent likewise I will reduce and abridge to a time, to avoid all question. For it will be said of them also, that after they were lost and recovered in ore gladii, that the ancient title of blood was extinct; and that the king was in upon his new title by conquest. And Mr. Walter hath found a book-case in 13 H. 6. abridged by Mr. Fitz-Herbert, in title of Protection, placito 56, where a protection was cast, ‘ quia profecturus in Gasconiam’ with the earl of Huntingdon, and challenged because it was not a voyage royal; and the justices thereupon required the sight of the commission, which was brought before them, and purported power to pardon felonies and treason, power to coin money, and power to conquer them that resist: whereby Mr. Walter, finding the word conquest, collected that the king's title at that time was reputed to be by conquest. Wherein I may not omit to give obiter that answer which law and truth provide, namely, that when any king obtaineth by war a country whereunto he hath right by birth, that he is ever in upon his ancient right, not upon his purchase by conquest; and the reason is, that there is as well a judgment and recovery by war and arms, as by law and course of justice. For war is a tribunal-seat, wherein God giveth the judgment, and the trial is by battle or duel, as in the case of trial of private right: and then it follows, that whosoever cometh in by eviction, comes in his Remitter: so as there will be no difference in countries whereof the right cometh by descent, whether the possession be obtained peaceably or by war. But yet nevertheless, because I will utterly take away all manner of evasion and subterfuge, I will yet set apart that part of time, in and during the which the subjects of Gascoigne and Guienne might be thought to be subdued by a re-conquest. And therefore I will not meddle with the prior of Shelley's case, though it be an excellent case; because it was in the time of 27 E. 3; neither will I meddle with any cases, records, or precedents, in the time of king H. 5, or king H. 6, for the same reason; but will hold myself to a portion of time from the first uniting of these provinces in the time of king H. 2, until the time of king John, at what time those provinces were lost; and from that time again unto the seventeenth year of the reign of E. 2, at what time the statute of Prærogativa Regis was made, which altered the law in the point in hand.—That both in these times the subjects of Gascoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, were naturalized for inheritance in England by the laws of England, I shall manifestly prove; and the proof proceeds, as to the former time, which is our case, in a very high degree à minore ad majus, and as we say, à multo fortiori. For if this privilege of naturalization remained unto them when the countries were lost, and became subjects in possession to another king, much more did they enjoy it as long as they continued under the king's subjection.

Therefore to open the state of this point. After these provinces were, through the perturbations of the state in the unfortunate time of king John, lost and severed, the principal persons which did adhere unto the French, were attainted of treason, and their escheats here in England taken and seized. But the people, that could not resist the tempest when their heads and leaders were revolved, continued inheritable to their possessions in England; and reciprocally the people of England inherited and succeeded to their possessions in Gascoigne, and were both accounted 'ad fidem utriusque regis,' until the statute of Prærogativa Regis; wherein the wisdom and justice of the law of England is highly to be commended. For of this law there are two grounds of reason, the one of equity, the other of policy. That of equity was, because the common people were in no fault, but, as the scripture saith in a like case, 'qui fecerunt oves istas?' It was the cowardise and disloyalty of their governors that deserved punishment, but 'what had these shep done?' And therefore to have punished them, and deprived them of their lands and fortunes, had been unjust. That of policy was, because if the law had forthwith, upon the loss of the countries by an accident of time, pronounced the people for aliens, it had been a kind of accession of their right, and a disclaimer in them, and so a greater difficulty to recover them. And therefore we see the statute, which altered the law in this point, was made in the time of a weak king, that, as it seemed, despaired ever to recover his right, and therefore thought better to have a little present profit by escheats, than the continuance of his claim, and the countenance of his right, by the admitting of them to enjoy their inheritance as they did before.

The state therefore of this point being thus opened, it resteth to prove our assertion, that they were naturalized; for the clearing whereof I shall need but to read the authorities, they be so direct and pregnant. The first is the very text of the statute of Prærogativa Regis. 'Rex habebit escheatas de terris Normannorum, cujuscuque feodi fuerint, salvo servitio, quod pertinet ad capitales dominos feodi illius: et hoc similiter intelligendum est, si aliqua hereditas descendat alicui nato in partibus transmarinis, et cujus antecessores fuerint ad fidem regis Francie, ut tempore regis Johannis, et non ad fidem regis Angliæ, sicut contigit de baronia Montmetæ, &c.'—By which statute it appears plainly, that before the time of king John there was no colour of any escheat, because they were the king's subjects in possession, as Scotland now is; but only it determines the law from that time forward.—This statute, if it had in it any obscurity, it is taken away by two lights; the one placed before it, and the other placed after it; both authors of great credit, the one for ancient, the other for late times.—The former is Bracton, in his cap. de Exceptionibus, lib. 5. fol. 437. and his words are these: 'Est etiam et alia exceptio, quæ tenenti

'competit ex persona petentis, propter defectum nationis, quæ dilatoria est, et non perimit actionem; ut si quis alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Franciæ, et actionem instituat versus aliquem, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Angliæ, tali non respondeatur, saltem donec terræ fuerint communes.' By these words it appeareth, that after the loss of the provinces beyond the seas, the naturalization of the subjects of those provinces was in no sort extinguished, but only was in suspense during the time of war, and no longer; for he saith plainly, that the exception, which we call plea, to the person of an alien, was not peremptory, but only dilatory; that is to say, during the time of war, and until there were peace concluded, which he terms by the same words, 'donec terræ fuerint communes;' which, though the phrase seem somewhat obscure, is expounded by Bracton himself in his fourth book, fol. 237, to be of peace made and concluded, whereby the inhabitants of England and those provinces might enjoy the profits and fruits of their lands in either place 'communitery,' that is, respectively, or as well the one as the other. So as it is clear they were no aliens in right, but only interrupted and debarr'd of suits in the king's courts in time of war.

The authority after the statute is that of Mr. Stamford, the best expositor of a statute that hath been in our law; a man of reverend judgment and excellent order in his writings. His words are in his exposition upon the branch of the statute which we read before. 'By this branch it should appear, that at this time men of Normandy, Gascoigne, Guienne, Anjou, and Britain, were inheritable within this realm, as well as Englishmen; because that they were sometimes subjects to the kings of England, and under their dominion, until king John's time, as is afore-said: and yet after his time, those men, saving such whose lands were taken away for treason, were still inheritable within this realm till the making of this statute; and in the time of peace between the two kings of England and France, they were answerable within this realm, if they had brought any action for their lands and tenements.'

So as by these three authorities, every one so plainly pursuing the other, we conclude that the subjects of Gascoigne, Guienne, Anjou, and the rest, from their first union by descent, until the making of the statute of Prærogativa Regis, were inheritable in England, and to be answered in the king's courts in all actions, except it were in time of war. Nay more, which is de abundantia, that when the provinces were lost, and disannexed, and that the king was but king de jure over them, and not de facto, yet nevertheless the privilege of naturalization continued.

There resteth yet one objection, rather plausible to a popular understanding than any way forcible in law or learning, which is a difference taken between the kingdom of Scotland and these duchies; for that the one is a kingdom, and the other was not so; and therefore that those provinces, being of an inferior nature, did acknowledge our laws, and seals, and parliament, which the kingdom of Scotland doth not.—This difference was well given over by Mr. Walter; for it is plain that a kingdom and absolute dukedom, or any other sovereign estate, do differ honore, and not potestate: for divers duchies and countries, that are now, were sometimes kingdoms; and divers kingdoms, that are now, were sometimes duchies, or of other inferior stile: wherein we need not travel abroad, since we have in our own state so notorious an instance of the country of Ireland, whereof king H. 8, of late time was the first that writ himself king, the former stile being lord of Ireland, and no more; and yet kings had the same authority before, that they have had since, and the same nation the same marks of a sovereign state; as their parliaments, their arms, their coins, as they now have: so as this is too superficial an allegation to labour upon.—And if any do conceive that Gascoigne and Guienne were governed by the laws of England; first, that cannot be in reason; for it is a true ground, that wheresoever any prince's title unto any country is by law, he can never change the laws, for that they create his title: and therefore no doubt those duchies retained their own laws; which if they did, then they could not be subject to the laws of England. And next, again, the fact or practice was otherwise, as appeareth by all consent of story and record: for those duchies continued governed by the civil law, their trials by witnesses, and not by jury, their lands testamentary, and the like.

Now for the colours that some have endeavoured to give, that they should have been subordinate to the government of England; they were partly weak, and partly such as make strongly against them: for as to that, that writs of Habeas Corpus under the great seal of England have gone to Gascoigne, it is no manner of proof; for that the king's writs, which are mandatory, and not writs of ordinary justice, may go to his subjects into any foreign parts whatsoever, and under what seal it pleaseth him to use. And as to that, that some acts of parliament have been cited, wherein the parliaments of England have taken upon them to order matters of Gascoigne; if those statutes be well looked into, nothing doth more plainly convince the contrary; for they intermeddle with nothing but that that concerneth either the English subjects personally, or the territories of England locally, and never the subjects of Gascoigne. For look upon the statute of 27 E. 3. cap. 5. there it is said, that there shall be no forestalling of wines. But by whom? Only by English merchants; not a word of the subjects of Gascoigne; and yet no doubt they might be offenders in the same kind. So in the sixth chapter it is said, that all merchants Gascoignes may safely bring wines into what part it shall please them. Here now are the persons of Gascoignes. But then the place whither? Into the realm of England. And in the seventh chapter, that erects the ports of Bourdeaux and Bayonne for the staple towns of wine; the statute ordains, 'that if any,' but who? 'English merchant, or his servants, shall buy or bargain other where, his body shall be arrested by the steward of Gascoigne, or the constable of Bourdeaux.' True, for the officers of England could not catch him in Gascoigne. But what shall become of him, shall he be proceeded with within Gascoigne? No, but he shall be sent over into England into the Tower of London.—And this doth notably disclose the reason of that custom which some have sought to wrest the other way: that custom, I say, whereof a form doth yet remain, that in every parliament the king doth appoint certain committees in the upper-house to receive the petitions of Normandy, Guienne, and the rest; which, as by the former statute doth appear, could not be for the ordering of the governments there, but for the liberties and good usage of the subjects of those parts when they came hither; or vice versa, for the restraining of the abuses and misdemeanors of our subjects when they went thither.

Wherefore I am now at an end. For us to speak of the mischiefs, I hold it not fit for this place, lest we should seem to bend the laws to policy, and not to take them in their true and natural sense. It is enough that every man knows, that it is true of these two kingdoms, which a good father said of the churches of Christ: 'si inseparabiles insuperabiles.' Some things I may have forgot, and some things perhaps I may forget willingly; for I will not press any opinion or declaration of late time which may prejudice the liberty of this debate; but 'ex dictis, et ex non-dictis,' upon the whole matter I pray judgment for the plaintiff.

JAMES, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to the sheriff of Middlesex, greeting: Robert Calvin, gent. hath complained to us, that Richard Smith, and Nicholas Smith, unjustly, and without judgment, have disseised him of his freehold in Haggard, otherwise Haggerston, otherwise Aggerston, in the parish of St. Leonard, in Shoreditch, within 30 years now last past; and therefore we command you, that if the said Robert shall secure you to prosecute his claim, then that you cause the said tenement to be resealed with the chatelets, which within it were taken, and the said tenement with the chatelets, to be in peace until Thursday next after 15 days of St. Martin next coming; and in the mean time, cause 12 free and lawful men of that neighbourhood to view the said tenement, and the names of them to be inbreviated; and summon them by good summoners, that they be then before us wherever we shall then be in England, ready thereof to make recognition; and put by sureties, and safe pledges, the aforesaid Richard and Nicholas or their bailiffs (if they cannot be found,) that they be then there, to bear the recognition; and have there the summoners, the names of the pledges, and this writ. Witness ourself at Westminster, the 3d day of Nov. in the 5th year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the one and fortieth.—For 40s. paid in the Hanper, KINGSLEY.

Middlesex, ss.; The assise cometh to recognize, if Rich. Smith, and Nich. Smith unjustly, and without judgment, did disseise Rob. Calvin, gent. of his freehold in Haggard, otherwise Haggerston, otherwise Aggerston, in the parish of St. Leonard in Shoreditch, within 30 years now last past: and whereupon, the said Robert, who is within the age of 21 years, by John Parkinson and William Parkinson, his guardians, by the court of the said king here to this being jointly and severally specially admitted, complaineth; that they disseised him of one messuage with the appurtenances, &c. And the said Richard and Nicholas, by William Edwards, their attorney, come and say, that the said Robert ought not to be answered to his writ aforesaid, because they say, that the said Robert is an alien, born on the 5th day of Nov. in the 3d year of the reign of the king that now is, of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the 39th, at Edinburgh, within his kingdom of Scotland, aforesaid, and within the allegiance of the said lord the king of the said kingdom of Scotland, and out of the allegiance of the said lord the king of his kingdom of England; and at the time of the birth of the said Robert Calvin, and long before, and continually afterwards, the aforesaid kingdom of Scotland, by the proper rights, laws, and statutes of the same kingdom, and not by the rights, laws, or statutes of this kingdom of England, was and yet is ruled and governed. And this he is ready to verify, and thereupon prayeth judgment, if the said Robert, to his said writ aforesaid, ought to be answered, &c. And the aforesaid Robert Calvin saith, that the aforesaid plea, by the aforesaid Richard and Nicholas above pleaded, is insufficient in law, to bar him the said Robert from having an answer to his writ aforesaid; and that the said Robert, to the said plea in manner and form aforesaid pleaded, needeth not, nor by the law of the land is bound to answer; and this he is ready to verify, and bereof prayeth judgment; and that the said Richard and Nicholas, to the aforesaid writ of the said Robert, may answer. And the said Richard and Nicholas, forasmuch as they have above alledged sufficient matter in law to bar him the said Robert from having an answer, to his said writ, which they are ready to verify, which matter the aforesaid Robert doth not gainsay, nor to the same doth in any ways answer, but the said avnement altogether refuseth to admit as before; pray judgment, if the aforesaid Robert ought to be answered to his said writ, &c. And because the court of the lord the king, here, are not yet advised of giving their judgment of and upon the premises, day thereof is given to the parties aforesaid; before the lord the king at Westminster, until Monday next after 8 days of St. Hilary, to hear their judgment thereof, because the court of the lord the king here thereof are not yet, &c. And the assise aforesaid remains to be taken before the said lord the king, until the same Monday there, &c. And the sheriff to distrain the recognitors of the assise aforesaid; and in the interim to cause a view, &c. At which day, before the lord the king at Westminster, come as well the aforesaid R. Calvin, by his guardians aforesaid, as the aforesaid Rich. Smith and Nic. Smith, by their attorney aforesaid; and because the court of the lord the king here of giving their judgment of and upon the premises is not yet advised, day thereof is given to the parties aforesaid before the lord the king at Westminster, until Monday next after the morrow of the Ascension of our Lord, to hear their judgment; because the court of the lord

The Question.

The question of this case as to matter in law was, whether Robert Calvin the plaintiff, being born in Scotland since the crown of England descended to his majesty, be an alien born, and consequently disabled to bring any real or personal (a) action for any lands within the realm of England. After this case had been argued in the court of King's Bench, at the bar, by the counsel learned of either party, the judges of that court, upon conference and consideration of the weight and importance thereof, adjourned the same, according to the ancient and ordinary course and order of the law, into the (b) Exchequer-Chamber, to be argued openly there; first by the counsel learned of either party, and then by all the judges of England; where afterwards the case was argued by Bacon Solicitor General, on the part of the plaintiff, and by Laur. Hide, for the defendant; and afterward by Hohart Attorney General, for the plaintiff, and by Serjeant Hutton, for the defendant; and in Easter term last, the case was argued by Heron, puisne baron of the Exchequer, and Foster puisne judge of the court of Common Pleas; and on the second day appointed for this case, by Crook, puisne judge of the King's Bench, and Altham, baron of the Exchequer; the third day by Snigge, baron of the Exchequer, and Williams, one of the judges of the King's Bench; the fourth day by Daniel, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas, and by Yelverton, one of the judges of the King's Bench: and in Trinity term following, by Warburton, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Fenner, one of the judges of the king's Bench; and after by Walmesley, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield, chief baron; and at two several days in the same term, Coke, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Fleming, chief justice of the King's Bench, and sir Thomas Egerton, lord Ellesmere, lord chancellor of England, argued the case, the like plea in disability of Robert Calvin's person being pleaded mutatis mutandis in the Chancery in a suit there for evidence concerning lands of inheritance, and by the lord chancellor adjourned also into the Exchequer-Chamber, to the end that one rule might over-rule both the said cases.

And first, for that I intend to make as summary a report as I can, I will at the first set down such arguments and objections as were made and drawn out of this short record against the plaintiff, by those that argued for the defendants. It was observed, that in this plea there were four nouns quatuor nomina, which were called, nomina operativa; because from them all the said arguments and objections on the part of the defendants were drawn; that is to say, 1. Ligeantia (which is twice repeated in the plea, for it is said, 'infra ligeantiam domini regis regni sui Scot', et extra ligeantiam domini regis regni sui Angl.') 2. Regnum (which also appeareth to be twice mentioned, viz. 'regnum Angl.' and 'regnum Scot.') 3. Leges (which are twice alledged, viz. 'leges Angl.' and 'leges Scot.' two several and distinct laws.) 4. Alienigenia (which is the conclusion of all, viz. that Robert Calvin is 'alienigena.')

1. Ligeantia. By the first it appeareth, that the defendants do make two ligeances, one of England, and another of Scotland, and from these several ligeances two arguments were framed, which briefly may be concluded thus.

1. Whosoever is born 'infra ligeantiam,' within the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of Scotland, is 'alienigena,' an alien born, as to the kingdom of England; but Robert Calvin was born at Edinburgh, within the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of Scotland; therefore Robert Calvin is 'alienigena,' an alien born, as to the kingdom of England. 2. Whosoever is born 'extra ligeantiam,' out of the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of England, is an alien as to the kingdom of England; but the plaintiff was born out of the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of England; therefore the plaintiff is an alien, &c. Both these arguments are drawn from the very words of the plea, viz. 'quod præd Robertus est alienigena, natus 5 Nov. anno regni domini regis nunc Angl' &c. tertio apud Edinburgh infra regnum Scot', ac infra ligeantiam dicti domini regis dicti regni sui Scot', ac extra ligeantiam dicti domini regis regni sui Angl'.

2. Regna. From the several kingdoms, viz. 'regnum Angl' and 'regnum Scot', three arguments were drawn. 1. 'Quando (a) duo jura (imo dua regna) concurrunt in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diversis; but in the king's person there concur two distinct and several kingdoms; therefore it is all one as if they were in divers persons, and consequently the plaintiff is an alien, as all the Antenati are, for that they were born under the ligeance of another king. 2. Whatsoever is due to the king's several politic capacities of the several kingdoms is several and divided; but ligeance of each nation is due to the king's several politic capacities of the several kingdoms; ergo, the ligeance of each nation is several and divided, and consequently the plaintiff is an alien, for that they that are born under several ligeances are aliens one to another. 3. Where the king hath several kingdoms by several titles and descents, there also are the ligeances several; but the king hath these two kingdoms by several titles and descents; therefore the ligeances are several. These three arguments are collected also from the words of the plea before remembered.

3. Leges. From the several and distinct laws of either kingdom, they did reason thus.

1. Every subject, that is born out of the extent and reach of the laws of England, cannot by judgment of those laws be a natural subject to the king, in respect of his kingdom of England, but the plaintiff was born at Edinburgh, out of the extent and reach of the laws of England; therefore the plaintiff, by the judgment of the laws of England, cannot be a natural subject to the king, as of his kingdom of England. 2. That subject, that is not at the time and in the place of his birth inheritable to the laws of England; cannot be inheritable or partaker of the benefits and privileges given by the laws of England? but the plaintiff at the time, and in the place of his birth, was not inheritable to the laws of England, but only to the laws of Scotland; therefore he is not inheritable or to be partaker of the benefits or privileges of the laws of England. 3. Whatsoever appeareth to be out of the jurisdiction of the laws of England, cannot be tried by the same laws; but the plaintiff's birth at Edinburgh is out of the jurisdiction of the laws of England; therefore the same cannot be tried by the laws of England. Which three arguments were drawn from these words of the plea, viz. 'quodque tempore natiuitatis præd' Roberti Calvin, ac 'diu antea, et continuo postea, præd' regnum 'Scot' per jura, leges et statuta ejusdem regni 'propria, et non per jura, leges, seu statuta 'hujus regni Angl' regulat' et gubernat' fuit, et 'ad hoc est.'

4. Alienigena. From this word 'alienigena' they argued thus, every subject that is 'alien' gentis (i. e.) alien' ligeant', est alienigena; but such a one is the plaintiff; therefore, &c.

And to these nine arguments all that was spoken learnedly and at large by those that argued against the plaintiff may be reduced.

But it was resolved by the Lord Chancellor and twelve Judges, viz. the two Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, Justice Fenner, Warburton, Yelverton, Daniel, Williams, Baron Snigge, Baron Altham, Justice Croke, and Baron Heron, that the plaintiff was no alien, and consequently that he ought to be answered in this assize by the defendants.

This case was as elaborately, substantially, and judicially argued by the lord chancellor, and by my brethren the judges, as I ever read or heard of any; and so in mine opinion the weight and consequence of the cause, both 'in 'præsenti et perpetuis futuris temporibus' justly deserved; for though it was one of the shortest and least that ever we argued in this court, yet was it the longest and weightiest that ever was argued in any court, the shortest in syllables, and the longest in substance; the least for the value (and yet not tending to the right of that least) but the weightiest for the consequence, both for the present, and for all posterity. And therefore it was said, that those that had written de fossilibus did observe, that gold, hidden in the bowels of the earth, was in respect of the mass of the whole earth, paruum in magna; but of this short plea it might be truly said (which is more strange) that here was maximum in parvo.

And in the Arguments of those that argued for the plaintiff I specially noted, that albeit they spake according to their own heart, yet they spake not out of their own head and invention: wherein they followed the counsel given in God's Book, [Job. viii. 8.] 'interroga 'pristinam generationem' (for out of the old fields must come the new corn) 'et diligenter 'investiga patrum memoriam, and diligently search out the judgments of our forefathers, and that for divers reasons. First, on our own part, 'hesterni enim sumus et ignoramus, et 'vita nostra sicut umbra super terram;' for we are but of yesterday, (and therefore had need of the wisdom of those that were before us) and had been ignorant, if we had not received light and knowledge from our forefathers and our days upon the earth are but as a shadow, in respect of the old ancient days and times past, wherein the laws have been by the wisdom of the most excellent men, in many successions of ages, by long and continual experience, the trial of right and truth, fined and refined, which no one man, being of so short a time, albeit he had in his head the wisdom of all the men in the world, in any one age could ever have effected or attained unto. And therefore it is 'optima regula, qua nulla est 'verior aut firmior in jure, neminem oportet 'esse sapientiore[m] legibus;' [Co. Lit. 97. b.] no man ought to take upon him to be wiser than the laws. Secondly, in respect of our forefathers. 'Ipsi,' saith the text, 'docebunt 'te, et loquentur tibi, et ex corde suo proferent 'eloquia,' they shall teach thee, and tell thee, and shall utter the words of their heart, without all equivocation or mental reservation; they I say, that cannot be daunted with fear of any power above them, nor be dazzled with the applause of the popular about them, nor fretted with any discontentment, the matter of opposition and contradiction, within them, but shall speak the words of their heart, without all affection or infection whatsoever.

Also in their arguments of this cause concerning an alien, they told no strange histories, cited no foreign laws, produced no alien precedents; and that for two causes: the one, for that the laws of England are so copious in this point, as, God willing, by the report of this case shall appear; the other, lest their arguments, concerning an alien born, should become foreign, strange, and an alien to the state of the question, which, being questio juris concerning freehold and inheritance in England, is only to be decided by the laws of this realm.

And albeit I concurred with those that adjudged the plaintiff to be no alien, yet do I find a mere stranger in this case, such a one as the eye of the law, our books and book-cases, never saw, as the ears of the law (our reporters) never heard of, nor the mouth of the law, for 'judex est lex loquens,' the judges our forefathers of the law, never tasted: I say, such a one, as the stomach of the law, our exquisite and perfect records of pleadings, entries, and judgments, that make equal and true distribution of all cases in question, never digested. In a word, this little plea is a great stranger to the laws of England, as shall manifestly appear by the resolution of this case.

And now that I have taken upon me to make a report of their arguments, I ought to do the same as truly, fully, and sincerely as possibly I can; howbeit, seeing that almost every judge had in the course of his argument a peculiar method, and I must only hold myself to one, I shall give no just offence to any, if I challenge that which of right is due to every reporter, that is, to reduce the sum and effect of all to such a method, as, upon consideration had of all the arguments, the reporter himself thinketh to be fittest and clearest for the right understanding of the true reasons and causes of the judgment and resolution of the case in question.

In this case five things did fall into consideration. 1. Ligeantia. 2. Leyes. 3. Regna. 4. Alienigena. 5. What legal inconveniences would ensue on either side.

1. Concerning ligeance: 1. It was resolved what ligeance was. 2. How many kinds of ligeances there were. 3. Where ligeance was due. 4. To whom it was due. And last, how it was due.

2. For the laws: 1. That ligeance or obedience of the subject to the sovereign is due by the law of nature. 2. That this law of nature is part of the laws of England. 3. That the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law in the world. 4. That the law of nature is immutable, and cannot be changed.

3. As touching the kingdoms: how far forth by the act of law the union is already made, and wherein the kingdoms do yet remain separate and divided.

4. Of Alienigena, an alien born: 1. What an alien born is in law. 2. The division and diversity of aliens. 3. Incidents to every alien. 4. Authorities in law. 5. Demonstrative conclusions upon the premises, that the plaintiff can be no alien.

5. Upon due consideration had of the consequent of this case: what inconveniences legal should follow on either party.

And these several parts I will in this report pursue in such order as they have been propounded; and first de ligeantia.

1. (b) Ligeance is a true and faithful obedience of the subject due to his sovereign. This

(b) Bacon's Discourse of Laws and Government, 2d. part fo. 46, 47, &c. Co. Lit. 129. a. Grotius, lib. 2. fol. 160.

ligeance and obedience is an incident inseparable to every subject: for as soon as he is born, he oweth by birth-right ligeance and obedience to his sovereign. 'Ligeantia est vinculum fidei;' and 'ligeantia est quasi legis essentia. Ligeantia est ligamentum, quasi ligatio mentium; quia sicut ligamentum est connexio articularum et juncturarum, &c.'

As the ligatures or strings do knit together the joints of all the parts of the body, so doth ligeance join together the sovereign and all his subjects, quasi uno ligamine. Glanville, who wrote in the reign of H. 2. lib. 9. cap. 4. speaking of the connexion which ought to be between the lord and tenant that holdeth by homage, saith, that 'mutua debet esse domini et fidelitatis connexio, ita quod quantum debet domino ex homagio, tantum illi debet dominus ex dominio, præter solam reverentiam,' and the lord, saith he, ought to defend his tenant. But between the sovereign and the subject there is without comparison a higher and greater connexion; for as the subject oweth to the king his true and faithful ligeance and obedience, so the sovereign is to govern and protect his subjects, 'regere et protegere subditos suos;' so as between the sovereign and subject there is 'duplex et reciprocum ligamen; quia sicut subditus regi tenetur ad obedientiam, ita rex subdito tenetur ad protectionem; merito igitur ligeantia dicitur a ligando, quia continet in se duplex ligamen.' And therefore it is holden in 20 H. 7. 8. a. that there is a liege or ligeance between the king and the subject. And Fortescue, cap. 13, 'rex (c) ad tutelam legis corporum et bonorum subditorum erectus est.' And in the acts of parliament of 10 R. 2, cap. 5. and 11 R. 2, cap. 1; 14 H. 3, cap. 3, &c. subjects are called liege people; and in the acts of parliament in 34 H. 8, cap. 1, and 35 H. 8, cap. 3, &c. the king is called the liege lord of his subjects. And with this agreeth M. Skeene in his book De Expositione Verborum, (which book was cited by one of the judges which argued against the plaintiff) ligeance is the mutual bond and obligation between the king and his subjects, whereby subjects are called his liege subjects, because they are bound to obey and serve him; and he is called their liege lord, because he should maintain and defend them. Whereby it appeareth, that in this point the law of England and of Scotland is all one. Therefore it is truly said, that 'protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectio protectionem.' And hereby it plainly appeareth, that ligeance doth not begin by the oath in the leet; for many men owe true ligeance that never were sworn in a leet, and the swearing in a leet maketh no (d) denization, as the book is adjudged in 14 H. 4, fol. 19, b. This word ligeance is well expressed by divers several names or synonyma which we find in our books. Sometimes it is called the obedience or obeysauce of the subject to the king, 'obediencia regi,' 9 E. 4, 7. b. 9 E. 4. 6. (e) 2 R. 3, 2. a. in the book of Entries, 'ejectione firm' 7. 14 H. 8, cap. 2; 22 H. 8, cap. 8, &c. Sometimes he is called a natural liege man that is born under the power of the king, 'sub potestate regis,' 4 H. 3, (f) tit. Dower. Vide the stat. of 11 E. 3, c. 2. Sometimes ligeance is called faith, 'fides, ad fidem regis, &c.' Bracton, who wrote in the reign of H. 3, lib. 5, 'Tractat' de Exception' cap. 24, fol. 427. 'Est etiam alia exceptio quæ competit ex personâ querentis, propter defectum nationis, ut si quis alienigena qui fuit ad fidem regis Francie, &c.' And Fleta (which book was made in the reign of E. 1.) agreeth therewith; for l. 6, c. 47. De Except' ex Omissione Participis, it is said, 'vel dicere potuit, quod nihil juris clauare poterit tanquam participis, eo quod est ad fidem regis Francie; quia alienigenæ repelli debent in Angl' ab agendo, donec fuerint ad fidem reg' Angl'.' Vide 25 E. 3, De Natis Ultra Mare, faith and ligeance of the king of England; and Litt. lib. 2. cap. Homage, (a) 'saving the faith that I owe to our sovereign lord the king;' and Glanv. l. 9. c. 1, 'salva fide debita dom' regi et hæredibus suis.' Sometimes ligeance is called ligealty, 22 Ass. pl. 25. By all which it evidently appeareth, that they that are born under the obedience, power, faith, ligealty, or ligeance of the king, are natural subjects, and no aliens. So, as seeing now it doth appear what ligeance is, it followeth in order, that we speak of the several kinds of ligeance. But herein we need to be very wary, for this caveat the law giveth, 'ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus;' and certainly 'lex non distinguit,' but where 'omnia membra dividuntur' are to be found out and proved by the law itself.

2. There is found in the law four kinds of ligeances; the first is, 'ligeantia naturalis, absoluta, pura et indefinita;' and this originally is due by nature and birth-right, and is called 'alta ligeantia,' and he that oweth this is called 'subditus natus.' The second is called 'ligeantia acquisita,' not by nature but by acquisition or denization, being called a denizen, or rather donuizon, because he is 'subditus datus.' Co. Lit. 129. a. The third is 'ligeantia localis,' wrought by the law, and that is when an alien that is in amity cometh into England, because as long as he is within England, he is within the king's protection; therefore so long as he is here, he oweth unto the king a local obedience or ligeance, for that the one (as it hath been said) draweth the other. The fourth is a legal obedience, or ligeance which is called legal, because the municipal laws of this realm have prescribed the order and form of it; and this to be done upon oath at the torn or leet.

The first, that is, Ligeance Natural, &c. appeareth by the said acts of parliament, wherein the king is called natural liege lord, and his people natural liege subjects. [Co. Litt. 129 a.] This also doth appear in the indictments of treason (which of all other things are the most curiously and certainly indicted and penned) for in the indictment of the lord Dacre, in 26 H. 8, it is said, 'præd' dominus Dacre debitum fidei et ligeant' suæ, quod præfato domino regi naturaliter et de jure impensaere debuit, minime curans, &c.' And Reginald Pool was indicted in 30 H. 8, for committing treason 'contra dom' regem supremum et naturalem dominum suum.' And to this end were cited the indictment of Edward duke of Somerset in 5 E. 6, and many others both of ancient and later times. But in the indictment of treason of John Dethick in 2 and 3 Philip and Mary it is said, 'quod præd' Johannes machinans, &c. prædict' dominum Philippum et dominam Mariam supremos dominos suos,' and omitted 'naturales' because king Philip was not his natural liege lord. And of this point more shall be said when we speak of Local Obedience. The second is Ligeant' Acquisita, or denization; and this in the books and records of the law appeareth to be three-fold. [Co. Lit. 122, 2.] 1. Absolute, as the common denization be, to them and their heirs, without any limitation or restraint. 2. Limited, as when the king doth grant letters of denization to an alien, and to the heirs (b) males of his body, as it appeareth in 9 E. 4. fol. 7, 8, in Raggot's case; or to an alien for term of his life, as was granted to J. Revnel, 11 H. 6. 3. It may be granted upon (c) condition, for (d) 'cujus est dare, ejus est disponere,' whereof I have seen divers precedents. And this denization of an alien may be effected three manner of ways; by parliament, as it was in 3 H. 6. 55, in Dower; by letters patent, as the usual manner is; and by conquest, as if the king and his subjects should conquer another kingdom or dominion, as well Autenati as Postnati, as well they which fought in the field, as they which remained at home, for defence of their country, or employed elsewhere, are all denizens of the kingdom or dominion conquered. Of which point more shall be said hereafter.

3. Concerning the Local Obedience it is observable, that as there is a local protection on the king's part, so there is a (e) local ligeance of the subjects part. And this appeareth in 4 Mar. Br. 32. (f) and 3 and 4 Phil. and Mar. Dyer, 114. Sherley a Frenchman, being in amity with the king, came into England, and joined with divers subjects of this realm in treason against the king and queen, and the indictment concluded (g) 'contra ligeant' suæ debi'tum;' for he owed to the king a Local Obedience, that is, so long as he was within the king's protection; which Local Obedience being but momentary and uncertain, is yet strong enough to make a natural subject, for if he hath issue here, that issue is (h) a natural born subject; à fortiori, he that is born under the natural and absolute ligeance of the king, which, as it hath been said, is 'alta ligeantia,' as the plaintiff in the case in question was,

ought to be a natural born subject; for 'loca-
'lis ligeantia est ligeantia infima et minima, et
'maxime incerta.' And it is to be observed, that it is 'nec caelum, nec solum,' neither the climate nor the soil, but 'ligeantia' and 'obedientia' that make the subject born; for if enemies should come into the realm, and possess a town or fort, and have issue there, that issue is no subject to the king of England, though he be born upon his soil, and under his meridian, for that he was not born under the ligeance of a subject, nor under the protection of the king. And concerning this local obedience, a precedent was cited in Hilar. 36 Eliz.
when Stephano Ferrara de Gama, and Enua-nel Lewis Tinoco, two Portuguese born, coming into England under queen Elizabeth's safe conduct, and living here under her protection, joined with doctor Lopez in treason within this realm against her majesty; and in this case two points were resolved by the judges.
First, that their indictment ought to begin, that they intended treason 'contra dominum regi-
'nam, &c.' omitting these words 'naturalem
'domin' suam' and ought to conclude 'contra
'(i) ligeant' suæ debitum.' But if an (k) alien enemy come to invade this realm, and be taken in war, he cannot be indicted of treason; for the indictment cannot conclude 'contra ligeant' suæ debitum,' for he never was in the protection of the king, nor ever owed any manner of ligeance unto him, but malice and enimity, and therefore he shall be put to death by martial law. And so it was in anno 15 H. 7, (l) in Perkin Warbeck's case, who, being an alien born in Flanders, feigned himself to be one of the sons of Edward the 4th, and invaded this realm with great power, with an intent to take upon him the dignity royal; but being taken in the war, it was resolved by the justices, that he could not be punished by the common law, but before the constable and marshal (who had special commission under the great seal to hear and determine the same according to martial law) he had sentence to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, which was executed accordingly. And this appeareth in the book of Griffith attorney general, by an extract out of the book of Hobart, attorney-general to king H. 7.

4. Now are we to speak of Legal Ligeance, which in our books, viz. 7 E. 2, tit. Avowry, 211. 4 E. 3, fol. 42. 13 E. 3, tit. Avowry, 120, &c. is called Suit Royal, because that the lige-ance of the subject is only due unto the king.
This oath of ligeance appeareth in Britton, who wrote in anno 5 E. 1, cap. 29. (and is yet commonly in use to this day in every leet) and in our books; [Co. Lit. 68. b.] the effect whereof is: 'You shall swear, that from this day for'ward, you shall be true and faithful to our so'vereign lord king James, and his heirs, and
'truth and faith shall bear of life and member,
'and terreno honour, and you shall neither
'know nor hear of any ill or damage intended
'unto him, that you shall not defend. So help
'you Almighty God.' The substance and effect hereof is as hath been said due by the law of nature, 'ex institutione naturæ,' as hereafter shall appear. The form and addition of the oath is, 'ex provisione hominis' In this oath of ligeance five things were observed. 1. That for the time it is indefinite, and without limit,
'from this day forward.' 2. Two excellent qualities are required, that is, to be 'true and 'faithful.' 3. To whom, 'to our sovereign lord
'the king, and his heirs.' [Co. Lit. 68. b.] and albeit Britton doth say, to the king of England, that is spoken 'propter excellentiam,' to design the person, and not to confine the ligeance; for a subject doth not swear his ligeance to the king, only as king of England, and not to him as king of Scotland, or of Ireland, &c. but generally to the king. 4. In what manner; 'and 'faith and troth shall bear, &c. of life and mem'ber,' that is, until the letting out of the last drop of our dearest heart's blood. 5. Where and in what places ought these things to be done, in all places whatsoever; for, 'you shall
'neither know nor hear of any ill or damage,
'&c.' that you shall not defend, &c. so as natural ligeance is not circumscribed within any place. It is holden 12 H. 7, 18. b. that he, that is sworn in the leet, is sworn to the king for his ligeance, that is, to be true and faithful to the king; and if he be once sworn for his ligeance, he shall not be sworn again during his life. And all letters patent of denization be, that the patentee shall behave himself 'tanquam
'verus et fidelis ligeus domini regis.' And this oath of ligeance at the torn and leet was first instituted by king Arthur; for so I read, inter leges sancti Edwardi regis ante Conquestum, 3
cap. 35, [Co. Lit. 68. b.] 'Et quod omnes prin-
'cipes et comites, procures, milites et liberi
'homines debent jurare, &c. in Folkemote, et 'similiter omnes procures regni, et milites et
'liberi homines universi totius regni Britannæ
'facere debent in pleno Folkemote fidelitatem
'domino regi, &c. Hanc legem invenit Ar-
'tharus, qui quondam fuit inclytissimus rex Bri-

'nos occidit.' Vide Lambert inter leges regis Edwardi,* &c. fol. 135 and 136. [Co. Lit. 68. b. 179. b.] By this it appeareth, when and from whom this legal ligeance had his first institution within this realm. Ligeantia in the case in question is meant and intended of the first kind of ligeance, that is, of ligeance natural, absolute, &c. due by nature and birth-right. But if the plaintiff's father be made a denizen, and purchase lands in England to him and his heirs, and die seised, this land shall never descend to the plaintiff; [Co. Lit. 8. a. 129. a.] for that the king by his letters patent may make a denizen, but cannot naturalize him to all purposes, as an act of parliament may do; neither can letters patent make any inheritable in this case, that by the common law cannot inherit. And herewith agreeth 36 H. 6, tit. Denizen, Br. 9.

Homage in our book is two-fold, that is to say, 'homagium ligeum,' and that is as much as ligeance, of which Bracton speaketh, l. 2. c. 35. f. 79. 'Soli regi debet sive dominio seu seruitio,' and there is 'homagium feudale,' which hath his original by tenure. [Co. Lit. 68. b. Vaug. 279.] In Fit. Nat. Brev. 269, there is a writ for respiting of this later homage, which is due 'ratione feodi sive tenuræ: sciatis quod respectuamus homagium nobis de terr' et tenementis quæ tenenter de nobis in capite debet.' But 'homagium ligeum, i. ligeantia,' is inherent and inseparable, and cannot be respited.

3. Now are we come to (and almost past) the consideration of this circumstance, where natural ligeance should be due: for by that which hath been said, it appeareth that ligeance, and faith and truth, which are her members and parts, are qualities of the mind and soul of man, and cannot be circumscribed within the predicament of ubi; for that were to confound predicaments, and to go about to drive (an absurd and impossible thing) the predicament of quality into the predicament of ubi. 'Non respondetur ad hanc questionem, ubi est?' To say, 'verus et fidelis subditus est; sed ad hanc questionem, qualis est? Recte et apte respondetur, verus et fidelis ligeus, &c. est.' But yet for the greater illustration of the matter, the point was handled by itself, and that ligeance of the subject was of as great an extent and latitude, as the royal power and protection of the king, 'et è converso.' It appeareth by the stat. of 11 H. 7, cap. 1. and 2 E. 6, cap. 2. that the subjects of England are bound by their ligeance to go with the king, &c. in his wars, as well within the realm, &c. as without. And therefore we daily see that when either Ireland, or any other of his majesty's dominions, be infested with invasion or insurrection, the king of England sendeth his subjects out of England, and his subjects out of Scotland also into Ireland, for the withstanding or suppressing of the same, to the end his rebels may feel the swords of either nation. And so may his subjects of Guernsey, Jersey, Isle of Man, &c. be commanded to make their swords good against either rebel or enemy, as occasion shall be offered. Whereas if natural ligeance of the subjects of England should be local, that is, confined within the realm of England or Scotland, &c. then were not they bound to go out of the continent of the realm of England or Scotland, &c. [2 Inst. 47, 48, 528.] And the opinion of Thirninge in 7 H. 4. tit. Protect' 100, is thus to be understood, that an English subject is not compellable to go out of the realm without wages, according to the statutes of 1 E. 3, c. 7. 18 E. 3, c. 8. 18 H. 6, c. 19, &c. 7 H. 7, c. 1. 3 H. 8, c. 5. &c. [2 Inst. 528.] In ann. 25 E. 1, Bigot earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and earl marshal of England, and Bohun earl of Hereford and high constable of England, did exhibit a petition to the king in French (which I have seen anciently recorded) [Maynard's E. 2. fo.] on the behalf of the commons of England, concerning how and in what sort they were to be employed in his majesty's wars out of the realm of England; [2 Inst. 528.] and the record saith, that, 'post multas et varias altercationes,' it was resolved, they ought to go but in such manner and form as after was declared by the said statutes, which seem to be but declarative of the common law. And this doth plentifully and manifestly appear in our books, being truly and rightly understood. In 3 H. 6, tit. Protection 2, one had the benefit of a protection, for that he was sent into the king's wars 'in comitiva' of the protector; [Co. Lit. 130. b.] and it appeareth by the record, and by the chronicles also, that this employment was into France; [Co. Lit. 130. b.] the greatest part thereof then being under the king's actual obedience, so as the subjects of England were employed into France for the defence and safety thereof: in which case it was observed, that seeing the protector, who was Prorex, went, the same was adjudged a voyage royal, 8 H. 6. fol. 16. b. the lord Talbot went with a company of Englishmen into France, then also being for the greatest part under the actual obedience of the king, who had the benefit of their protections allowed unto them. [Fitz. protect. 5. Br. protect. 48.] And here were observed the words of the writ in the Register, fol. 88. where it appeareth that men were employed in the king's wars out of the realm 'per præceptum nostrum,' and the usual words of the writ of protection be 'in obsequio nostro,' [Fitz. protect. 13.] 32 H. 6. fol. 4. a. it appeareth, that Englishmen were pressed into Guyenne, [Fitz. protect. 35. Br. protect. 24.] 44 E. 3. 12. a. into Gascoyne with the duke of Lancaster, 17 H. 6. tit. Protection, into [Fitz. protect. 56.] Gascoyne with the earl of Huntingdon, steward of Guienne, 11 and 12 H. 4. 7. a. into (a) Ireland, and out of this realm with the duke of Gloucester and the lord Knolles: vide (b) 19

H. 6. 35. b. And it appeareth in 19 Ed. 2. tit. Avowry 224. 26 Ass. 66. 7 H. 4. 19, &c. that there was 'forinsecum servitium,' foreign service, which Bracton, fol. 36. calleth 'regale 'servitium;' and in Fitz. N. B. 28. that the king may send men to serve him in his wars beyond the sea. But thus much (if it be not in so plain a case too much) shall suffice for this point for the king's power, to command the service of his subjects in his wars out of the realm, whereupon it was concluded, that the ligeance of a natural-born subject was not local, and confined only to England. Now let us see what the law saith in time of peace, concerning the king's protection and power of command, as well without the realm, as within, that his subjects in all places may be protected from violence, and that justice may equally be administered to all his subjects.

And certainly this was, when Lyons in France (bordering upon Burgundy, an ancient friend to England) was under the actual obedience of H. 6. For the king commanded fidelib' suis, his faithful magistrates there, that if any injury were there done, it should be by them reformed and redressed, and that they should protect the party in his person and goods in peace. In the Register, fol. 26, two other writs. 'Rex omnibus seneschallis, majoribus, juratis, paribus prepositis, ballivis et fidelibus suis in ducatu Aquitanie ad quos, &c. salutem. In cujus, &c. per unum annum duratur’. T. &c.’ By all which it is manifest, that the protection and government of the king is general over all his dominions and kingdoms, as well in time of peace by justice, as in time of war by the sword, and that all be at his command, and under his obedience. Now seeing power and protection draweth ligenance, it followeth, that seeing the king’s power command and protection extendeth out of England, that ligenance cannot be local, or confined within the bounds thereof. He that is abjured the realm, ‘qui abjurat regnum amittit regnum, sed non regem, amittit patriam, sed non patriam.’ [Cawly 139.] for notwithstanding the abjuration, he oweth the king his ligenance, and he remaineth within the king’s protection; for the king may pardon and restore him to his country again. So seeing that ligenance is a quality of the mind, and not confined within any place; it followeth, that the plea, that doth confine the ligenance of the plaintiff to the kingdom of Scotland, ‘infra ligenantiam regis regni sui Scocie, et extra ligenantiam regis regni sui Anglie,’ whereby the defendants do make one local ligenance for the natural subjects of England, and another local ligenance for the natural subjects of Scotland, is utterly insufficient, and against the nature and quality of natural ligenance, as often it hath been said. And Coke, chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, cited a ruled case [Cobledike’s case, temp. E. 1. reported by Hingham.] out of Hingham’s Reports, temp. E. 1. which in his argument he shewed in court written in parchment, in an ancient band of that time. Constance de N. brought a writ of aveil against Roger de Cobledike, and others, named in the writ, and counted that from the seisin of Roger her grandfather it descended to Gilbert his son, and from Gilbert to Constance, as daughter and heir. [Ellesmere’s Postnati 91, 92.] ‘Sutton dit, sir, el ne doit este respondre, pur ceo que el est Francois et nient de la ligenance ne la foy Denglitterre, et demand judgement si el doit action aver:’ that is, ‘she is not to be answered, for that she is a French woman, and not of the ligenance, nor of the faith of England, and demanded judgement, if she this action ought to have.’ Beresford, then chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, by the rule of the court disalloweth the plea, for that it was too short, in that it referred ligenance and faith to England, and not to the king. And thereupon Sutton saith as followeth; ‘Sir, nous voulons averre, que el ne est my de la ligenance Denglitterre, ne a la foy le roy, et demand judgement, et si vous agardes que el doit este responde, nous dirromus assets:’ that is, ‘Sir, we will aver, that she is not of the ligenance of England, nor of the faith of the king, and demand judgment, &c.’ Which latter words of the plea, nor of the faith of the king, referred faith to the king indefinitely and generally, and restrained not the same to England, and thereupon the plea was allowed for good, according to the rule of the court: for the book saith, that afterward the plaintiff desired leave to depart from her writ. The rule of that case of Cobledike, did, as Coke chief justice said, ever-rule this case of Calvin, in the very point now in question; for that the plea in this case doth not refer faith or ligenance to the king indefinitely and generally, but limiteth and restraineth faith and ligenance to the kingdom, ‘extra ligenantiam regis regni sui Anglie,’ out of the ligenance of the king of his kingdom of England: which afterwards the lord chancellor and the chief justice of the King’s-bench, having copies of the said ancient report, affirmed in their arguments. So as this point was thus concluded, ‘quod ligenantia naturalis nullis eluustris coeretur, nullis metis refrænatur, nullis finibus prematur.’

4 & 5. By that which hath been said it appeareth that this ligenance is due only to the king; so as therein the question is not now, ‘cui, sed quomodo debetur.’ It is true, that the king hath two capacities in him: one a natural body, being descended of the blood royal of the realm; and this body is of the creation of Almighty God, and is subject to death, infirmity and such like: the other is a politick body or capacity, [1 Inst. 15. b. 16.] so called, because it is framed by the policy of man (and in 21 E. 4, 39. b. is called a mystical body;) and in this capacity the king is esteemed to be immortal, invisible, not subject to death, infirmity, infancy, (a) nonage, &c. Pl. Com. in the case of the lord Barkley 238. and in the case of the Duchy 213. 6 E. 3, 291. and 26 Ass. pl. 54. Now seeing the king hath but one person, and several capacities, and one politick capacity for the realm of England, and another for the realm of Scotland, it is necessary to be considered, to which capacity ligenance is due. And it was resolved, that it was due to the natural person of the king, which is ever accompanied with the politick capacity, and the politick capacity, as it were appropriated to the natural capacity, and it is not due to the politick capacity only, that is, to his crown or kingdom distinct from his natural capacity, and that for divers reasons. First, every subject, as it hath been affirmed by those that argued against the plaintiff, is presumed by law to be sworn to the king, which is to his natural person, and likewise the king is sworn to his subjects, (as it appeareth in Bracton lib. 3. De Actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107.) which oath he taketh in his natural person: for the politick capacity is invisible and immortal; nay, the politick body hath no soul, for it is framed by the policy of man. 2. In all indictments of treason, when any do intend or compass 'mortem et destructionem domini regis,' which must needs be understood of his natural body, for his politick body is immortal, and not subject to death, the indictment concludeth, 'contra (b) ligeantiam suam debitam;' ergo, the ligeance is due to the natural body. Vide Fitz. Justice of Peace 53. and Pl. Com. 384. in the earl of Leicester's case. 3. It is true, that the king in genere dieth not, but, no question, in individuo he dieth: as for example, H. 8, E. 6, &c. and queen Eliz. died, otherwise you should have many kings at once. In 2 and 3 Pl. and Mar. Dyer 128. (c) one Constable dispersed divers bills in the streets in the night, in which it was written, that king E. 6 was alive and in France, &c. and in Coleman-street, in London, he pointed to a young man, and said that he was king Edward 6. And this being spoken de individuo, and accompanied with other circumstances, was resolved to be high treason; for the which Constable was attainted and executed. 4. A (d) body politick, being invisible, can as a body politick neither make or take homage: Vide 33 H. 8, tit. Fealty, Brook 15. 5. In fide, in faith or ligeance, nothing ought to be feigned, but ought to be ex fide non ficta. 6. The king holdeth the kingdom of England by birth-right inherent, by descent from the blood royal, whereupon succession doth attend; and therefore it is usually said 'to the king, his heirs, and successors,' wherein heirs is first named, and successors is attendant upon heirs. And yet in our ancient books succession and successor are taken for hereditance and heirs. Bract. lib. 2. De Acquirendo Rerum Dominio, c. 29. 'Et sciend' est, quod hereditas est successio in univ'ersum jus quod defunctus antecessor habuit, ex causa quacunque acquisitionis vel successiois, et alibi affinitatis jure nulla successio permittitur.' But the title is by descent. By queen Elizabeth's death the crown and kingdom of England descended to his majesty, and he was fully and absolutely thereby king, without any essential ceremony or act to be done ex post facto: for coronation is but a royal ornament and solemnization of the royal descent, but no part of the title. In the first year of his majesty's reign, before his majesty's coronation, Watson (e) and Clerke, seminary priests, and others, were of opinion, that his majesty was no complete and absolute king before his coronation, but that coronation did add a confirmation and perfection to the descent; and therefore, observe their damnable and damned consequent, that they by strength and power might before his coronation take him and his royal issue into their possession, keep him prisoner in the Tower, remove such counsellors and great officers as pleased them, and constitute others in their places, &c. and that these and other acts of like nature could not be treason against his majesty, before he were a crowned king. But it was clearly resolved by all the judges of England, that presently by the descent his majesty was completely and absolutely king, without any essential ceremony or act to be done ex post facto; and that (f) coronation was but a royal ornament, and outward solemnization of the descent. And this appeareth evidently by infinite precedents and book-cases; as taking one example in a case so clear for all, Henry 6 was not crowned until the 8th year of his reign, and yet divers men before his coronation were attainted of treason, of felony, &c. and he was as absolute and complete a king, both for matters of judicature, as for grants, &c. before his coronation, as he was after, as it appeareth in the reports of the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th years of the same king. And the like might be produced for many other kings of this realm, which for brevity in a case so clear I omit. By which it manifestly appeareth, that by the laws of England there can be no interregnum* within the same. If the king be seised of land by a defeasible title, and dieth seised, this descent shall toll the entry of him that right hath, as it appeareth by 9 (g) E. 4. 51. But if the next king had it by succession, that should take away no entry, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 97. If a disseisor of an infant convey the land to the king who dieth seised, this descent taketh away the entry of the infant, as it is said in 34 H. 6. fol. 34. (h) 45. lib. Ass. pl. 6. Plow. Com. 234. where the case was; king H. 3 gave a manor to his brother the earl of Cornwall in tail, at what time the same was a fee-simple conditional, king H. 3 died, the earl before the statute of Donis Conditional', having no issue, by deed exchanged the manor with warranty for other lands in fee, and died without issue, and the warranty and assets descended upon his nephew king Ed. 1. and it was adjudged, that this warranty and assets, which descended upon the natural person of the king, barred him of the possibility of reverter. and the son, to cover the treason hatched in their hearts, invented this damnable and damned opinion, that homage and oath of ligeance was more by reason of the king's crown (that is, of his politic capacity) than by reason of the person of the king, upon which opinion they inferred execrable and detestable consequences. 1. If the king do not demean himself by reason in the right of his crown, his lieges be bound by oath to remove the king. 2. Seeing that the king could not be reformed by suit of law, that ought to be done by the sword.* 3. That his lieges be bound to govern in aid of him, and in default of him. All which were condemned by two parliaments; one in the reign of Edw. 2, called Exilium Hugonis le Senecr, and the other in ann. 1. Edw. 3. c. 1. Bracton, lib. 2. De Acquirendo Rerum Dominio, c. 24. f. 55, saith thus, 'est enim corona regis facere justitiam et julic', et tenere pacem, et sine quibus corona consistere non potest nec tene e. Huja-modi autem jura sive jurisdictionis ad personas vel tenementa transferri non poterunt, nec a privatâ personâ possideri, nec usus nec executio juris, nisi hoc datum fuit ei desuper, sicut jurisdictio delegata delegari non poterit quum ordinaria remaneat cum ipso rege.' Et lib. 3. De Actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107. 'separare autem debet rex, cum sit Dei vicarius in terra, jus ab injuria, æquum ab iniquo, et omnes sibi subjecti honeste vivant, et quod nullus alium ledat, et quod unicuique quod suum fuerit rectâ contributione reddatur.' In respect whereof one saith, that 'corona est quasi cor ornans, cujus ornamenta sunt misericordia et justitia.' And therefore a king's crown is an hieroglyphic of the laws, where justice, &c. is administered; for so saith P. Val. l. 41. p. 400. 'coronam dicimus legis judicium esse, propterea quod certis est vinculis complicata, quibus vita nostra veluti reigata coeretur.' Therefore if you take that which is signified by the crown, that is, to do justice and judgment, to maintain the peace of the land, &c. to separate right from wrong, and the good from the ill; that is to be understood of that capacity of the king, that 'in rei veritate' hath capacity, and is adorned and endued with endowments as well of the soul, as of the body, and thereby able to do justice and judgment according to right and equity, and to maintain the peace, &c. and to find out and discern the truth, and not of the invisible and immortal capacity that hath no such endowments; for of itself it hath neither soul nor body. And where divers books and acts of parliament speak of the ligeance of England, as 31 Edw. 3. tit. Cosinage 5. 42 Ed. 3. 2. 13 Edw. 3. tit. Brief 677. 25 Edw. 3. stat. De Natis Ultra Mare; all these and other speaking briefly in a vulgar manner, for (i) 'loquendum ut vulgus' and not pleading, for

'sentiendum ut docti,' are to be understood of the ligeance due by the people of England to the king; for no man will affirm, that England itself, taking it for the continent thereof, doth owe any ligeance or faith, or that any faith or ligeance should be due to it; but it manifestly appeareth, that the ligeance or faith of the subject is proprium quarto modo to the king, omni, soli, et semper. And oftentimes in the reports of our Look-cases, and in acts of parliament also, the crown or kingdom is taken for the king himself, as in Fitz. Natur. Brev. fol. 5. Tenure in capite is a tenure of the crown, and is a seigniorie in gross, that is of the person of the king; and so is 30 Hen. 8. Dyer fol. 44, 45, a tenure in chief, as of the crown, is merely a tenure of the person of the king, and therewith agreeth 28 Hen. 8. tit. Tenure, Br. 65. The statute of 4 Hen. 5. cap. ultimo, gave priors aliens, which were conventual to the king and his heirs, by which gift saith 34 Hen. 6. 34. the same were annexed to the crown. And in the said act of 25 Edw. 3. whereas it is said in the beginning, within the ligeance of England, it is twice afterward said in the same act, within the ligeance of the king, and yet all one ligeance due to the king. So in 42 Edw. 3. fol. 2. where it is first said, the ligeance of England, it is afterwards in the same case called, the ligeance of the king; wherein though they used several manner and phrases of speech, yet they intended one and the same ligeance. So in our usual commission of Assise, of Gaol-Delivery, of Oyer and Terminer, of the peace, &c. power is given to execute justice, 'secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nostri Angliæ'; and yet Littleton, lib. 2. in his chapter of Villenage, fol. 43. in disabbling of a man that is attaind in a Precognire, saith, that the same is the king's law; and so doth the Register in the writ of ad jura regia style the same.

The reasons and causes, wherefore by the policy of the law the king is a body politic, are three, viz. 1. Causa Majestatis, 2. Causa Necessitatis, and 3. Causa Utilitatis. First, Causa Majestatis, the king cannot give or take but by matter of record for the dignity of his person. Secondly, Causa Necessitatis, as to avoid the (k) strander of him that hath right to the crown, as it appeareth in 1 Hen. 7. 4. lest in the interim there should be an (l) interregnum, which the law will not suffer. Also by force of this politic capacity, though the (m) king be within age, yet may he make leases and other grants, and the same shall bind him; otherwise his revenue should decay, and the king should not be able to reward service, &c. Lastly,

Causa Utilitatis, as when lands and possessions descend from his collateral ancestors, being subjects, as from the earl of March, &c. to the king, now is the king seized of the same in jure coronæ, in his politic capacity; for which cause the same shall go with the crown; [Co. Lit. 15. b. See Treby's argument in the Quo Warranto.] and therefore, albeit queen Elizabeth was of the half-blood to queen Mary, yet she in her body politic enjoyed all those fee-simple lands, as by the law she ought, and no collateral cousin of the whole blood to queen Mary ought to have the same. And these are the causes wherefore by the policy of the law the king is made a body politic: so as for these special purposes the law makes him a body politic, immortal and invisible, whereunto our ligeance cannot appertain. But to conclude this point, our ligeance is to our natural liege sovereign, descended of the blood royal of the kings of this realm. And thus much of the first general part de ligeantia.

Now followeth the second part, de l-gibus, wherein these parts were considered: first, that the ligeance or faith of the subject is due unto the king by the law of nature: secondly, that the law of nature is part of the law of England: thirdly, that the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law: fourthly, that the law of nature is immutable.

The law of nature is that which God at the time of creation of the nature of man infused into his heart, for his preservation and direction; and this is lex æterna, the moral law, called also the law of nature. [Wing's Max. 1. Co. Lit. 11. b. post. 14. b.] And by this law, written with the finger of God in the heart of man, were the people of God a long time governed, before the law was written by Moses, who was the first reporter or writer of law in the world. The apostle in Romans c. ii. saith, 'cum enim gentes, quæ legem non habent, naturaliter ea quæ legis sunt faciunt.' And this is within that command of the moral law, 'honorare patrem,' which doubtless doth extend to him that is 'pater patriæ.' And the apostle saith, 'omnis anima potestatibus sublimioribus subdita sit.' And these be the words of the great divine, 'hoc Deus in sacris scripturis jubet, hoc lex naturæ dicat, ut quilibet subditus obediat superiori.' And Aristotle, nature's secretary, lib. 5. Æthic. saith, that 'jus naturale est, quod apud omnes homines eandem habet potentiam.' And herewith doth agree Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5. and Fortescue, cap. 8, 12, 13, and 16, Doctor and Student, cap. 2, and 4. [Justinian Inst. lib. 1. cap. 2.] And the reason hereof is, for that God and nature is one to all, and therefore the law of God and nature is one to all. By this law of nature is the faith, ligeance, and obedience of the subject due to his sovereign or superior. And Aristotle 1 Politicorum proveth, that to command and to obey is of nature, and that magistracy is of nature: for whatsoever is necessary and profitable for the preservation of the society of man is due by the law of nature; but magistracy and government are necessary and profitable for the preservation of the society of man; therefore magistracy and government are of nature. And herewith accordeth Tully, lib. 3. de Legibus, 'sine imperio nec domus ulla, nec civitas, nec gens, nec hominum universum genus stare, nec ipse denique mundus potest.' This law of nature, which indeed is the eternal law of the Creator, infused into the heart of the creature at the time of his creation, was 2,000 years before any laws written, and before any judicial or municipal laws. And certain it is, that before judicial or municipal laws were made, kings did decide causes according to natural equity, and were not tied to any rule or formality of law, but did 'dare jura.' And this appeareth by Forte-cue, cap. 12 and 13, and by Virgil that philosophical poet, 7 Æneid.

'Hoc Priami gest'imen erat, cum jura vocatis
'More daret populus.'

and 5th Æneid.

—Gaudet regno Trojanius Acestes
'Indicit pte forum et patribus dat jura vocatis.'

And Pomponius, lib. 2. cap. de Origine Juris, affirmeth, that in Tarquinius Superbus's time there was no civil law written, and that Papirius reduced certain observations into writing, which was called Jus Civile Papirianum. Now the reason wherefore laws were made and published, appeareth in Fortescue, cap. 13, and in Tully, lib. 2. Officiorum: 'at cum jus æquabile ab uno viro homines non consequerentur, inventi sunt leges.' Now it appeareth by demonstrative reason, that ligeance, faith, and obedience of the subject to the sovereign, was before any municipal or judicial laws. 1. For that government and subjection were long before any municipal or judicial laws. 2. For that it had been in vain to have prescribed laws to any, but to such as owed obedience, faith, and ligeance before, in respect whereof they were bound to obey and observe them: 'frustra enim ferantur leges nisi subditis et obedientibus.' Seeing then that faith, obedience, and ligeance, are due by the law of nature, it followeth that the same cannot be changed or taken away; for albeit judicial or municipal laws have inflicted and imposed in several places, or at several times, divers and several punishments and penalties, for breach or not observance of the law of nature, (for that law only consisteth in commanding or prohibiting, without any certain punishment or penalty) yet the very law of nature itself, never was nor could be (a) altered or changed. And therefore it is certainly true, that (b) 'jura naturalia sunt immutabilia.' And herewith agreeth Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5, and Doctor and Student, cap. 5 and 6. And this appeareth plainly and plentifully in our books.

ship to the king: but if a man hath the wardship of his own son or daughter, which is his heir apparent, and is outlawed, he doth not (c) forfeit this wardship; for nature hath annexed it to the person of the father, as it appeareth in 33 H. 6, 55. b. 'Et bonus rex nihil a bono patre differt; et patria dicitur a patre, quia habet communem patrem, qui est pater patriæ.' In the same manner, 'maris et feminae conjunctio est de jure naturæ,' as Bracton in the same book and chapter, and St. Germin in his book of the Doctor and Student, cap. 5, do hold. Now if he, that is attainted of treason or felony, be slain by one that hath no authority, or executed by him that hath authority, but pursueth not his warrant, in this case his eldest son can have no appeal, for he must bring his appeal as heir, which being ex provisione hominis, he loseth it by the attainer of his father; [Q.] but his (d) wife, if any he have, shall have an appeal, because she is to have her appeal as wife, which she remaineth notwithstanding the attainer, because 'maris et feminae conjunctio' is 'de jure naturæ,' and therefore (it being to be intended of true and right matrimony) is indissoluble; and this is proved by the book in 33 H. 6, 57. So if there be mother and daughter, and the daughter is attainted of felony, now cannot she be heir to her mother for the cause aforesaid; yet after her attainer, if she kill her mother, this is parricide and petit treason; for yet she remaineth her daughter, for that is of nature; and herewith agreeth 21 E. 3, 17. b. If a man be attainted of felony or treason, he hath lost the king's legal protection, for he is thereby utterly disabled to sue any action real or personal (which is a greater disability than an alien in league hath) and yet such a person so attainted hath not lost that protection which by the law of nature is given to the king, for that is 'indelebilis et immutabilis,' and therefore the king may protect and pardon him, and if any man kill him without warrant, he shall be punished by the law as a manslayer, and thereunto accordeth 4 Ed. 4, [Cawly 17. 3 Inst. 126.] and 55 H. 6, 57. 2 Ass. pl. 3. By the statute of 25 Ed. 3, cap. 22, a man attainted in a Præmunire, is by express words out of the king's protection generally; and yet this extendeth only to legal protection, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 43, for the parliament could not take away that protection which the law of nature giveth unto him; [Q.] and therefore notwithstanding that statute, the king may protect and pardon him. And though by that statute it was farther enacted, that it should be done with him as with an enemy, by which words any man might have slain such a person (as it is holden in 24 H. 8. tit. Coron. Br. 197.) until the statute made anno 5 Eliz. cap. 1, yet the king might protect and pardon him. [B. N. C. 53. Co. Lit. 130. a. 2. Bulstr. 299. Cawly 40, 47. Co. Lit. 128. b.] A man outlawed is out of the benefit of the municipal law; for so saith Fitz. N. B. 161. a. 'utlegatus est quasi extra legem positus;' and Bract. l. 3. Tract. 2. c. 11, saith, that 'caput gerit lupinum;' yet is he not out either of his natural ligeance, or of the king's natural protection; for neither of them is tied to municipal laws, but is due by the law of nature, which, as hath been said, was long before any judicial or municipal laws. And therefore if a man were outlawed for felony, yet was he within the king's natural protection, for no man but the sheriff could execute him, as it is adjudged in 2 lib. Ass. pl. 3. [Br. Corone 67.] Every subject is by his natural ligeance bound to obey and serve his sovereign, &c. It is enacted by the parliament of 23 H. 6, c. 8, that no man shall serve the king as sheriff of any county above one year, and that, notwithstanding any clause of non obstante to the contrary, that is to say, notwithstanding that the king should expressly dispense with the said statute. [Plowd. 502. b. 2 H. 7. 6. b. Br. patents 109. 12 Co. 18.] Howbeit it is agreed in 2 H. 7, that against the express purview of that act, the king may by a special non obstante dispense with that act, for that the act could not bar the king of the service of his subject, which the law of nature did give unto him. By these and many other cases that might be cited out of our books, it appeareth, how plentiful the authorities of our laws be in this matter (dd). Wherefore to conclude this point (and to exclude all that hath been or could be objected against it) if the obedience and ligeance of the subject to his sovereign be due by the law of nature, if that law be parcel of the laws, as well of England as of all other nations, and is immutable, and that Postnati [i. e. of Scotland,] and we of England are united by birth-right in obedience and ligeance, which is the true cause of natural subjection, by the law of nature [Q.]; it followeth, that Calvin the plaintiff being born under one ligeance to one king, cannot be an alien born. And there is great reason, that the law of nature should direct this case, wherein five natural operations are remarkable: 1. the king hath the crown of England by birth-right, being naturally procreated of the blood royal of this realm: 2. Calvin the plaintiff naturalized by procreation and birth-right, since the descent of the crown of England; 3. ligeance and obedience of the subject to the sovereign, due by the law of nature: 4. protection and government due by the law of nature: 5. this case, in the opinion of divers, was more doubtful in the beginning, but the further it proceeded, the clearer and stronger it grew; and therefore the doubt grew from some violent passion, and not from any reason grounded upon the law of nature, 'quia quanto magis violentus motus, qui fit contra naturam, appropinquat ad suum finem, tanto debiliores et tardiores sunt ejus motus; sed naturalis motus, quanto magis appropinquat ad suum finem, tanto fortiores et velociores sunt ejus motus.' Hereby it appeareth how weak the objection grounded upon the rule of (e) 'quando duo jura concurrunt in unâ personâ, &c.' is: for that rule holdeth not in personal things, that is when two persons are necessarily and inevitably required by law, as in the case of an alien born there is; and therefore no man will say, that now the king of England can make war or league with the king of Scotland, 'et sic de cæteris': and so in case of an alien born, you must of necessity have two several ligeances to two several persons. And to conclude this point concerning laws, 'non adversatur diversitas regnor' sed regnant'; non patriarum, sed patrum patriar'; non coronarum, sed coronatorum; non legum municipalium, sed regnum majestatum.' And therefore thus were directly and clearly answered as well the objections drawn from the severalty of the kingdoms, seeing there is but one head of both, and the Postnati and us joined in ligeance to that one head, which is 'copula et tanquam oculus' of this case; as also the distinction of the laws, seeing that ligeance of the subjects of both kingdoms, is due to their sovereign by one law, and that is the law of nature.

For the third, it is first to be understood, that as the law hath wrought four unions, so the law doth still make four separations. The first union is of both kingdoms under one natural liege sovereign king, and so acknowledged by the act of parliament of recognition. The 2nd is an union of ligeance and obedience of the subjects of both kingdoms, due by the law of nature to their sovereign: and this union doth suffice to rule and over-rule the case in question; and this in substance is but a uniting of the hearts of the subjects of both kingdoms one to another, under one head and sovereign. The 3rd union is an union of protection of both kingdoms, equally belonging to the subjects of either of them: and therefore the two first arguments or objections drawn from two supposed several ligeances were fallacious, for they did disjungere conjungenda. The 4th union and conjunction is of the three lions of England and that one of Scotland united and quartered in one escutcheon.

1. England and Scotland remain several and distinct kingdoms. 2. They are governed by several judicial or municipal laws. 3. They have several distinct and separate parliaments. 4. Each kingdom hath several nobilities: for albeit a Postnatus in Scotland, or any of his posterity, be the heir of a nobleman of Scotland, and by his birth is legitimated in England, yet he is none of the (a) peers or nobility of England; for his natural ligeance and obedience, due by the law of nature, maketh him a subject and no alien within England: but that subjection maketh him not noble within England, for that nobility had his original by the king's creation, and not of nature. And this is manifested by express authorities, grounded upon excellent reasons in our books. If a baron, viscount, earl, marquis, or duke of England, bring any action real or personal, and the defendant pleadeth in abatement of the writ, that he is no baron, viscount, earl, &c. and thereupon the demandant or plaintiff taketh issue; this issue shall not be tried by jury, but by the (b) record of parliament, whether he or his ancestor, whose heir he is, were called to serve there as a peer, and one of the nobility of the realm. And so are our books adjudged in 22 Ass. 24. 48 Edw. 3. 30. 35 H. 6. 40. 20 Eliz. Dyer 360. Vide in the sixth part of my Reports, in the countess of Rutland's case. So as the man, that is not de jure a peer, or one of the nobility, to serve in the upper house of the parliament of England, is not in the legal proceedings of law accounted noble within England. And therefore if a countess of France or Spain or any other foreign kingdom, should come into England, he should not here sue, or be sued by the name of countess, &c. for that he is none of the nobles that are members of the upper house of the parliament of England; and herewith agree the book-cases of (c) 30 Ed. 4. 6. a. b. and 11 Ed. 3. tit. Bre. 473, like law it is, and for the same reason, of an earl or baron of Ireland, he is not any peer, or of the nobility of this realm; and herewith agreeth the book in 8 R. 2. tit. (d) Proces. pl. ultim. where in an action of debt process of outlawry was awarded against the earl of Ormond in Ireland; which ought not to have been, if he had been noble here. Vide Dyer (e) 20 Eliz. 360.

But yet there is a diversity in our books worthy of observation, for the highest and lowest dignities are universal; for if a king of a foreign nation come into England, by the leave of the king of this realm, as it ought to be, in this case he shall sue and be sued by the name of a king; and herewith agreeth 11 E. 3. tit. Br. (f) 473, where the case was, that Alice, which was the wife of R. de O. brought a writ of dower against John earl of Richmond, and the writ was 'præcip. Johann. comiti Richmondis cus-todi terr' et hæredis' of William the son of R. de O. the tenant pleaded that he is duke of Britain, not named duke, judgment of the writ? But it is ruled, that the writ was good, for that the dukedom of Britain was not within the realm of England. But there it is said, that if a man bring a writ against Edward (g) Baliol, and name him not king of Scotland, the writ shall abate for the cause aforesaid. And hereof there is a notable precedent in Fleta, lib. 2. cap. 3. § 9. where treating of the jurisdiction of the king's court of Marshalsea, it is said, 'et hæc omnia ex officio suo licite facere poterit (ss. seneschal' aul' hospitii regis) non obstante alicujus libertate, etiam in alieno regno, dum tamen reus in hospitio regis poterit inveniri; secundum quod contigit Paris. anno 14 Ed. 1. de Engelramo de Nogent capto in hospitio regis Angl', ipso rege tunc apud Parisiam existente, cum discis argenti furatis recenser super facto, rege Franc' tunc presente; et unde licet curia regis Franc' de præd' latone per castellanum Paris. petita fuerit, habitis et inde tractatibus in consilio regis Franc', tandem consideratum fuit, quod rex Angl' illa regia prærogativa, et hospitii sui privilegio uteretur, et gauderet; qui, coram Roberto Fitz-John milite tunc hospitii regis Angl' seneschallo de latrocinio convictus, per considerationem ejus cor' fuit (h) suspensus in patibulo sancti Germani de pratis.' Which proveth that though the king be in a foreign kingdom, yet he is judged in law a king there. The other part of the said diversity is proved by the book-case in 20 (i) E. 4, fol. 6. a. b. where in a writ of debt brought by sir J. Douglas, knight, against Elizabeth Molford, the defendant demanded judgment of the writ, for that the plaintiff was an earl of Scotland, but not of England; and that our sovereign lord the king had granted unto him safe conduct, not named by his name of dignity, judgment of the writ, &c. And there justice Littleton giveth the rule. The plaintiff, saith he, is an earl in Scotland, but not in England; and if our sovereign lord the king grant to a duke of France a safe conduct to merchandize, and enter into his realm, if the duke cometh and bringeth merchandize into this land, and is to sue an action here, he ought not to name himself duke, for he is not a duke in this land, but only in France. And these be the very words of that book-case; out of which I collect three things. First, that the plaintiff was named by the name of a knight, wheresoever he received that degree of dignity. Vide (k) 7 H. 6, 14 b. accord. 2. That an earl of another kingdom or nation is no earl, to be so named in legal proceedings, within this realm: and herewith agreeth the book of (l) 11 Ed. 3, the earl of Richmond's case before recited. 3. That albeit the king by his letters patent of safe conduct do name him duke, yet that appellation mak-eth him no duke, to sue or to be sued by that name within England: so as the law in these points, apparent in our books, being observed, and rightly understood, it appeareth how causeless their fear was, that the adjudging of the plaintiff to be no alien should make a confusion of the nobilities of either kingdom.

Now are we in order come to the fourth noun (which is the fourth general part) Alienigena; wherein six things did fall into consideration. 1. Who was Alienigena, an alien born by the laws of England. 2. How many kinds of aliens born there were. 3. What incidents belonged to an alien born. 4. The reason why an alien is not capable of inheritance or freehold within England. 5. Examples, resolutions, and judgments reported in our books in all successions of ages, proving the plaintiff to be no alien. 6. Demonstrative conclusions upon the premises, approving the same.

1. An alien is a subject that is born out of the ligeance of the king, and under the ligeance of another, and can have no real or personal action for or concerning land; but in every such action the tenant or defendant may plead, that he was born in such a country which is not within the ligeance of the king, and demand judgment if he shall be answered. And this is in effect the description which Lit. himself maketh, lib. 2. cap. 14. [Co. Lit. 128. b. 129, a. 4. Inst. 152. Lit. sect. 198.] Villeu. fol. 43. 'Alienigena est aliena: gentis seu aliena: lineage, qui etiam dicitur peregrinus, alienus, exoticus, extraneus, &c. Extraneus est subditus, qui extra terram, i. e. potestatem regis, natus est.' And the usual and right pleading of an alien born doth lively and truly describe and express what he is. And therein two things are to be observed. First, that the most usual and best pleading in this case is both exclusive and inclusive, viz. 'extra ligeantiam domini regis, &c. et infra ligeantiam alterius regis,' as it appeareth in (m) 9 Ed. 4, 7. b. Book of Entries, fol. 244, &c. which cannot possibly be pleaded in this case for two causes. 1. For that one king is sovereign of both kingdoms. 2. One ligeance is due by both to one sovereign, and in case of an alien there must of necessity be several kings and several ligeances. Secondly, no pleading was ever 'extra regnum,' or 'extra legem,' which are circumscribed to place; but 'extraligeantiam,' which (as it hath been said) is not local or tied to any place.

It appeareth by Bracton, lib. 3. tract. 2 c. 15. fol. 134, that (n) Canutus the Danish king, having settled himself in this kingdom in peace, kept notwithstanding (for the better continuance thereof) great armies within this realm. The peers and nobles of England distasting this government by arms and armies, 'odimus accipitrem quia semper vivit in armis,' wisely and politely persuaded the king, that they would provide for the safety of him and his people, and yet his armies carrying with them many inconveniences should be withdrawn; and therefore offered, that they would consent to a law, that whosoever should kill an alien, and be apprehended, and could not acquit himself, he should be subject to justice: but if the manslayer fled, and could not be taken, then the town where the man was slain should forfeit 66 marks unto the king; and if the town were not able to pay it, then the hundred should forfeit and pay the same unto the king's treasure; whereunto the king assented. [Full. Ch. Hist. l. 1. 12.] This law was penned 'quicumque occiderit Francigenam, &c.' not excluding other aliens, but putting Francigena a Frenchman for example, that others must be like unto him, in owing several ligeance to a several sovereign, that is, to be 'extra ligeantiam regis Angl.' and 'infra ligeantiam alterius regis.' And it appears before out of Bracton and Fleta, that both of them use the same example (in describing of an alien) 'ad fidem regis Francie.' And it was holden, that except it could be proved, that the party slain was an Englishman, that he should be taken for an alien; and this was called Englesheric, Englesherm, that is, a proof that the party slain was an Englishman. (Hereupon Canutus presently withdrew his armies, and within a while after lost his crown, and the same was restored to his right owner.) The said law of Englesheric continued until 14 Ed. 3, cap. 4, and then the same was by act of parliament ousted and abolished. So amongst the laws of William the first, (published by master Lambert, fol. 125.) 'omnis Francigena' (there put, for example as before is said, to express what manner of person Alienigena should be) 'qui tempore Edwardi pro-pinqui nostri fuit particeps legum et consuetudinum Anglorum' (that is made denizen) 'quod dicunt ad scot et lot persolvat secundum legem Anglorum.'

Every man is either alienigena, an alien born, or subditus, a subject born. Every alien is either a friend that is in league, &c. or an enemy that is in open war, &c. Every alien enemy is either pro tempore, temporary for a time, or perpetuus, perpetual, or specialiter permissus, permitted especially. Every subject is either, natus, born, or datus, given or made: and of these briefly in their order. An alien friend, as at this time, a German, a Frenchman, a Spaniard, &c. (all the kings and princes in Christendom being now in league with our sovereign; but a Scot being a subject, cannot be said to be a friend, nor Scotland to be solum amici) may by the common law have, acquire, and get within this realm, by gift, trade, or other lawful means, any treasure, or (a) goods personal whatsoever, as well as an Englishman, and may maintain any (p) action for the same:

but (q) lands within this realm, or houses, but for their necessary habitation only, alien friends cannot acquire, or get, nor maintain any action real or personal, for any land or house, unless the house be for their necessary habitation. For if they should be disabled to acquire and maintain these things, it were in effect to deny unto them trade and traffick, which is the life of every island. But if this alien become an enemy, as all alien friends may, then is he utterly disabled to maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. And this is to be understood of a temporary alien, that being an enemy, may be a friend, or being a friend may be an enemy. But a perpetual enemy, though there be no wars by fire and sword between them, cannot maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. All infidels are in law perpetui (r) inimici, perpetual enemies, for the law presumes not that they will be converted, that being remota potentia, a remote possibility, for between them, as with the devils, whose subjects they be, and the Christian; there is perpetual hostility, and can be no (s) peace; for as the apostle saith, 2 Cor. vi. 15. 'quæ autem conventio Christi ad Belial, aut quæ pars fidei cum infideli?' And the law saith, 'Judæo Christianum nullum serviat mancipium' 'nefas enim est quem Christus redemit blasphemum Christi in servitutis vinculis detinere.' Register 287. 'Infidelis sunt Christi et Christianorum inimici.' And herewith agreeth the book in 12 H. 8. fol. 4. where it is holden that a pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all. [Quære.]

And upon this ground there is a diversity between a conquest of a kingdom of a Christian king, and the conquest of a kingdom of an infidel; for if a king come to a Christian kingdom by conquest, seeing that he hath 'vitæ et necis potestatem,' he may at his pleasure alter and change the laws of that kingdom, but until he doth make an alteration of those laws, the ancient laws of that kingdom remain. [Dav. 30. b. 3. Keb. 409. Salk. 411. 412. 666. Comb. 55.] But if a Christian king should conquer a kingdom of an infidel, and bring them under his subjection, there ipso facto the laws of the infidel are abrogated; for that they be not only against Christianity, but against the law of God and of nature, contained in the Decalogue: and in that case, until certain laws be established amongst them, the king by himself, and such judges as he shall appoint, shall judge them and their causes according to natural equity, in such sort as kings in ancient time did with their kingdoms, before any certain municipal laws were given, as before hath been said. But if a king hath a kingdom by title of descent, there seeing by the laws of that kingdom he doth inherit the kingdom, he cannot change those laws of himself, without consent of parliament. Also if a king hath a Christian kingdom by conquest, as Henry 2, had Ireland, after John had given unto them, being under his obedience and subjection, the laws of England for the government of that country, no succeeding king could alter the same without parliament. And in that case while the realm of England and that of Ireland were governed by several laws, any that was born in Ireland was no alien to the realm of England. In which precedent of Ireland three things are to be observed. 1. That then there had been two descents, one from Henry 2 to Richard 1, and from Richard to John, before the alteration of the laws. 2. That albeit Ireland was a distinct dominion, yet, the title thereof being by conquest, the same by judgment of law might by express words be bound by act of the parliament of England. 3. That albeit no reservation were in king John's Charter, yet by judgment of law a writ of error did lie in the King's Bench in England of an erroneous judgment in the King's Bench of Ireland. [Kelw. 202. pl. 19. 4 Inst. 71. F. N. B. 22. d. Vaugh. 200. 291.] Furthermore, in the case of a conquest of a Christian kingdom, as well those that served in wars at the conquest, as those that remained at home for the safety and peace of their country, and other the king's subjects, as well Antenati as Postnati, are capable of lands in the kingdom or country conquered, and may maintain any real action, and have the like privileges and benefits there, as they may have in England.

The third kind of enemy is, inimicus permissus, an enemy that cometh into the realm by the king's safe-conduct, of which you may read in the Register, fol. 25. Book of Entries, 'ejectione firmæ,' 7, 32 II. 6. 2. b. &c. Now what a subject born is, appeareth at large by that which hath been said de ligeantia: [Co. Lit. 129. a.] and so likewise de subdito dato, of a Donatour: for that is the right name, so called, because his legitimation is given unto him; for if you derive denizen from deins nec, one born within the obedience or ligeance of the king, then such a one should be all one with a natural-born subject. And it appeareth before out of the laws of king W. 1. of what antiquity the making of denizens by the king of England hath been.

3. There be regularly (unless it be in special cases) three incidents to a subject born. [Lit. Rep. 27.] 1. That the parents be under the actual obedience of the king. 2. That the place of his birth be within the king's dominion. And 3. The time of his birth is chiefly to be considered; for he cannot be a subject born of one kingdom that was born under the ligeance of a king of another kingdom, albeit afterwards one kingdom descend to the king of the other. 1. For the first, it is termed actual obedience, because though the king of England hath absolute right to other kingdoms or dominions, as France, Aquitain, Normandy, &c. yet seeing the king is not in actual possession thereof, none born there since the crown of England was out of actual possession thereof, are subjects to the king of England. 2. The place is observable, but so as many times ligeance or obedience, without any place within the king's dominions, may make a subject born; but any place within the king's dominions without obedience can never produce a natural subject. And therefore if any of the king's ambassadors in foreign nations have children there of their wives, being English women, by the common laws of England they are natural-born subjects, and yet they are born out of the king's dominions. [Cr. Car. 601. 602. March 91. Jenk. Cent. 3.] But if enemies should come into any of the king's dominions, and surprise any castle or fort, and possess the same by hostility, and have issue there, that issue is no subject to the king, though he be born within his dominions; for that he was not born under the king's ligeance or obedience. But 3, the time of his (a) birth is of the essence of a subject born; for he cannot be a subject to the king of England, unless at the time of his birth he was under the ligeance and obedience of the king. And that is the reason that Antenati in Scotland (for that at the time of their birth they were under the ligeance and obedience of another king) are alicuius born, in respect of the time of their birth.

4. It followeth next in course to set down the Reasons, wherefore an alien born is not capable of inheritance within England; and that he is not for three reasons. 1. The secrets of the realm might thereby be discovered. 2. The revenues of the realm (the sinews of war, and ornament of peace) should be taken and enjoyed by strangers born. 3. It should tend to the destruction of the realm. Which three reasons do appear in the statute of 2 II. 5. cap. and 4 II. 5. cap. ultimo. [See 2 II. 4. c. 7. & c. 9.] But it may be demanded, wherein doth that destruction consist. Whereunto it is answered: first, it tends to destruction tempore belli; for then strangers might fortify themselves in the heart of the realm, and be ready to set fire on the common-wealth, as was excellently shadowed by the Trojan horse in Virgil's second book of his Aeneid, where a very few men in the heart of the city did more mischief in a few hours, than ten thousand men without the walls in ten years. Secondly tempore pacis, for so might many aliens born get a great part of the inheritance and freehold of the realm, whereof there should follow a failure of justice (the supporter of the commonwealth), for that aliens born cannot be returned of juries (b) for the trial of issues between the king and the subject, or between subject and subject. And for this purpose, and many other, see a Charter (worthy of observation) of king Ed. 3. written to pope Clement, 'datum apud Westm. 26. die Sept. ann. regni nostri Franciæ 4. regni vero Angliæ 17.'

5. Now are we come to the examples, resolutions, and judgments of former times: wherein two things are to be observed, First, how many cases in our books do over-rule this case in question, 'for ubi (c) eadem ratio ibi idem jus, at de similibus idem est iudicium.' 2. That for want of an express text of law 'in terminis terminantibus,' and of examples and precedents in like cases (as was objected by some), we are driven to determine the question by natural reason: for it was said, 'si cecidit lex scripta, id custodiri oportet, quod moribus et consuetudine inductum est; et si qua in re hoc defecerit, recurrendum est ad rationem.' But that receiveth a threefold answer. First, that there is no such rule in the common or civil law: but the true rule of the civil law is, 'lex scripta si ceciderit, id custodiri oportet quod moribus et consuetudine inductum est; et si qua in re hoc defecerit, tunc id quod proximum et consequens ei est; et si id non apparet, tunc jus, quo, urbs Romana utitur, servari oportet.' Secondly, if the said imaginative rule be rightly and legally understood, it may stand for truth: for if you intend ratio for the legal and profound reason of such, as by diligent study and long experience and observation are so learned in the laws of this realm, as out of the reason of the same they can rule the case in question, in that sense the said rule is true: but if it be intended of the reason of the wisest man that professeth not the laws of England, then (I say) the rule is absurd and dangerous; for (d) 'cuilibet in sua arte perito est credendum, et quod quisque (e) norit in hoc se exerceat. Et omnes prudentes illa admittere solent, quæ probantur iis, qui in sua arte bene versati sunt.' Arist. 1. Topico- rum, cap. 6. Thirdly, there be multitudes of examples, precedents, judgments, and resolutions in the laws of England, the true and unstrained reason whereof doth decide this question. For example,

The dukedom of Aquitain, whereof Gascoin was parcel, and the earldom of Poitiers came to Henry 2, by the marriage of Eleanor, daughter and heir of William duke of Aquitain, and earl of Poitiers, which descended to Rich. 1, Hen. 3, Ed. 1, Ed. 2, Ed. 3, &c. In 27 lib. (f) Ass. pl. 48. in one case there appear two judgments and one resolution to be given by the judges of both benches in this case following. The possessions of the prior of Chelsey in the time of war were seised into the king's hands, for that the prior was an alien born. The prior by petition of right sued to the king; and the effect of his petition was, that before he became prior of Chelsey, he was prior of Andover: and whilst he was prior there, his possessions of that priory were likewise seised for the same cause, supposing that he was an alien born; whereupon he sued a former petition, and alleged that he was born in Gascoin within the ligeance of the king: which point being put in issue, and found by jury to be true, it was adjudged that he should have restitution of his possessions generally without mentioning of advowsons. After which restitution, one of the said advowsons became void, the prior presented, against whom the king brought a quare impedit wherein the king was barred; and all this was contained in the latter petition. And the book saith, that the earl of Arundel, and sir Guy of B. came into the court of Common Pleas, and demanded the opinion of the judges of that court concerning the said case, who resolved, that upon the matter aforesaid the king had no right to seize. In which case amongst many notable points, this one appeareth to be adjudged and resolved, that a man born in Gascoin under the king's lineage, was no alien born, as to lands and possessions within the realm of England, and yet England and Gascoin were, 1. Several and distinct countries. 2. Inherited by several and distinct titles. 3. Governed by several and distinct municipal laws, as it appeareth amongst the records in the Tower, Rot. Vasc. 10. Ed. 1, num. 7. 4. Out of the extent of the great seal of England, and the jurisdiction of the chancery of England. 5. The like objection might be made for default of trial, as hath been made against the plaintiff. And where it was said that Gascoin was no kingdom, and therefore it was not to be matched to the case in hand, it was answered, that this difference was without a diversity, as to the case in question? for if the plea in the case at the bar be good, then without question the prior had been an alien; for it might have been said (as it is in the case at the bar) that he was born 'extra ligeantiam regis regni sul Angliæ, et infra ligeantiam domini sui Vasconie,' and that they were several dominions, and governed by several laws: but then such a conceit was not hatched, that a king having several dominions should have several ligeances of his subjects. Secondly, it was answered, that Gascoin was sometime a kingdom,* and likewise Millan, Burgundy, Bavaria, Bretagne, and others, were, and now are become dukedoms. Castile, Arragon, Portugal, Barcelona, &c. were sometime earldoms, afterwards dukedoms, and now kingdoms. Bohemia and Poland were sometimes dukedoms, and now kingdoms; and (omitting many other, and coming nearer home) Ireland was before 32 H. 8, a lordship, and now is a kingdom, and yet the king of England was as absolute a prince and sovereign when he was lord of Ireland, as now, when he is styled king of the same [Co. Lit. 7. b.] 10 Ed. 3, 41. an exchange was made between an Englishman and a Gascoin, of lands in England and in Gascoin; ergo the Gascoin was no alien, for then had he not been capable of lands in England. 1 H. 4. 1, the king brought a writ of right of ward against one Sybil, whose husband was exiled into Gascoin; ergo, Gascoin is no parcel or member of England, for 'exilium est patriæ privatio, natalis soli 'mutatio, legum nativarum amissio.' 4 E. 3, 10. b. the king directed his writ out of Chancery under the great seal of England, to the mayor of (p) Burdeaux (a city in Gascoin), then being under the king's obedience, to certify, whether one that was outlawed here in England, was at that time in the king's service under him in obsequio regis: whereby it appeareth, that the king's writ did run into Gascoin, for it is the trial that the common law hath appointed in that case. But as to other cases, it is to be understood, that there be two kinds of writs, brevia mandatoria et remedialia, et brevia mandatoria et non remedialia. [Vaugh. 401. 2 Inst. 486. Moor 804.] Brevia mandatoria et remedialia, as writs of right, of forfeiture, &c. of debt, trespass, &c. and shortly, all writs real and personal, whereby the party wronged is to recover somewhat, and to be remedied for that wrong was offered unto him, are returnable or determinable in some court of justice within England, and to be served and executed by the sheriffs, or other ministers of justice within England; and these cannot by any means extend into any other kingdom, country, or nation, though that it be under the king's actual ligeance and obedience. But the other kind of writs, that are mandatory, and not remedial, are not tied to any place [3 Inst. 179.] but do follow subjection and ligeance, in what country or nation soever the subject is, as the king's writ to command any of his subjects, residing in any foreign country, to return into any of the king's own dominions, 'sub fide et ligeantia quibus nobis tenemini.' And so are the aforesaid mandatory writs cited out of the Register of protection for safety of body and goods, and requiring, that if any injury be offered, that the same be redressed according to the laws and customs of that place. Vide le Reg. fol. 26. Stamford, Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39, saith, that men born in Gascoin are inheritable to lands in England. This doth also appear by divers acts of parliament: for by the whole parliament, 39 E. 3, cap. 16. it is agreed, that the Gascoins are of the ligeance and subjection of the king. Vide 42 Ed. 3, cap. 2. et 28 H. 6. cap. 5. &c.

Guienne was another part of Aquitain, and came by the same title: and those of Guienne were by act of parliament in 13 Hen. 4, [nn. 22. Cotton's Abr. 480.] not imprinted, ex nra. parliament. eodem anno, adjudged and declared to be no aliens, but able to possess and purchase, &c. lands within this realm. And so doth Stamford take the law. Prærog. c. 12. f. 39.

And thus much of the dukedom of Aquitain, which (together with the earldom of Poitiers) came to Hen. 2, (as hath been said) by marriage, and continued in the actual possession of the kings of England by ten descents, viz. from the first of Henry 2, unto the 32nd of Henry 6, which was upon the very point of 300 years, within which duchy there were (as some write) 4 archbishopricks, 24 bishopricks, 15 earldoms, 202 baronies, and above 1000 captainships and bailliwicks: and in all this long time neither book-case nor record can be found wherein any plea was offered to disable any of them that were born there, by foreign birth, but the contrary hereof directly appeareth by the said book-case of (a) 27 lib. Ass. 48.

The kings of England had sometimes Normandy under actual ligeance and obedience. The question is then, whether men born in Normandy, after one king had them both, were inheritable to lands in England; and it is evident by our books that they were: for so it appeareth by the declaratory act of 17 Edw. 2, de Prærog. Reg. c. 12. that they were inheritable to, and capable of lands in England: for the purview of that statute is, 'quod rex habebit eadem caetas de terris Normannorum, &c.' Ergo, Normans might have lands in England: 'et hoc similiter intelligendum est, si aliqua hæreditas descendat alicui nato in partibus transmarinis, &c.' [Stauf. Prærog. 38, 39, &c.] Whereby it appeareth, that they were capable of lands within England by descent. And that this act of 17 Edw. 2, was but a declaration of the common law, it appeareth both by Bracton, who (as it hath been said) wrote in the reign of Henry 3, lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 1. f. 116. and by Britton who wrote in 5 Edw. 1, c. 18. that all such lands as any Norman had either by descent or purchase, escheated to the king for their treason, in revolting from their natural liege lord and sovereign. And therefore Stamford Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39. expounding the said statute of 17 Edw. 2, cap. 12. concludeth, that by that chapter it should appear (as if he had said, it is apparent without question) that all men born in Normandy, Gascoin, Guienne, Anjou, and Britain, (whilst they were under actual obedience) were inheritable within this realm as well as Englishmen. And the reason thereof was, for that they were under one ligeance due to one sovereign. And so much (omitting many other authorities) for Normandy: [Kel. 202. pl. 19. 4 Inst. 286. Co. Lit. 11. b. Scld. Mare Clau. lib. 2. cap. 19. Guernsey and Jersey.] saving I cannot let pass the isles of Guernsey and Jersey, parts and parcels of the dukedom of Normandy, yet remaining under the actual ligeance and obedience of the king. I think no man will doubt, but those that are born in Guernsey and Jersey (though those isles are no parcel of the realm of England, but several dominions enjoyed by several titles, governed by several laws) are inheritable and capable of any lands within the realm of England, 1 Edw. 3, fol. 7. [Co. Lit. 11. b.] Commission to determine the title of lands within the said isles, according to the laws of the isles; [4 Inst. 286.] and Mich. 41 Ed. 3, in the treasury, 'quia negotium præd' nec aliqua alia negotia 'de insula præd' emergentia non debent terminari, nisi secundum legem insulæ præd', &c.' And the Register, fol. 22. 'rex fidelibus suis 'Guernsey et Jersey.' King William the first brought this dukedom of Normandy with him, which by five descents continued under the actual obedience of the kings of England; and in or about the 6th of king John, the crown of England lost the actual possession thereof, until Hen. 5 recovered it again, and left it to Hen. 6, who lost it in the 28th of his reign; wherein were (as some write) one archbishopric and six bishopricks, and 100 strong towms and fortresses, besides those that were wasted in war.

Maud the empress, the only daughter and heir of Henry 1, took to her second husband Jeffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, Tourain, and Mayne, who had issue Hen. 2, to whom the said earldom by just title descended, who, and the kings that succeeded him, styled themselves by the name of Comes Andegav', &c. until Edw. 3, became king of all France; and such as were born within that earldom, so long as it was under the actual obedience of the king of England, were no aliens, but natural-born subjects, and never any offer made, that we can find, to disable them for foreign birth. [Co. Lit. 7. a.]

But leave we Normandy and Anjou, and speak we of the little, but yet ancient and absolute kingdom of the Isle of Man, as it appeareth by divers ancient and authentic records; as taking one for many. [4 Inst. 283, 284. Co. Lit. 11 b. Kelw. 202. pl. 19. 2 And. 155, 156.] Artold king of Man sued to Hen. 3, to come into England to confer with him, and to perform certain things which were due to Hen. 3, thereupon Hen. 3, 21 Decemb. ann. regni sui 34, at Winchester, by his letters patent gave licence to Artold king of Man as followeth: 'Rex omnibus salutem. Sciatis, 'quod licentiam dedimus, &c. Artoldo regi 'de Man veniendo ad nos in Angl' ad loquend' 'nobisc' et ad faciend' nobis quod facere debet; et ideo vobis mandamus, quod ei regi in 'veniend' ad nos in Angl', vel ibi morand', 'vel inde redeund', nullum faciat' aut fieri permittatis damnun, injur', molestiam, aut gravamen, vel etiam hominib' suis quos secum ducet; et si aliquid eis forisfact' fuerit, id eis 'sine dilat' faciat' emendari. In cujus, &c. 'duratur' usque ad fest' S. Mich.' Wherein two things are to be observed; 1. That seeing that Artold king of Man sued for a licence in this case to the king, it proveth him an absolute king, for that a monarch or an absolute prince cannot come into England without licence of the king; but any subject being in league, may come into this realm without licence. 2. That the king in his licence doth style him by the name of a king. It was resolved in 11 H. 8. that where an office was found after the decease of Thomas earl of Derby, and that he died seised, &c. of the Isle of Man, that the said office was utterly void; for that the Isle of Man, Normandy, Gascoin, &c. were out of the power of the Chancery, and governed by several laws; and yet none will doubt, but those that are born within that isle, are capable and inheritable of lands within the realm of England.

Wales was sometime a kingdom, as it appeareth by 19 H. 6, fol. 6, and by the act of parliament of 2 H. 5, c. 6, but whilst it was a kingdom, the same was holden, and within the fee, of the king of England; and this appeareth by our books, Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 16. 1. E. 3, 59. 13 E. 3, tit. Jurisdic. 10 H. 4, 6 Plow. 14. 8 E. 3, Com. 368. [3 Keb. 402. 4 Inst. 239, 240, &c. Plow. 126. b. 129. Vaugh. 281.] And in this respect, in divers ancient charters, kings of old time stiled themselves in several manners, as king Edgar, Britannie Barbarus; Etheldredus, 'totius Albion' Dei providentia imperator; 'Edredus Magn' Britann' monarcha; which among many other of like nature I have seen. But by the statute of 12 E. 1, Wales was united and incorporated into England, and made parcel of England in possession; and therefore it is ruled in 7 H. 4. f. 13. a, that no protection doth lie 'quia moratur in Wallia,' because Wales is within the realm of England. [Co. Lit. 130. b. Fitz. protect. 23. Br. protect. 33. 3 Keb. 405. Vaugh. 414.] And where it is recited in the act of 27 H. 8, that Wales was ever parcel of the realm of England, it is true in this sense, viz. that before 12 E. 1, it was parcel in tenure, and since it is parcel of the body of the realm. And whosoever is born within the fee of the king of England, though it be in another kingdom, is a natural-born subject, and capable and inheritable of lands in England, as it appeareth in Plow. Com. 126. And therefore those that were born in Wales before 12 E. 1, whilst it was only holden of England, were capable and inheritable of lands in England.

Now come we to France and the members thereof, as Callice, Guynes, Tournay, &c. which descended to Edw. 3 as son and heir to Isabel, daughter and heir to Philip le Beau, king of France. Certain it is, whilst Henry 6 had both England, and the heart and greatest part of France under his actual ligeance and obedience, for he was crowned king of France in Paris, that they that then were born in those parts of France that were under actual ligeance and obedience, were no aliens, but capable of, and inheritable to lands in England. And that is proved by the writs in the Register, fol. 26, cited before. But the inrollment of letters patent of denization in the Exchequer int' originalia, ann. 11 H. 6, with the lord treasurer's remembrancer, was strongly urged and objected; for, it was said, thereby it appeareth, that 11. 6, in anno 11 of his reign, did make denizen one Reyuel born in France. Whereunto it was answered, that it is proved by the said letters patent, that he was born in France, before Henry 6 had the actual possession of the crown of France, so as he was Antennatus; and this appeareth by the said letters patent, whereby the king granteth, that 'magister Johannes Reynel serviens noster, &c. infra regnum nostrum Franc' oriundus pro termino vite sue sit ligeus noster, et eodem modo teneatur sicut verus et fidelis noster infra regnum Angl' oriundus, ac quod ipse terras infra regnum nostrum Angl' seu alia dominia nostra perquirere possit et valeat.' Now if that Reynel had been born since Henry 6 had the quiet possession of France (the king being crowned king of France about one year before) of necessity he must be an infant of very tender age, and then the king would never have called him his servant, nor made the patent (as thereby may be collected) for his service, nor have called him by the name of magister Johannes Reynel: but without question he was Anteanatus, born before the king had the actual and real possession of that crown.

Calais is a part of the kingdom of France, and never was parcel of the kingdom of England, and the kings of England enjoyed Calais in and from the reign of king Edw. 3rd, until the loss thereof in queen Mary's time, by the same title that they had to France. [Kelw. 202. pl. 19. 2. And. 116. Br. trial, 58, 133 Br. erro. 101. Br. cinque ports 10. Vaugh. 401, 4 Inst. 283.] And it is evident by our books, that those, that were born in Calais, were capable and inheritable to lands in England, 42 E. 3. c. 10. Vide 21 H. 7, 33. b. 19 H. 6, 2 E. 4, 1. a. b. 39 H. 6, 39. a. 21 E. 4, 18. a. 28 H. 6, 3. b. By all which it is manifest, that Calais being parcel of France was under the actual obedience and commandment of the king; and by consequent those that were born there were natural born subjects, and no aliens. Calais, from the reign of Edw. 3, until the 5th year of queen Mary, remained under the actual obedience of the king of England.

Guines also, another part of France, was under the like obedience to Henry 6, as appeareth by 31 H. 6, fol. 4. And Tournay was under the obedience of Henry 8, as it appeareth by 5 El. Dyer, fol. 224, for there it is resolved, that a bastard born at Tournay, whilst it was under the obedience of Henry 8, was a natural subject, as an issue born within this realm by aliens. [Fitz Protect. 13. Guynes. Tournay. Dy. 224, pl. 29 Vaugh. 233. Co Lit. 8. a.] If then those that were born at Tournay, Calais, &c. whilst they were under the obedience of the king, were natural subjects, and no aliens, it followeth, that when the kingdom of France (whereof those were parcels) was under the king's obedience, that those that were then born there, were natural subjects, and no aliens.

Next followeth Ireland, which originally came to the kings of England by conquest; but who was the first conqueror thereof, hath been a question. [12 Co. 108, 109, &c. 4 Inst. 349, 350, &c. Dav. 60. Præf. 4. Rep. 32, 33.] I have seen a Charter made by king Edgar in these words: 'Ego Edgarus Anglorum Basilius, & omniumque insularum oceanii, quæ Britanniam

'circunjacent, imperator et dominus, gratias ago ipsi Deo omnipotenti regi meo, qui meum imperium sic ampliavit et exaltavit super regnum patrum meorum, &c. Mihi concessi, propitia divinitas, cum Anglorum imperio omnia regna insularum oceanii, &c. cum susi ferocissimis regibus usque Norvegiam, maximamque partem Hibern', cum sua nobilissima civitate de Dublinâ, Anglorum regno subjungere, quapropter et ego Christi gloriam et laudem in regno meo exaltare, et ejus servitium amplificare devotus disposui, &c.' Yet for that it was wholly conquered in the reign of Henry 2, the honour of the conquest of Ireland is attributed to him; [Co. Lit. 7. a.] and his style was, 'rex Angl', dominus Hibern', 'dux Normann', dux Aquitan', et comes 'Audegav', king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, duke of Aquitain, and earl of Anjou. That Ireland is a dominion separate and divided from England, it is evident from our books, 20 H. 6, 8. sir John Pilkington's case. 32 H. 6, 25. 20 Eliz. Dyer 360. Plow. Com. 360. [12 Co. 111. 4 Inst. 351. 1 And. 263. 2 And. 116. Dav. 37. a. Jenk. Cent. 164. Br. parliam. 98.] And 2 R. 3, 12 a. 'Hibernia habet parliamentum, et faciunt leges, et nostra statuta non ligant eos, quia non mittunt milites ad parliamentum' (which is to be understood, unless they be especially named) 'sed personæ eorum sunt subjecti regis, sicut inhabitantes in Alesia, Gasconia, et Guyan.' Wherein it is to be observed, that the Irishman (as to his subjection) is compared to men born in Calais, Gascon, and Guienne. Concerning their laws, ex rotulis patentium de anno 11 regis H. 3, [Co. Lit. 141. a.] there is a Charter which that king made, beginning in these words: 'Rex, &c. baronibus, militibus, et omnibus libere tenentibus L. salutem. Satis ut credimus vestra audivit discretio, quod, quando honor memorie (a) Johannes quondam rex Angl' pater noster venit in Hiberniam, ipse duxit secum viros discretos et legis peritos, quorum communi consilio et ad instantiam Hibernensium statuit et præcepit leges Anglicanas in Hibern' ita quod leges easdem in scripturas redactas reliquit sub sigillo suo ad Scaccarium Dublin'.' So as now the laws of England became the proper laws of Ireland; and therefore, because they have parliaments holden there, whereat they have made divers particular laws concerning that dominion, as it appeareth in 20 H. 6, 8. and 20 El. (b) Dyer 360, and for that they retain unto this day divers of their ancient customs, the book in 20 H. 6, 8. holdeth, that Ireland is governed by laws and customs separate and diverse from the laws of England. A voyage royal may be made into Ireland. Vide (c) 11 H. 4, 7. a. and 7 (d) E. 4, 27. a. which proveth it a distinct dominion.

And in anno 33 reg. El. it was resolved by all the judges of England in the case of (e) Orurke an Irishman, who had committed high treason in Ireland, that he by the statute of 23 H. 8. c. 33. might be indicted, arraigned, and tried for the same in England, according to the purview of that statute; the words of which statute be, 'that all treasons, &c. committed by any (f) person out of the realm of England shall be from henceforth enquired of, &c.' and they all resolved (as afterward they did also in sir John Perrot's case) that Ireland was out of the realm of England, and that treasons committed there were to be tried within England by that statute. In the statute of 4 H. 7. cap. 24. of (g) fines, provision is made for them that be out of this land, and it is holden in Plow. Com. in Stowel's case 375, that he that is in Ireland is out of this land, and consequently within that proviso. Might not then the like plea be devised as well against any person born in Ireland, as (this is against Calvin that is a Postnatus) in Scotland? for the Irishman is born 'extra ligeantiam regis regni sui Angli, &c.' which be verba operativa in the plea: but all men know, that they are natural born subjects, and capable of and inheritable to laws in England.

Lastly, to conclude this part with (h) Scotland itself. In ancient time part of (i) Scotland (besides Berwick) was within the power and ligeance of the king of England, as appeareth by our books (k) 42 E. 3. 2. b. the lord Beaumont's case, 11 E. 3. c. 2, &c. and by precedents hereafter mentioned; and that part (though it were under the king of England's ligeance and obedience) yet was it governed by the laws of Scotland. Ex rotulis Scottiæ, anno 11 Ed. 3, amongst the records in the Tower of London. 'Rex, &c. Constituimus Rich. Talebot justiciarium nostrum villæ Berwici super Twedam, ac omnium aliarum terrarum nostrarum in partibus Scot', ad faciend' omnia et singula quæ ad officium justiciarii pertinent, secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Scot'. And after anno 26 E. 3, ex eodem rot. 'Rex Henrico de Percey, Ricardo de Nevil, &c. Volumus et vobis et alteri vestrum tenore presentium committimus et mandamus, quod homines nostri de Scot' ad pacem et obedientiam nostram existentes, legibus, libertatibus, et liberis consuetudinibus, quibus ipsi et antecessores sui tempore celebris memorie Alexandri quondam regis Scot' rationabiliter usi fuerunt, uti et gaudere deberent, prout in quibusdam indenturis, &c. plenius dicitur contineri.' And there is a writ in the Register 295. a. 'Dedimus potestatem recipiendi ad fidem et pacem nostram homines de Galloway.' Now the case in (l) 42 Ed. 3, 2, b. (which was within 16 years of the said grant, concerning the laws in 26 E. 3,) ruleth it, that so many as were born in that part of Scotland, that was under the ligeance of the king, were no aliens, but inheritable to lands in England; yet was that part of Scotland in another kingdom governed by several laws, &c. And if they were natural subjects in that case, when the king of England had but part of Scotland, what reason should there be, why those that are born there, when the king hath all Scotland, should not be natural subjects, and no aliens? So likewise (m) Berwick is no part of England, nor governed by the laws of England, and yet they that have been born there, since they were under the obedience of one king, are natural born subjects, and no aliens, as it appeareth in 15 R. 2, cap. 7, &c. Vide (n) 19 H. 6, 35. b. and 39 H. 6, 59. a. And yet in all these cases and examples, if this new devised plea had been sufficient, they should have been all aliens against so many judgments, resolutions, authorities, and judicial precedents in all successions of ages. There were sometimes in England, whilst the heptarchy lasted, seven several crowned kings of seven several and distinct kingdoms, but in the end the West Saxons got the monarchy, and all the other kings melted, as it were, the crowns to make one imperial diadem, for the king of the West Saxons over all. Now when the whole was under the actual and real ligeance and obedience of one king, were any, that were born in any of those several and distinct kingdoms, aliens one to another? Certainly they, being born under the obedience of one king and sovereign, were all natural born subjects, and capable of and inheritable unto any lands in any of the said kingdoms.

In the holy history reported by St. Luke, ex dictamine Spiritus Sancti, cap. 21 et 22 Act. Apostolorum, it is certain, that St. Paul was a Jew, born in Tarsus, a famous city of Cilicia; for it appeareth in the said 21st chap. v. 39, by his own words, 'ego homo sum quidem Judæus a Tarsos Ciliciæ, non ignote civitatis muni-ceps.' And in c. xii. v. 3, 'ego sum vir Judæus natus Tarsos Ciliciæ, &c.' and them made that excellent sermon there recorded; which when the Jews heard, the text saith, v. 29, 'levaverunt vocem suam, dicentes, tolle de terra hejusmodi, non enim fas est eum vivere; vociferantibus autem eis et projicientibus vestimenta sua, et pulverum jactantibus in aerem.' Claudius Lysias the popular tribune, to please this turbulent and profane multitude (though it were utterly against justice and common reason) the text saith, 'jussit tribunus, 1. induci eum in castra, 2. flagellis cædi, and 3. torqueri eum (quid ita?) ut sciret propter quam causam sic acclamarent;' and when they had bound Paul with cords, ready to execute the tribune's unjust commandment, the blessed apostle (to avoid unlawful and sharp punishment) took hold of the law of a heathen emperor, and said to the centurion standing by him, 'si hominem Romanum et indomatum licet vobis flagellare? Which when the centurion heard, he went to the tribune and said, 'quid acturus es? Hic enim homo civis Romanus est.' Then came the tribune to Paul, and said unto him; 'dic mihi si tu Romanus es?' 'At ille dixit, etiam.' And the tribune answered, 'ego multa summa civitatem hanc consequutus sum.' But Paul, not meaning to conceal the dignity of his birth-right said, 'ego autem et natus sum:' as if he should have said to the tribune, you have your freedom by purchase of money, and I (by a more noble means) by birth-right and inheritance. 'Protinus ergo,' saith the text, 'decesserunt ab illo qui illam torturi erant: tribunos quoque tinnit postquam rescivit, quia civis Romanus esset, et quia alligasset eum.' So as hereby it is manifest, that Paul was a Jew, born at Tarsus in Cilicia in Asia Minor; and yet being born under the obedience of the Roman emperor, he was by birth a citizen of Rome in Italy in Europe, that is, capable of and inheritable to all privileges and immunities of that city. But such a plea as is now imagined against Calvin might have made St. Paul an alien to Rome. For if the emperor of Rome had several ligeances for every several kingdom and country under his obedience, then might it have been said against St. Paul, that he was 'extra ligeantiam imperatoris regni sui Italice, et infra ligeantiam imperatoris regni sui Cilicie, &c.' But as St. Paul was 'Judæus patriæ et Romanus privilegio, Judæus natione et Romanus jure nationum;' so may Calvin say, that he is 'Scotus patriæ et Anglus privilegio, Scotus natione et Anglus jure nationum.'

Samaria in Syria was the chief city of the ten tribes; but it being usurped by the king of Syria, and the Jews taken prisoners, and carried away in captivity, was after inhabited by the Panymys. Now albeit Samaria of right belonged to Jewry, yet because the people of Samaria were not under actual obedience, by the judgment of the chief justice of the whole world they were adjudged alienigenæ, aliens: for in the Evangelist St. Luke, c. 17, when Christ had cleansed the ten lepers, 'unus autem ex illis,' saith the text, 'ut vidit quia mandatus esset, regressus est cum magnâ voce magnificans Deum et cecidit in faciem ante pedes ejus gratias agens, et hic erat Samaritanus. Et Jesus respondens dixit, nonne decem mundati sunt, et novem ubi sunt? Non est inventus, qui rediret et daret gloriam Deo, nisi hic alienigena.' So as by his judgment this Samaritan was alienigena, a stranger born, because he had the place, but wanted obedience. 'Et si deat obedientia non adjuvat locus,' And this agreeth with the divine, who saith, 'si locus salvare potuisset, Satan de celo pro sua inobedientia non cecidisset. Adam in Paradiso non cecidisset. Lot in monte non cecidisset, sed potius in Sodom.'

6. Now resteth the sixth part of this division, that is to say, six demonstrative illations

1. Every one that is an alien by birth, may be, or might have been an enemy by accident; but Calvin could never at any time be an enemy by any accident; ergo, he cannot be an alien by birth. Vide 33 H. 6, f. 1, a. b. the difference between an alien enemy, and a subject traitor. 'Hostes sunt, qui nobis, vel quibus nos bellum decernimus; cæteri proditores, prædones, &c.' The major is apparent, and is proved by that which hath been said. Et vide Magna Charta, cap. 30, 19 E. 4, 6, 9 E. 3, c. 1, 27 E. 3, c. 2, 4 H. 5, c. 7, 14 E. 3, stat. 2, c. 2, &c.

2. Whosoever are born under one natural ligeance and obedience, due by the law of nature to one sovereign, are natural-born subjects: but Calvin was born under one natural ligeance and obedience due by the law of nature to one sovereign; ergo he is a natural-born subject.

3. Whosoever is born within the king's power or protection, is no alien: but Calvin was born under the king's power and protection: ergo he is no alien.

4. Every stranger born must at his birth be either amicus or inimicus: but Calvin at his birth could neither be amicus nor inimicus; ergo he is no stranger born. Inimicus he cannot be, because he is subditus; for that cause also he cannot be amicus; neither now can Scotia be said to be solum amici, as hath been said.

5. Whatsoever is due by the law or constitution of man, may be altered; but natural ligeance or obedience of the subject to the sovereign cannot be altered; ergo natural ligeance or obedience to the sovereign is not due by the law or constitution of man. [Sawyer's Argument in Quo Warranto, 25.] Again, whatsoever is due by the law of nature, cannot be altered; but ligeance and obedience of the subject to the sovereign is due by the law of nature; ergo it cannot be altered. It hath been proved before, that ligeance or obedience of the inferior to the superior, of the subject to the sovereign, was due by the law of nature many thousand years before any law of man was made; which ligeance or obedience (being the only mark to distinguish a subject from an alien) could not be altered; therefore it remaineth still due by the law of nature. For 'leges nature perfectissimæ sunt et immutabiles, humani vero juris conditio semper in infinitum decurrit, et nihil est in eo quod perpetuo stare possit. Leges humanæ nascuntur, vivunt, et moriuntur.'

Lastly, whosoever at his birth cannot be an alien to the king of England, cannot be an alien to any of his subjects of England; but the plaintiff at his birth could be no alien to the king of England; ergo the plaintiff cannot be an alien to any of the subjects of England. The major and minor both be 'propositiones perspicue veræ.' For as to the major it is to be observed, that whosoever is an alien born, is so accounted in law in respect of the king. And that appeareth, 1, by the pleading so often before remembered, that he must be 'extra ligeantiam regis,' without any mention making of the subject. [Co. Lit. 2, b.] 2. When an alien born purchaseth any lands, the king only shall have them, though they be holden of a subject, in which case the subject loseth his seigniory. And as it is said in our books, an alien may purchase 'ad proficuum regis;' but the act of law giveth the alien nothing; and therefore if a woman alien marrieth a subject, she shall not be endowed, neither shall an alien be tenant by the curtesy. Vide 3 H. 6, 55, a. 4 H. 3, 179, 3. [Br. denizen 1 Fitz. dower 179.] The subject shall plead, that the defendant is an alien born, for the benefit of the king, that he upon office found may seize; and that the tenant may yield to the king the land, and not to the alien, because the king hath best right thereunto. 4. Leagues between our sovereign and others are the only means to make aliens friends; 'et fœdera percütere,' to make leagues, only and wholly pertaineth to the king. 5. Wars do make aliens enemies, and 'bellum indicere' belongeth only and wholly to the king, and not to the subject, as appeareth in 19 Ed. 4, fol. 6, b. 6. The king only without the subject may make, not only letters of safe-conduct, but letters patent of denization, to whom, and how many he will, and enable them at his pleasure to sue any of his subjects in any action whatsoever, real or personal, which the king could not do without the subject, if the subject had any interest given unto him by the law in any thing concerning an alien born. Nay, the law is more precise herein than in a number of other cases, of higher nature: for the king cannot grant to any other to make of strangers born, denizens; it is by the law itself so inseparably and individually annexed to his royal person (as the book is in 20 H. 7, fol. 8). [Br. patents 111.] For the law esteemeth it a point of high prerogative, 'jus majestatis, et inter insignia summa' 'potestati,' to make aliens born subjects of the realm, and capable of the lands and inheritances of England in such sort as any natural-born subject is. And therefore by the statute of 27 H. 8, c. 21, many of the most ancient prerogatives and royal flowers of the crown, as authority to pardon treason, murder, manslaughter, and felony, power to make justices in eyre, justices of assise, justices of peace and gaol-delivery, and such like, having been severed and divided from the crown, were again reunited to the same: but authority to make letters of denization, was never mentioned therein to be resumed, for that never any claimed the same by any pretext whatsoever, being a matter of so high a point of prerogative. So as the pleading against an alien, the purchase by any alien, leagues, and wars between aliens, denizations, and safe-conducts of aliens, have respect only and wholly unto the king. It followeth therefore, that no man can be alien to the subject that is not alien to the king. 'Non

'potest esse alienigena corpori, qui non est capiti, non gregi qui non est regi.'

All commissions ancient and late, for the finding of offices, to entitle the king to the lands of aliens born: also all letters patent of denization of ancient and latter times do prove, that he is no alien that is born under the king's obedience.

Now we are come to consider of legal inconveniences: and first of such as have been objected against the plaintiff, and secondly of such as should follow, if it had been adjudged against the plaintiff.

Of such inconveniences as were objected against the plaintiff, there remain only four to be answered: for all the rest are clearly and fully satisfied before: 1. That if Postnati should be inheritable to our laws and inheritances, it were reason they should be bound by our laws; but Postnati are not bound by our statute or common laws; for they having, as it was objected, never so much freehold or inheritance, cannot be returned of juries, nor subject to scot or lot, nor chargeable to subsidies or quin-zimes, nor bound by any act of parliament made in England. 2. Whether one be born within the kingdom of Scotland or no, is not triable in England; for that it is a thing done out of this realm, and no jury can be returned for the trial of any such issue: and what inconvenience should thereof follow, if such pleas that wanted trial should be allowed, for then all aliens might imagine the like plea, they, that objected it, left it to the consideration of others. 3. It was objected, that this innovation was so dangerous, that the certain event thereof no man could foresee; and therefore, some thought it fit, that things should stand and continue as they had been in former time, for fear of the worst. 4. If Postnati were by law legitimated in England, it was objected what inconvenience and confusion should follow, if for the punishment of us all, the king's royal issue should fail, &c. whereby those kingdoms might again be divided. All the other arguments and objections, that have been made, have been all answered before, and need not to be repeated again.

1. To the first it was resolved, that the cause of this doubt was the mistaking of the law: for if a Postnatus do purchase any lands in England, he shall be subject in respect thereof, not only to the laws of this realm, but also to all services and contributions, and to the payment of subsidies, taxes, and public charges, as any denizen or Englishman shall be; nay, if he dwell in England, the king may command him, by a writ of ne erant regnum, that he depart not out of England. But if Postnatus dwell in Scotland, and have lands in England, he shall be chargeable for the same to all intents and purposes, as if an Englishman were owner thereof, and dwell in Scotland, Ireland, in the isles of Man, Guernsey, or Jersey, or elsewhere. The same law is of an Irishman that dwells in Ireland, and hath land in England. But if Postnati, or Irishmen, men of the isles of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, &c. have lands within England, and dwell here, they shall be subject to all services and public charges within this realm, as any Englishman shall be. So as to service and charges, the Postnati and Englishmen born are all in one predicament.

2. Concerning the trial, a threefold answer was thereunto made and resolved: 1. That the like objection might be made against Irishmen, Gascoins, Normans, men of the isles of Man, Guernsey, and Jersey, of Berwick, &c. all which appear by the rule of our books to be natural-born subjects; and yet no jury can come out of any of those countries and places, for trial of their births there. 2. If the demandant or plaintiff in any action concerning lands be born in Ireland, Guernsey, Jersey, &c. out of the realm of England, if the tenant or defendant plead, that he was born out of the ligeance of the king, &c. the demandant or plaintiff may reply, that he was born under the ligeance of the king at such place within England: [Co. Lit. 291. a. b. 6 Co. 47. a.] and upon the evidence the place shall not be material, but only the issue shall be, whether the demandant or plaintiff were born under the ligeance of the king in any of his kingdoms or dominions whatsoever: and in that case the jury, if they will, may find the special matter, viz. the place where he was born, and leave it to the judgment of the court: and that jurors may take knowledge of things done out of the realm in this and like cases, vide 7 H. 7. 8. b. 20 Ed. 3, Averment 34. 5 Ric. 2, tit. Trial 54. 15 Ed. 4. 15. 31 H. 6, 25. Fitz. Nat. Br. 196. Vide Dowdale's case, in the sixth part of my Reports, fol. 47, and there divers other judgments be vouched. 3. Brown, in anno 32 H. 6, reporteth a judgment then lately given, that where the defendant pleaded, that the plaintiff was a Scot, born at St. John's town in Scotland, out of the ligeance of the king; whereupon they were at issue, and that issue was tried where the writ was brought, and that appeareth also by 27 Ass. pl. 24. that the jury did find the prior to be born in Gascoins, (for so much is necessarily proved by the words trove fuit.) And 20 Ed. 3, tit. Averment 34. in a juris utrum, the death of one of the vouchees was alledged at such a castle in Britain, and this was enquired of by the jury. And it is holden in 3 Ric. 2, tit. Trial 54. that if a man be adhering to the enemies of the king in France, his land is forfeitable, and his adherency shall be tried where the land is, as oftentimes hath been done, as there it is said by Belknap: and Fitz. Nat. Br. 196, in a mortdunc, if the ancestor died 'in itinere peregrinationis sue' vers. 'Terram Sanctam,' the jury shall enquire of it. But in the case at bar, seeing the defendant hath pleaded the truth of the case, and the plaintiff hath not denied it, but demurred upon the same, and thereby confessed all matters of fact, the court now ought to judge upon the special matter, even as if a jury upon an issue joined in England, as it is aforesaid, had found the special matter, and left it to the court.

3. To the third it was answered and resolved that this judgment was rather a renovation of the judgments and censures of the reverend judges and sages of the law in so many ages past, than any innovation, as appeareth by the book and book-cases before recited; neither have judges power to judge according to that which they think to be fit, but that which out of the laws they know to be right and consonant to law. 'Judex bonus nihil ex arbitrio suo faciat, nec proposito domesticæ voluntatis, sed juxta leges et jures pronuntiet. And as for 'timores,' fears grounded upon no just cause, 'qui non cadunt in constantem virum, vani timores astinandi sunt.'

4. And as to the fourth, it is less than a dream of a shadow, or a shadow of a dream: [2 Ventrix 6.] for it hath been often said, natural legitimation respecteth actual obedience to the sovereign at the time of the birth; for as the Antenati remain aliens as to the crown of England, because they were born when there were several kings of the several kingdoms, and the uniting of the kingdoms, by descent subsequent, cannot make him a subject to that crown to which he was alien at the time of his birth; so albeit the kingdoms (which Almighty God of his infinite goodness and mercy divert) should by descent be divided, and governed by several kings;* yet it was resolved, that all those, that were born under one natural obedience, while the realms were united under one sovereign, should remain natural born subjects, and no aliens; for that naturalization due and vested by birth-right, cannot by any separation of the crowns afterward be taken away; nor he, that was by judgment of law a natural subject at the time of his birth, become an alien by such a matter ex post facto. And in that case, upon such an accident, our Postnatus may be 'ad fidem utriusque regis,' as Bracton saith in the afore-remembered place, fol. 427. 'Sicut Anglicus non auditur in placitando aliquem de terris et tenement' in Francia, ita nec debet Francigena et alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Franciæ, audiri placitando in Angliâ: sed tamen sunt aliqui Francigenæ in Francia, qui sunt ad fidem utriusque, et semper fuerunt ante Normanniam perditam et post, et qui placitant hic et ibi, eâ ratione, quia sunt ad fidem utriusque, sicut fuit Willielmus comes mareschallus et manens in Angliâ, et M. de Gynes manens in Francia, et alii plures.' Concerning the reason drawn from the (a) etymologies, it made against them, for that by their own derivation, aliene gentis and aliene ligentia is all one: but arguments drawn from etymologies are too weak and too light for judges to build their judgments upon: 'sæpenumero ubi proprietatis (b) verborum attenditur, sensus veritatis amittitur: and yet when they agree with the judgment of law, judges may use them for ornaments.

But on the other side, some inconveniences should follow, if the plea against the plaintiff should be allowed. For, first it maketh ligeance local; videlicet, 'ligeantia regis regni sui Scotiae,' and 'ligeantia regis regni sui Angliæ:' wherupon should follow, first, that faith or ligeance, which is universal, should be confined within local limits and bounds: secondly, that the subjects should not be bound to serve the king in peace or in war out of those limits; thirdly, it should illegitimate many, and some of noble blood, which were born in Gascoign, Guienne, Normandy, Calais, Tournay, France, and divers other of his majesty's dominions, whilst the same were in actual obedience, and in Berwick, Ireland, Guernsey, and Jersey, if this plea should have been admitted for good. And secondly, this strange and new-devised plea inclineth too much to countenance that dangerous and desperate error of the Spencers, touched before, to receive any allowance within Westminster-hall.

In the proceeding of this case, these things were observed, and so did the chief justice of the Common Pleas publicly deliver in the end of his argument in the Exchequer-chamber. First, that no commandment or message by word or writing was sent or delivered from any whatsoever to any of the judges to cause them to incline to any opinion in this case; which I remember, for that it is honourable for the state, and consonant to the laws and statutes of this realm. Secondly, there was observed, what a concurrence of judgments, resolutions, and rules, there be in our books in all ages concerning this case, as if they had been prepared for the deciding of the question of this point; and that (which never fell out in any doubtful case) no one opinion in all our books is against this judgment. Thirdly, that the five judges of the King's-bench, who adjourned this case into the Exchequer-chamber, rather adjourned it for weight than difficulty, for all they in their arguments and voce concurred with the judgment. Fourthly, that never any case was adjudged in the Exchequer-chamber with greater concordance and less variety of opinions, the lord-chancellor and twelve of the judges concurring in one opinion. Fifthly, that there was not in any remembrance so honourable, great, and intelligent an auditory at the hearing of the arguments of any Exchequer-chamber case, as was at this case now adjudged. Sixthly, it appeareth, that 'jurisprudentia legis communis Angliæ est scientia socialis et copiosa:' sociable, in that it agreeth with the principles and rules of other excellent sciences, divine and human: copious, for that 'quamvis ad (d) ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur,' yet in a case so rare, and of such a quality, that loss is the assured end of the practice of it (for no alien can purchase lands, but he loseth them, and ipso facto the king is entitled thereunto, in respect wherof a man would think few men would attempt it) there should be such a multitude and farrago of authorities in all successions of ages, in our books and book-cases, for the deciding of a point of so rare an accident. 'Et sic determinata et terminata est ista questio.'

Whereupon all and singular the premises being seen, and by the court of the lord the now king here diligently inspected and examined, and mature deliberation being had thereof; for that it appears to the court of the lord the now king here, that the aforesaid plea of the said Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith, above pleaded, is not sufficient in law to bar the said Robert Calvin from having an answer to his aforesaid writ: therefore it is considered by the court of the lord the now king here, that the aforesaid Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith to the writ of the said Robert do further answer.

Lord Chancellor ELLESMERE's Speech in the Exchequer Chamber, in the Case of the POSTNATI (c).

MY lords: Mine age, mine infirmitie, and indisposition of health, my decarie and weaknesse of memorie, and desuetudo, and long discontinuance from this manner of legall exercise (aboue foureteene yceres) haue bereaued mee of the meanes and helpes that should inhable me to speake in so great a case.

I feare therefore, that it will be deemed presumption (if not worse) that I aduenture to speake heerein at all; specially after so many

(c) This Argument was printed in 1609, with the following title:—The Speech of the Lord Chancellor of England, in the Exchequer-Chamber, touching the Post-nati. Before the Speech there was the following Address to the reader:

“To the louing readers; Before I presumed to speake in the Exchequer-Chamber in R. C. case (which is now commonly called the Case of Post-nati,) I considered mine age and infirmities, and how long I had discontinued from such legall exercises. I might hereupon haue iustly challenged the priuiledge of silence. But greater and weightier reasons ouer-ruled mee, and enforced mee to waiue the benefit of that priuiledge: for, looking into the nature of the question then in hand, and examining the circumstances, I found the case to bee rare, and the matter of great import and consequence, as being a special and principall part of the blessed and happy Vnion of Great Britaine.—I heard many learned and iudicious arguments, made by the reuerend Judges: and finding that they did not all concurre in opinion (though the number was ineede so few, of them that differed, that in Greeke it woulde not make a plurall number) and that some things were by them omitted, which seemed to mee to bee both pertinent to the matter, and necessary to bee knowne, and more proper and fit to bee spoken by me respecting the place I hold, than by them, that did wholly binde themselues to the forme and rule of legall argument and discourse: I thought that I coulde not, in dutie, sit as a dumme and idle hearer onlie; the cause being iudicially depending in the high court of Chancerie, where I was to iudge of it according to lawe, following the rule of mine owne conscience, and the measure of mine owne vnderstanding, and not to bee swayed with the weight of other mens opinions.—I considered also, that although silentij tutum premium is often true in humane policie, yet sometime there is crimen reticentiae; and therefore the prophet said, ‘væ mihi quia tacui.’ And Chrysostome obserueth, that, ‘tribus modis in veritatem peccatur: 1. veritatem præ timore tacendo: 2. veritatem in mendacium commutando: 3. veritatem non defendendo.’ Remembring this, my conscience told me, that howsoeuer silence might in this case haue excused mee of the learned and iudicious arguments of so many grate, learned, and reuerend iudges.

To say the same that hath bene saied, must needes be vnpleasaunt, wearsome, and loathsome to the hearers; and not to say the same is to speake little to the purpose: for, what more can bee saied than hath bene?

Yet, for that the case is depending in Chancerie, and adiourned hither for difficultie in law, and there I must giue iudgement accord-second, yet I coulde not haue escaped by silence, from offending in the first and last. And if Festus thought it not reason, to send a prisoner, without shewing the causes which were layed against him, I might haue bene worthily and iustly censured, if vpon other mens arguments, and as it were fade implicito, I should haue pronounced my iudgement and sentence in so great a cause, without declaring the grounds and reasons whereupon I stood. Thus, ductie and necessitie (for, ratio sapienti necessitas) were the causes that induced mee to speake in this rare and weightie cause, and the force of truth moued mee to speake that which I did speake, without respect of pleasing or displeasing any. And so, hauing the warrant of a sincere conscience, which is truly said to be, ‘veluti comes, et testis, et iudex actionum.’ I haue in the Chancerie iudged and decreed the case for R. C. And the like iudgement is also giuen by the iudges of the King's Bench, in the assise depending in that court. The decree and iudgement being thus passed, diuerse vnperfect reports, and severall patches and pieces of my speech haue bin put in writing, and dispersed into many hands, and some offred to the presse. The king's maiestie, hauing knowledge thereof, mislied it; and thereupon commanded me to deliuer to him in writing, the whole discourse of that which I said in that cause.—Thus I was put to an vnexpected new labour, to reuiue my scribled and broken papers. Out of which (according to the charge imposed vpon me) I gathered all which I had before spoken, and so set it downe faithfully and plainly, and (as neare as I coulde) in the same words I vttered it. It pleased his sacred maiestie to take some view of it; and taking occasion thereby, to remember the diligence of the Lord Chief Iustice of the Common-Place, for the summary Report he had published of the Iudges arguments; he gaue mee in charge to cause this to be likewise put in print, to preuent the printing of such mistaken and vnperfect reports of it, as were already scattered abroad.—Whatsoeuer it is, it was first conceived and spoken out of conscience and duty; and is now published in humble obedience to my most gracious soueraine. And so I offer and comment it to your good acceptance and favourable interpretation.

ing to the law, whether the complainant bee inhabited, by lawe, to maintaine his suit in that court or not; I holde it more fitting to deliuer the reasons of my iudgement heere, where others haue bene heard, than there, before a few, which haue not heard that, which hath bene so learnedly argued and largely debated heere.

And therefore the case standing thus, I will speake what I thinke. And I must say as one of the graue iudges saied, I can tell no newes; but some old things which I haue read and obserued, I will remember; but I cannot diuine, or prophesie de futuris, I leaue that as iustice Yelverton did.

I am free and at libertie, 'nullius addictus in verba magistri,' and therefore I will speake ingenuously and freely.—In the arguing of this case, some things, which are of great weight with wee, haue, (in mine opinion) bene passed ouer too lightly: and some other things, which seeme to me but light, haue bene ouerweighed, as I thinke.—Halse an howers time longer or shorter I meane not to strife for; and therefore I will presume on your patience, and assume to myselfe such conuenient time as others haue done; and yet I will husband time as well as I can.—I will not be abashed to strengthen my weake memory with helpe of some scribled papers, as others haue done: for I account it a point of wisdome to followe wise mens examples. Other exordium, insinuation, protestation, or preface for the matter itselle either to prepare attentiu and beneuolent auditors, or to stirre offence or mislike against either partie, I meane not to vse. It is fit for orators; I neuer professed the art; I had neuer skill in it: and it is not decorum for iudges that ought to respect the matter, and not the humours of the hearers.—The exordium the ciuilians vse in their sentences I like well; 'in Dei nomine amen, et Deo prinitus inuocato.' Other exordium I care not for.

Robert Caluine, sonne and heire apparant of James lord Caluine of Colcrose in the realme of Scotland, an infant of three yeares of age, borne in the saied realme of Scotland, maketh title by his bill to a messuage and garden with th' appurtenances in the parish of St. Burtolph without Bishops-gate in the citie of London; and complaineth against Iohn Bingley, and Richard Griffin, for detaining the euidences concerning the same messuage and lands, and taking the profits thereof.—The defendants pleade, that the plaintife is an Alien; and that in the third yeere of his maiesties raigne of England, and in the 39th yeere of his maiesties raigne of Scotland, hee was borne in the realme of Scotland, within the ligeance of his said maiestie, of his realme of Scotland, and out of the ligeance of our soueraigne lord the king of his realme of England.—And the defendants say further, that at the time of the birth of the complainant, and long before, and ever sithence, the saied kingdome of Scotland was, and still is, ruled and governed by the proper lawes and statutes of the said kingdome of Scotland, and not by the lawes and statutes of this realme of England; and therefore the defendants demaund iudgement, whether the complainant ought to bee answered to his said bill, or shall be receiued to prosecute the said suite against the defendants, being for, and concerning the title of inheritance, and euidence touching the same.—Heereupon the complainant hath demurred in law.

This is the speciall case now depending in the Chancerie; in which, and touching all like cases in general, mine opinion is, and since the question was first mooued hath bene, that these Post-nati are not Aliens to the king, nor to his kingdome of England, but by their birth-right are liege subjects to the king, and capable of estates of inheritance and freehold of landes in England; and may haue and maintaine as wel real as personall actions for the same: and that therefore the now complainant Robert Caluine ought to bee answered.

This opinion I did first conceiue vpon those rules and reasons in lawe (as well the common law of England, as the Ciuile law) which heereafter in the course of my speech I will remember. And in this opinion I haue bene since confirmed by many great and weighty reasons.

First, in the statute made in the first yeare of his maiesties raigne of England, [16. Mart. 1603.] authorizing the Treatie betwene the commissioners for both the kingdomes, it is said (as iustice Warburton noted well) that both the famous and ancient realmes of England and Scotland are now vnted in allegiance and loyall subiection in his royall person, to his maiestie, and his posteritic for euer.

Heere wee haue the iudgement of the parliament, that there is a vnitie in allegiance to one royall person; and therefore I see not how wee may out of imaginarie conceits, and by subtile distinctions straine our wittes to frame severall allegiances to one and the same royall person, contrary to so plaine a declaration made by parliament.

Next followeth his maiesties Proclamation 20 Octobris 1604, by which hee assumed to himselfe the name and stile of king of Great Britaine: in which Proclamation, among many other weighty reasons, this is added for one, 'we haue receiued from those that be skilful in the lawes of the land, that immediately vpon our succession, diuerse of our aunient lawes of this realme are ipso facto expired; as namely, that of escuage, and of the naturalization of the subjects.' This was not done sodainely, nor lightly; but vpon graue and serious deliberation, and aduise: and therefore seemeth to mee to be a matter of great importance, and not to be lightly regarded.

The same 20th of October, these commissioners beganne their Treatie. Of the graue and iudicious course which they held, in debating of the matter then propounded, I will forbear to speake: but for this point of Naturalization now in question, their Resolution in the end was thus:—That it shall be propounded to both the parliaments at the next sessions, that an Act be made containing a Declaration, as followeth: that all the subjects of both the realmes, borne since the decease of Elizabeth the late queen of England of happie memory, and all, that shal be-born hereafter vnder the obedience of his maiestie and his royall progeny, are by the common lawes of both the realmes, and shall be for ever, inhabled to obtaine, succede, inherite, and possesse all lands, goods, and chuttels, &c. as fully and amply as the subjects of either realme respectiue might haue done, or may doe in any sort within the kingdome where they were borne.—This, after long debating, and graue and deliberate consideration, was, in the end, the Resolution of the greater part of the commissioners, not one openly gamesaying it. And diuerse of the principall iudges of the realme were present at all times when the point was debated. And herein I note the wise and iudicious forme of that resolution, which was not to propound to the parliament the making of a new lawe, but a declaration of the common lawes of both the realmes in this question.—Now, if wee consider who these commissioners were, what lords of the higher house, and what persons of the common house, selected of all degrees, most eminent for their learning and iudgement, as well in ciuile and common law, as in knowledge, and experience other waies, being assisted by the graue iudges of the realme: if this, I say, be well considered, then this resolution must be accepted and esteemed as a matter of great and weighty importance, and much to be regarded in the deciding of this question.

According to this act of the commissioners, the case was propounded in the next session of parliament. In the higher house, the iudges were required to deliuer their opinions. There were then eleven iudges present; whereof tenne did with one ynfirme consent affirme the law to be, that the Postnati were not aliens, but natural subjects (one onely dissenting.) After this, the question was debated in a solempne conference between both the houses of parliament at severall times, and at great length, and with much libertie; nothing was omitted that wit or art could inuent to obiekt against this opinion; and that was done by men of great learning, and singular iudgment in the common lawe, and ciuile lawe, and by some other gentlemen of the common house, of rare gifts for their learning, knowl-dge, elocution and experience.—At this conference the iudges were present; who, after they had heard all that was, or could be said, did confirme their former opinions, which they had before deliuered in the higher house: three of the chiefe of them declaring their reasons, and all the rest (sauing one alone) concurring in the same. So, here was now a generall Resolution by all the iudges of the realme (one excepted) and that deliuered, not privately, but in parliament; which without more adoe had bene sufficient to haue decided and determined this question.

Touching the proclamation, it was discreetly and modestly said by a learned gentleman of the lower house, that it was of great respect, and much to be regarded; but yet it was not binding, nor concluding: for, proclamations can neither make, nor declare lawes; and besides, that this proclamation was not grounded vpon any resolution of the reuerend iudges; but vpon the opinion of some skilfull in the lawes of this land.—Of the strength of proclamations, being made by the king, by the aduise of his counsell and iudges, I will not discourse; yet I will admonish those that be learned and studious in the lawes, and by their profession are to giue counsell, and to direct themselves, and others, to take heede that they doe not contemne, or lightly regard such proclamations.—And to induce them thereunto, I desire them to looke vpon, and consider aduisedly these few proclamations, prouisions, or ordinaunces, which I will point out vnto them; and of what valifitie and force they haue bene holden to be in construction of lawe, albeit they be neither statutes, nor acts of parliament.

M. 4 H. 3. in Dower, the defendant pleaded, 'quod petens est de potestate regis Francie, et residens in Franciis; et prouisum est a consilio regis, quod nullus de potestate regis Francie respondeatur in Anglia, antequam Angli respondeantur de iure suo in Francia.' [Fitzh. dower. 179.] This the plaintifes attorney could not denie; and thereupon the iudgement was, ideo sine die.—Anno 26 Hen. 3, Certaine prouisions and ordinaunces were made which were called Prouisions Merton, where the king assembled his archbishops, bishops, earles, and barons for the coronation of the king, and his wife queene Elenor; and the words be, 'prouisum est in curia dom. regis apud Merton coram Willikeimo Cantuariensi archiepiscopo, et coepiscopis, suffraganeis suis; et coram maiori parte conium et baronum Anglie ibidem existentium pro coronatione ipsius domini regis et Elionore regine, pro qua omnes vocati fuerunt, cum tractatum esset de communi utilitate regni super articulis subscriptis, ita prouisum fuit et concessum, tam a predictis archiepiscopis, episcopis, comitibus, et baronibus, et alijs. De viduis primò, &c.'

Fitzherbert [Nat. Br. 32.] citeth a prouision made anno 19 H. 3. in these words, 'et prouisum fuit coram domino rege, archiepiscopis, episcopis, comitibus, et baronibus, quod nulla assisa vltima, presentationis de cetero capiatur de ecclesijs, prebendis nec de prebendis.'

This prouision was allowed and continued for lawe, vntill W. 2. anno 13 Edw. 1, cap. 5. which prouides the contrary by expresse words.

Anno 6 Ed. 1, the king and his iudges made certaine explanations of the statute of Gloucester, which are called Explanaciones Statuti Glocestria: and these be the words, 'Postmodum per dominum regem et iudiciarios suos facta sunt quedam explanaciones quorundam articulorum superius postorum.' Which explanations haue ever since bene received as a law.

There is a proclamation by king Ed. 3, bearing teste at Westminster anno 15 Ed. 3. And iudge Thorpes opinion pa. 39 Ed. 3, 7. both which I will now forbear to report, and wish the students to reade the same in the printed bookes, where they shall see both the effect, and the reason, and the cause thereof; they are worth their reading, and may informe and direct them what iudgement to make of proclamations.

Touching the opinion of the iudges, some haue objected (yet modestly, and I suppose, according to their conscience and vnderstanding) that there is not like regarde to be had of iudges opinions giuen in parliament, as ought to bee of their iudgements in their proper courts and seates of iustice: for, in those places their oath bindeth them; but not so in the other.—1. To this I answer: the reuerence, and worthinesse of the men is such, as is not to bee quarrelled and doubted of, if there were no oathe at all: for, if men of so great and eminent places feare not God and his iudgments, euen out of a religious conscience, which is, 'frænum ante peccatum, et flagrum post peccatum,' it may be doubted that the externall ceremonie of adding a booke will little auale.—2. Their oath doth bind them as much in the court of parliament, as in their proper courts: for, that is the supreme court of all: and they are called thither by the kings writ, not to sit as tell-clocks, or idle hearers; but, 'quod personaliter intersitis nobiscum, ac cum cæteris de consilio nostro super dictis negotiis tractaturi, vestrumque consilium impensuri:' and those 'negotia' be 'ardua et vrgentia negotia regni, &c.' And their oath, amongst other things, is, that they shall counsell the king truly in his businesse.—3. This exception may serue aguinste the iudges, as well in cases when they sit and giue iudgement, as iustices of Assises, Nisi Prius, Oyer and Terminer, and Gaole Deliuerie, as in this case of parliament: for, there they haue none other oath but their generall oath.—4. It becomes vs to esteeme of iudges now, as our forefathers esteemed them in times past; for, as they succede them in time and place (I thanke God, and the king, I haue neither cause to feare any for displeasure, nor to flatter any for fauour: wherefore I will neither be afraid, nor abashed to speake what I thinke :) I say therefore, that as our iudges now succede the former iudges, in time and place; so they succede them, and are not inferior to them in wisdome, learning, integritie, and all other iudicious and religious vertues.

Then let vs see what the wisdome of parliaments in times past attributed to the iudges opinions declared in parliament; of which there be many examples; but I will trouble you but with two or three.

I will not remember Richard the 2d's time (of which some of our chroniclers doe talke idely, and vnderstand little) where power and might of some potent persons oppressed iustice, and faithful iudges, for expounding the law soundly, and truly.—1. The first, that I will remember, is this, in the parliament 28 H. 6, 16 Ianuarij, the commons made suite, that W. de la Poole duke of Suffolke should bee committed to prison for many treasons and other hainous crimes committed by him. The lordes in parliament were in doubt what answer to giue; they demaunded the opinion of the iudges. Their opinion was, that hee ought not to bee committed; and their reason was, for that the commons did not charge him with anie particular offence, but with generall slaunders and reports: and therefore because the specialties were not shewed, hee was not to bee committed. This opinion was allowed; and therupon 28 Ianuarij, the commons exhibited certaine speciall articles against him, viz. that he conspired with the French king to inuade the realme, &c. And thereupon hee was committed to the Tower.—2. In the parliament anno 31 H. 6, in the vacation (the parliament being continued by prorogation) Thomas Thorpe the Speaker was condemned in a thousand pounds damages in an action of trespassse, brought against him by the duke of Yorke, and was committed to prison in execution for the same. After, when the parliament was re-assembled, the commons made suite to the king and the lordes, to haue Thorpe the Speaker deliuered, for the good exploits of the parliament; whereupon the duke of Yorke counsell declared the whole case at large. The lordes demaunded the opinion of the iudges, whether, in that case, Thorpe ought to bee deliuered out of prison by priuiledge of parliament. The iudges made this answer, that they ought not to determine the priuiledge of that high court of parliament; but for the declaration of proceeding in lower courts, in cases where writtes of supersedeas for the priuiledge of the parliament be brought vnto them, they answered, that if any person that is a member of the parliament bee arrested in such cases as be not for treason or felonie, or for suretie of peace, or condemnation had before the parliament, it is vsed that such persons be released, and may make attorney, so as they may haue their freedome and libertie, freely to intend the parliament. Hereopou it was concluded, that Thorpe should still remaine in prison according to the lawe, notwithstanding the priuiledge of parliament, and that hee was the Speaker. Which resolution was declared to the commons by Walter Moyle, one of the king's serieants at lawe. And then the commons were commaunded in the kings name, by the bishop of Lincolne (in the absence of the abp. of Canterbury, then chauncellor) to chuse another Speaker.—3. In the parliament an. 7 H. 8, a question was moued, whether spirituall persons might bee conuented before temporall iudges for criminall causes. There sir Iohn Fineux and the other iudges deliuered their opinion, that they might and ought to bee so. And their opinion was allowed, and maintained by the king and the lordes: and D. Standish, who before had holden the same opinion, was deliuered from the bishops. And it is worth the noting, what wordes passed in that case betweene the archbishop of Canterbury and that worthy iudge Fineux.—t. If a writ of error bee brought in parliament vpon a iudgement given in the King's Bench, the lords of the higher house alone (without the commons) are to examine the errors; but that is by the aduise and counsell of the iudges, who are to informe them what the lawe is, and so to direct them in their iudgement. And if the iudgement bee reuersed, then commundement is to bee given to the lord chancellour to doe execution accordingly. And so it was in anno 17 R. 2, in a writte of error brought in parliament by the deane and chapter of Lichfield, against the prior and convent of Newport-Pannell, as appeareth by the record. But if the iudgement bee affirmed, then the court of the King's-bench are to proceed to execution of the iudgment, as it appeareth in Flowerdewes case, P. 1. li. 7. fol. 19. But it is to bee noted, that in all such writtes of error, the lords are to proceede according to the lawe; and for their iudgment therein they are informed and guided by the iudges, and doe not follow their owne opinions or discretions otherwise.

This extrauagant discourse touching proclamations, and iudges opinions deliuered in parliament, and how they ought to bee regarded, I haue thought materiall and necessarie, both in respect of the time wherein wee liue, and the matter which we haue in hand. And these bee thinges which I thinke haue bene too lightly passed ouer. But if you condemne it as impertinent, I must then confesse I haue presumed too much vpon your patience; I pray you beare with mee, it is but my labour lost, and a little time mis-spent, if it seem so vnto you; you are wont to pardon greater faultes; call it either a passe-time, or waste-time as pleaseth you. Now, to returne to the case we haue in hand.

The generall question hauing had this passage (by proclamation, by commission, and by debating in parliament) remaineth yet without conclusion or iudgement: and as euery man abounds in his owne sence, so euery one is left to his owne opinion; specially those that were not satisfied with the graue resolution of the iudges in parliament, which (although some may tearne and account as bare opinions) I must alwayes valew, and esteeme as a reall and absolute iudgement. Now, I say, this generall question is reduced to two particular cases, and is iudicially depending in two the highest courts of iustice in this realme; and that is by one complainant against severall defendants for the freehoule and inheritance of severall parcells of land: and (as Mr. Solicitor said well) is a case, not fained, nor surmised, but a true case betweene true parties: and being questio iuris, non facti, is by both these courts adourned hither to bee decided, and determined by all the iudges of England, as the rarenesse of the case, and the weight and importance of it, both for the present and the future, doth require.—And the case being of this nature and qualitie, it is not amisse to obserue the proceeding in it: for, it is worth the obseruing, and not to bee forgotten. The defendants counsell, men of great learning, and in their profession inferiour to none of their qualitie and degree, men conuersant and well exercised in the question, and such as in the great conference in parliament, most of them were specially selected and chosen, for so they well deserved, as most sufficient, able, and fit, as well for learning and knowledge, as for all other giftes of witte and nature, to handle so great and rare a question. And although it hath pleased them of their good discretion to vae the paines but of a few in the debating and arguing of the case at the barre: yet no doubt that was done vpon mature deliberation and conference with all the residue: and whatsoever the spirites, the learning, the wisdom, and knowledge of all the others, vpon long study, could affoorde, was put into the mouth of those few to serue as organs and instruments to deliuer it vnto vs: which they haue so well and sufficiently performed, that they deserue great praise and commendation: for, in my poore opinion, the witte of man could not deuisse to say more touching this question in lawe than they haue said. And whatsoever hath bene sithence spoken for that part, it is for the matter but the same in substance, which the counsell at the barre did deliuer; though it hath bene varied in forme, and amplified with other wordes and phrases, and furnished with shew of some other strained cases and authorities.

The handling of it by the learned and reuerend iudges hath bene such, as it may appeare to the world, that euery one hath spoken his owne heart and conscience; and hath laboured by long studie to search out the lawe and the true reason of the lawe in this rare case; and so they haue spoken, as coram Deo et angelis: none, with desire to seeme popular; for nothing ought to bee tum populari quam veritati: none to seeme to be time-seruers, or displeasers; for the king (whome vnder God they serue) being pater patrie, and soueraigne head of both these great vniued kingdome, is to them both, like as the head of a naturall body is to all the members of the same, and is not, nor cannot bee partiall more to one than to another. Hee deliuech in truth, and desireth it; and without truth hee cannot bee pleased. He ruleth by his lawe, and commaundeth his iudges to minister to all his subjects lawe and iustice sincerely, and truly; and equilly and iudifferently, without any partiall respect.

It was neuer seene, but that in all rare and difficult cases, there haue bene diuersitie of opinions; but yet without breach of charitie, which is the bond of vnitie. So it hath happened in this case. The case hath bene argued at large by fourteene learned iudges; twelue of them haue concurred in iudgement, but vpon severall reasons; for, as many wayes may leade to one end of the journey; so diuerse and severall reasons may conduce to one true and certaine conclusion.—And here I may not omit the woorthie memorie of the late graue and reuerend iudge, sir John Popham, chiefe iustice of the King's bench deceased, a man of great wisdom, and of singular learning and iudgement in the lawe, who was absolutely of the same opinion, as he often declared, as well in open parliament, as otherwise.

The apostle Thomas doubted of the resurrection of our Saviour Iesus Christ, when all the rest of the apostles did firmly beleefe it: But that his doubting confirmed, in the whole church, the faith of the resurrection.—The two woortly and learned iudges that haue doubted in this case, as they beare his name, so I doubt not but their doubting hath giuen occasion to cleare the doubt in others; and so to confirme in both the kingdomes, both for the present and the future, the truth of the iudgement in this case.

Thus my lords, haue you hitherto nothing from mee but Amen, to that which all the iudges (sauiug two) haue saied; and much more you cannot expect from mee: yet, since I must giue iudgement in this case; and I saied in the beginning, that I would render the reasons of my iudgement (for that is the course of argument I must hoolde); I will now deliuer vnto you, what are the speciall and principall reasons that first haue induced mee, and still moue mee to houlde the opinion that I doe: and as I goe, I will indeuour to cleere some doubts and questions, that partly in the conference in parliament, and partly otherwise, I haue heard in; not onely touching this case it selfe, but also touching the forme and manner how it is to be decided and iudged.—The case is rare, and new (as it hath bene often saied); it was neuer decided terminis terminantibus; it was neuer iudged by any statute lawe, which is a positue lawe; nor by iudgement of the iudges of the common lawe.

Now, the first question is, as some would haue it, how it is to be iudged, and by what lawe; and haue wished that it might haue stayed vntill the parliament, and so bee decided by parliament. They that make this doubt, I will let them demurre, and die in their doubts: for, the case beeing adiourned hither before all the iudges of England, is now to be iudged by them according to the common lawe of England; and not tarrie for a parliament: for, it is no transcendent question, but that the common lawe can and ought to rule it, and ouer-rule it, as iustice Williams said well.—But then this question produceth another; that is, what is the common lawe of England? whether it be ius scriptum, or non scriptum? and such other like niceties: for, wee haue in this age so many questionists; and quo modo and quare, are so common in most mens mouthes, that they leaue neither religion, nor lawe, nor king, nor counsell, nor policie, nor government out of question.

And the end they haue in this question, what is the common lawe, is to shake and weaken the ground and principles of all government; and in this particular question of the law of England, to overthrow that law whereby this realme hath many hundred yeares bene gouerned in all honour and happinesse: or at least to cast an aspersion vpon it, as though it were weake and vncertaine. I will therefore declare mine opinion in this point plainly and confidently, as I thinke in my conscience, and as I finde to be sufficiently warranted by ancient writers, and good authorities voide of all exception.

The common law of England is grounded vpon the law of God, and extendes it selfe to the originall lawe of nature, and the vniuersall lawe of nations.—When it respectes the church, it is called Lex Ecclesie Anglicane, as Magna Charta, ca. 1. 'Ecclesia Anglicana habeat omnia sua iura integra et illæsa.'—When it respectes the crowne, and the king, it is sometimes called Lex Coronæ, as in stat. 25 Edw. 3, cap. 1. 'Lex Coronæ Angliæ est et semper fuit, &c.' And it is sometimes called Lex Regia, as in Registro fo. 61. 'Ad iura regia spectat:' and 'ad conseruationem iurium coronæ nostræ, et ad iura regni ne depereant, &c.'—When it respectes the common subiects, it is called, Lex Terræ; as in Magna Charta ca. 39, 'Nisi per legale iudicium parium, vel per legem terræ.'—Yet, in all these cases, whether it respectes the church, the crown, or the subiects, it is comprehended vnder this generall terme, the common lawes of England: which although they bee for a great parte thereof reduced into writing; yet they are not originally leges scriptæ.

This I first learned of the late lord treasurer Burleigh (whose honourable memorie England can neuer forget) and hearing it from him, I indeuored by my priuate studie to satisfie my selfe thorowlie in it. And whosoever shall well consider the lawes of England, which were before the Conquest (whereof wee haue some remnants and patches) or since the Conquest vntill Magna Charta, anno 9 H. 3. will make little doubt of it.—In H. 2's time Glanville writeth thus; 'leges Anglicanas licet non scriptas, leges appellari non videtur absurdum.'—And in Hen. 3's time Bracton writeth thus: 'cum autem ferè in omnibus regionibus vtantur legibus et iure scripto, sola Anglia vsa est in suis finibus, iure non scripto et consuetudine; in ea quidem, ex non scripto ius venit quod vsus comprobauit.'

But I may not agree with Bracton, that 'sola Anglia vsa est iure non scripto:' for I find that the grauest, and the greatest learned writers of the Ciuile Lawe, both auncient and of this our time, doe hould the same opinion, touching the Ciuile Lawe it selfe, for thus they write: 'ex non scripto ius venit quod vsus approbauit.' And thus; 'ius ciuile dictum ex non scripto natum est.' And, 'ius non scriptum dicitur consuetudo, non quod scripto perpetuè careat, hoc enim falsum est: nam et consuetudines in memoriam constantiorem reducuntur in scripturam, vt cætera quoq; quæ sine scriptura perficiuntur: sed non scriptum ius est: id est, quod à scriptura vis eius non coepit nec pendet.' So, hereby it may appeare how in this wee concurre with the Ciuile Lawe.

But hereupon these questionists moue another question, viz. If the common lawe be not written, how then shall it be knowen?—To this I answer; it is the common custome of the realme, as Bracton saith, 'ius venit quod vsus comprobauit;' and it standeth vpon two maine pillars and principall parts, by which it is to bee learned and knowen.—1. The first is, certaine knowne principles and maxims, and auncient customes, against which there neuer hath beene, nor ought to bee any dispute. As in cases of subiects; an estate in fee-simple, for life, for yeeres, dower, curtesie, &c. in cases of the crowne, the female to inherite: the eldest sole to bee preferred: no respecte of half blood: no tenant in dower, or by the courtesie of the crowne; no disability of the king's person by infuene, &c.—2. The second is, where there be no such principles, then, former iudgements giuen in like cases: and these be but 'arbitria iudicium, et responsa prudentium,' receiued, allowed, and put in practise and execution by the king's authoritie.

Of these Bracton speaketh; 'ego H. de Bracton animum erexi ad vetera iudicia iustorum perscrutanda; facta ipsorum, consilia, et responsa in vnam summam redigendo compilauit.'

And before the Conquest, king Ethelbert caused a booke to bee made, which was called Decreta Iudiciorum: and king Alured did the like, as master Lambard, a iudicious and learned obseruer of antiquities, doth remember. [Lambard in explicatione verbi Hyde.]—Of these also the iudges speake H. 33, H. 6. Moyle, fo. 8, 'we rule the law according to 'the auncient course.' Ashton, fol. 9, 'all our lawe is guided by vse, and by statute.' And Prysot saith, fol. 9, 'there cannot be a 'positiue law, but such as was iudged or made 'by statute.' Wherein I note also that hee equalleth a iudgement with a statute.—In 36 H. 6, fol. 25, Fortescue reasoneth thus; 'the lawe is as I haue saide, and so hath beene 'alwaies since the lawe beganne.'—In 37 H. 6, f. 22, Ascue reasons thus; 'such a charter 'hath bin allowable in the time of our prede- 'cessours, which were as sage and learned as 'wee bee.'—In H. 4, Edw. 4, fol. 41, Mark- ham reasoneth thus; 'it is good for vs to doe 'as it hath bin vsed before this time, and not 'to keepe one way one day for one party, and 'another day the contrary for the other party: 'and so the former precedents be sufficient for 'vs to follow:' and iudgement was giuen accordingly.—And in the former case 36 H. 6, Fortescue saith further; 'wee haue many 'courses and formes which be holden for lawe.'

Also euerie one of these foure principall courts, the Chaucery, King's Bench, Com- mou-Plees, and Eschequer, haue in many things scuerall courses and formes which are obserued for law, and that not onely in that proper court, but also in all courtes through the realme; whereof many examples be remembred in the case of the Mines in Plowden's Commentaries,

3. The third: but if there be no such former iudgements, nor direct examples or precedents, then this rule hath a further extention, which is this.
