Of the sources of prejudice in religion, some of the most productive are those which belong to the antagonisms of party. People place themselves, or find themselves on antagonistic sides, and there springs up a disposition to view with dislike whatever is characteristic of the opposition. And it is remarkable how much the strongest natures may be swayed by this powerful and subtle influence. Let us take the case of Jerome, in the fifth century. Every one knows in what reverence he held the decisions of the Church, and with what relentless severity he pursued the gainsayer. It was his boast that he had never spared the heretics, but had always treated the Church's enemies as his own. In promoting monasticism, Jerome, by his example as well as his pen and voice, did all that man could do. Among other opponents whom he tried to silence was the presbyter Vigilantius, a man who seems to have got hold of many of those common-sense and Scriptural views that at the present day are our protection against ascetic tend-How did Jerome treat him? Among other points of controversy between them, one related to the lawfulness or propriety of certain nocturnal services or vigils, with which some of the festivals were attended. They were a mere substitution for pagan rites, and the scandals with which they were attended were notorious. the practice was a venerable one, and had received the sanction of the Church; and besides, the person who complained of them was this Vigilantius, a sort of obstinate protestant, who was always setting himself against church authority. The night vigils, therefore, found a strenuous defender in Jerome; their debaucheries were overlooked by the greatest ascetic of the age. "This doctor," as has been well said, "who would himself cheerfully have burned rather than sanction the marriage of a priest, is now heard pouring execrations upon an opponent whose extent of crime was to assert, on the one hand, the lawfulness of clerical matrimony, and to deny, on the other, the expediency of promiscuous nocturnal assemblages in churches !"

The prejudices of party are naturally intensified by protracted and bitter strife. Especially if the conflict has been one of life and death. And in that fiery furnace, the antagonism becomes indiscriminate, and is burned into the very character with an intensity that keeps it from wearing out for generations. During the early history of the Reformed Church of Scotland, there was no such intense horror of some of the usages of Episcopacy as came afterwards to prevail. The Churches of Scotland and England were in several respects nearer to each other, and the contrast which now prevails between their modes of worship was by no means so conspicuous. The Scottish Reformers were remarkably firm in claiming for their Church the constitution which they believed to be at ouce the most Scriptural and the best adapted to the circumstances of their country. But that they had no indiscriminate prejudice against English ways death on the Gallow-hill.

was evident from the institution of "Superintendents," from the sanction of a service-book for voluntary use, from the repetition of the Creed, the singing of Gloria Patri, and several other practices in their worship. But there came a time when unhappily it was attempted by fire and sword to force prelacy, in its most odious and offensive form, upon the people of Scotland. The resistance to this measure forms one of the noblest chapters of Scottish history, and has burnt its mark deep into the very nature of the people. The struggle was for life, and everything that made life dear; blood crimsoned the hills and moorlands, the Grassmarket of Edinburgh rang with dving testimonies.* and the martyrs of the Covenant were counted by thousands. It is not surprising that, after this, the feelings of the Scottish people against the English Church were greatly intensified, and "black prelacy" became a synonym for everything horrible. The line of demarcation between the Churches became more distinct, and several practices that had prevailed in the early period were altogether discontinued. The feelings of the people settled down into a vague horror of everything Anglican; and by a curious but natural enough perversion of language, every feature in which English worship differed from the Scotch was stigmatised as prelatical. It might be current among Presbyterians everywhere else, -in Holland, France, Germany, Scandinavia, America; but its being Euglish was enough to condemn it, and to stigmatise any one who had a leaning to it as a recreant son of the Presbyterian Church. Out of this condition of indiscriminate prejudice many are now happily emerging. Thoughtful and temperate men are walking round the Scottish Zion with a more open and candid eye, marking her ancient bulwarks, and considering her Presbyterian towers, and all the more impressed—because they have left prejudice behind them-with the truly strong and vital points of the system, and the duty of maintaining them, "whatsoever trouble or persecution may arise." At the same time, they are opening their eyes to lesser points in which profitable lessons may be got from England, or from any other quarter whatever. Those who are influenced by these views should not be confounded with any that would surrender everything for which their fathers fought and died, and lay down the Scottish Church, penitent and submissive, at the feet of her more powerful Anglican sister. Yet there are some men who laugh at such discrimination, who make it

^{*} Close to the writer's house is a rising-ground that used to be called the Gallow-hill, adjacent to a piece of nursery-ground, still called the Gallow-lee. Many of the martyrs of the Covenant perished here. It seems at the time to have been a lonely, unfrequented place; and it appears from Wodrow that executions were so common in the Grassmarket, that a rising of the inhabitants was sometimes dreaded, and hence many convicts were sent to this out-of-the-way spot to be executed at an early hour of the morning. A large number of those countemorated in the "Cloud of Witnesses" met their death on the Callow hill their endeavour to blow up all the ancient prejudices to the red heat of the "killing time," and affirm, and perhaps believe, that the slightest change from the practice of the last two centuries is sure to end in a full-blown system of Popish ritualism!

Nearly akin to the source of prejudice that has been under our view is that which is connected with extraordinary devotion to particular systems. Prejudice here springs from an exaggerated notion of the primary purpose of creeds. Instead of being regarded as designed to set forth revealed truth in opposition to error, they are looked on as a summary embodiment of all truth, and of all possible forms or aspects of truth; and everything which is not cast in the same mould is either viewed with suspicion, or rejected as erroneous. No allowance is made for those differences, whether of intellectual or spiritual temperament, which dispose good men to look at different sides of revealed truth, and to give prominence to one or other of these in their teaching. This is the more remarkable, that in the case of the leading Apostles, who were inspired to be the permanent teachers of the Church, the difference of temperament and of favourite views is so remarkable. Peter, with his favourite view of the Christian salvation as a redemption from the vain conversation and lust of the natural heart, and a translation into fellowship with the living Saviour; John, with his intense reverence for the person of Christ, and fondness for regions warmed with the brightest beams of the Divine love; James, with his plain, practical, realistic tendency, deeply concerned about common duties, and insisting that, whatever else the Church may be, she shall at least be moral; Paul, wonderfully combining the peculiarities of all the three, and expounding, more clearly and forcibly than any of them, the principles that underlie the Christian scheme of salvation—furnish us with types of Christian teaching so diverse, and yet so plainly the same in essence, that it becomes difficult to respect the prejudice that has no toleration for any divergence from one recognised type. Such divergence does not necessarily imply the subversion of any of the other forms, any more than St. James subverts St. Paul, or St. John St. Peter. Yet we have sometimes thought that if a volume of sermons modelled, but unavowedly, on the Epistle of James were to be published, it would be very likely to find a place in the Index Expurgatorius of some very excellent people. We know, indeed, the intensity of Luther's prejudice against that Epistle, arising from the feeling, which is now felt to be so unwarranted, that its teaching subverted the great articulus stantis aut cadentis ecclesiæ. In this case, the effects of prejudice were peculiarly disastrous: the book was cast out of the canon as an "epistle of straw." small error, surely, for such a man as Luther to fall into; and no slight warning to men of other times, to be on their guard against the prejudice that would hold even the Almighty limited to a single view of truth and duty.

The prejudice derived from excessive love of systems is often painfully exemplified in the judgment formed of the character and doings of persons known to belong to a different school. Men find it extremely difficult to believe that there can be true Christian excellence on the part of persons who in any way deviate from recognised opinions or practices. Yet both Scripture and Providence are frequently presenting us with facts that clash rudely with this theory. Our Lord taught that many would come from the East and the West and sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, while the children of the kingdom should be cast into utter darkness. It was a shrewd saying of Matthew Henry, that he believed he would get two great surprises in the kingdom of Heaven-to find many there he never expected to see, and to miss many he thought he was sure to find. A story is told of one of the best and worthiest ministers that Scotland ever produced, -old Ebenezer Brown of Inverkeithing,-who one snowy winter day, on his way to a prayer-meeting at North Queensferry, was tumbled by his pony into a ditch at the road-side, where he would have probably perished, had not some carters, bringing up whisky casks from the Ferry, seen the catastrophe. We must let his grand-nephew tell the story in his own words. "The carters rushed up, and raising him and dichtin' him, with much commiseration and blunt speech, said, 'Puir auld man, what brocht ye here in sic a day?' There they were, a rough crew, surrounding the saintly man, some putting on his hat, soothing and cheering him, and others knocking the balls off the pony's feet and stuffing them with grease. He was most polite and grateful, and one of these cordial ruffians having pierced a cask, brought him a horn of whisky and said, 'Tak that, it'll hearten ye.' He took the horn and, bowing to them, said, 'Sirs, let us give thanks!' And there, by the roadside, in the drift and storm, with these wild fellows, he asked a blessing on it, and for his kind deliverers, and took a tasting of the horn. The men cried like children. They lifted him on his pony, one going with him, and when the rest arrived in Inverkeithing they repeated the story to everybody, and broke down in tears whenever they came to the blessing: 'And to think o' askin' a blessin' on a tash o' whisky!' Next Presbytery day, after the ordinary business was over, he rose up-he seldom spoke-and said, 'Moderator, I have something personal to myself to say. I have often said that real kindness belongs only to true Christians, but'-and then he told the story of these men-'but more true kindness I never experienced than from these lads. They may have the grace of God-I don't' know; but I never mean again to be so positive in speaking of this matter."

A caution against this class of prejudices must not be held to imply either that the occasional occurrence of moral beauty apart from revealed truth proves that truth and life are unconnected, or that the existence of much Christian excellence where our symbols are not received, should make us indifferent to the heritage of truth that has been handed down to us by our fathers. Though one may occasionally find flowers in a desert, or trees growing in the cleft of a precipice, it does not follow that flowers have no connexion with cultivation, or that trees are independent of soil and shelter. The occasional occurrence of moral beauty apart from Christian truth does not affect the sad picture of the unconverted world in the Epistle to the Ephesians: "At that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." And we may quite well afford to look round with an open and unprejudiced eye among Christians of other creeds, without drifting into the notion that there is nothing distinctively excellent in our own. Devout minds, especially in a country that has had a marked providential history, will reverently recognise, in the attainments of their fathers, a heritage of which the sons are constituted the guardians, and which, though not binding their consciences by a positive descending obligation, it were shameful to cast-carelessly to the winds. In the course of the American war, no more striking words were spoken than those of Mr. Lincoln in the graveyard of Gettysburg, when he called on the survivors to complete their task, and thus give a value to the sacrifice of their comrades, whose bodies were in the graves around them. It is through future generations that value is given to the sacrifices of the past; and we should be showing ourselves faithless to the trust which Providence commits to us if we made light of the heritage bought and handed down to us at so great a cost.

The prejudices of system might be illustrated, more curiously perhaps than profitably, from our prophetic literature. The Stock Exchange is not the only region where illegitimate speculation pre-The tendency of imaginative minds to form minute theories of the future, from the prophetic symbols, is surely an illegitimate use of a portion of Scripture, which, when rightly used, is as fertile in feelings of reverence for God as in those of hope for the world. Once a compact Apocalyptic theory is formed, even facts themselves become the objects of prejudice. It is said of a well-known Apocalyptic writer, that he refused to believe the report of the death of the son of Napoleon I., so sure was he that in the plans of Providence he had an important part to perform. This writer, however, was comforted when Louis Napoleon succeeded to the throne of his uncle, and especially when he began to take an interest in the affairs of Italy. Of late years, we apprehend, his proceedings have not been quite so satisfactory; for is it not part of his rôle to become King of Rome, and fulfil the symbol of the eighth head of the Empire, who was to be of the seven, the same, yet different? In some cases the prejudice caused by Apocalyptic theories produces a jaundiced view of every movement one, and the public would be warned against it in going on at the present day. It is postulated by a prevalent theory, that the world shall become day by day darker and more daring in its wickedness. The demands of this theory lead even amiable and hopeful men to the most gloomy views of every feature of the times, and impel them to impute evil designs and aims to prominent men in a tone that cannot be reconciled with the spirit of charity.

Prejudices, in many cases, are due to the vis inertiæ of mankind. Some one appears propounding schemes that, if they were to be adopted, would cause trouble, change, uncertainty. A great neglected duty, like that of missions, is asserted; or a great scheme of Christian union is proposed; or an important change of policy or of organisation is demanded, when a wave of dislike rolls over a large section of those concerned, caused mainly by the shock that is given to their vis inertice. About half a century ago, a worthy old gentleman was professor of chemistry in one of the Colleges at Aberdeen. He had framed a course of lectures on his science which had enabled him decently and comfortably to discharge the duties of the chair during a considerable incumbency. In his old age, the received theory of the constitution of salts began to be attacked by Humphrey Davy, and discoveries were announced unsettling the opinions of all former chemists. In the course of time, the voice of the revolutionist was heard even at Aberdeen, and a deference began to be shown to it that troubled the worthy professor. But his Aberdonian caution stood him in good stead. He would give his old theories just as before, merely adding an explanatory note: - "There's a man called Davy telling us now that all this is He is a troublesome man Mr. Davy, a very troublesome man; but we'll just wait awhile, till we see." The dread of trouble may often have to do with the reception or the rejection of religious proposals or practices. Of course, it is in some measure a fair consideration. Unnecessary trouble is to be avoided. But the consideration is not of itself enough to justify the rejection or the reception of anything. It must be looked at in the lumen siccum. It must be considered on its own merits. Still less is the consideration enough to justify the imputation of bad motives, or the branding of any one as daugerous. Yet how often are these things due in great part to dislike of trouble-unwillingness to be disturbed!

A vague dread of consequences is another source of prejudice. The child that would not say A because if he did he would have to say B, has his compeers in older circles. And hence it is that any opinion, even if it be new, has a far better chance of getting fair treatment, if advanced by a man known to be cautious and conservative, than by one suspected to be fast and impetuous. There are positions in the new book of De Pressensé on the Life of Christ that, if advanced by a more suspected writer, would receive the severest denunciations. The book containing such positions would be pronounced a bad the strongest manner. But, as the proverb says, "One man may steal a horse, when another dare not look over the wall." De Pressensé stands well with all classes of the religious public, and is not suspected of revolutionary tendencies; his most rigid critics, therefore, will give a discriminating review of his book, praising what they like, and taking exception to what is distasteful. Would it really damage the interests of truth and righteousness if this style of criticism were to be generally practised?

There is a lurking feeling in some minds that prejudices, if only they are on the right side, are not such bad things after all. We will not wholly dispute the position, because a great mass of people have so few opportunities of investigation, and so small a faculty of judging, that many of their opinions are little better than prejudices, and of course it is better that they should be right than wrong. But, on the other hand, we must not flatter ourselves that prejudices even on the right side never do harm. Young persons brought up to believe in views and practices without reasons, are extremely liable to have their whole system of belief shaken, when, going elsewhere, they find that many of these traditional opinions have been mistakes. Impress on any one that Popery is a system of unmitigated evil, that the Popish Church in her every member is corrupt to the core, and that reverence, love, holiness, are never to be found in her communion; let that person so instructed go abroad, and fall in, it may be, with proofs of a devotion, an unworldliness, a fervour of soul that quite captivate him; -the probability is he will rush to the conclusion that everything he has heard about Popery is a mistake, and that it is the best religion and the true Church after all. We believe this is not a mere supposition. On the other hand, let one be taught to view even Popery with fairness and candour. Let a discriminating view be taken of her grievous errors and faults, and at the same time let due weight be given to any points in which she has shown superiority. Let the benefits of Protestantism be set forth with due allowance for any drawbacks which belong to her. The chances are, that when a young person so instructed goes to

Roman Catholic countries he will have his faith in the strong features of Protestantism, and his dislike of Popery as a whole more firmly established than ever. On questions of the most vital import the same holds true. In the hour of conflict, to an ingenuous mind, prejudice is the weakest of all weapons. The Apostle's rule is the true stronghold: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

The desire to escape the influence of prejudice in matters of religion has no necessary connexion with revolutionary tendencies. On the contrary, the probable effect of the expulsion of prejudice from religious discussions would be, the more rapid and satisfactory re-establishment of the great vital doctrines, accompanied only with those slight modifications of shading and colouring which are demanded by the spirit of the times, and which the succession of ages has so often brought about in the history of Christianity. On the other hand, when advocates of change are exposed to every bitter taunt that prejudice can devise, -to treatment which seems to them both disingenuous and unfair, -there is far less chance of their retiring from their position, by coming to an agreement with their opponents. Counter-prejudices are apt to be raised in them against the other side, and a chronic warfare ensues, in which personal bitterness becomes a far more powerful agent than zeal for truth. The present writer is no advocate of revolution; he would rather that his right hand should forget its cunning than that he should write a word fitted to unsettle a single mind in the great vital doctrines of the faith. He is disposed to take a hopeful view of what may be the final outcome of all the prevailing agitation in questions of religion, tumultuous and confused though it be at present. But, in order to a satisfactory ending of these agitations, it is indispensable that combatants on all sides shall be more earnest and conscientious in seeking the lumen siccum: more moderate and candid in judging of one another; more disposed to make allowances for diversities of various kinds; and more regardful of the divine canon-"Whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing."

MADONNA MARY.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART VI.

CHAPTER XXII.

THERE followed after this a time of such tranquillity as had never yet entered into Mrs. Ochterlony's life. Mary had known joy, and she had known sorrow, as people do to whom life comes with full hands, giving and taking; but it had always been life, busy and personal, which left her little leisure for anything beyond the quickly recurring duties of the hour and day. She had had no time to watch the current how it flowed, being as it were part of it, and going along with it in its ceaseless course. But now all this was changed. After Winnie's marriage a sudden tranquillity fell upon the ladies in the cottage. Life had gone on and left them; they were no longer going with the tide, but standing by upon the bank watching it. They were not unhappy, nor was their existence sad, -for the three boys were world enough to satisfy the two women and keep them occupied and cheerful; and when the children were asleep, Aunt Agatha and her niece were, as people say, company for each other, and talked over their work as they sat by the evening lamp, or in the twilight garden, which was always so green and so sweet,-and were content, or more than content; but still sometimes Mrs. Ochterlony would bethink herself, and it would seem as a dream to her that she, too, had once taken her part with the others and gone with the stream, and suffered cruel sufferings and tasted sudden joys, and been Hugh Ochterlony's wife. Was it so? Or had she never been but with Aunt Agatha by the little river that ran steadily one day like another under the self-same trees? This strange sense of unreality in the past turned her giddy by-times, and made her head swim and the world to go round and round; but, to be sure, she never spoke of these sensations, and life continued, and the boys grew, and everything went very well on Kirtell-side.

Everything went so well that Aunt Agatha many a day pitied the poor people who were out in the world, or the young men who set out from the parish to begin their career, and would say, "Oh, if they but knew how much better everybody is at home!" Mary was younger, and perhaps she was not quite of the same mind; but still it was peace that had fallen upon her and was wrapping her all round like a garment. There was the same quiet routine every day; the same things to do, the same places to walk to, the same faces to see. Nothing unforeseen ever arrived to break the calm. When Hugh was old enough to begin serious lessons. a curate turned up in the course of nature who took pupils, and to whom Islay, too, went by and by, and even little Wilfrid, who was always delicate. The boys went to him with shining morning faces, and came back growing louder and stronger, and, as Peggy said, more "stirring" every day. And Sir Edward made his almost daily visit, and let a thin and gentle echo of the out-of-door din into the cottage quiet. He told them in his mild way what was going on, and talked about the news in the papers, and about the books reviewed, and about the occasional heavenly visitant in the shape of a new publication that found its way to Kirtell-side. There were few magazines then, and no cheap ones, and a single Blackwood did for a good many families. Sir Edward himself, who had been always considered intellectual, took in the Edinburgh all for himself, and lent it to his neighbours; but then it could not be expected that many people in a district could be so magnificent as that. When the Curate, on the other hand, came to tea (he was not the sort of man, as Aunt Agatha said, that one would think of making a dinner for), it was all about the parish that he talked; and as Mrs. Ochterlony was a perverse woman in her way, and had her own ideas about her poor neighbours, such conversation was not so interesting to her as it might have been. But it was in this sort of way that she spent the next ten or twelve years of her life.

As for Winnie, she was having her day, as she had said, and was, it is to be supposed, enjoying it. She wrote letters regularly and diligently, which is one point in which a woman, however little elevated she may be above her masculine companion in other respects, always has the better of him. And she possessed a true feminine gift which ought also to be put in the compensating scale against those female drawbacks which are so often insisted upon. Sometimes she was ill-tempered, sometimes bitter in her letters, for the honeymoon happiness naturally did not last for ever; but, whatever mood Winnie might be in, she always threw an unconscious halo of interest around herself when she wrote. It was, as everybody might see, an instinctive and unpremeditated act, but it was successful to the highest extent. Whether she described her triumphs or her disappointments, her husband's kindness or his carelessness, their extravagant living or their want of money, Winnie herself, in the foreground of the pieture, was always charmingly, and sometimes touchingly, posed. A word or two did it, and it was done to perfection; and the course of her history thus traced was followed by Aunt Agatha with an unfailing enthusiasm. She herself went through it all in the person of her favourite, and Mary connected herself with a vague but still fairer future in the persons of her boys. And thus the peaceful existence went on day by day, with nothing more serious to trouble it than a transitory childish ailment, or a passing rumour that the Percivals were "going too fast," or did not "get on,"—clouds which only floated mistily and momentarily about the horizon, and never came down to trouble the quiet waters. It was a time which left no record, and which by-times felt languid'and lingering to the younger woman, who was still too young to be altogether satisfied with so dead a calm in the middle of her existence; but still, perhaps, it was, on the whole, the happiest time of Mary's life.

This halcyon time lasted until the boys were so far grown up as to bring the disturbing plans and speculations of their beginning life into the household calm. It lasted until Islay was sixteen and ready to pass his examination for Woolwich, the long-headed boy having fixed his affections upon scientific soldiership in a way which was slightly disappointing to his mother, who, as was natural, had thought him capable of a more learned profession. It roused the cottage into something like a new stage of existence to think of and prepare for the entry of its nursling into that great vague unseen sphere which Aunt Agatha called the world. But, after all, it was not Islay who was the troublesome member of the family. He had fixed his thoughts upon his chosen profession almost as soon as he knew what was meant by his father's sword, whic's had hung in Mrs. Ochterlony's room from his ear'iest recollection; and though there might be a little anxiety about how he would succeed at his examination, and how he would get on when he left home, still Islay was so steady that no one felt any alarm or absolute disquiet about him.

But it was rather different with Hugh. Hugh was supposed to be his uncle's heir, and received as such wherever he went, with perhaps more enthusiasm than might have fallen to his share merely as Mary's son. He was heir presumptive, recognised to a certain extent at Earlston itself as elsewhere in that capacity; and yet Mr. Ochterlony had not, so far as anybody was aware, made any distinct decision, and might still alter his mind, and, indeed, was not too old to marry and have heirs of his own, which was a view of the subject chiefly taken by Aunt Agatha. And, to aggravate the position, Hugh was far from being a boy of fixed resolutions, like his brother. He was one of the troublesome people, who have no very particular bias. He liked everything that was pleasant. He was not idle, nor had he any evil tendencies; he was fond of literature in a way, and at the same time fond of shooting and hunting, and all the occupations and amusements of a country life. Public opinion in the country-side proclaimed him one of the nicest young fellows going; and if he had been Fraucis Ochterlony's son, and indisputably the heir of Earlston, Hugh would have been as satisfactory a specimen of a budding country gentleman as could have been found. But the crook in his lot was, that he was the heir presumptive, and at the same time was generous and proud and high-spirited, and not the kind of nature which could lie in wait for another man's place, or build his fortunes upon another man's generosity. His own opinion, no doubt, was that he had a right to Earlston; but he was far too great a Quixote, too high-fantastical in youthful pride and independence, to permit any one to say that it was his uncle's duty to provide for him. And withal, he did not himself know what manner of life to take up, or what to do. He would have made a good soldier, or a good farmer, different though the two things are; and would have filled, as well as most people, almost any other practical position which Providence or circumstances had set clearly before him. But no intuitive perception of what he was most fit for was in him to enlighten his way, and at the same time he began to be highly impatient, being eighteen, and a man as he thought, of waiting and doing nothing, and living

"If we could but have sent him to Oxford," Aunt Agatha said; "if I had the means!"—but it is very doubtful whether she ever could have had the means; and of late Aunt Agatha too had been disturbed in her quiet. Her letters to Winnie had begun to convey enclosures of which she did not speak much, even to Mrs. Ochterlony, but which were dead against any such possibility for Hugh.

"If I had been brought up at school where I might have got a scholarship, or something," said Hugh; "but I don't know why I should want to go to Oxford. We must send Will if we can, mother; he has the brains for it. Oxford is too grand an idea for me——"

"Not if you are to have Earlston, Hugh," said his mother.

"I wish Earlston was at the bottom of the sea," cried the poor boy; "but for Earlston, one would have known what one was good for. I wish my uncle would make up his mind and found a hospital with it, or marry, as Aunt Agatha says——"

"He will never marry," said Mary; "he was a great deal older than your father; he is quite an old man."

"Indeed, Mary, he is not old at all, for a man," said Aunt Agatha, with eagerness. "Ladies are so different. He might get a very nice wife yet, and children, for anything any one could tell. Not too young, you know—I think it would be a great pity if he were to marry anybody too young; but a nice person, of perhaps forty or so," said Aunt Agatha; and she rounded off her sentence with a soft little sigh.

"He will never marry, I am sure," said Mary, almost with indignation; for, not to speak of the injustice to Hugh, it sounded like an imputation upon her brother-in-law, who was sober-minded, and not thinking of anything so foolish; not to say that his heart was with his marble Venus, and he was indifferent to any other love.

"Well, if you think so, my dear—" said Miss Seton; and a faint colour rose upon her soft old check. She thought Mary's meaning was, that after his behaviour to herself, which was not exactly what people expected, he was not likely to entertain another affection; which was probably as true as any other theory of Mr. Ochterlony's couduct. Aunt Agatha thought this was Mary's meaning, and it pleased her. It was an old story, but still she remembered it so well, that it was pleasant to think he had not forgotten. But this, to be sure, had very little to do with Hugh.

"I wish he would marry," said his heir presumptive, "or put one out of pain one way or another. Things can't go on for ever like this. Islay is only sixteen, and he is starting already; and here am I eighteen past and good for nothing. You would not like me to be a useless wretch all my life?" said Hugh, severely, turning round upon his mother, who was not prepared for such an address; but Hugh, of all the boys, was the oue most like his father, and had the Major's "way."

"No," cried Mary, a little alarmed, "anything but that. I still think you might wait a little, and see what your uncle means. You are not so very old. Well, my dear boy! don't be impatient; tell me what you wish to do."

But this was exactly what Hugh could not tell. "If there had been no Earlston in the question, one would have known," he said. "It is very hard upon a fellow to be another man's nephew. I think the best thing I could do would be to ignore Earlston altogether, and go in for-anything I could make my own living by. There's Islay has had the first chance-

"My dear, one is surely enough in a family to be a soldier," said Aunt Agatha, "if you would consider your poor mamma's feelings and mine; but 1 never thought, for my part, that that was the thing for Islay, with his long head. He had always such a very peculiar head. When he was a child,. you know, Mary, we never could get a child's hat to fit him. Now, I think, if Hugh had gone into a very nice regiment, and Islay had studied for something-

"Do you think he will have no study to do going in for the Engineers?" said Hugh, indignantly. "I am not envious of Islay. I know he is the best fellow among us; but, at the same time- The thing for me would be to go to Australia or New Zealand, where one does not need to be good for anything in particular. That is my case," said the disconsolate youth; and out of the depths, if not of his soul, at least of his capacious chest, there came a profound, almost despairing sigh.

"Oh, Hugh, my darling boy! you cannot meau to break all our hearts," cried Aunt Agatha.

It was just what poor Hugh meant to do, for the moment, at least; and he sat with his head down and despair in his face, with a look which went to Mary's heart, and brought the tears to her eyes, but a smile to her lips. He was so like his father; and Mrs. Ochterlony knew that he would not, in this way at least, break her heart.

"Would you like to go to Uncle Penrose?" she said; to which Hugh replied with a vehement shake of his head. "Would you like to go into Mr. Allonby's office? You know he spoke of wanting an articled pupil. Would you think of that proposal Mr. Mortare, the architect, made us ?don't shake your head off, Hugh; or ask Sir Edward to let you help old Sanders—or—or— Would you really like to be a soldier, like your brother?" said Mary, at her wits' end; for after this, with their limited opportunities, there seemed no further suggestion to make.

"I must do something, mother," said Hugh, and he rose up with another sigh; "but I don't want to vex you," he added, coming up and putting his arms round her with that admiring fondness which is perhaps sweeter to a woman from her son than even from her lover; and then, his mind being relieved, he had no objection to change the conversation. "I promised to look at the young colts, and tell Sir Edward what I thought of them," he suddenly said, looking up at Mary with a cloudy, doubtful look-afraid of being laughed at, and yet himself ready to laughsuch as is not unusual upon a boy's face. Mrs. Ochterlony did not feel in the least inclined for laughter, though she smiled upon her boy; and when he went away, a look of anxiety came to her face, though it was not anything like the tragical anxiety which contracted Aunt Agatha's gentle countenance. She took up her work again, which was more than Miss Seton could do. The boys were no longer children, and life was coming back to her with their growing years. Life, which is not peace, but more like a sword.

"My dear love, something thust be done," said Aunt Agatha. "Australia or New Zealand, and for a boy of his expectations! Mary, something must be done."

"Yes," said Mary, "I must go and consult my brother-in-law about it, and see what he thinks best. But as for New Zealand or Australia, Aunt Agatha-"

"Do you think it will be nice, Mary?" said Miss Seton, with a soft blush like a girl's. "It will be like asking him, you know, what he means; it will be like saying he ought to provide-"

"He said Hugh was to be his heir," said Mary, "and I believe he meant what he said; at all events, it would be wrong to do anything without consulting him, for he has always been very kind."

These words threw Aunt Agatha into a flutter which she could not conceal. "It may be very well to consult him," she said; "but rather than let him think we are asking his help- And then, how can you see him, Mary? I am afraid it would be-awkward, to say the least, to ask him here-"

"I will go to Earlston to-morrow," said Mary. "I made up my mind while Hugh was talking. After Islay has gone, it will be worse for Hugh. Will is so much younger, poor boy."

"Will," said Aunt Agatha, sighing. "Oh, Mary, if they had only been girls! we could have brought them up without any assistance, and no bother about professions or things. When you have settled Hugh and Islay, there will be Will to open it up again; and they will all leave us, after all. Oh, Mary, my dear love, if they had but been girls!"

"Yes, but they are not girls," said Mrs. Ochterlony, with a half smile; and then she too sighed. She was glad her boys were boys, and had more confidence in them, and Providence and life, than Aunt Agatha had. But she was not glad to think that her boys must leave her, and that she had no daughter to share her household life. The cloud which sat on Aunt Agatha's careful brow came over her, too, for the moment, and dimmed her eyes, and made her heart ache. "They came into the world for God's uses and not for ours," she said, recovering herself, "and though they are boys, we must not keep them unhappy. I will go over to Earlston tomorrow by the early train."

"If you think it right," said Miss Seton; but it was not cordially spoken. Aunt Agatha was very proud and sensitive in her way. She was the kind of woman to get into misunderstandings, and shun explanations, as much as if she had been a woman in a novel. She was as ready to take up a mistaken idea, and as determined not to see her mistake, as if she had been a herome forced thereto by the exigencies of three volumes. Miss Seton had never come to the third volume herself; she thought it more dignified for her own part to remain in the complications and perplexities of the second; and it struck her that it was indelicate of Mary thus to open the subject, and lead Francis Ochterlony on, as it were, to declare his mind.

The question was quite a different one so far as Mary was concerned, to whom Francis Ochterlony had never stood in the position of a lover, nor was the subject of any delicate difficulties. With her it was a straightforward piece of business enough to consult her brother-in-law, who was the natural guardian of her sons, and who had always been well disposed towards them, especially while they kept at a safe distance. Islay was the only one who had done any practical harm at Earlston, and Mr. Ochterlony had forgiven and, it is to be hoped, forgotten the downfall of the rococo chair. If she had had nothing more important to trouble her than a consultation so innoceut! Though, to tell the truth. Mary did not feel that she had a great deal to trouble her, even with the uncertainty of Hugh's future upon her hands. Even if Mr. Ochterlony were to contemplate anything so absurd as marriage or the founding of a hospital, Hugh could still make his own way in the world, as his brothers would have to do, and as his father had done before him. And Mrs. Ochterlony was not even overwhelmed by consideration of the very different characters of the boys, nor of the immense responsibility, nor of any of the awful thoughts with which widow-mothers are supposed to be overwhelmed. They were all well, God bless them; all honest and true, healthful and affectionate. Hugh had his crotchets and fidgety ways, but so had his father, and perhaps Mary loved her boy the better for them; and Wilfred was a strange boy, but then he had always been strange, and it came natural to him. No doubt there might be undeveloped depths in both, of which their mother as yet knew nothing; but in the meantime Mary, like other mothers, took things as she saw them, and was proud of her sons, and had no disturbing fears. As for Islay, he was steady as a rock, and almost as strong, and did the heart good to behold, and even the weakest woman might have taken heart to trust him, whatever might be the temptations and terrors. of "the world." Mary had that composure which belongs to the better side of experience, as much as suspicion and distrust belong to its darker side. The world did not alarm her as it did Aunt Agatha; neither did Mr. Ochterlony alarm her, whose sentiments ought at least to be known by this time, and whose counsel she sought with no artful intention of drawing him out, but with an honest desire to have the matter settled one way or another. This was how the interval of calm passed away, and the new generation brought back a new and fuller life.

It was not all pleasure with which Mary rose next morning to go upon her mission to Earlston: but it was with a feeling of resurrection, a sense that she lay no longer ashore, but that the tide was once more creeping about her stranded boat, and the wind wooing the idle sail. There might be storms awaiting her upon the sea; storm and shipwreck and loss of all things lay in the future: possible for her boys as for others, certain for some; but that pricking, tingling thrill of danger and pain gave a certain vitality to the stir of life renewed. Peace is sweet, and there are times when the soul sighs for it; but life is sweeter. And this is how Mary, in her mother's anxiety,-with all the possibilities of fate to affright her, if they could, yet not without a novel sense of exhibaration, her heart beating more strongly, her pulse fuller, her eye brighter,-went forth to open the door for her boy into his own personal and individual career.

CHAPTER XXIII.

It was a cheerful summer morning when Mary set out on her visit to her brother-in-law. She had said nothing to her boys about it, for Hugh was fantastical, like Aunt Agatha, and would have denounced her intention as an expedient to make his uncle provide for him. Hugh had gone out to attend to some of the many little businesses he had in hand for Sir Edward; and Islay was working in his own room preparing for the "coach," to whom he was going in a few days; and Wilfrid, or Will, as everybody called him, was with his curate-tutor. The cottage held its placid place upon the high bank of Kirtell, shining through its trees in a purple cloud of roscs, and listening in the sun to that everlasting quiet voice that sung in its ear, summer and winter, the little river's changeful yet changeless song. It looked like a place to which no changes could ever come: calm people in the stillness of age, souls at rest, little children, were the kind of people to live in it; and the stir and quickening of pleasurable pain which Mary felt in her own veins, -the sense of new life and movement about her,-felt out of place with the quiet house. Aunt Agatha was out of sight ordering her household affairs, and the drawingroom was silent and deserted as a fairy palace, full of a thousand signs of habitation, but without a single tenant audible or visible, except the roses that clambered about the open windows, and the bee that went in and made a confused investigation, and came out again none the wiser. An odd sense of the contrast struck Mrs. Ochterlony; but a little while before, her soul had been in unison with the calm of the place, and she had thought nothing of it; now she had woke up out of that fair chamber turned to the sunrising, the name of which is Peace, and had stepped back into life, and felt the tingle and thrill of resurrection. And an unconscious smile came on her face as she looked back. To think that out of that silence and sunshine should pour out such a tide of new strength and vigourand that henceforth hearts should leap with eagerness and wistfulness under that roof, and perhaps grow wild with joy, or perhaps, God knows, break with anguish, as news came good or evil! She had been but half alive so long, that the sense of living was sweet.

It was a moment to call forth many thoughts and recollections, but the fact was that she did not have time to entertain them. There happened to her one of those curious coincidences which occur so often, and which it is so difficult to account for. Long before she reached the little station, a tall figure broke the long vacant line of the dusty country road, a figure which Mary felt at once to be that of a stranger, and yet which she seemed to recognise. She could not believe her eyes, nor think it was anything but the association of ideas which misled her, and laughed at her own fantastic imagination as she went on. But nevertheless it is true that it was her brother-in-law himself who met her, long before she reached the railway by which she had meant to go to him. Her appearance struck him too, it was evident, with a little surprise; but yet she was at home, and might have been going anywhere; whereas the strange fact of his coming required a more elaborate explanation than he had it in his power to give.

I do not know exactly what put it into my head," said Mr. Ochterlony, "perhaps some old work of mine which turned up the other day, and which I was doing when you were with me. I thought I would come over and have a talk with you about your boy."

"It is very strange," said Mary, "for this very morning I had made up my mind to come to you, to consult you. It must be some kind of magnetism, I suppose."

"Indeed I can't say; I have never studied the natural sciences," said Mr. Ochterlony with gravity.

"I have had a very distinguished visitor lately: a man whose powers are as much above the common mind as his information is—Dr. Franklin, whose name of course you have heard—a man of European reputation."

"Yes?" said Mary, doubtfully, feeling very guilty and ignorant, for to tell the truth she had never heard of Dr. Franklin; but her brother-in-law perceived her ignorance, and explained in a kind of compassionate way.

"He is about the greatest numismatist we have in England," said Mr. Ochterlony, "and somehow my little monograph upon primitive art in Iceland came to be talked of. I have never completed it, though Franklin expressed himself much interested—and I think that's how it was suggested to my mind to come and see you to-day."

"I am very glad," said Mary, "I wanted so much to have your advice. Hugh is almost a man now—."

"A man!" said Mr. Ochterlony with a smile; "I don't see how that is possible. I hope he is not so unruly as he used to be; but you are as young as ever, and I don't see how your children can be men."

And oddly enough, just at that moment, Hugh himself made his appearance, making his way by a cross road down to the river, with his basket over his shoulder, and his fishing-rod. He was taller than his uncle, though Mr. Ochterlony was tall; and big besides, with large, mighty, not perfectly developed limbs, swinging a little loosely upon their hinges like the limbs of a young Newfoundland or baby lion. His face was still smooth as a girl's, and fair, with downy cheeks and his mother's eyes, and that pucker in his forehead which Francis Ochterlony had known of old in the countenance of another Hugh. Mary did not say anything, but she stopped short before her boy, and put her hand on his shoulder, and looked at his uncle with a smile, appealing to him with her proud eyes and beaming face, if this was not almost a man. As for Mr. Ochterlony, he gave a great start and said, "God bless us," under his breath, and was otherwise speechless for the moment. He had been thinking of a boy, grown no doubt, but still within the limits of childhood; and lo, it was an unknown human creature that faced him, with a will and thoughts of its own, like its father and mother, and yet like nobody but itself. Hugh, for his part, looked with very curious eyes at the stranger, and dimly recognised him, and grew shamefaced and a little fidgety, as was natural to the boy.

"You see how he has grown," said Mary, who, being the triumphant one among the three, was the first to recover herself. "You do not think him a child now? It is your uncle, Hugh, come to see us. It is very kind of him—but of course you knew who he was."

"I am very glad to see my uncle," said Hugh, with eager shyness. "Yes, I knew. You are like my father's picture, sir;—and your own that we have at the cottage—and Islay a little. I knew it was you."

And then they all walked on in silence; for Mr. Ochterlony was more moved by this sudden encounter than he cared to acknowledge; and Mary too, for the moment, being a sympathetic woman, saw her boy with his uncle's eyes, and saw what the recollections were that sprang up at sight of him. She told Hugh to go on and do his duty, and send home some trout for dinner; and, thus dismissing him, guided her unlooked-for visitor to the cottage. He knew the way as well as she did, which increased the embarrassment of the situation. Mary saw only the stiles and the fields, and the trees that overtopped the hedges, familiar objects that met her eyes every day; but Francis Ochterlony saw many a past day and past imagination of his own life, and seemed to walk over his own ashes as he went on. And that was Hugh !- Hugh, not his brother, but his nephew and heir, the representative of the Ochterlonys, occupying the position which his own son should have occupied. Mr. Ochterlony had not calculated on the progress of time, and he was startled and even touched, and felt wonderingly-what it is so difficult for a man to feel-that his own course was no longer of much importance to anybody, and that here was his successor. The thought made him giddy, just as Mary's wondering sense of the unreality of her own independent life, and everlastingness of her stay at the cottage, had made her; but yet in a different way. For perhaps Francis Ochterlony had never actually realised before that most things were over for him, and that his heir stood ready and waiting for the end of his life.

There was still something of this sense of giddiness in his mind when he followed Mary through the open window into the silent drawing-room where nobody was. Perhaps he had not behaved just as he ought to have done to Agatha Seton; and the recollection of a great many things that had happened, and that had not happened, came back upon him as he wound his way with some confusion through the roses. He was half ashamed to go in, like a familiar friend, through the window. Of all men in the world, he had the least right to such a privilege of intimacy. He ought to have gone to the door in a formal way and sent in his card, and been admitted only if Miss Seton pleased; and yet here he was, in the very sanctuary of her life, invited to sit down as it were by her side, led in by the younger generation, which could not but smile at the thought of any sort of sentiment between the old woman and the old man. For indeed Mary, though she was not young, was smiling softly within herself at the idea. She had no sort of sympathy with Mr. Ochterlony's delicate embarrassment, though she was woman enough to hurry away to seek her aunt and prepare her for the meeting, and shield the ancient maiden in the first flutter of her feelings. Thus the master of Earlston was left alone in the cottage, with leisure to look round him and recognise the identity of the place, and see all its differences, and become aware of its pleasant air of habitation. and all the signs of daily use and wont which had no existence in his own house. All this confused him, and put him at a great disadvantage. The probabilities were that Agatha Seton would not have been a bit the happier had she been mistress of Earlston. Indeed the cottage had so taken her stamp that it was impossible for anybody, whose acquaintance with her was less than thirty years old, to imagine her with any other surroundings. But Francis Ochterlony had known her for more than thirty years, and naturally he felt that he himself was a possession worth a woman's while, and that he had, so to speak, defrauded her of so important a piece of property; and he was penitent and ashamed of himself. Perhaps too his own heart was moved a little by the sense of something lost. His own house might have borne this sunny air of home; instead of his brother Hugh's son, there might have been a boy of his own to inhabit Earlston; and looking back at it quietly in this cottage drawingroom, Francis Ochterlony's life seemed to him something very like a mistake. He was not a hardhearted man, and the inference he drew from this conclusion was very much in his nephew's favour. Hugh's boy was almost a man, and there was no doubt that he was the natural heir, and that it was to him everything ought to come. Instead of thinking of marrying, as Aunt Agatha imagined, or founding a hospital, or making any other ridiculous use of his money, his mind, in its softened and compunctious state, turned to its natural and obvious duty. "Let there be no mistake, at least, about the boy," he said to himself. "Let him have all that is good for him, and all that can best fit him for his position;" for, Heaven be praised, there was at least no doubt about Hugh, or question as to his being the lawful and inevitable heir.

It was this process of reasoning, or rather of feeling, that made Mrs. Ochterlony so entirely satisfied with her brother-in-law when she returned (still alone, for Miss Seton was not equal to the exertion all at once, and naturally there was something extra to be ordered for dinner) and began to talk to their uncle about the children.

"There has been no difficulty about Islay," she said; "he always knew what he wanted, and set his heart at once on his profession; but Hugh has no such decided turn. It was very kind what you said when you wrote—but—I don't think it is good for the boy to be idle. Whatever you might think it right to arrange afterwards, I think he should have something to do——"

"I did not think he had been so old," said Mr. Ochterlony, almost apologetically. "Time does not leave much mark of its progress at Earlston. Something to do? I thought what a young fellow of his age enjoyed most was amusing himself. What would he like to do?"

"He does not know," said Mary, a little abashed; "that is why I wanted so much to consult you. I suppose people have talked to him of-of what you might do for him; and he cannot bear the thought of hanging, as it were, on your charity-

"Charity!" said Mr. Ochterlony, "it is not charity, it is right and nature. I hope he is not one of those touchy sort of boys that think kindness an injury. My poor brother Hugh was always fidgety-"

"Oh no, it is not that," said the anxious mother, "only he is afraid that you might think he was calculating upon you; as if you were obliged to provide for him-"

"And so I am obliged to provide for him," said Mr. Ochterlony, "as much as I should be obliged to provide for my own son, if I had one. We must find him something to do. Perhaps I ought to have thought of it sooner. What has been done about his education? What school has he been at? Is he fit for the University? Earlston will be a better property in his days than it was when I was young," added the uncle with a natural sigh. If he had but provided himself with an heir of his own, perhaps it would have been less troublesome on the whole. "I would send him to Oxford, which would be the best way of employing him; but is he fit for it? Where has he been to school?"

Upon which Mary, with some confusion, murmured something about the curate, and felt for the first time as if she had been indifferent to the education of her boy.

"The curate!" said Mr. Ochterlony; and he gave a little shrug of his shoulders, as if that was a very poor security for Hugh's scholarship.

"He has done very well with all his pupils," said Mary, "and Mr. Cramer, to whom Islay is going, was very much satisfied-

"I forget where Islay was going?" said Mr.

Ochterlony, inquiringly.

"Mr. Cramer lives near Kendal," said Mary; "he was very highly recommended; and we thought the boy could come home for Sunday-

Mr. Ochterlony shook his head, though still in a patronising and friendly way. "I am not sure that it is good to choose a tutor because the boy can come home on Sunday," he said, "nor send them to the curate that you may keep them with yourself. I know it is the way with ladies; but it would have been better, I think, to have sent them to school."

Mrs. Ochterlony was confounded by this verdict against her. All at once her eyes seemed to be opened, and she saw herself a selfish mother keeping her boys at her own apron-strings. She had not time to think of such poor arguments in her favour as want of means, or her own perfectly good intentions. She was silent, struck dumb by this unthought-of condemnation; but just then a champion, she had not thought of, appeared in her defence.

"Mr. Small did very well for Hugh," said a voice at the window; "he is a very good tutor so far as he goes. He did very well for Hugh-and Islay too," said the new-comer, who came in at the window as he spoke with a bundle of books under his arm. The interruption was so unexpected that Mr. Ochterlony, being quite unused to the easy entrance of strangers at the window, and into the conversation, started up alarmed and a little angry. But, after all, there was nothing to be angry about.

"It is only Will," said Mary. "Wilfrid, it is your uncle, whom you have not seen for so long. This was my baby," she added, turning to her brother-iu-law, with an anxious smile-for Wilfrid was a boy who puzzled strangers, and was not by any means so sure to make a good impression as the others were. Mr. Ochterlony shook hands with the new-comer, but he surveyed him a little doubtfully. He was about thirteen, a long boy, with big wrists and ancles visible, and signs of rapid growth. His face did not speak of country air and fare and outdoor life and healthful occupation like his brother's, but was pale and full of fancies and notions which he did not reveal to everybody. He came in and put down his books and threw himself into a chair with none of his elder brother's pleasant shamefacedness. Will, for his part, was not given to blushing. He knew nothing about his uncle's visit. but he took it quietly as a thing of course, and prepared to take part in the conversation, whatever its subject might be.

"Mr. Small has done very well for them all," said Mary, taking heart again; "he has always done very well with his pupils. Mr. Cramer was very much satisfied with the progress Islay had made; and as for Hugh-"

"He is quite clever enough for Hugh," said Will. with the same steady voice.

Mr. Ochterlony, though he was generally so grave, was amused. "My young friend, are you sure you are a judge?" he said. "Perhaps he is not clever enough for Wilfrid-is that what you meant to say?"

"It is not so much the being clever," said the boy. "I think he has taught me as much as he knows, so it is not his fault. I wish we had been sent to school; but Hugh is all right. He knows as much as he wants to know, I suppose; and as for Islay, his is technical," the young critic added with a certain quiet superiority. Will, poor fellow, was the clever one of the family, and somehow he had found it out.

Mr. Ochterlony looked at this new representation of his race for some time with a little alarm. Perhaps he was thinking that, on the whole, it was as well not to have boys; and then, as much from inability to carry on the conversation as from interest in his own particular subject, he returned to Hugh.

"The best plan, perhaps, will be for Hugh to go back with me to Earlston; that is, if it is not disagreeable to you," he said, in his old-fashioned, polite way. "I have been too long thinking about it, and his position must be made distinct. Oxford would be the best; that would be both occupation and preparation for him. And I think afterwards he might pay a little attention to the estate. never could have believed that babies grew into boys, and boys to men, so quickly. Why, it can barely be a few years since-Ah!" Mr. Ochterlony got up very precipitately from his chair. It was Aunt Agatha who had come into the room, with her white hair smoothed under her white cap, and her pretty Shetland shawl over her shoulders. Then he perceived that it was more than a few years since he had last seen her. The difference was more to him than the difference in the boys, who were creatures that sprang up nobody knew how, and were never to be relied upon. summer morning when she came to Earlston to claim her niece, Miss Seton had been old; but it was a different kind of age from that which sat upon her soft countenance now. Francis Ochterlony had not for many a year asked himself in his seclusion whether he was old or young. His occupations were all tranquil, and he had not felt himself unable for them; but if Agatha Seton was like this, surely then it must indeed be time to think of an heir.

The day passed with a curious speed and yet tardiness, such as is peculiar to days of excitement. When they were not talking of the boys, nobody could tell what to talk about. Once or twice, indeed, Mr. Ochterlony began to speak of the Numismatic Society, or the excavations at Nineveh, or some other cognate subject; but he always came to a standstill when he caught Aunt Agatha's soft eyes wondering over him. They had not talked about excavations, nor numismatics either, the last time he had been here; and there was no human link between that time and this, except the boys, of whom they could all talk: and to this theme accordingly everybody returned. Hugh came in audibly, leaving his basket at the kitchen door as he passed, and Islay, with his long head and his deep eyes, came down from his room where he was working, and Will kept his seat in the big Indian chair in the corner, where he dangled his long legs, and listened. Everybody felt the importance of the moment, and was dreadfully serious, even when lighter conversation was attempted. To show the boys in their best light, each of the three, and yet not so to show them as if anybody calculated upon. or was eager about, the uncle's patronage; to give him an idea of their different characters without any suspicion of "showing off," which the lads could not have tolerated; all this was very difficult to the two anxious women, and required such an amount of mental effort as made it hard to be anything but serious. Fortunately, the boys themselves were a little excited by the novelty of such a visitor, and curious about their uncle, not knowing what his appearance might mean. Hugh flushed into a singular mixture of exaltation, and suspicion. and surprise, when Mr. Ochterlony invited him to Earlston; and looked at his mother with momentary distrust, to see if by any means she had sought the invitation; and Wilfrid sat and dangled his long legs, and listened, with an odd appreciation of the fact that the visit was to Hugh, and not to himself or any more important member of the family. As for Islay, he was always a good fellow, and like himself; and his way was clear before him, and admitted of no hopes or fears except as to whether or not he should succeed at his examination, which was a matter about which he had himself no very serious doubts, though he said little about it; and perhaps on the whole it was Islay, who was quite indifferent, whom Mr. Ochterlony would have fixed his choice upon, had he been at liberty to choose.

When the visitor departed, which he did the same evening, the household drew a long breath: everybody was relieved, from Peggy in the kitchen, whose idea was that the man was "looking after our Miss Agatha, again," down to Will, who had now leisure and occasion to express his sentiments on the subject. Islay went back to his work to make up for the lost day, having only a moderate and temporary interest in his uncle. It was the elder and the younger who alone felt themselves concerned. As for Hugh, the world seemed to have altered in these few hours; Mr. Ochterlony had not said a great deal to him; but what he said had been said as a man speaks who means and has the power to carry out his words; and the vague heirship had become all of a sudden the reallest fact in existence, and a thing which could not be. and never could have been, otherwise. And he was slightly giddy, and his head swam with the sudden elevation. But as for Wilfrid, what had he to do with it, any more than any other member of the family? though he was always a strange boy, and there never was any reckoning what he might do or say.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WILL'S room was a small room opening from his mother's, which would have been her dressing-room had she wanted such a luxury; and when Mrs. Ochterlony went up-stairs late that night, after a long talk with Aunt Agatha, she found the light still burning in the little room, and her boy seated, with his jacket and his shoes off, on the floor, in a brown study. He was sitting with his knees drawn up to his chin in a patch of moonlight that shone in from the window. The moonlight made him look ghastly, and his candle had burnt down and was flickering unsteadily in the socket, and Mary was alarmed. She did not think of any moral cause for the first moment, but only that something was the matter with him, and went in with a sudden maternal panic to see what it was. Will took no immediate notice of her anxious questions, but he condescended to raise his head and prop up his chin with his hands, and stare up into her face.

"Mother," he said, "you always go on as if a fellow was ill. Can't one be thinking a little without anything being the matter? I should have put out my light had I known you were coming upstairs."

"You know, Will, that I cannot have you sit here and think, as you say. It is not thinking—it is brooding, and does you harm," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "Jump up and go to bed."

"Presently," said the boy. "Is it true that Hugh will go to Oxford, mamma?"

"Very likely," said Mary, with some pride. "Your uncle will see how he has got on with his studies, and after that I think he will go."

"What for?" said Will. "What is the good? He knows as much as he wants to know, and Mr.

Small is quite good enough for him."

"What for?" said Mary, with displeasure. "For his education like other gentlemen, and that he may take his right position. But you are too young to understand all that. Get up and go to bed."

"I am not too young to understand," said Wilfrid; "what is the good of throwing money and time away? You may tell my uncle, Hugh will never do any good at Oxford; and I don't see, for my part, why he should be the one to go."

"He is the eldest, and he is your uncle's heir," said Mary, with a conscious swelling of her motherly heart.

"I don't see what difference being the eldest makes," said Will, embracing his knees. "I have been thinking over it this long time. Why should he be sent to Oxford, and the rest of us stay at home? What does it matter about the eldest? A fellow is not any better than me because he was born before me. You might as well send Peggy to Oxford," said Will, with vehemence, "as send Hugh."

Mrs. Ochterlony, whose mind just then was specially occupied by Hugh, was naturally disturbed by this speech. She put out the flickering candle, and set down her own light, and closed the door. "I cannot let you speak so about your brother, Will," she said. "He may not be so quick as you are for your age, but I wish you were as modest and as kind as Hugh is. Why should you grudge his advancement? I used to think you would get the better of this feeling when you ceased to be a child."

"Of what feeling?" cried Will, lifting his pale face from his knees.

"My dear boy, you ought to know," said Mary; "this grudge that any one should have a pleasure or an advantage which you have not. A child may be excused, but no man who thinks so continually of himself——"

"I was not thinking of myself," said Will, springing up from the floor with a flush on his face. "You will always make a moral affair of it, mother. As if one could not discuss a thing. But I know that Hugh is not elever, though he is the eldest. Let him have Earlston if he likes, but why should he have Oxford? And why should it always be supposed that he is better, and a different kind of elay?"

"I wonder where you learned all that, Will," said Mary, with a smile. "One would think you had picked up some Radical or other. I might be vexed to see Lady Balderston walk out of the room before me, if it was because she pretended to be a better woman; but when it is only because she is Lady Balderston, what does it matter? Hugh can't help being the eldest: if you had been the eldest——"

"Ah!" said Will, with a long breath; "if I had been the eldest——" And then he stopped short

"What would you have done?" said Mrs. Ochterlony, smiling still.

"I would have done what Hugh will never do," cried the boy. "I would have taken care of everybody. I would have found out what they were fit for, and put them in the right way. The one that had brains should have been cultivated, and the one who had no brains should have—done something else. There should have been no such mistake as—— But that is always how it is in the world—everybody says so," said Wilfrid; "stupid people who know nothing about it are set at the head, and those who could manage——"

"Will," said his mother, "do you know you are very presumptuous, and think a great deal too well of yourself? If you were not such a child, I should be angry. It is very well to be clever at your lessons, but that is no proof that you are able to manage as you say. Let Hugh and his prospects alone for to-night, and go to bed."

"Yes, I can let him alone," said Will. "I suppose it is not worth one's while to mind—he will do no good at Oxford, you know, that is one thing;

whereas other people-"

"Always yourself, Will," said Mary, with a sigh.
"Myself—or even Islay," said the boy, in the most composed way; "though Islay is very technical. Still, he could do some good. But Hugh is an out-of-door sort of fellow. He would do for a farmer or gamekeeper, or to go to Australia, as he says. A man should always follow his natural bent. If, instead of going by eldest sons and that sort of rubbish, they were to try for the right man in the right place. And then you might be sure to be done the best for, mother, and that he would take care of you."

"Will, you are very conceited and very unjust," said Mary: but she was his mother, and she relented as she looked into his weary young face : "but I hope you have your heart in the right place, for all your talk," she said, kissing him before she went away. She went back to her room disturbed, as she had often been before, but still smiling at Will's "way." It was all boyish folly and talk, and he did not mean it; and as he grew older he would learn better. Mary did not care to speculate upon the volcanic elements which, for anything she could tell, might be lying under her very hand. She could not think of different developments of character and hostile individualities, as people might to whom the three boys were but boys in the abstract, and not Hugh, Islay, and Will-the one as near and dear to her as the other. Mrs. Ochterlony was not philosophical, neither could she follow out to their natural results the tendencies which she could not but see. She preferred to think of it, as Will himself said, as a moral affair—a fault which would mend; and so laid her head on her pillow with a heart uneasy—but no more uneasy than was consistent with the full awakening of anxious yet hopeful life.

As for Will, he was asleep ten minutes after, and had forgotten all about it. His heart was in its right place, though he was plagued with a very arrogant, troublesome, restless little head, and a greater amount of "notions" than are good for his age. He wanted to be at the helm of affairs, to direct everything-a task for which he felt himself singularly competent: but, after all, it was for the benefit of other people that he wanted to rule. It seemed to him that he could arrange for everybody so much better than they could for themselves: and he would have been liberal to Hugh, though he had a certain contempt for his abilities. He would have given him occupation suited to him, and all the indulgences which he was most fitted to appreciate: and he would have made a kind of beneficent empress of his mother, and put her at the head of all manner of benevolences, as other wise despots have been known to do. But Will was the youngest, and nobody so much as asked his advice, or took him into consideration; and the poor boy was thus thrown back upon his own superiority, and got to brood upon it, and scoru the weaker expedients with which other people sought to fill up the place which he alone was truly qualified to fill. Fortunately, however, he forgot all this as soon as he had fallen asleep.

Hugh had no such legislative views for his part. He was not given to speculation. He meant to do his duty, and be a credit to everybody belonging to him; but he was a great deal younger than his boy-brother, and it did not occur to him to separate himself in idea-even to do them good-from his own people. The future danced and glimmered before him, but it was a brightness without any theory in it-a thing full of spontaneous good-fortune and well-doing, with which his own cleverness had nothing to do. Islay, for his part, thought very little about it. He was pleased for Hugh's sake, but as he had always looked upon Hugh's goodfortune as a certainty the fact did not excite him, and he was more interested about a tough problem he was working at, and which his uncle's visit had interrupted. It was a more agitated household than it had been a few months before-ere the doors of the future had opened suddenly upon the lads; but there was still no agitation under the cottage roof which was inconsistent with sweet rest and quiet sleep.

It made a dreadful difference in the house, as everybody said, when the two boys went away—Islay to Mr. Cramer's, the "coach" who was to prepare him for his examination, and Hugh to Earlston. The cottage had always been quiet, its inhabitants thought, but now it fell into a dead calm, which was stifling and unearthly. Will, the only representative of youth left among them, was graver than Aunt Agatha, and made no gay din. but only noises of an irritating kind. He kicked his legs and feet about, and the legs of all the chairs, and let his books fall, and knocked over the flower-stands-which were all exasperating sounds: but he did not fill the house with snatches of song, with laughter, and the pleasant evidence that a light heart was there. He used to "read" in his own room, with a diligence which was much stimulated by the conviction that Mr. Small was very little ahead of him, and, to keep up his position of instructor, must work hard, too; and, when this was over, he planted himself in a corner of the drawing-room, in the great Indian chair, with a book, beguiling the two ladies into unconsciousness of his presence, and then interposing in their conversation in the most inconvenient way. This was Will's way of showing his appreciation of his mother's society. He was not her right hand, like Hugh, nor did he watch over her comfort in Islay's steady, noiseless way. But he liked to be in the same room with her, to haunt the places where she was, to interfere in what she was doing, and seize the most unfit moments for the expression of his sentiments. With Aunt Agatha he was abrupt and indifferent, being insensible to all conventional delicacies; and he took pleasure, or seemed to take pleasure, in contradicting Mrs. Ochterlony, and going against all her conclusions and arguments; but he paid her the practical compliment of preferring her society, and keeping by her side.

It was while thus left alone, and with the excitement of this first change fresh upon her, that Mrs. Ochterlony heard another piece of news which moved her greatly. It was that the regiment at Carlisle was about to leave, and that it was Our regiment which was to take its place. She thought she was sorry for the first moment. It was upon one of those quiet afternoons just after the boys had left the cottage, when the two ladies were sitting in the silence, not talking much, thinking how long it was to post-time, and how strange it was that the welcome steps and voices which used to invade the quiet so abruptly and so sweetly, were now beyond hoping for. And the afternoon seemed to have grown so much longer, now that there was no Hugh to burst in with news from the outer world, no Islay to emerge from his problems. Will sat, as usual, in the great chair, but he was reading, and did not contribute to the cheerfulness of the party. And it was just then that Sir Edward came in, doubly welcome, to talk of the absent lads, and ask for the last intelligence of them, and bring this startling piece of news. Mrs. Ochterlony was aware that the regiment had finished its service in India long ago, and there was, of course, no reason why it should not come to Carlisle, but it was not an idea which had ever occurred to her.

She thought she was sorry for the first moment, and the news gave her an unquestionable shock; but, after all, it was not a shock of pain: her heart gave a leap and kept on beating faster, as with a new stimulus. She could think of nothing else all the evening. Even when the post came, and the letters, and all the wonderful first impressions of the two new beginners in the world, this other thought returned as soon as it was possible for any thought to regain a footing. She began to feel as if the very sight of the uniform would be worth a pilgrimage; and then there would be so many questions to ask, so many curiosities and yearnings to satisfy. She could not keep her mind from going out into endless speculations-how many would remain of her old friends ?-how many might have dropped out of the ranks, or exchanged, or retired, or been promoted ?-how many new marriages there had been, and how many children? -little Emma Askell, for instance, how many babies she might have now? Mary had kept up a desultory correspondence with some of the ladies for a year or two, and even had continued for a long time to get serious letters from Mrs. Kirkman; but these correspondences had dropped off gradually, as is their nature, and the colonel's wife was not a woman to enlarge on Emma Askell's babies, having matters much more important on hand.

This new opening of interest moved Mrs. Ochterlony in spite of herself. She forgot all the painful associations, and looked forward to the arrival of the regiment as an old sailor might look for the arrival of a squadron on active service. Did the winds blow and the waves rise as they used to do on those high seas from which they came? Though Mary had been so long becalmed, she remembered all about the conflicts and storms of that existence more vividly than she remembered what had passed yesterday, and she had a strange longing to know whether all that had departed from her own life existed still for her old friends. Between the breaks of the tranquil conversation she felt herself continually relapse into the regimental roll, always beginning again and always losing the thread; recalling the names of the men and of their wives whom she had been kind to once, and feeling as if they belonged to her, and as if something must be brought back to her by their return.

There was, however, little said about it all that evening, much as it was in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind. When the letters had been discussed, the conversation languished. Summer had begun to wane, and the roses were over, and it began to be impracticable to keep the windows open all the long evening. There was even a fire for the sake of cheerfulness—a little fire which blazed and crackled and made twice as much display as if it had been a serious winter fire and essential to existence—and all the curtains were drawn except over the one window from which Sir Edward's light was visible. Aunt Agatha had grown more fanciful than ever about that window since Winnie's marriage. Even in winter the shutters were never closed there until Miss Seton herself went upstairs, and all the long night the friendly star of Sir Edward's lamp shone faint but steady in the distance. In this way the hall and the cottage kept each other kindly company, and the thought pleased the old people, who had been friends all their lives. Aunt Agatha sat by her favourite table, with her own lamp burning softly and responding to Sir Edward's far-off light, and she never raised her head without seeing it and thinking thoughts in which Sir Edward had but a small share. It was darker than usual on this special night, and there were neither moon nor stars to diminish the importance of the domestic Pharos. Miss Seton looked up, and her eyes lingered upon the blackness of the window and the distant point of illumination, and she sighed as she often did. It was a long time ago, and the boys had grown up in the meantime, and intruded much upon Aunt Agatha's affections; but still these interlopers had not made her forget the especial child of her love.

"My poor dear Winnie!" said the old lady.
"I sometimes almost fancy I can see her coming in by that window. She was fond of seeing Sir Edward's light. Now that the dear boys are gone, and it is so quiet again, does it not make you think sometimes of your darling sister, Mary? If we could only hear as often from her as we hear from Islay and Hugh——"

"But it is not long since you had a letter," said Mary, who, to tell the truth, had not been thinking much of her darling sister, and felt guilty when this appeal was made to her.

"Yes," said Aunt Agatha, with a sigh, "and they are always such nice letters; but I am afraid I am very discontented, my dear love. I always want to have something more. I was thinking some of your friends in the regiment could tell you, perhaps, about Edward. I never would say it to you, for I knew that you had things of your own to think about; but for a long time I have been very uneasy in my mind."

"But Winnie has not complained," said Mary, looking up unconsciously at Sir Edward's window, and feeling as if it shone with a certain weird and conscious light, like a living creature aware of all that was being said.

"She is not a girl ever to complain," said Aunt Agatha, proudly. "She is more like what I would have been myself, Mary, if I had ever been -in the circumstances you know. She would break her heart before she would complain. think there is a good deal of difference, my dear, between your nature and ours; and that was, perhaps, why you never quite understood my sweet Winnie. I am sure you are more reasonable; but you are not-not to call passionate, you know. It is a great deal better, a very great deal better," "You must not eried Aunt Agatha, anxiously. think I do not see that; but Winnie and I are a couple of fools that would do anything for love; and, rather than complain, I am sure she would die.'

Mary did not say that Winnie had done what was a great deal more than complaining, and had set her husband before them in a very uncomfortable light—and she took the verdict upon herself quietly, as a matter of course. "Mr. Askell used to know him very well," she said; "perhaps he knows something. But Edward Percival never was very popular, and you must not quarrel with me if I bring you back a disagreeable report."

"If it is about Aunt Winnie's husband, they say he is a fellow who bets and does all sorts of things," said the voice from the corner, which broke in so often upon their confidential talk.

Aunt Agatha gave a great jump in her chair. "Oh, Mary, I thought that dreadful boy was in bed!" she said, tremulously. "Do you know, Will, that it is very unkind and inconsiderate to say such things? Edward Percival is as much to me, or nearly as much to me—or at least he ought to be as much—as you are. And you ought to call him your uncle; and where could you ever hear a dreadful falsehood like that?"

"It is not a dreadful falsehood," said Wilfred.

"It is quite true, I am sure. I should like to see him. It would always be something to see a man who was not exactly like everybody else."

"Be quiet, Will," said Aunt Agatha, with a little indignation. "You ought to be in bed. If your mother were to take my advice, she would send you to bed every night at nine o'clock. It would be so much better for you. People who are not like other people, are never safe people," Miss Seton added, pointedly; for since his brothers had been away, Will, who was brought out by their absence, and attracted much more attention, had been unquestionably too much for his aunt.

"It is only some foolish story he has heard," said Mary. "He cannot know anything. I think I will go in to Carlisle as soon as they arrive. I should like to see them all again."

"And yet it will be a trial for you, Mary," said Aunt Agatha. "I do not think I could have borne it if it had been me. It will make you think of the difference. I was very angry with Sir Edward for telling you; but then you are so brave, and bear these things so well."

This was another little prick such as, kind as she was, Miss Seton rather liked to inflict upon her niece, who was not sentimental, nor apt to find ordinary things "great trials." But Mary was silent, for she was thinking of other things: not merely her happy days, but the one great vexation and mortification of her life, of which the regiment was aware—and whether the painful memory of it would ever return again to vex her. It had faded out of her recollection in the long peacefulness and quiet of her life. Could it ever return again to shame and wound, as it had once done? From where she was sitting with her work, between the cheerful lamp and the bright little blazing fire, Mary went away in an instant to the scene so distant and different, and was kneeling again by her husband's side, a woman humbled, yet never before so indignantly, resentfully proud, in the little chapel of the station. Would it ever come back again, that one blot on her life, with all its false, injurious suggestions? She said to herself "No." No doubt it had died out of other people's minds as out of her own, and on Kirtell-side nobody would have dared to doubt on such a subject; and now that the family affairs were settled, and Hugh was established at Earlston, his uncle's acknowledged heir, this cloud, at least, could never rise on her again to take the comfort out of her life. She dismissed the very thought of it from her mind, and her heart warmed to the recollection of the old faces and the old ways. She had a kind of longing to see them. as if her life would be completer after. It was not as "a great trial" that Mary thought of it. She was too eager and curious to know how they had all fared; and if, to some of them at least, the old existence, so long broken up for herself, continued and flourished as of old.

CHAPTER XXV.

It was accordingly with a little excitement that when the regiment had actually arrived Mrs. Ochterlony set out for the neighbouring town to renew her acquaintance with her old friends. It was winter by that time, and winter is seldom very gentle in Cumberland; but she was too much interested to be detained by the weather. She had said nothing to Wilfred on the subject, and it startled her a little to find him standing at the door waiting for her, carefully dressed, which was not usually a faculty of his, and evidently prepared to accompany her. When she opened the cottage-door to go out, and saw him, an unaccountable panic seized her. There he stood in the sunshine, -not gay and thoughtless like his brother Hugh, nor preoccupied like Islay,-with his keen eyes and sharp ears, and mind that seemed always to lie in wait for something. The recollection of the one thing which she did not want to be known had come strongly to her mind once more at that particular moment; a little tremor had run through her frame-a sense of half-painful, half-pleasant excitement. When her eye fell on Wilfred, she went back a step unconsciously, and her heart for the moment seemed to stop beating. She wanted to bring her friends to Kirtell, to show them her boys and make them acquainted with all her life; and probably, had it been Hugh, he would have accompanied her as a matter of course. But somehow Wilfred was different. Without knowing what her reason was, she felt reluctant to undergo the first questionings and reminiscences with this keen spectator standing by to hear and see all, and to demand explanation of matters which it might be difficult to explain.

"Did you mean to go with me, Will?" she said. "But you know we cannot leave Aunt Agatha all by herself. I wanted to see you to ask you to be as agreeable as possible while I am gone."

"I am never agreeable to Aunt Agatha," said

Will: "she always liked the others best; and besides, she does not want me, and I am going to take care of you."

"Thank you," said Mary, with a smile; "but I don't want you either for to-day. We shall have so many things to talk about-old affairs that you would not understand."

"I like that sort of thing," said Will; "I like listening to women's talk-especially when it is about things I don't understand. It is always something new."

Mary smiled, but there was something in his persistence that frightened her. "My dear Will, I don't want you to-day," she said, with a slight shiver, in spite of herself.

"Why, mamma?" said Will, with open eyes.

He was not so well brought up as he ought to have been, as anybody will perceive. He did not accept his mother's decision, and put away his Sunday hat and say no more about it. On the contrary, he looked with suspicion (as she thought) at her, and kept his position-surprised and remonstrative, and not disposed to give in.

"Will," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "I will not have you with me, and that must be enough. These are all people whom I have not seen since you were a baby. It may be a trial for us all to meet, for I don't know what may have happened to them. I can speak of my affairs before you, for you-know them all," Mary went on with a momentary faltering; "but it is not to be supposed that they could speak of theirs in the presence of a boy they do not know. Go now and amuse yourself, and don't do anything to frighten Aunt Agatha; and you can come and meet me by the evening train."

But she could not get rid of a sense of fear as she' left him. He was not like other boys, from whose mind a little contradiction passes away almost as soon as it is spoken. He had that strange faculty of connecting one thing with another which is sometimes so valuable and sometimes leads a lively intellect so much astray; and if ever he should come to know that there was anything in his mother's history which she wished to keep concealed from him ---. It was a foolish thought, but it was not the less painful on that account. Mary had come to the end of her little journey before she got free from its influence. The united household at the cottage was not rich enough to possess anything in the shape of a carriage, but they were near the railway, which served almost the same purpose. It seemed to Mrs. Ochterlony as if the twelve intervening years were but a dream when she found herself in a drawing-room which had already taken Mrs. Kirkman's imprint, and breathed of her in every corner. It was not such a room, it is true, as the hot Indian chamber in which Mary had last seen the colonel's wife. It was one of the most respectable and sombre, as well as one of the best of the houses which let themselves furnished, with an eye to the officers. It had red curtains and red carpets, and blinds drawn more than half way down; and there were two or three boxes, with a significant slit in the lid, distributed about the different tables. In the centre of the round table before the fire there was a little trophy built up of small Indian gods, which were no doubt English manufacture, but which had been for a long time Mrs. Kirkman's text, and quite invaluable to her as a proof of the heathen darkness which was her favourite subject; and at the foot of this ugly pyramid lay a little heap of pamphlets, reports of all the societies under heaven. Mary recognised too, as she sat and waited, the large brown-paper cover, in which she knew by experience Mrs. Kirkman's favourite tracts were inclosed; and the little basket which contained a smaller roll, and which had room besides occasionally for a little tea and sugar, when circumstances made them necessary; and the book with limp boards, in which the colonel's wife kept her list of names, with little biographical comments opposite, which had once amused the subalterns so much when it fell into their hands. She had her sealed book besides, with a Bramah lock, which was far too sacred to be revealed to profane eyes; but yet, perhaps, she liked to tantalize profane eyes with the sight of its undiscoverable riches, for it lay on the table like the rest. This was how Mary saw at a glance that, whatever might have happened to the others, Mrs. Kirkman at least was quite unchanged.

She came gliding into the room a minute after, so like herself that Mrs. Ochterlony felt ouce more that time was not, and that her life had been a dream. She folded her visitor in a silent embrace, and kissed her with inexpressible meaning, and fanned her cheeks with those two long locks hanging out of curl which had been her characteristic embellishments since ever any one remembered. The light hair was now a little grey, but that made no difference to speak of either in colour or general aspect; and, so far as any other change went, those earlier years might never have been.

"My dear Mary!" she said at last. "My dear friend! Oh, what a thought that little as we deserve it, we should have been both spared to meet again!"

There was an emphasis on the both which it was very touching to hear; and Mary naturally could not but feel that the wonder and the thankfulness were chiefly on her own account.

"I am very glad to see you again," she said, feeling her heart yearn to her old friend-"and so entirely unchanged."

"Oh, I hope not," said Mrs. Kirkman. hope we have both profited by our opportunities, and made some return for so many mercies. One great thing I have looked forward to ever since I knew we were coming here, was the thought of seeing you again. You know I always considered you one of my own little flock, dear Mary! one of those who would be my crown of rejoicing. It is such a pleasure to have you again."

And Mrs. Kirkman gave Mrs. Ochterlony another kiss, and thought of the woman that was a sinner with a gush of sweet feeling in her heart.

As for Mary, she took it very quietly, having no inclination to be affronted or offended—but, on the contrary, a kind of satisfaction in finding all as it used to be; the same thoughts and the same kind of talk, and everything unchanged, while all with herself had changed so much. "Thank you," she said; "and now tell me about yourself and about them all: the Heskeths and the Churchills and all our old friends. I am thirsting to hear about them, and what changes there may have been, and how many are here."

"Ah, my dear Mary, there have been many changes," said Mrs. Kirkman. "Mrs. Churchill died years ago—did you not hear?—and in a very much more prepared state of mind, I trust and hope; and he has a curacy somewhere, and is bringing up the poor children—in his own pernicious views. I sadly fear."

"Has he pernicious views?" said Mary. "Poor Mrs. Churchill—and yet oue could not have looked for anything else."

"Don't say poor," said Mrs. Kirkman. "It is good for her to have been taken away from the evil to come. He is very lax, and always was very lax. You know how little he was to be depended upon at the station, and how much was thrown upon me, unworthy as I am, to do; and it is sad to think of those poor dear children brought up in such opinions. They are very poor, but that is nothing in comparison. Captain Hesketh retired when we came back to England. They went to their own place in the country, and they are very comfortable, I believe—too comfortable, Mary. It makes them forget things that are so much more precious. And I doubt if there is anybody to say a faithful word——"

"She was very kind," said Mary, "and good to everybody. I am very sorry they are gone."

"Yes, she was kind," said-Mrs. Kirkman, "that kind of natural amiability which is such a delusion. And everything goes well with them," she added, with a sigh: "there is nothing to rouse them up. Oh, Mary, you remember what I said when your pride was brought low—anything is better than being let alone."

Mrs. Ochterlony began to feel her old opposition stirring in her mind, but she refrained heroically, and went on with her interrogatory. "And the doctor," she said, "and the Askells?—they are still in the regiment. I want you to tell me where I can find Emma, and how things have gone with her—poor child! but she ought not to be such a baby now."

Mrs. Kirkman sighed. "No, she ought not to be a baby," she said. "I never like to judge any one, and I would like you to form your own opinion, Mary. She too has little immortal souls committed to her; and oh! it is sad to see how little people think of such a trust—whereas others who would have given their whole souls to it—— But no doubt it is all for the best. I have not asked you yet how are your dear boys. I hope you are endeavouring to make them grow in grace. Oh, Mary, I hope you have thought well over your responsibility. A mother has so much in her hands."

"Yes," said Mrs. Ochterlony quickly; "but they are very good boys, and I have every reason to be content with them. Hugh is at Earlston, just now, with his uncle. He is to succeed him, you know; and he is going to Oxford directly, I believe. And Islay is going to Woolwich if he can pass his examination. He is just the same long-headed boy he used to be. And Will—my baby; perhaps you remember what a little thing he was?—I think he is going to be the genius of the family." Mary went on with a simple effusiveness unusual to her, betrayed by the delight of talking about her boys to some one who knew and yet did not know them. Perhaps she forgot that her listener's interest could not possibly be so great as her own.

Mrs. Kirkman sat with her hands clasped on her knee, and she looked in Mary's eyes with a glance which was meant to go to her soul—a mournful inquiring glance which from under the dropped eyelids seemed to fall as from an altitude of scarcely human compassion and solicitude. "Oh, call them not good," she said. "Tell me what signs of awakening you have seen in their hearts. Dear Mary, do not neglect the one thing needful for your precious boys. Think of their immortal souls. That is what interests me much more than their worldly prospects. Do you think their hearts have been truly touched—"

"I think God has been very kind to us all, and that they are good boys," said Mary; "you know we don't think quite alike on some subjects; or, at least, we don't express ourselves alike. I can see you do as much as ever among the men, and among the poor-"

"Yes," said Mrs. Kirkman, with a sigh; "I feel unworthy of it, and the flesh is weak, and I would fain draw back; but it happens strangely that there is always a very lukewarm ministry wherever we are placed, my dear. I would give anything in the world to be but a hearer of the word like others; but yet woe is unto me if I neglect the work. This is some one coming in now to speak with me on spiritual matters. I am at home to them between two and three; but, my dear Mary, it is not necessary that you, who have been in the position of an inquiring soul yourself, should go away."

"I will come back again," said Mary, rising; "and you will come to see me at Kirtell, will not you? It makes one forget how many years have passed to see you employed exactly as of old."

"Ah, we are all too apt to forget how the years pass," said Mrs. Kirkman. She gave a nod of recognition to some women who came shyly in at the moment, and then she took Mary's hand and drew her a step aside. "And nothing more has happened, Mary?" she said; "nothing has followed? and there is to be no inquiry or anything? I am very thankful, for your sake."

"Inquiry!" said Mary, with momentary amazement. "What kind of inquiry? what could have followed? I do not know what you mean!"

"I mean about—what gave us all so much pain—your marriage, Mary," said Mrs. Kirkman. "I hope there has been nothing about it again?"

This was a very sharp trial for the superstition of old friendship in Mrs. Ochterlony's heart, especially as the inquiring souls who had come to see Mrs. Kirkman were within hearing, and looked with a certain subdued curiosity upon the visitor and the conversation. Mary's face flushed with a sudden burning, and indignation came to her aid; but even at that moment her strongest feeling was thankfulness that Wilfrid was not there.

"I do not know what could have been about it," she said; "I am among my own people, here; my marriage was well known, and everything about it, in my own place."

"You are angry, dear," said Mrs. Kirkman. "Oh, don't encourage angry feelings; you know I never made any difference; I never imagined it was your fault. And I am so glad to hear it has made no unpleasantness with the dear boys."

Perhaps it was not with the same charity as at first that Mrs. Ochterlony felt the long curls again fan her cheek, but still she accepted the farewell kiss. She had expected some ideal difference, some visionary kind of elevation, which would leave the same individual, yet a loftier kind of woman, in the place of her former friend. And what she had found was a person quite unchanged-the same woman, harder in her peculiarities rather than softer, as is unfortunately the most usual case. The Colonel's wife had the best meaning in the world, and she was a good woman in her way; but not a dozen lives, let alone a dozen years, could have given her the fluer sense which must come by nature, nor even that tolerance and sweetness of experience, which is a benefit which only a few people in the world draw from the passage of years. Mary was disappointed, but she acknowledged in her heart-having herself acquired that gentleness of experience-that she had no right to be disappointed; and it was with a kind of smile at her own vain expectations that she went in search of Emma Askell, her little friend of old-the impulsive girl, who had amused her, and loved her, and worried her in former times. Young Askell was Captain now, and better off, it was to be hoped; but yet they were not well enough off to be in a handsome house, or have everything proper about them, like the Colonel's wife. It was in the outskirts of the town that Mary had to seek them, in a house with a little bare garden in front, bare in its winter nakedness, with its little grass-plot trodden down by many feet, and showing all those marks of neglect and indifference which betray the stage at which poverty sinks into a muddle of discouragement and carelessness, and forgets appearances. It was a dirty little maid who opened the door, and the house was another very inferior specimen of the furnished house so well known to all unsettled and wandering people. The chances are, that delicate and orderly as Mrs. Ochterlony was by nature, the sombre shabbiness of the place would not have struck her in her younger days, when she, too, had to take her chance of furnished houses, and do her best, as became a soldier's wife. And then poor little Emma had been married too early, and began her struggling, shifty life too soon, to know anything about that delicate domestic order, which is half a religion. Poor little Emma! she was as old now as Mary had been when she came back to Kirtell with her boys, and it was difficult to form any imagination of what time might have done for her. Mrs. Ochterlony went up the narrow stairs with a sense of half-amused curiosity, guided not only by the dirty little maid, but by the sound of a little voice crying in a lamentable, endless sort of way. It was a kind of cry which in itself told the story of the family-not violent, as if the result of a sudden injury or fit of passion, which there was somebody by to console or to punish, but the endless, tedious lamentation, which nobody took any particular notice of, or cared about.

And this was the scene that met Mrs. Ochterlony's eyes when she entered the room. She had sent the maid away and opened the door herself, for her heart was full. It was a shabby little room on the first floor, with cold windows opening down to the floor, and letting in the cold Cumberland winds to chill the feet and aggravate the temper of the inhabitants. In the foreground sat a little girl with a baby sleeping on her knee, one little brother in front of her and another behind her chair, and that pretty air of being herself the domestic centre and chief mover of everything, which it is at once sweet and sad to see in a child. This little woman neither saw nor heard the stranger at the door. She had been hushing and rocking her baby, and, now that it had peaceably sunk to sleep, was about to hear her little brother's lesson, as it appeared; while at the same time addressing a word of remonstrance to the author of the ery, another small creature who sat rubbing her eyes with two fat fists, upon the floor. Of all this group, the only one aware of Mary's appearance was the little fellow behind his sister's chair, who lifted wondering eyes to the door, and stared and said nothing, after the manner of children. The little party was so complete in itself, and seemed to centre so naturally in the elder sister, that the spectator felt no need to seek further. It was all new and unlooked for, yet it was a kind of scene to go to the heart of a woman who had children of her own; and Mary stood and looked at the little ones, and at the child-mother in the midst of them, without even becoming aware of the presence of the actual mother, who had been lying on a sofa, in a detached and separate way, reading a book, which she now thrust under her pillow, as she raised herself on her cushions and gazed with wide-open eyes at her visitor, who did not see her. It was a woman very little like the pretty Emma of old times, with a hectic colour on her cheeks, her hair hanging loosely and disordered by lying down, and the absorbed, halfawakened look, natural to a mind which has been suddenly roused up out of a novel into an actual emergency. The hushing of the baby to sleep, the hearing of the lessons, the tedious crying of the little girl at her feet, had all gone on without disturbing Mrs. Askell. She had been so entirely absorbed in one of Jane Eyre's successors and imitators (for that was the epoch of Jane Eyre in novels), and Nelly was so completely responsible for all that was going on, that the mother had never even roused up to a sense of what was passing round her, until the door opened and the stranger looked in with a face which was not a stranger's face.

"Good gracious!" cried Mrs. Askell, springing up. "Oh, my Madonna, can it be you? Are you sure it is you, you dear, you darling! Don't go looking at the children as if they were the principal, but give me a kiss and say it is you,—say you are sure it is you!"

And the rapture of delight and welcome she went into, though it showed how weakminded and excitable she was, was in its way not disagreeable to Mary, and touched her heart. She gave the kiss she was asked for, and received a flood in return, and such embraces as nearly took her breath away; and then Nelly was summoned to take "the things" off an easy-chair, the only one in the room, which stood near her mother's sofa. Mary was still in Mrs. Askell's arms when this command was given, but she saw the girl gather up the baby in her arms, and moving softly not to disturb the little sleeper, collect the encumbering articles together and draw the chair forward. No one else moved or took any trouble. The bigger boy stood and watched behind his sister's chair, and the younger one turned round to indulge in the same inspection, and little Emma took her fists out of her eyes. But there was nobody but the little woman with the baby who could get for the guest the only comfortable chair.

"Now sit down and be comfortable, and let me look at you; I could be content just to look at you all day," said Emma. "You are just as you always were, and not a bit changed. It is because you have not had all our cares. I look a perfect fright, and as old as my grandmother, and I am no good for anything; but you are just the same as you used to be. Oh, it is just like the old times, seeing you! I have been in such a state, I did not know what to do with myself since ever I knew we were coming here,"

"But I do not think you are looking old, though you look delicate," said Mary. "Let me make acquaintance with the children. Nelly, you used to be in my arms as much as your mamma's when you were a baby. You are just the same age as my Will, and you were the best baby that ever was. Tell me their names and how old they all are. You know they are all strangers to me,"

"Yes," said their mother, with a little fretfulness. "It was such a mercy Nelly was the eldest. I never could have kept living if she had been a boy. I have been such a suffering creature, and we have been moved about so much, and oh, we have had so much to do! You can't fancy what a life we have had," cried poor Emma; and the mere thought of it brought tears to her eyes.

"Yes, I know it is a troublesome life," said Mary; "but you are young, and you have your husband, and the children are all so well—"

"Yes, the children are all well," said Emma; "but then every new place they come to, they take measles or something, and I am gone to a shadow before they are right again; and then the doctors' bills—I think Charley and Lucy and Emma have had everything," said the aggrieved mother; "and they always take them so badly; and then Askell takes it into his head it is damp linen or something, and thinks it is my fault. It is bad enough when a woman is having her children," cried poor Emma, "without all their illnesses you know, and tempers and bills, and everything besides. Oh, Madonua! you are so well off. You live quiet, and you know nothing about all our cares."

"I think I would not mind the cares," said Mary; "if you were quite like me, you would not like it. You must come out to Kirtell for a little change."

"Oh, yes, with all my heart," said Emma. "I think sometimes it would do me all the good in the world just to be out of the noise for a little, and where there was nothing to be found fault with. I should feel like a girl again, my Madonna, if I could be with you."

"And Nelly must come too," said Mrs. Ochterlony, looking down upon the little bright, anxious, careful face.

Nelly was thirteen—the same age as Wilfred; but she was little, and laden with the care of which her mother talked. Her eyes were hazel eyes, such as would have run over with gladness had they been left to nature, and her brown hair curled a little on her neck. She was uncared for, badly dressed, and not old enough yet for the instinct that makes the budding woman mindful of herself. But the care that made Emma's cheek hollow and her life a waste, looked sweet out of Nelly's eyes. The mother thought she bore it all and cried and complained under it, while the child took it on her shoulders unawares and carried it without any complaint. Her soft little face lighted up for a moment as Mary spoke, and then her look turned on the sleeping baby with that air half infantile half motherly which makes a child's face like an angel's.

"I do not think I could go," she said; "for the children are not used to the new nurse; and it would make poor papa so uncomfortable; and then it would do mamma so much more good to be quiet for a little without the children ----

Mary rose up softly just then, and, to Nelly's great surprise, bent over her and kissed her. Nobody but such another woman could have told what a sense of envy and yearning was in Mary's heart as she did it. How she would have surrounded with tenderness and love that little daughter who was but a domestic slave to Emma Askell! and yet, if she had been Mary's daughter, and surrounded by love and tenderness, she would not have been such a child. The little thing brightened aud blushed, and looked up with a gleam of sweet surprise in her eyes. "Oh, thank you, Mrs. Ochterlony," she said, in that sudden flush of pleasure; and the two recognised each other in that moment, and knitted between them, different as their ages were, that bond of everlasting friendship which is made oftener at sight than in any more cautious way.

"Come and sit by me," said Emma, "or I shall be jealous of my own child. She is a dear little thing, and so good with the others. Come and tell me about your boys. And, oh, please, just one word—we have so often spoken about it, and so often wondered. Tell me, dear Mrs. Ochterlony, did it never do any harm?"

"Did what never do any harm?" asked Mary, with once more a sudden pang of thankfulness that Wilfred was not there.

Mrs. Askell threw her arms round Mary's neck and kissed her and clasped her close. "There never was any one like you," she said; "you never even would complain."

This second assault made Mary falter and recoil, in spite of herself. They had not forgot, though she might have forgotten. Aud, what was even worse than words, as Emma spoke, the serious little woman-child, who had won Mrs. Ochterlony's heart, raised her sweet eyes and looked with a mixture of wonder and understanding in Mary's face. The child whom she would have liked to carry away and make her own-did she, too, know and wonder? There was a great deal of conversation after this-a great deal about the Askells themselves, and a great deal about Winnie and her husband, whom Mrs. Askell knew much more about than Mrs. Ochterlony did. But it would be vain to say that anything she heard made as great an impression upon Mary as the personal allusions which sent the blood tingling through her veins. She went home, at last, with that most grateful sense of home which can only be fully realised by those who return from the encounter of an indifferent world, and from friends who, though kind, are naturally disposed to regard everything from their own point of view. It is sweet to have friends, and yet by-times it is bitter. Fortunately for Mary, she had the warm circle of her own immediate belongings to return into, and could retire, as it were, into her citadel, and there smile at all the world. Her boys gave her that sweetest youthful adoration which is better than the love of lovers, and no painful ghost lurked in their memory -or so, at least, Mrs. Ochterlony thought.

HOPE AND MEMORY.

Two Sisters are there—ever year by year Companions true and dear.

To meek and thoughtful hearts. Fair Hope is one,
With voice of merry tone,

With footstep light, and eye of sparkling glance.

The other is perchance

E'en somewhat lovelier, but less full of glee. Her name is Memory.

She wanders near me, chaunting plaintive lays
Of bygone scenes and days:

And when I turn, and meet her thoughtful eye, She tells me mournfully

Of soft low gurgling brooks, and glistening flowers,
And childhood's sunny hours:

And then with tears and melancholy tone
She tells me they are gone.

Hope gently chides her—bids me not to cast
My eyes upon the past—

Cheering me thus, she leads me by the hand To view her own fair land:

And soon I see where many pleasures meet, Some close before my feet;

And some, seen dimly through the distant haze, Grow brighter as I gaze.

Oh! both refresh me.—Yet not only so:
They teach—where'er I go.

One tells of follies past, and one is given To talk to me of Heaven.

And thus I'll cling to both. Soft Memory, All pensive though she be,

Shall bide a comrade cherish'd to the end:
But Hope shall be my friend.

J. S. HOWSON.

AN OVERLAND JOURNEY FROM SAN FRANCISCO TO NEW YORK, BY WAY OF THE SALT LAKE-CITY.

On the 13th of May, 1865, my three years' command of her Majesty's gun-boat Grappler, in the Pacific colonies, terminated, and I received permission from Admiral Denman, the Commander-in-Chief, to select my own route for returning to England. I arrived at San Francisco early in June, and, after visiting one or two places of interest in California, travelled to New York in an almost direct line, through a region but little known in the Old World.

The famous big trees of Talaveras county were my first object. A steamer leaves San Francisco at four in the afternoon, and, after winding through the narrow and tortuous "sleughs" of the San Joaquin river, reaches Stockton in the early morning. Hence a four-horse "Concord" coach leaves at six for Murphy's, where it arrives at about eight the same evening.

Let me describe a Concord coach: it derives its name from the town in the eastern states where it is built, and is an overgrown loutish descendant of the English mail-coach of former days. It is usually painted bright red, and carries on its panels a glaring portrait either of a President, a maiden, or a general; over the door is written "U. S. Mail," generally translated "Uncle Sam's Mail;" and along the top are the names of the termini between which it runs. Inside are three seats, each made to hold three people; the back and front seats are of course the most comfortable, those who are on the middle bench having but a strap to lean against. Thus, nine is the limit of inside accommodation; the limit outside has not yet been ascertained, but eight besides the driver may be comfortably seated, that is, if the word "comfort" is at all applicable to a Concord coach. A most important part is its powerful break, applied by heavy pressure of the driver's right foot. These breaks are used in all American coaches and mud-waggous, and are indispensable in the steep country they traverse. The luggage is strapped on to a vast platform behind; small parcels are put in the front boot, and miscellaneous light baggage is placed on the top. No springs would support this cumbrous body over Californian roads, so it is hung on stout leather thorough-braces.

The distance from Stockton to Murphy's is about eighty miles, travelled at an average speed of seven miles an hour. The road is good, for a new country, but little has as yet been done by art. It passes through grain-fields of from one to five thousand acres, the ground being absolutely level, and dotted with a sort of weeping oak. The last thirty miles of the road are through hilly country, lightly timbered with pine and flowering shrubs.

Murphy's is a pretty little country village in a mining district, and boasts a good inn, owned by Mr. Perry, the proprietor of the Mammoth Grove. Its comforts are an agreeable surprise to the traveller, almost stifled as he is by the dust, which tries the temper and equanimity of the most amiable.

Mr. Perry runs a stage to the big trees—fifteen miles—every morning, returning to Murphy's in the evening. There is a good hotel at the Grove, situated under the very shadow of the trees; it is a great place of resort for a few weeks in the summer, as the country is famous for an abundance of game, and for the beauty of the surrounding scenery.

One of the largest trees, thirty-one feet in diameter, was felled some years ago, and a section of it sent to New York; its stump is roofed over, and is used as a floor for dancing upon. The means taken for felling this tree were original and ingenious. A ring of bark was removed at a convenient height from the ground and the trunk was bored through with augurs, each hole touching its neighbour; it was then overthrown by wedges driven in on one side, the whole operation lasting three weeks.

The immense size of the trees does not impress one at first: it takes some little time to realise their magnificent proportions. The tallest is about three hundred and thirty feet high, but not one appears to be symmetrically finished; all seem to have been broken off or severely injured by the fires which have from time to time swept through the forest. As nearly three thousand rings can be counted on the stump of the tree above referred to, the largest are supposed to be nearly three thousand years old. The young trees are pretty with light graceful foliage. The botanical name is sequoia gigantea; the Americans very justly objecting to its being called Wellingtonia, and retaliate on our impertinence by calling it Washingtonia. It is said that this tree is only indigenous in two other places, and both are in California, at the same altitude above the sea. Its bark grows in vertical ridges like buttresses, sometimes projecting as much as two feet, and a section of the tree shows where the solid wood has in some instances overgrown the bark, enclosing small patches of it. The fibre of the wood is like the California red-wood, soft and rather fine grained; it is light, the cubic foot weighing rather less than nineteen pounds.

Most of the largest trees have names on marble tablets affixed to their trunks, such as "The Mother of the Forest," "The Father of the Forest," "Florence Nightingale," "Richard Cobden," "Hercules," "The Pride of the Forest," &c.

The most beautiful and striking spot in California, some say in the world, is the Yo Semite valley in Mariposa County, where are the highest known waterfalls. It is approached by stage from Stockton, through fine hill country affording some noble points of view and intersected by many streams and rivers, of a muddy-red colour, owing to the operations of miners. The stage stops fifty-seven miles from the valley, at a small dull place called Coulterville, said to be 2500 feet above the level of the sea.

On the 27th of June I started from Coulterville, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Baker, of Sacramento, who were so kind as to allow me to join their party. We travelled on horseback, accompanied by a guide, and what few articles we required were strapped on to the saddles. Mrs. Baker possessed in an eminent degree the art of at once putting a stranger at his ease, and, like most American ladies, thoroughly understood the leading topics of the day, and how to express herself clearly and intelligibly. Such pleasant companions as Mr. and Mrs. Baker proved to be, materially added to the pleasure of the journey, and as we rode through the forests her clear sweet voice rang out the patriotic melodics the late rebellion has given birth to and cherished.

We left Coulterville at nine A.M., and after travelling up the hills all the forenoon along a dry waggon-road, soft with a reddish impalpable dust that found its way everywhere where it ought not, we reached the Bower Cave soon after noon. A few distant glimpses through the trees, as we ascended the mountains, showed the glorious snow-capped Sierra Nevadas to the east, and the hills, streams, valleys and plains to the westward, through which we had already come.

This cave would not be much visited were it not on the road to the Yo Semite Valley, but it is rather a remarkable place. At any rate, it is very pleasant to leave the dry, dusty, hot, baking air of the upper earth, and descend a greateps to a cool and shady grotto. At the bottom is a deep pool of clear green icy water, by the side of which grow a couple of trees whose topmost branches are level with the ground above. A few stalactites hang from the roof, among which swallows and squirrels make their homes. I must add that the Frenchman and his wife who own the spot keep good cream, butter, and eggs, for the refreshment of the weary.

At half-past four in the afternoon we reached Black's—a wayside house eighteen miles from Coulterville, where travellers usually put up. Here we sat down to the best meal I tasted in California,—plain meats and farm produce, but everything genuine and quite the best of its kind—so we made merry over our excellent fare. Then rolling myself up in my Scotch plaid in the verandah, with my saddle-bags for a pillow, I fell asleep.

The next morning we started at half-past six along the mule trail which leads to the valley, thirty-six miles distant. Our way lay through much grander scenery, with views here and there over large tracts of country. The forest was never thick, but consisted chiefly of spruce and sugar pine, thinly growing in a red sandy soil, with granite or trap boulders eropping up. A group of these boulders was arranged in a hollow form like Stouchenge, enclosing an area about fifty feet in diameter, and a round boulder on the top of a slab seemed as if it must have been placed there by human hands.

The light underwood was composed principally of the manzanita, a celebrated mountain wood which takes a fine polish, but is seldom found to grow to any thickness, and can only be used in veneers. Although the best time for wild flowers had passed, there were many in bloom of rich and exquisite hues. As we reached the higher levels the species varied, and we saw quantities of sweet white azaleas.

At last we topped the hill over-looking the valley, and a grand sight was before us. Its remarkable feature was that it appeared to be an enormous rent in the rocks, whose perpendicular sides had opened out. Its depth, and not the height of the hills surrounding it, was what struck us most. On their further sides the hills are not steep, while towards the valley they are almost perpendicular. It is over these that the water pours uninterruptedly from a great height, feeding the Yo Semite river. which is seen like a bright serpentine line along the bottom. The descent occupied about an hour, and was tedious from its steepness and the roughness of the trail, and when we reached the foot we had still five miles to go to the hotel at the east end of the valley.

The trail lay through perfectly level park land, with long rich grass, and it abounded in picturesque retired spots, where nothing could be heard but the murmuring of the river and the distant thundering of the falls. As we looked up at the granite mountains, sheer rock faces of unequalled height and grandeur towering above our heads on either side, we began to realise what we had come so far to see. The melting snows threw their waters over the precipices at many points, but we saw only one of the grand falls, the Bridal Veil. In several places the river spreads out into a narrow still lake, and then again contracts to a rushing noisy stream.

At the distance of a mile from the hotel, we crossed a ferry, and presently met a merry party taking an evening ride; the ladies being in Bloomer costume, which is well fitted for this kind of travel.

At a quarter-past five we reached the hotel, somewhat wearied by our long ride, and found about a dozen people staying there, besides one or two picnic parties living in tents by the river-side. In the evening we hired the services of a guitar and a violin, and danced quadrilles and country-dances, and sang patriotic songs hilariously.

One of the sights of the valley is the Mirror Lake. Here the mountains approach very closely on either side, and are perfectly reflected in a small sheet of glassy water. The effect is quite unique: one feels suspended in space—endless heights above, and boundless depths below; but this effect is only produced in the early morning, when the air is still and clear, and before the sun shines directly unthe water.

The two finest falls in the valley, that is, those which contain the largest bodies of water, are on the same stream, the chief feeder of the Yo Semite river. For the latter part of the way they can only be approached on foot, over a rude trail through forest and among boulders. The Vernal Fall is the one first reached, but its roaring appeals to the ear and its spray to the touch long before it is seen. It is only three hundred feet high, but is on the whole the most impressive, as the sheet of water is unbroken; while the Nevada Fall, although three times the height, strikes the side of the rock about half-way down, sending clouds of spray in all directions. The rushing of such a volume of water produces a constant and unvarying wind, while the spray is scattered round for a long distance. Thus the soil is always moist, even during the hottest summers, and the trees and bushes are luxuriant, but all bow in one direction before the prevailing wind.

A very narrow trail made along the slippery face of a naked rock, leads from one waterfall to the other. The precipice over which the water pours has to be ascended by two long flights of ladders, the results of much perseverance and ingenuity; after which we come to the connecting quarter of a mile of smooth swift water. The ceaseless flow has worn the rocks away in circular basins, and the stream runs from one into another as if they were artificial.

The top of the Nevada Fall may be reached by laborious climbing, but it is beyond the route of most tourists, and there is little to reward one for the labour of the ascent. Precipitous rocks so lofty are probably to be found nowhere else in the world, and the effect is bewildering.

The Bridal Veil Fall is so called, because it breaks as soon as it tips over the rocks, and the water comes down in a sheet of spray like the most exquisite lace. Ever-changing tongues of foam course down its face, starting into existence, chasing one another, overtaking, uniting, vanishing: now swayed to one side, now to another, and now borne out by a breeze far from the rock, in a light cloud. The Indians call it Pohono, the name of an evil spirit. Its height is upwards of nine hundred feet; but it contains the smallest body of water of any of the great falls, and dries up in the summer.

The Yo Semite Fall is the highest in the world, 2548 feet; but it is eaught by the rocks in two places, dividing it into three falls; the lower one is about 700 feet high, while the upper is about 1448 feet, and between the two is a series of rapids rather than a fall.

I despair of being able to convey to the mind of a reader the emotions experienced at the sight of these stupendous falls. The enormous size both of them and of the mountains of rock is almost stupe-fying; the eye wanders up higher and higher, till the brain quite loses the power of judging heights and distances.

During last June, experiments were made by the Surveyor-General of California, Mr. Houghton, with the view of determining the volume of water pouring over the Yo Semite Fall. He selected a point below the Fall, where the stream is wide, and of nearly uniform depth, and where the current is comparatively slow. He estimated the area of a section of the river at this point to be 77.83 square feet, and the quantity of water passing this point, 428,861 cubic feet per hour. But it must be observed that of the water pouring over the first and third falls, a large amount is converted into spray, and the evaporation is very great; also that the river runs over a loose sandy and gravelly soil, from the foot of the last fall to the point of the above measurements, and that much must be lost by percolation. From these causes it is estimated that from the first dash over the upper fall to the point of measurement the volume is diminished at least 20 per cent., which would give a total volume at the first named point of over half a million cubic feet per hour.

I shall always remember my visit to the Yo Semite Fall with peculiar pleasure, because of the unreserved friendliness with which a party of American ladies and gentlemen at once freely admitted me to their society, knowing nothing of me except that I was a British sailor. It was chiefly owing to their kindness and genuine, simple good-will, that I spent in the Yo Semite valley one of the happiest weeks of my life, and enjoyed its beautiful sights thoroughly, when, but for them, I might have visited it mechanically—a bachelor, lonesome and despised.

On the 1st of July I quitted the valley in company with those whose society I so much valued, and the following day we reached Coulterville. Our return journey seemed to me to pass away too quickly. We left Coulterville by stage the same evening at midnight, and at six the next morning I parted from those friends whose unaffected goodness and kindness to a perfect stranger has taught me a lesson of true hospitality I shall never forget.

Having parted with my charming Bloomer companions, I pursued my solitary way with depressed spirits. Taking the stage I passed through Sonora, San Andreas, Mokelumne Hill, Jackson, and Drytown, and reached the Latrobe railway station on the morning of the 5th of July, where I joined the direct overland route between San Francisco and New York.

Leaving Latrobe by the evening train, we arrived at Shingle Springs after a couple of hours' run. This place, to the eastward of the 121st degree of longitude, is at present the end of that railroad which, starting from Sacramento, is some day to cross the continent. Gigantic as the task appears, it is steadily and perseveringly pursued: year after year do trains run further and further to the eastward, and the railway levels mount higher and higher. The Sierra Nevada mountains once crossed, the road will advance much faster; and I am persuaded that the central plains of this great continent will be crossed by steam before many years are over.

Some Americans think that this railroad will soon be considered a political necessity, as a bond of union between the Eastern and Western States. If the Federal Government would take the matter in hand, and furnish a guarantee for the money laid out, it would be an accomplished fact in two years, and I am inclined to think it would not prove an upprofitable speculation.

Leaving Shingle Springs by a six-horse stage, I arrived at Placerville at eleven P.M. morning, at half-past four, I rose to go on by the early coach. When it arrived I found that it was full, two gentlemen having engaged six seats, that they might sleep at ease. The night being now so far spent, I asked one of them to rent me a seat; but he replied that the pleasure of obliging me on his arrival at Placerville was not the motive that had induced him to engage his three seats at San Francisco. I begged him not to let it prey upon his mind; and I really don't think he did, as I saw him settle comfortably down into his feather pillows for another nap as the stage drove off. I tried to look happy, cheerful, contented, &c.; how far I succeeded, history must decide.

However, when the second coach arrived in the afternoon, I found a vacant seat, and pursued my journey to Virginia City. The road between that place and Shingle Springs is always kept in first-rate order; during the summer it is watered every night, and so kept hard. The coaches are first-class, the six horses are always carefully chosen and well matched, and the drivers are selected for their skill and good character. It is said that some of the "tallest" driving in the States may be seen on this road, and, as far as my experience goes, I certainly never saw such driving. One passes heavy waggons drawn by long teams, both journeying east and west; the road is often narrow and steep, with sharp turns; and when the driver, rapidly swinging his six horses round a bluff, sometimes comes suddenly on a waggon labouring up the hill, only great skill and experience. and firm nerve, prevent either a collision on the one hand, or a capsize on the other. The hills are descended at full gallop, and ascended at a smart trot. At one place it became necessary for us to go very near the edge of the steep; the earth crumbled and sunk under the outer wheels, and for a moment the coach heeled over a little, but, at the pace we were going, soon recovered itself. Accidents are very rare.

Placerville is a pleasant little town, with trees in the streets and ice in the hotels. Many of its houses are of brick or stone, and well built. Wooden houses are common in all parts of the United States. and are by no means ugly or uncomfortable; but in winter the better-built houses are far preferable. All houses are roofed with wooden shingle, usually made from the cedar.

There are on this road two high points, the First and Second Summits, said to be about six thousand feet above the level of the sea. Between them lies Lake Tahoc, a large sheet of fresh water about forty it is resorted to in the summer for the sake of its excellent fishing. We passed the First Summit in the evening, just before sundown, and the view was magnificent; mountain after mountain rolling away in the distance as far as the eye could reach. I have seen many of the celebrated views of the world, but never one which seemed to command so vast and immeasurable a view of this round earth

From the First Summit, the American river flows to the westward. During our ascent we followed its banks for many miles, and saw in several places the old emigrant road used in former days before the present one was made. Anything less like a road, or more like the track of an avalanche could scarcely be imagined; and one could in some degree conceive what were the obstacles surmounted by the hardy gallant pioneers of the far far west. In a few short years, Yankee go-aheaditiveness will have wiped out even these memorials of the past.

A wayside house in Strawberry Valley is worthy of mention on account of the simple derivation of its somewhat romantic name. It is kept by a man named Berry, noted for the good fare he provides for man and beast. It seems, however, that during one severe winter he ran short of provender, and fed some packer's mules with straw, and from this fact the valley has acquired its name.

The western slope of the Sierra Nevadas abounds with quail of two species. Near the plains is the common California quail, but higher up is the mountain quail, distinguished by a crest of two long feathers, which quiver with every quick nervous motion of its little head, as it runs over the rocks and among the bushes. Both species are numerous, of beautiful plumage, and good eating. They are difficult to catch alive, but I have seen a large cageful of them at a wayside house among the Descending at a break-neck pace from the First Summit we reached the borders of Lake Tahoe, whose southern shores we followed for nearly twenty miles. It was now night, but a full moon gave to the scene a peculiar beauty, lighting up points of the most distant hills, and shadowing valleys in the deepest gloom.

All day had I been jolted on the top of the coach, but when night came I took my place inside, where was a vacant seat. This was my first experience of a night spent in a Concord coach. Looking back to my first middle-watch as a midshipman, to my last middle-watch as a lieutenant, or to my first night after I caught the measles, I can remember no night of horror equal to my first night's travel on the Overland Route. We all know how veal-and-ham pie increases the intensity of a nightmare; and in the same way did the solid meal, bolted against time in the Strawberry Valley, affect this night's delights. An American friend, who had himself crossed the plains, had recommended me to bring an air-pillow. This became my mainstay: I sat on it by miles in diameter. A small steamer plies on it, and day, or interposed it between the hard side of the coach and my ragged skin and jaded bones, and by night I put my head through the hole in the middle and wore it as a collar, like a degraded Chinaman. This saved the sides of my head during my endeavours to sleep, but occasionally a heavier jelt than usual would strike the cranium violently against the roof, driving it down between my shoulders. I remember nothing between the shores of Lake Tahoe and the Second Summit; here I certainly did look out of the window, and then fell to bumping about again until we stopped for a short time at Carson City, at one A.M. Here we got out and stamped around for a few minutes while the horses were being changed, and were amused by a lady who had no money wherewith to pay her fare any farther, and at the same time declined to alight. The mail agent was in an awkward fix: he did not like to engage in a fray in the dead hours of the night, as the awakened neighbours would be sure to side with the woman they did not know, for the pleasure of abusing the man they did know; and yet if he allowed her to proceed, the amount of her fare would be charged against his pay. At last, however, he was persuaded to leave her in possession by her assurance that she was a person of great consideration, owning houses and lands in Virginia City, and that everybody knew where she lived. So I poked my head into my air-pillow again and off

At 4 A.M., just as the day was breaking, we stopped at the door of the International Hotel, Virginia City, and more dead than alive I fell asleep on a real bed for several hours. A very frowsylooking saint, bound for the Great Salt Lake, came with us, and started for his Eden two hours after arrival.

Virginia City is a remarkable specimen of the towns that seem to spring up by magic in the mining districts. It is situated near the foot of a conspicuous hill, Mount Davidson, in a land where rain never falls, where not a blade of grass is visible, and where trees are only to be seen in one distant valley. It lies in the focus of the rays of the sun reflected from the naked hills, a dry and uninviting evidence of underground wealth. that part of the State of Nevada, recently admitted into the Union, is known as the Washoe country, and is celebrated for the richness of its silver mines. The rain-bearing clouds that come floating in from the Pacific Ocean are caught by the Sierra Nevada mountains, and fall condensed before they reach the Washoe country. Snew falls heavily in winter on the Sierra Nevadas, and on the high plateau of Nevada State, which is much more elevated than California. These snows melting in summer feed two or three considerable streams which flow for some distance and are then lost in sinks in valleys, where a few cotton-trees grow. The ground is hard, and mostly covered with a sage-brush like the common garden-sage. A few attempts at irrigation have succeeded, and in one or two places round the town are small vegetable gardens.

There are many well-built brick buildings in Virginia City, including two theatres. The mines gave birth to three towns, Gold Hill, Silver City, and Virginia City; and houses have now sprung upbetween them, making one continuous street, three or four miles long, running along the side of a hill, which is burrowed and tunnelled in every direction. Like most speculative towns, Virginia City lives in a condition of normal collapse; every man you meet assures you that the place is "caving in," and that the mines are "played out;" yet, if you walk round the town, you will see houses springing up, and much business being transacted in the "stores."

Beautiful specimens of petrified wood are found in the neighbourhood. They are very remarkable, as there are now no trees within miles of the spot; and they seem to show that this country was once well wooded, and enjoyed a totally different climate. About five miles from Virginia City are some hot springs. I had not time to visit them, but I believe that there are several acres covered with small geysers of various temperatures.

From Placerville I journeyed with Mr. Little, a merchant returning from China, where he had spent some years. The pleasure of meeting an English gentleman in such a distant land cannot be exaggerated. I was also glad to renew at Virginia City, my acquaintance with Mr. Rising, Episcopal clergyman of that town, whom I had met at the Big Trees. He has opportunity for doing much good, and it appeared that his efforts were appreciated. He has a numerous attendance at his Sundayschool of both teachers and pupils, and their harmonious singing showed that trouble had been taken to cultivate that art.

Some letters I had brought with me, assisted by kind recommendations from Mr. Rising, secured for me the privilege of visiting the Gould and Curry silver mine, in company with the foreman. To the uninitiated, I do not know that there is any great interest in a mine. One mine is generally very much like another. One is sometimes dirtier than another; in one there is sometimes more bad air than in another; in one there is sometimes more black water than in another; but there is a strong family likeness. The Gould and Curry mine formed no exception. We entered the side of the hill, following a level tunnel, and carrying greasy candles; we went down shafts, clambered up ladders, crawled along drains, examined muddy pieces of rock, tapped them with pick-axes, broke off lumps and held them to the candles, and declared they were very beautiful and very rich. We were soon wet through with perspiration, and envied the miners in the scantiest possible clothing. Although quite tired out after a couple of hours, I had still to follow the foreman on his rounds, and did not reach the upper earth till I had spent three hours and a half in this noisome hole.

But although such a long visit was not very entertaining to me, two or three Californian gentlemen made up the party, and L was able to learn

The Gould and something from their remarks. Curry silver mine is one of the richest and probably the best worked in the world. The Company does everything on a handsome scale: it gives the resident manager 2,500l. a-year, and a good house; most of its buildings and work-shops are of brick and hewn stone; and no expense is spared in order that the works should be conducted as well as possible. The silver is contained in quartz, which is erushed in a steam quartz-crushing machine, worked with ninety stampers; and it is found to contain 25 per cent. of gold. Many mines are worked in the neighbourhood, but none afford returns so rich as the Gould and Curry. It has a great advantage in being on a hill, because the quartz is brought out in waggons, which run down on a railroad by their own impetus to the store-rooms and mills below.

A visit to the top of Mount Davidson, which overhangs the town, rewards one with an extensive view of the country. The ascent is steep and stony, but the sight from the top, like that at the First Summit of the Sierra Nevadas, is one never to be forgotten. The clearness of the sky in that pure mountain air makes the view almost illimitable, but it is only the great distance one is able to see, and the endless succession of mountain ranges. that is beautiful; for owing to the absence of all verdure, the nearer country looks painfully barren and repulsive. The grey sage-brush which everywhere covers the ground, has a dreary monotonous appearance that is wearisome both to eye and heart. At the top is a tall flag-staff, whence usually wave the stars and stripes; the pole is seventy feet long, but from the town below it looks like a stick with a handkerchief on the end of it. I believe Virginia City is about the ninth or tenth highest in the world.

At half-past six in the morning of the 10th of July, I left Virginia in a Concord coach. At last I felt myself fairly off on the great Overland Route. and a very charming journey it promised to be. The morning was cool, the sun was rising over the hills, and there was no wind to make the dust unendurable. Our coach was nearly a new one, and six beautiful glossy black horses, with flowing manes and tails, proudly champed their bits and pawed the ground, as we waited at the door of the stage-office for our final orders. Presently we dashed down the hill, through the lower streets of the town, and were soon rattling over the plain through the eternal sage-brush. The coach was quite full, niue inside and one out, the greatest number ever carried on this road. Three Mexican women and an American lady were among the passengers; the other five were miners, and proprietors of mule or waggon trains.

After journeying for two or three miles, we found there was plenty to try the temper of the passengers. We began to feel cramped, the heat of the sun made us hot and irritable: and not only was there a difficulty about stowing away one's feet, but we had even to fit in our knees, one with another, and then occasionally give and take pretty smart blows caused by the jostling of the carriage. Most of the men chewed tobacco, and those who occupied centre seats had to exert considerable skill to spit clear of the other passengers. Americans are generally adepts in this art, but we had one or two unskilful professors, although it must be admitted that they had hardly a fair opportunity of showing off their proficiency, from the jolting of the coach. Occasionally they would unconcernedly expectorate among the baggage on the floor. The smell caused by this abominable practice was intolerable and sickening at first, until one became somewhat accustomed to it. In railway carriages, in the best hotels, and even at the renowned West Point military academy, the disgusting habit of chewing tobacco prevails. Pocket-handkerchiefs do not appear to be common, and my fellow-passengers occasionally resorted to the primitive custom probably handed down to us from the Patriarchal ages, and religiously preserved among the London Arabs.

The females of the party had many small packages which they insisted on having inside with them, as is the wont of their sex. In this department the ladies from Mexico were distinguished. One basket, with the contents of which I must confess they were truly hospitable, thus quite disarming the grumblers, contained cheese, biscuits, dried fish, and onions. A very large soft flabby bundle contained dirty linen which they had not had time to have washed. I fear one of the gentlemen who chewed tobacco found it rather in his way.

After we had been an hour or two on the road the heat became oppressive; a light westerly breeze sprang up, which carried the dust along with us, and was at times stifling. The severe discomforts of this travelling can hardly be exaggerated, but one learns to endure them. The character, the language, and the manners of the class of people who chiefly use this route, however, became if possible even more repugnant to me each day. These I could not endure without disgust, and at the end of my journey, in spite of all attempts at reserve or civility, I felt myself cowed and humiliated in a manner not to be described. Even now I cannot think of my companions in some parts of the overland journey without a shudder.

We changed horses about every ten miles, and soon discovered that distance did not lend enchantment to the horses. The beautiful long-tailed prancers of the morning were shortly changed for muddy bony beasts, with drum-like skins, which suggested the idea that they were only walking about to save funeral expenses. But great was our chagrin, after bolting our dinners at Cottonwood, forty-five miles from Virginia City, to find that the coach went no further, and that our journey must be pursued in mud-waggons. This accounted for our starting with only one outside passenger in the morning.

I must endeavour to give some idea of a mud-waggon. If it had springs, it would be something like what in England is called a spring-van; but it hasn't. Like a Concord coach, it rides on thoroughbraces; its sides and top are of leather or folds of stout painted canvas stretched over a wooden frame; inside are three seats, each carrying three persons; a platform behind carries the mail-bags and heavier luggage, while the front boot holds the express bags and small parcels; and there is one seat for a passenger alongside the driver. These carriages are generally painted red, without expensive or elaborate ornament, and drawn by four, or sometimes six horses. Some mud-waggons are rather better than others, but all are very rough. It may be doubted, however, whether any better kind of carriage would stand the hard usage they receive. Some of the teams are fierce little mustangs, which draw very well, but are difficult to drive; others are respectable old carriage-horses that have seen better days, but staging is severe work, and soon kills them. did see one fine horse that had been staging for ten years in the wildest country, and appeared ready for ten years more, but he was an exceptionally sturdy old fellow.

The quality of the food supplied at the way-side houses, distinguished from the stations where only horses are changed by the name of home-stations, varied much. The meal set before us at Cottonwood was certainly good, consisting of meats and vegetables, bread, butter, and milk, and tea and coffee. And as a rule the meals supplied where the line is in regular working order are passable; but at some home-stations there was very little to be had; in one or two instances only bread, beans, and bacon, and even those very bad.

The stages profess to stop for three meals a-day, and to allow half an hour each time. This sounds fair enough, but it must be remembered that no other time is allowed for washing or change of clothes; the latter is a luxury never attempted, Between Virginia City and the former seldom. Salt Lake City the electric telegraph follows the stage-road, and so the number of passengers and the hour at which they may be expected is telegraphed from station to station. Ten minutes after arrival the food is on the table; ten minutes afterwards, you choke yourself as the driver calls out "all aboard"; and ten minutes after that again, you are fairly under weigh, inhaling dust; and ten minutes later still you are suffering from a severe attack of indigestion.

During the first part of the journey, tolcrably punctual time is kept, but time once lost cannot be made good afterwards, and as the home stations are at irregular distances, the results are apt to be inconvenient. One night at 11 o'clock we reached a home station where we ought, according to the waybill, to have breakfasted. Breakfast was ready, but dead tired as we were, we refused to turn out. The driver warned us we were a long way from the next home station, but who thinks of the morrow when he is worn out with fatigue? The nextday we had to pay for our neglect, as we did not reach a home station until two in the afternoon. By that time we were all more or less ill, and only a box of prunes from my hamper kept us at all alive.

The journey from Virginia City to Salt Lake City lasted five days and four nights. On the evening of the second day we crossed a brook called Reese River, and passed through a small town called Austin City. This was the only place on the road worthy of the name of a town, and it contained a few brick and stone houses. It stands among the hills, and is purely a mining town, some of the mines opening on to its street. A year or two ago there was a rush to the Reese River district, but the gold and silver mines have not quite answered the expectations formed of them.

Prospecting parties are often formed by speculators, and sent out to examine ledges or ranges of hills which are not well known. These parties often make valuable discoveries, and bring back rich specimens of the precious metals, and accounts of districts where such specimens abound. On the strength of their report companies are formed, and a rush to this particular spot takes place. Sometimes these reports are false, the specimens having been procured elsewhere to abet the fraud, but more often there is no deception in the matter.

Reese River is marked on most maps as a stream of some importance. It rises from two or three springs to the northward of Austin, flows some seventy or eighty miles to the southward, and sinks nowhere in particular. It is at best a mere ditch, probably in no place above two feet deep; and yet it is drawn on the map as a respectable well-conducted river, and gives its name to a large district. I believe that a bogus company was got up recently to run steamers on the Reese River, but nobody made any money out of it except the secretary, who has not been heard of since.

The road lay through desert alkali plaius, barren red hills and mountains, marshes, and sands. winds traversing these plains become impregnated with the alkali, which causes a bad taste in the mouth, and dries up the lips and the skin on the face and hands. In some places there were pretty views: some of the hill tops and a few of the valleys were relieved by pine and cedar scrub, but little can be said in favour of the scenery. The ground was invariably covered with dull grey sage-brush; the ranges of hills and mountains run north and south, aud between them are absolutely level plains, varying from ten to twenty miles in breadth; but the hills are seldom ascended. It is very remarkable that in almost every instance there is a natural pass through the hills on nearly the same level as the plains. One of these, nearly four miles long, had the regularity of a railroad cutting; it was in these passes that two or three years ago the Indians used to attack the stage.

On the morning of Friday the 14th, we reached Fort Crittenden, about fifty miles from Salt Lake City. Here we stopped to breakfast, and I made acquaintance with the Mormon innkeeper. He had but two wives, the youngest of whom I saw, herself a mere child, with her baby at her breast. Our mud-waggon from hence was rather better than those we were accustomed to, and the horses were finer and fatter.

At a distance of twenty-five miles from Salt Lake City we forded the river Jordan, the water being about four feet deep. It runs in a northerly direction about forty miles, from the fresh-water Utah Lake to the Great Salt Lake. These lakes lie at each end of a valley some fifteen miles in breadth. At the north end, the Salt Lake does not run across the whole breadth, but the mountains sweep round to meet its eastern shore; and on an elevated "bench" at their foot, sheltered from the north and east, is situated the famous city of the Latter Day Saints.

We entered the valley from the southward, passing over a rising ground from which we could sec it stretching out. For twenty-five miles the road ran due north, and at its termination the city was before us, bearing the appearance of white specks on a green ground-a striking contrast to the surrounding arid desert. On our right rose grand mountains, six or seven thousand feet high, thrown like a sheltering arm behind the City of the Saints: and on our left stretched the broad Salt Lake, with two mountainous islands standing out in bold relief, while the river Jordan, passing almost under our feet, was seen winding its way to the Dead Sea. The air of these regions is so pure, that distant objects are seen with a distinctness very deceiving. The drive into the city passes between fields irrigated by streams descending from the eastern hills. We changed horses every ten miles, and as we advanced, signs of prosperity were more numerous, for we saw houses, gardens, and small farms. At length it became dark, and it was not until 9.30 P.M. that our long, long drive terminated as we drew up in front of the Salt Lake

I was too much knocked up for sight-seeing on the first day after my arrival. Without feeling actually tired, I found myself continually dropping off to sleep, but the excitement of the journey gradually wore off. The first piece of news we heard by telegraph that morning was that a stagecoach, which runs three times a-week between Virginia City in the Idahoe territory and Salt Lake City, had been attacked and robbed by highwaymen. The driver and four passengers out of five were shot dead; the fifth fell down severely wounded in the bottom of the coach, and was only saved by the bodies of his companions falling on him. The murderers escaped with a booty of seventy thousand dollars, or fourteen thousand pounds, in Last summer this same stage was robbed, and the passengers murdered; some of the robbers were caught and hung, while others escaped.

The general impression given by Salt Lake City is an agreeable one. The streets divide the town into ten-acre blocks: they are all 128 feet broad, and at right angles to each other. On each side is a stream of living water, and rows of cotton-wood and locust trees border the side walks. There is but one main street, in which the houses are built close to each other; everywhere else each house stands in its own garden or orchard. Some of them are large, two or three stories high, built of burnt bricks, red sandstone, or granite, but most are of white sun-dried bricks. They look clean and cheerful: the door-posts, window-sills, &c., are of wood, painted bright green, or of rich red sandstone, and creepers adorn the walls. The gardens are well and tastefully kept, and fruit-trees are particularly successful. The streets chiefly used are gravelled; and as the plateau on which the town stands slopes gently to the southward, there is good drainage. Altogether, few towns have been so judiciously designed and so perfectly built; few enjoy so great natural advantages, which have been cleverly made the most of. The barren country we passed through would have prepared us to appreciate any place where there might be a spare blade of grass, but Salt Lake City would be considered beautiful anywhere. When it is remembered that seventeen years ago, this end of the valley was a desert, like the other, one is astonished at the enterprise and perseverance of the Mormon leaders. The city is 4000 feet above the level of the sea, so the climate has greater extremes than that of England. In summer it is hot and dry, and rain rarely falls at any season; in winter there are heavy snows, which caused great suffering to the Mormons on their first arrival. The Wahsatch Mountains, on the east side of the valley, are a spur of the Rocky Mountains, and much higher than the hills on the west side. From the east flow all the streams used for irrigation, fed by the ever-melting snows.

On the morning of Sunday, July 9th, I attended Divine Service, which is held in the rooms of a Young Men's Literary Association lately formed. The service was conducted by a Congregationalist clergyman, a Scotchman, the Rev. Norman M'Leod, Chaplain to the Forces stationed here. He is a gallant determined fellow, of considerable force of character. I believe he will do a great work here. I think the days of Mormonism are numbered: and its fall will be brought about by such agencies as Mr. M'Leod's ministry, by immigration, and by education, but not by persecution.

In the afternoon I attended the Mormon service. I was prepared to hear something of Mormon doctrines, or perhaps some gospel truths with which I could myself agree, but was utterly disappointed. During his address, the Mormon marshal twice stopped—once to bless the bread, and once to bless the water. These were handed round: the Sacrament being administered in that way every Sunday. Water is used instead of wine, until the Mormons shall be able to obtain the pure juice of the grape.

The people were assembled in a large booth in the Temple Block. It is one of the squares, which has been walled in, and on which the temple is being built.

When the first address was concluded, a second was given by a cadaverous-looking man. He urged the great weight his opinion of Mormonism ought to have with his audience, because, he said, he had tried all other religions and found them to be false. He said he was educated as a Baptist, but that religion did not satisfy him: he felt he wanted more, so he tried Presbyterianism; but that did not satisfy him, so he tried the Church of England and various sects, till at last he had found a home among the Mormons, and was happy. This climax was received with a sensation approximating to applause,

At the conclusion, a hymn was sweetly sung by a large choir, most of whom were Brigham Young's sons and daughters. The congregation did not join in this the only devotional part of the scrvice, which otherwise, neither in the subject-matter of the addresses nor in the behaviour of the people, had in it any appearance of reverence or devotion. It is difficult to believe that there can be any elevated sentiment among a people who allow themselves to be led by such palpable ignorance and folly.

After the service, we strolled round the Temple Block, which, like the other squares or blocks in the city, is ten acres in extent. Besides the booth in which the service was held, it contained two finished and two unfinished buildings. The former are the tabernacle and the endowment-house, presently in use, and the latter are the new tabernacle and temple. The tabernacle is used for preaching in on cold or wet days, when the booth cannot be used: the ceremonies performed in the endowment-house are secret.

It is very difficult to ascertain anything about the Mormons which has not been published to the world, owing to the overwhelming flood of gossipping-stories which are retailed from one Gentile to another, many of them palpably false, and nearly all exaggerations. I believe, however, that of one of their ceremonies -that of initiation-I received a tolerably accurate account. The candidate is left in the temple, to fast and pray for a day and a night; at the expiration of which he is brought, in a state of nuclity, before Brigham Young, who sits as the representative of God, with Elder Heber Kimball seated on his right hand, to represent Our Lord. is then baptised by total immersion, takes certain oaths, and is invested with a white robe, woven in one piece. This is bound with red round the throat, and has gashes bound with red cut in it over the heart and stomach, to signify that if he is unfaithful to his creed, his throat shall be cut, his heart taken out, and his belly ripped open; and that any brother may, without sin, perform these kind offices for him. Rigid Mormons are said always to wear this garment under their clothes, day and night.

The tabernacle is a long building, like a chapel, with a round roof; the sun's rays, emblems of divinity, being carved in wood at the ends. I did not go inside. The interior of the endowment-house can of course only be seen by saints; but from without it appears to be a plain two-storied house.

The new tabernacle is to be an oval building, surmounted by a huge dome, sustained on oblong red sandstone buttresses, in place of walls. The spaces between the pillars are to serve for windows and doors, and to be filled in winter by large glass frames on rollers. At the time of my visit, the last pillar was nearly finished, and it was hoped that the building would be completed in autumn. It is intended to hold fifteen thousand people. Only the foundations of the temple are, however, as yet built.

After walking round the block, we had some conversation with an old Scotchman who was in charge of the buildings. He appeared to me to be a genuinely pious man—the only Mormon I met whom I should be disposed so to characterise. He was well acquainted with the Bible, and able to bring many texts in support of the Mormon doctrine, and seemed sincerely to pity all who did not belong to the Church of Latter-Day Saints. Were there many such men among them, they would command our sympathy but I hardly think this character can be common, as I neither met with nor heard of a second.

It is hard and thankless to condemn a whole people, but the more I saw of the Mormons, the more was I convinced of the utter corruption of their chief men, and of the blind folly of the lower class. I believe Mormonism may be described as a system of extravagant fanaticism and unbounded licentiousness. It is often asked whether the women can get away if they are miserable. The answer is that, theoretically, there is no restraint; but what hope is there for a helpless woman in the middle of that continent, surrounded by vast deserts, and having probably alienated from herself the affections of her family? That some are unhappy, and deeply feel their desolate condition, I know, and I believe there must be many such. they choose to go to the Camp, they can have personal protection; but what they want is home and kindred. One case was mentioned which seems too monstrous to be true, but I found no reason to disbelieve it. Two widowed sisters arrived, one with four daughters, and the other with five, and one Mormon married the whole eleven of them !

Polygamy is the doctrine of the Mormon faith which most readily strikes a civilised man as being false and unnatural; and so this is the doctrine which is most commented on and ridiculed. It is not, however, the point on which a Mormon can be the most easily shaken. Polygamy is so great a plunge into a new order of things that it is only taken when a man has well fortified himself with arguments. Most Mormons I spoke to seemed to view this question just as I did myself—as a barefaced gratification of the passions. Of course, they would not say it in those words, but not one attempted to defend it on religious grounds.

At the north end of the town are some hot sulphur springs. The waters are much resorted to, and are considered very healthy.

Great attention has been paid to the internal economy of the city. It is divided into twenty wards, each of which is presided over by its own bishop, and controlled by its own sanitary and other officers, who all report regularly to Brigham Young. Among these officers are the watermasters, whose duty it is to see that the water of the streams is fairly divided among the streets by day and among the gardens by night. These last depend for their moisture entirely upon irrigation, but when carefully tended they are very fruitful. All English fruits and vegetables thrive well; the currant grows to a great size, but its skin becomes hard, and it loses its flavour. Ice is stored in the winter in large quantities, and is cheap even through the dry hot summer.

At Salt Lake City I made the acquaintance of Captain Charles Dahlgren, son of the distinguished American Admiral. He had done good service, both by sea and land, during the rebellion, and had now come to Utah as superintendent and confidential agent for a silver mining company, about to commence operations in the neighbourhood. Though he knew me only as an officer of the Royal Navy, he introduced me to Colonel George and the officers of the camp, and laid himself out to make my visit as agreeable as possible. This national habit of recognising the claims of strangers to be treated as guests is one that we in England would do well to cultivate more generally, especially when Americans visit this country.

On Monday Captain Dahlgren took me to Camp Douglas, where the American troops were stationed. A cheerful site has been chosen for their barracks on a plateau somewhat higher than the town, and distant from it about two miles to the eastward. Here there is a parade ground, encircled, Mormonfashion, with young locust-trees and running water, where their brass band plays daily. The houses are built of adobie (sun-dried) bricks or timber, and command a fine view of the valley to the southward. A small theatre has been built, and there are some workshops and storehouses.

Three newspapers are published at Salt Lake—two in the city, and one, The Vidette, in the Camp. This last is a Gentile daily paper, and is probably safer in the Camp than it would be in the city. The Descret News is a weekly Mormon paper, printed and published at the Tithing Office; and there is also a daily Mormon paper. At only one shop in Mormondom could books be purchased, and they were few in number and of the most paltry description. This is a significant fact with regard to a town which has a population of at least 10,000 couls.

It is difficult to estimate the amount of personal safety in the city, but there is no doubt that there is a most perfect system of espionage, and that little goes on with which the Prophet of the Lordas Brigham Young is styled-is not made acquainted. An artisan told me that seventeen years ago he joined the Mormons, and left them again about two years since. He said he still had some faith in Mormonism as it first existed, when there was probably a good deal of earnest picty among them. He held that now it was entirely changed and corrupted, and that the chiefs were a set of the lowest, most sensual, and degraded men. I doubt whether half-a-dozen years ago life was safe for anyone offending Brigham Young, but now, in the presence of the troops, the Mormon authorities would be afraid to have a man made away with. Some years ago a band of men existed, called Danites, or the destroying angels, whose business it was to execute the vengeance of the Prophet. They are now, however, released from that duty. One of them was pointed out to me, a man of most ferocious appearance. He was drunk, and driving a waggon through the street.

The town, however, has generally a sober and moral aspect; no retail liquor shops are allowed, and it is rare to see a drunken man. Offences are few. Sunday is scrupulously respected, and the people walk about in an orderly and quiet manner in their "Sabbath-day suits." The social evil is supposed not to exist, but this is not exactly the case. It is commonly said by the Gentiles that it exists for Mormons only, under the sanction and control of Brigham Young. I certainly know that all Mormons in good standing are not moral men.

I was warned by Gentile residents not to send my letters through the post, and was positively assured that they are often opened, and, if considered expedient, burned. As a people the Mormons are supercilious and insolent to outsiders, generally treating them with coldness and reserveoften with rudeness. There is great jealousy against them, and no prudent effort is spared to render their residence here uncomfortable. The insulting bearing of the Mormon hotel-keeper of the Salt Lake House, his indifference to the comfort of his. guests, the bad food and slovenliness of the establishment, made me rejoice when on Sunday night I moved into a boarding-house, kept by Mrs. King, where I spent the remainder of my stay in the enjoyment of cleanliness and civility. Mr. Little and Captain Dahlgren joined me there, so we Gentiles consoled each other. Excellent food is always to be had: fresh meat, vegetables, cream and eggs as good as in an English country town.

The Mormon women wear large sun-bonnets, and when they meet a Gentile they turn away their heads and look down. As a class I believe them to be modest and well-behaved—probably above the average—but ignorant and unintellectual.

On Monday evening I was invited to become an honorary member of the Young Men's Literary Association. Its president is the Chief Justice of the territory, Judge Titus, appointed by the Federal Government, -a man of high reputation, who ably fills his difficult post. Owing to the acquaintance with English law and precedents which he must have, a first-rate American lawyer is usually an agreeable and interesting man to meet. Association is of considerable importance, because it forms the only point of union for the Gentiles, who probably do not number more than a couple of hundred residents, besides the troops. The strong point of the Mormon government is its union and centralisation, so that the institution of this association was a first step by the Gentiles towards mutual help and sympathy, and accordingly the Mormons regard it with great disfavour.

On Wednesday morning I visited Elder Heber C. Kimball at his house. He is next in rank to Brigham Young. I had a conversation with him, in which he stated his belief that in a few years polygamy would be legalised all over the world; that the rapid strides made by the social evil proves this; and that it is a necessary thing for all young men. He is an uneducated and low-minded man. I did not hear him speak in public, but I was told that when defining the position and duties of woman in his sermons, his language is most gross and indelicate. With chivalrous gallantry, he alludes to his wives as "his cows."

The Mormon leaders are evidently in tribulation respecting the fate of their sect. The Speaker of the House of Congress, and other influential Americans who have lately visited Salt Lake City, plainly said that the Federal Government would insist on its laws being respected.

During the late rebellion, the Mormons cannot be accused of having assisted either party. In the most candid unblushing way they gloried in the strife between North and South, and prophesied the disruption of the Union. Of course, they looked forward to asserting their own independence-a future they keep steadily in view; and the complete triumph of the North has been a serious disappointment to them. Some of the sermons preached during the rebellion were little else than treason and sedition.

Seven-tenths of the population are from the British Isles, the remainder being Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, or Americans. The leading men are generally 'cute Yankees, while the others are from the most ignorant classes of various countries, especially remote parts of Wales and Scotland. It is a disgrace to England that this should be so. It is argued that as polygamy and murder are essential parts of Mormonism, a Mormon missionary is in fact soliciting people to commit a crime, and may therefore be apprehended and bound over to be of good behaviour. I say murder, because every Mormon, on donning his endowment robes, swears that, if directed to do so, he is prepared to take the life of a brother who violates his oaths or speaks against the Mormon pricethood. In Prussia the former view of the case is taken, so there are no missionaries there. When we remember that from the shores of Old England hundreds of poor deluded creatures annually cross the sea and the desert, and arrive at Salt Lake City, it would be well if some steps could be taken to stop the proselytising of the missionaries. Whatever modicum of good or of genuine piety there may have been among the early Mormons, their city is now a hot-bed of vice, ignorance, and sensuality.

The following day I called on Brigham Young. He was very reserved, but courteous and obliging. His dress and appearance are those of a farmer of the better class. I should say that his countenance has in it nothing sensual or repulsive, but he gives one the idea of a man of strong character and determined will. He is about sixty years of age, but looks ten years younger. His manner is perfectly natural, without the smallest vanity or arrogance, and he seemed by far the most superior Mormon I saw. Yet vanity or affectation might well be expected in a man who has done what he has done. It is not easy to realise what noble qualities must have been essential to the man who led a small body of people into the most desolate and least known part of the New World; who cheered and encouraged them during days of great hardship; and, after seventeen years, has built up in this distant valley a well-ordered town, surrounded with smiling farms and suburbs. However much the Mormons may now be degraded and deluded, their leader must have been no common man to have performed his life's work. From many things I heard, I am somewhat inclined to fear that, in spite of his talents and some admirable qualities, he is at heart a bad and wicked man; but no one will blame me if I shrink from too hasty a judgment. As far as I could learn, he has sixty-four carnal wives, besides two or three hundred spiritual wives. It is part of the Mormon creed that a woman cannot receive salvation except through a man. Brigham is said to have forty-eight sons capable of bearing arms, and he has a school-house set apart for his younger offspring. He is said to be enormously wealthy, but his wealth is probably exaggerated. No doubt, he is anxious to provide for his family.

Every Mormon is expected to pay tithes to the Church, the control of which rests with the bishops and elders. I could not find out that any check is kept on the disposal of these funds, or that there is anything like a public audit. This, to say the least, is a great temptation to those who finger the money. Most of it is supposed to be spent on public works. but there were not many buildings to show for it. Some is said to be spent in bribes to American officials; but I should be inclined to doubt this. It is also said that one of the Saudwich Islands has been bought as a refuge in case of further persecu-One of the richest Mormons-a chemist, owning a large shop in Main Street-has for the last two or three years very wisely declined to pay his tithes, the arrears of which amount to a considerable sum. He has been publicly rebuked for it in church, but to no purpose.

I requested permission to visit the schools, and Brigham Young directed Mr. Campbell, the superintendent of education, to take me round. There were, however, only two in session at the time, and of these two I formed but a poor opinion, both from the appearance of the children and from their stock of knowledge.

I frequently met people who admitted they were not very good Mormons, and, when pushed with a little close questioning, confessed they would leave the Mormon faith if there were any way open to them; but that at present to secede from it would entail some distress, and perhaps even personal danger.

On Friday, the 21st, four of us Gentiles hired a carriage-and-pair, and drove across the valleytwenty miles-to visit a point on the Great Salt Lake, where is a small inn, and where boats are kept. The only bridge over the Jordan is on this road: it is remarkably well built, and very creditable to its designers. The shores of the lake are covered with dark brown salt to a depth of three or four inches, and the only living creatures we could detect were minute flies, myriads of which settled on the water in patches, looking like seum until, on being touched, they rose in a cloud. The water holds in solution the greatest possible quantity of salt. When we bathed, we found it very buoyant; and when we dived, its great specific gravity forced it into our eyes, noses, and ears to an extent that was acutely painful. Mr. Little courageously dived with the view of reaching the bettom, and when he came up his sufferings were so severe that we were quite alarmed lest he should be seriously injured: however, patience and a little fresh water at length relieved us, leaving us sadder and wiser men.

The water is of a deep blue—an effect probably caused by the salt, which makes it so dense as materially to check a boat sailing through it, though making her float lightly. The depth of water is nowhere greater than thirty feet, and in many places only five or six. There are many islands in the lake, one of which—Church Island, at the east side—can be reached by fording. It contains good pasture. At the inn we were amused by seeing two full-length profile portraits of the martyrs, Joseph and Hiram Smith. I am afraid there is something ludicrous in the idea of a martyr in a claw-hammer coat.

Driving back, we were struck by the parallel water-lines, one above another, on the sides of the hills. At one place we counted seven distinct marks. The idea most readily suggested is that this country has all been under water, and that these lines represent the different levels to which it has from time to time sunk, until at last only the existing lake has been left. This theory is the most generally received; but the marks on the hills are to be seen all over the high plateau in the centre of the continent. Some say that the sandstone strata are harder in some places than in others, and that these lines are caused by the action of the sun and rain. Banks of fallen sand and gravel at the foot of the cliffs seem to give some colour to this theory.

On Saturday, the 22nd, I took my ticket for Atchison, on the Missouri River, and prepared to continue my journey eastward. On this day we heard of a Mormon settlement, about fifty miles to the southward, being attacked, and two Mormons killed, by Indians. We also heard of two murdered bodies being found in a stream near Fort Bridger, and that the stage from Virginia City in Idahoe, had again been stopped in the same place, but allowed to proceed, as it contained neither passengers nor treasure.

At this time, passenger traffic between Salt Lake City and Denver City was stopped on account of Indian troubles on the road. I received permission, however, to overtake the superintendent, who had started for the east this morning, and to obtain his sanction to proceed. From Mr. Roberson, the mail agent at Salt Lake, and from Mr. Carleton, the agent at the telegraph office, I received the same courtesies and goodwill that I experienced from so many Americans. But for the assistance that each afforded me in his particular line, I might have been detained many days.

The fare on the overland route is exorbitant. Approximately in English money it is as follows :-From San Francisco to Salt Lake City, twenty-five pounds; from Salt Lake City to Atchison, seventy pounds; from Atchison to New York, by rail, ten pounds: total of fares from ocean to ocean, one hundred and five pounds. The time in which the journey should be performed, if everything were in good working order, is about twenty days. During this time the traveller, of course, has to feed himself. Three meals a day, averaging at least a dollar a meal, amount to twelve pounds. He must also provide himself with suitable clothing, arms, blankets, and a small basket of provisions. So that on the whole the journey cannot be accomplished for much less than one hundred and thirty pounds. This is at least double what it ought to be. The voyage by Panama occupies about twentyeight days, and the expense is about thirty pounds; so great press of business alone, or a desire to see the country, would induce any one to take the overland route, and few would wish to try it a second time.

On the morning of the 23rd of July, I bade farewell to the Great Salt Lake City; and while following the course of a stream flowing down from the Wahsatch Mountains, I looked back rather regretfully at the peaceful valley I should probably never revisit. Accounts of the eastern road were gloomy: rumours of Indian troubles, of drivers and travellers murdered, and stage-horses driven off, were not wanting. Our mud-waggon was a poor make-shift, and our horses were but sorry beasts. As the stage professed to start at 4 A.M., I rose at three, and came downstairs at the half-hour, to "fix a bite" before starting. At that moment the waggon drove up, and the driver declared it was four o'clock, and he could not wait a moment. I bundled in my chattels, and we drove off. Presently we stopped at a house in the suburbs, to pick up another passenger. The driver, with many execrations, surlily declared he was behind time, and could not wait a moment. This passenger, who had not finished his breakfast, understood the language which had been lost on me, and produced a bottle and glass, which the driver enjoyed, while the passenger concluded his meal at his leisure. Presently, he got up on the box-seat, which had been refused me, and we went on our way. I have no doubt that a box of cigars and a keg of whisky judiciously applied, would have smoothed at least some of the unpleasantness of stage-travel.

After ascending mountains the whole forenoon, we came to a plateau of comparatively good land, watered by the Weber and Bear Rivers. These are separated from each other by a rocky ridge, which we passed through by a gorge called Echo Cañon. The forms assumed here by the soft red sandstone were more grotesque and striking than on any other part of the road. In some places we saw solid buttresses projecting far from the side of the rock, or standing out like towers, unconnected with the cliff, and in other places were caverns and archways, with the face of the rock seamed in all directions.

The portion of the overland route which lies between the western and eastern limits of civilisation, might be in general terms divided into three parts, each averaging about six hundred miles. These divisions would be—from Virginia to Salt Lake City; from Salt Lake City to Denver; from Denver to Atchison, on the Missouri River. Lest any hypercritical reader should cavil at the term "limit of civilisation," let me once for all declare that civilisation terminates at that point where bootblacking at the hotels is made an extra charge. In this second division of the journey we used mules more than horses, and found them on the whole quite as serviceable.

During the first two days we passed upwards of a hundred west-going waggons. It must be a hard road for emigrants; but men, women, and children all appeared the very picture of health. The cattle were usually poor, and in some places the road was literally lined with the boncs of beasts who had died from cold, starvation, drought, or overwork. The long trains of waggens we met on the road from time to time, were sources of frequent pleasure. Sometimes we were detained for a short time in the neighbourhood of an encampment, where the waggons were "coralled," the camp-fires lighted, the cooking-stoves at work, the jaded cattle in the distance trying to pick up a meal, and little heaps of children rolling over each other in the dust. In these cases we always found the emigrants cheerful, in good spirits, and anxious to be sociable. When their party happened to include an aged or sick person, their thoughtfulness and care for his comfort is often chosen as a camping-ground, because the corall of waggons is placed on the narrow neck, while the cattle graze on the broad enclosed land, and are easily caught when wanted. These emigrant trains have on several occasions been attacked by Indians, both when coralled and while on the road, but in no case with success.

It is estimated that about five thousand waggons, with an average of four souls each, cross these plains every year. This annual emigration of twenty thousand persons, is a constant drain that no country but America could sustain without feeling it a serious loss. It is, besides, an evidence of the boundless resources of the United States, which are ever developing more and more, to an extent of which few people in the Old World have any idea. Salt Lake City is the point where the paper and the gold currencies meet: there, paper is universally used. At the same counter the man travelling west pays his fare in gold, and the man travelling east, in paper.

It was impossible to resist the conclusion, that even the high plateau on which we were travelling had at some time been under water. The ground was in many places covered with alkali and salt, and the everlasting sage-brush. Here and there were hills of sandstone rocks, deeply scored with horizontal water-lines, appearing like islands in an unruffled sea. A few streams flow in a northerly direction, along green ravines that appear to have been washed out when the waters were swellen. They abound with bushes and shrubs, which relieve the dreary monotony, but the extreme cold in winter makes it impossible to cultivate the neighbouring land.

For the first three days I was the only passenger, and having the interior of the waggon to myself, succeeded by crafty disposal of my blankets and kit in making myself tolerably comfortable. Sometimes on arrival at a station we found no mules. and had to rest and feed our team and take them on another stage. On each side of the road were here and there burrows of ground squirrels and prairie dogs. The latter is a comical animal, not the least like a dog: he is a sort of ground rat, or rather like a grey guinea-pig. When the coach is heard he comes up to see it go by, and squats himself on the brink of his hole, where he gives vent to a peculiar squeak, which people have thought fit to designate a bark. These prairie dogs congregate in villages, and make a great noise as each sits at his front door; but the least offensive movement on the part of the passer-by, the lifting of a stick or the presenting of a gun, sends them all out of sight in an instant. A sort of large grouse is also seen, ealled by some the sage hen, and by others the prairie chicken; it differs from the grouse in the legs not being feathered.

these cases we always found the emigrants cheerful, in good spirits, and anxious to be sociable. When their party happened to include an aged or sick person, their thoughtfulness and care for his comfort the way and stuck in the mud. The driver had an was quite touching. A horse-shoe bend of a river assistant with him who held the reins and beat the mules with a rope, while the the former jumped into the water, broke his whip over them, dragged them from one side to the other, and lavished upon them all the most endearing epithets from the slang dictionary of a Western rowdy. Strange to say, even this had no effect; all four mules quietly lay down, with their heads just above the stream, and broke the pole. There was no help for it but to unhitch the team, which the two drivers drove to the bank, leaving me in the waggon with the water up to the floor. I cried to them to carry me on shore, which after a little hesitation one of them did. We walked to the nearest station about half a mile off, where we slept.

In the morning I was the first up, so I lighted the fire, and began preparing breakfast. Soon the drivers joined me, and one of them addressed me thus: "I guess, Mister, you've travelled round a bit." I replied that I had "travelled some," and inquired what made him think so. He said, "Wall, now! when we was stuck in the crick last night you sat still and says nothin; now if you'd a begun cussin at us, as some does, there you might have stayed, or got yourself wet walking out." After this we became bosom friends of course, and he berrowed my knife, which he quite forgot to return until he had been asked for it three times. He asked me many minute details about my personal and family history, and expressed great admiration for the cat-o'-nine-tails, which he said was just the "instituotion" the American army wanted. We rersuaded some emigrants to lend us a team of eight oxen which dragged the coach out at once, after which we spliced the pole and pursued our journey.

The electric telegraph follows the stage road beyond Fort Bridger, to a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles from Salt Lake City; then it keeps along a more northern road, which was formerly the stage road, but, owing to the frequent Indian troubles, was abandoned.

On the morning of the 26th I overtook Mr. Reynolds, the superintendent of the line, and travelled with him as far as Denver City. It was to me a matter of no small satisfaction that he consented to allow me to go with him, and a favour of which I am very sensible. I was fortified with letters from Colonel George to the officers commanding the troops along the road, and these, together with Mr. Reynolds' office, which he made the most of, secured us attentions by the way, large escorts, and occasionally government mules. At first our escort numbered only four men, but as we penetrated to the more dangerous country, it was increased to twelve. We were ourselves well armed with rifles and revolvers. The escort was changed every ten or fifteen miles, when we came to small detachments posted at those intervals. Generally I found one of the escort very glad to travel in the waggon, and to allow me to ride his horse—a benefit to both parties. The air in this two days I rode sixty or seventy miles without being the least knocked up.

The stage has been molested by Indians on more than one occasion. It was attacked a fortnight before I passed by about seventy. There were seven or eight passengers, who, with the escort, made up twenty persons, and after an hour's skirmishing they completely discomfited the savages, with only the loss of one horse killed and two wounded. The Indians are very chary of their lives; they usually gallop round and round the waggon, their bodies being bent down and sheltered behind their horses, to which they are always attached by stout leather thongs, so that if wounded they are carried off and do not fall into the enemy's hands. Their weapons are bows and arrows, and rifles, with which they are expert, but they prefer fighting at long range. It is said that there are white men among them who teach them to fight, and encourage them in their present rebellion. They have good telescopes, and signal by directing the rays of the sun from looking-glasses, reflecting from one to the other.

Riding for some miles every day, I had opportunities of conversing with the soldiers composing our escort. They were generally from a volunteer regiment, and in every instance included two or three men of good education: probably all were able to read and write, and held decided views on public questions, which they discussed with intelligence. The troops at Salt Lake City were volunteers, but well disciplined and cared for. The dress of our escort was at times little more than parti-coloured rags. At some places on the road between Denver and Atchison, they did not start until half-an-hour after the stage had gone on ; in one instance they were all drunk; on another occasion they were too lazy to bring their carbines. and would fire off their revolvers at marks on the road, leaving themselves quite defenceless.

In conversation with the soldiers, I was surprised to find how readily they admitted the many advantages of a monarchical form of government, and the incorrectness, to say the least of it, of the passage in the beginning of their Declaration of Independence, which says that all men are born free and equal, and entitled to the blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They confessed that it was all "bunkum" in a marching regiment in wartime. All whom I saw were armed with breechloading rifles, but different kinds were in use in different corps. Among both officers and men it seemed to be quite the general opinion, that on the whole the Joslyn rifle was the best, and ultimately would be adopted throughout the army.

One night we were awakened by a loud report close to our ears. We started up and seized our arms, but were quieted and soothed by the assurance that it was only a double-barrelled blunderbuss loaded with slugs which had gone off by accident, and blown out the side of the coach.

horse—a benefit to both parties. The air in this / One-day, as L rode on the right side of the serhigh country is very exhilarating, and on one or juant in command of the escort, his revolver went off; the bullet pierced through the saddle, wounded his horse, and passed down close to my foot. For the remainder of that stage I rode on his left side.

On the 27th we rode through the pass in the Rocky Mountains called Bridger Pass. This is the watershed of North America. Here we saw two tiny streams, within a few yards of each other: the one joins the Colorado, and flows into the Pacific; the other joins the Platte River and Mississippi, and flows into the Atlantic. This, then, was the summit of the Rocky Mountains in that latitude, yet we were only among hills, and no mountains were near. Nevertheless, the patches of snow a few yards up the hill-side,-still remaining through hot days when we were glad to wear broadbrimmed hats and linen coats,-showed that we must be at a considerable altitude. Near this spot we came upon a covey of sage-hens; the whole detachment opened fire on them with rifles and revolvers, but they walked majestically away through the sage-brush unhurt.

The following day we reached Fort Halleck, where we heard reports of Indians being in the neighbourhood, so our escort was increased. After leaving this place, the barren aspect of the country somewhat changed; the hill-sides were lightly timbered and picturesque, and the sage-brush was replaced by coarse prairie grass. There were many streams, so that the land appeared as if it might have been brought under cultivation by irrigation. More or less gold is found in all these hills, which it will be profitable to mine when transport and provisions are cheaper. The reddish soil abounding in quartz is just like the gold-bearing earth of some parts of California. Coal is also found in the neighbourhood, and so near the surface that it is dug up and used as wanted at Fort Halleck.

On the 30th we arrived at a romantic little station among some rocky hills, called Virginia Dale; after which we entered the prairie country. These stations consist in most instances of only the stagehouse and stables, and at the best there are but one or two houses besides. In themselves of no interest, they are nevertheless the only landmarks across a great continent, and may some day give their names to cities or districts. The houses are invariably loopholed between the logs; no man stirs out without at least a revolver, and everywhere one sees signs of being in a hostile land.

On the afternoon of the 31st, we reached Denver, a young and thriving town, with many brick buildings. It is built at a ford over the south fork of the Platte river. Last year the water rose suddeuly, carrying off some houses on its banks, and since then all new houses have been built on higher ground. Denver is a centre of what is called the Pike's Peak mining district; the stage-road makes a deep bend to the southward to pass through it, and a line of telegraph wire follows the South Platte as far as Fort Kearney, where it takes a northerly direction and joins the main overland wire from Salt Lake City.

This formed a period in the long journey. Here was a fair inn, a daily newspaper, telegraphic communication, and iced drinks; but I was only two-thirds of the way across the uncivilised country, and was anxious to press on. Early in the year there were Indian troubles between this and Atchison: the savages came in large bodies and drove off the stage-cattle, killed and horridly mutilated the station keepers, and carried off the women. Lately, however, they have been comparatively peaceful. A Concord coach arrives and departs daily, and a small escort of only three or four men accompanies it.

On the morning of the 1st of August I left Atchison. Mr. Reynolds at parting gave me letters to his subordinates at the different stations, which proved valuable credentials. Our journey was chiefly through rolling prairies, with but little variety—all sure to be brought under cultivation sooner or later. We saw several antelopes, and got a shot or two at them, but without damage to either party.

At Denver, we heard by telegraph that a body of fifteen hundred Sioux Indians had attacked some troops at Platte Bridge, near Fort Laramie, about seventy miles from the stage-road, and defeated them with a loss of one officer and twenty-six privates killed, and sixteen wounded. Along the road we found the telegraph operators and station-keepers in some alarm, fearing another Indian raid. On the second day we reached Julesburg. Four days previously two waggons travelling near this place were attacked by a party of Sioux, the occupants were killed and shockingly mutilated, the waggons burned, and their contents carried off, with the team of horses.

On the 4th we passed Fort Kearney, where is a small village. In the afternoon we stopped to dinner at a home-station, where we picked up another passenger, who travelled in the coach for a few miles. He studiously strove to pick a quarrel with me, which I as carefully avoided. At last he abused me outright, saying I was not the sort of man for that country; that he knew quite well who I was; that there were too many of my sort in the country already; that he saw through my little game perfectly, &c. I saw he had been drinking, so I laughed, and took no notice of him; and after he had got down I inquired of a fellow-passenger what I had done to provoke his wrath. He told me that I had mortally offended him by asking for a second plate off which to eat my tart, instead of using the same one I had for my meat, and that he believed me to be a New York travelling-clerk to a dry goods shop and "putting on style" in the far west.

On this overland journey I saw the roughest men I ever saw in my life. I have been among gold miners and coal miners, and I have seen the lowest specimens of 'long-shore bargees, but I never net such utterly degraded and repulsive men as soine of the stock-keepers on this road. Two or three generally live together; they are unmarried, and rarely see a woman. They never get hold of a book or a newspaper, unless it be one dropped by a passing traveller—whose baggage is not likely to contain much literature—and, as might be expected, they become thoroughly degraded and brutalised. I have always been able to make some headway with every class of people until I came across these men, and I must confess that with the exception of the driver, who brought us to grief in the river, I hardly met with a decent or civil word from any one of them.

In the evening we saw a body of about twenty horsemen a couple of miles distant, making for the road behind us. The driver walked his horses, in order that if they were Indians they might not think we were afraid of them, while we felt rather uncomfortable and got our arms ready. Presently, however, we opened out a hollow where was a military camp, so we concluded that the horsemen were either a cavalry picket or an Indian picket watching the soldiers. An hour or two later we saw a body of thirty or forty Indians travelling northwards. They passed close to an emigrant train that we met, without attempting to molest them, probably deterred by the proximity of the soldiers.

After Fort Kearney we left the Platte, and followed the course, first of the Little Blue and then of the Big Blue Rivers. Our progress now was slow, as late rains had made the roads heavy, and swollen the streams so that some were impassable. The damp cherished the mosquitoes, which came about us in clouds, adding much to our discomfort. At night the bushes swarmed with fireflies, or, as Americans elegantly describe them, "lightning-bugs."

On the morning of the 6th we reached the banks of the Big Blue, and found upwards of twenty feet of water dashing down over the ford. A stout rope was stretched over it, and we went across one at a time, on a raft made of three shapeless logs nailed together, which our weight completely submerged. The swift current rushed by up to our knees, and of course some of our baggage got wet, but all crossed without accident. Another coach was waiting for us, on the top of which we spread our wet things, and they dried quickly in the sun. On the following evening we drove into Atchison, and found ourselves once more in civilised parts.

From the Missouri river, New York may be reached by two or three railroads. I left Atchison the same evening and travelled by Quincy, Chicago, Detroit, and Buffalo. Hurrying at railroad speed over one thousand miles of country, and journeying with but few hours' interval for four days and nights, I was of course unable to form much idea of the several States through which we passed; and the comparative smoothness and rest of railway travelling produced a feeling of continued drowsiness, to which I was only too glad to give way. Thankful indeed was I when, on the afternoon of the 11th of August, I found myself safely housed in the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York.

EDMUND HOPE VERNEY.

THE ISLAND CHURCH.

BY THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF EMLY.

[The subject of these lines is borrowed from Runeberg, the poet of Finland. Of Runeberg's poem I have only seen a literal translation in French prose by M. Geffroy. I have freely used the incidents supplied by the Swedish poet, but there are not more than two or three verses in which I have attempted to preserve the expressions which I found in the French translation.]

Poor was the peasant, poor and heavy-hearted; Gone were his fields, his children, and his wife, The kindly friends of other days departed, The fine lights faded from the hills of life.

Glad threads of speech, if rough, the labourers mingle By their own fires, where their own smokewreaths curl;

But Onni sat beside the stranger's ingle,
And steep'd in tears the scant bread of a churl.

The young have hope: but on his head was shaken
The snow that summer-sun shall never thaw;
Yet bless'd are they whom Heav'n hath undertaken
To chasten and to teach from out God's law.

O bread of God! O fields for ever sunny!
O fadeless flowers upon life's craggiest shelves!

O better substance, more enduring money,

By grace laid up within our hearts themselves!

VII—28

Midsummer-day! All night the child hath folden Himself in expectation, heart and head, Like a bee in some rich bell dusty-golden, With long sleep pleasantly disquieted.

Midsummer-day! All night the rivers going By heath and holm triumphantly have slid, All night a soft and silver overflowing From joy expected bathed the sleeper's lid.

Midsummer-day! At morn the maiden merry
Dons her green kirtle: in the hawthorn lane
The farmer's boy beneath the rows of cherry Brings hampers full of flowers in the wain.

Midsummer-day! The sad and wrinkled peasant Smiles as he stands erect upon the sod: "In holy church to-day it will be pleasant To taste the liberty of the sons of God." Midsummer-day! They smother up the altar
With coronals, the richest of the year,
The village choirs have practised well the psalter,
The grand old hymns to Finland ever dear.

The feast of flowers! The old priest has conn'd over A bran new homily—joyful, yet perplex'd—Redolent of garden bloom and meadow-clover; "Behold the lilies!" is the good man's text.

The feast of flowers! Sky, ocean, earth, seem turning
All things to flowers. Midsummer winds expire
In perfumed music through the roses, burning
Like wreaths of red flame on the gilded wire.

Flowers in the churches! Every birchen column Blushes like dawn, or gleams as when it snows; Their sweet breath in the holy air is solemn, Like warbled music when it comes and goes.

Flowers on the window-sill, and in the chamber,
Flowers round the great stem of the village tree,
And far away of infinite blue and amber
The rose of heaven, the violet of the sea.

Speaks out the peasant Onni: "O my master!
But for a little while let me away.
Hark, through the woodland walks is rising faster
The voice of them that keep their holiday.

"All winter long, when the wild wind was grieving,
Thou know'st I drudged for thee in wet and cold;
All spring, when God's great sunshine was inweaving

Through forest-leaves his thousand nets of gold,

"I work'd thy flax; and still the bounding river Swept with his silver trumpets through the glade, But my poor ear was sicken'd with the shiver That the monotonous shuttle always made.

"Worse, worse than that; for we our gathering festal

Once in the twelvemonth only have down here, But saints and angels, on the sea of crystal, Their feast of flowers keep round th' eternal year.

"And much I dread, lest, when my dear Lord call me,

The chants of Heaven sound strange within my heart,

The low base influence of the earth enthral me,
Till I forget how I may bear my part.

"Yea, worse than all, six months how long and dreary,

This starving soul of mine is unsufficed With that sweet invitation to the weary, The music of the promises of Christ.

"O master!—let me call thee, O, my brother!—
I pray thee by all prayers thy heart may search,
I pray thee by the days when with thy mother
Thou kept'st the feast, O, let me go to church!"

But the churl pointed to the stream, where sombre A great white mist was creeping from the hill, Dulling the splendid laughters without number That twinkled on the water by the mill,

And said with thick voice, eloquent of the flagon, "There lies thy way to church, thou preaching Go in that boat alone, I have no waggon— [loon! Perhaps thy prayers to church will bring thee soon."

And Onni heard speechless, and taking only The oar, full heavy for that wrinkled hand, A weak adventurer in his vessel lonely, Pray'd inly, "God of ocean and of land!

"Sweetly and strongly at Thy will far-bringing All fins in waves, all plumes upon the breeze, Beautiful birds to western forest winging, And whatso passeth through the paths of seas,

"Me, of more value, with my soul immortal, Mine infinite futurity, than they, Me, a wing'd voyager to Thy starry portal, Lead, loving Father! to Thy church to-day."

Wearily, wearily, drags the oar, and slowly,
Like a man blinded by the snow athwart
His smarting eyelids, trails the boat, and wholly Lost in the fog, the rower loses heart.

And ding dong, ding dong, ding dong, in the distance,
The church bells sounded over holt and hill.
He dropp'd his oars, and, weary of resistance,
Let the strong river bear him at its will,

Until at last the bark's keel sharply grated
Upon the white sand of a little isle;
Then ding dong, ding dong, to the man belated,
The bells first clash'd, then ceased a little while.

White clung the colourless mist on the island forest,
Unbeautifying its green depths and fells;
Sad were his thoughts, but just when grief was
A silver music changed upon the bells. [sorest,

Then the mist thinn'd; the lustrous sky, from off it Sweeping one cloud, left interspace of blue, One isle of summer-light, one voiceless prophet Of sunny touches that make all things new;

And kenn'd beyond the furthest intervening Of dark green hall, and sombre colonnade, The northern river far away was sheening Like the dark blue of some Damascan blade.

"Ah, in the church are psalms divinely tender"—
Yet here is music too, not earthly born,
Dropp'd downward by the sky-larks as they render
Some air heard up beside the gates of morn.

And in the woodland depths, with restless shiver,
From branch to branch the countless wild birds
So the swift bow of a musician ever [sing;
Flits with the melody from string to string.

- "Ah, in the church the flowers are surely glorious, And the old pillars look full bright and brave; And the great organ, trembling yet victorious, Keeps quivering on like light upon the wave.
- "And better still, the good Priest of Christ's merits Speaks to believing hearts, right glad yet awed, And launches sinful yet forgiven spirits On that great deep, the promises of God;—
- "Whilst I, far off from church, like one in blindness Groping, lose sacrament and pastoral tone. The Lord commandeth not His loving-kindness, I am cast out from His pavilion."

Yet here are flowers, and light, and voices mystic— Were never such, since when, as Scripture tells, The High Priest in the Holicst moved majestic With gems oraculous and with golden bells.

And here are pillared pines, like columns soaring,
With branches tall that like triforiums are,
And a soft liturgy of winds adoring,
With echoes from some temple-gate ajar.

And that no consecration may be wanted,
One gently passes through the haunted place,—
Not like Him on the crucifixes painted,
With white, cold, aged, agonising face—

Not crown'd with thorns, and ever bleeding, bleeding, Stains on that rigid form more dark than wine—
Not dead but living, beautiful exceeding, Divinely Human, Humanly Divine.

And Onni prays the prayer that knows no measure
By bead, or clock, or count of regular chime—
The prayer which is the fulness of all pleasure,
In words unutter'd, and transcending time.

His worship ended, Nature sang no longer, But grown contemplative was silent too; And now made gladder, calmer, holier, stronger, He raised his voice, and bade his soft adieu.

- "O, fellow-worshippers with me and Nature, Who sang God's praises with my soul forlorn, Wild flower, and forest tree, and winged creature, And all the sunny sanctities of morn,
- "River, whom God hath taught to be my pilot, Needles of light that dart through larch and birch, Ripples that were the music of mine islet, And pines that were the pillars of my church—
- "Peace, and Farewell." Then happier and faster
 He glided homeward down the watery way,
 And with a gentle smile, said, "Thank you, Master.
 "I was at church, I kept my feast to-day."

SOME EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE ON THE BRAIN.

BY A MEDICAL MAN.

THE ordinary evil effects of intemperance are so well known and generally admitted that it would be waste of time to treat of them here. In this paper I shall therefore confine myself to pointing out, in a psychological point of view, how terrible occasionally are its results on the mind.

Dipsomania, or drinking madness, is about the most distressing phase of insanity that can afflict humanity. The sufferer is not only aware of the approach of the attack, but has sufficient reason to wish to avoid it. He is conscious that he is about to commit actions of the most degrading and ruffianly description, and that during the terrible paroxysm he will be deprived of all self-control. He knows perfectly well that by abstaining from drink he can avoid the catastrophe with which he is threatened, and yet he is utterly incapable of resisting the temptation, even while he has sufficient good sense to abhor it.

In some respects the disease is more marked in women than in men; and, disgusting as is the habit of excessive drinking, they are occasionally much to be pitied when it arrives at that degree of intensity which precludes the possibility of their breaking off the habit. Few women who have ever been accustomed to a respectable position in society acquire the habit of drinking from a love of the vice itself. The principal cause which induces them to contract it is sorrow. Another cause, though in a far less degree, originates in the habit of certain medical men frequently administering alcohol as medicine. My opinion on the former point received a full corroboration from a remark made to me by the late Mr. Gilbert Abbott A'Becket, magistrate at the Southwark Police Court :- "For some time after I was appointed to that court," he said, "nothing puzzled me more than the language made use of by irreclaimable female drunkards when in a state of sobriety. When under the effects of intoxication, language of the foulest description seemed perfectly natural to them; but as soon as the effect of the spirits had gone off, and they were penitent, their grammar was good, their language admirably chosen, and their general tone of thinking appeared to be irreproachable. After frequent inquiries, however, I found that most of those women had formerly occupied a decent position in society; but sorrow, occasioned possibly by their own improper behaviour, had induced them to apply to drink for consolation, and the effects were that the natural habits of the woman when in a state of intoxication became completely reversed, and the language and behaviour, which were then habitual to her, were utterly repugnant to ner feelings when sober."

As proofs of the difficulty a reclaimed drunkard has in avoiding the temptation of drink, even when feeling the strongest desire to do so, the two following cases may be considered as in point:—

A gentleman connected with the City Mission, about two years since gave a lecture on temperance at the Portland Hall, in the Edgeware Road. When he had finished his lecture and was about to leave the room, he noticed one of his audience—a tall, powerful, soldier-looking man, between forty and fifty years of age—eying him attentively. Mr. S., the missionary, immediately stopped, thinking the man perhaps wished to speak with him. For some moments the man appeared to hesitate; but at last, when no one was near them, he advanced to the lecturer and said, "I hope, sir, you will not be offended at the liberty I am about to take, but I want you to do me a very great favour. I am an army pensioner, and married to as good a wife as ever man had; but some years ago, when my regiment was in India, I foolishly took to drinking, and I also suffered from the sun-stroke. I was very ill in consequence, and was confined to the hospital for some time. When I arrived in England I determined to become a sober man, and took the pledge. For some time I kept it very well, flattering myself that I had completely broken through the habit of drinking. The first day, however, I had to receive my pension, I found I had made a mistake, for I met some old comrades, who invited me to a publichouse, and, not liking to refuse, I went with them, and the result was that I came home to my children far more like a madman than a drunkard. Well, I determined this should never occur again, and that nothing for the future should induce me to enter a public-house. I faithfully kept my word till my next pension was due, and then, as I left my house in the morning to fetch it, my wife said to me, 'Take care, John dear, and do not be tempted to enter a public-house. You are as good a husband as ever lived, when you are sober; but since your illness, you know your brain cannot stand drink.' I promised her I would not, and was returning home with my money safe enough in my pocket, having taken care to avoid meeting with any of my old comrades, when I found that to pass a public-house with my pension was impossible. I gave way to the temptation and entered one, resolving at the same time that I would only take one glass; but that one glass brought the desire for another; and the result was, that I became mad drunk, and every shilling of the pension I had received I either spent or was robbed of before I returned home. it end there. My wife received me without any anger or provocative remark, but simply asked me to go to bed, saying, I should be better the next day. Somehow I took this as an affront, and it ended by my brutally assaulting her. The next day, of course, I begged my wife's pardon, and although she had suffered greatly, she readily forgave me. From that time until my next pension was due I was never once intoxicated, although I frequently had money about me; and, singularly enough, it is only when I have my pension money in my pocket that this temptation comes over me. Now, it will be due to-morrow, and if you will go with me to receive it I will place it in your hands the moment it is paid, and we will return home together, and you shall give it to my wife. If you do not, I know it will end as before; for when the fit comes on I cannot help it."

Mr. S--- met him the next day, as he requested, and as soon as the pensioner had received the money he placed it in his hands, and they returned together to the man's lodgings. The poor woman expressed herself most grateful to Mr. S--- for the trouble he had taken, and spoke of her husband in the highest terms, stating that he was as good a man as ever lived when sober, and that the temptation to drink never came over him unless he had his pension money in his pocket. The next time the money was due, Mr. S- again met him, and the. whole passed off in the same satisfactory manner. On the third occasion, however, Mr. S--- was unfortunately absent from London, and the pensioner went alone for his money, and returned home in the evening brutally intoxicated, and raving like a madman. His wife, seeing the condition he was in, attempted to persuade him to go to bed and sleep it off. This irritated him to such an extent that, taking the kettle of boiling water from the fire, he threw it at his wife, who held in her arms a fine little boy of about eighteen months old, to whom the unhappy man was himself tenderly attached. Both mother and child were frightfully scalded, and had to be taken to the hospital, and the drunkard was placed in the hands of the police. The poor woman and her child remained for some time hanging between life and death; at last both fortunately recovered, but the infant was disfigured for life. The husband was committed for trial, found guilty, and sentenced to twelve months imprisonment with hard labour. He did not, however, work out the whole time of his punishment, for sorrow and remorse for his conduct, and the treatment his darling child had received at his own hands, added to the effect that solitary confinement frequently exercises on the mind, brought on lunaey, and the poor fellow is now an inmate of a convict lunatic asylum.

The other case I shall mention is that of a woman, and is singular in proving how strong occasionally the spirit of integrity may be in the poor creature who has fallen a victim to the vice of drinking.

A lady of my acquaintance was in want of a nurse for her children, and on looking down the list of advertisements in the 'Times' newspaper, her eye was arrested by one which seemed to point to a person of a most eligible description. It was that of a woman, forty years of age, with five years' excellent character from her last place. The advertisement was answered, and the applicant made her appearance. She was a stout, handsome woman, very respectably dressed, and with a remarkably good-natured expression of countenance. The lady with whom she had last lived, unfortunately resided at Abergavenny, but the woman said she had no doubt all questions put to her would be answered. The address was taken, and the letter written for the woman's character. The answer was of the most satisfactory description; indeed one or two expressions in it were of so laudatory a description, that suspicion might naturally have been aroused as to their being genuine. The lady, however, was satisfied; but not so her husband, and although the woman was engaged, he determined to make inquiries on the subject. A friend, who was going into Wales, promised he would do so for him. The character, as the husband had expected, turned out to be a false one, and the person who had given it, although of most honest and sober reputation, was the wife of a journeyman carpenter. There was every reason to suspect she was the nurse's sister. With this letter in his hand the husband confronted the woman.

"Well, sir," she said, "I acknowledge that the character was not a genuine one; still I lived for five years in the family of Sir ———, and if you like to make inquiries there, you will find that what I shall now tell you is correct. I left the family to be married to the coachman, who treated me so badly, that one day, to console myself, I drank till I became intoxicated, and both my husband and myself were immediately dismissed."

The gentleman wrote to Sir — —, who, in reply, informed him that the woman's statement was substantially correct, but that both she and her husband (from whom she was now separated) had been seen several times intoxicated. It was true that she had been five years in his service, and he had since heard that she had been reclaimed, and was now a very sober woman.

All this was satisfactory, so far as it went, and the woman was allowed to remain, and a better servant never entered a house. At last, when her first quarter's wages were due, she requested to be allowed a day's holiday, stating that she wished to redeem some of her things, which were in pawn. Permission was, of course, given her, and she left about eleven o'clock in the day, with the strict injunction to return before ten in the evening. But ten o'clock came, eleven, and then midnight, and still the woman did not make her appearance, and after waiting up for some time longer, the family went to bed, giving up all thought of her return. About noon the next day she came back, stupidly drunk, and her clothes covered with mud. As it was impossible to reason with her in that state, she was allowed to stagger up stairs to bed, her mistress determining she should leave the house as soon as she was sufficiently recovered. In the evening the poor woman descended to her mistress in a most penitent mood, and implored to be forgiven. She said she remembered taking her things out of pawn, and feeling fatigued she had gone into a publichouse; but from that moment she remembered nothing, and what had become of her clothes she knew not. She promised faithfully that when her wages again became due, she would leave them with her mistress to invest for her in the savings-bank, adding, "As long as I have no money of my own, ma'am, I feel no temptation to go into a publichouse; but if I have, I cannot resist entering one."

The woman was forgiven; and another three months passed over without a single fault being found with her. As she had promised, she left her wages in the hands of her mistress, who invested them for her in the savings-bank. Three more months passed in an equally satisfactory manner, and the morning her wages were due she told her mistress she should like to have one sovereign of the money to purchase a pair of boots. "Take care what you are about," said the lady. "Remember what you said, that if you had money in your pocket, you could not keep out of the publichouse."

"Very true, ma'am," was the reply, "but I wanted to ask if you will allow the housemaid to go with me, for then I should be in no danger."

Her mistress applauded her prudent resolution, and the housemaid and nurse left the house together. It was eleven o'clock at night before they returned home. Both were—drunk! Indignant at such behaviour, her mistress resolved that she should leave the house the next day, and that she would take no excuse. She had no difficulty on this occasion, for the next morning the nurse came to her, perfectly penitent, and addressed her in these words: "I am not a-going to ask you to forgive me this time; as a lady you could not do it. No person has tried to break themselves off drinking harder than I have, but it is stronger than I am. There is nothing in the world but the workhouse before me, and I may as well go to it at first as at last."

Notwithstanding the terrible influence the drinking mania had over this poor woman, it was inoperative on her natural integrity. During the whole time she had been in her situation she had not only abstained from using her employer's money to purchase spirits, but never on a single occasion had she been known to taste the wine belonging to the family, which was frequently under her care.

As a proof how strong this temptation may be, even in a strong-minded man, the case of Mr. may be mentioned. He was a member of one of the first families in Scotland, and a young man of independent fortune. He had secretly acquired the vice of drinking, and it had taken firm hold upon his constitution before his family succeeded in detecting it. He was naturally of a very gentlemanly and amiable disposition; but when intoxicated he was more like a madman than a sane person, his language and behaviour on these occasions being of the most disgraceful description. With a view of curing him of this habit, his friends placed him under the care of a physician residing at South Kensington. He had great personal liberty given him, but, at the same time, was watched to sec that he did not enter a public-house, for it was in those establishments that he generally misconducted himself. To make security doubly sure, he was never allowed to have money with him when he left home. For some time his behaviour was perfectly irreproachable, so much so that at last the physician said to him.

"Mr. —, it is a most painful thing to me not to allow you to have any money in your pocket when you leave home. If you will pledge me your honour as a gentleman that you will not enter a public-house, you may have any sum you wish."

"I give you my word of honour, doctor," replied Mr. —, "that I will not enter a public-house, and I should feel obliged to you if you will allow me to have ten pounds."

The money was given to him. About mid-day he quitted the house, and it was expected he would return home to the family dinner at seven o'clock. He did not make his appearance, however, and as he was generally very punctual, his absence caused the doctor considerable uneasiness, and after waitiug nearly an hour, the family dined without him. During the whole evening the worthy doctor remained in a state of great anxiety, wondering what had become of his patient. It was past midnight before he made his appearance, and then with such a changed countenance that it perfectly terrified the doctor. Mr. S. had left in the morning in high spirits and perfect good humour: when he returned he was pallid as a ghost, with intense and painful anxiety expressed on his features. Before the doctor could ask what had caused his absence, Mr. S. thrust his hand into his pocket, and taking from it the ten sovereigns which had been given to him in the morning, he threw them on the table,

"Take back your money, doctor; I will have nothing more to do with it, for I never passed such a dreadful day in my life. From the time I left home to the present moment, the temptation to enter a public-house was so strong on me that several times I stood outside the door of one for half-au-hour together, trying to summon up power to leave it. Fortunately, I succeeded; but I will never be placed under the same temptation again, unless you will withdraw from me all restriction. I will not, I assure you, enter a public-house if I can restrain myself, but to submit to a day of the same torture again, I will not."

Shortly after, the poor fellow became a confirmed lunatic, and had to be placed under confinement.

The most terrible cases of the eccentric action of the brain caused by the excessive use of alcohol are, perhaps, those where strong-miuded men have determined to cure themselves of the vice. The tenacious manner in which the temptation frequently clings to them, and the fearful struggles the victims make to relieve themselves from its thraldom, have something in them savonring of the romantic. Indeed they are occasionally such as would have formed a strong foundation for those monkish traditions of the Middle Ages, in which men are represented as having sold themselves to the fiend in return for some temporary happiness or success, and then tiring of their bargain and vainly attempting to withdraw from the contract. The most remarkable instance in this respect is the phantom that opposes the wish of the victim to return to sobriety, and actually forces him, against all his efforts and will, to continue the habit of drinking, until it ends in his death. I will give two or three of these cases, out of many which have been at different times brought under my notice.

Mr. G-, a young Englishman of large fortune and vast expectations, resided, about twenty years since, in the city of Milan. He was a kindhearted, amiable, and liberal young fellow, but, unfortunately, an incurable drunkard. He became enamoured of a young Italian lady, of a good but poor family, and he made an offer for her hand. Considerable opposition was shown by her family to the match, solely on account of the intemperate habits of her suitor, and his violent conduct when under the influence of drink; but the young lady herself was so fully persuaded of the sufficiency of her power over him to cure him of the folly, and perhaps dazzled at the prospect of a brilliant match, that at last all opposition was withdrawn and consent was given to the marriage. Among the guests invited was a certain English physician, who was attached to the suite of a nobleman then travelling in Italy. He refused the invitation, candidly admitting as his reason that he considered the poor girl was about to be consigned to a life of misery, in consequence of the intemperate habits of her future husband. After the wedding was over, and his opposition could be of no avail, he became a frequent visitor at the house and a great favourite with both husband and wife. For some time Mr. G-conducted himself with great propriety, and his friend, the doctor, on leaving Milan for two months, congratulated him on the improvement of his conduct. On the return of the physician to Milan, he called on Mr. G-, who received him with a most sorrowful, downcast countenance. The doctor inquired the cause of his melancholy, and Mr. G-frankly admitted that shortly after his departure, the passion for drink had returned, and that in a fit of drunken madness he had seriously and dangerously assaulted his wife. The police had interfered, and the result was that a legal separation had taken place between Gand his wife, and he was threatened with a lengthened imprisonment should he again in any way importune or molest her.

"I am very happy to see you again," said Mr. G.—, "for I am sure you will act as my friend in the matter, and use your influence to effect a reconciliation between myself and my wife."

"I am exceedingly sorry to refuse you," replied the doctor, "but at the same time I must positively do so, for I consider it better for the welfare of both of you that you should continue separated, otherwise I am certain that in one of your drinking fits you will do her some great injury, if not worse."

"I pledge you my word of honour as a gentleman," said Mr. G---, "that if you will make peace between us, I will never taste a drop of spirits again."

"I do not doubt your good intentions; but, strong as they may be, your habit of drinking is stronger."

"Only try me," said Mr. G——; "name any time you like for the experiment, and see if I do not keep my word."

"Well," replied the doctor, "I am going with his lordship for six weeks, to his villa on Lake Como; and when I return, if I find you have kept your word, I will see what I can do in bringing about a reconciliation between you and your wife."

The doctor again left Milan, and returned at the appointed time. His first visit was, of course, to his friend Mr. G——, whom he found at home, and who appeared delighted to see him.

"Doctor," said he with great glee, "I have faithfully kept my word, and now you must keep yours. I pledged you my word of honour that I would not taste any spirits, and I have not done so since you left; and now, as you promised, you must try your influence on my wife."

"Where is she now?"

"She is in Florence, but will, I understand, return in about a fortnight."

"As soon as she returns," said the doctor, "I will call on her, and see what I can do."

The conversation then turned on other subjects, when Mr. G----inquired of the doctor if he knew Count Lanzfeld, the head of the police.

"Yes, I know him very well," said the doctor; "but why do you ask?"

"Because I want you to remonstrate with him on his behaviour to me; he has placed a spy on me, who follows me everywhere."

"Are you certain of it?" inquired the doctor.

"Positively certain," was the reply; "wherever I go, I find the fellow watching me."

"I will certainly speak to the Count for you, and this afternoon, if possible," said the doctor.

Accordingly he called, and found the Count at home, and told him his errand.

"I assure you," said the Count, "Mr. G—— is under a great error; no person has been set to watch him; and beyond the dread that he may again annoy his wife, the police have no anxiety on his account. Pray tell him so from me; and also, ask him to point out any person who annoys him, and I will have him severely punished."

The doctor communicated the result of this conversation to Mr. G----, "I hardly believe him," said Mr. G-, "for no man would dare to offer me the annoyance that fellow does, unless he was certain he was doing it with impunity; however, I will watch him carefully, and the next time I see him I will collar him, and hand him over to the police."

For two days nothing further transpired on the subject; but on the third evening—a beautiful moonlight night,—the doctor was walking home with his friend, when suddenly the latter stopped, and exclaimed—

"Doctor, there he is !--now we will catch him; he went into this doorway."

The doctor immediately darted with Mr. G——into the passage, from which there was no outlet; but there was no person there, and it was very certain no one could have entered it.

"Mr. G-," said the doctor, "you must have been mistaken; you did not see the man."

"I saw him as plainly as I see you," he replied; "I have seen him too often to be mistaken."

"What sort of a man is he?" asked the doctor, beginning to think that Mr. G—— was suffering under some hallucination.

"He is a tall thin man," replied Mr. G---, "dressed entirely in black. He wears three black studs in his shirt, and always carries a glove in his right hand."

"Always?" inquired the doctor.

"Yes, always," was the reply.

The doctor immediately came to the conclusion that Mr. G—— was suffering under some delusion, and he resolved to trace it to its source.

A week had vet to elapse before the expected arrival of Mr. G--'s wife. In the meantime the doctor began to be considerably alarmed about his friend, so pertinaciously did the phantom pursue him. G-stated that night and day he had no peace, and that he could see the man looking through the window-blinds at night as he lav in bed. This, of course, the doctor knew to be a delusion; but that there might be no mistake in the matter, he requested the officer of a detachment of Austrian troops to allow a sentinel to keep watch round Mr. G--'s house, and especially to mark if any strangers approached it; and if so, of what description they were. The soldier reported that during the first night not a person had attempted to approach the house. The doctor then inquired of Mr. Gwhether he had been annoyed the night before.

"Yes," replied Mr. G___, "the fellow was peeping through my blinds all night long."

The doctor was now fairly puzzled what to do. At last Mr. G--'s excitement and terror increased to such an extent that the doctor determined on going to Florence to ask his wife to come back; hoping that her presence might, to a certain degree, neutralise the effect the phantom seemed to have upon him. Mrs. G---, now perfectly willing to be recouciled to her husband, immediately left Florence with the doctor for Milan. On their arrival, however, they found that a terrible change had taken place; Mr. G-- receiving his wife in the most unkind manner; upbraiding her for her conduct in having left him, and threatening her with personal violence if she attempted to approach the house again. The doctor had no difficulty in perceiving that Mr. G-- was intoxicated at the time; and he inquired of the servants how the change had come over their master, having left him under the resolution to keep sober. They told him, in reply, that no sooner had he left Milan, than the phantom never quitted their master night nor day. He asserted that it no longer looked through the window-blinds, but stood by his bed-side. Mr. Gcould support the torture no longer, and one night, in a fit of desperation, seizing a sword, he followed the phantom, which fled before him from room to room. The servants, aroused by the noise, went to their master's assistance, and found him, in his night-dress, stabbing the clothes on the bed through and through with his sword, calling out that the fellow had hidden himself there, and that he was determined he should annoy him no longer. The servants took the sword from his hand, and Mr. G--- fainted from the effects of his exertion. A medical man was immediately sent for, who, noticing the exhausted condition of his patient, ordered him a glass of brandy.

No sooner had Mr. G—— tasted the spirits than he exclaimed, "I am all right again; the fellow has gone." The next day the phantom again made its appearance, and the medical man being sent for, ordered a repetition of the glass of brandy, and again the phantom vanished. Having now found the means of relieving himself from the terrible persecution which followed him, every time the phantom appeared, Mr. G—— took a similar quantity of brandy, and it vanished.

His habit of intoxication had now commenced again, and when under the influence of spirits he was a perfect maniac. Frequently, however, when sober, he would implore the doctor to get him reconciled to his wife, for the poor fellow was ardently attached to her. The doctor of course refused, and the police were obliged to interfere. Mr. G--- now made another attempt to relinquish his habit of drinking, but it was impossible; the phantom never left him night or day. Its identity was so perfect that he would implore it, in the most piteous accents, to cease the persecution, but without the slightest effect. The phantom stood before him, with its cold, frigid glance, gazing at him with a look almost of indifference on its countenance, and, as usual, always holding its glove in the right hand.

A consultation of medical men was now held, when it was considered that the best thing that could he done for the unhappy man would be to persuade him to leave Italy and reside in some place on the Continent where he could have the benefit of seabathing. Boulogne, in France, was chosen as his place of residence, and he went there, the doctor thinking that the change of scene might restore him to sanity. For a short time after his arrival a most beneficial change certainly took place in him, and he recovered both strength of mind and body. A temporary fit of illness having somewhat weakened him, the phantom again made its appearance, nor would it quit him until he again took to drinking. It continued persecuting him night and day, till at last, at thirty-two years of age, the poor fellow fell a victim to a phantom conjured up by the effects of his immoderate drinking.

A somewhat similar case occurred in Belgravia during last winter. A gentleman had engaged a butler, whose character for integrity and sobriety for many years had been an excellent one; but during the last six months he had not been in a situation, having attempted to start an inn with his savings, but had not been successful. For some time the man's conduct was of a most exemplary description. One night one of the young ladies, in a state of great alarm, entered the bedroom of the governess, and informed her that she had seen a light pass her bedroom door, and had heard a footstep ascending the stairs. The lady thought she had merely been dreaming, and advised her to go to bed again, and nothing more was said on the matter. The little girl, however, was fully persuaded that she had not been in error, and resolved to watch again the next night, and at the same hour she saw the light pass her room, and heard the step again ascending the stairs. She immediately went to the governess, and this time informed her that she was certainly not deceived, and requested the lady to arise from her bed and judge for herself. The governess immediately arose, and throwing a dressing-gown over her, stood at the partially open door, and in a short time she perceived a light descending the stairs, and directly afterwards the butler, carrying a candle in his hand, made his appearance. It was difficult for her to judge whether the man was asleep or awake; his eyes were open, but he seemed in a state of intense alarm, as if under the influence of some terrible dream. He passed her door without noticing it was open, and proceeded to the drawing-room, which he entered. The governess, without hesitation, followed him, and found him turning over the sofa-cushions, and moving the chairs, as if searching for something.

"B——," she said, "what are you doing there?"
"I am looking for them," he replied; "I know they're somewhere here, and this time I'll have them. They shall not escape me now; I'll put a stop to this, once and for all."

The governess now called for assistance, and the man was advised to go to bed. On inquiring next morning, it was found that, in consequence of the misfortunes be had experienced during the time he was keeping the inn, he had sought consolation from drinking, which he had carried to an immoderate extent. He was, however, resolved to cure himself of it; and being a man of strong determination, he felt he had succeeded. No sooner, however, did he enter on his new situation, than the first night, on retiring to rest, two children placed themselves beside his bed, and continued staring at him. He was not acquainted with them, and they afforded no clue to connect them with his history. The second and every following night, they again made their appearance; the poor man feeling the while the certainty that if he took again to drinking they would vanish—but he would not succumb to the temptation. Night after night, the same phantoms appeared to him regularly, till he could support the persecution no longer, and he attempted to drive them away, when he was detected by the young lady and the governess. What was the termination of his case, I know not. Doubtless he either became insane or returned to his drinking habits: all I know is, it was found impossible to retain him in his situation.

The last case I shall mention is even more terrible than either of those already given. A lady called one morning on Dr. F-, a physician who was celebrated for his profound knowledge of diseases connected with the brain, and consulted him about her husband. She informed the doctor, without the least attempt at concealment, that her husband had formerly been the captain of a ship in the East India Company's service, and that unfortunately he had acquired habits of great intemperance. In consequence of some act which he had committed when intoxicated, and which was little to his credit, he became so disgusted with the degrading exhibition he had made of himself, that he resolved nothing should again tempt him to touch spirits, and he had since adhered strictly to his resolution. He felt the temptation occasionally come over him, however, very strongly; still he would not yield to it. At last, when there appeared to be every prospect of his becoming a reformed character, his wife noticed he had become very uneasy, as if something was weighing on his mind of which he did not like to inform her. She pressed him upon the point, and he told her that every night he had the same dream. A little old woman, with a red cloak and red petticoat, appeared to him, and gazed at him intently. Somehow he got the idea, that if he again commenced drinking, she would leave him; but nothing would induce him to alter his resolution. The phantom, at last, exercised so strong an influence upon him, that even during the day-time he had the blood-red colour of the cloak and petticoat she wore continually before his eyes. The lady told the doctor that she was afraid her husband was going out of his mind, and asked him what step she had better take to prevent it.

"I am sorry to tell you," said the doctor; "the case is a most serious one; and if the greatest precautions are not used, it is extremely probable your husband will commit suicide. You must watch him narrowly, and prevent it if possible. My advice to you is, to take him abroad immediately—to the south of Italy, or somewhere else—so that he may have a total change of scene; and the sooner you go the better."

The lady promised to follow the advice of the doctor; and without informing her husband of her reasons, she earnestly pressed him to take her for a trip into Italy; adding at the same time, she was sure it would benefit his health as well. He agreed to her request, and preparatious were made for their departure. When the day arrived for them to start, and the carriage was at the door to take them to the railway station, he suddenly stopped, and told his wife to wait a moment, as he had left something in his bedroom. A few minutes afterwards she heard the report of a pistol, and on rushing up-stairs, found to her horror that her husband had shot himself.

Should the few facts I have mentioned make any impression on the mind of the reader, I sincerely trust he will not be contented without investigating the question further. Let him inquire of any experienced medical man of his acquaintance, whether the facts I have alluded to are not of every-day occurrence. For my own part, I have but one test of the evil of drinking, either in a greater or less degree; and that is of Scripture origin: "Therefore by their fruits shall ye know them." If the mature fruits of a tree produce effects such as I have named, what must be the value and quality of the plant itself?

LONDON STREET TRAFFIC.

If an aëronaut were suspended in a balloon over London for a day, so as to command a fair bird's-eye view of its great lines of thoroughfare, he would witness a scene as the hours rolled by such as no other capital in the world could show him, and such we venture to say as no other people but the British would submit to. If he were to "take stock" of the great lines of intercommunication, one thing would at once strike him as very remarkable,—namely, that the further they run from the great centres of attraction and traffic the wider they become. The gathering channels, if we may so speak, which traverse the suburbs, where they shade off into the country, are generally of more than ordinary width; whilst the thoroughfares which deliver the vehicular and pedestrian traffic grow fine by degrees and beautifully less the nearer they approach the two great centres, or ventricles, West End and City, to which the great mass of the Metropolitan population are propelled every morning. This is the exact reverse of the method in which the blood, which we take to represent the flood of human life, is made to circulate in the human body. We do not find wide arteries at the extremities, but fine capillaries, the blood-vessels increasing in capacity, until they finally discharge themselves into the great arterial centre.

speak, which traverse the suburbs, where they shade off into the country, are generally of more perverse tendency on the part of our great channels than ordinary width; whilst the thoroughfares which of circulation is obvious enough on a little thought

-it is regulated by the value of land. In the suburban lines of road a very singular process of enlargement has been going on, which the reader must have noticed himself. Rows of small houses with garden-plots in front have gradually been absorbed by trade - the fore-courts, or gardens, have necessarily been thrown into the street, either in the form of roadway or footpath. In this manner all the main outlets into the country are gradually becoming colessal in their proportions. Let us instance Brompton Row, Knightsbridge, as having but lately undergone this process of augmentation; the Whitechapel Road and Mile End Road, again, have increased their volume in like manner; whilst from the same cause (i.e., increased commercial value acting through long periods of time) the streets of the City have been encroached upon until they are no longer able to carry the human tide that is daily being forced through them. This law, dictated by commercial instinct, we have never seen noticed, but it is worth conisderation whilst contemplating the congested condition of the leading thoroughfares, but especially those of the City. If for the sake of our bird's-eye view we again suspend ourselves in the balloon, the dead lock the traffic is brought to, by reason of the perverse system of street-making prevalent among us, becomes painfully apparent. Towards nine o'clock the immense army of business men begins to move upon the City. Let us watch those wings which approach from the south-west, west, and north-west; and when we speak of an army we are by no means using a figure of speech, for the City proper is invaded every day by a torrent of men larger than Napoleon ever had under his command. The main collecting channels into which this moving mass of humanity is forced, are two. The line of Oxford Street, Holborn, and Newgate Street, form one of these, and Piccadilly, Strand (augmented by the torrent flowing into it at Charing Cross from Westminster Bridge), Fleet Street, and Cheapside, form the other. Either channel is scarcely sufficient to deliver its load of vehicular and pedestrian traffic, but we find them both commingled at the top of Cheapside; and at an early hour in the day a congested state of the circulation takes place as a matter of course in its narrowest point, the Poultry, which in no part is more than thirty feet wide in the roadway. Practically then the Poultry is the western entrance to the heart of the City-all the lines running from west to east being collected into one, and then stopped in the narrow neck of the bottle! It certainly is no exaggeration to say that, many times in the day, a sheep-dog could leap from carriage to carriage for the whole length of the street-from St. Paul's Churchyard to the Mansion House, as easily as he could scramble over the backs of a flock of sheep.

And this stagnation of the circulation of commercial men takes place at a time when their minutes are worth guineas. What a curious speculation it would be to calculate the fortunes that have been lost by the precious moments wasted through the block in Cheapside. It is observable that in none of the great north and south channels of communication is there any stoppage of the traffic (with one notable exception), unless where they come in contact with, and are interrupted by the current running from east to west. Moorgate Street is never stopped, Tottenham Court Road runs freely, and so does Bishopsgate Street until it crosses Cornhill and Leadenhall Street. The same may be said of its continuation, Gracechurch Street, were it not for the arterial current passing and repassing from Lombard Street to Fenchurch Street. which renders the whole roadway through the greater part of business hours a scene of curses and collisions. At this point, Gracechurch Street is the pipe of a funnel leading to and from London Bridge-the narrow strait dividing all England eastward of that point. The population located upon its banks is little if anything short of one million, and it is constantly growing; hence it must be seen how vain it is to hope that by any system of police regulations a free passage across this Via Mala can be maintained. It may be urged that the opening of new railways, and of other bridges, and new streets (on the other side of the river), will do much to turn the flank of this narrow pass gorged with traffic, herse and foot. But we have proof that all the easements that have lately been made with respect to this bridge, do not by any means even keep the traffic upon it from increasing. In the year 1850, in a single day, between the hours of eight and eight o'clock, 13,000 vehicles passed over it; in 1860, this number had increased to 16,000, or 23 per cent. In the latter year the Brighton line opened a western terminus at Pimlico, and in 1864 Southwark Bridge was opened toll free. From an average of one thousand vehicles a day, the traffic across it rose to 3700 by 1865, a very large portion of which must have been abstracted from London Bridge. In 1864, the South Eastern drained a further traffic, in cabs, &c., from this bridge, by reason of the extension of its terminus to Charing Cross; and in the same year a new road was opened on the south bank of the Thames, which gave a passage for 5700 vehicles daily from the west over Blackfriars Bridge, very many of which would have otherwise gone over the great City bridge. Nevertheless, such was the amount of traffic attracted by this structure, that notwithstanding these various diversions, in the year 1865 its vehicular traffic had increased to 19,000. In the face of such facts as these, we cannot hope that the opening of Cannon Street station, or of the London, Chatham and Dover station at Ludgate Hill, will have any effect in keeping down the crush of carriages of all kinds that now pass over it.

Mr. William Hayward, the surveyor to the City Commissioners of Sewers, who by means of the police has collected many important statistics with reference to metropolitan traffic, upon which he has founded a very able report, urges that the only remedy for this overpowering rush across London Bridge is to build a new one lower down the stream. This proposition would necessitate the closure of the navigation for ships and ocean-going steamers to the west of it, a matter which would entail enormous losses upon the wharfingers who at this point of the river have colossal interests. There is a bill now before Parliament for the laying down of a subaqueous bridge - similar to that now in actual progress between Whitehall and the Waterloo Bridge station. Such a bridge or tunnel, running trains upon the pneumatic principle every five minutes, would drain a very large number of cab passengers from London Bridge, without in any way impeding the navigation. This subaqueous tunnel-bridge will, if accomplished, accommodate a line running from Leadenhall Market to London Bridge station, and thence by a junction to the Elephant and Castle on the one hand, and to the Waterloo Bridge terminus (now in hand) on the other. Such a scheme would relieve the great City bridge of a very large amount of omnibus and cab traffic, very much larger than any of the railways now open across the river, for the reason that it will be a strictly local line, running with far greater dispatch than any locomotive line, such as the Metropolitan, could do under the circumstances.

We are reminded that what may be termed the noisy highway, in contradistinction to the "silent highway" above bridges, could be made much more subservient to passenger traffic, if the river steamers were not so repulsive and dirty in appearance. Some years ago we were promised some new and spacious boats like Roman galleys, but they never made their appearance. There are, we see, some new steamers, with fine deck cabins and promenades over head, capable of carrying great numbers of passengers without inconvenience. If there were many such, and the approaches to the piers were made more convenient and public, we have no doubt whatever but that they would be used by large numbers now travelling by omnibus. Possibly when the Thames Embankment is finished-which of itself will only cause a greater embarrassment to London Bridge, and possibly to the Poultry, in consequence of the increased current it will throw across the latter thoroughfare at its Mansion-house Street embouchure-we shall have such improved river steamers, both above and below bridge. We may hope at least that by these means London Bridge traffic may be kept stationary for many years; and who knows what engineering science may enable us to do by that time?

But independently of the water communication at present existing between the different parts of the City and the West-End, causing chronic congestion of the traffic, there is the spasmodic rush in and out of the City morning and evening. It is unnecessary to say that the small space of 631 acres under the City jurisdiction is the most valuable area of ground in the world. When we know that the Commissioners of Sewers lately had to give 10,000l. for a plot of ground, at the corner of St.

Paul's, measuring 412 superficial feet, we see the reason why the City proper is rising up skyward. Just as by the action of natural laws lateral pressure will sometimes squeeze level ground into considerable elevations, so the financial pressure is now slowly working by a law quite as irresistible, to double the height of the houses of business and great warehouses in the City of London. Whilst, however, accommodation is thus afforded for a very large augmentation of business-men during the day. the resident City population is growing year by year smaller. In 1851 there were 129, 128 residents; ten years later this number had declined to 113,387, a smaller number than it had ever contained possibly since the days of the Plantagenets. The City proper is, in fact, nothing more than a vast countinghouse, deserted at night, with the exception of a few housekeepers, and the poor, who are to be found everywhere. Between seven and ten in the morning the true stream of commercial City life sets in. In 1860 the police counted the number of persons who arrived on foot and in vehicles, when the number was 706,621; and, according to the increase of population since that time, Mr. Hayward estimates that at the present time the number who seek this commercial centre of the world daily, is at least three quarters of a million, and the same number of course leave it. As it is well known that the arrivals and departures are mainly between the hours of nine and ten o'clock in the morning and five and six o'clock in the evening, we may imagine the stress put upon the great City thoroughfares to carry this multitude of people. The Duke of Wellington used to say that there was but one man in England besides himself who could march 10,000 men out of Hyde Park: is it to be wondered at therefore that 750,000 find a difficulty in engineering themselves through the narrow streets that lead to and from the City! It may be said that, as the larger proportion of the daily City visitors are carried by their own legs, the difficulty is not so great as may be imagined if they all went in on wheels. The police tell us that the mean of the whole number entering the City in 1860, was I vehicle to 3:13 on foot. But averages are deceptive. What our roadmakers have to provide for in vast populations are spasmodic rushes. A steady downfall of rain at once doubles the number of riders, and halves the means of riding, as omnibuses and cabs find no outside passengers under such circumstances. Our vehicular means of conveyance is not elastic enough, as every one knows, on such occasions. But happily engineers have found out the way to relieve the peripheral and centrifugal rush on the part of trading London. The underground railway system, which is purely a passenger system, is expansive enough to relieve any pressure upon the streets; and the construction of these conveniences under all the great lines of thoroughfare leading to and from centre and suburbs, may be looked upon as only a foregone conclusion. Already the Metropolitan line provides an arc of communication for the northern half of the metropolis, whilst the Metropolitan Extension will in a short time complete the southern sweep. In any Continental city such a line would not be of so much importance as in London, where we have no Boulevards. With us it opens up a perfectly new route. We are struck with astonishment sometimes at the very short stages the majority of the travellers by this line go. It would seem to be scarcely worth while to mount so many steps to travel so short a way. But the way is only short by rail: by road, even where one exists, the way is often so roundabout that a journey by it, which occupies by the line only a few minutes, takes on foot perhaps half an hour. The circular line is therefore of immense advantage to the metropolis irrespective of the through riders. But it is clear that a line running under Oxford Street and Holborn to Smithfield, is even more required than this useful roundabout rail. The Mid-London line was projected to meet this great want, and it seems extraordinary to us that the Committee of the House of Commons were short-sighted enough to overlook the necessity for such a route, when they authorized the Inner Circle line, and unwisely promised that no other metropolitan scheme should be considered until it was completed. The consequence, as we have seen, is the rejection of the Mid-London scheme, for two years at least. On the Surrey side of the river, the pneumatic system, in connexion with the two subaqueous tubular bridges proposed and in progress, will go a great way to relieve the cab and omnibus traffic.

Nevertheless a new east and west street is absolutely indispensable, a street that shall turn the flank of the Poultry, and escape the dead-lock at the ends of Cornhill and Lombard Street. Mr. Hayward proposes a route for this purpose which appears to us to be admirable. His idea is to run a street, seventy feet wide, starting from the eastern end of Holborn Valley Viaduct, by St. Sepulchre's Church, and terminating by a junction with Whitechapel High Street, close to Commercial Street. It would run to the north of St. Martin's-le-Grand. cross Wood Street, Basinghall Street, north of Guildhall, Coleman Street, and Moorgate Street, about 250 yards north of the Bank; thence by Drapers' Buildings to London Wall, along the northern side of Wormwood Street, up to Bishopsgate Street Within, across Houndsditch and Petticoat Lane, and thence to Whitechapel Road, near Commercial Street, where, before long, the Great Eastern, the East London (Thames Tunnel line), the North London, and the Metropolitan lines will have a joint terminus. Of necessity such a conjunction of important lines will draw a very large traffic to this point, vehicular and pedestrian, and it is quite certain that the present thoroughfares leading to it will be utterly inadequate to carry it. Such a street is therefore a necessity, and we have no doubt that it will eventually repay (itself. Although land in the line of the great City thoroughfares, and even in the line of those at the West-End, is so valuable, yet a few paces out of this line its value sinks greatly. A bird's-eye view of the Metropolis, -even a run along some of the lines that are on a high level, -shows that immediately contiguous to the most flourishing thoroughfares, there are hollow squares or blocks of building of a character so squalid as to astonish the spectator. These blocks are sometimes surrounded by streets in which the shops are very valuable, and the inhabitants are prosperous and respectable. Our streets are, in fact, hollow squares, in which we hide our wretchedness and poverty-the very reverse of the infantry square, in which all the valuables, both human and otherwise, are placed for security against attack. Such property cannot be very valuable; a street driven through it would convert these retreats of filth and fever into a highway that would every year increase in value. do not know what the ultimate loss, if any, will be by the construction of New Oxford Street; it cannot in the long run be much; but we do know the value it has been to the neighbourhood in ventilating and purifying it. Side streets that were pestiferous before it was made are now putting on a fresh appearance, even the people are clad more decently now they are open to the light of the outer world. Such would be the sanitary as well as the commercial value of opening up a new street sure of a large traffic in an entirely decayed neighbourhood. The navvy, when he slashes through the festering and putrefying hovels-for they can scarcely be called bouses-in such back slums, will act as curatively as the surgeon when he passes his knife through a corrupt wound.

We have spoken hitherto of the great commercial centre of traffic, which is, indeed, the one that is most distressed; but the seat of the Legislature and of the Court, the quarters of the nobility and gentry, and, in fact, the pleasure city of Westminster, also deserve some attention with respect to this question of traffic. There can be no doubt that the pressure upon Cheapside is greatly augmented by the conflict of vehicular traffic between these two centres. The traffic of the West-End proper, however, is of a totally different character from that in the City, depending as it does mainly upon season and the capricious movements of fashion. The streets that are comparatively deserted in the autumn and winter months, in April, May, and June are, on particular occasions, nearly as crowded as the City thoroughfares. Piccadilly, looking down the "dip," appears more like an avenue of flowers—the open carriages displaying the brilliant toilets of the fashionable fair-than an ordinary street. Regent Street, again, is often blocked in the afternoon, but as a rule the thoroughfares are equal to the traffic, greatly exceeding as they do in capacity the City streets. Thus, Regent Street is fifty-two feet wide, Westminster Bridge fifty-six feet; Oxford Street east of Duke Street, fifty-one feet; Piccadilly west of Half Moon Street; fifty feet eight inches; whilst the most densely-thronged City streets have the following measurements between the footways: Temple Bar, twenty-five feet; Holborn Hill, by St. Andrew's Church, thirty-five feet; Bishopsgate Street Without, twenty-two feet; London Bridge, thirty-five feet. Thus the mean of the four West-End streets is fifty-two feet and a half wide, whilst that of the four City thoroughfares is but little more than thirty feet, though they have a strain upon them in many cases double that upon the West-End ones.

There are no statistics of the vehicular West-End traffic at the height of the season: we have not therefore the means of making a comparison between it and that of the City streets; but in July, which may be considered the "cheap trippers" season, within the twelve hours 11,343 carriages passed along Regent Street, 8220 along Piccadilly west of Half Moon Street, and 10,619 along Oxford Street south of Wells Street; and 11,609, the largest vehicular traffic west, passed over Westminster Bridge. This is diminutive indeed to the number composing the crush of wheels passing along the constricted City thoroughfares-Fleet Street, by Temple Bar, with its 25,000; London Bridge, with its 19,000; Holborn, with its 29,000; and Blackfriars with its 24,000. Whilst, however, there is yet room enough for the fashionable in the majority of the West-End streets, there is one thoroughfare that is constantly choked by reason of the same cause as blocks London Bridge. It is true there is no river separating vast masses of the population, such as is the case eastward of London Bridge; but there is Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, which for one mile and a half as effectually stop the passage of heavy traffic, and a great deal of the light, north and south. Hence the whole of the traffic eastward is forced into the narrow gut of Park Lane, whilst the nearest western road is Silver Street, Bayswater, a tortuous thoroughfare of a most inconvenient kind.

But, independently of the loss of time caused by the chaotic condition of the metropolitan traffic, we must consider the very large loss of life it entails. There are many battles that are famous in history, in which the killed and wounded have been less than Londoners annually suffer in the battles of the streets. According to a parliamentary return just issued of the number of persons run over in the City and metropolitan districts, we find that from the 1st of January, 1865, to the end of February, 1866, there were 180 persons killed, and 2175 maimed and injured. And this list is very far from being perfect, as it only includes those cases which come under the knowledge of the police. Dr. Lankester, in his third annual report as coroner for the central district of Middlesex, states that he believes the number of maimed must be greatly more, as he finds that last year, in the Royal Free Hospital alone, one thousand four hundred and fifty-so received, and that 31 cases resulted in death. If such a multitude of injured persons were received into a second-rate hospital, what must be the total received into all the great metropolitan hospitals! It is certainly extraordinary, however, that the City, which is by far the most crowded with pedestrian and vehicular traffic, and which à fortiori we should have credited with the largest number of accidents, is by no means remarkable in this respect. For instance, within the civic limits for the time mentioned, there were only seventeen persons run over and killed out of a daily circulation of three quarters of a million of people, whilst in the comparatively open district of Hampstead there were fourteen deaths from the same cause. There seems to be only one possible explanation of this singular discrepancy. The number of female pedestriaus in the City proper, are only as 1 to 5 males, and it is generally the former sex who hesitate and are lost amid the rush of vehicles.

Among the metropolitan police divisions in which the greatest number of fatal accidents occur may be reckoned Finsbury, Stepney, Hampstead, and Highgate. But the greatest number mained were to be found in St. James's: namely, one hundred and thirty-eight; in Lambeth, one hundred and forty; Camberwell, one hundred and one; and Southwark, one hundred and forty-two. The crossing just by the entrance to the London Bridge station certainly appears to be the most dangerous in the metropolis; but although many persons are annually injured there, the deaths are not many, only six in fact taking place in the entire district. The only manner in which we can account for the great number of fatal accidents which occur from being run over on suburban roads, is by supposing that they are more subject to the furious driving of tradesmen's light carts-that frantic charioteer, the butcher-boy, being the greatest offender. pedestrian is always within an inch of his life in the morning, either from the furious little pony, who seems to be rendered frantic by the tray bumping upon his back, or from the butcher's cart which gallops round the corners totally regardless whether he runs over you or not. In the more settled districts they have the fear of the police before them, but in the suburbs they stay their chariot-wheels for no living thing.

The street crossings which are most liable to produce accidents are not those in which the traffic crosses at right angles, such as the bottom of Lud-The number of vehicles is so great gate Hill. there, and the danger of collision so imminent, that they are obliged to proceed at a walking pace; moreover, at such points the police are ever ready to assist the timid. The really dangerous crossings are those where several roads meet, such as the wide open space at the top of St. Martin's Lane. Here the foot-passenger is subjected to a concentrated fire, which takes him in flank and rear-he is raked by swift cabs as remorselessly as were the eight out-patients were treated there for accidents "Six Hundred" in the valley of death. There is a very spiteful crossing at the bottom of Snow Hill, down the incline of which a succession of omnibuses are slipping and sliding, when the roads are wet and greasy. It was here Mr. Wills of Bristol lost his life last year. Small side streets again, leading to great thoroughfares, are very dangerous. Carriages turning rapidly out of narrow thoroughfares are apt to bewilder the crowd of persons crossing at such situations. Argyll Place, Regent Street, enjoys a sad celebrity in this respect; and Hanover Street, turning into Hanover Square from Regent Street, is a regular trap for the unwary; and the same may be said of the Piccadilly end of Park Lane. At many of the frequented City crossings we believe that the greatest convenience and safety from accidents would be afforded by subways. In all railway stations we find they are adopted, and really between the passing of trains there is less danger there than in the crowded metropolitan thoroughfares. Bridges of the height necessary for the passage of traffic beneath them, would be both unsightly and very laborious climbing for the elderly people that would mostly use them.

It is evident that we are slowly taking a leaf out of the Parisian book: we are rebuilding the City—from bricks we are turning it into stone and marble. What a pity it is we cannot make our thoroughfares wide as well as the houses high. Perhaps our children may see even this accomplished, and then London will certainly be the most splendid city in the world.

ANDREW WYNTER.

ADMIRAL FITZROY.

In the long Summer's day few think of wintry storms, but when Summer is past, and Autumn has given place to Winter, and the piercing nor'-easter or milder seu'-wester scatters desolation and destruction on the more exposed parts of our coasts, then we both hear and read with keen interest and concern of disasters which bring misery upon thousands! Many a heart is touched with true sympathy for those of whom it knows nothing, 'save that they are unfortunate fellow-With some, again, the feeling dies creatures. almost as soon as it arose. But in the hearts of others it takes deep root, and gives no rest till some step is taken to alleviate the misery. With such minds the necessity for vigorous effort in a right direction becomes an imperative duty. And it is usually those who have themselves experienced the dangers of the ocean who feel most for others exposed to similar perils. At all events, he whose name stands at the head of this article knew well the dangers of the sea, and felt much for those who suffered from its ravages. To do good in his generation was the aim of his life, and more especially did he desire to do good to those with whom he had shared many of the risks common to all who embark on the uncertain waves; and the result is, that for a period of years the name of Fitz Roy has been familiar as a household word.

Robert Fitz Roy was born on July 5th, 1805, and had not completed his sixtieth year when his life terminated. He was the youngest son of Lord Charles Fitz Roy, second son of the third Duke of Grafton. His mother, Frances Anne, eldest daughter of the first Marquis of Londonderry, died in his infance.

Ampton, in Suffolk, was his birthplace; but only a very short period of his life was passed there. The home of his boyhood was Wicken, in Northamptonshire, and it continued to be the residence of his father till his death in 1830. His first attempt at navigation was somewhat daring for a boy, but was not a wholly successful one. Taking advantage of the servants' dinner-hour, he possessed himself of one of the laundry tubs, which he lined with bricks for ballast. He then launched it on a large pond, and stepping in by the aid of a pole, he steered his way triumphantly across; but on reaching the opposite shore, he leant over to fix the pole in the ground, and in so doing overbalanced the extemporised vessel; the bricks came sliding down, and in one moment, sailor, tub, and bricks were in the water. A gardener, who fortunately happened to be near, came to the rescue, and succeeded in drawing the young navigator to the bank, with no more injury than a thorough soaking.

His first school was Rottingdean, near Brighton; from that he proceeded to Harrow, whence he was removed to the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth, which he entered in February, 1818, being then not thirteen years old.

His education hitherto had partaken more of a sporting than a scholarly character, and the consequence was that, on entering the Naval College, he found himself in the lowest grade in everything but classics. He was especially deficient in arithmetic; but this was soon proved to be owing to no natural defect, but to want of instruction. He advanced so rapidly, under the good tuition now provided, that he finished the usual three years' course of education in one year and eight months, and left the Naval College in October, 1819, having attained such marked proficiency in mathematics that he was awarded the first College medal.

He was first appointed to the "Superb," bearing Sir Thomas Hardy's broad pennant in South America, and he sailed to join her in the "Owen Glendower," commanded by the Hoh. Robert Spencer. He remained on board the "Superb," between Brazil and Northern Peru, until her return to England in 1821: when he joined the "Hind," under the Hon. Captain Rous. He served for two years in the Mediterranean on board that corvette, during the last four months of which she was commanded by Lord John Churchill. He then went on board the "Cambrian," Captain Hamilton, and returned in her to England, to undergo his examination.

In July, 1825, he passed in seamanship, before Sir William Hoste and other officers, at the same time obtaining their marked approbation. In a later examination at the Naval College, he was first on the list of twenty-six. Every question was correctly worked by him, and many of them by two or three different methods. Promotion was immediately awarded by the Admiralty, in consequence of this examination and of the first College medal.

He was appointed early in 1825 to the "Thetis," Sir John Phillimore, and served in her till that frigate was paid off and re-commissioned by Captain Bingham, when he was immediately re-appointed to her.

In 1828, at Rio de Janeiro, Sir Robert Otway, Commander-in-Chief, proposed to Lieutenant Fitz Roy that he should join the "Ganges." Soon afterwards he was made flag-lieutenant, and in November of the same year, Sir Robert took the opportunity of a death-vacancy to promote him to the rank of commander, giving him the command of the "Beagle," a surveying vessel, from which period he commenced his labours as a hydrographical officer. He made some important surveying observations and discoveries while on board the "Beagle," and returned to England on the 14th of October, 1830, when that vessel anchored in Plymouh Sound, and was paid off.

It was in this, his first surveying voyage, that he discovered the Otway Water, in the Straits of Magalhaens. Captain King, the distinguished commander of this expedition, named one of the straits "Fitz Roy Strait," in honour of the discoverer.

On one occasiona violent pampero nearly capsized the "Beagle;" but by dint of great skill and readiness in seamanship, she was righted, and brought with her head to the wind, not, however, without loss of both topmasts and other smaller spars; her sails, although furled, being torn to pieces. But the severest disaster was the loss of two men, who were blown overboard and drowned. To his sensitive mind, this was a severe blow; but to have attempted to render aid in a boiling sea, when all were in similar peril, would have been The impression made on Lieutenant Fitz Roy by this circumstance was great, and the lesson derived from it was never forgotten, and ever after that time he laid great stress on the silent warnings of the barometer.

So greatly did he prize that most useful instrument, and so skilfully did he interpret its premonitory signs, that in his second surveying expedition, on most daugerous and unexplored coasts, he lost not a single spar, nor was he even once overtaken by a storm unprepared. He met and weathered the severest gales without the loss of a soul on board, or injury to his small vessel, one of those little brigs then named "Coffins" from their great insecurity.

In his able and interesting "Voyage" he has given an account of the loss of their boat, which was stolen by the savages; and of their unavailing efforts to recover it. He also tells of the seizure of one of the natives as a hostage, and the final arrival of the expedition in England, with three native men and one woman. His object was so to bring these natives under the influence of civilisation and education, that they might be made useful as government interpreters. A communication, he thought, might thus be opened with the natives, which would tend to civilise and ultimately christianise them; and thus the trade of the world and navigation generally would be greatly benefited.

This idea, however, was not carried out; and after maintaining the savages for more than a year entirely at his own expense, he resolved on restoring them to their own country, though it should cost him money and trouble. One of them died of smallpox soon after his arrival in England; but the others were healthy, and greatly enjoyed their life in a civilised land. They quickly acquired European habits, and learned enough of the English language to converse intelligibly in it. Many manifested a great desire to see them. William IV. and Queen Adelaide caused them to be brought to the palace, and received them very graciously.

Finding at length that the Admiralty had no intention of prosecuting the survey, and anxious to restore the Fuegians to their countrymen, Captain Fitz Roy engaged a vessel at great personal expense for that purpose. His uncle, the Duke of Grafton -grandfather of the present duke-had exerted all his influence to obtain for his nephew the command of a surveying vessel. Captain (afterwards Sir Francis) Beaufort, the celebrated hydrographer, who for several years filled that position at the Admiralty with so much credit to himself and benefit to the public, at the same time urged the necessity of a more complete survey of the South American coast. This double pressure resulted in the appointment of Captain Fitz Roy to the "Beagle" again, his commission dating from June 27th, 1831.

He had, however, to pay a large proportion of the sum for which he had contracted to the owner of the ship he had chartered for the reconveyance of the Fuegians to their own country.

The "Beagle" sailed in December, 1831. Captaiu Fitz Roy had been specially solicitous about the comfort and safety of the crew, and a great part of the necessary fittings in the small vessel was paid for out of his own private purse. The Lords of the Admiralty were scarcely inclined to be generous. Those who inspected the "Beagle" previous to her departure, considered the number of chronometers greater than was necessary, and they therefore desired that it should be reduced to five!

mander Fitz Roy, on the occasion: "The first thing, and indeed the only thing, that their Lordships have said to me since their return to Plymouth, was to express their surprise at the number of chronometers in the 'Beagle:' and they ultimately ordered me to let you have but five. This grieves me exceedingly, but I must submit; choose therefore those you like best, and when you have made up your mind, return the rest into store. Or would you like to write to the Board, to solicit your being allowed to retain seven out of the nine, on the ground of the accidents that may happen? If you do so, perhaps their Lordships may give way; and if my opinion is asked, you may be sure of my urging it as strongly as I can; but I felt so much hurt at the manner of the order, that I have not been able to persuade myself to interfere further."

The result of all this was, that Captain Fitz Roy spent 300l. of his own upon chronometers. Captain Beaufort, in a former letter had referred to the chronometers, and said that in his opinion "eighteen might be enough," but allowing for accidents, he should recommend that twenty be taken.

This memorable survey occupied five years, and is without doubt one of the most complete in the world's records. Long after, Captain Beaufort, having been called on, by the House of Commons, to report on the surveys that had been made, spoke of this one as "the splendid survey of Captain Fitz Roy." It was unparalleled indeed, in the greatness of the work done, the little aid given by Government, and the noble sacrifice of the surveyor's own private fortune.*

The following extracts from a letter to one of his cousins, referring to these expenses, and also giving an account of the return of the Fuegians to their native shores, may perhaps be read with interest:—

"In January, 1833, the Fuegians were landed at a pretty and really pleasant spot in Tierra del Fuego. at the northern part of what is called in the maps. 'Jemmy Button' said it was his own Nassau Bay. land. A young Englishman named Matthews voluntered to settle with them. We built houses of a beehive fashion, dug gardens, sowed and planted seeds and roots, and left our protégés to make their way amongst the natives as well as they As long as the 'Beagle's' party were present, nothing could promise better than the prospect of a peaceful settlement; the natives. though numerous, were very quiet, well disposed. and absolutely without any offensive weapons. There were about three hundred assembled around us while we were making the houses and gardens. Some even assisted in carrying the wood; but they could not understand why we dug up the ground for the seeds. To my great mortification, I found that Jemmy had quite forgotten his native language; and that the other two, belonging to a different tribe, were quite as mute. This default of Jemmy was a serious drawback. Although he found his mother, brothers, and sisters, he could only make himself partially understood by them. York and Fuegia preferred staying with Matthews and Jemmy, to going farther west into their own country. I think now, that old York, who was a deep, crafty character, had an eye to the good outfit which Matthews carried, and which sooner or later he hoped to get into his own possession. York had been desperately in love with Fuegia during some months, and on their landing we married them. During a week which elapsed between my first leaving Matthews, and my revisiting him, the natives had commenced stealing whatever they could lay their hands on, and at times they insulted and tormented Matthews so much, that he considered his life in great danger. The Fuegians who had been with us fared better, particularly Fuegia, who appeared to be a great favourite. took Matthews away, with what remained of his goods, considering it very wrong to risk his life any longer.

"At the expiration of another week I again went to the place, which is called, in the Fuegian vernacular, Wullia (or Wool-lī-ă), and found our friends were doing well, better I think by far than when Matthews was with them. His presence appeared to irritate the natives; they were angry with his colour, they disliked his beard, despised him because he was not so strong as they were, and appeared (as he thought) to hold frequent consultations as to his fate. When I last saw York he was busy building a boat, out of planks and nails which we had given him. Jemmy was making a canoe out of a large tree; thinking one of that sort better than the frail birchen kind used by his countrymen. Fuegia was dressed very tidily, and looking quite smart, although I took her by surprise. Several of the seeds and roots had sprouted up above the ground: I saw pears, beans, turnips, and corn, showing green "From that time until February of this year, I saw no more of the Fuegians.

"In that month the 'Beagle' went close to Wullia, but not a trace of our friends was to be found. In the deserted gardens were potatoes and turnips, just enough to make one dish. The houses were standing, but had not been inhabited, it was evident, for some months. For more than an hour, my feelings were not to be envied; but, as I was thinking of leaving the place, three canoes were seen approaching. In two of the canoes were individuals washing their faces, who were soon recognised as Jemmy Button and his brother. He was soon on board, bringing also his mother, his wife, two other brothers, and a sister. He had seen the ship at a distance, and hastened to us from an islaud where he had lived since the wigwams (where we established him) had been plundered, and their inmates put to flight by the incursion of a hostile tribe. He was as naked as any of his companions; his hair long and matted, and his whole appearance wretched; though he said he had never been ill, and was very happy. He said-'live, very good'-'plenty fruits'-'plenty birdies'-'too much fish' -and in snow time, plenty guanacoes. He was not cold, though without clothes, after having been used to them: but what surprised me most was, that he preferred staying in his present state to returning to a civilised life. He used to say that after passing one year with his people he should like to return with me to England for good. Instead of learning his own language, he had taught his family many words of English. We were surprised not a little, to hear one of his brothers call out-'Jemmy Button-canoe-come,'-when he was anxious that Jemmy should leave us, and return to the shore. The whole party seemed greatly to fear his being taken away again. I think the young, and not illlooking wife, had wrought the charm which bound him to a savage life. York and Fuegia had departed, soon after the irruption of the hostile tribe, in a large canoe; until that time, the three had lived together peaceably. Jemmy had had many meals in which beans, potatoes, and turnips, formed the material parts. The last acts of friendship which passed between them were, York stealing all Jemmy's clothes, Fuegia hiding them, and Jemmy slinging stones at the pair of thieves as they paddled away in their canoc. After passing two days with Jemmy, and loading his canoe with tools and various useful things, we took leave of him, Mrs. Button, and Co., and directed our course towards the Falkland Islands. From these Isles of Discord. we are now to remove to the Straits of Magellan. taking a peep in our way, at the great river Santa Cruz. From the Straits, we shall go to Concepcion. Valparaiso, and Coquimbo. During the next year or two, Valparaiso will be our reudezvous for letters, provisions, &c., and our employment will be examining the coast between the Straits of Magellan and Coquimbo, during the first year; farther northward, I hope, during the next, and in the third year from this time I trust we shall be crossing the Pacific. I have purchased, and am maintaining a schooner to assist the 'Beagle,' as your economical Admiralty will not assist me in any way, though I only asked them to pay the men and buy their provisions; but maintain her, I must and will-if it makes me a poor half-pay commander for the rest of my life. She is a fine vessel, is well found, has a good crew, is well officered, and has already done much essential service. Their Lordships at the Admiralty are little aware of the extent of the work their operations enjoin, and how inadequate one solitary vessel is to do all that ought to be done. I feel that the honour of England is somewhat touched in a survey of the shores of South America. from La Plata to Guayaquil, including the Falkland Islands: and while I have an eye, a leg, a head, and a shilling, I will struggle against wind and tide, to execute my share in a manner that shall not bring discredit on our character as explorers of that ocean, on which we ought to be first in every thing. How long did the Spanish surveyors put our officers to the blush? How few English charts were there forty years, nay thirty years ago, which could be compared for a moment with those of the Spaniards? But I will get down from my hobby, and remember that I am paying for everything and get nothing in return, except the satisfaction of doing my duty. This ought to be somewhat of a damper to my rather enthusiastic feelings, but I am such a mule that I care not much what happens to me in future-provided the 'Beagle's' voyage is but well carried on and satisfactorily ended."

An artist accompanied this expedition on board the "Beagle," to whom Captain Fitz Roy himself paid 300*l.*; which did not, in his opinion, entitle him to receive any of the products of the artist's genius, for himself or his friends, without paying the usual price.

Sir Roderick Murchison, in an eloquent and feeling address at a geographical anniversary meeting in May, 1865, has so amply set forth all the benefits to science Captain Fitz Roy effected in this survey, that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. It is sufficient merely to state that he carried a chain of meridian distances round the globe, and that his charts are faultless. He was accompanied on this voyage by Mr. Darwin, the celebrated naturalist, who has since become a man of worldwide reputation.

For the particulars of this voyage, we would refer to the published narrative by King, Fitz Roy, and Darwin. In it there is an interesting account of the rescue of the crew of the "Challenger," by Captain Fitz Roy in 1835. The captain rode many hundred miles, partly by night, through the unconquered territory of the Araucanian Indians, who were then hostile to all white men, and he afterwards piloted the "Blonde," (Commodore Mason,) to the place where the crew were saved.

In 1834, Captain Fitz Roy was promoted to the rank of Post-Captain by Lord Auckland. In 1837, on the recommendation of Sir Roderick Murchison, the Royal Geographical Society honoured him with the presentation of their gold medal, in acknowledgment of the results of the "Beagle's" voyages. He was elected an Elder Brother of the Trinity House in 1838. In 1841 he entered Parliament as member for Durham. The following year he was appointed to act as Conservator of the Mersey; and in August of that year (1842) he was selected by the Admiralty to attend on the Archduke Frederick of Austria, in his tour through Great Britain.

In March, 1843, he introduced into Parliament a Bill for establishing Mercantile Marine Boards, and for enforcing the examination of Masters and Mates in the Merchant Service; and from this Bill much of so different from the present, when this colony was on the verge of bankruptcy. I have seen my honourable friend, the Colonial Treasurer, who now sits so comfortably upon his well-filled chest, reduced almost to despair; and I have seen my trusty friend

Mr. Kennedy, not then, as now, the officer of the Union Bank of Australia, and helping to pay the proprietary a dividend of forty per cent. -- not then.

as now, rejoicing in deposits to the amount of 120,000%, but preparing at four o'clock in the afternoon to close the doors which, at ten o'clock the next morning, he had resolved not to open to the public. Then, in the face of his instructions, at the risk of loss of office, with no possible advantage to himself, right or wrong according to political economy, well or ill as to the result, for the sake of the public credit, and for no other cause, Captain

Fitz Roy made debentures a legal tender, and lost his office in his attempt to save the colony from ruin. One instance more, gentlemen, -for I shall not weary you with many: I was with Captain

Fitz Roy at the meeting with the native chiefs of the north, when the reinforcement of 200 men arrived from Sydney. On that occasion Thomas Walker the present Act, called the Mercautile Marine Act, has been taken.

In the midst of this useful and prosperous career, an offer was made to him by the late Sir Robert Peel and Lord Stanley (now Lord Derby) to go out to New Zealand as Governor. To do right, at whatever cost to himself, was the governing principle of his conduct, and after much anxious deliberation, he decided in giving up his seat in Parliament, his conservatorship of the Mersey, and his position at the Trinity House, (the latter two bringing in a certain income for life,) to fill a post which had little to offer in exchange. A more thorny path he could hardly have chosen, but to men of enterprise difficulties are an attraction rather than otherwise. The appointment had been offered to him in a highly gratifying manner, honourable alike to his character and his talents.

In the summer of 1843 he sailed, with his family, in a merchant vessel, for New Zealand.

It would far exceed our limits to enter fully into this portion of his life. It will be sufficient to state that he found the colony in a very depressed state. He brought with him neither money nor forces, nor even the promise of any; he threw open the ports, to save the colonists from bankruptcy; he issued debentures, to save the settlers from starvation. But by his efforts to avert ruin and destruction from New Zealand, he gave offence to the New Zealand Company, then sufficiently powerful to effect his recall; and, to the astonishment of his friends and partisans, of whom there were many amongst the most respectable of the colonists, his successor arrived with money, and military aid, and all that Governor Fitz Roy had in vain demanded! These voyages to and from New Zealand, with a family of little children, of course greatly increased his pecuniary embarrassments.

Before quitting this subject, the following extract from a speech by Dr. Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand, at a farewell dinner given to Sir George Grey, December 26th, 1853, will be read with interest :--*

"Next came a man whom I can never think of without sorrow and respect. For, mark me, gentlemen, I cannot measure merit by success. A good man struggling with the storms of fate will command my sympathy, even more than one standing on the pinnacle of success. I honoured Captain FitzRoy in his misfortunes, as I honour you, Sir George Grey, in your prosperity. Shortly after his recall, I saw a letter from the Secretary for the Colonies, in which he said: 'No one here dares say a word for poor Fitz Roy.' I am thankful to have this opportunity of saying a word in New Zealand, which no one would say in England. I have seen that honourable man, for the sake of the public good, sacrificing his own private property, and, what is even dearer to us all, his public reputation. There are many here present who can recollect the time.

gave the pledge, which he has since amply redeemed, that if the Governor would give the lie to Heke's assertions, that the land was to be taken from them, by sending back the troops, he and his men would guarantee the protection of the north. It was the wisest as well as the bravest act that was ever done by any Governor in the British Empire. It is true that the native allies were a little too late in taking the field; but when they took it they kept it. The example was set, and from north to south no British force has ever been employed without its contingent of native allies. The effect of that alliance, it is for military men to estimate rather than for me. I simply state the fact; and if I were to write the history of Captain Fitz Roy's administration, it would be in these words: 'He was the man who lost Kororareka, but who saved New Zealand."" In 1846, Captain Fitz Roy returned to England. In the House of Lords, in February, 1848, Lord Derby (then Lord Stanley), took occasion to speak in high terms of Captain Fitz Roy's disinterested and patriotic zeal. In July, 1848, Captain Fitz Roy was directed: by Lord Auckland to attend to the new frigate "Arrogant:" then about to be fitted with a screw. and peculiar machinery. From that time till she was commissioned by him he continually superintended her arrangements, all of which answered satisfactorily; many of them being new and original. He commanded her with great success; and that same happy tact and consideration for others, which made the "Beagle" a home to all in her, caused him to be equally popular in the "Arrogant," and much regretted when from ill-health he gave up this splendid command, in 1850. His sacrifices for New Zealand, and his finding himself on his return without money-all being lost, save his honourable character-had greatly broken his constitution. The return to active service, in the profession he so dearly loved, did much to restore him; but his health was not proof against the combined anxieties of his public duties, and the pressure of distress and illness in his own home. His expenses, as captain of a new and beautiful frigate like the "Arrogant," were great, and especially when senior officer at Lisbon. His pay did not cover all the necessary expenses incurred, and his own private means were inadequate to supply the deficiency and provide for his family at home.

When his health was sufficiently re-established for active occupation, he became for a short space of time one of the managing directors of the "General Screw Steam Shipping Company." He was desirous, however, for employment affoat again, and this he earnestly sought, naturally anxious to serve his time. He was unsuccessful, on the ground of having given up the "Arrogant;" and as time wore on, he turned his mind resolutely to the serving of his country on shore.

In 1854, a new office was organised, for the purpose of collecting data from observations at sea, and for deducing results for the promotion of science and navigation. It had its origin in the Brussels Conference of 1853, and was similar, though on a more limited scale, to the office held by the eminent Maury in America, which had done such good service, and had become so widely known before the unfortunate American War broke out.

Pending the establishment of the office, Captain Fitz Roy undertook the duties of private secretary to the Commander-in-chief, Lord Hardinge, at the time of the Crimean War: with the understanding that he was to give up the post when this new office to which he was appointed was ready for him, to assume its direction, which he accordingly did in August, 1854.

We have no space here to trace this little office through all its stages.

The Government applied to the Royal Society for their aid, and in the reply of that society the objects of the Meteorological Office are all elaborately set forth, in a manner worthy of the deeply scientific and highly cultivated mind of the writer;* though in its perusal, one cannot help wondering at snybody being found willing to undertake so herculean a mental labour as such a multiplicity of subjects involves.

However, as we have before said, difficulties have attractions for enterprising minds; and although in worldly position it was very inferior to what Captain Fitz Roy's friends could have desired for him, and the salary small, + yet he entered gladly on its duties, which opened up so wide a field of usefulness for his talents. For upwards of ten years he laboured at the work of this office, organizing it, building it up step by step, guiding, directing and teaching others to enable them to assist in the work.

In the eleventh year he sank under this unceasing labour, which daily increased upon him. notwithstanding that he was ably seconded by the few in his office competent to assist him, the foremost of whom for ability and zeal is his successor. Henry Babington, Esq.

When a sufficient supply of data was accumulated, from which to deduce valuable information, many useful and accurate wind-charts were issued; likewise diagrams showing the course of storms, one of the most interesting of which is that of the "Royal Charter" gale. Various publications also emanated from this office, many of them of great interest to the scientific world; some of them compiled by him, and others his own original writing.

The first result of practical utility was the establishment of barometers on the coast, for the use of fishermen; these were supplied by the Board of Trade gratuitously, wherever the population was too poor to defray the expense. A small manual, in simple terms and bold type, written by Admiral Fitz Roy, was sent with the barometers, and proved of great use in assisting the fishermen to understand correctly the indications of that instrument.

In 1857, Captain Fitz Roy became Rear-Admiral on the Reserved List.

It was not till 1861 that he accomplished the object he had had at heart for many years, and to which he had been gradually working his way: the system of Storm Warnings, or warning signals of approaching dangerous gales. On February 20th, 1861, the first Storm Warning was issued-and before the stated limit of time the storm burst furiously on most of our shores, amply verifying the signals. The Storm Warnings gradually gained on the public confidence, and became at length of such general interest, that foreign nations eagerly resorted to Admiral Fitz Roy for information respect-

France, with her usual quickness of apprehension and readiness of adaptation, was the first to follow and adopt the signals.

The same system has since been established in Prussia, Italy, and Holland, and is in progress of adoption by Russia, both in the Black Sea and the Baltie. Occasional cautions are also sent from the Meteorologic Office to Hamburgh, Hanover, and Oldenburgh, at the request and at the expense of the Government of those states-likewise to Sweden, at the request and cost of the Gothenburg Chamber of Commerce. Cautions were sent to Denmarkbut the war there put a stop to the communications, which have not since been resumed.

These arrangements entailed an immense amount of correspondence on Admiral Fitz Roy, requiring much thoughtful consideration; and it was impossible for him to delegate this duty to another. Let it be borne in mind, too, that all this was extra work; the regular routine office duties were continued, and the objects for which the office was originally instituted were not neglected.

^{*} General Sabine, F.R.S., &c.

An increase was promised, which, however, was not made till 1863, eight years after the establishment of the office, though a gratuity of 200% was awarded by the Board of Trade to Captain Fitz Roy in 1861, in acknowledgment of his public services.

He met with much regard from foreigners; and at home, those who were really men of science looked on with interest and appreciation. Many who owned themselves ignorant of all science, applauded the honest zeal and energy displayed by Admiral Fitz Roy. Facts, of course, are the best tests of such a system; and it is to them we should turn for corroborative testimony. It is not our purpose to enter into a defence of the warning signals here; and the facts are all clearly stated in the reports issued from the Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade. We will merely mention that Admiral Fitz Roy never supposed they could be infallible. His object was to save life by diminishing disasters at sea; and by avoiding dangerous risks. He hoped others would aid in a scheme which had for its object such benefits to mankind, and that by their advice and co-operation a system which he knew was only in its infancy might be brought to perfection.

The signals continue to be eagerly sought for at those ports which have not already had them; and the fearful storms of last November bear witness to the veracity of their warnings, and refute one of the many objections urged against them-that with him their success would terminate, as meteorologic science was not sufficiently advanced to form a

In the winter of 1862 the "Weather Book" was published, which he began to write during a six weeks' autumn holiday. It was a rare thing for him to take a holiday, and even on this occasion it did not imply total absence from his duties. He was within easy reach of the office, going there and returning frequently the same day. This work was continued, and completed at his own residence on his return home, evening after evening, through successive nights. His overstrained mind never entirely recovered this pressure. The late work, destroying his night's rest, soon told its tale; and from that time he was totally unable to write in the evening, or even to read for a few minutes without falling asleep. In vain he struggled against this propensity, trying every possible means to overcome it, but without avail. A more serious inconvenience resulted also from this overstrained pressure on the brain-an increasing deafness, from which he had slightly suffered for many years past, especially when very much fatigued. He consulted aurists, but derived no benefit, and he began to dread lest he should become stone-deaf.

It is not generally known, perhaps, that the "Weather Book" has been translated into the French and Russian languages. Dell 1200

Admiral Fitz Roy had been elected, January,

1852, Member of the Athenæum Club, without ballot; he was a Fellow of the Royal Society, Royal Geographical Society, British Meteorological, Astronomical, and Ethnological Societies: honorary member of the York I'hilosophical Society; and, in 1863, he was elected, in the room of the late Sir John Ross, Corresponding Member of the Paris "Académie des Sciences," an honour he greatly prized. In July, 1863, the Belfast Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution at their general meeting expressive of satisfaction at the results of scientific research, and their practical application, as shown by the Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade. In October, 1864, the French Government presented Admiral Fitz Roy with a beautiful "Pendule de Voyage," accompanied by a gratifying letter from the "Ministre de la Marine," offering it as a "mark of gratitude for the services rendered by Admiral FitzRoy, and which he continues to render to the Imperial Navy."

Never was there a man more free from personal vanity or self-love. He was always more ready to blame himself, than to censure others. Strictly conscientious in principle, nothing would make him swerve from what he considered the path of duty. The public claims were his first consideration; he regarded the time during office-hours as that of the Government by whom he was employed, and not at his own disposal. So scrupulously did he carry out this principle, that, during that time, he carefully avoided all personal matters, writing his own private letters after five o'clock, before his return home.

He was the most devoted of husbands, the tenderest of fathers, and a very warm and true friend. It is but the plain truth to say that he would exert himself in a friend's cause far more eagerly and indefatigably than in his own. The interest he took in all that affected Captain Maury, for whom he felt real feelings of friendship, was unbounded. In the last week of his life, the news arrived of the murder of the President of the United States, and this seemed to absorb his whole being. Ill as he was, he could not rest without exerting himself beyond his strength to see Maury once more, and once again, notwithstanding medical injunctions to take rest. After his last interview, he was painfully excited, and could neither rest nor sleep. When urged to do so, his only reply was: "Think of poor Maury, without a home; his wife and children away, he knows not where." Everything failed to divert him from the sensation of horror that seemed to possess him at the ideas called up by the scenes he had pictured to himself.

Though too ill to attend regularly at his office latterly, he went there, for the last time (as it proved), to telegraph a reply to her Majesty respecting the weather when she was about to cross to the Isle of Wight. He was frequently honoured by such messages from her Majesty and other members of the royal family, a few days previous to their embarkation.

When advised to rest by those whom he cousulted, he asked how much longer he could work without risk. On being told that immediate rest was necessary, he replied, that when such and such letters were answered then he would rest. That time never came.

He had often said, that "he would rather wear out than rust out." To die unflinchingly working to the last with his hand on the helm, was his wish; and this was realized to the utmost.

To an earnest, thoughtful mind like his, religious subjects could not fail to be interesting. He reflected deeply, taking nothing for granted, till he had weighed and considered every point that admitted of such deliberation. When once convinced, nothing could shake or remove that conviction. He was not fond of expressing his opinions in ordinary conversation, feeling that such subjects were too serious for general discussion; but to a friend he would speak freely, and when he felt called on to stand up for the Truth, no fear of censure or ridicule could deter him from doing so openly.

The too lavish expenditure of money caused him continual embarrassment; but his own liberality was always exercised in acts of public generosity or private friendship; he never spent money in frivolous amusements. If he had had but one shilling left in the world, he would have given it away if touched by the cry of distress. He spent but little on himself—not caring for luxuries, and was remarkably temperate and abstemious. Naturally of a sanguine, buoyant temperament, he had no fears for the future, till his health gave way, when both mind and body had lost their wonted elasticity.

In conclusion, we quote the words of Admiral Stokes, who served with him in the "Beagle," and who thus mentions him in his work, entitled "Journal of Discoveries in Australia":- "Our success afforded me a welcome opportunity of testifying to Captain Fitz Roy my grateful recollections of his personal kindness; and I determined, with Captain Wickham's permission, to call this new river after his name, thus perpetuating by the most durable of monuments the services and the career of one, in whom with rare and enviable prodigality, are mingled the daring of the seaman, the accomplishments of the student, and the graces of the Christian-of whose calm fortitude in the hour of impending danger, or whose habitual carefulness for the interests of all under his command, if I forbear to speak, I am silent because, while I recognise their existence, and perceive how much they exalt the character they adorn, I feel, too, that they have elevated it above either the need or the reach of any eulogy within my power to offer."

EVASIONS OF THE LAW.

The machinery of the law in relation to crime is very great, and very costly. The judicial statistics for England and Wales (1863) inform us that the police and constabulary force are maintained at an annual cost of £1,658,265 14s. 5d. In that year there were known to the police 126,139 criminal people of various classes, and this fact shows that if the agencies for the arrest of crime are great, the evils to be dealt with are also great. In that year, 52,211 crimes were committed as known to the police, and to these many thousands of unreported crimes must also be added. In connection with these crimes, 30,410 persons were apprehended, of whom about 16,000 would be convicted, leaving more than 36,000 crimes undetected and unpunished.

The number of undetected and unpunished crimes naturally awakens one's anxiety to know how it is that so many criminals escape the hands of justice. The subject is well worth studying, and must be studied if the amount of crime is to be materially reduced. But as the question is too vast to be here discussed in all its ramifications, our inquiries must be limited to one particular department of crime—the habitual thieves and their coaljutors.

With such a costly apparatus at work throughout the country, it is matter of surprise that the thieves can hold their ground. Individual criminals are crushed by law or mortality, but the class itself is perpetuated from generation to generation. One general explanation of this perpetuity is, that the criminal intellect increases in skill and deepens in acuteness in proportion to the legal difficulties which are placed in the way of its success.

The thieves owe much of their success to themselves, and to the classes of people with whom they are connected. Sharpened by danger and by constant exercise, their guilty wits attain to extraordinary facilities for crime. The whole fraternity are in league to assist each other. The police report 22,710 houses of bad character scattered throughout the country, and, when the thief wishes to hide himself, very many of these branded domiciles are ready to conceal him.

Occasionally our courts of law reveal to us the fact that the thieves receive much assistance from those who are not fully given up to criminal pursuits. Servants and policemen have before now been found in secret alliance with thieves and robbers, to the no small astonishment of the innocent and unsuspecting public. These solitary instances of detected collusion are small chinks through which the outer world obtains a slight glimpse into the internal machinery of thiefdom. If these exceptional revelations could be fully traced, the discoveries would probably startle most people, inasmuch as these left-handed helps undoubtedly belong to a system of concealed assistance. Putting together the instances of criminal collusion on the part of quasi honest people which have been brought to light, one is driven to the conclusion that the thieves receive a large amount of assistance from those who do not belong to their class, and any statements which the criminal profession may choose to make on the subject cannot à priori be disbelieved. Such assistance is possible, because it is known to have been rendered; and a system of such assistance is probable, because the legally acknowledged instances of it are not a few.

Who, then, are the criminal helpers of the thieves, and in what way is the assistance rendered? None can answer these questions exhaustively except the thieves themselves, and some of them have been frank enough to give us their explanations. No one will for a moment accept everything as true which people who live by dishonesty may choose to say, and yet with the instances of criminal assistance which have been detected and punished in our recollection, it would be rash to conclude that there is no truth whatever in the following revelations of the thieves as to their evasions of the law. Let each reader believe as much or as little of their disclosures as his own judgment and his general acquaintance with the criminal question may incline him.

Several classes of people are involved in the thieves' accusations of collusion, and we shall at once proceed to explain what has been explained to us, interspersing the communications of the criminal fraternity with a few independent remarks.

The phrases "put up, putting up, and putters up," are of very frequent use among the thieves. They mean by these terms the assistance which they receive from persons supposed to be iunocent, and not directly connected with themselves. Cases of burglary and robbery from the person are often said to be "put up"; and if the thieves did not receive much private information and direction, these depredations would be far less numerous than they are. Servants, hotel-waiters, cabmen, workmen, and policemen occasionally tell the thieves where booty is to be had, and when is the best time to go for it. Should the "put-up job" succeed, the putter-up comes in for his share of the criminal spoil. It is the general opinion of thieves, or rather their statement to us, that the great majority of heavy robberies is always effected by the aid of a traitor in the camp, and that some of them could have been accomplished in no other way. But the reader will say, "Dare any servant, or would any servant, give information whereby his present or former master's property might be stolen? The thing is impossible." Not so fast with assertions of impossibility. How is it that the thieves so often know exactly where what they want is to be found? How could they immediately lay hands on the right thing or the right person if no one had directed them? It is evident, in many instances, that some one must have put the criminal on the scent. The following, published originally in an English newspaper, speaks for itself. "A well-known member of the swell-mob was recently arrested in London, and on searching his pockets there was found upon him a letter, among others, dated from * * *, near * * *, giving information that the family would very shortly be away, and describing the doors, the approaches, the various rooms, the ways in and out, the plate and its chests, and everything which could facilitate what is, in the police world, known as a 'put-up' burglary. Had it not been for this timely discovery, the town would some morning have been alarmed by a bold and successful exploit. The valuables would have been safely removed, and, after a nine days' wonder, the whole would have passed by, perhaps only leaving a suspicion on some of the outlying rangers of * * *. As it is, however, we were astonished at hearing that a detective and others of the police had come down and arrested no less a person than the butler of the above mansion, whose name was attached to this remarkable letter." Servants, either by their wickedness or by their ignorance, are said to be frequent putters up of robberies. By some means, accidental or otherwise, they come into contact with the criminal fraternity, give them the required information and assistance, and too often escape with impunity. In very large towns, the thieves positively profess to have servants in their pay, who take situations expressly for the purpose of betraying the house to the burglar. At any rate this shows the importance of caution in the hiring of servants, and the ridiculous culpability of those employers who are indifferent to written certificates of character.

A thief's accusation must go for what it is worth; but if the criminal classes are at all to be believed, the police are by no means universally clear in the matter; and if returns of all who have been dismissed from the police force—not excepting the detective department—were published, it would be seen that the accusation made by thieves of police assistance, is not entirely without foundation. If the police authorities deny it, let them publish their returns. A corrupt policeman can easily plant the thieves upon some house in his old beat, or be out of the way when a depredation is committed in his own immediate walk; and the thieves say that such things have been done, for which service the guilty officer took care to be well paid.

Pocket-picking is put up or connived at as well as house-breaking. The omnibus conductors are accused of conniving at the sharpers, and hotel waiters are blamed for occasionally planting a likely mark

Among the professional thieves there is said to be a remarkable class having the singular name of licensed thieves. These licensed rogues are said to be in the employment of the police, the detectives especially. Strange tales are told about them. It is said that a detective, anxious for fame and nothing scrupulous as to the means of its accomplishment, will perhaps see a wire busily employed at his nefarious trade of picking pockets in the streets. By chance the wretch does his work cleverly, and so the policeman embraces the opportunity of making his acquaintance. He frightens the thief by telling him what he has seen, and hints that he can bring so and so against him; but if he will render him some private assistance, he shall be let alone for the present. If the thief agrees, he thus gets his licence; and dearly he has to pay for it. When the policeman wants a case for the sessions or the assizes, the thief must work. By discovering and furnishing secret information, he puts the policeman upon the right track of obtaining information sufficient to get up a case. The more of this work the spy does, the more he has to perform, and the further he becomes involved. At length the licensed thief quarrels with his employer, or refuses to do his bidding. Then comes his own doom. His licence is taken from him, something is brought against him, and he is probably condemned to penal servitude for many years. We tell the following story as it was told to us. A robbery of plate had been committed; the suspicions of the police guided them to the delinquent, but they could obtain no clue by which to prove the charge they had against him. He was, however, apprehended, and thrust into the cell. Another thief, known to the police, was thrust into the same cell, with secret instructions to act the spy. The spy had not been long in the cell before he began to speak very bitterly of the police. because of what he alleged to be their bad usage of himself. Presently he took half-a-crown out of his boot, and thrust it into the fire, saying, "There; that evidence is gone." "What evidence?" said the suspected man. "That I am a maker of money," answered the spy, who proceeded to describe in glowing colours his lucrative method of manufacturing base coin. The two became very confidential, and the spy began to bewail his want of silver with which to continue his business when he obtained his liberty. The bait took. The suspected man confessed that he had some silver which he had stolen. They at once agreed to partnership, and the next morning they were both set at liberty. The spy was furnished, it is said, by the police, with moulds, &c., and he fixed the time with his new friend to commence the manufacture. They were soon at work. One evening while they were melting the plate, the police, as previously arranged, suddenly rushed in. The spy was allowed to escape, but the real thief was caught. The career of the spy did not last long. The police became tired of him, he was beginning to know too much, and it was necessary to get rid of him. For anything we know to the contrary this licensed thief is now undergoing penal servitude. To what extent this kind of service is rendered to the police can never be completely known, but sufficient is known to lower the popular estimate of the skill of the detectives. They do exceedingly little in the way of independent and individual intelligence. Compared with the great bulk of undetected crime the success of the detectives is significantly small. "In consequence of information received" is a convenient formula for the police, the full meaning of which is best known to themselves and their (sometimes criminal) assistants. The morality of setting a thief to catch a thief passes muster in the English force; but they do these things better in America. Mr. Pinkerton's system for the detective police in America is vastly superior to the British system. He sets no thief to catch a thief, but works by pure and honourable means, and keep his entire force of agent beyond the reach of the temptations which arise from rewards and unfair means.

"Working back" is another phrase peculiar to thiefdom. It means the private restoration of stolen property. For instance, when a thief has commenced taking a watch, or whatever it may be, and finds that he cannot complete what he has begun without being caught, he "whips it back," or "works it back," and so saves himself by saving appearances. But stolen goods that have been safely carried away, are sometimes worked back when a reward is offered. This kind of felony is occasionally concealed in advertisements which convey the significant hint that no questions will be asked. Many stolen things are "worked back," and many more would be so, if people would lend themselves to that kind of felony. Almost any stolen documents may be recovered if the business is gone about in the right way, that is, if the thief be a regular member of the criminal fraternity. When it is privately circulated through the criminal quarter that a reward will be given and no questions asked, the business soon commences if the reward be high enough. The advertiser receives a letter or a call, pays his money in advance, occasionally recovers his documents or goods, and sometimes he is duped, losing both his property and the reward which he offered for its return. We once heard the following remarkable story of working back. Some trust deeds were taken by burglars from a house a long way from London. A reward of more than £100 was offered for their return. In about three months after the robbery the gentleman concerned for the restoration of the legal documents received a communication from London, in which he was told that the deeds might be restored if he would act honourably. The necessary pledge was given, and the time and place of meeting appointed. The gentleman was strictly enjoined to come alone; he would be well watched, and if anyone was seen with him, the worker back would not show himself at the place of meeting. So the gentleman went alone to London, on a Saturday, and stood in Hyde Park at the appointed place of meeting. After a while a carriage drove up, a person stepped out of it-this was the worker back. After some conversation the gentleman was informed that he could actual and direct discovery by means of their own not be put into possession of the documents until Monday. The time and place of meeting was again appointed, and the gentleman was required not to leave London in the meantime. He did, however, leave London, went home, and returned to the place of rendezvous on Monday at the time agreed upon. When the worker back came up, he at once charged the gentleman with a breach of faith, told him by what train he left London, where he went on the Sunday, and described the person who accompanied him to the railway station on the Monday morning. The gentleman urged that he had committed no breach of faith, and that it was only the necessities of business which compelled him to go home. They then got into a conveyance, and drove from the Park into one of the low parts of London. After traversing many back streets 'the passengers alighted, dismissed the conveyance, and went through several low streets on foot. They wandered on through dark passages, up one staircase and down another, until they came to a small back yard, and here the business was done. A small shutter was opened, and a hand held out the deeds. The gentleman saw that these were the identical documents he was in quest of. He passed the reward through the little window. The deeds were given to him, and he was requested to examine them in order that he might satisfy himself that he had not been deceived. ' He found that he had been honourably dealt with, and now the return journey commenced. He followed the footsteps of his guide through many a dark passage, and many a dreary street. They approached one of the leading thoroughfares and the guide suddenly vanished.

Suppose a thief has been justly apprehended, and is safely lodged in the police cell: are his evasions of the law then at an end? One would think so; but the thief says they are not. He professes to find a ready and efficient friend in the corrupt policeman. The charge-sheet lies upon the table, and the policeman finds in the list the name of an old friend. Then to business. Information is conveyed to the criminal's friends. They are perhaps instructed to tamper with the accuser, who is assured that the property shall be restored, in result of which the charge may be withdrawn. Or perhaps the line of defence is planned, and false witnesses are called. And here it may be said, that in close connection with the thieves there is a class of people who will swear to anything, if they are paid for it; "suborned witnesses," if a New Testament phrase may be used in such a connection. Low public-houses, where the magsmen take their victims, and lewd women drug the drink and fleece the purse of their hapless prey, are said to receive not a little assistance from the police; so that, in addition to the curse of drunkenness, these licensed pandemoniums are frequently dens of knavery. A man, let us suppose, has been cheated and robbed of everything, and, stung to madness, he rushes into the street for a policeman. But it may happen that the policeman on this beat knows the houses well, and has received many a bribe at their hands; so he "bounces" the maddened victim as well as he knows how, probably telling the plundered wretch that he has been where he ought not to have been, and advising him to go quietly home and say nothing about it, lest he should bring disgrace upon himself and his friends by a public exposure. So the victim sneaks home, and the corrupt policeman repairs to the criminal house, and refreshes his polluted throat with the bribing beer. He has smoothed away a disturbance, and must be rewarded with a share of the spoils. One is compelled to believe that public-houses are frequently no better than a den of thieves, and that the keepers of them frequently break the law by the connivance of those who ought to know better. Some time ago the following paragraph appeared in one of the provincial papers, headed "CRIME IN LARGE TOWNS .--, the late chief constable of ---, has written a letter to a gentleman in that town, in answer to inquiries as to the chief cause of crime in -, and the ability of a watch committee to repress it. As to the first point, Mr. - says, that drink is at the root of nearly all crime, and he complains that at present it is not fairly grappled with. As to the second, he says :- 'Shortly after I was appointed at -, a member of the watch committee (not now in the council) called upon me with a list, in writing, of four public-houses which were his property, and promised that, if I laid no informations against them, himself and friends would support me in the committee. He gave a similar list to the inspector next in command under me. These four were among the very worst-conducted houses in the town."

The marine-store dealers continue to evade the law as cleverly as most folks. After a long runlet us suppose a case-in the criminal purchase of criminal goods, the marine-store dealer attracts to himself the suspicions of the police. The suspected party soon feels that he must do something to avert suspicion and to prevent unpleasantness. He therefore saves himself by giving information to the police concerning some one who has brought what he believes to be stolen goods to his shop. But who and what are the parties against whom he informs? The thickes say that the marine-store dealer never informs against any one who really serves him well by cleverly bringing plenty of valuable goods. He informs only of those whose custom is so small as to make it worthless. Facts seem to bear this out, for, as far as we know, the marine-store dealers never do give information when anything very valuable is at stake.

There is a peculiar class closely allied with the regular thieves, whom we may call the better educated class. Scholars, clever people, and clerks, who have lost their character. These draw up briefs, write letters, and make sham invoices, by means of which the travelling thief passes himself off for what he is not.

The public press renders immense service to the country in reference to crime, but the press is used for evil as well as for good. Every morning the regular thief reads the police reports. Not unfrequently he has been an active agent in the crimes reported, and from these reports he draws his own conclusions as to what he must do to secure his own safety. The police Hue and Cry is not always perused by official eyes alone. Many of the thieves declare that they can see it as often as they please, and they go so far as to say that all the leading fence-masters, or receivers of stolen goods, read the Police Gazette regularly every week. The Hue and Cry contains detailed descriptions of supposed guilty parties, of missing or stolen property, and from these minute descriptions, the receivers of stolen goods and the thieves know whether or not the law is on the right scent, whether the chase is hot, or whether the pursuit will soon be given up. Thus they know whether to hide, to keep quiet, or to

The public mind has been frequently agitated in reference to ticket-of-leave men, and although it is not the province of this article to take up that subject at large, we may glance at it in its relation to evasions of the law. The loose manner in which the ticket-of-leave system was formerly administered, enabled numbers of returned convicts to plunder the public. This shameful state of things was chiefly owing to the fact that the ticket-ofleave men were not obliged to put in an appearance anywhere, nor were they compelled to report themselves to any one who had power to prevent the abuse of their conditional freedom. But the success with which these criminals evaded the law was also achieved by their own ingenuity. To say nothing of their clever selection of new and distant localities as the scene of their depredations. or of the assistance which they received from uncaught thieves, we may confine ourselves to one ingenious triek. Most of the regular thieves have their arms tatooed, sailor fashion, and these marks are carefully noted by the police and the prison authorities. The first thing, therefore, that the ticket-of-leave man did after coming out of prison was to get his arm marks altered. A wine-glass was turned into a sand hour-glass, or an auchor was transformed into a shield with quarterings. So he expected to escape, and sometimes did, because his arm marks failed to correspond with the evidence for identity. It was absolutely necessary that the ticket-of-leave man should regularly report himself to some appointed officer, in order that his manner of life might be truly known. So far the principle of the new regulation is wise and just, but to whom the ticket-of-leave man should report himself is another and a very different question. To make these criminals report themselves to the police is, in our judgment, a mistake. No man who has ever undergone penal servitude-whether he be a regular thief or only an exceptional offender-has any confidence in the police. The gentlemen in blue are execrated and mistrusted by the whole criminal fraternity, and at this fact, in the light of the foregoing revelations, no one need be surprised. Whether we believe the thieves' accusations or not, the thieves themselves do certainly believe them. Such, then, being the state of feeling between the two parties, it would be very extraordinary if the police inspection worked well. In addition to the prejudices and accusations which the thieves hold against the police, the inspection is not consistent with the proper functions of the police. A policeman's office and interests are vitally bound up in the detection of rogues, rather than in making men honest. How can any man successfully unite these two functions. without sacrificing the one to the other. If the ticket-of-leave man goes on quietly and honestly. as many of them do, the policeman gains neither emolument nor fame, but loses both; whereas, if by any means he can fall foul of the ticket-of-leave man he is lauded in the newspapers, and is soon promoted by the watch committee. Thus destruction to the ticket-of-leave man means salvation for the policeman. Many ticket-of-leave men never were regular thieves, and most of these, together with a few who have been criminal from their infancy, are anxious to bury the past, and strive their uttermost to earn an honest living. But the officious taunts of an ignorant and swaggering policeman will not help them very much. Not long ago a theft was committed in a manufactory. A detective was sent for, but he could make no discovery. Still he must earn professional honour of some sort in the case, and so he singled out about a dozen ticket-of-leave men who were steadily earning an honest living in that factory; and these poor fellows were at once dismissed, although from the arrangements of the factory, it was morally impossible that they could have had anything to do with theft. So this showy detective was eulogised, and the struggling ticket-ofleave men, against whom nothing was proved, were driven out into the open world, to beg, to starve, or to steal. So much for officious police interference. It would have been much better if the new regulations had required the ticket-of-leave men to report themselves to the Poor-law officers once a fortnight, instead of being obliged to report themselves to their natural enemies, the police, once a month.

The following case of distress resulting from police interference with a reformed thicf may be taken as a specimen of many such cases which must be well known to those whose official or philauthropic labours have brought them into contact with reformed criminals. During a two years' imprisonment a thief was brought to a better state of mind. He resolved to lead an honest life, and on his release from prison he sought and obtained employment. He got on well, and soon exchanged his first situation for a second with better wages. He formed an acquaintance with a respectable and prudent girl, whom he married. About six months after his marriage, the police got to know that he had "squared up," and was doing well. One night the reformed thief met a policeman whom he had known when he was leading a criminal life. The policeman asked him to do some "nasty work" for him, but the quondam thief promptly refused, saying that he was now leading an honest life, and meant to stick to it. This made the policeman angry, and he took a cruel revenge. The employer of the reformed thief was warned and prejudiced by the police, and the poor fellow was dismissed from his situation. The man knew not what to do: he had not the means of removing from the town. and could get no work where he was. In despair, and wanting the common necessaries of life, the poor fellow fell back to crime. When he was tried at the sessions his last employer was sent for, who gave him an excellent character, and said that he had nothing whatever against him. He was dismissed solely through the influence of the police. The man got two years' imprisonment, and of course from that hour all hopes of his reformation were at an end. His wife and child must have starved but for the kindness of her parents.

Some of the statements in this paper will surprise the reader, but he must pause before he rejects everything which the thieves say upon the subject of evasions of the law. So many thousands could never live by crime unless they had some strange means of escaping instice, and upon this aspect of the subject it is high time that the public should be enlightened. As far as the writer knows, or can ascertain, there is scarcely a prison chaplain, a governor of a reformatory, or a manager of a prison, who has not heard, again and again, from the criminal classes themselves the substance of the revelations contained in this article, and what everybody so positively affirms should certainly be well considered. The manuscript of this article was submitted to a police authority of considerable experience. After he had read it, the writer asked him "Is it all true?" and the answer was "No doubt of it."

HENRY W. HOLLAND.

A REMEMBRANCE.

OTHER thoughts have parted me From thy tender memory; Spaces, like a cloudy sea, Lie between my life and thee.

Buried sunsets heave and glow Where I would, but cannot, go; Purple storm and golden veil Make the lovely distance pale.

O! I want, across the cloud Once to hear thee speak aloud! Not with those faint calls that seem But a summons from a dream.

Not with those faint calls that fleet Daily past me in the street, Ceasing but to sound again While I turn my head in vain.

One vast moment, to content Hunger of my banishment! One strong clasp, and then I know I could bear to let thee go!

"WALKING WORTHY OF GOD."

BY THE EDITOR.

"That ve would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory."-1 Thess, ii. 12.

EACH of us, as he reads these words, should consider whether his faith has been more defective with reference to the truth here revealed, or his practice with reference to the life here enjoined. Where is our faith in the fact that the living God has "called us to His kingdom and glory?" Who of us firmly believes it? If so, where is our gratitude and joy; or, rather, where is our life as a necessary consequence of such Would that the truth of God could be brought out of the shadowy dream-land in which, to our dim eyes, it is apt to dwell, and that it became to us as real as any of those things which so powerfully rivet our attention, fill our thoughts, and stimulate our labours! For what a great change would it work in man, if God were to him as real a person as any of his neighboursthat His kingdom and glory were as palpable a reality as the money, to gain which he fights every day, to lose which he fears every hour, and to forget which is impossible for a single moment. Could we but attach the importance to this "kingdom and glory" which we do to the rise or fall of the money-market, to the question of war or of peace, to the expectation of a time of health or of sickness, then would there be such a true "revival" among us as would make us "walk more worthy of God" all the days of our pilgrimage, until we "dwelt in the house of the Lord for ever!"

Consider first of all the kingdom and glory to which God has called us. But to what kingdom? Is it His material kingdom only? Is it to possess its beauty by beholding and enjoying it, as revealed in world on world, for ever? Is it to possess its riches and to gather up its gold and jewels where and when we please? Is it to possess the power which everywhere so subtly works, and to exercise it in moulding worlds into beauty, or rearing in them palaces and homes of grandeur, such as the earth in its scenes of greatest magnificence never possessed? This indeed might seem a grand destiny, to have dominion over worlds, and these paradises of joy given to us for ever. Were such a kingdom as this a fit expression of God's bounty, He could assign it to us as readily as He does the cup of cold water to the lips of a parched saint! But if we knew what is really implied in possessing God's kingdom, we would smile in pity at those who preferred the material creation of God to it, just as the matured Christian would smile at the memory of his childish days when he preferred a toy to his Creator.

the only living and true God, or, in other words, to love God. It is impossible indeed for Him, who is infinitely wise, and infinitely powerful, to give us any inheritance greater than this. It was Christ's possession throughout eternal ages before the world was, or any created thing existed; and it is His chief possession now. It is the possession of angels and of saints. What sights, think you, have the mighty angels seen since they came into being! What have they enjoyed from the riches of creationfrom the intellect, from the affections, from society, and from labour! Yet, nevertheless, their kingdom and glory is in knowing and loving God. And it is thus, too, with those who once lived here, and, like children, chased bubbles as we do, and pursued shadows, and had their foolish and their sinful dreams, and who bought and sold, planted and builded, and were made glad by successful speculation in merchandise or made sad by failure, and who sometimes thought lightly enough of God's kingdom, yet who sincerely held fast their faith in God in darkness and their love to Him in weakness. These died and were buried and are forgotten, and the world goes on as it did when they were in it. But they now understand somewhat better what is meant by God's kingdom; and could they speak to us, we know not whether they would do so with holy indignation at our unbelief, or with pity at our folly, remembering their own, or with words of yearning love to awaken us from our sleep. One thing, however, they would tell us-that in the universe they had found but one kingdom in all, through all, and above all, the perfect love of the loving God. And if they once more prayed on earth, it would be to intercede with God in our behalf that their own richest possession might also become ours.

I should like to dwell for a short time on the thought of this kingdom. The idea of possession or inheritance belongs to a kingdom; hence such expressions as these :- "Thou hast made us kings :" "We are heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ:" "All things are ours:" "He that overcometh shall inherit all things." And if it is so, what would we reckon to be the greatest of all possessions, of all that exists or that can be possessed? God or the creature—God or the things which He has made? And if there is but one reply to this question, then consider further how we can possess God. Not surely by the senses, nor through the intellect or the understanding; but by the spirit, the heart, the knowledge, which is love. And this is the greatest possession, the richest inheritance possible for us. This is the "kingdom of God which is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." The greatest kingdom we can possess is to know same truth is expressed when it is said "that we are priests unto God;" for priestly sacrifice is the sacrifice of self, or in other words, the reign of love over self. Hence again, it is said, "if sons then heirs:" for the son is an heir, because he possesses his Father in love, and so is a fellow-heir with Jesus Christ at once the Son and Brother. When therefore God calls us "unto His kingdom," He calls us to possess Himself.

But it may be asked—what of other persons, and things? Shall we be poor in these? I reply that we possess all persons and all things when we possess God.

For example, we thus possess ourselves. There is such a thing as losing oneself, or being cast away: but we lose ourselves, lose self-possession, self-government, self-respect, when we lose our God. And it is only when we find Him that we find ourselves, and when we come to Him that we come to ourselves, and when we love Him that we can truly love ourselves; for then, but not till then, we are to ourselves, what we are to our God, very dear and precious. And thus it was said of the prodigal when he arose and went to his father: "My son was lost but now is found."

Then as to the possession of our brethren, it is sufficiently evident that if as sous we possess God our Father, so must we possess as our brethren all who are His sons. This union and sympathy of soul, by which we can use the language "I am thine and thou art mine," is based upon eternal rightcousness, and grounded ou the love which is of God aud in God. Hence the possession by Jesus of the perfect love of His whole redeemed Church as His brethren, is, next to the possession of the love of His Father, His most glorious inheritance, and is described as "the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints."

And what, again, it may be asked, of our possession of things? What of the material kingdom of God, for example, with its magnificent scenery, its rich melodies, and its noble works? What of the possession by the eye and car of all that can be seen or heard within its ample borders? What of the grander possession by the intellect, in the gathering of truth for ever from the finite and Infinite, from the unchangeable and variable, from the seen and unseen, from the laws of the Creator, and from the things created? "All things are ours, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are ours." What the universe of glory and of beauty is to God, it must be to us, in so far as creatures renewed after the image of God, and made like to Him in Jesus Christ, can possess and enjoy all things with the Creator. If he rejoices in His works so will we. That which is true, and good, and beautiful to Him, will be so to us. His kingdom will come into us, or we into it, when we come to Himself, the King. Now this is also "glory:" and no higher glory can the creature attain to. is the perfection of the creature's being. "The glory thou hast given me, I have given them, that they may be one even as we are one," one in love, and therefore one in blessedness and joy. Christ in us is the hope of glory.

We can very feebly apprehend all this. It is easy to repeat the words, but O, how difficult to attach a real, or adequate meaning to that which they express! Yet the saints in Heaven comprehend what we so feebly but apprehend. There is not one in Heaven, let him while on earth have been called statesman, philosopher, warrior, man of science, or sovereign, to whom every idea of what is glorious and worthy of admiration, is not absorbed in this love to God, and to all who are like Him, as the very glory of the universe.

But this kingdom and glory are not to be enjoyed hereafter only, for they are shared in kind, though not in degree, now. We can say even here, "Bekold now are we the sons of God!" "We are partakers of the glory which shall be revealed." And again, "Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Cousider, further, that God hath "called us to His kingdom and glory."

The ground of this call is His own character. He is perfection, and therefore desires perfection in all his creatures, which alone can fully meet His wishes. Material perfection is the immediate result of His will, and consequently all things are made very good, and indeed with reference to the ends which they are intended to serve, they could not be better. The starry heavens are perfect in their mechanism; the whole earth is full of His glory. But it is not so with man, because man is not a thing but a person, and his choice is an essential element in forming his character.

Now God calls him to choose this perfection, and presents every motive, and is willing to bestow upon him every power essential to the discharge of his responsibility, and to the realisation by him of the end of his being, which is to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever.

Aud in how many ways does He call us to His kingdom and glory! From the addresses of St. Paul to the heathen even, we are taught how His call is issued to those prodigal children, who are furthest from Him. The Apostle told the heathen Grecks, who worshipped in ignorance an unknown god, that the living and true God had, by even the arrangements of His providence, called them to "seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him." Though He was not far from any one of them :- "He told them that He had determined the bounds of their habitation" for this purpose-a doctrine which might be applied to their inner life, as well as to their outer condition, in so far as they were conscious of an ideal of glory, which had its "bounds" in the actual and could never be realised except in God, and which therefore led to Him. He told the heathen Romans, that if they did not from visible things discover the invisible, and so perceive God's eternal power and Godhead, and from their own moral being see His reflected, though as in a glass darkly, it was their own fault, "because they did not like to retain Him in their knowledge." He told the heathen Asiatics, that God had never "left himself without a witness, in that he did good, and gave them rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with joy and gladness."

But we have not to fall back upon such calls from afar-echoes, so to speak, of that Divine voice which is addressing us; for the call of God has come to us clear and distinct from Heaven, repeated and repeated in so many forms, that its sound fills the earth and sky. This call, interpreted by the Gospels, is expressed indeed in every instance of mercy that speaks of One who has "good will to men;" in every play of the affections that points to a love deeper and fuller than the heart of the creature can afford; in every loving parent who attracts the heart to the Father in Heaven; in every brother who attracts to Him who is the Brother; in every friendship which is but a sign of a higher friendship, satisfying, purifying, and enduring; ay, even in every agony or sense of emptiness experienced by the lonely and selfish spirit, which is designed to drive us, as by a strong wind, from the stormy sea into a harbour and a home where the heart can find rest. All these and many more voices from the Eternal Throne are saying to us, had we only an inner ear to listen to them, "Come to me." But these are almost lost in the one mighty voice of the Living Word-Jesus Christ-who has come to call us to His own kingdom and glory. O, mighty call, loud as a hallelujah of love which might surge through the universe in waves of joy, and beat upon the listening ear of distant worlds; yet a melody so low and soft that a child can hear it without fear, and lift up its eyes in peace to God and say-"My Father in Heaven!"

Jesus Christ the Son of God, who dwelt in the bosom of His Father from all eternity, has come from God and has been made flesh and has dwelt amongst us, to reveal in His own person what the kingdom is, and how it is to be obtained and possessed. By His life and death, summed up in His great atoning sacrifice, He has received, as His greatest reward, the joy of calling sinners unto the kingdom, and many sons and daughters unto God; and hence His prayer—"Glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee: as thou hast given Him power over all flesh to give eternal life to as many as thou hast given Him: and this is life eternal, that they might know thee, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

Jesus Christ, "who was dead and is alive, liveth for evermore," to accomplish his divine work. All power is given to Him as king, that He might make us heirs of His own kingdom, and that, as kings, we might in the end reign with Rim for ever. All that Christ said and did, as embodied in the Gospel, is God's call to a lost world to receive the kingdom. And when Jesus left the world, in His love and wisdom He made arrangements for keeping that call alive, so that His word should never die. He willed that the call should be embodied in an imperishable record, which should be spread before the eyes of men, and read and reread until it was transferred to the mind and memory, as "with a pen upon the rock for ever;" and He ordained that it should be spoken aloud in the ears of men by ambassadors from God, who were to speak as "though God did beseech" by them and "as in Christ's stead." He has, moreover, so arranged matters in His Divine providence, and according to the will of His Father, that the first day of every week should be consecrated to the special advancement of His kingdom, when the messengers of the Gospel should preach the message of love, and His people meet to hear it, and to praise God for it, and to pray that His kingdom might come more and more into their hearts, and to labour that others should be brought into it. He has directed all who share the blessings of the kingdom to send the message of love and mercy to every land, and to say to every human being-"The God who made you, who spread those heavens over your head, who has formed this palace of earth for your comfort, who has given you every blessingthis God has made you for good and not for evil, for love and peace and not for hate and misery; and He has sent His Son to seek and save you by His death and life, and He now calls you to turn from dumb idols to worship the living God, and to bring you out of the kingdom of darkness into the marvellous light of the kingdom of His dear

The King has also instituted sacraments, each testifying to love on the part of God. By one, children even are baptised on their entrance into the world, in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost-God thus claiming them as His own, as having been created to become children to Him the Father, by Jesus Christ the Son, through the Spirit the Sanctifier, and thus to be made heirs of the kingdom; and He charges parents and the Church to accept of these young heirs, and so to instruct them and train them up as that they shall in the end obtain the inheritance. Moreover, He spreads before His people a social meal, inviting them to partake of it in memory of His death for the redemption of transgressors, that "they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." That Hely Supper is a constant witness to a communion with God in Christ, and with His people, and of a kingdom and glory whose meat and drink and whose bond of fellowship is love. It is also a foreshadowing of the time when His people shall inherit the kingdom prepared for them before the foundation of the world, and eat and drink at His table in His kingdom when He comes again. "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father," that "God may be all in all." Nay more: God scals these outward calls by

His own Spirit, who, in ways and by means unknown to us, worketh in the spirit of man, knocking at the door of man's intellect, conscience, and affections, addressing him through every avenue to his will, to quicken him, persuade him, and strengthen him to obey the call of God. "The Spirit says, Come." His work is to glorify the Son in us, that we, through Him, may glorify God and share His kingdom and glory.

And now let us consider what our duty is with reference to this call of God. It is that we "walk worthy of God, who hath called us to His kingdom and glory."

This command is more directly applicable to those who have heard ar I obeyed the call. But seeing that the call is, in reed, to every man, since "God willeth not that any shoul perish, but that all should come to repentance," His ambassadors as fellow-workers with Him are to be eech all whom they address Lot to "receive the grace of God in vain," but "to be reconciled to God." When any one hears the call for the first time, what a moment in his history is that! He hears the good news that his God and Father is calling him through Jesus Christ to inherit all things, by simple faith in the righteousness of his Redeemer - a faith which cannot exist without working by love. In these circumstances, would he not be bound by every consideration that could affect a responsible being "to walk," at least, worthy of this call; and upon the mere chance that it might be true? Assume the possibility that there is no such kingdom-that it is a vaiu imagination and presumption; and let it merely be granted that what all the Christian Church for eighteen centuries has believed and rejoiced in may be true—that it is not impossible that even they themselves may be, as most certainly in the belief of every Christian they ought to be, partakers in some degree of its blessings now, and perfectly hereafter; -then, surely, this would be sufficient to condemn a man as wanting in all principle, all reverence for God, and as being unaffected by even the most prudential considerations, if he is not roused to thoughtfulness or even earnest inquiry. Does he not deserve to remain a beggar, if he despises even to inquire after the inheritance and the kingly crown which are thus offered to him? An honest seeking, a calm attention, a reverential thoughtfulness, are morally required of them, even should they believe nothing more than that what Christ and His apostles taught, what the Christian Church has believed, and what millions of the truest and best on earth have enjoyed, may be true, and may also be theirs. Let them begin at this startingpoint, and, if sincere, they will by God's help run the race, and in the end reach the goal, and possess the inheritance. "Unless ye become as little children ye cannot enter the kingdom of God." But let those who hear the call and refuse to pay attention to it, -let them turn away the shoulder and reject all God's counsels, and "not regard" Him, even when He stretches forth His hand, saying, "Turn ye at my reproof: I will pour my Spirit upon you,"—then, verily, the kingdom will never be theirs, and the ground of their condemnation will be this: "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; ye set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof." It was for this the slothful servant was condemned,—not merely because he did not his Lord's work, but because he "prepared not himself" to do it.

But how can those who have obeyed the call walk worthy of God?

To walk worthy of God! Weigh these words well, and say if they do not seem to extinguish rather than to kindle hope in our hearts? Methinks the highest seraph before the throne, or the first of heaven's hierarchy, might shrink at the thought of even attempting to walk worthy of God, so mysterious in His Eternal Being, so magnificent in His endless creations and contrivances, so perfect in His adorable character, so unfathomable in the depth of His wisdom, so incomprehensible in the fulness of His love! Such an attempt might seem an effort bordering upon the sinful ambition which made the angels fall. Nevertheless it is proposed to us. It is we who have never walked worthy of our own feeble convictions or beliefs for a single hour, -who have walked so often and so long in harmony with all that was vain, paltry, and worthless; we who have been contented with husks and proud of our rags-who have been poor and needy and in want of all things, yet in our ignorance and folly have said, "We have need of nothing;"-it is we who are called to walk worthy of God! And how can it be done? Before the attempt is hopefully, and therefore earnestly made, we must have some true idea how a man in this present world would walk, if he walked worthy of God. And what picture would our imagination be likely to draw of such a one? How would we represent our ideal man? It is possible that we would picture to ourselves a being with a noble, world-awing aspect, such as the old poets ascribed to their hero-gods. We might surround him with such signs of power and magnificence as would express the diguity of a person called to act so distinguished a part upon the earth, and give him a visible kingdom, a throne of resplendent glory, the sceptre of widespread dominion, the possession of a gorgeous palace encircled by glittering hosts obedient to his will. We might assign to him also what is called glory-the glory of genius in every form, of the poet, the philosopher, the orator, the man of science, the wise legislator, the irresistible commander, and the supreme ruler of the earth. And such a man we might possibly imagine would adequatery realise, as far as man could do, the idea of a being who was Godlike. If this, or anything the least like it, can be accepted as a representation of one walking worthy of God, no Gospel verily could be preached to the poor, nor indeed to any of us!

But let us turn from the foolish picture which might be fashioned by man's fancy, and look at a very different one-not a fiction, but a reality-not what might be, but what actually was-and see the Godlike in the Godly. Come, see a man who, indeed, walked worthy of God! But where shall we find him? Not in a palace, but in a lowly home-not in the abode of an earthly monarch, but of a common artisan. He was not a rich man, but one who had no place where to lay His head-one who was not honoured by men, but was despised and rejected. He was Jesus of Nazareth! About Him there was no outward visible grandeur, but lowliest birth and humblest upbringing, with most ordinary labour for many a year, and the endurance of the heaviest sorrows. No regal pomp attended His walks across the fields of Palestine. A few poor fishermen and pious friends alone were with Him. Yet this man was a King, heir of a King, sent by a King, the Founder of a Kingdom that cannot be moved, and the Lord of Glory. He possessed a power which is even yet subduing the earth; not such power as shattered the rocks of Horeb, or made the hurricane roar through its giant peaks, but power which, like the sun and dew, causes verdure to cover the earth and fills it with mellow fruitfulness and food for man. His was the power of the still small voice of truth which, when it entered the heart, subdued it and possessed it with irresistible might for ever. He had, indeed, a glory before which that of all earthly thrones pales; but it was not that belonging to material things, which cannot be ours, but that of character, which may be ours—the splendour of humility and meekness, the beauty of purity and holiness, the magnificence of self-sacrifice and self-denial: in one word, the glory of perfect love. His majesty shone amidst the lowly hills when prostrate before God in silent prayer; or in rural villages when He wept tears of sympathy with Martha and with Mary; or in words and works of mercy, as when he said, "Go in peace; thy sins are forgiven thee;" "Thy faith hath made thee whole." His kingly march of triumph was going about doing good; His spoils of victory, captives freed from the power of evil; His conquests, human hearts. Never did such a true King tread the earth, although His crown was thorns, His sceptre a reed of mockery, His festal cup a cup of sorrow, His anointing drops of blood. His throug a cross, His death among thieves, and His grave a gift of charity. And there never trod the earth one who walked so worthy of God; because in life and death He did the will of His Father, and at all times perfectly loved God and man. As a son and brother He loved. He loved the Father with heart, soul, and strength, and His neighbour as Himself; and God said of Him, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

It is thus that, when we contemplate the life of Jesus, we see what it is to "walk worthy of God." We understand how neither genius, nor rank, nor riches, nor anything which we cannot grasp, are necessary to constitute such worth as this; but that all which is necessary is within the reach of all who believe in Jesus, and receive His spirit; that no human being is excluded by God from the possession of His kingdom, which is for the cottage as well as for the palace, and is suited for Lazarus in his rags as well as for Abraham in the bosom of Godfor Martha serving or for Mary listening-for the Magdalen in tears or for the Virgin-mother rejoicing-for Peter fishing on the lake or opening the door to Jew and Gentile-for Nicodemus in the council or for Cornelius in the army-for the children in the temple or for the priests at the altar -for all men, for all nations, for every kindred and tongue, Greek and Barbarian, boud and free. To nothing higher does God call the augel Gabriel than to perfect love; to nothing lower the blind beggar. It is the inheritance and glory of Christ-the inheritance and glory of Christians.

And where is the man to be found among us who walks worthy of God? "The Lord knoweth them that are His." And when He who judgeth not as man judgeth, who searches the heart and tries the reins of the children of men, sees any true love in the heart, however weak, emanating from His own love as seen in the cross, and imparted by His Spirit, -and when, with His own infinite charity, he sees in the lives of men deeds of self-sacrifice performed out of love, sees even a cup [of cold water given for Christ's sake, sees forbearance and gentleness manifested towards others, and a readiness to cover with a mantle of charity a brother's sins, sees a perfect peace amidst adversity, sees a careful and conscientious discharge of daily duty in the unknown walks of life,—there He beholds one walking worthy of Himself; for this love is the spirit of obedience, the bond of peace, the root of humility, the light of heaven and earth.

"I therefore beseech you to walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love." "Be followers of God as dear children; and walk in love as Christ also hath loved us and given Himself for us." So be it.

BETWEEN THE SHOWERS.

Down it came—the summer shower—Bursting from the nimbus cloud;
Spending its impetuous power
On the great tree, strong and proud.
And the great tree murmur'd loud
As it caught the summer shower—
Turn'd it to a diamond dower.
When the cloud, its passion spent,
Broke and drifted, pale and rent,
Like a king refresh'd with wine,
Shone the tree. O heart of mine!
Pass through passion's frequent stress
With a like strong steadfastness.

Down it came—the summer shower—Rushing through the sobbing air; Beating on the lily-flower,
Till she trembled in despair
For her blossom, white and fair.
But in silence bent the flower,
Yielding perfume through the hour,

Till the sunbeams came and shed A new glory on her head,
On her robes, more dazzling white,
And her crown more golden bright.
Thus—my heart!—is patience tried,
Thus is meekness glorified.

Down it came—the summer rain—
Dashing through the darken'd sky,
On the green and tender grain;
Which received it with a sigh,
Quiver'd in each blade, and nigh
Bow'd unto the earth with grief.
But a whisper of the sheaf
Raised its head, and so it stood,
Swelling into bounteous food;
And ere yet the rain was o'er Glist'ning gladder than before.
Thus—my heart!—may dire distress
But increase thy fruitfulness.

CHAPTER I .- THE GENERAL SHOP.

ABOUT three miles from the Cathedral city of X- stands the Claydon turnpike gate, round which are clustered a number of cottages almost sufficiently numerous to merit the name of village. The most conspicuous of these, after the little roadside inn, is the dwelling of Mr. Thomas Carter, the proprietor of a highly respectable general shop. Mr. Carter was a married man, and his wife-a tall, honest, shrewd woman, about forty years of age-was a person of very industrious and cleanly habits, but somewhat infirm of temper. In the shop Mr. Carter employed an errand boy named Giles - a big, raw-boned, lazy shopboy, about sixteen years of age; and Mrs. Carter had under her special command a little girl about fourteen years of age, parents unknown, who had been obtained from the union workhouse. It was this damsel's duty to assist in making the beds and to take charge of the kitchen fire, when her mistress, in consequence of the master's absence from home, stress of customers, or other causes, was occupied

Mr. Carter himself was an active, bustling man of business, about fifty years of age. Although the amount of capital he employed was far from being large, the articles he dealt in were very numerous. As an ill-painted board over the shop-door indicated, he was licensed to deal in tea, coffee, tobacco, and snuff. Besides these, he sold Bath bricks, lucifers.

treacle, soap, small beer, and candles. Butter and bacon were also to be found in his shop in considerable quantities. To these were added pins, needles, balls of cotton all the colours of the rainbow, barley-sugar, spices, and a hundred other things too various to describe. Besides the onerous duties of general shopkeeper, he was also postmaster of the district, as might be seen by a letterbox being inserted in an opaque pane in the shop window. He was much respected by his customers, and with reason, for although there was no other shop near to offer him any opposition, he was very civil and attentive to all, no matter how small their orders might be, and he was moreover, in the fullest acceptation of the term, perfectly true and honest in his dealings.

Our narrative opens on a fine autumual afternoon, shortly after Mr. and Mrs. Carter and their subordinates had finished their dinner. Mrs. Carter had taken up her post behind the counter in order to attend to any chance customer who might enter, and her husband attended by Giles was occupied in placing in a basket the different articles which had been purchased in the morning by families resident in the neighbourhood, and which had now to be sent to their different destinations.

"Let me see," said Mr. Carter, pausing in his task; "what is the next order? Two pounds of moist sugar, a bottle of blacking, and six Bath bricks, for Mrs. Jones."

"You can't send them all to-day," said Mrs. Carter; "we have only two Bath bricks in the house."

"How very annoying," said her lord and master.
"This is the first order we have had from the Jones's, and it don't look well not to complete it."

"Why should you worry yourself about that?" said his better half, somewhat tartly. "Send the two we have, and Giles can take the rest to-morrow; we shall have some more in to-night. Don't forget to tell them, Giles, they shall have them the first thing in the morning."

"Yes, ma'am," said Giles, with a sort of groan; Bath bricks, owing to their weight, being the bête noire of that young gentleman's existence.

"Two pounds of currants, a pound of sugar, two ounces of beeswax, and a small-tooth comb, for the Wilsons," continued Mr. Carter, placing the separate items in the basket as he spoke. "Don't forget, Giles, when you leave them, to say that the packet of pins the servant took away from here last Friday were not paid for, and ask if I am to put them down to Mrs. Wilson's account. Say it civilly, you know, and that will give her a hint that I don't give servants credit."

"I won't forget, sir," was Giles's reply.

"Two shoe-brushes and another pot of blacking for the Brickmakers' Arms. You had better wait, Giles, after you have given them in for a moment or two, to see if they intend to pay for them; but don't ask for the money. They will pay in the long run, though they are rather long-winded. Let me see; that is all, I believe. No, by-the-bye, there are the things ordered last week for the Red House, two twopenny loaves and three candles."

When Mr. Carter had mentioned the last two items his wife gave a short satirical sort of laugh.

"What nonsense," she said, "your sending to that Red House; why, their orders don't pay Giles's shoe-leather. I'd stop that at once if I had my way."

"Come, come, wife," said her good-natured husband, "don't be angry. They have been better customers in their time, and I don't like to neglect them now they are poor. Let us do to others as we would be done by."

"As for my part," said Mrs. Carter, "I don't remember the time when their orders were anything to boast of. We have been here now five years, and all the profit we have made out of them would not buy me a new bounet. I should not so much mind it if their house was in the road to anybody else's; but they are pretty well a mile beyond the Brickmakers' Arms, and we have no other customer out their way. It's nonsense our carrying business on in that manner."

"Well, well, perhaps you're right. However, the things are now in the basket, so there is no use saying anything more about it. Now, Giles, you may be off, and the sooner you are back the better."

"If we see him back before supper-time," said Mrs. Carter, with a toss of the head, "he will make more haste than he has ever done yet."

Mr. Carter made no further observation, and

Notwithstanding the recommendation of his master to be speedy, Giles's movements were of the slowest. Of all that amiable youth's duties, the one he liked least was the one he was then employed on. He had at any time an instinctive aversion to a long walk; but to one after dinner, and with the accompaniment of a heavy load, he had a particular abhorrence. There was no alternative for him, however; the work was to be done, and all the consolation he could find was to perform it with as little inconvenience to himself as possible, and this he conscientiously carried out. But even in this good resolution the fates were somewhat against him. If his road had lain in the direction of the town he might have met persons with whom he could converse, and in that he could have found some relief, as he was by nature exceedingly loquacious; but his route was now directly opposite, and as he advanced travellers became scarce in proportion. As he arrived at the different customer's houses he not only left the goods consigned to them, but at each he rested himself as long as he conveniently could. He left the Bath bricks, as ordered, but utterly forgot the message sent by his master. The packet of pins which had not been paid for he certainly did remember, and even went beyond his instructions in pressing for immediate payment instead of applying the gentle hint suggested by his master. To this he was possibly instigated by the amiable idea that being out of humour himself he was justified in ruffling the temper of the girl to an equal extent. If such really was his intention, he succeeded to perfection, for he not only obtained no money from the damsel, but received instead some most uncomplimentary remarks both on his master and his messenger. At the Brickmakers' Arms he carried out his master's orders to wait to a far greater extent than was at all needed, for he sat in the porch for more than half an hour, complaining bitterly both of fatigue and thirst, in the vain hope that they might offer him a glass of beer. For some time no notice was taken of his remarks, but at last the landlady asked him if he would like a glass of water-an offer he treated with contempt. Utterly disgusted with the selfishness of human nature, he rose, and taking his basket on his arm, he turned from the high road into that which led to the Red House.

The cross road which Giles now took was the principal thoroughfare between two towns of but moderate importance. It was broad and well kept, although the traffic on it was but small; in fact, Giles that afternoon did not meet an individual the whole of the road, nor did one overtake him, as would certainly have been the case had any one been following him. With no better companion than his own bitter thoughts, he sauntered leisurely along, occasionally relieving the monotony of his melancholy by throwing a stone at some bird that offered a good mark for the exercise of his skill. But lazy as he was, and tardy as was his pace, he at last arrived at his destination.

Had Giles possessed in the slightest degree a mind more impressionable than his own, he could hardly have escaped being struck with the dreary aspect and dilapidated condition of the Red House, notwithstanding that he generally visited it twice a week. An air of desolation seemed to haug over the whole place; all was either in ruin or bore marks of utter neglect. The house itself stood at some distance from the high road, but was occasionally seen from it through breaks in the trees. It had formerly been approached through a handsome lodge gate, and along a neatly kept carriage drive. But the lodge was now in ruins, its roof had fallen in, the panes in its windows were all broken, and its door wrenched from its hinges, probably for fuel to some of the numerous bands of gipsies which occasionally infested the neighbourhood, and who appeared to hold the whole vicinity as an eligible camping ground, frequently even using the neglected shrubberies of the Red House for that purpose. The lodge gate, which being of iron was not capable of being burnt, and was too heavy and inconvenient to be carried, had, in a spirit of pure mischief, been lifted from its posts and thrown upon the grass beside the drive, leaving the grounds exposed to the ravages of stray cattle. This, however, was of comparatively rare occurrence, for from some inexplicable cause the very brutes of the field seemed to have an instinctive dislike to the place, and preferred browsing on the dusty sward at the roadside.

From the lodge gates to the house the carriage drive proceeded through what had formerly been tastefully designed and well-kept pleasure grounds, but for several years past these had been allowed to run utterly wild. Rare and beautiful flowering shrubs it is true might occasionally be seen, but they were so choked with rank briars and foul weeds that they had lost all their vigour, and were dwindling and falling down among into the vegetable chaos which surrounded them. All trace of flower beds and borders had long since disappeared, and coarse and rank weedy grass covered the whole space they had occupied. As the visitor approached the house the gravel road branched off into two walks, one continuing its course towards the principal entrance-door, the other turning off to the left towards a tolerably extensive range of stable-buildings and out-houses. The same air of neglect and desolation which seemed to overshadow the whole place was discernible also in this cluster of buildings. All were in the most dilapidated condition, and evidently fast sinking into ruins. Stable doors were off their hinges, the glass in the window frames was all broken, roofs were falling in, and coarse weeds had sprung up a foot high in the interstices of the paying, while the stones themselves as well as the walls were covered with a slippery, thick, soft moss.

The house itself was a substantial moderate-sized mansion, built of red brick, from which it had derived the name of the Red House, and, judging from the style of its architecture, had been erected about the latter part of Anne's reign, or in the early part of that of George the First. Its appearance was gloomy and unpromising in the extreme. Its numerous long, gaunt, narrow windows with frames of solid clumsy carpentry, were glazed with the small dim square panes of glass of the last century, and which from want of paint and care were almost falling from the wood-work which enclosed them. The entrance-door was flush with the front of the house, and had a curious small wicket inserted in one of its upper panels. was of oak, large and massive, but unpolished, and dried up by many years' exposure to the suns of summer and the action of the atmosphere, while the flight of stone steps which led up to it were in such a ruinous condition, that great care had to be taken in ascending them, lest they might fall out of their position. The back and sides of the house were, if possible, in a worse condition than the front. Hardly a pane of glass was whole in any of the windows, while the large conservatory, which had formerly led from the drawing-room to a handsome lawn, had fallen-in some years before from the weight of snow in winter, and had been left ever since in the same condition utterly uncared for.

. Giles had now reached the entrance-door of this inhospitable-looking abode. After having placed his basket on the most secure stone on the top of the flight of steps he gave a loud knock with the heavy rusted iron knocker, and then seating himself somewhat uncomfortably on the handle of his basket, he waited patiently till his summons should be answered. He remained thus for some minutes, by no means surprised at the delay, as the inmates of the house were generally even slower in their movements than himself. He beguiled the time by watching the flight of a colony of rooks who had established themselves in the high elmtrees surrounding the house, and being disturbed by the noise he had made were now testifying their surprise and curiosity in a most excited manner: Still no one came to the door; and as the lengthening shadows of the trees on the grass and his own appetite warned him that supper-time was rapidly approaching, he rose from his seat, and again taking the knocker in his hand he gave such loud notice of his impatience that the sound re-echoed through the house. No more notice however was taken of this second appeal than of the former, with the exception of still greater agitation among the rooks. Giles's annoyance at the delay was now so great that he took no further notice of the rooks beyond bestowing on them some very uncomplimentary remarks for the noise they were making, for the noise hindered him in his attempt to listen, with his ear glued to the wicket, whether any one was coming.

Several times did Giles repeat his double knock, but without any satisfactory result. At last, almost in despair, he again seated himself on the handle of his basket, that he might reflect more at his ease what course to pursue in the unpleasant predicament he found himself placed in. His position was really a most unpleasant one. From all appearance there was not the slightest probability of the wicket, through which he was accustomed to communicate with the inmates of the house, being opened to him, even though he remained there till the next morning. On the other hand, if he returned home without having executed his commission, it was extremely possible that Mr. Carter, who was a strict disciplinarian, and who had but slight faith in his servant's veracity, might discredit the whole of his (Giles's) statement, true as it was, aud under the supposition that he had shirked his duty, and had not called at the Red House, send him back again. At last that physiological phenomenon which in hard winters drives the robin to seek for succour at the dwellings of man-hungerbegan to act so powerfully on Giles that he became desperate, and resolved at all hazards to return home, and undauntedly brave whatever dangers might there await him. Before leaving the house, however, he resolved to make one more effort with the knocker as a solace to his conscience. He did so, and with such energy that the most terrible brazen thunder produced by the hand of the most expert London postman sank into utter insignificance when compared with it. Still not the slightest result followed his efforts, and even the rooks, which, during Giles's cogitation, had again sought their nests, as the evening was fast advancing, took no notice of it.

Giles now got fairly desperate, and snatching up his basket he proceeded rapidly homewards. From time to time, however, certain timorous qualms and doubts as to the reception his master would give him passed across his mind, in spite of his energetic whistling and other efforts to drive them away. As he neared home his fears increased, and with them his pace slackened till the quick march he had started with diminished to a melancholy drawl, and when he came in sight of the turnpike gates he came to a dead halt. After waiting for a few minutes in doubt, he at last came to the conclusion that sooner or later he must face his master, and that nothing could be obtained by further delay, with the exception, perhaps, of a more severe scolding. He again moved slowly forward, taking care however to keep on the side of the road opposite to the shop, so that he might be able to ascertain what was passing within it before he entered. The evening was now so far advanced that the two shop candles had been lighted, and by their aid he could perceive that Mr. Carter was engaged in his postmaster's duties, sorting the letters, and tying them up in little packets, preparatory to the arrival of the mail cart, and that Mrs. Carter was nowhere to be seen. All this fell in admirably with Giles's wishes, for his master had issued strict orders that no one was to speak to him when occupied with the letters, and consequently there would be no questioning for the moment, nor would there be any inspection of the basket by Mrs. Carter.

Having fully made himself master of the position. Giles made a desperate dash forward, entering the shop in great haste, as if the impetus of his homeward march had been so great that he found it impossible to stop himself. The trick, however, did not pass without notice from Mr. Carter, who, however, for the mement said nothing, but contented himself with casting a threatening glance at Giles. and then continued with his letters. The glance was by no means without its effect on Giles, who hastily concealed his basket under the counter opposite to his master, and then turned into the kitchen, where, to his great joy, he found his supper set down for him. Fearing the entrance of his master into the kitchen, he immediately seated himself at the table, and ate so voraciously that the little handmaiden who was present began to be greatly alarmed lest he should choke himself. Fortunately, however, no such calamity occurred, and Giles succeeded in finishing his supper before his master made his appearance. He immediately commenced a series of uncomplimentary remarks on Giles's habitual idleness and vagabond habits, all of which were listened to silently but sullenly, the good supper that young gentleman had lately consumed having considerably raised his courage. To one of his master's severe remarks Giles had even begun to meditate a reply, which was, however, nipped in the bud by the entrance of Mrs. Carter, who had been on some commission to the town. She immediately commenced a report of her adventures, and the conversation thereon lasted till bedtime. Before they retired for the night, however, Giles received a proof that his behaviour was neither forgiven nor forgotten by his master. "Although," said Mr. Carter, addressing him, "it is too late to-night, sir, for me to explain to you my opinion on your conduct, the subject will keep hot, and I promise you it shall not lose by keeping till to-morrow morning."

Giles, although he made no answer, was by no means displeased at the affair standing over, for he knew full well the difficulty his good-natured master would have in keeping up anger for twelve whole hours. He now slunk off quietly to his sleeping apartment under one of the counters in the shop, where, amidst the collection of odours peculiar to a country general-shop, and in the company of a fine tom cat which Mrs. Carter had kindly provided to frighten away the mice which were in the habit of nestling in his bed-clothes, he soon fell fast asleep.

CHAPTER II .- AT THE RED HOUSE.

As soon as breakfast was over next morning, Giles was called into the presence of his master, not only to render an account of the business transactions given him to execute the day before, but also to receive a lecture on the unwarrantable length of time he occupied when on errands, as well as on his general idle habits. The latter part went off without any very great difficulty. Giles knew that nothing could be gained by arguing the point with his master, and he also distinguished by the tone of Mr. Carter's voice that his anger had already greatly subsided.

"And now, sir, about the things you had to take home yesterday. Have you anything to tell me about them?"

"Nothing, sir. I left them all as you told me."

"Did you speak about the packet of pins not having been paid for?"

"Yes, sir, I did; but the servant put herself in a passion, and said you ought to be ashamed of yourself for troubling her about a trifle of the kind."

"Like her impudence," said Mrs. Carter, entering the shop. "There is always more bother with those servants than their mistresses."

"True enough, wife," said Mr. Carter; "but at the same time, we should bear in mind that if there were no servants there would be no mistresses, and that would not suit our books you know. Did you leave the message about the Bath bricks as I told you?" he continued, addressing Giles.

"Yes, I did, sir," said Giles, without the slightest hesitation: a lie being but a trifle in his way when occasion required one.

"Well, then, keep your word this morning, and start off with the other four. Where is your basket?"

"Under the counter, sir," said Giles, reddening at the danger of discovery.

Mr. Carter immediately advanced to the spot indicated by Giles, and drew out the basket. Finding in it the two twopenny rolls and the three candles which he had ordered to be taken to the Red House, he angrily demanded of Giles an explanation of the affair.

"If you please, sir, I knocked ever so long at the door, but I could not make anybody hear. It was not my fault if I did not leave the things."

"I more than half suspect," said his master, that you never went near the house at all."

"Yes, I did, sir; you can ask them at the Brickmakers' Arms, if you please. They saw me go down the road, and said it was a shame to send me so far with such a beggarly order."

"I suspect they were not far wrong," put in Mrs. Carter, "and since he has brought the things back, they may as well remain here. If the Red House folk want to deal with us, let them come here. It's not farther from their house to ours than from ours to theirs."

"That's all very well, wife, and perhaps you are right on the whole. For the future, I am willing to give up the custom of the Red House, if you wish it. To-day, however, I will be obeyed. Take those things back again," he continued, addressing

Giles, "as soon as you have left the Bath bricks; and see that you get the money for them. They always pay regularly enough, I must say that."

The Bath bricks were now placed in the basket, and Giles started off on his errand.

A long walk after a good breakfast on a fine autumnal morning not being by any means so objectionable as one after a good dinner, Giles went along contentedly enough. He left the Bath bricks at the house they were intended for, and he then continued his road to the Red House, and in due time arrived at his destination. He first commenced operations by giving a loud postman's knock, knowing full well that that functionary is generally more quickly attended to in his calls than other visitors. Nor was Giles disappointed in his calculation. After waiting patiently for a few moments, listening attentively at the door the while, he fancied he heard some one moving in the house. The sound suddenly stopped again, and Giles began to doubt whether he had not been mistaken. To assure himself on the point, he again took the knocker in his hand and repeated the postman's knock even louder than The sound of some one slowly moving towards the door he now most unmistakably heard, and he took the candles and loaf from his basket ready to hand them through the wicket as soon as it should be opened, as the door had never once been unclosed to him before.

The wicket opened, and immediately afterwards the person behind it disappeared, having fallen down heavily on the floor. Giles, greatly surprised, waited anxiously to see if the person would rise again, but she-for it was a woman-remained motionless. Giles now raised himself on tip-toe to see, if possible, through the wicket what had taken place inside. At first he could see nothing, but on looking carefully on the stone floor of the hall, he could distinguish a female hand and arm, but, from not being tall enough, he could not see the figure to which they belonged. What to do fairly puzzled the boy, whose intellects at the best were none of the brightest. Finding he could come to no settled conclusion, he got frightened, and instead of seeking for assistance in the neighbourhood, he left his basket on the door-steps and started home with an amount of celerity most unusual to him, nor did he slacken his speed till he had arrived at his master's house.

Although Giles's account of his adventure, owing to his fright and want of breath, was somewhat obscure, the worthy shopkeeper understood it sufficiently to be aware that something serious had happened, and without more ado he called to his wife to mind the shop during his absence, and putting on his hat, he accompanied Giles at a sharp pace to the Red House. Arrived there, he found Giles's basket still upon the steps, and on looking through the wicket, which was still open, he saw, at a short distance from the door, the motionless form of a woman. At first sight he thought she was dead; but Giles assured him that she was not in the same position she was in when he had left her, but must have moved since her fall. Mr. Carter therefore concluded that life might not be extinct, and he called loudly several times without eliciting any answer or detecting the slightest movement to prove that she had heard him.

He now left the door and proceeded rapidly to the public road to seek for assistance. Fortunately two persons were in sight: one, the Rev. Mr. Keats, a clergyman resident in the town, a justice, and a canon of the Cathedral, to whom Mr. Carter was known; and the other was a farm labourer, who resided some short distance from the Red House. The shopkeeper clearly and concisely explained to the clergyman the position the poor woman was in, and requested his advice what steps to take in the matter.

"We must get into the house by some means," said Mr. Keats, "and see what we can do for her. Here, my man," he continued, addressing the farm labourer, "have you anything to do just now?"

"No, sir," replied the labourer; "I am very sorry to say I have not."

"Then come and help us. I will see you are paid for anything you do."

The man willingly accepted the offer, and they all advanced towards the house.

"I thought," said the peasant, as they walked along, "there was something wrong with the old woman, and I have said so many times."

"What made you think so?" inquired the clergyman.

"Because for some nights past no light has been seen in her sitting-room. My mistress noticed it as well. She had been out for a day's charing, and as she came home late at night she looked out for the light in the sitting-room, but it was not to be seen, and after that the night policeman noticed it too."

"Why did you not give an alarm about it, then?"

"Well, you see it was no business of our'n, and besides that, nobody would like to interfere with her, or go near the house, if they could help it."

"Why not?"

"I don't know," said the man somewhat sheepishly. "Perhaps because they say the house is haunted. Not that I believe it myself."

"Who told you that nonsense?" said the clergy-

"I don't remember who told me, but that's what they say about here."

"By whom do they say it is haunted?"

"Well, they say the old woman sits up all night playing cards with the devil," replied the labourer, "and that she sleeps all the daytime."

"This appears to be a very serious offence indeed," said Mr. Keats, smiling, "and one that I, as a clergyman, ought to take up without a moment's delay." By this time they had reached the door, and the clergyman, looking through the wicket, still saw the form stretched upon the floor of the hall. When he removed his head, Mr. Carter looked in.

"Is she in the same spot she was in when you left her?" inquired Mr. Keats.

"She is, sir," was the reply; "but if I am not very much mistaken she has moved one of her arms since I saw her. Yes, I am certain she has. Giles, look in and tell me whether I am not right."

Giles did as he was desired, and fully corroborated his master's statement.

"Then," said Mr. Keats, "we must contrive to get into the house immediately in some way. Pray God we may yet be able to save the poor creature's life."

They now left the front door and examined the windows on the basement floor, to find one through which they might with the least inconvenience enter into the house. This was a work of some short time, for although most of the panes were broken, all the window-shutters were closed, and barricaded more or less effectually. At last they selected one, whose fastenings appeared to be more insecure than the rest. The countryman then quickly obtained a stake from a fence near by, and by using it as a lever, they soon contrived to effect an entrance. With some little difficulty, owing to the darkness of the passages, they found their way into the hall; and raising the prostrate woman from the floor, they bore her carefully into the sitting-room, and placed her gently on a sofa. The clergyman, who like most of his profession knew something of medicine, felt for her pulse, but failed to detect it. He then placed his hand on her heart, and at last, with great difficulty, distinguished a slight low throbbing.

"Thank heaven, life is not extinct," he said; "we may perhaps be able to save her. You, my man," he continued, addressing the labourer, "go as fast as you can to the nearest public-house, and get me some brandy, or any other spirit which may be handy; and you, my lad, gallop off at once to the town and find out Doctor Wilson who lives in the Close. Give him my card, and tell him I should feel greatly obliged by his coming here as quickly as possible. Tell him to come himself if he possibly can; if not, to send some one else. If you obey me diligently, I will give you a shilling for your trouble."

The labourer and Giles started off on their respective errands, while the clergyman and Mr. Carter remained with the poor woman, who as yet showed no external signs of animation. The former continued to stand by her side, his anxiety and impatience for the return of his messengers being somewhat dimmed by the sympathy he now began to feel for his patient. There was something particularly interesting in her appearance. Although certainly in the decline of life, (she was evidently fully fifty years of age), her hair grey and dishevelled and her dress scanty, poor, and ragged, there was such an expression of profound sorrow over her pallid features that it fairly went to his heart. Without knowing a word of her history, he instinctively felt that her life had been a blameless one, and that her present condition had been caused more by her misfortunes than her faults. He inquired of his companion if he knew anything of her family, but he received the somewhat unsatisfactory reply that he knew nothing of her whatever beyond that she and an old woman resided together in the house, and even that he knew only from the statement of his errand-boy, Giles. Some few months since the poor woman before them was in the habit of coming to his shop to make purchases of provisions and household necessaries, but always in a very small way, and she then used to take them away with her. She was always very taciturn, avoiding all conversation. About three months since she inquired if he would have any objection to let his boy call two or three times a week at her house for orders, as she found the walk very fatiguing. He acceded to her request, but she would never let the lad into the house, but gave her orders through the wicket, and received the goods by it as well, always punctually paying for them at the time. Latterly her orders had been very small indeed, in fact they were hardly worth executing, and he often feared she was getting very poor. Somewhere he had heard that she had formerly been very respectable, but from his own knowledge he knew nothing.

Mr. Keats cast a hasty glance around him. The room was large and lofty. The sole furniture consisted of the sofa upon which the poor woman was stretched, two torn and much worn antique easy chairs, one on each side of the fire-place, a few ordinary chairs which, though old-fashioned, had been well made, and a soiled mahogany dining table, with a large open Bible upon it at one corner, and a common brass candlestick, in which a candle had suddenly burnt out, in the centre. The paper on the walls was faded to an extent which rendered it impossible to discern what had been its original pattern; the fire-place was rusted and dilapidated, and without fuel, and the curtainless windows had evidently not been cleaned for months, possibly for years. Poverty and neglect were, in fact, stamped on everything in the room.

The labourer now returned with some spirits in a glass, and the clergyman, not without some difficulty, contrived to insert a few drops into her mouth. Small as the quantity was it was evidently not without some beneficial effect, and the dose was repeated. Animation now began perceptibly to return, and the kind-hearted clergyman congratulated himself on the result of his experiment. He next took a small piece of bread from the little loaf in Giles' basket, and after soaking it in the spirits, he succeeded in placing it in her mouth, and he could perceive from the mechanical movement of the muscles of the cheek, that she felt its presence. By degrees the vital powers became more apparent, but still no return to consciousness could be detected. Mr. Keats hoped on, however, and continued the stimulant.

Presently the sound of carriage wheels was heard on the gravel road leading to the house, and on looking out of window Mr. Keats, to his great joy, saw the doctor's brougham approaching. It stopped at the door, and Doctor Wilson himself alighted from it. With merely a nod and a friendly look at the clergyman, he walked straight to the sofa on which the patient was stretched. He felt her pulse, pressed his hand on her heart, and then, without speaking, carefully examined the pupil of her eye.

"You have been giving her some spirit," he said at last, examining the glass which had contained it. "You have done well, and it is probable you may have saved her life by it."

"What do you think is the matter with her, sir?" inquired Mr. Carter.

"There is but one conclusion I can at present arrive at," was the reply. "Judging from her emaciated form, poverty-struck appearance, and the powerful effects of the few drops of spirits you have given her, I am afraid she is simply suffering from starvation."

"Do you know anything of her?" asked Mr. Keats.

"Very little, indeed. Several mouths since I attended her mother, a very aged woman, on her death-bed. I suspected then they were very poor, but I had no idea there was any danger of an affair like this. I understood, by the bye, that this poor woman was to leave the house immediately after her mother's funeral, but I forget from whom I heard the report. One thing, however, I remarked about her, was that she hardly seemed in her right mind. Not insane, understand me, but utterly bewildered, probably by misfortune, of which I have heard she has had her full share. There appeared about her an air of great respectability not unmixed with pride, which gave me the impression that she would possibly consider it an act of indiscretion if I inquired into her family affairs. Now you know as much about her as I do.

"Probably not," said Mr. Keats, "or you must be ignorant of her name."

"From the fact of her wearing no wedding ring, I presume it is the same as her mother's, which was Thornbury," replied the doctor.

"I am certain they were very poor, said Mr. Carter, "I now remember having heard that after her mother's death, and before the funeral, she went in the dusk of the evening more than once to a pawnbroker's shop in the town to raise some money on her plate, a few pieces at a time, which I dare say was to pay for the expenses she had incurred."

During this conversation the doctor had been engaged in inserting into his patient's mouth small quantities of the spirit. At last, evidently with great difficulty, she gave a deep sigh, and immediately afterwards her lungs slowly commenced their action.

"I think we are safe for the moment," said the doctor.

"Thank God for it," said Mr. Keats.

"Don't you think, sir," said Mr. Carter, "that we had better ascertain for certain whether there is any one else in the house? From what Giles has told me, there were two women living here together, one much older than the other, though he certainly has not spoken much about them lately."

"Certainly we ought to be well informed on that point," said the doctor. "And now you mention it, I remember when I was attending Mrs. Thornbury there was an old servant who nursed her. I was very much struck with her appearance at the time, as there was a certain air of almost Quakerish neatness about her. I remarked also that she was much distressed at her mistress's death, and wept bitterly over her. Possibly she may now be in the house, bed-ridden and ill. If you two will go over the house and seek for her, I will remain here with my patient."

Mr. Keats and the shopkeeper agreed, and they immediately commenced their search.

If the sitting-room which they had left had borne on it the marks of utter poverty and neglect, it was a model of neatness and comfort when compared with the other parts of the house they visited. Room after room they entered, some of which had possibly not been opened for years. The atmosphere of those whose windows were unbroken, was almost stifling from the accumulated dust which arose in clouds from the mere action of opening the doors. The chambers on the first floor, though somewhat scantily furnished, were in tolerably decent order when compared with those on the second. These were crammed with all sorts of useless, dilapidated furniture, in a singularly damp and mouldy state, evidently arising from water from the rooms above them having filtered through the ceiling, many parts of which had fallen down on the floor beneath it. On ascending to the third floor, this crowding of the one beneath it was partly accounted for. When the roof had begun to get out of order and to let in the rain, no attempt had been made to repair it; but to remedy the inconvenience tubs had been placed to catch the water, and the furniture of the rooms was removed to the story below. As the tubs when full were never emptied, it naturally followed that the floor soon became flooded, and the water made its way through it.

Not finding the old servant in any of these rooms, Mr. Keats and his companion descended again, but before giving up all hope they resolved to search the basement floor. Here also there was the same appearance of poverty and neglect. The kitchen range was so rusted that it could not certainly have been used for years; indeed it was easy to perceive that the whole floor had long since been in disuse. Nothing was here found that could afford the slightest clue to the old servant's whereabouts, and they ascended to the ground floor. There they entered a room (the library) they had not yet visited. Some of the books were still upon their shelves, the others were piled up together in one corner of the room, and all were covered with a thick layer of dust. After the occupants of the house had determined that the basement floor should no longer be used, they had turned the library into a kitchen. Here it might have been expected that the gloom which pervaded the other part of the house would be wanting. Such however was far from being the case. It formed no exception to the rest. The small stove, which had been badly set by some inexperienced hand, was falling away from the brickwork which surrounded it. The kitchen battery was of the poorest description, and out of repair; while the crockery, which was placed on the shelves from which the books had been removed, was in no better condition, being cracked and broken, and only a few pieces amongst it belonging to the same set.

They again entered the sitting-room, where they found the doctor still watching his patient, and they informed him of the fruitless results of their search. The poor woman was evidently stronger than when they had left her, but still totally unconscious.

"We must now," said the doctor, "determine on some plan of action. My patient is certainly recovering, but it would be dangerous to attempt to move her just yet. I have sent the labourer for some milk for her, and when he returns I will endeavour to make her swallow some of it. In the meantime," he continued, addressing the clergyman, "you had better take my brougham and go to Mrs. Mitchell's. You know who I mean,—the person who was lately the matron of the County Hospital. She now lets lodgings for invalids, and a good, kind, attentive creature she is. Tell her I want her bedroom on the first floor for a patient of mine who is very ill. She must prepare it for her reception immediately, as I may want it in an hour's time."

"But what will become of the house when we have left it? There ought certainly be some one to take care of it," said Mr. Keats.

"You are quite right; I never thought of that," replied the doctor. "We ought not to leave it without some one to take charge of it, as you say."

"Would not the labourer answer our purpose?" said Mr. Keats. "I dare say for a trifle he would willingly remain in the house."

"But we know nothing of him," said the doctor; besides, I do not like the idea of taking any responsibility on myself in the matter."

"I should think, sir," said Mr. Carter, "the better way would be, after Mr. Keats has seen Mrs. Mitchell, for him to go to the inspector of police, tell him all that has taken place, and ask his advice on the subject. I think it is very likely he would send a policeman to take care of the house till the right owner turns up, or the poor woman can explain herself."

"That is a capital suggestion," said the doctor.
"Get the inspector by all means to send a policeman, if you can. He can come back in my carriage. I will, in the meantime, remain with my patient, and, as soon as she is strong enough, I will bring her with me to her lodgings."

Mr. Keats, accompanied by the shopkeeper, now started off in the brougham, leaving the doctor at his post. On the road Mr. Carter stopped at his own residence, and Mr. Keats proceeded onwards to Mrs. Mitchell, whom he was fortunate enough to find at home. Her first-floor being disengaged, she willingly agreed to receive the doctor's patient, and promised, as he desired, that everything should be ready for her in an hour's time. Mr. Keats then called on the inspector of police, who promised to send a policeman, and one was immediately dispatched to the Red House in the doctor's carriage, with instructions not to leave the place till further orders.

"There was always something about that house I could not understand," said the inspector. "I should have thought for some time past it had been uninhabited if my men had not told me there was a candle burning all night in one of the sitting-rooms, but was never seen in any of the bedrooms. More than once I sent a man to make some unimportant inquiry in the daytime, for the purpose of finding out who inhabited it, but no one ever answered the knock."

"What sort of reputation had the place?" inquired Mr. Keats.

"Oh, the foolish people about there used to say it was haunted, and told all sorts of absurd stories about it, all of which were, of course, lies."

"Who formerly occupied the house?"

"It belonged, I have heard, to an old gentleman of the name of Thornbury, now dead, and the present owner cannot be found. He went abroad, I understand, some years since, and nothing has been known of him since. At the same time I am a poor authority on the subject, as I have, as you know, only been here three years, and my duties are principally confined to the town."

The reverend gentleman then left the police station, and having now performed the whole of the duties assigned to him, he returned to his house. As it was now considerably past his dinner-hour, and his prolonged absence having caused a great deal of anxiety to his wife and two daughters, they anxiously inquired the cause. In reply he gave them a full account of his adventures at the Red House, and the danger the poor woman was in when he had left her, although somewhat recovered. The ladies, as may naturally be supposed, were greatly interested in his narrative. They readily volunteered to render her every assistance in their power, and proposed starting off immediately to Mrs. Mitchell's in order to receive the poor creature when the doctor should arrive with her. Knowing full well that too many persons round a sick person was fully as prejudicial as too few, Mr. Keats told them it would be far better for them not to interfere in the matter for the present, and by way of allaying their anxiety, he promised that as soon as dinner was over he would go over to the doctor's and see if he had arrived with his patient, and if so he would ask him whether Mrs. Mitchell needed any assistance. For his own part, he believed the doctor would prefer that his patient should be perfectly quiet and have no excitement. The young ladies and their mamma admitted the justice of this reasoning, and contented themselves with divers speculations as to what could have been the cause of the poor woman's misfortunes, for all of which, it is needless to say, they had not the slightest data to go upon.

In the meantime the doctor had been unremitting in his attention to his patient. Fortunately the labourer had been able to obtain some milk from a neighbouring cottage, and with some of the spirit mixed with it he contrived to raise the poor woman's strength considerably. Still, however, she showed not the slightest return to consciousness. It could hardly be said that her mental faculties were in a state of prostration, she seemed rather to be in the deep sleep of a greatly fatigued person in feeble health. He attempted to rouse her sufficiently to understand that he wished to remove her from the house. He desired her that if she understood, but was unable to speak, to raise her hand, but she evidently did not hear him, so profound was her slumber. In due time his brougham returned with the policeman in it, and he now resolved to take all responsibility and remove his patient to Mrs. Mitchell's. He put the policeman in possession of the house, and after remunerating the labourer for the trouble he had been put to, he took the emaciated form of the poor woman in his arms and placed her gently in his carriage. Having seated himself beside her the coachman drove as rapidly back to the town as the jaded energies of his horse would allow. Nor was the journey performed without considerable anxiety to the worthy doctor, the sitting position his patient was in being most objectionable in her condition. Thanks, however, to his great care, and the judicious use of the stimulants he had brought with him, he succeeded in reaching Mrs. Mitchell's without any accident; where for the present we will leave her, in good and skilful hands, and tended with the greatest care and attention, not only by her landlady but by the family of the Rev. Mr. Kcats as well.

MADONNA MARY.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART VII.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE Cottage changed its aspect greatly after the arrival of the regiment, and it was a change which lasted a long time, for the depôt was established at Carlisle, and Captain Askell got an appointment which smoothed the stony way of life a little for himself and his wife. Kirtell was very accessible and very pretty, and there was always a welcome to be had at the Cottage; and the regiment returned in the twinkling of an eye to its old regard for its Madonna Mary. The officers came about the house continually, to the great enlivenment of the parish in general. And Mrs. Kirkman came, and very soon made out that the vicar and his curate were both very incompetent, and did what she could to form a missionary nucleus, if not under Mrs. Ochterlony's wing, at least protected by her shadow; and the little Askells came and luxuriated in the grass and the flowers; and Miss Sorbette and the doctor, who were still on the strength of the regiment, paid many visits, bringing with them the new people whom Mary did not know. When Hugh and Islay came home at vacation times, they found the house so lively, that it acquired new attractions for them, and Aunt Agatha, who was not so old as to be quite indifferent to society, said to herself with natural sophistry, that it was very good for the boys, and made them happier than two solitary women could have done by themselves, which no duobt was true. As for Mrs. Ochterlony herself, she said frankly that she was glad to see her friends; she liked to receive them in her own house. She had been rather poor in India, and not able to entertain them very splendidly; and though she was poor still, and the Cottage was a very modest little dwelling-place, it could receive the visitors, and give them pleasantwelcome, and a pleasant meal, and pleasant faces, and cheerful companionship. Mrs. Ochterlony was not yet old, and she had lived a quiet life of late, so peaceful that the incipient wrinkles which life had outlined in her face, had been filled up and smoothed out by the quietness. She was in perfect health, and her eyes were bright, and her complexion sweet, and her hair still gave out by times a golden gleam out of its brown masses. The gold had not turned as yet to silver, but with all this she did not look preternaturally young, but carried all the dignity of her age in her serious matronly beauty. Emma Askell with her usual vehemence, knowing nothing whatever about the matter, declared that she was more Madonna Mary than ever, for there had always been a certain amplitude and repose about her, and her attractions had always been emphatically those of a matron. Mary had nothing to fret her, and tranquillity surrounded her on every side. No wonder then that her old friends saw little or no change in her, and that her new oncs admired her as much as she had ever been admired in her best days. Some women are sweet by means of being helpless, and fragile, and tender: and some have a loftier charm by reason of their veiled strength and composure, and calm of selfpossession. Mary was one of the last: she was a woman not to lean, but to be leant upon; soft with a touch like velvet, and yet as steady as a rock-a kind of beauty which wears long, and does not spoil even by growing old.

It was a state of affairs very agreeable to everybody in the place, except, perhaps, to Will, who was very jealous of his mother. Hugh and Islav when they came home took it all for granted, in an open-hearted boyish way, and were no more afraid of anything Mrs. Ochterlony might do, than for their own existence. But Will was always there. He haunted the drawing-room, whoever might be in it at the moment; and yet-though to Aunt Agatha's consciousness, the boy was never absent from the big Indian chair in the corner-he was at the same time always ready to pursue his curate to the very verge of that poor gentleman's knowledge, and give him all the excitement of a hairbreadth 'scape ten times in a morning. Nobody could tell when he learned his lessons, or what time he had for study -for there he was always, taking in everything, and making comments in his own mind, and now and then interposing in the conversation to Aunt Agatha's indignation. Mary would not see it, she said; Mary thought that all her boys did was rightwhich was, perhaps, to some extent true; and it was said in the neighbourhood, as was natural, that so many gentlemen did not come to the Cottage for nothing; that Mrs. Ochterlony was still a young woman; that she had devoted herself to the boys for a long time, and that if she were to marry again, nobody could have any right to object. Such reports spring up in the country so easily, either with or without foundation: and Wilfrid who found out everything, heard them, and grew very watchful and jealous, and even doubtful of his mother. Should such an idea have entered into her head, the boy felt that he would despise her; and yet at the same time he was very foud of her and filled with unbounded jealousy. While all the time, Mary herself was very glad to see her friends, and, perhaps, was not entirely unconscious of exciting a certain respectful admiration, but had as little idea of severing herself from her past life, and making a new fictitious beginning, as if she had been eighty; and it never occurred to her to imagine that she was watched or doubted by her boy.

It was a pleasant revival, but it had its drawbacks -for one thing, Aunt Agatha did not. as she said,

There was between get on with all Mary's friends. Miss Seton and Mrs. Kirkman an enmity which was to the death. The Colonel's wife, though she might be, as became her position, a good enough conservative in secular politics, was a revolutionary, or more than a revolutionary, an iconoclast, in matters ecclesiastical. She had no respect for anything, Aunt Agatha thought. A woman who works under the proper authorities, and reveres her clergyman, is a woman to be regarded with a certain respect, even if she is sometimes zealous out of season: but when she sets up on her own foundation, and sighs over the shortcomings of the clergy, and believes in neither rector nor curate, then the whole aspect of affairs is changed. "She believes in nobody but herself," Aunt Agatha said; "she has no respect for anything. I wonder how you can put up with such a woman, Mary. She talks to our good vicar as if he were a boy at school -and tells him how to manage the parish. If that is the kind of person you think a good woman, I have no wish to be good, for my part. She is quite insufferable to me-

"She is often disagreeable," said Mary, "but I am sure she is good at the bottom of her heart."

"I don't know anything about the bottom of her heart," said Aunt Agatha; "from all one can see of the surface, it must be a very unpleasant place. And then that useless Mrs. Askell; she is quite strong enough to talk to the gentlemen and amuse them, but as for taking a little pains to do her duty, or look after her children—I must say I am surprised at your friends. A soldier's life is trying, I suppose," Miss Seton added. "I have always heard it was trying; but the gentlemen should be the ones to feel it most, and they are not spoiled. The gentlemen are very nice—most of them," Aunt Agatha added with a little hesitation, for there was one whom she regarded as Wilfred did with jealous eves.

"The gentlemen are further off, and we do not see them so clearly," said Mary; "and if you knew what it is to wander about, to have no settled home, and to be ailing and poor——"

"My dear love," said Aunt Agatha, with a little impatience, "you might have been as poor, and you never would have been like that; and as for sick—— You know I never thought you had a very strong constitution—nor your sister either—my pretty Winnie! Do you think that sickness, or poverty, or anything else, could ever have brought down Winnie to be like that silly little woman?"

"Hush," said Mary, "Nelly is in the garden, and might hear."

"Nelly!" said Aunt Agatha, who felt herself suddenly pulled up short. "I have nothing to say against Nelly, I am sure. I could not help thinking last night, that some of these days she would make a nice wife for one of the boys. She is quite beginning to grow up now, poor dear. When I see her sitting there it makes me think of my Winnie;—not that she will ever be beautiful like Winnie. But Mary, my dear love, I don't think you are kind to me. I am sure you must have heard a great deal about Winnie, especially since she has come back to England, and you never tell me a word."

"My dear aunt," said Mary, with a little embarrassment, "you see all these people as much as I do; and I have heard them telling you what news of her they know."

"Ah, yes," said Aunt Agatha, with a sigh. "They tell me she is here or there, but I know that from her letters: what I want to know is, something about her, how she looks, and if she is happy. She never says she is not happy, you know. Dear, dear! to think she must be past thirty now—two-and-thirty her last birthday—and she was only eighteen when she went away. You were not so long away, Mary—"

"But Winnie has not had my reason for coming back upon your hands, Aunt Agatha," said Mrs.

"No," said Aunt Agatha: and again she sighed; and this time the sigh was of a kind which did not sound very complimentary to Captain Percival. It seemed to say "More's the pity!" Winnie had never come back to see the kind aunt who had been a mother to her. She said in her letters how unlucky she was, and that they were to be driven all round the world, she thought, and never to have any rest; but no doubt, if Winnie had been very anxious, she might have found means to come home. the years were creeping on imperceptibly, and the boys growing up-even Will, who was now almost as tall as his brothers. When such a change had come upon these children, what a change must there be in the wilful, sprightly, beautiful girl whose image reigned supreme in Aunt Agatha's heart. A sudden thought struck the old lady as she sighed. little Askells were at Kirtell at the moment with the nurse, whom their mother was now able to keep for them, and Nelly, who was more than ever the mother of the little party. Aunt Agatha sat still for a little with her heart beating, and then she took up her work in a soft stealthy way and went out into the garden. "No, my dear, oh no, don't disturb yourself," she said, with anxious deprecation to Mary, who would have risen too, "I am only going to look at the lilies;" and she was so conscientious that she did go and cast an undiscerning, preoccupied glance upon the lilies, though her real attraction was quite in an opposite quarter. At the other side, audible but not visible, was a little group which was pretty to look at in the afternoon sunshine. It was outside the garden, on the other side of the hedge, in the pretty green field, all white and yellow with buttercups and daisies, which belonged to the Cottage. Miss Seton's mild cow had not been able to crop down all that flowery fragrant growth, and the little Askells were wading in it, up to their knees in the cool sweet grass, and feeding upon it and drawing nourishment out of it almost as much as the cow did. But in the corner close by the garden hedge there was a more advanced development of youthful existence. Nelly was seated on the grass, working with all her might, yet pausing now and then to lift her serious eyes to Will, who leant upon an old stump of oak which projected out of the hedge, and had the conversation all in his own hands. He was doing what a boy under such circumstances loves to do; he was startling, shocking, frightening his companion. He was saying a great deal that he meant and some things that he did not mean, and taking a great secret pleasure in the widening of Nelly's eyes and the consternation of her face. Will had grown into a very long lank boy, with joints which were as awkward as his brother's used to be, yet not in the same way, for the limbs that completed them were thin and meagre, and had not the vigour of Hugh's. His trousers were too short for him, and so were his sleeves. His hair had no curls in it, and fell down over his forehead. He was nearly sixteen, and he was thoroughly discontented-a misanthrope displeased with everything without knowing why. But time had been kinder to Nelly, who was not long and lean like her companion, but little and round and blooming, with the soft outlines and the fresh bloom of earliest youth just emerging out of childhood. Her eyes were brown, very serious and sweet-eyes that had "seen trouble," and knew a great many more things in the world than were dreamt of in Will's philosophy; but then she was not so clever as Will, and his talk confused her. She was looking up to him and taking all in with a mixture of willing faith and instinctive scepticism which it was curious to

"You two are always together, I think," said Aunt Agatha, putting down a little camp-stool she had in her hand beside Nelly, for she had passed the age when people think of sitting on the grass. "What are you talking about? I suppose he brings all his troubles to you."

"Oh, no," said Nelly, with a blush, which was on Aunt Agatha's account, and not on Will's. He was a little older than herself actually; but Nelly was an experienced woman, and could not but look down amiably on such an unexercised inhabitant of the world as "only a boy."

"Then I suppose, my dear, he must talk to you about Greek and Latin," said Aunt Agatha, "which is a thing young ladies don't much care for: I am very sure old ladies don't. Is that what you talk about?"

"Oh, yes, often," said Nelly, brightening, as she looked at Will. That was not the sort of talk they had been having, but still it was true.

"Well," said Miss Seton, "I am sure he will go on talking as long as you will listen to him. But he must not have you all to himself. Did he tell you Hugh was coming home to see us? We expect him next week."

"Yes," said Nelly, who was not much of a talker. And then, being a little ashamed of her taciturnity, she added, "I am sure Mrs. Ochterlony will be glad." "We shall all be glad," said Aunt Agatha.
"Hugh is very nice. We must have you to see a little more of him this time; I am sure you would like him. Then you will be well acquainted with all our family," the old lady continued, artfully approaching her real object; "for you know my dear Winnie, I think—I ought to say, Mrs. Percival; she is the dearest girl that ever was. You must have met her, my dear—abroad."

Nelly looked up a little surprised. "We knew Mrs. Percival," she said, "but she—was not a girl at all. She was as old—as old as mamma—like all the other ladies," she added, hastily; for the word girl had limited meanings to Nelly, and she would have laughed at its application in such a case, if she had not been a natural gentlewoman with the finest manners in the world.

"Ah, yes," said Aunt Agatha, with a sigh, "I forget how time goes; and she will always be a girl to me: but she was very beautiful, all the same; and she had such a way with children. Were you very fond of her, Nelly? Because, if that were so, I should love you more and more."

Nelly looked up with a frightened, puzzled look in Aunt Agatha's eyes. She was very soft-hearted, and had been used to give in to other people all her life; and she almost felt as if, for Aunt Agatha's sake, she could persuade herself that she had been fond of Mrs. Percival; but yet at the same time honesty went above all. "I do not think we knew them very well," she said. "I don't think mamma was very intimate with Mrs. Percival; that is, I don't think papa liked him," added Nelly, with natural art.

Aunt Agatha gave another sigh. "That might be, my dear," she said, with a little sadness; "but even when gentlemen don't take to each other, it is a great pity when it acts upon their families. Some of our friends here even were not fond at first of Captain Percival, but for my darling Winnie's sake—— You must have seen her often at least; I wonder I never thought of asking you before. She was so beautiful, with such lovely hair, and the sweetest complexion. Was she looking well—and—and happy?" asked Auut Agatha, growing anxious as she spoke, and looking into Nelly's face.

It was rather hard upon Nelly, who was one of those true women, young as she was, who can see what other women mean when they put such questions, and hear the heart beat under the words. Nelly had heard a great deal of talk in her day, and knew things about Mrs. Percival that would have made Aunt Agatha's hair stand on end with horror. But her heart understood the other heart, and could not have breathed a whisper that would wound it, for the world.

"I was such a little thing," said Nelly; "and then I always had the little ones to look after mamma was so delicate. I remember the people's names more than themselves."

"You have always been a very good girl, I am sure," said Aunt Agatha, giving her young companion a sudden kiss, and with perhaps a faint instinctive sense of Nelly's forbearance and womanful skill in avoiding a difficult subject; but she sighed once more as she did it, and wondered to herself whether nobody would ever speak to her freely and fully of her child. And silence ensued, for she had not the heart to ask more questions. Will, who had not found the conversation amusing, had gone in to find his mother, with a feeling that it was not quite safe to leave her alone, which had something to do with his frequent presence in the drawing-room; so that the old lady and Nelly were left alone in the corner of the fragrant field. The girl went on with her work, but Aunt Agatha, who was seated on her camp-stool, with her back against the oak stump, let her knitting fall upon her knee, and her eyes wander into vacancy with a wistful look of abstraction that was not natural to them. Nelly, who did not know what to say, and yet would have given a great deal to be able to say something, watched her from under the shadow of her curls, and at last saw Miss Seton's abstract eyes brighten up and wake into attention and life. Nelly looked round, and her impulse was to jump up in alarm when she saw it was her own mother who was approaching—her mother, whom Nelly had a kind of adoration for as a creature of divine helplessness, for whom everything had to be done, but in whose judgment she had an instinctive want of confidence. She jumped up and called to the children on the spur of this sudden impulse: "Oh! here is mamma, we must go in," cried Nelly; and it gave her positive pain to see that Miss Seton's attitude remained unchanged, and that she had no intention of being disturbed by Mrs. Askell's coming.

"Oh how deliciously comfortable you are here," cried Emma, throwing herself down on the grass. "I came out to have a little fresh air and see after those tiresome children. I am sure they have been teasing you all day long; Nelly is not half severe enough, and nurse spoils them; and after a day in the open air like this, they make my head like to split when they come home at night."

"They have not been teasing me," said Aunt Agatha; "they have been very good, and I have been sitting here for a long time talking to Nelly. I wanted her to tell me something about my dear child, Mary's only sister—Mrs. Percival, you know."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Askell, making a troubled pause,—"and I hope to goodness you did not tell Miss Seton anything that was unpleasant," she said sharply, turning to Nelly. "You must not mind anything she said," the foolish little woman added; "she was only a child and she did not know. You should have asked me."

"What could there be that was not pleasant?" cried Aunt Agatha. "If there is anything unpleasant that can be said about my Winnie, that is precisely what I ought to hear."

"Mamma!" cried Nelly, in what was intended to be a whisper of warning, though her anxiety made it shrill and audible. But Emma was not a woman to be kept back.

"Goodness, child, you have pulled my dress out of the gathers," she said. "Do you think I don't know what I am talking about? When I say unpleasant I am sure I don't mean anything serious; I mean only, you know, that——and then her husband is such a man—I am sure I don't wonder at it, for my part."

"What is it your mamma does not wonder at, Nelly?" said Aunt Agatha, who had turned white and cold, and leaned back all feeble and broken upon the old tree.

"Her husband neglected her shamefully," said Emma; "it was a great sin for her friends to let her marry him; I am sure Mrs. Ochterlony knew what a dreadful character he had. And, poor thing, when she found herself so deserted — Askell would never let me see much of her, and I had always such wretched health; but I always stood up for Mrs. Percival. She was young, and she had nobody to stand by her —"

"Oh mamma," cried Nelly, "don't you see what you are doing? I think she is going to faint—and it will be all our fault."

"Oh, no; I am not going to faint," said Aunt Agatha, feebly; but when she laid back her head upon Nelly's shoulder, who had come to support her, and closed her eyes, she was like death, so pale did she look and ghastly; and then Mrs. Askell in her turn took fright.

"Goodness gracious! run and get some water, Will," she cried to Wilfrid, who had rejoined them. "I am sure there was nothing in what I said to make anybody faint. She was talked about a little, that was all—there was no harm in it. We have all been talked about, sometime or other. Why, fancy what a talk there was about our Madonna, her very self."

"About my mother?" said Wilfrid, standing bolt upright between Aunt Agatha, in her half swoon, and silly little Emma, who sat, a heap of muslin and ribbons upon the grass. He had managed to hear more about Mrs. Percival than anybody knew, and was very indifferent on the subject. And he was not alarmed about Aunt Agatha; but he was jealous of his mother, and could not bear even the smallest whisper in which there was any allusion to her.

"Goodness, boy, run and get some water!" cried Mrs. Askell, jumping up from the grass in her fright. "I did not mean anything; there was nothing to be put out about—indeed there was not, Miss Seton. It was only a little silly talk; what happens to us all, you know: not half, nor quarter part so bad as—Oh, goodness gracious, Nelly, don't make those ridiculous signs, as if it was you that was my mother, and I did not know what to say."

"Will!" said Nelly. Her voice was perfectly quiet and steady, but it made him start as he stood there jealous, and curious, and careless of everybody else. When he met her eye, he grew red and frowned, and made a momentary stand against her; but the next moment turned resolutely and went away. If it was for water, Aunt Agatha did not need it. She came to herself without any restorative; and she kissed Nelly, who had been whispering in her ear. "Yes, my dear, I know you are right-it could have been nothing," she said faintly, with a wan sort of smile; "but I am not very strong, and the heat, you know-" And when she got up, she took the girl's arm, to steady her. Thus they went back to the house, Mrs. Askell following, holding up her hands in amazement and self-justification. "Could I tell that she was so weak?" Emma said to herself. "Goodness gracious, how could anybody say it was my fault?" As for Nelly, she said nothing; but supported her trembling companion, and held the soft old hand firm on her arm. And when they approached the house Nelly, carried away by her feelings, did, what in full possession of herself she never would have done. She bent down to Aunt Agatha's ear-for though she was not tall, she was a little taller at that moment than the poor old lady who was bowed down with weakness and the blow she had just received. "Mamma says things without meaning them," said Nelly, with an undutiful frankness, which it is to be hoped was forgiven her. "She does not mean any harm, and sometimes she says whatever comes into her head."

"Yes, my dear, your mamma is a very silly little woman," said Aunt Agatha, with a little of her old spirit; and she gave Nelly, who was naturally much startled by this unexpected vivacity, a kiss as she reached the door of her room and left her. The door closed and the girl had no pretext nor right to follow. She turned away feeling as if she had received a sudden prick which stimulated all the blood in her veins, but yet yearning in her good little heart over Aunt Agatha who was alone. Miss Seton's room, to which she had retired, was on the ground floor as were all the sitting-rooms in the house, and Nelly as she turned away, suddenly met Wilfrid and came to a stand-still before him looking him severely in the face.

"I say, Nelly!" said Will.

"And I say, Will!" said Nelly. "I will never like you nor care for you any more. You are a shocking, selfish, disagreeable prig. To stand there and never mind when poor Aunt Agatha was fainting-all for the sake of a piece of gossip. I don't want ever to speak to you again."

"It was not a piece of gossip, -it was something about my mother," said Will in self-defence.

"And what if it were fifty things about your mother?" cried Nelly,-"what right had you to stand and listen when there was something to do? Oh, I am so ashamed! and after talking to you so much and thinking you were not so bad-

"Nelly," said Wilfrid, "when there is anything said about my mother, I have always a right to listen what it is-

"Well, then, go and listen," said Nelly with indignation, "at the keyhole if you like; but don't come afterwards and talk to me. There, good-bye, I am going to the children. Mamma is in the drawing-room, and if you like to go there I dare say you will hear a great many things; I don't care for gossip myself, so I may as well bid you good-bye."

And she went out by the open door with fine youthful majesty, leaving poor Will in a very doubtful state of mind behind her. He knew that in this particular Nelly did not understand him, and perhaps was not capable of sympathising in the jealous watch he kept over his mother. But still Nelly was pleasant to look at and pleasant to talk to, and he did not want to be cast off by her. He stood and hesitated for a moment-but he could see the sun shining at the open door, and hear the river, and the birds, and the sound of Nelly's step -and the end was that he went after her, there being nothing in the present crisis, as far as he could see, to justify a stern adoption of duty rather than pleasure; and there was nobody in the world but Nelly, as he had often explained to himself, by whom, when he talked, he stood the least chance of being understood.

This was how the new generation settled the matter. As for Aunt Agatha, she cried over it in the solitude of her chamber, but by-and-by recovered too, thinking that after all it was only that silly woman. And she wrote an anxious note to Mrs. Percival, begging her now she was in England to come and see them at the Cottage. "I am getting old, my dear love, and I may not be long for this world, and you must let me see you before I die," Aunt Agatha said. She thought she felt weaker than usual after her agitation, and regarded this sentence, which was in a high degree effective and sensational, with some pride. She felt sure that such a thought would go to her Winnie's heart.

And so the Cottage lapsed once more into tranquillity, and into that sense that everything must go well which comes natural to the mind after a long interval of peace.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"I LIKE all your people, mamma," said Hugh, "and I like little Nelly best of all. She is a little jewel, and as fresh as a little rose."

"And such a thing might happen as that shemight make you a nice little wife one of these days," said Aunt Agatha, who was always a matchmaker in her heart.

Upon which Hugh nodded and laughed and grew slightly red as became his years. "I had always the greatest confidence in your good sense, my dear aunt," he said in his laughing way; and never so much as thought of Wilfrid in the big Indian chair. who had been Nelly's constant companion for at least one long year.

"I should like to know what business he has with Nelly," said Will between his teeth. "A great hulking fellow, old enough to be her father."

"She would never have you, Will," said Hugh laughing; "girls always despise a fellow of their own age. So you need not look sulky, old boy. For that matter I doubt very much if she'd have me."

"You are presumptuous boys," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "to think she would have either of you. She has too much to do at home, and too many things to think of. I should like to have her all to myself," said Mary with a sigh. She sighed, but she smiled; for though her boys could not be with her as Nelly might have been, still all was well with them, and the heart of their mother was content.

"My uncle wants you all to come over to Earlston," said Hugh. "I think the poor old boy is beginning to give in. He looks very shaky in the morning when he comes downstairs. I'd like to know what you think of him, mamma; I don't think his wanting to see you all is a good sign. He's awfully good when you come to know him," said Hugh, clearing his throat.

"Do you mean that Francis Ochterlony is ill?" said Aunt Agatha, with sudden interest. "Your mother must go and see him, but you must not ask me; I am an old woman, and I have old-fashioned notions, you know—but a married lady can go anywhere. Besides he would not care for seeing me," Aunt Agatha added with a slightly-wistful look, "it is so very—very many years since we used to—"

"I know he wants to see yon," said Hugh, who could not help laughing a little; "and with so many people in the house I think you might risk it, Aunt Agatha. He stands awfully in awe of you, I can tell you. And there are to be a lot of people. It's a kind of coming of age affair," said Hugh. "I am to be set up on Psyche's pedestal, and everybody is to look at me and sing out, 'Behold the heir!' That's the sort of thing it's to be. You can bring anybody you like, you two ladies, little Nelly Askell, and all that sort of thing," he added with a conscious laugh; and grew red again, not at thought of Nelly Askell, but with the thrill which "all that sort of thing" naturally brought into the young man's veins.

The face of Wilfrid grew darker and darker as he sat and listened. It was not a precocious passion for Nelly Askell that moved him. If Nelly had been his sister, his heart might still have swelled with a very similar sentiment. "He'll have her too," was what the boy said to himself. There was no sort of justice or distribution in it; Hugh was the lucky fellow who had everything, while no personal appropriation whatever was to be permitted to Wilfrid. He could not engross his mother as he would have liked to do, for she loved Hugh and Islay just as well as she loved himself, and had friends and acquaintances, and people who came and talked, and occupied her time, and even one who was supposed to have the audacity to admire her. And there was no one else to supply the imperious necessity which existed in Will's mind, to be the chief object of somebody's thoughts. His curate had a certain awe of him, which was satisfactory enough in its way; but nobody watched and worshipped poor Will, or did anything more than love him in a reasonable unadoring way; and he had no sister whom he could make his slave, nor humble friend to whom he could be the centre of interest. Nelly's coming had been a God-send to the boy. She had found out his discontent, and taken to comforting him instiuctively, and had been introduced into a world new to her by means of his fancies: and the budding woman had regarded the budding man with that curiosity, and wonder, and respect, and interest, which exist by nature between the two representatives of humanity. And now here was Hugh, who, not content with being an Oxford scholar, and the heir of Earlston, and his mother's eldest son, and Sir Edward's favourite, and the most interesting member of the family to the parish in general, was about to seize on Nelly too. Will. though he was perhaps of a jealous temper, was not mean uor envious, nor did he grudge his brother his elevation. But he thought it hard that all should go to one, and that there should be no shares: if he had had the arranging of it, it would have been otherwise arranged; Hugh should still have had Earlston, and any other advantages suited to his capacity-but as for Oxford and Nelly-It was unfair-that was the sting; all to one, and nothing to the other. This sentiment made Wilfrid very unwilling to accompany the rest of the family to Earlston. He did not want to go and survey all the particulars of Hugh's good-fortune, and to make sure once again, as he had already so often decided, that Hugh's capacities were inferior to his luck, and that it was really of little advantage to him to be so well off. But Will's inclinatious, as it happened, were not consulted on the subject; the expedition was all settled without any room being left for his protest. Aunt Agatha was to go, though she had very little desire to do so, being coy about Mr. Ochterlony's house, and even not too well pleased to think that coyness was absurd in her case, and that she was old enough to go to anybody's house, and indeed do what she pleased. And Sir Edward was going, who was older than any of them, and was still inclined to believe that Francis Ochterlony and Agatha Seton might make it up; and then, though Mrs. Askell objected greatly, and could not tell what she was to do with the children, and limited the expedition absolutely to two days, Nelly was going too. Thus Will had to give in, and withdraw his opposition. It was, as Hugh said, "a coming of age sort of affair," but it was not precisely a coming of age, for that important event had taken place sometime before, when Hugh, whose ambition was not literary, had been working like a coal-heaver to take his degree, and had managed to take it and please his uncle. But there was to be a great dinner to introduce the heir of Earlston to his country neighbours, and everything was to be conducted with as much solemuity as if it had been the heir-apparent's birthday. It was so great an occasion, that Mrs.

Ochterlony got a new dress, and Aunt Agatha brought forth from among the sprigs of lavender her silver-grey which she wore at Winnie's marriage. It was not Hugh's marriage, but it was an event almost as important: and if his own people did not try to do him credit, what was to be expected of the rest of the world?

And for Nelly Askell it was a very important crisis. She was sixteen, but up to this moment she had never had a dress "made long," and the excitement of coming to this grandeur, and of finding Hugh Ochterlony by her side, full of unspeakable politeness, was almost too much for Nelly; the latter complication was something she did not quite understand. Will, for his part, carried things with a high hand, and behaved to her as a brother behaves to the sister whom he tyrannizes over. It is true that she sometimes tyrannized over him in her turn, as has been seen, but they did not think it necessary to be civil, nor did either of them restrain their personal sentiments in case anything occurred they disapproved of. But Hugh was altogether different-Hugh was one of "the gentlemen;" he was grown up, he had been to the University, he rode, and shot, and hunted, and did everything that the gentlemen are expected to doand he lowered his voice when he spoke to Nelly, and schemed to get near her, and took bouquets from the Cottage garden which were not intended for Mrs. Askell. Altogether, he was like the hero of a story to Nelly, and he made her feel as if she, just that very moment as it were, translated into a long dress, was a young lady in a story too. Will was her friend and companion, but this was something quitedifferent from Will: and to be taken to see his castle, and his guardian, and his future domains, and assist at the recognition of the young prince, was but the natural continuation of the romance. Nelly's new long dresses were only muslin, but they helped out the force of the situation, and intensified that vague thrill of commencing womanhood and power undreamed of, which Hugh's presence had helped to produce. Could it be possible that she could forget the children, and her mamma's head which was always so bad, and go off for two whole days from her duty? Mrs. Askell could scarcely believe it, and Nelly felt guilty when she realised the dreadful thought, but still she wanted to go; and she had no patience with Will's objections, but treated them with summary incivility. "Why shouldn't you like to go?" said Nelly, "you would like it very much if you were your brother. And I would not be jealous like you, not for all the world;" and then Nelly added, "it is not because it is a party that I care for it, but because it is such a pleasure to dear Mrs. Ochterlony, and to-

"Ah, yes; I knew you would go over to Hugh's side," said Will: "I said so the very day he came here."

"Why should I go over to his side?" cried Nelly, indignantly; "but I am pleased to see people happy; and I am Mr. Hugh's friend, just as I am your friend," added the little woman, with dignity; "it is all for dear Mrs. Ochterlony's sake,"

Thus it was that the new generation stepped in and took up all the foreground of the stage, just as Winnie and her love affairs had done, who was of the intermediate generation—thrusting the people whose play was played out, and their personal story over, into the background. Mary, perhaps, had not seen how natural it was, when her sister was the heroine; but when she began to suspect that the everlasting romance might, perhaps, begin again under her very eyes, with her children for the actors, it gave her a sweet shock of surprise aud amusement. She had been in the shade for a long time, and yet she had still been the central figure. and had everything in her hands. What if, now, perhaps, Aunt Agatha's prophecy should come true, and Hugh, whose future was now secure, should find the little wife all ready for him at the very outset of his career? Such a possibility gave his mother, who had not yet arrived at the age which can consent to be passive and superannuated, a curious thrill-but still it might be a desirable event. When Mary saw her son hanging over the fair young creature whom she had coveted to be her daughter, a true perception of what her own future must be came over her. The boys must go away, and would probably marry and set up households, and the mother who had given up the best part of her life to them must remain alone. She was glad, and yet it went with a curious penetrating pang to her heart. Some women might have been jealous of the girl who had first revealed this possibility to them; but Mary, for her part, knew better, and saw that it was Nature and not Nelly that was to blame; and she was not a woman to go in the face of Nature. "Hugh will marry early," she said to Aunt Agatha, with a smile: but her heart gave a little flutter in her breast as she said it, and saw how natural it was. Islay was gone already, and very soon Will would have to go; and there would be no more for their mother to do but to live on, with her occupation over, and her personal history at an end. The best thing to do was to make up her mind to it. There was a little moisture in her eyes as she smiled upon Nelly the night before they set out for Earlston. The girl had to spend the previous night at the Cottage, to be ready for their early start next day; and Mrs. Ochterlony smiled upon and kissed her, with a mingled yearning and revulsion. Ah, if she had but been her own-that woman-child! and yet it required a little effort to accept her for her own, at the cost, as it were, of her boy-for women are inconsistent, especially when they are women who have children. But one thing, at least, Mary was sure about, and that was, that her own share of the world would henceforward be very slight. Nothing would ever happen to her individually. Perhaps she regretted the agitations and commotions of life, and felt as if she would prefer still to endure them, and feel herself something in the world—but that was all over; Will must go. Islay was gone. Hugh would marry; and Mary's remaining years would flow on by necessity like the Kirtell, until some day they would come to a noiseless end. She said to herself that she ought to accept, and make up her mind to it; that boys must go out into the world, and quit the parent nest; and that she ought to be very thankful for the calm and secure provision which had been made for the rest of her life.

And next morning they started for Earlston, on the whole a very cheerful party. Nelly was so happy, that it did every one's heart good to see her; and she had given Will what she called "such a talking to," that he was as good as gold, and made no unpleasant remarks. And Sir Edward was very suave and benign, though full of recollections which confused and embarrassed Aunt Agatha. "I remember travelling along this same road when we still thought it could be all arranged," he said; "and thinking what a long way it would be to have to go to Earlston to see you; but there was no railroad then, and everything is very much changed."

"Yes, everything," said Aunt Agatha; and then she talked about the weather in a tremulous way. Sir Edward would not have spoken as he did, if he had not thought that even yet the two old lovers might make it up-which naturally made it very confusing for Aunt Agatha to be the one to go to Earlston, and make, as it were, the first advances. She felt just the same heart thumping a little against her breast, and her white hair and soft faded cheek could not be supposed to be so constantly visible to her as they were to everybody else-and if Francis Ochterlony were to take it into his head to imagine- For Miss Seton, though nothing would have induced her to marry at her age, was not so certainly secure as her niece was that nothing now would ever happen in her individual life.

Nothing did happen, however, when they arrived at Earlston, where the master of the house received them, not with open arms, which was not his nature, but with all the enthusiasm he was capable of. He took them to see all bis collections, everything he had that was most costly and rare. To go back to the house in this way, and see the scene of her former tortures-tortures which looked so light to look back upon, and were so amusing to think of, but which had been all but unbearable at the time, was strange to Mary. She told the story of her miscries, and they all laughed; but Mr. Ochterlony was still seen to change colour, when she pointed out the Etruscan vase which Hugh had taken into his hand, and the rococo chair which Islay had mounted. "This is the chair," the master of Earlston said; and he did not laugh so frankly as the rest, but turned aside to show Miss Seton his Henri II. porcelain. "It was nothing to laugh at at the time," he said, confidentially, in a voice which sank into Aunt Agatha's heart; and, to restore her composure, she paid great attention to the Henri Deux ware. She said she remembered longing very much to have a set like that when she was a girl. "I never knew you were fond of china," said Mr. Ochterlony. "Oh, yes," Aunt Agatha replied; but she did not explain that the china she had longed for was a toy service for her doll's and little companion's tea. Mr. Ochterlony put the costly cups away into a little cabinet, and locked it, after this; and he offered Aunt Agatha his arm, to lead her to the library, to see his collection there. She took it, but she trembled a little, the tender-hearted old woman. They looked such an old couple as they walked out of the room together-and yet there was something virginal and poetic about them, which they owed to their lonely lives. It was as if the roses that Hugh had just gathered for Nelly had been put away for half a century, and brought out again all dried and faded, but still roses, and with a lingering pensive perfume. And Sir Edward sat and smiled in a corner, and whispered to Mary to leave them to themselves a little-such things had been as that they might make it up.

There was a great dinner in the evening, at which Hugh's health was drunk, and everybody hoped to see him for many a happy year at Earlston, yet prayed that it might be many a year before he had to take any other place than the one he now occupied at his uncle's side. There were some county ladies present, who were very gracious to Mary, and anxious to know all about her boys, and whether she, too, was coming to Earlston; but who were disposed to snub Nelly, who was not Mrs. Ochterlony's daughter, nor "any relation," and who was clearly an interloper on such an occasion. Nelly did not care much for being snubbed; but she was very glad to seize the moment to propitiate Wilfrid, who had come into the room looking in what Nelly called "one of his states of mind;" for it must not be forgotten that she was a soldier's daughter, and had been brought up exclusively in the regiment, and used many very colloquial forms of speech. She managed to glide to the other end of the room when Wilfrid was scowling over a collection of cameos without being noticed. To tell the truth, Nelly was easier in her mind when she was at a little distance from the Psyche and the Venus. She had never had any training in art, and she would have preferred to throw a cloak or, at the least, a lace shawl, or something, over those marble beauties. But she was, at least, wise enough to keep her sentiments to herself.

"Why have you come up so early, Will?" she

"What need I stay for, I wonder?" said Will; "I don't care for their stupid county talk. It is just as bad as parish talk, and not a bit more rational. I suppose my uncle must have known better one time or other, or he could not have collected all these things here."

"Do you think they are very pretty?" said Nelly, looking back from a safe distance, and thinking that however pretty they might be, they were not very suitable for a drawing-room, where people in general were in the habit of putting on more decorous garments; by which it will be perceived that she was a very ignorant little girl and knew nothing about it, and had no natural feeling for art.

"Pretty!" said Will, "you have only to look and see what they are-or to hear their names would be enough. And to think of all those asses downstairs turned in among them, that probably would like a few stupid busts much better, -whereas there are plenty of other people that would give their ing on the old string!"

"I am not harping on any string," said Will. "All I want is that people should stick to what they understand. Hugh might know how much money it was all worth, but I don't know what else he could know about it. If my uncle was in his senses and left things in shares as they do in France and everywhere where they have any understanding-

"And then what would become of the house and the family?" cried Nelly, -"if you had six sons and Hugh had six sons—and then your other brother. They would all come down to have cottages and be a poor sort of clan-instead of going and making a fortune like a man, and leaving Earlston to be the head-" Probably Nelly had somewhere heard the argument which she stated in this bewildering way, or picked it out of a novel, which was the only kind of literature she knew much aboutfor it would be vain to assert that the principle of primogeniture had ever been profoundly considered in her own thoughts-"and if you were the eldest," she added, forsaking her argumentation, "I don't think you would care so much for everybody going shares."

"If I were the eldest it would be quite different," said Will. And then he devoted himself to the cameos, and would enter into no further explanation. Nelly sat down beside him in a resigned way, and looked at the cameos too, without feeling very much interest in them, and wondered what the children were doing, and whether mamma's head was bad; and her own astonishing selfishness in leaving mamma's headache and the children to take care of themselves, struck her vividly as she sat there in the twilight and saw the Psyche and Venus whom she did not approve of, gleaming white in the gray gloaming, and heard the low voices of the ladies at the other end of the room. Then it began to come into her head how vain pleasures are, and how to do one's duty is all one ought to care for in the world. Mrs. Ochterlouy was at the other end of the drawing-room, talking to the other ladies, and "Mr. Hugh" was downstairs with a quantity of stupid meu, and Will chances were that something had gone wrong at home; that Charley had fallen downstairs, or baby's bath been too hot for her, or something-a judgment upon Nelly for going away. At one moment she got so anxious thinking of it all, that she felt disposed to get up and run home all the way, to make sure that nothing had happened. Only that just then Aunt Agatha came to join them in looking over the cameos, and began to tell Nelly, as she often did, little stories about Mrs. Percival, and to call her "my dear love," and to tell her her dress looked very nice, and that nothing was so pretty as a sweet natural rose in a girl's hair. "I don't care for artificial flowers at your age, my dear," Aunt Agatha was saying, when the gentlemen came in and Hugh made his appearance; and gradually the children's possible mischances and her mamma's headache faded out of Nelly's thoughts.

It was the pleasantest two days that had been spent at Earlston in the memory of man. Mrs. Ochterlony went over all the house with very different feelings from those she had felt when she was an inmate of the place, and smiled at her own troubles and found her misery very comical; and little Nelly. who never in all her life before had known what it was to have two days to herself, was so happy that she was perfectly wretched about it when she went to bed. For it had never yet occurred to Nelly, as it does to so many young ladies, that she had a right to everything that was delightful and pleasant, and that the people who kept her out of her rights were ogres and tyrants. She was frightened and rather ashamed of herself for being so happy; and then she made it up by resolving to be doubly good and make twice as much a slave of herself as ever as soon as she got home. This curious and unusual development of feeling probably arose from the fact that Nelly had never been brought up at all, so to speak, but had simply grown; and had too much to do to have any time for thinking of herself—which is the best of all possible bringings up for some natures. As for Aunt Agatha she went and came about this house, which could never be otherwise than interesting to her, with a wistful look and a flickering unsteady colour that would not have shamed even Nelly's sixteen-year-old cheek. Miss Seton saw ghosts of what might have been in every corner; she saw the unborn faces shine beside the never-lighted fire. She saw herself as she might have been, rising up to receive her guests, sitting at the head of the long, full, cheerful table. It was a curious sensation, and made her stop to think now and then which was the reality and which the shadow; and yet there could be no doubt that there was in it a certain charm.

And there could be no doubt, either, that a certain sadness fell upon Mr. Ochterlony when they were all gone. He had a fire lighted in his study that night, though it was warm, "to make it look a little more cheerful," he said; and made Hugh sit with him long after the usual time. He sat was in one of his "states of mind." And the buried in his great chair, with his thin, long limbs looking longer and thinner than ever, and his head a little sunk upon his breast. And then he began to moralize and give his nephew good advice.

"I hope you'll marry, Hugh," he said. "I don't think it's good to shut one's self out from the society of women; they're very unscientific, but still-And it makes a great difference in a house. When I was a young fellow like you- But, indeed, it is not necessary to go back so far. man has it in his power to amuse himself for a long time, but it doesn't last for ever ---- And there are always things that might have been better otherwise-" Here Mr. Ochterlony made a long pause and stared into the fire, and after a while resumed without any preface: "When I'm gone, Hugh, you'll pack up all that Henri Deux ware and send it over to-to your Aunt Agatha. I never thought she cared for china. John will pack it for you-he is a very careful fellow for that sort I put it all into the Louis Quinze cabinet; now mind you don't forget."

"Time enough for that, sir," said Hugh, cheerfully, and not without a suppressed laugh; for the loves of Aunt Agatha and Francis Ochterlony were slightly comical to Hugh.

"That is all you know about it," said his uncle. "But I shall expect you altogether to be of more use in the world than I have been, Hugh—and you'll have more to do. Your father, you know, married when he was a boy, and went out of my reach; but you'll have all your people to look after—Don't play the generous prince and spoil the boys—mind you don't take any stupid notions into your head of being a sort of Providence for them. It's a great deal better for them to make their own way;—but you'll be always here, and you'll lend a helping hand. Stand by them—that's the great thing; and as for your mother, I needu't recommend her to your kindest care. She has done a great deal for you."

"Uncle, I wish you would not talk like this," said Hugh: "there's nothing the matter with you. What's the good of making a fellow uneasy and sending him uncomfortable to bed? Leave those sort of things till you're old and ill, and then I'll attend to what you say."

Mr. Ochterlony softly shook his head. "You won't forget about the Henri Deux," he said; and then he paused again and laughed as it were under his breath, with a kind of laugh that was pathetic and full of quaint tenderness. "If it had ever come to that, I don't think you would have been any the worse," he added; "we were not the sort of people to have heirs," and the laugh faded into a lingering, wistful smile, half sad, half amused, with which on his face, he sat for a long time and gazed into the fading fire. It was, perhaps, simply that the presence of such visitors had stirred up the old recollections in his heart-perhaps that it felt strange to him to look back on his own past life in the light thrown upon it by the presence of his heir, and to feel that it was ending, while yet, in one sense, it had never begun. As for Hugh, to tell the truth, he was chiefly amused by his uncle's reflective mood. He thought, which no doubt was to some extent true, that the old man was thinking of an old story which had come to nothing, and of which old Aunt Agatha was the heroine. There was something touching in it he could not but allow, but still he gave a laugh within himself at the superannuated romance. And all that immediately came of it, was the injunction not to forget about the Henri Deux.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

This was all that came immediately of the visit to Earlston; but yet, if anybody had been there with clear-sighted eyes, there might have been other results perceptible and other symptoms of a great change at hand. Such little shadows of an event impending might have been traced from day to day if that once possible lady of the house, whose ghost Aunt Agatha had met with in all the rooms, had been there to watch over its master. There being nobody but Hugh, everything was supposed to go on in its usual way. Hugh had come to be fond of his uncle, and to look up to him in many ways; but he was young, and nothing had ever occurred to him to put insight into his eyes. He thought Mr. Ochterlony was just as usual-and so he was; and yet there were some things that were not as usual, and which might have aroused an experienced observer. And in the meantime something happened at the Cottage, where things did not happen often, which absorbed everybody's thoughts for the moment, and threw Earlston and Mr. Ochterlony entirely into the shade.

It happened on the very evening after their return home. Aunt Agatha had been troubled with a headache on the previous night-she said, from the fatigue of the journey, though possibly the emotions excited at Earlston had something to do with it-and had been keeping very quiet all day; Nelly Askell had gone home, eager to get back to her little flock, and to her mother, who was the greatest baby of all; Mary had gone out upon some village business; and Aunt Agatha sat alone, slightly drowsy and gently thoughtful, in the summer afternoon. She was thinking, with a soft sigh, that perhaps everything was for the best. There are a great many cases in which it is very difficult to say soespecially when it seems the mistake or blindness of man, instead of the direct act of God, that has brought the result about. Miss Seton had a meek and quiet spirit; and yet it seemed strange to her to make out how it could be for the best that her own life and her old lover's should thus end, as it were, unfulfilled, and all through his foolishuess. Looking at it in an abstract point of view, she almost felt as if she could have told him of it, had he been near enough to hear. Such a different life it might have been to both: and now the moment for doing anything had long past, and the two barren existences were alike coming to an end. This was what Miss Seton could not help thinking; and feeling as she did that it was from beginning to end a kind of flying in the face of Providence, it was difficult to see how it could be for the best. If it had been her own fault, no doubt she would have felt as Mr. Ochterlony did, a kind of tender and not unpleasant remorse; but one is naturally less tolerant and more impatient when one feels that it is not one's own, but another's, fault. subject so occupied her mind, and her activity was so lulled to rest by the soft fatigue and languor consequent upon the ending of the excitement, that she did not take particular notice how the afternoon glided away. Mary was out, and Will was out, and no visitor came to disturb the calm. Miss Seton had cares of more immediate force even at that moment-anxieties and apprehensions about Winnie, which had brought of late many a sickening thrill to her heart; but these had all died away for the time before the force of recollections and the interest of her own personal story thus revived without any will of her own: and the soft afternoon atmosphere, and the murmuring of the bees, and the roses at the open windows, and Kirtell flowing audible but unseen, lulled Aunt Agatha, and made her forget the passage of time. Then all at once she roused herself with a start. Perhaps—though she did not like to entertain such an idea-she had been asleep, and heard it in a dream; or perhaps it was Mary, whose voice had a family resemblance. Miss Seton sat upright in her chair after that first start and listened very intently, and said to herself that of course it must be Mary. It was she who was a fantastical old woman to think she heard voices which in the course of nature could not be within hearing. Then she observed how late it was, and that the sunshine slanted in at the west window and lay along the lawn outside almost in a level line. Mary was late, later than usual; and Aunt Agatha blushed to confess, even to herself, that she must have, as she expressed it, "just.closed her eyes," and had a little dream in her solitude. She got up now briskly to throw this drowsiness off, and went out to look if Mary was coming, or Will in sight, and to tell Peggy about the tea-for nothing so much revives one as a cup of tea when one is drowsy in the afternoon. Miss Seton went across the little lawn, and the sun shone so strongly in her eyes as she reached the gate that she had to put up her hand to shade them, and for the moment could see nothing. Was that Mary so near the gate? The figure was dark against the sunshine, which shone right into Aunt Agatha's eyes, and made everything black between her and the light. It came drifting as it were between her and the sun, like the phantom ship in the mariner's vision. She gazed and did not see, and felt as if a kind of insanity was taking possession of her. "It is Mary, isn't it?"-she said in a trembling voice, and at the same moment felt by something in the air that it was not Mary. And then Aunt Agatha gave such a cry as brought Peggy, and indeed all the household, in alarm to the door.

It was a woman who looked as old as Mary, and did not seem ever to have been half so fair. She had a shawl drawn tightly round her shoulders, as if she were cold, and a veil over her face. She was of a very thin meagre form, with a kind of forlorn grace about her, as if she might have been splendid under better conditions. Her eyes were hollow and large, her cheek-bones prominent, her face worn out of all freshness, and possessing only what looked like a scornful recollection of beauty. The noble form had missed its development, the fine capabilities had been checked or turned in a false direction. When Aunt Agatha uttered that great cry which brought Peggy from the utmost depths of the house, the new comer showed no corresponding emotion. She said, "No; it is I," with a kind of bitter rather than affectionate meaning, and stood stock-still before the gate, and did not even make a movement to lift her veil. Miss Seton made a tremulous rush forward to her, but she did not advance to meet it; and when Aunt Agatha faltered and was likely to fall, it was not the stranger's arm that interposed to save her. She stood still, neither advancing nor going back. She read the shock, the painful recognition, the reluctant certainty in Miss Scton's eye. She was like the returning prodigal so far, but she was not content with his position. It was no happiness to her to go home, and yet it ought to have been; and she could not forgive her aunt for feeling the shock of the recognition. When she roused herself, after a moment, it was not because she was pleased to come home, but because it occurred to her that it was absurd to stand still and be stared at, and make a

And when Peggy caught her mistress in her arms, to keep her from falling, the stranger made a step forward and gave her a hurried kiss, and said, "It is I, Aunt Agatha. I thought you would have known me better. I will follow you directly;" and then turned to take out her purse and give a shilling to the porter, who had carried her bag from the station-which was a proceeding which they all watched in consternation, as if it had been something remarkable. Winnie was still Winnie, though it was difficult to realise that Mrs. Percival was she. She was coming back wounded, resentful, remorseful to her old home; and she did not mean to give in, nor show the feelings of a prodigal, nor gush forth into affectionateness. To see her give the man the shilling, brought Aunt Agatha to herself. She raised her head from Peggy's shoulder, and stood upright, trembling, but self-restrained. "I am a silly old woman to be so surprised," she said; "but you did not write to say what day we were to expect you, my dear love."

"I did not write anything about it," said Winnie: "for I did not know. But let me go in, please; don't let us stay here."

"Come in, my darling," said Aunt Agatha.
"Oh, how glad, how thankful, how happy I am, Winnie, my dear love, to see you again!"

"I think you are more shocked than glad," said Winnie; and that was all she said, until they had entered the room where Miss Seton had just left her maiden dreams. Then the wanderer, instead of throwing herself into Aunt Agatha's kind longing arms, looked all round her with a strange passionate mournfulness and spitefulness. "I don't wonder you were shocked," she said, going up to the glass, and looking at herself in it. "You, all just the same as ever, and such a change in me!"

"Oh, Winnie, my darling!" cried Aunt Agatha, throwing herself upon her child with a yearning which was no longer to be restrained; "do you think there can ever be any change in you to me? Oh, Winnie, my dear love! come and let me look at you: let me feel I have you in my arms at last, and that you have really come home."

"Yes, I have come home," said Winnie, suffering herself to be kissed. "I am sure I am very glad that you are pleased. Of course Mary is still here, and her children? Is she going to marry again? Are her boys as tiresome as ever? Yes, thank you, I will take my things off—and I should like something to eat. But you must not make too much of me, Aunt Agatha, for I have not come only for a day."

"Winnie, dear, don't you know if it was for your good I would like to have you for ever?" cried poor Aunt Agatha, trembling, so that she could scarcely form the words.

And then for a moment the strange woman, who was Winnie, looked as if she too was moved. Something like a tear came into the corner of her eye. Her breast heaved with one profound unnatural convulsive swell. "Ah, you don't know me now," she said, with a certain sharpness of anguish and rage in her voice. Aunt Agatha did not understand it, and trembled all the more; but her good genius led her, instead of asking questions as she was burning to do, to take off Winnie's bonnet and her shawl, moving softly about her with her soft old hands, which shook yet did their office. Aunt Agatha did not understand it, but yet it was not so very difficult to understand. Winnie was abashed and dismayed to find herself there among all the innocent recollections of her youth-and she was full of rage and misery at the remembrance of all her injuries, and to think of the explanation which she would have to give. She was even angry with Aunt Agatha because she did not know what manner of woman her Winnie had grownbut beneath all this impatience and irritation was such a gulf of wretchedness and wrong that even the unreasonableness took a kind of miserable reason. She did well to be angry with herself, and all the world. Her friends ought to understand the difference, and see what a changed creature she was, without exacting the humiliation of an explanation; and yet at the same time the poor soul in her misery was angry to perceive that Aunt Agatha did see a difference. She suffered her she felt Miss Seton's soft caressing hand upon her hair. She started partly because it was a caress she was unused to, and partly that her hair had grown thin and even had some grey threads in it, and she did not like that change to be observed; for she had been proud of her pretty hair, and taken pleasure in it as so many women do. She rose up as she felt that touch, and took the shawl which had been laid upon a chair.

"I suppose I can have my old room," she said.
"Never mind coming with me as if I was a visitor.
I should like to go up-stairs, and I ought to know the way, and be at home here."

"It is not for that, my darling," said Aunt Agatha with hesitation; "but you must have the best room, Winnie. Not that I mean to make a stranger of you. But the truth is one of the boys—and then it is too small for what you ought to have now."

"One of the boys—which of the boys?" said Winnie. "I thought you would have kept my old room—I did not think you would have let your house be overrun with boys. I don't mind where it is, but let me go and put my things somewhere and make myself respectable. Is it Hugh that has my room?"

"No,—Will," said Aunt Agatha, faltering; "I could change him, if you like, but the best room is far the best. My dear love, it is just as it was when you went away. Will! Here is Will. This is the little one that was the baby—I don't think that

"Not so much as I am," said Mrs. Percival under her breath, as turning round she saw the long-limbed, curious boy, with his pale face and inquiring eyes, standing in the open window. Will was not excited, but he was curious; and as he looked at the stranger, though he had never seen her before, his quick mind set to work on the subject, and he put two and two together and divined who it was. He was not like her in external appearance—at least he had never been a handsome boy, and Winnie had still her remains of wasted beauty-but yet perhaps they were like each other in a more subtle, invisible way. Winnie looked at him, and she gave her shoulders a shrug and turned impatiently away. "It must be a dreadful nuisance to be interrupted like that, whatever you may be talking about," she said. "It does not matter what room I am to have, but I suppose I may go up-

"My dear love, I am waiting for you," said poor Aunt Agatha, anxiously. "Run, Will, and tell your mother that my dear Winnie has come home. Run as fast as ever you can and tell her to make haste. Winnie, my darling, let me carry your shawl. You will feel more like yourself when you have had a good rest; and Mary will be back directly, and I know how glad she will be."

in her misery was angry to perceive that Aunt "Will she?" said Winnie; and she looked at Agatha did see a difference. She suffered her bounet and shawl to be taken off, but started when felt his quick eyes go through and through her. "He will go and tell his mother the wreck I am," she said to herself with bitterness; and felt as if she hated Wilfrid. She had no children to defend and surround her, or even to take messages. No one could say, referring to her, "Go and tell your mother." It was Mary that was well off, always the fortunate one, and for the moment poor Winnie felt as if she hated the keen-eyed boy.

Will, for his part, went off to seek his mother, leaving Aunt Agatha to conduct her dear and welcome, but embarrassing and difficult, guest up-stairs. He did not run nor show any symptoms of unnecessary haste, but went along in a very steady, leisurely way. He was so far like Winnie that he did not see any occasion for disturbing himself much on account of other people. He went to seek Mrs. Ochterlony with his hands in his pockets and his mind working steadily at the new position of affairs. Why this new-comer should have arrived so unexpectedly? why Aunt Agatha should look so anxious, and helpless, and confused, as if, notwithstanding her love, she did not know what to do with her visitor? were questions which exercised all Will's faculties. He walked up to his mother, who was coming quietly along the road from the village, and joined her without disturbing himself. "Aunt Agatha sent me to look for you," he said, and turned with her towards the Cottage in the calmest

"I am afraid she thought I was late," said Mary. "It was not that," said Will. "Mrs. Percival had just come, so far as I could understand, and she sent me to tell you."

"Mrs. Percival?" cried Mary, stopping short. "Whom do you mean? Not Winnie? Not my sister? You must have made some mistake."

"I think it was. It looked like her," said Will,

in his calm way.

Mary stood still, and her breath seemed to fail her for the moment; she had what the French call a serrement du cœur. It felt as if some invisible hand had seized upon her heart and compressed it tightly; and her breathing failed, and a chill went through her veins. The next moment her face flushed with shame and self-reproach. Could she be thinking of herself and any possible consequences, and grudging her sister the only natural refuge which remained to her? She was incapable for the moment of asking any further questions, but went on with a sudden hasty impulse, feeling her head swim, and her whole intelligence confused. It seemed to Mary, for the moment, though she could not have told how, as if there was an end of her peaceful life, of her comfort, and all the good things that remained to her; a chill presentiment, confounding and inexplicable, went to her heart; and at the same time she felt utterly ashamed and horrified to be thinking of herself at all and not of poor Winnie, the returned wanderer. Her thoughts were so busy and full of occupation that she had gone a long way before it occurred to her to say anything to her boy.

"You say it looked like her, Will," she began at last, taking up the conversation where she had left off; "tell me, what did she look like?"

"She looked just like other women," said Will; "I didn't remark any difference. As tall as you, and a sort of a long nose. Why I thought it looked like her, was because Aunt Agatha was in an awful way."

"What sort of a way?" cried Mary.

"Oh, well, I don't know. Like a hen, or something-walking round her, and looking at her, and cluck-clucking; and yet all the same as if she'd like to crv."

"And Winnie," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "how did she look ?-that is what I want most to know."

"Awfully bored," said Will. He was so sometimes himself, when Aunt Agatha paid any special attentions to him, and he said it with feeling. This was almost all the conversation that passed between them as Mrs. Ochterlony hurried home. Poor Winnie! Mary knew better than Miss Seton did what a dimness had fallen upon her sister's bright prospects-how the lustre of her innocent name had been tarnished, and all the freshness and beauty gone out of her life; and Mrs. Ochterlony's heart smote her for the momentary reference to herself, which she had made without meaning it, when she heard of Winnie's return. Poor Winnie! if the home of her youth was not open to her, where could she find refuge? if her aunt and her sister did not stand by her, who would? and yet- The sensation was altogether involuntary, and Mary resisted it with all her might; but she could not help a sort of instinctive sense that her peace was over, and that the storms and darkness of life were about to begin again.

When she went in hurriedly to the drawingroom, not expecting to see anybody, she found, to her surprise, that Winnie was there, reclining in an easy chair, with Aunt Agatha in wistful and anxious attendance on her. The poor old lady was hovering about her guest, full of wonder, and pain, and anxious curiosity. Winnie as yet had given no explanation of her sudden appearance. She had given no satisfaction to her perplexed and fond companion. When she found that Aunt Agatha did not leave her, she had come down-stairs again, and dropped listlessly into the easy chair. She wanted to have been left alone for a little, to have realised all that had befallen her, and to feel that she was not dreaming, but was actually in her old home. But Miss Seton would have thought it the greatest unkindness, the most signal want of love and sympathy and all that a wounded heart required, to leave Winnie alone. And she was glad when Mary came to help her to rejoice over, and overwhelm with kindness, her child who had been lost and was found.

"It is your dear sister, thank God!" she cried, with tears. "Oh, Mary! to think we should have her again, to think she should be here after so many changes. And our own Winnie through it all.

She did not write to tell us, for she did not quite know the day—"

"I did not know things would go further than I could bear," said Winnie, hurriedly. "Now Mary is here, I know you must have some explanation. I have not come to see you; I have come to escape and hide myself. Now, if you have any kindness, you won't ask me any more just now. I came off last night because he went too far. There! that is why I did not write. I thought you would take me in, whatever my circumstances might be."

"Oh, Winnie, my darling; then you have not been happy!" said Aunt Agatha, tearfully clasping Winnie's hands in her own and gazing wistfully iuto her face.

"Happy!" she said, with something like a laugh, and then drew her hand away. "Please let us have tea or something, and don't question me any more."

It was then only that Mary interposed. Her love for her sister was not the absorbing love of Aunt Agatha; but it was a wiser affection. And she managed to draw the old lady away, and leave the new-comer to herself for the moment. "I must not leave Winnie," Aunt Agatha said; "I cannot go away from my poor child: don't you see how unhappy and suffering she is? You can see after everything yourself, Mary, there is nothing to do; and tell Peggy—"

"But I have something to say to you," said Mary, drawing her reluctant companion away, to Aunt Agatha's great impatience and distress. As for Winnie, she was grateful for the moment's quiet, and yet she was not grateful to her sister. She wanted to be alone and undisturbed, and yet she rather wanted Aunt Agatha's suffering looks and tearful eyes to be in the same room with her. She wanted to resume the sovereignty, and to be queen and potentate the moment after her return; and it did not please her to see another authority, which prevailed over the fascination of her presence. But yet she was glad to be alone. When they left her, she lay back in her chair, in a settled calm of passion which was at once twenty times more calm than their peacefulness, and twenty times more passionate than their excitement. She knew whence she came and why she came, which they did not. She knew the last step which had been too far, and was still tingling with the sense of outrage. She had in her mind the very different scene she had left, and which stood out in flaming outlines against the dim background of this place, which seemed to have stopped still just when she left it, and in all these years to have grown no older; and her head began to steady a little out of the whirl. If he ventured to seek her here she would turn to bay and defy him. She was too much absorbed by active enmity, and rage, and indignation, to be moved by the recollections of her youth, the romance that had been enacted within these walls. On the contrary, the last exasperation which had filled her cup to overflowing was so much more real than anything that followed, that Aunt Agatha was but a pale ghost to Winnie, flitting dimly across the fiery surface of her own thoughts; and this calm scene in which she found herself almost without knowing how, felt somehow like a pasteboard cottage in a theatre suddenly let down upon her for the moment. She had come to escape and hide herself, she said, and that was in reality what she intended to do; but at the same time the thought of living there, and making the change real, had never occurred to her. It was a sudden expedient adopted in the heat of battle; it was not a flight for her life.

"She has come back to take refuge with us, the poor darling," said Aunt Agatha. "Oh, Mary, my dear love, don't let us be hard upon her! She has not been happy, you heard her say so, and she has come home; let me go back to Winnie, my dear. She will think we are not glad to see her, that we don't sympathize— And oh, Mary, her poor dear wounded heart! when she looks upon all the things that surrounded her, when she was so happy!——"

And Mary could not succeed in keeping the tender old lady away, nor in stilling the thousand questions that bubbled from her kind lips. All she could do was to provide for Winnie's comfort, and in her own person to leave her undisturbed. And the night fell over a strangely disquieted household. Aunt Agatha could not tell whether to cry for joy or for distress, whether to be most glad that Winnie had come home, or most concerned and anxious how to account for her sudden arrival, and keep up appearances, and prevent the parish from thinking that anything unpleasant had happened. In Winnie's room there was such a silent tumult of fury, and injury, and active conflict, as had never existed before near Kirtell side. Winnie was not thinking, nor caring where she was; she was going over the last battle from which she had fled, and anticipating the next, and instead of making herself wretched by the contrast of her former happiness, felt herself only, as it were, in a painted retirement, no more real than a dream. What was real was her own feelings, and nothing else on earth. As for Mary, she too was strangely, and she thought ridiculously affected by her sister's return. She tried to explain to herself that except for her natural sympathy for Winnie, it affected her in no other way, and was indignant with herself for dwelling upon a possible derangement of domestic peace, as if that could not be guarded against, or even endured if it came about. But nature was too strong for her. It was not any fear for the domestic peace that moved her; it was an indescribable conviction that this unlooked-for return was the onslaught signal for a something lying in wait—that it was the touch of revolution, the opening of the floodgates-and that henceforward her life of tranquil confidence was over, and that some mysterious trouble which she could not at present identify, had been let loose upon her, let it come sooner or later, from that day.

THE MILL IN THE VALLEY.

THE MILL IN THE VALLEY.

BY MRS. JOHN KNOX.

THE wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the seasons came and went;
The wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the miller was well content.

Sunshine and shade
For ever play'd
In the valley about the mill;
Like the changes wrought
By the changing thought
Of the heart that is never still:

From the heart of the hills
The water trills,
And leaps down the rocky stairs—
The same—yet never
The same—for ever
Its stream to the sea it bears.

Each stone left bare
To the dewy air
Is cover'd with velvet moss;
Flowers every chink,
To the water's brink,
Where the branches reach across.

Over the plank,
From bank to bank,
Would the miller's children trip,
To the hillside fields,
Where the brown goat yields
Her milk, and the white kids skip.

And the miller's son
Would take his gun,
And out on the mountains tarry;
The miller's daughter
Stray by the water,
And love her love and marry.

Thus the wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the seasons came and went;
The wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the miller was well content.

Yet into the light,
And into the night,
Uplifted and ever nigh,
The mountains stand,
Upon either hand,
With their awful heads on high:

With their unseen tracts,
And their cataracts
Unheard in the lower zones;
And the jewels that burn
On their crowns, and turn,
When reach'd, to cold grey stones:

Their shadows vast,
On the valleys cast,
And the thunders pealing thence;
And the shapes they take,
And the dreams they wake,
And their silences intense.

The shadows crept,
Then the shadows slept
On the valley one eventide;
In the house of the mill,
While the wheel stood still,
The grey-hair'd miller died.

The wheel goes round,
And the corn is ground,
And the seasons come and go,— Winter and summer,
And each new comer
Content that it should be so.

For the next who came
The mill to claim,
Away in his youth had roved;
But never more
Would he wander o'er
The mountains from those he loved,

For he brought his wife,
And the baby life
She held on her pure young breast;
Not half so divine
The holiest shrine,
He held, had he truth confest.

Over vale and hill,
To the little mill
He guided her, strong and wary;
As St. Joseph might,
In the days of flight,
Have guided THE SON and Mary.

He was bringing there
A saint. In prayer
To the hills she raised her eyes,
And their shadows fell
As into a well
Where the star of evening lies.

And the wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the seasons came and went;
The wheel went round,
And the corn was ground,
And the miller was well content.

At the glad sunrise,
The holy eyes
Of that mother young and saintly
Were upward cast,
And her gaze fell last
On the mountains burning faintly.

And their ways she trod, Going up to God With all the love he had given. "Whenever I tread On the hills," she said, "I seem to be nearing Heaven."

Of the wild fir-wood
She made a rood,
And taking her little son,
Set it in sight,
On the highest height
She could reach e'er day was done.

And she took him there
For their evening prayer,
And the shadows fell around;
And the miller would come,
And bring them home,
As treading on holy ground.

But her cheek grew pale,
And her feet would fail,
As the summer waned and went;
Her eyes went still
To the cross on the hill,
But alas! her strength was spent.

The shadows crept,
And the shadows slept,
At the close of the autumn day,
On the house at the mill,
Where all was still,
But the water on its way.

From her lips, just press'd
To all love's best,
Faded the smile of love.
There was still a light
On the highest height,
And a light her brow above.

Her eyes she turn'd
Where the glory burn'd,
Higher and higher yet!
Then a shadow fell
On her brow as well,
And they knew the sun had set.

And the mill goes round,
And the corn is ground,
And the miller is well content;
He is not the same
As he who came
When the grey-hair'd miller went.

CURIOSITIES OF PLANT LIFE.

THE productions of new forms or varieties of fruits and flowers by cultivation or hybridization is being carried on at the present time with much earnestness, as is proved by the novelties constantly to be seen at our flower-shows. It has been truly said that nature has distributed her gifts with a bounteous equality, and in no branch of natural history is it more apparent than in the vegetable kingdom. Many of the denizens of our fields and hedges, which we constantly overlook, would no doubt be highly prized by us, were it not for the very fact of their being indigenous. There is, for instance, the poppy-one of the commonest of our wild flowers-which to the grief of the husbandman adorns our corn-fields with a gorgeous blaze of scarlet. This plant, notwithstanding its ill-repute with one class, would, we have often thought, be coveted if it had only recently been introduced from some distant clime, and had the additional charm of ever so slight a fragrance. And here is an instance of that peculiar compensating principle seen in the distribution of nature's gifts, where a flower of the simplest form and wholly devoid of fragrance is made attractive by its brilliant colour alone. Another instance is to be found in the pretty little Stellaria media, or common chickweed. The arrangement of the petals of the plant in the form of a star (from which arrangement its generic name is derived), added to the purity of its white, make it ever attractive to a lover of nature's handiworks, although it is so very abundant on roadsides and waste places.

But our business at present is not with those simple forms of vegetation which come under our notice almost daily, nor is it with those forms of flowers which in their natural or normal condition have a resemblance, in point of structure or position of their parts, to the simple flowers already mentioned, and which have, so to speak, put on other clothing, or been changed into a different character by the art and the aid of man. It is not now our business to tell how the choicest damask rose derived its support and nourishment from the stock of the common briar by artificial budding, or how the finest of our dessert apples sprang from the common crab, or how from the sloe came the best varieties of plums. It is sufficient for us to say that man can bring about such great changes by careful cultivation—producing double flowers and similar "beautiful monstrositics," as a recent writer on this subject not inaptly termed them.

Numerous examples of peculiar and striking transformations of the vegetable kingdom are to be met with, which are not to be attributed to man's agency, but have the charm of being perfectly natural. Many persons have, no doubt, been struck with wonder on first beholding the singular pitcher plants in the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, but has it ever occurred to any one of them to ask what those graceful appendages really are? Some may have thought them leaves, others, perhaps, deemed them flowers. The first supposition came nearest the truth, for the pitchers we usually see in cultivation in our hothouses are, though not true leaves, yet an irregular form of petiole or leaf-stalk. It must be stated, however, that there are many forms of pitchers to be found in very different families. Those belonging to the natural order Nepenthaceæ are the most generally cultivated in this country. The order has but one genus, namely, Nepenthes, to which is appended about twenty species. They are natives of South-Eastern Asia, and are chiefly found in Borneo and Sumatra. One species only, the Nepenthes distillatoria, is found in Ceylon; another on the Khasian mountains, and two in Madagascar. They are half shrubby plants, and grow in swampy grounds. None of them have any known properties, and they are valued alone for their very singular appearance. Those who are not quite familiar with their forms will see from the woodcut that the pitchers are supported by a stalk, which to appearance springs from the apex of the leaves. Botanists themselves have, however, differed as to what this pitcher-like formation is—whether a prolongation of the midrib of the leaf or the true lamina or blade. An opinion at one time prevailed that the basal or leaflike portion was the true stalk become leafy, and that the lid of the pitcher was the true lamina. Dr.

Hooker, who has paid some attention to this subject, has come to the conclusion that the portion which has so much the appearance of an ordinary leaf, and to which the pitcher is appended, is, in fact, the leaf, and that the pitcher is a prolonged modification of the midrib. We know that in plants these transformations of parts frequently take place, and that the very flowers themselves are composed of the simplest organs, the petals, stamens, pistils, &c., being only altered forms of leaves. In the pitchers we have one of the most distinct metamorphoses known.

The presence of water in the pitchers in their young state is a notable fact, considering the closeness with which the lid fits. As the plant grows older, however, the lid opens and never closes again On account of their shape these natural vases have been very aptly called pitchers, but they might as well be termed "traps," flies and other insects being constantly caught and drowned in them. The power of secreting water is effected by small glands at the base of the cavity, and it has even been thought that it is a provision of nature for supplying animal manure to nourish the plants. Very beautiful objects are these plants when growing, in their bright green colour, and with their light and airy appendages, are always objects of interest. The pitchers can always be well preserved if carefully stuffed with cotton wool and then gradually dried. The species mostly in cultivation in our hot-houses are Nepenthes distillatoria, Nepenthes Rafflesiana, and N. ampullacea. The pitchers of these several species vary much in size and shape, some being six or eight inches long, and beautifully marked with rich brown spots. But the prince of pitchers is one of comparatively recent discovery, from Borneo. It has been named Nepenthes Rajah, by Dr. Hooker, after Sir James Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak. It is fully twelve inches long by six broad. The blade of the leaf is eighteen inches long by eight broad, and the midrib is nearly or quite as thick as the middle finger. This fine plant would certainly be a great acquisition were some traveller to succeed in bringing it home in a living state. A somewhat imperfect leaf and pitcher, dried, are in the Kew Museum. The young seedling plants of Nepenthes, with their perfect pitchers, are as pretty little objects as can be conceived. Where the ground is covered with them, as in their native country, the sight is described as being particularly beautiful. Mr. Low, who has travelled in Borneo, and done much to introduce these peculiar plants into this country, says, "Apparently the first attempts to form the leaf in the young plants are futile. The extended fibres become only pitchers, which, as the petioles are closely imbricated, form a dense mass, and frequently cover the ground as with a carpet of these curious formations."

These, then, are what are known as the true Pitcher plants; but others occur in families having no botanical affinities whatever. Thus, in the Sarraceniaceæ, or side-saddle flower order, we have the genera Sarracenia, Darlingtonia, and Heliamphora, all forming perfect but variously shaped pitchers, with this difference, however, that in these genera the pitchers are not appendages at the apex of the leaves, but are broad petioles, or leaf-stalks, united at the edges. The lamina or blade is small, and is seated at the mouth of the pitchers. This order, like the Nepenthaceæ, has no known properties or economic value, though the entire plant of Sarracenia purpurea was brought into this country from North America some short time ago as a reputed remedy for small-pox. The whole interest of the Sarracenias lies in their structural peculiarities.

The popular name of side-saddle has been derived from the peculiar shaped disk into which the style is expanded, and which bears five very small stigmas. The pitchers are usually nearly full of water, which is probably secreted by the plants. They are, perhaps, better insect traps than the Nepenthes, for round the mouth of the pitcher is a sticky or saccharine exudation, and that portion immediately below is perfectly smooth. Nearer the bottom, however, there is a series of sharp reflexed hairs. The flies being attracted by the sugar, slip down the smooth surface into the water, the hairs preventing their return.

The pitcher of the genus Darlingtonia is, perhaps, more peculiar in its formation than either of those we have yet spoken of. Near the orifice it curves over, forming a perfect hood, and it is from the inner edge of this hood, on the under side, that the true leaf springs. This leaf is very deeply divided, or two-lobed, the lobes spreading out and hanging downwards. The entrance to the pitcher is under the curved hood. This in some measure protects the orifice, and though, just inside, there are short, sharp hairs around the circumference, insects have frequently been found dead at the bottom of the pitcher. From the position of the vaulted hood over the mouth of the pitcher completely shutting out rains or other atmospheric moisture, it would seem to be conclusive that what moisture is found must be, as in the case of the Sarracenia, secreted by the plant. The only species known is Darlingtonia Californica, a perennial herb, growing in marshy places in California.

Another very pretty little plant is the Cephalotus follicularis, with its clusters of pitchers, the bottoms of which apparently rest on the ground and surround the leaves and flower spikes, which start upwards from the centre of this peculiar little cluster. The leaves themselves are somewhat spoon-shaped, and bright green in colour, like the pitchers, which are, however, marked with small brown or purple spots. The month is very similar to that of the pitchers of Nepenthes, having a thickened rim, and notched in a very regular manner. This peculiar little plant is a native of Australia, being found in swampy places in King George's Sound. It was introduced into this country so far back as 1823, and flowered for the first time at Kew in 1827.

Having noticed the most singular of leaf developments or appendages, let us now say a few words upon a remarkable example of an apparently undeveloped leaf. The numerous forms of leaves are all known to botanists by their technical names, which define their shapes, &c., and whether simple or compound, aquatic or land plants, their composition is the same. We know that leaves are made up of a green fleshy substance, covered on the upper and under sides with a thin epidermis or cuticle, the middle layer being composed of two tissues, called the vascular and cellular tissues. The vascular forms the veins and ribs of the leaf, while the cellular fills up the interstices with cells or fleshy matter. This, then, is the form of leaf we are mostly accustomed to look upon, but there is one peculiar plant, a native of Madagascar, whose leaves when growing have every appearance of having been skeletonised, perforated between each rib or vein, and this also is its truly normal condition. The plant to which we refer is a water plant, and is called the lace or lattice leaf plant. For its introduction into this country, or we should rather say their introduction, as there are two species known, we are indebted to the Rev. W. Ellis, a Madagascar missionary of some note, who brought the plant home in 1855. It is certainly one of the most interesting and beautiful of aquatic plants. The leaves, though apparently skeletonised, are of a green colour, and are attached to the rhizome or root-from which they radiate-by long stalks, presenting a flat surface uppermost, so as to be perfectly exposed to the eye. They grow to about a foot in length and two or three inches broad. At first sight one is apt to think that these peculiar leaves are abnormal and entirely devoid of cellular tissue, but upon closer examination this tissue is easily seen to surround the veins or ribs, though never entirely filling up the leaf; indeed the older and larger the leaves grow the wider and more open the interstices become. The plant bears its flowers on spikes which shoot up from the centre bases of the leaf stalks, and become branched into a double spike at the top. It grows in shallow water, or on the submerged banks of streams, and being only a short distance below the surface, is always visible. When placed in a white glazed earthenware pan, as we frequently see it in our hot-houses in this country, it is a very beautiful object, as the dark green of the leaf shows better against a light-coloured background.

As we have said, there are two or three species known: Ouvirandra fenestralis, however, is mostly in cultivation. The plant has an economic value in Madagascar, the roots being collected by the natives for food on account of the farina which they contain.

The generic name is derived from the native name ouvirandrano, meaning water yam, in allusion to the edible roots. This plant is not a solitary example of the natural perforation of leaves, though it is the most conspicuous one. In that magnificent water lily, the Victoria regia, similar perforations, to a slight extent, occur. These are caused at first by depressions upon the upper and under surfaces of the leaves at corresponding points, and are in their youngest stages closed by a thin membrane which afterwards disappears. Whether these perforations are a provision of nature to assist in carrying on the functions of the plant is a reasoning to which many are inclined. The strong thick ribs on the under side of the leaf, dividing it as they do into a thick framework, naturally confines the air between these divisions, and it has been supposed that it is for the purpose of allowing the air to escape that those holes are provided, otherwise that portion of the leaf between the ribs would not touch the water.

We have now pointed out some of the principal and most peculiar metamorphoses or changes leaves undergo, and will now note some of the more singular forms of flowers, and more especially fruits which recommend themselves to our notice chiefly for their similarity to other objects, and not for any abnormal formation. When we hear such names as the "Hand Plant," the "Telegraph Plant," or the yet more peculiar name of "Dancing Girls," given to a member of the vegetable world, we are sure there must be something either in its formation or movement to warrant such appellations. A name more appropriate could not have been given to the "hand plant," especially when the scientific and vulgar names agree in their literal meaning, as in this case, the generic name being Cheirostemon, from cheir, the hand, and stemon, a stamen, in allusion to the stamens being arranged in the form of a hand. The specific name platanoides indicates its habit to be similar to a plane tree; thus literally translated it would be the Plane-like Hand-tree. The Cheirostemon platanoides is a native of Mexico, where it grows in forests to a height of thirty or forty feet. This plant was discovered near the town of Toluco, where a solitary tree alone grew. It was greatly venerated by the natives on account of the singular formation of the flowers, as well as owing to the belief that it was the only tree of the kind in existence. It is more than probable, however, that the tree in question was taken from the forests near Guatemala and planted in the position where it was found. The singular flowers from which the plant derives its name are from two inches to two and a half inches long, and about the same width. They have no corolla, but when the flower is fully opened the calyx expands, forming a five-lobed deeply-notched cup, from the centre of which the column of stamens springs, dividing at about an inch and a half from the base into five parts or separate stamens, representing the five fingers of the human hand. This simile is the more perfect from the fact that at the point of dividing from the column the stamens are recurved, thus exposing what represents the palm of the hand uppermost; and being bent inwards again at the tips, the whole, when inverted, does not require a great stretch of the imagination to discover points of likeness to the claw of a bird. These stamens are of a bright-red colour, which lend to the flower, besides its peculiarity, an attractive appearance. In the fruit there is nothing remarkable; it is simply five-valved, opening spontaneously to allow the escape of its seeds.

The flowers of Mantisia saltatoria, a plant belonging to the Zingiberaceæ or Ginger order, are peculiar in form, and have, as they grow, a light, buoyant appearance, hence their popular name of "Dancing Girls." The word Mantisia has been derived from a resemblance which the flowers also have to the insect

Mantis; the specific name saltatoria referring to a dancer. The supposed head and neck of the lady is formed by the long filament of the stamen, and the anther with its membranous wing; the corolla has long lateral inner segments which represent the arms, the dress being formed by the labellum or lower curved petal. The plant is a native of the East Indies, and is frequently cultivated in hot-houses in this country for the sake of its singular flowers.

The irregular forms of the flowers of the Orchidaceæ are now so well known since these plants have become fashionable, that even the Butterfly orchid is no longer such a great rarity as it was some few years since. It is a native of Trinidad and Venezuela, and is known to botanists as Oncidium papilio. The flowers, which somewhat resemble a beautifully marked butterfly, are borne singly at the ends of long slender stalks, so long indeed as to make the flower appear at a distance rather suspended in the air than attached to the plant.

There are several species of Oncidium having peculiarities of more or less interest, but the same may be said of the Orchidaceæ in general, as well as of many other plants; and we will proceed in our next paper to consider many singular forms of fruits.

JOHN R. JACKSON.

UNDERSTANDEST THOU WHAT THOU READEST?

No picture is more familiar to us than that of the Ethiopian nobleman returning from his worship at Jerusalem, and reading aloud, on his chariot, the book of the prophet Isaiah. It is a history full of instruction. It speaks of an earnestness in seeking God-a diligence in the use of light given-an exertion and self-devotion in acting upon the knowledge of duty-which is an example for all time. And it speaks too of the reward of these things: how the eye of God marks such diligence and such exertion; how He takes care that, to him that hath, more shall be given; how He sends instruction to the teachable, guidance to the seeker, light to the watcher, and enables him who but now was puzzling hopelessly over the dark sayings of a Prophet, to lay hold of a directing clue and a guiding light, by which he may reach the Saviour Himself, and go on his way rejoicing.

The Evangelist Philip, guided by the express mission of the Holy Spirit, approaches the chariot of the Ethiopian stranger, hears him reading aloud, as he journeys, the volume of inspired Prophecy, and addresses him in words as grave as they are significant, "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

Let the same question now sound in our hearts—in reference to that completed Book, of which Philip and the Ethiopian possessed but one half, and that the more elementary and the less Evangelical half—and let it say to each one of us, not for an answer aloud, but for an answer to conscience and to the heart-searching God, When thou openest (as all Christians open) the Book of Holy Scripture, to find therein a lamp to thy feet and a light to thy path, "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

I fear there must be, for some of us-what was needless for the devout Ethiopian-an earlier and more elementary question still, "Readest thou?" In how many a nominally Christian home is the Bible unread from Sunday to Sunday! left unopened, unregarded, on the shelf or the table! eyed (so to say) askance, as an enemy and an intruder, nor come to benefit or to comfort, come rather to torment us before the time! Some who pray read not: how many, alas! neither pray nor read. Consciences are sensitive upon this subject. You might bring in vain many tentative charges against a congregation or against its members: you might draw your bow at a venture, trying one by one the arrows of remonstrance and conviction upon a sick man, dying and unawakened before you, and none should pierce and none should hit: but this, I think, might almost be depended upon, to hit at least if it pierced not, Was the Book of God your study and your meditation? Did youdaily read, daily mark it? Was it your companion by choice, was it even your monitor by duty? Too often day dawned and night darkened upon youyou rose and you rested-you had time for work, time for food, time for exercise, time for society—but no time for the Bible; no time to give to the study of that record of Revelation which yet you professed to receive as your rule, to trust as your guide, to look to as your hope. Who would not have been ashamed to be seen or to be heard, like this Ethiopian, reading his Bible as he took his journey? And is that shame itself a good sign—a sign of a depth of reverence which cannot bear to be intruded upon, of a sincerity which dreads to be overrated? Or is it not rather a confession of neglect and ungodliness, bashful about religion in public just because it does despite to God in secret? The question, "Readest thou?" must go before the question, "Understandest thou?"

But indeed the two questions are not wholly separate and disconnected. Many read not because they understand not. They have tried many times to become interested in the Bible, and failure has made them close it. And certainly many understand not because they read not. They give themselves no chance of understanding—they do not even read.

What is it then to "understand" the Scriptures? We may distinguish two things in it. There is an understanding of the mind, and there is also an understanding of the heart.

Some parts of the Bible are difficult of expla-There are passages in the Prophetspassages also in the Epistles-which even learned men cannot agree upon, which the uneducated cannot even guess at. Allusions to obscure events in history, to manners and customs long obsolete, to natural features now lost, or geographical arrangements now obliterated: and, on the other hand, unusual expressions or abstruse arguments such as only scholars can investigate, theologians discuss, or logicians unravel: these things, and others like them, make the understanding of a considerable part of Holy Scripture as difficult to the mind, as its deepest meaning must ever be inaccessible to the natural heart of man. In these respects, it may almost be said of a large portion of the Bible, as the prophet Isaiah says of the vision of God when it came of old to His people, "It is become as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed: and the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned."

But even where the interpretation is certain, even where the sense is plain, still it cannot be understood—nothing can be understood—without study. It is here that men deceive themselves. They fancy that the Bible is the one book in the world which needs no labour. Most painful is it, most affronting, to Christian people, to hear men of the world fing abroad hasty, superficial, summary judgments upon revelation and doctrine, without so much as the pretence of having studied or reflected or pondered. "Every one knows that "—" every one can judge of that "—is the language, scarcely veiled, upon God's truth and God's inspiration, on the lips of men who would think it monstrous for common sense, apart from long labour, thus to pronounce upon an art, a history, or a science. If any one is to be able to answer "Yes" to the question, "Understandest thou what thou readest" in the Bible? he must at least have diligently read and earnestly studied, in all its parts, the things written therein.

And let me say-lest anything before spoken as to the difficulties of the Bible should be made into a discouragement or a stumbling-block to anythat even a poor person, even an ignorant person, even a young child, will find page after page of God's Holy Word clear and explain itself before him as he dwells upon it in patient earnest study. I speak now even of the understanding of it by the mind. Just as the wisest of men can know nothing of the Bible without study, so the humblest of men can know much, can know most, of the Bibleeven as a matter of understanding-by study. "Thou hast hid these things," even intellectually, "from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." How often, how often, do we find that true!

And how much more often, when we come to the second part of understanding-which is that of the heart! We can all see that what the Bible speaks to in us, is not the mind, only or chiefly, but the heart. A person might have read all of it many times over-might have read it in the Greek, and read it in the Hebrew-might have read it with all the notes of all the commentators, and with the added help of all the travels and all the histories which could throw light upon its allusions and upon its references-and yet know nothing of it for his soul's health. The supposition is indeed unnatural: for who would care thus to know the Bible, if he cared not for a thing yet beyond—for the knowledge of it as opening to him the way of salvation? But the two kinds of knowledge are distinct, and must be spoken of in their distinct-

What then is it to understand with the heart?

This Ethiopian did not yet understand the Scriptures, because he had not yet found in them Jesus. He was still asking, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this"—this about the sheep led to the slaughter, and the lamb dumb before his shearer—a humiliation which deprived of justice, and a life taken by violence from the earth—"of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?" And it was when "Philip opened his mouth, and, beginning at the same Scripture, preached unto him Jesus," that he first "understood," in the true sense, the thing that he read.

Even so was it with the disciples after the resurrection, when One greater than an Evangelist at last "opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures." It was by making them see in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, the things concerning Himse!s.

Thus then no man really understands the Bible until he finds Christ in it. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." It is not only in one chapter of the prophet Isaiah, it is all through the Old Testament Scriptures, that God is testifying of His Son. The Law testified of Him. The moral law, by revealing to man his sinfulness, and making him cry out for forgiveness to One who is all-holy. The ceremonial law, as the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches us, by prefiguring an open way into the Divine presence, through the atoning and sanctifying blood of Jesus. How much more as the revealing light cleared and brightened, till it became in the prophetical Scriptures almost a Gospel - disclosing more and more of the work and of the glory of Him that should come-of man's utter need, and of God's boundless mercy -that so there might be no lack of signs by which men (when He came) might recognise their Saviour, and no dimness or dullness of hope for those who must go to their graves before His appearing.

And perhaps we think that there can be no doubt, in Gospel times, as to our thus understanding the Scriptures. We know that they are full of The very first use made of them for us in childhood was to teach us out of them the advent and the ministry, the life and the death, of Jesus. And the chief object of our ever opening the Bible for ourselves has been this-that in some cloudy and dark day, of anxiety or of bereavement, we might find something about Him to calm our fears, and to say to the tempest of our souls, "Peace, be still!" And yet there is no doubt that the understanding of Scripture with the heart is even more rare (if it be possible) than the understanding of it with the mind. We see Christ, it may be, in the Scriptures: but do we go on to seek Him, by their help, as the light of life, and the anchor of the soul, and the propitiation for personal sin, and the source and inspirer of an individual holiness? "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life-and they are they which testify of me-and yet ve will not come to me that ye might have life." Ah! it is here that we come short. We see that Christ is in the Bible: but we do not go to Him, we do not call Him in, we do not for ourselves seek nor search nor see Him there! And this last is the understanding of the heart. This last is the thing which enables a man to give an affirmative answer, when the question is put to him, apart by himself, "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

It remains then to ask, Why not? and to ask also, How? The two questions may be combined in one brief and closing enquiry. For, if we become conscious of the reason why we understand not, we shall also be instructed at the same time how we may understand.

And here, first of all, I need not fear to say positively that, in this as in every instance, we have not because we ask not. If, not as a form, but with deep, earnest truth, we always prayed our Church's Collect before we read the Bible - asking God to give us grace so to read as that we might embrace and hold fast Christ-that would be a safe and a sure step towards the "understanding" spoken of. How much more if we made it a matter of daily prayer that God would be pleased to open our understandings and prepare our hearts to receive Christ into them as our one Divine rest and peace and joy! But, as it is, we read the Bible, when we do read it, as if it could of itself do for us the thing which we want: as if the printed page could enter the soul, and work there by matter what is from first to last a work of spirit; as if the mere passing of the eye over the lifeless book could do by magic that office of enlightenment and salvation which the Holy Spirit of God deputes to nothing and to no one. If we would understand what we read, we must read in God's presence what God has revealed: an earnest and solemn act of self-presentation to Him for instruction must precede every readingand the thought, "I am here before God as His child and His disciple," must go along with the reading-and the prayer for the implanting of what has been taught, and for its carrying out with us into life, must close the reading-or we shall have been guilty (little as we may suspect it) of forgetting God in His gifts, of dispensing with His inward teaching even while seeking and occupied in the outward.

Next to this, and scarcely second even to this, in importance, I would place the consideration, that no one can love and no one can profit by the Bible, unless he is sincerely desirous to live the life which God approves. It is one practical proof-worth many laborious arguments - of the Inspiration of Holy Scripture, that sinners feel towards it just as they feel towards God. When Adam had sinned, he straightway hid himself (it is written) from the presence of the Lord God among the trees of the garden. And so, if a man is cherishing any known sin, you will always find him hiding himself from his Bible. Not only because the Bible is a religious book. He will take up a Christian biography-he will take up the narrative of a Christian's deathbed -he will take up a volume of sermons, and read without repugnance that which yet reproves and condemns him: he will not take up his Bible. can more easily pray than do that. The one may be the cry of a miserable divided heart in the ear of a distant God: the other is like God coming to him, and speaking aloud in his ear the words of confutation and judgment. The man who is not sincerely desiring to make his heart clean and his life pure, will never understand-if he can help it, he will never read-his Bible. See then, on the other hand, one of the ways towards that understanding. "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded." So shall you approach that book which has so much of God, so much of Christ, in it, not with dislike or repugnance, but with an earnest desire that ye may profit and that ye may grow thereby.

A third chief hindraneo to understanding the Scriptures is the infrequency, the intermittence, of their study. We shall never understand, so long as we grudge and stint the use of them. A common average Christian thinks it his duty to read a Psalm or to read a chapter daily. That is his maximum. Often it is cut short-often it is forgotten - often it is jostled out of his day by some call of business or pleasure, some accident of late rising or of evening drowsiness. But the rule is this. It is done, when done, as a dutyas something for the omission of which he will be punished-by doing which he will have given satisfaction to conscience and to his God. Alas! so long as this is our spirit, we may do the duty, but we shall never "understand" the Bible. The man who is to do this-the man who is to find Christ, to know God, by his Bible-must begin by determining to have it for his friend. "O how I love Thy word! It is my meditation all the day." "His delight is in the law of the Lord: and in His law doth he meditate day and night." You may say, that is an advanced stage of the study. It is so. But it has its beginning too. Much depends-I had almost said, everything depends-upon the way in which you view your Bible. Regard it as a dull book, and it will be so. Regard it as a book fit only for sickness and sorrow, and you will soon make it so. It will retire before you, sad (as it were) and reproachful, yet obedient too, into those dark and dismal chambers to which you bid it to confine itself. And then, when you would seek it there, perchance you will not find it. When you open it, it will not speak: when you call upon it, it will not answer. This is the punishment of those who in days of health have counted God's Word their enemy. But the converse is true also. Determine, God helping you, that you will love your Bible: read it, read it again-read whole books of it at one sitting, and when next you sit down with it, read them again: if anything at first puzzles you, study it, pray over it, then lay it aside, and soon study it again: that which was dark before will oftentimes be light now: what you know not now, you shall know hereafter: have the book itself always about, keep it very near you, on your desk and on your pillow: I had almost said, confine yourself to it till you can love it-and you will love it: it will begin to talk to you, it will begin to answer you, it will begin to resolve your doubts, and to stimulate your curiosity: it will accommodate itself to your mood: it will be grave when you are grave, and it will smile when you smile: till at last you shall say with the Psalmist, "I am as glad of Thy word as one that findeth great spoils-How sweet are Thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth! The law of Thy mouth is dearer unto me than thousands of gold and silver!"

Then at last, when the question is put to you, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" you shall be able to answer, with a joyful heart and a good conscience, "Thou, Lord, hast given me understanding—Thou hast dealt well with Thy servant—I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord!"

SUMMER DAYS AT CHALCEDON.

By MRS. WALKER, Authoress of "Through Macedonia."

YORGHI, our Greek servant, calls this place "Halkithôn;" the Turks have named it "Cadikeuy," or the village of the Cadi; and I know it as the best and most enjoyable of all the pleasant villages that fringe the sparkling shores of the Bosphorus.

During the absence of my husband in England, I am spending a brief summer holiday here, with some kind friends whom I shall call Aunt Sally and Uncle Ben, after a Greek mode of endearing expression, and not on account of any relationship between us, or of the slightest tendency to be venerable about the hospitable master and mistress of the house.

It is a bright, pleasant, cheery time; there is everything that heart can wish for, both in and around this pretty home; I mean a reasonable heart, not one that finds its sole happiness in three toilettes a day with several hours of lounging on the quay at Buyukdereh or Therapia, or of sitting in ball costume to watch the arrivals by the steamer.

after the fashion of the Prince's Islands: our pleasures are of a different kind, such as belong to the true happy life of the country: exquisite scenery, pic-nics, riding, sketching, boating, bathing, for the day; with music, bagatelle, and, occasionally, charades to enliven our evenings.

The house stands in a corner of the vineyard, which formerly covered the whole of the little promontory called Moda Bournou: it was celebrated for its fine "Tchaoush" grapes, and until within a few years was innocent of modern brick and mortar, but the tide of public favour has begun to set this way, and houses are rapidly springing up in all directions; you might imagine it for an instant a suburb of a small provincial town in France were it not for a large green tent in the adjoining field which quickly undeceives you. This is inhabited by a family of Montenegrins; they sleep in their tent, but pass the greater part of the day under a spreading tree in front of the house; the kitchen range is set up amongst the roots of a neighbouring mastic. The owner of the tent, who struts about gorgeous in gold braided jackets, and a belt full of ornamented weapons, and who commands his servant with the air of an emperor, is called, by the neighbours, Prince of Montenegro, as he lays claim to be connected by marriage with the ruler of his small country; nevertheless, the Princess, his wife takes in washing at so many piastres the dozen, and she certainly acquits herself (to our satisfaction) quite as if she had been accustomed to it all her life. This green tent under the trees with its half-wild occupants recalls the eastern element to the picture.

Uncle Ben's home, which is built nearly on the verge of the cliff, is a charming dwelling, such as London auctioneers would describe as "a desirable villa residence." On the ground floor, a cool marble hall leads you through a rustic porch, heavy with clematis and passion-flower, into a bright garden all sparkling with sunshine and gay blossoms. Of this part of the small domain I must say, as the greatest praise, that it is simply a garden-not a park, or pleasure-grounds, or parterres, or anything too grand or too extensive for the care of the two gentlemen who, aided by a Croat, make its cultivation the healthy employment of their spare moments-a garden with just the slightest dash of the cottage about it to give it a thoroughly comfortable look-a garden where the arbours are made to drink tea in, and the flowers are made to be plucked (discreetly), where, through the waving masses of the rose-covered trellised walk, you may observe healthy green peas and robust cabbages not ashamed to be seen in their proper place—a garden where geraniums have not yet all become pelargoniums, and where the delicate old-fashioned scarlet fuchsia dares still to show itself beside its washed-out sickly-looking modern sister; a border of homely, fragrant lavender blossoms modestly in one corner, and some sweet-briar bushes, delicate and scarce, are tended with peculiar care. Mixed with all these friends of childhood are others which speak of a foreign clime; long pendent leaves of the sugar cane are waving near the orange and lemon-trees whose bright golden fruit sets off the rich tints of a wild pomegranate—the castor-oil plant spreads abroad its large finely cut leaves—the snowy cotton is bursting from the pod, and the heavy yellow ears of the Indian wheat gleam here and there beyond the clustering tchaoush vines and the waving feathery mimosa-trees. There is a slight paling behind a row of raspberry bushes which marks the limit of Uncle Ben's territory; beyond it, and scarcely divided to the eye, the vineyard, the avenues of trees, the azure sea, and the distant shadowy mountains—but of this tempting landscape a better view will be obtained from the terrace.

On the upper storey of the house, crossing three drawing-rooms shaded by cool Venetian blinds, through which you perceive the waving branches of the lime-trees and catch a dreamy vision of Stamboul in the distance, glowing through a mist of violet and gold, you reach this terrace, without which no house in the East is complete; so from the third room we step on to one which has been lately trellised over for the support of various delicate climbing plants, but these we do not even see—it is the view beyond which at once arrests our eye.

To the left hand, on the summit of the cliff overhanging the little bay, the large building of the French College is a most picturesque object in the foreground of the picture. Its rich warm colouring, of a pinkish-gold tint, stands out in exquisite relief against the green foliage, and the dark purple masses of Kaisch Dagh behind. The cliff falls abruptly down from the college to the bay, which is bounded on one side by a wooded headland, a favourite promenade of the place, skirted by the vineyard on one side, and fringed on the other by fine terebinth and mastic-trees, with an occasional olive for variety. From the foot of Kaisch Dagh, on the opposite shore of the bay, the land dotted with villas and tchifliks, and rich in clumps of trees, green shady lanes and pleasant fields runs out into the blue Marmora, until it narrows to a point marked by a magnificent clump of plane-trees; but there, as if unwilling yet to leave the clear mirror which is reflecting all its beauties, it shoots out again in a long tongue of land, covered with stately cypresses. A white old-fashioned lighthouse stands on the extreme point, and harmonises well with the surrounding scenery.*

Beyond this again, we see the Prince's Islands, Prinkipo, with its mass of terraced dwellings, and the old monastery crowning the crest of the hill; Khalki, more quiet, but with many habitations, dotting its surface, and another fine old monastery on the summit; Proté, remarkable for the rich red tone of its earthy cliffs; then the small islet of Platé, now the property of the Viceroy of Egypt; and last, but not least in beauty, a barren rock, rising abruptly from the sea, solitary, peaked, jagged, displaying all those changing tints of tender grey, with trembling shades of rose or gold, which are the especial beauty of barren rocks in the clear atmosphere of southern climes. Behind this beautiful cluster of islands, the snowy peaks of the Olympus of Bithynia rise above the noble range of mountains, which carry the eye far into the Sea of Marmora; then on the distant horizon you distinguish the faint outline of Cysicus, and, even in a certain state of the atmosphere, the rocky peaks of the Island of Marmora itself.

Such are the natural beauties which one may gaze on evening after evening with a fresh sense of enjoyment, for there is ever some changing tint, some passing effect of light and shadow, some gleam more bright than usual from the sinking sun, eudowing the prospect with a new charm; but if all this glorious beauty does not suffice, and your soul longs for the "giddy walks of fashion," you have but to drop your glance to the foreground of the picture; there, at our very feet, is the long rustic walk, bordered by the terebinth and mastic trees, overhanging the water, where the élite among the Kadikiotes stroll up and down to display their dresses, or sit on low stools to sip the coffee supplied from a small coffee-shop at the entrance of the walk: by the way, the cafedjie has lately attempted to polish up and enliven the interior of his wooden but by papering it all round with immense placards of the Weekly Dispatch, announcing in startling English type the arrest of the murderer Müller.

The entrance to the walk is the most favoured spot of all; here Riza Pasha, the fallen Minister of Abdul Medjid, may often be seen sitting on one of the square stools, enjoying the refreshing breezes of the bay, while he smokes his narghilé. He comes quite simply now, with perhaps a single attendant, for, though still wealthy, he is a broken man, and greatly aged since the days of his full-blown prosperity. Just beneath this favourite lounge is the new stone Scala, where all our little boats are moored, the Polly, the Lucy, the Janie, the Ada, and others which lie there in safety under the care of the cafedjie. Here, as the glowing ardour of the day begins to abate, the energetic British members of the little colony gradually collect and man the tiny embarkations, when rowing matches come off, under the wondering eyes of the listless Levantines, to whom unnecessary exertion is a subject of intense astonishment.

On the walk above, the crême de la crême of the native society of the place saunter along, the ladies with an elegant nonchalance, trailing their starched and beflowered petticoats along the dusty way with a scrooping noise, which sets one's teeth on edge, while the young masculine element breaks out occasionally into absurdities under the leadership of a wealthy scapegrace, but known here by the name of the "monkey;" the crowning folly of this young Kadikiote the other evening, was an attempt at guiding two donkeys, tandem fashion, and which of the three cut the most absurd figure it was difficult to determine. Some other well-known inhabitants of the place, rarely to be seen on the public walk, are, in contrast, a charming example of a perfectly distinguished Levantine family—the young son, just springing into manhood, sensible, courteous, and perfectly gentlemanly, is our especial favourite; and when Mme. L- and her sweet, fair daughter Marie called upon us the other day, we all agreed that two more graceful and lovely women could not be found in any country. The mother, still in the prime of life, devoted to her young family, and quite superior to the exaggerations which too often mark the tone of Levantine ladies, has all the graceful ease of the well-bred Frenchwoman, with the domestic, homely, modest tastes which we flatter ourselves as being more particularly our own attributes; and sweet, fair Marie well, she is, they tell me, fiancée, so I will not say more than that she is one of the most loveable, ladylike young creatures I have ever seen, and for their sake, and that of a few other families whom I admire and esteem, I will not further develop my impressions of Levantine society in general; but leaving the promenaders of Moda Bournou to criticise each other's dresses to their hearts' content, look upwards to the high ground behind the French College. There all is bustle and activity in and about the short row of houses which have clustered together for the benefit of fresh air, sea-bathing, and quiet (?). There is a German Hotel, and a French Hotel, both full of visitors, who group themselves about the doors as the shades of evening begin to fall, and the sound of their voices reaches us at intervals across the grassy slope. There, also, as surely as the shadows begin to creep up the bright coloured wall of the College, four merry little black ponies, with four merry little riders, two ladies and two gentlemen, trot briskly up the slope, and stop at the door of the third house in the row. Then dinner-bells ring, and the bustling, active, outdoor life subsides for a time, to wake up once more about two hours later. If there is a moon, you then see groups of idlers again lounging backwards and forwards; the windows of all the houses are open, and in defiance of the heat, the sound of polkas, lancers, and other inviting music, shows that some are more actively amusing themselves within. We ourselves are probably engaged about that time in a merry contest at bagatelle, in which the crinolines challenge the neckties, and the crinolines, yes-I must say it-the crinolines almost always win. But this is the end of our day. think the employment of the earlier hours, happy as we ourselves feel them to be, deserves a few words of remembrance, although there is little excitement, and still less of adventure in our daily

The bell clangs londly at half-past six in the morning, and, after breakfast, Uncle Ben and T. T., who forms part of the family, start for a twenty minutes' walk to the steamer which is to carry them to their occupations on the European shore, for we are in Asia. Before leaving, however, the gentlemen, who are devoted to their garden, have found time to visit their pet plants: T. T. (not Tiny Tim, but Trusty Thomas) has seen that his seedling geraniums and oranges and lemons are thriving, and Uncle Ben reports that the heavy wealth of the Banksia roses has broken the light trellis-work of the garden walk. Then the gentlemen depart. Aunt Sally watches them from the door, till at the turn of the lane Uncle Ben waves his white umbrella in sign of farewell, after which, the masculine element being thus happily disposed of till evening (for I am quite of Miss Muloch's opinion that no household can go on comfortably from which the gentlemen are not absent for six hours of the day), we begin that cheerful mixture of practical and intellectual pursuits which keep every family healthy and alive. One day, perhaps, there is some fruit to be picked for preserving, for a man has come round with a bargain in red currants (a rarity here), and the opportunity must not be lost; so, as the servants are all busy, we tuck up our sleeves, put on bibs, and set to work in a pleasant morning room, with folding doors, wide open upon the arbour of passion flowers and clematis, with the bright garden beyond, all sparkling and joyous in the sunshine.

This over, we adjourn to a pretty room up-stairs, where, generally, some family dressmaking is going on; for dressmakers are amongst the social trials of feminine life in Turkey, so we consult the "Modes Illustrées," or the "Journal de Demoiselles," and we flatter ourselves that the result obtained would not at all disgrace us in the fastidious capitals of the West. White Jackets are the rage just now, the sultry heat of the dog-days here making thicker stuffs unbearable, and we cut and fit and braid and trim, according to pattern or our own taste, as it may happen to suit.

We are a very happy little party of four ladies in this morning room: in fact, we are so well satisfied with each other's society, that I am afraid we do not stand very high in the estimation of the rest of the colony for preferring our rational occupation to the prevailing habit of strolling listlessly into each other's houses, to tell Mrs. M. or N. "that those Miss X Y.'s have actually got new dresses again, though to be sure they are only imitation, and very flimsy; they won't wash, for certain, but how their father affords so much finery is more than one can imagine;" or to state an opinion of "that idle Greek maid Calliope, who, instead of sweeping her rooms, has taken her parasol and gone for a stroll down Moda! in the very heat of the day too!" or to wonder at "Madame V.'s dirty little servant-of-all-work, Thespinoula, who objects to go to the neighbouring 'bakal's' for a supply of candles, because she is a 'demoiselle,' and it is not fitting that an unprotected maiden should go to a public shop." I may observe that in general Thespinoula flaps about the house in slippers without heels and stockingless feet; slie wears her uncombed hair hanging in a tail down hermuslin, while her garments display an absence of superfluity at times almost distressing; yet on fête days she expands like a gaily decked umbrella, and her head is adorned with one of the prettiest of coiffures, the light handkerchief with its border of biblibi, forming a coronal of bright coloured silk flowers.

These Greek servants are an independent race, quick witted in general, and capable of becoming good domestics, but they have their peculiarities. I knew one honest man a few years ago, whose sayings deserve remembrance. "Oh, Nicodemus, what have you done?" exclaimed my friend, Madame F——, in dismay; "you have broken my vase, my beautiful vase; it is ruined, I can never replace it."

"Madame," replied Nicodemus, calmly, "do not distress yourself, the harm is not so great, for I have only broken one half of it, the other half is all right."

Mr. F—directed that the remainder of a bottle of rare wine should be put aside, and was astonished to see a full bottle appear at table the next day. "I did as you wished, sir," observed Nicodemus. "There was some other wine in that bottle already, but that does not signify, as I took care to pour the good wine quite on the top."

Madame F— went to the Islands, and directed Nicodemus to pack her glass pots of preserves with straw; it was done, but on arrival the straw was discovered to be within the glass covers!

But I have wandered from Aunt Sally's morning room, with its green Venetian blinds and its peeps of sea° and mountain, garden and vineyard. Dear Aunt Sally is sitting by her work-table braiding a jacket; she delights in procuring as much enjoyment as possible; she is constantly planning the most delightful schemes for possible and impossible excursions—a pic-nic to Kaisch Dagh, for which we must have horses, three or four days of tent life in the beautiful forest of Alem Dagh, which I have never seen; a row across the bay this evening to take our tea on the cypress-covered promontory of Fanaraki; and, lastly, a little cruise in a small private steamer round the gulf of Nicomedia. We shall take Joseph the Armenian footman, who like most of his countrymen, can turn his hand to anything, and is an excellent cook. We can buy our provisions in the little villages; it is a charming idea, and even if not realised, very pleasaut indeed to think about.

has taken her parasol and gone for a stroll down Moda! in the very heat of the day too!" or to wonder at "Madame V.'s dirty little servant-of-all-work, Thespinoula, who objects to go to the neighbouring 'bakal's' for a supply of candles, because she is a 'demoiselle,' and it is not fitting that an unprotected maiden should go to a public shop." I may observe that in general Thespinoula flaps about the house in slippers without heels and stockingless feet; she wears her uncombed hair hanging in a tail down her back, from under a dirty rag which once was white laughingly called Fireworks, from a muslin jacket with peculiarly fizzy trimmings) is perfectly amiable and obliging; she greatly increases our enjoyment, and helps on our light labours by her readiness at all times to read aloud anything we may wish, for an unlimited length of time—a rare merit.

Thus our mornings glide away. About noon we drive; then, if the day be very warm, we retire to take the siesta in our rooms, from which we are aroused by the afternoon coffee; after this it is time to dress again, for at five o'clock a firm, decided, possessive knock, such as free-born Britons alone can perpetrate, resounds through the house, announcing the return of the gentlemen. When there is moonlight, and the plans are for a boating excursion later in the evening, the substantial meat tea is spread in the arbour under the flowering limes at the end of the garden; the table is decorated with flowers, and there is besides a beautiful convolvulus winding its delicate tendrils round the pole which rises in the centre. The air is scented with sweetbriar, Scio jasmine, orange-blossom, and all the various perfumes of the daintily kept parterres, and just beyond the paling a scarlet pomegranate in full bloom touches the whole scene with brightness. From his place at the foot of the rustic table. T. T. can have the satisfaction of seeing by a side glance that the precious seedlings have not suffered during the heat of the day, and Uncle Ben, while sipping his tea, can overlook the operations of the Croat employed to water the garden.

Sometimes our repast is made at Fanaraki, at that favourite spot, from whence we obtain such an exquisite view of Stamboul-the long point of land covered with those wonderful old cypresses, where formerly stood a summer palace of the Greek Emperors, built by Justinian on the site of the Temple of Juno, two churches, baths, and other public buildings; and where now in the midst of the grove of gnarled and weird-looking trees, some small vestiges of the former occupation may still be traced in a ruined bath and some crumbling remains of ancient brickwork. Further along the eastern shore are considerable ruins of masonry, with fragments of marble columns; and slabs and several cisterns in the broadest part of the promontory mark, doubtless, the site of the gardens of the old palace.

The cypresses of Fanaraki are the most gaunt and strange-looking specimens of the kind that I have ever seen. They must be of great age, as almost every tree has another tree of a different kind—terebinth, wild pear, or fig—growing from the very centre of its branches, and these again show signs of long duration.

Uncle Ben and T. T., on the occasion of our visits to Fanaraki, usually row us over early in the boat, and while the cloth is being laid under that beautiful spreading tree, which overhangs the Sea of Marmora, Madge and myself sketch vigorously. On our return late in the evening, the gentlemen profit by the bright moonlight in order to extend our row along the bay. Madge steers, and carefully avoiding a small sunken rock, which is apt to be obtrusive, we may perhaps glide along as far as the English cemetery, northwards, or in the opposite direction towards that curious pile of granite blocks, heaped in ancient times on the small rock beyond the extreme points of Fanaraki, supposed to have formerly supported a beacon, and called by some the rock of Juno.

I am sitting in the vineyard, under a stately stone pine, with Lu-Lu, my little Macedonian dog, at my feet. The scene is a curious mixture of nature and civilisation, in which nature has the decided advantage. In front, as I raise my eyes, I see the scattered dwellings, the "desirable villa residences," of the European colony of Moda Bournou; from one or two of these the strains of the educational piano, in various stages of progress, come floating over the tops of the vines, and I catch, now a few bars from Gounod's "Faust," now some painfully uneven scales; a feeble voice is asking anxiously "What are the wild waves saying?" a distant water-wheel is emitting agonising groans, and a man is crying tomatas in the lane beyond. Near the German Hotel, two full-blown crinolines, profiting by the delicious coolness of this breezy summer morning, are swaying along, elaborately decked out for a visit to Mrs. C., who gave us a charming quadrille party a few evenings ago; and I can faintly make out, through a half-open wiudow, a young lady trying on a new corsage à la Mousquetaire, after a pattern extracted from the last "Modes Illustrées."

The great trunk of the stone pine, which hides from me the last of the houses, forms a rustic framework between this picture of miniature town life and another as dissimilar as can well be imagined; close by, on the other side of the rough bark, a field of Indian corn with its beautiful feathery blossom, and long pendent leaves, rustles gently in the wind, which murmurs through [the branches of the pine and breathes softly on the green tops of the fruit trees, making nature's own sweet melodies full of the soothing harmony that lulls the soul to peace. The ground slopes downwards, and I catch glimpses of blue water through the trees; on the opposite shore, fields and hedge-rows, country-houses, and farms, with here and there a dark cypress for relief, the swelling slopes of Kaisch Dagh for a back. ground; further to the right, more waving trees with one glorious opening, filled by the deep-blue waters of the Gulf of Nicomedia, with its wall of solemn mountains; and still again beyond, a visionary outline of the snow-capped summit of the Bithynian Olympus.

I turn to the left. Here the vineyard has been sadly neglected: the proprietor, seized with a mania for building, has allowed the precious stems which yielded the delicious tchaoush grape to remain for the most part uncared for; they are stunted and barren, but the rich earth is not to be cheated of its ornaments, and the field is bright with lilac mosses and the wild hollyhock, mingled with tall grasses in full bloom. A Croat is watching his flock of silkyhaired goats — white, and brown, and mouse-coloured, and golden-hued—which browse round about, finding rare feeding on the green shoots of the neglected vines. Beyond the vineyard the deep azure of the sea of Marmora is dotted with snowy sails, and the view ends in a purple hazy vision of Stamboul, the Seraglio Point, and the terraced heights of Galata and Pera.

There is a beautiful grassy seat at the end of the principal walk, overhanging the water; we sometimes go there of an evening, to watch the sun sink behind the domes and minarets of the darkening city, throwing long rays of golden glory across the ripples, to paint with ruby and amber light the sides of Prinkipo, and Khalki, and Antigone, and bathe in rose-colour the richly-toned earth of Proté, the nearest of the group of the Prince's Islands; the small islet of Platé, and, last of all, the now barren but beautiful rock of Oxeia, complete the picture, standing out in delicate relief against the shadowy range of the noble mountains of Nicomedia.

A vineyard in Turkey does not mean simply a tract of land devoted to the cultivation of the vine; it is a pleasure-ground where the vine certainly holds the principal place, but which is a garden and orchard at the same time, full of every kind of fruit tree and flowering shrub. Some of the vineyards overhanging the Bosphorus are celebrated for their beautiful roses, and for the admirable style of their adornment with kiosks and fountains, shrubberies; and winding paths kept with perfect order. This point of Moda Bournou, known as Tubini's Vineyard, has very small pretensions to landscape gardening; but it has one remarkable feature of its own: the whole of this little promontory, as well as a considerable inland tract of land, was evidently. in some bygone age, the site of an ancient cemetery; the whole of the earth is mixed with, indeed almost composed of, broken bits of funereal amphora: you have but to stoop in our garden or in the vineyard to pick up more fragments of such pottery than you can carry. They are mostly of a coarse quality, although we frequently find remnants of the smaller black or coloured and highly-glazed vases which the ancients placed inside the large funereal urns. It is in the highest point of the vineyard that the most delicate earthenware is discovered, and this we imagine to have been the place of interment of the aristocratic portion of the former inhabitants. One part gives one the impression of having been formerly an avenue of tombs.

Strolling along this particular path after breakfast this morning to examine some masses of old stone and brickwork, which still exist in two or three places, we found the broken parts of two funereal lamps, and some pieces of finely-painted vases, which, for colouring and delicacy of design, remind one of the precious relics of Etruscan skill; everywhere lie strewn about large pieces of the coarse square bricks which covered some of the graves, many of them slightly painted.

While we were groping at the foot of a fig-tree, the Croat guardian of the vineyard came near to inspect our proceedings, imagining, no doubt, that we were interested in the tomatas, whose bright scarlet balls were peeping out all around from under their green leaves; but I quickly explained that our object was "stones," very, very old, quite of the old time. He seemed much struck with the novelty of the idea; he settled his fez, and said, "Mashallah! Yes, I understand. If you want that kind of thing, you must look in the part where the new garden has been lately dug." So I made him take us to the place, which proved to be a piece of ground close to the house, and which we had already examined. "When we were digging this up we found a great many large pieces," said the man. "Well, what did you do with them?" "Oh! they were all broken up and strewed over the land; you see the little bits all about."

I am not sufficiently learned in such matters as to pretend to fix any date to these remains. I can only remark that they resemble precisely, in form and texture, those which I brought away from the site of Ancient Pella, in Macedonia, and that Madge, my dear friend and great ally in these groping expeditions, declares them to be exactly similar to those which are quite commonly found in the Troad. She condescends to be interested in the lamps and coloured bits picked up this morning, although she has been rendered fastidious by a familiar acquaintance with the plains of Troy, where, by the exertions of that learned and zealous antiquarian, Mr. Frank Calvert, the opening of tumuli and the discovery of rare vases was almost an everyday occurrence, so that she is disposed to speak of my bits of Chalcedon pottery as beneath her notice; yet, in spite of the superior claims of the Trojan fields, I am convinced that any one having the means of excavating largely about here, would certainly find "something to his advantage."

On the opposite side of the bay, under a group of magnificent plane-trees, is a holy spring, called by the Greeks "St. John's Well." The well itself has now no remarkable feature about it, except that they have lately spoilt it by erecting above a trumpery whitewashed chapel; but a little higher up, on the border of the road, is a large mass of ancient brick and stone work, which has fallen down. An old tree of great size, growing from out the ruins, shows that it has lain there for a considerable period. A little further on, along the winding shady lane, which is the high road to Bagdad, you come upon the remains of what some people call an amphitheatre; some, an ancient cistern. Such remains are scattered all over the country. Often in our long rides about Constantinople we have come upon the traces of Grecian art in the wildest and most sequestered nooks. For miles and miles along those swelling uplands no trace of present human care can be seen. Scarce a tree throws its shade over those wild and barren slopes, which now blush with the soft pink of the flowering cistus, now glow with the rich tints of broom, heath, and lavender. The sweet fragrance of the wild thyme rises with each touch of our horses' feet; and, mingling with the hum of the summer insect, the tinkle of some distant goat's bell, alone reminds us that we are not utterly solitary in this grand and beautiful desolation. But formerly the scene must have been widely different. All over the face of the country, in the wildest and most unfrequented spots, you meet with ancient fountains, and with the broken water pipes, forming part of that gigantic system of irrigation by means of which this now barren wilderness, bloomed like a garden in the days of its ancient splendour. Stately trees doubtless at that time clothed the beautiful hills around the capital of the East, and the rich earth yielded something more valuable to the inhabitants than the wild flowers which alone spring up there now.

The great care bestowed by the Byzantines on the proper supply of water is shown in the immense cisterns still existing (though mostly dry) in Stamboul, the numerous wells, and, finally, the extensive network of water pipes which meets the eye at every step. These pipes are so beautifully made and fitted one into the other that I doubt whether, even our own dear Fatherland in the nineteenth century, proud as we may be of its skilful handiworks, could produce anything superior in quality and finish. But, again, I have wandered far from the cemetery of old Chalcedon, and I must return, merely pausing, in justice to the present Sultan, to remark that, since the accession of Abdul Aziz to the throne, there is a very marked improvement in the state of the country in the immediate neighbourhood of the city. The change is very gratifying, indicating as it does more peaceful and industrious tendencies in the present government of the country.

While the great Christian Emperor was earnestly labouring at the improvement and adornment of his new capital, he did not neglect the important city on the Asiatic shore of the narrow strait. He erected amongst other similar works the beautiful Church of St. Euphemia, on the summit of a gentle though lofty ascent, a quarter of a mile from the Thracian Bosphorus.

After the fall of Constantinople, in 1453, before the victorious arms of Mahomed II., many of the Christian edifices on both sides of the Bosphorus were destroyed, and the materials employed in the decoration of the mosques and palaces of the Moslem sultans. Thus the beautiful church of St. Euphemia, which seems to have stood in a suburb of Chalcedon, was demolished, and its stately columns and marbles now serve to adorn the noble mosque of the Sultan Soliman. The site of St. Euphemia may be ascertained by the remains of the fountain still called the Holy Well of St. Euphemia. I imagine this to be the same which I see mentioned as called in the days of pagan Chalcedon the fountain of Hermagoras.

Beyond and above this site, spreads out the beautiful plain which was often covered with the camp of Turkish invaders, and it was here that the last struggle took place between Coustantine and Lycinius, which ended in the latter's banishment to Thessalonica: it is now called the plain of Hydar Pasha.

It was near this spot also that Amurath IV., charmed with the exceeding beauty of the situation, built himself a palace, enriched with all the luxury and splendour of Persian taste. This palace was thrown down in 1794, and the marbles which composed it were taken partly to the gardens of the Sultans in Stamboul, and partly served for the construction of the vast barracks which were erected on the site. These barracks were burnt at the time of the revolt of the Janissaries against the good Sultan Selim III. in 1807. After the destruction of that formidable body in 1826, Mahmoud II. caused the barracks to be rebuilt. This building was well known during the Crimean War as the Scutari Hospital, a name which awakens a painful echo in many an English home; for, of the gallant sufferers who were landed at the Harem Skélé, and conveyed within the walls of the enormous structure, many, alas! by far the greater number, in spite of tender nursing and devoted care, passed through the lofty gateway but once again, to sleep their long sleep in the beautiful cemetery which overhangs the cliff, in sight of the distant minarets and shadowy domes of the capital of the Moslem world.

To spend a quiet day under the spreading oaks of Merdivenkeuy, a village three or four miles from this, was a project of long standing. We accomplished it yesterday. Aunt Sally, a model housewife, who is great in the commissariat department on these occasions, had eaused sundry preparations to be made in the way of chicken pie, rhubarb tart, roast veal, &c., &c.; the china and glass had been packed, neither the salt nor the tea-pot forgotten, and everything was in readiness in good time for the arrival of the equipage. For greater convenience, and a little also for the sake of the couleur locale, an araba had been ordered-not a painted pumpkin, or an ornamented pill-box, such as are commonly used, the proper name of which is "talika," but the real, genuine These conveyances are article, a bullock cart. mostly preferred for country parties, where the roads are too rough for the power of horses, or the frail timbers of the talika. They deck and ornament them very gaily. The body of our araba was much enlivened by paint and gilding, the wheels and the poles to sustain the awning being bright blue and red, and the awning itself of a rich carmine-coloured woollen stuff, of native manufacture, with a handsome gold fringe drooping in front. Our two white oxen also were magnificent, with their large frontlets covered with bits of looking-glass inserted amidst a thick embroidery of beads and spangles, the whole trimmed round with tufts of scarlet wool. Fixed to the yoke in front, and curving gracefully backwards, two long red poles supported strings of scarlet tassels, which dangled and swung with every movement; there is, I suppose, some use for this ornament, but I could discover none, except that of looking exceedingly picturesque and peculiar. You get into the machine by a moveable wooden ladder of six steps, and as they are not furnished with seats, the natives place mattresses at the bottom of the araba and crouch upon them; but to be thoroughly comfortable in this pliant attitude, you must have Eastern suppleness of joint, and neither crinoline nor any other of the impediments of our present dress. In our case, cushions were charitably arranged for us instead, and we were soon comfortably en route, four ladies and a little child within the vehicle, and the two Armenian servants perched somewhere about the entrance. Mr. E-, a young Euglish clergymau, accompanied us on horseback. Two serious, respectable-looking Turks guided our little team; one directing their heads by admonitory pulls of their long horns, the other stimulating their solemn progress by suggestive pokes from a goad he carried.

The araba having no springs, we were of course considerably shaken over the rough stones of the village; but we soon turned aside on to a somewhat smoother road, leaving the main street of the village near the point where stands a rather remarkable object-the blackening rafters of a half-This unfinished house, built wooden dwelling. which holds a commanding situation, is very large, and after a stately plan; it was commenced many years ago by a wealthy Armenian banker, Mugarditch Djezaïrli, by many called the King of My Cadikeuy friends can well remember the old man, thin, shrivelled, sallow, and bent, they say, more with sorrow thau age, for his almost boundless wealth had been as a millstone about his neck. Like many of his money-loving people, he had lent largely to a powerful Minister of a former reign; and, as is usual in such cases, was unable to recover his money, which brought him to the verge of ruin; he waited and pleaded for many years in vain, until, worn out by delay, he applied to the public arm of the law. To the honour of the Government, although the Minister was still in the enjoyment of almost unlimited influence, the judgment was ou the point of turning against him and in favour of the plaintiff, when the Armenian suddenly died. They said his coffee disagreed with him. He passed away, leaving no heirs; and the money? "kim belir?" A little English girl whom he had adopted, and who should have been his heiress, returned without fortune to her former home; but the ill-gotten treasure worked probably the fall of the powerful and guilty debtor: it was his last act of cruelty and oppression, for he shortly after fell into disgrace, and is never likely to resume his exalted position.

Another house which we passed, soon after turning the corner of the large meadow, which lately served as the English cricketing ground, attracted our notice, and elicited another tale of local manners and customs. By the way, this ground had been kindly lent by the Sultan, before his accession, for the use of our cricket club; it is now a part of the property which he has handed over to his nephew, Murad Effendi. But for the house, which is a bright, handsome, well-ordered residence, surrounded with gardens and greenhouses, fountains and orangeries, and adorned within, they say, with paintings of some value brought from Italy,-here flourishes a certaiu Don Andrea, now a high dignitary of the Latin Church of Cadikeuy, a wealthy and important personage. About four years ago. the substantial prelate was known as Andrea Calimaki, a modest Greek tutor in the village; and on the site of the trim modern mansion stood a pretty little rose-coloured cottage in the midst of a rambling neglected vineyard; it belonged to a Turkish family, too poor to cultivate their land properly, so they offered it for sale, and Calimaki, who had put by some small savings, purchased the property for a trifle. There was a condition attached to the salethe Turks who had held this land from father to son for many generations, had a family tradition that an immense treasure in jewels and money had been in ancient times buried away somewhere about the property, at a great depth; they did not perhaps put implicit faith in their tradition, at any rate they were too poor and too inert to undertake the necessary researches, so they sold their proproperty with the understanding that if the purchaser found anything of value within it, the amount should be equally divided between them.

Andrea took possession of his modest cottage, and nothing particular transpired, until it was remarked by the original proprietors that the cottage was expanding into a mansion, that the tangled vineyard was blossoming into pleasure gardens, and that the humble tutor had evidently become a wealthy man. They claimed their half of the recovered treasure, to which rumour ascribed a fabulous amount; but the voice of the earthen pipkin is small when raised against the golden vase. Don Andrea turned a deaf ear for a time, until the matter was referred to Rome, whither he was suddenly summoned. On his return every one seemed satisfied, and Don Andrea is now a cheery, hearty old gentleman, enjoying his rare good fortune in peace.

After passing the whole length of what we still call the cricket field, although no matches take place there now, our araba brought us out upon the plain at the foot of Kaish Dagh, which rose majestically in front with its beautiful outline and heather-tinted sides. To the left of the road a deep ravine marked the course of an insignificant streamlet, beyond which the land was rich with melon-fields and maize, both in blosson, the bright yellow flowers of the melon forming a beautiful contrast to the graceful feathery violet bloom, which drooped from the tall stalks of the Indian wheat. Beyond the melon-beds, the threshing-floors were in full activity, the oxen literally, as in Scripture phrase, "treading out the corn," one man urging them with the goad, while another sat on the threshing-board to increase its weight.

Our adventures in the short transit to Merdivenkeuy were of the mildest description, being merely now and then a violent plunge of one wheel into a mud-hole, eliciting a quickly stifled wail from the little boy, and four screams and an immediate proposal to alight and walk on our part; but the old Turk, who seemed to understand perfectly what he was about, would raise his finger with a warning "Soos" (silence), so we contented ourselves with clinging to the hoops of the awning, or preparing to fall as soft as possible into each other's laps.

Before reaching the village we passed a ricketylooking wooden bridge, which had been thrown over the crumbling remains of one which must formerly have had some pretensions; the broken arch is of heavy masonry, and near it are the traces of ancient brickwork. A magnificent plane-tree overshadows the bridge.

The spot at which our araba halted, at the entrance to the little hamlet, is charming. At first we could have almost imagined it a somewhat neglected village-green in England; spreading oaks of unusual size and beauty, intermingled here and there with elm and plane trees, surrounded a grassy glade, dotted over with snowy geese and an occasional cow or donkey; the barn of the tchiflik, or farm, looked homely enough, rising among the smaller trees of the village; but a second glance showed us that we were in a land, many of whose customs have scarcely varied from the old Biblical times, for the groups of women at the further end of the green sat with veiled faces, and all over the gentle slope of the hills the toiling oxen of the threshing-floors, and the primitive method of sifting the wheat, looked as if winnowing machines and all the endless string of model farming improvements existed not. Steamploughs have come into Turkey; they are at work on a large estate in the Gulf of Nicomedia, but I am thankful to say I have not seen them.

While the servants were laying the cloth for our early dinner on the grass at the foot of a stately oak, we strolled about to look at the groups of Turkish women who were also crouched on carpets round their mid-day meal. The summer life of Turkish women is very much of a pic-nic existence; they frequently pack up their carpets, their cushions, and their children, and are conveyed to some green shade, or near some sparkling fountain, where they make themselves perfectly at home for the day; if a baby is of the party they commence their temporary installation by knotting a shawl at the four corners, and swinging it between two trees, and the little hammock bed is, in two minutes, just the same as it would be at home, where large rings are fixed into the woodwork of the rooms for this purpose.

There were some pretty girls among the groups of women, sitting on the green at Merdivenkeuy; two especially, in crimson satin férédjies, attracted our notice. They had lowered their yashmaks for convenience of eating, and we could see their small delicate features, and calculate the amount of paint which was in favour with each one. A striking-looking Abyssinian slave, with an apology for a yashmak floating over her head and shoulders. warmed up the dinner over a little fire of dry sticks. Another party of four ladies, more rigid in their ideas of propriety, got into their carriage whenever they wished for a quiet smoke and a perfectly uncovered face. They strolled near us while we were at dinner, and seemed greatly to admire our "spread," but they were perfectly ladylike and unobtrusive. Not so an ancient dame in tatters of a Greek cut and fashion; she hobbled towards us as soon as we were seated, with her knitting in one hand and a long wand in the other, and squatting down at the foot of a neighbouring tree, fell hard to work knitting, staring at us unremittingly all the while; she was only interrupted by occasional onslaughts on the wild dogs, who, judging apparently that she had intentions of poaching on their rights to the remnants of the feast, were disposed to treat her as an open enemy; she beat them off, however, and immediately subsided on to her heels, knitting and staring as before. As soon as we had finished, the old hag suggested that it would be well that she also should dine: her wish was gratified, and she seemed content for a while, but never left her station of observation, losing no opportunity, as we passed near her, to insinuate that money would be acceptable, with many complimentary phrases, of which, through my ignorance, the charm was lost to me.

The parties of Turkish women whom we had found on the ground on our arrival, left early, and drove off to end the day at Tanaraki, where there is a fashionable native promenade on Fridays, but later in the afternoon two more talikas came up and deposited their freights, consisting of three very young women and a minute baby. They were accompanied by two men dressed as sub-officers, which is so unusual a proceeding and one so contrary to Mussulman ideas of propriety, that at first I rather avoided approaching them; but as they were perfectly quiet and well-behaved, I concluded that they were persons of an inferior rank, who are not perhaps so scrupulous about appearances as their betters. The baby was a curiosity; about a foot long, swathed and wrapped in a small shawl, with its tiny feet and hands projecting, it looked like a good-sized chrysalis, as one of the young soldiers danced and caressed the little bundle. He appeared very proud of it, and brought it to Aunt Sally to be admired. The mother, we found, was the youngest looking of the group, a pretty little pale thing, about fourteen years old. We left her nursing the little one as we passed further on, and turning back soon after, saw her cherry-coloured satin férédjie flying gaily in the wind on the crest of the hill, while she was being whirled round with one of her companions on the threshing-board.

Having made a little sketch of our araba with the chief arabajie, who was much pleased with the performance, we departed very reluctantly from the shady glade of Merdivenkeuy, and climbing again into our springless conveyance, progressed only too quickly homewards, for every moment deepened the long shadows on the breezy common which led us towards Cadikeuy. Stamboul, in the soft distance, was putting on its opal-tinted veil, while in the clear evening sky above us, one feathery cloud, touched here and there with gold, had taken the form of an angel with outspread wings, holding towards the distant city a shadowy crown or garland, seeming an emblem of rest and peace.

An emblem of rest and peace? Alas! since those few words were written, the very darkness of the grave has shrouded that doomed city. The fearful sickness, the cholera, brought in the first instance by the scared Egyptians flying in wild terror from the scourge at Alexandria, has fallen on Constantinople with a violence which the devoted and most praiseworthy efforts of the Government have scarcely tended to allay. To arrest altogether the spread of the epidemic by quarantine regulations, I believe to be impossible. The awe-stricken people fled in blind confusion, some to die by hundreds on the crowded boats which carried their reeking freight towards distant coasts, where already the strange mysterious malady, spreading with giant strides, grimly awaited the few survivors; others, to strew the high roads into the interior with the corpses of the hapless creatures, who sank, and died where they fell, happy if some scanty tree or barren rock shielded their last agonies from the piercing rays of the sickening sun.

Now, as I write, the fatal visitation has been mercifully permitted to diminish its ravages; how many have been swept away by it, in Stamboul especially, will never be ascertained, as the official returns are supposed to represent not one-third of the real number of deaths. It is known that in one day, of which the published number was little over three hundred, seven hundred victims to cholera were carried for interment through the Adrianople Gate, one only of the numerous gates which lead from the city to the neighbouring cemetery; on another day, sixty Imaums were borne to their last resting-place by the same road, and during the worst period of the sickness, 2,000 a-day is supposed to be within the number of deaths in Stamboul and the villages of the Bosphorus; but the darkest secrets of this sad time of terror will never be revealed on earth. Numbers, they say, found a hasty, even a living grave, in the silent waters of the Sea of Marmora, thrown over on the first sign of illness from fishing-boats, and from the great bazaar calques which ply between St. Stefano and Constantinople. I was told by an inhabitant of the former place that of one boat-load of twenty-seven persons which left there, six or seven only reached the landing-place; and allowing largely for the exaggerations of fear, I must believe from what I know of the degree of abject terror which had seized the native population, and their general carelessness of human life, that there was some truth in these fearful reports.

Our village of Cadikeuy, which escaped the former visitation of cholera, has been heavily afflicted; twenty a-day being carried off from the small population during the worst period. Sometimes in the night-time unwonted footsteps and the hushed voices of men, passed our house in the direction of the landing-place; we did not ask each other why the stillness of the dark hours was thus broken, but we knew afterwards that the sick and the dead were being carried to the boats which conveyed, the former to the hospital, the latter, we knew not whither. But this was not until some weeks after the outbreak of the cholera; it declared itself at first in the Arsenal, and spread rapidly to the surrounding localities of Haskeuy and Kassim Pasha, where it carried off great numbers of the low Jewish population. This was expected, not only from their poor living and dirty habits, but from the bad drainage of those places; the wretched Jews further invited disease by eating the unwholesome vegetables which had been thrown away into the Golden Horn by order of the authorities.

The English, many of whom live at Haskeny, employed in the Arsenal workshops, alone remained stoutly at their posts when all the native workmen had fled in terror: at first they suffered slightly, but when the Government thought it necessary to relieve the overcrowded cemetery of Stamboul by bringing the bodies for interment to the Ocmeidan, on the hill above the village, landing them at Haskeuy, where they were obliged often to leave the blackening corpses exposed on the scala till the toiling carts could return to fetch them away to their uncoffined graves—then the English sickened and died: some, too many I fear, paid in that awful moment the penalty of intemperance; but some were good and gentle women who had remained in the infected neighbourhood rather than increase the panic by their flight. A friend of ours, the Rev. Mr. K-, whose self-devotion to these afflicted people has been admirable throughout this season of bitter trial, told me that one excellent woman, the wife of a principal engineer, said to him: "My husband wishes me to leave Haskeuy, and I should like to go; but I think it would discourage the people, so I prefer to remain here." She remained; the next day she sickened, and on the following afternoon it was Mr. K---'s sad duty to read the burial service over her in the English cemetery at Ferikeuy.

Another death touched me very much. A bright young girl, whom I knew, had married a thriving engineer of this same village; the husband took the cholera and died; the young wife, who had lately become a mother, was unable at first to realise her sudden loss; then, as consciousness returned, she was seized with milk fever, and was laid beside her husband a few days later, leaving her two little orphans to the care of the pitying neighbours, whose kindness to each other, their charity, their self-devotedness, have been, I am told, beyond all praise.

But severe as the visitation has been at Haskeuy, Scutari, Cadikeuy, Yeni-Keuy, and Therapia, it is at Stamboul that the cholera has raged with the greatest violence. The Turks, in common with all Eastern nations, being accustomed chiefly to a vegetable diet and to a great abundance of fruit during the hot season, must have suffered from the sudden deprivation of this kind of food; and the complete change-many of the poorer classes having at the same time a difficulty in procuring better nourishment-may account for their greater aptitude to take the malady. The Government has done its utmost to meet the difficulty, and has lately purchased great numbers of oxen and sheep in order to reduce the price of meat to its proper level. This is a wise measure, and one for which all must be grateful: but the diet of a people cannot be safely changed in a day.

The unhappy Turks, in the height of the calamity, caused processions of Imaums to traverse the streets of the city and of the suburbs at night barefoot, crying to the Almighty to have pity on the plaguestricken people; they even prayed some Christian communities to join them in these litanies. I do not know whether the request was complied with. I cannot think with those who ridicule this movement, and ask what has become of the stoicism of Mussulman "Khismet." I sympathise rather with the gentleman who raised his hat as the procession passed, and was pleased to see the satisfaction which this slight mark of good feeling appeared to afford them: Christian and Moslem, the children of one Heavenly Father, suffering under one common calamity, should we not alike and together "cry unto the Lord in our trouble"?

The solemn and awe-stricken demeanour of the Turks has formed a most striking contrast to the disgraceful conduct of many of the lower orders of the rayah population during this painful period; they seemed to wish to brave the danger from which they could not fly by drowning their fears in "raki;" and the quiet hours of the night often ring with the unholy echo of their drunken brawls. Many Greeks took refuge on the neighbouring tongue of land of Fanaraki, where they raised rude teuts and lived for a time under the shelter of the cypress grove. The wood of the cypress is supposed to possess disinfectant qualities, and fires of it have been lighted constantly in many parts.

Our happy summer days are clouded with tears. Our little household, thank God for it, has passed unharmed through this fearful time of sickness; and this safety I attribute greatly, under Providence, to the healthy, cheerful, rational tone of Uncle Ben's home. While the public offices were closed, the Exchange shut up, and the deserted streets of Galata testified to the extent of the panic, our English gentlemen have continued to go bravely to their daily avocations in spite of the harrowing sights and tales of woe which met them there: they did not speak of them on their return, but we surmised much of the truth; and without giving way to overpowering fear, we have never for one moment altogether forgotten the solemn dispensation which overshadows us. Our kind friends are ever ready, with the tenderest care, to avert the first symptoms of illness; and at the same time our course of employments has been unchanged. But if we have been permitted to pass through the danger thus unscathed in body, our hearts have been wrung by a deep, and to one of us an almost overwhelming, grief: a beloved sister, a cherished friend, one of God's ministering angels upon earth, has been taken to her rest, a victim to the dread malady: she fell asleep in hope and peace; but who can fill the vacant place her loss has occasioned in many sorrowing hearts? And - Oh! Caterina, my gentle little Greek maid, who gave me such willing, loving service-I have stood by her dying bed and felt with bitter sorrow that nothing could save the hapless young creature, who was the wife of our faithful servant, and who, until the fatal touch of cholera, had been in perfect health and joyous preparation for the near approaching birth of their first infant.

The cloud that has fallen over us, the sadness of all around, has dimmed the brightness of the glorious landscape; our pleasant plans and projects have faded away: and yet - perhaps - one day we may begin to speak of them again. terday they said that the snow-white gulls have returned; they were seen in myriads, circling in their flight back to the shores of the Bosphorus, and people now remember that during the late sickness all birds had been unaccountably absent; that the storks took flight a mouth before their usual time, as if the mysterious taint in the atmosphere, unfelt by man's coarser senses, were perceptible to the delicate instincts of animal life: but the snowy birds have come once more, and the soft summer of the late season may yet bring to those who are mercifully spared many a bright and happy day in sunny Chalcedon.

THE FIRST DOWNWARD STEP.

A CAUTION TO YOUNG MEN.

BY A CITY MAN.

haps nothing more forcibly strikes one than the apparent respectability of a large number of the prisoners awaiting their trial for acts of robbery, without personal violence, or fraud; such, for example, as clerks in merchants' or tradesmen's offices, shopmen, and their subordinates. Some of them have an open, candid look, and a frankness of speech particularly calculated to inspire confidence. Not only are the majority well-dressed; but there is actually an absence of all dishonest expression in the countenances of the greater number. I do not mean to say that, as a rule, they seem indifferent to their position. Many, indeed, show considerable anxiety as to the verdicts which will be pronounced on the charges brought against them. But their regret seems to be more for the folly that has brought them into their present condition, than for the sin they have committed. It frequently happens that a goodly number have been in respectable positions in life, and have received a good, and even religious education.

I am, however, far from saying that as a general rule, this respectability of appearance characterises in a like degree the prisoners awaiting their trial on charges of dishonesty in other parts of the country. I speak solely of London, where breaches of trust, committed to a greater or less extent by persons of presumed respectability, form a considerable portion of the cases tried at each session.

It would be a curious subject for inquiry, how far this honest expression of countenance in those awaiting trial, is real or assumed. Strange as it may appear, I am convinced that it is real: more especially in those cases where the prisoners have been committed for their first offence, and where their lives previous to the present charges being brought against them, have been unexceptionable. I am aware it will be argued, that a really honest man would never be guilty of theft or embezzlement under any circumstances, and that an opinion to the contrary must arise from some sort of morbid sympathy with crime, which, if generally entertained, would have most demoralising effects. To this I answer, that the class of persons I allude to, in nine cases out of ten, never had the slightest wish or intention to act dishonestly, when they took their first downward step. They commenced by some simple, trifling irregularity, quieting their consciences at first by some specious sophistry. When affairs became more complicated, and they began to fear detection, they told a lie to shield themselves from exposure. They generally succeeded in making things smooth again for a time, and gathered boldness from their former risk.

One beneficial effect expected from the punishment of offenders is, that by their degradation they will serve as a warning to others, to avoid similar acts of dishonesty. But this idea is far from being a correct one. A young man who may have taken his first downward step, by slightly tampering with property confided to his charge, and which he intends faithfully to restore, receives no lesson from the fact, that another clerk or shopman has just been sentenced to three years' imprisonment for some gross fraud. He has no intention of being dishonest, has never dreamt of committing such a disgraceful crime, and yet it is more than probable that in the case of the condemned criminal the first step was similar to that he has just taken. This first step to degradation made, the second will in a short time follow; then a third and fourth in quicker succession: until he finds himself unable to stop, and his downward course is arrested at last by the detective officer, or a magistrate's warrant.

I did not arrive at this conclusion as to the momentous importance of the first downward step in the career of a young man, without having gone pretty deeply into the subject. I not only, by personal exertion, collected a number of cases in proof, but I was greatly aided in the task by the kind offices of the chaplain of one of our great metropolitan prisons, whose views corresponded with my own. He collected for me. many authentic cases of prisoners who had been under his care, whose first fault had been a comparatively slight irregularity, without their having any ulterior dishonest intentions. As it would far exceed the space allotted to me were I to quote all the examples I could wish, I must content myself with placing before the reader three or four, merely to illustrate my meaning, only premising that I have taken them almost at hazard from more than a score of instances which I have noted down.

affairs became more complicated, and they began to fear detection, they told a lie to shield themselves from exposure. They generally succeeded in making things smooth again for a time, and gathered boldness from their former risk. Afterwards, acts of positive dishonesty were com-

A charitable gentleman obtained for the widow a situation as housekeeper for a suite of offices, with a salary of 25l, a year, without board, but with permission that the two children might reside with her. Of course, having three persons to maintain out of so small a sum, the poor woman was often in great straits. The boy, who had received from his father a respectable mercantile education, determined to relieve his mother (of whom he was very fond) from the burden of his board, and, if possible, to afford her some assistance as well. For this purpose he obtained from an acquaintance a daily inspection of the advertisements in the Times newspaper, and he anxiously searched in its columns in the hope of meeting with something that would be open to him. Day after day he made application, but never having been in a situation, and having, of course, no reference as to character, it was some weeks before he could find any one to employ him.

At last, and almost by chance, he entered a linendraper's shop, and asked if they required an assistant. The proprietor, who was in the shop at the time, being struck by the boy's open and candid appearance, and his apparent anxiety to do something, asked him a few questions, and was so pleased with his answers that he told him to call again in three or four days. The boy did as he was desired; and in the meantime the draper made some inquiries respecting his family, the answers to which were quite satisfactory. When the lad called on him, as had been appointed, he was informed that if he chose to accept a situation, partly as errand boy and partly as shop assistant, he might come on duty immediately at a salary of 7s. a-week, with his dinner and supper in the house. The poor boy was overjoyed at the intelligence, and thankfully accepted the offer. His conduct in his situation was irreproachable; he was industrious, civil, and obedient, and showed great capacity for business. His master was so well pleased with him that at the end of the first year he raised his salary to 10s. a-week, and employed him principally in the shop. He remained in the same situation for some years longer, and was at last promoted to assist in keeping the books, and thus he soon added to his acquaintance with the drapery business a good knowledge of accounts. At twenty years of age he left this situation for another at 11. a-week, in a large drapery establishment. He parted from his late master on perfectly good terms. They had a great respect for each other, and A. B. would gladly have remained with him; but, as he was accustomed to give a considerable portion of his salary to his mother, the offer of a rise to 11. a-week was too great a temptation to be withstood.

He succeeded so well in his new situation, and became so good an accountant, that at twenty-five years of age his salary amounted to 100k a year, though without board and lodging. Up to that time, a steadier young man had never entered a house of business. Not only did dishonesty seem to be unknown to him, but anything in the shape of irregularities in his duties as well. About this time he unfortunately became acquainted with some young men who had far larger incomes than he had, and he acquired that taste for ostentation which leads so many of our young men-of naturally honest intentions-into difficulties. By endeavouring to vie with those richer than himself, he insensibly got into debt. His liabilities were, however, but trifling, and he paid them off on the receipt of his next quarter's salary. But once out of debt, his late difficulties, instead of acting as a warning to him, seemed to have quite a contrary effect. He indulged in gaiety to a greater extent than before. When his next quarter's salary became due, he found his liabilities heavier than they had been the previous quarter. The amount he received, however, was still sufficient to pay them. and leave him a balance besides.

It should here be mentioned that as his love of gaiety increased, his love for his mother and sister diminished; and although his income was now ten times what it had been when he first accepted a situation, he had long ceased to make her any allowance, lavishing all his earnings on himself. His extravagance seemed to increase rather than diminish with his difficulties. At last, one day one of the parties to whom he owed the money, thinking to force it from him, called at the house of business to insist on its being paid. Dreading that his employers should become aware that he was in such difficulties, he assured his creditors that he had that day left his purse behind him, but that he would call next morning with the money and pay them the amount due without fail. He did so; but in what manner did he obtain it? He took-and this was his first act of dishonesty-as much money from the loose change he had under his control as would, with the money he had of his own, make up the amount, intending to replace what he had taken on receipt of his quarter's salary, which would be due in a few days. This slight defalcation was not noticed by the principals, for when his salary was paid he replaced the trifle he had taken, and at the same time he paid off a considerable portion of his debts, retaining sufficient only for his bare existence till the next quarter day. He now resolved that he would drop all the expensive habits he had so foolishly acquired. But he reckoned without his host. The creditors who had managed to obtain the money due to them, by annoying A. B. at the house of business, gave the hint to another creditor, who adopted the same means to recover his debt. The wretched man was now puzzled to know in what mauner he could relieve himself. There was but one way open to him, and that was again to abstract some of the money under his control. This he did with great repugnance, not knowing this time how he should be able to replace it. The debt was paid off, but an amount of anxiety of a most terrible description began to weigh upon his mind. He had to give an account of the money under his charge every Saturday, and how to supply the deficiency in this instance he did not know. At last he determined upon a step, frequently taken by young men in his unfortunate position: he applied to a tradesman who owed some money to the firm for the amount due, and this was immediately paid. Of this he made no entry in his books, but replaced the money he had abstracted, keeping in his possession the surplus, which he resolved he would not touch.

A circumstance now occurred which very nearly brought the whole affair to light. The tradesman who had paid the debt, on meeting one of the principals of the firm, complimented him upon having such an intelligent young man in their employment. After the conversation, it struck the partner as being singular that his customer should so speak of A. B., for he was not aware that there was any acquaintance between them, and he questioned A. B. on the subject. Schiller somewhere says, "The devil is not so wicked as to let a young servant perish for want of a lie," and he immediately placed one at the service of A. B., who informed his employer that he had known the tradesman for some time, and had met him on more than one occasion. Nothing more was then said on the subject, and A. B. congratulated himself on the escape he had had.

I have now described in what manner A. B.'s first step was taken. After that his descent was rapid enough. He found himself descending, and without the power to arrest his progress. He became reckless as to the future: but still the rags of his honesty clung about him. The amounts he abstracted were of the most trifling description, even while he had large sums under his charge. At last he found himself embarrassed to such an extent, that the whole affair seemed likely to be found out. The suspicion of his employers also began to be aroused against him, and singularly enough, this was owing to the partner having discovered that the statement he had originally made about his acquaintance with the tradesman who had paid the money, was untrue. A. B., now finding himself upon the verge of ruin, determined, if possible, to be relieved from his embarrassments; and for this purpose he resolved to commit a forgery. found he was a defaulter to the firm to the amount of 221. He calculated exactly what would be the cost of his passage to America, together with a moderate outfit, and he found that he would require 39l. altogether. He drew a cheque for this amount, and forged the signature of the firm; resolving, at the same time, that he would repay the money from his first earnings in America.

But he was detected before he had the opportunity of leaving England. He was arrested, and after a short examination at the Mansion House, was fully committed for trial. His employers would willingly have taken no part in the matter, on account of his previous good conduct; but he was prosecuted by the Bankers' Society. He was found guilty, and sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

The next case I shall mention is instructive as showing how fatal may be the ultimate effects of the first downward step, in a man of a naturally honest disposition.

C. D., -now a prisoner undergoing a sentence of nine months' imprisonment in one of our metropolitan jails for embezzlement-is the son of a docklabourer. His father appears to have been a low, sottish, brutal fellow, and had not taken the slightest care of his son, or made any attempt to bring him up in a proper or respectable manner. He could not himself either read or write, and finding that he was able to obtain the necessaries of life, as well as considerable quantities of drink, without such acquirements, he appears to have assumed that his son might be able to follow in his footsteps without any education. When quite a child C. D.'s father forced him to gain his own living by selling lucifer matches in the streets, which mode of life the boy continued till he was about ten years old, when a respectable tradesman (a bookseller and stationer), whom he had addressed in the streets, noticing the lad's honest and intelligent look, put some questions to him respecting his family connexions. Finding that the boy-though little better in appearance than a London Arab-had some elements of good about him, he told him that if he wished to become respectable he might call upon him the next morning, and he would see what he could do for him. The boy was delighted at the offer, and the next day called at the address which had been given him. The worthy tradesman, on questioning the lad as to what education he had received, found he did not even know his letters, and was very ignorant on religious matters. He had never heard either of a Saviour, or of the Bible, and had never, to his remembrance, entered a church. The tradesman. shocked at the utter neglect which the poor boy had received from his father, asked him if he would like occasionally to do odd jobs for him; determining at the same time, that if he found the lad trustworthy, he would do more for him afterwards. The boy willingly accepted the offer, and for more than a month he called each day, and was employed in cleaning boots and shoes, and other work of the same description, being narrowly watched the while by persons in the house. As the boy seemed willing to work, and betrayed no symptoms of dishonesty (for which he had several opportunities, had he been so inclined), Mr. X- determined to take him into his house as an errand boy, and to superintend his education to some extent. He entered on his new duties, and performed them in such a manner as to give his master great satisfaction. Mr. X-, true to his determination, now sent him to an evening school; and the lad being naturally very intelligent, made considerable progress. Before six months had elapsed, he could both read and write freely.

Unlike most boys of his age and restless habits, C. D. had a great love for study, and the improvement he made in his education during the time he was with Mr. X- was perfectly wonderful, and even surpassed his master's expectations. He spent the greater part of his small salary in endeavouring to improve himself; and by degrees acquired a very beautiful style of handwriting, as well as a very respectable knowledge of arithmetic. He also spent six months' wages in learning book keeping, in which he became quite a proficient. When about seventeen years of age, he changed his situation in consequence of the death of his master, and was engaged as shopman in a large respectable retail business in the same line, at a salary of 50%. a-year. He was soon much respected by his employers, who placed great confidence in him, and at last promoted him to keeping the day-book. C. D. now finding himself rapidly rising in society, began to pay more attention to his dress; and being a smart and goodlooking fellow, he soon made many acquaintances amongst those of his own class. . Unfortunately his friends were not all equally honest and respectable with himself. Some of them-as is too much the practice in the present day-had taken a great fancy to betting on horse-races; and C. D. one evening was drawn on to make what was for him a bet of some magnitude. Fortune was adverse to him; and he found he was one sovereign short of the amount of the bet. His salary was however, due the next week, and he could take the money from that belonging to his employers, which was in his hands. To do him justice he felt considerable repugnance to this, and he resolved (as is usual in such cases) never to do so again. He took the money and paid the bet, resolving to replace the amount he had taken, as soon as he received his salary, and so the thing passed off without detection.

It would be useless to trace the young man's downward career further. His first culpable irregularity drew on others still more blameable, till at last they culminated in acts of direct dishonesty. When he found he was unable to restore the money of which he had robbed his employer, his anxiety became so terrible that he took to drinking for relief. By something like instinct, he became aware that his employer suspected him, although not a word had been said on the subject. Again and again did he try to hit on some means of extricating him-At length, one morning, self; but all in vain. when he was almost driven to despair, he noticed his employer leave the house with a peculiarly sad expression of countenance. Something seemed to whisper to him that his career of dishonesty was about to close. He felt assured that his employer was on the point of taking steps against him; and that his only means of escape was to leave the house and conceal himself. But he had not the courage to make the attempt, but waited in a state of intense terror, for his employer's return. He was then told to go to his dinner, but to return as into extravagance. In his case (as in many others), quickly as possible. He now left the house, and had a fair opportunity of making his escape, if he had wished it: but terrified as he was, a peculiar attraction, which he could not withstand, seemed to draw him back to the house. When he returned. his employer told him some one wished to speak to him in the counting-house. C. D. found there a respectable looking man, who told him that he was a detective; and began to ask him questions, as to the manner in which he had lately employed his time. On finding that his defalcations were on the point of being discovered, he acknowledged, without hesitation, that he had been guilty of applying to his own use sums of money belonging to his employer, and earnestly begged to be forgiven. Pardon, however, was refused him. He was taken before the magistrate, and afterwards committed to the Central Criminal Court, where—as it was his first offence, and his previous character was proved to have been unexceptionable, -he was only sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. Here again was a proof, that the sentiment of integrity was never totally extinguished within the wretched youth, even while he was perpetrating his crimes. During the whole time he had had considerable sums of money belonging to his employer in his possession, yet the total amount of his peculations was only 91.

The next case offers, perhaps, a yet more perfect instance than either of the former, of a culpable irregularity leading, in the end, to direct and positive acts of dishouesty. E. F., now only nineteen years of age, is the son of poor, but highly-respectable parents, who appear to have taken great care of his moral and religious education. He was at first intended as an operative engineer, and was for some months employed in the service of a first-rate firm, but the work being hard, and his constitution delicate, he was obliged to leave it, and seek for some other occupation. With some difficulty, he obtained a situation in a draper's establishment, where he continued for more than a year. After two or three changes he obtained an excellent situation in London, with a salary of 60l. a year; more than double the amount he had hitherto received in any situation he had been in. He had to find his own lodgings and breakfast out of the money; but his other meals he took in the house of business. He behaved well in his new place, and being very assiduous and attentive, he contrived to gain the full confidence of his employers. A short time after his engagement, he was taken from the shop and employed at the books, as he was an excellent accountant, and wrote a beautiful hand. It might have been expected, that with an income sufficient to maiutain him in comfort, there could be little chance of his incurring debts; but such was far from being the case. While his income was small, he contrived to live withiu it, by a little management; but with an increase of salary, luxury and dissipation, and the wish to vie with others richer than himself, led him the casino, the public house, and betting on horseraces, brought him into debt; and how to relieve himself was a very difficult problem. No idea of dishonesty having yet entered his mind, he merely attempted to put off the evil day as long as possible; and for some time he was partially successful. length, being pressed by the person to whom he had lost money by betting, who threatened that if he did not pay the amount due, application would be made for it to his employer, he took some of his employer's goods. He still wished to avoid the appearance of any direct act of dishonesty. He entered the goods against himself in the books, and then sold them for half their value, in order to raise the necessary amount to relieve himself of his gambling debt. In this transaction, E. F. had not the most remote idea of ultimately defrauding his employers; but had resolved to pay for the goods he had taken out of his next salary. This he did faithfully, leaving barely sufficient to maintain himself till his next money was due. In this, however, he had calculated erroneously.

He had omitted one of his debts, and the party to whom it was owing now pressed him for payment. He again took some goods from his employer, entering them, as before, in the books to his own account. These he sold considerably under their value, and with the amount paid off the debt. Again his salary became due, and again he paid for the goods he had booked; but the amount was so heavy, that the surplus was totally insufficient to meet his expenditure till his next salary should be paid. In order to retrieve himself he again commenced betting, and of course lost. His first downward step had already been taken, another had followed it; and he now began to contemplate committing acts of dishonesty, which a few months before he would have shuddered even to think of. He took goods from his employer without entering them into the books, and sold them for considerably less than their value. During the whole time he was committing these depredations, his mind was in a state of the most intense anxiety. From his pallid and haggard look, suspicion was excited on the part of his employers, though hitherto they had not had the most remote idea of any breach of integrity on his part. At last he was thrown on a bed of sickness, and during his absence from the house, his books were examined, and he was found to be a defaulter to the amount of 50l. Nothing was said to him on the subject till he had quite recovered; and then he was arrested. He anxiously pleaded for pardon, which was refused by his emplovers, on the ground that it would form a bad precedent in an establishment like theirs, where so many young men were employed. He was shortly afterwards tried at the Central Criminal Court, and found guilty. He was strongly recommended to mercy, by his employers, who spoke of his previous behaviour in terms of high commendation, and in consequence he received a mitigated sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment, with hard labour Difficult, indeed, will it be for him to re-establish himself when he leaves the prison; and it will take years of labour (even if he succeeds) to again occupy the position he was in before he took his first downward step.

Although we have many other cases before us, proving how much the first downward step is to be dreaded, we submit that the three we have given are sufficient to prove our proposition. In most instances it appears impossible to detect the exact line of demarcation which separates the wilful irregularity from an act of positive dishonesty, -with such subtlety do they ofttimes run into each other. All the cases we have collected show that at the commencement the prisoners did not intend to wrong those who had placed confidence in them: and even after their first downward step had been taken, many of them would have revolted at the idea of committing an act of dishonesty; and vet all generally end in being thieves or forgers. It is singular to remark how seldom genuine poverty seems to have urged them to the crime they had committed. In almost every case it has been a love of luxury and dissipation, or the equally dangerous wish to imitate the bearing and style of life of those richer than themselves. A singular fatality also seems to attend them in this respect, that the money they become dishonestly possessed of appears to be utterly unproductive to them. They can neither purchase with it genuine amusement nor comfort; nor, if they attempt to trade with it, do their speculations ever succeed. When, after detection, the prisoner attempts to render an account to himself of the expenditure of the money, he finds it an impossible task, so swiftly has it passed through his hands. It is gone; and that is all he knows about it. Its possession and disappearance closely resemble those stories we read of in German legends, of people receiving from the devil a lump of gold over night, which they generally found turned into a log of wood or a few dried leaves by the next morning. Nor is this the case with petty defaulters alone, such as we have named. It was exactly the same with Redpath, Sir John Dean Paul, Roupell, Pullinger, and others. Pullinger especially is said to have been incapable of accounting to himself for the loss of more than two-thirds of the 400,000l. of which he had fraudulently taken possession.

With these great criminals, the first downward step seems to have been taken, in common with others, without any intention of ultimately committing a directly dishonest action. In all cases the money first appropriated was invariably restored. Step by step they went down, each succeeding step being swifter and deeper than the former, until they found it impossible to return. Some of the futile attempts made by them to calm their consciences after they had commenced their dishonest actions are exceedingly enrious, as showing the miserable sophistry the devil will use in order to deaden men to the enormity of the iniquity they are committing. Iu more than one instance we find, among petty defaulters, a fancied act of oppression or meanness on the part of their employer, used as an excuse for reimbursing themselves from his money. Let it be particularly understood, however, that this is invariably after the first downward step has been taken. Redpath attempted to atone for his sin by liberal acts of charity, and Sir John Dean Paul by strict religious observances. Neither of these criminals was hypocritical in his endeavours, and it served for the moment as a sort of opiate to the mind. If it did not succeed in shutting out from him the danger he was in, it at all events afforded a moment's relief from mental torture. How great that torture frequently is, may be judged by the behaviour of those great criminals when their acts of dishonesty were detected. Here the public seem to be labouring under a most erroneous impression. The indifference shown by these men in the dock is generally attributed to their being hardened in iniquity, and that by their stolid demeanour they are defying the aversion which is shown by those who behold them. This, however, is far from being the case. The punishment they are about to endure, and which perchance formerly they dreaded more than death itself, is now a haven of peace in comparison to the mental torture they lately endured. A few moments' reflection will tend to show how acute and oppressive their misery must have been. Many curious cases might be brought forward in proof of this, which, unfortunately, want of space prohibits our entering upon. One, however, must suffice-that of the notorious John Sadleir.

Could a full and accurate description of the career of this unhappy man be obtained, it might form one of the most instructive lessons, proving, as it would, the inability of a man to stop himself when once the first downward step had been taken. No man could have entered life with more honourable intentions, or with brighter prospects, than John Sadleir; and perhaps no one of our numerous criminals could be named whose fall was greater. His first downward step (as clearly as we have been able to ascertain) was, in common with the others we have quoted, solely a gross irregularity without any intention of direct dishonesty. After he found himself once entangled in the meshes of his crimes, no man could have struggled more energetically to relieve himself from their thraldom, and to return to an honourable position in society than he did, vet without the slightest success.

Sadleir was the son of a highly respectable solicitor in Ireland, and was himself a member of the legal profession. When a young man he was studious and indefatigable in his profession, and much respected by all. As he was naturally ambitious, he determined to enter on the career of politics, and accordingly took up the Catholic cause. By dint of immense exertion and great intelligence he at length became the leader of the Catholic party in Ireland, and was returned as a member of Parliament. He generally led the Irish party in the House, and perhaps could have commanded more votes than any other member of the legislature. So great, at one time, was his influence in the House, that it was said he could influence as many as forty votes. It is only natural to suppose, that with such power, his friendship and aid were earnestly sought for by the ministers of the day. He also entered largely into business speculations. with many of which he succeeded in a perfectly surprising manner. He was appointed chairman of the London and County Bank, the London Chatham and Dover Railway, and many other important public companies. Both in government offices and mercantile enterprises, his power of obtaining appointments was very great, and yet, to do him justice, he always appears to have exercised his patronage with great judgment and discretion. It is said that, among other valuable appointments, no fewer than four colonial judgeships were obtained through his influence. While to all appearance he was one of the most successful men of the day, being a Lord of the Treasury, and a frequent guest at the Palace, he was yet as common a forger as any at the time undergoing penal servitude.

Sadleir's first downward step appears to have been taken without the slightest particle of absolutely dishonest intention.

He had to pay some heavy calls on his shares in a gold mine, and found that he was at the time unable to meet the demand. He had in his possession some money belonging to a client who was then abroad, and this he made use of for the purpose of paying the calls, reckoning it certain that he would be able to replace it before the owner arrived in England. The gentleman, however, came sooner than was expected, and Sadleir, greatly surprised at his appearance, told him that he had not yet received the money, but that he should be certain to have it within two days. Of course no objection was made by his client, and on the day named, Sadleir, who had contrived to obtain the money, paid over the full amount.

The first step had now been taken, and immunity from detection having given him courage, Sadleir more than once made use of money belonging to his different clients, to assist him in his mercantile speculations-all of which moneys he for some time faithfully returned. At last, he became so much involved, that, in order to escape bankruptcy, he committed a forgery. The bill was, however, taken up by him before it arrived at maturity. He now commenced a regular system of forging; but the first forged bills to the amount of 10,000l. he regularly took up. Desperate, indeed, were the efforts he made to retrieve himself; but without effect. He purchased largely under the Encumbered Estates Act, being fully persuaded that the increased value of property would shortly enable him to escape from his difficulties. He was right in his calculations; but the rise was not so rapid as he had anticipated; and he entered largely into other speculations, all of which failed, leaving him at last almost hopelessly involved. Still he struggled on to retrieve himself—if possible. Singularly enough, the circumstance which caused him to destroy himself, is not believed to have been one in which he had committed any dishonesty.

A highly respectable solicitor, who was himself engaged in London, received one night, from a correspondent in Dublin, a telegraphic despatch, which merely said, "All wrong about --- 's mortgage; I will write by post." Sadleir, who saw the despatch, immediately conceived that it alluded to one of his forgeries, and that he was on the point of being discovered. Without saying a word, he went home, and on his road, purchased a quantity of essential oil of almonds: and the same night committed suicide. How great must have been the mental torture this wretched man had endured for some time previous to his committing this rash act, may be judged from the fact that a post-mortem examination showed that the coats of his stomach were impregnated with opium; and it was afterwards discovered that, from the constant use of the drug, the quantity he was obliged to take in order to procure a few hours' sleep, was enough to have killed an ordinary person. For some time before his decease, he seemed hardly capable of fixing his mind for five minutes together upon one continuous subject—his eye was incessantly turning, with a haggard expression, and he was totally unconscious of the matter under discussion. An absurd story is extant, that Sadleir, after all, escaped: the inquest being held upon the body of some other man. This, however, could not have been the case. The writer of this article saw him in conversation with Mr. Wakley, the Coroner (to whom he was well known), in the hall of the Reform Club, the evening before he committed suicide, and that gentleman immediately recognised the dead body when he saw it, without the slightest hesitation or indecision.

We would now submit to the reader whether the different instances we have quoted are not enough to prove that the first downward step is hardly sufficiently reprobated by moralists. To those who have no positive intentions to commit a dishonest act, the chain gang and the hulks have no terrors, and therefore can hardly teach a lesson. The great point to be held in dread is the first culpable irregularity, which, among criminals who have hitherto occupied a respectable position in society, is invariably the first downward step to an abyss, from which it is difficult, indeed, to return.

A PLEA FOR MUSIC IN COMMON LIFE.

In England in the sixteenth century, music was regarded as an essential part of a polite education. Thus in an imaginary conversation we find the following recorded:—

"Supper being ended, and Musicke Books (according to the custome) being brought to the table, the mistresse of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing; but when, after many excuses, I pretended unfainedly that I could not, every one began to wonder! Yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up, so that upon shame of mine ignorance I goe now to seeke out mine old friend Master Gnorimus, to make myself his scholler."—From Thomas Morley's "Playne and Easy Introduction to Practicall Musick." 1597.

But this pleasing little picture of social life, we imagine, represents what was then passing not in the cottage of the peasant, nor even in the farmsteading, but rather in the manse and the mansion. At the same time we must not forget how common were the art and practice of psalm-singing during Reformation times, when, as we are told, it was nothing unusual to hear 6000 persons at St. Paul's Cross all singing psalms. Neither was Scotland behind in this respect; for Calderwood informs us that, on the return of a banished minister (Rev. Mr. Durie) to Edinburgh in 1582, he was met at Leith pier by several hundred persons, who increasing to some two thousand as they went on, marched VII—34

"Now Israel may say, And that truly,"

"in such a pleasant tune in four parts known to most part of the people, that coming up the street all bareheaded till they entered in the kirk, with such a great sound and majestie, that it moved both themselves and all the huge multitude of the beholders, looking out at the shots and over-stairs, with admiration and astonishment." It is also an undoubted historical fact that, for several centuries, and even down to so recent a time as the year 1750, song schools existed in the chief towns of Scotland, where music, both vocal and instrumental, formed as regular a part of education to the sons of county gentry and town's burgesses, as the classics. Byand-by, however the public taste changed, and these institutions declined and vanished; and doubtless the musical degeneracy of Scotland is closely connected with this fact. By long disuse the musical faculty was believed to be lost, though not so much in England as in Scotland, on account of her Church possessing a more musical service. But up to within forty years ago the state of matters amongst us gave good grounds for the accusation often made by foreigners, that the British people were, as regards the art of music, uncultivated barbarians. A very select circle of well-meaning persons, who got more credit for their feelings than their judgment, patronised the few concerts then given, and a still more limited class of enthusiasts cultivated the art. To the million, however, music was a terra incognita; and it hardly seems to have entered into men's dreams that any moral or emotional power resided in this agent. A very great change has taken place, in this respect, of late years. It may, indeed, be doubted if any feature of our recent general progress will bear comparison with the advance made in musical proclivities, if not in musical culture.

Many, no doubt, still rest satisfied with a merely passive enjoyment of music; but with a goodly few it is much more than an ear-luxury, as they are at least able to recognise beauty of musical form, and some higher aspects and relations of the art, and the pleasure of hearing good music is by so much the more enhanced. And thus an art which appeals very powerfully to the best part of our being, is gradually becoming, as we hope, a "heritage to all." To prove that recreation is much more in demand than mental culture by those who toil, we have only to contrast the slight progress made by Mechanics' Institutes, their lectures, classes, and libraries, with the numbers of popular music-halls and concert-rooms that are being opened throughout the kingdom, till now there is scarcely a town of any consideration that has not a place of this kind. The number of musical entertainments is prodigious, and continually increasing, and thousands of persons-artistes, as they claim to be called-of exceedingly varied talents and degrees of culture, minister to the amusement of crowds, almost every night, during at least six months of the year. The business of catering for this taste is being rapidly reduced to something like scientific principles, and is generally found - such is the appetite of the public-to repay the enterprise expended on it. Never was the public ear so much cultivated; and the great soother, music, is now unquestionably the chief of our in-door public relaxations. The influence of this elevating and growing taste is powerful and salutary. The young are largely prevented from contracting low and gross habits, the depressing influence of toil is counteracted, the brow of care is smoothed, and men go home from these entertainments pleased and healthily excited, and scarce any the poorer. This tells not only on domestic happiness, but also largely on police statistios. On the whole, the general improvement which is taking place in the condition of the masses must be traced much more to this and like causes than to any repressive measures of legislation or police.

The increasing taste for high-class music must receive emphatic praise. Whilst a cultivated amateurship in hearing and enjoying music has been largely spreading, amateur execution has also, if with slower steps, been moving on. The magnificent vocal music of Handel, especially, has been studied, practised, and performed, to an extent almost impossible to be represented in words or figures. And though the sensations are not the same in kind, yet if appraised in different scales, the execution of music imparts greater pleasure than the hearing of it.* And, besides, the executants are not merely enjoying a luxury themselves, but ministering a luxury to others—so that music, like mercy, is, in this sense, twice blessed. The humanising influence of this art, therefore, interests and delights two classes—those who minister and those who are ministered unto.

Accordingly, while fully recognising this great movement, and desiring only to reform and purify, we yet think that musical culture may be extended in a direction, which may vastly increase its influence through society and its power for good. We hold that music may have a yet more congenial sphere, be cultivated with greater advantage, and impart more pleasure, by its receiving a cordial welcome and a home in the dwellings of the people, instead of being met only in the glare and crush of public life. Public feasting soon palls upon the taste, but the plain domestic meal is enjoyed through the even tenor of a lifetime. And as with feasting, so with music. Let public and domestic music go together: meanwhile we are concerned to make a plea for home music.

We greatly doubt, to begin with, whether the rage for favourite soloists be an unmixed musical good. The popular ear hankers after the silvery tones of a Patti, a Reeves, or a Santley-though ceteris paribus an Italian name is always of advantage-and the popular purse opens willingly and largely for the luxury. The admiration lavished on some artistes is simply a blind following of fashion. and is too often bestowed on skilful execution merely, or on trickery, if it only give out startling effects. But what of the modest though often good results of a disinterested culture? Let the experience of our musical societies be left to answer this question. We are not insensible to the educational influences which an eminent artist exercises upon those of his hearers whose ears and whose minds are intent upon self-improvement. But with all the rage for seeing, hearing, and talking about individual singers, the art is really little cultivated compared to what we would wish to see it-a conclusive proof that hearing pet performers does not sufficiently create the desire, or is not an efficient means of cultivation, either or both.

The expense to the pocket,—the price of admission, of dress, and of conveyances,—and the injury to the health, by overcrowding, exposure to cold and draughts, along with the violence often done to domestic duties—these and such-like are heavy drawbacks on public performances, which besides beget a want of composure and sobriety of spirit, greatly adverse to true enjoyment of the art. There are, moreover, various influences at work,—the system of puffing, and otherwise imposing upon the credulous public, by a class of traders whose first and great question is, What will pay? through which the interests of real art suffer, and its true province, that of raising and refining humanity, is perverted to the function of meeting, and pandering to, the weak and wayward fancies of the crowd, who hiss to-morrow what they applaud to-day, and do both without rightly knowing why. The agents, music-sellers, and caterers generally know well how to take advantage of what we have called the rage for soloists, and the practice of giving the latter a pecuniary inducement ("royalty") to sing particular pieces-in order that, like the knifegrinder's razors, they may "sell"—tends to corrupt art and delude the public. If you could imagine a whole concert made up of modern ballads, such as sentimental young ladies would admire, it would contain nothing but what a clever mimic or improvisatore might throw off, on the least cue being given to him, at a sitting-so little of character or stamina marks this class of compositions. Take a connected work of human interest, fitted to teach and elevate the people, and forsooth, it is not "popular"; and so it comes about that many composers care for nothing but momentary success.

Around the social hearth, on the other hand, music in its various forms may, so to speak, become a cheap and most enjoyable home-made article, with perfect freedom to choose your own materials. All, old and young, may easily engage in it, in a great measure free from the drawbacks we have enumerated as belonging to music in the crowd. Have you ever spent a musical evening with a family or circle of skilful and devoted amateurs? We assume you have been able to take some part. and we cannot doubt as to your reply, that the sumtotal of profit and enjoyment was vastly greater than at the ordinary run of concerts. Now we put in a plea for the extension of this kind of domestic concerts. But in urging this plea for music in the home, we think it of primary importance at once to point out our idea of the function of music-that music as usually understood is one thing, and the purposes to which it is applied another, and this latter too often ignored. Milton has said :-

We cannot accept this as wholly correct. It does charm the sense, and it is probable, as a thoughtful writer observes, that fine musical harmonies have a sanative influence over our bodily organisation. In certain morbid conditions of mind and body, music, we know, is a valuable remedial agent. Montesquieu says, "music is the only one of all the arts that does not corrupt the mind," and certainly we know of no better antidote to depressing or cankering influences, incident to continual toil and the cares of life. The natural desire for pleasurable excitement after toil can be gratified by no other means at once so easily and so cheaply attained, so harmless, so soothing, and so elevating. Music stands alone in this, that, whereas most other pleasures leave a residuum of regret, have a shadow more or less dark, it leaves, if rightly employed, a clearer intellectual vision, and more cheerful spirits. There can be no doubt that music has a great influence in imparting those delicious sensations which tend to sweeten and prolong life. But the heavenly origin of music, and its early use among men, alike prove that it was employed for the highest purposes, as the only adequate expression of angelic joy, and of human feeling and worship. Among the Greeks, we know, the term music meant not only the art of sound, but every other liberal (Muse-born) art. Surely with our present light, we may well refuse to confine the function of music, as some would, to mere "playing with sounds": for the music we advocate is not a series of sweet sounds merely, but an agent to interpret, intensify, colour, and impress the lessons and the beauties of poetry. Let the creative invention of man give it the forms which charm the sense; but the word and the spirit belong to man alone; and let it be wedded to the language of man, and let the soul and spirit of man thus find vent and expression. The living voice of man alone can be the organ and interpreter of his living spirit. If, as has been truly said, it requires the voice of man to intone the song of universal brotherhood, much more is it required to intone that of the praise of God, or even to prove a solace and relaxation worthy of a rational being. Well has our greatest living orator, Mr. Gladstone, observed :-"They who think music ranks among the trifles of existence are in gross error: because, from the beginning of the world down to the present time, it has been one of the most forcible instruments both for training, for arousing, and for governing the mind and the spirit of man. There was a time when letters and civilisation had but begun to dawn upon the world. In that day music was not unknown. On the contrary, it was so far from being a mere servant and handmaid of common and light amusement, that the great and noble art of poetry was essentially wedded to that of music, so that there was no poet who was not a musician; there was no verse spoken in the early ages of the world but that music was adapted as its vehicle, showing thereby the universal consciousness, that in that way the straightest and most effectual road would be found to the heart and affections of man." it is more than 2000 years since Plato wrote: "To look upon music as a mere amusement cannot be justified. Music which has no other aim can neither be considered of value, nor viewed with reverence." Music at first was simply the interpreter of poetry, and a drapery to it; and though, no doubt, the science of sound has been greatly elaborated since then, the result has too much tended to divorce the two, and thus man has put asunder what God made to be joined together. Whatever may be said of music as a system of sounds, yet even as appealing to the emotions, music must deal with ideas of which the mind can take cognisance. To these it gives fervour, and thus acts upon the emotions. We would not, however, utilise music too much, for there may be "songs without words," that partly suggest and partly express feelings too subtle for words; but in the general case, what an accession of vividness and power comes in with the word! Music is like molten gold, not to be poured out in a continuous stream, but, so to speak, into the moulds of ideas. We make this point prominent because, in general, it is very greatly lost sight of.

The universal devotion of women to one particular instrument, suggests the question how far, in treating of music, this particular taste deserves our approbation. The pianoforte is a noble instrument under the hand of a master, and of late years especially, some half-a-dozen players have, by a careful study of works of genius, made its performances splendid and intellectual. But these players move by themselves in an orbit to which they have risen by incredible labour, superadded to most uncommon fitness, and a rare enthusiasm. All ordinary efforts, however, must in proportion come short of this standard; nor in the general case can even a tithe of those immense efforts be possible, and even if they were possible, they could not, in the absence of a special genius, be equally successful. Hence, though money is expended by thousands of pounds to buy instruments and music, and to fee teachers, and time, more precious than money, spent beyond all human calculation in learning and practice, nothing is gained in ninty-nine cases in the hundred beyond a dead level of routine, artificial exercise to the eve and the fingers, with a series of sounds often barely tolerable. For who that has heard the playing of Thalberg, Arabella Goddard, Halle, or one or two others of like ability, though less known, will hear ordinary drawing-room performances with more pleasure than contempt? Is it, we ask, an adequate return for this incalculable outlay of time and means, that one's performances simply please, or perhaps only seem to please, a circle of too-partial friends? Or, if the enjoyment of practice, such as it is, be added to the credit side of the account, what if, after all, the thing music be unknown and unfelt, the power to move or to be moved by it a blank, and even the art of sight-singing, possessed by thousands of school-children, unattained? Yet we confidently appeal to the observant and candid reader, if such be not a fair summation of the results of pianoforte cultivation generally speaking. But we go a step farther, and it is rather a long one: we declare our belief that excessive, or even average, devotion to this instrument, has a tendency to mislead and blunt the ear to the perception of true intonation-that, in short, fidelity to the piano will prove falsity to song. This last point is of too technical a character to be entered upon iu detail here. But a jury, or individual, who will calmly try the experiment of applying the recognised mathematical scale by ear to the piano, through the various major and minor keys, or compare the instrument in this respect with the more perfect violin, or the still more perfect human voice, will return a verdict finding this charge proven. A serious charge no doubt, but it is further established by a practical test—that no devoted pianist was ever yet a true and feeling singer. No, it is time the truth were fully told—would it were acted on!—that piano-playing is a merely conventional accomplishment. Formerly the lute, virginal or spinet, harpsichord, etc., were fashionable instruments; and we do not see why ladies should not extend the range of their instrumental playing, and not be so uniformly alike in this as in so many other matters,—dress, talk, gait, and so forth.

But for our own part, we care not to confess that we hold all instrumental music as fit only to rank many degrees below the cultivated human voice, that is, when the voice is applied to high musical purposes, animated by intelligence, and moved by feeling. And where is anything known to us to compare with the voice of woman, when it is the organ of womanly emotion? Hence the undoubted claim which the voice has to priority of cultivation: hence the enjoyment, which, culture assumed, it gives, as not an interpreter merely, but part of your being, so superior in this respect to a mere dead piece of brass or wood, catgut or wire. The excessive and increasing prevalence of the costly and resultless form of musical cultivation we have alluded to, has induced us to brave the ordeal of truth-telling in regard to it. But we do so to show a more excellent way. We claim that the voice-the first and best of all organs of music-be first cultivated; and this leads us to an important part of our subject: the influence of woman in song. In other days, the "Gentlemen's Catch Clubs" and similar societies were composed exclusively of men, who resorted to them not alone for the sake of the music, or, if so, their enthusiasm must have been something wonderful, considering the materials on which they wrought. They met invariably in taverns, and, stimulated by good fellowship and joviality, the members were fully as much devoted to Bacchus as to Terpsichore. Part-music, for recreative purposes, in which the female voice had a place, was at a time very recent almost unknown. The ample recognition, however, of this potent and charming element by composers, and its accession to vocal music, is beyond all comparison the most salient and important fact in recent musical history. The gain has been every way unspeakable. In song, woman's emotions and woman's voice find a high and congenial exercise. Very sweet songs, as sweet as any in the Bible, are those of Hannah and of Mary; and women appear to have had an important place assigned them in the musical service of the Temple, and in that of the early Christian assemblies. With regard to vocal excellence, one has only to hear a male chorus, and then a mixed one (both good), to realise what an accession of warmth, sweetness, splendour, and pathos, the female voice brings to the "coucord of sweet sounds." To find the cause of this, we must add to beauty of voice, a deeper and even more potent element, intensity of feeling-for both qualities are required for true musical effect, and in both, woman excels man.

Now, it is one of the great advantages of the home cultivation of music, that this primary musical element would be made fully available as it can be by no sort of public organisation. In fact, in the domestic circle, woman's share in music wouldfemale modesty intact -- predominate; and this, within certain limits, is a guarantee for musical excellence. That this would also afford the best security for anything like general musical cultivation, must be too obvious to need to be stated; for to what influence can we compare that of the mothers of the present and of the next generation?

We need scarcely mention the great advantage of the daily use of music in family worship. How pleasing the picture the great Scottish poet has drawn of domestic psalmody in the "Cottar's Saturday Night ":-

"They chant their artless notes in simple guise; They tune their hearts, by far the noblest aim:
Perhaps Dundee's wild-warbling measures rise,
Or plaintive Martyrs, worthy of the name,
Or noble Elgin beets the heavenward flame, The sweetest far of Scotia's holy lays: Compared with these, Italian trills are tame; The tickled ear no heartfelt raptures raise; Nae unison hae they with our Creator's praise."

And the daily use of psalms and hymns in the home, is the best security against a meagre and degenerate church song, which all denominations of Christians have still more or less to deplore. How sublime and soul stirring, on the contrary, in the rare installes where it is heard in anything like perfection, is the voice of the great congregation! Gather, then, the children, the infants even, around your knee. Watch how soon a child will sing a hymn or song-before he takes it in intellectuallyand can we doubt (to borrow a happy simile of Hood's) how salutary these "impressions before letters" may after a time become? Do not too early confuse and vex them with intellectual disquisitions about notes, but simply let them lisp their childlike hymns musically. This we know was pleasing to Him who said "Suffer the little children to come unto me," when the children joined in the Hosanna to His praise. Although, as we have said, anything like formal instruction to children should at first be rather avoided, yet the language of music, when a proper key is applied to it, is not so intricate as is generally supposed. Without associating irksome exercises with what should be pleasant recreation, yet after a time, even children may gradually be trained without difficulty, "to sing from the notes." This must be effected, as everybody acquainted with the principles of music knows, by means of key relationship presented in its simplest forms. This is done by Mr. Curwen's Tonic Sol-fa Notation, which we recommend as at least an admirable introduction, and as | book at the turning; a party of rural folks in an being easily applied to the established notation. We should also recommend Colville and Bentley's letter-note method, which by engrafting the initial letters of the sol-fa syllables on the common notes virtually combines both notations. As a practical suggestion we think it of first importance to caution, that anything like forcing the voice in childhood and youth should be carefully avoided. causes, both of them common, contribute to thishigh pitches and shouting. The result is also doubly injurious-a harshness and want of suavity in the singing, and injury, if not destruction, to the opening vocal powers. Though we have used the phrase "home-made music," there can be no doubt that some measure of teaching, and good teaching, should be secured (say by two or more families joiuing together) to guide the songs even of children, as much, however, to correct excesses like the above, as to prelect or lay down the law.

It may be held, however, as a settled point, that practice by ear merely will lead to no thoroughly satisfactory or lasting results. You must first of all learn the alphabet, learn to spell (so to speak), and learn to read notes, as you do letters, else you no more understand music than you do literatureapart from the consciousness of a vague sensual pleasure. You must learn to know good music; and more important still, to wed it to poctry. These acquirements are valuable-for in some considerable measure as you know, will you love and enjoy, music. But such qualifications imply teaching and training; and this work is in the true sense strictly educational, and should be attended to during the proper educating season-youth. And be it remarked, that it is nearly, if not quite as important, that people should be taught what will harmlessly and improvingly fill up their leisure time, as what will fit them for a business or trade. Thus art becomes a part, and a very important part, of the education of the people. The influence of mothers must be aided by the technical knowledge In order, therefore, that of the schoolmaster. music may become a true and lasting joy in the homes of the people, it must be taught in our schools. But how few care to secure this qualification in a schoolmaster. Yet to this cause, in a large measure, are we to trace the musical superiority of Germany to Great Britain. Conservatories for rearing professors, a musical training for schoolmasters in Normal schools, the employment of schoolmasters in the musical service of the church and in the dayschool-these are the means by which the musical genius of the Teutonic race is developed. Britain, musically speaking, is in a great degree waste-land, but it is not sterile; it only wants cultivation; and judging from instances, by no means rare, the vocal resources of our people are vast, and only need to be drawn out. One of Pickford's carters found sitting on his cart in a meal hour copying music; a ploughman on the heights of Banffshire, "soughing" his exercise as he makes his furrow, and referring to his Aberdeenshire highland parish giving a performance from Handel—solos, choruses, with instrumental accompaniment by the minister and his family: these things, if reported from the Continent, would be held in this country as incidents of signal musical interest and promise. They are entitled to be so regarded, as actual facts in unlikely places in this our own island; and as allied to domestic cultivation among the common people, may be cited here both in the way of encouragement and augury.*

To return. We add a hint or two on points away from the technicalities of the music-master. Some systematic plan of study and practice, carried out with earnest purpose, is of vital importance. higher object must be aimed at than mere desultory pleasure-giving, otherwise your domestic music will prove only a sort of elegant dissipation. should aim at possessing the spirit of art-at being an artist, according to his means and opportunities, however humble. Rest content, in general, with simple music; for the artistic handling of what' appears exceedingly simple, will bring out meanings and excite feelings, which surface work can never evoke. Do not lean on instruments for support. Self-reliance is important here, and the voice alone will produce wondrous effects, the use of simple music being assumed. While simple music, however, may most appropriately form the staple of your home exercises, yet it will have a bracing effect, and increase the scope and pleasure of your.

study, to choose occasionally such pieces as offer the excitement of difficulty. But strive to put into the song a meaning higher than is to be found in the mere notes; for every piece of music, as has been well observed, is a poem either in blank verse or in rhyme, and careful study and insight will bring out beauties which will ever remain hidden to the thoughtless and superficial. Use music for purposes higher than itself-to vivify and adorn pure and noblé thoughts, to arouse the mind, to quicken healthy emotions, and to elevate the soul. "Beauty in all its highest forms," it has been well said, "is calculated to impress on human beings the belief in a perfection greater than this world contains"-a sentiment pre-eminently true of music, not only as giving wings to the soul's highest aspirations, but also as affording an employment in which man may anticipate the employments and rehearse the praises of eternity! Welcome then, this beneficent and ennobling influence at the family hearth and the family altar, and more and more identify music with the Voices, the Hearts, and the Homes of the People! Then may we hope to see it employed to sweeten and elevate the mass of society, to awaken songs of love and joy, and also that nobler song whose utterance by the collective voice is the grandest, not only of musical but of human manifestations, when the great congregation with one heart and one voice sound the high praises of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!

CHRISTIANS WITHOUT A LIVING CHRIST, THE MOST MISERABLE OF MEN.

BY THE EDITOR.

"If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable."—1 Cor. xv. 19.

In perusing the chapter from which these words are quoted, one impression, at least, is made by it upon our minds, and that is, of the intense, soul-possessing conviction of the writer that Jesus was alive; that "God had raised Him from the dead and given Him glory, that our faith and hope might be in God."

This fact was everything to St. Paul. He perils his character, peace, joy, and hope of immortality, yea, his very soul, upon it. All was over with himself, with the Church, and with every human being, if this was a fiction and not a fact.

Notice only the consequences which he admits must follow the supposition that Jesus Christ was not a revived and therefore a living Redeemer. One was, that he and all the apostles who had testified as to their having seen Him, spoken with Him, ate with Him, were "false witnesses." He does not attempt to evade this conclusion, however dreadful. He takes his stand as a man of truth on one or other of these alternatives-Jesus Christ is risen, and is now alive; or we are deceivers and impostors. Again, if He is not risen from the dead, it must follow that the faith of all Christians was vainfor, on that supposition, they believed a falsehood, and were trusting to a person who had no existence. Accordingly they were yet in their sins, as much as if the Lord had never died for them; and all who had fallen asleep pillowing their weary hearts in peace on Jesus, and looking to Him for pardon and redemption, had perished! They died trusting in a delusion, believing in a dream, hoping in a shadow. And if so, no wonder the apostle should burst forth with the wailing cry of misery, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable!"

A dozen years ago, the artisan and the peasant of Great Britain were believed to be, as regards the qualities required in rifle-shooting and in marching, incapables and louts; yet have not drill and practice made thousands of them good soldiers and admirable marksmen, competing with those of any other country? A national musical movement, carried on with equal system and equal enthusiasm. would issue in like results.

Such were Paul's convictions regarding the resurrection of the Lord. These may have little weight with some people, and be looked upon merely asopinions held by an individual man eighteen centuries ago. But all reverent and earnest men, even though they may not as yet have believed in Christ, ought to be powerfully influenced by the conviction that such a man as the Apostle Paul thus certainly felt and certainly believed, and that the living Church of Christ throughout the world and in every age has so felt and so believed with him. Let even the inspiration of the apostle be questioned, and his authority as a teacher be forgotten, yet if we only remember what a man he was, in sobriety of feeling, in strength of intellect, in range of experience, above all, in holiness of life, with all the actual consequences which have come to humanity from what he was, and from what he taught, -we cannot but be impressed with this solemn declaration of his, that unless Christ be risen, Christians are deceived, and Christianity is false.

Let us fix our attention, then, on one point, and that is, what Jesus Christ the living Saviour was to St. Paul.

The apostle entertained a certain hope of something yet unseen, and this hope was bound up with his faith in a living Christ. The hope unquestionably was of immortality, and of immortality in a specific state, not as mere existence; for our life might be one of misery in the future, as he assumes it would have been in the present had not Christ risen from the dead. His hope was of existence with Christ, realising, as the very end of his being, perfect conformity to Christ in everything. He did not and could not separate this hope from the person of Jesus Christ. It was as if he had said, "Unless He is risen, and has entered into His rest, and begun an endless life above, I have no hope of entering into rest. If He is not glorified, I have no hope of glory. If God has left Him here below, and that Holy One has seen corruption, and if His hopes have not been fulfilled, mine are vain. If His prayers have not been answered, and if that light be extinguished or that life be ended in the tomb, I have no hope of life or light ever surviving in me or in any man. Our hopes of the future have perished with Christ, and, if so, then whatever hope in Christ we may possess in this life, we are yet miserable, yea, of all men the most miserable." So assuredly felt the Apostle Paul; and I ask, had he not good reason for so feeling? Was he not justified in having come to this conclusion, and no other?

Let us consider this:—In so far as this world was concerned, St. Paul had sacrificed all that life that could be ministered to by the things of time and sense, in order that he might possess, and help others to possess, a higher and truer life. For what was his life in this world? Was there ever witnessed such an utter renunciation of all that men call life? Read his autobiography. We have it not in detail, but in outlines, as it were, of long—this was his hope.

chapters and of volumes; which, were they written out with the minuteness of our records of remarkable lives, would make a history of toil, stirring adventure, sufferings, hardships, and escapes, such as this world's teeming literature could not compete with :- perils of robbers, perils from his own countrymen, perils in the wilderness and in the city. shipwrecks, scourgings, stonings nigh unto death. famine, nakedness, the want of all things, without a home, without rest, without even the necessaries of life, cast down, crushed, until he became a very spectacle to men and angels, a worthless castaway! Thus had it fared with him for thirty years, and thus, so far as he could see, would it fare with him to the end. "The time of my departure is at hand," is his sad though peaceful anticipation; and that departure would, in all probability, be through a painful martyrdom.

Where is the man of flesh and blood, not to speak of one who with tender affection clings to others and intensely values human sympathy, who does not recognise this kind of life as one of unprecedented labour. of almost superhuman self-sacrifice? How can we think of it with unconcerned hearts? How can we enjoy the blessings of Christian civilisation, and stand with indifference on the graves of the noble army of martyrs by whom it has been achieved? How can we contrast with it our ease and self-indulgence; and not thank God that the world has contained such a man as Paul? And why did Paul thus live? Why did he fill up his few years by such sufferings? Would he not have been happy as a man had he lived in quiet, enjoying all the sweet comforts of domestic life, pursuing the even tenor of his way as a lawyer at Jerusalem, or as a prosperous Roman citizen at Tarsus, the consistent friend of the ecclesiastical authorities, and the man of influence in his city-reading, reflecting, arguing, speculating, taking possibly pleasant journeys, enjoying the sight of objects of art at Athens, studying politics at Rome, or wandering amid the gorgeous scenery of his own land, and be known at Tarsus as the able Paul, the learned Paul, or even the much-respected or beloved Paul! Why was all this kind of life given up, and another, very painful to flesh and blood, accepted, not only without a murmur, but with joy? Surely the Apostle had no love for mere sacrifice as sacrifice, or he would indeed have been "beside himself." But there never lived a man of more sound judgment, or one with less of the folly of ungenial fanaticism or of weak enthusiasm. No man goes to a hospital for the sake of pain, but for the sake of health; nor to battle for the sake of wounds, but for victory; nor risks his money for the sake of risk, but for the gain. And what was the health, the victory, the gain which the Apostle sought? It was to make all men partakers with himself of a life which consisted not in the abundance of earthly things, but in a life "hid with Christ in God"-a life derived from Christ, maintained by Christ, and which in the end was to be perfected with Christ:

Verily, if there was no Christ, and no such life in Him-if this hope was vain, and to end with death, he would have been of all men most miserable! His labour would have been in vain, his sacrifice in vain; all the seed he had cast into the ground would have been without a crop; his suffering, without health; his battle, without victory. Well might he exclaim, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." It was as if he had said :- Let us give up our hope, and fall back on a mere earthly life. It is poor, but it is nevertheless something; while the life we now live in the flesh is death, for 'I die daily.' And thus we see that, on the supposition of life in Christ now and hereafter being a delusion -and it was a delusion if Christ had not risenthe Apostle acknowledged that he would be more miserable than other men, for he sacrificed what they enjoyed, suffered what they escaped, and all for nothing but a mere fancy-a theological opinion -the dream of a fanatical or frenzied brain.

But, it may be asked, was not Paul's spiritual life of such a nature as must of itself have insured him more happiness than any man could have possessed whose life was only in things seen and temporal? And it may be alleged with some reason, that religion is itself delightful; that there is a pleasure and joy in being just and loving, and in doing good; that if there was no hereafter, it would nevertheless be wise in a man to live well here; that his nature is so constituted that it cannot work smoothly except when guided by principle; and that virtue is its own reward, securing to its possessor a peace which necessarily excludes misery.

Well, let it be assumed, for the sake of argument, that men may, to a large extent, obey the dictates of conscience and the instincts of their moral nature, and that in doing so they reap a corresponding reward. But would this reward be such as would preserve a man like St. Paul from being utterly miserable unless he had faith in a living Redeemer? Would a life of even perfect morality, were that possible, represent in kind the character and hopes of the Apostle? He was moral, and a great deal more; but that great deal more involved such a sum of experiences, of hopes and of joys, all bound up in a living Christ, that to suppose them blasted by the destruction of his faith in Christ, so that he would have nothing to fall back upon but a life prompted by his moral constitution, and rewarded by the personal and relative results of right living, would be to leave him indeed most miserable. No possible life which he could have possessed without faith in Christ-no results which he could have realised, apart from the ultimate one of perfection with Christ, could have saved him from a beggar's misery in the midst of any amount of mere moral splendour and riches! If we could conceive him ceasing to be Paul the believer and becoming Paul the moralist, more spiritual than Plato, more pure than Seneca, more speculative than Cicero, we could not imagine him otherwise than as enduring a misery which they never experienced, through having lost a hope which they never possessed.

Let us try to see in this light, the past, present, and future, as St. Paul saw them; and thus realise the feeling with which he said, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable."

(1.) First of all, his whole past life was seen in the light of Christ. What was his own estimate of that life, before he knew his Lord? It might have been called by others a sincere, moral, truthful, earnest, and honest life, though bigoted, narrow, or ignorantly zealous; but to himself it was stamped with one mark of condemnation,—it was "without Christ." To him it was not life but death. He calls it by no fine names; outwardly it was a religious life, the Sanhedrim being the standard of religion, but he himself acknowledges that it was the life of a persecutor, of an injurious man, of a blasphemer. He was therefore ashamed of it, he loathed and condemned it.

How, then, could he anticipate without fear and trembling such a life as that being revealed before the judgment seat of God? How could he meet with a calm countenance the accusing spirits of the past? How was it that he was not scared in his day and night dreams by the cries of those whom he had persecuted and tortured? How was it that remembering all the horrors of that life, he could say, "Nevertheless I am not ashamed":-How? Because herknew Whom he had trusted, and was persuaded that He would keep that which he had committed to Him until that day:-How? Because, being justified by faith he had peace with God through Jesus Christ by whom he had received the atonement:-How? Because it was a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom he was chief; and because he had obtained mercy, that in him Jesus Christ might show forth all longsuffering for a pattern to those who should hereafter believe in Him to life everlasting. Just imagine in what position would Paul have been, had his trust in Christ turned out to be a delusion by his discovering that there was no living Christ in whom to trust? He had found peace in believing; but could that peace remain while believing no more? and could he fall back into the indifference possessed by an ignorant unbeliever? Would it have been possible for him again to become what he was before he had ever heard of Christ? His conscience had been quickened by the knowledge of Christ: his heart had been gained by the love of Christ; he saw no mere spectres, but real sins haunting the past, all of which Christ had banished. But let Christ himself disappear-let it be proven to St. Paul that he had believed a lie, that his life hitherto in Christ had been a fantasy of joy, a delirium of comfort, an objectless hope, a fruitless labour, a walking, speaking, and singing in his sleep-could he henceforth ever occupy in peace the place of other men who had never known his life in Christ? Could he awake from his slumber on the downy bed of a refued philosophy, and, with a smile, say, "It was all a dream, but I can yet turn on my other side and rest in my worldly comforts and in my righteous character, and find a true life in my morality"? Impossible! Without Christ, "he would have been of all men most miserable;" the very past would have crushed him.

(2.) Again :- the whole of Paul's present, as well as his past condition, his motives, the light in which he beheld all things, his estimate of human life, the relationship in which he recognised all men as standing to him, and he to them,-all this, and more than we can enumerate, were determined by his knowledge of Christ and his faith in Him. All things had become different to him in their nature and meaning, since he had looked at them in the light of that new life which he had received from Jesus Christ. Christ was through all and in all, penetrating all persons and things as light does the atmosphere. The very world of nature was not as it used to be to Paul. He saw in it Christ's handiwork, Christ's instrumentality for effecting His glorious purpose; for he saw "all things created by Him and for Him." The whole kingdom of Providence was no longer a confusion, or the result of mere human agency; but it was a part of Christ's kingdom, under His government, moulded by His wise and righteous power, so that in the end His kingdom should appear as a majestic temple rising out of ruins. The whole unseen world of principalities and powers he saw as under subjection to Jesus Christ, restrained and overruled by the mighty arm of the same King seated upon His throne, high and lifted up. All mankind, moreover, were seen by him in a new relationship. Every human being was considered, valued, borne with,in one word, loved, -as being related to the Man Christ Jesus. He saw men no longer as mere individual, solitary units; but as persons with whom Christ had to do, in whom He had an interest, and whom He had come to seek and to save; while the living Church of Christ, made up of those who like himself recognised the claims of the Lord, and shared his spirit, -were all seen by him as members of that spiritual body of which Christ was the living Head; and were accordingly clasped to his heart with a love and fervour which no mere relationship of country or of blood could produce. To him, all outward distinctions were absorbed in this one thought, "that there was neither Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ was all and in all." Within the circle of things present, were also his trials and sorrows, labours and joys, but all these were seen in the same light. His trials were endured in Christ, his duties performed in Christ, his joys possessed in Christ. His whole life existed in Christ. "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in things through Christ who strengtheneth me;" "To me to live is Christ." If we therefore look around on the world within and without, and upon human life, with the eyes of St. Paul, we shall perceive how Christ penetrates all, illuminates all, regulates all, determines all. But if so, what would it have been to St. Paul had there been no Christ? What if he discovered that He had never risen nor obtained dominion, and that the universe existed without Him? Do you think that he could have resigned all those things which had become new, and have fallen back upon what he once was and had once believed, and seen all things in the old light, or as other men saw them ?- or could he have seen all this glory that filled the heavens and the earth depart, and then have walked in the darkness of other men, without thereby experiencing utter misery from contrasting it with what he had once beheld, but could behold no more-what he had once enjoyed, but could enjoy no more ?-for Christ was dead and gone! He would have been of all men most miserable!

(3.) There is another aspect of Paul's spiritual life in Christ, which could not have been destroyed or disturbed without producing deepest misery-and that was his glorious prospects of the future. Assuredly he had a future which, however ideal it may appear to many, was to him so real, that it was ever present to him. To him the light of heaven and earth mingled; the future streamed into the present. and the present passed into the future. It might be said of his vision of that future, that whether he was in the body or out of the body, he could not tell, so very living was it, yet so unlike to all earthly things. How can we attempt to fill up Paul's visionto describe it as he saw it-to map out even a few of its glories? It is to us, who are so unbelieving, and who occupy so low a range of thought, as the third heavens were to himself, in which we hear things that we cannot utter. In the bright vista of the future he beheld this earth under law to Christ, and His name glorious from sea to sea. He beheld Him coming in power and glory, the dead in Christ rising, this corruptible putting on incorruption, this vile body changed into His own glorious body, the sons of God manifested in all their glory, in a day towards which the whole creation had been groaning as for the birth of the world's regeneration. He realised a time when his knowledge should be no longer mingled with ignorance-when he should no longer see through a glass darkly, but know even as he was known-when his warmest affections should have full play in loving and in being beloved with the whole family of God, -when Jesus should be glorified in all His saints. He anticipated the "end," when Jesus should deliver up the kingdom to the Father, and God be all in all. But the whole grandeur and blessedness of that future were concentrated in one bright and glorious reality, Christ himself - and in being perfect like Christ - glorified together with Christ. This was the heaven me;" "I am crucified with Christ;" "I can do all that was ever before him. All this bright hope for himself, for the Church and for the world, was bound up with his faith in Christ. "Because He lives we shall live also;" "Our life is hid with Christ in God; when Christ who is our life shall appear, we shall also appear with Him in glory;" "Christ in us the hope of glory;" "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor augels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord;" "All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

Once more; -conceive what it would have been to St. Paul, to be persuaded by any process that there was no Christ-that Christ was not in him -that He was not his hope, and that he should never see Him appear-that He had not risen as the first-fruits of them that sleep! Would it have been possible for him to have given up all this bright future which faith in Christ alone had created; and have caused all those streams of life and hope which ever welled out of his heart, to return to his heart again to be frozen up by unbelief; and could he have rejoiced in this winter illuminated only by the cold shining icicles of mere morality? Could St. Paul have realised all this vision of the future and its glorious harmony with his whole being; and have seen a light never seen before until he beheld Christ, and that light so suited to his inner eye; have heard a music never heard before until he heard the voice of Christ, and that music so suited to his spiritual ear: and have partaken of that living bread and drunk of that living water, and found them so suited to his spiritual appetites, so satisfying and refreshing; and having given them all up, could he then, without that light, without that music, and without that meat and drink, and having nothing more than mere moral rectitude to satisfy him, could he have been otherwise than most miserable? Only fancy some Stoic telling him at such a crisis of his being, that though all he had hitherto believed through Jesus Christ was a delusion, a fanaticism, a fancy, vet that he need not be miserable, since he could still be a thoroughly moral man-speak the truth, and be honest, benevolent, helpful to his neighbours, useful as a citizen, and advance science, education, and art in Tarsus, would such a life have satisfied him and saved him from wretchedness? Would it have been possible for him to have occupied the same ground as he had done before the Son of God was revealed to him, and in him, without his being one of the most miserable of men?

There are changes in life which so revolutionise us, that we can never be as we once were. The existence of some other person in the world may, indeed, for a long period of our life be a fact to us unknown, or, if known, of no importance to our happiness. What to us are the joys or sorrows, the character or tastes, the sickness or the health, even the life or death, of this unknown one? But let this person become at last known to us—become the object of our affections—our own,—united to us for life in the closest bonds, and then never more can they be to us, or we to them, as we were before. Their life, their happiness, all they suffer or enjoy, becomes a part of ourselves. To lose them is to lose our earthly life, and never more can this mighty world of persons and of things be to us as it once was. Yet even in regard to an earthly affection our great poet has truly said—

"better to have loved and lost, Than never to have loved at all."

But can this be said of our love to Christ? The loss of Christian friends in this world is but a temporary one. We often speak of it as being their gain, and look forward to an eternal union with them hereafter. But to lose Christ !- to discover that we have believed in vain-that we have loved, not a real person, but a creature of our own imagination, -a being who no more lives nor loves, who no more knows us, than a dead mummy or a dead stone-O, better, better a thousand times, never to have loved at all, than endure such a loss as this! It would be irreparable. It would be the loss of all truth, hope, and love; -the loss of faith in all men, even in God himself. It would be the loss of faith in the moral order of the universe; the exchange of light for darkness, of life for death, of truth for a lie. And he who suffered such loss would verily be of all men most miserable!

St. Paul, indeed, never imagined that such a loss was possible. While he makes the supposition, it was to him what we call a demonstration that ends in proving an absurdity, and therefore cannot be true. He never for one moment imagined it to be a possible thing that Christ was not alive. He spoke of the consequences which should follow on this supposition, only to prove how false the supposition was: It could not be, as sure as there was a God and truth in the universe, that the Apostles were false witnesses; it could not be that the faith and life derived from Christ's life, death, and resurrection were false; it could not be that they were deceived who had fallen asleep in Jesus; it could not be that Christians were yet in their sins; it could not be that the Apostle, and all who, like him, loved the Lord, could be left in misery. These things could not be; they would be monstrous suppositions in God's universe, immoral miracles, and therefore were moral impossibilities.

But if this was impossible, then it was true that Christ was risen; and if so, faith in Christ was not in vain, and preaching was not in vain, nor were the Apostles false men, nor had those who were fallen asleep in Christ perished. Believers therefore never could be of all men most miserable, but were of all men most blessed; and, strong in faith, they were to "be steadfast, unmovable, abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as they knew that their labour was not in vain in the Lord!"

make to us, individually, if the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus were unreal? Alas! may it not be said of some, that if they could believe that Christ had risen from the dead and was alive, they would, while leading the life they do, be of all men most miserable? For they are without Christ. He is not in all their thoughts; He is not in their present, past, or future. Their past is not reconciled to their memory and conscience through faith in Jesus Christ, who forgiveth all our iniquities; their present is not affected by the thought of Christ for them, or Christ in them; nor their future by the hope of being with Christ and sharing His glory for ever. To them therefore the blotting out of Christ's name from the universe would be the mere blotting out of a doctrine or opinion-not the extinguishing of their Light and Life. Is theirs, then, the Christianity which St. Paul believed and possessed? No! It is not St. Paul's Christianity; therefore it is not Christianity at all.

We can answer for the living Church of Christ, that they sympathise with their whole hearts with the Apostle. Were it possible for them to conceive a universe without Christ, that universe would be to them outer darkness and eternal death. Such unbelief, to any man who has ever truly known the living Christ, is a moral impossibility: he would not believe an angel from heaven if he told him that "He was not alive." The faith of the "For true Christian is grounded, not merely on what the Apostles have testified, though he believes their testimony as having been eye-witnesses of His Majesty, but he has also the Day-star in his own heart; —he has in himself evidences of a Risen Saviour.

Through faith in that Christ, true life has been quickened in his own soul : -he has been enabled to crucify the old man with his affections and lusts, to bury him in the grave with Christ, to rise with Christ to newness of life, and consciously to partake of that life in God with all its blessedness. He lives, and he knows it is because Christ lives for him and in him, and that his is an eternal lifeeternal as the Father who is its object, the Son who is its medium, and the Spirit who is its source. When, with Christ, he can say, "Our Father in Heaven," he knows that this is itself a pledge that in heaven, as on earth, he shall ever find and enjoy his Father. If he had hope in Christ in this life only, he would be most miserable. But Christ in him now is inseparable from the hope of glory with Him hereafter; and such a hope "maketh not ashamed." "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In My Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." With joy and thanksgiving therefore he can say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." "I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him till that day." "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our

By WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis,"&c.

CHAPTER III .- THE THORNBURY FAMILY.

It is only natural that my readers should wish to know something of the family of our heroine, and I will devote a few pages to gratify this desire.

Mr. Edgar Thornbury, her father, came into possession of the Red House property, as well as a moderate sum of money in the Funds, by the death of his father, in the year 1819. The estate consisted of three copyhold farms, held under the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral (each containing about two hundred acres of land), together with the twenty acres of meadow and park land attached to the mansion, which was freehold, and entailed on the next male heir. The ready money did not exceed four thousand pounds, but Mr. Thornbury was an only child, and the whole property he inherited was unencumbered by family settlements of any description. The estate, though of no very great value, had been held for some centuries by the family. It was this circumstance upon it, although he was naturally of a cheerful disposition, with which the sombre aspect of the house and its surroundings did not very well accord. At the time he came into his fortune, he was a fine, good-looking, healthy young fellow, about twenty-four years of age, a bold rider, and passionately fond of field sports.

Mr. Thornbury's father, after the death of his wife, which took place about ten years prior to his own decease, had led a very secluded life. He associated with none of the gentry in the neighbourhood, and saw but little of his own tenants beyond receiving them at his house on rent-day, and making occasional calls for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were farming properly the land they held. It may, therefore, be easily imagined that his son, who resided constantly with him, had but little acquaintance with the world when he came into his inheritance.

centuries by the family. It was this circumstance | There was only one foible in which he was likely principally which induced Mr. Thornbury to reside | to indulge to any great extent, and that was horse-

He had never, of course, entertained the racing. idea of running racers of his own, but he had a natural love for every sport connected with horses. Accordingly, he attended all the races in his own county, and betted moderately, but with considerable success. His skill and good fortune having given him courage, he resolved to extend his operations, and he no longer contented himself with isolated bets, but commenced to keep a regular Success still attended him, and he hazarded larger sums. He was guided to a considerable extent in his betting by a person of showy exterior and plausible manners, whose acquaintance he had made on a race-course. This gentleman, at last, obtained such an ascendency over Mr. Thornbury, that he scarcely ever made a bet without consulting him on the subject, and his prognostication was generally followed by such good fortune as to increase still more the favourable impression he had made on Mr. Thornbury, who soon began not only to look upon him as a racing oracle, but conceived a warm friendship for him. He invited him to the Red House, and treated him as a favoured guest, showing him every attention in his power. In return, the new-made friend invited him to spend a fortnight in a neat little box he had near Doncaster. They could then attend the approaching races, and be very snug and comfortable together. The idea fell in admirably with Mr. Thornbury's views, as he had long desired to visit Doncaster, and the invitation was accepted.

The time arrived for their departure, and they travelled together to Doncaster. Mr. Thornbury was somewhat disappointed at the appearance of his friend's house, which was only a very humble cottage near the race-course. But as he was informed by his friend that it was merely rented in order that he might have a place near the course, when he wished to attend the different races there, the excuse was accepted. The morning after their arrival, Mr. Thornbury's friend introduced him to several sporting gentlemen, all of whom he assured him were as safe as the bank. With these gentlemen Mr. Thornbury made several heavy bets, not only on the races which were to come off next day, but on the days following as well. In fact, he contrived to make an excellent book, one which did his knowledge of the doctrine of probabilities great

The next day's races came off, and Mr. Thornbury, on making up his book in the evening, found he was a winner to a very considerable amounton paper. He, of course, paid what losses he had made, and received the amounts owing to him, the principal part, however, in IOU's, the proportion in ready money being very small indeed.

He had betted very heavily on the second day's races, and began to feel rather uneasy as to the result. Nor was this wholly without reason, for on making up his book in the evening, he found that he had that day lost between seven and eight hun- endeavoured to recover this by a still heavier bet on him with some common-places about the impossibility of being always a winner, and reminded him of the excellent book he had made on the third day's races. Although the loss somewhat annoyed Mr. Thornbury, he had sufficient philosophy to perceive that it would be quite useless to grieve over it, and he proceeded tranquilly to make some alterations in his dress, as he and his friend were to dine with a gentleman, an acquaintance of the latter, and pass a pleasant evening together.

They met, and formed a very happy little party. The only other guest, besides Mr. Thornbury and his friend, was a gentlemen also connected with the turf. He was, moreover, an excellent companion. well acquainted with all the sporting celebrities, and possessed a vast fund of anecdote and humour. The dinner was cooked in first-rate style, and the wines were excellent; indeed, to say truth, Mr. Thornbury indulged to a greater extent than was prudent. yet without being really intoxicated. Nor was he quite so much to blame in this, as he would have been in the present day. In those days the absurd custom prevailed of gentlemen challenging each other to take wine, and on this occasion it was much indulged in by Mr. Thornbury's companions, who seemed capable of consuming any quantity without danger of inebriety.

Dinner over, they sat for some time at dessert. and, conversation beginning to flag, one of the party proposed a rubber of whist to pass away the time. Mr. Thornbury made no objection, in fact his brain was already somewhat confused, but the two others said they did not feel inclined to play just then. They were tired, they said, and the events of the day were so fresh before them, that they should not be able to think of the game if they took a hand. As, however, the proposer was their host, if he really wished it they would offer no further objection. So the game was begun. In the first rubber, Mr. Thornbury and his friend were partners. They played for guinea points, as well as betted heavily on the rub. Mr. Thornbury and his partner were winners, and they netted a considerable suma result which put their opponents somewhat out of humour. At the second rubber, the tide of fortune turned, Thornbury and his friend being losers. They changed partners, and fortune again favoured Mr. Thornbury, so that before supper was announced he had won more than one hundred pounds.

After supper a steaming bowl of punch was placed upon the table, and the friends indulged in it pretty freely. In fact when Mr. Thornbury rose to take his seat again at the card-table he was nearly intoxicated. The idea flashed across his disturbed brain that, as he was evidently in lack that night, he might be able to recoupe himself for his day's losses, and he proposed an increase of the stakes. No objection being made by the others, they again commenced playing. Mr. Thornbury lost the first rubber as well as a heavy bet he had made upon it, but he dred pounds. His companion attempted to cheer the next game. He played on for some time, generally losing, and consoling himself the while with repeated glasses of punch. In this way he continued to play, his mind becoming gradually more and more obscured, till at last he lost all consciousness and sank under the table utterly insensible.

When he awoke next morning he found himself in bed in the house of his host of the previous evening. He felt feverish and thirsty. His tongue was dry as a potsherd, and he suffered from a violent throbbing headache. A servant knocked at the door of his room with a message from the master of the house informing him that if he (Mr. Thornbury) intended to go on the race-course that day, he had better rise immediately, else he would be too late. Mr. Thornbury told the man to thank his master for the information, and to say that he would be ready in half-an-hour at latest. Even then, however, he could hardly summon sufficient courage to rise from his bed, and when he did so, he felt so dizzy that he nearly fell senseless on the floor. By dint of bathing his head for some time in cold water he managed in some measure to arrange his ideas. When dressed, he descended to the breakfast-room, where he found his host, to whom he apologized for his behaviour on the previous night.

"Don't think anything more about it, my good fellow," was the reply. "It was an accident, which I dare say has befallen every one of us at one time or other. But now, if you intend going with us today, you had better get your breakfast as soon as you can."

Mr. Thornbury took the hint, and seated himself at the table. He had no appetite, however; his headache returned, and he laboured under a most distressing nausea. He tried to conceal his feelings, and rose from the table saying that he was now quite ready. But he had no sooner uttered the words than a sensation came over him of so oppressive a character, that he was obliged to seat himself in an easy-chair that he might not fall on the floor.

"Thornbury," said his host, "you are not in marching order to-day; you had better stop at home. A couple of hours' nap on the sofa will do you a deal of good. Remain then quietly here; we shall be home to dinner by seven o'clock. We can then arrange our little accounts of yesterday evening, and you can afterwards have your revenge, if you wish it."

Thornbury followed his friend's advice, and, throwing himself on a sofa, slept for several hours. When he awoke he felt considerably refreshed, and began to think over the events of the preceding evening. The remark which his host had made on leaving the room about arranging their accounts of the evening before, and giving him his revenge if he wished it, caused him some uneasiness. Of all that had taken place before supper he had a tolerably clear idea, but the remainder of the night's transactions were to him only a mass of tangled confusion, which it was impossible for him to unravel. His losses on the race-course the day before also caused him annovance but that after a little reflection, lessened considerably. He felt he had lost his money fairly, and he had no just cause for discontent; besides, it was very probable that he might be more fortunate that day, as he had some heavy and well-calculated bets on the event.

By dinner-time he had fully recovered himself. He heard, with great equanimity, the somewhat unsatisfactory intelligence, that on that day's transactions he had lost about two hundred pounds. During the meal the conversation ran principally on races which were yet to come off, those who had won that day, what horses were in favour, and other matters connected with the turf. When dinner was over and the dessert placed upon the table, one of the party said, "Now, Thornbury, we may as well arrange about yesterday evening. Here are your I O U's for your losses to me, and you would oblige me by giving me a cheque for the money, as I can assure you I have had some heavy pulls upon me to-day."

So saying he produced several pieces of paper bearing Thornbury's signature for different sums. Their host also, and the other gentlemen, did the same, placing their different memoranda before him, the whole demands upon him amounting to little less than 1,000*l*.

Mr. Thornbury was for some moments utterly aghast at their behaviour, but, soon recovering himself, he took up the different papers from the table and quietly and carefully examined each, without passing any remark upon them. The person who had first addressed him on the subject of his debts took umbrage at this behaviour.

"Do you imagine, sir," he said, "that the papers I have given you are forgeries, that you scrutinise them so carefully?"

Mr. Thornbury continued his examination for a moment longer, and then coolly replied,

"The signatures are evidently mine. I consider, however, that I was perfectly justified in examining them so closely, as I have no recollection whatever of the transactions to which they refer."

"Transactions to which they refer!" said the other indignantly. "Why, you gave them for the money you lost yesterday evening."

"My dear Thornbury," said the host, "it is all fair and straightforward, I assure you; and, more than that, as soon as you have settled these claims you can, if you please, have your revenge this evening."

"Thank you," said Thornbury, coolly, and still keeping his temper, "but I must decline playing again with those who do not consider it beneath them to obtain documents of such a description from an intoxicated man."

Each person present took this insult as personally applied to himself, and each stepped forward to resent it.

transactions were to him only a mass of tangled confusion, which it was impossible for him to unravel. His losses on the race-course the day before Thornbury alludes took place under my roof, I also caused him annoyance, but that, after a little must have precedence in the matter. To consider it possible, sir," he continued, addressing Mr. Thornbury, "that I would allow a guest of mine while in a state of intoxication to sign an I O U is simply to offer me a gross and gratuitous insult; and I must request you either to retract your expression or make me an apology."

"Let us clearly understand each other, gentlemen," said Mr. Thornbury. "How you came by my signature for such heavy sums I know not; suffice it to say that I acknowledge them without hesitation to be mine, and I intend paying the money, so no more need be said about the matter unless you desire it. But, at the same time, if any one of you is under the impression that I am a man to be bullied, he is grossly mistaken. Let us, however, do one thing at a time. I will for the moment put the question of the payment of the money aside, and if any gentleman present thinks himself affronted by my remark, I beg he will consider me immediately at his service."

"Come, come," said one, "let there be no quarrelling; we need say no more about the matter. I have no doubt Mr. Thornbury will at once give us cheques for the different amounts owing us."

"That I cannot do," said Thornbury. "I owe as much on the races as will absorb the whole of the ready money I have got at my banker's. As soon as those bets are settled I will write to my agent in London and request him to sell out of the Funds as much as will meet your claims. I intend immediately taking lodgings in the town, and I shall not leave it till I have paid you all the full amount I am indebted to you."

"But possibly," said the host, in so amicable a tone that it contrasted strangely with his late indignant manner; "but possibly the better plan will be for you to give us your promissory notes at a short date, as we may not find it convenient to remain here till your agent sends the money."

"I will do nothing of the kind. The money I owe shall be considered purely as a debt of honour, or I will dispute it altogether. That is my determination, and it is a waste of time for us to hold any further conversation on the subject. Are you willing to accept the terms I offer?"

Finding no other arrangement could be entered into with Mr. Thornbury, they at last accepted his offer, and he quitted the house with the determination to drop all acquaintance with the class of men he had just left, and never again make a bet on a horse-race—a resolution he ever afterwards rigidly adhered to.

As the town was crowded with visitors, Mr. Thornbury had some difficulty in providing himself with an apartment, but at last he succeeded. He engaged the first floor above a small but respectable linendraper's shop, kept by a widow—a Quakeress. The day after removing to it, he began to pay his different debts, which, together with the sum he had lost at the whist-table, considerably exceeded two thousand pounds. He drew cheques for the bets he had made on the races, which consumed the whole of his available balance at his banker's, and he wrote to his agents in London directing them, not only to sell out as much money from the Funds as would suffice for the balance, but to send him the address of some respectable solicitor in Doncaster, in whose hands he could place the duty of settling with his whist-table creditors. Both commissions were executed in the course of a week or ten days, the amounts were paid, and Mr. Thornbury's mind was at rest on the point. He consoled himself with the idea that, if he had paid dearly for his experience, the lesson was the less likely to be forgotten.

Although everything connected with his gambling transactions was now settled, Mr. Thornbury made no attempt to leave Doncaster. He had become much interested in the family of his landlady, and he took great pleasure in their society. His first impulse to cultivate their acquaintance arose from mere curiosity. It was the first time he had been thrown into any sort of relationship with the sect of Quakers, and it can easily be understood that their steady, sedate, amiable manners, together with their peculiar dress and quaint Bible phraseology, would please him greatly. The widow, Mrs. Watkins, was an intelligent, bustling, good-humoured, handsome old lady, very strictly attached to the tenets of her Her establishment consisted of her only daughter, Charity, a very pretty young woman, and a sort of half-servant, half-shopwoman, named Deborah, also a member of the Society of Friends. Mrs. Watkins' principal duty was to attend to the business, in which she was occasionally assisted by her daughter and Deborah, the latter having especial charge of the domestic economy of the house, which in every respect was a perfect specimen of Quaker order, cleanliness, and neatness.

Mr. Thornbury had hardly been a week in the house before the ladies began to entertain great good feeling towards their lodger, whom they held to be a very well-conducted young man, and the feeling was more than reciprocated by Mr. Thornbury. He used to spend his evenings with them, and some of the happiest moments of his life were passed in the little parlour behind the shop. He at last got so interested in the widow and her daughter and their primitive ways, that one Sunday he requested they would take him with them to their meeting-house. At first, they readily assented; but, after a little reflection, the widow began to have compunctions, and would willingly for various reasons have retracted her promise could she have done so honourably. But the promise had been given and she was a woman of too much integrity to break it.

The meeting being a silent one, Thornbury had ample opportunity for reflection. It would be wrong to say that religion entered very deeply into his thoughts on the occasion. They were concentrated on Charity, and no other object. Mr. Thornbury had, in fact, fallen deeply in love with the fair Quakeress, and he resolved, if possible, to make her his wife.

The meeting over, Thornbury accompanied Mrs. Watkins and her daughter back to their house. On the road, a little circumstance occurred which for the moment somewhat startled and annoyed him. He walked by the side of Charity, and attempted to enter into conversation with her, but with scant success. True, she answered every observation he made, but very shortly, and without turning her head towards him when she spoke. This was done in so marked a manner that he began to fear he must unknowingly have offended her, and under this impression he remained the whole of the day, for he saw her no more after they had entered the house. Charity was by no means displeased with her admirer-far from it; but, as she knew that she was watched by many a pair of female eyes, she was simply endeavouring to make it appear that she was offering him no encouragement, and that his attentions were rather displeasing to her than otherwise.

Thornbury, although somewhat mortified at Charity's behaviour, was still resolved to do all he could to make her his wife, but he was much puzzled as to the way to commence operations. The rigid ideas of propriety held both by the damsel and her mother, together with their secluded habits and strong sectarian principles, put it out of the question for him to offer to treat them to any amusements. Moreover, a severe-looking female Elder (the mother of several unmarried daughters) had visited the house, and been closeted for some time with Mrs. Watkins and Charity, and he noticed that after that they showed him considerably fewer little friendly attentions than he had been used to receive at their hands, and it was evident that Charity purposely avoided meeting him; but whether that proceeded from her own sense of propriety, or her mother's injunction, did not appear.

The difficulties thus thrown in Thornbury's way stimulated him to exertion rather than otherwise. He now resolved to conquer by increasing his personal attractions. He paid much attention to his toilet, purchased some very expensive articles of jewellery, used an immense amount of perfumery, wore a coat with the waist almost up to his shoulders, and assumed something of that swaggering air and manner much affected by the "Bucks" of the period. Those attempts, however, resulted in complete failure. Charity, girl as she was, held the pomps and vanities of this wicked world in utter contempt, and her mother's dislike to them amounted to absolute abhorrence. The poor fellow even sank considerably in Deborah's good opinion. She had hitherto been his warm friend, for she had admired him greatly for his steady, quiet, and affable manners, and she had frequently spoken highly of him to Charity; but even Deborah could not defend his foppishness.

At last, finding his suit by no means forwarded by this course, he resolved to practise it no longer. He again became the quiet, unostentations, sensible immediately followed the change. Mrs. Watkins began to speak to him in a kindlier tone; Charity, accidentally of course, met him more frequently. and always answered the remarks he made in a friendly tone; and he again rose in Deborah's good graces. Still nothing decisive had been accomplished, and he was at a loss what fresh step to take in the matter.

At length one morning, after having been a very long time over his breakfast, eating little, but meditating a great deal to little purpose about his love affair, he took up his hat to leave the house, thinking some bright idea might perhaps strike him if he took a solitary romantic walk into the country. Having descended the stairs, he was passing through the shop, when he noticed that there was no one in it. Looking round, however, he saw Charity sitting in the little back parlour, with her face at a pane of glass which had been inserted into the partition, so that a surveillance might be kept upon customers entering. Such a beautiful picture did she make, with her neat little cap on her head, that Thornbury found it impossible to pass on without speaking to her, and he turned back and entered the little parlour. He found Charity alone, her mother, as she informed him, having gone to market; she expected her back, however, in the space of half an hour, if he wished to speak to her. Thornbury was thinking what answer to make, when, without being afterwards able to relate how it came about, he suddenly found himself seated in a chair by Charity's side, her hand in his, which she was making no attempt to withdraw. Having had the courage to effect so much, the rest was comparatively easy to him. When he had found his tongue, he expressed with great fluency the profound affection he had for her, touched modestly on his own qualifications and expatiated largely on hers, and concluded by asking her permission to pay his addresses to her. Charity replied, in a proper and becoming manner, that she was so greatly surprised at his offer that she hardly knew how to reply to it. She did not understand, she said, how it was possible for him to have conceived so much affection for her, having known her for so short a time, with many other stereotyped phrases of the same description, the whole concluding by a reference to her mother, by whose advice she would be guided in the matter, admitting (evidently to prevent his being driven to despair) that she had certainly a great esteem for him. The half hour having nearly elapsed, he requested Charity would tell her mother that he wished to speak to her on some business of great importance, and that he would call on her in the afternoon, shrewdly believing that the daughter would be sure to inform her mother of the purport of his visit, and thus relieve him from the great difficulty of opening the question.

Thornbury now left the house with the air and step of a conqueror. He relinquished his intended romantic walk into the country, and contented himyoung fellow he had been before. Good effects self instead with strolling about the town till he began to feel fatigued. He then entered a newsroom, and tried to occupy himself with the newspapers, but read he could not; and at last he gave up the attempt, and again strolled about the streets till it was time for him to keep his appointment with the old lady.

The meeting passed off, to a certain degree, satisfactorily enough. Mrs. Watkins frankly told him that she felt much gratified by his offer, but at the same time there were some difficulties in the way which had to be cleared up before she could possibly entertain it. She must in the first place consult with some of the Friends on the subject, especially as he was not one of her own sect.

Things, however, did not progress so favourably as might have been wished. The Elder whom Mrs. Watkins requested to enquire about Mr. Thornbury was the husband of the Quakeress who had been closeted so long with her and Charity after Thornbury's visit to the meeting-house. Unfortunately, the only person he could find who knew anything about Mr. Thornbury was a clerk in the house of the Doncaster solicitor whom Thornbury had employed to arrange his gambling debts. Of course the conclusion the Elder arrived at from his conversation with the attorney's clerk was anything but favourable to Mr. Thornbury; and he, without any reservation, communicated this to Mrs. Watkins.

Mr. Thornbury was thunderstruck when Mrs. Watkins frankly told him that she had heard, upon good authority, that he was both a gambler and a drunkard. Instead of indignantly denying the accusation, he with great good sense gave a true account of the manner in which he had been entrapped by a gang of swindlers; that he had paid the amounts he had lost; and that he had resolutely determined never to make another bet on a race, and as a gentleman and a man of houour he would keep his word. He further requested that they would make what inquiries they pleased respecting his previous life, as he was fully convinced they would not hear one word really adverse to him.

All this was said so frankly and with so much appearance of truth in his manner, that Mrs. Watkins agreed to reconsider the matter, and Thornbury passed a far more happy evening with her and her daughter than might have been expected from the commencement of their conversation. To make a long story short, Mrs. Watkins, having a relative residing about ten miles from the Red House, entrusted to him the somewhat delicate task of making the necessary inquiries respecting the previous behaviour of Mr. Thornbury. In due time she received a very satisfactory answer, and then gave her permission for the marriage. Mrs. Watkins, not wishing to reside longer in the town her daughter was on the point of leaving, resolved to sell her business, and to take up her residence with the relative to whom she had entrusted the task of making inquiries into Mr. Thornbury's character. To his house she accordingly removed with her daughter and Deborah, who were to reside with her till the wedding-day. In the meantime Mr. Thornbury returned to the Red House to make what preparations were necessary for the reception of his bride.

About two months after Mrs. Watkins had given her consent to the match, the young couple were married. All passed off in the most satisfactory manner, with the exception of some little sorrow on the part of Mrs. Watkins and Deborah at seeing Charity in a bridal costume so contrary to their ideas of becoming and modest dress. But this again was modified by a promise on Charity's part that as soon as she and her husband had arrived at the Red House she would return as far as she could to the style of dress she had hitherto been accustomed to wear. The ceremony over, the bride and bridegroom started off on their wedding tour, and at the end of the honeymoon they took up their abode at the Red House.

CHAPTER IV.—LITTLE DIFFERENCES SETTLED,

RETURNED from her wedding trip, Mrs. Thornbury entered on her duties as mistress of the Red House with zeal and alacrity. Naturally quiet and amiable in her manners, she possessed at the same time a certain determination of character, and she soon brought the somewhat indifferently trained servants into a state of excellent organization. In this the methodical Quaker habits of her previous life considerably aided her. An addition was also made to the staff of servants in the person of Deborah, who entered into Mrs. Thornbury's service as a sort of upper servant or housekeeper. As to dress, Mrs. Thornbury, to please her husband and meet her own taste as well, adopted a costume partly that of the Quakers, and partly that of ladies in general. Although Mrs. Thornbury wished Deborah to follow her example, so far at least as to reduce somewhat the starched primness of her attire, it was without avail. Deborah resolved to wear the costume she had been used to, and no argument nor entreaty her mistress used could induce her to alter her determination. At last Mr. Thornbury and his wife yielded to her whim, rightly considering it impolitic to risk losing so valuable a servant by insisting on a trifle of the kind.

During the first year of Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury's married life everything passed off in a most satisfactory manner, indeed it would have been difficult to have found a happier couple. True, they had but few acquaintances and still fewer friends. The gentry in their neighbourhood were extremely aristocratical in their ideas, and strictly attached to the Established Church, and it having become known that Mrs. Thornbury was a Nonconformist, and had formerly been something very like an assistant in the shop of a small Yorkshire linendraper, a strong prejudice sprung up against her, and her society was but little sought for. This, however, gave the worthy couple no uncasiness; they had a little

Good Words, July 2, 1866.]

The second year after their marriage Mrs. Thornbury gave promise of becoming a mother. If her satisfaction at the prospect was great, it was trifling compared with that felt by her husband. The idea of having an heir to his estate perfectly delighted him. In vain his wife argued that there was equal probability of the child being a girl, he had made up his mind on the subject and he felt certain he should not be disappointed. Time, however, proved him to be in error, as his wife presented him with twins, both fine, healthy girls. He soon got over his disappointment, and was as fond and proud of his two girls as if he had had a son and heir.

Preparations had now to be made for the christening, and a great difficulty arose. Mrs. Thornbury still preserved many of her Quaker prejudices, and had a great objection to her infants being baptized according to the rites of the Church of England. and in this view she was strongly supported by her mother, Mrs. Watkins, who had been residing in the house during her daughter's accouchement. Deborah also brought her influence to bear on the question. Mr. Thornbury, however, was determined to have his own way in the matter, and so firm was he in his resolution that the arguments and prayers of his wife, his mother-in-law, and Deborah were as nought in the balance. Mrs. Thornbury, as in duty bound, was the first of his opponents to give way. She remembered that her husband was as strongly attached to the tenets of the Church of England as she and her mother were to those of the Quakers, and she told him that she would waive her objection and submit like a good wife to his wishes. Mrs. Watkins was far more obdurate in the matter, but at last she succumbed to a judicious compliment paid to her by her son-inlaw. When the question arose as to the names to be given to the infants, he told her that he had already come to a conclusion on the subject. One was to be baptized in the name of his wife-Charity, the other in that of Mrs. Watkins-Ruth. This little piece of flattery completely did away with the objection the old lady had to the christening, and Deborah, finding it was utterly useless for her to interfere longer, made no further remarks on the subject.

Mr. Thornbury fancied that as he had now proved he would have his own way in the matter of the christening, all would pass off smoothly. But he was terribly in error. Without consulting his wife on the subject, and with the idea of affording her a pleasing surprise as a reward for her dutiful behaviour, he had written to the proprietors of a well-known baby-linen warehouse in London to send him down a handsome layette for twins, such as would do honour to an occasion of the kind. In due time a very respectable middle-aged woman arrived at the Red House with a choice assortment of articles used on occasions of the kind. Mr. Thornbury with some little feeling of pride introduced this agent of the firm into the room where sat his wife, who was now sufficiently recovered to leave her bed; and he himself stood by while the wares were being displayed. To his astonishment he could not detect in the expression of his wife's countenance the slightest appearance of pleasure or satisfaction; while on the brow of Mrs. Watkins he perceived an ominous gloomy frown. The agent proceeded to unpack article after article, each to the female mind prettier than the former, but without eliciting from mother or daughter one expression of commendation. At last Mrs. Thornbury turned away her head, and the spirit then moved Mrs. Watkins to speak. She said, with marked disapprobation in her tone and manner, that her daughter at that moment was too much indisposed to be troubled with vanities of the kind, and requested that they might immediately be taken away. Mrs. Thornbury, although she said nothing. evidently concurred in her mother's remark; and the poor agent, not knowing what to do, looked up into Mr. Thornbury's face for her instructions. Annoyed at what he considered the ingratitude of his wife, he motioned to the agent to take the things away, and followed her out of the room, inwardly abusing mothers-in-law in general, and his own in particular, as he attributed solely to her influence the behaviour of his wife.

On the morrow, when Mr. Thornbury paid his wife a visit, the subject was again opened by Mrs. Watkins. She informed him that Mrs. Thornbury had commissioned her to explain to him how sorely it grieved her to object to anything he proposed, it being the bounden duty of wives to submit themselves to their husbands in all things not touching their spiritual welfare. Her daughter had always been instructed in those principles by her, and she was certain they were as dear to her as life itself. But, she went on to say, her duty to her Maker was also to be taken into consideration, and she (Mrs. Watkins) was under the firm impression that by adorning her infants in such vain dresses she was placing snares for their souls while they were yet on the very threshold of existence. In conclusion, she sincerely trusted that Mr. Thornbury would, on reflection, submit to the wishes of his wife; and that he would see that the caps and robes provided for the infants were little better than "vain trappings," and as such would not again wound his wife's feelings by offering them to her notice. Mrs. Thornbury's countenance appeared only to reflect the expression of her mother's, and, although she said nothing, her husband had no difficulty in perceiving that she had also definitively made up her mind on the subject, and had no intention of altering it. Wisely thinking it would be useless as well as derogatory for him to have a dispute with his wife, much as he objected to the course she had taken, Mr. Thornbury turned on his heel, and left the field in the possession of his opponents. He was annoyed and crestfallen; he felt he was no longer master in his own house.

With an abashed countenance he presented himself before the agent from the baby-linen warehouse, and informed her that his wife declined purchasing any of her wares. He greatly regretted the trouble he had given her, but he had no alternative in the matter. He was, however, 'perfectly willing not only to reimburse all her expenses, but to make her any reasonable allowance for the inconvenience she or her employers had been put to. The agent seemed hardly to understand him.

"You surely do not believe, sir, that your good lady does not wish to have the christening robes?"

"Such is the truth, however," said Mr. Thornbury, sorrowfully.

"Oh, sir, I am sure you must be mistaken."

"I most sincerely wish you could prove it to me. You would do me a singular favour, I assure you," said Mr. Thornbury, devoutly wishing to have his revenge on his mother-in-law, to whom he attributed his wife's opposition.

"I could easily do so, if you wish, sir; but you must give me full powers to act as I please. I am certain I should succeed. I know a great deal more about young mothers than you do, although, I dare say, you are wiser in most things than I am."

"You have full power to do what you please," said Mr. Thornbury, "and I wish you success, although I greatly doubt it."

"You have no occasion, sir, I assure you. If you could only get the old lady out of the way for an hour or so, to take a walk or anything else, by the time you come back you will find your good lady has quite changed her mind."

"I will get her away if it is at all possible," said Mr. Thornbury, in a very determined manner.

Mr. Thornbury, shortly after this conversation, met his mother-in-law at the lunch table. She seemed at first rather in doubt as to the reception he would give her, and she eyed him attentively for some momeuts. She soon perceived she had no cause for any anxiety-nothing could be more cordial than his manner to her. She was greatly pleased at the evident docility of his character, as it was another proof to her of the superiority of the female mind. During lunch, the pair conversed pleasantly on many subjects, without the slightest difference of opinion arising between them. When this meal was nearly over, Mr. Thornbury asked his mother-in-law whether she had anything particular to occupy her time that afternoon, as he would like to consult her about some alterations he intended making in the grounds; and which he wished finished soon, so as to be a surprise to his wife on her recovery.

Mrs. Watkins was pleased with her sou-in-law's amiability, and said she would be delighted to go with him. Mr. Thornbury, of course, skilfully contrived so to engage the old lady as to give the agent pleuty of time; and, on returning, he seated himself in the library, and waited somewhat impatiently for a report of what had taken place during his absence. At last the agent made her appearance, but as one of the female servants was near, she merely said in a low tone of voice, "It is all right, sir; the babies, as I promised you, will wear the robes at the christening."

The plan adopted by the agent was simply this: as soon as she had satisfied herself that Mrs. Watkins had left the house she took the opportunity of enlisting the monthly nurse in her service. The latter persuaded Mrs. Thornbury that as she looked somewhat fatigued she had better take a nap, and that she might not be disturbed by the infants they were removed into the next room, which had been fitted up as a temporary nursery, proposing that Deborah should remain with her mistress the while. This having been agreed to, the agent and the nurse took the opportunity to dress the two infants in the christening robes, and that being accomplished they quietly waited till Mrs. Thornbury should awake. In the course of half-an-hour Deborah, without entering the nursery, told them that her mistress was no longer asleep, and that they could bring the babies back again as soon as they pleased. In a few minutes the nurse and the agent, each armed with a baby splendidly attired, entered Mrs. Thornbury's bedroom.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said the latter; "but as I intend leaving for London to-night, I thought you might like to see how the babies would have looked in their robes."

"Two more beautiful little angels I never saw in my life," put in the monthly nurse. "They really do one's heart good to look at them."

Mrs. Thornbury east the loving glance of a proud young mother upon them, but, partially recovering herself, she attempted to turn her eyes from them dressed as they were, but it was impossible, and she submitted to the temptation. The woman and the nurse now approached her, so as to allow her to inspect the children's dresses more closely. The more narrowly Mrs. Thornbury looked at the twins the prouder she was of them. There was a strong excuse for her in thus swerving from the determination she had arrived at in the morning-the children's robes were perfect miracles of artistic needlework. Over white silk slips they were long robes of the finest cambric, richly embroidered with lovely lace insertions. Their caps were of white embroidered silk, trimmed profusely with the richest Mechlin lace. Altogether their appearance was so overwhelmingly attractive that, had either Mrs. George Fox or Mrs. William Peun been present in the flesh, their hearts must have melted within them, and they would have freely acknowledged that the temptation was too great for any mortal mother to withstand. Even Deborah gave way, and admitted that the infants were indeed levely.

Mrs. Thornbury now begun to examine the work in the infants' dresses mechanically, her pre-nuptial occupations having probably made her critical in productions of the kind. When she had finished her inspection she said to the agent,

"When do you propose leaving for London?"

"By the night coach, ma'am," was the reply.

"If you have no objection, I would prefer your remaining here till to-morrow."

"Certainly, ma'am, if you wish it. It will make no difference to me,"

"Then pray remain," said Mrs. Thornbury.

In the evening, as Mr. Thornbury was on the point of retiring to rest, he received a message from his wife informing him that she wanted to speak to him. He immediately obeyed the summons.

"I am afraid, my dear," she said to him, "I was undutiful to you this morning; pray forgive me. I have thought better of your kindness since, and I particularly wish the children to wear the dresses you have provided for them."

Thornbury kissed his wife, and promised that it should be as she wished.

The next day was appointed for the christening, but Mrs. Thornbury had not informed her mother of the change in her determination, considering, perhaps wisely, that sufficient to the day is the evil thereof. It was only when all was in readiness for them to start for the church, that Mrs. Watkins perceived that her daughter had obeyed her husband's wishes. She cast an indignant glance, first at him and then at the children.

"What would George Fox have said!" she exclaimed.

"George Fox be hanged!" remarked Mr. Thornbury, indignantly.

Mrs. Watkins could not by her presence sanction such irreverence. She rushed hurriedly away, and shut herself into her room for the rest of the day. The christening party now started for the church, where the infants were baptized in the names of Charity and Ruth—the latter being appropriated to our heroine. The next morning Mrs. Watkins left for home, and, to the great sorrow of her daughter, still unappeased. To do Mr. Thornbury justice, he submitted to his mother-in-law's departure with far greater resignation than his wife.

Two years after the birth of the twins, Mrs. Thornbury was again confined, and this time, to the great joy of both parents, of a boy. He received the name of Edgar, after his father. They had anticipated some little difficulty on the occasion with Mrs. Watkins, fearing she would again object to the christening robe. Fortunately, however, for Mr. Thornbury and his wife, the old lady at the time was suffering from rheumatism, and she feared leaving home, so all passed off pleasantly enough at the Red House. For five years after this, Mrs. Thornbury had no further addition to her family, but in the sixth she was again expecting to be a mother. Mrs. Thornbury wrote to Mrs. Watkins, inviting her to be present at the accouchement. Beyond the invitation, the letter contained a most grateful compliment to the old lady. It stated that should her health not be sufficiently strong to allow her to leave the house, they would both feel obliged by her informing them, in case the child should be a boy, whether she would prefer his being called George Fox or William Penn, as Mr. Thornbury had decided on one or the other of these names. The old lady was so pleased at this delicate attention to her feelings, that she immediately left home, to take up her residence for a time at the Red House. Luckily, the child was a boy, and at his baptism he was registered, "George Fox Thornbury," which so delighted Mrs. Watkins that she made no objection whatever to the splendour of the dress he wore on the occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury were certainly blessed in their offspring, for a finer or healthier little family it would have been difficult to find. After Mrs. Thornbury herself, whose attention to her children was unremitting, the greater portion of the credit was due to Deborah, who had relinquished her duties as honsekeeper to perform those of head nurse. Deborah's affection for the children was scarcely less than Mrs. Thornbury's; in fact, had they been her own she could hardly have shown greater solicitude for them, and they in return did ample justice to her judicious nursing. As the twins grew up, a marked difference developed itself both in their personal appearance and in their characters. Both were well made and healthy, intelligent and amiable, but there all similarity stopped. Charity was exceedingly pretty, had fair complexion, bright blue eyes, and auburn hair; in fact, her countenance would have formed an admirable model for a painter who wished to combine in the expression of the same face, love, amiability of temper, and mirth. Ruth, on the contrary, was dark in complexion, had black, thoughtful eyes, and raven hair: her features were regular, but with little to attract in them. There was, however, an interesting expression in her face, which went far to compensate for her lack of beauty. Her best feature was her month, which, especially when she smiled, imparted to the face an expression that had something extremely engaging in it.

The expression of countenance in the two girls was a faithful index to their minds and characters. Charity was a light-hearted, sweet-tempered, laughter-loving little romp. Ruth rarely smiled, had but little pleasure in their childish games, and when she did take part in them it was easy to perceive that she did so rather to please her sister than from any satisfaction of her own. But notwithstanding the difference between them in disposition and temperament, they had a remarkable affection for each other-each, however, showing it in her peculiar way. Charity, extreme in all things, would have given all she possessed in the world to her sister, if she had thought it would have pleased her; while Ruth, scarcely less generous in the matter of giving, had much more discretion, and was, even at eight years of age, the prudential adviser of Charity. She would remonstrate with her gravely on her habitual thoughtlessness, and yet would screen and assist her when she was in any trouble occasioned by her romps. She would arrange for her whatever little irregularities they might have occasioned in her dress, so as to hide them as much as possible from the scrutiny of Mrs. Thornbury or Deborah, both of whom retained to a great degree their original Quaker-like love of neatness. When Charity was in disgrace from any little accident, Ruth would plead her cause with great energy, and would wipe away her tears when she was subjected to any trifling punishment or scolding.

Her brother Edgar also came in for no small portion of Ruth's matronly supervision and advice. She watched over him with the greatest solicitude, keeping him as much as possible out of mischief, for which, child as he was, he showed considerable aptitude. She tried as far as she could to neutralise the baneful influence Charity, with her love of romping, was likely to exercise over him. Although there is little reason to doubt that Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury held the two girls in equal affection, and possibly would have revolted at the idea that both were not equally dear to them, there was no difficulty in perceiving that Ruth, with her gentle manners and well-regulated mind, was uppermost in her mother's thoughts, while the father made a very idol of Charity, and by his over-indulgence increased the natural buoyancy and thoughtlessness of her disposition.

As they grew older, the same characteristics were observable in the children; but all went on as happily as possible for the next five years. The same strong attachment continued to exist between the sisters. Charity's habitual carelessness did not diminish as she grew older, while Ruth became still more sedate and methodical. She was altogether a singular character. Although exceedingly undemonstrative, she was the very embodiment of latent family affection. This would occasionally develop itself without any apparent reason for its sudden outflow, whilst at other times, when it might naturally have been expected to show itself, it seemed to be almost dormant. In this respect she formed a singular contrast to Charity, whose love, always buoyant, showed itself when any especial occasion called for it; such as an act of unexpected kindness on the part of her father, or any just commendation from her mother, while Ruth would allow similar occasions to pass without much more notice than the thanks which were due. At other times, again, the marks of her love would show themselves without any particular cause being apparent to elicit them. For example, she would occasionally stand by ner mother's chair, while some topic that was totally uninteresting to her was the subject of conversation, and to which she appeared to pay not the slightest attention, when suddenly, and without warning, she would throw her arms round Mrs. Thornbury's neck and kiss her affectionately. Then she would relieve herself from the embrace, and resume her original position by her mother's side, wearing on her countenance the same placid thoughtful expression which she had

after a few moments she would leave the room on some errand of her own. In the evening, when the family party had assembled round the fire, Ruth would frequently seat herself on a stool by her father's side, and while he was conversing on subjects totally unconnected with her, she would take hold of his hand and retain it for a while, without uttering a word or paying the slightest attention to the topic which was occupying the others.

She was also exceedingly fond of her brother Edgar, although he was in the habit of making poor Ruth the butt of his boyish pranks and jokes. She submitted with the greatest equanimity, and possibly admired him the more for the very tricks he played upon her. The only individual to whom she was at all demonstrative, was her little brother George, now a singularly beautiful child, in feature closely resembling Charity, although in his face there was something of the mildness and intelligence of her own expression. Ruth had taken George under her especial protection, and the child in return was exceedingly fond of her. She had also constituted herself his instructress, and had taught him his letters and his childish prayers, and his efficiency in both was a source of great gratification to her.

But if any doubt could have existed in the minds of Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury of the love Ruth felt for her little brother, a lamentable circumstance which took place when she was between twelve and thirteen years of age elicited it to such a degree as must have completely undeceived them. Ruth had been ailing for some days. She was suffering from prostration of strength, and loss of appetite, with occasional fits of cold shivering alternating with flushes of burning heat. She, however, complained very little, and in consequence her malady did not receive the attention it really required. Notwithstanding the state of her health, she continued her attentions and instructions to her little brother George, hearing him his lessons in the day-time, and especially attending to his prayers night and morning. The child seemed also to be rather unwell: his appetite had fallen off, and he was far paler than usual, but like Ruth, he made scarcely any complaints, and Mrs. Thornbury, whose attention had been called to him, fancied that it was only some childish indisposition which a slight dose of ordinary domestic medicine would speedily cure. One evening, after he had been prepared for bed. Ruth attended as usual to hear him say his prayers. He repeated after her those he had beeu accustomed to use, till he came to a verse of a hymn which he was able to recite without her aid :-

"Gentle Jesus, meek and mild, Look upon a little child; Pity my simplicity, And teach me, Lord, to come to Thee."

her mother's side, wearing on her countenance the same placid thoughtful expression which she had worn before the ebullition of affection, or possibly bed-gown he knelt before Ruth, his glossy silken auburn locks, in which she took especial pride, falling on his neck from beneath his little cap, his hands pressed together, and his eyes bent reverently on the ground. Ruth thought at the time that he strongly resembled an angel. When his prayer was over, Deborah placed him in his cot. "Sit by me, Ruth," he said. She was about to obey him, but Deborah, noticing the girl's sickly look, interposed, and insisted on her leaving him and going to her bed. After some little demur, Ruth kissed him and left the room—and she never saw him afterwards.

The next morning Ruth was too unwell to rise from her bed, and a medical man was sent for. As soon as he saw her, he unhesitatingly pronounced her to be in a high fever, and that every precaution would need to be taken, or it might terminate in typhus. He also saw little George, who, although at the moment he showed no such symptoms as to excite alarm, was still far from well, and required great attention. He further advised that, if practicable, Charity and Edgar should immediately be sent away, as it was possible the malady might communicate itself to them also. This advice was immediately acted upon. Mr. Thornbury applied to one of his tenants to receive the two healthy children into his house for a few weeks. His request was immediately acceded to, and Edgar and Charity left home that night. As the doctor had feared, Ruth's malady terminated in typhus, and that in its most severe form. Delirium set in, and the disease ran its usual course. Thanks to skilful medical treatment, the excellent nursing of Mrs. Thornbury and Deborah, and a good constitution. the fever at last subsided, leaving its victim sadly enfeebled by the violence of its attack.

When Ruth had fully recovered her senses, she naturally became anxious about the health of the other members of the family, particularly of her little brother George. An evasive answer was given her, but she did not detect the ambiguity it contained. Two days afterwards, in the presence of her mother and Deborah, she again inquired after the child. Mrs. Thornbury attempted to answer her, but in vain, and, instead, she burst into a flood of tears. Deborah then took upon herself the painful task of explaining to Ruth that little George was dead. "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord," she said. "He hath in His mercy spared thee, my dear, but thy little brother is now one of His angels." Ruth received the intelligence in her usual placid, undemonstrative manner. She merely bent her head forward from her pillow as if in acquiescence to the Almighty's will; but uttered not a word. She remained perfectly still for a few moments, and then gently turned her head on the pillow as if to sleep.

mother, surprised at her conduct, thought she could hardly have understood Deborah's meaning, and she resolved on the first favourable opportunity to tell Ruth herself of the death of her brother. After a few moments' silence, so as not to disturb Ruth if she felt an inclination to sleep. Mrs. Thornbury noticed a slight heaving of the bed-clothes which covered Ruth's shoulder, and she went softly round to the other side of the bed to ascertain the cause. To her great surprise she found that the poor girl, though perfectly silent, was weeping bitterly. Her tears flowed so rapidly that Mrs. Thornbury became greatly alarmed. The poor child's sorrow, however, though it seemed perfectly overwhelming, was displaying itself in her own peculiar way. Her grief was perfectly silent; she did not utter a sob, and, but for the slight involuntary movement of the shoulders, she might have been supposed to be in a profound sleep.

Mrs. Thornbury now used every effort in her power to console the poor girl, but with small success. True, to a certain extent, she somewhat suppressed her tears, but the effort was evidently made with the intention of pleasing her mother more than anything else. Fortunately, beyond somewhat retarding her cure, Ruth's grief did not greatly injure her bodily health, but the doctor began to entertain some fears whether it might not act prejudicially on her mind. As soon as Ruth had acquired sufficient bodily strength to be removed, he advised Mrs. Thornbury to take her to the sea-side. This was readily agreed to. Mrs. Thornbury and Ruth left home, and returned in about a month, the patient having received great benefit from the trip.

Ruth never afterwards spoke of her little brother. and the rest of the family, to humour her, abstained from mentioning him in her presence. A slight difficulty relating to the poor boy had yet to be got over, and Mrs. Thornbury was sorely puzzled how to accomplish it. Before George was buried, several locks of his hair had been cut off, and one had been given to each member of the family with the exception of Ruth, though hers had been retained for her. Mrs. Thornbury now wished her to receive it, but did not like to broach the subject. Charity, however, came to her mother's assistance in this matter. She enveloped the lock of hair in a sheet of notepaper, on which she wrote, "A lock of poor George's hair," and she then placed it in a drawer in Ruth's room. Shortly afterwards, Charity asked her sister for something she knew was in the drawer, and Ruth left the room in which they were sitting to find it. Charity went again to the drawer in Ruth's bedroom. The lock of hair had been taken by Ruth, but she spoke not one word about it, nor could any one discover what she had Her done with it.

FROM THE OCEAN TO-THE SEA.

Some of the readers of Good Words may possibly be interested by a simple sketch of a journey through the South of France, from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean. True it is that most of the country is so well known to British tourists, that it will seem to some a sort of impertinence to talk about it, especially when the writer has nothing new to say. And this would be the case, were he about to fill his pages with descriptions of Pau, or Bagnères, or the Cirque de Gavarni, or many other places which swarm with tourists.

But a journey from the oceau to the sea takes the traveller through many places which tourists, for various reasons, avoid, or hurry past in the railway: and besides, the readers of Good Words are not all tourists; most of them will never see the Pyrenees or the Mediterranean; they will stay at home, and do the work which lies nearest them; and they may be glad to hear of new lands, new plants and insects, new people, and their looks and ways, even though a certain percentage of their countrymen know all about the matter already.

So I shall sketch, as simply as I can, the country between the ocean and the sea. Of the religion and politics of the folk who dwell therein, I shall say nothing. It would be an ungenerous requital for the courtesy and kindness which they show to an Englishman, simply because he is an Englishman, pharisaically to speak evil of them here at home; to assume the character of a critic, after having been treated, not as a customer, but as a guest; or to discover points of difference with those, whose chief anxiety was to discover points of agreement. No, pleasant, courtcous, honest, and I doubt not virtuous folk, this writer will say nothing of you, but the Good Words which befit this magazine.

The point from which to start, in order best to appreciate the change from ocean to sea, is perhaps Biarritz. The point at which to stop is Cette. And the change is important. Between the two points, races are changed, climates are changed, seenery is changed, the very plants under your feet are changed, from a Western to an Eastern type. You pass from the wild Atlantic into the heart of the Roman Empire—all the influences which formed the discoverers of the New World, to those which formed the civilisers of the Old. Gascony, not only in its scenery, but in its very legends, reminds you of Devon and Cornwall; Languedoc of Greece and Palestine.

In the sea, as was to be expected, the change is even more complete. From Biarritz to Cette, you pass from poor Edward Forbes's Atlantic to his Mediterranean centre of creation. In plain English and fact, whether you agree with his theory or not, you pass from the region of respectable whales, herrings, and salmon, to that of tunnics, scienas, dorados, and all the gorgons, hydras, and chimeras dire, which are said to grace the fish-markets of Barcelona or Marseilles.

But to this assertion, as to most concerning nature, there are exceptions. Mediterranean fishes slip out of the Straits of Gibraltar, and up the coast of Portugal, and, once in the Bay of Biscay, find the feeding good and the wind against them, and stay there.

So it befalls, that at worthy M. Gardére's hotel at Biarritz (he has seen service in England, and knows our English ways), you may have at dinner, day after day, salmon, louvine, shad, sardine, dorado, tunny. The first is unknown to the Mediterranean; for Fluellen mistook when he said that there were salmons in Maccdon, as well as Monmouth; the louvine is none other than the nasty bass, or seaperch of the Atlantic; the shad (extinct in these islands, save in the Severn) is a gigantic herring which comes up rivers to spawn; a fish common (with slight differences) to both sides of the North Atlantic; while the sardine, the dorado, and the tunny (whether he be the true tunny or the Alalonga), are Mediterranean fish.

The whale fishery of these shores is long extinct. The Biscayan whale was supposed to be extinct likewise. But like the ibex, and some other animals which man has ceased to hunt, because he fancies that he has killed them all, they seem indeed to reappear. For in 1854 one was washed ashore near St. Jean de Luz, at news whereof Eschricht, the great Danish naturalist, travelled night and day from Copenhagen, and secured the skeleton of the new-old monster.

But during the latter part of the middle ages, and on—if I recollect aright—into the seventeenth century, Bayonne, Biarritz, Guettary, and St. Jean de Luz, sent forth their hardy whale fishers, who slew all the whales of the Biscayan seas, and then crossed the Atlantic, to attack those of the frozen North.

British and American enterprise drove them from the West coast of the Atlantic; and now their descendants are content to stay at home, and take the sardine-shoals, and send them in to Bayonne on their daughters' heads.

Pretty enough it was, at least in outward seeming, to meet a party of those fisher-girls, bare-legged, high-kilted, lithe as deer, trotting, at a long loping pace, up the high road toward Bayonne, each with her basket on her head, as she laughed and sang, and tossed her black hair, and flashed her brown eyes, full of life and the enjoyment of life. Pretty enough. And yet who will blame the rail, which now sends her quickly into Bayonne—or even her fish without her; and relieves the fair young maiden from being degraded into a beast of burden?

Handsome folk are these brown Basques. A mysterious folk, who dwell alone, and are not counted among the nations; speaking au unique language, and keeping up unique customs, for which the curious must consult M. Michel's interesting book. There may be a cross of English blood among them, too, about Biarritz and Bayonne; English features there are, plainly to be seen. And whether or not one accepts the story of the country, that Anglets, near by, is an old English colony, left by our Black Prince, it is certain that Bayonne Cathedral was built in part by English architects, and carries the royal arms of England; and every school history will tell us how this corner of France was long in our hands; and was indeed English long before it was properly French. Moorish blood there may be, too, here and there, left behind by those who built the little "atalaya" or fire-beacon, over the old harbour, to correspond, by its smoke column, with a long line of similar beacons down the Spanish coast. The Basques resemble in look the Southern Welsh-quick-eyed, neat in feature, neat in dress, often, both men and women, beautiful. The men wear a flat Scotch cap of some bright colour, and call it "berretta." The women tie a gaudy handkerchief round their heads, and compel one corner to stand forward from behind the ear in a triangle, in proportion to the size and stiffness whereof the lady seems to think herself well dressed. But the pretty Basque handkerchief will soon give place to the Parisian bonnet. For every cove among the rocks is now filled with smart bathing-houses, from which, in summer, the gay folk of Paris issue in "costume de bain," to float about all day on calabashes-having literally no room for the soles of their feet on land. Then are opened casinos, theatre, shops, which lie closed all the winter. Then do the Basque house-owners fice into the moors, and camp out (it is said) on the hills all night, letting their rooms for ten francs a-night as mere bed-chambers-for all eating and living is performed in public. Then is the Villa Eugénie gay with an Imperial Court; and the dove-coloured oxen, with brown holland pinafores over their backs, who dawdle in pairs up and down the long street with their light carts, give place to wondrous equipages from the Bois de Boulogne.

Not then, for the wise man, is Biarritz a place to see and to love: but in the winter, when a little knot of quiet pleasant English hold the place against all comers, and wander, undisturbed by fashion, about the quaint little rocks and caves and natural bridges—and watch tumbling into the sea, before the Biscayan surges, the trim walks, and summerhouses, which were erected by the municipality the year before, in honour of the Empress and her suite. Yearly they tumble in, and yearly are renewed, as the soft greensand strata are graven away, and what must have been once a long promontory, becomes a group of fantastic pierced rocks, exactly like those which are immortalised upon the willow-pattern plates.

Owing to this rapid destruction, the rocks of Biarritz are very barren in sea-beasts and sea-weeds. But there is one remarkable exception, where the pools worn in a hard limestone are filled with what seem at first sight beds of chivasters, of all loveliest colours—primrose, sea-green, dove, purple, crimson, pink, ash-grey. They are all prickly sea-eggs (presumably the Echinus lividus, which is found in similar places in the west of Ireland), each buried for life in a cupshaped hole which he has excavated in the rock, and shut in by an overhanging lip of living lime—seemingly a Nullipore coralline. What they do there; what they think of, or what food is brought into their curious grinding-mills by the Atlantic surges which thunder over them twice a-day, who can tell? But they form, without doubt, the most beautiful object which this writer has ever seen, in pool or cove.

But the glory of Biarritz, after all, is the moors above, and the view to be seen therefrom. Under blazing blue skies, tempered by soft dappled cloud, for ever sliding from the Atlantic and the Asturias mountains, and in a climate soft as milk, and exhilarating withal as wine, one sees far and wide a panorama which, from its variety as well as its beauty, can never weary.

To the north, the long sand-line of the Biscavan shore - the bar of the Adour marked by a cloud of grey spray. Then the dark pine-flats of the Landes, and the towers of Bayonne rising through rich woods. To the eastward lies a high ' country, furred with woods, broken with glens; a country exactly like Devon, through the heart of which, hidden in such a gorge as that of Dart or Taw, runs the swift stream of the Nive, draining the western Pyrenees. And beyond, to the south-east, in early spring, the Pyrenean snows gleam bright, white clouds above the clouds. one turns southward, the mountains break down into brown heather-hills, like Scottish grouse moors. The two nearest, and seemingly highest, are the famous Rhune and Bayonette, where lie, to this day, amid the heath and crags, hundreds of unburied bones. For those great hills, skilfully fortified by Soult before the passage of the Bidassoa, were stormed, yard by yard, by Wellington's army in October, 1813. That mighty deed must be read in the pages of one who saw it with his own eyes, and fought there with his own noble body, and even nobler spirit. It is not for me to tell of victories, of which Sir William Napier has already told.

Towards that hill, and the Nivelle at its foot, the land slopes down, still wooded and broken, bounded by a long sweep of clayey crumbling cliff. The eye catches the fort of Secoa, at the mouth of the Nivelle-once Wellington's sea-base for his great French campaign. Then Fontarabia, at the Bidassoa mouth; and far off, the cove within which lies the fatal citadel of St. Sebastian, all backed up by the fautastic mountains of Spain; the four-horned "Quatre Couronnes," the pyramidal Jaysquivel, and beyond them again, sloping headlong into the sea, peak after peak, each one more blue and tender than the one before, leading the eye on and on for seemingly countless leagues. till they die away into the ocean horizon and the boundless west. Not a sail, often for days together, passes between those mountains and the shore on which we stand, to break the solitude, and peace, and vast expanse; and one lingers, looking and looking at one knows not what, and finds repose in gazing purposeless into the utter void.

Very unlike France are these Basque uplands; very like the seaward parts of Devon and Cornwall. Large oak-copses and boggy meadows fill the glens; while above, the small fields, with their five-barred gates (relics of the English occupation) and high furze and heath-grown banks, make you fancy yourself for a moment in England. And the illusion is strengthened, as you see that the heath of the banks is the Goonhilly heath of the Lizard Point, and that of the bogs the orange-belled Erica ciliaris, which lingers (though rare) both in Cornwall and in the south of Ireland. But another glance undeceives you. The wild flowers are new, saving those cosmopolitan seeds (like nettles and poppies) which the Romans have carried all over Europe, and the British are now earrying over the world. Every sandy bank near the sea is covered with the creeping stems of a huge reed, which grows in summer tall enough to make not only high fences, but fishing-rods. Poverty (though there is none of what we call poverty in Britain) fills the little walled court before its cottage with bay trees and its standard figs; while wealth (though there is nothing here of what we call wealth in Britain) asserts itself uniformly by great standard magnolias, and rich trailing roses, in full bloom here in April instead of-as with us-in July. Both on bank and in bog grow Scorzoneras (dandelions with sword-shaped leaves) of which there are none in these isles; and every common is ablaze with strange and levely flowers. Each dry spot is brilliant with the azure flowers of a prostrate Lithospermum, so exquisite a plant, that it is a marvel why we do not see it, as "spring bedding," in every British garden. The heath is almost hidden, in places, by the large white flowers and trailing stems of the sage-leaved Cistus. Delicate purple Ixias, and yet more delicate Hoop-petticoat Narcissus, spring from the turf. And here and there among furze and heath, crop out great pink bunches of the Daphne Cneorum of our gardens, perfuming all the air. Yes, we are indeed in foreign parts, in the very home of that Atlantic flora, of which only a few species have reached the south-west of these isles; and on the limit of another flora also-of that of Italy and Greece. For as we descended into the glen, every lane-bank and low tree is entwined, not with ivy, but with a still more beautiful evergreen, the Smilax of South-Eastern Europe, with its zigzag stems, and curving heart-shaped leaves, and hooked thorns; the very oak-scrub is of species unknown to Britain. And what are these 'tall lilies, which fill every glade breast-high with their sword-like leaves, and spires of white flowers, lilacpencilled? They are the classic flower, the Asphodel of Greece and Grecian song; the Asphodel through which the ghosts of Homer's heroes strode: as heroes' ghosts might stride even here.

For here we are on sacred ground. The vegetation is rank with the blood of gallant invaders, and of no less gallant patriots. In the words of Campbell's "Hohenlinden"—

> "Every turf beneath our feet May be a hero's sepulchre."

That little tarn below has "bubbled with crimson foam" when the kings of Europe arose to bring home the Bourbons, as did the Lake Regillus of old, in the day when "the Thirty Cities swore to bring the Tarquins home."

Turn to the left, above the tarn, and into the great Spanish road from Bayonne to the frontier at what was lately "La Negresse," but is now a gay railway station, sacred to the Empress and to fashion. Where that station is, was another tarn, now drained. The road ran between the two. And that narrow space of two hundred yards, on which we stand, was for three fearful days the gate of France.

For on the 10th of December, 1813, Soult, driven into Bayonne by Wellington's advance, rushed out again in the early morn, and poured a torrent of living men down this road, and upwards again toward the British army which crested that long ridge in front.

The ridge slopes rapidly away at the back, toward the lowlands of the Bidassoa; and once thrust from it, the English army would have been cut in two—one half driven back upon their sea-base at St. Jean de Luz: the other half left on the further side of the Adour.

And this was the gate, which had to be defended during a three days' battle. That long copse which overhangs the road is the famous wood, which was taken and retaken many times. You house above it, embowered in trees, is the "Mayor's house," in which Sir John Hope was so nearly captured by the French. Somewhere behind the lane where we came down was the battery which blasted off our troops as they ran up from the lowlands behind, to support their fellows.

Of the details of the fight you must read in Napier's "Peninsular War," and in Mr. Gleig's "Subaltern." They are not to be described by one who never saw a battle, great or small.

And now, if you choose to start upon your journey from the ocean to the sea, you will take the railroad here, and run five miles through the battle-fields into Bayonne, the quaint old fortress city, girdled with a labyrinth of walls, and turf dykes, and outside them meadows as rich, and trees as stately, as if war had never swept across the land. You may stop, if you will, to look at the tall Spanish houses, with their piazzas and jalousies, and the motley populace, French, Basques, Spaniards, Jews; and, most worth seeing of all, the lovely ladies of Bayonne, who swarm out when the sun goes down, for air and military music. You may try to find (in which you will probably fail) the arms of England in the roof of the ugly old cathedral; you may wander over the bridges which join the three quarters of the city (for the Adour and the Nive meet within the walls), and probably lose your way-a slight matter among folk who, if you will but take off your hat, call them Monsieur, apologise for the trouble you are giving, begin the laugh at your own stupidity, and compliment them on their city and their fair ladies, will be delighted to walk a mile out of their own way to show you yours. You will gaze up at the rock-rooted citadel from whence, in the small hours of April 14, 1813, after peace was agreed on, but unhappily not declared (for Napier has fully exculpated the French Generals), three thousand of Thouvenot's men burst forth against Sir John Hope's unsuspecting besiegers, with a furious valour which cost the English more than S00 men.

There, in the pine woods on the opposite side, is the Boucault, where our besieging army lay. Across the reach below stretched Sir John Hope's famous bridge; and as you leave Bayonne by rail, you run beneath the English cemetery, where lie the soldiers (officers of the Coldstream Guards among them) who fell in the Frenchman's last struggle to defend his native land.

But enough of this. I should not have recalled to mind one of these battles, had they not, one and all, been as glorious for the French and their great captain—wearied with long marches, disheartened by the apathy of their own countrymen, and, as they went on, overpowered by mere numbers—as they were for our veterans, and Wellington himself.

To form a conception of these famous Landes, it is only necessary to run down by the South-Western Railway, through the moors of Woking or Ascot: spread them out flat, and multiply them to seeming infinity. The same sea of brown heather, broken only by the same dark pignadas, or fir plantations, extends for nigh a hundred miles; and when the traveller northward has lost sight, first of the Spanish mountains, and then of the Pyrenean snows, he seems to be rushing along a brown ocean, without wave or shore. Only, instead of the three heaths of Surrey and Hants (the same species as those of Scotland), larger and richer southern heaths cover the grey sands; and notably, the delicate upright spires of the bruyère, or Erica scoparia, which grows full six feet high, and furnishes from its roots, those "bruyère" pipes, which British shopkeepers have rechristened "briar-roots." Instead, again, of the Scotch firs of Ascot, the pines are all pinasters (miscalled P. Maritima). Each has the same bent stem, carrying at top, long, ragged, scanty, leaf-tufts, instead of the straight stem and dense short foliage of the sturdier Scotchman; and down each stem runs a long fresh, scar, and at the bottom (in spring at least), hangs a lip of tin, and a neat earthen pipkin, into which distils turpentine as clear as glass. The trees have mostly been planted within the last fifty years, to keep the drifting sands from being blown away. As timber they are about as valuable as those Jersey cowcabbage stalks, of which the curious will at times make walking-sticks: but as producers of turpentine they have their use, and give employment to the sad. stunted, ill-fed folk, unhealthy for want of water, and barbarous from utter loneliness, whose only employment, in old times, was the keeping ragged flocks about the moors. Few and far between the natives may be seen from the railway, seemingly hung high in air, till on nearer approach you find them to be stalking along on stilts, or standing knitting on the same, a sheepskin over their shoulders, an umbrella strapped to their side, and, stuck into the small of the back, a long crutch, which serves. when resting, as a third wooden leg.

So run on the Landes, mile after mile, station after station, varied only by an occasional stunted cork tree, or a starved field of barley or maize. But the railroad is bringing to them, as elsewhere, labour, civilisation, agricultural improvement. Pretty villages, orchards, gardens, are springing up round the lonely "gares." The Emperor is helping forward, it is said, new pine plantations, and sundry schemes for reclaiming the waste. Arcachon, on a pine-fringed lagoon of the Atlantic, has great artificial ponds for oyster breeding, and is rising into a gay watering-place, with a distinguished scientific society. Nay, more: it is to see, this year, an international exposition of fish, and fish-culture, and fishing-tackle, and all things connected with the fisheries, not only of Europe, but of America likewise. Heaven speed the plan; and restore thereby oysters to our shores, and shad and salmon to the rivers both of Western Europe and Eastern North America.

As for the cause of the Landes, it may be easily divined, by the help of a map and of common sense.

The Gironde and the Adour carry to the sea the drainage of nearly a third of France, including almost all the rain which falls on the north side of the Pyrenees. What has become of all the sand and mud which has been swept in the course of ages, down their channels? What has become-a very small part, be it recollected, of the whole amount-of all the rock which has been removed by rain and thunder, frost and snow, in the process of scooping out the deep valleys of the Pyrenees. Out of that one crack, which men call the Val d'Ossan, stone has been swept enough to form a considerable island. Where is it all? In these Landes. Carried down year by year to the Atlantic, it has been driven back again year by year, by the fierce gales of the Bay of Biscay, and rolled up into banks and dunes of loose sand, till it has filled up what was once a broad estuary, 140 miles across and perhaps 70 miles in depth. Upheaved it may have been also, slowly, from the sea, for recent sca-shells are found as far inland as Dax; and thus the whole upper end of the Bay of Biscay has transfermed itself during the lapse of, it may be, countless ages, into a desolate wilderness.

It is at Dax that we leave the main line, and instead of running north for Bourdeaux and the land of clarets, turn south-east to Orthez and Pau, and the Gaves, and the Pyrenees.

And now we turn south-east, through ragged uplands, woody and moorish with the long yellow maize-stalks of last years' crop rotting in the swampy glens. For the "petite culture," whatever be its advantages, gives no capital or power of combined action for draining wet lands; and the glens of Gascony and Bearn in the south, as well as great sheets of the Pas de Calais in the north, are in a waterlogged state, equally shocking to the eye of a British farmer, and injurious to the health as to the crops of the peasants.

Soon we strike the Adour, here of the shape and size of a second-class Scotch salmon-stream, with swirling brown pools beneath grey crags, which make one long to try in them the virtues of "Jock Scott," "the Butcher" or the "Dusty Miller." And perhaps not without effect; for salmon are there still; and will be more and more as French "pisciculture" develops itself under imperial supervision.

And here we touch again the line of that masterly retreat of Soult's before the superior forces of Wellington, to which Napier has done such ample and deserved justice.

There is Bereuz, where the Sixth and Light divisions crossed the Gave, and clambered into the high road up steep ravines; and there is Orthez itself, with the beautiful old Gothic bridge which the French could not blow up, as they did every other bridge on their retreat; and the ruins of that robber den to which Gaston Phœbus, Count of Foix (of whom you may read in Froissart), used to drag his victims; and there overhead, upon the left of the rail and road, is the old Roman camp, and the hill of Orthez, and St. Boes, and the High Church of Baights, the scene of the terrible battle of Orthez.

The Roman camp, then "open and grassy, with a few trees," says Napier, is now covered with vine-yards. Everywhere the fatal slopes are rich with cultivation, plenty, and peace. God grant they may remain so for ever.

And so, along the Gave de Pau, we run on to Pau, the ancient capital of Bearn; the birthplace of Henri Quatre, and of Bernadotte, King of Sweden; where, in the charming old château, restored by Louis Philippe, those who list may see the tortoise which served as the great Henry's cradle; and believe, if they list also, the tale that that is the real shell

For in 1793, when the knights of the "bonnet rouge" and "carmagnole complete" burst into the castle, to destroy every memorial of hated royalty, the shell among the rest, there chanced—miraculous coincidence—to be in Pau, in the collection of a naturalist, another shell, of the same shape and size. Swiftly and deftly pious hands substituted it for the real relic, leaving it to be battered in pieces and trampled in the mud, while the royal cradle lay perdu for years in the roof of a house, to reappear duly at the Restoration of the Bourbons.

Of Pau I shall say nothing. It would be real impertinence in one who only spent three days in it, to describe a city which is known to all Europe; which is a permanent English colony, and boasts of one, and sometimes two, packs of English foxhounds. But this I may be allowed to say. That of all delectable spots I have yet seen, Pau is the most delectable. Of all the landscapes which I have beheld, that from the Place Royale is, for variety, richness, and grandeur, the most glorious; at least as I saw it for the first time.

Beneath the wall of the high terrace are rich meadows, vocal with frogs rejoicing in the rain, and expressing their joy, not in the sober monotone of our English frogs, but, each according to his kind. One bellowing, the next barking, the next cawing, and the next (probably the little green Hylas, who has come down out of the trees to breed) quacking in treble like a tiny drake. The bark (I suspect) is that of the gorgeous edible frog; and so suspect the young recruits who lounge upon the wall, and look down wistfully, longing, I presume, to eat him. And quite right they are, for he (at least his thighs) is exceeding good to eat, tenderer and sweeter than any spring chicken.

Beyond the meadow, among the poplars, the broad Gave murmurs on over shingly shallows, between aspen-fringed islets, grey with the melting snows; and beyond her again rise broken wooded hills, dotted with handsome houses; and beyond them a veil of mist and rain.

And on a sudden that veil lifts; and five-andtwenty miles away, beneath the black edge of the cloud, against the clear blue sky, stands out the whole snow-range of the Pyrenees; and in the midst, exactly opposite, filling up a vast gap which is the Val d'Ossan, the huge cone, still snowy white, of the Pic du Midi.

He who is conversant with theatres, will be unable to overlook the seeming art—and even artifice—of such an effect. The clouds lift like a drop-scene; the mountains are utterly unlike any natural object in the north, that for the moment one fancies them painted, and not real; the Pic du Midi stands so exactly where it ought, and is yet so fantastic and unexpected in its shape, that an artist seems to have put it there.

But he who knows nothing, and cares less, about theatres and their sham glories, and sees for the first time in his life the eternal snows of which he has read since childhood, 'draws his breath deeply, and stands astounded, whispering to himself that God is great.

One hint more, ere we pass on from Pau. Here, at least in spring time, of all places in Europe, may a man feed his ears with song of birds. The copies by the Gave, the public walks and woods (wherein English prejudices have happily protected what is elsewhere shot down as game, even to the poor little cock-robins whose corpses lie by dozens in too many French markets), are filled with all our English birds of passage, finding their way northwards from Morocco and Algiers; and with our English nightingales, black caps, willowwrens, and whitethroats, are other songsters which never find their way to these isles, and for which you must consult the pages of Mr. Gould or Mr. Bree-and chief among them, the dark Orpheus, and the yellow Hippolais, surpassing the blackcap, and almost equalling the nightingale, for richness and variety of song-the polyglot warbler which penetrates, in summer, as far north as the shores of the British Channel, and there stops short, scared by the twenty miles of sea, after a land journey-and by night, too, as all the warblers journey-from

At Pau, the railroad ends for the present; and they who would go eastward, must take carriage, and go by the excellent road (all public roads in the south of France are excellent, and equal to our best English roads) over the high Landes to Tarbes; and on again over fresh Landes to Montrejean; and thence by railway to Toulouse.

They are very dreary, these high flat uplands, from which innumerable streams pour down to swell the Adour and the Garonne; and as one rolls along, listening to the eternal tinkle of the horsebells, only two roadside objects are particularly worthy of notice. First, the cultivation, spreading rapidly since the Revolution, over what was open moor; and next the great natural parks which one traverses here and there; the remnants of those forests which were once sacred to the seigneurs and their field sports. The seigneurs are gone now, and the game with them; and the forests are almost gone-so ruinate, indeed, by the peasantry, that the government (I believe) has interfered to stop a destruction of timber, which involves the destruction both of fire-wood and of the annual fall of rain. But the trees which remain, whether in forest or in homestead, are sadly mangled. The winters are sharp in these high uplands, and firing scarce; and the country method of obtaining it is to send a woman up a tree, where she hacks off, with feeble arms and feeble tools, boughs half-way out from the stem, disfiguring, and in time destroying by letting the wet enter, splendid southern oaks, chestnuts, and walnuts. Painful and hideous, to an eye accustomed to British parks, are the forms of these once noble trees.

Suddenly we descend a brow into the Vale of Tarbes: a good land and large, a labyrinth of clear streams, water-meadows, cherry-orchards, and crops of every kind, and in the midst the pleasant old city, with its once famous university of Tarbes, you may read in the pages of Froissart—or, if you prefer a later authority, in those of Dumas "Trois Mousquetaires," for this is the native land of the immortal Ulysses of Gascony, the Chevalier d'Artagnan.

There you may see, to your surprise, not only gentlemen, but ladies, taking their pleasure on horseback after the English fashion; for there is close by a great "haras," or government establishment for horse-breeding. You may watch the quaint dresses in the market-place; you may rest, as Froissart rested of old, in a right pleasant inn ; you may eat of the delicious cookery which is to be found, even in remote towns, throughout the south of France, and even-if you dare-of "Coquilles aux Champignons." You may sit out after dinner in that delicious climate, listening to the rush of the clear Adour through streets, and yards, and culverts; for the city, like Romsey or Salisbury, is built over many streams. You may watch the Pyrenees changing from white to rose, from rose to lead colour, and then dying away into the night-for twilight there is little or none, here in the far > "The sun's rim dips, the stars rush out, At one stride comes the dark."

And soon, from street to street you hear the "clarion" of the garrison, that singularly wild and sweet trumpet-call which sends French soldiers to their beds. And at that the whole populace swarms out, rich and poor, and listens entranced beneath the trees in the Place Maubourguet, as if they had never heard it before; with an order and a sobriety, and a good humour, and a bowing to each other, and asking and giving of cigarlights between men of every class-and a little quiet modest love-making on the outskirts of the crowd, which is very pleasant to behold. And when the music is silent, and the people go off suddenly, silently, and soberly withal (for there are no drunkards in these parts), to their early beds, you stand and look up into the "purple night," as Homer calls it-that southern sky, intensely dark, and yet transparent withal, through which you seem to look beyond the stars into the infinite itself, and recollect that beyond all that, and through all that likewise, there is an infinite good God who cares for all these simple kindly folk; and that by Him all their hearts are as wellknown, and all their infirmities as mercifully weighed, as are (you trust) your own.

And so you go to rest, content to say, with the wise American, "It takes all sorts to make a world."

And the next morn you rise, to roll on over yet more weary uplands to Montrejean, over long miles of sandy heath, a magnified Aldershott, which during certain summer months is gay, here and there, like Aldershott, with the tents of an army at play. But in spring the desolation is utter, and the lone-liest grouse-moor, and the boggiest burn, are more cheerful and varied than the Landes of Lannemezan, and the foul streamlets which have sawn gorges through the sandy waste.

But all the while, on your right hand, league after league, ever fading into blue sky behind you, and growing afresh out of blue sky in front, hangs high in air the white saw of the Pyrenees. High, I say, in air, for the land slopes, or seems to slope, down from you to the mountain range, and all their roots are lost in a dim sea of purple haze. But shut out the snow line above, and you will find that the seeming haze is none, but really a clear and richly varied distance of hills, and woods, and towns, which have become invisible from the contrast of their greens, and greys, and purples, with the glare and dazzle of the spotless snows of spring.

There they stand, one straight continuous jagged wall, of which no one point seems higher than another. From the Pic d'Ossan, by the Mont Perdu and the Maladetta to the Pic de Lart, are peaks past counting-hard clear white against the hard clear blue, and blazing with keen light beneath the high southern sun. Each peak carries its little pet cushioned cloud, hanging motionless a few hundred yards above in the blue sky, a row of them as far as eye can see. But, ever and anon, as afternoon draws on, one of those little clouds, seeming tired of waiting at its post ever since sunrise, loses its temper, boils, swells, settles down on its own private peak, and explodes in a fierce thunderstorm down its own private valley, without discomposing in the least its neighbour cloudcushions right and left. Faintly the roll of the thunder reaches the ear. Across some great blackness of cloud and cliff, a tiny spark darts down. A long wisp of cloud sweeps rapidly toward you across the lowlands, and a momentary brush of cold rain lays the dust. And then the pageant is played out, and the disturbed peak is left clear again in the blue sky for the rest of the day, to gather another cloud-cushion when to-morrow's sun shall rise.

To him who looks, day after day, on this astonishing natural wall, stretching, without visible gap, for nearly three hundred miles, it is easy to see why France not only is, but must be, a different world from Spain. Even human thought cannot, to any useful extent, fly over that great wall of homeless rock and snow. On the other side there must needs be another folk, with another tongue. other manners, other politics, and if not another creed, yet surely with other, and utterly different. conceptions of the universe, and of man's business therein. Railroads may do somewhat. But what of one railroad; or even of two, one on the ocean, one on the sea, two hundred and seventy miles apart? Before French civilisation can inform and elevate the Spanish people, you must "plane down the Pyrenees."

At Montrejean, a pretty town upon a hill which overhangs the Garonne, you find, again, verdure and a railroad; and, turning your back upon the Pyrenees, run down the rich ugly vale of the Garonne, through crops of exceeding richness—wheat, which is reaped in July, to be followed by buckwheat reaped in October; then by green crops to be cut in May, and that again by maize, to be pulled in October, and followed by wheat and the same rotation.

And thus you reach Toulouse, a noble city, of which it ill befits a passer through, to speak. Volumes have been written on its antiquities, and volumes on its history; and all of either that the readers of this magazine need know, they will find in Murray's handbook.

At Toulouse—or rather on leaving it to go eastward—you become aware that you have passed into a fresh region. The change has been, of course, gradual: but it has been concealed from you by passing over the chilly dreary uplands of Lannemezan. Now you find yourself at once in Languedoc. You have passed from the Atlantic region into the Mediterranean; from the old highlands of the wild Vascones, into those lowlands of Gallia Narbonensis, reaching from the headwaters of the Garonne to the mouths of the Rhone, which were said to be more Italian than Italy itself.

The peculiarity of the district is its gorgeous colouring. Everywhere, 'over rich green plains, you look away to low craggy banks of limestone, the grey whereof contrasts strongly with the green of the lowland, and with the even richer green of the mulberry orchards; and beyond them again, southward to the now distant snows of the Pyrenees, and northward to the orange downs and purple glens of the Cevennes, all blazing in the blazing sun. Green, grey, orange, purple, and, in the farthest distance, blue as of the heaven itself, make the land one vast rainbow, and fit dwelling-place for its sunny folk, still happy and industrious—once the most cultivated and luxurious peoples in Europe.

As for their industry, it is hereditary. These lands were, it may be, as richly and carefully tilled in the days of Augustus Cæsar as they are now; or rather, as they were at the end of the eighteenth century. For, since then, the delver and sower—for centuries the slave of the Roman, and, for centuries after, the slave of Teutonic or Saracenic conquerors—has become his own master, and his own landlord; and an impulse has been given to industry, which is shown by trim cottages, gay gardens, and fresh olive orchards, pushed up into gleus which in a state of nature would starve a goat.

The special culture of the country—more and more special as we run eastward—is that of the mulberry, the almond, and the olive. Along every hill-side, down every glen, lie orchard-rows of the precious pollards. The mulberries are of richest dark velvet green; the almonds, one glory of rose-colour in early spring, are now of a paler and colder green; the olives (as all the world knows) of a dusty grey, which looks all the more desolate in the pruning time of early spring, when half the boughs of the evergreen are cut out, leaving the trees stripped as by a tempest, and are carried home for fire-wood in the quaint little carts, with their solid creaking wheels, drawn by dove-coloured kine. Very ancient are some of these olives, or rather, olivegroups. For when the tree grows old, it splits, and falls asunder, as do often our pollard willows; the bark heals over on the inside of each fragment, and what was one tree becomes many, springing from a single root, and bearing such signs of exceeding age that one can well believe the country tale, how, in the olive grounds around Nismes are still fruiting, olives which have furnished oil for the fair Roman dames who cooled themselves in the sacred fountain of Nemausa, in the days of the twelve Cæsars.

Between the pollard rows are everywhere the rows of vines, or of what will be vines when summer comes, but are now black knobbed and gnarled clubs, without a sign of life save here and there one fat green shoot of leaf and tendril bursting forth from the seemingly dead stick.

And one who sees that sight may find a new meaning and beauty in the mystic words, "I am the vine, ye are the branches." It is not merely the connection between branch and stem, common to all trees; not merely the exhilarating, and seemingly inspiring properties of the grape, which made the very heathens look upon it as the sacred and miraculous fruit, the special gift of God; not merely the pruning out of the unfruitful branches, to be burned as fire-wood, or (after the old Roman fashion, which I believe endures still in these parts) buried as manure at the foot of the parent stem; not merely these, but the seeming death of the vine, shorn of all its beauty, its fruitfulness, of every branch and twig which it had borne the year before, and left, unsightly and seemingly ruined, to its winter's sleep; and then bursting forth again, by an irresistible inward life, into fresh branches spreading and trailing far and wide, and tossing their golden tendrils to the sun.

This thought, surely—the emblem of the living Church springing from the corpse of the dead Christ, who yet should rise and be alive for evermore—enters into, it may be forms an integral part of, the meaning of, that prophecy of all prophecies.

One ought to look, with something of filial reverence, on the agriculture of the district into which we are penetrating; for it is the parent of our own. From hence, or strictly speaking from the Mediterranean shore beyond us, spread northward and westward through France, Belgium, and Britain, all the tillage which we knew-at least till a hundred years ago-beyond the primæval plan of clearing, or surface-burning, the forests, growing miserable white crops as long as they would yield, and then letting the land relapse, for twenty years, into miserable pasture. This process (which lingered thirty years ago in remote parts of Devon), and nothing better, seems to have been that change of cultivated lands which Tacitus ascribes to the ancient Germans. Rotation of crops, in any true sense, came to us from Provence and Languedoc; and with it, subsoiling; irrigation; all our artificial grasses. with lucerne at the head of the list; our peas and beans; some of our most important roots; almost all our garden flowers, vegetables, fruits, the fig, the mulberry, the vine—(the olive and the maize came with them from the East, but dared go no further north)—and I know not what more; till we may say, that (saving subsoil-draining, which their climate does not need) the ancestors of these good folks were better farmers fifteen hundred years ago, than too many of our countrymen are at this day.

So they toil, and thrive, and bless God, under the glorious sun; and as for raiu-they have not had rain for these two months—(I speak of April, 1864) -and, though the white limestone dust is ankle deep on every road, say that they want none for two months more, thanks, it is to be presumed, to their deep tillage, which puts the plant roots out of the reach of drought. In spring they feed their silkworms, and wind their silk. In summer they reap their crops, and hang the maize-heads from their rafters for their own winter food, while they sell the wheat to the poor creatures, objects of their pity, who live in towns, and are forced to eat white bread. From spring to autumn they have fruit, and to spare, for themselves and for their customers; and with the autumn comes the vintage, and all its classic revelrics. A happy folk-under a happy clime: which yet has its drawbacks, like all climes on earth. Terrible thunder-storms sweep over it, hail-laden, killing, battering, drowning, destroying in an hour the labours of the year; and there are ugly mistral winds likewise, of which it may be fairly said, that he who can face an eight days' mistral, without finding his life a burden, must be either a very valiant man, or have neither liver nor mucous membrane.

For on a sudden, after still and burning weather, the thermometer suddenly falls from thirty to forty degrees; and out of the north-west rushes a chilly hurricane, blowing fiercer and fiercer each day toward nightfall, and lulling in the small hours, only to burst forth again at sunrise. Parched are all lips and eyes; for the air is full of dust, yea, even of gravel which cuts like hail. Aching are all right-sides; for the sudden chill brings on all manner of liver complaints and indigestions. All who can afford it, draw tight the jalousies, and sulk in darkness; the leaves are parched, as by an Atlantic gale; the air is filled with lurid haze, as here in a north-east wind; and no man can breathe freely, or eat his bread with joy, until the plague is past.

What is the cause of these mistrals; why all the cold air of Central France should be suddenly seized with madness, and rush into the sea between the Alps and the Pyrences; whether the great heat of the sun, acting on the Mediterranean basin, raises up thence—as from the gulf of Mexico—columns of warm light air, whose place has to be supplied by colder and heavier air from inland; whether the north-west mistral is, or is not, a diverted north-easter; an arctic current which, in its right road toward the tropics across the centre of France, has been called to the eastward of the Pyrences, (instead of, as usual, to the westward,) by the sudden demand for cold air,—all this let men of science decide; and having discovered what causes the mistral, discover also what will prevent it. That would be indeed a triumph of science, and a boon to tortured humanity.

But after all, man is a worse enemy to man than any of the brute forces of nature: and a more terrible scourge than mistral or tempest swept over this land six hundred years ago, when it was, perhaps, the happiest and the most civilised portion of Europe. This was the scene of the Albigense Crusade; a tragedy of which the true history will never, perhaps, be written. It was not merely a persecution of real or supposed heretics; it was a national war, embittered by the ancient jealousies of race, between the Frank aristocracy of the north and the Gothic aristocracy of the south, who had perhaps acquired, with their half-Roman, half-Saracen civilisation, mixtures both of Roman and of Saracen blood. As "Aquitanians," "Provencaux,"-Roman Provincials, as they proudly called themselves, speaking the Langue d'Oc, and looking down on the northerners who spoke the Langue d'Oil as barbarians, they were in those days guilty of the capital crime of being foreigners; and as foreigners they were exterminated. What their religious tenets were, we shall never know. With the Vaudois, Waldenses, "poor men of Lyons," they must not be for a moment confounded. Their creed remains to us only in the calumnies of their enemies. The confessions in the archives of the Tolosan Inquisition, as elicited either under torture or fear of torture, deserve no confidence whatsoever. And as for the licentiousness of their poetry, -which has been alleged as proof of their profligacy, even by Sir James Stephen-I can only say, that it is no more licentious than the fabliaux of their French conquerors, while it is far more delicate and refined. Humanity, at least, has done justice to the Troubadours of the south; and confessed, even in the middle age, that to them the races of the north owed grace of expression, delicacy of sentiment, and that respect for women which soon was named chivalry; which looks on woman, not with suspicion and contempt, but with trust and adoration; and is not ashamed to obey her as "mistress," instead of treating her as a slave.

But these Albigenses must have had something in their hearts for which it was worth while to die. At Aviguonet, that little grey town on the crag above the railway, they burst into the place, maddened by the cruelties of the Inquisitor (an archdeacon, if I recollect rightly, from Toulouse), and slew him then and there. They were shut up in the town, and withstood heroically a long and miserable siege. At last they were starved out. The conquerors offered them their lives—so say the French stories—if they would recant. But they would not. They were thrust together into one of those stone-walled enclosures below the town, heaped over with vine-twigs and maize-stalks, and burned alive; among them a young lady of the highest rank, who had passed through all the horrors of the siege, and was offered life, wealth, and honour, if she would turn.

Surely profligate infidels do not so die; and these poor souls, whatever were their sins or their confusions, must be numbered among the heroes of the human race.

But the world has mended since then, and so has the French character. Even before the Revolution of 1793, it was softening fast. The massacres of 1562 were not as horrible as those of the Albigense Crusade, though committed-which the former were not-under severe provocation. The massacres of 1793-in spite of all that has been said-were far less horrible than those of 1562, though they were the outpouring of centuries of pardonable fury and indignation. The crimes of the Terrem Blanche, at the Restoration-though ugly things were done in the south, especially in Nismes-were far less horrible again; though they were, for the most part, acts of direct personal retaliation on the republicans of 1793. And since then the French heart has softened fast. The irritating sense of hereditary wrong has passed away. The Frenchman conceives that justice is done to him, according to his own notions thereof. He has his share of the soil, without which no Celtic populace will ever be coutent. He has fair play in the battle of life, and a "Carrière ouverte aux talens." He has equal law and justice between man and man. And he is content; and under the sunshine of contentment and self-respect, his native good-nature expands; and he shows himself what he is, not merely a valiant and capable, but an honest, kindly, charitable man.

Yes. France has grown better, and has been growing better, I believe, for centuries past. And the difference between the France of the middle age and the France of the present day, is fitly typified by the difference between the new Carcassone below and the old Carcassone above, where every traveller, even if he be no antiquarian, should stop and gaze about awhile.

The contrast is complete; and one for which a man, who loves his fellow-men, should surely return devout thanks to Almighty God. Below, on the west bank of the river, is the new town, spreading and growing, unwalled-for its fortifications are now replaced by boulevards and avenues; full of handsome houses; squares where, beneath the planetree shade, marble fountains pour out perpetual health and coolness; manufactories of gay woollens; healthy, chcerful, market folk; comfortable burghers; industry and peace. We pass outside to the great basin of the Canal de Languedoc, and get more avenues of stately trees, and among them the red marble statue of Riquet, whose genius planned and carried out the mighty canal, which joins the occan to the sea; the wonder of its day, which proved the French to be, at least in the eighteenth century, the master-engineers of the world; the only people who still inherited the mechanical skill and daring of their Roman civilizers. Riquet bore the labour of that canal—and the calumny and obstructiveness, too, which tried to prevent its formation; France bore the expense; Louis Quatorze, of course, the glory; and no one, it is to be feared, the profit: for the navigation of the Garonne at the one extremity, and of the Mediterranean shallows at the other, were left unimproved till of late years, and the canal has become practically useful only just in time to be superseded by the railroads.

Now cross the Aude. Look down upon the willow and aspen copses, where, over the heads of busy washerwomen, the nightingale and the hippolais, crowded together away from the dusty plains and downs, shake the copses with their song; and then toil upward to the grey fortress tower on the grey limestone knoll; and pass, out of nature and her pure sunshine, into the black shadow of the unnatural middle age; into the region of dirt and darkness, cruelty and fear; grim fortresses, crowded houses, narrow streets, and pestilence. Pass through the outer circle of walls, of the latter part of the thirteenth century, to examine—for their architecture is a whole history engraved in stones—the ancient walls of the inner enceinte; massive Roman below, patched with striped Visigothic work, with mean and hasty Moorish, with graceful, though heavy, Romanesque of the times of the Troubadours; a whole museum of ancient fortifications, which is now being restored, stone by stone, through the learning of M. Viollet le Duc and the public spirit of the Emperor. Pass in under the gateway, and give yourself up to legends. There grins down on you the broad image of the mythic Dame Carcas, who defended the town single-handed against Charlemagne, till this tower fell down by miracle, and let in the Christian host. But do not believe that she gave to the place its name of Carcassone; for the first syllable of the word is hint enough that it was, long ere her days, a Celtic caer, or hill-fortress. Pause at the inner gate; you need not exactly believe that when the English Crusader, Simon de Montfort, burst it open, and behold, the town within was empty and desolate, he cried: "Did I not tell you that these heretics were devils; and behold, being devils, they have vanished into air." You must believe, I fear, that of the great multitude who had been crowded, starving and fever-stricken within, he found four hundred poor wretches who had lingered behind, and burnt them all alive. 1 You need not believe that that is the mouth of the underground passage which runs all the way from the distant hills, through which the Vicomte de Beziers, after telling Simon de Montfort and the Abbot of Citeaux that he would sooner be flayed alive than betray the poor folk who had taken refuge with him, got them all safe away, men, women, and children. You need not believe that that great vaulted chamber was the "Chamber of the Inquisition." But you must believe that those two ugly rings let into the roof were put there for the torture of the cord; and that many a naked wretch has dangled from them ere now, confessing anything and everything that he -or alas! she-was bidden. But these and their like are the usual furniture of every mediæval court of justice; and torture was not altogether abolished in France till the latter part of the eighteenth century. You need not believe, again, that that circular tower on the opposite side of the town was really the "Tower of the Inquisition;" for many a feudal lord, besides the inquisitors, had their dens of cruelty in those old times. You need not even believe-though it is too likely to be true—that that great fireplace in the little first-floor room served for the torture of the scarpines. But you must believe that in that little round den beneath it, only appproached by a trap in the floor, two skeletons were found fastened by those chains to that central pillar, having died and rotted forgotten in that horrid oubliette-how many centuries ago?

"Plusieurs ont gemis là bas," said M. Le Duc's foreman of the works, as he led us out of that evil hole, to look, with eyes and hearts refreshed by the change, at a curious Visigothic tower, in which the good bishop Sidonius Apollinaris may have told of the last eruption of his Auvergne Volcanoes, to the good king Theodoric of the West Goths.

If any one wishes to learn what the Middle Ages were like, let him go to Carcassone and see.

And now onward to Narbonne-or rather, to what was once Narbonue; one of the earliest colonies ever founded by the Romans; then the capital of a Visigothic kingdom; then of an Arab kingdom: now a dull fortified town-of a filth unspeakable, and not to be forgotten or forgiven. Stay not therein an hour, lest you take fever, or worse: but come out of the gate over the drawbridge, and stroll down the canal. Look back a moment, though, across the ditch. The whole face of the wall is a museum of Roman gods, tombs, inscriptions, basreliefs: the wreck of Martial's "Pulcherrima Narbo," the old Roman city, which was demolished by Louis XIII., to build the ugly fortifications of the then new fashion, now autiquated and useless. Take one glance, and walk on, to look at live Nature-far more interesting than dead art.

Everything fattens in the close damp air of the canal. The great flat, with its heavy crops, puts you in mind of the richest English lowland—save for the total want of old meadows. The weeds on the bank are English in type, only larger and richer—as becomes the climate. But as you look among them, you see forms utterly new and strange, whose kinship you cannot faney, but which remind you that you are nearing Italy, and Greece, and Africa. And in the hedges are great bay-trees; and inside them, orchards of standard fig and white mulberry, with its long yearling shoots of glorious green—soon to be stripped bare for the silk-worms; and here and there long lines of cypresses, black against the bright green plain and bright blue sky. No; you are not in Britain. Certainly not; for there is a drake (not a duck) quacking with feeble treble in that cypress, six feet over your head; and in Britain drakes do not live in trees. You look for the climbing palmipede, and see nothing: nor will you see; for the quacker is a tiny green tree-frog, who holds on by the suckers at the ends of his toes (with which he can climb a pane of glass, like a fly), and has learnt the squirrel's art of going invisible, without "the receipt of fern-seed," by simply keeping always on the further side of the branch.

But come back; for the air, even here, is suggestive of cholera and fever. The uncleanliness of these Narbonnois is shameless and shocking; and "immondices" of every kind lie festering in the rainless heat. The sickened botanist retreats, and buys a bottle of Eau Bully—alias aromatic vinegar.

There, crowding yon hill, with handsome houses, and churches, is Beziers—the blood-stained city. Beneath the pavement of that church, it is said, lie heaped together the remains of thousands of men, women, and children, slaughtered around their own altars, on that fatal day, when the Legate Amalric, asked by the knights how they should tell Catholics from heretics, cried, "Kill them all—the Lord will know his own."

We will pass on. We have had enough of horrors. And, beside, we are longing to hurry onward; for we are nearing the Mediterranean now. There are small skiffs lying under the dark tower of Agde, another place of blood, fitly built of black lava-blocks, the offspring of the nether pit. The railway cuts through rolling banks of dark lava; and now, ahead of us, is the conical lava-hill of Cette, and the mouth of the Canal du Midi.

There it is, at last. The long line of heavenly blue; and over it, far away, the white-peaked, lateen sails, which we have seen in pictures since our childhood; and there, close to the rail, beyond the sand-hills, delicate wavelets are breaking for ever on a yellow beach, each in exactly the same place as the one which fell before. One glance shows us children of the Atlantic, that we are on a tideless sea.

There it is,—the sacred sea. The sea of all civilisation, and almost all history, girdled by the fairest countries of the world; set there that human beings from all its shores might mingle with each other, and become humane,—the sea of Egypt, of Palestine, of Greece, of Italy, of Byzant, of Marseilles, and this Narbonnaise, "more Roman than Rome herself," to which we owe the greater part of our own progress; the sea, too, of Algeria and Carthage, and Cyrene, and fair lands now desolate, surely not to be desolate for ever;—the sea of civilisation. Not only to the Christian, nor to the classic scholar, but to every man to whom the progress of his race from barbarism toward humanity is dear, should the Mediterranean Sea be one of the most august and precious objects on this globe; and the first sight of it should iuspire reverence and delight, as of coming home—home to a rich inheritance in which he has long believed by hearsay, but which he sees at last with his own mortal corporal eyes.

Exceedingly beautiful is that first view of the sea from Cette, though altogether different in character from the views of the Mediterranean which are common in every gallery of pictures. There is nothing to remind one of Claude, or Vernet, or Stantield. No mountain-ranges far aloft, no cliffs toppling into the water, with convents and bastides perched on their crags; and seaports, with their land-locked harbours, and quaint lighthouses, nestling on the brink. That scenery begins on the other side of the Rhone mouth, and continues, I believe, almost without interruption, to the shores of Southern Palestine, one girdle of perpetual beauty.

But here, the rail runs along a narrow strip of sand, covered with straggling vines, and tall white iris, between the sea and the great Etang de Thau, a long narrow salt-lake, beyond which the wide lowlands of the Herault slide gently down. There is not a mountain, hardly a hill, visible for miles: but all around is the great sheet of blue glassy water: while the air is as glassy clear as the water, and through it, at seemingly immense distances, the land shows purple and crange, blue and grey, till the landscape is one great rainbow. White ships slide to and from far-off towns; fishermen lounge on the marshes, drying long lines of net. Everywhere is vastness, freedom, repose, gentle and yet not melancholy; because with all, under the burning blue, there is that fresh wholesome heat, which in itself is life, and youth, and joy.

Beyond, nearer the mouths of the Rhone, there are, so men say, desolate marshes, tenanted by herds of half-wild horses; foul mud-banks, haunted by the pelican and the flamingo, and waders from the African shore; a region half land, half water, where dwell savage folk, decimated by fever and ague. But short of those Bouches du Rhone, the railway turns to the north, toward Montpellier and

And at Cette ends this little tour from Ocean to Sea, with the wish, that he who next travels that way, may have as glorious weather, and as agreeable a companion, as the writer of these lines had in 1864.

PART VIII.

CHAPTER XXIX.

WHEN the morning came, after that first bewildered night, the recollection that Winnie was in the house had a curious effect upon the thoughts of the entire household. Even Aunt Agatha's uneasy joy was mingled with many feelings that were not joyful. She had never had anything to do before with wives who "were not happy." Any such cases which might have come to her knowledge among her acquaintance she had been in the way of avoiding and tacitly condemning. "A man may be bad." she had been in the habit of saying, "but still if his wife had right feelings"-and she was in the way of thinking that it was to a woman's credit to endure all things, and to make no sign. Such had been the pride and the principles of Aunt Agatha's generation. But now, as in so many cases, principle and theory came right in the face of fact, and gave way. Winnie must be right at whatever cost. Poor Winnie! to think what she had been, to remember her as she left Kirtell splendid in her bridal beauty, and to look at her now! Such arguments made an end of all Aunt Agatha's old maiden sentiments about a wife's duty: but nevertheless her heart still ached. She knew how she would herself have looked upon a runaway wife, and she could not endure to think that other people would so look upon Winnie; and she dried an indignant tear, and made a vow to herself to carry matters with a high hand, and to maintain her child's discretion, and wisdom, and perfect propriety of action, in the face of all comers. "My dear child has come to pay me a visit, the very first chance she has had," she said to herself, rehearsing her part; "I have been begging and begging her to come, and at last she has found an opportunity. And to give me a delightful surprise, she never named the day. It was so like Winnie." This was what, omitting all notice of the feelings which made the surprise far from delightful, Aunt Agatha made up her mind to

As for Winnie, when she woke up in the sunshine and stillness, and heard nothing but the birds singing, and Kirtell in the distance murmuring below her window, her heart stood still for a moment and wondered; and then a few hot salt tears came scalding to her eyes; and then she began over again in her own mind the recapitulation of her wrongs. She thought very little indeed of Aunt Agatha, or of her present surroundings. What she thought of was the late scenes of exciting strife she had gone through, and future scenes which might still be before her, and what he would say to her, and what she would say to him; for matters had gone so far between them that the constantly progressing duel was as absorbing as the first dream of love, and swallowed up every thought. It cost her an effort to be patient with all the morning greetings, with Aunt Agatha's anxious talk at the breakfast-table, and discussion of the old neighbours, whom, doubtless, Winnie, she thought, would like to hear of. Winnie did not care a great deal for the old neighbours, nor did she take much interest in hearing of the boys. Indeed, she did not know the boys. They had been but babies when she went away, and she had no acquaintance with the new creatures who bore their names. It gave her a little pang when she looked at Mary and saw the results of peace and tranquillity in her face, which seemed to have grown little older-but that was almost the sole thing that drew Winnie from her own thoughts. There was a subtle sort of counection between it and the wrongs which were rankling at her heart.

"There used to be twelve years between us," she said abruptly. "I was eighteen when Mary was thirty. I think anybody that saw us would ask which was the eldest now."

"My darling, you are thin," said poor Aunt Agatha, anxiously; "but a few weeks of quiet and your native air will soon round out your dear cheeks—"

"Well," said Winnie, paying no attention, "I suppose it's because I have been living all the time, and Mary hasn't. It is I that have the wrinkles—but then I have not been like the Sleeping Beauty. I have been working hard at life all this time."

"Yes," said Mary, with a smile, "it makes a difference:—and of the two I think I would rather live. It is harder work, but there is more satisfaction in it."

"Satisfaction!" Winnie said, bitterly. There had been no satisfaction in it to her, and she felt fierce and angry at the word—and then her eye fell upon Will, who had been listening as usual. "I wonder you keep that great boy there," she said; "why isn't he doing something? You ought to send him to the army, or put him to go through some examinations. What does he want at his mother's lap? You should mind you don't spoil them, Mary. Home is the ruin of boys. I have always heard so wherever I have been."

"My dear love," cried Aunt Agatha, fearful that Mary might be moved to reply. "It is very interesting to hear you, but I want you to tell me a little about yourself. Tell me about yourself, my darling—if you are fixed there now, you know; and all where you have been."

"Before that boy?" said Winnie, with a kind of smile, looking Wilfrid in the face with her great sunken eyes.

"Now, Will, be quiet, and don't say anything impertinent," cried Aunt Agatha. "Oh, my darling, never mind him. He is strange, but he is a good boy at the bottom. I should like to hear about all my dearest child has been doing. Letters never tell all. Oh, Winnie, what a pleasure it is, my love, to see your dear face again."

"I am glad you think so, aunt—nobody else does, that I know of; and you are likely to have enough of it," said Winnie, with a certain look of defiance at her sister and her sister's son.

"Thank you, my dear love," said Aunt Agatha, trembling; for the maid was in the room, and Miss Seton's heart quailed with fear lest the sharp eyes of such a domestic critic should be opened to something strange in the conversation. "I am so glad to hear you are going to pay me a long visit; I did not like to ask you just the first morning, and I was dreadfully frightened you might soon be going again; you owe me something, Winnie, for staying away all these long years."

Aunt Agatha in her fright and agitation continued this speech until she had talked the maid safely out of the room, and then, being excited, she fell without knowing it, into tears.

Winnie leaned back in her chair and folded a light shawl she wore, round her, and looked at Miss Seton. In her heart she was wondering what Aunt Agatha could possibly have to cry about; what could ever happen to her, that made it worth her while to cry? But she did not put this sentiment into words.

"You will be tired of me before I go," she said, and that was all; not a word, as Aunt Agatha afterwards explained to Mary, about her husband, or about how she had been living, or anything about herself. And to take her by the throat as it were, and demand that she should account for herself, was not to be thought of. 'The end was that they all dispersed to their various occupations, and that the day went on almost as if Winnie was not there. But yet the fact that Winnie was there tinged everyone's thoughts, and made a difference in every corner of the house. They had all their occupations to betake themselves to, but she had nothing to do, and unconsciously every individual in the place took to observing the new-comer with that curious kind of feminine observation which goes so little way, and yet goes so far. She had brought only a portmanteau with her, a gentleman's box, into a lady's, and yet she made no move towards unpacking, but let her things remain in it notwithstanding that the wardrobe was empty and open, and her dresses, if she had brought any, must have been crushed up like rags in that tight enclosure. And she sat in the drawing-room with the open windows, through which everyone in the house now and then got a glimpse of her, doing nothing, not even reading; she had her thin shawl round her shoulders though it was so warm, and she sat there with nothing to occupy her, like a figure carved out of stone. Such an attitude, in a woman's eyes, is the embodiment of everything that is saddest, and most listless, and forlorn. Doing nothing, not trying to take an interest in anything, careless about the books, indifferent to the garden, with no curiosity about anybody or anything. The sight of her listless figure filled Aunt Agatha with despair.

And then, to make things worse, Sir Edward made his appearance the very next day to inquire into it all. It was hard to make out how he knew. but he did know, and no doubt all the parish knew, and were aware that there was something strange Sir Edward was an old man, about eighty now, feeble but irreproachable, with lean limbs that now and then were slightly unsteady, but a toilette which was always everything it ought to be. He came in, cool and fresh in his summer morning dress, but his brow was puckered with anxiety, and there was about him that indescribable air of coming to see about it, which has so painful an effect in general upon the nerves of the persons whose affairs are to be put under investigation. When Sir Edward made his appearance at the open window, Aunt Agatha instinctively rose up and put herself before Winnie, who, however, did not show any signs of disturbance in her own person, but only wound herself up more closely in her

"So Winnie has come to see us at last," said Sir Edward, and he came up to her and took both her hands, and kissed her forehead in a fatherly way. He did so almost without looking at her, and then he gave an unaffected start; but he had too much delicacy to utter the words that came to his lips. He did not say how much changed she was, but he gave Aunt Agatha a pitiful look of dismay and astonishment as he sat down, and this Winnie did not fail to see.

"Yes, at last," cried Aunt Agatha, eagerly. "I have begged and begged of her to come, and was wondering just what answer I should get when she was all the while planning me such a delightful surprise; but how did you know?"

"News travels fast," said Sir Edward, and then he turned to the stranger. "You will find us much changed, Winnie. We are getting old people now, and the boys whom you left babies—you must see a great deal of difference."

"Not so much difference," said Winnie, "as you see in me."

"It was to be expected there should be a difference," said Sir Edward. "You were but a girl when you went away. I hope you are going to make a good long stay. You will find us just as quiet as ever, and as humdrum, but very delighted to see you."

To this Winnie made no reply. She neither answered his question nor gave any response to his expression of kindness, and the old man sat and looked at her with a deeper wrinkle than ever across his brow.

"She must pay me a long visit," said poor Annt-Agatha, "since she has been so long of coming. Now that I have her, she shall not go away."

"And Percival?" said Sir Edward. He had cast about in his own mind for the best means of approaching this difficult subject, but had ended by feeling there was nothing for it but plain speaking. And then, though there were reports that they did not "get on," still there was nothing as yet to justify suspicions of a final rupture. "I hope you left him quite well; I hope we are to see him, too."

"He was very well when I left him, thank you," said Winnie, with steady formality; and then the conversation once more came to a dead stop.

Sir Edward was disconcerted. He had come to examine, to reprove, and to exhort, but he was not prepared to be met with this steady front of unconsciousness. He thought the wanderer had most likely come home full of complaints and outeries, and that it might be in his power to set her right. He hemmed and cleared his throat a little, and cast about what he should say, but he had no better inspiration than to turn to Aunt Agatha and disturb her gentle mind with another topic, and for this moment let the original subject rest.

"Ah—have you heard lately from Earlston?" he said, turning to Miss Seton. "I have just been hearing a report about Francis Ochterlony. I hope it is not true."

"What kind of report?" said Aunt Agatha breathlessly. A few minutes before she could not have believed that any consideration whatever would have disturbed her from the one subject which was for the moment dearest to her heart—but Sir Edward with his usual felicity had found out another chord which vibrated almost as painfully. Her old delusion recurred to Aunt Agatha with the swiftness of lightning. He might be going to marry, and divert the inheritance from Hugh, and she did her best to persuade her lips to a kind of smile.

"They say he is ill," said Sir Edward; "but of course if you have not heard—I thought he did not look like himself when we were there. Very poorly I heard—not anything violent you know, but a sort of breaking up. Perhaps it is not true."

Aunt Agatha's heart had been getting hard usage for some time back. It had jumped to her mouth, and sauk into depths as deep as heart can sink to, time after time in these eventful days. Now she only felt it contract as it were, as if somebody had scized it violently, and she gave a little cry, for it hurt her.

"Oh, Sir Edward, it cannot be true," she said. "We had a letter from Hugh on Monday, and he does not say a word. It cannot be true."

"Hugh is very young," said Sir Edward, who did not like to be supposed wrong in a point of fact. "A boy with no experience might see a man all but dying, and as long as he did not complain would never know."

"But he looked very well when we were there," said Aunt Agatha, faltering. If she had been alone she would have shed silent tears, and her thoughts would have been both sad and bitter; but this was not a moment to think of her own feelings—nor above all to cry.

Sir Edward shook his head. "I always mistrust those sort of looks for my part," he said. "A big man has always an appearance of strength and that carries it off,"

"Is it Mr. Ochterlony?" said Winnie, interposing for the first time. "What luck Mary has and her boys! And so Hugh will come into the property without any waiting. It may be very sad of course, Aunt Agatha, but it is great luck for him at his age."

"Oh, Winnie, my dear love!" cried Aunt Agatha, feebly. It was a speech that went to her heart, but she was dumb between the two people who did not care for Francis Ochterlony, and could find nothing to say.

"I hope that is not the way in which any of us look at it," said Sir Edward with gentle severity; and then he added, "I always thought if you had been left a little more to yourself when we were at Earlston that still you might have made it up."

"Oh no, no!" said Aunt Agatha, "now that we are both old people—and he was always far too sensible. But it was not for anything of that sort. Francis Ochterlony and I were—were always dear friends."

"Well, you must let me know next time when Hugh writes," said Sir Edward, "and I hope we shall have better news." When he said this he turned again quite abruptly to Winnie, who had dropped ouce more into her own thoughts, and expected no new assault.

"Percival is coming to fetch you, I suppose?" he said. "I think I can offer him some good shooting in a month or two. This may overcloud us all a little if—if anything should happen to Francis Ochterlony. But after what your Aunt Agatha says, I feel disposed to hope the best."

"Yes, I hope so," said Winnie; which was a very unsatisfactory reply.

"Of course you are citizens of the world, and we are very quiet people," said Sir Edward. "I suppose promotion comes slow in these times of peace. I should have thought he was entitled to another step by this time; but we civilians know so little about military affairs."

"I thought everybody knew that steps were bought," said Winnie; and once more the conversation broke off dead.

It was a relief to them all when Mary came into the room, and had to be told about Mr. Ochterlony's supposed illness, and to take a reasonable place between Aunt Agatha's panic-stricken assurance that it was not true, and Sir Edward's calmly indifferent belief that it was. Mary for the first time suggested that a man might be ill and yet not at the point of death, which was a conclusion to which the others had leapt. And then they all made a little effort at ordinary talk.

"You will have everybody coming to call," said

Sir Edward, "now that Winnie is known to have come home; and I daresay Percival will find Mary's military friends a great resource when he comes. Lovemaking being over, he will want some substitute—"

"Who are Mary's military friends?" said Winnie suddenly breaking in.

"Only some people in our old regiment," said Mary. "It is stationed at Carlisle, strangely enough. You know the Askells, I think, and—"

"The Askells!" said Winnie, and her face grew dark. "Are they here, all that wretched set of people?—Mary's friends. — Ah, I might have known——"

"My dear love, she is a very silly little woman; but Nelly is delightful, and he is very nice, poor mau," cried Aunt Agatha, eager to interfere.

"Yes, poor man, he is very nice," said Winnie, with contempt; "his wife is an idiot, and he doesn't beat her; I am sure I should, if I were he. Who's Nelly? and that horrid Methodist of a woman, and the old maid that reads novels? Why didn't you tell me of them? If I had known, I should never have come here."

"Oh, Winnie, my darling!" cried Aunt Agatha; "but I did mention them; and so did Mary, I feel sure."

"They are Mary's friends," said Winnie, with bitterness, and then she stopped herself abruptly. The others were like an army of observation round a beleaguered city, which was not guided by the most perfect wisdom, but lost its temper now and then, and made injudicious sallies. Now Winnie shut up her gates, and drew in her garrison once more: and her companions looked at each other doubtfully, seeing a world of sore and wounded feeling, distrust, and resistance, and mystery to which they had no clue. She had gone away a girl, full of youthful bravado, and fearing nothing. She had come back a stranger, with a long history unknown to them, and with no inclination to make it clear. Her aunt and her sister were anxious and uneasy, and did not venture on direct assault; but Sir Edward, who was a man of resolution, sat down before the fortress, and was determined to fight it out

"You should have sent us word you were coming," he said; "and your husband should have been with you, Winnie. It was he who took you away, and he ought to have come back to give an account of his stewardship. I shall tell him so when he comes."

Again Winnie made no answer; her face contracted slightly; but soon settled back again into its blank look of self-concentration, and no response came

"He has no appointment, I suppose; no adjutantship, or anything to keep him from getting away?"

"No," said Winnie. Digitized by

"Perhaps he has gone to see his mother?" said Sir Edward, brightening up. "She is getting quite an old woman, and longs to see him; and you, my pretty Winnie, too. I suppose you will pay her your long deferred visit, now you have returned to this country? Is Percival there?"

"No-I think not," said Winnie, winding herself up in her shawl, as she had done before.

"Then you have left him at —, where he is stationed now?" said Sir Edward, becoming more and more point-blank in his attack.

"Look here, Sir Edward," said Winnie; "we are citizens of the world, as you say, and we have not lived such a tranquil life as you have. I did not come here to give an account of my husband; he can take care of himself. I came to have a little quiet and rest, and not to be asked questions. If one could be let alone anywhere, it surely should be in one's own home."

"No, indeed," said Sir Edward, who was embarrassed, and yet more arbitrary than ever; "for in your own home people have a right to know all about you. Though I am not exactly a relative, I have known you all your life; I may say I brought you up, like a child of my own; and to see you come home like this, all alone, without baggage or attendant, as if you had dropped from the skies, and nobody knowing where you come from, or anything about it,—I think, Winnie, my dear, when you consider of it, you will see it is precisely your own friends who ought to know."

Then Aunt Agatha rushed into the mêlée, feeling in her own person a little irritated by her old friend's lecture and inquisition.

"Sir Edward is making a mistake, my dear love," she said; "he does not know. Dear Winnie has been telling me everything. It is so nice to know all about her. Those little details that can never go into letters; and when—when Major Percival comes——"

"It is very good of you, Aunt Agatha," said Winnie, with a certain quiet disdain; "but I did not mean to deceive anybody—Major Percival is not coming, that I know of. I am old enough to manage for myself: Mary came home from Iudia when she was not quite my age."

"Oh, my dear love, poor Mary was a widow," cried Aunt Agatha; "you must not speak of that."

"Yes, I know Mary has always had the best of it," said Winnie, under her breath; "you never made a set against her as you do against me. If there is an inquisition at Kirtell, I will go somewhere else. I came to have a little quiet; that is all I want in this world."

It was well for Winnie that she turned away abruptly at that moment, and did not see Sir Edward's look, which he turned first upon Mary and then on Aunt Agatha. She did not see it, and it was well for her. When he went away soon after, Miss Seton went out into the garden with him, in obedience to his signals, and then he unburdened his mind.

"It seems to me that she must have run away from him," said Sir Edward. "It is very well she has come here; but still it is unpleasant, to make the best of it. I am sure he has behaved very badly; but I must say I am a little disappointed in Winnie. I was, as you may remember, at the very first when she made up her mind so soon."

"There is no reason for thinking she has run away," said Aunt Agatha. "Why should she have run away? I hope a lady may come to her aunt and her sister without compromising herself in any way."

Sir Edward shook his head. "A married woman's place is with her husband," he said, sententiously. He was old, and he was more moral, and perhaps less sentimental in his remarks than formerly. "And how she is changed! there must have been a great deal of excitement and late hours, and bills and all that sort of thing, before she came to look like that."

"You are very hard upon my poor Winnie," said Aunt Agatha, with a long restrained sob.

"I am not hard upon her. On the contrary, I would save her if I could," said Sir Edward, solemnly. "My dear Agatha, I am very, very sorry for you. What with poor Francis Ochterlony's illness, and this heavy burden——"

Miss Seton was seized with one of those passions of impatience and indignation to which a man's heavy way of blundering over sore subjects sometimes moves a woman. "It was all Francis Ochterlony's fault," she said, lifting her little tremulous white hands. "It was his fault, and not mine. He might have had some one that could have taken care of him all these years, and he chose his marble images instead—and I will not take the blame; it was no fault of mine. And then my poor darling child——"

But here Miss Seton's strength, being the strength of excitement solely, gave way, and her voice broke, and she had to take both her hands to dry the fast-coming tears.

"Well, well, well!" said Sir Edward. "Dear me, I never meant to excite you so. What I was saying was with the kindest intention. Let us hope Ochterlony is better, and that all will turn out pleasantly for Winnie. If you find yourself unequal to the emergency, you know—and want a man's assistance—"

"Thank you," said Aunt Agatha, with dignity; "but I do not think so much of a man's assistance as I used to do. Mary is so very sensible, and if one does the very best one can—"

"Oh, of course I am not a person to interfere," said Sir Edward; and he walked away with an air still more dignified than that which Aunt Agatha had put on, but very shaky, poor old gentleman, about his knees, which slightly diminished the effect. As for Aunt Agatha, she turned her back upon him steadily, and walked back to the cottage with all the stateliness of a woman aggrieved. But nevertheless the pins and needles were in her heart, and her mind was full of anxiety and distress. She had felt very strongly the great mistake made by Francis Ochterlony, and how he had spoiled both their lives-but that was not to say that she could hear of his illness with philosophy. And then Winnie, who was not ill, but whose reputation and position might be in deadly danger for anything Miss Seton knew. Aunt Agatha knew nothing better to do than to call Mary privately out of the room and pour forth her troubles. It did no good, but it relieved her mind. Why was Sir Edward so suspicious and disagreeable-why had he ceased "to understand people; "-and why was Hugh so young and inexperienced and incapable of judging whether his uncle was or was not seriously ill; -and why did not "they" write? Aunt Agatha did not know whom she meant by "they," nor why she blamed poor Hugh. But it relieved her mind. And when she had pushed her burden off on to Mary's shoulders, the weight was naturally much lightened on her own.

CHAPTER XXX.

It is quite true, however, that Hugh was very inexperienced. He did not even notice that his uncle was ill. He sat with him at dinner and saw that he did not eat anything, and yet never saw it; and he went with him sometimes when he tottered about the garden in the morning, and never found out that he tottered; and sat with him at night, and was very kind and attentive, and very fond of his uncle, and never remarked anything the matter with his breathing. He was very young and he knew no better, and it never seemed to him that short-breathing and unequal steps and a small appetite was anything remarkable at Mr. Ochterlony's age. If there had been a lady in the house it might have made a wonderful difference; but to be sure it was Francis Ochterlony's own doing that there was not a lady in the house. And he was not himself so shortsighted as Hugh. His own growing weakness was something of which he was perfectly well aware, and he knew, too, how his breath caught of nights, and looking forward into the future saw the shadow drawing nearer his door and was not afraid of it. Probably the first thought went chill to his heart, the thought that he was mortal like other people, and might have to die. his life had been such a life as to make him very composed about it, and ot disinclined to think that a change might be for the better. He was not very clear about the unseen world-for one thing he had nobody there in particular belonging to him personally, except the father and mother who were gone ages ago; and it did not seem very important to himself personally whether he was going to a long sleep, or going to another probation, or into pure blessedness, which of all the three was, possibly, the hypothesis which he understood least. Perhaps, on the whole, if he had been to come to an end altogether he would not have much minded; but his state of feeling was, that God certainly knew all about it, and that He would arrange it all right. It was a kind of pagan state of mind; and yet there was in it something of that faith of the little child which was once set up as the highest model of faith by the highest authority. No doubt Mr. Ochterlony had a great many thoughts on the subject, as he sat buried in the deep chair in his study, and gazed into the little red spark of fire which was lighted for him all that summer through, though the weather was so genial. His were not bright: thoughts, but very calm ones; and perhaps his perfect composure about it all was one reason why Hugh took it as a matter of course, and went on quite cheerily and lightly, and never found out there was anything the matter with him until the very

It was one morning when Mr. Ochterlony had been later than usual of coming downstairs. When he did make his appearance it was nearly noon, and he was in his dressing-gown, which was an unheardof thing for him. Instead of going out to the garden, he called Hugh, and asked him to give him his arm while he made a little tour of the house. They went from the library to the diningroom, and then upstairs to the great drawing-room where the Venus and the Psyche were. When they had got that length Mr. Ochterlony dropped into a chair, and gasped for breath, and looked round upon his treasures. And then Hugh, who was looking on, began to feel very uneasy and anxious for the first time.

"One can't take them with one," said Mr. Ochterlony, with a sigh and a smile; "and you will not care for them much, Hugh. I don't mean to put any burden upon you; they are worth a good deal of money; but I'd rather you did not sell them, if you could make up your mind to the sacrifice."

"If they were mine I certainly should not sell them," said Hugh; "but as they are yours, uncle, I don't see that it matters what I would do."

Mr. Ochterlony smiled, and looked kindly at him, but he did not give him any direct answer. "If they were yours," he said-"suppose the case -then what would you do with them?"

"I would collect them in a museum somewhere and call them by your name," said Hugh, on the spur of the moment. "You almost ought to do that yourself, uncle, there are so few people to see them here."

Mr. Ochterlony's languid eyes brightened a little. "They are worth a good deal of money," he said.

"If they were worth a mint of money, I don't see what that matters," said Hugh, with youthful extravagance.

His uncle looked at him again, and once more the languid eye lighted up and a tinge of colour came to the grey cheek.

"I think you mean it, Hugh," he said, "and it is pleasant to think you do mean it now, even if - I have been an economical man in every way but this, and I think you would not miss it. But I won't put any bondage upon you. By the way, they would belong to the personalty. Perhaps not to think of it before. I ought to see about it this very day."

"Uncle," said Hugh, who had been sitting on the arm of a chair looking at him, and seeing, as by a sudden revelation all the gradual changes which he had not noticed when they began: the shortened breath, the emaciated form, and the deep large circle round the eyes, -" Uncle, will you tell me seriously what you mean when you speak to me like this?"

"On second thoughts, it will be best to do it at once," said Mr. Ochterlony. "Hugh, ring the bell --- What do I speak like this for, my boy? For a very plain reason; because my course is going to end, and yours is only going to begin."

"But, uncle!" cried Hugh.

"Hush-the one ought to be a kind of continuation of the other," said Mr. Ochterlony, "since you will take up where I leave off; but I hope you will do better than that. If you should feel yourself justified in thinking of the museum afterwards -But I would not like to leave any burden upon you. John, let some one ride into Dalken directly, and ask Mr. Preston, the attorney, to come to me-or his son will do. I should like to see him to-day - and stop," said Mr. Ochterlony reluctantly, "he may fetch the doctor, too."

"Uncle, do you feel ill?" said Hugh. He had come up to his uncle's side, and he had taken fright, and was looking at him wistfully as a woman might have done-for his very inexperience which had prevented him from observing, gave him a tender anguish now, and filled him full of awe and compunction, and made him in his wistfulness almost like a woman.

"No," said Mr. Ochterlony, holding out his hand. "Not ill, my boy, only dying-that's all. Nothing to make a fuss about-but sit down and compose yourself, for I have a good deal to say."

"Do you mean it, uncle?" asked Hugh, searching into the gray countenance before him with his suddenly awakened eyes.

Mr. Ochterlony gave a warm grasp to the young hand which held his closely yet trembling. "Sit down," he said. "I'm glad you are sorry. A few years ago there would have been nobody to mindexcept the servants, perhaps. I never took the steps I might have done, you know," he added, with a certain sadness, and yet a sense of humour which was curious to see, "to have an heir of my own- and speaking of that, you will be sure to remember what I said to you about the Henri Deux. I put it away in the cabinet yonder, the very last day they were here."

Then Mr. Ochterlony talked a great deal, aud about many things. About there being no particular occasion for making a will-since Earlston was settled by his father's will upon his own heirs male, or those of his brother-how he had bethought himself all at once, though he did not know exactly how the law stood, that there was some difference between real and personal property, and how, on the there's a will wanted for that. It was stupid of me whole, perhaps, it was better to send for Preston.

"As for the doctor, I daren't take it upon me to die without him, I suppose," Mr. Ochterlony said. He had never been so playful before, as long as Hugh had known him. He had been reserved—a little shy even with his nephew. Now his own sense of failure seemed to have disappeared. He was going to make a change, to get rid of all his old disabilities and incumbrances and antecedents, and no doubt it would be a change for the better. That was about the substance of Mr. Ochterlony's thoughts.

"But one can't take Psyche, you know," he said. "One must go alone to look into the face of the Immortals. And I don't think your mother, perhaps, would care to have her here-so if you should feel yourself justified in thinking of the Museum-But you will have a great deal to do. In the first place, your mother.-I doubt if she'll be so happy at the Cottage, now Mrs. Percival has come back. I think you ought to ask her to come here. And I shouldn't wonder if Will gave you some trouble. He's an odd boy. I would not say he had not a sense of honour, but---. And he has a jealous dissatisfied temper. As for Islay, he's all safe, I suppose. Always be kind to them, Hugh, and give Will his education. I think he has abilities; but don't be too liberal. Don't take them upon your shoulders. You have your own life to think of first of all."

All this Mr. Ochterlony uttered, with many little breaks and pauses, but with very little aid from his companion, who was too much moved to do more than listen. He was not suffering in any acute way, and yet, somehow, the sense of his approaching end seemed to have loosened his tongue, which had been to some extent bound all his life.

"For you must marry, you know," he said. "I consider that a bargain between us. Don't trust to your younger brother as I did—not but what it was the best thing for you. Some little bright thing like that—that was with your mother. You may laugh, but I can remember when Agatha Seton was as pretty a creature—"

"I think she is pretty now," said Hugh, half because he did think so, and half because he was anxious to find something he could say.

Then Mr. Ochterlony brightened up in the strongest pathetic way, laughing a little, with a kind of tender consciousness that he was laughing at himself. He was so nearly separated from himself now, that he was tender as if it was the weakness of a dear old familiar friend at which he was laughing. "She is very pretty," he said. "I am glad you have the sense to see it,—and good; and she'll go now, and make a slave of herself to that girl. I suppose that is my fault, too. But be sure you don't forget about the Henri Deux."

And then all of a sudden, while his nephew was sitting watching him, Mr. Ochterlony fell asleep. When he was sleeping he looked so gray and worn and emaciated, that Hugh's heart smote him. Ho could not explain to himself why it was that he had never noticed it before; and he was very doubtful and uncertain what he ought to do. If he sent for his mother, which seemed the most natural idea, Mr. Ochterlony might not like it, and he had himself already sent for the doctor. Hugh had the good sense finally to conclude upon doing the one thing that was most difficult—to do nothing. But it was not au enlivening occupation. He went off and got some wraps and cushions, and propped his uncle up in the deep chair he was reclining in, and then he sat down and watched him, feeling a thrill run through him every time there was a little drag in the breathing or change in his patient's face. He might die like that, with the Psyche and the Venus gleaming whitely over him, and nobody by who understood what to do. It was the most serious moment that had ever occurred in Hugh's life; and it seemed to him that days, and not minutes, were passing. When the doctor arrived, it was a very great relief. And then Mr. Ochterlony was taken to bed and made comfortable, as they said; and a consciousuess crept through the house, no one could tell how, that the old life and the old times were coming to a conclusion-that sad change and revolution hung over the house, and that Earlston would soon be no more as it had been.

On the second day Hugh wrote to his mother, but that letter had not been received at the time of Sir Edward's visit. And he made a very faithful devoted nurse, and tended his uncle like a son. Mr. Ochterlony did not die all at once, as probably he had himself expected and intended—he had his spell of illness to go through like other people, and he bore it very cheerfully, as he was not suffering much. He was indeed a great deal more playful and at his ease than either the doctor or the attorney, or Mrs. Gill, the housekeeper, thought quite right.

The lawyer did not come until the following day; and then it was young Mr. Preston who came, his father being occupied, and Mr. Ochterlony had a distaste somehow to young Mr. Preston. He was weak, too, and not able to go into details. All that he would say was, that Islay and Wilfred were to have the same younger brother's portion as their father had, and that everything else was to go to Hugh. He would not suffer himself to be tempted to say anything about the Museum, though the suggestion had gone to his heart—and to make a will with so little in it struck the lawyer almost as an injury to himself.

"No legacies?" he said—"excuse me, Mr. Ochterlony—nothing about your beautiful collection? There ought to be some stipulations about that."

"My nephew knows all my wishes," Mr. Ochterlony said, briefly, "and I have no time now for details. Is it ready to be signed? Everything else of which I die possessed to my brother, Hugh Ochterlony's cldest son. That is what I want. The property is his already, by his grandfather's will. Everything of which I die possessed, to dispose of according as his discretion and circumstances may permit."

"But there are other friends—and servants," pleaded Mr. Preston; "and then your wonderful collection——"

"My nephew knows all my wishes," said Mr. Ochterlony; and his weakness was so great that he sank back on his pillows. He took his own way in this, while poor Hugh hung about the room wistfully looking on. It was to Hugh's great advantage, but he was not thinking of that. He was asking himself could he have done anything to stop the malady if he had noticed it in time. And he was thinking how to arrange the Ochterlony Museum. If it could only have been done in his lifetime, so that its founder could see. When the doctor and the attorney were both gone, Hugh sat down by his uncle's bedside, and, half afraid whether he was doing right, began to talk of it. He was too young and too honest to pretend to disbelieve what Mr. Ochterlony himself and the doctor had assured him of. The room was dimly lighted, the lamp put away on a table in a corner, with a shade over it, and the sick room "made comfortable," and everything arranged for the night. And then the two had an hour of very affectionate, confidential, almost tender talk. Mr. Ochterlony was almost excited about the Museum. It was not to be bestowed on his college, as Hugh at first thought, but to be established at Dalken, the pretty town of which everybody in the Fells was proud. And then the conversation glided off to more familiar subjects, and the old man who was dying gave a great deal of very sound advice to the young man who was about to begin to live.

"Islay will be all right," said Mr. Ochterlony; "he will have what your father had, and you will always make him at home in Earlston. It is Will I am thinking about. I am not fond of Will. Don't be too generous to him, or he will think it is his right. I know no harm of the boy, but I would not put all my affairs into his hands as I put them

"It will not be my fault if I don't justify your confidence, uncle," said Hugh, with something swelling in his throat.

"If I had not known that, I would not have trusted you, Hugh," said Mr. Ochterlony. "Take your mother's advice—always be sure to take your mother's advice. There are some of us that never understand women; but after all it stands to reason that the one-half of mankind should not separate itself from the other. We think we are the wisest; but I am not so sure——"

Mr. Ochterlony stopped short and turned his eyes, which were rather languid, to the distant lamp, the one centre of light in the room. He looked at it for a long time in a dreamy way. "I might have had a woman taking care of me like the rest," he said. "I might have had the feeling that there was somebody in the house; but you see I did not give my mind to it, Hugh. Your father left a widow, and that's natural—I am leaving only a collection. But it's better for you, my boy. If you should ever speak to Agatha Seton about it, you can tell her that----"

Then there was a pause, which poor young Hugh, nervous and excited and inexperienced, did not know how to break, and Mr. Ochterlony continued to look at the lamp. It was very dim and shaded, but still a pale ray shone sideways between the curtains upon the old man who lay a-dying, and cast an enlarged shadow of Hugh's head upon the wall. When Mr. Ochterlony turned round a little, his eye caught that, and a tender smile came over his face.

"It looks like your father," he said to Hugh, who was startled and did not know what he meant. "It is more like him than you are. He was a good fellow at the bottom—fidgety, but a very good fellow—as your mother will tell you. I am glad it is you who are the eldest, and not one of the others. They are fine boys, but I am glad it is you—"

"Oh, uncle," said Hugh, with tears in his eyes, "you are awfully good to me. I don't deserve it. Islay is a far better fellow than I am. If you would but get well again, and never mind who was the eldest——"

Mr. Ochterlony smiled and shook his head. "I have lived my day," he said, "and now it is your turn; and I hope you'll make Earlston better than ever it was. Now go to bed, my boy; we've talked long enough. I think if I were quiet I could sleep."

"And you'll call me, uncle, if you want me? I shall be in the dressing-room," said Hugh, whose heart was very full.

"There is no need," said Mr. Ochterlony, smiling again. "But I suppose it pleases you. You'll sleep as sound as a top wherever you are — that's the privilege of your age; but John will be somewhere about, and nothing is going to happen before morning. Good night."

But he called Hugh back before he had reached the door. "You'll be sure to remember about the Henri Deux?" he said, softly. That was all. And the young man went to the dressing-room, and John, who had just stolen in, lay down on a sofa in the shadow, and sleep and quiet took possession of the room. If Mr. Ochterlony slept, or if he still lay looking at the lamp, seeing his life flit past him like a shadow, giving a sigh to what might have been, and thinking with perhaps a little awakening thrill of expectation of what was so soon to be, nobody could tell. He was as silent as if he slept—almost as silent as if he had been dead.

But Aunt Agatha was not asleep. She was in her room all alone, praying for him, stopping by times to think how different it might have been. She might have been with him then, taking care of him, instead of being so far away; and when she thought of that the tears stood in her eyes. But it was not her, fault. She had nothing to upbraid herself with. She was well aware whose doing it was—poor man, and it was he who was the sufferer now; but she said her prayers for him all the same.

When a few days had passed, the event occurred of which there had never been any doubt. Francis Ochterlony died very peaceably and quietly, leaving not only all of which he died possessed, but his blessing and thanks to the boy who had stood in the place of a son to him. He took no unnecessary time about his dying, and yet he did not do anything hastily to shock people. 'It was known he was ill, and everybody had the satisfaction of sending to inquire for him, and testifying their respect before he died. Such a thing was indeed seen on one day as seven servants, all men on horseback, sent with messages of inquiry, which was a great gratification to Mrs. Gill, the housekeeper, and the rest of the servants. "He went off like a lamb at the last," they all said; and though he was not much like a lamb, there might have been employed a less appropriate image. He made a little sketch with his own hands as to how the museum was to be arranged, and told Hugh what provision to make for the old servants; and gave him a great many advices, such as he never had taken himself; and was so pleasant and cheery about it, that they scarcely knew the moment when the soft twilight sank into absolute night. He died an old man, full of many an unexpressed philosophy, and yet, somehow, with the sentiment of a young one: like a tree ripe and full of fruit, yet with blossoms still lingering on the topmost branches, as you see on orange-trees-sage and experienced, and yet with something of the virginal and primal state. Perhaps it was not a light price to give for this crowning touch of delicacy and purity-the happiness (so to speak) of his own life and of Aunt Agatha's. And yet the link between the old lovers, thus fancifully revived, was very sweet and real. And they had not been at all unhappy apart, on the whole, either of them. And it is something to preserve this quintessence of maidenhood and primal freshness to the end of a long life, and leave the visionary perfume of it among a community much given to marrying and giving in marriage. It was thus that Francis Ochterlony died.

Earlston, of course, was all shut up immediately, blinds drawn and shutters closed, and, what was more unusual, true tears shed, and a true weight, so long as it lasted, upon the hearts of all the people about. The servants, perhaps, were not quite uninfluenced by the thought that all their legacies, &c., were left in the hands of the new master, who was little more than a boy. And the Cottage, too, was closed, and the inmates went about in a shadowed atmosphere, and were very sorry, and thought a little of Mr. Ochterlony-not all as Aunt Agatha did, who kept her room, and shed many tears; but still he was thought of in the honse. It is true that Mary could not help remembering that now her Hugh was no longer a boy, dependent upon anybody's pleasure, but the master of the house of his fathers—the house his own father was born in; and an important personage. She could not help thinking of this, nor, in spite of herself, feeling her heart swell, and asking herself if it was indeed her Hugh who had come to this promotion. And yet she was very sorry for Mr. Ochterlony's death. He had been good to her children, always courteous and deferential to herself; and she was sorry for him as a woman is sorry for a man who has nobody belonging to him—sorrier far, in most cases, than the man is for himself. He was dead in his loneliness, and the thought of it brought a quiet moisture to Mary's eyes; but Hugh was living, and it was he who was the master of all; and it was not in human nature that his mother's grief should be bitter or profound.

"Hugh is a lucky boy," said Mrs. Percival; "I think you are all lucky, Mary, you and your children. To come into Earlston with so little waiting, and have everything left in his own hands."

"I don't think he will be thinking of that," said Mary. "He was fond of his uncle; I am sure he will feel his loss."

"Oh yes, no doubt; I ought not to have said anything so improper," said Winnie, with that restrained smile and uncomfortable inference which comes so naturally to some people. She knew nothing and cared nothing about Francis Ochterlony; and she was impatient of what she called Aunt Agatha's nonsense; and she could not but feel it at once unreasonable and monstrous that anything but the painful state of her own affairs should occupy people in the house she was living in. Yet the fact was that this event had to a certain extent eclipsed Winnie. The anxiety with which everybody looked for a message or letter about Mr. Ochterlony's state blinded them a little to her worn looks and listless wretchedness. They did not neglect her, nor were they indifferent to her; for, indeed, it would be difficult to be indifferent to a figure which held so prominent a place in the foreground of everything; but still when they were in such a state of suspense about what was happening at Earlston, no doubt Winnie's affairs were to a certain extent overlooked. It is natural for an old man to die; but it is not natural for a young woman-a woman in the bloom and fulness of life-one who has been, and ought still to be, a great beauty-to be driven by her wrongs out of all that makes life endurable. This was how Winnie reasoned; and she was jealous of the attention given to Mr. Ochterlony as he accomplished the natural act of dying. What was that in comparison with the terrible struggles of life?

But naturally it made a great difference when it was all over, and when Hugh, subdued and very serious, but still another man from the Hugh who the other day was but a boy, came to the Cottage "for a little change," and to give his mother all the particulars. He came all tender in his natural grief with eyes ready to glisten, and a voice that sometimes faltered; but, nevertheless, there was something about him which showed that it was he who was Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston now.

CHAPTER XXXI.

This was the kind of crisis in the family history, at which Uncle Penrose was sure to make his appearance. He was the only man among them, he sometimes said-or at least the only man who knew auvthing about money; and he came into the midst of the Ochterlonys in their mourning, as large and important as he had been when Winnie was married, looking as if he had never taken his left hand out of his pocket all the time. He had not been asked to the funeral, and he marked his consciousness of that fact by making his, appearance in buff waistcoats and apparel which altogether displayed lightheartedness if not levity—and which was very wounding to Aunt Agatha's feelings. Time, somehow, did not seem to have touched him. If he was not so offensively and demonstratively a Man, in the sweet-scented feminine house, as he used to be, it was no reticence of his, but because the boys were men, or nearly so, and the character of the household changed. And Hugh was Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston; which, perhaps, was the fact that made the greatest difference of all.

He came the day after Hugh's return, and in the evening there had been a very affecting scene in the Cottage. In faithful discharge of his promise, Hugh had carried the Henri Deux, carefully packed, as became its value and fragile character, to Aunt Agatha; and she had received it from him with a throbbing heart and many tears. "It was almost the last thing he said to me," Hugh had said. "He put it all aside with his own hand, the day you admired it so much; and he told me over and over again, to be sure not to forget." Aunt Agatha had been sitting with her hands clasped upon the arm of his chair, and her eyes fixed upon him, not to lose a word; but when he said this, she covered her face with those soft old hands, and was silent, and did not even weep. It was the truest grief that was in her heart, and yet with that, there was an exquisite pang of delight, such as goes through and through a girl when first she perceives that she is loved, and sees her power. She was as a widow, and yet she was an innocent maiden, full of experience and inexperience, feeling the heaviness of the evening shadows, and yet still in the age of splendour in the grass and glory in the flower. The sense of that last tenderness went through her with a thrill of joy and grief beyond description. It gave him back to her for ever and ever, but not with that sober appropriation which might have seemed natural to her age. She could no more look them in the face while it was being told, than had he been a living lover and she a girl. It was a supreme conjunction and blending of the two extremes of life, a fusion of youth and of age.

"I never thought he noticed what I said," she answered at last with a soft sob-and uncovered the eyes that were full of tears, and yet dazzled as with a sudden light; and she would let no one touch ding tears that were bitter and yet sweet, over its many wrappings. Though he was a man, and vaguely buoyed up, without knowing it, by the strange new sense of his own importance, Hugh could have found it in his heart to shed tears too, over the precious bits of porcelain, that had now acquired an interest so much more near and touching than anything connected with Henri Deux; and so could his mother. But there were two who looked on with dry eyes: the one was Winnie, who would have liked to break it all into bits, as she swept past it with her long dress, and could not put up with Aunt Agatha's nonsense; the other was Will, who watched the exhibition curiously with close observation, wondering how it was that people were such fools, and feeling the shadow of his brother weigh upon him with a crushing weight. But these two malcontents were not in sympathy with each other, and never dreamt of making common cause.

And it was when the house was in this condition, that Uncle Penrose arrived. He arrived, as usual, just in time to make a fuss necessary about a late dinner, and to put Peggy out of temper, which was a fact that soon made itself felt through the house; and he began immediately to speak to Hugh about Earlston, and about "your late uncle," without the smallest regard for Aunt Agatha's feelings. "I know there, was something between him and Miss Agatha, once," he said, with a kind of smile at her, "but of course that was all over long ago." And this was said when poor Miss Seton, who felt that the bond had never before been so sweet and so close, was seated at the head of her own table, and had to bear it and make no sign.

"Probably there will be a great deal to be done on the estate," Mr. Penrose said; "these studious men always let things go to ruin out of doors ; but there's a collection of curiosities or autiquities or something. If that's good it will bring in money. When a man is known such things sell."

"But it is not to be sold," said Hugh quickly. "I have settled all about that."

"Not to be sold?-nonsense!" said Mr. Penrose; "you don't mean to say you are a collector-at your age? No, no, my boy; they're no good to him where he is now; he could not take them into his vault with him. Feelings are all very well, but you can't be allowed to lose a lot of money for a prejudice. What kind of things are they-pictures and that sort? or -

"I have made all the necessary arrangements," said Hugh with youthful dignity. "I want you to go with me to Dalken, mother, to see some rooms the mayor has offered for them-nice rooms belonging to the Town-Hall. They could have 'Ochterlony Museum' put up over the doors, and do better than a separate building, besides saving the expense."

Mr. Penrose gave a long whistle, which under any circumstances would have been very indecorous the precious legacy, but unpacked it herself, shed- at a lady's table. "So that is how it's to be!" he said; "but we'll talk that over first, with your permission, Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston. You are too young to know what you're doing. I suppose the ladies are at the bottom of it; they never know the value of money. And yet we know what it costs to get it when it is wanted, Miss Agatha," said the insolent man of money, who never would forget that Miss Seton herself had once been in difficulties. She looked at him with a kind of smile, as politeness ordained, but tears of pain stood in Aunt Agatha's eyes. If ever she hated anybody in her gentle life it was Mr. Penrose, and somehow he made himself hateful in her presence to everybody concerned.

"It costs more to get it than it is ever worth," said Winnie, indignant, and moved for the first time, to make a diversion, and come to Aunt Agatha's aid.

"Ah, I have no doubt you know all about it," said Mr. Penrose, turning his arms upon her. "You should have taken my advice. If you had come to Liverpool, as I wanted you, and married some steady-going fellow with plenty of money, and gone at a more reasonable pace, you would not have changed so much at your age. Look at Mary, how well-preserved she is: I don't know what you can have been doing with yourself to look so changed."

"I am sorry you think me a fright," said Winnie, with an angry sparkle in her eye.

"You are not a fright," said Uncle Penrose; "one can see that you've been a very handsome woman, but you are not what you were when I saw you last, Winnie. The fault of your family is that you are extravagant, -I am sure you did not get it from your mother's side; -extravagant of your money and your hospitality, and your looks and everything. I am sure Mary has nothing to spare, and yet l've found people living here for weeks together. I can't afford visitors like that-I have my family to consider, and people that have real claims upon meno more than I could afford to set up a museum. If I had a lot of curiosities thrown on my hands, I should make them into money. It is not everybody that can appreciate pictures, but everybody understands five per cent. And then he might have done something worth while for his brothers: not that I approve of a man impoverishing himself for the sake of his friends, but still two thousand pounds isn't much. And he might have done something for his mother, or looked after Will's education. It's family pride I suppose; but I'd rather give my mother a house of her own than set up an Ochterlony Museum. Tastes differ you know."

"His mother agrees with him entirely in everything he is doing," said Mary with natural resentment. "I wish all mothers had sons as good as mine."

"Hush," said Hugh, who was crimson with indignation and anger; "I decline to discuss these matters with Uncle Penrose. Because he is your uncle, mother, he shall inquire into the estate as much as he likes; but I am the head of the house, and I am responsible only to God and to those who are dead—and, mother, to you," said Hugh, with his eyes glistening and his face glowing.

Uncle Penrose gave another contemptuous prolonged whistle at this speech, but the others looked at the young man with admiration and love; even Winnie, whose heart could still be touched, regarded the young paladin with a kind of tender envy and admiration. She was too young to be his mother, but she did not feel herself young; and her heart yearned to have some one who would stand by her and defend her as such a youth could. A world of softer possibilities than anything she would permit herself to think of now, came into her mind as she looked at him. If she too had but been the mother of children like her sister! but it appeared that Mary was to have the best of it, always and in every way.

As for Will, he looked at the eldest son with very different feelings. Hugh was not particularly clever, and his brother had long entertained a certain contempt for him. He thought what he would have done had he been the head of the house. He was disposed to sneer, like Mr. Penrose, at the Ochterlony Museum. Was it not a confession of a mean mind, an acknowledgement of weakness, to consent to send away all the lovely things that made Will's vision of Earlston like a vision of heaven? If it had been Will he would not have thought of five per cent., but neither would he have thought of making a collection of them at Dalken, where the country bumpkins might come and stare. He would have kept them all to himself, and they would have made his life beautiful. And he scorned Hugh for dispossessing himself of them, and reducing the Earlston rooms into rooms of ordinary habitation. Had they but been his-had he but been the eldest, the head of the house—then the world and the family and Uncle Penrose would have seen very different things.

But yet Hugh had character enough to stand firm. He made his mother get her bonnet and go out with him after dinner, and everybody in the house looked after the two as they went awaythe mother and her firstborn-he, with his young head towering above her, though Mary was tall, and she putting her arm within his so proudly-not without a tender elation in his new importance, a sense of his superior place and independent rank which was strangely sweet. Winnie looked after them, envying her sister, and yet with an envy which was not bitter; and Will stood and looked fiercely on this brother who, by no virtue of his own, had been born before him. As for Aunt Agatha, who was fond of them all, she went to her own room to heal her wounds; and Mr. Penrose, who was fond of none of them, went up to the Hall to talk things over with Sir Edward, whom he had once talked over to such purpose. And the only two who could stray down to the soft-flowing Kirtell, and listen to the melody of the woods and waters, and talk in concert of what they had wished and planned, were Mary and Hugh.

"The great thing to be settled is about Will," the head of the house was saying. "You shall see, mother, when he is in the world and knows better, all that will blow away. His two thousand pounds is not much, as Uncle Penrose says; but it was all my father had: and when he wants it, and when Islay wants it, there can always be something added. It is my business to see to that."

"It was all your father had," said Mary, "and all your uncle intended; and I see no reason why you should add to it, Hugh. There will be a little more when I am gone; and in the meantime, if we only knew what Will would like to do ---"

"Why, they'll make him a fellow of his college," said Hugh. "He'll go in for all sorts of honours. He's awfully clever, mother; there's no fear of Will. The best thing I can see is to send him to read with somebody—somebody with no end of a reputation, that he would have a sort of an awe for—and then the University. It would be no use doing it if he was just like other people; but there's everything to be made of Will."

"I hope so," said Mary, with a little sigh. And then she added, "So I shall be left quite alone?"

"No; you are coming to Earlston with me," said Hugh; "that is quite understood. There will be a great deal to do; and I don't think things are quite comfortable at the Cottage, with Mrs. Percival here."

"Poor Winnie!" said Mrs. Ochterlony. "I don't think I ought to leave Aunt Agatha—at least, while she is so much in the dark about my sister. And then you told me you had promised to marry, Hugh?"

"Yes," said the young man; and straightway the colour came to his cheek, and dimples to the corners of his mouth; "but she is too y—— I mean, there is plenty of time to think of that."

"She is too young?" said Mary, startled. "Do I know her, I wonder? I did not imagine you had settled on the person as well as the fact. Well; and then, you know, I should have to come back again. I will come to visit you at Earlston: but I must keep my head-quarters here."

"I don't see why you should have to come back again," said Hugh, somewhat affronted. "Earlston is big enough, and you would be sure to be fond of her. No, I don't know that the person is settled upon. Perhaps she wouldn't have me; perhaps — But, anyhow, you are coming to Earlston, mother dear. And, after a while, we could have some visitors perhaps—your friends: you know I am very fond of your friends, mamma."

"All my friends, Hugh?" said his mother, with a smile.

This was the kind of talk they were having while Mr. Penrose was laying the details of Hugh's extravagance before Sir Edward, and doing all he could to incite him to a solemn cross-examination of Winnie. Whether she had run away from her husband, or if not exactly that, what were the circumstances under which she had left him; and whether a reconciliation could be brought about :all this was as interesting to Sir Edward as it was to Uncle Penrose; but what the latter gentleman was particularly anxious about was, what they had done with their money, and if the unlucky couple were very deeply in debt. "I suspect that is at the bottom of it," he said. And they were both concerned about Winnie, in their wayanxious to keep her from being talked about, and to preserve to her a place of repentance. Mrs. Percival, however, was not so simple as to subject herself to this ordeal. When Sir Edward called in an accidental way next morning, and Uncle Penrose drew a solemn chair to her side, Winnie sprang up and went away. She went off, and shut herself up in her own room, and declined to go back, or give any further account of herself. "If they want to drive me away, I will go away," she said to Aunt Agatha, who came up tremulously to her door, and begged her to go downstairs.

"My darling, they can't drive you away; you have come to see me," said Aunt Agatha. "It would be strange if any one wanted to drive you from my house."

Winnie was excited, and driven out of her usual self-restraint. Perhaps she had begun to soften a little. She gave way to momentary tears, and kissed Aunt Agatha, whose heart in a moment forsook all other pre-occupations, and returned for ever and ever to her child.

"Yes, I have come to see you," she cried; "and don't let them come and hunt me to death. I have done nothing to them. I have injured nobody; and I will not be put upon my trial for anybody in the wide world."

"My dear love! my poor darling child!" was all that Aunt Agatha said.

And then Winuie dried her eyes. "I may as well say it now," she said. "I will give an account of myself to nobody but you; and if he should come after me here—"

"Yes, Winnie darling?" said Aunt Agatha, in great suspense, as Mrs. Percival stopped to take breath.

"Nothing in the world will make me see him—nothing in the world!" cried Winnie. "It is best you should know. It is no good asking me—nothing in the world!"

"Oh, Winnie, my dear child!" cried Aunt Agatha, in anxious remonstrance, but she was not permitted to say any more. Winnie kissed her again in a peremptory way, and led her to the door, and closed it softly upon her. She had given forth her ultimatum, and now it was for her defender to carry on the fight.

But within a few days another crisis arose of a less manageable kind. Uncle Penrose made everybody highly uncomfortable, and left stings in each individual mind, but fortunately business called him back after two days to his natural sphere. And Sir Edward was affronted, and did not return to the charge; and Mrs. Percival, with a natural yearning, had begun to make friends of her nephew, and draw him to her side to support her if need should be. And Mary was preparing to go with her boy after a while to Earlston; and Hugh himself found frequent business at Carlisle, and went and came continually; when it happened one day that her friends came to pay Mrs. Ochterlony a visit, to offer their condolences and congratulations upon Hugh's succession and his uncle's death.

They came into the drawing-room before any one was aware; and Winnie was there, with her shawl round her as usual. All the ladies of the Cottage were there: Aunt Agatha seated within sight of her legacy, the precious Henri Deux, which was all arranged in a tiny little cupboard, shut in with glass, which Hugh had found for her; and Mary working as usual for her boys. Winnie was the one who never had anything to do; instead of doing anything, poor soul, she wound her arms closer and closer into her shawl. It was not a common visit that was about to be paid. There was Mrs. Kirkman, and Mrs. Askell, and the doctor's sister, and the wife of a new Captain, who had come with them; and they all swept in, and kissed Mary, and took possession of the place. They kissed Mary, and shook hands with Aunt Agatha; and then Mrs. Kirkman stopped short and looked at Winnie, and made her a most stately curtsey. The others would have done the same, had their courage been as good; but both Mrs. Askell and Miss Sorbette were doubtful how Mary would take it, and compromised, and made some sign of recognition in a distant way. Then they all subsided into chairs, and did their best to talk.

"It is a coincidence that brings us all here together to-day," said Mrs. Kirkman; "I hope it is not too much for you, my dear Mary. How affecting was poor Mr. Ochterlony's death! I hope you have that evidence of his spiritual state which is the only consolation in such a case."

"He was a good man," said Mary; "very kind, and generous, and just. Hugh, who knew him best, was very fond of him—."

"Ah, fond of him! We are all fond of our friends," said Mrs. Kirkman; "but the only real comfort is to know what was their spiritual state. Do you know I am very anxious about your parish here. If you would but take up the work, it would be a great thing. And I would like to have a talk with Hugh: he is in an important position now; he may influence for good so many people. Dear Miss Seton, I am sure you will help me all you can to lead him in the right way."

"He is such a dear!" said Emma Askell. "He has been to see us four or five times: it was so good of him. I didn't know Mr. Ochterlony, Madonna dear; so you need not be vexed if I say right out that I am so glad. Hugh will make such a perfect Squire; and he is such a dear. Oh, Miss Seton, I know you will agree with me—isn't he a dear?"

"He's a very fine young fellow," said Miss Sorbette. "I remember him when he was only that height, so I think I may speak. It seems like yesterday when he was at that queer marriage, you know—such a funny, wistful little soul. I daresay you recollect, Mary, for it was rather hard upon you."

"We all recollect," said Mrs. Kirkman; "don't speak of it. Thank Heaven, it has done those dear children no harm."

There was something ringing in Mary's ears, but she could not say a word. Her voice seemed to die on her lips, and her heart in her breast. If her boys were to hear, and demand an explanation! Something almost as bad happened. Winnie, who was looking on, whom nebody had spoken to, now took it upon her to interpose.

"What marriage?" she said. "It must have been something of consequence, and I should like to know."

This question fluttered the visitors in the strangest way; none of them looked at Winnie, but they looked at each other, with a sudden movement of skirts and consultation of glances. Mrs. Kirkman put her bonnet-strings straight, slowly and sighed; and Miss Sorbette bent down her head with great concern, and exclaimed that she had lost the buttou of her glove; and Emma Askell shrank behind backs, and made a great rustling with her dress as if she could not hear. "Oh, it was nothing at all," she said; being by nature the least hard-hearted of the three. That was all the answer they gave to Winnie, who was the woman who had been talked about. And the next moment all three rushed at Mary, and spoke to her in the same breath, in their agitation; for at least they were agitated by the bold coup they had made. It was a stroke which Winnie felt. She turned very red and then very pale, but she did not fliuch : she sat there in the foreground, close to them all, till they had said everything they had to say; and held her head high, ready to meet the eye of anybody who dared to look at her. As for the other members of the party, Mary had been driven hors de combat, and for the first moment was too much occupied with her own feelings to perceive the insult that had been directed at her sister; and Aunt Agatha was too much amazed to take any part. Thus they sat, the visitors in a rustle of talk and silk and agitation and uneasiness, frightened at the step they had taken, with Winnie immovable and unflinching in the midst of them, until the other ladies of the house recovered their self-possession. Then an unquestionable chill fell upon the party. When such visitors came to Kirtell on ordinary occasions, they were received with pleasant hospitality. It was not a ceremonious call, it was a frank familiar visit, prolonged for an hour or two; and though five o'clock tea had not then been invented, it was extemporized for the occasion, and fruit was gathered, and flowers, and all the pleasant country details that please visitors from a town. And when it was time to go, everybody knew how many minutes were necessary for the walk to the station, and the Cottage people escorted their visitors, and waved their hands to them as the train started. Such had been the usual routine of a visit to Kirtell. But matters were changed now. After that uneasy rustle and flutter, a silence equally uneasy fell upon the assembly. The new Captain's wife, who had never been there before, could not make it out. Mrs. Percival sat silent, the centre of the group, and nobody addressed a word to her; and Aunt Agatha leaned back in her chair and never opened her lips; and even Mary gave the coldest, briefest answers to the talk which everybody poured upon her at once. It was all quite mysterious and unexplainable to the new Captain's wife.

"I am afraid we must not stay," Mrs. Kirkman said at last, who was the superior officer. "I hope we have not been too much for you, my dear Mary. I want so much to have a long talk with you about the parish and the work that is to be done in it. If I could only see you take it up! But I see you are not able for it now."

"I am not the clergyman," said Mary, whose temper was slightly touched. "You know that never was my role."

"Ah, my dear friend!" said Mrs. Kirkman, and she bent her head forward pathetically to Mrs. Ochterlony's, and shook it in her face, and kissed her, "if one could always feel one's self justified in leaving it in the hands of the clergyman! But you are suffering, and I will say no more to-day."

And Miss Sorbette too, made a pretence of having something very absorbing to say to Mrs. Ochterlony; and the exit of the visitors was made in a kind of scuffle very different from their dignified entrance. They had to walk back to the station in the heat of the afternoon, and to sit there in the dusty waitingroom an hour and a half waiting for the train. Seldom is justice so promptly or poetically executed. And they took to upbraiding each other, as was natural, and Emma Askell cried, and said it was not her fault. And the new Captain's wife asked audibly, if that was the Madonna Mary the gentlemen talked about, and the house that was so pleasant? Perhaps the three ladies in the Cottage did not feel much happier; Aunt Agatha rose up tremblingly when they were gone, and went to Winnie and kissed her. "Oh, what does it all mean?" Miss Seton cried. It was the first time she had seen anyone belonging to her pointed at by the finger of scorn.

"It means that Mary's friends don't approve of me," said Winnie; but her lip quivered as she spoke. She did not care! But yet she was a woman, and she did care, whatever she might say.

And then Mary, too, came and kissed her sister. "My poor Winnie!" she said, tenderly. She could not be her sister's partisan out and out, like Aunt Agatha. Her heart was sore for what she knew, and for what she did not know; but she could not forsake her own flesh and blood. The inquisition of Uncle Penrose and Sir Edward was a very small matter indeed in comparison with this woman's insult, but yet it drew Winnie imperceptibly closer to her only remaining friends.

CHAPTER XXXII.

IT was not likely that Will, who had speculated so much on the family history, should remain unmoved by all these changes. His intellect was very lively, and well-developed, and his conscience was to a great extent dormant. If he had been in the way of seeing, or being tempted into actual vices, no doubt the lad's education would have served him in better stead, and his moral sense would have been awakened. But he had been injured in his finer moral perceptions by a very common and very unsuspected agency. He had been in the way of hearing very small offences indeed made into sins. Aunt Agatha had been almost as hard upon him for forgetting a text as if he had told a lie-and his tutor, the curate, had treated a false quantity, or a failure of memory, as a moral offence. That was in days long past, and it was Wilfrid now who found out his curate in false quantities, and scorned him accordingly; and who had discovered that Aunt Agatha herself, if she remembered the text, knew very little more about it. This system of making sins out of trifles had passed quite harmlessly over Hugh and Islay; but Wilfrid's was the exceptional mind to which it did serious harm. And the more he discovered that the sins of his childhood were not sins, the more confused did his mind become, and the more dull his conscience, as to those sins of thought and feeling, which were the only ones at present into which he was tempted. What had anyone to do with the complexion of his thoughts? If he felt one way or another, what had anybody but himself to do with that? Other people might dissemble and take credit for the emotions approved of by public opinion, but he would be true and genuine. And accordingly he did not see why he should pretend to be pleased at Hugh's advancement. He was not pleased. He said to himself that it went against all the rules of natural justice. Hugh was no better than he; on the contrary, he was less clever, less capable of mental exertion, which, so far as Will knew, was the only standard of superiority; and yet he was Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston, with a house and estate, with affairs to manage, and tenants to influence, and the Psyche and the Venus to do what he liked with: whereas Will was nobody, and was to have two thousand pounds for all his inheritance. He had been talking, too, a great deal to Mr. Penrose, and that had not done him any good; for Uncle Penrose's view was that nothing should stand in the way of acquiring money or other wealthnothing but the actual law. To do anything dishonest, that could be punished, was of course pure insanity-not to say crime; but to let any sort of false honour, or pride, or delicacy stand between you and the acquisition of money was almost as great insanity, according to his ideas. "Go into business and keep at it, and you may buy him up-him and his beggarly estate"-had been Uncle Penrose's generous suggestion; and it was a good deal in Wilfrid's mind. To be sure it was quite opposed to the intellectual tendency which led him to quite a different class of pursuits. But what was chiefly before him in the meantime was Hugh, preferred to so much distinction, and honour, and glory; and yet, if the truth were known, a very stupid sort of fellow in comparison with himself-Will. And it was not only that he was Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston. He was first with everybody. Sir Edward, who took but little notice of Will, actually consulted Hugh, and he was the first to be thought of in any question that occurred in the Cottage; and, what went deepest of all, Nelly-Nelly Askell whom Will had appropriated, not as his love, for his mind had not as yet opened to that idea, but as his sympathiser-in-chief-the listener to all his complaints and speculations—his audience whom nobody had any right to take from him-Nelly had gone over to his brother's side. And the idea of going into business, even at the cost of abandoning all his favourite studies, and sticking close to it, and buying him up-him and his beggarly estate-was a good deal at this moment in Wilfrid's thoughts. Even the new-comer, Winnie, who might if she pleased have won him to herself. had preferred Hugh. So that he was alone on his side, and everybody was on his brother's-a position which often confuses right and wrong, even to minds least set upon their own will and way.

He was sauntering on Kirtell banks a few days after the visit above recorded, in an unusually uncomfortable state of mind. Mrs. Askell had felt great compunction about her share in that event, and she had sent Nelly, who was known to be a favourite at the Cottage, with a very anxious letter, assuring her dear Madonna that it was not her fault. Mary had not received the letter with much favour, but she had welcomed Nelly warmly; and Hugh had found means to occupy her attention; and Will, who saw no place for him, had wandered ont, slightly sulky, to Kirtell-side. He was free to come and go as he liked. Nobody there had any particular need of him; and a solitary walk is not a particularly enlivening performance when one has left an entire household occupied and animated behind. As he wound his way down the bank he saw another passenger on the road before him, who was not of a description of man much known on Kirtell-side. It seemed to Will that he had seen this figure somewhere before. It must be one of the regiment, one of the gentlemen of whom the Cottage was a little jealous, and who were thought to seek occasions of visiting Kirtell oftener than politeness required. As Will went on, however, he saw that the stranger was somebody whom he had never seen before; and curiosity was a lively faculty in him, and readily awakened. Neither was the unknown indifferent to Will's appearance or approach; on the contrary, he turned round at the sound of the youth's step and scrutinised him closely, and lingcred that he might be overtaken. He was tall, and a handsome man, still young, and with an air which only much traffic with the world confers. No man could have got that look and aspect who had lived all his life on Kirtell; and even Will, inexperienced as he was, could recognise this. It did not occur to him, quick as his intellect was at putting things together, who it was; but a little expectation awoke in his mind as he quickened his steps to overtake the stranger, who was clearly waiting to be overtaken.

"I beg your pardon," he said, as soon as Wilfrid had come up to him; "are you young Ochterlony? I mean, one of the young Ochterlonys?"

"No," said Will, "and yet yes; I am not young Ochterlony, but I am one of the young Ochterlonys, as you say."

Upon this his new companion gave a keen look at him, as if discerning some meaning under the

"I thought so," he said; "and I am Major Percival, whom you may have heard of. It is a queer question, but I suppose there is no doubt that my wife is up there?"

He gave a little jerk with his hand as he spoke in the direction of the Cottage. He was standing on the very same spot where he had seen Winnie coming to him the day they first pledged their troth; and though he was far from being a good man, he remembered it, having still a certain love for his wife, and the thought gave bitterness to his

"Yes, she is there," said Will.

"Then I will thank you to come back with me," said Percival. "I don't want to go and send in my name, like a stranger. Take me in by the garden, where you enter by the window. I suppose nobody can have any objection to my seeing my wife: your aunt, perhaps, or your mother?"

"Perhaps she does not wish to see you," said

Will.

The stranger laughed.

"It is a pleasant suggestion," he said; "but at least you cannot object to admit me, and let me try."

Wilfrid might have hesitated if he had been more fully contented with everybody belonging to him; but, to tell the truth, he knew no reason why Winnie's husband should not see her. He had not been sufficiently interested to wish to fathom the secret, and he had accepted, not caring much about it, Aunt Agatha's oft-repeated declaration, that their visitor had arrived so suddenly to give her "a delightful surprise." Wilfrid did not care much about the matter, and he made no inquiries into it. He turned accordingly with the new-comer, not displeased to be the first of the house to make acquaintance with him. Percival had all a man's advantage over his wife in respect to wear and tear. She had lost her youth, her freshness, and all that gave its chief charm to her beauty, but he had lost very little in outward appearance. Poor Winnie's dissipations were the mildest pleasures in comparison with his, and yet he had kept even his youth, while hers was gone for ever. And he had not the air of a bad man-perhaps he was not actually a bad man. He did whatever he liked without acknowledging any particular restraint of duty, or truth, or even honour, except the limited standard of honour current among men of his class-but he had no distinct intention of being wicked; and he was, beyond dispute, a little touched by seeing, as he had just done, the scene of that meeting which had decided Winnie's fate. He went up the bank considerably softened, and disposed to be very kind. It was he who had been in the wrong in their last desperate struggle, and he found it easy to forgive himself; and Aunt Agatha's garden, and the paths, and flower-plots he remembered so well, softened him more and more. If he had gone straight in, and nothing had happened, he would have kissed his wife in the most amiable way, and forgiven her, and been in perfect amity with everybody-but this was not how it was to be.

Winnie was sitting as usual, unoccupied, indoors. As she was not doing anything her eyes were free to wander further than if they had been more particularly engaged, and at that moment, as it happened, they were turned in the direction of the window from which she had so often watched Sir Edward's light. All at once she started to her feet. It was what she had looked for from the first; what, perhaps, in the stagnation of the household quiet here she had longed for. High among the roses and waving honeysuckles she caught a momentary glimpse of a head which she could have recognised at any distance. At that sight all the excitement of the interrupted struggle rushed back into her heart. A pany of fierce joy, and hatred, and opposition moved her. There he stood who had done her so much wrong; who had trampled on all her feelings and insulted her, and yet pretended to love her, and dared to seek her. Winnie did not say anything to her companions; indeed she was too much engrossed at the moment to remember that she had any companious. She turned and fled without a word, disappearing swiftly, noiselessly, in an instant, as people have a gift of doing when much excited. She was shut up in her room, with her door locked, before any one knew she had stirred. It is true he was not likely to come up-stairs and assail her by force; but she did not think of that. She locked her door and sat down, with her heart beating, and her breath coming quick, expecting, hoping-she would herself have said fearing-an attack.

Winnie thought it was a long time before Aunt Agatha came, softly, tremulously, to her door, but in reality it was but a few minutes. He had come in, and had taken matters with a high hand, and had demanded to see his wife. "He will think it is we who are keeping you away from him. He will not believe you do not want to come," said poor Aunt Agatha, at the door.

"Nothing shall induce me to see him," said Winnie, admitting her. "I told you so: nothing in the world—not if he were to go down on his knees—not if he were—"

"My dear love, I don't think he means to go down on his knees," said Aunt Agatha, anxiously. "He does not think he is in the wrong. Oh, Wiunie, my darling!—if it was only for the sake of other people—to keep them from talking, you know——"

"Aunt Agatha, you are mistaken if you think I care," said Winnie. "As for Mary's friends, they are old-fashioned idiots. They think a woman should shut herself up like an Eastern slave when her husband is not there. I have done nothing to be ashamed of. And he—Oh, if you knew how he had insulted me!—Oh, if you only knew! I tell you I will not consent to see him, for nothing in this world."

Winnie was a different woman as she spoke. She was no longer the worn and faded creature she had been. Her eyes were sparkling, her cheeks glowing. It was a clouded and worn magnificence, but still it was a return to her old splendour.

"Oh, Winnie, my dear love, you are fond of him in spite of all," said Aunt Agatha. "It will all come right, my darling, yet. You are fond of each other in spite of all."

"You don't know what you say," said Winnie, in a blaze of indignation.—"Fond of him!—if you could but know! Tell him to think of how we parted. Tell him I will never more trust myself near him again."

It was with this decision, immovable and often repeated, that Miss Seton at last returned to her undesired guest. But she sent for Mary to come and speak to her before she went into the drawing-room. Aunt Agatha was full of schemes and anxious desires. She could not make people do what was right, but if she could so plot and manage appearances as that they should seem to do what was right, surely that was better than nothing. She sent for Mrs. Ochterlony into the dining-room, and she began to take out the best silver, and arrange the green finger-glasses, to lose no time.

"What is the use of telling all the world of our domestic troubles?" said Aunt Agatha. "My dear, though Winnie will not see him, would it not be better to keep him to dinner, and show that we are friendly with him all the same? So long as he is with us, nobody is to know that Winnie keeps in her own room. After the way these people behaved to the poor dear child—"

"They were very foolish and ill-bred," said Mary, "but it was because she had herself been foolish, not because she was away from her husband; and I do not like him to be with my boys."

"But for your dear sister's sake! Oh, Mary, my love, for Winnie's sake!" said Aunt Agatha; and Mary yielded, though she saw no benefit in it. It was her part to go back into the drawing-room, and make the best of Winnie's resistance, and convey the invitation to this unlooked-for guest, while Aunt Agatha looked after the dinner, and impressed upon Peggy that perhaps Major Pereival might not be able to stay long; and was it not sad that the very day her husband came to see her, Mrs. Percival should have such a bad headache? "She is lying down, poor dear, in hopes of being able to sit up a little in the evening," said the anxious but innocent deceiver-doubly innocent since she deceived nobody, not even the housemaid, far less Peggy. As for Major Percival, he was angry and excited, as Winnie was, but not to an equal extent. He did not believe in his wife's resistance. He sat down in the familiar room, and expected every moment to see Winnie rush down in her impulsive way, and throw herself into his arms. Their struggles had not terminated in this satisfactory way of late, but still she had gone very far in leaving him, and he had gone far in condescending to come to seek her: and there seemed no reason why the monster quarrel should not end in a monster reconciliation, and all go on as before.

But it was bad policy to leave him with Mary. The old instinctive dislike that had existed between them from the first woke up again unawares. Mrs. Ochterlony could not conceal the fact that she took no pleasure in his society, and had no faith in him. She stayed in the room because she could not help it, but she did not pretend to be cordial. When he addressed himself to Will, and took the boy into his confidence, and spoke to him as to another man of the world, he could see, and was pleased to see, the contraction in Mary's forehead. In this one point she was afraid of him, or at least he thought so. Winnie stayed upstairs with the door locked, watching to see him go away; and Hugh, to whom Winnie had been perhaps more confidential than to any one else in the house, went out and in, in displeasure ill-concealed, avoiding all intercourse with the stranger. And Mary sat on thorns, bearing him unwilling company, and Nelly watched and marvelled. Poor Aunt Agatha all the time arranged her best silver, and filled the old-fashioned epergne with flowers, thinking she was doing the very best for her child, saving her reputation, and leaving the way open for a reconciliation between her and her husband, and utterly unconscious of any other harm that could befal.

When the dinner-hour arrived, however (which was five o'clock, an hour which Aunt Agatha thought a good medium between the early and the late), Major Percival's brow was very cloudy. He had waited and listened, and Winnie had not come, and now, when they sat down at table, she was still invisible. "Does not my wife mean to favour us with her company?" he asked, insolently, incredulous after all, that she could persevere so long, and expecting to hear that she was only "late as usual;" upon which Aunt Agatha looked at Mary with anxious beseeching eyes.

"My sister is not coming down to-day," said Mary, with hesitation, "at least I believe——" "Oh, my dear love, you know it is only because she has one of her bad headaches!" Aunt Agatha added, precipitately, with tears of entreaty in her eyes.

Percival looked at them both, and he thought he understood it all. It was Mary who was abetting her sister in her rebellion, encouraging her to defy him. It was she who was resisting Miss Seton's well-meant efforts to bring them together. He saw it all as plain, or thought he saw it, as if he had heard her tactics determined upon. He had let her alone and restrained his natural impulse to injure the woman he disliked, but now she had set herself in his way, and let her look to it. This dinner. which poor Aunt Agatha had brought about against everybody's will, was as uncomfortable a meal as could be imagined. She was miserable herself, dreading every moment that he might burst out into a torrent of rage against Winnie before "the servants," or that Winnie's bell would ring violently and she would send a message-so rash and inconsiderate as she was-to know when Major Percival was going away. And nobody did anything to help her out of it. Mary sat at the foot of the table as stately as a queen, showing the guest only such attentions as were absolutely necessary. Hugh, except when he talked to Nelly, who sat beside him, was as disagreeable as a young man who particularly desires to be disagreeable and feels that his wishes have not been consulted, can be. And as for the guest himself, his countenance was black as night. It was a heavy price to pay for the gratification of saying to everybody that Winnie's husband had come to see her, and had spent the day at the Cottage. But then Aunt Agatha had not the remotest idea that beyond the annoyance of the moment it possibly could do any harm.

It was dreadful to leave him with the two boys after dinner, who probably—or at least Hugh—might not be so civil as was to be wished; but still more dreadful it was ten minutes after to hear Hugh's voice with Nelly in the garden. Why had he left his guest?

"He left me," said Hugh. "He went out under the verandah to smoke his eigas. I don't deny I was very glad to get away."

"But I am sure, Hugh, you are very fond of smoking cigars," said Aunt Agatha, in her anxiety and fright.

"Not always," Hugh answered, "nor under all circumstances." And he laughed and coloured a little, and looked at Nelly by his side, who blushed

"So there is nobody with him but Will!" said Aunt Agatha with dismay, as she went in to where Mary was sitting; and the news was still more painful to Mary. Will was the only member of the family who was really eivil to the stranger, except Aunt Agatha, whose anxiety was plainly written in her countenance. He was sitting now under the verandah which shaded the dining-room windows, quite at the other side of the house, smoking his cigar, and Will sat dutifully and not unwillingly by, listening to his talk. It was a new kind of talk to Will—the talk of a man blasé, yet incapable of existing out of the world of which he was sick—a man who did not pretend to be a good man, nor even possessed of principles. Perhaps the parish of Kirtell in general would not have thought it very edifying talk.

"It is he who has come into the property, I suppose," said Percival, pointing lazily with his cigar towards the other end of the garden, where Hugh was visible far off with Nelly. "Get on well with him, eh? I should say not, if the question was asked of me?"

"Oh yes, well enough," said Will, in momentary confusion, and with a clouding of his brows. "There is nothing wrong with him. It's the system of eldest sons that is wrong. I have nothing to say against Hugh."

"By Jove," said Percival, "the difficulty is to find out which is anybody's eldest son. I never find fault with systems, for my part."

"Oh, about that there can't be any doubt," said Will; "he is six years older than I am. I am only the youngest; though I don't see what it matters to a man, for my part, being born in '32 or '38."

"Sometimes it makes a deal of difference," said Percival; and then he paused: for a man, even when he is pushed on by malice and hate and all uncharitableness, may be sitate before he throws a firebrand into an innocent peaceful house. However after his pause he resumed, making a new start as it were, and doing it deliberately, "sometimes it may make a difference to a man whether he was born in '37 or '38. You were born in '38, were you? Ah! I ought to recollect."

"Why ought you to recollect?" asked Will, startled by the meaning in his companion's face.

"I was present at a ceremony that took place about then," said Percival; "a curious sort of story. I'll tell it you some time. How is the property left, do you know? Is it to him in particular as being the favourite, and that sort of thing?—or is it simply to the eldest son?"

"Simply to the eldest son," said Will, more and more surprised.

Percival gave such a whistle as Uncle Penrose had given when he heard of the Museum, and nodded his head repeatedly. "It would be good fun to turn the tables," he said, as if he were making a remark to himself.

"How could you turn the tables? What do you mean? What do you know about it?" cried Will, who by this time was getting excited. Hugh came within his line of vision now and then, with Nelly—always with Nelly. It was only the younger brother, the inferior member of the household, who was left with the unwelcome guest. If any one could turn the tables! And again he said, almost fiercely, "What do you mean?"

"It is very easy to tell you what I mean; and I wonder what your opinion will be of systems then," said Percival." By Jove! it's an odd position, and I don't envy you. You think you're the youngest, and you were born as you say in '38?"

"Good heavens! what has that to do with it?" cried Wilfrid. "Of course I was born in '38. Tell me what you mean."

"Well, then, I'll tell you what I mean," said Percival, tossing away the end of his cigar, "and plainly, too. That fellow there, who gives himself such airs, is no more the eldest son than I am. The property belongs to you."

THE VOYAGE.

I.-OFF THE COAST.

I HAVE bid farewell to English ground, to English faces dear,
I lie alone with restful heart in narrow cabin here;
The splashing oars of the shore-bound boat have faintly died away,
And on the dim wide river-mouth the twilight settles grey;

Still, hush'd and still, the glassy sea!—the shore a dim grey line! The long strange Sunday glides away—the sunset colours shine. The strange ship-sounds grow quieter, and far up in the blue, Above the bare black rigging, the stars are twinkling through.

The Foreland Light is gleaming red against a purple grey— The purple haze that wraps the west where sank the dying day; From side to side on the heaving tide the vessel dances true, She holds her course with jubilant force along the seething blue.

The Dover cliffs are shining white against a stormy sky,
The waves are heaving green and wild, the winds are rising high;
In teeth of heavy head-winds our ship must beat her way—
Must beat and tack, and labour hard and struggle many a day.

THE VOYAGE.

II .- THE OCEAN.

A strange new life is all around—strange voices meet mine ear; Strange faces kindly look on me, strange sights and sounds are here. The many-colour'd full-voiced Past seems wholly swept away—Across the Never-more a veil is gently drawn to-day!

The sailor at the wheel I watch,—the long horizon line; I hear the rushing of the wave, I mark the day's decline; I seek some little streak of land however dim and far; I try to cheat my faney with that long low cloudy bar.

Our swiftly forward-faring prow cleaves ever through the foam, And can we ever thus go on, and yet no nearer come— No nearer, never nearer to the circling line around? How strange is this enchanted life, so airy, yet so bound!

For manifold is this strange life, with antic colours gay; And quaint it is to watch at ease the serio-comic play; For human life has peopled thick this social solitude; Vast loneliness is all around—the solemn heavens brood Upon the lonely waters wide, and we alone are here, In this vast dome the only life—no other creatures near.

We are faring on together, from the one dear island home, All bound for the same country, yet for different objects come; Through the same perils passing, by the same breezes faun'd, Upheld, protected, onward borne by the same Almighty hand.

Oh, hallow thou the bond, Father! and make it not in vain That we are thus together bound in pleasure and in pain; And even as thou bearest us in safety through the sea, So bear us safe through all this life where perils ever be.

Oh, blessed Sundays on the sea! how softly on the soul Falls the sweet sound of prayer and praise, while billows round us roll! Oh, Thou above, whose tender love still easts out every fear, Bless Thou the voice of him who speaks, the hearts of those who hear!

And far away are those who pray, who guard us by their care, Who brood in love as on we move—still following with prayer; Oh, Thou who hearest them for us, hear us for them, we pray! On all those hearts in blessing rest, so far, so far away.

III.-THE TROPICS.

Slowly, heavily, drag the days; but still when night comes down, Beneath her softly folding wings, beneath her starry crown, We drink the dew of sweetest Peace—our hearts obey the spell, Our inmost beings answer her, who breathes that all is well.

We look down to the pitchy waves that smoothly glide below, And see the sparkling shoals of stars that dart and lighten through; Or all along our shining wake, the sheets of living light Still flying back along our track, far out into the night;

Or look above where worlds and suns are gleaming from on high, With spangled radiance filling all the immeasurable sky—
That sky to which a few hours since we could not lift our sight,
So full of burning blinding glare—now veil'd in sweetest night.

Or see the silvery queen of eve arise from out the sea! The stars grow pale before her, as she moves in radiancy; Upon the dancing sparkling waves she flings her splendour down, Till all the sea is liquid light, from her white glory thrown.

Oh, blessed night! hope gathers strength, and fears are lull'd to rest, And faith itself grows sweeter while I lean upon thy breast. The soft warm breath of tropic night comes whispering to my soul,—A note from out the music of the great harmonious Whole.

IV .- THE SOUTHERN OCEAN.

Soft breathing nights, so silvery sweet, and days of tropic glare, We have left you far behind us now, and on, still on, we fare; And cooler, colder grow the winds, the waves roll wide and high, As plunging through the southern seas the long rough weeks go by.

The sea-birds, following on our track, people with life the waste, In ceaseless circles round our stern their wheeling flights are traced. No other sight, no other sound, but wide grey sea and sky, And rolling waves, and sighing winds—the days, the weeks go by.

And colder, colder, grow the winds, more turbulent the sea,
And high is now our weather side, and low slopes down our lee;
And strange it is at times to think that woods are waving green,
That flowers and grass, and sunshine sweet, are somewhere to be seen;
That June is glowing even now, though waste monotonous grey Encompass us! Oh, sing my heart, the song of far away.

FAR AWAY.

FAR away the flowers are growing,
And the sweet June breezes blowing,
Rich warm light on hayfields glowing,
Sleepy cattle homeward going,
By the leafy hedgerows lowing:
Lights and shadows waver o'er,
Lovingly the lovely shore,
Far, far away.

Here the winds are round us sighing,
And the desert waves replying,
And the sea-bird skinming, flying
Round our ship, her rough track plying;
Day and night still changing, dying
Round our course—for evermore
Passing from the lovely shore
Far, far away.

Far away dear hearts are sending Thoughts of love, all space transcending;
Dear and honour'd knees are bending,
Voices sweet for us ascending,
Many a note of blessing blending—
Mighty blessings, following o'er,
Guard us to that other shore
Far, far away.

Moonlight on the waters sleeping!
Sun, in golden glory steeping!
Stars, your watch above us keeping!
Waves about us rolling, leaping!
Winds those liquid mountains heaping,
Light us, roll us, bear us o'er
To that other unknown shore
Far, far away.

Still through the surging rolling seas our forward-faring prow Cleaves ever, and amid the grey resounding wastes we go; Then came that well-remember'd night—that awful night came on, When our shuddering ship was giddily toss'd at the will of the wild cyclone

Giddily toss'd, and crash'd, and dash'd, by the madden'd and merciless sea, A sport for the wrath of the raging storm through the long, long night were we; Yet the sturdy strength of our batter'd ship to bear the brunt avail'd. Honour to those who brought us through, and peace to those who fail'd!

By morning light the storm is pass'd, and safely then roll we On the wildly-leaping billows of the exasperated sea; The monster lash'd to fury will not soon subside to rest, But must have many days to calm his angry heaving breast.

Day after day he gentler grows-the hours go gliding by, And we are steering north again to meet a milder sky; There comes a breath of softer air across the watery floor-Are these Australian breezes? are we getting near the shore?

Now comes the time when eager eyes are peering through the night, Landsman and sailor looking out to catch Cape Borda light. All looking out ;-at last the shout, the joyous shout and clear-"The light, the light, Cape Borda light!"-falls sweetly on the ear.

Thankful I slept, and waking see, by early morning light, Through narrow porthole shining, the fair and welcome sight Of a long low range of rolling hills against the sparkling sky, Beyond the land-blue waters that smiling round us lie.

Oh, joyous sweet! or is it but another deep-sea dream, Like those that used to come before with tantalising gleam? No; the hills are hills of ridged steeps! they will not fade away, And we are going up the gulf-may touch the land to-day!

Down goes our rattling anchor-chain, down, down, with sudden dip; Our guns resound, the crashing sound staggers the stately ship. Then all is still, all motionless—the long, long voyage past, And we have reach'd our destiny-Australia gain'd at last!

Still bend above us blessed lights whereby our course we'd steer; Sun, moon, and star, with you for guides, the deeps we will not fear; But cleave our way by the heavenly ray through the trackless heaving vast. How great soe'er be trial or care, to reach the land at last!

CURIOUS FORMS OF FRUITS.

RESUMING our notes upon the peculiarities of vegetation, we will proceed to introduce to our readers some singular forms of fruits. It will be as well, however, to begin by briefly describing what a fruit is, and indicating its proper functions. The word fruit has a wide meaning, and may be not incorrectly applied to all the seed-bearing parts of plants. But, in botany, the various forms of fruits, have each a distinctive term. The most simple form is the pod, or legume, of which the pea is a familiar example. It is a carpel, enclosing one known form, is called a pome, because it is formed of a certain number of carpels of a horn-like substance, corresponding with those scale-like coverings of the seeds or pips which we call the core : the fleshy portion is produced by the swelling of these carpels, and their union with the calyx or outer covering of the flower, which has also become fleshy. A very different arrangement occurs in the strawberry, which though called in popular language a fruit, is literally a collection of fruits. The succulent part, which is so much esteemed, is or more seeds. An apple, which is also a well nothing more than the peduncle, or stalk, become fleshy. In this state it is called a receptacle—the true fruits being the little dry one-seeded seed vessels, which most people persist in calling seeds. A similar arrangement occurs in the fig, where iustead of a convex receptacle with the fruits seated outside, we have a concave receptacle and the fruits inside. No one has ever seen the flower exposed upon the fig-tree, because the figs themselves start out upon the ends of the peduncles, without showing their flowers. But the flowers are there, nevertheless, though carefully hidden from sight in the hollowness of the fig. Thus the fig is not a true or simple, but a compound fruit; a fleshy, hollow receptacle, the true fruits being those little dried, monospermic, or one-seeded vessels, which are scattered through the pulp in the inside. We shall have occasion to refer to a plant nearly allied to the fig, and having a similar arrangement when we come to speak of the motion of plants. The swelling of the peduncle or fruit stalk, as we have seen, produces both the strawberry and fig, but in some plants the result is even more striking and curious. The cashew nut (Anacardium occidentale), is one of the best examples of this. Here the stalk swells to the size and shape of a moderate sized pear, and the true fruit, which is kidney shaped, and has a hard shell-like outer covering, is borne at the end of this receptacle. Both the fruit and the swollen . stem are edible, the kernels or seeds being very when wholesome roasted, after the hard shells have been removed. The receptacle or stalk has a pleasant acid flavour with, however, a slight degree of astringency. The plant grows in the West Indies, Central America, &c.

Many a tourist on the Continent has no doubt been puzzled at a peculiar article which is sold in the markets in various parts of France, under the name of marron d'eau, or water chestnuts. These are the fruits of Trapa natans, belonging to the natural order, Halorageaceæ. There are about five or six species known. The fruits of all are similarly formed, with long spines or horns, of which some species have two, some three, and some four. These hard bone-like fruits have a very anomalous appearance, and at first sight their vegetable origin might well be doubted.

The parts of the flowers of the genus Trapa are in fours, that is, they have four petals, four sepals, and four stamens or pollen-bearing organs. The fruit is one-celled, with a hemispherical stigma scated flatupon the top. The calyx is tubular at the base, and adheres to the ovary, and the peculiar hornlike appendages are the lobes of the calyx become hard after flowering. The name of the genus Trapa is an abridgment of Calcitrapa, the Latin name for Caltrops, an ancient iron spiked instrument of warfare, which was thrown upon the ground to stop the advance of cavalry, and to which the fruit has frequently been likened. Indeed, the whole of the species are sometimes called Water Caltrops. In Venice, the fruits are commonly known as Jesuits' nuts. All the species are floating water plants; they have long jointed root-stocks, and the roots themselves are very fine and hair-like. The leaves are triangular, dentate or toothed, and are arranged in a cluster, while the stalks are buoyant, and help to float the leaves. Trapa natans is a native of the south of Europe, and grows in stagnant or slow running waters. This species has two or more, often four, horns, as will be seen from the woodcut. The seeds are commonly used as an article of food. As they contain much starch, a kind of flour is made from them in many districts in Southern Europe, and with this the people bake very good bread. These fruits were used in very ancient times: Pliny states that the Thracians made bread of them, and they have been recently discovered in a very perfect state of preservation, amongst many other vegetable products, in the ancient lake habitations of Switzerland. A most valuable collection of these specimens is in the Museum at Kew, including some fine specimens of Trapa. All the other species known are natives of India, China, and Japan. Trapa bicornis is a Chinese species, where it is commonly known as Ling. The fruits have always two horns, and from these the species derives its name. They are really not unlike miniature bull's heads. They form an important article of food among the Chinese, who cultivate the plant extensively for that purpose.

Fruit of Trapa bicornis.

An East Indian species, Trapa bispinosa, has large kernels, which are much valued as food, for about thirty thousand people exist almost entirely upon them during five months in the year. Indeed, to such an extent are these collected and sold, that the enormous revenue of 12,000% is annually derived from them. The following interesting account is given by an Indian traveller, of the cultivation of this fruit, which is known as the Singhara:—

"Here (in the North-Western Provinces), as in most other parts of India, the tanks get spoiled by the Water Chestnut, which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water as wheat or barley is upon the dry plains. It is cultivated by a class of men called Dheemurs, who are everywhere fishermen and palankeen bearers; and they keep boats for the planting, weeding, and gathering of the Singhara. holdings or tenements of each cultivator are marked out carefully on the surface of the water by long bamboos stuck up in it; and they pay so much the acre for the portion they till. The long straws of the plants reach up to the surface of the water, upon which float their green leaves, and their pure white flowers expand beautifully in the latter part of afternoon. The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is white, esculent, and of a fine cartilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullock's backs two or three hundred miles to market. They ripen in the latter end of the rains or in September, and are eatable till the end of November. The rent paid for an ordinary tank by the cultivator is about one hundred rupees a year. I have known two hundred rupees to be paid for a very large one, and even three hundred, or thirty pounds a year. But the mud increases so rapidly from this cultivation, that it soon destroys all reservoirs in which it is permitted; and when it is thought desirable to keep up the tank for the sake of the water, it should be carefully prohibited."

A nearly allied family to that of the Trapa is the Lecythidaceae, which has amongst its representatives many singular and some well-known fruits. To this family belongs the common Brazil nut (Bertholletia excelsa) and the Sapucaia nut of our shops. The order is usually known as the Monkey-Pot order, that name being applied to the fruits of several species. The plants are mostly large forest trees, natives of the tropical regions of South America, and all have hard woody fruits, all bearing a great resemblance to each other. In the Brazil nut the fruit is nearly spherical, about the size of a child's head, with from ten to twenty seeds-which are the Brazil nuts of commerce-packed closely round a central axis. The Sapucaia nuts (Lecuthis Zabucaia), which like the former are the true seeds and not the fruits, are packed in a similar manner in large woody capsules shaped like an urn, and dehiscing, or opening spontaneously at the top in the form of a lid, thus allowing the seeds to escape naturally. One of the true Monkey-Pots is the fruit of Lecythis ollaria, of which we give a sketch. This, as will be seen, is also urnshaped, opening also by a natural lid at the top. The form most distinct from those we have already enumerated, is to be found in the fruit of Couratari Guianensis. This is about six inches long by about one inch in diameter, and as broad at the base as at the mouth. The lid, which covers the whole circumference of the top or mouth.

Monkey Pot-Fruit of

has the central axis attached to it, and separates from the fruit naturally. After the seeds have been taken out, the fruit and lid with the attached axis form a miniature pestle and mortar. It is not uncommon, indeed, in the countries where these trees grow, for the natives to convert the empty fruits into cups and bowls. Woody fruits similar to those we have described are one of the distinctive characters of this order, indeed they run through the whole of a large group of Australian plants, viz.: the Eucalypti, belonging to the allied order Myrtacee.

In the natural family Pedaliacea are some of the most extraordinary and fantastic forms of fruits known. Perhaps the most singular of all, and certainly the most mischievous to travellers, is the South African Grapple plant (Harpagophytum procumbens). The name of the genus is derived from the Greek arpax, to seize, and phyton, a plant, and that of the species from the peculiar prostrate habit of the plant. Dr. Burchell, the African traveller, first described it and gave a drawing of it in his book; Dr. Livingstone also mentions it, and so does almost every other African traveller, although in anything but favourable terms. Livingstone says "it has so many hooked thorns as to cling most tenaciously to any animal to which it may become attached. When it happens to lay hold of the mouth of an ox, the animal stands and roars with pain and a sense of helplessness." The fruits when dry are hard and bony, the fleshy or pulpy matter being dried up or absent. They have thus the appearance of huge long-legged spiders. The thorns or hooks are exceedingly sharp and recurved, lacerating the flesh and tearing the clothes fearfully when they have once become attached. These spines are merely natural prolongations; the flowers are of a rich crimson and purple colour; the corolla is tubular, and somewhat of the shape of the Foxglove; the calyx is five-parted; and the fruit contains a number of peculiarly wrinkled seeds.

That of Harpagophytum leptocarpum has eight rows of long bristle-like appendages, flattened, and becoming nearly as thin as paper at the point of attachment to the fruit; but at the extremities having four very sharp reflexed spines. These are very minute, but they are as sharp as steel points, and it is a difficult matter to rid oneself of them when once the barbs have become attached to the dress.

In the genus Martynia, belonging to the same order, the fruits of several of the species have hooks or thorns variously formed or curved. The most commonly known species is Martynia fragrans, a native of Mexico, but frequently cultivated in our gardens, as it grows well in the open air through the summer. The flowers are of a fine purple, borne on dense spikes, and have a rich fragrance.

Fruit of Martynia proboseidea.

The calyx is divided into five sepals, and the corolla is irregularly five-lobed, and somewhat bell-shaped. The fruit is prolonged into a tapering horn-like appendage, three or four inches long, very uniformly recurved. When dry this prolongation divides laterally and looks like a pair of bull's horns of an unusual length. Martynia proboscidea has very small and very hard bone-like fruits most curiously divided and marked, and having two short and very sharp curved spines at the apex.

In the Pedaliaceae, perhaps more than in any other family, the fruits have a tendency to run off

In the genus Rogeria the into these curious forms. apex of the fruit is brought up to a very sharp point like a spike, and in addition to this some of the species have spiny projections, usually side by side near the base. On the small and comparatively flat fruits of Pretrea there are also two spines, both seated on the same side where apparently there is not the slightest use for such a protection. The queer little four-sided fruits of Pedalium murex are furnished with a sharp prickle upon each corner near the base: these fruits are three-celled, one being nearly always abortive, so that it contains only two seeds. The plant is an annual, and a native of the sea coast of Malabar, Coromandel, and Cevlon. It has a strong musky odour, and the seeds are used in India in medicine. Besides this, the plant has the very peculiar power of making water or milk mucilaginous by simply stirring it once or twice with a small branch. It is said that the butter-milk sold in the Indian markets is frequently adulterated by being mixed with water or milk, in which some part of the plant has been

Though these armed fruits at first appear abnormal and contrary to what we are accustomed to see in the vegetation of this country, yet we have examples amongst our indigenous plants, and none is more familiar than the fruit of the Thorn Apple (Datura Strammonium). It is simply four-celled, opening by four valves, the outside of the valves being covered with strong, sharp, triangular spines. The formation of these spines is analogous to those in the genus Trapa and other fruits we have mentioned. These appendages must not be looked upon generally as organs of reproduction. They have no organic functions, and their main use can only be to protect the fruit from external injury. In many winged fruits the case is different, for it is by the aid of these appendages, as with winged seeds, that they make the long aërial journeys they are known to make, and to establish themselves in new and distant soils.

We have plenty of examples of winged fruits in our own timber trees. The maple, ash, and elm, are amongst the best known. A fruit of either of these in botanical language is called a Samara, the outer covering or pericarp being extended in the form of a wing. A very similar arrange. Winged Fruit of Centrolobium ment occurs in many leguminous plants. In Centrolobium paraense, of which we give a figure, the pod, though it is from six to nine inches long, and two-and-a-half or three inches broad, bears but one seed, which is placed at one end. The pod is here covered with long sharp prickles; the upper or wing-like portion is very thin and paper-like. It does not open spontaneously. On the back near the base is a long spurred spine, and it is from the presence of this spine,—which is the style become hardened,—that the genus derives its name.

The species are all trees, natives of Brazil, Guiana, They have leaves a foot or more in length. In Pterocarpus, a genus belonging to the same family, the pods, which contain one or two seeds, are surrounded by a membraneous wing, and are in some species nearly as large and as round as a saucer. The centre where the seeds are borne is of course the thickest part, and from this point the wing gradually becomes thinner and more paperlike towards the edges. The flowers are mostly vellow, papilionaceous, that is, similar in form to the flower of the common pea. The fruits and seeds of these plants have no economic value; but the woods of several species of Pterocarpus are much prized in their native countries, and the dyewood known in commerce as Red Sander's Wood, is produced by P. santalinus. Besides this, P. erinaceus in Africa, and P. marsupium in India, yield a valuable resin called Kino, used in medicine. In an allied plant the Myrospermum Peruiferum, from which the Balsam of Peru is obtained, the fruit or pod is similarly shaped to that of Centrolobium, or perhaps it even more closely resembles that of the maple. In point of structure, however, it is very different. If we were to examine these fruits more closely we should at once see that the fruit of the maple is attracted to the stalk at the thickest or seed-bearing end, while in Myrospermum the seed is borne at the farthest end from the stalk, to which the apex of the wing is apparently attached; but instead of being a winged fruit, as one might at first suppose, it is rather a winged stalk, or a case in which the upper portion of the stalk has become winged.

Legume of Myrospermus

The most perfect, or symmetrically formed winged fruits, are to be found in the natural order Dipterocarpaceæ. The genus Dipterocarpus, itself furnishes many good examples, though the wings are present to a greater or lesser degree in nearly all the species. The plants of this order are mostly trees, natives of the islands of the Eastern Archipelago. The flowers of many species of Dipterocarpus are fragrant, and are arranged in terminal clusters; and the calyx and corolla are five-parted, and the hard woody fruits vary in size and form from that of a hazel nut to a large walnut; they are one-celled, and one-seeded by abortion. The wings, of which there are never more than two, and which rise in some instances to eight or nine inches above the fruit, are the lobes of the calvx prolonged upwards, and become leafy; the other three lobes just reach the top of the fruit, where they crumple over, and are partially covered by the wings. Though these wings appear to spring from the top of the fruit, it will be seen upon closer examination, that they become at this point simply united with the other lobes of the calyx, and form an entire covering to the fruit. In fact, the fruit seems to grow in a hollow woody globe. The extended calvx lobes or wings are arranged as nearly opposite to each other as possible, and have the form and appearance of true leaves; they are reticulated, or veined, as in ordinary leaves.

Some fine fruits of Dipterocarpus are in the Museum at Kew; the one of which we give a drawing, measures nine inches long, the fruit being two inches, and the wings seven inches, and nearly two inches wide.

The genus derives its name from the presence of these wings, the compounds of the word Dipterocarpus being dis twice, pteryx a wing, and karpos a fruit. The Dipterocarpaceæ is a valuable family in an economic point of view. Many of the trees yield a resinous balsamic juice, used in commerce and in medicine; others are valuable timber trees.

The fruits of the genus Helicteres, belonging to the natural order Sterculiaceæ, a family nearly allied to the common mallow, are composed of five carpels, but instead of being arranged in a parallel manner, or side by side, they are twisted together like a screw, and gradually taper at the apex. There is nothing remarkable in the flowers which have their parts in fives, and are borne in little clusters. Helicteres Isora, a shrub about twelve feet high, a native of Southern India, is commonly known by the name of twisted horn, or twisted stick, from the singular twisting of the fruits: the genus also derives its name from this peculiarity. The natives have a superstitious belief, founded on the form of the fruit, that it is a certain cure for colic.

Having now briefly described the most curious and irregular forms of fruits, we shall, in our next, take into consideration that interesting class of plants in which motion and sensitiveness are amongst the leading characteristics. JOHN R. JACKSON.

LIGHT IN THE DESERT.

THE deserted monastery of St. Luke stands on one of the loveliest spots in all the lovely land of Greece. It is placed on a green slope at the foot of a mountain, which rears itself almost perpendicularly towards the deep blue sky; and the welcome shade thus east round the building during the burning heat of the day, has fostered the noble trees which the monks planted close to it centuries ago, to a growth and luxuriance rarely seen in that arid climate. At no great distance are the marble quarries, whence the material was taken for the glorious temples whose white columns still stand like ghosts of the past on the far off Attic plain, and in consequence of this vicinity nearly the whole of the monastery church is of pure white alabaster. It is almost entire, excepting that the portico and west end wall have completely crumbled away, leaving the interior open to the light and air. Within, the altar still stands in its place, and the silver lamp burns before it night and day, tended by the pious hands of those who make their weekly pilgrimage from a distant village, for the sole purpose of replenishing it. The paintings on the walls have retained their colours in that pure atmosphere as fresh and bright as at the first, and the pale sweet faces of the pictured saints look out on the solitude, with the strange serenity which tells of a death agony gladly borne for the love of their ancient

Just below the ruins, a little sparkling stream of the purest water flows along with a soft murmuring song, passing from its mountain source to lose itself in the blue Ægean, of which a faint far-distant streak is seen to flash into light when the early sunshine gleams suddenly upon it, only to vanish again altogether as the dim shadows of the purple hills steal over it, and quench its brightness.

One evening in the early summer, some years ago, a man was seated on a broken column in front of that portion of the monastery which still remains entire. He was gazing round with ardent eyes, as if the beauty which surrounded him had altogether filled his soul; and well it might, for if the scene we have described is so exquisite in the full blaze of the Eastern sun, it has a loveliness which is almost unearthly, when seen as he saw it then, at the sunset hour. The soft fair tints of the dying day-purple, rose, and amber, and a thousand indescribable hues of coloured brightness-passed, ever changing as they went, over the distant gleam of sea and the olive groves that bordered it, over the mountain, with its wealth of heath and myrtle, and the white marble tracks that revealed its hidden treasures, and came to touch, with a semblance of life, the saintly faces on the old church walls; while fairer still than all that changeful harmony of tint was the perfectly cloudless sky-one stainless expanse of ethereal transparent blue, such as is never seen in a less rarified atmosphere-with a single star shining pale and pure in its midst, like a lamp hung out before the gate of heaven. Not a sound was heard in the deep hush and stillness of the hour, save the low murmuring of the stream, and the faint sweet warbling of the nightingales among the rose laurels of the mountain side.

The man had been gazing for some time with eager admiration on the tender beauty of this scene, but at last he heaved a sigh as from the fullness of content, and involuntarily spoke his thoughts aloud.

"Why should I go further, seeking that which I shall never find? Here, at least, is undisturbed solitude-intense beauty and perfect calm: it shall suffice me, for earth can offer nothing more. I am weary of wandering without aim or object; it matters nothing where my life runs out its hopeless, useless course. This green spot will give me a peaceful shelter while it lasts, and in the end it will provide me with an unknown grave."

He rose up as he spoke, with a look of settled determination on his stern strongly-marked countenance. He was an Englishman, apparently about forty years of age, with the fair complexion, light brown hair, and strong muscular figure, which so often characterise his race; but there was that on his face which told he had learnt the lesson of life in many a hard battle with the world-deep lines of pain had contracted his forehead, and wearing thought had traced dark circles round his sunken eyes, where the lurid fires of smouldering passions were lurking still.

With a bold rapid step he walked down the slope to a shady spot on the banks of the stream, where his servants had pitched his travelling tent. He had evidently all the entourage of a man of fortune. Three or four horses had brought his luggage to the spot, and the beautiful Arab which he rode himself had its special attendant in a Turkish groom, whose sole business was to minister to its wants, while two or three magnificently dressed Greeks, looking as if they had been created solely for picturesque effect, had evidently been chosen from the finest specimens of the staff of travelling servants who haunt the hotels at Athens, and make merchandise of the unwary Britons who invade Thermopylæ and Parnassus under their guidance. They were busily engaged preparing supper for their temporary master, when he suddenly appeared on a rock just above them, and called out "Dimitri," in a clear ringing voice. The principal servant, a man well known to modern travellers in Greece, instantly bounded towards him, saying with the usual Eastern salutation, "What are your commands, Mr. Sydney?" Dimitri knew haif-a-dozen languages at least, but Sydney had, on the occasion of some former residence in the East, thoroughly acquired modern Greek, and always used it in giving his orders, or conversing with the people. What he had now to say entirely surprised the imperturbable Dimitri, who was wont to declare that nothing could astonish him, because he knew everything. Mr. Syduey announced to him that he did not intend to go further, but that he should take up his abode in the ruined monastery—also, that he should remain there quite alone. Dimitri was to leave his horse, his tent, and all his possessions, and, taking the other servants with him, was to go back to the village where they had slept the night before, and make arrangements that supplies of food should be brought to him from thence at intervals.

It was from this distant village that the good people came every Saturday night to replenish the lamp in the deserted sanctuary, that its steady flame might never cease, even in that solitude, to speak of the unseen Light of the World; and it was easy to arrange that they should at the same time bring him everything he might require; further, he gave Dimitri a letter for his banker at Athens, requesting him at certain times to forward such funds as might be necessary for him in his solitary life.

Sydney checked with a word all remoustrance or expression of surprise on the part of Dimitri, who, accustomed as he was to the eccentricities of the "Milors Anglais," had never come in contact with any one quite so mad as his present master appeared to him to be. With rapid energetic utterance Sydney gave his final orders, that the party were to set out before daybreak and leave him alone; and then, still apparently intoxicated with the beauty of the scene around him, he refused to enter his tent, but flung himself down on the dry soft moss which carpeted the whole expanse beneath the trees. There he spent the night, lying on his back, with his hands below his head, watching the great stars mounting up the deep blue vault, and Orion, the glittering warrior of the skies, gliding across the heaven to lose himself in the first beams of a mightier than he.

As the summit of the myrtle-clad mountain caught the earliest flash of sunlight, Sydney turned to the wondering servants, and, with an imperious gesture of the hand, pointed out the track they were to take in obedience to his orders; and before the far-off glimpse of the Egean Sea had flashed into light under the kindling beams, the cavalcade was on its way, and Sydney was alone.

Now the previous history of this man may be told in few words—for it is by no means an uncommon one. The only child of a merchant prince who had left him a large fortune, he found himself at one-and-twenty in full possession of it, without a living relation to claim a right to advise or guide him. He was a man of ardent passions, and of a warm impulsive temperament, which led him, in spite of a mind of no common order, to seek aliment for his aspirations rather among his fellow-creatures, than from the intellectual and scientific studies for which he was well adapted by his mantal powers. His natural gifts, as well as those which fortune had lavished upon him, won him favour and adulation wherever he went, and for some time his life was spent in the strong enjoyment of all that this world can offer. Yet even in his brightest years it was not on this life that he fixed his hopes of ultimate happiness. The very fact that all earthly joys seemed given to him, brought home to his vigorous mind a deep conviction of the incompleteness of this brief existence, and of the total impossibility that anything short of immortality could satisfy man's reasonable soul with its mysterious cravings; and through all the fiery excitement and vivid action of his life, he ever looked to the future of the dead for the satisfaction of the strong yearnings of his better nature. He had not thought out the subject for himself; his existence had been too rapid and too entirely filled with sensation and enjoyment; but he had accepted the hereditary faith of his fathers with full confidence, and later in life, when two of his fellow-creatures, whom he believed to be devoted adherents of that creed, exercised an unbounded influence over him, he rested upon their belief with entire security, and evaded the mental labours and quiet thought which would have established its principles on the basis of his own internal convictions. Sydney was conscious that the life he led was not altogether consistent with this belief, but it was characterised by no love of evil, and, like many others, he contented himself with his ardeut aspirations after a sinless eternity, and left to some calmer time the task of fitting himself for it. But in the meantime, through all the hurry and passion of his manhood, that immortal hope lay like a vision of beauty among the far off sunset clouds that would close in over the evening of his life, when his little day was past and gone; and often he turned to that restful thought with earnest longing, when satiety or disappointment cast a passing shadow over his bright existence.

There were two whom Sydney had loved on earth, and it may be said two only-for he poured out on them such a flood of fierce passionate adoration, that it left no room for lesser affections in his heart: on one especially, his orphan cousin Leila, who had been betrothed to him in her very infancy, and committed wholly to his care by her father and his own. He loved her with all the terrible strength of which such a nature as his was capable, and with an exacting jealous passion which claimed her whole being as his own. It rejoiced his very heart that she was entirely dependent on him, even for the means of existence. He would have kept every glance of her eye, every tone of her voice for himself, if he could. He never doubted that she loved him in return; the idea that it could be otherwise would have driven him to frenzy, and he would have been well-nigh ready to have taken the life of any who had hinted at such a possibility. It was no marvel that his strong ardent nature clung to one so exceedingly loving and gentle as Leila. She was fair and fragile as a lily, and appeared to have a soul as stainless. Her cloudless eyes seemed ever filled with holy light; her low voice had a pathetic tone which sometimes more nearly brought him to tears than anything on earth had ever done, and the shiuing hair hung about her sweet bright face like the glory round a star. For years their wedding-day had been fixed for her seventeenth birthday by those who now lay cold in their graves, and she had grown up to look on it as an immutable decree, while none ever asked if her own heart and soul responded to the indissoluble tie.

That day drew very near at last, and the man whose office it was to give her irrevocably to him was the only other being whom Sydney loved in all the world. Ruthven had been his companion at school and college, and in his earlier travels; and when Leila's growing loveliness drew him back to settle on the estate his father had left him, he appointed his friend to the living, which gave him a residence in his own immediate vicinity. Ruthven had the face of an angel, and seemed to have the soul of a saint, so entirely did he spend himself early and late for the good of others. In him and Leila, Sydney worshipped the faith of which they were to him the representatives.

The marriage day drew near, and Sydney never noticed the dimness of unshed tears in the mournful blue eyes of his darling, or the agony deepening almost to madness in the beautiful face of Ruthven. The wedding morning dawned; the grand old house of which Sydney was master was decked with all things beautiful for its coming queen. The merry chimes rung out on the summer air, and the village children brought flowers to strew before the feet of the bride. But as Sydney stood on the terrace and looked proudly over the fair domain which in one short hour would be Leila's home, a hasty messenger came to him with a letter, thrust it in silence into his hand, and fled. The words it contained were brief, but they seemed to have burned themsclves into his brain with the first sight of them, for though he tore the paper into a thousand fragments and stamped it into the dust, yet he saw them written ever afterwards in the sky, in the air, on the sea, wherever he went :-

"Forgive—forgive—we have struggled to be true to you day by day for years—in torture, in agony, we have struggled almost to the death—in vain. Love is stronger than death; it is stronger than honour and friendship: yet it is better one should suffer than all three. Forget us, and, if you can—forgive! By the time this reaches you we shall be bound by a tie which nothing in this life shall ever break." It was signed "Leila and Ruthven."

We cannot linger to tell of the fury and despair which swept over Sydney's soul and made it desolate of all that had been life to it. Not till he had given over the house that was to have been Leila's to the hand of strangers, and placed a man whose face he had never seen in Ruthven's post, did he rightly understand what their treachery had done for him; his love was turned to hate; his hope was ashes; but, worst of all, his belief in the faith which had been theirs died out in utter darkness. If these were its fruits-if they were false-what could he think in his delirium, but that they had deceived him in that as in all else? With a vengeful hate against everything connected with them in his mind, he set himself to read every poisonous sophistry he could find against it; and hardening himself into the conviction that he had finally rejected it, he delivered himself up to vice, which more surely than aught else quenches the knowledge of that truth which is attained by the way of holiness. Ten years of this life, which he loathed even while he strove to drown in it both memory and consciousness, had brought him to the point at which we find him, when, thoroughly disgusted and wearied with a career which drove him into contact only with the worst side of human nature, and destroyed his own self-respect, he suddenly resolved to change it for a total solitude, and to seek what enjoyment he might yet be able to find in the cultivation of his own talents. He had been a painter of no mean repute in his better days, and had also been a successful author, and to these employments he now looked for the occupation of his time; while the charms of the luxurious climate, and the exquisite beauty round him, would be more worthy of the name of pleasure to him than the brutalising excitement in which he had sought it of late. But he well knew, in the depths of his inner consciousness, that none of these things could fill the hungry yearning of his heart, for some hope beyond the limits of the grave, some prospect of existence for the imperishable individuality he felt within himself, more enduring than that which was slipping from his grasp day by day.

In the deep solitude to which he now condemned himself, these thoughts acquired a power and vitality they had never possessed, even in the days when faith had cast a halo from the brightness of eternity round the transitory years of life. But, as we have said, his hope had been founded rather on the belief of those he reverenced and trusted than on an intelligent, well-considered acquiescence on his own part; and this had been too effectually killed by their falsity and his own deliberate evil-doing to be capable of revival now, without some extraneous influence being brought to bear upon his mind.

Sydney had been some weeks in his solitude, and the deep quiet had been very refreshing to him—all desire for excitement had died out of his heart, his fiery impulses were stilled, his angry passions deadened; but he hegan to feel heavily oppressed by the weight of melancholy which had settled down upon him, and often, though he would not admit it to himself, he longed for the sound of a human voice or the pressure of a friendly hand, even while his determination never to return to the world where he had so sinned and suffered, grew daily stronger.

One morning he had ridden out at that early hour when all nature is hushed under the stillness that precedes the dawn, and the sky is full of a wonderful purity of light which is only seen when starlight is merging into opening day. He had gone along the mountain side to a point where he could see the sun rearing itself up from the bosom of the distant sea, in all the unspeakable glory which surrounds its advent in the burning East. Sydney remained watching it some time till the glittering spears of light had pierced through the trees and brushwood near him, and turned to sparkling brightness the path he had traversed in deepest shadow. He was about to turn homewards when a sound, soft as the call of the dove, among the myrtles above him, caused him to start with surprise. It was the sweet low voice of a child, saying to him in Greek,

"My Lord Stranger, will you help to wake my mother?"

He turned hastily and saw at a little distance a woman seated at the foot of an olive tree, and a boy kneeling beside her with his arms round her neck.

Sydney dismounted and walked quickly towards them. The woman was dressed in the ordinary costume of an Albanian peasant, with the long white under-garment, the heavy pelisse of thick brown cloth, the red fez round which her long black hair was twisted, and the floating white veil which tends to make it so picturesque a dress. She sat apparently in deep sleep, her head sunk on her breast so that her face was concealed, and her hands clasped on her lap. As Sydney drew near the boy turned his face towards him, and the painter's eye was fascinated at once by his remarkable beauty. It was such a face as is often seen amougst the very young in Greece and sometimes also in the south of Italy, but never in more northern climates. His large brown eyes, wistful and soft as those of a young fawn, were opened wide to catch the light in a manner which gave them a special lustre; his refined features, cast in the most classic mould, were admirably in keeping with the clear olive complexion, that looked in the full sunlight like delicately tinted ivory; his brown hair, soft and wavy as that of a girl, fell back over his shoulders almost to his waist; but the peculiar charm of this childish countenance was in the look of perfect purity and innocence it wore, and the singular thoughtfulness of its expression. He seemed about thirteen years of age, and Sydney noticed that he did not wear the crimson jacket and white fustanella (or petticoat) which was the usual dress of boys of his class, but a flowing dark garment. secured by a broad purple belt, which at once marked him as a neophyte destined to the priesthood.

"I pray thee help me to wake my mother," he said, looking up with a child's confiding glance into Sydney's face.

"She seems very weary," said Sydney. "How is it that she is sleeping here on the mountain side?"

"We are journeying," said the child, "from our home to Athena, where I am going to enter the seminary that I may learn to be a papas (priest). We thought to have reached the next village last night, but I was tired, and the air was warm, so my little mother said we could sleep well at the foot of this tree, and we did; but now I cannot wake her, and it is strange, for her eyes are never shut when the sun rises."

Sydney went forward and touched the woman's hand: as he did so he started in dismay, for it was cold with the unmistakeable chill of death. At the same time the cause of so sudden a calamity revealed itself, for his movement had disturbed a large snake which had twined itself round the foot of the sleeper; and as with a low hiss it reared its cruel head and glided away, Sydney saw that it was of a most venomous kind, whose bite was instantaneously He had often heard of similar accidents occurring to the peasants when at work among the vineyards or olive groves, and from the appearance of the unfortunate woman, he guessed that the deadly reptile had been concealed amongst the roots of the tree when she first sat down, and had bitten her while she slept, so that her slumber had passed secretly and silently into that deeper sleep from which she was to wake no more. The boy noticed the snake, as it slowly dragged its glistening coils from the spot where his mother sat.

"Oh! the serpent! the dreadful serpent!" he cried out; "do not let it go near my mother, it will bite her—it will kill her!" and he clung to the stranger in his terror. Sydney passed his arm round him with a tenderness of which he would hardly have been supposed capable from the habitual sternness of his expression.

"My child," he said, "I fear it has bitten her already."

"Then she will die!" exclaimed the boy in a passion of tears. "Let me go-let me go!" and, bursting from Sydney's grasp, he flew to his dead mother, and flung his arms round her, while he called on her to wake by the poetical endearing terms which are in habitual use among the Greek peasants. "My little mother-my life-my light-my thricebeloved!" he exclaimed imploringly; but the lips on whose accents he had so often hung were locked in inexorable silence, and when he found his fondest words in vain, he clasped her in his arms and kissed her with passionate love. Then, as the iey chill of the marble face met his own, a faint half-stifled cry escaped him. His arms relaxed their hold, his lips grew white, and he sunk on the ground in a deep swoou. Sydney stood for a moment gazing on the mother and son, who now seemed almost equally lifeless, while he thought over the best course to be pursued under such strange circumstances. The poor woman had been dead some time, and he knew that, according to the necessary custom of the country, her burial ought to take place within twenty-four hours of her death. Finally, he decided on conveying the child at once to the monastery, where he could place him in safety, while he himself rode to the nearest village to obtain assistance in removing the corpse. He lifted up the boy without attempting to awaken him from his merciful unconsciousness, and, placing him on his horse in front of him, he went off full gallop towards his solitary home.

The rapid motion and the current of air it produced, gradually roused the child from his faintness, and by the time Sydney dismounted at the door of the monastery, the beautiful eyes were gazing round with a bewildered look, which showed that the orphan had not yet regained consciousness of his misfortune. Very gently Sydney carried him into his own room, and laid him down on the bed; then he gave him some wine, into which he poured a mild opiate, and told the child that he had been ill and must go to sleep. With perfect docility the boy closed his eyes to obey, but, suddenly opening them again, he said, "My mother—where is my mother?"

"She is asleep," said Sydney, "You shall see her when you wake." And the child, who seemed of a singularly gentle and confiding disposition, made no further remark, and gradually he yielded to the effect of the soporific, and fell into a profound slumber. Sydney locked the door of the room and at once hastened to the village, where his sad tale soon roused the impulsive Greek peasants, and sent them off, headed by their priest, in quest of the poor dead woman. Sydney took them to the spot, and then leaving them to come slowly onward with their sad burden, he hastened back to his living charge.

The child still slept, and it was not till towards evening that he woke. Then Sydney gave him some food, and as consciousness had quite returned, he was obliged to answer his eager inquiries and let him remember the sad truth as to his loss. Once more there was a passionate burst of grief—even in this peculiarly gentle child the fiery Eastern nature asserted itself in fierce convulsions of sorrow, such as are rarely seen among the phlegmatic races of the north; but suddenly, in the very midst of his wildest anguish, he stopt short, made the sign of the cross on breast and brow, and looking up with his sweet candid eyes into Syduey's face, he said—

"Am I not wrong to grieve? If my little mother is dead, she is in Paradise, is she not?"

"I hope so, my child," said Sydney, smiling sadly at finding himself appealed to on such a point.

"Then she is blest," said the boy, his childish face settling into a calm solemnity. "It is beautiful in Paradise—all holy ones are there, and they have light and refreshment evermore. She will not want Ireneaus in that lovely home; but when the Angel Athanatos (Death) shall call me, too, away, then she will stand at the Gate of Pearls and watch for me, and I shall take her hand and enter in, and we shall walk together by the river of life among the flowers that never fade. I will weep no more." And, dashing the tears from his eyes, he turned with a bright smile to his astonished host.

"Who taught you all this, Ireneaus?" asked

Sydney.

"The Papas of our village; and when I told it all to my little mother, I asked her to let me be a Papas, too, that I might speak to others of the fair Paradise and show them how to reach it; but I shall not like to go to the seminary now," he added more sadly, "when my mother can never see me there. She was going to live in Athena, that she might be near me, and she would have come to me on every festa day."

Before Sydney could reply, there came a soft sound, musical but exceeding sorrowful, floating in through the open archway of the monastery, which he recognised as the wailing death-chant of the Eastern Church. It is a sound which can never be forgotten by those who once have heard it rising up through the clear air, as it heralds the approach of the dead, on whose unveiled face the sunshine falls with pitying light.

There are no signs of mourning or gloom at an Eastern funeral. The silent sleeper lies in his festal garments, with flowers in his hand, and the laurel crown on his brow, in token of conquest over life and all its tyranny, and yet the wail of the priests' voices, as they walk before him, pleading for the departed soul in that solemn old chant, has power to stir the very innermost depths of sadness in all who hear it. Ireneaus trembled from head to foot as the mournful music met his ear, and grew each moment softly louder, while the funeral procession wound along the mountain side towards them, but making once more the holy sign, he rose up and went out. Sydney followed. They turned towards the quiet green spot at the back of the monastery. where, under the shade of the tall trees, the monks' last resting-place had been made only a little more silent, a little more indomitably calm than that which they had already sought out for themselves in their living home. From this point Sydney and Ireneaus could watch the slow, solemn approach of the dead, as the train moved along the rocky path, now hidden by the olive trees, now appearing again with the last rays of the setting sun bathing the whole scene in softest light. They had made a rude bier of olive branches, on which the mother of Ireneaus lay. No wasting sickness had touched her still youthful beauty with decay, before the one fatal sting had poisoned the source of life, and she looked very levely as she lay there in her marvellous serenity, with a wreath of rose laurel which the peasants had twined for her, crowning the masses of her long brown hair. The priest walked in front of her-his dark garments and black crape veil the only sombre objects of the scene-and still the death-chant rose and fell and floated away on the sighing night breeze, till it was lost among the echoes of the mountain caves.

They bore their silent burden into the ruined church, and laid her down before the altar till the peasants had dug a grave for her beneath the spreading branches of a large oak tree. When it was ready, with solemn words of prayer, unchanged from the old apostolic days, they laid her softly down in it to rest till time should be no more. At her feet they placed the corn and wine, symbolic of the sacramental elements which had planted the germ of resurrection life in her cold form, and then all was ready to close up the tomb, and hide her for ever from the eyes of human love. But there was one last ceremony to be performed—the most touching and beautiful surely of all the customs that could be used at the burial of the dead. They bade Ireneaus call upon his mother to hear and answer him, with every endearing term his passionate affection could suggest, for they felt that if the motionless sleeper responded not to the voice of the being she had loved best on earth, then it was certain she was dead indeed, and meet for the grave, to which she must needs be so speedily consigned. Ireneaus obeyed-kneeling by the open tomb with hands outstretched over the silent breast on which he had pillowed his young head so long, he called on her in piteous imploring accents:

"Oh! mother mine—oh! mother, thrice beloved, light of my eyes, come back, come back to me. Ireneaus calls! Oh! hear my voice, sweet mother, mine." In vain—there was no response from the white lips locked over the mysteries of death—no answering cry from the heart that could beat no more, even with a nother's burning love. "Tclos," said the priest, "all is over." He made the sign of the cross over the quiet face of the dead, then reverently covered it with the folds of her long white veil. At a word from him the peasants performed the last office, and closed the grave, replacing the green turf over it, so that there remained no indication that another of earth's children had sought a refuge in her breast.

After a few moments of silence, the priest took Ireneaus by the hand and led him away. The child turned, however, towards Sydney, with a wistful look, and held out his arms towards him. A sudden inpulse moved the Euglishman: he hurriedly followed the priest and said, "What is to become of this child?"

"I know not, indeed," replied the old man. "He is quite an orphan now, friendless and homeless. His father died some years ago, and his mother was a native of Yanina, a stranger in our village."

"Give him to me," said Sydney, impulsively, "and let him be my psycho paithi" (soul's child).

Ireneaus gave a faint cry of delight at these words.

"But he was to have been a Papas of our church," said the priest, hesitatingly.

"And so he shall be, if he still wishes it when he is of age to decide," said Sydney. "In the meantime I can teach him all he would have learned at the seminary, at least for the first few years. He can go there when it is needful he should be taught the office books and doctrines of the Orthodox."

The old priest was propitiated by Sydney's use of this last appellation, which the members of the Eastern Church claim as their exclusive right.

"Are you willing to take this stranger for your soul's father, my child?" he said to Ireneaus.

"Yes! yes!" exclaimed the boy. "He has been kind to me, this stranger, and he lives where my mother sleeps. I will stay here with him."

"Then, in the name of Heaven, take him!" said the priest, as he placed the child's hand in Sydney's, and laying the end of his stole over both, pronounced them father and son in the Spirit. Half-an-hour later, the old priest and the peasants disappeared over the mountain side on their way home to their native village, and Ireneaus lay sleeping in innocent security, with his head pillowed on Sydney's arm.

It was ten long years since Sydney had loved anything on earth. The sources of human affection had been burned up in his heart by the treachery which had perverted his whole being; but now the confiding love of the friendless child unlocked the sealed fountains once again, and the passionate tenderness of his nature flowed forth freely on the newmade son of his soul. Ireneaus was in truth a child well calculated to awaken affection-one of those rarely gifted children on whom mothers look with trembling, because the powers of thought beyond their years which they possess, too often prove the precursors of their early removal to a more congenial sphere. This boy's whole thoughts and fancies centered in the Paradise of saints above: he seemed to have no desire in all his day-dreams but for a speedy entrance to that sinless realm. He talked of it continually, only varying the theme by repeating the stories he had heard of those who, in the early ages of the faith, had been caught up thither in the fiery chariot of martyrdom.

All the beauty around him was to him a source of pure delight, because he held it to be but a faint reflection of the far more glorious leveliness that would dawn on the eyes unsealed by immortality. All things spoke to him of the love of God, and he loved in return with happy unquestioning truth, which only deepened as his mind matured and his intellect expanded under the skilful teaching of his adopted father. He was a strange companion for the sin-worn man who believed himself an Atheist. But, unconsciously to Sydney himself, as time wore on, the child's pure faith seemed to shed a peaceful light over his weary soul, which was neither conscious belief nor hope, and yet soothed him with a dim semblance of the calm that springs from both.

Gradually, however, the child, who seemed to have come to him from heaven, assumed a more awful and absorbing interest in his eyes. It appeared as if Ireneaus's ardent longing for the sorrowless land, were wearing away the mortal clay which hindered his entrance there, and kindling a flame within his soul which was burning out all that was earthly in his nature. Day by day the bright face grew more spiritualised, the large clear eyes more full of light, the small white hands so often upraised to the glowing heaven of his hopes became almost transparent, and soon his weakness was so great that Sydney had to carry him from place to place like an infant.

spiritual powers grew and matured; his thoughts had a marvellous depth; his words a strange wisdom; and soon it was, as it were, the soul of a man which was departing from the body of a child. Ireneaus became Sydney's unconscious teacher, and truths undreamt of before dawned on the man's powerful mind, as he listened to the faith which was love. Strangest of all to him seemed the boy's rapturous delight in dying, and the increasing vigour of his intellect as he drew swiftly nearer to the grave. Death did not seem a word applicable to a change in which the mental powers brightened and strengthened with each step of its approach. Many doubts began to assail Sydney in his stronghold of unbelief: he no longer asked himself if immortality were possible, but rather if it were conceivable that this marvellous increase of spiritual strength could culminate in annihilation. There were moments when it seemed to him folly to suppose that the evanescent life of that weak mortal frame was to be the sole existence of the strong bright soul that hourly rose triumphant over it.

At last there came a night when Sydney mournfully watched the pallid sleeper as he lay, with the dews of death upon his fair calm brow, and with the breath ever passing fainter over his white lips, smiling even in sleep. As the dawn approached, calling into life the fragrance of the air, the beauty of the flowers, the roseate tinted hues on mountain and on plain, Ireneaus started from his slumber with rapturous brightness in his eyes, "Oh joy! oh joy!" he cried out, in a clear glad voice, "the glorious hour is come, and I go to my home-my home! I have heard the voices calling to me in the night. I have seen the radiant faces. Take me out, dear father, to see the sunrise, for I shall rise with it to immortal day!" Sydney lifted him up and bore him outhe laid him on a bed of moss by the streamlet's brink -and straightway, up to the purple vault where gleamed a myriad stars, paling before the dawn, the dying bey's large eyes were turned, as if his clear and piercing gaze saw far into its unseen depths. With parted lips, with labouring breath, while eager joy and expectation brightened on his face, he watched and waited; and when at length the glorious rays shot up behind the mountain summit, and the ascending sun flooded the earth with morning splendour, a glory and a light yet purer kindled on the fair sweet face. He lifted up his hands, and with his dying voice breathed out the strong words ef his mighty hope, "It has come-it has comethe day eternal! and my life, passing from night to morning, dawns perfect, pure, immortal. Now shall I see the endless glories of creation, the worlds rolling round the feet of God; the stars, each one a universe, marshalled at His call in glittering array, and all the souls that have ever breathed the breath of life living unto Him in deathless existence." But suddenly, even while he spoke, some sight unseen by Sydney checked his rapid utterance; his eyes opened wide with a look of wonder, while his whole face became transfigured by unspeakable rapture and delight, and as the failing powers of life sunk finally to their last effort, he murmured softly, "Oh love-love infinite-love eternal!" and sinking back upon his bed of moss he yielded up his soul, with the words yet on his lips. And slowly the proud, defiant, independent man, who had stood immoveable to see him expire, sunk down upon his knees beside the dead, and gazed into the eyes that still-wide open-seemed to pierce into the unseen. He laid his fingers ou the pulse that throbbed no more, and over the heart whose beating at length was still; he kissed the cold pale face that felt not his caress, and he saw that now, in one second of time, the tremendous mystery had been accomplished, which transformed the living, thinking, sentient being, glowing with hope and rapture, into a soulless mass of clay. Then the conviction fell upon him with resistless power, that death was not, could not be, annihilation; that the spiritual being, the living ego with which his own living spirit had been holding intercourse a moment before, had not in that instantaneous quitting of the body become extinct, a useless act of God's creation -unfinished work of His mighty hand - which had entered into existence only to abide for a brief space of time aimless and incomplete, and then pass away into void and nothingness. That instinctive faith in immortality which most surely co-exists in every soul with the very consciousness of life, struggled through the mass of specious reasoning and false conclusions with which he had overlaid it, and blazed forth triumphant again in that light which neither the darkness of error nor the mysteries of death can ever really destroy; and that moment, with its indomitable conviction, was to Sydney as truly a resurrection to spiritual life as that which awaited the corpse at his feet. With faith came hope and love, uplifting the soul, so long despairing and wretched, to its true place as the heir of immortality, the beloved of the Creator, the destined participator in a life of knowledge, wisdom, and purity, to which this dawn of existence, as we know it on the earth, is but what the dim morning twilight is to the blaze of noon. What need to tell how truth, re-established on her throne within that soul, energized it to live worthily of its immortal destiny: how, when he had laid the sleeping Ireneaus by his mother's side, Sydney went back into the world to do his part in furthering the consummation of love, peace, and purity, to which the whole purpose of creation tends: how his first act was to seek out Ruthven and Leila, amid the poverty and suffering to which his revengeful neglect had consigned them, and heap upon them every benefit which could bring them happiness, with the assurance of his perfect pardon: and how in hope he lived and in hope he died. witness to that truth which others beside himself have tested, that in the very coldness, silence, and inanimation of death lies the visible argument for the soul's immortality!

THE CAMPAGNA OF ROME.

WHO calls the broad Campagna drear,-His eyes are dull! his heart is cold! In every season of the year Her beauty is unthought, untold; But chiefest when the April showers Come brightly down and wake the flowers!

Athwart the classic Sabine hills The high white clouds come sailing on; With sudden gloom each valley fills; A moment-and 'tis gone! And o'er the vast enamell'd plain The shadow sweeps and fades again.

Flung like a chain from mile to mile, Erect the Appian arches stand, Like Roman knights in stately file Drawn out to guard the land. The long-horn'd cattle stand and gaze Beneath them; dumb with mild amaze.

Beside an ancient Norman Tower Built in the yesterday of Rome, A maid from vonder mountain bower To meet her love has come; And listens to the tender words Of him who keeps the flocks and herds.

On every side the asphodel Grow thick as on the plains of Troy; How bright is every bud and bell About the girl and boy! How sweet the voice of Nature sings To ears that count but twenty springs !

Yet these, the children of the soil, Who never knew a paler sky, Whose hands are scarcely touch'd by toil, Whose sunlit hours unheeded fly; Whose worst of hardship leaves them fair, With those bright eyes, that shining hair; Whose griefs allow them voice to sing And feet to dance and lips to pray! Can they be thankful for the Spring As we, who, on the Aurelian Way, First see that far grey curve, -the Dome Which rises o'er imperial Rome!

This is the Land by all beloved,-Which all in several ways desire. For me, my inmost heart is moved, And lit as by interior fire Of tenderness, when I but dream Of Her who sits by Tiber's stream.

And of the plain where Tiber sweeps And broadens to the sea-girt west. And fragrant woods where Silence sleeps Beside her bright unfurrowed breast, Pine shaded, while each grassy glen Brims o'er with purple cyclamen.

No more the nymphs and naiads play Together on the haunted shore; In yonder wave the god of day With Dian's Bow contends no more: Nor shadowy Trojan vessels glide Whitesail'd against the golden tide.

But Ostia's empty tombs that lie In flowery fields beside the stream, And temples roofless to the sky, And ancient fortress towers that seem Forgotten by all human things, And changeless through a thousand Springs, -

These are the themes that meet the sight And thrill the spiritual ear-To painter's memory always bright, To poet's muse for ever dear-And make this land a place apart— The Threshold of the World of Art!

JOHANNA CHANDLER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "QUAKER PHILANTHROPY."

In no country in the world, not even excepting America (and that is saying a great deal), are good works held in higher estimation than in England. The number of energetic and praiseworthy philanthropists to be found among us is far greater than even we ourselves have any idea of. From our unfortunate national tendency to hero-worship, we know the names, and are acquainted with the deeds of some few individuals who are indeed worthy of all honour; but in the worship we offer them, we Many of the most useful and important of our are too apt to set aside or ignore the services of public institutions not only originated with women, many who, from the nature and extent of their good | but have been conducted with singular courage and deeds, are as much to be admired as those whose names have become in our mouths as household words. This habit appears to us unjust, specially to women. Works of purely private charity, we are perfectly ready to admit, should not have publicity given to them, nor should those who do good by stealth be made to blush by finding it fame. But the philauthropic efforts of English women are by no means confined to acts of private charity.

ability by some whose names are scarcely known to the public, which is yet vastly benefited by their labours. One of the most noticeable of these is undoubtedly Miss Johanna Chandler.

Miss Chandler was one of a family of several orphan children, who were brought up under the care of their grandparents. About fifteen years ago, her grandmother left her home on a visit. She returned to it in a few days; but how great was the change which had taken place in the interim! She had left her home a hale, active, clear-minded woman, of remarkably strong will; she was carried back to it struck down by paralysis, and utterly helpless. The sight of the relative they had so lately taken leave of in such vigour, both of mind and body, and who had returned to them suffering so severely, had a great and painful effect, both on Johanna Chandler and her sister Louisa, since deceased. They felt deeply grieved for her misfortune, but their sorrow was not of that morbid kind which, feeding on itself, is content with pitying the While sympathising deeply with their grandmother, they exerted themselves physically to render the invalid every attention and relief in their power, so as to reduce to its minimum the pain of the stroke which had fallen on her. And to a great extent they succeeded. They soon saw that by good nursing and incessant care, the old lady received great benefit. While employed in these duties, they were led to think of the amount of discomfort and fatigue a case of paralysis or epilepsy must entail on a poor family, and also of the misery which must accrue to the afflicted person, from the inability of those surrounding him to offer the required attentions, irrespective of the heavy expense, both of time and labour, such an affliction must occasion.

Miss Chandler had soon an opportunity of testing by actual experiment the idea she had formed as to the heavy burden a case of paralysis or epilepsy must be in a poor man's family. An operative carpenter had been stricken down by paralysis; his only nurse was his wife, and she was almost dying of consumption at the time. These poor people had heard that Miss Chandler's grandmother had been afflicted with the same disease, and they sent to ask her for a little advice and assistance in their strait. Without hesitation, Miss Chandler visited the poor man's home, and a sad scene it was that presented itself to her on entering. In a small back room, hardly large enough to contain a bedstead and a few necessary articles of furniture, a poor woman lay suffering acutely in the last stage of consumption. Her husband, a man in the prime of life, was helplessly stricken with paralysis, having lost the entire use of his right side; while a group of four small children looked pitifully at their parents. The family were in a state of the most distressing poverty. In their need, they had applied to the parish for assistance, and the parish in reply had offered them admission to the House, possibly with the certainty that it would be refused.

At all events such was the case, for they preferred starving to being separated from each other. Miss Chandler assisted them to the best of her ability, and called on them frequently afterwards. One evening, however, a few days after her first visit, she found that death had relieved the poor woman from her sufferings. Miss Chandler, in a note she made on the occasion, says, "Mentally, I repeated, 'These are they who came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

The funeral over, Miss Chandler attempted to relieve the miseries of the bereaved family, and especially those of the husband. She applied to several hospitals and other charitable institutions for his admission as an in-patient; but to her great surprise, grief, and indignation, she found there was not one in the metropolis which would receive cases of the kind. "Although," she writes, "there are charities in London for the relief of almost every class of human affliction, yet the sufferings of the paralysed have been most strangely overlooked; and with that thought came the strong resolve that, God helping me, I would devote my life in endcavouring to supply this great want."

Although the infirm health of her grandmother prevented her for a time from making any very energetic attempts to carry out her resolve, it was never for a moment absent from Miss Chandler's mind, and she and her sister Louisa frequently employed themselves in sketching out the plan of operations they should follow when they should have the opportunity. The time at last arrived, and the two ladies set themselves to work with all that energy and single-mindedness which women so often display when occupied in any work of mercy they have determined to carry out. Never for a moment did they lose sight of the object they had in view, or allow any extraneous circumstance or temptation to divert them from it. Their first necessity was of course money; but how to raise it was indeed a difficult question. Although of a highly respectable family, they could hardly be considered in affluent circumstances; yet they resolved that energy alone should not be their contribution to the cause, and they took from their own resources the sum of two hundred pounds as a nucleus for the fund they proposed raising. was this done without difficulty, for to accomplish it they deprived themselves of many comforts they might have otherwise enjoyed. They now began to appeal publicly to the benevolent for aid, but without the slightest good effects attending their efforts. Greatly disappointed, but not discouraged, they then resolved to address letters to all the leading philanthropists of the day, for the purpose of eliciting their patronage and support for the proposed charity. They received a great variety of replies to their letters; some approving of the object they had in view, and others objecting. Many thought the idea a good one, but wished to have no trouble in the matter. Some praised them highly, but nobody promised or offered a shilling to assist them. Still they resolved to persevere; but an unexpected trouble arose. The youngest sister's health gave way under the accumulation of fatigue and anxiety, and she was declared to be in a hopeless state of consumption.

It was now five years since Miss Chandler had first determined on raising an hospital, for the relief of the paralysed and epileptic; but beyond the money she and her sister had themselves subscribed, and a certain amount of notoriety which had accrued from their unceasing efforts, the realisation of the object they had in view seemed as far distant as at first. Suddenly, however, the "little cloud" which had at first appeared no larger than a man's hand, began to expand. Miss Chandler, when almost in despair, received one morning a letter from the Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Wire) requesting to see her at the Mansion House concerning her proposed institution for the paralysed and epileptic. At this interview he remarked that he knew from personal experience that much could be done for the relief and cure of paralysis, as he himself had suffered from that malady. He promised her that he would not only give the undertaking his support as well as receive subscriptions for it, but that he would also preside at a public meeting which he proposed should be held at the Mansion House.

It is needless to attempt a description of the effect this kind offer of Alderman Wire had on the mind and heart of Miss Chandler. In warm terms she expressed her gratitude to him for his sympathy in the cause in which she was so deeply interested, and she then hurried home to inform her brother, sister, and friends, of the change which one short interview with a benevolent and influential gentleman had made in prospects which the most sanguine among them had begun to consider hopeless. Arrangements had now to be made by them for the public meeting, the Lord Mayor having left the order of the proceedings to be settled by Miss Chandler. Letters innumerable were written to persons likely to take an interest in the cause, inviting their attendance, and advertisements were drawn up and inserted in the public papers. All the family circle as well as some of their intimate friends worked unremittingly in making preparations for the forthcoming event, in order that nothing might be wanting to ensure its success. Even poor Louisa Chandler, whose hopeless condition was now fully known both to herself and her family, insisted on taking part in the labour along with the others, sealing and directing letters, and assisting them in every way in her power.

The day for the public meeting was now rapidly drawing near; but even before it arrived Miss Chandler received an earnest of the success which was shortly to attend her. Miss Burdett Coutts having seen the advertisements for the public meeting in the papers, wrote to the Lord Mayor request-hospital, and she was so pleased with the answers she received that she immediately sent him a cheque for one hundred pounds towards the building fund. promising him, in the same letter, a subscription of fifty pounds a year for the first five years after the hospital should be opened for the reception of patients.

On the morning of the public meeting Miss Chandler and her brother left their home to attend it with feelings which it would be difficult to describe. Their sister Louisa, who, under the stimulus of the mental exertion she had lately experienced. had appeared in somewhat better health, had that morning suffered so severe a relapse that her life for some hours was almost despaired of. True, she had partially recovered when the time for the meeting drew near; but more than once during the day's proceedings a terrible fear crossed the minds of both brother and sister as to the condition they should find her in on their return home. for the meeting itself, it was a perfect success. The Lord Mayor, from the chair, put to the meeting a resolution to the effect that a National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic should be established in the metropolis, and it was carried unanimously. Various other resolutions were also proposed and carried, and among them one accepting the services of E. H. Chandler, Esq., the brother of Miss Johanna. as honorary secretary, -an office, the duties of which he has continued to fulfil with noremitting earnestness and ability. Before the meeting separated the Lord Mayor had the satisfaction of announcing that. subscriptions exceeding eight hundred pounds had already been received by him in aid of the institution, and he added that he should have much pleasure in taking charge of any sums which might be forwarded to him for the same purpose.

The meeting over, Miss Chandler and her brother returned home with feelings of a singularly mixed description. While more than satisfied with the success of the day's operations, their anxiety as to the condition in which they might find their sister was very great. Fortunately their alarm was for the moment dispelled when they entered, for they found Louisa somewhat better, though they rightly feared that the improvement they saw in her was in no small degree to be accounted for by the excitement of her eagerness to know the result of the meeting. Johanna narrated to her the good fortune which had attended them. "Thank God," said the dying girl, "thank God! May the success which has now begun to attend your exertions prove a consolation to you when I am gone." Louisa Chandler lived only a few days afterwards. The public meeting at the Mansion House was held on the 2nd of November, 1859, and she expired on the 22nd day of the same month.

The name of the new hospital having been determined on, it now remained to provide or find a building in which it could be established. This was a difficult matter, but at last a house was found ing further particulars respecting the proposed situated in Queen's Souare, Bloomsbury which appeared in every way admirably adapted to the purpose. Not only was the main building most commodious, but it had also an adjunct of two very large rooms in the rear, which, with perfect facility, could be arranged for wards. In the month of May, 1860, a meeting was held in the building, and the hospital was declared open. With the energy and kind feeling habitually shown by the medical profession, in furthering all good works intended to relieve the physical misfortunes of their fellowcreatures, a most efficient staff of physicians of eminence (especially those experienced in the diseases of paralysis and epilepsy) enrolled themselves as the medical officers of the institution, and a vast number of out-patients soon flocked to them for advice and assistance. In the meantime the work of furnishing the wards progressed rapidly, or at least as much so as the limited finances of the charity would allow; for although fresh subscriptions continued to flow in, they hardly yet were sufficient to do all the good the benevolent promoters desired. A short time after the opening of the hospital the first ward (for women) was opened, and as a graceful compliment to the Misses Chandler it was called "The Sisters' Ward."

In June, 1860, the first in-patient was admitted into the hospital. The poor woman, when she found herself alone in the large ward, burst into tears, so depressing was the feeling of loneliness which came over her. She was comforted, however, by the assurance that she would soon have many companions, and the promise was kept to the letter. During the first year of its existence, the hospital was the means of doing a vast amount of good; so much so, in fact, that its reputation in consequence became fully established. During that period the President of the Committee (Mr. Alderman Wire) had been unceasing in his efforts to promote the prosperity of the institution. When the first anniversary festival was held, he was unfortunately absent from ill health. Miss Chandler sent him a letter of congratulation on the success of an enterprise which had received such excellent support at his hands. The letter was read to him, and he expressed his great satisfaction at its contents. He was too unwell at the moment to dictate an answer: and three days afterwards this good man was no more.

The promoters of the charity had originally determined on having a mixed board of management, composed of ladies and gentlemen. Objections were, however, raised to this plan, and it was resolved the institution should be worked by two separate committees—one of gentlemen, who should superintend the general economy and police of the hospital; the other of ladies, who should control the domestic arrangements, including the nursing, the latter, of course, under the direction of the medical officers. To this committee Miss Johanna Chandler was appointed honorary secretary, the duties of which office, although suffering from great weakness of constitution, she has admirably fulfilled to the present time. A more devoted sisterhood than this little band of ladies have proved themselves could not be named. With the liberality of our Protestant institutions they have maintained a discipline and organisation which could not have been surpassed by any sisterhood in the Roman Catholic Church. It may here be mentioned that their ministrations and duties bear a strong resemblance to that excellent Roman Catholic charity, "The Little Sisters of the Poor." Although they are far from having yet obtained the extensive organisation of the Roman Catholic sisterhood-indeed, on that point no comparison can be drawn between themin proportion to their numbers they have been equally a blessing to those under their charge. Unlike the lady patronesses of too many of our charities, the committee of ladies attached to this hospital do not content themselves with giving it the prestige of their names, and possibly paying it occasionally a formal visit; they not only personally superintend the arrangements, but bestow on it no small amount of practical exertion as well. They are also the administrators of a Samaritan fund. and a Pension fund attached to the charity; the whole of the money raised for these purposes being obtained by their energy as canvassers. These most useful adjuncts to the hospital, notwithstanding all the exertions of those ladies, are still far in arrear of the necessities they are intended to alleviate. Possibly no class of disease requires more assistance in a pecuniary way than those for which this charity was intended, or causes a greater drain on the limited resources of the poor patients and their families. Another branch, and a most useful one too, is also under the direction of these ladies. From the nature of their complaints, paralytic and epileptic patients not only require a continued supply of warm clothing, but, in the latter case especially, they are speedily worn out. To meet this want, the ladies, by application among their personal friends, succeeded in obtaining a large amount of clothing, though by no means equal to the need. In winter, also, the Samaritan fund enables them to a considerable extent to supply the outpatients with coals, blankets, and other articles necessary for the season. It may perhaps appear invidious to name one of these ladies in preference to the others, where all are equally benevolent and energetic; still, as on the occasion of a recent visit we paid to the institution, we were so struck with the activity and solicitude displayed by one we met there (Miss Bevington), that we may consider ourselves fully justified in offering her as a type of the rest. Of the gentlemen's committee, beyond stating that their duties are most efficiently performed, we shall not speak, the object of our paper being solely to show the value of well-regulated female co-operation in the promotion of charitable undertakings.

officers. To this committee Miss Johanna Chandler was appointed honorary secretary, the duties of which office, although suffering from great weakness of constitution, she has admirably-fulfilled to the present time. A more devoted sisterhood than venience; and more beds were required for the in-patients. As the expense which would attend the necessary enlargement of the premises would be very great, and as to lay out the money required on a building held only on a yearly tenancy would be improvident, it was resolved to purchase the freehold. To do this, however, a further sum of two thousand pounds was required. The labour of raising this amount was undertaken without hesitation by Miss Chandler and the ladies' committee. Having succeeded in obtaining the money, they eulisted the services of Mr. M. P. Manning, an eminent architect, to advise them on the desired alterations. This gentleman soon decided that the space in the building was insufficient for the accommodation proposed. At this juncture the board of management heard that the freehold of the adjoining house was for sale; but how to procure the money to purchase it, was indeed a difficult problem to solve. Johanna Chandler and her little band of lady helpers, were, however, by no means dismayed at the difficulty which had appeared so formidable to the gentlemen's committee. They set themselves resolutely to work, and through their agency the sum of fifteen hundred pounds was, in a short time, added to the funds of the hospital. Not content with their success, the ladies now applied themselves to raise the money for the required alterations, as well as for the purchase of new furniture; and through their canvassing alone the object was accomplished. The whole expenditure, including the cost of the freehold, with the alterations and furniture, amounting altogether to something more than six thousand pounds, was obtained directly or indirectly through the agency of Miss Chandler and the ladies' committee-a result which furnishes no mean proof of the value of female co-operation in works of public benevolence.

The new hospital is now completed, and a more admirable specimen of human ingenuity applied to the relief of suffering, it would be difficult to imagine. Every mechanical appliance which could advantageously be brought into action to cure the patient, or mitigate his sufferings, has been provided for him with most praiseworthy foresight and liberality. Not only are there in every ward the ordinary warm and cold baths, but on the basement floor are to be found baths of every conceivable variety, including Douche, Turkish, Vapour, Pin, and Sulphur. Round the fire-place in each ward is constructed a broad and high fender, to prevent any poor patient, who may have been suddenly struck by an epileptic fit, from falling into the fire. For the use of the paralysed are wheeled chairs of every description. Electricity now being much used as a curative power, both in paralytic and epileptic cases, an electrical room of large dimensions has been fitted up, which contains, perhaps, the finest electrical apparatus in Europe. Gymnasiums, both for male and female patients, have also been provided. In these are not only dumb-bells, Indian clubs, and other simple instruments, but every apparatus which can tend to develope the muscular power of the particular part or limb affected. In the practice of these gymnastics, of course the greatest caution is necessary to keep the patient, instead of obtaining benefit, from inflicting injury on himself, from accident, or misapplication of the special movement required. To prevent any occurrence of the kind, the whole of the gymnastic rooms are placed under the control of Mr. J. N. Radcliffe, F.R.C.S., the medical superintendent of the hospital, who directs the particular exercise applicable to the patient's case. We believe there is no other hospital in England which has a gymnasium attached to it. In Paris there are two or three; but a difference exists between these and the gymnasium in Queen's Square. In Paris, the gymnastic exercises are of the general description used by persons in health, while those under the control of Mr. Radcliffe are solely applicable to the disease they are intended to alleviate. The wards are large, lofty, and well ventilated. In this hospital may also be noticed another improvement, for which the patients are entirely indebted to the ladies' committee. Knowing full well how great a relief it is to the mind of a convalescent patient to quit, at least for some hours in the day, the room in which he has slept, a large, commodious, and well-furnished dayroom is attached to every ward. There is in every day-room a good library, and in some of the female wards pianos even-many of the female patients being ladies of good education, though in distressed circumstances. The walls, not only of the sittingrooms, but of the wards, are also hung with admirable prints in great profusion, principally Scripture subjects. In fact, everything that ingenuity could suggest, and kindness and goodwill perform or provide for the welfare of this particular class of patients, may be seen here.

Let us now point the moral of our tale. We started with the intention of showing how powerful is the co-operation of women in all good works. That philanthropic idea, which some twelve years since entered the mind of Johanna Chandler, has now, under God's blessing, resulted in one of the most useful and admirable charities in the country; and all this has been effected by the energy, common sense, and charitable feeling of a small band of women, who devoted themselves to the cause in good fellowship, and without jealousy one of another. Again, in the success of the National Hospital for Paralysis and Epilepsy, our lady readers may find another lesson-namely, how easy it is for them to obtain the affectionate and respectful co-operation of men, when the object they engage in is really useful and practicable. Thanks to the direct energy of women, with assistance from meu, this charity is acknowledged to be one of the most efficient in the country. A strong prejudice against special hospitals exists among a large portion of the medical profession, but not the slightest opposition has been shown by them to this one; on the contrary, physicians of the highest eminence immediately offered it their support, and it now possesses a medical staff unsurpassed for ability by any hospital in the world.

Much as Johanna Chandler and the ladies' committee have already accomplished, they have no intention of considering their labours as complete. A great deal has been done, but scarcely less still remains to do. A branch establishment in the country, having airing grounds for the use of the convalescent patients, is much needed, more especially as epileptic patients are excluded from all existing charities of the description; but whether the present effort being made for this will be attended with success, it is impossible to say. Judging from the present result of the labours of these ladies, it would be hazardous indeed to conclude that their present project will turn out a failure. Of one thing we are certain—there will not be one of our readers who will not wish them God speed, and hope that they will not cease in their labours until they have obtained the desired Convalescent Hospital, at present so much needed.

MORE ABOUT SHETLAND AND THE SHETLANDERS.

LAST year, when in Lerwick, I had a few days to spare while waiting the return of the steamer to the south, and I was glad of an opportunity, which turned up unexpectedly, of spending them profitably. Two clerical friends, who had come as a deputation from the Home Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland to visit the mission stations in Orkney and Shetland, were about to proceed to some of the more remote islands, and among others Fair Isle and Foula. The chance was too good to be lost. The weather was unusually settled, and a comfortable passage to those lonely islands, with pleasant companions, was not to be lightly thrown away. So after calculating the chances of my getting back to Lerwick in time for the return steamer, I decided on accompanying them.

Making an early start on the morning of the 4th of August from Dunrossness, to which I had been conveyed the previous night on ponyback, a journey of twenty-eight miles, we made our way to the Bay of Spiggie, where our cutter, the "Nelson," was anchored. We observed, on crossing the sands, a great many huge backbones, and learned that they were the remains of a shoal of the bottlenose or ca'-ing whales (Deiphinus deductor), which had stranded themselves and been expeditiously slaughtered by the natives.

It was a perfectly beautiful morning, and the wind though fair was extremely light, so much so that for some time we realised the idea of Coleridge's "Painted Ship." The skin of the sea, if I may use the expression, was as smooth as glass, while the general surface heaved gently up and down with the lazy undulation one would expect in a sea of oil. We had thus a very deliberate view of the west side of the grand headland of Fitful Head, and an excellent opportunity of shooting dozens of porpoises as they came to the surface, with their peculiar wheel-like motion, to sun themselves for a second or two. This opportunity we availed ourselves of to the extent of frightening a few of them. We got near enough the island to see its physical features distinctly. The extreme north end rises sheer up from the sea like a wall, and on the top the grass grows to the very edge of the precipice. We see numberless incipient caves, and the process of cave-making is made very plain, layer after layer being washed off by the upward action of the water, each layer as it peels off making the arch higher. In the north-east end the strata seem to be lying on edge, while in the north they are horizontal, which, taken in connection with the scoriæ which are said to be found in other parts of the island, is perhaps an evidence of volcanic action. The stacks and rocks have the most fantastic shapes. One is surmounted by a lump exactly like a lion couchant and looking over its shoulder. The Sheeprock, connected with the island by a ridge not many feet above the sea level, is like a hugh sphinx with the features blurred by too much washing, and another is like an old Rhine castle in ruins. So absolutely wall-like are the rocks that there seems no spot where it is possible to land. There are, however, two little creeks on the east side, and towards one of these our captain turned the prow of the vessel about six o'clock p.m. We see several huts and two or three people on the higher ground, who have noticed us, and are evidently watching our movements with interest. No sooner is it plain that we are making for the shore than off they rush in different directions with the intelligence. It spreads like wild-fire; groups of women and children are seen on the hillocks, and almost immediately a boat is making for us, while another crew are seen rushing down to launch a second. And now they are almost alongside, rowing with the peculiar swift stroke of the Fair Isle boatmen. The crew of the one consists of five nice-looking boys, the other of full-grown men, who spring aboard of us, all with glistening eyes and a not disagreeable absence of ceremony, arising from eagerness and excitement. Some of them who had seen the Rev. Mr. Cumming on his previous visit three years before gave him a very hearty welcome, and were much excited. I think we all felt that the excitement was infectious. Meantime dividing our forces we are rowed ashore in the two boats, and find a considerable number awaiting our arrival. Singularly enough it happened to be the fast day, so that the arrival of two ministers was somewhat striking. They are pressed to stay over Sunday and assist the missionary in celebrating the Communion. This involved a complete derangement of their plans, but there seemed something so appropriate in the unexpected coincidence of the fast day with their visit, that they were tempted to discuss the possibility of complying with the request. A conference was accordingly held. The ministers give good strong reasons for not staying over Sunday, but the islanders, with an interesting disregard of logic, arising from their anxiety, set them aside, and propose various plans by which their remaining may be made possible. My compelled return south by Monday's steamer was a difficulty which they proposed to meet by offering to send me out to the steamer on her passage. My luggage was, however, in Lerwick, and this plan would not suit. One of them turned to the captain and said, "Take ye da boat awa', and leave dem here."

"Yes," said the captain, "but how will you manage to keep them here?"

"Oh! der be no fear o' keeping dem, if da boat be awa'."

This was said with a twinkle of humour, for he knew on how few days in the week it was possible either to leave or approach the island. As a last attempt they turned to Mr. Cumming, saying, "Stay you and let da rest go." This, of course, was out of the question, and after it was finally decided not to stay, I heard one saying to his neighbour, with a look of exultation and a glance at the sky, "I think he'll (the wind and tide are always masculine) be a dead calm. They'll no get awa', and we's be a' richt after a'"—an anticipation that was almost realised, inasmuch as it took us twenty-eight hours to reach Foula, a distance of about fifty miles.

There was now a considerable number of women around us, many of them thin and apparently ill-fed, with a worn look produced by hard work and poor fare, which made it almost impossible to guess their age. There was also a number of children staring at us open-mouthed, all of them covered in some way or other, none of them dressed. They had evidently not expected evening visitors.

We were asked to go and see the school-house, which had been disused for sixteen months. We found it dismantled, part of the roof off, three tables that had served for desks, and one form and a half. The sole occupant was a hen perched comfortably on a joist over which there remained a fragment of the roof. Everything gave evidence of its having been for a long time used as a henhouse. Till about sixteen months before our visit they had been for some time without any resident clergyman. A missionary is again settled among them, who is to combine the duties of teacher and preacher. The parents expressed great anxiety for the resumption of school work. We then visited one or two of the dwelling-houses, which are not unlike many to be seen elsewhere in Shetland. Two or three benches arranged along the wall, one or two chaus, or some thing made to do a chair's duty, such as a "whummilled" cask or peat creel, and a large wardrobelooking cupboard, or it may be a chest of drawers, are the principal articles of furniture. The fire is in the centre of the floor, all the smoke that does escape finding its way out by a hole in the roof or by the door. It does not all escape however, for the atmosphere is sometimes very smoky. If they have not learnt to consume their own smoke, they at any rate contrive to economise it, for the rafters are literally covered with fish of various kinds which are thus smoked and preserved. You may find a pig luxuriously enjoying the hot ashes, hob-nobbing with a dog, cat, or lamb across the hearth, and a few chickens are sure to be going about. As there is usually no limit to their supply of peats, the kitchen is often oppressively hot. The sides of the passage which leads to the better room of the house are lined with box-beds, which form the partition between the two apartments.

It was now approaching the hour at which service was to begin. A couple of hours had been allowed to elapse, that messengers might give intimation through the island. The utmost alacrity was shown to have the news conveyed, and at eight o'clock we found the church filled from corner to corner. The psalm tunes were peculiar, and sung lustily, with a not unpleasant, wild, wail-like cadence, which was new to us all. There are some families of Methodists in the island, who were present, and interspersed the sermons with a running commentary of Scripture phrases, ejaculations, and groans, some of which were wofully misplaced, indeed ludicrously so. After service a good many Bibles and other religious books were distributed at the Church door, some of the islanders, whether from godliness or greed, contriving to come in for a double or triple share.

In spite of the great numbers of intermarriages in this island the physique of the men does not seem below the average, and there is no lunacy. The features are more purely Scandinavian than elsewhere in Shetland, and the prevalent colour of hair is a lightish brown or yellow. The women seem sicklier than the men. Whether this is due to their being less able to bear the uncertain climate, or that, as in the West Highlands and Islands, they are worked beyond their strength in cultivating the land while the men fish, I cannot say. I hope for the credit of the Fair Isle men it is not, as in the West Highlands, considered a disgrace for a man to take on his shoulders a creel, so as to relieve his wife of a burden unfitted for her strength and sex. The island is nearly three miles long and one and a half broad. Its highest point is about 700 feet. The population is 280-about 100 less than it was a year or two ago, but still too great. The bane of the islanders is their unwillingness to remove. Another drawback to their prosperity is the want of a proper harbour, so as to enable them to carry on fishing on a more extensive scale. Their only fishing is along the shores for saithe. The more remunerative deep sea fishing is, I understand, not prosecuted to any large extent, if at all. The fact of the island being the property of one individual may prevent the Fishery Board from supplying the inhabitants with a proper harbour. A considerable portion of the land towards the south and east is cultivated, but the crops are uncertain, though sometimes good. We cannot dismiss Fair Isle without adverting to an incident that connects it with an interesting portion of history. After the defeat of the Spanish Armada, when the remainder of the "invincible" fleet was making its way round the north of Scotland, the ship of the Admiral Duke de Medina Sidonia was wrecked here, and he, with 200 of his crew, got safe to land. The resources of the island for supplying the wants of such a large addition to the population were soon exhausted. Famine was beginning to stare them in the face, and many of the Spaniards were murdered: others were thrown over the rocks. Their burialplace is still pointed out, but it is indistinguishable from the parts around. The Duke at last escaped with the remainder of his men to Quendal Bay on the mainland, and was thence conveyed to Dunkirk.

A proof of this residence of the Spaniards among them is given in the peculiar pattern of the Fair Isle knitted work, which is to be found only here and in Spain. Very few ladies in the rest of Shetland are acquainted with it. The colours are very bright and of native dye; and sometimes seven or eight patterns are worked into one cravat.

Our captain having said that we should have a good tide for Foula at midnight, and the wind being still fair but exceedingly light, we made our way to the shore accompanied by a great portion of the congregation. Some had not yet got Bibles, another wanted one with large print for his old father whose sight was beginning to fail, and we were accordingly accompanied on board the cutter by one or two boats. It was a very striking midnight scene. One of the ministers was in the hold beside the box of books, his head just appearing above the deck, and around him a ring of eager faces, each soliciting a good book, while the light of one or two candles brought out every head into bold relief against the moonlit sky. The almost breathless stillness of the night, the hour, and the locality, one of the least frequently visited spots under Her Majesty's sway, the object of the visitors, and the excited eagerness of the visited, combined to invest the whole scene with a peculiar interest.

We must, however, if possible, get clear of the island before the tide turns. Good-bye is accordingly said all round in a very affecting and hearty way, and we set sail, much pleased with our visit, and with a very kindly feeling towards those interesting islanders.

Foula, of which it is generally supposed Tacitus speaks in his "Dispecta est et Thule," and the etymology of which is said to be Fughloe or bird island, is now our destination, lying between fifteen and twenty miles west of Shetland, and upwards of fifty from Fair Isle. This voyage occupied twenty-eight hours, owing to the lightness of the wind, Foula being provokingly visible almost the whole time owing to its great height. It is not quite so large as Fair Isle, but is much more picturesque. Viewed from the east it presents a serrated appearance, having five large hills and two or three stacks all leaning in the same direction like the teeth of a saw. The highest of them is above 1400 feet. The inhabitants did not show the same interest in our visit as the Fair Isle men. Three causes may be assigned for this: they have more frequent intercourse with the mainland; three-fourths of them are not members of the Established Church; and last, but perhaps not least, they had had an excellent fishing during the night and were too busy to attend service. While the clergymen were holding a meeting in the church one of our party and myself started on an expedition to the top of the Sneug Hill to see a species of gull called the bounxie or squa-gull, which is to be found only here and on This bird used to be common Roeness Hill. enough, but bird fanciers have almost killed them out. Some years ago the proprietor of the island, Dr. Scott of Melby, began to preserve them, and they are now not so very rare. We had scarcely started on our expedition when we were overtaken by a short wiry man, about sixty years of age, who told us that he was bound to accompany every one who landed to prevent the destruction of the bounxie. He was barefoot, and several times expressed his pity for us in climbing the hill with boots. A more active man of his age I never saw. We walked quickly because we had not much time to spare, but he kept close to our heels. Probably the guns we carried made him more suspicious. We were rewarded for our walk by a sight of the bounxie. It is not much larger, but more compact in build, than the common gull, and grey, with speckles of white. Its flight is rapid, and its temper fierce, so much so that it is the terror of the eagle, and hence a protection to the lambs. It is certainly a very plucky bird, as we found on a nearer approach to its nest. It kept hovering close around us, and every now and then with a rapid sweep passed close to our heads. Had we gone much nearer the keeper assured us it would attack us, as it had often done him, striking him on the face with its wings. I have no doubt his account was true. Another rare bird, the allan, is found almost exclusively on this island, and is also protected.

The rocks on the west side of Foula are particularly grand, rising sheer from the sea to a height of 1300 feet. The natives are daring fowlers, and many lives are lost in the pursuit of eggs. It is said of the Foula man, "His gutcher (grandfather) gaed before, his father gaed before, and he must expect to go over the Sneug too."

The south end of the island is in tolerable croft cultivation, and pleasant looking. The hills, to the very top, furnish good pasture, and are grazed by sheep and cattle, of which they have a much larger number than the people of Fair Isle. The tenants are not allowed to keep horses, for fear of crossing the pure Shetland breed; those belonging to the proprietor run wild. The inhabitants are almost all fishers. There is one shop on the island, the property of Mr. Garrick, the tacksman. Here, as in Fair Isle, and perhaps elsewhere in Shetland, an objection is felt to selling the young female sheep, which is supposed to be unlucky as diminishing the stock. They do not object to sell the male. The people are said to be moral, and attentive to their religious duties. The island belongs to the parish of Walls. Its distance, however, from the mainland, and the other very laborious duties of the minister, make it impossible for him to give it more than a very occasional visit. The Independents have a Missionary stationed on the island; and the Established Church supports a man who combines the duties of teacher and catechist.

Setting sail from Foula, we reached Vaila Sound, and found our way over five or six miles of an execrable road to the manse of Walls, where we received every kindness. Next day being Sunday, my clerical friends were to preach at Sandness. The distance is called six miles, but it can be reached only by crossing mountains, and there is no road. Three of us, all ignorant of the road, proposed to walk, and the servant girl was sent with us as a guide for a short distance. She told us we had a hill to cross, and on coming to an elevation well worthy of the name, we asked if this was the "Ah, no," she replied, "that's just a brae." We came to the hill at last, and a hill it certainly is, about 800 feet high. Till lately the minister of Walls required to cross this every alternate Sunday, summer and winter, in the discharge of his duty. This, coupled with his duty in Papa Stour-an island separated from the mainland by a dangerous firth-and an occasional visit to Foula, gave us some idea of the hard work of a Shetland minister. The congregation in Sandness gave the same indications of an impressionable nature as we observed in Fair Isle. Loud sighs and groans accompanied both sermons all through. Formerly, and it may be still, the excitement produced convulsions. A Shetland minister, finding this to have a very distracting effect on the rest of the congregation, recommended sudden immersion in cold water as a sovereign remedy, which, it is said, served the double purpose of immediate cure and ultimate prevention.

In my six visits to Shetland, I have only once failed to visit the Noup of Noss and the Orkneyman's Cave-two of the most accessible and interesting sights. In good weather both may be done during the Monday the steamer lies in the harbour, if the visitor cannot spend a week among The Noup, to be seen in all its grandeur, should be approached by sea. The view from the top is very fine, but the giddy height of 600 feet can be fully appreciated only from the base of the wall-like rock. Starting, then, by boat, we pass round the south end of Bressay, where there is some grand rock scenery, in some places quite precipitous, and rising to a height of 300 or 400 feet. The action of the sea on some softer parts of the rock has cut out several large arches, through which I have passed in a boat without lowering sail, though I am not sure that I should like to do so under less skilful guidance than that of the Rev. Dr. Hamilton of Bressay. One immediately under the lighthouse is like a handsome bridge with an almost symmetrical arch. Another, called the giant's leg, also affords passage for a boat. The leg rises up from the sea like a flying buttress, as if to prop up the huge rock against which it leans, which certainly seems to need no such propping. now we are in sight of Noss, though as yet we see only the landward grassy side of the peak. After a tack or two we get round the end of the island, and a view that for rugged grandeur can hardly be surpassed is presented to us. Close to the island lies the Holm of Noss, a huge solid rock cut off from the island by a passage which seems, in comparison with the height, a mere fissure, but which affords a good wide berth for a boat. The face of the rocks on both sides, and of the Holm all round, is perfectly mural, so that the latter is quite inaccessible, except by the apparently perilous but experimentally safe enough passage by the cradle. The chasm is about 100 feet wide and under 200 deep. Across it, a box, large enough to contain a man and a sheep, and called the cradle, is slung by rings on two parallel ropes, which are fastened to This is the stakes on either side of the chasm. only mode of communication with the Holm, and it seems a dangerous one, a fall being certain death; and yet, though it has been in use for two centuries, no life has been lost by it. Communication with it was first suggested by the innumerable eggs with which it was seen to be covered. The offer of a cow was sufficient to tempt a fowler to scale it. The island being higher than the Holm, the ropes slope a little, and the cradle descends by its own weight. In returning, the passenger must either work his own passage, or be pulled by his friends, no great effort being required in either case. The Holm pastures about a dozen sheep.

Steering our way between the island and the Holm. we come in full view of the Noup, which rises perpendicularly from the sea to a height of about 600 feet. Even after repeated visits it is a very grand sight; when seen for the first time it is almost overpowering. I saw it first in the month of June. and at that season the face of the rock from bottom to top was literally covered with sea-birds, and had the speckled look which a pretty heavy sprinkling of snow would produce. We fired a gun, and a cloud of birds shot out, darkening the air and almost deafening us with the noise. I have a distinct recollection that on that occasion my feeling was more akin to nervousness than I have ever experienced when there was no real cause for fear. At its base there is a natural pavement of considerable breadth; the sceue of many a pleasant pic-nic.

We have still the Orkneyman's Cave to visit, and must bid farewell to the Noup. Returning by the way we came, and taking, as we pass beneath it, a last look at the airy cradle, to put a foot in which seems a tempting of Providence, we coast along Bressay, and after a not very long pull reach the cave, an opening about forty feet square at the mouth, but sixty feet in height inside. I am unable to say how far it extends inwards. I know that you can go in either so crookedly, or so far, or perhaps both, as to lose the daylight. Hence it is necessary to take torches with you, for without them you will neither see your way nor the beautiful stalactites which adorn the sides, some like birds, others like draped figures, and others which want similitude.

It is called the Orkneyman's Cave, from the circumstance of an Orkney sailor, when pursued by the press-gang, having taken refuge in it. Once in, he got on to a shelving rock, but did not take care to secure his boat, which drifted away, as there was a considerable ground swell. He remained a prisoner for two days, when, the sea having calmed down, he plunged in and swam to a point from which he climbed to the top of the rock, and escaped.

The effects of a generally tempestuous sea are everywhere apparent. Near the peninsula of Northmavine is a lofty rock called the Dorholm, through which the sea has eaten a wonderful arch, 140 feet in height, and above 500 feet wide. Not far from this is another magnificent rock, called the Drenge or Drongs, so fantastically cleft and shattered by the action of the sea as to present, from certain points of view, the appearance of a small fleet of vessels in full sail. The same name is given to similar stacks in Faroe, and is of Scandinavian origin.

I have already said that the Shetlanders speak of themselves as distinct from Scotland. I might have added that some of the less educated have a half-defined dislike, or, at any rate, suspicion of Scotchmen. I know of a worthy woman who said, in all scriousness, of a man, that "he was a decent kind of man for a Scotchman."

Good Words, Aug. 1, 1868.1

A Shetland lady repeated to me a conversation that took place between herself and a man who had just returned from the Straits' fishing.

"Well, Johnnie, what are the Yaks (Esquimaux)

"Oh, Miss-just da queerest, maist ill-faured set ye could think o'. Ye wudna ken them frae Scotchmen."

"That's bad enough," said the lady.

"Ye may weel say dat, for Scotchmen hae been da ruin o' Shetland. A' dat we ever got by Scotland was dear meal and greedy ministers."

Perhaps Johnnie was a wag. I give the conversation as I got it.

There is perhaps no community that gives such indications of industry among the female population as Shetland. The knitting needles and the worsted are continually in their hands, and seem to form part and parcel of the woman herself. If you take a walk towards Tingwall, you will meet or pass dozens of women going for or returning with peats from the hill, all busy knitting-one a stocking, another a stout shawl or cravat. The finer articles -scarfs, veils, and lace shawls, which are often exquisitely fine-cannot be worked in this off-hand way, and are reserved for leisure hours at home. The "keyshie"-a straw basket like a large inverted bee-hive-may be full or empty, but you never fail to find the busy fingers. This carrying of peats is an almost daily task, and you sometimes sce a woman with strongly marked features and large frame, who, from constant exposure to sunshine and shower, and rendered gaunt and wiry by hard work, recalls Sir Walter Scott's description of Norna of Fitful Head. The poorer classes generally wear not shoes, but "rivlins"-a kind of sandal made of untanned cowhide, or sometimes sealskin, with the hair outside, and lashed to the foot with thongs.

All the wool of the pure Shetland sheep is fine, but the finest grows under the neck, and is never shorn off but "rooed," that is, gently pulled. It is said that an ounce of wool can by skill be spun into upwards of 1,000 yards of three-ply thread. Stockings can be knitted of such fineness as to be easily drawn through a finger-ring. The annual proceeds of this industry are said to be not less than 10,000%. It is quite common for a servant, when making an engagement, to stipulate that she shall "have her hands to herself," meaning that all she can make by knitting is to go into her own pocket. The industry of the women is to be accounted for by the fact that by their knitting they supply themselves with dress, but especially with tea, of which they are intemperately fond. It is a perfectly ascertained fact that the value of the tea annually consumed in Shetland far exceeds the whole land rental—about 30,000l. Very large quantities of eggs are sent south, bringing in, it is said, some thousands of pounds annually, a great part of which finds its way into the tea-pot.

Many of the smaller tenants save money, but they are generally very unwilling to let it be known. A friend of mine, who has the management of a property, gave me a case in point. One of the tenants, whom he knew to have money in the bank, asked him one day for a loan of 10l. to meet a purchase he had made. My friend wrote out an order on the bank in the following terms:—"Pay to R. S. the sum of 10l., if he has no money of his own." The tenant, after reading, handed it back, saying, "Na! I winna hae't."

It is said that large quantities of coined money are stored up in chests by the better class of small tenants, and that antiquarians would reap a rich harvest in old coins. It is quite conceivable that this feeling of distrust, generated during times of oppression when it was desirable to appear poor, has been transmitted as an inheritance, and is still cherished in these better days when openness would entail no evil consequences.

To Shetlanders the sea and its products are of paramount importance, and some account of their fisheries is accordingly indispensable. They are of three kinds, the herring, coast, and deep sea or ha'af fisheries. The first has not been hitherto, and is scarcely expected to be, successful, and is not pursued on a large scale. The second is almost a daily pursuit. Immense shoals of the gadus carbonarius, or coal fish, swarm round the coasts. In the fry state they are sillocks; when a year old, piltocks; and when full-grown, saithe. The two former are articles of home consumption, either fresh or in a semi-putrescent state, when they are called sour or blown. The fish is gutted, washed in salt-water, and hung up to dry for a week or ten days. Most Shetlanders prefer it in this, to southern notions, questionable state. The full-grown saithe are often abundant round Dunrossness and the Fair Isle, and last year brought 14l. per ton.

The principal fishery is that for cod, ling, and tusk, which is carried on from May till August. The tusk is a delicious fish, not found elsewhere in Scotland. The distance of the fishing ground varies from twenty to forty miles. The boat used is the Norway yawl, fitted either for sailing or rowing, and with six of a crew. Each boat has between seven and eight miles of line and 1,000 hooks. The lines are set in the evening, and if the first haul is not successful they may bait and set them again. They sometimes remain out two nights, if the weather is fine, during which they must content themselves with very little sleep and scanty fare. They take nothing with them but oat-cakes and water, or perhaps bland. This beverage is, I believe, peculiar to Shetland, and is prepared in the following way. After butter has been made, hot water is poured into the sour milk in the churn, which causes a curd to subside. This curd is used as food, and there is left a mixture of serum and water, which by-aud-by ferments and forms a sourish, and by no means disagreeable, drink, very refreshing in summer and much liked by the natives. The fishers erect temporary huts on the shore nearest to the fishing ground, where during the day, or stormy weather, they rest, and substitute for oatmeal and bland, a diet of fish and potatoes.

When the fish are brought to shore they are handed to the curer, who weighs and keeps an account of them. They are then split up and boned, and after being washed in sea-water, are put into a vat, the fish and salt being in alternate layers. Two days afterwards they are taken out, washed, and piled into stacks for a day or two. They are then spread out on the beach day after day till they are sufficiently dried, after which they are stored up, the air being carefully excluded, till they can be shipped for market.

The ha'af fishing has many a sad tale to tell of drowning and disaster. Their boats of eighteen feet keel and six feet beam are little fitted to weather a severe storm. Anxious not to lose their lines—in many cases their all—the poor fishers bravely try to keep their ground, and often lose their lives as well. Such calamities are more overwhelming from the fact that the crew of a boat are often all members of the same family. At such terrible times the warmth and kindliness of the Shetland character come out admirably, one family bringing up one orphan, another another, doubtless from the feeling that next season, or next week, their own little ones may be in similar case.

Hibbert, in his "History of Shetland," mentions a toast that used to be, and perhaps is still, given at a rude festival about the beginning of the ha'af fishing:—"Men an' brethren, lat wis (us) raise a helt (health). Here's first to da glory o' God, an' da guid o' wir (our) ain puir sauls, wir wordy landmaister, an' wir lovin' meatmither; helt to man, death to fish, an' guid growth i' da grund." When this fishing is over, and they are about to return to their harvest, the toast is, "God open the mouth o' da gray fish (sillocks), an' haud His hand aboot da corn."

In respect of education, Shetland generally is not, to the best of my knowledge, behind the rest of Scotland, except where physical hindrances exist. There are districts where the population is so sparse that a sufficient number of children could not be collected to make a schoolmaster's work remunerative; but there are similar districts in the Highlands and Western Islands. I think it may be said that wherever there is material for a school there is one. The island of Whalsey, with a population of about 1,000, is an exception, having, I understand, no school. Lerwick is well supplied with a very good parish school and the Educational Institute, besides some private schools. In Bressay there are two good schools, and in the majority of the other islands I have reason to believe there is no grievous educational destitution. I have already referred to the hard work some Shetland ministers must undergo. Efforts are being made to lighten their task, and the process of amelioration will no doubt steadily advance. A very good instance of the isolation and unsophisticated manners of the more remote islands came under my own observation. I had occasion to visit one of them in company with a clergyman. who, on landing, intimated his intention of preaching a sermon. Before the service began, one of the most respectable men in the island came to him, and asked him very earnestly to stay overnight. My friend replied that he was sorry he could not, at the same time asking the reason of this special request. The man hesitated a good deal at first, but at last said that he had just thought of taking advantage of his visit to get married, as there was no resident minister who could tie the knot, and it might be a long time before they had another clerical visitor. He proposed accordingly to be proclaimed at the service, and married next day. We were amused at this rather striking method of "improving the occasion," but as the man was thoroughly respectable, and had reached the mature age of at least forty, my friend could not urge the impropriety of the step, on the ground of youthful indiscretion. It was certainly irregular to be proclaimed at a week-day service, but the circumstances were peculiar and the emergency great. He accordingly professed his willingness to marry him immediately after the service, and so get away as he intended. The would-be bridegroom said he was not sure that that would do.

"Hadn't you better," suggested my friend, "go to your bride, and see what she says about it?"

"Well," he replied, "I would need to see her at any rate," with a significant emphasis on the last three words.

"What," said my friend, "have you not spoken to her about it at all?"

"Oh, no!" he replied. "I was just going to ask her now. I think she'll marry me, but I thought it better not to ask her till I knew whether you could stay till to-morrow."

He went and saw her, and came back somewhat downcast, saying that she had no objections to marry him, provided the minister could wait till tomorrow, but she thought it rather too hurried to be proclaimed and married on the same day.

My friend could not wait, and, so far as I know, the poor man is still in the misery of single blessedness.

Till lately, the only tolerable road on the mainland was that between Lerwick and Tingwall, a distance of about five miles. This want of intercommunication was a dead weight on the material prosperity of the country, and has now been removed. Good roads have been and are still being made in every direction, the benefits of which will be felt more and more every year.

The Shetlanders have two grievances of which they complain bitterly, and I think justly—the church and poor law. The rentals of the various parishes are small—in some cases very small—and the heritors have, notwithstanding, the same parochial burdens to bear as if the rentals were large. It is not at all uncommon for a whole rental and a half to be expended on church and manse in one year. To suggest a practical remedy for this is no easy matter.

The poor law bears heavily on Shetland from the fact that a great proportion of the male population are sailors, who, from their profession, fail to acquire a domicile in any other parish, and the consequence is that when they become old and infirm, they and their families are thrown back on their native parish. It might be supposed that this would be felt equally by other seafaring populations, such as those of the Western Islands. It is not so, however. The inhabitants of the Western Islands remove by townships and colonies, and never return. The parochial assessment in Orkney and Shetland is, I understand, considerably higher than that of the average Scotch county. The remedy for this would be to introduce a national system instead of a parochial rental one.

I do not think that I should like to live in Shetland all the year round, but it has many attractions during the months of July, August, and September. There is, for example, fishing without stint-a sort of paradise for anglers. The almost innumerable lochs with which the islands are studded teem with fine freshwater trout, the seashores swarm with splendid sea-trout from July to October, and the angler may wander from loch to loch, and from voe to voe, without let or hindrance. Salmon, too, are occasionally caught in the voes. The seeming abundance of this fish in Laxo voe induced an Aberdeen salmon fisher to attempt the establishment of a fishery, but after three years' trial he was obliged to abandon the undertaking, the quantity of fish caught not proving sufficiently remunerative.

Again, during these months, there are added to the very pleasant society of Lerwick parties of friends from Edinburgh and England, then on visits, and expeditions of all kinds are of frequent occurrence. To-day it is a boating, to-morrow a riding pic-nic. I have very agreeable recollections of many such.

A week in Shetland is a great relief to a man oppressed with correspondence. It is, perhaps, a question of temperament. I confess it suits mine. As soon as the steamer has started on Monday, you feel that for seven blessed days you need neither write nor expect a single letter. He is a happy man who cannot conceive how this, once a year, is a great comfort. The prevalent diseases, arising from the dampness of the climate, are said to be rheumatism, croup, and consumption. It does not appear, however, that Shetland is on the whole unhealthy, as many of the inhabitants attain a very great age.

The Shetlanders, like all other spirited, highly imaginative, and danger-daring people, are undoubtedly very superstitious. Considering their isolation, and the vicissitudes of their daily life, I should consider it a hopeless trait of character, and a proof of intellectual dulness, if they were not.

Many a tale of superstition could be told, if space permitted, of mermaids, shoopiltees, forespoken water, fairy circles on the ground, the casting of knots, witches who can raise and lull storms, evil eyes that charm away milk from cows, charms that can cause or remove disease, trows or "guid folk" who carry off cows and children and leave changelings in their stead, &c., but it would take a Shetland summer's day and winter's night to give any approximate idea of their lively fancies, and I shall not attempt it.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to remark that, as in Orkney, there are very few trees, and in the middle of summer scarcely any darkness. On glancing round a church, one sees more of the unmixed Scandinavian type of feature than in Orkney, which has more frequent communication with the mainland of Scotland.

Many topics of interest are necessarily left untouched, and I am aware how imperfect these sketches are. I shall have done all I intended, if I have succeeded in giving to those who have never visited these islands a more correct idea than is generally entertained of the refinement and hospitality of the well-to-do classes and of the honesty and simplicity of character of the poorer classes of a country in which I have been much interested, have received much kindness and made many friends, and my annual visit to which, in spite of its hyperborean latitude, I always look forward to with pleasure.

JOHN KERR.

HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD.

"In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts: and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and seethe therein: and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts."—Zech. xiv. 20, 21.

"In that day." Evidently the day spoken of in earlier verses of this chapter: the day when "living waters shall go out from Jerusalem," alike "in summer and in winter," to revive and to fertilize all the earth—"and the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day there shall be one Lord, and His name one." The day spoken of is one in which God shall be eyerywhere known and worshipped and honoured—His name hallowed, His kingdom revealed, His will done, as in heaven, so on earth.

The prophets were not instructed to distinguish between two comings, two Advents, of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Gospel age was seen in prospect as one age. Its small beginning, its slow growth, its many hindrances, its hairbreadth escapes, its hand-to-hand conflicts with the powers of darkness—the long interval which was to separate the coming in humility from the coming in glory—these things were not disclosed till the necessity for that disclosure was created; till the Incarnation, the Ministry, and the Propitation were complete, and men could believe the word of Him who was revealed as the Saviour, that He would be revealed hereafter as the Conqueror and the Judge.

"In that day," means generally, in the day of the Messiah. That which is written of it has a partial fulfilment to the Church Militant, and will have a final and an entire fulfilment to the Church Triumphant. Just in proportion as the Gospel has its perfect work in any place or in any man, the words are true already. They wait not a future day to be acted upon as a rule or claimed as a promise: they do wait a future day—the day of the manifestation of the sons of God—to be exhibited in their fulfilment before the universe of men and angels.

We have then before us in this passage some remarkable features of the Evangelical and Christian life.

(1) "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord." The bells spoken of were small plates of metal, hung from the necks or heads of horses or camels, both for the sake of ornament, and for the sake of the cheerful, and enlivening sound made by their striking against each other in movement. Upon these common, these unconsecrated things—associated entirely with the occupations of secular life—there shall be engraven in that day, the Prophet says, this singular and solemn inscription, "Holiness unto the Lord."

To understand the full force of the prediction, we must look back to the 25th chapter of the Book of Exodus. The subject is the equipment of the High Priest for his sacred ministration; the minute ordering of those vestments "for glory and for beauty" in which Aaron was to "minister before God in the priest's office." Upon the lowest hem of the ephod of blue there were to be placed golden bells; the sound of which (it is said) "shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not." This is one link of connection with the prophecy before us. The other; and closer, is in the direction which next follows. "Thou shalt make a plate of pure gold, and grave upon it, like the engravings of a signet, Holiness to the Lord: and thou shall put it on a blue lace, that it may be upon the mitre; upon the forefront of the mitre it shall be. And it shall be upon Aaron's forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the Lord."

Now, then the force of this clause of the prophecy of Zechariah stands out fully before us. That inscription, which was once borne by the High Priest alone-making him the representative and personification of the whole race of Israel in their dealings with the Most High and Holy God-shall "in that day"-in the Gospel age-be engraven upon the very bells of the horses. When you make a common journey; when you travel to Gaza or to Tyre or to Damascus; when you cross the waste desert, far away from the House of God, or from the public ordinances of His worship; even then, even there, the tinkling of your horses' bells shall be a memento of His presence, a pledge of His love and a memorial of your consecration. You yourselves shall be a royal priesthood, offering up day by day the spiritual sacrifice of a life's devotion: and the oil of your anointing shall overflow (as it were) upon all that you possess, dedicating each thing to God, and causing him to be honoured and to be magnified in each. "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord."

(2) "And the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar."

In the original institution of the Levitical service, there was a gradation of sanctity among the various vessels employed in the tabernacle or temple. "In a great house," St. Paul says, "there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour." It was so in the greatest of houses—even in the Tabernacle or Temple of the Lord of hosts. There were the "pots" or vessels for cooking and washing; such as those of which we read in the 2nd chapter of the 1st Book of Samuel, as used in seething the flesh of the offerings—or in the figurative language of the 60th Psalm, "Moab is my wash-pot:" and there were also the golden "bowls" or basons for holding the sacrificial blood in which the solemnity and sanctity of the whole Levitical Dispensation centred and culminated.

When it is here written that in the Gospel age "the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar"—in other words, that the meanest of the vessels used in the Temple should be as the most sacred of all—the declaration is, that ceremonial distinctions should all be done away; that there should no longer be such a thing as a more and a less sacred: whatsoever God has taken into His house is sanctified by that adoption: the only true holiness is consecration, and whatsoever is used in God's service is thereby made holy—yea, most holy, and altogether holy. Gradations of sanctity shall be for ever done away.

(3) A further thing, "Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and scethe therein." Not only shall all vessels in the Temple be equally holy-from the caldron that seethes the unburnt portions of the sacrifice—the portions left to the priest and to the worshipper-up to the bason which contains the sacred blood, and is carried by the High Priest into the most hely place to be sprinkled before the mercy-seat: not only this: there shall be more than a levelling of distinctions between the less and the more holy: there shall be also a removal of distinctions between common things and sacred: every vessel in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiuess to the Lord, and they that sacrifice shall come and take of them (of the common vessels of the houses) and use them for seething the sacred flesh which remains over and above, to the priest and to the worshipper, of the victim offered upon the Lord's altar.

Strange indeed must such a prophecy have sounded in the ears of an Israelite who listened to it amidst the prepossessions of the Mosaic Dispensation. It was one of those inspired utterances by which men were taught, even then—could they but hear them—that the Law of ceremonies and ordinances was but prefatory to a law of reality, light, and truth. "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." In that day—in the Gospel age—the commonest vessel in the houses of Israel shall be as sacred in the sight of God as the consecrated bowl beside His altar.

(4) Yet once more. "And in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts."

The Canaanite was an alien. He belouged to one of those nations which were dispossessed and cut off for their sins before the children of Israel. But the cutting off had been but partially executed. There remained enough of the former inhabitants of Canaan to be a perpetual snare and stumblingblock to the people of the Lord. To say that there should be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts, was to say with Isaiah, "The unclean shall not pass over it," shall not walk along the promised highway which should be called the way of holiness—or with the Gospel seer, the Evangelist St. John, "There shall in no wise enter into it," into the holy city, "anything that defileth."

There was, however, another and a more definite meaning of the word "Canaanite" which may possibly be the special point of prediction here. The original word denotes a "trafficker," a buyer and seller. "There shall be no more a bargainer (or trafficker) in the house of the Lord of hosts." It is impossible not to see here in word what was afterwards typified by our Lord Himself in act, when He drove out those who bought and sold in the temple, the changers of money, and the dealers in animals for sacrifice. The promise thus understood is, that in the days of the Messiah there shall be no longer that spirit of traffic, of bargaining, and of merchandise, which in its outward processes was the disfigurement of the Jewish temple, and in its more covert and insidious workings is still too much the defilement of the Church of God.

Thus then we have found in the closing sentence of the book of the Prophet Zechariah—the chief prophet of the period of Jerusalem's restoration and rebuilding after the captivity at Babylon—four particular, though closely connected, predictions with reference to times in which we live or else to which we ourselves (if we be Christiaus) are earnestly looking forward. Let us gather up the inspired lessons, and turn them, by God's blessing, to our profit.

i. First then, all that we have is holy. To be holy is to belong to God. All that we have belongs to God, just as we ourselves belong to God. "Ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's." "The temple of God is holy; which temple ye are." "Know ye not that your body is the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"

The world needed a long training, to make it understand that anything belonged to God-that, indeed, there was a God, a real, living, and acting God, for anything to belong to. During this period of necessary education as to the very idea, the very possibility, of holiness, it pleased God to assist human infirmity by outward signs and manifestations of His own presence. Such, in one respect, were miracles; visible and sensible proofs that there was One who made all things, because He could remake or unmake everything at His pleasure. Such, in another respect, was the Tabernacle or Temple; a standing monument of God's being; a tangible sign of His existence, of His presence, of His majesty, of His concern in man. It was the establishment in the heart of one nation (and through it, in the heart of all nations) of the idea of a real God, with whom to be connected, for purposes of use or of service, was, to be honoured, to be ennobled, to be consecrated. When men saw one individual person taken from a whole nation and from a whole generation to be set apart as God's Priest; when they saw one shrine erected upon earth, in which alone a bright light shone to mark the Divine presence; when they saw every vessel of that one sanctuary set apart for ever from all profane and common uses, so that it was death for any but the right person to touch each, and even for him to touch it for any but the right purpose; -all this must have engraven upon their consciences, as no mere reasoning could have done, the idea of the Divine reality, and prepared them to pass, in the fulness of time, as without such an education they could not have done, from the faith of a local into that of a world-wide presence; and from a worship formal and carnal in its ordinances, into a worship of life and heart, of soul and spirit.

And when this time came, then it was designed, the Prophet here says, that that local and external consecration which had educated the world should be entirely swept away for one universal, all-pervading, and eternal. That inscription, "Holiness to the Lord," which had hitherto been the badge of one man, one only, in a generation-which had authorized his approach to God in behalf of his people, and had made him to them the object of a reverence next to divine-was now to be extended, not to a body of priests, not to a larger but still select number of intermediates and mediators between man and God, but to all men-to men of all ranks and capacities and nations-to young and old, to servants and handmaidens-nay, for such is the testimony of the word here written, to all things that all men even possess and use-to the vessels of a common home and the animals of a common service. The inscription of the High Priest's mitre shall now be engraven upon the bells of the horses. All that we have is holv.

To Israel it must have sounded as a marvellous dignity, that that sacred, that incommunicable title should be extended hereafter to them and to theirs. How is it with us? Are we ready to accept that dignity—to inscribe upon all that we possess that august title, "Holiness unto the Lord?" Alas! even religious men would keep something out of the reach of that consecration. It is inconvenient, it is embarrassing, it is reproving and convicting, to have God thus brought quite into everything! One man will keep his money out of God's way: another will keep his amusements out of God's way: another will keep his affections, or just one affection, out of God's way: the inscription, "Holiness unto the Lord," would be incompatible, he knows, with this pleasure or with that indulgence -and, instead of thankfully coming with each, to have the sacred mark set upon it, he will evade, he will escape, he will even misread or mishear the proclamation-and instead of loving to see God in everything, he will keep God, if he can, and while he can, just out of this, and out of just that !

To state it, is to reprove the feeling: but is it not too much ours? Where, indeed, amongst us, is that simple, that single desire, to be altogether Lord of hosts.

God's—to use everything as His, and to enjoy everything as His, and to honour Him in everything as His—which is the very meaning of that blessedness which Zechariah speaks of, when he says, "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord?"

ii. Again, all things are alike holy. The commonest vessels in the Lord's house shall be like the sacrificial bowls before the altar. Not only so: every vessel in the humblest house shall be fit for those who sacrifice to seethe therein. Gradations of holiness are unknown, and distinctions between common and holy are unknown, under the Gospel. And this, not by the obliteration of the consecrating mark from any, but by the extension of the consecrating mark to all.

Most important, most vital, is this last principle. Some men say, A Church is no more holy than a house-it matters not what disrespect, what dishonour I show to it. I may come hither jesting and trifling-I may sit here when others kneel-I may smile here or whisper, spend the time in worldly (or worse) thoughts, begin to talk the moment the minister's voice is silent, and go out hence as if from a meeting or a concert-room—and all this because under the Gospel one place is no more sacred than another place! And another man will go on to say, One day is no more holy to a Christian than another day: the Sabbath is abolished under the Gospel-it was one of the rudiments or elements of the Divine education, now cast aside and abolished altogether for the man of full age in Christ. I will spend my Sunday in frivolity or business, and only say in my excuse that I esteem every day alike! Notice well the prophecy and the promise. Aaron wears no longer the inscription upon the priestly mitre, it is because that inscription has been extended to the very bells of the horses. If the sacrificial bowls have lost the exclusiveness of their sanctity, it is because the very pots in the Lord's house have been consecrated into the same honour. If the common vessels in the houses of Judah and Jerusalem are on a level now with the sacred utensils of the Temple, it is because these, like those, are used by them that sacrifice, and the unburnt portions of the offering are prepared therein for the priest and for the worshipper. It is not that the consecrating mark is obliterated from any: it is that the consecrating mark is extended to all. If you say that a Church is no more than a common dwelling, see that your own home partakes of its consecration. See that your own home shall become none other than the house of God-the place of your night's resting a very gate of heaven. If you say that Sunday is to you as any common week-day, see that it be because to you every day is a Sunday, and he who dwells always in God's presence needs not one particular day alone for seeking it. The pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar-and every vessel in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the

tii. Finally, we ourselves must be holy. "In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." They who would abide in God's house, like the son, for ever, must cleanse themselves from all defilement whether of flesh or spirit, and perfect holiness, while they live, in the fear of God. In the true house, under the Gospel, there is no Canaanite. He may seem to be there; the great severing is not yet: the wheat and the tares still grow together: the guest who has not on the wedding-garment may still sit with the accepted till the King comes in to inspect and to exclude. But in the true house he is not: God sees him not as there.

The Canaanite is the trafficker: the man who brings his merchandise into God's house: the poor person, it may be, who comes to Church to win favour with the dispensers of the Church's alms: he, or she, is a trafficker-making a gain of godliness-a Canaanite, whom God reckons not among His worshippers. Or the person, rich or poor, who comes to Church to be seen of men; who would buy respectability by worship-and so traffies in Church-going, and is like one of those buyers and sellers, or changers of money, whom Christ once drove out of the Temple, and accused of turning it into a den of thieves. Or the man who comes to Church with the world in his heart-and spends the hour of worship in running over in silence those mammon gains, or those schemes of avarice, which have no place there, and no blessing anywhere. These are examples of the trafficker, called in our text the Canaanite, who shall not be in the house of the Lord.

But the house of the Lord now is not the place of worship only-it is the Church itself, the congregation and community of believing men. Alas! how wide becomes the warning when we thus read it. Traffickers in this world's wealth and pleasure and honour-traffickers, too many of them, even in unjust gains and unlawful ventures-traffickers, are there none such? in the emoluments, the dignities, and the responsibilities of the Church's offices-if these are not to be found in the temple which is Christ's body, assuredly the promise of the text is not yet fulfilled: "in that day" must have a prospective as well as a present meaning-even an aspect towards that time when judgment shall have begun at the house of God, and Christ shall have sent forth His angels to gather out of His kingdom all things that offend !

So then the words of the Prophet predict a coming judgment. They say, in the spirit of the last book of Holy Scripture, already quoted from, "There shall in no wise enter into it"—into God's holy and eternal city—"anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs, and sorecrers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." The "Canaanite" is the sinner: he who, whatever his profession, has lived and died in sin; has never cleansed his heart from evil, nor consecrated his life to God's service.

When that great separation is at last made: when God has entered into judgment first with His own-with those who have borne Christ's name, and have worshipped year after year in the midst of the congregation of His people-where shall we be then? The Canaanite shall be no more in the Lord's house: the slave abideth not in the house for ever: only the son abideth ever: and the son is he whom Christ, the only-begotten, has set free through the truth. Could words be plainer-more ready for self-application? Has the Son, in any sense, set us free? Has Christ broken for us the yoke of sin-of evil habit, wrong desire, sinful living-and enabled us to go forth, as His freemen, to do and to suffer, day by day, in patient consistency, all the will of God? O, we may deceive ourselves in some things, but we can scarcely deceive ourselves in this. We may fall into errors, into follies, even alas! into sins, and yet not be utterly eareless, not wholly destitute of faith and grace: but we must know-we do know-whether Christ is anything to us, or nothing, as to the great question of living in sin or living to God; whether, in any degree, by faith in Him, by prayer through Him, we are conquering, or even struggling with, our besetting temptations; whether the words have any meaning at all for us, The Spirit of God, through Christ Jesus, sets me free from the voke of sin and death. Yes, we know it-each man in the deep of his heart. But we are not bound, not compelled as yet, to answer the question. The day of judgment is not yet-we will hope, we will trust, we will speculate, we will gamble, about salvation still!

May He awaken us, who alone can! If not otherwise, by one of His sharp shocks—by fear, by shame, by loss, by bereavement, by the approach of death! Anything rather than that we should sleep on and die! Anything rather than that we should hear the words at last, "How camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment? Bind him hand and foot and take him away—for in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts!"

HOW CAN WE BEST RELIEVE OUR DESERVING POOR?

BY THE EDITOR.

This question presses itself upon us with constant and increasing interest. All acknowledge that it is not answered by our poor law as at present administered in any portion of the kingdom. In England the benevolent principle of the poor law is, that no person shall perish from want of food, whatever his character or fitness for labour may be. The only legal check to imposition or sloth is the workbouse, with its separation of the members of the family, its forced labour, and its diet in quantity only sufficient to support life, and in quality not very tempting to a nice appetite. This system is very properly intended to be only a degree better than starva-But while in England, during the last year, more than a million of paupers-18 per cent. being able-bodied-were thus relieved, at an expense of more than six million pounds, vet how much pauperism remained unrelieved! How seldom did the relief afforded touch the most deserving class of sufferers, who conceal their need from the public eye, or succumb to disease from the want of sufficient nourishment to enable them to resist it. "The vast mass of unrelieved indigence in London," says a recent writer, "is perfectly overwhelming. Deaths from starvation are of frequent occurrence, * and no police regulation, no poor law, no charity, can do much with a pauper population which covers many square miles, and numbers several thousand souls." Verily, as the American report, which quotes these words, remarks, "that poverty and misery appear hopeless on which the almost incredible private charity of England makes little impression!" An impression might nevertheless be made, provided the incredible amount of private charity were administered in a wiser form, requiring possibly more self-denial than the giving of money, and aiming at leftier results than the affording of mere temporary relief, to get quit for a time of the presence of suffering.

The state of things in Scotland—we speak of the cities—is, we are persuaded, fully as bad as in England; and perhaps worse, considering the smallness of its population when compared with that of its sister-country, or even London. The ablebodied poor are not relieved by law in Scotland. If they are able to work, they must find work as best they can, or want. Last year, in Scotland, 602,520 paupers were relieved, at an expense of 770,629l. The applications for relief by 5,673 were rejected. How much misery may not this last item represent if we take into account those dependent on the applicants! And how many thousands more, whose cry is never heard, wither and pass away as unknown to the world as the decayed leaves of a

The practical difficulties which every form of legal assessment, as at present administered, has to contend against, are on the one hand that of giving, so as to pauperise and demoralise the community, and, on the other hand, that of withholding so as to let the poor starve and die. Let it be admitted. that in the present state of society a poor law of some kind is necessary; that to prevent it producing greater evils than poverty, it must be applied with all possible stringency, and the legal pound of charity flesh, or bread, be neither diminished nor increased by the weight of a hair, less or more; that a clear line of demarcation be practically drawn between the greatest amount of aid bestowed by law with its compulsory labour, and what can be obtained by industry with its free labour; and that the only guarantee given by the state shall be against absolute want :- then what would be the results of a poor law thus administered in the present state of society? One result, unquestionably, would be an immense mass of unrelieved poverty-poverty arising in some cases from culpable causes, but in other cases from causes in God's providence which render poverty neither a curse nor a disgrace, but an affliction which demands the sympathy and aid of the truly charitable.

Now, what is to be done with this mass of unrelieved poverty?

Some may be disposed to get quit of the pressing and painful difficulty by the simple aphorism that "We have nothing to do with it." But the very worst and most repellent among the poor are those who most prove that they at least have to do with us! It is they who cheat us out of our money; impose upon us by their falsehoods; rob us of our purses, or break into our houses, and when punished for their crimes, make us pay for their food, clothing, and safe-keeping. Nay, how generally are the homes of the worst and most neglected poor, the centres from which disease, in varied and dreadful forms, goes forth to infect the homes of comfort, and to remind the selfish and inconsiderate that they have to do with the most worthless, and are bound to them for good or evil. we then aid them by indiscriminate charity? This would only add to the evil. It is advised to stop all begging. Be it so. But what then becomes of the beggars? "If a man will not labour, let him not eat." But how are we to distinguish between the lazy, who will not work, and the industrious, who either cannot work, or can find no work to do? It is said, "Let congregations and churches relieve their own poor." This is just and right; but what of the poor who have no connecforest, who, if judiciously aided at the right time, might be saved from much suffering, and live to be industrious and happy members of society!

^{*} There were in London in ten years ending 31st of December, 1857, 3,292 deaths from starvation, as reported in the returns of the Registrar-General.

tion, from their very poverty, with any church? The more we examine the problem to be solved, the more must we be convinced that our cities contain a great amount of suffering which no legal charity ought to relieve, and which no private charity, unless combined in some organisation coextensive with the need, can relieve. It is altogether unnecessary to prove what no one denies. Those who, as clergymen, city missionaries, physicians, &c., daily come into contact with poverty in every form, feel this as a heavy and constant burthen on their hearts. They fear almost to look the evil in the face, from the pain occasioned by a sense of their utter helplessness to relieve it, and also from the conviction, that if kind-hearted people realised the actual suffering around them, and were aroused to a sense of their responsibility with regard to it, and believed in the possibility of relieving it by a proper organisation, it could be done; and, therefore, the fact of its not being done is as painful as that of seeing persons drowned or burnt who could have been saved, had others, as we phrase it, "only known," "only thought," "only been told about it."

It is impossible to classify such cases as those we have alluded to-these being as various as the circumstances and history of different persons and families. Among these cases are those of families reduced by fever, or by long periods of severe sickness, during which furniture and clothes, with even "the rags of old decency," have been sold or pawned, and where help is needed to restore wasted strength and the smallest amount of household comfort ;-families with weak constitutions, who, from want of proper nourishment, or country air, for a few weeks, are fast sinking into the depths ;-families out of work, with no one to aid them in getting it ;families in which an old father or mother, a delicate brother or sister, or possibly a fatuous one, are supported by others hardly able to support themselves ; orphan children, cast on the world at a period of life when a situation, or the training for one, might save them from destruction; -- poor children, unable to attend school from want of decent clothing, or the money to pay the school-fees ;-deformed children, who could be so far aided as to be made fit for labour; sick children, 50 per cent, of whom die from neglect or inadequate food, both produced or greatly aggravated by poverty: -idiotic children, who could be delivered from the mere animalism into which they are sinking, and thus becoming a sad drag on the family ;-children deaf and dumb and blind, who are utterly neglected through the ignorance or hopelessness of the poor parents;adults suffering from diseases which require modern and mechanical aids and appliances, such as bandages, trusses, &c., to enable them to work, or to relieve them from much suffering; - cases where abject poverty has caused listlessness, despondency, and despair, but which with wise advice and aid may be stimulated to renewed and successful effort; mothers in childbirth who could be saved to their large families by a little careful nursing and suitable food;—oh! how many such cases occur in a great city, utterly unknown to the kind-hearted ladies and gentlemen who inhabit it, and who hear nothing of them, for there is many a desolate cry of pain smothered within the walls of poor homes, like that of mariners in a sinking ship who see no sail within the wide horizon. To all this sad catalogue of suffering which may be remedied or alleviated, we must add the evils arising from ignorance regarding ventilation, cleanliness, and the cooking of simple food for the sick, or as to the best means, and the right time, for obtaining medical aid, and saving them from the impositions of unprincipled quacks.

In Scotland, where the able-bodied poor, as we have said, are not entitled to legal charity, such cases are probably more frequent than in England, in spite of the personal efforts which such a veto to every demand for parochial relief necessarily stimulates. But where are the able-bodied to ask relief with any hope of finding it, except in those cases where they are personally known as deserving to those who are both able and willing to relieve them? Let us state a :ase which accidentally came under our observation some time ago. On one of the coldest days in one of our coldest winters, a tall working man in old fustian clothes was seen sitting on a stone by the roadside with his head bent down. He was accosted by an acquaintance, who asked him what he was doing there. He replied that for three weeks he had been looking for work but could find none; that he felt very weak and unable to walk without often taking rest; and above all, that he trembled to meet his wife and children again with empty hands. His poor friend could only sympathise with him, and help him to return home. He returned home; -but there was no food in the house for his wife and five young children, and no fire in the grate, and hardly a shred of tattered clothes on their beds, as all had been pawned that could bring in a farthing. The father sat down, and buried his face in his hands, but said nothing. His wife having gone out on some message to a neighbour, was quickly followed by her eldest boy, who said, "Mither, come back, there's something far wrang wi faither." She hastily returned and found her husband suspended by the neck behind the door. She cut him down, and he slowly revived. With a woman's love and with many tears she upbraided him. He replied, "Dinna be ower sair on me. It was for you and my puir bairns I did it. As an able-bodied man I could get nae relief from the parish, and I didna like to beg; but I kent if I was dead they wad be obliged to support my widow and orphans." Poor fellow! his case became known to a very few, when it was promptly relieved, without his ever knowing that his rashness was suspected. It turned out that he was also suffering from hernia, and though an intelligent man, able to read and write—and honest, sober, and industrious, let us add-he had never heard of a truss, nor could he have bought one even if he had. Two pounds judiciously laid out restored him to comparative comfort; a note to an employer obtained him work, and he has never wanted since. Another instance of a different kind occurs to us; it was that of a respectable family consisting of father, mother, two sons, and a daughter. All had come to the town fresh and active from the country, and all found work; but the father died from fever, a son soon followed, the other son was smitten with consumption. The daughter, about 18, and very good-looking, laboured far beyond her strength to support her mother and brother. Every day she became weaker until at length medical aid was called in. "I cannot discover," the physician said, "any disease here, but she has no blood,what has been her food?" The poor mother, ignorant of her daughter's danger, said that she had no appetite, but never complained; that she lived chiefly on weak tea and toast, and always said she felt quite well, but was often wearied and weak. She died next day ;-"fell asleep," as her mother said, "and never awoke." That long narrow coffin with the mother weeping over it was a sad sight, and a soleme cry for aid to the suffering! And how easily she could have been saved! This losing of the appetite often deceives. "How did the poor children live?" we asked a mechanic after the cotton famine, who had a miserable income, with a large family. "I could hardly tell," he replied. "We had nothing to give them but 'porridge,' or pease brose, and these often but once a day and without milk. Having been accustomed to a sufficient quantity of food the young ones at first complained, but to do the auldest among them justice, they were very decent and genteel, -and never grumbled. But when their blood got thin, puir craturs, they were a' mair easily pleased, for they didna feel so hungry."

One of the most cheering, yet humbling facts, in connection with the relief of the deserving poor, is the little money that will tide a family over a trying time, when it is prudently used, with encouraging words, and other small but effective remedial measures, which can hardly be specified, but which experience, good feeling, and common sense naturally dictate. In the path of the deserving poor, there ever and anon occur ditches, which they have not the means of crossing at the moment, and which therefore make escape from the bull that is pursuing them as impossible as if they were oceans. A single plank would make escape easy-but the plank is not there! They may be able to command a dozen in a month perhaps, but they need one now; and if they have not the plank, and the bull is in full chase !-- what then ?

Now it is surely unnecessary at this time of day in the history of the Church or of the world, to remind our readers of their duties to the poor. But we fear some are apt to forget the prominent place which these hold in the moral teaching of the Old and New Testament. We are all apt to forget how a curse is pronounced on those who hide themselves from their own flesh, and a blessing on those who wisely consider the poor; -how Jesus, in declaring that the poor would be always with us recognised them as being always objects of charity, and a means of educating us in brotherly love; how He tells us that feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick, are the very tests which shall determine the reality of our love to Himself; and how He himself and His disciples, though poor, kept a common purse, out of which the poor were relieved. The letters of the Apostles breathe the same spirit and teaching. The apostle John says, "But whose hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth." St. James says, "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit? Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." St. Paul says, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate." And how nobly did St. Paul embody his teaching in his life, when he says, "These needs have ministered to my necessities, and to those that are with me," and when he laboured by word and deed to obtain aid from the Gentiles for the poor Jews in Jerusalem, and to administer it at the risk of his life. Let us take heed lest we underrate the importance of this duty to our brethren. To deny this duty of charity to the poor, is to deny the faith, and to substitute a mere Christian creed for a Christian life, and self-indulgence for self-denial.

But candidly admitting all this, it may be asked, how are we in the present circumstances of society to minister relief to the poor? Now one thing is essential to the success of every effort to distribute private charity, and that is, personal visitation and the careful scrutiny of every case. This is obviously necessary to detect and prevent imposture, and to discover the deserving poor. But it is above all necessary, in order to produce the higher result of making charity "twice blessed," as it should be-blessed to him who giveth, as well as to him who receiveth; more indeed, though it is seldom thought of, to the former than to the latter, inasmuch as it is more blessed to give than to receive. Such a virtue as legal "charity," or charity by Act of Parliament, does not and cannot exist. The claim of right destroys it, and converts it into a debt. The nature of the transaction implies no more love between the giver and the receiver, than between debtor and creditor. All our goods may in this form be given to feed the poor, and yet the sacrifice be made "without charity." The same may be said with as much truth in regard to all money given to beggars which expresses no higher sentiment than the very vulgar but too common one, "Get along with you!" But, on the other hand, the charitable person who, with "kind looks, kind words, and tender greetings," relieves the needy, is himself a greater gift, a revealer of a higher good, than any mere material gift which he bestows. He who thus helps the sick and feeds the hungry, may say to each family, "The kingdom of heaven is come nigh to you." Truly does the poet sing that-

- who does me good with unmoved face He is my benefactor, not my brother man."

"It is not," says Charles Lamb, "medicine, it is not broth and coarse meats, served up at stated hours with all the hard formalities of a prison; it is not the scanty bed to die on, which man requires from his species. Looks, attentions, consolations, in one word, sympathies, are what a man most needs. A kind look, a smile, a drop of cold water to the parched lips-for these things a man shall bless thee in death."

But, in addition to those accompaniments of true charity ministered by good sense and kindly sympathy, by personal visitation alone can other ends be accomplished for the relief of poverty which should never be overlooked; such as the stimulating of neighbours and relations to do their duty towards their poorer brethren; the helping of those out of employment to find it; the supplying of some defect in education which may be easily removed, but which would otherwise prove a constant drawback; and also, by friendly advice and aid, the saving or recovering many from careless habits, or vicious tendencies. That all this implies thoughtfulness and some trouble on the part of visitors is admitted, but it is a law that all true gain is inseparable from self-sacrifice. That the many cases of poverty arising from obstinate vice or idleness will remain unrelieved, is also likely: but then, for such sufferings-righteously annexed by God to evil-the vicious themselves are responsible, and not society. That much disappointment, and some ingratitude (though rarely), will be experienced, may also be anticipated; but in spite of all such painful results, the good done will immensely preponderate, and be a source of constant thanksgiving. One result, already alluded to, of such charity on a large scale, or when ministered by a large organisation, will much surprise those not accustomed to such experiments. This is the great way which a little money will go-the good which can be accomplished by small means wisely applied. While legal charity spends its hundreds of pounds, Christian charity, if its dispensers are properly organised, would with its tens attain, in every respect, higher results. The one is as water poured over a desert which brings forth thorns; carefully to examine their circumstances, and to the others would convert all the desert, not irretrievably doomed to sterility, into a fruitful field of physical and moral well-being.

These remarks suggest other questions :- How are the charitably disposed in a great city to be thus brought into contact with the poor? How is personal visitation possible? Is each man to search out the poor for himself, or is any association practicable by which the work can be done in a methodical and satisfactory manner?

Our reply to these questions will, in the meantime, be a statement of facts, as to what has been done in America, upon a scale and with results which warrant us in making the same attempt to relieve the deserving poor in our great cities.

The rest of this paper will therefore be devoted to giving some account of "THE NEW YORK ASSO-CIATION FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE POOR." All the annual reports of this association, twenty-two in number, are now before us, and from them we mean to furnish our readers with some account of this excellent society.

The association was formed in the year 1844. Its general object is "the elevation of the moral and physical condition of the poor; and so far as compatible with these objects, the relief of their necessities." When it began its operations, about thirty or forty almsgiving societies existed in the city, and a poor law was in full operation, dispensing a large amount of funds. But pauperism nevertheless increased with a greater ratio than the population, and mendicity had become a public nuisance. A select committee was appointed by a number of gentlemen in 1842-3, to inquire into the causes of failure in the several charities, and to report on them, and also to devise, if practicable, a better system of dispensing relief. They reported that among those causes were, 1st, the want of discrimination in giving relief, which led to imposition and the misapplication of large sums of mouey, and actually created more want than it relieved; 2ud, the independent action of the several societies, which artful mendicants turned to their own advantage, the most undeserving thus obtaining the largest amount of assistance; 3rd, the want of all provision for personal intercourse with the recipients of alms at their dwellings, and for such sympathy and counsel as would tend to encourage industrious and virtuous habits, and to provide for the permanent physical and moral improvement of those relieved; and finally, as regarded the state poor law, that every form of public charity which had not especial reference to the removal of the causes of poverty must increase its amount, and when it has done its utmost, must leave an immense work unaccomplished, which cannot be effected by isolated individual exertions.

After many investigations into the state of the poor both in America and in Europe, the association was formed "to put an end to street begging and vagrancy, and to visit the poor in their houses, extend to them appropriate relief, and through the friendly intercourse with visitors to inculcate among them habits of frugality, temperance, industry, and individual self-dependence."

To effect these desirable objects the following organisation was adopted, and has been successfully carried out : - The whole city of New York is divided into 22 districts. Each district is superintended by a committee of five. One of these acts as chairman. Each district is again divided by this committee into sections, the number of sections being determined by the number of visitors required by each, about 25 families being apportioned to each visitor. The whole association is governed by managers, including president, vice-presidents, treasurers, and secretary, about nine in all, who, along with the chairman of each district, form a supervisory council. There is a central office with a paid secretary. The visitors, all gentlemen, number at present about 370. The board of managers have exclusive control of the funds, fill up vacancies in their body, appoint the district committees, and adopt such means as the objects of the institution require. They meet for the prosecution of business once a month (except in July and August). A general meeting of the association is held annually. A meeting of the supervisory committee is called, when necessary, by the secretary at the request of the president. Every person who becomes an annual subscriber, a member of a district (advisory) committee, or a visitor, is officially a member of the association.

Among the fundamental rules of the association are the following: 1. To regard each applicant for relief as entitled to charity, until a careful examination proves the contrary. 2. To give relief only after a personal investigation of each case by visitation and inquiry. 3. To relieve no one, except through the visitor of the section in which the applicant lives. 4. To give necessary articles, and only what is immediately necessary. 5. To give what is least susceptible of abuse, and consequently no money. 6. To give only in small quantities, and in proportion to immediate need; and of coarser quality than might be procured by labour, except in cases of sickness.* 7. To give assistance at the right moment; not to prolong it beyond the necessity that calls for it; but to extend, restrict, and modify relief according to that necessity. 8. To require of each beneficiary abstinence from intoxicating drink; of such as have young children of a proper age, that they may be kept at school, except unavoidable circumstances prevent it; and to apprentice those of suitable years to some trade, or send them to service. The design being to make the poor a party to their own elevation, the wilful neglect or disregard of these rules shall debar them from further relief. 9. To give no relief to persons who, from infirmity, imbecility, old age, or any other cause, are likely to continue unable to earn their own support, and consequently to be permanently dependent, except in extreme cases for two or three days, or until they are' referred to the commissioners of charity (the poor-law guardians). 10. To discontinue relief to all who manifest a purpose to depend on alms rather than on their own exertions for support, and whose further maintenance would be incompatible with their good, and with the objects of the association. 11. To give those having claims on other charities a card directing them thereto, which indicates thereon why such relief was refused by the association; the duplicate thereof, the member should require the applicant to produce, when he affirms that the association has denied him relief.

It will thus appear that no existing charities, whether voluntary or legal, are interfered with. The association takes up those cases only which can be aided by neither. It is also evident that if every case of poverty is carefully inquired into, and aided in the best possible manner, the poor law may confine its out-door or in-door relief to those who are in the strictest sense paupers, and who cannot be otherwise relieved; and every other charity, whether congregational or otherwise, is aided in its work: thus leaving only such surplus poverty as is caused by voluntary idleness or dissipation, and which ought not therefore to be relieved by any party, but be permitted to suffer or reform.

In carrying out their work systematically, the association also publishes a small Almanac or "Directory," every year, for the use of subscribers. This directory contains the names of all the visitors, and their respective districts, with the funda-There are also mental rules of the association. printed cards, or slips, issued to the subscribers, with blanks, which they can fill up with the name and address of the visitor, and the name and address of the applicant, and which can be handed by the members to any person applying to them for relief, and thus secure the case being inquired into. The visitor has also blank forms, which he fills up with orders upon accredited stores, for articles of food or clothing. Each visitor, moreover, fills up a schedule, and makes a monthly return to his district committee-the monthly meeting of which he is expected to attendof the names of all the persons relieved during the preceding month, with residence, occupation, character, and amount of relief given. We may now state some of the results of this association. It is supported by about 700 subscribers, whose subscriptions, apart from legacies or donations, amounted last year to 49,290 dollars, or upwards of 9,600l. The work done last year was the relief of 5,373 families, containing 22,285 persons, by 22,300 visits. Since the association began, the number of the visitors has increased from 244 to 366-the subscriptions have increased four-foldwhile 678,882 visits have been made, and 654,063 persons relieved.

In order to estimate the labour of this association, and to judge how far such an organisation is capable of being adapted to the conditions of the great cities on this side of the Atlantic, it may be well to notice some circumstances connected with the city of New York, which will show the diffi-amine every case; ascertain their character and condition; and carefully inquire into the causes which have atton; and carefully inquire into the causes which have brought them into a state of destitution. You will be-come an important instrument of good to your suffering fellow-creatures, when you aid them to obtain this good from resources within themselves. To effect this, show them the true origin of their sufferings, when these suf-ferings are the result of imprudence, extravagance, idlawses intemperature or other meral agrees which ferings are the result of imprudence, extravagance, idleness, intemperance, or other moral causes which are within their own control; and endeavour, by all appropriate means, to awaken their self-respect, to direct their exertions, and to strengthen their capacities for self-support. In your intercourse with them, avoid all appearance of harshness, and every manifestation of an obtrusive and a censorious spirit. Study to carry into your work a mind as discriminating and judicious as it is kindly disposed, and a heart ready to sympathise with the sick and the infirm, the widow and the orphan, the tempted and the vicious. In short, if you would confer great and permanent good upon the needy, you first must distinctly understand in what that good consists; and as this knowledge can only be acquired by personal and as this knowledge can only be acquired by personal intercourse with them at their dwellings, the second rule those for whom your benevotent services are required, before granting relief. Having given these general instructions in relation to visitorial duties, it may be useful to present a few practical directions concerning each of the classes of the poor before named.

"First. Those who have been reduced to indigence by unavoidable causes.

"In your intercourse with this class, if you meet with industry, frugality, and self-respect, and a preference for self-denial to dependence upon alms, let not your the ways of undermining one right. for self-denial to dependence upon alms, let not your charities become the means of undermining one right principle, or of enfeebling one well-directed impulse. Alms in such cases must often be given, and the temptation is to bestow freely; but let them be administered with great delicacy and caution. The most effectual encouragement for such persons is not alms chiefty, or any other form of charity as a substitute for alms, but that sympathising counsel which re-enkindles hope, and that expression of respect for character, which such individuals never fail to appreciate. A wise distribution of charity, connected with a deportment of this kind towards the deserving poor, will often save them from pauperism, when the absence of these may degrade them to habitual when the absence of these may degrade them to habitual dependence on alms for subsistence.

"Second. Individuals who have become mendicants through their own improvidence and vices.

"The evils of improvidence can never be diminished, except by removing the cause; and this can only be done by elevating the moral character of the poor, and by teaching them to depend upon themselves. Many able-bodied persons apply for alms who earn enough for their own maintenance, but expend their carnings in improper indulgences, with the calculation of subsisting on charity when their own resources fail them, who might have tural increase of population, which in ten years amounted culties and discouragements which the association has had to meet.

The population of New York is now about a million, and greater, therefore, than that of any city in Europe or America, except Paris, London, and Constantinople. This population, moreover, is made up of the most heterogeneous elements. About one-half is either foreign-born, or of immediate foreign descent. Of the many immigrants into New York (upwards of 260,000 annually), twentyfive per cent. remain, and never pass into the interior. Among these are the poorest, and also the worst, we are ashamed to say, of our own population, whom we have got rid of by sending to the States. About 256,000 persons of foreign birth were relieved by the city of New York in one year.* And no doubt the most permanent class of paupers obviated this necessity by proper self-denial and economy. In respect to these cases, if relief must be given,—and it sometimes must be,—it should never be of a kind, or to a degree, that will make this dependence preferable to a life of labour. And it should not be forgotten, that many would be economical and saving if they knew how to be. Let it be your endcavour, therefore, to instruct them; to encourage deposits in savings banks for rent, fuel, and winter entrylies: and by all the metives which you can winter supplies; and by all the motives which you can present, stimulate them to habits of thriftiness, industry, and foresight. The rule is, that the willingly dependent upon alms should not live so comfortably with them as the humblest independent labourer without them.

"In this class is also included those who have been reduced to want by their vices. Among these, the vice of intemperance is the most prolific source of pauperism and abject poverty. How to act wisely in reference to this abject poverty. How to act wisely in reference to this class of applicants, is a most perplexing question, yet, as it will frequently occur, it must be met. As a general rule, alms should, as far as possible, be withheld from the drunkard. But here, perhaps, is the inebriate's family in actual want of the absolute necessaries of life. Still the rule is, that relief should never be given to the families of the intemperate, beyond the demands of urgent necessity. You should, if possible, become the instruments of their rescue; but any alms you can bestow may only perpetuate their misery. They may minister to the drunkard's recklessness, and induce him to feel that he is relieved from the necessity, perhaps from the moral is relieved from the necessity, perhaps from the moral obligation, of providing for his wife and children. Much must here be left to your discretion. Seek, however, by all the means of which you can avail yourself, to save the intemperate from ruin. Deprayed though he be, shut not your heart against him. Though apparently sout not your neart against min. Though apparently lost, he is not beyond hope. Act on this principle, and you may be the instrument of his recovery. But whatever may be your success with the guilty and perhaps incorrigible parent, never abandon your interest in the welfare of his children.

"Third. To the third general class specified, viz.,

"Third. To the third general class specified, viz., those who are able but unwilling to labour, and professional panpers, the Scripture rule applies without qualification: 'This we command you, that if any will not work, neither should he eat.' If the entire community were to act on this principle, some of this class might be exposed to the risk of starvation. But as such unanimity is not likely to occur, this association cannot, by bestowing alms on objects so undeserving, become a willing accessory in perpetuating the evils of vagrancy and pauperism."

excessory in perpetuating the evils of vagrancy and pau-perism."

It is admitted that the increase of population and wealth to the United States by immigration compensates ten-thousandfold for any such temporary loss. The annual average of immigrants is 260,000. The value of the im-migrant labour from 1850 till 1860 was carefully com-puted at fourteen hundred and thirty millions of dollars, making no allowance for increase of capital, nor for nain the city, the most ignorant, filthy, and thriftless, the greatest disturbers of the public peace, the rearers of the greatest number of ragged children and young criminals, are Irish. Fifty-three per cent. of the criminals are Irish, and 69 per cent. of those relieved are Irish. The Irish are all Roman Catholics, yet they have been aided as well as others, though grievously neglected by their church, among whose members no subscribers to the association are found. There is, moreover, in New York, as we have already mentioned, a poor law, worked on the same principles as the English poor law. We find from the report of 1856, -and matters have not improved, we believe, since then,-that there were 204,163 paupers supported by legal charity, at an annual expense of 1,379,954 dollars; and that while the population during twenty years (from 1830 till 1850) had increased 61 per cent., the pauperism had increased 706 per cent. The pauperism, according to the ratio of the population, was then as 2 to 1 to that of Ireland! Two-thirds of the pauperism of the State is confined to the city of New York. We may add that nearly 2,000 paupers are in the almshouse, and that between 70,000 and 80,000 receive out-door relief. Nor must it be supposed that New York is such a healthy city as to make the labours of the association lighter than they would be in London. New York might be one of the healthiest cities in the world, bounded as it is by the estuaries, and with its broad streets and fine climate: yet its death rate is equal to that of London.*

The sanitary condition of New York is, on the whole, far behind that of London. In 1864, no fewer than "400 butcheries and offal establishments were in full play, diffusing their sickening effluvia." Three-fourths of the city are unsupplied with sewerage. In 1859, it was reported that "147 miles in the city was one open cess-pool!" and we do not discover any evidence of much improvement since. About 18,000 persons live in cellars. Nearly half a million inhabitants are packed into ill-ventilated houses in one district, at the rate of 240,000 within a square mile; and 10,000 lives are thus annually lost from diseases which could be prevented.+ Moreover, one per cent. of the population, or 10,000.

to 24 per cent. It is also proved that the nation's wealth increases each ten years at the rate of 126 43 per cent.; and if the value of immigrant labour during ten years is multiplied by 126.43 (the increase of wealth for the same period), the result will be more than three billions of dollars to be gained by the United States in 1870. It is calculated that in 1864 alone immigrants brought with them to the United States 18,380,000 dollars.

* Up to 1857 the mortality of London was 25 in 1000, and New York 36 in 1000. New York has improved since then.

† In the report of the association for 1865, it is frankly admitted that "English legislation, in all that pertains to the conservation of public health, is far in advance of our own." We may add that, having once visited, many years ago, the "Five Points" in New York at night, under the guidance and protection of the Cap-tain of Police, we never saw more signs of squalor, poverty, and vice in the worst district of any European city.

Another fact, affecting the operations of this association, is the enormous civic taxation. "In ten years preceding 1864, the wealth of the city increased 20 per cent., the population 47 per cent., and taxation 60 per cent. !" This is attributed to the influence of a corrupt and unprincipled political "Ring"; and it is alleged that "one-third of the taxation is either squandered or stolen." The city tax amounts to upwards of 3,500,000l. ($18,196,608 in 1865), while the debt is upwards of 8,500,000l. ($42,581,724). Taking all these circumstances into account, it would appear that no European city can present greater difficulties or discouragements in the way of carrying out an organised system for aiding the deserving poor than those which have been met and overcome by the New York association with such wisdom, patience, and Christian self-denial.

The association, too, has had times of special difficulty to contend with, and such as fully tested the soundness of its principles. It has had a season of bad harvests, when tens of thousands were thrown out of employment in New York, and when excited "philanthropists" could not brook the patient labours of the association, but insisted on an openhanded charity expressive of what they called "spontaneous sympathy," which, at the time, was very popular with the beggars, but did incalculable harm in the end, and only proved the vast importance of personal visitation in dispensing charity, instead of such short-cut methods as indiscriminate soup-kitchens, and gifts in money, which save trouble but increase beggary in its worst forms and with all its worst vices. The association has also had to meet the disorganisation and the ruin of the most industrious and respectable of the working population, occasioned by the disastrous crashes in New York in 1854, when nearly a thousand failures occurred with losses amounting to upwards of twenty millions of pounds. At another time the brutal riots, occasioned by the lowest of the mob-ninetenths of whom were Irish-against the negroes, and in which 500 were massacred, increased the work of the association. But it was nobly aided by the New York citizens, who promptly put at its disposal upwards of 8000l., for the relief of the coloured population.

Then came the great war, to which the city of New York contributed more than 100,000 of her citizens as soldiers, and expended upwards of 600,000l. for the support of their indigent families during their absence on service. When these funds failed, many families had to be cared for by the association who had no legal claim on government assistance; yet it was able to meet and to weather all those storms, and never wanted funds, or people fit to administer them.*

^{*} It is stated in page 67 of the Report of the Association for 1864, that the citizens of the United States, in addition to their heavy taxation, subscribed during the war, for the

We again ask, whether it is likely any similar association in London, Liverpool, or Glasgow would have greater difficulties to overcome, or have severer tests applied to determine its qualities as a machine in every respect adapted for the work which it professes to accomplish?

We have not yet done with the operations of this society; and as we are writing for information, and with reference to one of the highest objects which can engage the attention of every good man—that of aiding the deserving poor—we crave indulgence while adding a few more details, which must be given in a condensed and, therefore, in a dry form.

It was not possible for an association like this to come into such close contact with the masses-to gather up through its many agents so much accurate information every month, and to systematise this, year after year, without its suggesting and developing various benevolent schemes and social reforms bearing on the moral and physical wellbeing of the poor. And one of the benefits conferred by such a society is its influence in creating a right public opinion, which must precede any legislation required to effect sanitary reforms on a large scale. Each succeeding year almost, in the history of the association, has been thus marked by a practical inquiry into some existing evil or remedy for it. It has, for example, organised a system for the supply of the indigent sick with gratuitous medical aid; and this has ended in the establishment of admirable dispensaries in the several wards of the city-the Demiet Dispensary alone having last year aided 328,308 persons, 66,128 being at their own homes. It has fostered special societies, as, for example, one "for the relief of the ruptured and crippled."* It introduced and systematised measures for lending stoves, and for gathering and distributing secondhand clothing and broken victuals.+ It published and circulated popular tracts on moral and economical subjects, imparting useful information and counsel. It took means of gathering neglected and vagrant children into Sabbath, week-day evening, and industrial schools; furnishing statistics which proved that, in the city, 40,000 children were growing up in ignorance, profligacy, and benefit in every form of the soldiers and their families, "probably not less than 250 million dollars," or about 50 million pounds! When Lancashire was in distress, and half a million of people reduced to the danger of sheer starvation, of the million of money expended for their relief nearly one-third came from abroad. We should ever gratefully remember that of this sum the heavily war-taxed citizens of America, in spite of all the home claims upon their charity which were so nobly met, contributed 76,480*l.* to the relief of our English sufferers.

* This society relieved, in 1864, 819 cases. There are five similar societies in London; one only of which, in one year, relieved 5252 cases of rupture, and since its formation, 168,000! Another relieved 1400 decrepit per-crime! As a result of this investigation, it projected and established a Juvenile Asylum for the education and elevation of vicious children, and their subsequent indenture. It founded a Public Washing and Bathing Establishment, at an expense of upwards of 8000l., of whose benefits, for cheap washing and ironing, 75,000 persons annually avail themselves, so that it is now self-supporting. It has done much for the young, by obtaining an act for the care of truant children; * and by establishing a Children's Aid Society. It has been instrumental in raising a Working Man's Home; and has constantly kept before the public and the legislature of the state the demands of the city for sanitary reform in the drainage and in the overcrowded ill-ventilated houses. We mention these facts to show how helpful such an association may be to society, and how its work grows and orbs itself out beyond its first intention. We may add, for the instruction of the benevolent at home, that from its first report in 1844, until its last in 1865. this association has constantly brought before the public, in the form of an address, like a "standing order," to the citizens of New York, the evil and selfishness of relieving street-beggars. All who know the class who constitute the beggars, vulgar and genteel, from the ragged "orphan" to the "poor widow," know that they are the most worthless and undeserving of the poor; and that to relieve them. without the most careful personal scrutiny, is to gratify mere feeling without thought, and to pamper idleness, falsehood, and vice. If the so-called benevolent will not aid wisely, let them not aid at all. Public begging should be put down by the force of law: the poverty it creates is in all circumstances greater than what it relieves. But at the same time we think, while a wrong system is put down, a better system of giving should be put up!

We must bring our article to a close, though the subject is by no means exhausted.

We have no wish to exaggerate what has been done by this association or by the other charities of New York. In the amount of funds annually dispensed in every form and from every source in behalf of the poor, we believe London stands immensely higher than any city in the world. But what every city wants is organisation, to make charity tell with the greatest amount of good and the least amount of evil.

Nor are the principles adopted by the New York association new. It is their application only, and that on so large a scale and for so long a period, with such excellent results, and at such a small expense, which is new, and from which we have so much to learn for the good of all our own cities. We know not how far the same organisation has been followed by other cities of the Union, but we have heard that a similar society is in operation in Chicago (200,000 inhabitants), and with similar beneficial results.

^{*} The excellent common-school system of America provides education, but does not secure its acceptance. The percentage of absenteeism or "truancy" was immense. By this New School Act, officers are appointed to look after truant children, and the effect has been most beneficial,—the police assistance being gratefully accepted by the parents. But there are as yet no means for competing children to attend school; hence the 40,000 still neglected, or unable to attend the common schools from their poor clothing.

The poor in Elberfeld, as we once informed our readers, after a visit to that city, have been for many years alimented on very much the same plan; with this difference only, that the money distributed to the poor in Elberfeld is not subscribed, but raised by a tax, while its distribution is by a voluntary organisation conducted like that of New York—with equal liberty, equal power, and equal self-denying labour and practical wisdom, in the examination of each individual case.

The most perfect exemplification of the same principle was afforded by the working, through the Church, of our old Scottish poor law, by which, whether the money for the poor was raised by a self-imposed tax authorised by law, or by voluntary contribution on the part of heritors, or at the church door on every Sunday, its disposal was entrusted to the minister and elders of each parish, and the expenditure regulated by the peculiar circumstances of each case, as to what was given, how much was given, and how long continued. Personal knowledge and house visitation were its very life and strength, and made it, in our humble opinion, at once the most economical and most Christian that ever existed in our country.

A remarkable and interesting experiment as to the practical application of this plan to a large city is one famous in the history of our poor-law administration. It was that of Dr. Chalmers, in the parish of St. John's, Glasgow. We have once more perused his chapters on this subject, along with his speech before the General Assembly,* and we believe that, whatever may be the fame of Chalmers in the next generation as a theologian or as a Church leader, he is destined to tell on the future more even than he has done on the past, by his wise and sagacious plans—the growth of a thoughtful mind, a Christian spirit, and great experience—for elevating the masses economically and spiritually.

The time is fast approaching when—urged by a sense of duty, by the cry of the deserving poor, by the increase of unprincipled pauperism, and by the obvious and acknowledged evils which the best worked poor law either produces, or can neither prevent nor cure—the Christian community of this land will be compelled to come to the rescue, and unite in works of true charity for the good of their suffering neighbours.* This would be the most practical and most lasting union of our Churches. Pious deeds would in the end more truly unite than pious words.

In the meantime we respectfully commend the thoughtful consideration of this all-important subject to our readers. We are glad to be able to do so in connection with an American society. The day is coming, if indeed it has not already come, when our brethren in America will be more closely united to us, and we to them; when the darkness of ignorance, prejudice, and unworthy jealousy which has, alas! too often marred our intercourse, will be dispelled by that sense of justice and truth, and by that chivalrous generosity of Christian love, which both of us so largely possess; when the two nations, descended from the same great stock, "speaking the language Shakspeare spoke," "holding the faith and morals Milton held," and both loving, more than any other nations upon earth, the true liberty and highest good of the human race, will intentionally and practically become one in promoting the reign of peace and of goodwill to men, and consider one another to pro-

By WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis," &c.

CHAPTER V .- THE EAST PENTALLECK TIN MINE.

During the next few years, nothing particularly worthy of notice occurred in the Thornbury family. The twins grew up fine, healthy, intelligent girls. Charity possibly became somewhat less volatile, but Ruth continued the same thoughtful, sedate creature we left her in the last chapter. Charity seemed to increase in beauty daily, and promised to be a most lovely woman. Ruth's personal attractions, on the contrary, did not improve as she grew older, although she was by no means ill-favoured. Like Charity, she was tall and well made, but perhaps just a little too slim in figure.

and that, since Ruth's fever, had generally been most satisfactory.

Little mention has hitherto been made of Edgar,

Not only did the sisters entertain towards each other an ardent affection, but there was between them unlimited confidence, not a thought or a wish of the one being unknown to the other. For the rest, they were dutiful and loving, neither of them probably having ever given their parents a moment's uneasiness or anxiety, apart from their bodily health;

* Since the above was in type, the sad disclosures regarding the Workhouse Hospitals in London have excited the horror and sympathy of the country. These hospitals contain 16,000 bedridden paupers, the great proportion of whom, from utter neglect and selfishness, are dying by inches of bed-sores!

the son and heir; this, however, is not because he will not hold a prominent place in our narrative, but rather because there has hardly been anything in his career different from the ordinary run of boys of his own age. He was tolerably good-looking, well made, and, though somewhat irascible, far from being ill-tempered. He had a fair amount of ability, and was generous, affectionate, and resolute. bore not only great love for his parents, but for his sisters also. Although, possibly, he teased Ruth more than he did Charity, and made the latter more his confidant, it would be unjust to say that his love was greater for the one than the other. Both the girls, in return, held him in high admiration and affection. Like his father, he had a great love for field sports, and before he was fourteen years of age he was not only a good and bold rider, but also a fair shot.

With the exception of Edgar's two years' residence at a boarding-school a few miles distant from the Red House. Mrs. Thornbury had hitherto been the sole instructress of her children. Though without what are generally termed accomplishments, like most Quakeresses she had received the elements of a good sound English education, and she found a pleasure in imparting instruction to her children. The question of economy, it must be admitted, was also somewhat mixed up in it. Her husband's income, though ample for their wants while the children were young, would hardly be sufficient when they grew older. Again, she was well aware that, although she was quite able to instruct her children up to a certain point, she could not go far beyond it, either with advantage to them or satisfaction to herself. It had therefore been determined on, that, when the twins had reached their fifteenth year, they should be sent to a first-rate finishing school in London for a short period, that they might have the benefit of the best masters in every branch of female education. This, of course, would entail increased expenditure, and this again would be augmented by the project Mr. Thornbury had formed of sending Edgar to Eton. To carry out both schemes would need, at the lowest computation, an additional outlay of at least five hundred pounds a year, and as Mr. Thornbury's income had never exceeded eight hundred, his wife had reasonably considered that by economising a little beforehand, the increase of expenditure would not be so much felt.

But notwithstanding all Mrs. Thornbury's foresight, she had missed one element out of her calculations. True, in the education of her children she had practised great economy; but in the same proportion that she had saved her husband had spent. He had never exceeded his income, but he had lived fully up to it, for though he had only one hobby, it was a most expensive one. He was passionately fond of hunting, and he spent more in horseflesh than he told his wife, so that when the time arrived when the twins should be sent to London, and Edgar to Eton, Mr. Thornbury, instead of having the necessary funds in hand, had not more than the balance of his last half-year's rents, and a portion of the last dividend arising from the money he had in the government securities. Of this, however, he did not inform his wife, and when her children were leaving her, she was under the pleasing but false impression, that, through her good management, the expense of finishing their education was already amply provided for.

After the children had been half a year at school, Mr. Thornbury left the Red House to bring them home for the vacation. A short time after their arrival, the bills for their schooling were sent in. The amounts of these were greater than Mr. Thornbury had anticipated, and they caused him considerable anxiety. By selling out some of the money he had in the funds he certainly would be able to meet them without difficulty, but then how could he provide for future claims that would be made on him? He saw that there were but two alternatives: either to reduce his domestic expenditure, or to hit upon some means of making money. The first would be so exceedingly painful to his pride, that he at once refused to entertain it. It must be admitted that a considerable amount of personal selfishness entered into his decision. It would have been difficult for him to have economised his household expenses, and at the same time to have lived in a style at all consistent with the position he held in society, so moderate, without being in the slightest degree niggardly, had been his wife's management. The only other way open to him was to have retrenched his hunting expenditure. Had he done this-sold one of his horses, and dismissed a groom-he would have saved not only sufficient to have paid his children's schooling, but have had money in pocket as well. This, however, he could not think of doing, and it now remained for him to find some plan by which he could increase his income. Trade, of course, he never thought of. In those days, any mercantilo transactions, save those of the very highest order, were deemed beneath the dignity of those who are now called country gentlemen of the good old school; and Mr. Thornbury was as prejudiced on the subject as his fellows, although he had married the daughter of a small Doncaster shopkeeper. At last he resolved that when he returned with his children to London after their holidays, he should sell out sufficient stock to pay their half-year's school bills, and at the same time hold a consultation with his stockbroker as to the best means he could adopt to increase his income.

When the time came, however, his stockbroker was out of Londou, and the person who transacted the business for him being a stranger, Mr. Thornbury did not like to ask his advice on the subject. But chance threw in his way, when he least expected it, a good authority on the subject. He had taken up his quarters at the Golden Cross Hotel, and one evening, in the coffee-room, he formed the acquaintance of a gentleman whose appearance and manners pleased him exceedingly.

In the course of conversation he informed Mr. Thornbury that he resided in Cornwall, where he was largely interested in mining operations, in which subject he seemed in fact to be particularly well versed. Mr. Thornbury at last became much interested in the details he heard, and many were the questions he put concerning them. He was, above all, struck with the enormous profits many of the mines yielded, and he readily admitted the truth of the argument, that if these were so remunerative, there was no possible reason why others might not be equally so. The conversation ended by the gentleman giving Mr. Thornbury his card, on which he wrote the name and address of a mining agent in the City, on whom full reliance might be placed. "He is an honourable and energetic young fellow," he said, "just commencing business, and well up in mining transactions. I am sure he will not allow you to be imposed upon by any one if you think of investing in mines, and I assure you it requires a good deal of caution and experience to detect what are good and what are bad speculations."

That night Mr. Thornbury slept little, his imagination being active upon the wonderful tales of brilliant fortunes made by mining, which he had heard in the coffee-room of the hotel. Immediately after breakfast next morning he started off to the City, to see the mining agent to whom he had been recommended. In fact, so early was it when he arrived, that he had anticipated the agent by more than half an hour. The short time before the latter's arrival, Mr. Thornbury spent in looking round the office. There was but little in it to attract or interest the unprofessional observer. A desk, two stools, and a long counter, were the only pieces of furniture it contained. On the counter were placed as many specimens of minerals as would have furnished a tolerably large geological museum, and under these again, others were ranged on the floor, very large and very heavy. Of the value of these specimens, of course, Mr. Thornbury was profoundly ignorant; but they served to convey the impression to his mind that the agent was a man of knowledge and ability, and well versed in the art and mystery of mining. When the agent arrived, Mr. Thornbury presented the card he had received from the stranger in the coffee-room, and he then briefly explained to him the object of his visit.

"I shall be very happy to give you any information in my power," said Mr. Morris, "and also to assist you in every way I can. Without self-laudation, I think I may say that I am as well acquainted with Cornwall and its mining operations as most men."

Mr. Thornbury immediately asked whether different mines, that had been spoken of on the previous evening, yielded such immense profits, and whether it would be possible for him to invest some money in them with advantage?

"Nothing can be truer than the account you have heard," said Mr. Morris, "and you can invest in those mines if you please, but, at the same time, remember that these shares are at an enormous premium, and therefore whether you can do so advantageously is another affair. I should rather say you could not, although by telling you so I am acting against my own personal interests. Money and money's worth are as well understood in Cornwall as in any part of the United Kingdom, and the men of Cornwall, as a rule, are as little disposed to part with a thing under its real value as any class of the population, take them from what part you may. The dividends of these mines, you must remember, are calculated on the original price of the shares, not the prices you can at present purchase them at. Now I will tell you what I would advise you to do, if you intend speculating in mines; and that is, to join a substantial respectable party of gentlemen in opening a new one."

"But I am totally unacquainted with a single person holding mining shares," said Mr. Thornbury, "and of course I should not like mixing myself up with a party of strangers."

"Very likely not," was the reply, "and I commend your prudence; at the same time, if you wish it, I could introduce you to some gentlemen with whom neither you nor any person living need object to act. There is, for example, a mine which it is contemplated opening, and one which promises most profitable results to the adventurers. In fact, I am at present organising the company."

"Would it be an indiscretion on my part," said Mr. Thornbury, "if I were to ask the particulars?"

"Indiscretion to ask it! Certainly not, my dear sir," said Mr. Morris. "At the same time, I hardly know whether I am at liberty to inform you who are the gentlemen engaged in the enterprise." Then, after a few moments' consideration, he continued: "After all, I do not see that there can possibly be any objection, as the number of shareholders is not yet complete. The mine I allude to is a tin mine. It is proposed that only twelve adventurers should be admitted into the concern, and at present there are only ten who have enrolled their names, although several others are nibbling at it; so I think it is not improbable you may have as good a chance of taking one of the vacant shares, as any of the others who have not yet fully made up their minds. At any rate, I will bring the question of your joining the company before them at their next meeting, if you wish it."

"And those who have already joined it are all respectable and responsible men?" inquired Mr.

Thornbury.

"Highly so," was the reply. "I might say, without the slightest exaggeration, there is not a man worth less than thirty thousand pounds among them."

"What capital would you require?"

"They propose that each shareholder should be prepared, in case of need, to advance as much as one thousand pounds, but it is more than probable not one half of the money would be required. Each proprietor would then have nominally one hundred shares allotted to him, and as the mine prospers these will naturally rise to a premium. Even with moderate success, nothing is more probable than that, at the end of two years, the sale of ten of your one hundred shares would more than recoupe you for the advance you have made, and you would thus have the remaining ninety shares without their having cost you one shilling."

"But if anything should go wrong, would not the liabilities be very great?"

"The mine will be worked on the cost-book principle, by which every shareholder's liability is limited to the amount of the shares he holds."

"But is that really a fact?" inquired Mr. Thornbury. "I have heard that in mining concerns the liability is unlimited, but I must admit that my knowledge of the subject is of the most limited description."

"By the cost-book principle, I can assure you that you are strictly limited to the amount of your shares. I know perfectly well that this view of the subject has been disputed, but I can show you the opinion I have lately received from an eminent barrister, well versed in the laws relating to mines, and he appears to have no doubt about the matter."

"Where is the mine situated?"

"About twelve miles from Truro, in the heart of the mining district. Labour is abundant in the neighbourhood, and access easy."

"What is the name of the mine?" inquired Mr.

Thornbury.

"The East Pentalleck Tin Mine."

"What is the amount of the purchase money to be paid to the present proprietors?"

"Nothing whatever," was the reply. "You will have to pay a royalty on all the tin it yields."

"Then there is no outlay for the purchase or the lease at the commencement," said Mr. Thornbury, evidently with much interest.

"Not one shilling," said Mr. Morris. "As I said before, you will merely have to pay a royalty, and a very moderate one, on the yield."

Mr. Thornbury was now silent for some moments, evidently deeply absorbed in thought. He then inquired what was the quantity as well as the quality of the tin found in the mine.

"My dear sir," said Mr. Morris, "pray do not deceive yourself on the subject. At present there is neither a mine, nor the appearance of one, more than on the floor we are standing on; the locality has simply the appearance of a barren moor. Not a spade has yet been placed in it."

"How do you know it contains tin, then?"

"We are almost certain of its existence from the fact that on all sides of the spot we have chosen are mines at present in full work, yielding large profits to the owners, and the probabilities are a thousand to one that some of the same veins must pass through our property."

"But is that opinion based upon good authority?" said Mr. Thornbury.

"On the highest authority, I can assure you. I will give you a proof. The person we have engaged as captain of the mine is one of the most experienced men in all Cornwall. There is a joke extant about him (though, by-the-bye, I am not so sure that it is a mere joke after all), that he was born underground, and has lived there three parts of his life. When Mr. Tredegar, for that is his name, received our proposition to put him at the head of a mine we intended opening, at first he agreed to the terms readily enough, but when he heard where the mine was situated, he positively refused to accept the appointment, unless he was allowed to take a twelfth share in it himself."

"But," inquired Mr. Thornbury, "did he expect to receive it as a gratuity?"

"Certainly not," said Mr. Morris, "he was to pay for it equally with the other shareholders. Some of the other shareholders demurred greatly to the proposition, and one of them offered to double his stake in the concern if Mr. Tredegar was not allowed to be a partner; but as the latter was imperative, and we could not do very well without him, we were obliged to submit to his terms."

"I think," said Mr. Thornbury, "it would have been very impolitic to have refused him."

"And I entirely agree with you," said Mr. Morris; "though some of the rest thought otherwise: holding that Tredegar, if he became a shareholder, would then at the same time be both a master and a servant. But it is now settled that he shall be allowed to take a twelfth share, and I have no doubt all will go on amicably for the future."

"Should I feel disposed to join the concern," said Mr. Thornbury, "how soon would you require my definitive answer?"

"In the first place," said Mr. Morris, "I am not prepared to say there will be a share at your disposal. But at the next meeting of the shareholders, which will take place in a few days, I will bring the subject before them, if you wish it. At the same time, remember I told you that there were several persons inclined to take shares, who have not definitely made up their minds. Of this I am sure, however, that if no personal friend of the present shareholders applies for the disposable shares, they will be allotted to those strangers who first apply for them. If you wish to join us, the sooner you send in a written application for a share, together with a cheque for 2001., the amount of the first call, the greater will be the probability of your success."

So anxious was Mr. Thornbury to secure a share in the East Pentalleck Tin Mine, that he spent very little time in making inquiries respecting the character of the agent. Indeed, he had some little difficulty in finding any one acquainted with Mr. Morris, and when at last he succeeded, the information he obtained respecting him was almost wholly of a negative description. Mr. Thornbury's authority had never heard anything said against Mr. Morris. He knew very little about him, but he seemed a very pushing energetic young man—one who was determined to make his way in the world. He (the authority) did not believe, from what he had seen of him, that he would in any way lend his name to a dishonest transaction.

Scanty and negative as all this was, it was eonsidered perfectly satisfactory by Mr. Thornbury, and he immediately sold out sufficient stock to pay the first call. Next day he called upon Mr. Morris with a cheque; and, after having filled up a form of application, he asked if it were likely he should obtain the share he was applying for? To his great satisfaction, he was informed by the agent that there was every prospect of his having the share allotted to him, as there were two shares still unappropriated, and only two applicants for them, so that they might have one each, always supposing that no personal friends of the present shareholders were desirous of taking them. The shareholders, Mr. Morris continued, were to meet next day, and the day afterwards Mr. Thornbury would certainly receive an answer to his application; and he (Mr. Morris) had no doubt it would be a favourable one. Two days afterwards, Mr. Thornbury received a note from the agent, informing him that he had been allotted one of the shares. All now being satisfactorily arranged, he made his preparations for leaving London, and returning to the Red House.

On his arrival at home, he found a letter awaiting him, which not only caused him considerable annoyance, but necessitated his immediate return to London. It has already been stated that his farms were copyhold under the Dean and Chapter of the Diocese. They were held for three lives; and a heavy fine was imposed on either of them falling in. About two years previous, one of them had fallen in; the fines were paid, and a young healthy life was substituted for the person deceased. Mr. Thornbury then fondly hoped that it would be many years before another change of the kind would take place: but he was doomed to be terribly disappointed. The person who had been nominated had died suddenly from an attack of apoplexy, and the letter which awaited him was from the solicitors of the Dean and Chapter, informing him of the event, and requesting that the new fine might be paid into their bankers with as little delay as possible. As there was no possibility of disputing the matter, Mr. Thornbury left home to raise the money by selling out the remainder of what he had in the funds, which would be sufficient for the purpose, and leave a balance of some hundred pounds. This he determined to place in the hands of his bankers. to be in readiness should any further ealls be required for working the East Pentalleck Tin Mine.

While in London, Mr. Thornbury formed the acquaintance of his brother shareholders in the mine. They seemed a plain, straightforward, jovial set of men, and pleased him immensely; while they, in their turn, seemed highly satisfied with their new associate. Moreover, they dined together, and drank success to their new undertaking. Thornbury took the chair on the occasion, and Mr. Morris, the agent, occupied the seat at the opposite end of the table. Mr. Thornbury, like most country gentlemen of the time, was fond of conviviality, and he was now in his glory. The guests all paid him the greatest respect, and listened with marked interest to his description of the state of agriculture in his part of the country, and of its local politics as well. They were also much pleased with the account he gave of his family, particularly the twins: and they then and there resolved that different parts of the mine should be called by their names, and, that this might not be forgotten, Mr. Morris was requested on the spot to make a note of their wish, and to see it carried into effect. They parted at a late hour, with abundant expressions of good feeling towards each other. And the next day Mr. Thornbury returned home.

pleted, Mr. Thornbury now employed all his energies in advancing the interests of the Pentalleck Tin Mine-in fact, he made it a perfect hobby. He had a copy of every despatch sent by Mr. Tredegar, the captain, forwarded to him at the Red House; and, as chairman of the company, he punctually returned his opinion endorsed on it, for the benefit of his brother shareholders. It was true he was, in reality, profoundly ignoraut on all mining affairs; but Mr. Morris had contrived to persuade him that he had a sort of natural genius for tin, and Mr. Thornbury had too great faith in the agent's integrity to doubt him. If he occasionally erred, it was not to be wondered at; even Mr. Morris himself (and that gentleman, with great modesty, admitted it) was sometimes at fault respecting the yield and requirements of the mine, although he had been brought up to the business all his life. Mr. Morris, for example, had firmly believed that the first call would have been ample for the working of the mine, as well as bringing it into full operation; but it had since appeared that much more was needed-so much, in fact, that before the works had been six months in progress, three other calls of 100l. each had been required.

The affair of the copyholds having been com-

The mine also (judging from the captain's reports) seemed to possess several annoying peculiarities. was ready enough to yield, in different quantities, several other minerals, though not the particular one required. It occasionally gave cupel, quartz, pench, mundig, and even now and then a little copper, but not a single particle of tin. Immediately after a call had been paid in, the reports generally became unsatisfactory, and ran in such a strain as this :- "The ground in the shaft continues hard, and there is an increase of water; but still I am in hopes it will not increase much more. Otherwise, all going on well." When more money was required, reports were more encouraging, and great hope was held out of immediate success. "The water has now disappeared," Mr. Tredegar would then write, "and everything is going on most satisfactorily. The mine looks kindly for tin. I herewith send you the cost sheet; by it you will perceive we are four hundred pounds in debt to the bankers. I am sorry for it, but it could not be helped. I have no fear of the ultimate results, although a little more money is now needed than was anticipated. I am certain the mine will be a success. Why should it not?" It should also be remarked that the resolution come to on the night of the dinner, respecting the naming of two of the principal parts had been faithfully carried out, and Mr. Thornbury felt quite flattered when he read such sentences in Mr. Tredegar's reports as that "Charity's shaft is now rather more than five fathom below the forty fathom;" or that "Ruth's adit was being driven by two men who well understood the work." These extracts always put him in good humour to pay the next call; and that, perhaps, after all, was what Mr. Tredegar intended.

Although the willingness and regularity shown by Mr. Thornbury in paying up his calls gave him great credit with the agent and Mr. Tredegar, he became at last somewhat anxious, if not alarmed, at their frequency. But he was informed that the necessity for these calls could be accounted for in a very disagreeable way. Three of the shareholders had become defaulters, and their estates, when wound up, did not pay one shilling in the pound to their creditors, and the remaining creditors had to submit to heavier calls in consequence. At last two other shareholders emigrated to America, leaving their last calls still unpaid. Never had Mr. Morris (and he acknowledged it too) been more deceived in his life than in the character of these men. He would have trusted them with every farthing he possessed in the world.

The water also rushed into the mine with greater violence than ever; though, at the same time, on every fresh application for money, Mr. Tredegar reported that "the mine looked kindly for tin." A drowning man proverbially catches at a straw, and in Mr. Thornbury's mining career this straw was the expression, so often repeated by the captain of the mine, that "it looked kindly for tin." Over and over again it had induced Mr. Thornbury to make a further advance, without remonstrance, in the hope that the promise thus held out would be realised. The mine, however, notwithstanding all the outlay, yielded not one ounce of tin, while its powers of absorbing gold seemed unlimited. At last, when the whole of the thousand pounds he had subscribed for was exhausted without the slightest return, Mr. Thornbury resolutely determined he would not advance another shilling. However, he was mistaken. The whole affair collapsed. Mr. Tredegar either absconded, or again took up his residence in some underground locality, where it was impossible to find him. After his disappearance it was found that, in his double capacity of master and servant, he had contrived to incur enormous liabilities on account of the mine, which Mr. Thornbury was requested to pay, his brother shareholders having been proved, to the satisfaction of the creditors, not to be worth powder and shot, or in other words they were not likely to pay the cost of prosecuting them. At first Mr. Thornbury obstinately refused to pay a farthing more than his own proportion of the liabilities, but proceedings at law having been taken against him, he was obliged to put the affair into the hands of his solicitor, who candidly advised him to pay the amount claimed without litigation, rather than incur heavy costs, as he would certainly lose the action. Mr. Thornbury, on looking coolly over the matter, followed his lawyer's advice, but he could only do so by the sale of the best of his copyhold farms, which had been in his family for more than two centuries.

CHAPTER VI.-RUTH'S LITTLE LOVE AFFAIR.

THE transactions described in the last chapter extended over the space of two years, and the total loss Mr. Thornbury experienced, including the fine on the copyholds, was something more than five thousand pounds. This naturally caused a great decrease in his income, and he had to take into consideration what reduction he could make in his expenditure, so as to bring it within the limit of his means. The first act of economy he practised was to reduce his own personal expenses. He sold one of his two hunters, and discharged a groom. This was a considerable saving, but still more had to be effected. The only plan he could now devise was either to take Edgar or his daughters from school. For some time he deliberated which of the two methods he would adopt, both being equally repugnant to his feelings. He much wished his daughters to remain another year under tuition, by which time it was considered their education would be completed; but, on the other hand, he considered it necessary for Edgar's future prospects that he should continue at Eton. True, he had not in any way distinguished himself there, except in boating and cricketing, yet his father imagined that his association with the class of youths there would not only be advantageous to his bearing as a gentleman, but possibly be a stepping stone to his future advancement.

At last a circumstance occurred which relieved him from the dilemma. One morning Mrs. Thornbury received a letter from the mistress of the school, at which the twins were, informing her that small-pox having broken out among the scholars, the physician deemed it necessary that the others should be immediately removed. This intelligence naturally caused great consternation at the Red House. Mr. Thornbury without delay started for London, and in a few days returned, bringing with him his daughters. Both the girls seemed somewhat out of health, but this was naturally attributed to the fatigue of the journey, and nothing more was said about the matter.

The morning after their arrival, Charity was too unwell to leave her bed, and the family medical attendant was called in. As soon as he saw her he intimated that she was suffering from small-pox and advised that no one who had not had the disease, or who had not been vaccinated, should be allowed to approach her. Mrs. Thornbury, greatly alarmed, suggested to her husband that he should immediately ascertain whether one of the tenants would not receive Ruth into his house during her sister's illness. Mr. Thornbury found one without difficulty, and Ruth was informed that it was necessary for her to leave home for a short time, otherwise she also might be attacked by the disease. But Mrs. Thornbury's usual influence over her daughter seemed lost on the present occasion. Ruth not only refused to leave the house, but insisted on nursing Charity through her illness. In vain was Mr. Thornbury called in to add the force of his commands to his wife's arguments; the usually mild and submissive girl now showed a determination which fairly surprised her parents. "Do not, dear mother," she said, "insist on anything of the kind. You know I have never yet disobeyed you, and pray do not oblige me to do so now, for it would grieve me sorely. But nothing shall induce me to leave Charity." Her parents, finding her so resolute, allowed her to remain, and Ruth immediately installed herself as Charity's head nurse, sleeping in her room, and never quitting her night or day. The disease fortunately proved to be of the mildest description; and, thanks to the skill of the doctor, combined with the excellent nursing of Ruth and her mother, assisted by Deborah, she rapidly recovered.

Charity was hardly pronounced convalescent when Ruth was attacked by the same malady. In her case the disease showed itself in a far more virulent form; indeed, at one time her life was despaired of, but she in her turn also recovered, Although fortunately the malady left no traces on Charity's countenance, that of Ruth was considerably marked by it, though not to such an extent as to disfigure her. A slight incident which occurred before Ruth had completely recovered may be here quoted as tending to show how much greater was her anxiety for Charity than for herself. She had one morning, during her recovery, risen from her bed, and was examining her face, which was still scarred, in the looking-glass. When she perceived how much she had been marked, the spirit of the young girl of eighteen for a moment, but only for a moment, rose within her, and her eyes filled with tears. Then suddenly brushing them away, she said, "It is a pity, a great pity; but how fortunate it is there is not the slightest scar on Charity's beautiful face."

Mrs. Watkins (Mrs. Thornbury's mother) died shortly after the disappearance of the small-pox from the Red House. Although she preserved her mental faculties to the last, she had been bedridden for many years, and her death did not take the family by surprise. Since leaving Doncaster, she had lived in a very quiet manner on the interest of 1200l. she had accumulated during the time she amount to be divided among her three grandchildren-500% to each of the girls, and the remainder to Edgar. Although the amount was not large, it was most acceptable to the Thornbury family in the present state of their finances. The girls immediately resolved that they would put their parents to no further expense for their dress. determining that the interest on the money they had inherited should supply them with every requisite for their toilet.

The next two years were particularly quiet ones to the family. The twins had fully recovered from the effects of the small-pox, the only memorial of the malady being some slight marks on Ruth's face. Both were now in the prime of girlhood. Ruth, it is true, had but few personal attractions beyond being a fine, well-grown, healthy young woman. The best feature in her face was certainly her mouth, which was not only beautifully formed, but, when she smiled, displayed a very regular set of teeth, white as the purest ivory. Her smile had, moreover, something exceedingly sweet in it, but unfortunately her family alone had the advantage of it. She was naturally of an extremely nervous and timid temperament, which became very apparent in the presence of strangers. Her countenance would then assume an expression of harshness, utterly inconsistent with her natural disposition.

If some objections might be taken to Ruth's personal appearance, they were fully neutralised by her mental endowments. To great intelligence she added an amiability of temper rarely equalled. Deborah used to boast that she had never in her life seen her out of temper. It must not be imagined, however, that she was naturally of au apathetic disposition. On the contrary, she was exceedingly impressionable, feeling acutely any tale of woe, and, with the greatest assiduity and kindness, assisting to the utmost of her power those of the poor around her who were in trouble. Yet all this was done in her own peculiarly quiet way. The good she did was generally done in secret, her right hand not knowing what her left hand gave. The first intimation her parents generally received of some sick pillow having been smoothed by her, of some poor mother in her confinement having had the necessary clothing and linen given her by Ruth, or of some one in fever being supplied with tea from the Red House, was from the parties themselves who had been benefited.

Ruth's love for her family continued as ardent as ever, yet without becoming in the least more demonstrative. No parents could ever have boasted of a more affectionate daughter than Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury had in Ruth; nor any brother of a better tempered, more constant, and indulgent sister than Edgar. But it was in her love for Charity that Ruth's affectionate disposition principally displayed itself; she seemed never happy when she was out of Charity's sight. And apart from the fact of her was in business. By her will, she left the whole being her sister, she had good cause; for a more levely or levable creature than Charity it would be difficult to imagine. In person she was exquisitely formed: her face combined with the mould of the Greek ideal the open confiding expression of the pure thoroughbred English girl. And the expression was not in the least unfaithful: a mean or jealous or unworthy thought she was incapable of harbouring. Though far lovelier and less thoughtful than Ruth, she was equally affectionate, and certainly more demonstrative. She was the glory of her mother, and the idol of her father; yet she never presumed on the power she must have been aware she possessed over them, but always showed them the respectful love of a good and obedient child. With Edgar she was invariably on the best possible understanding. Ruth's love she returned in full, great as it was; in fact, in respect of mind, the two sisters seemed to be one person, neither having a thought or a wish concealed from the other. Though twins, Charity seemed to look upon Ruth as an elder sister, always, when in need, applying to her for advice, and modifying her possibly too rapidly formed conclusions under the advice and suggestion of her more sedate counsellor. Ruth accepted without hesitation the mental superiority Charity tacitly admitted her to be possessed of, and guided her more volatile sister rather like a grave experienced matron than a girl of the same age.

Although they were now of an age to be introduced into the world and mix in society, they led almost as secluded a life as if they had been the inmates of a convent. The economical basis on which Mr. Thornbury had arranged his domestic expenditure, precluded them from receiving friends at home; and, although it was not likely two such amiable intelligent girls would lack invitations, they had too much pride to profit by them, knowing full well their inability to offer any return. Of course, under such a system, there was but little probability of their forming such acquaintanceships as might ultimately lead to matrimonial engagements. In Ruth's case, her family had already tacitly set her down as a confirmed old maid: nor did she make the slightest objection to such an arrangement, but quietly answered to the nick-name of Tabby, which her brother had bestowed on her. With Charity the case was very different. That she would one day marry, both Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury felt perfectly couvinced; but they seemed to hold by the old-fashioned idea, that marriages were made in heaven, for they took no steps whatever to introduce their child into such society as would lead her to form an eligible alliance. Possibly, after all, there was a slight taint of selfishness in the apparent apathy the parents showed as to the future prospects of their child. They loved her too dearly to entertain willingly the subject of parting with her; and, although they admitted to themselves that the time would come when she must leave them, they seemed resolved to defer the evil day as long as possible.

It is stated, however, on somewhat doubtful authority, that Ruth's girlhood did not pass without a love affair. If so, this was the only secret she did not confide to her sister. At the same time, it must be admitted that she did show not the slightest anger when Charity joked with her on the subject. All that can be really proved is, that a grave, semi-pious, and very mild flirtation was carried on, when she was about twenty years of age, between her and the Rev. Isaiah Jones, of Jesus College, Oxford, and only curate to the vicar of the neighbouring parish of Brentwood. The vicar was a confirmed invalid, who resided almost entirely on the Continent for the benefit of his health, leaving the duties of his cure of souls to his subordinate. In those days, the students of Jesus College, Oxford, were composed almost entirely of Welshmen; and the Rev. Isaiah himself was from that Principality. The students were all described by a wag of the period as being short of stature, red-haired, and deeply marked with the small-pox, and it was asserted that only one of them, a Mr. Jones, had wine in his rooms. How far this might have been true, it is impossible to say; but, at all events, Isaiah had several personal attributes in common with his brother-students, for he was short of stature, with hair almost the colour of the setting sun, and it was clearly proved by his face, that if he had ever been vaccinated, it had been performed in the most imperfect manner. Moreover, it was certain that he was not the Mr. Jones who had wine in his rooms. He was poor-miserably poor-but thoroughly honest; and as he would as soon have committed a robbery as incurred a debt which he could not pay-and as the only way he could have obtained the wine would have been by taking it on credit, there could be no doubt that he was not the distinguished Mr. Jones of Jesus College. On his promotion to his curacy he gained but little. His salary was only fifty pounds a-year, and ten pounds of that, it was currently reported, he forwarded annually to his widowed mother, who kept a small general shop near Welshpool. But it must not be imagined that he spent the whole of the balance on himself. The Rev. Isaiah Jones, with a stipend that a journeyman mechanic would have spurned, was liberal in proportion to his meausliberal almost to imprudence. He could resist no tale of woe; and as his curacy was situated in the heart of a poor agricultural district, where the rates were five shillings in the pound, it may easily be imagined that he heard many. Small as his own means were, there were but few of the gentry in the neighbourhood who would assist him from their private purses. "Did they not pay heavy poor's rates, and was not that sufficient?" "If the poor were in want, was there not the poor-house for them? and if sick, was the parish surgeon not paid to attend them at their own homes ?- and what could they want more?" They omitted to take into consideration, however, that drugs were expensive articles, and that the surgeon's remuneration averaged only sixpence per case, including medical comforts; and that between that small sum and the requirements of the patient, much was needed from private charity. Again, it should be stated that the reverend gentleman was not popular with the surrounding gentry, though greatly liked by the poor. There was a certain independence of manner about him, a certain off-hand candid manner of expostulation, which hardly harmonised with his position and his too evident low origin. Besides, his dress was exceedingly shabby, and his toilet generally so little attended to, that it was impossible he should be tolerated in good society: at least, such was the opinion of the majority of the ladies in the vicinity.

The only person who really actively assisted him in his exertions on behalf of the poor was Ruth Thornbury. They frequently met at the bedsides of the sick and dying, and often brought both comfort and consolation into families whose fate would have been sad indeed save for their kind ministrations. By degrees Mr. Jones came under the notice of Mr. Thornbury, who invited him to his house, and he became a frequent guest at his table. He was also a great favourite with Mrs. Thornbury, who, though now a member of the Church of England, still retained many of her original Quaker predilections. The poor curate's contempt for the vanities of the world pleased her greatly, although her pleasure would have been enhanced had he been more particular in respect to the neatness of his attire. Like the Friends, he entertained a far higher opinion of the value of good works than is generally found out of that philanthropic community. He was likewise an especial favourite with Deborah, who admired immensely his candid straightforward way of speaking his mind. She clearly saw he was no respecter of persons-a fact which accorded well with her republican and Quaker-like views of social equality. Charity also from the first liked him in her heart, although she used to quiz him terribly when she was alone with Ruth.

"My dear," Charity one day said to her sister, "the pains your reverend friend takes about the poor does him great credit."

"He certainly is most anxious in their behalf," said Ruth.

"At the same time it appears to me that he takes a great deal more trouble in finding out new cases than is at all necessary."

" How so ?"

"He seeks them occasionally in localities where he must know, if his zeal gave him time for reflection, that there is not the slightest probability of finding them."

"I never remarked that," said Ruth.

"You surprise me," said Charity. "I really shall begin to think that man has bewitched you, Ruth. Why nothing can be plainer than the useless trouble he sometimes gives himself in finding out the poor."

"Well, in coming here at least three days a week to find them."

"What nonsense you do talk, Charity!" said Ruth.

"What other possible reason can he have for coming, then?" said Charity, with a look of well simulated surprise.

"To see papa, of course,"

"Well, Ruth, I hardly think that can be the ease," said Charity. "Papa only speaks to him during dinner-time, and as he has the bad habit of falling asleep immediately afterwards, I hardly think that can be the cause of the reverend gentleman's frequent visits. Try again, Ruth."

"Perhaps it is to see mamma."

"That can't well be the case, Ruth; there must be some other cause."

"I have it now," said Rnth, laughing, "it is to see you, Charity."

"Now, dear Ruth, I am delighted to hear you say so," said Charity, "for it takes a great weight off my mind. Do you know, I began to fear you were the point of attraction? Over and over again, I fancied you were in danger of becoming the wife of a little Welsh parson. They say, by-the-byc, Ruth, that all little parsons become very fat as they get older, and Isaiah's appearance would hardly be improved if that were to be his fate. And do tell me what his prospects are; he surely cannot intend to be always a poor curate on fifty pounds a-year."

"No, he hopes some day to be taken into partnership with a person who keeps a boys' school near Welshpool; and besides, he expects to be appointed a curate in the same parish the school is in. If so, he may not be so badly off after all."

"Very true, my dear, but tell me how it was he made you his confidant in all those interesting little family affairs? I should have thought they would rather have been a subject for him to entertain papa with. Ruth, my dear," Charity continued, "stop, ere it is too late. Believe me, you are not adapted for the wife of a schoolmaster. The boys would play all sorts of pranks on you with impunity. They would lock you up in your room, and would not release you again unless you gave them the key of your fruit-closet, or some such thing; and besides, if ever you got one punished for his bad behaviour, it is more than probable you would ask his pardon for your unkindness afterwards. Ruth, you must not dream of such an incongruous union."

At last, the frequency of the reverend gentleman's visits to the Red House began to excite the curiosity of the servants, whose remarks among themselves on the subject were of the most explicit description. True, neither Mr. nor Mrs. Thornbury saw anything remarkable in his behaviour. They knew full well the general invitation they had given him, which had been dictated purely by the knowledge of his great poverty, and by the thought "Give me an instance," said Ruth attized by that it might sometimes spare him the expense of dining at home. The idea of a poor Welsh curate falling in love with the daughter of an English squire, was far too absurd to enter into Mr. Thornbury's imagination for a moment. That Ruth had a strong liking for the energetic, kind-hearted little man, there can be no doubt, and that she felt much pleasure in his society is equally certain; but whether she ever really loved him is a doubtful point. That he loved her was a far more certain matter. The poor widow, at whose cottage he lodged, remarked to Deborah that she could not think what had lately come over the parson, for he was for ever brushing his hair, and was, moreover, becoming very particular about the getting-up of his linen, which had till lately been a matter of perfect indifference to him.

Deborah made no remark at the time, but the words of Mr. Jones's laudlady left a deep impression on her mind. Although she strongly approved of the reverend gentleman's ideas of equality in theological matters, she by no means approved of them in relation to her young mistress; in fact, Mr. Thornbury himself could hardly have been more indignant at the thought of the curate's proposing for his daughter than was Deborah. Still, she resolved not to speak of the subject either to Mr. or Mrs. Thornbury till she had more certain proof of the feelings and intentions of the curate, thinking it possible she might be in error. At the same time she resolved to watch the young couple narrowly, and then, if she found it necessary, she could put her master and mistress on their guard.

One morning when Mr. Thornbury was absent, and his wife and Charity were occupied in some other part of the house, Ruth and the curate were left by themselves in the drawing-room. Little conversation had passed between them, Ruth's attention having been fixed upon some flowers sho was embroidering. The curate was apparently absorbed in the contents of a book he held in his hand. The careful observer might, however, have perceived that he never turned over the leaves of the book he pretended to be reading, but that his eyes were incessantly wandering from it to his companion. Suddenly, as if impelled by a motive which he found it impossible to resist, he threw the book on the sofa, and hurriedly walking up to Ruth, threw himself on his knees by her side, and grasped her hand. which she immediately and angrily withdrew. Whether this behaviour on her part brought the curate to his senses, or whether he recovered them spontaneously, it is impossible to say; but he abruptly rose from his knees, and, without saying a word, seized his hat and left the room. But Ruth's behaviour was not the only shock he received on the occasion. On leaving the drawing-room, he saw Deborah standing before the door, which had been open, with a peculiarly stern expression on her countenance. He passed her without saying a word and left the house, which he never afterwards entered. In what manner he was informed that his future visits would not be acceptable, it is impossible to say. Most probably the intelligence was conveyed to him by Deborah, acting under the orders of her mistress. Certainly, Mr. Thornbury knew nothing of it; for he frequently expressed his wonder at the continued absence of the parson. Ruth never saw her reverend admirer again, for he shortly afterwards left the neighbourhood for the appointment he had spoken of in Wales. Whether Ruth had really been offended at his behaviour, she alone knew; but if so, her anger in time certainly vanished, for long after he had become the little fat schoolmaster predicted by Charity, she spoke of him as having been a very pious, exemplary young man, and one much to be admired.

CHAPTER VII. - CHARITY'S LOVE-AFFAIR.

WE stated in the last chapter, that although Mr. Thornbury had greatly reduced his expenditure, and had even discharged a groom and sold one of his hunters, he still kept a horse for his own use. In fact, he appeared to carry his love of hunting so far beyond the bounds of hobbyism, that it almost assumed the appearance of insanity. And the older he got, the more the passion seemed to increase, his adventures at the last "meeting" generally forming the staple of his conversation till the next one. He spoke frequently in terms of the highest admiration of different gentlemen connected with the hunt. He used to regret that his straitened circumstances precluded his inviting them to his house, as he was persuaded that his wife and daughters would be as much pleased with their society as he himself was. As, however, their principal qualifications in his eyes appeared to consist in their being remarkably good fellows, bold riders, and possessed of fine strong horses, Mrs. Thornbury and the girls hardly seemed to feel the loss so keenly as he did.

One evening, after a long and fatiguing day's "run," Mr. Thornbury, having finished his dinner, and taken a lengthened nap afterwards, suddenly informed the girls that he had good news to tell them. That day, he said, the hunt had agreed to give a ball to the ladies and friends of the members, and it was to come off within a fortnight at the Assembly Rooms at X-.... He further stated that one gentleman among them, being a bachelor, and a stranger in that part of the country, had no acquaintance to whom he could give his ladies' ticket, and had in consequence offered it to him (Mr. Thornbury) if he chose to make use of it. "So now, girls," he continued, "you must set to work as quickly as you can, and get all your smartest things in readiness, as I expect you to be the belles of the room. I have no doubt that before the ball comes off, I shall be able to get a ticket for your mother; so we shall make altogether a snug little party of our own."

"My dear," said Mrs. Thornbury, "you must leave me out altogether. I certainly do not mean to say that such amusements are sinful, as wiser and better heads than mine hold the contrary, but I have never yet been present at a ball, and I have a dislike, a prejudice you may call it if you please, against going to one now, when I am getting an old woman; so you must go without me."

The girls here joined their father in persuading Mrs. Thornbury to change her mind, but without effect; and at last they gave up the attempt and submitted, though with real regret, to going to the ball without her.

Never since the birth of the twins, had there been so much excitement in the Red House, as during the fortnight preceding the ball. Not only were numerous family conclaves held, but the family carriage was dragged from its resting-place in the coach-house, where it had remained perfectly undisturbed since the collapse of the Pentalleck mining affair. It was now cleaned and brushed up to make it look as well as possible, and the twins made almost daily journeys in it to X-, especially to the houses of the principal mercer and the head milliner of the town. Long and mysterious were the transactions which took place in these two establishments, and vast was the amount of thought bestowed upon them. Experiments of the most profound description were made to discover what colours harmonised best with others, and with the complexion, and what ornaments for the hair were most becoming. The subject was one overladen with difficulties. In the first place the sisters had determined to dress exactly alike; and as Charity's complexion was a beautiful blonde, while Ruth was somewhat of a sallow brunette, it will readily be admitted that the colours which were adapted to the one, were hardly suitable to the other. As the idea of dressing alike was never even thought of being abandoned, it was some time before they arrived at a definite conclusion on all the matters brought under their notice. At last, however, all was satisfactorily arranged, and the dressmaker progressed with her labours to both the sisters' hearts content.

The evening of the ball at last arrived. At dinner Mr. Thornbury was informed by his daughters that their dresses had been completed in the most satisfactory manner, and they had no doubt they should at least do him no discredit on the occasion. At table neither of the girls showed the slightest appetite, so great was their excitement. Mr. Thornbury continually pressed them to eat, reminding them of the fatigue they were about to undergo, and his wife added her persuasions, but without avail. To oblige their parents, they swallowed a few mouthfuls, but the effort was a painful one, and they soon gave it up.

Dinner was hardly over before they left the table and sought their room to commence their toilets. When they entered it they found that Deborah, and a young girl who assisted her, had prepared everything for them. Their beds and all the chairs in the room were perfectly covered with smart articles of female attire. It indeed seemed a puzzle how two young ladies could contrive to put on their persons such a quantity of dress. Their courage, however, seemed quite equal to the occasion, and they commenced to dress with a resolution that nothing could daunt. It was amusing to observe the anxiety of Deborah on the occasion. When she first heard of their intention to be present at the ball, her Quaker prejudices immediately developed themselves, and for several days she was silent and sulky. By degrees, however, as different articles of millinery were sent in and placed in her custody, she gave way, and when the evening of the ball at last arrived, she was scarcely less interested in the matter than were the sisters themselves. Her admiration of Ruth and Charity increased with every fresh ornament they put on, till at last the prim Quakeress became quite enthusiastic. When their toilets were completed, she stood and gazed at them with wonder. Charity especially drew forth her admiration, which increased till she could not suppress her feelings, but, forgetting the relative position of mistress and servant, cast her arms around the girl and kissed her affectionately, to the great danger of her dress, saying: "Bless thee, my child; thou art indeed a beauty." Nor was Deborah without great excuse for this freedom of manner. A lovelier object than Charity at this moment was, it would be difficult to imagine. She was radiant with beauty. seemed to cast over the more homely features of Ruth a portion of its loveliness, and, instead of being a mere foil to her sister, she seemed handsome in the reflected light. When they descended into the drawing-room, their parents were equally delighted with them; and it is more than probable that, at the moment, Mrs. Thornbury regretted the resolution she had formed, not to make one of the party to the ball.

The carriage being now at the door, Mr. Thornbury and his daughters entered it, and in due time they arrived at the Assembly Rooms. As they were rather late, the rooms were already filled, and the dancing had commenced. For some minutes after their entrance the girls were a little nervous, but they soon recovered their self-possession. Their appearance produced a great sensation, and elicited much admiration; for they were certainly, as Mr. Thornbury had predicted, the belles of the room. Charity especially attracted attention, and numerous were the gentlemen who begged to be introduced to her. Ruth also had many admirers, and danced as often as her sister. She was doubly happy; for she had not only pleasure in the attentions she herself received, but on all sides she heard high praises of Charity's beauty. Ruth was frequently asked by her partners who that lovely girl was, and she felt intense pride in answering, "She is my sister."

In the course of the evening Mr. Thornbury introduced to Charity a Mr. Morecombe. He was a remarkably handsome man, of decidedly fine appearance and manners.

""," To this gentleman," said Mr. Thornbury, "you are indebted for the pleasure you are now enjoying. It was he who kindly gave you his ladies' ticket.

Without it, my dear, you would have remained in solitude at home."

"While I acquit you personally of all obligation," said Mr. Morecombe, gallantly, "I must hold at the same time that the Hunt owe me a debt of gratitude for my liberality." Then, turning to Charity, he requested that she would do him the honour of being his partner in the next dance. Charity uufortunately was engaged for the three next dances; after these were finished, she would have much pleasure in accepting his offer. Mr. Morecombe continued in conversation with her till the orchestra sounded the prelude for the next dance, when she left him to join her partner. Between the next two dances she conversed with Mr. Morecombe, and was also his partner in more than one quadrille afterwards. In fact, so much attention did he pay to her that the company began to notice it and to make their observations. All this was observed by Ruth with much interest, not unmixed with anxiety. Not that there was anything in the stranger's manner to her sister that transgressed the strictest rules of good society; but at the same time she could perceive that he was evidently much struck with her, and she also fancied that Charity was not quite indifferent to the attentions she was receiving.

All went on merrily till it was time to depart, and then Mr. Thornbury escorted Ruth, and Mr. Morecombe Charity, to the carriage. On Mr. Morecombe's taking leave, Mr. Thornbury said he should be happy to see him at the Red House, and Mr. Morecombe readily replied that he should have much pleasure in calling. As the carriage drove off, Mr. Thornbury threw himself back in it, exclaiming, "That Morecombe is one of the finest fellows I know;" a remark which did not pass without receiving due attention from his daughters. Not a word was spoken by either of the party during their journey home, Mr. Thornbury having fallen fast asleep, and Ruth and her sister being too profoundly absorbed in their own meditations to have any wish for conversation.

The sisters did not rise till a late hour next day, being much fatigued by their exertions on the previous evening. In fact they did not see their parents till they met at the dinner-table. During their meal the conversation ran almost entirely on the events of the night before and the different persons they had met at the ball. Mrs. Thornbury made many inquiries about what had taken place, and in spite of her professed disregard of all subjects connected with dress and such frivolities, the questions she asked as to the costume of the ladies were many and minute. Mr. Thornbury took but little share in the conversation, but what he did say was principally in commendation of his friend Mr. Morecombe. "You will most probably see him to-morrow," he said, addressing his wife; "and then you will be able to judge of him yourself. I have made an appointment with him about a horse

Strange to say, neither of the girls mentioned his name, although they conversed fluently enough about the qualifications of their other partners.

Next morning the girls rose at their usual hour. When they descended into the breakfast-room it was easy to perceive that, although they were dressed with great simplicity, they had taken much pains with their toilet. During breakfast the principal part of the conversation was carried on between Ruth and Mrs. Thornbury, Charity appearing the whole time, to use a French expression, reveuse. When breakfast was over they retired to the drawing-room, Charity continuing as silent as before,-a fact which particularly attracted the attention of Ruth, who was watching her with much interest.

"What sort of a man is this Mr. Morecombe?" inquired Mrs. Thornbury of Ruth. "Your papa seems much pleased with him."

"He is certainly a most gentlemanly and intelligent man," replied Ruth, "and one of the handsomest I have ever seen."

"What interest has he in the horse your papa wants to purchase?" asked Mrs. Thornbury.

"I really do not know, mamma," said Ruth. "When Mr. Morecombe bade us good-bye, papa asked him to come and see us. He certainly said he would do so, but whether he had made any appointment with him before that, of course I cannot tell."

"At any rate," said Mrs. Thornbury, seating herself at a window which commanded a view of the carriage-drive leading to the house, "we must show him all the civility we can after his kindness to you about the ticket for the ball."

For more than an hour following this conversation, little more than an occasional desultory remark passed between the mother and daughters, but at last Mrs. Thornbury suddenly exclaimed; "Here he is, girls; what a beautiful horse he is riding!"

Of the latter part of the sentence, short though the whole was, the young ladies heard nothing, for no sooner were they aware that Mr. Morecombe was approaching than they hurried from the room to put some finishing touch to their hair if possible, or to arrange any little irregularity which might have occurred to their dress.

Charity was first ready, and she left her room to join the party below. A few minutes afterwards, Ruth followed her. When she descended the stairs, to her great surprise she found Charity standing irresolute in the hall, evidently trying to summon up courage to enter the sitting-room. She did not notice Ruth's approach till she was close beside her, and then she started and seemed greatly confused. Ruth took no notice of her sister's agitation; but, gently passing her arm round her waist, she kissed her affectionately. Charity returned the kiss, and, taking her sister by the hand, rewarded her with a look of intense gratitude. The pair then entered the room together. Not a word had been uttered by either, but a mute and interesting conversation I wish to buy, and I have no doubt he will keep it." | had, nevertheless, passed between them.

When the sisters entered the room, they found Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury in it, as well as Mr. Morecombe. After the customary greetings, the conversation turned on general subjects. If Mr. Morecombe, on the night of the ball, appeared attractive to the young ladies, he seemed still more so now, when they could judge of him without their attention being distracted by other things. He spoke on many subjects, and on all with great discretion; his remarks evidently making a great impression on his hearers. His visit was a long one-perhaps longer than etiquette altogether warranted; but he made his company so agreeable that the objection was not much felt. During his stay, he left the room for a short time to converse with Mr. Thornbury on the ostensible object of his visit, and when he returned he found that lunch had been prepared for him. As he was about to leave, Mr. Thornbury pressed him to name some day in the following week when he would dine with them. Mr. Morecombe, however, appeared at first somewhat averse to naming the day. "I should have had much pleasure in accepting your invitation," he said; "but the fact is, I have a very aged relative, an uncle, who resides in the south of Devonshire. He is a confirmed old bachelor, very wealthy, very eccentric, and easily offended. I am the only relative he has in the world, and, for certain family reasons, it would be rash and unwise on my part to displease him. He has written requesting me to go there as quickly as I can, as he is very ill. To tell you the truth, I suspect there is very little the matter with him, and that he is only nervous. I wrote, in reply, saying that I much regretted his indisposition, and would start off immediately if he especially desired it; but that, as I had some business of importance to do in this part of the country, I must visit him at the present moment at great inconvenience to myself; and that I hoped, if possible, he would allow me to defer my visit for a fortnight or three weeks longer. I am now awaiting his reply, which I greatly fear will be adverse to my wishes, for if he specially desires my presence, I must start off directly."

"But when do you expect his answer?"
"In the course of five days, at the latest."

"Then dine with us on Saturday, if you have no better engagement," said Mr. Thornbury; "I expect my son Edgar home from Eton to-morrow, and I am sure he will be delighted to make your acquaintance."

"You are really so kind that I cannot refuse your invitation," said Mr. Morecombe. "On Saturday I will be with you, without fail."

The excitement which prevailed in the Rcd House during the two days previous to this momentous Saturday was scarcely less than that which had preceded the ball, although the young ladies preserved more silence on the subject.

Edgar arrived, as expected, the day after Mr. Morecombe's visit, and his family were naturally delighted to see him. He was now a very handsome, gentlemanly young fellow: modest in his demeanour, without being in any way diffident. His Eton education was finished, and though it could hardly be said that he was an accomplished scholar, he had not been altogether idle; and, without exaggeration, he was better educated than the average of young gentlemen of his years. As yet, nothing had been decided as to what profession he should follow, his parents differing somewhat in opinion on the subject. His mother wished him to enter holy orders, while his father thought he would succeed better as a barrister. The lad himself would have chosen the army, for which profession he was admirably fitted; but, as Mr. Thornbury had no influence at the Horse Guards, and the expense of purchasing a commission, as well as an outfit, and the allowance which would be necessary for him as an officer and a gentleman, were more than he could afford, the idea was definitively negatived. Both his parents had now, however, admitted that their son's future profession must be decided, and they resolved to entertain the subject seriously as soon as the first burst of pleasure on his arrival had somewhat subsided.

Attractive as Mr. Morecombe had already appeared to the Thornbury family, he surpassed himself at the dinner-table. He conversed fluently and well on every subject which came under discussion, and when relating his adventures in various parts of the world (for he had been a great traveller), he spoke of the part he had taken in them with so much modesty as to raise him still higher in the opinion of his hearers. Mr. Thornbury and Edgar were both delighted with him; Ruth admired him greatly, and Charity's good feeling towards him evidently surpassed her sister's. Nor was he by any means destitute of that small talk which is so much admired by ladies. He knew a great deal of the fashionable world, and spoke of its manners and habits with such ease as clearly proved that he had lived much in it. Moreover, he mentioned the names of several notables of high rank, with whom he was on terms of intimacy.

After the ladies had retired, the conversation turned principally on dogs and horses, and matters connected with the sporting world; on all of which subjects he appeared to be particularly well versed; so much so, in fact, that both father and son, themselves no indifferent judges in affairs of the kind, seemed to regard him as a very high authority. In the course of their conversation, Mr. Thornbury casually asked him if he had again heard from his uncle.

"To my great surprise, I have this day received a letter from him," said Mr. Morecombe, "for I imagined it would have required a longer time to receive an answer; and besides, I have generally found that to write by return of post is by no means the old gentleman's habit. I am happy to say his letter was couched in a most friendly tone. He says that as his health is much improved I need not now pay him the visit till

I have finished my business in this part of the country, and I shall certainly profit by his permission."

The conversation again turned on dogs and horses. Edgar remarked that he had lately been much disappointed in not being able to conclude a purchase he had wished to make. A man, a helper in a livery stable much patronised by the Eton scholars, had a very fine retriever for sale at a tolerably moderate price. Before the bargain was definitively concluded, however, a brother scholar had heard of the dog, and offering a far higher price than the sum originally named, he had got possession of it.

"Do you really want a retriever?" inquired Mr.

Morecombe.

"I do indeed, and I am sorry to say I do not know anybody who has got one for sale," was Edgar's reply.

"Nor I neither," said Mr. Morecombe, "but if you will accept one as a present from me, I shall have much pleasure in offering it to you. I have as beautiful a dog of the breed as man ever east eyes on, and he is at your scrvice."

"Oh dear no, I could not think of accepting it in that way," said Edgar, colouring at the same time with pleasure at the idea of having such a dog. "I could not think of depriving you of him."

"To tell you the candid truth," said Mr Morecombe, "besides the pleasure I shall have in obliging you, it will be doing me a service if you will accept him. I am very fond of the dog, but travelling about as I do, you may easily suppose I am in frequent danger of losing him, and it would be a satisfaction to me to know that he is in good hands, so I will take no refusal."

of Edgar, the dog was accepted, and Mr. Morecombe promised to bring him in the course of the ensuing week. On the Monday following he arrived with the retriever, and a beautiful animal he was. Edgar, as was to be expected, was perfectly delighted with his present. Mr. Morecombe remained with the family the whole of the day, and made himself as agreeable as possible.

He now became a regular visitor at the house. In consequence of a severe attack of the gout, Mr. Thornbury was confined to his room, and Edgar being frequently absent, the stranger was thus thrown into the society of the young ladies. In a very short time he began to show such marked attentions to Charity, that they became a subject of conversation with the whole of the establishment. Charity, on her part, received his attentions with evident pleasure, and everything promised a speedy dénoûment. At last, Mr. Morecombe called one morning, and by chance found Charity alone. He conversed with her for some time, and afterwards left the house. During the remainder of the dayshe was silent, thoughtful, and reserved. At night, on retiring to rest, Charity said abruptly to her sister.

"Ruth, dear, I have a secret to tell you."

"What is it?" inquired Ruth, at the same time forming her own conclusion as to the nature of the communication her sister was about to make.

"Mr. Morecombe has made me an offer."

"And did you accept him?" inquired Ruth, in a tone of great anxiety.

"Well, I hardly know," was Charity's reply. "I told him to speak to mamma."

Ruth, by way of answer, kissed her sister affectionately, and nothing more was said that evening upon the subject.

REQUIEM.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

"Lux æterna luceat eis! Dona eis requiem!"

O THE hour—the hour supernal,
When they met the light eternal,—
These, laid down at last to sleep
In a silence dark and deep;—
Waking—Lo! the night's away—
Light eternal—light eternal—
Full, soul-satisfying day!

Eyes of mine, thus hungry gazing
Into the far concave, blazing
With a dazzling blueness bright,—
Ye are blind as death or night:
Whilst my dead, their open'd eyes
Mute upraising, past all praising,
Pierce into God's mysteries.

O their wisdom, boundless, holy!
O their knowledge, large as lowly!
O their deep peace after pain,—
Loss forgotten, life all gain!
And, oh God! what deep love moves
These, now wholly nourished solely
In Thee, who art Love of loves!

Ye our Dead, for whom we pray not; Unto whom wild words we say not, Though we know not but ye hear, Though we often feel ye near:
Go into eternal light!
You we stay not, and betray not Back into our dim half-night.

Well we trow ye fain would teach us, And your spirit arms would reach us Tenderly from farthest heaven. But to us this is not given: Humble faith the lesson sole Ye may preach us, all and each—us Bound unto the selfsame goal.

Lesson grand-hard of discerning: Faintly seen, with mighty yearning At grave sides, or in the throes Of our utmost joys and woes: But one day will come the call; When, thus earning the last learning, Like our Dead, we shall know all.

NOTE.

THE POET COWPER AND THE REV. JOHN NEWTON.

May the writer be allowed to offer some remarks on a paper, entitled "William Cowper," which appeared in the March number of Good Words? He is quite sure that the excellent editor of that widely-popular magazine would not wittingly give his sanction to any unjust reflections on the character and doings of an eminently good man, whose memory is still fragrant in the Church. It is quite true that misrepresentation on this subject is not a new thing. But the old calumny of Mr. Newton's injurious treatment of Cowper is here revived, and (whether so a new thing. But the old catumity of Mr. Newton's injurious treatment of Cowper is nere revived, and (whether so intended or not) with much bitterness as well as injustice.

Mr. Newton is spoken of as "of a severe and exacting religious temper;" "his influence over Cowper" is said "to have bordered on tyranny, and to have been the main cause of his subsequent dejection and relapses into lunacy." Cowper is spoken of as "bowing to Mr. Newton's stronger will, and yielding up his own in perfect submission to his spiritual master;" and so the inference is drawn that being engaged, spite of the repugnance of his nature, in the task of visiting the sick, and, notwithstanding his horror of publicity, in offering up extempore nature, in the task of visiting the sick, and, notwithstanding his horror of publicity, in offering up extempore prayer, his nature had no other refuge than a second fit of insanity.

To all this it may be replied—and the writer speaks that which he knows—that Mr. Newton was one of the most genial and loving of men; a man without aught of assumption or priestly arrogance. The friendship between himself and Mr. Cowper was of the most endeared character, and unquestionably on terms of perfect equality. Besides which, Mr. Newton was a man of good sense, large knowledge of the world, and, acquainted as he was with the peculiar circumstances and temperament of his friend, not likely to impose upon him duties he saw to be hurtful.

Thus Mr. Newton himself speaks of his intercourse with Cowper during the time of their living together at Thus Mr. Newton himself speaks of his intercourse with Cowper during the time of their living together at Olney:—"For nearly twelve years we were seldom separated for twelve hours at a time when we were awake and at home. The first six I daily passed in admiring and trying to imitate him. During the second six I walked pensively with him in the valley of the shadow of death." And what are Mr. Cowper's expressions in that beautiful letter written to Mrs. Newton, when the vicarage had lost its former occupant, and Mr. Newton no longer lived at Ofney?—"The vicarage became a melancholy object so soon as Mr. Newton left it... I cannot look at it without being shocked.... Though in many respects I have no more sensibility than there is in brick and mortar, yet I am not permitted to be quite unfecling on this subject." In reference to this letter, Mr. Newton says:—"It drew

Speaking of a visit from Mr. Newton in August, 1783, when Mr. Cowper was suffering from very deep depression, the latter writes:—"The friend of my heart, the person with whom I had formerly taken sweet counsel, no longer useful to me as a minister, no longer pleasant to me as a Christian, was a spectacle which must necessarily add the bitterness of mortification to the sadness of despair."

Yet, again, there are Cowper's lines in "Conversation," in which there can be little doubt his thoughts went back to the first happy years at Olney :-

"But souls that carry on a blest exchange," &c.

Could such an intercourse as this be tyrannical on the one side, and tremblingly submissive on the other? And had Mr. Cowper possessed so little self-respect and independence of spirit as thus to have bowed to a will he felt that he must obey, would not a sensible woman like Mrs. Unwin have remonstrated?

As to the five years and a quarter (that is the exact period, from September, 1767, to January, 1773, when the malady returned—not, as stated in the article, seven years), there is little reason to doubt that it was the happiest period in Mr. Cowper's life. Writing to his friend the Rev. William Bull, in November, 1782, the poet says, referring to that time:—"I only regret that I did not know you intimately in those happier days, when the frame of my heart and mind was such as might have made a connection with me not altogether unworthy of you."

Again, it may be asked, what else but the religion he professed, and which was nurtured by his association with Mr. Newton, could have enabled Cowper to bear with such perfect resignation the terrible shock of his brother's death in 1770, when, too, a like event, the death of his beloved friend the Rev. Mr. Unwin, in after years, caused a relapse, after partial recovery from his mental illness? Then he was without the consciousness of a personal interest in religion.

Strange, too, that Mr. Newton's "injudicious treatment" should not have produced its supposed effect till more than five years had passed away. Was it not just the one thing that so long warded off the danger?

It were easy to reply to each of the specific charges in the above statement, but perhaps already too much space has been occupied. To one point, however, reference may be permitted. While it is quite true that Mr. Cowper had a great "horror" of certain kinds of publicity, and while he says he felt considerable trepidation "when called upon to take the lead in social worship," he also adds "that his trepidation wholly subsided so soon as he began to speak in prayer." As to his visitation of the sick, it was to him a pleasant duty, one for which he was eminently qualified. It is easy, indeed, so to represent such an effort in such circumstances as to make it appear injurious. It is hoped that these brief remarks may do something to remove a gross misapprehension, arising, it may be feared, alike from ignorance of the true facts of the ease, and from a prejudice against the evangelical sentiments It was while attemptions a history of the case.

It was while attempting a history of the early years of Mr. Cowper at Olney, as especially illustrated by some documents in the writer's possession, that he read the article in Good Words. That history is a full vindication of what is here indicated, and will shortly appear in the periodical for which it was prepared.

PART IX.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WILFRID was so stunned by the information thus suddenly given him, that he had but a confused consciousness of the explanations which followed. He was aware that it was all made clear to him. and that he uttered the usual words of assent and conviction: but in his mind he was too profoundly moved, too completely shaken and unsettled to be aware of anything but the fact thus strangely communicated. It did not occur to him for a moment that it was not a fact. He saw no improbability, nothing unnatural in it. He was too young to think that anything was unlikely because it was extraordinary, or to doubt what was affirmed with so much confidence. But, in the meantime, the news was so startling, that it upset his mental balance and made him incapable of understanding the details. Hugh was not the eldest son. It was he who was the eldest son. This at the moment was all that his mind was capable of taking in. He stayed by Percival as long as he remained, and had the air of devouring everything the other said; and he went with him to the railway station when he went away. Percival, for his part, having once made the plunge, showed no disinclination to explain everything, but for his own credit told his story most fully, and with many particulars undreamt of when the incident took place. But he might have spared his pains so far as Will was concerned. He was aware of the one great fact stated to him to begin with, but of nothing more.

The last words which Percival said as he took leave of his young companion at the railway were. however, caught by Wilfrid's half-stupefied ears. They were these: "I will stay in Carlisle for some days. You can hear where I am from Askell, and perhaps we may be of use to each other." This, beyond the startling and extraordinary piece of news which had shaken him like a sudden earthquake, was all Percival had said so far as Will was aware. "That fellow is no more the eldest son than I am-the property is yours;" and "I will stay in Carlisle for some days-perhaps we may be of use to each other." The one expression caught on to the other in his mind, which was utterly confused and stunued for the first time in his life. He turned them over and over as he walked home alone, or rather they turned over and over in his memory, as if possessed of a distinct life; and so it happened that he had got home again and opened the gate and stumbled into the garden before he knew what the terrific change was which had come over everything, or had time to realise his own sensations. It was such a moment as is very sweet in a cottagegarden. They had all been watering the flowers in the moment of relief after Percival's departure, and the fragrance of the grateful soil was mounting up among the other perfumes of the hour. Hugh and Nelly were still sprinkling a last shower upon the roses, and in the distance in the field upon which the garden opened were to be seen two figures wandering slowly over the grass, -Winnie, whom Aunt Agatha had coaxed out to breathe the fresh air after her self-imprisonment, and Miss Seton herself, with a shawl over her head. And the twilight was growing insensibly dimmer and dimmer, and the dew falling, and the young moon sailing aloft. When Mary came across the lawn, her long dress sweeping with a soft rustle over the grass, a sudden horror seized Wilfrid. It took him all his force of mind and will to keep his face to her and await her coming. His face was not the treacherous kind of face which betrays everything; but still there was in it a look of pre-occupation which Mary could not fail to see.

"Is he gone?" she said, as she came up. "You are sure he is gone, Will? It was kind of you to be civil to him; but I am almost afraid you were interested in him too."

"Would it be wrong to be interested in him?" said Will.

"I don't like him," said Mary, simply; and then she added, after a pause, "I have no confidence in him. I should be sorry to see any of my boys attracted by the society of such a man."

And it was at this moment that his new knowledge rushed upon Wilfrid's mind and embittered it; any of her boys of whom he was the youngest and least important; and yet she must know what his real position was, and that he ought to be the chief of all.

"I don't care a straw for him," said Will, hastily; "but he knows a great many things, and I was interested in his talk."

"What was he saying to you?" said Mrs. Ochterlony.

He looked into her face, and he saw that there was uneasiness in it, just as she looking at him saw signs of a change which he was himself unaware of; and in his impetuosity he was very near saying it all out and betraying himself. But then his uncertainty of all the details stood him in good stead.

"He was saying lots of things," said Will. "I am sure I can't tell you all that he was saying. If I were Hugh I would not let Nelly make a mess of herself with those roses. I am going in-doors."

"A lovely evening like this is better than the best book in the world," said Mary. "Stay with me, and talk to me, Will. You see I am the only one who is left alone."

"I don't care about lovely evenings," said Will; "I think you should all come in. It is getting dreadful cold." And as for being alone, I don't see how that can be, when they are all there. Goodnight, mother. I think I shall go to bed."

"Why should you go to bed so early?" said Mary: but he was already gone, and did not hear her. And as he went, he turned right round and looked at Hugh and Nelly, who were still together. When Mrs. Ochterlony remarked that look, she was at once troubled and comforted. She thought her boy was jealous of the way in which his brother engrossed the young visitor, and she was sorry, but yet knew that it was not very serious-while, at the same time, it was a comfort to her to attribute his pre-occupation to anything but Percival's conversation. So she lingered about the lawn a little, and looked wistfully at the soft twilight country, and the wistful moon. She was the only one who was alone. The two young creatures were together, and they were happy; and poor Winnie, though she was far from happy, was buoyed up by the absorbing passion and hostility which had to-day reached one of its climaxes, and had Aunt Agatha for her slave, ready to receive all the burning outburst of grievance and misery. This fiery passion which absorbed her whole being was almost as good as being happy, and gave her mind full occupation. But as for Mary, she was by herself, and all was twilight with her: and the desertion of her boy gave her a little chill at her heart. So she, too, went in presently, and had the lamp lighted, and sat alone in the room which was bright and yet dim-with a clear circle of light round the table, yet shadowy as all the corners are of a summer evening, when there is no fire to aid the lamp. But she did not find her son there. His discontent had gone further than to be content with a book, as she had expected; and he had really disappeared for the night.

"I can't have you take possession of Nelly like this," she said to Hugh, when, after a long interval they came in. "We all want a share of her. Poor Will has gone to bed quite discontented. You must not keep her all to yourself."

"Oh! is he jealous?" said Hugh, laughing; and there was no more said about it; for Will's jealousy in this respect was not a thing to alarm anybody much.

But Will had not goue to bed. He was seated in his room at the table, leaning his head upon both his hands, and staring into the flame of his candle. He was trying to put what he had heard into some sort of shape. That Hugh, who was down-stairs so triumphant and successful, was, after all, a mere impostor; that it was he himself, whom nobody paid any particular attention to, who was the real heir; that his instinct had not deceived him, but from his birth he had been ill-used and oppressed. These thoughts went all circling through his mind as the moths circled round his light, taking now a larger, and now a shorter flight. This strange sense that he had been right all along was, for the moment, the first feeling in his mind. He had been disinherited and thrust aside, but still he had felt all along that it was he who was the natural heir; and there was a satisfaction in having it thus proved and established. This was the first distinct reflection he was conscious of amid the whirl of thoughts; and then came the intoxicating sense that he could now enter upon his true position and be able to arrange everybody's future wisely and generously, without any regard for mere proprieties, or for the younger brother's two thousand pounds. Strange to say, in the midst of this whirlwind of egotistical feeling, Will rushed all at once into imaginations that were not selfish, glorious schemes of what he would do for everybody. He was not ungenerous, nor unkind, but only it was a necessity with him that generosity and kindness should come from and not to himself.

All this passed through the boy's mind before it ever occurred to him what might be the consequences to others of his extraordinary discovery, or what effect it must have upon his mother, and the character of the family. He was self-absorbed, and it did not occur to him in that light. Even when he did come to think of it, he did it in the calmest way. No doubt his mother would be annoyed; but she deserved to be annoyed-she who had so long kept him out of his rights; and, after all, it would still be one of her sons who would have Earlston. And as for Hugh, Wilfrid had the most generous intentions towards him. There was, indeed, nothing that he was not ready to do for his brothers. As soon as he believed that all was to be his, he felt himself the steward of the family. And then his mind glanced back upon the Psyche and the Venus, and upon Earlston, which might be made into a fitter shrine for these fair creations. These ideas filled him like wine, and went to his head, and made him dizzy; and all the time he was as unconscious of the moral harm, and domestic treachery, as if he had been one of the lower animals; and no scruple of any description, and no doubt of what it was right and necessary to do, had so much as entered into his primitive and savage mind.

We call his mind savage and primitive because it was at this moment entirely free from those complications of feeling and dreadful conflict of what is desirable, and what is right, which belong to the civilized and cultivated mind. Perhaps Will's affections were not naturally strong: but, at all events, he gave in to this temptation as a man might have given in to it in the depths of Africa, where the "good old rule" and "simple plan" still exist and reign; and where everybody takes what he has strength to take, and he keeps who can. This was the real state of the case in Wilfrid's mind. It had been supposed to be Hugh's right, and he had been obliged to give in; now it was his right, and Hugh would have to make up his mind to it. What else was there to say? So far as Will could see, the revolution would be alike certain and instantaneous. It no more occurred to him to doubt the immediate effect of the new fact than to doubt its truth. Perhaps it was his very egotism, as well as his youth and inexperience, which made him so credulous. It had been wonder enough to him how anybody could leave him in an inferior position, even while he was only the youngest; to think of anybody resisting his rights, now that he had rights, was incredible.

Yet when the morning came, and the sober daylight brightened upon his dreams, Will, notwithstanding all his confidence, begau to see the complication of circumstances. How was he to announce his discovery to his mother? How was he to acquaint Hugh with the change in their mutual destinies? What seemed so easy and simple to him the night before, became difficult and complicated now. He began to have a vague sense that they would insist, that Mrs. Ochterlony would fight for her honour, and Hugh for his inheritance, and that in claiming his own rights, he would have to rob his mother of her good name, and put a stigma ineffaceable upon his brother. This idea startled him, and took away his breath; but it did not make him falter: Uncle Penrose's suggestion about buying up him and his beggarly estate, and Major Percival's evident entire indifference to the question whether anything it suited him to do was right or wrong, had had their due effect on Will. He did not see what call he had to sacrifice himself for others. No doubt, he would be sorry for the others, but after all it was his own life he had to take care of, and his own rights that he had to assert. But he mused and knitted his brows over it as he had never done before in his life. Throughout it will be seen that he regarded the business in a very sober, matter-of-fact way-not in the imaginative way which leads you to enter into other people's position, and analyse their possible feelings. As for himself, he who had been so jealous of his mother's visitors, and watched over her so keenly, did not feel somehow that horror which might have been expected at the revelation that she was not the spotless woman he thought her. Perhaps it was the importance of the revelation to himself-perhaps it was a secret disbelief in any guilt of hers, perhaps it was only the stunned condition in which the announcement left him. At all events, he was neither horrified at the thought, nor profoundly impressed by the consciousness that to prove his own rights, would be to take away everything from her, and to shut her up from all intercourse with the honourable and pure. When the morning roused him to a sense of the difficulties as well as the advantages of his discovery, the only thing he could think of was to seek advice and direction from Percival, who was so experienced a man of the world. But it was not so easy to do this without betraying his motive. The only practicable expedient was that of escorting Nelly home; which was not a privilege he was anxious for of itself; for though he was jealous that she had been taken away from him, he shrank instinctively from her company in his present state of mind. Yet it was the only thing that could be done.

When the party met at the breakfast-table, there were three of them who were ill at ease. Winnic made her appearance in a state of headache, pale and haggard as on the day of her arrival; and Aunt Agatha was pale too, and could not keep her eves from dwelling with a too tender affectionateness upon her suffering child. And as for Will, the colour of his young face was indescribable, for youth and health still contended in it with those emotions which contract the skin and empty the veins. But on the other hand, there were Hugh and Nelly handsome and happy, with hearts full of charity to everybody, and confidence in the brightness of their own dawning lot. Mary sat at the head of the table, with the urn before her, superintending all. The uneasiness of last night had passed from her mind; her cheek was almost as round and fair as that of the girl by her side-fairer perhaps in its way: her eyes were as bright as they had ever been; her dress it is true was still black, but it had not the shadowy denseness of her widow's garb of old. It was silk, that shone and gave back subdued reflections to the light, and in her hair there were still golden gleams, though mixed with here and there a thread of silver. Her mourning, which prevented any confusion of colours, but left her a sweet complexioned woman, rich in the subdued tints of nature, in the soft austerity of black and white, did all for her that toilette could do. This was the figure which her son Wilfred saw at the head of the pretty country breakfast-table, between the flowers and the sunshine-an unblemished matron and a beloved mother. He knew, and it came into his mind as he looked at her, that in the parish, or even in the county, there was nobody more honoured; and yet- He kept staring at her so, and grew so white as he did so, and had so scared a look in his eyes, that Mrs. Ochterlony herself perceived it at last.

"What is the matter, Will?" she said; "I could think there was a ghost standing behind me, from your eyes. Why do you look so startled?"

"Nothing," said Will, hastily; "I didn't know I looked startled. A fellow can't help how he looks. Look here, Nelly, if you're going home to-day, I'll go with you, and see you safe there."

"You'll go with her?" said Hugh, with a kind of good-humoured elder brotherly contempt. "Not quite so fast, Will. We can't trust young ladies in your care. I am going with Nelly myself."

"Oh! I am sure Will is very kind," said Nelly; and then she stopped short, and looked first at Mrs. Ochterlony and then at Hugh. Poor Nelly had heard of brothers being jealous of each other, and had read of it in books, and was half afraid that such a case was about to come under her own observation. She was much frightened, and her impulse was to accept Will's guardianship, that no harm might come of it, though the sacrifice to herself would be considerable; but then, what if Hugh should be jealous too?

"I see no reason why you should not both go," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "one of you shall take care of Nelly, and one shall do my commissions; I think that had better be Will—for I can put no confidence, just now, in Hugh."

"Of course it must be Will," said Hugh. "A squire of dames requires age and solidity. It is not an office for a younger brother. Your time will come, old fellow; it is mine now."

"Yes, I suppose it is yours now," said Will.

He did not mean to put any extraordinary significance in his tone, but yet he was in such a condition of mind that his very voice betrayed him against his will. Even Winnie, pre-occupied as she was, intermitted her own thoughts a moment to look at him, and Hugh reddened though he could not have told why. There was a certain menace, a certain implication of something behind, which the inexperienced boy had no intention of betraying, but which made themselves apparent in spite of him. And Hugh too grew crimson in spite of himself. He said "By Jove!" and then he laughed, and cleared his mind of it, feeling it absurd to be made angry by the petulance of his boy-brother. Then he turned to Nelly, who had drawn closer to him, fearing that the quarrel was about to take place as it takes place in novels, trembling a little, and yet by the aid of her own good sense, feeling that it could not be so serious after all.

"If we are going to the Lady's Well we must go early," he said; and his face changed when he turned to her. She was growing prettier every day,—every day at least that she spent in Hugh's society,—opening and unfolding as to the sun. Her precocious womanliness, if it had been precocious, melted under the new influence, and all the natural developments were quickened. She was more timid, more caressing, less self-reliant, and yet she was still as much as ever the head of the house at home.

"But not if it will vex Will," she said, almost in a whisper, in his ear; and the close approach which this whisper made necessary, effaced in an instant all unbrotherly feelings towards Wilfrid from Hugh's mind. They both looked at Will, instinctively, as they spoke, the girl with a little wistful solicitude in case he might be disturbed by the sight of their confidential talk. But Will was quite unmoved. He saw the two draw closer together, and perceived the confidential communication that passed between them, but his countenance did not change in the slightest degree. By this time he was far beyond that.

"You see he does not mind," said Hugh, carrying on the half articulate colloquy, of which one half was done by thoughts instead of words; and Nelly, with the colour a little deepened on her cheek, looked up at him with a look which Hugh could but half interpret. He saw the soft brightness, the sweet satisfaction in it tinged by a certain gleam of fun, but he did not see that Nelly was for the moment a little ashamed of herself, and was asking herself how she ever could, for a moment, have supposed that Will was jealous. It was a relief to her mind to see his indifference, and yet it filled her with shame.

When the meal was over, and they all dispersed with their different interests, it was Mary who sought to soften what she considered the disappointment of her boy. She came to him as he stood at the window under the verandah, where the day before Percival had given him his fatal illumination, and put her arm within his, and did her best to draw his secret from his clouded and musing eyes.

"My dear boy, let us give in to Hugh," said Mary; "he is only a guest now, you know, and you are at home." She was smiling when she said this, and yet it made her sigh. "And then I think he is getting fond of Nelly, and you are far too young for anything of that sort," Mrs. Ochterlony said, with anxiety and a little doubt, looking him in the face all the time.

"There are some things I am not too young for," said Will. "Mamma, if I were Hugh I would be at home nowhere unless you were at home there as well."

"My dear Will, that is my own doing," said Mary. "Don't blame your brother. I have refused to go to Earlston. It will always be best for me, for all your sakes, to have a house of my own."

"If Earlston had been mine, I should not have minded your refusal," said Will. Perhaps it was as a kind of secret atonement to her and to his own heart that he said so, and yet it was done instinctively and was the utterance of a genuine feeling. He was meditating in his heart her disgrace and downfall, and yet the first effects of it, if he could succeed, would be to lay everything that he had won by shaming her, at her feet. He would do her the uttermost cruelty and injury without flinching, and then he would overwhelm her with every honour and grandeur that his ill-got wealth could supply. And he did not see how inconsistent those two things were.

"But my boys must mind when I make such a decision," said Mary; and yet she was not displeased with the sentiment. "You shall go to Carlisle for me," she added. "I want some little things, and Hugh very likely would be otherwise occupied. If you would like to have a little change, and go early, do not wait for them, Will. There is a train in half an hour."

"Yes, I would like a little change," he answered vaguely—feeling somehow, for that moment solely, a little prick of conscience. And so it was by his mother's desire to restore his good-humour and cheerfulness, that he was sent upon his mission of harm and treachery.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

WHILE Hugh showed Nelly the way to the Lady's Well with that mixture of brotherly tenderness and a dawning emotion of a much warmer kind, which is the privileged entrance of their age into real love and passion; and while Will made his with silent vehemence and ardour to Carlisle. Winnie was left very miserable in the Cottage. It was a moment of reaction after the furious excitement of the previous day. She had held him at bay, she had shown him her contempt and scorn, she had proved to him that their parting was final, and that she would never either see or listen to him again; and the excitement of doing this had so supported her that the day which Aunt Agatha thought a day of such horrible trial to her poor Winnie, was, in short, the only day in which she had snatched a certain stormy enjoyment since she returned to the Cottage. But the day after was different. He was gone; he had assented to her desire, and accepted her decision to all appearance, and poor Winnie was very miserable. For the moment all seemed to her to be over. She had felt sure he would come, and the sense of the continued conflict had buoyed her up; but she did not feel so sure that he would come again, and the long struggle which had occupied her life and thoughts for so many years seemed to have come to an abrupt end, and she had nothing more to look forward to. When she realised this fact, Winuie stood aghast. It is hard when love goes out of a life; but sometimes, when it is only strife and opposition which go out of it, it is almost as hard to bear. She thought she had sighed for peace for many a long day. She had said so times without number, and written it down and persuaded herself that was what she wanted; but now that she had got it she found out that it was not that she wanted. The Cottage was the very home of peace, and had been so for many years. Even the growth of young life within it, the active minds and varied temperaments of the three boys, and Will's cloudy and uncomfortable disposition, had not hitherto interfered with its character. But so far from being content, Winnie's heart sank within her when she realised the fact, that War had marched off in the person of her husband, and that she was to be "left in peace,"-horrible words that paralysed her very soul.

This event, however, if it had done nothing else, had opened her mouth. Her history, which she had kept to herself, began to be revealed. She told her aunt and her sister of his misdeeds, till the energy of her narrative brought something like renewed life to her. She described how she had herself endured, how she had been left to all the dangers that attend a beautiful young woman whose husband has found superior attractions elsewhere; and she gave such sketches of the women whom she imagined to have attracted him, as only an injured wife in a chronic state of wrath and suffering could give. She was so very miserable on that morning that she had no alternative but to speak or die; and as she could not die, she gave her miseries utterance. "And if he can do you any harm -if he can strike me through my friends," said Winnie, "if you know of any point on which he could assail you, you had better keep close guard."

"Oh, my dear love!" said Aunt Agatha, with a troubled smile, "what harm could he do us? He could hurt us only in wounding you; and now we have you safe, my darling, and can defend you, so he never can harm us."

"Of course I never meant you," said Winnie. "But he might perhaps harm Mary. Mary is not like you; she has had to make her way in the world, and no doubt there may be things in her life, as in other people's, that she would not care to have known."

Mary was startled by this speech, which was made half in kindness, half in anger; for the necessity of having somebody to quarrel with had been too great for Winnie. Mrs. Ochterlony was startled, but she could not help feeling sure that her secret was no secret for her sister, and she had no mind for a quarrel, though Winnie wished it.

"There is but one thing in my life that I dou't wish to have known," she said, "and Major Percival knows it, and probably so do you, Winnie. But I am here among my own people, and everybody knows all about me. I don't think it would be possible to do me harm here."

"It is because you don't know him," said Winnie.
"He would do the Queen harm in her own palace.
You don't know what poison he can put on his arrows, and how he shoots them. I believe he will strike me through my friends."

All this time Aunt Agatha looked at the two with her lips apart, as if about to speak; but in reality it was horror and amazement that moved her. To hear them talking calmly of something that must be concealed! of something, at least, that it was better should not be known!—and that in a house which had always been so spotless, so respectable, and did not know what mystery meant!

Mary shook her head, and smiled. She had felt a little anxious the night before about what Percival might be saying to Wilfrid; but, somehow, all that had blown away. Even Will's disconteut with his brother had taken the form of jealous tenderness for herself, which, in her thinking, was quite incompatible with any revelation which could have lowered her in his eyes; and it seemed to her as if the old sting, which had so often come back to her, which had put it into the power of her friends in "the regiment" to give her now and then a prick to the heart, had lost its venom. Hugh was peacefully settled in his rights, and Will, if he had heard anything, must have nobly closed his ears to it. Sometimes this strange feeling of assurance and confidence comes on the very brink of the deadliest danger, and it was so with Mary at the present moment that she had no fear.

As for Winnie, she too was thinking principally of her own affairs, and of her sister's only as subsidiary to them. She would have rather believed in the most diabolical rage and assault than in her husband's indifference and the utter termination of hostilities between them. "He will strike me through my friends," she repeated; and perhaps in her heart she was rather glad that there still remained this oblique way of reaching her, and expressed a hope rather than a fear. This conversation was interrupted by Sir Edward, who came in more cheerfully and alertly than usual, taking off his hat as soon as he became visible through the open window. He had heard what he thought was good news, and there was satisfaction in his face.

"So Percival is here," he said. "I can't tell you how pleased I was. Come, we'll have some pleasant days yet in our old age. Why hasn't he come up to the Hall?"

There was an embarrassed pause-embarrassed at least on the part of Miss Seton and Mrs. Ochterlony; while Winnie fixed her eyes, which looked so large and wild in their sunken sockets, steadily upon him, without attempting to make any reply.

"Yes, Major Percival was here yesterday," said Aunt Agatha with hesitation; "he spent the whole day with us- I was very glad to have him, and I am sure he would have gone up to the Hall if he had had time--- But he was obliged to go away---"

How difficult it was to say all this under the gaze of Winnie's eyes, and with the possibility of being contradicted flatly at any moment, may be imagined, And while Aunt Agatha made her faltering statement, her own look and voice contradicted her: and then there was a still more embarrassed pause, and Sir Edward looked from one to another with amazed and unquiet eves.

"He came and spent the day with you," said their anxious neighbour, "and he was obliged to go away! I confess I think I merited different treatment. I wish I could make out what you all mean-"

"The fact is, Sir Edward," said Winnie, "that Major Percival was sent away. He is a very important person, no doubt; but he cannot do just as he pleases. My aunt is so good that she tries to keep up a little fiction, but he and I have done with each other," said Winnie in her excitement, notwithstanding that she had been up to this moment so reticent and self-contained.

"Who sent him away?" asked Sir Edward, with a pitiful, confidential look to Aunt Agatha, and a slight shake of his head over the very bad businessa little pantomime which moved Winnie to deeper wrath and discontent.

"I sent him away," said Mrs. Percival, with as much dignity as this ebullition of passion would permit her to assume.

"My dear Winnie," said Sir Edward, "I am very very sorry to hear this. Think a little of what is before you. You are a young woman still; you are both young people. Do you mean to live here all the rest of your life, and let him go where he pleases—to destruction, I suppose, if he likes? Is that what you mean? And yet we all remember when you would not hear a word even of advicewould not listen to anybody about him. He had not been quite sans reproche when you married him, my dear; and you took him with a knowledge of

If that had not been the case, there might have been some excuse. But what I want you to do, is to look it in the face, and consider a little. It is not only for to-day, or to-morrow-it is for your life."

Winnie gave a momentary shudder, as if of cold, and drew her shawl closer round her. "I had rather not discuss our private affairs," she replied : "they are between ourselves."

"But the fact is, they are not between yourselves," said Sir Edward, who was inspired by the great conviction of doing his duty. "You have taken the public into your confidence by coming here. I am a very old friend, both of yours and his, and I might do some good, if you let me try. I daresay he is not very far from here; and if I might mediate between you --- "

A sudden gleam shot out of Winnie's eyesperhaps it was a sudden wild hope-perhaps it was merely the flash of indignation; but still the proposal moved her. "Mediate!" she said, with an air which was intended for scorn; but her lips quivered as she repeated the word.

"Yes," said Sir Edward, "I might, if you would have coufidence in me. No doubt there are wrongs on both sides. He has been impatient, and you have been exacting, and --- Where are you going?"

"It is no use continuing this conversation," said Winnie. "I am going to my room. If I were to have more confidence in you than I ever had in any one, it would still be useless. I have not been exacting. I have been --- But it is no matter. I trust, Aunt Agatha, that you will forgive me for going to my own room."

Sir Edward shook his head, and looked after her as she withdrew. He looked as if he had said, "I knew how it would be;" and yet he was concerned and sorry. "I have seen such cases before," he said, when Winnie had left the room, turning to Aunt Agatha and Mary, and once more shaking his head: "neither will give in an inch. They know that they are in a miserable condition, but it is neither his fault nor hers. That is how it always is. And only the bystanders can see what faults there are on both sides."

"But I don't think Winnie is so exacting," said Aunt Agatha, with natural partizanship. "I think it is worse than that. She has been telling me two or three things-"

"Oh, yes," said Sir Edward, with mild despair, "they can tell you dozens of things. No doubt he could, on his side. It is always like that; and to think that nothing would have any effect on her!she would hear no sort of reason—though you know very well you were warned that he was not immaculate before she married him: nothing would have any effect."

"Oh, Sir Edward!" cried Aunt Agatha, with tears in her eyes; "it is surely not the moment to remind us of that."

"For my part, I think it is just the moment," said Sir Edward; and he shook his head, and made a melancholy pause. Then, with an obvious effort to change the subject, he looked round the room, as if that personage might, perhaps, be hidden in some corner, and asked where was Hugh?

"He has gone to show Nelly Askell the way to the Lady's Well," said Mary, who could not repress

"Ah! he seems disposed to show Nelly Askell the way to a great many things," said Sir Edward. "There it is again, you see! Not that I have a word to say against that little thing. She is very nice, and pretty enough; though no more to be compared to what Winnie was at her age — But you'll see Hugh will have engaged himself and forestalled his life before we know where we are."

"It would have been better had they been a little older," said Mary; "but otherwise everything is very suitable; and Nelly is very good, and very sweet--"

Again Sir Edward sighed. "You must know that Hugh might have done a very great deal better," he said. "I don't say that I have any particular objections, but only it is an instance of your insanity in the way of marriage—all you Setons. You go and plunge into it head foremost, without a moment's reflection; and then, of course, when leisure comes——— I don't mean you, Mary. What I was saying had no reference to you. So far as I am aware, you were always very happy, and gave your friends no trouble. Though in one way, of course, it ought to be considered that you did the worst of all."

"Captain Askell's family is very good," said Mary, by way of turning off too close an inquiry into her own affairs; "and he is just in the same position as Hugh's father was; and I love Nelly like a child of my own. I feel as if she ought to have been a child of my own. She and Will used to lie in the same cradle—"

"Ah, by the way," said Sir Edward, looking round once more into the corners, "where is Will?"

And then it had to be explained where Will had gone, which the old man thought very curious. "To Carlisle? What did he want to go to Carlisle for? If he had been out with his fishing-rod, or out with the keepers, looking after the young pheasants——But what could he want going into Carlisle. Is Percival there?"

"I hope not," said Mary, with sudden anxiety. It was an idea which had not entered into her mind before.

"Why should you hope not? If he really wants to make peace with Winnie, I should think it very natural," said Sir Edward; "and Will is a curious sort of boy. He might be a very good sort of auxiliary in any negotiation. Depend upon it, that's why he is gone."

"I think not. I think he would have told me," said Mary, feeling her heart sink with a sudden ead.

"I don't see why he should have told you," said

Sir Edward, who was in one of his troublesome moods, and disposed to put everybody at sixes and sevens. "He is old enough to act a little for himself. I hope you are not one of the foolish women, Mary, that like to keep their boys always at their apron-strings?"

With this reproach Sir Edward took his leave, and made his way placidly homeward, with the tranquillity of a man who has done his duty. He felt that he had discharged the great vocation of man, at least for the past hour. Winnie had heard the truth, whether she liked it or not, and so had the other members of the family, over whom he shook his head kindly but sadly as he went home. Their impetuosity, their aptitude to rush into any scrape that presented itself-and expecially their madness in respect to marriage, filled him with pity. There was Charlie Seton, for example, the father of these girls, who had married that man Penrose's sister. Sir Edward's memory was so long, that it did not seem to him a very great stretch to go back to that. Not that the young woman was amiss in herself, but the man who, with his eyes open, burdened his unborn descendants with such an uncle, was worse than lunatic-he was criminal. This was what Sir Edward thought as he went quietly home, with a rather comfortable dreary sense of satisfaction in his heart in the thought that his own behaviour had been marked by no such aberrations; and, in the meantime, Winnie was fanning the embers of her own wrath, and Mary had sickened somehow with a sense of insecurity and unexplainable apprehension. On the other hand, the two young creatures were very happy on the road to the Lady's Well, and Will addressed himself to his strange business with resolution: and, painful as its character was, was not pained to speak of, but only excited. So ran the course of the world upon that ordinary summer day.

CHAPTER XXXV.

WILFRID'S sensations when he found himself in the streets of Carlisle on his extraordinary mission, were of the strangest kind. It was the first time he had ever taken any step absolutely by himself. To be sure, he had been brought up in full possession of the freedom of an English boy, in whose honour everybody has confidence-but never before had he been moved by an individual impulse to independent action, nor had he known what it was to have a secret in his mind, and an enterprise which had to be conducted wholly according to his own judgment, and in respect to which he could ask for no advice. When he emerged out of the railway station, and found himself actually in the streets, a thrill of excitement, sudden and strange, came over him. He had known very well all along what he was coming to do, and yet he seemed only to become aware of it at that moment, when he put his foot upon the pavement, and was appealed to by cab-drivers, eager to take him somewhere. Here there was no time or opportunity for lingering; he had to go somewhere, and that instantly, were it only to the shops to execute his mother's innocent commissions. It might be possible to loiter and meditate on the calm country roads about Kirtell, but the town and the streets have other associations. He was there to do something, to go somewhere, and it had to be begun at once. He was not imaginative, but yet he felt a kind of palpable tearing asunder as he took his first step onward. He had hesitated, and his old life seemed to hold out its arms to him. It was not an unhappy life; he had his own way in most things, he had his future before him unfettered, and he knew that his wishes would be furthered, and every thing possible done to help and encourage him. All this passed through his mind like a flash of light-He would be helped and cared for and made much of, but yet he would only be Will, the youngest, of whom nobody took particular notice, and who sat in the lowest room; whereas, by natural law and justice, he was the heir. After he had made that momentary comparison, he stepped on with a firm foot, and then it was that he felt like the tearing asunder of something that had bound him. He had thrown the old bonds, the old pleasant ties, to the wind; and now all that he had to do, was to push on by himself and gain his rights. This sensation made his head swim as he walked on. He had put out to sea as it were, and the new movement made him giddy-and vet it was not pain; love was not life to him, but he had never known what it was to live without it. There seemed no reason why he should not do perfectly well for himself; Hugh would be affronted, of course, -but it could make no difference to Islay, for example, nor much to his mother, for it would still be one of her sons. These were the thoughts that went through Wilfrid's mind as he walked along; from which it will be apparent that the wickedness he was about to do was not nearly so great in intention as it was in reality, and that his youth, and inexperience, and want of imagination, his incapacity to put himself into the position of another, or realize anything but his own wants and sentiments, pushed him unawares, while he contemplated only an act of selfishness, into a social crime.

But yet the sense of doing this thing entirely alone, of doing it in secret, which was contrary to all his habitudes of mind, filled him with a strange inquietude. It hurt his conscience more to be making such a wonderful move for himself, out of the knowledge of his mother and everybody belonging to him, than to be trying to disgrace his mother and overthrow her good name and honour; of the latter, he was only dimly conscious, but the former he saw clearly. A strange paradox, apparently, but yet not without many parallels. There are poor creatures who do not hesitate at drowning themselves, and yet shrink from the chill of the "black flowing river" in which it is to be accomplished. As for Will, he did not hesitate to throw dark anguish and misery into the peaceful household he had been bred in-he did not shrink from an act which would imbitter the lives of all who loved him, and change their position, and disgrace their name-but the thought of taking his first great step in life out of anybody's knowledge, made his head swim, and the light fail in his eyesand filled him with a giddy mingling of excitement and shame. He did not realize the greater issue, except as it affected himself solely-but he did the other in its fullest sense. Thus he went on through the commonplace streets, with his heart throbbing in his ears, and the blood rushing to his head; and yet he was not remorseful, nor conscience-stricken, nor sorry, but only strongly excited, and moved by a certain nervous shyness and shame.

Notwithstanding this, a certain practical faculty in Wilfrid led him before seeking out his tempter and first informant, to seek independent testimony. It would be difficult to say what it was that turned his thoughts towards Mrs. Kirkman; but it was to her he went. The Colonel's wife received him with a sweet smile, but she was busy with much more important concerns; and when she had placed him at a table covered with tracts and magazines, she took no further notice of Will. She was a woman, as has been before mentioned, who laboured under a chronic dissatisfaction with the clergy, whether as represented in the person of a regimental chaplain, or of a Dean and Chapter; and she was not content to suffer quietly, as so many people do. Her discontent was active, and expressed itself not only in lamentation and complaint, but in very active measures. She could not reappoint to the offices in the Cathedral, but she could do what was in her power, by Scripture-readers, and societies for private instruction, to make up the deficiency; and she was very busy with one of her agents when Will entered, who certainly had not come about any evangelical business. As time passed, however, and it became apparent to him that Mrs. Kirkman was much more occupied with her other visitor than with any curiosity about his own boyish errand, whatever it might be, Will began to lose patience. When he made a little attempt to gain a hearing in his turn, he was silenced by the same sweet smile, and a clasp of the hand. "My dear boy, just a moment; what we are talking of is of the greatest importance," said Mrs. Kirkman. "There are so few real means of grace in this benighted town, and to think that souls are being lost daily, hourly-and yet such a show of services and prayers-it is terrible to think of it. In a few minutes, my dear boy."

"What I want is of the greatest importance too," said Wilfred, turning doggedly away from the table and the magazines.

Mrs. Kirkman looked at him, and thought she saw spiritual trouble in his eye. She was flattered that he should have thought of her under such interesting circumstances. It was a tardy but sweet compensation for all she had done, as she said to herself, for his mother; and going on this mistaken idea she dismissed the Scripture-reader, having first filled him with an adequate sense of the insufficiency of the regular clergy. It was, as so often happens, a faithful remnant, which was contending alone for true religion against all the powers of this world. They were sure of one thing at least, and that was that everybody else was wrong. This was the idea with which her humble agent left Mrs. Kirkman; and the same feeling, sad but sweet, was in her own mind as she drew a chair to the table and sat down beside her dear young friend.

"And so you have come all the way from Kirtell to see me, my dear boy?" she said. "How happy I shall be if I can be of some use to you. I am afraid you won't find very much sympathy there."

"No," said Wilfrid, vaguely, not knowing in the least what she meant. "I am sorry I did not bring you some flowers, but I was in a hurry when I came away.''

"Don't think of anything of the kind," said the Colonel's wife, pressing his hand. "What are flowers in comparison with the one great object of our existence? Tell me about it, my dear Will; you know I have known you from a child."

"You knew I was coming then," said Will, a little surprised, "though I thought nobody knew? Yes, I suppose you have known us all our lives. What I want is to find out about my mother's marriage. I heard you knew all about it. Of course you must have known all about it. That is what I want to understand."

"Your mother's marriage!" cried Mrs Kirkman; and to do her justice she looked aghast. The question horrified her, and at the same time it disappointed her. "I am sure that was not what you came to talk to me about," she said coaxingly, and with a certain charitable wile. "My dear dear boy, don't let shyness lead you away from the greatest of all subjects. I know you came to talk to me about your soul."

"I came to ask you about my mother's marriage," said Will. His giddiness had passed by this time, and he looked her steadily in the face. It was impossible to mistake him now, or think it a matter of unimportance or mere curiosity. Mrs. Kirkman had her faults, but she was a good woman at the bottom. She did not object to make an allusion now and then which vexed Mary, and made her aware, as it were, of the precipice by which she was always standing. It was what Mrs. Kirkman thought a good moral discipline for her friend, besides giving herself a pleasant consciousness of power and superiority; but when Mary's son sat down in front of her, and looked with cold but eager eyes in her face, and demanded this frightful information, her heart sank within her. It made her forget for the moment all about the clergy and the defective means of grace; and brought her down to the common standing of a natural Christian woman, anxious and terrorstricken for her friend.

"What have you to do with your mother's marriage?" she said, trembling a little. "Do you know what a very strange question you are asking? Who has told you anything about that? O me! you frighten me so, I don't know what I am saying. Did Mary send you? Have you just come from your mother? If you want to know about her marriage, it is of her that you should ask information. Of course she can tell you all about it—she and your aunt Agatha. What a very strange question to ask of me!"

Wilfrid looked steadily into Mrs. Kirkman's agitated face, and saw it was all true he had heard. "If you did not know anything about it," he said, with pitiless logic, "you would say so. Why should you look so put out if there was nothing to tell?"

"I am not put out," said Mrs. Kirkman, still more disturbed. "Oh, Will, you are a dreadful boy. What is it you want to know? What is it for? Did you tell your mother you were coming here?"

"I don't see what it matters whether I told my mother, or what it is for," said Will. "I came to you because you were good, and would not tell a lie. I can depend on what you say to me. I have heard all about it already, but I am not so sure as I should be if I had it from you."

This compliment touched the Colonel's wife ou a susceptible point. She calmed a little out of her fright. A boy with so just an appreciation of other people's virtues could not be meditating anything unkind or unnatural to his mother. Perhaps it would be better for Mary that he should know the rights of it; perhaps it was providential that he should have come to her, who could give him all the details.

"I don't suppose you can mean any harm," she said. "Oh Will, our hearts are all desperately wicked. The hest of us is little able to resist temptation. You are right in thinking I will tell you the truth if I tell you anything; but oh my dear boy, if it should be to lead you to evil and not good——"

"Never mind about the evil and the good," said Will, impatiently. "What I want is to know what is false and what is true."

Mrs. Kirkman hesitated still; but she began to persuade herself that he might have heard something worse than the truth. She was in a great perplexity, impelled to speak, and yet frightened to death at the consequences. It was a new situation for her altogether, and she did not know how to manage it. She clasped her hands helplessly together, and the very movement suggested an idea which she grasped at, partly because she was really a sincere good woman who believed in the efficacy of prayer, and partly, poor soul, to gain a little time, for she was at her wits' end.

"I will," she said. "I will, my dear boy; I will tell you everything; but oh, let us kneel down and have a word of prayer first, that we may not make a bad use of—of what we hear."

If she had ever been in earnest in her life it was at that moment; the tears were in her eyes, and all her little affectations of solemnity had disappeared. She could not have told anybody what it was she feared; and yet the more she looked at the boy beside her, the more she felt their positions change, and feared and stood in awe, feeling that she was for the moment his slave, and must do anything he might command.

"Mrs. Kirkman," said Will, "I don't understand that sort of thing. I don't know what bad use you can think I am going to make of it;—at all events it won't be your fault. I shall not detain you five minutes if you will only tell me what I want to know."

And she did tell him accordingly, not knowing how to resist, and warmed in the telling in spite of herself, and could not but let him know that she thought it was for Mary's good, and to bring her to a sense of the vanity of all earthly things. She gave him scrupulously all the details. The story flowed out upon Will's hungry ears with scarcely a pause. She told him all about the marriage, where it had happened, and who had performed it, and who had been present. Little Hugh had been present. She had no doubt he would remember, if it was recalled to his memory. Mrs. Kirkman recollected perfectly the look that Mary had thrown at her husband when she saw the child there. Poor Mary! she had thought so much of reputation and a good name. She had been so much thought of in the regiment. They all called her by that ridiculous name, Madonna Mary-and made so much of her, before "And did they not make much of her after?"

said Will, quickly.

"It is a different thing," said Mrs. Kirkman, softly shaking her long curls and returning to herself. "A poor sinner returning to the right way ought to be more warmly welcomed than even the best, if we can call any human creature good; but—"

"Is it my mother you call a poor sinner?" asked Will.

Then there was a pause. Mrs. Kirkman shook her head once more, and shook the long curls that hung over her cheeks; but it was difficult to answer. "We are all poor sinners," she said. "Oh my dear boy, if I could only persuade you how much more important it is to think of your own soul. If your poor dear mamma has done wrong, it is God who is her judge. I never judged her for my part, I never made any difference. I hope I know my own shortcomings too well for that."

"I thought I heard you say something odd to her once," said Will. "I should just like to see any one uncivil to my mother. But that's not the question. I want that Mr. Churchill's address, please."

"I can truly say I never made any difference," said Mrs. Kirkman, "some people might have blamed me—but I always thought of the Mary that loved much—Oh, Will, what comforting words! I hope your dear mother has long, long ago, repented of her error. Perhaps your father deceived her, as she was so young; perhaps it was all true the strange story he told about the register being burnt and all that. We all thought it was best not to inquire into it. We know what we saw; but, remember you have pledged your word not to make any dispeace with what I have told you. You are not to make a disturbance in the family about it. It is all over and past, and everybody has agreed to forget it. You are not going to make any dispeace—""

"I never thought of making any dispeace," said Will; but that was all he said. He was brief as he always was, and uncommunicative, and inclined, now he had got all he wanted, to get up abruptly and go away.

"And now, my dear young friend, you must do something for me," said Mrs. Kirkman, "in repayment for what I have done for you. You must read these, and you must not only read them, but think over them and seek light where it is to be found. Oh, my dear boy, how anxious we are to search into any little mystery in connection with ourselves, and how little we think of the mysteries of eternity! You must promise to give a little attention to this great theme before this day has come to an end."

"Oh yes, I'll read them," said Will, and he thrust into his pocket a roll of tracts she gave him without any further thought what they were. The truth was, that he did not pay much attention to what she was saying; his head had begun to throb and feel giddy again, and he had a rushing in his ears. He had it all in his hands now, and the sense of his power overwhelmed him. He had never had such an instrument in his hands before, he had never known what it was to be capable of moving anybody, except to momentary displeasure or anxiety; and he felt as a man might feel in whose hand there had suddenly been placed the most powerful of weapons, with unlimited licence to use it as he would-to break down castles with it or crowns, or slay armies at a blow-and only his own absolute pleasure to decide when or where it should fall. Something of intoxication and yet of alarm was in that first sense of power. He was rapt into a kind of ecstasy, and yet he was alarmed and afraid. He thrust the tracts into his pocket, and he received, cavalierly enough, Mrs. Kirkman's parting salutations. He had got all he wanted from her, and Will's was not a nature to be very expansive in the way of gratitude. Perhaps even, any sort of dim moral sense he might have on the subject, made him feel that in the news he had just heard there was not much room for gratitude. Anyhow he made very little pretence at those hollow forms of courtesy which are current in the elder world. He went away having got what he wanted, and left the Colonel's wife in a state of strange excitement and growing compunction. Oddly enough, Will's scanty courtesy roused more compunctions in her mind than anything else had done. She had put Mary's fate, as it were, into the hands of a boy who had so little sense of what was right as to withdraw in the most summary and abrupt way the moment his curiosity was satisfied; who had not even grace enough, or self-control enough, to go through the ordinary decorums, or pay common attention to what she said to him; and now this inexperienced undisciplined lad had an incalculable power in his hands—power to crush and ruin his own family, to dispossess his brother and disgrace his mother; and nothing but his own forbearance or good-pleasure to limit him. What had she done?

Will walked about the streets for a full hour after, dizzy with that same extraordinary, intoxicating, alarming sense of power. Before, it had all been vague, now it was distinct and clear; and even beyond his desire to "right" himself, came the inclination to set this strange machine in motion, and try his new strength. He was still so much a boy, that he was curious to see the effect it would produce, eager to ascertain how it would work, and what it could do. He was like a child in possession of an infernal machine, longing to try it, and yet not unconscious of the probable mischief. The sense of his power went to his head, and intoxicated him like wine. Here it was all ready in his hands, an instrument which could take away more than life, and he was afraid of it, and of the strength of the recoil; and yet was full of eagerness to see it go off, and see what results it would actually bring forth. He walked about the town, not knowing where he was going, forgetting all about his mother's commissions, and all about Percival, which was more extraordinary-solely occupied with the sensation that the power was in his hands. He went into the Cathedral, and walked all round it, and never knew he had been there; and when at last he found himself at the railway station again, he woke up again abruptly, as if he had been in a dream. Then making an effort he set his wits to work about Percival, and asked himself what he was to do. Percival was nothing to Will: he was his Aunt Winnie's husband, and perhaps had not used her well, and he could furnish no information half so clear or distinct as that which Mrs. Kirkman had given. Will did not see any reason in particular why he should go out of his way to seek such a man out. He had been no doubt his first informant, but in his present position of power and superiority, he did not feel that he had any need of Percival. And why should he seek him out? When he had sufficiently recovered his senses to go through this reasoning, Will went deliberately back to town again, and executed his mother's commissions. He went to several shops, and gave orders which she had charged him with, and even took the trouble to choose the things she wanted, in the most painstaking way, and was as concerned that they should be right as if he had been the most dutiful and tender of sons; and all the while he was thinking to ruin her, and disgrace her, and put the last stigma upon her name, and render her an outcast from her peaceful world. Such was the strange contradiction that existed within him; he went back without speaking to any one, without seeing anybody, knitting his brows and thinking all the way. The train that carried him home, with his weapon in his hands, passed with a rush and shriek the train which was conveying Nelly, with a great basket of flowers in her lap, and a vague gleam of infinite content in her eyes, back to her nursery and her duties, with Hugh by her side, who was taking care of her, and losing himself, if there had been any harm in it. That sweet loss and gain was going on imperceptibly in the carriage where the one brother sat happy as a young prince, when the other brother shot past as it were on wings of flame like a destroying angel. Neither thought of the other as they thus crossed, the one being busy with the pre-occupation of young love, the other lost in a passion, which was not hate, nor even enmity, which was not inconsistent with a kind of natural affection, and yet involved destruction and injury of the darkest and most overwhelming kind. Contrasts so sharply and clearly pointed occur but seldom in a world so full of modifications and complicated interests; yet they do occur sometimes. And this was how it was with Mary's boys.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WHEN Wilfrid reached home, he found his mother by herself in the drawing-room. Winnie had a headache, or some other of those aches which depend upon temper and the state of the mind, and Aunt Agatha was sitting by her, in the darkened room, with bottles of eau de Cologne, and sal volatile, and smelling salts, and all the paraphernalia of this kind of indisposition. Aunt Agatha had been apt to take headaches herself in her younger days when she happened to be crossed, and she was not without an idea that it was a very orthodox resource for a woman when she could not have her own way, And thus they were shut up, exchanging confidences. It did poor Winnie good, and it did not do Miss Seton any harm. And Mary was alone downstairs. She was not looking so bright as when Wilfrid weut away. The idea which Sir Edward had suggested to her, even if it had taken no hold of her mind, had breathed on her a possible cloud; and she looked up wistfully at her boy as he came in. Wilfrid, too, bore upon his face, to some extent, the marks of what he had been doing; but then his mother did not know what he had beeu doing, and could not guess what the dimness meant which was over his countenance. It was not a bright face at any time, but was often lost in mists, and its meaning veiled from his mother's eyes; and she could not follow him, this time any more than other times, into the uncertain depths. All she could do was to look at him wistfully, and long to see a little clearer, and wonder, as she had so often wondered, how it was that his thoughts and ways were so often out of her ken-how it was that children could go so far away, and be so wholly sundered, even while at the very side of those who had nursed them on their knees, and trained them to think and feel. A standing wonder, and yet the commonest thing in nature. Mary felt it over again with double force to-day, as he came and brought her her wool and bits of ribbon, and she looked into his face and did not know what its meaning was.

As for Will, it was a curious sensation for him, too, on his part. It was such an opportunity as he could scarcely have looked for, for opening to his mother the great discovery he had just made, and the great changes that might follow. He could have had it all out with her and put his power into operation, and seen what its effects were, without fear of being disturbed. But he shrank from it, he could not tell why. He was not a boy of very fastidious feelings, but still to sit there facing her and look into her face, and tell her that he had been inquiring into her past life, and had found out her secret, was more than Will was capable of. To meditate doing it, and to think over what he would say, and to arrange the words in which he would tell her that it was still one of her sons who would have Earlston-was a very different thing from fairly looking her in the face and doing it. He stared at her for a moment in a way which startled Mary; and then the impossibility became evident to him, and he turned his eyes away from her and sat down.

"You look a little strange, Will," said Mary. "Are you tired, or has anything happened? You startled me just now, you looked so pale."

"No, I am not tired," said Will, in his curt way. "I don't know anything about being pale."

"Well, you never were very rosy," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "I did not expect you so soon. I thought you would have gone to the Askells', and come home with Hugh."

"I never thought of that. I thought you wanted your wool and things," said Will.

It was very slight, ordinary talk, and yet it was quivering with meaning on both sides, though neither knew what the other's meaning was. Will, for his part, was answering his mother's questions with something like the suppressed mania of homicide within him, not quite knowing whether at any moment the subdued purpose might not break out, and kill, and reveal itself; whereas his mother, totally unsuspecting how far things had gone, was longing to discover whether Percival had gained any power over him, and what that adversary's tactics were.

"Have you seen anybody?" she said. "By the way, Sir Edward was talking of Major Percival—he seemed to think that he might still be in Carlisle. Did you by any chance see anything of him there?"

She fixed her eyes full upon him as she spoke, but Will did not any way shrink from her eyes.

"No," he said, carelessly. "I did not see him. He told me he was going to stay a day or two in Carlisle, but I did not look out for him, particularly. He gets to be a bore after the first."

When Mary heard this, her face cleared up like the sky after a storm. It had been all folly, and once more she had made herself unhappy about nothing. How absurd it was. Percival was wicked. but still he had no cause to fix any quarrel upon her, or poison the mind of her son. It was on Winnie's account he came, and on Winnie's account, no doubt, he was staying; and in all likelihood Mrs. Ochterlony and her boys were as utterly unimportant to him, as in ordinary circumstances he was to them. Mary made thus the mistake by which a tolerant and open mind, not too much occupied about itself, sometimes goes astray. People go wrong much more frequently from thinking too much of themselves, and seeing their own shadow across everybody's way; but yet there may be danger even in the lack of egotism: and thus it was that Mary's face cleared up, and her doubts dispersed, just at the moment when she had most to dread.

Then there was a pause, and the homicidal impulse, so to speak, took possession of Will. He was playing with the things he had bought, putting them into symmetrical and unsymmetrical shapes on the table, and when he suddenly said "Mother," Mrs. Ochterlony turned to him with a smile. He said "Mother," and then he stopped short, and picked to pieces the construction he was making, but at the same time he never raised his eyes.

"Well, Will?" said Mary.

And then there was a brief, but sharp, momentary struggle in his mind. He meant to speak, and wanted to speak, but could not. His throat seemed to close with a jerk when he tried—the words would not come from his lips. It was not that he was ashamed of what he was going to do, or that any sudden compunction for his mother seized him. It was a kind of spasm of impossibility, as much physical as mental. He could no more do it, than he could lift the cottage from its solid foundations. He went on arranging the little parcels on the table into shapes, square, oblong, and triangular, his fingers busy, but his mind much more busy, his eyes looking at nothing, and his lips unable to articulate a single word.

"Well, Will? what were you going to say?"

"Nothing," said Will; and he got up and went away with an abruptness which made his mother wonder and smile. It was only Will's way; but it was an exaggerated specimen of Will's way. She thought to herself when he was gone, with regret, that it was a great pity he was so abrupt. It did not matter at home, where everybody knew him; but among strangers, where people did not know him, it might do him so much injury. Poor Will!

As for the boy himself, he went out, and took himself to task, and felt all over him a novel kind of tremor, a sense of strange excitement, the feeling of one who had escaped a great danger. But that was not at all the feeling which ought to have been in his mind. He had neglected and lost a great opportunity, and though it was not difficult to make opportunities, Will felt by instinct that his mother's mere presence had defeated him. He could not tell her of the discovery he had made. He might write her a letter about it, or send the news to her at second-hand; but to look in her face and tell her was impossible. So sit down there by her side, and meet her eyes, and tell her that he had been making inquiries into her character, and that she was not the woman she was supposed to be, nor was the position of her children such as the world imagined, was an enterprise which Wilfrid had once and for ever proved impossible. He stood blank before this difficulty which lay at the very beginning of his undertaking; he had not only failed, but he saw that he must for ever fail. It amazed him, but he felt it was final. His mouth was closed, and he could not speak.

nothing, and Mary was ashamed of her momentary

And then he thought he would wait until Hugh came home. Hugh was not his mother, nor a woman. He was no more than Will's equal at the best, and perhaps even his inferior; and to him, surely, it could be said. He waited for a long time, and kept lingering about the roads, wondering what train his brother would come by, and feeling somehow reluctant to go in again, so long as his mother was alone. For in Mrs. Ochterlony's presence Will could not forget that he had a secret-that he had done something out of her knowledge, and had something of the most momentous character to tell her, and yet could not tell it to her. It would be different with Hugh. He waited loitering about upon the dusty summer roads, biting his nails to the quick, and labouring hard through a sea of thought. This telling was disagreeable, even when it was only Hugh that had to be told-more disagreeable than anything else about the business, far more disagreeable certainly than he had anticipated it would be; and Wilfrid did not quite make out how it was that a simple fact should be so difficult to communicate. It enlarged his view so far, and gave him a glimpse into the complications of maturer life, but it did not in any way divert him from his purpose, or change his ideas about his rights. At length the train appeared by which it was certain Hugh must come home. Wilfrid sauntered along the road within sight of the little station to meet his brother, and yet when he saw Hugh actually approaching, his heart gave a jump in his breast. The moment had come, and he must do it, which was a very different thing from thinking it over, and planning what he was to say.

"You here, Will!" said Hugh. "I looked for you in Carlisle. Why didn't you go to Mrs. Askell's and wait for me?"

"I had other things to do," said Will, briefly. Hugh laughed. "Very important things, I have Hugh laughed. "Very important things, I have no doubt," he said; "but still you might have waited for me, all the same. How is Aunt Winnie?

I saw that fellow,—that husband of hers,—at the station. I should like to know what he wants hanging about here."

"He wants her, perhaps," said Will, though with another jump of his heart.

"He had better not come and bother her," said Hugh. "She may not be perfect herself, but I won't stand it. She is my mother's sister after all, and she is a woman. I hope you won't encourage him to hang about here."

"I?" cried Will, with amazement and indigna-

"Yes," said Hugh, with elder-brotherly severity.
"Not that I think you would mean any harm by it, Will; it is not a sort of thing you can be expected to understand. A fellow like that should be kept at a distance. When a man behaves badly to a woman—to his wife—to such a beautiful creature as she has been——"

"I don't see anything very beautiful about her," said Will.

"That doesn't matter," said Hugh, who was hot and excited, having been taken into Winnie's confidence. "She has been beautiful, and that's enough. Indeed, she ought to be beautiful now, if that fellow hadn't been a brute. And if he means to come back here—"

"Perhaps it is not her he wants," said Will, whose profound self-consciousness made him play quite a new part in the dialogue.

"What could he want else?" said Hugh, with scorn. "You may be sure it is no affection for any of us that brings him here."

Here was the opportunity, if Will could but have taken it. Now was the moment to tell him that something other than Winnie might be in Percival's mind, -that it was his own fortune, and not hers, that hung in the balance. But Will was dumb; his lips were sealed; his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth. It was not his will that was in fault. It was a rebelliou of all his physical powers, a rising up of nature against his purpose. He was silent in spite of himself; he said not another word as they walked on together. He suffered Hugh to stray into talk about the Askells, about the Museum, about anything or nothing. Once or twice he interrupted the conversation abruptly with some half-dozen words, which brought it to a sudden stop, and gave him the opportunity of broaching his own subject. But when he came to that point, he was struck dumb. Hugh, all innocent and unconscious, in serene elder-brotherly superiority, good-humoured and condescending, and carelessly affectionate, was as difficult to deal with as Mary herself. Without withdrawing from his undertaking, or giving up his "rights," Wilfrid felt himself helpless; he could not say it out. seemed to him now that so far from giving into it, as he once imagined, without controversy, Hugh equally without controversy would set it aside as something monstrous, and that his new hope would be extinguished and come to an end if his elder brother had the opportunity of thus putting it down at once. When they reached home, Will withdrew to his own room, with a sense of being baffled and defeated—defeated before he had struck a blow. He did not come downstairs again, as they remembered afterwards-he did not want any tea. He had not a headache, as Aunt Agatha, now relieved from attendance upon Winnie, immediately suggested. All he wanted was to be left alone, for he had something to do. This was the message that came downstairs. "He is working a great deal too much," said Aunt Agatha; "you will see he will hurt his brain or something;" while Hugh, too, whispered to his mother, "You shall see !- I never did much, but Will will go in for all sorts of honours," the generous fellow whispered in his mother's ear; and Mary smiled, in her heart thinking so too. If they had seen Will at the moment sitting with his face supported by both his hands, biting his nails, and knitting his brows, and pondering more intently than any man ever pondered over classic puzzle or scientific problem, they might have been startled out of those pleasant thoughts.

And yet the problem he was considering was one that racked his brain, and made his head ache, had he been sufficiently at leisure to feel it. The more impossible he felt it to explain himself and make his claim, the more obstinately determined was he to make it, and have what belonged to him. discouragement and sense of defeat did but intensify his resolution. He had failed to speak, notwithstanding his opportunities; but he could write, or he could employ another voice as his interpreter. With all his egotism and determination, Wilfred was young, nothing but a boy, and inexperienced, and at a loss what to do. Everything seemed easy to him until he tried to do it; and when he tried, everything seemed impossible. He had thought it the most ordinary affair in the world to tell his discovery to his mother and brother, until the moment came which in both cases proved the communication to be beyond his powers. And now he thought he could write. After long pondering, he got up and opened the little desk upon which he had for years written his verses and exercises, troubled by nothing worse than a doubtful quantity, and made an endeavour to carry out his last idea. Will's style was not a bad style. It was brief and terse, and to the point, -a remarkable kind of diction for a boy, -but he did not find that it suited his present purpose. He put himself to torture over his letters. He tried it first in one way, and then in another; but however he put it, he felt within himself that it would not do. He had no sort of harsh or unnatural meaning in his mind. They were still his mother and brother to whom he wanted to write, and he had no inclination to wound their feelings, or to be disrespectful or unkind. In short, it only required this change, and his establishment in what he supposed his just position, to make him the kindest and best of sons of the flesh, been known to him, -and he could not and brothers. He toiled over his letters as he had never toiled over anything in his life. He could not tell how to express himself, nor even what to say. He addressed his mother first, and then Hugh, and then his mother again; but the more he laboured, the more impossiblé he found his task. When Mrs. Ochterlony came upstairs and opened his door to see what her boy was about, Wilfrid stumbled up from his seat, red and heated, and shut up his desk, and faced her with an air of confusion and trouble which she could not understand. It was not too late even then to bring her in and tell her all; and this possibility bewildered Will and filled him with agitation and excitement, to which naturally his mother had no clue.

"What is the matter?" she said, anxiously; "are you ill, Will? Have you a headache? I thought you were in bed."

"No, I am all right," said Will, facing her with a look which in its confusion seemed sullen. "I am busy. It is too soon to go to bed."

"Tell me what is wrong," said Mary, coming a step further into the room. "Will, my dear boy, I am sure you are not well. You have not been quarrelling with any one-with Hugh-

"With Hugh!" said Will, with a little scorn; "why should I quarrel with Hugh?"

"Why, indeed!" said Mrs. Ochterlony, smiling faintly; "but you do not look like yourself. Tell me what you have been doing at least."

Will's heart thumped against his breast. He might put her into the chair by which she was standing, and tell her everything, and have it over. This possibility still remained to him. He stood for a second and looked at her, and grew breathless with excitement, but then somehow his voice seemed to die away in his throat.

"If I were to tell you what I was doing, you would not understand it," he said, repeating mechanically words which he had used in good faith, with innocent schoolboy arrogance, many a time before. As for Mary, she looked at him wistfully, seeing something in his eyes which she could not interpret. They had never been candid, frank eyes like Hugh's. Often enough before, they had been impatient of her scrutiny, and had veiled their meaning with an apparent blank; but yet there had never been any actual harm hid by the artifice. Mary sighed; but she did not insist, knowing how useless it was. If it was anything, perhaps it was some boyish jealousy about Nelly,-an imaginary feeling which would pass away and leave no trace behind. But, whatever it was, it was vain to think of finding it out by questions; and she gave him her good-night kiss and left him, comforting herself with the thought that most likely it was only one of Will's uncomfortable moments, and would be over by to-morrow. But when his mother went away, Will for his part sank down, with the strangest tremor, in his chair. Never before in his life had this sick and breathless excitement, this impulse of the mind and resistance bear it. It seemed to him he never could stand in her presence, never feel his mother's eyes upon him, without feeling that now was the moment that he must and ought to tell her, and yet could not tell her, no more than if he were speechless. had never felt very deeply all his life before, and the sense of this struggle took all his strength from him. It made his heart beat, so that the room and the house and the very solid earth on which he stood seemed to throb and tingle round him; it was like standing for ever on the edge of a precipice over which the slightest movement would throw him, and the very air seemed to rush against his ears as it would do if he were falling. He sank down into his chair, and his heart beat, and the pulses throbbed in his temples. What was he to do?-he could not speak, he could not write, and yet it must be told, and his rights gained, and the one change made which should convert him into the tenderest son, the most helpful brother, that ever man or woman had. At last, in his despair and pertinacy, there came into his mind that grand expedient which occurs naturally to everything that is young and unreasonable under the pressure of unusual trials. He would go away ;-he could not go on seeing them continually, with this communication always ready to break from the lips which would not utter it, -nor could he write to them while he was still with them, and when any letter must be followed by an immediate explanatiou. But he could fly; and when he was at a safe distance, then he could tell them. No doubt it was cowardice to a certain extent; but there were other things as well. Partly it was impatience, and partly the absoluteness and imperious temper of youth, and that intolerance of everything painful which comes natural to it. He sat in his chair, noiseless and thinking, in the stillness of night, a poor young soul, tempted and yielding to temptation, sinful yet scarcely conscious how sinful he was, and yet at the same time forlorn with that profound forlornness of egotism and ill-doing which is almost pathetic in the young. He could consult nobody, take no one into his confidence. The only counsellors he had known in all his small experience were precisely those upon whom he was about to turn. He was alone, and had everything to plan, everything to do for himself.

And yet was there nobody whom he could take into his confidence? Suddenly in the stillness of the night a certain prosperous, comfortable figure came into the boy's mind-one who thought it was well to get money and wealth and power, anyhow except dishonestly, which of course was an impracticable and impolitic way. When that idea came to him like an inspiration, Will gave a little start, and looked up, and saw the blue dawn making all the bars of his window visible against the white blind that covered it. Night was gone with its dark counsels, and the day had come. What he did after that was to take out his boy's purse, and count over carefully all the money it contained. It was not much, but yet it was enough. Then he took his first great final step in life, with a heart that beat in his ears, but not loud enough to betray him. He went downstairs softly as the dawn brightened, and all the dim staircase and closed doors grew visible, revealed by the silent growth of the early light. Nobody heard him, nobody dreamed that any secret step could ever glide down those stairs or out of the innocent honest house. He was the youngest in it, and should have been the most innocent; and he thought he meant no evil. Was it not his right he was going to claim? He went softly out, going through the drawing-room window, which it was safer to leave open than the door, and across the lawn, which made no sound beneath his foot. The air of the summer morning was like balm, and soothed him, and the blueness brightened and grew rosy as he went his way among the early dews. The only spot on which, like Gideon's fleece, no dew had fallen, was poor Will's beating heart, as he went away in silence and secresy from his mother's door.

MIGNONETTE.

This is no rose, among the garden flowers

A queen in her own right, or lily fair
The bride of kings, that breathes upon the air
Such fragrance as the fragrance of these bowers.
The sun has pass'd this way and laid the hours
Of light and warmth, with all a lover's care,
Upou my garden's breast, and everywhere
Arise sweet answers. This that overpowers
Or rose or lily, and does least forget
The sun that loved it, seeking to renew
Its vows of perfume, as in deep regret
That it by day held up no gold to view,
Crimson or purple, is my Mignouette,
Whose beauty is its sweetness, not its hue.

THE LAST ERUPTIONS AND PRESENT STATE OF VESUVIUS.

BY PROFESSOR D. T. ANSTED, F.R.S.

COMPARED with Etna, Vesuvius is a volcano of subordinate importance. The area over which the volcanic eruptions spread, the height of the loftiest cone, the extent of the showers of ashes, and the magnitude of the lava currents, are all much smaller, and the secondary results are on an inferior scale. But-from its easier access, its position among some of the most beautiful scenery on the face of the earth, hallowed by classical reminiscences, which include all that is most striking in Greek and Roman history, and from its vicinity to Naples, where human life is perhaps more active and noisy, if not more energetic, than in any city in Europe-Vesuvius has always attracted the attention of geologists as well as travellers; and its varied phases have been minutely recorded. But the remarkable group of eruptions, commencing in 1857 and ending in 1861, has, perhaps, been less thought of out of Italy than it deserved; and it is the more important as it bears in some measure upon some questions of interest in the history of volcanoes.

Before 1857, a visit to the wide space of perfectly level ground known as the "Atrio del Cavallo," extending for some distance between the foot of the cone of Vesuvius and the ridge of Monte Somma, was a very easy and pleasant carriage excursion from Naples. There was a good road as far as the Observatory, and an hour's rough walking or riding from thence over the old lava was not a serious matter even for delicate ladies. Now the case is different. The road has been destroyed by the lava of that year, and there is a rough ride or walk from Portici before the Observatory is reached. Still the excursion is one involving no difficulties, and only a moderate amount of fatigue. It is, indeed, made expensive by extortionate charges; but there is no need of horse, or even of guide, for those who choose to walk and explore. An intelligent guide, familiar with the sites of the recent eruptions, is, however, very useful, and will save much time and trouble.

The "Atrio del Cavallo" is a part of the floor of the old crater of Monte Somma, destroyed by the great eruption of A.D. 79, and since paved with fine ashes, stones, and lava by the eruptions of the last eighteen hundred years. It is about 2,400 feet above the sea, and is quite open to the south-west. Before reaching it, however, there are places of the greatest interest to be visited on the road from Portici. Leaving that town at the station we reach in a few minutes the modern Recina, part of which covers the ruins of Herculaneum. Just outside this town is a current of old lava, which seems to have extended towards the sea, and, perhaps, advanced the coast line. It is cut across by the road at an elevation of 140 feet above the sea, and it presents a peculiar pale ash-grey colour, characteristic of Vesuvian lava. Though naked in places, it admits of vegetation; and, in this respect, contrasts strikingly with the Etna lavas of 1669 at Catania.

After a walk of less than a mile, we come in sight of a part of the great lava current of 1857, and soon afterwards find it stretching down along the very road itself. Here the very last wave of the flowing current has been frozen and solidified almost in the act of moving. It is a curious ellipsoidal mass, nearly smooth though striated in the direction of the current, and quite vesicular throughout. It is a perfect little gem of its kind, and might easily be removed to a museum, measuring only about three feet long, and two feet in diameter in the middle. Immediately beyond is a magnificent expanse of the extremity of the whole coulée. There are few things in their way more picturesque and wildlooking, and, at the same time, more instructive, than this black barren expanse. The roughness is something altogether inconceivable. The lava is like long twisted cables-like gigantic serpents entwining and throttling one another. It is cracked, and, at the cracks, is stained of a yellow and red colour. It is broken, and fragments of all sizes and shapes lie about in every direction. All this is cold and dead, but there are places where the current of 1859 is still warm, as shown by the air rising out of the fissures. The places of recent eruption of gases are marked by a larger number of cracks and a greater abundance of colour at the surface. Here the temperature is still too hot to bear the hand, and large quantities of salt have formed in efflorescent crystals a little within the surface. The air. however, that comes out so hot is here not steam, nor is there any acid sensible to the taste.

This lava of 1859 came out immediately under an almost vertical wall of similar rock, occupying a wide fissure in the tuff, and erupted in 1850. The wall is about 100 feet high, and almost vertical; the foot of it is about 1,270 feet above the sea. It erupted from the principal cone, and largely covers the "Atrio del Cavallo," running thence in three principal streams. The principal erupting points in 1858 were two. One of these was also at the foot of the great cone in the Atrio del Cavallo, and the other on the opposite side towards Torre del Greco.

The eruption of 1861, the last of any importance from Vesuvius, is particularly interesting from the position of the seat of eruption, and the circumstances attending the phenomenon. Unlike the case of 1855, previously to which there had been an unusual period of repose, on this occasion (between 1855 and 1860) the mountain had been constantly uneasy and occasionally active, and had even thrown out several important currents of lava. These vents, however, had closed, and everything was quiet in the month of March, 1860. On the 7th of December in the following year, very clear indications of coming disturbance were felt on the side of the mountain, between the principal crater and Torre del Greco. About 3 P.M. on the 8th, at a distance of about 4000 yards (two and one-third miles) nearly S.W. from the centre of the great crater, and nearly the same distance from the sea, at an elevation of about 950 feet above the sea, there rose a large column of thick smoke, accompanied by an enormous quantity of very fine ashes. It would seem probable that, at this moment, a broad and open fissure was formed, extending towards the west, and nearly three-quarters of a mile in length, from several points of which eruptions took place. I was informed by my guide, who had been present (and the statement was confirmed by other eye-witnesses), that only fine ashes erupted from the part of the fissure nearest the crater, while ashes and small stones were ejected lower down, larger red-hot lumps of scoria and blocks of stone below that, and, towards 5 P.M., a flow of lava from the lower extremity. lava was unusually fluid, loaded with crystals of pyroxene, and of peculiar texture. It proceeded rapidly towards Torre del Greco, and at 11 P.M. had reached within about 1000 yards of the houses. It there stopped. The eruption of ashes, however, continued, and was very copious, being conveyed to a great distance. The fine dust was accompanied by stones thrown into the air to a height estimated at more than 800 feet.

The crevice formed on the first eruption was followed by others the next day, extending towards the sea, and greatly alarming the inhabitants of the town of Torre del Greco. On the 10th, the water flowing from the public fountains and other springs was suddenly increased in quantity; this increase being accompanied by the emission of large quantities of carbonic acid gas, and even, as I was informed, of carburetted hydrogen, with small quantities of petroleum. Large quantities of gas rose from the sea. The springs remained affected for some time, but the new cones and craters soon ceased to exhibit any activity, and the main disturbance was at an end in eight days from its first commencement. Electrical phenomena accompanied the commencement of the eruption, but they affected only the principal crater. They are described as consisting of flashes of forked blue lightning, different from ordinary lightning, and confined to the summit of the crater. Shortly after the eruption, the ground was cracked, and many deep fissures were produced in the town of Torre del Greco, reaching down to the sea, and rendering the town almost uninhabitable.

The present condition of the scene of this cruption is interesting in itself, and also in comparison with the last and more recent cruption on the upper slopes of Etna. These events offer many points of VII_{-42}

Thus, at Vesuvius, the outburst was contrast. from an unusually low point on the hill-sides, and at Etna, not much below the foot of the great crater (at least 1000 feet higher than the top of Vesuvius). At Vesuvius, again, the chief material thrown into the air was fine ash, while at Etna the stones of lava were from the first exceedingly large and abundant. The lava current was also much longer, larger, and deeper, in the disturbance of 1865. In the case of Vesuvius the work was over in eight days, at Etna it lasted as many months. In both cases there were seven distinct craters produced during the eruption; but the number of detached cones was smaller in the Vesuvian eruption.

The craters of 1861 are nearly in a line, and succeed one another at short intervals, commencing on the lower slopes of the mountain. The uppermost presents well stratified walls of tuff, probably those of the fissure. It is oval, and greatly depressed. There are remains of a small vent at the point nearest the cone of Vesuvius. It is much higher on the part towards the mountain than on the side near the sea, and is only separated from a smaller round crater adjoining it by a narrow ridge. It is partly filled with ashes of extreme fineness. Beyond the first and second crater is the third, which erupted somewhat later, but in the same way. There are no true cones of eruption, though there is a sloping heap of ash round both craters. They all exhibit more of the fissure than is usual, and are thus rather peculiar. The fourth (next in order towards Torre del Greco) was remarkable for its large eruption of stones, which are distributed over the ground adjacent in enormous quantity, mingled with ashes. Much mischief was done, as the country was cultivated and inhabited; one house being within a hundred yards of the fissure. There is still much chemical action going on in a part of this crater, and a considerable emission of sulphurous gases has taken place from it; but I could not discover any fumaroles in action at the time of my visit. The remaining three of the craters seem never to have attained any large size, although the chief erupted matter proceeded from the fifth and sixth. These are lower down the slope, and are now almost destroyed, being recognised quite as much by the desolation around as by their form. currents and the blocks of lava thrown out by the craters were all of the same kind, darker in colour than usual, and somewhat blue, resembling the lavas of 1855. Slight shocks of earthquakes were recorded at the mountain Observatory from the 7th of December to the 29th of January, and more considerable shocks took place about the time of the eruption and for a month afterwards. Heavy rain fell the day before the eruption. The appearance of the eruption at its first commencement was unusually grand; but it lasted a very short time. On the whole, there are few instances on record in which the lineal arrangement of the craters and the direction of the fissures, found in the adjacent country and indicated by outbursts of water and gas, afford more striking indications of the nature of the disturbance.

After visiting the scene of this interesting eruption I proceeded to the great cone, whose crater is now in a state of semi-activity—throwing out vapour and acid gases, with small quantities of scoriæ, but not exhibiting a large quantity of lava. This cone rises on the side towards Monte Somma from a level of 2400 feet above the sea. Many eruptions of lava of comparatively recent date have come out on this side, and almost all that is left of the ancient crater of Monte Somma is now covered with a rough floor, exhibiting the usual curious varieties of surface, observable when lava has cooled on an almost level plain. Crossing this, we approach the vertical walls of the old crater of Monte Somma, now intersected in every direction by remarkable dikes of hardened lava or basalt, that have long excited the attention of geologists. My own impression was, that these dikes are nothing more than the remains of parts of the liquid lava that once filled the old crater of Monte Somma to overflowing, and by its weight pressed outwards the tough walls till they were cracked. The fluid rock would then necessarily be squeezed into every crevice, whether produced by the weight of the mass or formed by the cooling of the lava after its first injection. The cooled and hardened lava has been ejected during subsequent eruptions.

This view was confirmed by what I saw in the interior of the crater of Vesuvius. The outside of the great cone is chiefly composed of fine ashes, but there is a large mixture of small and large blocks of lava, penetrating at intervals through the cinder On the cone, and across the Atria del Cavallo or plain at its foot, are seen masses of grey trachytic lava, angular and fragmentary, and apparently fallen from some lofty cliff, such as that presented by the ridge of Monte Somma. The guides, however, tell us-and observation soon proves their correctness-that these have been thrown out of the crater. I measured one that must have weighed at least 20 tons. The whole plain, though covered with recent lava, was strewn with blocks of smaller size of the same material, quite distinct from the black and scoriaceous material that had issued from the sides of the cone and run over the ground. There were also several of those rounded and spindle-shaped masses called volcanic bombs, some of which were very large (more than a cubic yard in content).

The ascent of the cone of Vesuvius is not difficult, if attempted where the larger scoriæ are sufficiently close together to afford foot-hold. Elsewhere it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, especially on the side towards the sea, where the ashes are fine and loose, and no progress could be made. The height of the cone from the Atria del Cavallo I found to be nearly 1600 feet, and the angle of the slope in some extreme cases as much as 33°. The cone is rather higher towards the south-east, and, except in one part, very steep and ridge-shaped, the descent inwards to the crater being sharper than the outer slope of ashes.

The view of the interior of the crater from the top is very grand, but, as a matter of course, the appearance is always changing. At the time of my visit, I found it particularly interesting, although the amount of positive action was small. With some difficulty, and risk of injury to boots and dress, the crater could be entered and all parts visited. The walls were extremely steep, in many places vertical, and in some overhanging. The upper part is constantly falling in, but on the occasion of an eruption, the height of the cone is increased by fresh showers of ashes and stones. The upper and outer part of the cone is thus always loose, owing to the mode of its construction; but in the interior, a little below the top, it is formed of pale bluish-grey trachytic lava, rather hard and tolerably compact, precisely identical with the blocks that have been ejected. The hard walls are like those of a quarry, but in many places, where fumaroles exist, they are covered and concealed with loose black ash, striated here and there with the most brilliant yellow and orange tints. From small cavities in some parts of these rocks, air proceeds so intensely heated as to cook an egg in a few seconds. The rock here must glow within a few inches of the surface, as fragments of paper thrust in with a stick were at once reduced to tinder, though driven out immediately with great force by the current of hot air.

The floor of the crater was extremely remarkable. Except where the two vents of actual eruption had thrown up cones, it was one mass of fragments of the same pale-blue trachytic lava as that of which the walls are composed. These were fractured in the most extraordinary and inconceivable manner. They were split as if by the blow of some vast hammer. One great cleft of considerable depth extended across the bottom of the crater from one end to the other, and other splits appeared to have been produced in different directions. The fragments were detached and angular, and of all sizes. They were as fresh as if broken yesterday, and it was difficult in some places—impossible in others to pass across and amongst them. Out of the middle of the principal crack a small crater was formed, and close by on another crevice (less distinctly shown) was a large pile of scoriæ and ashes, forming a small inner cone, with its own separate crater reaching down below the level of the principal crater. Both these vents were in partial action. Even from the sides of the principal cone, before reaching the summit, a hissing sound, like that of a number of rockets let off at once, had attracted my attention, and I had timed the explosions as occurring at intervals of about two minutes, with much more considerable noise at intervals of six minutes. When inside the principal crater, I was able to see the nature of these eruptions. The level of the top of the cone, was about 300 feet. The larger of the small cones of eruption rose about 120 feet above the floor of the crater, and the smaller one only about six feet. They were about eighty yards asunder. The eruptions from these small vents seem to be alternate, generally more active from one for several hours, and then more active from the other, although the eruption from the smaller was generally preceded or accompanied by a small puff of steam from the bocca grande, or larger vent. Each time the noise was heard, a puff of white cloud (almost entirely aqueous vapour), at very high temperature, came out with a steady rush from the smaller vent, accompanied by a number of fragments of red-hot scoriæ, as large as a man's fist, which fell around, and which were soft enough to admit of a copper coin being inserted within its substance without difficulty. The puff lasted only for a short time, and was followed by repose, but the heat of the air issuing from the vent was almost too great to allow me to look down into it. The eruptions from the bocca grande were insignificant during the time of my visit, but were said to be much more considerable than those from the small vent when they occur, rendering the crater at such times unsafe to visit. Stones as well as scoriæ are then crupted. A tremulous motion of the earth was distinctly felt just before the eruptions took place from the smaller vent.

The crevices with which the two vents are connected are not parallel, and seem to have an imperfect communication. The larger gives off incessantly a certain quantity of chlorine, and there is a good deal of chemical action evident on the erupted materials of the cone, from the effects of the fumaroles, which are both numerous and very hot. As far as the senses could detect, chlorine and carbonic acid gas were the only gases accompanying the steam, and the proportion was always small. There was no appearance of sulphur.

At a distance of about 100 yards from the bocca grande, and amongst great fragments of broken lava, most of which were cold, there was one spot where the heat appeared to be very great, and on looking down into a crevice, a couple of feet below the surface, I observed that the stone was of a bright glowing red, visible in broad daylight. No other place showed the red-hot stone in this way, and I saw no fluid lava, but it is evident that the eruption from the small mouth must have been through the molten rock at no great depth from the surface. Perhaps, if it had been possible to look down, one might have seen the lava there in a state of at least semi-fluidity, as the scorize could hardly otherwise have been erupted. I was struck with the fact, that there was within the crater much more of the pale bluish-grey lava than of scorizeous rock, and I could easily understand that the first effect of a great eruption must be to thrust out into the air all the loose fragments lying between the surface and the fixed rock below.

I found it on the whole easier to climb the steep face of the crater towards the top than I had done to descend into the interior, and after more than an hour spent in close contact with such terrible and interesting phenomena, I was not sorry to breathe once more the free and fresh air, untainted with the offensive gases constantly issuing from the walls and bottom of the crater.

I reached the summit of the cone on the side nearly opposite to that from which I had descended. The view across the black fine ashes of which the cone is formed, and the equally black plains of lava at its feet, to the rich and luxurious nature exhibited beyond—the sight of the Bay of Naples spread out at one's feet, with its numerous picturesque towns and villages, many of which had been shaken, and some almost overwhelmed only a short time before by the terrible forces slumbering beneath, could not but impress me very strongly. After remaining for a time enjoying the prospect and thinking over the history that belonged to it, I made my way down towards Recina. A few minutes' sliding over the vast slope of the finest ash of which the cone is here formed, brought me once more on the rough lava, and in half an hour I was again within the range of vegetation. Passing the hills and valleys formed a few years ago, I descended rapidly to the sea, and at length arrived at the broken and recently mended walls and houses of Torre del Greco.

Here we take leave of Vesuvius; but it is well worth while to examine, if there is time on passing through the little town, some very curious results of the earthquake that formed an appropriate close to the eruption of 1861.

MIRIAM HARRIS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "QUAKER PHILANTHROPY."

ALTHOUGH charity is eminently a Christian virtue, it is a singular fact that the most charitable community among us is that of the Jews. This, at least, we may say without fear of contradiction, that in all that pertains to the munificent and judicious distribution of alms the Jews very much excel us. Were deeds of benevolence practised by the Christian communities with the same liberality as they are among the Jews, not only would every child whose parents are too poor to pay for his instruction receive a good moral education, but the whole of our Poor Laws might be erased from our statute books, for the Jews, unaided by the parochial authorities, do actually manage to entirely support their own poor. When this fact is brought under the notice of our Christian philanthropists, the following conventional remark is generally made on it, "Ah, certainly the Jews are a very charitable class, but the enormous wealth to be found among them, and the few poor dependent on them, enable them to practise a far wider system of beneficence than would be possible in our Christian communities with our hundreds of thousands of paupers."

This argument contains two errors. In the first place the Jews are not on the whole a wealthy community. It is true that among them may be found some families possessed of enormous wealth, but their middle class are certainly not in easier circumstances than middle-class Christians. So far from there being few Jewish poor, the fact is that the numbers of their indigent are at least three to one greater in proportion than are the indigent of our own Protestant denominations. Yet not only do the wealthier English Jews relieve their co-religionists without any application to the Poor Laws, but they have also thrown upon their hands a vast body of foreign Jewish paupers. It is quite a common practice for the Polish, German, and Dutch synagogues to ship their poor over to England for relief. Indeed we are almost inclined to believe that the charity we find so abundant among our Hebrew population is almost confined to them, and that their foreign brethren lack this virtue in about as great a proportion as it is developed among those born among us.

Not only is the charitable nature of the English Jews most honourable to them, but their method of exercising their benevolence is equally so. A fraud is very seldom practised on the Jewish community by that class of impudent impostors who so trouble and perplex our Christian philanthropists. It is true that it is exceedingly difficult for a Jew to impose upon the charitable of his nation, and that it is very seldom attempted; because the unworthy are perfectly well aware they would be speedily detected. This facility in discovering any impostor is due to an excellent practice common among the rich (especially the women) of personally visiting the poor, and becoming acquainted with their manners and habits, when they relieve their necessities. Without difficulty the charitable wealthy thus become as expert in detecting the idle and improvident as one of our own poor-law relieving officers.

Among the charitable enterprises of the Jews in the metropolis, that of maintaining their schools on an efficient footing, perhaps ranks the highest in their estimation. Of such importance is education considered by the English Jews of the present day that they refuse to assist any Jewish parents, no matter how deep their poverty, who cannot prove that they send their children to school. Nor has the parent the slightest excuse to offer; for not only. as we have said, is education to be procured gratuitously by the poorest, but an inducement is held out to the children to come to school by dinners being likewise provided for them. The most interesting of these schools, in which we personally saw the poor children at their dinner, are the celebrated Jewish Infant Schools in Commercial Street, Whitechapel, under the immediate superintendence of the lady whose name stands at the head of this article.* Prior to the spring of the year 1848, no attention seems to have been paid by the Jewish community at large to the state of their poor infant population. Admirable schools had certainly been instituted in which the Jewish youth, of the poorer classes, received gratuitously an excellent education, but nothing had been done for the infants. At last the notice of some of the leading Jewish philanthropists was called to the neglected condition of the swarms of little Jewish children in the neighbourhoods of Houndsditch and Spitalfields, and a meeting was held for the purpose of taking into consideration the possibility of establishing an infant school on the system adopted in our Protestant communities. At this meeting, which was numerously attended by both ladies and gentlemen of the Hebrew persuasion, it was unanimously resolved that the establishment of an institution of the kind was a work of paramount necessity. This point being agreed on, it now remained to select a site for the building, and to choose a governess under whose charge the children might be placed. Several names were mentioned, but all in their turn were either rejected or put aside for future consideration, not from the slightest want of energy, respectability, or talent on the part of those proposed, but simply because not one of them had hitherto been engaged in teaching poor infants, and it was thought advisable, if possible, to obtain a lady who had already had some experience in the work. At last two gentlemen who were present informed the meeting that they had heard that an infant school for Jewish children had been established in Houndsditch by two benevolent Jewish ladies. It was stated that they not only supported this school from their own limited resources, but had gratuitously given up the whole of their time to the task of instructing the helpless little ones placed under their care. This intelligence naturally awakened considerable interest, and the meeting, after some further discussion, resolved that a lady should be deputed by the meeting to visit the infant schools mentioned, and to report on them to a committee which was to be formed for the purpose of carrying out the proposed scheme.

The lady nominated by the meeting was Miss Annie Goldsmid, the daughter of the late Baron de Goldsmid, whose memory, with justice, appears to be venerated by all his co-religionists. Miss Goldsmid, accompanied by a friend, contrived to find the school, which was situated in one of the poorest and most thickly-populated localities in Houndsditch. Their arrival being totally unexpected, they had ample opportunity of inspecting the school under its ordinary working aspect. The room in which the classes were held was inconveniently small, and so densely crowded with children that to these ladies, unaccustomed to such an atmosphere, respiration was exceedingly difficult. A more squalid congregation of little children than were there gathered together it would have been difficult to find. Yet even among them it could easily be perceived that a considerable reformation had already taken place. Although their dresses were of the most scanty and poverty-stricken description, the faces of all were perfectly clean, showing that they were already alive to the benefit of cleanliness. In the midst of these children were the two young ladies who had so nobly devoted themselves to their instruction, the Misses Miriam and Julia Harris. They are the daughters of a highly respectable Hebrew merchant who had died a short time before. At the death of their father it was found that, although his business operations had been extensive, he was far from being a wealthy man. His children, who had hitherto been accustomed not only to comforts but to luxuries, were now found to have been very indifferently provided for. Notwithstanding their straitened circumstances the sisters resolved to dedicate a portion of the little they had, as well as the whole of their energies, to ameliorating the condition of the infant children of the poor Jews in the neighbourhood. They had for this purpose rented the small room the deputation found them in, and for some years they had continued their self-imposed labours with little encouragement and less notoriety.

Miss Goldsmid and her friend were naturally much gratified by all they saw and heard, and they readily came to the conclusion that Miss Miriam Harris was a lady admirably qualified to fill the post of head mistress to the projected infant school. Without reserve they told her the object of their visit, and inquired whether she would be disposed to accept an offer of the kind. Miss Harris needed but a moment to decide that point, for she could scarcely have received a piece of intelligence more calculated to afford her unqualified satisfaction. To be the mistress of an important institution of the kind had long been the object of her very laudable ambition, but it appeared impracticable for her to seek such a position unknown as she was. The idea had often presented itself to her mind, but she had as often put it away as an idle dream. Now, however, her highest wishes seemed on the point of being realised. Without any hesitation she informed Miss Goldsmid that she would accept the appointment with gratitude and pleasure, and she trusted her abilities would be found equal to the occasion. Miss Goldsmid, after making arrangements for an interview between Miss Harris and the committee, left the crowded little schoolroom very much pleased with her visit.

On the day appointed, Miss Miriam Harris appeared before the committee, and she was nominated governess of the experimental school, which was to be opened for one year prior to steps being taken for organising it on a larger scale. She had been strongly supported in her application by Mr. Samuels and Mr. Walter Josephs, both members of the committee, who had become acquainted with her after the visit of Miss Goldsmid and her friend to the school at Houndsditch. A more commodious school-room was now taken, and paid for by the committee, and Miss Miriam Harris-with the assistance of Miss Phœbe Barnett, then attached to the celebrated Jewish Free Schools-commenced the labour of its organisation. Such success attended the enterprise, that before the expiration of the time for the experiment the class-rooms became so crowded as to be quite uncomfortable. The number of pupils at the commencement barely exceeded a dozen, but it soon rose to ninety, and many were the applications which could not be entertained owing to want of room. The Infant Schools Committee met to consider the question of finding some more commodious place than the rooms they at present rented. To this they were stimulated by the wonderful success which had attended their experiment, and they at length determined to erect an edifice of such dimensions as should amply provide for the wants of the children of their poor co-religionists in the densely crowded neighbourhoods of Houndsditch and Spitalfields. For this purpose, a large space of ground in the centre of Commercial Street, Whitechapel, was purchased from Government by the committee, and on it were erected the celebrated Jewish Infant Schools. The building is, we believe, the largest and most commodious of any religious denomination in England. Without the slightest blame being attachable to the incumbent of Christ Church, St. George's in the East, the Rev. Mr. McGill, (than whom there is hardly to be found a more zealous minister of religion,) a most mortifying contrast might be drawn between these Jewish schools and those of that populous and poverty-stricken district. While the Jewish children have for their accommodation a magnificent building, constructed purposely for an infant school, with large lofty school-rooms, and both covered and open play-grounds, the infant school of Christ Church, St. George's, containing several hundred children, is held under two railway arches, funds not having yet been provided for their better accommodation, notwithstanding the exertions of the incumbent and his committee.

As soon as the building was completed, Miss Miriam Harris was confirmed in her post of head governess, receiving at the time the high commendations of the Venerable the Chief Rabbi, the Rev. Dr. Adler, for the wonderful reformation she had made in the manners and habits of the Jewish infant population in the neighbourhood. From that date till the present time, the reports published by the School Committee prove how great has been the success of the institution. When the Houndsditch branch was opened, prior to the erection of the present infant schools, it was intended to receive only 200 pupils. Afterwards the building was enlarged so as to admit seventy additional children. This number was rapidly filled up, and applications for admission continued to increase till the opening of the new schools in Whitechapel, when the names of several hundred were entered on the books. The number continued steadily to increase, till they now register 1300 pupils, the schools, we believe, being more numerously attended than any in the United Kingdom. Large even as they now are, these schools are found not to be sufficient for the requirements of the neighbourhood, and a branch establishment, some short distance off, is at present in process of organisation. and will, when completed, accommodate about 100 more.

Although the establishment of these schools is due to the united efforts of the Jewish philanthropists resident in London, who, both ladies and gentlemen, have been unceasing in their personal exertions, as well as profusely liberal in pecuniary donations for their support, a vast proportion of the success which has attended them must undoubtedly be attributed to Miss Miriam Harris. From the time when she commenced the little class in a small room in Houndsditch, up till the present, when the schools have reached such magnificent proportions, she has had the immediate control and management of them. In her case, as in that of Miss Johanna Chandler, we would not for one moment wish it to be understood that to her efforts alone are due all the good results which have arisen from the institution. She has, on the contrary, unceasingly received the co-operation of a philanthropic band of Jewish ladies, whose unwearied labours liave tended greatly to the increase and efficiency of the schools.

No little praise should also be given to the Venerable the Chief Rabbi, the Rev. Dr. Adler, and the gentlemen of the Committee of Management, whose operations appear to have been carried on with the benevolence and intelligence characteristic of their nation. Still Miss Miriam Harris may be considered as the leading authority in the management of the institution. From her long residence in the neighbourhood, and her exertions in behalf of the children of the Jewish poor, she is regarded with feelings of peculiar regard, and that this is no unmeaning compliment the following anecdote will show.

One day, when walking through one of the streets in the neighbourhood of Houndsditch, two young thieves, some fifteen or sixteen years of age, attempted to steal her watch. They had hustled round her, and one had already got it in his possession, when he was greatly surprised by his "pal" striking him violently on the head, and snatching the watch from him, which he immediately returned to the owner, saying at the time to his astonished companion, who seemed strongly to demur to the arrangement, "You fool: don't you see it's Miss Harris?" The lady, who had now begun to recover from her confusion, instead of thanking the boy for his behaviour, took him by the arm and inquired sternly whether he was a Jew.

"Yes, I am, ma'am," was the reply.

"And you are a thief too, I see," she said. "Are you not ashamed of yourself?"

"What can I do, ma'am?" said the boy. "I can't get work."

"Why don't you go to school, then?" inquired Miss Harris.

"Because no school will take me in, ma'am."

"Both your answers are untrue," said Miss Harris. "You can get work, and you can go to school. Now, remember I don't thank you for having returned my watch to me, nor do I forgive you for the part you took in stealing it. If you choose to be respectable, I will assist you in becoming so; if, on the contrary, you intend to continue your disreputable life, I will prosecute you. I can easily find you out, and you know it. Now, take your own way. If you are willing to reform, call on me to-morrow morning, and I will aid you as far as I can; if you do not come, I will put the affair in the hands of the police." So saying, she left the boy and the disreputable crowd which had gathered round her greatly astonished at her proceeding. The next morning the boy called, and she lectured him soundly upon the wickedness of his course of life. Finding that he had neither father nor mother, and that he had fallen into bad company, she requested some of the gentlemen connected with the schools to assist her in reclaiming the lad. They readily promised their aid, and the result was that, after the boy had received some education in England, they paid his passage to Australia, where he is now a thriving and respectable tradesmau.

To any person interested in the well-being of young children, we cannot imagine a greater treat than to pay a visit to these schools. We are unable to state what is the usual formality necessary for gaining admission, but, judging from the extreme facility we experienced on our personal application, and the perfect courtesy and patience with which every detail was explained to us, we should imagine the reader would find little difficulty in the matter. A more extraordinary sight than the 1200 or 1300 little children congregated in these schools, and arranged in their different classes according to their ages, it would be almost impossible to imagine. Their instruction, with the exception of Hebrew, of which they are taught the rudiments, or at any rate sufficient to enable them to offer up some prayers in that language, appears to be very much the same as is generally given in our best Christian schools. The task of disciplining such a host of little creatures, whose ideas are naturally of the most republican description, must of course be a very troublesome one, but perfect success attends the efforts of the governesses of the different classes; while Miss Miriam Harris, as superintendent of the whole, from time to time walks through the different divisions, praising those worthy of commendation, and blaming others who may require it. The children are admitted into the school as early as two years of age, and leave it when they are six, unless in the case of cripples, when they are allowed to remain for two or three years longer.

A most praiseworthy feature in the management of these schools may be noticed: it is the general air of personal cleanliness which marks the children, notwithstanding the indifferent quality of their attire; and this result, it should be understood, is far more difficult to attain thau in our Christian schools. As we have before stated, the synagogues in Spain and Portugal, Germany, Holland, and Poland—the latter three especially—are in the habit of sending their poor over to England to be maintained by their more charitable co-religionists here. All the care their own countrymen on the Continent seem to bestow on them is to pay a trifling sum for their deek passage on board the Dutch or Hamburg steamers; and perhaps less thought is taken for their comfort on the voyage, or their fate on arriving in a strange country, than is bestowed upon the herds of cattle which are generally their fellowpassengers. The first care of the philanthropic English Jews on the arrival of these immigrants is to seek out the younger children, and by their being placed in the schools and under the care of Miss Miriam Harris and her assistants, they are saved from the squalor, disease, or death, which would be their lot if they remained under the immediate charge of their parents. The labour and difficulty experienced in teaching the fathers and mothers of these children the value of cleanliness is almost incredible. Although the code of Moses as well as their traditionary laws are exceedingly strict of the German and Dutch Jews are extraordinarily dirty in their persons and domestic arrangements, and a filthier specimen of humanity than a low Polish Jew could hardly be found. An excellent plan is adopted for the reformation of these foreigners by the London Jews. The latter, when dispensing their charity, refuse to assist any Jewish parents who cannot prove that they send their younger children to school, while Miss Miriam Harris and the School Committee on their part refuse to admit them unless they are in a cleanly condition. The low foreign Jewish parents usually grumble very much at this, in their opinion, utterly unnecessary requirement; but, as they as well as their children are totally dependent on the charity of the benevolent, they have no alternative but to obey, and in a short time the foreign children are sent to the schools in as clean and tidy a condition as their English fellow-pupils. As a further inducement for the children to attend regularly, a dinner is provided twice a week in the school-rooms for those whose parents are in great poverty. About 500 generally accept the invitation. Although these dinuers are of the simplest possible description, yet, judging from the energy shown in partaking of them, they are highly appreciated by the little guests. The dinuers, with the exception of those on feast-days, always consist of one dish, the receipt for which is as follows :- "To one sack and a half of potatoes add sixty pounds of rice; mix together, and when thoroughly cooked add fat to your taste." The reader might imagine from the quantity that this would be what is vulgarly called a cut-aud-come-again dish; but this is far from being the fact. After a quarter of an hour's attack by five hundred little Jews on this huge mass, not a particle of potato, not a grain of rice, nor as much fat as would leave the least stain on a silk dress, is to be found remaining. But if this feat should appear at all astonishing, it is nothing to what these children can accomplish on one of their feast days, when they have pudding and other delicacies allowed them. Then platefuls of food which would probably give a Life Guardsman au attack of indigestion, are carried off by little toddling creatures whose "stowage" capabilities, from outward appearance, would hardly have been considered equal to a fourth part of the burdens they have taken upon them-passengers. The first care of the philanthropic English Jews on the arrival of these immigrants is to seek out the younger children, and by their being placed in the schools and under the care of Miss Miriam Harris and her assistants, they are saved from the squalor, disease, or death, which would be their lot if they remained under the immediate charge of their parents. The labour and difficulty experienced in teaching the fathers and mothers of these children the value of cleanliness is almost incredible. Although the code of Moses as well as their traditionary laws are exceedingly strict as to the observance of cleanliness, yet the poorer ing the consolations which were being offered her by a group of her fellow-pupils and several ladies who were present. On inquiring the cause of her sorrow, we were informed that she had lost her crinoline!

Nor is feasting the only pleasure offered to the children. Games of every description are carried on unremittingly; toys of every variety are given to them, and the evening generally concludes with an exhibition of the magic lantern. An excellent plan has been adopted by Miss Harris for the purpose of inculcating on her little pupils habits of economy and thrift. A number of tiny money-boxes are kept, each being appropriated to a particular depositor, and into these the half-pence and farthings he may receive are placed. A little book is also kept in which the amount of the separate deposits are entered. When the total of any depositor's account amounts to any considerable sum, say for example one shilling, the box is solemnly opened in presence of the parents of the child, and after the amount has been verified as corresponding with that in the banker's book, it is spent at the direction of the little depositor, in a pair of shoes, a cap, or some other article of attire. From his having economised the money for its purchase himself, the article remains, till it is worn out, the most esteemed portion of his very modest wardrobe.

Besides the Infant School a Sabbath School is also held in the building, which is under the immediate superintendence of Miss Miriam Harris, although the instructions given are specially directed by the Rev. Hermann Adler, assisted by a numerous staff of Jewish ladies and gentlemen of high social standing who take great interest in the work. This class generally numbers at least five hundred. There is also a Sunday School conducted on the premises for the tuition of Jewish girls who are employed in shops during the week, and whose education is defective. This class is also very numerously attended.

But the good deeds of Miss Miriam Harris are not confined solely to the walls of the Jewish Infant School. Several other philanthropic institutions in the neighbourhood are also considerably indebted to her for their origin and success, such for example as the Jewish Model Lodging Houses in Commercial Street, and the Jewish Bible Women. Without ignoring the very valuable services and extraordinary energy and liberality of the wealthy Jews for the reformation of their poorer and more debased coreligionists in the eastern portion of the metropolis, we intend no discourtesy to them when we say there is not one among them who has been more unceasing in his efforts in the cause, or who has laboured with more integrity of purpose, or whose name is entitled to higher respect, than Miriam

HARVEST.

WORKING away at the harvest, reaping the ripening grain,
Laying it down in ridges like the men of an army slain;
Foremost in toil is the reaper with the sweat on his bronzed brow—
God bless the hand of the reaper, and send him vigour enow!

Binding the sheaves into bundles, bending so meekly and low, Come the patient orderly women, chattering on as they go; Following after the reapers come their mothers, sisters, and wives— God bless the orderly binders, who bind the staff of our lives!

After are coming the young men, lusty in sinew and limb,
Throwing the sheaves on the waggons, and building the loads so trim;
On the ricks are binding the old men, sage and practised of cye—
God bless the pitchers and rickers who are storing His treasures by.

Come the little prattling children when the field is carried and clear, Gathering up the fragments, and storing them ear by ear—So each one joins in providing against winter's tempest and frost, And the small birds gather the fragments that nothing of God's be lost.

ARKITE CEREMONIES IN THE HIMALAYS.

The following description of Arkite ceremonies in the Himalays may prove interesting to the readers of Good Words, on account of their great resemblance to the religious ceremonies of the Jews. It will be the purpose of the writer to describe them minutely, rather than to explain why such strange coincidences should exist. Among many theories about the lost ten tribes which have been suggested, their existence in the north of India has been asserted and believed in; but this point will form no part of our subject. Instead of assuming a theory to explain facts, the facts will be carefully and truly given, and these may be found useful in the ultimate discovery of the truth.

So far as I know, these ceremonies have never been described; at any rate they are so little known, that it may be said they are quite new to the public.

It may be noticed that the Arkite ceremonics were common all over the ancient world. The Egyptians carried arks about in the worship of Isis and Osiris. According to Rawlinson, the Assyrians had a goddess whose name was Sin, or Hurki, also called the "Great Lady," and an ark was used in the celebration of her rites. The step from Assyria and Persia through Cabool to the Indus is but a short one: and although the worship on the plains of India is now different from that of the Himalays, yet we have in the mythology of the Hindoos those ideas which seem to be common to all religious systems, and which suggest themselves as the foundation of those Arkite rites.

The primary idea is that of the Deity floating or moving on the face of the waters. The Divinity sits upon a seat or throne, and this throne, from being on the waters, becomes a boat, or ark.

New there is no feature of the Hindoo mythology which is so clearly evident as this primary conception of the Deity. One of the most striking instances is that of Vishnu as Narayana. In this the serpent Sesha is twisted into innumerable folds. forming the couch which floats on the waters, and the seven heads are inflated out to produce the canopy under which Vishnu reposes. This forms one of the sculptures in the caves of Ellora. The Hindoo system, like all the old systems, represents the creation of the world as being accomplished by a power deputed to do so by the Supreme Deity. This power, or deputy, is also represented as being on the waters. From Vishnu springs the stem of a lotus; the lotus itself is floating on the ocean, and it forms the seat upon which Brahma sits in the act of creating the world. This very peculiar character is not confined to these two representatives of the Hindoo mythology. "Arghanatha is a name of Siva, the Hindoo deity especially connected with the ceremonies in which Argha and Patra are used, and to whom indeed the name of Arghanatha, or

'lord of the boat-shaped vessel,' is especially applicable.''*

There is not a more beautiful object in the East than the large expanded flower of the lotus, with its flat round leaves floating on the surface of the water. It was enthroned on this flower that Brahma created the world. And the "Lotus Throne" of Buddha tells by its title that he who sits upon it is upon the waters. The lotus is never wanting on the throne of Buddha. On the rudest carvings of this figure will be found some indications of the petals of the flower; the petals are always represented along the whole length of the upper portion of the seat; so it is upon the lotus that he actually sits.

From this it will be seen that the supreme gods of Brahminism and Buddhism are represented under this primary idea of floating on the waters.

The story of Menu is now so clearly identified with that of Noah, that it ought to be noticed here, as relating to this subject, more particularly as the account of Menu's boat is intimately associated with the Himalays, where the ceremonics about to be described took place. Brahma appeared to Menu in the form of a fish, and told him

When the awful time approaches—hear from me what thou must do.

In a little time, O blessed!—all this firm and seated earth,

All that moves upon its surface—shall a deluge sweep away.

Near it comes, of all creation the ablution day is near; Therefore what I now forewarn thee, may thy highest weal secure.

All the fixed and all the moving—all that stirs, or stirreth not,

Lo, of all the time approaches—the tremendous time of doom.

Build thyself a ship, O Manu—strong, with cables well prepared,

And thyself, with the seven Sages, mighty Manu, enter in.

All the living seeds of things, by the Brahmins named of yore,

Place thou first within the vessel-well secured, divided well.

Menu, or Manu, did as ordered, and when the deluge came, the fish appeared, and the cable was used to bind the ship to a horn which the fish had on his head. By means of this divine aid—for the fish was Brahma himself—the vessel was guided to its place of rest.

None was seen but those seven Sages, Manu only, and the fish.

Years on years, and still unwearied drew that fish the bark along,

Till at length it came where lifted Himavan its loftiest peak.

There at length it came, and, smiling, thus the fish addressed the Sage;

* Moor's Oriental Fragments, p. 277.

"To the peak of Himalaya bind thou now thy stately ship."

At the fish's mandate quickly to the peak of Himavan Bound the Sage his bark, and ever to this day that loftiest peak, Bears the name of Naubandhana from the binding of the bark.*

The resemblance of all this to the Jewish system scarce needs to be pointed out. At the creation, "the Spirit of God moved upon the surface of the waters." At the deluge the same Spirit was there upon the waters, guiding the bark to the accomplishment of its purpose. The ark was the great type of the Church, and it is the doctrine of all Christendom to this day, that Jehovah is the Head of the Church-that He presides, or sits, in that Church, which is symbolled as an ark, or boat: "The Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth king for ever." (Ps. xxix. 10.) This cannot be the description of a mere thunderstorm, such as some commentators have explained it to mean, which deluged the country, and was "peculiar to the Phœnician coast." It is a flood over which "The Lord sitteth king for ever." And it was to symbolise this same idea that His throne in the tabernacle was an ark, or boat.

The boat of Menu was called nau; this was in the extreme East. With the Greeks a boat was vaus, and a temple vaos. This was midway between East and West; and here in the West the body of the church is the nave. If philologists will admit any connection between these words, they would go a great way to show how wide-spread, and at the same time how ancient, is this association of ideas about a church, or temple, and a boat; that it is the means, or the type of the means, by which the Divine purpose is carried out. And it is in the universality of this idea that we get the explanation of those Arkite ceremonies which were so prevalent everywhere in bygone times. And there is little doubt but the Aryan race—or by whatever name the early settlers are called-had those ideas, and that they took them across the Indus. The Hindeo mythology to the present day retains these ideas, and it is accepted by all that they did not originate in India. This tends to show a common origin in these Arkite rites.

There are rites still performed in the plains which seem to have had their origin in these Arkite ideas, but they are very different from the ceremonies of the Himalays. It is probable, however, that at a former time these ceremonies were not confined to the hills. On the sculptures of the Bilsah Tope, in Central India, Colonel Cunninghame found the representation of a ceremony which he identified with those practised in the Himalays at the present day. These sculptures are about two thousand years old, and would indicate that the ceremonies of these plains might be similar to those of the hills at that early date. Perhaps conquest and revolution may have

The locality where the ceremonies took place was in a village called Cheenee, about sixteen marches east from Simla. This village is upon the right bank of the Sutlej, and to the east of the first snowy range. A very few marches further east bring the traveller into the region of Tartars and of Llamas, and the rainless country of Thibet. The scencry of Cheenee is about the finest in the Himalays. The village stands some thousands of feet above the Sutlej-the river having through long ages cut its way into a deep gorge. On the face of a perpendicular cliff, more than a hundred feet above the present level of the stream, are to be seen water-worn rocks, showing that it was at one time the bed of the river. The sides of the valley sloping up to the village are plentifully covered with woods-the apricot, the walnut, the oak and various pines. Amongst the latter are what the natives call the Neozo, or the Pinus Gerardiana, the Khutrow, or Pinus excelsa, and the Keeloo, or Cedarus deodarus, the monarch tree of the Himalays, which, king-like, towers above all the others, growing to the height of 150 and 200 feet. Amidst these woods, wherever the absence of rocks will permit of cultivation, there are villages, and the fields are raised on terraces such as are seen in Palestine at the present day. Different kinds of grain are produced, and the locality from its dryness can grow the vine, the cultivation of which is considerable. On the other side of the river a most striking contrast is presented. It is the great Himalayan range of perpetual snow. A series of splendid peaks, of dazzling brightness, stand high up in the blue of heaven. Their altitude has been determined, and the highest are given at 18,068 feet, 19,990 feet, and one reaches the height of 21,103 feet, being upwards of 6000 feet higher than Mont Blanc. This high range is called the "Kailas," and according to etymologists this word is the same as the Latin Cœlus. Kailas is the heaven of Maha Deo, or Siva, and according to the Hindoo mythology this heaven is in the Himalays. When they are asked at what parti-produced the change that now appears. The Hindoes crossed the Indus, and spread over the plains. Alexander came by the same route of conquest, and was followed at a later date by the Mahomedans. The religion of Buddha spread over the whole of India about the fifth century before Christ, and was the predominating faith of that country for somewhere about a thousand years, when Brahminism overpowered it and took its place. During these changes the more primitive ceremonies may have been left intact in the hills, just as remnants of Druidism were left in the mountains of Wales and the highlands of Scotland to a very late periodlike causes producing like results. For example, the "Deisul," or going by the course of the sun, some time since described by the editor of Good Words as being still practised in a highland parish, is also observed in the mountains of the Himalays at the present time.

cular point of the Himalays this celestial locality may be found, they can give no answer. All that they can say is that it is somewhere in the hills, and that it is very high up in the inaccessible peaks. In fact, the word Kailas is now used to express the character of any high elevation, which is beyond the power of man to reach. On some such peak, on a throne of gems, sits Siva and his mountain-born consort, Parbuttie, at least such is the faith of the Hindoo; but when the Alpine Club shall extend their adventurous operations to the various summits of this mighty range, it will be curious to watch his confiding trust in the traditions of his religion. The peak Naubandhana, already mentioned as the spot where Menu bound his bark, is, like the Kailas of Siva, only spoken of as somewhere in the inaccessible regions of the snowy Himalays. The word Kailas is not the only name connected with these mountains as associated with heaven, for the word Himalay itself is recognised by the Germans as being the same as their own word Himmel, or heaven. All these factsand many more could be given-have a most important bearing on the ceremonies about to be described, and are of the highest importance to the biblical student. For here is a locality with a heavenly mountain, on which there is a throne of the Deity, and where an ark, which saved the world-the type of the Church-with eight holy persons rested. Be it remembered that one of the many traditions connected with Jerusalem, affirms that the ark of Noah rested there. All this shows that there is an identity of ideas as well as an identity of visible ceremonies.

The villages of these mountains are generally small, with short distances between each; whereever there is a spot allowing of a little cultivation a village has resulted. In the centre of each there is a house which is conspicuous for its size and ornamentation. This is the temple, and is usually called the Devi-ke-makahn, or house of Devi.

Idol at Karsali, near Jumnootree.

"Devi," or "Davi," is one of the many names of Parbuttie, the mountain-born bride of Siya. She is the principal deity of the hill people, and the very peculiar idol, or ark, which is kept in these temples, is chiefly identified with her. As they will not allow a stranger to touch this symbol of their faith, and as it is always closely veiled, it is difficult to tell what it contained. Externally they differed a good deal in appearance. One which I saw at Karsali, near Jumnootree, seemed like a square object on two staves, by which it was carried on men's shoulders, and around there were bound pieces of bright-coloured cloth, which covered not only the central portion, but extended along the greater part of the staves. Another of these idols, which I saw in the district of Gurhwal, was surmounted by a silver vase, having on its top a small umbrella of the same metal. A large ornamented cloth was used as a pall to cover nearly the whole length of the staves. Some chowries (wild yaks' tails) hing down the sides: these and the umbrella are royal insignia, and are often represented on pictures and sculptures of their various deitics. Those idols in the villages about Cheence seemed more elaborate in their construction. There was a circle of faces, seemingly of gold or silver, and nearly life-size, so arranged that there was a face looking in every direction. There might be about eight of these heads, and they were surmounted by a bunch of chowries, dyed of a dull deep red colour. They were about the size of the plumes upon a hearse, and waved about in a similar manner. The whole was placed upon a square frame-work, into which the two staves fitted for earrying it about, and from the circle of heads downwards it was closely enveloped with pieces of silk cloth striped with bright colours. Lower down among the folds there was generally another head, formed of silver, and larger than those above.

As I lived in the village of Cheenee for a couple of months, I had good opportunity of getting acquainted with the people, and seeing many of their habits and customs. They invited me to all their festivals, and were very pleased that I took an interest in them. I will now endeavour to describe how they treated this idol, their ideas respecting it, and the ceremonies that took place; and in this I shall try to be as faithfully minute as I can.

In the largest, the best, and most ornamented house in the village, the deity was kept, which they treated as a living being. I asked an old man one day what it was, pointing to the idol, and his answer was, "Ah, sahib, humara Khuda* hai;" which is, "Ah, sir, it is my God." Every day it was attended upon. I saw regularly every morning one of the villagers come to the well for water, which he carried in one of the vessels of the temple; he also plucked a handful of mint, which here grew plentifully. This I believe he dipped into the water, and washed the faces of the Khuda, and then made offerings, one of which was fire. For this operation they had a peculiarly formed instrument in every temple. Sometimes they would take the idol out to give it an airing, carrying it along the roads or through the woods, two men always bearing it by the staves upon their shoulders, and all the chief men of the village in close attendance. Some long trumpets, kettle drums, and cymbals were kept in the temple, and these were always in requisition, making as much noise as possible.

One morning we found the whole village astir, and on inquiring the cause, we were told it was to be a burra din, or "great day," which is the idiomatic way of expressing a pooja, or religious festival. The indications of the approaching holiday were very marked for that part of the world. For be it remembered that it is a hill country and a cold climate, two causes all the world over which stand in the way of cleanliness, and indeed the dirt of these people was something not to be described. It did seem remarkable to see the whole village out washing themselves and their clothes, showing that the proverbial alliance between cleanliness and godliness held true even in this very distant region. I asked one man, when he had washed himself before, and in the most straightforward manner he said, "Six months ago," "When will you wash again?" His answer to this indicated the same distant date, and his skin and dress stood before me as convincing witnesses to the truth of his words. In the front of all these hill temples there is a level space, roughly paved with flat stones, and in the middle of this space there is an open shed, called a dharamsala. It is used as a place of rest for travellers and pilgrims who chance to stay a night at the village, and on festivals the idol is placed there to rest at intervals during the ceremony. In the afternoon the whole village was out, and the people were all dressed in their best, looking clean and happy. They had the Khuda out, and here for the first time, I saw dancing as an act of worship. I knew that there were dancing girls in the temples of India," who danced for the deity; and every one knows that the Dervishes dance as a religious act. The Pyrrhic dance was also religious. The sculptures on the Greek temples represent men and women dancing at the ceremonies. I knew dancing had a religious signification all over the world; but I had never seen it as such before, and was now very much struck by it; perhaps the locality and circumstances helped to produce the strong impression. None of the examples of dancing mentioned above came into my mind; it bore no resemblance to any of them. There was only one instance which I could think of. David dancing before the Ark was being acted before me. The description of the one would pass for that of the other. In front of the rude temple, on what might be a "threshingfloor" (for in a hill country, if you make level an enclosure for a temple, or a threshing-floor, the one must have a resemblance to the other; and in the Himalays, where both are very rudely done, they cease to have any difference between them), such as might have been that of Nachon, or of Araunah the Jebusite, there was being carried what I, as a Gentile to them, dared not touch, a most sacred symbol of their religion, which they treated as a king or a god. And the men of the place played on all manner of instruments, on trumpets, and on drums, and on cymbals, while the crowd danced and sung before it. In 2 Sam. vi. 19, we read that David "dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh." On the present occasion nothing of this kind took place; but at another festival which will be described, this part also of the ceremony was observed; and, euriously enough, I was struck by the fact that the women were served before the men, which is not according to the usual practice of the East. Wine I did not see used. The dance was a very pretty one. About a dozen men twisted their arms in a peculiar fashion, so as to link themselves together into a chain; the women did the same, and continued the chain, the whole forming a semi-circle which occupied one side of the space, while the Khuda and its attendants and musicians took up the other. It went slowly round the enclosure, trumpets, drums, and cymbals playing, and the dance consisted in going round after them; but the peculiar feature of the dance was a movement backwards and forwards to and from the Khuda, making each time an obcisance to it. bowing of the head and body was done by the end man, who waved a chowrie in the air with the disengaged arm; in this he was followed by the next, and the movement went along the whole length of the dancers; the appearance was exactly that of a wave as its crest gracefully curls over on the beach. I never saw a more beautiful picture, or a more primitive subject for one. The girls were very pretty, and their beauty on this occasion was not eclipsed by the usual veil of dirt. Their costume is simple and very handsome, it is also as primitive as their customs; it is formed of one piece of cloth, and it amply covers the whole person except the right arm, which is generally bare. It is put on very much in the same way as the old highlander used to form his plaid and kilt from the one piece of cloth. The hill women, in this instance, wear the skirt portion down to their feet; a large Celticlooking brooch* on the left breast is used to hold it all together. They had all flowers in their hats and hair. They sung a slow quaint tune, which was the only music I liked that I heard in the hills. I could not make out the meaning of the words, except the first two, they were Goli gohano, which, if I mistake not, express the going round in a circle.+ The dancing and singing went on with but slight intervals for the rest of the day; they had other words and other tunes, but the dance had little change in it; it always came and went just like the ebb and flow of a wave, for I can give no better likeness of it, making as it were a salaam, bowing in reverence, singing all the while to what they believed was the Deity. Evidently they enjoyed it. If one left this circle, another at once took the place. It was no exclusive priesthood, with hired performers going through an elaborate ceremonial. It was the people of the village. "David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord." (2 Sam. vi. 5.) Here every house sent forth its inmates, old and young, and they all assisted at what was to them the worship of God. In their happiness they evidently realised the twofold meaning of the word holiday. I sat beside them till a rosy sunset burned on the snowy peaks across the Sutlej, and when the darkness fell a fire was kindled for light. Later in the evening I went down to see them under this new aspect, and the wave was still singing as it came and went. Even after I went to bed, the last sound that I can recall was the same quaint melody which they had already sung so often.

The villagers announced to me that there would soon be another festival, which they called the Croat-ke-pooja, or "Walnut Festival." It was to be held, not at Cheenee, but at a village called Coatee, about two miles away. I had visited this village before, and seen its temple, which had some very finely carved wooden pillars. My companion, who was devoted to hunting pursuits of every kind, had been complaining that there was no fishing to be had in this locality. The snow-melted waters of the Sutlej and other streams were too cold for such sports. While wandering about the village he found a tank filled with fine large fish. The delight was great, -his at the prospect of good fishing, and mine at the idea of an agreeable change from our monotonous dinner fare. That evening was spent in getting the fishing-tackle in order, and the next day I went down to watch my friend's success. The line was scarcely into the water before a large fellow was caught and sprawling on the ground. A second was already hooked, when a commotion became manifest in the village. There approached some of the elders, followed by a crowd, all very much excited, imploring us in the most earnest and piteous manner not to touch the fish, for they belonged to Devi, the divinity of the temple. This at once stopped my friend's sport, and our dinner was again the usual mutton.

There are sacred fish all over India. They have there some religions signification, as they had in Assyria, where Dagon the fish-god was one of the chief divinities. As already stated, it was under the form of a fish that Brahma appeared to Menu, when he told him to build a boat, and during the deluge the same fish appeared and guided the vessel to the Himalays. So these fish may have derived their sacred character from this connection of Brahma and the ark of Menu; and if so they have a bearing upon the Arkite ceremonies which are still to be found in that region.

It was a few days after this adventure that we went down to see the Croat-ke-pooja. We found that it was not to be at the village itself, but at a temple close at hand in the woods. This sylvan temple stood all alone. There was the "threshing. floor"-like platform raised up and roughly paved, with two dharamsalas upon it. There were some very fine deodars growing in the vicinity. I had before noticed the fact that very fine specimens of these trees were near to some of the temples, and on making inquiry, was told that they were sacred in their character, and were never cut down except for building or repairing the temples. The cedar of Lebanon (Cedrus Libanus) is almost the same tree as the deodar (Cedrus deodarus). Botánically, they are two species of the same genera, and as the former is still looked upon as having a sacred character, because used in the construction of Solomon's temple, we get a curious bit of analogy, which may perhaps be accidental, but seeing it is associated with so many other Jewish customs, it is at least worthy of being noticed.

When we reached the temple, the ceremony had not commenced. A few of the villagers were there busy making ready the cakes; a large pot of oil was on the fire, and a man sat beside it, who, when the cakes were pressed into the desired shape, dipped them into the boiling oil, and a very few minutes were enough to cook them. They came out of the oil baked and buttered. The people began to gather, and I found that they came from all the villages about-my friends from Cheenee among the rest. I had seen no ablutions for this pooja. It was not above a couple of weeks since that process had been gone through, and it was not according to their notions that such an operation could possibly be required so soon again. girls, as usual, had all got flowers about their heads, and, seated on the ground in groups, had evidently a great deal to talk about. What the topics of conversation were, it would be difficult to say, for there can be no such thing as "news" in such a place. It could not be the change of fashion, for that is unknown in the East. Nothing changes in a valley like this; the ceremonies I am describing are a proof of it. Still, that they had something to interest them was evident enough, for there was a great deal of tittering, which often broke out into hearty laughter. There was one dark-skinned beauty who seemed to absorb all the talk to herself wherever she went. She was evidently a gossip, and a bit of a wag as well, for she was always laughing herself and moving to merriment the company around.

At last the sound of the trumpets and drums was heard in the direction of Coatee, and soon after, the procession appeared winding its way through the woods. The Khuda, or idol, was almost identical with that of Cheenee. It was carried upon staves by two men, and there was the usual music and dancing around it. On reaching the paved platform at the temple, the Khuda was placed in one of the dharamsalas. On this occasion, an old man appeared in a red dress, such as the Llamas of Thibet wear, and he, along with a boy, seemed to perform the principal part of the ceremony. As I saw this old man in the usual dress of the place after the pooja was over, I concluded it had been put on to officiate with. He was very old, and although not more Jewish than others I have seen in various parts of the East, yet had I been in want of a model to sit for painting any of the Jewish patriarchs, I could not have wished for a better. I sketched his portrait—greatly to his delight—a front view, and it was very strongly marked; in this position the large hooked nose projects so far down as to cover the upper lip. He told me his name was "Diloo,"

First of all, he washed the faces of the Khuda with mint leaves and water, then he offered incense, with bread, fruit, and flowers. A number of young kids were brought forward. They were playful little animals, some black, and some white. Diloo sprinkled them with water. This was in front, and distant perhaps about six feet from where the Khuda was placed under the shed. A large flat brazen dish was put on the ground, and one of the villagers stood ready with a hatchet. It was ornamented, and I conclude was one of the sacred instruments of the service, for I had noticed them in other temples. With one blow the head of a kid was knocked off; then the boy who assisted Diloo lifted the head up, and advancing forward to the Khuda, presented it with a low muttering of words. He put his finger into the blood, and then by a jerk flicked it upon the idol. The blood was thus "sprinkled." After doing this once or twice, he dipped his forefinger into the blood, and touched the Khuda with it. The head was then deposited among the other offerings. The body of the kid had been so placed that all the blood ran into the brazen vessel; and when two or three of the animals had been sacrificed and the dish was full, one of the men lifted it up, and first presenting it to the Khuda, turned round, and giving a great swing of his body, emptied the vessel upon the wall of the temple. As they killed the rest, the same ceremony was gone through, and at least three times was the large basin of blood dashed against the wall. The temple seemed to have been whitewashed, and as this is unusual in the hills, I supposed that it was done to cover up the effects of the old ceremony, and present a clear surface for the new.

It was after this that they went through the performance that gave the name to this pooja. A baleony went round a sort of upper chamber in the temple, and here Diloo appeared, followed by about half-a-dozen of the younger men. The moment they presented themselves, they were assailed with volleys of pine-cones and waluuts, which, though green, were fully formed. After making the circuit of the balcony, the young meu gathered up the missiles, and returned them against their assailants, who managed to screen themselves from the more numerous party below by means of the rough boards in front of the balcony. The fight went on in this manner for about half-an-hour, when Diloo and his young friends came down and mixed among the crowd as before.

What was the purpose or meaning of this part of the ceremony I could not find out. No one was hurt on this occasion; but they told me that accidents did sometimes occur, and that deaths had even resulted from injuries received at these fights. The pine-cone, I remind the reader, had a religious signification in Assyria. In the Nineveh sculptures, the priests and eagle-headed divinities hold them in their hands as if presenting them at the altar. The pine-cone is the chief ornament on the Cashmere shawls, and is indeed a favourite form of ornament all over India. The royal jewel which a rajah wears on his head is generally of this pattern. The walnut may perhaps have an allied signification. I did not notice if it or the pine-cone was presented among the offerings to the Khuda, but in travelling in the hills walnuts are the usual offering presented by the head man of the village, when, according to custom, he comes to make his salaam.

While the contest had been going on, the slaughtered kids were being cooked for a feast. The people having seated themselves all round upon the space before the Khuda, the cakes and flesh were dealt out to them and eaten. It was here that I noticed that the women were served before the men. And here let me refer again to the words descriptive of the ccremony when David brought up the ark. "And they brought in the ark of the Lord, and set it in his place, in the midst of the tabernacle that David had pitched for it: and David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before the Lord. And as soon as David had made an end of offering burnt offcrings and peace offcrings, he blessed the people in the name of the Lord of hosts. And he dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh." In Exodus xxix. 31, 32, we read, "Thou shalt take the ram of the consecration, and seethe his flesh in the holy place. And Aaron and his sons shall eat the flesh of the ram, and the bread that is in the basket, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation." It is added, "a stranger shall not eat thereof." Whether these villagers would have allowed any strangers to share in the feast, had they wished to do so, I cannot say. We, of course, made no such request, and they made no offer that we should join I have not referred to the passages in the Bible about the "sprinkling," and other Jewish sacrifices, in which blood assumes such an important signification. The wonderful resemblance is too striking to require detailed remark.

At the close of the feast the Khuda was lifted up of bolbing up and down on both sides, and then to be carried back to its temple in the village. But the Cheenee Khuda made way to give the place of the hearers had not gone far, when there arose some cause of great excitement. I saw the red plumes bobbing up and down with considerable agitation, and surrounded by a crowd of the principal men. On asking the meaning of the uproar, I was told that the Khuda bolta hai, i.e., "the God speaks." How it expressed itself I could not discover. There seemed to be some doubt as to whether it wanted to go back to Coatee direct, or go off on a visit to the village of Cheenee, and they were endeavouring to find out its desires on this matter. After a good deal of excitement, and much bobbing of the red yaks' tails, the decision of the Khuda was declared, and a shout from the Cheenee wallahs announced that theirs was the village to be honoured.

They at once started; the trumpets brayed forth, the singing and dancing began. However, the dancing this time was not the slow-measured salaam of the first pooja already described, but was performed with all their might, in wild excitement, particularly by the Cheenee folks. Thus the procession moved on, with all the people following it, through the woods. Whoever has read the Endymion of Keats may remember that he begins the story by the description of a procession of the simple shepherd population of Latmos with an old priest, to sacrifice among the woods.

"Upon the sides of Latmos was outspread A mighty forest."

The wonderful feeling of primitive simplicity which the poet has given of these people was vividly recalled to my memory by what I here witnessed on the Himalays. The ceremonies were not altogether alike, but the out-of-the-world sort of feeling was the same. Scarcely one of these people had ever been a dozen miles from their own village. It was almost impossible for a single idea from the outer world to reach them. They had just been practising the most ancient rites of worship, which must have remained shut up and unaltered in that wild valley for ages.

With shouts of delight they were dancing through what seemed a primitive forest with giant pines, whose tops were lost sight of in the shaggy woods above. Vast fragments of rock lay about in such quantities as to suggest that it had been the battle-field of the Titans. At times, through openings in the woods, we could see in the deep blue sky the Kailas peaks shining in spotless white. The scene seemed a remnant of primeval times, and the ceremonies were of the oldest. The one was in keeping with the other.

Some of the men belonging to Cheenee had gone on before, and were at the outside of the village with the Cheenee Khuda, attended by its trumpets, drums, &c., to receive its guest with that state which is due from one royal power to another. When the two Khudas met, there was a great deal of bolbing up and down on both sides, and then the Cheenee Khuda made way to give the place of honour to the guest, who entered the village in advance. After some few ceremonics on reaching the temple, they were both housed together for the night. Next morning, when the Coatee Khuda left to return to its own village, the Cheenee idol accompanied it to the outskirts again, and bade adieu to its guest by the bobbing which marked its reception.

TWO GLASGOW STORIES.*

BY THE EDITOR.

I,-JAMES ANDERSON.

About ninety years ago the 21st, or North British Fusiliers, were engaged in the American war, and fighting at Ticonderoga—the dilapidated remains of which old fort will be remembered by every traveller who has visited the romantic scenery which connects Lakes George and Champlain. The Fusiliers were then commanded by Colonel Inglis Hamilton, formerly of the Scots Greys, who inherited from a long line of ancestors the property of Murdestoun, in the vicinity of Glasgow.

William Anderson, a Glasgow man of excellent character, was a private in the 21st, and rose to the rank of sergeant-major. He had born to him in America two sons, James and John, and two daughters. Having been wounded, he was discharged with a pension, and with his family settled in the Gallowgate of Glasgow, occupying a house situated opposite to the then best hotel in the city, "The Saracen's Head "-at which, by the way, Dr. Johnson "put up" when he visited the city on his western tour. Colonel Hamilton, having attained the rank of major-general, left the service, and with an old sister resided at his estate of Murdestoun. He was a man of the highest character, which was fully shared by his sister, who had once been a beauty, but from a heart disappointment in early life, (the premature death of her lover,) had retired from the gay and busy world, and devoted herself to her brother. The General was, moreover, a man of fortune, his annual income from his estate amounting to about 5000l., besides his vested capital.

One day the General, in driving up to the Saracen's Head, saw to his surprise Sergeant-major Anderson playing with his children on the opposite side of the street; and no less to the surprise and delight of the old Sergeant, he saw his General, and felt the grasp of his affectionate hand. The children remembered the General, who, delighted with the appearance of James, seized him in his arms and tossed him in the air, which so charmed the boy that he exclaimed, "Do it again, General; please give me another toss over your head." From that day the General's heart was knit to "Jamie" Anderson. He showed the greatest kindness to all the family, educating the boys in the grammar school, and afterwards at the University; while the girls received the best teaching which the boarding schools of Glasgow could then afford. James, moreover, was taught riding, a pony was provided for his daily use; and Murdestoun became his home almost as much as the more humble, but not less happy and contented abode in the Gallowgate. This kindness was not the effect of mere injudicious impulse, but had a purpose in it. In carrying out his purpose, the General obtained a commission for "Jamie" as a cornet in the Scots Greys, then called the Royal North British Dragoons. The Secretary-at-War assumed the boy's name to be Inglis Hamilton, and the General for this mistake, which was quite unintentional on his part, writes a letter of apology to the Sergeant, and in it says: "If the nomination is given in and past recal, the General hopes that Mr. Anderson will agree to it, as it must be of such advantage to the young man. Besides, he has to acquaint Mr. Anderson that he always intended to leave Jamie something handsome at his death, on condition that he bore his name; and will condescend to say, if agreed to, that his annual income, in money, bonds, or stock, shall exceed the rents of Murdestoun when the General's father changed his name from Hamilton to Inglis, by virtue of the testator's will."

We need not add that no objections were made to the generous arrangement stated in such courteous and respectful terms by the good General; but within the folds of the above letter there still remains a memorandum of the old Sergeant's, showing how he felt at being separated from his boy:—"Parted with my son James at Larkhall, at halfpast seven: he was aged sixteen years and seven days. I walked to Hamilton that night with a heart full of grief."

Before James joined his regiment, the General informed him that if he conducted himself like an officer and a gentleman, he meant to leave him, after his death, property to the amount of 5000l. a-year! He in the meantime settled upon him 200l. a-year while cornet.

Years passed. The Cornet behaved like an officer and a gentleman, and was the pride of the old General, who had the satisfaction of seeing him become Lieutenant-Colonel of his regiment, respected and beloved by officers and men.

^{*} All the facts in this brief history of James Anderson are taken from a volume which is now being published in Glasgow, in monthly numbers, with the title of "Old Reminiscences of Glasgow and the West of Scotland, by Peter Mackenzie." It is full of lively and interesting details of events, chiefly of local interest, which have occurred during the early part of the present century and the end of the last in Glasgow and its immediate neighbourhood.

The General in the meantime made his will, leaving his property to James and his heirs male, with his whole movable estate, then amounting to 200,000%.

But before the General died he lost, through the bankruptcy of his army agents in London, Ross & Ogilvie, 100,000l., which he had guaranteed to Government as security for their transactions, and also 50,000l. which were in their hands. The dividend offered by the bankrupts was only one penny in the pound. But in spite of this great loss, the General before he died was able to invest in the Funds 60,000l. "for the sole and exclusive benefit of his dear adopted son," for whom he "earnestly entreated" from his trustees and his relatives "all the friendship and respect they could show."

The General died, and according to a request written by him and placed in his prayer-book, "Jamie" acted as chief mourner, accompanied by the nobility and gentry of the county. Never was a truer mourner. He writes to his brother in deepest sorrow for the loss of his "only friend"—his "beloved benefactor."

When the will was opened in the presence of the distinguished company assembled at Murdestoun, the problem "Who is his heir?" was solved, to the surprise and, it would appear, to the gratification of all present, and to the disappointment of none. But a flaw was discovered in the deed which couveyed the 60,000l. to Colonel Hamilton, and which prevented the trustees from carrying it into effect without the consent and deed of Miss Hamilton, who was now entitled to claim this large sum as her own, and to dispose of it as she pleased. But no sooner did Miss Hamilton, who was in another room, hear of this unexpected intelligence than she seized the Colonel's hand, and said, "My darling, all this is yours!" and, addressing the trustees and gentlemen present, she said, "I revere my brother's settlement; I shall faithfully pay attention to all his bequests; and you, dear gentlemen, make out immediately my settlement and get it confirmed. and then I shall die contentedly, as my beloved brother has done, in the faith and peace of our blessed Redeemer." Those two loving hearts have not been put to shame!

The receiver of this fortune displayed a generosity in disposing of it worthy of its donor. He provided amply, without even a day's delay, for all the old servants and dependents of the General, and often added afterwards to his benefactions. He bought and furnished a handsome house for his parents and sisters, settling 500l. a-year upon them. He also gave 300l. a-year to his brother John, who had received a commission in the 38th Regiment. After the death of his parents, the two sisters were left in possession of the house and their handsome income. He also made a will, ordering 20,000% to be invested after his death in Government stock for their behoof, leaving besides to each a legacy of 1500l. In 1814, Colonel Hamilton married a beautiful Englishwoman, endowing her with 500l. a-year as "pin-money," and the life-rent of his estate. In 1815 he joined, in command of his regiment, the British army in Belgium.

We now turn to another and later period in this family history.

Nearly twenty years after the departure of the Colonel on his voyage to Ostend, the writer of the original sketch, from which we draw all our materials, and who was then the editor of a Glasgow newspaper, was waited upon one Saturday afternoon, when residing in the Gorbals of Glasgow, by an Irishwoman, who, with all the clamorous energy of her nation, implored him to aid two female sufferers who lived near her, and were enduring tho direct sufferings from long-continued poverty, which at last had reached starvation. Such applications are not uncommon in great cities; but, alas! they are often the contrivances, and some of them very cunningly and cleverly done, of unprincipled beggars. The Irishwoman stated, however, that the poor ladies were the sisters of a Colonel of the Scots Greys, in which regiment her husband had served as a sergeant, and that the Colonel was an officer whom he adored; and she exclaimed in her earnestness, "Oh, my God! are the sisters of the Colonel of my darling husband to be left to perish on the morrow, the Sabbath-day, for the want of the common necessaries of life!" She then produced to her astonished hearer her husband's letter describing the Battle of Waterloo and giving an account of Colonel Hamilton.

The story on examination, which was promptly made, was found to be true! There, in a miserable room, were the two sisters of the brave, the good, and generous Hamiltou. There was no fire in the wretched den, no bed but some straw spread in a corner, no provisions but a few cold potatoes, no furniture but an old stool on which one of the sisters sat sewing, with the half of a blanket over her shoulders, while the other lay on a bit of old rug upon the floor. Yes, there was another piece of furniture-a military portmanteau, full of old papers, and inscribed "Captain James Inglis Hamilton, North British Dragoons." "That, sir," said one of the ladies, bursting into tears, "is all we have of him!" The sergeant's wife, who had been weeping all the while, modestly begged from their kind visitor "but one shilling," to get food for her poor friends!

How came such women, whose character we may state had ever been irreproachable, and on whom honour and fortune had once so suddenly shone, to sink into such poverty? A brief but sufficient answer to this natural inquiry must here suffice.

Their misfortunes began with the death of their noble brother. He had led his famous regiment at Waterloo with the greatest bravery. Both his arms had been wounded—or rather "shot off," as we are informed by the narrative before us—yet, with the bridle of his horse held in his teeth, he had dashed on in that terrible charge which called forth the admiration of Napoleon as with telescope in hand he watched "ces chevaux gris!" The Colonel was shot dead, and was buried on the field of battle. His brother John, an equally gallant officer, after having been frequently engaged in Spain, and one of the forlorn hope at the siege of Badajoz, died in Glasgow of wounds received at Salamanca. widow of Colonel Hamilton got a pension, but died without leaving any issue, and the property of Murdestoun consequently passed into another family. Then followed rapidly a series of sad losses to the poor sisters. The Edinburgh lawyer who was entrusted with their money, used it for his own selfish purposes, and, being himself ruined, committed guicide. Minor swindles followed-one by the pretended lover of one of the sisters, and another by the auctioneer who disposed of their furniture; until finally, left without a farthing, they became the occupants of poor lodgings in a poor street in Glasgow. A donation of 2001. in 1829 from the Royal Bounty was kindly given them, in reply to a letter written by themselves and addressed direct to the King, and which it is understood he transmitted to the Duke of Wellington for his advice. When this sum was expended, they in vain applied to the Patriotic Fund, and to the War Office, and to King William IV. for aid, but their "claims" were not found to come under the "rules" by which grants from either source were dispensed; and so the ladies sank into the deep poverty which we have recorded. Their first relief afterwards came through Mr. Mackenzie, called to visit them. as we have related, by the sympathising Irishwoman. For next day, with letter of Colonel Clarke in hand-who had succeeded in the command of the Greys-giving an account of the death of Colonel Hamilton, Mr. Mackenzie proceeded to the Barracks, and brought the sad case of the sisters under the notice of Colonel Wildman and the officers of the Carabineers. Nothing could exceed the sympathy and liberality instantly shown by the officers of that regiment and their wives, who immediately raised 35% for the sufferers, while clothing and other comforts were personally bestowed with the cordial sympathy of "fair women and brave men." A touching description was given by a neighbour of their condition when visited by their charitable friend in the morning after their case became known. Their door was locked, and while Mr. Mackenzie and one of the officers were wondering at the silence of death within, and the absence of all response to the repeated demands for admittance, a person living on the same stair said, "Oh, sir, you need not knock there any longer, for the poor ladies will admit nobody: they creep out at daybreak to pick up a bit of breakfast, and sometimes they creep out at night to the back well for water; and when we offer to go any message for them, they say they are forsaken by their betters, and just wish to slip awa' quietly; indeed, we have often feared they're been dead for days together." A few confidential whispers through the keyhole made them unbar the door at this time, when the condition of the room so shocked the officer who accompanied Mr. Mackenzie that he exclaimed, "Oh, my God, come away!"

They were soon placed in circumstances of comparative comfort, which so bewildered them that one for a time seemed excited to the verge of insanity.

Before the last of these ladies died, in 1849, other sums unexpectedly came to their relief. One of 300l. was raised in Glasgow, the subscriptions having originated in the publication of a letter of the Duke of Wellington's, in reply to an application for a Treasury grant, when it seemed necessary to relieve them as paupers from the parish funds. We publish the letter below as being characteristic of his Grace.*

The history of the recovery of another and last sum is worth recording. It has been already mentioned that a dividend of one penny in the pound had been declared in favour of the creditors of the bankrupt army agents in London. Mr. Mackenzie, having accidentally noticed an advertisement in the Globe newspaper, stating that the trustees of Ross & Ogilvie were prepared to pay this dividend to all legal claimants, immediately went to London and secured the sum of 125*l*. for his poor friends!

The rest of this narrative may be briefly told. One of the sisters died a lunatic in 1848. The other a year after followed her to the grave; the only property which she left behind being the sash worn at Waterloo by her brother, which, strange to say, had been preserved and sent to the family soon after the memorable battle. His body was discovered on the field and recognised two days after his death, but everything was gone except his sash, which with many tears was presented to Mr. Mackenzie—by whom it is still possessed and cherished—as a memento of all his kindness to the last representatives of their brother.*

* " November 22, 1836.

"Sir,—I have this morning had the honour of receiving your letter of the 19th inst., regarding the sisters of the late Colonel Hamilton of the Scots Greys. If I had this single case to deal with, or a hundred, or even hundreds, I should be under no difficulty; but as soon as the war was over, nothing would avail the officers of the army, their relatives, and relicts, but exorbitant profits and interest. Instead of placing their money in security, and being satisfied with small but secure interest for the same, they entrusted it to gamblers and speculators—whether in the profession of the law or otherwise—in order to acquire more than could fairly be made by money; and the tale of distress which you relate of the Misses Hamilton is that, not of hundreds, but, to my certain knowledge, of thousands. All these naturally come to me, from all parts of the world. I have at this moment applications before me from Canada and the East Indies, as well as from different parts of Europe; and I need scarcely add that the relicts of officers of the army are not the only sufferers. The Government will do nothing; and I must confess that I cannot see on what ground a grant of money can be justified, founded on losses of fortune occasioned by imprudent and unreasonable speculations. No private funds can provide for such domands. I make this statement in answer to your letter, as I wish to show you that the case is not singular; at the same time, I send you the enclosed, requesting you to add it to any subscriptions which may have been made for the service of these unfortunate ladies.

The following beautiful verses—by whom written we know not—were found recorded in a MS. book kept by the last survivor, and we think them well worth quoting, if only as a touching expression of the feelings of the sufferer who recorded them:—

"Shadow lieth over all,
Sorrow holdeth festival,
Dimmed are our eyes by tears that fall
On dreary paths below:
Wearily through earth we roam,
Trouble-toss'd, like tempest foam;
Longing for the rest of home,
Where we so lingering go.

"Hopes, of youth and vigour born,
Lit and cheered our way at morn;
Ere noontide vanish'd, all forlorn
We pilgrimage below;
Streaming far on Faith's keen eye,
Beacon lights burn brilliantly,
Kindled on heaven's turrets high,
To guide us where to go.

"Friendships counted fast and true,
When our trusting hearts were new,
Transient pass, as sun-dyed dew,
Betray our trust below;
Friendship blooms, aye fair and green,
Dwells a brother yet unseen,
On whose love's strong arm may lean
A whole world—where we go.

"Haste our dearest-loved away;
Youth's bright comrade—manhood's stay—
The hope of age, but little way
Attend us here below.
There's no loss in each remove;
'Tis but one more hand of love
Stretched to welcome us above

When in our turn we go!

"Seekings trouble all the soul, Tendings to an unknown pole, Strainings unto an unreach'd goal, Resultless here below; Here we know not what we feel; God our clos'd sight will unseal—God his secret will reveal, Where we with yearning go.

"Sorrow's tears, temptation's fights,
Cheated trust that chills and blights,
Turmoiling days and wakeful nights,
Embitter life below:
Calm, unbroken, perfect peace,
Tireless toil, unresting ease,
Joy that ne'er can know decrease,
Reign ever where we go.

"So—with steadfast purpose braced— May the storms of life be faced, The path by love and wisdom traced, Be followed here below, That we—when we cease to roam— Gathered in God's radiant dome; May bless the woes that chased us home Whence no more out we go!"

II .- JAMES MACRAE.*

JAMES MACRAE entered on public life by being whipped through the streets of Ayr.

If that "auld toon" in the days of Burns was entitled to the praise which he bestows upon it, as having been unsurpassed in "honest men and bonnie lasses," the hero of our narrative did not thus appear to be the "father of the man" who would ever contribute to the fame of its honesty.

Hitherto the boy, having lost his father, had been brought up in the retired parish of Ochiltree, in Ayrshire, by a Hugh M'Guire, who occupied his busy hours as a maker of spinning-wheels, which in those days whirred by every fireside; while his art as a fiddler made his presence essential at every merry-meeting in the district. He was a kindhearted man, and faithfully discharged the duties of a foster-father to Macrae, to whom he gave the best education which the parish could afford. The only charge which tradition has preserved against his protégé is, that he had a restless spirit, and was "always getting into scrapes." But what precise scrape led to his being flogged is not known-probably nothing more serious than his having perhaps robbed the Provost's garden, or something of the same sort, which in these days would have met less public and more lenient treatment. Macrae was too much ashamed to return to his patron in Ochiltree, but disappeared, no one knew whither. Every trace of him was lost, and his very existence almost forgot.

About the year 1733 the town of Ayr was all astir, and its local dignitaries, with the neighbouring gentry, were assembled in gala costume to do honour to "an old Indian," who was the Governor of Madras, and had amassed an immense fortune. He was for some reason or other about to bonour Ayr with a visit, and a grand reception was to be given to the great man, and the freedom of the city bestowed upon him. All this was done, and the name accordingly of "James Macrae, late Governor of Madras," stands recorded among the burgesses of Ayr. It is said, however, that all this honour was arranged without his consent having been asked or given, and from an eager desire on the part of the authorities to claim the great and rich man as their own, all they could ascertain about his origin having been that he was an Ayrshire man. Tradition also states that he refused an interview requested by the magistrates, in rather stern and decided terms. He aloue had remembered the whipping and its probable injustice. Be that as it may, the same James Macrae, who left Ayr as a poor criminal, returned to it as a rich Governor!

It turned out that Macrae, either in this country or in India, enlisted as a soldier, and had risen from the ranks by his own bravery to be a field officer; that he had afterwards held a high and very lucrative office in the commissariat, and finally, having amassed a large fortune, became Governor of Madras.

^{*} This story may serve, among other purposes, as an illustration of the condition of some of the "deserving poor;" to the best method of relieving whom the Editor called the attention of his readers in the last number of Good Words.

^{*} We are indebted for most of the facts in this narrative to the kindness of the Rev. Mr. Patrick, minister in Ochiltree.

He visited the place of his birth and upbringing, and revealed himself to his old friend Hugh M'Guire. His mother had died several years before, having received to the last the greatest kindness from his own early friend. Macrae resolved to express to the utmost of his ability a sense of all the benefits which had been conferred on his mother and himself by the wheelright and fiddler. His first act was to purchase and to present to him the farm of Drumdow. Finding that two good-looking daughters had been born to his friend, probably by a marriage made late in life, he, with the cheerful consent of their parents, sent them to the best boarding-school he could find.

He also gave to both handsome fortunes. are not acquainted with the subsequent history of the youngest, but that of the eldest, Elizabeth, is well known. She married William, 13th Earl of Glencairn, in 1744, the Governor having purchased for her the estate of Ochiltree in her native parish, and for which he paid 100,000l.! The marriage turned out a very happy one. Their son, with whom the title became extinct, was the Lord Gleneairn so much esteemed by Robert Burns, and his true friend when such friends were few. We may also state that the memory of Elizabeth, Countess of Glencairn, is still remembered and greatly revered in the district where she had once herded cattle as a poor girl, and afterwards lived in state as the Lady of the Manor. She seems to have possessed admirable sense and genuine picty. Her very life was devoted to the good of all around her, chiefly of the tenants on her large property. She introduced clover and other new grasses into the parish. Her tenants were comfortably housed, and leases were secured to them at comparatively small rents. Long before the Sunday Schools were elsewhere known, the Countess had a flourishing one. She had also, what was then rare, an Industrial School for girls, in which spinning was taught and the proceeds of the labour of the scholars expended, one half in premiums and the rest kept as a small dowry for marriage. Her patronage of the parish was exercised in the most admirable manner, her sole aim being the appointment of the best clergyman she could find. Much of her excellence and usefulness as a Countess may be traced to the impressions made on her young and thoughtful mind when tending her cows "along the mountain side," and when keenly appreciating the blessings of good grass for them, and good schooling, with a comfortable home, for herself. So much for the good directly and indirectly effected by James Macrae.

Another memorial of James Macrae, and one which will ever connect him with Glasgow, and we shall bring our short notice of him to a close.

The traveller who visits Glasgow and takes the trouble of walking along the Trongate, which would be a fine street in any city, will notice near "the Cross," at its eastern extremity, an equestrian statue of no mean value as a work of art, and he will also discern two old guns protruding their small rusty muzzles above the ground near its base. Those guns blazed at the battle of the Boyne, and they now look up to King William III., who commanded them there. Strange to say, this is the only statue in Scotland or England erected to him of "immortal memory." A Latin inscription on the base of the statue informs us, among other things, that it was erected in 1734 by "Jacobus Macrae, Gubernator Madrasii!" The Governor, from his admiration of the great "Orangeman" presented this statue, at a cost of 3000l., to the city of Glasgow, and thus unwittingly reared the only monument. as far as we know, which exists bearing his own worthy name.

We may add that this work of art was the only one of the kind known, for more than a century, to the peasantry of the West Highlands. The first object on reaching Glasgow which the Highlander went to see was "the black horse;" and the first question asked of him when he returned home, by those who wished to hear his "news," was, "Have you seen the black horse?" There are comparatively few in Glasgow even who know the name of the person by whom it was erected, far less his history.

THE LADY AND THE ROOKS.

A TRUE STORY.

TRUST the grand and gentle Trees, Never will their welcome fade; All that lives may lie at ease In the haven of their shade; Treasuries of tranquil air Keep they for the burning days, IZEC D/ IC'And the tempest's war-alarms; And their boughs ascend like prayer, And their leaves break forth like praise.

Patient are they, for they wait On the humours of the year; Noble, for they keep their state When the Winter leaves them sere; Strong, to suffer heat and cold Very tender, for they hold All bird-babies in their arms.

Where the Winter silence hears

No voice louder than a brook's,
There was built for many years

A great city of the Rooks;
There they brush the tall elm-crests

With their sable sweep of wing;
You may count a hundred nests

Bare among the buds of Spring.

Couch'd in crimson window-curve
Looks a Lady at the sky,
Sees cach builder stoop and swerve
Like a great black butterfly;
Hum of their familiar talk Brings a greeting to her ear—
"We are in the elm-tree walk!
Spring is sure, and Summer near!"

But a louder note invades—
Whence and how? who dares to tell?
They are building in the shades
By her own pet Oriel!
In the Cedar—which so long
With a separate glory stood,
Like a Sunday Tree among
Work-day brethren of the wood.

In her Cedar, nothing less!
Heavens, what free-and-easy birds!
Now she utters her distress
Rapid, with despotic words:
"This is quite against the laws,
You must drive them out of reach;
We shall have superfluous caws
Mixing with our parts of speech."

So she spake, and it was done;
Strew the ruins at her feet!
Little homestead, scarce begun,
You shall never be complete!
See how silent and dismay'd
Hang the guilty pair aloof—
Tenants they, with rent unpaid,
Watching their dismantled roof.

And the fair Spring-day was lost
In a soft prophetic night,
Covering all the coming host
Of King Summer's bloom and light;
And the household lay at rest,
Dreaming not of labour vain,
And the Rooks to that poor nest
Came, and set to work again.

Angry eyes awoke and saw Ruthless hands the work undo;
Many a faint remonstrant caw
Dies unheeded in the dew;
Five times was the nest begun;
Five times, at the break of day,
Were the cunning links undone.
And the framers chased away.

But one night through all the trees
Went a whirr of wings afloat,
And a tumult and a breeze
Big with caws from many a throat;
Sleep is hunted from the house,
Through the dark the master looks,
Saying to his weary spouse,
"There's a strike among the Rooks."

To those houseless birds forlorn
All the Nation came in aid:
"This," they cried, "cau not be borne!
In a night it shall be made!"
And it was! They pile, they weave,
Flit, fuss, chatter, through the shade
The first twig was set at eve,
And by dawn the eggs were laid!

When the Lady came to see,
Much she marvelled, as she might,
Such a goodly work to be Finished in a single night.
All the air was black with wings,
For the Nation hovered near,
Pleading for their precious things
Half in anger, half in fear.

THE ROOKS' PETITION.

"Bear with us! Your garden shows
Many a snug and comely nest,
But the very leaf we chose
Is for us the only best;
And you would not wish a change
In the music of our words,
If you knew how harsh and strange
Seems your talk to all the birds!

"We are happy where we please,
Not where you would have us dwell;
We've our choice among the trees,
You, your own pet Oriel;
If you hunt us while we sue,
You are strong, and we despair;
But one thing you cannot do—
Make us feel at home elsewhere!

"Rulers to their cost have found
Hearts of men are much like ours:
Laws that grow not from the ground
Often die like gather'd flowers;
Rule and measure as they may,
They will see at last, perhaps,
God makes pictures every day
Which are better things than maps.

"But we wander from our text,
We are most unreasoning birds,
And your eyes, although perplext,
Seem to soften at our words;
Give not only, but forgive
Even a constancy misplaced;
Grant the meanest things that live
Whim and fancy, wish and taste!"

CHRISTIANITY VINDICATED FROM ALLEGED TENDENCIES TO PERSECUTION.

By HENRY ROGERS, Author of "The Eclipse of Faith," &c.

OUR age has not been unfruitful in theological paradox; but few are bolder than that Christianity, by implication, if not directly, patronises the spirit of persecution, and must be held responsible for the excesses which have been perpetrated in its name.

That Christians, so called, like many millions of men not so called, have been persecutors, is most true; but, in so far as they have been such, they have not been Christians. Nothing can be plainer than that in its letter and its spirit, by precept and example, by direct assertion and oblique inference, the code of Christianity, as expounded in its only authentic statute-book, the New Testament, utterly proscribes all persecution; all attempts to cocree men's wills, or to gain their adhesion to its doctrines by any other means than those of conviction and persuasion.

When John and James, angry with those Samaritans who, under the influence of national bigotry, peremptorily refused to admit the Great Founder of Christianity into their village, wished to call down fire from heaven upon them, Christ rebuked them in words never to be forgotten, and which ought to have determined all such points for His disciples through all time: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of Man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." No fairer plea for coercion and punishment could be conceived than that suggested in this contumelious rejection of the Master himself; and yet the Master himself overruled in the suggested in the suggested in this contumelious rejection of the Master himself; and yet

Similarly the texts which tell us that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," that we are to "be gentle unto all men, in meckness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth;" that "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but spiritual;" that Christ's "kingdom is not of this world," and many others, imply the same thing.

In like manner, the general maxims which Christianity inculcates, and which have so often been represented as paradoxes of an impracticable patience and meekness;-the maxims which enjoin us "not to return evil for evil;" "to overcome evil with good," "not to resist evil," "to turn the left cheek to him who smites us on the right," "to yield our coat to him who has taken away our cloak," and "with him who would compel us to go one mile, to go twain;" all these prove, à fortiori, that it is utterly forbidden to the Christian to perscente—unless he can plead a distinct dispensation from them, nay, a liberty to invert them all, wherever men are not Christians, or not such Christians as himself: that is to say, towards nearly all mankind! With whatever limitations the last three maxims be received—and common sense will naturally interpret the extreme and variously coloured figurative language rather as a rhetorical expression of the predominant spirit of meekness which Christ inculcates, than as rules to be literally acted upon-they are, at least, utterly inconsistent with persecution in every form. In a word, the whole of the New Testament as clearly condemns persecution in the followers of Christ, as the Decalogue forbids theft or murder. To charge, therefore, the persecutions which have so deeply stained the page of ecclesiastical history on Christianity itself, is to charge a code with the crimes which have been committed in violation of it; with the crimes of those who professed and owed allegiance to it, but never paid it! And the defence of Christianity would, in this respect, be complete, if not only many Christians, but all of them, had been persecutors; nay, if every one of them had been as bad as Bonner.

All men have broken some of the commands of the Decalogue, and not a few have broken all; but no one would argue that the Decalogue does not condemn such acts. All moral systems, even the very worst that men have professed, have still been better than the conduct of the men who professed them; but no one supposes that they, therefore, sanction the very things they condemn. In like manner, the character of the code in every country is naturally judged by the terms of its statute-book alone; by the letter and spirit of its express prohibitions, and not by the degree in which it is obeyed or infringed. The law remains the same (good or bad, as the case may be), and is not answerable for those who warp or break it, let the judges be ever so corrupt, let the gaols be ever so full. But, in truth, in no other case but Christianity are men so unreasonable as to make any system whatsoever responsible for the very conduct it expressly forbids, or for the faults of those who set it at defiance.

If it be asked, how is it, then, that Christians have so often been persecutors? the answer is, that in this, as well as in many other respects, men, in corrupting Christianity, warped it to the maxims and passions of their own nature, a process by which at last it was so transmuted as to bear a very close resemblance to religions of undoubted human origin.

As the Pharisees at length made "the law of God of none effect by their traditions," so the corruption of the Christian Church gradually obliterated some of the divinest features of the Gospel, and stamped upon it the human "image and superscription" instead. The shape into which man instinctively moulded it, followed the law of man's nature and the fashion of his previous chefs-d'œuvre of religious manufacture. That he should have taught it to persecute, is not at all more wonderful than that he should have invented a purgatory; consecrated idolatry in new forms; substituted ten thousand intercessors for one; shut the Bible, and worshipped in an unknown tongue; commuted the moral and spiritual for the ceremonial; appraised sin at a money value, and sold pardons and indulgences by the pennyweight. And as, in these changes, Christianity was but assimilated to many religions which existed before it, and others that exist still; so, in teaching it to persecute, man taught it to do what human nature was always prone enough to do, and had been most diligently practising against itself all through the first three hundred years of its history!*

One would imagine that, with such a code, it was not very easy to bring in Christianity as a patron of persecution, however guilty its professed disciples might be. Nor, perhaps, would it be easy to find any one who would charge it with directly inculcating it. Yet, if we may believe M. Renan, + Christianity naturally tends to persecution, by the very fact of its "being a faith which asserts that it is exclusively true;" and that every such Faith-that is, every Faith which does not think that Truth may be manifold-will be apt to persecute too! Further, that if a man is willing to "die" for the truth, he is very likely to be willing to "kill" for it. But let us hear the passage: it occurs apropos or more, correctly speaking, mal-apropos-of the account of the martyrdom of St. Stephen :-

"And thus opened the era of Christian martyrs. Martyrdom was not altogether a thing unknown. Not to speak of John the Baptist, and of Jesus, Judaism, at the epoch of Antiochus Epiphanes, had had its faithful witnesses, even to the death. the succession of courageous victims, which began with St. Stephen, has exercised a peculiar influence on the history of the human mind. It introduced into the western world a sentiment which was foreign to it, -an exclusive and absolute Faith; the notion that there is but one religion that is good and true. In this sense, the martyrs commenced the era of intolerance. One may say, with a good deal of probability, that he who would give his life for his faith, would be intolerant if he had the power. Christianity, which passed through three centuries of persecution, having become in its turn predominant, was more persecuting than any religion that ever existed. When a man has shed his blood for a cause, he is too ready to shed the blood of other people, in order to preserve the treasure he has acquired." *

On this curious passage I would make the following remarks :-

"In this sense, the martyrs introduced the era of intolerance!" It would not be easy to find a better illustration of the fable of the wolf accusing the lamb of troubling the waters. It were as wise to say that not Cain, but Abel, introduced "the era" of murders into the world, or that the slaughtering of sheep introduced the era of butchers; whereas, it were surely more intelligible to say that the era of butchers introduced the slaughtering of sheep. There must have been persecutors before there could be martyrs; and before Christian persecutors, we know that heathen persecutors had existed for three hundred years; a tolerable proof that "the era of intolerance" dates higher than Anno Domini, and that persecution is no special characteristic of those who believe that there is but one religion "exclusively true." On the contrary, it was practised by those whose tolerance and levity could in other cases theoretically tolerate anything. In truth, it is too late to trace the lineage of intolerance to Christianity, with the history of the first three centuries before us.

But the fallacies in the passage do not end with this odd anachronism—this curious example of putting the "cart before the horse." Is it a fact that the belief in a religion which asserts itself to be "exclusively true" is at all necessarily connected with persecution? History does not bear out this statement. It is quite true that men are universally apt to assert with undue vehemence their own dogmas, and in proportion to the supposed importance of them; to be angry, if they are contradicted; and if there be the power, to use violence to give effect to them. It is a tendency, not peculiar to religion only, but common to politics, sometimes even to philosophy and science; for even these too can get angry and unjust in the attempt to assert their own doctrines, or suppress those of their opponents. But this is the fault of human nature, and not of the exclusive character of any presumed Truth. It is human nature that has imported into the controversy between Truth and Error what did not belong to it. But that the connection is not necessary, is found in this plain fact-that the connection is found to be, not invariable, but accidental.

Not only did Christianity uncompromisingly affirm the exclusive validity of its doctrines, and yet teach, side by side with them, and as one of

"Nor can this remnant of the spirit of Romanism be so called, in the sense of making the peculiar system of that Church properly the cause of it, because we find the same principle manifested in its full force among the Mahometans, who cannot in any way be regarded as deriving it from Romanism.

"It is derivable rather from the character of the 'natural man,' from the natural feelings of resentment against opponents, of love of control, and of a desire to promote apparent good."—Whately's "Errors of Romanism," pp. 243-4.

^{*} It has been well said by one who wrote the "History of Toleration," "Persecution has not resulted from any particular system, but from the prevalence of ignorance, and the force of those illiberal prejudices which are natural to the mind of untutored men." On this an acute critic on the passage adds, without any such qualification, "In fact it may be laid down as a fundamental principle that intolerance is natural to man in every state of society."—Edinburgh Review, vol. xxvi.

them, that no violence should be used on their behalf: not only did Christ himself, who made these claims, inculcate, as he also practised, lessons of the most unlimited charity; not only did Christianity for three centuries maintain the same exclusive claims, and yet renounce all "carnal weapons" in its support; but when, after ages of spiritual slumber, our forefathers, by a renewed study of the Gospel, vindicated and established the doctrines of religious freedom, they still held as firmly as any man could, the "exclusive and absolute" truth of Christianity; and millions since their day have not thought there was any inconsistency in sincerely holding both positions. Nay, there would be the grossest inconsistency in not holding both; for if there be Truth at all, its claims must be exclusive, unless Truth, like Error, can be manifold; and on the other hand, it cannot in the nature of things be propagated by violence, or by anything but conviction and persuasion; in other words, only under the auspices of liberty. And we must be pardoned for saying that if our forefathers had not believed in the paramount and exclusive claims of Christianity, we have some doubts whether we should ever have recovered our liberties at all; whether they would have had the courage and endurance to face the dangers and sufferings necessary for this purpose. Certain it is, that no man is more willing to remain a timid and slavish adherent of the system "that is in possession,"-no matter what,-more willing "to remain where he is," than many a modern champion of the doctrine that "doctrine is of no consequence," and "one religion as true and as good as another."

We see then in point of fact, that millions within the last two centuries have been perfectly convinced that Christianity is "absolutely and exclusively true," and yet have had no disposition to cut other people's throats, or even mulct or imprison them, if they do not adopt the same opinions. Thousands of these, like the early champions of the great doctrine of religious liberty, would have been perfectly willing to be martyrs for either the one or the other of the terms of this supposed disjunction ;-for the exclusive Truth of the Gospel, or the Rights of Conscience it recognises. But in fact there is no sort of connection between the terms of these propositions, "I believe this to be an absolute religious truth," and "I believe therefore that it is my duty to lay violent hands on anybody who gainsays or denies it;"* least of all to him who knows what he is talking about; since, whether Truth be exclusively with him or not, he knows, not only that, wheresoever it is, it must be exclusive. but that it is not worth a farthing unless it be the result of moral conviction, and therefore voluntarily embraced.

The tendency, then, to persecute may or may not be connected (as we see, in fact) with the presumed possession of "exclusive and absolute religious truth;" that variable connection itself shows that it is but accidental. When the disposition to persecute exists, therefore, it must be traced to other principles, and these are not far to seek; which, in fact, are none other than the impatience of opposition and greed of dominion, which readily enough explain the analogous excesses, both of secular and spiritual despotism. There is no more difficulty in accounting for the one set of enormities than the other; one origin will sufficiently account for both. The fons malorum is in human nature: in its pride and selfishness, its fiery impatience of opposition, its imperious will, in the hateful disposition of Power, to ride rough-shod over all who are opposed to it, to make everybody think, or say he thinks, as it bids, or cease to think at all. That same disposition, which is the cause of all tyranny, made man, in corrupting the Gospel, corrupt it in the sense and direction of his own usurping nature, whereby it became as easy for him to cancel the plainest and clearest prohibitions of persecution, as it is for the ordinary tyrant to cancel, in favour of his own arrogant will, the instincts of humanity and conscience, and all the sanctions of the eternal, though unwritten, law. No doubt both the religious tyrant and the political tyrant (for this is a necessity of human nature, for its own peace' sake,) gloze over, and varnish their evil deeds by plausible pretexts: the one, of preventing the spread of deadly error; and the other, of preventing the spread of as deadly anarchy: but the true motives, which these things only mask, are the same in each. There is, then, no reason why we should seek for any other origin of the truculence of a Bonner than what will account for the truculence of a Jeffries; and the same cruel passions and maxims which filled the cells of the Bastile will, variously modified, suffice to fill the cells of the Inquisition.

The closing statement of the paradoxical passage I am commenting on is not less curious. "We may say, with probability, that he who gives his life for his faith, would be intolerant, if he were to obtain the ascendancy; and that when a man has shed his blood for a cause, he is too much disposed to shed the blood of other people, in order to preserve the treasure he has acquired." If there is any plausibility at all in this last sentence, it is because the form of expression disguises the difference between active and passive. In a figurative sense certainly, the martyr may be said "to shed his own blood," but he is quite passive, notwithstanding. It is something very different to assert that if a man is willing to be made a martyr for a cause, he is very likely to make martyrs of other people. So far as there is any truth in the statement, it has no special relation to Christianity. In a persecuting age, and among a persecuting people (no matter what the religion), no doubt mutual wrongs will inflame mutual hatred, and either party, having more angry men than willing martyrs, will be apt to persecute when it is the stronger. But to suppose that those who have voluntarily submitted to death, would have been the most ready to inflict it on others—that a Polycarp would have made an excellent Dominick, and Latimer a conspicuous Inquisitor, we see as little reason to believe, as that a murdered man would be likely to have been a murderer; or that because it is true that he

^{*} On this subject some admirable remarks will be found in Whately's Essays on "Persecution," in Errors of Romanism, pp. 248-250.

"Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free," therefore we must believe Johnson's parody of the line, and say,

"Who drives fat exen should himself be fat."

M. Renan says that "Christianity, which had passed through three centuries of persecutions, became (once made predominant) more persecuting than any religion that has ever existed." The statement may, perhaps, be disputed. Whether Imperial Rome, or Papal Rome, or Mohammedanism is best entitled to the unenviable palm of a victorious cruelty, may well perplex any student of history to decide. All that is necessary for a reasonable advocate of Christianity to maintain is, that whether a corrupt Christianity stand first or last in the list, it attains its bad eminence in virtue of its being assimilated to that same human nature which inspired both the religion of Imperial Rome and that of the Arabian impostor. The statute-book of Christianity renounces and condemus the counterfeit that assumes her name.

Another, though not novel, mode of proving Christianity chargeable with encouraging persecution, has been recently insisted on. It has been argued that its appalling doctrine of "Future Punishments" necessarily tends to steel the heart to pity, and in a manner compels the humane mind to adopt cruel means for the repression of errors and heresies that would involve such fearful. consequences. It is, perhaps, superfluous to remark that one half of this argument answers the other; for, if the doctrine in question tends to sear the heart and inure it to cruelty, it is hard to say what room it leaves for that exquisite humanity which, in pure compassion, consigns men to rack and faggot, to prevent worse consequences! But in point of fact, the argument breaks down, in whatever point of view it is considered. First, even if we were to grant that the darkest aspect of the doctrine in question was the incontrovertible view of the New Testament (which, however, a not inconsiderable, and probably increasing party deny to be its correct interpretation,) still it cannot annul the express injunctions, (regarded by all as incontrovertible,) of that same book, to abstain from all persecution; and therefore, as already said, Christianity cannot be answerable for the infractions of its rule, let men's reasons be ever so plausible. The law of the Gospel is perfectly clear in the matter of persecution, and at once vindicates itself from any tampering with it, under pretended dread of the consequences of its doctrine on other points. Secondly, as already said, it is not very easy to imagine a humanity that takes so eccentric a way of manifesting itself. Thirdly, as a recent writer (in the Times if we mistake not,) has well observed, the argument cuts both ways; -- for a humane man would naturally think that so much more dreadful a retribution than he could inflict might well absolve him from the endeavour to anticipate, and increase it; and that the menace of it might serve, (if any thing could,) as a warning to others quite as well as the humane cruelty of Inquisitors ;-which last, as experience has long since convinced the world, is by no means an infallible malleus hereticorum. Thirdly, that though it need not be denied that there have been persecutors here and there, (as Sir Thomas More or Cranmer, for example,) who honestly persuaded themselves that they were torturing men's bodies out of love to men's souls, yet the general characteristics of the coarse insolent spirits who have delighted in work of this kind, and done the principal part of the religious carcass-butchers of the world,—the Alvas and the Bonners,—show they were no more prompted by humanity, when they dropped men's bodies into the fire, in order to snatch men's souls out of it, than were the great despots and tyrants of the earth, who have inflicted similar and equal cruelties on humanity, without any such pretended reasons at all.*

Indeed, considering the enormous load of suffering under which the wickedness of ordinary despotism has made mankind groan, it seems ludicrous to account for that which a parallel religious despotism has inflicted, by supposing it the result, not of vulgar passion, which will account, (as a general rule) equally for both, but as a subtle humanity, which, though mistaken in its means, was naturally misled, by ingenious deductions from one doctrine of Christianity, utterly to ignore and trample under foot another, and that other written as with a sunbeam on every page of the New Testament! It is, perhaps, hardly too much to suspect that this halfapology for the excesses of religious persecution, (which, in fact, as little needs far-fetched theories to account for it as the analogous excesses of other forms of man's depravity,) would not have been offered, but for the sinister purpose of damaging Christianity by making it in some way responsible for the persecutions, which nevertheless, it so explicitly forbids and condemns. Fourthly, it may be remarked, that if the theory were worth a pin, and this doctrine be naturally and necessarily connected with persecution, then those who held it could certainly never have discovered (and that out of the Gospel itself) the doctrine that all persecution is unlawful. Yet we all know that the doctrines of religious liberty and toleration were, after ages of persecution, first reasserted and viudicated (and that out of the Gospel itself) by those who still firmly held the dogma of eternal punishment; and that these doctrines are now as zealously maintained by those who affirm as by those who deny that dogma, to be indisputable doctrines of Scripture. They are just as zealous advocates of the rights of conscience as any sceptic can possibly be. If it be said (as has been said) that this is because men do not really believe this appalling doctrine, then the argument answers itself; for certainly a doctrine which is not believed will neither account for the cruelty, nor the humanity, nor that strange tertium quid, the humane cruelty, by which it is supposed to lead inevitably to persecution. And lastly, as if to show that by every test of the Baconian induction, this theory must be rejected, not only is it true that the doctrines of religious toleration were first vindicated and established by those who did not yet question the obnoxious dogma; but that parties who never supposed that the differences between them involved any such dreadful results as the forfeiture of salvation, or doubted that both the one and the other might get safe to heaven, were still often just as prompt to persecute one another, as if they had been divided by the deadliest heresy. Not only have Papists burut Protestants, and Protestants burnt Papists, but Protestants have cruelly persecuted one another, though both sides were quite willing to admit that the faith of either contained everything that was essential to salvation. It is, indeed, a mystery of wickedness that men should thus have warped the plain literal declarations of what they professed to revere as the statute-book of their Master. Yet it is clear that neither He nor it is responsible for this. It was part of man's "New Gospel," his corrupted edition of the original institute; -one of the very points in which it differs from the genuine 'Ευαγγέλιον, which, in this respect as in so many others, contradicts the original tendencies of his nature. When man remodelled the Gospel by corrupting it, he, in this as in other points, acted upon the usual plan of idolaters, "who make a God after their own image." The sublime idea of a religion claiming to be exclusively authoritative, and yet disclaiming peremptorily all violence and coercion in its propagation-monopolising exclusive truth, and yet according universal liberty-had never presented itself to the minds of merely mortal religionmongers. The forms of toleration with which the ancient world was familiar, fell far short of any such conception. As may be easily shown, they were a result either of that indifferentism, which may well tolerate what it does not care about; or of the fact, that the local and national deities were unambitious, and obligingly partitioned out the moral Poland among themselves, content each with his own share; or (in the case of Rome) of that astute policy, which ever characterised her, and by which she conciliated the subject nations to her iron rule; a policy which she abandoned the moment she found herself face to face with a moral system, which though, abjuring all "carnal weapons," aspired to a still wider and more durable dominion than her own, and portended, as she faucied, trouble to her in the attempt to realise it.

^{* &}quot;The desire," says Whately, "of saving men from the dreadful doom in the next world denounced on those 'who do not obey the truth,' has often been a reason, and oftener perhaps a plea, for seeking to enforce a right faith, and to put down religious error by all possible means."

Modern sceptics, of course, applaud with Gibbon, the toleration generally practised by the ancient heathen, and are fond of contrasting it favourably with the too common bigotry of both Jew and Christian. It is a topic of praise which has been often copiously dwelt upon, and sometimes in exaggerated terms; for, as Bentley says in his reply to Collius, the examples of Socrates, Aristotle, Diagoras, and others; the frequent jealousies not only of the partisans of different systems of idolatry, but even of "sects" of the same idolatry; the mutual wrongs which, according to Juvenal, were inflicted by religious animosity when such awkward things happened as one man's worshipping the God which another ate, shows that even the most easy-going heathenism could, upou occasion, be intolerant. As to Rome (the peculiar object of panegyric), her toleration seems to have been entirely measured by her policy. In her earlier days, and when the elements of her population were comparatively homogeneous, she could be jealous of the integrity of the old Roman rites, and, as Livy, Cicero, and other writers show, again and again issued decrees against religious innovations. When she became the mistress of the world, she doubtless found, like other great empires, that it was more easy to induce the subject nations to submit to her political rule, than to abandon their religion; and, as her truly practical policy aimed only at a civil uniformity, she, as already said, humoured them all in the matter of their gods. There was no reason why she should not, as long as these gods were content to dwell on easy terms with one another, satisfied each with his own share of worshippers, his daily sniff of sacrificial smoke, and dole of libation and But the true nature and limits of her toleration were at once disclosed the moment a system arose which asserted "absolute and exclusive truth," and avowed its determination to achieve, though by moral means alone, a victory over the rival creeds. Three centuries of bitter persecution proved how intolerant she really was, in spite of all her boasted lenience; and that it is not necessarily those who assert a system "exclusively true," that persecute for it; those who only hear it propounded, can persecute quite as rigorously. But even while it lasted, the toleration which Gibbon so highly applauds, was assuredly of little worth. It was the expression of contemptuous indifferentism, and sprang neither from a sympathetic charity, nor any lofty sense of the rights of conscience. How could it, when it was founded upon a state of things so epigrammatically expressed by the historian himself? He says, and truly, "that in the view of the philosopher, all religions were equally false; in the view of the vulgar, all equally true; in the view of the statesman, all equally expedient." All these might easily tolerate what they felt either iudifference or contempt for. In truth, it was a toleration not altogether unlike that which is often pleaded for in the present day, and had about the same merit.

There are those who tell us that "dogma is of little consequence," and that it is of the essence of intolerance to assert for any one doctrine that it is "absolute and exclusive truth." Now, of course, if dogmas are of no importance, a wise man will be indifferent to them all; and all who are as indifferent as himself, may well tolerate each other's trivial or accidental preferences. Substitute now "dogma" for "idol," and you will have a state of things much resembling that in virtue of which all the divinities of Olympus, Syria, and Egypt, interchanged courtesies and good offices. In some respects, indeed, this modern toleration exceeds the ancient; Greeks and Romans never seem to have thought that the votaries of Jupiter, Bacchus, and Venns, could really all worship at the same time, in the same temple, and with the same formularies; and still less deemed it an asserted privilege of their religious liberty, not to let it be even clearly known of what deity they were worshippers!

Religious liberty is indeed a most precious and sacred thing, and by it I understand the right of any man, uncoerced, unmolested by his fellows,without bribe or menace, -to form, and manfully avow, his religious opinions, let them be what they

But one of the most precious of the privileges of our new form of liberty is sometimes alleged to be, that, if loss of stipend or position be involved, we need not manfully avow, but may timidly conceal our opinions, or express them with politic ambiguities or subterfuges. What should we think of a political liberty of the like kind? What should we say to a man boasting of his political liberty, who if we asked him, "And what, my friend, are your opinions? with which party do you side? what policy do you advocate?" should rejoin-"Tell you my opinions? You shall not catch me tripping, I promise you. No, it is one of the immunities of my political liberty, to keep all my political opinions to myself." "Why, as to that," you may reply, "it is an equal privilege of political slavery also." Surely this curious sort of liberty is the genuine product of those same views which dictated the saying ascribed to M. Talleyrand and to so many more, "That the tongue was given us, not to express but to conceal our thoughts." But this liberty sometimes goes further.

In Dutch, and Freuch, and German churches, we find men who have written books on the very model of M. Renan's, who reject every shred of the miraculous history of Christ, and every one of the characteristic doctrines of Christianity, yet asserting, and their compatriots echoing, their right to retain their professorial chairs and pulpits. But the toleration which it implies is a good deal like appeal be to Miracles, the answer often is:-"Oh, the toleration of the ancient polytheists.

The combination, in Christianity, of a claim to authoritative truth and undivided allegiance, and of an absolute prohibition of all application of force in its propagation,-leaving its rewards and punishments alike to a future state of existence, -forms one of the many peculiar traits which discriminate this religion from others of acknowledged human origin. The toleration of the ancient world, so far as it existed, mainly depended on the recognition of many co-ordinate deities, and on the theory that one religious system might be as good as another. When a religion, like Mahometanism, denied this, and made exclusive pretensions to authority, then coercion and persecution were appealed to.

For similar reasons, when human nature proceeds to remodel, or in other words, corrupt Christianity, it rends asunder the two elements thus peculiarly conjoined, and either affirms with our forefathers, that persecution is the complement of exclusive claims to allegiance, or denies, with too many in the present day, that exclusive claims can consist with perfect toleration, and that a repudiation of such claims is the complement of religious freedom. But the statute-book of Christianity distinctly affirms both the elements in question: and it is one of the evidences that it is not of human origin, that in this, as in so many other respects, it is discriminated from the religious which man has fabricated; and no less from its transformed self, whenever mau remodels it, (as he naturally will), in the direction of his own passions and prejudices.

In truth, it becomes a very interesting question, how it happens that in this, as in so many other points, unsophisticated Christianity, as laid down in the New Testament, is so strongly discriminated from other religions; thereby showing that it is not a religion which man was likely to invent, and affording a strong confirmation of its superhuman origin. It is a point, however, which the opponents of Christianity too generally disregard. They content themselves for the most part with insisting on the fancied resemblances between Christianity and other religions admitted to be of human origin, and therefore infer that this too may have had a similar origin. But it is far more to the purpose, as well as more difficult, to account for the differences. the two chief elements of the philosophical character (according to Bacon), the faculty of seizing analogies and the faculty of discriminating differences, the latter, in the present case, is incomparably the more important. Christianity and other religions, so far forth as they are religions, must have some points of resemblance. The most clumsy counterfeits, the most spurious imitations, must, in order to have any power to deceive at all, have their similarities to what is genuine. The great point is to detect the differences. Now the Christian apologist has much reason to complain of the adversaries of Christianity in this respect. For example, if the every religion has its tales of miracles!" But to say nothing of the character or the historic evidence of the Christian Miracles, as compared with others, has any other religion, except the Jewish, been based on an appeal to miracles? Has any other, on such appeal, procured assent to its claims in the presence of a prejudiced and hostile world? It is easy to account for miraculous stories grafted upon a system which can plead long prescription,-for legends which have grown up gradually amongst its devoted partisans: but what religion, except Christianity, ever successfully appealed to miracles in an historic age, and in the face of such prejudices and hostility as both Jew and Gentile felt towards it? We know that Mahomet declined the test; and the few, like the "French prophets" a century ago, who have attempted anything of the kind, have signally and instantly failed.

Similarly; if reference be made to the great fact of Christ's Resurrection, we are told by M. Renan, "Oh, we see in all ages of the world, multitudes who mistook maniacal hallucinations for divine realities; the illusions of a Bedlamite, or of some petty sect of enthusiasts, are as real to them as the visions of the Apostles were to them." But does the "Bedlamite," or the "petty sect," inaugurate, as M. Renan admits the Apostles did, a new era in the world's history, and give it "a new religious code for humanity?" Do they ever get the world to go mad too? The "Bedlamite" gets nothing but to be shut up in Bedlam, and the petty sect is only laughed at, as hundreds of them have been, and then passes away.

Again; if appeal be made to the extent to which this religion has spread in the face of so mighty obstacles, the answer is, "Oh, every nation and every race has its favourite superstitions, propagates them with avidity, and supports them by its power." But what we want to know is, how it was that this religion set at naught the lines of demarcation between nation and nation, and race and race, intruded its own peculiar doctrines and worship in the place of their cherished superstitions, and found a tongue in every language and a home in every clime?

If appeal be made to the rapidity of the early conquests of Christianity, the answer is:—"Oh, Mohammedanism was equally rapid;" forgetting that the very point of difference is, that Christianity had no force to appeal to, and Mohammedanism achieved its principal conquests by that and by nothing else.

If appeal be made to the morality of Christianity, the auswer is, "Oh, every religion has its morality, which more or less approximates to the truth." But what we want to know is how the ethics of this religion came to differ from the ethics of other religions? how it came to take under its special patronage the passive virtues, the virtues man least loved; to make everything depend upon internal purity, and to set practical morality infinitely above ceremonial observances?

If the appeal be made to the wonderful compositions in which the religion of Christ is consigned to us, the answer is, "Oh, every religion has its sacred books." But the question is, have they exacted from the genius, learning, and culture of the most civilised nations and of the most various races, a millionth part of the homage which these books have done?

And so it is with many other topics of argument. The differences between Christianity and other religions are for the most part left unaccounted for, and ignored. If any man will fairly consider all the differences in the character, history, and effects of Christianity, as compared with religions which have undoubtedly been of human origin, he will then, and then only, appreciate the improbability of its being the work of man; and that inference will be further strengthened if he considers that, when man has innovated upon it, he has (as in the matter of persecution) naturally assimilated it to his own ordinary handiwork, thereby giving additional proof how little it was likely to come from him.

A GLIMPSE OF SHEPHERD-LIFE IN NEW ZEALAND.

I AM a New Zealand shepherd. But if, gentle reader, this should convey to your mind the idea of a rural swain reclining on a mossy bank, his woolly charge spread "o'er the gowan lea," or gravely chewing their cud in the shade of a wide-spreading oak, while the notes of his oaten reed float on the still noontide air; or of a smock-frocked, mittened, and comforted grandfather, on a cold frosty morning, shifting hurdles and filling troughs in a turnip-field, you are mistaken. If you will accompany me in imagination on a two or three hours' walk, I will try to give you some idea of New Zealand shepherding and New Zealand scenery. You agree? Well, the time is early morn in summer; the scene my flowly cot. The prospect from my door is very contracted, though very different to English scenery; steep, rough hills rise on every side within half a mile, their upper parts all hidden this morning by a dense fog. Breakfast is over; the plate, pannikin, knife, and fork, are washed, and put on the shelf; the floor is swept, and the fire is covered up; the bread is set for baking on my return; the dogs are loosed, and the puppy is chained up; my glass is slung over my shoulder, my dog-call fastened to a button-hole, and I pull the door close by the greenhide strap, and the bobbin jerks down, then jumps up; it is fast, and I am off.

Away I go, across the small flat by the Manuka grove, Ned and Fly skipping and jumping in advance, poor puppy crying, because he is not big enough to go too; and I take a passing look at my thriving potatoes, cabbages, and onions, and pluck a sprig of wall-flower for a nosegay. Away round the bend, across the creek, and behind the kuoll; and now for the long, long pull up the steep side of Ben-Moor, the top of which is at present invisible; but, at this time of the year, the sun generally dispels the fog in the course of the morning. So, expecting that it will soon clear away, up I go, and the lower edge of the fog is soon reached. Here I pause for a breath-and it is so strange to look along the level bottom of the fog, it appears like the ceiling of a great room. Onward and upward again, right into the fog, and the lower world becomes indistinct, and then disappears. And now, having nothing to look at but the grey, steamy-looking mist, I fall into a brown study, and think about old friends far away, about old times, and the dear "old country;" and am startled out of my reverie by an equally startled wether, who sniffs

the air, and rushes away into the mist. Onward and upward I proceed, still in the fog; but I know the way now along the steep sideling and over the saddle, and up again. But it begins to brighten, and now the sun peeps through; not that the fog is clearing away yet, but I am getting above it; and now I emerge into the clear bright sunshine, and the summit is in view. Another hundred yards of climbing yet; but, cheered by the sight of the morning sunlight, I climb faster; my blood rushes with increased speed through my veins; my breathing is quickened, and, inhaling more of the pure bracing mountain-air, my spirits are raised, my mind is exhilarated. I feel as if under the influence of laughing-gas; I feel inclined to shout and sing; thoughts and ideas, new and striking, rush rapidly and involuntarily through my mind. Had I but an audience, I could electrify it with my eloquence! Had I but an amanuensis, I could dictate, faster than he could write, words which would immortalise me! Oh! ye poor slaves of the pen who apply to the bottle for inspiration, dash it to the ground! and, if you lack words or ideas, rush out into the bright morning air, climb the steep mountain-side with your tablets in your pockets, and there you will find thoughts and ideas original and noble, views broad and profound, and words which will reach the hearts, and convince the judgment of your fellow-men.

But the summit is gained; aud, standing there, I gaze on a scene which to be appreciated must be seen. I seem to stand upon an island, small, steep, and rugged; but oh! what a sea around! If the great ocean were, in the midst of a storm, to be suddenly frozen into pure white snow, with every foam-capped billow left standing, erect and motionless, it would well represent the scene around my mountain island. The upper surface is, on the whole, as level as a water-surface. Other mountains protrude their broken and jagged peaks or rounded brows above the snowy sea, and appear round each of these, filling in the hollows in their sides, and, wrapping round the spurs, always maintains a uniform height; and the surface appears in the distance much more clearly defined than close at hand, which helps the illusion, and thus "distance lends enchantment to the view." I should scarcely be surprised to see a silver canoe, with paddles of pearl, and carrying fairy forms, shoot out from behind one of the islands!

But, though such a bright scene of sunshiny desolation surrounds me, though the mountain-tops stand silent and immovable as ever, and the rollers on my aërial ocean roll not, yet sounds various and familiar strike on my ear. The dense pall, which hides the lower world from my view, does not prevent me from hearing the warbling, screaming, and cackling of a thousand birds in the bush down the hill-side. I hear, too, the occasional velp of a dog, and the crowing of a cock at the home-station, the cracking of the bullock-driver's whip, and the hammer of the carpenter, who is building a new shearing-shed, -and, away to the left, inland, the bleating of the sheep, and the murmuring of the river: and, to the right, the hoarse constant roar of the sea, as it breaks on the rock-bound coast. Farther away to the extreme right round the bay, there is a still louder roar, for the surf is always high, and for miles and miles the beach is sand and shingle, and the rollers come in in regular unbroken lines, and the whole length breaks at once on the beach with a roar like thunder, and then all is silent till another follows. The sound of this mighty, ceaseless, endless pulse-beating of the ocean, I find it impossible to describe, as I know of nothing with which to compare it; it being the most tremendous and terrible sound I ever heard. But whoever has lain in bed within a mile of it, and listened to it throughout the livelong night, when a storm was raging, will never forget it. But while I am trying to describe things indescribable, the scene around me is changing. Old Sol is asserting his supremacy over King Fog. I know only of one scene more splendid than the one I have tried to describe; and that is, when the fog gradually clears away, and admits to view the glorious panorama spread below. First, through a shapeless vista in the breaking mist, I catch a momentary view of a fragment of the coast, with the white water washing among the rocks, and the dark-green Karaka trees extending to the water's edge. That vista is closed, but through another I catch a glimpse of the further shore of a tidal lagoon, and, on the top of the bank, a Maori hut. A third shows to me a part of the home-station on the plain, and some scraps of fences; another a large patch of the deep blue sea, and the distant horizon. But new scenes and wider views are bursting on my sight, faster than I can describe them. The fog is breaking up into huge masses; smaller ones disengage themselves, and, wandering alone, soon vanish in thiu air. I watch one mass of vapour like other islands; and the fog, clinging closely just in front of me. It already becomes smaller-but not through distance, for it is almost motionless -it becomes less dense: the outer corners disappear. I can now see through any part of it: it gets more and more filmy and transparent: it is going, going-it has gone! And now all is clear and bright, and, from my lofty position, I can take a bird's-eye view of the glorious prospect of river, plain, and ocean, which lies below. The bullockteam is slowly erecping along the beach for firewood; a horseman is coming in the opposite direction; the boy is turning the cows out of the stockvard, and old Joe is earrying two buckets of milk up to the house; a small steamer is passing about a mile from the shore, hugging the rocks as near as she dare to shorten the distance. Farther out in the offing, is a topsail schooner, which has evidently a stronger breeze than we have here. Some one is now about to cross the lagoon from the homestation: my glass will tell me who they are. I thought so. It is the overseer and his wife going over to the garden in the small boat, which he is so proud of having built himself. And Mrs. H---'s favourite puppy, Shot, wants to follow, but dares not, and runs along the water's edge, looking for a dry road across: while the overseer's two old veteran sheep-dogs, Bob and Cobbler, prefer lying in the sun on the top of the bank, waiting their master's return, to wetting themselves with a loug swim to follow him. A canoe, laden with Maories, with their dogs and spears, is lazily paddling along towards the upper end of the lagoon; the men on a pig-hunting excursion, and the women to work in their gardens. One Maori woman is off to the beach for shell-fish, and old Waitai is mending his fences, as usual. A mob of goats, belonging to Dicky Prouse, the old whaler (who, with his old Maori wife, lives along the beach, just round "the point"), are grazing on the hill-side; and higher up are a few detached mobs of sheep.

Looking away to the "sou-west" with my glass, I can just discern the snow-capped Kaikara mountains on the next island. Looking iuland, I see nought but hills behind hills, alps rise on alps, and other alps beyond. Looking more closely on the nearer hills and spurs, which I know so well, I see the sheep drawing down their accustomed tracks in single file, looking in the sunshine like strings of pearls: which reminds me that I, Dan, the shepherd, must cease for awhile to expatiate on the beauties of Nature, and try, with the assistance of my two canine servants, to get hold of a small mob of wethers, and take them to the home-station; or the cook will be short of mutton for to-morrow's dinner. This is easier said than done; for "steep and rough is old Ben-Moor," and the sheep are very determined, cunning, and swift. But, fortunately, Ned is far more cunning, I am quite as determined, and Fly is equally swift. So, if you will take my glass, and sit for the next hour where we have been sitting the last, I think you will see me make them prisoners in the yard, at the corner of the paddock. Then, when I have had a bit of dinner, and a yarn with the cook, you may see me trudging up the hill-side, en route for my "ware," driving up the sheep from the river-side as I go along, my daily occupation just now being to prevent the sheep from crossing the river. If you take a look into my hut a few hours later, you may see me take out of the camp-oven such a nice loaf of bread, But I am afraid it may be a little burnt, while I am scribbling nonsense about oceans in the air, and giving gratuitous advice to dissipated authors.

DANIEL BAYLISS.

RUTH THORNBURY; OR, THE OLD MAID'S STORY.

BY WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis," &c.

CHAPTER VIIL.—MR. MORECOMBE SUCCEEDS IN HIS SUIT.

THE day following Charity's confession to her sister that Mr. Morecombe had made her an offer, a letter was brought to Mr. Thornbury by private hand. Although the person who delivered it was a stranger, the young ladies instantly guessed from whom it came, and also what were its contents. After the lapse of an hour, during which the parents had read it over and conversed together on its contents, the sisters were sent for to come into their father's room. They felt somewhat nervous, and for some moments after they entered, a dead silence prevailed, which was broken by Mr. Thornbury intimating that their friend Mr. Morecombe had written to request that he might be allowed to become a suitor for Charity's hand. Although he (Mr. Thornbury) would strougly insist on his right as parent to put his veto on such a proposition should he consider it necessary, at the same time he wished to ascertain what were Charity's own feelings on the subject, as in case she objected he would immediately put a stop to any further correspondence with Mr. Morecombe.

It was indeed a painful as well as puzzling moment for the girl. Had she followed the bent of her own inclination, probably she would have answered that she was much pleased at receiving the addresses of so brilliant, gentlemanly, and handsome a man as Mr. Morecombe, one who, she felt assured, was actuated by the highest feeling of honour. But as such an avowal would have been a breach of propriety on the part of a young lady of a well-regulated mind, she remained for some moments undecided what to answer. At last, and evidently with considerable effort, she stammered out, "Just as you and mamma please."

Mr. Thornbury, with his obtuse male wit, hardly considered this answer sufficiently definite, and pressed her for a more explicit one; but his wife, who had far more penetration in matters of the kind, coolly said to him, "You may go on, my dear; the answer our dear Charity has given us is quite sufficient."

An expression of surprise passed over Mr. Thornbury's face at these words, but he made no remark.

"I must say, my dear children," continued Mr. Thornbury, "that the spirit in which Mr. Morecombe's letter is written is perfectly in accordance with the high estimation in which I hold him, both as a man and a gentleman. That I may satisfy myself fully as to his character and respectability, he has thought it better to absent himself for a few days, and with that intention he has made a journey to London, to wait there with intense anxiety an answer to his letter. Now, my dears, as I said before, I have a great respect for Mr. Morecombe, but at the same time I admit that I am not sufficiently acquainted with him to give a decided answer without making further inquiries. The question now before us is, what steps we had better take, so as to obtain the information without in any way hurting his feelings."

"I quite agree with you, my dear," said Mrs. Thornbury, "but might it not be very unpleasant for him to answer by letter questions connected with his family and his affairs? I think perhaps the better plan would be for you to invite him to the house, and then you could talk over the matter."

After a great deal of conversation on the subject, in which Ruth took but little part, and Charity none whatever, it was at last decided that he should be invited to the house. A draught of the letter to be written having been agreed on, the family separated, and the girls retired to their room.

"I think papa and mamma have entertained Mr. Morecombe's offer in a very kind and sensible manner," remarked Ruth, when they were alone.

Charity, who was evidently out of humour, made no reply, but stood at the window, with her back to her sister, apparently absorbed in watching the rooks on the elm tree before her, and pretending not to have heard Ruth's remark.

"I do not think," continued Ruth, "that they could have adopted a more delicate way of inquiring into his family affairs."

"Indeed!" said Charity, turning round somewhat angrily to her sister; "I should like to know what need there is for making any inquiries at all? I am sure his family is quite as good as our own."

"Very probably," said Ruth, mildly; "but for all that, it is only prudent on papa's part to insist on knowing something more about him, especially when your happiness is at stake."

"My happiness!" said Charity, with a slight sneer. "Do you think it will be increased by your annoying him with impertinent questions? I can judge of people as quickly and correctly as any of you, and I am certain a more honourable man does not exist. Make inquiries about him, indeed!"

"Now, Charity, my dear, do be reasonable," said Ruth, in a conciliating tone. "Papa is acting in the matter solely with a view to your welfare."

"If you think so," said Charity, sharply, "pray try to persuade papa not to send that letter."

Poor Ruth! she had no experience in matters of the kind, but she knew that to argue against a young girl in the flush of her first love, would be attended with no good result. She therefore wisely dropped the conversation, and resolved to wait patiently until her sister should be in a better temper.

The letter was dispatched to Mr. Morecombe as agreed on, and three days afterwards he made his appearance at the Red House. He was received by Mr. Thornbury in the library, and the door was closed upon them. After a short conversation on general matters, Mr. Thornbury, with some nervousness in his manner, indirectly advanced to the subject they had met to converse on.

"I hope your uncle is quite well?" he began.

"Thank you," said Mr. Morecombe, "but I am sorry to say the state of his health is far from satisfactory. When I was in London, I received a letter which stated that he wished to see me as soon as possible on matters of importance, and I am afraid I sent a somewhat clumsy excuse. I would willingly have obliged him, for I have a great respect for the old gentleman, but strong as that wish was I was too anxious to know the reply to the proposal I had sent to you, to think of other matters. I must not, however, delay my visit to him much longer; after the kindnesses I have received from him, it would be impolitic as well as ungrateful on my part."

"I think you would do wisely to pay him an early visit," said Mr. Thornbury. "At his time of life, and in his state of health—if for no other reasons—it would be wrong to offend him. But now let us speak on matters more immediately concerning ourselves. I received your letter as you are aware; and I will candidly admit, whatever may be the result, that I felt complimented by its contents. But at the same time, I am sure you will excuse me, if, as Charity's father, and having her interest at heart, I put some questions to you touching your prospects and the state of your finances."

"I will answer truthfully, and without the slightest hesitation, every question you may be pleased to put to me," said Mr. Morecombe. "Pray do not feel the least reserve about that."

"In the first place," said Mr. Thornbury, "it is a duty incumbent on me to ascertain what means you may have for supporting a wife. I will not disguise from you that I am not a wealthy man, although neither am I a poor one. I understand you have, unfortunately, no profession."

"I am sorry to say I have not," replied Mr. Morecombe. "When very young I held a commission in the army, but owing to a dispute with my commanding officer (in which, I unhesitatingly admit, I was to blame) I left the service; and since that time, I regret to say, I have not adopted any other profession. You see I am frank, for I believe it is better to tell you all than to conceal anything from you. My present meaus I am sorry to say are not large. I have an income of about four hundred a year arising from some improved rents of houses in London. If, however, this security is not of the most eligible description, it has at least one good quality—the rents are all paid regularly; I have not a tenant a single quarter in arrears."

"Are the houses held on long leases?" inquired

Mr. Thornbury.

"I am sorry to say they are not; in fact, I do not think they have more than twenty years to run; but they will certainly last longer than my uncle's life; and then I conscientiously believe I shall inherit more than fifteen hundred a year. I am his heir, and the only relation he has in the world. He and I are all that are left of a formerly numerous family. If you would like a fuller description of the house property, I shall be happy at any time to place the particulars before you; I wish, as I have said, to conceal nothing from you."

"Thank you," said Mr. Thornbury; "perhaps on some future occasion I will speak to you again on the subject. Let me now ask you another question. Does your uncle know of your wish to marry Charity? It would be better, I think, that he should be acquainted with your intention, as I should of course like to have his consent to the match."

"At present he knows nothing whatever about it," replied Mr. Morecombe, "and that is another reason I have for wishing to pay him a visit. It is better that I should inform him of it myself than that he should hear of it from a stranger, as it is possible he might conjure up objections which I could dispel without any difficulty were I beside him. He is, I can assure you, very eccentric, as you might easily discover if you were to make inquiries respecting him. Do you know any one in Devonshire?"

"Not a soul," said Mr. Thornbury.

"Because if you were acquainted with anyone in the neighbourhood of St. Blaise, near Exeter, you might hear some droll-enough anecdotes about old Squire Jacob Morecombe. I propose going down to see him in a fortnight, and if you would write to him, say about a week after my departure, informing him of my contemplated marriage, I will have him fully prepared for the intelligence, and I have not the slightest doubt as to the result."

"Very well," said Mr. Thornbury. "Now let me speak to you about Charity's expectations, that you may not be disappointed afterwards in that matter. As I told you before, I am far from being a rich man, and my child will bring with her but a small dowry. Charity has five hundred pounds of her own, which she inherited from her grandmother. To that sum I shall add fifteen hundred more, making in all two thousand pounds. Until my death, there is not the slightest prospect of her receiving more."

"I beg to assure you," said Mr. Morecombe, with an expression of great satisfaction, "that it is more than I expected. Believe me, I should have been perfectly satisfied if she had not had a shilling. It is herself I desire, and not her fortune."

"I am pleased to hear you say so. Now let me ask you another question: When you are married, where do you propose to reside? I am devotedly attached to my child, and I should wish that, if possible, she should live near me."

"And I sincerely desire it too," said Mr. Morecombe. "What I should like would be to find a convenient house, with about forty or fifty acres of grazing land, as near you as possible. We might live on it in a strictly economical manner until the death of my uncle. Afterwards my great ambition would be to buy some snug estate and farm it myself, as I have a great wish to become an agriculturist."

The conversation continued for some time longer in the same satisfactory strain. At last the interview was concluded, and Mr. Morecombe joined the young ladies, who had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that Mr. Thornbury had given him a favourable reception, so strongly was satisfaction expressed on his countenance. After a short time Ruth pleaded some excuse and left the room. It is unnecessary to go over in detail what passed between the lovers during Ruth's absence; suffice it to say, that when she again made her appearance, she found them sitting beside each other in a most amicable manner. After a moment of somewhat awkward silence, Charity said to her sister,—

"See, Ruth, dear, what a beautiful present Mr. Morecombe has made me!" at the same time, holding out her arm, on which was a bracelet of considerable value.

This remark seemed to set all parties at their ease, and they conversed together for the remainder of the morning with perfect self-possession. When Mrs. Thornbury descended to the drawing-room shortly before dinner was announced, she gave Mr. Morecombe a most friendly reception, and told him she should always be happy to see him. He certainly profited by this invitation, for until he left the neighbourhood for his uncle's, he was a daily visitor at the Red House.

It would be doing Mr. Thornbury an injustice to imagine that we have here set down all the conversation which took place between himself and Mr. Morecombe in the library. Mr. Morecombe had, unasked, placed in the hands of Mr. Thornbury a list of the houses in London from which he derived his income. The latter at once wrote to his solicitor, requesting him to make full inquiries as to the nature of the property and the validity of Mr. Morecombe's title to it. In a few days he received a most satisfactory reply. All the tenants were of a very respectable class, and at once acknowledged Mr. Morecombe as their landlord.

Mr. Thornbury was hardly so successful in his inquiries about old Squire Jacob Morccombe, as he knew of no one in Devonshire to whom he could write on the subject. After Mr. Morecombe had been with his uncle about a week, Mr. Thornbury wrote to the Squire, as had been suggested, and very soon received a most satisfactory reply. The letter was well worded, but rather badly written. He assured Mr. Thornbury that, though he could not be present at the wedding, owing to his infirmities, the young couple would have his sincere wishes for their future welfare, and the letter wound up with a promise that he would forward to Charity, by his nephew, a trifling present, which he begged she would accept as a pledge of his affection and esteem.

In due time Mr. Morecombe returned, bringing with him the old gentleman's present. Charity could scarcely restrain her delight, when, on opening the little packet, she found it contained a magnificent pair of diamond earrings. All were much pleased with the gift, and it contributed not a little to raise in their minds an exalted idea of the old Squire's wealth. Everything now progressed in the smoothest and most satisfactory manner, and the more the Thornburys saw of Mr. Morecombe, the more they liked him.

Fortunately, his love for his affianced bride, though great, was quite compatible with the exercise of considerable foresight. To do him justice, he was indefatigable in his endeavours to find a suitable house in the immediate neighbourhood. He was, moreover, greatly assisted in the search by Ruth and Edgar. At last they found one to let which appeared in every way eligible. It was a handsome cottage, in good repair, ready for immediate occupation, and surrounded by about forty acres of meadow land. True, it was more than two miles from the Red House, but the road being good, the distance was of comparatively little importance. The house having been decided upon, the task of furnishing was vigorously gone into.

It now wanted but three weeks to the weddingday, and the whole of the female portion of the Red House establishment was in a state of intense excitement. Frequent indeed were the visits which Charity and Ruth made to the town, and numerous were their purchases. Dressmakers were incessantly calling, and many were the secret meetings which were held with closed doors to consider, and discuss, and arrange points of difficulty as to wedding dress and costume. Mr. Thornbury was in part to blame for this, for he had resolved that his dear daughter should be provided with an outfit worthy of her, and he placed a most liberal sum at her disposal for that purpose. The preparations progressed in a perfectly satisfactory manner, everything being in readiness two days before the time.

When the wedding-day arrived, the ceremony passed off in a very satisfactory manner, Ruth acting as bridesmaid, and Edgar as best man. And Mr. Morecombe led from the altar of the parish church as beautiful and amiable a bride as had ever stood before it.

CHAPTER IX. -- CHARITY IN HER OWN HOME.

The newly-married pair, after spending their honeymoon in Paris, returned to England, and took up their abode at Elm Lodge, their new residence. Charity had had but little experience in the management of an establishment, but she became, after a little practice, a very excellent housekeeper. No small portion of her success, however, was due to the assistance she received from her sister Ruth, who was an almost daily visitor.

Although things appeared to go on smoothly enough at the Red House, there existed great cause for anxiety in Mr. Thornbury's mind. As we have said, he had promised to give fifteen hundred pounds as a wedding portion to Charity; and he faithfully kept his word. He had, however, experienced some difficulty in raising the money, and had had to mortgage one of his remaining farms to nearly half its value, thereby diminishing, to a very considerable extent, his own already straitened income by the payment of heavy interest on the money borrowed. The future career of Edgar was also a source of great embarrassment to him. From want of means he was unable to send him to college, or to start him in any profession; and the poor young fellow (sorely against his own inclination, for he had no lack of natural energy) remained loafing about at home, without any occupation, though fortunately keeping out of mischief. He frequently implored his father to find him some employment, no matter of what description, as he had a strong aversion to idleness; and Mr. Thornbury always promised that he would take the subject into his serious consideration. The difficult question, however, always arose as to the manner in which the necessary funds were to be obtained; and so many obstacles arose that the subject was invariably dismissed without any definite arrangement having been made. time of agricultural distress also came on, and more than one of the tenants were in arrears of rent, and it was exceedingly difficult to obtain even the money required for keeping up the establishment at the Red House on the most economical footing.

At the Lodge everything progressed favourably, and a happier couple than Mr. and Mrs. Morecombe it would have been difficult to find. True, Charity's husband was frequently away on business matters, but of what description his wife did not clearly understand. As, however, he rarely remained from home more than two or three days at a time, his absence did not cause her any uneasiness.

Before the end of a year, Mrs. Morecombe became the mother of a fine boy. The infant was christened Walter, after its father. Mr. Thornbury was one of the godfathers, and Ruth was godmother. She, at least, resolved that the office should not be an honorary title merely. Charity, after her confinement, rapidly recovered, and an admirable young mother she made. The arrival of the little stranger was a source of great joy to the whole family. The grandfather and grandmother seemed pleased with increased attention and affection, to assuage the evident sorrow of her sister.

That night Ruth did not sleep; so great was her anxiety about Charity. The behaviour of the mau who had so pertinaciously insisted on seeing either Mr. or Mrs. Morecombe, had certainly somewhat puzzled her; but her uneasiness went far beyond anything his visit, taken by itself, could have occasioned. Without being able to account for the suspicion, she felt certain that her sister was at the time suffering under some great affliction. Again and again she attempted to drive away the presentiment, but in vain. At last she could endure the suspense no longer, and resolved to return the next morning to Elm Lodge, and satisfy herself whether any real cause existed for the anxiety she felt about her sister.

At the breakfast-table Ruth was silent and reserved. She answered dutifully enough the questions put to her by her father and mother respecting what had taken place at the Lodge during her visit; but she started no subject of conversation herself. In fact she felt somewhat embarrassed as to how she could break to Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury her desire to return to the Lodge, after so long an absence from home. She could see how glad her father and mother were to have her with them again, and she felt it would almost be an act of cruelty to leave them so soon. Still the wish to visit Charity was dominant, and she could not overcome it.

A circumstance soon occurred which relieved her from the difficulty. Before they had finished breakfast, a little cow-boy, who was employed at the Lodge, brought a letter from Charity. Ruth hastily opened it, and read as follows to her father and mother:—

"Dearest Ruth,—Pray come and see me immediately, as I wish particularly to consult you about a letter I have just received from Mr. Morecombe.

"Ever your affectionate sister, Charity."

Although the letter had nothing alarming in it, Ruth clearly saw from the handwriting that her sister had been greatly agitated at the time. She made no remark as to that, however; but folding up the letter, placed it in her pocket, and left the breakfast-table to prepare to go to her sister's.

On arriving at the Lodge, great was her surprise when the door was opened for her by the strange man of the day before. He had evidently not left the house since his arrival, and now appeared perfectly at home in it. He held a pipe in one hand, and, pointing with it to the parlour-door, said,—

"Mrs. Morecombe is upstairs, you had better go in and sit down. I dare say she will not be long."

Instead of doing as she was requested, Ruth stood as if petrified, and gazed at the man with surprise; of which, however, he took not the slightest notice.

"You had better go in," he continued, "and rest yourself a little; I dare say you feel tired."

Ruth for a moment longer remained motionless; but hearing her sister's footstep rapidly descending the stairs, she mechanically obeyed the man. Charity followed the moment after, and closed the door.

A glance at her sister's face at once told Ruth that some terrible misfortune had befallen her. As soon as they were alone, Charity rushed into the arms of her sister, who clasped her to her breast; but neither for awhile uttered a word. At last Ruth said,

"Charity, who is that strange-looking man in the hall?"

"I don't know what you would call him," she said; "he has been sent here by the landlord to seize our furniture for the rent which is owing."

"For the rent owing?" inquired Ruth, in a tone of great surprise. "You surely do not mean that the rent of the house has not been paid?"

"No, dear, I am sorry to say it has not; and there is now more than a year due."

"Charity," said Ruth, reproachfully, "why have you not told me this before? You knew I would have assisted you if I could."

"Because, my dear, Mr. Morecombe has always been in the hope of receiving money; and, besides, he strictly desired that I should not mention the state of his affairs to anyone. I have often wished to inform you, but I dared not disobey him."

"Sit down, dear," said Ruth, to her weeping sister, "and dry your tears; we must now talk over the matter calmly, and see what can be done. How long will this man remain in the house before the furniture is sold? My reason for asking is this: I wish, if possible, to keep the affair from papa's ears; and, if there is time enough, I should like to write up to Loudon, to sell out some of my funds there, and so pay the amount without its being bruited about the neighbourhood."

"My dear Ruth," said her sister, "it would be useless your doing anything of the kind. The man in possession has informed me that, besides the rent owing, he heard that there was a bill of sale on the furniture—and that, if the rent were paid to-morrow, the furniture would be seized for the other debt. Ruth, you have not heard all, and I have not the courage to tell you. I have this morning," she continued, "received this letter from Mr. Morecombe. Read it, and then tell me whether I have not cause to be unhappy."

Charity here placed the letter in Ruth's hand, who was horrified at its contents. It appeared to be the production of an utterly reckless and ruined man. He told his wife that it was perfectly uscless to disguise matters longer—he had lost everything, and had not now a shilling in the world. Things, for some time past, had been going rapidly from bad to worse with him, and if she did not obtain some assistance from her father, it would be impossible for him to return home, as judgment had been taken out against him for more than one debt, and the bailiffs were already on his track.

After Ruth had read the letter, she remained for some time silent, while Charity wept bitterly. At last Ruth broke the silence with,— "Charity, my dear, this is certainly terrible; but I implore you to tell me the whole truth. How has Mr. Morecombe lost the money he received with you?"

"I can hardly tell you, Ruth. Indeed I cannot," she continued, noticing a strong expression of incredulity on her sister's face; "but——" here she hesitated for a moment, "I greatly fear it has been in some way connected with horse-racing."

"What makes you think so?"

"From his acquaintances being almost all on the turf, as they call it, and the numerous races he has left home to attend. But understand me, he has always been most reserved to me about money matters, and I never inquired into them, fearing that my suspicion of his being addicted to gambling would turn out correct."

"What can we possibly do?" said Ruth, now almost in despair. "I don't like to tell my father, lest he should become the fellow's victim: for I clearly see he is too bad a man to spare any one."

The sisters were again for some minutes silent— Ruth being evidently absorbed in thought.

"Charity," she said at last, "objectionable as the plan is, I see but one way by which we can get out of this difficulty; and that is, to place the state of Mr. Morecombe's affairs before my father, and ask him if he can assist us. His health for some time past has been so very infirm that I fear the shock may have a very bad effect upon him. It cannot, however, be avoided; he must hear it sooner or later; and it is just as well to let him know of it now, as when it may probably be too late for him to help us. As soon as I return home I will tell him all."

The news of Mr. Morecombe's ruin was a terrible blow to Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury—the more so, as it was totally unexpected. As may naturally be supposed, Mr. Thornbury was highly indignant at the conduct of his son-in-law; for Ruth had told him all without the slightest reservation. At first he resolved on offering his house as an asylum to his daughter and her children, resolving, at the same time, that he would never speak to Mr. Morecombe again. On second thoughts, however, he relinquished the idea as impracticable. He wrote a letter to Charity, saying, that in the present state of his affairs it was impossible for him to ward off the sale of her furniture, and that she had better immediately leave Elm Lodge in charge of the man in possession, and, with her children, take up her abode at the Red House. He added, that if her husband thought fit to accompany her after what had happened, he would also be received, though it was impossible for him (Mr. Thornbury) to give him the same welcome that he had hitherto done.

The letter being concluded, Ruth was despatched, with instructions to return home as soon as possible with her sister and the children. Mr. Thornbury also forwarded a sufficient sum of money by Ruth, to pay the servants their wages, and whatever little debts might be owing in the neighbourhood. A few hours afterwards poor Charity, with her two infants, returned home to her parents, utterly destitute, with the exception of a few clothes she had brought with her. Sad, indeed, was the meeting between Mr. and Mrs. Thornbury and their child; still, they did all in their power to console her, and made her as comfortable as her unhappy circumstances would allow. In the evening, Edgar (who had been absent for a few days, on a visit to a young friend in the neighbourhood) returned home, and was naturally much surprised to hear what had taken place. He expressed himself in very strong terms at the conduct of his unworthy brother-in-law. When he heard that his father had given Mr. Morecombe permission to reside at the Red House again, the language he made use of was hardly accordant with the respect due from a son to his father; and a violent altercation took place between them. Mrs. Thornbury and Ruth, assisted by Charity, attempted to pour oil on the troubled waters-but without success. The anger of both, when they separated for the night, was unabated; and Edgar declared, in spite of the entreaties of his mother and sisters, that the moment Mr. Morecombe put his foot under that roof, he would leave it, never to return.

CHAPTER X.—MR. MORECOMBE STARTS IN BUSINESS ON HIS OWN ACCOUNT.

IF Mr. Thornbury had concluded that his son-inlaw would abstain from joining Charity at the Red House, he was grievously mistaken. Delicacy was by no means one of that gentleman's weaknesses; and without the slightest hesitation he accepted Mr. Thornbury's very qualified invitation. soon as he made his appearance, Edgar Thornbury, true to the threat he had made, left home, and took up his abode at the house of the young friend already alluded to. At first Mr. Morecombe's behaviour was of the most penitent and subdued description. He submitted with great resignation to Mr. Thornbury's anger; and with all the persuasive eloquence he was master of, he attempted to win over Ruth to his cause. He saw very little of Mrs. Thornbury, as her asthma, added to the shock of Charity's return in so destitute a condition, had thrown her on a bed of sickness, to which she was confined for several weeks. As far as Ruth was concerned, his attempts to regain her good opinion were a failure. Whenever he spoke to her she replied with great civility, and without the slightest anger, but her answers were always laconic, and she never on any occasion commenced a conversation with him.

But if Ruth was inexorable, not so Mr. Thornbury. Mr. Morecombe possessed to perfection one accomplishment of the swindler—plausibility; and he now used it with great tact and skill. He commenced operations by frequently expressing his regret at the disordered state of his affairs, and the unhappy habit of gambling he had been insensibly drawn into.

"I am not naturally a gambler," he would say;

"no man indeed can have greater objections to the habit than I have, and nothing shall ever induce me to make another bet-still, when a man commences running down hill, it is very difficult for him to stop himself just at the moment he wishes. I began playing merely for amusement, and for some years never staked more than I could conveniently pay, if I lost. In consequence, however, of a heavy bad debt I made before my uncle's death, I became in a very slight degree embarrassed, and when I found myself disappointed in receiving money at his decease, I made some heavy bets in the hope of retrieving myself, and lost again. Ill-fortune ever afterwards followed me, and at last I became a ruined man. Believe me, if you only knew half the misery and anxiety I have suffered lately, much and justly as you now blame me, you would pity me still more."

Mr. Thornbury-notwithstanding the discrepancies he could not fail to detect in Mr. Morecombe's description of his expectations on his uncle's death-listened with considerable sympathy; probably looking back to a certain episode in his own life, previous to his marriage. He began now to admit that there might be some excuse for his son-in-law. Mr. Morecombe was too good a tactician not to perceive the favourable impression he had made, and determined to follow it up. He gradually introduced the subject of his affairs to Mr. Thornbury; and often wished he could have the opportunity of starting in some respectable line of business. He would thereby maintain himself and his wife and family in independence and respectability.

"But in the present disordered state of your affairs," said Mr. Thornbury, one day, when his sonin-law had brought forward the subject, "how is it possible for you to enter into business? I presume you have many debts still unpaid; and with these hanging over your head, all you earned would go to the benefit of your creditors."

"That is unfortunately the case," he replied; "still, if I had a little ready money, I could easily effect a compromise."

"In what way?" asked Mr. Thornbury.

"I have already been in communication with my creditors about it," said Mr. Morecombe; "I owe in all about two thousand pounds, and a compensation of five shillings in the pound would be accepted. If I could pay that sum, and have a little over to start with, I am convinced I should be able to make my way in business."

"In what line would you propose to start?" inquired Mr. Thornbury.

"As a commission agent. It requires but little capital, and the profits are very great. From the vast number of acquaintances I have, I am persuaded I could easily form a good connection."

"And what amount would you require beyond the money necessary to compromise with your

"One thousand pounds would be ample," said

Mr. Morecombe. "I should take a small house in the suburbs of London, and furnish it cheaply; and with one room as an office in the city, I could do well enough. I should, of course, have to pay good interest on the money advanced, but the profits which would accrue from my business I am certain would easily allow me to do that, and also leave me a handsome surplus—more, in fact, than would be necessary for the maintenance of my wife and family."

Although the conversation then dropped, the scheme proposed by Mr. Morecombe made a strong impression on the miud of his father-in-law. He referred to it more than once afterwards, and on each occasion Mr. Morecombe painted the advantages likely to accrue from a speculation of the kind in still more glowing colours than on the previous one. At last Mr. Thornbury began to think seriously whether it would not be advantageous to assist Mr. Morecombe to carry out his plan; and one day he asked him what amount of interest he would give if he advanced the money.

"I am a poor man myself," said Mr. Thornbury, "and I should have to raise the money. Moreover, I could not afford to diminish the small income I now have. If I assist you, therefore, it must be entirely as a matter of business between us."

"And I would accept the advance on no other terms," said Mr. Morecombe; "the obligations I am already under to you are too great to allow me to accept another—especially one which might in the slightest manner injure you in a pecuniary point of view. I should propose to pay you eight per cent. for the fifteen hundred pounds, and I can assure you that the interest on that amount should be paid as regularly as the bank dividends."

After mature deliberation, the weak-minded man agreed to advance the required sum to his son-inlaw. To do this, he was obliged to sell one of his remaining farms (he had but one now, besides that which was mortgaged), for which he received three thousand pounds. After setting aside the money promised to his son-in-law, he invested the remainder in government securities.

When Edgar heard of t

When Edgar heard of this arrangement, his anger knew no bounds. He was at his friend's house when the intelligence reached him, and he immediately hurried home, if possible, to stop the transaction being carried through. He was too late, however; not only was it completed, but Mr. Morecombe had already left the Red House for London to arrange with his creditors, and make preparations for commencing business. On Edgar's arrival at home, he sought his father, and a long and angry discussion took place between them which lasted for some time. At length Edgar said,— "It is useless, I perceive, for us to speak longer on the subject. I have made up my mind what to do. I care but little for the money; within a few months I shall be of age, and my own master; but I can see clearly enough that my poor mother and Ruth will become in the end the victims of a thorough-paced swindler. I am fully persuaded in a few years they will be totally ruined."

"I will not take that language from you, sir," said Mr. Thornbury; "either speak and behave to me with the respect which is my due, or leave the house, and do not again attempt to enter it until you know how to conduct yourself."

"I will obey you," said Edgar; "but let us part, if possible, without anger. Advance me the two hundred pounds I shall have of my own, and I will make my way in the world as best I can. I am thoroughly tired of doing nothing, and being led on by promises of assistance which are never fulfilled."

"And should I do so, in what way would you propose to act?" inquired Mr. Thornbury.

"I should immediately start for India. had the idea in my head for some time, and from what has taken place between us, I am resolved to carry it out. The money I am entitled to is quite sufficient to pay for the voyage and to provide an outfit. When once there, I know well enough there is room for every man to succeed who has courage, perseverance, and integrity to back him."

"A very nice idea, indeed," said Mr. Thornbury, with a sneer; "without recommendation or introduction, without friends or capital, India is certainly the place for a thoughtless, inexperienced young man to get on in. Nonsense! If you are sufficiently foolish to take a step of the kind, it is my duty, as your father and natural guardian, to prevent you. I shall not advance you a shilling of the money, trusting, that before you are fully of age, you will come to your senses."

"Let us clearly understand one another," said Edgar. "As my father, you have certainly the power to withhold the money from me for some months longer; but go I will. Either advance me the money, as I asked you, or before to-morrow evening I will enlist in the light cavalry regiment at present quartered in the town. Now, do what you choose; my fate is entirely in your hands."

"You may enlist as soon as you please," said Mr.

Thornbury, doggedly.

Without saying another word Edgar snatched up his hat and left the room. Before he had reached the hall-door, however, Mr. Thornbury became alarmed lest his son should really do as he had threatened, and he called him back.

"Let us speak once more on the subject," he said to Edgar, as soon as he had re-entered the room. "If you positively insist on going to India I will advance you the two hundred pounds you require. Better that, at any rate, than have you disgrace your family by enlisting as a private soldier. But am I definitely to understand that you insist on having the two hundred pounds immediately, and that with it you will start for India? Remember, I have no acquaintances, and I cannot assist you."

"Ouce more, father, my mind is fully made up," said Edgar. "Go I will, and nothing shall hinder me. If I cannot go as a gentleman, I will, as I said before, enlist as a private soldier."

"The effect of your folly be upon your own head," said Mr. Thornbury. "I can do no more."

Before leaving the room Mr. Thornbury gave his son an order on his banker for the money; and the next day Edgar started for London. He used great promptitude in getting his modest outfit prepared, and he engaged his passage on board an East-Indiaman, which was to sail in about a fortnight's time for Calcutta. All his arrangements being at last completed, he returned to the Red House for two or three days, to take leave of his family. A painful parting it was for all; so much so, that had Edgar not been actuated by what he considered a sense of duty, it is more than probable he would have broken down at the last moment. Shortly before he left the house, he was closeted with his sister for some time, discussing in what manner Mr. Morecombe's baneful influence over their father could be neutralized. In her heart, Ruth had no higher opinion than Edgar of her brother-in-law, and although she was less demonstrative in her dislike, she promised to do everything in her power to prevent her father making any further advances.

"What has already been done," she said, "cannot now be helped. I feel as you do, that the money advanced will ultimately be all lost. Pray God it may be the last."

"Well, Ruth, do the best you can to prevent any more being thrown away on him. It would be a thousand times better for Charity and her children to come home again, than that my poor father and mother should be thrown destitute on the world. May God bless you, dear Ruth. Keep me well informed of everything that takes place. soon as I have arrived in Calcutta, you shall hear from me; and remember, I expect a letter from you by every mail, which I promise punctually to answer. If I succeed, as I trust I shall do, I may yet be able to help you; and should I have the power, be assured I will do so."

Next morning, Edgar started for London, and a few days afterwards the ship in which he had taken his passage sailed for India.

During the next year no iucident worthy of particular notice occurred to any of the Thornbury family. Ruth had received a letter from Edgar, announcing his safe arrival in India after a long and stormy passage. He had had great difficulty in obtaining a situation, in consequence of his being without letters of introduction. At last, however, he had been successful in getting a subordinate appointment in the house of an agent principally connected with the indigo trade, and at a salary so small that it required great economy on his part to avoid falling into debt. He did not, however, despair; he had now obtained a footing, and he was determined to keep it. At any rate, he could remain a sufficiently long time in his present situation to enable him to obtain a good reference, and then, as soon as he should hear of another and more lucrative appointment, he should apply for it. Altogether, his letter, if not a very satisfactory one, proved that his courage was still high and that he had good hopes for the future.

Ruth's letter in reply gave a definite account of all that had taken place at the Red House since his departure. The facts she particularly dwelt upon were, that Mr. Morecombe had arranged satisfactorily with his creditors, and had afterwards started in business with, as far as she could understand, every prospect of success. She regretted to state that Mr. Morecombe had contrived to quarrel with her before Charity had left the Red House for London, so that she was afraid she should have but little opportunity of seeing her sister. Mr. Morecombe had candidly told her that in his opinion she was, to a great extent, the cause of the discontent Charity had for some time plainly shown, and that as he wished, if possible, to retain the affections of his wife unimpaired, he thought the less they saw of each other the better. However, her father intended shortly to visit London, and had promised he would then endeavour to make peace between her (Ruth) and Mr. Morecombe.

For more than a year, the affairs of Mr. Morecombe appeared to prosper; and very encouraging were the reports which from time to time Mr. Thornbury received from him on the subject. The interest on the money advanced was paid with the greatest regularity. Charity also frequently corresponded with her sister, and if her letters did not paint matters in such brilliant colours as those of her husband, there was at least nothing in them to cause any uneasiness. Mr. Thornbury, on his part, seeing the prosperity of his son-in-law, determined, if possible, to endeavour to increase his own income, which was now limited indeed. The lease of the farm, on which he had raised money by mortgage for Charity's wedding portion, having fallen in, he resolved to turn his attention to agriculture. True, he knew little or nothing of the management of arable land, but in stock farming he had acquired some little experience by turning to account the laud which was attached to the Red House freehold estate. It required capital, however, to commence on a larger scale; and Mr. Thornbury for that purpose sold out the 1500l. he held in government securities. Things went on smoothly enough at the farm during the summer. The first year's harvest was a most productive one; and Mr. Thornbury began to congratulate himself upon the new speculation he had entered into. Unfortunately, he omitted to insure his stackyard; and one night the whole of the ricks were consumed by fire. It was strongly suspected that the destruction was eaused by an incendiaryone of the numerous persons his bailiff had offended, for he was druoken and despotic. Of this, however, there was no clear proof; and the only certainty on the subject which remained for Mr. Thornbury, was that the whole year's crops had been lost, creating a large deficiency in his annual income.

Thornbury was as easily depressed by any misfortune; and without attempting to retrieve his losses by better management, he resolved to throw up his plan of farming altogether. This he did, and found another tenant for the farm.

During the winter, Mr. Thornbury had another attack of the gout, which confined him to the house. Mr. Morecombe paid him a visit, leaving Charity and the children in London. He brought with him the half year's interest for the money he had borrowed of Mr. Thornbury; and gave his father-inlaw such a glowing description of his transactious in trade, that poor Mr. Thornbury began to regret he had not invested more largely with his son-inlaw, rather than have embarked in the farming.

"If you continue to succeed in this manner," said Mr. Thornbury one day to Mr. Morecombe. after the latter had been describing the enormous profits he had made in a certain transaction. "vou will soon be a man of fortune."

"That, I am afraid, is impossible," said Mr. Morecombe. "I find that a commission agent, to do a large business, requires a large capital. As it is I am perfectly content, and can maintain my dear wife and children in comfort. I must admit, however, that occasionally I do feel annoyed when I see advantageous bargains slipping through my fingers, solely in consequence of my not having enough capital to entertain them."

"But," said Mr. Thornbury, "I thought a commission agent required little or no capital."

"So I thought," replied Mr. Morecombe, "when I first began business; but I find I was wrong. For example, suppose a man asks me to find a purchaser for some valuable commodity. Possibly at the moment, there is no buyer to be found; but the seller is in want of money, for which he is willing to pay a good rate of interest. Now, if I had the money to advance him at the time, always leaving a good margin on the transaction, I should have the management of the sale, and not only receive my commission on the sale, but the interest as well. Not having sufficient capital, however, I am obliged to let many such chances pass."

"Now," said Mr. Thornbury, trying to assume an air of mere curiosity, "what amount of capital would you require to enable you to extend your business, and carry it on in a satisfactory manner?"

"Well," said Mr. Morecombe, doubtfully, "I hardly know. I have never given the subject such thorough consideration as would enable me to speak decidedly, for I knew there was little prospect of my being able to raise more money. I should say a very few thousands-say two or three thousand pounds, would be ample. Yes, with that amount, I am sure I could make from two to three thousand a year profit in my business-taking into consideration the very large and respectable connexion I have formed."

The subject then dropped for a time; but it kad been sufficiently discussed to prove to Mr. Easily elated by any transient success, Mr. | Morecombe, that the principal object which had induced him to pay a visit to his father-in-law was likely to be gained. He was, however, too knowing to press the subject with anything like importunity—on the contrary, he appeared rather to avoid discussing it on more than one occasion when Mr. Thornbury brought it forward.

Shortly after Mr. Morecombe's return to London, he wrote a letter to Mr. Thornbury, informing him that he had in view a speculation so brilliant, and one which promised such perfect success, that he did not like to let it pass without making an effort to profit by it. The sum required would be about a thousand pounds more than what he could at that moment command. The security for the advance would be given on warrants for saltpetre, to three times the amount of the money required; and the interest would be large. If Mr. Thornbury liked to join him in the speculation, he should have great pleasure in insuring the profits to him; deducting nothing whatever for his trouble in the transaction.

On the same day, however, that Mr. Thornbury received this letter, Ruth also had one from Charity, strongly advising her to set her face against any further advance of money being made by Mr. Thornbury to her husband, but without giving any reason for her desire. Although Ruth did not quite understand her sister's motive for writing thus, she implicitly obeyed her injunctions; but as her father did not inform her of the nature of Mr. Morecombe's communication, she could only do so very vaguely and indirectly. Mr. Thornbury made no remark in reply; but contented himself with stating, that business of importance would oblige him to leave home on a visit to London for a few days.

Ruth immediately despatched a letter to Charity, informing her of her father's contemplated visit to London, and requested her, in her turn, to be upon her guard to prevent, if possible, any monetary transactions taking place between him and her husband. Unfortunately, this letter fell into Mr. Morecombe's hands; and his rage against Ruth was greater than ever. He did not inform his wife of the contents of Ruth's letter, so that when Mr. Thornbury arrived in London, he had full opportunity of communicating with Mr. Morecombe unrestricted by interference on the part of Charity.

Mr. Morecombe appeared delighted to see his father-in-law; at the same time he cautiously concealed from him that he was perfectly well aware of the object of his visit. By degrees, however—and merely as if in the course of casual conversation—he introduced the subject of his affairs; giving details of the most brilliant description as to the amount of money he was making, and his splendid prospects for the future. Mr. Thornbury of course expressed satisfaction at the intelligence.

"I am half afraid," said Mr. Morecombe, one day, after dinner, "you will be strongly inclined to believe that the account I have given of my success in trade must be somewhat exaggerated, but I assure you it is not. Rather than allow any ground to remain for such a suspicion, you would do me a great favour if you will come to the City with me to-morrow, and just cast your eye over my books: I promise you, I will conceal nothing from you."

"I shall, if you wish it," said Mr. Thornbury; "at the same time, do not for one moment imagine that I doubt in any way the truth of your statement."

"I am very pleased to hear it; but still I shall be more satisfied if you come to the conclusion from your own personal inspection of the books. Tomorrow, then, after breakfast, we will go to the City together, if you have no other engagement?"

Mr. Thornbury, of course, had none; and next morning the two started for the City. Shortly after their arrival at the office, Mr. Morecombe spread out before his father-in-law the different account-books, and commenced describing them, pointing out his profits on the different transactions he had been engaged in during the time he had been in business.

The deeper Mr. Thornbury went into his son-inlaw's affairs, the better he was pleased with them. He carefully examined the books-for Mr. Morecombe would allow him to pass over nothing in which there appeared any obscurity; and not only did the business appear to be progressing steadily, but everything seemed in a most satisfactory state. At last, Mr. Thornbury resolved to enter into partnership with his son-in-law. He broached the subject, and the proposal was readily entertained. A few days after everything was arranged between them. Mr. Thornbury was to have onehalf of the profits of the business, on condition that he advanced another fifteen hundred pounds. The original debt was to be cancelled, and considered as added to the amount of capital employed in the partnership. Mr. Morecombe was to have the sole management of the business; but no transaction of any importance was to be entered into without Mr. Thornbury being advised on the subject, who could then, if he pleased, put his veto on it, or come up to town and investigate the project thoroughly.

Mr. Thornbury now sold his only remaining farm for three thousand pounds, and placed the amount agreed on in the business, but invested the balance in the bank; resolving that if the partnership turned out as flourishing a speculation as he hoped and believed, he would afterwards add the remaining money to it as well.

CHAPTER XI. -- MORECOMBE AND CO.

It would be difficult indeed to name a mercantile firm which appeared to succeed better than did Morecombe and Co. for some time, for under that style Mr. Thornbury and his son-in-law traded. So perfect and sagacious were Mr. Morecombe's propositions, that not in a single instance had his partner to offer the slightest objection.

At stated periods Mr. Thornbury's share of the profits were forwarded to him, and so large were the amounts he received, that he determined to make his appearance in the hunting field again.

He was even in treaty for the purchase of a magnificent horse, quite up to his weight, which had greatly increased lately notwithstanding the anxiety he had had, when Ruth one morning received a letter from her sister, with an inclosure. The appearance of the letter caused her no little surprise and agitation, as she was aware that Mr. Morecombe had prohibited Charity from writing to her. Fortunately there was no one in the breakfast room when the letter arrived, consequently she could read it undisturbed by any questions.

In the letter Charity invited Ruth to come up to London and spend a few days with her, as she wished very much to see her and consult her about many things. She also stated, that Mr. Morecombe being from home, she was very dull, and Ruth would only be acting kindly if she did not delay coming, but would start off as quickly as possible. If Ruth's surprise was great on reading the letter, it amounted to absolute terror when she glanced at the inclosure. In it Charity told her sister that she had written the other for her father and mother to see, as she wished if possible to conceal from them all cause of anxiety, until the last moment, although they must ultimately learn it. Utter ruin, she said, awaited them all, and she very much feared disgrace also. Not only had Mr. Morecombe contracted many debts which he was unable to pay, but there was too much reason to believe that his reputation was blasted beyond hope of recovery. She would not explain more by letter, as there was a remote chance of its falling into other hands; and it was better to keep the affair secret as long as possible.

Ruth was perfectly thunderstruck at these tidings. Collecting her senses as quickly as possible, and assuming an expression of as little auxiety as she could, she placed the inclosure in her pocket, and gave Charity's letter to her father and mother to read when they entered the breakfast room. Somewhat to Ruth's dissatisfaction Mr. and Mrs. Thorubury seemed rather pleased at the idea than otherwise. They looked upon the invitation Ruth had received as indicative of a more friendly feeling towards her on the part of Mr. Morecombe. Charity was again expecting her confinement, and it would be a great comfort to have her sister with her. They advised Ruth not to delay her departure, but to start for London by that night's coach. Ruth of course made no objection, but immediately commenced her preparations for the journey, and before night she left home for X- and arrived in London the next morning.

As soon as Ruth left the coach, she hailed a cab, and drove direct to Mr. Morecombe's house in Islington. On her arrival, she found the shutters closed, as though the family had not yet risen. This gave her but little surprise, as it was still early; but as she could not keep the cabman waiting, she told him to knock at the door. He obeyed her, and remained for some time expecting that it would be opened, but no one coming he knocked again, this time much louder than before. Still the door remained closed, nor was there the appearance of any one at the windows. Again and again the man knocked, but without any better success; and at length, he asked Ruth whether she was certain they had driven to the right address, as he thought the house must be deserted. But Ruth assured him there could be no mistake, and she began to feel extremely uneasy at finding that no one answered the knocking. A slight noise was at last heard in the passage, and the next minute the bolts were withdrawn by a shabby disreputable looking old man, still half asleep, and looking as if he had slept in his elothes.

"Does Mr. Morecombe live here?" inquired Ruth.
"No," said the old man, sulkily, "he don't;" and without further observation he closed the door.

The driver, in obedience to Ruth's instruction, again knocked. The old man opened the door, but evidently in a worse humour than before.

"My good man," said Ruth, who had now alighted from the eab, "I am sorry to trouble you, but you will greatly oblige me by telling me where I can find Mr. Morecombe, for he certainly did live here."

"Very likely," was the reply, "but he don't now."

"Is Mrs. Morecombe at home, then?"

"No, there is nobody here but me, and I'm in possession."

"In possession! and what for?" inquired Ruth, in a tone of great surprise.

"Well, for twelve months' rent, if you must know," said the man.

"Will you allow me to come in, then," said Ruth, "and wait till I can make some further inquiries?"

"Not unless you're a policeman with a search warrant; and you don't look much like that;" and with this the old man closed the door.

Poor Ruth, utterly bewildered, remained motionless on the pavement, the cabman quietly waiting her orders. Presently a milk-woman advanced, and noticing Ruth's indecision said, "If you're wanting the Morecombes, ma'am, they're gone from here."

"Can you tell me where I can find them?" inquired Ruth.

"I cannot, ma'am, exactly," said the woman with some hesitation; "what might you want with them?"

"I am Mrs. Morecombe's sister," said Ruth, "and I particularly wish to see her."

"Oh! that's different, ma'am," said the woman.
"I thought you might be wanting money of her, a good many people do, and she has been almost harassed to death. She owes me a matter of thirty shillings, but I should be sorry to worry her for it, poor thing, for she's in great trouble now."

"And can you not tell me where I can find her?" said Ruth.

"Well, ma'am, as you're her sister, I can," was the reply. "If you take the second turning to the right, and the first to the left, you will find her at

No. 15, Mrs. Thornton's; you can't miss it, it ain't five minutes walk from here."

Ruth thanked the woman for her information, and again entered the cab. The first street into which they turned was mean and poverty stricken enough, but it was respectable compared with the one in which Charity lodged. The house itself was a miserable looking little green-grocer's shop; in fact, so squalid was it, that had the name of Thornton not been over the door, Ruth would have believed she had wholly mistaken the woman's instructions. On inquiring whether Mrs. Morecombe lived there, Ruth was answered in the affirmative, and was requested to walk upstairs and she would find Mrs. Morecombe on the first floor. Ruth, having dismissed the cabman, made her way, with difficulty, up the narrow staircase, leaving her trunk in the shop. As Ruth reached the door the eldest child sprang into her arms, and Charity turned round to ascertain what had made the child run from her side, and recognised Ruth. Uttering a pleased, though subdued exclamation of surprise, she rushed forward, and in a moment the sisters were in each other's arms. For some minutes emotion kept both silent. As soon as they had recovered a little, Charity said,

"How kind it is of you, dear Ruth, to come up! Oh! how earnestly I have wished to see you. We were turned out of our house yesterday, and I was going to write to-day, to tell you where to find us. How did you find us out?"

Ruth told her of her meeting with the milk-woman.

"You must have been very much surprised, dear Ruth," said Charity, "to find that we had moved, but, thank God, you are here now."

"But what has occurred to oblige you to quit your house?"

"It is a long story, Ruth, and a sad one. An execution for arrears of rent was put in yesterday, and the landlord insisted on our leaving the house immediately. Fortunately, Mrs. Thornton had pity on us, and has taken us in. If it had not been for her kindness, my poor children and myself would not have had a roof over our heads last night."

"But what right had he to turn you out of the house in that manner?" inquired Ruth; "surely that cannot be law."

"We had no one to protect us," said Charity; and I could do nothing, for he threatened to send for the police, if I did not leave the house."

"But where is Mr. Morecombe," said Ruth, "that he has left you at such a moment?"

Charity looked in her sister's face, and her eyes filled with tears, but she remained silent. Ruth did not press the question, but contented herself with asking how they had fallen into such poverty. "From the letters he wrote to my father," she said, "we all thought he was rapidly making a fortune."

"Ruth," said Charity, "I do not wish to speak against my husband if I can help it, but I am sorry to say that all he has written of his success in business was untrue."

"Why, then, did you not write to inform us of the real state of the case?"

"Because I was not aware of it myself," said Charity. "Mr. Morecombe was always most reserved to me about his affairs. True, we had lately been subject to a great deal of privation, but I thought it was only occasioned by temporary circumstances, or——"

Here she stopped, and looked imploringly in her sister's face.

Ruth was for a moment silent. She looked at the pallid faces of Charity and her children, and easily saw the truth of her sister's statement. Presently she said.

"But what do you intend doing, Charity? You cannot stay in this miserable place, kind though the people may have been to you."

"What can I do?" was the answer. "I have not a shilling, or even a penny in the world. Besides, they would not allow us to take anything from the house, so I have nothing to sell to procure food. The poor children have had no breakfast to-day."

Fortunately, Ruth, being naturally very economical, had been able to bring with her several pounds of her savings. She now ceased to ask any more questions, but quickly descended the stairs, and speedily returned again, having purchased some food. In a short time the breakfast was laid, and during the meal, the sisters, as if by mutual consent, abstained from speaking on family matters. When they had finished, Ruth addressed her sister:

"Now, dear Charity, I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but you must relate all that has occurred, that I may assist you, and that I may tell my father what it may be necessary for him to know. What has so suddenly ruined Mr. Morecombe?"

"I am afraid," said Charity, sorrowfully, "his ruin has not been sudden."

"Do you mean to say that the accounts he has been sending to my father, up to the last moment, have been false?"

"I am afraid it is too true," said Charity. "As I said before, I knew nothing of his affairs, not even of the letters you say he sent to my father. I only judge from the frequent applications I have had for some time past for money owing by Mr. Morecombe."

"Why did they not apply at his office?" said Ruth.

"I cannot tell, though I suspect that has been given up for some time."

"Why then," said Ruth, indignantly, "does he not come forward and meet his creditors openly, instead of keeping out of their way, and allowing his wife to be persecuted for his debts?"

Charity was silent.

"Where is he just now?" inquired Ruth.

Charity made no reply, but looked sorrowfully at her sister.

Ruth, now getting terribly alarmed, "that he has deserted you?"

"Worse than that, dear Ruth—far worse," said Charity, her eyes again filling with tears.

"Charity, explain yourself: this suspense is insupportable."

"Ruth," said Charity, "he is now in prison."

"And what for?" said Ruth. "Has he committed any act of dishonesty?"

"Worse, Ruth," replied Charity, now bursting into tears. "He is accused of having a wife living when he married me."

Ruth was so overwhelmed that she was on the point of fainting. Her sister, alarmed at her appearance, brought some water and bathed her temples. By degrees Ruth recovered a little, and attempted to ask Charity for further explanation, but it was some time before she succeeded. At last she was informed that Mr. Morecombe had been arrested about a week before on a charge of bigamy, which his first wife's relations were prosecuting against him in the Police Court; and that he had been committed for trial.

"I was afraid, Ruth, that you might have seen an account of it in the papers at the Red House; and, if so, I am sure it would have broken my poor father's heart."

"He must know of it, dear," said Ruth, sorrowfuly; "but how we shall break it to him and my poor mother, I know not! But," she continued, "can Mr. Morecombe make no defence? It is impossible it can be true."

"I do not know, dear, what he intends doing. I have not heard one word directly from him since he was arrested."

"But do you not know the name of the magistrate before whom he was taken?"

"I do not, dear; but I heard that it was the Westminster Police Court, and that he is now in Tothill-fields Prison."

"How did you ascertain that?"

"From a newspaper which was left at our house."

"And you have not made any further inquiries about him?" said Ruth, astonished.

Her sister was silent for a moment, and then admitted that, on finding he was committed for trial, she had written to ask him if she might come and see him: but he had sent back word, that he did not wish to see her, or any one belonging to her.

"What shall we do?" said Ruth, utterly bewildered.

"I am sure I do not know, dear Ruth; I am completely broken down, and can think of nothing,"

Ruth rose from her chair, and for some moments walked to and fro in the little room, without saying a word, the two children looking at her the while, with wonder. Suddenly she stopped.

"Charity, dear," she said, coming up to her sister, and kissing her affectionately, "this is the time for action, not for despair: we must be up and doing. In the first place, you must leave this house, and I will go at once and take a respectable lodging for you; after that, we will consult what steps we had better take,"

Ruth now left her sister, and although a stranger in the place, she soon succeeded in finding rooms in a respectable house, to which Charity and her children removed, after settling with kind-hearted Mrs. Thornton. As soon as they were established in the new lodging, Ruth began to devise some plan of action, for her sister seemed to be unable to arrange her thoughts on any subject. The first thing to be discovered was whether Mr. Morecombe was really guilty of the charge, and to learn the real state of his affairs. The very fact of an execution for rent having being put in the house, and Charity and her children turned into the streets, besides the frequent applications made by Mr. Morecombe's creditors for money, seemed to prove that matters were in a most deplorable state. Still Ruth hoped on against hope that the case was not, perhaps, so bad as it appeared to be; and she determined to investigate matters as far as she could. But how to carry this out was a very difficult point. Presently she remembered the name of the solicitor who had formerly acted for her father, although she knew there had been no communication between them for some time past. To this gentleman she determined to apply for assistance, if she was unable to obtain the information by other means. She resolved first to call at Mr. Morecombe's office in the City, and find out whether Charity had been rightly informed as to his having given it up.

Ruth accordingly left the house, and taking a cab, drove to the office in the City. Having dismissed the driver, she inquired whether Mr. Morecombe had still an office there. She was informed that he had formerly rented a room in the house, which he had used as an office, but that it had been given up for more than a year, and that any letters for him were immediately forwarded to his house in Islington. Ruth now went to the house of the solicitor, and fortunately found him at home. She candidly informed him of the object of her visit, and implored him to give her what information he

"My dear lady," he said, "I would willingly assist you if I had it in my power, but beyond common report I am sorry to say I know little about his affairs. He has always avoided me, and from what I have heard of him, since his marriage with your sister, I have had very little desire to make his acquaintance."

"But in the first place," said Ruth, "can you tell me if there is any truth in the dreadful accusation brought against him?"

"All I know is from the newspaper reports, and from these, I fear there is very little chance of his escaping a verdict of guilty."

"What shall we do!" exclaimed Ruth in despair. "Have you heard anything of his private affairs?" she continued, addressing the solicitor.

"I am sorry to say, I have, and that from the evidence of one of my own clients, who has suffered by him. I will not disguise the truth from you," he continued, after a moment's hesitation, "the fellow is a thorough-paced scoundrel. I sincerely trust he has not drawn your father into any transaction with him?"

"I am sorry to say that he has, to a very considerable amount," said Ruth.

There was now a silence of some moments, which was broken by Ruth:

"There is but one course I can think of at present," she said, "and that is to see Mr. Morecombe himself, and get from him, if possible, the truth, both as to the state of his affairs and his alleged former marriage. Can you tell me if there would be any difficulty in my seeing him?" "I should think not," was the reply. "Leave me your address, and I will send my clerk to make inquiries, and will forward a letter to you this evening, informing you what steps you ought to take to procure an interview with Mr. Morecombe in prison; and if I can be of any further use to you, pray command me."

Ruth, with many expressions of gratitude, now took her leave of the solicitor, and proceeded homewards. The letter informing her what steps to take to see the prisoner, was sent to her in the evening, and Ruth determined on the morrow that she would obtain an interview with Mr. Morecombe.

A RIDE THROUGH MONTENEGRO.

In the account of my visit to Cettigne, * I spoke of the hospitality of the Prince, and of my visit to the Bishop. It is only recently that these two offices have been separated. On this point a few words may be necessary. In the days of the Serbian monarchy, of which Montenegro formed a part, the country was governed by a Ban, or governor, who resided at Jablach. At the time of the fatal battle of Kossova (A.D. 1389) this office was held by Balcha, son-in-law of Lazar, the knes or king of Serbia; and when the independence of Serbia was lost on that disastrous field, the Montenegrin Ban was able to maintain the cause of freedom in the recesses of the Black Mountains, and there became an independent prince. The government of the principality remained in the family of this Prince until nearly the end of the fifteenth century, when, dispirited by the necessity of constant hostility against the whole force of the Turkish Sultans, then at the height of their power, George Tschernovitch abandoned his country, retired to Italy and died there. When he quitted the country, though the people had been able to maintain their independence, yet the limits of Montenegro had been greatly circumscribed, and its inhabitants had been driven from the sea-coasts and from the rich plains lying beyond the present frontier of the principality. Jablach was now no longer a safe residence for the court, and its nearness to the Turkish frontier had compelled Ivan, the father of George Tschernovitch. to remove to the more inaccessible post of Cettigne. On the flight or abdication of the latter Prince, the people rallied around their bishop, who refused to quit them, and he became henceforth their counsellor and ruler both in ecclesiastical and in secular matters. The country, thus deserted by its prince and by many of the chief families, became a prey to anarchy. Out of heart at the prospect of subjection to the Turks, many of the Montenegrins apostatised. Mahommedans now settled in several parts of the country, and Turkish armies swept over the whole principality in their march to and from Bosnia and Albania. This state of things lasted for about two hundred years, and the country seemed on the point of becoming subject to Turkey, when, at the beginning of the last century, an act of atrocity perpetrated upon their bishop roused the people from the lethargy into which they had sunk.

Daniel, or Danilo Petrovitch, born at Negush, had been chosen by the people as their bishop in 1697, and had been consecrated to that office soon after by the Serbian bishops in Slavonia. Having been invited by Demir Pasha to Podgaritza, in order to consecrate a church for the use of the Christians in that part of Albania, he was treacherously seized and was pressed to embrace Mahommedanism. On his refusal he was tortured and chained to a large piece of timber, which he was compelled to drag along the road from Podgaritza to Spush. At a heavy sum he was ransomed by his people. On his release the Montenegrins resolved to rid themselves of the presence of their oppressors. A general massacre of the Mahommedans, the native apostates, and the Turkish settlers, followed, and Monteuegro became free, and Danilo its Princebishop. As the bishops throughout the Eastern Church, of which this bishopric is a portion, are chosen from the unmarried clergy, the succession to the chief power could not devolve in the same manner as in strictly secular monarchies, from father to son. In order, however, to escape from the evils of popular election, the bishop was authorised to nominate his successor, who was consecrated as the next bishop, and succeeded to the supreme power. This mode of government continued until the death of Peter the Second, who nominated as his successor his nephew, Danilo Petrovitch, then at Vienna. The young Prince-bishop elect, who was then but just of age-perhaps from some sense of unfitness for the sacred duties of his office, but certainly after having fallen in love at Trieste with a young Serbian lady of that city-had influence enough to put an end to this combination, and succeeded to the secular authority only. Prince ^{*} See p. 57. of this volume.

Danilo was one of the most remarkable men of his time, and during the short period of his rule wrought wonders in the civilisation of his subjects. On his death, by assassination at Cattaro in 1860, the Princess Darinka, his widow, being left with only an infant daughter—the Princess Olga—proclaimed the present Prince, the nephew of her husband, as his successor, and thus avoided the evils of a disputed succession. Thus much in order to put the reader in possession of the leading events of Montenegrin history, and to make some of the references in my narrative intelligible.

As the great heat at the time of my visit to Montenegro rendered travelling in the middle of the day unsafe, it was late in the afternoon before I left Cettigne, in company with M. Vaclick, and attended by four or five of the Prince's guards. Our road on this occasion lay over the southern heights of the circle of rocks by which this city is surrounded, the way being for the most part of the same rough description as that which I had encountered the day before. Indeed, until Montenegro is free from the danger of Turkish inroads, which now occur every six or seven years, it would be the height of imprudence to make the roads at all easier for travellers. As the journey had not commenced until it was almost evening, and the twilight is short in this latitude, night overtook us with half our journey to accomplish, and although the moon was almost full, yet the depth of our descent after we had reached the ridge of the mountain, and the direction in which we were going, soon deprived us of any advantage from the moon. Could I have seen the road, I should have thought it necessary to go with caution; as I could not see the way, I had to trust to the sagacity of my horse. As, however, we stumbled over the stones which lay in our path, my companious broke the monotony of the journey by their stated amusement of firing off their pistols and rifles, and as my horse, strange to say, seemed unaccustomed to the noise, every shot made him start and plunge over the stones, so that I had some difficulty in keeping my seat, and at length, as the descent grew more abrupt, I was forced to dismount, and continue the rest of my journey on foot. In this way, by nine o'clock we had scrambled to Rjeka, which lies on the river of the same name, and were glad to find beds for the night in a small, half-furnished house of the Prince.

Next morning I rose early, in order to explore the town and neighbourhood. Rjeka is a small town, or as we should say, village, consisting for the most part of a row of houses built on the margin of the river which sweeps in a semicircle at this spot. The houses are some of them of the unwonted height of two storeys. A small bazaar and market-place lie behind the houses which front the river. Most of the embroidery work for the dress of the Montenegrins is done in this place, and the handsome features of the women here show what, but for early toil, the whole female population of the Black Mountains would be. Close to my lodging, in a kind of loggia on the ground, a man was busy in making leather girdles, and decorating them with large red cornelians. This place is the chief market in the principality for musliu, linen, cloth, and articles of dress. In a piece of low meadow-ground which skirts the river, and which can easily be laid under water, I passed in my morning walk two fields of rice, the property of Mirko, the father of the Prince. This is an experimental crop, which has only been introduced during the last few months. Higher up among the hills, a few days after, I passed another experimental crop-that of coffee. How far these two articles can be reared in Montenegro is as vet doubtful. Rice may probably succeed, but I should think it unlikely that the coffee-plant would flourish here. The attempt will show, however, that this people are alive to the necessity of introducing such new articles of commerce as can be reared on their rocky soil. I found on the opposite side of the river a small arsenal, chiefly used for the repair of the fire-arms of which every one in Montenegro possesses some specimen or other. On the heights above this manufactory I visited a church, remarkable as the only one to be found in the whole country with external transepts. At least I was told that this was so, and my own subsequent experience confirms this account. As the Montenegrin people are regular in their attendance at church, every village and small cluster of houses has its church, served by a priest, who has only a nominal stipend, and who supports himself and family, like the members of his flock, by agriculture. He has a house and small glebe, and is undistinguished by dress from the rest of the people. Indeed, were it not for the beard, which is worn exclusively by the priests, it would not be possible to distinguish between the clergy and laity of Montenegro. Close to the church at Rieka is a school, maintained by Mirko, and on one side of the churchyard are some traces of the foundations of an ancient printing-office, destroyed long since during one of the forays of the Turks. At this town, and in this printing-office, the first book in the Slavonic language was printed, so that Rjeka is in this way the cradle of the literature of Russia, of Serbia, and of a large part of Austria. A copy of this book, the Osmo Glasnik, is in the library of Prince Nicholas. It was printed in 7001, of the Greek era, corresponding to A.D. 1493.

The river at this place is spanned by a bridge of three arches, built by Prince Danilo, which having been destroyed about five years ago by the Turks, has lately been rebuilt by Prince Nicholas. In its general aspect Rjeka recalls the memory of one of the smaller Dalmatian sea-coast towns. Having taken coffee, we set off about six o'clock for our journey to the southern frontier, our horses having being despatched by a road over the mountain, with directions to the men in charge to meet us at Jablach. As I left the house I saw a man drawing up his cel lines, and with them a magnificent cel of nearly a yard in length. The Rjeka, like most of the rivers in Montenegro, abounds in fish. Having walked down the banks of the river, which is here fringed with the Raketa (Salix caprea, Linn.), gay with purple clusters of flowers, pomegranate bushes, with here and there a scarlet blossom, and fig-trees laden with their second crop of figs, we hired a boat in which we were to make the rest of our journey. The river here presented a more animated spectacle than usual, as the boats engaged in the trade between Skodra and Rieka were taking in or discharging their cargoes of salt, wheat, fish, and dyewood. The river, however, soon grew solitary, and resembled a Highland river, except in the character of the vegetation on its banks, and in its greater breadth-widening into lake-like reaches, which seemed shut in on all sides by the grey sterile rocks rising immediately from its bed. The effect, however, of the breadth of the river is lost in consequence of the fields of rushes and water lilies, white and yellow, which cover the whole surface of the water except in the centre of the stream. These furnish a cover for gul!s and other aquatic birds, and shelter numerous families of coots and water-hens. At the top of the hills on either side we frequently caught sight of earthworks-or rather breastworks, for earth there is none-thrown up by the Montenegrius in the late campaign, to arrest the advance of the Turks; and as we passed the mouth of the ravines which open upon the river, we had glimpses of white gabled cottages peeping out of clusters of fig-trees, and rising above the hedges of pomegranates, and of olives which surrounded them. Thus, with Serbian songs from our boatmen and attendants, especially the favourite one which answers to our "Should auld acquaintance be forgot," we dropped down the Rjeka, our attendants occasionally trying their skill by firing upon the water-hens, storks, and other birds which darted out of the covert of rushes, or rose from the margin of the river; and, truth compels me to add, almost invariably missing the object fired at. Indeed, the Montenegrin, from long use, requires a resting-place for his rifle, and leisure for a steady aim. Our sportsmen, who are accustomed to bring down birds when on the wing, would hold him in small esteem. On a little rock at the mouth of the river are clustered a number of fishermen's huts, forming the village of Plotcha, near which are found beds of good anthracite coal. The scoranza are taken in large quantities just below this village. These fish leave the lake of Skodra, and make their way up the Rjeka in September, when the fishery is formally commenced, the Prince and his Court coming to Plotcha to open the fishing-season with appropriate ceremonies. These fish are cured at this place, and are then exported to Albania, and other parts of Turkey, to Dalmatia, and even to Italy.

Passing out of the Rjeka, we entered the Karatuna and next arrived at Jablach, where we were joined by our attendants with the horses, and after a breakfast al fresco by the border of the river, we pulled down a little lower, landed at the frontier Turkish post, and waited on the commandant. By this time I was thoroughly exhausted and felt the full effects of my long day on the Lovchen, my evening ride and walk to Rjeka, and my early ramble round that village; so that I had hardly seated myself in the divan, and had received the congratulation of the Turkish Major who commanded the garrison, than I fell fast asleep, I imagine, to the astonishment of my host. However, he showed no signs of surprise, or if he did, he had recovered from them when, after a good half-hour's sleep, I awoke. Then came coffee and cigars—the latter I was allowed to decline-and when these were finished the attendants brought to us trays of melons, a fragrant yellow one and the common pink water-melon, which, cut up in square pieces, were very refreshing. Then, after hand-washing and another cup of coffee, we departed. The fortifications of this fort have been twice destroyed by the Montenegrins in recent wars, but have been lately repaired and considerably strengthened. We left this place at about half-past ten, under a blazing sun, and had to cross an arid Albanian plain without shade of any sort. The southern frontier of Montenegro makes a considerable bend inward, so that to go from one part of Montenegro to another on this frontier, the shortest road is to cross this part of Albania. After going through a field or two of maize, we rode along the banks of the Zievna, which we forded, and somewhat lower down crossed the Moratcha in the same way, disturbing large flocks of wild pigeous on the road. On this plain we passed many traces of the ancient occupants, patches of old roads ruined by neglect, fragments of Roman fountains and the hollows of half-filled wells. One or two remarkable bridges built by these masters of the old world are still used for traffic. As the Wednesday market was closing in the frontier-town, where we intended to rest for the night, the road, or rather track across the plain swarmed with passengers. We passed one or two hareems, groups of Serbian and Albanian peasants driving mules, and horses laden with wood, roughly made furniture, vegetables, and other commodities, with occasionally some Bashibazouks and soldiers of the regular army. The arid and wholly uncultivated plain is utterly barren except for the tufts of wild thyme, which are found in great profusion, and which, bruised by the feet of our horses, scented the air on all sides. As we rode along we saw great numbers of swallows on the wing, and large tortoises lazily crawling about amongst the stones.

At Podgaritza, the Turkish town on the frontier, we stayed for the night. This place is a flourishing town, with a good market attended by buyers and sellers from the whole of Montenegro, from the Herzegovina, and from all parts of Albania down at least as far as Skodra. This is the market, the day for holding which Prince Nicholas had lately succeeded in changing from Sunday to Wednesday. The town lies on the little river Ribnetza—or fish river, as its name means—which falls into the Moratcha at this point. It was of old the seat of the powerful family of the Nemyana, which gave several kings to Serbia in the early days of the Serbian monarchy. As we approached the town the first object that caught our eye was the square tower, seemingly of a church, which rises far above everything else in the town. We found, however, on getting nearer that this was merely a watch-tower, apparently of Venetian work, standing alone like a Belgian belfry, or an Italian campanile; for, though minarets rise on all sides in this town, the Christian inhabitants are not allowed to have a church within the town itself, but are compelled to go about a mile and a half outside the town for worship. These Christians compose about a third of the population; formerly, and indeed in recent times, independently of those who lived in the town, there was a large Turkish population in the suburbs, but the whole of these have disappeared. In this particular, the town resembles most others in European Turkey. The Turkish quarter is one of utter decay; a large ruined citadel with extensive outworks crowns the heights on one side of the town, ruins of ancient baths and mills rise amid the poplars which fringe the north bank of the river: the Turkish houses are mostly ruins, the mosques and minarets are tumbling down from long neglect, and even the latticed windows of the hareems are dropping into the streets. On the other hand, in the Christian quarter the traveller sees new houses rising and others in course of repair or enlargement. In a narrow street we passed through a small shop, and having wended our way through a dark kitchen and darker brewery-or at least a place where something was being distilled-we crossed a small garden of some five-and-twenty feet, and found a new and spacious house building for the proprietor in the rear of his shop. On going over the half-finished building I was struck with the nunatural smallness and lowness of the windows; and on making inquiry iuto the cause I was informed that no Christian is allowed to have other than small and low windows, lest he should chance to overlook the garden of some Turkish neighbour. Here, at Nisch on the other side of Serbia, and in the other Turkish towns which I visited in the course of my present holiday journey, I noticed one unvarying circumstance. A Turk never repairs, at least I never saw a Turkish house in even decent repair. So that, judging from my own experience, if a traveller sees fresh mortar on a building, or any improvements going on, the enlargement of a house in progress, or even fresh paint being applied, he may be sure that the tenant is a Christian.

The fragments of Latin inscriptions, pieces of sculptured marble, bits of architraves, door-posts, and fractured carvings of classical design built into the walls of the houses in various parts of the town, indicate the neighbourhood of a Roman stationmany of these fragments having most probably been brought from Dioclea, about half-a-dezen miles off. But as night was fast closing round us, we did not Threading our way through the town, we reached a period of the Serbian monarchy. At present it con-khan much frequented by the Montenegrins, where we were to rest for the night. We found everything in disorder—the front was being rebuilt, the apartments in the rear were being enlarged, and we had to ride over mounds of rubbish and to avoid piles of timber and new doors and rafters as well as we could. The front of the khan, which opened upon the main street, was used for a wine store and restaurant. The apartment for the use of travellers was immediately behind. The basement consisted of stables for horses; and store-cellars for goods: above these were the sleeping-apartments, entered from a gallery which ran round the building. Our room consisted, of course, of nothing save bare walls; but in deference to my necessities, or prejudices, a table and chairs were brought, and a piece of matting was spread upon the floor. On this matting we laid the rugs we had brought, and our beds were complete. The night was very warm, and we slept with the window and door open, placing the chairs at the door as a kind of barrier, whilst in front of these, in the open gallery, our attendants stretched themselves in all attitudes, and were soon in the land of dreams. For myself, the hard bed, or rather the floor, the howl of dogs under the window of our room, and the melancholy music of a small Turkish force which was under canvas close to the town, combined to prevent me from falling asleep until a late hour.

In the morning, before leaving Podgaritza, we waited on the Turkish authorities, and examined the ruins which compose a large part of the town. In doing this, apropos of nothing except my Frankish costume, a fanatic in one of the streets hurled a large stone at me, which providentially merely struck me on the wrist of my left hand, causing me pain and inconvenience for a time, but nothing At ten o'clock, later by four hours than we ought to have set out, we left Podgaritza, and a ride of about three-quarters of an hour along the banks of the Moratcha brought us to the point where that river receives the waters of the Zeta. On our way along the banks of the Moratcha we passed a beautiful Roman bridge; and as we came near to the ford where we were to cross the river we had to make our way over small mounds of rubbish and heaps of ruins, in which we could still trace the hands of the masters of the old world; and on reaching the opposite bank we stood at once amidst the ruins of Dioclea, an important station of the Romans in the time of the Emperors, and the reputed birth-place of the Emperor Diocletian. The whole plain through which the Moratcha has eaten a channel is composed of conglomerate, singularly coarse; so coarse, indeed, that at first sight it is difficult to decide whether the masses of pebble on the banks are the foundations of Roman buildings or the formation of nature. It is evident from the character of the ruins, as well as from records, that Dioclea was for many years a place of great importspend much time in examining these remains, ance, not only in classical times but far down into the sists of ruins only and of half-a-dozen cottages standing in the midst of vineyards and maize-grounds, which occupy the site of the imperial palace and the spacious basilica. Inscriptions and fragments of marble walls are found in great plenty, and some beautiful sculptured stones in a vault below the surface indicate the place of burial of the notabilities of this city. The bulk, however, of the marble which once covered the walls of the imperial residence has gone to a neighbouring cemetery. Here may be seen fragments of fluted columns cut into the requisite size and laid as tombstones. The covers and the bottoms of ancient stone coffins have been taken for the same purpose. Fine fragments of marble friezes, pagan altars, and in one place a magnificently carved console, serve the same purpose. The church round which the cemetery was first formed has for ages been in ruins; the churchyard, however, remains a favourite place for the burial of the villagers in the neighbourhood. These ruins deserve a careful examination. I regret that fatigue, exposure, and the great heat combined to bring on so sharp an attack of fever, that I was unable to explore the ruins as fully as I desired; although the Prince had placed a labourer at my disposal to assist in excavating any part which seemed promising. The remains of the old city stand at the junction of the Zeta with the Moratcha, on a site of an irregular triangular form, having the Zeta on the south-west and the Moratcha on the southeast, and a rivulet—the Siralija—on the north-west. To the north of the city is the old Roman cemetery. and to the east the burial-place of Rogame, still used by the Montenegrins. The great gate of the city is on the north side; the defences which remain along the whole extent of the ancient city, consist of a massive wall, strengthened at short intervals by square towers, the site being surrounded by a broad fosse on three sides. The two rivers which flow along the southern face of the city have eaten for themselves a course so far below the plain on which Dioclea stands that they add considerably to the strength of the fortifications. From the time of its Roman builders down to the fourteenth century the name of the city repeatedly occurs in the annals of the Greek and Bulgarian wars. It was the seat, for a time, of an archbishop. In 1199 a synod was held here; and it is frequently mentioned as the residence of one or another of the ancient kings of Serbia. Coins, medals, terra cotta seals, and intaglios are often dug up in and around the ruins. Prince Nicholas has a small collection of Roman imperial coins of silver mostly found here, and I bought from a peasant more than a hundred and fifty coins, the chief part only of late brass, but some were in very good preservation; I also brought home with me a large intaglio of early Greek work in chalcedony from the same remains.

Fatigued by the journey the day before, and by the excessive heat from which I had suffered in my ride across the Albanian plain, I had just fallen into a sound sleep under my tent, when I was awakened by a confused noise of shrieks and laughter and the drone of the gusle and the bagpipe, accompanied by vocal music. Looking out, I found that all the villagers had assembled and, under the light of a most brilliant moon, were taking their turns in the dance. As this dance had been "got up" in honour of my arrival, I thought it my duty to dress again and come out of my tent. The Montenegrin dance almost exactly resembles the old Highland reel. Two, or at the most four, dancers throw themselves into the circle, and dance with a might which says much for simple living and pure mountain air. The dancing was so energetic that each couple soon gave place to fresh and untired performers. One girl, however, the belle of the village, stamped and shrieked and threw about her arms and waved her handkerchief with a challenge to all comers for a couple of hours or more, seemingly without being conscious of fatigue. fore the dance was over I crept back again to bed. Next day I was unable to move from under my tent, or to eat or drink anything except the new milk and fresh ripe grapes which the kind villagers brought me without stint. When, however, the sun had almost set, and I was able to mount my horse and had ridden a mile or so up the sides of the mountains which rise almost immediately to the north of Dioclea, I wondrously revived, and felt nothing more of the fever.

About an hour after dark I reached the small monastery of Chelja, where I found shelter for the night. Next morning I was able to look around and examine the monastery itself. The Church and the half-a-dozen rooms which make up the monastery are situated on a small plateau of ground overlooking the Turkish territory near Spush. It has only one monk, who is thus at the same time Hegumon and simple monk, and has to enforce and obey his own rule. In a small apartmenta part of the belfry-however, I was introduced to an old bed-ridden monk, who has been blind for the last ten years, and has found an asylum at this place. Like everything else near the Turkish frontier, the outer walls of the monastery, the walls of the church within, and even the walls of all the apartments, are loopholed for defence. The church, as an inscription over the west door informs the visitor, was restored in 1848. In the choir is the coffin of a Montenegrin saint-one Stephen, who, flying from the persecutions of the Mahommedans in the Herzegovina, lived a saintly life at this place towards the end of the seventeenth century. On his death the people near built a church to perpetuate his memory, and canonized him, as it were, by acclamation. This is the case with most of the Montenegrin Saints, whose names will not be found in any Calendar save that popular one by means of which the people themselves retain the names of those who were revered for the holiness of their lives and for their works of mercy. The church is remarkable for a low stone synthronus behind the altar-the only one which I saw in Montenegro.

We left the monastery early, and rode along the slope of the mountain, over an interesting country, through villages almost hidden by hedges of fig and pomegranate-neither ripe, however, though the boughs were laden with abundant fruit. About noon we arrived at another monastery, in which is one monk. The monasteries indeed throughout Montenegro, with perhaps two exceptions-I am not sure that there are any exceptions-are but parish churches, served by unmarried priests. These priests, in addition to the care of the people within a certain district or parish, undertake the education of one or more lads, who are at the same time their pupils and assistants. The utter decay of the old monastic system of these countries is evident both in Serbia and in Montenegro. This arises from the disinclination of the people for the monastic life-a disinclination which will end in extinguishing the last vestiges of monachism in these countries before many years are over. The church, where we arrived at mid-day, was loopholed like the one in the monastery at which we had slept the night before. That the need for this still existed was evident from the person of the monk who had charge of it. The tombs around this church had been destroyed by the Turks in the last war, and the bodies of the dead torn up and dismembered. As soon as the Turks had retired, the remains of the dead, however, were collected as well as possible, and the tombs had just been restored as nearly as could be to their former state. This monk had been severely wounded in defending his church, and showed me the marks caused by the shots which had gone through his arms and body.

Having diped and refreshed ourselves with a siesta, we started in the early evening along the banks of the Zeta, for Ostrug, our sleeping-place for the night. On our way to this place we crossed a fine bridge of Roman or early Serbian work. Another bridge-the Hadzin Most, or pilgrim's bridge-which spans an arm of the Zeta, is a remarkable structure of one arch, and so lofty that most of the company preferred to ride down the banks of the stream and scramble across its bed instead of passing over the bridge. Soon after crossing this bridge we began to mount the heights, near the top of which the monastery is situated. The night was a fine moonlight one, so that the horses were able to pick their way easily over the stones and through two or three foaming mountain torrents which crossed our path. About nine o'clock we reached our destination. The monastery of lower Ostrug-for there is a higher and lower Ostrug-is perched on a small plateau formed by the falling of a portion of the mountain behind it. Two or three immense boulders, resembling the bastions of a regular fortification, lie in front of the monastic buildings, and shut out the sight of them from below. There, wedged between two of these boulders, one of which has been converted into a small garden and the earth which has accumulated in the crevices of its top planted with kitchen-vegetables, stands the little church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, rebuilt in 1840, after being partially destroyed by the Turks; the apartments of the monks lie on the one side of this church, and on the other are the storehouse and rooms for the monastic servants. At some distance from the monastic buildings the Prince has lately erected a long suite of rooms for the use of the pilgrims who on Trinity Sunday come in great numbers to Ostrug. Outside the gate of the monastery is another church—that of St. George—built in 1799; this, however, is seldom used: it seems to be the parochial church of the district, as distinguished from the monastic one.

Ostrug the higher, to which we climbed on Sunday morning, is scooped out of the face of the rock just below its summit. It is what we should call a hermitage rather than a monastery, except for the circumstance that the solitary monk who inhabits it solaces himself by descending at times to enjoy the company of his brethren below. The present monk has occupied his post for sixteen years, and during that time has been a rigid vegetarian, eating no meat, eggs, fish, or milk, but only garden produce. In the narrow dingy cell of this monk we found a few Slavonic manuscripts, and some early printed books from the press at Keiff. The small and singular chapel in which the services of the Orthodox Church are sung daily, is a cavern in the live rock, with a lean-to roof of wooden slabs, under which it is just possible to stand upright. Its shape is as singular as everything else in the hermitage. The altar, placed on a natural shelf in the rock, stands north-east. Adjoining the chapel is the powder magazine belonging to the district. A spring gushing from the rock in this out-of-the-way place affords an unfailing supply of water. A little garden of herbs, which is only accessible from this hermitage, supplies the hermit-monk with the necessary food. A loopholed wall, two or three rifles, besides piles of stones, conveniently placed for hurling on the heads of any intruders, make the place impregnable, whilst the garden and spring of water save it from the dangers of a blockade. It is said never to have been entered except for a short time during the last war. Mirko held this post with half-adozen men, and for eight days the cannon of the Turkish army played from the heights opposite upon the living walls of this monastic fortress. Three or four assaults were easily repelled, with great loss to the assailants, when Mirko withdrew without molestation in the face of thousands of hostile troops, who entered it after he had retired.

The chapel of upper Ostrug was hollowed out—I can hardly say built—by St. Basil, to whose memory it is dedicated, and was re-edified in 1774. His body, enclosed in a coffin, rests in the little choir of this miniature chapel. This St. Basil is not either of the theologians of that name, but a less distinguished local saint, formerly Metropolitan of the Herzegovina, who, tired out by the persecution of the Turks, took shelter in Montenegro somewhen in the seventeenth century, and made this almost inaccessible spot his retreat. Here he died, and the little chapel or hermitage-monastery of upper Ostrug arose to his memory soon after. His shrine, and indeed the two monasteries of upper and lower Ostrug, are held in such veneration that it is said that sometimes as many as 20,000 pilgrims climb the heights and visit the churches there. These come from Bosnia, Albania, and the Herzegovina, as well as from all parts of Montenegro, and their great happiness is to be able to carry off little chippings of the rock for amulets. It is singular that the veneration for St. Basil is by no means confined to the Christians. The Bosnian Mahommedaus esteem his shrine quite as highly as their Christian neighbours, and come, in sickness and distress, to pray before the coffin of the saint and to entreat the prayers of St. Basil for themselves, their family, or friends. The tenacity with which the Bosnians, who were compelled to embrace Mahommedanism, cling to these and other observances of their old creed distinguish them from the rest of the worshippers of the false prophet. On the Sunday that I spent at Ostrug, I found two sick persons who had been brought and placed in the shadow of the church in the hope of recovery. I trust their simple faith was rewarded. The annual offerings of the pilgrims is the chief source of revenue to these two monasteries, but in addition to these they possess some landed property in the neighbourhood of Dioclea, which is let out to tenants who return one-third of the produce by way of rent. A school is about to be built near this monastery for the use of the surrounding villages.

Three or four miles' ride from Ostrug brought us to the northern frontier of Montenegro at Gradatz, and gave me a spectacle which I hope, for the sake of our common humanity, cannot be paralleled in any part of the world. We pulled up our horses at the edge of a precipitous slope, and looked down upon the beautiful plain of Niksich in the Herzegovina, clothed in perennial green and interlaced by two or three small streams of water. To the north this plain is backed by a range of mountains-the true geographical frontier of Montenegro, but at present in the occupation of the Turks. This range was formerly wooded, and even yet remains of noble forests in some parts blacken the slope of the limestone mountains. When we looked at it, however, the whole range was almost concealed by dense clouds of smoke. For eighteen months these mountains have been burning, and the magnificent oaks and beeches which furnished the country around with the choicest timber are now almost wholly destroyed. This has been done by orders from Constantinople, in order to form a sterile frontier, but its effect will be to destroy the plain which lies at the foot of the mountains, and to reduce it to the condition of the arid plains of Albania on the other frontier of Montenegro. But it will do more than even this: it will dry up the tributaries of the Zeta which flow through Montenegro, and render barren much of the scanty territory possessed by these people. Such a flagrant injury to the country of a neighbour is surely contrary to the spirit if not to the letter of the law of nations, and now the Turk has been brought within the pale of civilisation such an act merits our strongest reprobation.

Returning to sleep at the monastery we set out next day for Danilograd, passing through the fertile plain of the Zeta, which river we forded in the course of our journey. The houses are mostly perched on the rocky sides of the mountains rising on either side of this plain. This is partly for defence, partly in order not to encroach upon the too scanty extent of cultivated soil. In our ride we crossed fields of potatoes, maize, melons, vines, tobacco, wheat, oats, barley, and capsicum, hedged with fig and pomegranate trees, with a few mulberry, cherry, pear, peach, cornel, and apple trees, and passed scattered cottages surrounded by gardens of kitchen-vegetables, out of which rose the tall conical hives which supply the Montenegrin peasant with a substitute for sugar. This is said to be almost the only parts of the country in which the plough is in use, the rugged character of Montenegro in general only permitting the use of the spade for turning up the ground. Here and there along this valley were cottages, still roofless, with charred rafters, blackened walls, and broken fences-the tokens of the last invasion by the armies of the Turk; but for the most part these have been restored, and the country when I passed through it was again smiling with the garb of peace.

Towards evening we reached a small hunting-lodge of the Prince, standing on a rising ground overlooking the Zeta. This had been built by Prince Danilo, with the expectation that Danilograd, as the village is called from its founder, might become the capital of the mountain principality, and that it might be possible for the Montenegrin court to leave the sterile plain and almost inaccessible village of Cettigne. The late war, however, showed that this desirable change cannot yet take place. The Turk is too near and the plain of the Zeta too accessible to a hostile army to allow the Prince to abandon the natural fortifications, where for nearly four centuries his predecessors have been compelled to live in order to preserve their independence. I trust, however, that the force of public European opinion may before long compel the Ottoman to respect the rights and liberties of this people more than he has hitherto done. It is no less the interest of Turkey than it is that of Montenegro, that an end should be put to the periodical attempts of the former power to subdue this mountain principality. Within the last three or four years, a circle of forty-eight small fortresses have been built close to the frontier of Montenegro, -to the injury of these people, indeed. but at an expense which the Turkish treasury can but ill afford; and the maintenance of these blockhouses and their garrisons is a perpetual drain upon the resources of the Sultan, which cannot for ever be met by loans on the exchanges of London and Paris.

After a night's rest we rose early, to ride across the mountains to Rieka. On our way we passed large nursery grounds in which the Prince had planted great numbers of mulberry-trees, to be distributed to the cottars throughout the principality. As a large quantity of silk is annually exported, the growth of this tree is of prime necessity to the Montenegrins. Unfortunately for them, in the late war the soldiers of Omar Pasha singled out these trees for destruction, and wherever the mulberry was found, it was cut down by the Turkish troops, so that it will take years to repair the waste of war in this respect. In our route across the mountain we passed, I regret to say at some distance, a field where the interesting experiment is being made to ascertain whether the coffee-plant can be reared with success in Montenegro.

After about a six hours' ride, not over rough ground, but rather over the top of a rugged limestone rock, we found ourselves in the middle of the little village of Selo-Gradatz-glad to halt, to bait our tired horses and to prepare our own breakfast. We had hardly swept away the crumbs when a smart shower compelled us to take shelter in one of the cottages; and as it may be taken as a fair type of the ordinary residences of small Montenegrin proprietors, it may be well to describe it. The village road was of the same or even of a more rugged character than the mountain-way which we had just been traversing, and the only means of getting along was by leaping from one stone to another-a fatiguing feat, and one which sometimes required care, as the hard limestone-in fact, marble-was polished by use and heated by the sun until it was as smooth as glass. On one side of the road at the entrance of the village was a threshing-floor, raised some ten or twelve feet above the pathway, and resting on large uncemented stones. The space below the floor was used as a store-house for straw and maize stalks. The threshing-floor itself, like all others throughout Montenegro, was well cemented and finished with care, and surrounded by a wall of about two feet in height. A white mulberry-tree in the centre of the road flung its shade over the threshing-floor. On the other side of the way was a wall surrounding cottages. This was also of uncemented stones, flecked with lichens and half covered with blackberry bushes. Inside the wall a pigstye and another mulberry-tree filled up the little court. The house itself was one long apartment, partially divided in the centre by hurdles. It had two doors in front, so that it had the appearance of two small houses instead of one large one, and each end of the house was lighted by a small unglazed window or loophole. Behind, the roof of thatch kept down by means of bands and large stones, rested on the live rock. In front, the wall was of hewn stone, cemented together with care, with here and there a loophole for defence. In the room which I first entered, one or two logs and one wooden chair were all the ostensible seats; others, however, could be extemporised out of the upon it from above. The fields of aquatic plants, boxes and large stones which lay on the earthen floor. Overhead were a few rafters, not however, intended to support a ceiling, for there was none, but ranged from wall to wall as a convenient means of supplying the place of cupboards. From these rafters hung strings of onions, a ham or two, some salted fish, and two or three curiously coloured sheets of paper, which looked as though they had been used by juvenile artists for their first attempts in water-colour painting. On close inspection, however, I found the paper to be covered with the eggs of the silkworm hung up for hatching. Two or three earthen jars for water, a wooden bicker for milk, a coarse woollen rug, a child's cradle of primitive and uncomfortable construction, a couple of reaping-hooks, a heavy horse-pistol and a rifle, were all visible through the dingy atmosphere. On one of the logs of wood sat a woman nursing her infant, two or three other children crowded behind their mother and peered over her shoulder with awo and astonishment at the strangers. In another part of the room, stretched at full length in a sound sleep. was a girl of some fifteen years, and at her feet lay a young calf in apparently the same state of unconsciousness, whilst a couple of dogs velped and snarled and contested with the children the right of the occupancy of the floor. Behind the hurdle other members of the family had collected, to watch our movements from a safe distance. This apartment contained the rough boards on which the bedding of the various members of the family could be laid. A mass of rugs and other furniture for beds occupied one corner, and firewood was heaped up in another. On a fire at the end of the apartment was placed a pot, the steam from which announced that preparation for dinner was going on. What else there might be in the room I could not see, as the smoke from the beech logs obscured the room before it escaped by the regular outlets in the roof. Without any request, hospitality, as a right to be freely dispensed, was given us, at least to the extent of shelter, water, fair wholesome wine, and a glass of raki; and so, until the rain had ceased, my companion and myself, with our half-dozen attendants, made ourselves at home. It was just such a picture as Sir Walter Scott has left us of a highland cottage of the last century, or indeed such as several estates in Scotland can show at the present moment. The heaps of maize for man and pig, the mulberry-tree, the fig-branches trailing over the wall, the vine heavy with purple clusters of grapes, and the hedges of pomegranate bushes on fire with scarlet blossoms, were southern, and gave a local colouring to the scene; but apart from these it was easy to imagine oneself in some almost unfrequented spot, at a distance from railways, in the northern part of Great Britain.

Soon after leaving this village we came to the pass in the mountain looking down upon the Rjeka. Though I had gone down this river only two or three days before, I did not recognise it as I looked water-lilies and rushes had now the appearance of meadow-land, and the river was diminished to a mere silvery thread of water winding its way through a mountain gorge. Our ride of two or three miles to Rjeka lay along the side of and half way down the mountain, past small farmsteads, cottages, and tiny villas, over the same kind of rough path as I have already described, with a hedge on one side of fig and pomegranate, powdered and scented with clematis, and on the other a precipitous rock, with breaks at intervals giving us glimpses of bits of sylvan and pastoral scenery. As evening was closing in we reached Rjeka, where I was to pass the night in my old lodgings.

Next morning we traversed the same mountain road lying between this place and Cettigne, which we had passed over at the commencement of our journey. Then, however, it was dark night, now it was broad daylight, and the ride and seenery pleased me much. The country between Cettigne and Rjeka consists of two or three basins, each with an enormous girdle of rocks encircling a beautiful plain at the bottom. In these plains were the fields of cultivated land, belonging to the cottagers and farmers whose houses were for the most part perched halfway up the mountain. After a ride of about five hours we reached Cettigne. Here I rested until about four o'clock on the following day, when, having taken my leave of my kind friends, I set out on my return to Cattaro, with an escort of halfa-dozen men, and accompanied by one of the cousins of the Prince, who was on his way to Ragusa. Night overtook us at the top of the pass looking down upon the sea and the city on its border; and it was not until nine o'clock that we reached the barriers of the city, and after some delay, as the gates were closed, and we were now in Austrian territory and in a land of passports and suspicion, we obtained admission.

My stay in Montenegro had extended to a fortnight - long enough to make myself acquainted with the character of the scenery, to traverse the most interesting portions of these highlands of the Adriatic, and to make me regret the kind friends whom I was to leave behind. Beyond this, it requires but little to understand what are the causes of the poverty of the Montenegrins, and the reasons for their quarrels with the Turks. Montenegro is a chaos of sterile mountains; the plains below have gradually, by treachery or force, been seized by the Turks and reduced to utter barenness. Though the people make good mariners-indeed, the best seamen in the Austrian mercantile navy are of this race—they have no port for the sale of their goods, or by which articles of foreign growth or manufacture can be introduced into their country. The consequence is that they increase on a spot of territory which is narrowed from time to time, and which does not at the present moment grow sufficient food for their sustenance." They are in fact like the people of a large fortified city, living in perpetual blockade. At the foot of the mountains which make the western frontier of their country, are two or three small ports, which properly belong to Montenegro, though held by the Turks with little if any advantage to themselves, but which, if transferred to the people of this principality. would enable the brave mountaineers to find that employment which they now so greatly need. At the time of the Crimean war, Prince Danilo, it is well known, remained at peace with Turkey, although the straits to which that power was then reduced offered a tempting opportunity to the Montenegrin prince. It was believed that the service would have been acknowledged by the cession of a port, but peace was negociated and nothing was done. Indeed, so far from any acknowledgment of the friendly conduct of Prince Danilo being made by Turkey, as soon as peace was secured Omar Pasha was directed to invade Montenegro with a large Turkish army; and the good service rendered by Prince Danilo was returned by the devastation of some of the most fertile portions of the principality-devastations from which they have not yet recovered. Good faith and gratitude, if such a virtue is to be expected in a nation, required a different return. The cession of a port and the yielding the plains which lie at the foot of their mountains to the people of Montenegro, would not only be a measure of strict justice on the part of the Turks, but would also be consistent with the truest policy. The enormous levies of men which are fast depopulating the Turkish empire, are only needed because of the insane idea which holds possession of the Turkish authorities, and their belief that they can yet reduce the people of Serbia and Montenegro to subjection. Were a good understanding come to with these principalities, the armies which now drain the population of the empire and exhaust the treasury of the sultan would be to a great measure stayed.

But I have no intention to wander forth into politics. After a night's rest at Cattaro, next morning, leaving this city at six o'clock, I went ou board the Austrian steamer for Trieste, and stopping as usual at Ragusa-long enough to pass two or three pleasant hours with our consul, Mr. Paton, who was amongst the first to direct attention to the people of Montenegro by the publication of his volumes of researches on the Danube and the Adriatic-at Spalato long enough to get a ramble, not only through the city, but some miles into the country-at Sebanico for service on Sunday morning at the Greek church, and at Zara for the afternoon service-I reached Trieste on Tuesday morning. Leaving Trieste on the evening of that day, I passed through some of the most romantic scenery of Styria, and reached Vienna on Wednesday afternoon, arriving there just too late for the train to Paris. I remained in that city until Thursday evening, when I left for England: and passing Passau, Nuremberg, Darmstadt, Mayence, Coblentz, Cologue and Brussels, arrived at Calais on Saturday at noon, and by five o'clock was at my home in London.

WILLIAM DENTON.

DUST HO!

A LADEN dust-cart is neither a picturesque nor an odorous object, but as it drawls along the road with its sluggish driver, reduced like the dyer's hand, to the colour of the material in which he works, we must regard it in an economical point of view, at least, as we would a chrysalis in its first stage of transmutation into a butterfly. "When things are at their worst," says the old adage, "they must take a turn for the better," and what to an ordinary observer can have descended lower in the material scale than the dust-heap? There mundane things seem to have reached the last stage of exhaustion, repulsiveness, and deformity.

Our painters, fond as they are of giving us pictures of still life, have never attempted a dust-heap, and yet nothing is so still as the dust. If a man might be allowed to moralise over such an unsavoury object, the first thing that would strike him would be the painful sense of desolation it exhibits. The absolute repose of the dust, the detritus of all earthly things, the fine grains of nothingness into which the world is day by day being ground down by the action of the elements and man, is in itself impressive enough. But a dust-heap is not all dust: there, for instance, is a rusty cage-like structure, the shattered ribs of which project from the heap-the fact that it is an old crinoline is patent enough, but what a tale it tells of past finery and flaunting pride, of human life in its exultant moments! Then again, we see perhaps an old bonnet, smudged and grimy, still retaining its artificial flowers. It is the contrast between the picture of the adornments of blooming life in the past, and the rotten stillness and desolation into which it has merged, which makes a dust-heap a matter upon which a wise mind may find food for thought.

Perhaps in a small compass, the refuse of our houses, if allowed to remain undisturbed, would afford to future ages a better idea of the domestic belongings, the comforts, and the contrivances, among us at different epochs, than any other physical record we may leave behind us. An example of the value of refuse heaps as records of cotemporary life, was afforded the other day at the exhumation of the Romano-British city of Uriconium. Here a dust-heap, near one of the public baths, was discovered, which assisted in no inconsiderable degree to eke out a picture of semi-civilised British life after the departure of the Romans, sixteen hundred years ago. In this ash-heap were found pieces of Samian ware, keys, chains, slates with the nails still remaining in them, hinges, even children's leaden toys, bodkins, bracelets, and a bottle of eye-salve, with directions for its use stamped upon the seal!

The middens of northern Europe again, are remarkable examples of remnants left to us of ancient life; and in the detritus found beneath the lake habitations of Switzerland, we have records transmitted to us of a period before even the tools were invented which could shape a recording stone. What would antiquaries give if they could find ashheaps "of the period," ranging back at intervals of five hundred years, through the last three thousand years?

But whilst we have been talking of ash-heaps as valuable records, and moralising over them as Hamlet did over poor Yorick's skull, our dust-cart has got as far as Paddington, where the chrysalis, as we have termed the dust, begins the first of its series of wonderful transmutations—its resurrection from death to life.

Riders on the line of omnibuses which have their terminus at the Royal Oak, whilst passing over the bridge of the Paddington Canal, must have had their curiosity excited by a singular spectacle which may be noticed upon its banks. Here are situated the yards of the great dust contractors of the metropolis, and here from morn till dewy eve, may be seen a busy throng of men and women, who may be counted by hundreds, toiling and moiling with spade, and pick, and sieve, amid heaps of rubbish. At the distance it is not easy to discern the nature of their operations, but the view we lately obtained stimulated us to further inquiry, and with the permission of Mr. Ferguson, who is the largest metropolitan dust contractor, we were enabled to follow the dust-heap into its various elements, and to learn the different operations by which they rise again from their "ashes" to do service in the world.

The smell that greets the visitor as he enters the yard is so peculiar in its offensiveness, that with a scientific inquisitiveness we paused to analyse it. It was not sewer odour, it was not rotten cabbage odour, it was not the odour of decaying animal matter; but it was a combination of all three, with an after flavour of old boots and dirty dishclouts. We defy Mr. Piesse to imitate it, cleverly as he imitates the odour of the most delicate flowers. Can the occupation be healthy? we inquired mentally. We shall answer the question hereafter.

Whilst we were in the yard several of the carts were driven in, and their contents were shot in heaps in all directions upon the ground. Upon these heaps the men immediately commenced working, clearing away the rougher articles, and preparing the dust for the operations of the women. The women-or rather those specimens of humanity so called, for they certainly do not belong to the gentler sex-use but one appliance, and remain almost constantly in a stooping attitude. They are mere machines for sifting. The men fill their sieves, but they have a diverse duty to perform. Surrounding each sifter are several baskets, into which the contents of the sieve are sorted. Let us watch a sifter at work. As she sifts, the fine dust and coal ashes descend? these are very important elements, the use of which we shall mention by-and-by. As the smaller matters pass through, the coarser ones appear upon the sieve, and with great rapidity the woman sorts the different articles into the different baskets which surround her. First of all, there are the pieces of coal. The richness of this so-called refuse is according to the richness of the neighbourhood from which the dust is collected. In neighbourhoods where the poor reside, very few waste pieces of coal ever find their way into the dust-hole-the shovel is too often at work throwing up the ashes upon the fire to allow of any stray pieces of coal escaping; but it is far different with the richer districts, where Jeames does not pay the coal bill, and where, consequently, he does not demean himself to put such vulgar "refuge" as ashes on the fire. A dust contractor of any experience, by merely looking at a heap, can tell whether it comes from a poor neighbourhood or not. Belgravia and Tyburnia can be detected in a moment; and the awful waste that goes on in the article of coal where "pampered menials" are employed, gives a good idea of the general extravagance of rich households arising from the carelessness of servants. The waste coal is sold to the poor in the neighbourhood.

Now appear upon the sieve the curiosities of the dust-bin. There is a bone, a valuable piece of refuse. In Mr. Ferguson's yard alone 15 cwt. is collected weekly. These bones are sent to Lambeth to be boiled, for the purpose of extracting all the fat they contain, and the gelatine for sizemaking purposes and for the use of the lozengemakers. That old bone, for instance, will yield as much gelatine as will go to make the transparent packet of sweets the little ones like so much. The bones themselves, if of the better sort, are used for a score of manufacturing purposes-nail brushes, handles of knives, buttons, &c., &c. Bones that are too small for manufacturing purposes are ground into powder and dissolved in sulphuric acid, and the product is a peculiar grey powder which sells for 16 guineas a ton as superphosphate of lime. This product is one of the most valuable fertilisers known. Mr. Symonds, in his curious book on waste substances, informs us that the county of Cheshire, which at the end of the last century had become almost sterile in consequence of the large quantity of phosphates taken out of the land in the form of corn and dairy produce, was restored by the application of bone-dressings. Thus the mouldy bone we see in the dust-bin returns to us in the bread we eat and the milk we drink, and, for the matter of that, in the light we strike, for the phosphorus of the lucifer-match also comes from old bones. Like the giant in the fairy tale, we grind our bones to make our bread. The circle of life is ever interchangeable; and when we look on the old Egyptian symbol of eternity, the serpent with its tail in its mouth, we see how the ancients instinctively hit upon a great truth which it required the knowledge of after ages to explain in all its bearings. Zed whereby, as Liebig indignantly says, we drain the fair foreign fields of their very life-blood; but we also scour foreign battle-fields, and the remains of warriors who have helped to partition out Europe into its present limits, are now doing further service by rendering up their bones to make our bread.

But there are other things in the sieve besides bones, and we must make haste if we wish to keep time with the sifter. Next comes glass. All the broken pieces of white glass are kept by themselves; they go to the melters either to be re-melted, or to help "start the furnace," as it is termed, the sand and flint requiring some aid of this kind to make it fuse quickly. The bottles are also placed by themselves in another basket. There is nothing we throw away with greater pleasure than physic bottles; after a long illness, they are the reminders of our troubles, and we do not care what becomes of them as long as they are removed from our sight. Here they are washed, and then they go the dismal round of the sick room again and again. Ginger-beer bottles arise from their dust-bins, and refresh thirsty souls as of yore, and all stoneware articles, even down to the penny ink-bottles, if perfect, are picked out and cleaned with acid, and once more come into circulation. Even old boots and shoes are not without their value. The soles are sliced up by the shoemakers, to make the packings for the soles of new shoes. Some of the better shoes and boots taken from the dust-hole, go to the clobberers in Monmouth-street, who make their bread by patching them and concealing cracks by means of heel-ball; and now and then the more artful accomplish the same deception by means of a paste made from road sweepings, known in the trade as a "smother." Old goloshes are melted again for their rubber, and the fine rags so carefully seized upon by the sifter, together with the fine paper, go to the mills to be converted into paper. It is extraordinary the number of crinolines that find their way to the dust-yard. They are stripped of their cotton covering, and their steel finds a place among the old iron. Under that name what a heterogeneous heap of battered articles are to be seen here-old frying-pans, saucepans, tea-trays, housemaids' pails, old tin articles. But they are speedily restored to the manufacturing world. The tinware, such as house-pails, are first treated for the recovery of their solder, which is more valuable than tin. The old iron sometimes goes across the sea as ballast, to be melted abroad. Ten years ago we exported 365 tons to the Continent. Scrap-iron that has been beating about the world is far more valuable than new iron; for instance, the nails cast in the road from horses' shoes are invaluable for the purpose of making gun-barrels. All Stubbs' patent twist barrels are made of this iron, which derives great additional toughness from the hammering it gets against the granite paving. Scraps of tin, such as the corner pieces which are made in cutting out the tops and bottoms of saucepans, are passed through the fire for the purpose of melting off their tin, and the iron of which they are composed being charcoal-iron is sold for a high price. A great deal of scrap-tin is used for a very singular purpose. There are many streams in the copper districts impregnated with copper held in solution. All this, if not intercepted, runs into the sea; but it has been discovered that the copper has a peculiar affinity for tin, and some clever people have utilised this fact by placing in the streams all the odd pieces of clean tin-plate they can obtain; in time, the copper is deposited upon this, and it is recovered by melting; the refuse tin is thus converted into a trap to secure the more valuable metal.

The sifters often find money, which of course they take care to keep. It has often been a puzzle to us to account for the number of Roman copper coins that are continually being turned up apparently from the surface of the ground. From the number of coppers found in the dust-bins, it is clear that the Roman coins we discover must have been accidentally thrown away in their dust-heaps, which have long since sunk to the level of the surrounding soil.

The coarser and more bulky articles of refuse, which are raked away by the men previously to the operations of the sifters, consist of what is termed soft core and hard core. The soft core is decaying vegetable matter, the sweepings of the markets. This stuff is sent off into the country by canal to make mauure. A couple of barge-loads a day leave Mr. Ferguson's premises. The speedy manner in which this refuse is removed accounts for the healthy condition of the workers in these yards. The hard core consists of broken crockeryware, old panchards, stoneware, &c., and makes a capital foundation for roads.

Commercially speaking the most valuable refuse is the breeze and ashes. The breeze is used to burn bricks. Many of our readers have doubtless seen in the suburban brick-fields solid piles of brick, from which the smoke of an internal fire is continually arising. Newly made bricks are embedded in breeze, every brick being kept separate from its neighbour. The breeze is lighted from below and gradually smoulders away with a red heat: in this manner the bricks are baked in the kiln to the required hardness without causing them to vitrify.

Dust contractors are generally brick-makers as well, and the barge that takes away the breeze returns with the bricks it has helped to bake. The small coal-dust and ashes is mixed with the clay composing the brick, and in the process of kilning, burns away and helps the process of baking. As London is built entirely of brick, it may be said to arise from its own ashes as the phænix is said to have done of old.

Among the more filthy sights of a dust-yard is the display of house-cloths, and other greasy woollen refuse, which are spread on the ground for the purpose of being dried. The destination of these worn-out and filthy articles are the Kentish hopgrounds. When a woollen rag is fit for nothing else, it serves as admirable manure; and the greasy cloth returns to us in the shape of the fragrant hop—in bitter beer we drink up our dish-clouts! But it must be very filthy and greasy indeed to find this final resting-place.

There are a number of mixed fabrics with warp of cotton and woof of wool, which not long since were worthless, as they could neither be converted into manure nor into paper; but by a very ingenious process these rags of mohair and alpaca are now reduced to their elements by the action of superheated steam exerted under the pressure of six atmospheres in closed digesters. The wool is reduced to a fine black powder know as an excellent manure, by the name of Ulmate of Ammonia. leaving the cotton intact and fit for the paper maker. An old woollen waistcoat or coat is sometimes raked out of the dust-heap; but this, if not too dirty, finds its way to the Yorkshire mill, where it is put into the "devil" and reground for shoddy. The material which furnishes most of the cheap garments of the shops, and for the matter of that. some of the fashionable Petershams, Tweeds, and Witneys are made out of this material. When a garment is too worn to be "revived," to this end it comes; and, as may be supposed, the manufacture of shoddy has grown into a mighty trade, which is carried on principally at the town of Batley, in Yorkshire. The amount of old clothes worked up afresh in these mills annually is equal to 20,000 tons of rag and wool; from this it will be seen what an enormous amount of fleeces we save by this simple reconstruction of what but a few years ago was a useless rag. Sometimes pieces of bread, if not too stale, are taken possession of by the women and placed in their wallets as one of their "perks," as they term the small articles they are allowed to take home with them. In France a very remarkable man has built up a colossal industry in this very article. Observing the amount of bits of bread that were wasted at every table, and at the same time noting the quantity of bread crumbs used in French cookery, he applied himself to the new industry of bread collecting; and by degrees his carts were seen all over Paris. He collected from the chiffonnier's basket, from the convent slop-tub, from the restaurant, from the private houses, &c., and he established bakeries, in which these refuse pieces were baked and then grated fine by young girls. There is scarcely a restaurant in Paris, excepting those of the highest class, in which, if you order soupe au pain, or purée au croûton, you will not be pretty sure to taste old crusts refreshed by the process of the ingenious Frenchman. The burnt pieces he converted into tooth-powder. He has long since retired with a splendid fortune; but the process is still carried on, and the carts in which the bread-scraps are collected are still to be seen going about Paris in every direction.

Of all the commodities rescued from decay by the ingenuity of the dust-contractor, the most valuable is the breeze, which makes the ashes of cities a source of revenue, instead of an obnoxious refuse to be got rid of at great expense. Its value of course depends upon the amount of building going on; and as in London houses are springing up in every direction, this refuse must yield a large return to the parochial authorities. A chaldron of breeze, when in great demand, is said to be worth a guinea. If we had not been so improvident as to give away to a public company the greater portion of the sewage collected by the main-drainage scheme in the pumping-places in Essex, a splendid return might have been expected from this refuse in every sense of the word; and this, together with the dust, should have yielded a profit which would have cleared off the greater portion of our parochial rates. We are told that the refuse of Antwerp, which at one time cost the authorities 1000l. annually to cart away, is now sold for 40,000l. Now, considering the size of the two places, the refuse of the metropolis, reckoned at the same rate, ought to be, at least, worth a million of money annually-a sum more than sufficient to pay all parish expenses, and perhaps to yield something over to the ratepayer.

But we must not close this paper without saying something about the dust-men and women, as well as the dust: and first, of the ladies. The chiffonnières of Paris are said to be amongst the most savage and abandoned of that ungovernable population, and history has recorded the atrocious part they played in many a horrible scene during the Revolutionary days. The English chiffonnière, we fear, does not rank much higher morally than her French compatriot. But though gross and animal to the last degree, and so unsexed that you doubt whether she even be a woman, yet there is a touch in her of the national manly character. When these women fight among themselves, which is pretty often, there is none of the scratching and hair-pulling which distinguishes the usual contests of the sex: they are manly even in their rage. They simply go to work exactly as men would do. The lookers-on form a ring, the principals have backers, and they set to work with closed fists, and fight as fairly as Tom Cribb would have done. In the last century, there were professional boxers of the female sex, who fought for money, just as the men do now; but even these professionals do not appear to have conquered the female tendency to claw, as it was made a condition of each match, that the combatants should fight with money in their hands, which was forfeited to the opponent the moment it was dropped, thus providing against the use of the nails. But the modern dust-weman does not require this ingenious method of restraint, and she gives and takes with a gallantry and pluck, if we may use the term, which cannot be excelled by any member of the prize-ring. It is well to note even this spirit of fair play among them, for otherwise they form the lowest dregs, intellectually and morally, of the population. Their wages are only one shilling and twopence a day, and their "perks"-as they term their perquisites, which consist of one pailful of cinders, and as much refuse wood as they can carry home daily-are valued at about three shillings more weekly. Working so hard as they do for eight hours per day at such a repulsive employment, and getting such small pay, it may be concluded that their ranks are recruited from among the very lowest of the population. Nevertheless, they are not so low but that human sympathy and kindness may reach them, and we regret to find that as a class they have been utterly neglected by those worthy people who go about doing good. We do not allude to mere teameetings, for we fear that these alone, however well conducted, can have no permanent influence upon their life, but to that constant intercommunication with a fairer and more beneficent civilisation, such as some of our charitable visiting societies afford. At present they are as much outcasts from any species of culture, although living in its midst, as the Indian squaw.

We fear the dustman is no whit better than the dustwoman. They are, in fact, a sadly drunken lot; perhaps the nature of their occupation may, to a certain extent, excuse this. It seems now to be a practice with them never to empty a dustbin without demanding twopence for drink-money, which they call their "sparrows," and if this is freely granted to them, or its worth in beer, which we fear is the case but too often, we may guess the amount of liquor they consume in the course of the day. There is a certain number of them who, knowing the value of the dust, call and take it away without any authority and sell it: these are called "flying dustmen," of course from the celerity of their movements whilst engaged in their surreptitious employment. We are glad to find that, notwithstanding the filthy nature of their occupation, there is very little sickness among them as a class. This, no doubt, is owing to the open-air nature of their occupation. The mere fact that the occupation is a nuisance to the public, as far as the smell and sight is concerned, is no proof whatever that it is unhealthy.

When the proprietor of a bone-boiling factory, at Lambeth, was indicted some time since on account of the nuisance it occasioned, he replied to the charge by producing in court a healthy family of young children, who had been brought up in the midst of the so-called unhealthy atmosphere. The dustman can make an equally good report of the scavenger's yard, for underneath that grimy coating of dust, he is ruddy and fat, far healthier-looking than the city clerk, who never soils his fingers with anything fouler than ink, and never exerts himself beyond getting up and down from a stool. Dr. Guy, indeed, who has considered the class from a sanitary point of view, says they are far healthier than the majority of working men, and that the master scavengers "are the healthiest set of meu I have ever seen." Nevertheless, we do not think even this high authority will induce anybody to live near a "laystall" or scavenger's yard, which is certainly the most repulsive-looking place we have ever seen.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE breakfast-table in the Cottage was as cheerful as usual next morning, and showed no premonitory shadow. Winnie did not come down-stairs early: and perhaps it was all the more cheerful for her absence. And there were flowers on the table, and everything looked bright. Will was absent, it is true, but nobody took much notice of that as yet. He might be late, or he might have gone out; and he was not a boy to be long negligent of the necessities of nature. Aunt Agatha even thought it necessary to order something additional to be kept hot for him. "He has gone out, I suppose," Miss Seton said; "and it is rather cold this morning, and a long walk in this air will make the boy as hungry as a hunter. Tell Peggy not to cook that trout till she hears him come in."

The maid looked perturbed and breathless; but she said, "Yes, ma'am," humbly—as if it was she who was in the wrong; and the conversation and the meal were resumed. A minute or two after, however, she appeared once more: "If you please, there's somebody asking for Mr. Hugh," said the frightened girl, standing, nervous and panting, with her hand upon the door.

"Somebody for me?" said Hugh. "The gamekeeper, I suppose; he need not have been in such a hurry. Let him come in, and wait a little. I'll be ready presently."

"But, my dear boy," said Aunt Agatha, "you must not waste the man's time. It is Sir Edward's time, you know; and he may have quantities of things to do. Go and see what he wants: and your mother will not fill out your coffee till you come back."

And Hugh went out, half laughing, half grumbling—but he laughed no more, when he saw Peggy standing severe and pale at the kitchen door, waiting for him. "Mr. Hugh," said Peggy, with the aspect of a chief justice, "tell me this moment, on your conscience, is there any quarrel or disagreement between your brother and you?"

"My brother and me? Do you mean Will?" said Hugh, in amazement. "Not the slightest. What do you mean? We were never better friends in our life."

"God be thanked!" said Peggy; and then she took him by the arm, and led the astonished young man up-stairs to Will's room. "He's never sleepit in that bed this night. His little bag's gone, with a change in't. He's putten on another pair of boots. Where is the laddie gone? And me that'll have to face his mother, and tell her she's lost her bairn!"

"Lost her bairn! Nousense!" cried Hugh, aghast; "he has only gone out for a walk."

"He may be lying in Kirtell deeps for anything we can tell. And me that will have to break it to his mother——"

Hugh stood still in consternation for a moment, and then he burst into an agitated laugh. "He

"When a boy like that goes out for a walk, he does not take a change with him," said Peggy.

Hugh stood still in consternation for a moment, and then he burst into an agitated laugh. "He would not have taken a change with him, as you say, into Kirtell deeps," he said. "Nonsense, Peggy! Are you sure he has not been in bed? Don't you go and frighten my mother. And, indeed, I dare say he does not always go to bed. I see his light burning all the night through, sometimes. Peggy, don't go and put such ridiculous ideas into people's heads. Will has gone out to walk, as usual. There he is, down-stairs. I hear him coming in: make haste, and cook his trout."

Hugh, however, was so frightened himself by all the terrors of inexperience, that he precipitated himself down-stairs, to see if it was really Will who had entered. It was not Will, however, but a boy from the railway, with a note, in Will's handwriting, addressed to his mother, which took all the colour out of Hugh's cheeks—for he was still a boy, and new to life, and did not think of any such easy demonstration of discoutent as that of going to visit Uncle Penrose. He went into the breakfast-room with so pale a face, that both the ladies got up in dismay, and made a rush at him to know what it was.

"It is nothing," said Hugh, breathless, waving them off, "nothing—only a note—I have not read it yet—wait a little. Mother, don't be afraid."

"What is there to be afraid of?" asked Mary, in amazement and dismay.

And then Hugh again burst into an unsteady and tremulous laugh. He had read the note, and threw it at his mother with an immense load lifted off his heart, and feeling wildly gay in the revulsion. "There's nothing to be frightened about," said Hugh. "By Jove, to think the fellow has no more taste—gone off to see Uncle Penrose. I wish them joy!"

"Who is it that has gone to visit Mr. Penrose?" said Aunt Agatha, and Hugh burst into explanation, while Mary, not by any means so much relieved, read her boy's letter.

"I confess I got a fright," said Hugh. "Peggy dragged me up-stairs to show me that he had not slept in his bed, and said his carpet-bag was gone, and insinuated—I don't know what—that we had quarrelled, and all sorts of horrors. But he's gone to see Uncle Penrose. It's all right, mother, I always thought it was all right."

"And had you quarrelled?" asked Aunt Agatha, in consternation.

"I am not sure it is all right," said Mary; "why has he gone to see Uncle Penrose? and what has he heard? and without saying a word to me."

Mary was angry with her boy, and it made her heart sore—it was the first time any of them had taken a sudden step out of her knowledge—and then what had he heard? Something worse than any simple offence or discontent might be lurking behind.

But Hugh, of course, knew nothing at all about that. He sat down again to his interrupted breakfast, and laughed and talked, and made merry. "I wonder what Uncle Penrose will say to him?" said Hugh; "I suppose he has gone and spent all his money getting to Liverpool; and what could his motive be, odd fellow as he is? The girls are all married—"

"My dear boy, Will is not thinking of girls as you are," said Mary, beguiled into a smile.

Hugh laughed and grew red, and shook his abundant youthful locks. "We are not talking of what I think," he said; "and I suppose a man may do worse than think about girls—a little: but the question is, what was Will thinking about? Uncle Penrose cannot have ensnared him with his odious talk about money. By-the-way, I must send him some. We can't lot an Ochterlony be worried about a few miserable shillings there."

"I don't think we can let an Ochterlony, at least so young a one as Will, stay uninvited," said Mary. "I feel much disposed to go after him and bring him home, or at least find out what he means."

"No, you shall do nothing of the kind," said Hugh, hastily. "I suppose our mother can trust her sons out of her sight. Nobody must go after him. Why, he is seventeen—almost grown up. He must not feel any want of confidence—"

"Want of confidence!" said Aunt Agatha.
"Hngh, you are only a boy yourself. What do you know about it? I think Mary would be very wrong if she let Will throw himself into temptation; and one knows there is every kind of temptation in those large, wicked towns," said Miss Seton shuddering. It was she who knew nothing about it, no more than a baby, and still less did she know or guess the kind of temptation that was acting upon the truant's mind.

"If that were all," said Mary, slowly, and then she sighed. She was not afraid of the temptations of a great town. She did not even know what she feared. She wanted to bring back her boy, to hear from his own lips what his motive was. It did not seem possible that there could be any harm meant by his boyish secresy. It was even hard for his mother to persuade herself that Will could think of any harm; but still it was strange. When she thought of Percival's visit and Will's expedition to Carlisle, her heart fluttered within her, though she scarcely knew why. Will was not like other boys of his age; and then it was "something he had heard." "I think," she said, with hesitation, "that one of us should go—either you or I——"

"No," said Hugh. "No, mother, no; don't think of it; as if he were a girl or a Frenchman! Why it's Will! What harm can he do? If he likes to visit Uncle Penrose, let him; it will not be such a wonderful delight. I'll send him some money today."

This, of course, was how it was settled; for Mary's terrors were not strong enough to contend with her natural English prejudices against surveillance and restraint, backed by Hugh's energetic remonstrances. When Winnie heard of it, she dashed immediately at the idea that her husband's influence had something to do with Will's strange flight, and was rather pleased and flattered by the thought. "I said he would strike me through my friends," she said to Aunt Agatha, who was bewildered, and did not know what this could mean.

"My dear love, what good could it do him to interfere with Will?" said Miss Seton. "A mere boy, and who has not a penny. If he had wanted to injure us, it would have been Hugh that he would have tried to lead away."

"To lead away?" said Winnie scornfully. "What does he care for leading away? He wants to do harm, real harm. He thinks he can strike me through my friends."

When Aunt Agatha heard this she turned round to Mary, who had just come into the room, and gave a little deprecating shake of her head, and a pathetic look. Poor Winnie! She could think of nothing but her husband and his intentions; and how could he do this quiet household real harm? Mary said nothing, but her uncasiness increased more and more. She could not sit down to her work or take up any of her ordinary occupations. She went to Will's room and examined it throughout, and looked through his wardrobe to see what he had taken with him, and searched vainly for any evidence of his meaning; and then she wrote him a long letter of questions and appeals, which would have been full of pathetic eloquence to anybody who knew what was in her mind, but would have appeared simply amazing and unintelligible to anybody ignorant of her history, as she herself perceived, and burnt it, and wrote a second in which there was still a certain mystery. She reminded him that he might have gone away comfortably with everybody's knowledge, instead of making the household uneasy about him; and she could not but let a little wonder creep through, that of all people in the world it was Uncle Penrose whom he had elected to visit; and then she made an appeal to him: "What have I done to forfeit my boy's confidence? what can you have heard, oh Will, my dear boy, that you could not tell to your mother?" Her mind was relieved by writing, but still she was uneasy and disquieted. If he had been severely kept in, or had any reason to fear a refusal; -but to steal away when he might have had full leave and every facility; this was one of the things which appeared the most strange.

The servants, for their part, set it down to a quarrel with his brother, and jealousy about Nelly, and took Hugh's part, who was always the favourite. And as for Hugh himself, he sent his brother a cheque (his privilege of drawing cheques being still new, and very agreeable), and asked why he was such an ass as to run away, and bade him enjoy himself. The house was startled—but after all, it was no such great matter; and nobody except Mary wasted much consideration upon Will's escapade after that first morning. He was but a boy; and it was natural, everybody thought, that boys should do something foolish now and then.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

WHILE this commotion arose in the Cottage, Will was flying along towards Liverpool in a curious state of mind. Not even now had the matter taken any moral aspect to him. He did not feel that he had gone skulking off to deliver a cowardly blow. All that he was conscious of was the fact, that having something to tell which he could not somehow persuade himself to tell, he was going to make the communication from a distance under Uncle Penrose's advice. And yet the boy was not comfortable. had become apparent to him vaguely, that after this communication was made, the relations existing between himself and his family must be changed. That his mother might be "angry," which was his boyish term for any or every displeasure that might cloud Mrs. Ochterlony's mind; that Hugh might take it badly-and that after all it was a troublesome business, and he would be pleased to get it over. He was travelling in the cheapest way, for his money was scanty; but he was not the kind of boy to be beguiled from his own thoughts by the curious third-class society into which he was thus brought, or even by the country which gradually widened and expanded under his eyes from the few beaten paths he knew so well, into that wide unknown stretch of hill and plain which was the world. A vague excitement, it is true, came into his mind as he felt himself to have passed out of the reach of everything he knew, and to have entered upon the undiscovered; but this excitement did not draw him out of his own thoughts. It did but mingle with them, and put a quickening thrill of life into the strange maze. The confused country people at the stations, who did not know which carriage to take, and wandered hurried and disconsolate on the platforms, looking into all-the long swift moment of passage over the silent country, in which the train, enveloped in its own noise, made for itself a distinct atmosphere—and then again a shriek, a pause, and another procession of faces looking in at the window -this was Will's idea of the long journey. He was not imaginative; but still everybody appeared to him hurried, and downcast, and pre-occupied. Even the harmless country folks had the air of having something on their minds. And through all he kept on pondering what his mother, and what Hugh would say. Poor boy! his discovery had given him no advantage as yet; but it had put a cross upon his shoulders—it had bound him so hard and fast that he could not escape from it. It had brought, if not guilt, yet the punishment of guilt into all his thoughts.

Mr. Penrose had a handsome house at some distance from Liverpool, as was natural. found it a very tedious and troublesome business to get there, not to speak of the calls for sixpences from omnibuses and porters, and everybody (he thought) who looked at him, which were very severe upon his slender purse. And when he arrived, his uncle's servants looked upon him with manifest suspicion; he had never been there before, and Mr. Penrose was now living alone, his wife being dead, and all his children married, so that there was nobody in the house who could identify the unknown nephew. The Cottage was not much bigger than Mr. Penrose's porter's lodge, and yet that small tenement had looked down upon the great mansion all its life, and been partly ashamed of it, which sentiment gave Will an unconscious sense that he was doing Uncle Penrose an honour in going to visit him. But when he was met at the door by the semi-polite suspicion of the butler, who proposed that he should call again, with an evident reference in his mind to the spoons, it gave the boy the forlornest feeling that can be conceived. He was alone, and they thought him an impostor, and nobody here knew or cared whether he was shut out from the house or not. His heart went back to his home with that revulsion which everybody knows. There, everybody would have rushed to open the door to him, and welcome him back; and though his errand here was simply to do that home as much injury as possible, his heart swelled at the contrast. While he stood, however, insisting upon admittance in his dogged way, without showing any feelings, it happened that Mr. Penrose drove up to the door, and hailed his nephew with much surprise. "You here, Will?" Mr. Penrose said. "I hope nothing has gone wrong at the Cottage?" and his man's hand instantly, and as by magic, relaxed from the door.

"There is nothing wrong, sir," said Will, "but I wanted to speak to you;" and he entered triumphantly, not without a sense of victory, as the subdued servant took his bag out of his hand. Mr. Penrose was, as we have said, alone. He had shed, as it were, all incumbrances, and was ready, unfettered by any ties or prejudices, to grow richer and wiser and more enlightened every day. His children were all married, and his wife having fulfilled all natural offices of this life, and married all her danghters, had quietly taken her dismissal when her duties were over, and had a very handsome tombstone, which he looked at on Sunday. It occurred to very few people, however, to lament over Mr. Penrose's loneliness. He seemed to have been freed from all impediments, and left at liberty to grow rich, to get fat, and to believe in his own greatness and wisdom. Nor did it occur to himself to feel his great house lonely. He liked eating a luxurious dinner by himself, and knowing how much it had cost, all for his single lordly appetitethe total would have been less grand if wife and children had shared it. And then he had other things to think of-substantial things, about interest and investments, and not mere visionary reflections about the absence of other chairs, or other faces at his table. But he had a natural interest in Wilfrid, as in a youth who had evidently come to ask his advice, which was an article he was not disinclined to give away. And then "the Setons," as he called his sister's family and descendants, had generally shut their ears to his advice, and shown an active absence of all political qualities, so that Will's visit was a compliment of the highest character, something like an unexpected act of homage from Mordecai in the gate.

But even Mr. Penrose was struck dumb by Will's communication. He put up his hand to his cravat and gasped, and thumped himself on the breast, staring at the boy with round scared apoplectic eyes—like the eyes of a boiled fish. He stared at Will,—who told the story calmly enough with a matter of fact conciseness,—and looked as if he was disposed to ring the bell and send for a doctor, and get out of the difficulty by concluding his nephew to be mad. But there was no withstanding the evidence of plain good faith and sincerity in Will's narration. Mr. Penrose remained silent, longer than anybody had ever known him to remain silent before, and he was not even very coherent when he had regained the faculty of speech.

"That woman was present, was she?" he said; "and Winnie's husband—Good Lord! And so you mean to tell me Mary has been all this time—When I asked her to my house, and my wife intended to make a party for her, and all that—and when she preferred to visit at Earlston, and that old fool Sir Edward, who never had a penny—except what he settled on Winnie. And all that time you know Mary was—Good Lord!"

"I don't see what difference it makes to my mother," said Will. "She is just what she always was—the difference it makes is to me—and of course to Hugh."

But this was not a view that Mr. Penrose could take who knew more about the world than Will could be supposed to know-though his thoughts were usually so preoccupied by what he called the practical aspect of everything. Yet he was disturbed in this case by reflections which were almost imaginative, and which utterly amazed Will. He got up, though he was still in the middle of dessert, and walked about the room making exclamations. "That's what she has been, you know, all this time-Mary, of all people in the world! Good Lord! That's what she was, when we asked her These were the exclamations that were bursting from Uncle Penrose's amazed lips-and Will at last grew angry and impatient, and hurried into the practical matter on his own initiative.

"When you have made up your mind about it, Uncle, I should be glad to know what you think best to be done," said Will, in his steady way, and he looked at his adviser with those sceptical, clearsighted eyes, which, more than anything else make a practical man ashamed of having indulged in any momentary aberration.

Mr. Penrose came back to his chair and sat down, and looked with respect, and something that was almost awe, in Will's face. Then the boy continued, seeing his advantage: "You must see what an important thing it is between Hugh and me," he said. "It is a matter of business, of course, and it would be far better to settle it at once. If I am the right heir, you know, Earlston ought to be mine. I have heard you say, feelings had nothing to do with right and wrong."

"No," said Mr. Penrose, with a slight gasp; "that is quite true; but it is all so sudden, you know,—and Mary—I dou't know what you want me to do——"

"I want you to write and tell them about it," said Will.

Mr. Penrose put his lips into the shape they would naturally have taken had he been whistling as usual; but he was not capable of a whistle. "It is all very easy to talk," he said, "and naturally business is business, and I am not a man to think too much about feelings. But Mary—the fact is, it must be a matter of arrangement, Will. There can't be any trial, you know, or publicity to expose her ——"

"I don't see that it would matter much to her," said Will. "She would not mind; it would only be one of her sons instead of the other, and I suppose she likes me the same as Hugh."

"I was not thinking of Hugh, or you either. I was thinking of your mother," said Mr. Penrose, thrusting his hands into the depths of his pockets, and staring with vacant eyes into the air before him. He was matter of fact himself, but he could not comprehend the obtuseness of ignorance and self-occupation and youth.

"Well?" said Will.

"Well," cried the uncle, turning upon him, "are you blind, or stupid, or what? Don't you see it never can come to publicity, or she will be disgraced. I don't say you are to give up your rights, if they are your rights, for that. I daresay you'll take a deal better care of everything than that fellow Hugh, and won't be so confounded saucy. But if you go and make a row about it in public, she can never hold up her head again, you know. I don't mind talk myself in a general way; but talk about a woman's marriage,—Good Lord! There must be no public row, whatever you do."

"I don't see why there should be any public row," said Will; "all that has to be done is to let them know."

"I suppose you think Hugh will take it quite comfortable," said Mr. Penrose, "and lay down everything like a lamb. He's not a business man, nor good for much; but he will never be such an idiot as that; and then you would need to have your witnesses very distinct, if it was to come to anything. He has possession in his favour, and that is a great deal, and it is you who would have to prove everything. Are you quite sure that your witnesses would be forthcoming, and that you could make the case clear?"

"I don't know about making the case clear," said Will, who began to get confused; "all I know is what I have told you. Percival was there, and Mrs. Kirkman—they saw it, you know—and she says Hugh himself was there. Of course he was only a child. But she said no doubt he would remember, if it was brought to his mind."

"Hugh himself!" said Mr. Penrose—again a little startled, though he was not a person of fine feelings. The idea of appealing to the recollection of the child for evidence against the man's rights, struck him as curious at least. He was staggered, though he felt that he ought to have been above that. Of course it was all perfectly just and correct, and nobody could have been more clear than he, that any sort of fantastic delicacy coming between a man and his rights would be too absurd to be thought of. And yet it cannot be denied that he was staggered in spite of himself.

"I think if you told him distinctly, and recalled it to his recollection, and he knew everything that was involved," said Will, with calm distinctness, "that Hugh would give in. It is the only thing he could do; and I should not say anything to him about a younger brother's portion, or two thousand pounds," the lad added, kindling up: "He should have everything that the money or the estate could do for him—whatever was best for him, if it cost half or double what Earlston was worth."

"Then why on earth don't you leave him Earlston, if you are so generous?" said Mr. Penrose. "If you are to spend it all upon him, what good would it do you having the dreary old place?"

"I should have my rights," said Will with solemnity. It was as if he had been a disinherited prince whom some usurper had deprived of his kingdom, and this strange assumption was so honest in its way, and had such an appearance of sincerity, that Mr. Penrose was struck dumb, and gazed at the boy with a consternation which he could not express. His rights! Mary's youngest son, whom everybody, up to this moment, had thought of only as a clever, not very amiable boy, of no particular account anywhere. The merchant began to wake up to the consciousness that he had a phenomenon before him-a new development of man. As he recovered from his surprise, he began to appreciate Will-to do justice to the straightforward ardour of his determination that business was business, and that feelings had nothing to do with it; and to admire his calm impassibility to every other view of the case but that which concerned himself. Mr. Penrose thought it was the result of a great preconcerted plan, and began to the solemnity, and the calm, and that beautiful confidence in his rights, were features of a subtle and precocious scheme which Will had made for himself; and his thoughts, which had been dwelling, for the moment on Mary, with a kind of unreflective sympathy, turned towards the nobler object thus presented before him. Here was a true apotheosis of interest over nature. Here was such a man of business, heaven-born, as had never been seen before. Mr. Penrose warmed and kindled into admiration, and he made a secret vow that such a genius should not be lost.

As for Will, he never dreamt of speculating as to what were his uncle's thoughts. He was quite content that he had told his own tale, and so got over the first preliminary difficulty of getting it told to those whom it most concerned; and he was very sleepy - dreadfully tired, and more anxious to curl up his poor, young, weary head, under his wing, and get to bed, than for anything else in the world. Yet, notwithstanding, when he laid down, and had put out his light, and had begun to doze, the thought came over him that he saw the glow of his mother's candle shining in under his door, and heard her step on the stairs, which had been such a comfort to him many a night when he was a child, and woke up in the dark and heard her pass, and knew her to be awake and watching, and was not even without a hope that she might come in and stand for a moment, driving away all ghosts and terrors of the night, by his bed. He thought he saw the light under his door, and heard the foot coming up the stairs. And so probably he did; but the poor boy woke right up under this fancy, and remembered with a compunction that he was far away from his mother, and that probably she was "angry," and perhaps anxious about his sudden departure; and he was very sorry in his heart to have come away so, and never to have told her. But he was not sorry nor much troubled anyhow about the much more important thing he was about to do.

And Uncle Penrose, under the strange stimulus of his visitor's earnestness, addressed himself to the task required of him, and wrote to Hugh. He, too, thought first of writing to Mrs. Ochterlony; but, excellent business man as he was, he could not do it; it went against his heart, if he had a heart, -or, if not his heart, against some digestive organ which served him instead of that useful but not indispensable part of the human frame. But he did write to Hugh-that was easier; and then Hugh had been "confounded saucy," and had rejected his advice not about the Museum only, but in other respects. Mr. Penrose wrote the letter that very night while Will was dreaming about his mother's light; and so the great wheel was set agoing, which none of them could then stop for ever.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

result of a great preconcerted plan, and began to Hugh had left the Cottage the day after Will's awake into admiration and respect. He thought departure. He had gone to Earlston, where a good deal of business about the Museum and the estate awaited him; and he had goue off without any particular burden on his mind. As for Will's flight from home, it was odd, no doubt; but then Will himself was odd, and out-of-the-way acts were to be expected from him. When Hugh, with careless liberality, had sent him the cheque, he dismissed the subject from his mind-at least, he thought of his younger brother only with amusement, wondering what he could find to attract him in Uncle Penrose's prosaic house,—trying to form an imagination of Will wandering about the great Liverpool docks, looking at the big ships, and all the noisy traffic; and Hugh laughed within himself to think how very much all that was out of Will's way. No doubt he would come home in a day or two bored to death, and would loathe the very name of Liverpool all his life thereafter. As for Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston himself, he had a great deal to The mayor and corporation of Dalken had come to a final decision about the Museum, and all that had to be done was to prepare the rooms which were to receive Francis Ochterlony's treasures, and to transfer with due tenderness and solemnity the Venus and the Psyche, and all the delicate wealth which had been so dear to the heart of "the old Squire." The young Squire went round and looked at them all, with a great tenderness in his own, remembering his uncle's last progress among them, and where he sat down to rest, and the wistful looks he had given to those marble white creations which stood to him in the place of wife and children; and the pathetic humour with which he had said, "It is all the better for you." It was the better for Hugh; but still the young man in the fulness of his hopes had a tender compunction for the old man who had died without getting the good of his life, and with no treasures but marble and bronze and gold and silver to leave behind him. "My poor uncle!" Hugh said; and yet the chances were that Francis Ochterlony was not, either in living or dying, sorry for himself. Hugh had a kind of reluctance to change the aspect of everything, and make the house his own house, and not Francis Ochterlony's. It seemed almost impious to take from it the character it had borne so long, and at the same time it was his uncle's wish. These were Hugh's thoughts at night, but in the fresh light of the morning it would be wrong to deny that another set of ideas took possession of his mind. Then he began to think of the new aspect, and the changes he could make. It was not bright enough for a home for-well, for any lady that might happen to come on a visit or otherwise; and, to be sure, Hugh had no intention of accepting as final his mother's determination not to leave the Cottage. He made up his mind that she would come, and that people-various people, ladies and otherswould come to visit her; that there should be flowers and music and smiles about the place, and perhaps some one as fair and as sweet as Psyche to change the marble moonlight into sacred living sunshine. Now the fact was, that Nelly was not by any means so fair as Psyche—that she was not indeed what you would call a regular beauty at all, but only a fresh, faulty, sweet little human creature, with warm blood in her veins, and a great many thoughts in her little head. And when Hugh thought of some fair presence coming into those rooms and making a paradise of them, either it was not Nelly Askell he was thinking of, or else he was thinking like a poet-though he was not poetical, to speak of. However, he did not himself give any name to his imaginations—he could afford to be vague. He went all over the house in the morning, not with the regretful, affectionate eye with which he made the same survey the night before, but in a practical spirit. At his age, and in his position, the practical was only a pleasanter variation of the romantic aspect of affairs. As he thought of new furniture, scores of little pictures flashed into his mind-though in ordinary cases he was not distinguished by a powerful imagination. He had no sooner devised the kind of chair that should stand in a particular corner, than straightway a little figure jumped into it, a whisper of talk came out of it, with a host of imaginary circumstances which had nothing to with upholstery. Even the famous rococo chair which Islay had broken was taken possession of by that vague, sweet phantom. And he went about the rooms with an unconscious smile on his face, devising and planning. He did not know he was smiling; it was not at anything or about anything. It was but the natural expression of the fresh morning fancies and sweet stir of everything hopeful, and bright, and uncertain, which was in his heart.

And when he went out of doors he still smiled. Earlston was a grey limestone house, as has been described in the earlier part of this history. A house which chilled Mrs. Ochterlony to the heart when she went there with her little children in the first forlornness of her widowhood. What Hugh had to do now was to plan a flower-garden for-his mother; yes, it was truly for his mother. He meant that she should come all the same. Nothing could make any difference so far as she was concerned. But at the same time, to be sure, he did net mean that his house should make the same impression on any other stranger as that house had made upon Mary. He planned how the great hedges should be cut down, and the trees thinned, and the little moorland burn should be taken in within the inclosure, and followed to its very edge by the gay lawn with its flower-beds. He planned a different approach—where there might be openings in the dark shrubberies, and views over the hills. All this he did in the morning, with a smile on his face, though the tears had been in his eyes at the thought of any change only the previous night. Francis Ochterlony had been by, as perhaps he was, no doubt he would have smiled at that tender inconsistency-and there would not have been any bitterness in the smile.

And then Hugh went in to breakfast. He had already some new leases to sign and other business matters to do, and he was quite pleased to do itas pleased as he had been to draw his first cheques. He sat down at his breakfast-table, before the little pile of letters that awaited him, and felt the importance of his new position. Even his loneliness made him feel its importance the more. Here were questions of all sorts submitted to him, and it was he who had to answer, without reference to anybody-he whose advice a little while ago nobody would have taken the trouble to ask. It was not that he cared to exercise his privilege, -for Hugh, on the whole, had an inclination to be advised-but still the sense of his independence was sweet. He meant to ask Mr. Preston, the attorney, about various things, and he meant to consult his mother, and to lay some special affairs before Sir Edwardbut still, at the same time, it was he who had everything to do, and Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston sat down before his letters with a sense of satisfaction which does not always attend the mature mind in that moment of trial. One of the uppermost was from Uncle Penrose, redirected from the Cottage, but it did not cause any thrill of interest to Hugh's mind, who put it aside calmly, knowing of no thunderbolts that might be in it. No doubt it was some nonsense about the Museum, he thought—as if he himself was not a much better judge about the Museum than a stranger and business-man could be. There was, however, a letter from Mary, which directed her son's attention to this epistle. "I send you a letter directed in Uncle Penrose's hand," wrote Mrs. Ochterlony, "which I have had the greatest inclination to open, to see what he says about Will. I dare say you would not have minded; but I conclude, on the whole, that Mr. Ochterlony of Earlston should have his letters to himself, so I send it on to you uninvaded. Let me know what he says about your brother." Hugh could not but laugh when he read this, half with pleasure, half with amusement. His mother's estimate of his importance entertained him greatly, and the idea of anything private being in Uncle Penrose's letter tickled him still more. Then he drew it towards him lightly, and began to read it with eyes running over with laughter. He was all alone, and there was nobody to see any change of sentiment in his face.

He was all alone-but yet presently Hugh raised his eyes from the letter which he had taken up so gaily, and cast a scared look round him, as if to make sure that nobody was there. The smile had gone off his face, and the laughter out of his eyes,and not only that, but every particle of colour had left his face. And yet he did not see the meaning of what he had read. "Will!" he said to himself. "Will!" He was horror-stricken and bewildered, but that was the sole idea it conveyed to him-a sense of treachery-the awful feeling of unreality and darkness round about, with which the young betrayed. He laid down the letter half read, and paused, and put up his hands to his head as if to convince himself that he was not dreaming. Will! Good God! Will! Was it possible? Hugh had to make a convulsive effort to grasp this unnatural horror. Will, one of themselves, to have gone off, and put himself into the hands of Uncle Penrose, and set himself against his mother and her sons! The ground seemed to fail under his feet, the solid world to fall off round him into bewildering mystery. Will! And yet he did not apprehend what it was. His mind could not take in more than one discovery at a time. A minute before, and he was ready to have risked everything on the good faith of any and every human creature he knew. Now, was there anybody to be trusted? His brother had stolen from his side, and was striking at him by another and an unfriendly hand. Will! Good heavens, Will!

It would be difficult to tell how long it was before the full meaning of the letter he had thus received entered into Hugh's mind. He sat with the breakfast things still on the table, so long, that the housekeeper herself came at last with natural inquisitiveness to see if anything was the matter, and found Hugh with a face as grey and colourless as that of the old Squire, sitting over his untasted coffee, unaware, apparently, what he was about. started when she came in, and bundled up his letters into his pocket, and gave an odd laugh, and said he had been busy, and had forgotten. And then he sprang up and left the room, paying no attention to her outery that he had eaten nothing. Hugh was not aware he had eaten nothing, or probably in the first horror of his discovery of the treachery in the world, he too would have taken to false pretences and saved appearances, and made believe to have breakfasted. But the poor boy was unaware, and rushed off to the library, where nobody could have any pretext for disturbing him, and shut himself up with his secret, his first secret, the new horrible discovery which had changed the face of the world. This was the letter which he had crushed up in his hand as he might have crushed a snake or deadly reptile, but which nothing could crush out of his heart, where the sting had entered and gone deep:-

"MY DEAR NEPHEW, -It is with pain that I write to you, though it is my clear duty to do so in the interests of your brother, who has just put his case into my hands-and I don't doubt that the intelligence I am about to convey will be a great blow, not only to your future prospects but to your pride and sense of importance, which so fine a position at your age had naturally elevated considerably higher than a plain man like myself could approve of. Your brother arrived here to-day, and has lost no time in informing me of the singular circumstances under which he left home, and of which, so far as I understand him, you and your mother are still in ignorance. Wilfrid's perception of the fact soul for the first time sees itself injured and that feelings, however creditable to him as an individual, ought not to standin the way of what is, strictly speaking, a matter of business, is very clear and uncompromising; but still he does not deny that he felt it difficult to make this communication either to you or to his mother. Accident, the nature of which I do not at present, before knowing your probable course of action, feel myself at liberty to indicate more plainly, has put him in possession of certain facts, which would change altogether the relations between him and yourself, as well as your (apparent) position as head of the family. These facts, which, for your mother's sake, I should be deeply grieved to make known out of the family, are as follows: your father, Major Ochterlony, and my niece, instead of being married privately in Scotland. as we all believed, in the year 1830, or thereabouts-I forget the exact date-were in reality only married in India in the year 1837, by the chaplain, the Rev. - Churchill, then officiating at the station where your father's regiment was. This, as you are aware, was shortly before Wilfrid's birth, and not long before Major Ochterlony died. It is subject of thankfulness that your father did my niece this tardy justice before he was cut off, as may he said, in the flower of his days, but you will see at a glance that it entirely reverses your respective positions-and that in fact Wilfrid is Major Ochterlony's only lawful son.

"I am as anxious as you can be that this should be made a matter of family arrangement, and should never come to the public cars. To satisfy your own mind, however, of the perfect truth of the assertion I have made, I beg to refer you to the Rev. Mr. Churchill, who performed the ceremony, and whose present address, which Wilfrid had the good sense to secure, you will find below-and to Mrs. Kirkman, who was present. Indeed, I am informed, that you yourself were present-though probably too young to understand what it meant. It is possible that on examining your memory you may find some trace of the occurrence, which though not dependable upon by itself, will help to confirm the intelligence to your mind. We are in no hurry and will leave you the fullest time to satisfy yourself, as well as second you in every effort to prevent any painful consequence from falling upon your mother, who has (though falsely) enjoyed the confidence and esteem of her friends so long.

"For yourself you may reckon upon Wilfrid's anxious endeavours to further your prospects by every means in his power. Of course I do not expect you to take a fact involving so much, either upon his word or mine. Examine it fully for yourself, and the more entirely the matter is cleared up, the more will it be for our satisfaction as well as your own. The only thing I have to desire for my own part is that you will spare your mother—as your brother is most anxious to do. Hoping for an early reply,

"I am,

"Your affectionate uncle and sincere friend,
"J. P. PENROSE."

Hugh sat in Francis Ochterlony's chair, at his table, with his head supported on his hands, looking straight before him, seeing nothing, not even thinking, feeling only this letter spread out upon the table. and the intelligence conveyed in it, and holding his head, which ached and throbbed with the blow, in his hands. He was still, and his head throbbed and his heart and soul ached, tingling through him to every joint and every vein. He could not even wonder, nor doubt, nor question in any way, for the first terrible interval. All he could do was to look at the fact and take it fully into his mind, and turn it over and over, seeing it all round on every side, looking at it this way and that way, and feeling as if somehow heaven and earth were filled with it, though he had never dreamt of such a ghost until that hour. Not his after all-neither Earlston, nor his name, nor the position he had been so proud of: nothing his-alas, not even his mother, his spotless mother, the woman whom it had been an honour and glory to come from and belong to. When a groan came from the poor boy's white lips it was that he was thinking of; Madonna Mary! that was the name they had called her by-and this was how it really was. He groaned aloud, and made an unconscious outcry of his pain when it came to that. "Oh, my God, if it had only been ruin, loss of everything-anything in the world but that!" This was the first stage of stupefaction and yet of vivid consciousness, before the indignation came. He sat and looked at it, and realised it, and took it into his mind, staring at it until every drop of blood ebbed away from his face. This was how it was before the anger came. After a while his countenance and his mood changed—the colour and heat came rushing back to his cheeks and lips, and a flood of rage and resentment swept over him like a sudden storm. Will! could it be Will? Liar! coward! traitor! to call her mother, and to tax her with shame even had it been true-to frame such a lying, cursed, devilish accusation against her! Then it was that Hugh flashed into a fiery, burning shame to think that he had given credence to it for one sole moment. He turned his eyes upon her as it were, and looked into her face and glowed with a bitter indignation and fury. His mother's face! only to think of it and dare to fancy that shame could ever have been there. And then the boy wept, in spite of his manhood-wept a few, hot, stinging tears, that dried up the moment they fell, half for rage, half for tenderness .-- And, oh my God, was it Will? Then as his mind roused more and more to the dread emergency, Hugh got up and went to the window and gazed out as if that would help him; and his eye lighted on the tangled thicket which he had meant to make into his mother's flower-garden, and upon the sweep of trees through which he had planned his new approach, and once more he groaned aloud. Only this morning so sure about it all, so confidently and carelessly happynow with not one clear step before him to take, with no future, no past that he could dare look back upon, no name, nor rights of any kind-if this were true. And could it be otherwise than true? Could any imagination frame so monstrous and inconceivable a falsehood; -such a horrible impossibility might be fact, but it was beyond all the bounds of fancy; -and then the blackness of darkness descended again upon Hugh's soul. Poor Mary! poor mother! It came into the young man's mind to go to her and take her in his arms, and carry her away somewhere out of sight of men and sound of their voices-and again there came to his eyes those stinging tears. Fault of hers it could not be; she might have been deceived; and then poor Hugh's lips, unaccustomed to curses, quivered and stopped short as they were about to curse the father whom he never knew. Here was the point at which the tide turned again. Could it be Hugh Ochterlony who had deceived his wife? he whose sword hung in Mary's room, whose very name made a certain music in her voice when she pronounced it, and whom she had trained her children to reverence with that surpassing honour which belongs to the dead alone. Again a storm of rage and bitter indignation swept in his despair and bewilderment over the young man's mind; an accursed scheme, a devilish hateful lie-that was how it was; and oh horror! that it should be Will.

Through all these changes it was one confused tempest of misery and dismay that was in Hugh's mind. Now and then there would be wild breaks in the clouds-now they would be whirled over the sky in gusts-now settled down into a blackness beyond all reckoning. Lives change from joy to misery often enough in this world; but seldom thus in a moment, in the twinkling of an eve. His careless boat had been taking its sweet course over waters rippled with a favourable breeze, and without a moment's interval it was among the breakers; and he knew so little how to manage it, he was so inexperienced to cope with winds and waves. And he had nobody to ask counsel from. He was, as Will had been, separated from his natural adviser, the one friend to whom hitherto he had confided all his difficulties. But Hugh was older than Will, and his mind had come to a higher development, though perhaps he was not so clever as his brother. He had no Uncle Penrose to go to; no living soul would hear from him this terrible tale; he could consult nobody. Not for a hundred Earlstons, not for all the world, would he have discussed with any man in existence his mother's good name.

Yet with that, too, there came another complication into Hugh's mind. Even while he actually thought in his despair of going to his mother, and telling her any tender lie that might occur to him, and carrying her away to Australia or any end of the world where he could work for her, and remove her for ever from shame and pain, a sense of outraged justice and rights assailed was in his mind. He was not one of those who can throw down their arms. Earlston was his, and he could not relinquish it and his position as head of the house without a struggle. And the thought of Mr. Penrose stung him. He even tried to heal one of his deeper wounds by persuading himself that Uncle Penrose was at the bottom of it, and that poor Will was but his tool. Poor Will! Poor miserable boy! And if he ever woke and came to himself and knew what he had been doing, how terrible would his position be. Thus Hugh tried to think till, wearied out with thinking, he said to himself that he would put it aside and think no more of it, and attend to his business; which vain imagination the poor boy tried to carry out with hands that shook and brain that refused to obey his guidance. And all this change was made in one little moment. His life came to a climax, and passed through a secret revolution in that one day; and yet he had begun it as if it had been an ordinary day-a calm summer morning in the summer of his days.

This was what Hugh said to his mother of Mr. Penrose's letter:—"The letter you forwarded to me from Uncle Penrose was in his usual business strain—good advice and that sort of thing. He does not say much about Will; but he has arrived all safe, and I suppose is enjoying himself—as well as he can, there."

And when he had written and despatched that note he sat down to think again. He decided at last that he would not go on with the flower-garden and the other works-till he saw; but that he would settle about the Museum without any delay. "If it came to the worst they would not recall the gift," he said to himself, brushing his hand across his eyes. It was his uncle's wish; and it was he, Hugh, and not any other, whom Francis Ochterlony had wished for his heir. Hugh's hand was wet when he took it from his eyes, and his heart was full, and he could have wept like a child. But he was a man, and weeping could do no good; and he had nobody in the world to take his trouble tonobody in the world. Love and pride made a fence round him, and isolated him. He had to make his way out of it as best he could and alone. He made a great cry to God in his trouble; but from nobody in the world could he have either help or hope. And he read the letter over and over, and tried to recollect and to go back into his dim baby-memory of India, and gather out of the thick mists that scene which they said he had been present at. Was there really some kind of vague image of it, all broken and indistinct and effaced, on his mind?

CHAPTER XL.

WHILE all this was going on at Earlston, there were other people in whose minds, though the matter was not of importance so overwhelming, pain and excitement and a trembling dread of the consequences had been awakened. Mary, to whom it would be even more momentous than to High, knew nothing of it as yet. She had taken Mr. Penrose's letter into her hand and looked at it, and hesitated, and then had smiled at her boy's new position in the world, and redirected it to him, passing on as it were a living shell just ready to explode without so much as scorching her own delicate fingers. But Mrs. Kirkman felt herself in the position of a woman who had seen the shell fired and had even touched the fatal trigger, and did not know where it had fallen, nor what death and destruction it might have scattered around. She was not like herself for these two or three days. She gave a divided attention to her evangelical efforts, and her mind wandered from the reports of her Bible readers. She seemed to see the great mass of fire and flame striking the ground, and the dead and wounded lying round it in all directions; and it might be that she too was to blame. She bore it as long as she could, trying to persuade herself that she, like Providence, had done it "for the best," and that it might be for Mary's good or Hugh's good, even if it should happen to kill them. This was how she attempted to support and fortify herself; but while she was doing so Wilfrid's steady, matter-of-fact countenance would come before her, and she would perceive by the instinct of guilt, that he would neither hesitate nor spare, but was clothed in the double armour of egotism and ignorance; that he did not know what horrible harm he could do, and yet that he was sensible of his power and would certainly exercise it. She was like the other people involved-afraid to ask any one's advice, or betray the share she had taken in the business; even her husband, had she spoken to him about it, would probably have asked what the deuce she had to do interfering? For Colonel Kirkman, though a man of very orthodox views, still was liable in a moment of excitement to forget himself, and give force to his sentiments by a mild oath. Mrs. Kirkman could not bear thus to descend in the opinion of any one, and yet she could not satisfy her conscience about it, nor be content with what she had done. She stood out bravely for a few days, telling herself she had only done her duty; but the composure she attained by this means was forced and unnatural. And at last she could bear it no longer; she seemed to have heard the dreadful report, and then to have seen everything relapse into the most deadly silence; no cry coming out of the distance, nor indications if everybody was perishing, or any one had escaped. If she had but heard one outcryif Hugh, poor fellow, had come storming to her to know the truth of it, or Mary had come with her fresh wounds, crying out against her, Mrs. Kirkman could have borne it; but the silence was more than she could bear. Something within compelled her to get up out of her quiet and go forth and ask who had been killed, even though she might bring herself within the circle of responsibility thereby.

This was why, after she had put up with her anxiety as long as she could, she went out at last by herself in a very disturbed and uneasy state to the Cottage, where all was still peaceful, and no storm had yet darkened the skies. Mary had received Hugh's letter that morning, which he had written in the midst of his first misery, and it had never occurred to her to think anything more about Uncle Penrose after the calm mention her boy made of his letter. She had not heard from Will, it is true, and was vexed by his silence; but yet it was a light vexation. Mrs. Ochterlony, however, was not at home when Mrs. Kirkman arrived: and, if anything could have increased her uneasiness and embarrassment, it would have been to be ushered into the drawing-room, and to find Winnie seated there all by herself. Mrs. Percival rose in resentful grandeur when she saw who the visitor was. Now was Winnie's chance to repay that little demonstration of disapproval which the Colonel's wife had made on her last visit to the Cottage. The two ladies made very stately salutations to each other, and the stranger sat down, and then there was a dead pause. "Let Mrs. Ochterlony know when she comes in," Winnie had said to the maid; and that was all she thought it necessary to say. Even Aunt Agatha was not near to break the violence of the encounter. Mrs. Kirkman sat down in a very uncomfortable condition, full of genuine anxiety; but it was not to be expected that her natural impulses should entirely yield even to compunction and fright, and a sense of guilt. When a few minutes of silence had elapsed, and Mary did not appear, and Winnie sat opposite to her, wrapt up and gloomy, in her shawl, and her haughtiest air of preoccupation, Mrs. Kirkman began to come to herself. Here was a perishing sinner before her, to whom advice, and reproof, and admonition, might be all important, and such a favourable moment might never come again. The very sense of being rather faulty in her own person gave her a certain stimulus to warn the culpable creature, whose errors were so different, and so much more flagrant than hers. And if in doing her duty, she had perhaps done something that might harm one of the family, was it not all the more desirable to do good to another? Mrs. Kirkman cleared her throat, and looked at the culprit. And as she perceived Winnie's look of defiance, and absorbed self-occupation, and determined opposition to anything that might be advanced, a soft sense of superiority and pity stole into her mind. Poor thing, that did not know the things that belonged to her peace!-was it not a Christian act to bring them before her ere they might be for ever hid from her eyes?

Once more Mrs. Kirkman cleared her throat. She did it with an intention; and Winnie heard, and was roused, and fixed on her one corner of her eye. But she only made a very mild commencement—employing in so important a matter the wisdom of the serpent, conjoined, as it always ought to be, with the sweetness of the dove.

"Mrs. Ochterlony is probably visiting among the poor," said Mrs. Kirkman, but with a sceptical tone in her voice, as if that, at least, was what Mary ought to be doing, though it was doubtful whether she was so well employed.

"Probably," said Winnie, curtly; and then there was a pause.

"To one who occupies herself so much as she does with her family, there must be much to do for three boys," continued Mrs. Kirkman, still with a certain pathos in her voice. "Ah, if we did but give ourselves as much trouble about our spiritual state ! "

She waited for a reply, but Winnie gave no reply. She even gave a slight, scarcely perceptible, shrug to her shoulders, and turned a little aside.

"Which is, after all, the only thing that is of any importance," said Mrs. Kirkman. "My dear Mrs. Percival, I do trust that you agree with me?"

"I don't see why I should be your dear Mrs. Percival," said Winnie. "I was not aware that we knew each other. I think you must be making a mistake."

"All my fellow creatures are dear to me," said Mrs. Kirkman, "especially when I can hope that their hearts are open to grace. I can be making no mistake so long as I am addressing a fellow sinner. We have all so much reason to abase ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes. Even when we have been preserved more than others from active sin, we must know that the root of all evil is in our hearts."

Winnie gave another very slight shrug of her shoulders, and turned away, as far as a mingled impulse of defiance and politeness would let her. She would neither be rude nor would she permit her assailant to think that she was running away.

"If I venture to seize this moment, and speak to you more plainly than I would speak to all, oh, my dear Mrs. Percival," cried Mrs. Kirkman,-"my dear fellow sinner! don't think it is because I am insensible to the existence of the same evil tendency in my own heart."

"What do you mean by talking to me of evil tendencies?" cried Winnie, flushing high. "I don't want to hear you speak. You may be a sinner if you like, but I don't think there is any particular fellowship between you and me."

"There is the fellowship of corrupt hearts," said Mrs. Kirkman. "I hope, for your own sake, you will not refuse to listen for a moment. I may never have been tempted in the same way, but I know too well the deceitfulness of the natural heart to take any credit to myself. You have been exposed to many temptations --- "

"You know nothing about me, that I am aware," cried Winnie, with restrained fury. "I do not know how you can venture to take such a liberty with me."

"Ah, my dear Mrs. Percival, I know a great deal about you," said Mrs. Kirkman. "There is nothing I would not do to make a favourable impression on your mind. If you would but treat me as a friend and let me be of some use to you: I know you must it is never too late to turn away from evil, and that with true repentance-"

"I suppose what you want is, to drive me out of the room," said Winnie, looking at her fiercely, with crimson cheeks. "What right have you to lecture me? My sister's friends have a right to visit her, of course, but not to make themselves disagreeableand I don't mean my private affairs to be discussed by Mary's friends. You have nothing to do with me."

"I was not speaking as Mary's friend," said Mrs. Kirkman, with a passing twinge of conscieuce. "I was speaking only as a fellow sinner. Dear Mrs. Percival, surely you recollect who it was that objected to be his brother's keeper. It was Cain; it was not a loving Christian heart. Oh, don't sin against opportunity, and refuse to hear me. The message I have is one of mercy and love. Even if it were too late to redeem character with the world, it is never too late to come to-

Winnie started to her feet, goaded beyond bearing. "How dare you! how dare you!" she said, clenching her hands, -but Mrs. Kirkman's benevolent purpose was far too lofty and earnest to be put down by any such demonstration of womanish fury.

"If it were to win you to think in time, to withdraw from the evil and seek good, to come while it is called to-day," said the Evangelist, with much steadfastness, "I would not mind even making you angry. I can dare anything in my Master's service-oh, do not refuse the gracious message! Oh, do not turn a deaf ear. You may have forfeited this world, but, oh think of the next: as a Christian and a fellow sinner-"

"Aunt Agatha!" cried Winnie, breathless with rage and shame, "do you mean to let me be insulted in your house?"

Poor Aunt Agatha had just come in, and knew nothing about Mrs. Kirkman and her visit. She stood at the door surprised, looking at Winnie's excited face, and at the stranger's authoritative calm. She had been out in the village, with a little basket in her hand, which never went empty, and she also had been dropping words of admonition out of her soft and tender lips.

"Insulted! My dear love, it must be some mistake," said Aunt Agatha. "We are always very glad to see Mrs. Kirkman, as Mary's friend; but the house is Mrs. Percival's house, being mine," Miss Seton added, with a little dignified curtsey, thinking the visitor had been uncivil, as on a former occasion. And then there was a pause, and Winnie sat down, fortifying herself by the presence of the mild little woman, who was her protector. It was a strange reversal of positions, but yet that was how it was. The passionate creature had now no other protector but Aunt Agatha, and even while she felt herself assured and strengthened by her presence, it gave her a pang to think it was so. Nobody but Aunt Agatha to stand between her and impertinent inhave had many temptations; but we know also that I trusion. Nobody to take her part before the world.

That was the moment when Winnie's heart melted, if it ever did melt, for one pulsation and no more towards her enemy, her antagonist, her husband, who was not there to take advantage of the momentary thaw.

"I am Mary's friend," said Mrs. Kirkman, sweetly; "and I am all your friends. It was not only as Mary's friend I was speaking—it was out of love for souls. Oh, my dear Miss Seton, I hope you are one of those who think seriously of life. Help me to talk to your dear niece; help me to tell her that there is still time. She has gone astray; perhaps she never can retrieve herself for this world,—but this world is not all,—and she is still in the land of the living, and in the place of hope. Oh, if she would but give up her evil ways and flee! Oh, if she would but remember that there is mercy for the vilest!"

Speaker and hearers were by this time wound up to such a pitch of excitement, that it was impossible to go on. Mrs. Kirkman had tears in her eyes—tears of real feeling; for she thought she was doing what she ought to do; while Winnie blazed upon her with rage and defiance, and poor Aunt Agatha stood up in horror and consternation between them, horrified by the entire breach of all ordinary rules, and yet driven to bay and roused to that natural defence of her own which makes the weakest creature brave.

"My dear love, be composed," she said, trembling a little. "Mrs. Kirkman, perhaps you don't know that you are speaking in a very extraordinary way. We are all great sinners; but as for my dear niece, Winnie—My darling, perhaps if you were to go up-stairs to your own room, that would be best—"

"I have no intention of going to my own room," said Winnie. "The question is, whether you will suffer me to be insulted here."

"Oh, that there should be any thought of insult!" said Mrs. Kirkman, shaking her head, and waving her long curls solemnly. "If any one is to leave the room, perhaps it should be me. If my warning is rejected, I will shake off the dust of my feet, and go away, as commanded. But I did hope better things. What motive have I but love of her poor soul? Oh, if she would think while it is called to-day—while there is still a place of repentance—"

"Winnie, my dear love," said Aunt Agatha, trembling more and more, "go to your own room."

But Winnie did not move. It was not in her to run away. Now that she had an audience to fortify her, she could sit and face her assailant, and defy all attacks. Though at the same time her eyes and checks blazed, and the thought that it was only Aunt Agatha whom she had to stand up for her, filled her with furious contempt and bitterness. At length it was Mrs. Kirkman who rose up with sad solemnity, and drew her silk robe about her, and shook the dust, if there was any dust, not from her feet, but from the fringes of her handsoms shawl.

"I will ask the maid to show me up to Mary's room," she said, with pathetic resignation. "I suppose I may wait for her there; and I hope it may never be recorded against you that you have rejected a word of Christian warning. Good-bye, Miss Seton; I hope you will be faithful to your poor dear niece yourself, though you will not permit me."

"We know our own affairs best," said Aunt Agatha, whose nerves were so affected that she could scarcely keep up to what she considered a correct standard of polite calm.

"Alas, I hope it may not prove to be just our own best interests that we are most ignorant of," said Mrs. Kirkman, with a heavy sigh-and she swept out of the room following the maid, who looked amazed and aghast at the strange request. "Show me to Mrs. Ochterlony's room, and kindly let her know when she comes in that I am there." As for Winnie, she burst into an abrupt laugh when her monitress was gone-a laugh which wounded Aunt Agatha, and jarred upon her excited nerves. But there was little mirth in it. It was, in its way, a cry of pain, and it was followed by a tempest of hot tears, which Miss Seton took for hysterics. Poor Winnie! She was not penitent, nor moved by anything that had been said to her, except to rage and a sharper sense of pain. But yet, such an attack made her feel her position, as she did not do when left to herself. She had no protector but Aunt Agatha. She was open to all the assaults of well-meaning friends, and social critics of every description. She was not placed above comment as a woman is who keeps her troubles to herself-for she had taken the world in general into her confidence, as it were, and opened their mouths, and subjected herself voluntarily to their criticism. Winnie's heart seemed to close up as she pondered this - and her life rose up before her, wilful and warlike-and all at once it came into her head what her sister had said to her long ago, and her own decision: were it for misery, were it for ruin, rather to choose ruin and misery with him, than peace without him? How strange it was to think of the change that time had made in everything. She had been fighting him, and making him her chief antagonist, almost ever since. And yet, down in the depths of her heart poor Winnie remembered Mary's words, and felt with a curious pang, made up of misery and sweetness, that even yet, even yet, under some impossible combination of circumstances—this was what made her laugh, and made her cry so bitterly -but Aunt Agatha, poor soul, could not enter into her heart and see what she meant.

They were in this state of agitation when Mary came in, all unconscious of any disturbance. And a further change arose in Winnie at sight of her sister. Her tears dried up, but her eyes continued to blaze. "It is your friend, Mrs. Kirkman, who has been paying us a visit," she said, in answer to Mary's question; and it seemed to Mrs. Ochterlony that the blame was transferred to her own shoulders, and that it was she who had been doing something, and showing herself the general enemy.

"She is a horrid woman," said Aunt Agatha, hotly. "Mary, I wish you would explain to her, that after what has happened it cannot give me any pleasure to see her here. This is twice that she has insulted us. You will mention that we are not—not used to it. It may do for the soldiers' wives, poor things! but she has no right to come here."

"She must mean to call Mary to repentance, too," said Winnie. She had been thinking with a certain melting of heart of what Mary had once said to her; yet she could not refrain from flinging a dart at her sister ere she returned to think about herself.

All this time Mrs. Kirkman was seated in Mary's room, waiting. Her little encounter had restored her to herself. She had come back to her lofty position of superiority and goodness. She would have said herself that she had carried the Gospel message to that poor sinner, and that it had been rejected; and there was a certain satisfaction of woe in her heart. It was necessary that she should do her duty to Mary also, about whom, when she started, she had been rather compunctious. There is nothing more strange than the processes of thought by which a limited understanding comes to grow into content with itself, and approval of its own actions. It seemed to this good woman's straitened soul that she had been right, almost more than right, in seizing upon the opportunity presented to her, and making an appeal to a sinner's perverse heart. And she thought it would be right to point out to Mary, how any trouble that might be about to overwhelm her was for her good, and that she herself had, like Providence, acted for the best. She looked about the room with actual curiosity, and shook her head at the sight of the Major's sword, hanging over the mantel-piece, and the portraits of the three boys underneath. She shook her head and thought of creature-worship, and how some stroke was needed to wean Mrs. Ochterlony's heart from its inordinate affections. "It will keep her from trusting to a creature," she said to herself, and by degrees came to look complacently on her own position, and to settle how she should tell the tale to be also for the best. It never occurred to her to think what poor hands hers were to meddle with the threads of fate, or to decide which or what calamity was "for the best." Nor did any consideration of the mystery of pain disturb her mind. She saw no complications in it. Your dearest ties-your highest assurances of good-were but "blessings lent us for a day," and it seemed only natural to Mrs. Kirkman that such blessings should be yielded up in a reasonable way. She herself had neither had nor relinquished any particular blessings. Colonel Kirkman was very good in a general way, and very correct in his theological sentiments; but he was a very steady and substantial possession, and did not suggest any idea of being lent for a day—and his wife felt that she herself was fortunately beyond that necessity, but that it would be for Mary's good if she had another lesson on the vanity of earthly endowments. And thus she sat, feeling rather comfortable about it, and too sadly superior to be offended by her agitation down-stairs, in Mrs. Ochterlony's room.

Mary went in with her fair face brightened by her walk, a little soft anxiety (perhaps) in her eyes, or at least curiosity, -a little indignation, and yet the faintest touch of amusement about her mouth. She went in and shut the door, leaving her sister and Aunt Agatha below, moved by what they supposed to be a much deeper emotion. Nobody in the house so much as dreamt that anything of any importance was going on there. There was not a sound as of a raised voice or agitated utterance as there had been when Mrs. Kirkman made her appeal to Winnie. But when the door of Mrs. Ochterlony's room opened again, and Mary appeared, showing her visitor out, her countenance was changed, as if by half-a-dozen years. She followed her visitor down-stairs, and opened the door for her, and looked after her as she went away, but not the ghost of a smile came upon Mary's face. She did not offer her hand, nor say a word at parting that anyone could hear. Her lips were compressed, without smile or syllable to move them, and closed as if they never would open again, and every drop of blood seemed to be gone from her face. When Mrs. Kirkman went away from the door, Mary closed it, and went back again to her own room. She did not say a word, nor look as if she had anything to say. She went to her wardrobe and took out a bag, and put some things into it, and then she tied on her bonnet, everything being done as if she had planned it all for years. When she was quite ready, she went down-stairs and went to the drawing-room, where Winnie, agitated and disturbed, sat talking, saying a hundred wild things, of which Aunt Agatha knew but half the meaning. When Mary looked in at the door, the two who were there, started, and stared at her with amazed eyes. "What has happened, Mary?" cried Aunt Agatha; and though she was beginning to resume her lost tranquillity, she was so scared by Mrs. Ochterlony's face that she had a palpitation which took away her breath, and made her sink down panting and lay her hands upon her heart. Mary, for her part, was perfectly composed and in possession of her senses. She made no fuss at all, nor complaint, -but nothing could conceal the change, nor alter the wonderful look in her eyes.

"I am going to Liverpool," she said, "I must see Will immediately, and I want to go by the next train. There is nothing the matter with him. It is only something I have just heard, and I must see him without loss of time."

"What is it, Mary?" gasped Aunt Agatha. "You have heard something dreadful. Are any of the boys mixed up in it? Oh, say something, and don't look in that dreadful fixed way."

"Am I looking in a dreadful fixed way?" said

Mary, with a faint smile. "I did not mean it. No, there is nothing the matter with any of the boys. But I have heard something that has disturbed me, and I must see Will. If Hugh should come while I am away——"

But here her strength broke down. A choking sob came from her breast. She seemed on the point of breaking out into some wild cry for help or comfort; but it was only a spasm, and it passed. Then she came to Aunt Agatha and kissed her. "Good bye: if either of the boys come, keep them till I come back," she said. She had looked so fair and so strong in the composure of her middle age when she stood there only an hour before, that the strange despair which seemed to have taken possession of her, had all the more wouderful an effect. It woke even Winnie from her preoccupation, and they both came round her, wondering and disquieted, to know what was the matter. "Something must have happened to Will," said Aunt Agatha.

"It is that woman who has brought her bad news," cried Winnie; and then both together they cried out, "What is it, Mary? have you bad news?"

"Nothing that I have not known for years," said Mrs. Ochterlony, and she kissed them both, as if she was kissing them for the last time, and disengaged herself, and turned away. "I cannot wait to tell you any more," they heard her say as she went to the door; and there they stood, looking at each other, conscious more by some change in the atmosphere, than by mere eyesight, that she was gone. She had no time to speak or to look behind her; and when Aunt Agatha rushed to the window, she saw Mary far off on the road, going steady and swift with her bag in her hand. In the midst of her anxiety and suspicion, Miss Seton even felt a pang at the sight of the bag in Mary's hand. "As if there was no one to carry it for her!" The two who were left behind could but look at each other, feeling somehow a sense of shame, and instinctive consciousness that this new change, whatever it was, involved trouble far more profound than the miseries over which they had been brooding. Something that she had known for years! What was there in these quiet words which made Winnie's veins tingle, and the blood rush to her face? All these quiet years was it possible that a cloud had ever been hovering which Mary knew of, and yet held her way so steadily? As for Aunt Agatha, she was only perplexed and agitated, and full of wonder, making every kind of suggestion. Will might have broken his leg—he might have got into trouble with his uncle. It might be something about Islay. Oh! Winnie, my darling, what do you think it can be? Something that she had known for years!

This was what it really was. It seemed to Mary as if for years and years she had known all about it; how it would get to be told to her poor boy; how it would act upon his strange half-developed nature; how Mrs. Kirkman would tell her of it. and the things she would put into her travelling bag, and the very hour the train would leave. It was a miserably slow train, stopping everywhere, waiting at a dreary junction for several trains in the first chill of night. But she seemed to have known it all, and to have felt the same dreary wind blow, and the cold creeping to the heart, and to be used and deadened to it. Why is it that one feels so cold when one's heart is bleeding and wounded? It seemed to go in through the physical covering which shrinks at such moments from the sharp and sensitive soul, and to thrill her with a shiver as of ice and snow. She passed Mrs. Kirkman on the way, but could not take any notice of her, and she put down her veil and drew her shawl closely about her, and sat in a corner that she might escape recognition. But it was hard upon her that the train should be so slow, though that too she seemed to have known for years.

Thus the cross of which she had partially and by moments tasted the bitterness for so long, was laid at last full upon Mary's shoulders. She went carrying it, marking her way, as it were, by blooddrops which answered for tears, to do what might be done, that nobody but herself might suffer. For one thing, she did not lose a moment. If Will had been ill, or if he had been in any danger, she would have done the same. She was a woman who had no need to wait to make up her mind. perhaps she might not be too late, perhaps her boy meant no evil. He was her boy, and it was hard to associate evil or unkindness with him. Poor Will! perhaps he had but gone away because he could not bear to see his mother fallen from her high estate. Then it was that a flush of fiery colour came to Mary's face, but it was only for a moment; things had gone too far for that. She sat at the junction waiting, and the cold wind blew in upon her, and pierced to her heart-and it was nothing that she had not known for years.

DELIVERANCE

As some poor captive bird, too weak to fly, Still lingers in its open cage, so I My slavery own.

For evil makes a prison-house within; The gloom of sin, and sorrow born of sin, Doth weigh me down.

Ah, Christ! and wilt not thou regard my sighs, Long wakeful hours, and lonely miseries, And hopes forlorn?

Let not my fainting soul be thus subdued, Nor leave thy child in darkened solitude, All night to mourn!

He hears my prayer! the dreary night is done, I feel the soft air and the blessed sun,

With heavenly beams. He comes, my Lord! in raiment glistening white. From pastures golden in the morning light And crystal streams.

O let me come to Thee !- from this dark place. And see my gentle Shepherd face to face, And hear his voice.

So shall these bitter tears no longer flow. And thou shalt teach my secret heart to know Thy sacred joys!

SENSITIVE PLANTS.

life differs in many respects, there is one property common to both the great divisions of organised nature. This is the means by which the function of nutrition is carried on through the cellular tissue. Vegetables seem to be governed by the same law as animals, and though unable to protect themselves or resist destruction to the same extent, yet, as we showed in our paper on "Curious forms of Fruits," many of them are provided with a certain means of protection by the prolongation of some of their parts or the addition of others.

Though sensitiveness or excitability is not so general or so intense amongst plants as it is amongst animals, it will be seen from the examples we are about to give that where it does occur it is so marked that there is no mistaking its presence. As to tenacity of life, plants are quite as fully endowed as animals, or perhaps even more so. know that two distinct vegetable forms which in the process of grafting may have had their tissues ruptured by being cut, will unite and become as one plant, the circulation passing freely from one to the other. Again, many plants may be considerably reduced in weight by drying, while yet they are capable of being restored to perfect life and vigour. De Candolle mentions an instance of a plant of Sempervivum cæspitosum growing after having been shut up amongst other dried plants in a herbarium for eighteen months. In many seeds too we have proof of this tenacity of life when we see that after they have been kept for a length of time, and consequently become dried and shrivelled, or perhaps subjected to severe cold or frost, they germinate with the greatest facility. This tenacity of vegetable life is partly borne out by the hygrometric properties of some plants. Among cryptogams many instances are known of a revival of the plants after a lengethened suspension of the

Though the composition of Animal and Plant occasion to refer more fully to these various functions when we come to speak of the individual plants so affected.

Of those plants which come under the designation of irritable or sensitive, none is more popular than the Mimosa pudica, which is commonly known as the "Sensitive Plant." It is a native of Sensitive Plant-Mimosa pudica.

Brazil, but is very frequently to be seen in cultivation in our hothouses. M. sensitiva is also found in cultivation, but it is not nearly so sensitive as M. pudica. Most of our readers have, no doubt, watched the closing and opening of its leaflets; and many a lesson of humility may have been learnt from its voluntary motion. The meek, subdued manner in which it receives an injury, appeals in a gentle but decided way to our own feelings. The plant, if ill used, cannot retaliate by inflicting injury in return—as we have shown many plants can do by their armed fruits-but it simply droops, looks withered and dead as if to shame its assailant. After a short time, however, it revives, carefully and gradually opening its leaflets to the same most important vital functions. We shall have extent as before. The following lines, from the pen of Erasmus Darwin, eloquently set forth the delicate habits of the Mimosa:—

"Weak with nice sense the chaste Mimosa stands, From each rude touch withdraws her timid hands, Oft as light clouds o'erpass the summer glade, Alarm'd, she trembles at the moving shade, And feels, alive through all her tender form, The whisper'd murmurs of the gathering storm; Shuts her sweet eyelids to approaching night, And hails with freshen'd charms the rising light."

The plant, as will be seen from the cut, has compound bipinnate leaves, and four partial leaf-stalks starting from one common petiole.

If a leaflet be touched at the apex, or the sun's rays concentrated upon it by a lens, it will immediately move upwards, and the opposite leaflet will have a simultaneous motion until the upper surfaces of the two leaflets are brought together; the next pair lower down will likewise follow a similar course of closing, and so on, one pair after another, increasing in rapidity till the last pair has closed, when the partial petiole itself will drop downwards, after which the influence is transmitted to the entire leaf, and the main petiole suddenly drops, like the arm of a railway semaphore. If the leaflet be touched at the base instead of the apex, the motion will be in the opposite direction. The stem of the plant does not appear to be directly concerned in this sensitiveness. It may be wounded or injured in various ways without producing any effect upon the leaflets, but the application of a chemical agent, as a fluid or acid, which can be absorbed by the cells of the tissue, will cause the leaves to become depressed. The mechanism by which, so to speak, this motion is carried on, is contained in the lower part of the swollen base or joints of the petiole. The upper part may be touched, or even cut away, and the leaf remains erect; but if a similar injury occurs to the lower part, the drooping of the leaf immediately follows. "Hence it appears that the elevation and depression of the leaf is owing to the elasticity of the tissue, of which the swollen joint is composed; and that the stimulus employed to produce motion tends to weaken the upper part of these joints in the case of the leaflets and partial petioles, but the lower part of those belonging to the main petiolesthe contrary sides continuing elastic as before." How the effect is produced, and the causes which regulate its action, have been much investigated questions, and numerous explanations have been given by scientific men. Dr. Dutrochet, however, has perhaps gone more fully into the subject, in its chemical and physiological bearings, than any other writer, and we cannot do better than quote his opinions on this point, as given in the "Botanical Register":-"The principal point of locomotion, or of mobility, exists in the little swelling which is situated at the base of the common and partial petioles of the leaves; this swelling is composed of a very delicate cellular tissue, in which is found an immense number of nervous corpuseles;

the axis of the swelling is formed of a little fascicle of tubular vessels. It was ascertained by some delicate experiments, that the power of movement, or of contraction and expansion, exists in the parenchym and cellular tissue of the swelling, and that the central fibres have no specific action connected with the motion. It also appeared that the energy of the nervous powers of the leaf depended wholly upon an abundance of sap, and that a diminution of that fluid occasioned an extreme diminution of the sensibility of the leaves. Prosecuting his inquiry still further, the author ascertains that in the movements of the sensitive plant there are two distinct motions—the one of locomotion, which is the consequence of direct violence offered to the leaves, and which occurs in the swellings already spoken of; the other, nervimotion, which depends upon some stimulus applied to the surface of the leaflets, unaccompanied by actual violence, such as the solar rays concentrated in the focus of a lens. As in all cases the bending or folding of the leaves evidently takes place from one leaf to another with perfect continuity, it may be safely inferred that the invisible nervous action takes place in a direct line from the point of original irritation, and that the cause by which this action of nervimotion is produced must be some internal uninterrupted agency. This was, after much curious investigation, determined by the author to exist neither in the pith nor in the bark, nor even in the cellular tissue filled with nervous corpuscles, and ou which he supposes the locomotion of the swelling at the base of the petioles to depend. It is in the ligneous part of the central system, in certain tubes supplied with nervous corpuscles, and serving for the transmission of sap, that Dr. Dutrochet believes he has found the true seat of nervimotion, which he attributes to the agency of the sap alone, while he considers the power of locomotion to depend upon the nervous corpuscles alone."

The sensibility of the plant is greatly diminished by continued shaking, or other agitation; if it is exposed to the wind it gets used to the motion, and after a short time fully expands its leaves. Another proof of the power of arresting its sensibility may be had by carrying the plant in a vehicle. At first it droops and looks withered, but it soon gets accustomed to the continued motion and fully opens its leaves.

Another very interesting plant is the "Moving Plant," Desmodium gyrans. It is a native of the East Indies and belongs to the same natural order as the Sensitive Plant. Its movements, however, differ from those of the Mimosa, inasmuch as the leaves have a rotary motion instead of a collapsing or drooping one. Again, the Sensitive Plant, to put it in motion, requires some outward mechanical agency, such for instance as being touched, or breathed upon. In the Desmodium the motion is voluntary, for some of the leaflets appear never to be at rest even where there is no wind or air to set them in motion. Indeed the movements are most apparent in plants growing in a closed hothouse, where the sun has undiminished power. The leaves are ternate, that is, composed of three leaflets; sometimes one of these leaflets will be in motion while the others are still. At other times two will be moving, and at other times all three; so that there is no regularity in the motion of the leaflets, and they may be seen moving either steadily or by jerks in every possible direction. Linnæus's description of the peculiarities of this plant is worth quoting, as it shows the accuracy and acute observation of that great naturalist. He says :- "No sooner had the plants, raised from seed, acquired their ternate leaves than they began to be in motion in every direction; this movement did not cease during the whole course of their vegetation, nor were they observant of any time, order, or direction; one leaflet frequently revolved, whilst the others on the same petiole were quiescent; sometimes a few leaflets only were in motion, then almost all of them would be in movement at once; the whole plant was very seldom agitated, and that only during the first year. It continued to move in the stove during the second year of its growth, and was not at rest even in winter."

665

Though, as we have before said, the motion of this plant is distinctly different to that of the Sensitive Plant, it seems that some of the causes of their motions are similar. Thus, for instance, heat, as derived from the sun's rays, has a similar effect upon both. It is, however, singular that mechanical action is required to set one in motion, and not the other. Æschynomene viscidula and Æ. sensitiva have also sensitive leaves: the first is a native of Florida. and the latter of the West Indies. Like the "Sensitive" and "Moving" plants, they belong to the Leguminosæ, or pea family; and it is remarkable that many others of the same order have a similar habit of opening their leaflets during the day, and closing them during the night. These facts would seem to go to establish the theories of some authors that the motion of plants, even under mechanical treatment-we mean by being touched-is to be referred to what is called the sleep of plants. Hoffman's opinion is that the sleeping and awaking of leaves is to be attributed to temperature, and that VII-47 light affects the change only so far as it contains calorific rays. Many plants are familiar to us as opening and closing either their leaves or flowers at dawn and dusk, but there are none equal in beauty to the night-flowering cacti. Cereus grandiflorus, a native of the West Indies, is the most common of these kinds; but C. Macdonaldia is by far the most beautiful. The flowers of this species when fully expanded are quite fourteen inches across. The petals are of a delicate white, backed by radiating sepals of bright red and orange. The stamens are very numerous, and, drooping from the centre, give a graceful feathery appearance to that part of the flower. The stems of the plant are no thicker than the finger, and appear scarcely strong enough to support the mass of flowers, for upon a wellgrown plant as many as twelve or eighteen flowers may be seen at one time. The plant requires a wall or trellis-work to grow upon, and in this way it will cover a very large surface. In the Botanic Garden, Kew, there is a very fine plant, which flowers profusely during the months of May and June; but it labours under this disadvantage, that by the time it opens its blossoms the public are excluded from the gardens. Between eight and nine o'clock in the evening it usually prepares for its display, and by eleven o'clock is fully blown-fading, and the petals dropping, by daybreak next morning.

Venus's Fly Trap (Dionæa muscipula) is a well-known and very striking example of vegetable irritability. The plant is a native of the swamps of Venus's Fly Trap-Dionæa muscipula.

North Carolina, and belongs to the natural order Droseraceæ. It is frequently in cultivation in our hothouses, not for the magnificence or splendour of its flowers, but solely on account of the interest excited by its peculiar movements. The entire plant is very small, and has radical leaves arranged in a cluster, from the centre of which the flower-spike springs. These leaves have long winged footstalks, as will be seen by the cut.

The true leaf is the irritable part, and this is seated at the apex of the winged petiole, in a similar position to the Pitchers mentioned in our first paper; it is divided by a continuation of the mid-rib into two nearly semicircular lobes, the edges of which are fringed with a single row of stiff hairs. In the centre of each of these lobes, on the upper sides, are three hairs, or short fine bristles, arranged in the form of a triangle. It is in these hairs that the irritation exists, and they are so delicately sensitive, that the least touch will bring the two halves of the leaf closely together. The best way of witnessing this interesting motion is when a fly or other small insect settles or crawls upon the leaf, and so touches the fine hairs. Then the two lobes will immediately collapse, completely and securely enclosing the intruder until he is either dead or has ceased to struggle, when the sides again open and resume their former position. A similar movement of course can be produced by lightly touching the hairs on the lobes with a fine straw or needle. This, then, is the trap from which the plant derives its name. Indeed, it has been presumed that a sweet liquor exuded by the little glands, which are only to be distinguished by the aid of a lens, on the upper surface of the leaf, is the means of tempting insects to their destruction; and these insects dying in the plant and being decomposed, act as naturally gotten manure. But before accepting this last theory as a sound one, further confirmation is needful. A very beautiful example of the perfectness of nature's work is to be seen in the alternate clasping of the hairs of the edges when the lobes are brought together in a perfectly similar manner to the clasping of the human hand; by this arrangement much strength is gained to resist the struggles of the insect inside.

The Sundews, of which three species are indigenous to Britain, have a slight irritable tendency. The genus is a very peculiar one, the leaves are covered with glandular hairs, the tips of which are bright red, enclosed in a colourless viscid fluid, which attaches itself to the wings of flies or other small insects, and gradually bends over them. leaf itself slightly curls inwards, and so holds its prev securely until it is dead. If we examine any number of plants of Drosera rotundifolia, which is a British species, having rotundate leaves, we shall scarcely find one whose leaves have not an insect, or the remains of one, attached to them. These peculiar plants, which grow in bogs, were formerly valued for reputed medicinal properties. Gerarde, in his Herbal, speaks of the Sundew as a remedy for consumption and various other diseases. The viscid juice was also considered efficacious for removing sunburns, freckles, warts, &c. Though the juice is undoubtedly acrid, the properties assigned to it seem to be imaginary rather than real, as is also the notion, once prevalent, that it was the cause in some districts of the disease in sheep called rot. This disease, however, would seem more likely to be derived from the miasma arising from the unhealthy situations in which the plants are usually found, and where the herbage is largely interspersed with moss, rushes, and similar vegetation.

Some of the foreign species of Drosera have a very striking appearance; D. binata, for instance, which is a native of Tasmania, has very long stem-like leaves, which, in their young state, are rolled up in a similar manner to the fronds of a fern. These are thickly covered with fine hairs, each one tipped with red, and the whole covered with a viscid fluid-so clear that they look like little spikes of crystal. These hairs are very beautiful objects under the microscope. The flowers are small and inconspicuous; their parts are in fives, and the styles from three to five cleft. The name of the genus is derived from the Greek drosos, dew, in reference to the dewy appearance of the hairs, to which the English name of Sundew also refers. Vegetable irritability occurs more or less in many other plants, but the examples we have given are those in which the movements are most apparent, and they are, moreover, plants which can readily be seen in any well-kept collection: so that most of our readers could without much difficulty examine the living specimens. Plants having this power of motion are found in widely distinct natural orders; even in the Orchidaceae, movements of a similar nature have been found to take place, though perhaps they are not to be referred to the same causes. In the genera Caleana and Spiculæ, both terrestrial orchids of Australia, the lip of the flower bends back in fine weather, or when undisturbed, and so leaves the column uncovered; but as soon as it rains, or the plant receives any motion by being jarred or otherwise, the lip instantly drops down, securely covering up the column.

In many plants a spontaneous motion is seen, such as the ejecting of the seeds with considerable force, or the contraction or expansion of their several parts: this is to be referred either to the hygroscopic properties of their tissues, or to a contact of two naturally secreted liquids of different densities, and this system is called endosmose. The fluid contents of plant cells being frequently of different degrees of density, and the freer passage of a thin liquid through the membranous divisions of the cells to the denser fluid—which movement is constantly going on in the cells of plants, so as to cause an interchange in their contents—is frequently attended with such results as we see in the squirting cucumber, Echalium agreete, the fruit of which separates from the stalk, either spontaneously or upon the least touch, when they have arrived at maturity, and eject their seeds with great force through the aperture caused by the rupture from the stalk. A very common example of the motion is seen in the curling up of the ripe fruit of the balsam, Impatiens noli-me-tangere.

As to the hygroscopicity of tissue, a more striking example cannot be given than the so-called Rose of Jericho, Anastatica heirochontica. It is an annual, belonging to the natural order Crucifera, and grows in the deserts of Arabia and Egypt. The plant is small, with obovate leaves. The flowers are white, borne on small spikes. During the flowering period, the plant grows vigorously, but at the time the seeds ripen the whole plant begins to coil itself up like a ball. The root is easily torn up by the wind, and the plants are blown about on land, or carried into the sea or some pool of water, where they expand, and the little ripe fruits open and throw out their seeds: so that when the plants are cast on shore by the tide, the seeds frequently germinate in situations far removed from their original position. So soon as the plants become dry, they immediately coil up again, and they retain this hygrometric property for years. In Palestine, a tradition prevails that this plant opened at the birth of our Saviour. The fronds of Lycopodium lepidophyllum and L. squamatum curl inwards, and fold themselves tightly together in dry weather, opening again at the least approach of moisture.

We cannot do better than finish these papers with a brief notice of a most interesting aquatic plant, the Vallisneria spiralis. It is found widely distributed in warm and tropical regions, and is frequently seen cultivated in water-tanks and aquaria in this country for the sake of the interest attached to the process of fertilisation. The plant is a perennial, and has long narrow leaves, as will be seen by the cut. They are frequently over a yard long. These leaves are a favourite object for the microscope, the cellular tissue being so very transparent that the movements of the contents of the cells are distinctly visible. The plants propagate themselves freely by suckers: they are diocious, that is, having the two sexes in different plants. The male flowers are very small, and appear as nothing more than little white globular forms arranged on a general stalk, and enveloped in a kind of spathe; when ripe this opens by valves, and the flowers also become detached, rising to the surface of the water, where they expand, and the anthers burst, setting the pollen free. The flowers float about on the water till they are attracted by the female flowers, upon the stigmas of which the pollen is shed, and so fertilisation is produced. The female flowers are much larger than the males, and though floating on the surface of the water are not free, but are attached by long spiral stalks to the base of the plant: these stalks grow in length and produce a number of coils equal to the depth of the water in which the plant grows, so that when uncoiled the flower may float either in deep or shallow water. The most singular part of the process is that, after the pollen from the anthers of the male flowers has become attached to the stigmas of the female, the spiral stalk coils up, taking the flower again to the bottom of the water, where it finishes its maturing process-producing a small berry-like fruit, from half an inch to about two inches in length.

The expansion and contraction of this spirally twisted stalk has no relation to the instances mentioned in other parts of this paper; but, as a striking and singular provision of nature, we were tempted to introduce it.

JOHN R. JACKSON.

CADGERS AND TRAMPS.

"Big fleas have small fleas
Upon their backs to bite 'em;
And these fleas have other fleas,
And so on ad infinitum."

"ONE half the world doesn't know how the other half lives." The more we see of life, the more we see the truth of this popular saying. The Parliamentary Report on Vagrancy, just out, gives us a picture of the habits and customs of a class of people living in our midst, but of whom we know as little as we do of the savages of the interior of Africa. To an ordinary observer, all classes of Euglish men and women of the more respectable order have certain ideas of living and enjoyment in common. The first nobleman in the land lives in a house, and cats and drinks, and has his duties and his responsibilities, like the workman, or the porter at his gate; in all the essentials of life there is an almost painful uniformity in the manner the various grades of the population spend the twenty-four hours of the day. The curious Blue-book just issued has, however, introduced us to a new tribe of people-a race paying no taxes, calling no man master; having no house to cover them, no friends to help them; feeling no love for any human thing, but a great deal of hate; buying no food, owning no bed to lie down upon-in short, a people as unproductive and almost as naked as the moment they came into the world. When we hear of the state of society two or three hundred years ago, when certain classes on the Borders used to live by levying black-mail, we fancy what extraordinary times they must have been-how unlike our The only difference really between those times and these, is to be found in the fact that in a lawless time a certain portion of the population took toll of our substance in a lawless manner, whereas now, in a time of law and respect for the rights of others, we have a class who do exactly the same thing in a perfectly lawful manner-nay, we have a most perfect machinery under a national board to further their views and to legalise their plunder. Vagrants, cadgers, and tramps—the poetic temperament has always had a leaning towards this erratic class, and Charles Lamb had more than a sneaking regard for them. To roam about the country, not knowing what adventures may turn up or where you may lay your head, the idea has fired many a lad and lass of a romantic turn in their teens; but what shall we say to a class of people so devoted to this nomade existence that they continue in it to the latest period of their lives, without having the slightest feeling of romance, and with a full knowledge that the end of every day's ramble will be terminated by a night in the tramp-ward, passed in a tumultuous fight with all kinds of creeping things, a meal of dry bread in the morning and a basin of skilley, painfully earned by three hours' stonebreaking, oakum-picking, or the cleaning out of water-closets! There certainly is no romance in this, neither is there any adequate recompense in the way of food, one would think, to induce a man to seek such parish hospitality night after night for years together. But that such a class exists, and is, if anything, on the increase, the returns of the poor-law inspectors testify. That they are for the greater part known to each other, and that they have some mysterious means of intercommunication, is also certain. The chief constable of the city of Chester, writing to Andrew Doyle, Esq., one of the poor-law inspectors, gives a curious example of this. "The perfect system of communication among tramps is surprising. I have tested it, and found that about two days are sufficient to promulgate a new regulation, &c., among the fraternity. My test was causing every male to be searched, and burning pipes and tobacco found amongst them. " Every professional tramp carries a favourite pipe, and, as a rule, has half an ounce of tobacco per day. After two or three nights, not one of the applicants had either pipe or tobacco, having hidden those luxuries before entering the police-office. The second test was searching for money, and with a like result. Cadgers and tramps generally travel in companies of twos and threes-often a man with his putative wife, and perhaps a child or two. It is their habit, when they have money or anything else about them they do not wish taken away, to leave the things in charge of one of the gang who sleeps outside whilst the others seek admission in the casual-ward of the Union." The same writer gives the following curious account of the class of people who apply for this kind of temporary relief. He says: "The public are totally unaware what class of persons apply for this kind of relief. Estimated roughly, I am decidedly of opinion that 75 per cent. of them never work, but spend their time in tramping from Union to Union. In fact, I have at this moment the names, or rather the nicknames, of between thirty and forty men and women who are known as the 'Long Gang,' and who work Cheshire and North Wales in pairs, visiting Liverpool when they get possession of anything they can dispose of safely elsewhere." These tramps generally leave behind them in the workhouses some handwriting on the wall, by which those who come after them are informed of the character of the various workhouses in the neighbourhood. Some of these places have a particularly bad name among the fraternity. Congleton Workhouse, near Sandbach, is thus spoken of in one of these wall inscriptions :-

"Oh Sanbach, thou art no eatch;
For like heavy bread, a — bad batch,
A nice new suit for all tear-ups,
And stones to break for refractory pups."

The bad and good points are carefully noted in the neighbouring workhouses, just as in towns the traveller records the treatment he has received; the only difference being that, as a rule, the traveller says nothing but pleasant thing:-the tramps quite the contrary. Thus, the bare boards of some vagrant wards are distinguished from the good padding of others; and notice is given that in certain Unions named, the "tear-ups" will not get new suits. The term "tear-ups" alludes to those tramps who, before being sent out in the morning, tear up their old rags, which are generally covered with vermin, well knowing that the master of the Union will not send them adrift naked. But this convenient system of obtaining a change of clothes at the expense of the community is sometimes frustrated by the master having old sacks and bags made up for them, in such a manner as to insure decency, but by no means elegance in their fit or general appearance. We have given an example of a condemnatory notice of one workhouse, we now quote a poem in approbation of the Seisdon Union at Trysull :-

"Dry bread in the morning, ditto at night, Keep up your pecker and make it all right. Certainly the meals are paltry and mean, But the beds are nice and clean. Mind don't tear these beds, sheets, or rugs, For there are neither lice, fleas, nor bugs At this clean little union at Trysull. But still at the place there is a drawback, And now I'll put you on the right track, For I would as soon lodge here as in Piecadilly, If along with the bread they give a drop of skilly, At this clean little union at Trysull.

So I tell you again, treat this place with respect, And instead of abusing pray do it protect; For to lodge here one night is certainly a treat, At this clean little union at Trysull."

The writer of this, who signs himself "Bow Street," is certainly a jolly beggar of a humorous turn, and must be a prime favourite among the fraternity. His doggrel is scrawled over many of the workhouses, and he seems to be no more able to keep down his rhyming propensities, than he can repress his turn for mendicancy.

Mr. Doyle gives a curious collection of the announcements and appointments he has copied from the workhouse walls in his district, some of them are very curious :-

"Private Notice.—Saucy Harry and his mate will be at Chester to eat their Christmas dinner, when they hope Saucer and the fraternity will meet them at the Union. 14th November, 1865."

"Spanish Jim, the —— fool who robbed the two poor —— tramps in Clatterbridge Union, were here on the —— find it out."

"The Flying Dutchman off the Brum for a summer cruise at the back doors, or any other door."

"Wild Scotty, the celebrated king of the eadgers, is in Newgate, in London, going to be hanged by the neck till he is dead. This is a great fact—written by his mate."

"Never be ashamed of eadging. I was worth five hundred pounds once, and now I am glad to cadge for a penny, or a piece of bread.—LANKY TOM."

"If rag-tailed Soph stays here (Shiffnall), come on to Chester."

"Shaver here, bound for Salop, to see the Rev. Henry Burton, a most benevolent minister of the Church of England, and may the devil fetch him."

The gentleman is no believer in tramps, hence the polite wish at the end of Shaver's notice.

"Beware of Ludlow, -bare boards -no chuck."

"Bowney will not have none of Prince Charles this winter. He is bound for Westmorland and Cumberland. All pudding cans in that county: no dirty rags and boards."

"Boys, look here! There's Long Lank working at Warrington for two or three rags of clothes, and taking the bread out of other mouths."

Nothing seems to be so infamous as to work among the fraternity. This Long Lank is the gentleman who tells his mates never to be ashamed of cadging, but he appears to have thought better of it, and is denounced accordingly. Some of these gentlemen find their time hang heavy on their hands just before festive seasons. A fellow who signs himself Westminster Coekney, for instance, pathetically says, "I don't know where to go, to put over the time untill Christmass, but there is too dry service in Yorkshire to please me; I shall take my likeness to Bristol for the next two months." It is customary to regale the inmates of workhouses on that happy day with roast beef and plumpudding, and we see in the public papers flourishing announcements that certain charitable people have sent money to the workhouses for that purpose. We here see some of the kind of people who lie in wait for such good things. What the meaning of the following announcement can be, we leave to the reader's discrimination:—

"Harry Heenan was here, hafter being off the ropes for twelve months. 13th September, 1865."

"The Yorkshire Rodneys coming down into Cheshire to spoil the splendid country, after filing their ——guts with good cheese and bacon.—Buttermilk."

The irrepressible "Bow Street," who seems to have made acquaintance with all the Unions in this district at least, evidently has a vein of humour, and a touch of sarcasm in him which would have earned for him a better livelihood in the literary world, we should think, than padding the hoof can do. Here, for instance, are a few words from his pen, worthy of some of the jolly scoundrels in the old dramatists : "Bow Street and two other ragamuffins slept here on the night of the 12th of April, and was quite shocked at the elownish impudence of the old pauper at the lodge. The thundering old thief denied us a drink of water. So help me Bob; "and then he adds, with a rare vein of irony, "What noble institutions these Poor-law Unions are; and how they succour distress, opening arms-Yes, over the left; plenty of pump, but little grub, and a nice warm breakfast in the morning. Don't you wish you may get it?" But there is a dismal touch about this vagabond, which proves that his genius is versatile as well as jolly. Perhaps, for the sake of enjoying a little solitude and reflection after the freedom of the cadger life, he graduated for a prison; and we find him thus apostrophising it in a strain too life-like not to be drawn from personal experience :-

A PRISON.

"No sun, no moon,
No morn, no night,
No sky, no earthly blue,
No distant-looking view,
No road, no street,
No tother side the way,
No dawn, no dusk,
No proper time of day,
No end to any row,
No top to any steeple,
No indication where to go,
No sight of familiar people,
No cheerfulness, no healthy case,
No butterflies,
Nor yet no bees."

After that, who shall say there are no Laureates among the beggars? "Bow Street," however, is a very remarkable exception—a ne'er-do-well possibly of a better class, who loves vagrancy for itself. The majority of the tramps and casuals are simply rogues and vagabonds, who never have worked, and never would, even if it were offered them. It is a singular feature in human nature, that a distinct class should exist who beg their way through life with a labour and an earnestness that would insure them good wages in any honest occupation. A poor, wretched looking creature, clothed in filthy rags, with two or three miserable children dragging behind her, will now and then be seen trudging along the road on a rainy day accompanied by a low-browed tramp, who whines for halfpence in a voice that you know is simulated, and could in a minute be exchanged for oaths and blasphemies. The broken victuals, and the coppers they collect, and the buggy bed of the casual-ward at night, with skilley and cold water for breakfast, make up the sumptuous fare upon which they live from year's end to year's end. What can there be in this gipsy roving life to give zest to such a manner of passing one's days? It will, perhaps, be said that begging is a more profitable occupation than we imagine, or that the cadger enjoys his orgies now and then as well as his betters.* Granted, but in the long run the life must be hard-far harder than that of the labourer who lives by the sweat of his brow. We can only account for the strange life of the cadger on the supposition that he really possesses some Bohemian blood in him, which irresistibly leads him to wander, beg, and steal. We know that likenesses to ancestors that have lived generations back now and then come up in families. Why may not the tramp inherit a taint of vagrancy from his great-great-grandfather? It must be a disease of the blood, as it is too hard a life to be selected from choice. The late Charles Buller-who looked upon the cadging tribe as a class of rogues and vagabonds who lived upon the charity of weak people in the daytime, and on the hospitality of the poor-law guardians at night-endeavoured to put an end to their indiscriminate relief by the promulgation of the following rules:-

"1. The refusal of relief to all able-bodied young men who, in the opinion of the relieving-officers or the masters of workhouses, were not actually destitute.

"2. The exacting of a task-work suitable to the capacity of the casual poor who are relieved.

"3. The employment of police-officers as assistant relieving-officers.

"4. Requiring the production of passes or certificates, except under exceptional circumstances, from all those who applied for relief as casual poor."

These rules worked well during the lifetime of Mr. Buller, especially the one systematically retusing relief to professional tramps; but with his death they fell into disuse, and any applicant is now considered entitled to relief if he is not found to be in possession of money. The evidence of nearly all the poor-law inspectors is in favour of reverting to the plan of employing the police as relieving-officers. It may be feared that, by so doing, the deserving casual poor may be confounded with the worthless tramps and cadgers, who now form three-fourths of those who apply for relief.* If this were the case, it would of course be a fatal objection, inasmuch as we have no right to place any of the deserving poor under police surveillance. But those who have had any experience of the two classes can no more confound them than a veterinary surgeon could confound a pony with a donkey. A cadger and professional tramp is self-conscious; he is betrayed by his tone of voice, his clothes, his very walk. There is no remnant of that independence which is always observable in the casual poor walking from place to place in search of work. Under the present state of things, indeed, this deserving class scarcely ever apply to the workhouse for a night's lodging, unless they are in the last extremity of want. The brutal language, the fearful vermin. + and the indecent conduct of many of these wretches, make our workhouses too loathsome for the most destitute of the honest poor, and they prefer to seek shelter in low lodging-houses rather than endure it.

Mr. Doyle, the poor-law inspector, makes an excellent proposition. He suggests that a classification should be made of the casuals demanding admittance. The true cadger should be turned over to the attentions of the police relieving-officer, and the deserving poor should be received and lodged in a separate room. A return might advantageously be made, he thinks, to the old form of certificate of character. "The deserving class of poor may be furnished with such evidence of their character and circumstances as might afford a fair presumption of the truth of their plea of destitution. A wayfarer of this class might, at the place where the cause of destitution occurs, be enabled by those who are cognisant of it to obtain a certificate from some proper authority, setting forth his name, the cause of destitution, and the object of the journey." The "casual" bearing such a certificate, as Mr. Doyle justly observes, should be entitled to some better treatment than the mere cadger who will not work. It certainly is a monstrous thing that an honest, but destitute, traveller should be subjected to the ^{*} Blind beggars, we know, live sumptuously, carning large sums duly, through the compassion of the kind-hearted public, which they spend on mere animal enjoyments. Many of the fellows we see tapping their sticks along Regent Street, if followed home would be found eating their rump steaks, drinking the best stout, and waited upon by a couple of "doxies." It is a fortune to a eadger to lose his eyes.

^{*} The letters of "An Amateur Casual," published in a cotemporary, has had the singular effect of calling forth a perfect erowd of persons anxious to contribute to the journals their experience of workhouse life. Among these, to the writer's knowledge, was a clergyman and a medical man, both of whom are now partaking of the hospitality of the guardians. The letters of some of these casuals prove that they have been well educated, and that no class is safe from the descent into pauperism.

and that no class is safe from the descent into patherism.

† In the refuges for casuals supported by voluntary contributions in the Metropolis, a very expeditious method is adopted of getting rid of vermin. The applicants for relief are put into a warm bath; meanwhile their clothes are taked in an oven. If the poor law authorities were to imitate this simple process, there would be more comfort and fewer "tear-ups."

treatment which is invented to deter the professional tramp. A poor starving creature in search of work is certainly entitled to better fare than a hunch of dry bread (often mouldy) and water for supper, and skilley or gruel for breakfast. Moreover, they should not be subjected to the temptations these eadgers put in their way. What should we say to the authorities of an hospital who placed physically depressed creatures, suffering also from mental fear, in the wards of a cholera hospital, check by jowl with poor creatures in a state of collapse! Yet this is just what we do by our present regulations, morally speaking, with our travelling poor. When they are at the lowest point of Fortune's wheel, we place them for the night in the company of the cadger, who boasts his earnings by day, and tempts them by the tales he tells of their vagabond life. Can it be wondered at that so many poor creatures fall victims to the teaching the law throws in their way?

If the cadger class could be banished from our workhouses, there would be ample funds for giving a good meal to the destitute traveller, without increasing the rates by one penny. The cadger is the human wolf of this century—the creature that eats up our substance without making any return for it, unless it be to tear up his clothes, or burn the wheat-rick, out of revenge for some fancied slight on the part of the master of the workhouse-and, like the wolf who used to eat up our mutton, he should be ruthlessly destroyed. But our poor-law management seems to have fallen into a fearful state of neglect. Immense sums are paid in the form of rates annually, and those for whom they are raised get no benefit from the money. Like our Admiralty and our Army, enormous sums are thrown away on establishments and the machinery of a bad system; and just as in the case of those establishments, which can neither furnish us with ships, sailors, or soldiers, our workhouses are so managed, that the deserving poor, for whom the relief they afford was intended, avoid their doors as they would the gates of a prison. But even the machinery and rules for casual relief afford a specimen of disorder and want of system which can scarcely be matched in any other national institution in the country. Having to do with the same class of worthless tramps, who wander from one end of the kingdom to the other, one would naturally think that the same rules as to lodging, feeding, and task-work would be carried out. Nothing of the kind. Every workhouse manages these matters as it likes; there appears to be no kind of general supervision; and one is lost in wonder as to what may be the labours of the Poor-law Board, and what the nature of the duties of that exalted individual, the President of that board.

In some Unions, no labour is demanded of the vagrant in return for his food and lodging; in others, they are put to work three hours before receiving it. In some, no food is given; in others (Penrith), only on Sundays! In other points, there is the greatest diversity: 35 ounces of bread are given in some Unions; 16 ounces in another, night and morning. In some, milk; in others, pea-soup; in some, gruel or skilley. In the Bala Union, the tramp gets porridge, treacle, 8 ounces of bread, 3 ounces of cheese, 7 ounces of bread, 11 pint of gruel, and 1 an ounce of treacle for supper and breakfast. At Bridgnorth, they get only bread and water! In short, there is far more diversity as regards the quantity and quality of the food in our different workhouses than travellers find in our hotels; and we are obliged to say there is the same diversity in the bedding. Some have bare boards. inclined at an angle, to sleep upon, with rugs to cover them; others have only straw mattrasses, with rugs and blankets. To some is accorded the luxury of iron bedsteads, with mattresses, sheets, and rugs. There is a fire in some vagrant wards; in the majority, none at all. In some places the sleepers have no covering! In short, the housing, feeding, and employment of tramps is a regular hodge-podge, and the tramps know it, and "spot" those houses which are to be avoided or frequented, as we have said before. The consequence is, that whilst some Unions never see a tramp, others are regular houses of call, by which the equality of the burthen thrown upon the ratepapers may be imagined. If the relief were alike all over the country, things would be more equalised, and the "Bow Street" worthies would no longer be able to find any theme for sprightly verse. It is probable that, if policemen were made assistant relieving-officers, the tramp would be driven to open courses of thieving; but this would be better than his present unsatisfactory state—a nominal wayfarer, but an active rogue, succoured by the Poor Law, as at present administered, instead of being punished, as he would be if deprived of that eleemosynary assistance which he takes out of the mouths of the really deserving travellers.

That we shall always have among us a certain number of professional beggars, as long as there are so many givers, we by no means doubt; but they should not, at least, be fostered in their laziness by the resources of the state. They have organisation enough, without such aid, as it is.

We are all of us familiar with the cadger's map, published as a frontispiece to the little volume, the "Slang Dictionary," and we mark the manner in which the houses of charitable people are hieroglyphically indicated, and vice versā. There is one practical remark anent this custom we wish to make. If the reader has ever given anything to a tramp, and then finds him making any mark upon his premises, let him rub it out at the first convenient opportunity, unless he wishes to be the victim of perpetual morning calls by this class of people. If he has given nothing, let him cherish such marks as they may make, as they will certainly not be to his advantage in a charitable sense, although they may be in a financial sense.

A late writer in Notes and Queries throws much light upon mendicant freemasonry; he says: "Let any one examine the entrances to the passages in any town, and there he will find chalk marksunintelligible to him, but significant enough to beggars. If a thousand towns were examined, the same marks will be found at every passage entrance. The passage mark is a cipher with a twisted tail: in some cases, the tail projects into the passage; in others, outwardly-thus seeming to indicate whether the houses down the passage are worth calling at or not. Almost every door has its mark: these are varied. In some cases, there is a cross on the brickwork; in others, a cipher. The figures 1, 2, 3, are also used. Every person may test for himself the accuracy of these statements, by the examination of the brickwork near his own doorway-thus demonstrating that mendicity is a regular trade, carried ont upon a system calculated to save time, and realise the largest profits." It is only in provincial towns these marks are to be found, however, as Londoners are considered to be too "fly" (experienced) to be taken in by them. We have heard of a clergyman who, having learned the meanings of these signs, turns them against the beggars, by making, on the piers of his parsonage gate, the signs of gammy (unfavourable, mind the dog), and flummuxed (sure of a month in gaol), and as a consequence no cadgers or beggars ever trouble him. There are no "Bow Street" poets out of doors, as within the walls of the Union, but a mysterious language is certainly prevalent, which they partly borrow from the gipsies, who undoubtedly adopted hieroglyphic signs, even in England, in times past, in order to give private information to each other by handwriting on the wall.

In conclusion, may we not remark that, when Dean Swift penned the droll lines at the head of this article, his prophetic eye must have seen the cadger in all his modern vigour? For this creature not only preys upon the better classes, but is a miserable parasite, stealing the substance even from the most destitute.

ANDREW WYNTER.

THE "CORNWALL AGRICULTURAL AND COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION OF JAMAICA."

DEPLORABLE events have, within the last twelvemonth, suddenly recalled the attention of the English people to an island, once deemed one of the richest jewels in England's colonial crown. It would be probably foreign to the purposes of Good Words to go into the still vexed question of the true character of the sanguinary collision which took place in October, 1865, between the white, the coloured, and the black race in the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East. Suffice it to say that, if we adopt the statements of the Royal Commissioners, whilst eighteen persons were killed and thirty-one wounded by the coloured rioters in or about the Court-house at Morant Bay on the 11th October, to whom must be added three other persons killed, or who lost their lives through wounds and exposure, and two wounded elsewhere in the course of the following days, making in all twenty-one who lost their lives and thirty-three who were wounded (several of whom were themselves coloured, and one a negro), -the "total number of deaths caused by those engaged in the suppression amounted to 439," -the number of persons flogged "could not have been less than 600,"—the "total number of dwellings burned" amounted to 1000, and no attempt seems to have been made by the Commissioners to estimate the number of persons wounded, short of death, by any other means than the lash, with or without pianoforte wire twisted round it. So that, in brief, to quote the concluding words of the Commissioners, "the punishments inflicted were excessive,"-"the floggings were reckless, and at Bath, positively barbarous," and "the burning of 1000 houses was wanton and cruel,"

It would hardly have been necessary to refer to these disturbances, confined as they were to the single parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, whilst the proclamation of martial law which they gave occasion to did not extend beyond the county of Surrey, in which that parish is situate, forming the eastern extremity of the island, except to observe that the movement to which I wish to call attention belongs to the county of Cornwall, which comprises the western extremity, were it not for a curious incident in the history of the movement, which has earned for it a place in a recent Blue-book. But it is necessary to state here, at the outset, that the Black River district, in which the movement has its focus, has at present scarcely any interest in common with the parishes of the eastern end of the island. Although the total area of Jamaica (4,256 square miles) is less than that of York county, yet its configuration, stretching lengthwise 150 miles on an average width of about forty, the absence of roads, or the bad condition of many, and the generally imperfect means of locomotion (which render the journey from Black River to Kingston one of two days), keep the people of the island so far apart that numbers, even of the educated and well-to-do, spend their lives without seeing more than a corner of their own country, and perhaps a couple of chief towns. Before, however, the nature of the movement in question can be understood, it appears needful briefly to indicate the general condition of the island.

It would be difficult perhaps to show this under one of its aspects more effectively than in the words of a gentleman who has recently returned from Jamaica,

Mr. W. Morgan, a well known Birmingham solicitor, in a letter (May 26, 1866) to the secretary of the Anti-slavery Society: "It was truly melancholy to see that an immense portion of the island is wholly uncultivated, although everywhere its wild and luxuriant vegetation gave us abundant proof of the capacity of the soil . . . It is not easy to carry to our own countrymen a popular notion of the extent of this abandoument. More than half the large estates that were growing sugar and coffee in 1834 are now thrown up." And he goes on to quote figures which show that whilst in 1805 Jamaica had 859 sugar estates in cultivation, and exported 137,000 hhds. of sugar, and 24,000,000 lbs. of coffee, these figures had already declined in 1834 to 646 sugar estates in cultivation, and an export of 79,465 hhds. of sugar, and 17,859,277 lbs. of coffee; that in 1862 the export of sugar had sunk to 33,097 hhds. and finally in 1865 to 23,750 hhds., grown on 300 estates; and that, since the hogshead of sugar costs in wages about 111., the diminution of 10,000 hhds. in four years shows in that time a reduction of wages to the labouring population of The population meanwhile has in the last 110,000%. quarter-century increased by 100,000 souls; so that "a larger population has had a smaller amount of wages to expend; and this at a time when there has been an immense advance in the price of clothing and other articles of import."*

A gloomy picture certainly, and one which, as sketched for the Anti-slavery Society by one of its own temporary delegates, seems abundantly to confirm all the anticipations of evil from the emancipation of coloured labour which the advocates of slavery used to proclaim. But in human society fortunately, as in nature, there are few flat surfaces, such as a single picture can adequately represent; the effect varies with every change of the point of view; and we must go round most things, in order to know what they really are. Now, if we go round, so to speak, this terrible abandonment and decay which is pictured to us, we shall find, I think, that it is not so much a fact as a process; that out of this death life is already unfolding itself.

"My own opinion," writes Governor Eyre himself, in a despatch to Mr. Cardwell of Aug. 19, 1865 -"is (greatly as I regret being compelled to admit it) that Jamaica, like some of the other smaller West India Islands, is in a state of transition . . . thus openly regrets—is described in a far different spirit by his predecessor, Sir Charles Darling, a West Indian himself, in a despatch of December 26, 1860, which will be found in a Blue-book of reports on "the past and present state of Her Majesty's Colonial Possessions," presented to Parliament, May, 1861. "I look upon it as a settled point," wrote that governor, "that the great mass of the emancipated population and their descendants are betaking themselves to the cultivation of the soil on their own account, either as a source of profit or as the mere means of subsistence . . . The proportion of those who are settling themselves industriously on their own holdings, and rapidly rising in the social scale, while commanding the respect of all classes of the community, and some of whom are, to a limited extent, themselves the employers of hired labour, paid for either in money or in kind, is however, I am happy to think, not only steadily increasing, but at the present moment is far more extensive than was anticipated by those who are cognisant of all that took place in this colony in the earlier days of negro freedom. There can be no doubt, in fact, that an independent, respectable, and, I believe, trustworthy middle-class is rapidly forming." And he concludes the despatch in question by these remarkable words: "Thus it is that Jamaica presents, as I believe, at once the strongest proof of the complete success of the great measure of emancipation, as relates to the capacity of the emancipated race for freedom, and the most unfortunate instance of a descent in the scale of agricultural and commercial importance as a colonial community."

Let us take an instance of this change. Mr. Samuel Rennalls, custos of St. Thomas-in-the-Vale, in a letter of March 23, 1865, (forming one in a huge crop of replies to a circular despatch of Governor Eyre's, called forth by the transmission of a certain celebrated letter of Dr. Underhill's,) says: "In the district in which I reside for a portion of the year, and in which I possess property realising a rent-roll, from land tenanted by negroes, of between 200l. and 250l. a year, the population numbers from 5000 to 6000 souls, according to the last census of 1861. There are no sugar estates, nor are there any properties, of any extent, carried on by the owners in the cultivation of coffee or any other export. The lands are rented out in small lots (generally from one to five acres each) to labourers; and immediately upon emancipation they purchased freeholds, now planted with coffee, arrowroot, and the usual ground provisions, as well as [Indian] corn, to a very considerable extent of acreage. In fact, they are formed into a numerous middle class, and I do not believe that they would ever be induced, under any circumstances whatever, to become, in the general acceptation of the term, a labouring class."

It is the fact that the minor staples of the island. and coffee to a great extent, are already in the hands of the small freeholders. Thus, Governor Eyre himself, in a despatch of April 10, 1865, after speaking of that it is, in fact, gradually passing into the hands of quite a different class of proprietors from that which held possession some thirty years ago." And this change, - which the late Governor of Jamaica * And food generally. "I have never known every description of food to be at such high prices all at the same time as it has happened lately. The native ground provisions, flour and meal, salt fish and pickled fish, all scarce and dear at the same time," wrote, August 5, the custos of St. James's parish, in reply to some inquiries from Governor Eyrc. (See "Papers relative to the Adairs of Jamaica," presented to Parliament, Feb. 1865.)

the imports of the then last five years, says that "the labouring classes, by the cultivation of coffee, honey, bees-wax, ginger, and other products have themselves largely added to the value of the general exports of the colony during the same period." Dr. Hamilton, a member of the Executive Committeei. e., ministry of the island-says, in an inclosure to a despatch of Governor Eyre's of May 23, 1865: "Since emancipation a large number of the then existing coffee plantations have been thrown out of cultivation, and yet since 1860 the average exports of coffee have not diminished. Had Dr. Underhill, or his correspondents, travelled through the coffee districts they would have found that this was due to the number of small settlers who now grow coffee on their 'little freeholds'; and if the exports of ginger, bees-wax, honey, &c., are considered (all of which are the produce of the small freeholders), it will be apparent that these branches of industry are not in the deplorable condition Dr. Underhill would have us believe." In proof of which, Dr. Hamilton subjoins a table of exports, from 1849 to 1864, of coffee, ginger, arrowroot, bees-wax, honey, cocoanuts, and pimento. Mr. Shaw, inspector of prisons, expresses himself to the same effect (April 20, 1865): "Native products have maintained full prices for some years past, and are likely to continue to do so; I mean ginger, coffee, yams, plantains, and corn (maize)." Nay, it is certain -however opinions may differ as to the advantage of the system, -that the small settlers are rapidly becoming, in many districts, sugar producers. "We are assured by those best acquainted with the country," writes Dr. Bowerbank, custos of Kingston (March 15, 1865), "that the cultivation of sugar on a small scale, and by a middle and better class of labourers, is rapidly increasing. . . . An American workman, in a distant parish, has manufactured and put up forty small sugar-mills, and is now engaged erecting six more. The rollers and frame are of wood, with iron cogwheels. They can be made and put up for 5l. or 6l. a set. The demand for mills at this price is more than he can meet, and so pressing is the demand for them that he has at present engaged extra tradesmen in manufacturing them. Hundreds of these small mills are already in operation." This fact is testified to by other custodes also. Mr. Lewis Mackinnon, custos of Vere, -judging, I fear, too much from his own neighbourhood, -declares (March 17, 1865) that "the island is gradually getting covered with nice cottages and thriving settlements, where not only vegetables, but sugar and coffee, are grown to a considerable extent." The Rev. D. B. Panton, quoted by Archdeacon Stewart in his reply to inquiries from the Bishop of Kingston (March 7, 1865) says in like manner of "the peasantry of the mountains of the parish of St. George," that "each year more land is cleared for the cultivation of coffee, sugar, arrow-root, &c." So, again, the custos of St. Mary's, Mr. A. J. Lindo (March 20, 1865): "The peasantry here not only raise ground-provisions, but many produce the staples of the colony, sugar and coffee, bees-wax, cocoa, arrow-root, starch, tobacco, cotton, and other minor products." And Mr. Salmon, custos of St. Elizabeth, asks (March 28): "Whence is the entire crop of ginger, a large portion of the coffee, and much pimento? who grows the sugar consumed by all classes of colour and by many white families, the arrow-root, the starch? from whence comes the raw material of all the pickles and preserves which are exported?"—obviously implying that all these articles are produced by the coloured population on their own account.

From these statements, which I have been careful to borrow from official sources alone so far, it must be clear that what seems at first sight to be an abandonment, is in fact only a displacement of labour and cultivation. And we may now perhaps be interested to find that Mr. Morgan, although looking at what he saw from a different point of view, bears witness to the very same facts:—

"The labouring class," he says, "by how slow and painful steps we can scarcely imagine, has been gradually finding out for itself new sources of gain and outlets for industry... In spite of obstacles, the people are gradually bringing a large portion of the abandoned estates into cultivation again... An English proprietor of extensive sugar and coffee properties, who has resided in Jamaica for more than thirty years—in speaking of the difficulty which he had experienced in obtaining a supply of labour—said he could not blame the people, for they were doing better for themselves in cultivating their own little patches than by earning such wages as he could afford to pay; and he offered to show me thirty little sugar-mills, all at work, belonging to peasant proprietors, within three miles of his own house. The following morning, in the course of a delightful ride on horseback among the mountains, my friend's promise was amply fulfilled. At one point we could distinctly see at a glance, on the various hill-sides, twelve or fourteen small mills; and the industrious negroes were in all directions cutting, carrying, and crushing their little crops of sugar-cane. We visited several of these peasant proprietors, and I came away with the conviction that, although undoubtedly poor, because they are employing themselves in the production of an article which does not at present bring a remunerative price, yet nothing can fairly be alleged against either their industry or their skill."

We must therefore admit the fact that the soil of Jamaica is passing into the economic condition of peasant proprietorship. From this condition there is at present no escape. The larger planters may still talk about assistance by loan from the mothercountry; but Governor Eyre, who, as we have seen, regrets the change, expressly says, in a before-quoted despatch of August 19, 1865, "I have myself no faith in the resuscitation of the by-gone prosperity, and still decaying interests, of the Jamaica planters through the instrumentality of any adventitious stimulus, such as a government loan is intended to be." There remains, then, only to make the best of that which is. The large planting interest is decaying, dying. The small planting interest is alive and growing. To the small planters, then, we must look for the future of their noble island.

Now, without entering here into any lengthy disquisition as to the advantages or disadvantages of the peasant proprietor system, which have been largely discussed by Mr. Mill and other economists, it is sufficient to say that the drawbacks of the system seem all to turn on the absence of accumulated capital, combined labour, and directing skill. And the only possible counteraction to these drawbacks lies in association, which rolls up the small capitals into a large one, distributes and economises labour by combination, and by selection winnows out those powers of management which in the many are wanting, and which ran to waste before in the few. Accordingly, Dr. Underhill, in his famous letter of January 5, 1865, to Mr. Cardwell, suggested that the Governor might be instructed to encourage, by his personal approval and urgent recommendation, the growth of exportable produce by the people, on the very numerous freeholds they possess,"-amongst other means, "by the formation of associations for shipping their produce in considerable quantities."

But the power to associate is itself, in fact, a skill of no mean order, -nay, it is the human skill above all others, -and the truest measure of human civilization lies in the extent to which man is capable of associating with his fellows. We need not, therefore, be surprised if a people like the coloured race of Jamaica, scarcely separated from slavery by the interval of a generation, and amongst which every man who was over thirty-two on August 1, 1865, may have been born a slave, should be deficient in associative power. This is insisted on by some who most strongly urge the need of combination amongst them. "Were the peasantry capable of association," wrote Dr. Hamilton in a before-quoted paper, "and were they to organise bands of labourers to go from one district to another, under the guidance of some one among them of sufficient intelligence to manage their affairs, there would be no cry of want of labour on the part of the planter, or of want of employment on the part of the labourer." But "a total want of confidence in each other is a prevailing fault of the peasantry of Jamaica, and they have a still greater distrust of any person or society of persons who may endeavour to get them to form associations, either for the disposal of their produce or any other cause, in which money is concerned. Thus small coffeegrowers, though ready to acknowledge the advantage they would derive from combining their produce, and having it fitted for market in the manner employed upon the larger properties, will still each man dispose of his own particular portion, with 'all faults,' for which he obtains a price no greater than what would be obtained for the lowest quality if properly prepared. So in labour each man works for himself." And Governor Eyre again, speaking of "the absence of roads and bridges in the remote or mountainous districts, where the peasantry chiefly reside," says that "much might be done by the people themselves to remedy the evil they complain of, if they would only combine together;" but they are stated "to be disinclined to association, to be suspicious of, and to have no trust in, each other."

There is only one testimony, in the Bluc-book from which I have hitherto quoted, which seems to run counter to the received opinion, that the small settlers of Jamaica are incapable of combination. And curiously enough, it comes from a quarter which appears to be entirely given up to them. In a letter already quoted, Mr. S. Rennalls, custos of St. Thomas-in-the-Vale, speaking of that district above referred to, in which, amongst a population of from 5000 to 6000 souls, there are no sugar estates. nor "properties of any extent carried on by the owners in the cultivation of coffee or any other export," says: "I do not think it will be out of place here to state that a system prevails, especially at the season of planting ground provisions, &c., of families and neighbours joining together in large numbers for digging the yam-hills, so that considerable patches of land become prepared and planted. There is a reciprocity of labour among them, no money passes, and thus the great extent of provision cultivation in this parish is readily to be accounted

This is certainly combination, but in a very loose and rudimentary form only. But if we now turn to Mr. Morgan's testimony, we shall find a good deal more to the same effect. He speaks of having seen "the managers of an association, formed at Black River, for collecting the people's produce, and superintending its shipment to England, and conversion into money." He speaks of having personally visited, and inspected the books and rules of a negro bank (or, perhaps more properly, loan society), established in 1862, on a capital of 401., subscribed by its members, to be lent out again at interest amongst them, and whose funds have now increased to 624L, lent out to 103 different persons; the treasurer and secretary of the establishment being a former slave, now a successful sugar-planter on a small scale. And he adds, "I could multiply instances of this spirit of co-operation."

It is of the former of the two establishments thus specially noticed by Mr. Morgan, that I propose to speak here. I have before me its minute-book, coming down to May 19, 1866; of which I can only say, that if it had been reproduced at length in those "Papers relative to the Affairs of Jamaica," presented February, 1866, from which I have hitherto been quoting, it would have greatly improved the staple of the contents of that Blue-book. A more genuine, touching picture than it affords of a people's earnest efforts to raise themselves, both morally and materially, I have never met with.

This strange Joint Stock Company's minute-book opens by a private circular letter, dated St. Elizabeth, July 11, 1865, from W. Brydson, C. Plummer, and R. G. Tomlinson, to each of themselves, and to S. W. Holt and three other persons. It runs as follows:—

"In order that we make some efforts against the present difficulty, and also make a way that shall ultimately carry us out of our generally depressed condition, it is necessary that every one who feels an interest in the matter should join in giving expression to the views which he entertains, and particularly to state what course of action he believes to be the readiest and most practicable for the accomplishment of some good for the island.

To this end it appears that we should carefully consider our respective positions, with a view to find out what each one can do, and answer to ourselves the questions that are set forth on the other side, so that when we meet at a time and place to be appointed, we shall the more readily be able to arrive at something definite, and thus unite our efforts for a common good. For the present this movement will be confined to the persons only named below, until such time as it shall be necessary to enlarge it... A reply, expressive of your willingness to cooperate, is requested by the 10th instant, as it is deemed always best to do quickly what is to be done.

"QUESTIONS FOR SELF-EXAMINATION.

"Influence—what kind; whether of money, property, interest of friends, position, &c., &c., and in what direction would you exercise it so that it may be available to its full extent in every conceivable way, and yet be productive of good to all classes?

"Which is the step first to be taken, or plan best for adoption?

"Whether it would be best to limit our attention to one particular thing, or to several? and, if so, state them."

Such is the starting-point of the movement. Three men—all coloured natives of Jamaica—trusting each other and four men besides, wish to lay their seven heads together, to consider what is "the readiest and most practicable" course of action "for the accomplishment of some good" for their island; and as a first step, to take stock of their respective resources, in order that their influence "may be available to its full extent in every conceivable way, and yet be productive of good to all classes." An undertaking should not grow much awry, which springs from such a root.

An answer to the circular, dated July 11, next appears. The writer does not "believe that we are in a lost condition. Unity, with intelligence, can work wonders. We are not powerful; but we will have enough power, if we form ourselves into a confederacy, to benefit ourselves, and then the public generally." He is himself, in agriculture, "both scientifically and practically learned, having tried every plant almost." Commercially, he can vouch for his correspondent. A third probably knows as much as both. The queries put are replied to with great frankness:—

"2. This influence could only be directed and expended on my own property, which while it is serviceable and profitable to myself, yet is also beneficial to those who partake of the privilege. I engage parties who work on the métairie system, i.e., who take up land and cultivate it on halves. It is the most advantageous system of cultivation to both proprietor and tiller. The several little privileges to the cultivator are of immense importance, although of little money value.

"3. The first and best step to be taken would be to procure capital, which is the basis of all enterprise, to allot to each certain amounts to be expended solely on cultivation or rearing of stock,—or, more properly speaking, farming.

"4. I do not think it advisable to limit our attention exclusively on (sie) any one particular object. If we look at the names referred to, we will see that they are scattered over or throughout the parish, and that they possess such a variety of soil and climate that it would be wiser to allow every man to adopt that best suited to his locality. I would recommend, firstly, that a capital be raised on loan or otherwise (the best means for doing this must be left for our discussion at our meetings).... Secondly, a system of visiting each member from time to time to tender advice, &c., upon the principle that two heads are better than one.... Thirdly, as commerce is a handmaid to agriculture, and that we must dispose of our goods, I would recommend that a commercial agency be established to ship our produce and import our goods, and that we pledge our honour to support such agency, taking our share in its profit or its losses. Let every man pledge his word and honour to be true and faithful in all his dealings one with another, and encourage one another to the best of his ability."

From a second letter, dated July 20, I extract one characteristic passage:—

"You propose to have a meeting during next week. Now, although I like dispatch, yet I think the first day of August would be the fittest day. Although I am not superstitious, still I have an unaecountable liking for certain names, months, and days. Now, 'August' sounds well, and Tuesday is Mars' day,—a proper day to commence a battle against the ills that are weighing down every one. Still I am not anxious nor willing to allow my predilections to weigh against the joint wish of others."

It was not necessary for one coloured citizen of Jamaica to remind another of what some of my readers may need to be reminded of, namely, that the 1st of August was the day of Freedom for the British West Indian slave.

Of the next letter, dated July 22, the following are the main portions:—

"Commerce and agriculture being inseparable in promoting the prosperity of a nation, I think our efforts must be directed to both of these important objects, first, to establish commercial interests abroad and at home; and immediately after, agricultural pursuits.... to co-operate with and assist us in the former. Considering, then, that neither of these interests can be established without some capital at home * to begin with, I would suggest that this all-important mainspring of Two days suggest that this all-important manispring of our machinery be obtained by or from shares of 10. each, to be paid up either in cash or produce, with which to procure a reasonable cargo of the products of this island, to be exported to England under the personal supervision and management of a respectable deputation, chosen from amongst us, who shall have full power so to consign, sell, or use the same there as to induce capitalists to aid us with such advances in money or merchandise as to increase our means of establishing our second, or agricultural interests. This I think could be done by establishing in Jamaica, out of the funds raised abroad, a respectable mcrcantile establishment from which loans, either in cash or merchandise, could be obtained on good security by agriculturists, to enable them to cultivate their lands and aid in supporting the said mercantile establishment with their products. These two interests, establishment with their products. These two interests, thus combined, would materially aid and support each other, whilst they would at the same time afford the means of employment to a good number of persons, and ensure to the small planters who may take part with us a ready and profitable market for their produce. . . . I agree with you that, considering the generally depressed condition of our beautiful and most prolific island and its inhabitants, whatever efforts are to be made for her redemption and ours should be made without delay. With our trust in God,-with unity, integrity, and perseverance regulating and governing our actions,—we have nothing to fear."

Another reply to the circular is also dated July 20:-

"It is one of the articles of my creed," says the writer, "that the prosperity and happiness of the people of a country depend principally on an earnest co-operation of every department to promote the general good, not influenced by considerations for classes, sections, or particular interests. How far this course has been pursued in this island may be fairly judged by simply viewing its present condition,—a condition which every one agrees in proposed to be prost deplaceble, and if anything pronouncing to be most deplorable, and, if anything, apparently growing worse. . . . The necessity, however, arises for all good men and true to begin to bestir themselves, and do something to save the country from such a wretched state of poverty. Our country is as beautiful a spot as you will hear of in the western hemisphere..... The productiveness of the soil is unquestioned. Day by day we witness ships departing from our shores laden with the produce of our island, and yet day by day the country is getting poorer, and the small producers become country is getting poorer, and the small producers occome generally more circumscribed (sic). On all sides the cry is 'No money! What is become of the money? where does it go to? Surely some one connected with the produce, labourer and producer, must get it?' Yes, both get some of it; and they part with it for salt pork and salt fish, and other things from abroad, sold by men who get the representations. get the money and keep it. And are we to be continually parting with our hard carnings to enrich men who behold with indifference the languishing state of the land, and will not loan (sic) one shilling of the money they cat from us and through us for its cultivation or ioin get from us and through us for its cultivation, or join in erecting objects of public utility as a small token of gratitude to the country that has treated them so well? men who will not afford the use of their money at all for any purposes that tends to benefit the country? Now, then, if the men who live and grow fat by means of the money we spend, will not assist us, we must find some other more considerate customers. We must manage so that we sell to ourselves and buy from ourselves."

The suggestions of this writer as to constituting what he terms a "local board of trade for the purpose of centralising the produce of the small settlers of the country," freighting a ship with produce for England, to be accompanied by a deputation, &c., do not differ materially from those of the previous one. He continues :-

"Having already visited England and made some interest, particularly in Mauchester, that, in connection with the general knowledge which the people of Cornwall have of me, and my own experience of business, particularly in respect of shipping, I consider, are sufficient influences to be brought in exercise at the present moment. In respect of cultivation, I consider that each member would pursue it on his own account, and not in the form of an association, though perhaps in some cases two or three united might be desirable, particularly in renting a property. It would be a duty incumbent on every one to interest himself in a friendly manner, devoid of officiousness, in the labours of his neighbour, so that the chances of failure will be obviated as much as possible; and meetings held as often as convenient to hear the progress each party to the present movement is making. And may God assist us in these efforts!"

A postscript says: "Let there be no longer cause given to the British people to say that the people of Jamaica are good for nothing."

The correspondence bore fruit, for on the 1st of of a meeting of a committee, to take into consideration the crippled state of our country, and the best means to extricate ourselves from the difficulties that beset us," at which "were present as committeemen-William Brydson (in the chair), Richard G. Tomlinson, Nicholas Tomlinson, Rev. Samuel Holt, Charles Plummer, secretary pro tem.; also Thomas Henry, and James Kinlock, as friends of the association.

"The business of the meeting having been opened with an appropriate prayer by the Rev. Samuel Holt," resolutions were passed, naming the society as above, appointing W. Brydson president, C. Plummer vice-president, a treasurer, secretary, and directors. It was further resolved :-

"That the above-named association of shareholders be a trading firm, having for its object the creation of an agency for the exportation of the produce of the small and other settlers of the country, and the importation of goods from abroad: the profits from such transactions to be divided amongst the shareholders. It will also, consistently with its means, make advances to cultivators of the soil under proper guarantees, and will embrace the buying of produce and other articles of trade."

The capital was fixed at 50,000l., in 10,000 shares of 5l. each, with power to increase to 20,000 shares; meetings to be held "on the first day of every month, unless it happens on a Sunday, when the second day of the month shall be the day of meeting." It was also resolved :-

"That, as soon as a sufficient number of shareholders is obtained to warrant the committee in its judgment to take action for the benefit of the association, a vessel be chartered and loaded for England, with a cargo of the produce of this island; and that a commission be ap-pointed to resort to England for the purpose of making business arrangements on behalf of the association.'

The correspondence above referred to appears to have been adopted, by universal consent, as indicating the basis of the association, since it stands copied at the head of its minutes.

The association was now fairly started, 105 shares being subscribed for at this first meeting, by twenties, teus, and one five. The first monthly meeting took place at the Court-house of Black River, on Sept. 1, three more "friends" being present. One resolution deserves especial notice: "That the president and vice-president be a deputation to wait on his honor the custos, to request him to become a patron of the association." A solicitor was appointed, and extraordinary meetings fixed for six different localities in the parish. From henceforth, the minutes of almost every meeting are followed by applications for shares: here 8, there 5, elsewhere 41, 29, 15, 18, 12. By the 1st of November, the association has entered into an agreement for wharfage, and for renting an office.

But whilst the "Cornwall Agricultural and Commercial Association" has been thus quietly growing at the western end of the island-giving the lie to those who declare the coloured men incapable of useful combination—the disturbances August appears the minute of "The inauguration of St. Thomas-in-the-East have occurred, and have found their way into the minute-book of the association. The minutes of Oct. 18 (Berlin) conclude with these words: "Every member expressing his sincere regret of the late barbarous occurrences in St. Thomas-in-the-East, in this island." Those of Oct. 19 (Burns' Savannah), in like manner: "The members and friends of the association having severally expressed the utmost indignation against the murderous malcontents in St. Thomas-in-the-East, and their determination to maintain their loyalty through life, and to set forth (sic) every effort for the capture of Paul Bogle, the ringleader of the said insurrection, he being known in this district." At the close of the meeting of Nov. 1, the president "expressed his earnest hope that the late disturbance in St. Thomas-in-the-East has been finally suppressed, in which he was heartily joined by every member present." On the 22nd of November, the president "addressed the meeting, explaining that it must be distinctly understood that this association discards all connection or interference with politics; and that it be considered as specially an association for the promotion of the agricultural and commercial interests of this island, and for the general good of all classes of its inhabitants." And it was resolved, "That this association is fully sensible of the evil consequences to the island by the late unfortunate rebellion in the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, and probably to the interests of the association, and therefore it the more feels the necessity of a combined and firm exercise of its efforts to counteract any influences that may be of a prejudicial nature."

Many persons will probably feel that, for a practical body like the "Cornwall Agricultural and Commercial Association," it was not only going out of its way, but self-contradictory, to be passing resolutious about "the late unfortunate rebellion," professing loyalty, or expressing a determination to use efforts for catching Paul Bogle. But Jamaica rejoices in a form of Bumbledom unknown to the mother-country, that of 'custodes'-a kind of diminutive lord-lieutenants set over every parish, and of course self-important to the full extent of their lilliputian honours. Hence it is not from the minute-book of the association, but from "Papers relating to the Disturbances in Jamaica," Part I., presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty, February, 1866, pp. 120-1, that I have now to extract two delicious bits of official tom-foolery :-

"MR. SALMON TO GOVERNOR EYRE.

"Malvern, October 31, 1865.

"Your Excellency,—Meetings, I am informed, have been called at several places by a Mr. Plummer, a Mr. Brydson (a magistrate), a man Gilling,* of this parish, of the inhabitants and small settlers, black and coloured. The persons attending are informed that the growers of

* I am utterly unable to discover any person of this name in the minute-book. The nearest approaches to it are Grindley, Gittoes, Green, Kinlock.

produce are imposed upon and cheated. To enable the small proprietor to receive a full value for his produce, a commercial and agricultural association is said to be formed, and shares are offered and recommended, value 51. each, by which the shareholder is to realise the value of his exports through the hands of the above-named persons, who constitute themselves the managers. On a sufficient sum being subscribed, Brydson informs the meetings he is to go to England to take all the money subscribed, which, if enough, is to purchase a vessel and bring out goods the members of the association require, and which they are to obtain at a much less price than they are sold for in the stores. The object of the managers of this association is to press Dr. Underhill's statements, that the negro is cheated in the value of the produce he has to dispose of, that he has no opportunity of sending his produce to the home markets.—The carry-ing out such object will materially injure general society, as the members of the association are to pledge themas the members of the association are to pleage themselves not to dispose of any oil-nuts, coffee, ginger, or other produce to any white person; * it will foster and continue distrust and suspicion, and prevent the intercourse at present profitable to all. Its result can easily be foreseen: the consequences will be disastrous to the members, and may be also troublesome to the peace of the district, for the small settler will be cheated out of his subscriptions, and also his produce, by men of straw, who have no capital and no character entitling them to conduct such an undertaking, even if it were legitimate and honest. It is so barefaced an attempt as not to be mistaken for a piece of rascality.—Is the association at such a time as the present, and the meetings, legal? The people are ignorant, and only the other day were represented as suffering so dreadfully from the drought that they had nothing to eat, and now are called on to provide 5l. each to be admitted to the prospective benefits to arise under the management of Brydson, Plummer, and Gilling. To obtain this amount to purchase a share in the association, men are desirous of selling horses, or what they may possess or have disposable, and they will be swindled.—Perhaps your Excellency would direct me to be informed what course would be legal or right at such a time. I have had several coloured people applying to me as to what they should do. I have told them I believe they will be swindled; but they are dissatisfied and fretted, and kept unsettled, and say they should be told 'if the thing be good, and for their good; or bad, and to take their money.' (Signed)

"JOHN SALMON."

Bumbledom in all countries is capable of incredibly stupid things. But I doubt if there be a village churchwarden in England so stupid as to suppose that it can be illegal for a number of farmers to agree to club their funds together for sending their produce to market, or for buying the supplies they want. Again, Mr. Brydson's position as a magistrate of many years' standing + should at least have secured him from being libelled behind his back as a swindler by the chief official of his parish to the Governor. But instead of the moral reproof which he deserved, Mr. Custos Salmon obtained in reply the Attorney-General's opinion, dated Nov. 2,

† Another magistrate, Mr. S. G. Greaves, although not a shareholder, had recently expressed at a public meeting his "entire approbation of and co-operation with the association."—(Minute of October 19.)

^{*} This extraordinary statement appears to arise out of the simple fact, that the members of the association were to pledge to it the consignment of all their produce. Of course, if they were all coloured persons, this might practically be a pledge not to dispose of produce to the whites. But as there was nothing whatever to prevent white persons from subscribing, it would be their own fault if such were the result.

1865, -pooh-poohing, indeed, his legal crotchets, but even more offensive to the men who were so earnestly struggling to retrieve their country's prosperity than the custos's own letter :-

"I see nothing illegal in the proposed association. Trade is free, and ought to be so. It is very certain, however, that a dead loss will accrue to all the share-holders, even supposing the managers to be perfectly honest, and even if they give their services gratuitously. But as by foolish or wicked counsels the small producers seem to have lost confidence in the mercantile capitalists, I know no better way of enabling them to find out their own blunders than that they should try their experiment. Even if, by an extraordinary rise in the produce-market, the first attempt should be successful, a very little further trial will restore the equilibrium of educated commonsense. And no time better than the present could be chosen, when there is a strong force in the country to preserve the peace against any attempt against it which should arise from the dissatisfaction of the industrious producers at the result of their own folly.—If the custos and other gentlemen of position unconnected with trade and commerce were to explain to the intended shippers the length of time that must elapse before they can have any returns or advances on their shipments for the interest of the invested cargo, the difficulty of selecting the latter for each shipper, or the otherwise inevitable nccessty of establishing another association for the sale of their imports, and the expenses of sailing their ship, port dues, import duties, seamen's wages, long credits, and bad debts, it is not unlikely that the sway of common sense will prevail, and the proposed society become an If it should really succeed, which I think no reasonably well-educated man can conceive to be possible, so much the better for the benefit of honest competition and the general good. Viewed in its most favourable light, this is a miserable repetition of the French or-ganisation of labour under Fourrier (sie), or of Owen in England twenty-five years ago. There is no occasion for legal preventive measures to prevent the objects avowed.

(Signed) "ALEXANDER HESLOP."

Mr. Attorney-General Heslop is himself, I understand, a coloured man; I trust not to be taken as a sample of such as only are deemed fit for office. is not worth while going into his off-hand opinion, much of which turns upon a mis-statement of Mr. Custos Salmon's, that a ship was intended to be purchased, whereas the minutes of the association show clearly that the only thought was of chartering one. Let it not be forgotten that in its innocency the association had actually asked the custos to be its patron, so that any mis-statement of its nature and objects was as inexcusable on his part as the Attorney-General's strictures upon it, on the strength of information received only at second hand, were unbecoming.

It must, however, be observed that the members of the association were quite unaware of this correspondence whilst it was going on, and only became acquainted with it when the Blue-book, in which it stands recorded, reached Jamaica in the following But they were not left unmolested—the houses of one or two were searched; a third, who happened to be a full black, and to have known G. W. Gordon, was asked publicly "if he were not hanged yet?" whilst strenuous exertions were made by the custos and others to hinder their coloured wise uncalled for professions of loyalty which I noticed above. The members persevered, however, and the minutes continue to show the holding of fresh meetings to beat up subscribers, and fresh subscriptions for shares, -as many as forty being taken up after a single meeting, and one application coming in from Mexico; one unbeliever, however, withdrawing from the association. Communications were opened by the president with the "Cotton Supply Association" of Manchester, and samples of cotton forwarded-cotton being apparently rather a hobby with the president, Mr. Brydson. In January, 1866, a cargo of produce for shipment in April begins to be made up, and we find entries of the receipt of "one bag of coffee, said to weigh 100lbs.," "one half-ton logwood," &c., or again, "two pieces cement, one piece coal, to be tested." In March, sufficient produce is in hand to have become worth insuring for 300l., besides 300l. on the buildings of the association. Governor Eyre having been meanwhile superseded by a man of sense, one of the directors of the association, Mr. Holt, summoned to give evidence at Spanish Town, had an interview with Sir Henry Storks, who expressed a wish to see the books and papers of the association. The president was at once appointed to wait upon the Governor, and gave an account of his mission to a meeting on May 1, stating that "his Excellency Sir Henry Storks was much pleased, and expressed himself much gratified at the formation of such a society, and wished it every prosperity." At the same meeting a deputation was appointed to proceed to England, and 150l. granted for its expenses. The last minute recorded is of May 19. By that time over 500 shares had been subscribed for.

That deputation, consisting of the above-named Messrs. W. Brydson, C. Plummer, and the Rev. S. W. Holt, is in England at the time of my writing. The two former are coloured men, freeborn; the first, as before stated, has been for years a member of the island magistracy; the second is the owner of 2000 acres of land, cultivated on halfprofits with the actual producers, an inspector of schools, and the author of a little catechism on the products of Jamaica; both educated and intelligent men, the former already acquainted with England. The last is a pure black, slave-born, self-educated, self-made, stiff-backed, minister of a small congregation in connexion with the Baptist body. All three bear the highest moral character, and cannot, in my humble judgment, though libelled as swindlers by Mr. Custos Salmon, fail to inspire, by their very demeanour, confidence in their integrity; Mr. Plummer is a member of the Church of England; Mr. Brydson, like Mr. Holt, a Baptist. They have safely brought with them 600l. worth of Jamaica produce, and sold it at a very handsome profit; more is on the way, and more still preparing for shipment. They have found and made friends, and a company has been established-in which the "Cornwall brethren from subscribing to the association. Hence Agricultural and Commercial Association " may to the origin-perhaps the necessity-of those other- some extent become merged-to act as an agency for disposing of its produce and shipping goods to its order. I won't say more, lest any of my readers should be tempted to wish for shares in it; although, considering Mr. Attorney-General Heslop's legal opinion that "no reasonably well-educated man" cau conceive it possible for such an undertaking to succeed, I ought not to suppose them ignorant enough to do so.

For myself, I do not hesitate to say that in this association of the small settlers of Jamaica to sell for themselves and purchase for themselves, so long as it is regulated by the honest and high purpose of the founders of the "Cornwall Agricultural and Commercial Association," I see a germ of salvation not only for their own beautiful island, but for all other West Indian colonies, which are passing into the same condition of peasant proprietorship,—I might say for all the West Indies,—and should not despair of these coloured fellow-subjects of ours in Jamaica realizing on a wider scale the marvellous example set by the "Rochdale Equitable Pioneers."

One word more: I have preferred to put the claim of the "Cornwall Agricultural and Commercial Association" to our interest in its efforts on the simple ground of their associative character, as a combined attempt of the coloured population to develope the resources of their country. There are many special features about the trade of Jamaica which, however, invest the undertaking with a character of almost necessity. It is impossible, I think, for anyone who inquires into the facts to resist the conclusion that the small coloured settlers are the victims of a vast amount of fraud in their dealings, both as sellers and purchasers. The larger island houses for the most part disdain, sometimes absolutely reject their produce, so that they fall into the hands of smaller and less respectable dealers, mostly Jews, who even when they seem to deal with them on favourable terms too often defraud them in weight and measure. It will be sufficient for me in this respect to quote the words of the respected Chief-Justice of the island, Sir Bryan Edwards, the representative of an old planterfamily (to be found in the Papers relative to the affairs of Jamaica, February, 1866):

"Every one must concur with Dr. Underhill in desiring to see the efforts of our small settlers, in the production of articles of exportable value, encouraged and extended. It is a direct and positive advantage to the colony; and I am inclined to believe that his suspicion of gross and systematic fraud practised by the purchasers in dealing with them has a good deal of foundation."

But the undertaking which they have entered upon is one which will tax their best and utmost efforts. Apart from all hindrances of ill-will, opposition, and calumny from without, they have to encounter a far more fiery trial within. No one knows how difficult it is for a man to co-operate with his fellows until he has tried to do so. Fair as I believe are the prospects of the "Cornwall Agriculture and Commercial Association," internal discord, or merely distrust, is a rock on which it must always fear to split. Only if it will act up to the above-quoted words of one of its founders will it really secure success; but with "trust in God,—with unity, integrity, and perseverance, regulating its actions," it will truly "have nothing to fear."

HOME AT LAST.

THE ship is sailing, the moon is shining;
Low on a level with the deck
She swims through the white cloud breakers, leaping
About her hull as about a wreck.

The ship is sailing, the moon is sinking;
All will be dark ere she touch the strand:
"Yonder's the pier," says the sailor steering,
As dark through the darkness looms out the land.

"We're in at last, mate," whispers the steersman;
"We're over the bar, and may slacken sail:
I wish it had been in the fair broad daylight,
Or that even a voice our ship would hail.

"We've been held in the death-grip yonder, Among the ice of the frozen seas; Been blown and beaten and tossed and tumbled, And now we are coming to rest and ease.

"And yet my heart will keep sinking, sinking—It's three long years since we leit them, Ned—
You land is not like the land of the living,
And this is the sea giving up its dead.

"The ship is sailing, my heart is sinking;
Ned, you ne'er knew me feel thus before:
We're home at last! but I wish 'twere morning—
There's something waiting for me ashore."

ST. PAUL'S REFERENCES TO ROMAN LAW.

I.-THE SON.

"Now I say, that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father.'

ST. PAUL, himself a Roman citizen, and in his letters addressing persons who either themselves enjoyed or were familiar with the privileges conferred by citizenship, has in his writings made use of terms of Roman Private Law which, conveying to the English reader modern ideas only, have deprived the passages in which they occur of much of their original significance. It is proposed to examine the meaning of some of these terms, and see whether by lifting the veil which conceals from our view the Roman Family system, we can clothe words so familiar and precious to us all, with a fresher and deeper meaning for the student of the New Testament.

The Roman citizen had public and private rights. With the former of these we are not now concerned, although it is important to note how St. Paul on two well-known occasions availed himself of it, to escape degrading and unjust punishment* or to secure a more impartial trial. + On both of these occasions it is interesting to observe how the possession by the apostle of this great civil privilege, and its prompt exercise by him, was instrumental in the propagation of the Gospel. On the first occasion he was sent from Jerusalem for trial before the Procurator Felix, and thus had an opportunity of making that striking apology for his life and doctrine which we have handed down for the instruction of the Church in the 26th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles: on the second, -by availing himself, in the technical form made use of in Roman Law, of his right of appeal to the Emperor himself in the last resort, he was enabled to preach the Gospel in the city of Rome, the seat of intellectual atheism, the centre of the civilized world. It is, however, with the Private Law of the Romans, to which St. Paul alludes so frequently, and from which many of his most striking illustrations are drawn, that we have now to do.

The power with which under the jus privati, a Roman citizen who was pater familias, the head of a family, was invested over every subordinate member of the family group, is, whether we regard its completeness or its severity, one of the most singular phenomena in the history of civilization. Under the old civil law as it existed during the Republic and up to the commencement of the Empire, he was proprietor-dominus-of his children as of his slaves, and had over both the power of life and death. While he lived, his wife, his children, his son's children, t were all "under power" as the phrase was; had no capacity of acquiring or retaining property, could not make a valid testament or take under one, had in short no civil rights whatsoever-was a thing, a res, a chattel. This authority, -empire rather, -of the father was supreme. His was the jus vitæ hecisque, the absolute control over the life and property of his sons. He could sell, expose, or abandon them; transfer them by adoption into another family, or, as a domestic judge from whose sentence there was no appeal, even punish them capitally. "Under the domestic relations," observes Mr. Maine, in his Antient Law, "created by Private Law, the son lived under a domestic despotism which, considering the severity it retained to the last, and the number of centuries through which it endured, constitutes one of the strangest problems in legal history."

In proportion as the citizenship was extended by the Emperors throughout the Provinces, this remarkable power was transmitted along with it: and the rights it conferred were eagerly caught at, and interwoven with the social life of those nations who were gradually incorporated into the Roman Empire, until under Caracalla the citizenship was granted to the whole of the civilized world. And this wide diffusion of the patria potestas was as remarkable as the tenacity with which the Roman people clung to an institution peculiarly their own, but which, singular to say, they succeeded in inducing other countries most alien to them in language, manners, and disposition, not merely to acquiesce in but eagerly to adopt. At the time at which St. Paul wrote, this power of the Father was in its full vigour. Its influence over the son's person was but slightly lessened; over his property—save towards one class of persons, namely, soldiers on service-hardly at all. The Jew of Tarsus and Alexandria, the Greek of Ephesus or Corinth, the African, the Spaniard, the Gaul, who had received the citizenship by gift, purchase, or inheritance, placed themselves under the Roman Law of Persons, and were invested with an authority within the circle of their families, of which, in its complete supremacy, the history of civil society presents no other example. Well therefore, and not as an artifice of rhetoric, but with technical exactness, could the Apostle say when writing to the Galatian Church, as stating a fact within the cognizance of and underlying the social and political life of all, "Now I say that the heir, as long as he is a child-νηπιος, infans, a minor -differeth nothing from the slave, though he be lord of all."*

^{*} Acts xxii. 25. † Acts xxv. 11. ‡ A daughter's children were not of her familia: they were under the power of their father or paternal grandfather. VII—48

It is interesting to remark, as bearing on the signifi-cance of this illustration as addressed to the Galatian Church, that Gaius, the commentator on Roman law, although mentioning the Patria Potestas as distinctively of Roman origin, yet finds in the Asiatic Galatæ traces of an institution more analogous than was found in any other of the various races that were brought into subjugation to the Roman people.

But let us, following the train of thought suggested by the succeeding clause of the verse, examine into this subject somewhat more particularly. The Apostle proceeds to say, "But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed by the father." These terms correspond generally* to the tutor and curator of the Roman Law; to the former of which was entrusted the personal guardianship, to the latter the care of the goods of the heir, the management of business, and the power of giving validity to his contracts; and they lead us to the consideration of the power of the father as exercised over the son either by himself, or by means of guardians appointed by him in these two aspects of Person and Property.

1. Of Person. - And here at once we meet with two words of most deep interest to us, and full of significance-"adoption" and "emancipation." They are both technical terms of the Roman Law of Persons; and have a far deeper meaning than in their ordinary employment is conveyed to the English reader. We speak of a child being "adopted," that is to say, taken to live with, be brought up and educated by, and perhaps even succeed to the property of, persons generally who have no children of their own; and of a person being "emancipated," that is, freed from control, become "his own master," with no one to stand between him and society, so as to prevent responsibility attaching to his conduct and position in life. And in so speaking we convey something of course of the meaning which a Roman Paterfamilias would understand belonged to the words. But we stop far short of that meaning. Let us see how far. And first, what did a Roman citizen, what did St. Paul mean, by "adoption?"

Adoption was one of those legal fictions to which society in its archaic state had recourse, in order to its own preservation and extension. Notably in the history of Rome a whole community of foreign origin was in early times incorporated with the two tribes which at first formed the nucleus of the commonwealth. And so long did this custom exist, and so deeply did it enter into the public as well as the private life of the community, that in the later period of the Empire, down even to the time of Justinian, we find the succession to the Imperial throne secured and kept up by the employment of this fiction of law, the adoption by the reigning prince of his successors into his family. "The earliest and most extensively employed of legal fictions," says Mr. Maine, "was that which permitted family relations to be created artificially, and there is none to which I conceive mankind to be more deeply indebted. If it had never existed I do not see how any one of the primitive groups, whatever were their nature, could have absorbed another, or on what terms any two of them could have combined except those of absolute superiority on one side and absolute subjection on the other. . . The expedient which in those times commanded favour was that the incoming population should feign themselves to be descended from the same stock as those on whom they were engrafted; and it is precisely the good faith of this fiction, and the closeness with which it seemed to imitate reality, that we can never hope to understand."*

This method of enlarging the circle which in the infancy of law was applied first to the family, the type of archaic society, and afterwards to entire communities, became, as the legal system of which it formed a part was developed, a means of widely extending the power of the Father. For the persous thus amalgamated theoretically by adoption, were both by law and public opinion as perfectly held together by the principle of implicit obedience to the authority of the highest living ascendant, father, grandfather, or great-grandfather, as if they had been born under his power. Between the obligations incident to the tie of sonship by nature, and by adoption, the Roman law of Persons recognised no difference whatever. Probably the practical exercise of this power was softened by causes with which we are but imperfectly acquainted, and doubtless in a large number of cases by the influence of natural affection. Decency also and public opinion would require that when the son was filling high civil offices in the state, he should not be subjected to a vexatious and indeed degrading subordination, which by an active employment of the patria potestas would interfere with his duties to the state. Soldiers also would be, and during the Empire were, employed during long intervals either in the military occupation of, or in assisting to colonise, remote provinces; and thus distance of place and time would put him in a position of comparative independence, and render the father's power neutral. Still it remained, after every allowance made for exceptional cases, the prominent feature of Private Roman Law, penetrating and influencing every relation and minute circumstance of domestic life, and preserving through the family and the social system, a vast net-work of subordination to which modern ideas and habits of life present no parallel whatever. The son, "the heir," is while "under power" a slave: and the son by adoption is as completely and entirely a slave as the son by kinship.

This singular system is brought into still greater contrast with modern conceptions of sonship, when we consider the method by which the son is "emancipated" from the power of the father. Here again the son and slave ideas are combined. The method employed was nothing more or less than a sale. The father sold his son three times in succession, (ter venumduit was the technical phrase,) to the purchaser—the adopter—and thus the son passed from under the father's power, was withdrawn from the patria potestas, and was said to be "in mancipio," in itself a species of slavery. act of adoption required, however, for its consummation a further process in the nature of a fictitious suit or feigned recovery, termed cessio in jure. The adopter claimed the son as having bought him; the father made no defence, and the magistrate declared that the child was the son of the Adopter. A procedure very closely analagous to this, with reference to a different species of "property," was for hundreds of years made use of by English lawyers; and it is curious, as a feature in the history of society, to see how legal fictions reproduce themselves, and similar expedients are presented in historical periods far apart, when we find the triple sale, and feigned surrender in the case of the person of the Roman heir under power, paralleled by those famous Fines and Recoveries which, as methods of conveyance of interests in land, were for so many centuries familiar to the English lawyer. It was not until the time of the Emperor Justinian (cir. 500 after Christ,) that the fictitious sale ceased to be part of the process of adoption; and in its place was substituted a simple declaration on the part of the paterfamilias before a magistrate. The corresponding fiction in English law was in active operation down to the middle of the present century; and it was not until the year 1834, that the act was passed for the abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and the substitution in their place of a simple Deed of Transfer.

^{*} Strictly speaking, these officers were appointed over those who were sui juris, but who had not attained their majority. Here, in order to exhibit the dependent position of the heir, the Apostle, in order as it were to cover the whole of the minor's life until he was of age, regards him as subject as well to the father when living as to the "tutors and governors" who, as it were, perpetuated the father's authority after his death, until the "time appointed," i.e., for the termination of their office.

^{*} Antient Law.

So far as regards the son's Person: and now as to his property, and the Power of the Father as connected with it.

Whatever influences may have softened insensibly the father's authority over the son's person, as given him by law, with respect to property there was nothing whatever at the time St. Paul wrote, to impede its fullest exercise. The son, as has been already said, could acquire nothing for himself. His father was entitled to take the whole of any property he may have come into possession of, and to reap the benefits while he was not exposed to the disadvantages of any contracts he may have entered into. The possibility of children "under power," having an ownership separate from the parent, or of holding property apart from him, was never contemplated by the ancient law of Rome. But this state of things, however suited to an archaic society when the family was the chief unit, becomes wholly anomalous in, and one would have thought incompatible with, if not destructive to, a people in an advanced state of civilisation. But such was not the case with Rome. The slowness with which these private rights were broken in upon, is even more curious than the extent of the power they conferred on the individual. It was not until the first years of the Empire that any innovation was attempted; and then the acquisitions of one class only—namely, of soldiers on service—were withdrawn from the influence of the patria potestas, and the power of disposing by will of what was gained in camp was granted to the soldier,—doubtless, as Mr. Maine observes, as a part of the reward of those armies which had overthrown the free commonwealth. An interval of three hundred years elapsed before a similar indulgence was accorded to persons in the civil employment of the state; and the privilege thus extended from the military to the civil professions received no further enlargement until the time of the Emperor Justinian, more than five hundred years after the foundation of Christianity.

Once more do the son and the slave meet in the Roman Law of Persons, in connection with this subject of property. The permissive property over which this qualified and dependant ownership was granted, was called by the special name of peculium; a term applied to those savings and perquisites, for which they, the son and the slave, were not compelled to be responsible in the household accounts. In the case of the slave, we have reason to think that the remissness or indulgence of masters in some cases permitted these savings to accumulate until they reached a considerable value: indeed, we know that some of the higher slaves, in a large Roman household, had others of an inferior kind amongst their peculia, and that, in this way, they were frequently enabled to acquire property of sufficient value even to purchase their freedom.* But the son had, with certain few exceptions, no such opportunity within his reach. Unless he was a soldier on service, and in that capacity possessed a castrense peculium, as it was termed, he was merely a channel through which property was acquired for the Father. Later, indeed, in the history of the Empire, and long subsequent to the period at which St. Paul wrote, other peculia were added, extending, as was done by Constantine, the privileges awarded to soldiers, "under power," to property acquired either in the service of the Emperor or Empress—quasi castrense peculium—or from other adventitious sources, peculia adventitia. But not even under the enlarged rights conferred by Justinian, and which we find stated in the Institutes, was anything approaching to the modern idea of full control over property granted, while the head of the family was living to appropriate the son's acquisitions and take advantage of, without sustaining loss by, the contracts he entered into.

Such was the condition of the "son under the power of the father," the "heir as long as he was a child;" an "infant" in the legal and strict sense of the word, one who could not answer, or go through the legal forms, for himself; subject to degrading servitude—for it could amount to little less—not-withstanding the glorious inheritance of citizenship to which he was born, and on which at the "time appointed by the father," he was to enter. Capable of exercising no rights, of acquiring no property, liable to be punished, sold, even put to death, he was for all the practical purposes of life assimilated to a slave, and the difference between the two states was accurately described by the apostle, as "nothing,"—ουδεν διαφερει—though the heir was to be "lord of all."

* Tacitus, Annal. xiv. 42.

See how this description brings out into sharp and vivid contrast, the opposite idea of the citizen, sui juris; the son arrived to the possession and enjoyment of the citizenship, the πολίτεια, in all the wide extent of its privileges; the heir, when the "fullness of time" had come. No illustration can be conceived that would more aptly convey in its perfectness something of the nature of the Christian sonship, than this one of the Roman citizen-son, when the power of his ascendant had ceased. It was in truth a favourite illustration of the apostle, and used by him sometimes under less peculiarly Roman forms than he here employs. Elsewhere writing to communities, as for instance to the Ephesians, where the Greek element entered into the population more largely, and the Greek idea of civil privileges predominated, St. Paul, in his anxiety to bring out the full idea of the Christian sonship, uses terms such as "citizen," "fellowcitizen," "of the household;" words which the native of Athens or Ephesus would well understand as having a national meaning of their own, and one opposed to the "stranger" or "foreigner," whose home was not in their levely cities, and who stayed there subject to alien taxes, and shut out from political or civil rights. But no example could be brought, nowhere could an image be found so adapted to the truth intended to be taught, no parallel drawn so close in its conveyance of that idea of the divine state, to the contemplation of which the Christian was to be drawn, as that of the Roman citizen-heir when a slave-child under curators and tutors, and the heir when slavery no longer held him, but he became "a fellow-citizen with the saints, and of the household of God."

It is a remarkable feature in the theology, corrupt as it was, of Rome, and of communities which had adopted Roman ideas, how the idea of the Father interpenetrates the whole system. There are deities to represent every passion, every want, every desire pure and impure, virtuous and vicious; but underlying the whole of this Pantheism, there is the one idea of Jove the Father, arbiter of gods and men; the Supreme controller of events, the Avenger and Protector of their city. From what hidden and mysterious source was this idea, all but universal as it was, incorporated into the civil and religious life of this great nation of antiquity? May not the cause of this be found in the traces of a higher theology and a purer faith, which taking its rise iu that East which was the scene of the first and direct intercourse of God with man, found its way through nations whose origin is lost in obscurity, and whose history and very names are unknown to us, until i found a new expression in the leading idea of the religion of Rome? Certainly it is a remarkable circumstance that forces itself on the student of history, that alike in the case of the Roman Republic, and those republics of Greece from which has been derived so much that is intellectually great and noble, so soon as the great and leading idea of the one Superintending Father, who was not far from every one of them, although they knew him not and erected altars to Him as "The Unknowable," * had ceased to enter as a principle into the political or family life of those ancient states, so in proportion did their manners become corrupt, and they hastened by marked step to that decline and ultimate fall which more than almost any other event in ancient times has been the subject of the historian. They fell, not again to appear as powers among the nations of the earth. Their influence over us is still great, but it is of the past. Greece fell before Macedonia and Rome; Rome in her turn, before the wild force of Germany, and the tribes of the north.

To conclude; in the light of the preceding explanation, the whole passage of St. Paul's epistle which has been the subject of our remarks, will read as follows:-"Now I observe that the heir, as long as he is an infant-a minor-differeth nothing from a slave, although he be lord of the entire inheritance, but is under tutors and curators until the time appointed (in the testament or will.) by the father. And so we also, when we were infants, were slaves to the elements of the world (i.e., of outward phenomena, τον κοσμου). But when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that he might purchase up those that were under the law, that they might receive the sonship by adoption. And because ye are (now) sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba: Our Father. Wherefore you are no more a slave, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Compare Romans viii. 15, 23; Ephesians i. 5.

II.—THE SLAVE.

"Slaves, be obedient to your masters, according to the flesh."
"Masters, give unto your slaves that which is just and equal."

A SLAVE! What is a slave? It is when the entire being and personality of an individual—his faculties educated or uneducated—are in bondage to the supremacy of another. It is a condition which, though of great antiquity, and existing in the midst of a very high degree, not merely of civilisation and refinement, but of civil and religious freedom, yet has its origin in one of the coarsest motives that can influence mankind; the desire, namely, to use the services, bodily and mental, of a fellow creature to minister to our necessities and increase our wealth. It has found a place in the most opposite political systems, and amongst races of men differing most widely in language, manners, institutions, and laws. In the history of Rome we find it existing under the kings, the Republic, and the Empire; and it forms the subject of certain clauses in the code of Justinian, 500 years after the foundation of Christianity. It has been incorporated into the simpler despotism of the Asiatic princes, the tyrannies of some of the Hellenic states, and the democracies of others. The rugged oligarchy of Lacedæmon, and the theocracy of Judaism: all these forms of government, so various and disparate, have recognised-the last two, indeed, in a mitigated form-and adopted the slave state as a prominent and even necessary element in the structure of their societies; while, in tracing its history to more modern times, we find it amongst ourselves in the serf and villein of the Anglo-Saxon race; and, finally, at the present day, in the nineteenth century, it flourishes, or until very recently has flourished, in its most marked and repulsive form, in the Southern States of America.

From the outset, however, the moral consciousness of mankind, in however blunted a form, seems to have been instinctively aware that some apology for the institution was necessary; and two chief theories have, therefore, been advanced, which it was considered would go far to justify the existence and maintenance of the slave state in the midst of highly civilised communities. The Romans started with the admission that in a state of nature, and under the law of nature, all men were equal; but affirmed that the necessities of society gave birth to institutions inconsistent with and hostile to the primary law. Amongst these was slavery. It sprang, their jurisprudence taught, from that law of nations as applied to civilised states, under which, although all were originally free, yet that freedom was by the jus gentium forfeited to a conqueror whose property, as taken by the strong hand, manu capta, were the lives and fortunes of his prisoners. If, therefore, he spared their lives, they became by the law of nations, scrvi, (servati) slaves; and were in fact considered as having purchased existence on the condition of entailing perpetual servitude on themselves and their descendants. Other methods belonged more peculiarly to the Civil Law: these were when slavery was inflicted as a punishment, as for open and disgraceful crimes, such as theft-furtum manifestumor where, as under the law of the Twelve Tables, the debtor who made default in payment after a certain period, was delivered over-addictus-as a slave to his creditor. But, generally speaking, the state or condition of a slave was, in view of the Roman jurisprudence, regarded as having its origin in the Law of Nations, and as a result of the right of life and death possessed by a conqueror over his captives.

The other theory was that of Race. The Greek, the Asiatic, and, in our time, the American, held that certain races were born slaves: that perpetual servitude was their normal state, and freedom, if ever they obtained it, an abnormal condition from which, from the very nature of the case, there never could be any long or sustained departure. Nature herself, it was and still is affirmed, had marked them out for slaves by the presence of certain physical and mental characteristics, and the absence of others. Complete as this theory is, it was, it will be seen, by far the baser and coarser conception of the two. Absolute as was the dominion which the Roman master exercised over his slave, yet there could still be discerned in the institution as the Roman jurists viewed it, a desire to trace back its commencement to an original agreement, rude and coarse though it might be, to which both were parties, and in which can be traced the idea of contract; an account of the matter which, though obviously a refinement, and based on a legal fiction, was yet intellectually far in advance of the opposite theory, at the root of which lay the assumption that as the enslaved race never had been, so they never could be, on anything like an equality, or have any rights whatever in common with those whom they served.

Let us, however, leaving this larger question, examine more closely the position which the slave held in the Roman family, with reference to the allusions to and illustrations drawn from his condition in the Pauline Epistles: bearing in mind that in each of the passages in which the word "servant" occurs in the authorised version as the meaning of δουλος, the rendering should be "slave." This correction is absolutely necessary in order to the bringing out in each case of the meaning of the Apostle.

The power given to the master over his slaves by the Roman Private Law was spoken of as the dominica potestas, as that of the father over his descendants was termed patria potestas. Its severity, to the extent sauctioned by law, was very great; and it was not until the time of the Antonines-some years after St. Paul wrote-that any attempt was made by Imperial rescript to place a limit on its exercise. When, therefore, we find in the Epistles exhortations to the slave to be obedient and the master to be just, we can but understand the value of these precepts, and the extent to which the softening influence of Christianity was needed in the Roman household to enforce their observance, when we bear in mind that at the time these passages were written, the "dominion," as it was called, of the master was supreme. Subsequently, indeed, by a constitution of the Emperor Antoninus. he who, without any reason whatever, but simply from wantonness, killed his slave, was to be punished equally with one who killed the slave of another; and the same emperor decided, when consulted on the point by some governors of provinces, that if the severity of masters should appear excessive-si intolerabilis videatur sævitia dominorum

-they might be compelled to sell their slaves on favourable terms, so that the master should not, when deprived of his authority over the slaves, fail at the same time to receive the full value of his property. But even this decree, favourable as was its influence on the slave's coudition, was prefaced by the emperor with the admission that in his view the power of the master should be preserved unimpaired, and that it was for their interest, equally with that of the slave, that excessive severity should be restrained, and relief granted against cruelty, inasmuch as it was for the public good that property should not be suffered to depreciate in The slave, regarded in this view, was treated with humanity, not from any sense of an obligation, moral or otherwise, on the part of the master so to treat him, but from the regard which, in such a highly civilised state as was Rome under Hadrian and the Antonines, was paid to property of any kind-any depreciation in which was regarded as so much subtracted from the national wealth. We have before remarked, when speaking of the position of the son under the power of the father, how nearly his position was assimilated to that of the slave. One of these meeting points was the question of property. Both were permitted, by the connivance rather than the sanction of the law, to acquire the species of property termed peculium; but while that of the son received, at least during the later empire, legal recognition as far as regarded property acquired in military service or from employments about the court, that of the slave remained at all times at the absolute disposition of his master, who could seize or control it at his pleasure. Still, that the slave was allowed either by the indulgence or connivance of his lord, to acquire an interest in any degree partaking of the nature of property or wealth was one of those redeeming features in the institution itself as it existed amongst the Romans, in which it contrasts most favourably with the gross and unrefined subjection under which slavery meets us in modern communities who yet claim to have reached a higher grade of civilisation. Nor was this peculium, their savings, of insignificant value. The slaves in a Roman household were divided into two classes: those to whom special duties or offices of trust were assigned, -servi ordinarii-such as the cook, butler, baker, &c., and those in a subordinate capacity termed vicarii, who were the attendants of the others, and even formed part of their peculia. It may easily be imagined that an intelligent and active slave would gradually so insinuate himself into the favour of his master, and so identify himself with the management of his property, as to be in a position to amass a considerable sum; and we know, on the authority of Tacitus, that the peculia were often of sufficient value to enable the possessor to purchase his freedom.* They not unfrequently occupied such positions of trust as that of physician, and instructor or caretaker of the children of the family; * and one of the most striking of St. Paul's illustrations (the meaning of which is wholly concealed under the authorised version) is taken from the employment of a chief slave in such confidential duties, when he speaks of the law, not as it is erroneously rendered, as "the schoolmaster," but "the slave that led us to the school of Christ:" παιδαγωγος, whose duties ended where those of the schoolmaster, or instructor began. Indeed it may be observed as marking the domestic position which the slave held, that in classical Latinity one of the chief meanings of the word familia is the slaves of the household. But the most singular proof of this is given in the well-known fact that under the Roman Private Law the slave had the power of succeeding, on failure of the legitimate heirs, to the property and responsibility of his master as heir in the last resort when all others had failed: the hæres necessarius, as he was termed, because the law, while conferring on him freedom together with the heirship, did not allow him to refuse to enter on the inheritance, but insisted on his becoming the heir whether he would or not. In fact, the inheritance vested in him the instant the testator died. To understand fully this position of the slave would require a more technical knowledge of the Roman law than the reader can be assumed to possess: it is enough to observe, by way of explanation of this curious expedient, that the institution of the heir was the most essential feature in the devolution of property amongst the Romans. He was not only put into possession of the goods, but was liable to the creditors of the deceased. Frequently therefore the inheritance was far more burdensome than advantageous, for which reason the legitimate heirs declined to enter on it: and in order to ensure that the affairs of the deceased should be wound up in a legal and proper form, it was provided that the most necessary person in the whole transaction, the heir, on whom the responsibilities, and indeed the persona or legal existence of the testator devolved, should be always forthcoming. In short, the "necessary heir" was appointed when the master knew that his hereditas was so encumbered that no one else would accept it. But this capacity of being heir in the last resort was an incident in the slave's position which marks the refinement of the institution as it is found when moulded, not only by the high civilisation, but also by the great legal genius possessed by the Roman people; and the possibility, which must have been contemplated in many households of the government of the family devolving under a certain state of circumstances on a bondman, must of itself have, in some slight degree, contributed to the ele-

^{*} Not tutors; a term which had a technical meaning in Roman law, and referred to the position of the son, or heir, before reaching majority, and meant one who was appointed for the purpose of supplying what was wanting in the legal position, the "persona," of the minor: hence he was spoken of as having "auctoritas;" he filled up, augebat, what was wanting in the pupil's persona, or legal existence.

vation of his place in the fabric of Roman society. "It may," says Mr. Maine, and the observation is interesting as lying at the root of the difference between Roman and American servitude, "be asscrted with some confidence, of advanced and matured codes, that wherever servitude is sanctioned the slave has uniformly greater advantages under systems which preserve some memento of his earlier condition than under those which have adopted some other theory of his civil degradation. The point of view from which jurisprudence regards the slave is always of great importance to him. The Roman law was arrested in its growing tendency to look on him more and more as an article of property by the theory of the law of nature; and hence it is, that wherever servitude is sanctioned by institutions which have been deeply affected by Roman jurisprudence, the servile condition is never intolerably wretched. There is a great deal of evidence that in those American states which have taken the highly Romanised code of Louisiana as the basis of their jurisprudence, the lot and prospects of the negro population were better in many material respects (until the letter of the fundamental law was overlaid by statutory enactments passed under the influence of panic) than under institutions founded on the English common law, which, as recently interpreted, has no true place for the slave, and can therefore regard bim only as a chattel."

Insensibly therefore, under the combined influence of a civilisation refined and generally humane, a keen sense of the value of property incident to advanced communities, and a jurisprudence which, for its completeness and the flexibility with which it adapted itself to every portion of the framework of society, has had no equal in the history of mankind, the Slave rose to no unimportant place in the domestic and political life of the Romans. But a higher advancement was yet to be his. It remained for a great Christian Teacher to elevate him to a position, not of possible succession to an encumbered inheritance which all but he rejected, or to a freedom so restricted as to be all but worthless, but to a larger citizenship, to wider privileges, than any which an Emperor could give. But this teaching had formidable obstacles to encounter, arising from the very constitution of a Roman household, and the daily habits and manners of Roman domestic life. It was a great advance in ethical knowledge and in the moral education of the family, when as between the master and the slave, the two extremes of their system, absolute authority on the one hand and absolute servitude on the other, was brought in for the first time the idea not only of moral, but of Christian obligation. It will be seen that the chasm thus bridged over was wide; for obligation is founded on contract, and contract implies moral responsibility. Henceforth whatever might be the legal tie, the nexus, which bound the slave to his master, there were correlative rights and duties based on a higher law than the Roman, subsisting between the two. But, at the time, the innovation on existing modes of life and habits of thought to which the words of St. Paul pointed was very great; and the relative positions of Master and Slave were broken in upon to a degree to which we who live under forms of modern civilisation are simply strangers. To the Master of a household at Rome, at Ephesus, or Corinth, it would be something strange and almost startling to be called on as a duty to give to his slave what was "just and equal"; to be urged to do so by the reflection that corresponding obligations rested on him for which he would have to account: and-which would be stranger than allto be told that his slave was in the Christian view of his position, no longer a mere chattel, a thing to have property in, to buy and sell, to caress with capricious indulgence or to punish with wanton severity, but a rational being, clothed with rights which the law of Christ would not suffer to be set at naught, and above all invested equally with those to whom he was in bondage with a capacity of attaining unto that true citizenship, that eternal inheritance of Sonship, in the city of God.

And as by such teaching as this a great instrument of moral and Christian elevation was brought to bear on the large and corrupt mass of polished and cultivated heathenism, so, to look at the other pole of the system, the faculties of the slave himself were appealed to and brought out, and every act of his servitude was, as it were, ennobled and placed on a higher platform. Henceforth the principle of the obedience which he was in all its strictness still required to render, and that subordination to his master according to the flesh, which it is to be observed no word or expression of St. Paul ever tends to weaken, was made to spring, not from that fear which prompted a servile watching of eye and hand, of look and gesture, that προσωποληψια which, while pleasing to men, yet with God found no favour, but from that simplicity or singleness of heart, the result of the centering of every faculty on the one object—the true Master—the real Freedom.

One amongst our own Christian writers and poets, George Herbert, has the same thought:

"All may of Thee partake,
Nothing can be so mean,
But with this tincture (for thy sake)
Will not grow bright and clean.

"A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine,
Who sweeps a room as for thy laws
Makes that and the action fine."*

Of such results we have one memorable instance recorded. There was amongst St. Paul's dearest companions a fugitive slave, by name Onesimus, the property of a Christian member of the church at Colosse. He had robbed his master of a considerable sum of money, and had fled to Rome.† Here he met with St. Paul, and became a Christian.

^{*} The Elixir, Paley, Hor. Paul., on Ep. ad Philemon, 10-12.

Observe now, in the light of the preceding sketch of the Roman law of Servitude, the influence of the Gospel on the relations of the slave and his master, aud it will be seen to what extent Christianity had penetrated the great barrier which still legally was interposed between them. St. Paul, careful not to infringe on the legal rights of Philemon, although anxious to retain Onesimus in the service of the Gospel (ver. 13), insists on his returning to his master. But, at the same time, he himself offers to repay the sum which the slave had stolen (ver. 20). But in what spirit does he write of this slave to his master, Philemon? "No longer," he says of Onesimus, "a bondman, but above a bondman-a brother beloved; very dear to me, but how much more to thee, being thine both in the flesh and in the Lord." And here we have the answer to those who would argue in favour of the perpetuation of the slave condition from the absence of any condemnation of it, and the recognition of the authority of the master, in the New Testament. This kind of reasoning, if it can be called such, is based upon a total misconception of the office of the preachers of the Gospel, and the relation in which they stood to existing states of society, or modes of government. They had, in truth, nothing to do with the comparative right or wrong, advantage or disadvantage, of political systems or grades in social life. These were slight matters compared with that great mission which was entrusted to them. To the Apostles and first teachers of the truth it in one sense signified but little, whether the world, the Roman empire, was under the tyranny of a Nero, or the mild despotism of Hadrian or the Antonines; whether the converts they made were slaves or masters; in the camp or in Cæsar's household. Their business was not to abolish these relations, or to substitute more enlightened forms of social or political life in their place, but to see that, whatever were the domestic institutions or methods of government which they found to prevail in the countries in which they preached, the spirit of Christianity should thoroughly saturate and influence them all. It was for them to see that the principles of truth and Christian freedom should silently and imperceptibly, but not the less radically, leaven the whole mass, then rotten to its very core, of Roman Heathenism. And if this were done, slavery, and tyranny, and oppression would of themselves cease; and gentleness with authority in its highest form and most beneficent exercise would take their place among the nations of the earth.

III.—THE WIFE.

"Wives, submit yourselves to your husbands."

In no respect was the departure from the ancient strictness of manners amongst the Roman people more conspicuous than in the gradual relaxation which crept in to the relation of husband and wife. The laws respecting marriage, at first marked by extreme rigour, were, towards the end of the Republic, gradually relaxed, until at length they became mere formalities, and fell eventually into all but complete desuetude. In tracing this out, it is curious and instructive to observe how enactments which, in their original freshness and severity, may have been suited to the then condition of society, as soon as they have survived the habits and manners from which they sprang, degenerate into a mere formal procedure, are habitually set aside, and thus become insensibly the means of their own destruction.

The position of women under the early Roman law was one of great restraint. They were not only excluded from all public transactions, but their domestic activity was confined within the narrowest limits. They could not undertake any private business without the "authority," or legal presence, of those under whose power they were: husband or father.* They could not be witnesses to a will or testament, because they were excluded from taking part in those public solemnities which were necessary to its ratification. + Their manners in the seclusion of their own homes were guarded with the same spirit of jealousy and caution. A woman who drank wine-a practice which among the Greeks, as many passages in Aristophanes prove, was regarded as eminently venial-was visited with the same punishment as that inflicted on an adulteress. Gradually, however, this severity fell into disuse, and in its place succeeded that laxity of conduct and disregard of restraint with which every reader of the works of the Roman Satirists is familiar. And so inveterate became at length amongst Roman women the habit of mixing in all transactions, that legislative restrictions were enacted for the purpose of placing some check on an activity which was wholly at variance with the secluded position which, in the view of the law. was the only one which a Roman matron could properly occupy; # and a law was accordingly passed in the Senate under which women were forbidden to enter into legal obligations, or become bound for others.

During the Republic there were three kinds of marriage-ceremony in use among the Romans; although it should be observed that at no time was marriage considered as otherwise than a civil contract, depending for its validity solely on the mutual consent of the parties. Religious ceremonies and nuptial rites formed no part of the essence of the tie itself, but were merely accessories of that which formed the binding relation between the parties. § Whenever two persons capable of entering into the contract mutually consented to do so, and evidenced their consent by any mode recognised by law, the justa nuptiae, as it was termed, the legal marriage, was complete. These three kinds of marriage were termed confarrateo, coemptio, and usus; the signification of which terms will be presently explained. In the mean time, we may remark, as a general characteristic of each of these three methods of entering into the marriage state, that under them -and they obtained more or less general acceptance until the end of the Republic-the husband acquired more extensive rights over the person and property of his wife than any system of modern jurisprudence has conferred upon him. And here again that singular domestic supremacy termed the Power of the Father, so peculiar to and cherished by the Roman people, meets us no less remarkably in the case of the wife than it did in the cases of the son and the slave. The relation of the wife to the husband under whose power she had come, was that of a ward to a guardian, of a child to his ascendant.* She passed out of her own family, and ceased any more to belong to it, and entered that of her husband, under whose power, or dominion, she henceforth found herself. He was invested by the law with an authority little short of absolute: it has, in fact, been considered that he possessed over her, as over his children, the power of life and death; + but this authority he exercised not in the legal view of his position as a husband, but as a Father. Such amongst the Romans was the place of a woman whose marriage was formed by one of the three modes stated above, down to the Empire.

The first of these methods, termed confarrateo, was the most solemn: it was the only marriage of a directly religious kind; it invested the children of the marriage with certain privileges, and the tie thus formed could only be dissolved by a ceremony of peculiar solemnity, which was regarded with dread. #

The second method, termed coemptio, was that generally employed in marriages between Patricians and Plebeians during the Republic, after the Canuleian law (B.C. 445) rendered such alliances legal. This was the highest form of a purely civil marriage; and here again the power of the head of a Roman household is illustrated by the mode being nothing more or less than a simple sale of the wife to the husband, in presence of a certain number of witnesses. and accompanied with certain ceremonies.§

The third and lower form of the purely civil marriage, was what was known as usus: this was nothing but a continuous co-habitation in the husband's house for one year, from which the intention to enter into the contract of marriage was inferred. Under these three forms of entering into a matrimonial contract, the wife, as has been said, left her own family, and passed under the power, the manus, of her husband; as completely subject to his authority as if she were a slave, or his son: her legal position that of a daughter, as being included amongst those who came under his patria potestas: her property his, inasmuch as all right over it vested in him absolutely; and he had the power of prolonging his authority so that it should exist even after his death, for-unless he gave the wife the option of choosing her own guardian*-she became subject to the tutelage of the guardian appointed by his will. If she had not this option given to her, and no testamentary guardian was appointed, the wife was by the law of the Twelve Tables placed under the guardianship of the husband's nearest male relations. Thus arose that well-known feature of Roman Private law, termed the perpetual tutelage of women. Under this system, though relieved from the authority of her parent by his decease, she continued for her life under subjection to the next of kin in the male line, or to the guardian nominated by the father. In fact, this perpetual guardianship was nothing more than an artificial prolongation of the power of the father, the patria potestas, after for other purposes it had ceased to exist. So completely was the whole machinery of the domestic life of the Romans made to revolve around this leading principle of the subordination of every member of the family group to the Power of its

The working of this system, as regarded the position of the married woman, was, as may be supposed, too harsh and artificial not to be frequently evaded; and the law itself respecting the guardianship of the person of the wife was finally abolished by the Emperor Claudius. + Before, however, its formal abolition, a legal fiction was the means adopted in order to enable the wife to escape from its severity. . This fiction consisted in a contract on the part of the wife of a feigned marriage, and a subsequent sale of her person by the pretended husband to a third person, termed a tutor fiduciarius, by whom she was at once emancipated. ‡ Originally, perhaps, no obligation rested on the trustee to carry out the intention of the parties to this transaction, though, as a matter of fact, he always did so; but the procedure was soon considered as being purely formal and of course, and as such received legal recognition, for the Prætor considered the tutor bound in conscience by the trust he had undertaken, and compelled him to execute it. But the expedient adopted for thus extricating the wife from the entanglement with an artificial subjection, was eminently consistent with the spirit of Roman jurisprudence, and it is noticed here as being very illustrative of the position, subordinated and almost servile as it was, which the wife occupied in the Family during that period in the history of the Roman people when, while the Republic lasted, manners were purer, and domestic and political life less corrupt and venal, than in the later and more luxurious times of the Empire.

But these three forms of marriage, under which the husband acquired more extensive rights over the person and property of his wife than any system of modern jurisprudence has conferred upon him, proved at length too severe for the decaying virtue of Roman civilisation. They subsisted in more or less general acceptance until the close of the Republic, and then fell gradually into disuse; so that under the most splendid period of Roman greatness, that of the Empire, they had entirely given way to a species of marriage which, though of considerable antiquity, had not up to this time been regarded as reputable. We have seen that the lowest of the civil forms was that of usus, or simple co-habitation for a year uninterruptedly, which was considered sufficient to raise the presumption of the intention of the parties to contract a marriage. What took the place of this method-to which the incidents of subjection to the power of the husband, and tutelage were, it has been seen, annexed-was a modification which amounted in law to nothing more than a temporary deposit of the woman in her husband's house. She absented herself for a certain given period in the year,* and the legal effect of this expedient was held to be that she never passed away from the power of her own ascendant, or into that of her husband, her property never became his, her rights remained unimpaired, and though she was subject still to the tutelage, yet it was that of guardians appointed by her parents, whose authority was paramount to that of her husband. Hence the position of the Roman wife, under this later and all but universally adopted form of marriage, was one of great independence, and its effect was to reduce the power of the guardian nominated by the husband to a nullity, while the form of marriage adopted between the parties conferred on him no compensating superiority; + and by degrees the tone of public feeling in this matter fell lower and lower.

It might have been thought that a tie formed with so little ceremony as this was, would hang with sufficient looseness around those who bound themselves by it, and would satisfy the conditions of a society so far removed from any standard of high principle as was that of Rome at the time of St. Paul. But there was recognised in the Roman law of marriage a still lower grade, a yet easier method of entering into a convenient union, to which no conditions of embarrassing strictness were annexed, and which demanded no very high example of virtue on the part of those who adopted it. This was a species of concubinage, not such as we are familiar with as existing among Oriental nations, but which rather resembled the custom still to be found in Northern countries which is termed a left-hand marriage. The legal incidents to concubinage, for it was a state sanctioned and regulated by law, and wholly distinct from unlawful union, were these :- there could not be more than one concubine; the parties must both be free: the children were not under their father's power; a capacity must exist in both the parties at any time to contract a more formal marriage; and their children-which were termed natural (naturales), could be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents. This connection also might be dissolved at the simple will of both parties, without any formal divorce or act of renunciation. It will be observed that traces of a connection not wholly dissimilar to this exist at the present day amongst us in the law of Scotland, which is highly tinged with the maxims of the Civil Law, and which admits of this method of subsequent legitimation of children. But it was common at Rome; received. as we have seen, legal sanction, and in fact differed from the lowest form of civil marriage merely as a matter of evidence. Both unions were recognised by law; both were formed by mere consent, and consent alone; and hence the question whether it was a case of lawful marriage or concubinage, depended on this consideration only, whether the husband intended to take the woman as his wife or his concubine: as the maxim was, concubinam ex sold animi destinatione æstimari potest.* Such was the state of Roman society and its law of marriage at the time St. Paul wrote: relaxed in morals; exhibiting symptoms of decay in the very centre of its domestic life; given up to the dominion of an artificial refinement which every day became more severe in its exactions; advancing with rapid strides to that decline and ultimate fall which at length overtook the most splendid example of heathen civilisation which the world has ever seen.

This sketch of the Roman law of marriage and the insight which it gives us into the state of manners which that law was instrumental in forming, will place the reader in a position to perceive more clearly the significance of the apostolic injunction, + "Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands as unto the Lord." This language in truth denotes just as great a stride in ethical conceptions, and as complete a revolution in existing habits and manners, as we have seen took place in the relations of the Son to the Father, or the Slave to his Lord. From the very first, indeed, the Christian teachers, especially St. Paul, himself in the enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship, set themselves vigorously to narrow the remarkable liberty accorded by Roman custom and jurisprudence to married persons; and looked with disfavour on a marital tie which was, as a learned writer has observed, "the loosest that the western world had ever seen." Accordingly they proceeded to elevate the marriage state to the very highest level at which it could be placed. The Christian Bishop or Presbyter, for example, was required, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the sacred functions of his calling, that he should be the husband of one wife; by which injunction is obviously to be understood a prohibition against the election to these sacred offices of anyone who had availed himself of the corrupt facilities for divorce given by the Roman law, and who thus might have more than one woman standing to him in the relation of a wife living at the same time. The Christian neophyte had his thoughts directed to the contemplation of its original institution when man was as yet innocent: to the examples supplied by ancient Jewish story and record of the subjection of pious women to their husbands; and to the consecration, as it may be considered, which the institution received at the hands of their divine Master himself by His presence at the marriage feast at Cana of Galilee, when His supremacy over the kingdom of inanimate nature was asserted and proved by the first miracle. From this starting point, in itself a prodigious advance in ethical conceptions and on the maxims of a corrupt society, and, with all its boasted symmetry, an imperfect jurisprudence; they proceeded to a stage as far removed from the archaic or Jewish views of marriage, as those were in advance of the heathen. The union is no longer civil; it is not merely simply religious. It has indeed annexed to it civil rights and sanctions; it is also religious in a sense in which it never was before. But it has become almost divine in the meaning with which it is invested, the symbol of higher things, pointing to a higher state; in a sense sacramental, for it is made to shadow forth that mysterious union of Christ and His church, on which the thoughts of all Christian people dwelt then as they dwell now, and to which their hopes converged as do scattered rays to a mirror's polished surface.

In England chiefly, amongst other modern countries, do traces exist of that ancient severity and merging of all other rights in the universal authority conferred by the patria potestas, which deprives a married woman, unless where equitable as distinct from purely legal principles are allowed to have effect, of all control over her property. This still obtains as a rigid rule of the English common law: and is a consequence of the influence of the canonists. who in the position which they assigned to women had it for their object to place a curb on the extreme laxity of manners which was characteristic of Roman jurisprudence. In their anxiety to restore to the institution of marriage as much as possible of the Christian element, they departed as widely from the spirit of secular jurisprudence in the restraint which they imposed on the persons, as on the disabilities which they placed on the enjoyment of property by married women. But the two are quite distinct, and stand on a widely different basis; and the circumstance that they exist as they do now in combination under the English common law, is, as has been observed, the vestige of a struggle between ecclesiastical and secular principles in which the former obtained the ascendency.

But no other system of law in modern Europe exhibits the same consolidation of maxims in their very nature distinct. The Code Napoleon allowed women all the powers of dealing with property which Roman jurisprudence had granted; but the law of Scotland and that of Denmark and Sweden have not accorded to them a position of similar freedom. although these codes are far less rigorous than the English law, which, it is interesting to observe, in the disability it imposes on the acquisition and tenure of property by women, serves more clearly than any other existing system to picture that great institution termed the patria potestas which we have seen occupied so large a place in Roman society, and which was in its full vigour at the time St. Paul lived and wrote. "I do not know," observes Mr. Maine, "how the operation and nature of the ancient patria potestas can be brought so vividly before the mind, as by reflecting on the prerogatives attached to the husband by the English Common Law, and by recalling the vigorous consistency with which the view of a complete legal subjection on the part of the wife is carried by it, where it is untouched by equity or statutes, through every department of rights, duties, or remedies."

And in what condition, it may be asked, in pursuance of a train of thought which this subject naturally suggests to us, is our own country, England, at the present day, with regard to an institution which is so closely entwined with the fabric of national and domestic happiness and prosperity? Is the vigilance which of old, in the earlier and purer days of Roman story, guarded the marriage state, still preserved amongst ourselves; or is it gradually, year by year, degenerating into a mere civil contract, comparatively easy of dissolution, appealing to no high sanctions, and carrying with it merely civil rights, obligations, and penalties? We have seen with what closeness an historical parallel can be drawn between the law of England and that of the Roman Republic as bearing upon the rights of the husband, and the legal position and disabilities of the wife, and how those rights and disabilities were worn away, until in times of greater luxury and less public virtue, they ceased altogether. But in addition to this historical case we also trace an ethical parallel; and must we look for a gradual laxity of manners, impatience of restraint, and an eagerness to escape from obligations which a keener sense of pleasure, and a greater abundance of national wealth added to a corresponding desire for its speedy enjoyment, have made distasteful? There are not wanting both in formal acts of the legislature and in the tone of society, indications of a departure from that high standard of morality and Christian principle with which, on its original institution, this the most solemn and binding obligation that can be entered into by man was invested. The influence of the Roman code, with that singular vitality that marks the great legal genius of the people, still exists and makes itself felt amongst us; and this circumstance has in a measure been the cause why a lower view of the marriage contract has found a place in our legal system. This aspect, however, of regarding marriage is, it should be constantly borne in mind, to be traced to a Heathen not a Christian source, and to have taken its rise when Paganism not Christianity was the religion, if it can be called so, of the world. It should not be allowed to gain strength amongst us: it should be kept in check by the efforts of Christian teachers and Christian writers; by all, in a word, who desire to see English society and domestic life in a sound and healthy condition, and to aid Englishwomen in reaching that purity of life and manners after which they are bidden by St. Paul to strive.

WILLIAM DE BURGH.

A SOCIETY TO RESCUE GIRLS FROM THE WORKHOUSE.

How great is the amount of good to be done, and how difficult it is to do it well! A good intention is an excellent thing, but the right talent for carrying it out is certainly not less excellent, and experience proves that these do not always go together. We are short-sighted creatures, and often delude ourselves by the idea that in the measure our hearts are enlarged, our wisdom is increased. But though our charity may expand so as to embrace the whole human race, we may yet be as deficient as ever in the knowledge of the right way to carry out even so much as one work of charity. There are many most important things which we never think of in the first rise of our charitable feelings, but which nevertheless often cause us to break down or render our efforts a source of evil instead of good. We too often forget that each action is a root which has many branches; that each effort produces a series of consequences which are so complicated, have often such antagonistic influences, that a great deal of prudence and reflection is required so to connect our endeavours with the world around, as to effectually secure the good object aimed at.

Nobody, I believe, will deny that the originators of the workhouses were animated by the desire to do good. The peace and safety of society, and the sympathy human nature must ever feel towards the homeless, the helpless, and the fatherless, imperatively demanded the establishment of such houses. They were founded, therefore, and the doors were opened to those who needed a shelter. a bed, work, and bread. Schools were instituted for the children; wards were fitted up for the sick, and work-rooms for the able-bodied; and the whole was placed under the management of trustworthy officials. It was thought the work was now done and the poor admirably provided for. Some far-sighted individual may perhaps, even in those days, have had his misgivings and have shaken his head, thinking that it might prove a more serious thing than was fancied, to deal with a thousand or two thousand persons, male and female, of all ages, and amongst them the very dregs of society, within the walls of one large building. This feeling of serious apprehension, it seems, was not shared by the general public, who were only too glad that there were such things as workhouses. Gradually, however, serious symptoms manifested themselves; there were such shocking and alarming revelations, that the whole population was roused and became indignant. Workhouses had at first been founded to rescue the poor from starvation and death; now societies are founded to rescue them from the workhouses.

It was such a society Miss Louisa Twining founded in 1861, for the establishing of an Industrial Home for Girls, in New Ormond Street, Red Lion Square. This lady was led, thirteen years ago, to visit the sick in the female wards of the workhouses. From the state of things she then witnessed she felt impelled to do what she could to form a workhouse visiting society, and for this purpose she united with her several other ladies. The object of the society was to introduce, as much as possible, religious influence into those institutions. The principle on which Miss Twining proceeded was the only one that could contribute anything truly effective towards meeting the fearful evils of which the workhouses have become the Though she could not hit upon such administrative measures as would restore the workhouses to a satisfactory condition, it was clear to her that the preaching of Christ, and the manifestation of Christian love to the sick and the suffering, were the first means to be tried. So Miss Twining's society continued for some years, trying all their might to diffuse the saving, quickening, and consoling influences of the Gospel among the inmates of the workhouses.

But Miss Twining and her friends soon found that their work would only resemble the labour of the Danaides, unless some further step was taken towards preventing the spread of the evil which they so zealously endeavoured to check. The great fault of the workhouses-a fault which may be regarded as the chief cause of all their other faults —is the indiscriminate amalgamation of the inmates. No regard is had to the respective moral character and development of the various persons who find their way into these houses. Now, as all the individuals who take refuge in them are not degraded characters, this was a serious defect. Many a respectable widow with her numerous family is driven into the workhouse from sheer necessity; many an irreproachable servant girl, sick or out of her situation, goes into it from the want of a home; and many orphans of respectable parents are sent into it by the parish guardians. It is true that there are schools and special places for children in all workhouses, where they are trained and kept separate from the adults. But the laws require them to step over into the adult wards as soon as they have reached the age of fifteen,* and here they find themselves among the worst company that can be imagined. Every day they must hear the foulest possible language, and witness the most disgraceful spectacles. It really would seem as if the intellectual faculties of those poor creatures were for fifteen years sharpened for no other purpose than that they might the better take in the pernicious teachings of that wicked company.

Efforts were made to bring about such a se-They were rendered paration, but in vain. powerless by the rules of the workhouses, which admitted of no such improvement without some legislative enactment. So Miss Twining and her friends soon had the conviction forced upon them that they must work quite independently of the Poor Law Board. The establishing of a home for girls above the age of thirteen was the scheme which engaged their earnest consideration. That home was to be a means "to lift these girls out of the workhouse, and to give them some other point of attraction and centre, for their thoughts and affections." The means required for hiring and fitting up a suitable house, were easily obtained by a society, amongst whose members Miss Burdett Coutts and other influential and generous ladies were found, and which numbered five bishops amongst its promoters. Miss Burdett Coutts, the Hon. Mrs. W. Cowper, Mrs. Goodfellow, Mrs. Tait and the Hon. Miss H. Waldegrave, formed the committee of this Home, while Miss L. Twining, as the lady-superintendent, undertook its direction and daily control.

Now it would have been an easy matter to have got such a house filled with poor homeless girls, if the doors were opened to every workhouse-girl that would apply, and no payment were required. But the Society rightly judged that an injustice would be done to the benevolent supporters if girls were admitted who had a legal claim on the boards of guardians of the poor. The Home was not intended to be a private workhouse, supported by voluntary contributions, and re-modelled on the principles of Christian philanthropy. It was meant to be a home for such girls as were actually left to the charge of the guardians of the poor: and for the support of whom the ratepayers were actually contributing, and for whose support, consequently, it would be unjust to charge the ratepayers again, through an appeal to their liberality. It is true the boards of guardians were legally bound to send those girls to the workhouses, but the Society hoped that the guardians would feel justified in disregarding that wrong regulation. So a circular was addressed to the different boards, requesting them to commit girls to the care of the Society, at the same sum as they cost in the workhouse—i.e., four shillings a-week. The opportunity of getting a poor homeless girl well taken care of was, of course, also held out to benevolent private individuals; but such cases were exceptional. The bulk of the inmates of the house, it was hoped, would consist of girls who otherwise would have been thrown amongst the objectionable company of the workhouse population.

The expectation of the ladies did not prove too sanguine. Their proposal met with a favourable response on the part of eleven unions, which, in the course of the first year, sent them forty-one girls, while twenty-three were sent by private individuals. And this was a very encouraging result. Sixty-four young girls were thus preserved from the contagion of the very worst company, and placed under the influence of a Christian family life. Would it have been a wonder if, from various quarters, cries had risen for more such homes?

But such cries were not heard. On the contrary, there was in some quarters, if not positive opposition, at least, criticism and contradiction. Some boards of guardians kept aloof; some positively refused to send girls. "The workhouse education," it was said, "was not so bad as to necessitate such homes. The children there were well instructed in the schools, and many of them had afterwards turned out good servants and tradespeople," &c., &c. These, and similar objections, clearly proved that those who raised them understood scarcely anything of the question at issue, and were firing away shot and powder where there was no enemy.

The reports of Miss Twining breathe the spirit of honesty. I have read many reports of many societies, but I must say of the reports of this Society, that they excel in their simplicity, candour, and veracity. Of the tendency so often noticeable, and perhaps excusable in reports, that of giving a rose-coloured tinge to everything, I could not discover a trace. On the contrary, the sincerity of the ladies went so far as to elicit the remark, "that they deserved no credit for what they were doing, because they dealt only with the best girls, leaving the others to their fate and their hopeless degradation, so that there was nothing extraordinary in their pupils turning out well on the whole." Indeed, some amount of Christian meekness and self-possession is required to be able to keep one's temper under such kind observations. What did the ladies answer? "Just so," they replied; "we do not in the slightest degree attempt to deny what you have said. It has, from the very first, been our intention only to take the best girls. But is there no merit, and no object, in the task we do set before ourselves, which is to save the hitherto uncontaminated from swelling the numbers of those hopeless ones? Is it nothing to keep those who have been educated at great public expense, in the right path, and to launch them into independence, instead of leaving them to be lifelong burdens to ratepayers, and a national disgrace?" Ay; this was an answer, each word of which was well weighed and effective. Prevention is better than cure; and it is not the habit of Christian charity to leave a good work undone because something extraordinary cannot be made out of it. Why, a charitable society, which is thankfully content with ordinary work and results, if only that ordinary work be good, is, in my opinion, a very extraordinary society in the present time.

With this view of the spirit and object of the Society we can easily understand that Miss Twining must be very particular in selecting the girls for admission, the more so that the Home offers only accommodation for about thirty-five. If, after two or three months' trial, a girl gives the ladies little hope of being able to recommend her to a respectable situation, she is returned to the workhouse, if she has no relations to receive her. Girls whose reputation is not quite good are not admitted at all. The Society would undermine its own work if it did not strictly adhere to this rule. The Home is not a reformatory, nor is it a school. Of course the girls, while staying in the house, are engaged in needlework and in household work, and those who are deficient in reading and writing obtain instruction in these branches every evening. But they are, as a rule, not longer in the House than three or six months; such as stay for twelve are exceptions. It is not the object of the Home to give the girls a complete training as servants. It is only meant to be a link between respectable workhouse girls and respectable mistresses of the middle class. Whatever is required to make them accomplished servants they must themselves learn in their situations. The Home only gives them a little preparatory training, a little push to help them to begin life and to go along smoothly. The Society aims at launching them into independence as quickly as is compatible with reason and circumstances.

Now certainly this is a very good principle. It is well known that children who have spent their life amongst people who did nothing for their own support, are prone to think that this is the best way of getting through the world. They commonly show a tendency towards leaning upon others, instead of standing upon their own feet. Admission into a Home like this is anything but a cure for that evil. It is exactly the thing they like; and the longer they stay in it, the more they are pleased. The best way to unteach them that habit of dependence is to throw them upon their own resources. Moreover, an establishment life-though the establishment may be ever so good-is never commendable for a child. The sooner the child is taken away the better, provided it can be placed in a good family. Miss Twining's Home approaches the family form much more than those large establishments, in which hundreds of children are crowded together like soldiers in barracks. Still even such a comparatively small Home is too large to keep the barrack style fully out. "Do what we can," says Miss Twining, in her second report, "we can never make an institution exactly like a household." This is a truth of great importance. If it had always been clearly understood, our philanthropic and educational schemes would have been guarded against gross defects. I do not know whether, or in how far, Pastor Bräm's system,* which has proved, and is still proving, such a blessing both to the children and the families with which they are boarded, would be practicable in England. Miss Twining's Society, it appears to me, is a considerable step towards realising Bräm's idea in London, inasmuch as that Society proceeds on the principle of keeping the girls as short time as possible in the Home, and of spreading them as soon as possible amongst respectable families. There is, however, a great difference between Pastor Bräm's society and Miss Twining's. The former is a strictly educational society, which boards the children from their infancy up to their sixteenth year with good families, for the purpose of getting them trained up in the spirit of the Gospel; whereas in Miss Twining's Society the educational element occupies a secondary place, its chief object being to help its pupils as soon as possible into a respectable independence. The consequence of this difference is, that in Bram's society the regular and constant visiting of the families by the members and by agents, specially appointed for the purpose, forms an essential part of its operations; whereas the work of Miss Twining's Society ends with having provided the girls with respectable situations. It is true, Miss Twining continues to keep up as much as possible a friendly relation with the girls after they have been sent out: some of them visit the Home from time to time on their holidays; once a year, on the anniversary of the Institution, they are all invited to spend a day at the Home; several come every Sunday to a Bible and singing class, and, when any of them are out of situations, the Home proves once more a true home to them, up to the age of eighteen. But regular visitation of the girls in their situations, and of the families with whom they live, does not constitute a part of the Society's work. Nor could such visits be paid here on the same footing as Bram's friends and agents pay theirs, since Miss Twining's pupils are not boarders, but servants. Still, it appears to me that such visits, if performed in a spirit of discretion and with kind cordial sympathy, would be welcome and beneficial to many heads of families, ^{*} See vol. ii. p. 79, seqq., of my work on "The Charities of Europe," in which a description of Pastor Bram's excellent Society for the Education of Indigent Children is given.

Good Words, Oct. 1, 1866.7

as well as to the girls. In this way it could be ascertained whether the circumstances and peculiarities of a family were such as to exercise a favourable influence upon the character of the girl. An excellent opportunity would also be afforded for introducing the blessings of the Gospel into families which, though respectable, are often sadly ignorant of the spirit and principles of a truly Christian household. Such a scheme would, perhaps, hardly be practicable, if the families to which the girls are sent belonged to the higher class, or if the girls were all of them adults. But it is not so. The families belong to the lower middle class, so that no etiquette would obstruct the visiting agent. And the girls, averaging from thirteen to sixteen, are at an age which places them in the greater need of supervision and advice, because they often find themselves in a state of independence, which, as a rule, is not quite natural to that period of life.*

It is clear, that if any such missionary labour is to be connected with this excellent Institution, it must keep its stand on the ground of voluntary Christian Charity. The Home was, in 1863, sanctioned by a certificate of the Poor Law Board under an Act of Parliament, so that any doubt on the part of the boards of guardians, as to the legality of their sending the girls to the Home, is fully removed. This gives to the Home the advantage of a legal position, as well as the inspection and counsel of duly qualified inspectors. Still. I fully concur with what the Rev. J. E. Kempe, rector of St. James' and one of the guardians of the poor, said on the occasion of the first anniversary of the Home; he "could not help thinking, that if the Home were taken out of the hands of vie Society by the guardians, it would lose a great deal of its wholesome influence." Strange to say, notwithstanding the sanction of the Home by the government, the number of boards of guardians which sent girls has not only not increased, but the number of girls sent by them has decreased. The accompanying table gives the names of the unions, and the numbers of the girls which they sent during the five years of the existence of the Home. It shows a strange fluctuation, owing, I hope, not to unsteadiness in the sympathy of the guardians with the Home, but to other, perhaps inexplicable, causes. St. George-in-the-East has faithfully kept its first place all through, but the Strand Union. which the first year sent thirteen girls, has sent only one in each of the two past years. West London, Holborn, Bishop's Stortford, the City, and Wandsworth, sent girls the first year, but then dropped off altogether. The number of girls sent by the guardians diminished so much in the third year, that the total number sent by them, which in the second year amounted to 74, dwindled down to 28. The Society, upon finding that the supply from the London unions threatened to cease altogether, applied to the country unions, which, in the fourth year, brought up the number to 61. But this fresh source did not continue to flow so copiously as at first, for in the next year the number again fell to 39. The Home received only nine girls from the London guardians in 1865, when we exclude St. George-in-the-East. I was glad to learn that since the foundation of this Home, similar Homes have been founded in the neighbourhood of London, and in the country. If this fact accounts for the decrease of the numbers, we may look upon that decrease as a sign of increasing interest in the object of the Society.

I have with great pleasure visited the Home in New Ormond Street. It is one of those substantially-built old houses, with large, lofty apartments, and therefore suited well for such a purpose as this. The matron, a kind, simple-hearted woman, appeared to me to be exactly such a person as is required for the management and control of such an establishment, combining the firmness of a ruler with the tenderness of a mother. Her hands proved that she was not only used to bid the girls work, but also to show them how to do it. I found a dozen of girls engaged in sewing under the control of a teacher; others were engaged in household work. They wear no uniform, as they continue to use their own gowns; their under-clothing however is supplied by the house. The bed-rooms, the kitchen, the wash-house, &c., were what such apartments ought to be. I need not say that a Home under the superintendence of Miss Twining leaves nothing to be desired in this respect.

I saw a portion of the sewing-room separated from the rest by a curtain, behind which there were five or six beds. This place was formerly used as a little hospital for incurable and infirm women, and the girls were taught there how to nurse them. This scheme was originated by the visiting society, it being found that the noisy and bustling sick wards in the workhouse were no fit places for such invalids. The Society found the means to hire a house adjoining the Home, and to fit it up for the accommodation of 16 women. It now contains 27. Up to the present year 56 such women, all belonging to the respectable servants or trades class, have been received into this truly beneficial establishment. They pay 201. a year, and are here enabled to finish their last days in quiet repose, under the care of Christian benevolence. All the house-work and part of the nursing, is done by the girls of the Home. One of the rooms in the Industrial Home is also fitted up as a chapel. Here Miss Twining, or one of the ladies who attend to the invalid women, conduct family worship every morning and evening. The chaplain of the Home, the Rev. Geo. Akehurst, also conducts Bible classes and prayers once in the week; and the Litany is read every Wednesday and Friday, at 12 o'clock.

As to the result of the work among the girls, the bad cases form, on an average, one-tenth of the number of those admitted and re-admitted. Perhaps, if the Society would apply Pastor Bräm's regular visiting system, the result would turn out even more favourable. However, the Society gladly encourages the girls to keep in the good way.* Rewards are given to those who continue for some time in their situations. It is very gratifying to read that most of the girls are very conscientious in repaying to the Home the expense of their clothing. They also stand in such good reputation, that families are anxious to obtain servants from the Home. The demands amount annually to upwards of two hundred, a number which of course far exceeds the power of the Society to supply.

It can easily be imagined that the cost of the Home cannot be met by the moderate sums paid for the board of the girls. They do not even cover the half of the expense. In 1865-6 the Home cost the Society a trifle above 702l., whereas the payments for the girls amounted only to 290l.; while 53l. came in for washing, and 7l. 10s. for registry fees. Still, owing to 368l. from voluntary contributions, &c., the yearly balance closed with a surplus of 215l. 6s. 11d. For the above mentioned sum of 702l., fifty-nine girls were supported.

In the Home for Incurable and Infirm Women, twenty-eight invalids were provided for during the year. They cost the House 887l. 11s., towards which the inmates paid 478l. 16s. 1d., and voluntary contributors, 307l. 6s. 10d.

I can understand, after having seen Miss Twining's noble and excellent work, how the Archbishop of Canterbury, at the anniversary meeting in 1864, should close his address with the cordial declaration: "That he was sure that all the guests present felt as he did, very proud and happy to meet Miss Twining, and to congratulate her on the success which had attended her efforts, and to express to her and the other ladies their earnest hope and confident expectation that its advantages would be much more extended."

J. DE LIEFDE.

TWO YEARS' EXPERIENCE OF THE MAORIES.

BY AN ARMY CHAPLAIN.

Two years and a half have elapsed since we left England, and we are now under orders to return home. In a few days we shall embark on the noble vessel which is to convey a living cargo of some four hundred souls round the Stormy Cape, through the glittering ice-bergs, over the pathless ocean, till we see the white cliffs of Albion once more. Some of us may never see them again; we have invalids on board, men who have broken down under the fatigues and privations of war; but there is something cheerful and reviving in the very idea of home, which wards off gloomy thoughts and brings the flush of hope to their pale cheeks. They look better already; the voyage may set them up again, and if they are spared to return to their native villages, they will have strange stories to relate of Maori warfare.

What a powerful hold England has over the heart of every one of her sons! The Atlantic cable may fail or succeed, but there are millions of invisible wires extending from the old country to every quarter of the globe, to every island of the ocean, to every spot of God's earth frequented by our countrymen, and we feel the electric shock when the word home is telegraphed to us across the waste of waters. We may be reconciled in a measure to colonial life, we may have formed new ties and new friendships, we may believe ourselves to be contented and happy; but the prospect of revisiting home makes the blood circulate through our veins with fresh vigour, and awakes something of that buoyancy of spirits and exuberant joy which schoolboys exhibit on the arrival of breaking-up day. We pity those who remain behind; we leave them to sing the Song of the Exile:

^{*} While these pages are going through the press, I learn that the regular visitation of the girls by a lady residing in the Home, was carried on for the first three years, but, owing to circumstances, was given up. It is hoped, however, that it will be resumed again, as Miss Twining herself is a decided advocate of the plan.

"The palm-tree waveth high, and fair the myrtle springs, And to the Maori maid the bush with music rings; But I dinna see the broom wi' its tassels on the lea, Nor hear the lintie's sang o' my ain countrie!'

And yet, compared with other countries, the exile's lot in New Zealand may be regarded as enviable. There cannot be two opinions regarding the climate; the moisture of the atmosphere covers the earth with an unfading carpet of green; the bright sunshine makes the mere animal process of living a pleasurable sensation; and the fertility of the soil is so great that "you have only to tickle its ribs with a hoe to make it burst out a-growing." The great obstacle to the material progress of the colony is the want of roads; the colonist who settles in the bush has often no means of communicating with, or conveying his produce to, the capital. Mrs. Mudie has told us something of the désagrémens of bush-life in Canada; our readers may safely take it for granted that it is not more attractive in New Zealand. A friend of ours, a member of one of the learned professions, tired of civilisation, and holding with the poet that came out to settle on the forty acres which the Colonial Government liberally bestows on every applicant. He had as much difficulty in fluding his allotment as Martin Chuzzlewit had in discovering the delightful city of Eden; the savage wildness of the place would have tried the temper of Mark Tapley himself. But our friend was resolved to come out strong under trying circumstances. had brought with him into the bush an axe, a small tent, a barrel of salt junk, and a bag of biscuit. pitched his tent, sharpened his axe, and began to hack at the trees as if they had been his natural enemies: he might have cleared the forest in time, if the rain had not begun to pour down in torrents, and continued to do so without cessation for two months. Time might have hung heavily on his hands if his tent had not been invaded by an army of rats which left him no peace by day or by night, switched his face with their tails when he was dropping asleep, cut their way to his beef and biscuits, and soon disposed of the whole. Hunger drove him back to the haunts of civilisation, and he is now occupying a position worthy of his talents and education. A Life in the Bush, like a Life on the Ocean Wave, sounds amazingly well in song; but the reality is something very different. My friend has given up reading Rousseau, and is cured of all his romantic ideas.

> "Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long,'

It is a mistake for gentlemen to come out here to settle, unless they be possessed of a moderate amount of capital. Officers in the army, who know nothing of the country, are often tempted to sell out and settle in New Zealand by the offer of four hundred acres of land; they are invariably disappointed. Their land is usually situate in some wild part of the bush, where there are no cultivations, no roads, no means of transport; it would be folly to settle ou such a spot, and their only ambition now is to obtain some humble appointment under Government. If they fail in this, they sink deeper and deeper in the social scale, till they disappear and are lost for ever. The other evening we were seated on the sloping side of Mount Eden, admiring the charming landscape which extends from the Waitewata to Cape Colville, when we were startled by the words, "Will you buy a mirror, sir? You may have it for fourpence." There was something so incongruous in the idea of buying a mirror for fourpence, that I turned laughingly round to the person who addressed me; the sight of him at once sobered and saddened me. He was unmistakably a man of gentle breeding; you could tell it at once by his hands, his feet, and his features; certainly not by his dress, which was not worth the price of the small shining glass which he dignified with the name of mirror. He was as ragged as a scare-crow, though his clothes had evidently been made for him, and still retained a sort of disreputable air of fashion. He was a man of good family and liberal education, the son of a London physician. At home he had been "rather fast," and now he was reaping the fruit of what he had sown. There are hundreds of these "rather fast" young men sent out here to reform; this one was a kind of living illustration of the reformation they undergo. They continue their reckless course till their means are gone, when they disappear, no one knows where or cares to know. The present war was a great wind-fall for these roving gentlemen; many of them obtained commissions in the Waikato regiments without much inquiry being made about their antecedents, but now that retrenchment is the order of the day they will be thrown on their own resources a second time.

At the present moment, this colony is overcrowded with immigrants, introduced at the public expense, for the purpose of occupying the land coufiscated from the natives. Most of these men have no previous knowledge of agriculture, and they would literally starve in the bush, where they are located, if they were not supplied with rations and employed on public works. This unhealthy state of things reminds us of the ateliers publiques which were opened for the unemployed at Paris after the revolution of 1848, and must necessarily be attended with the same demoralising effects; no man can become the recipient of charity without losing his self-respect. There is no field here, at present, for the mere labourer; but the skilled artisan and the small farmer, with a fair amount of capital and a numerous progeny of sons, must always succeed.

New townships are daily springing up, and large tracts of confiscated land will soon be exposed to public competition. Men who could never have possessed a single acre at home, may become founders of families and fathers of future squires in New Zealand.

Millions of acres have been confiscated in the districts occupied by the rebellious natives, and it is only just that they should contribute to the expenses of the war. They will still be allowed to retain a larger tract of territory than they are ever likely to occupy or to turn to any profitable account. The charge has often been brought against the colonists, that they incited the natives to rebellion from the selfish desire to obtain possession of their There may be some foundation for this charge in individual cases, but it is evidently unjust as applied to the great body of the colonists, who had nothing to do with the origin of the war, Governor Gore Browne initiated that struggle, which began at Taranaki in 1860, and was brought to a close at Wanganui in 1866, by attempting to solve by force of arms a question of disputed property, which ought to have been decided in a court of law. It was often asserted that a contest for supremacy between the two races was inevitable, and it was only a question of time when it should begin. This may be quite true, but it was unfortunate that, when it did begin, we had not justice on our side. We have felt this disadvantage all along, nor was our position improved by the restoration of the disputed piece of land to the original claimant; this act of justice came too late. The beginning of strife is like the letting out of waters; none can arrest the torrent when it has once begun to flow.

Since our occupation of this island, about a quarter of a century ago, we have been involved in four different wars with the natives. The war with Heke, in the north, in 1845, was caused by that chief having thrice cut down the British flag, which, as he believed, prevented ships from entering the harbour of Rororarika with the usual supply of blankets and tobacco; the others have arisen, more or less directly, from disputes connected with land. The New Zealand Company sold in London vast tracts of land to which they had not the shadow of a claim; no wonder then that the colonists met with opposition from the true owners of the soil. At Taranaki the natives offered only a passive resistance by throwing their arms around the trees, and thus preventing the settlers from cutting them down; elsewhere they drove them by force from the lands to which they believed themselves legally entitled. It has been said that the natives have received a fair price for their land: the average sum they have received, in the shape of purchase money, does not exceed a farthing an acre, which can scarcely be called an extravagant price, even at the antipodes. When they discovered the impositions which had been practised upon them, they lost all confidence in the Pakeha, and formed themselves into an anti-land-selling league. Governor Gore Browne tried to suppress that league by force; and thus brought on that inglorious struggle which has extended over six years, and left the natives more estranged from us than before. After the expenditure of millions of money, and the sacrifice of many valuable lives, the Maories are only worsted, they are certainly not vanquished. There are many who hold qu'ils ne reculent que pour mieux sauter, and we ourselves are inclined to that opinion. At a great meeting of the rebel chiefs, recently held at Hangitikei, it was agreed that the war should be discontinued, but only for the present.

The colonists have injured their own cause by affecting to be more virtuous than they really are. The Philo-Maori phylacteries which they occasionally assume, only serve to render them ridiculous: they appear to far more advantage when they present themselves in their natural character, with all the ordinary virtues and vices of the Anglo-Saxon race. They are just the same as other Englishmen would be under the same circumstances; neither better nor worse. If the members of the Aborigines' Protection Society were living in the midst of the native population, we venture to say they would soon be brought to think, to speak, and to act very much in the same way as those colonists whom they have denounced. It is easy to be philanthropic when it costs you nothing, and there is a great deal of this cheap philanthropy in the world at the present day. The philanthropy of the most philanthropic Pakeha would speedily evaporate if he were brought into daily contact with the Maori. While we readily concede to the latter the possession of certain savage virtues, we can easily understand how an industrious settler would not look upon him as a desirable neighbour. His land is overrun with thistles; every breeze carries the seed into the settler's well-cultivated fields, and diminishes the value of his crops. He keeps a pack of half-starved mongrel curs which worry the settler's sheep; he breaks down his enclosures for firewood; he makes a pathway wherever he chooses; he walks into his house and seats himself at his table without saying "By your leave," or waiting for a formal invitation. He has his savage virtues, as we have said; but he is not exactly the style of man whom a member of the Aborigines' Protection Society would invite to dinner, or introduce to his wife and daughters. He knows as little of cleanliness as he does of godliness; the missionaries have not been able to teach him either of these two virtues, which are said to be so closely related. In short, the Aborigines' Protectionist would find him, as the colonist has found him, a highly objectionable and extremely disagreeable neighbour. He might bear with him long, but his patience would at length be exhausted. We have all heard the story of the Quaker captain, who, when his ship was boarded by a pirate, said, "Friend, thou hast no business here," and, without a moment's hesitation, pushed him overboard. The Aborigines' Protectionist is peaceful as the Quaker; but if he were to return from the field some day like a second Esau, and find a noble savage devouring his porridge, we suspect he would at once seize him by the shoulders and push him out of doors. He would not kill him; he would only wish to get quit of him; and that is exactly the feeling of the colonist toward the Maori. He says to him, firmly and frankly, "My friend, you are an irreclaimable savage; you are unfit for the society of civilised men; but the world is wide enough for us all; fall back to your native forests, and leave me to till my acres in peace." The Maori may resent this candour, and refuse to fall back: in that case there comes a push, a blow, a fight, a war. It is always better to tell the truth: the colonists gain nothing by affecting to be more inoffensive than Quakers or Aborigines' Protectionists. Their assumed airs of mock philanthropy have done them more injury than all the attacks of their enemies.

Hitherto, in New Zealand, the Maoris have formed a sort of imperium in imperio. They have been allowed to retain their own institutions, customs, and laws; they have frequently waged war upon one another, and been guilty of the greatest atrocities, without interference on our part; the native tribunals have even recently condemned innocent persons to death for witchcraft and other imaginary crimes; no powerful arm has been stretched forth to avert their doom. It is only when some Pakeha has been the victim, that public opinion has demanded the punishment of the murderers: so long as crime was confined to the natives themselves, it was connived at and overlooked. It is a singular fact, that there are men in this colony, of rank and position, visionary enough to believe that the permanence of the Maoris as a race can only be secured by the establishment of a native state, governed by native laws, and free from Pakeha control. Without stopping to expose the absurdity of this idea, which can never be realised, and would be attended with an exactly opposite effect, if it were, we cordially adopt the principle that for the future the Maori and the Pakeha shall be subject to the same law, impartially administered without reference to race. We are now in a position to enforce this principle, which we have never been before, and any hesitancy or vacillation in doing so would be cruelty toward the weaker race. We hail the punishment of the murderers of Völkner and Fulloon as the inauguration of a new régime, as an assertion of the supremacy of British law.

In half a century—it may be in less time—the Maoris will have passed away, and given place to a more energetic race. There are Spanish gentlemen in South America who glory in the fact that the blood of the Incas is flowing in their veins: among the future aristocracy of New Zealand may be found descendants of Hongi, Heke, or Rewi, equally proud of their origin. In this sense the Maori race would always survive, as there are 2000 half-castes in the island, the offspring of European fathers and native mothers; but the Maori race pur sang are fast dying out. They are subject to the same law of mortality which is sweeping away the natives of all the South Sea Islands. When Cook visited Tahiti, it could beast of 200,000 inhabitants: the population has now been reduced to 7000. A quarter of a century ago the population of this island was estimated at 150,000: at the present moment it certainly does not exceed 40,000, and the mortality is rapidly on the increase. The war has done much to produce this result, but disease and drunkenness have done more. A feeling of delicacy prevents us from entering on a more minute analysis of the causes of Maori decay.

In a few years there will be no New Zealander left to take his stand on London Bridge to verify Macaulay's prediction; the Maori will be as much a creature of the past as the Moa, . If the intercourse between the two races had been duly regulated at first, he might have been saved; we have no faith in the revolting theory, that savage races must ever succumb before civilised. If such were the case, it would be far better to leave them in a state of barbarism, than to force upon them a civilisation which can only lead to their destruction. We must distinguish between the results of civilisation and the results of the vices of civilised men; the former tend to ennoble the savage, the latter to destroy him. The due regulation of the intercourse between civilised and savage nations, is a subject worthy of the study of the most enlightened philanthropists of the day; as hitherto that intercourse has been fraught with misery, suffering, and death to the latter.

The missionaries, who have devoted their lives to the regeneration of the Maori race, speak mournfully and despairingly of the future. The fierce outburst of Pai Marire fanaticism swept away the superstructure they had so laboriously raised, and left nothing but a foul sediment of impurity behind. One of them ascribes the decay of the race to "uncleanness-inwardly and outwardly-in diet, dress, and habitation, in body and mind, in all their thoughts, words, and actions." This language will not appear unnecessarily strong to any one who is cognisant of the facts of the case; though, to a stranger, it may seem somewhat exaggerated. The colonists, apart from immigration, are increasing more rapidly than the Anglo-Saxon race in any other part of the world; it seems as if a supernatural effort were made to fill up the void of human life. There is no physical reason why the Maoris should not increase at the same rate, as the climate is equally adapted to both races; for four centuries they continued to multiply and replenish the earth, till the fatal hour when the Pakeha landed on their shores, and introduced among them the vices and diseases of civilised life.

We are not to suppose, however, that the decay of this interesting race is to be attributed to foreign influences alone; it may be traced partly to certain vitiating causes which lie at the foundation of their whole social system. They are a race of Communists, they have adopted the principles of St. Simon, without having ever heard of his name, and in their case, socialism has produced its natural and legitimate results. They have no homes, no individual property, no vested rights, and very few children that reach maturity. Sir George Grey, in one of his very plausible and clever despatches, speaks of the Ngatiawas as fighting for "their hearths and homes;" the old Latin pro aris et focis doubtless suggested an expression which, as thus applied, is singularly ludicrous, and strikingly inappropriate. The Maori has neither home nor hearth to fight for; he has no conception even of what a home or a hearth is. He cooks his food in the open air, he occupies a whare or hut, in common with the other members of the hapu to which he belongs. It is not unusual to find twenty or thirty Maories of different ages and sexes huddled together at night in the same hut; the moral, or rather the immoral, results of this state of things may be easily conceived. The missionaries have grappled with this evil, but they have been worsted in the struggle, and led to tolerate a system which is utterly subversive of morality and self-respect. Some of the best men among them have given up the struggle in despair, and left the colony in search of a more promising field of labour. It was only recently that one of these men, in preaching his farewell sermon, declared, with manly candour and singular honesty, that the bitterest reflection on his mind, was the knowledge, that after labouring twenty-five years in New Zealand, he left it with the Maori no more Christianised than he was when he first landed. He was one of the ablest members of the missionary body, and his truthfulness of spirit is beyond all praise.

It has been asserted that the Maories have been corrupted and demoralised by the new form of fanaticism, which sprung up during the recent war; but this assertion is grounded on a misconception of the true state of things. In point of morality, Pai Marireism has left the Maori exactly where it found him: the only difference is that it has sanctioned and ratified a state of things which was felt to be inconsistent with the religion previously professed. Marriage, for example, is now abolished; but it may be doubted whether that institution ever exercised much restraining influence over the Maories as a race. In many cases it was set at nought, in others it was soon violated. With that happy facility of imitation, for which half-savage races are remarkable, the Maori would sometimes go in for marriage after the Pakeha fashion; he would have groomsman, bridesmaids, favours, gloves, ring, everything in short which etiquette demands on similar occasions; throughout the ceremony he would acquit himself with the calm screnity of a man equal to his fate; when it was over, he would write his name in the puka-puka in the most approved fashion; but we had rather not follow the other details of his married life. The poorest Englishman who takes a woman to be his wife "for better and for worse," has always some home to lead her to; it may be only a garret or a cellar, but it is sanctified to him as his home; it belongs to him alone, no stranger can force himself within its sacred precincts. The wealthiest Maori, on the other hand, has no place which he can call his home; married or single, he can only occupy part of the filthy raupo hut, where all and sundry may spread their blankets and matson the floor. That fierce outburst of fanaticism known as Pai Marireism, has much to answer for; but it has not demoralised the Maori race, it has only lent its sanction to an immorality which already existed.

The idea of property, like the idea of home, lies at the foundation of all social progress. The Maori has no such idea: he has nothing in this world which he can call his own: all that he has belongs to him only in common with his tribe. The social system of which he is the slave, is a system of the purest socialism; it is the embodiment in actual society of those principles which Fourier and St. Simon taught. He has no motive for acquiring property, which would only go to enrich his tribe, and not himself as an individual. If he advances beyond his fellows, their envy is excited, and the law of muru is at once applied. Muru is only another name for legalised robbery, and some pretence will always be found for exercising it. A case in point recently occurred in one of the northern districts. A native, a frugal, industrious man, took to himself a wife, and built a hut for his own separate use. This unsocial procedure excited the ridicule of the tribe, but as yet he had done nothing to incur their displeasure. As winter was approaching, he laid in a sufficient stock of provisions for the use of his family: his improvident neighbours failed to do so, and soon found themselves in want. It was intolerable that they should fast while he was feasting, but everything was done in the most legal manner. He was placed under surveillance, and it was soon reported to the runanga, or village council, that he had been guilty of a grievous offence; one evening, in leaving his whare, he had touched the foot of a woman who was standing near the door. In the interests of morality, it was resolved that he should be subjected to a heavy fine-heavier, in fact, than he could possibly pay; in default of payment, all his provisions were seized and devoured on the spot.

It is evident that, under such a system, the Maoris can make no progress in civilisation or in material prosperity. A man has no motive for acquiring property, when he knows that it will not belong to himself, but to his tribe; and to the tribal system must be traced much of the squalid misery everywhere visible in the native villages. A Maori has literally nothing which he can call his own; he can only boast in a share of all that belongs to his tribe. If he buys a new coat, he may wear it the first day: the next, his neighbour may be seen disporting himself in it—it goes the round of the whole tribe, and when it returns to the original owner, it is not worth much. His wife visits Auckland and buys a new hat; within a fortnight after her return to her bassa, it has been worn by every woman in the pa, and its beauty is gone for ever. In either case it would be a solecism in manners—a breach of all the conventionalities of social life—for the purchaser to offer any objection. Where the distinction between meum and tuum is practically set at nought, there can be no property, no progress, no civilisation.

"Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires, And, unawares, Morality expires; Nor public flame, nor private, dares to shine, Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine."

Until the tribal system be broken down, no reasonable hope can be entertained of the regeneration of the Maori race; it lies at the root of their whole social system, and is the organic cause of their decay. It is so interwoven with their national life, that both must perish together, and in a very brief period of time, the weaker must be absorbed by the dominant race. We know of only one Maori who has won the affections of an Englishwoman: but there are hundreds of Englishmen who have married Maori wives. At one time, such marriages were prohibited by law, and the dowry given by the tribe was confiscated by the Government: the dowry might be returned, if the parties lived in a state of concubinage. This immoral law has now been abolished, and both races enjoy equal rights.

THE PRAISE OF THE LORD'S GOODNESS.

AN AUTUMN MEDITATION ON THE HUNDRED-AND-SEVENTH PSALM.

THERE seem to be three ways of reading this Psalm. There is the literal, which most readers will probably take up the first, and think of desert tracks where the caravan has been buried in the sand, and unclaimed bones lie bleaching in the sun; then of stone cells, and the cross-barred light, and clank of iron fetters; of sick rooms and the shaded window, the hush, and light footfall, and scared faces that are turned upon the dying; of wild nights upon the ocean, and the hissing of angry waters, and the shivering of the strained ship—thinking of cries that scarce can pass through the slaked and blackening lips, and yet pierce in their faintness and from the great lonely waste into Heaven, and draw down angels to the rescue; of men whose haughty sin has fretted against prison walls till they grew maddened, and their terror called round them the spectres of past misdoings to company with them in their solitude and God shone in upon their hearts and pardoned them; of sorrows hovering like a cloud over the threshold, waiting only the stroke of the hour that is to ring out the knell of a dear life, and how Christ's face glanced through them as He came with virtue and healing in His track; of sailors in the storm that howls upon an iron coast, when the stars have gone out, and there is no light but the misty gleam of the breakers, until like a flash the moon unveils, and the harbour is gained, and they are safe; of Hagar and her child, of Jairus' daughter, of Peter's mother, and the boat upon Genesareth, and how one Divine eye bends over all.

There is the historical, which was the clearer reading to the Jew. It was on a historical basis, to commemorate historical facts, that the Psalm was written. The Jew would recognise in it, wilderness journeys, sore travail of his fathers, weary wanderings through other lands, hunger and thirst, the manna, and the water of Horeb; he would recognise in it Assyrian bondage, military rule, desolated fields, the men made conscripts and the women slaves, the land without Sabbaths, the people grinding in the prison-house; he would recognise in it the exile, the harp hung upon the willows while the singer's tears ran down into the river, the decay and great sickness of his people verging almost on extinction, the struggle and pain of their return, the straggling ships that bore heavily through the sea from Egypt; and over against all these-for the desert and the moving of the tents, he would set the slopes and vineyards of Tabor and Jerusalem throned upon its hills; for the bands of affliction and iron, the recovered air and elastic step of freedom; for the slow dying out of a captive nation, a march of the captives home; and for the perils of the way, a quiet rest under the old skies of Canaan. Or, taking up the history nearer to his own time, he would see in it four pictures of the exile; four pictures of 'return; from the east and from the north, from the west and from the south; from waste places without inhabitant; from the crushing of despotic ownership; from pestilent regions where the plague smote them down; from the way of the sea; * and another might see in it not merely characteristics of the localities of the exile, but a fourfold image of exile life under the guise of a wilderness, a prison, sickness and the sea.

It is with this last impression that a third reading is connected, the spiritual, which finds here symbolised the conditions and strivings of the soul, and its final deliverance by the Lord; and not only the first deliverance and translation into light, but those successive rescues which the Christian experiences when he is plucked from each backsliding, though often "saved only so as by fire." And the third reading in no way conflicts with the former two, nor they with one another; but each is very beautiful and true by itself. Yet, to our fuller light, the literal meaning alone is shallow, and the historical alone is narrow; while the reading of the Church includes both in itself, embracing all varieties of temporal deliverance, and the story of the Jew in the wider story of the body of Christ.

^{*} It is noticeable here that the sea-picture, while it is so graphic that, for example, the word for quiet occurs again only in the description of the storm in Jonah, is also the landsman's view of it, just such as his unfamiliar imagination would lay hold of and vividly retain; just such as Jews would feel when they came back by this, to them, untrodden way.

"Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness."

The words form part of a chorus, which is repeated at regular intervals, a burst of praise which could not otherwise find expression, the only change being in the second verse of the chorus, which alters each time in harmony to the character of the preceding thoughts. Each Divine work draws to it this holy jubilee.

I. Hungry and thirsty souls wandering in the wilderness are fed and guided to a city.

To picture the world that most men live in as a wilderness, its joys like cast out and withered flowers, the flow of its pleasures like the fantastic imagery of the air, its pomp and dignity like shadows, its resonant and stately speech and words of power like flying echoes in their vanishing; to show it as a barren dreary plain where the streams sink into the sand, and the grass is withered or gone, and people are straying like men struck blind; would only excite derision. Men would appeal against such a view of the world, by what they have or what they hope to have, or what at least they have seen others have, and the impulse that is on them to take their ease, eat, drink, and be merry. Yet the child who reads God's Word may tell us that God sees a worldly life to be nothing better than that picture, and that into that wilderness He sent His Son to seek and save the lost. Jesus is a Shepherd, and has a fold of sheep that hear His voice and that He leads into green pastures; but these sheep, He says, are in the wilderness. The prodigal was starved in the far country where he lived and rioted. We hear of broken cisterus there, that hold no water. The life of which this is spoken may be a pleasant, simple, country life, with its sowing, and its reaping, and its gathering into barns; it may be engrossed in business, in the buying and selling of lawful trade; of workmen earning their bread in the grimy smoke and crush of the city; or thinkers brooding over such problems as thought may solve. Men are incredulous of that, but they are not therefore right. The innocent lad that leaves his home and goes out into life far away, and before long falls into the hands of a gang of swindlers, does not believe that they are rogues. He fancies them the gentlemen they pretend to be, or he would fly from them. they are thieves. We must trust the larger experience, the wiser head, the sincerity of love. We have the simple word of a Father for what living for the world is; we may either trust that, or the tempter whispering at the ear, "Eat, and ye shall be as God," or "Eat and drink, for to-morrow ye die."

Some, at least, have found that God is not deceiving them, that worldliness is as empty and delusive as He has said. They have lost interest in it, not because they are satiated, but disappointed. Where will they turn? They are hungry and thirsty, not because the world has nothing to give, for it has so many interests, and aims, and occupations, and thoughts on which the mind is fixed. that in the eagerness of youth we are only struck by the lavish, bewildering profusion. But they hunger and thirst for real food and drink, for thoughts that will fill their souls, for what will last them and serve their higher needs, for truth, holiness, love, divine things. They would slake their thirst at a muddy pool if they felt that the water had fallen from the sky. They are content to take what any stammering friend or teacher may say to them. And, because of this hunger and thirst, they wander, impelled by a gnawing pain and yearning, and the first cries are wrung from them to God to guide them; for as soon as they get to know that the world is a wilderness, they know it is pathless. Then they come to a path that seems plain enough, and that they never saw before, nor could have seen but that God led them to it by a way which they knew not. It is Jesus the Way. "No man," He saith, "cometh to the Father but by Me." On this way they are fed with living bread, and can drink of living water; they have supplies of never-failing grace; their souls have reached thoughts that can worthily occupy them; they have righteousness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost; and what they have is theirs for ever, and cannot break, but by its very nature must infinitely surpass its early promise. The road leads them-they are pilgrims indeed now, but not wanderers-to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem; from very far, for faith is keen-sighted, they may behold its gates; the shining glory about it flings a visionary light upon their journey; issuing bands of angels may flash sometimes across their dazzled eyes; and it may be some murmuring sweetness of its song has already stolen to their ears. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men! For He satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness."

II. Souls in prison are brought out of the darkness, and their bonds are broken in sunder.

When we were children we could have wept over Samson, the poor sightless giant, grinding in the prison-house, and jeered at through the windows by the cruel Philistines. We might fancy Christ weeping over the race of men endowed with faculties so noble, of strength and wisdom so marvellous, of nature so Godlike, and heirs of immortality, yet poor and blind, and grinding at the world's taskwork, taunted by the mockery of devils. Men say that they are rich and have need of nothing. Their hearts are stout and high, and they could do without God. "Can we not think as we please? Are not our actions our own? Who is Lord over us?" Yet they are then in prison. "Is not the world wide and roomy? Can we not go where we would? even follow whims and idle conceits? are we not free?" While they say that, they are in prison. The prison is sin, a real dungeon, with its narrow blank walls, and its cheerlessness, and its gaoler, who is the devil. And we think life so spacious, like a world, because we are blind: Satan has blinded us. What is our freedom? To toil and strain year by year for something we were told would make us happy-make our fortune, perhaps we phrase it; and when the years have grown older, and our energies have decayed, to toil still, passively, unable to stop. And who told us but he who tempted us by evil whispers, or smooth lies; tempted us and set us our grinding work, and mocked at us as we slaved for him? Are we free from habit, are we free to give up a vice, are we free to leave worldly society, even when we feel it worthless? Let those who still think they are free, and have never learned "Without Me ye can do nothing,"-let them try; it may be, in trying they will stumble against the prison-wall, and realise the horror of confinement. For that is a horror that comes over a man when, unexpectedly, in some despair or fiercer effort, he may hit against his cell, while he wanders half stupidly all round, groping with his hands, and finds no outlet, and sits down to realise he is in prison; when he feels sin holds him, and he is fettered by it; that the doors are strong, and the keeper Argus-eyed; when he thinks of the clasp of bands about him, and tries if only one step can be taken loose of these chains; when he thinks he hears hideous laughter of the guardian spirits, and in frenzy will pull some sin from off him, and finds simply the pain and the knowledge that he cannot; and he cries miserably, "Who shall deliver me?" Theu Christ comes, breaks the gates of brass, and cuts the bars of iron in sunder. and the sinner, who is sitting in darkness and the shadow of death, finds the door yield-that door of his heart that has been barred against the Lord, and feels a touch upon his eyes, and looks up into the love of Jesus, and walks out free. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men! For He hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder."

III. Souls in great sickness are healed.

There is an element introduced here, as well as in the preceding image, which may not be passed over without the risk of infinite confusion in this matter. In the eleventh verse it is written that men are prisoners by their own fault, by the just punishment of their own offence. Here it is written that fools are afflicted, but because they have through transgression made themselves fools; "those who, because of their transgressions and because of their iniquities are fools, are afflicted." God's judgments do not light merely on the transgressing fool, but on him who by transgression has made himself a fool. Prisoners may murmur, Why am I in prison? Wanderers may say, Why am I in the wilderness? The sick may cry, Why am I afflicted? How is it that I am thus, and that God is love? Because thou hast "rebelled against the words of the Lord, and contemned the counsel of the Most High." Look into thy heart. "Is not the secret there? Look into thy ways. Do they not convince thee of thy folly? "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores."

That is the state into which the fool has brought himself, his "soul abhorring all manner of meat, and drawing nigh unto the gates of death." who is he? The man whom men laugh at for his easy good-nature till it brings ruin upon him, and then they-pity him? The man who is called "a perfect child in matters of business?" The man who lays up nothing, neither gains nor wisdom in the summer, and is left destitute in the evil day? The man who is hot-brained and, headstrong and light-headed, unsteadily pursuing hobbies, too obstinate for warning, too rash to be let alone? Perhaps so; but just as likely the cool and prudent and nicely calculating, whom the world would never suspect of a mistake; sagacious counsellors, thoughtful, reasoning, unprejudiced people, the brilliantly wise, who leave great names and a trailing glory on the earth behind them. For the folly is their sin. There is a wild haughty word of Goethe: I hate all bungling like sin. Sin is crime: and evil is a far deeper and more awful thing than bungling. the sinner is a fool: sinning is the saddest, supremest folly. And it brings with it its own punishment. The laws of God are all in league against it, from the lower laws of nature up to the moral government of God and the necessities of His own being. It is for ever punishing itself. It makes the world "a room of sickness and unrest." It creates the diseases of the soul, and spreads them with an irresistible contagion. We may see the wise, or beautiful, or famous, or noble, or genial, or happy; but when Christ came into the world He saw the palsied, the lame, the lepers, the fevered, men with an infirmity of years, and women with a bloody issue; not the purple and fine linen, but loathsomeness, ill concealed by beggars' rags. And it is through that world and among those, that He is ministering, pouring balm into open wounds, binding up broken hearts, and throwing still as He passes the gracious shadow of His presence, where miserable men lie sick upon beds of their own making. The Lord despises the folly, but He does not despise the fool; He hates sin, but He does not hate the sinner: He hears them, and delivers them from their destruction. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and His wonderful works to the children of men. And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare His works with rejoicing."

IV. Souls that reel to and fro in the storm are brought unto their desired haven.

When the voyage of life is earnestly begun, it is mostly earnest pleasure, youth at the prow and pleasure at the helm. The little waves that dance round the vessel's sides are lit by the sun, and playful and chiming in with the dauce of young hope in the heart. But God commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, the ship is a mere toy tossed from billow to billow or floundering in the trough of the water. Out in the world, thrown hither and thither by its fluctuation, getting conscious at last that it is a strife between wind and waves, and that there is probability of utter wreck, men may look for a haven. But the world grows more uneasy, the storms more boisterous; they make for one harbour after another, manhood now, old age again, retirement this year, travel the next: the harbours are exposed, and the anchors drift, and men fear they will never reach land. There is a time even when we may part from all former anchorages; when what held us gives way, or is rudely cut, our affections, our interests in life, our childhood's memories. Old thoughts, old reasonings, are weak and useless. We are adrift among speculations of the stormiest kind, it may be on the wild sea of unbelief. We live in an age of magnificent triumphs and vast projects, nobler perhaps than any other, richer in charity and wisdom: but its brilliance and restlessness are mixed with doubt. Minds, that would have rested hitherto, are touched with the unsettled motion. Timid and ill-prepared men may find themselves voyaging over troubled and unknown waters.

Or, if it be not doubt that tosses a man's soul, it may be conscience. A time comes when a man knows that he is wrapped in the tempest of sin, when it is to him like the shriek of storm-fiends, the bubble and seething of raging seas, darkness in the waters, and darkness over the waters, and he cannot tell whither he is whirling; it is all sin—his sin, and he is paralysed with fear.

However it be, there is the Christ walking out in the evil night, and at the first cry He is seen walking to us, and the waves lie under His Divine feet, and the winds fold themselves to sleep about His head; and so He bringeth us into our desired haven. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, for His wonderful works to the children of men."

V. The spring of all these works—the Divine spring and the human.

1. The Divine—the goodness of the Lord. Up to that we must trace our blessings, track them with a patient faith through each winding and beyond each earthly source, till they recede into the goodness of God. It is never our wit that helps us, for we are at our wit's end (ver. 27); it is never our friends, for there is none to help (ver. 12); it is never our strength, for our soul had fainted in us (ver. 5.); it is never the length of our life, for we had drawn near unto the gates of death (ver. 18),—it was simply God. This goodness of the Lord, because it reaches over so vast an area, and if we view it chiefly as expressed by pardon may well be indistinct to us; may not even express any notion so real as the goodness of a living man. Nay: it must be indistinct so long as God is not our God and Father, -so long as we associate another notion of goodness with Him than we do with Jesus Christ. But if it be apprehended with any clearness, there is surely an unspeakable pleasure and blessing in dwelling on that one thought, and watching how the character and near relation of God to us expand from it; how this goodness brings Him into contact with us; how it seems to run with a smile over the sky and the green earth, and sad hearts too, until we wonder that all things are not lighted by it, and lifted up to it, as flowers would to fill their cups with sunbeams. It is this goodness that is the spring here. It is to this goodness that the rescued sinner turns. It is by this goodness that God comes closer when we have got so far as to think He must abhor us. It is in this goodness that He "spared not His own Son, but gave Him up to death for us all." "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and His wonderful works to the children of men!"

2. The human—the cry of prayer.

All the romance of history and life seems gathered within the compass of this psalm: wandering princes, beggars on the throne, the perishing of empires, the blessing of kingdoms, personal straits, national episodes; life in the desert, the ocean, the prison-cell, the sick-room; the play and shifting of things, the little incidents that slip unnoticed, events that become the public talk, whatever we can conceive of varying fortune that goes on over the earth or has gone on over it; the one little knot binds them all together, one little key opens all their secrets and reveals their order-prayer. We do not understand much about that yet. God has been teaching us of late rather how little we know than how much to pray. (1.) It is the last thing a sinner or backsliding saint is forced to. The prodigal had taken to be a swineherd, sunk down to the dregs of society, and then been brought to hunger before he could bring himself to say, Father, I have sinned. David had to be made condemn himself, and be humbled by a prophet, and threatened with loss of his child, before he would cry, Have mercy upon me, O God! When the heart is brought down, when no other escape is possible, when the soul is melted because of trouble, when the gates of death are swinging open, -not till then men cry unto the Lord. (2.) It is the first thing God attends to. He heeds apparently none of the groanings or piteous looks or hardships of the situation. It seems as if He will give no sign while the sensitive heart is on the rack, while shame is burying men in despair, while their condition would provoke all pity. They must cry to him; be it ever so feeble, an upturned eye, a word, a sigh; then the answer comes rushing down. That is very plainly written here, and surely it has its practical lesson; to put that first which we put last; to cry to God. It is not because it appears at the end He hears it, but because it is prayer. It is not that we must go through a certain course of training, before we can come with a broken heart and broken voice, that can only falter, Mercy! but it is that we come with the heart and utterance. Let it be at the beginning. It is our fault, our misery, that so much falls between, that we have to be driven step by step over our reluctance. And let us never dream that because we are so wretched, God will compassionate us without our asking. The gift is ready, the love is unchanging, the compassion never faileth. One thing only is lacking-our prayer. Further, we cannot fail to notice the power of prayer. It is becoming a common expression now. Let it never lose its meaning in its commonness. There is always danger of the word, the name, slipping into the place of the thing, the truth. We may think of the power of the sun, generating, fructifying, lightening: but that is slow. We may think of the power of electricity, the cloven path of the lightning: that is irregular, and we see it seldom. We may think of the power that wills and rules a European strife, of the power of kings, or governments, or gold. We may think of a power that controls the world of stars, urging them to a speed from which we start back appalled, and holding them as easily as a mother holds her child's hand. These do not bring home to us the power of prayer. Only knowing it and feeling it will realise it-it is so unlike any other. A contrite sigh will set a thousand agencies in motion. Tempest and calm, rain and sunshine, pestilence and famine, passion, lust, wrath, armies and tyrants, sun and moon, the seasons and men's hearts, are all within the sphere of prayer. The little child that can scarcely lisp Our Father, may burst open the prison-house of a soul; and the man that has only returned from the far country, or from wallowing in the mire, utters some feeble speech, and, in a moment, a Father's arms are round him.

This may be an autumn song; when the fields are golden with the grain, and the reapers are binding the sheaves, and the orchard swings its load of fruit, and the path to the church leads past the bending ears; when the farmer's care is over, and nature in the clear weather, and with the full lustrous moon of the harvest, offers her thanksgiving to God. For we owe all to the goodness of the Lord; and the grain is His, and the bread we eat, and the gold we win. It may speak to us of a larger harvest and of richer fruits. It spoke to the Jews of a wonderful deliverance; of a sowing in tears and a reaping in joy. We picture the long files of the procession as they swept through the streets and up to the temple singing their burden, and how as they passed within the gate a new song met them from the inner choir, and the great shout was eaught up and swelled to heaven in one harmony, pealing within and echoing far without, and as it died caught up again, and old men who had seen the exile dropped tears of joy and bowed in prayer as the chant swung by, and children who had been born in Babylon sang it with clear sweet voices,-"Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" And we of the Church of Christ may think of a shout of joy that goes up over the world this day, swelling from redeemed souls, leaping from village to village, and from hamlets in the mountains to hovels in the city, from once ribald haunts and once prayerless homes, and caught away by angels, and echoing on into the praises that are singing round the Lamb; and down many cheeks the silent tears are trickling, and loving souls give thanks : and children's voices ring in it, and there is the quavering tremor of old age, and mothers' eyes are filling as they gaze upon their twice-born sons, and husband's that have watched for unborn wives, and there is one heart, one cry, one thought-"Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

W. F. STEVENSON.

ADELINE COOPER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "QUAKER PHILANTHROPY."

Vast as are the changes which have of late years taken place in the aspect of London by the formation of new streets, railway termini, and other improvements, perhaps there is not a district which has undergone a more complete metamorphosis than that of St. Margaret's, Westminster. Thirty or forty years ago there was not a parish in the Metropolis which had obtained (and perhaps justly) a wider reputation for poverty and degradation. A large proportion of the land was held by the Dean and Chapter of Westminster—a body which in those days was composed of a very different order of men from the gentlemen who fortunately have succeeded them. They and their predecessors appear to have taken but little interest in the spiritual and social condition of their tenants; things being allowed pretty much to take their course, provided the quitrents and the heavy fines imposed on the renewal of leases were regularly paid. These fines were so onerous, and the duration of the leases on which the houses were let so short, that their tenants and sub-lessees were to a great degree precluded from building good houses on the ground. The result was that the quarter was crowded with streets, alleys, and courts of a most miserable and squalid description, while the inhabitants who flocked to them, in consequence of the demolition of houses in the western parts of the Metropolis, and the natural increase of the population, were of a character only too well suited to the dwellings which had been erected for their reception. In the mean time the parochial authorities took little interest in the matter. The guardians of the poor, though nominally elected from the parishioners at large, were in fact no better than self-elected. They were generally chosen from small tradesmen in the locality, who, so long as they could enjoy their parish dinners in peace and comfort, cared but little about the moral condition of the poor under their guardianship; and if occasionally a member somewhat more public-spirited than his brethren proposed some amelioration of the disgraceful state of things then existing, his attempts were soon stopped by the indifference which pervaded the majority. degrees, however, a different state of feeling began to develop itself among the parochial authorities. Some innovators, who were looked upon by the old parish magnates as little better than disturbers of the public peace, began to take exception to the amounts recorded in the parish balance-sheet for feasting and other outlays. Again, another most disagreeable fact began to thrust itself upon the notice of the guardians. Although they admitted that a large proportion of the inhabitants were most demoralised, still vice could not go on without the expenditure of money, and as tradesmen they had hitherto had but little to complain of. But fresh population continued to flow into their parish, and the new comers were invariably of the poorest order, so that, although retail trade continued to flourish, the poor's-rate increased in a still greater ratio; and while they benefited as traders by the increase in the number of the inhabitants, as ratepayers they suffered in a still greater proportion.

The parochial authorities now roused themselves in good earnest to meet the difficulty, although the plan they adopted was hardly of a nature to be commended. The sole object they seemed to have in view was to drive the poor out of their parish, and that by the exceedingly simple process of destroying their dwellings. To effect this, by aid of an act of Parliament, an arrangement was entered into with the Dean and Chapter, on whose estate the worst portion of the poor were congregated, for the formation of a broad new street reaching from Westminster Abbey to Pimlico. Great difficulties, however, had to be encountered before the scheme could be carried out, but at last they succeeded; and many thousands of the poerest individuals to be found in the Metropolis were driven out of the parish. Still, in a moral point of view the movement was not so successful as its promoters had anticipated. Although the poor's-rates were certainly to a great degree reduced by it, and a vast number of bad characters get rid of, yet many, and those of the worst class, remained behind; and from the scarcity of house accommodation they became more crowded, and in consequence more demoralised. The overcrowding-as shown by the returns of the medical officer of health-is even at the present day utterly disgraceful. Model ledginghouses on a grand scale have certainly been built. but regulations were established by their promoters very adverse to their being really successful. persons getting their means of living in the streets, such as petty hawkers, costermongers, and others of the same class, were precluded from being tenants, and thus the great evil remains almost untouched. Not the slightest better provision was made for these poor creatures, and the result was that, both physically and morally, they fell from bad to worse, till at last, to be as great a thief as a Tothill Fields costermonger, became a common phrase of abuse among the lowest and most degraded.

But while misery and vice thus continued to exist with little apparent abatement, there was no lack of effort on the part of the resident clergy of all denominations for the reformation of the inhabitants. But these efforts had comparatively little good effect when compared with the vast amount of labour employed. Nor was this to be wondered at while the magistrates licensed gin palaces by the score; and the authorities, governmental or parchial, availed themselves of every pretext for destroying the dwellings of the poor to carry out some contemplated improvement.

These who were already overcrowded were thus packed still closer together, and the moral and social evils, already too notorious, were greatly increased. Notwithstanding this unfavourable state of affairs, there were still many benevolent persons who believed that the population of the district was as capable of being raised to respectability as any portion of the community, if only common justice were done them. And considering the injustice of municipal legislation, and the numerous licences, they were probably right. Still nothing very conclusive was done in the matter till a young lady-Miss Adeline Cooper-undertook to prove the truth of this opinion; and most triumphantly has she succeeded in her truly honourable self-imposed mission.

The history of Miss Cooper's labours among the poor of Westminster furnishes a singular example of that tenacity of purpose so often found among our countrywomen. No opposition seems to terrify them; no obstacle too vast for them to surmount. About ten years ago some benevolent persons interested in a Ragged School in Westminster were on the point of closing its doors for want of funds. One of them, however, proposed that before doing se they should apply to her friend Miss Cooper for advice and assistance on the subject, as Miss Cooper had had great experience in the management of schools for the children of the poor in the neighbourhood of Pimlico. The lady's advice was acted on, Miss Cooper readily accepted the invitation given her, and by dint of united efforts the school was kept open. While engaged in teaching these poor children, Miss Cooper had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with many of the inhabitants of the district, and she resolved to do something to raise them out of the abject poverty and degradation in which they were sunk. For this purpose she rented two little cottages in a court in Old Pye-street-since swept away by the improvement commissioners-and she there commenced day and night Sunday-schools, as well as a mothers' meeting. Not only had she plenty of applicants, but the rooms became so overcrowded that she was obliged to look for more extensive accommodation. She had some difficulty in succeeding, but she at last found a building which for size and situation was admirably adapted for the purpose. Singularly enough, in this new building she found an opportunity to point a moral -and a forcible one too. The house she had selected had formerly been the "One Tun," a notorious public-house, which was then vacant in consequence of the tenants' having decamped without paying their rent, and stealing everything they could possibly take away with them. At the outset Miss Cooper experienced great opposition from a number of roughs who had been accustomed to drink and gamble at the "One Tun." They voted the school a nuisance, and openly threatened the teachers that if they did not "clear out of it" they should be driven away by force. No notice was taken of this threat, and Miss Cooper and her assistants kept steadily on their course, when the angry feeling among the roughs began to gradually subside, and they afterwards showed many acts of kindness to the resident teachers. And it is only justice to them to add, that on no occasion did they ever subject the ladies connected with the school to the slightest annoyance.

Noticing the terrible effects of intemperance in the neighbourhood both on old and young, Miss Cooper, after taking the temperance pledge herself, established a band of hope for the children, which was also attended with marked success. The reason she gave for becoming a teetotaller was, not that at the time she considered the moderate use of fermented drinks objectionable, but that it would not be right on her part to ask persons who were badly fed and ill-clothed and housed, exposed to drenching rain or burning heat, and subjected to every kind of temptation, to give up the habit while she herself had every comfort. Her efforts to inculcate sobriety on the adults were not so encouraging as she could have wished. True, they advised their children to abstain, and even admitted that her arguments as applied to themselves were worthy of grave consideration, but, unfortunately, as they generally chose the tap-room as the locality for discussing the matter, it may be easily imagined that Miss Cooper's reasoning in such an atmosphere lost a considerable portion of its effect. She attempted to induce the men to attend her meetings in the school-room at the "One Tun." They were all civil snough when invited, but they still stayed away, while the room was nearly filled with women and children. By degrees Miss Cooper ascertained some of the reasons which operated against her. First, it was thought infra dig. to go to a school; secondly, on that special evening some might have to work all night; others might have had a bad day in selling their wares, and were obliged to try again in the evening; while the majority, when asked, gave for an excuse that they had forgotten all about it.

Annoyed at her want of success, but still not discouraged, Miss Cooper determined to try another plan to induce the men to become sober. She resolved on establishing a club in a different locality, where the men might have full opportunity of meeting together in commodious, well-lighted rooms, and where they might be free from the temptation of the public-house, and be able to coolly reason on the advantages of sobriety. For some time she could find no house suitable, but at last she heard that a piece of ground in Duck Lane, Westminster, was to be let on a building lease. This, with the assistance of some friends, she took a lease of, and on it was built a handsome, lofty room, well lighted, warmed, and ventilated, and with every convenience attached to it. In this building Miss Cooper established her costermongers' club. In its organisation she was considerably assisted by several gentlemen who had always been her warmest supporters. Possibly the regulations which Miss Cooper would have liked to have seen carried into effect might have been somewhat more stringent than those advised by her male friends, several of whom, having had experience of the working of the West End clubs, advised her to allow the members to form their own code of regulations unbiassed by any surveillance or restrictions whatever. Miss Cooper readily agreed to this suggestion, and one of her friends, a civil engineer, assisted in drawing up a code of regulations somewhat like those of the Reform Club, of which he was a member. These rules were merely offered to the members for their guidance in forming their own rules, for the power was left them to adopt or accept these as they might think fit.

A meeting of the members was now called to take into consideration the formation of a code of laws by which the affairs of the club were to be regulated, a sufficient number of members having enrolled themselves to allow of its being opened. The different rules were then put seriatim, and all were carried without difficulty. At last a question was brought before the meeting which caused poor Miss Cooper the greatest anxiety. The question was whether they should apply for a beer licence for the club, and her trouble was still further increased at finding that the first person who rose to speak on the subject was far better known for his industry and shrewdness than his sobriety. addressed the meeting in something like the following words :-

"Now, I'll tell you what my opinion about this beer licence is. I aint a tetollar, and I don't intend being one; and when I want a viut of beer I intend having it, providing I can afford to pay for it. Now, if I want a pint of beer, I can go to a public-house for it; but if I want to keep away from beer, and I very often do, I can come here. Now, if beer's sold here, I don't see the difference between this and a public-house, or what's the use of my being a member any longer, so I shall hold up my hand against any beer licence being had."

All the other speakers followed in the same tone, and on the question being put, "whether a beer licence should be applied for," Miss Cooper had the unspeakable gratification to find that it was unanimously rejected. But more remains to be told. The luxury of being able to get away from beer soon began to be felt by the members of the club, while several finding they could do without beer, gave it up altogether, and became teetotallers. On the evening of the meeting for passing the rules the club, which numbered one hundred and twenty members, counted among them only twenty-five teetotallers; a few weeks afterwards, more than half the members had taken the pledge.

The more Miss Cooper saw of her new acquaintances, the costermongers, the more fully she became convinced that a very great injustice had been done them by the estimate the public had formed of them. True, they had many faults, and were prone to many vices, but the dishouesty of which they were accused was not common among them. On the contrary, many instances came under her notice of honourable actions which would have been creditable to any class of society. Again, a very singular feature was noticeable in their behaviour to each other. The Westminster costermonger, being generally a man of weakly constitution, is obliged to wage the battle of life by aid of his cunning and address. Accustomed from his early youth to mercantile transactions, which though in a very small way are possibly quite as intricate and require as much tact in their management as those of greater magnitude, he naturally becomes a very clever financier, seldom entering into any bargain without a clear prospect of gain. Yet, notwithstanding all his shrewdness, Miss Cooper found him continually giving up, perhaps as much as half his capital in loans without interest to a brother costermonger in temporary distress; and the readiness with which he advanced his money was usually the greater in proportion to the possible inability of the borrower to repay it. She further noticed the great kindness and solicitude which they showed towards each other when in sickness, and the prompt manner in which they would get up subscriptions for the widows or orphans of any deceased members of their class. These and other evidences of Christian feeling being so obvious to Miss Cooper she attempted to inculcate upon the members of her club a more religious tone, and in a short time a very efficient Bible class was formed in it. In the mean time the temperance movement progressed rapidly among the members, and in this Miss Cooper received great assistance from the celebrated George Cruikshauk, the artist, who joined her committee and used frequently to take the chair at the meetings, making himself exceedingly popular among the costermongers, thus doing good service in the cause of sobriety.

Meanwhile the schools established in the "One Tun" continued to flourish. The band of hope also continued to prosper. Miss Cooper established among the members of the band a penny bank, which was held in high favour among the young teetotallers. They encouraged it to such an extent that last Christmas she had the satisfaction of returning to them more than eighty pounds which they had saved during the year.

Miss Cooper now fondly hoped that her labours would go on without further impediment, but she was doomed to be greatly disappointed. A terrible onslaught was made by the police on the costermongers who were wont to ply their trade in the Broadway, Westminster. This attempt of the police at the time roused great indignation among many of the well-wishers of the poor, and the police received from all sides great blame for their arbitrary conduct. The police at first tried to defend themselves by pleading that the costermongers and hawkers whom they had driven away were little better than thieves, but Miss Cooper and her friends roundly asserted that this was not the fact, and challenged them to prove their case. The police then shifted their ground and stated that the hawkers and costermongers caused great impediment to the traffic and also severely injured the trade of the legitimate shopkeepers in the vicinity. This last assertion, however, was fully disproved by the shopkeepers themselves, who said that these poor people, so far from being an impediment to the retail trade of the neighbourhood, rather brought customers than drove them away.

While Miss Cooper was devoting all her energies to the defence of the oppressed, she received another rebuff, which would have damped the courage of any one less determined than herself. One morning a notice was sent her from the improvement commissioners, that it was necessary her club-house should give way to make room for some alterations they proposed to effect, and that she would shortly be obliged to leave it. At the same time an intimation was conveyed to her, that she would be fully compensated for her interest in the building. Annoyed but not discouraged, she now looked around her to find some other spot in the neighbourhood to which she could remove. She was without success, however. The value of land had so much increased in Westminster, that the compensation she had received from the improvement commissioners was insufficient for the purpose of re-establishing her institution near the spot from which she had been ejected. For some time she was at a loss what steps to take, when a friend sprung up where she had little expected to find one. The report of her exertions on behalf of the friendless poor, had reached the cars of the Marquis of Westminster. After making inquiries on the subject, and finding the statements he had heard as to the good she had effected were quite true, the marquis kindly offered to lend her 7600*l.*, at 3 per cent. interest. It is almost needless to say, the noble marquis' offer was accepted with gratitude by Miss Cooper, in fact she looked upon it in the fullest sense of the term as a Godsend to her. She was now, not only in a position to re-establish her club, but to unite to it a model lodging-house, for those of the poor who were unable to become tenants of other model lodging-houses in the neighbourhood.

She now sought for some other locality in which she could commence operations. She at last discovered a vacant piece of freehold ground, and four old houses, situated in the corner of Pve Street and St. Anne's Lane, which were purchased for 2260l., and on this she not only erected her club, but also a dwelling house sufficiently large to accommodate fifty or sixty of those families who were ineligible, from the lowness of their weekly wages, or their daily avocations, for any other model lodging-house, Mr. Peabody's included, where none but men earning from eighteen to twenty shillings a week can be admitted. The expense of the whole building, beyond the cost of the freehold land, was 6300l., including 163l. for stoves, and 333l. for iron joists, the whole with legal and other expenses amounting to nearly 9000l.

Few who are acquainted with the general aspect of working-men's clubs, would recognise at first sight that erected for the costermongers, street hawkers, and others of the poorest class in Westminster. The building was designed by Mr. Henry M. Eyton, of Buckingham Street, Strand, and of Ipswich, and would not disgrace the handsomest street in the Metropolis. The portion of the building set apart for the club, has a general room thirtytwo feet by twenty-four, and thirteen feet high. with a lavatory and other accommodations attached, also a kitchen and library. Over the club-room is a lecture-room thirty-two feet by twenty-four, and also a committee room and office. In the dwelling house, which is entered from St. Anne's Lane, there are seventeen single tenements, thirty-eight with two rooms, five with three rooms, let off at one and ninepence, three shillings, and four and sixpence a week. The entrance to each tenement is at the back, from stone external galleries; on each landing are two water-closets, a washing-sink, and a tap with water laid on to both, also two dust-shafts. Each of the living-rooms has one of Nicholsou's grates with oven and boiler, a lock-up larder, and a coal-closet; one of the most remarkable features in the building, and perhaps the most to be commended, is the wash-house placed on the top floor, by which arrangement the inmates of the dwelling-houses are not annoyed by the steam from the washing. It is a large and lefty room with seven coppers and washing troughs, also two drying closets properly fitted up; all the floors in the building are of iron and concrete boarded over, and the lintels of strong bar iron, no timber being used in the construction; and the stairs are of York stone, built into the walls on both sides, so that as far as practical, the building is fire-proof.

In a portion of the building, forming the angle of Old Pye'Street and St. Anne's Lane, is a handsome double fronted shop, in which the members have established a co-operative store; this also promises to be a success. It has been open only a month yet, but more than 160% has been taken over the counter.

Including children, there are 242 persons in the dwelling-house; and of these, 60 are married couples. If the integrity or respectability of tenants can be proved by the punctual payment of their rent, and the good order and cleanliness of their abodes, there is little more to be desired in those of the Pye Street model lodging-house. Greater cleanliness than pervaded the whole at the time of our unexpected visit we have rarely met with; and, on inquiry of the manager, we found there was not a tenant one week in arrears in rent. Yet the class from which they are taken may be better understood when we state that among the tenants we found twenty-six hawkers and costermongers, two grinders, four blind street-musicians, two cabmen, two chair-menders, one china-mender, six widowsmost of them charwomen, and the rest made up of persons in a similar grade of life. Pride and discontent might find many a useful lesson by visiting this establishment. We found two poor widows thankful for the mercy they received in having obtained full employment. One laboured from six in the morning till six at night, sifting cinders in a dust-yard in Paddington, for a wage of ten-pence a day; the other was in full work making skewers for butchers at seven-pence halfpenny a thousand. Not the slightest surveillance or espionage is kept over these poor people, the regulations of the lodging-house, which they are bound to obey, being merely such as are necessary for their mutual comfort. In such high reputation is the establishment held that every room in it was occupied twenty-four hours after it was opened; and applications sufficient to have filled a building ten times the size are on the books from persons waiting for admission.

In the club and dwelling house, several collateral societies have been formed. A loan society has been established among them—the operations of which now amount to a sum of considerable magnitude, no less than 328l. 18s. having passed through Miss Cooper's hands in the course of the last year. There is also a temperance Sick Benefit Society, which is in favour among the teetotallers; and a barrow club, by which members, through paying up small weekly subscriptions, may in time become the freeholders of good substantial barrows. Within the last two years no fewer than fifteen barrows have been bought and paid for in this mauner. The penny bank is also a flourishing institution, there being no fewer than 1,110 deposits.

No one can with justice dispute the fact that Miss Cooper has worked out her problem in a most satisfactory manner. She has proved that the poorest and most neglected are capable of becoming as respectable and well conducted as any other class of society; that the street hawker, the costermonger, the charwoman, the crossing-sweeper, and the cinder-sifter have all elements of good among them easily capable of development, if they are taken by the hand, and instructed with judgment and discretion. All the ministers of religion in the vicinity of her labours speak of her with respect and affection. Miss Cooper has further added another proof how powerful is judicious female agency in all well-matured religious and social undertakings. She has set an example well worthy of imitation; let us hope that the lesson will not be lost on those who have the welfare of their poorer fellow citizens at heart, and are possessed of the ability to further it.

RUTH THORNBURY; OR, THE OLD MAID'S STORY.

By WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis," &c.

CHAPTER XII.

MR. MORECOMBE IN HIS TRUE CHARACTER.

The demeanour of the two sisters at the breakfast table next morning, presented, in more ways than one, a singular contrast. Charity, naturally cheerful and lively, was now completely broken in spirit. She tasted nothing, and beyond paying attention to the immediate wants of the children, seemed incapable of the slightest exertion, either of mind or body. Ruth, on the contrary, ordinarily mild and staid, now appeared the very embodiment of determination and energy. If she did not eat with appetite, she at least did so as a duty, that she might thus obtain physical support for the labours she was about to undertake.

Little conversation passed between the sisters during their meal. Sorrow seemed to have thrown a lethargic influence over Charity, and Ruth was too busy with her own thoughts to keep up a conversation; besides, on what subject could she have conversed unless some very unpleasant one? She could say nothing to Charity respecting the inquiries made the day before, that would not rather tend to increase her sorrow than allay it. As for Ruth, such a thought as submission to the adverse circumstances surrounding them, did not for one moment enter her mind. To nothing would she succumb, except the positive certainty that her efforts were useless.

Breakfast over, Ruth left the room to prepare for her visit to the prison; but it was not until she was on the point of leaving the house, that Charity inquired where she was going.

Ruth hesitated for a moment, and then she answered, firmly, "I am going to see Mr. Morecombe, dear, and to try if possible to obtain from him a true statement of his case, so that we may know how it really stands. Surely he is not so great a villain as circumstances, at the present moment, paint him."

"Pray God you may be right," said Charity; "but I am afraid he will be very angry when he sees you."

"I do not fear his anger," said Ruth, "nor have I the slightest reason to dread it."

"Ruth," said Charity, her eyes filling with tears, "pray return as soon as you have seen him, and let me know all that takes place. It is better to know the worst than to be thus in doubt."

Ruth now left the house, and hiring a cab, drove to the prison. It might have been expected that as she neared it she would feel anxious as to the result of her interview with Mr. Morecombe. This, however, was far from being the case. She was one of those beings who are retiring and timid in the extreme when there are no especial circumstances to call out their energies, but who become cool and determined in proportion to the difficulties they have to encounter. When she had dismissed the driver, she made her application at the prison-gate without the least perturbation. An officer was sent with her to the cell in which Mr. Morecombe was. He was leisurely looking over some documents he had in his hand. He started up when he saw her.

"What, Ruth!" he said in a jaunty tone of voice; "is that you? You have come to have your revenge, I suppose. You are rather early though, I am not yet tried, and there is many a slip between the cup and the lip, as I dare say you have heard before."

"If you imagine, Mr. Morecombe, that I came here with any intention of the kind, you do me an injustice," said Ruth. "The object of my visit is to ascertain from you, not only for my sister's sake, but also for the sake of the rest of her family, whether the accusation which has been made against you is well-founded; and also to know in what position my poor father now is relative to the business transactions which have taken place between you. At present he is not aware of what has occurred, and I wish, when I write to him, to explain the exact position he is in."

"As to your first question, Ruth," he answered, in an off-hand manner, "I must decline entering into particulars, especially in the presence of my friend here," pointing to the officer, who had remained with them; "for information on the subject

I must refer you to the newspapers, in which, I have no doubt, you will find a full, true, and particular account of all that has taken place in connection with that somewhat unpleasant affair. As to—"

"But you surely don't mean to say that you do not deny the charge?" said Ruth, interrupting him.

"I hardly see of what use it would be if I did; but do not interrupt me until I have done. With respect to my transactions with your father, I am not certain that my arrest is any very great misfortune to him, seeing that at present we are not in debt, let me say, to more than a thousand pounds or so beyond our assets, which might not have been the case had I remained longer at liberty. You see I am frank with you," he continued, and burst into a forced laugh on noticing Ruth's expression of countenance. "Better, my girl, to know the worst at first, than find things different from what you expected afterwards."

"You surely do not mean to say that circumstances are really so bad?" said Ruth, now terribly alarmed for her father.

"It is a fact, I assure you," he answered coolly. Ruth remained silent for some moments, and then addressed him in an imploring tone:

"But, Mr. Morecombe, give me some word of consolation—something with some hope in it. You lead me to suppose that the terrible accusation against you is true; and you follow it up by showing, not only that my poor sister and her children are beggars, but that my old father is also ruined. I can support much, but all this weighs me down," said Ruth, bursting into tears.

"I cannot help it, Ruth," Mr. Morecombe answered coolly; "facts are facts, though unpleasant."

"To think," continued Ruth, "of my poor sister turned into the streets with her helpless children two days since, without a friend in the world, and that the ruin and disgrace you have brought upon my poor father will probably bring down his grey hairs in sorrow to the grave, is more than I can bear."

Here she sank upon the seat which had been occupied by Mr. Morecombe, and, leaning her head upon the table, wept bitterly.

"I am sorry for your father, I confess," said Mr. Morecombe; "he is a good fellow, if not particularly bright: but as for your sister, I suspect she is not without her consolation. If she is poor, she has at any rate got rid of a husband she detests, although there is not perhaps much love lost between us. If I have been a bad husband—which I know you to believe me to have been—I have not been much more fortunate in a wife."

At the commencement of this remark Ruth raised her head from the table, and when it was completed she sat erect and regarded Mr. Morecombe with a look of defiance, such as those who knew her on ordinary occasions would hardly have thought her capable of showing.

"How dare you speak of my sister in that manner!" she said in a tone of deep indignation.

"What right have you to speak of her so disrespectfully, I say! She has been a good wife to you—a thousand times better than you deserved."

"Come, come, Ruth," said Mr. Morecombe, "do not talk to me in that manner, or I will answer you in the same tone. I can assure you my tongue is as well hung as yours, woman though you be."

"I care not," said Ruth; "say what you please. You cannot, with the slightest pretence of truth, say anything against my poor sister. You have behaved most infamously to her."

"Take care, Ruth."

"You were received by us with friendship and confidence. My father gave you his darling child, and became poor to make you rich and happy. And what is the return you have made us! The ruin you have brought on us all is nothing in comparison with the disgrace you have covered us with."

"I have at any rate given you an opportunity of showing your care and solicitude for your family, Ruth," answered Mr. Morecombe with a sneer.

"What have my sister and her children to depend on now," continued Ruth, without noticing his remark, "save the sympathy of those whom your villany has ruined?"

"Come, come," said Mr. Morecombe in the same bantering tone, "do me justice at any rate; whatever my failings may have been, I have made restitution, and that ought to go a great way in obtaining forgiveness. If, as you say, I unlawfully took your sister from her home, I have returned her to it again, without the impediment of a husband to interfere with any future alliance she may wish to make."

This cruel remark had a singular effect upon Ruth; it seemed entirely to change her nature. Her eyes glared upon him with the expression of an enraged tigress; she spasmodically clenched her hands, and, advancing a step, hissed at him through her closed teeth.

"You villain! you coward! Oh! how I wish I were a man, that I might kill you!"—and, as if to give greater emphasis to her words, she struck the table before her with such strength that her glove burst, and the blood oozed through the abrased skin of her knuckles.

At this the wretch remarked with a sneer, "Why, Ruth, what a hypocrite you must be! I had no idea you were such a termagant."

What Ruth would have now done in her rage it is impossible to say, but any further demonstration was put a stop to by the officer advancing to her, and saying in a kind tone:

"Come, come, good soul, don't take on so: you had better leave him; you will do no good, for he is a thorough blackguard. Do come away."

"I think, sir," said Mr. Morecombe, "you had better mind your own business. I am not shut up here to be the butt of your low-bred impertinenca."

"I shall say what I please," said the officer, much irritated. "She called you a coward, and it is true; you may tell any one you please that I say so. Come now," he continued, addressing Ruth with considerable feeling, "let the fellow alone; the gallows is too good for him."

The officer then conducted Ruth to the lodge, and having seated her in a chair, procured a glass of water for her. "Take my advice," he said, "and do not trouble yourself any more about that fellow. He is a thoroughpaced bad one, and you will get no good out of him, you may take my word for it."

After remaining for a few minutes longer, Ruth thanked the warder for his kindness and left the prison. She now walked rapidly homewards in a very singular frame of mind.

As soon as Ruth had entered the room at her lodging, a change came over her. She had controlled her feelings on her way home, but when she arrived there, they completely overcame her. She attempted to address Charity, but could not utter a word. She raised her hands and moved them as if to give force to the words she wished to utter; and her lips moved as if speaking, but not a syllable escaped from them. At last her features relaxed, and throwing herself on her sister's neck, she gave vent to her grief in a passionate flood of tears.

Charity now led her to a seat, and taking Ruth's head in her hands, pressed it to her heart. In this position the sisters remained for some moments. Ruth's tears relieved her, and she spoke.

"There is no longer any hope, Charity; that bad man is guilty, and he has ruined my father."

"I felt sure of it, Ruth," said Charity, "but now what can we do? You cannot imagine the illtreatment and privation I and my children have endured at his hands. While I believed him to be my husband I kept his conduct concealed from all; but now it is over I may speak. me back with you, Ruth; in pity do. As soon as I am well enough I will endeavour to obtain a situation as governess in some family, so that I may be no expense to my father for the maintenance of my children. Pray take me with you, Ruth."

Ruth made no reply to her sister's request, but rising from her chair, gave her a kiss,-a thousand times more expressive than any words would have been. They now remained for some minutes silent, Ruth meanwhile walking about the room, a habit with her when she was thinking deeply. At last she stopped, and wiping away the half-dried tears from her face, she addressed Charity with such a calm in her tone and manner, as singularly contrasted with her late agitation.

"Charity," she said, "we must now determine what course we are to pursue; we cannot leave London for some days. To return home abruptly and unexpectedly would be too great a shock to my poor father and mother; indeed, to my father it might be fatal. I will write to him by to-night's post, and give him some idea of the trouble we are in. To-morrow I will send him another letter, explaining things more clearly; and the day after a third, telling him all, and that he may expect us the following day. Get me a sheet of paper, dear; I will write at once."

Charity immediately did as her sister desired, and Ruth sat down at the table to write.

"My dear Ruth," said Charity, noticing the wounded condition of her sister's hand, "what is the matter-have you hurt yourself?"

"I have merely bruised myself a little," said Ruth, colouring slightly, "but it is of no importance." And then coolly and without the slightest difficulty she commenced her letter. When she had finished it, she read it over to her sister; and so perfect had been her self-possession that it was found quite correct. She stated that Mr. Morecombe was in great difficulties, and regretted to say there were reports respecting him which bore a most unhappy appearance. She went on to sav she had found Charity in a humble lodging, and in great poverty; but that she had since removed her into a respectable house, and done all in her power to make her comfortable. She concluded by saying that she would write again next day, and give them more particulars; but at the same time she implored them to expect no good news.

Next morning, as soon as breakfast was over. Ruth wrote a second letter to her father and mother; and hastily completing it, she left the house, telling Charity that she would return about the middle of the day. After posting her letter, she went to the office of Mr. Willoughby, her father's solicitor. She explained to him all that had taken place the previous day. She told him that without doubt he would shortly hear from her father; and implored him to give the case, which would be put into his hands, the most careful consideration. Mr. Willoughby, with much feeling, assured her that he would look after her father's interest with every solicitude.

"I have for some time past feared you had fallen into the hands of a swindler," he said; "and I would willingly have put you on your guard against him, but, on mature consideration, I came to the conclusion that, as Mr. Thornbury had withdrawn his confidence from me, it would be unprofessional on my part to meddle with the matter."

After Ruth had left the solicitor, she went to the coach-office to ascertain what places were vacant on the day she had fixed for leaving London, and finding there was room for them all, she secured seats, and then returned home to her sister. In the afternoon of the same day, Ruth took her two little nephews out for a walk, and seizing the opportunity, she bought the children everything they required. Charity thus found her boys with a respectable outfit, when in the morning they had barely sufficient clothes to wear. She thanked her sister for her kindness, in terms as explicit as she could find, but the expression of her face better told her gratitude. Ruth did not go out again that day, but employed herself in the evening with writing her next day's letter to her father and mother. This she worded with great care. In the one she had despatched by that night's post, she informed her parents of the heavy suspicion that Mr. Morecombe had another wife living; and in the one she was now writing, she told them that the suspicion had turned out to be well founded, and that there was no possibility of a doubt as to Mr. Morecombe's guilt. His affairs, she also stated with equal certainty, were in the most deplorable condition; and it would require all her father's energy, assisted by the ability and tact of a clever solicitor, to separate his interests from those of his unworthy son-in-law. She concluded by saying that she intended to return home the next day with her sister and the children; and she especially begged that when they arrived Charity might be welcomed in such a way as should not be painful to her feelings. She knew perfectly well that she would receive every kindness, and she suggested, therefore, that her father and mother should, if possible, receive her in the same manner as they would have done had she joined them merely for the purpose of passing a few weeks with them on an ordinary visit. Having well impressed all these instructions on her parents, she concluded her letter by assuring them of the great happiness she anticipated in being with them again.

Ruth did not show this letter to her sister, but, after having folded and directed it, to be ready for the next day's post, she occupied herself in assisting Charity with some needle-work she was engaged with

The next morning, after breakfast, Ruth proposed that Charity should accompany her to make some purchases. As soon as she had left the house, Ruth told her sister that it would be most painful to her father and mother if she returned home so insufficiently provided with clothes, and for that reason she hoped Charity would accept them as a gift from her: and that was why she had requested her to leave the house, that they might obtain them. Charity, who was totally destitute, could only express her gratitude at her sister's liberality; and they now visited shop after shop in search of the various articles they required. Ruth, as has already been stated, had an intense admiration of her sister's beauty, and the beneficial change the new dress made in her appearance was most gratifying to the kind-hearted donor. She looked at her sister with great satisfaction, and was infinitely more pleased with the effect produced than Charity was herself. Ruth also bought many necessary things, which were to be made up when they returned home. The remainder of the day was spent in packing and making preparations for the journey, and early the next morning they left London for the Red House.

As Mr. Morecombe will not again appear in our narrative, we may mention that he was found guilty, and sentenced to a long imprisonment.

CHAPTER XIII. - CHARITY'S RETURN HOME.

Nothing worthy of particular notice occurred to Ruth or her charge on their homeward journey, and they arrived safely at X-, where they hired a chaise to take them on to the Red House. The children were fatigued and sleepy, while their mother and aunt were absorbed in their own reflections. Charity, as was to be expected, was much depressed; and the idea of having to return home to her parents with her two boys, who were no longer allowed to bear their unworthy father's name, weighed terribly upon her spirits. Ruth's feelings were of a somewhat different description-less painful, perhaps, but hardly less anxious. She greatly feared that, in spite of all her warnings, her parents' sorrow at their unfortunate child's return would show itself in a way which might be injurious to Charity. This feeling increased the nearer they approached home, and at last it became so painful that Ruth felt it a relief when the chaise drew up at the door of the house. Mrs. Thornbury said nothing, but, flinging her arms round Charity's neck, kissed her affectionately. Mr. Thornbury had evidently determined to carry out Ruth's advice, and advauced towards his daughter, saying in a tone which he intended to be one of open-hearted pleasure :-

"Charity, my dear, welcome home again, welcome home ——"

Here he stopped, utterly incapable of proceeding further. He flung himself into a chair, and, covering his face with his hands, wept like a child. Mrs. Thornbury, seeing the condition of her husband, quitted her embrace of Charity, and all advanced towards him, for the purpose of consoling him. He still continued to sob, when Deborah, who was standing by, said to him with much solemnity, "Be not ungrateful to God, for He hath restored to thee thy good child. Do not sorrow, but thank the Lord for his mercy."

"Deborah is right," said Ruth, "the God who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, has been equally good to Charity. He has given her back to us to cherish, and so let us cheerfully obey his command. He will not desert those who fear and love Him."

These remarks acted powerfully in calming the sorrow of Mr. Thornbury, who now rose from his seat, and tenderly embraced Charity. The children, who had been standing by in mute astonishment, were now brought forward, and kindly treated by all. Calm was soon established, and a degree of happiness now reigned in the family circle, completely shutting out the thought of the late events which had brought them together. After Ruth and Deborah had put the children to bed, the family again met, and the remainder of the evening was passed in prayer and supplication to the Almighty, to assist them in the strait they were in.

Next morning, Ruth was closeted for some time with her father. She related to him clearly and fully all that had taken place during her absence, and the state their affairs were in, as well as she had been able to ascertain them.

"Ruth," said Mr. Thornbury, quite aghast at the account; "what am I to do? I am a ruined man. All I have in the world is not sufficient to cover the amount owing; or, at any rate, if I am able to pay it, I shall not have a shilling left: I must even mortgage my life interest in the house, and the little land surrounding it."

"Do not despair, father," said Ruth, "there may be still something left; enough for us to live upon, with strict economy. In the first place, we must disniss our servants, and wait on ourselves; that, after all, will be no great hardship. Remember, those who have courage to appear poor, deprive poverty of half its sting. When Charity's confinement is over, I propose to sell out my five-hundred pounds of stock, and with that we will start a school together. I think this is the best thing we can do. I do not see why she and I should not succeed. We have as much ability and energy as others; at any rate, no good can be done by desponding. You had better write by to-night's post to Mr. Willoughby, and place your affairs in his hands."

"I will do as you say, Ruth," he replied; "when God has bestowed on me a child so good as you are, it would be sinful, indeed, in me to despair."

Mr. Thornbury despatched a letter to his solicitor by that day's post, giving him a detailed account of the business transactions he had entered into with his unworthy partner, and requesting his best attention to the ease. Ruth, on her side, persuaded her mother to dismiss all the servants, with the exception of Deborah and a young girl. Everything was now put on the most economical footing possible, without anything being settled as to their ultimate method of living, as that would of course greatly depend on the manner in which Mr. Willoughby managed to wind up the partnership affair.

About this time, Ruth received a second letter from her brother Edgar. He was still a junior clerk in an indigo house, without, at that moment, any promise of a rise in salary. He was then in a doubt whether he would not quit the firm with whom he was engaged, and seek for another situation. He could, he said, obtain one at a higher salary without any difficulty, but the merchant who made him the offer was in a very small way of business, and there would consequently be slight chance of advancement; whereas, in the firm with which he then was, there were several clerks, and more than one of them were in receipt of good salaries, and in case of the death of either of them, or of their getting other employment, he would assuredly have the preference for the vacant post. How he should decide, he could not at that moment saythe probabilities were, in fact, about equally balauced; though he would soon have to make up his mind, as the other clerkship might be filled up, leaving him no alternative but to stay where he was.

Ruth answered this letter by the first post. She informed her brother of the terrible calamity which had overwhelmed the family, and the villany of Mr. Morecombe. The future, she said, seemed gloomy indeed; but still she did not despair. If nothing better offered, she and Charity had determined on keeping a school, and, with the blessing of God, she felt sure they would succeed.

The time was now fast approaching for Charity's accouchement, and the nearer it came, the greater was the anxiety of her family: so debilitated had she become from the severe shock she had received. She seemed, however, to entertain no fears on her own account, but looked forward with pleasure to the time when she should be sufficiently recovered to help her sister in keeping the school.

Charity did not get over her confinement very easily, -in fact she was in great danger; and the infant (a girl) was so delicate, that there did not appear to any but its mother the slightest probability of its living. The time passed, but Charity gained uo strength, and the doctor began to be very concerned about his patient. Ruth, with all her intense love for her sister, and her willingness to elose her eyes to the real state of the ease, could not conceal from herself that Charity was in a very dangerous condition. It was exceedingly beautiful to see the affection and unremitting attention she showed her. She seemed to be no longer susceptible to fatigue, for night and day she was at the bedside. She was in every respect an admirable nurse; had she even been trained for the sick room, it was hardly possible she could have been better. tremely patient, tender, and watchful, as well as quiet in her movements, she seemed to anticipate each wish of the invalid, while every word she spoke was uttered in a voice so soft and sweet, that it seemed to have a curative power of its own.

Though now visibly sinking, Charity herself had no idea of the danger she was in. She would have her boys beside her, and would converse with them for hours. For their amusement, she would build for them castles in the air, and they would talk of what they would all accomplish as soon as she was well enough to leave her bed. Ruth had not the courage to inform her of her great danger, much as she wished to speak of it to her.

A circumstance, however, occurred which, while it relieved Ruth's embarrassment as to whether Charity ought to be informed of her danger, and the necessity of preparing for the speedy death that too certainly awaited her, at the same time caused her great sorrow. One evening Ruth had, as usual, taken up her position beside her sister's bed; as night advanced Charity fell into a profound slumber, and Ruth resolved to lie down, for a little time, dressed as she was, in the next room, leaving the door of communication open, so that she might hear if her sister awoke and required any assistance. At first she felt little inclination to sleep, and this was still further lessened by the bright beams of the full moon, which shone in through the windows.

Gradually she fell into a doze, which might have lasted for a couple of hours. She then suddenly awoke, and saw some one standing by her bedside. The figure seemed to be dressed in a robe of white, which became the more distinct from the clear rays of the moon falling on it. So peculiar was the effect produced, that the form appeared almost ethereal, and conveyed to Ruth's scarcely awakened perception the idea that it was an angel standing by her side. A momentary feeling of awe came over her, which was broken by the sound of Charity's voice.

"Are you sleeping, dear Ruth?" she said.

"Charity," said Ruth, having now fully regained her self-possession, "is that you? How imprudent it is of you to leave your room; pray go back again, or you may suffer for it."

"Ruth," Charity went on, making no answer to the remark, but seating herself on her sister's bed, "I wish particularly to speak to you. Do not be alarmed, dear, but I have this night received a message from the Almighty, telling me that I am to die; and that the poor baby will be taken before me. Better so," she continued, her voice faltering with emotion: "we shall soon meet again."

"Charity," said Ruth, greatly astonished, "you must have been dreaming.

"It was no dream," she said solemnly.

Ruth now sat up on her bed, and passing her arm round her sister's waist, said calmly, "Collect yourself, Charity dear, and tell me what has occurred."

"I cannot explain it, Ruth, but I received the message as I tell it to you."

"But were you not asleep and dreaming?"

"Certainly not; I was perfectly awake. I had been asleep, but did not dream."

"Tell me, how was the message conveyed to you?" inquired Ruth, a sensation of awe pervading her at the time, "tell me who spoke to you?"

"No one," said Charity, "no one uttered a word to me. I awoke from my sleep and looked around to see if you were near me, but I found that you had left the room. Thinking you had gone to lie down, I determined not to disturb you, but partly raised myself up in bed to see if baby was comfortable in her cot. I mention this to show you how perfectly I was awake. Finding baby was asleep, I placed my head back on the pillow to wait till you came into the room. A moment afterwards I experienced (for I can only explain it in that manner) a certainty that baby would die, and that I should shortly follow her."

"But my dear, that was only your imagination."

"Indeed, Ruth, you are in error: it was a message from heaven, I assure you, conveyed to me in a manner clearer than any voice could have conveyed it. Ruth, I shall die; and I am perfectly resigned. Nothing can save me, nor would I wish it otherwise,—uay, more, I should have received the message with a welcome, had it not been for these help-less once I must leave behind me. Ruth," she continued, taking her sister's hand, "make me a promise that you will take my place as a mother to my poor little boys."

"Charity," said Ruth, with something like reproach in her tone, "how can you imagine it necessary to ask a promise of the kind? Had they been my own children, they could not be dearer to me than they are, and always will be."

"Pardon me, dear Ruth," said Charity, "pardon me; I do not in my heart for one moment doubt you. Had I thought for one instant, I need not have asked you. Now I shall die happy."

The conversation between the two sisters, which continued for some time longer, was at length broken by the low faint cry of the infant. They went directly to its assistance, and Ruth remained with her sister for the rest of the night.

The next day, at Charity's desire, Ruth called on the vicar, and requested that he would visit them at the Red House, for the purpose of baptizing the infant, and administering the sacrament to her sister. This gentleman demurred for some time—civilly enough, it is true—to accede to her request. He pleaded the great extent of his parish, its onerous duties, the great distance between his house and hers. He inquired particularly into the state of her sister's health, and whether it would not be possible for her to attend at the church, which was about equidistant from both houses.

Ruth informed him, that both her sister and the infant were far too ill to be taken from home; that their case, in fact, was such that a day's delay might bring the death of either. Finding the case so urgent, he promised to call next day; and Ruth returned home to apprise her parents and her sister of the result of her mission. According to promise, the vicar called at the Red House on the morrow. He baptised the infant, and administered the sacrament to Charity, but all this was done in a manner so cold and formal, as to convey as much pain as comfort.

The following day the baby died. Mr. Thornbury, Ruth, and Deborah, (who now stood on terms of perfect equality with the family,) attended the funeral; Mrs. Thornbury remaining at home with the invalid. The service was read by the vicar in so careless a manner, as to excite great sorrow in the mind of both Mr. Thornbury and Ruth; while Deborah was positively so indignant at his want of feeling, that she expressed herself strongly on the subject. When they returned home, and Mrs. Thornbury had joined Ruth and Deborah, the latter said, "I hope that worldly hard-hearted man will not come here again."

"But, Deborah," said Ruth, "you must consider that we cannot do without him. My sister ought to have the services of a minister of religion in her present condition."

"And are we not all ministers of religion?" said the old Quakeress, with some indignation. "Are we women not as capable of praying and addressing the Almighty as cold hard-hearted men like that?

Where do we find in the Holy Scriptures that a woman cannot minister? Are there not in the Bible," she continued, "many proofs to the contrary? Who were Miriam, and Huldah, and Deborah? What was Anna but a prophetess of the Jewish Church ?-did she not publicly proclaim in the Temple the birth of the Messiah? Were not women the first witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, and were they not commissioned by Him to proclaim it to His disciples? At His ascension, were they not equally with men partakers of the Holy Spirit? Are they not spoken of as fellowlabourers with the Apostles? Does not Luke speak of the four daughters of Philip the deacon, 'who did prophesy'? Did not Paul say 'I commend unto you Phæbe, our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea. . . Greet Priscilla and Aquila, my helpers in Christ Jesus. . . Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord.'-Rom. xvi. 1, 3, 12. And again, in Phil. iv. 3, 'Help those women which laboured with me in the gospel.' Are not these proofs that women are able to do without the ministrations of that cold time-serving man? Thy father, Ruth, may be too sorrowful to minister to thy sister and give her comfort, and thy mother hath not strength enough; do thou then take upon thyself the duty of praying with thy sister, and be assured the God of mercy will hear thy voice."

Although somewhat doubtful of her own powers, Ruth determined to follow Deborah's counsel; and the family now met regularly morning and evening in Charity's room, for prayers. During the day-time, in the intervals of her nursing, Ruth also read portions of the Bible to her sister, in which she was occasionally assisted by Deborah.

Charity's weakness became daily more perceptible. As she became feebler, Ruth seemed almost to forget she was her twin sister, and tended her rather with the solicitude a mother shows to a dying child than to a woman of her own age. One day, when she was standing by her sister's bedside watching her, Charity, who was evidently deeply absorbed in thought at the time, had turned her head to the other side of the bed; and Ruth, fearing her sister's thoughts might be occupied on some painful subject, attempted to attract her gaze, by partially leaning over her. But in vain—Charity saw her not. Ruth waited for some moments, and then said in a sorrowful tone, and yet attempting to smile, "Look at me my pretty one, look at me."

Charity, turning her head towards her sister, said, "I will look at you Ruth with pleasure; for a sight of you is the only unmixed happiness that remains for me in this world. I will look at you with love, during the few short hours I have yet to live; and should it please the Almighty to pardon my sins and take me into His kingdom, my gaze shall still be on you—if it be permitted me—until we meet again there."

The solemnity with which Charity uttered these capabilities and dispositions, and the result gave words made a profound impression upon her sister, and they never afterwards faded from her memory. be both amiable and intelligent. As the morning

CHAPTER XIV. -RUTH'S MOTHERHOOD.

It would be needless to harrow the feelings of the reader with any further description of Charity's illness. She died, and was buried in the same grave with her infant.

The morning after the funeral, Ruth took her little nephews into the library, and, seating herself on a chair, placed the younger on her knee, who nestled close to her, while the elder stood at her side, leaning against her. For some moments Ruth was silent, nor did the children disturb her. She had that morning taken upon herself the duties of motherhood, and was imploring the Almighty to bless and strengthen her for the task. Her prayer over, she commenced the formation of a plan for future action. She determined, in the first place, that the children should be no expense to her father, as she could educate them herself, until they were old enough to go to school. The interest of her five hundred pounds in the Funds would, with great economy, suffice for some years for their dress and her own; and she would persuade her mother to keep only Deborah, dismissing the other servant, who, being a clever active girl, would have no difficulty in obtaining another situation. This was necessary, for all that Mr. Thornbury now had was two or three hundred pounds in ready money. To raise sufficient money for the payment of his debts, he had been obliged to mortgage his trifling interest iu the Red House to its full value; the fields being let out to a neighbouring farmer, in order to get enough to pay the interest. The only asset of any importance remaining to him besides this was the family plate, which was massive, and of considerable value. Nor had he the power to increase his income by any exertion of his own; indeed, his mind appeared to be failing him, and he had no energy.

As soon as Ruth had laid out her plans for the future, she began to converse with her little nephews. With the garrulity and candour of children, they readily answered all her questions. Ruth now drew from them what amount of education they had received. They told her that poor mamma had taught the elder to read, and the younger his letters: the former had also began to write, and could even work a simple sum in addition. It is needless to say that she found them as well acquainted with the elements of the Christian religion as could be expected from their extreme youth—their infantile prayers being repeated to her with great correctness. As Ruth had always been employed in her sister's sick-room, the care of the children, and the hearing of their prayers, night and morning, had been undertaken by Mrs. Thornbury and Deborah, so that their proficiency, coming by surprise, as it did, on Ruth, pleased her greatly. She now conversed with them on other matters, with the intention of finding out their natural capabilities and dispositions, and the result gave her great satisfaction, as it proved the children to was fine, she took them round the grounds, and explained the different objects they saw, all of which were matters of great interest to them—the more that they were totally ignorant of anything connected with country life, never having once been out of London since their mamma went to reside there. At last, fatigued with their walk, Ruth returned with them to the house, resolving next day to commence her duties as governess.

Ruth's resolution to practise economy in all things was now, of course, a matter of absolute necessity, for she persevered in her determination never to allow the children to occasion the slightest expense to her father. Her liberality to Charity and the children before leaving London, and the expenses of the journey-all of which she had defrayed out of her own pocket-had consumed her savings, and left her almost penniless, until the time her next dividend should become due. She now searched among her old school-books for some elementary works, to avoid purchasing new ones, and she succeeded in finding all that were necessary. She established herself in the library (which she had taken possession of for a school-room), and every morning, from nine o'clock till twelve, she devoted exclusively to the education of her nephews. Never had children a more amiable and patient instructress than Ruth proved to them.

In this way five years passed quietly over, nothing very special taking place. During that time, Mr. Thornbury's mental and bodily health had greatly sunk, so that he was now almost an imbecile. Mrs. Thornbury's health also was now too infirm to allow of her taking any active part in tending her husband; but, as soon as Ruth and Deborah had dressed him in the morning, he was brought down-stairs and, in the winter, seated in an easy-chair beside the fire, and at the window in summer, where he remained till it was time for him to be taken to bed again. Here Ruth proved herself as good a daughter as she had been a sister, and, as her bodily strength was greater than Deborah's, she performed the most fatiguing portions of the duties required by her father.

Ruth occasionally heard from Edgar. He had quitted the firm with which he had been at first engaged, and had entered the service of the one which he contemplated doing when he wrote the last letter. The sole proprietor of the business had become very infirm, and in consequence a great portion of the responsibility had fallen upon Edgar, and he was pleased to say their transactions had greatly increased since they had been under his management. His salary had in consequence been raised, though not to any very large extent. His prospects were now much brighter, though as yet he remained a clerk. As a proof of the genuineness of the affection he expressed for his family, he enclosed in one letter a bill of exchange for fifty pounds, as a present to his mother; and in the last letter Ruth had received there was not only another hundred pounds for his mother, but a request that when Charity's children were old enough to start in the world, Ruth would send them to him, as his footing in India was now sufficiently well established to procure them appointments without any difficulty.

The money which Edgar's letter contained came most opportunely, for so low had Mr. Thornbury's finances fallen that on more than one occasion the question had been seriously entertained whether it would not be advisable to dispose of the family plate. Mrs. Thornbury offered Ruth a portion of the money she had received from her son, to assist with the children; but this Ruth would not hear of. She had resolved that Charity's children should be hers, and hers alone, and had so attended to them that her conscience might be perfectly clear as to her promise to her sister. Hitherto, by great tact and economy, she had succeeded in making the interest of her five hundred pounds cover all current expenses, though to accomplish this she had occasionally been put to great shifts.

But Ruth's hard duties were accompanied with the pleasure arising from success. Better or more tractable children no teacher ever had. She managed them admirably; and it was almost impossible boys could have been under better control. Nor was this the result of any severity on Ruth's part; on the contrary, no one could have been more indulgent. She appeared peculiarly adapted for the management of children. While she exacted from them implicit obedience, she was never known to use towards them a harsh expression. She ruled by kindness alone; and in return she received, not only submission, but love. They were also extremely intelligent, and learnt rapidly.

When the elder boy was between thirteen and fourteen years of age, she was obliged to admit that she could not keep him any louger from school without prejudice to him. She now looked around her for some establishment to which she could send him, with profit to himself, but without drawing too heavily on her very limited resources. It was a matter of no little difficulty with her to come to a conclusion on this point. At last, on the recommendation of a young curate, who now performed the principal duties of the parish, she fixed upon a small school about thirty miles distant, kept by the parish clergyman, who, to eke out a very limited income, had taken six pupils into his house. His terms were exceedingly moderate, being forty pounds a-year, including all expenses. He was a man of great learning, and admirably adapted, from his genial, patient, and kindly mauners, to impart a sound education to the lads under his care.

Ruth now felt that her nephew would entail on her far heavier expenses than he had hitherto done. In order to meet this she, without the slightest hesitation, made the first break in her capital, and sold out stock to the amount of a hundred pounds. With this she purchased for him such an outfit as no gentleman's son of moderate means need have been ashamed of, and also made him an ample allowance for pocket-money. When all the arrangements were completed, she herself conducted him to the school, and placed him under the care of the master.

During the next two years all passed off satisfactorily enough. No improvement, however, was perceptible in the state of Mr. Thornbury's mind, while his bodily health had become much feebler. The reports Ruth continued to hear from the schoolmaster of the progress of her nephew were of a most pleasing description. He was intelligent, studious, and obedient, and in every way gave promise of becoming a good and clever man. The younger boy had improved so much under her own tuition that she determined to place him also at the same school. To do this, she had again to break in upon her capital. The money she had sold out was now totally expended on the elder boy's education, and she was under the necessity of drawing a similar sum for the other. His outfit was purchased on the same liberal scale, and at the conclusion of the Christmas vacation Ruth conducted them both to school, with the satisfaction of knowing that she had now completed her duties as their instructress in a conscientious manner, so far as her ability would allow.

Two years after the younger boy had been placed at school, Ruth lost her father. The children had been spending the Christmas vacation at home, and Ruth had determined on taking them back to school kerself, as she wished to visit London afterwards in order to sell out the remainder of her stock. The last time she saw her father alive was at the moment of her leaving home. He was then seated in an easy chair by the fire, and she attempted to make him understand that she and the boys wished to bid him adieu. He was, however, incapable of comprehending her, so she kissed him herself, while the boys shook his unresisting hand without his understanding the movement. He died the same evening, and it was only the day before his interment that Ruth returned home, without having heard a word in the interim of his death. This change was naturally a great shock to her, but ere long she recovered from it; and when she was capable of reflecting on the subject, she could not disguise from herself the fact that her father's life had for some years past only been a burden to him, incapacitated as he was both in mind and body for the slightest enjoyment. Fortunately about a month prior to his death Mrs. Thornbury had received from Edgar a present of a hundred pounds, which relieved them under the expenses attendant on Mr. Thornbury's funeral.

Ruth communicated to her brother the news of her father's death. She reminded him in the letter, that the Red House was now his, and stated the condition in which it was, as well as the land. Her father, she said, had left some debts which, from respect to his memory, ought to be paid. Even if they succeeded in obtaining another tenant for the land surrounding the house, it would absorb the whole of the rent for some years, and she requested Edgar to answer her letter by return of post, informing her what steps he wished her to take in the matter, as her mother was incapable of attending to business. It was ten months before Ruth received any answer from Edgar. He told her in his letter that he would leave the Red House in his mother's hands, and that during her lifetime she should enjoy any advantage she might be able to obtain from it; he also forwarded, as a present, a bill for two hundred pounds. With regard to his own affairs, he informed her that. although his income was still far from being large, his prospects were by no means unpromising. was still the head clerk in the office, and had the entire management of the business. In speaking of his nephews, he again repeated his offer to assist them; and he advised Ruth to send them to him as soon as they were capable of leaving school, and he would engage to take every care of them, and find them employment. He concluded his letter by saying, that it was very probable Ruth might soon hear of his being married; but that matters, as yet, were not sufficiently advanced for him to enter into particulars ou the subject.

On receipt of her brother's letter, Ruth resolved on sending her eldest nephew to India. He was now a fine, well-grown, resolute lad, well adapted to make his way in the world. She immediately informed him of her intentions, and he received the news with great pleasure. She went with him to London, purchased his outfit, and secured a passage for him on board an East Indiaman. She made him a present of a Bible and watch, both of which she requested him to keep in remembrance of her; and it may be added that she wept bitterly at parting from him. She remained in town till the ship sailed; and then returned home with a sorrowful heart, but with the conviction that she had now fully performed the one half of her promise to her sister.

Next year, Ruth was able to send out the younger boy, but to accomplish this she expended within a few pounds all she possessed in the world.

The boys being now provided for, Ruth remained at the Red House with her mother and Deborah. Their life was, in every respect, a most unsensational one: Deborah was naturally tacituru, unless when she had an opportunity of speaking upon some religious subject; and Mrs. Thornbury's health was too infirm to allow of her taking much interest in anything besides her own malady. was now a confirmed invalid, and the doctor's expenses for attending her-made a great hole in their small means. The family plate began to disappear piece by piece, to supply their necessities; for although Edgar sent his mother, from time to time, presents of money, they were not sufficient to cover their expenses-moderate as they were. He again spoke of his marriage, and this time informed them that the bride elect was the daughter of the principal of the house in which he was engaged. Her father, he said, would give nothing with her; and all the pecuniary advantage he would gain by the match at the time was, simply, that he could live in the same house with his father-in-law, who was exceedingly penurious, though imagined to be very wealthy.

The description Edgar gave of the behaviour of his nephews was satisfactory in the extreme. He had taken the elder into the house of which he had the management; and the younger was placed with a friend of his, who had a factory near them. He found them both steady, moral, and industrious youths; and he had not the slightest doubt of their future success.

Three years after the departure of the boys for India, Ruth lost her mother, who had been confined to her bed for some months. She had been rather querulous for some time, and insisted that the doctor did not understand her case, and was killing her by inches. One day she insisted upon rising, and was carried down-stairs. But if the difficulty of bringing her down-stairs had been great, that of taking her back again was still greater. More than once she almost fainted on the way up, and thankful indeed was her daughter when they had succeeded in placing her safely in bed again. For some time she remained perfectly quiet, as if fatigued, and at last fell asleep. So tranquil was her slumber, that after sitting by her mother's bed for some time, Ruth sought her own, which was placed in the same room. She was a light sleeper, and awoke several times in the night; but as her mother's rest seemed perfectly undisturbed, she soon fell asleep again. It was broad daylight before she arose, and she immediately went to the bedside of her mother, who appeared to be still in a quiet sleep. Noticing an unwonted pallor on her mother's face, she felt her hand, and found it was cold as marble. Terribly alarmed, she drew aside the bedclothes, which partially concealed her mother's face, and uttered a loud scream-Mrs. Thornbury was dead.

Deborah, alarmed by Ruth's cry, immediately threw on a few clothes, and ran to the sick-room. When she entered it, she looked to Ruth for an explanation, but finding her weeping bitterly, she turued to the bed, and saw, in a moment, that Mrs. Thornbury was dead. Deborah's behaviour on this occasion was remarkable, and offered a striking contrast to that of Ruth. The latter on seeing that her mother was no more, gave full vent to her grief; but in her own peculiar quiet way. She uttered not a sigh, nor a sob, but wept on. The old Quakeress, on the contrary, usually so undemonstrative, now flung herself on the dead body of her mistress and wept aloud, as one who would not be comforted. So great was her grief, that Ruth, even in her deep sorrow, tried to console her, but with no effect. With difficulty she removed her from the dead body, but her lamentations continued without abatement. With her dress in great disorder, her dishevelled grey hair hanging unrestrainedly about her face, and her eyes streaming with tears, she unceasingly paced to and fro in the room, wringing her hands the while, and uttering apparently at random—and certainly without sequence—such texts from Scripture as at the moment corresponded with her passing thoughts:—

"Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water, because of the destruction of the daughter of my people."

"Forsake me not, O Lord; O my God, be not Thou far from me."

"Mine eyes fail for Thy word, saying, When wilt thou comfort me?"

"Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me."

"We looked for peace, and no peace came; and for a time of health, and behold trouble,"

"Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not with any intermission."

"Though I speak, my grief is not assuaged, and though I forbear, what am I eased?"

"Mine heart panteth, my strength faileth me; as for the light of mine eye, it is also gone from me."

"Mine eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow."

For more than an hour the two women continued their grief unrestrainedly, each in her own peculiar mauner. At last, Ruth's attention was attracted by a loud knocking at the front door; she immediately descended to answer it, and found it was the doctor. In an instant he divined from Ruth's appearance what had taken place; he nevertheless entered the house, and accompanied her up-stairs. When he came into the room, Deborah took not the slightest notice of him, but continued her wailing unremittingly. The doctor, finding that the last sad offices of closing the eyes and hinding up the head of the dead person had not been performed, requested Ruth to bring him a handkerchief, and to assist him. As Ruth gently lifted up her mother's head from the bed, to allow the doctor to fix on the handkerchief more conveniently, she attracted Deborah's attention, who advancing towards them, and stretching her hands forward as if addressing the corpse, said,

"Very pleasant hast thou been unto me. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of woman. And, O how I loved thee, O how I loved thee! Rivers of water could not wash out my love."

The tone of unspeakable anguish in which Deborah uttered these words communicated itself to Ruth, who, utterly overcome, quitted her mother's head, and concealing her face in the pillow, gave way to a sorrow as loud as that of the Quakeress herself. Even the doctor, though a cool man of science, found his eyes fill with tears at the terrible sorrow of the two poor women as he continued his task alone. The next day, feeling for their desolate condition, he kindly called on them, to ask them if he could assist them in making any preparations for the funeral. Ruth thankfully profitted by his offer, telling him she would leave it entirely in his hands. Before leaving the house, he took an opportunity of speaking to Deborah alone, who, now dressed with her accustomed prim neatness, stood ready to open the door for him as he left the house. He told her, that although her sorrow for her deceased mistress did her great credit, still she ought to restrain it. It was her duty to console Miss Thornbury, who required great consolation, and not selfishly to indulge in her own grief. Deborah listened to him very demurely, and evidently admitted his reasoning to be valid; she pleaded, however, two words in extenuation of her conduct: "Jesus wept."

The funeral over, the minds of the two poor women became somewhat calmer, and they began to trace out plans for the future. The first thing Ruth did was to write a letter to her brother, informing him of his mother's death, and requesting his instructions as to what she was to do with the house, which was now his. She also explained the great poverty she was in, and asked him to assist her. She said that, with great economy, she and Deborah might contrive to exist till she received his reply; but after that time they would both be entirely destitute. She apologized for troubling him, but she had no other friends in the world to whom she could apply for assistance, and she should not have had the courage to write to him on the subject, had it not been for the love he had always shown her, and his great liberality to his father and mother.

The letter having been despatched, Ruth disposed of the remainder of the plate, which realised a considerable sum. With the proceeds she paid the doctor's bill, which was far heavier than she had contemplated. It is more than probable that the worthy doctor would have reduced the amount had he been aware of the real state of their finances, but Ruth, actuated by a pride some would call false, had not the courage to tell him. She also paid some other out-standing debts, and then reserved the balance for her own and Deborah's support, till she should receive her brother's reply. She and Deborah now fastened up the whole of the basement-floor of the house, and they then hired a carpenter to insert in the front door the small wicket of which we have spoken in our first chapter, and through this she and Deborah afterwards received their provisions, and answered the few persons who called at the house. They now made an arrangement with Mr. Carter, the keeper of the general shop in the village, to send his errandboy two or three times a-week for orders, and then finally shut themselves up in the house.

Nothing could be more monotonous than the lives these two women now led. They were almost as silent as spectres, scarcely any conversation passing between them. Deborah, always taciturn, as we have said, had become far more so since the death of her mistress: and she now passed her time, when not engaged in household duties, in reading her Bible, or in silent prayer. Things went on in this manner till Edgar's reply to Ruth's letter was due—when, to their great disappointment, none came. It was true they had calculated the time for its arrival somewhat too closely, but then their necessities led them into the error—they were almost starving.

One evening, Deborah had been reading her Bible, as she was invariably accustomed to do before retiring to bed, and when she had finished, instead of rising from her chair, she remained for some time leaning back with her eyes closed and her hands clasped on her lap, her lips moving the while as if in silent prayer. Suddenly she turned her head towards Ruth, and said,

"My dear, I can no longer remain quietly and see thee starve. I have just prayed to God to guide me, and I feel He has heard my prayer. Some of my relations in London may still be living, although I have not heard from them for years. I have as much good linen left as will pay my way to London, and I am determined to start off the moment God directs me to leave." So saying, she rose from her chair, and, without kissing Ruth, as was her wont, abruptly left the room.

Next morning when Ruth descended from her bed-room, she found the hall-door open. Greatly surprised as she was at this circumstance, she was still more so when, on entering the sitting-room, she found a piece of paper with something written on it, lying on Deborah's open Bible. It was a few lines written by the old Quakeress, stating that at day-break God had told her to leave; but that she had not the courage to say farewell to her mistress. She begged Ruth to be of good cheer, as she should, with the Divine permission, soon hear from her; that her own heart was stout, for, although a very old woman, she felt that the Almighty would direct and support her. Although Ruth had not the slightest suspicion of Deborah's intention to depart that morning, she hardly felt surprised at it. To say the truth, a singular apathy had taken possession of her, which increased with her bodily weakness, arising from protracted starvation. Her finances now dwindled down from pounds to shillings, and from shillings rapidly to pence; and, as each coin was changed, she reduced the amount of food she purchased, her weakness increasing the while as well as her apathy. She did not even feel surprised at the absence of all intelligence from her brother or Deborah. At last, having lived for more than a fortnight on a few penny rolls, she sunk from exhaustion, and would have died, had it not been for the providential discovery of her position by Giles the errand-boy.

It must not be imagined that nothing worthy of note took place in the Red House in the interim between the departure of Deborah and the discovery of Ruth by Giles. On the contrary, several incidents occurred well worthy of relating, but they will be better understood if deferred to a later chapter of our narrative.

MADONNA MARY.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART XI.

CHAPTER XLI.

WHEN Mary went away, she left the two ladies at the Cottage in a singular excitement and perplexity. They were tingling with the blows which they had themselves received, and yet at the same time they were hushed and put to shame, as it were, for any secondary pang they might be feeling, by the look in Mrs. Ochterlony's face, and by her sudden departure. Aunt Agatha, who knew of few mysteries in life, and thought that where neither sickness nor death was, nor any despairs of blighted love or disappointed hope, there could not be anything very serious to suffer, would have got over it, and set it down as one of Mary's ways, had she been by herself. But Winnie was not so easily satisfied; her mind was possessed by the thought, in which no doubt there was a considerable mingling of vanity, that her husband would strike her through her friends. It seemed as if he had done so now; Winnie did not know precisely what it was that Percival knew about her sister, but only that it was something discreditable, something that would bring Mary down from her pinnacle of honour and purity. And now he had done it, and driven Mrs. Ochterlony to despair; but what was it about Will? Or was Will a mere pretence on the part of the outraged and terrified woman to get away? Something she had known for years! This was the thought which had chiefly moved Winnie, going to her heart. She herself had lived a stormy life; she had done a great many things which she ought not to have done; she had never been absolutely wicked or false, nor forfeited her reputation; but she knew in her heart that her life had not been a fair and spotless life; and when she thought of its strivings, and impatience, and selfwill, and bitter discontent, and of the serenc course of existence which her sister had led in the quietness, her heart smote her. Perhaps it was for her sake that this blow, which Mary had known of for years, had at last descended upon her head. All the years of her own stormy career her sister had been living at Kirtell, doing no harm, doing good, serving God, bringing up her children, covering her sins, if she had sinned, with repentance and good deeds; and yet for Winnie's sake, for her petulauce, and fury, and hotheadedness, the angel (or was it the demon?) had lifted his fiery sword and driven Mary out of Paradise. All this moved Winnie strangely; and along with these were other thoughts—thoughts of her own strange miserable unprotectedness, with only Auut Agatha to stand between her and the world, while she still had a husband in the world, between whom and herself there stood no deadly shame nor fatal obstacle, and whose presence would shield her from all such intrusions as that she had just suffered from. He had sinued against her, but that a woman can forgive-and she had not sinned against him, not to such an extent as is unpardonable in a woman. Perhaps there might even be something in the fact that Winnie had found Kirtell and quiet not the medicine suited to her mind, and that even Mary's flight into the world had brought a tingling into her wings, a longing to mount into freer air, and rush back to her fate. Thus a host of contradictory feelings joined in one great flame of excitement, which rose higher and higher all through the night. To fly forth upon him, and controvert his wicked plans, and save the sister who was being sacrificed for her sake; and yet to take possession of him back again, and set him up before her, her shield and buckler against the world; and at the same time to get out and break loose from this flowery cage, and rush back into the big world, where there would be air and space to move in-such were Winnie's thoughts. In the morning, when she came down-stairs, which was an hour earlier than usual, to Aunt Agatha's great amazement, she wore her travelling dress, and had an air of life and movement in her, which startled Miss Seton, and which, since her return to Kirtell, had never been seen in Winnie's looks before.

"It is very kind of you to come down, Winnie, my darling, when you knew I was alone," said Aunt Agatha, giving her a tender embrace.

"I don't think it is kind in me," said Winnie; and then she sat down, and took her sister's office upon her, to Miss Seton's still greater bewilderment, and made the tea, without quite knowing what she was doing. "I suppose Mary has been travelling all night," she said; "I am going in to Carlisle, Aunt Agatha, to that woman, to know what it is all about."

"Oh, my darling, you were always so generous," cried Aunt Agatha, in amaze; "but you must not do it. She might say things to you, or you might meet people——"

"If I did meet people, I hope I know how to take care of myself," said Winnie; and that flush came to her face, and that light to her eye, like the neigh of the war-horse when he hears the sound of battle.

Aunt Agatha was struck dumb. Terror seized her, as she looked at the kindling cheeks and rapid gesture, and saw the Winnie of old, all impatient and triumphant, dawning out from under the cloud.

"Oh, Winnie, you are not going away," she cried, with a thrill of presentiment. "Mary has gone, and they have all gone. You are not going to leave me all by myself here?"

"I?" said Winnie. There was scorn in the tone, and yet what was chiefly in it was a bitter affectation of humility. "It will be time enough to fear my going, when any one wants me to go."

Miss Seton was a simple woman, and yet she saw that there lay more meaning under these words than the plain meaning they bore. She clasped her hands, and lifted her appealing eyes to Winnie's face—and she was about to speak, to question, to remonstrate, to importune, when her companion suddenly seized her hands tight, and silenced her by the sight of an emotion more earnest and violent than anything Aunt Agatha knew.

"Don't speak to me," she said, with her eyes blazing, and clasped the soft old hands in hers till she hurt them. "Don't speak to me; I don't know what I am going to do-but don't talk to me, don't look at me, Aunt Agatha. Perhaps my life-and Mary's-may be fixed to-day."

"Oh, Winnie, I don't understand you," cried Aunt Agatha, trembling, and freeing her poor little crushed soft hands.

"And I don't understand myself," said Winnie. "Don't let us say a word more."

What did it mean, that flush in her face, that thrill of purpose and meaning in her words, and her step, and her whole figure ?- and what had Mary to do with it ?-- and how could their fate be fixed one way or other? Aunt Agatha asked herself these questions vainly, and could make nothing of them. But after breakfast she went to her room and said her prayers-which was the best thing to do; and in that moment Winnie, poor Winnie, whose prayers were few though her wants were countless, took a rose from the trellis, and pinned it in with her brooch, and went softly away. I don't know what connection there was between the rose and Aunt Agatha's prayers, but somehow the faint perfume softened the wild, agitated, stormy heart, and suggested to it that sacrifice was being made and supplications offered somewhere for its sins and struggles. Thus, when his sons and daughters went out to their toils and pleasures, Job drew near the altar lest some of them might curse God in their hearts.

It was strange to see her sallying forth by herself, she who had been shielded from every stranger's eye; and yet there was a sense of freedom in itfreedom, and danger, and exhilaration, which was sweet to Winnie. She went rushing in to Carlisle in the express train, flying as it were on the wings of the wind. But Mrs. Kirkman was not at home. She was either working in her district, or she was teaching in the infant school, or giving out work to the poor women, or perhaps at the mothers' meeting, which she always said was the most precious opportunity of all; or possibly she might be making calls which, however, was an hypothesis which her maid rejected as unworthy of her. Mrs. Percival found herself brought to a sudden standstill when she heard this. The sole audible motive which she had proposed to herself for her expedition was to see Mrs. Kirkman, and for the moment she did not know what to do. After a while, however, she turned and went slowly yet eagerly in another direction. She concluded she would go to the Askells, who might know something about it. They were Percival's friends; they might be in the secret of his plans-they might convey to him the echo of her indignation and disdain; possibly even he might himself --- But Winnie would not let herself consider that thought. Captain Askell's house was not the same cold and neglected place where Mary had first seen Emma after their return. They had a little more money-and that was something; and Nelly was older-which was a great deal more; but even Nelly could not altogether abrogate the character which her mother gave to her house. The maid who opened the door had bright ribbons in her cap, but yet was a sloven, halfsuppressed; and the carpets on the stair were badly fitted and threatened here and there to entangle the unwary foot. And there were a bewildering multiplicity of sounds in the house. You could hear the maids in the kitchen, and the children in the nursery -and even as Winnie approached the drawing-room she could hear voices thrilling with an excitement which did not become that calm retreat. There was a sound as of a sob, and there was a broken voice a little loud in its accents. Winnie went on with a quicker throb of her heart-perhaps he himself-But when the door opened it was upon a scene she had not thought of. Mrs. Kirkman was there, seated high as in a throne, looking with a sad but touching resignation upon the disturbed household. And it was Emma who was sobbing-sobbing and crying out, and launching a furious little soft incapable clenched hand into the air-while Nelly, all glowing red, eyes lit up with indignation, soft lips quivering with distress, stood by, with a gaze of horror and fury and disgust fixed on the visitor's face. Winnie went in, and they all stopped short and stared at her, as if she had dropped from the skies. Her appearance startled and dismayed them, and yet it was evidently in perfect accordance with the spirit of the scene. She could see that at the first glance. She saw they were already discussing this event, whatever it might be. Therefore Winnie did not hesitate. She offered no ordinary civilities herself, nor required any. She went straight up to where Mrs. Kirkman sat, not looking at the others. "I have come to ask you what it means," she said; and Winnie felt that they all stopped and gave way to her as to one who had a right to know.

"That is what I am asking," cried Emma, "what does it mean? We have all known it for ages, and none of us said a word. And she that sets up for being a Christian! As if there was no honour left in the regiment, and as if we were to talk of everything that happens! Ask her, Mrs. Percival. I don't believe half nor a quarter what they say of any one. When they dare to raise up a scandal about Madonna Mary, none of us are saie. And a thing that we have all known for a hundred years!"

18 Oh mamma!" said Nelly, softly under her breath. The child knew everything about everybody, as was to have been expected; every sort of tale had been told in her presence. But what moved her to shame was her mother's share. It was a murmured compunction, a vicarious acknowledgment of sin. "Oh mamma!"

"It is not I that am saying it," cried Emma, again resuming her sob. "I would have been torn to pieces first. Me to harm her that was always a jewel! Oh, ask her, ask her! What is going to come of it, and what does it mean?"

"My dear, perhaps Nelly had better retire before we speak of it any more," said Mrs. Kirkman, meekly. "I am not one that thinks it right to encourage delusions in the youthful mind, but still, if there is much more to be said——"

And then it was Nelly's turn to speak. "You have talked about everything in the world without sending me away," cried the girl, "till I wondered and wondered you did not die of shame. But I'll stay now. One is safe," said Nelly, with a little cry of indignation and youthful rage, "when you so much as name Mrs. Ochterlony's name."

All this time Winnie was standing upright and eager before Mrs. Kirkman's chair. It was not from incivility that they offered her no place among them. No one thought of it, and neither did she. The conflict around her had sobered Winnie's thoughts. There was no trace of her husband in it, nor of that striking her through her friends which had excited and exhilarated her mind; but the family instinct of mutual defence awoke in her. "My sister has heard something which has—which has had a singular effect upon her," said Winnie, pausing instinctively, as if she had been about to betray something. "And it is you who have done it; I want to know what it means."

"Oh, she must be ill!" wailed poor Emma; "I knew she would be ill. If she dies it will be your fault. Oh, let me get up and go to her. I knew she must be ill."

As for Mrs. Kirkman, she shook her head and her long curls, and looked compassionately upon her agitated audience. And then Winnie heard all the long-hoarded well-remembered tale. The only difference made in it was that by this time all confidence in the Gretna Green marriage, which had once been allowed, at least as a matter of courtesy, had faded out of the story. Even Mrs. Askell no longer thought of that. When the charm of something to tell began to work, the Captain's wife chimed in with the narrative of her superior officer. All the circumstances of that long-past event were revealed to the wonder-stricken hearers. Mary's distress, and Major Ochterlony's anxiety, and the consultations he had with everybody, and the wonderful indulgence and goodness of the ladies at the station. who never made any difference, and all their benevolent hopes that so uncomfortable an incident was buried in the past, and could now have no painful results; -all this was told to Winnie in detail; and in the confidential committee thus formed, her own possible deficiencies and shortcomings were all passed over. "Nothing would have induced me to say a syllable on the subject if you had not been dear Mary's sister," Mrs. Kirkman said; and then she relieved her mind and told it all.

Winnie, for her part, sat dumb and listened. She was more than struck dumb-she was stupified by the news. She had thought that Mary might have been "foolish," as she herself had been "foolish;" even that Mary might have gone further, and compromised herself; but of a dishonour which involved such consequences she had never dreamed. She sat and heard it all in a bewildered horror. with the faces of Hugh and Will floating like spectres before her eyes. A woman gone astray from her duty as a wife was not, Heaven help her! so extraordinary an object in poor Winnie's eyesbut, good heavens! Mary's marriage, Mary's boys, the very foundation and beginning of her life! The room went round and round with her as she sat and listened. A public trial, a great talk in the papers, one brother against another, and Mary, Mary, the chief figure in all! Winnie put her hands up to her ears, not to shut out the sound of this incredible story, but to deaden the noises in her head, the throbbing of all her pulses, and stringing of all her nerves. She was so stupified that she could make no sort of stand against it, no opposition to the evidence, which, indeed, was crushing, and left no opening for unbelief. She accepted it all, or rather was carried away by the bewildering overwhelming tide. And even Emma Askell got excited, and woke up out of her crying and added her contribution of details. Poor little Nelly, who had heard it all before, had retired to a corner and taken up her work, and might be seen in the distance working furiously, with a hot flush on her cheek, and now and then wiping a furtive tear from her eye. Nelly did not know what to say nor how to meet it-but there was in her little woman's soul a convictiou that something unknown must lie behind, and that the inference at least was not true.

"And you told Will?" said Winnie, rousing up at last. "You knew all the horrible harm it might do, and you told Will."

"It was not I who told him," said Mrs. Kirkman; and then there was a pause, and the two ladies looked at each other, and a soft, almost imperceptible flutter, visible only to a female eye, revealed that there might be something else to say.

"Who told him?" said Winuie, perceiving the indications, and feeling her heart thrill and beat high once more.

"I am very sorry to say anything, I am sure, to make it worse," said Mrs. Kirkman. "It was not. I who told him. I suppose you are aware that—that Major Percival is here. He was present at the marriage as well as I. I wonder he never told you. It was he who told Will. He only came to get the explanations from me."

They thought she would very probably faint, or make some demonstration of distress, not knowing that this was what poor Winnie had been waiting, almost hoping for: and, on the contrary, it seemed to put new force into her, and a kind of beauty, at which her companions gazed aghast. The blood rushed into her faded cheek, and light came to her eves. She could not speak at first, so overwhelming was the tide of energy and new life that seemed to pour into her veins. After all, she had been a true prophet. It was all for her sake. He had struck at her through her friends, and she could not be angry with him. It was a way like another of showing love, a way hard upon other people, no doubt, but carrying a certain poignant sweetness to her for whose sake the blow had fallen. But Winnie knew she was in the presence of keen observers, and put restraint upon herself.

"Where is Major Percival to be found?" she said, with a measured voice, which she thought concealed her excitement, but which was overdone, and made it visible. They thought she was meditating something desperate when she spoke in that unnatural voice, and drew her shawl round her in that rigid way. She might have been going to stab him, the bystanders thought, or do him some grievous harm.

"You would not go to him for that?" said Emma, with a little anxiety, stopping short at once in her tears and in her talk. "They never will let you talk to them about what they have done; and then they always say you take part with your own friends."

Mrs. Kirkman, too, showed a sudden change of interest, and turned to the new subject with zeal and zest: "If you are really seeking a reconciliation with your husband-"she began; but this was more than Winnie could bear.

"I asked where Major Percival was to be found," she said; "I was not discussing my own affairs: but Nelly will tell me. If that is all about Mary, I will go away."

"I will go with you," cried Emma; "only wait till I get my things. I knew she would be ill; and she must not think that we are going to forsake her now. As if it could make any difference to us that have known it for ever so long! Only wait till I get my things."

"Poor Mary! she is not in a state of mind to be benefited by any visit," said Mrs. Kirkman, solemnly. "If it were not for that, I would go."

As for Winnie, she was trembling with impatience, eager to be free and to be gone, and vet not content to go until she had left a sting behind her, like a true woman. "How you all talk!" she cried; "as if your making any difference could matter. You can set it going, but all you can do will never stop it. Mary has gone to Will, whom you have made her enemy. Perhaps she has gone to ask her boy to save her honour; and you think she will mind about your making a difference, or about your visits-when it is a thing of life or death!"

And she went to the door all trembling, scarcely able to support herself, shivering with excitement and wild anticipation. Now she must see him-now it was her duty to go to him and ask him why-She rushed away, forgetting even that she had not obtained the information she came to seek. She had been speaking of Mary, but it was not of Mary she was thinking. Mary went totally out of her mind as she hurried down the stairs. Now there was no longer any choice: she must go to him, must see him, must renew the interrupted but never-ended struggle. It filled her with an excitement which she could not subdue nor resist. Her heart beat so loud that she did not hear the sound of her own step on the stairs, but seemed somehow to be carried down by the air, which encircled her like a soft whirlwind; and she did not hear Nelly behind her calling her, to tell her where he lived. She had no recollection of that. She did not wait for any one to open the door for her, but rushed out, moved by her own purpose as by a supernatural influence; and but for the violent start he gave, it would have been into his arms she rushed as she stepped out from the Askells' door.

This was how their meeting happened. Percival had been going there to ask some questions about the Cottage and its inmates, when his wife, with that look he knew so well-with all the coming storm in her eyes, and the breath of excitement quick on her parted lips-stepped out almost into his arms. He was fond of her, notwithstanding all their mutual sins; and their spirits rushed together, though in a different way from that rush which accompanies the meeting of the lips. They rushed together with a certain clang and spark; and the two stood facing each other in the street, defying, hating, struggling, feeling that they belonged to each other once more.

"I must speak with you," said Winnie, in her haste; "take me somewhere that I may speak. Is this your revenge? I know what you have done. When everything is ended that you cau do to me, you strike me through my friends."

"If you choose to think so-" said Percival.

"If I choose to think so? What else can I think?" said the hot combatant; and she went on by his side with hasty steps and a passion and force which she had not felt in her since the day when she fled from him. She felt the new tide in her veins, the new strength in her heart. It was not the calm of union, it was the heat of conflict; but still, such as it was, it was her life. She went on with him, never looking or thinking where they were going, till they reached the rooms where he was living, and then, all by themselves, the husband and wife looked each other in the face.

"Why did you leave me, Winnie?" he said; "I might be wrong, but what does it matter? I may be wrong again, but I have got what I wanted. I would not have minded much killing the boy for the sake of seeing you and having it out. Let them manage it their own way; it is none of our business. Come back to me, and let them settle it their own way."

"Never!" cried Winnie, though there was a struggle in her heart. "After doing all the harm you could do to me, do you think you can recall me by ruining my sister? How dare you venture to look me in the face?"

"And I tell you I did not mind what I did to get to see you and have it out with you," said Percival; "and if that is why you are here, I am glad I did it. What is Mary to me? She must look after herself. But I cannot exist without my wife."

"It was like that, your conduct that drove me away," said Winnie, with a quiver on her lips.

"It was like it," said he, "only that you never did me justice. My wife is not like other men's wives. I might drive you away, for you were always impatient; but you need not think I would stick at anything that had to be done to get you back."

"You will never get me back," said Winnie, with flashing eyes. All her beauty had come back to her in that moment. It was the warfare that did it, and at the same time it was the homage and flattery which were sweet to her, and which she could see in everything he said. He would have stuck at nothing to get her back. For that object he would have ruined, or killed, or done anything wicked. What did it matter about the other people? There was a sort of magnificence in it that took her captive; for neither of the two had pure motives or a high standard of action, or enough even of conventional goodness to make them hypocrites. They both acknowledged, in a way, that themselves, the two of them, were the chief objects in the universe, and everything else in the world faded into natural insignificance when they stood face to face, and their great perennial conflict was renewed.

"I do not believe it," said Percival. "I have told you I will stick at nothing. Let other people take care of their own affairs. What have you to do in that weedy den with that old woman? You are not good enough, and you never were meant for that. I knew you would come to me at the last."

"But you are mistaken," said Winnie, still breathing fire and flame. "The old woman, as you call her, is good to me, good as nobody ever was. She loves me, though you may think it strange. And if I have come to you it is not for you, it is to ask what you have done, what your horrible motive could be, and why, now you have done every injury to me a man could do, you should try to strike me through my friends."

"I do not care that for your friends," said Percival. "It was to force you to see me, and have it out. Let them take care of themselves. Neither man nor woman has any right to interfere in my affairs."

"Nobody was interfering in your affairs," cried Winnie; "do you think they had anything to do with it?—could they have kept me if I wanted to go? It is me you are fighting against. Leave Mary alone, and put out your strength on me. I harmed you, perhaps, when I gave in to you and let you marry me. But she never did you any harm. Leave Mary, at least, alone."

Percival turned away with a disdainful shrug of his shoulders. He was familiar enough with the taunt. "If you harmed me by that act, I harmed you still more, I suppose," he said. "We have gone over that ground often enough. Let us have it out now. Are you coming back to your duty and to me?"

"I came to speak of Mary," said Winnie, facing him as he turned. "Set those right first who have never done you any harm, and then we can think of the others. The innocent come first. Strike at me like a man, but not through my friends."

She sat down as she spoke, without quite knowing what she did. She sat down, because, though the spirit was moved to passionate energy, the flesh was weak. Perhaps something in the movement touched the man who hated and loved her, as she loved and hated him. A sudden pause came to the conflict, such as does occur capriciously in such struggles; in the midst of their fury a sudden touch of softness came over them. They were alone—nothing but mists of passion were between them, and though they were fighting like foes, still their perverse souls were one. He came up to her suddenly and seized her hands, not tenderly, but rudely, as was natural to his state of mind.

"Winnie," he said, "this will not do; come away with me. You may struggle as you please, but you are mine. Don't let us make a laughing-stock of ourselves! What are a set of old women and children between you and me? Let them fight it out; it will all come right. What is anything in the world between you and me? Come! I am not going to be turned off or put away as if you did not mind. I know you better than that. Come! I tell you, nothing can stand between you and me."

"Never!" said Winnie, blazing with passion: but even while she spoke the course of the torrent changed. It leaped the feeble boundaries, and went into the other channel—the channel of love which runs side by side with that of hate. "You leave me to be insulted by everybody who has a mind-and if I were to go with you, it is you who would insult me!" cried Winnie. And the tears came pouring to her eyes suddenly like a thunderstorm. It was all over in a moment, and that was all that was said. What were other people that either he or she should postpone their own affairs to any secondary consideration? Their spirits rushed together with a flash of fire and roll of thunder. The suddenness of it was the thing that made it effectual. Something "smote the chord of self, that trembling" burst into a tumult of feeling and took to itself the semblance of love; no matter how it had been brought about. Was not anything good that set them face to face, and showed the two that life could not continue for them apart? Neither the tears, nor the reproaches, nor the passion were over, but it changed all at once into such a quarrel as had happened often enough before then. As soon as Winnie came back to her warfare, she had gone back, so to speak, to her duties according to her conception of them. Thus the conflict swelled, and rose, and fluctuated, and softened, like many another; but no more thoughts of the Cottage, or of Aunt Agatha, or of Mary's sudden calamity drew Winnie from her own subject. After all, it was, as she had felt, a pasteboard cottage let down upon her for the convenience of the moment-a thing to disappear by pulleys when the moment of necessity was over. And when they had had it out, she went off with her husband the same evening, sending a rapid note of explanation to Aunt Agatha-not with any intention of unkindness, but only with that superior sense of the importance of her own concerns which was natural to her. She hoped Mary would come back soon, and that all would be comfortably settled, she said. "And Mary is more of a companion to you than I ever could be," Winnie added in her letter, with a touch of that strange jealousy which was always latent in her. She was glad that Mary should be Miss Seton's companion, and yet was vexed that anybody should take her place with her aunt, to whom she herself had once been all in all. Thus Winnie, who had gone into Carlisle that morning tragically bent upon the confounding of her husband's plans, and the formation of one eternal wall of separation between them, eloped with him in the evening as if he had been her lover. And there was a certain thrill of pride and tenderness in her bosom to think that to win her back he would stick at nothing, and did not hesitate to strike her through her friends.

CHAPTER XLII.

THERE is something wonderful in the ease with which the secondary actors in a great crisis can shake themselves free of the event, and return to their own affairs, however exciting the moment may be at which it suits them to strike off. The bystanders turn away from the most horrible calamity, and sit down by their own tables and talk about their own trivial business before the sound of the guns has ceased to vibrate on the air. or the smoke of the battle has dispersed which has brought ruin and misery to their dearest friends. The principle of human nature, that every man should bear his own burden, lies deeper than all philosophy. Winnie, though she had been excited about her sister's mysterious misfortune and roused by it, and was ready, to her own inconvenience, to make a great effort on Mary's behalf, yet could turn off on her way without any struggle, with that comfortable feeling that all must come right in the end which is so easy for the lookers-on. But the real sufferers could not entertain so charming a confidence. That same day rose heavily over poor Hugh, who, all alone in Earlston, still debated with himself. He had written to his uncle to express his amazement and dismay, and to ask for time to give full consideration to the terrible news he had heard. "You need not fear that I will do anything to wound my mother," the poor boy had written, with a bitter pang in his heart. But after that he had sunk into a maze of questions and discussions with himself. and of miserable uncertainty as to what he ought to do. The idea of asking anybody for information about it seemed almost as bad to him as owning the fact at once; asking about his mother-about facts in her life which she had never herself disclosed-inquiring if, perhaps, she was a woman dishonoured and unworthy of her children's confideuce! It seemed to Hugh as if it would be far easier to give up Earlston, and let Will or any one else who pleased have it. He had tried more than once to write to Mr. Churchill, the chaplain, of whom he had heard his mother speak, and of whom he had even a faint traditional sort of recollection; but the effort always sickened him, and made him rush away in disgust to the open air, and the soothing sounds of nature. He was quite alone during those few days. His neighbours did not know of his return, for he had been so speedily overtaken by this news as to have had no heart to go anywhere or show himself among them. Thus he was left to his own thoughts, and they were bitter. In the very height of his youthful hopes and satisfaction, just at the moment when he was most full of plans, and taking the most perfect pleasure in his life, this bewildering cloud had come on him. He did not even go on with his preparations for the transfer of the Museum, in the sickness of his heart, notwithstanding the eagerness he felt whenever he thought of it to complete that arrangement at least, and secure his uncle's will to that extent, if no more. But it did not seem possible to exert himself about one thing without exerting himself about all, and he who had been so fresh and full of energy, fell supine into a kind of utter wretchedness. course of his life was stopped when it had been in full career. He was suddenly thrown out of all he had been doing, all he had been planning. The scheme of his existence seemed all at once turned into folly and made a lie of. What could he do? His lawyer wrote to say that he meant to come to Earlston on some business connected with the estate, but Hugh put him off, and deferred everything. How could he discuss affairs which possibly were not his affairs, but his brother's? How could he enter into any arrangements, or think of anything however reasonable or necessary, with this sword hanging over his head? He got up early in the morning, and startled the servants before they were up by opening doors and shutters in his restlessness; and he sat up at night thinking it all over, for ever thinking of it and never coming to any result. How could he inquire, how could he prove or disprove the horrible assertion? Even to think of it seemed a tacit injury to his mother. The only way to do his duty by her seemed to be to give up all and go away to the end of the world. And yet he was a man, and right and justice were dear to him, and he revolted against doing that. It was as if he had been caught by some gigantic iron hand of fate in the sweetness of his fearless life. He had never heard nor read of, he thought, anything so cruel. By times bitter tears came into his eyes, wrung from him by the intolerable pressure. He could not give up his own cause and his mother's cause without a struggle. He could not relinquish his life and rights to another; and yet how could he defend himself by means that would bring one question to careless lips, one light laugh to the curious world, over his mother's name? Such an idea had never so much as entered into his head. It made his life miserable.

He read over Mr. Penrose's letter a dozen times in the day, and he sat at night with his eyes fixed on the flame of his lamp, calling back his childhood and its events. It was as vague as a dream, and he could not identify his broken recollections. If he could have gone to Mrs. Ochterlony and talked it over with her, Hugh might have remembered many things, but wanting that thread of guidance he lost himself in the misty maze. By dint of thinking it over and over, and representing the scene to his mind in every possible way, it came to him finally to believe that some faint impression of the event which he was asked to remember did linger in his memory, and that thought, which he could not put away, stung him like a serpent. Was it really true that he remembered it? Then the accusation must be true, and he nameless and without rights, and Mary- Not much wonder that the poor boy, sick to the heart, turned his face from the light and hid himself, and felt that he would be glad if he could only die. Yet dying would be of no use, for there was Islay who would come next to him, who never would have dreamt of dispossessing him, but who, if this was true, would need to stand aside in his turn and make room for Will. Will !- It was hard for Hugh not to feel a thrill of rage and scorn and amaze mixing with his misery when he thought of the younger brother to whom he had been so continually indulgent and affectionate. He who had been always the youngest, the most guarded and tended, whom Hugh could remember in his mother's arms, on her knee, a part of her as it were; he to turn upon them all, and stain her fame, and ruin the family honour for his own base advantage! These thoughts came surging up one after another, and tore Hugh's mind to pieces and made him as helpless as a child, now with one suggestion, now with another. What could he do? And accordingly he did nothing but fall into a lethargy and maze of despair, did not sleep, did not eat, filled the servants' minds with the wildest surmises, and shut himself up, as if that could have deferred the course of events, or shut out the coming fate.

This had lasted only a day or two, it is true, but it might have been for a century, to judge by Hugh's feelings. He felt indeed as if he had never been otherwise, never been light-hearted or happy, or free to take pleasure in his life; as if he had always been an impostor expecting to be found out. Nature itself might have awakened him from his stuper had he been left to himself; but, as it happened, there came a sweeter touch. He had become feverishly anxious about his letters ever since the arrival of that one which had struck him so unlooked-fer a blow; and he started when something was brought to him in the evening at an hour when letters did not arrive, a little note with a little red seal, very carefully folded that no curious eye might be able to penetrate. Poor Hugh felt a certain thrill of fright at the innocent-seeming thing, coming insidiously at this moment when he thought himself safe, and bringing, for anything he could tell, the last touch to his misery. He held it in his hand while it was explained to him that one of the servants had been to Carlisle with an order given before the world had changed-an order made altogether antiquated and out of course by having been issued three days before; and that he had brought back this note. Only when the door closed upon the man and his explanation did Hugh break the tiny seal. It was not a letter to be alarmed at. It was written as it were with tears. sweet tears of sympathy and help and tender succour. This was what Nelly's little letter said :-

"DEAR MR. HUGH,-I want to let you know of something that has happened to-day, and at which you may perhaps be surprised. Mrs. Percival met Major Percival here, and I think they have made friends; and she has gone away with him, I think you ought to know, because she told us dear Mrs. Ochterlony had gone to Liverpool; and Miss Seton will be left alone. I should have asked mamma to let me go and stay with her, but I am going into Scotland to an old friend of papa's, who is living at Gretna. I remember hearing long age that it was at Gretna dear Mrs. Ochterlony was first married—and perhaps there is somebody there who remembers her. If you see Aunt Agatha, would you please ask her when it happened? I should so like to see the place, and ask the people if they remember her. I think she must have been so beautiful then; she is beautiful now-I never loved anybody so much in my life. And I am afraid she is anxious about Will. I should not like to trouble you, for I am sure you must have a great deal to occupy your mind, but I should so like to know how dear Mrs. Ochterlony is, and if there is anything the matter with Will. He always was very funny, you know, and then he is only a boy, and does not know what he means. Mamma sends her kind regards, and I am, dear Mr. Hugh,

"Very sincerely yours,

This was the letter. Hugh read it slowly over, every word—and then he read it again; and two great globes of dew got into his eyes, and Nelly's sweet name grew big as read through them, and wavered over all the page; and when he had come to that signature the second time he put it down on the table, and leant his face on it, and cried. Yes, cried, though he was a man-wept hot tears over it, few but great, that felt to him like the opening of a spring in his soul, and drew the heat and the horror out of his brain. His young breast shook with a few great sobs-the passion climbing in his throat burst forth, and had utterance; and then he rose up and stretched his young arms, and drew himself up to the fulness of his height. What did it matter, after all? What was money, and lands, and every good on earth, compared to the comfort of living in the same world with a creature such as this, who was as sweet as the flowers, and as true as the sky? She had done it by instinct, not knowing, as she herself said, what she meaut, or knowing only that her little heart swelled with kind impulses, tender pity, and indignation, and yet pity over all; pity for Will, too, who, perhaps, was going to make them all miserable. But Nelly could not have understood the effect her little letter had upon Hugh. He shook himself free after it, as if from chains that had been upon him. He gave a groan, poor boy, at the calamity which was not to be iguored, and then he said to himself, "After all!" After all, and in spite of all, while there was Nelly living, it was not unmingled ill to live. And when he looked at it again, a more reasonable kind of comfort seemed to come to him out of the girl's letter; his eye was caught by the word struck out, which yet was not too carefully struck out, "where dear Mrs. Ochterlony was first married." He gave a cry when this new light entered into his miud. He roused himself up from his gloom and stupor, and thought and thought until his very brain ached as with labour, and his limbs began to thrill as with new vigour coming back. And a glimmering of the real truth suddenly rushed, all vague and dazzling, upon Hugh's darkness. There had been no hint in Mr. Penrose's letter of any such interpretation of the mystery. Mr. Penrose himself had received no such hint, and even Will, poor boy, had heard of it only as a fable, to which he gave no attention. They two, and Hugh himself in his utter misery, had accepted as a probable fact the calumny of which Nelly's pure mind instinctively demanded an explanation. They had not known it to be impossible that Mary should be guilty of such sin; but Nelly had known it, and recognised the incredible mystery, and demanded the reason for it, which everybody else had ignored or forgotten. He seemed to see it for a moment, as the watchers on a sinking ship might see the gleam of a lighthouse; -and then it disappeared from him in the wild waste of ignorance and wonder, and then gleamed out again, as if in Nelly's eyes. That was why she was going, bless her! She who never went upon visits, she who knew better, and had insight in her eyes, and saw it could not be. These thoughts passed through Hugh's mind in a flood, and changed heaven and earth round about him, and set him on solid ground, as it were, instead of chaos. He was not wise enough, good enough, pure enough, to know the truth of himself-but Nelly could see it, as with angel eyes. He was young, and he loved Nelly, and that was how it appeared to him. Shame that had been brooding over him in the darkness, fled away. He rose up and felt as if he were yet a man, and had still his life before him, whatever might happen; and that he was there not only to comfort and protect his mother, but to defend and vindicate her; not to run away and keep silent like the guilty, but to face the pain of it, and the shame of it, if such bitter need was, and establish the truth. All this came to Hugh's mind from the simple little letter, which Nelly, crying and burning with indignation and pity, and an intolerable sense of wrong, had written without knowing what she meant. For anything Hugh could tell, his mother's innocence and honour, even if intact, might never be proved, -might do no more for him than had it been guilt and shame. The difference was that he had seen this accusation, glancing through Nelly's eyes, to be impossible; that he had found out that there was an interpretation somewhere, and the load was taken off his soul.

The change was so great, and his relief so immense, that he felt as if even that night he must act upon it. He could not go away, as he longed to do, for all modes of communication with the world until the morning were by that time impracticable. But he did what eased his mind at least. He wrote to Mr. Penrose a very grave, almost solemn letter, with neither horror nor even anger in it. "I do not know what the circumstances are, nor what the facts may be," he wrote, "but whatever they are, I do not doubt that my mother will explainand I shall come to you immediately, that the truth may be made clearly apparent." And he wrote to Mr. Churchill as he had never yet had the courage to do, asking to be told how it was. When he had done this, he rose up, feeling himself still more his own master. Hugh did not deceive himself; he did not think, because Nelly had communicated to his eyes her own divine simplicity of sight, that thereforc it was certain that everything would be made clear and manifest to the law or the world. It might be otherwise: Mrs. Ochterlouy might never be able to establish her own spotless fame, and her elder children's rights. It might be, by some horrible conspiracy of circumstances, that his name and position should be taken from him, and his honour stained beyond remedy. Such a thing was still possible. But Hugh felt that even then all would not be lost, that God would still be in heaven, and justice and mercy to some certain extent on the earth, and duty still before him. The situation was not changed, but only the keynote of his thoughts was changed, and his mind had come back to itself. He rose up, though it was getting late, and rang the bell for Francis Ochterlony's favourite servant, and began to arrange about the removal of the Museum. He might not be master long—in law; but he was master by right of nature and his uncle's will, and he would at least do his duty as long as he remained there.

Mrs. Gilsland, the housekeeper, was in the hall as he went out, and she curtseyed and stood before him, rustling in her black silk gown, and eyeing him doubtfully. She was afraid to disturb the Squire, as she said, but there was a poor soul there, if so be as he would speak a word to her. It annoved Hugh to be drawn away from his occupations just as he had been roused to return to them; but Nelly's letter and the influence of profound emotion had given a certain softness to his soul. He asked what it was, and heard it was a poor woman who had come with a petition. She had come a long way, and had a child with her, but nobody had liked to disturb the young Squire; and now it was providential, Mrs. Gilsland thought, that he should have passed just at that moment. "She has been gone half her lifetime, Mr. Hugh-I mean Sir," said the housekeeper, "though she was born and bred here; and her poor man is that bad with the paralytics that she has to do everything, which she thought if perhaps you would give her the new lodge-

"The new lodge is not built yet," said Hugh, with a pang in his heart, feeling, notwithstanding his new courage, that it was hard to remember all his plans and the thousand changes it might never be in his power to make; "and it ought to be some one who has a claim on the family," he added, with a half-conscious sigh.

"And that's what poor Susan has," said Mrs. Gilsland. "Master would never have said no if it had been in his time; for he knew as he had been unjust to them poor folks; and a good claim on you, Mr. Hugh. She is old Sommerville's daughter, as you may have heard talk on, and as decent a woman—"

"Who was old Sommerville?" said Hugh.

"He was one as was a faithful servant to your poor papa," said the housekeeper. "I've heard as he lost his place all for the Captain's sake, as was Captain Ochterlony then, and as taking a young gentleman as ever was. If your mother was to hear of it, Mr. Hugh, she is not the lady to forget. A poor servant may be most a friend to his master—I've heard many and many a one say so that was real quality—and your mamma being a true lady——"

"Yes," said Hugh, "a good servant is a friend; and if she had any claims upon my father, I will certainly see her: but I am busy now. I have not been—well. I have been neglecting a great many things, and now that I feel a little better, I have a great deal to do."

"Oh, sir, it isn't lost time as makes a poor creature's heart to sing for joy!" said Mrs. Gilsland. She was a formidable housekeeper, but she was a kind woman; and somehow a subtle perception that their young master had been in trouble had crept into the mind of the household." Which it's grieved as we've all been to see as you was not—well," she added, with a curtsey; "it's been the watching and the anxiety; and so good as you was, sir, to the Squire. But poor Susan has five mile to go, and a child in arms, a bouncing boy, as is a load to carry; and her poor sick husband at home. And it was borne in upon them as perhaps for old Sommerville's sake—"

"Well, who was he?" said Hugh, with languid interest, a little fretted by the interruption, vet turning his steps towards the housekeeper's room, from which a gleam of firelight shone, at the end of a long corridor. He did not know anything about old Sommerville; the name awakened no associations in his mind, and even the housekeeper's long narrative as she followed him caught his attention only by intervals. She was so anxious to produce an effect for her protegée's sake that she began with an elaborate description of old Sommerville's place and privileges, which whizzed past Hugh's ear without ever touching his mind. But he was too goodhearted to resist the picture of the poor woman who had five miles to go, and a baby and a sick husband. She was sitting basking before the fire in Mrs. Gilsland's room, poor soul, thinking as little about old Sommerville as the young Squire was; her heart beating high with anxiety about the new lodgebeating as high as if it was a kingdom she had hopes of conquering; with excitement as profound as that which moved Hugh himself when he thought of his own fortune hanging in the balance, and of the name and place and condition of which perhaps he was but an usurper. It was as much to poor Susan to have the lodge as it was to him to have Earlston, or rather a great deal more. And he went in, putting a stop to Mrs. Gilsland's narrative, and began to talk to the poor suitor; and the firelight played pleasantly on the young man's handsome face, as he stood full in its ruddy illumination to hear her story, with his own anxiety lying at his heart like a stone. To look at this scene, it looked the least interesting of all that was going on at that moment in the history of the Ochterlony familyless important than what was taking place in Liverpool, where Mary was-or even than poor Aunt Agatha's solitary tears over Winnie's letter, which had just been taken in to her, and which went to her heart. The new lodge might never be built, and Hugh Ochterlony might never have it in his power to do anything for poor Susan, who was old Sommerville's daughter. But at least he was not hard-hearted, and it was a kind of natural grace and duty to hear what the poor soul had to say.

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was morning when Mary arrived in Liverpool, early morning, chilly and grey. She had been detained on the road by the troublesome delays of a cross route, and the fresh breath of the autumual morning chilled her to the heart. And she had not come with any distinct plan. She did not know what she was going to do. It had seemed to her as if the mere sight of her would set her boy right, had there been evil in his mind; and she did not know that there was any evil in his mind. She knew nothing of what was in Mr. Penrose's letter, which had driven Hugh to such despair. She did not even know whether Will had so much as mentioned his discovery to Uncle Penrose, or whether he might not have fled there, simply to get away from the terrible thought of his mother's disgrace. If it were so, she had but to take her boy in her arms, to veil her face with shame, yet raise it with conscious honour, and tell him how it all was. This, perhaps, was what she most thought of doing-to show him the rights of the story of which he had only heard the evil-seeming side, and to reconcile him to herself and the world, and his life, on all of which a shadow must rest, as Mary thought, if any shadow rested on his mother. By times she was grieved with Will-"angry," as he would have said-to think he had gone away in secret without unfolding his troubles to the only creature who could clear them up; but by times it seemed to her as though it was only his tenderness of her, his delicacy for her, that had driven him away. That he could not endure the appearance of a stain upon her, that he was unable to let her know the possibility of any suspicion—this was chiefly what Mrs. Ochterlony thought. And it made her heart yearn towards her boy. Anything about Earlston, or Hugh, or the property, or Will's rights, had not crossed her mind; even Mrs. Kirkman's hints had proved useless, so far as that was concerned. Such a thing seemed to her as impossible, as to steal or to murder. When they were babies, a certain thrill of apprehension had moved her whenever she saw any antagonism between the brothers; but when the moment of realizing it came, she was unable to conceive of such a horror. To think of Will harming Hugh! It was impossible-more than impossible; and thus as she drove through the unknown streets in the early bustle of the morning, towards the distant suburb in which Mr. Penrose lived, her thoughts rejected all tragical suppositions. The interview would be painful enough in any case, for it was hard for a mother to have to defend herself, and vindicate her good fame, to her boy: but still it could have been nothing but Will's horror at such a revelation—his alarm at the mere idea of such a suspicion ever becoming known to his mother-his sense of disenchantment in the entire world following his discovery, that made him go away; and this she had it in her power to dissipate for ever. This was how she was thinking as she approached Mr. Penrose's great mansion, looking out eagerly to see if any one might be visible at the windows. She saw no one, and her heart beat high as she looked up at the blank big house, and thought of the young heart that would flutter and perhaps sicken at the sight of her, and then expand into an infinite content. For by this time she had so reasoned herself into reassurance, and the light and breath of the morning had so invigorated her mind, that she had no more doubt that her explanations would content him, and clear away every cloud from his thoughts, than she had of his being her son, and loyal as no son of hers could fail to be.

The servants did not make objections to her as they had done to Will. They admitted her to the cold, uninhabited drawing-room, and informed her that Mr. Penrose was out, but that young Mr. Ochterlony was certainly to be found. "Tell him it is his mother," said Mary, with her heart yearning over him; and then she sat down to wait. There was nothing after all in the emergency to tremble at. She smiled at herself when she thought of her own horrible apprehensions, and of the feelings with which she had hurried from the Cottage. It would be hard to speak of the suspicion to which she was subjected, but then she could set it to rest for ever: and what did the pang matter? Thus she sat with a wistful smile on her face, and waited. The moments passed, and she heard sounds of steps outside, and something that sounded like the hurried shutting of the great door; but no eager foot coming to meet her-no rapid entrance like that she had looked for. She sat still until the smile became rigid on her lip, and a wonderful depression came to her soul. Was he not coming? Could it be that he judged her without hearing her, and would not see his mother? Then her heart woke up again when she heard some one approaching, but it was only the servant who had opened the

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said the man, with hesitation, "but it appears I made a mistake. Young Mr. Ochterlony was not—I mean he has gone out. Perhaps, if it was anything of importance, you could wait."

"He has gone out? so early?—surely not after he knew I was here?" said Mary, wildly; and then she restrained herself with an effort. "It is something of importance," she said, giving a groan in her heart, which was not audible. "I am his mother, and it is necessary that I should see him. Yes, I will wait; and if you could send some one to tell him, if you know where he is—"

"I should think, ma'am, he is sure to be home to luncheon," said the servant, evading this demand. To luncheon—and it was only about ten o'clock in the morning now. Mary clasped her hands together to keep herself from crying out. Could he have been out before she arrived—could he have fled to avoid her? She asked herself the question in a kind of agony; but Mr. Penrose's man stood blank and respectful at the door, and offered no point of appeal. She could not take him into her counsel, or consult him as to what it all meant; and yet she was so anxious, so miserable, so heart-struck by this suspense, that she could not let him go without an effort to find something out.

"Has he gone with his uncle?" she said. "Perhaps I might find him at Mr. Penrose's office. No? Or perhaps you can tell me if there is any place he is in the habit of going to, or if he always goes out so early. I want very much to see him; I have been travelling all night; it is very important," Mary added, wistfully looking in the attendant's face.

Mr. Penrose's butler was very solemn and precise, but yet there was something in the sight of her "I don't restrained distress which moved him. know as I have remarked what time the young gentleman goes out," he said. "He's early this morning-mostly he varies a bit-but I don't make no doubt as he'll be in to luncheon." When he had said this the man did not go away, but stood with a mixture of curiosity and sympathy, sorry for the new-comer, and wondering what it all meant. If Mary herself could but have made out what it all meant! She turned away, with the blood, as she thought, all going back upon her heart, and the currents of life flowing backward to their source. Had he fled from her? What did it mean?

In this state of suspense Mrs. Ochterlony passed the morning. She had a maid sent to her, and was shown, though with a little wonder and hesitation, into a sleeping room, where she mechanically took off her travelling wraps and assumed her indoor appearance so far as that was possible. It was a great, still, empty, resounding house; the rooms were large, coldly furnished, still looking new for want of use, and vacant of any kind of occupation or interest. Mary came downstairs again, and placed herself at one of the great windows in the drawing-room. She would not go out, even to seek Will, lest she might miss him by the way. She went and sat down by the window, and gazed out upon the strip of suburban road which was visible through the shrubberies, feeling her heart beat when any figure, however unlike her boy, appeared upon it. It might be he, undiscernible in the distance, or it might be some one from him, some messenger or ambassador. It was what might be called a handsome room, but it was vacant, destitute of everything which could give it interest, with some trifling picture-books on the table and meaningless knick-nacks. When Mrs. Ochterlony was sick of sitting watching at the window she would get up and walk round it, and look at the wellbound volumes on the table, and feel herself grow wild in the excess of her energy and vehemence, by contrast with the deadly calm of her surroundings. What was it to this house, or its master, or the other human creatures in it, that she was beating her wings thus, in the silence, against the cage? Thus she sat, or stood, or walked about, the whole long morning, counting the minutes on the timepiece or on her watch, and feeling every minute an hour. Where had he gone? had he fled to escape her? or was his absence natural and accidental? These questions went through her head, one upon another, with increasing commotion and passion, until she found herself unable to rest, and felt her veins tingling and her pulses throbbing in a wild harmony. It seemed years since she had arrived when one o'clock struck, and a few minutes later the sound of a gong thrilled through the silence.

This was for luncheon. It was not a bell, which might have been heard outside and quickened the steps of any one who might be coming. Mary still stood and watched at her window, but nobody came. And then the butler, whose curiosity was more and more roused, came upstairs with steady step, and shoes that creaked in a deprecating, apologetic way, to ask if she would go down to luncheon, and to regret respectfully that the young gentleman had not yet come in. "No doubt, ma'am, if he had known as you were coming, he'd have been here," the man said, not without an inquiring look at her, which Mrs. Ochterlony was vaguely conscious of. She went downstairs with a kind of mechanical obedience, feeling it an ease to go into another room, and find another window at which she could look out. She could see another bit of road further off, and it served to fill her for the moment with renewed hope. There, at least, she must surely see him coming. But the moments still kept going on, gliding off the steady hand of the timepiece like so many months or years. And still Will did not come.

It was all the more dreadful to her, because she had been totally unprepared for any such trial. It had never occurred to her that her boy, though he had run away, would avoid her now. By this time even the idea that he could be avoiding her went out of her mind, and she began to think some accident had happened to him. He was young and careless, a country boy-and there was no telling what terrible thing might have happened on those thronged streets, which had felt like Pandemonium to Mary's unused faculties. And she did not know where to go to look for him, or what to do. In her terror she began to question the man, who kept coming and going into the room, sometimes venturing to invite her attention to the dishes, which were growing cold, sometimes merely looking at her, as he went and came. She asked about her boy-what he had been doing since he came-if he were not in the habit of going to his uncle's office-if he had made any acquaintancesif there was anything that could account for his absence? "Perhaps he went out sight-seeing," said Mary; "perhaps he is with his uncle at the office. He was always very fond of shipping." But she got very doubtful and hesitating repliesreplies which were so uncertain that fear blazed up within her; and the slippery docks and dangerous water, the great carts in the streets and the string of carriages, came up before her eyes again.

Thus the time passed till it was evening. Mary could not, or rather would not, believe her own senses, and yet it was true. Shadows stole into the corners, and a star, which it made her heart sick to see, peeped out in the green-blue sky—and she went from one room to another, watching the two bits of road. First the one opening, which was fainter and farther off, then the other, which was overshadowed by the trees, yet visible and near. Every time she changed the point of watching, she felt sure that he must be coming. But yet the stars peeped out, and the lamps were lighted on the road, and her boy did not appear. She was a woman used to self-restraint, and but for her flitting up and down the stairs, and the persistent way she kept by the window, the servants might not have noticed anything remarkable about her; but they had all possession of oue fact which quickened their curiosity-and the respectable butler prowled about watching her, in a way which would have irritated Mrs. Ochterlony, had she been at sufficient leisure in her mind to remark him. When the time came that the lamp must be lighted and the windows closed, it went to her heart like a blow. She had to reason with herself that her watch could make no difference-could not bring him a moment sooner or later-and yet to be shut out from that one point of interest was hard. They told her Mr. Penrose was expected immediately, and that no doubt the young gentleman would be with him. To see Will only in his uncle's presence was not what Mary had been thinking of-but yet it was better than this suspense; and now that her eyes could serve her no longer, she sat listening, feeling every sound echo in her brain, and herself surrounded, as it were, by a rustle of passing feet and a roll of carriages that came and passed and brought nothing to her. And the house was so still and vacant, and resounded with every movement-even with her own foot as she changed her seat, though her foot had always been so light. That day's watching had made a change upon her, which a year under other circumstances would not have made. Her brow was contracted with lines unknown to its broad serenity; her eyes looked out eagerly from the lids which had grown curved and triangular with anxiety; her mouth was drawn together, and colourless. The long, speechless, vacant day, with no occupation in it but that of watching and listening, with its sense of time lost and opportunity deferred, with its dreadful suggestion of other things and thoughts which might be making progress and nourishing harm, while she sat here impeded and helpless, and unable to prevent it, was perhaps the severest ordeal Mary could have passed through. It was the same day on which Winnie went to Carlisle-it was the same evening on which Hugh received Nelly's letter, which found his mother motionless in Mr. This was the Penrose's drawing-room waiting. hardest of all, and yet not so hard as it might have been. For she did not know, what all the servants in the house knew, that Will had seen her arrivethat he had rushed out of the house, begging the man to deceive her-that he had kept away all day, not of necessity, but because he did not dare to face her. Mary knew nothing of this; but it was hard enough to contend with the thousand spectres that surrounded her, the fears of accident, the miserable suspense, the dreary doubt and darkness that seemed to hang over everything, as she waited ever vainly in the silence for her boy's return. 9 4 4

leaped so into her throat that she felt herself suffocated; she had to put her hands to her side and clasp them there to support herself as footsteps came up the stair. She grew sick, and a mist came over her eyes; and then all at once she saw clearly, and fell back, fainting in the body, horribly conscious and alive in the mind, when she saw it was Mr. Penrose who came in alone.

CHAPTER XLIV.

WILL had seen his mother arrive. He was coming downstairs at the moment, and he heard her voice, and could hear her say, "Tell him it is his mother," and fright had seized him. If only three days could have been abrogated, and he could have gone to her in his old careless way, to demand an account of why she had come !- but there stood up before him a ghost of what he had been doing-a ghost of uncomprehended harm and mischief, which now for the first time showed to him, not in its real light, but still with an importance it had never taken before. If it had been hard to tell her of the discovery he had made before he left the Cottage, it was twenty times harder now when he had discussed it with other people and taken practical steps about it. He went out hurriedly, and with a senso of stealth and panic. And the panic and the stealth were signs to him of something wrong. He had not seen it, and did not see it yet, as regarded the original question. He knew in his heart that there was no favouritism in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind, and that he was just the same to her as Hugh-and what could it matter which of her sons had Earlston?-But still, nature was stronger in him than reason, and he was ashamed and afraid to meet her, though he did not know why. He hurried out, and said to himself that she was "angry," and that he could not stay in all day long to be scolded. He would go back to luncheon, and that would be time enough. And then he began to imagine what she would say to him. But that was not so easy. What could she say? After all he had done no harm. He had but intimated to Hugh in the quietest way that he had no right to the position he was occupying. He had made no disturbance about it, nor upbraided his brother with what was not his brother's fault. And so far from blaming his mother, it had not occurred to him to consider her in the matter, except in the most secondary way. What could it matter to her? If Will had it, or if Hugh had it, it was still in the family. And the simple transfer was nothing to make any fuss about. This was how he reasoned; but Nature held a different opinion on the subject. She had not a word to say, nor any distinct suggestion even, of guiltiness or wrong-doing to present to his mind. She only carried him away out of the house, made him shrink aside till Mary had passed, and made him walk at the top of his speed out of the very district in which Mr. Penrose's house was situated. Because his mother would be "angry" -because she might find fault with him for going away or insist upon his return, or infringe his liberty. Was that why he fled from her?-But Will could not tell-he fled because he was driven by an internal consciousness which could not find expression so much as in thought. He went away and wandered about the streets, thinking that now he was almost a man, and ought to be left to direct his own actions; that to come after him like this was an injury to him which he had a right to resent. It was treating him as Hugh and Islay had never been treated. When he laid himself out for these ideas they came to him one by one, and at last he succeeded in feeling himself a little ill-used; but in his heart he knew that he did not mean that, and that Mrs. Ochterlony did not mean it, and that there was something else which stood between them, though he could not tell what it was.

All this time he contemplated going in, facing his mother, and being surprised to see her, and putting up with her auger as he best could. But when midday came, he felt less willing than ever. His reluctance grew upon him. If it had all come simply, if he had rushed into her presence unawares, then he could have borne it; but to go back on purpose, to be ushered in to her solemnly, and to meet her when her wrath had accumulated and she had prepared what to say-this was an ordeal which Will felt he could not bear. She had grown terrible to him, appalling, like the angel with the flaming sword. His conscience arrayed her in such effulgence of wrath and scorn, that his very soul shrank. She would be angry beyond measure. It was impossible to fancy what she might say or do; and he could not go in and face her in cold blood. Therefore, instead of going home, Will went down hastily to his uncle's office, and explained to him the position of affairs. - "You go and speak to her," said Will, with a feeling that it was his accomplice he was addressing, and yet a pang to think that he had himself gone over to the enemy, and was not on his natural side; "I am not up to seeing her to-night."

"Poor Mary," said Uncle Penrose, "I should not be surprised to find her in a sad way; but you ought to mind your own business, and it is not I who am to be blamed, but you."

"She will not blame you," said Will; "she will be civil to you. She will not look at you as she would look at me. When she is vexed she gives a fellow such a look. And I'm tired, and I can't face her to-day."

"It is mail-day, and I shall be late, and she will have a nice time of it all by herself," said Mr. Penrose; but he consented at the end. And as for Will, he wandered down to the quays, and got into a steam-boat, and went off in the midst of a holiday party up the busy river. He used to remember the airs that were played on the occasion by the blind fiddler in the boat, and could never listen to them afterwards without the strangest sensations. He felt somehow as if he were in hiding, and the people were pointing him out to each other, and had a sort of vague wonder in his mind as to what they could think he had done—robbed or killed, or something-when the fact was he was only killing the time, and keeping out of the way because his mother was angry, and he did not feel able to face her and return home. And very forlorn the poor boy was; he had not eaten anything, and he did not know what to get for himself to eat, and the host of holiday people filled up all the vacant spaces in the inn they were all bound for, where there were pretty gardens looking on the river. Will was young and alone, and not much in the way of thrusting himself forward, and it was hard to get anyone to attend to him, or a seat to sit upon, or anything to eat; and his forlorn sense of discomfort and solitude pressed as hardly upon him as remorse could have done. And he knew that he must manage to make the time pass on somehow, and that he could not return until he could feel himself justified in hoping that his mother, tired with her journey, had gone to rest. Not till he felt confident of getting in unobserved, could he venture to go home.

This was how it happened that Mr. Penrose went in alone, and that all the mists suddenly cleared up for Mary, and she saw that she had harder work before her than anything that had yet entered into her mind. He drew a chair beside her. and shook hands, and said he was very glad to see her, and then a pause ensued so serious and significant, that Mary felt herself judged and condemned; and felt, in spite of herself, that the hot blood was rushing to her face. It seemed to her as she sat there, as if all the solid ground had suddenly been cut away from under her, that her plea was utterly ignored and the whole affair decided upon; and only to see Uncle Penrose's meekly averted face made her head swim and her heart beat with a kind of half-delirious rage and resentment. He believed it then-knew all about it, and believed it. and recognised that it was a fallen woman by whose side he sat. All this Mrs. Ochterlony perceived in an instant by the downcast, conscious glance of Mr. Penrose's eye.

"Will has been out all day, has he?" he said. "Gone sight-seeing, I suppose. He ought to be in to dinner. I hope you had a comfortable luncheou, and have been taken care of. It is mail-day, that is why I am so late."

"But I am anxious, very anxious, about Will," said Mary. "I thought you would know where he was. He is only a country boy, and something may have happened to him in these dreadful streets."

"Oh no, nothing has happened to him," said Uncle Penrose. "You shall see him later. I am very glad you have come, for I wanted to have a little talk with you. You will always be quite welcome here, whatever may happen. If the girls had been at home, indeed, it might have been different—but whenever you like to come, you know——I am very glad that we can talk it all over. It is so much the most satisfactory way."

"Talk what over?" said Mary. "Thank you, uncle, but it was Will I was anxious to see."

"Yes, to be sure—naturally," said Mr. Penrose; "but don't let us go into anything exciting before dinner. The gong will sound in teu minutes, and I must put myself in order. We can talk in the evening, and that will be much the best."

With this he went and left her, to make the very small amount of toilette he considered necessary. And then came the dinner, during which Mr. Penrose was very particular, as he said, to omit all allusion to disagreeable subjects. Mary had to take her place at table, and to look across at the vacant chair that had been placed for Will, and to feel the whole weight of her uncle's changed opinion without any opportunity of rising up against it. She could not say a word in self-defence, for she was in no way assailed; but she never raised her eyes to him, nor listened to half-a-dozen words, without feeling that Mr. Penrose had in his own consciousness found her out. He was not going to shut his doors against her, or to recommend any cruel step. But her character was changed in his eyes. A sense that he was no longer particular as to what he said or did before her, no longer influenced by her presence, or elevated ever so little by her companionship as he had always been of old, came with terrible effect upon Mary's mind. He was careless of what he said, and of her feelings, and of his own manners. She was a woman who had compromised herself, who had no longer much claim to respect, in Uncle Penrose's opinion. This feeling, which was, as it were in the air, affected Mary in the strangest way. made her feel nearly mad in her extreme suppression and quietness. She could not stand on her own defence, for she was not assailed. And Will who should have stood by her had gone over to the enemy's side, and deserted her, and kept away. Where was he? where could he have gone? Her boy-her baby-the last one, who had always been the most tenderly tended; and he was avoidingavoiding his mother. Mary realised all this as she sat at the table; and at the same time she had to respect the presence of the butler and Mr. Penrose's servants, and make no sign. When she did not eat Mr. Penrose took particular notice of it, and hoped that she was not allowing herself to be upset; and he talked, in an elaborate way, of subjects that could interest nobody, keeping with too evident caution from the one subject which was in his mind all the while.

This lasted until the servants had gone away, and Mr. Penrose had poured out his first glass of port, for he was an old-fashioned man. He sat and sipped his wine with the quietness of preparation, and Mary, too, buckled on her armour, and made a rapid inspection of all its joints and fastenings. She was sitting at the table, which had just been so luxuriously served, and where the purple fruit and wine were making a picture still; but she was as truly at the bar as ever culprit was. There was an interval of silence which was very dreadful to her, and then, being unable to bear it any longer, it was Mary herself who spoke.

"I perceive that something has been passing here in which we are all interested," she said. "My poor boy has told you something he had heard—and I don't know, except in the most general way, what he has heard. Can you tell me, uncle? It is necessary I should know."

"My dear Mary, these are very unpleasant affairs to talk about," said Mr. Penrose. "You should have had a female friend to support you—though, indeed, I don't know how you may feel about that. Will has told me all. There was nobody he could ask advice from under the circumstances, and I think it was very sensible of him to come to me."

"I want to know what he wanted advice for," said Mary; "and what it is you call all; and why Will has avoided me? I cannot think it is chance that has kept him out so long. Whatever he has heard, he must have known that it would be best to talk it over with me."

"He thought you would be angry," said Mr. Penrose, between the sips of his wine.

"Angry!" said Mary, and then her heart melted at the childish fear. "Oh, uncle, you should have advised him better," she said; "he is only a boy; and you know that whatever happened, he had better have consulted his own mother first. How should I be angry? This is not like a childish freak, that one could be angry about."

"No," said Mr. Penrose; "it is not like a childish freak; but still, I think it was the wisest thing he could do to come to me. It is impossible you could be his best counsellor where you are yourself so much concerned, and where such important interests are at stake."

"Let me know at once what you mean," said Mary, faintly. "What important interests are at stake?"

She made a rapid calculation in her mind at the moment, and her heart grew sicker and sicker. Will had been, when she came to think of it, more than a week away from home, and many things might have happened in that time—things which she could not realise nor put in any shape, but which made her spirit faint out of her and all her strength ooze away.

"My dear Mary," said Mr. Penrose, mildly,
"why should you keep up any pretence with me?
Will has told me all. You cannot expect that a young man like him, at the beginning of his life, would relinquish his rights and give up such a fine succession merely out of consideration to your feelings. I am very sorry for you, and he is very sorry. Nothing shall be done on our part to compromise you beyond what is absolutely necessary; but your unfortunate circumstances are not his fault, and it is only reasonable that he should claim his rights."

"What are his rights?" said Mary; "what do you suppose my unfortunate circumstances to be? Speak plainly—or, stop; I will tell you what he has heard. He has heard that my husband and I were married in India before he was born. That is quite true; and I suppose he and you think——" said Mary, coming to a sudden gasp for breath, and making a pause against her will. "Then I will tell you the facts," she said, with a labouring, long-drawn breath, when she was able to resume. "We were married in Scotland, as you and everybody know; it was not a thing done in secret. Everybody about Kirtell—everybody in the county knew of it. We went to Earlston afterwards, where Hugh's mother was, and to Aunt Agatha. There was no shame nor concealment anywhere, and you know that. We went out to India after, but not till we had gone to see all our friends; and everybody knew—"

"My wife even asked you here," said Mr. Penrose, reflectively. "It is very extraordinary; I mentioned all that to Will: but, my dear Mary, what is the use of going over it in this way, when there is this fact, which you don't deny, which proves that Hugh Ochterlony thought it necessary to do you justice at the last."

Mary was too much excited to feel either anger or shame. The colour scarcely deepened on her cheek. "I will tell you about that," she said. "I resisted it as long as it was possible to resist. The man at Gretna died, and his house and all his records were burnt, and the people were all dead who had been present, and I had lost the lines. I did not think them of any consequence. And then my poor Hugh was seized with a panic, -you remember him, uncle," said Mary, in her excitement, with the tears coming to her eyes. "My poor Hugh! how much he felt everything, how hard it was for him to be calm and reasonable when he thought our interests concerned. I have thought since he had some presentiment of what was going to happen. He begged me for his sake to consent that he might be sure there would be no difficulty about the pension or anything. It was like dragging my heart out of my breast," said Mary, with the tears dropping on her hands, "but I yielded to please him."

And then there was a pause, inevitable on her part, for her heart was full, and she had lost the faculty of speech. As for Mr. Penrose, he gave quiet attention to all she was saying, and made mental notes of it while he filled himself another glass of wine. He was not an impartial listener, for he had taken his side, and had the conducting of the other case in his hands. When Mary came to herself, and could see and hear again—when her heart was not beating so wildly in her ears, and her wet eyes had shed their moisture, she gave a look at him with a kind of wonder, marvelling that he said nothing. The idea of not being believed when she spoke was one which had never entered into her mind.

"You expect me to say something?" said Mr. Penrose, when he caught her eye. "But I don't see what I can say. All that you have told me just amounts to this, that your first marriage rests upon your simple assertion; you have no documentary or any other kind of evidence. My dear Mary, I don't want to hurt your feelings, but if you consider how strong is your interest in it, what a powerful motive you have to keep up that story, and that you confess it rests on your word alone, you will see that, as Wilfrid's adviser, I am not justified in departing from the course we have taken. It is too important to be decided by mere feeling. I am very sorry for you, but I have Wilfrid's interests to think of," said Mr. Penrose, slowly swallowing his glass of wine.

Mary looked at him aghast; she did not understand him. It seemed to her as if some delusion had taken possession of her mind, and that the words conveyed a meaning which no human words could bear. "I do not understand you," she said, "I suppose there is some mistake. What course is it you have taken? I want to know what you mean."

"It is not a matter to be discussed with you," said Mr. Penrose. "Whatever happens, I would not be forgetful of a lady's feelings. From the first I have said that it must be a matter of private arrangement; and I have no doubt Hugh will see it in the same light. I have written to him, but I have not yet received a satisfactory answer. Under all the circumstances I feel we are justified in asserting Wilfrid to be Major Ochterlony's only lawful son—"

An involuntary cry came out of Mary's breast. She pushed her chair away from the table, and sat bending forward, looking at him. The pang was partly physical, as if some one had thrust a spear into her heart; and beyond that convulsive motion she could neither move nor speak.

"—and of course he must be served heir to his uncle," said Mr. Penrose. "Where things so important are concerned, you cannot expect that feeling can be allowed to bear undue sway. It is in this light that Wilfrid sees it. He is ready to do anything for you, anything for his brother; but he cannot be expected to sacrifice his legal rights. I hope Hugh will see how reasonable this is, and I think for your own sake you should use your influence with him. If he makes a stand you know it will only ruin your character, and make everybody aware of the unhappy position of affairs; and it cannot do any good to him."

Mary heard all this and a great deal more, and sat stupefied with a dull look of wonder on her face, making no reply. She thought she had formed some conception of what was coming to her, but in reality she had no conception of it; and she sat listening, coming to an understanding, taking it painfully into her mind, learning to see that it had passed out of the region of what might be—that the one great, fanciful, possible danger of her life had developed into a real danger, more dreadful, more appalling than anything she had ever conceived of. She sat thus, with her chair thrust back, looking in Mr. Penrose's face, following with her eyes all his upon her ears like a stinging rain. And this was all true; love, honour, pride, or faith had nothing to do with it. Whether she was a wretched woman, devising a lie to cover her shame, or a pure wife telling her tale with lofty truth and indignation, mattered nothing. It was in this merciless man's hand, and nothing but merciless evidence and proof would be of any use. She sat and listened to him, hearing the same words over and over; that her feelings were to be considered; that nothing was to be done to expose her; that Will had consented to that, and was anxious for that: that it must be matter of private arrangement, and that her character must be spared. It was this iteration that roused Mary, and brought her back, as it were, out of her stupefaction into life.

"I do not understand all you are saying," she said, at last; "it sounds like a horrible dream; I feel as if you could not mean it: but one thing—do you mean that Hugh is to be made to give up his rights by way of sparing me?"

"By way of sparing a public trial and exposure—which is what it must come to otherwise," said Mr. Penrose. "I don't know, poor boy, how you can talk about his rights.".

"Then listen to me," said Mary, rising up, and holding by her chair to support herself; "I may be weak, but I am not like that. My boy shall not give up his rights. I know what I am saying; if there should be twenty trials, I am ready to bear them. It shall be proved whether in England a true woman cannot tell her true story, and be believed. Neither lie nor shame has ever attached to me. If I have to see my own child brought against me—God forgive you!—I will try to bear it. My poor Will! my poor Will!—but Hugh's boy shall not be sacrificed. What! my husband, my son, my own honour—a woman's honour involves all belonging to her——Do you think I, for the sake of pain or exposure, would give them all up? It must be that you have gone out of your senses, and don't know what you say. I, to save myself at my son's expense!"

"But Wilfrid is your son too," said Mr. Penrose, shrinking somewhat into himself.

"Oh, my poor Will! my poor Will!" said Mary, moaning in her heart; and after that she went away, and left the supporter of Will's cause. startled, but not moved from his intention, by himself. As for Mrs. Ochterlony, she went up into her room, and sank down into the first chair that offered, and clasped her hands over her heart lest it should break forth from the aching flesh. She thought no more of seeing Will, or of telling him her story, or delivering him from his delusion. What she thought of was, to take him into her arms in an infinite pity, when the poor boy, who did not know what he was doing, should come to himself. And Hugh-Hugh her husband, who was thought capable of such wrong and baseness-Hugh her boy, whose name and fame were to be taken from him, -and they thought she would yield to it, to save herself a pang! When she came to remember that the night was passing; and to feel the chill that had crept over her; and to recall to herself that she must not exhaust her strength, Mary paused in her thoughts, and fell upon her knees instead. 'Even that was not enough; she fell prostrate, as one who would have fallen upon the Deliverer's feet; but she could say no prayer. Her heart itself seemed at last to break forth, and soar up out of her, in a speechless supplication -"Let this cup pass." Did not He say it once who had a heavier burden to bear?

"CARISSIMO."

Just beyond the Julian Gate,
Stands an old and ruin'd seat,
With some Latin and a date,
'Neath a broken statue's feet.
There, from out a batter'd mask,
Once a fountain used to flow,
There by day the lizards bask,
There by night the lovers go.

There I heard them over-night,
Billing, cooing—all alone;
I was hidden out of sight,
Where the bank slides sheerly down—
Sitting on an olive's root
In a dream of love and pain,
Eating Memory's bitter fruit;
Living the old times again.

Little Nina's voice it was,
Whispering "Carissimo"—
Once I did the same—alas!
That was twenty years ago.
'Twas the very voice and tone
Once her mother used to have;
I could not repress a groan,
Thinking she is in her grave.

Then they heard me, found me there Nina fell upon my breast,
Kiss'd my cheek—but I forbear—
You who know me, know the rest.
They are happy—from the tree
Falls the fruit when fully grown.
She is happy to be free—
I am wretched, left alone.

W. W. STORY.

THE DEFORMED AND THE STRICKEN.

This is a broadly expressed title, and I fear I shall neither be able to keep actually within it, nor to write quite up to its limits. My mind, in meditating upon the subject, took deformed people for a point of departure, but included in its way the sorely-stricken, whose inscrutable maladies connect themselves with the frame-work of the body, and have upon the surface that stamp of fatalism which is so awful, and so trying to the faith that would gladly see the hand of God in everything. It is peculiarly difficult to write of such things. One knows before he takes up the pen that numbers of his fellow-creatures, who are precisely so stricken, will read his words-and can they read them without some wincing? Alone, they might, but could they in the presence of others? I have not had a single fragment of experience myself of any kind of close intercourse with the deformed and stricken; but we all know how delicate and difficult a problem is often presented to us in our casual relations with, for instance, very decrepit people-especially decrepit women. They want help, perhaps; and the problem is, how to afford the help in an efficient manner, without seeming to recognise the defect which creates the need for it. Something of the same kind of feeling disturbs me now, as I reflect that stricken fellow-creatures (some of whom may be living a great deal nearer to God than I do), may happen to read these lines, and may wince as they read. Yet I never obeyed a clearer prompting than that in obedience to which I now write about Deformed and Stricken People. Somebody ought to put in plain words the deep incessant wakeful sympathy with which the unstricken think of them; the honour with which the strong remember the infirmities of the weak; in a word, the mighty currents of human love with which they are surrounded. If that love could be made known to them the saddest among them would surely lift up heart and head for a moment, and feel that the breath of God was warm upon their brow.

It was from Lord Byron that my own recent meditations upon the condition of the Deformed and Stricken took their rise. He has inspired a good many people with extreme dislike; and I, for one, used absolutely to hate him. Many years ago I read in Mr. Trelawney's "Recollections" his account of what he did when he saw Byron's corpse at Missolonghi:-" No one was in the house but Fletcher, who withdrew the black pall and the white shroud, and there lay the embalmed body of the Pilgrim-more beautiful even in death than in life. The contraction of the skin and muscles had effaced every line traced by time or passion; few marble busts could have matched its stainless white, the harmony of its proportions, and its perfect finish. Yet he had been dissatisfied with that body, and longed to cast its slough. How often have I heard him curse it. I asked Fletcher VIII-52 to bring me a glass of water; and on his leaving the room, to confirm or remove my doubts as to the cause of his lameness, I uncovered the Pilgrim's feet, and was answered—both his feet were clubbed, and the legs withered to the knee: the form and face of an Apollo, with the feet and legs of a sylvan satyr."

This is interesting, if only as correcting the usual impression that poor Byron had a club foot. But the questions which arose in my mind when I first read it were these: Had Mr. Trelawney any right to uncover the corpse of his dead friend? and, even if he had a right to do it, had he a right to go and tell? Upon reflection I decided that none of us could have any business to judge Mr. Trelawney, who was a brave man, and had proved himself a faithful friend to the whole of that strange, fascinating Italian group. That was all that passed through my mind at the time.

But some years afterwards the passage came before me again, and I read it with different eyes, with a burning agony of compassion for the unhappy man, which scorched out of my brain every line of severity that lay there for poor Byron. I forced myself to conceive, to picture the shrivelled limbs and the horrible feet; and then I felt-as who could help feeling?-with hot ignominious blushes, the irony of such a body: "the form and face of an Apollo, with the feet and legs of a sylvan satyr." And yet once more, I reflected, that any conception I could possibly form of the sufferings of a man of Byron's mould, from the ever-present sense of deformity, must fall indefinitely short of what he really did endure. "One day," says Mr. Trelawny, "after a bathe, he held out his right leg to me, saying-'I hope this accursed limb will be knocked off in the war.' 'It won't improve your swimming,' I answered; 'I will exchange legs, if you will give me a portion of your brains.' 'You would repent your bargain,' he said." There is no doubt Byron spoke what he really felt; although, no doubt, the majority of people have had the fancy that in his splendid powers, and splendid position, he was compensated for his bodily defect. But we may see in this anecdote how wrong such a fancy is. Again, Byron's lameness may, and probably had, much to do with, we need not say the intensity of his vices, but with something else. We do not hate a man for any kind of intensity in vice, however we disapprove; for example, we do not hate Mirabeau. But Byron's vices were more than intense, they were virulent, and it is that that we hate. And there are certain reasons for surmising that this peculiar virulence of vice is always connected with some physical defect. But, not to delay the subject with conjectures, let me say that my former dislike of Byron was drowned in a flood of compassion, and that this anecdote of Mr. Trelawney's telling, was the means of helping me to think, in future, with peculiar tenderness of deformed or blemished people.

Some of them, indeed, stand in no need of our pity, for they have manifested in their beautiful lives the very highest forms of human goodness. But the list of the fine natures which have been saddened and darkened, if not embittered and cankered, by natural or congenital blemish or deformity, is a long one. The poets, whose whole peculiar value and capacity of doing good is founded upon an unfathomably deep and unspeakably quick sense of beauty, seem to have come off rather badly in this regard. Three great modern names suggest themselves at once: Byron, Heine, Leopardi. We may safely conjecture that Heine would never have written with such a virulence of sceptical bitterness, if he had not been the paralytic wretch he was. What infinite suggestion of the very misery of helplessness lies in the simple fact that he could not open one of his own eyes-that the lid had to be lifted for him, if he was to see with it at all! Of Leopardi's story and writings, I know little. But I gather enough (from what is not plainly spoken) to know that his was the worst case of all; enough to give me, or anybody, dumb, crushing fits of horror. And yet his poetry does not appear to have any virulent bitterness in it. I speak with very imperfect knowledge. But one single fact will speak volumes for the music of his verse. It is from four to five or six years since I saw quoted in the Cornhill Magazine a single couplet from Leopardi, addressed to the moou-

> "Che fai tu, luna, in ciel? dimmi che fai, Silenziosa luna?"

Such was the exquisite music of that brief quotation, such its magic of sweetness, that it dwelt in my mind for years, and I looked out for Leopardi's name in future. I have since seen just enough of his writings (with which my acquaintance will, however, be improved in time) to feel that a musical sadness, a very peculiar plaintive rhythm, both of thought and manner, and not any virulence of bitterness, is the characteristic of Leopardi's poetry. But, I am informed, it is without even passing notes of faith or hope.

Happily, we all know that very deformed, and very horribly-stricken people, may and do live lives of tender beauty and unshaken trust. I have in my thoughts, while writing this, the case of a man of letters not very long dead, but whom I flinch from naming. Many of my readers will know very well who it is that I mean-how deformed he was, what a cheerful, confiding life his was, and what a happy memory he left with those of his friends who survived him. Instances of happy, sweet-souled creatures, with awfully mis-shapen bodies, are doubtless known to hundreds who will read these lines, in spite of the well-known blunder of Lord Bacon, which so many hasty people have copied or followed up. It is not true that deformed people are commonly even with nature, and avenge themselves upon their fellow-creatures. A crowd of sad, kind faces upon poor, crooked, bent bodies, rise up in my memory to contradict Bacon as I quote him; and some of the realistic novelists, who have the most keenly observed life, have introduced in deformed people types of character of uncommon beauty, tenderness, and power. Mr. Benson, in Mrs. Gaskell's "Ruth," is a case in point; and Will Belton's sister in Mr. Trollope's "Belton Estate" is another: nor is Philip Wakem, in George Eliot's "Mill on the Floss," an unworthy or unloveable man. How many of the people we meet in the streets and the shops are half as kind. or a quarter as just and as faithful to what is best in life? I once knew a deformed man who was the founder and the very life and soul of a ragged school; and I have not a moment's doubt that those whose duties call them to mingle more intimately than I do with the utterly poor, could tell off-hand and in great number the most thrilling stories of heroic goodness, active as well as passive, among the deformed and stricken, who, besides their peculiar trouble, have to struggle with mean, sordid, grinding poverty. Their reward is laid up in Heaven. What do I say? They have it now, in felt overflows of the Divine sympathy. And it is right that they should know the good they do us-remote from them and their work and their sorrows; only guessing at their existence, and yet guessing with a guess which is divinely certain. Friends, the thought of you comes like a pulse of the Infinite Love, and makes us move with happier wills and swifter feet.

The subject is not without its humorous, laughing side, as well as a crying side. During the whole of the time for which it is certain that a new human being is about to be brought into the world, I am sure a good many fathers suffer unutterable pangs of anxiety lest the new-comer should, in any painful way, vary from the type. But the "people" proper -those whom Hannah More particularly had in her eye when she wrote her "Tracts for the Common People"-have not, as a general rule, any particuliar sensitiveness to deformity or painful peculiarity. There are half a dozen shows in London this very night at which abnormal babies are exhibited before wondering and, on the whole, delighted crowds. And, when you come to think of it, we are all of us abnormal, all of us de-Where is the nose that is like the formed. Apollo's, the shoulder that is like the shoulder of the Milo Venus? Or if we can find perfect single features, where is the artist who has ever seen a perfect "model?" It may be a new view of the subject to some of us, but we are all of us unquestionably "deformed," somewhere or other: in our knees, or our noses, or our finger-ends, or our backs, or our ears, or somewhere else. And our little deformities are, sometimes at the very first, almost always in the long run, elements of attraction to those who love us. I don't say they are beauties, -the nature of things does not change,

-but they are attractions; and I pause to point this out, because I have read a great deal of muddleheaded nonsense about the non-existence of a "standard of beauty," from the pens of writers who did not draw the obvious distinction at which I am now hinting. By association of ideas, and tender "use-and-wont," a thing which is not at all beautiful may become highly agreeable, and minister to the ends of love. There is a story-don't go and say I vouched for its truth-of a young man who fell in love with a girl who squinted, and wooed her for a great many years. Shortly before the day appointed for the wedding, the girl, who thought it would be a pleasant surprise for her lover, went and submitted to the well-known operation for strabismus, and presented herself to him at his next visit with both eyes looking straight ahead. But, as the story goes, her betrothed was so bewildered by his inability now to meet her eye in the longaccustomed manner, that he chilled in his attentions from that hour, and at last the match was broken If the story is true, I can only say it is a pity the young man did not wait a little while, for the cherished squint might have returned, as a squint sometimes does after the operation in question. However, I will just add, that I have known at least one face of which the expression was almost seraphic, in spite of a squint. The last time I saw it, I was almost puzzled to think which side of the face I preferred, the side on which the eye squinted, or the side on which it did not.

One of the oddest cases of deformity I ever read or heard of, I found in a book by a well-known surgeon, Mr. Tuson, who has, I believe, great skill in dealing with deformities in general. This was the case of a gentleman whose head turned clean round and looked over his back the moment he began to walk. They made him a peculiar cap with a ring in it, and so, by means of a stick inserted in the ring, he was able to keep his head in front of him. I have laughed at this case till the tears have run down my cheeks; but I should not say so, if I could not add that the gentleman was cured. In spite, indeed, of the slow movement of what I may call visceral therapeutics, the advance of modern surgery seems to be as astonishing as anything else in the history of science. I have read of almost incredible cures in cases of spinal curvature, club-foot, and the like; and, indeed, there is scarcely anything that ought to be despaired of in their direction. There is an absurd anecdote about a sultan or pacha who, being blind of one eye, and hearing that a famous maker of glass eyes had arrived from England, sent for the man and bought one for his own use; but after a week's trial of the glass eye, had the poor artist severely bastinadoedbecause he found he could not see with the glass eye. But when I first read (or heard) this ridiculous story, it had an effect over and above that of making me laugh, the effect namely, of suggesting that science might really, some day, have something defect, as well as to certain kinds of blemish. The to say in the matter of artificial eyes, which should scar of an honourable wound no man winces at; but make the poor pacha cut a little less absurd figure. There would, of course, be certain forms of optical defect, or deterioration, to which science could have nothing helpful to say, because she could not create living tissues, or manufacture a nerve; but, though one is slow to believe anything of the kind, in a hoaxing world like this, there is surely nothing intrinsically absurd in a paragraph which I find in the Popular Science Review for October, and which briefly quotes from, I suppose, a French medical journal, an account of an artificial eye for restoring sight. The English journal expresses "much doubt," which we must all of us share, as to the "efficiency" of M. Blanchet's "phosphore," but we cannot read without interest a little account like this :- "The operation consists in puncturing the eye, and introducing a piece of apparatus to which M. Blanchet gives the name of 'phosphore.' The operation in most instances produces little pain. and when the globe of the eye has undergone degeneration, none at all, and the 'phosphore' apparatus is introduced without difficulty. The contrivance consists of a shell of enamel, and of a tube closed at both its ends by glasses, whose form varies according to circumstances. The operator first punctures the eye with a narrow bistoury. The translucent humour having escaped, the 'phosphore' apparatus is applied, and almost immediately, or after a short time, the patient is partially restored to sight! Before introducing the apparatus it is necessary to calculate the antero-posterior diameter of the eye, and if the lens has cataract it must be removed. Inasmuch as the range of vision depends on the quantity of the humour left behind, M. Blanchet recommends the employment of spectacles of various kinds."

Generally, it may be deemed that the assistance rendered by surgical science in remedying or supplementing natural defects is much greater than is generally known. Those who read medical works now and then obtain glimpses of it, and I have sometimes wished that a Book of Hope were compiled for the deformed and stricken out of cases successfully treated by the skill of the surgeon. I may add that, in modern practice, surgery is obviously following the same line of direction as medicine; i.e., it tries more and more to get "nature to help herself," as the phrase is: for instance, there is less of the kn fe and the iron boot, and the stretching pulley, and a great deal more of surgical gymnastics. I cannot but believe that there are thousands of sufferers from bodily deformity capable of cure, who do not seek cure simply because they are too ill-informed to believe cure (or alleviation bordering on cure) to be possible.

I dare say some people will find the feeling I have thrown into a few of the foregoing sentences excessively funny. They are welcome. I make them a present of the information that I am (what they will call) "morbidly" sensitive to congenital bodily there is something horrible to me in the idea of a scar from a flogging. I never see a common soldier, or a volunteer of the same rank, without a shudder, and the thought, "That man is liable to have his back cut open by the lash." Nor shall I ever have done wondering that people are found to join the volunteer corps when that liability exists. In the same way, I always try to forget, or not to know that a man has been educated in a public school, or that a boy is being educated at one; for I have otherwise the ever-present miserable thought, "That man's, or boy's, body has been scarred by the rod." To this hour-at this moment of writing, the blood rises to the tips of my ears as I think of such things. It is not wrong or trivial, it is highly important that such things should be spoken; it is good that the world should know that there are men who do feel like this. And I have not the least doubt there are thousands who do. I never was flogged, and I never administered a flogging; but I positively know that permanent scars do come of school and domestic floggings. "A light matter, a thing to laugh at!" In your eyes, I dare say; but in mine a misery, a horror, and a haunting degradation.

There is no degradation attaching to the idea of a congenital defect, or a purely accidental deformity; but there is much grief and pain in such a thing, and there is much sympathy for all the deformed and the irremediably "stricken." If I speak the feeling that is in me, I shall speak the feeling of a million; and that feeling is always one of affectionate and respectful wonder at the cheerfulness, the energy, and the uncorrodable goodness of heart so often shown by the Deformed and the Stricken, while we—— ah! I need not finish the sentence. Let us go and abhor ourselves very much, and mend our manners and our moods.

It is a well known fact that the moment you turn your mind to a subject, a hundred things turn up to illustrate it, without your seeking them. At this very moment I find in a newspaper the following:-"Mr. Kavanagh of Borris, stated to be 'a descendant of a race of Irish kings,' has addressed the electors of Wexford as the Derbyite candidate for the seat which will be vacated by the promotion of Mr. George. He is much respected as a landlord and country gentleman, and is very popular with the peasantry, both on account of his lineage and of the spirit with which he contends against extraordinary natural defects. Born without either hands or feet, Mr. Kavanagh is an accomplished player on several musical instruments, a daring rider to hounds, a capital shot, and a dexterous coachman. If he carries Wexford he will have to be himself carried into the House of Commons." Admirable! I think, if I were born without hands and feet, I should feel that I was a Joke, and that playing on "several musical instruments"-all at once, if possible-was the best way of-of-explaining MATTHEW BROWNE.

ICE-CAVES OF ANNECY.

ATTENTION has recently been called to the curious works of nature locally known in Switzerland and in some parts of France as glacières, or ice-caves, being caves in which large masses of ice are found throughout the year, in latitudes and at altitudes where ice would not naturally be expected to appear in summer. Many of these are out of the reach of tourists who object to face discomforts, not to say hardships, in their search for the picturesque or the strange; but in the neighbourhood of Annecy, in what is now the French department of Haute-Savoie, three remarkable ice-caves are found, which can all be visited in the course of a long day from comfortable and attainable head-quarters. The present paper contains some account of a second visit to these caves, in the summer of 1865, the object of which was to complete certain investigations left unfinished in the previous year.

Our party consisted only of two members of the Alpine Club, one of whom has on various occasions done something towards raising the scientific character of that muscular society. We left the diligence, or rather it left us, at Charvonnaz, close upon Les Ollières, a hamlet some three-quarters of an hour distant from the residence of our excellent friend the Maire of Aviernoz, the owner of two of the glacières and our guide to all, with whom we had made arrangements by post for the further exploration of the caves. Being breakfastless, we naturally asked for the nearest auberge at Les Ollières, and were informed circumstantially that it was only ten minutes off, near the Church, an amount of detail which might in itself have rendered us sceptical as to the existence of the auberge, if we had not been fresh from England. We went on for more than one ten minutes, each new peasant assuring us that there was no such thing nearer than Thorens, which we knew to be some miles off, and declaring that we could not even be supplied with bread or milk aux Ollières. At length a larger house appeared at some small distance from the path, and we determined, auberge or no auberge, to breakfast there. M. Joly, for such we eventually discovered the distinguished name of the proprietor to be, was supercilious at first, but after some explanations as to our position and intentions, he became polite and elaborately hospitable.

On inquiring about M. Métral, the Maire of Aviernoz, and M. Rosset, the Instituteur of that commune, we found that M. Joly was a friend of both, and he proposed to accompany us as far as the Mairie, a proposal which we accepted with polite raptures. He put on his best hat and coat accordingly, and led the way. Finding that we were ecclisiastiques of the Anglican Church, he proceeded to ask precisely the same questions that the schoolmaster of Aviernoz had asked the year before, couching them in such very similar language that I am disposed to believe it is a part of the religious instruction of the district to slander the faith of our Church.

When we reached the Mairie, about eight o'clock in the morning, we found that M. Métral had gone out to work in his fields, under the impression that the weather was too bad to allow of our projected visit, and M. Rosset was still in bed. The Mayoress meanwhile received us with some empressement, and sent for the Maire and awoke the schoolmaster. The latter appeared first, in a state of great delight by reason of the arrival of his friend of the previous year, and of some squalor by reason of the hastiness of his toilette. We shook hands most affectionately; but with that insular coldness which characterises even the most adaptable Englishman, I abstained from embracing and saluting him. He was much impressed by the presence of the vrai savant, my companion, to whom I introduced him, and he rejoiced greatly in our turning up on the day we had fixed, inasmuch as it was his weekly holiday, and he could therefore accompany us without the necessity of any ingenious devices to excuse his absence from scholastic duties. Presently the Maire arrived. He, unlike the schoolmaster, did not look so well as in the previous year. The end of his nose was decidedly and fixedly red, and his incessant shrug had eventuated in chronic high shoulders.

Considerable preparations had been made for our expedition. One of the domestics was to accompany us as porter, and a monsieur from Annecy, a good friend and confrère of the Maire's, had engaged to come out and give us his countenance for the day; indeed, he had promised to condescend so far as to call upon us at the Hotel de Genève, and accompany us from Annecy to Aviernoz, but that he had not To enhance his merits, M. Métral informed us that he was an aubergiste. As he did not appear before the start from the Mairie, his alpen-stock was made over to Bonney, whose trusty weapon had been lost the week before on a railway in Brittany. The new possessor was not as grateful as he ought to have been for the honour, misdoubting the sustaining power of a long and thin mottled bamboo-for such the stock was-with a point something like the broken awls with which boys used to arm their reed arrows in the days when boys were boys and made their own offensive weapons.

A steep ascent through fir woods brought us in two hours to the furthest of the Maire's three châlets, where we encountered a particularly disagreeable brouillard, and endeavoured to console ourselves by lunching on uncooked ham and boiled milk. Bonney was scientific enough to take an altitude observation with his aneroid, and fastidious enough to broil his ham on the end of a stick, marks of the civilised savant which caused the assembled party to marvel, and brought upon the poor Maire the affliction of burned fingers in the course of a praiseworthy effort of imitation with respect to the ham. Twenty minutes from this showed the mouth of the first glacière, the glacière of Grand Anu, as Rosset had spelled it for me the year before, though now he said that ahn would be a better spelling. As we stood amid rude vegetation at the edge of the huge pit in whose side is the entrance to the eave, the appearance of the vast portal below, with its gigantic architrave of a single block almost regular enough to give the idea of art, was exceedingly impressive; and the large masses of piled snow which lay at the bottom of the pit and led into the darkness added much to the strangeness of the scene. The perpendicular depth of the pit is 120 feet, and the descent of more than half of this is by the snow which has resisted the summer's heat. Bonney made the accompanying sketch from a point a few feet below the edge of the pit, in spite of the impossibility of drawing down-hill.

The snow had very much increased since the last year, and it gave M. Joly much fear. That upright man came slowly and stiffly on, at each step tottering on the verge of becoming an avalanche, and not reassured by the dreadful yells of Rosset, who had preceded him and developed a mania for waking the subterranean echoes. M. Joly arrived at the bottom at last; but it was evident even in that dim light that he had left his colour behind, and from observations made during the day it is certain that he never quite recovered it. The increase of snow was still more perceptible at the mouth of the cave than on the side of the pit of descent, and where there had been in the previous year a neat and precise pyramid of that material, there was now a huge misshapen mass, almost blocking up the entranec. The amount of ice on the walls was very great, much greater than before, and its folds and curves were beyond description beautiful and grand. To my great satisfaction, the prismatic structure of the ice, which many of those whom I had consulted on the subject had attempted to explain away, was very beautifully and clearly marked, and we chopped out at random masses of ice composed entirely of separable prisms. We found, as might have been expected, that an hexagonal arrangement prevailed; but there were apparently many exceptions, and in numerous cases the bounding lines of the end surfaces of the prisms were not straight lines. Some of the prisms were decidedly of the nature of truncated pyramids, and others were twisted. The ice seemed to be but little less hard and difficult to cut by reason of this structure. The pieces chopped out usually broke off at the depth of from one to two inches below the surface, and prisms of that length were easily separated from the mass by means of a penknife; very often our fingers alone sufficed for the operation. The accompanying sketch (p. 744) shows a part of the glacial decoration on one of the walls of the cave, the ice of the foreground being the solid floor of unknown thickness.

A pit in the ice on the opposite side of the cave was the point on which our hearts were set. I had found it on my former visit, and had fathomed it to a depth of 70 feet, the aperture at top being a yard or four feet across. One side of the pit was the solid rock wall of the cave; the other sides were the ice of the floor. We had brought from England a sufficient length of the stoutest Alpine club rope, and pulleys running on bars of iron, with an abundance of strong staples to make our proposed descent free from danger. To make it if possible comfortable, we had caused to be made a broad and strong belt of stretching-girth and leather, that we might not be cut by the rope while being let down. At the mouth of the original pit of entrance we had cut three strong limbs of young fir trees, which were to be laid across the pit, and make the framework for the pulleys supporting the rope. But alas! the first sight of the edge of the pit made it too evident that our plan could not answer. Notwithstanding the great increase of ice on the walls of the cave, the ice forming the floor had disappeared to the extent of nearly a foot in depth, and as it had departed irregularly about the mouth of the pit, and the opposite side was sheer rock with a narrow ledge at the former level of the ice, there was no place for the logs of wood to rest upon. Indeed it was unpleasant work to approach the pit at all in the dim light which alone reached that side of the glacière, and for further safety we lay flat on our faces, and thrust our heads over the edge to look down into the utter darkness, knowing from my previous visit that the ice caved away sharply under our feet. We had brought out a number of yards of magnesium wire for the illumination of the lower regions; but when we began to make experiment thereof, we found that, without some further contrivance than we had the means of effecting, the wire was of no use to us. Each motion of the hand, or jerk of the string which supported the wire, caused the ignited portion to snap off, and after a score of attempts we fell back upon our oil lamps. Bougies had been intended to be our main stay for all ordinary purposes, but when we asked the Maire for some at his house, he assured us that there was not a candle of any kind in the whole commune, none nearer than Thorens indeed. Of oil lamps we had two. One was our own property, a bull's eye lantern purchased for the occasion in Cambridge, and it turned out to be the most atter imposture ever perpetrated, dying in an unscrupulous and unseemly manner within a minute of each fresh re-arrangement of the wick. The other was a lamp of the country, from the luncheon châlet, looking completely past work, but doing its little best when tried. This we lowered steadily, with the care which might be expected of men whose only luminary was being committed to unknown and perilous depths. As the feeble twinkling light descended, it showed in passing that what had before been bare rock had now a thick coating of ghost-like ice, profusely decorated with large corbel towers and massive pendants; and though immediately under where we lay the solid ice which formed the floor of the glacière caved inwards, the pit seemed to be closely surrounded with ice through three-fourths of its circumference, and wherever the scanty light of the oil-wick penetrated, we saw still the same glacial decoration. Between 60 and 70 feet below the surface, the lamp struck a floor of ice, and as we payed out more line it glided smoothly down the slope, passing at length under an arch in the rock, which hid it from our view at a depth of 73 feet. Just before its disappearance, the flame burst for a moment into something like brilliancy, and the flash revealed to us the smoothest possible slope of dark ice, passing on as far as we could see. This was close upon 200 feet below the surface of the earth, and the temptation to prosecute our designs was naturally great; but independent of the fact that there was no possible point d'appui for our apparatus of cords and pulleys, it struck us that the rope in swinging about as we descended must detach some of the heavy corbels of ice, and launch them upon the adventurous head below. Any one of them would have been sufficient to fracture an ordinary skull. Besides, the slope at the bottom was, so far as we could tell by the one glimpse we had caught of it, so exceedingly smooth, and so very sufficiently rapid, that a man suspended, as we had proposed, with a belt under his arm-pits supporting all his weight, could never effect a fast footing, and so must be content to slide down shapeless out of the sight of those above, till such time as water, or a precipice, or the end of the 90 feet of rope should arrive. Under all the circumstances, we determined that no good could come of an attempted descent; and even the dictum of a friend, who, having the lowest possible opinion of all approach to instruments and observations in connection with the Alps, had told us that 'if we were smashed, it would be a comfort to be smashed in the interests of science,' could not to any practical extent ameliorate the unpleasantness of the situation. All the same, it would be a useful thing to determine how far towards the centre of the earth this strange stream of subterranean ice rolls down the wide fissures of the limestone rock.

We decided sorrowfully that this investigation must be left to other and better equipped explorers, and made a start for the second glacière. This had declined to be found in the previous year, having only been discovered two years before, and never since visited. On the receipt of my note to the Maire, Rosset had gone off for a hunt in the neighbourhood of the place where the Maire had told us it certainly ought to be, and having succeeded in finding it, had marked it down. Nevertheless, we were taken hither and thither among the chasms and furrows in the white live rock, which here formed the surface, and up and down the projecting masses of stone, in a very unsystematic manner. Patience and endurance, however, met with their reward after a time, and the coy glacière stood at length revealed. Nothing could be more unlike the grand wild opening of the former glacière, than the unpretentious hole which afforded the only means of reaching l'Enfer, a name which provided the schoolmaster with inexhaustible material for witticisms bordering on the blasphemous, and sometimes transgressing the boundary. A desceut under an archway of rock, by a slope of muddy shingle for forty feet or so, ushered us into a large low hall with a floor of ice, of which we could see no termination any way, for -unlike the previous glacière-daylight failed as soon as we reached the bottom of the slope. Once more we gave the impostor lantern a chance, but it failed even more miserably than before, and the native lamp, which had braved the dangers of the pit we dared not face, did not give sufficient light to render locomotion under its guidance safe, especially as we were a party of six, and only one could have the lamp at once. We therefore resorted to the magnesium wire, and saw at once the form and dimensions of the cave. The floor appeared to be of solid ice, perfectly level and unbroken, and formed an area approximately circular, with a diameter, as we afterwards determined by measurement, of seventy-five or eighty feet. The roof was ten or twelve feet above the floor, and the surface of the rock composing it was almost even. From one side to the other it scarcely varied at all, and the effect of this even natural roof, stretching away always parallel with the floor, was very remarkable. Progressing slowly at such times as the magnesium wire chose to burn, and remaining earefully without motion during the frequent intervals, we arrived at length at a hole in the ice floor, and into this the two Englishmen made their way. It soon turned under the ice, and we proceeded by the light given by a succession of wax vestas to explore its further recesses, sternly forbidding any of the others to come. Little came of it, however, except that we saw enough to show that the ice composing the floor of the cave was of great thickness. On our return to the surface of the ice floor, we found that the others of our party had become sufficiently accustomed to the darkness, or twilight, to move cautiously without a candle, and they had discovered that at the farthest end of the cave the ice did not quite reach up to the wall of rock, but was rounded off in a swelling wave, leaving a sort of Bergschrund or gap a foot or two across, formed of course on a principle the very opposite of that of a Bergschrund proper. Into this hole they threw stones, which crashed down over ice for what sounded like some considerable distance, and then fell heavily into water. It seemed to be possible to effect a descent at one end of this chasm, where the ice joined the rock, so Bonney put on the belt and we let him down with the lamp. He reported that at a depth of about twelve feet a tunuel-shaped hole passed steeply down under the main mass of ice, and at the bottom of this tunnel water was visible. He threw down several large pieces of stone, and made all the observations he could, and then we hauled him up again. The other Englishman in turn assumed the belt, and was let down with a string for measuring distances, and a supply of magnesium wire to illuminate the depths. The length of the tunnel proved to be twenty-three feet, and its slope we guessed at about 30°, so that the thickness of the mass of ice forming the floor of the glacière - 's here about twenty-four feet. The water was whited in a cave in the ice, lying in a most suggestially unpleasant manner at the end of the tunuel, which was perhaps four feet high. The standing ground provided by nature for these observations was of the narrowest and most unsatisfactory description, and we were obliged to have the rope kept on a constant stretch to check the frequent commencements of a slide down into the tunnel. While half-standing, half-hanging, I chanced to kick a large piece of decayed wood towards the mouth of the tunnel, and getting on to the slope it glided rapidly down, and fell with a loud splash into the water. A second or two elapsed, when a horrible gurgling groan issued from some cavernous depth, and almost frightened me into losing my hand-hold. They heard it distinctly above, and were asking what could that noise be, when to our dismay, the same rolling groan came from far away under the ice, feeling its way, as it were, towards the tunnel, and up to where I stood. At periods of several seconds it continued to be repeated, losing nothing of its horror, as long as I stayed down below; and after they had hauled me up it still lasted, growing rather fainter and occurring at considerably less intervals, till at last, when we went away, it was going at the rate of thirty-nine groans in a minute. Those who have heard a large hydraulic ram at work, and can conceive that sighing, groaning noise transferred to such a place as I have described, and made horrible by the acoustic properties of the black depths from which it issued, may have some idea of what it was. The schoolmaster suggested, with a ready ingenuity which I believe came very near the truth, that the noise was related to that class of noises which water running from the neck of a bottle allows the entering air to make. He imagined that the piece of wood I had despatched to the lower regions, had been sufficiently heavy to remove some obstacle, which had before prevented the accumulated waters from passing through a hole into a reservoir still further underground, and that the noise we heard was, on a large scale, exactly the gurgling noise which attends the flow of fluid from a bottle. It is unnecessary to suggest any of the various modifications of this theory, which the tastes of different theorisers may form. It may very probably be that some explanation of the noise can be given on grounds radically different from those which Rosset enunciated, but for the present I am quite inclined to believe that he hit off the true theory, or something very like it.

At the mouth of the glacière we found a young man in a blue blonse, whom the Maire introduced as his confrère, the aubergiste from Annecy, who had come out to give himself the pleasure of joining our party. With this accession to our forces, we marched off to the third glacière, down a very remarkable face of riven and eroded rock. The cheminée leading to this glacière was found without difficulty, and four of us ascended to the entrance of the cave. The Maire had declared, early in the day, that though he had not entered this glacière when I was last there, he fully intended to explore it with us now; but he changed his mind at last, year's carefulness about risking his neck in the descent from the entrance cave to the fissure in which the glacière lay, had been attributed to a patriotic determination that so exalted a person as the Maire of Aviernoz must at all hazards be kept unhurt, but he had no such excuse now, for he informed us that the elections had taken place three days before, and another was Maire. He had been eligible for re-election, but had not desired it. Indeed it was nothing but trouble, being The Maire, then-for so we were still at liberty Maire; there was nothing to be made by it, and and did not even attempt the cheminée. His last the work was great. Five or six francs, for journeys which he was forced to make on communal business, that was all the reimbursement he received. It appeared, however, that whether eligible or not, he had no chance for re-election, for the prefet had put down the name of the man to be chosen, and the commune had been obedient. The election had occurred after three, instead of after five years, so M. Métral's period of dignity had not been so long as he had expected.

to call him, inasmuch as the bare sapin, which is planted in front of the official's house, and points out to the world the position of the Mairie, had not been removed-and the monsieur from Annecy remained at the bottom of the cheminée; indeed the Maire eventually made his way to the fire of some Italian charcoal burners, where we found him roasting on our return. M. Joly, still manfully maintaining an upright back, clambered stiffly up the cheminée, and posed himself in the small cave at top, a sort of dark ante-room to the narrow internal fissure which penetrates into the heart of the mountain, with its roof of rock immensely high above. He had long before relapsed into a sort of moody silence, caused by his fatigue, and broken only by occasional questions to which he seemed not to require any answer, such as, "The English are the greatest people in the world?" "You don't believe ' in baptism?" and so on. The rest of the party made towards the drop which leads from this cave to the fissure, and we observed that there was an absence of the icy current of air, which had so tried our endurance and our candles on the previous visit. On lowering the solitary little oil-lamp down this drop, we found, to our astonishment, that the fissure was choked with snow, commencing eight or nine feet below the platform where we stood, and passing down as far as we could see-which is not command a radius of six feet. I had believed, on my previous visit, that it was quite impossible for snow to reach the fissure, and I am now at a loss to know how it got there, unless the lie of the hills and gullies exposes the mouth of the cave to strong northerly winds, which drift the snow through the various windings of the approach to the fissure. We could see that the snow shrank from the sides of the fissure, and so presented a sharp descending arête, with what may be called a Bergschrund on a small scale on either side. To pass down this in saying much, for the range of the lamp did not the dark was as unsatisfactory a process as can well be imagined, for the friction caused by the contact of a broad shoulder with the rugged side of the fissure was often the only hold, excepting the sharp edge of unresisting snow, on which the foot dared place no reliance whatever. Considering how useful the bull's-eye lantern would have been, we rather wished we had the man who sold it at one or two of the worst parts of the descent.

The snow reached as far as the entrance to the first ice-chamber. This, a gallery of forty feet long, showed a complete flooring of ice, whereas in the previous year, rather earlier in the summer, there had only been ice at the further end of the floor. The cascade which blocked that end was much higher and more striking than on that occasion, when it measured seven yards in height. It must have been now, at the least, half as much again, and the ice was thicker and more beautiful. most limpid parts of it were prismatic, and were so clear that, as we moved the lamp backwards and forwards, the meshes of the net-work of shadow cast through the ice upon the rock behind were most distinct, being magnified and diminished, of course, according as the lamp was nearer or further off. In one part we observed that the mass was formed of prisms of very large size, the ice being so clear and limpid that the shadow cast by the dividing lines was seen as if nothing were interposed between us and the rock on which it rested. Some of these prisms were at least three inches across the exposed end, and one or two cast shadows of most perfect hexagons; their length, that is, the thickness of the ice in this particular part, must have been half a foot, and was possibly a good deal more. Their beauty was so great, that here, as in the first glacière, we groaned over the impossibility of carrying them away. Some parts of this cascade were interspersed with large and eccentric air-bubbles, but in the best prisms there was not a flaw of any kind.

It was now time to descend to the lower chamber on the right hand side of the fissure, everything being, of course, involved in the most pitchy darkness. The solid ice floor of this chamber, and the remains of columns at the entrance, were apparently in precisely the same state as when I had last seen them. But the corner which we were bent upon exploring was much changed, unfortunately for our schemes. It was before closed by a curtain of ice, and a hole in the curtain was easily made large enough to admit a man. Within the curtain I had found a gentle slope of ice passing down into a supposed chamber, which gave forth sounds of water and of rock in answer to the lumps of ice despatched along the slope. The curtain at that time formed a low roofing, which did not permit me to stand upright, but allowed room for sitting on the ice-slope and using the axe to cut steps. I had desisted on that occasion from proceeding more than a yard or two down the slope, in consequence of the absence of ropes, and the impossibility of finding any holding for hands or feet in case of a slip. We were now well provided with ropes, and we attacked the curtain in great spirits. It was evident at a first glance that the amount of the ice which formed the curtain had very much increased, but we were not prepared for the labour it cost us to hew a hole through it. The difficulty of this process was made greater by the extreme slipperiness of the ice on which those who hewed and those who looked on were obliged to stand. Whenever the hewer put more than ordinary vigour into a stroke, his foothold gave way, and he slid along the ice bent double and with all sides foremost, in that fatuous way which marks a beginner's appearance on skates. This was only partially remedied by roughening with the axe the ice-floor in the neighbourhood of the desired hole in the curtain. When at length we had all had our turn, and had all skated about involuntarily and inelegantly, and were all pretty well tired, a hole sufficiently large to admit a man, legs first, was achieved, and we sent in the oil-lamp to explore. The icy current which rushed out from the hole was almost too much for the feeble flame, and blew it about so much that we could see nothing of what was inside. We therefore lighted a piece of the magnesium wire, and after many unsuccessful attempts contrived to light up the interior with it. In place of a tolerably roomy cave, with floor and roof of ice, and ice on one side and the other, we found a mere trough. The diminution in size was caused by the lowering of the icy roof, which now approached much nearer to the slope forming the floor, and ran parallel with it as far as we could see, until the flooring passed down into invincible darkness, and the roof joined the rock. What we had called a curtain was in fact a grand and solid mass of ice, streaming down from a fissure in the rock, and completely occupying all that corner of the chamber. This mass of ice reached within two feet of the ice floor through all its thickness, and the curtain in which we had hewn a hole was a veil hung before the entrance to the broad and low tunnel thus made. The roof was very prettily groined, and was studded with crystals, and here and there graceful pillars ran up to it from the floor. There was nowhere room to sit upright, barely sufficient room for a man lying down, and there was no possible chance of using an axe. It was clear, however, that a man lying on the ice could worm himself along down the slope, and accordingly the belt was put on and I essayed to go, entering feet first, and taking our only light with me. But before I was well in a feeling of suffocation came on. The situation was too much like what it must be to be buried alive. Whatever happened, it was impossible to do much more than raise the head and indulge in lateral motion of the arms and legs. The idea was so unpleasant that I resolved to be cowardly and go no further. There seemed to be no reason for supposing that there would be more vertical space further on, where the slope became more rapid and turned a corner of the rock; so that it was among probabilities that an explorer in my circumstances would be let gradually down by the rope, gliding on his back round this corner, and there would remain jammed when the attempt to pull him up again was made. Besides, the horrible devouring gurgle of the depths of the last glacier was still in our ears, and this tunnel in which I lay might end in sudden water just as the tunnel in l'Enfer did. Water we knew to be round the corner at some greater or less distance, and the idea of plunging in, feet first, off a slippery slope of ice, without room for any kind of struggle, and without a certainty that the spasmodic tirez! tirez! would reach through all obstacles to the men at the other end of the rope, finally decided the question. Before calling, however, to them to haul me up through the hole, I observed that the roof of this strange trough was thickly set with the same brown case-flies which I had found in the glacières of La Genollière and S. Livres in the Jura, and here, in the previous year. 'The present specimens struck me as being smaller than those I had before seen, and I secured two-being all I could accommodate in fingers already encumbered by an axe and an oil-lamp. Then they were told to haul me out, which they did with a will, evidently enjoying it much more than I did, and oblivious to the fact that a human being feels more than a log of wood may be supposed to do, when jerked abruptly on his back over a little obstacle a foot high, consisting of a solid threshold of ice jagged with recent hewing. While we were placing the two flies in the box prepared for them, we found that two others had attached themselves to my coat, and one of these was of an entirely different species. These insects have since been submitted to the inspection of the Entomological Society. Three of them are specimens of Stenophylax, the largest being probably, though not certainly, S. hieroglyphicus of Stephens, as the specimen brought from an ice-cave in the Jura had already been supposed The two smaller caddis flies are either S. testaceus of Pictet, or some very closely allied species. The remaining insect is an ichneumon of the genus Paniscus, but no one has been able to identify it with any described species. It differs from all its congeners in the marking of the throat, and in this respect bears a strong resemblance to some species of Ophion; nevertheless, it is a true Paniscus.* The case-flies may have been washed into the cave, somehow or other, in the larva form, and come to maturity on the ice where they have lodged. Case-flies, it is well known, have the power of adapting themselves to great extremes of cold; the same flies which come to maturity in one year, or even in one season, in protected and warmer regions, requiring two and three and even four years to arrive at the perfect state at higher altitudes, or in colder latitudes. But this explanation will not hold in the case of the ichneumon, which is a parasitic genus on larvæ of terrestrial insects. The ice trough in which the flies were found must have been hermetically sealed at the end by which we entered. No one who had seen the huge curtain of ice which shut in that corner of the cave could doubt the fact. The other end plunged down into darkness, and blocks of ice despatched down the slope fell at length into water. A great entomological authority is of opinion that the presence of the ichneumon proves conclusively that some communication with the outer air existed at the time. or had very recently existed, but the depths into which the trough plunged pass straight on towards the heart of the mountain in whose face the original entrance to the fissure lies. Another gentleman, who has for several years, investigated the insect fauna of Switzerland, is inclined to think that the curtain could not have hermetically sealed the entrance to the trough, and that through its interstices the insects had flown. In any case it is exceedingly remarkable that this particular cavity in the ice should be found to contain such a very large number of the same insects that I had found in two of the Jurane ice-caves the summer before. The flies were perfectly stationary on the ice until touched, when they ran actively, and we had great difficulty in catching the ichneumon.

On the opposite side of the main fissure from that on which this triangular chamber opened out, we found the same curious channel of motionless water that we had observed the year before, lying about a yard and a half wide between vertical walls of rock which passed up out of sight. By lighting the fissure with magnesium wire we discovered with some difficulty the other end of this singular channel, far away from the furthest point we could reach. The rock at the end rose up vertically like the sides, and we did not succeed in detecting the roof. The man who accompanied us from the Mairie declared that he had long known the glacière, and had been employed to extract ice from it for M. de Chosal of Annecy, and that on one occasion he had found one side of the channel of water solid ice, along which he had passed till he reached yet another ice-cave.

This supplementary visit to

This supplementary visit to the glacières of Mont Parmelan and the Montagne de l'Eau had the effect of raising our opinion of the grandeur of the natural phenomena connected with them, while our observations seemed to show that no very deep scientific reasons for their existence need be sought. The presence of a large quantity of snow in the cave last described contradicted the opinion formed upon the observations of the previous visit, and showed that in this cave also snow may have played the large part it certainly does play in many glacières in the production of the larger masses of ice which form the solid floor of the caves. Very probably such glacières may be found in connection with many of the neigières, or snow-holes, which abound in the Jura, in cases at least where the water formed by the melting snow does not run off entirely by natural drainage, but lodges in a cave at the bottom or side of the pit. And from the nature of snow it is easy to see that the mere presence of a large superincumbent mass will tend to convert the lower parts into ice when the infiltration of surface water is taken into account, without the necessity of supposing a complete thaw of the snow and a separate freezing of the resulting water. The decorative parts which appear on the walls in the shape of curtains, and as pillars, and stalactites, and stalagmites, are originally no doubt formed in the end of winter or in early spring, and are maintained by the low temperature which a cave half full of ice and snow must possess. Probably, indeed almost certainly, additions are made to these portions of the ice by the congelation of some of the water which courses over them, or falls on to them from fissures in the roof and walls of the cave, at later periods of the spring and summer. It is worthy of special notice that in the course of a visit paid to two of the Jurane ice-caves in the middle of January of the present year, a small course of water was found to be running down the face of a rock where in summer is nothing but a solid sheet of ice; and a certain pathway in the cave, which in the hot months is difficult by reason of a thick crust of ice, was bare rock. This appears to point to early spring as the time when the fermation of the decorative parts of the ice commences.

^{*} I have to thank Mr. R. M'Lachlan and Mr. Albert Müller for valuable information and suggestions with respect to these insects.

The temperatures in the three glacières after we had been in them some little time were respectively as follows:-1.2 centigrade, 1.5, and 2.5, being higher than the register of the previous year, observed a few weeks earlier in the season. misconduct of the aneroid renders the altitude observations less trustworthy, but the heights of the three caves are probably from 4900 to 5500 feet. With regard to the prismatic structure so very clearly marked, it seems possible that when large masses of ice are subjected for a length of time to the summer temperature of these caves, a degree or two degrees above freezing, the surface takes the opportunity afforded by the partially relaxed condition of its molecules to assume to a definite extent the crystalline form which in a more modified degree is natural to it.

MARY MERRYWEATHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "QUAKER PHILANTHROPY."

THE philanthropic labours of Miss Merryweather commenced several years prior to the date when the subject of nursing was brought prominently before the public by the doings of Miss Nightingale. Indeed, from an early age she seems to have devoted her energies to the comfort, instruction, and elevation of those around her. For some time, however, she did not confine her exertions to any one definite object, but merely did what good she could, and wherever she found the opportunity. But one day, in the summer of 1847, a friend narrated to her the particulars of a fête she had witnessed a short time before, which had been given to the factory hands of some large silk works situated near Halstead. Miss Merryweather was much interested in the recital, and asked many questions respecting the condition of the operatives employed. Her friend readily gave her a lucid description of the extraordinary amount both of good and evil to be found among the silk workers, yet the good and the evil seemed balanced in such equal proportions, that it was difficult to say which predominated. The proprietors of the factory, she stated, were by no means to blame, for more liberal or kind-hearted people it would be difficult to find. They had already done what had been suggested for the improvement of their operatives, especially the girls, and they were now seeking for some lady who could undertake to read and lecture to them daily, as the Ten Hours' Bill, which had lately come into operation, gave them far more leisure than they JIGINIZED by had hitherto enjoyed.

The graphic description Miss Merryweather's friend had given her of the condition of the factory hands at Halstead greatly interested her. The more she thought over the subject, the more attractive did it grow, until at last she resolved to offer her services to Mr. Courtauld, the proprietor of the silk works, in the capacity of reader and lecturer to the factory girls in his employ. She had little difficulty in obtaining an introduction to Mrs. Courtauld, the wife of the proprietor, and that benevolent lady willingly accepted Miss Merryweather's offer. Having first spent some weeks at the Normal School in the Borough Road, to make herself fully acquainted with the routine of the work on which she was about to enter, she left London for Halstead, where she received a most cordial reception from Mr. and Mrs. Courtauld, who immediately accompanied her to the scene of her future labours. The factory itself was a large brick building, very similar to others of the same description. It contained on the basement floor five hundred looms, which were worked by steam power, and each attended to by one woman. Above this were two stories, partly appropriated to the weaving of gauze for crape, and partly to other processes connected with silk manufacture. At the time of her visit there were fully a thousand women and girls employed in the factory, besides the requisite number of men for performing the heavier portion of the work. Miss Merry weather found the women in general clean and tidily dressed; but in spite of the pains taken by the overseers to enforce cleanliness, many were very dirty and slovenly.

Having entered on her duties, she soon determined that her labours should not be confined to the instruction of the young girls, but that she would assist the adult females as well. She obtained from the overseers of the factory a list of those women absent from work on account of sickness, and she made it one portion of her daily work to visit cases of the kind. As may be imagined, she found singular instances of all that is honourable in woman side by side with gross immorality and incredibly uncleanly habits. Many seemed not to have the slightest idea of religion, while dirt and drunkenness appeared to have assumed complete power over them.

Hitherto there had been no schools in connection with the factory. The children were always more than thirteen years of age before they commenced working, and thus the masters were not required by Act of Parliament to supply them with the means of education. There was, however, a British school in the town which was liberally supported by the firm, and there were also two National schools connected with the two churches. The larger proportion of the children in the factory, however, had received little or no education from those schools, and it was one of Miss Merryweather's first endeayours to establish an evening school. In order to enlist some interest among the better-instructed of the young women in the factory, and to get them to co-operate with her, Miss Merryweather paid frequent visits to them while they were at work. She thus endeavoured, by conversing with them, and entering into their little domestic histories, to establish an intimacy with them which might afterwards be used with advantage. The system answered admirably, and Miss Merryweather in a short time obtained from them not only their confidence, but also the assurance of their hearty co-operation with her in the work she was engaged in.

Having organised her staff, Miss Merryweather commenced operations, and in a short time opened her evening school. About a hundred and twenty scholars entered their names the first week; but a great many difficulties remained to be overcome before the movement could be looked upon as a success. The road to the school-room from the main street was by a narrow dirty path where there were no lamps. The school-room itself was without gas, and sad were the disasters which happened to the oil-lamps by which it was lighted. "Nothing could be more uncomfortable than all was at first," Miss Merryweather writes, "not only in the school, but in the dark, dirty, winding way which led to it; but I carried my own little lantern, and the more timid girls went and came with me. Again, our first school nights were unsettled and exciting. A great many of the most disorderly girls were attracted by the novelty. They would come and see what this new teacher was like, and have some fun, as they thought. The managers of the factory, knowing the characters of most of these, asked me to have one or two of the overseers present to prevent disorder; but this I declined, and would do just the same thing again in the same circumstances. It was best to do what was possible with them on my own personal responsibility. I was anxious, also, to disconnect in their minds the school from the factory. But it would have been better, and have made it much easier to manage at first, if all the weavers above seventeen had been made to pay at least a penny a week. The school being free, there was great crowding and crushing up to be classified. Some of those who came were coarse, noisy girls, with no womanly reserve or modesty; they pushed, jested, and even swore at each other."

The thorough organisation of the school seems to have caused Miss Merryweather no little trouble. The better and more modest young women who had promised to assist her as monitors, began to shrink from the undertaking, as they disliked to be subjected to the taunts and jeers of the ruder girls while engaged at their labours in the factory. By degrees, however, a better order of things began to prevail. Miss Merryweather had persisted in her systematic patience and mildness of manner, and at last experienced the fruits of the policy she had adopted. She began to be implicitly obeyed without even the necessity of using an angry or an impatient word to those who had hitherto been the most refractory. Her monitors also had more attention shown them. The school building, too, underwent considerable repair and improvements. Gas was put on, and many other little comforts were attended to, and at last everything was got into good working order.

With the adults Miss Merryweather had far greater trouble than with the girls-the women as well as the men being in the habit of frequenting the numerous public-houses in the neighbour-There they not only wasted their own time and money, but enticed others, who were comparatively innocent, to imitate them. Another attraction against which Miss Merryweather had particularly to work, were the penny dances, which were of course accompanied with immoderate drinking and low songs, and were generally got up in public-houses. By degrees, however, Miss Merryweather contrived to induce the women to leave them, and come to the school, or the mothers' meetings. Still a vast amount of mischief remained untouched which no efforts of hers could subduc.

In the mean time the evening school progressed in the most satisfactory manner, and the elder girls began to take great interest in it. Miss Merryweather would now frequently give them simple lectures on elementary portions of science, especially the first principles of physiology, the great laws governing health, and the value of personal cleanliness. In this department she had, perhaps, more difficulty than any other, but at last she succeeded. The admonition to wash themselves regularly and thoroughly every day seemed to be received by many as an absurd and impossible thing; indeed one blunt girl declared she did not believe she had ever been in a bath since she was a baby. By degrees, however, not only did the truth of Miss Merryweather's lectures become apparent to them, but they also came to feel the comfort of following her advice, and at last her pupils became as cleanly in their persons as they had hitherto been the

It is not our intention to follow Miss Merryweather through her various philanthropic efforts in the neighbourhood of 'Halstead and its factory, deeply interesting as the subject would be. the reader wish for more information respecting her work, we would refer him to a little book written by her, entitled "Experiences of Factory Life, being a Record of Fourteen Years' Work at Mr. Courtauld's Silk Mill at Halstead, Essex." We can assure the reader that the perusal of its pages will well repay the time it will take.

Notwithstanding the interest Miss Merryweather felt in her factory labours, she had still a place in her heart for other kinds of work, and, like many other ladies, she took a great interest in the subject of nursing, and often wished she could employ herself in any way in furthering the movement. For some time, however, no opportunity presented itself to her, and she continued steadily and indefatigably to do her duties at Halstead. Chance, however, befriended her when she least expected it. A gentleman of fortune residing in Liverpool (whose name it is unnecessary to mention here) resolved to raise a monument in memoriam of a severe domestic affliction. He justly considered that none better could be erected than a building dedicated to the welfare of his fellow-creatures, and especially to the solacement of the sick and wounded, and he decided on establishing a nurses' training-school and home. As soon as his intentions were made known, other benevolent individuals gathered round him, and offered him their co-operation in the good work he was about to commence. In a short time a very handsome edifice was erected in the rear of the Royal Infirmary.

During the construction of the building, the subscribers employed themselves in organising their working staff. The committee of the school was selected from the Infirmary committee, the chairman and treasurer being ex officio members. The most difficult office, however, had yet to be filled up-that of a lady superintendent, and diligent indeed were the researches made to find a person fitted for the purpose. Many were proposed, and from these Miss Merry weather was at last chosen. Nor were the committee easily pleased in their choice, as a quotation from a report of their proceedings to the subscribers will show, which we insert the more readily, as it will relieve us from the suspicion of any personal flattery of Miss Merryweather. 'The committee's report says, "To take charge of such an institution from its very commencement no ordinary qualities were required. A lady competent for such a post must in it were to be strictly attended to. The success be endowed with considerable energy and a hopeful spirit; must have strong religious principles, yet be free from anything like sectarian prejudice and bigotry; must possess a clear and sound judgment; must be devoted to her work, and have skill to select, and moral and mental power to control and inspire a number of young women brought together under circumstances affording them great opportunities of usefulness and self-improvement, but at the same time exposing them to considerable temptations. We were fortunate enough to find a lady who possessed the requisite qualifications, and to prevail on her to undertake the work."

Even in Miss Merry weather's case an objection at first presented itself. Constant and kind as had been her attendance at the bedside of the sic' at Halstcad, she had as yet had no experience in nursing on a large scale or in the management of such an institution. This objection, however, was speedily removed. Miss Merryweather, immediately on her appointment, attended at the Nightingale School in connection with St. Thomas's Hospital, and also that of the Sisters of St. John's House, who have charge of King's College Hospital, and thus she made herself thoroughly acquainted with the system and organisation of those two nursing schools, and their method of study and the surgical and medical training therein pursued. The remaining portion of her duties was far more easy to acquire, her own innate ideas of order and discipline qualifying her admirably for regulating an establishment of the kind. various officials having now been selected, it remained to draw up a code of rules to regulate the admission and instruction of the nurses as well as to control them. To accomplish this, the three separate elements of which the administration was composed, combined admirably. So far as the scientific instruction and direction of the nurses was concerned they were placed under the immediate control of the medical officers. When in the Home they were wholly under the control of Miss Merryweather; but when in the Hospital she had no power beyond what the mistress of every establishment ought to maintain over those young women confided to her care; and this regulation has been rigidly submitted to by Miss Merryweather, whose only interference with the duties of the Infirmary has been to see that the orders of the medical officers were rigorously carried out whenever there appeared any probability of their being neglected.

The general economy and business arrangements of the Home were to be regulated by the managing committee, while the direct superintendence and control of the nurses, when off duty and in the Home, were entrusted to Miss Merryweather. There her powers were to be absolute. While she was to be submissive to the medical officers so long as her nurses were on duty in the infirmary, they again were equally without power in the Home, although of course their opinion as to any sanitary regulations which has attended this institution proves how great is the power of the male and female minds when actively employed together in good works, compared to what is seen when the sexes are separated into sisterhoods or fraternities. Without wishing to say one disrespectful word of the different Protestant sisterhoods in England at present, or of the purity of their motives, and the strength of their zeal, we must still express our conviction that the success of the Liverpool Nurses' Home and Training School has been far greater than it would have been if Miss Merryweather, and the ladies cooperating with her, had shut themselves up in a state of half seclusion, and had communication only with their male fellow workers on specified occasions, or through the clergyman attached to their particular establishment.

The rules for the regulation of the nurses were compiled with consummate ability. Candidates were to be chosen, if possible, of ages ranging between twenty-five and thirty-five. Although ladies were to be willingly admitted as probationers, it was considered that the classes of young women best adapted for the work were those of the lower middle orders, farmers' daughters, and respectable and intelligent female servants. When a candidate applied for admission, a printed form was to be given her to be filled up, and in this she was required to state her name, age, place of birth, where she had been educated, her previous occupation, and whether married, single, or a widow, (if the latter a marriage certificate was required,) and if married or a widow, whether she had any children, and if so, how many, as well as to give some good reference as to her respectability. These having been examined by the managing committee and the lady superintendent, and admitted to be satisfactory, another paper was given the applicant to be filled up by some medical man well acquainted with her family, so as to prove her physical capabilities for the work she was about to undertake. The questions in this certificate, which is still in use, are of the most stringent character. The medical referee is required to state how long he has been acquainted with the applicant; whether she is intelligent, and of active habits; what is her general appearance, configuration, height, weight, and general health; whether she has had any serious illness, and if so, when, and of what character; whether she is subject to head affections, or has any tendency to pulmonary disease, whether her parents are living, and whether there has been any insanity in her family. Should this certificate be filled up in a satisfactory manner, the applicant is required to attend before the committee. and having again expressed her willingness to be a probationer, she is asked a series of questions such as whether she has read the rules which she is expected to obey; whether she is willing to attend the poor as well as the rich, and whether she clearly understands that she is not to accept any present of any value from patients or their friends, without the consent of the committee. She is also informed that when in the Home or on duty, she must always wear a dress prescribed by the committee, and that she is further to understand that in case of her neglecting to strictly obey the regulations of the Home, she will be immediately dismissed.

We must here describe the dress prescribed by the committee. It has nothing of the appearance of that worn by a sisterhood, or the members of a conventual institution. It is simply a neat cotton gown of one regular pattern, such as a person would wear when engaged in any active employment. This regulation appears to have been adopted by the committee, rather with the view of preventing any competition in the toilets of the nurses, than to place on them any badge or uniform. This explanation is the more necessary, as nothing would be more contrary to the unsectarian opinions of the committee, than anything approaching to the costume of a mediæval ecclesiastical order. Nor have the sick and the wounded under the charge of the nurses lost in any manner by the simplicity of their secular attire; and if the cross is not worn by them as an emblem on their outward dress, their behaviour to those under their ministrations has hitherto proved that it is not the less deeply engraven on their hearts.

Subject to their good behaviour and competency, the nurses are now engaged for three years, and during that time they are employed in hospital, district, and private nursing, according as their talents or the want of their services may make advisable. When a probationer enters on her duties, she is first placed for two months in a surgical ward, and afterwards for two more in a medical ward. If sufficiently trained, she is then placed for four months as nurse in a surgical ward, under one of the head nurses, and after that for four months more as nurse in a medical ward; subject, however, to such modifications as the lady superintendent may consider necessary. By the end of twelve months, it is generally considered that the curriculum of study necessary to form an experienced nurse has been gone through.

As soon as a probationer's education is considered complete, she is entered on the register of nurses at the Home, as being ready for any professional service, either in private families or in district nursing. To go into details as to the general management of the nurses' Home, and the duties of its inmates, would far exceed our limits. Should our readers be interested in the subject, we would refer them to an excellent brochure written by a member of the committee, (unfortunately he has withheld his name, for he is deserving of great praise,) "On the Organisation of Nursing in Large Towns," in which with justifiable pride he draws his conclusions from the success which has attended the Liverpool Nurses' Training School and Home. The book is interesting as a narrative to the public at large, and also as a book of reference to those engaged in establishing similar institutions. On one point, and one only, we do not agree with the writer—we allude to the somewhat too low estimation in which he appears to hold the Poor Laws, as a means of dispensing charity. True, he admits that good nursing under the Poor Law would do much to lessen that large amount of pauperism which is the consequence of sickness among the hard-working poor, but he adds:

"On other grounds we do not desire to see this done. For under a system of parochial payment, we should lose the best and most useful accompaniment of private charity—the personal interest and superintendence of the givers. So long as the nurse is supported by private benevolence, she and her patients enjoy the inestimable advantages of the control, advice, and aid of educated and refined women, who naturally undertake the supervision of a charity for which they provide the means, but who would neither be able nor willing to interfere, if the nurse were a parish officer, and the nursing and food and medicine supplied by the parish funds."

Even at the risk of the writer regarding us as "nothing, if not critical," we must strongly object to a conclusion of this kind. Instead of denying the possibility of the admission of a charitable feeling into the Poor Law Administration, would it not be far better if he, and such men as he is associated with, were to exert themselves to restore the Poor Law to its original basis and intention-the regulated almsgiving of a Christian community, which, while it allowed the really benevolent to indulge to the fullest extent their private charity, would at the same time place a legal obligation on the selfish to contribute, according to their means, to the wants of their fellow-creatures. There need be no fear of the really benevolent ever wanting employment, even though the Poor Law should be fairly carried out, for "the poor always ye have with you." Again, the writer seems to have hardly taken sufficiently into consideration the enormous amount of good which might be effected even in the nursing of the sick poor, if such men as he would only interest themselves as much in the administration of the poor rate, as they do in works of public and private Of the statistics of Liverpool we know charity. little but from a comparison with what might be effected at a small cost to the rate-payers in the metropolis by the judicious organisation of a nursing staff, we may assume that, with numbers and means in proportion, the same might be done in Liverpool. A lady superintendent with 1000%. a year, two vice-superintendents with 500l, a year each. one hundred head or superintendent nurses at 100l. a year each, and a body of a thousand trained nurses at 50% a year each, might be maintained in the metropolis by a rate hardly exceeding three farthings in the pound, and from the saving their services might effect in reducing the parochial expenditure the cost would possibly be reduced to little more than a farthing in the pound. We do not offer this as a scheme to be adopted, we merely throw it out as a suggestion worthy of the consideration of the author of "The Organisation of Nursing in Large Towns," and we sincerely hope the time will soon arrive when such men as he is will take more interest in the administration of the poor rate, being fully convinced that nothing but good could accrue from their interference.

We must now return to Miss Merryweather. Aided by the efficient services of her sister, Elizabeth, the Training School and Home for Nurses has become, under her immediate management one of the most celebrated institutions in Liverpool. Nor is its high reputation in any way undeserved. We have visited some of the best hospitals in Europe, but in none have we seen nursing carried to higher perfection than here. A more respectable and intelligent body of women than those attached to the Liverpool training school, it would be difficult to find: even their costume is much to be admired. It has none of that depressing effect occasionally produced by the black dress of the Sisters seen in foreign hospitals. Miss Merryweather's nurses convey a cheering impression rather than otherwise. They have about them a genial air, which brings to the mind of the sick under their care more of the idea of skilful and kind home nurses, than of the organised business routine of a public institution. Yet it would be impossible for any women, no matter how strictly they may have bound themselves by vows, to carry out their mission to the sick, to show greater courage, devotion, and patience, than have been shown by the nurses under Miss Merryweather's care, during the late severe visitation of the cholera. Many of them were then prostrated by sickness from the severity of their labours, yet all unhesitatingly resumed them as soon as their health was re-established, while two of them actually fell victims to the faithful performance of duty.

But notwithstanding the liberality of the rules of the institution, the most perfect order, discipline, and cleanliness pervades both the Infirmary and the Home. Not a thing seemed wanting, nor was anything out of its place. The Home itself in all its arrangements appeared a perfect model of what an institution of the kind ought to be. The private rooms of the nurses and probationers (for each had her own room) were not only well-furnished and supplied with every comfort, but an order was observable in them which could not have been surpassed in any private establishment, no matter how well regulated. At present the number of nurses and probationers attached to the School and Home is about eighty, and the committee are willing to receive any other eligible applicants who may present themselves. Altogether a visit to the Home would well repay any philanthropist interested in institutions of the kind, and we are certain the impression he will bring away with him will be the same as that we experienced—that while other nursing institutions may equal it in excellence of management, it would be difficult indeed to find one to exceed it.

BRIDGET DALLY'S CHANGE

AN EXPERIENCE OF A DISTRICT VISITOR.

I was somewhat alarmed when I was asked to become a District Visitor in the little town of Marsham. I felt not a little shy when I made my first round of visits, and I hardly knew how to apologisc for my intrusion as I entered house after house, not knowing the inmates and not feeling at all sure that they wanted to know me. My receptions were as various as possible. One or two welcomed me in a cheery, kind, pleasant sort of way, as if they felt confident that I meant well and that some good would come of it-or at any rate as if it was a pleasure to them to receive a lady's morning call. Some were stiff and surly, did not ask me to sit down, gave no encouragement to my tremulous attempts at small-talk, and expressed "Get about your business!" as plainly as they could without actually pronouncing the words. Several were painfully humble and servile, full of compliments which were evidently articles of barter, and for which they expected returns with interest. One patronised me. Her manner implied that I had nearly as much sense as could reasonably be expected from a lady, and that she was quite willing to help me to acquire a little more. One unmistakably snubbed me, and gave me to understand in a moment that a person whom she believed to be my mamma had recommended "somebody else" as washerwoman, which "somebody else" was a perfect mountain of immorality, and as she phrased it, "simply grymed the clothes instead of cleanin" them," while she, the snubber, who ought to have been recommended and was not, was in all respects a model, invariably sending back all her things "as if they was new, without a brack or a break anywhere." And one, I am sorry to say, discovered my approach from a side window, and hurrying into her kitchen was ready to be discovered on her knees before an open Bible by the time I arrived at the door. Altogether, when I got to the last name on my list I was a good deal bewildered and flurried, and it was with no small comfort that I heard a frank voice say, ere I had well crossed the threshold, "Come in, miss, I heerd you were goin' your rounds, and I hoped you wouldn't forget me."

I saw a brisk, hearty-looking woman, about six or seven and thirty, busily engaged in ironing, while two boys of eight and nine, and a girl a little older, were preparing to start for afternoon school. The woman's name was Patty Brooke, as she speedily told me. She introduced her children, with a word of commendation for each, packed them off to school with a warning not to loiter by the way, volunteered a vast deal of information about her family and her circumstances—her husband's delicate health, which prevented him from earning his wages regularly—and her own active habits, which more than made up for the deficiency. She seemed to be a bustling, high-spirited, industrious, self-complacent kind of woman, who would let no grass grow under her feet or anybody else's if she could help it. She finished by inviting me to go upstairs and see "th' owld ooman" before I went, and as I complied with her request she told me who "th' owld ooman" was—namely, a certain Bridget Dally, who had been for many years servant to a former rector of the parish, and being now past her work was pensioned off as a boarder in the house of Patty Brooke.

"She mostly keeps her bed now," said Patty, as she climbed the stairs; "there aint to say much of a reason for it, for she can stand a walk so well as my man any day—but she has her fancies, and she's frightful cross, that's the truth."

I entered a clean little room, where, on a bed covered with a patchwork quilt, the old woman lay. She was so gaunt and so wrinkled that she might well have counted ninety years. Three substantial pillows raised her head, so that her strongly-marked profile was conspicuous before I reached the bedside, and I could see that she shut her eyes tightly as soon as she was aware by the trembling of the floor that some one had come to visit her. Being very deaf she had not heard our steps on the stairs.

"Ah, she's makin' believe to be asleep because she thinks I want to say summat to her," said Patty, under her breath, with a slight laugh. "I don't know if she'll look at ye, miss, but we'll just try."

Coming close up to the bedside, she shouted in the old woman's ear, "Mrs. Dally! Mrs. Dally! there's a young lady come to see you."

To my dismay, the old woman reared herself up with every appearance of vigour, and screeched at the top of her voice, "Give her sixpence! give her sixpence!"

Patty laughed again. "She always speaks that loud," said she, reassuringly, to me. "I take it, miss, she thinks it's somehow a kind of revenge upon me for her being so deaf, for she knows it makes my head ache." Then, raising her voice to the utmost, she added, "It's a young lady you never saw before, come to pay you a visit."

Old Bridget shrieked again, in a voice that went through me like a screw, "Give her sixpence! send her away!"

"She'll never get the better of that, I do believe," cried Patty. "You see, miss, the last time she got her pay, there was sixpence too much, and the lady came the next day and had it back again, which made her dreadful angry. She couldu't stand it nohow, and I shouldn't wonder if she were to have quite a spite at you, like, because of it."

"I think I shall go away," said I, beginning to be really frightened. "I would much rather not worry her to speak to me, if she doesn't like it."

"No, no," said Patty; "if you go, she's sure to remember it against me. Mrs. Dally! it's not Miss Jones come to see you; it's quite a new young lady, Miss Trevor."

I wish it to be understood that every word addressed to the old woman, or spoken by her, was uttered in the loudest voice that could possibly be achieved by human lungs. The dialogue which Patty and I carried on between whiles, in our usual tones, was quite inaudible to her.

Old Bridget now turned towards me with some sulky effort at civility, and seemed to be asking what I wanted.

"I am the visitor for this district; I am come to make friends with you."

"I don't want to make no pens," was her answer; "they're no use to me."

"To make friends," screamed Patty; "friends,

Bridget acknowledged the correction with a grunt, and looked at me again, as much as to say, "what next?"

"I hope you are comfortable here," began I, hesitatingly.

"Oh, Heaven bless you, miss, don't say that to her!" murmured Patty.

"I think I'll be movin' next month," was Bridget's answer, before I had time to change the subject. "The children makes all the noise in their natures, just to worrit me from morning till night; and dinner's always late, which puts a poor old body off her appetite—" ("Hear that now!" ejaculated Patty; "and she's been eatin' for two, this very blessed day: I do think it's so much meat that lies heavy ou her temper!") "—and there's nothing straight in the whole house. The master's idle—"

"Oh now, goody," interposed Mrs. Brooke, "when you know how sick he is! It's a shame for you to say that!"

"But I will say it, and the lady shall hear it, and she shall know that you don't do your duty by me; you take the pay, and you don't wait on me, nor tend me, nor do nothing that you ought by me: you're no use in life. I'll move next week, I will."

"A good thing if you do, I'm sure," cried the ruffled Patty; "I don't want you."

"Where's them children?"

"Goue to school," answered Patty, subsiding into good humour again. "Haven't got their lessons, I'm feared."

"Ah, I dare say!" said Bridget, with a grim laugh; "that's allers the way with 'em."

Patty winked at me. "I just said that to please her; nothing soothes her like fancyin' the children's in a scrape. Law, only just to consider how cross she is to-day!"

I made a faint attempt to commence my ministry. "Shall I come and read to you sometimes?" asked I. "I should like to do it if you will let me." (I'm very much afraid that was a story, but I bonestly wished it to be true.)

"Anan?"

"Shall I read to you?" in a louder key.

"Bleed me? It's little enough blood I've got in my veins! That's doctor's work, miss!"

"I meant, shall I come and read to you-ont of a book-out of some good book?"

"I haven't a penny in the world to spare," was her answer. "No use bringin' them subscription books to the likes o' me."

"I'm afraid I shall never make her understand," said I, in despair.

"Oh, never mind, miss; she's put out to-day; I dare say she'll be better next time you come. She's like this most days, and then she comes round between whiles and seems quite humane for a minute or two. Law, I never heeds her; she's the same to everybody. This is the sixth house she's lodged in, and I don't believe anybody else would have her."

As we went down-stairs, Patty bemoaned herself a little: "I don't know, I'm sure, miss, whether I shall be able to go on with it; it's hard work. She takes everything that happens in such bad part; and law, if you could just see her eat!-seven rashers did she take to her blessed dinner this mortal day, with eggs uncounted. She's that frightened lest I shouldn't spend all she gives me on her own food that she goes on at her meals long after she's done wantin' any. And then she's always provin': if I'm one minute late with dinner, she proves that I'm always half an hour after time; and if I'm ever so careful cleanin' and settliu' her room, she'll prove that I neglect her. I don't know how to answer her; I don't know what to do with her; I'll have to give it up, and then I'm sure I don't know what'll come to her."

I really could say nothing consolatory, for I felt that no imaginable motive could be strong enough to induce me to accept Bridget Dally for a boarder, if I could possibly get rid of her.

Some weeks after this I was unexpectedly obliged to leave home, and to remain away for nearly a year. Immediately after my return I resumed my office as District Visitor, and one of the first houses to which I betook myself was Patty Brooke's. During the interval a baby had been added to the family, and had grown to be a fine strapping rosy girl of seven months.

I caught sight of her in her mother's arms as I entered. She was sitting very upright, and exhibiting a bald head and a large double chin to the greatest possible advantage, and with much dignity. As on the occasion of my former visit the dinner had been recently finished, and the elder children were preparing for school.

"Put on her top! Put on her top!" shouted an old woman, who was sitting by the fire, in a huge wooden arm-chair like a sentry-box; "would you show her to the lady without her top?"

Patty, laughingly, but yet with a certain haste of manner which showed that the order must be obeyed, snatched the baby's cap out of a neighbouring drawer and tied it on, to the great improvement of that young lady's appearance.

"It's a sin and a shame—" began the old woman by the fire, in a tone which recalled former days. But she was interrupted.

"Ubbl bubbl wubbl wubbl wubbl wubbl wubbl wubbl! Hoo! Hoo! Hoo!" said the Baby.

Words would fail to describe the kind of ecstasy into which the old woman immediately dissolved. She grinned and glared at the child and waved both her arms towards it with a stiff and aimless vehemence, like Punch. "Hark to her!" cried she. "Did you ever hear the like o' that? Hark to her! She can say everything!"

"You're welcome, miss, won't you sit down?" interposed Patty, dancing the Baby. "Please to sit next granny, mis: for then she can hear you." I sat down as directed. The words made me think for a moment that this might be a new old woman, possibly a real grandmother and not Bridget Dally. But no—wonderful to relate "Granny" was simply a term of endearment. The old woman had relapsed item of endearment in repose they reverted to somewhat of their original expression.

"I am glad to see you so much better, Mrs. Dally."

"Aha! Sh-sh-sh-sh-sh! Ickadickadickadicka! Aha!" observed the Baby, with crushing sarcasm in its voice.

"What did she say then?" inquired the old woman, transformed in an instant. "Didn't she like me to scold her brother then, a darling? Well, we wont, we wont!" and she began a hard and skinny process of stroking down the boy's head and face, which he did not seem to prefer to the scolding. "Ah poor! Ah poo—o—or! Jacky must be a good boy then, mustn't he?"

"Ba-a-a-a-a-a-a-ah! Heigho!" replied the Baby, mildly.

"D'ye hear her? She knows as well what I mean! There's nothing she doesn't know! Did ye hear her then? She says Jacky is to be a good boy, and not worrit his granny!"

There was a general acquiescence of the whole family in the statement that the Baby had said this, which I scarcely expected. And Jacky himself took the little rosy feet in his hands, and gave them a sort of frieudly shake by way of expressing his good intentions.

"Now children, be off to school, you'll be late!" said Patty.

"Stop a bit," cried Bridget. "Isn't it Thursday?" She appealed to the Baby, who said,

"Dah!" apparently "Yes," in some unknown tongue.

"Yes! She knows it is! Aud what happens o' Thursday?" Here the Baby seemed to be at fault, but the old woman was too busy and too much delighted to perceive it. She was fumbling in a large bag of rusty black silk, which lay on the seat of the chair beside her, and out of which she finally produced four sugarplums. "Comfits o' Thursday!" she continued. "Doesn't she know? Ah, that she does! Come here Betty!"

Each of the elder children was called up in turn, to receive a sugarplum from the Baby's hand. The operation was tedious and difficult, as the Baby was all the while trying vigorously to convey the sugarplums to its own mouth, and uttering loud shouts of decision. But Bridget held the little wrist firmly, and when the gifts had been duly presented, gave the Baby the last sugarplum for herself, just in time to prevent an outbreak of wild lamentations.

Jack and Betty departed to school, and after a little talk with Bridget, during which I ascertained that she was very comfortable, and had no thought of moving, and that she took her meals with the family, now, because there was always a little more than she wanted, and it was but fair they should have the good of it, seeiu' they was so kind to her, I also took my leave. Patty accompanied me to the door, talking sotto voce.

"O yes, miss, we gets along nice and comfortable now; it's all along of the Baby. Granny's been quite different since she was boru. First, she began to notice her, and then she didn't like to miss her, and as I couldn't be always upstairs, the next thing was she must come down, and so it has gone on by little and little. And she's always pleasant now, except just a rough word here and there, which we don't mind, any of us. Only last week, the ladies sent her a bottle of port wine, and she's given my man as good as two glasses out of it, for she said he was weaker nor she was, which is true enough; and she hears so much better-it's a wonder how it is! And there's many a little job about the house which she creeps to and fro aud does; it amuses her, and saves me a bit of trouble often and often. It's all along of the baby."

There is no doubt that baby was a missionary, and we know who sent her. She had done her work well, and if, as Bridget said, "she knew everything," she must have known how rich a harvest the sowing of one little seed of love in that poor dry heart would produce.

I looked back as I walked away, and through the open door I saw the old woman gazing in a perfect rapture at the baby, who was making maudlin and misdirected attempts to imitate the crowing of a superannuated cock.

FAITH REPENTING AND FAITH RESOLVING.

I.—FAITH REPENTING.

"I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."—Job xlii. 5, 6.

FROM faith to faith is St. Paul's short, strong way of describing the Christian life. He who has no faith is no Christian. He whose faith is anything—however weak, however wavering—is something of a Christian. He whose faith is growing—however slowly—is running the Christian race. He whose faith is perfected is already in Heaven.

Now therefore, of all questions, this becomes the most critical and the most vital, Have I faith? To assist such as shall read this in answering that great question; to guide them not only to an answer, but to that answer which accompanies peace and salvation; and then to furnish them with some directions as to the way in which they should go, that they may in due time join the spirits of just men already made perfect, in that world where faith is lost in sight—this is the threefold object of that little course upon which we now enter, when we would propose as the first of our special meditations on the great subject of Faith, the brief but pregnant thesis, Faith Repenting.

We will not spend time in elaborate definitions of the two words which our subject thus brings together, Faith and Repentance. We may just call Faith a spiritual sight, and Repentance a changed mind, and pass at once to the combination which forms the point and pivot of our subject.

Faith is a spiritual sight. The seeing with the eve of the soul something which, some one whom, we cannot see with the eye of the body. Read the illustrious records of faith, as they are spread out before us in Heb. xi., and you will perceive that what is said of one of the heroes of faith is in substance the secret of the life and works of all the rest, "He endured as seeing Him who is Invisible." Faith is the looking upward into the Heaven above, and seeing God in Christ there-the looking onward into the world eternal, and seeing there a life most unlike this life-a life pure and peaceful and blessed and unchanging-reserved for all who, not having seen, have yet loved Christ here, and patiently kept His word, and done His Father's will, in spite of weakness and weariness and warfare and temptation, below. Faith is the looking upward, and the looking onward, above and beyond the things which are seen and temporal and the persons who people the world that is, to the things which are unseen but eternal, and to Him whose kingdom is already open in Heaven for all who, with a resolution which will take no denial, will earnestly and diligently press into it.

This is Faith. He who lives looking upward and looking onward—setting God always before him, and seeking earnestly the salvation which is in Christ Jesus—is a man of faith. It is of him that we speak in these Discourses, and say of him, first, that the man of Faith is a man also of Repentance.

Repentance, or a changed mind, has reference specially to two subjects—sin, and God.

To repent is to regard sin differently. Once it was made light of, carelessly played with, rashly approached, indolently yielded to, or passionately fostered. Now it is seen as God sees it; viewed seriously, judged of gravely, deeply bewailed, anxiously guarded against, avoided, dreaded, shrunk from, abhorred.

To repent is to regard God differently. Once He was trifled with, left afar off, disliked as an intruder; His Word, His worship, His holy day disregarded; His right as the Creator forgotten, His call as the Redeemer unlistened to and disobeyed. Now God is seen as He is; seen as the Fountain of being, whose we are and must be; seen as the Spring and Source of Life, whom to know is to be happy, whom to serve is perfected freedom. He who has undergone this change, this change towards sin, and this change towards God, he, and he alone, has true repentance.

Now when we speak of Faith Repenting—meaning, of course, by that expression, the man of Faith repenting—we say, in effect, that Repentance itself is an act of Faith; that Faith is necessary to Repentance, and that true Faith prompts and produces true Repentance.

It is not very uncommon, in books and sermons, to represent Repentance as going first, and Faith as following. Some would even regard Repentance as perfected before Faith begins. Some would make Repentance a preliminary stage of the Christian life; or even no stage of it-a mere preparation and clearing of the way for the Christian life; and Faith that which comes next-beginning where Repentance ends, and wholly distinct from it and separate. And others, however unintentionally, so express themselves, as to make Repentance a sort of condition which man must satisfy in order to his coming with acceptance to receive life from God. Man must repent, and then God will forgive. No wonder that, under such teaching, Repentance has a chilling and a repulsive sound! But if the present subject-if the two words, Faith Repentingshould be fixed by God's grace in any waiting heart, we shall both see why heretofore we have had no true Repentance, and how we may obtain in the future its peaceable fruit, its abiding unchanging joy.

1. Holy Scripture is abundant in examples of the workings, shallow or deceptive—at all events, disappointing and fruitless—of the things which man calls Repentance. It tells of Fear Repenting, and Vexation Repenting, and Despair Repenting, as though to enhance and illustrate the power of the one true heart-deep transformation, which is Faith Repenting. Good Words, Nov. 1, 1866.]

(1.) There was once a young man, addicted to the sports of the field, dear to his father's indulgent heart by reason of a certain frankness and sensibility which shot now and then like a passing gleam of sunlight over a life of selfishness and selfindulgence, which the plain spoken oracle of Revelation can characterise only by the epithet "profane." And this young man had a brother, most unlike him in natural disposition; as calculating and purpose-like as the other was short-sighted and impetuous: and he, taking advantage one day of his brother's fatigue and hunger to drive with him a hard bargain, possessed himself, in exchange for a single meal of pottage, of those rights of the firstborn which contained in them not only the family inheritance but the patriarchal priesthood. Years passed away, and still the father lived, and still the early recklessness reaped not its full recompense of reward. At last retribution fell. He who had despised and sold his birthright loses, years afterwards, the blessing too. Then flowed in abundance those bitter tears which are so often regarded as the infallible token, if not the very reality and essence, of repentance; but the bitter tears flowed in vain: "Esau for one morsel of meat had sold his birthright: and ye know how that afterwards, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected; for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." It was the repentance of wounded pride-it was the repentance of disappointed ambition-it was the repentance of natural resentment: it was not the repentance of grace-it was not Faith Repenting.

How often have we mourned over the late-discovered consequences of some youthful folly or more mature transgression; bitterly accusing ourselves of an act of which all the sweetness has vanished, but of which the sting, it seems, must be perpetual till life is ended! How have we lashed ourselves for the folly, till we persuaded ourselves that we were even penitent for the sin! And yet how wide the difference between regret and repentance! How anxious the question for each one of us which of the two is ours! Is our sorrow from God and toward God? or is the but that sorrow of the world of which an Apostle has written that it even worketh death? It is Faith only, it is not vexation, which repents.

(2.) Centuries passed away, and the younger brother's house has grown into a nation upon the earth. For 400 years that nation has been growing and multiplying under a pressure of servitude and of severity which might have been expected to be its extinction. At length God, the God of its fathers, has come down to see its sorrows. By a long and awful series of miraculous judgments, He is making the oppressor willing to let Israel go free. But again and again, just when the end seems to be gained, the tyrant king relapses into his obduracy. "Entreat the Lord for me," he said again and again in the hour of his humiliation, "and I will let the people go." But as soon as he "saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart. I have sinned this time: the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked. Entreat the Lord (for it is enough) that there be no more mighty thunderings and hail: and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer." The great leader listened; he "went out of the city, and spread abroad his hands unto the Lord: the thunders and hail ceased, and the rain was not poured upon the earth." But when the king "saw that the rain and the hail and the thunder were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, neither would he let the children of Israel go." It was the repentance of fear—it was not Faith Repenting.

Oh, what a Book is God's Word for unravelling the mazes of the heart of man! Which of us has not in some moment of fear registered against himself in Heaven some vow of repentance soon to be forgotten? Who shall count the promises made on deathbeds? Who shall discriminate, save One alone, the reality and the unreality of the repentances of battle-fields and shipwrecks? Leave not we such a work for such a moment! Ours be the repentance of a calm but earnest faith; not the repentance of a sudden terror, of a fearful looking for of judgment!

(3.) These are two examples of a Repentance not of faith and therefore not effectual. Take yet a third, from a time yet more eventful and a scene more sacred still.

It was the time when the Son of God stood in human form upon the earth; when He was speaking God's words and doing God's works and fulfilling perfectly the will of God below. There was one amongst His own chosen followers, who lived with Him without loving Him. By degrees the breach widened and deepened, until a deliberate act of treachery sacrificed the Master's life. We might have thought that one who could plan and execute such a crime, must have been hardened beyond the possibility of penitence. But it was not so. "Judas, which had betrayed Him," St. Matthew writes, "when he saw that He was condemned, repented himself, and brought back" the price of the betrayal "to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." Conscience awoke yet once more, even in him, and wrought there something to which Holy Scripture does not altogether refuse the nominal title of repentance. But that repentance was not of faith, and therefore, when it was finished, it brought forth not life but death. The repentance of remorse and despair ended not in amendment but in suicide. Before, or almost before, his Master was in Paradise, Judas had ended by his own hand the life which had betrayed His. "He departed, and went and hanged himself."

And oh, how many a repentance, since that day, has produced the same deadly fruit! Sin seen, too late, to be exceeding sinful—sin seen without Christ—seen in its true character, and seen in its real consequences, but seen apart from that blood of sprinkling which alone can make the sight endurable -has not only rendered life miserable, it has driveu the sinner on to that act of self-destruction which is the seal and signature of his ruin. The repentance of disappointment, the repentance of fear, may be shallow or short-lived; the repentance of remorse, the repentance of despair, may even close recklessly upon the sinner the door of grace for ever. God in His great mercy keep us all from that end!

2. The same Word of truth, which shows us, by doctrine and example what Repentance is not, teaches us also what it is-sets before us Faith Repenting: exemplifies to us the working of that grace which is man's life, in this particular department, its relation to personal sin and to our recovery and restoration from it.

It is altogether deceptive and mischievous language to represent sin as finally done with so soon as a man comes to Christ for salvation. Past sin is not then done with, and present sin is not then done with. The Christian life has to take account still of both. And then for the first time can that account be taken rightly, when a man knows in whom he believes, and is able to commit to Him with confidence the keeping of his eternal interests. It was when the patriarch whose words are before us could say for the first time to his God, "Now mine eye seeth Thee," that all his self-confidence and self-esteem gave way at once, and he can add, from the depths of a contrite soul, "wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." It was the thought of his sin as sin against God his God which made David utter the words of the 51st Psalm: it was the look of Jesus which broke Peter's heart, destroyed for ever his forwardness and selfparade, and made him go forth to weep bitterly, and come back converted to strengthen his brethren.

The two great lessons of our subject are these:

(1.) Only faith can repent. If you would be a penitent man, you must be a mau of faith. So long as you pore over the records written within of past transgression and vileness, hoping to reach repentance by means of a truer estimate and a livelier consciousness of your own demerit and sinfulness. not only will you never know peace, you will never feel as you ought your own guilt. Begin, rather, at the other end. Begin by falling at the feet of Jesus. Begin by laying hold upon the one hope set before you in the Gospel; the hope of a free forgiveness, of a perfect absolution, through the one allperfect all-sufficient sacrifice made by Him for all sin. See your own sins as a re-crucifixion of the Crucified. See Him, nevertheless, bearing them on the Cross for you, that you might go free. Lay hold upon the Atonement there made-upon the love which laid all upon Christ; upon the love which took upon itself all the load; upon the love, unexhausted and untiring, which still says to you, after all these years of provocation and backsliding, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest-My grace is sufficient for thee -'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." By degrees, in the daily study, in the hourly use, of that glorious revelation, the forgiveness of sin, of all sin, for the alone merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, there will rise up within you, as never before, a sense of the evil of sin, and of your own deep defilement with it, such as will find its best expression in the memorable words, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth Thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." Faith only can repent.

(2.) Faith must repent. It is a sad thought, to any one who is in the least degree taught of God, how slightly Christian people deal with their own sins; how they dismiss from memory and conscience past years of negligence and ungodliness; how they make it almost a duty to forget the things behind-not in St. Paul's sense, as the repudiation of self-complacency and over-boldness, but in a sense most opposite, as the dismissal, from concern and remembrance, of all that is disheartening and saddening in the years that are gone! Not so did St. Paul. It is evident that he retained to the end of his course a deep and even anxious recollection of the long period of his unbelief. "Less than the least of all saints-The least of the Apostles, not meet to be called an Apostle-Once a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious -Sinners, of whom I am chief"-such are the honest, earnest words which express his opinion of himself, in reference to the time when he was a stranger to Christ, and to its abiding influence upon his Christian standing. A man of faith is kept humble to the end by the memory of the sins of his youth.

But is it only in reference to the long past, to the far-distant sinfulness, that he is thus penitent still? How does each day, as it runs its course, give room and reason for the exercise of a new repentance! Good left undone, and evil done, day by day-and habits but half broken and better habits but half learned-opportunities of receiving spiritual benefit, and opportunities of influencing others towards godliness, every day neglected, set aside, or sinned away-yes, to the very end the Repentance of Faith must be new every morning, and the aspect and attitude of the believing be also to the last hour of life the aspect and attitude of the penitent.

Let us earnestly foster in ourselves this grace, which is the grace of saints. Even faith may become over-confident, may fall back little by little into a self-reliance and a levity and a presumption most unbelieving, most unchristian, most displeasing to God. Let it not be so with us. Let us sink low that we may rise high. Let us humble ourselves day by day under the mighty hand of God, that He, not we, may exalt-and that, not all at once, but only in due time. Such self-abasement will be the measure of our growth in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ. "I have heard of Thee" long and often "by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.",

II .- FAITH RESOLVING.

"The God of heaven, He will prosper us; therefore we His servants will arise and build."—Nehemiah ii. 20.

THE Repentance of Faith—our first subject—leads on to the Resolution of Faith, which is the second. "Faith Repenting;" and now, "Faith Resolving."

No doubt the first subject might have been made to include the second. Resolution may be viewed either as a fruit or as a part of Repentance. For the sake of clearness we have distinguished the two.

In each case the point lies in the combination of the two words which form the thesis. There is a repentance which is not of Faith, and certainly there are resolutions which are not of Faith. We desire to enter into judgment with our own souls, in reference to our standing in the Christian life; which is, from its first step to its latest, a life of Faith. We desire to see whether our repentances -for all men have something so called-are real or counterfeit repentances; whether, when they come to us, they come out of fear, out of disappointment, out of punishment, out of remorse; or whether they spring out of that true and living faith, which is the sight of things unseen, the sight of Him who is invisible. And we desire to see whether our resolutions-for all men know what it is to form resolutions-spring out of that faith which is the conviction of spiritual realities, the apprehension of a living and Almighty Person, or out of something else, which may indeed prompt resolutions, but not the resolutions of a Christian, not the resolutions which accompany salvation. We desire to know this, that, while there is time, we may refuse the wrong kind and choose the right. We would put away the first, that we may establish the second.

There is a strong tendency in all human teaching to be one-sided. The truth of God, like the city of God, "lieth four square:" but men are evermore altering that perfect shape, and making it, instead, all length or all breadth; all lines or curves or angles, instead of that full and fair proportion which God the heavenly Architect has assigned to His work.

In nothing is this tendency shown more strongly than in the subject of Resolution; which may be briefly defined as a determination of the Will for action

It is the first idea in most minds, that they have only to will and they cau of course do. It is an idea implanted in us by nature; an idea inherent in that of duty, of responsibility, of judgment; an idea which the Fall has not destroyed, and which the Gospel itself recognises even while it corrects. Free will is the condition of action; the birthright of the moral being; the starting point of effort, and the keystone of accountability. In any scheme of morals, in any system of religion, in any voice of revelation, there must be place found for the human will, there must be the assertion of its existence and (in a certain sense) of its independence, if there is to be either an echo from the conscience or a strength for the life. If you cannot say to a man, "This is the way-then walk in it;" if you cannot appeal to him as one who has the power to refuse the evil and choose the good; if you cannot "reason with him of righteousness and temperance and judgment to come," as things which it is a matter of duty to seek, to practise, and to prepare for; -you make the world one vast mad-house, in which the chain and the padlock must take the place of liberty and selfmanagement, because reason has left her throne, and force only can prevent mischief or secure decency. The will of man may be enfeebled, biassed, besotted, even enthralled; the man himself may rust it by indolence, blunt it by misuse, spoil it by folly. begrime it by vice: but even in that man it exists still, and each step of its deterioration has been (strange as may be the paradox) not taken by another but taken by itself. It was the act of the will which in each iustance weakened and damaged the will: and when it lies at last, a helpless, corrupt, and reprobate thing, it lies so by its own choice, and the ruin which is its curse was its own working

There is in all men this consciousness. Even those who complain the most loudly of the thraldom of their will to evil, are the most keenly sensitive to its possession and to its misuse. They know that they have a will, and that by their own will they have lost its force.

Language may easily be used in the name of the Gospel-fortified even by Gospel texts-which vet is not true nor wholesome language. I do not doubt that habits of sin have been fastened upon some men by telling them that they were powerless to resist. The food of the healthy is the poison of the sick. Words which to a Christian man express only his own conscious unworthiness, his inability to staud before God in his own strength, or to earn for himself by mcrit the recompense of the great reward-may be to a careless, half-awakened soul a very lullaby of indifference, neutralising the strivings of conscience, and at last paralysing the energies of action. It is time enough to speak of moral impotence, when we see pride and self-confidence dominant: to the ear of apathy and selfcomplacency the proper call is that which reminds of duty, and declares that that which God commands. His creature must rouse himself to perform.

Unwholesome doctrine, on this topic of accountability and free-will, has much to answer for, in reference to the careless lives and evil habits of members of Christian congregations. Education has a solemn office in sounding into the ears of children the lesson of strict duty and inevitable retribution. The discipline of a Christian home and a Christian school rests entirely for its justification upon the reality of the free-will. Do this—you can do it—and you shall have praise for the same. Do not this—you can avoid it—and you shall suffer. Form this habit—you can—of thought or speech, and it will bring you reward—you will have done well. Form this other, this opposite habit—but you need not—and it will be your trouble, your foe, your perpetual punishment. It is thus—not by the repetition of the words, but by the daily enforcement of them in a discipline not all joyous but often for the present grievous—that the child of impulse and indolence grows by degrees into the man of activity and self-control; into a condition the very opposite of that which would have been reached by perpetual allowances for human frailty, or incessant inculcations of the doctrine of human impotency.

And the more the young man or the old man deals on this principle with himself; saying, in regard to each question that comes before him of doing or not doing, This ought to be done, therefore it can be done. This ought to be resisted, this thought, this word, this action, therefore it can be, and therefore it shall be—the happier and the truer and the godlier will life itself be; much trouble will be saved, much misery escaped, much evildoing prevented: angels and good men will have more to rejoice in, and the enemies of God Himself will find the less cause to blaspheme.

Man, even fallen man, has a will—and God requires him to exercise it.

The man who cannot resolve is but half a man.

And yet there have been those who have so stated this principle, as to make it false in fact and subversive of the Gospel.

Some men say, What more do I want? I have a will: I know what is right: I have only to resolve, and I can do all things. Living thus, what has God Himself to say against me?

We see at once, when the thought is breathed in words, how dreadful it is. More unpleasing in the sight of man, more offensive to the eye of God, than any prodigal or any Publican is that cold, self-satisfied Pharisee, who sees in himself no flaw, sees consequently in the Saviour of sinners "no beauty that he should desire Him."

This man has evidently not apprehended the whole of the truth, when he seized that one fragment of it, the freedom of the will.

And to confine ourselves strictly to the present subject, he has evidently caught but one of the two words before us—"Resolving," but not "Faith Resolving"—and he shows us, in a living instance, how needful is the conjunction and the combination. There is a resolution which is not Christian: there is a resolution which is not of Faith.

Free will is one element of truth: free grace is the other.

"The God of heaven, He will prosper us: therefore we His servants will arise and build." Or, in corresponding words less figurative, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure." The resolutions of Nature are weak, shallow, and partial: the resolutions of Faith, like the inspirations of their Author, are thorough, heart-deep, life-wide, and effectual.

Look at each: ponder, then contrast them.

1. Nature resolves.

Resolves, perhaps, to get rid of a fault.

We will not ask how the fault got there; nor stay to remark that there must be something incomplete in Nature, something defective (in other words) in the condition of the free will, to have allowed a bad habit to establish itself in a being which ought to have been upright. We will take it up where it is. There is something wrong. Wrong, perhaps, in a child: a little, trifling trick of ill-temper, untruthfulness, or disobedience. Wrong perhaps in a boy: those which have been mentioned in the child, and, added to them, something a little worse-I need not say of what kindselfishness, cruelty, or sensuality. Wrong in a young man: by this time, worse things still-beginnings of self-indulgence, intemperance, or sinful lust. It matters not, in this respect, either the age of the person, or the kind of thing. For in this point, -the resolutions of Nature, -all ages and all sins are alike. The fault, or the sin, has become troublesome. I thought I was master. I thought I could say at any moment to my own sin, Thus far shalt thou come and uo further. But I was mistaken. I fall when I would stand. I seek it yet again, when I would abstain. Even when I would do good, the evil is present with me. Then I must seriously appeal to the strong will within. I must rouse my dormant energies, I must rally my scattered troops, I must turn out this intruder, I must reign again undisturbed in the citadel of my own being. Nature resolves.

Ah! who has not heard the saying, "Hell is paved with good resolutions?" Who that has ever fallen into a bad habit has not found in himself the justification of that sad proverb? In childhood, in boyhood, in youth, in age, we sin and resolveresolve and sin again; sometimes, it may be, the resolution is weak-because it does not rise to the emergency-because there is a lingering longing half-reserve all the time within, favouring the foe whose expulsion is the enterprise; but sometimes iu spite of the utmost force and concentration of purpose—in spite of an experience of misery bitterly learnt, and an intention of amendment as vehement as it was sincere. Such is the record, tear-blotted and blood-stained, of ten thousand times ten thousand human lives; lives oscillating perpetually between wickedness and virtue, because the power of habit was too strong for the resolution of Nature, and the soul that was just escaping as a bird out of the snare of the fowler was again and again, in spite of itself, entangled therein and overcome.

But it might be said, these are exceptional cases. Here the strength of the will has been lost by evil habit. No wonder the blunted instrument cannot all at once recover the edge of its blade and the strength of its wielding, and cut down that evil growth which it has once and for long acquiesced in. Nature could have resolved, if now she cannot.

Let us take another case then.

Nature resolves to live a life of virtue.

This was the actual endeavour of one man who has—and doubtless of many who have not—left a full account of it.

For a time all seemed to prosper. The life was moral; the religious aspect of it outwardly perfect:—there was even a high estimate of duty, and a great zeal for God.

The man thought himself perfect.

At length the law of God (as he expresses it) "came" to him. Came home, I suppose, as a real thing: not as a mere written book, but as a voice of authority, as a word of command. It came into the deep places of conscience, and said, Thou shalt not so much as desire that which is forbidden. It reached forth into the distant parts of the life, and said, God is everywhere: no province of the being is without His domain: everywhere and in all things thou must walk as in His presence.

Then was kindled a flame of rebellion in the moral being. Desire forbidden was even stimulated by the prohibition. Sin, dead within, revived as under the ray of a tropical sun forcing matter into vitality. The "fair show in the flesh" was turned into rottenness, and the supposed perfection of duty was found to be a mere enmity and hatred against God

At last there came into the world One bringing a true message from the living God in Heaven: a Man who would make religion real, and who could not be induced to accept conventional phrases or ceremonial observances in the place of a soul's homage and a life's devotion. And when He was found to be resolute, and men could not either intimidate or use Him, they seized Him at length in the holy city, and, calling in for once the hated foreigner, crucified Him by Gentile hands, and thought Him vanquished when, -lo! out of this death there sprang an invincible life, and disciples of the despised Nazarene became the one influence upon earth. And all men must take their side, in regard to this new Religion-he whom we have described among them-the man whose resolution for virtue had thrown him into insurrection against God: and he, of course, went against the Nazarene -"persecuted" His followers "even unto strange cities, and when they were put to death gave his voice against them !"

The resolution of Nature was a resolution against Grace

All this may sound visionary or obsolete in some ears: but let a man take it home—let him express it in modern language and apply it to present circumstances—and it will become real enough, and alas! true enough in relation to the world of this century and a Church calling itself Christian.

Many have resolved in our days—and it is a noble resolution, as it was in Saul of Tarsus—to be men of high attainment in virtue. The resolution was formed early enough to prevent a youth of vice: they estimated the life to which they aspired, and it contained in it at least three ingredients—personal, domestic, and social purity.

In the pursuit of this perfection they trusted to the firmness of the resolution, to the strength of the will. God entered not into it—save as the God of creation and perhaps of judgment—the Framer of the moral constitution, and possibly the Arbiter of the individual destiny. Him they acknowledged, probably, in the decent maintenance of religious forms; but they sought Him not as necessary to the acquisition of that virtue which they had proposed to themselves as the goal of their race.

Now I will not doubt that the life corresponded to this beginning. That, in the case supposed, the end aimed at was reached. The life was blameless, exemplary, useful. The conscience remained unsullied: the home was peaceful, and the career honourable.

But I will venture to say that, even in this most favourable case, the resolution of Nature had at least three fatal defects.

First, There was no real concord and conscious communion between the soul and its God.

Secondly, There was no deep and all-sufficient consolation under the inevitable trials and eventual separations of a life of change and a death of pain.

Thirdly, There was no room here for Christ. He was not wanted as the Propitiation for sin. He was not admitted as the humbler of human self-sufficiency, or the alone strength of human weakness. To the best resolution of nature Christ can only be what He was to Saul of Tarsus in the days of flesh and the Law—a superfluity, an offence, a stumbling-block, and a foolishness.

2. Faith resolves.

That is, the man of faith resolves; and resolves as a man of faith—in the exercise of his faith. "I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God—The God of Heaven, He will prosper us: therefore we His servants will arise and build."

The Christian life is one of perpetual resolutions.

(1.) Conscience, or the Bible—the conversation of a friend, or the ministry of the Word,-has suggested to me some grace in which I am defective, or reminded me of some fault to which I am prone. The first step is Repentance; the second step is Resolution. The general has become the particular. The power of faith has to be turned in a particular direction. The engine of grace must be brought to bear upon a particular part of the building. It may be that Prayer has been too brief or too superficial. It may be that I have thought too little of the Congregation-of its prayer, its preaching, or its Sacraments. It may be that my conversation has been marked by symptoms of levity, of vanity, of censoriousness. It may be that some root of bitterness has revived within; some old sin, once apparently conquered, has again raised its head, and if I would escape utter defeat, discomfiture, and ruin, I must crush,

I must tread it down, I must eradicate it. The first step is Repentance: the second step is Resolution.

But what resolution? A resolution of Faith.
And what is that?

First, an earnest calling in of Him in whom I believe. This is the very name given in Scripture to Christian people. "They that call upon the Lord—Those who call habitually upon the name of the Lord." They who in everything call upon and call in Jesus Christ. This which the resolution of Nature wholly omits, is the first and foremost element of the resolution of Faith.

And then, not a mere idle waiting for Jesus Christ to do all for us, without thought, care, or toil of ours. An earnest calling in of Christ, and then an earnest going forth in His strength to do the neglected good, or to cast out the sin harboured.

And once more, not merely a calling in, and a going forth, but a posture and attitude (as it were) of dependence and of expectation, suitable to one who has a serious undertaking on hand, for which he wants, and must have, all the help and all the grace which is in the Omnipotent and the All-holy.

These are the special resolutions of Faith, answering to the special resolutions (above dwelt upon) of Nature.

(2.) But there is also, as before, a general resolution, bearing upon the life as a whole: an ideal proposed to one's self, and a goal made for.

The man of faith says to himself, This and this must I be in life, and this and this in death. me to live must be Christ, and to me to die must be gain. How can this be? Every energy must be knit up for this great enterprise; the greatest enterprise, by far, which can be presented to a responsible immortal being. Before I die, I must be this. If so, I must be this while I live: lest. coming suddenly, Christ find me something elsesomething which cannot be with Him because it is not like Him. Then I must begin now-begin this day. I must study my great Example, to see what I ought to be. I must commune with Him who is my Life, that I may grow by degrees into His likeness. Every day that I live. I must take a step onwards. It is a perpetual race. Each day is an epitome of life: each night is a rehearsal of death. In proportion as I give myself to the work, I shall be interested, engrossed, absorbed in it. In proportion as I get nearer to Christ, who is my Life and my Resurrection, I shall be nearer to holiness, to happiness, to my home. Not in my strength, but in His-not by looking inward, but by looking upward-upward to the throne of God and to Him that sitteth thereon-I will press to my mark. From faith to faith-faith repenting, faith resolving -faith working, faith resting-faith militant, faith at last triumphant-such be my life, and such my end! "The God of Heaven, He will prosper me: therefore I His servant will arise and build."

THE CONDITION OF THE CHRISTIANS UNDER THE TURKS:

AS SEEN BY G. MUIR MACKENZIE AND A. P. IRBY.

THE condition of the Christians under the government of the Turks is likely to become more and more a subject of interest to us. If what is so vaguely called the Eastern Question should again arise for debate-perhaps for armed debate-in Europe, it will not find public opinion in this country just where it found it at the time of the Crimean War. A sterner spirit has gone forth against those Mahometan conquerors who, from the period of their first invasion of Europe to the present moment, have never ceased to rule in the spirit of conquerors. Equal justice between a Mahometan and a Christian has never yet been dealt by a Mahometan ruler. What is more, a Mahometan ruler has never recognised that there could be equality in the eye of the law between what he chooses to call the Believer and the Unbeliever. The day when such an equality should be established would be a day of humiliation for the genuine Moslem: he would read in it the sign of the approaching extinction of his own faith. Perhaps not unwisely; for his religiou has ever been the religion of states and armies, of men triumphing in their might. Take from it the prestige of power, deprive it of that success which has ever been appealed to as the chief evidence of Mahometanism, and what is there to secure it a continuance in the heart of man? What of truth it can claim, any system of Deism may possess: it has not even any mythology, any tender fable, any divine here that can lay hold of the affections of a man of peace. A Mahometan state we can, to our cost, easily enough conceive; but a Mahometan congregation—supported, let us say, by voluntary contributious—living side by side, in equal rivalry with Jew and Christian—could this have any vitality in it? Is not dominion, in some shape, interwoven with the very faith itself?

Will England ever again put forth her hand to support the Moslem rule, the rule of Turk over Christian? We think not. Here, if anywhere, surely the policy of non-intervention may righteously prevail. We may at least stand aside here, and allow those who have governed by the sword to maintain their position by the sword.

Meanwhile, as we have said, there is a growing curiosity about the Christian population under the Ottoman dominion. Its condition in Constantinople and other large towns is probably well enough known, but there are whole provinces of Turkey-in-Europe about which our information is very scanty. They present little or no attraction to the English traveller. Who cares about Bulgaria, or Bosnia, or Lower Servia? A man must be very fond of wandering who finds himself in these dreary regions, which can neither be called savage nor civilised, where there seems nothing to study but very commonplace forms of poverty and ignorance and oppression.

Nevertheless, precisely into these neglected provinces have two enterprising ladies lately penetrated.* Alone, that is without any other escort than some guides or servants of the country though which they pass, with no more confidential friend than some sort of courier they call a cavass, these two ladies-single or married we are not informed-travel day after day through semi-barbarous districts, making their inquiries, taking their notes, and studying, as they proceed, the language and traditions of the people. It is not our present intention to review their book; we shall merely avail ourselves of the information they have procured for us on the one topic, the condition of the Christian population in the less frequented provinces of the Turkish dominion.

A vague feeling probably pervades the general mind here in England, that under 'the Turkish empire Christian and Greek are synonymous terms. If such vague apprehension exists, it is certainly a most erroneous one; for not only are the majority of the Christians in the Turkish provinces far from being Greeks, but a spirit of nationality is daily separating the Slavonic Christian from the Greek Christian. When our travellers were in Bohemia. and mentioned to some literary Uzechs, whom they met in Prague, that they were about to visit Athens. they were asked whether they did not intend to visit also their brethreu the South Slavonics. The ladies confessed that this title, the South Slavonics. was new to them. And well they might, for it is a new title due to the revived spirit of nationalities which is taking its course through Europe. That large portion of the Austrian empire which speaks the Slavonic language is acknowledging its brotherhood to that equally large portion of the Turkish empire which speaks the same language. Hence the name South Slavonics. And the same spirit of nationality which, in spite of political boundaries, is uniting these distant Slavonians, is disuniting Slav from Greek, where they are living together under the same government. Speaking generally, the only South Slavonics we are concerned with are those inhabiting the districts marked in our maps as Servia and Bulgaria. It may be well, perhaps, to mention that the new Principality of Servia, which has obtained for itself some degree of independence, and which has been welcomed amongst us as the "youngest member of the European family," is but a small part of the province of Servia. It has the enviable distinction of Free Servia; the southerly portion is called here Old Servia, or rather Serbia.

Of the inhabitants of this district, some are, of course, Mahometans, and a considerable portion are Roman Catholics, but the majority belong to the Slavonic branch of the Greek Church. And here the first thing that strikes us, and the sorriest fact we have to mention, is that these poor Slavs get very little advantage of any kind from their union with the Greek Church. They have a Greek bishop appointed over them who is generally an absentee, who spends what revenue he can extract from his diocese in the nearest civilised town, and feels no interest whatever in promoting the education of the Slav through his native language, the only one through which he can be approached. The poorer natives, therefore, have for their temporal ruler a Turk, and for their spiritual ruler a Greek; and the Greek bishop and Turkish pasha are accused of conspiring together to the detriment of the unprotected peasantry. Those who love the Greeks elsewhere, speak in no flattering terms of them as they stand related to their Slavonic flocks; and an eminent Philhellene, we are told, has apostrophised them as "those corrupt Turkish officials, the Greek hishops in Bulgaria." No wonder, if this be true, that the Roman Catholics are withdrawing many of the population to their church. The Greek bishops, as travellers tell us, exhibit themselves in a doubly odious character, and are, at once, tyrants and slaves. They reluctantly give to them the name of Greeks, and prefer to distinguish them by the title of "Phanariotes," which is current amongst their own countrymen, and which is taken from the "prelate's quarter in Stamboul."

Our travellers have done their best to obtain for us what information they could of this rural population of Slavonic Christlans. They form the mass of the inhabitants. "In Bulgaria," we are told, "there is a good sprinkling of Osmanlee townresidents, but in the western districts-Old Serbia, Bosnia, and Herzegovina-it is generally said that they could be emptied of Osmanlees by simply recalling the officials and garrisons of towns." By Osmanlees are meant those who are both Turks and Mahometans. To these must be added both Slavonian and Albanian Mahometans, who, it is said, are almost as little attached to the Osmanlee as the Christian himself. That our readers may follow us in such details as we may have to present, it is necessary to premise that our travellers first paid their projected visit to Athens, and then crossed from Greece into Turkey-iu-Europe; so that their route lies from the Ægæan to the Adriatic. taking Old Serbia by the way. We land at Salonica, the old Thessalonica.

Here the majority of the inhabitants are Jews; many of them wealthy, many of them handsome, with auburn hair, and the women delicate and fair. In one respect at least they are faithful to their traditions. They will not touch fire, or in any way deal with it, on the sabbath, and if a conflagration should break out in the house they will let it burn on rather than meddle with it. A Jewish servant maid, whose clothes caught fire on the sabbath, has been known to run burning to her Christian neighbours to obtain assistance. But we grieve to say that of the Christians of Salonica a superstition is reported which, perhaps of all the superstitions that have ever disgraced the pure religion, is the most abhorrent and detestable. A custom prevails of taking up the bodies of the dead, after a year spent in the grave, to see if they are sufficiently corrupted or not. If they should be in a state of unusual preservation it is taken as a bad sign, and prayers for the soul of the deceased must be said, for which of course the priest is to be paid. The scene on these occasions must, indeed, be loathsome in the extreme, for added to the frightful sight and smell, is the superstitious terror of relatives, and the horrible curiosity of lookers-on. A corpse which is pronounced to be insufficiently decayed is reinterred, but examined again after another year, and the ceremonial may be repeated a third time. Tender-hearted women who have interred a loving son or daughter are obliged to conform to this hideous practice; and we are told of an instance "where there was the additional agony of finding the little body in a state which relations and neighbours considered as indicating that the soul was in hell."

Our next post of observation is Monastir, but in journeying there, a curious instance occurs of Turkish road-making. The pasha first levies a tax on the country people to pay the labourers—he then proceeds to make the road by forced labour—and puts the result of the tax in his own pocket. Then the workmen, to obtain some compensation for themselves, hit upon the following expedient: where a stream crossed the road, they bridged it over by planks removable at pleasure. Of course when a traveller arrived, he found the planks removed, and not till he paid toll were they reinstated.

At Monastir, the Christians are outnumbered by the Mahometans, and their case seems to be pitiable in the extreme. Even open murder occurs frequently, and passes unpunished. Two instances are related on the testimony of eye-witnesses or near relatives; one of these is especially characteristic. A Christian had sued a Turk for debt, and the Turk had for a very short time been imprisoned. The son of the Turkish debtor thought himself bound to revenge the indignity. He watched for his opportunity, stole upon the Christian merchant while he was taking his siesta under a tree, crept up to him, and discharged a gun into his body. The merchant died of the wound, but the murderer was unmolested.

Even if the assassin is traced and known, conviction is hopeless, for the evidence of a Christian is not received in criminal cases. On the other hand, if a Christian retaliates, or if he wounds a Mahometan in mere self-defence, he is sure to be rigorously punished. It seems to be a recognised feeling, even by the highest Turkish officials, to make it understood that nothing whatever can excuse a Christian for laying violent hands on the sacred person of a true Believer. A Grand Vizier, travelling through the provinces to do justice and reform abuses, stopped in his progress at this Monastir. Some little time before this visit, two boys, a Christian and a Mussulman, had fought; the Christian had struck only in self-defence; both were injured, but the Mussulman boy had received a fatal blow, and subsequently died. The Grand Vizier ordered the execution of the Christian boy; he rejected the petition that was presented to him for mercy, he disregarded the remonstrance of the foreign consuls. he even delayed his own journey that he might witness the execution. Now in Turkey capital sentences are rare. A criminal, as our travellers observe, may be ordered to receive a number of lashes under the half of which he dies, or he may be assigned a term of imprisonment in a loathsome den, wherein he is certain to perish, but he is not sentenced to die. The determination of the Grand Vizier, therefore, in the present instance to have the poor boy publicly executed, was tantamount to a declaration that, let the circumstances be what they may, the death of a Mussulman at the hand of a Christian can, on no account, be pardoned.

It is not the least evil of the miserable government of the Turks that the Christians themselves are corrupted by it; not only corrupted by the fears it engenders and the abject servility it stamps upon the oppressed, but still more corrupted by the share of the oppression they are able to secure by their own craft and subtilty. Thus it is that those whose experience lies amongst official circles have frequently asserted that they have found the Christians worse than the Turks. It has ever been the policy of the Mussulman to govern his various subjects by opposing one to the other. He is therefore well pleased that a Greek bishop should excite the anger of Slavonian Christians by some successful act of perfidy. And, whether he designs it or not, he is constantly holding out a prize to those who desert their compatriots or their coreligionists to become the tool of his own tyranny. When there are good intentions at the seat of authority, these are thwarted by the fraud or the fanaticism of subordinate officials. Permission, for instance, is granted to the Christians of some remote town to build a church; they build, and the church is no sooner built than the neighbouring Mussulmans come and pull it down; they persevere, however, and, perhaps, after the third time, the building is allowed to stand.

In these provincial towns it seems there is not only a Governor, but a Town Couucil, or medjlis. But the establishment of the medjlis seems to have been of little advantage to the Christian. Formerly, by bribing the Governor, he could secure a certain amount of protection; now he has to bribe both the Governor and the medjlis.

By a late concession the Christians are allowed to be represented in the Council by a single member, or by two members if there are both Roman Catholics and Oriental Christians in the place. The Christian member of the Council is, however, powerless to protect his co-religionists. "In the first place," say our travellers, "he is one against many; secondly, he is used as a servant to hand pipes and coffee to the Mussulmans; thirdly, he is sent out of the room whenever anything of importance is to be discussed." He may indeed obtain a share in the spoil by deserting the cause of his co-religionists, and in this case he becomes a scourge to his own community.

At Vuchitern our travellers met with a priest of honest out-speaking character. "Here," he told them, "there are but 200 Christian houses and from 400 to 500 Mussulmans, so the Arnaouts have it all their own way. They rob the Christians whenever and of whatever they please; sometimes walking into a shop, calling for what they want, and carrying it off on promise of payment; sometimes seizing it without further ado."

In this town of Vuchitern the church was destroyed, and a new one was to be built. Not only was it of the plainest exterior, but, lest it should overtop the houses of the Arnaouts, it was sunk some feet in the ground. Other churches have been known to have been sunk still further underground for the same reason, and to have been left almost dark, lest a large window should excite attention and the missiles of the Turkish youth.

We come to Novi Bazaar, and here, when the Christian is questioned, and dares to utter his complaint, the pent-up waters overflow. "The Christian community," says one worthy witness, "of Novi Bazaar is at the mercy of the Mussulmans. They enter houses both by day and night, take what they choose, and behave as they will. Raise an arm or speak a word, and you bring on yourself death or the loss of a limb. Make a representation to the authorities, and you are ruined by the revenge of those of whom you have dared to complain."

On being asked whether the state of things had not improved of late years, the answer was, that in some trifling matters, dress and the like, the Christians had been less molested. For instance, they might enter their own quarter of the town on horseback, though it would still be unsafe to ride past a Mussulman in the road or the bazaar. But, on the other hand, a severer repression had been exercised, for fear of the Christians rising to join the Free Serbians over the border. The injury they found it hardest to bear-as well they might-was the carrying off of Christian girls by Mussulmans. Instances of this flagrant insult were brought distinctly before our travellers. In one case the girl escaped, and came back to the family from which she had been stolen; and because these gave her shelter, the vengeance of the rascals fell upon the whole Christian community.

The Christians who, one after the other, opened their hearts to our travellers, would ask, in a whisper, whether they had been in Serbia meaning the Principality. The word "Serbia" was found an open sesame to all hearts. And what is drawing the Serbs still more together in a bond of nationality, is the ill-advised conduct of the Greek episcopate. The head of the Eastern Church appoints to his Serb flocks Greek bishops unacquainted with the Slavonic language. Throughout the Serb provinces still under Turkey, the bishops are Greek. With one exception, all were absent in Constantinople, and that one was occupied in extorting from the peasantry the means to return to the capital as soon as possible. Turkish authorities are called in to levy the bishop's dues; and the minor clergy, fleeced by their superiors, are constrained to sell as dearly as they can every rite of the Church. One peasant declared that the corpse of his brother had been left lying in his house until he could raise what the priest asked to bury it-two gold ducats paid in advance. Thus, in the Slavonic provinces, the Greek bishop is enrolled in the same category as the Turkish governor; and the people are learning to look to Free Serbia, and a union amongst themselves, for the blessings of education and of good government.

Our next station is the monastery and town of Ipek. Here the same story of misrule and oppression follows us. Our informants seem fully aware of the difficulty of getting at the truth through all this region of the world; they confess that it is simply impossible, where different versions of the same incident are presented to them, to arrive at the fact; but as to the state of society there can be no doubt, for all agree in the same account. Even the Turkish authorities admit, while they attempt to excuse, the prevailing disorder; they complain that they have not sufficient power to compel obedience from their various subjects. For the Christians to be prosperous in these parts is to mark them out for destruction. Of course industry is discouraged. And these Serbians are described as of an industrious disposition, with a love of home and of home comforts, and with quite a Hollander's passion for cleanliness. There are the materials here for a prosperous people if only the laws gave security for person and property. But the animosity of the Arnaouts runs riot here; they carry it to such an excess that when the Christians bear out the dead for burial, they throw stones at the corpse, and cover it with dust and dirt. A poor woman burst into tears before our travellers and poured out, amidst her sobs, a tale of agony which, it seems, was by no means an unexampled one. An Arnaout who had a grudge against a Serb, entered his house and shot him dead. In an evil hour the Christian community of Ipek, knowing the murderer, denounced him to the kaimakam, and thereupon the Arnaouts seized on another Christian and declared that he. not an Arnaout, was guilty of the deed. Christian evidence going for nothing against a Mussurman, of course the Serbian could not be cleared. Thus the unhappy Christian (the husband of the poor woman who relates the story) was kept for months in prison, leaving wife and family unprovided for. Finally he was carried off elsewhere to be tried, and had never returned.

Have we not related enough to show that misrule in Turkey-in-Europe is very little abated, and that, in fact, there is no hope that this part of the world can enjoy the indispensable advantages of just laws fairly administered while the Mahometan is master? Let a new nationality, that of the Christian Slav, be freed from its foreign tyrant;

let us, at all events, do nothing to prolong the present oppression. We have obtained an ill odour abroad, where we are accused of indifference to our co-religionists. Here, in England, every child knows that it was from no love of the Turk that we interposed between him and the Czar of Russia: our commercial and colonial interests were thought to require this step. But should the occasion again occur, England will re-think this matter over. She will ask herself whether, in fact, any interest of hers, commercial or political, does require that she should uphold the tyranny of the Turk over the Slay, of the Mahometan over the Christian.

A DAY'S FISHING.

Down by the pier when the sweet morn is blowing, Slips from her moorings the Fisher's light bark, Sends up her ringing sails while she is going, Spread on the sky like a Bird of the Dark;

Treads very timidly, pauses, grows bolder,
Parts the soft wave, like a tress, from her brows,
Turns, like a girl looking over her shoulder,
Poised in the dance, as she passes and bows.

There, while his slow net is swinging and sinking,
There sits the Fisher, a busy man he;
There too his little son, looking and thinking,
Dumb with the joy of his first day at sea.

He thinks there are flowers for his small hands to gather

Down far below, if he only could dive; He thinks that the fishes are friends of his father, And flock to his nets like the bees to a hive;

He thinks that their yawl is a fortress unfailing, And, should he fall out, why, for certain, he floats;

He thinks that the sea was created for sailing,
And wonders why spaces are left without boats;

He thinks that God made the salt water so bitter Lest folks should grow thirsty and drain the big cup:

He thinks that the foam makes a terrible litter,

And wonders the mermaids don't sweep it all up.

He thinks if his father were half a life younger,
What fun they might have with the coils of that rope:

He thinks—just a little—of cold and of hunger, And Home—just a little—comes into his hope.

He fancies the hours are beginning to linger,
Then looks, with a pang, at the down-dropping light,

And touches the sail with his poor little finger, And thinks it wou't do for a blanket to-night.

The waves all around him grow blacker and vaster,
He fears in his soul they are losing their way,
The darkness is hunting him faster and faster,
And the man there sits watching him, gloomy and grey.

O! is it his father? O! where is he steering?

The changes of twilight are fatal and grim;—

And what is the place they are rapidly nearing?

And what are these phantoms so furious and dim?

He is toss'd to the shore! In a moment they grasp him!

One moment of horror that melts into bliss: It is but the arms of his mother that clasp him, His sobs and his laughter are lost in her kiss.

Softly she welcomes her wandering treasure:

"And were you afraid? Have I got you again?

Forget all the pain that came after your pleasure
In the rest and the joy that come after all pain!"

"SON, REMEMBER."

BY THE EDITOR.

It is a very solemn and affecting thought that we shall all remember our present life in what we call the next world. We either disbelieve this fact, do not lay it to heart, or lose the good impression which it is calculated to make upon us. Many people, indeed, dislike to think about the future at all: they get quit of the pain which would be occasioned by the thought of their present life ever being reproduced in memory, by picturing to themselves a dim and mysterious future of they know not what, spent in some place they know not where, and assume that it is impossible to get their doubts on the subject practically relieved, or their darkness enlightened.

It does indeed seem strange, that a man after he dies should be able to remember his life from childhood, the place where he lived, the people he met and talked with, laughed with, or sorrowed with ;-that he should remember those whom he helped to be good or bad by what he said and did, to whom he told his views and opinions, and to whom he stood in various relationships, as master or servant, neig'ibour or friend, husband or father, teacher or learner: -that his whole life, in short, whatever it has been, whether unknown to the busy world, yet known to God, whether occupied by this or that handicraft, whether spent in workshop or in parliament, at the bench or in the pulpit, in the garret or on the throne, should all be reproduced and remembered beyond the grave. We find it very difficult to believe this about those who have left us. When the family meet in silence, broken only by low sobs, around the departed, and gaze on the marble features, and see before them no longer a person, but a thing-a dead body; and when they lower the cotfin, in which it is nailed, into the grave, and speak low, and say of him who was but the other day amongst them -a very part of themselves-that he is gone; and when they come back to his home, and his empty room, and his unoccupied bed, and put away all the old remembrances of sickness-the phials and medicines, with all the means and appliances which skill had contrived to relieve pain or retain life-until as time rolls on the man becomes like a vision, and his name, once so familiar, is whispered and spoken of as if heard in a dream-oh! it is very difficult for us to realise the fact regarding him that he remains the same identical person, with a memory filled with all the past, of all the events of his lifejourney, from its beginning till its close. It is difficult to believe that death has not made him a different kind of being than a voyage or journey would have made him had he only bidden us farewell to visit some distant shore. We thus think of death, as though it were the blotting out of the past, and the beginning of a new existence, like a birth in which all was future.

But a moment's reflection will teach us that such notions of the dead, or rather of those living elsewhere, cannot be correct. This is involved in the fact of our personal identity. He who does not remember anything of the past, is, to himself, a new creation. Could we forget our whole past history in eternity, it is evident that our responsibility would vanish, and any judgment upon our actions be impossible. Jesus could no longer be the object of our adoration or thanksgiving, as having redeemed us by his blood, and made us kings and priests unto God. No servants could be condemned as having been unprofitable; and no disciples approved of as having visited their brethren in sickness, clothed them when naked, or fed them when hungry. But, "Son, remember" (Luke xvi. 25), is an address to memory. It is a quickening of its powers to recall the things received and done during life; and the result is the remembrance of the members of the family, the five brothers who remained behind, their moral condition, and the necessity of some messenger being sent to rouse them, lest their end should be misery.

So far, indeed, from memory being obliterated in a future state, there is every reason to believe that it will be greatly intensified, and will recall the past with a fulness and clearness of which we have at present no adequate conception. Even now we are familiar with facts regarding this faculty which are well fitted to make us wonder at its mysterious power, and to inspire us with awe when anticipating its future revelations. It would seem, indeed, that when anything has once entered the mind, it is rapidly photographed, so to speak, in all its minute details, and remains unchanged for ever. What a mysterious chamber of the brain it must be which can thus contain the imperishable records of the events of each day and hour in the long life of one man, which, if recorded in volumes, would fill all the libraries of Europe! We cannot explain this. It is a part of the higher mystery-that of the creation of the spirit of immortal man after the image of God, who knows all things, and to whom past, present, and future are as one. But thus it is that we have striking evidence of the permanence of whatever enters the mind. It is a fact, for example, that men have acquired languages in youth which, though forgotten in maturer years, were recalled and spoken during the delirium of fever, and then with restored health passed away again into oblivion! And thus it is with ten thousand things which we once knew but cannot now remember. To us they are not, yet they are, -not dead but asleep, and memory may at a moment touch them with her magic rod and compel them to awake: or they are locked up like coin in a casket, the contents of which are forgotten until the mysterious finger of memory touches a concealed spring, when all are revealed and recognised as having been gathered by ourselves. The occasion of memory thus acting may be a mere trifle-the tone of some well-known voice, an old familiar song, a letter written or received years ago, a lock of hair white as snow from some patriarch's head, or fair and silky from a dead child's brow, the scent of a flower,-

"A subtle smell that Spring unbinds, Dread pause abrupt of midnight winds, An echo or a dream."

Tell the man who has been since boyhood a stranger from his home and country, and long a wanderer in many lands, that, in spite of all the strange faces he has seen, and the strange places he has visited, and the strange adventures he has had by sea and land, the faces, and scenes, and circumstances of the past are still impressed upon his soul, and he may smile at the folly of asking him to believe what he nevertheless wishes could be done. He will assure you that the past is to him like a dim and confused dream, and that there are few things which he can vividly recall. But let him only return to the home of his childhood, to the rural village, or the old house in which he was nurtured, how touching is it to watch in him the opening up of page after page filled with memories which he cannot choose but read, though each page in the old life-book may be blotted by his tears. As he journeys to the place from which long ago he took his departure as a boy, and sees the old hills, the fields, the streams, the rocks, the trees, the church and churchyard, the school, the scattered homesteads-there is not an object that does not summon up persons who have passed away, and incidents of joy and sorrow which up to that moment he had forgotten! "How well," he exclaims, "I remember! It is all as if it had happened yesterday!" As he paces from room to room of the old home, what memories crowd upon him!-days of laughter and of weeping-of parents, brothers, sisters, and friends of the olden time who look on him as of yore; and he hears again voices which the big world, with all its confusing noises, may have long silenced. He is a child again! and instead of saying "I cannot remember," he exclaims, "I cannot forget;" for every room and every window, every field in the landscape, every tree in the garden, cries to him, "Son, remember!"

We have, in such facts as these—and they might be indefinitely multiplied—evidence enough to convince us that the past, though asleep, may still live; that it may be all written in a book in our souls, though not read; and that in a moment memory may waken up that past and compel it to speak, or open up that book and compel us to read it.

You will observe also that there is a marvellous power of memory to recall in a single moment what would take volumes to describe. When we open the eye and gaze for a single second on a landscape, a whole world of details is flashed into us, and when we shut the eye and recall these, they are far more than can be numbered. And thus it is that we might be able in a very brief period of time, in the twinkling of an eye, to recall and identify our whole past life, it may be as clearly as it is seen by the omniscient God.

These facts we cannot possibly alter; memory must remain so long as we are the same persons. What we now are—our whole life made up of our beliefs, affections, purposes, influence, and actions, whatever be its character-must be recalled. We may ourselves determine, by the grace of God, what we shall now be, how we shall live, what kind of influence we shall exercise on the world-what features, in short, shall be characteristic of our moral being; but when once these exist, they exist for ever in the book of memory. Here, then, we have a future beyond our will, and a future within our will. The one is the absolute certainty that we must recall the past and recognise it as true; the other is, that we can mould the future by the present. Whatever we now are, that we shall remember as having once been; and we are responsible for the memories of our life in the future only by being responsible for that life itself in the present.

With these thoughts before us, we naturally ask, how will all this present life look from the other side of time? What judgment shall we pass upon it when it is remembered?

Consider for a moment what a dread vision a sinful, misspent life must be to an ungodly man! In this world even he has no wish to recall it. He says, and says truly, that he hates to think about it-that it is his constant endeavour to bury it out of sight; and, in some degree, he manages to do so. Of innumerable actions, each of which occupied his mind at the time, few are remembered at all. They were seen and have been forgotten, like the features of the landscape as seen from a rapid train; or they have been thrust away into dark corners or locked up in underground cellars, and, thus out of sight, they are, in a sense, out of mind. He has been helped to this forgetfulness by the blinding and hardening effects of sin, until he almost persuades himself that his deeds are forgotten by God also. But should sin against God grow into crime against man, ah, then, how terrible does memory become! We are all familiar with the picture-so often drawn. yet never up to the truth-of the mental anguish which a human being is capable of enduring, with no other power than memory to vex him by constantly dragging up the past as a witness against him at the bar of conscience. Memory pursues him across the seas, haunts him by day and night with the details of crime which may be known only to himself and God, or which may be associated in the minds of others with all that is cruel or dishonourable. Like an accusing spirit, memory awakes him from his sleep, crying, "Son, remember!" it startles him at the festive board; it calls loudly to him in the storm, louder than the thunder and the hurricane; it bends over him in sickness, and sits beside him at the hour of death. Willingly would he escape from this spectre by suicide, had he not the instinctive fear of meeting it again as that "something after death" which must remain with him for ever. Now, such experiences in this world are but portents of what the impenitent will endure in the world to come, when the past cannot be banished by any effort of will, nor be made endurable by a new life in God, and when not only this or that act will be remembered, but the whole life; when every day will pass in awful review, and memory will direct the eye to every event with the words, "Son, remember," until the criminal shall see but one great sinner-himself; one unprofitable servant-himself; one enemy to his own soul-himself; one executioner -himself; one moral suicide -himself!

This picture is what the words of Our Lord suggest:—"Son, remember thou hast had thy good things." And so memory would recall those things which the selfish man called his good, and which he had chosen to the exclusion of God and of eternal righteousness;—the grand house, the purple and fine linen, the boon companions, the godless brothers in his father's home, the neglected Lazarus—all, all would pass like a panorama before him, and condemn him in the light even of his own conscience.

science. But you tell me that no good man in glory could be other than miserable if he were subjected to such a review of the past. Why so? The good man has an experience of the same kind even in this world. He does not forget the past here, nor does he desire to do so. Whatever the past has been, he has no wish to shut his eyes to it, or to judge it more leniently than it deserves, but rather to see it clearly and condemn it heartily in all its vileness. His knowledge, indeed, of the sinfulness of the past is the necessary result of his knowledge of God and of his righteousness. The more holy his present is, and the more he enjoys the peace of God, and is renewed after the image of his Son ;-the more, in fact, his present is the very opposite of his past, the more vividly is that past recalled, and the more sincerely is it loathed. It was so with the Apostle Paul: he did not forget his past with all the evidences which it contained of his life as an unbeliever, a persecutor, and a blasphemer. He recalled it with intense vividness. But that past he had laid down at the Cross of Christ; he had believed in the love of God revealed to the chief of sinners through a Redeemer whose blood cleansed from all sin; he had accepted of the forgiveness of sins, was reconciled to God, and had consecrated himself for evermore to his Yet while he thus saw the past in God's light, and judged it according to God's righteous judgment, he saw it no more as condemning him for the future, because he was delivered from its guilt through the atonement, and delivered from the power of sin which made it a curse to himself and others. Recalling it, therefore, he could utter such words as these :- "Nevertheless, I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have trusted, and I am persuaded he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." And again, "What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Thus it has been with the penitent Magdalen, the thicf on the cross, and with the whole redeemed Church of Christ on earth, who were able to remember the past, because they believed in a Saviour who had granted remission for the sins that are past, renewed their souls for the present, and were assured that God, who in his mercy had pardoned them for what they had been, and made them what they were, would secure to them for ever what they desired to be. VII-54

Nor can I conceive it possible that the saint in glory will choose to forget—even were he able to do so-the condition out of which his Redeemer has delivered him. The more he dwells in the light of eternal truth, righteousness, mercy, and love, the more will he feel it to be in harmony with all He most loves, feel it to be a righteous response to God for all He is, and for all He has done for him, deeply to feel, fully to recognise, and from his whole soul to express his sense of all that he himself had been and done as a lost sinner. It may be difficult to reconcile such a state of mind as this with that selfish joy-if joy it can be called-which necessitates the forgetfulness of every cause of sorrow. But I am sure that he who loves God can reconcile it with his own experience, and would willingly anticipate it as a portion of his joy unutterable, to be able thus to see and to acknowledge his whole wicked past, even at the moment when received into the joy of his Lord, or when casting his crown along with the whole redeemed Church before His throne and joining in the song of "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain," "Thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood."

And now, in conclusion, let me ask, how would your past look if you were compelled to recall it by the command, "Son, remember?" Let it be granted that all of us could remember sin, great and terrible in proportion to our light, our knowledge, our mercies, the many gifts we have received, and the long-suffering patience of God which we have experienced; but could we remember anything different in kind from this? We could remember Christless days, -could we remember other days that could not have been what they were unless He had been our guide, our help, our deliverer, our comforter? We could remember prayerless days, -could we remember any day in which we came to God and made known our request to Him by prayer and supplication and thanksgiving? We could remember how very often we had done our own will, -could we remember our having done or "prepared ourselves to do" the will of Jesus Christ as our Lord and Master? We could remember evil habits,-could we remember earnest strivings to master them, and form better habits? We could remember defeats by the flesh, -could we remember any battles or victories by the Spirit? In one word, could there be recalled even now, or do we hope that the Spirit of God could recall to us hereafter, any portiou of life, any state in life, any acts in life, which could not have been unless we had had faith in God and Jesus Christ his Son, or were walking under the influence, not of mere instinct, passion, impulse, or varying circumstances, but in the Spirit, and therefore from an inward principle of right? I am not speaking of many years, but of any days-not of many things, but of any things-not of Christian manhood, but of Christian childhood, as evidencing such a knowledge of God, such a recognition of his relationship to us in Christ as would enable Our Lord to call us one of his sheep who had heard his voice and followed his steps; one of his disciples who had learned of Him; one of his servants who had obeyed his commands; one of his brothers and sisters who had done the will of his Father.

I do not mean to affirm, of course, that any good done by us in the past can blot out the evil or give us hope for the future. But it alone can afford satisfactory evidence of a true and living faith in Jesus, "whom God has set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." You may say that we have to do only with the present, for we cannot change the past, which must remain for ever the same. I ask no more. Be right for the present-now-towards God in Christ, through a sincere faith, hearty repentance, and the filial heart of love and obedience-in one word, truly know God as your reconciled Father, and as the rest and satisfaction of your spirit now; and He will judge you, not by what you were, but by what you are. The past will not condemn you now, if now you are justified by faith in God through Jesus Christ. Jesus having been an enemy cannot alter the fact of Jesus now being a friend; and while you must blame yourself only for your own wicked past, you will bless God and his grace for your very different present. And as for the future, to know and love God truly now, implies that we shall love and enjoy Him for ever. What He is to us, contains the assurance of what to us He will for ever be, and is a revelation of an eternal future. "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

But if in this world we dare not recall the past. how shall we be prepared to stand before the judgment seat of Christ, and to give an account of ourselves to God, when He shall "require that which is past?" O my brethren, it would be a great aid to us, I think, if we sometimes thus summoned ourselves to the bar of memory and conscience, and judged ourselves, that we should not be judged of the Lord! It would aid us were each of us sometimes to ask himself, What will I think of what I am doing, or intending to do, of what I am now rejecting or accepting, suffering or enjoying, giving or withholding, saying or not saying, when such words as "Son, remember" compel me to contemplate all in the presence of God? How much would such a test as this, fairly applied, even now, strengthen us to fly from the evil and pursue the good! How would the anticipation of this future help us to despise all that was vain, proud, mean, selfish, sensual, earthly, and devilish, and unworthy of being recalled! How it would arouse us to be simple and sincere in our every-day life, and encourage us to lay up a store against the time to come, and to record each day such an autobiography as would, by God's grace, be read with thanksgiving to Eather, Son, and Holy Ghost! O that the words sounded in our ears when tempted to evil, when prompted to do good, when becoming careless and slothful, or earnestly fighting and conquering:-"Son, think now that all this will be remembered hereafter!" Merciful Saviour, forgive us all the guilt of our past lives, for Thou hast died on the Cross as our propitiation; through the Holy Spirit renew us in the spirit of our minds; help us to do Thy will during the present; establish, strengthen, settle us, and enable us so to remember Thee each day of our life that Thou mayst remember us when Thou comest into Thy kingdom! Amen.

CURIOUS OLD REGISTERS IN SOMERSET HOUSE.

ABOUT nine-and-twenty years ago, a number of venerable but somewhat dingy-looking volumes began to travel from all parts of England and Wales to a certain London office. So varied were these volumes in size, shape, and style of binding, that any similarity as to their contents would scarcely have been surmised from their external aspect. Some of them were folios strongly bound in leather; some were books only a few inches square, enclosed in paper covers; some were three hundred years old; some had not been in existence a quarter of a century: yet these miscellaneous volumes were pretty much alike as to the nature of the matter which they contained. Upon their arrival in London, moreover, the smallest and most insignificant-looking of the number, as well as the more bulky and pretentions, underwent a scrutiny so careful as to show that they were one and all held to be documents of no little importance.

The volumes to which we refer had been sent by their custodians to the metropolis on the invitation of certain commissioners appointed under the Great Seal. They were nothing more nor less than records of births, baptisms, marriages, deaths, and burials, which had been kept by such divisions of the community as did not belong to the Established Church. A new system for registering, in the case of every individual Englishman, the great landmarks of his earthly existence, had lately been passed into law by Act of Parliament. It was now designed to collect together, so far as it might be practicable, the records which, in the absence of a general system, had hitherto been locally kept by the various bodies of Nonconformists. The object in view was twofold:

-that these documents might be placed in Government custody; and that extracts from such of them as should be deemed trustworthy evidence, might henceforth be issued on Government authority.

The design met with general favour amongst the Dissenters. It is true that some bodies altogether withheld their registers from Government protection, and that others, which ultimately acceded to the Government proposal, began by objecting to it. But 3,630 religious congregations at once consented to deliver up their records; and the transmission of 7,000 volumes to the commissioners was the immediate result of this consent. The number of books has since been largely augmented. At the present time there are in the custody of the Registrar-General nearly 9,000 registers which have been deposited with him by the Nonconformist bodies; and, by an Act of the 3rd and 4th Vic., cap. 92, extracts therefrom, sealed with the seal of the General Register Office, are made receivable as evidence in all courts of law, without any additional proof whatsoever.

Various are the shades of religious belief which these 9,000 volumes represent. French Protestants, whose confession of faith was drawn up by Calvin himself, have contributed several venerable folios to the number. That remarkable body, the Society of Friends,-distinguished, on the other hand, for its broad Arminianism, -has materially added to the total. The Independents, whose name is associated with moderate doctrinal views and with the Congregational system of church government, are present in great force. The more exclusive Baptists muster strongly. The Presbyterians are not absent. The followers of Whitefield and Wesley, with their diverse but (let us hope and believe) not essentially antagonistic tenets, have also augmented the list of the volumes.

Nor are the smaller and less demonstrative sections of English Nonconformity unrepresented. The various subdivisions of the Wesleyan body; the Moravians; the Swedenborgians, and others, have each and all contributed their quota to the mass of documents which we are considering.

The Roman Catholic prelates declined to consign their registers to Government custody. Their main reason for objecting to do so was, it must be admitted, intelligible and weighty. Continual applications, they said, are made to them, from the Continent and elsewhere, for certificates of baptism, confirmation, and marriage, both for legal and ecclesiastical purposes; and in Catholic countries these documents are useless, unless verified by the episcopal seals and signatures. Had the registers in question been permitted to pass out of the hands of the Catholic Church, the Catholic Church clearly could not have authenticated extracts therefrom without considerable inconvenience; while, wanting such authentication, the extracts would in many cases have been valueless. Hence the mass of the Catholic registers remained in the keeping of their original custodians; a few volumes, however, from the northern counties, subsequently found their way into the hands of the commissioners.

The Jews also objected to part with the records relating to their Society.

It may, perhaps, be imagined that registers of baptisms, marriages, and burials are unlikely to yield much interesting information, or to suggest reflections either novel, useful, or entertaining. It happens, however, that, in various ways, the 9,000 volumes under our consideration forcibly illustrate the histories and tenets of the denominations to which they refer. Some of them contain, in addition to the entries of names for which they were principally designed, minutes and other matter of no small interest and importance; and the registers themselves are by no means so barren a subject for consideration as might be supposed at first sight. We propose in the present paper to glance at the various sections of Protestant Nonconformists in the light afforded by these volumes.

The registers of the Independent, Baptist, and Presbyterian denominations are not the most ancient, but they will, perhaps, be found as interesting as any to the mass of our readers, and we therefore begin with them.

The number of volumes deposited with the Registrar-General by these great sections of English nonconformity amounts to about 2,350. Before dealing with the denominations separately, let us briefly notice a series of registers in which all the three are alike represented, and which we have not included in the above total.

Dr. Daniel Williams, a Presbyterian divine, who was born in the middle of the seventeenth century, and who died at the beginning of the eighteenth, founded a library in Redcross Street, Cripplegate, Loudon, for the use of Dissenting ministers. In 1742 -twenty-six years after the founder's death-a register of births was commenced in connection with this library, and was continued up to the year 1837, when the civil registration system-so ably administered by the present Registrar-Generalbegan to operate. The records consist of eleven well-kept folios, which comprise about 50,000 entries. The persons registered in these volumes were, for the most part, such as belonged to the better class of Dissenters. The volumes themselves are wanting in any interest of a religious character, and are noteworthy merely as representing a systematic attempt at registration on a large scale, made nearly a century before Government had taken the matter up. We have spoken of the books as well kept; but one defect is at once noticeable in them: each entry is not always made complete in itself. Thus, a single mention of the names of the parents frequently has to do service for a whole family of children-a circumstance which embarrasses the process of extracting separately, in the form of certified copies, the entries of individual births. The registers, however, are perfectly reliable, and extracts therefrom are in continual request for legal and other purposes.

Of the three denominations to which we have referred, the Independent body undoubtedly stands first at the present time, both in the numbers and in the influence of its adherents. The sect is largely represented at the General Register Office. Distributed as it is evenly and abundantly throughout the population of the country, its records are to be traced in corresponding order and numbers on every shelf of the library through which we are leading our readers. The registers, however, although numerous, do not any of them extend back to the earliest days of the history of the denomination. The most ancient volume amongst them is that from Bull Lane Chapel, Stepney, which contains a large number of entries of baptisms and burials, and which would appear to represent an important congregation. Its first page is dated 1644.

It may seem strange to the reader that a sect whose origin is referable to the early days of Queen Elizabeth's reign should not be represented by records of any date prior to that mentioned above. But a consideration of the history of the denomination leads us at once to understand the non-existence of very early registers. Let it be remembered that until the days of the Civil War the Independents were undergoing a perpetual series of molestations, that their assemblies were forbidden by law, and their adherents regarded as dangerous fanatics. Amidst the struggle for existence which these early persecutions involved, it was not to be expected that the denomination would be enabled to give much attention to the comparatively minor business of registration. But in the days of Cromwell and John Owen the tables were turned: the sect which had been despised and persecuted now became popular and influential. From this time, notwithstanding the temporary troubles arising to dissent at the Restoration, the Independents occupied a recognised position such as they had never occupied before. From this time they recorded, as they had been unable to do previously, the baptisms which occurred in their chapels, and the interments over which their ministers presided.

Several registers referring to the latter half of the seventeenth century testify to the brightening prospects of the Independents of that period. There is, amongst others, a curious old book from a chapel in Guildhall Street, Canterbury. The congregation there first assembled in the year 1646, and its records commence with the following year. Another singular old volume, which we have perused with great interest, and whose brown and mouldering pages have been patched and mended with the most reverential care, introduces us to a church formed at Morley, near Leeds, in Yorkshire, about the year 1654. In this book quaint little cash accounts of sums laid out in bread, wine, and other devotional necessaries, are curiously intermingled with entries of burials and baptisms. Texts on which the sermons of favourite preachers were founded, together with notices of excommunications, are also interspersed amongst the other entries; reminding the reader that a moderate Calvinism was then, as now, characteristic of Congregational doctrine, and that Congregational discipline has from the first been properly, although not severely, enforced. We may remark here, that it was not unusual to introduce into the register-books of former days a considerable amount of matter essentially foreign to the records. For instance, we have met with an old volume—professedly a baptismal register — which comprises amongst its entries various memoranda of infallible cures for corns, bunions, and small-pox; and which gives instructions as to the proper method of charming away warts, and excellent recipes for balm tea and currant wine.

The Independent records relating to the close of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth are numerous, and consist of a very miscellaneous assemblage of volumes. The denomination (in common, it must be owned, with their Baptist brethreu) for a long time continued to carry thoroughly independent principles into their registration system; each congregation having recorded its own baptismal and sepulchral facts in the manner that seemed best in its own eyes. In later days printed forms were in use in some places; but, as far as we can discover, no attempt at a general and uniform method of registration was ever made by the denomination.

An entry, dated about a hundred years ago, which we have found in a volume belonging to the Independent Chapel (now called "Lower Meeting House") Newbury, Berkshire, will serve to exemplify the relations subsisting between the Congregationalists and the Baptists at that period. The entry is worded thus:—

"In the years 1769 and 1770 the Anabaptists, by their usual methods (which are well known to those who are acquainted with them), made an attack upon the above church; and nine persons were prevailed upon to deny their infant baptism; however, the church having met and resolved that whoever were Anabaptists amongst us should be only considered as occasional communicants, presently after this four of the members left us, and joined the Anabaptist church. But the Lord blessed the following methods to prevent the error from spreading any further, viz.:—Preaching upon the infant's right to this seal of the Covenant; and public baptizing—which I pray God may never more be disused in this church. (Signed) "J. Reader."

The Independents, as will be remembered, owe their commencement and early successes to two men named respectively Brown and Robinson. Amongst themselves Robinson is naturally the favourite of the two; for Robert Brown, in the later days of his life, left the sect which he had founded, and accepted a benefice in the Established Church—obviously a just cause of offence to his forsaken followers. There is little doubt, however, that the first rise of the Congregational theory in this country is mainly to be attributed to the teaching of the latter, although we cannot wonder that the Independents should be ready to disown him. And they can well afford to erase his name from the list of their worthies. The catalogue of their learned and pious pastors is undoubtedly long and weighty; we could select from the Independent volumes under our notice a large number of signatures which would immediately recall such lives and labours as any Christian community might be proud to have produced. Through accidental circumstances, however, it happens that the names of some great and prominent men in the denomination are missing from these records. We had hoped, for instance, to discover in the baptismal register from the Independent chapel in Bury Street, St. Mary Axe, the handwriting of good Dr. Watts, who was pastor of the congregation for a long period. But our volumes from the chapel do not extend back to a date sufficiently early to embrace any portion of the doctor's pastorate.

It is interesting in casting our eyes over these registers, which record the names of so many Independent families, to consider what we owe to the denomination, and how far the influence which it has exercised has been beneficial. We are aware that the blame of one lamentable fact—the execution of King Charles-is commonly laid upon the sect. We would rather not attempt to answer the uncomfortable question whether or not this accusation Let us rather turn to the unmistakable good which is to be traced to the existence of the Independent body.

It is admitted then, on all hands, that the Independents were the first advocates of absolute religious toleration. As a body the Presbyterian party were far more narrow-minded; and the counteracting influence of the broader Independent views seems to have been unquestionably beneficial. Let us thankfully acknowledge our obligations to the denomination, and admire the numerous useful and pious lives which it has produced. Let us hope, too, that amidst the external prosperity which seems to attend the sect in the present day, it may continue to maintain that high character for piety and usefulness which it justly won in those darker times when its principles were misconstrued and its members persecuted.

Next to the Independents in numbers and importance come the Baptists. This denomination is perhaps, on the whole, less satisfactorily represented at the General Register Office than any other. Not, indeed, that the number of volumes which they have deposited there is exceptionally small. On the contrary, they have contributed largely to the ancient library which we are considering. allude rather to the want of system and completeness which characterises their records. Such imperfection, however, is easily to be explained. From the absence of any baptismal ceremony during the infancy of their children, Baptist parents are remarkably likely to overlook, or to defer to a late period, the registration of those children's births; for we well know from experience that matters of business which are not attended to at specified times, are wont to be either imperfectly fulfilled, or to be neglected altogether. When the royal commission issued their circular inviting Dissenting ministers to transmit their registers to London, many attempts were made by Baptist pastors to supply the deficiencies of previous years, by compiling from entries made in family Bibles, and from other private sources, the records which they had failed to keep in the ordinary regular manner. But such second-hand evidence was clearly not to be trusted. Thus, on looking through the calendar of volumes which were examined by the commissioners and rejected on the ground of doubtful authenticity, we find that a very large proportion of the volumes so rejected belonged to Baptist congregations. describing the registers of this denomination, however, as being ill kept, we must be understood as speaking generally. There are many exceptions to the rule, and many satisfactory volumes amongst the Baptist records.

Our documents relating to the Baptists extend but little further back than those of the Indepen-Doubtless the causes which in the one case operated to prevent early registration, operated similarly in the other also; while, with respect to both sects, it should be remembered that their most ancient records were precisely those which were likeliest to be treasured up by private individuals, and thus to escape inclusion in any such general collection as that now under our notice.

The history of the English Baptists is a remarkable one, and we shall venture in this place briefly to advert to its leading features. Up to that point when the volumes before us will assist our narrative, we shall endeavour to be especially concise. We would premise that, in speaking of the Baptists of the present day, we ordinarily mean the Calvinistic or Particular Baptists, which now constitute by far the greater proportion of those who hold adult baptism. But, in referring to earlier times, we must not necessarily be thus understood. It should be borne in mind, also, that many of those who first embraced Baptist principles in this country were men who entertained opinions on other religious subjects of a palpably absurd and extravagant character; men who, in all probability, would not be recognised as brethren by the Particular Baptists of our own times. 'It thus becomes evident that while modern Baptist sentiments cannot fairly be associated with those early extravagancies to which we have alluded, neither can our Baptist friends of to-day claim, as martyrs to the cause which they represent, all the Anabaptists who unhappily suffered death at the time of the Reformation. Since, however, there is a general identity of views on the single subject of baptism, amongst all those who have ever borne the name of Baptist or Anabaptist in England, we shall not, in these brief observations, again dwell upon the distinctions which we have here thought it well to point out.

Wickliff has been supposed to have held Baptist sentiments, and many of his followers undoubtedly were Baptists. William Sautré, the first English martyr, who was burnt in London A.D. 1400, is thought by some to have embraced these views; but we believe the idea rests upon no reliable basis. During the reign of Henry VIII., persecutions against the Anabaptists seem to have been rigorously carried on. In 1535, ten were put to death in England, while ten others saved themselves from a similar fate only by recantation. In November, 1538, the king put forth a proclamation condemning all the books of the Anabaptists, and directing the punishment of those who sold them. Passing on to the benign reign of King Edward VI., we find that the only two persons who suffered for their religious sentiments under his gentle rule were Anabaptists. For these deaths, we believe, Cranmer must be held responsible. It cannot be denied that such cruelties on the part of our Reformers afforded to Queen Mary an unfortunate pretext for the severities which, when she came to the throne, she practised towards those Reformers themselves.

In the early years of Elizabeth's reign, the privy assemblies of the Baptists appear to have been numerous. Upon her accession the Queen had ordered that all who were imprisoned on account of religion should be set at liberty; and this act had probably conveyed the impression of a wider toleration than Her Majesty subsequently found it expedient to practise. Certain it is that dissent was rife at this period. "We found," says Jewel, writing to Martyr, "a large and inauspicious crop of Arians, Anabaptists, and other pests, which I know not how, but as mushrooms spring up in the night and darkness, so these sprang up in that darkness and unhappy night of the Marian times." The good bishop had cause to remember the "Marian times" with bitterness; but he is unreasonable, we think, to lay upon those times the blame of the particular evil which he is here lamenting. The "crop" of which he complains probably flourished still better in the days of his episcopate than in those previous ones when he had been an exile and a wanderer. Such, at all events, would seem to be the case, from the fears aroused and the repressive measures resorted to during the latter part of his lifetime. In 1568 a special visitation was ordered in every parish throughout the realm to discover the teachers of Anabaptist and other "evil doctrines." Many Dutch Anabaptists were now taking refuge in England from the persecutions of the Duke of Alva; and the influence and teaching of these refugees were looked upon by the Government with great suspicion and alarm.

In 1575-four years after Jewel's death-the Anabaptists had increased to such an extent, that it was thought needful to resort to strong measures for their repression. An event now occurred which is greatly to be regretted. On the 3rd of April in the above-mentioned year, a congregation of thirty Flemish Baptists assembled in a private house in being commissioned to confer with these accused persons, produced four articles, requiring their subscription. If obstinate, they were to be burnt Two of the number-Jan Peters and Hendrik Terwoort—suffered death in this manner: while such of the rest as remained constant were banished. It is all the more melaucholy to reflect on these and similar cruelties, when we remember that the men instrumental in inflicting them were frequently themselves persons of undoubted piety.

In the reign of James I., the Baptists, in common with the Puritans, were much harassed, and many Baptist families withdrew from the kingdom in consequence. As the sentiments of the sect came to be more fully developed, the question arose amongst them whether they, having themselves been baptised only in infancy, were competent to administer the rite to other persons-pædo-baptism being held by them as altogether invalid. One prominent man of the body, who lived during James's reign, is said to have re-baptised himself in order to dispose of the difficulty. The Baptists, however, do not, we believe, generally credit the assertion that he did so. It certainly is not easy to perceive how such an act could have been sufficient to allay the misgiving to which we have adverted. If a man be avowedly incompetent to baptise others, we do not see how he can be held competent to baptise himself.

The last person burnt alive in England on account of religious opinions was Edward Wightman, a Baptist of Burton-on-Trent, who suffered death in the year 1611. As in other cases, the peculiarity of this man's views was by no means confined to those which he entertained on the subject of baptism.

In 1633 the Baptists, who had previously been intermixed with other Protestant Dissenters, and who had consequently shared with the Puritans in all their persecutions, began to separate themselves and to form distinct societies. Ten years later they published a formal confession of their faith.

We have now reached the period when the volumes before us take up the thread of the narrative which we have followed thus far without their assistance. Numerous Baptist churches were founded about the middle of the seventeenth century, and the records of some of these churches we are able to introduce to our readers. One of the oldest containing matter of any interest or suggestiveness, is that from the chapel in Coxwell Street, Circnester. The congregation first assembled in the year 1651, and was still subsisting when its registers were transmitted to London in 1837. The record dates back to the year of foundation, but until the beginning of the present century it was very imperfectly kept. On the first page of the volume are the names of five persons "whom" (as is stated at the foot of the list) "the church hath agreed to cast out." Then come the names of London for worship. They were interrupted, and five others, followed by this statement:-"These taken into custody. The bishop of the diocese, persons the church hath agreed to admonish further in order for their recovery." It would have been interesting to learn what amount of inconsistency of conduct was deemed incompatible with a continnance in church membership by the Baptists of those days. But we are not told what the delinquencies of the ten persons had been. If, however, we may form any opinion on the subject from notices in the same volume which relate to nearly a century later, those delinquencies were, many of them, probably open and unmistakable breaches of social morality. The members "cut off" from the church at this later period were persons who had been guilty of the gravest vices, which vices are carefully specified; and the delinquents in these cases were manifestly dealt with in a commendable spirit of patience before their final excommunication. The religious profession of a person seeking admission to a Baptist church is of the highest and most definite nature that can be imagined. may therefore perhaps be pardoned if we watch with a peculiar exigency the conduct of those who have obtained such admission.

We have examined with interest a book from a Baptist chapel of some antiquity in Oxfordshirethat at Coate, near Bampton. The congregation was formed in the year 1664. The volume is headed by the following inscription, which forcibly illustrates in its language the spirit in which the good people first assembled, and also (by its spelling) their unlettered condition :-

"The Lord whoe was pleased in these last dayes to gather his people out from ammonge the people of this world (in respect of worship) hath bene pleased acording to his aboundant goodnes to gather together some of his poore children and to place here in and about Longworth where wee have injoyed many mercyes and privilidges which he hath bestowed upon his people and amongst the many mercyes this is not the least that in this church he hath given some increase in number of his witnesses against those vaine wayes of this world which they re-ceve by tradition from their flathers as chiefly baptizing of Infants (as they call it) & touching their false per-suasions about the place where they bury their dead which two things (as alsoe many other) the Lord hath separated us from them in.

"And taking these things into consideration wee were lead by that sure word of prophesic as in baptisme soc alsoe in buring our dead in a place aparte from the people of this world, hereupon our Births and our Burialls were neither of them regestered by the Parish regesters so we Judged it expedient to take care in this mater whereupon wee apoynted one to it and prepared this booke wherein wee have inserted on one side Births the other Burialls."

The register thus prefaced was evidently highly valued, and was carefully kept. It comprises entries of some interest relative to church membership, which, however, our limited space forbids us to quote.

Passing on to that portion of our old library which relates to the county of Kent, we meet with a singular volume from the old Meeting-house, Bessell's Green, Orpington. It is described, and the intentions of the church are explained, in the following words :-

"A booke belonging to the church or congregation of the Saintes of God in Jesus Christ Assembled in the parish of Orpington in the County of Kent. Anno Domini 1667 Sept. 29.

"Wee whose names are underwritten being beleevers baptized and stated upon the six principles contaned in the 6 chapter Hebrues verses 1 and 2 according to the order of the gospell do resolve to sett downe together in a church or congregationall wave with the help of the Lord takeing for our rulle to walke by the written word of God contaynde in the ould and new testament and from this Church or Congregationall wave wee doe not Intend to depart to anye other Church or congrattion to sett downe with them without the advise and consent of this Church or congration meeting at Orpington in the county of

"Whereby the bands of love may not be broken."

The time at which these words were written was far from being one of hope to the Nonconformists. The Conventicle Act was in force, and many prominent Dissenters, both of Baptist and other persuasions, were suffering under its penalties. Bunyan was in Bedford Gaol, and the sudden suppression of the zealous and successful labours of that remarkable man could not have failed to depress in an unusual degree the denomination to which he had attached himself; while his privations were but representative of those which were now being endured by a large number of his co-religionists. We cannot help, then, being struck with the brave determination which characterises the above quotation. It must have needed no small courage to form a new church under the circumstances which attended the formation of that at Orpington. But strong courage is generally found to be associated with strong conviction; and no one, after reading the foregoing paragraphs, could doubt that the Orpington Baptists were thoroughly persuaded of the correctness of their views.

The books from the Pithay and Broadmead churches, Bristol, represent ancient and important congregations in that city. There are ten volumes of registers in Government keeping belonging to these chapels. The earliest date to which the records relate is the year 1679. They are well kept; the more ancient entries especially being written with remarkable care, and also with curious minuteness. From the completeness of these registers, combined with the extent and standing of the congregation to which they refer, they would doubtless be considered peculiarly valuable by the Baptist denomination. The story of the Broadmead church has of late years been published under the title of the "Broadmead Records," and to the historical introduction to this book we must own ourselves indebted for some of the facts mentioned in the present paper. We may also confess here a similar indebtedness to "Crosby's History of the English Baptists"-a valuable work now, we believe, but rarely to be met with.

From James II. the Baptists received freedom to meet for worship; and the passing of the Toleration Act, which ensued upon the accession of William, brought them complete religious liberty. Having, then, seen the denomination into smooth waters, we propose in this place to take a retrospective glance at its successful combat with persecution.

We can best accomplish our purpose by inserting a list of Baptist churches founded during the troublous seventeenth century.

The list is necessarily incomplete, for we are able to include in it those churches only whose existence is evidenced by the volumes before us; while a few of those again are absent from our catalogue, for the reason that there is some doubt as to the date of their foundation. We think, however, that the list is sufficient to show that the Uniformity and Conventicle Acts were, with their less notable predecessors of the same class, as inefficacious as they were unjust; and that the Baptists-whom we may take in this matter as the representatives of all other Protestant Dissenters - gained far more than they lost under the operation of those

From the commencement of the eighteenth century to the present time, the Baptist denomination has been steadily on the increase. The tables published by the Registrar-General after the census of 1851 show the total number of Baptist chapels in England at that time to have been 2,789. Of these, nearly two thousand belonged to the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists.

It is considered that the missionary enterprises of the Baptists especially entitle them to the praise and gratitude of Christendom. It cannot be questioned that their efforts in this direction have been zealous and persevering; nor, however much we may differ from the views of such men as Dr. Carey, can we justly withhold from him, or from many others like him, the tribute of respect and admiration which is due to Christian self-denial, under whatever aspect it may exhibit itself.

Of the English Presbyterians we shall have but little to say. Our books referring to this denomination, which are less than 200 in number, fail for the most part to tell by any internal evidence the "strange eventful history" of that great religious body-once so prominent, and now scarcely to be discovered in this country. Of those 200 volumes, however, many bear testimony to the continued popularity of Presbyterian opinions, long after the attempt to make Presbyterianism the State religion had been abandoned, and to the still flourishing condition of the denomination in those days (1691) when the Presbyterian and Independent ministers of London agreed to drop their differences and to cooperate as allies.

It is well known that during the last hundred years Socinian opinions have gradually spread through the denomination. Turning to the baptismal records of a Presbyterian congregation at Norwich, which relate to the middle of the last century, we find there the frequent signature, "John Taylor;" and to this learned and eminent doctor of divinity the change, we believe, is mainly attributable. The publication of his "Scripture Doctrine of Atonement," in the year 1751, seems to have paved the way to open Unitarianism on the part of the English Presbyterians; although in all probability from a much carlier period, such views had gradually been gaining ground on the old Puritan faith.

The words "Unitarian" and "Presbyterian" at length came to be, in this country, almost synonymous. Those who still adhered to the Calvinistic creed of the Puritans for the most part joined the Independents, or other "orthodox" bodies, leaving the old chapels and endowments in the hands of the Socinian party. Practically, then, English Presbyterianism wellnigh ceased to be before the close of the last century, and not until recently has there been anything like a revival-on the English side of the Tweed-of those tenets which 200 years ago appeared likely to carry everything before them. We believe we are correct in stating that at the present time there are in the northern counties and in London, a large number of congregations bearing the Presbyterian name, whose views nearly coincide with those of the Church of Scotland. We forbear, however, to enlarge upon the subject of the Presbyterians, since, as we have before intimated, the documents before us afford no evidence of so special a character as to be worthy of quotation or comment.

We will now proceed to the consideration of that great religious movement which took place in England during the last century, and which owed its origin and its name to the methodical piety of a few zealous Oxford undergraduates. Methodism in both its branches is duly represented in our collection of registers, and we hope to be able to give it the position which it deserves to hold in the present sketch. We will in the first place consider the Wesleyan body.

The Wesleyans, and their several secession branches, have given over to the care of Government 856 volumes of registers. These records may briefly be described as accurate and orderly. The first fact which strikes us with regard to them is one that at once betrays an important circumstance in the history of the denomination. It may be said that the Society was fairly established by the year 1745, when the country had been divided into circuits, and when the first Conference was held; but the most ancient of the registers before us commence from a period nearly twenty years later. How is this to be accounted for? The answer to the question is to be found in the fact that John Wesley did not originally design the foundation of a new religious body. His teaching was intended to infuse new piety into churchmen, but it was not intended to destroy their churchmanship. Thus for a long period the children of parents who attended Wesleyan class-meetings and love-feasts were baptised and registered at church in the usual manner; and had it not been for the short-sighted illiberality which at length absolutely compelled Wesley's retirement from the Establishment, the names of his disciples might have been found recorded in parish registers to this day. It has always appeared to us a matter for regret that the services of this extraordinary man should have been lost to the Church of England; and we have pleasure in the reflection that his own early preference VII-55 and conviction had no share in making him a separatist.

In glancing over the Wesleyan registers we cannot help being struck by the elaborateness of that system of polity which the founder of the Society devised, and which exhibits itself in different ways in these volumes. Wesley's great administrative abilities were gradually unfolded as circumstances rendered the position of his followers more and more anomalous. It is said by those who have studied the matter far more deeply than we can ourselves pretend to have done, that the provisions of his scheme are admirably suited to the requirements of a religious society, and that they evince rare forethought and knowledge of human nature. That the system works well, cannot be questioned. We remember that Dr. Pusey in his "Eirenicon" refers to the Wesleyans as exhibiting a larger amount of vitality than any other body of Dissenters; and it would seem to be but a fair conclusion that this vitality is maintained by their classes, love-feasts, and watch-nights, by their arrangements with respect to local and itinerant preachers, and by the various other provisions which distinguish the discipline of the Society.

Up to the commencement of the present century no effort was made amongst the Wesleyan denomination to begin a general system of registration. In the year 1818, however, they instituted a Metropolitan Office in Paternoster Row, London, for the registration of the births and baptisms occurring amongst the different congregations of their adherents. The registers from this office, accompanied by certificates on parchment-which certificates were signed by the parents of the registered child, by witnesses present at the birth, and by the minister who performed the baptismal ceremony-have been handed over to Government, and have taken their place on the shelves of our old library. A large place it is; for they are the most enormous folios we ever saw. They are three in number, and contain together the births and baptisms of 10,291 children. We should state that we have not included these volumes in the total of Wesleyan registers already given.

The Metropolitan Wesleyan Registry was kept with an elaborateness and precision characteristic of the Society. The registrar furnished the ministers on the various circuits with duplicate printed forms on parchment, both of which were signed by the several persons whom we have mentioned above. These forms were then transmitted to the registry. when the registrar entered the particulars contained therein in one of the large folios which we have described, adding to the forms a certificate of the date of such registration, with the number and folio of the volume in which he had made the entry. One of the duplicate parchments was then returned to the parents, the other being filed at the office. The forms employed were very carefully and lengthily worded, and they recall, by their scrupulous exactness, the registers of the Society of Friends, which we hope to introduce to the reader in a future article.

The metropolitan registration of the Wesleyans was not designed to supersede their congregational registration. Both the old and new systems proceeded together until the year 1837, when the passing of the Act before alluded to, obviated the necessity for any further denominational efforts of the kind.

We have hitherto purposely avoided making any other than a most passing allusion to the divisions which have sprung up from time to time amongst the Wesleyans; nor shall we now have either space or inclination to dwell upon them, although we are continually reminded of them in our investigation of the registers. We will, however, in this place, very briefly review the principal secessions from the original Wesleyan Society.

When the enthusiastic hero-worship which the venerable and saintly John Wesley inspired during his lifetime had somewhat subsided, the discovery was made by his followers that his authority over them had been wellnigh absolute. This authority in the hands of other travelling preachers soon began to grow burdensome. The right of the laity to participate in the spiritual and secular government of the body began to be considered, and urged; and the new cause found its champion and representative in the person of a minister named Alexander Kilham. On account of his innovating opinions this gentleman was tried at the Conference of 1796, and was expelled from the Society. The result was, that in the following year Mr. Kilham became the virtual founder of the "Methodist New Connexion."

The "Primitive Methodists" are the next offshoot from the parent plant of Wesleyanism. A desire arose at the beginning of this century, amongst certain members of the Society, to recur to various early practices with respect to fieldpreaching, &c., which had fallen into disuse. The proposed revival of modes of procedure, then unprescribed, gave offence to the Conference, and the formation of the "Primitive Methodist" Connexion followed.

The "Wesleyan Methodist Association" and "Wesleyan Methodist Reformers" represent further disputes which arose in Conference in the years 1835 and 1849, and further divisions consequent thereupon. We cannot do more than express a regret that such disputes should ever have taken place.

Few and insignificant are the evidences to be found at the General Register Office of the teaching of Wesley's great contemporary, George Whitefield. But this deficiency probably supplies a better illustration of the scope and character of that teaching than any orderly array of registers could have done. It formed no portion of Whitefield's endeavours to found a united society, nor to organise a general system of ecclesiastical polity. In his sermons he dealt mainly with individuals, and had little to say of churches, their formation, and their discipline; while the congregations which were the results of his preaching were distinct bodies which he made no effort to combine, by means of general rules, into a single association. "Lady Huntingdon's Connexion," as his followers have been designated in compliment to his titled convert and patroness, can scareely be said, we believe, to be a connexion at all. There are only fifty-seven volumes at Somerset House bearing the above title; and while other religious faiths and movements are, for the most part, represented there in proportion to their extensiveness and importance, the startling and widespread revival of which Whitefield was the promoter is but thus dimly and imperfectly reflected.

We are inclined to believe that the lack of any definite denominational results from Whitefield's teaching, such as is shadowed forth by this deficiency of registers, far from pointing to any weakness in that teaching, exhibits its most powerful characteristic. It displays the great Calvinist preacher, we think, as a man whose labours were carried on in a singularly self-forgetful spirit, and whose aims were purer and more exalted than those of many religious teachers. It was a saying of his :- "Let the name of George Whitefield perish, so that the name of Christ be exalted." This sentiment appears to have been the key-note of his evangelistic career; and it cannot be denied that the conception of life involved in the words is a very noble one.

The popularity of Calvinistic Methodism in Wales is remarkable. It will be remembered that Mr. Howel Harris, a gentleman of Trevecca, in Brecknockshire, was the person who introduced these tenets into the Principality. His labours were undoubtedly great. But the general acceptance with which his teaching met would seem to prove not only singular zeal on the preacher's part, but also some unusual disposition on the part of his hearers to embrace the particular doctrine inculcated. We will give a few figures in support of our hypothesis that the primitive Welsh mind is peculiarly addicted to Calvinism.

The total number of chapels in the Principality from which volumes of registers have been sent to London is 644. Of these we find that no less than 398 are places of worship belonging to the Calvinistic Methodists. Of the remaining 246 chapels, by far the greater proportion belong to such other dissenting bodies as are more or less Calvinistic in their teaching, the Wesleyans being in a small minority. On turning to the census tables of 1851, we find these proportions corroborated. In that year the total number of chapels belonging to the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales was 781; to the Independents, 640; and to the Particular Baptists, 373: giving a total of 1,794 Calvinistic Dissenting chapels. To set against this, on the Arminian side we have only 539 Nonconformist places of worship altogether. These include the chapels of all the divisions of the Wesleyans, and those of the General Baptists. We cannot but regard it as remarkable -even considering the special labours of Mr. Howel Harris and others-that Calvinist views should preponderate in so exceptional a degree amongst our dissenting brethren to the west of the Wyc. But other similar instances of the irregular distribution of our creeds-instances which would suggest many interesting psychological inquiriesmight be mentioned, had we space,

Before closing this brief account of some of the Nonconformist registers, we will call the reader's attention for one moment to the records from Bunhill Fields burial-ground, City Road, London. This graveyard was in use so early as the year 1665; and it subsequently became the principal burialground of the metropolitan Dissenters. The registers commence in 1713, from which time, however, until towards the close of the century, they were but negligently kept. An entry during this period would frequently consist, for instance, of information as meagre and unsatisfactory as the following:-

May ye - Mrs. Smith from Bermondsey } -: 13:6." buried in a Grave

But it should be remembered that the volumes were kept more as accounts of fees received, than for any other purpose; and it is not, therefore, to be wondered at that the facts relating to the interred persons should be but briefly noted. The registers consist of twenty-nine books; and since the year 1788 they have been well kept.

We have reserved, for special mention in a future paper, the registers of foreign refugees and of the Society of Friends, with certain old church records, which cannot here conveniently be referred to: besides these, however, a few volumes in our library still remain unnoticed. The Moravian Church-a deeply interesting section of Christendom-has contributed a small number. The Swedenborgians have also sent books; so, again, have the Mormons, or Latter-day Saints. But we must content ourselves with a bare mention of these records.

In conclusion, we shall venture upon a single reflection. How much needless and blameworthy religious antagonism is brought to mind by the volumes which we have partially examined! How often have the very Particular Baptists, whose names are recorded in yonder small and badly written octavo, unthinkingly and unkindly consigned to the woes of the Pharisee and hypocrite, their Wesleyan neighbours-so neatly enrolled upon the printed pages of the adjoining orderly folio! What bitter religious judgments are frequently implied in these prim signatures of Quakerism, and in those careless scrawls of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists! And yet here at last all the wrangling creeds are quietly brought into one interesting and useful assemblage. Drawn together by the great facts of human existence-on account of the births, marriages, and deaths which are common to all alike—the Calvinist and the Arminian, the Prelatist and the Puritan, have at length met on these book-shelves with an object in which there can be no trace of antagonism!

So, lost in the great truths of our common lot and nature, may we win the happiness of never forgetting that we cannot all see precisely alike; and humbly learn together of "one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in us all."

EDWARD WHITAKER.

RUTH THORNBURY; OR, THE OLD MAID'S STORY.

By WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis," &c.

CHAPTER XV .- RUTH'S BRIGHTER PROSPECTS.

WE must now take up the thread of our narrative in the lodging taken for Ruth by Dr. Wilson at Mrs. Mitchell's, the ex-matron of the hospital. The good effects produced by the stimulants swallowed at the Red House being neutralised by the fatigue occasioned by the drive in the brougham-short though it was-Ruth remained for some days hovering between life and death. At last, thanks to the elasticity of a naturally good constitution, aided by the skill and care of the doctor and nurse, a turn for the better took place. Slowly, very slowly, her strength returned, but without being accompanied by the slightest mental improvement. So utterly paralysed did her mind appear, that for some time Dr. Wilson feared she was suffering from incurable softening of the brain. Fortunately, as it afterwards turned out, he was in error. When morning informed him that in the course of the last evening his patient had spoken to her, and that she evidently quite understood the words she uttered. This was a step in the right direction, and without further remark the doctor hurried up-stairs, and, placing himself beside the bed, kindly inquired of Ruth if she felt herself better. She looked at him for a moment, as though it occasioned her some effort to collect her thoughts, and then said, in a voice so subdued he could hardly hear it, that she felt stronger; and concluded by asking something about a letter, which he could not fully understand. Having tried in vain to catch her meaning, he contented himself with the belief that consciousness was returning, and advised her not to trouble herself about the letter that day, but that he would speak to her about it on the morrow. He directed that she should be kept perfectly quiet, and that almost in despair on the subject, the nurse one no questions were to be asked of her; but that if she volunteered any remarks, particular attention was to be paid to them, as he would like to be informed of their purport when he paid his visit next day. He also impressed on Mrs. Keats (the clergyman's wife) and her daughters, whose anxiety about Ruth's recovery was very great, the necessity of his patient being kept perfectly quiet, and he particularly advised them not to speak to her on any subject until he gave them permission.

On the morrow, when Dr. Wilson arrived at the house, and before he entered the sick-room, he was told by Mrs. Mitchell that his patient was in much the same condition as when he had last seen her; occasionally she had spoken, but only a few words at a time, and these without any particular meaning. It was possible, Mrs. Mitchell continued, that he might be better able to understand her; but, as he had strictly prohibited her from entering into any conversation with his patient till he should see her again, she had forborne to ask any explanations, especially as the words she uttered did not relate to any immediate wants. For the last few hours, beyond appearing perhaps a little stronger, there was no perceptible difference in her health.

The doctor now entered his patient's room, but for a few moments she did not seem to be aware of his presence, although her head was turned to the side of the bed at which he stood, and her eyes were open. Gradually, however, an expression of intelligence appeared in her countenance, and presently she seemed to recognise him. She gazed at him fixedly for some moments, and then her lips began to move. He bent his head towards her, and on listening attentively he could distinguish some words, and among them that of "letter" was several times repeated. This gave him considerable satisfaction, as he could perceive that some fixed idea was occupying her thoughts, and that she was not merely uttering random words without any meaning.

"Tell me," he said to her, in a voice of great kindness, "what is it you wish." But all the reply he could get was a few unconnected words, and among them, as before, that of "letter" occurred more than once. After two or three more trials he gave up the attempt, fearing that he might fatigue her; and then repeating to Mrs. Mitchell the instructions he had given the day before, he eft the house to make the round of his patients.

Although his mind was now occupied with other subjects, he could not entirely divest himself of the idea that the poor woman must have some special reason for dwelling upon, and repeating so often, the word "letter." Indeed, so frequently did his mind return to the subject that he resolved, when his visits were over, to call on the Rev. Mr. Keats—who still took a deep interest in the poor woman's case—and consult him as to what steps ought to be taken on her behalf. He fortunately found Mr. Keats at home, and told him the object of his visit.

"There can be no doubt," said Mr. Keats, "that she has been expecting to receive a letter from some

oue. Let us inquire at the Post-office whether one has come for her. I propose that we should go at once."

"With all my heart," said the doctor: "though, even supposing there should be one, I do not see what steps we could take in the matter. I hardly think the postmaster will consider himself justified in placing it in our hands; and, even if he did, we could make nothing of it, as it is not ours."

"There is certainly some difficulty in that," said Mr. Keats; "but at any rate there will be no harm in our ascertaining whether any letter has really arrived for her."

When they reached the Post-office, the clerk, in reply to their question, told them that a letter had arrived addressed to Miss Thornbury, Red House, near X.—. It was from India, and there was some postage to pay on it, which the policeman on duty at the house had declined to advance. The letter would be sent there again on the morrow, and, if not received, would be returned to the Dead-letter Office. He could not, he said, place it in the hands of either the doctor or clergyman, as it was contrary to rule; at the same time, if any one received it at the house for Miss Thornbury, all responsibility would be taken off his shoulders.

Acting upon this very plain hint, the doctor and Mr. Keats next proceeded to the Police Station, and saw the inspector. They requested him to send a messenger to the policeman on duty at the Red House, with orders, that when the letter was presented next day, the postage was to be paid, and that it was to be forwarded to Dr. Wilson, who would take charge of it for his patient. The inspector having agreed to this arrangement, Dr. Wilson and his friend separated.

Next day the worthy doctor received the letter, but what to do with it now that he had it, puzzled him exceedingly. He seut for Mr. Keats to advise him in the matter, and after due consultation they came to the conclusion that they could not open it without receiving permission from the owner, as it would be an act of gross indiscretion, -and yet the patient was not in a condition to give anyone authority to read it. Again, the doctor was somewhat doubtful as to the effect it might produce on her if she were told that it had arrived. At present, the only sign of intelligence she showed was that of anxiety. the letter should contain pleasing news, the excitement might possibly be beneficial to her, but of that he was by no means certain; while, on the contrary, if the letter told of any misfortune or trouble, the most prejudicial effects might be apprehended. Another circumstance, however, rendered the knowledge of its contents exceedingly desirable. It might contain money, or at any rate advice of some to be received; and on that point both the doctor and clergyman were somewhat anxious. The former, indeed, said that he would be most willing to render her his services gratuitously, should she require them; but he had made himself auswerable for her current expenses as well, and although these were far from being great, he hardly considered himself called upon to pay them, out of justice to his own family. Mr. Keats perfectly agreed with him in the view he took of the matter, and they now conversed together in order to find a way out of their difficulty, but without success. At last they resolved to delay all further consideration of the subject until the next morning. Then perhaps she might be better able to understand them, and they could determine what course to adopt.

On the morrow the doctor, accompanied by his friend, called to see his patient, and found her progressing slowly but favourably. She appeared somewhat more intelligent, and several times mentioned the letter. The doctor asked her where she expected it to come from, but failed to make her understand the question. Presently he inquired whether it was from India, and at the word a ray of intelligence flashed across her face. He now felt certain that he had in his possession the letter she was so anxious about, and he promised her-though possibly without her fully understanding him-that he would make inquiries about it. On further consideration, he concluded that it would be more prudent to abstain from showing it to her for a few days. In the interim she recovered so rapidly, that he determined on trying the experiment, and taking Mr. Keats with him, he showed her the letter, and then asked if he should read it for her, to which she nodded assent.

The letter was from Edgar. In it he expressed himself deeply grieved at his mother's death, though at her advanced period of life such a misfortune might naturally have been looked for. He greatly praised Ruth for the attention she had so willingly shown to her parents, and assured her, not only of his love, but also of his gratitude for the part she had taken in comforting their declining years. He regretted the straitened circumstances she had been in, but assured her his position was now so well established that she should never again be in danger of suffering any privation. He then went into some detail about his own affairs. He told her he had married Miss Macdonald, the only daughter of his employer; that her father (as he had before stated) was of very penurious habits, and had refused to give her any dowry, comforting his son-in-law for the disappointment he might possibly have felt by saying that, as he had no relative in the world besides his child, she would ultimately inherit whatever little property he might die possessed of. As Mr. Macdonald was, in appearance, a very hearty man at the time, the reversion to his property seemed somewhat remote; but he (Edgar) consoled himself with the knowledge that every shilling accumulated by his father-in-law would ultimately come into his own hands. He therefore submitted with perfect good-will to the old gentleman's excuse, the more readily too, as he knew the business was annually increasing, and the profits becoming very large. Edgar then went on to say that, contrary to all expectation, Mr. Macdonald had died suddenly. On opening his will, which had been made some years previous to his daughter's marriage, he was found to be a man of large fortune-and the whole was left to his child. Edgar could not state what was the amount of Mr. Macdonald's wealth, as it would be some time before the estate could be wound up; but at present, besides the business, he could perceive that the property would realise at least a hundred thousand pounds. He had determined, as soon as affairs were a little further advanced-say in three months' time-to leave India with his wife, on a visit to England; and, indeed, it was probable that he might remain there permanently. Everything would depend upon the conduct of his nephews. If they continued as steady as they had hitherto been, he should never again return to India. He had entered into partnership with the gentleman with whom he had placed Edgar, his younger nephew; and his intentions were. that if during his residence in England he found that his two nephews kept steadily to business, he should retire from the firm, leaving his share in it entirely to them. With respect to the Red House. he advised Ruth to leave it, if she thought proper, and place it under the charge of some respectable house agent till his return, when he intended, after making considerable alterations, to reside in it himself; and he sincerely trusted that she would occupy it with him. For her present necessities he enclosed her a bill of exchange for two hundred pounds; and he further informed her that he had established a credit for her with his agent in London for a like sum, should she require it.

The reading of the letter, so far from having any ill effect on Ruth, seemed on the contrary to exercise a most beneficial influence. At the same time, the doctor thought that it would be advisable not to prolong the conversation that day, and Mr. Keats and himself left the house, promising that he would see her on the morrow. Next day the atony had returned to such an extent that Dr. Wilson began to regret the step he had taken. He tried for some time to elicit signs of intelligence, but in vain; and he left the house much disappointed and depressed at the change for the worse in his patient. It was some days before she regained the condition she was in before the letter was read to her.

Gradually, however, Ruth's fits of atony diminished, not only in frequency, but in duration, and as she improved, the doctor withdrew his objection to conversation with his patient, and Mrs. Keats with her two daughters, Fanny and Ellen, were now frequent visitors. So far from any prejudicial results arising from their interviews with Ruth, they seemed, on the contrary, to be attended with great advantage. Still the fits of somnolency occasionally returned, nor could the doctor with his utmost care and ability avert them. He now began to be fairly puzzled what course to pursue; Ruth's bodily health having increased greatly, while the fits of somnolency still occasionally showed themselves.

The most cheering feature in her malady was, that each succeeding relapse was shorter than the former, while her mind, in the intervals, increased in power to such a degree that it was not easy to detect anything wrong with it. She spoke of her affairs, and her brother's return, with perfect lucidity, and expressed her great anxiety as to the fate of Deborah. She had, with perfect consciousness, signed the receipt for the money sent her by Edgar, and had agreed to the proposal, made by the doctor, that it should be lodged with the bankers in the town, and that she should, from time to time, draw from it such small sums as she might require. She gave orders that advertisements should be inserted in the newspapers, offering a reward to any one who could give her any information about Deborah: and she further requested the iuspector of police to use any means he thought advisable to gain some intelligence of the poor old Quakeress. She also placed the Red House in the hands of an estate-agent, determining to follow the doctor's advice not to return to it till her health was sufficiently re-established, or till her brother should arrive in England.

A circumstance now occurred which gave Dr. Wilson an opportunity of sharing the responsibility of Ruth's case with a brother practitioner. He had long wished to hold a consultation with some physician of eminence who was learned in diseases of the brain, but there was no one resident in the neighbourhood of X- of sufficient experience on the subject to confer with. The Rev. Mr. Keats had a brother, a physician, in extensive practice, residing in the neighbourhood of Torquay, who had formerly paid great attention to maladies of this description. This gentleman was now on the point of paying a visit, of a week or ten days, to his brother, whom he had not seen for some years; and Dr. Wilson resolved to consult him on Ruth's case. On his arrival, Dr. Wilson requested him to visit his patient with him, which Dr. Keats willingly agreed to do. They found Ruth in one of her fits of somnolency, from which they had great difficulty in arousing her. When fully awake she spoke lucidly, but it was quite evident that she did so with great effort—the desire to sleep again being plainly apparent. At last they left her, and retired to Mrs. Mitchell's sitting-room to consult on the case. Dr. Wilson gave his professional brother a full description of Ruth's malady, and the means that he had adopted to stay it, though with but partial success. "Her whole career," said Dr. Wilson, "is a perfect illustration of that cat-like attachment which some women have to the home they have been brought up in. The poor creature would have starved outright rather than have quitted the house-in fact, she was almost in articulo mortis when I was called in to see her."

"How do you account for these fits of somnolency?" inquired Dr. Keats. "Her strong attachment to the house would hardly have produced "On that point I admit I am quite puzzled," was the reply; "unless the extreme debility arising from her protracted starvation may have had something to do with it."

"That could hardly have had the effect in her case," said Dr. Keats; "for her mind would have recovered its healthy tone at least as rapidly as her bodily health. You say she is much stronger than she was when you first saw her, and that she gains flesh daily. Now, my opinion is, that she is suffering from some terrible excitement, which we have not yet heard of. The mind has probably been over-fatigued, and the unconscious state she is now so frequently in, is simply a dreamless sleep, which is recruiting her mind, as ordinary rest would restore her body. It is really a most extraordinary case; and I should much like, if possible, to get at the real facts of it."

"I much suspect you will find out nothing more than what I have told you. I think I mentioned that the sorrow she displayed at the death of her mother, whom I attended in her last illness, was so great, that at the moment I almost feared it would leave some lasting and serious impression on her brain."

"You did; but, if I understood you correctly, her mother has been dead for some time. Intense grief might at the time have taken such a form as to have justified your conclusions: but time would have greatly mitigated that; and even supposing it had not, I do not think it would have shown itself in its present phase. I am fully convinced there is more in her case than we have yet discovered. Do you know much of her previous history?"

"Very little,"

"Is she naturally an intelligent woman, and welleducated? My sister-in-law and her daughters speak very highly of her, and seem to have taken a great fancy to her."

"From what I have seen of her," said Dr. Wilson, "she seems to have been well educated, and is a very mild and amiable woman; but beyond that I know very little of her. Her brother is a merchant in India, and is shortly expected in this country. I understand he is a man of large fortune: but, from what I gather from her, she has no other relatives."

"Her case is a very singular one, certainly," said Dr. Keats, after a moment's reflection, "and I should like to study it. As I have said before, I am convinced her mind must have received some terrible shock, and that there is not one iota of insanity in her malady. Where does she intend to reside when she leaves this house?"

"I cannot inform you, nor do I believe she knows herself. I have advised her not to return to her old home, and she has consented to leave it—indeed, it is now in the hands of an estate agent, who will take charge of it until her brother's return."

"I intend taking my niece, Fauny, back with me," said Dr. Keats, "and the girl appears to have taken a great fancy to your patient: do you think she could be persuaded to accompany her?"

"I have no doubt she would willingly do so,"

was the reply; "and the more readily as she is very fond of your niece. All things considered, I think this is, perhaps, the best thing that could be done in her case. Change of air and scene would be the best alteratives that could be prescribed for her."

The next day, a great improvement was visible in Ruth. Dr. Wilson, as had been previously arranged, suggested to her on his visit that change of air and scene would be beneficial to her, and inquired if she had any friends or relatives in the South of England, whom she could visit for some time. To this, Ruth replied that she knew no one whatever. Dr. Wilson then merely remarked that it was a pity, as he believed the air of Devonshire would have a most salutary effect on her. And he then changed the conversation to another subject, leaving it for Mrs. Keats and the young ladies to broach the matter to her more explicitly. In the afternoon the ladies called on Ruth. She informed them of the doctor's visit in the morning, and of his advice to her to try the air of the South of England, and, she continued, that she felt strongly disposed to follow his suggestion, if any one could tell her of a nice place to choose. The cue being given, Fanny immediately remarked, "Why do you not come to Torquay with me? I am sure my uncle would be delighted to take charge of you on the road, and advise you how to proceed on your arrival. Little as he has seen of you, I assure you you are a great favourite of his."

Of course Ruth demurred to the proposition, saying that she should not like to trouble Dr. Keats, and so on. There was no difficulty in perceiving, however, that the suggestion was a most acceptable one to her. After a little more conversation on the subject-Ruth still persevering in her objections-Fanny said to her, laughing at the time, "I will argue the matter with you no further, as I see you are too obstinate for me to manage. I will send my uncle to you presently, and try if he has more influence over you than I have." Later in the day, Dr. Keats called on Ruth, and, as Fanny had predicted, he easily won Ruth over. Before he left her, it was agreed that she should not only go with him and Fanny to Torquay, but that he would also write to his wife by that night's post, to make arrangements to receive her into his own house.

Next day, Ruth left Mrs. Mitchell's house for the first time since she had gone to lodge there. Her bodily strength being now quite equal to the exertion, Mrs. Keats accompanied her to different shops to make purchases, for her wardrobe was at a very low ebb—in fact, everything she then wore had been lent to her by the Keats' family. She afterwards spent the evening with them, and then returned home, suffering a little from the fatigue she had undergone.

The time was now fast approaching for Dr. Keats to return home; and Ruth had everything ready for the journey. She hailed with pleasure the idea of quitting X——, as, her story being now well known in the town, she was occasionally much annoyed by the remarks she heard made upon her as she passed; not that they were uncomplimentary, but she naturally had an objection to being made an object of curiosity with strangers. Before leaving X—, she visited the inspector of police, and stimulated him to increased exertion, by doubling the amount of reward she had offered, to obtain some information of Deborah, of whom nothing had as yet been heard. It may here be mentioned that, notwithstanding all the means used, no tidings were ever heard of the old Quakeress, although much correspondence passed on the subject. It was a long time before Ruth gave up all hope; and the fate of the poor old creature always remained a source of great anxiety and grief to her.

The day arrived for them to leave X—, and Ruth (after taking farewell of her kind friends, and remunerating Dr. Wilson for his medical attendance, so far as money could do it) started on her journey to Torquay, in company with Dr. Keats and Fanny.

CHAPTER XVI.-RUTH'S PHANTOM FAMILY.

For some time after Ruth's arrival in Torquay, her malady took a decided turn for the worse : but this did not cause Dr. Keats any uneasiness. He had satisfied himself that her fits of atony or somnolency were simply profound mental fatigue after violent excitement; the journey, with the variety of scene she had passed through on the road, he thought had wearied her brain, and she was suffering in consequence. He was perfectly right in his conclusion, which was proved by her gradual recovery. By degrees, her fits of insensibility became of shorter duration, and the time between the attacks longer. Her bodily health had also so much improved that she was able to take walks of considerable length, without experiencing any great fatigue. She not only lived in the doctor's house, but boarded with them as well-in fact, she became in every respect as one of the family. The doctor's wife, as well as her children, all took a great fancy to her, and tried to make her comfortable in every respect. Her great friend, however, was Fanny. Her fits of atony had now entirely ceased. but occasionally she would be exceedingly taciturn, though without the slightest touch of moroseness in it. She would often speak of her family matters with much feeling, though in these instances she perfectly controlled herself. She often referred to her brother in terms of great affection, and spoke with intense pleasure of his anticipated return to England. Her only source of anxiety was respecting Deborah, of whom she frequently wrote to Dr. Wilson and the inspector of police at X-, inquiring whether they had received any intelligence of her. These letters always met with a negative reply. She had hardly been six weeks in Torquay, when the doctor saw she had perfectly recovered her tone of mind, but, at the same time, he thought it would be injudicious not to watch her narrowly. He dreaded lest any sudden excitement might cause a return of her malady, which another month's quiet under his care might wholly prevent. He now began to converse with her more particularly on her family affairs, with the intention of discovering something which might lead him to form a conclusion as to the origin of her malady. With great tact, he insinuated himself into her confidence, and at last obtained from her a lucid description of certain events, which clearly proved that he had been perfectly correct in his supposition—that it was not simply physical debility, arising from excessive prostration, which had brought on her fits, but that they were entirely due to some continuous and terrible excitement.

It appeared that for the first day or two after Deborah's departure, Ruth found the profound silence of the house somewhat oppressive, although, as was before stated, little or no conversation had passed between her and the old servant. degrees this went off, and she became more accustomed to her absolute solitude. The sole mental occupation she now had, was reminiscences of different episodes in her life at the Red House. last, by continually reflecting on them, they presented themselves to her imagination with perfect minuteness and life-like reality, the smallest detail connected with them being clearly present. Again, the very objects of furniture became to her as documentary evidence-proofs strong as Holy Writof different circumstances in her history. They became the collateral physical witnesses or records of events written on her brain-the present visible proofs of occurrences of interest to her and her family.

She now began to place the different articles of furniture in the position with which they were each particularly identified. The old easy-chair which her father had so long occupied beside the fire-place, was moved to its original position, and opposite to it she placed the one in which her mother used to Beside the table, she placed the seat old Deborah was wont to occupy after the labours of the day were over; the large old Bible, she had been in the habit of reading every night, remained open at the page where she had left it the evening before her departure. The bed on which her poor sister had died had never been removed or used since her death; and that on which her mother had spent the last few days of her life, and in which Deborah used afterwards to sleep, was with great difficulty placed by Ruth in the position it had formerly occupied, it having being removed by the old servant to another spot she had considered more desirable. Ruth even went so far as to bring down from the garret to her own room an old cot, in which her little brother, whom she had lost in early childhood, had slept. Other articles of furniture less connected with our narrative were also put in places she remembered them to have occupied when the events connected with them occurred.

Although it was with painful difficulty that she employed her mind on subjects unconnected with her family, and although she had an earnest wish to wholly abstract herself from the outer world, yet considerations of serious importance would, from time to time, thrust themselves before her, and so forcibly that it was impossible to ignore them. Her little stock of money was daily diminishing -a few shillings only were left. A portion of this she was obliged to reserve, in case it should be required for the payment of her brother's letter, and the remainder she had to eke out as sparingly as she could. It might be argued that, by disposing of the furniture, she might have been still supplied with necessaries till an answer came to the letter she had written to her brother in Bengal. But it should be remembered, that the slow starvation she was enduring, by lessening her vital powers, increased the sad effects her sorrows were causing on her mind, and brought on a numbing apathy, and an inability to cope with the difficulties of her position.

One evening, after counting over her little store, and setting apart as much as would pay for the few necessaries Giles would bring next day, she placed the candle as usual on the table. She did not light it yet, because it was not totally dark, and, as it was her only remaining caudle, she wished to make it last as long as possible. She then seated herself on the floor beside the few embers that burnt in the grate, and began to reflect on the peculiarities of her position. For the first time the idea presented itself of the possibility of death being near her. Her strength had been daily diminishing, and for some time she could not disguise from herself the fact, that the amount of nourishment she was taking was insufficient for the support of life. She remained motionless for some time in deep thought, which was disturbed by the falling together of the cinders in the grate. She now perceived that the fire was dying out, and that it was necessary for her to light a candle, or she must remain all night in the dark. Turning partially round, she took the candle from the table, and after lighting it, she placed it on the ground beside her, and then remained for some time longer in the same position.

She now brought to mind the dear ones she had lost, and the probability of her soon rejoining them. She thought of the misfortunes of her poor father, and the lamentable condition he was in before death released him from his sufferings. Her mother and her long illness now came before her; and then her mind reverted to Deborah, and she endeavoured to arrive at some reason for her continued silence. She next thought of Charity, now an angel in heaven, and her promise to watch over her. Other episodes, each unconnected with the rest, slowly passed before her memory; all her thoughts at last culminating in the certainty she felt of her own approaching death. At length, heaving a deep sigh, she said gently, but aloud, "Thy will be done;" and then rose from the ground to place the candle on the table. She remained motionless, with the candle in her hand, struck with awe and surprise, though without the slightest mixture of fear. Before her, in the seat she had been accustomed to occupy, sat Deborah, in the neat white quaker-cap and kerchief she habitually wore; her hands clasped before her on her lap, her lips moving as if in prayer, her general appearance being exactly the same as when Ruth had seen her the evening before she left the house.

Ruth, breathless and silent, sunk into a chair on the opposite side of the table, placing the light in such a position ou it as not to keep her from plainly seeing Deborah, whom she now watched with astonishment. Deborah, with the exception of the slight movement of her lips, remained as motionless, and as silent as a statue. She seemed not to take the slightest notice of Ruth, or even to be aware of her presence. Although the old servant sat there as perfectly distinct, and to all appearance as palpable as when Ruth last saw her, yet from some indescribable impression, she felt that her companion was not of this world, but a spirit. It was now clear to her that Deborah was no more, and that she had been sent to her for some especial reason, most probably to warn her of her own approaching death. For some time, Ruth's wonder prevented her from collecting her thoughts, but at last, as if she shared in the same feeling as Deborah, she commenced a silent prayer. She besought the Almighty to grant her the power to submit with resignation to His will, that her sins might be forgiven her, and that she might be received into heaven at her death.

In this manner more than two hours passed, and no word had been spoken by either, when suddenly the candle went out, leaving Ruth in total darkness. This changed the current of her thoughts, and for the first time she spoke to Deborah; but she received no answer, and, moreover, had a certain instinctive feeling, that the phantom was no longer there. She felt no inclination to move; but remained motionless on her chair, and attempted to pray, but without succeeding. An extraordinary apathy seemed occasionally to come over her during the night, which was in no respect like sleep; and yet she had no power of thinking with any consciousness. In this manner she remained till the light of early dawn was thrown into the room; and she then looked anxiously towards the chair Deborah had occupied, but she was no longer there. Broad day soon filled the room, and Ruth awoke to the stern reality of her position.

She now left her seat and wandered about the house without other purpose than to restore the circulation in her limbs, which had become benumbed by the coldness of the room. As the day advanced, she took down from the shelf a roll of bread, and ate a portion of it, which, with a cup of water, constituted her breakfast; the remainder of the bread being put aside for her dinner. This being the day Giles should visit the house, she remained in the usual sitting-room till he came, and then taking from him another roll of bread and some candles, she closed the wicket and again entered the room. Here she remained in a state of half stupor, from which she did not recover till late in the afternoon, when she resolved to take her second meal, and seek her bedroom, and try if possible to obtain a little rest. After she had eaten the remainder of the roll, she placed a candle in the candlestick together with some matches, that she might get a light when she awoke, should it be night. Deborah's apparition the evening before seemed now no longer to cause any surprise when she thought of it. She almost began to look at it in the light of a dream, but still it was floating hazily in her memory when she fell asleep.

It was dark night when Ruth awoke. She stretched out her hand for the candle, and having lighted it. she proceeded downstairs considerably refreshed by her sleep. On entering the sitting-room she found Deborah again in it; but she had somewhat altered her position from that of the night before. She sat in the same chair; but was leaning over the Bible on the table, and apparently reading it attentively. Ruth stopped for a moment, and a thrill of awe passed over her; but recovering herself, she advanced towards the table and placed the light on it. Still the old woman paid not the slightest attention to her presence, and continued her reading, pointing, as was her wont, to each successive sentence with her finger as she went on. Suddenly Ruth's surprise vanished, and she looked over the old woman as she read. The Bible at the time was open at the 22nd Psalm, and at the moment Ruth fixed her eves on the book, Deborah's finger was pointing to the 24th

"For He hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted; neither hath He hid his face from him; but when he cried unto Him, He heard.

"My praise shall be of Thee in the great congregation: I will pay my vows before them that fear Him.

"The meek shall eat and be satisfied: they shall praise the Lord that seek Him: your heart shall live for ever."

When Deborah's finger had reached the last line, it stopped there, marking the place; and then she slowly raised her eyes from the book, and turning her head towards Ruth, regarded her fixedly, as if she wished especially to direct her attention to these verses. This was the first sign Deborah had given of being aware of Ruth's presence. After gazing some seconds in Ruth's face, she resumed her reading as before, marking with her finger each succeeding line.

For some short time Ruth again fixed her eyes on the book, but presently raising them without any definite reason, she saw her father seated on a chair by the opposite side of the fireplace, and in the dress he wore when she had last seen him. There he was, as perfectly plain in every respect as if he had been in life. His lack-lustre eye was fixed on the fireplace; he moved not, nor gave the slightest indication that he was aware of her presence; there he sat, to all appearance as devoid of intelligence as he had been during the last few years of his life.

When Ruth had fully realised her father's presence, she felt a painful sensation of surprise, but totally unmingled with fear. She advanced towards him, and sat opposite to his chair, thus thinking to attract his attention: but he took no notice of her. She attempted to speak to him, but her voice, as on the previous evening, when she turned to address Deborah, completely failed her. Her eyes now began to fill with tears; she moved to her seat near the table, and leaning her head upon it, gave full vent to her grief. Her sorrow had hardly exhausted itself, when she raised her head, and saw indistinctly through her tears a form seated on the chair opposite her father. Clearing her eyes a little, she saw before her the phantom of her mother, as she had seen her seated there on the evening of her death. For the first time a feeling of terror came over Ruth, -so strong, that she would certainly have fallen under it, had it not been that the phantom turned its head towards her, and cast on her a look of such exquisite tenderness and love, that her fear immediately vanished. Ruth would have risen and thrown herself on her knees before it; but the phantom, as if aware of her intention, made a deprecatory movement with its hand. Ruth obeyed the mute injunction, and remaining seated, returned the look of love her mother had cast upon

For some moments a sort of mute sympathetic conversation passed between them, filling Ruth's heart with calm delight. It was broken at last by the phantom of her mother turning towards Deborah, -who, apparently aware of the presence of her mistress, had ceased reading, and bent her eyes on her, as if awaiting some sign. The phantom now joined its hands, as if in prayer; Deborah and Ruth both followed its example. They continued thus in prayer, taking no further notice of each other's presence. Hour after hour passed in this manner, Ruth feeling, as the time went on, that she was each moment approaching nearer to eternity. She was pleased with the idea that she was about to die, and looked upon the near advance of death with a feeling of intense happiness. In this frame of mind she continued till the first faint dawn of day, when the phantoms seemed to become less distinct to her vision. As the day advanced they seemed to dissolve in its light. Slowly and imperceptibly they continued to disappear, and gradually became mere shadowy outlines, and before the broad day had fully broken on the world, they had completely vanished. Now, as on the morning before, the realistic light of day showed all objects in their true forms and colours, and Ruth felt a dead chilly coldness come over her again. By exercise she somewhat recovered warmth and circulation; but an extraordinary weakness oppressed her. The little exercise she had taken, which was merely walking about in her room, hadfatigued her excessively; and-strange to say-she experienced a feeling of intense satisfaction in it.

Although the broad glare of day had done much to relieve her mind from the associations of the past night, she felt that she was gradually sinking, and she rejoiced at it. When the hour for breakfast arrived, she had no appetite: but nevertheless, she went mechanically into the kitchen and took a piece of the roll she had purchased the day before; she could not eat it, however; so putting it back again, she contented herself with a glass of water. As the day advanced, she began to feel the strange painful weight that had oppressed her the day before. In the afternoon she sought her room, and swallowed, without the least appetite, a few mouthfuls of bread, which served for her dinner. After lying down on her bed, it was some time before she fell asleep, but when she did, her sleep was most profound.

It was far in the night before she awoke, but she knew not the hour, having for some weeks past ceased to take any account of time. Before quitting her bed, she sat for some minutes in the dark, endeavouring to collect her thoughts. They quickly centred on the event of the night before; and the wish again became strong within her to be with her phantoms. So agitated and anxious to rejoin them did she become, that it was with difficulty she contrived to obtain a light. Having at last succeeded, she left the room, the attraction which drew her becoming greater the nearer she approached the sitting-room. She felt certain that she should there again meet with those loved ones; but Charity, her beloved sister, where was she?

The idea had hardly crossed her brain, when she passed the open door of Charity's room. She could not repress a vague thought that she perceived some indistinct white figure within the room. She paused, and held up the candle to ascertain what it might be, but as the flickering light could not reach far, nought was visible save the usual furniture the room contained. As she proceeded downstairs, that singular sensation we have all felt of some one unheard and unseen being near us, came over her with peculiar force. On reaching the hall it became more vivid, and she felt certain that some one was beside her; but when she entered the sitting-room the feeling entirely passed off, and her attention was directed to the scene before her. On the same seat she had occupied the previous night, sat Deborah, reading from the open Bible on the table, and pointing as usual to each succeeding line as she read. Her father was in the easy chair beside the fireplace, his back to the window, and his vacant unconscious gaze fixed on the grate; opposite to him, in the dress in which she had last seen her, sat her mother. As Ruth advanced with her light into the room, they all seemed to be aware of her presence. Deborah ceased reading, but kept her finger resting as a mark on the line where she had left off, and, turning her head in the direction of the new comer, looked kindly at her. phantom of her mother bent forward in the chair, as it seemed, the better to see Ruth, Deborah being Good Words, Nov. 1, 1866.]

seated in a line with her. Even her father turned round his head and smiled at her with evident recognition. Ruth, speechless, advanced towards them, and seated herself in the same chair she had occupied the evening before. A feeling of intense and almost unearthly happiness came over her as she met their concentrated loving gaze.

By degrees Ruth began to wonder why her beloved sister Charity did not appear among them. Her surprise at length became so great that she almost seemed to forget the presence of the other phantoms. Presently an irresistible attraction drew her attention from them to the other side of the chair. She turned slowly round, and perceived standing beside her the form of her dear sister, clad as on the night when Charity imagined she had received an intimation from heaven that she and her baby would shortly die. A singular expression was on the features of the phantom. While they preserved the appearance of Charity as she was in life, there was yet mingled with it an angelic beauty which evidently was not of this world. Ruth's surprise at her sister's apparition did not last longer than a moment, for starting from her seat, and turning to it with outstretched arms, she "Charity, my loved one-"

At the sound of Ruth's voice the phantom vanished. Astonishment for the moment superseded all other feelings, and completely overcame her. She turned to the rest, as if to ask for an explanation of her sister's disappearance; but not one of them was to be seen-all had fled. The chairs of her father and mother were empty, Deborah had disappeared, and Ruth was alone in the large and dimly lighted room. A feeling of despair came upon her, when she found herself thus deserted by those she so fondly loved. She walked distractedly up and down the room, her hands clasped and pressed on her breast, as she exclaimed, passionately and sorrowfully, "Oh Charity! my own Charity! come back to me! Mother, dear mother! where are you? What have I done to offend you all that you desert me so cruelly? For pity's sake come back! What have I done to offend you all? Pity me! pity me!" No reply of any kind was given, and no notice seemed to be taken of her implorings, and she remained the whole night in deep grief, calling frequently for the return of those who had so suddenly left her.

The morning found her in a condition of bodily depression, which mental excitement alone kept her from sinking under. The feeling of apathy she had experienced the two previous days did not in the slightest degree come over her. She roamed incessantly, but now silently, through the deserted rooms of the house, finding no rest for the sole of her foot. At last the excitement began to abate somewhat; and so great was her exhaustion, that it warned her of the necessity of taking some nourishment. She swallowed a few mouthfuls of bread, but with so much difficulty that the effort was positively painful to her. She put aside the roll which she had been eating, and began to reflect whether it would not be better for her to abstain from food altogether, that her sorrows might the sooner end, and that she might join in another world those who had now fled from her. The wickedness of these thoughts became apparent to her, however, and the wish soon arose to know whether the phantoms would not again visit her the next evening; so she gave up the idea of voluntarily starving herself. She again took the roll, and with great resolution, contrived to eat nearly the half of it; and after having taken a draught of water, she fervently prayed that God would grant her the strength of mind to support her in her great need. Her prayer finished, she became calmer, and remained quietly seated for some hours, when her fatigue became so great that she resolved to seek her room, and obtain, if possible, a few hours' rest.

On entering the bed-room, her eye alighted on the cot her little brother had slept in. It elicited no particular thought or feeling, however, and she fixed her gaze on it simply in obedience to the habit, common to all when in deep thought, of gazing intently on something utterly devoid of interest, while the mind is actually employed on some other and totally different subject. It was so at this moment with Ruth-much as she had loved the child, she thought not of him at the time; her mind being absorbed in the probable return of the phantoms when it should be night. She threw herself, dressed as she was, on the bed, and after some time, fell into a disturbed, yet dreamless slumber. It was dark when she awoke, and she lighted her candle to proceed downstairs. As she was passing out of the room, her gaze fell instinctively on the child's cot; it was only for an instant, however, and she gave no thought to the subject. As she descended the staircase she became very anxious, for she dreaded on entering the room that she might find it without her phantom visitors. When she had reached it, beyond the chairs remaining in their usual places, and the open Bible on the table before Deborah's seat, there was nothing to remind her of its occupants of the evening before. With a heavy heart, she placed the light on the table and sunk into a chair, her cyes the while filling with tears.

Suddenly she dashed away her tears, and gazed intently on some object before her. There, on his knees, his head bent forward, his hands clasped, and his lips moving as if in prayer, was her little brother George. He appeared to her exactly in the same position she had seen him in the evening before she was attacked with fever. Nothing could be more exact than his identity. Ruth's astonishment at his appearance was far greater than she had experienced on first seeing the phantom of Deborah. With her intense love for her family, she had of course frequently thought of the child, and her girlish affection for him was still strong within her. From the number of years which had elapsed since his death, beyond the fact that he had light hair and fine blue eyes, the form of his features had faded from her memory; yet he was before her as perfectly as when she had last seen him. He even wore the same night dress, and the little night-cap with its tiny frill edging, on his head, from under which his hair had escaped and fallen on his shoulders.

Ruth continued to gaze at the child's figure, which never ceased its prayers, nor took the slightest notice of her presence. The impression now came over Ruth that he was praying for her, and that her sister might be allowed to return to her. She kneeled also; and casting down her eyes, prayed long and fervently. Finding her spirit calmer, she rose from her knees, and saw, not only the child still in the same position, but also her father, mother, and Deborah, all seated in the same places from which they had vanished the night before. She had hardly realised their presence, when, on the other side of her, she saw her sister Charity, regarding her with an expression of the tenderest affection. Ruth now remained silently seated on her chair, returning her sister's gaze with one as full of love. Presently-without a word being spoken by either-a current of intelligence seemed to pass between them. Charity informed her sister that she would shortly die, and bade her prepare herself for the change; that she had watched over her ever since her own death, marking the solicitude she had manifested for her orphan boys; and she assured her that the efforts she had made to bring them up religiously and morally, would soon meet with their reward. She reminded her that when she should join her in heaven, they would never more be separated. She bade Ruth be of good comfort, and told her that the next evening she would visit her again; and that although invisible, she would in the interim be near her.

This had hardly been understood by Ruth when the phantom vanished; but on looking round she found the others still remaining. None of them seemed to notice her, but all were in the attitude of prayer;—the child in the midst. Ruth joined them in their devotions, and thus they remained till the dawn, when the forms, as before, gradually faded away in the increasing light of day.

During the whole of that day, so profound was Ruth's apathy, she did not stir from the room in which she had passed the night, except to open the wicket for Giles in the morning. She placed on the table the roll he had brought her, and it remained there untouched till the afternoon, when making an effort to rouse herself, she ate a portion of it. She then tried to calculate how long the small amount of money she had still left would last; but her mind was very unequal to the task, so she relinquised it. Night came on, and she lighted her candle. She now felt much more interest in her existence, and seated herself in the chair, at the same time fixing her eye on the spot where the child had knelt the evening before. As she continued her gaze, she noticed an indistinct and shadowy outline of its form present itself; and this by degrees became as clearly defined and life-like as on the previous night. The same phenomena took place with her father and mother and Deborah. Charity was the last to appear, but after a few moments she vanished, the rest remaining till daylight.

It would occupy too much time to go more minutely into Ruth's hallucinations. For more than a week she passed every night in the same phantom society; and in the morning there came the same reaction, or rather apathy, in which she remained for the rest of the day. Her stock of money perceptibly decreased, and at last she had only a few pence left. She now quietly resigned herself to her fate. For several days she was becoming gradually weaker, till at length it was with difficulty she could walk from one room to another. The natural excitement she experienced in the society of her ghostly companions increased in intensity, while her apathy during the succeeding days was in proportion more profound. The night before the day on which Giles so ineffectually attempted to attract her attention, made a deep impression on her memory. Till then, Charity had never remained with her more than a few minutes, but that night she never quitted her side. told Ruth that the hour of her death was at hand, but that she would remain with her till God took her, that she might conduct her to Paradise. marked difference took place that night in the behaviour of the other phantoms. They all seemed to regard her with an expression of intense love, not unmixed with joy. Even the countenance of her father lighted up with intelligence, and neither he nor any of the others withdrew their gaze from her for one moment. The whole night was for Ruth one of continuous happiness as she waited for the moment of her dissolution. The day dawned, however, and with the dawn the phantoms, as usual, gradually disappeared.

The next day the reaction was so strong, that Ruth remained till night in a state of profound lethargy. The continued knocking of Giles was unheard by her, and it was only on the approach of night that she somewhat recovered. That day she took no nourishment whatever, and when she attempted to rise from her chair, for the purpose of obtaining a light, she sunk back in it, unable frem weakness to move. After several efforts she succeeded, but it was with immense difficulty that she returned to her seat. By degrees the unearthly excitement again came on, and one by one the phantoms re-appeared, but now no longer in their accustomed positions. They gathered round her, as if they waited the moment of her death; although it came not, her weakness greatly increased, and it was with difficulty she could sustain herself erect. Presently she heard an indistinct noise, as of voices singing in the distance, and at the same moment the countenances of those around her assumed an expression so angelic as to be hardly recognisable. The singing continued, and now she could almost recognise the voices; she felt herself sinking, and she looked on the face of Charity, and found it beaming with joyful expectation. Suddenly all became dark, and she remembered no more; on her return to consciousness, she found herself stretched on the ground; it was broad day, and the light of the sun was appearing through the windows. A loud knocking was heard at the door, but she took no notice of it; as it continued, she made an attempt to rise, but her weakness was so great, that she found it quite impossible. Again she heard the knocking, and again she attempted to rise, but with no more success than before; she dragged herself along the floor, and reached the front door. By great and repeated efforts she succeeded in raising herself up, and opening the wicket, but the next moment she fainted and fell heavily; it was then that Giles stood up, and looking in, saw her prostrate with outstretched arms on the floor. How she had contrived to move from the door into the centre of the hall, where the shop-keeper and Mr. Keats afterwards found her, she was unable to tell. She remembered nothing of what took place, till she found herself in the apartment taken for her by the doctor, and under the care of Mrs. Mitchell.

CHAPTER XVII. -EDGAR THORNBURY'S RETURN.

NEVER, perhaps, was there a more complete cure than that of Ruth Thornbury, under the hands of Dr. Keats. Not only was her bodily health restored, but the powers of her mind as well. Not the slightest vestige of the atony of the brain remained, and all her ordinary power of cool calm judgment returned. She occupied herself in various useful charitable works, an exercise well adapted to her peculiar temperament. She had become strongly attached to Fanny Keats, who was now her usual companion, and they enrolled themselves as teachers at the Sunday school, in the immediate neighbourhood, and also became members of the Dorcas Society. But Ruth's favourite occupation was placed in her way, through the agency of Dr. Keats, who introduced her to the resident surgeon of the small dispensary. Through this gentleman, she made the acquaintance of many of the sick poor in the neighbourhood; and many a sick pillow was smoothed by her kindness, and many a comfort obtained for the invalids through her liberality. She became very intimate with the family of the dispensary surgeon, and was of use to them in many ways. He had a sickly wife and several young children, and it was one of Ruth's greatest pleasures to assist the mother, either in teaching or taking care of the children. Altogether, a happier state of existence than Ruth enjoyed while in Torquay, she could scarcely have desired.

Some months after she became an inmate of Dr. Keats' house, her brother Edgar and his wife came to England. The meeting between the brother and sister was a most affectionate one. Edgar was not much changed in his appearance, although his face was somewhat bronzed by his many years' sojourn in India. Mrs. Thornbury, his wife, was a delicate looking woman, but appeared very amiable, and expressed great satisfaction at meeting Ruth, of whom she had heard her husband so frequently speak in terms of high affection. But Ruth's cup of happiness was not yet full. Not only did Edgar give a most flattering report of the conduct of her nephews, but he also informed her that they had each sent her a long letter, which he was sorry to say he had left behind him in London, but that he would forward them to her as soon as he returned. He further said that he had made arrangements with his partner to establish an office in London; and that Walter, her elder nephew, would shortly leave India to take permanent charge of the English branch, under his (Edgar's) superintendence till he was able to manage it himself. He concluded by telling Ruth, that it was his intention to leave it entirely in the hands of his nephews, when he should find they had sufficient experience in business to take the responsibility of management themselves. Ruth, of course, was delighted at the intelligence, for the eldest nephew had always been an especial pet of hers—possibly. more from the strong resemblance he bore in feature to her sister Charity than for any other reason, both of the lads being equally fond of her, and equally deserving of her love. A few days after Edgar's arrival, the first surprise and pleasure being over, a conversation took place between him and his sister as to their future arrangements. Edgar stated that, after his return to London, he should visit the Red House. He had heard from the agent that it was greatly out of repair; but he should have it put in proper order, as he intended as soon as it was completed to take up his residence in it. When he first left England, he had resolved to reside in it should he outlive his father; and now that his father was dead, he looked upon it as an especial blessing from the Almighty that he was able to realise his desire.

Her brother's determination to reside at the Red House gave Ruth great satisfaction, and she expressed it warmly, complimenting him on his affection for the old place. In return, he asked her what were her views for the future.

"My dear brother," she replied, "what views can I have? I spent my last shilling before I was taken ill, and had it not been for your liberality, I might now have been dead or in the poor-house."

"Then," said Edgar kindly, "if you have no will of your own on the subject, I must insist on you, as a good sister, submitting to mine. The old house will seem unlike itself without you, and you must reside with me in it. Now, let me have no objections," he continued, noticing ske was about to speak; "remember, I have resided so long in the East that I have imbibed some of the despotic notions prevalent there, and I will be disobeyed by no one under my care. I have a right to control you, you know, and it is your duty to obey me."

"But, Edgar, what will your wife say to an arrangement of the kind? Remember she ought also to be consulted. For my own part, nothing in the world could add more to my happiness than to live with you; but your wife might consider my presence an intrusion."

"My dear Ruth, you do not know Marguerite, or you would not speak so. So far from there being any likelihood of any disagreement between her and you, I am sure you will be excellent friends. However, to make your mind easy on the subject, I may say that I have already spoken to her about it, and she requested me to inform you that an arrangement of the kind would give her the greatest pleasure; so you may consider it as settled. In the meantime, till all is prepared for you at the Red House, I would advise you to remain quietly here with the doctor."

Ruth expressed her willingness to remain in Torquay till everything was in readiness at the Red House, and the conversation on the subject closed.

Before leaving Torquay, Edgar Thornbury had a long consultation with the doctor on his sister's health. Edgar then heard for the first time of the singular hallucinations under which Ruth had laboured before leaving the Red House. The news caused him considerable uneasiness, and he inquired whether Ruth had any tendency to insanity.

"None whatever," said Dr. Keats; "I have not the slightest suspicion of anything of that kind."

"But do you not think it possible," said Edgar, "that if my sister returned to the same house, it might bring on another attack?"

"Candidly," said the doctor, after a few moments' reflection, "I am not without some anxiety about that; more especially, if she were to return immediately. In the first place, what arrangements do you intend making for her reception?"

"Simply that she will live with us as one of the family," said Edgar; "you may rest perfectly assured that I will do everything in my power that I think may conduce to her comfort and welfare. If you consider the plan at all practicable, tell me how you would suggest it should be carried out, and I will implicitly obey you."

"Do you intend making any alterations in the premises?" inquired the doctor.

"I propose putting the place in thorough repair," said Edgar; "beyond that, I hardly know what I shall do. I have not yet visited the Red House, but I am told it is in a most dilapidated condition, and with all the alterations I have already determined on making, it will probably take more than twelve months to put it in order. But why do you ask the question?"

"Because I hold, that the greater the change you make in it, the less would be the danger of a relapse. Singular as it may appear, I consider that the different objects by which your sister was surrounded during her solitary abode at the Red House, were to a considerable extent the cause of her delusions."

"How so?"

"By the different articles of furniture acting as outlines for her mind to fill up with the phantoms which appeared in them. This is a common psychological phenomenon, and we are all capable of exhibiting it in a greater or less degree. example," he said, pointing to a large picture of a landscape on the wall, "look at that picture steadily for a minute: now if I were to take it away, and place in its stead a slight outline of the various objects-no matter how vaguely they might be drawn-your memory would be able to fill up the details of the picture. The different objects by which your sister was surrounded at the Red House acted in the same manner upon her excited brain, without the slightest particle of insanity being connected with it. Without them, it is more than probable the hallucination would never have assumed the form it did. It was owing to the open Bible and the chair that the phantom of the old servant was conjured up. The phantom of her father and mother are accounted for in the same way. The sight of the child's cot accidentally coming under her observation, brought to her mind her little brother, and her heated imagination did the rest. Her sister Charity was brought to her mind by passing the open door of her bedroom; and her excited brain, acting on her feeble bedily health, afterwards painted the apparition of her sister by her side. The vanishing of the phantoms when she addressed her sister, is also easily accounted for, the realistic sound of her own voice, dispelling the unreal visitors by whom she was surrounded. As her bedily strength diminished, the phantoms assumed more and more the appearance of reality. Of course I need hardly say that the voices of the angels she thought she heard, when she imagined herself expiring, arose simply from the blood rushing into her ears before fainting. Now, if you would take my advice, you would not merely repair and redecorate the house, but you would change every piece of furniture in it. If you do that, it is possible-nay, I might say certain-no injurious effects will ensue when she takes up her residence with you, especially as you say it would be twelve months before you would be prepared to receive her; and if you leave her here with me, I will do all I can to prevent the possibility of a relapse when she returns home."

"But does my sister admit that all she then saw was a hallucination?" inquired Edgar Thornbury.

"Certainly," said the doctor; "the very failure of the chief conclusion she had then arrived at,—that she was expiring,—has taught her the absurdity, or at any rate the unlikelihood, of the whole affair."

"Well, doctor, I will do everything that you advise," said Edgar Thornbury. "Not a particle of its present furniture shall remain in the house, and even the paper in every room shall be changed; and any further suggestion that may present itself to you shall be carried out, if you will inform me of it. I am extremely fond of my poor sister, and her residing with me again would give me great pleasure."

About four months after Edgar Thornbury had quitted Torquay, his nephew Walter arrived in England, and after a short sojourn in London, he paid a visit to his aunt. Ruth, as may naturally be supposed, was delighted to see him. He was much changed in appearance since he had left her. He was no longer the tall stripling he then was; but a fine-grown, powerful, well-made young man. His manners also had greatly improved during his absence; and from being somewhat bashful and awkward, he had become self-possessed and cour-Ruth was vastly pleased, and introduced him with evident pride to her friends, by whom he was received with great cordiality. All spoke of his appearance and manners in terms of high commendation, with the exception of Fanny Keats, who showed some reserve on the subject. The young fellow on his part seemed much struck with Fanny; and with an air of affected indifference, which was specially noticed by Ruth, he made many inquiries respecting her; all of which were answered to his satisfaction. Not content with the information he had thus received concerning Fanny herself, he made inquiries respecting her family and connections as well-what sort of a man was her father? was her mother amiable and ladylike? how many brothers and sisters had she ?-to all of which Ruth gave full answers, and those of a very complimentary description. By degrees Fanny's reserve vanished, and she seemed to take considerable pleasure in the young man's society. Walter Morecombe (for he still retained the name of his unworthy father) now began to find Torquay and its neighbourhood exceedingly agreeable, and proposed to prolong his stay much longer than he had contemplated on his arrival.

This proposition met with Ruth's cordial approval, for not only was she highly pleased to have her nephew beside her, but, with the intuitive perception of an old maid in discovering undeveloped affection in young people, she casily saw that not only had her nephew taken a great fancy to Fanny Keats, but that he had likewise made a great impression on the heart of that young damsel. A match between them would fall in admirably with Ruth's views. She knew enough of the world to be aware that a young man's best companion is an amiable wife; and she well knew that Fanny Keats was admirably adapted to fill a position of the kind. She was not only pretty, ladylike, and well-conducted, but gentle in her manners, of a very affectionate disposition, and in every respect a good pious girl.

Ruth now took every opportunity of allowing Walter and Fanny to meet, that they might become better acquainted with each other, though at the same time little success seemed to attend her manœuvre. At last one day, on abruptly entering the drawing-room, she found her nephew and Fanny in it. That they had been conversing together, there could be but little doubt, although they were seated on the sofa at the greatest distance from each other-both looking remarkably sheepish and confused. Ruth had tact enough to perceive that the separation had been caused by her sudden entrance, and that before it they had been sitting in close proximity to each other. She made no remark, however, but endeavoured to allow them to regain their self-possession by commencing a conversation on some indifferent subject. Her good intention, however, was of little avail, for they still remained confused and silent. In the afternoon Ruth was asked by her nephew to take a walk into the country; an invitation which she readily accepted. When she was preparing to leave the house, she was a little surprised by Fanny Keats proposing to remain at home, pleading a headache as an excuse, and utterly dissenting from Ruth's suggestion that a walk would cure her. After a moment's reflection, however, the idea struck Ruth that her nephew perhaps wished to speak with her alone on some subject; and as the only one which presented itself to her imagination was connected with him and Fanny. Keats, the girl's proposition to remain at home gave her more pleasure than surprise. During the walk Ruth saw that she was not wrong in her guess, for her nephew, who for some time had remained remarkably silent and thoughtful, at last broke out

"I suspect, auut, you thought I looked very sheepish when you came into the drawing-room this morning."

"I did not remark anything of the kind," said Ruth, adding another to the catalogue of her sins.

"I felt keenly that I did, at all events," he said.

"Why so?

"Well, to tell the truth, aunt, I had been that moment proposing to Fanny Keats."

"You don't say so!" said Ruth, with difficulty repressing a laugh.

"It is a fact, aunt, I assure you."

"And what did Fanny say to you in reply?" inquired Ruth.

"Well, between ourselves, she accepted me, subject to the approval of her father and mother."

"Very proper, indeed," said Ruth.

"What do you think they will say to my proposition?" inquried Walter.

"When they come to know you, I do not think you will meet with much difficulty."

"I am afraid, aunt, that your good opinion of me may make you take a somewhat too sanguine view of the matter. What sort of a man do you say her father is?"

"As I told you before, a very kind and amiable man. I am sure you will like both him and his wife."

"I will write to them by to-night's post; I suppose I may refer to you for my character."

"You may with every certainty of receiving a good one, my dear. I will not disguise from you, that if you marry Fanny Keats it will give me great satisfaction. She is just the girl your poor mother would have liked to see you united to."

"Well, I want you to do me a great favour."

"What may it be?" inquired Ruth. "I must know that before I can promise to grant it."

"I want you to write to my uncle, telling him all about it."

"And why cannot you do it yourself?" said Ruth.

"Oh, I don't know, aunt; it looks so foolish for one man to write to another about love affairs, and things of that kind, you know."

Ruth promised to write to her brother next day, but Walter insisted that she should do so by that night's post, so that they might receive the answer to both letters at the same time. Ruth then said she would do so, and after a little more conversation on the subject, the aunt and nephew returned home. As soon as Ruth had entered the house she sent for her future niece to come into the bedroom. Fanny, who anticipated the object for which she was wanted, looked rather foolish when she entered, but the cordial embrace she received from Ruth soon set her completely at her case. Ruth expressed to her the great satisfaction she felt at the intelligence that a marriage was contemplated between her and her nephew, and how pleased she should be if it took place, as from what she knew of both of them they were admirably suited for each other. Ruth's kind behaviour soon set Fanny Keats's tongue at liberty, and she and Ruth remained together, building castles in the air, till they were summoned to dinner.

Both letters, as Walter had anticipated, arrived by return of post. Mr. Keats informed him, that without further investigation of his prospects, as well as a personal acquaintance with him, he must, for the present, decline to accept the offer he had made for his daughter's hand; at the same time he requested that Walter would not take that as a definite refusal. If all things turned out as he had been led to suppose, it was still possible that he might give his consent to the match. He admitted also, that in conversation with Mr. Thornbury, whose acquaintance he had had the pleasure of making some months back, he had incidentally spoken of both his nephews in terms of high approbation. Mr. Keats also said that another difficulty would have to be cleared up : before he could entertain the question he must be sure that his daughter would not have to leave England to reside in India. He was, he said, tenderly attached to his children. and no offer that she might receive, however flattering, should induce him to part with her. The letter concluded with an expression of great good feeling towards Walter, and admission of pleasure at the compliment he had paid his daughter.

Edgar Thornbury's letter to his nephew was short, and to the point. He congratulated him on the choice he had made. What he had seen of the young lady, during his visit to Torquay, had pleased him exceedingly; and he had since made the acquaintance of her father and family, for all of whom he had conceived a high respect. He concluded by telling Walter that the match had his full approbation, and that he would take an early opportunity of addressing the Rev. Mr. Keats on the subject, and telling him of the pleasure he should have if the offer were accepted.

Although the letter from Mr. Keats was not conclusive, neither Ruth nor the young lovers had the slightest doubt that all would terminate favourably, and they were henceforth looked upon by all who knew them in Torquay as an engaged couple.

Ruth was now in her glory. Not only had she the occupation, so dear to old maids, of superintending an interesting love-match; but she felt that in assisting to bring it about she had been fulfilling a portion of the promise she made to her sister on her death-bed. Her time was now occupied in what is usually called playing propriety—and she did it admirably. She allowed the young couple to be very frequently out of ear-shot, but comparatively rarely out of sight. She accompanied them in their walks, but generally on these occasions she kept at a considerable distance in the rear, saying that she felt fatigued, and that she found it difficult to walk so fast as they did. The excuse was always admitted (though with expressions of regret) by the lovers.

Walter had now more than once put off his departure for London. Indeed, so pleased was he with his residence in Torquay, that there is no saying how long he might have remained there, had he not one morning received a very decided letter from his uncle, insisting on his immediate return to town. As he held his uncle in great respect, and knew that it was dangerous to trifle with him, he without hesitation made preparations for obeying the summons; and after a somewhat lengthy leave-taking with his betrothed, and a shorter, though still a most affectionate one with his aunt, he left Torquay for London.

To say the truth, his departure took a considerable weight off Ruth's mind. One afternoon, about a fortnight before, when accompanying the young people in one of their walks in the country, they were overtaken by a violent shower, and as they were all unprepared with umbrellas, the whole party were drenched. Walter and Fanny fortunately suffered no inconvenience from it, but not so Ruth. A severe attack of inflammation of the lungs came on, and confined her to her bed, adding sorely not only to her own personal discomfort, but to her mental annoyance as well, for she could no longer exercise a surveillance over the young couple, which, with her rigid ideas of propriety, she felt was much to be regretted. On the day of Walter's departure she had risen from her bed for the first time since the attack. So enfeebled had she become from her malady, that she was unable to leave the house for many weeks, but this inconvenience was, to a great extent, neutralised by the kind attention of Fanny Keats.

MADONNA MARY.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART XII. CHAPTER XLY.

So very late it was when Will came in, that he crept up to his room with a silent stealth which felt more like ill-doing to him than any other sin he had been guilty of. He crept to his room, though he would have been glad to have lingered, and warmed himself and been revived with food. But, at the end of this long, wretched day, he was more than ever unfit to face his mother, who he felt sure must be watching for him, watchful and unwearied as she always had been. It did not occur to him that Mrs. Ochterlony, insensible for the moment to all sounds, was lying enveloped in darkness, with her eyes open, and all her faculties at work, and nothing but pain, pain, ever, for ever, in her mind. That she could be wound up to a pitch of emotion so great that she would not have heard whatever noise he might have made, that she would not have heeded him, that he was safe to go and come as he liked, so far as Mary was concerned, was an idea that never entered Will's mind. He stole in, and went softly up the stairs, and swallowed the glass of wine the butler compassionately brought him, without even saying a word of thanks. He was chilled to his bones, and his head ached, and a sense of confused misery was in all his frame. He crept into his bed like a savage, in the dark, seeking warmth, seeking forgetfulness, and hiding; so long as he could be hid, it did not matter. His mother could not come in with the light in her hand to stand by his bedside, and drive all ghosts and terrors away, for he had locked the door in his panic. No deliverance could come to him, as it seemed, any way. If she was "angry" before, what must she be now when he had fled and avoided her? and poor Will lay breathing hard in the dark, wondering within himself why it was he dared not face his mother. What had he done? Instead of having spent the day in his usual fashion. why was he weary, and footsore, and exhausted, and sick in body and in mind? He had meant her no harm, he had done no wrong he knew of. It was only a confused, unintelligible weight on his conscience, or rather on his consciousness, that bowed him down, and made him do things which he did not understand. He went to sleep at last, for he was young and weary, and nothing could have kept him from sleeping; but he had a bad night. He dreamed dreadful dreams, and in the midst of them all saw Mary, always Mary, threatening him, turning away from him, leaving him to fall over precipices and into perils. He started up a dozen times in the course of that troubled night, waking to a confused sense of solitude, and pain, and abandonment, which in the dark and the belong to you. You may think I don't know, but silence were very terrible to bear. He was still only a boy, and he had done wrong, dreadful wrong, and he did not know what it was.

In the morning when Will woke things were not much better. He was utterly unrefreshed by his night's rest-if the partial unconsciousness of his sleep could be called rest; and the thought he woke to was, that however she might receive him, to-day he must see his mother. She might be, probably was, "angry," beyond anything he could conceive: but however that might be, he must see her and meet her wrath. It was not until he had fully realised that thought, that a letter was brought to Will, which increased his excitement. It was a very unusual thing for him to get letters, and he was startled accordingly. He turned it over and over before he opened it, and thought it must be from Hugh. Hugh, too, must have adopted the plan of pouring out his wrath against his brother for want of any better defence to make. But then he perceived that the writing was not Hugh's .- When he opened it Will grew pale, and then he grew red. It was a letter which Nelly Askell had written before she wrote the one to Hugh which had roused him out of his despondency. Something had iuspired the little girl that day. She had written this too, like the other, without very much minding what she meant. This is what Will read upon the morning of the day which he already felt to be in every description a day of fate:-

"WILL !- I don't think I can ever call you dear Will again, or think of you as I used to do-oh, Will, what are you doing? If I had been you I would have been tied to the stake, torn with wild horses, done anything to that used to be done to people, rather than turn against my mother. would have done that for my mother, and if I had had yours! Oh, Will, say you don't mean it! I think sometimes you can't mean it, but have got deluded somehow, for you know you have a bad temper. How could you ever believe it? She is not my mother, but I know she never did any wrong. She may have sinned perhaps, as people say everybody sins, but she could never have done any wrong; look in her face, and just try whether you can believe it. It is one comfort to me that if you mean to be so wicked (which I cannot believe of you), and were to win (which is not possible), you would never more have a day's happiness again. I hope you would never have a day's happiness. You would break her heart, for she is a woman; and though you would not break his heart, you would put his life all wrong, and it would haunt you, and you would pray to be poor, or a beggar, or anything rather than in a place that does not

I do know. I am a woman, and understand things better than a boy like you. Oh, Will! we used to be put in the same cradle, and dear Mrs. Ochterlony used to nurse us both when we were babies. Sometimes I think I should have been your sister. If you will come back and put away all this, which is too dreadful to think of, I will never more bring it up against you. I for one will forget it, as if it had never been. Nobody shall put it into your mind again. We will forgive you, and love you the same as ever; and when you are a man, and understand and see what it is you have been saved from, you will go down on your knees and thank God.

"If I had been old enough to travel by myself, or to be allowed to do what I like, I should have gone to Liverpool too, to have given you no excuse. It is not so easy to write; but oh, Will, you know what I mean. Come back, and let us forget that you were ever so foolish and so wicked. I could cry when I think of you all by yourself, and nobody to tell you what is right. Come back, and nobody shall ever bring it up against you. Dear Will! don't you love us all too well to make us unhappy? "Still your affectionate

"NELLY."

This letter startled the poor boy, and affected him in a strange way. It brought the tears to his eyes. It touched him somehow, not by its reproaches, but by the thought that Nelly cared. She had gone over to Hugh's side, like all the restand yet she cared and took upon her that right of reproach and accusation which is more tender than praise. And it made Will's heart ache in a dull way to see that they all thought him wicked. What had he done that was wicked? He ached, poor boy, not only in his heart but in his head, and all over him. He did not get up even to read his letter, but lay in a kind of sad stupor all the morning, wondering if his mother was still in the housewondering if she would come to him-wondering if she was so angry that she no longer desired to see The house was more quiet than usual, he thought-there was no stir in it of voices or footsteps. Perhaps Mrs. Ochterlony had gone away again-perhaps he was to be left here, having got Uncle Penrose on his side, to his sole companyexcommunicated and cast off by his own. Wilfrid lay pondering all these thoughts till he could bear it no longer; instead of his pain and shrinking, a kind of dogged resistance came into his mind; at least he would go and face it, and see what was to happen to him. He would go downstairs and find out, to begin with, what this silence meant.

Perhaps it was just because it was so much later than usual that he felt as if he had been ill when he got up-felt his limbs trembling under him, and shivered, and grew hot and cold-or perhaps it was the fatigue and mental commotion of yesterday. By this time he felt sure that his mother must be gone. Had she been in the house she would have come to see him. She would have seized the opportunity when he could not escape from her. No doubt she was gone, after waiting all yesterday for him, -gone either hating him or scorning him, casting him off from her; and he felt that he had not deserved that. Perhaps he might have deserved that Hugh should turn his enemy-notwithstanding that, even for Hugh he felt himself ready to do anything-but to his mother he had done no harm. He had meditated nothing but good to her. He would not have thought of marrying, or giving to any one but her the supreme place in his house. He would never have asked her or made any doubt about it, but taken her at once to Earlston, and showed her everything there arranged according to her liking. This was what Will had always intended and settled upon. And his mother, for whom he would have done all this, had gone away again, offended and angry, abandoning him to his own devices. Bitterness took possession of his soul as he thought of it. He meant it only for their good -for justice and right, and to have his own; and this was the cruel way in which they received it, as if he had done it out of unkind feelings-even Nelly! A sense that he was wronged came into Wilfrid's mind as he dressed himself, and looked at his pale face in the glass, and smoothed his brown long hair. And yet he stepped out of his room with the feelings of one who ventures upon an undiscovered country, a new region, in which he does not know whether he is to meet with good or evil. He had to support himself by the rail as he went downstairs. He hesitated and trembled at the drawing-room door, which was a room Mr. Penrose never occupied. Breakfast must be over long ago. If there was any lady in the house, no doubt she would be found there.

He put his hand on the door, but it was a minute or more before he could open it, and he heard no sound within. No doubt she had gone away. He had walked miles yesterday to avoid her, but yet his heart was sore and bled, and he felt deserted and miserable to think that she was gone. But when Will had opened the door, the sight he saw was more wonderful to him than if she had been gone. Mary was seated at the table writing: she was pale, but there was something in her face which told of unusual energy and resolution, a kind of inspiration which gave character to every movement she made. And she was so much pre-occupied, that she showed no special excitement at sight of her boy; she stopped and put away her pen, and rose up looking at him with pitiful eyes. "My poor boy!" she said, and kissed him in her tender way. And then she sat down at the table, and went back to her letters again.

It was not simple consternation which struck Will; it was a mingled pang of wonder and humiliation and sharp disappointment. Only her poor boy !-- only the youngest, the child as he had always been, not the young revolutionary to whom Nelly had written that letter, whom Mrs. Ochterlony had come anxious and in haste to seek. She was more anxious now about her letters apparently than about him, and there was nothing but tenderness and sorrow in her eyes; and when she did raise her head again, it was to remark his paleness and ask if he was tired. "Go and get some breakfast, Will," she said; but he did not care for breakfast. He had not the heart to move—he sat in the depths of boyish mortification and looked at her writing her letters. Was that all that it mattered? or was she only making a pretence at indifference? But Mary was too much occupied evidently for any preteuce. Her whole figure and attitude were full of resolution. Notwithstanding the pity of her voice as she addressed him, and the longing look in her eyes, there was something in her which Wilfrid had never seen before, which revealed to him in a kind of dull way that his mother was wound up to some great emergency, that she had taken a great resolution, and was occupied by matters of life and

"You are very busy, it seems," he said, peevishly, when he had sat for some time watching her, wondering when she would speak to him. To find that she was not angry, that she had something else to think about, was not half so great a relief as it appeared.

"Yes, I am busy," said Mary. "I am writing to your brother, Will, and to some people who know all about me, and I have no time to lose. Your Uncle Penrose is a hard man, and I am afraid he will be hard on Hugh."

"No, mother," said Will, feeling his heart beat quick; "he shall not be hard upon Hugh. I want to tell you that. I want to have justice; but for anything else—Hugh shall have whatever he wishes; and as for you—"

"Oh, Will," said Mrs. Ochterlony; and somehow it seemed to poor Will's disordered imagination that she and his letter were speaking together—"I had almost forgotten that you had anything to do with it. If you had but come first and spoken to me—"

"Why should I have come and spoken to you?" said Will, growing into gradual excitement; "it will not do you any harm. I am your son as well as Hugh—if it is his or if it is mine, what does it matter? I knew you would be angry if I stood up for myself; but a man must stand up for himself when he knows what are his rights."

"Will, you must listen to me," said Mary, putting away her papers, and turning round to him. "It is Mr. Penrose who has put all this in your head: it could not be my boy that had such thoughts. Oh, Will! my poor child! And now we are in his pitiless hands," said Mary, with a kind of cry, "and it matters nothing what you say or what I say. You have put yourself in his hands."

"Stop, mother," said Will; "don't make such a disturbance about it. Uncle Penrose has nothing to do with it. It is my doing. I will do anything in the world for you, whatever you like to tell me; but I won't let a fellow be there who has no right to be there. I am the heir, and I will have my rights."

"You are not the heir," said Mrs. Ochterlony, frightened for the moment by his tone, and his vehemence, and his strange looks.

"I heard it from two people that were both there," said Will, with a gloomy composure. "It was not without asking about it. I am not blaming you, mother—you might have some reason;—but it was I that was born after that thing that happened in Iudia. What is the use of struggling against it? And if it is I that am the heir, why should you try to keep me out of my rights?"

"Will," said Mary, suddenly driven back into regions of personal emotion, which she thought she had escaped from, and falling by instinct into those wild weaknesses of personal argument to which women resort when they are thus suddenly stung. "Will, look me in the face and tell me, Can you believe your dear father, who was true as—as Heaven itself; can you believe me, who never told you a lie, to have been such wretched deceivers? Can you think we were so wicked? Will, look me in the face!"

"Mother," said Will, whose mind was too little imaginative to be moved by this kind of argument, except to a kind of impatience. "What does it matter my looking you in the face? what does it matter about my father being true? You might have some reason for it. I am not blaming you; but so long as it was a fact what does that matter? I don't want to injure any one—I only want my rights."

It was Mary's turn now to be struck dumb. She had thought he was afraid of her, and had fled from her out of shame for what he had done; but he looked in her face as she told him, with unhesitating frankness, and even that touch of impatience as of one whose common sense was proof to all such appeals. For her own part, when she was brought back to it, she felt the effect of the dreadful shock she had received; and she could not discuss this matter reasonably with her boy. Her mind fell off into a mingled anguish and horror and agonised sense of his sin and pity for him. "Oh, Will, your rights," she cried; "your rights! Your rights are to be forgiven and taken back, and loved and pitied, though you do not understand what love is. These are all the rights you have. You are young, and you do not know what you are doing. You have still a right to be forgiven."

"I was not asking to be forgiven," said Will, doggedly. "I have done no harm. I never said a word against you. I will give Hugh whatever he likes to get himself comfortably out in the world. I don't want to make any fuss or hurry. It can be quietly managed, if he will; but it's me that Earlston ought to come to; and I am not going to be driven out of it by talk. I should just like to know what Hugh would do if he was in my place."

"Hugh could never have been in your place," cried Mary, in her anguish and indignation. ought to have seen this is what it would come to. I ought to have known when I saw your jealous temper, even when you were a baby. Oh, my little Will! How will you ever bear it when you come to your senses, and know what it is you have been doing? Slandering your dear father's name and mine, though all the world knows differentand trying to supplant your brother, your elder brother, who has always been good to you. forgive them that have brought my boy to this," said Mary, with tears. She kept gazing at him, even with her eyes full. It did not seem possible that he could be insensible to her look, even if he was insensible to her words.

Wilfrid, for his part, got up and began to walk about the room. It was hard, very hard to meet his mother's eyes. "When she is vexed, she gives a fellow such a look." He remembered those words which he had said to Uncle Penrose only yesterday with a vague sort of recollection. But when he got up, his own bodily sensations somehow gave him enough to do. He half forgot about his mother in the strange feeling he had in his physical frame, as if his limbs did not belong to him, nor his head either for that part, which seemed to be floating about in the air, without any particular connection with the rest of him. It must be that he was so very tired, for when he sat down and clutched at the arms of his chair, he seemed to come out of his confusion and see Mrs. Ochterlony again, and know what she had been talking about. He said, with something that looked like sullenness. "Nobody brought me to this-I brought myself," in answer to what she had said, and fell, as it were, into a moody reverie, leaning upon the arms of his chair. Mary saw it, and thought it was that attitude of obstinate and immovable resolve into which she had before seen him fall; and she dried her eyes with a little flash of indignation, and turned again to the half-finished letter which trembled in her hands, and which she could not force her mind back to. She said to herself in a kind of despair, that the bitter cup must be drunk -that there was nothing for it but to battle for her son's rights, and lose no time in vain outcries, but forgive the unhappy boy when he came to his right mind and returned to her again. She turned away, with her heart throbbing and bleeding, and made an effort to recover her composure and finish her letter. It was a very important letter, and required all her thoughts. But if it had been hard to do it before, it was twenty times harder now.

Just at that moment there was a commotion at the door, and a sound of some one entering below. It might be only Mr. Penrose coming back, as he sometimes did, to luncheon. But every sound tingled through Mrs. Ochterlony in the excitement of her nerves. Then there came something that made her spring to her feet—a single tone of a voice struck on her ear, which she thought could only be her own fancy. But it was not her fancy. Some one came rushing up the stairs, and dashed into the room. Mary gave a great cry, and ran into his arms, and Will, startled and roused up from a sudden oblivion which he did not understand, drew his hand across his heavy eyes, and looked up doubting, and saw Hugh-Hugh standing in the middle of the room holding his mother, glowing with fresh air, and health, and gladness.-Hugh! How did he come there? Poor Will tried to rise from his chair, but with a feeling that he was fixed in it for ever, like the lady in the fable. Had he been asleep? and where was he? Had it been but a bad dream, and was this the Cottage, and Hugh come home to see them all? These were the questions that rose in Will's darkened mind, as he woke up and drew his hand across his heavy eyes, and sat as if glued in Mr. Penrose's chair.

CHAPTER XLVI.

MRS. OCHTERLONY was almost as much confused and as uncertain of her own feelings as Will was. Her heart gave a leap towards her son; but yet there was that between them which put pain into even a meeting with Hugh. When she had seen him last, she had been all that a spotless mother is to a youth-his highest standard, his most perfect type of woman. Now, though he would believe no harm of her, yet there had been a breath across her perfection; there was something to explain; and Mary in her heart felt a pang of momentary anguish as acute as if the accusation had been true. To have to defend herself; to clear up her character to her boy! She took him into her arms almost that she might not have to look him in the face, and held to him, feeling giddy and faint. Will was younger, and he himself had gone wrong, but Hugh was old enough to understand it all, and had no consciousness on his own side to blunt his perceptions; and to have to tell him how it all was, and explain to him that she was not guilty was almost as hard as if she had been obliged to confess that she was guilty. She could not encounter him face to face, nor meet frankly the wonder and dismay which were no doubt in his honest eyes. Mary thought that to look into them and see that wondering troubled question in them, "Is it so-have you done me this wrong?" would be worse than being killed once for all by a straightforward blow.

But there was no such thought in Hugh's mind. He came up to his mother open-hearted, with no hesitation in his looks. He saw Will was there, but he did not even look at him; he took her into his arms, holding her fast with perhaps a sense that she clung to him, and held on by him as by a support. "Mother, don't be distressed," he said, all at once, "I have found a way to clear it all up." He spoke out loud, with his cheery voice which it was exhilarating to hear, and as if he meant it, and felt the full significance of what he said. He had to put down his mother very gently on the sofa after, and to make her lie back and prop her up with cushions; her high-strung nerves for an instant gave way. It was as if her natural protector had come back, whose coming would clear away the mists. Her own fears melted away from her when she felt the warm clasp of Hugh's arms, and the confident tone of his voice, not asking any questions, but giving her assurance, a pledge of sudden safety, as it were. It was this that made Mary drop back, faint though not fainting, upon the friendly pillows, and made the room and everything swim in her eyes.

"What is it, Hugh?" she said faintly, as soon as she could speak.

"It is all right, mother," said Hugh; "take my word, and don't bother yourself any more about it. I came on at once to see Uncle Penrose, and get him out of this mess he has let himself into. I could be angry, but it is no good being angry. On the whole, perhaps showing him his folly and making a decided end to it, is the best."

"Oh, Hugh, never mind Uncle Penrose. Will, my poor Will! look, your brother is there," said Mary, rousing up. As for Hugh, he took no notice; he did not turn round, though his mother put her hand on his arm; perhaps because his mind was full of other things.

"We must have it settled at ouce," he said. hope you will not object, mother; it can be done very quietly. I found them last night, without the least preparation, or even knowing they were in existence. It was like a dream to me. Don't perplex yourself about it, mother dear. It's all right-trust to me."

"Whom did you find?" said Mary, eagerly;

"or was it the lines-my lines?"

"It was old Sommerville's daughter," said Hugh, with an unsteady laugh, "who was there. I don't believe you know who old Sommerville or his daughter are. Never mind; I know all about it. I am not so simple as you were when you were eighteen, and ran away and thought of nobody. And she says I am like my father," said Hugh, "the Captain, they called him-but not such a bonnie lad; and that there was nobody to be seen like him for happiness and brightness on his wedding-day. You see I know it all, motherevery word; and I am like him, but not such a bonnie lad."

"No," said Mary, with a sob. Her resolution had gone from her with her misery. She had suddenly grown weak and happy, and ready to weep like a child. "No," she said, with the tears dropping out of her eyes, "you are not such a bonuie lad; you are none of you so handsome as your father. Oh, Hugh, my dear, I don't know what you mean-I don't understand what you say."

And she did not understand it, but that did not matter-she could not have understood it at that moment, though he had given her the clearest explanation. She knew nothing, but that there must be deliverance somehow, somewhere, in the helpless and half unconscious, deserted as it were air, and that her firstborn was standing by her with light and comfort in his eyes, and that behind, out of her sight, his brother taking no notice of him, was her other boy.

"Will is there," she said, hurriedly. "You have not spoken to him-tell me about this after.

Oh, Hugh, Will is there!"

She put her hand on his arm and tried to turuhim round; but Hugh's countenance darkened, and became as his mother had never seen it before. He took no notice of what she said, he only bent over her, and began to arrange the cushions, of which Mary now seemed to feel no more need.

"I do not like to see you here," he said: "you must come out of this house. I came that it might be all settled out of hand, for it is too serious toleave in vain suspense. But after this, mother. neither you uor I, with my will, shall cross this threshold more."

"But oh, Hugh! Will!—speak to Will. Do not leave him unnoticed!" said Mary, in a passionate whisper, grasping his hand, and reaching up to his Hugh's look did not relent. His face darkened while she looked at him.

"He is a traitor!" he said, from out his closed lips. And he turned his back upon his brother. who sat at the other side of the room, straining all his faculties to keep awake, and to keep the room steady, which was going round and round him, and to know something of what it all meant.

"He is your brother," said Mary; and then she rose, though she was still weak. "I must go to my poor boy, if you will not," she said. "Will!"

When Will heard the sound of her voice, which came strange to him, as if it came from another world, he too stumbled up upon his feet, though in the effort ceiling and floor and walls got all confused to him, and floated about, coming down on his brain as if to crush him.

"Yes, mamma," he said; and came straight forward, dimly guiding himself, as it were, towards her. He came against the furniture, without knowing it, and struck himself sharply against the great round table, which he walked straight to, as if he could have passed through it. The blow made him pause and open his heavy eyes, and then he sank into the nearest chair, with a weary sigh; and at that crisis of fate-at that moment when vengeance was overtaking him-when his cruel hopes had come to nothing, and his punishment was beginning -dropped asleep before their eyes. Even Hugh turned to look at the strange spectacle. Will was ghastly pale. His long brown hair hung disordered about his face; his hands clung in a desolate way to the arms of the chair he had got into; and he had dropped asleep.

At this moment Mrs. Ochterlony forgot her eldest son, upon whom till now her thoughts had been centred. She went to her boy who needed her most, and who lay there in his forlorn youth by all consolation. She went to him and put her hand upon his hot forehead, and called him by his name. Once more Will half opened his eyelids; he said "Yes, mamma," drearily, with a confused attempt to look up; and then he slept again. He slept, and yet he did not sleep; her voice went into his mind as in the midst of a dream—something weighed upon his nerves and his soul. He heard the cry she gave, even vaguely felt her opening his collar, putting back his hair, putting water to his lips—but he had not fainted, which was what she thought in her panic. He was only asleep.

"He is ill," said Hugh, who, notwithstanding his just indignation, was moved by the pitiful sight; "I will go for the doctor. Mother, don't be alarmed, he is only asleep."

"Oh, my poor boy!" cried Mary, "he was wandering about all yesterday, not to see me, and I was hard upon him. Oh, Hugh, my poor boy! And in this house."

This was the scene upon which Mr. Penrose came in to luncheon with his usual cheerful composure. He met Hugh at the door going for a doctor, and stopped him; "You here, Hugh?" he said; "this is very singular. I am glad you are showing so much good sense; now we can come to some satisfactory arrangement. I hardly hoped so soon to assemble all the parties here."

"Good morning, I will see you later," said Hugh, passing him quickly and hurrying out. Then it struck Mr. Penrose that all was not well. "Mary, what is the matter?" he said; "is it possible that you are so weak as to encourage your son in standing out?"

Mary had no leisure, no intelligence for what he said. She looked at him for a moment vaguely, and then turned her eyes once more upon her boy. She had drawn his head on to her shoulder, and stood supporting him, holding his hands; gazing down in anxiety beyond all words upon the colourless face, with its heavy eyelids closed, and lips a little apart. and quick irregular breath. She was speaking to him softly without knowing it, saying, "Will, my darling-Will, my poor boy-Oh, Will, speak to me; "while he lay back unconscious now, no longer able to struggle against the weight that oppressed him, sleeping heavily on her breast. Mr. Penrose drew near and looked wonderingly, with his hand in his pocket and a sense that it was time for luncheon. upon this unexpected scene.

"What is the matter?" he said; "is he asleep? What are you making a fuss about, Mary? You women always like a fuss! he is tired, I daresay, after yesterday; let him sleep and he'll be all right. But don't stand there and tire yourself. Hollo, Will, wake up and lie down on the sofa. There goes the gong."

"Let us alone, uncle," said Mary, piteously; "never mind us. Go and get your luncheon. My poor boy is going to be ill; but Hugh is coming back, and we will have him removed before he gets worse."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Penrose; but still he looked curiously at the pale sleeping face, and drew a step further off—"not cholera, do you think?" he asked, with a little anxiety—"collapse, eh?—it can't be that?"

"Oh, uncle, go away and get your luncheon, and leave us alone," said Mary, whose heart fainted within her at the question, even though she was aware of its absurdity. "Do not be afraid, for we will take him away."

Mr. Penrose gave a "humph," partly indignant, partly satisfied, and walked about the room for a minute, making it shake with his portly form. And then he gave a low, short whistle, and went downstairs, as he was told. Quite a different train of speculation had entered into his mind when he uttered that sound. If Wilfrid should die, the chances were that some distant set of Ochterlonys, altogether unconnected with himself, would come in for the estate, supposing Will's claim in the mean time to be substantiated. Perhaps even yet it could be hushed up; for to see a good thing go out of the family was more than he could bear. This was what Mr. Penrose was thinking of as he went downstairs.

It seemed to Mary a long time before Hugh came back with the doctor, but yet it was not long: and Will still lay asleep, with his head upon her shoulder, but moving uneasily at times, and opening his eyes now and then. There could be no doubt that he was going to be ill, but what the illness was to be, whether serious and malignant, or the mere result of over-fatigue, over-tension and agitation of mind, even the doctor could not tell. But at least it was possible to remove him, which was a relief to all. Mary did not know how the afternoon passed. She saw Hugh coming and going as she sat by her sick boy, whom they had laid upon the sofa, and heard him downstairs talking to uncle Penrose, and then she was aware by the sound of carriage-wheels at the door that he had come to fetch them; but all her faculties were hushed and quieted as by the influence of poor Will's sleep. She did not feel as if she had interest enough left in the great question that had occupied her so profoundly on the previous night as to ask what new light it was which Hugh had seemed to her for one moment to throw on it. A momentary wonder thrilled through her mind once or twice while she sat and waited; but then Will would stir, or his heavy eyelids would lift unconsciously and she would be recalled to the present calamity, which seemed nearer and more appalling than any other. She sat in the quiet, which, for Will's sake, had to be unbroken, and in her anxiety and worn-out condition, herself by times slept "for sorrow," like those disciples among the olive-trees. And all other affairs fell back in her mind, as into a kind of twilight-a secondary place. It did not seem to matter what happened, or how things came to be decided. She had had no serious illness to deal with for many, many years-almost never before in her life since those days when she lost her baby in India; and her startled mind leapt forward to all tragic possibilities-to calamity and death. It was a dull day, which, no doubt, deepened every shadow. The grey twilight seemed to close in over her before the day was half spent, and the blinds were drawn down over the great staring windows, as it was best they should be for Will, though the sight of them gave Mary a pang. All these conjoined circumstances drove every feeling out of her mind but anxiety for her boy's life, and hushed her faculties, and made her life heat low, and stilled all other interests and emotious in her breast.

Then there came the bustle in the house which was attendant upon Will's removal. Mr. Penrose stood by, and made no objection to it. He was satisfied, on the whole, that whatever it might be -fever, cholera, or decline, or anything fatal, it should not be in his house; and his thoughts were full of that speculation about the results if Will should die. He shook hands with Mary when she followed her boy into the carriage, and said a word to comfort her .-

"Don't worry yourself about what we were talking of," he said; "perhaps, after all, in case anything were to happen, it might still be hushed

"What we were talking of?" asked Mary, vaguely, not knowing whether it was the old subject or the new one which he meant; and she made him no further answer, and went away to the lodging Hugh had found for her, to nurse her son. Uncle Penrose went back discomfited into his commodious house. It appeared, on the whole, that it did not matter much to them, though they had made so great a fuss about it. Hugh was the eldest son, even though, perhaps, he might not be the heir; and Will, poor boy, was the youngest, the one to be guarded and taken care of; and whatever the truth might be about Mary's marriage, she was their mother; and even at this very moment, when they might have been thought to be torn asunder, and separated from each other, nature had stepped in and they were all one. It was strange, but so it was. Mr. Penrose had even spoken to Hugh, but had drawn nothing from him but anxiety about the sick boy, to find the best doctor, and the best possible place to remove him to; not a word about the private arrangement he had, no doubt, come to make, or the transfer of Earlston; and if Will should die, perhaps, it could yet be hushed up. This was the last idea in Mr. Penrose's mind, as he went in and shut behind him the resounding door.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE illness of Will took a bad turn. Instead of being a mere accumulation of cold and fatigue, it developed into fever, and of the most dangerous kind. Perhaps he had been bringing it on for a long time by his careless ways, by his long vigils and over thought; and that day of wretched wandering, and all the confused agitation of his mind | might forgive Will, he had no thought of forgiving had brought it to a climax. This at least was all that could be said. He was very ill; he lay for six weeks between life and death; and Mrs. Ochterlony, in his sick-room, had no mind nor understanding for anything but the care of him. Aunt Agatha would have come to help her, but she wanted no help. She lived as women do live at such times, without knowing how-without sleep, without food, without air, without rest to her mind or comfort to her heart. Except, indeed, in Hugh's face, which was as anxious as her own, but looked in upon her watching, from time to time like a face out of Heaven. She had been imade to understand all about it-how her prayer had been granted, and the cup had passed from her, and her honour and her children's had been vindicated for ever. She had been made to understand this, and had given God thanks, and felt one weight the less upon her soul; but yet she did not understand it any more than Will did, who in his wanderings talked without cease of the looks his mother gave him; and what had he done? He would murmur by the hour such broken unreason as he had talked to Mary the morning before he was taken ill-that he meant to injure nobody-that all he wanted was his rightsthat he would do anything for Hugh or for his mother-only he must have his rights; and why did they all look at him so, and what did Nelly mean, and what had he done? Mrs. Ochterlony sitting by his bedside with tears on her pale cheeks came to a knowledge of his mind which she had never possessed before—as clear a knowledge as was possible to a creature of so different a nature. And she gave God thanks in her heart that the danger had been averted, and remembered, in a confused way, the name of old Sommerville, which had been engraved on her memory years before, when her husband forced her into the act which had cost her so much misery. Mary could not have explained to any one how it was that old Sommerville's name came back with the sense of deliverance. For the moment she would scarcely have been surprised to know that he had come to life again to remedy the wrongs his death had brought about. All that she knew was that his name was involved in it, and that Hugh was satisfied, and the danger over. She said it to herself sometimes in an apologetic way as if to account to herself for the suddenness with which all interest on the subject had passed out of her thoughts. The danger was over. Two dangers so appalling could not exist together. The chances are that Will's immediate and present peril would have engrossed her all the same, even had all not been well for Hugh.

When he had placed his mother and brother in the rooms he had taken for them, and had seen poor Will laid down on the bed he was not to quit for long, Hugh went back to see Mr. Penrose. He was agitated and excited, and much melted in his heart by his brother's illness; but still, though ne the elder man, who ought to have given the boy better counsel: but he was very cool and collected, keeping his indignation to himself, and going very fully into detail. Old Sommerville's daughter had been married, and lived with her husband at the border village where Mary's marriage had taken place. It was she who had waited on the bride, with all the natural excitement and interest belonging to the occasion: and her husband and she, young themselves, and full of sympathy with the handsome young couple, had stolen in after them into the homely room where the marriage ceremony, such as it was, was performed. The woman who told Hugh this story, had not the faintest idea that suspicion of any kind rested upon the facts she was narrating, neither did her hearer tell her of it. He had listened with what eagerness, with what wonder and delight may be imagined, while she went into all the details. "She mayn't mind me, but I mind her," the anxious historian had said, her thoughts dwelling not on the runaway marriage she was talking of, as if that could be of importance, but on the unbuilt lodge, and the chances of getting it, if she could but awake the interest of the young squire. "She had on but a cotton gown, as was not for the likes of her on her wedding-day, and a bit of a straw-bonnet; and it was me as took off her shawl, her hands being trembly a bit, as was to be expected; I took her shawl off afore she came into the room, and I slipped in after her, and made Rob come, though he was shy. Bless your heart, sir, the Captain and the young lady never noticed him nor me."

Hugh had received all these details into his mind with a distinctness which only the emergency could have made possible. It seemed to himself that he saw the scene—more clearly, far more clearly, than that dim vision of the other scene in India, which now he ventured in his heart to believe that he recollected too. He told everything to Mr. Penrose, who sat with glum countenance, and listened. "And now, uncle," he said, "I will tell you what my mother is ready to do. I don't think she understands what I have told her about my evidence; but I found this letter she had been writing when Will was taken ill. You can read it, if you please. It will show you at least how wrong you were in thinking she would ever desert and abandon me."

"I never thought she would desert and abandon you," said Mr. Penrose; "of course every one must see that so long as you had the property, it was her interest to stick to you—as well as for her own sake. I don't see why I should read the letter; I daresay it is some bombastical appeal to somebody—she appealed to me last night—to believe her; as if personal credibility was to be built upon in the absence of all proofs."

"But read it all the same," said Hugh, whose face was flushed with excitement.

Mr. Penrose put on his spectacles, and took the half-finished letter reluctantly into his hand. He turned it round and all over, to see who it was addressed to; but there was no address; and when he began to read it, he saw it was a letter to a lawyer, stating her case distinctly, and asking for advice. Was there not a way of getting it tried and settled, Mary had written; was there not some court that could be appealed to at once, to examine all the evidence, and make a decision that would be good and stand, and could not be re-opened? am ready to appear and be examined, to do anything or everything that is necessary," were the last words Mrs. Ochterlony had written; and then she had forgotten her letter, forgotten her resolution and her fear, and everything else in the world but her boy who was ill. Her other boy, after he had set her heart free to devote itself to the one who now wanted her most, had found the letter; and he, too, had been set free in his turn. Up to that very last moment he had feared and doubted what Mr. Penrose called the "exposure" for his mother; he had been afraid of wounding her, afraid of making any suggestion that could imply publicity. And upon the letter which Mr. Penrose turned thus about in his hand was at least one large round blister of a tear-a big drop of compunction, and admiration, and love, which had dropped upon it out of Hugh's proud and joyful

"Ah," said Uncle Penrose, who was evidently staggered; and he took off his spectacles and put them back in their case. "If she were to make up her mind to that," he continued, slowly, "I would not say that you might not have a chance. It would have the look of being confident in her case. I'll tell you what, Hugh," he went on, changing his tone. "Does the doctor give much hope of Will?"

"Much hope!" cried Hugh, faltering. "Good heavens! uncle, what do you mean? Has he told you anything? Why, there is every chance—every hope."

"Don't get excited," said Mr. Penrose. "I hope so, I am sure. But what I have to say is this: if anything were to happen to Will, it would be some distant Ochterlonys, I suppose, that would come in after him—supposing you were put aside, you know. I don't mind working for Will, but I'd have nothing to do with that. I could not be the means of sending the property out of the family. And I don't see now, in the turn things have taken, that there would be any particular difficulty between ourselves in hushing it all up."

"In hushing it up?" said Hugh, with an astonished look.

"Yes, if we hold our tongues. I daresay that is all that would be necessary," said Mr. Penrose. "If you only would have the good sense all of you to hold your tongues, and keep your counsel, it might be easily hushed up."

But Uncle Penrose was not prepared for the shower of indignation that fell upon him. Hugh got up and made him an oration, which the young man poured forth out of the fulness of his heart; and said, God forgive him for the harm he had done to one of them, for the harm he had tried to do to all -in a tone very little in harmony with the prayer; and shook off, as it were, the dust off his feet against him, and rushed from the house, carrying, folded up carefully in his pocket-book, his mother's letter. It was she who had found out what to do -she whose reluctance, whose hesitation, or shame, was the only thing that Hugh would have feared. And it was not only that he was touched to the heart by his mother's readiness to do all and everything for him; he was proud, too, with that sweetest kind of exultation which recognises the absolute best in its best beloved. So he went through the suburban streets carrying his head high, with moisture in his eyes, but the smile of hope and a satisfied heart upon his lips. Hush it up! when it was all to her glory from the first to the last of it. Rather write it up in letters of gold, that all the world might see it. This was how Hugh, being still so young, in the pride and emotion of the moment, thought in his heart.

And Mrs. Ochterlony, by her boy's sick-bed, knew nothing of it all. She remembered to ask for her blotting-book with the letters in it which she had been writing, but was satisfied when she heard Hugh had it; and she accepted the intervention of old Sommerville, dead or living, without demanding too many explanations. She had now something else more absorbing, more engrossing, to occupy her, and two supreme emotions cannot hold place in the mind at the same time. Will required constant care, an attention that never slumbered, and she would not have any one to share her watch with her. She found time to write to Aunt Agatha. who wanted to come, giving the cheerfullest view of matters that was possible, and declaring that she was quite able for what she had to do. And Mary had another offer of assistance which touched her, and yet brought a smile to her face. It was from Mrs. Kirkman, offering to come to her assistance at once, to leave all her responsibilities for the satisfaction of being with her friend and sustaining her strength and being "useful" to the poor sufferer. It was a most anxious letter, full of the warmest entreaties to be allowed to come, and Mary was moved by it, though she gave it to Hugh to read with a faint smile on her lip.

"I always told you she was a good woman," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "If I were to let her come, I know she would make a slave of herself to serve us both."

"But you will not let her come," said Hugh, with a little alarm. "I don't know about your good woman. She would do it, and then tell everybody how glad she was that she had been of so much use."

"But she is a good woman in spite of her talk," said Mary; and she wrote to Mrs. Kirkman a letter which filled the soul of the colonel's wife with many thoughts. Mrs. Ochterlony wrote to her that it would be vain for her to have any help, for she could not leave her boy-could not be apart from him while he was so ill, was what Mary said -but that her friend knew how strong she was, and that it would not hurt her, if God would but spare her boy. "Oh, my poor Will! don't forget to think of him," Mary said, and the heart which was in Mrs. Kirkman's wordy bosom knew what was meant. And then partly, perhaps, it was her fault; she might have been wise, she might have held her peace when Will came to ask that fatal information. And yet, perhaps, it might be for his good-or perhaps-perhaps, God help him, he might die. And then Mrs. Kirkman's heart sank within her, and she was softer to all the people in her district, and did not feel so sure of taking upon her the part of Providence. She could not but remember how she had prayed that Mary should not be let alone, and how Major Ochterlony had died after it, and she felt that that was not what she meant, and that God, so to speak, had gone too far. If the same thing were to happen again! She was humble and softened to all her people that day, and she spent hours of it upon her knees, praying with tears streaming down her cheeks for Will. And it was not till full twentyfour hours after that she could take any real comfort from the thought that it must be for all their good; which shows that Mrs. Ochterlony's idea of her after all was right.

These were but momentary breaks in the long stretch of pain, and terror, and lingering and sickening hope. Day after day went and came, and Mary took no note of them, and knew nothing more of them than as they grew light and dark upon the pale face of her boy. Hugh had to leave her by times, but there was no break to her in the long-continued vigil. His affairs had to go on, his work to be resumed, and his life to proceed again as if it had never come to that full stop. But as for Mary, it began to appear to her as if she had lived all her life in that sick room. Then Islay came, always steady and trustworthy. This was towards the end, when it was certain that the crisis must be approaching for good or for evil. And poor Aunt Agatha in her anxiety and her loneliness had fallen ill too, and wrote plaintive, suffering letters, which moved Mary's heart even in the great stupor of her own anxiety. It was then that Hugh went, much against his will, to the Cottage, at his mother's entreaty, to carry comfort to the poor old lady. He had to go to Earlston to see after his own business, and from thence to Aunt Agatha, whose anxiety was no less great at a distance than theirs was at hand; and Hugh was to be telegraphed for at once if there was "any change." Any change !- that was the way they had got to speak, saying it in a whisper, as if afraid to trust the very air with words which implied so much. Hugh stole into the sick room before he went away, and saw poor Will, or at least a long white outline of a face, with two big startling eyes, black and shining, which must be Will's, lying back on the pillows; and he heard a babble of weary words about his mother and Nelly, and what had he done? and withdrew as noiselessly as he entered, with the tears in his eyes, and that poignant and intolerable anguish in his heart with which the young receive the first intimation that one near to them must go away. It seemed an offence to Hugh, as he left the house to see so many lads in the streets, who were of Will's age, and so many children encumbering the place everywhere, unthought of, uncared for, unloved, to whom almost it would be a benefit to die. But it was not one of them who was to be taken, but Will, poor Will, the youngest, who had been led astray, and had still upon his mind a sense of guilt. Hugh was glad to go to work at Earlston to get the thought out of his mind, glad to occupy himself about the museum, and to try to forget that his brother was slowly approaching the crisis, after which perhaps there might be no hope; and his heart beat loud in his ears every time he heard a sound, dreading that it might be the promised summons, and that "some change "-dreadful intimation-had occurred; and it was in the same state of mind that he went on to the Cottage, looking into the railway people's faces at every station to see if, perhaps, they had heard something. He was not much like carrying comfort to anybody. He had never been within reach of the shadow of death before, except in the case of his uncle; and his uncle was old, and it was natural he should die-but Will! Whenever he said, or heard, or even thought the name, his heart seemed to swell, and grow "grit," as the Cumberland folks said, and climb into his throat.

But yet there was consolation to Hugh even at such a moment. When he arrived at the Cottage he found Nelly there in attendance upon Aunt Agatha; and Nelly was full of wistful anxiety, and had a world of silent questions in her eyes. He had not written to her in answer to her letter, though it had done so much for him. Nobody had written to the girl, who was obliged to stay quiet at home, and ask no questions, and occupy herself about other matters. And no doubt Nelly had suffered, and might have made herself very unhappy, and felt herself deeply neglected and injured, had she been of that manner of nature. She had heard only the evident facts which everybody knew of-that Will had been taken ill, and that Hugh was in Liverpool, and even Islay had been sent for; but whether Will's illness was anything more than ordinary disease, or how the family affairs, which lay underneath, were being settled, Nelly could not tell. Nobody knew: not Aunt Agatha, nor Mrs. Kirkman, though it was her hand which had helped to set everything in motion. Sometimes it occurred to Nelly that Mr. Hugh might have written to her; sometimes she was disposed to fear that he might be angry-might think she had no right to interfere. Men' did not like people to interfere with their affairs, she said to very kindest; and Nelly dried her eyes and would acknowledge to herself that it was just. But when Hugh came, and was in the same room with her, and sat by her side, and was just the same-nay, perhaps, if that could be, more than just the same -then it was more than Nelly's strength of mind could do to keep from questioning him with her eyes. She gave little glances at him which asked -" Is all well?"-in language plainer than words; and Hugh's eyes, overcast as they were by that shadow of death which was upon them, could not answer promptly-"All is well." And Aunt Agatha knew nothing of this secret which lay between them; so far as Miss Seton had been informed as yet, Will's running away had been but a boyish freak, and his illness an ordinary fever. And yet somehow it made Hugh take a brighter view of everything-made him think less drearily of Will's danger, and be less alarmed about the possible arrival of a telegram, when he read the question in Nelly Askell's eyes.

But it was the morning after his arrival before he could make any response. Aunt Agatha, who was an invalid, did not come downstairs early, and the two young creatures were left to each other's company. Then there ensued a little interval of repose to Hugh's mind, which had been so much disturbed of late, which he did not feel willing to break even by entering upon matters which might produce a still greater confidence and rapprochement. All that had been passing lately had given a severe shock to his careless youth, which, before that, had never thought deeply of anything. And to feel himself thus separated as it were from the world of anxiety and care he had been living in, and floated in to this quiet nook, and seated here all tranquil in a nameless exquisite happiness, with Nelly by him, and nobody to interfere with him, did him good, poor fellow. He did not care to break the spell even to satisfy her, nor perhaps to produce a more exquisite delight for himself. The rest, and the sweet unexpressed sympathy, and the soft atmosphere that was about him, gave Hugh all the consolation of which at this moment he was capable; and he was only a manand he was content to be thus consoled without inquiring much whether it was as satisfactory for her. It was only when the ordinary routine of the day began, and disturbed the tête-à-tête, that he bethought him of how much remained to be explained to Nelly; and then he asked her to go out with him to the garden. "Come and show me the roses we used to water," said Hugh; "you remember?" And so they went out together, with perhaps, if that were possible, a more entire possession of each other's society—a more complete separation from everybody else in the world.

might have written to her; sometimes she was disposed to fear that he might be angry—might think she had no right to interfere. Men did not like blown and disconsolate, and the leaves dropping off people to interfere with their affairs, she said to herself sometimes, even when they meant—oh! the in certain reminiscences of what had been, "you remember?"—comings back of the sweet recent untroubled past, such as give to the pleasant present and fair future their greatest charm. And then all at once Hugh stopped short, and looked in his companion's face. He said it without the least word of introduction, leaping at once into the heart of the subject, in a way which gave poor Nelly no warning, no time to prepare.

"Nelly," he said, all at once, "I never thanked you for your letter."

"Oh, Mr. Hugh!" cried Nelly, and her heart gave a sudden thump, and the water sprang to her eyes. She was so much startled that she put her hand to her side to relieve the sudden panting of her breath. "I was going to ask you if you had been angry?" she added, after a pause.

"Angry! How could I be angry?" said Hugh.

"You might have thought it was very impertinent of me talking of things I had no business with," said Nelly, with downcast eyes.

"Impertment! Perhaps you suppose I would think an angel impertment if it came down from Heaven for a moment, and showed a little interest in my concerns?" said Hugh. "And do you really think you have no business with me, Nelly? I did not think you were so indifferent to your friends."

"To be sure we are very old friends," said Nelly, with a blush and a smile; but she saw by instinct that such talk was dangerous. And then she put on her steady little face and looked up at him to put an end to all this nonsense—"I want so much to hear about dear Mrs. Ochterlony," she said.

"And I have never told you that it had come all right," said Hugh. "I was so busy at first I had no time for writing letters; and last night there was Aunt Agatha, who knows nothing about it; and this morning—well this morning, you know, I was thinking of nothing but you——"

"Oh, thauk you," said Nelly, with a little confusion; "but tell me more, please. You said it was all right --- "

"Yes," said Hugh, "but I don't know if it ever would have come right but for your letter; I was down as low as ever a mau could be; I had no heart for anything; I did not know what to think even about my—about anything. And then your dear little letter came. It was that that made me something of a man again. And I made up my mind to face it and not to give in. And then all at once the proof came—some people who lived at Gretna and had seen the marriage. Did you go there?"

"No," said Nelly, with a tremulous voice; and now whatever might come of it, it would have been quite impossible for her to raise her eyes.

"Ah, I see," said Hugh, "it was only to show me what to do—but all the same it was your doing. If you had not written to me like that, I was more likely to have gone and hanged myself, than to have minded my business and seen the people. Nelly, I will always say it was you."

"No-no," said Nelly, withdrawing, not without some difficulty, her hand out of his. "Never mind me; I am so glad—I am so very glad; but then I don't know about dear Mrs. Ochterlony—and oh, poor Will!"

His brother's name made Hugh fall back a little. He had very nearly forgotten everything just then except Nelly herself. But when he remembered that his brother, perhaps, might be dying—

"You know how ill he is," he said, with a little shudder. "Nelly, it must be selfish to be happy.

I had almost forgotten about poor Will."

"Oh, no, no," cried Nelly; "we must not forget about him; he never could mean it—he would have come to himself one day. Oh, Mr. Hugh——"

"Don't call me that," cried the young man.
"You say Will—why should I be different, Nelly?
If I thought you cared for him more than for me——"

"Oh, hush!" said Nelly, "how can you think of such things when he is so ill, and Mrs. Ochterlony in such trouble? And besides, you are different," she added, hastily; and Hugh saw the quick crimson going up to her hair, over her white brow and her pretty neck, and again forgot Will, and everything else in the world.

"Nelly," he said, "you must care for me most. I don't mind about anything without that. I had rather be in poor Will's place if you think of somebody else just the same as of me. Nelly, look here—there is nobody on earth that I can ever feel for as I feel for you."

"Oh, Mr. Hugh!" cried Nelly. She had only one hand to do anything with, for he held the other fast, and she put that up to her eyes, to which the tears had come, though she did not very well know why

"It is quite true," cried the eager young man.
"You may think I should not say it now; but,
Nelly, if there are ill news, shall I not want you to comfort me? and if there are good news, you will be as glad as I am. Oh, Nelly, don't keep silent like that, and turn your head away—you know there is nobody in the world that loves you like me."

"Oh, please don't say any more just now," said Nelly, through her tears. "When I think of poor Will, who is perhaps—And he and I were babies together; it is not right to be so happy when poor Will—Yes, oh yes—another time I will not mind."

And even then poor Nelly did not mind. They were both so young, and the sick boy was far away from them, not under their eyes as it were; and even whatever might happen, it could not be utter despair for Hugh and Nelly. They were selfish so far as they could not help being selfish—they had their moment of delight standing there under the faded roses, with the dead leaves dropping at their feet. Neither autumn nor any other chill—neither anxiety nor suspense, nor even the shadow of death could keep them asunder. Had not they the more need of each other if trouble was coming? That was Hugh's philosophy, and Nelly's heart could not say him nay.

But when that moment was over Aunt Agatha's voice was heard calling from an upper window. "Hugh, Hugh!" the old lady called. "I see a man leaving the station with a letter in his hand—it is the man who brings the telegraph—Oh, Hugh, my dear boy!"

Hugh did not stop to hear any more. He woke up in a moment out of himself, and rushed forth upon the road to meet the messenger, leaving Nelly and his joy behind him. He felt as if he had been guilty then, but as he flew along the road he had no time to think. As for poor Nelly, she took to walking up and down the lawn, keeping him in sight, with limbs that trembled under her, and eyes half blind with tears and terror. Nelly had suffered to some extent from the influence of Mrs. Kirkman's training. She could not feel sure that to be very happy, nay blessed, to feel one's self full of joy and unmingled content, was not something of an offence to God. Perhaps it was selfish and wicked at that moment, and now the punishment might be coming. If it should be so, would it not be her fault? She who had let herself be persuaded, who ought to have known better? Aunt Agatha sat at her window, sobbing, and saying little prayers aloud without knowing it. "God help my Mary! Oh God, help my poor Mary! give her strength to bear it!" was what Aunt Agatha said. And poor Nelly for her part put up another prayer, speechless, in an agony -"God forgive us," she said, in her innocent heart.

But all at once both of them stopped praying, stopped weeping, and gave one simultaneous cry, that thrilled through the whole grey landscape. And this was why it was :- Hugh, a distant figure on the road, had met the messenger, had torn open the precious dispatch. It was too far off to tell them in words, or make any other intelligible sign. What he did was to fling his hat into the air and give a wild shout, which they saw rather than heard. Was it all well? Nelly went to the gate to meet him, and held by it, and Aunt Agatha came tottering downstairs. And what he did next was to tear down the road like a racehorse, the few country folks about it staring at him as if he were mad, -and to seize Nelly in his arms in open day, on the open road, and kiss her publicly before Aunt Agatha, and Peggy, and all the world. "She said she would not mind," cried Hugh, breathless, coming headlong into the garden, "as soon as we heard that Will was going to get well; and there's the dispatch, Aunt Agatha, and Nelly is to be my wife."

This was how two joyful events in the Ochterlony family intimated themselves at the same moment to Miss Seton and her astonished house.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

And this was how it all ended, so far as any end can be said to have come to any episode in human history. While Will was still only recovering—putting his recollections slowly together—and not very certain about them, what they were, Hugh and his mother went through the preliminaries necessary to have Mrs. Ochterlony's early marriage proved before the proper court-a proceeding which Mary did not shrink from when the time came that she could look calmly over the whole matter, and decide upon the best course. She was surprised to see her own unfinished letter preserved so carefully in Hugh's pocket-book. "Put it in the fire," she said to him, "it will only put us in mind of painful things if you keep it:" and it did not occur to Mary why it was that her son smiled and put it back in its place, and kissed her hand, which had grown thin and white in her long seclusion. And then he told her of Nelly, and Mrs. Ochterlony was glad-glad to the bottom of her heart, and yet touched by a momentary pang for which she was angry with herself. He had stood by her so in all this time of trial, and now he was about to remove himself a little, ever so little further off from her. though he was her first-born and her pride; but then she despised herself, who could grudge, even for half a moment, his reward to Hugh, and made haste to make amends for it, even though he was unconscious of the offence.

"I always thought she should have been my child," Mary said, "the very first time I saw her. I had once one like her; and I hungered and thirsted for Nelly when I saw her first. I did not think of getting her like this. I will love her as if she were my own, Hugh."

"And so she will be your own," said Hugh, not knowing the difference. And he was so happy that the sight of him made his mother happy, though she had care enough in the meantime for her individual share.

For it may be supposed that Will, such a youth as he was, did not come out of his fever changed and like a little child. Such changes are few in this world, and a great sickness is not of necessity a moral agent. When the first languor and comfort of his convalescence were over, his mind began to revive and to join things together, as was naturaland he did not know where or how he had broken off in the confused and darkling story that returned to his brain as he pondered. He had forgotten, or never understood about all that happened on the day he was taken ill, but yet a dreamy impression that some break had come to his plans, that there was some obstacle, something that made an end of his rights, as he still called them in his mind, hovered about his recollections. He was as frank and open as it was natural to his character to be, for the first few days after he began to recover, before he had made much progress with his recollections; and then he became moody and thoughtful and perplexed, not knowing how to piece the story out. This was perhaps, next to death itself, the thing which Mary had most dreaded, and she saw that though his sickness had been all but death, it had not changed the character or identity of the pale boy absorbed in his own thoughts, uncommunicating and unyielding, whose weakness compelled him to obey her like an infant in everything external, yet whose heart gave her no such obedience. It was as unlike Hugh's frank exuberance of mind, and Islay's steady but open soul, as could be conceived. But yet he was her boy as much as either; as dear, perhaps even more bound to her by the evil he had tried to do, and by the suffering he himself had borne. And now she had to think not only how to remedy the wrong he had attempted, and to put such harm out of his and everybody's power, but to set the discord in himself at rest, and to reconcile the jangled chords. It was this that gave her a preoccupied look even while Hugh spoke to her of all his plans. It was more difficult than appearing before the court, harder work perhaps than anything she had yet had in her hands to doand hard as it was, it was she who had to seek the occasion and begin.

She had been sitting with her boy, one winterly afternoon, when all was quiet in the house-they were still in the lodging in Liverpool, not far from Mr. Penrose's, to which Will had been removed when his illness began; he was not well enough yet to be moved, and the doctors were afraid of cold, and very reluctant to send him, in his weak state, still further to the north. She had been reading to him, but he was evidently paying no attention to the reading, and she had left off and begun to talk, but he had been impatient of the talk. He lay on the sofa by the fire, with his pale head against the pillow, looking thin, spectral, and shadowy, and yet with a weight of weary thought upon his overhanging brow, and in his close compressed lips, which grieved his mother's heart.

"Will," she said, suddenly, "I should like to speak to you frankly about what you have on your mind. You are thinking of what happened before you were taken ill?"

"Yes," he said, turning quickly upon her his great hollow eyes, shining with interest and surprise; and then he stopped short, and compressed his upper lip again, and looked at her with a watchful eye, conscious of the imperfection of his own memory, and unwilling to commit himself.

"I will go over it all, that we may understand each other," said Mary, though the effort made her own cheek pale. "You were told that I had been married in India just before you were born, and you were led to believe that your brothers were—were—illegitimate, and that you were your father's heir. I don't know if they ever told you, my poor boy, that I had been married in Scotland long before; at all events, they made you believe—""

"Made me believe!" said Will, with feverish haste; "do people generally marry each other more than once? I don't see how you can say,

' made me believe.' "

"Well, Will, perhaps it seemed very clear as it was told to you," said Mary, with a sigh; "and you have even so much warrant for your mistake, that your father too took fright, and thought because everybody was dead that saw us married that we ought to be married again; and I yielded to his wish, though I knew it was wrong. But it appears everybody was not dead; two people who were present have come to light very unexpectedly, and we have applied to that Court—that new Court, you know, where they treat such things—to have my marriage proved, and Hugh's legitimacy declared. It will cost some money, and it will not be pleasant to me; but better that than that such a mistake should ever be possible again."

Will looked in his mother's face, and knew and saw beyond all question that what she told him was absolute fact; not even truth, but fact; the sort of thing that can be proved by witnesses and established in law. His mouth, which had been compressed so close, relaxed; his under lip drooped. his eyes hid themselves, as it were, under their lids. A sudden blank of mortification and humbled pride came over his soul. A mistake, simply a mistake, such a blunder as any fool might make, an error about simple facts which he might have set right if he had tried. And now, for ever and ever, he was nothing but the youngest son; doubly indebted to everybody belonging to him; indebted to them for forgiveness, forbearance, tenderness, and services of every kind. He saw it all, and his heart rose up against it; he had tried to wrong them, and it was his punishment that they forgave him. It all seemed so hopeless and useless to struggle against. that he turned his face from the light, and felt as if it would be a relief if he could be able to be ill again, or if he had wounds that he could have secretly unbound; so that he might get to die, and be covered over and abandoned, and have no more to bear. Such thoughts were about as foreign to Mrs. Ochterlony's mind as any human cogitations could be, and yet she divined them, as it were, in the greatness of her pity and love.

"Will," she said, speaking softly in the silence which had been unbroken for long, "I want you to think, if this had been otherwise, what it would have been for me. I would have been a woman shut out from all good women. I would have been only all the more wicked and wretched that I had succeeded in concealing my sin. You would have blushed for your mother whenever you had to name her name. You could not have kept me near you, because my presence would have shut against you every honest house. You would have been obliged to conceal me and my shame in the darkness—to cover me over in some grave with no name on it—to banish me to the ends of the earth—"

"Mother!" said Will, rising up in his gaunt length and paleness on the sofa. He did not understand it. He saw her figure expanding, as it were, her eyes shining in the twilight like two great mournful stars, the hot colour rising to her face, her voice labouring with an excitement which had been long pent up and found no channel; and the thrill and jar in it of suppressed passion, made a thrill in his heart.

"And your father!" she went on, always with growing emotion, "whom you are all proud of, who died for his duty and left his name without a blot;-he would have been an impostor like me, a man who had taken base advantage of a woman, and deceived all his friends, and done the last wrong to his children, -we two that never wronged man nor woman, that would have given our lives any day for any one of you,-that is what you would have made us out!"

806

"Mother!" said Will. He could not bear it any longer. His heart was up at last, and spoke. He came to her, crept to her in his weakness, and laid his long feeble arms round her as she sat hiding her face. "Mother! don't say that. I must have been mad. Not what I would have made you

"Oh, my poor Will, my boy, my darling!" said Mary, "not you-I never meant you!"

And she clasped her boy close, and held him to her, not knowing what she meant. And then she roused herself to sudden recollection of his feebleness, and took him back to his sofa, and brooded over him like a bird over her nest. And after awhile Islay came in, bringing fresh air and news, and a breath from the outer world. And poor Will's heart being still so young, and having at last touched the depths, took a rebound and came up, not like, and yet not unlike the heart of a little child. From that time his moodiness, his heavy brow, his compressed lip, grew less apparent, and out of his long ponderings with himself there came sweeter fruits. He had been on the edge of a precipice, and he had not known it; and now that after the danger was over he had discovered that danger, such a thrill came over him as comes sometimes upon those who are the most fool-hardy in the moment of peril. He had not seen the blackness of the pit nor the terror of it until he had escaped.

But probably it was a relief to all, as it was a great relief to poor Will, when his doctor proposed a complete change for him, and a winter in the South. Mary had moved about very little since she brought her children home from India, and her spirit sank before the thought of travel in foreign parts, and among unknown tongues. But she was content when she saw the light come back to her boy's eye. And when he was well enough to move. they went away* together, Will and his mother, Mary and her boy. He was the one who needed her most.

Aud when Hugh and Nelly were married, the Percivals sent the little bride a present, very pretty, and of some value, which the Ochterlonys in general accepted as a peace-offering. Winnie's letter which accompanied it was not, however, very peaceful in its tone. "I daresay you think yourself very happy, my dear," Winnie wrote, "but I would not advise you to calculate upon too much happiness. I don't know if we were ever meant for that. Mary, who is the best woman among us, has had a terrible deal of trouble; and I, whom perhaps you will think one of the worst, have not been let off any more than Mary. I wonder often, for my part, if there is any meaning at all in it. I am not sure that I think there is. And you may tell Mrs. Kirkman so, if you like. My love to Aunt Agatha, and, if you like, you can kiss Hugh for me. He always was my favourite among all the boys."

Poor Aunt Agatha heard this letter with a sigh. She said, "My dear love, it is only Winnie's way. She always liked to say strange things, but she does not think like that." And perhaps on the whole it was Aunt Agatha that was worst off in the end. She was left alone when the young creatures paired, as was natural, in the spring; and when the mother Mary went away with her boy. Aunt Agatha had no child left to devote herself to; and it was very silent in the Cottage, where she sat for hours with nothing more companionable than the Henri-Deux ware, Francis Ochterlony's gift, before her eyes. And Sir Edward was very infirm that year. But yet Miss Seton found a consolation that few people would have thought of in the Henri-Deux, and before the next winter Mary was to come home. And she had always her poor people and her letters, and the Kirtell singing softly under its dewy braes.

CURIOUS OLD REGISTERS IN SOMERSET HOUSE.

In our last month's article we introduced to our readers, under the above heading, some of the registers which have been deposited by the various Nonconformist bodies in Government custody. Commencing with those documents which related to the principal denominations of the present day, we considered, in the first place, the records of the Independents, Baptists, and Presbyterians. proceeded to examine the registers of various other classes of the more modern dissenters.

We propose in the present paper to extend our investigations to the records of Foreign Refugees, and of the Society of Friends. Before turning, however, to those volumes which will constitute the principal objects of our consideration, let us pause for a moment to examine an old and interesting book which has found its way into our library, but which falls, nevertheless, under a special category.

The volume is one in which certain familiar episcopal signatures declare it to refer to the Church of England; and a cursory glance at its contents enables us at once to discover that it is an ancient register from the Chapel Royal, Whitehall. We may mention in passing that, amongst the "nine thousand" non-parochial records which (speaking generally) we have described as Dissenting records, there are, nevertheless, a few volumes having reference to the Established Church. Such are the registers from Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals; such, too, is an ancient book from the Mercer's Hall Chapel; such, again, is the volume to which we now allude. It should be noted, however, that the circumstances which have brought this last register into the keeping of the Registrar-General are of a wholly exceptional character.

^{*} They went to San Remo, if any one would like to know, for no particular reason that I can tell, except that the beloved physician, Dr. Antonio, has thrown the shield of his protection over that picturesque little place, with its golden orange groves and its delicious sea.

The book includes entries of the deaths of various persons connected with the Chapel Royal, and also a large number of marriage-entries. Amongst the latter, the following-which makes mention of a name that is great in connection with Art-is conspicuous:-"ffeb 24. 1676. Sr Christopher Wren and Madam Jane ffitswilliams were marryed by Dr William Holder Subdean." But the main interest of the volume depends upon its evidence as to certain customs of the times which it represents, and upon its frequent allusions to facts of historical moment. The first entry which we shall quote may be interesting to some readers, as setting forth King Charles the Second under the character of a vindicator of strict church observances-a character somewhat different from that which is usually associated with his name. It is as follows :-

"ffeb 24 1679. Being Leape-year, A great dispute arose between His Majty and some of his nobles whether Matthias day ought to be observed the 24 or 25. The king sent for Dr Holder the subdeane for his opinion in king sent for Df Holder the subdeane for his opinion in the case, who told his Maty that every Leape year it was wont to be observed in ye chappell the 25. The king was pleased to answer, well then I'le have no Innovations in ye church So it was not observed ye 24, but ye first Lessons for the 25 were read at morning and Evening prayers ye 24, and the next day being Ash Wednesday, were read the Lessons for Matthias day, using that Collect, but omitting ye Athanasian Creed, and thro' the service Ashwednesday superseded the ffeast of St Matthias' Matthias."

We will here insert the instructions given at about this time for the dressing of the altar in the Chapel Royal. We must leave the reader to draw his own conclusions as to whether or not these instructions implied an amount of decoration in excess of that chaste medium of adornment usually associated with our English church—a medium aptly described by George Herbert in the words-

> "A fine aspect in fit array, Neither too mean, nor yet toc gay."

The instructions run thus :-

"The Attyre of ye Altar.

"On Holyday Eves and Holydays ve Altar to be covered with a Carpet partly velvet, and partly white Goldflower'd Stin: an Altar-peice of the same hung up. A great Charger set on three Basons, one bigger and two less, two great flather'd flagons, and two less of the same work, two candlesticks with tapers, A rich Bible in two parts, three Common Prayer Bookes, two at the west End and one at the East, on a velvet cushion.

"ffor ye Comunion, two Patins, two Chalices with "Christmas Eve the Altar to be cover'd with peices of our Saviour's Baptism his Presentation in the Temple, his Circumcision &c. and the same to continue there till after the Epiphany."

On the 30th of January the altar was to be covered with black velvet. On that occasion, too, prayers were to be read "after a parochial manner," and no music was to be introduced into the service.

The next entry which we shall extract relates to the death of Charles II. and to the accession of James :-

"King (ffebry 2d 1684 Candlemas day being monday. Charles Bee it Remembered that his Maty was seis'd win a most violent fit of an Apoplexy, wen terminated in an intermittent fleavor of web hee dyed about 12 the ffriday following being fleb 6th In the afternoon of web day his R^{II} Highness James Duke of York and Albany &c was proclaymed at Whitehall-gate at Temple Bar and at the old Exchange in the City, King of England, Scotland, ffrance and Ireland &c."

The following quotations also relate to facts of some importance in our history :-

"On Sunday ffebry 15th 168 4 King James the 24 was openly seen at Masse w. his Queen in a little chappell closet next the water-side in his Lodgings at the end of the long gallery."

"James Scot late Duke of Monmouth Landed at Lyme Re in Dorsetshire we about 150 men on the 11th day of June 1685. Hee was Routed at Weston-Moore near Bridgwater on Monday July ye 6th following. Hee was taken July 8th in Dorsetshire near Ringwood on the borders of Hampshire; He was brought to Whitehall July 13th and fro thence carryed to the Tower, and Executed on Tower Hill July 15th. He dyed a Refractory ffanatick, owning (at the last) he had lived happily for 2 years last past whye Lady Harriot Wentworth as his wife; His Dutche/s when he saw her in the Tower he used but coldly.

"Since the vote of both houses, that the Throne is vacant, I think it will bee necessary and do so advise, to leave off praycing for the late King James the Second and the Queen Consort and instead thereof to use the prayer for the Prince of Orange which was lately published. ffeb: 9th 1688. H. London."

We will conclude our extracts with an entry showing the changes which the Whitehall service underwent at the command of King William :-

"It is His Matyes Pleasure that these Regulations be made in the Chapel Service.
"1st That there be no other musick in the Chappell, but the Organ.

"2. That no other part of ye service be sung to the Organ, besides the Anthems, and after the three first Collects, and the Holy, Holy &c, and the Glory be to God on High in the comunion Service.

"3. That no Prayers properly so called, in the Responses, Litany, or elsewhere, or the Amens be sung in any manner.

"Dated ffulham "Signed H. London "Feb. 23rd 168 8"

We will now proceed to the examination of those ancient and interesting records which relate to the Protestant refugees. The oldest volume of all is the register of the Walloon Church of St. Julien, or God's House, at Southampton. There was a settlement of Walloons at this town, and also of refugees from the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and the Orkneys, as early as the reign of Edward VI. The church in question appears to have been founded in 1567, for the first entries contained in its register relate to that date, and a minute which we shall hereafter have occasion to quote, confirms the supposition by a direct mention of the age of the congregation. The register includes baptisms, marriages, and deaths. It also comprises lists of the persons who were admitted to the Holy Communion at the several monthly celebrations. have examined with much interest the account of the communicants at the first Sainte-Cène administered to this congregation. The list is a long one; surprisingly so when the juvenility of the church is considered. But we presume that a congregation situated like that of "God's House" at the time to which we are referring, would number among its members but few grown persons who were not communicants. We find that the numbers were augmented almost every month by refugees newly arrived from Paris and elsewhere, who were introduced to the church of St. Julien by epistolary recommendations from their late pastors.

But the more interesting entries in the volume are to be discovered under the heading-"Les Jeusnes." The fasts appointed for observance by the congregation were numerous; and there is an unmistakable air of simple, solemn earnestness about the minutes which relate to them-a circumstance not to be wondered at when we remember how real and practical a thing the religion of these Protestants must have become amidst the persecutions which had driven them to our shores. We can well understand with what intense interest the refugees would watch from their tranquil retreat the stillcontinuing sufferings of their fellow-Protestants on the continent, and how hearty and genuine would be their acts of intercession on behalf of their persecuted brethren. The good people seem however to have been somewhat superstitious, with all their manifest piety. One of their early fasts was partially induced by the appearance of a comet, which they regarded as a special token of the Divine

It was only five years after the foundation of the church of St. Julien that the massacre of St. Bartholomew occurred. That unparalleled act must necessarily have plunged the refugees into the deepest gloom; and their gratitude for their own escape must have been well-nigh outweighed by agony on account of their murdered friends. The following entry, which occurs amongst the Jeusnes, partially relates, it will be seen, to the massacre. We give it literatim.

"lan 1572 le 25° Jö de Setembre fut celebré Ung Jeusne publicq. la raison estoit por ce q Monsieur le prince dorenge estoit Venue au pails bas, auce Nouuelle Armee dalemaigne por afaier A deliurer le pails et les poures eglises hors de la main du duc dalbe Ce Cruel tiran. et Ausi principallement por ce \overline{q} les eglises de la France estoient en une meruilleuse et horrible calamité extreme por ce \overline{q} ung horrible Masacre et sacre a avoit esté fet a paris le 24 Jor daoust passé ou grand Nombre de Nobles, et de fidelles furent tues en Jor et Nuit, environ de 12 ou 13 milles. la presche deffendue \overline{p} tout la Roiaume et tout les biens de fidelles pilles \overline{p} tout le Roiaume et por la consollation deux $[a^*eux]$ et du paiis bas et por prier le Sr [Seigneur] a leur deliurance fut celebré le jeusne solemnel."

Nor can we suppose that such intercessory exercises were unavailing. In the case before us, there undoubtedly was a wonderful recovery amongst the Protestants from the shock which they had sustained. By the interposition of Providence, the pastors of the Huguenot flocks had many of them escaped the cruel massacre. These good men were in many instances the means of keeping the congregations together, and of reviving the depressed spirits of individuals. Thus the Protestants were sustained under the blow which had fallen upon them; and various encouragements, which visited them from time to time, enabled them to remain constant until the year 1598, when the Edict of Nantes was proclaimed—the first legislative enactment in favour of the Reformation which had been passed by the French Government. May we not rightly connect this preservation of Protestant fidelity, with such earnest and solemn acts of intercession as that to which our quotation relates?

Amongst the records of fasts, which necessarily refer to calamitous events either dreaded or lamented, we meet here and there with entries of a different and more pleasing character. The following mention of a public thanksgiving for the destruction of the Spanish Armada is a case in point.

"Le 19e de Nouebre 1588 graçes furet rendues publicquemet au Seigneur pour la dissipation estrange de la flotte d'Espagne quy s'estoit rendue aux costes d'Angleterre, pour conquester le dit royaume et le remettre sous la tyranie du pape."

In the year 1591, again we find an interesting allusion to a visit paid by Queen Elizabeth to Southampton, an event which occurred during September in that year. It appears that certain representatives of the congregation of "God's House," having being unable to obtain satisfactory access to her majesty during her stay in the place, presented themselves to the queen-headed, no doubt, by their pastor-just after she had left the town. The deputation proceeded to express to the royal lady their thanks for the twenty-four years of tranquillity, which by God's goodness they had enjoyed under her protection. The queen's reply appears to have been a gracious one. "Elle respondit," says the entry, "fort humainemet." She expressed her gratitude to God, that He had given her the ability to gather together aud befriend the suffering strangers; and she declared her belief that their prayers would greatly tend towards the security of her kingdom.

We are compelled to pass over many entries of more or less interest. During a period of seventyseven years, after the date of the thanksgiving for the destruction of the Spanish Armada, a great number of solemn public fasts were observed, on different occasions, by the congregation of "God's House." They related frequently to the sufferings of the Protestant Churches on the continent, but occasionally had reference to matters nearer home. These records are interspersed with a few entries of Actions de Grâçes, which show that the little society did not forget gratefully to acknowledge such blessings and deliverances as were from time to time vouchsafed both to their persecuted brethren and to themselves.

We select for quotation two more entries which relate to important events of our own history. The first, as will be seen, records the circumstance that a fast was observed in consequence of the visitation of the Plague; the second alludes in a similar manner to the Great Fire of London. As before, we give literal transcripts of the original entries, making exceptions, however, in the cases of two or three abbreviated words, the contractions of which would perhaps scarcely be intelligible in print. We do not think that our readers will be inclined to compliment the Registering Officer of "God's House," upon the correctness either of his spelling or of his composition. The entries are as follows:—

"Le 6ºm de Decembre 1665 le Jusne fut celebré en cette Eglize cette Ville estant affligé de la Peste ces 5 mois passé estant mort de nostre petit troupeau viron 20 psones & des Englois enviro 800. Le Seign; veile bieu tost (bientôt) cesser cette vi/sitation et Isey (ici) et ailleurs."

"Le 10cm D'octobre 1666 Le Jusne fut celebré en cette Eglize par le comanndem! du Roy come ausy toute les Eglizes Engloizes pour prier le Segn! deppaiser son Ire et ce/ser ses Jugemens maintenant espandu sur ce Royaume la ville (Capitale) de Londres estant la plus grande partie consumé par le feu."

It is now generally believed that the Great Fire was a blessing in disguise. Probably most, if not all of the visitations which we are wont to ascribe to the wrath of Heaven, would be found, could we regard them from an altitude higher than that which our minds are usually able to reach, to come under the same category. But after all, it does not appear that we are at all times meant to climb to such an altitude. The impulse simply to "cry to the Lord in trouble," would seem to be a most wholesome one; although subsequent reflection may show us that the evil which once we deprecated was but a good in ugly guise. In their readiness to make every calamity or supposed calamity, the occasion for new and hearty humiliation before the Great Disposer of human events, we may at any rate safely follow the example of the good Refugees.

Walloon churches, besides that which we have mentioned, whose registers are to be found amongst the volumes now under our notice, were founded at Norwich, and Canterbury, and in Threadneedle Street, London. It must not be supposed, however, that these churches represent the total number of Walloon settlements in England. The strangers also established themselves at Sandwich, Colchester, Maidstone, and other towns, introducing various useful manufactures. For a full and interesting account of them we beg to refer our readers to Burn's History of the Foreign Refugees-a volume to which we are indebted for some of the facts mentioned in the present article. The church at Canterbury, like that at Southampton, appears to have been established in the reign of Edward VI., which sovereign granted to the foreign Protestants a Charter for the exercise of their religion. But the Canterbury books which have been preserved to the present time extend no further back than to the The congregations at Norwich and Threadneedle Street seem to have been large and flourishing. The Registers relating to the latter body commence at 1599, and we find that in the following year 106 baptisms occurred at this church. During the same period 108 children were baptized by the pastor at Norwich.

The numbers of Protestant refugees, which had been greatly augmented after the frightful massacre of Paris in 1572, were more than ever increased when, a century later, Louis XIV. signed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. On this occasion, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts made by the French government to stay the torrent of emigration, multitudes escaped. Hidden in casks and in bales of merchandise; huddled together in holes in the holds of vessels; sometimes even venturing to sea in open boats-the honest men and women whose consciences forbade compliance with the requirements of a religion which their hearts had learnt to detest, contrived to fly in large numbers to this and other countries. It is supposed that nearly 50,000 persons came to England. Were other evidence wanting to prove where the bulk of these immigrants settled, we could undertake to decide the question from the Records which form the subject of this paper. But the fact that the silk manufacture, which is well known to have been introduced into England by the Refugees, has its principal seat in the vicinity of Spitalfields, would lead us beforehand to the expectation of finding the main traces of their religion in that neighbourhood. And there, accordingly, we do find them. No less than eight of the French Protestant churches to which the volumes that we are considering belong, were situate at or near Spitalfields; and many of these volumes date back to within a short period of 1685-the year of the Revocation which drove the foreigners to our shores. A répertoire général of Baptisms performed at various French chapels, which has been deposited with the other Records at the General Register Office, includes moreover the Registers of two more congregations in the same

It is impossible to restrain a feeling of pride and thankfulness when we reflect on the hospitalities shown by our country to these strangers. For the maintenance of their schools and pastors our sovereigns liberally provided; and here, in their chosen land of refuge, the good and industrious artisans who constituted a large proportion of the immigrants, were allowed to worship God unmolested in the simple manner which they believed to be most acceptable to Him; while they prosecuted their useful handicrafts with a diligence and peaceableness which doubtless confirmed the respectful sympathy already entertained towards them by our forefathers, on account of their constancy under suffering and persecution. True, we had not ourselves in those days learnt the full meaning of the words "religious toleration." We were more ready to acknowledge the evil of intolerance as exhibited in other lands than to detect the same evil as it still existed in our own. Yet it is undoubtedly cause for congratulation that our nation stood foremost amongst those which earliest recognised the absurdity and wickedness of coercive measures in matters of faith, and which offered to the sufferers by such measures an asylum of safety and repose.

It will be remembered that the doctrinal teaching of the French Protestant Refugees was Calvinistic, and that their form of Church Government was Presbyterian. Whatever opinion may be entertained as to their distinctive tenets, it cannot be denied that their religion bore upon it the unmistakable stamp of genuineness. Tried by the safe and simple test of Holy Writ, their faith must needs have been a reality. The fruit was good. The tree could not have been bad. The old volumes at which we have glanced, wherein are enrolled the names of the Refugees and their descendants, will not perhaps have been uselessly referred to, if the reference renew our admiration for these brave, constant Huguenots-who self-expatriated themselves for their religion's sake, and whose pure morals in the land of their adoption commend them to our imitation no less than their fidelity under intolerance and ill-usage in their native country.

There can be no doubt that the immigration of 1685 was greatly beneficial to England. The silk manufacture; the arts of calico-printing and paper making; the more delicate operations of watchmaking and jewellery, together with many other useful and important branches of industry, owe to the arrival of the Refugees either their introduction to the country, or their extension and improvement here. And, in addition to the material advantages which we have derived from the advent of the good and clever Frenchmen amongst us, we may be indebted for much that is not so distinctly traceable to their arrival. Who can tell the benefits which they may have conferred upon us in their prayers for our country and our kings? The register of one of the French Churches that we have referred to (the congregation of which church was small and poor) opens with the pathetic inscription: "Nostre aide et commencement soit au nom de Dieu qui a fait le ciel et la Terre." The grateful intercessions of the simple people who were accustomed habitnally to rely upon that great name, must have been of no small value to the nation.

At one time there appear to have been in England no less than sixty-four congregations of French Protestants. At the period of the Commissioners' report on the non-parochial registers, however, (1838) this number had dwindled to five or six; while in the census returns for 1851, only three are mentioned as being in existence. The descendants of the original immigrants naturally became gradually incorporated with the English population, and their churches thus declined, and at length ceased to be. All the Spitalfields congregations have now been dissolved; and we suppose that the venerable volumes to which we have referred must constitute the most direct documentary evidence extant as to their former existence.

Let us now, finally, take a glance at another and an important body, whose registers form a remarkable feature in the curious collection of records which we have been considering. We refer to the Society of Friends.

This Society at first objected to resign their registers to the keeping of the Government. They replied, when such a transfer was originally suggested to them, that to retain their documents locally would be more conducive to the convenience both of the Society itself and of the general public. than to deposit them at a Metropolitan office. They therefore, for a while, courteously declined to surrender their records. At length, however, their objections gave way. The result was the transfer to the custody of the Registrar-General of nearly 1500 volumes of births, marriages, and burials-a number further augmented in the year 1857 by 124 additional books. A complete, and, as we are assured, a most accurately framed index of all these registers has been prepared by the Society, and is retained in their possession, being deposited at their central office in Houndsditch.

The registers of the Society of Friends have been better kept, and more carefully preserved, than those of any other religious denomination. Their scrupulous order and accuracy distinguish them from all the various volumes which surround them in the fireproof vault where they are now placed. They may be said to furnish a complete history of the interesting and respected body which they represent, from its foundation in the middle of the seventeenth century, down to the establishment of the present system of civil registration in the year 1837. Many of the volumes referring to the first years of the Society contained, when they were forwarded to London, valuable minutes relative to tenets, 'sufferings,' * and discipline; but these portions of the books were, in most cases, detached and returned to the places from whence they came, in pursuance of the expressed wishes of the senders. Sufficient matter has nevertheless been left behind in the shape of the registers proper, forcibly to illustrate many of the characteristics of the "People of God, called Quakers." We shall find further, that some of the minutes alluded to have been left in their original situations amongst the lists of births, marriages, and burials.

^{*} A gathering of the Society, which is connected with their yearly meeting, and is called a "Meeting for Sufferings," has been held by them from the early days of their history. It was originated with the object of urging the Government to grant relief from the many injuries to which the first adherents of the Society were subjected. Its purposes have, however, in course of time become somewhat modified and extended.

In the Friends' registers of births are to be found dates reaching back nearly to the commencement of the seventeenth century. We have ourselves discovered one entry having reference to a period so early as 1609, and we have reason to believe that others might be found relating to years even more remote still. This will surprise such of our readers as may remember that George Fox, the founder of the society, was not born until 1624, and that he did not begin to promulgate his opinions till twoand-twenty years later. The difficulty is cleared up, however, by the discovery-which a glance at the earlier registers enables us to make-that it was the custom of the Society to record the births of all their members—even of such as joined the body after having reached middle life. In these days it is illegal to register a birth more than six months subsequently to its occurrence. But the Society of Friends, naturally desirous in the infancy of their existence to enrol all their recruits, were not at all likely to bind themselves by any such restrictions. Their main object was, we suppose, to obtain an accurate account of the numbers of their adherents. We understand that at the present time, although they allow the general system of registration to supersede that which their Society adopted prior to 1837, yet they still record with great care by another process, both their births and burials, in order that lists of their members may be correctly kept, and that distinct evidence of all interments which take place in their own burial grounds may be preserved.

The remarkable precision and order which characterise the registers of the Friends aptly illustrate the eminently practical nature of their religion. That they have as a body carried out their principles into the minutiæ of daily life with preeminent consistency, their entire past history testifies. And when we come to examine their method of accomplishing the matter-of-fact process of registration, we find ourselves able to trace in the elaborate precision of that method, new evidence of the same rigid standard of Christian practice which from the first has regulated the entire habits, the furniture, the dress, the manners, and the speech of this remarkable sect.

Of the sixteen hundred admirably kept volumes which now represent the Society of Friends at the Registrar General's Office, the earlier books, although the entries which they contain are comparatively brief, give as good an idea of the general precision of the records as the later ones. One of the first methods of registration adopted was to record on a single page the complete history of a family. In the volumes prepared for this system each page was divided into three columns. In the first column were entered the births of the parents and their marriage. In the second the births of the children were recorded; while in the third were inserted, in course of time, notices of the burials of the entire family. This curious plan does not appear to have been followed for any great length of time. It must have presented great difficulties even to the Society of Friends, and would have been impracticable in any less perfectly organised body.

In these earlier registers are to be found many curious traces of the Quaker faith. It frequently happened, for instance, that persons embracing Quakerism had been previously married according to the rites of the Church. In some of these cases we find a solemu notification made in the first column of the register that such members had been "joined together by the priest before being convinced of the truth, and not according to the gospel order and practise of the people of God," or other words to the same effect, which illustrate that fundamental article of the Friends' creed that no separate class of men is specially authorised to administer the ordinances of a Christian community, and their persuasion that marriage is a divine institution, in which solemn covenant it is the prerogative of God alone to join persons together, and with respect to which they view the interference of a priest as an assumption altogether unwarranted by Holy Scripture, or by the example of the primitive church.

After a while the records of births, marriages, and burials, were kept distinctly; indeed, in some instances, this method was adopted from the first. The births were ultimately inscribed on parchment sheets, which sheets, when filled in, were inserted in volumes prepared to receive them. They were attested by the signatures of two or more persons who had been present at the scene of nativity. The documents which came under this category were therefore of the most unimpeachable authenticity. Not indeed that any of the Friends' records are otherwise than dependable. But the system by which they preserved the original signatures of the witnesses, was that in which their painstaking exactness reached its maximum, and their liability to error its minimum.

The burial registers are many of them of the same character. They consist, to a great extent, of notices issued to different grave-makers to prepare graves by certain given dates for the bodies of the persons whom they describe. Like the birth records to which we have alluded, they are entered on parchment sheets. The interment having been accomplished, the grave-maker notified the same at the foot of the sheet with which he had been furnished. His signature completed the document; and such document was finally inserted in its proper order in the particular volume designed to receive it.

of the records as the later ones. One of the first But pains even more scrupulous and elaborate methods of registration adopted was to record on a single page the complete history of a family. In the Friends appear to have been singularly cautious, from the first, on all subjects connected with matrimony, "Great care was taken," says the historical sketch, published by the Society in 1864, "in regard to proceedings in marriage; investigation as to the clearness of the parties from other marriage engagements, full publicity of their intentions, and the consent of parents, appear to have been recommended in early times as preliminaries to the ratification of the agreement between the parties; and this act took place publicly in the religious meetings of the Society." The restrictions and recommendations were of an undoubtedly salutary character. Marriages amongst first cousins, for instance, were discountenanced from the earliest days of the Society. "It is our judgment," says a minute of 1675, "that not only those marriages of near kindred, expressly forbidden under the law, ought not to be practised under the Gospel, but that we in our day ought not to take first consins in marriage. And though some have been drawn into such marriages, let not their practise be a precedent or example to any others amongst us for the time to come." The following advice from different meetings shows with what seriousness the marriage contract has continued to be regarded by the Society. "We earnestly advise and exhort all young and unmarried Friends, that they do not make any procedure one with another upon the account of marriage without first applying to their parents or guardians for their consent and agreement therein. And we also advise that, in the first place, all young persons concerned seriously wait upon the Lord for counsel and clearness in this weighty concern, before they make any procedure with any in order to marriage; that they may not be led by any forward or uncertain affections in this great concern to their own hurt, the grief of their friends, and the dishonour of the truth."

And an accurate record of the contract itself, as well as a careful examination into the qualifications of the contracting parties, was considered necessary amongst the Friends at an early period of their history, and has continued to be so considered. The following entry, which relates to a marriage in the year 1695, and which may be taken as a fair specimen of the registers of that day, will prove the care bestowed upon the wording of these records. The page containing the entry to which we refer, is headed by a statement of the birth and parentage of the bride and bridegroom. Then follows the marriage record thus:—

"These are to certify all whom it may concern, That whereas the Agreement and Intention of Marriage Betwixt us Samuel Overton of Grove Field in the Parish of Hampton-Lucy in the County of Warwick Husbandman, and Mary Lucas of Aft-Church in the same County Single woman, hath been openly published several times (according to church order) and no objection made against us; Now upon this Twenty-Fourth Day of the first Month called March in the year one Thousand six Hundred Ninety and $\bigce \text{Four} \bigce \text{We the said Samuel and Mary} \text{Five} \bigce$ We the said Samuel and Mary have openly and solemnly, as in the presence of God and before the Congregation of his People, taken each other in Marriage to live together as Husband and Wife, according to God's Divine Ordinance and Appointment (Gen: 2, 24 & Ch: 24.14) in Testimony whereof we have hereunto set our Hands the Day and Year above written.

"Samuel Overton. Mary Overton.

"And that they the aforesaid Samuel and Mary were this day openly and solemnly married, according to the Order of the Church of Christ, and the good examples of God's People in ages past, mentioned in the holy Scriptures (Ruth 4. Matt: 19—5. 6. John 2—1. 2. 1 Tim: 5—14,) We whose names are hereunder written (being members of the same Church and Eye and Ear-Witnesses of the Publication and Marriage aforesaid) Do hereby give in our Testimonies for them and with them, to Remain upon Record unto Posterity, as a witness for God and his People against all the works of Darkness, and all such as go together therein, out of which God hath called us to bear witness of his Everlasting Covenant of Light and Truth, upon the Earth, In which stands the Marriage that is truly honourable, unto which we bear record for the clearing of the Truth, and such as live in it, from Scandals and false Reports; and for the full satisfaction of all People that in any wise may be concerned therein. Signed with our own hands the Day and Year above written."

Then follow the signatures of the witnesses; who are forty in number.

In course of time the Friends began to use printed forms for their marriage registers. Some of the volumes containing these forms are of an exceed ingly bulky and imposing description. They consist of thick folios massively bound in leather, and printed within in large Italian type upon sheets with broad margins. The entries are not quite so lengthy as that quoted above; but they still give evidence of the scrupulous care which characterises all the records of the Society, and the form is framed with the greatest verbal precision. In these printed volumes (and others) the words employed by the bride and bridegroom at the time of marriage (the same, we believe, as those which the Quakers use at the present day under similar circumstances) are inserted. "Friends," says the man taking the woman by the hand, "in the fear of the Lord, and before this assembly, I take this my friend be my wife, promising, through Divine assistance, to be unto her a loving and faithful husband until it shall please God by death to separate us." The woman then, taking the man by the hand, repeats the same words with the necessary modifications.

The number of persons who attached their signatures to the marriage entries was in some instances extremely large. "In the mouth of two or three witnesses," says Scripture, "shall every word be established." But the Friends were evidently of opinion that the "two or three" might with advantage be largely multiplied. They were clearly determined "to make assurance doubly (and much more than doubly) sure." We have ourselves counted the names of as many as a hundred and twenty witnesses added at the foot (or at the back) of an entry. It may easily be imagined, therefore, that the issue of certificates to prove a Quaker pedigree, is a matter frequently involving no small amount of labour. We should mention, however, that abbreviated copies of marriage entries are often to be found in the records of the quarterly meetings.

The benevolence and liberality of the Society of Friends are universally acknowledged, and have recently been remarked upon in the pages of Good Words. That the Quakers' generosity was recognised even when the association was in its infancy, we think the following quotation will show. The evidence is of a kind which is often of more value than any other. The generosity is proved, not by the testimony—which might be prejudiced—of those who were its legitimate recipients; it is shown by the witnessed existence of a person who found it worth his while deliberately to take wicked advantage of that generosity.

The entry is taken from one of the Cornwall registers. It is, we think, amusing, as affording a quaint instance of that gentle yet wary demeanour which would seem to have been characteristic of the Friends throughout their entire history—a demeanour exemplifying at once, and in odd conjunction, the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove:—

"From a monthly meeting at Truro the 12 day of $\frac{12}{mo}$ 1677.

"Friends,

"This is to give notice that there is a young man lately gone out of Penrhyn in this County whose name is Bartholomew Shepherd; he sometimes came to Friends meetings and took the bouldness in a presumptuous manner to stand up as a preacher in some places. But hath of late lived very loosly and hath made it his business to borrow money of several Friends and others in these parts and hath contracted several debts where he is no way able to pay and now he is gone away. These are therefore to pursue him that no Friends nor charitable people may be deceived by him he is a tall young man aged about 20 yrs something of a long visage. By trade he styles himself a cutler he hath formerly been at London and some other countries and hath left an ill savour behind him, and now in Love to y? precious Truth and in tenderness to all that do profess it we write this, lest any should be deceived by him when he is not (?) and we desire that copies of this with the remembrance of our love may be sent to the several monthly meetings in England and elsewhere from us whose names are under written."

While referring to the benevolence of the Friends, we cannot refrain from citing an example of this virtue which they have given in our own day, but which is not, we believe, generally known. We allude to their liberality at the time of the Irish famine. In the year 1847, the Quakers raised and distributed amongst our suffering fellow-subjects in Ireland, the sum of 200,000/.

The persecutions and annoyances to which the Friends were subjected at the commencement of their history, are witnessed by several curious entries in the volumes before us. The zeal and enthusiasm of the adherents of the Society were likely to excite reproach and opposition; and it cannot be denied that Members were often treated with an amount of cruelty and injustice as honourable to the patient sufferers, as it was dishonourable to those who inflicted it. At the same time, it seems probable that on many occasions the Friends, from lack of sound judgment, laid themselves open to the spiteful treatment of the magistracy, without in the smallest degree benefiting their own cause, or even satisfactorily exemplifying their principles. We think our readers will agree with us that their habit of visiting the churches (or to use the Friends' expression, "steeple-houses"), in order that they might publicly challenge the scriptural character of the service, was a kind of proceeding as entirely indefensible, as it was certain to be useless with respect to its object-although the address to the priest or congregation may not necessarily have been (and we believe generally was not,) intruded as a positive interruption to the worship. Although the good men who acted in this manner, doubtless did so under impulses which they closely connected with some of their best and holiest aspirations; yet it must be admitted as not improbable, that they often mistook for the special leadings of the Holy Ghost, the mere suggestions of their own minds.

The following quotations from a volume of the Monthly Meeting of Colchester, Essex, will give to the reader an account of some of these intrusions from the Friends' point of view. He will be enabled to draw from the statements what deductions he pleases. Some of the minutes relative to this matter have evidently been cut out from the book. Examples more than sufficient to answer our purpose, have however been left behind, from which we select the subjoined:—

"12th $\frac{5}{mo}$ 1655. James Parnell sent prisoner thither* by Dionisius Wakering Thomas Cooke Herbert Pelham and William Harlackenden for Speaking to Priest Willis in the Steeplehouse at Great Coggeshall where he remained a Prisoner about tenne months suffering much abuse from the Jaylor's wife and there died an Innocent Sufferer for ye testimony of Jesus."

"28 day of ye 3 month 1657. William Monk of Sandon sent a prisoner to Colchester Castle by Henry Mildmay and John Passall of Much Baddow called Justices, for speaking to a Priest after he had done his worship, and Priest Smith of Sandon began to speak to the people after the other Priest had done on purpose to hinder the said William from speaking. The said William Monk was kept prisoner about two years and four monthes by a statute made in Queen Marcys dayes."

"28th of 10th mo. 1657. John Sewell of Gestingthorp being moved of the Lord to goe in the steeplehouse at Hedingham Castle stood silent till the Priest had ended his service who having sprinkled a child with water the said John bid him prove that ever any minister of Christ sprinkled water upon the face of any child and called it baptism, which he refused to doe but caused the said John to be had before him called Justice Eden who committed him to Colchester Castle where he suffered imprisonment on y? account about 12 or 14 dayes."

The views of the Society, with respect to war, have, from the first, been plainly expressed. "We entreat all who profess themselves members of our Society," says the printed Epistle of 1744, "to be faithful to that ancient testimony, borne by us ever since we were a people, against bearing arms and fighting; that by a conduct agreeable to our profession, we may demonstrate ourselves to be real followers of the Messiah the Peaceable Saviour."

A later Epistle, that of 1790, exhibits further the opinions of the Friends on this subject. "We entreat that when warlike preparations are making, Friends be watchful, lest any be drawn into loans, arming or letting out their ships or vessels, or otherwise promoting the destruction of the human species."

We insert the following entries in proof of the inconveniences to which the Friends were exposed, during the reign of Charles the Second, for their rigid adherence to these anti-warlike convictions.

"Distrained for not finding Armes. 1671. 34 mo. 4th day. Jno Hurly (then Junt) fined four pounds, had taken from him by Henry Garland & Edw4 Rout Sergants in Ralph Crefilds Company three quarters of a hundred and thirteen pound wt of kettles worth six pounds five shillings."

"Solomon Hormantell ye same day distrayned by the said Sergants of 40/s fine, a clock worth 50/s."

"Thomas Cole for 40/s fine had taken from him by Segismund Baker & J. —— Sergants and Wm Wiltshire Constable a good feather bed & blanket value of about three pounds."

"George Neatherly for twenty shillings fine for half an arms under Capt Moore fined by ye deputy Lieutenants, had taken from him by Joseph Andrewes, John Hardee, Thomas Rose Constables & John Russell, Robert Pate, Peter Savil & Henery James Witnesses 9 bushels ½ of Mault the 13th of 12th month 1676 worth £1: 01: 00."

The above entries are taken from the Colchester volume which has before been referred to.

Although we are ourselves very far from agreeing with the views entertained by the Society of Friends, we must confess to a feeling of regret at the recollection that the numbers of that venerable body are steadily decreasing in this country. Whatever may be the cause of the diminution the fact is undoubted. "The marriages among Quakers," says the Registrar General's last Annual Report—that for 1863*—"exhibit an almost yearly decline." That the Friends themselves attribute the decrease in the sum of their British adherents to the continuous emigration of their members to America is well known; but we understand that this explanation is not considered altogether satisfactory. Perhaps the days are becoming too impetuous, and the notions of men too material, to admit the continuance amongst us of the religious transcendentalism of the Quakers. Perhaps the Society is only obeying that universal law by which human ideas, even the best and purest, having been as it were worn for a while, are folded up and put away, to give place to other garments of thought, better suited than the old to the growing necessities of the time.

"Our little systems have their day;
They have their day and cease to be:
They are but broken lights of Thee,
And Thou, O Lord, art more than they."

But whatever may be the ultimate fate of Quakerism in England, its past history can never be forgotten, nor cease to bear wholesome fruit. That portion of truth which it was the mission of the Friends to uphold, they have upheld with constancy in the face of much opposition; and the purity of their entire principles has been evidenced by thousands of beautiful Quaker lives. These are facts the results of which no lapse of time, no modifications of opinion, can obliterate. For our own part, we have glanced over the Quaker Records, and over the history which those Records have brought before us, with a feeling of sincere respect and admiration; and we are inclined to believe that this feeling will have been in some degree shared by most of our readers.

We have now completed the brief survey of English Nonconformity which our nine thousand registers suggested; and it has been impossible so to consider the various creeds, without perceiving on all hands the tokens of that human frailty which, alas! pervades them all. But such a review naturally leads us also into another and a pleasanter line of thought. It reminds us that real goodness, in its broad and essential features, is ever beautifully the same; and that whatever may be the good man's particular prejudices or distinctive phraseology, he is always a man who does justly, loves mercy, and walks humbly with his God.

EDWARD WHITAKER.

LILIES.

SHE came in the dewy dawning,
Where a little brooklet ran,
With the blue sky for an awning
And a white flower for a fan.

Spring-light was on the meadows, Spring-light was in her eyes, And she saw in the stream the shadows Of the lilies fall and rise,

The stream roll'd to the river, And the river roll'd to the sea, And the years that roll for ever Bore the maiden away from me.

But I bless the Heaven that sent her, Though spring has taken its flight, And summer changed into winter, And all my day into night.

And I often dream of the valleys

Long ago, and the sweet spring-tide,
And the little stream and the lilies,

And the maiden that stood beside.

FAITH WORKING, RESTING, FIGHTING, AND CONQUERING.

III.-FAITH WORKING.

"Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace."—Ruth ii. 2.

"REMEMBERING without ceasing your work of faith." The Repentance of Faith, and the Resolution of Faith, is followed in due order by the Work of Faith. That is no true Repentance which does not resolve: and that is no true Resolution which does not work.

Work has many aspects. It may be treated as a portion of man's curse.

"In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread," was one section of the original curse.

But it was not work which was new to man. From the beginning work had been assigned to him: the difference was that work henceforth was to be both excessive in degree and comparatively unremunerative. The earth was to bring forth in great part thorns and thistles in return for labour: and that labour was to be no longer moderate and wholesome, but wearisome and disproportionate.

Still for fallen man work was also a safeguard. It is in the idle heart, it is in the indolent life, that the rankest weeds of evil grow: a toil so hard as to be the gradual undermining of the physical strength, is yet the protection of the moral and may be the safety of the spiritual being.

And not only so. Let the labouring man compare lives with the luxurious, and his lot will be found on the whole to be the happier. "The sleep of a labouring man is sweet," says the Book of Ecclesiastes, "whether he cat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep." If work is not always happiness, certainly idleness is always misery.

And yet once more: there is a dignity too in work. God Himself works: works all days alike: works, as none else, without intermission and without repose. Else would the universe be broken up, order become again chaos, and life death. If Christ can say, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," such a sentence elevates at once the humblest toil, dignifies the meanest, and consecrates the commonest.

Now since work is thus universally God's ordinance for His creatures; even for His holy Angels who have never fallen; an ordinance on the whole beneficent, and destined (we trust) to be perpetuated even in that "new heaven and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness; an ordinance in the keeping whereof He Himself goes before, and calls upon man to be but His follower and imitator; it is plain that the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ could not leave this great topic untonehed; could not possibly fail to say something about work; about its place in the system of the Divine life in man; about its proper motive and method, about its duty, its blessing, and its reward.

The Gospel of Christ does not leave work out. On the contrary, it is full of it. And when we take now for our subject the brief but comprehensive thesis, Faith Working, we know not how to grasp or to handle it; so wide is its reach, so large its compass, so manifold its application.

Men have quarrelled oftentimes about Faith and Work. They have tried to set the one against the other, and asked which of the two it is which justifies. We shall not enter into that vexed question. We shall only say very briefly, that, where one of the two is certainly, there, as of course, is the other really. Faith which works not, is not, in God's sense, Faith: and work which springs not of Faith is not, in God's sense, work.

The two words, Faith Working, seem to remind us that there are other things which work besides Faith. Let us set before our minds, first of all, two or three of these other labourers in the great work-field of life, that we may see afterwards how they differ from their one Christian and Evangelical rival, which is the grace of Faith.

1. Nature works.

Sometimes in the mere consciousness of health and vitality. There is that in a man which will not and cannot be idle. If his position is such that he wants nothing; that he "has all and abounds" by no exertion of his own; wealth left to him from his forefathers, a home furnished and a table supplied from day to day by dependents whom he feels not the cost of lodging and feeding and paying for their service; then, rather than endure the wretehedness of utter inaction, he will make a toil even of his pleasures: he will "rise up early and late take rest," spend wearisome days for the sake of toil, that he may even deceive himself into the thought that he is busy, and escape that tedium of indolence against which he bears witness half unconsciously that it is the very foc of peace. Thus even Wealth works. The Esaus of a luxurious home will take their quiver and their bow, and go to the field day by day to hunt for their venison.

And certainly the opposite of Wealth works. Want works. A large part of the human family literally eats its bread in the sweat of its face. For how many millions of homes, at this moment, is the father of the family the winner of its bread, and the mother of the family the patient, uncomplaining, yet (to speak plainly) drudging housewife! Want works: works that it may live: works that it may supply life to those whom God has given to it as its own.

calls upon man to be but His follower and imitator; it is plain that the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ work—that "love of money" (in some one or other could not leave this great topic untouched; could not possibly fail to say something about work; a root of all evil?" When want is satisfied, wishing about its place in the system of the Divine life in begins. The lust of having is not filled with getting:

and to add this grain and that to an already heapedup store, is found as powerful an incentive to labour as that first urgency of necessity which made the man ask, "What shall I eat? and wherewith shall I be clothed?" Where is he who really knows when he has enough, or counts that a reason for repose, which he can possibly turn into a motive for labour?

And does not Ambition work? Men, on the one hand, who want nothing-men, on the other hand, who desire nothing-of the vulgar wealth of this world, will yet spend ceaseless toil upon the pursuit of honour. What is it which makes men politicians; whether in the small affairs of a town, or in the great interests of a nation? What is it which makes men willing to spend in a sultry arid city weeks and months of a glorious summer, which is enriching their distant fields and gardens with a beauty lost upon their possessor? Ambition-in one of its forms or in many-the ambition of fame, or the ambition of power, or the ambition of fashion, or the ambition of importance—this recouciles a man to anything: Ambition works: works with an earnestness and a devotion which it is hard sometimes to distinguish from self-sacrifice.

And does not Knowledge work—knowledge, and the thirst of knowledge? What is to come, in ten thousand cases, of all this accumulation of wisdom? For one man who rises to distinction by writing, thousands live laborious days and nights in reading: this appetite, like others, grows by indulgence; and every year sends to the grave many a mind filled with undivulged secrets of knowledge, and many a brain prematurely worn out by relentless and now profitless researches. Work has its victims as well as its votaries: and no insignificant portion of these are men who have martyred themselves in knowing.

Do we blame indiscriminately these workers who are not yet of Faith? Doubtless human life is the gainer by every kind and department of industry. The labourers of society are its benefactors. Better any work than any idleness.

And we must add yet one more to the list of workers; one which comes nearer than any before it to that of which we are in quest, and yet stops short of being that which alone is distinctively Christian.

Duty works. There are those who are brought day by day to the performance of the task set them, not by inclination, but in spite of it; not from a superabundance of energy which must have its vent, but rather with a conscious lack of energy which must be made up for by the mere sense of duty. There are men who would give much for repose: men, too, who might rest without wanting: men, too, for whom the world has found no honour -- whose business is uncongenial to them if not repulsive, and who ply it from youth to age without expectation of success or hope of change. And yet they work. Duty works, as well as want, or covetousness, or ambition, or the thirst of knowledge: Duty works also; works on principle; and seems at first sight to miss scarcely by a hair's breadth that higher, that highest attainment, the working of a principle which is not of this world, the spiritual gift and grace of faith.

2. Faith works.

And a very little consideration will show us some definite points in which the work of Faith differs from any of those industries of which we have hitherto spoken. The little Parable of the text will then be expounded, and we shall hear Faith saying, in reference to the life-work proposed to her, "Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after Him in whose sight I have found grace."

(1) The work of Faith looks within.

Nothing can be plainer, and yet nothing is more often forgotten, than that ont of the heart (in all senses) are the issues of life. "Out of the abundance of the heart the month speaketh." Speech, Christ says, is the mere overflow of the heart. And so action is nothing but the expression of an inward principle; the coming ont of something which first is within. These things, to a Christian, are self-evident. But when we go on to apply them, some dispute, some mistake, almost all evade them.

Life, we say, is seen by God in its spring. It is not the performance, by daily routine, of a certain number, nor even a certain kind, of separate acts. It is not the mere discharge of the offices which belong to the particular station in which God has placed us. It is not merely a careful attention to business, a studious regard to propriety, nor even the addition to these of a regular and decent attendance upon the ordinances of Divine worship. There is nothing, in any of these things, or in all of them, which necessarily implies there being anything left when this mortal husk and shell is stripped off from the soul which it encases. All these things may have been done and well done, and yet the immortal soul, when it has shuffled off its bodily circumstance, may find itself utterly unqualified (to say the least) for that standing before God, and still more for that dwelling with God, which is the thing which comes after death, the thing which is to be through eternity. The question, "What will you do in Heaven?" is one which may well sound with disquietude and consternation in many ears not of the profane or dissolute, not of the blasphemers of God or of the open injurers of man.

The work of Faith theu, unlike other works, begins within. Faith, which is the sight of the unseen, apprehends the existence of spirit, the possibility of regeneration, and the direct influence of Divine grace upon the heart and soul of man. It would not be faith—in the Christian sense—if it did not apprehend these mysteries. Before Faith can set out upon her gleaning, she must find grace in the sight of One unseen. One half of her work, and that the primary and the most essential, has to be done within. Not indeed that the outward work can stand still until the inward work is accomplished. Day by day a man must fulfil the duties which grow out of his circumstances. Nor would the inward work really be prospered by the suspension or postponement of the outward. Still we say that the inward comes first; first in importance, first (iu a sense) in order. No man's day's work will be interfered with by prayer and watching. On the contrary, the day is lengthened for effective labour by every moment taken from it at either end for deep communing and earnest wrestling with Him who is alike God of Nature, God of Providence, and God of Grace. Look well to the condition of that soul, the health of which, the prosperity of which, will evermore communicate itself to the work and to the life. Neglect that, and then, whatever else it may be, yours will not be the work of Faith: it will not have the benediction of God: there will be nothing of it left when the thoughts of earth perish.

(2) The work of Faith looks upward.

Faith does not make that broad and deep line, which some draw, between religious work and unreligious. And though we have spoken of the work of Faith as beginning within, this is not to be understood as though Faith first looked to the heart and then went out to attend to the life. Faith is a thing which "moves altogether where it moves at all;" pervades everything, and makes all things of one piece and colour: insomuch that Prayer is concerned much about matters of duty and conduct, and Action, in its turn, whatever it be, draws all its strength and vitality from the Divine communion.

The work of Faith, throughout, looks upward. Not in seasons of worship only. "I have set the Lord always before me: because He is on my right hand, I shall not be moved." The eye of Faith is upon God, even while the hand of Faith, and the foot of Faith, is moving among the things of this world.

We have scarcely yet expressed the particular thing now intended.

The motto of the work of Faith, in this respect, is a double motto. One part of it has been given: "I have set the Lord always before me." The other is, "I delight to do Thy will, O my God." The one is the spiritual side, the other the practical. "God is at my right hand"—that is the strength: "My work is God's will"—that is the motive.

What assurance, what quietness, what unity, what dignity, is given to my day's work, by just remembering that, whatever it is-however humble, or however difficult-however dull, or however suffering-it is the will of God! It is the will of God that the rich man should be bountiful, that the active man should be useful, that the public man should be patriotic, that the poor man should be provident, that the lawyer should be upright, the physician humane, the clergyman diligent. It is the will of God that I should this day go forth to my work and to my labour until the evening; furnishing my little quota to earth's toils and to man's happiness; serving my generation in the humble offices, at home and abroad, in which God has set me towards my fellows, until the long night cometh when I can no more work. It is the will of God that I should to-day pay this visit of courtesy or of charity, do this act of duty or kindness, read this book, write this letter, hold this converse; and I, because I have found grace in His sight—because He has so loved me as to give His Son to die for me, and so borne with me and had patience as to give me this added day of life, reason, and efficiency—I therefore "delight to do it: Lo, I come," like my Master before me, because "in the Volume of the Book" it is prescribed to me—I delight to do God's will, "yea, His law is within my heart."

Thus Faith looks upward in working.
(3) The work of Faith looks around.

It may be said of most, if not of all the workers before enumerated, that their toil was in a great degree selfish. The work of pleasure-seeking, and the work of money-getting, and the work of ambition, is essentially and altogether selfish. The work of necessity, of providing for a family, of keeping bread in the house and hunger from the household, has probably in it a large admixture of selfishness: at all events, if it looks beyond itself, it looks not beyond its own. The work of acquiring knowledge, unless it be sedulously guarded, is commonly, if not of necessity, a self-seeking labour. Even the work of duty-if it stops with duty-may centre in and be circumscribed by self. It is only Faith, which knows how to be really unselfish. If any of the other workers are so in any degree, it must be, we may venture to say, by an admixture, by the aid, of Faith. But of Faith it is written that it "worketh by love."

How is this?

Faith says, "Let me go now to the field, and glean ears of corn after Him iu whose sight I have found grace." The work of Faith is the imitation of Christ. The work of Faith is the following and gleaning after Christ. No words could be more expressive. It is but a gleaning which is left to Faith. The work of Christ Himself is the harvest. It is He who wrought entirely by love. It is He who carried unselfishness to its limit, and left to those who come after, only, as it were, "the gleaning grapes when the vintage is done."

But that Faith which looks within, and which looks above, does really look around also. Faith does look not only on her own things, but on the things of others. Faith does seriously contemplate the wants and the woes and the wickednesses which are making havoc of humanity, and has something truly of "that mind" in her "which was also" first and perfectly "in Christ Jesus."

The working of Faith is through love. "By this shall all men know" that ye have faith, "if ye have love one to another."

How is it then that any work of benevolence or charity stands still amongst us? How is it that institutions which have the love of man for their motive, and the good of man for their object, are left imperilled and in suspense, while we "run every man to his own house," and care not if the work of love, which is the work of God, stands still in mid course or fails to reach the goal?

In other words, "How is it that we have no Faith?" for the Faith which works not by love, is, in God's sight, a Faith which is not.

(4) The work of Faith looks onward.

Whatever is not seen is an object of Faith.

An Apostle teaches us that it is by faith that we apprehend even past things which we saw not. "By Faith we believe that the worlds were framed by the word of God:" things seen, out of things which appear not.

And so it is by Faith that we apprehend things within, and things above, and (in a certain sense) things around also. Because, when we speak of the aspect of Faith towards things around, we speak, evidently, not of material things, but of the true interests of mankind; just of those things which make little show, which force not themselves upon notice, or which, by the nature of the case, are incapable of doing so; bodies racked by pain in secret homes, or souls endangered by siu, where the chief malady is insensibility and silence.

But most of all is Faith exercised in things not only spiritual but future. "Faith is the substance (confidence) of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." The work of Faith looks onward.

Oftentimes would Faith faint if it had not an onward aspect.

Faith sees at present so few results. The labour of days and weeks and months and years seems all gone for nothing. "Then I said, I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength for nought and in vain." Not one life seems to have been altered by many expostulations, not one soul permanently benefited by rivers of tears or by mountains of efforts. How can I carry on this lost, this thankless labour? How can I persevere to the end in the toils of a love never repaid, never requited?

Now Faith has in itself the antidote of despair. Efforts are mine: results are God's. "Though Israel be not gathered, yet my God shall be my strength." He never promised a speedy success. He never promised a success which the vain workman could gloat over, or a triumph which should parade itself in spirits led captive. Faith is willing to wait for the day of God's power; willing to be lost and forgotten in the eventual ingathering. "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." Had Christ Himself counted His successes up to the moment when "He made His soul an offering for sin," eleven poor men, and a few faithful women, would have been the sum total of His achievement. Even after the miracle of Resurrection, and the forty days of His tarrying, "the number of the names together were" but "an hundred and twenty." Only by Faith could He Himself "see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied." Not even yet, eighteen centuries afterwards, does He see the kingdoms of this one little earth become actually the kingdoms of His reign and of His possession. He looked onward then: He looks onward still. "For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross:" for the joy still to be revealed He endures the long ages of an intercessory priesthood, strivings of grace, and mediatorial expectation. Even thus must it be—and well may it be—with the work of Faith below. "The disciple is not above his Master." What He counts worth the waiting for, well may we wait for, and not faint.

"These all died in faith, not having received the promises." But they had "seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them."

God grant us all that grace of patience, which is the very crown and glory of the work of Faith! What have we done for Christ, that we should expect to reap, while He is yet "awaiting the early and latter rain?" Looking within, that there be no rootless growth there; looking upward, that there be no forgetfulness of the source and spring of life; looking around, that there be no listless idling and no selfish complacency; let us look onward also, that there be no short-sighted reckonings and no irrational disappointments! Happy is he to whom it shall be said, "Go thou thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days!"

IV.—FAITH RESTING.

"I will lay me down in peace, and take my rest: for it is Thou, Lord, only that makest me dwell in safety."
—Psalm iv. 8.

THERE are two great and equal necessities of man's nature: Work and Rest.

A man cannot be happy without either, without both, of these. We must have work; and we must have rest.

Once the two things were one. An unfallen being finds repose in activity. In Heaven "there is no night." The will of God is done there, not only perfectly, but continually. Those holy spirits which behold the face of God, and are sent forth thence to minister to the heirs of salvation, could do but half, not half, of their office, if they took either night or day for rest from labour. "They rest not day nor night." They rest in working.

So shall it be, we doubt not, with us, when once the rest of the grave has removed all trace of the languors of earth, and the body of humiliation is transformed into that body of glory which never faints nor is weary either of the song of praise or of the office of love.

Meanwhile there is, for us, a divorce of the two things which God had joined together, work and rest. Work begins where rest ends: not until work is ended can rest begin. That is the condition of earth. "Man goes forth to his work and to his labour until the evening." When night comes, "no man can work."

We have spoken before of Nature Working, and of Faith Working. Now we are to speak of the Resting of Nature, and the Resting of Faith.

1. God our Father, merciful even to the fallen, has recognized an alternation of rest as a necessity of our being. It was God who "called the light Day," and set the greater of the "two great lights" to rule it. And it was God who "called the darkness Night," and left not even night unregarded in His provision for its comfort and its beauty. "So He giveth His beloved sleep." So He recruits exhausted energies, and testifies, not by voice but by sign, to the reality of His providence and the certainty of His judgment.

"Nature rests." Night by night she lies down to sleep, guarded by a hand denied or forgotten. She too is in God's keeping: even to her He leaves not Himself without a witness.

But there is a craving in man's heart for repose and relaxation, which this provision of natural sleep cannot satisfy. The want of Rest, the desire of Rest, the pursuit of Rest, lies deeper, and soars higher, and stretches further.

Where is the man who has not in his mind some project of rest? Not, necessarily, a rest of inaction; but at least a rest from weariness—whether it be the weariness of mere labour, or the weariness of monotony, of irksomeness, of compulsion.

The boy looks on to his holidays: not that he may do nothing: perhaps his holiday pursuits may be more vigorous than the occupations of school: but that he may get rid of constraints, please himself, do what he likes to do, and in that find rest.

And the man of mature age-is not he like him? Dull indeed is that life which has not some prospect, however indefinite, however remote, of repose. In early manhood, it may be the prospect of making for one's self a home-word full of rest! of venturing upon independence and marriage; of building a nest of safe and lawful felicity, in which all'shall be concord and comfort, blessing and love. Later on, it may take the form of planning for retirement. We begin to talk of the vanity of ambition, of the unsatisfactoriness of a life drained to the dregs in business, of the comfort of having now and then a half hour of idleness, of the pleasure of being able to look forward to a little command of time, an occasional change of scene, perhaps a little enjoyment of society, or (it may be) a little attention to the soul. At last it comes to a desire of repose, pure and simple. The old man drags himself unwillingly from his chair and his fire; prefers the day which has no mark upon it, and the night which comes between two night-like days.

There is, I say, a prospect and a project of rest—whatever we call rest—in all of us. What we call rest varies greatly with temperament, with circumstances, with habit, with age.

And as Rest in its simplest form is God's gift to us, and Rest in its highest form God's promise, so is Rest, in its widest sense, man's one motive; the spring of much that is noble in action, and of all that is base.

What is it which makes the Statesman careless of pleasure, the Scholar of society, the Philanthropist of money, the Missionary of home? Each is seeking rest—what he pictures as rest—what to him would be rest, might he but reach it! Fame, knowledge, good done, souls saved—each of these is a terminus—however various in value and in satisfaction: the last was so even to Him of whom Prophecy writes, "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied."

And again-to change abruptly to the very opposite-what is it which makes the spendthrift reckless of possession, the idler of success, the intemperate man of health, the immoral man of character? Is it that any one of these is really unaware of the amount which he is staking-of the utter, ruinous risk which he is running-when he yields to such habits, or even when he does the first acts which form them? No-but he is seeking rest: it is a want of his nature-and his, perhaps, is a low nature, and this is its idea of rest: day after day, night after night, he has the thirst of rest upon him-what we may truly call the lust of resting: and as he cannot go without his rest, and cannot wait God's time for it, or even reason's and wise men's time for it, he must seize it at once, and do yet again this thing which he knows, while he does it, to be folly and misery, sin and death.

Rest is Nature's end: and Nature makes for it in her own way; by a short road or a long one, according to her constitution, education, or caprice. If a man is wise, as man reckons wisdom, he is seeking rest: if a man is a fool, as God and man alike reckon folly, he is seeking his rest still!

2. We will leave these things here, and pass on to better. Our subject is, "Faith resting."

For, observe, the want of rest, and the desire of rest, and the pursuit of rest, is not wrong. God does not reprove any one of them. He only says, This is not your rest, and this is: this is a premature, a self-made, a fallacious and a fatal resting; and this other thing is a rest indeed for the soul, because it is a rest from Me and in Me. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Faith is the apprehension of that rest; the laying hold now upon the promise, the entering at last into the fruition. Faith which works is a Faith also which rests.

(1) There is a resting of Faith which is habitual. Faith rests while it works.

This is a peculiarity of the true Gospel. No false religion could teach it. Many human forms even of the true Gospel do not teach it. Many professed disciples of Christ Himself—men to whom the name of religious persons cannot be denicd—never learn it. True faith rests habitually; rests in working. It is a paradox; but a paradox full of truth, full of beauty, full of admonition.

When King Asa went out against Zerah the Ethiopian, and set the battle in array against overwhelming numbers, he cried to the Lord his God, and said, "Lord, it is nothing to Thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power: help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on Thee, and in Thy name we go against this multitude." Faith rested, while it wrought.

And when King Hezekiah saw the mighty host of Sennacherib coming to fight against Jerusalem, he said to his captains of war, "There be more with us than with him: with him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God, to help us, and to fight our battles. And the people," it is added, "rested themselves upon the words of Hezekiah king of Judah." It was an example of Faith resting (not after, but) in working.

The Gospel of Christ lavs great stress upon this point. What shall I do, asks an awakening conscience, to work the works of God? Surely some great feat of self-sacrifice; some "giving of my firstborn for my transgression;" some deed of selfmortification and self-crucifixion, after which the world shall be dead to me and I to the world; this surely must be the life to which God calls one who. being a sinner, would be an heir of salvation? Mark the answer. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." To work is to believe. To believe is to rest. "Say not in thine heart, Who shall go up for me into Heaven? or, Who shall descend for me into the deep? The word is very nigh thee. If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Faith is rest.

I scarcely know which of the two sides of the truth we are more prone to forget—Faith Working, or Faith Resting. To forget the one is to disobey: to forget the other is to disbelieve. Christ is all, one says: then I may be idle: without exertion of mine I am safe to enter. All is done: then to do anything is to supersede Christ. Work is faith—faith is rest—rest is relief from duty: "in returning and rest ye shall be saved." Terrible profaneness! Hence, as of course, utter carelessness, gross inconsistency, and great occasion given to the enemics of the Lord to blaspheme.

Another says, It is only by working with all my might that I can hope to secure an interest in Christ's salvation. If I do all my duty; if I live a life of great self-denial, of active charity, of utter unworldliness and perpetual devotion; then I may hope that God will at last accept me, give me a place in His kingdom, and set me on the right hand in the gathering of all nations. I must work as if all depended upon myself-work out my own salvation with fear and trembling-and then perhaps I shall find that Christ's merits at last cover me, and that God for His sake will forgive my sins, even mine. Words narrowly missing-but yet missingthe true tone of the Gospel! less mischievous, less pernicious, than the other, but still not the very truth itself; calculated to make life less happy, and conduct less vigorous, and religion less attractive, than God would have it to be; taking into account the one thing, Faith Working, but leaving out altogether the other, which is Faith Resting.

If Faith is to work effectually, it must rest habitually. It must rest while it works.

What does this mean?

Faith works not for salvation, but from salvation. It is not to save myself; and it is not to get a place in Christ's salvation; but it is because Christ has done all—because His work has in it the forgiveness of all sins, and the power of all workings; it is because, "if One died for all, then all died," and live henceforth no longer to themselves, but to Him who died for them and rose again—therefore it is that I work; and so working my soul rests upon Christ, even while mind and hand, strength and life, are busily occupied in working for Him.

If we would ever know real work, we must know real rest; resting from work even amidst work; resting in Christ while working for Christ.

(2) There is a resting of Faith which is occasional."

i. After long confusions and conflicts within, as to the true way of salvation, at last I see and I apprehend it. "Christ is all." He has made peace. He has brought in an everlasting righteousness. In Him God is well pleased. "In Him we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins." Can it be but that the soul, finding Him, should, for joy of that finding, rest and refresh itself, consciously, in the Lord?

ii. Doubt has returned. A book which has fallen in my way—the conversation of an unbeliever—something less palpable, a thought of unbelief, springing I know not whence within—has caused me new perplexity, new searchings of heart. What am I to think of Christ? "Art Thou He that should come?" or must I still look out, as of old, for some one who shall come—or perhaps never come—to be the Saviour of sinners and the Light of the world? At last the clouds disperse, and I see "above the brightness of the firmament" a form like that of the Son of God in Heaven. The "clear shining after rain" has been vouchsafed to me, and Faith has rest and is edified.

iii. I have passed through a sore fight of temptation. It seemed as though hell had opened herself for my ruin. The old days of carelessness and ungodliness never presented to me proposals so terrible. The careful and watchful and even mournful walking of months and years seemed to have gone for nothing. I found no place for the sole of my foot amidst the morasses and quagmires and precipices of unbelief, sensuality, and presumption, by which I was surrounded. It was as if the Saviour's history were being re-enacted in me-"I was there in the wilderness, tempted of Satan-I was with the wild beasts"-every ugly and rapacious creature, of lust and uncleanness, beset me with its howlings-"refuge failed me-I had no place to flee unto-no man cared, for my soul." In my anguish

I cried to the Lord. My new weapou, All-Prayer, turned the fight in my favour: the encounter brought me to my knees—but I neither yielded, nor fled, nor fell. Then was fulfilled in me my Master's experience: "Then the devil leaveth Him, and, behold, Angels came and ministered unto Him." After conflict, waged bravely by faith, waged manfully in Christ's name, comes of His grace a special repose: "hardly bestead and hungry," Faith then reposes herself upon Him, and takes her rest.

iv. So is it sometimes after great labour. We have undertaken some work which is all for God. Ashamed of the idleness and self-indulgence which has so long bound and debased us; feeling the wickedness of such a return for the self-forgetting self-sacrificing love of Christ; seeing the days passing away, and nothing done, nothing even attempted, to bring Him one life, one soul, for His travail even unto death for us; we did at last arouse ourselves by the help of prayer, and calling Him in, went forth into the vineyard to bear something of "the burden and heat of the day." The toil was at first difficult: flesh and blood rebelled, Satan opposed, conscience misgave me: but I persevered; persevered unto weariness; came back at late evening, faint and hungry: but Faith strengthened and brightened within me as I stood before the Lord to report to Him of my poor endeavours: I found Him nearer to me when I thus began to treat him as a Person, as One who had work for me and would receive my reckoning: that night I was able to say, as never before, "I will lay me down in peace, and take my rest: for it is Thou, Lord, only, that makest me dwell in safety."

v. And there are restings of Faith, not in the inward experience, but in the outward circumstances of this life.

It pleases God now and then to break the clouds of an ordinarily monotonous or even trying existence by a gleam of positive and lively joy. When I have begun to say, All things are against me-I am marked out and written down for sorrow-I aloue of all men have an unchequered unrelieved portion of suffering-there comes something to me -a small thing many would call it, but to me it is not small-which stirs my stagnant pool of being into bright, vivid, sparkling waves: the ray may be phosphoric, meteoric, fleeting-but it served a purpose: it said to me, Thy God, after all, is a God of love: as often as it is safe, or as soon as it is safe for thee, all shall be joy: wait but a little, wait and faint not, and "thy good things" shall replace the evil: the hand over thee is grace and goodness: soon shalt thou find it so, and that for ever. Faith rests, and is comforted.

And sometimes, on the other hand, it is not in joy, but in sorrow, that the rest comes. Are there not amongst us some who can tell of the deep peace, the entire calm which dwells in a chamber darkened even by death? During the long days and nights of watching, it seemed hard to say, "Thy will be done." The sight of the suffering was anguish; the prospect of the end intolerable. But it was to be—and at last it was. The offices of the nurse and of the physician were ended together. A sad sense of uselessness seemed to settle upon the loving household. There was nothing any longer to be done: only endurance, only blank patience—and that for ever. Yet scarcely has the thought entered, than there comes with it another also. He is at rest. He is happy. No more pain—no more conflict—no more anxiety—no more sin. I shall go to him—soon at the latest. Even now we can meet in Christ. All the family, in Heaven or on earth, is at one there. Faith rests—and out of bitterest sorrow draws sweetest strength.

vi. And it would be ungrateful if we added not yet one to these occasional restings of Faith: one which depends not upon any circumstance, inward or outward, of human life, but is provided everywhere, of God's goodness, in that blessed communion and fellowship which is the Church and body of Christ. When Faith droops, under the pressure of things temporal, whether adverse or prosperous, how often does it draw newness of vigour from obeying the call, "Let us go to the house of the Lord," or the charge, "Do this in remembrance of me!" It is only presumption-it is not faith-which can dispense with these things. Christ judged better for us, as men not of the world but yet in it, when He bade us not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, promised to be with even two or three thus gathered, and affixed a peculiar grace to the petition in which two should agree. If Faith would know what is meant by her resting, she must frequent, with earnestness and large expectation, the "table provided in the wilderness;" the feast of which it is written, that, when Jesus took bread and blessed it, and gave to them, "their eyes were opened, and they knew Him." Faith, struggling elsewhere, rests here. "Handle me, and see."

(3) Lastly, as there is a resting which is habitual, and a resting which is occasional, so also there is a resting of Faith which is final.

Few words are needed to set this before us.

For we speak now of that last act of all, by which Faith is at once crowned, and dethroned; consummated, and superseded; made ripe for fruition, and swallowed up in sight.

In life it is the work of Faith which has predominated. Faith has had to run a race, to wage a warfare, to subdue a foe. It has had to accomplish a great task: no less than that of turning a life of nature into a life of spirit, and making a world of sense a very gate of heaven. It has had to make a poor fallen being into the preserving salt and the transforming light of its fellows. These things might be done indeed—if rightly done, they were done—in a spirit of resting: but they were themselves works of toil. Therefore during days of health and activity Faith Working has preponderated of necessity over Faith Resting.

At last sickness comes. It may be in age, or it may be in youth. Oftentimes "in the midst of life"—oftentimes in the very spring-time of life—"we are in death." But whenever it comes—the decisive, the final sickness—it brings with it one call—one trial, one necessity, one only possibility—a call to rest. Nothing can now be done but to lie still. And is that, think we, so easy? Visit a bed of death, and see whether even patience, whether even submission—much more, whether affiance, whether faith—is the grace of every man! O, we see then the truth of the saying, "And that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God!" To rest on the Lord then, is just as "impossible with man," as it is in life to work for God.

But Faith—the man of Faith—can do it. He thinks this one of the chief blessings, one of the chief evidences too, of Christ's Gospel, that it never sets a man to do anything impossible; that its demand is always appropriate; its call exactly suitable to youth and age, to health and sickness, to life and to death. To him now it says only these two words, Faith, rest! Lie still, and look upward. What has been left undone, canuot now be done: rest it upon Christ. What has been ill done cannot now be amended: rest it upon Christ. What has been done amiss cannot now be undone: rest it upon Christ. Lean all thy weight upon Him. He is sufficient. He has borne all. Trust Him, and doubt not. He will undertake for thee. It is enough.

And so that Faith which has rested habitually—that Faith which has rested occasionally—rests now finally. My flesh sliall rest in hope. I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness. I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep—sleep, God willing it, the long sleep—for it is Thou, Lord, only, that makest me dwell in safety. All live unto Thee—the dead and the living. Death does but withdraw the veil, the slight thin veil, between the seen and the unseen, between sense and spirit, between the soul and Christ. I shall "dwell in safety" still, if I "sleep in Jesus."

The restings of Faith are ended: the rest of sight is begun.

V.—FAITH FIGHTING.

"When I ery unto Thee, then shall mine enemies turn back: this I know; for God is for me."—Psalm lvi. 9.

LIFE is at once a field of work and a field of battle. It is so for Nature: it is not less so for Grace. The Faith which works is a Faith also which fights. "Every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon." The same Apostle who wrote to one of his congregations, "I remember your work of Faith," wrote also to one of his friends, "Fight the good fight of Faith," and so "lay hold on eternal life."

Faith Working describes but one-half of life's whole activity. Now we are to add the other: Faith Fighting.

1. "From wheuce come wars and fightings among you?" St. James asks—asks of a nominally Christian community—and answers this question by another: "Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?"

Thus he introduces to us the thought of Nature fighting; and warns us too that Nature may fight still even in those who by profession and privilege are children of grace.

There are two fruitful sources of discord in the world, heathen or Christian, of the fallen Adam. They might be traced, doubtless, up to one. But in practice they are distinguishable: Selfishness and Pride. St. Paul deals with both of them in his Epistle to the Philippians. He speaks of those who "seek their own," and charges Christian people not to look on their own things, but also on the interests of others. He speaks also of doing things "through vainglory;" and bids Christians "in lowliness of mind to esteem each the other as better than themselves." And these two cautions he connects with his call to unity. In other words, he points out selfishness and pride as the two chief sources of Nature's fightings.

(1) There is an object in view, attainable but by one, and two would have it.

It may be office—it may be emolument—it may be honour.

Hence, at once, discord. Out of selfishness, fightings. Eagerness, ambition, covetousness, partyspirit, efforts to outstrip by interest or to trip up by calumny, to circumvent by intrigue, or to damage by slander—and a whole world of warfare is instantly kindled by throwing into it one spark of that provocation which is the self, the fallen self, of Nature.

And so in a thousand smaller or less visible workings.

Every trade, every profession, every social circle, has its own selfishnesses, and as a necessary consequence its own fightings. In a certain sense, in all these things, every man's hand is against his brother's. Every man's gain is another's loss. One man cannot succeed, but another suffers. And although there is a Christian way of bearing these defeats, and even of subduing these dispositionsand a worldly way also, either imitated from the Christian, or else framed upon calculations of selfinterest and personal comfort, preventing the display or even the fostering of those enmities which spring and strive and war within-still there is also, on the whole, a vast amount of commercial and professional and social jealousy seething below the calm surface of conventional propriety, and from time to time sending to the surface one of those bubbles of rancorous bickering, which may be evanescent in their nature, but are at least noisy in the explosion and mischievous in the consequences.

Selfishness fights.

(2) And Pride too has its fightings.

How many of our divisions are distinctly trace-

A person thinks himself slighted. He has not been consulted, as he ought to have been, on some practical question. Or he was not consulted first, or perhaps not last. Or, though consulted, he was not followed. An adverse or a different opinion prevailed. Or, in consultation, some disparaging half-contemptuous expression was dropped by another. I had no reply ready, and the success rested with him. Pride was wounded, and discomfort, soreness, unfriendliness, was the result. "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" Often from wounded pride.

Or not in business but in society offence has been given and taken. Some one else took precedence of me in a festive gathering. The host gave it him. As small a thing as this has caused a breach and a hostility! Or some one has been wanting in paying me the courtesy of a visit, or in returning the civility of mine. Or a slighting word was dropped, the other day, concerning me in the house of a friend-dropped, and not resented. Or an idle tale was told of me, by one who ought to have known better. Or a change of manner is perceptible in some one towards me, which can proceed, certainly, from nothing but from having heard something against me. Pride broods over the suspicion, and nurses it into a settled resentment. The ignorant, unsuspecting, innocent cause is never told of it, and sleeps securely upon the volcano of his own unconscious kindling!

I have only just prefaced my real subject with these experiences of the life of this world, because they serve to illustrate, by contrast, the soul's warfare, and to show us how different is the use which Christ would have us make of that principle of combativeness and of pugnacity which the heavenly Artificer set in us from the beginning.

It is not wrong to fight-but with whom? in what armour? with what weapons? for what prize?

2. "Fight the good fight of Faith." Volumes might be written, and the subject scarcely touched still.

Take into view just three particulars.

(1) Faith descrying.

Celebrated pictures of great commanders show them to us in the use of the telescope or descryingglass. They are looking out. They are observing the enemy. They cannot plan, they can still less act, till they see the foe and his dispositions. It is so with Faith.

We have seen what are the foes of Nature. They are those persons who threaten to interfere with my earthly interests. They are those persons who have disparaged, or whom I suspect of wishing to disparage, my honour, or importance, or ability, or worldly position. Are these the foes of Faith?

Faith, which is the sight of the unseen, may be expected to discern, through her descrying-glass, a Nature, fallen Nature, discovers by her reconnoitring. And it is so.

"We wrestle," St. Paul says, "not against flesh and blood." The confounding, still more the interchanging, of friend and foe, has been in all times a fruitful source of defeat. In the mist of the foggy November morning the soldiers of England at Inkerman could not at first know the Russian from the Frenchman. And the position itself might have been sacrificed to that confusion. It is just so in the conflict between the human soul and its enemies.

All tempters approach us in disguise. If we could see their features as God and good Angels see them, there would be in them no attractions. We should see in the smile of love the grin of malice: we should perceive in the "word smoother than oil," the "very sword" of hatred and hostility.

But of this discernment Nature is incapable. That which offers me present indulgence must be my friend. That which tells me unwelcome truths must be my foe.

We might almost say that Faith reverses this judgment. So much reason has she for suspiciou of present seeming, that she almost says, I may judge of friend and foe inversely by the profession. It was to Elijah that Ahab said, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" He said not so Faith fighting is, first of all, Faith descrying.

Now when Faith sets herself thus to discriminate friend and foe, she perceives but one real enemy, and that is Sin. She does not wage war with flesh and blood. Faith does not bid me to count as my enemy the man who has gained this or that prize for which I had been a candidate-not this or that person who has outrun me in the race of this world -this commercial, or that professional, or that social rival, whose business has prospered beyond mine, whose skill or whose talent has been acknowledged by a wider circle or a more unanimous verdict. That is Nature's foe possibly: but it is not the antagonist of Faith. Faith sees in such persons a friend in disguise. One who has been ordained of God to humble pride, to reprove selfconfidence, and to make vanity in its own eyes contemptible. The one enemy of Faith is Sin.

But the armies of that one enemy are marshalled under three chief captains. And though the word of command is one, and the object of the war one, and the plan of campaign also one, still Faith finds it necessary to recognize a division too, and to prepare herself for the conflict in different departments and aspects.

i. The first of these is the world. The gaze of Faith being stedfastly fixed upwards and onwards -upward toward the throne of God, onward toward the eternal future-she must, of course, regard as hostile any influence which drags her downwards, and any influence which enchains her in the predifferent kind of antagonists from those whom sent. Now it is the one object of the world to effect this. The sin of the world is not in saying that that is pleasant which is not pleasant, or that painful which is not painful. Faith does not expect the world to say that a life of obscurity and dulness is more enjoyable or more attractive than a life of eminence and bustle and public fame. It would be a falsehood if it did say so. The error of the world, and the falsehood of the world, lies in bidding us choose the pleasanter and the easier, in place of the more difficult and the more enduring. The sin of the world consists in making the seen and the temporal more real and more important than the invisible and the eternal.

That then is the first of the foes of Faith. And observe, it needs Faith to descry it as such. Any one except the man of Faith would view it differently; would hail as a friend and an auxiliary that which Faith repels as an enemy in disguise.

ii. Just so is it with the second-the flesh. Faith is well aware that it is more pleasant to humour the flesh than to crucify it. More pleasant to sit still and enjoy, than to go forth and labour. More pleasant to imbibe the sweet syrup of lust, than to refuse and repel it as an honeyed poison. More pleasant to live luxurious days and sleep delicious nights, than to rise early and late take rest, in doing the work of God, and bearing forth upon the shoulder the sharp cross of Christ. Faith is as necessary to descry this foe as to encounter it.

iii. And the devil. Does he come, did he come in Paradise, as an open enemy-as one who brings fire in his hand, and hell in his promise? Is it more pleasant, at the moment, to think a devil's thought -of resentment, of anger, of malice, of revenge-or to repel it? Is it more pleasant, at the moment, to retaliate or to forgive a wrong-to say the bitter word, to vent the angry retort, or to suppress it-to utter the convenient hie which suggested itself, or to smother and bury it, and say the truth? Is it always easy, on the instant, to keep down the thought of murmuring and discontent at God's dealings with you in his Providence or in His grace -to refuse to think of Him as a hard taskmaster or a relentless judge—to say, as each new anxiety arises, "Thy will be done"-or, as every successive stroke falls, "He doeth all things well?"

It is Faith-it is not Nature-which descries the real foe under the pretended friend, and wages war, not with flesh and blood-not with an irksome duty, and not with an unwelcome Providencebut rather with sinful inclination, with a perverse will, and with "spiritual wickednesses in high places."

(2) Faith arming.

When Faith has descried her foe, she must prepare to meet him.

And special directions are given her with a view to this preparation.

"Take unto you," St. Paul says, "the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day."

One or two things must be noticed.

i. Faith must arm before the battle.

Many persons say, It will be time enough to resist when temptation comes.

St. Paul says, He who waits to arm himself till then, will be defeated and captured.

ii. The armour of Faith-with one, if one, exception-consists of habits; principles of good-in other words, graces of the Spirit-which he who would have once must have always.

A person says, How hard that I should fall, when I prayed so earnestly!

Yes, but were you armed beforehand? Was the habit of your life Christian? Or did you expect to get straight and direct from God's treasure-house, for one single wearing, armour which you had never essayed and never proved?

iii. Look then at the armour. Not to discourage -but to humble, and to instruct.

Truth. "The loins girt about with truth." We understand by this, sincerity. Reality of character: earnestness of purpose: thoroughness of devotion. Many have all save just this. Many regrets, many resolutions: strong impulses, fervent aspirations, zealous endeavours: only just not Truth. The girdle which binds all together is wanting: the garments hang loose and discinct, the man rushes into the battle, not one but many.

Righteousness. "Having on the breastplate of righteousness." Ah! some would put instead of this-what is more easily fancied or counterfeitedthe imputation of a theological justification! No wonder! But what Faith wants for her breastplate, is something which may indeed spring out of this-which can only spring out of a living trust in the completed work of Christ-yet is not this. It is that safeguard-practically speaking-of au habitual endeavour "to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and man," which St. Paul is not afraid to call here the Christian breastplate, and elsewhere, yet more strongly, "the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left."

Readiness. "Your feet shod with the preparation (readiness) of the Gospel of peace."

One man wants the girdle-another the breastplate-another the sandals. To how many a man, not otherwise unhopeful, might we give the old surname of "the Unready!" I ought to have seized the opportunity-but it escaped me. I ought to have availed myself of that opening for a word of counsel-but I was not ready, and the door closed. I ought to have answered on the instant that taunt, that innuendo, of the infidel-but I was not ready: the conversation changed before I spoke, and the honour of Christ my Lord lay there unvindicated. I ought to have hastened to that bed of sickness, to that house of mourning: but I was not ready, and before I went, sickness was again health, or sorrow was again forgetfulness.

So with the rest. Each part of the armour-I have spoken but of three parts-must be put on beforehand; before the battle begins; before that fiery trial which will try every man's faith of what sort it is.

(3) Faith engaging. Faith in conflict.

The foe is ascertained—and Faith is armed to meet him. The moment of action is come.

This action itself may be twofold. There is the action of defence, and there is the action of aggression. Faith may await the onset—or Faith herself may charge.

i. Faith defensive is Faith tempted.

Holy Scripture abounds in examples of the conflict of Faith with the tempter.

There is the noble Hebrew youth resisting the solicitations of a wicked Egyptian matron, with the unanswerable, the impregnable question, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?"

There is the great Hebrew lawgiver learning in early manhood the lesson of future strength, when he refuses to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, because he counts the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, having respect to the recompense of the reward.

There are the three faithful Israelites under the shadow of the giant empire of Babylon, refusing to worship the great golden image, because they know that the God whom they serve can, if He will, deliver them from the fiery furnace—and because, if not, if He wills not to deliver them, they can obey and trust Him still.

There is the heroic Hebrew Prophet firm to worship God as he did aforetime, because, though the writing is signed against him, he cannot forego the wonted communion, and knows that, if he be given to death here, he shall obtain a better resurrection.

These are all examples of Faith Fighting.

And there is one greater still.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, coming to bear all our sorrows, must be in all points tempted like as we are. In body, in soul, in spirit-by appetite, by ambition, by presumption-in the most insidious because the most refined and elevated of all forms -He is subjected to the influence of temptation. To change stones into bread for his own support; to take to Himself the kingdoms of the earth, and reign at once; to rely upon the protecting care of God, and "for the more confirmation of the faith" cast Himself unhurt from the pinnacle of the Temple; such is the temptation which Faith, in Him, endured and vanquished; vanquished not more in our stead than as our example; vanquished each time in the strength of that Word of God, which is, for us also, the one offensive weaponthe sword of the Spirit, two-edged, and "turning every way," for the discomfiture of the tempter and the protection of the soul.

It is with the defensive warfare of Faith that we are all primarily concerned. For one man who has to wage any aggressive warfare, a thousand and ten thousand must repel for their soul's sake the assaults of the devil. And where amongst us is he who can do this? Even of Christian men how many stand upright when Satan strongly assails? Who is there who does not mix together too often the allurements of inclination and the promises of the Gospel—weakly yield or timidly flee when sin tempts, and only hope afterwards that, nevertheless, God will forgive?

Not so does Faith. She calls in the help of God, and knows that, when she calls, her enemies will be put to flight, because God Himself, the Almighty, is on her side.

It is indeed chiefly thus-chiefly by earnest. resolute, determined Prayer-that Faith itself conquers. "Praying always, with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance." We have spoken of the previous arming; of those principles and habits of the soul which must be formed in us and fostered before the special conflict begins. But how are these habits of grace themselves formed in any man? Is it not by daily, by persevering prayer-prayer begun in much weakness, amidst many wanderings of thought and many interruptions of unbelief-but adhered to, and persisted in, till at last an answer came-an answer of hope and peace within, an answer of help and strength without? And of what avail would even habits of grace be, in the emergency of a strong temptation, without a present God, and without a real grace, called in and apprehended at the moment by special, eager, importunate prayer? A man of Faith must be a man of Prayer. By prayer he believes, and by prayer prevails: prayer is the very link between Faith and God, between the soul that is all weakness and the God who is Omnipotent strength. "My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness."

ii. But is Faith then, Christian Faith, to be always and altogether defensive? Is it enough that she should repel attack, and never wage, herself, an aggressive warfare?

It would be well indeed if none allowed themselves to attack, who have not first learned to repel. It would be well, if only they advanced to the decisive, the final charge, who had first tried, in themselves, the temper of their Divine weapon, and found it allsufficient to save themselves from death.

But when this is done; when the life has been redeemed and cleansed from sin; when the soul is given to the Lord who bought it, to be a living and a life-long sacrifice to His glory; then there must be something done—ill were it for the world else—to carry the war into the enemy's country; to show forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into His marvellous light, by the living example of a holy life, and by the persuasive influence of a consistent devotion. Faith must not repel only—she must at last charge also.

Where should we have been—where would have been this Church of England, with her ordinances of worship and her influences of good—if the first Apostles of truth had been faithful only in resisting temptation—if they had never risen to the help of the Lord against a mighty world and a mightier spirit of evil?

It is not enough, anywhere or in any age, that we live in the enjoyment of Christian privileges, and think not how to hold out the lamp of life to the millions still sitting in darkness. What are we doing—what am I doing, let each one ask himself—to make the warfare of Faith not defensive only but aggressive too?

"And this I say, brethren, the time is short."
Let each one set himself something—if it be but a little thing—in the way of a warfare to be waged in Christ for God. God gives us a wide choice of our field of service: only let us all enlist ourselves under His banner, and in some manner, and in some place—at home or abroad—in the cause of piety or of charity—in the service of the evangelisation of our country, or of its rescue from some of the terrible moral evils which drag it down unto perdition—set ourselves to fight the good fight of Faith, and to lay hold, in so doing, on eternal life.

So, at last—when our time comes, and the shadows of earth must be exchanged for the realities unseen—ours shall be the experience written down for all time by the great Apostle and Evangelist of nations, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day;" the day of the restitution and the refreshing—of the final discomfiture of evil, and the everlasting triumph of good.

VI.—FAITH CONQUERING.

"He shall overcome at the last."-Gen. xlix. 19.

In the race of life there are many runners for one victor. In the battle of life there are many combatants for one conqueror.

Every generation, every profession, every place, almost every family, has its disappointed men as well as its successful. Wide as the world is, it is not wide enough for a universal success: there must be obscurity, there must be failure, there must be defeat, or the race of man would be an army of generals, with none to follow them, and uone to obey.

Now is there any characteristic quality which either prognosticates or explains a career of earthly success? Is there any sense in which we can speak of Nature Conquering, so as to furnish an illustration, whether in the way of likeness or contrast, of our present subject, which is Faith Conquering?

A man looking back, from middle or later life, upon the companions of his boyhood, will not only be ready to moralize upon their fortunes, but able also, roughly at least, to generalize and account for them.

He will recall one, perhaps, who had singular advantages of mind, of body, and of estate. He was the envy and admiration of his fellows: quickness of apprehension, versatility of intellect, readiness of expression, wonderful health, spirits, and activity; in addition to these, high birth, an ample fortune, a wide circle of friends—everything in possession, and everything in prospect to secure success: where is he now? Outstripped in the race by competitors whom once he despised; ruined, long years past, slowly by indolence, or suddenly by vice; pitied now as he once was envied—or not even pitied—just put aside, passed by, overlooked, and forgotten.

So then none of these things are securities for success, speaking at present only of this world's struggles. A man may have every gift of nature, and yet be, even in these competitions, nowhere and nothing!

Another, little known and little noticeable in youth, has risen to great eminence. He has utterly baffled the calculations of early friends: they can scarcely reconcile themselves to a reversal so complete of their expectations and judgments. At each step of his advancement they have talked of accident; of the chances of life, and the caprices of fortune. And yet, perhaps, if we knew all, we should scarcely find any place at all in human life for such influences as these. On reflection, you will probably find that that man of unlooked-for success had in him at least three qualities, the sum of which in their developed maturity was the cause, humanly speaking, and the sufficient explanation of his triumph.

The first of these was resolution. That man could set before himself an object. He did not run uncertainly, nor, in fighting, did he beat the air. He saw distinctly the goal for which he would start, and the nature of the prize which hung upon it. He willed, he resolved, he determined, to succeed. He did not allow himself to multiply or to change his objects. His motto was, This one thing I do. This thing is my choice, and to this I will adhere. Resolution.

The second quality was good sense. He sought his one end by prudent means. He did not allow himself to be misled by appearances nor diverted by speculations. He judged with calm and steady gravity what would, and what would not, day by day, advance him towards his end. There were many who said to him, This is the way: this bypath will be a short cut to your object: this present offer will shorten your toil by years, and bring you at once to notice and to distinction. He knew better. Good sense guided each step, as resolution had set him in the way.

The third quality was perseverance. As he knew that the way was long, he was not dauuted by finding it so. He was prepared for delays, he was prepared for difficulties; he was prepared for impediments, and he was prepared for disappointments. He took these as things of course. They did not affect his expectation. He would succeed still, for all that. Toil long and patient, toil constant and arduous, was to him but one of the conditions upon which he started in the race of life. Without perseverance he would have failed, whatever his resolution and whatever his good sense. The three together form one of those triple cords of which the wise man says that they are not quickly broken. The three together form that character which Christ Himself set in sorrowful contrast with that of too many of His own disciples, when He said, "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light."

And we might go on to speak, not of the successes of this life, but of other achievements and conquests, of which, nevertheless, it must be said that they are victories not of grace but of nature.

For example-

Pride will cast out many sins. There are many weaknesses and many meannesses over which pride will gain an easy success. Many a lust of the flesh has been precluded, or else broken off, by wounded self-love or mortified vanity. A man will not stoop to accept an unwilling affection: a man will not demean himself to solicit where he has been refused or slighted. There is such a thing as Pride Conquering.

And Ambition will cast out many sins. A man bent upon being the great man of his generation will not waste himself upon light trivialities of worldliness or loose extravagances of passion: he will reserve himself for higher things, and not risk for minor self-indulgences the attainment of his real end, his great prize—it also of the earth and earthly! There is such a thing as Ambition Conquering.

And Affection, lawful love, will cast out many sins. A man without religion will be kept faithful by a sincere attachment. A man who fears not God will forfeit comfort, will risk life itself, for the defence or rescue of wife or child. Selfishness has been overborne and vanquished by a mightier force of love. It is not Divine love only, it is sometimes human love and earthly, which is mighty and all-prevailing. There is such a thing as Affection Conquering.

And yet, great as are the achievements of nature, they are as nothing in comparison with the victories of grace. At the best they are bounded by time: at the best they win a corruptible crown. Turn from them to look at our present subject—which is Faith Conquering. See what Faith conquers, and see how Faith conquers: and then we shall understand the saying that is written, "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

Faith Conquering.

Out of a vast subject we must select just a few particulars.

1. Faith triumphant in Doubt.

The Gospel is a Revelation. It is the telling of a secret. It is the clearing away of mists and clouds which hang around man's destiny and God's pur-

It is the bringing of life and immortality to pose. light. It is the disclosure of a mystery buried in silence from eternal times. Never let us so speak as if the Gospel had added to man's perplexities, or made that dark or darker which was light or comparatively light before. These are representations of the matter, at once ungrateful and false. The mysteries of the Gospel are all, so far as they go, revelations. They are all, so far as they go, secrets told, not secrets kept. There is not one mysteryin the human sense of the word-either about man or about God, which has been either caused or aggravated by the Gospel. Doubtless there are matters not yet revealed. There are unexplained, perhaps inexplicable, difficulties, as regards God's will and man's future, which the Gospel leaves where it found them. It is of the very nature of sin and a Fall to create such difficulties. And God might give us ten Gospels, and not remove these. All we say is, that the Gospel of Christ causes none of these, and clears away many.

Many, but not all. So many as lay really in the way of man's access to God; but not those which lay in the way of man's speculations about God. That is the distinction. God by the Gospel taught us the way of salvation: but God did not teach us, by any of His revelations, that which might have gratified curiosity, but which it could not assist duty, to know concerning Himself.

More than this. Every fresh accession of light not only leaves a fringe and border of darkness around it, but makes us more conscious of the extent and of the density of that darkness. Therefore it is that many questions trouble an enquiring Christian, which do not seem to have troubled an enquiring Jew. The very fact of knowing so much makes us impatient of not knowing more. A thousand questions remain unanswered concerning the power of God, the justice of God, and the goodness of God, which all the more exercise the patience or even burden the conscience of a Christian, because God has told him so much, and because Christ has come to be the Light of the World and the Justifier of the ways of God to man.

Now Faith, the sight of the invisible-Christian faith, which is the sight of the invisible God in Christ-must needs have an office to discharge in reference to these difficulties and these perplexities. It was so from the beginning. The Apostles themselves felt this, when they were first called to believe in the possibility, in the fact, of a Resurrection. "When they saw Him, they worshipped Him: but some doubted." Did they not worship? Did doubt preclude faith? Rather faith triumphed in and over doubting: and they who could not explain, and they who could not understand, yet felt themselves to be in the presence of a mightier and more convincing reality, and even where they could not see they could adore and they could believe still!

So is it now. A man keenly sensible of difficulties—a man on whose very soul lie the burdens of a thousand unreconciled contradictions-a man who feels that he would give all that he possesses for one ray of solution and of explanation-is no hypocrite, and no unbeliever, if he still calls Christ his Saviour, offers before Him all the powers and dedicates to Him all the capacities of his being. His doubts are as nothing in comparison with his evidences. Is he to give up Christ, and go back into the outer darkness of sin unforgiven and heaven unopened, because he cannot fathom the deep abyss of a Trinity in Unity, or combine in one logical theory the two opposite necessities, of a responsible man and an Omnipotent God? If he can find a lamp for his feet and a light for his steps; if he can find a Saviour worthy of his devotion, and a spirit omnipresent to guide; he must be content to wait for explanations till he reaches a land where there is neither temptation nor weakness; a life in which the intellect may expand itself in God's presence, and the soul drink in knowledge at the fountainhead of God's truth. In the meantime Faith triumphs amidst doubtings; and when Christ asks, "Will ye also go away?" is content to answer, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

2. Faith triumphant in Disappointment.

It is the natural thought of one who enters seriously upon a life of Faith, that of course Faith will conduct him straight to victory. He has only to call Christ in, and success must be sure. Whether he set himself to the conquest of sin or to the performance of duty; whether he wrestle with a besetting temptation, or gird on his armour for conflict with opposing wickedness; in either, in any case, if the Gospel be true, he will find himself strong for victory. And thus he goes forth into the battlefield of life, outward or inward; begins his warfare with pride, with evil temper, with murmuring, with indolence, with sin, with self; or else, at the appointed hour, sets himself to seek, abroad, the opposing demon of carelessness or ungodliness, of intemperance or cruelty; visits the homes of the poor, full of the sincere desire to carry into them the illuminating light, the irresistible power, of Christ's Gospel; nothing doubting, that his Master still lives, still works, as swift to hear as He is strong to save. But what is the issue? Within, it is as though what before was an influence, became now a possession, of evil: never till he began to resist did he feel what was the strength, what the malignity, what the pertinacity, of sin. It seems almost as though his prayers were answered by contraries; as if, when he asked for strength, he was endued with weakness; when he implored victory he was recompensed with defeat. Never before was he so severely tempted: never before did he more shamefully fall. Evil temper, evil desire, sinful indolence, repugnauce to duty-each in its turn seems to be let loose upon him, "as it were a ramping and a roaring lion." More than ever before, "when he would do good, evil is present work of good for others-whether it be to teach the young, or to minister to the sick, or to reason and remonstrate with the wicked-he is ready to call himself a hypocrite and a deceiver. What is he, that he should work the work of God? And in attempting that work, what does he effect? What becomes of his labour? Can he point to one home brightened, one life altered, or one soul saved, by his ministry? It is discouragement, disappointment, defeat, every part of it. If he looks within, all is weakness and darkness: if he looks without, all is lost labour, mere vanity and vexation of spirit.

But Faith, if it be Faith, triumphs still. umphs amidst, and triumphs over, baffled hopes and wasted toils. That is because it is Faith. If we walked by sight, of course results would be everything. That which succeeded not, that which was not seen to succeed, would be as if it were not. But Faith, the realization of things future, and the sight of things unseen, is no respecter of present recompenses. A man of Faith may be dauntedbut not Faith itself. He is dannted for lack of Faith. The promise has regard not only or chiefly to this life, but to the life to come. To be willing to wait, even for encouragement, much more for victory, is an essential part of his character who has "seen the promise afar off, and been persuaded of it, and embraced it," and who now lives day by day in the calm humble looking for of a light that shall arise and a rest that is reserved in heaven for God's people.

Whether the disappointment be inward or outward; in the soul, or in the life; in the life of feeling, or in the life of action; it is the office of Faith to conquer and to triumph still, assured that God's time will come, and that He is faithful still who promised.

3. But let us not leave it in doubt-for it were but a false and fallacious comfort to do so-whether Faith is, even in the present, a power or a weakness. Something that has been said might be so interpreted as to represent Faith as the discoverer rather than the conqueror of indwelling sin. And indeed there is a truth there also. The letting in of God's light upon the darkened chamber of the careless and sin-bound soul, must have the first effect of disclosing the disorder and the impurity within. That too is an office of Faith. But the words, Faith Conquering, would have little hope and little meaning in them for sinners, if we could not speak of it first, and above all, as conquering Sin. That is our most urgent want, and that is Faith's most solemn office. It is not because of his Faith that any man remains the slave of his sins. not because he trusts in 'the blood of Christ to save him in them and amidst them and under them still. That is a terrible perversion of the Gospel of free grace. "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" St. Paul asks. "God forbid! How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" It is the office of Faith to make us see with him." In attempting, such as he is, to do any | Christ; see Him in His death for our forgiveness, see Him in His life after death for our sanctification. Was any man ever encouraged in his sins by looking up into heaven, and discerning there at the right hand of God the form of Christ crucified and Christ risen? Was any man ever made iudifferent to the result of his day's conflict with his own sins, by meditating upon the all-sufficiency of the sacrifice, or upon the freeness and fulness of the Divine absolution? Nay, is there not in all these things a motive and an influence and a strength too, directly conducive to a watchful and a praying and a holy life? Faith Conquering is, above all things, Faith conquering sin; Faith looking upwards to a living Saviour, and drawing down from Him the desire and the effort and the grace to be holy. It is true, Faith is seen in never despairing under the disappointment of this hope; Faith is seen in looking upward still, even if no answer comes; Faith is seen in determining, even if God be silent-even if Christ should say, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs"-still to submit, still to struggle, and still to pray. But it is a higher exercise of Faith to draw down the blessing itself by continued, by importunate supplication. The Syrophœnician woman went not back to her house acquiescing in her disappointment: Faith triumphed over the disappointment, and made her ask on against refusal, and hope on against hope, till the answer of peace came, which said, "Thy faith hath saved thee." If Faith does not at last conquer sin, its other victories will be turned at last into discomfitures.

Let this question sound in the secret depth of each heart, Is faith conquering sin in me? Am I indeed striving against sin? And that, not from pride, and not from self-interest, and not from the ambition to be tranquil and self-satisfied withinbut from faith? from believing in Jesus Christ? from the desire to please Him, to be like Him, at last to be with Him? God grant that we shrink not, any of us, from the question! It is our life. A man who is using faith to conquer sin, must be a Christian man: he has God's mark upon him: he shall one day be at rest in heaven. Any one elseany one who is not resisting sin, or not resisting it by the help of faith-may have many things; may be amiable, acceptable, useful; may even be talking of the Gospel, and hoping to be saved, and making his boast of Christ: but he lacks the one thing needful: he has still to deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Jesus.

4. Conquering doubt, conquering disappointment, conquering sin, there is yet one more enemy for Faith to conquer—and that is Death.

There is a strange confidence in some of us concerning that end (or, if the Gospel be true, that beginning) of being, which we call Death. We must all die, we say: as if the universality made it safe, and the necessity easy. And yet, when we reflect upon it, how mysterious, how formidable, how awful a thing, is death! What have we to rely upon, in taking that plunge into the invisible?

beyond? Where shall we be, and what, when that brief or that protracted struggle is ended-when the body has become a corpse, and the ministrations of the sick room are exchanged for the solemn silence of the chamber of death? Where shall Ithe real personal being-find myself then? where, and what? Surely if there be anywhere any information to be found upon this subject, it must demand my study! And if there be any one who can tell me that he has gone through this, and that he knows the great secret, and that he can counsel me how to prepare for death and how to diesurely I must listen! And still more if there be One Person, who not only knows, and can instruct. and can counsel, but who also can offer to be with me in dying, and to support me through death, and to meet me beyond death, and to be my Friend and my Rest and my Happiness in that eternal age of which for myself I know and can know nothingsurely nothing can compare in importance with the acquisition and with the cementing and with the enjoyment of this knowledge, this friendship, this communion of an everlasting love! If I can become acquainted with this Person now; if I can grow into loving Him; if I can find peace now in receiving His Spirit to be my spirit, and in taking His will for my will, and His work and His objects to be mine also-so that time and eternity may be linked together, for me, by a real unity of interest and occupation-and death, instead of being a wrench and a disruption, may be nothing more than the drawing aside of a curtain, or the entering through a long-closed door into the very presence of One whom, not having seen, I have already loved and already lived for; if all this may be, then I am justified in saying that Death, the last enemy, is, for me, by anticipation vanquished: I can exclaim already, without a sense of presumption and without a fear of disappointment, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, which giveth me the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

Surely the inevitableness is not comfort! What is

And this conquest of Death is, from first to last, a victory of Faith. Dreadful must it be, if that is all that I know of it, to undergo, through pain and anguish, amidst misgivings of mind and lamentations of surrounding friends, a change which must separate me from all that is seen, and carry me into a region dark, blank, and friendless. If death is not this to the Christian, to what does he owe the difference? Simply to the fact that in that other world—as we vaguely term it—there is already, for him, a Father and a Saviour and a Comforter, One whom it has been the joy of his soul to commune with here, and the strength of his life to find real, to find near, and to find all love and strength and grace.

Now therefore the workings of Faith are accomplished. If Faith can conquer Death, it has conquered the last enemy. There is none beyond. He who can die well has done all. Beyond death there is nothing new. Earth's doubtings are vanquished, and earth's disappointments are vanquished, and earth's sins are vanquished, if death is vanquished for me! Let us not be deceived about this. Let us not come to the brink of that river, and then find that we cannot cross it! Let us not plunge into that stream, and sink and drown there! If we would die happy, we must first be holy. If we would be indeed holy, we must first be Christ's.

Christ Himself, upon earth, condescended to walk by Faith. His victories were victories of Faith.

He conquered Doubt by faith. Whom did doubt ever assail as it assailed Him? On the cross He cried aloud, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" And, so far as Scripture tells, there was no lightening of that load, even to the last breath. And yet His words were, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit!"

And Christ conquered Disappointment by faith. Was it nothing to Him to find whole towns in His own Galilee closed against Him by unbelief? to be unable (as the holy record describes it) to do any mighty work, here, and there, in consequence of their unbelief? to find Jerusalem, the holy city, locked and barred against its King by fetters of brass and iron upon the hearts and souls of its inmates? to die and rise again for man's salvation, and see thus far but one hundred and twenty souls plucked out of the national rejection by such toils, such self-denials, at last such sufferings? And yet Faith triumphed. He saw by anticipation of the travail of His soul, and was strong to endure still. He saw the unseen, and He realized the invisible.

And Christ conquered Sin by Faith. What was His temptation but a victory of faith? the resolute putting aside of a present gain—let none gainsay it, a present good—for the sake of duty, for the sake of a mission, for the sake of Holy Scripture and of the will of God? He conquered sin first in Himself, and then He conquered it also for His people. And in both cases alike by faith He conquered.

And Christ conquered Death by Faith. "For the joy that was set before Him," writes the Apostle to the Hebrews, "He endured the Cross." He who offers to carry man through death, first tasted of it for every man. Faith was mighty in Him first of all and prevailed, and then being made perfect through sufferings He became the Author, to others also, of eternal salvation.

Let us bring to Him our own sins to be blotted out, our own sins to be vanquished. Then, living or dying, we are the Lord's. Then in all things—joy or sorrow, sickness or health, hope or fear, life or death—all must be well with us, for in all things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us!

C. J. VAUGHAN.

NOVEL ANTIQUITIES.

I HAD been reading with much interest some recent accounts of the proceedings of the Palestine Exploration Society, as well as about the learned labours of M. Deutsch on that curious Samaritan Epigraph (containing the Decalogue), which was found some years ago, stuck topsy-turvy in the minaret of a Turkish mosque. On the same evening I happened to glance (after an interval of many years) into that curious article in Michaelis' "Laws of Moses" (No. LXIX.), in which the author, indulging in what many would call a waking dream, (albeit he was by no means given to dreaming,) speculates on the probability of our one day finding "the great stones" inscribed with the Law, or portions of it, which Moses commanded the Israelites to set up on Mount Ebal, and which Joshua tells us were set up in obedience to that command.

This chance medley of various, yet not unconnected reading, suggested to me a dream, in which the dream of Michaelis seemed to be fulfilled; and which, as perhaps it may not be altogether destitute of instruction and entertainment, I will venture to confide to the reader. But a word or two first on the "waking dream" of Michaelis. Without entering into the many controversies as to the precise meaning of those injunctions detailed in Deuteronomy (ch. xxvii. 1—8), and without deciding whether it was the whole Law, or part of it, or the Decalogue only, that was to be inscribed upon "those great stones" (though Kennicott and my dream both agree that it was the Decalogue only), suffice it to say that Michaelis supposes the letters to have been cut deep, and then covered, as commanded, with a thick coating of lime; and that having been thus preserved, they may be hereafter discovered. The passage is so curious, that it may be worth while to cite it.

"Let us only figure to ourselves," says he, "what must have happened to these Memorials amidst the successive devastations of the country in which they were erected. The lime would gradually become irregularly covered with moss and earth; and now, perhaps, the stones, by the soil increasing around and over them, may resemble a little mound; and were they accidentally disclosed to our view, and the lime cleared away, all that was inscribed on them 3500 years ago would at once become visible. Probably, however, this discovery (highly desirable though it would be both to literature and religion), being in the present state of things, and particularly of the Mosaic Law, now so long abrogated, not indispensably necessary, is reserved for some future age of the world. What Moses commanded, merely as an act of legislative prudence, and for the sake of his laws, as laws, God, who sent him, may have destined to answer likewise another purpose; and may choose to bring those stones to light at a time when the laws of Moses are no longer of any authority in any community whatever. Thus much is certain, that nowhere in the Bible is any mention made of the discovery of these stones, nor indeed any further notice taken of them than in Josh. viii. 30—35, where their erection is described; so that we may hope they will yet be one day discovered."

To me it seemed at least as probable, that his dream of the discovery of these memorials might be fulfilled, as that they would produce, if discovered, any very notable effects upon those who had managed to clude all other evidence of the truth of the Sacred Records. However that may be, no sooner were my eyes closed in sleep, than, as seemed, this wonderful discovery had been actually made by the Palestine Exploration Society, (in the course of some excavations in the neighbourhood of Nablous, the ancient Sichem.) on the lower slopes of Mount Ebal. The locality corresponded with the directions of Moses as to the erection of these tablets.

At first, indeed, the intelligence came in the enigmatical form which the Eastern telegrams so often assume; a good deal like some of the messages recently transmitted from India, in which one might fancy that a native at the other end of the wire was making experiments whether the telegraph would not convert his broken English into something intelligible by the time it reached us. The message, in fact, set all the wits at work to decipher the meaning, and failing that, furnished them with numberless jests on its absurdity. It ran thus : - "Palestine exploratious - great discovery-Mount Babel-Mosaic Dialogues-Laws of Moses and Michael." People asked very naturally what could be the meaning of it? They wanted to know where "Mount Babel" was. Some answered, it was very evident that that at all events should be known to the telegraph, since it spoke its original dialects in all their confusion. With regard to the "Mosaic" again, some sagely surmised that some curious specimens of Roman tesselation might have been found; but what "Mosaic Dialogues" could mean no man dared even to conjecture. Others imagined, from the mention of "Moses and Michael," that our savans might have found some ancient representation of the quarrel between "Michael and the Devil," touching "the body of Moses;" and amused themselves with some sarcastic observations on the extravagance of learned enthusiasm, in deeming some trumpery pictorial or sculptured symbols of an old myth, worthy of being trumpeted to the world "as a Great Discovery."

In short, no one had the most distant idea of what was coming; for the modern hieroglyphics of the telegraph can be quite as dark as those of ancient Egypt. They piqued curiosity, however, nearly as much, and there was a good deal of impatience to know what was really meant. Such are the usual conditions under which great discoveries are heralded. First come indistinct mutterings and whispers which excite curiosity, and in part exhaust it, before the truth gets to us.

But after a great deal of persistage occasioned by the unlucky telegram, authentic intelligence at length arrived, and assured us of nothing less than that the memorable discovery adverted to as possible in the above-cited passage from Michaelis, had been actually made; that the telegram, properly corrected, meant-"Palestine Exploration Expedition -great discovery of the Mosaic Decalogue-see Laws of Moses by Michaelis." Letters from the agents of the Society gave an account of the circumstances which had led to the discovery, and again inflamed curiosity and expectation to the utmost. Millions were in raptures at the intelligence, and seemed to think that scepticism would no longer have a leg to stand upon. They thought with Michaelis that these "Sermons on Stones" would prove a most opportune reinforcement of a decaying faith, and mightily sustain the evidence for the truth and authenticity of the Mosaic records. Even I, in spite of long and deep couviction, that moral evidence is, after all, principally strong or weak as the human mind chooses to make it, and that though the sun may shine ever so clearly. man can always make it day or night just as he pleases, by simply opening or shutting his eyes; in spite, I say, of long and deep conviction, that evidence is adjusted to our state as one of moral probation, and will never be found such as to overbear our judgment or compel our assent, or such that it shall not be in the power of ingenious perverseness plausibly to evade it ;-even I, too, could not help falling into the common delusion. In all cases, men are apt vastly to over-estimate the effect of a novel and seemingly cogent piece of evidence, and to under-estimate the skill of wayward ingenuity in destroying or neutralising it. feel as many a suitor in a court of justice, who asks how it is possible for their adversary to "get over" this or that fact of their case? But I soon found (as he often does, to his cost) that nothing is more easy, and that "where there is a will, there is a way." Almost from the very moment the discovery was intelligibly announced to us, it was evident that multitudes, in virtue of their general opinions one way or other, had come to a foregone conclusion, and argued for or against the genuineness of the tablets with the utmost zeal. It was in vain that the wise and moderate, whether believers or sceptics, begged these furious partisans to have a little patience. They were reminded that some members of the expedition had expressly promised to bring home portions, or perhaps the whole, of the venerable relics with them. It was of little use; controversy went on; nay, the point was dogmatically settled by thousands who not only had no manner of data whereon to form a judgment, and before it was possible they should have any; but who, if they had had them all, would have been utterly unable to estimate them. hypotheses were formed to account for the "blind enthusiasm" (so some called it) which had cheated the explorers, or for the impudent cheat (as others said) which they had attempted to practise on the world.

Many declared that sooner than credit anything so extremely absurd, they could readily believe that the learned members of the Society had either been imposed upon, or had become the dupes of their own zealous antiquarianism; that they had either been cheated by others or had cheated themselves: a few even hinted, that sooner than credit the thing, they could believe that the explorers were perpetrating a "pious fraud," and joining in a foul conspiracy in defence of an exploded fable; that if they had found the "Decalogue of Moses," it was not before they wanted it, and that it was to be hoped they would profit by the command which forbids us to "bear false witness." But to this minority, it was replied that the world would be slow to believe such a charge against men whose names and known characters seemed to be an unanswerable reply to any such imputation. This was generally admitted; but the advocates of the first theory said, that it was by no means improbable that they might have been deceived by others, or might have deceived themselves. It was hard to say what high-wrought "enthusiasm" and "subjective" causes might do: that they might have mistaken, and probably had, some mis-shapen stones with some undecipherable inscriptions upon them, for what their heated fancy had suggested; that when some one among them had once imagined such a thing, it was easy to imagine all the rest following the antiquarian bell-wether. As M. Renan sald, in reference to Mary Magdalen and the resurrection-"When one had seen, there was no merit (and no wonder) in others seeing." Some of these gentlemen, indeed, asked with exquisite naïveté, "whether, since M. Renan had proved that the doctrine of the resurrection had arisen out of strange 'subjective' illusions on the part of the disciples, (who had on many different occasions, collectively and simultaneously, lost their wits, and misinterpreted the most ordinary facts into supernatural phenomena,) the gentlemen of the Expedition might not have done the like?" To this a good man replied, that if M. Renan's theory was true, and the disciples, separately and together, had, time after time, simultaneously gone mad, he really knew no reason why the exploring party might not have gone mad too: "I quite admit," said he, "that the one wonder would be no greater than the other. In the meantime, as I believe M. Renan's hypothesis, as well as that of Paulus of Heidelburg, (which is very like it) merely prove the hallucination of the authors, and not of the apostles, I am no more willing to admit the one supposition than the Besides," said he, "if the very inscribed stones be really forthcoming, it would be very hard to imagine that these could be 'subjective' phenomena." "Ay," said the sceptics incredulously, "if they be forthcoming. But what proof have we that they will be; or if they are, that they have the legible characters upon them these folks profess to read there? or any characters at all that are not as hard to be deciphered as the cuneiform writing of Assyria, or the hieroglyphics of Egypt?"

Finally, however, it was agreed by most people that it was of no use to "fight in the dark;" that we must wait the arrival of the explorers themselves. with, as they promised, the very "slabs." If they brought these, and they really bore, not illegible hieroglyphics, but plain orthodox Hebrew, it was agreed that the theory of "simultaneous hallucination" of antiquarian enthusiasm would hardly apply. It was agreed by everybody that blocks of stone were far too solid and massive to be "subjective phenomena; " and that if "simultaneous enthusiasm" had made the explorers read the same illegible or enigmatical characters the same way (though itself a very unaccountable piece of business), still their blunders would be corrected by other eyes. But if all the world thought the inscriptions as legible as they had done, it would be hardly possible to get the world to believe itself mad too.

And so methought the whole thing remained by general consent in abeyance, till this unique specimen of antiquities should be brought home. Not that everybody was silent about the matter; only those who felt that it was impossible to argue without data, and to talk with nothing to talk about. Among the rest, controversy and conjecture still went on; and thereby many actually put themselves out of condition to judge of the facts at the proper time, by nursing their minds in the impressions and prejudices originally taken up; and, when proof came, were fully prepared, not to investigate, but to resist it. Not a few, I heard, decided the matter in their own rational way, by "laying bets" freely, that the slabs would never come; and I was told that if they should, "a good deal of money would change hands."

At length the day came when these curious relics of the Mosaic age arrived, and were safely lodged in the British Museum; and of course all the world crowded to see them, as though it had never seen a Decalogue before;—and, indeed, it was no doubt a pretty good while since many of the visitors had seen one. There it was, however; there could be no doubt of that; large slabs, as seemed to me, ten feet square, with Hebrew characters upon them, no less than two inches long; looking, it is true, rude and antique, and more angular than those in our printed Bibles, but still good legible Hebrew characters notwithstanding.

Men gazed and gazed at this Decalogue, as if they really had some intention of keeping it. Those who had done little but break the commandments all their lives, now looked at them as earnestly as though they thought it was of the uttermost importance to ascertain their duty or make sure of their own condemnation. But in the majority of cases, I soon found they came only to gratify curiosity, to equip themselves to take a side, to find out what was to be said on either, to wrangle, to know what was speculatively true and right, and how to maintain it without one thought of practising it. Human nature was perfectly consistent in all this, for it has ever been more solicitous to speculate about duty than to do it; always professes a code of morals better than its practice, and is almost willing to become a martyr for doctrines and creeds which, nevertheless, it contradicts every day of its life!

Methought the spectacle became so popular, that excursion trains were organised from all parts of the country, and advertised in large placards almost as big as the Decalogue itself, and with all the usual ineitements to view any other taking novelty. People made parties to see it, just as they would to the Exhibition or the Zoological Gardens, or the Crystal Palace; and, indeed, a great many Exhibitions were jealous of the Museum, and broke the "Decalogue" by "coveting" their neighbour's "Decalogue" exceedingly. Some interested in such spectacles hinted that it would be good for the "public," and good for "religion," if the venerable relic were permitted to itinerate to all the principal show-places in the kingdom.

As people became accustomed to the phenomenon, the effects of familiarity showed themselves in a variety of ways, startling at first, but all of them, I fancy, characteristic enough of human nature; and proving too clearly that the anticipations of Michaelis, as to the effect of any such accession of evidence, must be largely discounted. thousands, indeed, who visited the relie, did so with feelings of profound veneration; but it was principally those who were already convinced. To them (as our author conjectured it would be) it was a strong confirmation of their faith. On the great Commands which they had so often lightly read and lightly repeated, and still more often lightly broken, they looked with new emotions of awe and selfcondemnation. According to the ordinary laws of association, by which mere novelty in the mode of presentation will vividly recall half-forgotten truth, reinvest a familiar object with all the interest which habit and custom have deadened, and dissolve the soul in a flood of unaccustomed emotion, they felt almost as if they had stood at the foot of the Burning Mount, and seen the tablets written by the finger of God Himself. Thousands more, who had indeed the otiose historic faith, but nothing besides, were in a measure similarly affected, and gazed on the memorials with a peculiar solemnity and awe; and in some I do think the impression remained (as Socrates says of the orators who so pleasantly flattered his vanity) for "three whole days, at least." But like their prototypes in the Parable, the convictions "having no depth of earth," soon faded away. Their feeling was just as transient as that of the Israelites, -at whose fickleness, so often wondered at, I wondered no more. Like them, they were ready, in a couple of days or so, to worship again the "golden calf," as if these momentary emotions had never intruded themselves, and as if there had been no interruption of their customary abs rption in the pursuit of gain or pleasure. VII-59

Others scarcely looked at the spectacle with any serious feeling at all. Without denying, any more than people in general, the reality of the discovery, or doubting that they were then actually gazing upon the relics which Joshua had set up more than three thousand years ago, to be the memorials to distant ages of the truth of the Mosaic history, and a salutary confirmation of men's faith in it, they soon learned to laugh and jest in the very presence of the venerable Memorials! At first, I confess, I was astonished that any one should act thus, unless he discredited the discovery itself. But it only shows that I did not make adequate allowance for the moral paradoxes of which human nature is capable. For do not the very same class of men, in the very same conditions of mind, often do the like in public worship, and giggle and jest in spite of the solemnities in which they are professedly engaged; and though they say they believe as much as anybody the great verities the preacher is expounding, and the authority of the book which contains them? Or did these irreverent spectators behave at all differently from the bulk of those who frequent an oratorio, -that somewhat equivocal method of dramatising religious mysteries? Part of the audience no doubt, -to whom the music is the appropriate vehicle for conveying sentiments which, if divorced from it, leave it little more than "a tinkling cymbal,"-feel with thrilling intensity the great truths of which it is so sublime an expression; and, like Handel himself, when he was found dissolved in tears over the attempt to embody his own conceptions of the pathos of those words, "He is despised and rejected," are moved to deepest sympathy with the music. But thousands, whose whole soul-what little there is of it-is in their ears, or whose cars, like those of another animal, are their principal characteristic, can yet, without at all denying their conviction that the music does give expression to great truths (in which they will tell you they believe as much as anybody), so lose sight of the thought in the sound, of the truth in the vehicle of it, as to feel no impropriety at all, while coolly peeling an orange, in encoring the sorrows of Redceming Love, or applauding with rapture a recitative of the Future Judgment; as little sensible of their own absurdity as an audience I once knew, who were doing honour to a great composer by listening to a requiem to his memory, and who actually so forgot the occasion as to demand, with much vociferation and gesticulation, its gratifying repetition,-which was accordingly given by the accommodating orchestra! The requiem for the dead served only to call forth noisy shouts from the living. It was much as if a man's funeral had been so charmingly "performed," that nothing would satisfy his friends and relations but to have it performed over again!

As time went on, methought, there were indications enough that even the extremest forms of human folly, knavery, and irreverence were no more capable of being repressed by this venerable symbol of religion than by any other. One rogue was detected, at an early hour, attempting to cut away some portion as a relic, or else to make gain of it; he had nearly, I was told, chipped off the words "Thou shalt not covet," and that too with the words "Thou shalt not steal" staring him in the face. If he had not been found out in time, he would no doubt have stolen these too. To some friends who expressed their horror at this, I asked, how it differed from the frequent case of ordinary sacrilege: if men would break open the church box and steal altar-clothes and chalices, with all the Ten Commandments in full view, why should we wonder that they were willing to steal the Decalogue itself? Or if they felt no compunction in running off with a rare Bible, why should they be expected to feel any in appropriating a few words of it?

In a similar manner, the custodier told me that though the people in general behaved with becoming decorum, it was next to impossible to repress that odd passion for immortality by which many of the vulgar are impelled to scrawl their ignoble names on anything, however sacred; that more than once he had detected "John Smith" or "John Brown" endeavouring to inscribe those unlucky words on vacant spaces in the tablets. "But how can we wonder at it," said he, "when there is no place so hallowed that these names are not to be found there? It's my belief that either of these rogues would scrawl his name on the door of heaven itself, if he could ever get up to it!"

But with whatever varying feelings, permanent or transient, of devout reverence, idle curiosity, or profane levity, the multitudes in general were disposed to contemplate this strange spectacle, one thing was clear; that, considered as an instrument of confuting the gainsayer or silencing scepticism (in which light principally Michaelis thought it might be of value), our author had greatly overrated it. "If meu will not believe Moses and the propliets, neither will they believe though one rose from the dead."-I do not deny, indeed, that this singular piece of posthumous evidence had the effect he predicted in many cases, by arresting the attention of the candil sceptic, and leading to a renewed and serious weighing of the evidence for the truth of the sacred records generally; but by no means in so many as one would have thought likely. It was really wonderful to see what a variety of plausible reasons were given why the relics should not be thought undoubtedly genuine. The theory, indeed, of "simultaneous" self-deception,—the result of a fanatical antiquarianism,—as to the meaning of the inscriptions, was given up as nutenable when the stones were safely lodged in the Museum; the case was as hopeless as the theory of the Resurrection propounded by M. Renan. But it would have been a great mistake to suppose that scepticism had nothing further to say; on the contrary, there are few of the arginieuts against the genuineness and authenticity of the Gospels which had not their ingenious counterparts in the reasons for doubting the genuineness and authenticity of these relics.

For example, it was observed by some that it by no means followed that, because they were discovered in such a locality, and in circumstances so suggestive of those mentioned in the Book of Deuteronomy, they were as ancient as the time of Joshua, or that they were, after all, anything more than an imposture, though not on the part of the respected Explorers. "It is observable," said they, "that they were found in the limits of Samaria"as if, by the way, they could be found (if they were genuine) anywhere else! "Now the Samaritans received the Pentateuch alone, and they were continually striving to establish a claim to equal participation in the glories of the Mosaic dispensation with their Jewish rivals. What more likely than that the Samaritans, at a far subsequent date to that of Moses-finding the injunctions in the Book of Denteronomy—conceived the idea of giving éclat to their system of worship by getting s eming possession of so remarkable a memorial of antiquity, and so setting up the tablets on Mount Ebal, thus forging a spurious relic of the days of Joshua?"-It was in vain to urge those who once took this idea into their heads, that there was no historic proof or probability of anything of the kind, and that the enmity and jealousy between the two races would have been sure to induce the Jews to proclaim and expose the cheat as soon as attempted; not to say that the tablets seem to have been utterly unknown to both parties till so wonderfully rediscovered. To this it was rejoined that "we could not reasonably expect, in the dearth of historic information in relation to those remote times, to have every doubt cleared up, and that doubtless many important facts had gradually vanished from history;"-an argument which a good many of us felt to come with singular grace and modesty from men who never for a moment allowed that that was a reason for not demanding a solution of every minute objection to the historic character of the Pentateuch or the Gospels.

One said that "as the remains had been discovered on Mount Ebal, this, though it accorded with the locality assigned in the Hebrew Scriptures, contradicted the statement in the Samaritan Pentatench, which gave Mount Gerizim as the true site. Now if this (as even Michaelis thought) was the correct reading, these could not be the stones referred to by Moses: that, for his part, he thought the Samaritan Pentateuch was ripht," (he gave no reasons, however); "and that at all events the contradiction between the two texts caused a grave difficulty, which, until it was fully cleared up, must leave the whole matter covered with doubt."

Another man having observed a crack across one of the slabs, caused in moving it (though happily it was not broken), shook his head sagely, as though he found reason to suspect a callida junctura there; and significantly whispered to those about him that if we knew the full history of that "crack," we should, he suspected, get to the bottom of the mystery: instead of being as old as Joshua, possibly the whole would be found to have been put together-"not a hundred years ago." But I must do the people the justice to say that few paid any heed to this insinuation, and seemed to think the "crack" was rather in his own head.

Some who flattered themselves that they had irrefragably proved, from the language of the Pentateuch, and an infinity of other arguments, that it cannot be referred to the date to which it has been generally ascribed, -possibly parts of it may be as early as the time of Ezra, or even Solomon, -here took advantage of their own wrong, and easily showed that as these tables were a faithful transcript of part of the Pentateuch, they also were incontestably of far later date than the age of Joshua. "In short," said one of them, "these inscribed tablets bear a most suspiciously close resemblance to the Decalogue, as given in the Pentateuch."

This theory-which was very acceptable to the multitudes who believe in the infallible scent of modern criticism, in determining from internal evidence the age of any book-had like to have been imperilled by some one whose microscopic eye had discovered that, after all, there were some minute variations in the forms of two or three words; and who felt disposed to argue, not that the preceding theory must be reconsidered, but that such "discrepancies" were fatal to the claims of a document which purported to be a transcript from the Pentateuch; in short, argued much as sceptical critics do (or rather did, before Bentley refuted them) from similar unimportant "various readings" in the New Testament.

Another, who was not aware of any such discrepancies, and assumed that the one "Decalogue" was an exact duplicate of the other, thought that whichever of the two was the oldest, their exact conformity was a very suspicious circumstance. Some one asked him why two copies of the same thing should not be alike?

But, on being questioned, his reasoning was found plausible enough. He said that as the Pentateuch had continued in constant use, and had been continually transcribed from age to age, it would naturally be affected by, and carry on its face, (though it would not of itself disclose,) the various changes of inflection, spelling, and forms of words, which were the inevitable effects of time and custom on all languages; just as we see that a modern edition of one of Sir Thomas More's writings, or even of Bacon, (though substantially to all intents and purposes the same as the earlier editions), yet exhibits innumerable diversities in these respects from the old copies. But he was quickly silenced by those who had already been busy in proving that the absence of archaisms was one of the palmary arguments for demonstrating that the Pentateuch was of late date, and begged him for heaven's sake to hold his tongue. He did not see that in fact he were the same it was ridiculous to believe, while was damaging this sceptical argument, which has been a good deal insisted upon in our day; namely, that the Pentateuch exhibits too near an approximation to the forms and idioms of a later age, -that it is not archaic enough.

One man, a learned Jew (as I afterwards found), a devoted admirer of the Rabbis, suggested another difficulty. He could not, indeed, after the controversies of the last two centuries, maintain with the Rabbis of the middle ages the immemorial antiquity or the divine origin of the Hebrew points; nor even persist in supposing them as old as Moses. But if he did not go quite so far as the elder Buxtorf, he yet held for certain, (what even Michaelis thought probable,) that the vowel system had grown out of one simpler and older; that let people say what they would about the scriptio defectiva, there never was a written language so "defective" as to have no better vowel notation than the poor Yod and Aleph on these tables. He would as soon have doubted the authority of Moses himself, as believe in documents so deplorably naked of all trace of even the rudiments of Kametz or Mappik; and found this a certain sign that the asserted antiquity of this copy of the Decalogue was a mere dream, not for a moment to be admitted by any genuine disciple of Rabbi Ben Solomon.

Another odd fellow, who, though a most orthodox believer, had given much time to the investigation of ancient alphabets, and had a passion for that class of antiquities, was convinced that in several momentous points, the letters did not correspond with the more ancient Jewish characters. How he could possibly tell, with any precision, what was the exact form of the letters in the time of Moses, was a puzzle to everybody but himself. But he decided that the characters approximated far too much to the present square letters; and that though (as many critics have conjectured) these "square" letters might have been very gradually developed out of Phonician, yet that at all events the transformation had not occurred so early; and that the writing, if genuine, ought to have been more like that on "Hasmonean coins," and less like that of the "Palmyrene inscriptions." But this was a mere individual crotchet, which yet a quantum sufficit of pedantry and conceit rendered demonstration to It showed not merely (as some of the other crotchets did) on what trivial grounds men can ingeniously parry evidence which it is not pleasant to receive; but what is still more strange, how incomparably more powerful may be the veriest crotchet which has come to be indulged by a wayward fancy or perverted learning, than the strongest arguments, even when these last fall in with the habitual convictions of the men who indulge it: for the good man readily admitted the genuineness and authenticity of the Pentateuch, and needed, as he said, no confirmation of his faith whatever. That Joshua put up tablets as ordered in Deuteronomy, he had no doubt; but that these Kophs had such big heads and long legs, and Gimels were so suspiciously like Nuns

One gentleman, I was told, had (in accordance with the characteristic tendency of modern science to pitch itself right into the most remote antiquity, and to find the solution of all mysteries there) delivered a lecture, in which he modestly threw out a hint that, from what he had heard of the situs in which, and the depth at which, the supposed remains were alleged to have been found, "he could not help having his doubts whether the strata had been disturbed for many centuries before the age of Moses; and that, if so, it was a proof at once that a fraud had been committed, -as had been undoubtedly the case with some of the supposed 'pre-Adamite relics' that had been palmed upon the world." In regard to these last relics indeed, his antiquarian faith was in general equal to anything; but in this case, he became suddenly sceptical. Some one gravely told him that, as he so readily received stone knives and arrow-heads found in such a situs, as proof of the existence of man perhaps millions of years ago, he ought to complete his theory by receiving these remains on the same conditions, and so running up the Pentateuch (at least this portion of it) to the same antiquity with his celts. Half angry and half puzzled, he declared that he would sooner believe that, than the ordinary age and date of the Pentateuch on any such evidence as this story of the Mount Ebal Some who heard the lecture were Decalogue. seriously disposed from such premises to come to the conclusion, that these fragments of the Pentateuch, if not the Pentateuch itself, were thousands (why not millions?) of years older than had been generally supposed, and corroborative of the fact (now generally conceded by scientific men) of the unlimited antiquity of the human race. In short, whether it were proved that the books of Moses were a very late forgery, or genuine relics of pre-Adamite man, seemed equally satisfactory to many; always provided they were allowed not to have been composed at the time and by the persons generally imagined.

A solitary disciple of the old-fashioned atheism, who most unreasonably felt himself puzzled by these Stone Witnesses, when the whole universe, and the Bible to boot, gave him no trouble at all, condescended to visit the Museum, and soon came to the conclusion that a "notable trick" had been palmed on the world; and, turning to me, asked what could be the "design" of it? I told him gravely that I did not believe in any arguments from "design;" and that I could not sec, since he believed that all the visible universe, and everything in it, (in a word, whatever showed "marks of design,") were the effect of impersonal chance, or impersonal and unconscious law, why he should not believe that the same impersonal agencies might have produced these inscrutable blocks of stone. He evidently hardly knew whether to be angry with me, or to agree with me. "However," said he, "suppose the thing to be the effect of design, what could the design be?" I told him that, though I did not see any reason, in his case, why he should trouble himself about the matter, as his theory would solve any phenomena whatever; yet I thought the design, if design there was, was plain enough. "And what is that?" said he. "Why, to tell man that he is to love God with all his heart, and his neighbour as himself, which last I thought we could hardly do, if we lightly suspected people of the most impudent frauds, as at present he seemed rather inclined to do."

But, after all, the most wonderful part of the whole was not the facility with which men made their escape from evidence which it was unpleasant to receive, or the ingenuity and plausibility of some of their hypotheses invented for this purpose, or-when nothing plausible could be offered, -the trumpery arguments with which the Will hoodwinked the Understanding; I say this was not the most wonderful part of the spectacle. Nor was my surprise chiefly excited by what was incomparably more wonderful - the inappreciable difference the discovery made in the bulk of those who, so far from feeling any disposition to deny that it was a great confirmation of the truth of the Scriptures, were quite willing to allow that it was so; for why should they regard the new copy of the Decalogue any more than they had done the old, or a small part of the Bible than the whole of it? There was one thing that surprised me still more; it was to see many vehemently and too literally swearing by the claims of this sacred relic to profound veneration, though their whole language and bearing showed that they had not only no knowledge of the subject, but cared not a groat about it-and who zealously broke the Commandments in the very terms in which they contended for them.

On one occasion, I remember, on a rude, pert sceptic's making some remark of an offensive kind, a countryman told him in great dudgeon, and with a profane oath, that "he was a scurvy rascal; that he would he hanged" (he used, I am sorry to say, a much stronger word) "if he would let any one laugh at his religion, and that if it was not for the company, he would teach him to know better."—Another was rejoiced to find these supplementary proofs given to the claims of the Bible: "In these sceptical times," he said, "it is a devilish good thing; and here is an argument which that old rogue Colenso, and all his infernal crew of Zulus, will find it hard to meet."

Methought I was awoke out of my dream by a curious incident. One sturdy sceptic, who had puzzled himself with the various theories for getting over the difficulty without implicating the character of the exploring party, (just as Strauss and other sceptics attempt to account for the falsehood of the Gospel history without touching the character of the Apostles,) but who found himself dissatisfied with them all, came back (as Strauss has done in the case of Christianity) to the conclusion that there had been, after all, some gross cheating in the matter and that the explorers, as he said aloud, had been "playing the knave." It so happened that one of these gentlemen was standing near him, and before the words were well out of his mouth, being a man of high honour and quick sensibility, he fairly knocked the unlucky sceptic head over heels, at the same time saying :- "And who are you, or any like you, that you should think yourselves of sufficient importance to induce honourable men, and a number of them too, to perjure themselves, and undergo infinite pains, trouble, and ignominy, to deceive you into an unprofitable lie? Do you think we should submit to all this for the purpose of hoodwinking such a stupid old owl as you, -that needs no deceiving at all, but can deceive himself at any time, especially if he be brought into the sunlight?" I really thought it was an answer which Moses himself, Apostles, Prophets, and Martyrs (though perhaps not in terms so brusque, and certainly without the argumentum baculinum, which in this case accompanied it), might have reasonably addressed to many a suspicious sceptic who has doubted their honour, veracity, and even common sense.

There is, perhaps, little probability of the Palestine Exploration Society's fulfilling the anticipations of Michaelis, or turning my dream into a reality. But if they do not find the "Memorial Stones" in question, it is certain they will find many highly valuable and curious confirmations of sacred writ. God has, no doubt, concealed in his archives—the bosom of the earth—many a monument which shall explain or reconcile the difficulties, or corroborate the statements, of His own Word, and that they will yield themselves to persevering search. The society may rest assured there are thousands who are watching their labours with the greatest interest.

DOLL POEMS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LILLIPUT LEVEE."

I.—THE PICTURE.

The beautifulest Doll that ever was seen!
Oh, what nosegays! Oh, what sashes!
Oh, what beautiful eyes and lashes!

Oh, what a precious perfect pet!
On each instep a pink rosette;
Little blue shoes for her little blue tots;
Elegant ribbons in bows and knots.

Her hair is powdered; her arms are straight; Only feel, she is quite a weight! Her legs are limp, though;—stand up, miss!— What a beautiful buttoned-up mouth to kiss!

II.—THE LOVE STORY.

This is the Doll with respect to whom A story is told that ends in gloom; For there was a sensitive little sir Went out of his mind for love of her!

They pulled a wire, she moved her eye; They squeezed the bellows, they made her cry; But the boy could never be persuaded That these were really things which they did.

"My Dolladine," he said, "has life; I love her, and she shall be my wife; Dainty delicate Dolladine, The prettiest girl that ever was seen!"

To give his passion a chance to cool, They sent the lover to boarding-school, But absence only made it worse— He never learnt anything, prose or verse!

He drew her likeness on his slate; His grammar was in a dreadful state, With Dolladine all over the edges, And true love-knots, and vows, and pledges.

What was the consequence?—Doctor Whack Begged of his parents to take him back; When his condition, poor boy, was seen, Too late, they sent for Dolladine.

And now he will never part with her: He calls her lily, and rose, and myrrh, Dolly-o'-diamonds, precious lamb, Humming-bird, honey-pot, jewel, jam, Darling, delicate-dear-delight, Angel-o'-red, angel-o'-white, Queen of beauty, and such like names; In fact all manner of darts and flames!

Of course, while he keeps up this wooing, His education goes to ruin: What are his prospects in future life, With only a doll for his lawful wife?

It is feared his parents' hearts will break! And there's one remark I wish to make; I may be wrong, but it seems a pity For a moveable doll to be made too pretty.

An old-fashioned doll, that is not like nature, Can never pass for a human creature; It is in a doll that moves her eyes That the danger of these misfortunes lies!

The lover's name must be suppressed
For obvious reasons. He lives out west,
And if I call him Pygmalion Pout,
I don't believe you will find him out!

HI.-DRESSING HER.

This is the way we dress the Doll:— You may make her a shepherdess, the Doll, If you give her a crook with a pastoral hook, But this is the way we dress the doll.

Chorus. Bless the Doll, you may press the Doll, But do not crumple and mess the Doll!

This is the way we dress the Doll.

First, you observe her little chemise, As white as milk, with ruches of silk; And the little drawers that cover her knees, As she sits or stands, with golden bands, And lace in beautiful filagrees.

Chorus. Bless the Doll, you may press the Doll,
But do not crumple or mess the Doll!
This is the way we dress the Doll.

Now these are the bodies: she has two, One of pink, with ruches of blue, And sweet white lace; be careful, do! And one of green, with buttons of sheen, Buttons and bands of gold, I mean, With lace on the border in lovely order, The most expensive we can afford her!

Chorus. Bless the Doll, you may press the Doll,
But do not crumple or mess the Doll!
This is the way we dress the Doll.

Then, with black at the border, jacket And this-and this-she will not lack it; Skirts? Why, there are skirts, of course, And shoes and stockings we shall enforce, With a proper bodice, in the proper place (Stays that lace have had their days And made their martyrs); likewise garters, All entire. But our desire Is to show you her night attire, At least a part of it. Pray admire This sweet white thing that she goes to bed in! It's not the one that's made for her wedding; That is special, a new design, Made with a charm and a countersign, Three times three and nine times nine: These are only her usual clothes: Look, there's a wardrobe! gracious knows It's pretty enough, as far as it goes!

So you see the way we dress the Doll: You might make her a shepherdess, the Doll, If you gave her a crook with a pastoral hook, With sheep, and a shed, and a shallow brook, And all that, out of the poetry-book.

Chorus. Bless the Doll, you may press the Doll,
But do not crumple and mess the Doll!
This is the way we dress the Doll;
If you had not seen, could you guess the Doll?

MEAT AT STARVATION PRICES.

WHEN we consider that the rise in the price of meat, which has been taking place gradually these last thirty years, but with great rapidity these last ten years, affects the poor in a far greater degree than any other class of the community, it is not out of place in a journal of this character to make a few inquiries into the subject. If coals were to go up forty per cent. in price, our manufacturers would make an amazing outcry, and possibly, through their powers of combination, would speedily provide some remedy for the evil. But the poor and the labouring class do not possess the same powerful means of combination, and they suffer in consequence. The working classes, in one sense, are, however, machines, and it is as necessary for them to keep up their steam as it is for the engine of the manufacturer—their coal, in other words, is meat, and meat they must have if they are to raintain their powers of work; but out of their present wage this they cannot do. It is possible that when the cattle plague has wholly passed away, butcher's prices will somewhat decline, but we are told, on the very best authority, that our chief articles of muscle-making fuel will never return to old prices, and that these prices can only be kept within any due limit by importations from abroad. If we ask any butcher the causes of the rapid rise in meat, he immediately tells you that it is owing to the cattle disease. But we know, on official authority, that only five per cent. of cattle have succumbed to this plague. This loss has been again far more than replaced by importation from abroad. Indeed, "Oh, the Roast Beef of Old England," is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. Our best butchers buy foreign meat equally with home grown. Our imports are mainly drawn from the Dutch and German ports, these again draw their supplies from the depths of the continent. Styria and Bohemia, and Hungary, are now our grazing grounds. France sends us some noble beasts, and Spain and Portugal furnish much finer cattle than our own as regards size, and we are told on all hands that they are rapidly increasing in quality now that the trade is a growing one, and the tastes of the English consumer are consulted. But it seems pretty clear that it is not so much the Rinderpest that is answerable for high prices, as Government Orders in Council, which have paralysed the whole trade. The stoppage of circulation in the cattle trade has thrown immense impediments in the way of the butcher; he has lost his time, an item which makes no show, and the graziers have lost their means of obtaining foreign stock for fattening, which has had the effect of reducing our own flocks and herds in a remarkable degree; so much so, in fact, that meat is cheaper in the metropolis than in any other of our great towns, and the country for a hundred miles round London is supplied from its markets.

These facts, together with the still more important one, that whilst our population is growing at a great rate, we are becoming greater meat-eaters, will, we think, sufficiently account for the present spasmodic rise in price, and the gradual and seemingly less accountable increase going on during the present generation. As far as we can gather from the very interesting report "On the Trade in Animals," just printed, our main hope of keeping down the price of meat depends upon the development of our foreign imports, and upon improved means of bringing homegrown meat to market. We should say, judging from the evidence given by butchers in this important inquiry, that the vendors of meat are themselves a very prejudiced class of men, by no means up to the work of the day, and incapable of getting out of old ruts, or of accommodating themselves to an altered state of things. No doubt a new race, with larger ideas than those of their fathers, will arise, who will perceive that we must in future draw our meat mainly from abroad as we do our wheat, and that the machinery that was fully adequate when the meat travelled from Smithfield to their private slaughter-houses breaks down under a system which will send them for supplies to the end of the earth.

Mr. Rudkin, the Chairman of the Markets Committee of the City of London, tells us that "during the next three or four years London will be practically supplied with foreign cattle," and the evidence proves that the metropolitan city during eight months in the year is very largely supplied with dead meat. Dr. Letheby tells us that five years ago about $0,000 tons of meat came to the metropolitan markets annually, but that it is now 150,000 tons. Our primest beef and mutton comes from Aberdeen. Scotch mutton, indeed, comes with intermissions of a week or so of the hottest weather, all the year round, in perfect condition. are even told that although the meat does not look quite so well to the eye, that it eats better, and will keep one day longer than town-killed meat. It is clear, therefore, that in the future we require to smooth the way for an entirely new method of supplying our markets-to create a machinery for the conveyance and reception of a widely extended field of supply, and it is to the perfection of that system we must look for keeping meat within the reach of the poor and of working men. At present, no doubt prices are enhanced by the great friction, if we may so term it, which takes place between the time the beast leaves the field to its entering the butcher's shop in the shape of joints. Not only do our butchers require to adopt quicker methods, but our railways must mend their ways. As it is, without exception, they have done nothing towards expediting matters as regards the carrying of meat. And this, be it remembered, is a matter of vital importance, inasmuch as a question of a few hours in transit in summer is sufficient to transform wholesome meat into a mass of corruption. The one exception, which deserves to be widely made known, is the Bristol and Exeter Railway. Necessity, they say, is the mother of invention, and to the Order in Council prohibiting the carrying of cattle by railroads, we owe some very astounding results. Finding their traffic annihilated in live stock, the directors at once turned their attention to carrying dead meat. They ran special fast trains to the west of England, which is full of rich grazing districts, and fitted up trucks just like sham-These they ran by a siding into their goods-shed, where a regular meat market was fitted up. This being done, they made known to the farmers on their line of railway, that "The West of England Produce Company offer at their stores ample and complete accommodation for the reception of carcasses sent to them by railway, and that with a view to diminish, as far as possible, the inconvenience and loss that must necessarily arise under the present restrictions, both to the graziers and to the public, they have made the necessary arrangements for the sale of carcasses, which must be addressed to the care of Mr. H. T. Swan, West of England Agricultural Stores, New Cut, Bristol. ... As manager, they authorised me to say, that until some other arrangements were made, we should be responsible for the proper account of sales, and for remittances. We found that this was responded to, to a very great extent, by the graziers and farmers of Devonshire and Somersetshire, and that several station slaughter-houses had been erected, so that animals were slaughtered at the railway stations, put into very commodious vans, hung, in fact, as they would be in shambles, brought to these stores, and then they were offered for sale." As may be supposed, the butchers were immediately in arms; although a carcass market was brought to their doors, they refused to have anything to do with it; they even came to a resolution not to deal with any one who sent these carcasses to market. But the company were not to be defeated, they advertised the meat, and the public at once responded. "They rushed down in very large numbers, and there was no difficulty at all in selling the meat. People of first-class respectability in Clifton, such as physicians, proprietors of schools, and others, clubbed together; several gentlemen said 'we will have a sheep between us,' and all that sort of thing. There was a very great demand, and farmers and graziers, if one may judge from the success which attended the undertaking, got very much better returns through this company, than they were receiving from the butchers, while on the other hand a very large saving was made to the purchaser." Here was a tremendous revolution. This meat sold for 4s. Sd. per stone, or 7d. a pound, at the same time that meat was selling for 10d. per pound in Clifton, and we are further told, that the effect of this movement was to reduce the price of meat 2d. per pound at the butchers'. Thus at one stroke the grazier and the farmer were brought into connection with the consumer-an abolition of friction with a vengeauce; the carcass butcher, the salesman, and the retailer. were swept off the scene at a blow; and the result was a reduction of the price of meat by the amount of 3d. per pound. This is a fact worthy of all consideration, for whilst it is quite possible for the public to live without butchers, they certainly cannot live without meat. We hear that this method of distribution is still going on at Bristol, that the co-operative stores in that city buy entirely from the railway company, and redistribute to their shareholders. The co-operative system is a very large one, and will, we believe, ultimately bear important fruits. We do not wish to enter into the subject here, but the example we have given of what is being done at Bristol may certainly be followed in other large cities contiguous to great grazing districts, provided railway managers act with the same spirit as the manager of the Bristol and Exeter line. It has been objected that slaughtered animals get bruised in transit, but we see by the institution of these "travelling larders" that the meat comes up in very perfect condition. each careass being so secured laterally that it cannot get bruised by bumping up against the next carcass. The consequence of the perfection of these carriage arrangements is, that this line continues to carry large quantities of dead meat, now that the prohibition against carrying cattle has been rescinded. The carriage of live beasts has been a disgrace to the country. Cattle often are detained on the road between five-and-twenty and six-and-thirty hours, without one drop of water or mouthful of hay; the consequence is, that they arrive at their destination fevered, and often afflicted with the footand-mouth disease. Cattle in such a condition will not drink, and if killed when thus fevered are very difficult to keep, and always eat badly; if on the other hand they are allowed to rest, the loss of time enhances their cost to the butcher. The treatment of beasts in the cattle-ships is equally bad: the most obvious arrangements to give food and water are neglected, and beasts after a long voyage become so exhausted that they lie down and are trampled upon. Inasmuch as the cost of meat has been so greatly raised by the cattle plague, and the vexatious Orders in Council to which it has given rise, it is of the utmost importance that for the future it shall not again re-enter this country through the introduction of foreign cattle. The whole of England was poisoned, we are told, through the Metropolitan Cattle Market, at which beasts were sold that had been brought up the Thames. In order to shut this door it has been proposed that a foreign cattle market shall be established somewhere down the river, near the place of landing from the steamers, that here the cattle should be sold and slaughtered, and only allowed to enter the metropolis as dead meat. If this could be done the metropolis would at once get rid of many obnoxious trades which cluster around the slaughter-housesthe fat-boiling, bone-boiling, blood manure-making, catgut-making, the hide and bone stores, &c., which now render the neighbourhood of Whitechapel so unhealthy and unsavoury. It would also prevent any further fear on the head of the cattle plague. The butchers, however, "do not see it." They say that it will not do to separate the foreign and the home market, and that we must have but one market for three millions of people. It seems to be agreed, however, that it would be well to land foreign beasts much lower down the river than we do at present. It is the last twenty or thirty miles coming up the river, where there is a want of circulation of air, that distresses the cattle. This would be avoided by their being landed lower down the Thames, and carried to the Islington Cattle Market direct. We suppose it is necessary to have a live meat market in the metropolis, inasmuch as in hot weather it affords a kind of reserve for the butcher to fall back upon, in ease there should be any falling off in the dead meat supply; but even in these emergencies the butchers forget that we have telegraphs and railways at our disposal, and beasts may be slaughtered down in the country at half an hour's notice, and sent up by the midnight train. We feel convinced that in another twenty years it will be as rare a sight to see an ox driven through the City as it is now to see a camel. But these results will require a little time to reconcile the trade to them.

We have shown that the dead meat is becoming the great source of metropolitan supply. More than half of the meat sold is killed in the country. comes regularly from Aberdeen, a distance of 600 miles-it comes also from Cornwall. If it can be brought fresh across the length and the breadth of the land, we see no reason why, with proper railway arrangements, it should not come to the metropolitan market from every part of the country. As far as we can see, there is only one objection to the supply of London wholly by country-killed meat, and that is, it would deprive the poor of their chief food, the offal. The liver and lights, the heart, the tripes, and the feet, form the principal flesh food of the working classes. If these "oddments" were left behind-and they would scarcely bear carriage -one indispensable item of food would be cut off from the working population. The West-end never touches these things, hence the dead-meat trade is gradually absorbing the whole market in that quarter.

Dead meat is beginning to come from abroad too. Holland sends us legs and shoulders of mutton. The distance is not great, and in the cold weather meat travels very well by sea. A large portion of Scotch beef and mutton also comes by the same mode. In a few years we shall certainly be supplied largely from France and Denmark. At present the arrangements for the sale of dead meat are so horrible that only Englishmen would put up with them. Newgate Market, the chief market, is so thronged in the morning that its narrow entrances are impassable for hours. In a year or so all this will be remedied by the fine market now building on the site of Old Smithfield. Here we shall find a complete system of railwass in the basement of the market, and the market above. The meat will be lifted from the vans by hoists to the shambles over head. This market will be placed in direct communication with the slaughter-houses of Islington Market by means of the Metropolitan Railway, and sooner or later the Great Western, Great Northern, and North-Western, will run into it. By the use of the telegraph and special meat trains running at high speeds, it will be able to command all the country slaughter-houses, and by a touch of electric fire our commissariat will be replenished almost as quickly as it could be by the slaughtermen of the metropolis. When one thinks of the amazing increase of stock that is consumed in London, the wonder is how we have been able to get on as we have done with our miserable market arrangements. Our foreign importations, it must be remembered, have only began within these last twenty years, and during that time our farms have doubled the number of flocks and herds they used to support. A very large per-centage of this new supply finds its way to the miserable holes and corners in the metropolis we were pleased to call markets, before the opening of the new emporium at Islington. Even now our dead-meat markets would be a disgrace to any fifth-rate town, to say nothing of the largest capital of the world.

It is just possible that we may be able to draw upon still further fields for our meat supplies than even the wide one of continental Europe. We have all heard of jerked beef, or the charqué of South America. This is the first of the preserved provisions that has made any noise, or has, indeed, been freely used by Englishmen as an article of diet. We have long known that the flocks and herds of South America count by millions. Even in those countries bordering the river Plate, we are told that there are 22,000,000 eattle and 35,000,000 sheep that are valuable there merely for their skins, horns, and fleeces. The meat which we pine for, is a mere drug in that country. Legs of mutton are selling for a shilling each in the large towns, and beef is comparatively cheaper. If we could only preserve this meat so as to be able to carry it across the sea to England, what a boon it would be to our starving millions! Many energetic men have tried to solve this problem by different processes. The best known of these is by cutting the flesh into slips, which are salted and then dried in the sun. The beef thus prepared certainly has this advantage, that one pound of it contains less than half as much water as we find in English fresh meat, and it contains double the amount of nitrogenous matter, which is very important, as it can be sold for 3d. per pound; its cost being really only 12d. The nutriment found in this article of food is very great, but then it is not very palatable. Health and strength could be sustained by it, but even the poor would soon tire of eating it. The moist charqué contains more water, but still far less than our fresh beef, but would never be used as a staple article of food. The salting process takes away many of the more nourishing qualities of the meat, at least when used externally in the old method. We hear, however, that Mr. Williams, long resident in South America, has patented a new process by which the meat is preserved in a much more scientific method. Whilst the beast is yet warm its chest is opened, the great artery leading from the heart is exposed, and brine is forced into it by great pressure. In ten minutes all the blood is driven before it, and the whole ox salted so thoroughly that every capillary or fine vessel is filled with the preserving fluid, so that by merely cutting the ear or hoof the brine flows out quite pure. This beef is preferable on every account to that salted by the old method, but still it is salt meat, and will not therefore become a staple article of food, although we hear that the samples sent over have sold freely in Liverpool, the price being about 4d. per pound. But fresh beef is the thing desired, and we have certainly tasted of South American beef in the joint which was brought over here as fresh in appearance as though it had just come from Newgate Market. The method of preserving it in this condition is as old as the hills, but this particular process has been patented by Messrs. Sloper and Paris, two gentlemen connected with the house of Messrs. M'Call. The process is as follows: The fresh meat is cut into joints of a suitable size and placed in tin canisters having a hole at the top and a hole at the bottom; water is then forced in at the bottom until it entirely fills the canister, driving the air or oxygen, the destructive agent, before it; when all the air is expelled the water withdrawn, and is followed by a gas the nature of which is not known, which fills the tin, on the completion of which process the canister is hermetically sealed. The action of the gas is like that of a police-constableit has no oxydising qualities itself, but the moment oxygen leaks in from any imperfection in the tin, the gas instantly seizes hold of it, and renders it powerless to taint the meat. The gas is in all probability the sulphite of potash, which has such a very great affinity for oxygen, that it instantly combines with it and forms the sulphate of potash, which keeps the beef sweet. The dinner given in the City a short time since by the patentees of this process, was served with dishes made from this fresh beef, and it certainly was excellent. Measures are being taken to bring this food over in large quantities, and we trust it will be a very valuable supplement to our European sources of supply. It can be sold at 5d. per pound, a very great recommendation in these hard times. If this process turns out to be practicable on a commercial scale, we can scarcely estimate its value. It will give us the power to feed the scarcity of one region with the superfluities of another. Beef and mutton are good things, but there are scores of other articles of food obtainable in foreign countries which will then be easily transferred to this.

Baron Liebig has taken advantage of the cheapness of South American beef to establish a factory for his preparation known as "Extractum Carnis," at Fray Bentos, near the establishment of Mr. Morgan in the vicinity of the town of Paysandú, in the republic of Uruguay. Mr. Ford, her Majesty's consul at Buenos Ayres, who has made a report to Lord Clarendon respecting the different means of preserving the South American beef, from which we have already quoted, says with respect to the Baron's method, "This process differs essentially from that employed by Mr. Morgan, for the meat, instead of being preserved whole, is reduced to an essence, and can, consequently, only be used as a thick soup or stock. . . Eight small tins will hold the concentrated elementary matter of an entire ox, at a price of 96s. and will make over 1,000 basins of soup, good strong soup; one tea-spoonful to a large cup of water, and either alone or with an addition of a little bread, potato, and salt, affords a good sound repast." This sounds very well, a very multum in parvo; but Mr. Vosper, an analytic chemist, in a communication to the Lancet, declares that, so far from being an essence of meat, it is deficient in gelatine and fat, and that the fibrin and albumen are insoluble in water, therefore boiling it in that element to produce an essence will not give those elements. If this is the case, we fear "one pound of the essence, which is sufficient to make broth for 128 men," according to Mr. Ford, will do these 128 men little good, as they will get only five grains each of a material from which many of the blood-making qualities are withdrawn. Dr. Hassall has, however, patented a process which he calls the "Flour of Meat," which possesses all the elements of the meat, even to the fibrin itself, which is ground down to an impalpable powder. The value of this preparation to invalids is great, because a cup of highly nutritious beef-tea can be made from it in a moment. This preparation, however valuable to the invalid, can scarcely come under the title of food for the million, inasmuch as the price is above their reach; but if the doctor could prepare it like the Baron in South America, where beef is worth scarcely anything, another most valuable and nourishing aliment could be furnished to the public at a very cheap rate. The more preparations we have, giving us the real essence of meat, the better; it is with pleasure, therefore, that we hear a firm is busy in Australia transferring to us the superfluous flesh of that country. An Englishman may say with Macbeth, "I have stomach for them all."

ANDREW WYNTER.

DERVISHES IN SYRIA,

Dervisues may be divided into two classes—those who belong to fraternities or societies for religious exercises, whose tenets and oaths are kept so secret that the uninitiated can only describe their outward appearance and the ceremonies which are practised in public; and those recluses who, without belonging to any special sect, profess holiness and abstinence, and wander solitarily over the face of the earth.

Of the first class the principal sect is that of the "Mowlawiyeh" (singular, "Mowlawi"). head-quarters are at Konia in Karamania. follow various trades and callings, and assemble on certain days at their hospice for religious exercises. They wear a tall drab felt hat, shaped like an inverted flower-pot or sugar-loaf, with a flattened top, around which the sheikh of the order wears a turban of white or green muslin neatly folded in lattice pattern; it is called the "taj," or crown. Then they have a close-fitting white cotton jacket, and long white skirt of cotton stuff gored from the waist and leaded at the hem; and over all they wear a "farajîyeh," or loose garment of coloured merino or cloth, made very wide, and with long loose sleeves. These latter articles, however, are only worn when the dervishes are going to a religious entertainment: but the taj is always worn. They have establishments at Konia, Constantinople, Cairo, Damascus, and Tripoli, the superiors of which are appointed by the chief man at Konia. They practise abstinence and charity, perform the "zikr,"-a repetition of the name and attributes of the Deity, -with a twirling dance to the music of the "kanûr," a kind of stringed instrument, the tambourine, and "nakarat," or kettle-drums. On certain days they distribute soup and bread to all poor applicants, from the local funds, and are generally respected by those who know them or have any dealings with them.

I have been present at many of their weekly gatherings in Damascus, and think a description of these may not be uninteresting to the reader.

The "Tektyeh," which is both hospice and convent for the dervishes of this order, is situated in a pleasant spot just outside the gate of the city. The windows of the rooms look out on a garden well cultivated both with fruit-trees and flowers. A considerable stream from the river Barada is conducted through the garden, and over its course are erected kiosks or summer-rooms. A mosque is attached to the establishment; it is of about 40 feet square; and in it an octagonal space of about 30 feet each way is railed off and well floored with smooth polished boards, for the prayers, zikrs, and other ceremonies. Between the railing and the wall a space of about five feet wide is left all round for the spectators. On the northern side is an elevated balcony for the orchestra and a few dervishes and favoured guests. In a recess on the eastern side there is a latticed balcony for ladies; and on the western side is a recess containing the cenotaphs of some celebrated members of the order who have died in Damascus.

The zikr is performed every Thursday after noonprayers. The door of the mosque is opened a little before noon, when those desirous of witnessing the ceremony assemble and take their places in the space allotted to them.

A little after noon a dervish in a red cloth "binesh" or farajîyeh, makes his appearance, carrying a sheepskin stained red and a small praying-carpet. The carpet is very reverentially spread out near the middle of the stage, and the sheepskin is placed upon it. Fourteen dervishes, wearing their farajiyehs and other distinguishing marks of the order, then come in, bow to the carpet on passing it, and kneel down on the stage at about equal distances from each other with their backs to the railings. The musicians and a few dervishes go to the orchestral balcony. sheikh then comes in, wearing a black or green cloth binesh (which is not quite so loose as the farajiyeh), and with a white or green turban neatly folded round his pale drab taj, as in the sketch. He bows to the carpet, and then takes his position upon it in an attitude of prayer, with his face turned towards the south. The other dervishes and about an equal number of the spectators arrange themselves in various rows behind him and say their prayers also, but all in silence. Presently, when the "fard" or obligatory prayers are concluded, they arrange themselves in two ranks, like soldiers, and go through the "surach" or customary prayers, rising, kneeling, and making the prostrations to the word of command, as it were.

Prayers being over, those of the spectators who had joined in them step over the railing to their places again. The sheikh's carpet and sheepskin, which are regarded as emblems of the secret powers of the sheikh who founded the order, are placed in the south-west angle, and after the sheikh has taken his place on it kneeling, the rest of the dervishes go to their places as before. They kneel thus for several minutes in silence. The sheikh then raises his hands as if holding an open book, and in a melodious voice pronounces the unity of God, implores blessings on the Prophet, the Sultan, and the members of his government.

He then repeats many times the "Tekbîr," or declaration of the greatness of God, "Allahu Akbar." One of the dervishes in the orchestra then chants in a plaintive voice, the others being still seated on their heels and knees as before.

But the kettle-drum is suddenly sounded, whereupon the dervishes all strike the palms of their hands on the ground, and rise simultaneously, and the band strikes up a lively strain. sheikh moves a few paces, reverently bows to his carpet, and, with his arms folded across his chest, marches round the platform. The dervish next to him then approaches the carpet and bows, passes it and bows again, and then follows his sheikh. So do the next and the next, till all have bowed and all are marching round the platform in slow procession. This is done three times. Having returned to their places, they let fall the ends of the white skirts, which have till now been hitched up in their girdles, and they throw off their loose cloak, thus displaying the close-fitting jacket above alluded to.

Those about to join in the twirl, generally about ten or twelve at a time, solemnly cross their arms, place their left hands on their right shoulders, and their right hands on their left shoulders, and kick their long heavy skirts before them, as they hang heavily and cling uncomfortably to the knees.

Each in turn approaches the sheikh with a low bow, and humbly kisses his hand, the sheikh at the same time kissing the dervish's cap. After making a second bow the dervish recedes a few steps, and begins twirling from right to left, like waltzing backwards. He gradually and slowly draws his hands from his shoulders, and stretches them out at arm's length, the palm of the left hand downwards, and that of the right hand upwards. The skirt, being gored and leaded, spreads out like an umbrella without any creases or plaits. The head is generally slightly inclined on one shoulder, and the eyes are closed, as if the performer were in a trance. When all have started, one of them works his way to the middle of the platform, and remains there revolving on his own axis; the others move round him. As the music becomes faster so do the revolutious of the twirlers. The elder, who brought in the sheikh's carpet, walks about with a slow step between the dervishes, and when any one of them gets out of his proper place, he gently stamps his foot to call him to his senses. The sight of these eight or ten human teetotums is really very striking; and it is remarkable that they do not more often come in contact with each other's skirts; but frequent practice, and the superintendence of the spectral dervish who glides about between them, generally prevent such collisions. At the end of about four minutes the music stops with one note from the drum; the dervishes stop almost as suddenly, place their hands across their breasts as before, and step back to their places, most of them streaming with perspiration, but not giddy. They bow, and then the sheikh takes two steps forward to the middle of the platform, and makes one bow, as if thanking them. Chanting then recommences in the orchestra, and lasts for about two minutes. At a change in the tune the dervishes again go through the ceremony of kissing the sheikh's hand, and having their caps kissed by him; and they twirl round the room again for about five minutes, but this time a little faster than before.

For about two minutes there is chanting, and for the third time they kiss the sheikh's hand and twirl; but this time about four of the dervishes, who had not before participated in the dancing, take the places of others, who rest themselves.

When the twirlers have gained a certain position of about equal distances from each other, they make no further progress, but remain stationary, revolving only on their own axis; and the sheikh, taking hold of the collar of his coat in his right hand, makes two steps forward, and twirls in a most dignified manner. The music gradually quickens, till all the dervishes seem in a state of eestasy, and remain so for about ten minutes. When the music is stayed, the twirling also ceases, and they return to their places, put on their farajiyehs, and kneel down in silent meditation. Presently the sheikh commences the Fât-hah,—the first chapter of the Koran, which is supposed to be repeated in silence by all good Moslems present. This done, they all stand up. The first dervish on the sheikh's left hand approaches with a bow, kisses the sheikh's hand, and takes up his position on the sheikh's right. The next then kisses the hand of the sheikh, and then that of the first dervish, and takes his position still on the right hand. They follow each other till each has kissed the hand of all who have passed before. The sheikh then reverently bows to his carpet and retires. The others follow the example, and the elder in red carries away the carpet and sheepskin.

Some of these dervishes are very old men, whereas others are mere boys. The "Ahmediyeh" are distinguished by a red turban and a red garment. They practise the zikr, but are more numerous in Egypt than in Syria. The "Bekriyeh" have white as their distinguishing colour. They also practise the zikr. The "Khalwatiyeh" resemble the Bekriyeh, and only practise the zikr. The "Rafa'fyeh" wear a drab felt hat somewhat less high than that of the "Mowlawiyeh." Round it the sheikh wears a white woollen turban, with a piece of green ribbon crossing the front part. They practise the zikr with such great violence as frequently to produce cataleptic fits. They eat fire, glass, and serpents. They perform feats with swords and other sharp instruments, thrusting them into their flesh without apparently doing any injury. I have seen a young man with as many as sixteen or eighteen skewers protruding from his neck and body, and another passed through each cheek. When the sheikh draws out the skewer, he wets the tip of his finger with saliva, and, applying it to the wound, no blood flows, and although there is a hole, it does not look like a serious wound. When I saw glass eaten, I thought that some other transparent but more easily digested substance had been substituted for it; so, after the performance, I spoke to one of the dervishes on the subject. He assured me that it was real glass, and offered to eat my friend's spectacles, but they could not be spared. He then brought down a glass lamp, which we examined, and deliberately bit from it piece after piece, and crunched it up between his teeth with as much apparent relish as if it had been short-bread. It is a mystery to me. I cannot explain it; I only state the fact.

The "Sh'eibaniyeh" wear the taj and white turban, like the Rafa'iych, but without the green ribbon. They practise the same rites. The "Sa'adfyeh" wear a small taj and a white turban, and follow the same rites and practices as the Rafa'iyeh and the Sh'eibaniyeh. The "Shazliyeh," again, wear a white shirt and a white skull-cap. They only practise the zikr. The "Sawiveh" adopt both the dress and the rites of the Khalwatiyeh. "Kadrîyeh" wear a worked cap, with an edging or fringe of black or coloured silk or wool. They sometimes wear a white woollen turban wound round their cap, with a piece of green ribbon on the right side. They practise the zikr, accompanied by a large drum and a tambourine. The "Nakshbendiych" wear a white skull-cap. They practise the zikr in silence, and seek God's favour. "Bakdashiyeh" wear a drab felt hat, not quite so high as that of the Mowlawiyeh, wound with a turban of white muslin. They generally wear stone tablets on their chests, and carry horns. which they blow, producing a very loud noise. They have no zikrs, or prayers and ceremonies. They are not bound to abstain from forbidden things, nor to obey the commandments. wear their hair very long, and make frequent mention of the name of 'Ali.

Having now disposed of our first class of dervishes, we come to the other class, which is made up of a large variety of characters. The Bakdashiyeh, the last-mentioned of the first class, may perhaps be numbered among them. They vary in habits, dispositions, and dress. Some are mere maniacs or idiots, and are especially respected on that account, it being believed that God has favoured them, and raised them above worldly intelligence. Others are religious devotees. Some again are mere impostors, who, under the garb of poverty and religion, gain a good livelihood in performing the rites ordinarily practised by regular dervishes, such as writing amulets and charms. They pretend to elairvoyance, and even to bodily locomotion by supernatural agency. They divine the authors of conspiracy, theft, or robbery; perform tricks of jugglery and sleight of hand, mutter prayers over persons afflicted with sickness, and practise other rites similar to those of the dervish "Bideen" and his companions, so graphically described by the late Mr. Morier, in his highly interesting work, entitled "The Adventures of Hadji Baba in Ispahan."

Of course a great deal of self-confidence and effrontery are necessary to support the character of a dervish. The bolder he is if an impostor, and the madder he is if a real maniac, the greater are the respect and veneration shown him. He has carte-blanche to enter almost any place he chooses. He visits the pashas and high functionaries, who rise and kiss his hand, and place him in a seat of honour. When the dervish has gained sufficient influence over the pasha, he upbraids him, flatters him, or reproaches him, just as may suit his purpose: his sayings and doings being considered as especially directed by Providence. It is even considered a mark of God's favour should a madman of this class conceive a passion, and it would be encouraged rather than opposed. "It takes a wise man to make a fool," and on this principle impostors rarely include in such intrigues, lest a scandal and revolt should be produced in the minds of even such bigots as now revere them. I have, however, heard of several instances during my residence in the East; for dervishes have sometimes as much influence and power over Moslem families as Jesuit priests have occasionally over Roman Catholic families. But they are too wise to make much use of it.

The following is an instance of an impostor's influence: - Some years ago, Damascus had a very superstitious governor-general. A dervish, whom we will call Sheikh Ahmed, was in the habit of visiting him, and congratulated him or scolded him, slandered people or praised them, just as it suited his purpose. He pretended to be very poor, and said that he did not seek to alter his position, even refusing presents of money offered him by the pasha; but he made ample amends for his selfdenial in the large sums he exacted from other persons who bribed him to speak a word in their

He had been very extortionate and cruel towards the Jews, and was jealous of the position and rank of the chief general accountant, who was a Jew named Rafael. This man had suffered many indignities at the sheikh's hands, and at last conceived a plan to relieve himself and his community from the oppression.

Sheikh Ahmed had pretended to the pasha that he was miraculously transported every Friday from Damascus to Mecca, where he joined in the prayers of the faithful in the Haram; and he returned every Friday afternoon with all the consequential bearing of a religious enthusiast whose holiness is unquestioned. The pasha believed in him, and devoutly kissed his hand always on his return, as one just arrived from a holy place.

The Jewish sarrâf obtained a very fine jet rosary of Mecca workmanship, and removing from it the long bead at the top, called the "meidaneh," or minaret, presented it thus incomplete to the pasha. His excellency accepted it, but regretted the absence of the meidaneh, and asked where it was. Rafael answered that it had been lost by a former owner, but that the pasha need not be uneasy on that score, for, being of Mecca workmanship, it could be replaced, and as Sheikh Ahmed, the dervish, was in the habit of visiting Mecca every Friday, he might be commissioned to bring one back with him.

The pasha was satisfied with this, and next day, when the sheikh came, his excellency showed him the present, and, pointing out the deficiency, said,

When you bring it back complete it will have an additional value.

The sheikh promised to comply with the pasha's request, and immediately left the apartment inwardly chagrined. He soon found out who had made the present, and guessed the motive. That evening he disguised himself, and, for the first time in his life, polluted himself by entering a Jew's house, namely, that of Rafael, the sarraf. He was shown into a handsome room in the outer court, and Rafael soon entered from the inner court. He expressed in the most powerful terms the honour the sheikh had conferred upon him in visiting his poor house.

The sheikh answered, "I am not here for compliments; we are men of the world, and must understand each other. You have given the pasha a rosary without a meidaneh, and I want the rest from you." The host confessed that he had presented an incomplete rosary to the pasha, and that it was altogether unworthy of his acceptance, but added that he had never seen the meidauch. The wily old dervish knew better, and it was now a case of "diamond cut diamond." He declared that he saw through the plot, promised that the Jews should be protected in future, and that none of them should ever be molested if Rafael would only give up the coveted meidaneli.

The Jew was not content with this verbal assurance, as it might be broken the very next day, and he therefore remained obdurate, though with an affected humility. "God forbid," he said, "that I should deny you anything I possess, especially when you have honoured me by this visit. I am yours, my house is yours, and all it contains; but as to the rosary, had it been perfect it would never have fallen to the lot of a poor man of my rank. The sheikh used all kinds of persuasion, but in vain. Rafael remained inexorable. At last Sheikh Ahmed drew forth his inkhorn, and unfolding a clean sheet of paper, wrote on it as follows :- "The reason of this writing is, that I the undersigned Sheikh Ahmed confess that I have received from the hands of the Sarraf Rafael the jet meidaneh of the rosary which he, the above mentioned, gave incomplete to his Excellency the Pasha, and I make this declaration in writing in proof of the compact existing between us." He then signed it, and removing the signet ring from the little finger of his right hand, placed the tip of the pen on the signet, rubbed the ink to an even surface over the face of it, then with the tip of his third finger he moistened a spot near his signature and sealed the document. He then held it out to his host, saying, "Take this bond, read it, and give me the meidanch; and know at the same time that you are now my master, for if I do not exert myself to my utmost ability to serve your people, you can disgrace me by exhibiting this paper."

It was now Rafael's turn to be humble and to "I wish you to take the resary with you next confess. He took the paper, carefully folded it up Friday to Mecca, and purchase a meidaneh for it. and concealed it in a box in the bookcase; then opening a paper parcel, he drew forth the subject of the visit and presented it to the sheikh, who received it with a thousand thanks. Sheikh Ahmed left the house professing immense friendship for the Jew; but inwardly uttering imprecations on him and on his family, and generations past and present.

On the following Friday the sheikh concealed himself as usual, and a few hours after noon came down from his hiding-place, and bustling along in a great perspiration and covered with dust, proceeded to the divan where the pasha was anxiously awaiting him. After receiving the pasha's more than usual homage he presented the rosary complete.

His excellency's faith in the sheikh's miraculous power of locomotion was thus confirmed, and he thanked him very sincerely. By this means the Jews were to a great extent freed from oppression.

A village woman, who had strong suspicions of the sheikh's dishonesty and falsity, invited him to dine at her house, and asked the principal villagers to meet him. At the appointed time the guests arrived, and dinner was served, consisting of several dishes of rice, and between them hashes of various kinds, such as meat and onious stewed together with butter, and vegetable marrows scooped out and filled with chopped meat. But immediately in front of the reputed saint she placed a dish consisting of a nicely cooked fowl with boiled rice, and then covered with a thin layer of boiled burghul, or bruised wheat, which is looked upon as inferior to rice. She directed the attention of the dervish especially to this dish, as she said she had prepared it on purpose for him. He tried to excuse himself by saying that he was not accustomed to burghul. The hostess insisted, but the sheikh protested that he preferred the rice. The guests now interfered and begged the woman to desist from such importunity, and to leave the learned man to his own wishes, as it was contrary to the rules of hospitality. She then plunged her hand into the dish and drew forth the fowl stuffed with rice, and showing that there was only a very thin layer of burghul on it, she said, "There, my sheikhs, do you think that the dervish who could not see a fowl through a thin coating of burghul, close to his face and hands, could see what happened in the holy mosque at Mecca hundreds of hours away? No, he is a cheat."

The rest of the meal did not pass off very agreeably, and the guests, although much disappointed, could not help admiring the woman's wit.

GOD HEARS.

THOUGH the heavens be as brass, and the clouds drop lead;

Though the living walk as foes, and our friends lie dead:

Though the mighty rule the right, and uphold black wrong;

Though the song of victory be a blatant song,
Though the cry of the oppress'd riseth all day long:

Yet, beyond our Heaveu, and beyond our clouds, Stand the white-robed angels, in their countless crowds;

These all have striven, as we strive this day, These all have wearied on the steep, dark way, They, too, petition'd, even as we pray:— O God, our Father, unto whom we cry, We know, past doubting, Thou indeed art nigh; By all Thy doings ere we saw this light, By what shall follow when we sleep in night; We know, our Father, Thou wilt keep the right.

The world is Thine, and it can but go As Thou dost utter, "Let it be so." These all shall smoothen in Thine own good time,— The rude, rough clanging turn to Sabbath chime: There is no ruin in Thy plan sublime.

And we too, Father, claim the kindred sweet, Thine own weak children cling about Thy feet, And meekly bathe them, in repentant tears, And bring before Thee all unspoken fears And speechless sorrows,—for we know God hears.

THE ART OF SELF-PROTECTION AGAINST THIEVES AND ROBBERS.

In former articles on the criminal question, the course of investigation was confined to the character, the habits, and the machinations of the thieves, in order that the public might to some extent understand the subject on its criminal side. Such understanding was necessary, for how can crime be either crushed or guarded against unless it is understood? But there is one important part of the question which remains to be discussed. The art of self-protection against thieves and robbers is interesting to all, and the space now at our disposal cannot be better employed than in teaching the public how to take care of themselves. Many of the hints which we shall give, have been supplied to us by convicts and others of the criminal classes.

To a large extent the public certainly can take care of themselves, and this important duty ought not to be neglected, simply because no precautionary measures can render the success of thieves altogether and absolutely impossible. It is chiefly by the carelessness and ignorance of the people that the criminal fraternity succeed, and popular carelessness in not a few instances is so excessive and egregious as to form a positive inducement and opportunity to the thief and the swiudler.

The police statistics often contain startling facts illustrative of the carelessness of the multitude. The Manchester Police Report for the year 1832 informs us that the number of robberies committed on Sundays in shops and dwelling-houses during the absence of the proprietors, amounted to forty-three, from which property to the value of 237l. was abstracted. Six thousand five hundred and twenty pounds were taken by the police from drunken persons, and restored to them when sober. Five thousand nine hundred and thirty-three children were reported as lost; and two thousand two hundred and five premises were left insecure, by doors, windows, &c., not being fastened.

The foregoing facts are startling enough, and as one cannot suppose that the Manchester people are more careless than the inhabitants of other towns, Captain Palin's statistics may be regarded as a specimen of the carelessness of the people throughout the country. With such known opportunities as these, no wonder that thieves are bold and successful, and that the criminal class perpetuates itself from generation to generation. Surely common seuse and the most ordinary prudence should teach people not to leave their doors open ready for thieves to enter in, or to place themselves at the mercy of pickpockets by being intoxicated in the streets. But there are many other sources of danger which the people en masse cannot know until they are put before them, and several of these we hasten to explain.

Some of the ways in which men lay themselves open to thieves, need no explaining. If people won't keep sober when they are abroad, they must suffer for their inebriety. What can men expect, if, on being accosted familiarly by a total stranger, they will allow themselves to be drawn aside and held in suspicious and culpable conversation? This gentle hint, which those whom it most concerns can easily take, accounts for many street robberies, both by day as well as by night. And it would place no small check upon theft, if the laws of the land refused to assist a man to recover his stolen purse, who voluntarily enters a habitation which is legally defined to be contra bonos mores.

Happy are the people who are safe without locks, and who can afford to dispense with bolts and bars; happy are the folk who have no need to fasten their doors except to keep out the cold, or to prevent their being opened by the wind. But at present Britain is no such paradise of security and innocence. In this country, and in all other civilized countries, security and reputation, life and property, are often all dependent upon the handicraft of the locksmith. Look to your locks, reader. Chubb can do more for you than the policeman. Inside of the house and out of it, people who wish to be safe, must look to their locks. The locks on entrance doors, being the most publicly situated, are the most likely of all to be attempted. Yet very few houses, when first built, are furnished with reliable locks. In many a row of dwellinghouses, should one of the occupants, returning home on a dark night, miss his own door, and go by mistake to that of a neighbour, he will find his latch-key provide him an entrance just as easily as to his own house, and not discover his error until he is inside. Notwithstanding the large trade in good and secure door locks, by far the greater proportion of street doors are kept closed (for it is absurd to say they are fastened) by most worthless articles. It is a common circumstance in the police courts, when a thief has been captured while trying to effect an entrance at some house door, to hear the officer's statement that he has taken from the prisoner a few pick-lock keys which he has since found will open most of the doors in the locality. Still, it is necessary to look to other entrances than the principal door. If a thief finds a lock too far his master, he will seek some other entrance, and often find it in a back door, an area door, or an unbolted window. Even a bolted window is not safe unless the bolt be of such construction that it cannot be unfastened by means of a knife inserted between the window sashes. The chief point of safety for door locks consists in having a variety of tumblers, thereby rendering useless pick-locks and false keys. The "Mortise Latch" is about the neatest of Mr. Chubb's productions, because, being sunk into the wood from the edge of the door, nothing is seen of it but the keyhole and handle. It has also this advantage, that it reduces the size of the key required to a minimum; indeed it is sometimes made so small as to be set under the stone of an ordinary finger ring, and be quite concealed while the ring is worn. Warehouses, stores, and such places as are left uninhabited, are very generally secured with a bar and padlock on the entrance door. The chief objection to this method is the liability of a padlock to be wrenched off, it being, of all kinds of locks, the most exposed. In general a lock fixed upon the inside of the door is preferable, as nothing but its keyhole is visible outside. In some cases, however, a padlock has its advantages. Padlocks are extensively used on warehouse doors in London, and the police officers argue in their favour that if a door having only an inside lock be either forced open, or unlocked with the right key, if that be surreptitionsly obtained, the thief can enter and secure the door on the inside, so that it appears fast on being pushed from the outside; whereas, if a padlock be used, it must be removed or hang loose, and cannot be replaced while the person is inside the premises. So the policeman on going his rounds would instantly miss it, and see that something was wrong.

Iron safe locks, when their various manufacturers had adopted measures to protect them from being drilled into, were attempted by gunpowder. An ordinarily made lever lock may be crammed with gunpowder, the key-hole of the safe then plugged up, leaving merely a small touch-hole, and a fuse applied and lit, when presently the powder explodes, and does serious damage to the works of the lock, generally blowing away all its security at one discharge. A special construction is requisite in order to counteract this effect, and this has been satisfactorily attained in Chubb's powder-proof lock for iron safes, one of which has not only been charged and exploded more than thirty consecutive times without any effect, but at the end of the trials it answered perfectly to its key, none of its working powers being at all injured.

It is not merely necessary to secure iron safes and entrance doors with good locks. There is a vast quantity of petty theft within the house sometimes, and by those engaged about it; wine-cellars, plateclosets, and jewel cases, often suffer in private houses; cash boxes, desks, and tills in the counting-house and shop. Frequently, indeed, it is found that the key of a really secure lock upon a wine-cellar, plate-closet, or even of a strong room or iron safe, is kept in a drawer or desk with a lock on the latter so common as to be opened with a bent wire, which is thus, virtually, the key of the supposed secure receptacle!

It is commonly objected that it is useless to place an expensive lock on such articles as cash-boxes, travelling-bags, portmanteaus, &c., as the one could be easily run away with, the others cut open. The answer is simple: -no one in a counting-house would be likely to carry off a cash-box, nor would servants at hotels cut open portmanteaus; but in either case there is the temptation to pilfer, when it is known that common locks are so easy of access.

If thieves are determined to break into a house, it will be next to impossible to keep them out, but their entrance may be made so difficult and dangerous, that they will not dare to run the risk. Additional arrangements in the police force might increase the difficulties of burglars very consider-As the arrangements are at present, the regularity of the policeman's beat helps the thieves not a little; the policeman, easily recognised by his uniform, is watched through his rounds, and when he has passed the marked house, the thieves know that it will be some time before he passes it again. The policeman's uniform, again, is of great assistance to pickpockets, who seeing the officer near or in the distance, abstain from their purposes, and hide away until he passes. As for the detectives, a great deal more has been placed to their credit than they deserve, for the fact is they detect very little, unless it be in consequence of "information received" from some bribed thief, who "peaches" upon his comrades. Still there is a certain kind of private and general service which they render, and on that account they cannot be through before the fastening can be removed.

very well dispensed with, though some of the members of that department of the service would do well to dispense with their showy pride and ostentatious vanity. The great need is an intermediate force in plain clothes, to occupy a middle position between the detectives and the men and officers of the ranks. Let this additional force have no fixed beat, but send them out into different parts of the town at irregular intervals, independent of the men on the fixed beats. A fixed policeman may be bribed, or out of the way, or at any rate his rounds are so regular, that the regular thieves generally know when and where to find him; but an irregular, flying squadron could not be recognised, the criminals could not calculate upon their whereabouts, and consequently many burglars, and especially pickpockets, would be suddenly pounced upon and caught.

House dogs and watch dogs come in for their share of work in the protection of life and property. Dogs outside the house may deter the less expert and daring robbers, but are of no use as against the professional burglar, because he takes care to have them drugged or poisoned previous to his nocturnal visit. Yard dogs should be supplemented by curs within the house, and these should not be allowed to run loose within the house, for in that case they too might be drugged or poisoned. Fasten your cur always at the foot of the stairs, and then you may defy all the burglars in London to get at him in time to prevent his alarming the whole house by his furious barks.

Permit another hint or two about the inside of the house. Some householders burn a light all night, in the belief that it will induce burglars to suppose that some of the inmates are still astir. But this does not always produce the intended effect. Many a house has been robbed while the signal light was in. This device may deter unpractised thieves, and it may prevent an unpremeditated robbery on the part of professional thieves. But this is really all that the light can do. In the case of a planned depredation the house is watched day and night for some time, and thus they know how many inmates there are, where they sleep, and what the midnight light means. Shutters should always be fastened on the inside with stout iron bars, so fixed that they cannot be removed except by lifting them up, and this, through a small aperture, is very difficult for the burglar to do. The uniformity of method in fastening shutter bars gives the burglars a chance, but if every one fastened them in his own way the burglars could have no uniform method of overcoming them, and would be puzzled how to proceed. Suppose the burglar does get into the house, his depredations may generally be confined, by door chains, to one room, unless he comes in at the front door, which he is not very likely to do in a general way. Door chains are better than locks, for they cannot be picked, and the panel must be cut Bolts or chains are best for sleeping rooms, for the same reasons. The noise of cutting through a panel would surely waken any sleeper. The only objection to chains for down-stair doors is the disfigurement; but what disfigurement can there be in a brass chain? Is it not better to prefer safety to appearances? Plate, jewellery, and other valuables should not be kept always in the same place except it be in a "strong room," or stout "patent safe." Old servants, and tradesmen who have been working in the house, sometimes "put up," a robbery, i.e., give information to the burglars as to the internal arrangements of the house, which explains their often going direct to what they want. When things are shifted the thief is sometimes baffled. It is a dangerous thing to leave a key in the door, as it can be easily turned from the outside by instruments used for the purpose.

Suppose, notwithstanding all your precaution, the burglars are actually in the house; then comes the question how are you to get them out again? As a general rule, the burglar would rather go without booty than stay in the house to run the risk of being shot, captured, or identified another day. If you are strong enough to capture your visitors, do so; but if not, you had better keep at a distance, instead of closing with them for an unequal fight. Rouse an alarm through the windows, or shout through the house; especially let them hear the crack of your pistol, and feel its bullet: they will not stay for you to give them a second barrel, so take good aim in the first instance, and wing your game. Burglars will seldom fight if they can get away without it. They dread the consenuences of robbery with violence. But if you drive them into a corner, and they cannot get away without fighting, then they will fight, and nothing will stop them from fighting except a pistol pointed at their head, and the crack of which they have already heard. Occasionally the burglars will set a watch over a bedroom door to give warning if the inmates come out. A convict once told us the following story:-He was engaged in robbing a house, and had to mount guard over a bedroom in which two young men were sleeping. He heard them talking. One said, "I'm certain there's somebody in the house; go down-stairs and see." The other answered, "No! you go." Neither of them durst turn out, and so the burglary was completed. Now if they had both turned out or opened the window and raised an alarm, the robbery would have been prevented.

Heavy robberies are often committed by house-breakers and burglars, but, on the whole, this is the least successful and least part of the criminal trade. It is by pocket-picking, in its various methods, that the public are the greatest losers. When people are travelling or walking, they are sometimes absent in mind, and while their wits are away from them, instead of being all about them, the thieves help themselves. They are keen-eyed, and can soon tell by a man's cut and manner if his thoughts are so occupied in reverie or otherwise as to make him lost to everything around him. In this state of absence and abstraction, whether in the omnibus, the train, the church, or the theatre, their next neighbour, if he be a thief, does his criminal work, and either makes off, or hands the spoil to some one else; or perhaps he will keep his place for awhile to lull suspicion, especially if he is too respectably dressed to be suspected. Watch chains, and ladies' outside pockets are considered good guides by the criminal classes. The chain shows there is a watch, and they have only to run their light finger along it to come to the fob. The thief gets the watch into his hand, and suddenly snaps the bow (which he may easily do) to which the chain is attached. Mr. White, manager for Lister, the Newcastle-upon-Tyne jeweller, has invented an admirable contrivance which renders this method of taking watches impossible. The stud containing the bow to which the chain is attached is made swivel fashion, and so, instead of breaking, it simply turns round in the thief's hand, and he is obliged to give up his prey and flee from his failure. Those who travel much, or mix in dubious crowds, should by all means wear swivelled watches. A ring, fastened at the bottom of the watch pocket, and through which the chain is passed, renders it impossible for the thief to draw the watch clean out. A double pocket, the watch being placed in the second, and the chain passed through a small hole in the pocket, answers the same end. ladies' ontside pockets had been invented on purpose to make picking pockets easy work, the construction of them could scarcely have been more satisfactory to the light-fingered sinners.

Here it may not be out of place to say a word to railway guards. These might prevent the success of many pickpockets, if they would only keep a sharp and intelligent watch upon the passengers. Not only do the railway thieves nearly always travel three together, but they jump in and out at almost every station, and this continual restlessness ought to excite the guards' suspicions. When they are in the carriages, they sit next the door and opposite to each other, having rugs over their arms, under the concealment of which their hands are hidden when they fleece the parties who pass them.

Shopkeepers should be very careful in giving change, and should never count it into the hand of the person who receives it. Money counted into the hand can be easily palmed. This trick is performed by holding part of the money in the palm of the hand by pressing the thumb against it. Then turning the hand quickly over, the palmer lets the loose money fall upon the counter, says it is not the right change, and while the shopkeeper is counting it, the thief slips the palmed cash into his pocket.

When a new shop is opened, or when new people come to an old shop, the thieves immediately begin to ply their arts, and continue to do so until they are detected and driven off. Most shopkcepers of lengthened experience can generally tell when a suspicious character enters their establishment, but it is necessary to apprise all hands immediately that the enemy is within the gate. A little tact casily gets over this difficulty, and puts all the shop-hands upon their guard without letting the thief know that he is watched. An acquaintance of the writer's has a sigual for such emergencies which is understood by all in his employ. When the master, or any of his people, have reason to fear that there is a thief in the shop, the suspecting party calls out, as if in the way of business, and loud enough for all hands to hear, "It's number five." This is a good plan, and every shopkeeper can easily arrange something of the sort for himself.

Exchange robberies might, to a very large extent, be prevented with a little cost and a little care. There should be small private offices upon every Exchange into which gentlemen might go to pay and receive moneys. Then few would know who had money upon them and who had not. But as it is the thief who has managed to get on 'Change has no difficulty in selecting his mark. Bauk-notes are openly handed about, and the thief can easily see what gentleman has them and the pocket in which they are placed, and knowing this he follows up his cue and makes his attempt, always preferring to make it on 'Change. As no ordinary policeman or porter can detect the Exchange thief, there ought to be on every Exchange one or two detectives en permanence. These men have had experience of the disguises of pickpockets, and would soon get to know all the merchants by sight. Then when strangers came on, they would be closely observed.

Pickpockets and their scouts keep a close look-out for likely subjects in the neighbourhood of Money-order Offices, Banks, and Exchanges. People sometimes come out of these places into the street, either with money in their hands or else in the act of adjusting it in their pockets. What can be more ridiculous than this open display of treasure? In dangerous circumstances, such as coming from Bank or Exchange, money is only safe in an inside waistcoat pocket. From any other pocket it can be and has been readily abstracted; and especially if its possessor is subject to morbid fits of absence, and allows himself to be touched in bodily contact with strangers.

Persons who are fleeced by cardsharpers in railway trains and other places are deserving of little sympathy. It is only the lust of mouey that induces them to play. They think the party challenging them to play has plenty of treasure, and they are determined if possible to obtain some of it. Like Eve of old, they see before them the forbidden fruit, covet it, pluck it, and are severely taken in for their pains. Besides, parties who will gamble with strangers in railway trains will not stop at trifles. They think they know a trick or two, but the cardsharper knows a trick or two more. So, each secretly determined to overreach the other, they go to work—unskilled vanity tersua fraudulent craft. The quasi-honest man hungering for the stranger's gold is foiled and stabbed by his own weapons. Serve him right! Why did he play? It is the easiest thing imaginable to defend yourself against cardsharpers, and the whole secret of self-preservation is contained in two words—don't play.

"Hustling" is the most successful of all the stratagems employed by pocket-pickers. A person finds himself pushed against by parties, or he is in some way or other quietly and suddenly brought into bodily contact with strangers. This may happen in the street, in a throng of people, in entering into or coming out of a public conveyance or public building. His being jostled may be only an accident, and he may be only in contact with honest people. Often, however, it is not an accident, but the result of a criminal arrangement. When thus criminally jostled, your watch or purse is gone in a moment. It is a safe rule under all circumstances to avoid being jostled as much as possible.

Parties who are obliged to be much upon the streets, and at untimely hours, should beware of persons who dog their steps. In lonely streets especially, it is best to step aside and let the suspicious follower pass on. If you do not, he may either garotte you, or follow you up until you are in a little difficulty by having to pass three or four people, when he may avail himself of your momentary perplexity to take your purse. The middle of the street is best for late hours, in dangerous quarters. This prevents your being taken by surprise, whereas, if you walk along the flags, some ruffian concealed in a passage or doorway may suddenly spring upon you from behind.

A solitary individual in the hands of garotters has only one chance, and that is to be quiet. Resistance only brings severer physical punishment to the helpless victim, who, being in their hands, is entirely at their mercy.

All the robberies that are committed upon the person, must on no account be put down to the cleverness of the thieves. Evil company, absence of mind, out-of-the-way places, the want of ordinary precaution, untimely hours, and the clation of wine, make people an easy and tempting prey for their furtive enemies.

This is, in all probability, our last article from the criminal side of the general subject of crime. All the papers from this pen have chiefly been written upon the principle that crime could never be exhaustively understood, until some practical use had been made of the information which the thieves themselves could give, and as this has been done as far as practicable, our task in this department of the criminal question is at an end. But much more remains to be done in other and more important aspects of the subject. The prevention of crime, and the treatment of criminals, have been as yet untouched by us, and we cannot take leave of the reader without saying, that when our thoughts on these and other kindred topics are matured, he will probably hear from us again.

By WILLIAM GILBERT, Author of "De Profundis," &c.

CHAPTER XVIII. -THE RED HOUSE AGAIN.

THE winter passed over without any occurrence worthy of remark, Ruth and Fanny Keats remaining in Torquay with the doctor. Walter Morecombe had not only been introduced to the Rev. Mr. Keats and his wife, but had been formally accepted by them as a suitor for their daughter's hand. Edgar Thornbury had taken a furnished house in London for the winter, and along with his nephew occupied himself in organising the contemplated English branch of his firm. From time to time he visited the Red House, to superintend the repairs and alterations, in which he took great interest. The whole house was undergoing a complete metamorphosis. The wish of Dr. Keats, that nothing should be found in it that could remind Ruth of the episodes which had occurred to her there, and which had left so singular an effect upon her memory, was being thoroughly carried out. Besides, as is seldom the case with such works, there was every probability of the alterations being completed within the time specified, and Edgar looked forward with great pleasure to the day when he should be able again to inhabit the old house which had for so many vears belonged to his family.

Spring came on, and with one exception the current of affairs continued to run smoothly. The exception however was a grave one. It will be remembered that Ruth had been severely indisposed, having been thrown on a bed of sickness by an attack of inflammation of the lungs. Although she recovered, the effects of the attack were plainly visible on her during the whole of the winter. Unless the weather was exceedingly mild and genial, it was impossible for her to leave the house without bringing on a most distressing cough. At last the doctor, who began to be very uneasy about her health, prohibited her leaving the house till fine weather should set in. Seclusion of this kind, however, was not without its charms for her. She had not only the satisfaction of being the confidante of Fanny Keats in her love affair (the girl perpetually consulting her upon details which could not have the slightest interest for anybody save the lovers themselves and an old maid confidante), but she also received during the winter a lengthened visit from her brother Edgar and his wife. A strong intimacy sprung up between the latter and Ruth, who began to entertain a sincere affection for her sister-in-law. Nor was this without good reason, for Margaret Thornbury was a most kind and amiable woman, and fully returned the love Ruth had for her. Walter on two occasions paid Fanny Keats and his aunt a visit of some days, a circumstance which added greatly to Ruth's happiness.

All seemed to go on pleasantly enough till the month of March, when Ruth was one day tempted by the genial weather imprudently to take a long drive in an open carriage. Before her return the wind suddenly changed, and she found herself exposed to a strong, chilling, easterly blast. Unfortunately the wrappings she had taken with her were not sufficient to protect her thoroughly from its influence, and she felt its effects on her frame very strongly. After she had reached home, a severe fit of shivering came over her, which the doctor had great difficulty in subduing. The next day found Ruth confined to her bed, violent inflammation of the lungs having set in. So severe, indeed, was the attack, that Edgar Thornbury was written to by the doctor to visit his sister, as her case was decidedly dangerous. Fortunately, however, under the doctor's skill the acute symptoms subsided. Their effects however continued during the whole of the summer, occasionally causing him the greatest anxiety.

Autumn at last arrived, and not only were the repairs and alterations at the Red House fully completed, but, thanks to the exertions of Mrs. Thornbury and her husband, the house was completely furnished as well. The marriage between the young couple was now about to take place. Ruth Thornbury and Fanny Keats were to leave Torquay, the former to take up her residence with her brother at the Red House, and the latter to return to the house of her parents in X---. Preparations were soon made for this journey, in which the ladies were to be under the escort of Walter Morecombe, who had left London for that purpose. The leave-taking with the doctor and his family was most friendly, and also that between Ruth and the surgeon of the dispensary and his wife. An acute observer might have noticed an expression of much interest on the countenances of the two medical men as they bade Ruth "good-bye." As soon as the carriage had driven off, Dr. Keats said to his friend:

"I am afraid that's a bad affair, Thornton."

"I fear so too," replied Thornton. "I should be very sorry if anything happened to the poor woman, for a more amiable creature than she is I believe never lived."

"It's a great pity," said Dr. Keats, "that she could not have stopped here a little longer, or have gone to some warm climate."

"Why did you not persuade her to do so?" inquired Thornton.

"Well, I did not like to interfere too much in their family arrangements. She and her brother have been separated several years, and during that time many sad events have taken place, which have left a very strong impression on her mind. Miss Thornbury is the very embodiment of family affection. Save her nephews, her brother is the only member of her family now alive; and the prospect of living again with him affords her such happiness, that I do not believe she would have remained away from him, even though she had known death was certain to be the consequence. However, she is gone now, and it is of no use to think anything more about the matter. I will write to my friend Dr. Wilson to-night, giving him all details about her case, and advising him to be particularly on his guard against allowing her to run any risk of getting cold. If he can keep her quietly to the house, and see that every care is taken of her during the winter, she may survive it; although, from the state her lungs are now in, I very much doubt the possibility."

By easy journeys, Ruth Thornbury, her nephew, and Fanny Keats arrived at X --- . Edgar Thornbury and his wife were waiting at the Rev. Mr. Keats's with the pony-carriage, to conduct Ruth home. She was so fatigued, however, that it was deemed advisable for her to remain at Mr. Keats's for the night, and proceed homewards next day. The request of the family that she should stay during the night with them was strongly seconded by Dr. Wilson, who, having heard of her probable arrival, had waited at Mr. Keats's house to receive her. He had that day felt much anxiety on her account, for in the morning he had received a letter from Dr. Keats, informing him of the precarious condition of Ruth's health, the truth of which he became fully aware of the moment he saw her, notwithstanding that the excitement of travelling had somewhat deceived the others as to her real state. The evening passed off very pleasantly; in fact, a happier little party it would have been difficult to imagine. Ruth also was in excellent spirits, and it was not without much persuasion that her friend Dr. Wilson induced her to retire to bed at an earlier hour than the rest. Mr. Thorubury and his wife remained some time after Ruth had left them, and then, accompanied by Walter Morecombe, they drove home, promising to call for Ruth the next day if the weather should prove fine.

Next morning Ruth rose in better health and spirits than might have been expected. She joined the family at the breakfast-table, at which conversation was not for one moment allowed to flag. Breakfast over, Ruth, Mrs. Keats, and her two daughters retired into the drawing-room, where deep and mysterious consultations were held, respecting the dresses and paraphernalia for the approaching ceremony. It was broken by the arrival of Dr. Wilson, who called to see his patient. He found her much better than he had anticipated: still, he clearly perceived it was only one of those delusive appearances so common in consumptive cases.

After the doctor had left them, the consultation among the ladies again commenced, and continued till mid-day with unabated interest, when it was broken by the arrival of Edgar Thornbury and his nephew. Edgar, after lunching with the family, asked his sister whether she was prepared to return home, to which she replied in the affirmative.

When all was in readiness, she stepped into the pony-chaise, and her brother drove off, Walter Morecombe being left behind with his betrothed to follow at his leisure.

During their road homeward, Edgar Thornbury watched attentively the behaviour of his sister. At first, she was in high spirits, and talked freely, and seemed highly to enjoy the idea of returning home. As she neared the Red House, however, a change gradually came over her. It was chiefly observable as they passed certain spots and objects likely to bring with them reminiscences of former The nearer home they came, the more rapidly did these objects present themselves, and the greater evidently became the excitement they occasioned, although Ruth made no remark whatever concerning them. When they arrived at the entrance to the grounds, a very perceptible change came over her countenance. There were mingled in it surprise, bewilderment, and excitement; and she gazed with intense curiosity on everything around her. The dilapidated gate was no longer thrown on the grass beside the carriage drive, nor was the lodge tenantless or in ruins. A handsome modern Gothic cottage occupied the spot on which the old lodge formerly stood, and some four or five fine-looking healthy children were playing under its porch. A cry from them having informed their mother of an arrival, a remarkably neat, goodlooking young woman came out, and, curtseying to Thornbury and his sister, drew back the gate, to allow the carriage to pass in.

As they drove up to the house, the condition of the grounds strongly attracted Ruth's attention. What she had left a tangled field of weeds and briars, had been changed into beautifully kept and tastefully planned pleasure-grounds. Though much surprised at the alterations she saw, she did not utter a single word of comment. The depth of her feeling was evinced by her flushed countenance and anxious searching eye. On coming within sight of the house, however, a low short cry of wonder escaped her, and for a moment she appeared to be under great excitement, which immediately afterwards somewhat subsided. There certainly was considerable cause for it, for the change which had taken place in the Red House during her absence was very great. A handsome portico, as much in keeping with the façade of the house as its architecture would allow, had been built, and this was approached by a broad flight of stone steps. The thick clumsy window frames, with their small panes, had been replaced by sheets of plate glass; and, in fact, every improvement which taste could suggest had been adopted to give a lively modern air to the somewhat quaint and sombre old mansion.

Ruth, on alighting, was welcomed with affectionate cordiality by her sister-in-law, who stood in the portico to receive her. Edgar now joined them, and they entered the hall together, when he warmly embraced his sister, and expressed the great joy both he and his wife felt at her taking up her residence with them. Although Ruth returned her brother's embrace with equal affection and sincerity, there was a certain perplexed look on her countenance which did not escape him, and he rightly judged the cause. Everything around them had been changed. Handsome mahogany double doors, with ornamental sheets of plate-glass inserted in them, screened the inner hall from the cold when the outer door was open. The huge oak staircase had been thoroughly repaired and highly polished, as well as considerably altered. The walls were of a different colour from what they were when she had last seen them, and the whole aspect of the place was so changed that she had some difficulty in believing it to be the same.

Mrs. Thornbury now conducted her sister-in-law into the parlour, in which such strange scenes had taken place before Ruth's departure. If the change in the appearance of the hall had been great, that in the room they were now in far exceeded it. an article of the original furniture remained in itall was modern. An exquisitely carved Italian chimney-piece had been erected, on which was a magnificent mirror. The walls had been newly decorated, and were hung with pictures of considerable value, and selected with excellent taste.

After waiting a short time, to allow Ruth to recover herself, for she had appeared at first both greatly agitated and fatigued, Mrs. Thornbury conducted her to her bed-room, which was the same she had before occupied. Here an equally great metamorphosis had taken place. All the furniture was new; instead of the old dingy bedhangings there was now a fresh chintz of a cheerful pattern-roses on a white ground, and the windowcurtains were of the same. Indeed, not an article remained in the room which could possibly have reminded her of the many years she had occupied it.

But perhaps the difference which struck Ruth the most, was the air of bustling life which pervaded the whole place. The numerous servants at the dinner-table, as well as the animated conversation of those present (two or three gentlemen, resident in the neighbourhood, having dropped in), all seemed to increase her perplexity and make her somewhat ill at ease with herself.

When her brother and the gentlemen, early in the evening, joined the ladies in the drawing-room, Mrs. Thornbury called the notice of her husband to Ruth's anxious and fatigued expression. turned round to look at her, and was considerably alarmed. He made no remark on the subject, however, but merely suggested whether, from the great fatigue she had undergone the last two or three days, it would not be better that she should retire early to rest. Ruth thanked him for his solicitude, and told him that as she did not feel very well, she would gladly follow his advice; and after taking an affectionate leave of her brother and sister, she left the room. A very respectable, handy young woman, who told her that she had been engaged to act as her lady's maid, quickly unpacked her boxes, and everything being arranged, she left her new mistress for the night.

The next day, when Ruth came down to the breakfast-table, she appeared much more cheerful than she had done on the previous evening. Indeed, had it not been for a slight hectic flush on her cheek, the anxiety Edgar had felt on her account would have completely vanished. After breakfast, as the weather was mild, he proposed to show her round the house and grounds, and to explain to her the alterations and arrangements he had already made, and those which he still contemplated making. Ruth readily agreed. Edgar first conducted her over the house. All the rooms, as well as the kitchen and offices in the basement, had returned to their original uses. The study, the room which the reader may remember as having been used for cooking purposes when the kitchen was abandoned, had especially undergone great alterations. Handsome book-cases filled the space formerly occupied by the old bookshelves, but they were as yet empty. The library furniture was all new, and a handsome stained glass window had replaced the old one. To Ruth's inquiry, why the books had not been placed in the bookcases, Edgar told her that the furnishing of the room had only just been completed, and as he intended making her useful in the establishment, he requested that she would accept the office of honorary librarian: "I knew you were always fond of reading, Ruth," he said, "and I fancied it would be just the very occupation for you. All the books are upstairs. When you feel inclined to begin, call Mary, your maid, to assist you-(the girl has had a very decent education, and I am sure will not object to the job)and if she is not strong enough to carry the larger volumes, get some of the men to assist you." Ruth readily accepted the appointment. Although for several years before leaving the house her general reading had fallen into abeyance, yet at Dr. Keats's she had found opportunity to revive and feed her old tastes, and had made frequent use of his excellent library.

Ruth now took her brother's arm to inspect the alterations and improvements he had made in the grounds. So completely had their whole aspect been changed, that but for the position of the fine old trees with which they were studded, she would hardly have known them again. At last, however, she saw in one of the fields an object, unromantic enough in itself, which recalled to her memory some of the scenes of her earlier childhood. By the side of the meadow, and under a dwarf quickset hedge, with some old trees here and there in it, was a small ditch, some three feet wide. It had been a feat with Charity and Edgar, when children, to leap across this ditch, which they could easily do; while poor Ruth did it in a remarkably clumsy manner, generally eliciting thereby the good-humoured laughter of her brother and sister. By chance, the reminiscence struck Edgar at the same moment as it did Ruth.

"Do you remember," he said, "the games we used to have, when children, in leaping across that ditch, and the fun it used to cause us when you couldn't manage it ?"

"Very well," answered Ruth, "and a very naughty boy you were."

"Oh, come now, Ruth, don't talk in that manner, or I shall remind you of a certain pragmatical, puritanical little monkey, who seemed to think her mission on earth was to keep her more talented brother and sister in order. And when you did play the girl, instead of the governess, very ridiculous did you occasionally appear in the youthful character. One day, I remember very well, in a fit of buoyant hilarity you attempted to leap across that ditch, and in doing so nearly tore your frock from your shoulders. A pretty absurd figure you made, with the rueful face you put on when von perceived the mischief you had done. Poor Charity was seated at the time under that tree, and when she found you were not hurt, how she laughed! You were so frequently lecturing her about accidents of the kind, that to be guilty of a similar fault yourself seemed to amuse her exceedingly."

"I remember the circumstance perfectly well," said Ruth, this time without the slightest merriment

They now continued their walk, till they had visited every part of the grounds, and they then returned to the house.

In the evening Dr. Wilson, accompanied by Walter Morecombe, who had remained with the Keats family, arrived at the Red House. Walter was to remain with his uncle till next day, and then to leave for London, where he was to reside till the week before the wedding, which was to take place in a month's time. They were received with great cordiality by all, and passed a very pleasant evening together. The doctor had a conversation with Ruth, whom he found in better health than he expected. Before leaving the house, Edgar Thornbury took an opportunity of asking him his candid opinion on the state of Ruth's health. as he had noticed one or two suspicious symptoms, especially a distressing cough, which harassed her so much at night that he was greatly alarmed on her account.

"Frankly," said the doctor, "I find her in much better health than I had anticipated. Her journey, instead of having a prejudicial effect, as Keats and myself much feared, appears really to have done her good. Still, I will not disguise from you that she is in a most precarious condition, and the greatest care must be taken, else the winter may prove fatal to her. Keep her mind well employed, and do everything you can to make her cheerful. Her spirits must on no account be allowed to flag. Here I am sure she will want for nothing, and we must leave the rest in the hands of the Almighty. I will call and see her occasionally, but if you should notice the slightest change for the worse, pray send over for me and I will come immediately. I am not only much interested in her case, but I have a sincerc regard and sympathy for her."

Next morning Ruth rose early. She wished, if possible, to meet her nephew before the others had joined him at the breakfast-table, so that she might be able to have a little conversation with him alone on subjects connected with the approaching nuptials, in which she was much interested. She found Walter had also left his room, but unfortunately he was engaged with his uncle on business matters in the library, which they had not concluded till breakfast was ready. Ruth, however, was determined not to be disappointed, so she put off her project till the meal was over, and as soon as she had the opportunity she took her nephew's arm and walked with him into the grounds. Here she asked a great many questions as to his arrangements for the future; all of which the young fellow answered readily enough, and with exemplary patience. She then interrogated him as to how Fanny was progressing with the wedding trousseau, but his answers on this point were so unsatisfactory, yet withal so provocatory, that she determined on accompanying him in the carriage to X-, so that she might have an interview with Fanny herself, and return in time for dinner, as the doctor had especially ordered that she should never be out after dusk. On the road she could ask Walter any questions she might have forgotten, as well as satisfy herself on those important points connected with the wedding preparations, on which he had proved himself so lamentably ignorant.

The aunt and nephew now returned to the house and joined the rest of the family, and shortly afterwards, the carriage being in readiness, they started for Mr. Keats's.

Poor Ruth's plan, however, turned out somewhat of a failure. On the road she called to mind many subjects on which she wished her nephew to enlighten her; but although he answered her readily enough, still his replies were by no means satisfactory, as his mind was evidently very much occupied with other matters, and he became the more abstracted the nearer they approached to the home of his bride. At last Ruth, possibly detecting the cause and sympathising with it, dropped the conversation, and perfect silence reigned between them till they had arrived at Mr. Keats's.

Here Ruth was hardly more fortunate. For some time the lovers were engaged together on affairs of such importance that they seemed wholly to forget the presence of the others, and they continued to converse by themselves until it was time for Walter to leave for London. After he had gone Ruth tried to enlist Fanny in conversation, but the damsel was extremely silent, and, although Mrs. Keats conversed readily enough with Ruth on the preparations, and showed her many new purchases which had been made, at the same time they lost a considerable portion of their attractions owing to the fact that Fanny took no part in the consultation. It was now time for Ruth to return home, and she took leave of the Keats family somewhat disappointed with her visit, which to a certain extent, however, was relieved by Fanny and her mother promising her they would pay her a visit next evening, and report progress in a more satisfactory manner than they had done that day.

At breakfast next morning Edgar Thornbury asked his sister when she intended entering on her duties as librarian. "Remember, Ruth," he said, laughing, "no one eats the bread of idleness in this house."

"I am perfectly willing, Edgar," replied Ruth, "to begin the moment breakfast is over. But how am I to manage it? I must have some book in which I can make a catalogue. Have you provided me with one?"

"I have, ma'am," was his answer; "so you will have no excuse on that account. Moreover, I will tell Mary to take up a small table, and a pen and ink, and you can seat yourself beside the closet door and catalogue the books as she takes them out. Now, is there anything further you require?"

"Nothing whatever," said Ruth; "I will begin my work this morning."

Ruth now summoned Mary, and all being in readiness, they commenced their labours. After the girl had taken the books from the closet, and dusted them, Ruth examined and entered them in her catalogue, and then a footman, who was in attendance, took them down into the library. In this way, some hours passed agreeably enough, Mary exerting herself to please her mistress, in which she perfectly succeeded. Lunch being ready. Ruth quitted her post; but so interested was she in her labours, that after a short rest she returned again, although her brother and his wife strongly cautioned her not to over-fatigue herself. She and Mary, however, continued their occupation till it was nearly four o'clock, when the latter drew forth from the closet a small book, which had formerly been very handsomely bound, but was now considerably worn. Mary had just opened it, when it caught Ruth's eye, and she immediately took it from the girl's hand, and without even waiting to have the thick dust brushed off it, she placed it in the pocket of her dress, merely remarking that it was her prayer-book when she was a girl. A short time afterwards, pleading fatigue, she told Mary they would do no more that day, and she then retired to her own room, till the bell rung for dinner. During the meal, she appeared more abstracted and thoughtful than usual, but not so much so as to excite any particular attention on the part of her brother and his wife.

In the evening Mrs. Keats and her two daughters paid her their promised visit. They were exceedingly communicative, going with great minuteness into all the details they thought would amuse her. But it was Ruth's turn to be silent and absent. She certainly attempted to force her attention to their remarks, but with very little success, nor could they fail to notice the very little effect their attempts to amuse her produced. Seeing the languid condition she was in, Mrs. Thornbury told her she feared she had over-fatigued herself during the day. Ruth admitted the possibility, and pleaded it as an excuse for retiring. After she had left the room, all remarked upon the change which had taken place in her appearance and manners, trusting at the same time it would pass off after a good night's rest. Next morning Ruth had somewhat recovered, but the effect of the previous night's fatigue was still plainly visible on her. Her brother advised her not to occupy herself with the books that day, but Ruth, who had taken a great fancy for the work, begged that she might be allowed to continue it. At last, a compromise was entered into, Ruth promising that her labours should not last longer than an hour, and then she would do nothing more for the remainder of the day. This being agreed to, she summoned Mary, and they commenced their occupation. Among the books they took from the closet, were some elementary educational works, of little value, which had been used by Ruth and her brother and sister in their school-days, and which she had not required when instructing her little nephews. Few and uninteresting as they were, she appeared to take far more interest in them thau in any which had yet passed through her hands. After Mary had dusted them, Ruth would not allow them to be taken down into the library with the others, but she placed them aside, saving she would take charge of them herself. Her hour's labour over, she took the school-books with her into her bed-room, where she remained till it was dinner-time. At table the abstraction she had shown the day before seemed rather to have increased than otherwise, but not to such an extent as to call forth any special remark from her brother

For three days afterwards, Ruth, assisted by Mary, continued the inventory of the books, setting aside as before the few school-books she met with, and taking them with her into her own room. All the others having been placed on the shelves and duly catalogued, the library arrangements were then pronounced by Edgar Thornbury to be complete.

CHAPTER XIX .-- RUTH TERMINATES HER MISSION.

NOVEMBER now set in somewhat coldly, and a great change took place in Ruth Thornbury's appearance and manner. Her flow of spirits had gradually fallen off, and her health had suffered in like proportion. She was now in a far more precarious condition than she had ever been; her brother and sister, with all their desire to take the most favourable view of her case, could not disguise from themselves that there was very little hope of her recovery. Her cough had very much increased, and it was only through the aid of narcotics that she could obtain a few hours' rest. It was with difficulty that she could move from one room to another without assistance. At the first appearance of the relapse, Dr. Wilson had advised that an attempt should be made to take her to the south of Europe, thinking that perhaps the change to a warmer climate might check the march of the disease. But Ruth would not agree to this proposal. Like many other consumptive patients, she was not willing to admit herself to be in the infirm state of health she really was. She had set her heart on being present at her nephew's wedding, and nothing could make her swerve from her determination. A change, however, had taken place in her ideas respecting it. She had gradually lost all interest in the preparations, which had hitherto had so much attraction for her; the prospect of her nephew's future happiness now alone occupied her thoughts.

"RUTH THORNBURY."

Her spirits continued to droop, and at length, without the slightest apparent cause, she would burst into fits of weeping. She avoided meeting strangers who came to the house, and frequently remained alone in her room for hours together. Her brother and his wife did all in their power to amuse and cheer her, but without success. Finding their efforts unavailing, they inquired whether they could do anything to afford her pleasure or amusement, or whether any alterations in their domestic arrangements could be made so as to be more agreeable to her. To this she replied that there was nothing she possibly could wish for that was not already provided, and she expressed herself most grateful for the kindness and consideration shown her. She very much regretted that they should have noticed her depressed spirits, but she assured them that there was not the least rational cause for it, beyond her feeling some bodily weakness. So far from being unhappy, she told them it was scarcely possible for any human being to be in a happier frame of mind than she was.

For some days after this conversation with her brother and his wife she appeared more cheerful, but it was evidently rather from a desire to please them than from any real improvement in her health; and they easily saw, from her rapidly decreasing bodily strength, that she was practising on them an excusable deception.

A week now only remained before the wedding was to take place, and Walter Morecombe took up his residence at the Red House. Although Ruth had so dressed herself to receive him as to leave the effects of the disease as little visible as possible, and, by way of greater precaution, had seated herself in an easychair placed with its back to the window, so that the light might not show her face too clearly, her nephew was deeply grieved at the change he perceived had taken place in her. He had much difficulty in restraining the expression of sorrow on his countenance; but Ruth quickly detected the real state of his feelings, and was not ungratified by it. She gave him her hand, and kissed him affectionately. "You're a dear good boy," she said to him, for she still seemed to regard him in much the same light as when he was a child-"you're a dear good boy, and I understand you fully. Promise me faithfully that you will not allow me to see any sorrow on your face; it is much better-looking without it. Remember that your wedding will be to me the climax of all the happy events of my life, and I must neither see nor hear anything that may tend to depress me." Walter promised what she asked, although the dry hot hand he held in his, and the plainly perceptible throbbing of the veins in it, told him at the same time (unscientific as he was) that he had good cause for sorrow.

That evening Mr. and Mrs. Keats and their daughters visited the family at the Red House, and except for the occasional anxious glances they cast on Ruth, who had insisted on sitting up to meet them, all went off very happily. Even Ruth, from the excitement she was now under, seemed in better health, and she took great interest in what was going on around her. With Fanny Keats she was especially pleased. The girl had sat beside her on a sofa, and had given her a lengthy account of the arrangements she had made in dress and other matters. But the interest she now felt was solely in the happiness shown by the young girl, who under such favourable auspices was about to commence the most hazardous portion of the journey of life. The party separated at a somewhat early hour on Ruth's account, who, in spite of all their entreaties, could not be induced to leave

Next day she suffered severely from fatigue. Dr. Wilson called to see her in the morning, and found her so weak and languid that he advised her to remain in her room the whole of the day.

"I am afraid," he continued, "I must also put a prohibition on you which will grieve you very

"What may that be?" said Ruth, smiling.

"Simply that you do not leave the house the day of the wedding, for the fatigue it would occasion you might be far too great for you to bear."

"Then, doctor-I shall certainly disobey you. For particular reasons, known only to myself, I wish to be present at the wedding, and nothing less than positive incapability of moving shall prevent

"I am sorry for it," said the doctor. "I did not expect to find you so obstinate."

"But why should you be sorry," said Ruth. "when you know how much pleasure it will afford

"Possibly," the doctor replied, smiling, "for a selfish reason: I shall be so anxious about you that I shall lose one half the pleasure I have promised myself at the wedding."

"Come, doctor," said Ruth, "be a little reasonable. I know you are a good kind soul, and you must help me if you can. In return I will meet your views half way. Give me only sufficient strength to be present in the church during the ceremony, and I promise you I will return home immediately afterwards, and not make my appearance at the wedding breakfast. I will not trouble you to come back with me or take any care of me. Mary will accompany me, and she will be quite able to bring me back. Now is that a bargain between us?"

"Well," said the doctor, laughing, "wilful women must have their way I suppose, as well as wilful men. I agree to the proposal save in one point, and in that I shall use my own discretion."

"Which is it?" inquired Ruth.

"Whether you shall come back with Mary alone, or whether I shall accompany you. And now, to get your strength up for the occasion, in the first place you must promise implicitly to obey my instructions."

"I will do so to the letter, I assure you."

"Then you must not leave your bed-room till the sun is well up, not before, say, eleven o'clock, and if the weather is cold or stormy you must remain in it all day."

"Agreed."

"You must absolutely keep silence, save in the case of any necessary instructions to your maid, and you must take regularly the medicine I shall send you."

"I faithfully promise to do all that," said Ruth.

"You must see no strangers, nor any one from the Keats family. In order that they may not consider it unkind on your part, I will call on them this evening and inform them of the prohibition I have put on you. Should the weather become mild and warm, and the sun be out, I have no objection to your taking a short drive in the afternoon, but it must not last longer than an hour at the utmost. I dare say your brother, or his nephew, if he can tear himself away from his beloved, would accompany you. Remember you must be well wrapped up, and you must drive very slowly that you may not be fatigued. Now obey these orders in every particular, and I think you will be able to be present at the wedding, but you must return home, according to your own proposition, as soon as it is over."

Ruth implicitly obeyed the doctor's instructions, but till within two days of the wedding the weather was not sufficiently genial to allow her to take the projected drive. On that afternoon, however, it was warm and sunny, and Walter Morecombe, who happened to be at the Red House, volunteered to accompany his aunt. The little pony carriage being ready, Ruth was well wrapped up in furs and took her seat in it, and Walter having seated himself by her side they started at a walking pace. The air and sun had a most beneficial effect on Ruth's spirits, and on more than one occasion she was on the point of commencing a conversation with Walter, but remembering the doctor's advice she had sufficient command over herself to continue silent.

Without having traced out any definite course, Walter drove along the different roads he considered most sheltered from the wind, till the hour allotted for their drive was nearly exhausted, and he then turned homewards. Presently they came in sight of a neat cottage, and Ruth, without speaking, placed her hands on the reins to reduce the pace of the pony to a walk, for he had started off somewhat rapidly. Walter took no notice of the movement, but absorbed in his own thoughts looked straight along the road before him. Not so Ruth; her eyes were riveted on the cottage as they passed it. It was Elm Lodge, which the reader will remember as being inhabited by Charity. Unlike the Red House not a single alteration had been made upon it. Its appearance seemed precisely the same as on the morning Charity had quitted it.

The reminiscences which the sight of the cottage suggested were exceedingly painful to Ruth. Presently Walter turned his head towards her, and perceived that she was weeping bitterly.

"My dear aunt," he said, with much astonishment in his tone, and pulling up the pony at the same time, "what is the matter with you?"

"Don't you remember that cottage, Walter?" she said.

"No, I do not. Stop a moment, though," he continued, gazing at it attentively. "It seems to me I have seen it before, though I cannot remember when."

"That is Elm Lodge, my dear; the house in which your poor mamma lived, and in which you and your brother were born. Drive on now, and I will try and recover myself before we arrive at the house. I should not like your uncle to see that I have been crying."

Walter now drove rapidly homeward, deeply blaming himself for his carelessness in not having ascertained the exact position of Elm Lodge. He knew the house in which his poor mother had lived was in that locality. He had never visited it, although he had frequently promised himself to find it out. His uncle had never mentioned it to him, nor anything connected with the place, as he still disliked to think of any incident connected with Charity's marriage. All the servants at the Red House being strangers to the neighbourhood, Edgar could have gained but little information from them, even if he had been inclined to question them on the subject. The mischief, however, was now done, and could not be undone; but he was nevertheless sorely vexed at the misadventure. Before they arrived at the Red House, Ruth had dried her tears, and her brother, who was waiting to receive her under the portico, did not perceive that she had been crying. He inquired whether she had enjoyed her drive, to which she merely nodded assent, remembering the doctor's advice not to converse with any one. With some little difficulty, they got her to her room, where she remained at ease for the remainder of the day. On the morrow Dr. Wilson called to see her, and was by no means pleased at the condition he found her in. Mary told him that her mistress had slept but little the previous night, though her cough had troubled her far less than it usually did. Dr. Wilson would willingly have prohibited Ruth's leaving the house the next day, but, as he knew he should not be obeyed, he merely gave her some directions, and then left her, resolving not to quit her side at church till he had conducted her home again.

The next morning was as bright and sunny as any young couple could have wished for their marriage day. It had been arranged that Walter should drive Mrs. Thornbury in the pony-chaise to church, and that Mr. Thornbury should follow them in the carriage with Ruth, and Mary, her maid. Walter and Mrs. Thornbury now started off, and Ruth, having been dressed by Mary, and assisted downstairs by her, had taken a seat in the drawing-room till the carriage should drive up. Her brother here saw her for the first time that morning, and was much pleased with her appearance, as she seemed in far better health than for some weeks past. Had Dr. Wilson been present he might have formed a different judgment in the case.

The carriage being ready, Edgar and Mary assisted Ruth into it, and the coachman having received orders to drive carefully, they started on their road to the church, where they arrived immediately after the Keats family, and a few minutes before the time fixed for the ceremony. The bride certainly looked well, and was dressed in excellent taste; while the bridegroom was about as handsome a young fellow as could have been found in the county. Warm indeed were the greetings between the different friends present, and all received Ruth with the greatest affection.

The clergyman having taken his place at the altar, Ruth quitted her brother's arm (he having to act as bridesman) for that of Dr. Wilson. She placed herself beside the altar railings, so that (in his opinion) she might keep her eye on the young couple during the ceremony. He was in error, however. As soon as the service commenced, she knelt down, and with bowed head and hands pressed together engaged in prayer: but, with the exception of her lips moving, she remained perfectly motionless till it was finished. When all was over, and the bridal party were moving towards the vestry, Dr. Wilson touched her on the shoulder, and told her to rise. Still Ruth for some minutes moved not, as if determined to continue her prayer. At length, with her friend's assistance, she rose from her knees, and placed herself on a seat by the altar, the doctor remaining the while by her side. As soon as the formalities in the vestry were terminated, the wedding party left it, and entered the church to return home. Previous to quitting the building, the young couple advanced towards Ruth, who, seated as she was, put out her hands to receive them, and affectionately kissed them both.

"God bless you, my children," she said, "may you both be happy—there, go on, go on, do not let me detain you. Good-bye, good-bye," and as they moved away, she continued, in so low a tone that the doctor only could hear it, "Good-bye—and for ever."

As soon as the church was cleared of the weddingparty, Ruth, leaning on the arm of the doctor on one side, and supported by Mary on the other, proceeded down the centre aisle to the brougham. which was waiting for her at the door. With some little difficulty she was placed in it, and the doctor then seated himself by her side, and as soon as Mary had got up beside the coachman, they drove slowly in the direction of the Red House. Ruth continued perfectly silent till the carriage arrived at the turnpike-gates, when the doctor nodded to Mr. Carter, the general shopkeeper, whom he saw standing in front of his house. A smile passed across Ruth's face, as she noticed the doctor's nod of recognition, for she had of course heard that it was Mr. Carter and his boy who had discovered her, when she was so nearly dying from starvation. She smiled, and said to the doctor, -

"Circumstances are much changed since the last time Mr. Carter saw me with you in your carriage. You were then taking me from home to restore me to life, after having suffered much misery and privation. You are now taking me home, after witnessing one of the happiest—"

"Hush, be silent," said the doctor, somewhat sharply interrupting her; for he dreaded the conclusion of her sentence, knowing full well its truth. "Be silent; do you think you have so much breath that you can afford to waste it?" Then, noticing a slight expression of sorrow on Ruth's countenance. he placed his hand gently on hers, and continued. "Pardon me, I did not mean to offend you, but you had better not talk." Ruth obeyed him, and not another word was spoken on their road home. When the carriage arrived at the Red House, the doctor and Mary assisted Ruth to alight, and she was then carried into her chamber. The doctor did not leave the house till she was in bed, and then, finding that she exhibited no symptoms to cause him any immediate anxiety, he again drove home. On passing the turupike-gates, he saw Mr. Carter standing on the road, and evidently wishing to speak with him. The carriage pulled up, and the shopkeeper advancing to the window,

"I am afraid, doctor, that poor lady is in a bad way. She had a better chance of living when we found her starving in the Red House, than she has now, surrounded as she is with every luxury and comfort that wealth can produce."

"I fear you are right, Mr. Carter," replied the doctor. "I am sorry to say there is no hope for her in this world. A few weeks, or even days, and all will be over."

"I am sorry for it, sir," said Mr. Carter. "I have lately heard a good deal about her, more than I ever heard before, and not a soul seems to be able to say a bad word of her."

"I believe a more amiable creature never lived," said the doctor, beckening to his coachman to drive on, as he knew that Mr. Carter was apt to be garrulous when he had nothing else to do.

The doctor arrived at Mr. Keats's house while the wedding guests were still at breakfast. He gave a favourable report of his patient, perhaps more so than was altogether truthful; but in this he was actuated by the kind feeling of not wishing to spoil the happiness of others; and seating himself at the table, he was soon one of the merriest of the party. And all went off well, even to the time-honoured fashion of throwing the slipper.

The day after the wedding, Ruth found herself too much fatigued by the previous day's exertion, to quit her room; nor did she ever after leave it. She sank gradually. Besides her immediate relations in the house, the only two persons who saw her were Dr. Wilson and the Rev. Mr. Keats. both of whom were most assiduous in their attentions. For some time, no extraordinary symptoms in Ruth's malady showed themselves; but at length Dr. Wilson noticed that when he called on her in the day time, she was frequently in a deep sleep, from which he found it difficult to arouse her. At first this caused him no surprise; but finding that the fits of somnolency began to assume a good deal of the appearance of those she had suffered from after her removal from the Red House. he closely questioned Mary as to whether she had noticed anything particular in her mistress's behaviour. Mary informed him, that with the exception of her being rather irritable at night at any noise, and always lying with her head turned towards the window, she had not noticed anything extraordinary in her. This hardly satisfied Dr. Wilson, and he wrote the same evening to his friend, Dr. Keats in Torquay, mentioning to him the facts, and requesting his opinion on them. By a singular coincidence, Dr. Keats had for some time past been intending to pay a short visit to his brother in X-, and as he had always felt much interest in Ruth's case, he resolved not to delay his depar-Two days afterwards he arrived at his brother's house. The same evening he called on Dr. Wilson, and it was agreed that the two should visit Ruth next day. When they arrived at the Red House they found Ruth in a deep sleep, so profound, indeed, was it, that she was totally unaware of their presence. Dr. Keats looked at her anxiously for some moments without speaking. Presently he leant forward to ascertain more correctly the state of her breathing, In doing so, he perceived the end of a book projecting from beneath her pillow. "It is my mistress's prayer-book," said Mary, who just at that moment entered the room. "It is an old one she found among the books, when we were sorting them." The doctor mechanically opened it, and found written on the fly-leaf,-

"To my dear sister Ruth, on her seventeenth birthday, CHARITY THORNBURY."

He also found the end fly-leaf gummed to the binding at the top and bottom, so as to form a sort of pocket. In it was something in a paper envelope, on which was written in a school-girl's hand, "A lock of poor George's hair." It was the same which had been put into Ruth's drawer by her sister after the death of the child. How and where Ruth had secreted it during so many years, no one knew.

"This, I suspect," said Dr. Keats, "will furnish a clue to the whole mystery. Could you," he continued, addressing Mrs. Thornbury, "question her on the subject?"

Mrs. Thornbury promised to do so, and the two doctors then left the house, resolving to call on the morrow.

When they arrived next day, before visiting Ruth they were conducted by Mrs. Thornbury into the parlour.

"I have executed your commission," she said.
"Ruth tells me, that every night the spirit of her sister, in the white robes of an angel, visits her for some time, and that they pray together. Charity, who, she says, always stands by the side of her bed nearest the window, has informed her, that whether visible or invisible, she is always in the room watching over her, nor will she quit her till it shall please the Almighty to take her away."

"It is certainly a singular hallucination," said Dr. Kcats.

"If, indeed, it be an hallucination," said the Rev. Mr. Keats, who had accompanied them in their visit, rather as if thinking aloud than addressing the others.

"I maintain it is simply an hallucination, but at the same time, it is one from which it would be cruelty to awaken her. Leave her undisturbed in her happiness for the few short hours she has now to live. Let me remark, however, that the position of the phantom by the side of her bed nearest to the window, is the same in which she saw her sister that night on which she first felt the certainty of her approaching death, and the white robes of the angel, the effect of the beams of the moon that at that moment fell upon her night-dress, causing the idea of the supernatural it did at the moment of her awakening."

The brother said nothing, but it was easy to conclude from the expression of his countenance, that he was hardly convinced by the argument. They then visited Ruth, but she was unconscious, and they soon left her.

Ruth Thornbury lived only a week longer. Her sister-in-law and Mary acted as her nurses during the time, assisted occasionally by Mrs. Keats, who out of pure friendship took up her abode in the house. During the day the invalid slept incessantly. When evening approached, she somewhat rallied, and during the night she never closed her eyes, and was evidently under the impression that her sister's spirit was standing by her side, waiting or the moment of her dissolution. Ruth's hallunation made a singular impression on those who at up with her; they could not divest themselves of the idea that an angel, invisible to them, was in the room, and they prayed silently and as intently as Ruth herself. The evening before her death, she appeared to be aware that her end was approaching, and she took leave of her friends. Towards morning, the symptoms became so alarming, that the family gathered round her bed, expecting every moment would be her last. When dawn broke, she was still alive, though her breathing was hardly perceptible. When the suu rose brightly, and cast its beams into the room, Ruth for a moment showed signs of consciousness. She appeared to awake from a dream, and seemed to have some difficulty in collecting her Presently, fixing her eyes on her brother, she said .-

"Am I awake?"

"Yes, dear Ruth," was his reply. "Do you feel better?"

For an instant she made no reply, but afterwards raising her head slightly from her pillow, she said, "Kiss me, dear brother."

Thornbury pressed his lips on his sister's brow.

Ruth's head then sunk gently on her pillow, and she again fell asleep—this time to wake no more.

Little more remains to be told of the Thornbury family. About two years after the death of Ruth. her younger nephew visited England, where he remained for six months, and then returned to India. taking with him as his wife the second daughter of the Rev. Mr. Keats. Edgar Thornbury retired from the business, leaving it entirely in the hands of his nephews. Their career has been a most successful one, and they now rank among the merchant princes of the country; and as Edgar Thornbury, who continues to reside at the Red House, has no family, they may be considered as the presumptive heirs to his fortune.

In taking leave of his subject, the author feels that he has done but scant justice to the character of Ruth Thornbury. God is Love, and she possessed as much of His divine essence as human frailty would permit. The end and aim of this narrative has been to show how slight a barrier of earth may occasionally stand between a pious, amiable, and affectionate old maid, and the guardian angel of her family. How far he has been able to carry out the idea it is for the reader to decide.

NOTE ON THE STORY OF JAMES MACRAE.

Since the publication of our short notice of James Macrae, *a volume has been kindly sent to us of whose existence we were ignorant, but of which we gladly avail ourselves, to give a few details supplementing, and in some points correcting, those already given from more limited sources of information. The volume we allude to is entitled "Annals of James Macrae, Esq., Governor of Madras, 1725—1731; compiled from Official Records by J. Talboys Wheeler, Professor of Moral Philosophy and Logic at the Madras Presidency College." These annals formed a portion of "Madras in the Olden Time," a larger work, published by the same author. A few copies of the Memoir of Macrae were struck off at Madras, for private circulation only, in 1862.

In an appendix the fullest information, gathered from articles published in the Ayr Observer, is given regarding the Governor, with references to all that has been written in various publications in connection with the same romantic story. We now give Professor Wheeler's account of the beginning and ending of his career; omitting the annals of his Governorship—which have comparatively little interest of a personal character.

I. Macrae's Early Life.—"Mr. James Macrae was born in Ayrshire about the later part of the reign of merry King Charles. His parents were of the very lowest class, and he himself whilst a boy is said to have been employed in looking after eattle. His father, however, died whilst James was still very young; and his mother then removed with her son to the town of Ayr; where they lived in a little thatched cottage in the suburbs, and where the poor widow gained her living as a washerwoman. Here young Macrae added something to his mother's earnings by running messages; but at the same time seems to have picked up some little education by means only known to Scotchmen. He appears, however, to have grown tired of this monotonous life whilst still a boy. Ayr was a scaport; and it is easy to understand how a young man, endowed with the energy which Macrae subsequently prov ment of Mr. Elwick led to Mr. Macrae's advancement to the latter post sooner than could have been expected. returned from the West Coast towards the end of 1724, and without proceeding to Fort St. David, at once took his seat as second Member of Council at Fort St. George. At last, on the 18th of January, 1725, the son of the poor washerwoman of Ayr took his place as Governor of the Madras Presidency."

II. Macrae's Later Years.—"On the 21st January, 1731, Governor Macrae set sail for England, after an absence of some forty years. Without a wife, and without, of course, any legitimate child, he appears to have returned to his native land laden with a fortune popularly estimated at above a hundred thousand pounds. According to a tradition published a few years back in the Ayrshire Observer, the vessel in which Mr. Macrae returned to England was captured on its way by a privateer; and the shrewd ex-Governor, knowing the vessel to have on board a valuab family. It seems that his mother had been dead some years, and that his sister, who was still living at Ayr, had married a man named MacGuire, who gained a livelihood partly as a carpenter, and partly as a fiddler at kirns and weddings. Mr. Macrae accordingly wrote to his sister at Ayr, enclosing a large sum of money, and engaging to provide handsomely for herself and family. The surprise of Mr. and Mrs. MacGuire was of course unbounded; and they are said to have given way to their delight by indulging in a luxury which will serve to illustrate both their ideas of happiness, and the state of poverty in which they had been living. They procured a loaf of sugar and a bottle of brandy; and scooping out a hole in the sugar loaf, they poured in the brandy, and supped up the sweetened spirit with spoons, until the excess of felicity compelled them to close their eyes in peaceful slumber.

"The grand object which Mr. Macrae appears to have had in view during the remaining years of his life, was the elevation of his sister's family, the four daughters of Mr. and Mrs. MacGuire.* The eldest daughter married William, the thirteenth Earl of Glencairn. In this match Governor Macrae took the liveliest interest, but it did not come off till the year 1744; and then the old Nabob was so seriously ill that the doctor could not assure him of living until the solemnisation of the nuptials. On this occasion Governor Macrae gave his niece as 'tocher' the barony of Ochiltree, which had cost him 25,000l., as well as diamonds to the value of 45,000l. But the marriage did not prove a happy one, for the earl had no real affection for his wife, however much he may have respected her wealth. The earl, however, was not inclined to submit to any taunting allusions to his wife's family, for when Lord Cassilis reproached him at a ball with having so far forgotten his rank as to marry a fiddler's daughter, he at once replied,— 'Yes, my lord, and one of my father-in-law's favourite airs was "The Gipsys cam' to Lord Cassilis's yett," ' referring to the elopement of a Countess of Cassilis with the gipsys, celebrated in the old song of 'Johnny Faa.'
The second son of this Earl of Glencairn, by the niece of Governor Macrae, succeeded to his father's title as James, fourteenth Earl of Glencairn, and is known as a benefactor of the Poet Burns. This earl died in 1791, when Burns wrote his 'Lament for James, Earl of Glencairn,' concluding with the following pathetic lines:—

'The bridegroom may forget the bride, Was made his wedded wife yestreen; The monarch may forget the erown That on his head an hour has been;

The mither may forget the bairn
That smiles sae sweetly on her knee;
But I'll remember thee, Glencairn, And a' that thou hast done for me!'

"The second daughter of the MacGuires married Mr. James Erskine, who received the estate of Alva; and was afterwards elevated to the Bench under the title of Lord Alva.

"The third daughter married a young gentleman of suspicious origin, who went by the name of James Macrae. This young man was said to be the nephew of the old Governor, but he is generally supposed to have been a natural son. The barony of Houston was conferred upon the pair, but the subsequent career of this branch of the family was far from fortunate. A son, known as Captain Macrae, became a reputed bully and professed duellist at Edinburgh; and is represented in one of the caricatures of the time as practising with a pistol at a barber's block. In 1790 Captain Macrae fought a celebrated duel with Sir George Ramsay, in which the latter was mortally wounded. It seems that whilst both gentlemen were escorting some ladies out of the theatre at Edinburgh, their servants quarrelled as to whose carriage should be drawn up at the door. Each of the gentlemen took his servant's part, and the result was the duel which occasioned the death of Sir George Ramsay and the exile and outlawry of Captain Macrae. "The youngest married Mr. Charles Dalrymple, who was Sheriff Clerk of Ayr, and received the estate of Crangefield.

Crangefield....
In conclusion, we must notice the very few recorded events which are still preserved of the last years of Governor Macrae. The old Anglo-Indian appears to have passed some fifteen years in his native country prior to his death in 1746. In 1733 he was admitted as a burgess of the old town of Ayr, when his name was entered a James Macrae, late Governor of Madras. In 1734 he presented the citizens of Glasgow with the metallic equestrian statue of King William, which still adorns that city. How he employed himself during the latter years of his life is nowhere stated, beyond the bare fact that he lived and died at Orangefield. We can easily, however, imagine the old man busy in promoting the advancement of his nieces, and in superintending the estates which he purchase. from time to time. One of his last recorded acts occurred in December, 1745, when he lent 5000*l*, to the community of Glasgow, to meet the sum which had been levied from them by Prince Charles. He died somewhere about the year 1746, and was buried in Prestwick churchyard. Such is the eventful story of Governor Macrae, the son of a washerwoman of Ayr."

It does not appear from the information given in this volume that there is any evidence of the Ex-Governo having been whipped when a boy through the streets of Ayr. No allusion is made, indeed, to such an event in history. Our correspondent found the story recorded in a periodical published in Kilmarnock in August, 1833 entitled "The Improvisator," an Ayrshire Journal of Literature and the Fine Arts. But it does not seem to be But it does not seem to be supported by evidence

We are also glad to be informed that Glasgow is not the only city on this side the Irish Channel which ha erceted a statue to the Great William, though unquestionably it is the finest of them, and one of the best equestria statues in the country. A correspondent in Hull informs us that an equestrian statue stands in the Market Place that town, and has been recently gilt, being "gold without and wood within." Other correspondents tell us of on in St. James's Square, London, another in Bristol, and others elsewhere.
